product as may be prescribed, which creates an interest or any other exposure of a financial or equivalent kind' (emphasis added). The Act provides no definition of what is meant by either 'financial product' or 'an interest'. If one confines one's analysis to the four corners of the English text, it is difficult to determine precisely what was intended by BPPG s 3(3).

However, the Afrikaans text of the Act offers some insight. The Afrikaans text suggests that the provincial government cannot bind itself to a 'financial product' which creates 'rente' or 'any other exposure of a financial or equivalent kind'. If one were to make use of the ejusdeum generis rule as an aid to interpretation, it would suggest that the 'other exposure' shares some common denominator with 'rente'. 'Rente' signifies not 'an interest' of a generalised nature, but 'interest' in the sense of 'interest which is payable'. The 'other exposure' would therefore be an exposure to the payment of something that is similar to interest (in the form of 'rente') such as finance charges and the like.

If interest is taken to mean a form of finance charge, then BPPG s 3(3) is highly restrictive of provincial borrowing. It would extend to loans for capital expenditure which are not limited by FC s 230.

A further limitation to provincial borrowing should be mentioned in this context. This limitation is on the borrowing powers of provincial public entities. In terms of PFMA s 66, only provincial government business enterprises may be authorised to borrow money for capital expenditure.[1] The determining factors in the classification of a provincial government business enterprise are the fact that it is not funded from the provincial revenue fund, and that it carries out business activities in accordance with ordinary business principles.

The effect of the limitations in the BPPG and the PFMA is that a province may only carry out capital expenditure by funding the expenditure itself, by entering into a public private partnership ('PPP') agreement or by setting up a business enterprise that has sufficient revenues to borrow money. In this regard, many provinces do not have the ability to raise finance in the market cheaply. Furthermore, provincial government business enterprises are not easy to establish, and the authorisation to borrow follows scrutiny by National Treasury. As a result, provinces have limited access to the borrowing market. The legislative barriers to provincial revenue raising and borrowing may have had an impact on the service delivery ability of provincial government. Provincial goverment is incentivised in this way to collaborate with the private sector on capital expenditure projects, either through PPP projects or joint ventures that involve private investment outside of the PPP framework.

Municipal Borrowing

National Treasury has developed a highly coherent framework for municipal borrowing. A key document is National Treasury's 'Policy Framework for [1] Certain provincial public entities may be authorised to borrow money for bridging purposes.

Municipal Borrowing and Financial Emergencies' ('the Municipal Borrowing Policy') which was gazetted in 2000.[1] The policy emphasises the need to enhance municipal access to private capital markets but stresses, > that in pursuing this goal, central government wishes to avoid the apartheid-era practice of generally underwriting municipal borrowing and, in effect, transferring municipal liabilities onto itself. Government's central objective is not to produce a short-term inflow of 'soft' or subsidised funds to municipalities. It is, rather, to develop a sustainable market for municipal debt where risk is properly priced. In the long term an environment needs to emerge where loan finance becomes increasingly available and decreasingly costly to municipalities because the regulatory and institutional frameworks encourage appropriate behaviours, municipalities are increasingly well managed, and ancillary market facilitators are increasingly active.[2]

National Treasury's vision (as set out in the policy document) has four core elements: the restriction on borrowing for current or operational expenditure; the prohibition of sovereign guarantees for municipal borrowing;[3] the expansion of permitted forms of municipal security; and the creation of an institutional framework for municipal default and bankruptcy.[4] FC s 230A provides constitutional support for the first and third of these elements.[5] FC s 230A(1)(a) allows Municipal Councils to raise loans for capital or current expenditure, but allows loans for current expenditure to be 'raised only when necessary for bridging purposes during a fiscal year'. The MFMA expresses this restriction by creating a distinction between long-term and short-term debt and restricting the uses of long-term debt. Hence, MFMA s 46(1) states that, '[a] municipality may incur long-term debt … only for the purpose of (a) capital expenditure on property, plant or equipment to be used for the purpose of achieving the objects of local government …; or (b) re-financing existing long-term debt.' The key consequence of these provisions is that municipalities may not borrow to avoid operational deficits and hence can default on their financial obligations for financial reasons. Furthermore, this outcome is not softened by national legislation as is the case with provincial borrowing. Indeed, section 153(1)(c) of the MFMA provides expressly for default in a detailed chapter dealing with financial problems. The provision states that '[a] municipality may apply to the High Court for an order … to terminate the municipality's financial obligations to creditors, and to settle claims in accordance with a distribution scheme referred to in section 155'

A further key element is set out in FC s 230A(1)(b). According to the section, a 'Municipal Council may, in accordance with national legislation … bind itself and

[1] The Borrowing Policy was published in Government Gazette No 21423 (28 July 2000).
[2] Ibid at 6.
[3] See § 27(5)(c) infra, under the heading 'Sub-Sovereign Debt'.
[4] See § 27(6)(c) infra.
[5] FC s 230A is the result of an amendment introduced through Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 34 of 2001.

a future Council in the exercise of its legislative and executive authority to secure loans or investments for the municipality'. The national legislation referred to is the MFMA which provides impressive security provisions. In terms of MFMA s 48(2), appropriate security includes, 'ceding as security any category of revenue or rights to future revenue [which would include equitable share] … undertaking to retain revenues or specific municipal tariffs or other charges, at a particular level or at a level sufficient to meet its financial obligations … undertaking to make provision in its budgets for the payment of its financial obligations, including capital and interest … agreeing to restrictions on debt that the municipality may incur in future until the secured debt is settled or the secured obligations are met'. These provisions allow for a fettering of legislative and executive discretion and indicate how seriously the national legislature considers the issue of political risk in respect of municipal borrowing.[1] The scope of the constitutional and MFMA provisions are, however, limited to security for loans and investments, and do not extend to security for the payment of monies in respect of general contracts.

FC s 230A is not undercut by national legislation. There is no equivalent of the BPPG at municipal level and borrowing for capital expenditure occurs and is encouraged.[2] Indeed, National Treasury considered limiting the amount of long-term debt (for example, by prescribing ratios of the debt service burden to revenues) and chose not to do so.[3] Furthermore, the security arrangements permitted in FC s 230A(1)(b) and the MFMA are expansive and are presumably intended to counter-balance the exclusion of national and provincial guarantees.[4]

Sub-Sovereign Debt

An issue closely aligned to the question of borrowing for current expenditure is that of national government guarantees for provincial and municipal debt. This critical issue follows from the premise that the national government cannot fail financially, while municipal governments can. National guarantees of municipal debt would insulate municipalities from financial failure, if they were possible.

[1] In a speech given by the National Minister of Finance on the Second Reading Debate on the Municipal Finance Management Bill on the 11th September 2003, it is stated that the intention of the insertion of section 230A was to reduce the risk premium for municipalities when they borrow funds. The Minister referred to national government's commitment to facilitating a municipal borrowing market and allowing municipalities to lower their costs of borrowing for capital expenditure and to attract investors. Accessed from http://www.treasury.gov.za/speech/2003091102.pdf on 24 April 2007.

[2] See National Treasury (2004) 33.

[3] See Municipal Borrowing Policy (supra) at 16.

[4] MFMA s 48 provides a long list of legitimate security options in s 48(2). However, certain restrictions should be noted. For example, a municipality may undertake to effect payments directly from a source to secure payment of a debt, however, s 8(2) provides for categories of money to be paid directly into the primary bank account of the municipality. A further example pertains to the s 48(4) restrictions over the way that security over capital assets may limit their availability in service provision.

The Final Constitution allows this matter to be settled by national legislation.[1] National legislation sets its face emphatically against national or provincial guarantees for municipal debt. However, the terms national legislation employs in barring such guarantees are rather peculiar. MFMA s 51 states that '[n]either the national nor a provincial government may guarantee the debt of a municipality or municipal entity except to the extent that Chapter 8 of the Public Finance Management Act provides for such guarantees'.[2] The PFMA regulates financial management in the national government and provincial governments and Chapter 8 relates to the loans, guarantees and other commitments of these governments. Chapter 8 of the PFMA does not expressly provide at all — let alone to some extent — for national or provincial governments to guarantee the debts of municipalities. It is curious that the drafter of the MFMA refers to Chapter 8 of the PFMA in this context, knowing full well that the PFMA does not provide for such guarantees. It is possible that the drafters of the MFMA anticipated an amendment of Chapter 8 of the PFMA which has not yet occured. As things stand, however, the MFMA and the PFMA, read together, prohibit national and provincial guarantees of municipal debt.

Further clarification of terminology used in this context illuminates other important issues involving municipal debt. The term 'sub-sovereign' is used to describe municipal debt that is explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by national or provincial governments. In circumstances where a local government is a 'sub-sovereign', creditors understand that the sovereign will not allow for municipal financial failure, and under these circumstances the municipal credit rating will be the same as that of the national or provincial governments that guarantee their debts. The MFMA (in Chapter 13 and elsewhere) makes it clear that South African municipalities are not sub-sovereign in this sense.

[1] See FC s 218(1).

[2] Given that the prohibition in the MFMA relates to guarantees it is necessary to provide a brief parenthetical background on the meaning of the word 'guarantee' which, in the context of South African law, is ambiguous. A distinction is made in South African law between the contract of indemnity, which imposes an original obligation to make good any loss suffered by a creditor — and the obligation of a surety, which is accessory to that of the principle debtor. Documents which are often called 'bank guarantees' are not contracts of suretyship at all but are promises to pay conditional upon the happening, or non-happening, of a stated event. See Hazis Transvaal & Delagoa Bay Investment Co Ltd 1939 AD 372, 384; SA Warehousing Serevices (Pty) Ltd and Others v South British Insurance Co Ltd 1971 (3) SA 10 (A). When the word 'guarantee' is used in a contract it may mean either indemnity or suretyship. It is a question of interpretation in which the use of the word is not viewed in isolation. See List v Jungers 1979 (3) SA 106 (A). The question to be answered is whether 'guarantee' means indemnity, or suretyship, or both, in the context of the MFMA. In our opinion it means both those legal concepts since the tenor of the statute is to instill the need for financial probity and responsibility in local government by way of making certain transactions independent of aid from national or provincial government. Consequently, the widest meaning should be given to the word since that reading, in our view, gives effect to the legislative intention.

27.6 Monitoring and withholding public funds

(a) Regulation by National Treasury

The final stop on the pathway through raising, allocating, budgeting and spending public funds is monitoring, withholding and regulating the use of public funds. This legally and politically complex area involves a primary regulatory role for National Treasury and (perhaps surprisingly) an important intervention role by provinces during moments of municipal crisis.

Because the functioning of National Treasury must be established through legislation, two questions arise: first, whether the Final Constitution has a particular vision of National Treasury's role (in FC s 216 and elsewhere); and second, whether the legislation that establishes National Treasury's role is in keeping with this constitutional vision. These questions are important because National Treasury is, arguably, the most important government department, and its role is, at times, contested.

The Scope of National Treasury's Regulatory Role

FC Chapter 13's vision for National Treasury seems to be a narrow one. However, to understand even the limited role contemplated by FC Chapter 13, a basic command of the lexicon is necessary. The phrase 'treasury control' relates to rather formal matters set out in the sub-provisions of FC s 216(1). FC s 216(1)(a) relates to 'generally recognised accounting practice' (sometimes known as 'GRAP') which is one of many forms of accounting treatment.[1] 'Uniform expenditure classifications' referred to in FC s 216(1)(b) is expanded in the MFMA into 'uniform expenditure and revenue classification systems'.[2] Such classification systems are presumably designed to standardise financial information in budgets and reports. Finally, the 'treasury norms and standards' mentioned in FC s 216(1)(c) appear to relate in practice to informational requirements around financial, budget and fiscal matters.[3] FC s 216(2) then provides a powerful (although blunt) remedial tool to enforce the accounting treatment, expenditure classification and treasury norms and standards envisaged in FC s 216(1) — namely stopping inter-governmental grants.[4] Both the scope of National Treasury's current role and the remedial instruments used to enforce compliance with its measures would appear to have expanded beyond their modest beginnings in FC s 216.

[1] GRAP is prescribed for municipalities in MFMA s 122(3).
[2] See MFMA s 5(2)(c)(ii).
[3] See, eg, DORA Act 7 of 2003 s 5(7).
[4] Only National Treasury may stop equitable share. Once equitable share is allocated to local government and transferred via a provincial revenue fund, it must be paid to the municipalities in that province. See FC s 226(3).

Stopping Transfers of Grants and Equitable Share

The Final Constitution limits the stopping of funds in terms of FC s 216(2) to breaches of generally recognised accounting practice, uniform expenditure classifications and uniform treasury norms and standards. This power is reflected in MFMA s 5(2)(e). It is important to distinguish stopping funds under FC s 216(2) and interventions under FC ss 100 and 139. The former reflect an enforcement measure designed to achieve compliance with formal National Treasury Standards. By contrast, FC ss 100 and 139 posit serious executive failures that require direct intervention with serious political consequences.

FC s 216(2) is triggered by 'serious or persistent material breach' of the measures set out in FC s 216(1). The Constitutional Court, in First Certification Judgment, heard a challenge to the provision that alleged that the provision would encroach upon the legitimate autonomy of provinces.[1] In affirming the certifiability of FC s 216, the Court mentioned that the exercise of the power to stop the transfer of funds would be subject to the external controls in FC s 216(3) to (5) and '[t]he question whether there has been a serious or persistent material breach of the provisions would also be justiciable'. The issue has not arisen since and has not been subject to judicial consideration.

The phrase, 'serious or persistent material breach', is a standard triggering phrase. It appears in FC s 139(5), in the equivalent MFMA provision dealing with financial problems,[2] and in the Division of Revenue Act.[3] Whereas MFMA s 140 sets out criteria for determining when there has been a 'serious or persistent material breach' of financial commitments, the Final Constitution does not offer similar criteria for a breach of FC s 216(1). As was suggested by the Constitutional Court in the First Certification Judgment, the phrase is intended to create a high threshold for the FC s 216(2) remedy which can be invoked only if there has been a serious or persistent material breach. The word 'persistent' suggests continuing in some action 'against opposition' and may indicate a remedy of last resort. Furthermore, not only must the breach of the standard in FC s 216(1) be 'serious' but it must be a 'material breach'. These separate requirements indicate that not only must the breach be related to a fundamental aspect of FC s 216(1) — and thus material — but that this material breach must be a serious material breach. This rather awkward formulation clearly indicates a high threshold of non-compliance before FC s 216(2) applies. Furthermore, even if these standards are met, provincial transfers may not be stopped for more than 120 days at a time, and the stopped transfer must be approved by Parliament.[4] Failure by Parliament to approve a decision to stop the transfer will cause the order to stop the transfer to lapse retrospectively.[5]

[1] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 279.

[2] See MFMA s 139.

[3] See DORA 7 of 2003 s 30 and DORA 1 of 2005 s 39.

[4] See FC ss 216(3)(a) and 216(4).

[5] See FC s 216(3)(b).

If the exercise of FC s 216(2)-powers is justiciable, then a related issue is whether the remedy can be used to enforce compliance with statutory requirements that do not relate directly to FC s 216(1). Since national legislation harnesses FC s 216(2) for its own purposes, this question is not an abstract inquiry. The PFMA, which establishes National Treasury, allows for a withholding of funds 'in terms of section 216(2) of the Constitution, to address a serious or persistent material breach of this Act by a department, public entity or constitutional institution' (emphasis added).[1] Because many aspects of the PFMA go beyond formal treasury standards (such as approval of disposals of assets, or approval of contracts or corporate plans), one could argue that the FC s 216(2) remedy has been torn from its proper context.[2] Similarly, DORA uses the remedy in FC s 216(2) to enforce compliance with the conditions of inter-governmental grants.[3] Again, this purpose is not contemplated by FC s 216(1). Equitable share is a constitutional entitlement the allocation of which is settled by national parliament. The view that the power of National Treasury to stop transfers is limited to the enforcement of the matters set out in FC s 216(1) is supported by the Constitutional Court's affirmation of the external controls related to the FC s 216(2) remedy. Under these circumstances, we would suggest that the use of the FC s 216(2) remedy to enforce statutory (and not constitutional standards) goes beyond the powers envisaged for National Treasury in FC s 216.

Economic and Contract Regulation

The second case in which National Treasury powers may have expanded beyond the contemplation of the drafters of FC s 216 is the regulatory role of National Treasury. Although the Final Constitution does not describe National Treasury as regulating public finance, we think it useful to use this term and intend by it three mechanisms of control, namely: standard setting; monitoring of compliance with the standard and enforcement of the standard. These three mechanisms are set out (explicitly or implicitly) in FC s 216. FC s 216(1) contemplates the introduction of generally recognised accounting practice, uniform expenditure classifications; and uniform treasury norms and standards; and FC s 216(2) compels National Treasury to 'enforce compliance with the measures established in subsection (1)'. Monitoring of compliance is not mentioned in FC s 216, but is implicit as an intermediate step between introducing and enforcing the standard.

The difficulty is that the legislation — the MFMA and the PFMA — and the practice indicates significant National Treasury involvement not only in matters suitable for uniform standards but specific executive and legislative decisions. A representative sample of the actual powers of National Treasury under national legislation includes the following: the authorisation of public private partnership agreements pursued by national and provincial government;[1] recommendations on whether a municipality should enter into 'contracts having future budgetary implications',[2] recommendations on whether a municipality should form a municipal entity;[3] the delegation of powers by the council to an executive committee or executive mayor or chief financial officer of decisions to make investments on behalf of the municipality may only be made within a policy framework determined by the Minister of Finance;[4] the delegation of powers by the accounting officer for a department, trading entity or constitutional institution may be limited or controlled by the National Treasury;[5] the limit of councillors and officials on a governing board of a municipal entity;[6] commenting on price increases of bulk resources for the provision of municipal services;[7] the approval of three-year borrowing programmes submitted by certain public entities (national government business enterprises or major public entities);[8] and approving the corporate plans of certain public entities (which would include such matters as dividend policy).[9] The powers accorded to National Treasury are accentuated by drafting which in some cases vests an untrammelled discretion in National Treasury to approve transactions[10] or exempt agencies from compliance with regulations or legislation.[11] Furthermore, while National Treasury may only have the power to comment or make recommendations, its approval powers are so significant that agencies may have the perception that they depart from Treasury recommendations at their peril. The result is that in practice National Treasury exercises a power in respect of transactions and plans that may come close to a veto. A power of this kind involves a far more interventionist role for National Treasury in executive decision making than FC s 216 suggests.

[1] See PFMA s 6(2)(f).

[2] See also PFMA s 18(2)(g)(Gives a similar power to Provincial Treasures vis-a-vis provincial departments and public entities.)

[3] See, eg, DORA 7 of 2003 s 22.

[1] See Treasury Regulations reg 16.
[2] See MFMA s 33.
[3] See MFMA s 84.
[4] See Systems Act s 60(2).
[5] See PFMA s 44(2)(a).
[6] See Systems Act s 93E.
[7] See MFMA s 42.
[8] See Treasury Regulations reg 29.1.3*(a)*.
[9] See PFMA s 52.
[10] An important example is the approval power of National Treasury vis-à-vis PPPs. The definition of 'public private partnership' in reg 16 of the Treasury Regulations is important because it acts as a filter — only those transactions that are 'PPPs' will be subject to the somewhat onerous requirements set out in reg 16. The latest definition of 'public-private partnership', as set out in regulation 16 of the Treasury Regulations, means a commercial transaction between an institution and a private party in terms of which the private party (among other things) 'assumes substantial financial, technical and operational risks in connection with the performance of the institutional function and/or use of state property'. The difficulty is that 'substantial risk' is a rather porous filter. In practice, a discretion is exercised by the PPP Unit of the National Treasury which establishes the scope of Regulation 16. Neither the PFMA nor the regulations guide the exercise of this discretion or even expressly acknowledge it. Although National Treasury formally exercises weaker powers vis-à-vis municipal PPPs, the practice is likely to be akin to national and provincial PPPs.
[11] For example, in terms of MFMA s 170, the National Treasury 'may on good grounds approve a departure from a treasury regulation or from any condition imposed in terms of this Act'.

Our conclusions here must be stated carefully. One can make a strong argument that this interventionist role of National Treasury exceeds the rather narrow and formal role contemplated in FC s 216. However, it is also possible that National Treasury is performing the regulatory role allocated to national government in several other provisions of the Final Constitution, rather than performing the role strictly allocated to National Treasury in FC s 216. Indeed, FC s 216 itself does not state that the role of National Treasury is limited to the enforcement of the matters in FC s 216(1). If FC s 216 does not limit enforcement matter to those enumerated in FC s 216(1), then an expanded role for National Treasury is not problematic — provided that the expanded role is itself defensible under the Final Constitution as a national regulatory role. This proviso raises a question that requires a more general assessment of how the spheres of government interact and whether national economic regulation through the National Treasury is consistent with the executive autonomy of provinces and municipalities. An argument that National Treasury's role ought to be restricted to formal regulation of norms and standards is buttressed by the idea that sub-national spheres of government have executive authority and constitute the government within their sphere.[1] Indeed, in the case of local government, the Final Constitution is at pains to assert the 'right' of a municipality to govern, on its own initiative, 'the local government affairs of its community'.[2] National and provincial governments 'may not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions'.[3] It might be argued that a limited and formal role is envisaged for National Treasury because a more extensive role — such as price controls, approval of contracts and approval of budgets — may undermine the autonomy of the non-national spheres of government.

However, an interventionist role for National Treasury does not necessarily compromise the exercise of municipal powers and functions. Indeed, it may serve to enhance them by protecting macro-economic stability and local government structures. In short, the Final Constitution cannot be read as requiring national government to adopt a 'hands off' regulatory approach in the face of executive incapacity or failure. Indeed, the Constitutional Court, in its certification of the Final Constitution, described the 'support' role of national and provincial governments vis-à-vis local government as a 'considerable' competency facilitating a 'measure of provincial government control over the manner in which municipalities administer' their functions.[4] The dilemma of how to regulate sub-

[1] On co-operative government and the independence and interdependence of the three spheres of government, see, generally, S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

[2] See FC s 151(3).

[3] See FC s 151(4).

[4] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 371.

national governments in a decentralized structure is further considered below and indicates that the choice of how intrusively to regulate is as much strategic as legal.

(b) Provincial Role in Regulating Public Finance

FC s 216 establishes the National Treasury in order to enforce public finance standards. Although there are provincial treasuries which are also given a regulatory role under national legislation, our view is that provinces have no general supervisory role in respect of finance. It is a cliché of the new constitutional framework that municipalities are no longer creatures of provincial ordinance.[1] As a result, provincial local government ordinances have a rather ambiguous status. Our view, based on a reading of Chapter 13 and the constitutional schedules, is that financial regulation of municipalities is no longer a provincial legislative competence and that provincial ordinances regulating this area are impliedly repealed. This conclusion eviscerates lengthy provisions in provincial ordinances dealing with, among other things, procurement, contracting, budgeting and borrowing. All this legislation conflicts now with so-called 'new-order' legislation and in our view is redundant. Many provinces, lead by Gauteng, have enacted repeal legislation to harmonise their statute book with new-order legislation.[2]

MFMA s 5 spells out the new role of provinces under national legislation in regard to financial regulation of municipalities. MFMA s 5(4) states that '[t]o the extent necessary to comply with subsection (3), a provincial treasury (a) must monitor—(i) compliance with [the MFMA] by municipalities and municipal entities in the province; (ii) the preparation by municipalities in the province of their budgets; (iii) the monthly outcome of those budgets; and (iv) the submission of reports by municipalities in the province as required in terms of this Act; (b) may assist municipalities in the province in the preparation of their budgets; (c) may exercise any powers and must perform any duties delegated to it by the National Treasury in terms of [the MFMA]; and (d) may take appropriate steps if a municipality or municipal entity in the province commits a breach of [the MFMA].' Although, in our view, the Final Constitution has ended the provincial role in regulating municipal finance, it still strongly affirms the intervention role of provinces in the case of municipal financial failure.

(c) Intervention Powers of the Provinces

In addition to the intervention powers of national government and parliament under FC s 216(2), the provinces (and not national government in the first instance) are given an important power of intervention under FC s 139. There is an interesting legislative history to FC s 139 which has a direct bearing on municipal borrowing and financial autonomy.

[1] See Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1991 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 38.

[2] See, for example, the Gauteng Local Government Laws Amendment Act 1 of 2006.

The existing version of FC s 139 was introduced by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 3 of 2003. The original FC s 139 provided for provincial supervision. This supervision entailed issuing directives and, in more serious cases, assuming responsibility for the relevant obligation. However it was something of a blunt tool and perhaps an ineffective one as well. In particular, it did not clarify the extent to which an intervening province could assume municipal executive and legislative powers in order to restore service provision. Furthermore, in the context of municipal borrowing, it did not appreciate that because it is not legally or practically possible to liquidate a municipality, the ability of creditors to satisfy their claims in the event of default is likely to be closely tied to the restoration of the fiscal position of the municipality to normality. This appreciation comes through strongly in National Treasury's Policy on Municipal Borrowing. The policy sees the development of an institutional framework for municipal default and bankruptcy as a fuller expression of a decentralised framework for municipal finance. Hence,

> ... the corollary of moving towards a modern, decentralised framework for municipal finance where moral hazard is minimised, capital is allocated efficiently, risk is properly priced and incentives for prudent financial management are real is a clear legal and institutional framework for dealing with municipal default and bankruptcy.[1]

The Municipal Borrowing Policy then develops and affirms the idea of a judicially authorized administrative agency with some independence from the executive. This agency oversees fiscal and financial 'turn-arounds' analogous to judicial managements in the private sector but designed for the particular circumstances of the municipal sector.[2] The agency, suitably equipped with the necessary powers, would develop and implement municipal turn-around plans. Chapter 13 of the MFMA gives full legal expression to this idea by establishing and regulating the Municipal Financial Recovery Service.[3] A key dilemma for the drafters of the constitutional amendment, in developing the idea of a Municipal Financial Recovery Service, was how to deal with a case where a financial recovery plan was developed for the municipality, but a Municipal Council could not or would not act in accordance with the plan. Because financial recovery would require the adoption or adjustment of budgets, and the determination of tariffs and taxes (all legislative functions under Fedsure), a Municipal Council could frustrate implementation of the recovery plan. Originally, the Municipal Borrowing Policy contemplated that the Municipal Financial Recovery Service would have 'all the powers of a municipal council' including its legislative powers. Accordingly, an early version of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Bill, 2001 added a new section 155(8) to the Final Constitution which stated that: '[n]ational legislation may provide for the exercise of executive and legislative authority on behalf of a municipal council to the extent necessary — (a) to govern the municipality when the council for any reason cannot function; or (b) to resolve a serious and persistent financial emergency in the municipality.' This amendment was not made, arguably because the drafters were self-conscious about the prospect of a non-elected body enacting legislation. The dilemma was resolved through the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 3 of 2003 which inserted the current version of FC s 139. The amended section empowers the provincial executive in FC s 139(5) to 'dissolve the Municipal Council, if the municipality cannot or does not approve legislative measures, including a budget or any revenue-raising measures, necessary to give effect to [a] recovery plan'. Hence, the current section affirms municipal legislative powers, but allows for dissolution of municipal councils if these powers are inappropriately exercised during times of crisis. On dissolution, an administrator gives effect to the recovery plan (including approving a temporary budget and required revenue-raising measures) until a new Municipal Council is elected.[1] Arguably, dissolution of a Municipal Council, rather than enactments on its behalf, is an appropriate balance between municipal political autonomy and the need to manage municipal financial crises. Once the constitutional amendment had been passed, it was possible to enact the MFMA which elaborated a detailed framework on municipal borrowing and financial emergencies.

[1] The Municipal Borrowing Policy (supra) at 31.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See MFMA ss 157–162.

The text of FC s 139 requires interpretation, an exercise that would take us away from our focus on Chapter 13 of the Final Constitution. There is already analysis elsewhere of some of the key textual issues, including the meaning of the phrase which triggers intervention under FC s 139(1), namely that a 'municipality cannot or does not fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation'.[2]

The MFMA Treatment of Intervention

The MFMA has turned the provisions of FC s 139 into a lengthy and important chapter. The Final Constitution distinguishes three types of financial problem: first, a case in FC s 139(1) where 'the municipality cannot or does not fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation'; second, a case in FC s 139(4) where 'a municipality cannot or does not fulfil an obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation to approve a budget or any revenue-raising measures necessary to give effect to the budget'; and third, a case in FC s 139(5) where as a result of a crisis in its financial affairs, [the municipality] is in serious or persistent material breach of its obligations to provide basic services or to meet its financial commitments, or admits that it is unable to meet its obligations or financial commitments'. The Final Constitution makes provincial intervention discretionary in the first case and mandatory in the latter two cases. The MFMA offers a more fine grained account of these distinctions in chapter 13. It terms the first case a 'financial problem' and sets out the steps a provincial executive may take in response to such a problem. These steps are termed 'discretionary provincial interventions' in MFMA s 137. The third case is called a 'financial crisis' and requires (as prescribed in the Final Constitution) 'mandatory provincial interventions' under section 139 of the MFMA. The second case is treated separately in section 26 of the MFMA (and is not further considered here). The MFMA sets out criteria that describe when a municipality is in a financial crisis[1] or when it has encountered a serious financial problem.[2] A very important factor in the determination that there is a financial crisis rather than a serious financial problem is that the municipality has failed to make 'any payment to a lender as and when due'.[3] Because a financial crisis has more serious consequences than a financial problem, the MFMA makes a failure to provide payment to a lender or an investor more serious than a simple non-payment of a debt to other creditors. This distinction elevates the status of lenders and creates a more enabling regulatory environment for municipal borrowing.

[1] See FC s 139(5)(b).

[2] See J De Visser A Legal Analysis of Provincial Intervention in a Municipality (1999) 6, LLM Thesis, University of the Western Cape, available at http://www.sn.apc.org/users/clc/localgovt/thesisjdv.rtf (accessed on 22 April 2007)(Discussing the legal framework for provincial intervention in terms of FC s 139.)

As suggested above, each kind of intervention results in differing consequences for the municipality. While a discretionary intervention in response to a serious financial problem may result in nothing more than a directive from the province to the municipality to act or refrain from acting in a particular manner, a mandatory intervention in response to a financial crisis requires the province to request the intervention of the Municipal Financial Recovery Service[4] which is required to draw up a financial recovery plan.[5] Provinces are given wide powers

[1] See MFMA s 140.

[2] See MFMA s 138.

[3] See MFMA s 140(2)(a)(emphasis added). Because the indicator relates to 'any payment' it would presumably include part payments (such as cases where interest was paid but not installments relating to the principal amount).

[4] This service forms part of the National Treasury in terms of MFMA s 157.

[5] MFMA s 142 sets out the requirements for financial recovery plans. These documents are aimed at securing the municipality's ability to meet its obligations to provide basic services or dischange its financial commitments. The first aim is to identify the problems of the municipality, and then to design a response that puts the municipality in a sound and sustainable financial condition as soon as possible. The Financial Recovery Plan identifies those human and financial resources needed to achieve the aims of the Plan. The Plan also identifies what needs to be done for its implementation. The Plan may call for the liquidation of assets other than those needed for the provision of the minimum level of basic municipal services and may provide for debt restructuring or debt relief. If a recovery plan is prepared in a mandatory provincial intervention, then s 146(1)(a) lays down that the municipality must implement it and report to the MEC for finance in the province about its implementation. See s 146(1)(c). National intervention is contemplated to meet a situation where the province does not adequately perform any of the mandatory intervention obligations. In such cases the national executive enjoys the powers and functions of the provincial executive. See 150(2)(a).

of intervention: including the right to intervene in the provision of services as well as the right to dissolve a Municipal Council and appoint an administrator. These rights are essentially the last form of protection afforded to a local community, whose social welfare and development the municipality is considered to have failed to serve.

It is important to note that although financial crises prompt mandatory provincial interventions, it is necessary for provincial executives to determine that the conditions of a financial crisis have, in fact, been met. These are the conditions described in FC s 139(5): namely, that as a result of a crisis, the municipality is in 'serious or persistent material breach of its obligations to provide basic services or to meet its financial commitments'. The factors that indicate that this criterion is met are set out in section 140 of the MFMA. It should be stressed that even though the provincial executive must make the assessment that the criterion for a financial crises has been met, this assessment does not make the intervention 'discretionary'. The provincial executive must make a finding of fact based on the indicators set out in section 140(2). Once it has been determined that the facts exist, the provincial executive is compelled to act under section 139 of the MFMA. This point is strengthened by examining the factors set out in section 140(2) which intend, in our view, to make the trigger for a mandatory intervention objective.[1]

(d) Municipal Financial Failure

It is a striking feature of South African public finance that municipal financial failure is possible. We do not use the word 'insolvency' to describe municipal financial failure because municipalities cannot be 'wound up'. Indeed, the purpose of debt relief is to provide a form of protection from creditors in the absence of which a financial recovery plan may fail.[2] However, the MFMA does make provision for a municipality to apply to the High Court for an order 'to terminate the municipality's financial obligations to creditors, and to settle claims in accordance with a distribution scheme referred to in section 155'.[3] In short, the MFMA creates a process that is akin in some respects to insolvency. Prior to termination of financial obligations, provision is made for lesser forms of relief: where a municipality is unable to meet its financial commitments, it may, in terms of section 152, apply to the High Court for an order to stay all legal proceedings by persons claiming money from it (or a municipal entity) for a period not exceeding 90 days. Provision is also made for extraordinary relief in the form of a suspension of the municipality's financial obligations or a portion of such obligations until the municipality can meet those obligations.[4]

[1] See, eg, MFMA s 140(2)(c), which quantifies the extent of the failure, or MFMA s 140(2)(a) which refers to 'any payment', that is, at least one payment.
[2] See MFMA s 153(2)(b).
[3] See MFMA s 153(1)(c).
[4] See MFMA s 153(1)(b).

To our knowledge the provisions of chapter 13 of the MFMA have not been applied — even though provincial interventions under the Final Constitution have occurred. Instead, National Treasury and the Department of Provincial and Local Government have focused on capacity building initiatives and rescue plans for weak municipalities. Project Consolidate is the best known of such plans.[1] The question that arises is whether, notwithstanding the provisions of the MFMA, national government would 'rescue' a municipality to prevent its financial failure. Even though MFMA s 51 prohibits national and provincial guarantees of municipal debt, it would, in principle, be possible for national government to provide additional equitable share to a municipality in order to enable to the municipality to discharge its financial obligations. Section 6(3) of the Division of Revenue Act 1 of 2005 empowers '[t]he national government [to] appropriate a portion of its equitable share or excess revenue to make further allocations in an adjustments budget to municipalities, as a conditional or an unconditional allocation'. However, it is uncertain whether national government will exercise this power to assist municipalities with financial problems and we do not wish to speculate in this regard.

27.7 Other institutions

(a) Financial and Fiscal Commission

FC Chapter 13 creates the Financial and Fiscal Commission and the Central Bank. For our purposes, the former is a more important organisation. The Financial and Fiscal Commission is established in terms of FC s 220. The Financial and Fiscal Commission Act clarifies its functions, powers and composition.[2] Its purpose is to act as an impartial and independent body which makes recommendations and gives expert advice to organs of state in the national, provincial and local spheres of government on financial and fiscal matters. These matters would include the fiscal policies of government, whether national, provincial or local; the role of province in raising revenue through taxation; borrowing by local and provincial governments; and fiscal allocations. The body is constituted in terms of FC s 221 from members appointed by the President. However, the Premiers of provincial government and organized local government participate, to some extent, in the appointment process.

In fulfilling its constitutional mandate, the Commission focuses primarily on intergovernmental revenue sharing and fiscal issues that arise from DORA.

[1] Project Consolidate is a program implemented by the Department of Provincial and Local Government to assist local government with the following: basic service delivery and infrastructure; local economic development; municipal transformation and institutional development; municipal financial viability; and good governance and community participation. See Department of Provincial and Local Government Project Consolidate: A Hands on Local Government Engagement Programme for 2004-2006 (May 2004)('DPLG Project Consolidate').

[2] Act 99 of 1997.

DORA may not be passed until the Commission has been consulted and its recommendations considered. The recommendations of the Commission are presented to both Houses of Parliament and provincial legislatures and address the following issues: the equitable division of revenue as between national, provincial and local government; the determination of the equitable share of each province; and other allocations including the conditions on which they are made.[1] Secondary functions have been allocated to the Commission in the Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act and the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act. In terms of the former Act, the Commission may make recommendations regarding loans to provincial governments by national government as well as the total interest a provincial government may incur on its debt in a financial year. In respect of the latter act, the Commission may be represented at meetings of the Budget Council and may make recommendations on revenue sharing and the allocation of money.[2] This Act also provides for the Commission to provide input on DORA prior to its enactment in terms of FC s 214(2).

Assessments of the Commission have been mixed. One assessment is that the Commission has lost influence since 1994:

> Several countries, such as India and South Africa, have adopted independent commissions to oversee and protect fiscal transfers from the center to the sub-national from political vagaries. But, the performance of these commissions have been mixed. In the case of India, many states have not implemented state level finance commissions. In South Africa, the Financial and Fiscal Commission, while playing an important role in the initial years of the new democracy, has progressively lost its influence as the country made its transition from conflict years.[3]

(b) Central Bank

The central bank, known as the South African Reserve Bank, is contemplated in FC s 225 and regulated by the South African Reserve Bank Act.[4] The primary object of the South African Reserve Bank, as set out in FC s 224(1), is the protection of the value of the currency in the interest of balanced and sustainable economic growth in the Republic. From this constitutional mandate, the Bank has understood its mission as ensuring 'the achievement and maintenance of price stability'.[5] The Reserve Bank is co-responsible for formulating South Africa's [1] Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997 s 9(1).

[2] For a discussion on Budget Council and the Local Goverment Budget Form, see § 27.3*(d)* supra.

[3] See J Ahmad, S Devarajan, S Khemani & S Shah 'Decentralization and Service Delivery' World Bank Policy Research Working Paper 3603 (May 2005) 7.

[4] Act 90 of 1989. FC s 225, provides that: 'the powers and functions of the South African Reserve Bank are those customarily exercised and performed by central banks, which powers and functions must be determined by an Act of Parliament and must be exercised or performed subject to the conditions prescribed in terms of that Act.'

[5] See 'Mission Statement of the South African Reserve Bank' at http://www.reservebank.co.za/ (accessed on 20 April 2007).

monetary policy, and is largely responsible for implementing this policy. The Final Constitution requires the Reserve Bank to perform this function and its other functions independently and without fear, favour or prejudice. However, it also provides that there must be regular consultation between the Bank and the Cabinet member responsible for national financial matters. The Reserve Bank and the National Treasury together constitute the monetary authority in South Africa.

The South African Reserve Bank acts as the central bank for the country and its banking institutions. It thereby provides so-called 'accommodation' to various banks.[1] The Reserve Bank is the custodian of the statutory cash reserves which all registered banks are required to maintain, and it provides facilities for clearing and settlement of inter-bank obligations. In addition, the Reserve Bank is the custodian of the greater part of South Africa's gold and other foreign exchange reserves, controls the South African Mint Company, and issues banknotes printed by the South African Bank Note Company, a wholly owned subsidiary of the Bank.

27.8 Local government in South Africa's fiscal structure

(a) Decentralised structure

In considering the place of local government in South Africa's fiscal structure, the key question is whether FC Chapter 13 envisages fiscal and other forms of decentralisation. The question has practical importance: decentralised systems imply, among other things, a high-level of autonomy in respect of sub-national spending decisions. This autonomy would, in turn, have implications for the nature of the inter-governmental grant system and the nature of national regulation of sub-national budgeting and spending. In considering the extent of decentralisation in South Africa, the literature postulates a continuum from 'deconcentration' (the lowest level of decentralisation), through 'delegation' to 'devolution' (the highest level of decentralisation).[2] This terminology is somewhat unreliable and is not always used consistently. Nonetheless, it is clear that the Final Constitution does contemplate a level of decentralisation that is closer to the devolution end of the continuum. There are four components that define the fiscal dimensions of decentralization: '(i) allocation of expenditure responsibilities by central and local tiers of government; (ii) assignment of taxes by government tiers; (iii) the design of an intergovernmental grant system; and (iv) the budgeting and monitoring of fiscal flows between different government tiers.'[1] When applied to South Africa, these criteria yield fairly clear conclusions: sub-national governments are directly elected; they have a constitutional responsibility for service delivery, a constitutional entitlement to nationally-raised revenue and the autonomy to formulate their own budgets and determine their own expenditure priorities (within broad strategic objectives). On this basis, it is fair to conclude that the Final Constitution does contemplate fiscal decentralisation.[2] Indeed, some commentators have called this conclusion 'self-evident'.[3] Actual fiscal practice, however, is not clearly aligned with this constitutionally-mandated structure.

[1] See http://www.reservebank.co.za/internet/Publication.nsf/ (accessed on 22 April 2007) for clarification of the Reserve Bank's system of accommodation.

[2] See P Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System — Paper Two: Evaluating the Local Government Grant System' IDASA Occasional Papers (July 2003) 5. See also Ahmad et al (supra) at 12.

Although it might be argued that the push towards decentralisation and local financial accountability is supported by the constitutional provisions earlier described, the extent to which municipalities have been forced into financial autonomy post-1994 is also an expression of policy choice. In other words, it would have been possible for more money to have been transferred to local government — particularly through equitable share — without sacrificing key aspects of decentralisation. Not surprisingly, these choices and the associated pressures on municipalities of cost recovery, credit control and disconnection of services have been the subject of sustained criticism in the literature.[4] Failures in the delivery of municipal services have been exacerbated by 'unfunded mandates' that have widened the gap between functional allocation and funding.[5] Some national government departments have acknowledged these problems. For example, a leading policy document cites among the challenges facing local government, 'financial and capacity constraints within local government and [t]he uncoordinated devolution of powers and functions to local government by national and provincial government.'[6]

(b) The Shift to Intervention

As under-funded municipalities with inadequate capacity have produced disappointing performance, the constitutional model of decentralised service provision has become contested. It is arguable that national government has become less convinced that the benefits of local democracies outweigh the costs of inadequate

[1] See Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System' (supra) at 8.
[2] See E Yemek 'Understanding Fiscal Decentralisation in South Africa' IDASA Occasional Paper (July 2005) 5. See also Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System' (supra) at 5.
[3] See Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System' (supra) at 5.
[4] See, eg, DA McDonald & J Pape Cost Recovery and the Crisis of Service Delivery (2002); G Hart Disabling Globalization: Places of Power in Post-Apartheid South Africa (2002); P Bond Unsustainable South Africa (2002).
[5] See § 27.3*(g)* supra.
[6] DPLG Project Consolidate (supra) at § 7.3*(g)*.

service delivery.[1] The result, in our view, has been ambiguous patterns of law-making and governmental practice. Some momentum away from decentralisation is clearly discernible. We have suggested a shift in national legislation towards economic regulation of local government.[2] At the level of policy it is possible to show significant national intrusion. For example, the policy of free basic services ('FBS'), which is a centre piece of municipal service provision, can be read as a national policy on municipal services rather than the expression of local democratic will.[3] At the level of operations and asset ownership, the Cabinet decision to shift from municipal provision of electricity to regional provision through six regional electricity distributors ('REDs') — all of which will be public entities under the PFMA — is a significant shift away from decentralized provision of a core municipal service.[4]

However, the basic decentralized model remains deeply entrenched. At a legislative level, efforts to amend the Final Constitution in order to allow for legislative authority to be exercised on behalf of a municipal council in times of financial crisis have not succeeded[5] and the PPP regime under the MFMA envisages a weaker role for National Treasury in respect of municipal PPPs than is the case for national and provincial PPPs. Indeed, the prospect of municipal financial failure under the MFMA clearly underscores the significant financial autonomy accorded to local government. Other indications of the survival of decentralisation include the assertive role of organised local government[6] and the fact that in comparison to conditional grants, the proportion of equitable share is increasing — a trend that increases municipal financial autonomy.[7] In addition, the approach of creating funding windows within [1] It should be recalled that the premise for decentralization is that, 'devolving decision making power and responsibilities increases citizens engagement in local governance decisions and makes local governments more efficient and accountable. This implies that decentralization shifts power to citizens and local governments (elected and administrative) thereby enhancing their capacities to make effective choices — that is, to translate their choices into desired actions and outcomes'. See U Raich 'Fiscal Determinants of Empowerment' World Bank Policy Research Working Paper 3705 (September 2005) 5. Poor municipal service provision has tested this justification for decentralisation.

[2] See § 27.6*(a)* supra.

[3] This assessment is suggested in passing by Paul Whelan. See P Whelan 'Local Government and Budget 2004' IDASA Occasional Papers (June 2004) 6–7, fn 3.

[4] A media statement issued on 26 October 2006 by EDI Holdings (Ltd) (the government body which oversees restructuring of the electricity distribution industry) expressed the strong belief that 'the regulation of a large, monopolistic integrated national system such as the Electricity Distribution Industry should be conducted by a professional independent regulator reporting to central government, rather than by hundreds of municipalities'. The statement is available at http://www.ameu.co.za/library/restructuring (accessed on 24 April 2007).

[5] See § 27.6*(c)* supra.

[6] Local Government is organised through the South African Local Government Association ('SALGA'). SALGA has been assertive on issues that impact financial autonomy or viability. A good example is the reform of the South African electricity distribution industry ('EDI') in which municipalities individually, and through SALGA, have actively engaged national policy formation.

[7] See IDASA 'Local Government in Budget 2005?' 154 Budget Briefs 7 (9 May 2005), available at http://www.idasa.org.za/ (accessed on 19 April 2007).

equitable share, andhence diminishing its unconditional nature has not survived in the current formula for equitable share. Furthermore, the Department of Water Affairs and Forestry has strongly affirmed the authority function of municipalities in its cabinet-approved proposals for institutional reform of the water sector. In doing so the Department has departed from the 'top-down' approach favoured for the restructuring of the electricity distribution industry.[1]

The question is whether municipal failures, when they have occurred, are related to inadequate access to finance — whether by way of an adequate tax base, sufficient inter-government grants or access to the money markets — or whether there are inherent structural deficiencies in the South African model of fiscal decentralisation. The former problem is arguably resolved by municipal capacity building, increased equitable share and national strategies to reduce poverty. These issues demonstrate a dilemma around decentralisation that is particularly acute in its earlier phases and is well-described in the literature:

> [d]uring the early phases of decentralization, as lower-tier governments adapt to their new responsibilities, the results in terms of service delivery may be disappointing. How can we distinguish between weak outcomes because of the transition and weak outcomes because of a fundamental flaw in the design of decentralization? In addition, decentralization opponents can use any early disappointing outcomes to build political momentum to slow down or even reverse decentralization. If the problem is one of transition, then how can these political forces be balanced by those who favor decentralization, even if they have little to show for it at the start? One obvious approach to managing the politics of decentralization is try to show early results on service delivery. This leads to a second dilemma. In order to show early results, it may be necessary to intervene and provide resources and technical assistance to lower-tier governments in ways that are different, and perhaps even inimical, to the long-run, sustainable success of decentralized service delivery.[2]

The indicators of momentum towards and away from decentralisation may suggest that National Treasury and the South African Parliament ought to confront these dilemmas directly. Because Chapter 13 and Chapter 7 of the Final Constitution give decentralisation a constitutional imprimatur, the pressure to improve service provision has favoured solutions that preserve the basic autonomy of local government while attempting to enhance service provision. These solutions have included a separation between the authority role and the service provision role, restructuring of the electricity and water sectors, grant funding to support national policy initiatives and increasingly interventionist regulation of service provision. At times, the outcomes have not been optimal. From the national perspective, the unconditional nature of equitable share does not make it optimal as a funding instrument for free basic services. Other devices, such as the separation of the authority and provider role, are very useful in reconciling local democratic will with the urgent need to improve service provision.

[1] See Strategic Framework for Water Services s 3 (September 2003), available at http://www.info.gov.za/otherdocs/2003/waterstrat.pdf (accessed on 24 April 2007). The document states that '[p]rovision of water services is the constitutional responsibility of local government. Developmental and democratic local government is in the best position to make accountable decisions related to how services should be provided, taking into account the social and environmental aspects of water services.' Ibid at 10.

[2] See Ahmad et al (supra) at 22.

Chapter 13, and the legislation it has spawned, is central to an understanding and a resolution of these debates. At times, as we have shown, Chapter 13 and the Final Constitution do not settle key questions, such as where to allocate responsibility for public expenditure. Leaving these questions unsettled has inflamed the decentralisation debate. In other cases, the provisions of Chapter 13 are unambiguous. Local government is politically responsible for determining its own budget. It has its own revenue base. It has a right to a share in nationally raised revenue and to be involved in decision making around the allocation of nationally-raised revenue. No doubt, until service provision has stabilised, municipal autonomy will ebb and flow and the constitutional model of decentralised service provision will be tested in legislation and in practice.

28 Transitional Provisions On Executive Authority, Assets and Liabilities

Matthew Chaskalson

28.1 Introduction 28-1

28.2 The succession to executive authority in relation to old order legislation. 28-2

(a) Transitional provisions in the Interim Constitution relating to executive authority. 28-2

(i) Assignments of executive authority 28-2

(ii) Administrative responsibility, executive authority and the interpretation of assigned legislation. 28-6

(aa) Administration of laws and power to exercise executive authority. 28-6

(bb) Interpretation of assigned legislation 28-7

(b) Transitional provisions in the Final Constitution relating to executive authority 28-8

28.3 The transfer of old order State assets and liabilities. 28-9

28.1 Introduction

Much of the legislation on the South African statute books is 'old order' legislation that was enacted before 27 April 1994. Accordingly, it confers powers on executive authorities created by the constitutional regimes that governed South Africa prior to the enactment of the Interim Constitution.[1] In terms of Interim Constitution s 229 and Final Constitution[2] Schedule 6, Item 2(1), all old order legislation that has not been repealed continues in force subject to its consistency with the Interim and Final Constitutions respectively. The Interim Constitution regulated in some detail the transfer of executive power in respect of this old order legislation to the national and provincial executive authorities it created. The Interim Constitution also made corresponding provision for the transfer of State assets and liabilities from the old order executive authorities to the new national and provincial authorities. The transitional scheme of the Interim Constitution in respect of old order executive powers and old order State assets and liabilities was recognised and carried over into the period after 4 February 1997 by the Final Constitution. In order to understand the current position with respect to executive powers created by old order legislation and State assets and liabilities which existed prior to 27 April 1994, it is necessary to examine the transitional provisions of the Interim Constitution. This laborious exercise remains of relevance to contemporary constitutional law and litigation for two reasons. First, it determines whether national or provincial executive authorities may now lawfully exercise particular executive powers created by old order legislation, and whether national or provincial executive authorities have succeeded to specific old order assets. Second, it determines whether national or provincial legislatures may lawfully repeal or amend particular provisions of old order legislation. The latter consequence flows from the decision by the Constitutional Court in DVB Behuising that old order legislation may be amended or repealed by a provincial legislature only if it is legislation that was administered by provincial executive authorities immediately prior to the commencement of the Final Constitution.[3] As a result, the national or provincial succession under the Interim Constitution to executive authority in respect of old order legislation determines, under the Final Constitution, the legislative competence of Parliament and the provincial legislatures to repeal or amend the old order legislation in question.[4]

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').
[3] Western Cape Provincial Government and Others: in Re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government and Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('DVB Behuising') at paras 18–34.
[4] See further Victoria Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Forthcoming, 2004) ('Constitutional Law 2nd Edition') Chapter 15.

28.2 The Succession to Executive Authority in Relation to Old Order Legislation

(a) Transitional provisions in the Interim Constitution relating to executive authority[1]

(i) Assignments of executive authority

Under the Interim Constitution, the succession to executive authority in respect of old order legislation was governed by IC s 235. Section 235 reads, in relevant part, as follows:

> (1) A person who immediately before the commencement of this Constitution was —
> (a) the State President or a Minister or Deputy Minister of the Republic within the meaning of the previous Constitution;
> (b) the Administrator or a member of the Executive Council of a province; or
> (c) the President, Chief Minister or other chief executive or a Minister, Deputy Minister or other political functionary in a government under any other constitution or constitutional arrangement which was in force in an area which forms part of the national territory, > shall continue in office until the President has been elected in terms of s 77(1)(a) and has assumed office . . .
>
>
> . . .
>
> (6) The power to exercise executive authority in terms of laws which, immediately prior to the commencement of this Constitution, were in force in any area which forms part of the national territory and which in terms of s 229 continue in force after such commencement, shall be allocated as follows:
> (a) All laws with regard to matters which – > (i) do not fall within the functional areas specified in Schedule 6; or > (ii) do fall within such functional areas but are matters referred to in paras (a)–(e) of s 126(3) . . .
>
> shall be administered by a competent authority within the jurisdiction of the national government . . .
> (b) All laws with regard to matters which fall within the functional areas specified in Schedule 6 and which are not matters referred to in paras (a)–(e) of s 126(3) shall –
> (i) if any such law was immediately before the commencement of this Constitution administered by or under the authority of a functionary referred to in ss (1)(a) or (b), be administered by a competent authority within the jurisdiction of the national government until the administration of any such law is with regard to any particular province assigned under ss (8) to a competent authority within the jurisdiction of the government of such province; or

[1] The transitional provisions relating to executive authority are discussed in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature, & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) ('Executive Council, Western Cape') at paras 66–98 (Chaskalson P) and paras 162–89 (Kriegler J) and in DVB Behuising (supra) at paras 18–34.

(ii) if any such law was immediately before the said commencement administered by or under the authority of a functionary referred to in ss (1)(c), subject to ss (8) and (9) be administered by a competent authority within the jurisdiction of the government of the province in which that law applies, to the extent that it so applies: Provided that this subparagraph shall not apply to policing matters, which shall be dealt with as contemplated in para (a).

(c) In this subsection and ss (8) 'competent authority' shall mean -

(i) in relation to a law of which the administration is allocated to the national government, an authority designated by the President; and

(ii) in relation to a law of which the administration is allocated to the government of a province, an authority designated by the Premier of the province.

...

(8) (a) The President may, and shall if so requested by the Premier of a province, and provided the province has the administrative capacity to exercise and perform the powers and functions in question, by proclamation in the Gazette assign, within the framework of s 126, the administration of a law referred to in ss (6)(b) to a competent authority within the jurisdiction of the government of a province, either generally or to the extent specified in the proclamation.

(b) When the President so assigns the administration of a law, or at any time thereafter, and to the extent that he or she considers it necessary for the efficient carrying out of the assignment, he or she may -

(i) amend or adapt such law in order to regulate its application or interpretation;

(ii) where the assignment does not relate to the whole of such law, repeal and re-enact, whether with or without an amendment or adaptation contemplated in subpara (i), those of its provisions to which the assignment relates or to the extent that the assignment relates to them; and

(iii) regulate any other matter necessary, in his or her opinion, as a result of the assignment, including matters relating to the transfer or secondment of persons (subject to ss 236 and 237) and relating to the transfer of assets, liabilities, rights and obligations, including funds, to or from the national or a provincial government or any department of State, administration, force or other institution.

(c) . . .

(d) Any reference in a law to the authority administering such law, shall upon the assignment of such law in terms of para (a) be deemed to be a reference mutatis mutandis to the appropriate authority of the province concerned.

(9) (a) If for any reason a provincial government is unable to assume responsibility within 14 days after the election of its Premier, for the administration of a law referred to in ss (6)(b), the President shall by proclamation in the Gazette assign the administration of such law to a special administrator or other appropriate authority within the jurisdiction of the national government, either generally or to the extent specified in the proclamation, until that provincial government is able to assume the said responsibility.

(b) Subsection (8)(b) and (d) shall mutatis mutandis apply in respect of an assignment under para (a) of this subsection.

Section 235 was designed to deal with the practical reality that, on 27 April 1994, a new constitutional framework was superimposed on a public administration that was not yet federal. According to IC s 235, most executive powers vested in the national government. Executive powers relating to 'provincial matters' (ie the functional areas listed in IC Schedule 6 which defined the ambit of provincial legislative authority) were to be assigned to the provinces as they developed the administrative capacity to deal with these powers. To this end, IC s 235 distinguished four categories of existing legislation:

(1) laws with regard to matters which did not fall within the functional areas specified in IC Schedule 6 (IC s 235(6)(a)(i));
(2) laws with regard to matters which fell within the functional areas specified in IC Schedule 6, but which fell within the ambit of the national government legislative override covered by IC s 126(3)(a)–(e) (IC s 235(6)(a)(ii));
(3) laws with regard to matters which fell within the functional areas specified in IC Schedule 6, which were not covered by the national government legislative override, and were, immediately prior to 27 April 1994, administered by provincial or national authorities within South Africa (IC s 235(6)(b)(i)); and
(4) laws with regard to matters which fell within the functional areas specified in IC Schedule 6, which were not covered by the national government legislative override, and were, immediately prior to 27 April 1994, administered by homeland authorities (IC s 235(6)(b)(ii)).

In terms of IC s 235(6), executive authority in respect of the first three categories of existing laws was allocated on 27 April 1994 to the national government. Executive authority in respect of the fourth category of laws was allocated to the relevant provincial governments. However, by virtue of Proclamation R102 of 1994,[1] promulgated by the President under IC s 235(9) on 4 June 1994, executive authority over the fourth category of laws was removed from the relevant provincial governments and assigned to the national government. Accordingly, the effect of IC s 235(6) and Proc. R102 was that executive authority over all old order legislation was initially reserved for the national government. The only way in which provincial governments could acquire executive authority over old order legislation was by presidential assignment under IC s 235(8). The express allocation of executive authority in respect of laws under IC s 235(6) was therefore superceded in all practical respects by the discretionary power of assignment of executive authority in respect of laws under IC s 235(8).[2]

IC s 235(8)(a) addressed only laws contemplated by IC s 235(6)(b). These laws fell within the third and fourth categories described above (ie laws with regard to matters which fell within the functional areas specified in IC Schedule 6, and which were not covered by the national government legislative override in IC s 126(3)). IC s 235(8)(a) provided that once the provinces had the necessary administrative capacity, the President was able, and, if requested by the Premier, was obliged, to assign by proclamation the administration of IC s 235(6)(b) laws to 'a competent authority within the jurisidiction of the government of a province'.[1]

[1] Regulation Gazette 5344, Government Gazette 15781, 3 June 1994.
[2] The categorisation of laws under IC s 235(6) remains important only insofar as IC ss 235(6)(b)(i) and (ii) identify which laws may be assigned to the provinces under IC s 235(8).

Because IC s 235(8)(a) was confined in its operation to laws contemplated by IC s 235(6)(b), the validity of any assignment under IC s 235(8)(a) could be challenged on the grounds that the law assigned falls outside the scope of IC s 235(6)(b). In Executive Council, Western Cape & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others[2] a majority of the Constitutional Court held that the purported assignment to the provinces under IC s 235(8) of the Local Government Transition Act[3] was invalid because the Act did not fall within the categories covered by IC s 235(6)(b). Similarly, in Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: in Re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another,[4] a majority of the Court held that the purported assignment of certain provisions of Proclamation R293 of 1962 was invalid because the provisions in question did not fall within the categories covered by IC s 235(6)(b). Both Executive Council Western Cape and DVB Behuising illustrate some of the difficulties of categorizing legislation for the purposes of IC ss 235(6) and 235(8).[5] Nevertheless, it is possible to identify certain general principles applicable to the categorisation exercise. First, it is not necessary, for the purposes of IC ss 235(6) and 235(8), to fit the whole of a given statute within a single category. If, within a single statute, there are some provisions which fall within the categories contemplated by IC s 235(6)(b) and others which do not, the former provisions will be capable of assignment under IC s 235(8) but the latter provisions will not.[6] Second, when classifying a law or provision for the purposes of IC s 235(6)(a) and (b), the purpose of the legislation is the critical component of the inquiry. A law, the subject matter of which prima facie appears to fall outside IC Schedule 6, may nevertheless be classified as an IC s 235(6)(b) law if its true purpose is to regulate a matter within IC Schedule 6. The converse is equally true.[7] Finally, although IC s 235(6)(b) refers only to provisions falling within functional areas specified in IC

[1] IC s 235(6)(c)(ii) defined 'competent authority' as 'an authority designated by the Premier'.
[2] 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC).
[3] Act 209 of 1993.
[4] 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC).
[5] These difficulties are, in essence, those raised by the processes of categorising legislation for the purposes of determining provincial legislative competence and determining whether national or provincial legislation prevails in particular cases of legislative conflict. See M Chaskalson & J Klaaren 'Federalism' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 5; Victoria Bronstein 'Conflicts' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, Forthcoming 2004) Chapter 16; Victoria Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, Forthcoming 2004) Chapter 15.
[6] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 23.
[7] Ibid at paras 37-38.

Schedule 6 and not to provisions which are necessary or incidental to such matters,[1] the Constitutional Court has held that such necessary or incidental provisions are also to be categorised as IC s 235(6)(b) provisions.[2]

(ii) Administrative responsibility, executive authority and the interpretation of assigned legislation

(aa) Administration of laws and power to exercise executive authority

The use of the terms 'administration of a law'[3] and 'power to exercise executive authority' in IC s 235 is potentially confusing. The terms may appear to have been used interchangeably in the section. This, however, is not the case. 'Power to exercise executive authority' is the authority to exercise powers conferred by law. 'Administration of laws' refers to political responsibility for the implementation of the laws in question. In Zama v Minister of Safety and Security,[4] Levinsohn J distinguished the two concepts in the following manner:

> The concepts of 'power to exercise executive authority in terms of laws' and 'laws administered by a competent authority within the jurisdiction of a national government' seem to me to be different . . . Both [paras] (6)(a) and (b) provide for these laws to be administered by 'competent authorities' within the jurisdiction of the national government or the provincial government, whatever the case may be. This appears to confer management functions upon the particular 'competent authority' rather than investing them with executive powers . . . In my view [subsec] (6) does not confer executive authority in terms of the existing laws upon the 'competent authorities' designated by the president. The subsection seeks to allocate the administration of the laws to either the national government or to a province.[5]

As Levinsohn J points out, the 'competent authorities' contemplated by IC s 235 do not necessarily acquire all the executive powers created by the laws in respect of which they were designated. The laws in question may have conferred different executive powers on a range of functionaries. The 'administration of the law' cannot therefore have meant the exercise of executive power under that law. Rather, it referred to the managerial control of the exercise of executive powers created by that law. Thus the significance of the designation of the competent authority was that he or she was the member of the Executive Council or Cabinet Minister under whose portfolio an assigned law would fall, and he or she became the party who was held politically responsible for the proper administration of the law in question.

[1] See IC s 126(2) in which legislative competence over matters incidental to the exercise of their legislative competence over schedule 6 matters expressly vest in the provinces.

[2] DVB Behuising (supra) at paras 55–59.

[3] Section 235(8) refers to 'administration of a law'. Section 235(6)(a) and (b) refer to 'laws [which] . . . shall be administered'.

[4] 1994 (4) SA 699 (D) ('Zama').

[5] Ibid at 703C–F.

(bb) Interpretation of assigned legislation

The IC s 235(8) proclamation assigning administration of laws to a province could amend any law to regulate its application or interpretation.[1] The extent of this power of amendment by proclamation was never clarified. In Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature[2] the Constitutional Court split evenly between judges who construed this power narrowly and those who construed this power broadly. The former read the power to embrace those amendments objectively necessary to achieve functional efficiency in the administration of the assigned laws.[3] The latter read the power to encompass any amendments that the President bona fide considered necessary for the efficient carrying out of an assignment.[4]

Where any relevant IC s 235(8) proclamation did not amend assigned legislation, the allocation of executive powers created by such legislation was a matter of statutory interpretation. Here the crucial transitional provisions of the IC were IC s 232(1)(c) and s 235(8)(d). Where the administration of an old order law was assigned to a province,[5] IC s 232(1)(c) provided that a reference in that law to 'a State President, Chief Minister, Administrator or other chief executive, Cabinet, Ministers' Council or executive council' should, 'unless it is inconsistent with the context or clearly inappropriate', be construed as a reference to the Premier acting in accordance with the Constitution.[6] Thus, all executive powers in laws assigned to a province which vested in a person or body referred to in IC s 232(1)(c) ordinarily vested in the Premier. IC s 232 provided no guidance on how references to Cabinet Ministers were to be construed. However, IC s 235(8)(d) provided that any reference in a law assigned to a province under IC s 235(8)(a) should 'be deemed to be a reference mutatis mutandis to the appropriate authority of the province concerned'.[7] Accordingly, where executive powers in old order

[1] Section 235(8)(b).

[2] Executive Council, Western Cape (supra)(Didcott, Kriegler and Langa JJ did not express a view on this issue).

[3] Ibid at paras 96–8 (Chaskalson P). Ibid at paras 146 and 198 (Ackermann, O' Regan and Sachs JJ concurring).

[4] Ibid at paras 144–6 (Mahomed DP)(Mokgoro J concurring). Ibid at paras 228–30 (Madala and Ngoepe JJ).

[5] The allocation of laws takes place under s 235(6). The assignment of laws takes place under s 235(8). See § 28.2*(a)*(i) above. See President of the Republic of Bophuthatswana & Another v Milsell Chrome Mines (Pty) Ltd & Others 1995 (3) BCLR 354, 366E–G (B). Waddington J seems to suggest that all old order legislation relating to IC Schedule 6 matters was, for the purposes of IC s 232(1), allocated to the provinces by IC s 147(2). With respect, that reading cannot be correct. IC s 232 contemplated only allocations effected by virtue of IC s 235(6).

[6] This would mean a reference to the Premier acting in consultation with the Executive Council because IC s 147(2) provided that, with some specified exceptions, none of which are relevant for present purposes, the President was to exercise his or her powers in consultation with the Executive Council.

[7] IC s 235(8)(d).

laws vested in Cabinet Ministers, the new order assignment by President of the laws in question to a province meant that executive powers vest in the relevant member of the Executive Council.[1] Likewise, where powers in old order laws vested in the administrative head of a department, under the new dispensation the administrative head of the relevant department of the provincial administration exercised the requisite power.

(b) Transitional provisions in the Final Constitution relating to executive authority

FC Schedule 6 gives continuing effect to any assignments effected under IC s 235(8). FC Schedule 6, Item 2(2) provides that pre-1994 legislation continues in force and is administered by the authorities that administered it when the Final Constitution took effect.[2] Thus assignments of administrative authority under IC s 235(8) of the Interim Constitution endure.

FC Schedule 6, Item 14 is the successor to IC s 235(8). It provides for the assignment to provinces of executive powers under legislation that (a) relates to Schedule 4 or 5 matters and (b) pre-dates the Final Constitution. The President is given the discretion to make such assignments by proclamation. Unlike IC s 235(8), Item 14 does not give the provinces the right to demand the assignment. The President may refuse to assign the relevant powers. Another significant difference is that Item 14 permits the assignment of any executive powers conferred by Schedule 4 or 5 legislation. It is not limited to matters in respect of which the national legislative override does not operate.

[1] There was no tension between IC s 232(1)(c) and IC s 235(8)(d) because the Premier was usually the 'appropriate authority' in respect of powers which vested in any person or body referred to in IC s 232(1)(c). In Zama, Levinsohn J stated:

> 'In my judgment, once it is found that the KwaZulu Police Act is a law which in terms of the Constitution has been allocated to the national government, then the situation which was envisaged in s 232(1)(c)(i) comes into effect and "Cabinet" is construed as a reference to "the President acting in accordance with this Constitution". In my view, the intention was that the President should assume the executive functions which were invested in those erstwhile functionaries. That, to my mind, is totally consonant with the President's position as the principal arm of executive government.'

Zama (supra) at 703J–704B (emphasis added). Where the Premier is not the appropriate authority in respect of powers which vested in a s 232(1)(c) body or functionary, the section will not operate to construe references to that body or functionary as references to the Premier because that would, of necessity, be 'clearly inappropriate'.

[2] FC Schedule 6 Item 2(2) reads, in relevant part, as follows: 'Old order legislation that continues in force . . . continues to be administered by the authorities that administered it when the new Constitution took effect, subject to the new Constitution.'

28.3 The Transfer of Old Order State Assets and Liabilities

IC s 239 regulated the allocation of state assets and liabilities existing on 27 April 1994 between the national and provincial governments. The first principle was that assets[1] associated with the administration of a particular law vested, at any given time, in the authority that had been allocated or assigned administrative responsibility in respect of that law in terms of IC s 235.[2] Assets not associated with the administration of any particular law were divided into two categories. In the first category, those assets that were to be applied in connection with a matter referred to in IC Schedule 6 that was not subject to the national government legislative override vested in the relevant provincial governments.[3] In the second category, those assets that were to be applied in connection with matters not covered by IC Schedule 6 or matters covered by IC Schedule 6 but subject to the national government legislative override vested in the national government.[4] IC s 239(1)(d) provided that, where assets could not be classified according to these principles, disputes between a provincial government and the national government were to be referred to the Commission on Provincial Government.[5] All public debts and liabilities that existed on 27 April 1994 were assumed by the national government.[6]

The Final Constitution contains no provisions relating to the succession to public assets that vested in governments disestablished by the Interim Constitution.[7] Ordinarily this textual silence will not create any difficulties. The national and provincial governments under the Final Constitution succeed the identical governments that existed under the Interim Constitution. Thus assets that were owned by any particular government under the Interim Constitution will remain the property of that government under the Final Constitution. Where, however, a public asset that pre-dated the Interim Constitution was not capable of allocation

[1] 'Assets' were defined by IC s 239(1) to include funds and administrative records. The broad use of the term suggests that it covered all debts owed to a government. See Government of the Republic of South Africa v Malevu 1995 (8) BCLR 995, 998I–J (D).

[2] IC s 239(1)(c). The provisions relating to the assignment of administrative responsibility over existing legislation are discussed above at . . . 28.2(b). The relationship between these provisions and IC s 239, the transitional provision relating to state assets, was described by Kriegler J in Executive Council, Western Cape (supra) at para 176.

[3] Section 239(1)(b). The wording of s 239(1)(b) was confusing. The section referred to any 'matter which is not a matter referred to in paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 126(3)', but it obviously ought to have referred to 'any matter falling within a functional area specified in Schedule 6 which is not a matter referred to in paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 126(3)'. Cf the wording of IC s 239(1)(a).

[4] IC s 239(1)(a).

[5] IC s 239(1)(d).

[6] IC s 239(3)(a) as amended by s 11 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 44 of 1995.

[7] It appears to have been drafted on the assumption that all such questions of succession to assets would have been resolved under the Interim Constitution, either by operation of law in terms of ss 239(1)(a)–(c), or by agreement in terms of s 239(1)(d).

in terms of the rules of IC ss 239(1)(a)–(c), and was not allocated in terms of s 239(1)(d), a problem arises. IC section 239(1)(d) no longer exists and the Final Constitution contains no procedure comparable to IC s 239(1)(d) by which to allocate such an asset. In such a situation, while the asset would vest in the State, there would be no obvious mechanism for its allocation to the provincial or national governments as agents of the State.[1]

The Final Constitution does not regulate the succession to public liabilities that pre-date 27 April 1994. Unlike assets, however, there is no need for it to do so. The Interim Constitution provided that all these liabilities were assumed by the national government.[2]

[1] In the absence of any legislation regulating the issue, the allocation of the asset between provincial and national governments would have to be negotiated between the governments concerned, having regard to the principles of co-operative government set out in Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution.

[2] IC s 239(3)(a) as amended by s 11 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 44 of 1995.

29 Elections

Glenda Fick

29.1 Introduction 29-1
29.2 Voting in national, provincial and municipal elections 29-2
(a) Identity documents and voter registration 29-2
(b) Voting rights of prisoners 29-3
29.3 Election of national and provincial legislatures 29-7
(a) Calling for elections. 29-7
(b) Composition of the national assembly and provincial legislatures 29-7
(c) The electoral system applicable to national and provincial elections. 29-9
(d) Floor-crossing and electoral systems 29-13
(e) Membership in the national and provincial legislatures . 29-13
(f) Floor-crossing in the national and provincial legislatures 29-14
29.4 The Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 2003. 29-19
29.5 Funding of political parties in the national and provincial legislatures 29-21
29.6 Election of municipal councils 29-22
(a) The electoral system applicable to municipal elections. . 29-22
(b) Membership of municipal councils 29-25
(c) Floor-crossing in the municipal councils 29-25
29.7 The Electoral Commission. 29-26
(a) Establishment of the Commission. 29-26
(b) Composition of the Commission 29-27
(c) Independence of the Electoral Commission. 29-28
29.8 The Electoral Court. 29-30

29.1 INTRODUCTION

In a representative democracy, elections provide the primary means through which citizens express the general will of the polity.[1] The Final Constitution vouchsafes free, fair and regular elections for every legislative body established in terms of the Constitution[2] and guarantees those political rights such elections require.[3]

While the Final Constitution and our electoral laws refer to free and fair elections, they do not tells us what free and fair actually means. The standard embraces several related concerns. An election is free and fair if (a) all candidates and voters have the opportunity to exercise all relevant rights; (b) each voter counts as one; and (c) all candidates and parties campaign on a formally equal basis.[4]

This chapter will canvass both the constitutional provisions and the enabling legislation designed to secure free and fair national, provincial and municipal elections.[5] This chapter will also engage those constitutional provisions and legislative enactments that govern the Electoral Commission.[6]

---

[1] Sunstein makes the point that '[a] good constitution ensures democratic elections and a free press.' He goes on to say that the central goal of a constitution is to create the preconditions for a well functioning democratic order, one in which citizens are genuinely able to govern themselves. See C R Sunstein Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do (2001) 6.

[2] Constitution of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 (the 'Final Constitution' or 'FC'), s 1*(d)*, reads, in relevant part: The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values . . . [u]niversal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

[3] FC s 19 reads, in relevant part: (1) Every citizen is free to make political choices, which includes the right to form a political party, to participate in the activities of, or recruit members for, a political party, and to campaign for a political party or cause. (2) Every citizen has the right to free, fair and regular elections for any legislative body established in terms of the Constitution. (3) Every adult citizen has the right to vote in elections for any legislative body established in terms of the Constitution, and to do so in secret, and to stand for public office and, if elected, to hold office.

[4] See P De Vos 'Free and Fair Campaigning in N Steytler et al (eds) Free and Fair Elections (1994) 119 (Free and fair elections form the bedrock of a democratic society, instilling popular confidence in the system of government and in the governors themselves as representing the will of the people.) See also J Elklit and P Svensson 'The Rise of Election Monitoring: What Makes Elections Free and Fair?' (1997) 8(3) Journal of Democracy 32-46. Free and fair elections is the internationally accepted standard. See Centre for Human Rights Human Rights and Elections: A Handbook on the Legal, Technical and Human Rights Aspects of Elections (1994); SADC Principles and Guidelines Governing Democratic Elections (2004) 3.

[5] The provisions relating to the election of the national and provincial legislatures are set out in FC ss 46 and 105, respectively. FC s157 addresses the election of legislative structures in local government. The most important pieces of electoral legislation are the Electoral Commission Act 51 of 1996, the Electoral Act 73 of 1998 and the Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000. See also Mketsu & others v African National Congress & others 2003(2) SA 1 (SCA), 2002(4) All SA 205 (SCA). In Mketsu, the Supreme Court of Appeal pointed out that the Electoral Act was to be applicable to national, provincial and municipal elections under FC s 3. Parliament provided that the Act was to come into effect at a date to be proclaimed and that s 3*(c)*, which addressed municipal elections, would come into effect later than the rest of the Act. As it turned out, no such date making the Act applicable to municipal elections was proclaimed. Instead, Parliament passed the Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000. The provisions of this Act are similar to the Electoral Act. Indeed, s 78 of the former contains the same provisions as s 96 of the latter.

[6] FC s 190(1)(a)-(b).

29.2 VOTING IN NATIONAL, PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS

The right to vote is qualified by the requirement that one must be a registered voter. Unlike the 1994 election, for which there was no voters' roll, the Final Constitution, contemplates an electoral system based on the national common voters' roll for the election of the National Assembly.[1] Elections for the provincial legislatures and municipal councils are based on the province's segment and the municipality's segment of the national common voters' roll respectively.

The Electoral Act 73 of 1998 creates an environment for free and fair elections of the national and provincial legislatures. Although the Act does not define a free and fair election, compliance with its provisions results in elections that can be regarded as free and fair. The Electoral Act ensures that all South African citizens whose names appear on the voters roll have the right to vote.

The compilation of the national common voters' roll by the chief electoral officer requires a voter registration process.[2] Any South African citizen in possession of an identity document may apply for registration as a voter. The required identity document is a bar-coded identity document that contains computerised information about a potential voter. The information contained in the barcode that is used to construct the voters' roll.

The necessity of possessing a bar-coded identity document as a prerequisite for registering as a voter proved controversial in the run-up to the 1999 national and provincial elections. Many South Africans citizens did not possess the required identity document.[3]

(a) Identity documents and voter registration

In New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic South Africa,[4] the Constitutional Court recognised the significance of free and fair elections in relation to the right to vote.[5] The Court stated:

> The right to free and fair elections underlines the importance of the exercise of the right to vote and the requirement that that every election should be fair has implications for the way in which the right to vote can be given more substantive content and legitimately exercised.[6]

This broadly stated principle has two concrete implications. First, each citizen must be entitled to vote only once in an election. Secondly, only those persons

[1] FC ss 46, 105 and 157.

[2] Section 6 of the Electoral Act.

[3] For purposes of the general registration of voters prior to the 1999 elections, an identity document included a temporary certificate, issued by the Director-General of Home Affairs, to a South African citizen from particulars contained in the population register and who had applied for an identity document.. Therefore, citizens who had taken steps to apply for an identity document and who were in possession of a temporary registration certificates were eligible to register and once registered, qualified to vote in the second democratic election of the National Assembly and provincial legislatures.

[4] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) ('NNP').

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at para 12.

entitled to vote should be permitted to do so. In order to ensure the proper exercise of the right to vote, [t]he process of registration and voting needs to be managed and regulated in order to ensure that the elections are free and fair.[1] The NNP Court held that the Electoral Act creates the appropriate mechanisms for voter registration, voting and the construction of the national common voters roll. In particular, the NNP Court was satisfied that a bar-coded identity document constituted a rational means of realizing the legitimate government purpose of enabling the effective exercise of the right to vote.

In Democratic Party v Minister of Home Affairs the constitutionality of the provisions of the Electoral Act that provide for the documents necessary for registration and voting were challenged.[2] Goldstone J, writing for the Court, took the view that the issues relating to the constitutionality of the Electoral Act in the present case were substantially similar to those addressed by the court in New National Party. In the Electoral Act, Parliament expressly excluded certain citizens from registering as voters. The Act provides that the chief electoral officer may not register a person as a voter if the person has not registered in the prescribed manner or has applied for registration fraudulently. Other bars to registration (and voting) are: being declared by the High Court to be of unsound mind or mentally disordered, detention under the Mental Health Act, and not being ordinarily resident in the voting district for which a person has applied for registration.[3]

(b) Voting rights of prisoners

The Interim Constitution contained provisions that permitted Parliament to qualify the right to vote.[4] Section 16*(d)* of the Electoral Act 202 of 1993 denied the right to vote to prisoners who had been convicted and sentenced without the option of a fine in respect of murder, robbery with aggravating circumstances and rape; or who had been convicted and sentenced without the option of a fine for any attempt to commit these offences. The Electoral Act 73 of 1998 did not expressly deny any category of prisoner the right to vote in a South African election.

Just prior to the 1999 elections, the Constitutional Court considered the voting rights of prisoners. In August v Electoral Commission, the Court held that prisoners were not excluded from voting by the provisions of s 8(2) of the Electoral Act, were entitled to register as voters and could not be disenfranchised.[5] Furthermore, all prisoners who had registered to vote were entitled to vote in the election of the national and provincial legislatures in 1999.

---

[1] NNP supra at para 16.

[2] 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC).

[3] Section 8(2) of the Electoral Act.

[4] Section 6*(c)* and s 21(2) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 200 of 1993 (the Interim Constitution or 'IC').

[5] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) ('August').

In its prefatory remarks in August, the The Constitutional Court quoted the following dictum from Haig:

> All forms of democratic government are founded on the right to vote. Without that right, democracy cannot exist. The marking of a ballot is the mark of distinction of citizens of a democracy. It is the proud badge of freedom. While the Charter guarantees certain electoral rights, the right to vote is generally granted and defined by statute. That statutory right is so fundamental that a broad and liberal interpretation must be given to it. Every reasonable effort should be made to enfranchise citizens. Conversely, every care should be taken to guard against disenfranchisement.[1]

After establishing that the Constitution did not disenfranchise prisoners, the August Court had to determine whether there was any basis in law to do so. According to the court, [r]ights may not be limited without justification, and legislation dealing with the franchise must be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement.[2] Since Parliament had failed to limit the voting rights of prisoners in terms of a law of general application that was reasonable and justifiable under FC s 36, prisoners were entitled to the full and effective citizenship.[3] That includes the right to vote.

In August, the Court was also required to interpret the phrase 'ordinarily resident' in s 7(1) of the Electoral Act. It held that the phrase had to be interpreted to allow for the enfranchisement of voters. In the circumstances of the case, those prisoners imprisoned during the period of voter registration would be considered ordinarily resident in prison.[4]

---

[1] Haig v Canada 105 DLR (4th) 577, 613 (SCC) cited in August (supra) at para 18. The textual argument in August had a number of different sources. FC s 1*(d)* recognises universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll and a multi party system of democratic government to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness. Under the Constitution, there is a common South African citizenship. All citizens are equally entitled to the rights privileges and benefits of citizenship, and equally subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. FC ss 3(1) and (2). Section 3(3) requires legislation to determine the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship. The Constitution does not define citizenship, but states that [n]o citizen may be deprived of citizenship. FC s 20. In August the court was concerned with citizenship but offers no interpretation of the right to citizenship set out in s 20. Citizenship is a contested concept. TH Marshalls' influential conception of citizenship depicts it as a complex interplay of social, political and civil rights. T Marshall Citizenship and Social Class (1950) extract reprinted in P Clark (ed) Citizenship (1994) 173. These three components are adequately provided for in the Constitution. Under Marshalls' account of citizenship, the political element means the right to participate in the exercise of political power, as a member of a body invested with political authority or as an elector of the members of such a body. See R Lister Citizenship: Feminist Perspectives (1997) 15-16. The Constitution gives effect to this aspect of citizenship in s 19(3). It links all political rights, including the right to vote, to citizenship. FC s 19(3) grants the right to vote for all legislative bodies to all adult citizens. As the section stands, it must be read to include prisoners. To this end, the August Court stated:

> The achievement of the franchise has historically been important both for the acquisition of the rights of full and effective citizenship by all South Africans regardless of race, and for the accomplishment of an all-embracing nationhood. The universality of the franchise is important not only for nationhood and democracy. The vote of each and every citizen is a badge of dignity and of personhood. Quite literally it says that everybody counts.

August (supra) at para 16.

[2] August (supra) at para 17.

[3] Ibid at para 16.

[4] Ibid at para 27.

After the Constitutional Courts' decision in August, Parliament amended s 7 of the Electoral Act.[1] The amendment states that a person is regarded as ordinarily resident at the home or place where that person normally lives and to which that person regularly returns after any period of temporary absence. The amendment also states that a person is not regarded as ordinarily resident at a place where that person is lawfully imprisoned or detained, but at the last home or place where that person normally lived when not imprisoned or detained.

The matter of the prisoners' franchise was revisited before the 2004 national and provincial elections. Parliament had amended the Electoral Act so as to rescind the right to vote from convicted prisoners who were in prison without the option of a fine.[2] In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-Integration of Offenders (NICRO), the Constitutional Court held that these provisions that denied convicted prisoners serving sentences without the option of a fine of the right to register for and to vote in elections during the period of imprisonment were unconstitutional.[3]

In NICRO, the Constitutional Court, pointing out that in a justification analysis facts and policy are intertwined, required the Minister of Home Affairs to justify a legislative enactment limiting the right to vote.[4] In NICRO the Court heard from counsel that government had distinguished three classes of prisoners: (1) awaiting trial prisoners who were entitled to be presumed innocent, (2) prisoners who had been sentenced to a fine with the alternative of imprisonment, and who were in custody because they had not paid the fine; and (3) prisoners incarcerated without the option of a fine. Only the third group was to be excluded from registering and voting. The government argued that since there were law-abiding citizens who were, for various reasons, unable to get to registration and voting stations, then it was both reasonable and justifiable to prefer to allocate its scarce resources for the enfranchisement of such citizens to vote and rather than continued enfranchisement of the third group of prisoners.[5] Considerations of equity, and the perception that the electorate would view the government as soft on crime were it to allow the prisoners to vote, were also said to have animated the government's decision.[6]

---

[1] See Schedule 2 to the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000.

[2] Section 8(2) reads, in relevant part: 'The chief electoral officer may not register a person as a voter if that person:(f) is serving a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine.' Section 24B(1) reads, in relevant part: 'In an election for the National Assembly or a provincial legislature, a person who on election day is in prison and not serving a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine and whose name appears on the voters roll for another voting district, is deemed for the for that election day to have been registered by his or her name having been entered on the voters roll for the district in which he or she is in prison.' Section 24B(2) reads, in relevant part: 'A person who is in prison on election day may only vote if he or she is not serving a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine.'

[3] 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) ('NICRO').

[4] NICRO (supra) at para 35.

[5] Ibid at para 44.

[6] Ibid at para 55.

With respect to the structure of the government's argument for restricting the franchise of prisoners, the NICRO Court wrote:

> Where justification depends on factual material, the party must establish the facts on which the justification depends. Justification may, however, depend not on disputed facts but on policies directed to legitimate government concerns. If that be the case the party relying on justification should place sufficient information before the court as to the policy that is being furthered, the reasons for that policy, and why it is considered reasonable in pursuit of the policy to limit a constitutional right.[1]

The Court then concluded that while resources cannot be ignored in assessing whether reasonable arrangements have been made for enabling citizens to vote, the mere assertion by the government that it could not afford to reach out to non-incarcerated citizens at the same time as it continued to facilitate prisoner enfranchisement did not satisfy the aforementioned standard of justification. [2] So although the government had asserted that it would be costly and logistically difficult[3] to make the necessary electoral arrangements for prisoners, it had failed to provide the court with sufficient information on the actual costs of such an endeavour.[4]

With respect to policy, the Court rejected the governments desire to enhance its image and to correct a public misconception as to its true attitude to crime as grounds for the disenfranchisement of the third class of prisoners.[5] The Court assumed, for the sake of argument, that what the government actually intended to convey was that it is important for [it] to denounce crime and to communicate to the public that the rights that citizens have are related to their duties and obligations as citizens.[6] But even this argument, against the background of the the almost tangential manner in which the government justified its policy arguments for the disenfranchisement of the prisoners, could not save the challenged amendment. The Court ordered the Electoral Commission and the Minister of Correctional Services to ensure that all prisoners who were entitled to vote were

[1] NICRO (supra) at para 36.
[2] Ibid at para 48.
[3] Ibid at para 50
[4] Ibid at para 49 (The factual basis for the justification based on cost and the lack of resources had not been established.)
[5] Ibid at para 57.
[6] Ibid at para 57. These duties and obligations include at least an obligation to respect the rights of others and to comply with the law. Ibid at para 57. Embedded in the courts statement is a conception of citizenship that it does not elaborate on. The balancing of rights and obligations are essential to an understanding of the concept of citizenship. In relation to citizenship, Lister writes '[f]ew would dispute that responsibilities as well as rights enter the citizenship equation. The questions is what is the appropriate balance between the two and how does that balance reflect power relations.' R Lister Citizenship: Feminist Perspectives (1997) 21. Besides saying that the rights of citizenship under FC s 3 include the right to vote in elections and that the duties and responsibilities include at least an obligation to respect the rights of others and to comply with the law the court says nothing else about what citizenship under FC s 3 and FC s 20 might entail. NICRO (supra) at para 24.

afforded the opportunity to register as voters and to vote in the 2004 national and provincial elections.[1]

29.3 Election of the National and Provincial Legislatures

(a) Calling for elections

The National Assembly and provincial legislatures are elected for a period of five years.[2] If the National Assembly is dissolved or if National Assemblys term expires, the President must call for and set dates for an election that must be held within 90 days of the date of either the dissolution or term expiration. A proclamation calling and setting dates for an election may be issued either before or after the expiry of the term of the National Assembly. The election must take place on a single day announced by the President after consultation with the Electoral Commission.

FC s 109 sets out a set of similar provisions applicable to the election of provincial legislatures. The Premier calls for these elections.

The Electoral Commission may request that the person who called an election postpone the voting day if is satisfied that such postponement is necessary for the ensuring a free and fair election and that the voting day will still fall within the period required by the Constitution or by national or provincial legislation.[3] If the request is acceded to, the President or Premier, by proclamation or notice in the Government Gazette, must postpone an election to a day determined by the President or Premier. However, the new voting day must fall within the period required by the Constitution or national or provincial legislation.[4]

(b) Composition of the National Assembly and provincial legislatures

The National Assembly is elected to represent the people and to ensure government by the people under the Constitution.[5] It consists of 400 elected women and men. They are elected in terms of an electoral system that is prescribed by national legislation[6]; is based on the national common voters roll; provides for a minimum voting age of 18 years and results, in general, in proportional [1] NICRO also had a bearing on the 2005 municipal elections. Section 7 of the Municipal Electoral Act states that a person may vote only if registered as a voter on the certified segment of the voters roll for a voting district which falls within the municipality. The compilation of the voters roll takes place in accordance the provisions of s 8 of the Electoral Act. After NICRO, s 8(2)(f) was found to be unconstitutional. Prisoners are now allowed to register to vote and should be allowed to vote in the municipal elections.

[2] FC ss 49(1) and 108(1).

[3] Section 21(1) of the Electoral Act.

[4] Ibid at s 21(2).

[5] FC s 42(3).

[6] See schedule A to the Electoral Act 73 of 1993. The schedule was introduced by the Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2003 and provides for a system of close-list proportional representation.

representation.[1] An Act of Parliament must provide a formula for determining the number of members of the National Assembly.[2] This formula is set out in schedule 3 to the Electoral Act.

A provincial legislature should be elected according to an electoral system based on the same principles applicable to the election of the National Assembly. It should have between 30 and 80 members.[3] Schedule 3 to the Electoral Act sets out the formula for determining the number of seats held by parties in the provincial legislatures.

In Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v The Electoral Commission, the Constitutional Court found the number of seats in a provincial legislature provided for in a provinces constitution would prevail over the number of provincial seats determined by the Electoral Commission in accordance with schedule 3 to Electoral Act.[4] The Constitutional Court held that FC s 105(2) has no application to the composition of a provincial legislature that is otherwise provided for in a provincial constitution. If FC s 105(2) did not apply to said composition, then neither would any legislation authorised by that section.[5]

The Constitution confers on a provincial legislature the power to make its own provincial constitution.[6] FC s 143(1) permits provincial legislatures to provide for different legislative structures and procedures to those provided for in the default provisions in chapter 6 of the Constitution.[7] In Certification of the Constitution of the Province of Kwa-Zulu Natal, the Constitutional Court had held that legislative and executive structures and procedures did not relate to the fundamental nature and substance of the democratic State created by the Interim Constitution nor to the substance of the legislative or executive powers of Parliament or government of the provinces. In Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, the Constitutional Court found that structures of the legislature or executive pertained to the component parts of the legislature or the executive. With respect to these component parts, a provincial constitution could depart from the default provisions. Hence,

[1] FC s 46(1).

[2] See s 114 of the Electoral Act. The formulae referred to in sections 46(2) and 105(2) of the Constitution are set out in schedule 3 to the Electoral Act.

[3] FC s 105.

[4] 1999 (11) BCLR 1209 (CC) ('Premier of the Province of the Western Cape'). The factual background of Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v The Electoral Commission is as follows. Before the June 1999 election, the Electoral Commission determined that there would be 39 seats allotted to the Western Cape legislature. However, the provinces constitution allowed for 42 seats. The parties were unsuccessful in resolving the dispute and on an urgent basis approached the court for a declaratory order. The respondents contended that the conflict between the provincial constitution and national legislation was to be resolved in accordance with s 147 of the Constitution.

[5] FC s 105(2) provides that a provincial legislature consists of between 30 and 80 members and that the number of members, which may differ among the provinces, must be determined in terms of national legislation.

[6] The scope of the constitution-making powers of the provinces was considered by the Court in Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of Kwa-Zulu Natal 1996, 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) and Ex Parte Speaker of the Western Cape Certification Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC) ('Speaker of the Western Cape').

[7] Premier of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 9.

a province could provide in its constitution that its legislative and executive component parts could operate quite differently from those provided for in the national Constitution. However, any difference would have to comply with FC s 143. Section 143(2)(a) requires compliance with the founding values and the principles of co-operative government. Section 143(2)(b) states that a provincial constitution may not confer on a province any powers beyond those conferred upon it by the Constitution. Read together Certification of the Constitution of the Province of Kwa-Zulu Natal and Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape lead to the conclusion that the determination of the number of seats in a provincial legislature pertained to a legislative structure and could therefore be addressed by a provincial constitution.[1]

In Ex Parte Speaker of the Western Cape Certification Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997, the Constitution Court was asked to decide whether a provincial electoral system is a provincial structure contemplated by FC s 143(1)(a).[2] An electoral system provides a mechanism for converting votes cast by the electorate to seats in an elected body. The degree of correspondence between the number of votes cast and the seats won is determined by the choice of electoral system. The system of proportional reprsentation provided for in the provincial constitution of the Western Cape was not consistent with the one provided for in Annexure A to Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution. The province argued that an electoral system related to the structure of the provincial legislature. Since it was allowed to provide for legislative structures different from those set out in Chapter 6 of the Final Constitution, then it was similarly allowed to alter the electoral system. The Constitutional Court dismissed this argument. The Court held that when FC s 143 permits a provincial legislative structure different to that provided for in FC Chapter 6, it envisages no more than a difference regarding the nature and the number of the elements constituting the legislative structure. An electoral system does not constitute one of these elements. It also has no effect on the nature or the number of such elements.[3] Hence, the provisions of the provincial constitution that allowed for an electoral system that was predominantly based on representation in geographic multi-member constituencies were held to be inconsistent with the electoral scheme provided for in the Final Constitution

(c) The electoral system applicable to the national and provincial elections

Item 6(3) of Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution sets out a variety of transitional arrangements. It states that:

[1] Given that there was no conflict between national legislation and the provisions of the provincial constitution, the dispute resolution mechanism provided for in FC s 147(1)(a) did not apply.

[2] 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC).

[3] Speaker of the Western Cape (supra) at para 48.

Despite the repeal of the previous Constitution, schedule 2 to that Constitution, as amended by Annexure A to this schedule, applies:

(a) to the first election of the National Assembly under the new Constitution;

(b) to the loss of membership of the Assembly in circumstances other than those provided for in section 47 (3) of the new Constitution; and

(c) to the filling of vacancies in the Assembly, and the supplementation, review and use of party lists for the filling of vacancies, until the second election of the Assembly under the new Constitution.

Schedule 2 to the Interim Constitution (as amended by Annexure A to schedule 6 to the 1996 Constitution) sets out the details of the closed-list proportional representation system that applied to the 1994 and 1999 national and provincial elections. Item 11(1) of schedule 6 contains similar provisions relating to the election of the provincial legislatures.

During the 1994, 1999 and 2004, national and provincial elections in South Africa relied on a system of closed-list proportional representation (PR). Under this system, a political party receives a share of seats in a legislature in direct proportion to the number of votes cast for the party in the election.

There is no constitutional or legislative provision that extended the closed-list proportional representation system beyond 1999. After the 1999 elections, South Africa experienced the unusual situation of not having in place an electoral system applicable to national and provincial elections. An amendment to the Electoral Act in 2003 corrected the situation.[1] The Act constitutes the national legislation contemplated by ss 46(1) and 105(1). Schedule 1A of the Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2004 sets out the closed-list PR system applicable to future elections.

Under this system political parties compile lists containing the names of the candidates they have nominated. The parties rank their candidates in order of preference, with the leader of a party topping its list. The lists are closed. That is, a voter is not able to express with his or her vote any preference for a particular candidate on the list over another. The essence of the system is that the proportion of all the votes cast for a party is translated into a proportionate number of seats in the legislature. All votes are equally weighted and no votes are wasted. The system is valued for its simplicity. Voters make a mark next to the name and symbol of the party for which they wish to vote.

An important feature of this system is that the seat held by a member of a legislature belongs to the party that nominated the candidate and not to an individual candidate.[2] Another feature of the electoral system is its inclusiveness. It requires no minimum threshold of votes to secure representation in a legislative body. The system is capable of accommodating a wide spectrum of political parties representing a range of voters interests.[1]

[1] See Schedule 1A to the Electoral Act 73 of 1998 introduced by the Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2004.

[2] See Speaker of the National Assembly v Makwetu 2001 (3) BCLR 302, 308 (C)(Hlope JP and Davis J held that the amount of seats allocated to each party was dependent on the votes cast in favour of such party at the general election. Once a member of the National Assembly ceased to be a member of a particular political party, that party was entitled to fill the vacancy by nominating a person whose name appeared on the list of candidates from which the vacating member was originally nominated and who was the next qualified and available person on the list.)

Compared to constituency-based systems, closed-list PR more readily enables higher levels of womens representation in legislative bodies. One reason advanced for this outcome is that the electorate is required to vote for a party rather than for an individual. It is argued that voting in this manner allows voters and parties to overcome the negative stereotyping of women in politics. Of course, party lists only increase the chance of female representation in legislatures when women appear in winnable places on a partys list.[2]

South Africas closed-list PR electoral system is often criticised for falling short on accountability. According to one definition political accountability refers to the constraint placed on the behaviour of public officials by organisations and constituencies with the power to apply sanctions to them.[3] Lodge notes that under South Africa's electoral system, elected representatives are directly accountable to their leaders, not the electorate.[4] PR lacks the responsiveness and accountability that exists in the constituency-based system.[5]

The electoral system received the attention of the government appointed Electoral Task Team (ETT) in 2002. In order to address the lacuna in South Africa's constitutional and electoral law mentioned earlier, the ETT's brief was to prepare draft legislation for an electoral system that would meet the requirements of FC ss 46(1)(a)-(d) and 105(1)(a)-(d). These sections require that national legislation

[1] See United Democratic Movement v President of South Africa 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC) ('United Democratic Movement'). The Court wrote that a multi-party system of democratic government required by FC s 1*(d)*:

> . . . clearly excludes a one-party state, or a system of government in which a limited number of parties are entitled to compete a multi-party democracy contemplates a political order in which it is permissible for different political groups to organise, promote their views through public debate and participate in free and fair elections. These activities may be subjected to reasonable regulation compatible with an open and democratic society. Laws which go beyond that, and which undermine multi-party democracy, would be invalid. What had to be decided, therefore, was whether the disputed legislation had this effect.

[2] In South Africas 1994 and 1999 elections the percentage of women in the National Assembly was 27 per cent and 30 per cent respectively. High levels of womens representation are more likely to occur when closed-list PR is used along with a quota that favours women candidates. For example, the ANCs policy in 1994 and 1999 made women one third the candidates on its list. See J Ballington 'Political Parties, Gender Equality and Elections' in South Africa in G Fick, S Meintjes & M Simons (eds) One Woman, One Vote: The Gender Politics of South African Elections (2002) 75-102. In 2004, the ANC increased the number of women candidates on its lists to 40 per cent. After the 2004 elections women now hold 123 of the 400 seats (31 per cent) in the National Assembly. It is unclear how many women voters voted for parties which reflected their interests and which promoted gender equality and non-sexism. It is also worth noting that SADC Heads of State signed the Gender and Development Declaration in Blantyre, Malawi in 1997. The Declaration's provisions include a commitment on the part of Heads of State to ensure the equal representation of women and men in the decision-making of member states and SADC structures at all levels, and the achievement of at least 30 per cent target of women in political and decision-making structures by year 2005. The ANC has made a public commitment that by 2009 half of its members of parliament and other public representatives would be women.

[3] PIMS & The Right to Know Programme Regulation of Private Funding to Political Parties IDASA Position Paper (October 2003) 10.

[4] T Lodge 'How the System Works' Election Update (South Africa) Number 1 (February 2004) 2.

[5] Ibid.

prescribes an electoral system that is based on the national common voters' roll; that provides for a minimum voting age of 18 years; and that results, in general, in proportional representation. FC s 46(2) requires an act of Parliament to provide a formula for determining the number of members in the National Assembly. FC Section 105(2) governs membership in provincial legislatures.

The ETT reviewed the closed-list PR system that had applied to the 1994 and 1999 national and provincial elections. All members of the ETT recommended that this electoral system apply to the 2004 election.

A minority of ETT members proposed no changes to the electoral system. Under this system, of the 400 members in the National Assembly, 200 are elected from the national lists and 200 from the regional lists submitted by political parties. The regional lists are derived from the nine provinces.[1]

The majority of ETT members proposed a change to the electoral system for the 2009 national and provincial elections. It took the view that under the 1994 and 1999 electoral system, each of the nine provinces could readily be regarded as a multi-member constituency. In its view, the number of multi-member constituencies could be increased if the each of the provinces was broken down into smaller constituencies.[2] It was proposed that the nine multi-member constituencies be increased to 69 multi-member constituencies countrywide. The number of representatives to be elected in each of these constituencies would vary from 3 to 7 depending on the number of registered voters in a constituency. Of the 400 members in the National Assembly, 300 would be elected from closed party lists applicable to the 69 multi-member constituencies and 100 members would be elected from the national lists. The national lists would be used to achieve overall proportionality.

This proposal for closed-list PR in multi-member constituencies was driven by concerns about accountability and a desire to establish a closer link between the voter and his or her representative. The majority of the ETT was of the opinion that [g]iven that the lists [would] be short and that candidates [would] have to campaign in their constituencies and represent them afterwards, there will clearly be a face to representation and a much closer link with the electorate than is presently the case.[3] The ETT's majority did not advocate a parallel system or a mixed member proportional (MMP) system. That is, it does not call for single-member constituencies in which members of the National Assembly would be elected on a first-past-the-post basis accompanied by a compensatory closed national list. It remains to be seen whether the recommendations of the majority of members of the ETT will be debated in Parliament at some point in the future.

[1] Item 25 of schedule 2 to the Interim Constitution defines a region as the territorial area of a province and defines a regional list as a party's list of candidates for the election of the National Assembly.

[2] The boundaries of the constituencies would be those of district councils and metro councils and the same outer boundaries wold apply for national, provincial municipal elections. No constituency boundary would transcend a provincial boundary and electoral demarcation would not be required. See Report of the Electoral Task Team (2003) 23.

[3] Ibid at 25.

(d) Floor-crossing and electoral systems

The Final Constitution now allows for floor crossing in legislatures in the three spheres of government.[1] A vexing question is whether there is a need for a move towards a PR system applicable to the election of representatives in the national and provincial legislatures that more readily accommodates floor-crossing than closed-list PR does. While not as responsive as a first-past-the-post single-member constituency system, closed-list PR in multi-member constituencies still require elected officials to answer to identifiable constituencies.[2]

In United Democratic Movement v President of South Africa[3] the court alluded to the awkwardness of allowing floor crossing under a (closed-list) proportional representation in the following terms:

> There is a closer link between the voter and party in proportional representation systems than may be the case in constituency-based electoral systems, and that for this reason the argument against defection may be stronger than would be the case in constituency-based elections. But even in constituency-based elections, there is a close link between party membership and election to a Legislature. Floor-crossing, in the absence of a meaningful link between the voter and the political party he or she votes for under a closed list PR system, has the potential to make a relatively unresponsive system even less responsive.[4]

(e) Membership in the national and provincial legislatures

Every citizen who is qualified to vote for the National Assembly is eligible to be a member of the Assembly.[5] There are several exceptions to this

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 2 of 2003.

[2] Report of the Electoral Task Team (supra) at 26 (Closed-list PR in multi-member constituencies increase the the degree of accessibility and responsiveness between voter and representative.)

[3] 2003(1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC) ('United Democratic Movement').

[4] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 34. In this paragraph the Court was referring to a first-past-the-post or majoritarian constituency-based system in which there are single-member constituencies. See A Reynolds & B Reilly 'Proportional Representation Systems' in The International IDEA Handbook of Electoral System Design (1997) 66 (Of closed-list PR systems generally, the authors write: Voters have no ability to determine the identity of the persons who will represent them, and [have] no identifiable representative for their own town, district or village, nor do they have the ability to easily reject an individual if they feel that he or she has behaved poorly in office.')

[5] FC s 47(2). B Van Heerden, A Cockrell and R Keightley (eds) Bobergs' Law of Persons and the Family (2nd Edition 1999) (The authors point out that '[i]n as much as minors who have attained the age of 18 years are eligible for nomination as candidates for election to the National Assembly, the National Council of Provinces and a provincial legislature, it seems that such minors would have locus standi in proceedings relating to their candidacy'). See FC s 47(1) read with FC s 46(1)(c), and FC s 62(1) read with FC s 106 (1).

rule.[1] Any disqualification contemplated by FC s 47(1)(e) ends five years after the sentence has been completed.[2] In addition, a person who is not eligible for membership of the National Assembly on the grounds mentioned in s 47(1)(a) or (b) may be a candidate for the Assembly, subject to any limits or conditions established by national legislation.[3] Similar qualifications and exceptions apply in relation to membership in provincial legislatures. [4]

A person loses membership of the National Assembly if he or she ceases to be eligible, or is absent from the Assembly without permission in circumstances for which the rules and orders of the Assembly prescribe loss of membership.[5]After a recent amendment to FC s 47(3*(c)*, a person loses membership of the National Assembly if he or she ceases to be a member of the party that nominated him or her as a member of the National Assembly, unless he or she has become a member of another party.[6] This scenario was made possible after the introduction of Schedule 6A to the Final Constitution and the lifting of the prohibition on floor crossing in the national and provincial legislatures. The provisions of Schedule 6A are discussed below.

The Final Constitution requires that vacancies in the National Assembly and provincial legislatures be filled in terms of national legislation.[7] The filling of vacancies in both legislative bodies is now covered by item 23 of schedule 1A to the Electoral Act. In the event of a vacancy in a legislature, the party which the vacating member represented must fill the vacancy by nominating a person whose name appears on the list of candidates from which the party's members were originally nominated and who is the next qualified and available person the list.

(f) Floor-crossing in the national and provincial legislatures

Item 23(A) of Annexure A to schedule 6 to the Final Constitution provided:

[1] See FC s 47(1)(a)-(e).

[2] FC s 47(1)(e). Grounds for disqualification include anyone who is appointed by, or is in the service of the state and receives remuneration for that appointment or service other than the President, Deputy President, Ministers and Deputy Ministers. The exceptions to the rule include other office-bearers whose functions are compatible with those of a member of the Assembly, and have been declared compatible with those functions by national legislation, permanent delegates to the National Council of Provinces or members of a provincial legislature or Municipal Council and extend to un-rehabilitated insolvents, anyone declared to be unsound mind by a South African court or anyone who, after the coming into effect of the section, is convicted of an offence and sentenced to more than 12 months' imprisonment without the option of a fine, either within or outside of South Africa if the conduct constituting the offence would have been an offence in South Africa. No one may be regarded as having been sentenced until an appeal against the conviction or sentence has been determined, or until the time for an appeal has expired.

[3] FC s 47(2).

[4] FC s 106.

[5] FC s 47(3)(a) and (b).

[6] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 2 of 2003.

[7] FC s 47(4).

(1) A person loses membership of a legislature to which this schedule applies if that person ceases to be a member of the party which nominated that person as a member of the legislature.
(2) Despite sub-item (1) any existing political party may at any time change its name.
(3) An Act of Parliament may, within a reasonable period after the new Constitution took effect, be passed in accordance with section 76(1) of the new Constitution to amend this item and item 23 to provide for the manner in which it will be possible for a member of a legislature who ceases to be a member of the party which nominated that member, to retain membership of such legislature.
(4) An Act of Parliament referred to in sub item (3) may also provide for:
(a) any existing party to merge with another party; or
(b) any party to subdivide into more than one party.

The constitutional framework created by the above provisions was altered after a series of political realignments in the Western Cape. The initial realignment was the result of the withdrawal of the NNP from the Democratic Alliance. Later on all parties seized upon the possibility of creating mechanisms for such realignments that might help them shift the political landscape in their own favour.

In June 2002 Parliament passed two amendments to the Constitution and two Acts of Parliament aimed at allowing members of national, provincial and local government legislatures to defect or to cross the floor. The Acts were:

(a) the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002 (the First Amendment Act);
(b) the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 21 of 2002 (the Second Amendment Act);
(c) the Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002 (the Local Government Amendment Act); and
(d) the Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002 (the Membership Act).

In short, the four Acts allowed members of the National Assembly, the provincial legislatures and local government to cross the floor or to form new parties without loss of their membership. That is, a member of the National Assembly or a provincial legislature or local government could change parties while retaining his or her seat. The First Amendment Act and the Local Government Amendment Act both related to floor crossing in the local government sphere. The Second Amendment Act and the Membership Act related to floor crossing in the National Assembly and provincial legislatures. The Membership Act removed the constitutional prohibition on floor crossing. The United Democratic Movement and other parties challenged the suite of floor crossing legislation in United Democratic Movement v President of South Africa.[1]

[1] 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC). See also United Democratic Movement (supra) and President of the Republic of South Africa v United Democratic Movement 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) (Addressed the issuing of interim orders by the High Court and Constitutional Court respectively.)

One leg of the applicant's argument was that an anti-defection provision was an essential component of an electoral system based on proportional representation. This argument did not emphasise that South Africas electoral system was a closed-list system. There are other PR systems such as those that rely on open lists or have a majoritarian element which more readily accommodate floor crossing. The electoral system applicable to South Africas local government elections is an example of the latter.

The applicants regarded an anti-defection provision as necessary to ensure that the results of an election would not be affected by the defection of persons who gained their seats in a legislature solely because of their position on the party list. The applicants correctly pointed out that it is the party, and not the members, which is entitled to the seats. Addressing the relationship between voters and their elected representatives the United Democratic Movement Court observed that '[t]here is a tension between the expectation of voters and the conduct of members elected to represent them.'[1] It then quoted from its holding in the First Certification Judgment:

> Under a list system of proportional representation, it is parties that the electorate votes for, and parties which must be accountable to the electorate. A party which abandons its manifesto in a way not accepted by the electorate would probably lose at the next election. In such a system an anti-defection clause is not inappropriate to ensure that the will of the electorate is honoured. An individual member remains free to follow the dictates of personal conscience. This is not inconsistent with democracy.
>
> . . . An anti-defection clause enables a political party to prevent defections of its elected members, thus ensuring that they continue to support the party under whose aegis they were elected. It also prevents parties in power from enticing members of small parties to defect from the party upon whose list they were elected to join the governing party. If this were permitted it could enable the governing party to obtain a special majority which it might not otherwise be able to muster and which is not a reflection of the views of the electorate (emphasis added).[2]

The court recognised that requiring a member of a legislature to resign if he or she changes party allegiance during the life of the legislature though possibly desirable cannot be implied as a necessary adjunct to a proportional representation system [3] However, the Court's description of the electoral system as a proportional representation system is not sufficiently precise. The system in South Africa is, as we have seen, a closed-list proportional representation in which a party receives a number of seats in a legislature in proportion to the total number of votes it receives in an election. The Court correctly noted that '[a]lthough voters might have been influenced by the names of candidates, and possibly their place on the list, they voted for parties and not for particular candidates.'[4]

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 31.

[2] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) (First Certification Judgment) at paras 186-187.

[3] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 35.

[4] Ibid at para 37.

As we have already seen, South Africa's closed-list proportional representation system is but one of many systems of proportional representation. Moreover, a number of other proportional representation systems – for example, the mixed member proportional (MMP) representation system – that possess features of majoritarian and list proportional representation that more readily accommodate floor crossing.[1] In these other systems, lists compensate for any disproportionality in party support brought about by voting in constituencies or wards.

The Final Constitution itself implicitly recognises the variety of PR systems. IC s 46(1) of the Constitution requires a system that results, in general, in proportional representation. Reynolds and Reilly note that the rationale underpinning all proportional representation systems is to consciously reduce the disparity between a party's share of the national vote and its share of the parliamentary seats.[2] The system relied on in South Africa's 1994 and 1999 elections results in pure proportional outcomes.[3] However, Parliament has a range of options under FC s 46(1). A closed list PR system with pure proportional outcomes would meet this requirement, but so would a system which had an overall (or general) outcome of proportionality.

In United Democratic Movement, the Constitutional Court did not emphasise the features of a closed-list PR system. In United Democratic it simply reiterated the view expressed in First Certification Judgment that it did not follow that a proportional representation system without an anti-defection clause is inconsistent with democracy.[4] To what aspect of democracy was the Court referring? At a minimum, the judgment should have engaged directly the coherence of allowing floor crossing in a closed list PR system in which representatives could not, at the time of their election, defect.

For reasons that are not entirely clear, the United Democratic Movement Court seemed less inclined to recognise the importance of the will of the electorate than in the First Certification Judgment. It was likewise uninterested in assessing the aptness of the provisions of the Membership Act for the existing closed list PR

[1] Under the MMP system in Lesotho the 40 members on the compensatory seats (those coming from party lists) are not allowed to cross the floor while those members elected in constituencies can do so. See J Elklit 'Lesotho 2002: Africas first MMP elections' (2002) 1(2) Journal of African Elections 4.

[2] Reynolds & Reilly (supra) at 19.

[3] M Krennerich Electoral Systems: A Global Overview in J de Ville & N Steytler (eds) Voting in 1999: Choosing an Electoral System (2000) 12.

[4] Ibid at para 34.

system. It is true that item 23A granted Parliament the power to amend the provisions of the Final Constitution by an Act of Parliament (the Membership Act) under FC s 76(1). It is also true that the purpose of the legislation was to make provision for members of the national and provincial legislatures to change their political parties without losing their seats in the legislature. However legitimate the textual authority for this legislation may be, it creates an anomalous situation under a system of closed-list PR. So while the Constitutional Court could not take issue with Parliament's power to do what it did, it had an obligation to press down on the tension between floor-crossing and a closed-list PR system. Its lack of engagement with such issues is reflected in the following two remarks: :

> Where the law prohibits defection that is a lawful prohibition, which must be enforced by the courts. But where it does not do so, the courts cannot prohibit such conduct where the legislature has chosen to do so.[1]
>
> . . . .
>
> We were referred in argument to a number of democratic countries with proportional representation systems in which defection is not allowed. No case was cited to us, however, in which a court in any country has ever held that, absent a constitutional or legislative requirement to that effect, a member of the legislature is obliged to resign if he or she changes party allegiance during the life of a legislature.[2]

A deeply reasoned judgment on the electoral system offering an opinion on the relationship between voters and their representatives in South Africas democracy, even if obiter, would have provided valuable guidance to Parliament when it reconsidered the Membership Act after the Courts finding of unconstitutionality Such analysis might have deterred the raw political expediency which drove the legislature to turn the Membership Act into a constitutional amendment less than two years before the 2004 national and provincial elections.

Prior to 2002, and the run-up to the next elections, Parliament had showed little inclination to take up the Final Constitution's invitation to change our electoral system. In fact, a parliamentary committee appointed in 1997 had reported that floor-crossing in the context of the closed-list system was not fair or democratic and recommended that Parliament should not make use of the option given to it by the Constitution.[3] At the time, the ANC agreed. It took the view that:

> Parties are represented in the legislatures, on the basis of party lists, in proportion to the votes they had received in elections Our system does not provide scope for the role of an independent individual MP or of a group of MPs not directly elected by votes on the basis of a party list There are many difficulties with the qualified right to cross the floorThe crucial problem here is that it is difficult to establish what constitutes a significant shift in public opinion, when such shift has occurred and to what extent the desire of a group of MPs to defect, reflects this shift. More fundamentally, if there has been a significant shift, surely the answer is fresh elections?

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 35.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See Report of the Natinal Assembly's Ad hoc Committee on Membership of Legislatures (25 May 1998).

By 2002, the ANC had changed its tune. Unfortunately for the party, the Constitutional Court concluded that the Membership Act, passed by Parliament more than five years after the Final Constitution came into effect and was not passed within a reasonable period. The United Democratic Movement Court held that the FC s 76 procedure was an option only during the reasonable period stated in item 23A, and that having expired, the amendment of the Final Constitution in a manner not contemplated or sanctioned by the Final Constitution itself, was invalid.[1]

29.4 THE CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT ACT 2 OF 2003

After the Constitutional Court's decision in United Democratic Movement, Parliament passed the Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 2003. The Amendment Act repeals The Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002. It introduces a new schedule 6A to the Final Constitution.

The schedule stipulates that a member of the legislature who becomes a member of a party other than the party which nominated that person remains a member of that legislature if the member on his or her own or together with one or more other members (who ceased to be members of a party that nominated them) represent not less than 10 per cent of the total number of seats held by the nominating party in the legislature.[2] (These provisions apply whether the party of which a person becomes a member participated in an election or not. The seat held by a member is regarded as having been allocated to the party that an individual joins (the party which did not nominate the member). Ceasing to be a member of the party that nominated an individual must take place in the time periods specified in item 4(1)(a) or (b) of the schedule. The provisions of item 2 apply for fifteen days from the first to the fifteenth day of September in the second year after an election of the legislature and for a period of fifteen days during the same period in September in the fourth year after an election of the legislature.

Any party represented in a legislature is permitted to merge with another party.[3] It does not matter whether the latter participated in an election or not. Furthermore, any party may subdivide into more than one party.[4] After a sub-division, any party may merge with another party whether the latter participated in an election or not. After a sub-division, members leaving their original party must represent not less than 10 per cent of the total number of seats held by the original party in any legislature. The time periods set out in item 4(1)(a) and (b) also apply to item 3.

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 113.
[2] Item 2(1).
[3] Item 3(1)(a).
[4] Item 3(1)(b).

If there is a merger of parties or a sub-division or subdivisions and merger of parties contemplated in items 3(1)(a) and (b), the members retain membership of the legislature to which they were elected and the seats they held are regarded as having been allocated to the party which they represent after any merger, subdivision or subdivision and merger envisaged under item 3(1). During the periods referred to in items 4(1)(a) and (b) a member of the legislature may change membership of a party on one occasion only. Similarly, during the periods referred to in items 4(1)(a) and (b) a party may merge with another party, subdivide into more than one party or subdivide and merge with another party on one occasion only. Within seven days after the expiration of a period mentioned in item 4(1)(a) or (b) a party represented in the national Assembly or a provincial legislature must submit a list of its members to the secretary of the legislature.[1] The number of seats held by each party represented in that legislature and the name of and party represented by each member will be published in the Government Gazette.

The provisions of items 2 and 3 of schedule 6A allow parties representation in the national and provincial legislatures without requiring them to contest an election. Members of political parties who are elected under the aegis of one political party and after crossing the floor or after the merger and/or subdivision of parties may end up representing a different party. The result is that new parties may acquire representation between elections.

Who do the members of new parties represent? They would have been elected by voters supporting the party that nominated them as electoral candidates. The seats they retain would be seats that belonged to the party that nominated the member or members and which were allocated to a party based on the electorates support for that party. When a member ceases to be a member of the nominating party, the provisions in items 2 and 3 permit a member to transfer the seat of his or her original party to a different or new (non-elected) party in a legislature.

No party represented in a legislature may suspend or terminate the party membership of any one of its members representing it in that legislature without the written consent of the member concerned.[2] Furthermore, a party may not perform any act which causes a member to be disqualified from holding office as a member without the written consent of the member concerned.[3] A party that does not register as a political party under the Electoral Act 73 of 1998 may still be regarded as a party for purposes of schedule 6A. However, the party must register as a political party within the periods set out in items 4(1)(a) and (b). If it fails to do so within four months after the expiration of these periods, the party will cease to exist. In these circumstances the affected seats are to be allocated to the remaining parties in accordance with applicable law.

During the first fifteen-day period following the date of the commencement of schedule 6A, members of the National Assembly and the provincial legislatures were allowed to become members of political parties which had not nominated them while retaining their seats in a particular legislature. The schedule also allowed party mergers and the subdivision of parties. In these situations members were allowed to hold their seats and the seats were regarded as seats belonging to the members new party and not the one which, in the first place, had nominated the members.

[1] Item 5(2).
[2] Item 4(3)(c)(i).
[3] Item 4(3)(c)(ii).

Schedule 6A contains provisions which recognise the reality of party politics. Members of political parties become disgruntled with their parties. The provisions permit them to shift allegiance to a party whose policies are more aligned with their own. The provisions also accommodate situations in which a political party splits because of differences in opinion between groups or factions in a party. New parties may be formed through subdivisions and mergers. That said, the tension between floor-crossing and closed list PR remains. The will of the electorate expressed at the time of an election – for parties and their policies – morphs into the will of the individual representatives and the parties and policies for whom they express a preference.

29.5 Funding of Political Parties in the National and Provincial Legislatures

FC s 236 states that to enhance multi-party democracy, national legislation must provide for the funding of political parties participating in national and provincial legislatures on an equitable and proportional basis. The national legislature passed the Public Funding of Represented Political Parties Act in accordance with this constitutional directive.[1] The Act established the Represented Political Parties Fund. The fund making provisions for already-elected political parties participating in Parliament and provincial legislatures rather than those who aspire to participate in the multi-party government envisaged by the Final Constitution.[2] The chief electoral officer of the Electoral Commission manages the Fund and serves as the accounting officer and chief executive officer of the Fund.[3] Allocations from the fund cover activities related to: developing of the popular will of the people; bringing a political party's influence to bear on the shaping of public opinion; inspiring and furthering political education; promoting active participation by individual citizens in political life; exercising and influence on political trends; and ensuring continuous, vital links between the people and organs of state.

Aspirant political parties and those who already have representation in South Africas legislative bodies may receive unlimited and unconditional funding from private sources. No legislative framework similar to that applicable to public funding is in place. There is therefore no mechanism to control the impact of such funds on a political party's policies and on what they include in their manifestos. In the absence of any legislative framework the electorate cannot know or easily obtain information on where political parties derive their funding from. The electorate is unable to form an opinion on the measure of influence brought to bear upon a political party by a private donor. Such unregulated funding creates incentives for corruption.

[1] Act 103 of 1997.
[2] Section 2(1) of the Public Funding of Represented Political Parties Act 103 of 1997.
[3] Ibid at s 4(1).

IDASA has launched a campaign to promote greater transparency by political parties. It uses the Promotion of Access to Information Act to elicit documentation about the source of their private political party funding. Political parties represented in the legislatures are required by the Act to provide details of any private funding over R50,000.00. IDASA makes the compelling argument that regulation of party funding will strengthen democracy, curb opportunities for corrupt practices and promote several constitutionally enshrined rights.[1]

29.6 Election of Municipal Councils

The Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000 regulates municipal elections. The Constitution and the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 identify three categories of municipality[2]: A, B and C.[3] Municipal councils consist of members elected in accordance with the electoral options set out in FC s 157(2). They are elected for terms of five years.[4] Whenever necessary, the Minister, after consulting the Electoral Commission, must, by notice, call and set dates for an election of all municipal councils. The election must be held within 90 days of the date of the expiry of the term of municipal councils.[5]

(a) The electoral system applicable to municipal elections

The Constitution envisages an electoral system based on closed-list proportional representation and reliant upon that municipality's segment of the voters roll.[6] It also provides for an alternative of a semi-proportional system made up of a component of proportional representation and representation on a ward basis, based on that municipalitys segment of the voters roll.[7] The electoral system

[1] PIMS & The Right to Know Programme Regulation of Private Funding to Political Parties IDASA Position Paper (October 2003) 4.

[2] Several sections of the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 were challenged in Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development, Executive Council, Kwa Zulu- Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC).

[3] Section 7 of the Municipal Structures Act lists several types of municipality. See R Kriel, M Monadjem & B Bekink 'Local Government' in M Chasklason, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, August 2005) Chapter 20.

[4] Section 24 of the Municipal Structures Act.

[5] Ibid.

[6] FC s 157(2)(a).

[7] FC 157(2)(b).

applicable to local government elections must result, in general, in proportional representation.[1]

The Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 provides for a system that allows for semi-proportional representation. This type of semi-proportional system is often favoured in new democracies. It generally benefits from the broad representation of parties that accompanies voting under a closed-list proportional representation system. It possesses direct accountability.[2] A system that combined proportional representation (PR) and voting in wards on a first-past-the-post basis was employed in the local government elections in 1995 and 1996. In that election, voters cast their ballots for councillors on a 40% PR and 60% ward basis. In this parallel system the proportional representation and first-past-the post elements operated separately from each other. Currently these elements are combined in a mixed member proportional (MMP) system. Under this system, 50% of the councillors represent wards and the other 50% are elected by PR. The difference between a parallel system and a mixed member proportional system is that the latter allows for the adjustment of distortions to party representation brought about by voting in wards on a first-past-the-post basis. The former does not. This change to the system was necessary.[3] After the 1995-96 local government elections – for which there was no demarcation process – residents in the formerly White, Coloured and Indian areas were over-represented in the 843 transitional councils. The number of councils was reduced to 284 for the 2000 elections. The new demarcation process ensured that wards consisted of the roughly the same population size.[4] The introduction of the current system allows for an increase in the number of councillors elected by proportional representation.

The Municipal Structure Act provides that a metro council (a municipal council of a metropolitan municipality or category A municipality) and a local council (municipal council of a local municipality or category B municipality) with wards must be elected according to a system of proportional representation from party lists and direct representation from wards. In an election for a metropolitan or local council with wards, each registered voter has two votes, one for a party, by proportional representation, and one for a ward candidate. If a local council has no wards, all the councillors must be elected from the party lists according to a system of proportional representation. In an election for a local council that has no wards, each registered voter has two votes, one for the local council and one for the district council. If a local council has wards, councillors must be elected from the party list according to a system of proportional representation and direct representation for the wards.

[1] FC 157(3).

[2] Ministry for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development The White Paper on Local Government (March 1998) 88. (This type of system has two excellent features, namely, an element of representivity – the proportional matching of council seats with votes cast, and an element of accountability – the identification of individual councillors to particular wards).

[3] See T Lodge 'Local Government Reform' in Politics in South Africa: From Mandela to Mbeki (2002) 86-100.

[4] See Local Government: Demarcation Act 27 of 1998.

Importantly, district councils (municipal councils of a district municipality or category C municipality) may be comprised of representatives elected from party lists by registered voters in local councils, with or without wards and voters registered in a district management area. Sparsely populated or mountainous areas and game parks would be classified as district management areas. If a voter is registered in a local council with wards he or she will have a third vote in respect of a 40 per cent proportional representation election of the district council in which area the local council (with wards) is located. Registered voters in district management areas will have two votes, one for the representative in the district management area, and one for the district council.

Sixty per cent of the seats in district councils will be allocated on the basis of proportional representation to the candidates from the district management areas and representatives elected to the district council from the local councils. The Municipal Structures Act contemplates that local council elections will take place first. Thereafter representatives from these councils, in an internal election, will be nominated and elected to the district council. The remaining 40 per cent of the seats will be allocated to those proportional representation candidates voted onto the district council by registered voters.

Political parties who have complied with the registration requirements can contest an election by submitting a list of the names of candidates to stand as its representatives for the election of members of the council or by nominating ward candidates to stand a representatives of the party in a ward; or may comply with both of these requirements.[1] Item 11(3) of schedule 1 of the Municipal Structures Act that every party must seek to ensure that women and men candidates are evenly distributed throughout the list.

In this regard, item 11(3) is distinguishable from s 26 of the Electoral Act 73 of 1998. Each requires the submission of lists of candidates under an electoral system that relies on closed-list proportional representation. Item 11(3) does more than s 26 to ensure the participation of women in local government elections, but only just. It does not place a clear obligation on political parties to ensure that women candidates are included on party lists when it states '[e]very party must seek to ensure that fifty per cent of the candidates on the party list are women and that women and men candidates are evenly distributed through the list, but encourages them to do so.' Had Parliament excluded the words seek to it could have been interpreted as introducing a statutory quota geared towards ensuring the equal distribution of women candidates on party lists and a consequent increase in the number of women councillors.[2] Section 26 of the Electoral Act leaves the decision to include women candidates entirely to political parties.

[1] Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000.

[2] After the 2000 local government elections 20% of all the councillors elected were women. Twenty-nine per cent of the councillors elected by proportional representation were women, while only 11% of councillors elected to ward seats were women.

(b) Membership of municipal councils

In United Democratic Movement, the Constitutional Court upheld the Constitution of the Republic South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002 that amended FC s 157 and the Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002. The amendments permitted floor crossing in the sphere of local government. The court held that the wording of the amended FC s 157(1) – subject to schedule 6A, a Municipal Council consists of members elected in accordance with subsections (2) and (3) – did not subordinate the Final Constitution to the schedule.[1] FC s 157(3) states that '[a]n electoral system in terms of FC s 157(2) must result, in general, in proportional representation.' According to the United Democratic Movement Court, FC s 157(3) is to be harmonized with FC s 157(1) and the schedule.[2] In its effort to harmonise the relevant provisions, the Court wrote:

> In the light of the reference to schedule 6A, the reference in subsection 3 to the need for the electoral system to result, in general, in proportional representation must be construed as reference to the voting system and not to the conduct of elected members after the election.[3]

The United Democratic Movement Court draws a distinction between the voting system and the conduct of elected members after the election. The conduct of elected members refers to a situation in which an individual ceases to be a member of the party that nominated him or her to the legislative body in favour of another party. Such conduct (giving up membership of the nominating party and joining another) might well affect the overall support for the members original party if the member is allowed to retain his or her seat after changing parties. So while it is correct that, in general, proportional representation refers directly to the electoral system, a member's conduct might well affect the overall result of an election determined by the voting system.

Concerns about floor-crossing still arise in relation to the PR segment of a mixed member proportional system. Floor-crossing under the municipal electoral system is less objectionable when it occurs in terms of first-past-the-post wards. In these wards, voters express support for individual candidates to whom seats in the municipal council are assigned. The seats belong to the candidate no matter what his or her party affiliation.

(c) Floor-crossing in the municipal councils

Every citizen who is qualified to vote for a municipal council is eligible to be a member of the council.[4] The Final Constitution lists a number of persons who would not be eligible for membership in a municipal council.[5] Anyone

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 84.
[2] Ibid at para 83.
[3] Ibid at para 84.
[4] FC 158(1).
[5] FC 158(1)(a)-(e).

disqualified from voting for the National Assembly or disqualified in terms of s 47(1)(c), (d) or (e) may not be a member of the council.

The participation of traditional leaders in municipal councils is addressed by the Municipal Structures Act.[1] Traditional leaders are allowed to participate in the meetings of a municipal council, but have no voting rights.[2] The number of traditional leaders participating in a council is restricted to no more than 10% of the total number of councillors in the council. If there are fewer than 10 councillors, only one traditional leader is allowed to participate. A traditional leader must be allowed to express a view on any matter directly affecting the areas under his or her rule. In the light of these sections traditional leaders have lost some of the status and power on municipal councils that they enjoyed under IC s 182. They now fulfil a largely consultative and advisory function. As a result, the new local government dispensation set out in the Municipal Structures Act was not well received by traditional leaders. Lodge reminds us that opposition from this quarter resulted in the postponement of the second local government election in 2000.[3]

29.7 THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION

(a) Establishment of the Commission

The Electoral Commission has the role of ensuring that all elections will be free and fair.[4] The Electoral Commission is established by FC s 181 and, unlike the Independent Electoral Commission set up to oversee the 1994 national and provincial elections, it is a permanent institution. It is also one of the Chapter 9 institutions strengthening constitutional democracy.

The Electoral Commission Act 51 of 1996 lists the functions of the Electoral Commission. They embrace the promotion of democratic electoral processes,[5] the managing of elections of national, provincial and municipal legislative bodies, compiling a national common voters roll and declaring the results of an election.[6] The Final Constitution grants Parliament the power to prescribe any additional powers and functions of the Electoral Commission.[7] In New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa the Constitutional Court noted that the provisions of the Electoral Commission Act accord the Commission a role that was never intended to merely supervisory[8]. Its management functions are active, involved and detailed.[9]

[1] Section 81. The identification of traditional leaders for the purposes of s 81 is addressed in schedule 6 of the Act.

[2] See Lodge (supra) at 94 ('[W]ithin the rural areas 800-odd chiefs and some 10 000 headmen would sit on councils ex officio, the law giving them no voting rights.')

[3] Ibid at 95.

[4] FC s 190(1)(b).

[5] Section 4 of the Electoral Commission Act.

[6] FC s 190. See also s 5 of the Electoral Commission Act.

[7] FC s 190(2).

[8] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) (New National Party).

[9] Ibid at para 76.

(b) Composition of the Commission

The Electoral Commission must be composed of at least three persons.[1] The exact number of commissioners and their terms of office is provided for by the Electoral Commission Act. It allows for the establishment of a commission made up of five members. One of the members of the Commission must be a judge.[2] South African citizenship is a requirement for appointment to the Commission.[3] A further requirement is that an appointee must not have a high party-political profile.[4]

Recommendations for appointment are made from a list of candidates prepared by a panel of representatives from the Human Rights Commission, the Commission on Gender Equality and the Public Protector. The Chief Justice is a member and chairperson of the panel.[5] The panel is required to submit a list of no fewer than eight recommended candidates to a committee of the National Assembly.[6] In preparing the list, the panel must act in accordance with the principles of transparency and openness. The panel must make its recommendations to the committee after taking into account a person's suitability, qualifications and experience.[7] The committee proportionally composed of members of all parties represented in the National Assembly, in turn, forwards a list of nominated candidates to the National Assembly, which after the adoption of a resolution a majority of its members, recommends candidates for appointment by the President.[8]

The President appoints commissioners to seven-year[9] terms in either a full-time or a part-time capacity.[10] Commissioners appointed in a full-time capacity are not allowed to perform any duty or obligation arising out of other employment unless the President authorizes such employment.[11] The President designates a chairperson and vice-chairperson from among the commissioners. Commissioners terms of appointment can be cut short by resignation or death, or by removal from office on grounds of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence.[12]

Commissioners may be removed from office by the President after a finding of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence by a committee of the National Assembly upon the recommendation of the Electoral Court.[13] A majority of the

[1] FC s 191.
[2] Section 6 of the Electoral Commission Act (ECA).
[3] Ibid.
[4] ECA, s 6(2).
[5] ECA, s 6(3)(a).
[6] ECA, s 6(4).
[7] ECA, s 6(5).
[8] ECA, s 6(20)(c).
[9] ECA, s 7(1).
[10] ECA, s 7(2).
[11] ECA, s 9(1)(b).
[12] FC s 194. Section 7(3) of the Electoral Commission Act reiterates these grounds.
[13] The Electoral Court is established in terms of s 18 of the Electoral Commission Act. See also the definition of Electoral Court in s 1 of the Electoral Act.

members of the National Assembly of must adopt a resolution calling for a commissioner's removal from office. A commissioner may be suspended from office by the President at any time after the start of the proceedings of the committee and may be re-appointed, but only for one further term of office.[1]

The Commission must appoint a suitably qualified and experienced person as the chief electoral officer.[2] The chief electoral officer heads the administration of the Commission.[3]

(c) Independence of the Electoral Commission

The Electoral Commission, like the other Chapter 9 institutions, is independent, and subject only to the Constitution and the law.[4] It is required to be impartial and to exercise its powers and perform its functions without fear, favour or prejudice.[5] Every member of the Commission must serve impartially and independently.[6] The income necessary for the Commissions functioning is derived from Parliament. The Commission may receive funds from other sources. The Electoral Commission is accountable to the National Assembly and is required to report on its activities and performance of its functions and funding to the National Assembly at least once a year.[7]

In New National Party, the Constitutional Court recognised the creation of an Electoral Commission as an essential component of managing a free and fair election. The appellant alleged that the government had not acknowledged the independence of the Commission and had thereby undermined its capacity to run free and fair elections. First, the government refused to accept the advice of the Commission that bar-coded identity documents should not be the only means of identification acceptable for registering as a voter and for voting. Second, insufficient funding had been made available to the Commission. As a consequence, it had not been unable to appoint the necessary officials to attend to the registration of voters prior to the 1999 elections. The government had assumed this function.

Addressing the relationship between the government and the Commission, the Court asked whether the conduct of government had been demonstrated to have impinged on the affairs of the Commission in a manner which affected its independence in the carrying out of its functions, or whether such conduct constitute[d] a threat to do so.[8] When considering this question, the Court highlighted three areas: the responsibility for elections, the system of financial accounting and problems in relation to the engagement of the staff of the Commission.

[1] ECA, s 7(3)(c).
[2] ECA, s 12(1).
[3] ECA, s 12(2)(c).
[4] FC s 181(2). Section 3 of the Electoral Commission Act 51 of 1996 provides for a Commission that is independent and subject only to the Final Constitution and the law.
[5] ECA, s 3(2).
[6] ECA, s 9(1).
[7] FC s 181(5).
[8] New National Party (supra) para 79.

With respect to responsibility for the elections, the Court noted that Parliament had the competence to pass the Electoral Act. Parliament's decision to provide for bar-coded identity documents did not impair the independence of the Electoral Commission.

The court then distinguished financial independence from administrative independence.[1] It held that financial independence related to the Commission having access to funds reasonably required by it to enable it to discharge the functions it is required to perform constitutionally and legislatively. Parliament – and not the executive – ought to assess what is reasonably required by the Electoral Commission to enable it to perform its functions. Administrative independence related to those matters directly connected with the functions which the Commission has to perform under the Constitution and the Act.[2]

The court observed that the establishment of the institutions supporting constitutional democracy is a new development on the South African scene and that other organs of state needed to assist and protect the chapter 9 institutions to ensure their independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness.[3] The Court held that a government department ought not to instruct the Commission on how to conduct voter registration or whom to employ. However, if the Commission required the governments assistance to provide staff to participate in the voter registration process, the government was under an obligation to assist in so far as possible. If not, the Commission was to receive the financial assistance to enable it to do what was necessary. In the instant case, the Department of Home Affairs, the Department of State Expenditure and the Minister of Finance did not fully appreciate the independence the Commission required. However, since these were not the issues canvassed by the appellant in its application, the Court held that the appellant had failed to show that the independence of the Electoral Commission had been infringed.

The independence of the Electoral Commission arose again in Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality.[4] This time the independence of the Commission engaged the principles of co-operative government delineated in Chapter 3.[5] The dispute related to the Commission's decision to allocate a single voting station to the residents of the town of Stilbaai. The municipality argued that many voters would be deterred by the distance they would have to travel in order to exercise their right to vote.

The appeal brought before the Constitutional Court addressed the issue of whether the municipality had to comply with those provisions of FC ss 40 and 41 that required parties in intergovernmental disputes to make every effort to settle the dispute before approaching a court. The Court noted that both the

[1] New National Party (supra) at para 98.
[2] Ibid at para 99.
[3] Ibid at para 78.
[4] 2001 (3) 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)(Langeberg).
[5] For a detailed discussion of this case, please see S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (OS, 2nd Edition, June 2004) Chapter 14.

municipality of Stilbaai and the IEC were organs of state.[1] The more difficult question was whether Commission could, for the purposes of Chapter 3 analysis, be located within the national sphere of government. The Court concluded that could not. It is simply a state institution supporting democracy. The Court reasoned that since 'state' is a broader term than 'national government' and embraces all spheres of government,[2] then Chapter 9 of the Final Constitution must make a distinction between the state and the government, whether local, provincial or national.[3] Moreover, the Court found that the Commission is established as independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law.[4] The independence accorded the Electoral Commission by the Constitution would be undermined if it were viewed as part of any sphere of government.

Since the Commission is not an organ of state within the national sphere of government, the dispute between the Commission and the Stilbaai municipality could not be classified as an intergovernmental dispute. The upshot of the judgment is that when another organ of state seeks to bring an action against the Electoral Commission it can do so without having to comply with FC s 41(3).

29.8 THE ELECTORAL COURT

The Electoral Court is established under the Electoral Commission Act.[5] It possesses the status of a High Court.[6] The President on the recommendation of the Judicial Service Commission appoints the members of the court. They are: the chairperson, a judge of the Supreme Court of Appeal; two High Court judges and two other members. All members of the Electoral Court must be South African citizens.[7]

The Court has the power to review any decision of the Commission. It can hear appeals against decisions of the Commission provided that the decision relates to the interpretation of any law or matter for which an appeal is provided by law. The Court has the power to investigate any allegation of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence of a member of the Commission. The Rules Regulating Electoral Disputes and Complaints about Infringements of the Electoral Code of Conduct made by the Electoral Court, in terms of s 20(4) of the Electoral Commission Act, stipulate that the High Courts and Magistrates Courts have jurisdiction to hear any electoral dispute or complaint about an infringement of the Code.[8]

The Electoral Court has jurisdiction to impose all of the s 96(2) listed penalties. The High Court may impose all penalties except those penalties that result in the [1] Langeberg (supra) at 27.

[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] FC s 181.
[5] Act 51 of 1996.
[6] FC s 18 of the Electoral Commissions Act.
[7] ECA, s 19.
[8] Government Gazette No 19572 (4 December 1998).

disqualification of a person's candidature or that result in an order cancelling the registration of a political party. The Magistrates' Courts may impose all penalties except those that result in the disqualification of a persons candidature or that result in an order cancelling the registration of a political party. The Magistrates' Courts may also not prohibit the receipt of any funds from the state or foreign sources.[1] Only in circumstances when an order that results in the disqualification of a person's candidature, or in an order cancelling the registration of a political party is sought, may a party approach the Electoral Court directly. Direct access is granted with leave of the chairperson and at least two members of the Electoral Court. Rules 3, 4 and 5 set out the procedures for bringing an electoral dispute or complaint about a breach of the Electoral Code of Conduct before the courts.[2]

The Electoral Court has final jurisdiction in respect of all electoral disputes and complaints pertaining to the infringement of the Code.[3] No decision or order of the Electoral Court is subject to appeal or review.[4] Section 96(2) of the Electoral Act must be read in conjunction with s 20(4)(b) of the Electoral Commission Act. The latter section states that the Electoral Court shall have the power to determine which courts of law have jurisdiction to hear particular disputes and complaints about infringements, and appeals against decisions arising from such hearings.

In Mketsu v African National Congress the appellants, members of the African National Congress (ANC) challenged the selection processes of the party's list and ward candidates for the 2000 local government elections.[5] They claimed that these processes were flawed and did not comply with the party's procedures. They sought an order in the Eastern Cape Division of the High Court. The respondents opposed the application on a number of bases – one being that the High Court lacked jurisdiction to hear the application. The High Court upheld this defence.

---

[1] Rule 2(2) and 2(3) of the Rules Regulating Electoral Disputes and Complaints about Infringements of the Electoral Code of Conduct.

[2] Rule 2(4) stipulates that the offences in Part 1 of chapter 7 and in s 107, 108, 109 of the Act are to be dealt with in accordance with the legislation applicable to criminal matters. These offences will be heard in a court with criminal jurisdiction. In terms of s 98 (a), a court may, upon conviction of an offence mentioned in s 87(1)(b), (c), or (d), 89(2), 90, 91, 93 or 94, impose a penalty of a fine or term imprisonment not exceeding 10 years. According to s 98*(b)* a court may, upon conviction of an offence mentioned in s 87(1)(a), (e), or (f), (2), 3, or 4, 88, 89(1), 92, 107(4), 108 or 109, impose a penalty of a fine or term imprisonment not exceeding 10 years. According to s 96(3), a penalty imposed in terms of s 96(2), in certain cases, will be in addition to any penalty imposed in terms of ss 97 and 98 of the Act. Section 98*(a)* specifies that if a person is convicted of an offence in terms of s 94 (breaching the Code), the possible penalties are a fine or term of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years. The latter penalty would be in addition to an appropriate penalty in terms of s 96(2)(a)-(i).

[3] Section 96(1) of the Electoral Act ('EA').

[4] FC s 167(6) states:

'National legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court —

(b) to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court.'

Decisions reached under section 96(1) of the EA are therefore susceptible to constitutional challenge under this section of the Final Constitution.

[5] 2003 (2) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (4) All SA 205 (SCA) (Mketsu).

On appeal the appellants again argued that the High Court had jurisdiction to hear and resolve the objection to the ANC selection process. The Supreme Court of Appeal considered the meaning of s 65 of the Municipal Electoral Act. The section deals with objections concerning any aspect of an election that is material to the declared result. It found that such objections would occur only after an election. It also considered the provisions of s 78(1) of the Municipal Electoral Act. The section reads: 'the Electoral Court has jurisdiction in respect of all electoral disputes and complaints about infringements of the Code subject to s 20(4) of the Electoral Commission Act'. The court found that these disputes and complaints would typically, but not necessarily, be heard and resolved prior to the declaration of an election result.

After considering these statutory provisions the court came to the conclusion that s 65 was concerned with objections concerning any aspect of an election that is material to the result. The jurisdiction conferred on the Electoral Court by s 78(1), on the other hand, was intended to be exclusive. That exclusivity is only subject to the power of the Electoral Court to determine which courts of law would exercise concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction to hear particular electoral disputes and complaints about infringements of the Code.[1] The court observed that the language in s 78(1) was similar to that in s 20(4). Both sections referred to electoral disputes and complaints about infringements of the Code. However, s 78(1) is subject to s 20(4). The Electoral Court therefore retains the power to determine which courts have jurisdiction to hear disputes under both s 20(4) and s 78(1).

The court held that s 78(1) addressed matters that were not referred to in s 65 of the Municipal Electoral Act. Objections under s 65 were not addressed by s 20(4) of the Electoral Commission Act. The court held that the process relied on to choose candidates was one concerning any aspect that is material to the declared result and that the Electoral Court and not the High Court had the jurisdiction to hear such an objection.[2] Although the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court is not readily ousted, the Court observed that the process set out in s 65 of the Municipal Electoral Act was intended by the legislature to be mandatory. It rejected the appellant's principal argument that the High Court retained its jurisdiction to hear the applications and dismissed the appeal.

[1] Mketsu (supra) at para 11.
[2] Ibid at para 9.

30 International Law

Hennie Strydom
Kevin Hopkins

30.1 International law and its relationship with domestic law. 30–1
(a) The nature of international law. 30–1
(i) Definition. 30–1
(ii) The transformation of international law 30–2
(b) Sources of international law 30–3
(i) Treaties 30–3
(ii) Customary international law 30–4
(iii) General principles of law recognised by civilised nations, and judicial decisions and the writings of highly qualified publicists 30–5
(iv) The impact of overriding principles and values. . . . 30–5
(c) The constitutionalisation of international law in South Africa 30–6
30.2 The incorporation of international law into substantive domestic law in South Africa 30–7
(a) Customary international law as part of South African domestic law 30–7
(b) Treaties and conventions as part of South African domestic law 30–9
(c) United Nations resolutions. 30–11
30.3 International law as an aid to interpretation of the Bill of Rights 30–11
30.4 State conduct and obligations 30–14
(a) Jus ad bellum and jus in bello 30–14
(b) Diplomatic immunity. 30–18
(c) State immunity 30–18
(d) Diplomatic protection 30–23
(e) Extradition. 30–26

International law
231.

(1) The negotiating and signing of all international agreements is the responsibility of the national executive.

(2) An international agreement binds the Republic only after it has been approved by resolution in both the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces, unless it is an agreement referred to in subsection (3).

(3) An international agreement of a technical, administrative or executive nature, or an agreement which does not require either ratification or accession, entered into by the national executive, binds the Republic without approval by the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces, but must be tabled in the Assembly and the Council within a reasonable time.

(4) Any international agreement becomes law in the Republic when it is enacted into law by national legislation; but a self-executing provision of an agreement that has been approved by Parliament is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

(5) The Republic is bound by international agreements which were binding on the Republic when this Constitution took effect.

Customary international law
232.

Customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

Application of internatioal law
233.

When interpreting any legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law.

Interpretation of Bill of Rights
39.

(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum:
- (a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;
- (b) must consider international law; and
- (c) may consider foreign law.[1]

30.1 International Law and its Relationship with Domestic Law

(a) The nature of international law

(i) Definition

International law is traditionally defined as that body of law which binds or regulates states in terms of their relationships with other states.[2] While there is some debate as to whether international law constitutes a system of law separate and distinct from the domestic law of states, most domestic systems automatically incorporate, or else incorporate through a separate act of adoption, many rules of international law into their system of municipal law.[1] International law also influences the manner in which courts interpret domestic law. This chapter is concerned with those provisions of the Final Constitution that deal with the manner in which international law determines or informs our municipal law.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').
[2] H Waldock (ed) The Law of Nations (6th Edition, 1963) 1.

(ii) The transformation of international law

Traditionally, states were considered to be the only subjects of international law.[2] State sovereignty and firm adherence to the principle of non-intervention in the affairs of other states meant that international law did not concern itself with the manner in which states treated their own citizens.[3]

Since the Second World War and the advent of the United Nations, however, international law has increasingly concerned itself with protecting the rights of

[1] The relationship between international law and municipal law is controversial. It has long troubled both theorists and courts, mainly because international lawyers have for some time been divided on which of two main approaches to adopt — monism or dualism. The monists see all law as a unified body of rules. Since international law is law, monists regard international law as automatically forming part of the same legal structure that includes municipal law. For them, international law is incorporated directly into municipal law without any specific act of adoption. State judges, argue monists, are consequently obliged to apply the rules of international law in their municipal courts. Dualists, by contrast, see international law and municipal law as completely different legal systems. For a dualist, the question of which legal system ought to govern a dispute is dependent on both the nature of the dispute and the forum in which the matter arises (ie. whether the adjudicating body is a municipal court or an international tribunal). Obviously, dualists accord international law primacy over municipal law in the international arena; for example, where the dispute is one between states. Similarly municipal law enjoys primacy in domestic disputes. The two legal orders are thus, for a dualist, quite distinct and separate — both in their application and purpose. For this reason, a dualist will never see international law as being applicable in a municipal court unless there has first been a specific act of adoption. As we will illustrate below, South Africa has traditionally adopted a mixed approach to the incorporation of international law into our domestic law — adopting a dualist approach in respect of treaties and a monist approach in respect of customary international law. The Final Constitution maintains this mixed approach. Most standard international law textbooks contain some literature on this long-standing debate. See, for example, J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Edition, 2000) 43-44; D Harris Cases and Materials on International Law (5th Edition, 2004) 66-72; R Wallace International Law (3rd Edition, 1997) 36-37; M Shaw International Law (5th Edition, 2003) 120-123. For a more detailed analysis of the debate, see A Aust Modern Treaty Law and Practice (2000) 146-161.

[2] Dugard (supra) at 1.

[3] Article 2(7) of the United Nations Charter endorses this view when it states that 'nothing contained in the Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state'. This anti-human rights stance adopted by earlier international law is probably the reason for the international community's acceptance of the atrocities committed in South Africa during the apartheid era. Of course this changed as international law became more human rights friendly. See K Hopkins 'Assessing the World's Response to Apartheid: An Historical Account of International Law and its Part in the South African Transformation' (2002) 10 Univ of Miami Int and Comparative LR 241; MD Prevost 'South Africa as an Illustration of the Development in International Human Rights Law' (1999) South African Yearbook of International Law 211.

individuals. This transformation was largely a reaction to the atrocities committed by the Nazi German government. Since then numerous multi-lateral and regional treaties that protect individual human rights have been adopted by states.[1]

Many of the rights afforded by these treaties have been incorporated into the domestic law of states — often in the form of justiciable bills of rights. Our own Bill of Rights, Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution, quite consciously echoes the language found in international human rights instruments. Moreover, FC s 39(1)(b) turns international law into a mandatory canon of constitutional interpretation.[2]

(b) Sources of international law

There are four sources of international law:

(a) International conventions, otherwise known as treaties;
(b) Customary international law;
(c) The general principles of law recognized by civilized nations; and
(d) Judicial decisions, and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists.[3]

The source of the law will often determine the manner in which it is incorporated into domestic law.

(i) Treaties

Treaties are international agreements entered into between states in terms of which states expressly agree to be bound by the terms of the treaty.[4] Treaties can be bi-lateral, where two states enter into a treaty to regulate a particular aspect of their relationship (for example, extradition arrangements or trade relations) or they may be multi-lateral, where a number of states enter into a treaty (as is the case with human rights conventions such as the ICCPR and the ICSECR). Multi-lateral treaties normally have the purpose of codifying international law with regard to the subject-matter in question.

[1] Some of the most important international human rights treaties are: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ('ICCPR') (ratified by South Africa in 1998); the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICSECR') (signed by South Africa in 1994 but yet to be ratified); the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ratified by South Africa in 1998); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (ratified by South Africa in 1995); the Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified by South Africa in 1995); Convention on the Crime of Genocide (ratified by South Africa in 1998) and the Torture Convention (ratified by South Africa in 1998). South Africa also ratified the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights in 1996.

[2] FC s 39(1)(b) reads: 'When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum must consider international law.'

[3] See Statute of International Court of Justice, art 38(1).

[4] In terms of article 2(1)(a) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969), a treaty means 'an international instrument concluded between states in written form and governed by international law, whether embodied in a single instrument or in two or more related instruments and whatever its particular designation.'

Treaties are usually negotiated and signed by the executive branch of government. In many systems, however, the legislature has a role to play in the treaty-making process. In some instances treaties only become binding upon the state concerned if ratified by the legislature. In addition, they often only become part of the domestic law if the legislature promulgates a law incorporating the contents of the treaty into domestic law. Under the old constitutional dispensation in South Africa, the power to enter into treaties was entrusted solely to the executive branch of our government.[1] The legislature played no part in the treaty-making process, and treaties did not become part of our domestic law unless they were incorporated through legislation.[2]

In terms of FC s 231, although treaties are still negotiated and signed by the executive, a treaty only becomes binding on the South African state at the international law level if approved by a resolution of both houses of the national legislature.[3] Unlike under the old constitutional dispensation, ratification by Parliament is therefore a necessary component of the treaty-making process under the Final Constitution. Consistent with the dualist approach to the incorporation of treaties, a further enactment by the national legislature is required to make the treaty part of domestic law.

(ii) Customary international law

Customary international law is that source of international law developed through state custom or practice. It is the 'common law' of the international legal system.[4]

A custom will become a rule of customary international law where it is a sufficiently widespread practice adopted by states out of a sense of legal obligation. There are, accordingly, two elements to customary international law — settled practice (usus), and opinio iuris et necessitatis (the psychological element of acceptance of an obligation to be bound).

According to the International Court of Justice in The Asylum Case, for a practice to become a rule of customary international law, the practice must be 'constant and uniform'.[5] Such a practice may be evinced in a number of ways: through decisions of national and international courts, diplomatic correspondence, the opinions of state law advisors and resolutions of international organizations like the United Nations.[6]

[1] Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983, s 6(2)(c).

[2] See Pan American World Airways Incorporated v SA Fire and Accident Insurance Co Ltd 1965 (3) SA 150, 161 (A); S v Tuhadeleni & Others 1969 (1) SA 173, 175 (A); Maluleke v Minister of Internal Affairs 1981 (1) SA 707, 712 (B); Binga v Administrator-General, South West Africa & Others 1984 (3) SA 949, 968 (SWA); Tshwete v Minister of Home Affairs 1988 (4) SA 586, 606 (A); S v Muchindu 1995 (2) SA 36, 38 (W); Azapo v President of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC)('Azapo') at para 26.

[3] Treaties of a 'technical administrative or executive nature' or any other treaty 'which does not require ratification or accession' binds us without ratification by the National Assembly. FC s 231(3).

[4] Dugard (supra) at 26.

[5] Columbia v Peru (1950) ICJ Reports 266 ('Asylum').

[6] Dugard (supra) at 28.

The creation of international customary law rules through resolutions by the political organs of the United Nations is a hotly contested practice, especially with regard to UN resolutions that are non-binding and that fall under the category of mere recommendations. The International Court of Justice in Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear Weapons explains its treatment of such resolutions as follows:

> The Court notes that General Assembly resolutions, even if they are not-binding, may sometimes have normative value. They can, in certain circumstances, provide evidence important for establishing the existence of a rule or the emergence of an opinio juris. To establish whether this is true of a given General Assembly resolution, it is necessary to look at its content and the conditions of its adoption; it is also necessary to see whether an opinio juris exists as to its normative character. Or a series of resolutions may show the gradual evolution of the opinio juris required for the establishment of a new rule.[1]

(iii) General principles of law recognised by civilised nations, and judicial decisions and the writings of highly qualified publicists

Although less seldom invoked, these residual sources of international law may be drawn upon in the absence of treaty law or customary international law.

(iv) The impact of overriding principles and values

While there is generally no hierarchy of lower and higher norms making up the international legal system, two concepts of recent origin suggest that certain principles, norms or values may have such overriding importance for international co-existence and that their enforcement trumps other international obligations of states.

Jus cogens denotes the peremptory nature of certain norms. According to Brownlie, the least controversial examples of such norms are the prohibition of the use of force in international relations, the law of genocide and crimes against humanity, the principle on racial non-discrimination, and the rules prohibiting piracy and the trade in slaves.[2]

The concept has found its way into the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Article 53 of the Convention states that a treaty will be void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law. Such a norm, Article 53 continues, is one that is 'accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.'

Erga omnes obligations have been defined by the International Court of Justice as obligations a state owes 'towards the international community as a whole' as opposed to obligations that arise vis-à-vis another state.[3] In contemporary international law, such obligations arise, according to the Court, from the 'outlawing of acts of aggression, and of genocide, as also from the principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person, including protection from slavery and racial discrimination.'[1]

[1] (1996) ICJ Reports 226.
[2] I Brownlie Principles of Public International Law (6th Edition, 2003) 488, 489.
[3] Belgium v Spain (1970) ICJ Reports 3, 32 ('Barcelona Traction').

In Prosecutor v Furundzija, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia ('ICTY') clarified the distinction between erga omnes obligations and jus cogens.[2] In ruling that the prohibition against torture has acquired the status of jus cogens, the ICTY made clear that at the level of international enforcement:

> the violation of such an [erga omnes] obligation [to enforce the prohibition] simultaneously constitutes a breach of the correlative right of all members of the international community and gives rise to a claim for compliance accruing to each and every member, which then has the right to insist on fulfillment of the obligation or in any case to call for the breach to be discontinued.[3]

With respect to international treaty monitoring bodies, the findings of such bodies regarding jus cogens 'enjoy priority over individual States in establishing whether a certain State has taken all the necessary measures to prevent and punish torture.'[4] Such jus cogens status, for example, deligitimates any legislative, executive or judicial measure authorizing or condoning torture or absolving its perpetrators through an amnesty law.[5]

At the national level, the jus cogens nature of a norm would mean that individual victims of a violation could institute proceedings in a competent national or international tribunal with a view to having the violating measure annulled. The jus cogens nature of a norm also means that a civil action can be instituted in a foreign court for the claiming of damages and that the perpetrators can be held criminally responsible either in a foreign state or in their own state under a subsequent regime.[6]

(c) The constitutionalisation of international law in South Africa

As we shall see below, the Final Constitution contains provisions that govern the manner in which international law is incorporated or adopted into our domestic law to form part of our substantive law — FC ss 231 and 232 – and provisions that determine the kind of influence international law has on the interpretation of our domestic law — FC ss 39 and 233.[7]

[1] See also Bosnia and Herzegovina v Yugoslavia (1996) ICJ Reports 615–616 ('Genocide').
[2] (2002) 121 International Law Reports 213.
[3] Ibid at 260.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at 261.
[6] Ibid.
[7] See also FC s 35(3)(1)(Everyone has the right 'not to be convicted of an act or omission that was not an offence under either national or international law at the time when it was committed or omitted'); FC s 37(4)('Any legislation enacted in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency may derogate from the Bill of Rights only to the extent that the legislation is consistent with the Republic's obligations under international law applicable to states of emergency'); FC s 201(2)('[T]he primary object of the defence force is to defend and protect the Republic, its territorial integrity and its people in accordance with the Constitution and the principles of international law regulating the use of force.')

30.2 The Incorporation of International Law into Substantive Domestic Law in South Africa

A substantive rule of international law can become part of a state's domestic law if it is incorporated into the body of domestic law in that particular state. The incorporation of international law into domestic law can occur in one of two possible ways: (1) automatically; (2) by a specific act of adoption. Whether or not a special act of adoption is required is a matter to be determined by the domestic laws of each individual state. The Final Constitution is clear that customary international law automatically forms part of our domestic legal system, whilst treaties only become a part of our law through a separate act of adoption.

(a) Customary international law as part of South African domestic law

The South African common law has long regarded international law as part of South African domestic law.[1] FC s 232 endorses the common law's recognition subject to the condition that the international law in question is not inconsistent with the Final Constitution itself or else an Act of Parliament. This process of incorporation is monist. It should, however, be noted that the place of customary international law in the hierarchy of laws renders it subordinate to the Final Constitution itself and to Acts of Parliament.[2] It is superior to all other sources of South African domestic law.

International law differs quite radically from domestic law in that it knows no doctrine of stare decisis. This means that the doctrine of judicial precedent 'cannot be invoked as an obstacle to the application of a new rule of international law.'[3] In Kaffraria Property Co (Pty) Ltd v Government of the Republic of Zambia,[4] the Supreme Court followed the reasoning of an English court in Trendtex Trading Corporation v Central Bank of Nigeria.[5] The Trendtex Court had held that:

> International law knows no rule of stare decisis. If this court today is satisfied that the rule of international law on a subject has changed from what it was 50 or 60 years ago, it can give effect to that change — and apply that change in our English law — without waiting for the House of Lords to do it.[6]

Trendtex and Kaffraria Property thus allow for an exception to the doctrine of judicial precedent where international law has changed since the earlier domestic decision was delivered. For example, a High Court can arrive at a different legal conclusion in a similar matter already decided by the Supreme Court of Appeal

[1] Ex Parte Belli 1914 CPD 742, 745-6; Crooks and Company v Agricultural Co-operative Union Ltd 1922 AD 423; R v Lionda 1944 AD 348, 352; S v Penrose 1966 (1) SA 5, 10 (N).
[2] Whilst an Act of Parliament will trump customary international law, subordinate legislation will not.
[3] Dugard (supra) at 52.
[4] 1980 (2) SA 709, 715 (E)('Kaffraria Property').
[5] [1977] QB 529 ('Trendtex').
[6] Ibid at 554.

where it finds that the relevant rule of customary international law upon which that SCA decision was based has subsequently changed. The absence of stare decisis at international law thereby frees the High Court to depart from the domestic precedent in question.

It is, of course, another matter to convince the High Court that a particular rule or practice ought to be regarded as a rule of customary international law, or that customary international law has itself changed. As we noted above, a rule or practice will be recognized as a rule of customary international law only when it meets the twin requirements of usus and opinio juris. A court making such an assessment would need to consult the decisions of international courts and tribunals (or those of other domestic courts addressing the same point, as well as academic works.[1]) This is not always easy to do and there is very little consistency in South African domestic courts on how this ought to be done.

Some South African decisions wrongly suggest a test for such determinations that is far stricter than the test laid down by international law itself. International law requires that before a customary rule of international law be accepted as such, there needs to be 'evidence of a general practice accepted as law.'[2] The South African decisions that require evidence of a 'universal' practice should be viewed as incorrect statements of law.[3] Rebecca Wallace states the correct position as follows:

> How many states must be involved in a particular activity before the practice is accepted as law? Universal practice is fortunately not necessary. Article 38(1)(b) speaks not of a universal practice, but of a general practice. A practice can be general even if it is not

[1] See Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa 2004 (5) SA 191 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda'). The Constitutional Court had to consider whether or not there was a constitutional duty on South Africa to afford diplomatic protection to its nationals when their fundamental human rights were being violated in a foreign state. It stands to reason that if such a duty exists under customary international law then it also exists under South African domestic law through the operation of FC s 232 — the duty under customary international law would automatically be incorporated into our domestic law. The Kaunda Court accepted the view that states, under customary international law, have the right to espouse a claim on behalf of a national. The Court also accepted (based on a report from the International Law Commission) that there is in fact evidence that the municipal laws of many states actually make diplomatic protection obligatory. However, the Court still held that 'this is not the general practice of states.' Ibid at para 29. The Court, in fact, found that the general practice of states was that 'diplomatic protection remains the prerogative of the state to be exercised at its discretion.' Ibid. The Court went on to state that 'it must be accepted, therefore, that the applicants cannot base their claims on customary international law.' Ibid. There simply was not sufficient evidence of state practice to say that the rule had developed from a mere right into a legally binding duty.

[2] See Article 38(1)(b) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

[3] See Du Toit v Kruger (1905) 22 SC 234, 238 (De Villiers CJ stated that 'the rules which are laid down by some writers for exempting the private property of an enemy from capture have not been so universally accepted and acted upon as to justify this court in treating them as binding principles of law.') See also Nduli v Minister of Justice 1978 (1) SA 893, 906 (A)(Rumpff CJ wrote that 'it was conceded by counsel for the appellants that according to our law only such rules of customary international law are to be regarded as part of our law as are either universally accepted or have received the assent of this country. I think that this concession was rightly made.') > universally followed, and there is no precise formula indicating how widespread a practice must be. What is in fact more important than the number of states involved, is the attitude of those states whose interests are actually affected.[1]

In the North Sea Continental Shelf Cases[2] the ICJ likewise held that something less than 'universal' acceptance is required:

> an indispensable requirement would be that within the period in question . . . state practice, including that of states whose interests are specifically affected, should have been both extensive and virtually uniform.[3]

Conradie J in S v Petane recognized that the Appellate Division itself had erred in this regard when he wrote:

> It is not clear to me whether Rumpff CJ in giving the judgment [in Ndull] meant to lay down any stricter requirements for the incorporation of international law usages into South African law than the requirements laid down by international law itself for the acceptance of usages by states. International law does not require universal acceptance for a usage of states to become a custom.[4]

The correct approach ought to be that if a rule is accepted at international law as customary international law then the rule must also be accepted by our domestic courts as customary international law. There is only one exception to this: the persistent objector principle. As far as South Africa is concerned, a practice to which it has persistently objected is simply not a customary rule of international law and can thus never be regarded as part of substantive South African domestic law.

(b) Treaties and conventions as part of South African domestic law

According to FC s 231, the incorporation of treaties and conventions follows the dualist approach.

Treaty-making falls exclusively within the competence of the executive. Treaties are negotiated and signed by the executive. Parliament then ratifies them by means of a resolution. Only those treaties specifically incorporated by an Act of Parliament become part of South African domestic law.[5] The rationale for the dualist approach flows from the separation of powers doctrine. If treaties could become part of our domestic law without any participation or endorsement from [1] R Wallace International Law (3rd Edition, 1997) 11.

[2] Federal Republic of Germany v Denmark and Federal Republic of Germany v Netherlands ICJ Reports (1969) 3 ('North Sea Continental Shelf').

[3] Ibid at 43. See also Spain v Canada ICJ Reports (1974) 3, 23-6 ('Fisheries Jurisdiction').

[4] 1988 (3) SA 51, 56 (C).

[5] According to John Dugard, the legislature in South Africa employs three principal methods to transform treaties into domestic law — 'in the first instance, the provisions of a treaty may be embodied in the text of an Act of Parliament; secondly, the treaty may be included as a schedule to a statute; thirdly, an enabling Act of Parliament may give the executive the power to bring a treaty into effect in municipal law by means of a proclamation or notice in the Government Gazette.' Dugard (supra) at 57. Mere publication of a treaty for general information does not, according to Dugard, constitute an act of incorporation.

the legislature, then wide law-making powers would be conferred on the executive. It is not, according to the separation of powers doctrine, the function of the executive to make law.[1]

Where South Africa has ratified a treaty, it is bound by international law to honour the provisions of that treaty. As Mohamed DP notes in Azapo v President of the Republic of South Africa:

> International conventions and treaties do not become part of the municipal law of our country, enforceable at the instance of private individuals in our courts, until and unless they are incorporated into the municipal law by legislative enactment.[2]

Thus, where a treaty has been ratified but has not been incorporated in municipal law by Parliament, and domestic courts cannot enforce our international obligations, the state may be found in breach of international law.[3] Under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Article 26 places an obligation upon a state that has become a party to a treaty to execute the treaty in good faith, while Article 27 prevents the state party from invoking the provisions of its domestic law as justification for its failure to perform in terms of the treaty.

[1] Some of these issues were dealt with in Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa. 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 478 (CC)('Harksen'). The State President is empowered by s 3(2) of the Extradition Act to consent to the surrender of a person on an ad hoc basis, in other words, even where there is no extradition treaty between South Africa and the requesting state Act 67 of 1962. One of the issues raised in this case was the constitutionality of s 3(2) given that it seems to conflict with FC s 231(2). The Constitutional Court's decision is rather disappointing. The Harksen Court held that the President's consent under s 3(2) did not constitute an 'international agreement' and it was thus not subject to the provisions of FC s 231. Accordingly Parliamentary approval was not required. Ibid at paras 22-23. According to the Constitutional Court, the effect of Presidential consent is merely a domestic act and not conduct on the international plane because Germany (the requesting state in this instance) was 'not entitled to rely on the President's consent to establish any enforceable obligation against South Africa.' Ibid at para 28. We find it difficult to see how there could have been no agreement between South Africa and Germany — even if only an informal one. Call it what you will, the President agreed, unilaterally, to extradite Harksen to Germany, and this had consequences on both the domestic and international planes. To allow the State President to act unilaterally when it comes to the surrender or extradition of individuals is, we submit, contrary to the spirit of transparency and accountability which underlies FC s 231, if it is not, in fact, in direct violation of FC s 231(2) itself. The effect of the Court's ruling would allow the executive to extradite South Africans to states which may have extremely poor human rights records — and to do so contrary to the wishes of Parliament. See J Dugard & G Abraham 'Public International Law' (2000) Annual Survey of South African Law 114-118. Dugard and Abraham make the point that s 3(2) was inserted into the Extradition Act in 1962, at the height of apartheid, so as to allow South Africa to extradite fugitives at a time when very few states had treaties with South Africa. But it has no place in the new constitutional order because 'transparency and accountability in treaty-making are important values recognized in the Final Constitution.' Ibid at 118.

[2] 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC)('Azapo') at para 28.

[3] A state could feasibly ratify an international treaty in which it undertakes (to the international community) to prosecute persons within its territory who are responsible for the commission of industrial acts that are destructive to the environment. If the state ratifies the instrument, it will then incur responsibility under international law to the international community where it fails to make the relevant prosecutions. The reality, however, is that the state will be unable to meet its international obligations until it incorporates the treaty into its domestic law. Domestic courts cannot enforce prosecutions in the absence of domestic laws that prohibit such conduct. This principle is known as nullum crimen sine lege.

(c) United Nations resolutions

Resolutions adopted by the Security Council in terms of chapter VII of the UN Charter are binding on all members of the United Nations. In terms of article 25 of the UN Charter member states undertake to carry out such resolutions. Consequently, if domestic measures are needed to give proper effect to such resolutions, domestic authorities must see to it that such measures are in place. In South Africa, the Application of Resolutions of the Security Council of the United Nations Act authorises the incorporation of such resolutions into national law by proclamation in the Government Gazette.[1]

Non-binding resolutions, such as those adopted by the General Assembly or by the organs of other international organizations, do not have direct legal effect in the national legal system and must be transformed into national law by means of a legislative measure.[2]

30.3 International Law as an Aid to Interpreting a Provision in the Bill of Rights

In recognition of the important influence that international human rights law has had on the drafting of our Bill of Rights, FC s 39(1)(b) makes it mandatory for our courts to consider international law when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

Although evidence of real consideration and application of international law is scant,[3] there has been significant reference to international human rights jurisprudence in a number of the judgments of the Constitutional Court.[4] In S v Makwanyane, Chaskalson P set out the approach that ought to be employed by a court when considering how to use international law in interpreting the meaning of a provision in the Bill of Rights:

> In the course of the arguments addressed to us, we were referred to books and articles on the death sentence, and to judgments dealing with challenges made to capital punishment in the courts of other countries and in international tribunals. The international and foreign authorities are of value because they analyse arguments for and against the death sentence and show how courts of other jurisdictions have dealt with this vexed issue. For that reason alone they require our attention. They may also have to be considered because of their relevance to section 35(1) of the Constitution . . .

[1] Act 172 of 1993

[2] See Welkom Municipality v Masureik and Herman T/A Lotus Corporation & Another 1997 (3) SA 363, 371-372 (SCA) .

[3] See M Olivier 'South Africa and International Human Rights Agreements, Policy and Practice' (2003) 2 Journal of SA Law 293.

[4] Many of the initial judgments making reference to international law in the interpretation of the Bill of Rights were decided under IC s 35(1). It read: 'In interpreting the provisions of the [interim Bill of Rights] a court of law shall promote the values which underlie an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality and shall, where applicable, have regard to public international law applicable to the protection of the rights entrenched in [the bill of rights], and may have regard to comparable foreign case law.' Although there is a slight difference in emphasis, the two subsections are, in essence, identical and the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court decided under IC s 35(1) remains relevant to the application of FC s 39(1)(b).

> . . . In the context of section 35(1) public international law would include non-binding as well as binding law. They may both be used under the section as tools of interpretation. International agreements and customary international law accordingly provide a framework within which [the Bill of Rights] can be evaluated and understood, and for that purpose decisions of tribunals dealing with comparable instruments, such as the United Nations Committee on Human Rights, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, the European Commission on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights and in appropriate cases, reports of specialized agencies such as the International Labour Organisation may provide guidance as to the correct interpretation of particular provisions of [the Bill of Rights].
>
> . . . In dealing with comparative law, we must bear in mind that we are required to construe the South African Constitution, and not an international instrument or the constitution of some foreign country, and that this has to be done with due regard to our legal system, our history and circumstances, and the structure and language of our own Constitution. We can derive assistance from public international law and foreign case law, but we are in no way bound to follow it.[1]

Two important guidelines emerge from these extracts. The first is that the obligation to consider international law when interpreting the Bill of Rights includes both treaty law and customary international law. Such law embraces both binding and non-binding international law. Thus, where there is a relevant treaty to which we are not yet bound, the obligation to consider international law would include such a non-binding treaty. Second, although there is an obligation to consider applicable international law,[2] our courts are not bound to apply it.[3] International law is merely a tool of interpretation, and the differing contexts of the applicable international law instrument or principle and our Bill of Rights should be borne in mind by the courts in assessing its influence. In Coetzee v Government of RSA, the Court held that what IC s 36 and FC s 39 require is not a rigid application of 'formulae' but rather that due regard be paid to the principles that can be extracted from international experience.[4]

While Makwanyane clarified the respective positions of both binding and non-binding international law, the Court's understanding of what should qualify as non-binding international law is less certain. One finds for instance no reference to non-binding standards, also known as 'soft law', and no explanation as to whether multilateral treaties not ratified by South Africa would qualify as

[1] S v Makwanyane 1995(3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 34, 35 and 39.

[2] IC s 35(1) only required consideration of international law 'where applicable', whereas the obligation under FC s 39(1)(b) is not similarly qualified. However, in our view, it seems clear that a court is only obliged to consider 'applicable' international law.

[3] See S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at paras 21 and 23 (Court held that 'valuable insights' may be gained from international law, and that FC s 35(1) required the Court to 'have regard' to 'international consensus.' Courts are 'not bound to follow it, but neither can they ignore it.')

[4] 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 57.

non-binding international law. The Constitutional Court offered some clarification of its position in Grootboom.[1] In considering the use of international law to advance the Court's gloss on the right to housing in FC s 26, Yacoob J wrote:

> The relevant international law can be a guide to interpretation but the weight to be attached to any particular principle or rule of international law will vary. However, where the relevant principle of international law binds South Africa, it may be directly applicable.[2]

In a footnote appended to the phrase 'binds South Africa', Yacoob J refers to FC s 231 in its entirety which can only mean that a binding international law norm can be inferred from a treaty ratified by Parliament, but not enacted into domestic law. It seems reasonable to conclude that the above understanding of the relevance of international law aims at a distinction between international law as an aid in constitutional construction and international law as directly applicable law. In terms of this understanding, the role of non-binding international law will be limited to providing guidance as to the correct gloss to place on a given provision. Thus, Grootboom invokes a non-binding international standard to give content to a specific constitutional provision.[3] The Court took a similarly restrictive view in Treatment Action Campaign.[4]

The Court's reluctance to venture beyond the wording of the Final Constitution in interpreting fundamental rights has certain implications for the role of international law as an aid to interpretation. While directly applicable convention law still has a chance of receiving some consideration, non-binding norms of whatever kind are likely to be met with indifference. One must also not lose sight of the fact that, in general, South African courts have always favoured case law when applying comparative source material from other jurisdictions and the fact is that

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1160 (CC)('Grootboom').

[2] Ibid at para 26.

[3] At issue was whether FC s 26 must be interpreted in a way that ensures compliance with the minimum core obligations to fulfil socio-economic rights articulated in General Comment No 3 (1990) by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The Grootboom Court accepted that what the Committee intended was to set a minimum essential level below which state conduct must not drop with respect to socio-economic rights. It determined that, in international law, this minimum essential level means that regard must be had to the needs of the most vulnerable groups in society. However, the Court was quick to point out the difficulty in determining a minimum core obligation where needs in relation to adequate housing were diverse. Ibid at para 31. In addition, the Court rejected the argument that it was obliged to determine the minimum core content of a right, since FC s 26 states that the apposite test is whether the state has taken reasonable steps, within the state's available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of the right to housing. Ibid at 33.

[4] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC)('TAC'). The TAC Court concluded that FC s 27 should not be interpreted to provide for minimum core obligations, and that such benchmarks should be treated as possibly relevant only to the question whether the state's measures were reasonable or not. Ibid at paras 34–38.

they now may do so. That international law must be considered is unlikely to change that sentiment. It is also interesting to note that the preference for staying as close as possible to the Final Constitution has been entrenched in the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act.[1] Section 3 of this Act determines that any person interpreting the Act must do so with a view towards giving effect to the Final Constitution, and in doing so may be mindful of international convention law or customary law and comparable foreign case law. Here international law is put on the same footing as foreign case law, a position that differs from that assigned to international law in terms of FC s 39. Against the background of these developments there is much to be said for the comment that 'the distinction between foreign and international law has not been fully realized [by the South African courts]; that reference has often been passing, cursory and largely 'ceremonial'; and that the number and nature of international sources used, has, by and large, been uncreative to say the least.'[2]

30.4 State Conduct and Obligations

(a) Jus ad bellum and jus in bello

The right to use armed force (jus ad bellum) is now constitutionally regulated. The primary function of the defence force is 'to defend and protect the Republic, its territorial integrity and its people in accordance with the constitution and the principles of international law regulating the use of force.'[3] The primary function referred to here is the defence of the Republic against external military aggression. The use of the military for internal policing is limited to exceptional circumstances.[4] The reference to 'international law regulating the use of armed force' outlaws the use of the defence force for a war of aggression and limits the deployment of the force to instances involving action to restore or to maintain international peace and security,[5] enforcement action under a regional arrangement,[6] and individual or collective self-defence action.[7] The South African Defence Review, undertaken in 1998 to elaborate upon the defence force's policy framework contained in the 1996 White Paper on National Defence, makes it clear that the 'government does not currently, and will not in the future, have aggressive intentions towards any state.'[8] It regards the use or threat of military force as a measure of last resort in the face of aggression 'when non-violent forms of conflict resolution have failed.'[9]

[1] Act 4 of 2000.

[2] N Botha 'The Role of International Law in the Development of South African Common Law' (2001) 26 SA Yearbook of Int Law 253, 255.

[3] FC s 200(2).

[4] White Paper on National Defence for the Republic of South Africa: Defence in a Democracy (1996), available at http://www.info.gov.za/whitepapers/1996/defencwp.htm (accessed on 1 October 2005)('White Paper') 7.

[5] UN Charter Article 42.

[6] UN Charter Article 53.

[7] See also White Paper (supra) at 8.

[8] South African Defence Review (1998) Chapter 1, para 35, available at http://www.dod.mil.za/documents/defencereview/defence/20review1998.pdf (accessed on 13 September 2005).

[9] Ibid.

The deployment of the defence force for purposes commensurate with international law on the use of force must be understood in terms of the roles assigned to the executive and the legislature by the Final Constitution.[1] Only the President, as head of the national executive, may authorize the deployment of the defence force. This function must be exercised together with other members of the cabinet.[2] The purposes for which deployment is authorized are limited to co-operation with the police force, defence of the Republic and fulfillment of an international obligation.[3] If deployment takes place for any of these purposes, Parliament must be promptly informed, and in appropriate detail of: (1) the reason for the deployment; (2) the place where the defence force will be deployed; (3) the number of people involved in the operation: and (4) the period for which the force will be deployed.[4] Although it is not spelled out in the Final Constitution, once informed about the particulars of the operation, Parliament could either endorse or veto the deployment. Such an oversight role is often assigned to the legislature.[5]

It is unclear whether, in the case of deployment in defence of the Republic, a prior declaration of a state of national defence is a pre-condition for deployment. The Final Constitution authorizes the President to declare a state of national defence in a provision that is textually and structurally unrelated to the provision that determines when the defence force can be deployed.[6] However, the word 'may' in this context indicates authority rather than possibility. Once a declaration has been made, Parliament must be informed about the reasons for the declaration, the place where the defence force will be deployed and the number of people who will be involved. Here, the President is not required to state the period for which the deployment will be effected, presumably because the period of deployment will coincide with the time during which the declaration remains in force. A declaration of national defence will lapse unless Parliament approves of it within seven days of the declaration.[7]

One difficult institutional issue in a constitutional democracy is the ability of the courts to pass judgment on matters concerning national security. In Hamdi, [1] According to FC s 198*(d)*, national security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive.

[2] FC s 85(2).

[3] FC s 201(2).

[4] FC s 201(3).

[5] For comparative developments, see LF Damrosch 'The Interface of National Constitutional Systems with International Law and Institutions on Using Military Forces: Changing Trends in Executive and Legislative Powers' in C Ku & H Jacobson Democratic Accountability and the Use of Force in International Law (2003) 39.

[6] FC s 203.

[7] FC s 203(3).

the US Supreme Court rejected the government's assertion that the separation of powers doctrine divested the Court of its power to hold the executive accountable in times of war.[1] It asserted its right and its duty to assess the constitutionality of any limitations placed on habeas corpus rights of enemy combatants.

The judicial branch is, however, unlikely to assess the substantive grounds for the actual deployment of the defence force. In Turp v Chretien, the applicants applied to a federal court for judicial review of an executive decision to involve Canadian forces in a military intervention in Iraq on the basis that such an intervention was not authorized by the Security Council and would be contrary to international law.[2] In addition, the applicants moved for interim relief prohibiting the Canadian government from participating in any military intervention in Iraq pending the outcome of the court's ruling. The applicants further argued that a declaration of war, without the approval of Parliament, would be contrary to Canada's democratic commitments and that any executive decision to deploy the armed forces must be supervised by Parliament and be subject to both the Canadian Charter and international law. The motion for interim relief was dismissed on the basis that it was not yet ripe. As to the gravamen of the complaint, the court held that, unless there is a breach of the Canadian Charter, questions of 'high policy' are not reviewable by the courts.[3]

The conduct of the military during armed conflict is now explicitly regulated by the Final Constitution. It states that the security services 'must act, and must teach and require their members to act, in accordance with the Constitution and the law, including customary international law and international agreements binding on the Republic'.[4] From this it follows that 'no member of any security service may obey a manifestly illegal order.'[5] As it stands, 'manifestly illegal order' must be interpreted as referring to an order that violates the principles in any of the sources mentioned in the previous provision.[6] A more open-ended reference to 'international humanitarian law' applies to the detention of aliens in consequence of an international armed conflict. In terms of FC s 37(8), which forms part of the Bill of Rights, the state must comply with the 'standards binding on the Republic under international humanitarian law in respect of the detention of such persons.' FC s 37(8) embraces both international customary and treaty law.

[1] Hamdi v Rumsfeld 542 US 507 (2004). See also HA Strydom 'The Case of the Gunatanamo Detainees in United States (and Other) Courts' (2004) TSAR 294.

[2] 111 CRR (2003) 184.

[3] In coming to this conclusion the Turp court relied on Black v Canada. (2001) 54 OR (3rd) 215, (2001) 199 DLR (4th) 228 (CA)('Black'). The Black Court held that executive decisions involving the signing of a treaty or a declaration of war concern public policy and public interest considerations that far outweigh the rights of individuals or their legitimate expectations. See also R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex parte Everett [1989] 1 All ER 655 (CA).

[4] FC s 199(5).

[5] FC s 199(6).

[6] According to Article 33(2) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, an order to commit genocide or a crime against humanity is a manifestly illegal order.

The role of customary international law as a source of international humanitarian law principles must be read in conjunction with the constitutional provision that customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament.[1] Although this provision ranks customary international law below the Final Constitution and an ordinary Act of Parliament in the case of an inconsistency, inconsistencies will be rare. As far as treaty law is concerned, only treaties to which South Africa has become a party are law. South Africa is party to the Hague Conventions and Regulations (1899 and 1907),[2] the Geneva Conventions (1949)[3] and their Additional Protocols (1977).[4] In addition, South Africa is party to a number of multi-lateral treaties limiting the use of weapons designed to cause unnecessary suffering.[5]

Although the Final Constitution only refers to humanitarian law treaties to which South Africa has become a party, relevant and supplementary principles present in other sources cannot be left out of the equation. Though not coextensive, human rights law and humanitarian law do overlap.[6] Thus, where the courts are called upon to apply and interpret the Bill of Rights as part of a humanitarian law issue, binding as well as non-binding international law will become part of the reference material.[7] FC s 233 obliges courts to follow international humanitarian law in instances in which a legislative measure is open to multiple interpretations: the courts must choose an interpretation of a legislative measure that is consistent with international law over an alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law.[8]

The Geneva Conventions place the domestic effect of these multi-lateral treaties in doubt.[9] While the lack of an enactment in terms of FC s 231(4) could pose a problem for the domestic prosecution of individuals for the commission of war crimes, that problem is largely obviated by the domestic implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court[10] through the Implementation

[1] FC s 232.

[2] The following conventions were ratified on 29 July 1899: Convention (II) with Respect to the Laws and Customs of War on Land and Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land; Declaration (IV, 2) concerning Asphyxiating Gases; Declaration (IV, 3) concerning Expanding Bullets. Ratified on 18 October 1907 were the following: Convention (III) relative to the Opening of Hostilities; Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and its Regulations Concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land; Convention (VII) relating to the Conversion of Merchant Ships into War Ships; Convention (VIII) relative to the Laying of Automatic Submarine Contact Mines; Convention (IX) concerning Bombardment by Naval Forces in Time of War; Convention (XI) relative to certain Restrictions with regard to the Exercise of the Rights of Capture in Naval War.

[3] Ratified by South Africa on 31 March 1952.

[4] Ratified by South Africa on 21 November 1995.

[5] For such a list, see J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Edition, 2000) 432, 433.

[6] See, eg, T Meron 'The Humanization of the Law of War' (2003) 24 Recuiel des Cours 301.

[7] See FC s 39(1)(b); Makwanyane (supra) at 413-4.

[8] FC s 233.

[9] See Dugard (supra) at 439.

[10] The Rome Statute was ratified by South Africa on 27 November 2000.

of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act.[1] This Act gives the South African courts jurisdiction to adjudicate cases involving the Statute's core crimes in accordance with the principle of complementarity in article 17 of the Rome Statute. It directs the courts to consider and to apply, in addition to the Final Constitution and the domestic law of South Africa, conventional international law, customary international law and comparable foreign law.[2]

(b) Diplomatic immunity

Diplomatic immunity is regulated by the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act.[3] The Act incorporates certain important provisions of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963) and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961).[4] In case of an ambiguity between the statutory and convention law on diplomatic immunities and privileges, the courts must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the statutory law that is consistent with international law.[5] In addition to statutory and convention law, the rules of customary international law will be applicable unless such rules are inconsistent with the Final Constitution or an Act of parliament.[6]

Apart from convention rules and customary international law, the privileges and immunities in question here can also be extended to foreign dignatories by agreement entered into with a foreign state, government or organization[7] and can even be conferred on the recipient by executive notice in the Government Gazette. Agreements of this nature must comply with FC s 231. That entails both parliamentary approval and the enactment of legislation incorporating the agreement into domestic law.[8]

(c) State immunity

Jurisdictional immunity, which is granted to a foreign sovereign, forms part of the general principles of international law. In the words of Marshall CJ in The Schooner Exchange v McFaddon

> One sovereign being in no respect amenable to another, and being bound by obligations of the highest character not to degrade the dignity of his nation, by placing himself or its sovereign rights within the jurisdiction of another, can be supposed to enter a foreign

[1] Act 27 of 2002 ('Implementation Act').
[2] Implementation Act, s 2.
[3] Act 37 of 2001 ('DIPA').
[4] DIPA, s 2(1). It also incorporates the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations (1946) and the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies (1947). See also FC s 231(4).
[5] FC s 233.
[6] FC s 232.
[7] DIPA, ss 4(1)(a) and (b) and 4(2)(a) and (b).
[8] FC s 231(2) and (4).

> territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign station, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication, and will be extended to him. This perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns, and the common interest compelling them to mutual intercourse, have given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation.[1]

Since the 1970's a number of states have started moving away from the absolute nature of this rule by adopting a restrictive approach to jurisdictional immunity.[2] Such immunity will only apply to the official acts (acta jure imperii) of a foreign state while rendering commercial transactions (acta jure gestiones) to which the foreign state is a party subject to domestic law.[3] South Africa endorsed this position in the Foreign States Immunities Act.[4] Consequently, while foreign states enjoy immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts of the Republic,[5] immunity will not apply to commercial transactions[6] entered into by the foreign state[7] or to a contractual obligation incurred by a foreign state if the contract falls to be performed wholly or partly in the Republic.[8]

The erosion of the absolute doctrine of state immunity by excluding commercial transactions from its operation is only one phase in adapting the doctrine to changing circumstances. The doctrine is likely to be further eroded by two recent developments. The first is the entrenchment of the effective remedy provision in international human rights instruments. The second is the conflict between immunity and the institution of criminal and civil proceedings against immunity-bearing persons accused of gross human rights violations.

Both international and regional human rights instruments contain express provisions relating to the right of persons to an 'effective remedy' for acts violating human rights.[9]

---

[1] (1812) 7 Cranch 116.

[2] The restrictive theory of state immunity has been endorsed in the first multi-lateral instrument on the issue of jurisdictional immunity. See United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, A/Res/59/38 (16 December 2004), reprinted in 44 ILM 803 (2005). Exceptions to the immunity of a state and its Property include claims arising from: (1) commercial transactions; (2) employment contracts; (3) personal injury and damage to property; (4) ownership, possession and use of property; (5) intellectual and industrial policy; (6) state-owned or state-operated ships used for purposes other than governmental non-commercial purposes; (7) arbitration proceedings; and (8) situations involving consent to jurisdiction. Ibid at articles 7–18.

[3] I Congreso del Partido [1983] 1 AC 244 (HL); Inter-Science Research and Development Services (Pty) Ltd v Republica Popular de Mocambique 1980 (2) SA 111 (T).

[4] Act 87 of 1981 ('FSIA').

[5] FSIA s 2(1).

[6] FSIA, s 4(3)(For a definition of 'commercial transaction'.)

[7] FSIA, s 4(1)(a).

[8] FSIA, s 4(1)(b).

[9] Article 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights links the effective remedy requirement to the remedies of national tribunals; article 2(3)(a) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights places an obligation on states partie to ensure that a person whose rights have been violated 'shall have an effective remedy'; article 6 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination obliges state parties to assure to everyone 'effective protection and remedies'; article 25 of the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights proclaims the right of every person to simple and prompt recourse, 'or any other effective recourse' for protection against acts that violate fundamental rights; and article 13 of the European Convention on Human Rights states that everyone whose rights and freedoms are violated 'shall have an effective remedy before a national authority.'

References to a right to some form of restitution is also not uncommon.[1] The UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power contains, for example, provisions relating to questions of restitution and mentions 'prompt redress' for harm done, 'fair restitution to victims, their families or dependants for harm or loss suffered', 'reimbursement of expenses incurred as a result of victimization', and the obligation of states to provide 'financial compensation' when compensation is not fully available from the offender.[2] In a more recent declaration on the obligations of individuals and organs of civil society to protect human rights, the General Assembly has once again drawn attention to the need for effective remedies by stating that:

> In the exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms. . .everyone has the right. . .to benefit from an effective remedy and to be protected in the event of the violation of those rights. To this end everyone . . . has the right . . . to complain to and have that complaint reviewed in a public hearing before . . . a competent judicial or other authority . . . and to obtain from such authority a decision . . . providing redress, including any compensation due, . . . as well as enforcement of the eventual decision and award.[3]

In Velásques v Honduras, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights offers a clear statement regarding the victims of human rights abuses and the provision of reparation of damages resulting from violations committed by state actors.[4] Reaffirming this state obligation in Barrios Altos, the Inter-American court ruled that:

> all amnesty provisions, provisions of prescription and the establishment of measures designed to eliminate responsibility are inadmissible, because they are intended to prevent the investigation and punishment of those responsible for serious human rights violations such as torture, extrajudicial summary or arbitrary execution and forced disappearance.[5]

The Human Rights Committee, established in terms of article 28 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), has also addressed this issue and concluded as follows in its General Comment 20:

> The Committee has noted that some States have granted amnesty in respect of acts of torture. Amnesties are generally incompatible with the duty of states to investigate such acts;

[1] Article 9(5) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights speaks of an 'enforceable right to compensation' in the case of unlawful arrest or detention; article 14 of the Convention Against Torture states that each state party must ensure that the victim of an act of torture 'obtains redress and has an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation, including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible'; article 6 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination provides for a right to seek 'just and adequate reparation or satisfaction for any damage suffered'; article 63(1) of the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights entitles the courts to rule that the consequences of a breach 'be remedied and that fair compensation be paid to the injured party.'

[2] GA resolution 40/34 of 29 November 1985.

[3] GA resolution 53/144 (1998) — Declaration on the Right and Responsibility of Individuals, Groups and Organs of Society to Promote and Protect Universally Recognised Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

[4] 28 ILM (1989) 294.

[5] 41 ILM (2002) 93 at para 41.

> to guarantee freedom from such acts within their jurisdiction; and to ensure that they do not occur in the future. States may not deprive individuals of the right to an effective remedy, including compensation and such full rehabilitation as may be possible.[1]

It stands to reason that an immunity arrangement, whether under the diplomatic or state immunity doctrine, creates a procedural bar to a legal remedy. The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court limits the reach of such arrangements in article 27. Article 27 states that 'immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.'[2] The enactment of this rule in South African domestic law further suspends immunity as a defence for past heads of state or government or other government officials or representatives regardless of whether a contrary rule exists by virtue of any other law, including customary and conventional international law.[3] Since the South African courts now have jurisdiction over the crimes listed in the Rome Statute, the courts' approach to immunity should be altered accordingly.[4]

As far as civil proceedings against violators are concerned, immunity is still a bar to claims against state officials.[5] Although this approach was recently reinforced in decisions handed down by the European Court of Human Rights,[6] there are definite signs of erosion in this doctrine as well. In Al-Adsani the applicant was the victim of torture committed by public officials in Kuwait. When civil proceedings were initiated in a British court against the government of Kuwait, the applicant learned that immunity legislation conferring immunity on foreign governments frustrated his attempts to obtain compensation for the physical and mental harm done to him. His further claim before the Strassbourg court that the immunity rule denied him access to court in violation of article 6(1) of the European Human Rights Convention was turned down on the basis that, despite the jus cogens nature of the prohibition on torture, state immunity still applies in respect of civil claims for damages. However, the ECHR Court split nine to

[1] General Comment 20 of 1992 reprinted in J Steiner & P Alston International Human Rights in Context (2000) 531, 532.

[2] 28 ILM (1989) 294. See also Article 7(2) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (adopted on the 25 May 1993 by Security Council resolution 827); Article 6(2) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (adopted on the 8 November 1994 by Security Council resolution 955); Article 6(2) of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone (established pursuant to Security Council resolution 1315 of 14 August 2000).

[3] The Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 ('Implementation Act'), s 4(2).

[4] Implementation Act ss 3*(d)* and 4(3).

[5] See, eg, R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate: Ex Parte Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [1999] 2 All ER 97 (HL) 157 (Lord Hutton) 179 (Lord Millet) 182 (Lord Phillips). See also J Dugard 'Immunity, Human Rights and International Crimes' (2005) TSAR 482, 485; H Strydom & SD Bachmann 'Civil Liability for Gross Human Rights Violations' (2005) TSAR 448.

[6] Al-Adsani v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 273 ('Al-Adsani'); Fogarty v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 302; McElhinney v Ireland (2002) 34 EHRR 322 ('McElhinney').

eight on this issue. For the minority, the distinction between criminal and civil proceedings lacked merit. The only question, they argued, was the difference in status between the prohibition on torture and the immunity rule. Once the jus cogens nature of the prohibition on torture was established, reasoned the minority, a state could no longer invoke hierarchically lower rules such as immunity to avoid the consequences of a violation of the norm.[1]

Although not dealing with a jus cogens matter, the minority judgment in McElhinney v Ireland further illustrates this shift in sentiment.[2] The applicant, an Irish police officer, was involved in a rather bizarre incident at a British checkpoint that resulted in the applicant driving two miles into the Republic of Ireland with a British soldier clinging to his vehicle. The British soldier eventually discharged his weapon at the applicant's car and at the applicant. The applicant suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of the incident and sued the British government in the Irish courts, only to find himself barred by the principle of state immunity. The McElhinney Court concluded that:

> there appears to be a trend in international and comparative law towards limiting State immunity in respect of personal injury caused by an act or omission within the forum state, but that this practice is by no means universal. Further, it appears from the materials referred to above that the trend may primarily refer to 'insurable' personal injury, that is incidents arising out of ordinary road traffic accidents, rather than matters relating to the core act of State sovereignty such as the acts of a soldier on foreign territory which, of their very nature, may involve sensitive issues affecting diplomatic relations between States and national security.[3]

The dissent found a clear violation of article 6(1) of the ECHR and grounded its finding on the principle that state immunity had long ceased to be a blanket rule exempting states from the jurisdiction of courts of law. This evolution, the minority argued, is reflected in exceptions to absolute immunity recognised by national legislatures and courts, in the codification of international law on state immunity and in international treaty law. The convergence of these developments was, according to the minority, 'sufficiently powerful to suggest, at any rate, that at present there is no international duty, on the part of States, to grant immunity to other States in matters of torts caused by the latter's agents.'[4]

As the law on immunity currently stands, immunity could still be granted in the case of civil proceedings regardless of the unlawful character of the conduct. Lord Millet, in the English House of Lords decision in Pinochet, wrote:

> The international community had created an offence for which immunity ratione materiae could not possibly be available. International law cannot be supposed to have established a crime having the character of a jus cogens and at the same time to have provided an immunity which is coextensive with the obligation it seeks to impose.

[1] Al-Adsani (supra) at 297.
[2] McElhinney (supra) at 322.
[3] Ibid at 335.
[4] Ibid at 340.

> In my opinion, acts which attract state immunity in civil proceedings because they are characterised as acts of sovereign power may, for the very same reason, attract individual criminal liability. The respondents relied on a number of cases which show that acts committed in the exercise of sovereign power do not engage the civil liability of the state even if they are contrary to international law. I do not find those decisions determinative of the present issue or even relevant. In England and the United States they depend on the terms of domestic legislation; though I do not doubt that they correctly represent the position in international law. I see nothing illogical or contrary to public policy in denying the victims of state sponsored torture the right to sue the offending state in a foreign court, while at the same time permitting (and indeed requiring) states to convict and punish the individuals responsible if the offending state declines to take action.[1]

Despite the clear distinction made between civil and criminal proceedings, the International Law Commission reached the conclusion that Pinochet stands for the proposition that 'State officials should not be entitled to plead immunity for acts of torture committed in their own territories in both civil and criminal actions.' Whether this gloss on the Pinochet case is accurate or not, Bianchi is surely correct to point out that Pinochet creates a 'manifest inconsistency which ought to be remedied by denying immunity to state and state officials in civil proceedings' because 'human rights atrocities cannot be qualified as sovereign acts' and because the characterisation of certain offences as jus cogens 'should have the consequence of trumping a plea of state immunity … in civil proceedings as well.'[2]

(d) Diplomatic protection

In Barcelona Traction Company, the ICJ held that domestic law may lay upon the state an obligation to protect its citizens abroad and may even confer a right upon the national to demand the performance of such an obligation and further clothe the right with a corresponding sanction.[3] This remedy, also known as diplomatic protection, normally arises in situations where the fundamental rights of a national of a state are under threat in a foreign country and there are no proper remedies in the foreign state upon which the national can rely.

At its forty-eighth session in 1996, the International Law Commission (ILC) identified the topic of diplomatic protection as one that warrants codification and progressive development.[4] In 2003, the ILC published its Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection in which the following definition of diplomatic protection was given:

[1] R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex Parte Pinochet Ugarte No 3 1999 2 All ER 97 (HL) 179f–g.

[2] A Bianchi 'Immunity versus Human Rights: The Pinochet Case' (1999) 10(2) European JIL 237, 264–265.

[3] Belgium v Spain (1970) ICJ Reports 3.

[4] General Assembly Official Records, 51st Session, Supplement No 10 (A/51/10) par 249 and Annex II, Addendum 1.

> Diplomatic protection consists of resort to diplomatic action or other means of peaceful settlement by a State adopting in its own right the cause of its national in respect of an injury to that national arising from an internationally wrongful act of another State.[1]

By holding that a state 'has the right to exercise diplomatic protection' the Draft Articles made it clear that there is no legal duty that rests on a state to come to the rescue of its national who faces denial of justice in a foreign country.[2] Furthermore, the state may not bring an international claim in respect of an injury to its national before the injured person has exhausted all local remedies.[3] For this purpose, 'local remedies' are defined as 'remedies which are as of right open to the injured person before the judicial or administrative courts or bodies, whether ordinary or special, of the State alleged to be responsible for the injury.'[4] However, in the following instances local remedies need not be exhausted:

- When the local remedies provide no reasonable possibility of effective redress;
- When there is an undue delay in the remedial process attributable to the state;
- When the circumstances of the case make the exhaustion of local remedies unreasonable;
- When the responsible state has waived the requirement that local remedies be exhausted first.[5]

Since diplomatic protection involves intervention by the executive, judicial control over executive action or inaction raises separation of powers concerns. In Abbasi v Foreign Secretary, a United Kingdom citizen detained by American forces in Guantanamo Bay petitioned a British court for an order instructing the foreign office to intervene on his behalf because his due process rights were ignored by the United States government.[6] While acknowledging that nationals of a state may, in certain instances, have a legitimate expectation that their government would act upon a request for assistance, it was also made clear that the remedy in such instances is fairly limited. This is so because the consideration of the request and what will constitute an appropriate response to it are matters only the executive can decide and are therefore not justiciable. Only in an extreme case where, for instance, the executive refuses to consider an application, will it be appropriate for a court to grant an order directing the executive to apply its mind to the matter. The most a court can do is to enquire into the nature and consequences of the action taken and to expect the executive to provide reasons for its decision.[7]

[1] Report of the International Law Commission, 55th Session (2003), General Assembly Official Records, 58th Session, Supplement No 10 (A/58/10) 81, Article 1(1).
[2] Ibid at Article 2.
[3] Ibid at Article 8(1).
[4] Ibid at Article 8(2).
[5] Ibid at Article 10.
[6] Abbasi v Foreign Secretary 42 ILM 359 (2003)('Abbasi').
[7] Ibid at 381–382.

South African jurisprudence follows the same approach. In Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court ruled that the currently prevailing view is that diplomatic protection is not recognized by international law as a human right and cannot be enforced as such.[1] Consequently, 'diplomatic protection remains the prerogative of the State to be exercised at its discretion.'[2] Although the Kaunda Court accepted that such matters remain largely within the discretion of the executive, it pointed out that in the case of a material breach of a human right that forms part of customary international law, the courts ought not to simply acquiesce. Two constitutional provisions were cited for the argument that in such cases there is a positive obligation on government to act. The first is FC s 7(2). FC s 7(2) places an obligation on government to not only respect and protect, but also to promote and to fulfill the rights in the Bill of Rights. The second is FC s 3. FC s 3 guarantees all South African citizens equal entitlement to the rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship. The Kaunda Court interpreted this section to mean that citizens have a right to request that government provide them with diplomatic protection and that there is a corresponding obligation on government to consider the request and to deal with it in a manner commensurate with the Final Constitution. There may even be a duty on government to act on its own initiative.[3] However, a court cannot tell a government how to respond to the request for diplomatic protection, since the decision 'as to whether, and if so, what protection should be given is an aspect of foreign policy which is essentially the function of the executive.'[4] In exercising this function, the executive has broad discretion which must be respected by the courts.[5] That respect has its limits. Since the exercise of all government power is subject to constitutional review, the courts retain jurisdiction to review instances of bad faith or irrational responses to a request for diplomatic review.[6]

Kaunda was followed by the High Court in Van Zyl & Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[7] In this matter a number of companies registered in Lesotho and their South African shareholders unsuccessfully applied for a mandamus instructing the South African government to espouse their claims for compensation against the Lesotho government. The claims arose out of a longstanding legal battle with the Lesotho government over compensation for the [1] Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa 2004 (5) SA 191 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda').

[2] Ibid at para 29.
[3] Ibid at paras 66, 67, 69, 70.
[4] Ibid at paras 73, 77.
[5] Ibid at para 77.
[6] Ibid at paras 78–80.
[7] Van Zyl & Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others Case No 20320/2002 ('Van Zyl')(Unreported, 20 July 2005, Transvaal Provincial Division).

expropriation and cancellation of certain mining leases granted to the companies by the Lesotho government.[1] Apart from the fact that the companies were registered in Lesotho and could therefore not claim entitlement to diplomatic protection by the South African government, the High Court also ruled that FC s 3, on which the judgement in Kaunda was partly premised, does not apply to legal personae. Such persons cannot claim the guarantees citizens of the Republic have in terms of FC s 3.[2] However, the Van Zyl Court also ruled that where a company is a national (i.e. registered in the Republic) and seeks diplomatic protection, the executive is obliged to consider the request and exercise its discretion whether to provide diplomatic protection or not. In this instance, the source of the duty to consider the case for the company is grounded in FC ss 41*(a)–(c)*'s requirement of accountability. While FC ss 40 and 41 are predominantly about the relationship between the national, provincial and local spheres and organs of state, these sections have also been relied upon by private parties in disputes with the state. Whatever the textual basis for its conclusions might have been, the Court rightly noted that executive discretion is constrained by customary international law.[3]

(e) Extradition

The rule that the courts of one country will not sit in judgement of the transactions of another country no longer applies in extradition cases where the standards of justice in the requesting state have implications for the fundamental rights of the person to be extradited.[4] In South Africa, the extradition of a person sought by a country with a poor human rights record may be successfully challenged.[5]

In Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa Mohamed, a Tanzanian national indicted in the United States on various charges carrying the death

[1] See Attorney-General of Lesotho & Another v Swissborough Diamond Mines (Pty) Ltd & Others 1997 (8) BCLR 1122 (CA); Swissborough Diamond Mines (Pty) Ltd & Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1992 (2) SA 279 (T).

[2] Van Zyl (supra) at para 93.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See Kuwait Airways Corporation v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 & 5) [2002] 2 WLR 1353; Buttes Gas and Oil Co v Hammer (No 3) [1982] AC 932.

[5] In this respect it must also be noted that in terms of the United Nations Model Treaty on Extradition (1990), it is mandatory for the requested state to refuse the extradition of a person if that state has substantial grounds for believing that the extradition has been requested for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing the person on account of his or her race, religion, nationality, ethnic origin, political opinions, sex or status. Another ground for a mandatory refusal is when the person to be extradited would be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or would not receive the minimum guarantees in criminal proceedings as contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. South Africa's obligations in this regard would also arise under the 1990 Commonwealth Scheme relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders whose principles were included in the 1996 amendments to the Extradition Act 67 of 1962 and under the European Convention on Extradition (1957) and Additional Protocols (1975 and 1978 respectively) to which South Africa acceded on 13 May 2003.

penalty, challenged his removal from South Africa to the United States for trial.[1] Mr Mohamed's lawyers contended that his handing over to the US authorities was not a deportation but an extradition in disguise and that, as such, it constituted a clear breach of the Aliens Control Act.[2] They also sought an order directing the South African government to submit a written request to the US authorities that the death penalty would not be sought, imposed or carried out upon Mohamed's conviction.

On the validity of the deportation, the Constitutional Court pointed out the need to distinguish between extradition and deportation. While extradition involves co-operation between states for the delivery of an alleged criminal for the purpose of trial or sentence in the requesting state, deportation is a unilateral act by a state to get rid of an undesired alien. It was clear that the state's power to deport was regulated by the Alien Controls Act. Neither this Act, nor the Final Constitution, contains any prerogative power to deport or to determine the destination of the deportation. Thus, since the United States was not a destination in terms of the Act, the South African authorities acted unlawfully in deporting Mohamed to the US.[3] In ruling on the death penalty, the Mohamed Court held that since the South African authorities were actively involved in the deportation of Mohamed, it was incumbent upon them to secure a prior undertaking from the US government that the death sentence would not be imposed. Failure to have done so constituted a violation of Mohamed's constitutional rights under South African constitutional law. Although the unlawful deportation was irreversible and the US proceedings against Mohamed were already at an advanced stage, the Mohamed Court nevertheless found it appropriate to order the South African authorities to do whatever might still be possible to ameliorate the deleterious consequences of the State's unconstitutional acts.[4]

In Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa, the constitutionality of section 3(2) of the Extradition Act[5] was challenged on the grounds that the President's ad hoc exercise of powers of extradition — in the absence of an extradition treaty – did not comply with FC s 231's requirement that international agreements on such subjects must be enforced.[6] The Harksen Court held that FC s 231 did not govern the implemention or the interpretation of a piece of legislation that neither initiates nor concludes an agreement on extradition.[7]

[1] Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC)('Mohamed'). See also N Botha 'Deportation, Extradition and the Role of the State' (2001) SAYIL 227.

[2] Act 96 of 1991.

[3] Mohamed (supra) at 696–698, 701.

[4] Ibid at 711.

[5] Act 67 of 1962.

[6] Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 478 (CC) ('Harksen').

[7] Ibid at 484, 485.

31 Application

Stuart Woolman

31.1 Introduction 31–1
(a) A road map 31–1
(b) Application doctrine under the Interim Constitution 31–4
(c) Application doctrine under the Final Constitution. 31–6
(d) Decision Tree 1: Du Plessis v De Klerk. 31–14
(e) Decision Tree 2: Khumalo v Holomisa 31–15
31.2 Application under the Interim Constitution 31–16
(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–16
(i) Facts 31–16
(ii) Holding 31–16
(b) Analysis of Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–18
(i) Court's approach to the text. 31–18
(ii) An alternative approach to the text 31–19
(c) Jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–21
(d) Critique of the jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk . . 31–23
(i) Fortuity of form 31–23
(ii) Arbitrariness of application. 31–23
(iii) An artificial defense of the status quo 31–26
(iv) Untenability of the public-private distinction. 31–26
(v) Judicial boundedness 31–28
(vi) History and power. 31–29
(e) Jurisprudence of unqualified direct application 31–32
31.3 Application under the Final Constitution: Benefits of the Bill of Rights 31–33
(a) Everyone 31–35
(i) Aliens. 31–35
(ii) Individuals 31–36
(iii) Foetus 31–37
(b) Citizens 31–38

(c) Children 31–38
(d) Juristic persons 31–39
31.4 Application under the Final Constitution: Burdens of the Bill of Rights 31–42
(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Khumalo v Holomisa 31–42
(i) Facts 31–42
(ii) Holding 31–43
(iii) Court's reasoning. 31–43
(iv) The black letter law and the preferred reading . . . 31–45
(v) A good faith reconstruction of Khumalo v Holomisa 31–47
(aa) The First objection 31–48
(bb) The Second objection. 31–49
(cc) A Third objection 31–52
(dd) A Fourth objection 31–53
(b) Section 8(1) 31–56
(i) What the courts say FC s 8(1) means 31–56
(ii) What FC s 8(1) should mean 31–56
(aa) Real meaning of 'all law'. 31–56
(bb) Application of FC s 8(1) to the common law 31–57
(iii) The binding of the judiciary 31–57
(iv) The binding of the legislature 31–60
(v) The binding of the executive 31–61
(vi) The binding of organs of state 31–62
(c) Section 8(2) 31–62
(i) What FC s 8(2) means in Khumalo v Holomisa 31–62
(ii) What FC s 8(2) should mean and the courts' support for the preferred reading 31–63
(iii) The preferred reading, the no-law thesis and the problem of surplusage 31–70
(d) Section 8(3) 31–74
(i) What the courts say FC s 8(3) means 31–74
(ii) What FC s 8(3) should mean 31–75
(iii) Meaningless phrases in FC s 8(3) 31–76
(e) Section 39(2) 31–77
(i) What FC s 39(2) means 31–78
(ii) FC s 39(2) and the process of developing the common law. 31–78
(aa) FC s 39(2) and the over-determination of changes to the common law 31–78

(bb) The obligation to develop the common law . 31–80
(iii) The development of the common law and the interaction between FC s 39(2) and FC ss 7, 8, 38, 167, 172 and 173, and a difference in remedies . . 31–82
(iv) FC s 39(2) and the transformation of the common law. 31–86
(v) FC s 39(2) as mandatory canon of statutory interpretation 31–87
(vi) Reading down. 31–88
(vii) Shared constitutional interpretation and FC s 39(2) 31–90
(viii) An objective normative value system. 31–93
(ix) Customary law 31–95
(x) Stare decisis. 31–95
(aa) Walters and Afrox. 31–95
(bb) After Afrox and Walters 31–97
(f) Section 239: Organ of State 31–100
(i) Any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government 31–101
(ii) Any other functionary or institution. 31–104
31.5 Application of the Bill of Rights to other sections of the Constitution 31–107
31.6 Extraterritorial effect of the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution 31–113
(a) Persons outside South Africa's borders 31–114
(b) Foreign law and the Final Constitution 31–119
31.7 The waiver of rights 31–122
(a) A category mistake 31–122
(b) Waiver and the Law of Contract as neutral backdrop . 31–130
(c) The poverty of waiver. 31–130
(d) The relationship between waiver and the benefits of fundamental rights 31–131
31.8 Temporal application of the Bill of Rights 31–132
(a) Retrospectivity 31–132
(b) Application of the Bill of Rights to matters pending upon commencement of the Final Constitution 31–134

Appendix: Academic Contributions to the Debate on Application 31–136
(1) Sprigman and Osborne 31–137
(2) De Waal and Currie 31–141
(3) Roederer and Hopkins. 31–146
(a) Roederer 31–146
(b) Hopkins 31–150
(4) Cheadle, Davis, Van der Walt and Ellmann 31–152
(a) Cheadle and Davis. 31–152
(b) Van der Walt 31–157
(c) Ellmann 31–158

Application
8 (1) The Bill of Rights applies to all law, and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state.

(2) A provision of the Bill of Rights binds a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.

(3) When applying a provision of the Bill of Rights to a natural or juristic person in terms of subsection (2), a court

(a) in order to give effect to a right in the Bill, must apply, or if necessary develop, the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right; and

(b) may develop rules of the common law to limit the right, provided that the limitation is in accordance with section 36(1).

(4) A juristic person is entitled to the rights in the Bill of Rights to the extent required by the nature of the rights and the nature of that juristic person.[1]

31.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) A road map

There is more, much more, to 'application' than the text above might suggest. One purpose of this introduction is to offer a road map of the complex terrain this chapter will traverse.

When jurists, lawyers and academics say they wish to talk about the application of the Bill of Rights under the Final Constitution, by and large, they have a single vexed question in mind: Upon whom do the burdens of the Bill of Rights fall? That is, they want to know (or they want to tell us), as a general matter, which kinds of persons or parties may have the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights enforced against them, what kinds of laws attract meaningful scrutiny and what conditions or circumstances must obtain for a substantive provision to be said to apply to a given dispute. But let's bracket this question of burdens for just a moment.

Application embraces a host of other issues that are all at least notionally associated with the benefits of the Bill of Rights. Even that characterization, however, subordinates substance to style. In § 31.3, we look at 'benefits' in their most obvious sense. The text of most of the rights that appear in FC ss 9 through 35 tell us that 'everyone' enjoys them. That said, some rights expressly constrain the universe of persons entitled to their benefit — eg, citizens or children. With respect to others rights, the extension of their benefits is unclear. In the case of juristic persons, aliens and foetuses, the question of benefits may still generate controversy.

In § 31.7, we look at benefits through the prism of 'waiver'. Many jurists, lawyers and academics like to speak as if the persons entitled to the benefit of

* I have benefited enormously from extended discussions on this subject with Frank Michelman and Danie Brand. Their very substantial contributions are recognized throughout the text. Anthony Stein's and Theunis Roux's discipline, as editors, has saved me more than once from myself. Any remaining errors in argument or infelicities in style are my responsibility alone.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

a right may waive that same right. As we shall see, however, like talk of ghosts, the grammar of 'waiver-talk' creates the illusion that we are in fact referring to something that exists. Waiver is a great example of language gone on holiday. For, in truth, there is no such thing as waiver.

In § 31.8, we look at benefits from the perspective of temporal application. Temporal application encompasses two discrete questions. First, and most importantly, can the Bill of Rights benefit persons retrospectively? Secondly, which Constitution, Interim or Final, applies to matters in respect of which the cause of action arose before the Final Constitution's commencement, but after the Interim Constitution's commencement, and are being heard now, after the Final Constitution's commencement? As one might expect, issues of temporal application will recede with time.

In § 31.6, we look at a question of benefits that will certainly not recede with the passage of time. That question is whether the Bill of Rights has extraterritorial effect. This question itself generates two different, though related, queries. When, if at all, does the Bill of Rights benefit some persons — and burden others — in disputes that occur beyond South Africa's borders? To what extent, if any, does the Bill of Rights benefit South African nationals in legal proceedings adjudicated in foreign courts by foreign states under foreign law. Both questions, but especially the latter, have troubled the Constitutional Court of late.

In § 31.5, we look at benefits in terms of how courts go about reconciling substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights and other constitutional provisions that appear, at first blush, to conflict with one another. While the Bill of Rights contains a number of operational provisions that guide the courts with respect to conflicts between fundamental rights, no provision speaks directly to the resolution of tensions between Chapter 2 and non-Chapter 2 provisions. As a result, our courts have been obliged to develop doctrine designed to harmonize the demands of fundamental rights with the dictates of constitutional provisions that engage the exercise of power by various other branches or spheres of government.

By now it should be clear that talk about benefits is more than a mere throat clearing exercise. But, of course, what I really want to talk about is the big question: when and against whom can a beneficiary enforce her fundamental rights. The answer to this question appears, in various forms, in § 31.2, in § 31.4, and the appendix to this chapter.

In § 31.2, I rehearse briefly the terms and the outcome of the application debate under the Interim Constitution.[1] I do so because past is, quite obviously, prologue: the drafters of the Final Constitution spoke directly to concerns about the text of the Interim Constitution; the Constitutional Court accepts the invitation of the drafters of the Final Constitution's invitation to revisit — and to recast — the application doctrine developed under the Interim Constitution. In addition to an abbreviated analysis of the Court's application doctrine under the Interim Constitution, § 31.2 contains an assessment of the general jurisprudential concerns that framed the initial debate and that recur, albeit in transmogrified form, under the Final Constitution.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

This discussion retains its currency because I have chosen not to repeat these arguments within § 31.4.

In § 31.4, I take on more immediate concerns of what application doctrine is, and ought to be, under the Final Constitution. My manner of approach to application doctrine in § 31.4 warrants a few prefatory remarks.

§ 31.4 begins with the Constitutional Court's articulation of the black letter law on application in Khumalo v Holomisa.[1] The Khumalo Court does not explain in any detail what the various sections of FC s 8 mean or how they are designed to work. This lack of transparency requires me to offer a good faith reconstruction — an amplification if you will — of the application doctrine articulated by the Khumalo Court.

This good faith reconstruction cannot be the last word on the application doctrine under the Final Constitution. Although the good faith reconstruction fleshes out the Khumalo Court's conclusions in a manner that coheres with the judgment's various textual and jurisprudential premises, even a reconstructed Khumalo is unsatisfactory and, ultimately, unredeemable.

§ 31.4 engages this good faith reconstruction in a number of different ways. § 31.4 sets out four primary doctrinal objections to the Khumalo Court's statement of the law. These four objections are grounded, to varying degrees, in conflicting statements by the Constitutional Court — as well as courts of more general jurisdiction — about what each of the subsections in FC s 8 and FC s 39 should be understood to mean. § 31.4 thus offers an account of a second body of black letter law: namely, what the courts have said the discrete subsections — FC ss 8(1), 8(2), 8(3) and 39(2) — denote. (For lawyers, jurists and academics who only want to know what the courts have said about FC ss 8(1), 8(2), 8(3) and 39(2), § 31.4 provides an exhaustive account.) This black letter law governs subjects as diverse as the meaning of the term 'all law', the binding of the judiciary, the legislature, the executive and organs of state, how the common law is to be developed and transformed, the creation of new remedies under the Bill of Rights, as well as such doctrines as reading down, shared constitutional interpretation, stare decisis and objective normative value systems.

In an ideal world, the general framework articulated in Khumalo would be internally (logically) consistent and would be externally consistent with (map directly on to) the courts' express understanding of what the specific sections in FC s 8 and FC s 39 signify and the manifold doctrines they generate. In other words, Khumalo would provide the edifice, and other cases that had a bearing on our understanding of application would slot neatly into its structure. As we shall see in § 31.4, the dissonance created by the disjunction between the black letter law on the general framework for application analysis and the black letter law on the meaning of its various textual components constitutes one of the primary grounds for rejecting the Court's current application doctrine. In its stead, § 31.4 offers a preferred reading that meets all of the doctrinal objections to Khumalo and, concomitantly, gives each of the constituent parts of the text, and the related doctrines they generate, a reading that fits the general framework for application.

For those readers who wish to immerse themselves in the finer points of application doctrine, a detailed appendix takes stock of the most important interventions made by other commentators on this subject. These academic contributions ought not to be considered mere arcana. At their best, these arguments develop, in full, theories of application merely hinted at in judicial opinions and about which the text is, inevitably, mute.

[1] Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo').

I hope that this road map gives the general reader an initial sense of how this chapter addresses the existing law on application. To further facilitate this understanding, I have set out directly below both a brief account of the black letter law — and a digest of my preferred readings — under both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution. This discursive effort is followed by two decision trees that attempt to lay bare the mechanics of application analysis under the Interim Constitution after Du Plessis and under the Final Constitutional after Khumalo.

(b) Application Doctrine under the Interim Constitution

The Constitutional Court answered the question of burdens under the Interim Constitution in Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another.[1] The facts, the holdings, and the reasoning in that case are discussed at length below in § 31.2. This thumbnail sketch of Du Plessis merely adumbrates the choices that the Constitutional Court had before it under the Interim Constitution and some of the arguments that the Constitutional Court once again engaged, at least tacitly, in Khumalo under the Final Constitution.

According to the prevailing pre-Du Plessis discourse, the Constitutional Court had two options. It could take a vertical approach. On such a reading of the text, the Bill of Right's substantive provisions engaged directly only legal relationships between the state and the individual. It could take a horizontal approach. On such a reading, all legal relationships between the state and the individual and all legal relationships between private persons would have been subject to direct review for conformity with the specific substantive rights set out in IC Chapter 3.

Despite this basic difference in orientation, every jurist, practitioner or academic interpreting the Interim Constitution was committed to the following three propositions. Statutes, when relied upon by the state, were subject to constitutional review. Statutes, when relied upon by a private party in a private dispute, were subject to constitutional review. The common law, when relied upon by the state, was subject to constitutional review. Moreover, almost every jurist, practitioner and academic agreed that the heart of the application debate was whether the common law, when relied upon by a private party in a private dispute, was subject to constitutional review.

On this heart of the matter, the majority of the Constitutional Court in Du Plessis v De Klerk came firmly down on the side of verticality. The Du Plessis Court held that the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights of the Interim Constitution applied only to law emanating from the legislature or the executive and to the conduct of these two branches of government. Driven by a 'traditional' view of what constitutions do, and bewitched by a text that ostensibly did not apply to all law or bind the judiciary, the Du Plessis Court endorsed a doctrine whose most notable feature was its insulation of common law disputes between private parties from direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

[1] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('Du Plessis').

This chapter offers several demurrals to the Du Plessis doctrine. As three dissenting justices in Du Plessis noted, the text did not settle the debate. But it did lead the Du Plessis Court to the jurisprudentially untenable conclusion that while rules of common law that govern disputes between private parties are not subject to direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights, (because constitutions traditionally do not apply to relations between private parties), rules in statutes or regulations that govern disputes between private parties are subject to direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. So the 'fact' that a legal dispute is between private parties would appear to be a necessary but not a sufficient condition for the Du Plessis Court's conclusion. Indeed, it is hard to know whether it should be called a 'condition' at all. I call the very logic of the Du Plessis Court into question because whether the law governing a dispute between private parties was subject to direct application under the Interim Constitution was entirely and fortuitously contingent upon the form the law took. Embedded in the Du Plessis Court's differential treatment of these two bodies of law is the premise that the common law — unlike legislation — protects a private ordering of social life that is neutral between the interests of various social actors. That premise is false. Moreover, abstention from constitutional review of common-law rules functions as a defence of deeply entrenched and radically inegalitarian distributions of wealth and power by immunizing from review those rules of property, contract and delict that sustain those inegalitarian distributions. The differential treatment of the two bodies of law also rests on a traditional distinction between the public realm and the private realm. At a minimum, this distinction fails to recognize the extent to which the state structures all legal relationships. With the ineluctable erosion of the public-private divide, one of the last justifications for treating common law and legislation differently disintegrates as well. What we are left with is a doctrine that traditionally produces an incoherent body of decisions and that cannot explain why courts, perfectly capable of vindicating autonomy interests when asked to review statutory provisions governing private relationships for consistency with the Bill of Rights, prefer not to subject common-law rules governing private relationships to the same form of scrutiny.[1]

[1] I have employed the terms verticality and horizontality above and shall continue to do so in this chapter where necessary. However, it seems fairly clear that these two terms have outlived their usefulness and that the current debate over application warrants a change in nomenclature. The post-Khumalo black letter law on application and the preferred reading of those same application provisions eschew any mention of verticality or horizontality. The debate over application of the Bill of Rights is now best characterized solely in terms of direct and indirect application. Direct challenges describe instances in which the prescriptive content of at least one specific substantive provision of the Bill of Rights applies to the law or to the conduct at issue. Indirect challenges describe instances in which the prescriptive content of no specific provision of the Bill of Rights applies to the law or to conduct at issue. Indirect challenges rely upon the spirit, purport and objects of the entire Bill to interpret or to develop the law in order to settle the dispute before the court. (That is not to say that a specific right might not be relevant — in some way, say as value, and not as a rule — to an indirect challenge. I only claim that there must be a distinction with a difference between the direct application of a right and the relevance of a right to a more amorphous assessment of whether a rule of law remains in step with the general spirit of our constitutional order. See Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)(On the difference between how constitutional norms operate as values and how they operate as rules.))

(c) Application Doctrine under the Final Constitution

Du Plessis effectively foreclosed debate on the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights to rules of common law governing private disputes. The drafters of the Final Constitution, however, reconsidered the Interim Constitution's provisional position on application. Unlike the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution's Bill of Rights points unequivocally toward a much broader conception of direct application: FC s 8(1) states that the Bill applies to 'all law' and binds 'the judiciary'; FC s 8(2) states that the provisions of the Bill will bind private persons.

In Khumalo, the Constitutional Court accepted the Final Constitution's invitation to broaden its conception of the law and the relationships to which the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights apply directly. The signal difference between Du Plessis and Khumalo is that the Khumalo Court reads FC s 8(2) to mean that some of the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights will apply directly to some disputes between private parties some of the time.

The black letter law on application in terms of Khumalo takes the following form.

FC 8(1) stands for the following two propositions:

- All law governing disputes between the state and natural persons or juristic persons is subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.
- All state conduct that gives rise to disputes betwen the state and natural persons or juristic persons is likewise subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

FC 8(2) stands for the following proposition:

- Disputes between natural persons and/or juristic persons may be subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights, if the specific right asserted is deemed to apply.

FC 8(3) stands for the following proposition:

- Where direct application of the right asserted occurs in terms of FC s 8(2), and the court further finds a non-justifiable abridgment of that right, then the court must develop the law in a manner that gives adequate effect to the right infringed.[1]

For reasons the judgment does not adequately explain, the Khumalo Court chose to ignore FC s 8(1)'s injunction that the Bill of Rights applies to 'all law'

[1] FC s 39(2), although not engaged expressly in Khumalo, stands, under a secondary body of black letter law, for the following three propositions:

- Where an asserted right is, under FC s 8(2), deemed not to apply directly to a dispute between private parties, the court may still develop the common law or interpret the apposite provision of legislation in light of the more general objects of the Bill of Rights.
- Even where a right is asserted directly, the court may still speak as if a finding of inconsistency or invalidity requires that a new rule of common law be developed in terms of FC s 39(2).

and binds 'the judiciary'. One might have thought that such an explanation was warranted, given that it was precisely the absence of these phrases — 'all law' and binds 'the judiciary' — in a comparable section of the Interim Constitution that led the Du Plessis Court to reach the conclusion that the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights did not apply directly to disputes between private parties governed by the common law. The Khumalo Court claims instead that had it given FC s 8(1) a gloss that ensured that the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights applied to all law-governed disputes between private parties — regardless of the provenance of the law — it would have rendered FC s 8(3) meaningless. That particular assertion is unfounded — or at the very least radically under-theorized.

While it is quite easy to poke holes in the gossamer thin fabric of Khumalo, such victories, pyrrhic as they are, do not advance understanding. In § 31.4, I offer a good faith reconstruction of Khumalo. This good faith reconstruction fleshes out the Khumalo Court's conclusions in a manner that simultaneously coheres with its jurisprudential commitments, avoids surplusage in so far as these commitments permit, and satisfies basic considerations of textual plausibility and naturalness. The good faith reconstruction begins with a perfectly understandable and workable distinction between a constitutional norm's range of application and that same norm's prescriptive content. The 'range of application' speaks to FC s 8(1)'s commitment to ensuring that each and every genus of law is at least formally subject to the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. The 'prescriptive content' speaks both to FC s 8(2)'s invitation to apply the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private parties and to the interpretative exercise required to determine whether a given substantive provision of the Bill is meant to engage the kind of dispute before the court. However, even this effort to put Khumalo on the most solid footing possible comes up short in four significant ways.

The Khumalo Court quite consciously crosses over the public-private divide. The text of the Final Constitution left it little choice. But Khumalo's one step forward is followed by two steps back. Whereas all disputes between the state and an individual are subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights under the Final Constitution, Khumalo tells us that only some disputes between private parties will be subject to some of the provisions of the Bill of Rights. This revised public-private distinction in application jurisprudence creates the following anomaly.

In Du Plessis, the traditional view of constitutional review was used to suppress direct application of the Bill of Rights with respect to disputes between private parties governed by the common law. In Khumalo, the traditional view of constitutional review is used to defer — and potentially suppress — direct application of the Bill of Rights with respect to disputes between private parties. Here's the rub. Direct application is deferred — and by that I simply mean turned into a question of interpretation — with respect to all disputes between private parties. It matters not whether the law governing disputes between private parties is grounded in statute, subordinate legislation, regulation, common law or customary law. Put slightly differently, whereas the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights was understood to apply directly, and unequivocally, to legislation that governed private disputes, the Final Constitution's Bill of Rights does not. Less law is subject to the direct unqualified application of the Bill of Rights under the Khumalo Court's reading of the Final Constitution than it was under the Du Plessis Court's reading of the Interim Constitution.

Doctrinal tension generates a second objection. The Constitutional Court has constructed a powerful set of doctrines in which (1) every exercise of state power is subject to constitutional review and (2) every law is subject to the objective theory of unconstitutionality. Much is rightly made of the Constitutional Court's bold assertion in Fedsure,[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers[2] and their progeny that all law derives its force from the basic law — the Final Constitution — and that all law, and all conduct sourced in the law, must as a logical matter be consistent with the basic law. Despite the first requirement — and despite the fact that FC s 8(1) applies to all law and binds both the legislature and the executive — primary legislation or subordinate legislation that governs a dispute between private persons will not necessarily be subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. Those same provisions in legislation or subordinate legislation would, however, automatically be subject to the direct application of the provisions of Bill of Rights if they were invoked by an individual in a dispute with the State. The absurdity of this distinction is brought into even sharper relief by the Court's own doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. (The relative desuetude of this doctrine is offset by the fact that it has, as yet, not been repudiated by the Constitutional Court.[3]) In its most general form, the doctrine holds that the validity or the invalidity of any given law is in no way contingent upon the parties to the case. If a provision of legislation would be deemed to be unconstitutional when invoked by an individual in a dispute between the State and an individual, then it must likewise be unconstitutional when invoked by an individual in a dispute between that individual and another individual. However, the Court's differentiation between FC s 8(1) disputes that are invariably subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights and FC s 8(2) disputes that are not invariably subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights is logically incompatible with the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. The Khumalo application doctrine relies upon the ability to distinguish constitutional cases — and thus the constitutionality of laws — upon the basis of the parties before the court. The doctrine of objective unconstitutionality denies the ability to distinguish constitutional cases — and thus the constitutionality of laws — upon the basis of the parties before the court. This contradiction is a direct consequence of the Khumalo Court's refusal to give the term 'all law' in FC s 8(1) its most obvious construction and the Court's preference for making FC s 8(2) the engine that drives the analysis of all disputes between private parties. Not even the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo can meet this second objection.

The third objection flows from the Khumalo Court's refusal to say anything about FC s 8(1)'s binding of the judiciary. Perhaps the most damning consequence of this structured silence is that it offends a canon of constitutional interpretation relied upon by Justice O'Regan in Khumalo itself: 'We cannot adopt an interpretation which would render a provision of the Constitution to be without any apparent purpose.'[1] Not only does Justice O'Regan refuse to give the provision 'any apparent purpose', we cannot, even on the good faith reconstruction, give it any apparent purpose. The good faith reconstruction gains its traction through a distinction between a constitutional norm's range of application and that same norm's prescriptive content. That creates the interpretational space to argue that while FC s 8(1) speaks to each specific constitutional norm's range of application — and does not distinguish one genus of law from another — FC s 8(2) speaks to the prescriptive content of each specific constitutional norm and directs us to consider whether that prescriptive content ought to be understood to govern the private conduct of the private parties that constitutes the gravamen of the complaint. This good faith reconstruction does no work with respect to the phrase 'binds the judiciary' because the distinction between 'range' and 'prescriptive content' engages the relationship between constitutional norms and ordinary law. It does not speak to the provenance of a given law. The reason it cannot be recast in a manner that speaks to the differing concerns of FC s 8(1) and FC s 8(2) is that FC s 8(2) does not concern itself with our different law-making institutions — legislative, executive or judicial. What is left? A weak reading in which the judiciary is bound — not in terms of the 'law' it makes — but purely in terms of its 'conduct' (or 'non-law-making conduct'). It seems to me to defy both logic and common sense to argue that when FC s 8(1) binds the legislature and the judiciary, it means to bind the actions of legislators or judges solely in their personal capacity. When we bind the legislature, we must bind both the law it makes and the non-law-making actions it takes. The text offers no reason to treat the judiciary any differently. While we do want state actors — legislators and judges alike — to care about the manner in which they comport themselves, we care primarily about the law they make. But that is not what Khumalo says, nor can it be reconstructed in such a manner as to say so.

[1] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure').

[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of The Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers').

[3] See Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In re Financial Services Board v Van der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) at para 20 ('This court has adopted the doctrine of objective constitutional invalidity.') See also De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)(Confirms continued validity of doctrine.)

The final objection to Khumalo's construction of FC s 8 turns on the style of the argument. In short, before Justice O'Regan decides whether to engage the applicant's exception to the action in defamation in terms of freedom of expression, she has already concluded: (a) that the law of defamation is in pretty good shape post-Bogoshi;[2] (b) that freedom of expression is important but not central to an open and democratic society; and (c) that dignity — especially as viewed through the lens of reputation — is of paramount concern. Only after having reached these conclusions does Justice O'Regan decide that this matter warrants direct application of freedom of expression to the common law of defamation in a dispute between private parties. Based upon the Court's own jurisprudence and our good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, a court should first decide whether the provisions of Chapter 2 apply to the dispute before the court. If, as in Khumalo, the court determines that freedom of expression applies directly, then the generally accepted approach to rights analysis has us begin with a determination of the scope of freedom of expression and follows with an assessment of whether the law of defamation constitutes a prima facie infringement of that right. In Khumalo, it would most certainly have been found to be such. The second question is whether the law of defamation — as currently constructed — is a justifiable limitation of the right to freedom of expression. Instead, the judgment looks, in manner of delivery, much like the kind of judgment in which, under FC s 39(2), the common law is developed via indirect application of the Bill of Rights.

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 32.
[2] National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA)('Bogoshi').

The style of the judgment suggests that the Khumalo Court considers it relatively unimportant to engage this dispute as if, in fact, direct application takes place. Or more accurately, by packaging Khumalo as if it were simply a common law judgment, the Khumalo Court intimates that the difference between direct application and indirect application of the Bill of Rights is minimal, if not non-existent. I might be inclined to accept this elision of the analytical processes required by FC s 8 and FC s 39(2) were it not for the fact that the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court have handed down judgments regarding constitutional jurisdiction, stare decisis and indirect application under FC s 39(2) that manifest a clear desire not to disturb settled bodies of common law precedent and that cannot help but immunize a substantial body of apartheid-era decisions from reconsideration by lower courts. This claim requires some amplification.

Leaving aside the problem of surplusage raised by our courts' occasional interchangeable use of FC s 8 and FC s 39(2), the Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox,[1] extending the reasoning of the Constitutional Court in Walters,[2] has held that there is at least one critical difference between direct application under FC s 8 and indirect application under FC s 39(2). A High Court may revisit pre-constitutional Appellate Division precedent only where a party has a colourable claim grounded in the direct application of a substantive provision of the Bill of Rights. High Courts may not alter existing common law precedent (whether pre-constitutional or post-constitutional) through indirect application of FC s 39(2). (The rest of our appellate courts' novel doctrine of constitutional stare decisis further constrains the High Courts' constitutional jurisdiction.) What happens when our appellate courts' marry this restrictive doctrine of stare decisis to an incrementalist gloss on indirect application in terms of FC s 39(2)? It spawns an application doctrine that effectively disables the High Court from undertaking meaningful constitutional review of existing common law precedent (as well as all other constructions of law) and thereby protects 'traditional' conceptions of law and existing legal hierarchies. This observation about the manner in which our existing array of application doctrines — as well as related doctrines of stare decisis and constitutional jurisdiction — conspire to blunt the transformative potential of the basic law is one of the strongest rejoinders to those jurists and commentators who have suggested that whether one relies upon FC s 8 (1) or FC s 8 (2), or FC s 39(2), the song remains the same: namely, how should the law governing a dispute be developed, re-formulated or re-interpreted?

[1] Afrox Healthcare Bpk. v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox').

[2] Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters').

There is a better way. In § 31.4, I offer a preferred reading that satisfies the demands of naturalness, textual plausibility, coherence, surplusage and ideology, and, just as importantly, meets the objections lodged against both Khumalo and the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo. That preferred reading takes the following form.

FC s 8(1) covers 'all law' — regardless of provenance, form, and or the parties before the court. FC s 8(1) also covers all state conduct — by all branches of government and all organs of the state — whether that conduct takes the form of law or reflects some other manifestation or exercise of state power.[1] In sum, FC s 8(1) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- All rules of law and every exercise of state power are subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

FC s 8(2) covers dispute-generating conduct between private actors not 'adequately' governed by an express rule of law. There are two basic ways to read 'not governed adequately by an express rule of law.' First, it could contemplate the possibility of a dispute over an aspect of social life that is not currently governed by any rule of law at all. Such instances are rare. Indeed there is good reason to believe that such instances do not exist at all. The second and better reading views non-rule governed conduct in a much narrower sense. In many instances a body of extant rules — or even background norms — may be said to govern a particular set of private relationships. FC s 8(2) calls our attention to the fact that these rules of law may not give adequate effect to the specific substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights and may require the courts to develop a new rule of law that does give adequate effect to a particular provision in the Bill of Rights in so far as a dispute between private persons requires it to do so. In sum, FC s 8(2) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- While, on the Hohfeldian view, a body of extant legal rules — or background norms — will always govern a social relationship, those same rules will not always give adequate effect to a provision in the Bill of Rights. FC s 8(2) calls attention to the potential gap between extant rules of law and the prescriptive content of the Bill of Rights, and, where necessary, requires the courts to bridge that gap by bringing the law into line with the demands of particular constitutional norms.

[1] The cosmology of common law jurisdictions is such that some lawyers express discomfort with the notion that a common law rule found inconsistent with the Final Constitution could occasion a finding of invalidity. But that locution is, in fact, endorsed by the Constitutional Court. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 556 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 73 (Court declares 'common-law offence of sodomy . . . inconsistent with the 1996 Constitution and invalid.') See also Shabalala v Attorney General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC); S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)(Court notes that a finding of inconsistency with respect to common law may occasion an order that goes beyond invalidity to develop a new rule of law.)

If we decide that the right invoked engages the conduct in question and that the right has been unjustifiably infringed, then we move on to FC s 8(3). FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b) enjoin the court to develop new rules of law and remedies designed to give effect to the right infringed. Thus, where FC s 8(2) acknowledges gaps in existing legal doctrine, FC s 8(3) aims to fill those gaps. In sum, FC s 8(3) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- If the court finds that the right relied upon warrants direct application to the conduct that has given rise to the dispute, and further finds a non-justifiable abridgment of the right, then the mechanisms in FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b) must be used to develop the law in a manner that gives adequate effect to the right infringed.

It may be, however, that the prescriptive content of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights does not engage the rule of law or conduct at issue. Two things can happen. A court can decide that the Bill of Rights has nothing at all to say about the dispute in question. A court can decide that although no specific provision of the Bill of Rights is offended by the law or the conduct in question, the Bill of Rights warrants the development of the law in a manner that coheres with its general spirit, purport and objects. In sum, FC s 39(2) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- Where no specific right can be relied upon by a party challenging a given rule of law or the extant construction of a rule of law, the courts are obliged to interpret legislation or to develop the law in light of the general objects of the Bill of Rights.

The preferred reading, unlike the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, is untroubled by fortuitous differences between forms of law. It does not suppress or defer application of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private persons governed by either legislation or common law. The preferred reading, unlike the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, generates no tension between the legality principle and the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. It recognises all forms of law as exercises in state power and makes each and every exercise of state power subject to constitutional review. It does not rest on a distinction between the parties before the court and thus does not offend the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. The preferred reading, unlike the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, does not offend the surplusage canon of constitutional interpretation. It alone gives the phrase 'binds the judiciary' meaningful content by recognising that the phrase engages all emanations of law from the courts. The preferred reading, unlike the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, is not plagued by a host of conflicting doctrinal commitments that blunt the transformative potential of the Bill of Rights. Proper apportionment of analytical responsibilities between FC s 8(1), FC s 8(2), FC 8(3) and FC 39(2) finesses the many difficulties created by a hide-bound doctrine of stare decisis that permits little, if any, development of the common law in light of FC s 39(2). The arguments that support the preferred reading of Chapter 2's application provisions are explored at length in § 31.4 below.[1]

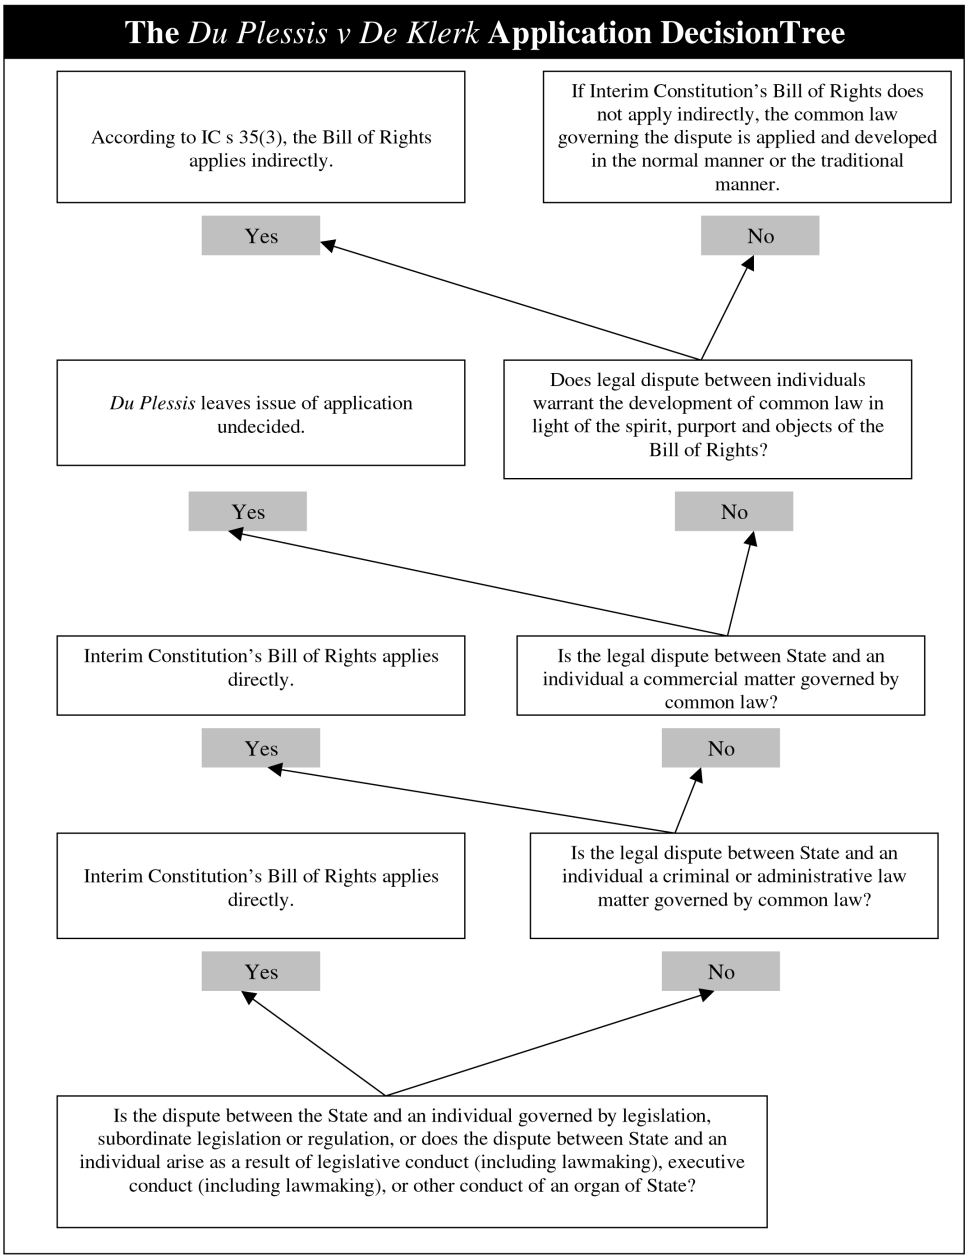
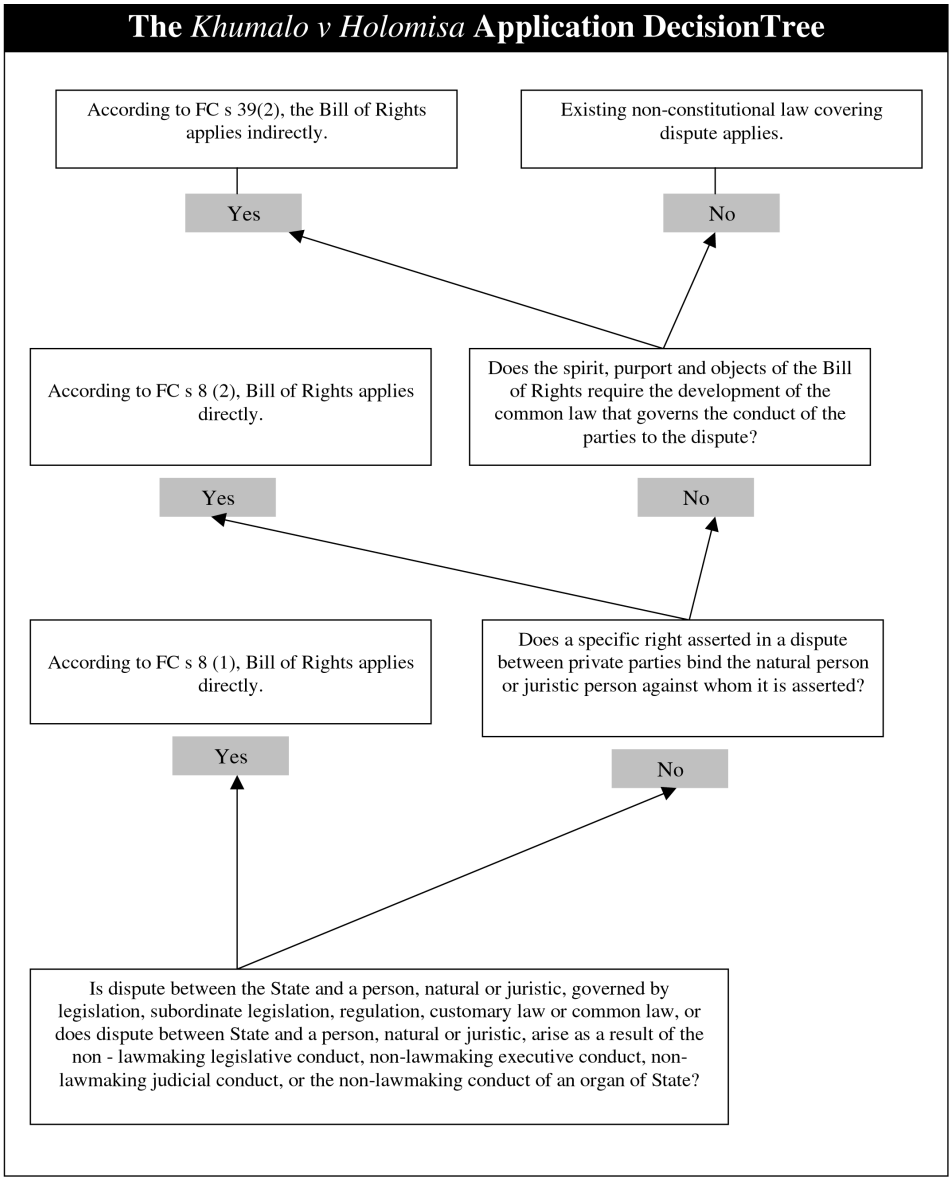
[1] A caveat and a codicil are in order.

The caveat is that there is no unassailable answer to the question of burdens raised by FC s 8. Shoddy drafting left us with a text — FC s 8 — that generates multiple possible readings and that resists a simple mechanical explanation because its component parts are difficult to reconcile. That does not mean that no grounds exist for preferring one reading over another. Indeed, the appropriate response to that standard academic trope — 'so what' — is to construct an analytical framework for direct application under FC s 8 that coheres with the manifold doctrinal demands of indirect application, stare decisis, the rule of law, constitutional jurisdiction, objective unconstitutionality, textual plausibility and naturalness. This chapter constitutes one such answer.

The codicil reflects the recognition that questions of application in terms of FC s 8 are, at bottom, questions of interpretation. This proposition has two dimensions: one logical, one historical. As a logical matter, we could function perfectly well without a provision on application. Whether the provenance of the law at issue or nature of the parties before the court have some bearing on the disposition of a matter could well be accommodated as part of the interpretation of a right. The presence of FC s 8 reflects the judgment of the drafters that our Final Constitution must speak to the application of the Bill to the exercise of both public and private power, and that constitutional texts have always done so (even where those texts have operated to protect existing hierarchies of private power.) Because the drafters of the Final Constitution set their face against the traditional immunization of certain kinds of private dispute from constitutional review, all legal disputes are now notionally subject to the strictures of the Bill of Rights. As a result, the line drawing exercise that animated the debate around the Interim Constitution's application provisions ought to have proved of diminished import by now. That the application debate has not withered away cannot be explained by the logic of the text alone. The text points towards such a withering away. The continued debate over application reflects the extent to which the meaning of our basic law is determined by extant historical conditions: the echo of the Interim Constitution, the limited jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court versus the plenary jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal and, perhaps most importantly, the felt need to chart a careful course between the Scylla of transformation and the Charybdis of tradition.



The Du Plessis v De Klerk Application DecisionTree
According to IC s 35(3), the Bill of Rights applies indirectly.
If Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights does not apply indirectly, the common law governing the dispute is applied and developed in the normal manner or the traditional manner.
Yes
No
Du Plessis leaves issue of application undecided.
Does legal dispute between individuals warrant the development of common law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights?
Yes
No
Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights applies directly.
Is the legal dispute between State and an individual a commercial matter governed by common law?
Yes
No
Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights applies directly.
Is the legal dispute between State and an individual a criminal or administrative law matter governed by common law?
Yes
No
Is the dispute between the State and an individual governed by legislation, subordinate legislation or regulation, or does the dispute between State and an individual arise as a result of legislative conduct (including lawmaking), executive conduct (including lawmaking), or other conduct of an organ of State?



The Khumalo v Holomisa Application DecisionTree
According to FC s 39(2), the Bill of Rights applies indirectly.
Existing non-constitutional law covering dispute applies.
Yes
No
According to FC s 8 (2), Bill of Rights applies directly.
Does the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights require the development of the common law that governs the conduct of the parties to the dispute?
Yes
No
According to FC s 8 (1), Bill of Rights applies directly.
Does a specific right asserted in a dispute between private parties bind the natural person or juristic person against whom it is asserted?
Yes
No
Is dispute between the State and a person, natural or juristic, governed by legislation, subordinate legislation, regulation, customary law or common law, or does dispute between State and a person, natural or juristic, arise as a result of the non - lawmaking legislative conduct, non-lawmaking executive conduct, non-lawmaking judicial conduct, or the non-lawmaking conduct of an organ of State?

31.2 Application under the Interim Constitution

(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Du Plessis v De Klerk[1]

(i) Facts

In 1993 the Pretoria News published a series of articles dealing with the supply of arms by South Africa to UNITA in Angola. The articles suggested that private air operators and airstrip owners — the plaintiffs — were aiding the Department of Foreign Affairs in fuelling the Angolan war.

The plaintiffs instituted a defamation action in May 1993. The defendants filed pleas denying that the articles suggested wrongful conduct by the plaintiffs or defamed the plaintiffs. The defendants argued, in the alternative, that even if the articles were defamatory, they were published in the public interest. In October 1994 — after the Interim Constitution came into effect — the defendants asked to amend their plea in order to claim that the right of freedom of expression, IC s 15, afforded them a new defence.[2]

(ii) Holding

The court held that the substantive provisions of Bill of Rights of the Interim Constitution were not, in general, capable of application to any legal relationship other than that between legislative or executive organs of state at all levels of government and natural or juristic persons. In particular, IC s 15, freedom of expression, was not capable of application to any legal relationship other than that between persons and legislative or executive organs of the state at all levels of government and natural or juristic persons.

[1] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC). The leading judgment and the court's order in Du Plessis was written by Kentridge AJ and concurred in by Chaskalson P, Langa, O'Regan, and Ackermann JJ. While Ackermann J concurred with both the judgment and the order of Kentridge AJ, he authored a separate judgment designed to amplify points made in Kentridge AJ's decision. Sachs J also concurred with the judgment and order of Kentridge AJ, but suggested that there were alternative grounds for the judgment. Mahomed DP penned a separate judgment, but agreed with the order as formulated by Kentridge AJ. Langa J and O'Regan J concurred with Mohamed J's judgment. Mokgoro J concurred with the judgment and order proposed by Kentridge AJ, agreed with Mahomed DP and added an opinion of her own. Kriegler J dissented from the majority's judgments and order regarding application under the Interim Constitution. He was joined in his dissent by Didcott J. Madala J agreed with the majority's order regarding retrospectivity, but dissented from the majority's order regarding application.

[2] See De Klerk & Another v Du Plessis & Others 1995 (2) SA 40, 46–47 (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124, 130–131 (T). Van Dijkhorst J refused the defendant's application to amend on two grounds: IC s 241(8) precluded retrospective application of the Constitution, IC s 15 did not apply horizontally and thus could not be invoked as a defence in a civil action for defamation. He wrote: 'Traditionally bills of rights have been inserted in constitutions to strike a balance between governmental power and individual liberty . . . It would . . . be correct . . . to take the view that our Constitution is a conventional constitution unless there are clear indications to the contrary.' The Constitutional Court requested argument on both points. With respect to the question of retrospectivity, the Constitutional Court held that the defendants were not entitled to invoke the provisions of the Interim Constitution. For a further discussion of retrospectivity, generally, and the holding on retrospectivity in Du Plessis, see § 31.8*(a)* infra. See also Cheryl Loots & Gilbert Marcus 'Jurisdiction and Procedures of the Court' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 6. Both Kentridge AJ and Mohamed DP wrote that IC s 98(6) might permit retrospective application 'in the interests of justice and good government.' See Du Plessis (supra) at paras 14 and 69. Retrospective application has, for obvious reasons, receded in importance over time.

Kentridge AJ did not limit his plurality judgment to these two propositions. A necessary consequence of these two general propositions was that while the constitutional guarantees of IC Chapter 3 could be invoked in private disputes where a litigant contended that a statutory provision relied upon by the other party impaired the exercise of a specific fundamental right enshrined in IC Chapter 3, the same guarantee could not be invoked in private disputes where a litigant contended that a rule of the common law relied upon by the other party was invalid. Not all rules of the common law were immunized from constitutional challenge. The majority held that governmental acts or omissions in reliance on the common law may have their consistency with specific substantive provisions of IC Chapter 3 challenged by a litigant in a dispute with the state.[1] This exception had a rider attached. Kentridge AJ was willing to find that common-law rules relied upon by government in its classically public activities — ie, the administration of criminal justice — could be attacked directly. He seemed far less inclined to allow common-law rules governing state activities in the commercial or contractual sphere to be similarly subject to direct attack. As if these various caveats and codicils were not enough, Kentridge AJ concluded that while the rights and freedoms in IC Chapter 3 did not generally have direct application to common-law rules governing legal relationships between individuals, it remained possible that a litigant in some future case could assert, successfully, that a particular provision of IC Chapter 3 must have direct application to such relationships. Barring such an eventuality, potential litigants could take solace in IC s 35(3). This section provided for the development of common-law rules in light of the 'spirit, purport and objects' of the Bill of Rights. But even this sop to those who wished to see the common law transformed had a disclaimer. Kentridge AJ wrote that the initial development of the common law was 'not a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court under s 98.'[2] Such initial development lay within the purview of Supreme Courts (now High Courts) and the Appellate Division (now the Supreme Court of Appeal).[3]

[1] See Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)(Common-law docket privilege relied upon by the state found unconstitutional.)

[2] Du Plessis (supra) at para 63.

[3] Kentridge AJ qualified this remark by writing that the Constitutional Court retains 'jurisdiction to determine what the spirit, purport and objects of Chapter 3 are and to ensure that, in developing the common law, the other courts have had due regard thereto.' Ibid. The exact boundaries of such limited appellate jurisdiction were left open to future cases. For a discussion of the effect of this decision on the assertion of constitutional jurisdiction by the AD and the SCA, as well as constraints that imposed on High Court constitutional jurisdiction, see Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There A Constitution in This Courtroom: Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38. The Constitutional Court has, under the Final Constitution, asserted its jurisdiction with respect to all constitutional matters means that 'all law' and every exercise of public power is potentially subject to review for compliance with the basic law. See Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC). See, generally, Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11. See also § 31.4*(e)(x)* infra (On the relationship between jurisdiction, stare decisis and the transformation of the common law.)

(b) Analysis of Du Plessis

(i) Court's approach to the text

For the Constitutional Court in Du Plessis, the provisions in IC Chapter 3 that had a bearing on application looked ineluctably vertical. The primary textual support for this reading flowed from IC ss 7(1), 7(2), 33(4) and 35(3).

IC s 7(1) appears to narrow IC Chapter 3's applicability to legislative and executive law-making and conduct. IC s 7(1) read: 'This Chapter shall bind all legislative and executive organs of state at all levels of government.' The clause was silent about the Chapter's extension to the judiciary and judicial decisions. The vertical reading of this structured silence is that the drafters meant to insulate judicial enforcement of the common law that governs private relations from constitutional review.[1]

Kentridge AJ read IC s 7(1) together with IC s 7(2). On this account, IC s 7(1) modified IC s 7(2)'s injunction that 'this Chapter shall apply to all law'. Rather than reading IC s 7(2) literally, so that all provisions at least notionally apply to all legal relationships, reading IC s 7(2) in light of the strictures of IC s 7(1) yields the traditional, vertical view. Statutes, subordinate legislation, regulation, executive conduct or legislative conduct, when relied upon by the state, or which give rise to a dispute between the state and an individual, are subject to direct Bill of Rights review. Statutes, subordinate legislation, or regulations, when relied upon by a private party in a private dispute, are subject to direct Bill of Rights review. The common law, when relied upon by the state, is (sometimes) subject to direct Bill of Rights review. Private disputes governed by the common law are not subject to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

Kentridge AJ's gloss on IC s 35(3) provides further support for this thesis. IC s 35(3) read:

> In the interpretation of any law and the application and development of common law and customary law, a court shall have due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of this Chapter. (Emphasis added).

The phrase 'the application and development of the common law' was said to reflect the intent of the drafters of the Interim Constitution not to extend the Bill of Rights' application directly to the common law and, particularly, the private relations governed by the common law. If the drafters had intended unqualified, [1] See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights Tenth Report 4, 31 (5 October 1993). See also Lourens M du Plessis & Jacques de Ville 'Bill of Rights Interpretation in the South African Context (3): Comparative Perspectives and Future Prospects' (1993) 4 Stellenbosch LR 356, 390; Hugh Corder 'Towards a South African Constitution' (1994) 57 Modern LR 491, 511. The argument that the textual silence reflects an intentional omission of the judiciary is that much more compelling when IC s 7(1) is compared with IC s 4(2) and when one consults the full set of technical committee notes. Unlike IC s 7(1), IC s 4(2) states that the Interim Constitution 'shall bind all legislative, executive and judicial organs of state at all levels of government'. The notes of the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights demonstrate that the committee flirted repeatedly with the inclusion of the judiciary in the application clause. It then decided against inclusion.

direct application, so the argument went, this provision would have been unnecessary. At the same time, the drafters were said to have wished the rights enshrined in IC Chapter 3 to permeate the entire legal culture.[1] They made provision, through IC s 35(3), for the Bill of Rights to influence the interpretation of law produced by non-legislative and non-executive branches or organs of the state.

(ii) An alternative approach to the text

That was not the only way to read IC ss 7(1), 7 (2) and 35 (3). Several disabling strategies were available.[2] First, IC ss 7(1) and (2) could have been read sequentially — not cumulatively. IC s 7(2)'s broad injunction that IC Chapter 3 applies to 'all law' might have meant that 'all law' was subject to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.[3] Second, IC s 7(1) continues to do work even after one concludes that it need not modify IC s 7(2). IC s 7(1) rejects the age-old principle that Parliament and the executive were neither bound by their own acts nor subject to substantive review of the content of the laws they promulgated.[4] Third, while it may have been accurate to claim that IC s 35(3) appears in Chapter 3 as a sop to those who would have preferred unqualified direct application and to ensure some seepage of fundamental rights into common law disputes between private parties, it was not necessary to read the section as Kentridge AJ did. The section could just as well have meant that, in the

[1] See Lourens M du Plessis 'A Note on the Application, Interpretation, Limitation and Suspension Clauses in South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights' (1994) 5 Stellenbosch LR 86, 88 (A member of the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights which drafted the section, Du Plessis writes: 'Section 35(3) is the provision allowing for a seepage of the provisions of Chapter 3 to horizontal relationships by requiring a court interpreting any law and applying and developing the common law and customary law, to have due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of the chapter.') See also Lourens Du Plessis 'The Genesis of the Provisions concerned with the Application and Interpretation of the Chapter on Fundamental Rights in South Africa's Transitional Constitution' (1994) 4 TSAR 706, 711 ('There were . . . quid pro quos for the deletion (in s 7) of explicit reference to the (possible) horizontal operation of Chapter 3. The first one is reflected in the present s 35(3)'); Martin Brassey 'Labour Relations under the New Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 179, 187 ('[Section] 35(3) . . . is an enemy, not a friend, of those who say private action is reviewable [directly] under the Chapter.')

[2] More detailed critiques of Kentridge AJ's textual arguments appear in the first edition of this work. See Stu Woolman 'Application' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) §§ 10.3*(a)(i), 10.3(a)(v), and 10(3)(b)*. The entire first edition is housed at www.chr.up.ac.za. See also Stu Woolman & Dennis Davis 'The Last Laugh: Du Plessis v De Klerk, Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and Application under the Interim and the Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361.

[3] See Du Plessis (supra) at para 129 (Kriegler J, in dissent, maintained just that.)

[4] See Motala & Another v University of Natal 1995 (3) BCLR 374, 381 - 382 (D)('It seems to me that the reason for the presence of s 7(1) is to stress that the State and its minions are to honour the entrenched rights both in legislation and administration.') The new principle — that the legislative and executive branches of government have a duty to make good the promise of the rights enshrined in Chapter 3 — which was implicit in both readings of IC 7(1) was made explicit in FC s 1 (c), FC s 7(1) and FC s 7(2). FC s 7(2) reads: 'The state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.' FC s 7(1) reads: 'This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa.' FC s 1*(c)* reads, in relevant part: 'The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on . . . (c) Supremacy of the constitution.' Indeed, it is worth considering whether such a reading was the only way to make sense of the socio-economic rights enshrined in IC ss 29, 30(1)(c) and 32. See, eg, Sandy Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chasklason (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33.

'interpretation of any law and the application and the development of common law and customary law' in a context where no specific constitutional right is asserted, a court should infuse its interpretation of the law with the general values of the Chapter.[1] Such an interpretation treats, statute, subordinate legislation, regulation, common law and customary law as equally appropriate objects for constitutional infusion. When so read, IC s 35(3) is neutral on the issue as to whether the rights in IC Chapter 3 apply vertically or horizontally, directly or indirectly.[2] It certainly would not have been, as Kentridge AJ contended,

[1] The Constitutional Court places exactly this spin on FC s 39 (2). See § 31.4*(e)* infra.

[2] Kentridge AJ's judgment inadvertently advertises several other disabling strategies. First, he argues that although the limitation clause, IC s 33(1), applies to all law of general application, including common law, 'applying 33(1) to private relationships governed by the common law seems almost insurmountable.' Du Plessis (supra) at para 55. Why? According to Kentridge AJ:

> The common law addresses problems of conflicting rights and interests through a system of balancing. Many of these rights and interests are now recorded in the Constitution and on any view that means that as a result of the terms of the Constitution the balancing process previously undertaken may have to be reconsidered. A claim for defamation, for instance, raises a tension between the right to freedom of expression and the right to dignity. The common-law compromise has been to limit both rights to a certain extent, allowing damages to be recovered for what is regarded as 'unlawful expression' but allowing 'dignity' to be infringed in circumstances considered to be privileged. Section 33(1) could hardly be applied to such a situation.

Ibid. But Kentridge AJ contradicts both himself and the existing precedent of the Court. He had already agreed that IC s 33(1) applied to rules of common law. See Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725, 736 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593, 1604 (CC)(Common-law docket privilege held unjustifiable under IC s 33(1) — 'law of general application within the meaning of s 33(1) would ordinarily include a rule of the common law.') Second, the fact that the common law as it currently exists tries to balance these competing rights does not mean that the existing body of defamation law has struck the balance correctly. The common law, like any other body of law, may have struck that 'balance' incorrectly. The Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution both require that we revisit these issues, and both clearly state that the limitations clause is one of the mechanisms by which such issues will be re-analysed. As we shall see below, the Khumalo Court expressly rejects Kentridge AJ's reasoning. The common law is just as susceptible to constitutional 'balancing' as any other form of law. Third, Kentridge AJ states that IC s 4 supports the proposition that the rights in IC Chapter 3 do not apply directly to common law rules that govern private disputes. He notes that while IC s 4 states that any law inconsistent with the Interim Constitution must be nullified and that the Interim Constitution binds the legislature, the executive and the judiciary, it contains the proviso 'unless otherwise provided expressly or by necessary implication in this Constitution.' He then concludes that 'if on a proper construction of Chapter 3, [the Bill of Rights] . . . operation is intended to be vertical only, the [horizontal] argument based on s 4 loses any force which it may have had.' Du Plessis (supra) at para 48. But this conclusion simply begs the central question. Do the provisions of Chapter 3 — and provisions found elsewhere in the Interim Constitution — 'necessarily imply' that acts of the judiciary and common law disputes between private parties are not directly subject to the rights and freedoms enshrined in the Chapter? On its own, IC s 4(1)'s proviso does no work in favour of Kentridge AJ's position. Finally, Kentridge AJ's argues that direct unqualified application cannot be squared with the Constitutional Court's limited jurisdiction:

> If . . . [IC] s 15 had a direct horizontal application the task of formulating an appropriate law of defamation would fall to this Court on appeal. But that could not be reconciled with our limited jurisdiction under IC s 98(2). Our jurisdiction, which is to interpret, protect and enforce the provisions of the Constitution, cannot empower us to choose one among a number of possible rules of common law all of which may be consistent with the Constitution. It would be equally impossible, for reasons which I have already explained, for this Court simply to declare that a particular rule of the law of defamation is invalid, leaving a lacuna in the law.

Ibid at para 59. This reasoning suffers from several flaws. First, IC s 98(2) did not expressly or implicitly preclude the Constitutional Court from exercising the inherent power to craft new rules of law and to superfluous.[1]

(c) Jurisprudence of Du Plessis

The Du Plessis Court, and other advocates of a vertical approach to application, offered a concatenation of history lessons, liberal politics and democratic theory create new remedies. IC s 98(2) simply defined the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Kentridge AJ then contends that that 'the Constitution allows for the development of the common law and customary law by the Supreme Court in accordance with the objects of Chapter 3' in terms of IC s 35(3). Ibid. But IC s 35(3) said absolutely nothing about the Supreme Court having exclusive jurisdiction over the development of the common law' and nothing in the text supports the Justice's inference that 'the requisite development of the common law and customary law is not to be pursued through the exercise of the powers of this Court under section 98 of the Constitution.' Ibid at para 60. (Under FC s 39(2), the Constitutional Court has asserted the power to ensure that all courts have developed the common law — or interpreted legislation — as the 'objective normative value system' manifest in the Bill of Rights requires. See §§ 31.4*(e)*(viii) infra.) Finally, according to Justice Kentridge, IC s 33(4) would also have been unnecessary if the Chapter's rights were meant to have direct horizontal application. IC s 33(4) read: 'This Chapter shall not preclude measures designed to prohibit unfair discrimination by bodies and persons other than those bound in terms of section 7(1).' Proponents of this position argued that unless the Chapter's extension was limited to the bodies bound by IC s 7(1) — unless the vertical reading was assumed — the drafters would not have needed to ensure that some other line of attack on private discrimination was possible. See Lourens Du Plessis 'The Genesis of the Provisions Concerned with the Application and Interpretation of the Chapter on Fundamental Rights' (supra) at 712 (IC s 33(4) — 'the second quid pro quo [for deleting from s 7 explicit reference to the possible horizontal operation of Chapter 3] — was included at the insistence of the ANC as part of the limitation clause.') This conclusion is hardly inevitable. Whether IC s 33(4) was present or not, the legislature could pass legislation banning various kinds of private discrimination. IC s 33(4) does no more than attempt to immunize civil rights legislation affecting non-governmental bodies from such constitutional attacks. While IC s 33(4) may have been a quid pro quo for deleting references to horizontal application from IC s 7(1), such horse-trading does not alter the words of IC s 33(4). The words support neither a vertical reading nor a horizontal reading of IC Chapter 3. See Stu Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) §§ 12.11, for more on IC s 33(4) and the extent of its success in immunizing civil rights legislation from review.

[1] Kriegler J offered similar textual arguments in his dissenting opinion. Du Plessis (supra) at para 128. One argument, not discussed above, is that IC ss 4(1) and (2) were meant to support the proposition that all three branches of government — the judiciary expressly included — were subject to the dictates of the Interim Constitution. IC Section 4(2) reads: 'This Constitution shall bind all legislative, executive and judicial organs of state at all levels of government.' In short, all decisions by all branches of government are to be subject to and subordinate to the Constitution. Judicial decisions applying, interpreting or developing the common law should therefore be subject to constitutional review. On the other hand, the presence of the term 'judiciary' in IC s 4 makes its absence palpable in IC s 7. The drafting history also makes clear that the committee charged with responsibility for crafting this section was quite familiar with the word and repeatedly toyed with its inclusion in the text. See, eg, Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights Fifth Report (11 June 1993)(Judiciary included); Sixth Report (15 July 1993)(Judiciary dropped); Seventh Report (29 July 1993)(Judiciary included); Tenth Report (21 August 1993)(Judiciary dropped). Martin Brassey contends that 'the cumulative effect of . . . these interpretive materials is simply too overwhelming to justify an argument based upon inadvertence.' Brassey 'Labour Relations' (supra) at 185. But the drafting history does not, in fact, close the book on a direct, unqualified approach to application. The pace of the drafting — and the political pressure on all parties to generate an 'acceptable' rather than an optimal product — suggests a somewhat unusual canon of interpretation: 'incompleteness'. See Motala v University of Natal 1995 (3) BCLR 374, 381–382 (D)('Given the high-powered, perhaps almost frantic milieu in which the Constitution was forged . . . it would be a mistake . . . to attribute too much significance to the presumption against redundancy and some of the other highly clinical tenets of interpretation at the risk of attributing too little to the professed spirit and objectives of the enactment.') in support of their claim that the application provisions of the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights ought to be restrictively interpreted.

Proponents of this approach began with the unassailable truism that the traditional function of most constitutions is to protect individuals from abuses of state power. They argued that we should not depart from this widely accepted model unless the text indicated clearly that another was intended.[1] This emphasis on the need to control state power is then used to explain why IC s 7(1), by not mentioning the judiciary, should be understood to place private disputes governed by the common law beyond the reach of the Bill of Rights.

Liberal theory places the following gloss on this public-private distinction. Because individuals and groups pursue the ends that give their lives meaning primarily within the private domain, we should be loath to endorse a mode of constitutional analysis that permits greater state interference in those relationships and practices we deem to be constitutive of our being.[2] There is, on the liberal account, no good reason to allow a judge to supplant the beliefs of individual citizens about the nature of the good life with her own idiosyncratic vision.

Democrats are likewise sceptical of any claims that judges possess such privileged access. However, democrats believe that state intervention in the private domain — and thus interference with individual conceptions of the good life — can be justified by reference to a more representative and legitimate decision-making body: the legislature. Democrats also insist that the legislature is better equipped institutionally than are the courts to tackle polycentric social problems.[3]

Textual arguments, supplemented by prudential concerns and comparative jurisprudence, largely exhaust Kentridge AJ's rhetorical strategies in Du Plessis. What is missing from the judgment is a principled engagement with the real issues underlying the application debate.[4]

[1] See De Klerk & Another v Du Plessis & Ohers 1995 (2) SA 40, 46–47 (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124, 130–131 (T)(Van Dijkhorst J)('Traditionally bills of rights have been inserted in constitutions to strike a balance between governmental power and individual liberty . . . It would . . . be correct . . . to take the view that our Constitution is a conventional constitution unless there are clear indications to the contrary.') See also Brassey 'Labour Relations' (supra) at 191 ('The normal role of a constitution is rather to establish and regulate the institutions of government than to . . . impose duties on private citizens. If the mandate had been to draw up the Final Constitution, the drafters might have been more adventurous; but in framing an Interim Constitution, designed to exist for a mere two years, they can be forgiven for preferring to progress gradually'); Peter Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition 1992) § 34.2*(g)*('In deciding that the Charter does not extend to private action, the Supreme Court of Canada has affirmed the normal role of a constitution. A constitution establishes and regulates the institutions of government, and it leaves to those institutions the task of ordering the private affairs of the people.')

[2] See, eg, Johan Van der Vyfer 'The Private Sphere in Constitutional Litigation' (1994) 57 THRHR 378, 388 ('As a matter of political freedom, excessive control by the state of purely private matters would result in a totalitarian regime.')

[3] One additional argument, which may have informed Kentridge AJ's jurisdictional concerns, was that if we extend the application of constitutional rights to private relationships, we risk diluting the effectiveness of fundamental rights as a brake on state power. See William Marshall 'Diluting Constitutional Rights: Rethinking "Rethinking State Action"' (1985) 80 Northwestern University LR 558, 569 ('Characterizing every shouting match or every decision with whom to associate as actions that may lead to constitutional liability is to trivialize the meaning of constitutional protection and thereby to weaken the force of a claim of 'true' constitutional violation by overexposure.')

[4] Kentridge AJ pauses to remark that 'difficulties and anomalies arise on the vertical as well as

(d) Critique of the Jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk

Critiques of the jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk fall into six basic categories: the fortuity of legal form; the inevitable arbitrariness in judicial application of the Bill of Rights; the artificial defence of the status quo; the untenability of the public-private distinction; judicial boundedness; and the specific pressures that South Africa's radically inegalitarian distributions of wealth and power places on the interpretation of the text of our basic law.

(i) Fortuity of form

On the Du Plessis Court's reading of IC s 7(1), whether or not law governing private relations was subject to the direct application of the substantive provisions in IC Chapter 3 was entirely contingent upon the form the law took. If a party to a dispute challenged legislation, then IC Chapter 3 applied to that law and the private relations that the law governed. If, on the other hand, the party challenged common-law rules governing a dispute (or challenged the conduct sanctioned by those common-law rules in a dispute) between private parties, then the substantive provisions of IC Chapter 3 did not apply directly. Laws governing private disputes were not, therefore, immunized entirely from direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

(ii) Arbitrariness of application

Foreign experience supports the thesis that such distinctions invite arbitrary enforcement. While application doctrines vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, the basic plot remains the same. Some decisions expand the parameters of state action to include behaviour and relationships heretofore thought of as private, while others strive to give content to the state/non-state action distinction in order to restrict the application of constitutional rights.[1]

In one case, a court might hold that since a company town possesses all the indicia of a regular municipality and provides all the services of a local government, it is legitimately subject to the same constitutional constraints that limit the horizontal approaches … [but] that the supposed irrationalities of the vertical interpretation are exaggerated.' Du Plessis (supra) at para 51. 'Such as there may be,' he writes 'flow from the structure and wording of the Constitution.' Justice Kentridge may have been correct in arguing that the text of the Interim Constitution pointed toward verticality. But a vertical approach's irrationalities, difficulties and anomalies were, and still are, issues entirely independent of the text. Kentridge AJ simply chose not to engage these broader jurisprudential problems. See, further, Stu Woolman & Dennis Davis 'The Last Laugh: Du Plessis v De Klerk, Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and Application under the Interim and the Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361.

[1] For basic statements of application doctrine in foreign jurisdictions, see Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v Dolphin Delivery (1987) 33 DLR (4th) 174, [1986] 2 SCR 573 (Canadian Charter applies to acts of the legislature and the executive, not courts, and thus not to common law governing private disputes); Luth 7 BVerfGE 198 (1958)(Although German Basic Law was primarily intended to protect individual liberty against state encroachment, the Bill also embodies an objective order of values that necessarily determines the broad outline of private law and public law); Civil Rights Cases 109 US 3 (1883)(State action consists of: (a) statutes or regulations enacted by national, state and local bodies; (b) the official actions of all government officers. The expansive understanding, reflected in Harlan J's dissent, asks whether a private actor is performing a government function or is sufficiently 'involved with' or 'encouraged by' the state to warrant being held to the state's constitutional obligations.) Even exercise of state power.[1] In another case, it might hold that despite the fact that modern shopping complexes tend to possess all the indicia of public forums and may acquire a monopoly on places suitable for effective political communication, their suppression of expressive conduct does not engage the constitution.[2] A court might hold that statutory authority for an arbitrator to make binding orders against an employer implicates the state and subjects the actions in question to constitutional scrutiny; in a subsequent matter, it may find that collective bargaining agreements governed by statute do not implicate the state.[3]

South African case law throws up similar anomalies. In one case, a creature of statute, the Health Professions Council — which fulfils the important public function of regulating medical practitioners — was deemed not to be an organ of state because it was not under the direct control of the state.[4] In another case, a creature of statute, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission — which fulfilled defenders of the vertical position tend to admit that current bodies of application or state action jurisprudence 'cannot be defended without resort to intellectual dishonesty.' See Marshall (supra) at 570. For a similar broadside by a long-time critic of the doctrine, see Lawrence Tribe 'Refocusing the 'State Action' Inquiry: Separating State Acts from State Actors' Constitutional Choices (1985) 246.

[1] See Marsh v Alabama 326 US 501 (1946)(Circumscribes the right of private property owners to engage in unconstitutional forms of discrimination by finding that a company town's refusal to allow a woman to distribute literature on behalf of the Jehovah's Witnesses was a violation of her free speech rights.)

[2] See Hudgens v NLRB 424 US 507 (1976)(No state action in judicial enforcement of common law of trespass — thus foreclosing possibility of a hearing on the merits of the freedom of speech challenge — and allows union to be barred from picketing a store in a shopping centre). Compare Burton v Wilmington Parking Authority 365 US 715 (1961)(US Supreme Court found that the refusal of the Eagle Coffee Shoppe — a private establishment located in a building owned and operated by an agency of the state of Delaware — to serve Mr Burton because he was African-American constituted a denial of Mr Burton's right to the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment) with Moose Lodge No 107 v Irvis 407 US 163 (1972)(US Supreme Court found that the refusal of the Moose Lodge — a privately owned club licensed by the Pennsylvania liquor board — to serve Mr Irvis, an African-American, because of his race did not constitute state action denying him equal protection of the law.) What does the variable nature of the court's intervention mean? Some commentators argue that the courts are willing to intervene in so-called private disputes where they believe that the most fundamental of fundamental rights are being violated. See Sue Davis 'The Supreme Court: Finding State Action . . . Sometimes' (1983) 26 Howard LR 1395, 1406 ('An examination of state action cases reveals that whether the nature and extent of the state involvement in a given case will be sufficient to constitute state action depends upon the importance of the interest sought to be vindicated by the party claiming discrimination, when weighed against the interests of the person said to discriminate.') Others argue that the courts' refusal to intervene in private disputes reflects the belief — however misguided — that the existing common law is neutral between the competing parties and that the courts ought not to disturb the private consensual ordering of social life. See Charles Black Jr 'Foreword: State Action, Equal Protection and California's Proposition 14' (1967) 81 Harvard LR 69; Cass Sunstein 'Lochner's Legacy' (1987) 87 Columbia LR 873.

[3] Compare Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson [1989] 1 SCR 1038, (1989) 59 DLR (4th) 416 (Adjudicator empowered under Canada Labour Code to make orders against employer held to be 'statutory creature' deriving all coercive powers from statute and state, and therefore subject to Charter) with Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union [1991] 2 SCR 211, (1991) 81 DLR (4th) 545 (Closed-shop provision in collective bargaining agreement authorized by labour legislation found to be private agreement beyond reach of Charter.)

[4] Korf v Health Professions Council of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 1171 (T).

the important public function of composing an initial record of apartheid — was deemed to be an organ of state despite the fact that it was not under the direct control of the state.[1]

Perhaps, as Mark Tushnet has suggested, the central purpose of the Final Constitution — to subject private parties, as well as state parties, to the basic law's provisions — makes these fine distinctions between state and non-state entities less pressing than they might otherwise be.[2] But several points are worth keeping in mind. Our courts often use the permissive wording of both FC s 8(2) and FC s 39(2) in order to decline Chapter 2's invitation to constitutionalize 'private law' disputes.[3] Even in socio-economic rights cases, where the state is almost always going to be a party to litigation in matters traditionally or historically placed within the private domain, a version of the state action doctrine has established a beachhead.[4] This 'legitimate expectations' doctrine, as a species in the genus of state action doctrines, enables the court to suppress a finding on the merits of a claim for specific relief.

[1] Inkatha Freedom Party v TRC 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 534 (C).

[2] See Mark Tushnet 'The Issue of State Action/Horizontal Effect on Comparative Constitutional Law' (2003) 1 Journal of International Constitutional Law 79. Tushnet identifies two factors — with respect to South Africa — that may influence the extent to which any given set of application provisions will be more or less likely to result in the constitutional transformation of existing bodies of private law: (1) a specialized Constitutional Court that lacks powers of general jurisdiction has a limited capacity to change non-constitutional bodies of law and concomitantly less control over courts of general jurisdiction; and (2) a commitment to strong social democracy — through either socio-economic rights or state policy or both — diminishes the impact of public-private distinctions in constitutional law because the ends of social transformation are likely to be secured through either socio-economic rights or government programmes. See also Steven Ellmann 'A Constitutional Confluence: American State Action Law and the Application of Socio-Economic Rights Guarantees to Private Actors' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 444 (Arguing that a broad understanding of FC s 8(1)'s application of the Bill to organs of state, FC s 8(2)'s invitation to apply the Bill of Rights to private disputes, and the presence of socio-economic rights narrows the gap between constitutional and non-constitutional bodies of law.) For more on Professor Ellmann's account see § 31, Appendix, 4*(c)*.

[3] See §§ 31.4*(c)–(e)* infra.

[4] In these cases, individuals who have already received a particular government benefit are distinguished from those individuals who have not. The former class may ask the court to order the state to continue provision of the benefit. See Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)('Kyalami') at paras 34, 48, 51 (Constitutional Court concludes that the state, having already committed itself to housing persons on state land, a prison, incurred an obligation to find other suitable land for housing in the event that such persons had to be moved.) The latter class of litigant may only request an order that requires the government to take those steps necessary to ensure the reasonable and progressive realization of the right for all of the right's intended beneficiaries. The second class of litigants are, generally speaking, never entitled to specific relief. See, eg, Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom'). By finding no pre-existing benefit or entitlement, the courts avoid requiring the government to alter radically its budgetary priorities and to commit significant amounts of funds to particular individuals or communities. See, eg, Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services (B & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others) 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C). Four prisoners diagnosed as HIV positive sought orders declaring that, under FC s 35(2)(e), they had the 'the right . . . to . . . the provision, at State expense, of adequate . . . medical treatment.' All four had CD4 counts of less than 400/ml and presented with symptoms of HIV. All four therefore satisfied generally accepted criteria for anti-retroviral treatment. Two of the prisoners had

(iii) An artificial defence of the status quo

Does it make sense to hold — as the Du Plessis Court effectively did — that the state is acting when the legislature passes legislation and the executive enforces legislation that applies to relations between private parties, but that the state is not acting when the courts make laws, apply them to private parties, and have their decisions enforced by the executive? According to Cass Sunstein, this disjunction reflects the 'traditional' view that legislation interferes with the existing nexus of private relationships while the common law simply provides a neutral backdrop for the private, consensual ordering of individual preferences.[1] Given that this distinction is incorrect as a descriptive matter — no body of law can be neutral with respect to existing distributions of wealth and power, and the state backs up each and every legal regime with the threat of force — it makes no sense to treat the autonomy interests at stake in a dispute governed by legislation any differently than the autonomy interests at stake in a dispute governed by common law. The real point of the basic law, as Justice Kreigler points out in his dissent in Du Plessis, is to transform all legal regimes that offend current constitutional commitments. As it so happens, the Justice notes, the common law of property, contract and delict are amongst those regimes in need of the greatest reform.[2]

(iv) Untenability of the public-private distinction

Each of the previous three critiques of Du Plessis is a variation on a single theme: the untenability of the public-private distinction with respect to the application of constitutional rights. As a general philosophical matter, the public-private divide is largely a product of natural law jurisprudence.[3] Natural law jurisprudence, as elaborated in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, portrayed individuals as the possessors of inalienable rights. Constitutions were intended, on this account, to enable individuals and groups to exercise rights of expression, conscience, religious practice, association and property free from interference by both state and non-state actors. They were not originally conceived as tools to eradicate private discrimination and redistribute wealth.[4] already been prescribed appropriate anti-retrovirals by medical practitioners. The other two prisoners had not had any anti-retroviral treatment prescribed by the state. The court held that the two prisoners who had been prescribed a combination of AZT and ddl by medical practitioners were entitled to provision of that cocktail at state expense, but that the two prisoners who had not as yet been prescribed either anti-viral mono-therapy or anti-viral combination therapy were not entitled to provision of any treatment at state expense. Only de minimus state action — namely that someone, somewhere in the state apparatus has seen a prescription — enables the first two applicants to secure the protection of FC s 35(2). See also D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chakalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 56C; Chemerinsky (supra) at 537 (State action doctrine 'is no more than a disguised abstention doctrine: courts utilize it to avoid the fundamental issues presented by the cases.')

[1] Cass Sunstein The Partial Constitution (1993) 66–9 and 171–3.

[2] Du Plessis (supra) at para 146.

[3] See Paul Brest 'State Action and Liberal Theory: A Casenote on Flagg Brothers v Brooks' (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania LR 1296, 1300 (While '[t]he connection between natural rights and state action is not one of logical necessity . . . the doctrines are mutually sympathetic.')

[4] Natural rights theory does not logically require one to take a vertical view of constitutional application. Natural law is not only concerned with the relationship between state and citizen. Natural rights protect each citizen against undue interference by his fellow citizens and require state intervention

This natural law understanding of the relationship between the state and individuals, and between the law and private affairs, is not the only available understanding. Positivist jurisprudence tends to view all law and all rights as emanating from the state.[1] Moreover, on the positivist account, the law mediates all social relations. There is nothing beyond it. As a consequence, the positivist believes that every social transaction is governed by law, or at a minimum, underwritten by the power of the state. Put another way, all 'private actions' are acquiesced in by the state and the state is free to withdraw its authorization for these actions — and for the law that permits them — at will.[2]

The implications of positivism for application doctrine are relatively clear.[3] A positivist must object to Du Plessis' ample cleavage: a public domain determined by the state and a private domain unencumbered by the state. That does not mean that a positivist cannot, in good faith, articulate a normative theory of rights committed to some form of a public-private distinction. I have elsewhere vigorously defended zones of so-called 'autonomy' that enable individuals and groups to pursue ways of being in the world largely free from state interference. I do not, however, claim that the state would not be implicated in sustaining such 'private' where an individual's inviolable sphere of liberty is breached by his compatriots. On this account some rights – if not all rights – ought to have horizontal applicability. See Frank Goodman 'Professor Brest on State Action and Liberal Theory, and a Postscript to Professor Stone' (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania LR 1331, 1335; Erwin Chemerinsky 'Rethinking State Action' (1985) 80 Northwestern LR 503, 529 ('[T]he concept of state action makes no sense under a regime of natural law. . . [P]rivate invasions of liberty are just as intolerable as governmental violations because both deprive a person of inherent rights.') Natural rights were deemed compatible with verticality because it was assumed that the common law would provide sufficient protection for individuals in private disputes. It is, perhaps, worth offering two additional observations. First, placed in its proper historical context, natural law was a progressive doctrine that helped carve out a space for individual autonomy and subjectivity to develop free of the overweening control of public authority. Second, natural rights are not adequate to the task of reorganizing democratic societies along more open, participatory and egalitarian lines.

[1] See Thomas Hobbes Leviathan (1651)('Where there is no state, there is no law.')

[2] Commentators in civil-law jurisdictions are more inclined towards such a view because judge-made common law does not play the same obfuscatory role. Hans Kelsen argued that the 'logically, entirely untenable' distinction between public law and private law > has no theoretical, but only an ideological character. Developed by constitutional doctrine, it is designed to secure for the government and its administrative machinery . . . a freedom not from law, which . . . is impossible, but from statutes, from the general legal norms created by the Parliament as the representation of the people . . . The differentiation in principle between a public (or political) and private (or unpolitical) legal sphere is designed to prevent the recognition that the private right created by the legal transaction of a contract is just as much the theater of the political dominion as the public law created by legislation and administration. But the so-called private law, the complex of norms whose core is the legal institution of private property, is a method of creating individual norms characteristic of the capitalistic system.

Hans Kelsen Theory of Pure Law (1960) 283–4. See also Hans Kelsen General Theory of Law and State (1945) 207 ('The distinction between public law and private law is useless as a common foundation for a general systemization of law.') See, further, Chemerinsky (supra) at 526 ('The critical point here is that under a positivist analysis . . . the common law is state law and court enforcement is state action. Under positivism, the concept of state action makes no sense because state action is always present.') arrangements. Quite the opposite. I argue that the state should acknowledge its complicity in sustaining associations from which we derive the better part of life's meaning.[1]

[3] Let me not be misunderstood. I do not assert that positivism — in any form — by logical necessity leads to the application doctrine preferred in these pages.

While most contemporary legal theorists' sympathies lie with the positivist rendering of the relationship between the state and the individual, these theorists are more accurately described as constructivists. Constructivists argue that all natural rights theories may be manipulated to make any set of private social circumstances appear 'natural' and that these circumstances have, more often than not, been used to turn race or sex or age or disability into an unfortunate destiny under law.

Constructivists suggest that we should stop conceiving of the state as something separate and apart from the individuals who live within it. It is not a thing that occasionally crosses the chasm between the public and the private to act on individuals. The state is, rather, a locus of relationships, rules, norms and ideas that determine the way we understand ourselves.[2] The recognition of this influence does not mean that our political life exhausts our self-understanding. But it does mean that we can never look at people and events as being pre-political. Whether they know it or not, their identities have been shaped by political institutions and legal doctrines. A vertical or quasi-vertical approach to application is, on the constructivist account, difficult to justify. If a state's laws and conduct so profoundly determine our public and private lives, then it seems hard to understand why we should subject only those acts immediately traceable to two specific arms of the state to constitutional scrutiny and immunize from constitutional attack those acts backed by the power of the state but traditionally described as private.

(v) Judicial Boundedness

The fiction of the public-private divide also played out in the notion that the judiciary could not be bound by the Bill of Rights. The judiciary could not be bound because it was simply responsible for discovering and then applying common-law rules — common-law rules that ostensibly did not emanate from the state.

[1] See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[2] See Laurence Tribe 'The Curvature of Constitutional Space: What Lawyers Can Learn From Modern Physics' (1989) 103 Harvard LR 1, 7–8 and 20 ('Just as space cannot extract itself from the unfolding story of physical reality, so also the law cannot step back, establish an Archimedean point of detached neutrality, and selectively reach in, as from the outside, to make fine-tuned adjustments to highly particularized conflicts. Each legal decision restructures the law itself, as well as the social setting within which the law operates, because, like all human activity, the law is inevitably embroiled in the dialectical process whereby society is constantly recreating itself. . . . A court cannot behave as if all that mattered is rendering a result on the case concerning the parties before it. It must realize that the very process of legal observation (judging) shapes both the judges themselves and the material being judged. The results the courts announce . . . will . . . have continuing effects that reshape the nature of what the courts initially undertook to review, even beyond anything they directly order anyone to do or refrain from doing. The law is thus not simply a backdrop against which the action may be viewed . . . but is itself an integral part of that action.')

But even on the vertical approach endorsed by Du Plessis, the courts were bound by some of the provisions of IC Chapter 3. IC s 25's rights to silence,[1] against self-incrimination,[2] of the accused being presumed innocent,[3] to a trial within a reasonable time,[4] to reasonable bail,[5] to a fair trial,[6] to speedy sentencing,[7] and not to be subject to cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment[8] apply to the judiciary.[9] A court order for scandalizing the court is subject to review as an abridgement of the freedom of expression.[10]

The text of the Final Constitution should have resolved this problem. After all, FC s 8(1) binds the judiciary. But the Khumalo Court rebuffed counsel's request to give the phrase 'binds the judiciary' content. According to Khumalo's black letter law on application, FC s 8(1)'s 'binds the judiciary' does not mean that the common law — as the legal product of the courts — is invariably subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. And yet, despite this holding in Khumalo, the Constitutional Court has, in other judgments, interpreted FC s 8(1)'s binding of the judiciary in such a manner as to ensure that the Constitutional Court always retains the authority to decide whether any gloss placed by any tribunal on any rule of common law or provision of statute comports with constitutional dictates.[11] Those two positions are logically incompatible.

(vi) History and power

Three opinions in Du Plessis demur from the application doctrine proffered by the majority. What all three opinions share is a common belief that the majority failed to come to grips with how issues of history and power ought to shape our interpretation of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution.

The majority opinion[s], Justice Kriegler writes:

> reflect pervading misconception[s] held by some and . . . egregious caricature[s] propagated by others . . . That is that so-called direct horizontality will result in an Orwellian society in which the all-powerful state will control all private relationships. The tentacles of government will, so it is said, reach into the marketplace, the home, the very bedroom. The minions of the state will tell me where to do my shopping, to whom to offer my services or merchandise, whom to employ and whom to invite to my bridge club. That is nonsense. What is more, it is

[1] See, eg, Osman v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC).

[2] See, eg, Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Park-Ross v Director for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C).

[3] See, eg, S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 652 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC).

[4] See, eg, Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W).

[5] See, eg, S v Dhlamini 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC).

[6] See, eg, Scagell v Attorney-General of the Western Cape 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC).

[7] See, eg, Wild v Hoffert 1998 (3) SA 695 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 656 (CC).

[8] See, eg, S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC).

[9] See, eg, R v Rahey [1987] 1 SCR 588, 39 DLR (4th) 481 (Supreme Court of Canada held that a criminal court's delay in ruling on an application for directed verdict was a breach of s 11*(b)* of the Canadian Charter.)

[10] See, eg, S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)(Citation for contempt for scandalizing court will attract review under FC s 16.)

[11] See § 31.4*(b)*(i)–(ii) infra.

> malicious nonsense preying on the fears of privileged whites, cosseted in the past by laissez faire capitalism thriving in an environment where the black underclass had limited opportunity to share in the bounty. I use strong language designedly. The caricature is pernicious, it is calculated to inflame public sentiments and to cloud people's perceptions of our fledgling constitutional democracy. 'Direct horizontality' is a bogeyman.[1]

Justice Madala's dissent is a far more polite affair. Madala J takes the majority to task for their failure to read Chapter 3 in light of the remedial purposes of the Interim Constitution. To this end he quotes the coda of the Interim Constitution:

> The postamble reminds us that the Constitution is a '. . . historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society characterized by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice, and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex.[2]

He then reminds the majority that the Court functions in South Africa — not in an advanced Western liberal democracy — and that every provision of the Interim Constitution should be construed with South Africa's particularly troubled history and present in mind.[3] He writes:

> Ours is a multi-racial, multi-cultural, multi-lingual society in which the ravages of apartheid, disadvantage and inequality are just immeasurable. The extent of the oppressive measures in South Africa was not confined to government/individual relations but equally to individual/individual relations. In its effort to create a new order, our Constitution must have been intended to address these oppressive and undemocratic practices at all levels. In my view our Constitution starts at the lowest level and attempts to reach the furthest in its endeavours to restructure the dynamics in a previously racist society.[4]

Most significantly, Justice Madala warns his fellow justices that they must come to terms with the abuse of power simpliciter — whether it is privately or publicly sourced — or risk blunting the transformative powers of the law:

> Those who widen the scope of the operation of the Bill of Rights hold the view that the verticality approach is unmindful of modern day reality — that in many instances the abuse of power is perpetuated less by the State and more by private individuals against other private individuals.[5]

The late Chief Justice Mahomed's concurrence largely tracks the textual analysis of Kentridge AJ. It is imbued, however, with an entirely different spirit. This [1] Du Plessis (supra) at para 120. Kriegler J adds that despite the learning reflected in the other judgments, he cannot 'see the dire consequences' of the unqualifiedly direct approach to application. 'Indeed', he says, 'as I see it, it makes no fundamental difference with regard to such consequences whether the horizontal application of Chapter 3 is direct or indirect. It has little, if any, effect jurisprudentially or socially whether the Chapter 3 rights are enforced directly or whether they 'irradiate' private legal relationships. I stress this point not only because of the impending doom Ackermann J perceives in the direct horizontal application of Chapter 3. I do so also because it would be foolish to ignore the public utterances of political and legal commentators in a similar vein.' Ibid.

[2] Ibid at para 157.

[3] Ibid at para 162.

[4] Ibid at para 163.

[5] Ibid at para 154.

difference is captured in two statements: one on the nature of law; one on the relationship between the basic law and the harsh realities of South African life. On the untenability of the public-private divide in law, Mahomed CJ, then DP, writes:

> I am not persuaded that there is, in the modern State, any right which exists which is not ultimately sourced in some law, even if it be no more than an unarticulated premise of the common law and even if that common law is constitutionally immunized from legislative invasion. Whatever be the historical origins of the common law and the evolutionary path it has taken, its continued efficacy in the modern State depends, in the last instance, on the power of the State to enforce its sanction and its duty to do so when its protection is invoked by the citizen seeking to rely on it. It is, I believe, erroneous to conclude that the law operates for the first time only when that sanction is invoked. The truth is that it precedes it and is indeed the ultimate source for the legitimization of any conduct. Freedom is the fundamental ingredient of a defensible and durable civilization, but it is ultimately secured in modern times, only through power, the sovereignty and the majesty of the law activated by the State's instruments of authority in the protection of those prejudiced through its invasion by others. Inherently, there can be no 'right' governing relations between individuals inter se or between individuals and the State the protection of which is not legally enforceable, and if it is legally enforceable it must be part of law.'[1]

The preceding paragraph suggests the late Chief Justice's ambivalence about the majority's order. Mahomed DP writes that although the text constrains him to agree with many of Kentridge AJ's conclusions, he remains concerned that the majority's construction of the provisions on application > could in practice [mean] that the Constitution was impotent to protect those who have so manifestly and brutally been victimized by the private and institutionalized desecration of the values now so eloquently articulated in the Constitution. Black persons were previously denied the right to own land in 87% of the country. An interpretation of the Constitution which continued to protect the right of private persons substantially to perpetuate such unfairness by entering into contracts or making dispositions subject to the condition that such land is not sold to or occupied by Blacks would have been for me a very distressing conclusion.[2]

[1] Du Plessis (supra) at para 79.

[2] Ibid at para 84. Rather than dissent, Mahomed DP sought solace in the promise of indirect application under IC s 35(3). Justice Mohamed wrote: '[IC] s 35(3) can, in appropriate circumstances, accommodate much of the concern felt by those like me who are anxious to avoid giving to s 7 of the [Interim] Constitution an interpretation which would leave the courts substantially impotent in affording the proper protection of constitutional values to those victimized by their denial to them in the past.' Ibid at para 87. It is through IC s 35(3), he continues, that the courts could avoid being 'trapped within the limitations of the past.' Ibid. Exactly how IC s 35(3) would enable the courts to escape that trap was not — and is still not under FC s 39(2) — entirely clear. For example, in Du Plessis, Kentridge AJ said that he agreed with the view articulated by Cameron J in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers that IC s 35(3) made much of the vertical/horizontal debate irrelevant. 1996 (2) SA 588 (W). But Cameron J in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers operates as if the method of constitutional analysis for common law rules under IC s 35(3) is identical to the method employed by the Constitutional Court when it analyses legislation, subordinate legislation or state conduct. He holds expressly that IC 's 35(3) requires the fundamental reconsideration of any common law rule that trenches on a fundamental rights guarantee and that in reviewing the

(e) The jurisprudence of unqualified direct application

Unqualified direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights is derived from the interaction of two simple axioms. The state constructs and enforces all law no matter what form the law takes.[1] Legislation, subordinate legislation, common law and customary law shape both relationships between the state and its citizens and relationships between individuals.

Two conclusions follow. Coherence dictates that since the state constructs and enforces all law, all law should be measured against constitutional standards. Candour demands that an assessment of the constitutionality of a particular law should not be artificially suppressed because of the form the law takes.[2]

These two conclusions come with three closely related caveats. First, not all action is state action subject to constitutional scrutiny. As Cass Sunstein notes, common law for consistency with the Bill of Rights, one ought to adopt the Constitutional Court's two-stage approach to rights analysis. Unlike Cameron J, Kentridge AJ argues that by choosing words such as 'due regard' 'the lawgiver [could not have meant] that courts should invalidate rules of common law inconsistent with Chapter 3 or declare them unconstitutional.' Du Plessis (supra) at para 60. He suggests that when reviewing or developing the common law in light of constitutional values the 'judiciary should confine itself to those incremental changes which are necessary to keep the common law in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society.' Ibid at para 61 citing R v Salituro [1991] 3 SCR 654, (1992) 8 CRR (2d) 173, 189. Cameron J's position presages radical transformation, Kentridge's approach accords with the nothing new or unusual position reflected in R v Salituro. See also Lappeman Diamond Cutting Works v MIB Group Ltd 1997 (4) SA 908 (W)(Joffe J)('The manner in which statutory discretion is to be exercised must likewise not be trapped in the past. Should . . . discretion be exercised in a manner inimical to the spirit, purport and objects [of] the [Interim] Constitution, such binding authority need not be followed.') But see Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox'). The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have not warmed to the notion of a radical transformation of the common law under FC s 39(2). See the discussions of the transformative role of FC s 39(2), at § 31.4*(e)*(iii)–(iv) infra, and the relationship between application and stare decisis, at § 31.4*(e)*(ix). Nor are they particularly moved by the alleged need for doctrinal harmony. See, eg, Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1220 (SCA) at para 35 (Supreme Court of Appeal notes that the Constitutional Court in Carmichele had 'quoted with approval a passage to the effect that the Judiciary should confine itself to those incremental changes which are necessary to keep the common law in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society.') See also Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service, & Another 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Rule of law does not require identical outcomes in cases based upon the same factual and legal substratum.)

[1] See Morton Horowitz & Kenneth Karst 'The Proposition 14 Cases: Justice in Search of a Justification' (1966) 14 UCLA LR 37, 41–45 ('[T]here always exists some state law (statutory, decisional or declarable in a court of first instance) determining the legal characteristics of any private discriminatory conduct . . . State action, in the form of state law, is present in all legal relationships among private persons.') See also New York Times v Sullivan 376 US 254, 265 (1964)('We may dispose at the outset of . . . the proposition relied on by the State Supreme Court — that "the Fourteenth Amendment is directed against State action and not private action." That proposition has no application to this case. Although this is a civil law suit between private parties, the Alabama courts have applied a state rule of law which petitioners claim to impose invalid restrictions on their constitutional freedom . . . It matters not that the law has been applied in a civil action and that it is common law only. . . The test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised.')

[2] See Erwin Chemerinsky 'Rethinking State Action' (1985) 80 Northwestern LR 503, 536 ('[W]e must remember . . . [i]n each case when a question of state action arises, both the freedom of the violator and the freedom of the victim are at stake. No matter how a court decides, someone's liberty will be expanded and someone's liberty restricted. To assert that the state action doctrine is desirable because it preserves autonomy and liberty is to look at only one side of the equation.')

'[w]hen one person excludes another from his own home, there is no state action; the state action consists only in the availability or actual use of the trespass laws.'[1] Second, challenges to existing rules of common law do not entail the subversion of the common law. In some cases, a rule of common law being relied upon by one party in defence of their property interests will trump another party's claim to equal treatment. In another contest between such rights and interests, a rule of common law may fall. In all cases, the court will be forced candidly to determine the priority of rules, and not hide behind the artifice of government action or inaction. Third, the commitment to direct application does not mean that 'there is no line between public and private action.'[2] Where laws intended to protect a particular comprehensive — or even partial — conception of the good life can meet the requirements of constitutional justification, that 'private' understanding of 'the good' will be protected and the line between the public and the private will be maintained.[3] Where a rule of common law meant to protect a 'traditional' legal arrangement fails to secure the necessary level of judicial solicitude, a new line between the public and the private will be drawn.[4]

31.3 Application under the Final Constitution: Benefits of the Bill of Rights

There were few express changes from the language of the Interim Constitution to the Final Constitution with respect to the intended beneficiaries of the Bill of Rights. One change is that 'every person' has become 'everyone'. This change was motivated by a desire to simplify the language of the text. Another change is that the right to freedom of trade, occupation and profession — formerly freedom of economic activity — no longer extends to 'every person' or 'everyone'. Its protection is limited to every 'citizen'. The obvious rationale for the change is that non-citizens are now permitted to ply a trade or work in this country only at the [1] See Sunstein (supra) at 159–160 (The lesson 'is that the law of contract, tort, and property is just that — law. It should be assessed in the same way in which other law is assessed. When the trespass law is used to evict someone from private property, the state is involved. The real issue is whether that action offends the Constitution.') See also Mark Tushnet 'The Issue of State Action/Horizontal Effect on Comparative Constitutional Law' (2003) 1 Journal of International Constitutional Law 79.

[2] Sunstein (supra) at 159.

[3] Supplementing vertical application with horizontal application — to yield a doctrine of unqualified direct application — does not mean that private actors will be subject to the same standards as state actors. There may well be justifications for private behaviour that would not underwrite similar governmental conduct. See Chemerinsky (supra) at 506.

[4] A comparison of Canadian and Irish jurisprudence shows up the difference between a basic law that endorses direct application of a Bill of Rights to common law disputes between private parties and a basic law that bars such direct application. As recently as 1991, five of Canada's ten provinces maintained and enforced the rule of dependent domicile. Because the Charter has been deemed inapplicable to litigation between private parties, it was impossible — in the absence of government action — to challenge a facially inequitable rule. See Annalise Acorn 'Gender Discrimination in the Common Law of Domicile and the Application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms' (1991) 29 Osgoode Hall LJ 419, 438–443. In Ireland, such an inequitable rule has been successfully challenged because the courts recognize that the common law is created and maintained by the state, the court is an organ of state, and that the Irish Constitution — the Bunreacht — 'lays down standards relevant to the conduct of interpersonal relations.' Andrew Butler 'Constitutional Rights in Private Litigation: A Critique and Comparative Analysis' (1993) 22 Anglo-American LR 1, 23. See, eg, CM v TM [1988] ILRM 456, 470 (Irish High Court held that the dependent domicile rule infringed a woman's right to equality and declared the law 'patently unconstitutional.') discretion of the national government.[1] Juristic persons are treated under the Final Constitution much as they were under the Interim Constitution. Where a particular right is deemed to apply to a particular kind of juristic person, the right applies. The issue is thus less one of application than it is of interpretation.[2]

The Bill of Rights identifies six kinds of entity entitled to the protection of the rights enshrined therein: natural persons, citizens, children, juristic persons, workers, and employers. It goes without saying that not all members of the aforementioned six classes are entitled to the benefit of every right. The object of this section is to show what kinds of entities are entitled to which Chapter 2 rights.

[1] But see Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)(Requirement that alien spouse be required to be outside South Africa in order to secure work permit violates right to dignity in terms of FC 10 of South Africans and their alien spouses. However, the status and the dignity rights of aliens without spousal attachment was not addressed.)

[2] See First National Bank of SA Ltd T/A Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another, First National Bank of SA Ltd T/A Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 45 (After noting the invitation of FC s 8(4) to analyze the applicability of a right to juristic persons, the Court wrote that '[e]ven more so than in relation to the right to privacy, denying companies entitlement to property rights would . . . lead to grave disruptions and would undermine the very fabric of our democratic State. It would have a disastrous impact on the business world generally, on creditors of companies and, more especially, on shareholders in companies. The property rights of natural persons can only be fully and properly realised if such rights are afforded to companies as well as to natural persons'); Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at paras 18 ('Juristic persons are not the bearers of human dignity. Their privacy rights, therefore, can never be as intense as those of human beings. However, this does not mean that juristic persons are not protected by the right to privacy. Exclusion of juristic persons would lead to the possibility of grave violations of privacy in our society, with serious implications for the conduct of affairs. The State might, for instance, have free licence to search and seize material from any non-profit organisation or corporate entity at will. This would obviously lead to grave disruptions and would undermine the very fabric of our democratic State. Juristic persons therefore do enjoy the right to privacy, although not to the same extent as natural persons'); Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 57–58 (The Court held that FC s 8(4) was not in conflict with Constitutional Principle II. It reasoned that many 'universally accepted fundamental rights' would be fully recognised only if afforded to juristic persons as well as natural persons, and it was furthermore wrong to equate juristic persons with powerful and wealthy corporations as there were countless small companies and close corporations that needed and deserved protection no less than natural persons did); Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)(Jurisitic person, a newspaper, allowed to assert defense under FC s 16.) See also Oostelike Gauteng Diensteraad v Transvaal Munisipale Pensioenfonds 1997 (8) BCLR 1066 (T). A local authority contended that its right to associate had been violated by its statutory obligation to contribute to a municipal pension fund that serviced employees throughout the province. Cameron J concluded that there is no reason, in principle, why an organ of government cannot enforce a right against another person or organ of state. Although it may seem odd — if not wrong — to claim that the state could enforce a fundamental right qua beneficiary, the courts have acknowledged that an organ of state or a state official has standing to represent the interests of others under FC s 38. See Minister of Health and Welfare v Woodcarb 1996 (3) SA 155 (N). In the instant case Cameron J decided that the right in question — association — could not be meaningfully stretched to cover the purely fiscal relationship between a local authority and a municipal pension fund. Cf Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Bernard Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, June 2004) Chapter 14 (In the event of a conflict between state actors, FC Chapter sets the framework for resolution of the dispute.).

(a) Everyone

With a few minor exceptions, Chapter 2 speaks about benefits almost exclusively in terms of 'everyone'.[1] Despite the fuzzy extension of the term 'everyone', the case law enables us to draw several conclusions about the persons who might legitimately expect protection from abridgements of various fundamental rights.

(i) Aliens

Where the text employs 'everyone' instead of the more restrictive 'citizen', we can assume that the right in question protects both citizen and alien alike. In particular, the text gives us no reason to assume that resident aliens — who have legally entered the country and who remain in good legal standing — will receive anything less than the levels of constitutional protection required for personhood.[2] That does not mean that every right extended to persons will afford equal levels of protection to all classes of alien. That illegal or undocumented aliens may receive diminished levels of procedural or substantive protection in specific situations — such as prior to making entry into the country — does not, as the Constitutional Court in Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs correctly reasoned, extinguish their rights entirely.[3] Moreover, as the Supreme

[1] The replacement of 'every person' with 'everyone' reflects the move towards more natural locutions in the Final Constitution and the apparent linguistic requirement of Constitutional Principle II that '"everyone" shall enjoy all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties.'

[2] The position of aliens under the Final Constitution has shown marked improvement. See Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)(Court holds that refusal of temporary residence permit to alien spouse violated dignity rights of both the South African spouse and the alien in terms of FC s 10); Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)(Requirement that alien spouse be required to be outside South Africa in order to secure work permit violates right to dignity in terms of FC 10 of South Africans and their alien spouses); Patel v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 343 (D)(Aliens possess same rights under Final Constitution — FC ss 9, 10, 12, 21 and 33 in particular — unless contrary position expressly required by the Final Constitution.) For a cautionary note on the current status of aliens, see Jonathan Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission Report on Treatment of Person Arrested and Detained under the Aliens Control Act' (1999) 15 SAJHR 132. For a discussion of the rather parlous state of alienage under the Interim Constitution, see Jonathan Klaaren 'So Far Not So Good. An Analysis of Immigration Decisions under the Interim Constitution' (1996) 12 SAJHR 605. See also Xu v Minister van Binnelandse Sake 1995 (1) SA 185 (T), 1995 (1) BCLR 62 (T)(IC s 20 applies only to citizens and not to every person, and thus not to aliens); Parekh v Minister of Home Affairs 1996 (2) SA 710 (D)(Dismisses alien's request for reasons from Home Affairs under IC ss 23 and 24); Naidenov v Minister of Home Affairs 1995 (7) BCLR 891 (T)(Dismisses request for reasons for rejection of political asylum claim made in terms of ss IC 23 and 24). But see Baloro v University of Bophuthatswana 1995 (4) SA 197 (B), 1995 (8) BCLR 1018 (B)(Aliens are persons in terms of IC s 8 and are entitled to that section's protections.) For the position in the US, see Plyler v Doe 475 US 202, 210 (1982) ('[A]n alien is surely a 'person' in any ordinary sense of the term' and therefore entitled to protection afforded persons under both the due process and equal protection clauses.')

[3] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights'). The Constitutional Court construed several provisions of the Immigration Act in a manner that expands the level of due process to which undocumented persons on board ships are entitled. The Lawyers for Human Rights Court described the basis for this expansion as follows:

> [We are] concerned with a delicate issue that has implications for the circumstances in and the extent to which we restrict the liberty of human beings who may be said to be illegal foreigners. The determination of this question could adversely affect not only the freedom of the people concerned but also their dignity as human beings. The very fabric of our society and the values embodied in our Constitution could be demeaned if the freedom and dignity of illegal foreigners are violated in the process of preserving our national integrity.

Ibid at para 20.

Court of Appeal noted recently in Watchenuka, our immigration laws cannot be used to visit extra-judicial penalties on persons seeking asylum in order to advance policies designed to create disincentives for illegal immigration.[1] The courts will err in favour of extending non-citizens the full panoply of guarantees whilst they reside in South Africa.[2] Non-citizens outside South Africa's borders are not, generally speaking, entitled to the benefits of the Bill of Rights.[3]

(ii) Individuals

That the text employs primarily the term 'everyone', and does not use 'individuals', means that the interpretive space exists for juristic persons to benefit from many, if not all, of Chapter 2's provisions. FC s 8(4) makes explicit this commitment. The benefits afforded corporations and other juristic persons by the rights and freedom found in Chapter 2 are dealt with below.[4]

[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Minister of Home Affairs v Watchenuka, found unconstitutional regulations issued by the Minister and rules emanating from the Standing Committee for Refugee Affairs that visited blanket prohibitions, with respect to employment and study, on asylum seekers. 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 120 (SCA)('Watchenuka'). The Watchenuka Court held that such prohibitions constituted a violation of the right to dignity because the state refused to offer support to asylum seekers and left persons exercising their right to apply for asylum no alternative but to turn to crime, begging or foraging. The Court also held that such prohibitions constituted a violation of the right to education because children lawfully in country to seek asylum may not be deprived of such resources at a critical period of their development. The Watchenuka Court recognizes that a right to asylum only becomes meaningful if immigration laws actually permit a person to seek asylum. Read together, Lawyers for Human Rights and Watchenuka support the dual proposition that our immigration laws must be construed in a manner that permits the actual, and not merely theoretical, exercise of every person's fundamental rights.

[2] See Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC)(Person who entered country illegally still entitled to protection of Bill of Rights. Collusion of state officials with US authorities seeking Mr Mohamed's extradition for trial constituted a clear violation of Mr Mohamed's South African constitutional rights.) Canadian cases are similarly expansive when it comes to according aliens within Canada rights under the Charter. See Singh v Minister of Employment and Immigration [1985] 1 SCR 177, 202, 17 DLR (4th) 422 (Section 7, fundamental justice, could be asserted by 'every human being who is physically present in Canada.') See also Peter Hogg 'Application' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 34–5 (Even persons inside Canada illegally entitled to most Charter rights.)

The South African record on the fundamental rights of aliens prior to the Interim Constitution was execrable. See Cabinet for the Territory of South West Africa v Chikane & another 1989 (1) SA 349 (A)(Fundamental rights often restricted to nationals of states with charters of human rights and therefore restrictions on an alien's to rights to enter and to move did not contravene rights to equality or due process); Lewis v Minister of Internal Affairs & another 1991 (3) SA 628 (B)(Since it was never the intention of the legislature to allow individual rights to prevail over the interests of the state or public safety, an alien may not contest a Minister's decision on the grounds that he was denied a hearing, reasons for his deportation, or treated unequally.)

[3] Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa Amicus Curiae) 2005 (1) SACR 111 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)(Non-citizens not entitled to benefit of South African Constitution beyond South Africa's borders.) See § 31.6 infra (On extra territorial effect of Bill of Rights.) See also Nishimura Ekiu v US 142 US 651, 659 (1892)(Constitutional protections afforded aliens limited by generally recognized power of Congress to 'forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them in only such cases and such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe.') While aliens in the United States are entitled to basic constitutional protections, aliens outside the US are entitled to little or none. See United States ex rel Knauf v Shaughnessey 338 US 537, 544 (1950)('Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned.')

[4] See § 31.3*(d)* infra (Discussion of protection afforded juristic persons under the Bill of Rights.)

(iii) Foetus

Both recent case law and statute suggest that the term 'everyone' does not include a foetus.[1] In Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health, the court held that because FC s 11 — the right to life — does not apply to a foetus, it could not be used as a grounds for attacking the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act.[2] In support of this conclusion, McGreath J held that because FC s 12 safeguards a women's right to control her body and, in particular, her right to reproduction, the drafters of the Final Constitution could not have possibly intended FC s 11 to protect a foetus.[3] Similarly, he opined that because FC s 28 protected children and children were defined as persons under the age of 18, the foetus was not protected by FC s 28 since it did not possess an 'age'.[4] The judge then concludes that since FC s 28 does not protect a foetus, no other right in the Bill of Rights could.[5]

The last three arguments are tendentious at best. First, constitutional rights conflict. Drafters of constitutions and statutes alike often refuse to address contentious issues and leave them for courts to decide. FC s 12(2) in no way forecloses attribution of personhood to a foetus in terms of FC s 11. Secondly, the argument from FC s 28 does no work. Only if you define age as beginning at birth does a foetus not possess an age. Thirdly, as we have just noted, the claim that if one right is understood not to include a foetus, then all other rights do not protect a foetus is simply fallacious. It does not follow that because a foetus is not entitled to the protection afforded by FC s 28, that it possesses no rights at all. These critiques should not be understood as a rejection of the outcome in Christian Lawyers I.[6] The court, and the public, would have been better served if the court had addressed the issues of conflicting imperatives openly rather than engaging in an aridly textual, and ultimately casuistic, exercise.[7]

[1] Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health 1998 (4) SA 1113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T)('Christian Lawyers I'). See also Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health & Others 2005 (1) SA 509, 526 (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086, 1103 (T)('Christian Lawyers II'). A foetus is not entitled to any rights under the Canadian Charter. See Peter W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 1999) § 34.1*(b)*. See also Borowski v Attorney General of Canada (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 731 (Sask CA)(Foetus not included within s 7's 'everyone' or s 15's 'individual'); R v Morgentaler (1988) 44 DLR (4th) 385, [1988] 1 SCR 30 (Abortion provisions of Criminal Code declared unconstitutional impairment of mother's s 7 right to fundamental justice — without ruling on foetus' s 7 right to life.) A foetus is entitled to some rights under the US Constitution. See Roe v Wade 410 US 113 (1973)(State claims a sufficiently compelling interest in the foetus to prevent abortion only when it may survive outside the womb.) The German Federal Constitutional Court has held that the human dignity and the right to life of the foetus take precedence over woman's right to self-determination. However, it is important to note that quite a number of circumstances exist in which a woman's rights will trump those of the foetus, and the FCC has declined to equate its refusal to sanction abortion with efforts to criminalize the procedure. See 88 BVerfGE 203 (1993); 39 BVerfGE 1 (1975)(Striking down federal abortion legislation.)

[2] Act 92 of 1996.

[3] Christian Lawyers I (supra) at 1441–1444.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid.

[6] See Michelle O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 37; Tjakie Naude 'The Value of Life: Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health' (1999) 15 SAJHR 542.

[7] The structure of analysis under the Interim Constitution — in particular the proscription of limitations that negated the essential content of the right — might have complicated the outcome of a challenge to pro-choice legislation. An abortion case brought under the Final Constitution will not be

(b) Citizens

The term 'citizen' is used to qualify the entitlement to four of FC Chapter 2's rights: citizenship rights,[1] political rights,[2] some of the rights to freedom of residence and movement,[3] and the freedom of trade, occupation and profession.[4] The Constitutional Court's equality and dignity jurisprudence does, however, extend certain kinds of trade, occupation, profession and residence entitlements to permanent residents.[5]

Citizens are, by logical implication of the other qualifiers (persons, children, workers), entitled to the benefit of all of Chapter 2's rights. But not all citizens are entitled to exercise all of Chapter 2's rights at any given moment. For example, not all citizens are entitled to the protection of children's rights. Only persons under the age of 18 are entitled to the rights enumerated in FC s 28.

(c) Children

Rights that do not benefit children are the exception. The courts have already used many of the other rights in Chapter 2 to buttress the children-specific rights found in FC s 28.[6] subject to the same structural impediments. With the elimination of the essential content of the right requirement in the limitation clause, it is now possible to find that a foetus is a person under FC s 11 — the right to life — and still hold that pro-choice legislation is reasonable and justifiable under FC s 36(1). The structure of analysis required by IC Chapter 3 dictated that if the court was to uphold a pro-choice statute, it would either have to find that a foetus was not a person or have to finesse, somehow, the issue of whether an abortion negated the essential content of the foetus' right to life. See Van Heerden & Another v Joubert NO & Others 1994 (4) SA 793 (A)(Appellate Division showed that it was conscious of the constitutional implications of its decisions regarding the standing of a foetus by holding that a stillborn baby is not a 'person' as envisaged by provisions of Inquests Act 58 of 1959.)

---

[1] See Jonathan Klaaren 'Citizenship' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2005) Chapter 66.

[2] See Anthony Stein 'Political Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 45.

[3] See Jonathan Klaaren 'Residence and Movement' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 67.

[4] See Dennis Davis 'Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 54.

[5] Such claims on behalf of permanent residents must be grounded in those rights — dignity and equality — whose extension embraces non-citizens. See, eg, see Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)(While requirement that alien spouse be outside South Africa in order to secure work permit found to violate right to dignity of South Africans and their alien spouses, the failure to recognize similar rights of aliens without South African spouses suggests the outer limits of economic activity related claims.)

[6] See Adrian Friedman & Angelo Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 47. The courts' assessment of the child's best interests is informed by a slew of other rights: equality, dignity, freedom and security of the person, housing, health, social security, education. See, eg, Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)(Court found s 18(4)(d) of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 to be unconstitutional as a violation of the right to equality); Petersen v Maintenance Officer & Others 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 117 (C)(Common-law rule that did not allow an extra-marital child to claim maintenance from its paternal grandparents, while legitimate children could so claim, found to constitute unfair discrimination and to violate of the right to dignity); S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC)(Children have the right not to be subject to cruel and degrading punishment.); Christian Education

One could argue that children are not entitled to the political rights identified in FC s 19. Children are not entitled to vote. Only adult citizens have such a constitutional entitlement. Of course, that is the wrong way round this particular benefit question. Children could have the ability to vote extended to them under new legislation. The legislation — say, dropping the voting age below 18 — might then be subject to constitutional scrutiny. The constitutional text does not provide a clear and unequivocal answer to the question of whether children may possess the franchise. To the extent that it says anything at all, FC s 9 states that no one may be discriminated against on the basis of age.[1]

One good reason for the absence of a clear and unequivocal answer to the voting rights question is that notions of adulthood and childhood are reasonably flexible — which is another way of saying that childhood as a category is often over-inclusive, and sometimes under-inclusive.[2] Adulthood can begin later (and capture fewer young persons) or start earlier (and capture more children). Moreover, the bright line drawn at age 18 by FC 28 applies only to the rights guaranteed to young persons by that right. The benefits of other rights are not made age contingent.

(d) Juristic persons

FC s 8(4) reads:

> Juristic persons are entitled to the rights in the Bill of Rights to the extent required by the nature of the rights and of the juristic persons.[3]

Whether a juristic person may benefit from a right in the Final Constitution is not an issue of application, but an issue of interpretation.[4] While FC s 8(4) holds out the promise of constitutional solicitude for juristic persons, the courts were left to decide whether they possess rights to property, privacy or expression. As it turns out, they do.

SA v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)(Children have right to be free from physical violence.) The US Supreme Court has held that 'whatever may be their precise impact, neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Bill of Rights is for adults alone.' In re Gault 387 US 1, 13 (1967). See also Planned Parenthood of Cent Missouri v Danforth 428 US 52 (1976)(Minor possesses right to privacy and, therefore, abortion); Tinker v Des Moines Independant Community School District 393 US 503 (1969)(Minor possesses right to freedom of expression.) But see Carey v Population Services International 431 US 678, 693 (1977)(Restrictions on the exercise of fundamental rights by children will be subject to less rigorous scrutiny than similar restrictions on adults.)

[1] Minister of Education v Harris 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC); Harris v Minister of Education 2001 (8) BCLR 796 (T).

[2] See Laurence Tribe 'Childhood, Suspect Classifications, and Conclusive Presumptions: Three Linked Riddles' (1975) 39 Law & Contemporary Problems 8.

[3] IC Section 7(3) provided that 'all juristic persons are entitled to the rights entrenched in Chapter 3 where, and to the extent that, the nature of the right permits.' That position has changed under the Final Consitution. The court now must take account of the nature of both the right asserted and the juristic person claiming its benefits. See Lourens du Plessis 'The Genesis of the Provisions Concerned with the Application and Interpretation of the Chapter on Fundamental Rights in South Africa's Transitional Constitution' (1994) 4 TSAR 706, 714 (Noting the striking similarity between IC s 7(3) and s 19(3) of the German Basic Law, and arguing that IC s 7(3) linked the application of the right to the nature of the right, and not the nature of the juristic person, so as to more readily restrict the entitlement of juristic persons to fundamental rights.)

[4] See First National Bank of SA Ltd T/A Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd T/A Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB') at para 45 (Noting the invitation of FC s 8(4) to analyze the applicability of a right to juristic persons.)

The courts have repeatedly noted that the failure to accord juristic persons the protection of fundamental rights would 'undermine the very fabric of our democratic state.' Implicit in this view is the recognition that the resources of juristic persons — and in particular corporations — will ensure that the courts have an opportunity to hear constitutional challenges that natural persons might not be able to afford to bring.[1]

Of course, some rights are clearly not designed to benefit corporations. Corporations have neither conscience nor religious belief within the meaning of FC s 15. They are neither citizens for the purposes of FC s 19 or FC s 20, nor children for the purposes of FC s 28. They have neither life in terms of FC s 11, nor human dignity in terms of FC s 10.[2] They can associate (FC s 18). But they would be hard pressed to assemble (FC s 17). Other rights must apply to corporations if their presence in the text is to be even partially vindicated.[3]

Newspapers, radio stations and television networks must be able to benefit from the freedom of expression.[4] Only such entities are capable of exercising the right in its robust and intended sense.[5]

Similarly, it is difficult to imagine the rights to property and economic activity belonging to natural persons and not to juristic persons. Even in a regulated

[1] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB'). Concerns that corporations would skew rights analysis are, as yet, not reflected in the case law. For example, only 3 of the 26 Constitutional Court judgments reported in the 2002 South Africa Law Reports involved juristic persons relying on provisions in the Bill of Rights.

[2] See Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Hyundai')(Juristic persons are not the bearers of rights to human dignity.) Cf JR Midgley 'An Artifical Situation' (1988) 105 SALJ 415 (Juristic persons should possess personality rights in appropriate circumstances, citing supportive obiter from Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyers Films (Edms) Bpk 1979 (1) SA 441 (A).) See also Sage Holdings v Financial Mail 1993 (2) SA 451 (A)(Jurisitic persons have right to privacy.)

[3] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 57–58 (Court held that FC s 8(4) was not in conflict with Constitutional Principle II. It reasoned that many 'universally accepted fundamental rights' would be fully recognised only if afforded to juristic persons as well as natural persons, and it was, furthermore, wrong to equate juristic persons with powerful and wealthy corporations as there were countless small companies and close corporations that needed and deserved protection no less than natural persons did.) See also AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1994 (4) BCLR 31, 38 (E)(Bill of Rights must protect juristic persons to be effective.)

[4] Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)(Media plays an indispensable role in creating conditions for an open and democratic society); Sayed v Editor, Cape Times 2004 (1) SA 58, 62–63 (C)(High Court suggests that given democracy's place as an animating value of the Final Constitution, when the media publishes political speech the bar to defamatory action needs to be somewhat higher.) See also Dario Milo & Anthony Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS September 2005) Chapter 42.

[5] See Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finances) Case 42/04 CT (27 May 2005)(Closed corporation entitled to rely on FC s 16 in defense of claim of trademark infringement); Government of the Republic of South Africa v Sunday Times Newspaper & Another 1995 (2) SA 221 (T)(Press and other media afforded protection of IC s 15 because of role juristic persons play in vindicating the values which animate the right.) See also Edmonton Journal v Alberta (AG) [1989] 2 SCR 1326, 64 DLR (4th) 577.

market economy, corporations must be able to form some strong expectations about what kind of property they can hold and transfer.[1]

Privacy might be a right normally associated with intimacy, and intimacy with personhood. But commercial concerns have an interest in not being subject to unwarranted searches and seizures.[2]

Extending the equality right to juristic persons met with initial resistance. A number of courts and commentators argued that expanding the ambit of IC s 8 or FC s 9 so as to serve the interests of corporations threatened the primary purpose of the equality clause: the amelioration of the discriminatory effects of apartheid and the creation of a more egalitarian society.[3]

The Constitutional Court rejected this restrictive approach because it artificially suppresses questions worth asking. While FC s 9(3) relies on various indicia of human personhood for a finding of unfair discrimination, FC s 9(1) — the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law — asks whether the law reflects irrational distinctions or naked preferences. As Justice O'Regan wrote in East Zulu Motors (Pty) Ltd v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council and Others:

> The first question to be answered in any equality challenge, therefore, is whether the governmental action or regulation under consideration is rational. The question is not

[1] See FNB (supra) at para 45 (After noting the invitation by FC s 8(4) to apply the right to property to juristic persons, the Court wrote that '[e]ven more so than in relation to the right to privacy, denying companies entitlement to property rights would . . . lead to grave disruptions and would undermine the very fabric of our democratic State. It would have a disastrous impact on the business world generally, on creditors of companies and, more especially, on shareholders in companies. The property rights of natural persons can only be fully and properly realised if such rights are afforded to companies as well as to natural persons.') Where the US Constitution affects property, corporations are generally permitted to seek vindication of their rights. The 'takings' and 'contract' clauses offer corporations benefits equal to those extended to natural persons. See United States Trust Company of New York, Trustee v New Jersey 431 US 1 (1977)(State's impairment of its contractual obligations with either corporations or individuals will be constitutional only if the impairment is 'reasonable and necessary to support an important public purpose.') The 'equal protection' clause offers corporations less protection than many so-called 'suspect' classes of natural person. Compare Lindsey v Natural Carbonic Gas Company 220 US 61 (1911)(Economic regulation will not be struck down if the means employed bear some rational relation to a legitimate government objective) with Strauder v West Virginia 100 US 303 (1880)(Racial classifications will only be upheld if they are necessary and narrowly tailored to promote a compelling state interest).

[2] See Hyundai (supra) at para 18 ('Juristic persons are not the bearers of human dignity. Their privacy rights, therefore, can never be as intense as those of human beings. However, this does not mean that juristic persons are not protected by the right to privacy. Exclusion of juristic persons would lead to the possibility of grave violations of privacy in our society, with serious implications for the conduct of affairs. The State might, for instance, have free licence to search and seize material from any non-profit organisation or corporate entity at will. This would obviously lead to grave disruptions and would undermine the very fabric of our democratic State. Juristic persons therefore do enjoy the right to privacy, although not to the same extent as natural persons.')

[3] Giving corporations equality rights in order to pursue commercial ends, it was said, would diminish the symbolic purpose of the clause and weaken the standards employed by the judiciary. (That is, the judicial deference paid to legislative restrictions on commercial concerns would result in similar forms of deference in non-commercial cases.) Corporations, so the argument went, are perfectly capable of taking care of themselves in the democratic process and do not need the solicitude FC s 9 affords. See Azhar Cachalia, Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis, Nicholas Haysom, Penuell Maduna & Gilbert Marcus 'Application' in Fundamental Rights in the New Constitution (1994) 21–3 (Arguing that IC s 8 ought not to be > whether the government may have achieved its purposes more effectively in a different manner, or whether its regulation or conduct could have been more closely connected to its purposes. The test is simply whether there is a reason for the differentiation that is rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose.[1]

Such a relatively deferential test is well-suited to corporations. By extending equality rights to juristic persons, the Court gives corporations the opportunity to reveal manifestations of irrationality and corruption in the law-making process.[2] By limiting such equality enquiries to the kind of irrationality unlikely to correct itself through democratic political processes, the Court has answered the objection that the extension of equality rights to corporations will undermine the more important remedial ends of FC s 9.

31.4 Application under the Final Constitution: Burdens of the Bill of Rights

(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Khumalo v Holomisa[3]

(i) Facts

Bantu Holomisa, the leader of the United Democratic Movement, sued the Sunday World over an article that alleged that Mr Holomisa was involved with a gang of bank robbers and under police investigation for his involvement. In the High Court, the Sunday World averred, by way of exception, that because the contents of the article 'were matters in the public interest' and that the respondent had failed 'to allege in his particulars of claim that the article was' false, Mr Holomisa had failed to satisfy the requirements for a cause of action in defamation. The High Court dismissed the extended to corporations). But see Cathi Albertyn & Janet Kentridge 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 149, 167–72 (While calling for a restrictive approach to IC s 8(2) that would largely track the reasoning of the Canadian Supreme Court in Andrews, the authors suggest that corporations might successfully seek solace under the more general provisions of IC s 8(1). IC s 8(1) is now FC s 9(1).) See also Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 at 174, (1989) 56 DLR (4th) 1 (Protection of Charter s 15 flows only to those individuals or groups who can establish discrimination based upon a personal characteristic either enumerated in s 15 or shown to be analogous to one of those grounds); Cathi Albertyn 'Equality' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 51.

[1] 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 24. See also Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25 ('It is convenient, for descriptive purposes, to refer to the differentiation presently under discussion as 'mere differentiation'. In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional State is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional State. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the State is bound to function in a rational manner. This has been said to promote the need for governmental action to relate to a defensible vision of the public good, as well as to enhance the coherence and integrity of legislation.')

[2] See AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1994 (4) BCLR 31, 38 (E) '[I]t is difficult to appreciate why a corporation should not be entitled to enforce [IC] s 8 where an executive or administrative functionary blatantly treats it unequally from all other persons.')

[3] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC).

applicant's exception.[1] The High Court did so on the grounds that it was bound by the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in National Media Ltd v Bogoshi.[2]

(ii) Holding

Given that there could be no appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal in terms of a dismissal of an exception, the applicants had no choice but to seek leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court. To succeed the applicants had to show that the common-law rules of defamation as they stood post-Bogoshi violated the Final Constitution.

The applicants relied primarily on FC s 16. In the alternative, the applicants relied upon FC s 39(2). Either way, asserted the applicants, the role of the mass media in an open and democratic society vindicated their position that the current law of defamation had to be altered.

The Constitutional Court rejected the applicants' claims. While noting the value of a robust exchange of ideas in any democracy, the Court found that the Final Constitution's commitment to human dignity — and thus to self-worth and reputation — was of greater import. The Khumalo Court held that the defense of reasonableness developed in Bogoshi, rather than a requirement that the plaintiffs prove an allegedly defamatory statement false, better struck the desired balance between these competing interests.

More importantly for the purposes of this chapter, the Khumalo Court addressed the question of whether the common law of defamation was subject to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. The Khumalo Court held that, contrary to the applicants' contention, FC s 8(1) did not subject the law that governed disputes between private parties to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. It held instead that FC s 8(2) determined the conditions under which direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private parties would occur. Under FC s 8(2), the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights apply directly to disputes between private parties where a specific provision is interpreted by a court to bind the party against whom the right is asserted. In the instant case, the Khumalo Court found that FC s 16 bound the private party relying upon the existing common-law rules of defamation.

(iii) Court's reasoning

The Khumalo Court's application analysis begins at paragraph 29 of the judgment. It reads, in pertinent part:

> The applicants' exception relies directly on section 16 of the Constitution, despite the fact that none of the parties to the defamation action is the state, or any organ of state.[3]

The Khumalo Court then goes on to rehearse the language of FC s 8. Note, for now, that the provisions of the Chapter apply to 'all law' and 'bind … the judiciary'. Recall that Justice Kentridge's argument in Du Plessis v De Klerk for indirect application relied heavily on the absence of the 'judiciary' in IC s 7(1) and the notion that 'all law' in s IC 7(2) was modified by 'legislative and executive' in IC s 7(1). Together IC s 7(1) and IC s 7(2) were read to exclude emanations of law from the judiciary — in particular, the common law — and disputes between private persons — since no state actor was present — from the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

[1] Holomisa v Khumalo & Others 2002 (3) SA 38 (T).
[2] 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA)('Bogoshi').
[3] Khumalo (supra) at para 29.

In paragraph 30, Justice O'Regan, for a unanimous Khumalo Court, notes that applicants' counsel made the comparison between the texts of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution the basis for their contention that the Final Constitution must be read to apply to all law and to bind private parties no matter what kind of law governs a dispute. Counsel placed great emphasis on the inclusion of those phrases — 'all law' and 'binds . . . the judiciary' in FC s 8(1) — that were absent from IC s 7(1).

In paragraph 31, the Khumalo Court says that this argument cannot succeed. Why? Because the Final Constitution ostensibly distinguishes between two kinds of parties burdened: state actors in FC s 8(1) and private actors, potentially, in FC s 8(2). But look closer at what the Khumalo Court does — or doesn't do. It forgets to analyze the phrase 'applies to all law'. Justice O'Regan writes: 'Section 8(1) binds the legislature, executive, judiciary and all organs of state without qualification to the terms of the Bill of Rights.' Despite argument from counsel, the Khumalo Court ignores the phrase 'all law' entirely. The Khumalo Court then fails to take cognizance of the phrase 'binds . . . the judiciary.' The Khumalo Court never actually engages the applicants' arguments: the Court's cursory conclusions in this regard are all the more surprising given that it framed the application debate in these very terms in Du Plessis.

In paragraph 32, Justice O'Regan writes:

> Were the applicants' argument to be correct, it would be hard to give a purpose to section 8(3) of the Constitution. For if the effect of sections 8(1) and (2) read together were to be that the common law in all circumstances would fall within the direct application of the Constitution, section 8(3) would have no apparent purpose. We cannot adopt an interpretation which would render a provision of the Constitution to be without any apparent purpose.[1]

For starters, the Khumalo Court's textual argument is wrong on several crucial counts. First, FC s 8(1) alone makes 'all law' subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. One does not need FC s 8(2) for that particular purpose. Second, the applicants' argument does not render FC s 8(3) meaningless.[2] The notion that FC s 8(3) would be meaningless if FC s 8(1) really applies to 'all law' is completely inconsistent with the Court's own jurisprudence — before and after Khumalo — on the many uses of FC s 8(3).[3] The Court's own (non-Khumalo) jurisprudence supports an alternative account — my preferred reading — that gives every provision in FC s 8 a purpose and still makes good the drafter's intent to apply the Bill of Rights directly to disputes between private parties governed by the common law.

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 32.
[2] See § 31.1*(c)*(Precis of the preferred reading of FC s 8).
[3] See § 31.4*(d)*(i) infra (On the meaning of FC s 8(3)).

(iv) The black letter law and the preferred reading

The black letter law on application in terms of Khumalo takes the following form.

FC s 8(1) stands for the following two propositions:

- All law governing disputes between the state and a natural or juristic person is subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.
- All state conduct that gives rise to a dispute between the state and a natural or juristic person is subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

FC s 8(2) stands for the following proposition:

- Disputes between natural and/or juristic persons may be subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights if the specific right asserted is deemed to apply.

FC s 8(3) stands for the following proposition:

- Where direct application of the right asserted occurs in terms of FC s 8(2), and the court further finds a non-justifiable abridgment of that right, then the court must develop the law in a manner that gives adequate effect to the right infringed.[1]

The preferred reading on application takes the following form.

FC s 8(1) covers 'all law' — regardless of provenance, form, and or the parties before the court. FC s 8(1) also covers all government conduct — by all branches of government and all organs of state — whether that conduct takes the form of law or reflects some other manifestation or exercise of state power.[2] In sum, FC s 8(1) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- All rules of law and every exercise of state power are subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

FC s 8(2) covers dispute-generating conduct between private actors not 'adequately' governed by an express rule of law. There are two basic ways to read 'not governed adequately by an express rule of law.' First, it could contemplate the possibility of a dispute over an aspect of social life that is not currently governed by any rule of law at all. Such instances will be rare. Indeed, there is good reason to believe that such instances do not exist at all. The second and better reading views non-rule governed conduct in a much narrower sense. In many instances a

[1] FC s 39(2), although not engaged expressly in Khumalo, stands, under a secondary body of black letter law, for the following three propositions:

- Where an asserted right is, under FC s 8(2), deemed not to apply directly to a dispute between private parties, the court may still develop the common law or interpret the apposite provision of legislation in light of the more general objects of the Bill of Rights.
- Even where a right is asserted directly, the court may still speak as if a finding of inconsistency or invalidity requires that a new rule of common law be developed in terms of FC s 39(2).

[2] The cosmology of common law jurisdictions is such that some lawyers express discomfort with the notion that a common law rule found inconsistent with the Final Constitution could occasion a finding of invalidity. But that locution is, in fact, endorsed by the Constitutional Court. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 556 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 73 (Court declares 'common-law offence of sodomy . . . inconsistent with the 1996 Constitution and invalid.') See also Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC).

body of extant rules — or even background norms — may be said to govern a particular set of private relationships. FC s 8(2) calls our attention to the fact that these rules of law (common law or legislation) may not give adequate effect to the specific substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights and may require the courts to develop a new rule of law that does give adequate effect to a particular provision in the Bill of Rights in so far as a dispute between private persons requires it to do so. In sum, FC s 8(2) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- While, on the Hohfeldian view, a body of extant rules — or background norms — will always govern a social relationship, those same rules will not always give adequate effect to a provision in the Bill of Rights. FC s 8(2) calls attention to the potential gap between extant rules of law and the prescriptive content of the Bill of Rights, and, where necessary, requires the courts to bridge that gap by bringing the law into line with the demands of the particular constitutional right or rights deemed to apply.

If we decide that the right invoked engages the conduct in question and that the right has been unjustifiably infringed, then we move on to FC s 8(3). FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b) enjoin the court to develop new rules of law and remedies designed to give effect to the right infringed. Thus, where FC s 8(2) acknowledges gaps in existing legal doctrine, FC s 8(3) aims to fill those gaps. In sum, FC s 8(3) should be understood to stand for the following proposition:

- If the court finds that the right relied upon warrants direct application to the conduct that has given rise to the dispute, and further finds a non-justifiable abridgment of the right, then FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b) guide the court's development of the law in a manner that gives adequate effect to the right infringed.

It may be, however, that the prescriptive content of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights does not engage the rule of law or conduct at issue. Two things can happen. A court can decide that the Bill of Rights has nothing at all to say about the dispute in question. A court can decide that although no specific provision of the Bill of Rights is offended by the law or the conduct in question, the Bill of Rights warrants the development of the law in a manner that coheres with the general spirit, purport and objects of Chapter 2. In sum, FC s 39(2) should be understood to stand for the following:

- Where no specific right can be relied upon by a party challenging a given rule of law or the extant construction of a rule of law, the courts are obliged to interpret legislation or to develop the law in light of the general objects of the Bill of Rights.

The black letter law and the preferred reading establish the parameters of the debate. As I noted at the outset,[1] the justification for the black letter law requires a good faith reconstruction of the arguments in Khumalo. That reconstruction follows directly below. Thereafter, I entertain arguments that justify the preferred reading.

[1] See § 31.1*(c)* supra.

(v) A good faith reconstruction of Khumalo

The thinness of Khumalo's reasoning makes several of its arguments appear tendentious.[1] However, a good faith reconstruction suggests that Khumalo may not be entirely wrong, just much less than optimal.

Let us begin this exercise by concerning ourselves with questions of textual plausibility or what Frank Michelman calls naturalness. That does not mean we set aside forever questions about what would be the ideologically or pragmatically preferable way to parse the first three subsections of FC s 8. I only postpone them.

One straightforward way to parse FC ss 8(1), (2), (3) — one that I believe closely tracks Justice O'Regan's intent in Khumalo — begins with a perfectly understandable and workable distinction between a constitutional norm's range of application and that same norm's prescriptive content.[2] It is entirely possible — the Justice might say — that FC s 8(1), and the Bill of Rights, applies to all law in the following sense. FC s 8(1) rules out any contention that a piece of law is exempt from the demand for conformity with the requirements of the Bill of Rights because that piece of law falls within some genus of law — say, private law, or common law — with which the Bill of Rights is not concerned. It does not follow from this reading of FC s 8(1), however, that the extension or the prescriptive content of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights engage the content of every rule of law.

Take the following two norms — constitutional norm A and non-constitutional norm B. To say, as per FC s 8(1), that Norm A applies to Norm B is to say that Norm B cannot stand insofar as Norm B is inconsistent with Norm A. To see whether it is inconsistent, we have to know the content of both Norm A and Norm B, or be in a position to determine the content of one or both norms by what would normally be an act of judicial interpretation. Suppose, then, that the content of Norm A is (or is determined by some judge to be) exhausted by the proposition that 'no state lawmaker or state official may exercise lawmaking or other official powers in such a way as to limit any person's freedom of expression.' Norm A does not engage actions by any non-state actor or any other set of circumstances. Suppose that the content of Norm B is (or is determined by some judge to be) exhausted by the proposition that 'private employers have complete freedom, subject to contractual modification, to fire employees for saying things the employer does not like, on or off the work site.' Norm A undoubtedly applies, in a general or a formal sense, to Norm B (or, if you prefer, it applies to conduct justified in terms of Norm B). But in so far as Norm B is undoubtedly required to pass a test of compliance or harmony with Norm A, Norm B does, indeed, pass the test. Why? Because Norm A is solely concerned about censorship by state actors wielding official powers and has nothing to say, so to speak, about Norm B's content — expression in the workplace.

[1] Not everyone believes that the five paragraphs on application in Khumalo are a disappointment. See, eg, Chris Roederer 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57 and the discussion of this article at § 31, Appendix 3*(a)*, infra.

[2] I am deeply indebted to Frank Michelman for working through this good faith reconstruction of Khumalo with me. Much of the language in this section is drawn directly from our e-mail correspondence, and the better turns of phrase belong to him. Any mistakes made in this good faith reconstruction remain mine alone.

Armed with such a distinction between the range of application of constitutional norms and the prescriptive content of constitutional norms, one can generate an orderly set of definitions for the first three subsections of FC s 8 that assigns independent meaning to each subsection. FC s 8(1) stands for the proposition that no genus of law is exempt from testing against the norms in the Bill of Rights. (This general claim is neither empty nor idle: as we saw in Du Plessis — and in our treatment of the application jurisprudence of other jurisdictions — there remains an abiding inclination to exempt the common law from constitutional inspection.) FC s 8(2) stands for the proposition that the prescriptive content of one or another norm in the Bill of Rights may engage or 'bind' conduct other than that of state officials wielding official powers. That is, FC s 8(2) stands for the proposition that the prescriptive content of one or another norm in the Bill of Rights 'may' engage or 'bind' the conduct of a natural person or a juristic person. (This general claim is neither empty nor idle: as we saw in Du Plessis — and in our treatment of the application jurisprudence of other jurisdictions — the prevailing instinct is to hold that the norms in a Bill of Rights are largely unconcerned with private conduct.) FC s 8(3) provides direction for courts in cases in which: (i) they find that a specific substantive provision binds the conduct of a private party in terms of FC s 8(2); and (ii) the law relied upon by that private party fails the test of compliance with the specific substantive provision deemed to bind the private party.

There may not, at first glance, appear to be any serious flaw in the foregoing textual exegesis. This exegesis also coheres with a perfectly plausible set of intentions to be attributed to the drafters. First, that there is but one system of law and all of the law in that system derives from the basic law — as reflected in the norms of the Final Constitution. Second, since all rules of law must comport with the dictates of the basic law, and since the law structures, or governs, all conduct, then all conduct must, ultimately, comport with the dictates of the basic law.

(aa) The First Objection

The Khumalo Court quite consciously crossed over the public-private divide in the application debate. The text of the Final Constitution left it little choice. Khumalo's one step forward is, however, followed by two steps back. The judgment does not endorse the proposition that all legal disputes are grounded in exercises of public power that must comport with constitutional dictates. Whereas all disputes between the state and an individual are subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights, Khumalo tells us that only some disputes between private parties will be subject to some of the provisions of the Bill of Rights. This revised public-private distinction in application jurisprudence creates the following anomaly.

In Du Plessis, this traditional view of constitutional review was used to suppress direct application of the Bill of Rights with respect to common law disputes between private parties. In Khumalo, the traditional view of constitutional review is used to defer — and potentially suppress — direct application of the Bill of Rights. Direct application of the substantive provisions is deferred — and by that I simply mean turned into a question of interpretation — with respect to all disputes between private parties. It matters not whether the law governing disputes between private parties is grounded in statute, subordinate legislation, regulation common law or customary law. The Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights was, in terms of Du Plessis, understood to apply directly, and unequivocally, to legislation, subordinate legislation or regulations that governed private disputes. The Final Constitution's Bill of Rights, in terms of Khumalo, does not. The two steps back: less law is subject to the unqualifiedly direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights under the Khumalo Court's reading of the Final Constitution than it was under the Du Plessis Court's reading of the Interim Constitution.

(bb) The Second Objection

The Constitutional Court has created a legal regime in which (1) every exercise of state power is subject to constitutional review[1] and (2) every law is subject to the objective theory of unconstitutionality.[2] Much is rightly made of the Constitutional Court's bold assertion in Fedsure, Pharmaceutical Manufacturers and their progeny that all law derives its force from the basic law (the Final Constitution) and that all law and all conduct sourced in the law must, as a logical matter, be consistent with the basic law.[1] Despite the first requirement — and despite the fact that FC s 8(1) applies to all law and binds both the legislature and the executive — legislation, subordinate legislation or regulation that governs a dispute between private persons will not automatically be subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. Those same pieces of legislation, subordinate legislation or regulation would automatically be subject to the direct application of the provisions of the Bill of Rights if they were invoked by an individual in a dispute with the State. The absurdity of this distinction is brought into even sharper relief by the Court's own doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. (The relative desuetude of this doctrine is offset by the fact that it has, as yet, not been repudiated by the Constitutional Court.[2]) In its most general form, the doctrine holds that the validity or the invalidity of any given law is not contingent upon the circumstances (say, the timing) of the case, or, more specifically, the parties to the case. If a provision of legislation would be deemed to be unconstitutional when invoked by an individual in a dispute between the State and an individual, then it must likewise be unconstitutional when invoked by an individual in a dispute between that individual and another individual. However, the Court's differentiation between FC s 8(1) disputes that are invariably subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights and FC s 8(2) disputes that are not invariably subject to direct application of the Bill of Rights is logically incompatible with the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. The Khumalo application doctrine relies upon the ability to distinguish constitutional cases — and thus the constitutionality of laws — upon the basis of the parties before the court. The doctrine of objective unconstitutionality denies the ability to distinguish constitutional cases — and thus the constitutionality of laws — upon the basis of the parties before the court.

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of The Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers'); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure').

[2] See National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at paras 28–29 ('On the objective theory of unconstitutionality adopted by this Court a litigant who has standing may properly rely on the objective unconstitutionality of a statute for the relief sought, even though the right unconstitutionally infringed is not that of the litigant in question but of some other person'); Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party & Others 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) at para 64 (In re-affirming its commitment to the objective theory of unconstitutionality, the Court wrote that 'the practice that has been urged upon this Court carries with it the distinct danger that Courts may restrict their enquiry into the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament and concentrate on the position of a particular litigant'); Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 26–28 ('The subjective positions in which parties to a dispute may find themselves cannot have a bearing on the status of the provisions of a statute under attack. The Constitutional Court, or any other competent Court for that matter, ought not to restrict its enquiry to the position of one of the parties to a dispute in order to determine the validity of a law. The consequence of such a (subjective) approach would be to recognise the validity of a statute in respect of one litigant, only to deny it to another. Besides resulting in a denial of equal protection of the law, considerations of legal certainty, being a central consideration in a constitutional state, militate against the adoption of the subjective approach.') The generous conditions for standing ensure that the objective theory of unconstitutionality will continue to operate in practice — even if the Court refuses to announce or to renounce its position on the doctrine. See, especially, Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg & Associates: In re Eisenberg & Associates v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC)(Attorneys' firm whose practice concerned mainly immigration matters was granted standing — in its own interest and as an interested member of the public — to mount constitutional challenge to immigration regulations passed without requisite notice and comment. Although the regulations did not effect the firm's members directly, the Court found that the firm had an interest in proper notice and comment procedures being followed. Said regulations were found unconstitutional.)

That legislation governing a dispute between private persons is not automatically subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights is, I think, one of the strongest objections to the Khumalo Court's construction. Not even the good faith reconstruction of Justice O'Regan's position can meet this objection.

Several readers, upon encountering this objection, were puzzled. Others denied its truth. What explains the bemusement? It seems obvious that when a statute's constitutionality is challenged, appropriately, in a dispute between private persons, the Constitutional Court — post-Khumalo — will not hesitate to apply provisions of the Bill of Rights directly. It will not even consider submitting the law at issue to the 'test' set out in FC s 8(2). (That test is described above in the good faith reconstruction.) Examples of this refusal to submit a dispute between private parties governed legislation post-Khumalo to FC 8(2) analysis are legion. For example, in Daniels v Campbell, the Intestate Succession Act governed the distribution of an estate that was the subject of a dispute between private litigants.[1] A provision of the Bill of Rights, FC s 9(3), was applied directly by the High Court to invalidate the Act. My claim, in short, is that the Constitutional Court's construction of FC s 8(2) in Khumalo — on both Justice O'Regan's account and the good faith reconstruction — bars it from confirming the High Court's order without first deciding whether FC s 8(2) permits the application of FC s 9(3) to this particular private dispute. Justice Moseneke's minority opinion, which supports the High Court's disposition, fails, in terms of the Constitutional Court's own precedent, to analyze the Intestate Succession Act and the parties before the court in terms of FC s 8(2), before applying FC s 9 and invalidating that provision of the Act that discriminates against partners that enter into marital covenants under Muslim law.

[1] The finest restatement of the law on this subject is to be found in Frank Michelman's chapter in this work. See Frank Michleman 'The Rule of Law, Legality, and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] See, especially, De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, WLD 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)(Confirms expressly the continued vitality of the objective theory of unconstitutionality.) See also Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In re Financial Services Board v Van der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) at para 20 ('This Court has adopted the doctrine of objective constitutional invalidity.')

Perhaps, as one interlocutor has suggested, few would care to raise such an objection to Justice Moseneke's analysis. No member of the Constitutional Court would dream of raising it. (And, of course, none did.) Khumalo could not possibly have committed them to the position I have just attributed to them. (But, of course, it did.)

My point is not primarily empirical. I am not saying that the Constitutional Court does do what Judge Moseneke fails to do. My point is one of logic and consistency. The Constitutional Court has, in Khumalo, committed itself to a particular analytical framework and Justice O'Regan's justification for this framework relies heavily on her assertion that her construction of FC s 8 is the only one that can give all the words in FC s 8 independent meaning. And yet, despite the fact that our acceptance of Khumalo turns on it being the only 'possible' account of how FC s 8 operates, neither the Court nor its individual members feel compelled to discipline themselves in the manner that they themselves have decided FC s 8 demands.

This general claim is neither idle nor empty. We can expect that the Constitutional Court will continue to do what Justice Moseneke did in Daniels. They will routinely apply the Bill of Rights to private disputes without feeling obliged to honour the demands of the official Khumalo-construction of FC s 8(2).

In order to clarify exactly what is at stake here with respect to my claim of a logical contretemps, let us return to the distinction made, in the good faith reconstruction, between a norm's range of application and its prescriptive content. Suppose the Constitutional Court had concluded in Daniels that 'spouse' cannot be construed to cover Juleiga Daniels. Direct application of FC s 9(3) to the Intestate Succession Act is, then, the only line of constitutional argument left open to her. On the good faith reconstruction of Justice O'Regan's account, the next question must logically be whether, according to the inquiry required by FC s 8(2), the prescriptive content of FC s 9(3) reaches the conduct, in these circumstances, of the natural and juristic persons with whom Ms Daniels contends for a share of the estate. Only if we answer 'yes' to FC s 8(2)'s application inquiry do we reach the point where we can test the Act's discriminatory treatment of Muslim-rite marital partners against the normative demands of FC s 9(3).

However counter-intuitive this account may seem, that (re)construction is exactly what the Khumalo Court endorses. The thinness of Justice O'Regan's argument simply masks its 'unnaturalness', its 'textual implausibility'.

[1] Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 735 (CC).

Does the Constitutional Court offer an alternative, somewhere in its jurisprudence, to this rather laborious mode of analysis? Given the Final Constitution's generous provisions for standing, a litigant in Juleiga Daniels' position will generally be able to launch litigation in the name of some public official responsible for carrying out the obnoxious statutory directive, thus avoiding FC s 8(2) altogether. That simply invites the reply — from me — that such a move is not contemplated by Khumalo and is fundamentally at odds with how Justice O'Regan expressly states that FC s 8 must be read. (Indeed it should be obvious that such a move is consistent only with my preferred reading.)

(cc) A Third Objection

The good faith reconstruction has nothing to say about the binding of the judiciary. At most, it may allow us to follow the weak reading of the phrase 'binds the judiciary' offered below.[1] In short, the weak reading holds that the judiciary's behaviour as a government institution — as manifest in tenders for contracts or hiring practices — is subject to constitutional norms.

This weak reading is strained for three reasons. First, one would have expected that judicial actions as government conduct would be subject to constitutional dictates regardless of whether they were expressly mentioned in the text or not. Second, the plain meaning of the text suggests that all judicial actions — including judicial emanations such as the common law — are without express exception (since none is offered) measured for harmony with the dictates of the Bill of Rights. Third, it defies both logic and common sense to argue that when FC s 8(1) binds the legislature and the judiciary, it is intended to bind the actions of a legislator or a judge solely in their official, but non-lawmaking, capacity. When we bind the legislature, we must bind both the law it makes and the actions it takes. The text offers no grounds for treating the judiciary any differently. While we do want state actors — legislators and judges alike — to care about the manner in which they comport themselves, we care primarily about the law that they make. But that is not what Khumalo says, nor can it be reconstructed in such a manner as to say so.

What should really trouble the Constitutional Court — and any other reader of the judgment — is that the Khumalo Court refuses to give the phrase 'binds the judiciary' any meaning at all. Perhaps the most damaging consequence of this structured silence is that it offends the 'surplusage' canon of constitutional interpretation articulated in Khumalo itself: The canon reads:

> We cannot adopt an interpretation which would render a provision of the Constitution to be without any apparent purpose.[2]

Not only does Justice O'Regan not give the provision any apparent purpose, she cannot, even on the good faith reconstruction, give it any apparent purpose. Remember that the good faith reconstruction gains its traction through a distinction between a constitutional norm's range of application and that same norm's prescriptive content. That creates the interpretational space to argue that while FC s 8(1) speaks to the norm's range of application — namely to every conceivable genus of law — FC s 8(2) speaks to the prescriptive content of a norm and directs us to consider whether that prescriptive content ought to be understood to govern the private conduct (of the private party) that constitutes the gravamen of the complaint. This good faith reconstruction does no work with respect to the phrase 'binds the judiciary' because the distinction applies to 'law' and not to a sphere of government. The reason the good faith reconstruction cannot be recast in a manner that speaks to the differing concerns of FC s 8(1) and FC s 8(2) is that FC s 8(2) does not concern itself with the lawmaking activity of any lawmaking institution — legislative, executive or judicial.

[1] The strong reading and the weak reading — as well as the case law that engages the phrase 'binds the judiciary' — are covered below at § 31.4*(b)*(iii).

[2] Khumalo (supra) at para 32.

Can we save Khumalo by generating a second good faith reconstruction? No, we cannot. There is simply no way to create another account of the meaning of FC s 8 that takes cognizance of the phrase 'binds the judiciary' and that fits the first good faith reconstruction. At best, we will have two separate accounts of the single set of phenomena to which FC s 8 addresses itself. As with all phenomena, we ought to prefer the simpler of two explanations and not engage in any unnecessary multiplication of entities and theories to explain them. By choosing not to give content to the phrase 'binds the judiciary', Justice O'Regan may have saved the Court from an obvious violation of Occam's Razor. But that choice does nothing to save Khumalo's account of the phenomena it claims to explain.

(dd) A Fourth Objection

The final objection to Khumalo's construction of FC s 8 turns on the style of the argument. Recall that the Court only concludes that the common law dispute between Khumalo and Holomisa requires direct horizontal application at paragraph 33 of the judgment. One would have thought that the Court would have dealt with application in its natural place, after deciding whether the court has jurisdiction and whether the case is justiciable. It doesn't. After deciding whether the appeal has been properly lodged with the Constitutional Court,[1] the Court initiates its discussion of the substantive law with an overview of the recently revised law of defamation.[2] The Court vindicates Bogoshi's 'new' defense of reasonableness and its elimination of strict liability. It endorses the Bogoshi Court's view that media organs may not claim the absence of an intent to harm as a defence.

After this discussion of defamation, the Court offers a rather peculiar account of the role of the media in creating the conditions for an open and democratic society.[3] The concluding paragraph about freedom of expression and its role in our democracy is particularly telling. Justice O'Regan writes:

> although freedom of expression is fundamental to our democratic society, it is not a paramount value. It must be construed in the context of the other values enshrined in our Constitution. In particular, the values of human dignity, freedom and equality.[4]

[1] Khumalo (supra) at paras 1–5.
[2] Ibid at paras 16–21.
[3] Ibid at paras 21–25.
[4] Ibid at para 26.

FC ss 39 and 36 tell us that, with regard to the interpretation of the Final Constitution, we are to aim for 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom.' An open and democratic society should be based, at least in part, upon freedom.[1] Indeed, Justice O'Regan, writing for a unanimous Court in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence, states that freedom of expression and a panoply of related guarantees — assembly, association, belief, the franchise — 'lie at the heart of a democracy.'[2] Freedom of expression, she continues:

> is valuable for many reasons, including its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally. The Constitution recognises that individuals in our society need to be able to hear, form and express opinions and views freely on a wide range of matters . . . [F]reedom of expression [FC s 16] . . . freedom of religion, belief and opinion [FC s 15], the right to dignity [FC s 10], as well as the right to freedom of association [FC s 18], the right to vote and to stand for public office [FC s 19] and the right to assembly [FC 17] . . . taken together protect the right of individuals not only individually to form and express opinions, of whatever nature, but to establish associations and groups of like-minded people to foster and propagate such opinions. The rights implicitly recognise the importance, both for a democratic society and for individuals personally, of the ability to form and express opinions, whether individually or collectively, even where these views are controversial.[3]

What makes freedom of expression a 'non-paramount value' in the context of defamation and Khumalo goes unexplained. Justice O'Regan then goes on to describe how the foundational value of dignity vindicates an array of personality rights.[4]

In sum, before Justice O'Regan decides whether to engage the applicant's exception on the basis of freedom of expression, she has already told us in a rather roundabout way that: (a) the law of defamation is in pretty good shape post-Bogoshi; (b) that freedom of expression is important but not central to an open and democratic society; and (c) that dignity is a foundational constitutional value and that individual dignity — as viewed through the lens of reputation — is of paramount concern. Only then does Justice O'Regan decide that this matter warrants direct application of the Bill of Rights.

Based upon the Court's own jurisprudence and our good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, a court should first decide whether the provisions of Chapter 2 apply

[1] See Sayed v Editor, Cape Times 2004 (1) SA 58, 62–63 (C)(Constitutional Court in Khumalo supported the Supreme Court of Appeal in Bogoshi in rejecting an onus shift where the defamatory statement related to free and fair political activity. High Court suggests that given the primacy of place of democracy as an animating value in our constitutional enterprise, when the media publishes political speech, the bar to defamatory action needs to be somewhat higher.)

[2] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU') at paras 7–8.

[3] Ibid at paras 7–8. The Constitutional Court's minimalist approach means that while freedom of expression in SANDU is a paramount value for a democratic society, one that quite consciously embraces controversy at the same time as it signifies the moral agency — and thus the dignity — of each citizen, in Khumalo, freedom of expression is not a paramount value, and certainly not one that embraces controversy at the same time as it manifests a commitment to the moral agency of the speaker.

[4] Khumalo (supra) at paras 27–28.

to the dispute before the court. If, as in Khumalo, the court determines that freedom of expression applied directly, then the generally accepted two-stage rights enquiry would have begun with a first stage analysis of the scope of freedom of expression and whether the law of defamation resulted in a prima facie infringement of that right. In Khumalo, it would most certainly have been found to constitute such limitation. The second question would be whether the law of defamation — as currently constructed — was a justifiable limitation the right to freedom of expression. The Constitutional Court in Khumalo certainly would have found the law as concurrently construed to be 'proportional' under FC s 36. Khumalo fails to follow the accepted form of fundamental rights analysis in cases of direct application.[1] The judgment looks, in manner of delivery, much like the kinds of judgments in which, under FC s 39(2), the common law is developed via indirect application of the Bill of Rights.

The style of judgment suggests that the Khumalo Court considers it relatively unimportant to engage this dispute as if there is, in fact, direct application. Or more accurately, by structuring Khumalo as if it were simply a common law judgment, the Khumalo Court intimates that the difference between direct application and indirect application of the Bill of Rights is minimal. I might be inclined to accept this elision between the analytical processes required by FC s 8 and FC s 39(2) were it not for the fact that the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court have handed down judgments regarding constitutional jurisdiction, stare decisis and indirect application under FC s 39(2) that manifest a clear desire not to disturb settled bodies of common law precedent and that cannot help but immunize a substantial body of apartheid-era decisions from reconsideration by lower courts.

This last point requires some amplification.

Leaving aside the problem of surplusage raised by our courts' occasional interchangeable use of FC s 8 and FC s 39(2), the Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox, extending the reasoning of the Constitutional Court in Walters, has held that there is at least one critical difference between direct application under FC s 8 and indirect application under FC s 39(2).[2] A High Court may revisit pre-constitutional Appellate Division precedent only where a party has a colourable claim grounded in the direct application of a substantive provision of the Bill of Rights. High Courts may not alter existing common law precedent through indirect application of FC s 39(2). (The rest of our appellate courts' doctrine (whether pre-constitutional or post-constitutional) of constitutional stare decisis further constrains the High Courts' constitutional jurisdiction and is discussed at length below.[3]) What happens when our appellate courts marry this restrictive doctrine of stare decisis to an incrementalist gloss on FC s 39(2)? The spawn is an application doctrine that effectively disables the High Court from undertaking meaningful constitutional review of existing common law precedent (as well as all other constructions of law) and thereby protects 'traditional' conceptions of law and existing legal hierarchies. This observation about the manner in which a set of related doctrines that affect application, stare decisis and constitutional jurisdiction conspire to blunt the transformative potential of the basic law is one of the strongest rejoinders to those jurists and commentators who have suggested that whether one relies upon FC s 8 (1) or FC s 8 (2), or FC s 39(2), the song remains the same: namely, how should the law governing a dispute be developed, re-formulated or re-interpreted? If I am correct in my characterization of the Constitutional Court's proliferating doctrines on the status of the 'basic law' and their consequences in terms of the development of the case law, then (a) it does very much matter where one comes down on issues of application and (b) FC s 39(2) does not, in fact, offer nearly as much promise of transformation as some would hope.[1]

[1] See S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 318 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC); National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC); Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC).

[2] Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 2 (SCA); Ex parte Minister of Safety & Security: In re S v Walters 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 663 (CC).

[3] See § 31.4*(e)(x)*, 'Stare decisis', infra.

(b) Section 8(1)

(i) What the courts say FC s 8(1) means

To understand FC s 8(1), we need first to remind ourselves of the content of the comparable text of the Interim Constitution. The Interim Constitution read:

> 7(1): This Chapter shall bind all legislative and executive organs of state at all levels of government.
> 7(2): This Chapter shall apply to all law in force and all administrative decisions taken and acts performed during the period of operation of this Constitution.

The Final Constitution reads:

> 8(1) The Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all other organs of state.

The black letter law on the meaning of FC s 8(1), following Khumalo, takes the following form: All law and all conduct at issue in disputes between the state and a natural person or a juristic person is subject to the direct application of substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. Khumalo intimates — without expressly saying — that 'the law' referred to in FC s 8(1) is not law that governs disputes between private parties.

(ii) What FC s 8(1) should mean

(aa) The real meaning of 'all law'

FC s 8(1) places the phrase 'applies to all law' prior to any mention of a sphere or branchof government. The text no longer allows for an argument comparable to that offered by Kentridge AJ in Du Plessis, that 'legislature' and 'executive' modify 'all law'. To be aridly textual about it, 'all law' means 'all law'. In short, on the preferred reading, 'all law' embraces legislation, subordinate legislation, regulation, common law and customary law.

[1] See § 31.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 'Obligation to develop the common law', infra; § 31.4(e)(iv)(bb), 'FC s 39(2) and the transformation of the common law', infra; and § 31.4(e)*(viii), 'An objective normative value system', infra.

Recall that on the good faith reconstruction of the Khumalo Court's account of FC s 8, if one distinguishes between the range of application of and the prescriptive content of constitutional norms, one can generate an account in which FC 8(1) stands for the proposition that no genus of law is exempt — in the abstract — from testing against the norms in the Bill of Rights and still assign independent meaning to FC ss 8(2) and (3). In this respect, the good faith reconstruction and the preferred reading give 'all law' its common sense extension.

(bb) The application of FC s 8(1) to the Common Law

As a matter of black letter law post-Khumalo, FC s 8(1) subjects the common law governing disputes between the state or an an individual to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. As a matter of common sense, the black letter law post-Khumalo on FC s 8(1) should make the common law governing private relationships subject to direct constitutional scrutiny as well.

The Constitutional Court seems confused about what 'law' in FC s 8(1) actually denotes. In President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union, the Court suggests that 'all law' refers to the common law irrespective of the kind of dispute it governs:

> the right to a fair trial has now been entrenched in our Constitution. Section 35(3) of the Constitution which deals with criminal proceedings provides that 'every accused person has a right to a fair trial'. Section 34 of the Constitution … applies to other proceedings … These provisions must be read with s 8(1) of the Constitution … It follows that s 34, which is part of the Bill of Rights, applies to the Judiciary. Moreover, the common law, which is 'law' within the meaning of s 8(1), is also subject to s 34 and in terms of s 39(2) must be developed in accordance with its provisions.[1]

'Law' and the 'binds the judiciary' appear in SARFU to possess their common sense extension.

(iii) The binding of the judiciary

FC s 8(1) contains the phrase 'binds … the judiciary'. Recall that the absence of 'binds … the judiciary' in IC ss 7(1) or 7(2) of the Interim Constitution enabled Kentridge AJ to argue that judicial emanations, namely common law precedent and rulings based thereon, were immunized from direct application of the Bill of Rights.[2] The presence of the phrase 'the judiciary' in the Final Constitution should have driven the Khumalo Court to the conclusion that the emanations of the judiciary — its interpretation of legislation and its common law rulings — count as law directly subject to Chapter 2's Bill of Rights. It did not.

The Khumalo Court seems obliged — even on the good faith reconstruction — to adopt a much weaker reading of FC s 8(1). On such a reading, the binding of the judiciary simply means that the judiciary's behaviour as a government institution — as manifest in tenders for contracts or hiring practices — is subject to constitutional norms.[1] This reading is strained for three reasons. First, one would have expected that judicial actions as government conduct — state action simpliciter — would be subject to constitutional dictates regardless of whether they were expressly mentioned in the text or not. Secondly, the plain meaning of the text suggests that all judicial actions — including judicial emanations such as the common law — are without express exception (since none is offered) measured for harmony with the dictates of the Bill of Rights. Third, it defies both logic and common sense to argue that when FC s 8(1) binds the legislature and the judiciary, it intended to bind the actions of legislators or judges in their official capacity but not in their law-making capacity. As I have already noted above, while we care about the manner in which legislators and judges comport themselves,[2] we care primarily about the law that they make.[3]

[1] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC)('SARFU') at para 28.
[2] See § 31.2*(a)* supra.

The rejection of the weak reading of the phrase suggests a gloss on 'binds the judiciary' that is on all fours with the preferred reading. 'Binds the judiciary' covers the 'law' that the judiciary generates. Such a reading is consonant with the obvious — and accepted reading — of 'binds the legislature'. Moreover, by mapping the primary meaning of 'binds the judiciary' onto 'all law' we avoid two of the primary objections to Khumalo: (a) the failure to give meaning to a term in the Final Constitution; and (b) the need for two different, incompatible accounts of the various sections of FC s 8. Pace Khumalo, the preferred reading avoids both surplusage and silence.[4] Pace Khumalo, the preferred reading affords interpretive space for FC s 8(3).[5]

[1] Thus, if a judicial actor was to infringe the freedom of assembly by ordering, on his own motion, that picketers or protestors on government property must vacate the premises, then the Bill of Rights would apply to the actions of that judicial actor. However, if the judicial actor was merely arbitrating the dispute between two other social actors — let us say an employer and a picketing union — then the Bill of Rights would not apply to the judicial actor's decision. It would apply only to the law at issue. How one distinguishes between the judicial actor's decision and the law at issue is another matter.

[2] See De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430, 455 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C) (Parliament's conduct impaired the exercise at freedom of expression in terms of FC s 58 and FC s 16. Because Parliament's treatment of parliamentary privilege amounted to conduct not governed by a law of of general application, it could not be saved by FC s 36.)

[3] There are obvious exceptions to this general rule. See, eg, S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)(Citation for contempt for scandalizing court will attract review on FC s 16); BCGEU v British Columbia (Attorney General) [1988] 2 SCR 214, 53 DLR (4th) 1 (Supreme Court of Canada held that an injunction issued by a judge on his own motion to restrain picketing by union in front of his courthouse was subject to the Charter — despite the fact that a court is not a government actor for the purposes of Charter review. Court found this dispute to be more 'public' than 'private' and thus the appropriate object for direct application of the Chater.)

[4] Prior to Khumalo, some courts read FC ss 8(1), 8(2) and 8(3) in a manner consistent with the preferred reading proferred in these pages: namely, FC s 8 gives us direct, unqualified application subject only to the condition that the application of any provision to a given dispute is contingent upon the interpretation of — the prescriptive content of — a right. See Protea Technology Ltd v Wainer 1997 (9) BCLR 1225, 1238 (W)('The new Constitution admits of both horizontal and vertical application for the Bill of Rights. Whether it does have application in a given case will require interpretation of the provision in question.')

[5] While FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b) anticipate just such an occurrence, the courts could formulate a new rule or a new remedy even in the absence of specific FC s 8(3) direction. The courts have already read FC ss 39, 7, 38, 167, 172 and 173 as authorizing the development of the common law where the Bill of Rights requires it. See § 31.4*(e)*(iii) infra, 'The development of the Common Law and the interaction between FC s 39(2) and FC ss 7, 8, 38, 167, 172 and 173.'

Despite Khumalo, the Constitutional Court has endorsed a strong reading of FC s 8(1). It has authored a set of decisions over the past five years that have had the collective effect of subjecting every exercise of judical power to constitutional review. In Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission For Gender Equality, As Amicus Curiae), the Court wrote: 'In terms of s 8 of the [Final] Constitution the judiciary is bound by the Bill of Rights.'[1] As I noted above, the SARFU Court extended the notion of judicial boundedness to the common law: 'The common law, which is 'law' within the meaning of s 8(1), is also subject to s 34 and in terms of s 39(2) must be developed in accordance with its provisions.'[2] Deploying a concatenation of provisions, the Constitutional Court in Boesak ventured that:

> [t]he development of, or the failure to develop, a common law rule by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the Supreme Court of Appeal developed, or failed to develop, the rule under circumstances inconsistent with its obligation under s 39(2) of the Constitution or with some other right or principle of the Constitution. The application of a legal rule by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the application of a rule is inconsistent with some right or principle of the Constitution.[3]

Similarly, from Pharmaceutical Manufacturers through Carmichele to Thebus, the Constitutional Court has made it abundantly clear that all law-making activity — no matter what its provenance — must comply with the requirements of the Final Constitution. The Thebus Court, quoting from Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, wrote:

> There is . . . only one system of law and within that system the Constitution is the supreme law with which all other law must comply.[4]

The High Court in Westley v Attorneys Fidelity Fund likewise reasoned that FC s 8(1) — read with FC s 39(2) — requires the courts '(in circumstances where the point is central to a proper decision of a matter) to raise a constitutional issue mero motu.'[5] In S v Lubisi, the High Court found that because FC s 8 binds the judiciary, FC s 8, when read with FC ss 173, 7 and 39(2), obliges every court to interpret and to develop the law in a manner that promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[6] In BP Southern Africa (Pty) Ltd v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs, the High Court found that the binding of the judiciary in FC s 8, when read alongside the general obligations placed by FC s 7 upon the state, meant that 'all statutes must be interpreted through the prism of the Bill of Rights [and] all law-making authority must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution.'[7] Failure by a lower court to interpret legislation

[1] 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC) at para 19.
[2] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) at para 28. See § 31.4*(b)(ii)(bb)* supra.
[3] S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC)('Boesak') at para 15.
[4] S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)('Thebus') at para 25.
[5] 2004 (3) SA 31 (C) at para 31 citing De Beer v Die Raad vir Gesondheidsberoepe van Suid-Afrika (Case No 13598/02)(Unreported judgment, Bertelsmann J, 16 April 2003).
[6] S v Lubisi: In Re S v Lubisi & Others 2004 (3) SA 520, 530 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1041,1051(T).
[7] 2004 (5) SA 124, 141 (W).

properly in light of the dictates of the Bill of Rights invites appellate constitutional review of the judicial decision itself.

However, despite Boesak and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' very expansive understanding of judicial boundedness, not every action of the judiciary is meat for review under the Final Constitution. In Mphahlele v First National Bank of SA Ltd, the Constitutional Court held that the binding of the judiciary does not always require a court to supply reasons for its decisions.[1]

(iv) The binding of the legislature

FC s 8(1) states that the Bill of Rights 'binds the legislature' in addition to applying to 'all law'. A plain meaning approach to the two phrases, read together, should yield the proposition that all legislation, whether passed by Parliament or a provincial legislature, is always subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. Of course, in light of Khumalo, it is clear that legislation is not always automatically subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. Legislation is only invariably subject to the Bill of Rights when it forms part of the substratum of a dispute between the State and an individual. When legislation governs a dispute between private parties, then Khumalo's gloss on FC s 8(2) tells us that the Bill of Rights only applies to such disputes — and thus to the underlying legislation — if and when the right invoked is deemed to bind the natural or juristic person in question. So while FC s 8(1) applies to all conduct of legislatures, and conduct that produces law that governs the relationships between the state and the individual, it does not apply to that conduct of the legislature which produces law that governs private conduct. If one finds that proposition palatable, then Khumalo's gloss on FC s 8(1) may seem plausible.

Two other questions shall detain us but briefly.

The first question, dealt with at greater length below, is whether legislative powers exercised in accordance with other sections of the Final Constitution are subject to Chapter 2's rights and freedoms.[2] For example, to what extent are rules regarding parliamentary privilege — even if drawn from the provisions of the Final Constitution itself — subject to the Bill of Rights? In De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly, the High Court suggests how, when, and why the exercise of power by a legislature sourced directly in the Final Constitution is subject to the strictures of the Bill of Rights.[3]

The second question is whether, or when, municipal councils count as legislatures. Municipal councils exercise both legislative and executive powers. FC s 151(2) reads: 'The executive and legislative authority of a municipality is vested in its municipal council.' FC s 156 reads, in relevant part:

> i. A municipality has executive authority in respect of, and has the right to administer a. the local government matters listed in Part B of Schedule 4 and Part B of Schedule 5; and b. any other matter assigned to it by national or provincial legislation.

[1] 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) at para 4. See also Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, SARS 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[2] See § 31.5 infra.

[3] 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C).

ii. A municipality may make and administer by-laws for the effective administration of the matters which it has the right to administer.

Prior to the Interim Constitution, by-laws were viewed 'as a form of subordinate legislation' and were 'fully reviewable by the courts.'[1] That view changed with the advent of the Interim Constitution. The power to pass by-laws is clearly a legislative function. In Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council, the Constitutional Court found that IC s 24 and FC s 33 — the administrative justice provisions — may apply to the exercise of executive powers delegated by a municipal council to its functionaries, but could not be meaningfully applied to the by-laws made by the municipal council itself.[2] When crafting by-laws, the municipality must be viewed as a deliberative legislative body.[3] The Fedsure Court wrote: 'The enactment of legislation by an elected local council in accordance with the Constitution is, in the ordinary sense of the words, a legislative and not an administrative act.'[4]

(v) The binding of the executive

FC s 8(1) states that the Bill of Rights 'binds … the executive' in addition to applying to 'all law.' A plain meaning approach to the interpretation of the two phrases, read together, should yield the proposition that all executive action, including subordinate legislation and regulation, is always subject to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

After Khumalo, it is clear that executive action is not always subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. When executive action, say in the form of subordinate legislation, governs a dispute between natural and juristic persons, then Khumalo's gloss on FC s 8(2) tells us that the Bill of Rights only applies to such disputes — and thus to the underlying legislation — if and when the right invoked is deemed to bind the natural or juristic person in question.

Executive action is, however, invariably subject to the Bill of Rights when it arises in a dispute between the State and an individual. A host of cases support this proposition. In President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others, the Constitutional Court observed:

> Public administration, which is part of the executive arm of government, is subject to a variety of constitutional controls . . . . First, in the Bill of Rights there is the right of access to information and the right to just administrative action . . . . Secondly, all the provisions of the Bill of Rights are binding upon the Executive and all organs of State.[5]

[1] Lawrence Baxter Administrative Law (1984) 151.
[2] Fedsure (supra) at para 41.
[3] Ibid at para 26. See also Hardy Ventures CC v Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality 2004 (1) SA 199 (T).
[4] Fedsure (supra) at para 42.
[5] 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at paras 133–134. See also Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others; In Re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 41 ('The Constitution also prescribes that all conduct of the State must accord with the provisions of the Bill of Rights. This is evident from s 8(1) of the Constitution which provides that '*(t)*he Bill of Rights applies to all law, and binds the Legislature, the Executive, the Judiciary and all organs of State'); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)

The same problem we face when trying to understand when legislation is covered by FC s 8(1) under Khumalo applies with equal force to the Court's characterization of executive law-making covered by FC s 8(1). While FC 8(1) applies to all conduct of all executives, and conduct that produces law that governs the relationships between the state and the individual, Khumalo dictates that FC s 8(1) does not apply to that conduct of the executive which produces law that governs private conduct.

(vi) The binding of organs of state

The definition of organs of state is covered by FC s 239. For that reason, the discussion of the manner in which organs of state are bound by the Bill of Rights appears below.[1]

(c) Section 8(2)

Section 8(2) reads:

> A provision in the Bill of Rights binds all natural and juristic persons, if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and any duty imposed by the right.

(i) What FC s 8(2) means in Khumalo

As we have already noted, the black-letter law in Khumalo on FC s 8(2) reduces to this proposition: disputes between natural persons and/or juristic persons may be subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights, if the specific right is deemed to apply to the private party whose conduct (which oddly, reduces to a reliance on ordinary law) is challenged.

The good faith reconstruction of Khumalo runs as follows. FC s 8(1) speaks to the range of the specific substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. It tells us that no law is exempt from the demand for conformity to the requirements of the Bill of Rights simply because that piece of law falls withinsome genus of law. It does at para 4 ('Government, as part of a formidable array of responses to the pandemic, devised a programme to deal with mother-to-child transmission of HIV at birth and identified Nevirapine as its drug of choice for this purpose. The programme imposes restrictions on the availability of Nevirapine . . . The applicants contended that these restrictions are unreasonable when measured against the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996, which commands the State and all its organs to give effect to the rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. This duty is put thus by ss 7(2) and 8(1) of the Constitution respectively'); Fredericks v MEC For Education and Training, Eastern Cape 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 at para 11 ('In this case, the applicants have alleged an infringement of their rights under ss 9 and 33 of the Constitution. The respondents who are alleged to have infringed the rights are all bound to observe the provisions of the Bill of Rights in terms of s 8(1) of the Constitution.') See also Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society For The Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa & Another Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at paras 70–71; South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 2004 (4) SA 10 (T); BP Southern Africa (Pty) Ltd v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124 (W).

[1] See § 31.4*(f)*, 'Section 239: organ of state', infra.

not follow, however, that the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights engage, jointly and severally, the content of each and every rule of law. FC s 8(2) speaks to the prescriptive content of the right and tells us, effectively, that we must consider whether the right asserted by one party was meant to cover the contested conduct of another party. What is important to note is that this is not a question of application. It is a question of interpretation. Even on a good faith reconstruction of Khumalo, FC s 8(2) simply sidesteps general issues of application and drives one straight to the right. Note, however, that the shape of this interpretation exercise — determined as it is by the parties before the court — does not map directly on to a standard determination of the content of a right. FC s 8(2) identifies a preliminary interpretative step.[1] That FC s 8(2) does not really do anything meaningful by way of application may explain why the courts regularly fail to acknowledge the need to undertake this preliminary interpretive step.

(ii) What FC s 8(2) should mean and the courts' support for the preferred reading

I have, above, identified four discrete reasons why we should abjure even the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo's gloss on FC s 8(2).

First, whereas the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights was, per Du Plessis understood to apply directly, and unequivocally, to legislation or subordinate legislation that governed private disputes, the Final Constitution's Bill of Rights does not. The counter-intuitive consequence of the Khumalo Court's approach is that legislation that governs the conduct of private persons is not necessarily engaged by the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights. As with a rule of common law, FC s 8(2) makes the application of the Bill of Rights to such legislation contingent upon the preliminary interpretative exercise identified above. To be able to attack the legislation in question, one must either demonstrate that the right asserted was meant to cover the private conduct contested (or find a state actor who bears responsibility for the enforcement of the rule of law asserted). Despite the dramatic assertion that there is now direct application for private conduct, less law is immediately and unequivocally subject to the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights under the Final Constitution than under the Interim Constitution. (The force of this conclusion is in no way diminished, but rather reinforced by the fact the Constitutional Court has, itself, failed to follow its own rules regarding FC s 8(2), and acted, instead, as if it were analyzing legislation governing private conduct in terms of the preferred reading of both FC ss 8(1) and 8(2).)

Second, the objective theory of unconstitutionality holds that the validity or the invalidity of any given law is in no way contingent upon the circumstances of the case, or, more specifically, the parties to the case. Whereas this doctrine tells us that the validity or the invalidity of any given law cannot be made contingent upon the parties to the case, the Khumalo Court tells us exactly the opposite. For even under the good faith reconstruction of FC s 8(2), if the right asserted is deemed not to apply to the conduct contested, then there is no 'direct' application of the substantive provision of the law. So, the Constitutional Court has created, as a purely logical manner, a doctrine in which a provision of legislation deemed to be unconstitutional when invoked by the State in a dispute between the State and an individual would not necessarily be held to be unconstitutional when invoked by an individual in a dispute between that individual and another individual. The reason for this is that a negative response to an FC s 8(2) inquiry into 'conduct' would prevent the court from actually determining whether the right has been impaired by the 'law' in question. Put slightly differently, a negative response precludes the court from undertaking an objective assessment of the law's constitutionality.

[1] With respect to direct application of a provision of the Bill of Rights to a dispute governed by FC s 8(1), the interpretation stage of rights analysis concentrates on the scope of the right's protection and the infringement of the right by law or conduct. In FC s 8(2) cases, the interpretation of the right requires, as a threshold matter, that the court decide whether a right is meant to burden the party against whom it is asserted. Only then, it would appear, is the court to move on to questions of scope and infringement. Of course, it seems impossible to separate out entirely an FC s 8(2) examination of burdens without determining, to some degree, what the actual scope of a right is.

Third, neither the Khumalo Court's reading of FC s 8(2) nor the good faith reconstruction can make much sense of the Final Constitution's addition of the term 'binds the judiciary'. The notion that the phrase was added to ensure that non-law-making conduct of judges would be subject to constitutional norms but not the law that judges actually make simply beggers belief.

Fourth, apart from considerations of surplusage and supervenience, the Court's elision of the analytical processes required by FC s 8(2) and FC s 39(2) has at least one other major untoward consequence. We have seen that the Court's restrictive doctrine of stare decisis — a doctrine that effectively bars High Court review of existing precedent in terms of FC s 39(2) — married to an incrementalist gloss on the indirect application required by FC s 39(2) spawns an application doctrine that protects 'traditional' conceptions of law and existing legal hierarchies. This observation about the manner in which our existing array of doctrines conspire to blunt the transformative potential of the basic law is one of the strongest rejoinders to those jurists and commentators who believe that the analytical processes of FC s 8(1) or FC s 8(2) or FC s 39(2) require little or no differentiation.

The difficulties that attend even the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo create the space for an account of FC s 8 that possesses greater internal consistency and greater explanatory power. The Khumalo Court expressed concern about the redundancy of FC s 8(2), if FC s 8(1) is given the preferred reading. However, pace Khumalo, FC s 8(2) retains a purpose even if we give FC s 8(1) an appropriately expansive gloss. FC s 8(1) ought to govern all disputes governed by a rule of law or involving a government actor. If the rules of law that govern the conduct in question do not give adequate effect to the provisions of the Bill of Rights, and no government actor is involved, then the court is instructed by FC s 8(2) to consider whether a given provision of the Bill of Rights binds the 'conduct' of the natural or juristic party against whom the provision is being invoked.

Unlike the good faith reconstruction, which relies on a workable, but not especially efficacious distinction between the range of a constitutional right and its prescriptive content, the distinction that gives FC s 8(2) more desirable content is the rather familiar distinction between law and conduct. That distinction runs as follows. While most conduct is law governed, there are instances in which private conduct is not governed by an express rule of law. For example, a plaintiff sues a defendant for refusing to hire the plaintiff for an open position. The defendant claims absolution on the ground that there is no common law norm imposing on the defendant a duty, in the current set of circumstances, to hire the plaintiff. If the defendant's claim regarding the content of the common law is upheld by a court, then quite a significant number of lawyers are inclined to endorse the two-fold proposition that (a) the defendant's conduct is not unlawful, and (b) the defendant's conduct remains conduct not governed by law.

This distinction is not philosophically sound. Indeed, I have argued against the pure form of the law/conduct distinction in an earlier iteration of this very chapter and would have preferred, ceterus paribus, not to have to consider it.[1] That said, South African lawyers and jurists continue to draw the distinction.[2] In addition to being underwritten by the accepted practice — or legal cosmology — of a fair number of South African lawyers, the traditional distinction between law-governed conduct and non-law-governed conduct appears to have informed the drafting of FC s 8.[3]

This reading of FC s 8(2) covers two possible sets of disputes between private actors. First, it contemplates the possibility of a dispute over an aspect of social life that is not currently governed by any rule of law at all. (For reasons assayed in the footnote below, this locution describes a linguistic practice and not an empirical fact.[4]) Second, it describes the gap between the prescriptive content of constitutional norms and extant express rules of law. While a body of extant legal

[1] See § 31.2*(d)*(iv)–(v) infra.

[2] An anecdote is instructive (though it does not, admittedly, qualify as incontrovertible evidence.) I gave a talk at the Legal Resources Centre in which the 'law never runs out' thesis did a certain amount of heavy lifting in favour of a direct, unqualified approach to application under the Interim Constitution. Despite the fact that a direct, unqualified approach better fit the progressive legal agenda of the LRC, none of the participants, at least a half dozen of whom had appeared before the Constitutional Court, accepted the proposition that the law never runs out. There were, on the accepted understanding of the common law, express rules of law and background conditions. The general thesis that the common law permits what it does not expressly proscribe did not count as 'law'. Nor was my audience moved by the Hohfeldian notion — discussed below — that a court ruling that grants a party absolution because it finds that the common law imposes no duty still cloaks the defendant's conduct in a legal relationship called 'privilege'. Rather, in such an eventuality, it was, my audience insisted, more appropriate to say that there was 'no law' and certainly, no express rule of law, that governed the conduct of the parties before the court.

[3] See Halton Cheadle 'Application' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law (2002) 19.

[4] Some argue that the existence of such areas is quite limited (proposition 1). Others argue that it is always possible to characterize a dispute as one governed by a rule of law (proposition 2). As an empirical matter, the first proposition is true. As a philosophical matter, the second proposition is true. How can one hold that both propositions are true: how can the law never run out (proposition 2) and how can the law sometimes run out (proposition 1)? Like this. Proposition 1 is grounded in the fact that the law exists as a body of express, clearly articulated rules covering most, but not all, conduct and a court will sometimes have to craft new rules to govern the conduct of the parties before it. Proposition 2 recognizes that law as a system of rules, principles and background norms offers a sufficiently dense latticework of materials from which a court can fashion a remedy: that is, the law always supplies an answer. (Footnote continued on next page.)

rules — or even background norms — may always be said to govern any particular set of relationships, it remains possible to understand FC s 8(2) as requiring that the courts develop a new rule of law where the current rules do not give adequate effect to a provision in the Bill of Rights.

Dennis Davis has described Khumalo as a perfect example of the second set of circumstances.[1] Davis argues that we should understand counsel's argument in Khumalo through the prism of the pleadings. That is, when counsel for Khumalo took an exception to the argument as framed by counsel for Holomisa, what they were effectively saying was that no rule of common law governed the relationship between the parties in a manner contemplated by the Bill of Rights. Counsel, on Davis' view, should have characterized its argument as a request that the Court develop the law to fill a gap in existing defamation doctrine created by the presence of a new, more basic, norm — the constitutional right to freedom of expression.

Danie Brand and I think that there is an additional way of describing the problem that supplements Davis' gloss. We would prefer not to emphasize the pleadings, but rather the relationship between rights interpretation and remedies. On our account, FC ss 8(2) and 8(3) contemplate situations in which there exists no adequate legal remedy for a rights infringement. That is, FC ss 8(2) and 8(3) anticipates that existing law will not always provide adequate remedies in terms of what a given right requires. In S v Thebus, the Constitutional Court wrote that: '[I]t is in this context that courts are enjoined . . . to develop the common law in order to give effect to a protected right.'[2] Likewise, while the Constitutional Court in Fose found that the common law at the time was adequate for the vindication of

Let us expand on the scenario introduced in the text above. The plaintiff (P) sues the defendant (D) for refusing to hire P for an open position. D claims absolution on the ground that there is no common law norm imposing on D a duty, in the current set of circumstances, to hire P. If D's claim regarding the content of the common law is upheld, then the judgment is that D's conduct has not been unlawful. As a philosophical matter, there is and can be for a judge or lawyer no gap between such a judgment and a judgment that the conduct is lawful. In Hohfeldian terms, the result is a judgment to the effect that the common law cloaks D's conduct, relative to P, with the legal relation called 'privilege'. Privilege is not the absence of law. When the judge grants D's plea for absolution, she is applying the law in D's favour.

The linguistic — and legal sociological — gap is created, as I noted above, by the deeply entrenched inclination to say that when the judge rules in D's favour she merely relies on a background condition of the common law that runs as follows: when there is no other relevant law — or no legal duty imposed by a rule of law — the defendant prevails. This is the heart of the strong 'no law thesis'. Its truth is fixed by reference to a definition of law that restricts the extension of the term to express rules of law that impose duties.

The discomfort occasioned — in some — by accepting such a restrictive definition flows in part from the obvious counterfactual. Assume that the judge rules in P's favour and crafts a new remedy that imposes a duty on D in the very circumstances that gave rise to the suit. The judge's ruling in favour of P is law. How else would one describe it? So too then was the ruling in favour of D in the original hypothetical. We are, on the Hohfeldian account, never lawless.

I think that the difference between the Hohfeldian account and the no-law thesis can be split by my second variation on FC s 8(2): namely where a body of extant rules — or even background norms — may be said to govern a particular set of relationships, FC s 8(2) requires the courts to develop a new rule of law where the current rules do not give adequate effect to a provision in the Bill of Rights. We are, on this account, never lawless. What we lack are rules of law adequate to the task of giving content to the new universe of legal norms imposed by the basic law — the Final Constitution.

[1] Dennis Davis 'Presentation on the Horizontal Application of the South African Bill of Rights' RULCI Conference, University of the Western Cape (9 August 2004.)

[2] Thebus (supra) at para 25.

the constitutional rights asserted, the Fose Court left open the possibility that another set of facts would throw up constitutional interests not adequately vindicated by existing remedies.[1]

Recent case law offers numerous examples in which the existing body of rules do not do adequate justice to the demands of a given right. The High Court in Afrox v Strydom can be understood as viewing existing principles of the law of contract — say, pacta sunt servanda — that would uphold negligence waiver clauses in hospital admission forms as a failure to vindicate the constitutional right of access to health care services.[2] It filled this gap in existing doctrine with a rule of common law grounded in the requirements of FC s 27.[3] The new rule ultimately creates a remedy heretofore unavailable at common law.[4]

Similarly, the High Court in Ross v South Peninsula Municipality should be understood as attempting to revisit existing property law in light of FC s 26(3)'s requirement that 'no one may be evicted from their home … without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances.'[5] By shifting the onus to the owner of the property to demonstrate that the circumstances required

[1] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC). See also Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele'). Had Carmichele been decided in terms of ss 8(2) and 8(3), it might have provided a perfect fit for the scenario contemplated here. Carmichele does not create a constitutional remedy distinct from delictual remedies available at common law. What it did do is force the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal to revisit the existing law of delict and expand the duty of care. The new rule of common law thereby gives effect to the rights protected in the Bill. See, especially, President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd CCt 20/04 (May 15 2005)(Court creates a constitutional remedy grounded in FC s 34 and FC s 1*(c)*).

[2] The High Court found a disclaimer in a private hospital's admissions contract unenforceable. Strydom v Afrox Healthcare [2001] 4 All SA 618 (T)('Afrox I'). See Dire Tladi 'One Step Forward, Two Steps Back for Constitutionalising the Common Law*: Afrox Healthcare v Strydom'* (2002) 17 SA Public Law 314–315 and 317 (Discussion of Afrox I). Mavundla AJ began his analysis with the unassailable proposition that a common law rule with a contractual term contrary to the public interest is unenforceable. (This rule was recognised and applied in a host of cases. See Wells v South African Alumenite Company 1927 AD 69; Sasfin (Pty) Ltd v Beukes 1989 (1) SA 1 (A); and Botha (now Griessel) v Finanscredit (Pty) Ltd 1989 (3) SA 773 (A). For more recent discussions of the rule, see Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments (Pty) Ltd 1999 (3) SA 389 (SCA); De Beer v Keyser 2002 (1) SA 827 (SCA) and Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA).) Relying upon FC ss 27(1) and 39(2), Mavundla AJ further reasoned that the rule must be interpreted in light of the Bill of Rights and, in particular, the respondent's constitutional right to have access to health care services. Access to health care was, in turn, read to mean 'access to health care, whether private or public, administered by professional and trained people with skill and care.' Afrox I (supra) at 627. The right to have access to health care services, so the High Court reasoned, entitled the claimant to have access to health care services provided in a professional manner and with reasonable care. The contract's disclaimer, insulating the appellant against claims for negligence, impaired the respondent's right to health care services provided with the requisite professionality and care. The High Court found the disclaimer unenforceable. Ibid at 627–628. Because the common law prior to Afrox I did not contemplate the extension of the 'contrary to the public interest' proviso to such disclaimers, Mavundla AJ was obliged to craft a new rule of common law that vindicated the FC s 27 right to health care.

[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal reversed the Afrox I High Court in Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox').

[4] It is beyond the scope of this section of the chapter to engage in an extended discussion about the ontological status of rules and values in the common law. But for my considered view on the subject in so far as it relates to application, see my criticism of Chris Roederer's position at § 31, Appendix 3*(a)*.

[5] 2000 (1) SA 589 (C)('Ross').

for an eviction order are present, the High Court in Ross crafts a new rule of common law grounded in the requirements of FC s 26.[1] The Ross Court's emphasis on changing the common law in order to shift the onus of proof and the attendant alteration of the form and the content of the pleadings provides a paradigmatic example of how Dennis Davis' pleadings analysis and my own conduct analysis (sometimes) reinforce one another. What starts off in Ross as an exception to an existing common law rule based upon the direct application — through FC s 8(2) — of FC s 26(3) to the conduct under scrutiny, becomes a new common law rule — generated through FC s 8(3) — that vindicates the right.[2]

The subject matter of Mahambehlala v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another — a failure by the State to pay timeously a welfare grant — requires that application analysis take place in terms of FC s 8(1). However, the court's analysis still provides a guide as to how to understand common law rule and remedy creation under FC ss 8(2) and 8(3).[3] The Mahambehlala High Court found that the failure to pay a welfare grant at the appropriate time was a function of the responsible department's negligence. The High Court concluded, however, that existing remedies at common law would not enable the plaintiff to recover amounts lost — including the interest that should have accrued — as a result of the delay. Leach J wrote:

> I do not see how the applicant can recover an amount in respect of that period under common law review. She would probably be able to institute an action for damages based upon the negligent failure to process her application timeously, but one cannot lose sight of the fact that she is in straightened [sic] financial circumstances and may well be unable to

[1] Ross (supra) at 596.

[2] Ibid at 596. Josman AJ describes the constitutionally mandated change in the common law as follows:

> Section 26(3) of the Constitution in effect requires a court hearing an application or action for the eviction of a person from his or her home not to issue the order until it has had an opportunity to consider all the relevant circumstances . . . At issue is how those circumstances should be placed before the court . . . . As the court has to consider all the relevant circumstances, the adversarial system predicates that the plaintiff should place such information before the court as it considers relevant, to which the defendant can plead by answering the allegations as well as by raising additional issues. The plaintiff in turn can respond to those allegations in reply. In this manner the pleadings will introduce the issues and define them, the evidence will provide the substance and detail, and the court will then be able to exercise its discretion after having considered all the relevant circumstances. In this manner the adversarial system allows for and in most instances will ensure that all such circumstances are placed before the court. The court can presumably call for amplification if, after considering the issues raised in the pleadings, it deems it necessary. If both parties to a case involving eviction from a home raise the issues which they consider to be relevant, the court should ultimately have sufficient information before it to consider all the relevant circumstances prescribed by the Constitution.

Ibid. Of particular relevance to my analysis is the very end of the very last sentence. While the common law and statute covered evictions prior to the enactment of the Final Constitution, the enactment of the Final Constitution — and in particular FC s 26(3) — creates new prescriptive content for the law of eviction. Whether the law of eviction as it stood prior to enactment of the Final Constitution meets the demands of the basic law is a question about which the courts have differed. The Supreme Court of Appeal reversed Ross in Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA). But, consistent with my view of FC s 8(2), Josman AJ found that the Final Constitution required the courts to develop a new rule of law where the current rules did not give adequate effect to a substantive provision in the Bill of Rights.

[3] 2002 (1) SA 342 (SE), 2001 (9) BCLR 890 (SE)('Mahambehlala').

> fund such an action. In those circumstances, the knowledge of a potentially successful right of action is a poor balm to relieve the loss of a social grant for five months. In my opinion, in the light of these considerations, the applicant's common law remedies are insufficient to be regarded as appropriate relief as envisaged by s 38 of the Constitution . . . . In the light of this, I am of the view that it is incumbent upon this Court to attempt to fashion what may loosely be referred to as 'constitutional relief' to cater for the fact that the common law relief to which the applicant would be entitled is insufficient to address the effects of the delay of her social grant for five months and that it is unrealistic to expect her to institute a separate action to claim damages.[1]

The appropriate new 'constitutional' remedy for the negligent conduct of the State is the award of an amount equal to that which the plaintiff would have received had the grant been paid timeously. The court then turns its attention to the issue of interest. Leach J finds that 'the general rule of the common law is that interest is not payable.' Once again Leach J holds that a meaningful constitutional remedy requires the award of such interest.[2] The direct application of the Final Constitution to 'conduct' by the state requires the crafting of new rules of and remedies at 'constitutional common law'. In form, Leach's approach to direct application of the Final Constitution to state conduct where the statute is insufficient to vindicate a constitutional entitlement is no different than it would be for direct application of the Final Constitution to private conduct where the common law, or any other rule of law, is deemed insufficient to vindicate a constitutional entitlement.[3]

[1] Mahambehlala (supra) at 354–355.

[2] Leach J leans heavily on dicta in Fose as the basis for his crafting new rules of and remedies at 'constitutional common law'. See Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC). Leach J quotes Ackermann J to the effect that 'appropriate relief will in essence be relief that is required to protect and enforce the rights enshrined in the Constitution.' Fose (supra) at para 19. He endorses Kriegler J's observation in Fose that when courts grant relief, 'they attempt to synchronise the real world with the ideal construct of a constitutional world.' Fose (supra) at para 94.

[3] The following example is meant to demonstrate this proposition. Imagine that a farmer prevents workers from leaving the property in order to vote. The farmer may be guilty of unjustifiable detention under existing common law. However, no existing rule of law covers expressly the situation in which an employer refuses to allow his workers to leave the property in order to vote. (In other words, the employer currently has no specific duty to enable his workers to leave the property to vote.) To see that the existence of such a rule may well matter, one might ask whether the existing remedies for unjustified detention gives the workers what they want: namely, the right to vote or damages designed to make good any interference. If the law and its existing remedies do not do so, then it seems reasonable to conclude that such conduct by private parties is both repugnant to the right to vote and requires the crafting of a new, more specific, rule of common law and the creation of remedies adequate to the right. See Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier, Western Cape, & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto')(Mokgoro J and Sachs J, dissenting, note that 'if a court finds law or conduct inconsistent with the Constitution, it must declare that law or conduct to be invalid to the extent of its inconsistency. In addition to the declaration, the court may proceed to provide additional appropriate relief. Sometimes a declaration of invalidity may not be sufficient, or appropriate on its own. The

(iii) The preferred reading, the no-law thesis and the problem of surplusage

It should be clear, from the jurisprudential arguments in § 31.2 regarding fortuity of form, the arbitrariness of application, the untenability of the public-private distinction, and judicial boundedness, coupled with the detailed textual arguments already offered in § 31.4, that FC s 8(1) alone could do all of the application work required by the Bill of Rights (without engendering a problem of surplusage.) In short, FC s 8(1) functions as a reply to all of the primary objections of Justice constitutional defect might lie in the incapacity of the common law or legislation to respond to the demands of the Bill of Rights. Section 8(3) then requires that the Court should develop a suitable remedy. No particular remedy, apart from the declaration of invalidity, is dictated for any particular violation of a fundamental right. Because the provision of remedies is open-ended and therefore inherently flexible, Courts may come up with a variety of remedies in addition to a declaration of constitutional invalidity. An 'all-or-nothing' decision is therefore not the only option.') See also Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 27 (Kriegler J writes that '[o]ur flexibility in providing remedies may affect our understanding of the right.' Kriegler J's comment requires amplification. The flexibility of which he speaks should not be viewed as a negative capability. Rather an expansive approach to remedies has the attendant consequence of expanding our understanding of what a right protects. Indeed, Kriegler J notes that South Africa compares quite favorably to other jurisdictions in terms of the 'broad range of remedial options [available] when rights are threatened or infringed.')

The hypothetical voting rights case reminds us of the fact that FC s 8(2) raises questions not of application, but of interpretation. Having said that FC s 8(2) raises questions not of application, but of interpretation, there remain two possible readings of the section: a strong reading and or a weak reading. On the strong reading, a right will apply to a natural person or a juristic person unless the right makes expressly clear that only certain kinds of relationships are meant to be protected by it. For example, the rights to property, housing, health care, food, water, social security, education, information and the rights of children and arrested, detained and accused persons contain wording that may seem to limit the ambit of those rights — in large part or whole — to relationships between the state and individuals and thereby resist application to relationships between natural and/or juristic persons currently ungoverned by any express rule of law. But appearances can be deceiving. As Frank Michelman presciently pointed out several years ago, a compelling case can be made for extending the rights to housing, food and water to the many feudal private relationships which currently operate in both agricultural and urban communities. Assume that an NGO committed to providing adequate, affordable housing to South Africa's poor attempts to lease a large unused expanse of land from a landowner on the outskirts of Johannesburg. The landowner refuses. He says he would prefer the land to lie fallow. The NGO institutes an action against the landowner asserting that FC s 26(1)'s right to adequate housing applies to private relationships ungoverned by statute or regulation and that it trumps the common-law right to alienate one's property as one wishes. The argument that FC s 26(1) applies to private relationships is given greater force when FC s 26(1) is compared with FC s 26(2). FC s 26(2) requires that the state take 'reasonable legislative and other measures . . . to achieve the progressive realization of this right.' FC 26(1), so the argument goes, would have been unnecessary — redundant — unless it applied to relationships other than the state-citizen relationships contemplated by FC s 26(2). Michelman's example asks us to reconsider our initial intuitions regarding the applicability of socio-economic rights to private relationships ungoverned by statute or regulation. Remarks of Frank Michelman Centre for Applied Legal Studies Seminar on Horizontality and the 1996 Constitution (28 January 1997). Indeed, the Constitutional Court recently took a significant step in that direction. See President of the Republic & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (PTY) Ltd CCT 20/4 (13 May 2005) at para 26 (Constitutional Court acknowledges possible horizontal application of FC s 25(1) to land invasions.) See also Danie Brand 'Socio-Economic Rights in FC s 27: Health Care, Food, Water and Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 56. The weaker reading of FC s 8(2) precludes, tout court, the application of certain rights to conduct by and relationships between natural and/or juristic persons. Michelman's example, and the recent decisions identified above, undercut this second, weaker reading of FC s 8(2).

Kentridge in Du Plessis: namely, that the absence of the phrases 'all law' and 'the judiciary' from IC s 7(1) indicated that IC Chapter 3 did not apply horizontally.

As we have already seen, the additional presence of FC ss 8(2) and (3) generates multiple possible readings.[1] Some surplusage seems inevitable. Even allowing for the possibility of surplusage, the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo produces so many anomalies as to warrant rejection. The question, of course, is whether the preferred reading offered in this chapter better meets the challenges of the text and the charge of surplusage.

As Frank Michelman notes, according to the preferred reading, I am obliged to defend some form of a 'no-law thesis' (NLT) in order to give FC s 8(2) a meaningful role. In its strongest possible form (a form I do not defend), the NLT stands for the proposition that FC s 8(2) covers dispute-generating conduct between private actors over an aspect of social life that is not currently governed by any rule of law at all. As a philosophical matter, I agree with Michelman that the NLT so characterized is vulnerable to the charge that, in fact, all social disputes that are disposed of by a court of law are governed by some rule of law. On the Hohfeldian account of law — which I employed as part of the critique of Du Plessis — when a judge grants a defendant's claim of absolution on the grounds that the common law imposes no duty on the defendant, the judgment cloaks the defendant's conduct, relative to the plaintiff, in a legal relation called 'privilege'. Privilege is not the absence of law. When the judge grants the plea for absolution, she is applying the law in the defendant's favour.

I am not defending the strongest possible form of the NLT. I am defending a much narrower version of the NLT which stands for the proposition that while a body of extant rules — or even background norms — may be said to govern a particular set of private relationships, the purpose of FC s 8(2) — along with FC s 8(3) — is to get us to recognize that the law as it stands may not give adequate effect to a provision, or multiple provisions, in the Bill of Rights. This narrow version of the NLT — and the narrow construction of FC s 8(2) — does not offend the Hohfeldian account to which both Michelman and I subscribe. It merely emphasizes an obvious aspect about our extant jurisprudence to which the drafters of the Final Constitution clearly wanted us to attend: that there is a gap between the body of law to which we are currently subject and the idealized, but still inchoate, account of the law to which we aspire under the Final Constitution. Justices Mokgoro and Sachs recognize this 'gappiness' in our law in Bel Porto when they write that:

> [I]f a court finds law or conduct inconsistent with the Constitution, it must declare that law or conduct to be invalid to the extent of its inconsistency. In addition to the declaration, the court may proceed to provide additional appropriate relief. Sometimes a declaration of invalidity may not be sufficient, or appropriate on its own. The constitutional defect might lie in the incapacity of the common law or legislation to respond to the demands of the Bill of Rights. Section 8(3) then requires that the Court should develop a suitable remedy.[2]

[1] One could imagine background conditions in which all readers would arrive at the same conclusion about the meaning of FC s 8. But the current differences in political orientation towards this issue, coupled with the text's flawed phrasing, over-determine the grounds for disagreement on the meaning of FC s 8.

[2] Bel Porto (supra) at para 180. Though all law may, as the Constitutional Court states, derive its force from the Final Constitution, not all law adequately reflects the basic law's dictates. The Constitutional

It would seem, therefore, that to be saddled with the weaker version of the NLT is not quite the burden Professor Michelman initially anticipated. The weaker version of the NLT splits the difference between the strong version of the NLT and the Hohfeldian notion that the law never runs out. The distinction with a difference is the weak NLT's acknowledgement of the 'gap' identified by the Final Constitution, in general, and FC ss 8(2) and (3), in particular. That gap is the space between our extant body of express rules of law — the 'law that is' — and the prescriptive content of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights — the 'law is what it is becoming'. So to recap. It is true that there is, in fact, never any conduct that is not law governed; it is also true that there will be conduct that is not governed by an express rule of law that is consistent with the Final Constitution.

It should be apparent now that the preferred reading attempts to meet the surplusage challenge in four discrete but related ways. The first two arguments are grounded in intention and in perception. Because my preferred reading of FC s 8 is an idealist account, the gloss these arguments place on FC s 8(2) ought not to be understood in terms of, nor framed by, theories of original intent.

Despite the persistence of views to the contrary, FC s 8(2) makes little sense other than as textual response to the outcome in Du Plessis. However one chooses to read FC s 8(2), it must stand — at a minimum — for the proposition that some of the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights will apply to some disputes between private parties currently governed by rules of common law. That proposition is different in kind from the Du Plessis Court's conclusion that no such general invitation to apply the Bill of Rights to private disputes could be gleaned from IC ss 7(1) and 7(2). For a South African audience inclined not to apply the Bill of Rights to common law disputes between private parties, such an invitation does real work.

By distinguishing between 'law' and 'no-law', FC s 8(2) — on my account — fits the jurisprudential predispositions of a fair number of South African lawyers. We need not agree as to whether the Hohfeldian account is correct. 'The truth of the matter' is besides the point for any attempt to understand what the drafters meant and how they expected to be read. Many lawyers are accustomed to seeing 'gaps', 'holes', 'no-law spaces' where the law imposes no duty on a party to act in a particular way. FC s 8(2) and FC s 8(3) speaks to that way of perceiving the law by telling us that conduct which does not warrant censure under the current non-constitutional regime of law will still be subject to the provisions of the Bill of Court had, under the Interim Constitution, refused to extend the force of such an argument to the question of whether common law disputes between private parties are subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. FC s 8(2) invited, as Steve Ellmann gently puts it, the Constitutional Court to revisit that judgment. Steven Ellmann 'A Constitutional Confluence: American State Action Law and the Application of Socio-Economic Rights Guarantees to Private Actors' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 444; See discussion of Steven Ellmann's work at § 31, Appendix 4*(c)* infra.

Rights, and, if that conduct fails the FC s 8(2) mandated 'test' for Bill of Rights consistency, then the courts are, under FC s 8(3), obliged to craft a rule of law that does impose duties on the party whose conduct or reliance on a rule of law can no longer be justified. FC ss 8(2) and 8(3) fill in the gaps. For an audience that tends not to buy the Hohfeldian account, my preferred reading of FC s 8(2) does real work.

These two intentionalist readings serve both pragmatic and rhetorical ends. Pragmatic: the reading relies upon what these words in FC s 8 are generally understood to mean. Rhetorical: the reading opens up the interpretive space for my idealist account by relying on what most readers understand the words to mean and thus securing initial acceptance for the propositions that follow. (NB: If there is still surplusage after all is said and done, then there is surplusage for a reason — namely a pre-disposition of the drafters and the readers to talk a certain way.) It should also be clear that while these two intentionalist readings support just about every account of FC s 8(2) — Khumalo, the good faith reconstruction, and my idealist account — they do not exhaust the possible meanings of the clause. My reading of FC s 8(2) narrows the space afforded by the two intentionalist readings in a manner that will permit FC s 8(2) to still fit my readings of FC ss 8(1) and 8(3). My reading, while anchored to a broadly shared understanding of the words in the text, is not, however, constrained by a particular version of the drafting history.

Despite having given FC s 8(2) apparent purpose, I am not yet home free. While this construction of FC s 8(2) gives it something distinctive to do in the eyes of the drafters and the readers, it still must cohere with my reading of FC s 8 as a whole. And it does. The gap identified by FC s 8(2) is not between the absolute absence of law and express rules of law. The gap is between extant rules of law and those rules of law that must exist in order for our law to be consistent with the Final Constitution. Again, FC s 8(2) reminds us of the inevitable, but not ineffable, presence of such gaps, and tells us to fill them in where appropriate.

Does this reading cohere with the preferred reading of FC s 8(1)? It certainly does to the extent that the weak NLT construction of FC s 8(2) eliminates any doubt (a) about the application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private parties, in general, and (b) about the ability to use the Bill of Rights to develop new rules of law and new remedies that will give adequate effect to the specific provisions of the Bill, in particular.

One response is that this notion of an aspirational gap is equally true of express rules of law engaged by FC s 8(1) — be they statute, regulation, common law, or customary law. A second response — again along Hohfeldian lines — is that one could make do with FC s 8(1) alone. (Then again, I would say, we could make do without FC s 8 in its entirety.[1]) Both assertions are true. An application doctrine

[1] FC s 8(1), FC s 8(2) and FCs 8(3), properly understood, express canons of constitutional interpretation. In this instance, they tell the courts what kinds of law are engaged by the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights, what conduct is engaged by these provisions and how to remedy any defects or deficiences in the law. So, for example, Du Plessis told us that one canon of constitutional interpretation under the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights was that the substantive provisions of the Bill did not apply directly to disputes between private persons governed by common law. Khumalo rejects grounded solely in FC s 8(1) would be neat, comprehensive and require no special pleading. But in constitutional law, as in life, 'you must dance with who brung ya.' FC s 8(2) forces us to linger a little longer on the floor.

(d) Section 8(3)

FC s 8(3) reads:

> In applying the provisions of the Bill of Rights to natural and juristic persons in terms of subsection (2), a court —
> (a) in order to give effect to a right in the Bill, must apply, or where necessary develop, the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right; and
> (b) may develop rules of the common law to limit the right, provided that the limitation is in accordance with section 36(1).

(i) What the courts say FC s 8(3) means

According to Khumalo, under FC s 8(3)(a), a court will be called upon to craft a new rule of common law if, in the normal course of Bill of Rights analysis under FC s 8(2), the right is deemed to have been infringed. In arriving at its conclusions, the Khumalo Court made much of the potential redundancy of FC s 8(3) if FC s 8(1) was to be given the reading pressed upon it by counsel. But as the above discussion of FC s 8(2) is meant to demonstrate, the Constitutional Court has ignored both the logic and the content of its construction of FC s 8(3) in a welter of other cases.

As it turns out, FC s 8(3) does work without FC s 8(2). Lots of work.

For example, the Constitutional Court in Thebus states that where a court undertakes the development of the common law under FC s 39(2), the 'courts are enjoined,' under FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b), 'to apply and, if necessary, to develop the common law in order to give effect to a protected right, provided that any limitation is in accordance with s 36'.[1] Thebus is not a FC s 8(2) case.

In Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund, the Supreme Court of Appeal wrote that '[i]n terms of s 8 of the Constitution a Court, in order to give effect to a right in the Bill of Rights, must develop the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right.'[2] Road Accident Fund is not a FC s 8(2) case.

In Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier, Western Cape, several justices on the Constitutional Court observed that

> '[t]here are several provisions in the Constitution which are important to bear in mind when considering constitutional remedies, in particular ss 38, 172(1), 8(3), and 39(2) . . . . In that canon with respect to the question of whether the substantive provisions of the Final Constitution's Bill of Rights can apply directly to disputes between private persons governed by common law. The new canon reads that they may. More than that FC s 8 does not say.

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 25.

[2] 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1220 (SCA)('Road Accident Fund') at para 35.

> addition to [a] declaration of invalidity, the court may proceed to provide additional appropriate relief. Sometimes a declaration of invalidity may not be sufficient, or appropriate on its own.[1]

Bel Porto is not a FC s 8(2) case.

In Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, the Cape High Court found that 'an existing common law rule violated an extra-marital child's constitutional rights to equality and dignity', that the 'common law rule [was] unreasonable and unjustifiable and should be declared unconstitutional and invalid,' and FC 's 8(3)(a) of the Constitution enjoins the Court in order to give effect to a right in the Bill of Rights set out in Chap 2 of the Constitution, where necessary, to develop the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right.'[2] Petersen is not — at least on the Court's own analysis — a FC s 8(2) case.

Why does FC s 8(3) feature in non-FC s 8(2) cases? As I note below in the discussion of the development of the common law under FC s 39(2), a profusion of provisions — from FC ss 1, 7, 8, 38, 39, 167, 172 to 173 — inform the courts' assessment of the judiciary's capacity to craft new common law remedies. FC s 8(3) is simply one of the sections that the courts routinely cite when they intend to create a new common law rule and a new common law remedy.

As for the general response of the courts to the specific demands of the text of FC ss 8(3)(a) and (b), perhaps van der Westhuizen J, in Holomisa v Khumalo, put it best: 'I am not going into the philosophical and academic debate around the meaning and interpretation of this sub-clause.'[3] Whatever FC s 8(3) really means, the Constitutional Court has, before and after Khumalo, attributed to the sub-clause meaning that is both independent of and not exhausted by the meaning that counsel in Khumalo (and I) would attach to FC s 8(1). Given that this is the case, the judgments in Thebus and Bel Porto have already effectively responded to the surplusage objection raised in Khumalo.

(ii) What FC s 8(3) should mean

It should be obvious that, pace Khumalo, (FC s 8(3) does have a purpose once we give both FC s 8(1) and FC s 8(2) their appropriate extension.) Where law or conduct is found to violate a constitutional right, FC s 8(3) provides the mechanism for the creation of a new rule of law and a new remedy. On its own terms, FC s 8(3) provides the mechanism for the creation of a rule where, heretofore, neither an express rule of common law nor a provision of legislation gave adequate expression to the demands of a specific constitutional right.

As a matter of black letter constitutional law, FC s 8(3) retains a purpose even where FC s 8(2) is not part of the application or the interpretation analysis on a given case. It has been deployed both in terms of direct application under

[1] 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 180.
[2] 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C) at para 8.
[3] 2002 (3) SA 38 (T).

FC s 8(1) and indirect application under s 39(2). FC s 8(3) simply reinforces the courts' inherent power to create rules and remedies where the Bill of Rights so demands.[1]

(iii) Meaningless phrases in FC s 8(3)

There are several phrases in FC s 8(3) to which the courts have refused to attend. Part of the reason that these phrases have not been defined is that the phrases may well be meaningless.

The phrase 'must apply' in that part of FC s 8(3)(a) that says a court 'must apply, or where necessary develop, the common law', adds nothing. If applying the existing common law was all that was necessary to give effect to a right, then that would be identical to saying that the extant common law is consonant with the dictates of the right in question. One does not need FC s 8(3)(a) to keep the common law as it is.

The phrase 'to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right' in that part of FC s 8(3)(a) which states that a court 'must … develop … the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right,' adds nothing. As with the phrase 'must apply … the common law', if applying the protection of existing legislation were all that was necessary to give effect to a right, then that would be the same as saying that no new remedies need be created. The Constitutional Court in National Education Health and Allied Workers

[1] The language of FC s 8(3) is certainly confusing and misleading. In the First Edition of this work, I suggested that the section appeared to be designed to cut back on the extent to which the Bill of Rights can be used to effect radical alterations to the existing body of common law and that it made the existing body of common law the departure point for analysis of the constitutionality of particular rules of common law. I was wrong: at least about the intent of the drafters. According to Halton Cheadle, all the parties in the Constitutional Assembly supported direct horizontal application. They simply differed on the best language to make such intent manifest. Remarks of Halton Cheadle Centre for Applied Legal Studies Seminar on Horizontality and the 1996 Constitution (28 January 1997). See also Halton Cheadle, 'Application' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 19. On this view, the changes made to FC ss 8(2) and (3) between 23 April 1996 and 8 May 1996 reflect nothing more than the efforts of the parties to achieve optimal transparency of their intent. Halton Cheadle may be correct about the general intent of the drafters. But his remarks shed absolutely no light on the content of FC s 8(3). To get a better sense of how FC s 8(3) should be understood, it is worth comparing the wording of FC s 8(3) in the 23 April 1996 draft with the final wording of FC s 8(3). The 23 April 1996 version read, in relevant part: 'When a right in the Bill of Rights binds a natural or juristic person, and there is no law of general application that grants a remedy based upon that right, a court must develop a remedy based upon that right . . .' The 23 April 1996 version of FC s 8(3) requires a court to create a new remedy or a cause of action that makes good the requirements of an impaired right where no adequate remedy at common law or statute exists. So understood, this earlier incarnation of FC s 8(3) does not appear to demand that one take a position on whether FC s 8(2) engages law or conduct or both. Whether one believes that the common law never runs out or that common law consists of only those rules that have been expressly articulated by a court, the 23 April 1996 version of FC s 8(3), when read with FC ss 8(1) and (2), reminds us that: (1) rules of common law are, in fact, subject to direct constitutional review; and (2) where no legal remedy gives effect to the demands of a specific provision in the Bill of Rights, a new remedy must be formulated to do so. That is exactly how we should read the final version. See S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642, 651 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)(Discussing the relationship between constitutional law and rules of common law, the Court wrote: 'Proper attention to our legal history, traditions and usages does not imply that constitutional rights should be cut down by reading implicit restrictions into them, so as to bring them into line with the common law.')

Union v University of Cape Town captures the logic — or the lack thereof — of this part of FC s 8(3)(a)'s formula:

> In many cases, constitutional rights can be honoured effectively only if legislation is enacted. Such legislation will of course always be subject to constitutional scrutiny to ensure that it is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Where the Legislature enacts legislation in the effort to meet its constitutional obligations, and does so within constitutional limits, courts must give full effect to the legislative purpose. Moreover, the proper interpretation of such legislation will ensure the protection, promotion and fulfilment of constitutional rights and as such will be a constitutional matter. In this way, the courts and the Legislature act in partnership to give life to constitutional rights.[1]

As the NEHAWU Court makes clear, the existence of legislation designed to give effect to the right does matter. But it only matters to the extent that the legislation gives constitutionally adequate effect to the requirements of the right. Should an act, say the Labour Relations Act at issue in NEHAWU, fail to effect constitutional objectives or fail to achieve constitutional objectives by constitutionally permissible means, it does not satisfy FC s 8(3)(a). If it does satisfy constitutional obligations within constitutional limits, then the issue ostensibly addressed by FC s 8(3)(a) never arises. One does not need FC s 8(3)(a) to keep both the common law and legislation as it is.[2]

The final phrase in FC s 8(3) to which the courts have refused to attend is that part of FC s 8(3)(b) that says a court 'may develop rules of the common law to limit the right, provided that the limitation is in accordance with section 36(1).' One would have thought that the whole point of FC s 8(3) was to give adequate effect to a provision of the Bill of Rights where no express rule of law currently does so. It is difficult to fathom how the injunction to create such new remedies to give effect to 'the' right can possibly constitute a limitation on that same right. To see that the right limited is the same right to which the new remedy gives effect, look at the word 'the'. If the drafters had meant to specify that another right was infringed by the new rule of or remedy at common law, then it would have been necessary for them to use either 'a' or 'another'. Moreover, 'the right' referred to in FC s 8(3)(b) must refer to that same right referred to in FC s 8(3)(a) in order for either to make any sense.

(e) Section 39(2)

FC s 39(2) reads:

> When interpreting any legislation and when developing the common law and customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights (emphasis added).

[1] 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC)('NEHAWU') at para 14 (emphasis added).

[2] As I note below in the section on 'Shared constitutional interpretation', both the NEHAWU Court and FC s 8(3)(a) indicate that the courts and legislatures must work together to give effect to the rights enshrined in the Final Constitution. See § 31.4*(e)*(vii) infra.

(i) What FC s 39(2) means

What is the import of FC s 39(2), now that, post-Khumalo, FC s 8 subjects all disputes between the state and the individual and some disputes between individuals to the direct application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights? At a minimum, FC s 39(2) requires the courts to interpret legislation or to develop the common law in light of the general objects of the Bill of Rights where no specific right can be relied upon by a party challenging a rule of law, the extant construction of a rule of law, or conduct.

(ii) FC s 39(2) and the process of developing the common law

The Constitutional Court, in Carmichele, wrote as follows:

> It needs to be stressed that the obligation of Courts to develop the common law in the context of the s 39(2) objectives, is not purely discretional. On the contrary, it is implicit in s 39(2) read with s 173 that where the common law as it stands is deficient in promoting the s 39(2) objectives, the Courts are under a general obligation to develop it appropriately. We say a 'general obligation' because we do not mean to suggest that a court must, in each and every case where the common law is involved, embark on an independent exercise as to whether the common law is in need of development and, if so, how it is to be developed under s 39(2).[1]

As to what the FC s 39(2) inquiry requires of any tribunal, the Carmichele Court wrote:

> [T]here are two stages to the inquiry a court is obliged to undertake . . . The first stage is to consider whether the existing common law, having regard to the s 39(2) objectives, requires development in accordance with these objectives. This inquiry requires a reconsideration of the common law in the light of s 39(2). If this inquiry leads to a positive answer, the second stage concerns itself with how such development is to take place in order to meet the s 39(2) objectives.[2]

Despite the fact that these passages from Carmichele have been repeatedly quoted with approval, the subsequent case law has thrown up several problems with this initial construction of FC s 39(2).

(aa) FC s 39(2) and the over-determination of changes to the common law

The Thebus Court's gloss on FC s 39(2) obligation 'to develop the common law in the context of the s 39(2) objectives' is, perhaps, the most perplexing. Justice Moseneke, for the Thebus Court, writes:

> It seems to me that the need to develop the common law under s 39(2) could arise in at least two instances. The first would be when a rule of the common law is inconsistent with a constitutional provision. Repugnancy of this kind would compel an adaptation of the common law to resolve the inconsistency. The second possibility arises even when a rule > of the common law is not inconsistent with a specific constitutional provision but may fall short of its spirit, purport and objects. Then, the common law must be adapted so that it grows in harmony with the 'objective normative value system' found in the Constitution.[1]

[1] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').
[2] Ibid at para 40.

The Carmichele Court's use of the term FC s 39(2) objectives does not seem to embrace the two-fold meaning that the Thebus Court attributes to FC s 39(2). Fulfilling FC s 39(2) objectives is not about direct challenges to laws that conflict with specific provisions of the Bill of Rights. That is why we have the various provisions of FC s 8. This gloss of the Thebus Court on FC s 39(2) offends the 'no surplusage' canon of constitutional interpretation by making parts of FC s 8 redundant.

As I note below, the approach of the Thebus Court does not merely suffer from a lack of analytic precision.[2] The over-determination of the textual bases for changing the common law contradicts the Constitutional Court's own distinctions between (1) direct application and indirect application and (2) those remedies that flow from findings of constitutional invalidity and those remedies that flow from a re-formulation or a re-interpretation of the law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. If the Constitutional Court's judgments in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice[3] or Khumalo tell us anything, it is that FC ss 8(1) and s 8(2) engage rules of common law directly, and that remedies for any violation of a specific provision take place in terms of FC ss 172*(a)* and 172*(b)* or 8(3). The Constitutional Court in Amod appears to address the distinction between changes to the common law via FC ss 8(2) and (3) and changes to the common law via FC s 39(2). The Amod Court writes:

> Section 8(2) makes the Bill of Rights [directly] binding on natural and juristic persons . . . Section 8(3) requires Courts in giving effect to s 8(2) to 'apply, or if necessary develop, the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right . . .' The development of a coherent system of law may call for the development of the common law under . . . s 39(2) of the 1996 Constitution to be done in a manner consistent with the way in which the law will be developed under s 8(2) and (3) of the 1996 Constitution . . . When a constitutional matter is one which turns on the direct application of the Constitution . . . considerations of costs and time may make it desirable that the appeal be brought directly to this Court. But when the constitutional matter involves the development of the common law, the position is different. The Supreme Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to develop the common law in all matters including constitutional matters. Because of the breadth of its jurisdiction and its expertise in the common law, its views as to whether the common law should or should not be developed in a 'constitutional matter' are of particular importance.[4]

The Amod Court recognizes that the unitary system of law contemplated by the Final Constitution 'may' require development of the law as a result of the

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 28.
[2] See § 31.4*(e)*(ii)(aa), 'FC s 39(2) and the over-determination of changes to the Common Law', infra.
[3] 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at paras 90 and 96.
[4] Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC)('Amod') at paras 31–33. See also De Freitas & Another v Society of Advocates of Natal (Natal Law Society Intervening) 1998 (11) BCLR 1345 (CC) at paras 20–21.

indirect application of the Bill of Rights in a manner that coheres with the development of the law as a result of the direct application of the Bill of Rights. It is difficult to make any sense of this observation unless FC s 8 analysis and FC s 39(2) analysis are different in kind.

Is there any further evidence for the proposition that FC s 39(2) is not the intended engine for changes in the common law that flow from the direct application of the Bill of Rights? Kentridge J held in Du Plessis that the purpose of FC s 39(2)'s predecessor — IC s 35(3) — was to enable the judiciary to develop common law through the indirect application of the Bill of Rights.[1] High Courts in both Eastern Metropolitan Substructure v Peter Klein Investments (Pty)[2] and Bongoza v Minister of Correctional Services[3] have noted that the complainants before them 'did not contend that a specific constitutional right was violated,' but rather requested that the courts engage in 'the process of developing common law in the context of s 39(2).'[4]

(bb) The obligation to develop the Common Law

Carmichele's general, and not purely discretionary, obligation to develop the common law reflects an attempt to chart a course between the Scylla of transformation and the Charybdis of tradition.[5] On the one hand, the Constitutional Court's constitutional supremacy doctrine has expanded its limited jurisdiction such that every common law case — and any other exercise of judicial authority — is, potentially, a constitutional matter.[6] As the Constitutional Court notes in Boesak:

> The development of, or the failure to develop, a common law rule by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the Supreme Court of Appeal developed, or failed to develop, the rule under circumstances inconsistent with its obligation under s 39(2) of the Constitution or with some other right or principle of the Constitution. The application of a legal rule by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the application of a rule is inconsistent with some right or principle of the Constitution.[7]

[1] Du Plessis (supra) at paras 60 and 61.

[2] 2001 (4) SA 661 (W) at para 40 (Citing Du Plessis, the Eastern Metropolitan Court wrote that 'the facts of this case call for an indirect application of the fundamental rights provisions embodied in the Constitution. The degree of development required is of a limited nature. What is required, in the present instance, is not a setting aside of the common-law rule but an incremental change in its application, necessary to ensure that the underlying values and constitutional objectives are achieved. Instead of permitting a barrier to the raising of estoppel against a public authority exercising public power, the common law should be developed to emphasise the equitable nature of estoppel, and its function as a rule allocating the incidence of loss.')

[3] 2002 (6) SA 330 (TkH) at para 7 quoting Carmichele (supra) at para 36.

[4] Ibid at para 7.

[5] See § 31.4*(e)*(iv), 'FC s 39(2) and the transformation of the common law', infra.

[6] For more on the jurisdictional implications of the Court's constitutional supremacy doctrine, see Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[7] Boesak (supra) at para 15.

In S v Pennington, the Constitutional Court unequivocally places itself at the top of the constitutional food chain. It wrote:

> On a proper construction of the 1996 Constitution there can be no doubt that this Court has appellate jurisdiction, including jurisdiction to hear appeals from decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal on constitutional matters. Section 167(3)(a) of the 1996 Constitution provides that the Constitutional Court 'is the highest court in all constitutional matters'. Section 168(3) provides that the Supreme Court of Appeal 'may decide appeals in any matter. It is the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters.' The 'highest' Court of appeal in respect of constitutional matters is therefore the Constitutional Court.[1]

On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has assured the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts that this radical doctrine of constitutional supremacy does not mean that every judicial decision is meat for constitutional review or that the Constitutional Court will supplant the Supreme Court of Appeal as the guardian of the common law. In S v Bierman, the Constitutional Court wrote:

> It is clear that special leave to appeal against a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal will be granted only when it is in the interests of justice to do so. This Court has . . . also held that where the development of a rule of the common law is in issue, this Court will be reluctant to grant an applicant leave to appeal directly to this Court and ordinarily requires the application to be heard first by the Supreme Court of Appeal . . . [W]here an applicant asserts that the common-law rules require reconsideration in the light of the Constitution, such arguments must be placed before the Supreme Court of Appeal before being raised in this Court.[2]

But while the Constitutional Court will accord due deference to the Supreme Court of Appeal with respect to the latter's role in the development of the common law, the Constitutional Court's retention of ultimate appellate jurisdiction in constitutional matters places a sword of Damocles over the Supreme Court of Appeal and any High Court that shirks the 'general' obligation to ensure the development of the common law in light of constitutional dictates.[3]

---

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) at para 10. FC s 167(6) makes the Constitutional Court's position absolutely clear: 'National legislation or the Rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court — (a) to bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court; or (b) to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court.' The Pennington Court holds that the 'words "any other court" include the Supreme Court of Appeal.' Ibid.

[2] 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC) at para 7.

[3] Lower courts have acceded to this hierarchy and division of labour. In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, the High Court admitted that it had erred in failing to recognize its obligations under FC s 39(2). 2003 (2) SA 656 (C), 2002 (10) BCLR 1100 (C). Chetty J wrote:

> In upholding the appeal, the CC refrained from itself deciding whether the law of delict should be developed on the basis contended for on behalf of the plaintiff. What it did hold, however, was that 'where the common law deviates from the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, the courts have an obligation to develop it by removing that deviation.' It furthermore held that under the Constitution, courts are obliged to develop the common law under s 39(2) of the Constitution and that both I and the SCA 'assumed that the pre-constitutional test for determining the wrongfulness of omissions in delictual actions of this kind should be applied,' and in so doing 'overlooked the demands of s 39(2)'. I must confess that I did not have regard to the demands of s 39(2).

Ibid at para 5.

How then should we understand the obligation that courts are under with respect to the development and interpretation of law in light of FC s 39(2)'s general objectives? As Danie Brand has pointed out, FC s 39(2)'s obligation should be read with both FC s 7(2)'s injunction that the judiciary must protect and promote the Bill of Rights and FC s 8(1)'s binding of the judiciary. These textual provisions, along with the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on the unity of the law and constitutional jurisdiction, frame the preferred reading of FC s 39(2)'s obligation:

- Where courts decide that the rights asserted by a party do not apply directly to the dispute before the court in terms of either FC s 8(1) or FC s 8(2), then the court may still apply the Bill of Rights indirectly to the dispute before the court and modify the law accordingly;
- The language — 'when interpreting any legislation and when developing the common law and customary law' — obtains in a context in which specific constitutional rights are not being asserted expressly;
- A court must always infuse any law with the general spirit purport and objects of the Bill;[1]
- The courts must be prepared to raise, of their own accord, constitutional issues that may affect the interpretation of legislation or the development of the common law;[2]
- However, simply because an interpretation of a statutory provision or a common law rule could, in the abstract, raise some kind of constitutional issue does not mean that counsel must offer a free-standing constitutional argument in every dispute or that a tribunal must provide a constitutional analysis of the status of the common law, or a piece of legislation in every case in which such a rule is dispositive.[3]

(iii) The development of the Common Law, interaction between FC s 39(2) and FC ss 7, 8, 38, 167, 172 and 173, and a difference in remedies

The logic of the relationship between FC s 8 and FC s 39(2), post-Khumalo, is one

[1] The word 'must' marks a subtle shift in emphasis from IC s 35(3) to FC s 39(2). IC s 35(3) reads, in relevant part, that '[i]n . . . the development of the common law and customary law, a court shall have due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of this Chapter'. On the other hand, FC 39(2) reads, in relevant part, that 'when developing the common law and customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'. Although 'shall' is rarely read as permissive in South African case law, the change to 'must' clearly reflects an intent both to make the language more natural and to make the contemplated development of the common law mandatory.

[2] The idea behind this reading is that there is now a core set of values — an objective normative value system — which undergirds our entire legal system. For a discussion of the meaning of 'an objective normative value system' in the context of FC s 39(2), see § 31.4*(e)*(viii) infra. See also S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505, 524–525 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100, 1119–1120 (CC)("The Constitution embodies an "objective normative value system" and . . . the influence of the fundamental constitutional values on the common law is authorized by s 39(2). It is within the matrix of this objective normative value system that the common law must be developed. Thus, under s 39(2), concepts which are reflective of, or premised upon, a given value system 'might well have to be replaced, or supplemented and enriched by the appropriate norms of the objective value system embodied in the Constitution.')

[3] See Bongoza v Minister of Correctional Services 2002 (6) SA 330 (TkH) at para 8 (In refusing to develop the common law with regard to the laws of evidence, the court found 'that there is no reasonable possibility of another court coming to a different conclusion regarding the development of the common law involved in the present matter.') that should require the courts to interpret legislation or to develop the common law in light of the general objects of the Bill of Rights only where no specific right can be relied upon by a party challenging a given rule of common law, the extant construction of a provision of legislation or conduct.[1] But the plethora of provisions that courts have relied upon when engaging the constitutionality of various rules of common law — from FC s 7, 8, 39, 167, 172 through 173 — has led to some confusion in the Constitutional Court itself about how FC s 39(2) operates. It is worth returning, in this regard, to the language of Moseneke J's judgment in S v Thebus:

> It seems to me that the need to develop the common law under s 39(2) could arise in at least two instances. The first would be when a rule of the common law is inconsistent with a constitutional provision. Repugnancy of this kind would compel an adaptation of the common law to resolve the inconsistency. The second possibility arises even when a rule of the common law is not inconsistent with a specific constitutional provision but may fall short of its spirit, purport and objects. Then, the common law must be adapted so that it grows in harmony with the 'objective normative value system' found in the Constitution.[2]

As we have already noted, textual over-determination for the development of the common law is just fine, until it leads the Constitutional Court to contradict its own textual grounds for distinguishing between different forms of application and various kinds of remedies. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice, the Court wrote the following with regard to the common law offence of sodomy:

> In this judgment the conclusion has already been reached that this offence should be declared constitutionally invalid in its entirety. This conclusion has been reached by a direct application of the Bill of Rights to a common law criminal offence, not by a process of developing the common law.[3]

The NCGLE I Court is obliged by FC s 172(1)(a) to make an order of invalidity. FC s 172(1)(b) then empowers the Court to make any order that is 'just and equitable.' The NCGLE I rightly concludes that it is impossible to make an order under FC s 172(1)(b) which is just and equitable in relation to the invalidity of the inclusion of the offence of sodomy in the statutory schedules, without at the same time making such an order in relation to the invalidity of the common law offence itself.

---

[1] Again, to risk repetition, direct challenges, which occur in terms of FC s 8, describe instances in which the prescriptive content of a specific provision or provisions of the Bill of Rights governs the law or the conduct at issue. Indirect challenges, which occur in terms of FC s 39(2), describe instances in which no specific provision of the Bill of Rights applies to law or to conduct. Indirect challenges rely upon the spirit, purport and objects of the entire Bill to interpret or to develop the law in order to settle the dispute before the court. A particular right may be relevant to the more amorphous assessment of whether a rule of law remains in step with more general spirit of our constitutional order. But it is relevant as a value, not a rule. For more on the distinction between rules and values, see Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaarern, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11; Minister at Home Affairs v National Institute of Crime Prevention 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC); § 31, Appendix 3*(a)*, infra.

[2] Thebus (supra) at para 28.

[3] National Coalition for Gay &Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I')(Emphasis added).

Similarly, in Khumalo, the Court wrote:

> In this case, the applicants are members of the media who are expressly identified as bearers of constitutional rights to freedom of expression. There can be no doubt that the law of defamation does affect the right to freedom of expression. Given the intensity of the constitutional right in question, coupled with the potential invasion of that right which could be occasioned by persons other than the State or organs of State, it is clear that the right to freedom of expression is of direct horizontal application in this case as contemplated by s 8(2) of the Constitution. The first question we need then to determine is whether the common law of defamation unjustifiably limits that right. If it does, it will be necessary to develop the common law in the manner contemplated by s 8(3) of the Constitution.[1]

Where an order of invalidity for a rule of common law that violates a specific provision of the Bill of Rights is sufficient, the courts should rely upon FC s 172. Where the common law violates a specific provision of the Bill of Rights and requires development in order to comport with constitutional dictates, courts should rely upon FC s 8(3).

The error made by the Thebus Court is quite similar to that which the Constitutional Court itself identified in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs. The National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality II Court wrote:

> There is a clear distinction between interpreting legislation in a way which 'promote[s] the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights' as required by s 39(2) of the Constitution and the process of reading words into or severing them from a statutory provision which is a remedial measure under s 172(1)(b), following upon a declaration of constitutional invalidity under s 172(1)(a) . . . The first process, being an interpretative one, is limited to what the text is reasonably capable of meaning. The latter can only take place after the statutory provision in question, notwithstanding the application of all legitimate interpretative aids, is found to be constitutionally invalid.[2]

In sum, FC ss 172 and 8(3) apply to instances in which the direct application of the Bill of Rights to a rule of common law requires one form of remedy. FC s 39(2) applies to instances in which the indirect application of the Bill of Rights to a rule of common law is ultimately determined to require the development of the common law and thus another form of remedy.

Assuming a court is able to keep straight the different remedial requirements that flow from direct application and indirect application, FC s 39(2) may be read together with a range of other provisions. But that probably assumes too much. At the moment the courts are apt to rely on a dizzying array of provisions in the Final Constitution when they choose to develop the common law: FC ss 7, 8, 38, 39(2), 167, 172 and 173. In S v Lubisi: In re S v Lubisi & Others, the High Court read FC s 173's protection of the courts' 'inherent power to protect and regulate their own process' — together with FC s 7 and FC s 8 — as 'establishing the Bill of Rights as the cornerstone of democracy and underlining the fact that the Judiciary is bound thereby, … as well as

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 33.
[2] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE II') at para 24.

[FC] s 39(2).'[1] In BP Southern Africa (Pty) Ltd v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs, the High Court read FC s 39(2) together with FC s 7 and FC s 8.[2] In Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, the High Court runs FC s 39(2) into FC s 173 and FC s 8.[3] The Petersen Court makes clear our courts' general confusion about the textual bases for the development of the common law by saying too much about the provisions it invokes. In deciding that a common law rule articulated in Motan violated an extra-marital child's constitutional rights to equal support from maternal and paternal grandparents, Fourie J in Petersen writes that while he is > bound by the decision in Motan with regard to the interpretation of the common law, . . . s 173 of the Constitution provides that the Court has the inherent power to develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice. Section 8(3)(a) of the Constitution enjoins the Court in order to give effect to a right in the Bill of Rights set out in Chap 2 of the Constitution, where necessary, to develop the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right. Section 39(2) of the Constitution provides that when developing the common law, the Court must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[4]

The common law rule articulated in Motan was deemed to have impaired, specifically, the rights to equality and dignity. Where, as in Petersen, rights bind directly a state actor under FC s 8(1), FC s 8(3)(a) is the appropriate mechanism for development of the common law.

The Supreme Court of Appeal is equally guilty of running these disparate and incompatible provisions together. In Juglal v Shoprite Checkers (Pty) Ltd T/A Ok Franchise Division, the Supreme Court of Appeal read the FC s 39(2) requirement to develop the common law in terms of FC ss 8 and 173. In Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund, the Supreme Court of Appeal used the same formula.[5] The Road Accident Fund Court wrote that:

> Section 173 of the Constitution provides that the Constitutional Court, this court and the High Courts have the inherent power to develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice. In terms of s 8 of the Constitution a Court, in order to give effect to a right in the Bill of Rights, must develop the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right. A Court should in terms of s 39(2), when developing the common law, promote the spirit, purport, and objects of the Bill of Rights.[6]

The mistake the Road Accident Fund Court makes is identical to that made by the Petersen Court. In cases of direct application, the development of the common law proceeds under FC s 8(3). In cases of indirect application, the development of the common law proceeds under FC s 39(2).

---

[1] 2004 (3) SA 520, 530 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1041, 1050 (T).
[2] 2004 (5) SA 124, 141 (W).
[3] 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C).
[4] Ibid at para 8.
[5] 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1120 (SCA)('Road Accident Fund').
[6] Ibid at para 35.

(iv) FC s 39(2) and the transformation of the common law

As we noted already, much of the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence that engages FC s 39(2) attempts to chart a path between transformation and tradition. The combination of the legality principle or the rule of law doctrine and the doctrine of constitutional supremacy — as articulated in cases such as Fedsure, Pharmaceutical Manufacturers and Carmichele — radically expands the Constitutional Court's limited jurisdiction. By making every exercise of public power and every judicial construction of both law and conduct a 'constitutional matter', the Constitutional Court retains the capacity to review each and every judicial decision.[1] At the same time, the Constitutional Court has attempted to assuage the fears of courts of general jurisdiction that every judicial decision is in fact meat for constitutional review by the Constitutional Court.[2]

Not surprisingly, the Supreme Court and the High Courts have responded to this manichean construction of the doctrine of constitutional supremacy in a variety of different ways. The Supreme Court of Appeal has often cautioned against — and resisted — radical doctrinal change. It prefers to characterize FC s 39(2)'s obligation to transform the common law as one that requires incremental, not punctuated, evolution. In Road Accident Fund, the Supreme Court of Appeal noted that the Constitutional Court in Carmichele had 'quoted with approval a passage to the effect that the Judiciary should confine itself to those incremental changes which are necessary to keep the common law in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society.'[3]

Some High Courts have adopted the Supreme Court of Appeal's incrementalist approach. In Bongoza v Minister of Correctional Services, the High Court emphasized the dicta in Carmichele that '(i)n exercising their powers to develop the common law, Judges should be mindful of the fact that the major engine for law reform should be the Legislature and not the Judiciary.'[4] The Bongoza Court, in light of this dicta, concluded that: (1) FC s 39(2)'s obligations did not require an analysis of the constitutionality of common-law rules of evidence; and (2) no court — and by implication the Constitutional Court — could find that FC s 39(2) required a different conclusion.[5]

Other High Courts have accepted the Constitutional Court's invitation to revisit common law doctrine in light of the demands of FC s 39(2). In S v Lubisi: In Re S v Lubisi & Others, Bertelsmann J wrote that '[a]lthough the powers granted' to the court in terms of FC ss 39(2) and 173 'have to be exercised with caution

[1] See S v Pennington 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) at para 10 ('On a proper construction of the 1996 Constitution there can be no doubt that this Court has appellate jurisdiction, including jurisdiction to hear appeals from decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal on constitutional matters.') See also Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC).

[2] Bierman (supra) at para 7. See also Metcash (supra) at para 14.

[3] Road Accident Fund (supra) at para 35.

[4] 2002 (6) SA 330 (TkH) at para 7 quoting Carmichele (supra) at para 36. See also Eastern Metropolitan Substructure v Peter Klein Investments (Pty) Ltd 2001 (4) SA 661 (W).

[5] Ibid at para 8.

and circumspection, the Constitution has broadened the scope for judicial activism where such appears to be in the interest of justice.'[1] He further wrote that:

> The debate on the rewards to be reaped by imaginative orders made by activist Judges on the one hand, and the dangers associated with an overzealous approach to usurp the function of the Legislature, or to transgress into the domain of the Executive on the other, are the subject of ongoing and vigorous debates in the European Union, the United States and other countries. In general, the conclusion may be drawn that an innovative approach is justified in all instances where it is motivated by a teleological interpretation of a constitution or treaty and has as its aim the proper realisation of the principles, ideals and values underlying the constitution or treaty concerned. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that constitutional rights must be generously interpreted.[2]

(v) FC s 39(2) as a mandatory canon of statutory interpretation

The Constitutional Court has made it quite clear that FC s 39(2) creates a mandatory constitutional canon of statutory interpretation. In Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit, the Constitutional Court wrote: 'This means that all statutes must be interpreted through the prism of the Bill of Rights.'[3] The Constitutional Court amplified this point in First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance:

> [N]o matter how indispensable they may be for the economic well-being of the country . . . [fiscal statutory provisions] are not immune to the discipline of the Constitution and must conform to its normative standards. In . . . Carmichele . . . , this Court held that the obligation of courts to develop the common law, in the context of the s 39(2) objectives, is not purely discretionary . . . The courts are under a general obligation to develop the common law appropriately where it is deficient, as it stands, in promoting the s 39(2) objectives. There is a like obligation on the courts, when interpreting any legislation — including fiscal legislation — to promote those objectives.[4]

The Constitutional Court had previously offered a similar, though not identical, gloss on FC s 39(2) in National Coalition For Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs.[5]

Lower courts have tracked the Constitutional Court's language in Hyundai and FNB. The High Court in Bezuidenhout v Bezuidenhout found that when 'determining whether to make a redistribution order and, if so, the extent of such order, [it

[1] 2004 (3) SA 520, 532 (T).
[2] Ibid at 532–533.
[3] 2001 (1) SA 545, 588 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 349 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Hyundai') at para 21.
[4] 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB')(Emphasis added).
[5] NCGLE II (supra) at para 24 ('There is a clear distinction between interpreting legislation in a way which "promote[s] the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights" as required by s 39(2) of the Constitution and the process of reading words into or severing them from a statutory provision which is a remedial measure under s 172(1)(b), following upon a declaration of constitutional invalidity under s 172(1)(a). The first process, being an interpretative one, is limited to what the text is reasonably capable of meaning.' (Emphasis added).)

was] required to interpret . . . the Act' in terms of FC s 39(2)'s requirement that all statutory interpretation 'must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.'[1] In Paola v Jeeva NO, the High Court found that it was bound to consider any and all constitutional implications of the statutory construction relied upon by the parties. Kondile J wrote that '[a]lthough the parties have not raised the issue of the constitutionality of s 7(1)(b)(ii) of the Act, this Court is constrained to advance the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution in interpreting this section.'[2]

(vi) Reading down

FC s 39(2) enables courts to read down legislation so that it conforms to the dictates of the Bill of Rights.[3] In S v Bhulwana, the Constitutional Court held that a court may save a legislative section which is 'reasonably capable' of a more restrictive, but still constitutional, interpretation.[4] How does one read down? The wrong way round, as the court in Zimbabwe Township Developers v Lou's Shoes Ltd noted, is to 'interpret the Constitution in a restricted manner in order to accommodate the challenged legislation.'[5] The Zimbabwe Township court wrote that '[t]he Constitution must [first] be properly interpreted,' and '[t]hereafter the challenged legislation must be examined to see whether it can be interpreted to fit into the framework of the Constitution.'[6] The process of reading down presupposes: (1) an assessment by the court of the ambit of the right or rights in question and (2) a determination of whether the impugned statutory provision limits the right or rights so interpreted.[7]

Because FC s 39(2) — unlike its precursors IC ss 35(2) and 35(3) — does not distinguish between indirect application and reading down, courts have erroneously assumed that when courts are asked to read legislation in light of the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights, they are always charged with the task of attempting to read legislation so that it conforms to the demands of a particular right or set of rights. But this cannot be so. First, there will inevitably be instances in which no particular right enshrined in FC Chapter 2 engages a given piece of legislation. In other words, the universe of legislation subject to the direct application of a particular right, or even all the rights in Chapter 2, is not coextensive with the universe of legislation subject to 'normal' legal analysis. Legis-

[1] 2003 (6) SA 691, 707 (C).
[2] 2002 (2) SA 391, 405–406 (D)('Paola').
[3] See Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2003 (1) SA 586 (C) at para 21 quoting Paola (supra) at 405–406 ('Although there is no equivalent in s 39 of the Constitution to s 35(2) of the interim Constitution, the presumption of consistency with the Bill of Rights exists independently of its expression in s 35(2) of the interim Constitution.')
[4] 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 28.
[5] 1984 (2) SA 778, 783 (SCA).
[6] Ibid.
[7] NCGLE II (supra) at para 24. See also See Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Classroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Walters and Afrox' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38; Jonathan Klaaren 'Remedies' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 9.

lation that is subject to two-step fundamental rights analysis as a result of direct application of the Bill of Rights is a subset of legislation subject to judicial interpretation. Second, the instruction to read legislation in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Chapter is, in cases where no right can be said to apply directly, a constitutionally-mandated canon of statutory interpretation. This new canon requires that given two possible readings of a provision, one that takes into account the general value commitments to be found in Chapter 2 and one that does not take these values into account (assuming only two such possible readings), the former is to be preferred. In sum, FC s 39(2) contemplates at least two different kinds of interpretation of legislation. A court may be asked to read down legislation so that it conforms to the dictates of a particular right (or rights) in the Bill of Rights. A court may be asked to interpret legislation so that it offers the best fit with the Chapter's general commitments.[1]

It should also be obvious that reading down is a fundamentally different process than reading in. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, the Constitutional Court wrote:

> There is a clear distinction between interpreting legislation in a way which 'promote[s] the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights' as required by s 39(2) of the Constitution and the process of reading words into or severing them from a statutory provision which is a remedial measure under s 172(1)(b), following upon a declaration of constitutional in-

[1] In Govender v Minister of Safety and Security, the SCA thought that, in reinterpreting section 49(1)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ('CPA'), it was engaging in 'reading down'. 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 197 (SCA)('Govender'). That is, it believed that it was reinterpreting section 49(1)(b) to accord with constitutional dictates, as part of a process of direct application, so as to avoid having to invalidate it. This characterization suggests that the High Court's broader finding that the SCA 'overstepped its constitutional mandate' — by engaging in direct rather than indirect application — is on target. Throughout Govender, Olivier JA appears to assume that the SCA had the power to apply the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights directly to section 49(1)(b) of the CPA. (It did not.) For instance, at the outset of his constitutional inquiry, Olivier JA makes the following statement: 'Section 49(1) of the Act self-evidently imposes a limitation on these [constitutional] rights. The question then is whether the limitation it imposes as properly interpreted passes the tests laid down in s 33(1) of the interim Constitution'. Govender (supra) at 280. Further on he states that after determining the 'objects and purport of the Act or the section under consideration', a judge must 'examine the ambit and meaning of the rights protected by the Constitution', 'ascertain whether it is reasonably possible to interpret the Act or section under consideration in such a manner that it conforms with the Constitution, ie by protecting the rights therein protected', 'if such interpretation is possible, to give effect to it, and', 'if it is not possible, to initiate steps leading to a declaration of constitutional invalidity.' Govender (supra) at 280–281 (my emphasis). Olivier JA operates as if the SCA possessed the power under the Interim Constitution to interpret specific rights of the Bill of Rights and to test section 49(1)(b) against those rights. (It did not.) He also seems to believe that the SCA possessed the power to find that an infringement of the rights in question had occurred, and then go on to consider the justifiability of section 49(1)(b), in terms of IC s 33, and to invalidate s 49(1)(b) if it chose to do so. These beliefs are predicated upon a wholly erroneous underlying presupposition that the SCA under the Interim Constitution had the power to engage in direct application. In formal terms, this error means that the SCA did indeed 'overstep its constitutional mandate'. In terms of the substantive outcome of the case, the High Court's characterization may lack any meaningful purchase. Regardless of what it thought it was doing and what it was entitled to do, the SCA in Govender can be re-read as having re-interpreted section 49(1)(b) in light of the general constitutional objects of the IC's Bill of Rights. This particular truth about Govender does not mean that distinctions between direct application and indirect application and between reading down and indirect application could not, in principal, affect the outcome of a case. Nor does it mean that we should tolerate sloppy elisions in the kinds of analysis the Bill of Rights contemplates.

validity under s 172(1)(a) . . . . The first process, being an interpretative one, is limited to what the text is reasonably capable of meaning. The latter can only take place after the statutory provision in question, notwithstanding the application of all legitimate interpretative aids, is found to be constitutionally invalid.[1]

(vii) Shared constitutional interpretation and FC s 39(2)

FC s 39(2) — as construed by our courts — contemplates a regime of shared constitutional interpretation. What is 'shared constitutional interpretation'? In short, it stands for four basic propositions:

First. It supplants the notion of judicial supremacy with respect to constitutional interpretation. All branches of government have a relatively equal stake in giving our basic law content. Second. It draws attention to a shift in the status of court-driven constitutional doctrine. While courts retain the power to determine the content of any given provision, a commitment to shared constitutional interpretation means that a court's reading of the constitutional text is not meant to exhaust all possible readings. To the extent that a court consciously limits the reach of its holding regarding the meaning of a given provision, the rest of the judgment should read as an invitation to the co-ordinate branches or other organs of state to come up with their own alternative, but ultimately consistent, gloss on the text. Third. Shared constitutional competence married to a rather open-ended or provisional understanding of the content of the basic law is meant to increase the opportunities to see how different doctrines operate in practice and maintain the space necessary to make revision of constitutional doctrines possible in light of new experience and novel demands. In this regard, the Constitutional Court might be understood to engage in norm-setting behaviour that provides guidance to other state actors without foreclosing the possibility of other effective safeguards for rights or other useful methods for their realization. Fourth. A commitment to shared interpretation ratchets down the conflict between co-ordinate branches of government. Instead of an arid commitment to separation of powers — and empty rhetorical flourishes about courts engaging in legal interpretation not politics — courts are freed of the burden of having to provide a theory of everything and can set about articulating a general framework within which different understandings of the basic text can co-exist. The courts and all other actors have more to gain from seeing how variations on a given constitutional norm work in practice.[2]

In National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town, the Constitutional Court recognizes that the process of interpreting the Labour Relations Act in light of the demands of both FC s 39(2) and FC s 23(1) requires an appreciation of the legislature's and the courts' shared responsibility for interpreting the Final Constitution. It wrote:

The LRA was enacted 'to give effect to and regulate the fundamental rights conferred by s 23 of the [Final] Constitution.' In doing so the LRA gives content to s 23 of the [Final] Constitution and must therefore be construed and applied consistently with that purpose. Section 3*(b)* of the LRA underscores this by requiring that the provisions of the LRA must be interpreted 'in compliance with the Constitution'. Therefore the proper interpretation > and application of the LRA will raise a constitutional issue. This is because the Legislature is under an obligation to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights'. In many cases, constitutional rights can be honoured effectively only if legislation is enacted. Such legislation will of course always be subject to constitutional scrutiny to ensure that it is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Where the Legislature enacts legislation in the effort to meet its constitutional obligations, and does so within constitutional limits, courts must give full effect to the legislative purpose. Moreover, the proper interpretation of such legislation will ensure the protection, promotion and fulfilment of constitutional rights and as such will be a constitutional matter.In this way, the courts and the Legislature act in partnership to give life to constitutional rights.[1]

[1] NCGLE II (supra) at para 24.

[2] Stu Woolman & Li Yu 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing & Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law — (forthcoming). See also Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' 2000 Sup Ct Rev 61.

The creation of remedies for rights violations requires a similar sort of institutional comity. The National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs Court wrote:

> It should also be borne in mind that whether the remedy a Court grants is one striking down, wholly or in part; or reading into or extending the text, its choice is not final. Legislatures are able, within constitutional limits, to amend the remedy, whether by re-enacting equal benefits, further extending benefits, reducing them, amending them, 'fine-tuning' them or abolishing them.[2]

Shared responsibility for interpreting the Final Constitution has its limits. The legislature — or the executive — must make a good faith attempt to revisit an issue in a new and constitutionally permissible way. In Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa,[3] the Constitutional Court was asked to assess the con-

[1] 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC) at para 14 (Emphasis added). See also Institute for Democracy in SA & Others v ANC & Others [2005] JOL 14201 (C)('IDASA') at paras 16–18. In IDASA, Griesel J reinforces this understanding of the shared responsibility for constitutional interpretation, especially with regard to constitutionally-mandated super-ordinate legislation. He writes that:

> Currie & Klaaren express preference for the view that [FC] s 32 remains, after the commencement of PAIA, as 'a free-standing constitutional right of access to information'. As to when such constitutional right of access to information can be directly invoked, however, the learned authors are more guarded: When can the constitutional right of access to information be directly relied on? The answer is only in the exceptional case where a provision of the AIA, other legislation or conduct beyond the reach of the AIA is challenged as an infringement of s 32. This answer is in accordance with the principle of avoidance which dictates that remedies should be found in common law or legislation (interpreted or developed, as far as possible, so as to comply with the Constitution) before resorting to direct constitutional remedies. It is related to the principle that norms of greater specificity should be relied on before resorting to norms of greater abstraction. Most compellingly, however, deference must be given to the constitutional authority that [FC] s 32(2) accords to Parliament to give effect to the constitutional right of access to information. This means that the Act must be treated as the principal legal instrument defining and delineating the scope and content of the right of access to information, establishing the mechanisms and procedures for its enforcement and limiting the right where necessary. The constitutional right therefore recedes to the background, indirectly informing the interpretation of the Act but rarely directly applicable. It appears, therefore, that the learned authors envisage a two-fold role for s 32: the one is to 'inform' the interpretation of PAIA; the other is to serve as a basis for a possible challenge to the constitutionality of PAIA for being either under-inclusive or over-restrictive.

Ibid at para 16 quoting Iain Currie & Jonathan Klaaren The Promotion of Access to Information Act Commentary (2002) § 2.12 and citing Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein and M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2002) Chapter 61.

[2] NCGLE II (supra) at para 76.

[3] 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Satchwell II').

stitutionality of a statutory and regulatory framework almost identical to one that it had declared unconstitutional only a year earlier in Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa.[1] In Satchwell I, the Constitutional Court had declared ss 8 and 9 of the Judges' Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act[2] unconstitutional because they discriminated against homosexual Judges' same-sex partners. The Satchwell I Court ordered that the words 'or partner in a permanent same-sex life partnership in which the partners have undertaken reciprocal duties of support' be read into the provisions after the word 'spouse'. Subsequent to the judgment in Satchwell I, Parliament promulgated a new Act, the Judges' Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act.[3] This Act took no notice of the Satchwell I Court's order. In Satchwell II, the Constitutional Court refused to accord Parliament any deference, declared the new provisions discriminatory, and read into the new legislation the words 'or partner in a permanent same-sex life partnership in which the partners have undertaken reciprocal duties of support.'[4]

[1] 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)('Satchwell I').

[2] Act 88 of 1989.

[3] Act 47 of 2001.

[4] See Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) Sup Ct Rev 61, 81–83. Dorf and Friedman use the cases of Miranda and Dickerson on to great effect in explaining how shared constitutional interpretation works. See Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966)('Miranda'); US v Dickerson 530 US 428 (2000)('Dickerson'). As any viewer of US police dramas knows, Miranda rights take, in part, the form of warnings that law enforcement officers must give detained persons prior to any custodial interogation. What few viewers appreciate is the extent to which most of those warnings were intended as judicial guidelines and not as excavations of constitutional bedrock. The Miranda Court, as Dorf and Friedman point out, > explains that it granted certiorari 'to explore some facets of the problems . . . of applying the privilege against self-incrimination to in-custody interrogation, and to give concrete constitutional guidelines for law enforcement agencies and courts to follow.' The Court sets out its 'holding' at the outset, and that holding is only that the prosecution may not use statements made in custodial interrogation 'unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure' the privilege. And '[a]s for the procedural safeguards to be employed, unless other fully effective means are devised to inform the accused persons of their right of silence and to assure a continuous opportunity to exercise it' the specific Miranda guidelines are required. The Court then devotes an entire paragraph to encouraging governmental bodies to devise their own ways of safeguarding the right. At least twice more, the Court repeats the holding and re-extends the invitation.

Dorf & Friedman (supra) at 81–83. Congress accepted the invitation. But as the judgment in Dickerson reflects, it willfully misconstrued the nature of the invitation. Congress did not, as the Supreme Court suggested, come up with equally effective ways of safeguarding the right to remain silent and not to have statements made in custodial interrogation used by the prosecution unless adequate safeguards have been put in place. Instead, Congress simply enacted as legislation the pre-Miranda test that the voluntariness of a confession would be assessed in terms of a totality of the circumstances. The Miranda-specific warnings were merely included as factors to be taken into account when determining voluntariness. Not surprisingly, the Dickerson Court rejected Congress' 'new' take on the voluntariness of custodial confessions. It did so, as Dorf and Friedman argue, because Congress had failed to take seriously the Court's concerns about the 'compulsion inherent in custodial interrogation' and had failed to offer an alternative that could be deemed 'equally effective in ameliorating this compulsion.' Dorf & Friedman (supra) at 71. While the 34 years between Miranda and Dickerson might have witnessed confusing dicta from the Court regarding the status and the reach of the holding in Miranda, Dorf and Friedman convincingly show that Congress and other government actors did indeed possess significant space to place their own gloss on the Fifth Amendment's protections. What they were not free to do was ignore entirely even the narrowest possible construction of the Miranda Court's holding.

(viii) An objective normative value system

How does one know 'how' to develop the common law in terms of FC s 39(2)? The Constitutional Court recognizes that there are any number of notionally different approaches one could take when pruning this bramble bush. There is, however, only one true way: '[I]t is within the matrix of … [the Final Constitution's] objective normative value system that the common law must be developed.'[1] Exactly what this phrase means — cribbed as it is from German constitutional jurisprudence — remains unclear.[2] The courts have done little to delineate its extension. The use of synonyms such as 'normative' and 'value' and the adjective 'objective' might lead one to conclude, correctly, that the phrase does no heavy lifting. It would be wrong, however, to say it does no work at all.

It is no coincidence that the phrase is borrowed from the Germans.[3] For both Germans and South Africans, the phrase attempts to address the anxiety that the judgments of constitutional courts might simply reflect the parochial for the idiosyncratic views of the individual judges. Post-Third Reich, Germans want to be able to say that the Basic Law speaks directly to and for everyone. Post-apartheid, South Africans want to say that the Final Constitution speaks directly to and for everyone. As Davis J writes in Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security:

> The content of this normative system does not only depend on an abstract philosophical inquiry but rather upon an understanding that the Constitution mandates the development of a society that breaks clearly and decisively from the past and where institutions that operated prior to our constitutional dispensation had to be instilled with a new operational vision based on the foundational values of our constitutional system. The facts of this case recall a sad part of the apartheid past, of individuals left to die in cells, of a systematic destruction of human dignity of people who were in the custody of the police. That was our past and it can no longer be our future, for if it is, then the wonderful aspirations and magnificent dreams contained in the Constitution will turn to post-apartheid nightmares. The transformation of our legal concepts must, at least in part, be shaped by memory of that which lay at the very heart of our apartheid past. When considering police action, the past is of great importance in assisting to shape legal concepts which are congruent with our constitutional future.[4]

As Davis J suggests, the phrase 'objective normative value system' reflects a modernist response to post-modern anxiety about how memory and power turn

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 54. See also Thebus (supra) at para 27.

[2] See Luth BVerfGE 7, 198 (1958)('The basic rights are primarily of the citizen against the State (negative rights); the basic rights of the Basic Law, however, also embody an objective system of values, to be taken as the basic constitutional determination for all areas of law . . . . [N]o provision of private law may contradict [the Basic Law]; each must be interpreted in its spirit.') See also Gerhard Casper 'The Karlsruhe Republic — Keynote Address at the State Ceremony Celebrating the 50th Anniversary of the Federal Constitutional Court' (2001) 2 (18) German Law Journal at paras 18–21, available at www.germanlawjournal.com (accessed on 17 September 2004); Donald Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (1989) 368, 370.

[3] See Carmichele (supra) at para 54 ('Our Constitution is not merely a formal document regulating public power. It also embodies, like the German Constitution, an objective, normative value system. As was stated by the German Federal Constitutional Court: "The jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court is consistently to the effect that the basic right norms contain not only defensive subjective rights for the individual but embody at the same time an objective value system which, as a fundamental constitutional value for all areas of the law, acts as a guiding principle and stimulus for the Legislature, Executive and Judiciary." The same is true of our Constitution.' (Citation omitted.)) law into hotly contested political terrain. The appeal to universally shared values ostensibly blunts the force of assertions that the Court plays politics or that its judgments reflect controversial ethical positions.

[4] Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security 2002 (4) SA 719, 728 (C).

Moreover by stating that the Final Constitution embodies an 'objective normative value system', the Constitutional Court would appear to reject a purely procedural approach to constitutional interpretation in favour of an approach that rests upon comprehensive vision of the good life. In S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education & Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae), the Court wrote:

> To posit a pluralist constitutional democracy that is tolerant of different forms of conduct is not, however, to presuppose one without morality or without a point of view. A pluralist constitutional democracy does not banish concepts of right and wrong, nor envisage a world without good and evil. It is impartial in its dealings with people and groups, but it is not neutral in its value system. Our Constitution certainly does not debar the State from enforcing morality. Indeed, the Bill of Rights is nothing if not a document founded on deep civic morality . . . . Yet, what is central to the character and functioning of the State is that the dictates of the morality which it enforces, and the limits to which it may go, are to be found in the text and spirit of the Constitution itself.[1]

Whether our courts possess the capacity to give meaningful content to such a comprehensive vision of the good life is quite another matter. In S v M, the High Court found that the common law offence of bestiality was perfectly consistent with the civic morality enshrined in our Final Constitution.[2] That take on the content of our civic morality was consistent with previously articulated Constitutional Court dicta on the very same point.[3] In Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail v Rail Commuters Action Group, however, the Supreme Court of Appeal differed with the Cape High Court over the content of the civic morality enshrined in the Final Constitution.[4] In Rail Commuter Action Group v Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail, the High Court had found that the Final Constitution imposed a legal duty on Transnet to ensure that all railway commuters — regardless of race or class — enjoyed a certain level of physical safety.[5] While recognizing the 'objective' moral content of our basic law, the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the proposition that our constitutionally mandated morality demanded that a legal duty of care be imposed on Transnet in order to remedy the endemic violence visited upon commuters from historically disadvantaged communities.

The Court is not really concerned with making fine distinctions between the right and the good. What animates this line of thought are more mechanical matters: namely how does a specialized constitutional court ensure that the basic law transforms the manner in which courts with plenary jurisdiction dispose of ordinary disputes. Like the legality principle, an 'objective normative value system' grounded in the 'objectives' of FC s 39(2) has the potential to expand dramatically the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. If the FC s 39(2)

[1] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 499 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan') at para 104.
[2] 2004 (3) SA 680 (O) at paras 18–25.
[3] Justice Sachs provides the putative grounds for such distinctions in NCGLE I: 'There are very few democratic societies, if any, which do not penalize persons for engaging in inter-generational, intra-familial, and cross-species sex, whether in public or in private . . . The privacy interest is overcome because of the perceived harm.' NCGLE I (supra) at para 118.
[4] 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA).
[5] 2003 (5) SA 518, 573 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C).

objectives map directly on to this 'objective normative value system', then the Constitutional Court may assert constitutional jurisdiction through FC s 39(2) whenever it believes that a rule of the common law or the interpretation of a statute does not conform with its understanding of our basic constitutional norms. The Constitutional Court relies on this characterization of FC s 39(2) in Carmichele in order to compel the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Court to develop the common law of delict. So despite the Thebus Court's admission that FC s 39(2) 'does not specify what triggers the need to develop the common law or in which circumstances the development of the common law is justified', the failure of any court to adhere to the FC s 39(2) obligation to develop the common law in light of the demands of the Final Constitution's 'objective normative value system' risks reversal by our highest constitutional tribunal.

(ix) Customary Law

Where customary law is found to be in conflict with a specific provision of the Bill of Rights, it must be declared invalid to the extent of its inconsistency and, where necessary, a new rule of customary law must be crafted. Where customary law is found to be out of step with the spirit of the Bill of Rights, it must be developed so that it comports with FC s 39(2)'s objectives. In Mabuza v Mbatha, Hlophe JP wrote:

> [A]ny custom which is inconsistent with the Constitution cannot withstand constitutional scrutiny. In line with this approach, my view is that it is not necessary at all to say that African customary law should not be opposed to the principles of public policy or natural justice. That approach is fundamentally flawed as it reduces African law (which is practised by the vast majority in this country) to foreign law - in Africa! The approach whereby African law is recognised only when it does not conflict with the principles of public policy or natural justice leads to an absurd situation whereby it is continuously being undermined and not properly developed by the Courts, which rely largely on 'experts'. This is untenable. The Courts have a constitutional obligation to develop African customary law, particularly given the historical background referred to above. Furthermore, and in any event, s 39(2) of the Constitution enjoins the Judiciary when interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[1]

The Constitutional Court endorsed this very approach to customary law in Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha.[2]

(x) Stare decisis

(aa) Walters and Afrox

In a number of recent cases, the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of [1] 2003 (4) SA 218 (C) at paras 30–31.

[2] See, eg, Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at paras 42–46 (Succession based upon male primogeniture found unconstitutional. The Court wrote: 'At the level of constitutional validity, the question in this case is not whether a rule or provision of customary law offers similar remedies to the Intestate Succession Act. The issue is whether such rules or provisions are consistent with the Constitution. This status of customary law has been acknowledged and endorsed by this Court.') For an extended discussion of the various tropes employed by the courts when transforming customary law. See the analysis of both Bhe and Mabuza in Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

Appeal have deployed the doctrine of stare decisis in a manner that dramatically curtails the ability of High Courts to use the Bill of Rights, generally, and FC s 39(2), in particular, to develop the common law or to re-interpret legislation in ways that depart from Constitutional Court, Supreme Court Appeal, or Appellate Division precedent. The Constitutional Court in Walters restricted its conclusions about stare decisis to precedent handed down by the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Appellate Division in the (rather ambiguously described) 'constitutional era.'[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox extended binding precedent — backwards — past the very beginning of even the most controversial understanding of the 'constitution era'.[2] The Afrox Court recognized that High Courts could retain constitutional jurisdiction for any direct attack on a rule of law grounded in a pre-constitutional decision of the Appellate Division. However, where a High Court is persuaded that a pre-constitutional decision of the Appellate Division should be developed, through FC s 39(2), so that it accords with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights (true indirect application), its hands are tied. The High Court is bound to follow the pre-constitutional decisions of the Appellate Division. Brand JA, for the Afrox Court, writes:

> Die antwoord is dat die beginsels van stare decisis steeds geld en dat die Hooggeregshof nie deur artikel 39(2) gemagtig word om van die beslissings van hierdie Hof, hetsy pre- hetsy post-konstitusioneel, af te wyk nie.[3]

As Danie Brand and I have argued elsewhere, the problems with Walters and Afrox on the issue of stare decisis and the constitutional jurisdiction of the High Courts are legion.[4] What is particularly troublesome for the purposes of application analysis is that the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have said that FC s 39(2) is the appropriate vehicle for development of the common law — both directly and indirectly — but that the High Courts may not disturb settled precedent through FC s 39(2).[5]

[1] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters') at para 61.

[2] 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox').

[3] Ibid at para 29 ('The answer is that the principles of stare decisis still apply and that the High Court is not authorised by section 39(2) to depart from decisions of this Court, whether pre-constitutional or post-constitutional.' (Danie Brand's translation).)

[4] See Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There a Constitution in This Classroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Walters and Afrox' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38–83 (Sets out the doctrine of stare decisis for all courts with constitutional jurisdiction, and the limits the doctrine imposes on the High Courts.)

[5] One other space remains within which to contest existing precedent. The Afrox Court states that High Courts will be able to deviate from SCA, AD and CC precedent with respect to how they understand such open-ended notions as boni mores and public interest. Afrox (supra) at para 28. A second line of attack may be open to the High Courts. Where the Supreme Court of Appeal has assiduously avoided constitutionalising an issue of law, then the Constitutional Court's doctrines of legality, the unity of the law, constitutional supremacy and an objective normative value system suggests that the High Courts should have an opportunity to test such a rule of law against the basic law's dictates. To this end, the Constitutional Court in Boesak writes:

> The development of, or the failure to develop, a common-law rule by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the Supreme Court of Appeal developed, or failed to develop, the rule under circumstances inconsistent with its obligation under s 39(2) of the Constitution or with some other right or principle of the Constitution. The application of a legal rule

(bb) After Afrox and Walters

Since Afrox and Walters were handed down, several cases have engaged the principle of stare decisis and the development of the common law through FC s 39(2). None have altered the manner in which the Afrox and Walters doctrine shapes constitutional jurisdiction and the development of the common law.[1]

The Constitutional Court has not had its authority with respect to precedent, jurisdiction or the development of the common law challenged. It has even extended ever so slightly the reach of its precedent. In National Director of Public Prosecutions v Mohamed, the Constitutional Court noted that not only does the holding of a case constitute binding precedent, the reasons supporting the holding themselves constitute 'an objective precedent, with such binding force on other courts as the principles of stare decisis and the status of the Court delivering the judgment dictate.'[2]

The Supreme Court of Appeal has had its authority to develop or to interpret the law under FC s 39(2) contested on a number of occasions. In Blaauwberg Meat Wholesalers CC v Anglo Dutch Meats (Exports) Ltd, the Supreme Court of Appeal dressed down a High Court judge for having the temerity to suggest that the Supreme Court review its conclusions in an earlier decision.[3] The Blaauwberg Meat Wholesalers Court wrote: 'In the absence of a constitutional challenge, to which other considerations would apply, perceived equities are not a legitimate basis to depart from a decision of a higher Court or to avoid the strictures of a statute.'[4] by the Supreme Court of Appeal may constitute a constitutional matter. This may occur if the application of a rule is inconsistent with some right or principle of the Constitution.

---

Boesak (supra) at para 15. Neither the Boesak Court nor the Walters Court make clear whether such a failure can be remedied by all courts with constitutional jurisdiction or only by the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court. Cf K v Minister of Safety and Security CCT 52/04 (13 June 2005).

[1] High Courts have accepted the 'dominant principles' set out in Afrox and Walters. See Harper v Morgan Guarantee Trust Co of New York, Johannesburg 2004 (3) SA 253, 267 (W)('It is argued that this Court is bound by the principles of stare decisis. Confirming that both the inherent and the constitutional right of the Supreme Court to develop the law are subject to the principles of stare decisis is Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom . . . That was stated to be the case in respect of post-1994 judgments in Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another . . . There is no decision deciding on the appellant's argument specifically, but there are decisions about dominant principles.') See also Ritchie v Government, Northern Cape 2004 (2) SA 584 (NC)('None of the issues before us require a decision whether or not a politician (for example MEC Block) is competent to sue the applicants . . . I am nevertheless also of the respectful view that Joffe J's decision that a cabinet minister does not have the right to sue for damages falls foul of the principles enunciated by the Constitutional Court in Khumalo v Holomisa . . . . and that in accordance with the established principles of stare decisis the learned Judge was bound thereby. See Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: In re S v Walters and Another . . . [and] Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom.')

[2] 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC) at para 57.

[3] 2004 (3) SA 160 (SCA).

[4] Ibid at para 20 quoting Dischem Pharmacies (Pty) Ltd v United Pharmaceutical Distributors (Pty) Ltd 2003 CLR 9 at para 13 and citing Walters (supra) at para 61 and Afrox (supra) at paras 25–26. See S v Kgafela 2003 (5) SA 339, 341(SCA)(Court a quo granted leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal, and 'after setting out a full review of the general sentencing rules, . . . felt "impelled to venture" that [the Supreme Court of Appeal] might welcome the opportunity to revisit the decision in Malgas in order to give more definition or formulation to the phrase "substantial and compelling circumstances", and to reverse the order of the enquiry. The Supreme Court of Appeal tersely dismissed the High Court's invitation and wrote: This is an approach to granting leave that cannot be accepted.' The Supreme Court

What these 'constitutional' considerations are, the Blaauwberg Meat Court does not say. In Wagener v Pharmacare Ltd; Cuttings v Pharmacare Ltd, the Supreme Court of Appeal refused the invitation to revisit its own precedent and to develop the common law of delict.[1] It did not merely view its own precedent as dispositive. It suggested that only the legislature should initiate the dramatic change in the law that a departure from its own precedent would require. With regard to the displacement of its own precedent, the Wagener Court found that while it might be obliged to reverse itself in 'a situation … in … which there was no remedy at all in existence or a patently inadequate one, and the dictates of the Constitution led to the need for change, … that is not the situation we have before us.'[2]

The Wagener Court's view, that the development of the common law under FC s 39(2) — or FC s 8(3) — requires that there be either no remedy at law or a patently inadequate one, sets an almost insuperable threshold for revisiting existing precedent. Marry the Supreme Court of Appeal's resistance to doctrinal development to a refusal to afford High Courts the space to alter existing Appellate Division or Supreme Court of Appeal precedent via FC s 39(2) and it is hard to imagine why any given litigant would seek to challenge such precedent in either a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal. Moreover, given the Constitutional Court's reluctance to alter the common law without the Supreme Court of Appeal having first fully vetted a particular rule or doctrine of common law, it seems reasonable to conclude that few litigants will underwrite expensive challenges to existing rules of law via FC s 39(2).

Some challenges to existing common law precedent via direct application of the Bill of Rights have succeeded. In Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (Pty) Ltd v Police Commissioner, Western Cape (Legal Resources Centre As Amicus Curiae) Desai J noted counsel's reliance on 'the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom.'[3] He then wrote as follows:

> As I understand … Afrox … , if I am convinced that any common law rule is in conflict with the Constitution, I am obliged to differ from it … The obligation to differ from the common law is, for obvious reasons, more compelling where it is in conflict with the fundamental liberties entrenched in the Bill of Rights contained in the Constitution.[4]

In Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, the High Court found that while it was technically 'bound by the [AD's] decision in Motan with regard to the interpretation of the common law', the rule articulated in Motan violated an 'extra-marital child's constitutional rights to equality and dignity enshrined in [FC] ss 9 and 10 … and is contrary to the best interest of the child' according to of Appeal then quoted, in support of this contention, Cassell and Co Ltd v Broome & Another [1972] AC 1027. The House of Lords in Cassell wrote: 'The fact is, and I hope it will never be necessary to say so again, that, in the hierarchical system of courts which exists in this country, it is necessary for each lower tier, including the Court of Appeal, to accept loyally the decisions of the higher tiers.') See also Contract Forwarding (Pty) Ltd v Chesterfin (Pty) Ltd 2003 (2) SA 253 (SCA).

[1] 2003 (7) BCLR 710 (SCA).

[2] Ibid at para 30.

[3] 2004 (4) SA 444, 449 (C).

[4] Ibid at 449–450.

FC s 28(2).[1] Direct application of these three rights resulted in a finding that the Motan rule was unconstitutional. The Petersen Court then crafted a new rule of common law using its powers under FC s 173, FC s 8(3) and FC s 39(2).

Other challenges to existing common law precedent via direct application of the Bill of Rights have failed. In Bookworks (Pty) Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council, decided prior to both Afrox and Walters, the High Court recognized that, unlike IC 7(1), FC s 8(1) 'applies to all law and binds, inter alia, the Judiciary' and thus might be understood to change the body of law being applied to the case before the court.[2] Cloete J wrote:

> I am fully aware that in terms of s 8(1) of the final Constitution the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds, inter alia, the Judiciary. I am also aware that, whereas s 35(3) of the interim Constitution required a court, when interpreting a statute, to have 'due regard' to the spirit, purport and objects of the chapter on fundamental rights, s 39(2) of the final Constitution goes further and provides that a court 'must promote' the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[3]

But Cloete J refused to accept the proposition that the shift in the language from the Interim Constitution to the Final Constitution in any way altered the 'law' being applied to the case before the court.[4] He wrote:

> I respectfully agree with the view of Cameron J in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd . . . that the Constitution requires that its provisions and values 'must be given primacy over the rules of the common law, even when those rules have been invested with the highest stature of pre-constitutional judicial authority.' But where a superior Court has decided what the effect of the Constitution is on established law, whether substantive or procedural, a lower court must in my view follow that decision, the supremacy of the Constitution notwithstanding. . . . To hold otherwise would be to invite chaos.[5]

---

[1] 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C) at para 7.

[2] 1999 (4) SA 799 (W)('Bookworks').

[3] Ibid at 810–811.

[4] But see Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Classroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Walters and Afrox' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38. We argue that the Final Constitution is a different body of law from the Interim Constitution. The differences in the provisions governing direct application and indirect application require that decisions made using the application provisions of the Final Constitution are, for the purposes of stare decisis, not identical with decisions made using the provisions under the Interim Constitution. However, even if that thesis is controversial, the application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights from either the Interim Constitution or the Final Constitution to any legal dispute must change the body of law applied from that body of law applied prior to the enactment of the Interim Constitution. The willingness of the Constitutional Court to acquiesce to the Supreme Court's bold assertion that pre-constitutional precedent binds High Courts in terms of the development of the common law — or the interpretation of statutes — would appear to fly in the face of the Constitutional Court's assertion that all law now derives its forced from the Final Constitution and that the Final Constitution makes manifest an objective normative value system. Can the body of law being applied by the High Court under the Final Constitution truly be said to be the same body of law applied before either the Interim Constitution or the Final Constitution came into effect?

[5] Bookworks (supra) at 810 (Emphasis added). Cloete J's take appears consistent with the Afrox Court's restrictive understanding of stare decisis. Other judges, however, continue to push the envelope of stare decisis. Davis J, in Sayed v Editor, Cape Times, averred that the Constitutional Court had erred in Khumalo & Others v Holomisa when it confirmed the Supreme Court of Appeal's position on defamation in National Media Ltd & Others v Bogoshi. 2004 (1) SA 58 (C). Davis J suggested that given the primacy of place of 'democracy' in 'our constitutional enterprise', the bar to defamatory action with respect to political speech 'needed to be somewhat higher'. Davis J, having thrown the gauntlet down, was forced to concede that 'Khumalo was now the law which the Court was obliged to follow.' Ibid at 61–62.

What Cloete J appears to be saying is that where the Supreme Court of Appeal (or the Appellate Division) have decided that neither the Interim Constitution nor the Final Constitution has any meaningful effect on a rule of law — even when the Court lacked the jurisdiction to apply the Interim Constitution directly or did not realize that it possessed the jurisdiction to apply the Interim Constitution indirectly — a High Court would not be free to depart from such SCA or AD precedent.

(f) Section 239: Organ of State

FC s 239 reads, in relevant part, as follows:

> Definitions
> In the Constitution, unless the context indicates otherwise — . . .
> 'organ of state' means —
> (a) any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government; and
> (b) any other functionary or institution —
> (i) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or > (ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation.
> but does not include a court or a judicial officer.

FC s 8(1) tells us that 'organs of state' are amongst the bodies bound directly by the Bill of Rights. FC s 239 tells us that organs of state come in two varieties: those identified in FC s 239*(a); and those identified in FC s 239(b)*. While the courts have no problem identifying organs of state, they have thus far been reluctant to fit them into either of these two categories.

Laundry lists may not seem especially helpful when one is attempting to understand the analytical framework that has been developed for determining whether an entity is an organ of state. Still, such an inventory may give the reader a better sense of the constellation of bodies that have already been identified as being part of this universe. 'Organs of state' embraces Transnet,[1] South African Airways,[2] the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration,[3] the Magistrates' Commission,[4] the President,[5] the Ministers of Finance and

[1] Hoffman v SAA 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC); Claase v Transet 1999 (3) SA 1012 (T); Goodman Bros (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (4) SA 989 (W), 1998 (8) BCLR 1024 (W), [1998] All SA 336 (W).

[2] Hoffman v SAA 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC).

[3] Mkhize v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration 2001 (1) SA 338 (LC); Carephone v Marcus 1999 (3) SA 304 (LAC).

[4] Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 222 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) citing Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others 2001 (4) SA 396 (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 915 (T); De Kock & Others v Van Rooyen 2005 (1) SA 1 (SCA); Chevron Engineering (Pty) Ltd v Nkombule & Others 2004 (3) SA 495 (SCA); Ruyobeza & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 51 (C); Moldenhauer v Du Plessis & Others 2002 (5) SA 781 (T).

[5] Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC).

Provincial Affairs,[1] the Minister of Trade and Industry,[2] provincial premiers in Kwa-Zulu Natal,[3] the Western Cape,[4] and the Eastern Cape,[5] the National Gambling Board,[6] the Kwa-Zulu Natal Provincial Gambling Board,[7] the University of Bophuthatswana,[8] the Permanent Secretary of the Department of Welfare for the Eastern Cape,[9] the Western Cape's Minister of Education,[10] the Western Cape's Department of Education,[11] the Greater George Municipal Council,[12] the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board,[13] the Independent Electoral Commission,[14] the Langeberg Municpality,[15] the Cape Metropolitan Council,[16] Port Elizabeth Municipality,[17] the Eastern Cape Appropriate Technology Unit,[18] the Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope,[19] and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.[20]

(i) 'Any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'

While much of the legal action and the academic commentary around the meaning of 'organ of state' has been driven by FC s 239*(b), it is worth pausing to see exactly what is meant by FC s 239(a). FC s 239(a)* binds departments of state or administrative bodies whether or not they act 'in terms of' the Final Constitution, a provincial constitution or a piece of legislation. As a result, FC s 239*(a)* stands, at a minimum, for three propositions.

[1] Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC).
[2] National Gambling Board v Premier, Kwa-Zulu Natal & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC).
[3] MEC for Health, KwaZulu-Natal v Premier, KwaZulu-Natal: In Re Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 717 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1028 (CC).
[4] Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC).
[5] Cekeshe v Premier, Eastern Cape 1998 (4) SA 935 (Tk).
[6] National Gambling Board v Premier, Kwa-Zulu Natal & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC).
[7] Ibid.
[8] Baloro & Others v University of Bophuthatswana & Others 1995 (4) SA 197 (B), 1995 (8) BCLR 1018 (B).
[9] Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another v Ngxusa & Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA).
[10] Naptosa v Minister of Education 2001 (2) SA 112 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 388 (C).
[11] Ibid.
[12] Pedro v Breater George Transitional Council 2001 (2) SA 131 (C).
[13] Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board 2001 (2) SA 980 (W).
[14] Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municpality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC).
[15] Ibid.
[16] Cape Metropolitation Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & Others 2001 (3) 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA).
[17] Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples Dialogue on Land and Shelter 2001 (4) SA 759 (E).
[18] Mgijima v Eastern Cape Appropriate Technology Unit 2000 (2) SA 291 (TkH).
[19] Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 103 (C).
[20] Inkatha Freedom Party v Truth and Reconciliation Commission 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 534 (C).

One. Even when a 'Department of State or Administration' does not act within the express terms of a constitution or piece of legislation, they are bound by constitutional dictates. In other words, all conduct of FC s 239*(a)* entities is subject to the Bill of Rights.

Two. As a consequence of this first position, a 'Department of State or Administration' is bound by the Bill of Rights in the commercial or contractual realm. The position under the Final Constitution marks a notable shift from the position under the Interim Constitution.[1]

Three. The phrase 'a Department of State or Administration' does not generate a bright line rule. As Stephen Ellmann has persuasively argued, there are good reasons to conclude that parastatals and entities privatised by the state, but still functionally public, are captured by FC s 239*(a)*.[2] With regard to parastatals, Ellmann relies on the reasoning of the US Supreme Court in Lebron v National Railroad Passenger Corporation.[3] In Lebron, the Court held:

> That where, as here, the Government creates a corporation by special law, for the furtherance of government objectives, and retains for itself permanent authority to appoint a majority of the directors of that corporation, the corporation is part of the Government for the purposes of the First Amendment [of the Constitution].[4]

The Constitutional Court reached a similar conclusion in Hoffmann v South African Airways.[5] In finding that the parastatal Transnet, and thus SAA as a wholly owned subsidiary of Transnet, was an organ of state, the Hoffmann Court held that SAA satisfied FC s 239 because it was both a statutory body and controlled by the State.[6] The Hoffmann Court wrote as follows:

[1] See Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC). Kentridge AJ was willing to find that government reliance on common-law rules with respect to the criminal law could be attacked directly. He seemed less inclined to allow common law rules governing state activities in the commercial or contractual sphere to be similarly subject to direct attack. See also J De Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition 2001) 50. The authors agree that what was once an open question under the Interim Constitution is now closed under the Final Constitution. However, the authors are surely wrong to suggest that common law rules governing state activities in the commercial or contractual sphere are governed by the application provision of FC s 8(2). Even if one accepts their Khumalo-like assessment of the split between FC s 8(1) and FC s 8(2), there is certainly no good reason to accept the conclusion that legal relationships between a government actor and a natural or juristic person are governed by FC s 8(2). Organs of state are bound by FC s 8(1). The text is unequivocal about that. (The only possible way in which FC s 8(2) could apply would be if we read FC s 8(2) to always govern the conduct of a private party being challenged, even when the other party in the dispute is the state. Such a reading would expand implausibly the disputes captured by FC s 8(2).)

[2] S Ellmann 'A Constitutional Confluence: American State Action Law and the Application of Socio-Economic Rights Guarantees to Private Actors' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 444, 446–448.

[3] 513 US 374 (1995).

[4] Ibid at 400.

[5] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffmann').

[6] The Hoffmann Court also held that Transnet, and thus SAA, was an organ of state that possessed public powers and that exercised public functions, in terms of legislation, in the public interest. Ibid at para 23. Its analysis of the statutory basis for this finding is worth quoting in full:

Transnet Ltd has its origin in the South African Railways and Harbours Administration, which was > Transnet is a statutory body, under the control of the State, which has public powers and performs public functions in the public interest. It was common cause that SAA is a business unit of Transnet. As such, it is an organ of State and is bound by the provisions of the Bill of Rights in terms of s 8(1), read with s 239, of the Constitution. It is, therefore, expressly prohibited from discriminating unfairly.[1]

In reaching its conclusion, the Hoffmann Court notes that under the South African Transport Services Act, South African Transport Services [Transnet's precursor] was 'not a separate legal person, but a commercial enterprise of the State.'[2] In the Hoffmann Court's eyes, neither a name change nor a statutory change alters Transnet's status as part of the State:

> Pursuant to ss 2(1) and 3(2) of the Legal Succession to the South African Transport Services Act 9 of 1989 Transnet was incorporated as a public company and took transfer of the whole of the commercial enterprise of the South African Transport Services.[3]

The Constitutional Court's inclination to avoid fitting its findings into a pre-conceived test makes it difficult to press down particularly hard on its FC s 239 analysis in Hoffmann. The facts and the holding are, however, consistent with the reasoning offered by both Ellmann and the Lebron Court.

A knottier question, but one of some moment in South Africa, is whether the 'privatisation and sale' of a parastatal 'removes it from government for the purposes of [FC] s 239*(a)*?'[4] One should suppress any initial intuition that such a sale removes the entity from the orbit of government — and thus the ambit of FC s 239 — if various indicia of government and government control remain present. If, as Ellmann suggests, 'the government retains some seats on the privatised entity's board of directors' or supplies the entity with 'subsidised electricity or guaranteed contracts', then there is every reason to believe that the entity 'has never actually departed from the government's ambit.'[5] Failure to hold such entities administered by the State under the Railway Board Act 73 of 1962. In terms of s 2(1) of the South African Transport Services Act 65 of 1981 the South African Railways and Harbours Administration was renamed the South African Transport Services. In terms of s 3(1) it was not a separate legal person, but a commercial enterprise of the State. It was empowered, in terms of s 2(2)(a), amongst other things, to 'control, manage, maintain and exploit . . . air services (under the title 'South African Airways' or any title in the Minister's discretion)'. Pursuant to ss 2(1) and 3(2) of the Legal Succession to the South African Transport Services Act 9 of 1989 Transnet was incorporated as a public company and took transfer of the whole of the commercial enterprise of the South African Transport Services. SAA is a business unit within Transnet, established in terms of s 32(1)(b) of that Act. In terms of s 2(2), the State is the only member and shareholder of Transnet. Section 15 requires it to provide certain services in the public interest. Its services must be performed in accordance with the provisions of Schedule 1 to the Act.

Ibid at para 23, fn 17. The language of the Hoffman Court implies that Transnet qualifies as an organ of state in terms of both FC s 239*(a)* and FC s 239*(b)*.

[1] Ibid at para 23.

[2] Ibid at para 23, fn 17.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ellmann (supra) at 447.

[5] Ibid.

accountable as organs of state would permit the state to escape its constitutional obligations 'under a veneer of privatisation.'[1]

This last line of analysis cannot be avoided by arguing that FC s 239*(b)* was designed for just such an eventuality. If one proffers a very literal — and potentially cramped — reading of FC s 239*(b), and the privatised entity under scrutiny is no longer exercising a power or function in terms of the Final Constitution or a piece of legislation, then the entity's para-governmental function might escape both FC ss 239(a)* and (b). In such cases, where the entity lies at the very periphery of our vision of what constitutes an organ of state, the courts are under some obligation to craft two sets of tests adequate to the taxonomic task of determining which entities count as government and which entities do not.[2]

(ii) Any other functionary or institution

Given the other changes wrought by the Final Constitution with respect to issues of application, one would expect a similar sea-change with respect to the definition of 'organ of state' under FC s 239*(b)*. Under the Interim Constitution, only institutions

[1] Ellmann (supra) at 447. Ellmann pushes the envelope for those kinds of private entities that could be captured by FC s 239*(a)* when he argues that private building contractors, if they possess a significant fraction of the tenders for a government programme designed to deliver adequate housing as per FC s 27, might legitimately be taken to be part of the state apparatus. One implicit ground for this argument is that because the progressive provision of adequate housing is a constitutional obligation imposed upon the state, the state should not be able to avoid any irregularities in its programme simply through the privatization of the work. That implication seems relatively uncontroversial. However, as soon as Ellmann starts creating distinctions between builders or a building association with a significant fraction of the total budget for housing and smaller contractors, the coherence of his argument collapses. Ibid at 450. No percentage of such work can, save by fiat, create an institutional link between the state and the party employed to do its bidding. A functional test that grounds the finding that an entity is an organ of state avoids such a mathematical miasma.

[2] Of course, it remains possible to interpret both FC ss 239 (a) and (b) with sufficient generosity as to capture such entities at either stage. As Ellmann's analysis suggests, what matters is whether the entity possesses the requisite indicia of government. As with all state action enquiries, the analysis is going to be driven less by the text and more by the court's inclination towards making the Bill of Rights applicable directly to a wider or a narrower body of actors. For example, the judgments of Van Djikhorst evince a clear desire to draw sharp lines between state and non-state actors and to hold as few of the latter as possible subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights. See Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister for Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting 1996 (3) SA 800 (T); W*ittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others* 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)(Van Dijkhorst J holds that state-aided secondary school was not an organ of state under the Interim Constitution); Korf v Health Professions Council of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 1171 (T), 2000 (3) BCLR 309 (T)(Van Dijkhorst J holds that test employed for organs of state under Interim Constitution remains the same under the Final Constitution.) The judgments of Davis J reflect a more expansive approach to 'organ of state' analysis and a recognition that for purposes of application the important questions are not how power has been traditionally described, but how power is actually exercised. See, eg, Inkatha Freedom Party v TRC 2000 (3) SA 119, 133 (C)(To be defined as an organ of state, entity need not be under direct control of government but must merely 'fulfill objectives indentified in the Constitution' or a piece of legislation.) See also J De Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition 2001) 51 (Narrow construction of organ of state inconsistent with a 'central objective' of the Final Constitution: to impose a 'culture of justification and openness on private persons and institutions' that 'perform public functions'.)

under the direct control of the government were considered organs of state.[1] In Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister for Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting, Van Dijkhorst J set out the basic contours of this restrictive definition:

> By control, I do not mean inspection or supervision in respect of the quality of his services, but the right to prescribe what the function is and how it is to be performed. He must be part of the government apparatus . . . The concept must be limited to institutions which are an intrinsic part of government, . . . ie where the majority of members are appointed by the state or where the functions of that body and their exercise is prescribed by the state to such an extent that it is effectively in control. In short, the test is whether the state is in control.[2]

By contrast, the Final Constitution provides expressly that those institutions and individuals bound by its dictates are those exercising 'public power' or engaging in a 'public function' in terms of some underlying legislation or constitutional provision. These institutions and individuals need not be an 'intrinsic part' of what we have commonly or historically considered to be the 'government'. They need not be subject to the effective control of elected legislative or executive bodies. The drafters of the Final Constitution have crafted this section in such a manner as to ensure that if the state created the conditions for the exercise of some power or function, then the institutions produced and the individuals so empowered are going to have to answer for their actions in the same manner as those institutions and officials to whom we have no trouble ascribing the appellation 'government'.[3]

To understand the difference this distinction makes one must first appreciate what the control test allowed. The government control test, as elaborated by Van Dijkhorst J, sought to allow institutions created by government, but not under its direct control or supervision, to operate without fear of constitutional sanction.[4]

[1] 1996 (3) SA 800, 810 (T)('Directory Advertising Cost Cutters'); Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)(Holds that state-aided secondary school was not an organ of state under the Interim Constitution.)

[2] Directory Advertising Cost Cutters (supra) at 810.

[3] For an extended discussion of the case law concerning 'organ of state' under the Interim Constitution, see the version of this chapter in the first edition. Stuart Woolman 'Application' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) § 10.3*(a)*(iv)(cc).

[4] The control test, borrowed as it is from Canadian constitutional jurisprudence, has a certain amount of give in it. In the early 1990s, the Canadian Supreme Court held that the Charter did not apply to a publicly created and funded university because it fell outside the state's direct control. See McKinney v University of Guelph [1990] 3 SCR 229, 76 DLR (4th) 545. See also Connell v University of British Columbia [1990] 3 SCR 451 (Limited state supervisory role and significant fiscal control did not make university 'government' for purposes of Charter.) The McKinney Court found that although the University of Guelph was subject to government regulation and dependent upon government funding, it was not a state actor because it managed its own affairs and allocated those funds along with tuition moneys, endowment funds and other sources. Similarly, in Stoffman v Vancouver General Hospital, the Canadian

Perhaps, as Mark Tushnet has suggested, the central purpose of the Final Constitution — to subject private parties, as well as state parties, to the basic law's provisions — makes these fine distinctions between organs of state and non-organs of state less pressing than they might otherwise be.[1] But given the Constitutional Court's penchant for avoiding the constitutionalization of 'private' disputes, the characterization of a legal relationship as one between the state and an individual — as opposed to one between private parties — retains its value.

The courts have not, as yet, tested the outer limits of FC s 239 analysis in the manner suggested by Ellmann and Canadian case law. However, a clutch of cases largely confirm the conclusion that our courts have rejected the restrictive, anachronistic understanding of 'organ of state' offered up by Van Djikhorst J in Direct Cost Cutters and Korf and that they are inclined to prevent the state from delegating responsibilies so as to immunize itself from liability for the actions of its creations.[2]

Supreme Court found that the Charter did not apply to hospital regulations even though fourteen of sixteen hospital board members were government appointees and the Minister had the power to veto and compel regulations made by the board and to compel the board to enact regulations. [1990] 3 SCR 483 ('Stoffman'). The Court held that Charter did not apply because government presence was only supervisory and did not effect actual operation of hospital. Recently, however, the Canadian Supreme Court has adopted a more relaxed approach to the control test. In Eldridge v British Columbia, the Canadian Supreme Court found that a hospital was subject to the Charter despite the absence of direct control over the hospital's operation. [1997] 3 SCR 624 at paras 43–51. That the hospital was, in significant part, governed by and funded under British Columbia's Hospital Services Act was sufficient to secure review under the Charter. Although there is little difference, factually, between McKinney, Stoffman and Eldridge, the legal conclusions are worlds apart. In McKinney and Stoffman, the absence of state actors ends the Supreme Court's constitutional analysis. In Eldridge, the finding of a sufficient quantum of government presence underwrites the Supreme Court's decision to review the hospital's conduct under s 15 of the Charter.

Peter Hogg notes the factual similarities and legal differences with some dismay. He concludes that Eldridge was wrongly decided and that the Charter should not have applied. See Hogg, 'Application' in Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2001) Chapter 34. But given this difference in outcome, it is hard to maintain, as Hogg does, that the control test looks solely to 'an institutional or structural link' with government as opposed to a 'functional' link. Ibid at 34–17. At a minimum, the control test now enables a Canadian court to rely either on institutional affiliation alone or public function (when tied to some state foundation).

[1] See, eg, Mark Tushnet 'The Issue of State Action/Horizontal Effect in Comparative Constitutional Law' (2003) 1 Journal of International Constitutional Law 79.

[2] Cf Duncan Kennedy 'The Stages of the Decline of the Public-private Distinction' (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania LR 1349 (While Kennedy argues, correctly, that public-private distinctions rarely do any meaningful work, we, in South Africa, do not have the same liberty to dispense with that distinction for the purposes of FC s 239 organ of state analysis.)

In Hoffmann, the Constitutional Court found that a change of legal form from a state commercial enterprise to a state-owned public company was insufficient to take Transnet and SAA out of the orbit of government. A public function and the exercise of public power — in the public interest and in terms of legislation — makes both Transnet and SAA organs of state for the purposes of FC s 239*(b)* and thus FC s 8(1). Similarly, non-governmental professional regulatory bodies and public service entitites that possess all the trappings of state power have been found to satisfy the requirements of FC s 239*(b)*. In Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, the High Court found that the Public Accountants and Auditors Board is an 'organ of state' as defined in FC s 239*(b)*(i) and (ii).[1] The Association of Chartered Certified Accountants Court reasoned as follows:

> The Board clearly exercises a public power; it is a creation of statute and the source of its power is to be found in the Public Accountants and Auditors Act 80 of 1991. The Board also appears to fulfil a public function in terms of the said legislation. The Board is a regulatory body entrusted with the task of ensuring that proper standards are maintained in the accounting and auditing profession. It functions in close co-operation with structures of State authority, its members are appointed by the Minister and include persons selected among the persons holding office as State functionaries, it is also dependent upon the State for infrastructural support.[2]

The High Court in Mkhize employed similar reasoning regarding the FC s 239*(b)* status of the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration ('CCMA').[3] The CCMA was established in terms of a statute — the Labour Relations Act[4] — and exercises a public function and a public power. Mkhize seems especially close in facts, reasoning and outcome to Eldridge v British Columbia. In both cases, the hook was the enabling legislation. Once the entity was demonstrated to be a statutory body, the court only needed to show that the entity operated as an extension of the state, or furthered state objectives or played a role traditionally associated with the state.

31.5 Application of the Bill of Rights to other sections of the Constitution

The wording of FC s 8 offers no indication as to how the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights engage other sections of the Final Constitution. However, the text — especially where it has changed from the Interim Constitution to the Final Constitution — intimates when and where the substantive provisions of the Bill engage other constitutional provisions.

[1] Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board 2001 (2) SA 980 (W).
[2] Ibid at 996.
[3] Mkhize v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration 2001 (1) SA 338 (LC).
[4] Act 66 of 1995.

The supremacy clause of the Interim Constitution, s 4(1), read as follows:

> This Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic and any law or act inconsistent with its provisions shall, unless otherwise provided expressly or by necessary implication, be of no force and effect to the extent of the inconsistency. (Emphasis added.)

The supremacy clause of the Final Constitution, s 2, reads:

> This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and obligations impose by it must be fulfilled.

At a minimum, the Interim Constitution contemplated the possibility that a constitutional provision — and government action taken in terms of that provision — could, in the abstract, conflict with the requirements of another constitutional provision. I say 'in the abstract' because the Constitutional Court has committed itself to the proposition that all constitutional provisions must be read in a manner that permits them to be harmonized with one another.[1] While harmonization as a canon of constitutional interpretation implies that a substantive provision in the Bill of Rights might have to bow before the requirements of another constitutional provision, the text of the Final Constitution indicates that harmonization ought, as a general matter, to cut the other way.[2] FC s 7(1) provides that:

> The Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic rights of human dignity, equality and freedom.

By making fundamental rights an indispensable component of South Africa's political process, FC s 7 provides support for the argument that where another provision can be read either to undermine a fundamental right or to give effect to a fundamental right, it should be read so as to do the latter.[3]

One further section of the Final Constitution deserves our attention. FC s 36(2) reads, in relevant part, that:

> Except as provided in subsection (1) or in any other provision of this Constitution, no law may limit any right entrenched in this Chapter.

The phrase 'any other provision of this Constitution' should give us pause. On one reading, the phrase would appear to permit the override of fundamental

[1] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening: Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae)(No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM') at para 12 (Court held that 'amendments to the Constitution passed in accordance with the requirements of s 74 of the Constitution became part of the Constitution. Once part of the Constitution, they could not be challenged on the grounds of inconsistency with other provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution, as amended, had to be read as a whole and its provisions had to be interpreted in harmony with one another.') See also Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC).

[2] UDM (supra) at para 12 (Since an amendment to the Final Constitution must be read as part of the Final Constitution, all other provisions must harmonized with the new provision So although FC s 19 or FC s 1 could be given a gloss that would put them at odds with the practice of floor-crossing any interpretations consistent with floor-crossing must be given precedence.)

[3] De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)('De Lille').

rights by other provisions of the Final Constitution without the requirement that they be justified by reference to the test laid out in FC s 36(1).

There is, however, a better reading. Given the primacy of place the Final Constitution accords the Chapter's fundamental rights, and their express purpose of placing clear limits on the exercise of government power, it would be counter-intuitive to subordinate automatically these rights to the exercise of government power. At the very least it should remain an open question as to whether or not the exercise of power expressly provided for by the Final Constitution should be permitted to limit a fundamental right. While we may not want to subject such limitations to the justificatory test set out in FC s 36(1), another kind of justificatory test is warranted. Such a test would treat the kinds of justification for a constitutional-power-based incursion into a fundamental right quite differently than FC s 36(1) treats the justifications for statutory, executive, common law or customary law infringements of fundamental rights.

The position adumbrated above is consistent with the Canadian learning on 'internal' constitutional conflicts. No part of the Canadian Constitution is deemed to be superior to any other part. The Charter, therefore, may not be used to invalidate other provisions of the Constitution.[1] The Canadian Supreme Court has crafted a more subtle distinction that permits application of the Charter to acts performed in the exercise of a constitutional power.[2] The test the Supreme Court employs turns on whether acceding to the Charter argument negates or removes a constitutional power (part of the tree itself). If so, the Charter does not apply. If, however, the attack merely engages the exercise of a constitutional power (the fruit of the tree), then a court can entertain the Charter argument.[3]

Both De Lille and UDM provide some clarity on the South African courts' take on this complex set of issues.

In De Lille the applicant was found by Parliament to have violated alleged rules of parliamentary procedure.[4] She was duly punished and suspended. The question for the court was whether the constitutional provisions dealing with the powers of Parliament could justifiably limit the constitutional rights of the applicant: especially the rights to administrative justice, political participation and freedom of expression. Parliament had taken the position that the rules of parliamentary privilege — which, amongst other things, include the power of the National Assembly to [1] See Reference re Act to Amend Education Act (Ont) [1987] 1 SCR 1148, (1987) 40 DLR (4th) 18. With regard to the determination of whether a law is constitutional or not, Peter Hogg argues for the logical priority of the constitutional provisions regulating the legislative process over the rights and freedoms found in the Charter as follows: 'It is impossible for a nation to be governed without bodies possessing legislative powers, but it is possible for a nation to be governed without a Charter . . . . Another point in favour of the logical priority of federalism issues over Charter issues is the presence in the Charter of Rights of the power of override.' 'Judicial Review on Federal Grounds' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 15-2–15-5.

[2] See New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia [1993] 1 SCR 319, (1993) 100 DLR (4th) 212.

[3] Ibid at 373. See Peter Hogg 'Application' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 34-9–34-12.

[4] The decision of the Cape High Division was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal, but on non-constitutional grounds. See Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Court found suspension beyond the scope of Paliament's authority — ultra vires — in the absence of legislation or rules that might permit such punishment.)

order its own affairs — were not an appropriate object for judicial review. The De Lille court rejected this view.

The De Lille court observed that, in terms of FC s 2, the Final Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic and that any law or conduct inconsistent with the Final Constitution is invalid. The court then noted that, according to FC s 8(1), the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state.[1] Any conduct or legislation regarding privilege inconsistent with the Final Constitution — even if drawn from the provisions of the Final Constitution itself — must be found infirm. In De Lille, the court found that power to craft rules or make decisions regarding parliamentary privilege was so inextricably bound up with the exercise of that power that the two could not be distinguished. The De Lille court was therefore obliged to hold that the determination of the extent of this privilege must relate to its exercise, and that both must therefore be subject to judicial review. If the court had decided otherwise, Parliament would have had a blank cheque to set the limits of its own powers.[2] Most importantly, this specific exercise of judicial review enabled the court to find that Parliament had exercised its powers in breach of the substantive provisions of Chapter 2. De Lille suggests that where a non-fundamental rights provision of the Final Constitution appears to contemplate a limitation of a fundamental right, no such limit should be permitted without clear and convincing textual evidence.

De Lille also supports the proposition that the exercise of powers sourced from non-Chapter 2 constitutional provisions that impair the exercise of a substantive provision of Chapter 2 cannot — unless authorized by a law of general application — be justified by reference to FC s 36. Judge Hlophe writes:

[1] Judge Hlophe reinforces this point when he writes that:

> Ours is no longer a parliamentary state. It is a constitutional state founded on the principles of supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law. A new political and Constitutional order has been established in South Africa. The new Constitution shows a clear intention to break away from the history of parliamentary supremacy. There are many other provisions in the Constitution which do not support Mr. Heunis' contention. For example: (i) s 1*(c)* says the Republic of South Africa is a democratic state founded on the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law; (ii) s 2 provides that the Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic and law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid; (iii) s 34 states that everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of the law decided in a fair public hearing before a court of law or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum; (iv) s 38 entitles anyone alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened to approach law courts for appropriate relief; (v) s 165(3) provides that no person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts; (vi)s172(1)(a) provides that when a court decides a Constitutional matter within its power it must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; (vii) s 8 provides that the Bill of Rights applies to all law, and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state; and (viii) other relevant sections include s 165(2), s 39(1)(a) and 39(2).

Ibid at 452.

[2] Ibid at 446–447.

[3] Ibid at 455.

> The suspension of the first applicant fails the first leg of the limitations test because it did not take place in terms of law of general application. There is no law of general application which authorises such suspension. It is not authorised by the Constitution, the Powers and Privileges of Parliaments Act of 1963 or the Standing Rules of the National Assembly. The law of Parliamentary privilege does ot qualify as a law of general application for purposes of s 36. It is not codified or capable of ascertainment. Nor is it based on a clear system A of precedent. Therefore there is no guarantee of parity of treatment. It is essentially ad hoc jurisprudence which applies unequally to different parties. . . . Accordingly, the law of privilege fails the 'law of general application' leg of the limitations test.[1]

When can the parliamentary right to free speech afforded by FC s 58, and reinforced by FC s 16, be justified by reference to FC s 36(1)? Beyond finding that any restrictions on privilege must be justified in terms of a law of general application, the De Lille court does not say.

The Constitutional Court in UDM offers a somewhat different, although ultimately consistent, take on the subject.[2] In June 2002, Parliament passed four Acts that aimed to allow members of national, provincial and local government to change parties without losing their seats. The four Acts were: (1) the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002 (the First Amendment Act); (2) the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 21 of 2002 (the Second Amendment Act); (3) the Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002 (the Local Government Amendment Act); and (4) the Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002 (the Membership Act).

With regard to the constitutional attack on the validity of two constitutional amendments — the First Amendment Act and the Second Amendment Act — the UDM Court was quite clear:

> Amendments to the Constitution passed in accordance with the requirements of s 74 of the Constitution become part of the Constitution. Once part of the Constitution, they cannot be challenged on the grounds of inconsistency with other provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution, as amended, must be read as a whole and its provisions must be interpreted in harmony with one another. It follows that there is little if any scope for challenging the constitutionality of amendments that are passed in accordance with the prescribed procedures and majorities.[3]

Only in extraordinary circumstances, where the 'basic structure' of the Final

[1] De Lille (supra) at 455. See also Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Finding that Parliament acted ultra vires consistent with High Court finding that Parliament did not act in terms of any cognizable law.)

[2] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa and others (African Christian Democratic Party and others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa and another as Amici Curiae)(No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM').

[3] UDM (supra) at para 12.

Constitution is threatened by an amendment, will the Constitutional Court even consider challenges to amendments 'passed in accordance with the prescribed procedures.'[1] As a result, various challenges to the two amendments failed.

A normal act of Parliament — even one married to constitutional amendments — is not due such deference. The Membership Act — having failed to comply with the requirements of Item 23A of Annexure A to Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution — was held to be unconstitutional.[2]

Read together, De Lille and UDM provide support for the following propositions:

- Chapter 2's fundamental rights and freedoms will take precedence over law and conduct that is generated in terms of other constitutional provisions.
- While the primacy of place of fundamental rights in the Final Constitution militates against subordinating fundamental rights to constitutionally articulated government powers, fundamental rights have no automatic claim of priority over constitutionally articulated government powers.
- Accepted canons of constitutional interpretation require that the courts must attempt to harmonize Chapter 2 and non-Chapter 2 claims.
- When harmonizing the rights and freedoms found in Chapter 2 with constitutionally articulated government powers, a court should construe constitutionally articulated government powers in a manner that gives greatest effect to the rights and freedoms at issue.

The last proposition points to one of the strengths of De Lille. As I noted at the outset of this section, Chapter 2's Bill of Rights is, in the words of FC s 7, a 'cornerstone of democracy in South Africa'. De Lille recognizes this relationship of reciprocal effect between rights and democracy and quite consciously reads the constitutional provisions regarding rules and orders of Parliament in terms of the Final Constitution's commitment to freedom of speech. As UDM demonstrates, however, this reciprocal effect may sometimes cut the other way. The Constitutional Court in UDM is surely correct in noting that there as many types of multi-party democracy as there are tokens and that the Final Constitution did not commit itself to a type of multi-party democracy that precluded floor-crossing.[3]

[1] UDM (supra) at paras 14–17. The UDM Court referred to Premier, KwaZulu-Natal & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, in which Mahomed DP had written, with the full support of the Court, that:

> There is a procedure which is prescribed for amendments to the Constitution and this procedure has to be followed. If that is properly done, the amendment is constitutionally unassailable. It may perhaps be that a purported amendment to the Constitution, following the formal procedures prescribed by the Constitution, but radically and fundamentally restructuring and reorganising the fundamental premises of the Constitution, might not qualify as an 'amendment' at all.

1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1561 (CC) at para 47.

[2] Item 23A of Annexure A to Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution contained the anti-defection provision relevant to the national and provincial legislatures and could be amended by ordinary legislation 'within a reasonable period after the new Constitution took effect' to make it possible for a member of the legislature who ceased to be a member of the party which nominated that member to retain membership of such legislature. The UDM Court found that Parliament had failed to Act in a reasonable period of time after the Final Constitution took effect.

[3] If anything, the presence of Item 23A reinforces the argument the Final Constitution contemplates a type of democracy that permits floor-crossing. If this last proposition is true, then the Constitutional

31.6 Extraterritorial Effect of the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution

The Final Constitution, and Chapter 2 in particular, applies to various forms of law and conduct within South Africa. What the text does not indicate is whether persons outside South Africa's borders can benefit from the rights in Chapter 2, whether the exercise of state power by the South African government outside South Africa's borders is subject to the strictures of Chapter 2, and whether the Bill of Rights has anything to say about disputes governed by foreign law in foreign jurisdictions. The next two sections speak to these fundamental questions in some detail. But first a brief set of responses.

Is the South African government obliged to abide by the Final Constitution's requirements outside South Africa's border? The initial, short answer was yes. The Constitutional Court in Mohamed found that the state was subject to constitutional dictates even though the person subject to the exercise of state power was neither legally resident in South Africa nor still within its borders.[1] At present the answer is unclear. The Constitutional Court in Kaunda muddied the waters by running together two discrete issues: whether state action outside South Africa's borders can be subject to the requirements of Chapter 2, and whether disputes governed by foreign law in foreign jurisdictions can be subject to the requirements of Chapter 2.[2] The Kaunda Court held that the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution did not apply extraterritorially, for reasons largely to do with the comity of nations, but that South African law might apply to nationals abroad in special circumstances.

Are foreign legal regimes in any way subject to the dictates of the Bill of Rights? The short answer is no and yes. Respect for the sovereignty of foreign countries — along with the practical realization that the review of foreign laws apparently in conflict with the Bill of Rights would be logistically and politically impossible for our courts — demands that we restrict the application of the Final Constitution. However, where, as in Mohamed, a South African court properly exercises jurisdiction in a matter that potentially involves the extradition of a person for trial in a foreign jurisdiction, the Constitutional Court has found that a South African court is required to take into account the penalties to be exacted upon that person if extradited to another country and then convicted in its courts. The court must determine the extent to which such penalties would constitute a breach of his or her fundamental rights under the South

Court was correct in harmonizing the Final Constitution's provisions in such a fashion as to give the maximum possible effect to both the floor-crossing amendments and the existing provisions against which they were being measured. For more on UDM, floor-crossing and representative democracy, see Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17; Glenda Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29 and Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 9.

[1] Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC)('Mohamed').

[2] Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa Amicus Curiae) 2004 (1) SACR 111 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda').

African Constitution. A significant breach would require intervention. A court order requiring the South African government to intervene in the proceedings of a trial in a foreign jurisdiction in order to correct a violation of South African constitutional law by South African officials was not understood, by the Mohamed Court, to be a violation of the principle of separation of powers.

Kaunda cuts back Mohamed's understanding of extraterritoriality. Pace Mohamed, the Constitutional Court in Kaunda found that the South African government is under no obligation to intervene in a trial of a South African national under foreign law in a foreign jurisdiction until there is an imposition of a penalty that would constitute a significant breach of his or her rights under the South African Constitution. The Kaunda Court characterized as a violation of separation of powers any order by a South African court requiring government intervention prior to the meting out of punishment by a foreign court.

(a) Persons outside South Africa's borders

Chapter 2 is clearly concerned with the South African government's treatment of people within its borders. There seems to be no good reason why abuses of state power within South Africa's borders should be subject to Chapter 2, but abuses of state power outside the borders should not be similarly subject. To relax the strictures on extraterritorial exercise of state power — and even private power — seems to offer a licence to the state — or another party burdened by Chapter 2 — to abuse persons abroad in ways it would never contemplate at home.[1] FC s 8(1) tells us that the Bill of Rights binds the conduct of the government. It does not distinguish home from abroad.

The United States Constitution provides some protection for US citizens outside US borders.[2] Aliens abroad are far less likely to benefit from the US Constitution's protections.[3] Where aliens abroad are concerned, the US courts regularly 'uphold' law enforcement violations of the Fourth Amendment's

[1] South Africa was ahead of the curve on this issue even before the post-1994 constitutional dispensation. See S v Ebrahim 1991 (2) SA 553 (A)(Appellate Division held that a cross-border warrantless kidnapping by security forces violated the fundamental rights of the accused. The court further justified its landmark opinion on the grounds that to permit such cross-border kidnappings would violate the sovereignty of other states and undermine the dignity and integrity of the judicial system asked to endorse such acts.)

[2] See Rochin v California 342 US 165 (1952)(Citizens abroad are protected against government violations so egregious that they 'shock the conscience'. These protections are, however, 'diluted'.) See also In Re Ross 140 US 453 (1891)(No right to jury trial abroad); Reid v Covert 354 US 1, 75 (1957)(Not every 'provision of the Constitution must be automatically applicable to American citizens in every part of the world'); US v Warren 578 F2d 1058 (5th Cir 1978)(Coast Guard stoppage of American vessel, apparently without reasonable grounds for suspicion, not deemed violation of Fourth or Fifth Amendments). Even the Hungarian Constitution, a document of more recent vintage, maintains this citizen/non-citizen distinction. According to Article 69(3): 'Every Hungarian citizen is entitled to enjoy the protection of the Republic of Hungary, during his/her legal stay abroad.'

[3] But see Rasul v Bush 542 US —, 124 SCt 2686 (2004)(Foreign nationals held at Guantanamo Bay entitled to bring legal action in Federal Court challenging the alleged grounds for their detention.)

prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures.[1] It is not clear why benefits should flow to non-citizens within the United States' borders when subject to state power, but not to non-citizens outside the borders when subject to that same state power.[2]

Persons outside Canada's borders are entitled to the benefit of some Charter rights.[3] The Canadian Supreme Court has even held that non-citizens abroad are entitled to the Charter's protection when subject to the exercise of police power by Canadian officials in a foreign jurisdiction.[4] The Supreme Court of Canada implicitly recognizes that to hold otherwise valorizes state sovereignty and treats all government action abroad as the legal equivalent of war in defense of the nation.[5]

The limited succour to be had by non-citizens in American courts makes the Constitutional Court's decision in Mohamed that much more remarkable.[6] At the time of the Constitutional Court hearing on the matter, the appellant was on trial in a US federal court on capital charges related to the bombing of the United States embassy in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania in August 1998. Although the applicant was now beyond the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction, his representatives asked the Court to find: (i) that the interrogation and the handing over of Mr Mohamed by South African officials to US agents was unlawful, and (ii) that the government had breached Mr Mohamed's constitutional rights by handing him over to the US government without first obtaining an assurance that the death penalty would not be imposed or carried out in the event of Mr Mohamed's conviction. Furthermore, the appellants sought an order 'directing the Government of the Republic of South Africa to submit a written request … to the Government of the United States of America that the death penalty not be sought, imposed nor carried out' in the event of conviction.[7] By and large, the Constitutional Court granted the relief sought by the applicant. In rejecting claims made by the government that a court order in this matter was 'futile', beyond the Constitutional Court's powers, and a breach of the separation of powers, the Mohamed Court wrote:

[1] US v Verdugo-Uriquidez 494 US 259 (1990); Lujan v Gengler 510 F2d 62 (2d Cir 1975). But see US v Toscanino 500 F2d 267 (2d Cir 1974)(Abduction of alien abroad so shocks conscience as to violate constitution) Poll case. See, generally, Louis Henkin Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (1972) 251–70.

[2] See Johnson v Eissentrager 339 US 763 (1950)(Non-resident enemy aliens outside territorial jurisdiction of United States not entitled to a writ of habeas corpus.)

[3] See R v A [1990] 1 SCR 995. But see Peter Hogg 'Application' Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition 1992) 34–5, fn 23. Despite the changes in Canadian law cited herein, Hogg maintains that the extraterritorial benefit of rights ought to extend only to Canadian citizens. See Peter Hogg 'Application' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 34–5, fn 23.

[4] R v Cook [1998] 2 SCR 597(US citizen arrested in US for murder committed in Canada still entitled to protection of Charter when interrogated by Canadian police officers in the US. Failure to apprise the accused of right to counsel violated Charter. Moreover, the enforcement of the Charter did not constitute a violation of US sovereignty.)

[5] See Jonathan Klaaren 'Human Rights Legislation for a New South Africa's Foreign Policy' (1994) 10 SAJHR 260 (Klaaren argues that human rights ought to be a linchpin of South African foreign policy.)

[6] 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).

[7] Mohamed (supra) at para 4.

> To stigmatise such an order as a breach of the separation of State power as between the Executive and the Judiciary is to negate a foundational value of the Republic of South Africa, namely supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law. The Bill of Rights, which we find to have been infringed, is binding on all organs of State and it is our constitutional duty to ensure that appropriate relief is afforded to those who have suffered infringement of their constitutional rights.[1]

Having found the government's actions unlawful under the Aliens Control Act and unconstitutional under FC ss 10, 11, and 12, the Mohamed Court then ordered that a copy of its judgment be sent, as a matter of urgency, to the apposite US federal district court. On the more general issue of the Constitutional Court's — and thus the Final Constitution's — reach, the Mohamed Court's judgment stands for the proposition that the Final Constitution applies to aliens both within and without South Africa's borders and that the government cannot undo our basic law's fetters simply by claiming that a case concerns sensitive political issues or foreign affairs. Moreover, even if a court has a limited capacity to affect directly the manner in which the government carries out its foreign affairs, a finding that the government violated the constitutional rights of a person within its borders might support an action in delict and thereby influence the government's behaviour in the future.[2]

If Mohamed is an advance with respect to the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights to the exercise of state power beyond our borders, then Kaunda must be viewed as a retreat. The Constitutional Court in Kaunda was approached by 69 South African citizens held in Zimbabwe on a variety of charges related to alleged mercenary activities. They requested relief ranging from an order directing the South African Government to seek the release and the extradition of the applicants from Zimbabwe and Equatorial Guinea back to South Africa, to a more limited order directing the South African Government to seek assurance from the Zimbabwean and Equatorial Guinean Governments that they would not impose the death penalty on the applicants. The Constitutional Court denied all seven forms of requested relief.

The textual basis for the Kaunda Court's rejection of the claim that the Bill of Rights applies to extraterritorial legal proceedings begins with a curiously cursory appraisal of FC s 7(2) and ends with what ultimately amounts to a very narrow construction of the holding in Mohamed. The Kaunda Court writes:

[1] Mohamed (supra) at para 71 citing, in support of these various proposition, FC s 1*(c), and FC s 7(2) read with FC ss 38 and 172(1)(a)*. See also Metlika Trading v South African Revenue Service 2005 (3) SA 1 (SCA)(Enforceability or effectiveness of order not sole criterion granting requested relief.)

[2] See Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC). In Carmichele, the failure by the state to protect adequately a person it knew to be in danger led to the development of the common law of delict so as to create a duty of care that would enhance the likelihood that state actors would not fail to exercise this duty in the future. It is reasonable to imagine that a court, having placed the government on notice that violations of the rights of aliens at home or abroad is unconstitutional, will be willing to extend the duty of care in a delictual action to include government agents responsible for the care or the welfare of aliens at home or abroad. Moreover, the recent decision of the Constitutional Court in Modderklip strengthens the claim that the failure of the state to discharge a constitutional duty may occasion a finding that the state must bear the costs incurred by its conduct or its omission. Modderklip (supra) at para 68.

> The starting point of the enquiry into extraterritoriality is to determine the ambit of the rights that are the subject matter of section 7(2) . . . . [T]he rights in the Bill of Rights on which reliance is placed for this part of the argument are rights that vest in everyone. Foreigners are entitled to require the South African state to respect, protect and promote their rights to life and dignity and not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way while they are in South Africa.[1]

Foreigners are entitled to all but a few of the rights enshrined in Chapter 2 — when they are in South Africa. That is what Mohamed told us.

The Kaunda Court continues: 'Clearly, [foreigners] lose the benefit of that protection when they move beyond our borders.[2]' There is nothing clear about the basis for this assertion. The text says nothing about what foreigners do and do not possess with respect to extraterritorial application. Nor does it make any distinction between citizens and non-citizens. The Kaunda Court then turns to the extraterritorial entitlements of citizens. It asks:

> Does section 7(2) contemplate that the state's obligation to South Africans under that section is more extensive than its obligation to foreigners, and attaches to them when they are in foreign countries?[3]

This rhetorical use of FC s 7(2)'s ostensible treatment of foreigners primes the Court's intuition pump with respect to its subsequent analysis of the appropriate constitutional contours of the state's obligations to South African nationals. Unfortunately, FC s 7(2) has nothing to say about the treatment of foreigners or nationals. The Kaunda Court looks to FC s 7(1) for an answer. FC s 7(1) reads:

> This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom. (My emphasis.)

It is difficult to discern in FC s 7(1) the basis for denying the extraterritoriality of the Bill. The Kaunda Court writes:

> The bearers of the rights are people in South Africa. Nothing suggests that it is to have general application, beyond our borders.[4]

The Kaunda Court's entire textual argument on the lack of extraterritoriality turns on the presence of a word — the preposition 'in' — that could never have been intended to carry such weight. The Kaunda Court cites no authority — neither travaux preparatoires nor academic writing — in support of this proposition.[5]

There are better textual sources than the preposition 'in' with regard to the extraterritoriality. Under FC s 8(1), the Bill of Rights binds the executive as well

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 36.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Kaunda (supra) at para 37 (My emphasis).
[5] Anthony Stein offers another perfectly tenable, and to my mind more plausible, reading of 'in' that would turn not on a literal sense of time or place, but on the broader connotation of 'in' — namely 'of the people of South Africa'. The Kaunda Court's reading leads to a reductio ad absurdum: it suggests that if all of us in South Africa today were to go to Mozambique for a holiday tomorrow, the Bill of Rights would, tomorrow, cease to enshrine the rights of any and all South Africans.

as the other two branches of government. Under FC s 2, all laws and all conduct inconsistent with the provisions of the Final Constitution are invalid. Neither provision gives the State a free ride when it acts outside the borders of South Africa. As Justices O'Regan and Mokgoro note in their dissent:

> There is nothing in our Constitution that suggests that, in so far as it relates to the powers afforded and the obligations imposed by the Constitution upon the executive, the supremacy of the Constitution stops at the borders of South Africa. Indeed, the contrary is the case. The executive is bound by the four corners of the Constitution. It has no power other than those that are acknowledged by or flow from the Constitution. It is accordingly obliged to act consistently with the obligations imposed upon it by the Bill of Rights wherever it may act.[1]

The Kaunda Court's error flows from the conflation of two discrete issues: (1) the exterritorial application of the Bill of Rights to state conduct and persons beyond our borders; and (2) the exterritorial application of the Bill of Rights to the law of foreign jurisdictions. As a result, the Kaunda Court concludes that:

> There may be special circumstances where the laws of a state are applicable to nationals beyond the state's borders, but only if the application of the law does not interfere with the sovereignty of other states. For South Africa to assume an obligation that entitles its nationals to demand, and obliges it to take action to ensure, that laws and conduct of a foreign state and its officials meet not only the requirements of the foreign state's own laws, but also the rights that our nationals have under our Constitution, would be inconsistent with the principle of state sovereignty. Section 7(2) should not be construed as imposing a positive obligation on government to do this.[2]

This conflation of issues has its source in the failure by the Kaunda Court to recognize the textual basis for the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights to every exercise of power by the South African state. As Justice O'Regan writes:

> So, the extraterritorial application of the provisions of the Bill of Rights will be limited by the international law principle that the provisions will only be enforceable against the government in circumstances that will not diminish or impede the sovereignty of another state. The enquiry as to whether the enforcement will have this effect will be determined on the facts of each case. As a general principle, however, our Bill of Rights binds the government even when it acts outside South Africa, subject to the consideration that such application must not constitute an infringement of the sovereignty of another state.[3]

Justice O'Regan's exemplary analysis of the distinction between the Bill of Rights' application to the South African state and the Bill of Rights' application to foreign law invites some future majority of the Constitutional Court to reconsider its cramped understanding of the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights.

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 228. Justice O'Regan continues: 'It is not necessary to consider in this case whether the provisions of the Bill of Rights bind the government in its relationships outside of South Africa with people who have no connection with South Africa.' Ibid. However, as Justice O'Regan intimates later on in her dissent, the logic of the proposition that the exercise of state power is always circumscribed by the Bill of Rights creates a rebuttable presumption that the Bill of Rights does indeed bind the state in its actions beyond its borders — whether or not citizens or foreigners are involved. Whether such a rebuttable presumption may be overcome more easily beyond our borders is another matter and beyond the scope of this chapter.

[2] Kaunda (supra) at para 44.

[3] Ibid at para 229.

(b) Foreign law and the Final Constitution

A different set of considerations militates against the subjection of foreign law to Chapter 2's strictures. Here the issue is not the exercise of South African state power against individuals, but respect for the sovereignty of another country. Such respect generally demands both the recognition that the laws of other countries may differ fundamentally from our own and the practical realization that we cannot subject foreign laws to review every time they might appear to abrogate Chapter 2 rights.[1] Leaving aside questions of time, capacity and enforcement, the courts would quickly find themselves embroiled in the kinds of international political disputes that clearly fall outside their proper domain.

That said, Mohamed forces the reader to rethink the Final Constitution's relationship to foreign affairs and the law of foreign jurisdictions.[2] While no South African court can expect its judgment to have the force of law in another jurisdiction, Mohamed suggests that a South African court can expect that its

[1] See Swissborough Diamond Mines Ltd v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (2) 279 (T)(Court held that, given the act of state doctrine (or a doctine of judicial restraint in foreign affairs), a court must be extraordinarily circumspect when applying South African law to the behaviour of the Government of Lesotho within its own borders. Court described request for review of decisions taken together by the governments of South Africa and Lesotho as a 'judicial no-man's land'.) See also TW Bennett 'Redistribution of Land and the Doctrine of Aboriginal Title in South Africa' (1993) 9 SAJHR 444 (On how the act of state doctrine may interact with discontinuities in rule — between various pre- and post-apartheid legal regimes — and aboriginal land claims in South Africa; effectively asks age-old question of whether a new regime can take cognizance of legal relationships in previous regimes, and thus whether the past is, in fact, a foreign country.) The 'act of state' doctrine in US jurisprudence severely curtails the application of US constitutional law to foreign bodies of law. It holds that 'the courts of one nation will not sit in judgment on the acts of another nation within [the latter's] own territory.' Banco Nacional de Cuba v Sabbatino 376 US 398, 416 (1964). A domestic tribunal is only competent to examine the validity of foreign law where a treaty or some other agreement clearly establishes controlling legal principles. Canada has recently rejected a similarly restrictive doctrine. In the first few years of the Charter, the Canadian Supreme Court refused to apply Charter rights to foreign law. See Canada v Schmidt (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 18, [1987] 1 SCR 500 (Canadian Charter cannot be given extraterritorial effect to govern how criminal proceedings in a foreign country are to be conducted); Kindler v Canada (1991) 84 DLR (4th) 438. (Since Charter was not applicable to foreign law, a fugitive could legitimately be extradited to the US, even though he might be executed and such execution violated Charter's s 7.) However, the Canadian Supreme Court expressly reversed itself in United States v Burns. [2001] 1 SCR 283 ('Barns'). In Burns, the Court wrote that 'in the absence of exceptional circumstances, . . . assurances in death penalty cases [that the penalty will not be sought] are always constitutionally required.' In Suresh v Canada, the Canadian Supreme Court extended the holding in Burns to cover cases in which deportation of a foreign national was likely to result in torture of that person. [2002] 1 SCR 72. However, as Peter Hogg notes, the Supreme Court has allowed extradition to the United States when the 'fugitive faced penalties that were more severe than penalties for similar crimes in Canada' and which, if imposed in Canada, would be deemed contrary to the Charter. Hogg (supra) at 34–29 citing US v Jamieson [1996] 1 SCR 465; US v Ross [1996] 1 SCR 469; US v Whitley [1996] 1 SCR 467.

[2] Metlika v South African Revenue Service 2005 (3) SA 1 (SCA)(Court held that the possible lack of effectiveness did not prevent it from granting an order that might have to be enforced in and by another state.)

judgment will exert influence over the conduct of foreign affairs in a number of different ways. First, a South African court should expect that its own government will fashion its actions in a manner consistent with the South African Constitution. Second, the increased use of comparative (foreign) constitutional materials and the enhanced status of international law means that a foreign court will likely take note of a specific South African judgment that speaks directly to that court. Third, the Final Constitution also ties more closely the jurisprudence of other jurisdictions to our own by: (a) making some international agreements a part of domestic law;[1] (b) treating some international law as authority falling somewhere between the Final Constitution and Acts of Parliament, on the one hand, and such bodies of law as the common law or subordinate legislation, on the other;[2] and (c) employing international law as a guide to the interpretation of the Final Constitution and many pieces of legislation.[3] The influence of international law on our constitutional law ensures that there will be a reciprocal effect of South African constitutional law on international law. (That reciprocal effect is one of the engines that powers the development of international law.)

Kaunda rolls back Mohamed. It sets very strict limits on the extent to which the Final Constitution requires the South African government to intervene in the internal legal affairs of a foreign state and the extent to which foreign tribunals, after being put on notice by the South African government, must take cognizance of South African law. The Kaunda Court concludes that FC s 3 does not create an enforceable right to 'diplomatic protection'. At best, 'South African citizens are entitled to request South African protection under international law against wrongful acts of a foreign state.'[4] The Kaunda Court writes:

> [G]overnment policy concerning nationals in foreign countries, who are required to stand trial there on charges for which capital punishment is competent, is to make representations

[1] FC s 231, International Agreements, reads, in relevant part: (3) An international agreement of a technical, administrative or executive nature, or an agreement which does not require either ratification or accession, entered into by the national executive, binds the Republic without approval by the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces, but must be tabled in the Assembly and the Council within a reasonable time. (4) Any international agreement becomes law in the Republic when it is enacted into law by national legislation; but a self-executing provision of an agreement that has been approved by Parliament is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament. (5) The Republic is bound by international agreements which were binding on the Republic when this Constitution took effect.

[2] FC s 232, Customary International Law, reads as follows: Customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

[3] See FC s 233, Application of International Law, and FC s 39(1)(b), Interpretation. FC s 233 reads as follows: When interpreting any legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law. FC s 39 (1)(b), reads, in relevant part: When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum . . . must consider international law. For more on the effect of international law on South African constitution analysis, Kevin Hopkins & Hennie Strydom 'International Law and Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2004) Chapter 30.

[4] Kaunda (supra) at para 60.

> concerning the imposition of such punishment only if and when such punishment is imposed on a South African citizen. This policy adopted by South Africa in its relations with foreign states is not inconsistent with international law or any obligation that the government has under the Constitution.[1]

In addition to loosening considerably, and somewhat disconcertingly, the South African state's specific obligation to intervene with respect to the death penalty, Kaunda curbs significantly the doctrine of extraterritorial application articulated in Mohamed.

The Kaunda Court distinguishes Kaunda from Mohamed on the facts. According to the Kaunda Court, the South African Bill of Rights has bite in Mohamed because the accused had been subject to the exercise of South African state power while in South Africa. The Mohamed Court's requirement that the South African government pass along its judgment to the apposite US federal district trial court is, ostensibly, grounded in the South African state's failure to adhere to the South African Bill of Rights. There is, here, an obvious sleight of hand. The Mohamed Court's intervention in the affairs of a foreign tribunal in a foreign state is required because a foreign national who has passed rather quickly through the legal apparatus of South Africa is now potentially subject to a legal penalty that could never have been imposed within South Africa. The Constitutional Court found itself obliged to put the US trial court on notice that the death penalty ought not to be imposed because it would violate the South African Constitution. The 'absence' of the exercise of South African state power in Kaunda ostensibly takes the matter out of the Mohamed-recognized orbit of the Bill of Rights. Of course, the South African government in Kaunda did exercise power comparable to that exercised in Mohamed. In Kaunda, the South African government informed the government of Zimbabwe of the presence of the alleged mercenaries. This information led, ineluctably, to the arrest of the alleged mercenaries. At a minimum, the South African government ought to have been under a comparable constitutional obligation to make efforts to ensure that the death penalty was not imposed. Recall that in Mohamed, South African agents assisted US agents in secreting the accused back to the US for trial. The South African government then found itself under a constitutional obligation to make efforts to ensure that the death penalty was not imposed.[2]

One cannot help but wonder whether the identity of the foreign states involved in the respective cases influenced the Constitutional Court's disparate decisions. After acknowledging substantial deficits in the administration of justice in both Equatorial Guinea and Zimbabwe, the Kaunda Court writes:

> The situation which exists in the present case is one which calls for delicate negotiations to ensure that if reasonably possible the fears that the applicants entertain can be put to rest, and that the trial, if one takes place, is conducted in a way that meets internationally accepted standards. The assessment of the risk, the best way of avoiding it and the timing

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 144.

[2] Even if the Kaunda Court had articulated a principled distinction between the treatment of nationals, who, of their own accord, subject themselves to the full force of a foreign legal system, and the treatment of nationals, who, through the interposition 'or action' of the South African state, find themselves subject to the full force of a foreign legal system, such a distinction would not, in the hands of this court, have led to a different result.

> of action are essentially matters within the domain of government . . . . The situation that presently exists calls for skilled diplomacy the outcome of which could be harmed by any order that this Court might make. In such circumstances the government is better placed than a court to determine the most expedient course to follow. If the situation on the ground changes, the government may have to adapt its approach to address the developments that take place. In the circumstances it must be left to government, aware of its responsibilities, to decide what can best be done.[1]

No such reservations about the wisdom of court-sanctioned state intervention in the legal processes of the United States are voiced in Mohamed.

The second problem with Kaunda is that state intervention with respect to the imposition of the death penalty — even with respect to nationals — has become a matter of policy not constitutional law. The South African government's concerns regarding any imposition of the death penalty need only be articulated after a death sentence has been imposed. Both aspects of the holding in Kaunda appear to roll back the protections afforded to the non-national accused in Mohamed.

Once again, Justice O'Regan's dissent invites some future majority of the Court to reconsider its highly permissive reading of the constitutional obligations of the South African government with regard to the treatment of South African nationals subject to foreign law in foreign tribunals. According to Justice O'Regan, FC s 3(2) creates an entitlement to diplomatic protection. That entitlement creates a state obligation. Justice O'Regan writes:

> [G]overnment [is] not . . . constitutionally permitted simply to ignore a citizen who is threatened with or has experienced an egregious violation of human rights norms at the hands of another state. Were government to be entitled to do so, the achievement of human rights would be obstructed and international human rights norms undermined. Accordingly, and in the light of my understanding of the values of our Constitution, I would conclude that it is proper to understand section 3 as imposing upon government an obligation to provide diplomatic protection to its citizens to prevent or repair egregious breaches of international human rights norms. Where a citizen faces or has experienced a breach of international human rights norms that falls short of the standard of egregiousness, the situation may well be different. Thus, I conclude that to the extent that section 3(2) states then that 'citizens are equally entitled to the . . . privileges and benefits' of citizenship, it is not only an entitlement to equal treatment in respect of the privilege and benefit of diplomatic protection, but also an entitlement to diplomatic protection itself.[2]

31.7 The Waiver of Rights

(a) A Category Mistake

Whether the beneficiaries of constitutional rights can waive their rights is an underdeveloped and confusing area of constitutional law. It is underdeveloped and confusing because (a) no constitutional provision is made for waiver and (b) few meaningful discussions of the notion of 'waiver' have percolated up through the courts.

For reasons that will become clear, the 'waiver' of constitutional rights should never be tolerated. But to say waiver should never be tolerated is to speak the language of waiver. It is the thesis of this section that there is no such thing as waiver. The basis for this thesis is not at all obvious. It is not obvious because many courts and commentators have failed to see that what is at issue in all of these cases is not actually the waiver of a right, but the interpretation of a right. To talk of waiver is to make a category mistake.[1]

[1] Kaunda (supra) at paras 132–133.
[2] Ibid at para 238.

What is a category mistake? A category mistake is the attribution to one, sometimes non-existent, entity attributes that properly belong to another entity, and the unnecessary multiplication of explanations for a single phenomenon. For example, you may take a visitor for a tour around the firm at which you work — introduce her to the managing partner and your articles clerk, show her the boardroom and the library, have her sit in your chair in your office. If, at the end of your tour, she asked you 'But where is the firm?', as if it were something different, something over and above what she had already seen, you would be perplexed. The cause of her confusion — and yours — is that she has made a category mistake. This is the kind of error made by those who speak of waiver as if it were an entity — a phenomenon — over and above the content of the specific substantive rights found in Chapter 2. It isn't.

The clearest Constitutional Court statement on the subject of waiver occurs in Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa).[2] In Mohamed, the South African government handed Mr Mohamed over to US authorities for prosecution on capital charges related to the bombing of the United States embassy in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania in August 1998. In defense of its handing over a person within South Africa and within South African government control to the representatives of a state in which Mr Mohamed could receive the death penalty if convicted, the South African government claimed that Mr Mohamed had waived those constitutional rights that would have (a) barred his extradition or (b) made such extradition subject to assurance by the United States that it would not seek the death penalty if Mr Mohamed were convicted. The Mohamed Court rejected both of the government's contentions. First, the Court wrote:

> It is open to doubt whether a person in Mohamed's position can validly consent to being removed to a country in order to face a criminal charge where his life is in jeopardy. The authorities ought not to be encouraged to obtain consents of such a nature.[3]

Second, assuming for the sake of argument, and no more, that the government could secure legitimately such a waiver of rights, the Mohamed Court held that:

> To be enforceable, however, it would have to be a fully informed consent and one clearly showing that the applicant was aware of the exact nature and extent of the rights being waived in consequence of such consent.[4]

Third, the Mohamed Court declared that '[t]he onus to prove such waiver is on the government.'[5] As a matter of fact, the Mohamed Court found that under no

[1] See Gilbert Ryle The Concept of Mind (1951).
[2] 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC)('Mohamed') at para 61.
[3] Ibid at para 61.
[4] Ibid at para 62.
[5] Ibid at para 64.

plausible construction of the case history could the government demonstrate that it had discharged its obligations. The Mohamed Court is a bit fuzzy, however, as to whether, as a matter of law, the government could have discharged its obligations. Earlier in the judgment, the Mohamed Court makes much of the government's failure to even attempt to seek assurance that the death penalty would not be imposed: assurance that seemed to be required because of South Africa's commitment to the rights to dignity, to life and to not be punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. The Mohamed Court seems to suggest that absent such assurance, no extradition could be justified. But the entire discussion of waiver undercuts this conclusion. The extradition to the United States ultimately turns on whether Mr Mohamed 'was aware of his crucial right to demand [that the South African government secure such assurances as necessary to] protect against exposure to the death penalty.'[1] One must assume, from the manner in which the Court writes, that had Mr Mohamed possessed legal counsel, had he been in a position to offer or to withhold meaningful consent and had he still reached the conclusion that he wished to go to the United States to stand trial without any assurance regarding a death sentence, the Court would have allowed him to go.[2] If this invitation to a beheading is what the Mohamed Court actually had in mind, then there seems to me to be good reason to decline to follow its reasoning about waiver.

The Supreme Court of Appeal has taken a firmer line on waiver. In Transnet Ltd v Goodman Brothers (Pty) Ltd, the respondent (Goodman Brothers) had unsuccessfully tendered to supply wristwatches to the appellant (Transnet).[3] The respondent, relying on FC s 33 read with FC Item 23(2)(c) of Schedule 6, contended that the part of the tender conditions that provided that Transnet would not 'assign any reason for the rejection of a tender/quotation' was unconstitutional and that Transnet was obliged to furnish reasons for rejection of the respondents tender.[4] The applicant argued that since the Bill of Rights contains no general rule barring the waiver of rights, contracting parties could, with respect to at least some rights, stipulate to their waiver. The Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the applicant's argument. It reasoned as follows:

> The correct approach to the question of waiver of fundamental rights is to adhere strictly to the provisions of s 36(1) of the Constitution. It provides that 'the rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application . . .' A waiver of a right is a limitation thereof. One must be careful not to allow all forms of waiver, estoppel, acquies

[1] Mohamed (supra) at para 65.

[2] The Mohamed Court writes:

> Here South African government agents acted inconsistently with the Constitution in handing over Mohamed without an assurance that he would not be executed and in relying on consent obtained from a person who was not fully aware of his rights and was moreover deprived of the benefit of legal advice.

Ibid at 68. The Mohamed Court's vacillation on whether consent to extradition would suffice seems difficult to square with such pronouncements as 'the rights to life and dignity are the most important of all human rights, and the source of all other personal rights.' S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC) at para 144.

[3] 2001 (1) SA 853 (SCA), 2001 (2) BCLR 176 (SCA)('Transnet').

[4] The contract read in relevant part: '10*(a)* The Company does not bind itself to accept the lowest or any tender/quotation nor will it assign any reason for the rejection of a tender/quotation.'

> cence, etc to undermine the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights. In my view, a strict interpretation of s 36(1) is indicated. Transnet has not made out a case that the waiver it relies upon is warranted by law of general application.[1]

The reasons for the Transnet Court's conclusions are sound: with two very important exceptions. First, it is not clear why the correct approach to waiver is to adhere to the provisions of FC s 36(1). There is nothing about FC s 36 that has any obvious bearing on questions of waiver. One way to understand the Transnet Court's remark about limitations is to read it as part of a characterization of waiver as 'conduct' that does not qualify as law of general application. Second, the Transnet Court's approach to waiver begs the primary question: does the waiver amount to or lead to the violation of a right? The Transnet Court assumes — which it is not entitled to do — that all assertions of waiver are always parasitic on the violation of a right. (As we shall see, in many instances of alleged waiver, there is no right upon which one party may simultaneously rely and waive.) Only if one defines a right in a fashion that excludes the possibility of waiver does limitations analysis under FC s 36 ever begin to matter. (Again, in many instances of alleged waiver, there is, in fact, no right upon which a party may rely, and thus, there is no issue of waiver.) And it goes without saying, if there is no infringement of a right, there can be no question about limitations — for there are none.

The Transnet Court was certainly correct on the facts of this case. The respondent was entitled to be furnished with reasons for the rejection of its tender. Given that the case law holds that a tenderor's rights are always adversely affected by the rejection of a tender, and a tenderor is entitled to the provision of reasons for a rejection, the failure to supply those reasons is a violation of the right to just administrative action.

When it looks beyond the facts, the Transnet Court seems inclined to establish the following rule: waiver ought not to be allowed to undermine the rights enshrined in Chapter 2. It would have been more interesting if the Transnet Court had taken a stronger line: no waiver can take place in the context of an infringement of a fundamental right. As it stands, the Transnet Court and the Mohamed Court seem uncomfortable with waiver, but not adamantly opposed to it. Neither court is able to articulate, in any principled way, when we should permit waiver and when we should bar it.

Here then is the strong coherent line that courts should adopt. No fundamental right can ever be waived. Consent to a given state of affairs — contractual waiver — can only occur where no right can be violated. The basis for this conclusion is not as casuistic as it may appear. Some rights in Chapter 2 will rarely, if ever, permit an interpretation of their scope that will create the space for legal and social relations that, at least notionally, enable rights' bearers to forego them. Some rights do permit interpretations of their scope that enable both rights bearers and other parties to engage in a wide array of activities and to form legal relationships that appear, at least notionally, to engage the subject matter of those rights, but do not result in their abrogation. Put pithily, what is at issue in all these cases is not the waiver of a right, but the interpretation of a right.

[1] Transnet (supra) at paras 47–48.

Academic commentary on this subject has only aided and abetted our courts' confusion. Some of this analysis is worth further consideration if only to set out in somewhat starker relief the choices before us.

The least attractive position — and one given the Constitutional Court's imprimator of approval in Mohamed — is that there exists a hierarchy of rights: at the top, those rights that are so important as to never permit waiver; at the bottom, those rights that are of such little consequence that waiver is effectively built into their exercise. With such a hierarchy clearly in mind, Halton Cheadle simply asserts that the 'rights to life, dignity and non-discrimination cannot be waived.'[1]

Johan De Waal, Iain Currie and Gerhard Erasmus bear some responsibility for Halton Cheadle's assertion. They contend that the nature of the 'rights to human dignity . . . , to life . . . . the right not to be discriminated against or the right to a fair trial does not permit them to be waived.'[2] Other rights — say, the freedoms of expression, religion, assembly, property, occupation, association — may be waived. Part of this distinction appears to rest on a rather obtuse if not orotund distinction that De Waal, Currie and Erasmus draw between rights that have a positive and a negative dimension and rights that do not have both dimensions. The authors do not tell us what such dimensions mean, save to say, rather enigmatically, that the right to 'dignity cannot be exercised by being abused,'[3] but that freedom of expression can be exercised by being silent.[4]

More disconcerting are the following paired set of claims. The first claim reads: 'a waiver cannot make otherwise unconstitutional laws or conduct constitutional and valid;'[5] and '[t]he actions of a beneficiary can have no influence on the invalidity of unconstitutional law or conduct. That is why a person cannot undertake to behave unconstitutionally.'[6] The second claim reads: '[w]hat individuals may do is waive the right to exercise a fundamental right. The individual may undertake not to invoke the constitutional invalidity of state or private conduct.'[7] The first leg of the first claim seems unobjectionable. The second leg of the first claim raises a flag. As an empirical matter, the actions of a beneficiary of a right will have an influence on a finding of validity or invalidity of law or conduct because it is only as a result of the beneficiary's attempt to exercise and enforce her rights that we will come to know whether law or conduct of a particular kind is or is not unconstitutional.

It is true, as the Handbook authors suggest, that a person cannot agree to behave unconstitutionally. But not for the reasons that De Waal, Currie and Erasmus think. A successful annulment of a contract on constitutional grounds stands for the

[1] Halton Cheadle 'Application' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 19 citing with approval Johan De Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition 2001).
[2] De Waal, Currie & Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (supra) at 43–44.
[3] Ibid at 44.
[4] Ibid at 43.
[5] Ibid at 42.
[6] Ibid at 43.
[7] Ibid.

proposition that there never really was a valid contract in the first place and that the applicant's constitutional right was not waived. When a party goes to court to have an agreement annulled on constitutional grounds and loses, she was, the court tells us, never in a position to assert legitimately that the right in question trumped the agreement in question. The prescriptive content of the substantive provision of the Bill of Rights is deemed not to cover the conduct at issue. In this second case, the party never possessed a constitutional right that she could waive.

We can see now that De Waal, Currie and Erasmus have things the wrong way around. Individuals may not, as a logical matter, choose to allow other individuals or the state to treat them — via law or conduct — in unconstitutional ways. There is nothing for them to choose in this regard. What De Waal, Currie and Erasmus should have said is that when we interpret the freedom to trade, occupation and profession or the freedom of expression or the freedom of religion to permit two parties to contract, we really mean that these various rights, correctly interpreted, do not proscribe the kinds of activities or relationships or contracts engaged in or entered into by the respective parties.[1] Now that is a method of proceeding profoundly different from the creation of (a) hierarchies of rights, or (b) categories of negative and positive dimensions of rights, or (c) distinctions between freedoms and rights. Whether we are talking about life, dignity, torture, slavery, religion, expression or property, the question is always the same: does the right permit the kind of activity, relationship or status contemplated — at some point in time — by the parties before the court. If it does not, then, as we noted above, the right bars the law or conduct contemplated and no such thing as waiver can occur. If the right in question permits the kind of activity or agreement in question, then the parties may do as they wish and the question of waiver never arises.

Kevin Hopkins' recent work on the problem of waiver reflects how deeply entrenched the language of waiver is, and how difficult the language is to shrug off.[2] Hopkins begins his discussion in the thrall of Currie's arguments. He quotes Currie's explanation of the 'waiver' permitted by the Court in Garden Cities Incorporated Association Not for Gain v Northpine Islamic Society[3] as follows:

> [The waiver is permissible] because freedom rights can be positively or negatively exercised. Just as one can exercise the right to freedom of expression by choosing to remain silent, one is free to practise one's religion and equally free to choose not to. A waiver therefore amounts, as it were, to an undertaking to exercise the right negatively. The undertaking in clause 20 (b) [of the contract of sale] not to make calls to prayer would be similar to a contractual undertaking not to disclose certain information, or not to work in one's chosen

[1] In talking about the concept of unconstitutional conditions — in which the government may withhold benefits or privileges subject to conditions designed to encourage a given set of policy aims and which bear a family resemblance to notions about waiver — Lawrence Tribe writes:

> Independently unconstitutional conditions — those that make the enjoyment of a benefit contingent on sacrifice of an independent constitutional right — are invalid; whether a condition is unconstitutional depends on whether government may properly demand sacrifice of the alleged right in a given context.

American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition 1988) 781.

[2] 'Constitutional Rights and the Question of Waiver: How Fundamental are Fundamental Rights' (2001) 16 SA Public Law 122 (Hopkins 'Waiver').

[3] 1999 (2) SA 268 (C).

> profession, or to perform nude on stage, or to attend religious instruction in a private school. These are respectively waivers of the rights to freedom of expression, to occupational freedom, to privacy and to freedom of religion. There should, in principle, be no objection to enforcing contractual undertakings such as these since they are not violations of a constitutional right.[1]

Note the last sentence. 'There should, in principle, be no objection to enforcing contractual undertakings such as these since they are not violations of a constitutional right.'[2] Currie and Hopkins each run right past the easiest possible answer to this entire problem: there is no issue or problem of waiver, because there is no violation of a constitutional right about which we need be worried.[3]

[1] Iain Currie 'Bill of Rights Jurisprudence' (1999) Annual Survey of South African Law 54–55.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See Garden Cities Incorporated Association Not for Gain v Northpine Islamic Society 1999 (2) SA 268 (C). The contract between the two parties for the sale of land had been concluded in 1979, well before either the Interim or Final Constitution came into effect. The respondent had been formed with the objective of erecting and maintaining a mosque and madressah in the area being developed. The agreement for sale of land between the applicant and the respondent contained provisions that the respondents would not conduct any activities that would be the source of nuisance or disturbance to other owners in the township, particularly prohibiting the use of sound amplification equipment. Instead, the agreement stated that the call to prayer would be made by the use of a light on the top of the minaret that would be switched on at the appropriate time. In spite of these provisions, the respondent installed sound amplification equipment and added a loud speaker to the mosque that it had built on the property purchased. In response to complaints from the residents of the surrounding properties, the applicant had applied for an interdict barring the respondent from using any sound amplification equipment and obliging it to remove such equipment. The Court held that the agreement — with its various restrictions — did not violate FC s 15. It did not discuss the concept of waiver. (Instead, it made a rather spurious distinction between calls to prayer and amplified calls to prayer — the former it identified as an integral part of the religion, the latter it found not to be an integral part of the religion.) The correct basis for the decision — the conclusion itself is correct — is that the right to freedom of religion does not entitle a party to engage in practices that disturb the general peace of the community. (Indeed, the parties' agreement to such restrictions reflects the recognition by both parties that such practices as amplification of calls to prayer, in fact, constitute a breach of the peace.) For a general account of the grounds for judicial intervention in religious affairs, and a relatively strict test for such intervention, see Paul Farlam 'Freedom of Religion, Thought, Belief and Conscience' S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41. But see Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44 (Defending a test for religious association that takes such ways of being seriously but does not simply concede the arguments made by religious groups with regard to the centrality of particular beliefs.)

Similarly, Iain Currie, Johan De Waal & Gerhard Erasmus wrongly describe Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria & Others as an instance of constitutional waiver of the right to religious freedom. 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T). In Wittmann, a learner was expelled from an independent school for refusing to attend compulsory religious instruction classes. Van Dijkhorst J correctly notes that the case turns on questions of associational freedom, not religious freedom:

> In respect of these educational institutions, the fundamental freedom of religion of 'outsiders' is limited to the freedom of non- joinder. Outsiders cannot join on their own terms and once they have joined cannot impose their own terms.

Ibid at 455A–B. See, further, Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44. In sum, the right of a student to religious freedom is not impaired by her agreement to attend compulsory religion classes at a private religious educational institution in which she has chosen to enrol. It would be comparable to saying that when I attend Sunday Mass at my local parish church that I am waiving my right to read the Torah amongst my fellow Catholic congregants. I never had a right to read the Torah there. No reasonable understanding of religious freedom could embrace any other thesis.

Having failed to take heed of Currie's own words, Hopkins continues to use the categories of inalienable and alienable rights with which he has been saddled. Only at the conclusion of his article does Hopkins begin to realize that the distinctions he is both relying upon and making up are rendered meaningless by a few basic propositions to which he rightly adheres:

> To summarize the position on the waiver of a constitutional right (other than an inalienable right) is in effect to re-iterate my argument that contracts are enforceable unless contrary to public policy. This is the position in the common law as it currently stands. But, as I have also argued, public policy must now be informed by the values that underlie the Constitution generally, and in particular it must be informed by the provisions contained in the Bill of Rights. This means that contracts whose enforcement would entail the violation of a right in the Bill of Rights are unenforceable because they are contrary to public policy. Enforcement of such a contract (waiver) would mean, in effect, the limitation of a contractant's constitutional right — this can only be done if the requirements (for the valid limitation of a constitutional right) in the limitations analysis are met. Two of these requirements are 'reasonableness' and 'proportionality'. And so in addition to there being 'good reason' for the limitation, there must also be proportionality.
>
> My argument that all contracts which purport to waive a fundamental right are unenforceable because they are contrary to public policy seems at first blush to render redundant the need to distinguish between rights that are alienable and rights that are inalienable. This is because, one might argue, the respective contracts purporting to waive either type of right (alienable or inalienable) are both effectively unenforecable. Although I concede that this is so, the distinction becomes relevant not at the interpretation stage of the enquiry but rather at the limitation stage. This, I argue, is because only alienable rights are capable of being justifiably limited; inalienable rights on the other hand are, by their definition, incapable of limitation — therein lies the need for treating the rights differently and by implication drawing the distinction.[1]

Let us make clear the two points with which Hopkins does battle. First, 'all contracts which purport to waive a fundamental right are unenforceable because they are contrary to public policy seems at first blush to render redundant the need to distinguish between rights that are alienable and rights that are inalienable.'[2] Correct. Once a right is interpreted to proscribe either law or conduct, no amount of fair bargaining can save the contract or agreement in question. Second, the issue is ultimately whether 'the respective contracts purporting to waive either type of right (alienable or inalienable) are both effectively unenforceable.'[3] Correct. But Hopkins will simply not let go of an unworkable distinction. So he puts it to new, and equally useless, service. He tells us the distinction continues to do work 'because alienable rights are capable of being justifiably limited; inalienable rights on the other hand are, by their definition, incapable of limitation.' Two further points put this distinction out of our misery. One. If we have just found that a right renders a contract or an agreement unenforceable, then there is no saving it under the limitation clause. The Transnet Court was certainly correct in holding that a contract or an agreement is not a law of general application. FC s 36 cannot, therefore, be used to justify them. Two. No rights are inherently or textually beyond the limitations exercise. We have no limitation-proof rights.

[1] Hopkins 'Waiver' (supra) at 137–138 (Emphasis added).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.

(b) Waiver and the Law of Contract as Neutral Backdrop

What is the explanation for this pervasive category mistake? Elsewhere in this chapter we have noted how the traditional conception of the common law as a neutral backdrop for a variety of social contracts between 'autonomous' individuals shaped the Du Plessis Court's views on IC s 7 and informed the drafters' views of the distinction between law and conduct in FC s 8. The 'common law as neutral backdrop' does similar work here.

The traditional view of the common law is wedded to the idea of the sanctity of contract. Even in those areas of social life where the language of contract is far less appropriate — say where law enforcement officials are holding an alleged terrorist incommunicado, and thus out of the reach of any potential legal assistance — we cling to the notion that, just perhaps, Mr Mohamed consented to his extradition to stand trial on capital charges. The predisposition to describe even non-contractual relationships in terms of contract coupled with the inclination to make common-law rules the departure point for constitutional analysis explains why many academics and jurists accord the 'contract' between parties primacy of place and describe constitutional rights in contractual terms. But in a country where 'all law derives its force from the constitution', and all law is measured for its consistency with the basic law, to describe constitutional rights in contractual terms gets things back to front. One can contract only to do those things that are constitutionally permitted. And since one cannot do what the Final Constitution does not permit, there is nothing to waive.

(c) The Poverty of Waiver

The doctrine of waiver is worth worrying about because contracts of adhesion are still relatively pervasive. In Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom, an agreement was concluded between the appellant, the owner of a private hospital, and the respondent, a party seeking medical treatment.[1] After an operation at the hospital, negligent conduct by a nurse led to complications that caused further injury to the respondent. The respondent argued that the negligent conduct of the nurse constituted a breach of contract by the appellant and instituted an action holding the appellant responsible for the damages suffered. The hospital's admissions document contained an exemption clause in which the respondent:

> [a]bsolved the hospital and/or its employees and/or agents from all liability and indemnified them from any claim instituted by any person (including a dependant of the patient) for damages or loss of whatever nature (including consequential damages or special damages of any nature) flowing directly or indirectly from any injury (including fatal injury) suffered by > or damage caused to the patient or any illness (including terminal illness) contracted by the patient whatever the cause/causes are, except only with the exclusion of intentional omission by the hospital, its employees or agents.[1]

[1] 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox').

The appellant relied on the above clause to avoid liability. The respondent advanced several reasons — including a constitutional claim based upon FC s 27(1)(a) — as to why the provisions of the exclusion clause could not operate against him. The Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the respondent's claims on the grounds that such contractual terms are the norm and that the courts are duty bound to enforce the contractual terms unless the Final Constitution or the boni mores of the community clearly dictate otherwise. The reasoning of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox is tantamount to a construction of the hospital admissions form that holds that the respondent 'waived' whatever constitutional (or other) rights he possessed when he signed the form. If we are concerned about contracts entered into (a) by parties who do not possess the requisite capacity to understand fully the document they sign or (b) by parties in radically unequal bargaining positions, then we should be concerned about a constitutional doctrine that supports the enforcement of such contracts on the grounds that lack of knowledge or compulsion is equivalent to 'waiver'.[2] Afrox rests on the fiction identified above — namely that the common law constitutes a neutral contractual backdrop for relations between fully autonomous individuals. Waiver now looks less like an innocent category mistake and more like a potentially pernicious pre-constitutional relic.

(d) The relationship between waiver and the benefits of fundamental rights

The behaviour of beneficiaries influences whether the conduct of private parties will be found to be unconstitutional. Only the beneficiaries of rights are going to ensure that their rights — even those ostensibly compromised by a contract to which they are a party — are protected. And they will have to go to court to do so. How a court views the behaviour of the party who asserts the benefit of a right and the party who allegedly bears the burden determines whether or not the conduct at issue passes constitutional muster.

What makes the doctrine of waiver more pernicious than it might otherwise be is that we are unlikely to see too many cases in which parties contest contracts of adhesion. This is so because the persons who need to contest their alleged waiver of constitutional rights are the least likely to be in a position to bargain effectively to protect their constitutional rights and are, similarly, unlikely to be in a position to litigate subsequent claims. The poverty and powerlessness of many South Africans shapes the content of our constitutional rights through the structured silence of disputes that never make it to court. The doctrine of waiver, however, assumes — wrongly — what my understanding of this structured silence denies: that all contracting parties are in a position to make an informed and freely willed choice about their bargaining position as well as their legal remedies.

[1] Afrox (supra) at para 3.

[2] For critical perspectives on Afrox, see Danie Brand 'Disclaimers in Hospital Admission Contracts and Constitutional Health Rights' (2002) 3:2 ESR Review 17–18; Pieter Carstens & Anton Kok 'An Assessment of the Use of Disclaimers Against Medical Negligence by South African Hospitals in View of Constitutional Demands, Foreign Law, Medical Ethics and Medical Law' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 430; Dire Tladi 'One Step Forward, Two Steps Back for Constitutionalising the Common Law: Afrox Health Care v Strydom' (2002) 17 SA Public Law 473; Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38.

31.8 Temporal Application of the Bill of Rights

As the term 'temporal' indicates, we are concerned here with issues of application as they relate to time. Such issues fall into two broad categories: (1) retrospective application; (2) application of the Interim and the Final Constitution to matters pending upon commencement of the Final Constitution. As time goes on, issues of temporal application will recede in importance.[1]

(a) Retrospectivity

Neither the Interim Constitution nor the Final Constitution applies retrospectively.[2] In other words, neither constitution applies to conduct that took place before they came into operation. Before we interrogate this claim, and limn the precedents for the exceptions to the rule, let me first set out the general framework for retrospectivity analysis.

In Du Plessis v De Klerk, the defendants based part of their defense to a claim of defamation on IC s 15 — the freedom of expression. It was common cause that the conduct at issue occurred in March 1993, well before the commencement of the Interim Constitution on 27 April 1994. After placing a gloss on some early precedents that would have otherwise undermined the Du Plessis Court's conclusions, Justice Kentridge wrote:

> The difficulty facing the defendants in this Court was their inability to point to anything in the Constitution which suggests that conduct unlawful before the Constitution came into force is now to be deemed to be lawful by reason of chapter 3. Indeed, all indications in the text are to the contrary. First, there is IC s 251(1) itself, which fixes the date of commencement. Then there is s 7(2), which provides that chapter 3 should apply 'to all law in force and all administrative decisions taken and acts performed during the period of operation of this Constitution.' .... Again, IC s 98(6) provides: 'Unless the Constitutional Court in the interests of justice and good government orders otherwise, and save to the extent that it so orders, the declaration of invalidity of a law or a provision thereof — (a) existing at the commencement of this Constitution, shall not invalidate anything done or permitted in terms thereof before the coming into effect of such declaration of invalidity; or (b) passed after such commencement, shall invalidate everything done or permitted in terms thereof.' That subsection enables this Court, where the interests of justice and good government require it, to antedate the operation of a declaration of invalidity. Although there is no > express limit on the power to antedate a declaration of invalidity, it could hardly be suggested that any such declaration could refer to a date earlier than the date of the commencement of the Constitution.[1]

[1] For an excellent account of temporal application, see Johan De Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition 2001) 57–62.

[2] Northern Province Development Corporation v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control 2003 (2) SA 284 (T) citing S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) and Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC).

After rejecting both claim (a), that the damages in delict were analogous to sentences of capital punishment, and claim (b), that it would be arbitrary and absurd — and therefore unjust — to allow 'one category of persons … to enjoy the human rights guarantees of the Constitution' and to deny such entitlements to a similarly situated group simply because the dates of the conduct differed, Justice Kentridge concluded that 'the Constitution does not turn conduct which was unlawful before it came into force into lawful conduct.'[2] Justice Kentridge then formulated the following exception to the rule:

> The consequences of that general principle are, however, not necessarily invariable .... [W]e leave open the possibility that there may be cases where the enforcement of previously acquired rights would, in the light of our present constitutional values, be so grossly unjust and abhorrent that it could not be countenanced, whether as being contrary to public policy or on some other basis. It is not necessary to spell out examples. It is sufficient to say that cases such as the one before us obviously do not fall into that category.[3]

The truly interesting developments with respect to retrospectivity have not involved a direct constitutional challenge to a rule of law in order to make unlawful conduct lawful or offensive laws unconstitutional. They have, rather, involved the use of the concept of indirect application of the Bill of Rights to develop the

[1] Du Plessis (supra) at para 15 (Kentridge J's emphasis) citing S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC).

[2] Du Plessis (supra) at para 20.

[3] Ibid at 20. See also Tsotetsi v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd 1997 (1) SA 585 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1439 (CC). The Tsotetsi Court confirmed the existence of the exception created in Du Plessis but rejected its application to the instant case. Justice O'Regan wrote:

> It is unnecessary in this case to decide the question to which I have referred in para [7] which was expressly left open in Du Plessis v De Klerk. Even if it is accepted that there may be exceptional cases where the general rule of non-retroactivity may not apply, it cannot be said that this is such a case. Such a case could only arise, first, if it was clear that the challenged provision or conduct was a gross violation of the provisions of the Bill of Rights, and, secondly, if there were special and peculiar reasons which would suggest that an order with retroactive effect should be made in a particular case. No such circumstances exist in this case. Even if the applicant were to persuade this Court that the impugned provisions of the Schedule do constitute a breach of the equality clause, it cannot be said that those provisions constitute such a gross breach of that clause that a special exception to the general rule concerning the retrospective application of the Constitution should be made.

Tsotetsi (supra) at para 9. With respect to retrospectivity and the Final Constitution, see S v Pennington & Another 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 329 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC). The Pennington Court wrote:

> There is nothing in the 1996 Constitution which suggests that the decision as to retroactivity in Du Plessis v De Klerk is no longer applicable, or that it was intended that the 1996 Constitution should have retroactive application. It should perhaps be added that even if the phrase 'unless the interests of justice require otherwise' was wide enough not only to make the provisions of the 1996 Constitution applicable to pending proceedings in appropriate cases, but also to make them applicable retroactively, it could hardly be said to be in the 'interests of justice' to allow completed trials to be re-opened and to be dealt with in accordance with laws of procedure and evidence which were not in force at the time of the trial.

Ibid at para 36.

common law in such a manner as to make unlawful conduct lawful or offensive laws unconstitutional. In cases such as Gardener v Whitaker,[1] Key v Attorney General[2] and Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments,[3] the Constitutional Court has acted as if it possesses the discretion to develop the common law — in line with either IC s 35(3) or FC s 39(2) — and thus change what may have been unlawful conduct before the commencement of either constitution into lawful conduct thereafter.[4]

De Waal, Currie and Erasmus lament the lack of forthrightness by the Constitutional Court about the consanguinity of indirect application and retrospectivity. They hold both that FC s '39(2) demands … development' of the common law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the chapter and that 'judge-made law is always retrospective.'[5] With respect, the courts legitimately feel somewhat queasy about this back-door retrospective application of the Final Constitution. There can be no doubt that the courts are changing conduct unlawful at the time it was undertaken into lawful conduct and that the instrument for such change is the Final Constitution. De Waal, Currie and Erasmus are wrong to think that by calling a process of constitutional interpretation 'indirect application' rather than 'direct application' that one thereby disposes of the problem of retrospectivity.

(b) Application of the Bill of Rights to matters pending upon commencement of the Final Constitution

FC Schedule 6, Item 17 reads as follows:

> All proceedings which were pending before a court when the new Constitution took effect, must be disposed as if the new constitution had not been enacted, unless the interests of justice require otherwise.

In S v Pennington & Another, the Constitutional Court held firm the line on

[1] 1996 (4) SA 337 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 775 (CC). In Gardener, Justice Kentridge wrote:

> Both the issue of retrospectivity and the issue of horizontality have, however, now been dealt with by this Court in the case of Du Plessis and Others v De Klerk and Another. It follows from the judgment in that case that, although Froneman J was correct in his interpretation of s 241(8), the right of freedom of speech under s 15 cannot be invoked as providing a defence to an action for damages founded upon a defamation uttered before the Constitution came into force. The judgment and order of Froneman J nonetheless stand. As I have indicated, the Judge in my view reached his decision not on a direct horizontal application of s 15, but by purporting to develop the common law, having regard, inter alia, to the values embodied in s 15 and, I emphasise, by applying it as so developed to the case before him.

Ibid at para 13. (My emphasis).

[2] 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 113 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC) at para 13 (Despite bowing to the rules on retrospectivity set out in Du Plessis, the Key Court held that a criminal trial court would always have to ensure that the accused enjoyed the benefit of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by IC s 25(3) and that the benefits of that right might require that evidence obtained unconstitutionally — and prior to the date of the Interim Constitution's commencement — be excluded.)

[3] 2000 (2) SA 837 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 465 (CC) at para 7 (Court asserts that it possesses the discretion to develop common law retrospectively.)

[4] But see Mthembu v Letsela 2000 (3) SA 867 (SCA)(Supreme Court of Appeals assumes that retrospective application of the Final Constitution means just that. It refuses to find that the case before it fits the Du Plessis exceptions of gross injustice and abhorrence before the law nor does it use indirect application of the Final Constitution to alter a rule of customary law that prevented illegitimate children from securing inheritance.)

[5] De Waal, Currie & Erasmus (supra) at 59.

retrospectivity.[1] It also refused to read the phrase 'unless the interests of justice require otherwise' as a license to re-open completed trials and dispose of them according to the constitutional rules 'of procedure and evidence which were not in force at the time of the [original] trial.'[2]

In Sanderson v Attorney-General (Eastern Cape), the Constitutional Court put a slightly more generous spin on the phrase 'unless the interests of justice require otherwise.'[3] It wrote that the phase 'denotes an equitable evaluation of all the circumstances of a particular case.'[4] In particular, a court would be required to determine 'whether [an] individual's position is substantially better or worse under the Final Constitution than under the Interim Constitution.'[5]

This rule on taking the respective benefits of the Final Constitution and the Interim Constitution into account has both substantive and procedural dimensions. In S v Naidoo, the High Court found that because FC s 35(3) barred the admission of evidence that would have been deemed legally obtained under the Interim Constitution, the accused was entitled to the benefit of FC s 35(3).[6] In Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council, the Constitutional Court held that if the application of the procedures and the provisions of the Final Constitution would not prejudice any party to a case, then the Final Constitution should be used to guide the courts.[7] For example, if a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal would have lacked jurisdiction to hear particular kinds of claims under the Interim Constitution — say challenges to the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament — but would possess such jurisdiction under the Final Constitution, then goods like increased systemic efficiency and diminished litigation costs would favour treating cases in which such issues arose as if the proceedings had commenced after the Final Constitution was enacted.[8]

[1] Pennington (supra) at para 36.
[2] Ibid.
[3] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC).
[4] Ibid at para 17.
[5] Ibid.
[6] 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D).
[7] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) reversing Fedsure Life Asurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1998 (2) SA 1115 (SCA), 1998 (6) BCLR 671 (SCA).
[8] For a similar view, see S v Meaker 1998 (8) BCLR 1038 (W), 1998 (2) SACR 73 (W).

APPENDIX: ACADEMIC CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE APPLICATION DEBATE

Quite a bit jurisprudence has been generated about the meaning of and relationship between FC ss 8(1), 8(2), 8 (3) and 39(2). It is worth taking stock of the broad range of opinion on the subject, not simply as an academic exercise, but because the arguments made elsewhere shed light on a host of concerns not yet engaged by our courts. I did not engage these significant contributions within the body of the chapter so that I might hew to a 'relatively' tight narrative line and focus the reader's attention on the deficiencies in the Constitutional Court's current doctrine and the grounds for the preferred reading.

The writers canvassed in this appendix fall into roughly four camps.

The first find that nothing fundamentally changed from the Interim Constitution to the Final Constitution. According to Michael Osborne and Chris Sprigman, the position articulated by the Constitutional Court in Du Plessis remains the best possible reading of the Final Constitution's comparable provisions on application.

The second surmise that even if the language of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution is palpably different — and points towards very different conceptions of application — the courts should act, consistent with a commitment to avoidance, as if the final text demands indirect application if and when it requires any application of the Bill of Rights at all. Iain Currie, Johan de Waal and Gerhard Erasmus champion this cause.

The third opine that it does not fundamentally matter whether we employ direct application or indirect application: the 'values' enshrined in the Final Constitution demand that we use whatever tools we have at our disposal to bring public and private relationships into line with the basic law. Chris Roederer and Kevin Hopkins offer variations on this theme.

The fourth map out a constellation of positions not dissimilar from those on offer in Khumalo. The virtue of Halton Cheadle and Dennis Davis' account is its candour about the textual hooks for the argument and their unwavering commitment to the proposition that the drafters of the Final Constitution meant the Bill of Rights to apply unequivocally to all forms of law and all manifestations of private power. Johan Van der Walt likewise acknowledges a signal difference between the interim text and the final text. Unlike most other authors, he sets great store in the extension of FC s 8(1). The strength of Van der Walt's normative claims about the ability of FC s 8(1) to reach all law — and ultimately all conduct — makes it unclear as to whether his subsequent view about the sufficiency of a doctrine he describes as 'progressive indirect application' constitutes an empirical claim about what the courts have done and will do, or expresses a preference as to how we, as a community, ought to proceed. Steven Ellmann's preoccupation is with the variety of different ways in which the Final Constitution extends the application of the Bill of Rights — from socio-economic rights, to organs of state, and, ultimately to private disputes. Ellmann takes care to note that while the Final Constitution invites direct application with respect to legal disputes between private parties, it does so with great circumspection.

(1) Sprigman and Osborne[1]

In 1999, Chris Sprigman and Michael Osborne found themselves in the unenviable position of having to argue against the grain of the text of the Final Constitution in order to resurrect Du Plessis. Such a sysiphean task earns the authors more than grudging respect.[2]

The difficulty of their task does not make weak textual arguments any more compelling. Sprigman and Osborne begin by writing that:

> Section 7 of the Interim Constitution provided that '[the Bill of Rights] shall bind all legislative and executive organs of state at all levels of government.' The Du Plessis majority noted that s 7 binds only the legislature and executive, and not the judiciary. Had the drafters of the Interim Constitution intended that the Bill of Rights bind the judiciary, the majority argued, all common law disputes, even those between private parties, would be subject to constitutional scrutiny for the simple reason that a court, if it were bound in all cases by the Bill of Rights, could not issue an order inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights. If that were the intent of the drafters, they would expressly have included the judiciary as an organ of state bound under s 7(1).[3]

This argument is correct, so far as it goes. It fails to note the Du Plessis majority's gloss on IC s 7(2), its take on the relationship between IC ss 7(1) and (2), the distinction made between IC s 4 and IC s 7, arguments based upon IC ss 33(1) and (4) and 35 (3) and various assertions about the implicit limits of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction under the Interim Constitution.

These are minor cavils. Let us suppose that a Dolphin Delivery-like argument based upon the exclusion of the judiciary from IC s 7(1) were sufficient for the Du Plessis court to have reached its ultimate conclusion about the limits of direct application. The authors go on to note that:

> In contrast to s 7, s 8(1) of the 1996 Constitution provides explicitly that the Bill of Rights binds the judiciary, in addition to the legislature, the executive, and all other organs of state. Moreover, s 8(2) of the 1996 Constitution provides that a right in the Bill of Rights: 'binds a natural or juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.'[4] (Quotation marks added.)

[1] Chris Sprigman & Michael Osborne 'Du Plessis is not Dead: South Africa's 1996 Constitution and The Application of the Bill of Rights to Private Disputes' (1999) 15 SAJHR 25.

[2] I must, however, note that Sprigman and Osborne's powerful arguments are undermined by careless errors with respect to the correct characterization of other works of commentary or the Final Constitution itself. These errors, when viewed cumulatively, suggest a practice of disregard for the actual content of other texts. For example, they attribute Johan Van der Walt's work to Andre Van der Walt. They ascribe a remark made by me in the chapter on 'Application' in the first edition of this work to the chapter written by me on Limitation in that same text. In quoting from the German Basic Law ('GBL'), the authors write that the GBL 'shall bind the legislature, the executive and the judiciary as directly enforceable law. In as much as it specifically includes the judiciary, that provision mirrors s 8(2).' FC s 8(2) contains no such language. FC s 8(1) mirrors the language of the GBL.

[3] Sprigman & Osborne (supra) at 30.

[4] Ibid.

Does the authors' studious refusal to mention that 'all law' appears in FC s 8(1) and that the term can no longer be restricted — as under IC s 7(2) — to legislative and executive enactments warrant censure? Maybe not. But it is hard to know how to respond to an argument that relies on the intent of the wording of the interim text at the same time as it refuses to infer that a change in wording in the final text manifests a change in intent. Having agreed, by more than mere implication, with the Du Plessis Court's conclusion that the text of the Interim Constitution immunized private legal disputes governed by common law from direct application of the Bill of Rights, they provide little by way of argument for the proposition that the express binding of 'the judiciary' under the Final Constitution does not, as one might expect, subject those very same private legal disputes governed by common law to direct application of the Bill of Rights. Instead, they claim that while the Final Constitution allows 'horizontal application', it does not require it: They write:

> [W]e believe that the best reading of s 8 is that it simply defers the question of application. Whatever the intentions of the men and women involved in the drafting and the ratification of the 1996 Constitution's application provision actually were, they settled on language that leaves entirely to the courts the determination of when, if ever, horizontal application is appropriate.[1]

There is, as I have already noted, a sense in which the authors' suggestion that questions of application are by their nature always deferred is correct.[2] To say that the Bill of Rights applies as a general matter to a given 'kind' of dispute is not to say that that the interpretation of a particular right (or set of rights) has anything to say about the specific law or conduct being challenged.[3] The good faith reconstruction of Khumalo rests on just such a distinction between the range of application of a specific right and the prescriptive content of that right. The authors mean to say something stronger. They mean to say that however strong the textual and drafting indications to the contrary might be, the courts still have the power to ignore the text's invitation to engage in direct horizontal application per se.

Let us ignore, since the authors do, FC s 8(1)'s injunction that the Bill of Rights 'applies to all law'. Can Sprigman and Osborne make the running when only faced with the single hurdle of the phrase 'binds … the judiciary'? Much of their argument that the binding of the judiciary does not 'inevitably give rise to horizontal application' rests on comparative constitutional jurisprudence. With respect to the German Basic Law ('GBL'), the authors argue that the GBL applies only indirectly to disputes between private parties.[4] How to best describe — or understand — application analysis under the GBL is certainly contested terrain.

[1] Sprigman & Osborne (supra) at 30–31.

[2] See § 31.4*(a)-(c)* supra.

[3] As I have noted above, however, interpretation of the ambit of a right is — at least in so far as FC s 8(1) application analysis is concerned — a wholly separate enquiry. See § 31.4*(a)-(c)* supra. FC s 8(2) creates a threshold interpretation inquiry not required by FC s 8(1).

[4] Sprigman & Osborne (supra) at 32 citing Du Plessis v De Klerk (supra) at paras 98–106 (Ackermann AJ concurring).

Both Johan Van der Walt and Mark Tushnet resist Sprigman and Osborne's characterization in their most recent work.[1] In Van der Walt's estimation, the Federal Constitutional Court has applied the Basic Law directly to the rulings of lower courts with regard to disputes between natural persons and/or juristic persons. The authors' contentions about American jurisprudence often appear oddly anachronistic. It would be churlish to deny the merits of federalism arguments when Shelley was handed down in 1948. However, in the face of a long line of cases that take an expansive view of the extent to which the 'state action' doctrine engages non-federal bodies of law, such federalism arguments lose much of their purchase. Moreover, it is not clear how arguments from federalism inform application analysis in South Africa's decidedly non-federal judicial system. The authors' observation that American legal academics excoriated the Court for its expansive view of state action in Shelley is underwritten solely by two well-regarded pieces by Herbert Wechsler and Louis Henkin. It ignores the subsequent history of the American legal academy and its long-standing and now almost universal agreement that the US Supreme Court's position on 'state action' is incoherent because the Court fails to endorse the view that state power structures all legal relationships and that the state action required for purposes of constitutional review is, in fact, notionally present in all legal disputes. This selective engagement with a complex body of jurisprudence and scholarship lends little support to the dubious proposition that FC s 8(1)'s binding of the judiciary does not extend to all law that emanates from the courts.

The most powerful weapons in Sprigman and Osborne's arsenal are their arguments from democracy. They contend that we should not subject disputes between private parties governed by common law to direct application because it inevitably requires us to do limitations analysis that courts are ill-equipped to undertake. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that this is true, then it must likewise be true of disputes governed by common law between the state and its subjects. Moreover, it is unclear, as always, how direct application of the Bill of Rights to a statute that governs a private dispute is different from direct application of the Bill of Rights to a rule of common law that governs a private dispute. If anything, the author's arguments from democracy should have them prefer the direction application of the Bill of Rights to the common law over direct application of the Bill of Rights to statute.

Sprigman and Osborne aver that courts are often ill-equipped to deal with 'the voluminous, confusing and contradictory factual evidence submitted by the state in support of … [the] justification' of the statutory or common law rule in question.[1] If this proposition is true, then it has significant implications not simply for the judicial process and constitutional review (about which the proposition would appear agnostic at best). It is a scathing indictment of the democratic process of law-making. If the justifications for a statute are contradictory or confusing or both in court, then one must have reason to doubt whether they are any less so in Parliament. If our elected officials en masse are not even able to offer a patina of plausible intent for legislation, then it is difficult to understand what the institutional argument against judicial review of legislation (or common law) is. The baggy pants of democracy are not big enough to hide a problem of that magnitude. It is simply impossible to square the authors' initial negative assessment of the democratic state's ability to construct justificatory arguments for its laws with their subsequent hackneyed appeal to 'the exhaustive investigation, committee deliberation, publicity, debate, negotiation' that ostensibly distinguish parliamentary processes and secure their legitimacy.[2]

[1] Johan Van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights: Towards a Co-operative Relationship between Common Law and Constitutional Jurisprudence' (2001) 17 SAJHR 341; Mark Tushnet 'The Issue of State Action/Horizontal Effect in Comparative Constitutional Law' (2003) 1(1) Journal of International Constitutional Law 79, 84. When writing about the subjection of all state action — including judicial pronouncements — to the German Basic Law, Tushnet articulates a thesis pressed throughout the pages in this chapter: 'It is not clear to me why a theory of state duty [to uphold the Constitution] is less radical than a theory that individuals are directly bound. I believe that . . . the theories are precisely equivalent.' Indeed, South Africa's Final Constitution makes this point about equivalence clear by having the Bill of Rights apply to 'all law', bind 'the judiciary' and apply, if applicable, to natural and juristic persons.

The authors then reverse gears and claim that standard two-stage Bill of Rights analysis is possible for legislation — despite the inadequacies of evidentiary record — but too unduly complicated for a rule of common law. The authors make this assertion despite that fact that the Constitutional Court has engaged in two-stage analysis of both kinds of legal rules under the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution.[3] Their empirically false assertion is not rehabilitated by the equally tendentious thesis that while vertical disputes 'pit individual rights against the state, horizontal disputes pit individual rights against one another.'[4] Both legs of this claim are, at best, misleading. Classically vertical challenges to a statute often occur in the context of disputes between private persons. One natural or juristic person relies on the statute; another natural or juristic persons attacks it. Moreover, while the party challenging the constitutionality of a statute must invoke a provision of the Bill of Rights, it is also quite common — though not necessary — for the party relying on the statute in question to invoke another, competing right as part of its argument in justification. With regard to the second leg, an individual relying upon a rule of common law will not necessarily

[1] Sprigman & Osborne (supra) at 41.

[2] Ibid at 46.

[3] See, eg, NCGLE I (supra) at para 57 (Common-law offence of sodomy found inconsistent with rights to equality, dignity and privacy and 'the criminalisation of sodomy in private between adult consenting males' and the 'limitation in question in our law regarding such criminalisation cannot be justified under [FC] s 36(1).') See also S v Thebus & Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) at para 65 (An arrested person had the right to remain silent and drawing an adverse inference on credibility from silence limited the right. The Court wrote: 'The rule of evidence that the late disclosure of an alibi affects the weight to be placed on the evidence supporting the alibi is one which is well recognised in our common law. As such, it is a law of general application. However, like all law, common law must be consistent with the Constitution. Where it limits any of the rights guaranteed in the Constitution, such limitation must be justifiable under s 36(1). Whether this rule is justifiable in terms of s 36(1) is a question to which I now turn'); Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd T/A Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853, 862 (SCA)('Insofar as . . . restraint [of trade clauses constitute] . . . a limitation of the rights entrenched in [FC] s 22, the common law as developed by the Courts, in my view, with the requirements laid down in [FC] s 36(1). Any party to any agreement where a restraint clause is regarded as material is free to agree to include such a clause in the main agreement and the common law in this regard is therefore of general application.') invoke a constitutional right. The mere fact that a party defending a common law rule believes that she can rely upon a given right does not support the proposition that the party is, in fact, entitled to the protection afforded by the right invoked.

[4] Sprigman & Osborne (supra) at 42.

(2) De Waal and Currie

Johan De Waal and Iain Currie offer one of the most detailed, and complicated, arguments in favour of any given take on application. While De Waal and Currie admit that the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution contemplates direct application, they argue that the direct application of specific provisions of the Bill of Rights should be studiously avoided.

They initiate their discussion of the latter, and more controversial half, of their conclusions as follows:

> Traditionally, a bill of rights regulates the relationship between the individual and the state. However, the 1996 Bill of Rights goes further than is traditional. It recognises that private abuse of human rights may be as pernicious as violations perpetrated by the state. For this reason, the Bill of Rights is not confined to protecting individuals against the state. In certain circumstances, the Bill of Rights protects individuals against abuses of their rights by other individuals.[1]

They then appear to take the textual bull by the horns:

> It may be argued that since s 8(1) provides that the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the judiciary, the subsection precludes 'all law' and 'the judiciary' from upholding private conduct that conflicts with the Bill of Rights. If this is so, private persons will not be able to seek the assistance of the law, or the courts, to enforce their unconstitutional behaviour.[2]

The above two points suggest that if (a) the Bill of Rights applies to abuses of private power and (b) the Bill of Rights prevents reliance on express rules of law or judicial constructions of law inconsistent with its provisions, then (c) the Bill of Rights governs disputes between individuals in the same manner as it governs disputes between the state and an individual. That is not the conclusion De Waal and Currie draw. Instead they write that:

> Such an interpretation confuses the two application issues that we identified at the outset. The reach of the Bill of Rights must be considered before its relationship with the ordinary law is considered. Its reach must be determined with reference to the actors it binds. The result determines the extent to which the Bill of Rights applies directly to the law. By providing that the Bill of Rights 'applies to all law', s 8(1) merely recognizes that when the Bill of Rights does not apply directly to the law, it does apply indirectly to the law.[3]

This paragraph, articulated with De Waal and Currie's customary elan, obscures a rather critical distinction: that of 'reach' and 'application.' The fact that no mention of 'reach' is made in the Final Constitution is not, in and of itself, fatal to the argument. [The good faith reconstruction of Khumalo requires such artifice.] But it does require that the reader search the book in order to determine the extension of 'reach'. Elsewhere, in a section entitled 'Direct Application', the authors write:

[1] Johan de Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition 2001) 45.
[2] Ibid at 46.
[3] Ibid.

> Direct Application. The reach of the Bill of Rights (beneficiaries, duties and time) demarcates the types of legal disputes to which the Bill of Rights applies as directly applicable law. Within this demarcated area, the Bill of Rights overrides ordinary law and any conduct inconsistent with the Bill of Rights and ... generates its own set of remedies.[1]

Reach appears to mean direct application. But it is direct application of a rather desiccated sort. Read together, these two paragraphs reduce to a single supposition: when the Bill of Rights states that it applies to 'all law', it does not, in fact, apply to all law. All that 'all law' means is that when the Bill of Rights is deemed to 'reach' a certain set of duties or beneficiaries or time, then it may apply directly or indirectly. It might be tempting to conclude that the authors mean to offer a variation on the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo and its use of the distinction between the range of application of a norm and the prescriptive content of the norm to explain the difference between FC s 8(1) and FC s 8(2). However, De Waal and Currie make clear that this clever fiction of 'reach' simply services their more general thesis that indirect application is always to be preferred to direct application:

> It is convenient to consider the reach of the Bill of Rights before looking at its application in legal disputes and its relationship with the ordinary law. Once the reach is determined, a consideration of the relationship between the Bill of Rights and ordinary law can be sensibly divided between direct application to law and conduct and indirect application of the Bill of Rights to law.[2]

It would be 'convenient' if we knew what 'reach' was or understood the textual hook for this lexical ordering of our analysis: reach before application. Instead of being told what 'reach' is, and told how 'reach' analysis precedes 'application' analysis, we are told, again, that the indirect application of the Bill of Rights must always be considered before its direct application of the Bill of Rights:

> It must be stated at the outset, however, that in practice the indirect application of the Bill of Rights must always be considered before its direct application to law or conduct. The reason for this is the principle, laid down by the Constitutional Court in an early decision, that where it is possible to decide a case without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course that should be followed. Where a legal dispute cannot be resolved without reference to the Constitution, the principle clearly prefers indirect application ... over direct application.[3]

The reason to prefer this canon of interpretation over any other, the authors opine, is that the Constitutional Court prefers to avoid constitutional issues where it is possible to do so. To put it pithily, we are to prefer some kind of application of the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution (let us say indirect), because the Constitutional Court has told us to avoid applying the Final Constitution (including the Bill of Rights) where it is possible to do so. But by making avoidance the canon of choice, the authors offend quite a number of other canons of constitutional construction in the process.

[1] De Waal, Currie & Erasmus (supra) at 37 (Emphasis added).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 37 citing S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59.

For starters, De Waal and Currie's commitment to avoidance turns FC s 8(1) into surplusage. FC s 8(1)'s injunction 'all law' appears to mean that the Bill of Rights will apply — indirectly or directly — if the Bill of Rights is deemed to apply in terms of benefit, time and duty.[1] Aside from the difficulties that attend any reconstruction of the logic of this reading, 'law' does no work. The Bill of Rights applies only if the benefit of the right, the time of the conduct in question and the duties imposed by the right in question require it — and then it should apply indirectly, rather than directly. Is this a plausible interpretation of FC s 8(1)?

FC s 8(1) creates another insuperable problem for De Waal and Currie. The authors defend the proposition that when FC s 8(1) 'binds … the legislature', the Bill of Rights applies to legislation. They defend the proposition that when FC s 8(1) 'binds … the executive', the Bill of Rights applies to subordinate legislation.[2] But when asked to defend the proposition that when FC s 8(1) binds the judiciary, it binds the common law or any judicial construction of law, De Waal and Currie balk. They do not say why FC s 8(1) embraces the law-making function of the legislature and the executive, but does not encompass the law-making function of the judiciary. To the extent that De Waal and Currie offer a defence of their position, it takes the form of an explanation of what it means for the judiciary to make law:[3]

> On the one hand, every court order can be considered to become part of the common law and add to the common law. That is, unless or until it is overturned by a higher court or the legislature. If this is so, no court order may give legal effect to private conduct that is inconsistent with the Bill of Rights. For practical purposes, private persons will then always be bound to [sic] the Bill of Rights.
>
> On the other hand, all court orders can be considered to be the application of a pre-existing common law principle to a new set of facts. This approach rests on the fiction that the judiciary does not make law, but 'finds' the law and then applies it. If this is so, then the judiciary will find that the Bill of Rights sometimes does not directly apply to private conduct, leaving them to apply the common law to the dispute.[4]

[1] De Waal, Currie & Erasmus (supra) at 46.

[2] On their reading, the Bill 'binds' these two branches only if the benefit of the right, the time of the conduct in question and the duties imposed by the right in question require it. This reading is neither natural nor plausible. Even the cramped reading the Du Plessis Court offered of IC s 7(1) subjected legislative and executive enactments to direct application tout court.

[3] Ibid at 54 (Emphasis added).

[4] Ibid.

The authors' seem inclined to view the former position as the most accurate characterization of judicial law-making. They take comfort from the latter because it best fits their approach to application analysis. Their preference for this 'fiction' results in the following difficulties.

If the judiciary takes law as it finds it, but does not make law each time it applies it, then it is — apparently — free to apply the law without worrying about the constitutionality of the rules it applies. This move begs every question. It is not clear why previously created judicially-made law is not bound by FC s 8(1), but previously created legislatively-made law or previously created executively-made law is so bound. It is not clear why, when a court 'finds' an applicable common law rule, FC s 8(1) does not bind either this 'finding' of the court. The emphasis on time and whether each instantiation of a rule of common law entails the creation of a new rule is a red herring. It does no work.

It is also simply untrue that 'every court order can be considered to become part of the common law and add to the common law.'[1] Some court orders — and here the authors must mean judgments — are simply a gloss on legislation, subordinate legislation, customary law, executive conduct, the actions of organs of state or even non-law-making judicial behaviour.

Even if FC s 8(1) only recognizes that the Bill of Rights might apply to 'all law', and might bind the legislature and the executive assuming other conditions are met, what meaning do we attach to FC ss 8(2), 8(3) and 39(2)? We are, I think, to assume that FC s 8(2) and FC s 8(3) indicate that the Bill of Rights might apply to private conduct and might require the development of new rules of law and new remedies assuming other conditions — benefit, duty, time — are met. This gloss on FC s 8(2) and FC s 8(3) may fit the overall structure of De Waal and Currie's argument, but it is most unnatural. In terms of what the drafters intended or what a reader might have expected the words to mean, it is implausible. But worst of all, the sections have no real independent meaning. Their meaning is entirely parasitic on a distinction between indirect application and direct application.

Which brings us to the meaning of FC s 39(2). Unless the two processes of application are identical — which the authors themselves tell us they are not — then the various sections of the Bill of Rights that deal with application must contemplate at least two distinct modes of analysis and must employ language that reflects such a distinction. Moreover, as a matter of logic, one must know when direct application is or is not required in order to know when indirect application is or is not required. Direct application means that the prescriptive content of the substantive rights found in FC ss 9 through 35 engage the law or conduct at issue. Where the prescriptive content of the substantive rights found in FC ss 9 through 35 does not engage the law or the conduct at issue, then FC s 39(2) tells us that the more general spirit, purport and objects of the chapter may inform our efforts to bring all law into line with the Final Constitution. If we reverse the spin, and we first use FC s 39 to bring the law into line with the general spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, there is simply nothing left to be done in terms of direct application. The reason is obvious. If the general spirit, purport and objects of Chapter 2 — which embraces the entire value domain constituted by the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights — does not require a change in the law, then no narrower set of values and purposes reflected in a single provision could be expected to do so.

[1] De Waal, Currie & Erasmus (supra) at 54.

The jurisprudence of avoidance does not appear to stop with a reversal of the lexical ordering of indirect application and direct application. Avoidance, on their account, means that we rely, whenever and wherever possible, on the use of extant rules of ordinary law as the departure point for dispute resolution. At the same time, the authors write that 'the Bill of Rights overrides ordinary law.' Given that our existing corpus of law provides an answer to almost all legal disputes, the priority given the avoidance principle would effectively render almost all disputes immune to constitutional review. The Bill of Rights would actually never override ordinary law. That cannot be right. But if it is, the authors have contradicted themselves.

Again, as a logical matter, the authors seem to be saying: 'A(pplication) = not A(pplication)'. We have seen that avoidance equals indirect application and that the principle of avoiding application entails a preference for (indirect) application over (direct) application. So, if the principle of non-application of the Final Constitution does not obtain (and we have seen that non-application equals indirect application), then the principle of non-application entails (indirect) application of the Final Constitution over (direct) application. One cannot both apply and not apply the Final Constitution. This is, quite literally, nonsense.

Even a good faith reconstruction seems implausible. A strong view of avoidance prevents ordinary rules of law from ever being displaced by the Final Constitution. A weaker view holds that to the extent that avoidance does not preclude application, then we must engage in indirect application. But even on the weaker view, indirect application exhausts the universe of possibilities for application of the Bill of Rights and we would never be required to engage in direct application.

Let us attempt a reconstruction of their argument from avoidance that is weaker still. Assume that the authors mean 'reading down' when they say avoidance. On this account, they are attempting to avoid a finding of invalidity through direct application and even a 'change' in the law through indirect application. But 'reading down' does not avoid constitutional analysis. It is a mandatory canon of constitutional interpretation that enables a court to skirt a finding that a rule of law is unconstitutional and, therefore, invalid. Before one can 'read down' a rule of law, one must first ascertain what the ambit of the applicable constitutional provision is. Only when one has determined that ambit — and this is hardly avoidance — is one in a position to determine whether a preferred gloss on a rule is or is not consistent with constitutional dictates. Analysis of the Final Constitution is logically prior to the analysis of the common law.

The logical incoherence of this approach flows from the authors' commitment to minimalism and their attempt to make minimalism a theory of everything. Minimalism stands for the proposition that courts ought to develop the body of substantive constitutional law 'one case at a time' and that the basic law ought to upset existing doctrine no more than is absolutely necessary. With respect to some constitutional doctrines, say, how one approaches the interpretation of individual rights, minimalism may be a plausible jurisprudential line. But it works only as a 'style', not as a rule. When minimalism is converted into a rule, as the authors must do in order to give the specific provisions of FC s 8 and FC s 39 content, it does too much work and turns all of FC s 8 into surplusage.

(3) Roederer and Hopkins

(a) Roederer

Chris Roederer's strategy in 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning' bears a family resemblance to De Waal and Currie's account.[1] Neither Roederer nor De Waal and Currie feel particularly constrained by the text. De Waal and Currie, however, are primarily concerned with safeguarding extant non-constitutional rules of law from unnecessary constitutional alteration. Roederer demonstrates no appreciable concern for law as a rule-governed exercise. The novelty of Roederer's project is that it depicts constitutional interpretation, generally, and application analysis, in particular, as a value-driven, but largely rule-free, exercise.

Roederer's conclusions about the application of the Bill of Rights under the Final Constitution are as follows. First, there is no meaningful difference between direct application of the Bill of Rights under FC s 8 and indirect application under FC s 39(2). Second, those who believe a meaningful difference exists between analysis under FC ss 8 and 39 rely on a clear cleavage between rules and values. Third, since no clear cleavage exists between the rule-governed analysis and the value-governed analysis under the Final Constitution, then any distinction between the two sections grounded in the belief that they require different kinds of analysis collapses. Fourth, the collapse of both the rule/value distinction and the direct application/indirect application distinction liberates the courts from the yoke of South Africa's traditional legal matrix and unleashes the full transformative potential of the Final Constitution. Fifth, Khumalo offers a perfect example of a decision that recognizes that there is no meaningful difference in the analysis that occurs under FC s 8 and FC s 39(2).

This no-text, no rule, approach may seem like an odd interpretive strategy. But Roederer has two aims that seem to require this technique: (a) to offer a particular kind of justification for the Constitutional Court's decision in Khumalo; (b) to make an intervention in the debate about application which allows him to argue that there is no longer anything worth arguing about.

Roederer's first contention is that there is no meaningful difference between direct application of the Bill of Rights under FC s 8 and indirect application under FC s 39. But despite sections entitled 'Is there a distinction based on the text?' and 'The distinction is an illusion', Roederer never actually tells us what the sections should mean. It is therefore impossible to gauge whether there is, in fact, a legitimate distinction based on the text, whether such a distinction could be deemed meaningful and what the alternative is.[1] At minimum, one might expect an explanation as to why FC s 8 is entitled Application and FC s 39 is entitled Interpretation.

[1] Christopher Roederer 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57.

The differences between the interpretive technique Roederer employs and the interpretive technique employed by the Khumalo Court in the decision he seeks to defend are difficult to reconcile. The refusal to take the text seriously and to then claim that there is effectively no meaningful distinction between FC s 8 and FC s 39 flies directly in the face of Justice O'Regan's injunction that we should not attribute meaning to one section of the Final Constitution that renders another section, quite literally, senseless.[2] If they both mean the same thing, then one of those sections is entirely superfluous.

The attribution of distinct purposes to the two sections is an absolutely essential exercise. FC s 8(1) requires that the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights apply to each and every 'kind' of law. It does not mean that the prescriptive content of the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights cover each and every legal dispute. Put another way, while the specific provisions in the Bill of Rights cover a large domain of law-governed activity, they do not engage all law-governed activity. The independent purpose of FC s 39(2) is to cover those law-governed activities that are not engaged by any of the specific provisions set out in Chapter 2.

A counterfactual makes this distinction clear. Assume that FC s 39(2) and FC s 8 do require the same mode of analysis. Assume, as Roederer would have us do, that this mode of analysis is purely a value-driven exercise. Why even have a Bill of Rights? Why not just have a grocery list of a few general goods? Or even one longer list that embraces all of the values made manifest in the substantive provisions in Chapter 2? The correct reply is that the drafters intended for there to be two different processes. The first process — direct application — takes the rights and freedoms — and the general rules derived from them — as our departure point for determining whether law or conduct is invalid. The second process allows for a mode of analysis that neither specifies a particular right that demands vindication nor permits a finding of invalidity. Instead, as Carmichele and Thebus tell us, the courts operate under a general injunction to bring all law into line with the 'spirit, purport and objects' of the Bill of Rights and the 'objective, normative value system' made manifest in the text of the Final Constitution as a whole.

Roederer's second contention is that those who believe a meaningful difference exists between analysis under FC s 8 and FC s 39 rely incorrectly on a cleavage between rules and values. He claims that since FC ss 39 and 36 require that we analyze both rights and limitations of rights in light of the same five core values that we must necessarily be engaged in the same kind of 'global' assessment of provisions and values whether we are doing direct application or indirect application. This is false. When we ask whether a statutory provision or a rule of common law violates the equality clause, we do not engage in some global assessment of competing Bill of Rights considerations. We know that FC s 9 requires us to ask very specific kinds of questions about 'differentiation', 'discrimination,' 'unfairness,' 'systemic disadvantage' and 'impairment of dignity.' Likewise, it could hardly be the case that when we interpret the right to housing in light of those five cores values we end up with the same content as when we interpret the right to access to court in light of those five core values. However general their wording might be, these provisions are rules with real purchase. Roederer should know that simply because there is never an incontrovertible answer to the skeptical challenge as to exactly how a rule will be applied in some future instance it does not follow that we are not engaging in rule-governed behaviour when we try to follow a given rule or to apply the rule to a case in court.[1] His second effort to blur the rule/value distinction takes the following form:

[1] Roederer (supra) at 71–80.

[2] Does the putative collapse in the rule/value distinction better justify the result in Khumalo? Once we make this move, there is only one question we could ask when faced with any allegation of a rights violation: Stepping back from it all, is the law or conduct under review the kind of law or conduct that the 'entire scheme of the Bill of Rights . . . is meant to achieve?' Such a broad inquiry inevitably makes questions about the particular kinds of application of fundamental rights required by FC ss 8 and 39 superfluous. But this interpretative strategy floats so free of the text that it makes any analysis of the specific rights in FC ss 9 through 35 superfluous. That would seem to violate with a vengeance the non-redundancy or non-surplusage requirement articulated by Justice O'Regan in Khumalo.

> Any rule-like provision is subject to the interpretive exercise enunciated in s 39. The broader the interpretation, the more likely there will be conflict with or limitations on other rights. The more tailored and limited the application the less likely that it will heavily impact on

[1] Though Roederer is sometimes careful to say that he is merely talking about supplanting old rules of law with new justifiable rules, when he talks about constitutional provisions a sort of naïve skepticism creeps into the discussion. He writes:

> For the most part, the provisions in the Bill of Rights of the 1996 Constitution and the rights included therein are not rule-like self-interpreting provisions. They do not appear in the form of statutory entitlements or administrative regulations.

Roederer (supra) at 75–76. True, the rights in the Final Constitution are not like administrative regulations. However, the distinction or the comparison does no work. No rule is self-interpreting in the sense that Roederer implies. Perhaps Roederer's anxiety is that the very breadth of a constitutional provision makes it impossible to apply. This view of language and rules Wittgenstein describes as follows:

> This was our paradox: no course of action could be determined by a rule, because every course of action can be made out to accord with the rule. The answer was: if everything can be made out to accord with the rule, then it can also be made to conflict with it. And so there would be neither accord nor conflict here.

See Ludwig Wittgenstein Philosophical Investigations (1953) § 201. That sounds like what Roederer is saying. However, Wittgenstein's point is not to entertain such naïve skepticism, but rather to oppose it. Following rules — or trying to follow rules — is what meaningful action is all about. Roederer's exhortation to not engage in rule-following behaviour is meaningless unless it reduces to something like 'Don't follow those rules, follow these rules.' Roederer, wanting to be inside and outside the legal community simultaneously, is loath to supplant one form of rule-following behaviour with another. The result is the use of extant rules articulated in cases like Khumalo (though he doesn't call them rules) that suggests an end-run around his initial opposition to rule-following. He cannot have it both ways. Wittgenstein puts this point crisply when he writes:

> There is an inclination to say: every action according to the rule is an interpretation. But we ought to restrict the term 'interpretation' to the substitution of one rule for another.

Ibid. For a full account of Wittgenstein's views on rule-following as well as the skeptical answer to the skeptic's challenge, see Saul Kripke Wittgenstein: On Rules and Private Language (1982); for an account of Wittgenstein's view of rule-following that abjures skeptical moves entirely, see GP Baker & PMS Hacker Skepticism, Rules and Language (1984).

> other horizontally applicable rights. In the end, a balancing must take place between the various rights in issue. The balancing cannot be done, or rather, should not be done by a myopic technical evaluation of competing provisions. It can only be done properly by stepping back and looking at the entire scheme of the Bill of Rights and what it is meant to achieve.[1]

But it is not clear which interpretive exercise in FC s 39 Roederer is talking about. He must be talking about FC s 39(1) and not FC s 39(2). If he were talking about FC s 39(2), he would simply be comparing FC s 39(2) analysis to FC s 39(2) analysis. I do not believe he could have intended a tautology. If, however, he is talking about how FC s 39(1) informs Bill of Rights analysis, then Roederer has overshot the mark. What FC s 39(1) tells us is that 'when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court ... must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.' FC s 39(1) is intended to help us think about how we determine the content of any given right. But it is not a substitute for applying our mind to the particular purposes or the specific values that determine the ambit or the prescriptive content of a substantive provision. When he then writes that 'the broader [and I assume here that he means something like the more notional or the more generous] the interpretation [of the right], the more likely there will be conflict with or limitations on other rights,' he assumes two things that he is not entitled to assume. He assumes that a broad interpretation will inevitably yield an infringement of the right. There is no reason to grant Roederer this assumption. If it were true, then it would be an argument against both Bill of Rights analysis generally and a notional approach to Bill of Rights analysis in particular. He also assumes that every infringement of a right that leads to limitations analysis invariably leads to a balancing of conflicting rights. However, unless we believe that we can reconfigure every justification for a limitation into a rights claim itself, I see no reason to grant this assertion. The state can limit the right to smoke dagga — and thus infringe a Rastafarian's right to engage in a particular religious practice — and make no reference to a countervailing constitutional right. Its concerns — concerns the Prince Court vindicated — are captured by a desire to limit drug-trafficking and to limit the kinds of gateway drug abuse that may lead to hard-core drug abuse and to higher levels of crime. The state may proscribe bestiality and thereby limit a person's right to privacy.[2] The court may uphold such a proscription. However, since there is no constitutional right that entitles an animal to be free from bestiality, then it would be incorrect to say that a countervailing right justifies the state's limitation of my privacy rights. There is, in this instance, no balancing of rights claims.[1]

[1] Roederer (supra) at 76.

[2] The Constitutional Court is on record as having some sympathy for the criminalisation of just these sorts of victimless crimes. See Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)('Case') at para 99. See also National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at para 118.

In considering the explanatory power of Roederer's collapse of the rule/value distinction, it may be worth reflecting upon the Constitutional Court's own take on the distinction between rules and values and the different uses to which the Final Constitution puts them. In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention, Chaskalson CJ writes:

> The values enunciated in section 1 of the Constitution are of fundamental importance. They inform and give substance to all the provisions of the Constitution. They do not, however, give rise to discrete and enforceable rights in themselves. This is clear not only from the language of section 1 itself, but also from the way the Constitution is structured and in particular the provisions of Chapter 2 which contains the Bill of Rights.[2]

Values are one thing, the NICRO Court appears to be saying, rules another. While it is certainly true that the fundamental values articulated in the Final Constitution will shape the rules expressed therein, and that the rules will have a reciprocal effect with respect to our understanding of those fundamental values, there remains a distinction with a difference. Rights give rise to rules and enforceable claims. Values do not.

(b) Hopkins

Kevin Hopkins is primarily interested in how FC s 39(2) can be used to develop the common law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[3] He has written that:

> Each and every pre-Constitutional precedent will need to once again be scrutinized, this time against the values that permeate through the Bill of Rights, so as to make sure that all

[1] As this analysis makes clear, Roederer has used FC s 39 to jettison rights analysis completely and somehow get us to the point where, under FC s 36, we are balancing conflicting rights. But we have already seen that the justificatory analysis required by FC s 36 does not presuppose the assertion of a countervailing right. What then does he mean when he writes that: 'The more tailored and limited the application the less likely that it will heavily impact on other horizontally applicable rights.' Roederer (supra) at 76. What he must mean is: 'the more narrowly circumscribed the content of a right is, the less likely it will be to impair the exercise of another right.' Is this true? In any event, constitutional analysis does not normally proceed in terms of pitting rights against rights. We are generally measuring ordinary law for consistency with constitutional dictates. If a law impairs the exercise of a right, then we ask whether that impairment can be justified. We may well do so by reference to the values made manifest in other rights. But it need not be so. If the law or the conduct in question does not impair the exercise of a right, then we do not get to ask whether that impairment can be justified by reference to some value made manifest in another right. Roederer wants to set up the balancing of rights as an ineluctable part of Chapter 2 analysis. It clearly isn't.

[2] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO') at para 21.

[3] See, eg, Kevin Hopkins 'The Common Law is Indeed a Living Creature: A Noteworthy Decision is Handed Down in the Cape High Court' (2001) 118 SALJ 149; Kevin Hopkins 'Constitutional Rights and the Question of Waiver: How Fundamental are Fundamental Rights?' (2001) 16 SA Public Law 122.

> law (including case law) is constitutionally compliant. That it is our duty to do this is beyond question — the common law must be developed so that it is brought into line with our Constitution.[1] (Emphasis added)

But Hopkins' writings rarely mention 'how' the Bill of Rights applies and how courts are to understand their obligations. His writings appear to reflect a two-fold inclination to view: (1) the common law as a rather seamless web that should be preserved in so far as it is can; and (2) direct constitutional application of the Bill of Rights as an intrusion upon the well considered assessments of equity and fairness made manifest in the common law. He writes:

> Certainty in the common law is supposed to be maintained by the doctrine of precedent and it is in the judges of our courts that we trust to correctly (and carefully) apply this doctrine when they go about resolving legal disputes. This is a far easier task in an established common law system such as the one that existed in South Africa before the new constitutional era was ushered in. But now, in this new era, the emphasis seems to have shifted from consistency to compliance so that a new imperative now rests with judges: that all law, including the common law, be made constitutionally compliant [with FC 39(2)] . . . . [However,] [j]udges need to be more disciplined when using the Constitution: unless they give clear reasons articulating how they arrive at their decisions we run the risk of eroding the certainty created by centuries of well-thought out and carefully applied common-law rules.[2]

FC s 39(2) is Hopkins' preferred mechanism for development of the common law because the invocation of direct application under FC s 8 ostensibly forces the courts to come up with new constitutional remedies. Hopkins orientation towards FC s 39(2) seems to have been informed by the Constitutional Court's very cautious approach to the creation of new and self-standing constitutional remedies in damages — as distinct from common law and statutory remedies — for rights violations.[3] However, the creation of a novel constitutional remedy for damages need not be the outcome of direct application of the Bill of Rights to a rule of common law. National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice is a good example of direct application of the Bill of Rights to a rule of common law and a finding that the rule is unconstitutional.[4]

---

[1] Kevin Hopkins 'The Influence of the Bill of Rights on the Enforcement of Contracts' 2003 (August) De Rebus 22.

[2] Kevin Hopkins 'Constitutional Values and The Rule of Law: They Don't Mean Whatever You Want Them To Mean' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 433 ('Constitutional Values')(Emphasis added).

[3] See, eg, Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose'); Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2002 (1) SACR 79 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele'). In Fose, the Court rejected a request to develop a self-standing constitutional action — above and beyond an action in delict — that could result in the award of damages on top of those awarded at common law. In Carmichele, the Court modified slightly its views in Fose and required the development of the law of delict in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. But see Modderklip (supra) at para 68 (Court creates a new constitutional remedy grounded in the violation of FC s 34 and the rule of law.)

[4] NCGLE I (supra) at para 90 ('In this judgment the conclusion has already been reached that this offence should be declared constitutionally invalid in its entirety. This conclusion has been reached by a direct application of the Bill of Rights to a common-law criminal offence, not by a process of developing the common-law'.)

Hopkins argues that direct application of the Final Constitution requires > a two-part enquiry. In the first part we ask whether the right has been limited, and in the second part (assuming that the first part is answered in the affirmative) we ask whether the limitation is reasonable and justifiable.[1]

For reasons that go unexplained, Hopkins then asserts that > direct application' works well with attacks on legislation — because the claim is usually that the infringing legislation limits a specific constitutional right in an unreasonable and unjustifiable way.[2]

Direct application, he claims, does not work for attacks on rules of common law.

This claim is wrong as a matter of law.[3] First, there have been any number of successful, direct attacks on rules of common law in which the standard two-stage approach has been employed by the courts.[4] Second, there is no reason to conclude that an attack on legislation is based upon one right alone. Constitutional challenges to law are often grounded in multiple rights.[5]

The claim also seems incorrect as a matter of logic. If a rule of common law and a statutory provision can be articulated in exactly the same language, then there are no grounds to support the claim that a rule of common law and an identically phrased statutory provision cannot both be attacked as (a) infringing a specific right and (b) infringing that specific right in an unreasonable and unjustifiable way.

(4) Cheadle, Davis, Van der Walt and Ellmann

(a) Cheadle and Davis

Halton Cheadle and Dennis Davis are not reluctant to apply the Bill of Rights directly to disputes between individuals. In their article 'The Application of the [1] Hopkins 'Constitutional Values' (supra) at 435.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)(Common-law docket privilege relied upon by the state held by Constitutional Court to be unconstitutional.)

[4] NCGLE I (supra) at paras 18–90.

[5] The Constitutional Court often deploys rights simultaneously in the service of its arguments — and it often describes rights as interdependent and symbiotic. See eg, Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)(Court twinned privacy and dignity in support of personality rights in a suit for defamation); Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)(Mutually reinforcing rights of religion and culture were deemed to be in conflict with, and ultimately subordinate to, constellation of equality, dignity, freedom and security of the person and children's rights considerations); NCGLE I (supra) at paras 28–29 (The constitutional protection of dignity 'requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society'; moreover, 'the rights of equality and dignity are closely related, as are the rights of dignity and privacy'); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)(Concatenation of rights — conscience, expression, assembly, association, political participation — support finding that sections of Defense Act are constitutionally infirm.)

1996 Constitution in the Private Sphere',[1] they express absolutely no doubt that the Final Constitution is meant to 'subject private power to constitutional scrutiny.'[2] Their analysis of the text of FC s 8, however, encounters many of the same problems that manifest in Khumalo.

The two authors begin by noting that because 'FC s 8(1) binds the state in its different manifestations to the provisions of the Bill of Rights … the specific inclusion of the judiciary [in FC s 8(1)] will give rise to its own difficulties.'[3] What those interpretive challenges are, Cheadle and Davis do not say. Instead of engaging the extension of FC 8(1), Cheadle and Davis focus their attention almost entirely on FC s 8(2). They write:

> When we say that the executive is bound that means that the executive cannot act in breach of the Constitution. This means in each case that the legislature and the executive do things that the courts have to measure against the Constitution. Can we ever make the same claim in respect of the courts? Their conduct — the processing of law claims and the passing of judgments - is not extraneous action to be tested against the Constitution - it is constitutive of the law, including the Constitution, itself. Section 8(2) reads: 'A provision of the Bill of Rights binds a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.' This section puts beyond dispute that the Bill of Rights can bind natural or juristic persons.[4]

While I agree with the last sentence, it is hard to comprehend fully the textual basis for the claim. The binding of the executive — like the binding of the judiciary or the application of the Bill of Rights to 'all law' — occurs in terms of FC s 8(1). The authors assert, without argument, that when the common law — an emanation of the judiciary — governs a private dispute, the Bill of Rights applies only in terms of FC s 8(2).

Cheadle and Davis are quite conscious of, and admirably candid about, the fact their analysis of FC s 8 — and their reliance on FC s 8(2) — resurrects, in a modified form, doctrinal difficulties created by Du Plessis. Cheadle and Davis write presciently that:

> The deep convictions that fired the debate and the majority judgment in Du Plessis case will fuel the controversy built into this formulation — how far should judges go in binding private persons to the strictures of the Bill of Rights. Those who fear the Constitution's incursion into private law will use the discretion given in this section to put the brakes on the application of the Bill of Rights to private persons. Those who recognise that power is not the sole prerogative of the state, particularly as the state privatises many of its functions, will use the discretion to provide a remedy to bring private conduct into line with the Constitution when the legislature fails to do so.[5]

[1] (1996) 12 SAJHR 44, 46 ('As both authors were party to the constitutional negotiations and Halton Cheadle was directly involved in the formulation of Chapter 3 [of the Interim Constitution], we have some justification for believing that Chapter 3 required a constitutional audit of all law. Chapter 3 did not create direct constitutional causes of action against private persons, but if a rule of law was involved in private litigation, Chapter 3 was applicable to that rule of law.')

[2] Ibid at 54–55.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid at 56.

The rest of their article is given over to a detailed explanation of why FC s 8(2) should not be used to avoid subjecting private relationships to constitutional scrutiny. Addressing themselves to the better angels of those who defend the sanctity of the common law, they write:

> The text enjoins a court to take account of the nature of the right and the nature of the duty imposed by the right. The nature of the right may reveal that it is a right capable of being applied to private persons - the right to dignity (injuria, defamation); the right to freedom and security of person (delict), the right to privacy, the right to an environment that is not harmful to health or well-being (nuisance), right to property, and childrens' rights. We have deliberately selected rights already recognised in the common law to demonstrate that there is an imminent horizontality in respect of many of the rights in Chapter 2. The common law recognition of any of the rights does not always cover the whole ambit of the constitutional right, but the fact that part of the right is capable of application suggests that the right is suitable for application to private persons.[1]

The argument draws down on the generally accepted notion that the common law seeks to 'balance' competing rights claims in order to service a comparable claim about fundamental rights. I have my doubts about the persuasive power of this rhetorical move. If one thinks that the legislature is best placed to structure the relationships between private persons, then one will be disinclined to use the Bill of Rights to restructure such legislation. If one thinks that the body of common law that governs relations between private parties is a densely woven tapestry that is best left to the courts to weave, slowly, incrementally, stitch by stitch over time, then one may be disinclined to use the Bill of Rights to alter the fabric of the common law to suit the emerging exigencies of the constitutional order.

In his recent chapter on application, Halton Cheadle rehearses many of the arguments above.[2] The chapter possesses the added virtue of recognizing that FC s 8(1) 'states that the Bill of Rights "applies to all law."'[3] Cheadle then goes on to make the unobjectionable claim that 'all law' means 'law' in all its various manifestions: legislation, subordinate legislation, regulation, common law and customary law. More importantly, he rejects the assertion that the application of the Bill of Rights to legal disputes between the state and an individual differs materially from the application of the Bill of Rights to legal disputes between individuals.[4] Such a distinction, Cheadle writes:

> ... has no basis in law, given the changes made to the [F]inal Constitution. All law is now subject to constitutional scrutiny regardless of how and with whom it arises in litigation. A common law rule is no different from any other legal norm — if it is invalid, a court must declare it invalid.[5]

Such a statement should put to rest the issue of the application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to common law disputes between private

[1] Cheadle & Davis (supra).
[2] Halton Cheadle 'Application' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 19.
[3] Ibid at 31.
[4] Ibid at 33.
[5] Ibid.

parties. Several pages later, however, Cheadle writes that FC s 8(2) 'limits' the application of the Bill of Rights with respect 'to private power.'[1] Some rights — say FC s 9(4)'s injunction against any and all discrimination — must apply to legal disputes between private parties. Other rights — the criminal process rights in FC s 35 and the political rights in FC ss 19(2) and (3), 20 and 21(2), (3) and (4) — can only meaningfully apply to relations between the state and individuals. As for the rest, the Bill of Rights applies if a right asserted is found to be 'suitable for application.'[2] Perhaps Cheadle means only to draw the distinction offered in the good faith reconstruction of Khumalo: namely that while FC s 8(1) commits us to the proposition that the Bill of Rights applies to every kind of law, FC s 8(2) draws our attention to the fact the prescriptive content of the substantive rights may not speak to a particular legal relationship between or to particular kinds of conduct engaged in by private parties.

Cheadle prefers to explain the meaning of FC s 8(2) in terms of what he describes as 'the South African Constitution's special genius.'[3] What is this 'special genius'? Cheadle writes:

> Precisely because generally stated rights are not appropriate vehicles for the imposition of standards of conduct, section 8 seeks to avoid application of the right to conduct of private persons by requiring either legislation or a common law rule 'to give effect to the right.' This constitutional motif of an intermediate law between the constitutional right and the conduct of the state or of the private actor repeats itself throughout the Bill of Rights.[4]

What I understand Cheadle to be saying is that the Bill of Rights rarely, if ever, applies directly to 'conduct'. It applies to law. Is this 'special'? I guess that depends on one's perspective. If one adopts the Hohfeldian view that every dispute that makes it to court is, at bottom, rule-governed, then FC s 8 does not avoid 'application of [a] right to private persons' but rather characterizes the constitutional challenge to the private conduct in question as an attack on a rule of law. FC s 8 may, however, reflect the 'special genius' of its drafters if it is read against the background of a community of practitioners hesitant to adopt the Hohfeldian account and wary of the disruption that generally stated norms might have on a well-settled body of law. The notion that all conduct is, in fact, law-mediated, and mediated through express rules of a statute or the common law, suggests that the Final Constitution is not designed to create a new jurisprudence out of whole cloth but to tailor the existing law to fit the basic law. Is this 'genius'? If Cheadle's elaboration of FC s 8 can convince South African jurists, practitioners and academics that direct application of the specific substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to all species of law and all kinds of disputes is not something to be feared, but embraced, then his account of FC s 8 is genius incarnate.

I have but one serious qualm about Cheadle's account. For Cheadle, FC s 8(3)(a) stands for the proposition that a court is obliged to develop the common law only where no 'mediating' or existing rule of common law or statutory provision exists to [1] Cheadle (supra) at 36.

[2] Ibid at 37.
[3] Ibid at 29.
[4] Ibid.

give effect to the right that has been violated. I do not agree. If anything, FC s 8(3)(a) must be concerned with the absence of appropriate mediating rules of law. In cases where customary law, common law or statute do not give effect to constitutional imperatives, Chapter 2's rights and freedoms become the unavoidable vehicles for the imposition of new standards of conduct. How could it be otherwise? Where the existing common law is out of step with the rights enshrined in Chapter 2, the courts must set the law right and craft a new rule of common law.[1] The same is true of statutes. The preferred modality is to strike down a statute or sever an offending provision. But it is also fair to say that this Constitutional Court has not been shy about 'reading in' words in order to remedy the constitutional flaw in legislation.[2]

'The constitutional motif' of mediating law may also refer to what I have described as the Final Constitution's commitment to 'shared constitutional interpretation.' Various pieces of super-ordinate legislation — the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, the Access to Information Act, the Equality Act and the Labour Relations Act — give effect to constitutional rights. Such legislation forces the courts to recognize that they share responsibility for giving content to the Final Constitution.[3] Where, however, neither super-ordinate legislation, normal legislation, subordinate legislation nor common law effectively mediate conduct in a manner consistent with the Final Constitution, FC s 8(3)(a) makes it incumbent upon the courts to assist other government actors in developing a system of best practices — at least until constitutionally-mandated enabling legislation appears.[4]

[1] If striking down common law rules or statutory provisions that govern private conduct — and potentially replacing these rules — especially common law rules — with rules derived from a constitutional right is an accepted, and indeed necessary, part of constitutional review, then it is hard to explain why an area of the law as yet ostensibly ungoverned by an express common law rule or a statutory provision is exempt from direct application of the Bill of Rights. It is especially difficult to see with respect to the common law. That the courts hate to announce that they are making law has more to do with style — the rhetoric of stare decisis and judicial law-making — than it does with substance. See Stu Woolman & Danie Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Walters and Afrox' (2003) 192 SA Public Law 38.

[2] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at paras 67, 68, 70 (Court held that as far as deference to the legislature is concerned, there is 'in principle no difference between a court rendering a statutory provision constitutional by removing the offending part by actual or notional severance, or by reading words into a statutory provision. In both cases the parliamentary enactment, as expressed in a statutory provision, was being altered by the order of a court: in the one case by excision and in the other by addition. The only relevant enquiry was what the consequences of such an order were and whether they constituted an unconstitutional intrusion into the domain of the Legislature. Any other conclusion would lead to the absurdity that the granting of a remedy would depend on the fortuitous circumstance of the form in which the Legislature had chosen to enact the provision in question. Reading in was, depending on all the circumstances, an appropriate form of relief under s 38 of the Constitution and whether a Court read in or struck out words from a challenged law, the focus of the Court should be on the appropriate remedy in the circumstances and not on the label used to arrive at the result.')

[3] IDASA v ANC [2005] JOL 14201 (C).

[4] For example, FC s 41(2) requires Parliament to pass legislation designed to mediate disputes between organs of state. While draft legislation on intergovernmental relations has now appeared, the lacuna in the law — the lack of mediating law — did not prevent the Constitutional Court from using FC ss 40 and 41 to develop rules designed to resolve intergovernmental disputes. See Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Bernard Bekink 'Cooperative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

(b) Van der Walt

Johan Van der Walt has pedalled, of late, a position on application that deviates somewhat from the rather strong line he took shortly after the Constitutional Court delivered Du Plessis and certified the Final Constitution.[1] In 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights', Van der Walt starts off by defending the proposition that FC s 8(1)'s injunction that the Bill of Rights 'applies to all law' captures both statute and common law alike.[2] He presses the point by further asserting that whether it is statute or common law that governs a legal dispute between private persons, it is state action all the same.[3] It matters not whether the law emanates from Parliament or the Constitutional Court. With respect to common-law rules that govern private legal relations, he asks:

> Is it not strictly speaking still the relationship between state action and citizens of the state that is at issue here, rather than relations between citizens?

To demonstrate that this is not fanciful academic rhetoric, Van der Walt endorses the reasoning of the US Supreme Court in Shelley v Kraemer: non-statutory private law rules can be understood to constitute state action.[4] On this account, it matters not whether a rule or a relationship is described as vertical or horizontal. An enforceable legal rule is, whatever its provenance, always backed up by the power of the state. When the state acts, the Final Constitution always applies. Van der Walt's gloss on 'Drittwirkung cases decided by the Bundesverfassunsgericht' backs up his thesis on state action:

> [V]irtually all the important Drittwirkung cases decided by the Bundesverfassunsgericht turn on an application of the [general] rule [regarding state action articulated] in Shelley. Nowhere does the [German Constitutional] Court resort to terminology that suggests that a fundamental right was violated by a private legal subject. The violation of the fundamental right is always attributed to an incorrect interpretation of the bearing of the Federal Constitution of Germany or Grungesetz on the private dispute by a trial court.
> . . . .
> The most consistent position to take would be that one can never take the vertical relation or involvement of the state out of horizontal or private legal relationships . . . This implies, of course, that the constitutional review of private legal relations is fundamentally a matter of regular constitutional review of state power.[5]

Van der Walt then equivocates with respect to the proper extension of FC ss 8(2) and (3). Rather than offer a reading of these subsections consistent with his take on FC s 8(1), Van der Walt states that 'I do not wish to again take issue with the interpretive question whether the 1996 Bill of Rights applies directly or indirectly to private disputes.'[6] He further concludes that:

[1] See John Van der Walt 'Perspectives on Horizontal Application: Du Plessis v De Klerk Revisited' (1997) 12 SA Public Law 1
[2] Ibid at 346–347.
[3] Ibid at 347.
[4] 334 US 1 (1948).
[5] Van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application' (supra) at 347–348.
[6] Ibid at 351.

> We can assume that the future impact of the Bill of Rights will predominantly take place through what has come to be understood as the indirect horizontal application of the Bill of Rights.[1]

This comment could simply reflect Van der Walt's assessment of how the courts have used both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution to alter ordinary law. That the claim is probably descriptive, and not prescriptive, is born out by his subsequent statement that the Constitutional Court's ruling in Fose underwrites this conclusion. Fose supports the contention that the courts are more comfortable modifying the common law through indirect application via FC s 39(2) than through direct application via FC s 8.

That Van der Walt is not, in fact, content to let the matter rest with a descriptive claim is reflected in the following question:

> Is it so that there are social relations between private individuals which do not found causes of action and on which the law for this reason, and the 1996 Constitution for that matter (if we ignore for the moment s 8(2), as had to be done when Du Plessis was decided) have no bearing?[2]

It seems to me that Van der Walt wants to say that it is true — in an arguably trivial sense — that there are instances of private conduct that do not found causes of action and upon which the law and the Final Constitution have no immediate bearing: namely those instances of private conduct that do not lead to a dispute that winds up in court. To the extent that a dispute must be resolved by a court, it is inevitably mediated by law, and the Final Constitution may have a material bearing on the outcome. I am less certain about how Van der Walt understands FC s 8(2) and FC s 8(3). I think it safe to say that he would not object too strenuously to my preferred reading: namely, they indicate that the courts must create new rules of law to govern the conduct of private persons in those instances in which extant and express rules of ordinary law do not give adequate effect to a substantive provision in the Bill of Rights.

(c) Ellmann

As I have already noted, Ellmann devotes the better part of his discussion of application jurisprudence in 'Constitutional Confluence' to a patient explanation of how the term 'organ of state' expands the kinds of entities and relationships captured by FC s 8(1).[3] After completing his analysis of organs of state, Ellmann moves directly into an analysis of FC ss 8(2) and (3).[4]

[1] Van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application' (supra) at 351.

[2] Ibid at 354.

[3] Steven Ellmann 'A Constitutional Confluence: American State Action Law and the Application of Socio-Economic Rights Guarantees to Private Actors' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 444, 446–448.

[4] Just prior to addressing FC ss 8(2) and (3), however, Ellmann indicates that he believes that the inclusion of the phrase 'binds the judiciary' constitutes the second significant shift in the application provisions of the Final Constitution. He fails to offer an explanation of the significance of this change. Ibid at 450.

About FC ss 8(2) and (3), Ellmann writes:

> [S]ection 8(2) states the circumstances in which rights bind private actors — 'if, and to the extent that' they are applicable. Its phrasing seems more instructive than conditional. It does not say that 'rights may apply' in certain circumstances, but that they do. Moreover, s 8(3) goes on to specify how courts are to develop the law 'when applying a provision in the Bill of Rights to a natural or juristic person in terms of subsection (2)'; again the import of such phrasing is that there will be such cases. So it does not seem correct to read the new Constitution as 'simply defer[ring] the question of application'; the text is an invitation to such application. What the invitation leaves very much to the Courts, however, is the elaboration of the proper occasions for this horizontal application, and of the proper methods of carrying it out.[1]

This paragraph is meant to dispatch the contention that the text is so open-ended that the courts can still avoid direct application entirely.[2] Ellmann is, however, concerned less with setting out a framework for direct application analysis and concerned more with its ramifications for institutional relations between coordinate branches of government.[3] As a result, two questions dominate Ellmann's analysis: what are the risks that attach to the courts' acceptance of this invitation to apply the Bill of Rights directly to private legal disputes and how will this acceptance affect the shared responsibility that the courts and the legislature have for shaping constitutional doctrine.

Ellmann has a modicum of sympathy for the view expressed by some that direct application of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private parties may impair majority rule. His sympathy, however, has clear limits. He notes that the Final Constitution reflects a political choice by the majority of South Africans. That democratically determined decision commits our polity to justiciable rights and the direct application of these justiciable rights to private disputes, both of which of necessity 'limit[] legislative prerogatives.'[4] Failure to recognize these

[1] Ellmann (supra) at 451.

[2] Ellmann goes on to note that while the dominant tradition in application jurisprudence has been one that eschews direct application to private actors, that tradition 'may be shifting' and that the drafters of the South African Constitution intended to 'depart from [that tradition] to some extent.' Ibid at 452.

[3] Ellmann's failure to address the meaning of FC s 8(1)'s 'applies to all law' and 'binds . . . the judiciary' leads him to speak as if direct application is also something that FC s 8(1) invites rather than demands. As I have noted, application is, in fact, always only an invitation. Application analysis never determines the prescriptive content of a right — although it may serve to shape it. Ellmann's two-fold omission reflects, however, a momentary lapse in analytical rigour. As I have already noted in the body of the chapter, while much of the application debate engages disputes between private parties governed by common law, it is at least important to discuss what it means for Chapter 2 to bind the legislature or to apply to legislation. Ellmann, like most commentators, refuses to draw the unavoidable conclusion that if FC s 8(2) determines the conditions for direct application of the Bill of Rights to all legal disputes between private parties, then it necessarily determines the conditions for direct application of the Bill of Rights to all legal disputes between private parties governed by legislation. Conversely, if the binding of the judiciary in FC s 8(1) is genuinely a noteworthy change, it must be because it means that all emanations from the judiciary are subject directly to the provisions in the Bill of Rights.

express incursions into a supposedly pure legislative domain would itself be an affront to 'democratic principles'.[1]

Ellmann notes that the South African Bill of Rights has a way of mitigating 'infringements on majority rule and the impairment of policy-making.'[2] The capacity for 'indirect application' of the Bill of Rights — and the ability to create constitutional common law — 'avoids the potentially undemocratic and inflexible character of constitutional adjudication by turning instead to development of the common law guided by constitutional values.'[3] The apparent advantage of indirect application is that such constitutional common-law rules can be 'overridden freely by the legislature.'[4]

This weaker form of judicial intervention is not a complete solution to separation of powers problems. Ellmann identifies two distinct causes for concern.

Indirect development of the common law does not ensure judicial deference to later legislative interventions in the same area of law. As Ellmann observes in his discussion of the history of the Miranda rule in US jurisprudence, even an invitation by the courts to the legislature to address afresh an area of law may later be withdrawn.[5]

Sometimes, however, indirect application may not be intrusive enough. Ellmann writes that the choice to develop the common law under FC s 39(2) means that future violators of the new common law rule will only be guilty of violating the common law and not the Final Constitution. Why this outcome counts as a separation of powers concern is not quite clear. After all, the courts are not guilty of doing too much vis-à-vis the legislature. They seem to be doing too little.

The potential for judicial over-reliance on FC s 39(2) and indirect application forces Ellmann to attend once again to the point of the invitation extended by FC ss 8(2) and (3). He states that we could not possibly be meant to rely entirely on [4] Ellmann (supra) at 453.

[1] Ellmann (supra) at 453. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly noted that as one of the guardians of the Bill of Rights, it is sometimes obliged to reject the considered opinions of the other two co-ordinate branches of government. Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of The Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC); South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC); S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC).

[2] Ellmann (supra) at 454.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966)('Miranda'). While the US Congress enacted such legislation two years later — making a Miranda-like warning but one of several considerations for the admissibility of a confession — the statute was rarely utilized because of 'doubts about its constitutionality.' Ibid at 455. When the statute finally arrived at the Supreme Court's doorstep over three decades after its passage, the institutional comity of the initial invitation for a legislative override was itself overridden by the US Supreme Court's view that the decision had now become part of accepted police practice and, perhaps

FC s 39(2) for the development of constitutional common law because that would leave us exactly where we were after Du Plessis and 'undercut the symbolic force of [FC] s 8(2).'[1]

One clear virtue of this line of analysis is that it recognizes expressly the distinct processes required by FC ss 8(2) and (3), on the one hand, and FC s 39(2), on the other. FC s 8(2)'s invitation to undertake direct application of the Bill of Rights to private disputes entails that the new remedies anticipated by FC s 8(3) cover cases in which a specific provision of the Bill of Rights applies directly to a dispute between private actors. FC s 39(2) addresses instances in which the 'Bill of Rights [does] not apply' directly, 'but [is] merely guiding.'[2]

For those committed to a transformative vision of the Final Constitution, FC s 8(1), s 8(2), s 8(3) and s 39(2) support the claim that 'there are no legal questions left in South Africa to which the Bill of Rights is simply and inherently irrelevant.'[3] For those concerned about issues of institutional comity, this sliding scale of application allows, on the one hand, for the constitutionalization of private legal disputes through the articulation of clear constitutional rules that emanate directly from specific provisions of the Bill of Rights — rules which are not especially amenable to override — and, on the other hand, makes provision for the creation of constitutional common-law rules that have no clear textual lineage — rules which leave room for 'legislative innovation'.[4] more importantly, a part of 'our national culture.' See Dickerson v United States 530 US 428 (2000).

[1] Ellmann (supra) at 456.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid at 457.

32 Interpretation

*Lourens du Plessis

32.1 Introduction 32–1
(a) Aspects of Bill of Rights interpretation in pre-1994 case law 32–3
(b) Bill of Rights interpretation as depicted in early post-1994 constitutional jurisprudence 32–6
(c) Rights interpretation and/as constitutional interpretation 32–11
(d) The scope of constitutional interpretation 32–16
(e) The mechanics of rights analysis 32–20
(i) Direct application and interpretation of a specific substantive right 32–21
(ii) Subsidiarity and indirect application as preferred modes of interpretation 32–21
32.2 Interpreters of the Constitution 32–22
(a) Constitution-makers 32–23
(b) Courts 32–24
(c) Legislative and executive organs of state 32–25
(d) Citizens and other non-state organs protected, empowered and obliged by the Constitution 32–27
32.3 Theories of interpretation and their relevance for constitutional interpretation 32–28
(a) Common-law theories of statutory interpretation 32–29
(b) Constitutional interpretation and the inadequacy of common-law theories of statutory interpretation 32–40
(i) Constitutional democracy and the end of the dominance of literalism-cum-intentionalism 32–41
(ii) The linguistic turn 32–44
(iii) 'Politics': predicament or prospect? 32–45
(iv) Purposive interpretation as the increasingly preferred alternative to literalism-cum-intentionalism 32–52

(c) Theories of, theoretical positions on and leitmotivs in constitutional interpretation 32–56
(i) Three comparative examples. 32–57
(ii) Theoretical position(s) in relation to interpretive leitmotiv(s) 32–66
(iii) Transitional constitutionalism 32–68
(aa) The Constitution as bridge: justificatory constitutionalism 32–69
(bb) The Constitution as memory and promise: memorial constitutionalism 32–73
(iv) Transformative constitutionalism. 32–79
(v) Theoretical accounts and assessments of constitutional adjudication 32–82
(d) Contemporary developments: linguistic-turn thinking and the new textualism 32–86
(e) The Constitution as text sui generis among law-texts. . . 32–92
(i) The Constitution as prescriptive, abstractly-normative law-text. 32–93
(aa) Law as text and text(s) as law 32–93
(bb) Narrative and normative law-texts 32–94
(cc) Prescriptive and persuasive (normative) law-texts 32–95
(dd) Abstract and concretized normative law-texts 32–95
(ee) The Constitution as genre text 32–96
(ii) The Constitution as supreme law 32–97
(iii) The Constitution as negotiated and negotiating text 32–100
32.4 The enacted Constitution-in-writing. 32–107
(a) The Constitution and the construction of enacted law. 32–108
(b) Multilingualism 32–115
(c) Interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text 32–116
(i) Conspicuous waymarks 32–117
(aa) The Preamble to the Final Constitution . . . 32–117
(bb) FC s 1: Founding Provisions. 32–119
(cc) FC s 7: Rights 32–120
(dd) FC s 8: Application 32–125
(ee) FC s 36: Limitation of Rights 32–127
(ff) FC s 39: Interpretation of Bill of Rights. . . 32–128

(gg) FC Chapter 3: Co-operative Government . . 32–131
(hh) FC s 195: Basic Values and Principles governing Public Administration 32–132
(ii) FC s 239: Definitions 32–132
(ii) Inconspicuous waymarks 32–133
32.5 Methods of constitutional interpretation. 32–135
(a) Method(s) as doing(s) 32–135
(b) Reading strategies 32–136
(i) Construing the Final Constitution in a case law context. 32–137
(ii) Reading in conformity with the Final Constitution 32–138
(iii) Subsidiarity 32–142
(aa) Jurisdictional subsidiarity. 32–146
(bb) Adjudicative subsidiarity 32–150
(c) Method(s) as canon(s) and canon(s) as method(s) (of construction): Canon-guided reading strategies 32–159
(i) Grammatical interpretation 32–160
(ii) Systematic interpretation. 32–162
(iii) Teleological interpretation. 32–167
(iv) Historical interpretation 32–170
(v) Comparative interpretation (or transnational contextualization). 32–171
(aa) International law 32–173
(bb) Foreign law. 32–183
32.6 Constitutional interpretation in a constitutional state 32–191

7 Rights

(1) This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.

(2) The state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.

(3) The rights in the Bill of Rights are subject to the limitations contained or referred to in section 36, or elsewhere in the Bill.

39 Interpretation of Bill of Rights

(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum —

(a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;

(b) must consider international law; and

(c) may consider foreign law.

(2) When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

(3) The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.

32.1 INTRODUCTION

Treatises on statutory interpretation in South Africa, and in other jurisdictions where Interpretation of Statutes is a legal discipline in its own right, most often start by posing the question 'what is statutory interpretation?'. They then proceed to proffer a working definition of some sort to get further discussion going.[1] These treatises assume that statutory interpretation is a readily describable, interpretive analysis of enacted law, guided by common- and statute-law canons of construction that manifest as rules and presumptions.

* The invaluable support of the South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional, Public, Human Rights and International Law (SAIFAC) and the personal support (and patience) of Theunis Roux and Stu Woolman in the completion of this chapter is hereby gratefully acknowledged. SAIFAC fellows such as Michael Bishop, Sebastian Seedorf and David Bilchitz read drafts of this chapter and gave me critical input during seminars. Their engagement — along with Stu Woolman's edits – considerably enhanced the quality of the end product. But, of course, any shortcomings that have remained are my sole responsibility. The hospitality and support of the Max-Planck-Institut für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht in Heidelberg, Germany during the final phases of the completion of this chapter are hereby also acknowledged.

[1] See, for example, LC Steyn Die Uitleg van Wette (5th Edition, 1981) 1:

> [W]at is wetsuitleg? ... Dit is om die wils- en gedagte-inhoud van die wetgewer vas te stel ... aangewese op die woorde wat die wetgewer gebruik het om daardie wils- en gedagte-inhoud te openbaar. ['What is statutory interpretation? ... It is to determine the content of the legislature's will and thinking ... relying on the words that the legislature employed to reveal its will and thinking.']

For a similar approach, see P Langan Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (12th Edition, 1976) 1. See also LM du Plessis The Interpretation of Statutes (1986) 1:

> The subject Interpretation of Statutes is concerned with the pinciples, rules, methods and techniques which jurists employ in order to understand statutes, ie legal precepts deriving from legislative activity, and to apply their provisions to concrete, practical situations.

See also C Botha Statutory Interpretation. An Introduction for Students (4th Edition, 2005) 1.

A similar introduction to the chapter on 'Interpretation' in this four volume treatise on South African constitutional law would be inadequate and inappropriate. Certain reading strategies in constitutional interpretation do require the use of some of the conventional canons of statutory interpretation. And constitutional interpretation also involves an analysis of the written constitutional text to determine meaning. However, constitutional interpretation is also an enterprise that goes much further than any other form of legal interpretation. It is a practice emanating from, rooted in and part of the shaping of a constitutional democracy.[1] Its most distinctive and consequential feature as an interpretive endeavour is its ability to underwrite constitutional supremacy, warding off unconstitutional action, halting the abuse of power, or providing redress for the adverse consequences of unconstitutional conduct. Constitutional interpretation, as mediated by the courts and other political actors, can also use supreme constitutional authority either to undo existing law inconsistent with the Final Constitution, or to keep impugned law intact, but then to develop it so that it conforms with the dictates of the Final Constitution. Constitutional interpretation also activates — and gives content to — the values that underlie and pervade a democratic, constitutional state (Rechtsstaat).[2]

The first section of this chapter surveys some of the major notions of constitutional interpretation evident in the case law in the decade or so preceding the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa on 27 April 1994. These shortcomings in the South African courts' pre-1994 jurisprudence on constitutional interpretation gave rise to the inclusion of interpretive directives in two consecutive written constitutional texts and helped to transform judicial attitudes towards constitutional interpretation shortly after the commencement of the Interim Constitution (IC) in 1994.

The second main section of the chapter focuses on the authorized interpreters of the Final Constitution. The third main section considers the possible relevance of various theories of interpretation to constitutional interpretation. Conventional theories of statutory interpretation are inadequate — though not wholly irrelevant — for purposes of constitutional interpretation. I explore developments associated with the linguistic turn in legal thinking, on issues of interpretation, to see if they can help us address some of these inadequacies. In the past (almost) decade and a half of constitutional democracy in South Africa, no clearly discernible theories of constitutional interpretation have emerged. However, several leitmotivs, traceable to theoretical positions on constitutional interpretation, have guided our constitutional interpretation in a particular direction.

[1] For a description of 'constitutional democracy', see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 10-18–10-22.

[2] See Chapter 1 (the 'founding provisions') of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

The fourth main section of this chapter identifies the aids and the waymarks to the interpretation of the Constitution-in-writing that are present in the written text itself, while the fifth main section is devoted to a discussion of methods of and reading strategies in constitutional interpretation.

(a) Aspects of Bill of Rights interpretation in pre-1994 case law

> [T]he Court has a particular duty as guardian of liberty, but it has to exercise its powers of controlling legislation with a scalpel and not with a sledgehammer.[1]

The admonitory metaphor in this dictum, dating from 1984, foreshadowed the need eventually to include provisions such as FC ss 7 and 39 in the Final Constitution some twelve years later.[2] Hiemstra CJ, then Chief Justice of the 'homeland'[3] Bophuthatswana, intended the dictum as a slap on the wrist for another court whose over-zealous (and, in Hiemstra's view, less than graceful) implementation of Bophuthatswana's justiciable Constitution in an earlier case compromised thoughtful constitutional adjudication.

In S v Marwane,[4] Hiemstra CJ in the court a quo[5] was first called upon to test the constitutionality of a provision of the notorious (South African) Terrorism Act[6] on the basis of Bophuthatswana's justiciable Constitution.[7] Section 93(1)(a) of that Constitution provided that '[s]ubject to the provisions of this constitution' all laws in operation in any district of Bophuthatswana immediately prior to 6 December 1977, the date of commencement of the Constitution, would continue to apply except in so far as such laws were superseded by any applicable law of Bophuthatswana or amended or repealed by Bophuthatswana's legislature. The South African Terrorism Act thus continued to apply in Bophuthatswana. Section 7(1) of the Constitution proclaimed the Constitution to be the supreme law of Bophuthatswana while s 7(2) provided that any statutory provision inconsistent with any constitutional provision — and enacted after the date of commencement of the Constitution — would be void to the extent of such inconsistency. For Hiemstra CJ the decisive question in Marwane was largely a 'technical' one, namely, whether South African legislation received in Bophuthatswana by virtue of s 93(1)(a) could be reviewed and voided on constitutional grounds. Answering this question in the negative, he concluded that the court lacked jurisdiction to pronounce on the constitutional validity of the impugned provisions of the Terrorism Act.

---

[1] Smith v Attorney-General Bophuthatswana 1984 (1) SA 196, 200C (B)('Smith').

[2] IC ss 35(1) and (3) contained provisions akin to those provisions present in FC s 39. See § 32.1*(b)* and § 32.4*(c)(i)(ff) infra. IC s 35(1) and (3) were thus in essence retained in the Final Constitution. FC s 7 had no predecessor in the Interim Constitution. No provision akin to IC s 35(2) was included in the Final Constitution. See § 32.5(b)*(ii) infra.

[3] 'Homeland' here understood as defined in FC schedule 6, item 1.

[4] 1982 (3) SA 717 (A)('Marwane').

[5] S v Marwane 1981 (3) SA 586 (B)('Marwane a quo').

[6] Act 83 of 1967 s 2(1((c) read with s 2(2).

[7] Constitution of the Republic of Bophuthatswana Act 18 of 1977: especially ss 12(5), 12(7) and 12(8).

At the time the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of South Africa in Bloemfontein was still the final court of appeal for Bophuthatswana. Marwane then proceeded to South Africa's highest court to have (among other things) a statute of South African origin declared invalid on substantive, constitutional grounds[1] — something which the then South African Constitution (of 1983)[2] precluded any South African court from doing.

A majority of the Appellate Division negotiated with relative ease the technical hurdle over which Hiemstra CJ had stumbled. It then proceeded to test the impugned provision of the Terrorism Act and held it to be unconstitutional. The majority was, as a matter of fact, appreciably more enthusiastic and activist than the circumstances required. They pronounced on provisions of the Terrorism Act which they — and the court a quo — were not even called upon to consider.

Hiemstra CJ's scalpel and sledgehammer metaphor, quoted above, was meant to depict the constitutional over-indulgence of the majority in the Marwane appeal. His dictum comes from Smith v Attorney-General Bophuthatswana.[3] Smith reflects the virtues of judicial self-restraint and a display of 'carefully balanced constitutional adjudication'.[4]

The number of constitutional cases before high courts in Southern Africa increased during the late 1980s and early 1990s.[5] This increase flowed directly from the growth in the number of 'independent' homelands (with justiciable constitutions) to five,[6] and the presidential proclamation of a justiciable 'interim constitution', with entrenched fundamental rights, for Namibia in anticipation of its independence.[7] In some instances, courts in the homelands (especially the former Ciskei[8]), as well as the Supreme Court in pre-independence Namibia,[9] handed down judgments in constitutional cases that indeed reflected a nuanced

[1] Marwane (supra).

[2] See Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983 s 34(3).

[3] Smith (supra) at 200C.

[4] See A Thomashausen 'Human Rights in Southern Africa: The Case of Bophuthatswana' (1984) 101(3) South African Law Journal 467, 480. See also TJ Kruger Die Wordingsproses van 'n Suid-Afrikaanse Menseregtebedeling (Unpublished LLD Thesis, Potchefstroom (1990) 211 and 224-229); LM du Plessis & JR de Ville 'Bill of Rights Interpretation in the South African Context (2): Prognostic Observations' (1993) 4(2) Stellenbosch LR 199, 200-202.

[5] For a comprehensive evaluation of Southern African constitutional jurisprudence dating from this period, see LM du Plessis & JR de Ville 'Bill of Rights Interpretation in the South African Context (1): Diagnostic Observations' (1993) 4(1) Stellenbosch LR 63; LM du Plessis & JR de Ville 'Bill of Rights Interpretation in the South African Context (3): Comparative perspectives and future Prospects' (1993) 4(3) Stellenbosch LR 356.

[6] The 'TBVC states' were Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei.

[7] Schedule 1 to Proclamation R101 of 17 June 1985.

[8] See, for example, African National Congress (Border Branch) & Another v Chairman, Council of State of the Republic of Ciskei & Another 1992 (4) SA 434 (CkGD); Bongopi v Chairman of The Council of State, Ciskei & Others 1992 (3) SA 250 (CkGD); Bongopi v Chairman, Ciskei Council of State & Others 1993 (3) SA 494 (CkA).

[9] See, for example, Ex Parte Cabinet for the Interim Government of South West Africa: In Re Advisory Opinion in terms of s 19(2) of Procl R101 of 1985 (RSA) 1988 (2) SA 832 (SWA); Namibian National Students' Organisation and Others v Speaker of the National Assembly for South West Africa & Others 1990 (1) SA 617 (SWA).

understanding of the ethos of constitutionalism.[1] In Bophuthatswana, on the other hand, constitutional jurisprudence after Smith went down the road to perdition.[2] This lasted until Friedman J, in Nyamakazi v President of Bophuthatswana,[3] relying on a wide range of authorities and quoting extensively from miscellaneous sources, sought to formulate proper guidelines for 'progressive' constitutional interpretation in the South African context.

The then Appellate Division in South Africa exchanged its controversial boldness in Marwane for a wariness to face up to constitutional issues. It often avoided them on technical grounds and deprived litigants of the optimal protection of their constitutional rights. It also denied South African courts an early jump on the inevitable demands of constitutional interpretation in South Africa's post-apartheid constitutional order.[4] Within the territory of what was the Union of South Africa after 1910 and the Republic of South Africa since 1961, substantive (as opposed to formal or manner and form) judicial review of (original) legislation was not possible. With the constitutional debacle of the 1950s, manifesting in what became known as the 'Harris cases'[5] and resulting in the disenfranchisement of coloured voters, even manner and form review proved to be controversial.

Mindful of this state of affairs, a number of interpretive waymarks (recognizable as such) were included in the text of the Interim Constitution. Such provisions were ratified over the protests of senior members of the judiciary.[6] For the most part these provisions reappeared in the text of the Final Constitution.

Under the respective headings 'Rights' and 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights', FC s 7 and FC s 39 count among the more important operational provisions (read 'interpretive aids') of the Bill of Rights (Chapter 2 of the Constitution). In other words, these sections are provisions that facilitate the realization of rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights by giving, through various modes of interpretive reasoning, content, shape and direction to them — and placing limits on them.

[1] See LM du Plessis & JR de Ville 'Prognostic Observations' (supra) at 200-202 and 205-209.

[2] See Government of the Republic of Bophuthatswana v Segale 1990 (1) SA 434 (BA); Monnakale & Others v Republic of Bophuthatswana & Others 1991 (1) SA 598 (B)('Monnakale') and Lewis v Minister of Internal Affairs & Another 1991 (3) SA 628 (B)('Lewis').

[3] 1992 (4) SA 540 (BGD), 1994 (1) BCLR 92 (B).

[4] See, for example, such pre-independence Namibian cases as: Tussentydse Regering vir Suidwes-Afrika en 'n Ander v Katofa 1987 (1) SA 695 (A); Cabinet of the Transitional Government for the Territory of South West Africa v Eins 1988 (3) SA 369 (A) and Cabinet for the Territory of South West Africa v Chikane & Another 1989 (1) SA 349 (A).

[5] See Harris & Others v Dönges NO & Another 1951 (4) SA 707 (C); Harris & Others v Minister of the Interior & Another 1952 (2) SA 428 (A) ('Harris v Minister of the Interior'); Minister of the Interior & Another v Harris & Others 1952 (4) SA 769 (A) and Collins v Minister of the Interior & Another 1957 (1) SA 552 (A).

[6] The then Chief Justice, for instance, thought that it was inadvisable to lay down rules for interpretation of the Bill of Rights. Interpretation is a question of common sense based on judicial experience, he thought, and there was evidence that South African judges sitting in constitutional cases in 'other divisions' had appropriated the well-known rules for interpretation 'developed worldwide', to a point where full confidence in their ability to apply just and equitable rules of interpretation was warranted. See L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 119.

Other such operational provisions, pertaining to the Bill of Rights in particular, occur in FC s 8 (application of the Bill of Rights), FC s 36 (limitations of rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights), FC s 37 (derogations from rights in states of emergency) and (arguably also) FC s 38 (enforcement of rights). In addition, FC s 7 plays, in respect of the Bill of Rights, an anchoring, depictive and interpretive role akin to that of the founding provisions in FC s 1.[1]

FC ss 7 and 39 also have repercussions for both private law and public law. These two sections may engender transformative readings of all existing law in a manner somehow associable with the protection of the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights, and with the promotion of the constitutional values embodied in and engendered by those rights. Such readings, provided that they are duly restrained, may also call attention to the received wisdom enshrined in the existing law. As I shall later discuss in full, this constrained transformative mode of interpretation often goes by the name of 'subsidiarity' and takes full advantage of the wording of FC s 39(2).[2] That said, neither FC s 7 nor FC 39 exhausts the tools available for interpretation of the Final Constitution, in general, and the Bill of Rights in particular.

(b) Bill of Rights interpretation as depicted in (early) post-1994 constitutional jurisprudence

Pre-1994 South African constitutional law was informed mainly by the English common law and the commitment to parliamentary sovereignty. English common law and the commitment to parliamentary sovereignty sit somewhat uncomfortably with a preference for constitutional (as opposed to parliamentary) supremacy to secure democracy and to promote the ideals of the constitutional state. As long as there is accountable government and due observance of the rule of law,[3] deference to the sovereignty of Parliament, as the incarnation of the highest will of the people, is thought to be consistent with safeguarding individual rights and liberties. Of course, the real source of the problem with human rights in South Africa from 1910 to 1994 was not English common law and the commitment to parliamentary sovereignty: it was colonialism and apartheid. It was, in the first place, the century's long denial of the humanity and dignity of the majority of South Africans under white minority rule – not the absence of a supreme constitution – that must be blamed.

The precedence of legislative authority in common-law systems manifests in a wariness to entrust courts with overly extensive powers of review.[4] Statute law is,

[1] See also Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-32–10-34.

[2] See § 32.5*(b)*(iii) infra.

[3] For an insightful discussion of how the notion of the rule of law interacts with the idea of a constitutional state, see I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 10-13.

[4] See VP Sarathi The Interpretation of Statutes (3rd Edition, 1986) 2 (Claims that '[o]ne of the maxims of British jurisprudence is optima est lex minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis, optimus judex qui minimum sibi – that system of law is best which confides as little as possible to the discretion of the judge; that judge is the best, who relies as little as possible on his own opinion'.)

as a rule, drafted in detail, endeavouring to cater for as many eventualities as possible and to avoid loopholes — lest the sovereign legislature be 'misunderstood'. This style of draftsmanship,[1] characterized by long-windedness, encourages a literalist reading of statutes.

In civil-law legal systems,[2] on the other hand, the wording of enacted law (that is, all law laid down by a designated law-maker of some sort)[3] is characteristically open-ended: '[T]he expansive terms which are the universal language of constitutional texts' and which enumerate the fundamental rights of people in legal systems worldwide[4] are commensurate with the characteristically broad and indeterminate manner in which enacted precepts in civil-law systems are phrased. Adjudicators working with such expansively and indefinitely couched precepts in specific cases are expected to give concrete expression to them in accordance with a reasoned 'sense of justice'.[5]

Moving from conventional common-law 'interpretation of statutes' to fully-fledged constitutional interpretation calls for a strategic break with a default interpretive assumption, namely, that the most acceptable answers to questions of interpretation are, by and large, 'the obvious ones'. In other words, a constitutional order calls for a departure from the inclination to read the text in a strictly literal and technical manner.

A number of British jurists, in anticipation of the commencement of their country's new Human Rights Act,[6] made some rather instructive observations about the nature and effects of the repositioning mentioned above. The Human Rights Act enjoins courts to read statutes 'so far as possible' to be compatible with fundamental rights guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights. If such a reading is not possible, a court may declare legislation to be 'incompatible' with Convention rights. Thereafter, the executive may initiate and Parliament may avail itself of a fast-track procedure to pass remedial legislation.[7] Lord Irvine of Lairg who, as Lord Chancellor, played a key role in shepherding the Human Rights Act through Parliament,[8] reflected on the previously mentioned repositioning as follows:[9]

[1] See R David & JEC Brierly Major Legal Systems in the World Today (3rd Edition, 1985) 361-364 and 383-384.

[2] Civil law systems are also referred to as 'Romano-Germanic' or 'Continental' legal systems.

[3] For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts' see § 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and § 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

[4] Lord Irvine of Lairg 'Activism and Restraint: Human Rights and the Interpretative Process' (1999) 4 European Human Rights Law Review 350, 352.

[5] David & Brierly (supra) at 95-97.

[6] 1998 c 42.

[7] Sections 3, 4 and 10. See also S Grosz, J Beatson & P Duffy Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000) 28-29.

[8] See C Baker Human Rights Act 1998: A Practitioner's Guide (1998) 3-4.

[9] Lord Irvine of Lairg (supra) at 352.

> Interpretation is, at root, an exercise in textual analysis. It is, therefore, the words of a bill of rights with which judges must primarily be concerned as they seek to adjudicate in cases which engage fundamental norms. Although many eminent judges held that the judicial function entailed nothing other than this literal approach to construction, this declaratory theory long ago gave way to more open recognition that law-making – within certain limits – is an inevitable and legitimate element of the judge's role. Acceptance of this truism reveals the real nature of the interpretative process. In particular it indicates that, when construing a statutory provision, the judge may well have to choose between competing meanings by reference, for instance, to the underlying rationale of the legislative scheme.

The Human Rights Act professes to leave the sovereignty of the Westminster Parliament intact,[1] and effects an incomplete incorporation of European human rights law into domestic law.[2] The South African Final Constitution, as the fully justiciable, supreme law of the Republic, goes quite some distance further and has thereby placed issues of constitutional interpretation at the apex of discussions prominently on the agenda of legal interpretation in this country.[3]

In the early days of constitutional adjudication, South African courts (and the Constitutional Court in particular) made several attempts to depict interpretation of the Bill of Rights (Chapter 3 of the IC) as an exceptional mode of legal interpretation. Even though the Interim Constitution — like any statute law — was adopted and 'passed' by a demonstrable law-maker, the courts repeatedly emphasized that 'ordinary' statutory interpretation and rights interpretation are essentially distinct. The latter calls for a less restrictive — and thus more generous — reading in favour of those whose rights enjoy constitutional protection:[4]

> Constitutional rights conferred without express limitation should not be cut down by reading implicit restrictions into them, so as to bring them into line with the common law. [5]

Dicta from two specific foreign cases were frequently quoted in support of such a generous approach to constitutional interpretation:[6]

[1] Grosz, Beatson & Duffy (supra) at 30-33.

[2] Some eminent jurists called for full incorporation. See Lord Bingham of Cornhill 'The European Convention on Human Rights: Time to Incorporate' in R Gordon & R Wilmot-Smith (eds) Human Rights in the United Kingdom (1996) 1-11 and R Wilmot-Smith 'Incorporation and the Loss of Illusions' in R Gordon & R Wilmot-Smith (eds) Human Rights in the United Kingdom (1996) 91-98. For the different models of incorporation that were considered, see Grosz, Beatson & Duffy (supra) at 28-29.

[3] L du Plessis 'Die Sakelys vir Wetsteksvertolking en die Epog van Konstitusionalisme in Suid-Afrika' (1999) 64 Koers 223 and LM du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts. The Epoch of Constitutionalism and the Agenda for Statutory and Constitutional Interpretation in South Africa' (2000) 15(2) SA Public Law 257.

[4] See, for example, S v Gumede & Others 1998 (5) BCLR 530, 542B (D).

[5] Attorney General v Moagi 1982 (2) Botswana LR 124, 184 (Kentridge AJ).

[6] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC); 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma') at paras 14 and 15 (Kentridge AJ).

The first of these is the much-quoted passage from the judgment of Lord Wilberforce in the Privy Council in Minister of Home Affairs (Bermuda) v Fisher [1980] AC 319 (PC) ([1979] 3 All ER 21). After referring to the influence of certain international conventions on the constitutions of former colonies of the British Commonwealth, he said that these called for 'a generous interpretation … suitable to give to individuals the full measure of the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to', and that the Constitution called for 'principles of interpretation of its own'. He went on to say:

> This is in no way to say that there are no rules of law which should apply to the interpretation of a constitution. A constitution is a legal instrument giving rise, amongst other things, to individual rights capable of enforcement in a court of law. Respect must be paid to the language which has been used and to the traditions and the usages which have given meaning to that language. It is quite consistent with this, and with the recognition that rules of interpretation may apply, to take as a point of departure for the process of interpretation a recognition of the character and origin of the instrument, and to be guided by the principle of giving full recognition and effect to those fundamental rights and freedoms with a statement of which the constitution commences.[1]

In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, Dickson J said, with reference to the Canadian Charter of Rights:

> The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect. In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concept enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be … a generous rather than legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of a guarantee and the securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. …[2]
>
> Both Lord Wilberforce and Dickson J emphasised that regard must be paid to the legal history, traditions and usages of the country concerned, if the purposes of its constitution are to be fully understood.[3]

Four conclusions about the distinctive nature of rights interpretation can be drawn from the above quotations. First, rights interpretation is essentially distinct from conventional statutory interpretation because it is overtly value-laden.[4]

[1] See S v Marwane 1982 (3) SA 717, 748–9 (A). See also Minister of Defence, Namibia v Mwandinghi 1992 (2) SA 355, 362 (NmS).

[2] (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 321, 395-6, 18 CCC (3d) 385.

[3] Zuma (supra) at para 15.

[4] See Matiso & Others v The Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others 1994 (3) SA 592, 597B-597H (SE), 1994 (3) BCLR 80, 87B-87H (SE)('Matiso'). Froneman J wrote:

> In a constitutional system based on parliamentary sovereignty it makes good sense to start from the premise of seeking 'the intention of the Legislature' in statutory interpretation, because the interpreting Judge's value judgment of the content of the statute is, theoretically at least, irrelevant. As long as the Legislature remains civilised and is broadly representative of the population of the country, the system should work satisfactorily …

Second, it requires judicial exponents of constitutional rights to pass value judgments on a text couched in inclusive and open-ended language. From a common-law point of view this means investing the judiciary with law-making authority that depart from systems committed to parliamentary sovereignty.[1] Third, rights interpretation is thought of as characteristically purposive. The notion of 'purposive (constitutional) interpretation' will be dealt with more fully at a later stage.[2] Finally, (purposive) rights interpretation is generous (or 'liberal') in that it seeks to optimise safeguards against interference with constitutionally entrenched rights.

Constitutional interpretation is, however, not unrestrained. The following cautionary note sounded by Kentridge JA in S v Zuma & Others has been the met with considerable support within the judiciary:[3]

> While we must always be conscious of the values underlying the Constitution, it is nonetheless our task to interpret a written instrument. I am well aware of the fallacy of supposing that general language must have a single 'objective' meaning. Nor is it easy to avoid the influence of one's personal intellectual and moral preconceptions. But it cannot be too strongly stressed that the Constitution does not mean whatever we might wish it to mean . . .

The interpretative notion of ascertaining 'the intention of the Legislature' does not apply in a system of judicial review based on the supremacy of the Constitution, for the simple reason that the Constitution is sovereign and not the Legislature. This means that both the purpose and method of statutory interpretation in our law should be different from what it was before the commencement of the Constitution on 27 April 1994. The purpose now is to test legislation and administrative action against the values and principles imposed by the Constitution. This purpose necessarily has an impact on the manner in which both the Constitution itself and a particular piece of legislation said to be in conflict with it should be interpreted. The interpretation of the Constitution will be directed at ascertaining the foundational values inherent in the Constitution, whilst the interpretation of the particular legislation will be directed at ascertaining whether that legislation is capable of an interpretation which conforms with the fundamental values or principles of the Constitution. Constitutional interpretation in this sense is thus primarily concerned with the recognition and application of constitutional values and not with a search to find the literal meaning of statutes.

Froneman J's observations on the role of the 'intention of the legislature' in statutory interpretation are untenable in the light of contemporary insights into the nature of legal interpretation associated with the 'linguistic turn'. See § 32.3*(b)*(ii) infra.

[1] See Matiso (supra) at 597I-598B:

> The values and principles contained in the Constitution are, and could only be, formulated and expressed in wide and general terms, because they are to be of general application. In terms of the Constitution the Courts bear the responsibility of giving specific content to those values and principles in any given situation. In doing so, Judges will invariably 'create' law. For those steeped in the tradition of parliamentary sovereignty, the notion of Judges creating law, and not merely interpreting and applying the law, is an uncomfortable one. Whether that traditional view was ever correct is debatable, but the danger exists that it will inhibit Judges from doing what they are called upon to do in terms of the Constitution. This does not mean that Judges should now suddenly enter into an orgy of judicial law-making, but that they should recognise that their function of judicial review, based on the supremacy of the Constitution, should not be hidden under the guise of simply seeking and giving expression to the will of the majority in Parliament. Judicial review has a different function, but it is still subject to important constraints. And recognition of those constraints is the best guarantee or shield against criticism that such a system of judicial review is essentially undemocratic.

[2] See § 32.3*(a)*(v), (b)(iii) and (c)(iii) infra.

[3] See § 32.3*(a)*(i) infra.

> [E]ven a constitution is a legal instrument, the language of which must be respected. If the language used by the lawgiver is ignored in favour of a general resort to 'values' the result is not interpretation but divination … I would say that a constitution 'embodying fundamental rights should as far as its language permits be given a broad construction'.[1]

In S v Gumede & Others Magid J recognised that FC s 39(1)(a) particularly requires 'a liberal interpretation' of the Bill of Rights, but does not:

> permit or encourage courts to ignore the actual language used in the Constitution. If it were felt that the rights of detained persons should be extended, this should be achieved by means of legislative action and not by means of judicial activism, or by interpretation which read words into provisions which were not there or excised words which were.[2]

The assumption that language as such could restrain an over-generous reading of provisions entrenching rights is controversial. Magid J therefore quite rightly deployed separation of powers (or trias politica) considerations as means of judicial restraint. Similarly, Froneman J in Matiso & Others v The Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others, warned that judges should not 'enter into an orgy of judicial law-making' and that '[j]udicial review … is … subject to important constraints', the recognition of which 'is the best guarantee or shield against criticism that … a system of judicial review is essentially undemocratic'. [3]

(c) Rights interpretation and/as constitutional interpretation

In Kalla v The Master,[4] Van Dijkhorst J maintained that 'obviously' the construction of clauses of the Bill of Rights 'which set out broad principles' had to take place 'in the spirit of the Constitution': however, such broad principles would 'surely' be unnecessary when a constitutional provision providing for Bloemfontein as the seat of the Appellate Division[5] had to be construed. His suggestion that value-laden Bill of Rights interpretation and the interpretation of the other (especially more technical and mundane) provisions of the Constitution are largely dissimilar draws too definite and superficial a distinction. First, quite a number of the non-Bill of Rights provisions of the Final Constitution are designed to have an immediate 'value impact' and they obviously animate 'the spirit of the Constitution'. One only need review the founding provisions in FC ss 1 to 6 (Chapter 1), FC ss 40 and 41 (Chapter 3) on co-operative government, FC s 59 on public access to and involvement in law-making by the National Assembly, FC s 165 on judicial independence, FC s 195 on the basic values and principles governing public administration, and FC s 237 on the diligent performance of obligations to see that 'broad principles' are required for their construction.

[1] Zuma (supra) at paras 17 and 18.
[2] 1998 (5) BCLR 530, 542A-C (D).
[3] Matiso (supra) at 598A-B.
[4] 1995 (1) SA 261, 268G (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79, 87C (T).
[5] See IC s 106(1). The 'Appellate Division' referred to in that section is presently the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Second, even seemingly technical, merely formal (or mundane) provisions of the Final Constitution often make significant value or policy statements when considered in context and read purposively. The constitutional definition of 'organ of state' in FC s 239, for instance, excludes 'a court or a judicial officer'. It thereby affirms the democratic value of judicial independence in atypical value language, and supplements and supports the more conspicuously value-couched provisions on judicial independence in, for instance, sub-ss (2) to (4) of FC s 165.[1] It is indeed hard to conceive of any constitutional provisions (even the most technical ones) in a vacuum of value-neutrality and devoid of 'the spirit of the Constitution'.

The place name 'Bloemfontein' in the Interim Constitution, at any rate, referred not just to a city (and the district in which it is situated), but also to the political compromise made manifest in 1909 in the then South Africa Act,[2] the first Constitution of the Union of South Africa. This political decision — plagued by controversy[3] — meant that while Bloemfontein would be the judicial capital of the Union of South Africa, Cape Town and Pretoria would operate as the legislative and administrative capitals respectively. 'Bloemfontein' in any successor to the South Africa Act — even one as distant in time as the Interim Constitution — would never be just a 'spiritless' or value-neutral indication of locality, but also a reminder, in the (continuing) spirit of the 1909 Constitution, that politics (and, in negotiating the Interim Constitution, transitional politics in particular) largely determined the designation of a seat for (what used to be) South Africa's highest court. By the same token the omission of 'Bloemfontein' from the text of the Final Constitution is more than just a formal or 'technical' oversight or non-action: it is a decided and measured silence.

The following is another example of how and why the construction of 'technical' or 'formal' constitutional provisions require the deployment of constitutional values and objectives.[4] FC s 46(1) provides that the National Assembly consists of no fewer than 350 and no more than 400 men and women. Presumably, a National Assembly consisting of 360 men only (or 360 women only) will not meet this requirement because this legislative body must consist of men and women. However, in the light of the Final Constitution's overwhelming insistence on gender equality, a national assembly consisting of, for example, 355 men and 5 women will probably also be 'unconstitutional'. To take it further: if members of

[1] FC s 165(2) to (4) reads as follows:

(2) The courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice.

(3) No person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts.

(4) Organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the courts to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.

See also § 32.4*(c)*(ii) infra.

[2] 9 Edward VII, Ch 9.

[3] See HR Hahlo & E Kahn The Union of South Africa: The Development of its Laws and Constitution (1960) 249-251.

[4] See L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 146-147.

the National Assembly resign or are killed in an accident, and their numbers drop to below 350, will the remaining members still constitute 'the National Assembly' — at least for the time being? And does it make a difference whether the numbers have dropped below the minimum due to resignations or due to an accident? These questions can be resolved, but they will have to be addressed contextually and purposively, that is, with reference to where and how they fit into the scheme of the Final Constitution as a whole, and with further reference to the constitutional objectives they seek to achieve and the values they were designed to promote. No algorithm provides an easy answer to any of the previous questions.

No South African court has as yet said, in so many words, that the interpretation of the Bill of Rights and the interpretation of non-Bill of Rights provisions of the Final Constitution are in fact inextricably connected. But some courts have suggested that the general approach to Bill of Rights interpretation is very much the same as the approach to the interpretation of other parts of the Final Constitution. The notion of 'purposive interpretation/construction' has been relied on to make the link. In the minority judgment in S v Mhlungu & Others[1] Kentridge AJ, for instance, said that a purposive construction of IC s 241(8) — requiring proceedings that were pending immediately before the commencement of that Constitution to be dealt with 'as if this Constitution had not been passed' — would be appropriate given the 'fundamental concerns of the Constitution' and its 'spirit and tenor'. In a similar vein, the Constitutional Court, in two later judgments, contended for a purposive interpretation of the functional areas of provincial legislative competence (in Schedules 4 and 5 of the Constitution) so as to 'enable the national Parliament and the provincial legislatures to exercise their respective legislative powers fully and effectively'.[2]

Finally, in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, one of the Constitutional Court's earliest landmark judgments, the Court insisted that an important objective of constitutional interpretation is to establish respect for the supremacy of the Constitution.[3] This means that courts with the necessary jurisdiction must always to live up to their duty to 'test' legislation and executive action for consistency with the Constitution, and to declare law and conduct not passing muster invalid.

Is there a need to distinguish between Bill of Rights interpretation and interpretation of the rest of the Constitution? Certainly not, if such a distinction suggests that the 'broad principles' of the Bill of Rights have to be interpreted

[1] 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 63.

[2] See Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 17. See also Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC) at para 32.

[3] 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 100. For an appreciative evaluation of this judgment, see H Klug 'Introducing the Devil: An Institutional Analysis of the Power of Constitutional Review' (1997) 13 South African Journal on Human Rights 185.

'in the spirit of the Constitution', but other constitutional provisions do not.[1] However, Bill of Rights interpretation is mostly (though not invariably) rights interpretation that 'takes the rights and freedoms [entrenched in the Bill of Rights], and the general rules derived from them, as … [a] point of departure for determining whether law or conduct is invalid'.[2] The interpretation of provisions in the rest of the Final Constitution is norm interpretation. The outcome of both rights interpretation and norm interpretation is normative (regulatory, prescriptive). However, their starting points differ: the former starts with rights and derives particular, concrete norms from them; the latter starts with a general norm that is then concretized. Because these two forms of interpretation are so similar in outcome, the general distinction between them must be treated with circumspection, and one must remain mindful of three things.

First, there are provisions in the Bill of Rights that do not entrench rights and therefore do not lend themselves to rights interpretation. The conditions for and procedures that must be observed during a state of emergency as set out in FC s 37 (excluding FC s 37(5) — see below), for instance, call for norm interpretation, and so does FC s 39(2), for it requires, without any specific reference to entrenched rights, judicial interpretation of existing statute, common and customary law to promote certain designated values. Subsections (1) and (3) of FC s 39 are not in the same category: they stipulate how rights ought to be construed and are therefore operational provisions, normative in nature, that facilitate the realization of Chapter 2 rights, and give content, shape and direction to them. Other normative Bill of Rights provisions set standards for rights interpretation (and were previously also identified as operational provisions): the limitations clause (FC s 36), the application clause (FC s 8), FC s 37(5) that deals with derogations from rights during a state of emergency (and is therefore a provision akin to FC s 36) and the enforcement clause (FC s 38).

Second, rights interpretation and norm interpretation, though decidedly different in kind, can be mutually supportive. Rights can be protected effectively — and conditions conducive to their protection can be created and enhanced — by giving effect to constitutional norms that are not part of the Bill of Rights. Meaningful protection and enforcement of rights will, for instance, not be possible if the FC s 165 provisions dealing with the independence of the judiciary or the FC s 171 provisions granting the courts certain powers in constitutional matters are not properly construed and duly observed. The political rights entrenched in FC s 19 (which forms part of the Bill of Rights) will also ring hollow in the absence of elections actually held and conducted in accordance with properly construed constitutional norms dealing with such elections (for instance, FC ss 46, 105, 157 and Schedule 3).

[1] See Kalla v The Master 1995 (1) SA 261, 268G (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79, 87C (T).
[2] S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 South African Law Journal 762, 769.

Finally, rights interpretation is not more value-laden or value-driven than norm interpretation. Both forms of interpretation instantiate constitutional interpretation which, in its turn, instantiates (and requires) the realization of constitutional values and an understanding and implementation of the Final Constitution that best promotes such values through efficient and accountable government. Certain provisions in the Final Constitution, both in the Bill of Rights and the rest of the Constitution, articulate values in an 'objective' (norm-like as opposed to a rights-like) manner. Such provisions are mostly to be found among the interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text that will be discussed at a later stage.[1] In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another,[2] the Constitutional Court contended that:

> [o]ur Constitution is not merely a formal document regulating public power. It also embodies, like the German Constitution, an objective, normative value system.

This phrase — fraught as it is – means that Bill of Rights provisions enshrining fundamental rights do not only safeguard those rights as individual, subjective rights, but also embody an objective value system applicable to all areas of the law and serving as a guiding principle and stimulus for the legislature, executive and judiciary.[3]

FC s 39(2) is a similar guiding principle designed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights when interpreting existing law. But is there then still any point in distinguishing between (subjective) rights interpretation and (objective) norm interpretation? A majority of the Constitutional Court in Barkhuizen v Napier[4] seemingly thought that there is not. The Court was called upon to test a time limitation clause in a short-term insurance policy against an insured claimant's fundamental right of access to court, entrenched in FC s 34. The impugned clause prevented the claimant from instituting legal action if summons was not served on the insurance company within the time limit set out in the clause. The majority of the court preferred not to go the rights route. Instead, by appealing to FC s 39(2), it determined the constitutionality of the impugned clause with reference to public policy informed with constitutional values (including the values in the Bill of Rights).[5]

Stu Woolman objects to such an approach because, in his view, the Bill of Rights and rights interpretation appear to vanish from the scene of constitutional interpretation.[6] He suggests that this troubling approach seems to have become a

[1] See § 32.4*(c)*(i) infra.

[2] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele') at para 54 confirming a dictum to a similar effect in Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('De Klerk') at para 94.

[3] See BVerfGE 39, 1 ('First Abortion Decision') 41.

[4] 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 30.

[6] See Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (supra) at 762.

trend in some recent majority judgments of the Constitutional Court.[1] Rights interpretation, according to Woolman, is the correct approach when law or conduct is challenged on the basis that it infringes a fundamental right or rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights, and norm interpretation à la FC s 39(2) may be resorted to if rights interpretation proves to be incapable of rendering a viable result. FC s 39(2) at any rate requires norm interpretation as a constant reminder to judicial interpreters of the Final Constitution that all law must be brought in line with the spirit, purport and objects of (and thereby the objective, normative value system embodied in) the Bill of Rights.[2] Woolman's observations confirm that rights interpretation and FC s 39(2) norm interpretation are two distinct interpretive procedures: each occupies its own rightful place in constitutional interpretation.[3]

(d) The scope of constitutional interpretation

What is a constitution? And what does its interpretation entail? Much has been (and will still be) written about these two questions. However, mindful of the nature and structure of the collective work of which this chapter forms part, these vexed questions will be answered provisionally, for the time being, not so much taking account of all the topics that may possibly be included in a treatise on constitutional interpretation, but rather accounting for the exclusion from the limited account in this chapter of some eminently possible (and relevant) topics. Both questions posed above are decidedly philosophical, and some of the theoretical concerns involved in dealing with them will be considered in due course.[4]

Two texts from classical antiquity, one probably by Aristotle (384–322BC) or a student of his, and the other attributed to Xenophon (ca. 431–355 BC) (but not by him), are both entitled Athenaion Politeia: The Constitution of the Athenians or The Athenian Constitution.[5] Classicists cannot agree on any one English word or phrase adequately rendering 'politeia'. 'Republic', 'polity', 'system of government', 'state organisation', 'form of government' and even 'régime' are all regarded as candidates — each with its own merits and demerits — and then of course 'constitution' is considered to be quite a feasible option too. 'Constitution' as 'politeia' (translated into English) is not just a written document, authored and carried into

[1] See Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (supra) at 762 (Woolman shows how in NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC) and Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions & Others 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya') a similar approach was adopted.)

[2] Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (supra) at 769. See also Carmichele (supra) at para 54 and Thebus & Another v S 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC).

[3] Woolman traces the Constitutional Court's failure to recognize and to maintain this distinction and to afford rights interpretation its rightful place — at least in the cases he discusses — to an unwillingness to apply the Bill of Rights directly to relationships between private ('non-state') actors. This matter will be returned to later. See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(dd) infra.

[4] See § 32.3*(b)(ii)* infra.

[5] See, for example, Aristotle The Athenian Constitution (1984).

effect by duly designated constitution-makers, and embodying a nation's binding memorandum of understanding — a 'linguistic datum',[1] in other words — but also includes 'the constitutional dispensation', as it has become known in South African constitutional vocabulary.[2]

However, the default and dominant mindset among both jurists and lay citizens in South Africa (and probably in most countries with a written constitution as highest law) is to associate the signifier 'constitution' — especially when verbalized unreflectively — with a linguistic datum manifesting as a document in writing. On the other hand, in a jurisdiction like the United Kingdom, whose constitution is not embodied in a single written document, but is spread over a large number of Acts of Parliament and 'constitutional conventions',[3] constitution and constitutional dispensation are probably more readily equatable and interchangeable.

The Final Constitution as a written document is clearly a part of the contemporary South African constitutional psyche. The concreteness of the linguistic datum is a tangible, 'readable' reminder of the respect owed to the supremacy of the Final Constitution, as antidote to potential emasculations of constitutional democracy and its institutions.[4] In expositions of constitutional interpretation (such as this chapter) the 'constitutional document' may serve as a lookout onto, an access into and an orientation unto whoever explores the politeia.

The Constitution-in-writing is frequently referred to as 'the constitutional text'.[5] However, this turn of phrase may nowadays be confusing due to the many meanings and meaning possibilities that the word 'text' has acquired in postmodern (and, in particular, poststructuralist) discourse on language, meaning and interpretation. The implications of this development for legal and constitutional interpretation will be considered in due course,[6] and until then any reference to the Constitution as 'text' without further ado will be deferred. The Constitution as linguistic datum will mostly be called 'the Constitution-in-writing', 'the written Constitution' or 'the written constitutional text'.

[1] See F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (1999) 10 Stellenbosch Law Review 269, 269. See also § 32.3(e)(ii)(aa) infra.

[2] For the implications of a broad conception of 'constitution' for constitutional interpretation, see WF Murphy, JE Fleming & SA Barber American Constitutional Interpretation (2nd Edition, 1995) Chapters 1, 5 and 6.

[3] D McClean 'United Kingdom' in G Robbers (ed) Encyclopedia of World Constitutions Volume III (2007) 972, 972.

[4] In this chapter 'constitutional democracy' is used in the same sense as described in T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 10-18–10-22.

[5] Telling examples of such a usage occur in the Constitutional Court's two 'certification judgments: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, In re: Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgement'); Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, In re: Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Second Certification Judgement').

[6] See § 32.3*(b)*(ii) and (iv) infra.

Together with a high esteem for the Constitution-in-writing and its pivotal positioning in a democratic constitutional dispensation, crucial caveats need to be observed. Most important among these warnings is that one ought not to invest the Constitution as linguistic datum with a degree of autonomy sufficient to isolate and, indeed, declare it independent from the politeia: separation of the written Constitution and the constitutional dispensation is simply unacceptable! It is a looming pitfall, though, given the fact that conventional approaches to statutory interpretation[1] (which have had an impact on constitutional interpretation too) are premised on the assumption that the interpretation of a statute or statutory provision essentially entails a retrieval or exhumation of meaning — intended and encoded by its law-making author — from the instrument. This belief entails that a provision to be construed has an appreciably independent life of its own, and that a knowledgeable interpreter who heeds the rules of the particular genre of encoding will retrieve from the written provision (and from it alone) the meaning intended by its author. This is then regarded as the 'best' or 'most correct' meaning of the provision in question. Various objections to this key tenet of conventional statutory interpretation will be considered below.[2] However, it is enough for now to point out that the notion of an enacted instrument[3] as bearer of meaning implies that it is by and large autonomous in passing on that meaning. This implication, in turn, kindles the belief that the role of the instrument as conveyer of meaning may be considered in isolation from the sometimes messy 'environment' in which it obtains. If such a bearer and conveyor of meaning is also 'the supreme law of the Republic',[4] it becomes difficult to resist the temptation of placing it on a pedestal somewhere above (and removed from) the day-to-day activities of the 'constitutional dispensation'. One way of countering — or at least minimizing the effects of — such a separationist move is to uphold 'constitution' in its classical signification, thereby contending that a constitution-in-writing is meaningless in isolation from the politeia. This move entails, among other things, the presentation and the development of cogent arguments for contextual interpretation — an interpretive strategy that features prominently in this chapter.[5]

Conventional approaches to statutory interpretation also underwrite rather thin conceptions of 'constitutional interpretation' — they assume the possibility of observance and application of predetermined canons of construction to retrieve meaning from the (autonomous) written Constitution.[6] The theoretical tenability

[1] See § 32.3*(a)-(b)* infra.

[2] See § 32.3*(b)*(i)-(iii) infra.

[3] For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts', see §§ 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

[4] FC s 2.

[5] See §§ 32.3*(a)*(iv), (b)(ii) and (e) and § 32.5*(c)*(ii) infra.

[6] For a crude articulation of this notion, see Government of the Republic of Bophuthatswana v Segale 1990 (1) SA 434, 448F-G (BA)(Galgut AJA):

> The task of the courts is to ascertain from the words of the statute in the context thereof what the intention of the legislature is. If the wording of the statute is clear and unambiguous they state what the intention is. It is not for the courts to invent fancied ambiguities and usurp the functions of the legislature.

of this idea will be challenged more fully when dealing with the unity of interpretation and application (and the notion of interpretation as concretization).[1] At this stage, it is enough to note that on the broad understanding of constitutional and Bill of Rights interpretation contended for in this chapter, what were previously referred to as 'operational provisions' of the Bill of Rights[2] form part of the arsenal of means and strategies of constitutional interpretation and could therefore quite appropriately have been dealt with under the heading constitutional and/or Bill of Rights interpretation. Constitutional interpretation indeed has everything to do with the realization of constitutional provisions — and in particular Bill of Rights provisions in which rights are guaranteed — by giving them content, shape and direction. However, issues regarding the application of the Bill of Rights,[3] limitations of rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights,[4] derogations from rights in states of emergency,[5] and the enforcement of rights[6] are sufficiently specialized, complex and wide ranging also to warrant their treatment in separate chapters.

Constitutional interpretation is about employing generally applicable principles, procedures and strategies to read and apply the Constitution, starting with and centred on the Constitution-in-writing. However, especially in the context of Bill of Rights interpretation, specialist readings of the various provisions entrenching different rights are also required. Rights differ in nature because they refer to dissimilar interests and entitlements. For the interpretation of certain rights, unique principles, procedures and reading strategies may apply, or general principles, procedures and strategies may have to be invoked in special ways. In principle the various manifestations of specialized rights interpretation do belong under the heading of constitutional interpretation. However, this treatise is sufficiently broad enough in scope — 76 chapters — to allow for the analysis of different rights in discrete chapters.

It is debatable whether interpretive procedures and strategies for the interpretation of existing statute and common law, but necessitated by the exigencies of construing existing law subject to the supreme Constitution, could be referred to as procedures and strategies of constitutional interpretation. Reading in conformity with the Constitution (sometimes also referred to as 'reading down' or 'the

[1] See § 32.3*(b)(ii) and § 32.3(d)* infra.

[2] See § 32.1(a) and also § 32.1*(c)* supra.

[3] FC s 8. See also S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[4] FC s 36. See also S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[5] FC s 37. See also N Fritz 'States of Emergency in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 61.

[6] FC s 38. See also A Friedman & J Brickhill 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59; M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9. presumption of constitutionality') is a telling example of such a procedure.[1] It probably does not really matter whether, strictly speaking, such procedures may appropriately be described as 'constitutional interpretation': they must at any rate be discussed in a chapter on constitutional interpretation.

FC ss 7 and 39 — quoted at the beginning of this chapter — certainly fall squarely within the scope of constitutional (and, in particular, Bill of Rights) interpretation. But they are not primarily what constitutional interpretation is all about. With the exception of FC s 39(2) (and perhaps FC s 39(1)(b) and (c)), FC ss 7 and 39 have to date not been thoroughly and systematically analyzed in the constitutional case law. They have been relied on, instead, as ad hoc rhetorical stratagems.[2] The role of FC ss 7 and 39(1)(a) and (3) as sources of interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text will be considered together with sources of other such waymarks below.[3] The focus will be on the courts' articulation of how they understand these sections and the possibility of a comprehensive and coherent ('model') construction of them. FC s 39(2) will feature in several 'capacities' in this chapter, but especially as a source of a new canon of statutory interpretation[4] and as part of the subsidiarity landscape.[5] FC s 39(1)(b) and (c) will be dealt with under the heading of comparative interpretation (or transnational contextualization) towards the end of this chapter.[6]

(e) The mechanics of rights analysis

As a general matter, the Bill of Rights offers two different ways in which to undertake rights analysis: direct application and interpretation (and potentially limitation) of a specific substantive right and indirect application of the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights to the legal dispute that confronts a court. Although I shall make the case that subsidiarity — a particular form of indirect application — is often to be preferred to direct application, it is important to know how each form of interpretation operates.

[1] See § 32.5*(b)*(ii) infra.

[2] The absence of thorough and systematic analyses of FC sections 7 and 39 is a definite shortcoming in our constitutional jurisprudence. But I do not mean to suggest that reliance on rhetorical stratagems in constitutional interpretation and jurisprudence is impermissible. It is in fact unavoidable. See WJ Witteveen De Retoriek in het Recht: Over Retorika en Interpretatie, Staatsrecht en Demokratie (1988) 149; Du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts' (supra) at 282-283.

[3] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(cc) and (ff) infra.

[4] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) infra.

[5] See § 32.5(b)(iii)(bb) infra.

[6] See § 32.5*(c)*(v) infra.

(i) Direct application and interpretation of a specific substantive right

As Woolman and Botha write:

> As a general matter, constitutional analysis under a specific substantive provision in the Bill of Rights takes place in two stages. First, the applicant must demonstrate that the exercise of a fundamental right has been impaired, infringed, or, to use the Final Constitution's term of art, limited. This demonstration itself has several parts. To begin with, the applicant must show that the conduct or the status for which she seeks constitutional protection is a form of conduct or status that falls within the ambit of a particular constitutional right. If she is able to show that the conduct or the status for which she seeks protection falls within the value-determined ambit of the right, then she must show, in addition, that the law or the conduct she seeks to challenge impedes or limits the exercise of the protected activity. If the court finds that a challenged law infringes the exercise of the fundamental right, the analysis may move to a second stage. In this second stage of analysis, the party that would benefit from upholding the limitation will attempt to demonstrate that the infringement of a fundamental right is justifiable. This second stage of analysis occurs, generally speaking, not within the context of the fundamental right or freedom, but within the limitation clause.[1]

Woolman in his chapter on 'Application' and Woolman and Botha in their chapter on 'Limitations' provide fuller, more nuanced accounts of the stages of — and justifications for – direct application and interpretation of a specific substantive right that need not be rehearsed here.[2]

(ii) Subsidiarity and indirect application as preferred modes of interpretation

On one account, indirect application must occur where no specific substantive right applies directly to a specific dispute, but the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights requires a court to view or to interpret the law — and potentially remake the law — in light the general values which animate FC Chapter 2 and the Final Constitution as a whole. But the commitment to subsidiarity means that we look at such matters somewhat differently. As I shall contend at greater length below, a host of good reasons exist for using existing bodies of non-constitutional law — be they statute, common law or customary — to adjudicate disputes before we turn to specific provisions of the supreme law for relief. That said, subsidiarity is not to be confused with avoidance. For when one relies on non-constitutional law as the source of relief, one still invites constitutional interpretation. That invitation extends primarily to recasting — where necessary — non-constitutional forms of law in light of constitutional desiderata. Subsidiarity — so understood — draws simultaneously upon the richness and depth of existing bodies of law while recognizing that our basic law — the Final Constitution — is the 'text' from which all other law derives its power.

[1] Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at 34–3–34-6.
[2] See also Woolman 'Application' (supra) 31-1–31-136.

32.2 Interpreters of the Constitution

According to The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary one of the meanings of 'interpreter' is '[a] person who interprets laws, texts, etc., in an official capacity'. [1] Peter Häberle contends that a constitution is a 'public process' (öffentlicher Prozeß) in the interpretation of which an open society (offene Gesellschaft) participates.[2] 'Offen' means 'open' as well as 'public' and indicates the space for the concrete realization of the Constitution not only within the sphere of authority of the state, but in civil society too:[3]

> All organs of state, all public powers and all citizens and groups are potentially involved in the processes of constitutional interpretation. There is no fixed number of constitutional interpreters![4]

The South African Constitution proclaims its own supremacy as follows:

> The Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it, is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.[5]

All those who are obliged by and who somehow benefit from this statement of supremacy — not only (or even primarily) the courts of law (with the Constitutional Court at the helm) — are authorized readers and therefore interpreters of the Constitution. Other organs of state, organs of civil society, citizens and other individuals under the authority (and protection) of the South African state are equally important interpreters of the basic law. This contention is commensurate with the doctrine of shared constitutional interpretation,[6] which, properly

[1] The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on CD-ROM (5th Edition Version 2.0, 2002).

[2] P Häberle Verfassung als Öffentlicher Prozeß: Materialen zu einer Verfassungstheorie der Offenen Gesellschaft (1978) 155.

[3] See LM du Plessis 'Legal Academics and the Open Community of Constitutional Interpreters' (1996) 12 South African Journal on Human Rights 214, 215.

[4] P Häberle (supra) at 156 (present author's translation):

> In die Prozesse der *Verfassungs*interpretation sind potentiell alle Staatsorgane, alle öffentliche Potenzen, alle Bürger und Gruppen eingeschaltet. Es gibt keinen numerus clausus der Verfassungsinterpreten!

He continues:

> Constitutional interpretation has up to now, consciously and with but a scant sense of reality, too much been made into a matter for a 'closed, guild-like community' of juristic interpreters of the Constitution and for formal participants in the constitutional process. In reality it is much more a matter for an open community (in other words all public powers in so far as they are material participants) because constitutional interpretation always co-constitutes this open community anew and is itself constituted by it. Its criteria are as open as the community is pluralistic.

[Verfassungsinterpretation ist *bewußtsein*smäßig, weniger realiter, bislang viel zu sehr Sache einer geschlossenen Gesellschaft: der 'zunftmäßigen' juristischen Verfassungsinterpreten und der am Verfassungsprozeß formell Beteiligten. Sie ist in Wirklichkeit weit mehr Sache einer offenen Gesellschaft, d.h. aller — insoweit materiell beteiligten — öffentliche Potenzen, weil Verfassungsinterpretation diese offene Gesellschaft immer von neuem mitkonstituiert und von ihr konstituiert wird. Ihre Kriterien sind so offen, wie die Gesellschaft pluralistisch ist.]

[5] FC s 2.

[6] For a discussion of the doctrine of shared constitutional interpretation, see Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at 34-7–34-8. See also Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31–90.

understood, also recognizes authorized readers of the Final Constitution that fall outside our expressly political domain.[1] The following important interpreters contribute to and enrich the open process of constitutional interpretation in the politeia:[2]

(a) Constitution-makers

Proximity in time to a major constitution-making process has made South African constitutional scholars privy to how original authors of a constitutional text cultivate their own confident (though by no means unanimous) understandings of what their 'creation' says — and will say, according to them, in time to come. Authorial interpretations of a written constitution-in-the-making may come from those actually drafting and writing it (a technical committee of experts, for instance), from authorized constitution-makers debating the draft (in committees or bilateral discussions or plenary deliberations, for instance) and from members of the deliberative body (a constitutional assembly, for instance) that eventually have to agree to and pass the written text. Interpretations of a constitution in the course of deliberations preceding its adoption are significant because these interpretations anticipate possible meanings that can be attributed to constitutional provisions. This results in specific formulations and preference for certain inclusions in (and exclusions from) the written constitutional text — formulations and preferences most often negotiated by the constitution-makers among themselves. Traditionally, preceding deliberations were not regarded as sources readily available to aid the subsequent interpretation of any enacted text.[3] However, the Constitutional Court in S v Makwanyane & Another[4] (per Chaskalson P) held that '[b]ackground evidence may … be useful to show why particular provisions were or were not included in the Constitution'.[5]

The process agreed on for the adoption of the Final Constitution furthermore yielded an interpretive aid of considerable significance. According to IC s 71, the Final Constitution could come into effect only after the Constitutional Court had certified that the proposed text complied with the 34 Constitutional Principles agreed on by the multi-party negotiators responsible for drafting the Interim Constitution.[6] There were two Certification Judgments. The Constitutional Court referred the first text submitted for certification back to the Constitutional

[1] See S Woolman The Selfless Constitution: Experimentation and Flourishing as the Foundations of South Africa's Basic Law (2009).

[2] For the meaning of 'politeia', see § 32.1*(d)* supra.

[3] LM du Plessis The Interpretation of Statutes (1986) 133-134. For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts' see §§ 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

[4] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 19.

[5] For reliance on travaux préparatoires in constitutional interpretation, see § 32.5*(c)*(iv) infra.

[6] These principles were included in Schedule 4 to the Interim Constitution.

Assembly after holding, in First Certification Judgment that the text did not comply, in 9 discrete respects, with the 34 Constitutional Principles. In the Second Certification Judgment the Court thereafter certified a text that met and satisfied its initial objections.

In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that where one of the permissible meanings of a particular provision of the new text did comply with the Constitutional Principles, but another did not, it would 'adopt the interpretation that gives to the new constitutional text a construction that would make it consistent with the Constitutional Principles'.[1] The First Certification Judgment Court explained the further significance of this reading strategy for the interpretation of the Final Constitution as follows:

> Such an approach has one important consequence. Certification based on a particular interpretation carries with it the implication that if the alternative construction were correct the certification by the Court in terms of [the interim Constitution] s 71 might have been withheld. In the result, a future Court should approach the meaning of the relevant provision of the [new constitutional text] on the basis that the meaning assigned to it by the Constitutional Court in the certification process is its correct interpretation and should not be departed from save in the most compelling circumstances. [2]

(b) Courts

South Africa's Constitution was meant to be justiciable, and was, indeed, required in terms of the Constitutional Principles to be justiciable.[3] The constitutional text therefore, in several ways, waymarks the exercise of a judicial testing right that derives from and crucially depends upon the supremacy of the Final Constitution. FC s 1*(b)* proclaims the '[s]upremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law' to be among the values on which the Republic of South Africa as 'one, sovereign, democratic state' is founded. FC s 172 deals with the powers of courts in constitutional matters and enjoins a 'court deciding a constitutional matter within its powers' to 'declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency' ('a court … must declare …' — emphasis added).[4] To this end, FC s 165 Constitution vouchsafes the independence of the judiciary. FC s 165(2) states: '[t]he courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice'. FC s 165(5) makes '[a]n order or decision issued by a court' binding on 'all persons to whom and organs of state to which it applies'.

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 42. See also Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (1) SA 997, 1033C–G (C).

[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 43.

[3] See, in particular, Constitutional Principles I and IV in Schedule 4 to the Interim Constitution. See also § 32.1*(a)* supra.

[4] FC s 172(1)(a). FC ss 167(3)-(7), 168(3), 169(a) and (by implication) 170 indicate the extent to which constitutional matters are within the powers of the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal, High Courts and magistrates' courts respectively.

Issues of constitutional interpretation that come before courts are pronounced upon in a conventionally judicial manner, both in terms of style and consequence. Stare decisis, as conventionally understood in the case law, has moreover also been preached and practised in our constitutional jurisprudence since 1994.[1] A court judgment is meant to end a particular dispute, but its ratio decidendi may also, in cases to come, provide binding, 'model' answers to general or specific questions of constitutional interpretation. The authority of a particular court's answers will largely depend on its ranking in the stare decisis hierarchy. A Constitutional Court judgment on an issue of constitutional interpretation can, for instance, wield considerable authority — both as an exercise of consequential constitutional power at a particular time, and as a binding precedent in time to come. But this still does not mean that courts, with the Constitutional Court at the pinnacle, are the only de facto, competent and authentic interpreters of the Constitution. Non-judicial interpreters understand and construe the constitutional text from day to day, and only a small number of questions of constitutional interpretation are eventually adjudicated upon in court.

Courts are thus, in terms of the Constitution, powerful and consequential interpreters of the Constitution. In litigation, they are often, with regard to certain particular constitutional issues, final interpreters of the Constitution. However, to look upon them as the only constitutional interpreters of consequence will be to impoverish constitutionally based life in the politeia.

(c) Legislative and executive organs of state

Among the most significant non-judicial interpreters of the Constitution are legislative and executive organs of state.[2] A former American president, Andrew Jackson, pointed out in 1832, in his veto of a bank bill, that every public official takes an oath to uphold and support the US Constitution, but not the Supreme Court's interpretation of it.[3] He thereby emphasized his own responsibility to construe the US Constitution in order to be able to discharge the presidential duties and responsibilities it imposes. There are ample examples of the South African Constitution imposing a particular responsibility on various executive and legislative organs of state to construe the Final Constitution in order to be able to discharge their constitutional duties and responsibilities.

[1] See, eg, Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Others; Gumede & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1995 (1) SA 608, 618D–H (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 85, 95B–F (T); Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In Re: S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters') at paras 55-61. See also § 34.5*(b)*(i) infra.

[2] See Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) 262-344. The same, of course, holds for ordinary legislation. See FAR Bennion Statutory Interpretation: A Code (3rd Edition, 1997) 16-24. See, further, L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 136.

[3] See Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 267, 313-314.

A constitutional injunction to uphold, defend and respect the Final Constitution as the supreme law of the Republic,[1] for instance, prefaces the South African Constitution's entrustment of the president with various distinctive head-of-state powers and functions.[2] The presidential oath of office includes a solemn undertaking to 'obey, observe, uphold and maintain the Constitution and all other law of the Republic'.[3] The oaths of office of other executive office-bearers (such as the deputy president,[4] ministers,[5] deputy ministers,[6] and the premiers and members of the executive councils of provinces[7]) include a similar undertaking. Public administration must be governed by 'the democratic values and principles enshrined in the Constitution' — and these principles are spelt out in more detail in FC s 195(1).[8] These provisions require knowledge and understanding — and thus authorize interpretation — of the Final Constitution to inform the exercise of executive authority in every sphere of government. This interpretive authority exists with respect to the security services,[9] other constitutional institutions such as the Public Service Commission,[10] the Central Bank[11] and, in particular, the Chapter 9 'State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy'[12] (for example, the Public Protector,[13] the South African Human Rights Commission[14] and the Auditor-General[15]).

Legislatures in the three spheres of government (national, provincial and local) are under a duty to pass legislation consistent with the Final Constitution — otherwise, they will find themselves in breach of the undertaking in their oath of office to 'obey, respect and uphold the Constitution'.[16] More importantly, their legislation is likely to be found constitutionally infirm.[17] The National Assembly is 'elected to represent the people and ensure government by the people under the

[1] FC s 83(b).
[2] FC s 84.
[3] FC Schedule 2(1).
[4] FC Schedule 2(2).
[5] FC Schedule 2(3).
[6] FC Schedule 2(3).
[7] FC Schedule 2(5).
[8] FC s 195(1).
[9] Established in terms of FC Chapter 11.
[10] FC s 196.
[11] FC ss 223-225.
[12] See, in general, FC s 181.
[13] FC ss 182-183. See, generally, M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A.
[14] FC s 184. See, generally, J Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24C.
[15] FC ss 188-189. See, generally, S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B.
[16] FC Schedule 2(4).
[17] See FC s 2.

Constitution'.[1] Provincial legislatures are bound by the national Constitution (and their own provincial constitutions where these have been adopted).[2] Municipal councils are required to comply with a number of constitutional objects.[3] Legislatures in all three spheres of government thus bear responsibilities which they can fulfil only if they understand the Constitution — pursuant to an implicit authorization (and duty) to construe it.

(d) Citizens and other non-state organs protected, empowered and obliged by the Constitution

A Constitution, founding the type of state South Africa professes (and wishes) to be, invites all those it protects and empowers (citizens and non-citizens alike) to understand and put its promises to the test — and this, in turn, calls for interpretation of the Constitution. Constitutional litigation (begetting consequential constitutional jurisprudence on key issues) often springs from citizens' and other beneficiaries' (concrete, existential) understandings of the Constitution.

The Constitution is furthermore particularly amenable to civil involvement in public processes such as law-making[4] and public administration.[5] To be of optimal consequence, such involvement has to be informed with knowledge of what the Constitution says, and the need for such knowledge once again emphasizes the legitimacy of 'civil interpretations' of the Constitution.

Within the open community of constitutional interpreters in the politeia, various civil society actors constantly engage in a process of defining rights and entitlements peculiar to spheres of activity that matter to them. Labour, religious, business, cultural and sports organizations are all examples of such actors. Their endeavours sometimes result in specialist written declarations of rights.[6] Two examples are the Business Charter of Social, Economic and Political Rights adopted by the South African Federation of Chambers of Industry in 1986 and a Declaration of Religious Rights and Responsibilities adopted by representatives of various religious communities at a National Inter-faith Conference in 1992. Any court called upon to construe provisions of the Final Constitution affecting the rights of such interest groups would do well to take into account the persuasive force of such focused declarations of rights.

[1] FC s 42(3).
[2] FC s 104(3).
[3] FC s 152.
[4] FC ss 59, 72 and 118. The Constitutional Court's judgments in two recent cases demonstrates how immensely important public participation in law-making is. See Doctors for Life v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life'); Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele').
[5] FC ss 195(1)(e), (f) and (g).
[6] The Final Constitution, at least by implication, seems to lend support to the idea of producing such documents, in that FC s 234 provides that Parliament may adopt Charters of Rights consistent with the provisions of the Constitution '[i]n order to deepen the culture of democracy established by the Constitution.'

Citizens' and other beneficiaries' initial, mostly 'non-expert' readings of the Final Constitution, in response to the exigencies of states of affairs in everyday politeia life, may have a profound effect on our constitutional jurisprudence. A non-expert interpretation of the Constitution may generate an interpretive endeavour rich in 'public' consequence even if, in the expert view of the court finally deciding the issue, such an interpretation is 'wrong'. Non-expert understandings of the Final Constitution may moreover result in extra-judicial political action or may initiate administrative or legislative action.

Specialist interpretations of the Constitution are not inevitably 'better' than or superior to non-specialist interpretations.[1] The active involvement of any authorized interpreter — specialist and non specialist alike – co-determines (at the very least) 'what the Constitution eventually says'.[2]

That said, specialist readings of the Final Constitution (as with other genre texts such as literary texts, philosophical texts, religious texts and other law texts[3]) have something of a leg-up on non-specialist readings. The expert usually has knowledge and experience of the different reading strategies prevalent in his or her field of expertise as well as of the techniques that authors use to produce texts, and of the tradition of the subject matter from which the text derives. Such skill and training should enable the specialist to reveal the text's full richness of meaning and to explore various avenues of dealing with interpretive issues and controversies. However, expertise can also blinker an interpreter's perspective and thereby result in a failure to take account of 'realities' beyond the 'technical' facets of the text. Some legal experts, for instance, maintain that they can, effortlessly and correctly, deduce meaning from a provision couched in 'ordinary, clear and unambiguous language'.[4] Specialist readings of constitutional provisions should, by contrast, be alert to the plurality of meanings that can be attributed to a provision due to the expansiveness, elasticity and thus perpetual openness of the natural language in which it is couched.

32.3 Theories of Interpretation and their Relevance for Constitutional Interpretation

In legal parlance, the word 'theory' is used rather loosely. Sometimes it is a synonym for 'rule' or 'precept'. The 'expedition theory' in the law of contract, for instance, actually is a rule stipulating that a contract concluded by mail comes into existence the moment that the written acceptance of an offer is posted.[5] In a [1] See HL du Toit 'The Contribution of Hermeneutics and Deconstruction to Jurisprudence: A Response' (1998) Acta Juridica 41, 46-47.

[2] See § 32.3*(b)*(ii) infra.

[3] As to the meaning of 'law-texts' see §§ 32.3*(b)*(ii) and (e)(i)(aa) infra.

[4] For criticism of this position, see § 32.3*(b)*(ii) infra.

[5] See W J Hosten, A B Edwards, F Bosman & J Church Introduction to South African Law and Legal Theory (2nd Edition, 1995) 704–705.

more conventional sense a 'theory' is, on the one hand, an 'explanation' or 'explication'.[1] The consensus theory in the law of contract, for instance, explains that a contract is based on a concursus animorum of the parties involved.[2] On the other hand, a theory can also be an idea accounting for a situation or, especially in law, justifying a certain course of action. The theory then advances the principles on which the practice of an activity is based.[3] The consensus theory in the law of contract will, for instance, account for (and justify) a finding that, in the absence of evidence of a concursus animorum, the parties have not concluded a contract. Thus, theories of interpretation are explanatory and justificatory at the same time and can also be referred to as 'interpretative approaches'.[4]

(a) Common-law theories of statutory interpretation[5]

The six conventional theories of statutory interpretation that will briefly be discussed under this heading have evolved and taken shape over time in England, the motherland of common law, but have also spread to other common-law jurisdictions (including South Africa). Broadly speaking, however, the first three theories (literalism, intentionalism and literalism-cum-intentionalism) are usually regarded as representing the more or less 'conventional' positions in interpretive legal thinking while the last three (contextualism, purposivism and objectivism) are mostly associated with more recent developments.[6] These latter three interpretive developments maintained a rather subdued presence in statutory interpretation in South Africa prior to 1994, playing second fiddle to especially literalism-cum-intentionalism. Since 1994, they have gained greater prominence in the case law — even if they have not yet displaced entirely the three conventional approaches.

(i) Literalism maintains that the meaning of an enacted provision can and must be deduced from the very words in which the provision is couched, regardless of consequences.[7] Clear language is placed on the same footing as plain or

[1] See J Pearsall (ed) The New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998) 1922. Scholarly or scientific theories are examples of such explanatory models.

[2] See F du Bois (ed) Wille's Principles of South African Law (9th Edition, 2007) 736–737.

[3] Pearsall (supra) at 1922.

[4] See, eg, FI Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation with Professor Frank Michelman' (1995) 11 South African Journal on Human Rights 477, 482.

[5] For a more elaborate discussion of these theories, see Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at Chapter 5.

[6] Among the latter category of theories there are, however, also some that have antecedents in the distant past. The mischief rule, as a manifestation of purposivism, for instance, dates back to Heydon's Case in the late sixteenth century. See § 32.3*(a)*(v) infra. See also JMT Labuschagne 'Die Opkoms van die teleologiese Benadering tot die Uitleg van Wette in Suid-Afrika' (1990) 107 South African Law Journal 569 (Provides a succinct depiction of the evolution of theories of statutory interpretation in South Africa as described above.)

[7] For examples see LC Steyn Die Uitleg van Wette (5th Edition, 1981) 64–67.

ordinary language,[1] in other words, the language that a native speaker would use and understand.[2] However, experience has shown that ordinary language as 'natural language' is not characteristically clear and unambiguous, and strict adherence to the words of a provision may produce results that are absurd and repugnant to 'common sense'. Thus developed the golden rule[3] of interpretation, of which Lord Wensleydale's dictum[4] is the classical exposition:

> [T]he grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified, so as to avoid the absurdity and inconsistency, but no farther.

Crude literalism has 'probably reached its apogee and is on the wane'.[5] However more nuanced versions are alive and kicking — in South African constitutional law too.[6] Kentridge JA,[7] for instance, in a previously cited dictum from the Constitutional Court case of S v Zuma & Others,[8] contended that 'the Constitution does not mean whatever we might wish it to mean' and that as a legal instrument its language must be respected. The language used by the lawgiver may therefore not be ignored 'in favour of a general resort to "values"' lest interpretation turns into divination. Kentridge JA's contentions have been regularly relied upon to justify resort to literalism in constitutional interpretation.[9]

In S v Mhlungu & Others[10] the Constitutional Court disagreed on precisely how strictly to abide by the very language in which the apparently 'technical'

[1] PB Maxwell The Interpretation of Statutes (12th Edition, 1976) 28–29.

[2] R Cross Statutory Interpretation (3rd Edition, 1995) 1.

[3] DV Cowen 'The Interpretation of Statutes and the Concept of "The Intention of the Legislature"' (1980) 43(4) THRHR 374, 379 (Refers to the golden rule as 'the second canon of literalism'.)

[4] See Grey v Pearson [1843–60] All ER Rep 21 (HL) 36. The golden rule is well established in South African case law. See, eg, Venter v R 1907 TS 910, 914–915 ('Venter'); Principal Immigration Officer v Hawabu & Another 1936 AD 26, 30–31; S v Toms; S v Bruce 1990 (2) SA 802, 807H–J (A); Van Heerden v Joubert 1994 (4) SA 793, 795E–G (A); Poswa v Member of the Executive Council for Economic Affairs, Environment and Tourism, Eastern Cape 2001 (3) SA 582 (SCA) at paras 10-13.

[5] See GE Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (1992) 26.

[6] See, eg, Abrahamse v East London Municipality and Another; East London Municipality v Abrahamse 1997 (4) SA 613, 632G (SCA); Standard Bank Investment Corporation Ltd v Competition Commission & Others; Liberty Life Association of Africa Ltd v Competition Commission & Others 2000 (2) SA 797, 811A–H (SCA)('Standard Bank').

[7] See § 32.1*(b)* supra, for the full quotation.

[8] S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at paras 17-18 (Kentridge AJ)('Zuma').

[9] See, for example, Standard Bank (supra) at 811A–D. See also JD van der Vyver 'Constitutional Free Speech and the Law of Defamation' (1995) 112 South African Law Journal 572, 574–575 ('[T]he South African Constitutional Court in its first judgment clearly endorsed the view that the rules of interpretation pertaining to the Chapter on Fundamental Rights [in the Interim Constitution] do not authorize the courts to go beyond the wording of the instrument itself.')

[10] 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu').

IC s 241(8) was couched. The minority[1] understood the above-cited dictum from Zuma[2] to be a narrowly tailored prescription to the effect that — however important it may be not to ignore 'fundamental concerns' or 'the spirit and tenor of the Constitution'[3] — a court's interpretive conclusion may never amount to rewriting or reformulating the ipsissima verba of the written constitutional text. The majority,[4] on the other hand, after identifying constitutional objectives beyond the 'ordinary meaning' of the ipsissima verba of the provision in question, was comfortable to fill gaps in the wording of IC s 241(8). They arrived at this conclusion to prevent the denial of 'the equal protection of fundamental rights guaranteed by [IC] Chapter 3' to 'a substantial group of people'.[5]

(ii) Intentionalism claims that the paramount rule of statutory interpretation is to discern and give effect to the real intention of the legislature:[6]

> The governing rule of interpretation — overriding the so-called 'golden rule' — is to endeavour to ascertain the intention of the law-maker from a study of the provisions of the enactment in question.[7]

What is actually stated in this classical dictum is not a rule, but a fundamental (theoretical) assumption or premise about the interpretation of enacted law to which most South African jurists traditionally (and often with a rhetorical lack of reflection) subscribe. As it stands, it is too general and unspecific to be a rule — let alone the paramount rule of statutory interpretation. The designation 'intention of the legislature' has become a rhetorically malleable device lending weight to judicial pronouncements on the meaning of enacted law.[8] Instead of averring that a provision 'means X or Y', a court will typically assert that 'the legislature intended X or Y'.

Intentionalism in practice cannot be understood in isolation from its alliance with literalism (literalism-cum-intentionalism) and purposivism (intentionalism-cum-purposivism).[9]

[1] Mhlungu (supra) at paras 72–80 (Kentridge AJ).
[2] Ibid (supra) at para 77.
[3] Ibid at para 63.
[4] Ibid at paras 2–34 (Mahomed J).
[5] Ibid at para 33.
[6] See Steyn (supra) at 2.
[7] Farrar's Estate v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1926 TPD 501, 508. See also SANTAM Versekeringsmaatskappy Bpk v Roux 1978 (2) SA 856, 868E–F (A); Suliman v Minister of Community Development 1981 (1) SA 1108, 1120A–B (A); S v Masina 1990 (4) SA 709, 713G (A); Dodd v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1997 (2) SA 763, 769D (A); Coin Security Group (Pty) Ltd v SA National Union for Security Officers and Other Workers & Others 1998 (1) SA 685, 688E (C).
[8] See Du Plessis Reinterpretation of Statutes (supra) at 106. For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts', see §§ 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.
[9] Cowen (supra) at 382.

(iii) Premised on a combination of literalist and intentionalist assumptions, literalism-cum-intentionalism has traditionally been the dominant theory of statutory interpretation in South Africa.[1] The principal purpose of interpretation is said to be determining the intention of the legislature. The legislature couches or encodes its intention in the language of the statutory provision to be construed. When the words used for this purpose are clear and unambiguous, their literal, grammatical meaning must prevail and they must be given their ordinary effect. This, it is believed, will disclose and convey, without further ado, the true intention of the legislature and thereby the 'correct' meaning of the provision construed.

Literalism-cum-intentionalism is more literalist than intentionalist. First, it assumes that there is a grammatical structure that allows for a fixed and stable 'ordinary effect' of language. Second, it assumes that the 'correct' (both auctorial and interpretive) use of language — honouring the ordinary meaning of its words, its grammatical structure and its rules — will make the intention inherent in a statutory text equally clear to all users of the language. On these two assumptions an 'objective' determination of the meaning of a provision seems unproblematic. Only when the language used is ambiguous or obscure to some extent will it be practicable to consider resort to interpretive aids other than those associated with ordinary language, literally understood, in order to determine the intention of the legislature.

The default approach to statutory interpretation just described has attracted criticism from legal scholars who claim that it does not accord with recent developments in interpretive theory at all.[2] First, statutory language is natural and not formal language.[3] The same applies to the language of the Constitution. Natural language is always open-ended and makes for a proliferation of meanings.[4]

[1] For a classical articulation of this theory, see Venter (supra) at 913 (Innes J). For recent examples of the Supreme Court of Appeal's continued adherence to this approach, see Randburg Town Council v Kerksay Investments (Pty) Ltd 1998 (1) SA 98, 107A–B (SCA); Public Carriers Association & Others v Toll Road Concessionaries (Pty) Ltd & Others 1990 (1) SA 925, 942I–J (A); Manyasha v Minister of Law and Order 1999 (2) SA 179, 185B–C (SCA); Commissioner, SA Revenue Service v Executor, Frith's Estate 2001 (2) SA 261, 273G–I (SCA).

[2] See, eg, NJC van den Bergh Die Betekenis van die Strukturele Hermeneutiek vir die Uitleg van Wette (1982)(LLD Thesis, University of the Orange Free State 680); L du Plessis 'Die Sakelys vir Wetsteksvertolking en die Epog van Konstitusionalisme in Suid-Afrika' (1999) 64(2 & 3) Koers 223, 238–240 and L du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts: The Epoch of Constitutionalism and the Agenda for Statutory and Constitutional Interpretation in South Africa' (2000) 15(2) SA Public Law 257, 283–286.

[3] See F Müller 'Observations on the Role of Precedent in modern Continental European Law from the Perspective of "Structuring Legal Theory" '(2000) 11 Stellenbosch LR 426, 432-433. For the distinction between natural and formal language, see R Audi (ed) The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy (2nd Edition, 1999) 318, 673.

[4] 'Not only is its meaning constantly in flux, but also ever and again in conflict — especially so with law that has to regulate massive and mostly antagonistic conflicts'. See F Müller 'Observations' (supra) at 432. See also P Cilliers Complexity and Postmodernism: Understanding Complex Systems (1998) 37–47.

Second, linguistic form and clear language cannot neutralize or dilute our pre-understanding which thoroughly, inevitably and decisively shapes and shepherds our understanding of anything. Kentridge AJ's dictum in S v Zuma & Others[1] — about respecting the language of the Interim Constitution when construing it — was accompanied by an acknowledgement (albeit in passing) that as a judge engaged in constitutional interpretation it is not easy 'to avoid the influence of one's personal intellectual and moral preconceptions'.[2] This remark unsettles the belief that deference to linguistic form guarantees objective interpretation, uninfluenced by interpreters' inarticulate premises, but is not an outright renunciation of the idea that language can be clear. Stanley Fish, however, challenges the very notion of 'clear and unambiguous language':

> Meanings only become perspicuous against a background of interpretive presumptions in the absence of which reading would be impossible. A meaning that seems to leap off the page, propelled by its own self-sufficiency, is a meaning that flows from interpretive assumptions so deeply embedded that they have become invisible.[3]

What can be clear to an interpreter of a statutory provision is, in other words, not the language or meaning of the text ('objectively' speaking), but the interpreter's subjective understanding of what the provision in question stipulates with regard to a given concrete situation. This understanding is determined not just by the language in which the provision is couched, but very much by 'personal intellectual and moral preconceptions' too, and by the interpreter's familiarity with (and the embeddedness of her or his faculties of understanding in) the context.

Third, the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa and the linguistic turn in legal interpretation have led to diagnoses of ailments weighing on literalism and literalism-cum-intentionalism in interpretive practice. These two relatively recent phenomena and their impact on legal interpretation will be examined more fully in due course.[4]

(iv) Contextualism is the theory of statutory interpretation that holds that the meaning of an enacted provision and its words and language can only be determined in light of its context or 'background conditions'.[5] Actually, contextualism and purposivism, the theory that will be discussed next,[6]

[1] Zuma (supra) at paras 17 and 18. See also § 32.1*(b)* supra.

[2] Zuma (supra) at para 17. See also SACCAWU v Irvin & Johnson Ltd (Seafoods Division Fish Processing) 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC) at para 13.

[3] S Fish Doing What Comes Naturally: Change, Rhetoric, and the Practice of Theory in Legal Studies (1989) 358.

[4] See §§ 32.3*(b)*(i) and (ii) infra.

[5] See West Rand Estates Ltd v New Zealand Insurance Co Ltd 1925 AD 245, 261; Secretary for Inland Revenue v Brey 1980 (1) SA 472, 478A–B (A), Makwanyane (supra) at para 10; Ferreira v Levin NO; Vryenhoek v Powell NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at paras 52, 54, 57 and 70 (Ackermann J) and para 170 (Chaskalson P); S v Motshari 2001 (2) All SA 207 (NC) at para 8.

[6] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) infra.

share a family resemblance.[1] Both are post-literalist-cum-intentionalist positions, though some versions of contextualism, such as the classical ex visceribus actus canon of statutory interpretation[2] (invoked in constitutional interpretation too[3]) do not really contradict literalism, but seek to augment and enrich it instead.[4]

The South African locus classicus on the significance of context in statutory interpretation is Schreiner JA's seminal articulation (in a minority judgment in Jaga v Dönges NO & Another; Bhana v Dönges NO & Another[5]) of an interpretive strategy that honours the exigencies of both language and context. The approach he suggests does not represent a decided break with literalism-cum-intentionalism,[6] but it does go beyond 'an excessive peering at the language to be interpreted without sufficient attention to the contextual scene'.[7] This judgment is one of the most frequently cited minority judgments in the history of South African case law.[8] Its broadmindedness (compared to crude

[1] See Ferreira (supra) at para 46 (Ackermann J) and para 172 (Chaskalson P).

[2] See S v Looij 1975 (4) SA 703, 705C–D (RA). See also New Mines Ltd v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1938 AD 455; Hleka v Johannesburg City Council 1949 (1) SA 842, 852–853 (A); City Deep Ltd v Silicosis Board 1950 (1) SA 696, 702 (A); Soja (Pty) Ltd v Tuckers Land and Development Corp (Pty) Ltd 1981 (3) SA 314, 321H (A); Principal Immigration Officer v Bhula 1931 AD 323, 335 (This approach also facilitates the harmonisation of ostensibly conflicting provisions of one and the same statute on the assumption that 'the legislature is . . . consistent with itself'.) See also Le Roux v Provincial Administration (OFS) 1943 OPD 1, 4; S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC)('Dlamini') at para 84.

[3] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 115 and 278; Mhulungu (supra) at paras 15, 45, 105 and 112; Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei & Others 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC)('Zantsi'), 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC) at para 35; Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the RSA & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1995') at para 204; S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218, 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC) at paras 17–21; Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at para 123; S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 148; Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 116; De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange') at para 30; Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) at paras 43-46 and 59; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('National Coalition 1999') at para 87.

[4] Examples of dicta that allow for a departure from the 'plain meaning' of the words of a statute if compelled by the context of a provision do exist. See, for example, Naboomspruit Munisipaliteit v Malati Park (Edms) Bpk 1982 (2) SA 127, 133F (T); Oertel v Direkteur van Plaaslike Bestuur 1983 (1) SA 354, 370D–G (A); Reynolds Bros Ltd v Chairman, Local Transportation Board, Johannesburg 1984 (2) SA 826, 828G (W).

[5] 1950 (4) SA 653, 662D–667H (A)('Jaga').

[6] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 113-114.

[7] Jaga (supra) at 664H.

[8] See for example Secretary for Inland Revenue v Sturrock Sugar Farm (Pty) Ltd 1965 (1) SA 897, 903G–H (A); S v Radebe 1988 (1) SA 772, 778D–G (A); University of Cape Town v Cape Bar Council and Another 1986 (4) SA 903, 913I–914E (A); Fundstrust (Pty) Ltd (in liquidation) v Van Deventer 1997 (1) SA 710, 726H–J (A); Shepstone & Wylie and Others v Geyser NO 1998 (3) SA 1036, 1044A–B (SCA); Fei Lui and Others v Commanding Officer, Kempton Park & Others 1999 (3) SA 996, 1005G–C (W); Standard Bank (supra) 810G–811H; Paltex Dyehouse (Pty) Ltd v Union Spinning Mills (Pty) Ltd 2000 (4) SA 837, 852C–E (BHC); Thoroughbred Breeders' Association v Price Waterhouse 2001 (4) SA 551 (SCA) at para 12 (Marais JA, Farlam JA and Brand AJA); Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC)('Bato Star Fishing') at paras 89 and 90.

literalism-cum-intentionalism, for instance) seems to appeal to judges who seek to justify a mode of interpretive reasoning that goes beyond linguistic formalism. Unsurprisingly, dicta from this judgment have been cited with approval in South African constitutional jurisprudence.[1]

Schreiner JA in Jaga v Dönges intimated that 'context' does not only include the language of the rest of the statute, but also its matter, its apparent purpose and scope and, within limits, its background.[2] 'Background', understood as 'history', is a contextual element that in the case law has been taken into account for interpretive purposes[3] especially where vague language shrouds 'the intention of the legislature' in obscurity.[4] The Constitutional Court has also emphasized the importance of construing constitutional provisions in context, holding that this includes the history of and background to the adoption of the Constitution, other provisions of the Constitution itself and, in particular, the provisions entrenching fundamental rights (IC Chapter 3 and FC Chapter 2).[5] The role of the history of a constitution's making in its subsequent interpretation will be considered at a later stage.[6]

(v) A proponent of purposivism, looking at a particular legislative provision as part of a more encompassing instrument, will attribute meaning to such a provision in the light of the purpose or object it has (most probably) been designed to achieve. Where 'clear language' and purpose are at odds, the latter supposedly has to have the upper hand. Judicial interpreters of statutes in South Africa have not always agreed on this sequitur. As will be shown below, the more accepted view seems to have been that only vague and ambiguous (as opposed to clear and unambiguous) language may play second fiddle to statutory purpose.

How can 'purpose' be discerned? According to the classical version of purposivism in the common-law tradition, the so-called mischief rule in Heydon,[7] the prime purpose of enacted law is to suppress mischief. A court interpreting a provision is constrained to ask four questions: first, what the common law was before the enactment of the provision; second, what the mischief and defect were for which the common law did not provide; third, what remedy Parliament resolved and appointed 'to cure the disease of the commonwealth'; and, fourth, the true reason for the remedy:

[1] See, for example, Makwanyane (supra) at para 10; Bato Star Fishing (supra) at paras 89 and 90.
[2] Jaga (supra) at 662G–H.
[3] S v Nel 1987 (4) SA 276, 290F–J (O).
[4] See Santam Insurance Ltd v Taylor 1985 (1) SA 514, 527C and 527A–B (A). See also JR de Ville 'Legislative History and Constitutional Interpretation' (1999) Tydskrif vir Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 211, 212–214 (De Ville quite correctly observes, that it is not history 'out there' that is invoked by an interpreter, but his or her interpretation of history: '(s)he creates a text with which the statutory text is then approached.')
[5] Makwanyane (supra) at para 10; Ferreira (supra) at para 172 (Chaskalson P).
[6] See § 32.5*(c)*(iv) infra.
[7] (1584) 3 Co Rep 7a, 7b.

> [T]he office of all judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief and advance the remedy, and to suppress subtle inventions and evasions for continuance of the mischief, and pro privato commodo, and to add force and life to the cure and remedy according to the true intent of the makers of the Act pro bono publico.

The last sentence of the dictum implies that the true intention of the legislature (to remedy mischief) and the purpose of the Act (to be instrumental in this remedial endeavour) can hardly be at odds — and this creates room for a notion of intentionalism-cum-purposivism.

The mischief rule has been applied in South African case law and was (re-) stated in Hleka v Johannesburg City Council.[1] This line of reasoning likewise informs constitutional interpretation: it holds that the 'previous constitutional system of this country was the fundamental "mischief" to be remedied by the application of the new Constitution'.[2] Looked at in this way, the Final Constitution is a remedial measure that must be construed generously in favour of redressing the mischief of the past and advancing its own objectives for the present and the future.

It has long been recognized in South African case law on statutory interpretation that giving effect to the policy or object or purpose of legislation is an accepted strategy of statutory interpretation.[3] However, as was suggested above, it has also been made clear that this strategy is appropriate only if the language of a provision is insufficient.[4] The purposive approach has, in other words, mostly run a distant second to the literalist-cum-intentionalist approach: as a rule, 'ordinary' or 'clear and unambiguous language' has trumped other indicia of policy, object or purpose.[5]

In some cases, however, purposivism is understood to be an ally of especially the intentionalist leg of literalism-cum-intentionalism. As in Heydon, the intention of the legislature and the purpose of an Act are then understood to be identical.[6] This version of purposivism-cum-intentionalism usually goes together

[1] 1949 (1) SA 842, 852–853 (A). See also Harris & Others v Minister of the Interior & Another 1952 (2) SA 428, 459F–H (A); S v Conifer (Pty) Ltd 1974 (1) SA 651, 655D–H (A); Glen Anil Development Corp Ltd v Secretary for Inland Revenue 1975 (4) SA 715, 727H–728A (A); Sefalana Employee Benefits Organisation v Haslam & Others 2000 (2) SA 415 (SCA) at para 8.

[2] Qozoleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 634I-635C (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 81G–H (E)('Qozoleni'). See also Potgieter v Kilian 1995 (11) BCLR 1498, 1515B–F (N).

[3] See, for example, Stellenbosch Farmers' Winery Ltd v Distillers Corp (SA) Ltd & Another 1962 (1) SA 458, 473F (A); Nasionale Vervoerkommissie van Suid-Afrika v Salz Gossow Transport 1983 (4) SA 344, 357A (A); Kanhym Bpk v Oudtshoorn Munisipaliteit 1990 (3) SA 252, 261C–D (C); Raats Röntgen and Vermeulen (Pty) Ltd v Administrator Cape and Others 1991 (1) SA 827, 837A (C); Stopforth v Minister of Justice and Others; Veenendaal v Minister of Justice & Others 2000 (1) SA 113 (SCA) at para 21.

[4] See Goldberg NO v P J Joubert Ltd 1960 (1) SA 521, 523D (T).

[5] See Dadoo Ltd & Others v Krugersdorp Municipal Council 1920 AD 530, 543 (Relied on in Standard Bank (supra) at 810C–G as the classic exposition of purposivism). There are, however, also examples of manifest differences among judges on the appropriate relationship between language and purpose. See Ebrahim v Minister of the Interior 1977 (1) SA 665 (A)(Manifold differences in the interpretive modes employed in the majority and minority judgments.)

[6] Konyn & Others v Special Investigating Unit 1999 (1) SA 1001, 1007H–1008B (Tk).

with a readiness on the part of a judicial officer to proceed beyond the literal form of a provision that stands to be construed and to 'go by the design or purpose which lies behind it'.[1] Much is made of, for instance, the preamble to an Act as well as explicit statements of purpose in the body of the written text. Preambles, traditionally reserved for legislation of a formal and solemn nature and therefore only exceptionally and sparingly used,[2] have become a feature of post-1994 legislation, while statements of purpose, which were previously unheard of, are quite readily included, especially in Acts with potentially far-reaching policy effects.[3] Statutes enacted with the specific aim of promoting constitutional values or fulfilling constitutional duties or obligations are often construed with reference to the preambulatory and other value statements in the Constitution itself.[4]

With purposiveness fast becoming a substitute for clear language (and authorial intent) as a primary consideration in constitutional interpretation,[5] caution is warranted. As will be argued below,[6] glib purposivism cannot be allowed to dominate constitutional interpretation in the same manner and to the same extent that literalism-cum-intentionalism has conventionally been dictating statutory interpretation.

(vi) Objectivism is intended as an antidote to the (apparent) subjectivism of intentionalism. Its proponents contend that once a law has been enacted the legislature has had its say and the text assumes an existence of its own.[7] Objectivism entrusts the concretizing of enacted law to the courts.[8]

[1] James Buchanan & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd [1977] 1 All ER 518, 522j–523b cited with approval in Baloro & Others v University of Bophuthatswana 1995 (8) BCLR 1018, 1061H–J (B); Dulabh & Another v Department of Land Affairs 1997 (4) SA 1108 (LCC)('Dulabh') para 48. See also MV Golden North Governor and the Company of the Bank of Scotland v Fund Constituting the Proceeds of the Judicial Sale of the MV Golden North (Maritime Technical Co Ltd Intervening) 1999 (1) SA 144 (D), 152A–B.

[2] See LM du Plessis The Interpretation of Statutes (1986) 123–124.

[3] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 239-244.

[4] See, for example, Dulabh (supra) at paras 52 and 53.

[5] See, for example, D Davis, M Chaskalson & J de Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism: The Role of Constitutional Interpretation' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 122–126; D Dennis, H Cheadle & N Haysom Fundamental Rights in the Constitution. Commentary and Cases (1997) 11–13. See also I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 148–150 (on the place and role of purposive interpretation in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court.)

[6] See § 32.3*(b)*(iv) infra.

[7] For a discussion of this approach, see DV Cowen 'Prolegomenon to a Restatement of the Principles of Statutory Interpretation' (1976) Tydskrif vir Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 131, 156–158; Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (supra) 50–51.

[8] See F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (1999) 10(3) Stellenbosch Law Review 269, 269.

JMT Labuschagne has propounded quite a far-reaching variant of objectivism, with substantial merit, premised on the assumption that a statutory provision acquires meaning only once it is interpreted and applied in a concrete situation.[1] This contention echoes Hans-Georg Gadamer's seminal insight about the oneness of interpretation and application.[2] According to Labuschagne a statute as promulgated is only a structure statute: it contains merely a 'structure norm' and only becomes 'real' or 'complete' (ie a function statute) once it is applied to a specific case, thereby effecting its outcome. Since the 'function norm' operates with reference to a particular, unrepeatable, concrete situation only, it is unique and legal norms (qua 'function norms') can therefore not conflict with one another. The legislative process, according to Labuschagne, proceeds from the generality of the structure norm to the particularity of the function norm.[3]

According to Labuschagne, 'interpretation' as an independent concept has too mechanical a connotation — and has thus become increasingly inappropriate — to depict the realization of the law in day-to-day situations where legal norms are not just interpreted but actually formed[4] (he speaks of 'regsnormvorming').[5] He traces an evolutionary shift in word cultures from iconic (authoritarian) to communicative (egalitarian) justice.[6] In most contemporary legal systems, judicial action inevitably co-constitutes legal norms and the judges have inevitably become part of the legislative process.[7]

Objectivism, generally speaking, reminds the interpreter that statutes ought to be construed with reference to the continuing time frame within which they function.[8] Regard should accordingly be had to the policies that existed

[1] See JMT Labuschange 'Regsdinamika: Opmerkinge oor die Aard van die Wetgewingsproses' (1983) 46(4) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 422. See W le Roux 'Undoing the Past through Statutory Interpretation: The Constitutional Court and Marriage Laws of Apartheid' (2005) 26(3) Obiter 526, 537.

[2] H-G Gadamer Wahrheit und Methode: Grundzüge einer Philosophischen Hermeneutik (4th Edition, 1975) 308. See also L du Plessis 'Die Sakelys vir Wetsteksvertolking en die Epog van Konstitusionalisme in Suid-Afrika' (1999) 64(2 & 3) Koers 223, 247–251; Du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts' (supra) at 295–299.

[3] See Labuschagne 'Regsdinamika: Opmerkinge oor die Aard van die Wetgewingsproses' (supra) at 426.

[4] JMT Labuschagne 'Die Opkoms van die Rasionele en van Individualiserende Geregtigheid by Regsuitleg en —vorming: Opmerkinge oor die Disintegrasie van Refleks- en Ikongeregtigheid' (2004) 67(4) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 614, 616.

[5] See, for example, JMT Labuschagne 'Regsnormvorming: Riglyn vir 'n nuwe Benadering tot die tradisionele Reëls van Wetsuitleg' (1989) 4 SA Public Law 205.

[6] Labuschagne 'Opmerkinge oor die Disintegrasie' (supra) at 615.

[7] JMT Labuschagne 'Die Opkoms van die teleologiese Benadering tot die Uitleg van Wette in Suid-Afrika' (1990) 107(4) South African Law Journal 569, 573. See also JMT Labuschagne 'Die heilige Oervader, Regsevolusie en redematige Administratiefregspleging' (1995) 10(2) SA Public Law 444; JMT Labuschagne 'Gewone Betekenis van 'n Woord, Woordeboeke en die organiese Aard van Wetsuitleg' (1998) 13(1) SA Public Law 145; JMT Labuschagne 'Die Leemtebegrip by Wetsuitleg as Anachronisme: 'n Regsantroplogiese Verklaring' (1999) 62(2) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 300.

[8] RWM Dias Jurisprudence (5th Edition, 1985) 170; Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (supra) 51.

at the time when a statute became law as well as to the changes that may have been made to these policies in the interim. ' "Application" is a continuing process and the application of a provision in a particular case is only one step in a journey.'[1] DC du Toit speaks of the dimension of futurity in the law.[2] Subscribing to a key tenet of objectivism, he rejects the idea that statutory interpretation merely involves discovering the 'past intention' of a legislature. The interpretation of a text (and of a statute) is the 'present realisation' of the meaning possibilities contained in the original draft instead.[3] 'Past meaning' must, in other words, be transposed into present terms, while 'present meaning' opens up vistas of futurity. Understanding a statute is tantamount to its existential application.[4]

Judicial or free theories of statutory interpretation constitute a theoretical position closely associable with objectivism. In moderate form, these theories recognize and justify judicial activism. In a more radical form, they strongly advocate judicial activism: this conclusion is predicated upon the belief that judges have a creative role to play in the interpretation and application of statute law. 'Moderate free theorists' contend that determining the intention of the legislature necessarily entails the filling in of gaps in an enactment, making sense of an open-ended provision.[5] A 'wait and see' attitude with regard to legislative reform is deemed inappropriate.[6] The judiciary, with the help of the common law, must intervene in order to remedy defects in statute law, since legislative processes are not sufficiently expeditious and streamlined to cope with deficiencies that show up in day-to-day practice.

More radical adherents of judicial activism do not reject the tenets that inform the moderate approach. But they do take the piercing of the veil of ostensible judicial objectivity further.[7] The interpretation of enacted law is seen not as a science, but as an art that essentially involves the making of choices. Interpretation is not really guided by 'objective' canons of construction. Instead the exigencies of an intuitively arrived at or desired interpretation, induce preferential reliance on certain preferred canons of construction to justify a particular interpretive result.

[1] Dias (supra) at 170.
[2] DC du Toit 'The Dimension of Futurity in the Law: Towards a Renewal of the Theory of Interpretation' (1977) 2 Tydskrif vir Regswetenskap 11.
[3] Ibid at 16.
[4] Ibid at 18–19.
[5] See Magor and St Mellons Rural District Council v Newport Corp 1950 (2) All ER 1226, 1236 (CA).
[6] See Shaw v Director of Public Prosecutions 1961 (2) All ER 446, 452–453 (HL).
[7] See J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 367–372.

Constitutionalism and constitutional interpretation are quite amenable to objectivist and free-theory forms of adjudication. However objectivist and free-theory forms of adjudication do not generally constitute self-sufficient theoretical positions,[1] but usually give momentum and direction to contextualist and purposivist reasoning in both statutory and constitutional interpretation.[2]

(b) Constitutional interpretation and the inadequacy of common-law theories of statutory interpretation

The advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa more or less coincided with a modest but mounting realization among South African jurists, and legal scholars in particular, that conventional theories of statutory interpretation, and especially the dominant literalist-cum-intentionalist approach, are insufficient to the task of constitutional interpretation. Since the mid-1980s, for example, all South African monographs on statutory interpretation, written by legal scholars for use by academics, students, judicial officers and legal practitioners, have been critical of literalism-cum-intentionalism as a theoretical position and have questioned its basic propositions and assumptions.[3] The disenchantment with conventional theories of interpretation deepened as, in anticipation of constitutional democracy, their shortcomings were exposed in an emerging literature predicting that, with a supreme constitution in place, interpretive business would be unable to proceed 'as usual'.[4] The de facto and de jure onset of constitutional supremacy dealt the reign of 'clear and unambiguous statutory language' in legal and statutory interpretation a decided blow. Key insights associated with the linguistic turn started winning credence and increasingly informed the emerging discourse on legal interpretation. These developments have manifested in growing support for a purposive interpretation of, firstly and definitely, the Constitution, as a distinctive linguistic datum with a far-reaching impact on the whole legal system, but also of statutes and other laws.

[1] For an explanation of the meaning of 'theoretical position' when used in this chapter, see § 32.3*(c)*(i) and (ii) infra.

[2] See, for example, In re Former Highlands Residents: Sonny v Department of Land Affairs 2000 (2) SA 351 (LCC); Ngxuza v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2001 (2) SA 609 (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E)('Ngxuza'); Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples Dialogue on Land and Shelter 200 (2) SA 1074 (SE)('Peoples' Dialogue').

[3] See LM du Plessis The Interpretation of Statutes (1986); C Botha Statutory Interpretation (4th Edition, 2005); Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (supra); JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000); L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002). See also EA Kellaway Principles of Legal Interpretation: Statutes, Contracts and Wills (1995)(Kellaway's positions may be the exception to the norm — but not clearly so.)

[4] See, for example, JR de Ville Moontlike Veranderinge in die Administratiefreg na Aanleiding van 'n Menseregteakte (1992)(LLD Thesis, University of Stellenbosch); TJ Kruger Die Wordingsproses van 'n Suid-Afrikaanse Menseregtebedeling (1990)(LLD Thesis, Potchefstroom University); J Kruger & B Currin (eds) Interpreting a Bill of Rights (1994); L du Plessis, & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) Chapter 1; Davis, Chaskalson & De Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism' (supra); IM Rautenbach General Provisions of the South African Bill of Rights (1995) 21-35.

(i) Constitutional democracy and the end of the dominance of literalism-cum-intentionalism

It is difficult to reconcile constitutionalism — the '-ism' of constitutional supremacy and justiciability at the heart of constitutional democracy[1] — with literalist-cum-intentionalist (constitutional and statutory) interpretation. That said, intentionalism and its place in constitutional interpretation remains a live issue in the world's oldest constitutional democracy: in the United States of America, originalists have maintained that the US Constitution must be read and understood as faithfully as possible in accordance with the original intent of its framers.[2] Indeed, it is fair to say that in some form or another, original intent is endorsed by a plurality if not a majority of the US Supreme Court. The main objection to this viewpoint is that originalist intentionalism does not allow either for the interpretive growth engendered by radically different circumstances or the desirability of limited readings for antiquated provisions.[3] Constitutional interpretation, the objectors maintain, is not about finding and giving effect to the original intent of the 'founding fathers' more than two centuries ago, but about attributing present-day meaning, significance and relevance to constitutional provisions rooted far back in history.

In quite a number of South African Constitutional Court cases reference has been made to what the framers of both the Interim and Final Constitutions would (or would not) have thought or foreseen or 'intended'.[4] These conjecture-like assertions, reminiscent of intentionalist-speak in statutory interpretation, have in most instances been invoked to justify the court's specific understanding of a provision in a particular situation and/or with reference to a specific issue, still clutching at trusted literalist-cum-intentionalist sentiments along the unbeaten track of constitutional interpretation. Such conventionalism is not to be mistaken for embracing the theory of originalism, however, for the court itself has voiced its

[1] For a fuller description, see § 32.3*(e)*(ii) infra.

[2] See R Dworkin Life's Dominion. An Argument about Abortion and Euthanasia (1993) 132–144 (Offers some helpful and insightful perspectives on this debate); FI Michelman 'Constitutional Authorship, "Solomonic Solutions", and the Unoriginalist Mode of Constitutional Interpretation' (1998) Acta Juridica 208-234. See also H Corder 'Lessons from (North) America (Beware the "Legalization of Politics" and the "Political Seduction of the Law")' (1992) 109 South African Law Journal 204, 206–214 (Deals in some detail with the contributions of Robert Bork, regarded as one of the main proponents of originalism.) See also 32.3*(c)*(i)(B) infra.

[3] For the role of 'present circumstances' in constitutional interpretation, see LM du Plessis & JR de Ville 'Bill of Rights Interpretation in the South African Context (3): Comparative Perspectives and Future Prospects' (1993) 4 Stellenbosch Law Review 356, 376–377.

[4] See, for example, S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane) at para 392; S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at paras 100, 102 and 105; Ferreira (supra) at para 15; Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 53; De Klerk (supra) at para 45; Executive Council of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development of the RSA; Executive Council of KwaZulu-Natal v President of the RSA 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1999') at paras 39-41; S v Twala (Human Rights Commission Intervening) 2000 (1) SA 879 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 106 (CC) at paras 9-17.

rejection of 'the doctrine of original intent' in no uncertain terms. In South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others,[1] Chaskalson P, for instance, held that there are perfectly valid and operative constitutional provisions not directly discernible from visible linguistic signifiers occurring in the written constitutional text (unexpressed provisions, in other words). By analogy with unexpressed but operative terms of a contract,[2] the Court, however, drew a distinction between tacit and implicit/implied provisions of the Constitution. It explained its preference for the adjective(s) 'implicit / implied' to depict such provisions as follows:

> In the law of contract a distinction is drawn between tacit and implied terms. The former refers to terms that the parties intended but failed to express in the language of the contract, and the latter, to terms implied by law. The making of such a distinction in this judgment might be understood as endorsing the doctrine of original intent, which this Court has never done. I prefer, therefore, to refer to unexpressed terms as being 'implied' or 'implicit'.

The trend in constitutional jurisprudence to bring 'what the framers of the Constitution had in mind' into arguments on the interpretation of constitutional provisions can thus not be a reconfirmation of allegiance to intentionalism as it has always functioned in statutory interpretation, for the intention of the legislature, conventionally regarded as the prime force that must be given effect to in statutory interpretation, has irrevocably been toppled by the supremacy of the Constitution. This is clear from FC s 39(2)'s interpretive injunction that a statutory provision is firstly and most importantly to be understood in conformity with the Constitution,[3] and not necessarily in accordance with what its (supposedly) clear and unambiguous language conjures up. The decisive question of statutory interpretation can therefore not be what the legislature intended a provision to mean, but which one of its possible meanings is most compatible with the Constitution and most conducive to the promotion of its objectives and values. The 'intention of the legislature' plays second fiddle at best:

> The interpretative notion of ascertaining 'the intention of the Legislature' does not apply in a system of judicial review based on the supremacy of the Constitution, for the simple reason that the Constitution is sovereign and not the Legislature.[4] > or

[1] 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 19.

[2] As to the law of contract in this regard, see Alfred McAlpine & Son (Pty) Ltd v Transvaal Provincial Administration 1974 (3) SA 506, 526C-F (A); J Salmond & J Williams Principles of the Law of Contracts (2nd Edition, 1945) 37-40. The issue was (re-)considered by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Seven Eleven Corporation of SA (Pty) Ltd v Cancun Trading No 150 CC [2005] 2 All SA 256 (SCA). For a discussion of the latter judgment, see S Cornelius 'The Unexpressed Terms of a Contract [A Discussion of the Judgment of Lewis JA in Seven Eleven Corporation of SA (Pty) Ltd v Cancun Trading No 150 CC [2005] 2 All SA 256 (SCA)]' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 494.

[3] See § 32.5*(b)*(ii) infra.

[4] Matiso & Others v The Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others 1994 (3) SA 592, 597B-597H (SE), 1994 (3) BCLR 80, 87B-87H (SE)('Matiso'). For fuller dictum, see § 32.1*(b)* supra.

All statutes must be interpreted through the prism of the Bill of Rights.[1]

This means that FC s 39(2) actually establishes a new canon of statutory interpretation, namely, that legislation must be construed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. This canon cannot be overridden by 'legislative intent' couched in (allegedly) 'clear and unambiguous language'. The 'intention of the legislature', in all its possible significations, is always subject (and second) to the Constitution, and not only when a statute is allegedly inconsistent with a provision or provisions of the Constitution.[2] An interpretive strategy known as reading in conformity with the Constitution, which will be discussed below,[3] helps to give specific effect to this new canon of statutory interpretation in s 39(2).

The Constitutional Court's decided rejection of original intent as a guiding force in constitutional interpretation rules out the possibility that the notion of the dominant intention of the legislature, as conventionally understood and deferred to in statutory interpretation, could rear its head in constitutional interpretation too. Any reference to the intention of the framers of the Constitution in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court is then to be understood as, at most, a rhetorical gateway to historical interpretation.[4] From a stylistic perspective the value-laden[5] Constitution-in-writing has also unsettled the notion of 'clear and unambiguous language', the prime partner of intentionalism in constituting the South African judiciary's conventional literalist-cum-intentionalist position on the interpretation of enacted law.[6] Crucial constitutional provisions, such as statements of values in the Preamble, previously referred to sections of the Final Constitution,[7] and the Bill of Rights in its entirety, are couched in all but clear and unambiguous language — and deliberately so. Rights and values can hardly

[1] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd. In re: Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit NO 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Investigating Directorate') at para 21.

[2] See Investigating Directorate (supra) at para 21. The Investigating Directorate Court described the canon of statutory interpretation derived from FC s 39(2) as follows:

> All law-making authority must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution. The Constitution is located in a history which involves a transition from a society based on division, injustice and exclusion from the democratic process to one which respects the dignity of all citizens and includes all in the process of governance. As such, the process of interpreting the Constitution must recognize the context in which we find ourselves and the Constitution's goal of a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights. This spirit of transition and transformation characterizes the constitutional enterprise as a whole.

[3] See § 32.5*(b)*(ii) infra.

[4] See § 32.5*(c)*(iv) infra.

[5] See § 32.1*(c)* supra.

[6] See § 32.3*(a)(iii) supra. For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts' see §§ 32.3(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

[7] See, for example, the founding provisions in FC s 1, FC ss 40 and 41 on co-operative government, FC s 165 on judicial independence, FC s 195 on the basic values and principles governing public administration and FC s 237 on the diligent performance of obligations.

be expressed categorically or conclusively. The Final Constitution is furthermore meant to be durable and its expansively formulated provisions have been designed to cater for an inestimable array of exigencies.

The open-endedness of the constitutional text makes the inevitable role of the judicial interpreter's pre-understanding in construing constitutional provisions more visible. Froneman J, in an unprecedented dictum in Ngxuza v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape was, for instance, quite upfront about the fact that his pre-understanding had co-determined his construction of FC s 38 of the Constitution in relation to subjects' standing in constitutional litigation.[1] Similarly Horn AJ, in Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples' Dialogue on Land and Shelter,[2] discouraged an overly legalistic approach to the construction of crucial provisions of the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act,[3] as 'a piece of welfare legislation formulated upon humanitarian lines'.[4]

(ii) The linguistic turn

Meaning is not discovered in (and retrieved from) a construable text, but is made in dealing with the text.[5] This key tenet of the linguistic or hermeneutical turn in legal interpretation has been enhanced by the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa. Language cannot 'carry' or 'produce' perspicuous, clear and unambiguous (one and only) meaning(s), but it does determine the meaning that an interpreter ultimately attributes to construable constitutional and statutory provisions in a decisive and most pervasive way — and does so amid (and pursuant to) a dynamic interplay of multifarious meaning-generative forces and phenomena.[6]

The South African judiciary is rather unfamiliar with linguistic-turn reasoning and very rarely will a 'respectable' court admit that it construes a constitutional or a statutory provision by attributing meaning to it, rather than finding meaning in it. Rarely is not, however, never — this is evident from a dictum of Gildenhuys J in the judgment of the Land Claims Court in In re: Former Highlands Residents: Sonny v Department of Land Affairs[7]. The court depicts the statutory interpretation in which it engaged as giving meaning to a statutory provision rather than finding pre-given meaning in it.[8] The following dictum of Lord Denning MR aptly demonstrates

[1] Ngxuza (supra) at 619F–620F, 1327I-J.
[2] 'Peoples' Dialogue' (supra) at 1081F–G.
[3] Act 19 of 1998.
[4] Peoples' Dialogue (supra) at 1080E.
[5] For an insightful discussion of the linguistic turn, see RJ Coombe '"Same As It Ever Was": Rethinking the Politics of Legal Interpretation' (1989) 34 McGill Law Journal 603; A Boshoff Die Interpretasie van Fundamentele Aansprake in 'n heterogene Samelewing (2000) (LLD Thesis, University of Johannesburg.) For a critical assessment, see MS Moore 'The Interpretive Turn in Modern Theory: A Turn for the Worse?' (1989) 41 Stanford Law Review 871.
[6] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) xv.
[7] 2000 (2) SA 351 (LCC) at para 10 (Gildenhuys J).
[8] Ibid at para 11 (Gildenhuys J).

how down-to-earth judicial rhetoric (and reasoning) can be commensurate with embracing the theoretical ramifications of the linguistic turn without mentioning it by name:

> So once again we have here the problem of statutory interpretation. It vexes us daily. Not only us. But also the House of Lords. Even the simplest words give rise to acute differences between us. Half of the judges think the interpretation is clear one way. The other half think it is clear the other way.
>
> To get rid of these continuous conflicts, we should throw aside our traditional approach and adopt a more liberal attitude. We should adopt such a construction as will promote the general legislative purpose …
>
> Put quite simply, perhaps too simply, whenever you have a choice between two interpretations, the choice is a matter of policy for the law: Which gives the more sensible result? It is not a semantic or linguistic exercise. Nine times out of ten you will find that judges will agree on what is the sensible result, even though they disagree on the semantic or linguistic result.[1]

The linguistic turn has its origin in theoretical reflections on language, meaning and interpretation in general. Contemporary developments associated with this reflection and with the discourse occasioned by it will be considered in due course.[2] For now it is enough to point out that linguistic-turn discourse emphasizes, from a broad, interdisciplinary perspective, two truisms of considerable importance for constitutional, statutory and, indeed, legal interpretation in general. First, it assumes that language is an open, complex system in which the context of an utterance is a pivotal determinant of meaning. Second, it emphasizes that the dynamics of (natural) language always leave an interpreter with the responsibility to decide on one of several possible (semantic) meanings of a provision as the best or 'most sensible' (as Lord Denning would have it) response to a problem entertainable by law.

(iii) 'Politics': predicament or prospect?

Endemic to the mainstream culture of adjudication in South Africa has been the belief that adjudication ought to remain neutral in the sense that adjudicators are required to abstain from interpretations or orders that have decided 'political' (or 'policy' or socio-economic) significance and consequences.[3] A classic statement of this belief came from Holmes JA, almost five decades ago, in Minister of the Interior v Lockhat & Others,[4] observing that the politically very controversial Group Areas Act[5]

[1] R v Sheffield Crown Court, Ex parte Brownlow [1980] QB 530 (CA) 538.
[2] See § 32.3*(d)* infra.
[3] M Pieterse 'What Do We Mean When We Talk about Transformative Constitutionalism?' (2005) 20(1) SA Public Law 155, 164-165.
[4] 1961 (2) SA 587, 602D–E (A).
[5] Act 77 of 1957.

> represents a colossal social experiment and a long-term policy. It necessarily involves the movement out of Group Areas of numbers of people throughout the country. Parliament must have envisaged that compulsory population shifts of persons occupying certain areas would inevitably cause disruption and, within the foreseeable future, substantial inequalities.

Acquiescence in the consequences of this 'colossal social experiment', the court thought, would be the most proper judicial demeanour:

> The question before this Court is the purely legal one whether this piece of legislation impliedly authorises, towards the attainment of its goal, the more immediate and foreseeable discriminatory results complained of in this case. In my view . . . it manifestly does.

In S v Adams, King J explained the court's political dilemma in relation to — and its apparent powerlessness in the face of — the same Act as follows:

> [A]n Act of Parliament creates law but not necessarily equity. As a Judge in a Court of Law I am obliged to give effect to the provisions of an Act of Parliament. Speaking for myself and if I were sitting as a Court of Equity, I would have come to the assistance of the appellant.[1]

Prior to the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa, courts did not maintain impeccable political neutrality and more often than not enforced harsh apartheid legislation.[2] The mixed success with which South African courts handled constitutional adjudication prior to 1994, and especially the tendency to detract attention from substantive constitutional law issues and concentrate on technicalities and formalities instead, can at least partly be attributed to their attempts to hand down politically neutral judgments. This does not mean that those judgments were politically neutral in fact — and nor were the earlier Lockhat and Adams judgments. A judgment upholding a political status quo may in effect be every bit as 'political' as a transformative judgment challenging and overruling it. Courts operating under apartheid quite consciously enforced the law of the apartheid state.

With the exception of objectivism and judicial or free theories of interpretation,[3] all the traditional common-law theories of statutory interpretation previously discussed are largely silent on the political and politicized nature of the interpretation of enacted law. However, some of the presumptions of statutory interpretation, for instance, the presumption that statute law is not unjust, inequitable and unreasonable,[4]and that legislation promotes public interest, may bring to bear 'matters political' upon the interpretation of enacted law.[5] But then again, presumptions have traditionally not ranked high among the canons of construction and have been relied on only as a last resort (as 'tertiary grounds of deduction').[6] Presumptions and whatever politics they may entail have thus mostly and

[1] 1979 (4) SA 793, 801A–B (T).
[2] See Rossouw v Sachs 1964 (2) SA 551, 562E-H (A).
[3] See § 32.3*(a)*(vi) supra.
[4] See Du Plessis Re-interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 154-164.
[5] Ibid at 165-168.
[6] HS Celliers 'Die Betekenis van Vermoedens by Wetsuitleg' (1962) 79(2) South African Law Journal 189, 195. See also § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.

conveniently been kept out of interpretation, as long as there is sufficient scope for reliance on other more 'neutral' canons of construction. In short, the conventional theories and canons of statutory interpretation are such that the interference of politics in interpretation has been perceived mostly as a predicament.

Generally speaking, constitutional interpretation in South Africa since 1994 seems to have been accompanied by an awareness of the judiciary's unavoidable political involvement in the broad sense of the word. Evidence of this awareness is Kentridge AJ's unprecedented acknowledgement, in S v Zuma,[1] of the fact that it is not easy for a judge 'to avoid the influence of one's personal intellectual and moral preconceptions'. The Constitutional Court has produced numerous dicta acknowledging the political nature of constitutional adjudication:

- In S v Makwanyane & Another[2] Kriegler J in effect confirmed Kentridge AJ's observation in Zuma without referring to it by name:

  > [I]t would be foolish to deny that the judicial process, especially in the field of constitutional adjudication, calls for value judgments in which extra-legal considerations may loom large.

- In Brink v Kitshoff NO[3] O'Regan J attributed the different approaches to equality of courts in different national jurisdictions not only to different textual provisions and different historical circumstances, but also to different jurisprudential and philosophical understandings.
- In President of the RSA v SA Rugby Football Union[4] the judges of the Constitutional Court were challenged to put their political affiliations on the table and to deal with allegations of their political bias. The Court did not shy away from the fact that its members do have (and have shown) political preferences and predilections, and the court accepted, in so many words and with reference to several authorities, that out-and-out neutrality on the part of a judicial officer cannot be achieved.[5] The Court then proceeded to consider how best to deal with such a-neutrality in order to ensure that justice is done (and also seen to be done).
- Froneman J openly acknowledged, in Ngxuza v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape,[6] that his view of 'the social context in which the law is applied to a particular set of facts' had co-determined his interpretation of s 38 of the Constitution (on the issue of standing in a constitutional action).

[1] S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma') at para 17. See also § 32.1*(b)* supra.

[2] Makwanyane (supra) at para 207.

[3] 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 39.

[4] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC).

[5] President of the RSA v SA Rugby Football Union 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) at paras 42-44.

[6] 2001 (2) SA 609, 619F–620E (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322, 1327I-J (E).

However, the Constitutional Court has quite often intimated that it can decide controversial issues in a 'legal' as opposed to a 'political' manner.[1] Thus Sachs J in S v Makwanyane & Another opined:

> Our function is to interpret the text of the Constitution as it stands. Accordingly, whatever our personal views on this fraught subject [capital punishment] might be, our response must be a purely legal one.[2]

And perhaps the best known effort of the Constitutional Court to avoid, ostensibly, a political exercise of its powers by falling back on the canard that it is exercising purely a judicial function, appears in the First Certification Judgment:

> First and foremost it must be emphasised that the Court has a judicial and not a political mandate. Its function is clearly spelt out in IC 71(2): to certify whether all the provisions of the NT comply with the CPs. That is a judicial function, a legal exercise. Admittedly a constitution, by its very nature, deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power as also with the relationship between political entities and with the relationship between the state and persons. But this Court has no power, no mandate and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the CA in drafting the NT, save to the extent that such choices may be relevant either to compliance or non-compliance with the CPs. Subject to that qualification, the wisdom or otherwise of any provision of the NT is not this Court's business.[3]

No judge will find it particularly flattering to learn that her or his judicial work reflects association with particular party political sentiments or genuflections to incumbent powers.[4] At the same time no judge can convincingly plead political innocence. The Constitutional Court, in the first two cases in which it was called upon to give effect to socio-economic entitlements guaranteed in FC ss 26 and 27,[5] made it clear that it would not refrain from setting aside policy (also read: 'political') decisions simply because they were decisions of the executive. The Court nonetheless refrained from second-guessing the policies informing these decisions, but demonstrated a willingness to test the decisions against the standards of the Constitution — which is what a vigilant judiciary is expected to do. The Constitutional Court has also indicated that 'a court should be slow to impose obligations upon government which will inhibit its ability to make and implement

[1] See, for example, Executive Council of the Western Cape & Others v President of the RSA & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1995') at paras 116-122.

[2] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 349.

[3] Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, In re: Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgement') at para 27. This gloss on its own method of constitutional interpretation was roundly and rightly criticized by Matthew Chaskalson and Dennis Davis shortly after the judgment was handed down. See M Chaskalson and D Davis 'Constitutionalism, the Rule of Law, and the First Certification Judgment' (1997) 13 South African Journal of Human Rights 430, 433-434.

[4] See, for example, Executive Council of the Western Cape 1995 (supra) at paras 116-122.

[5] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') and Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

policy effectively'.[1] However, when called upon to adjudicate state action necessary to provide relief to those in desperate need, the Constitutional Court — in keeping with constitutional injunctions[2] enjoining the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of socio-economic or 'second generation' entitlements — has assumed an uncommonly activist role in ordering or supporting the procurement of such relief.[3] The court's judgment in Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others[4] is a case in point. Both the court a quo and the Constitutional Court found that, at certain state hospitals, the Department of Health unreasonably prevented the administration of the drug, Nevirapine, with its proven record of efficacy and safety in reducing the risk of mother-to-child transfer of HIV, to HIV-positive women and their small children. The government furthermore failed to design and implement a comprehensive national programme to prevent such transfers. The Court — not prevaricating about its power to review the implementation of the government policies involved, especially where compliance with constitutional duties stood to be compromised — made both declaratory and mandatory orders against the state, compelling it to fulfil its constitutional mandate.[5]

The examples of judicial intervention in matters political just mentioned, have been of instances where policy decisions and their implementation resulting in administrative action were impugned. The same reasoning, however, applies mutatis mutandis to policy decisions resulting in the adoption of legislation. Not only constitutional interpretation, but statutory interpretation too, is thoroughly political. A court exercising its testing right in respect of legislation is enjoined to assess the policies (or politics) underlying and informing impugned legislation in relation to the Constitution, and then to assign a 'political meaning' to such legislation under, in conformity with and/or informed with the values of the Constitution. This obligation may, among other things, require 'a court to negotiate the shoals between the Scylla of the old-style literalism and the Charybdis of judicial law-making'.[6]

Rationality review could arguably help to 'depoliticize' a judicial assessments of the constitutionality of legislative or administrative exercises of public power.

[1] Premier of the Province of Mpumalanga v Executive Committee of the Association of Governing Bodies of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC) at para 41.

[2] For example, FC ss 26(2) and 27(2).

[3] Grootboom (supra) at paras 40, 52 and 96; Minister of Public Works v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC), 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC) at paras 38–39.

[4] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC').

[5] For a discussion of this case and other significant cases on the state's duties regarding the implementation of socioeconomic rights, see S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-24–33-48.

[6] Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA)('Govender') at para 11 (Olivier JA).

Rationality is a requirement of the rule of law functioning as a safeguard against arbitrariness or caprice in the exercise of public power. It requires a rational link between a legitimate governmental objective sought to be achieved, and the means adopted to achieve it. Often the rationality requirement allows for more than one way of achieving the said objective. Preference for a particular way of doing so is then regarded as a policy question to be decided by a politically authorised and accountable (legislative or administrative) organ of state, and it is not competent for a court of law to second-guess such a preference once it has passed the rationality muster.[1]

A South African court may sometimes be faced with the dilemma of having to consider the perpetuation of some politically controversial and probably unconstitutional pre-1994 legislative measures which, their racially biased pedigree notwithstanding, could nowadays hold some advantage for at least some of the very people against whom they were initially designed to discriminate.[2] In Moseneke v Master of the High Court[3] Sachs J described the court's dilemma in such instances as follows:

> To keep a manifestly racist law on the statute books is to maintain discrimination; to abolish it with immediate effect without making practical alternative arrangements is to provoke confusion and risk injustice. Such a dilemma is inherent in transition. The Black Administration Act, as its very name indicates, both reminds us of South Africa's shameful and 'disgraceful' past and continues to make invidious and wounding distinctions on grounds of race. It survives, however, because it has become encrusted with processes of great practical, day-to-day importance to a large number of people.

In other cases, courts had to decide to what extent and with what political consequences political powers may pursue politics of transformation using statute law.[4] In S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice Intervening)[5] the Constitutional Court per Sachs J cautioned against undue judicial activism in certain socially sensitive areas, where the legislature (as political decision-maker) is best left with a 'reasonable degree of latitude or margin of appreciation'. In casu the court, considering

[1] See Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Other 2008 (10) BCLR 969 (CC) at paras 62-64,110-115, 166-192, 260-286. See also Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier, Western Cape and Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 45; The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA. In re: The Ex parte Application of the President of the RSA 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at paras 68, 85 and 90; Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 s 6(2)(f)(ii).

[2] See, for example, Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC); Moseneke v Master of the High Court 2001 (2) 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC)('Moseneke').

[3] Moseneke (supra) at para 25.

[4] See Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)(Walker'). In this case the empowering act itself was not challenged, but the Court had to deal with the policy implications of legislation read in the light of the Interim Constitution.

[5] 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC)('Baloyi').

the constitutionality of s 3(5) of the Prevention of Family Violence Act,[1] observed as follows:[2]

> One may accept that insistence on rigid and inflexible rules would be inappropriate in this developing area, with its complex nuances and new procedures. Provided it remains within constitutionally appropriate limits, the Legislature must enjoy a reasonable degree of latitude or margin of appreciation in choosing appropriate solutions to a grave social ill, particularly when the need for special law enforcement procedures has become manifest. In the present case this requires a construction of s 3(5) that is sensitive to its context and seeks to balance out the interests of all concerned in the fairest manner possible.

The involvement of courts in determining the final outcome of overtly political disputes makes judges susceptible not only to criticism of the 'legal' techniques and justifications on which they rely to sustain their decisions, but also to criticism of their (actual or supposed) political motivation for reaching a decision. In S v Mamabolo (E TV, Business Day and Freedom of Expression Institute intervening)[3] the Constitutional Court said that, in a constitutional democracy, politically inspired criticism of the judiciary is not improper per se, and that the conventional common-law offence of scandalizing a court simply by criticizing its decisions on political grounds cannot survive constitutional scrutiny. Vocal public scrutiny of the courts' performance may serve as 'a democratic check on the judiciary',[4] and ideally > robust and informed public debate about judicial affairs promotes peace and stability, by convincing those who have been wronged that the legal process is preferable to vengeance; by assuring the meek and humble that might is not right; by satisfying business people that commercial undertakings can be efficiently enforced; and, ultimately, as far as they all are concerned, that there exists a set of just norms and a trustworthy mechanism for their enforcement.[5]

Finally, theoretical accounts assessing and determining trends in constitutional adjudication make much of the impact of socio-political realities on determining specific outcomes in such adjudication. Far from being perceived as an interpretive predicament, politics, in these accounts, aids an understanding of why constitutional decisions — in general and in specific instances — go a certain way. More will be said about theoretical accounts of constitutional adjudication later on.[6]

[1] Act 133 of 1993.
[2] Baloyi (supra) at para 30.
[3] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo').
[4] Ibid at para 30.
[5] Ibid at para 31.
[6] See § 32.3*(c)*(v) infra.

(iv) Purposive interpretation as the increasingly preferred alternative to literalism-cum-intentionalism

Purposive interpretation is slowly supplanting (or has already supplanted, some may claim) literalism-cum-intentionalism as the leading approach to especially constitutional interpretation.[1] The supremacy of authorial intent as alleged prime determinant of meaning is also on unsteady ground. In statutory interpretation 'the intention of the legislature' has, as was pointed out before,[2] been toppled by the supremacy of the Constitution. In constitutional interpretation, original intentionalism has been suspect right from the outset.[3] A key assumption of literalism-cum-intentionalism, namely, that natural language can be clear and unambiguous, is also increasingly being questioned. 'Purpose', in constitutional and statutory interpretation, has probably not and will hopefully not become a prime force akin to 'intention of the legislature' (best expressed in clear and unambiguous language) as it used to reign supreme in mainstream statutory interpretation. Constitutional and legislative purpose can nonetheless pilot interpretive endeavours and outcomes decidedly, as is powerfully illustrated by the majority judgment of the Constitutional Court in African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others.[4]

Section 14(1)(b) of the Municipal Electoral Act[5] requires a party contesting a municipal election to pay a deposit equal to a prescribed amount by means of a bank guaranteed cheque submitted to the office of the local representative of the Electoral Commission by a stipulated cut-off date. A notice of a party's intention to contest the election and its party lists must also be submitted together with the cheque.[6] The African Christian Democratic Party (ACDP), proposing to contest an election in the Cape Town Metro Municipality, submitted their notice and party lists to the Cape Town office of the Electoral Commission, but did not pay the prescribed deposit of R3000,00 in the manner s 14(1)(b) requires. Instead, it submitted a bank guaranteed cheque to the central office of the Electoral Commission in Pretoria, including in one amount all the deposits payable in respect of all the municipalities in which the party wished to contest the election. A list of these municipalities was submitted together with the cheque, but as a result of an administrative oversight the Cape Town Metro was omitted from the

[1] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.
[2] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.
[3] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.
[4] 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party')(O'Regan J). This judgment has enjoyed an enthusiastic reception among proponents of purposive interpretation as interpretive approach of first choice. See W le Roux 'Directory Provisions, Section 39(2) of the Constitution and the Ontology of Statutory Law: African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC)' (2006) 21(2) SA Public Law 382; GE Devenish 'African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission: The New Methodology and Theory of Statutory Interpretation in South Africa' (2006) 123 South African Law Journal 399.
[5] Act 27 of 2000.
[6] Section 14(1)(a).

list, and the bulk amount did not include a deposit for the election in Cape Town. The party discovered the mistake after the deadline for the payment of deposits had passed and after it had decided not to contest elections in certain of the municipalities initially included in its list. This meant that the Commission held a surplus amount of money in favour of the ACDP, who then requested the Commission to use that credit (or part of it) as deposit for the election in the Cape Town Metro. The Commission refused to do so, contending that the prescribed procedure and deadline for party registrations were peremptory, and that the ACDP's failure to comply fully with both could not be condoned.

On appeal against this decision, the Electoral Court agreed with the Commission, and the ACDP thereupon turned to the Constitutional Court for relief. The majority of the Court held that payment of the deposit in Pretoria for participation in respect of the election in municipalities subsequently uncontested by the ACDP sufficed as payment of the deposit for the Cape Town Metro election. The Court emphasized that it was not condoning the ACDP's non-compliance with peremptory registration requirements. Rather, the Court concluded, by doing what the ACDP did the party was indeed complying with these requirements.[1] Actual compliance was thus not required to be compliance in accordance with the letter of the law: circuitous and arguably even unintended compliance, duly serving the purpose of the provision in question, sufficed. This conclusion meant reaping the greatest possible advantage from the elasticity of the language of s 14(1) to achieve optimum realization, first, of the immediate purpose of the provision itself, namely 'to ensure that a deposit is paid by a political party to establish that they have a serious intention of contesting the election';[2] second, of the purpose of the Act as a whole, namely to encourage and facilitate participation in (rather than allow exclusion from) municipal elections; and, third and ultimately, of a core purpose of the Constitution, namely, to sustain multi-party democracy through free and fair elections.[3] This core purpose is articulated, as an assertion of values key to multi-party, democratic government, in FC s 1*(d)*. The purposive picture painted by the Court displaces the literal statutory arrangement that a deposit must be paid at a particular designated place (or, for that matter, before the expiration of a stipulated deadline).

Wessel le Roux neatly depicts the Court's modus operandi — and the decided shift from literalism to purposivism that it involved — as follows:

> The Court resolves the case, not by asking what the phrase 'office of the Commission's local representative' means linguistically, but by asking what the purpose of that phrase is within the context of election law. The Court is not pursuing an abstract definition but an operative effect. The concern with the linguistic meaning of the phrase is at the same time

[1] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 34.
[2] Ibid at para 27.
[3] Ibid at paras 15, 20 and 31-33.

> dismissed as an 'unduly narrow' (read textualist or literalist) approach to statutory interpretation. By contrast, the broader (read purposive) approach which the Court favours includes the following distinct steps: (i) establish the central purpose of the provision in question; (ii) establish whether that purpose would be obstructed by a literal interpretation of the provision; if so, (iii) adopt an alternative interpretation of the provision that 'understands' (read promotes) its central purpose; and (iv) ensure that the purposive reading of the legislative provision also promotes the object, purport and spirit of the Bill of Rights.[1]

Laudable as this shift is, however, it should not to be construed as a panacea for all the ills that attach to conventional (literalist and formalist) approaches to constitutional interpretation.[2] The following cautionary reminder by Gildenhuys J still holds:

> Important as the purpose of legislation may be, elevating it to the prevailing factor of interpretation will not, in my view, always provide the key to unlock meaning.[3]

Similar words of circumspection were sounded by Kroon and Froneman JJ slightly more than two months after the onset of constitutional democracy in South Africa:

> [I]t serves little purpose to characterise the proper approach to constitutional interpretation as liberal, generous, purposive or the like. These labels do not in themselves assist in the interpretation process and carry the danger of introducing concepts or notions associated with them which may not find expression in the Constitution itself.[4]

Purposive interpretation, as these judges would agree, has the potential to turn into a rather unruly horse if three caveats are not heeded.

First, the processes involved in constitutional and statutory interpretation are too complex to be captured in one essential(-ist) or predominant catchword. A sensible word of advice to all construing the Final Constitution will thus be to resist this temptation.

Second, it must be realized (and recognized) that a generous or broad interpretation of the Final Constitution, and the Bill of Rights in particular, as envisaged by, among others, the Constitutional Court,[5] is not necessarily tantamount

[1] Le Roux 'Directory Provisions' (supra) at 386.

[2] See GE Devenish 'Review of D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers and D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1995) Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 595, 597.

[3] In re Former Highlands Residents: Sonny v Department of Land Affairs 2000 (2) SA 351 (LCC) at para 12. See also C Botha Statutory Interpretation: An Introduction for Students (3rd Edition, 1998) 31. For a critique of Botha's position at the time, see J de Ville 'Meaning and Statutory Interpretation' (1999) 62(3) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 373, 377–378.

[4] Qozoleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 633G (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 80D (E)('Qozoleni'). See M Sachs (ed) Grundgesetz Kommentar (3rd Edition, 2002) 17 (Contends that teleological interpretation is 'nicht ein Synonym für die Auslegung überhaupt, sondern meint die weitergehende, verfeinernde Berücksichtigung eines anderweitig festgestellten Regelungszieles in den jeweiligen Spezialzusammenhängen' ['not a synonym for interpretation as such, but refers to a further, refined consideration of a regulative objective determined in another way within the particular context of the subject-matter'] thereby confirming the sentiments expressed in the two dicta here cited.)

[5] See Zuma (supra) at para 14; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 1 SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('National Coalition 1999') at para 21. See also § 32.1*(b)* supra.

to construing the Constitution purposively: purposive interpretation can also be restrictive, precisely because a purpose can be restrictive.[1]

Third, purposive interpretation can at any rate not simply begin (and end) by giving effect to the (alleged) purpose of a provision to be construed, because the purpose of a provision can simply not be known prior to interpretation. 'Purpose' can be established only through interpretation. The interpretation of enacted law is by its very nature purpose-seeking.[2] The attempted determination of a constitutional or legislative purpose undisciplined by studious interpretation too easily seduces an interpreter to read a purpose or object into a provision prematurely, and therefore in an arbitrary manner, shedding the responsibility to justify or, at least, explain his or her preference.[3] In pre-1994 South African case law optimum effect was sometimes given to harsh statutory provisions, gratuitously interfering with fundamental rights, precisely because they were construed 'purposively'.[4] Some writers therefore argue that purposive interpretation should enjoy the status of a secondary (as opposed to a primary) mode of interpretation.[5] Similarly, some South African scholars, mindful of the pitfalls of unrestrained purposive interpretation, have put forward what they call a teleological approach to constitutional interpretation in particular. This approach, while still thoroughly purposive,[6] takes us beyond ad hoc purposivism, and aspires in the interpretation of individual constitutional (and statutory) provisions, to realize the 'scheme of values' on which the constitutional order is premised.[7] This 'value-activating interpretation',[8] in other words, goes beyond the design or purpose that lies behind an individual provision and invokes the entire scheme of values said to inform the legal and constitutional order in its totality.[9] Teleological interpretation has not yet been

[1] See Soobramoney (supra) at para 17; SA National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 28. See also § 32.1*(b)* supra.

[2] See L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 85. For a further explication of the features of 'enacted law', see §§ 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

[3] Judicial observations to the effect that 'a purposive approach to interpretation does not do away with the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation') must probably be understood as words of caution. See Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd 2001 (3) SA 1293 (LCC) at para 51 n 115. See also Minister of Land Affairs v Slamdien 1999 (4) BCLR 413 (LCC) at para 16.

[4] See, for example, Rossouw v Sachs 1964 (2) SA 551 (A); H McCreath 'The "Purposive Approach" to Constitutional Interpretation' in Constitution and Law II (1998) 65–68; E Mureinik 'Administrative Law in South Africa' (1986) 103 South African law Journal 615, 620.

[5] See F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (1999) 10 Stellenbosch Law Review 269, 275–276; F Müller Juristische Methodik I (8th Edition, 2002) 278–279. See also M Sachs (ed) Grundgesetz Kommentar (3rd Edition, 2002) 17 (Sachs claims that teleological interpretation 'hat keinen selbständigen, primären Anknüpfungspunkt, sondern baut auf (den) anderen aspekten auf' ['has no independent, primary starting point, but builds upon (the) other aspects'].)

[6] 'Purposive' and 'teleological' are largely synonyms, but see § 32.5*(c)*(iii) infra.

[7] See Mureinik 'Administrative Law in South Africa' (supra) at 623-624.

[8] See CJ Botha Waarde-aktiverende Grondwetuitleg: Vergestalting van die Materiële Regstaat (1996)(LLD Thesis, University of South Africa.)

[9] See G Carpenter 'More about Language, Meaning and Statutory Interpretation' (1999) 62(4) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 626, 633.

explained in the case law in quite this way. However, there have been dicta in cases dealing with constitutional interpretation where the line of reasoning that informs the teleological approach, or a line of reasoning akin to it, has been approved.[1] In African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others, the majority of the Constitutional Court convincingly showed how the immediate purpose of a particular provision (in casu s 14(1) of the Municipal Electoral Act) can be construed as feeding into the broader purpose of the Act as a whole, and eventually, through its effectual embeddedness in the Act, into constitutional core values informing (even) the founding provisions in the Final Constitution. In casu the immediate purpose of the provision in question, namely to procure payment of a deposit establishing that a political party has a serious intention to contest an election, was held to feed into the purpose of the Act as a whole, namely to encourage and facilitate (rather than discourage and hinder) participation in municipal elections, and ultimately, through its effectual embeddedness in an Act designed to promote constitutional objectives, into constitutional core values sustaining multi-party democracy through free and fair elections. These core values are bold assertions of the founding provisions in s 1*(d)* of the Final Constitution. The modus operandi of the majority of the Constitutional Court strikingly illustrates that teleological interpretation is an enriched version of purposive interpretation and moves from the effectual acknowledgement of the purpose of a particular provision to the realization and fulfilment of values and purposes key to the legal and constitutional order as a whole.

Can purposive interpretation as teleological interpretation then indeed be proffered as an alternative to conventional literalist-cum-intentionalist interpretation? The answer to this question is not a simple 'yes' or 'no'. That the former has contributed significantly to the demise of the primacy traditionally bestowed upon the latter has been all to the good. However, this recent turn of events still does not justify affording one interpretive approach pride of place among the others. It is preferable and possible to work towards a meaningful and creative coexistence of various interpretive approaches (qua reading strategies) that sustain and enrich one another.

(c) Theories of, theoretical positions on, and leitmotivs in constitutional interpretation

The word 'theory' is used rather loosely in legal parlance and in connection with constitutional interpretation too. After almost a decade and a half of constitutional democracy and constitutional jurisprudence in South Africa, it is still not possible to catalogue comprehensively the theories of constitutional interpretation developed and/or named by the courts. It is of course not part of the primary business of courts to proclaim theories of constitutional (or any other form of) interpretation by name, and to attend to the sustained and systematic development of such theories.[1] Theory-building is rather what legal scholars do when they observe and try to explain what is happening when role players in various contexts and capacities engage with the Constitution-in-writing. Constitutional scholars focus and reflect mostly on how the Constitution is construed in practice (and mostly by the courts). In South Africa scholarly work on theories of constitutional interpretation has mostly been anticipatory in nature, considering comparative examples of what could in time gain currency as fully-fledged theories of constitutional interpretation in this country.[2] In a similar vein the discussion that follows will explore the possibility and desirability of the development of typical South African theories of constitutional interpretation, and the relevance of the hitherto crystallized (and previously discussed[3]) common-law theories of statutory interpretation in the process. It will also be argued that (and shown how), in the absence of fully-fledged theories of constitutional interpretation in South Africa, theoretical positions on constitutional interpretation have been manifest in interpretive leitmotivs, in other words, in recurring keynote or defining ideas, motifs or topoi, that have to an appreciable extent guided constitutional interpretation in practice.

[1] See, for example, Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Matiso 2') at para 46 (Sachs J); Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('De Klerk') at para 181 (On the role of the Constitution in the legal order in a constitutional democracy); Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 684D-E (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19, 30F-G (E).

(i) Three comparative examples

Given the breadth of experience with constitutional interpretation in other jurisdictions, it is worth briefly canvassing how 'theory' features in constitutional interpretation in Germany, Nigeria and the USA. The jurisprudence in these states will serve as a preface to a discussion of the (possible) place and role of 'theory' in South African constitutional interpretation.

German constitutional interpretation is not so much concerned with theories of interpretation as such, but with theories of fundamental rights (Grundrechtstheorien) instead.[4] Five such theories have been discernible in the jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court:

(aa) The classical liberal theory of fundamental rights emphasizes the primacy of constitutional guarantees of civil rights and liberties crucial to the realization of the freedom of the individual in the constitutional state (Rechtsstaat). This is believed to be best achieved by holding the powerful state at bay.

[1] See S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 South African Law Journal 762, 784 ('Courts rarely offer theories of what they do'.)

[2] D Davis, M Chaskalson & J de Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism: The Role of Constitutional Interpretation' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 11-19 and 103-121; GE Devenish A Commentary on the South African Bill of Rights (1999) 615-617.

[3] See § 32.3*(a)* supra.

[4] See E Böckenförde 'Grundrechtstheorie und Grundrechtsinterpretation' (1974) 27 Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 1529. For an English translation of this work, see E Böckenförde State, Society and Liberty: Studies in Political Theory and Constitutional Law (1991) 175-203. See also M Sachs (ed) Grundgesetz Kommentar (3rd Edition, 2002) 53-55 and Davis, Chaskalson & de Waal (supra) at 85-103. For a comprehensive treatment of the subject, see R Alexy Theorie der Grundrechte (1985).

(bb) The institutional theory of fundamental rights focuses not so much on safeguarding 'a sphere of individual and social liberty in which individuals, legally speaking, may do as they subjectively wish. They [the fundamental rights] are more like objective organisational principles for the sphere of rights they protect. They emerge and are realised in normative provisions of an institutional nature that are upheld by the idea of order enshrined in the basic rights and as such mould living-conditions.'[1]

(cc) The value theory of fundamental rights holds fundamental rights to be elements and instruments in the creation of the state as (ideally) a community of shared experience, culture and values. The fundamental rights standardize a system of values or commodities lending a 'material status' to individuals increasingly integrated as a people and a distinct nation.[2]

(dd) The democratic-functional theory of fundamental rights contends for a reading of these rights from the perspective that they fulfil a public, political function. The existence and functioning of free processes in the democratic state (for example, freedom of expression, freedom of assembly and association) indeed constitute such a state, lend meaning to fundamental rights and are therefore to be safeguarded. There is no room for the notion of innate rights, that is, rights preceding the existence of the democratic state.[3]

(ee) The welfare-state theory of fundamental rights emphasizes the impossibility of a duly fulfilled safeguarding of 'classical' fundamental rights (and 'freedom rights' in particular) as long as socio-economic needs have not been duly attended to:

> It is [the] gulf between legal and actual liberty as enshrined in the basic rights that the welfare-state theory of those rights seeks to bridge . . . [B]asic rights no longer have a purely negative, delimiting character; they also give individuals certain claims upon the state in respect of social services. The thing to be guaranteed is no longer seen as simply an abstract legal liberty but as real liberty.[4]

None of the theories aforesaid enjoys pre-eminence in the jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court, and the FCC, in particular cases, chooses freely — too freely to the taste of some, it would seem[5] — the theory upon which it will rely. This free choosing, which Michael Sachs[6] positively depicts as theoretical multifunctionality (Multifunktionalität), is commensurate with the kind of state envisaged in s 20(1) of the German Basic Law — a state which is simultaneously a pluralistic party-state, a constitutional state, a competitive democracy, a social state and a federal state.[7]

[1] Böckenförde State, Society and Liberty (supra) at 184.
[2] Ibid at 189.
[3] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(cc) infra, for an opposite view. For an explanation of this theory, see Böckenförde State, Society and Liberty (supra) at 192.
[4] See Böckenförde State, Society and Liberty (supra) at 195-196.
[5] Ibid at 198-203.
[6] See Sachs (supra) at 55.
[7] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(bb) infra.

The theories of fundamental rights as significant determinants of interpretive outcomes are distinguished from the methods of (constitutional) interpretation (Methoden der Verfassungsinterpretation).[1] In a nutshell, these methods are, first, the classical hermeneutical method in which FC von Savigny's four 'methods' of interpretation — grammatical, systematic, teleological and historical interpretation — hold a central place. This Von Savigny Quartet will figure prominently towards the end of this chapter.[2] Second, there is the method of interpretation known as the hermeneutical concretization of norms through rational arguments. Third, the topical method focuses on interpretation as problem solving through free and open argumentation rather than strict adherence to the (supposed) meaning of provisions gleaned from the Constitution-in-writing. Finally, what is known in German as the wirklichkeitswissenchaftlich orientierte Methode orients itself toward the meaning and reality of the Constitution rather than its wording and dogmatic conceptuality.

While, as 'ways of doing', the methods of constitutional interpretation can themselves not appropriately be described as 'theories of interpretation',[3] they do reflect discernible theoretical orientations or positions. In addition to the theories and methods of constitutional interpretation the Germans also rely on principles of constitutional interpretation (such as reading the Constitution as a whole and giving optimal effect to its norms)[4] and canon-like interpretive means (Auslegungsmittel) closely associable with the Savignian quartet of reading strategies.[5]

In Nigerian constitutional jurisprudence — as presented by Chuks Okpaluba[6] — much is made of the essential dissimilarity between constitutional interpretation, as an interpretive genre sui generis, and ordinary statutory interpretation.[7] Principles of constitutional interpretation have been laid down in the constitutional jurisprudence of courts at the highest level,[8] but no explicit mention is made of theories of interpretation. Of course, the principles of constitutional interpretation articulated by the courts do, to some extent at least, manifest theoretical orientations. The Nigerian example is eye-catching in that, with a few exceptions, the

[1] See E Böckenförde 'Die Methoden der Verfassungsinterpretation — Bestandaufnahme und Kritik' (1976) 29 Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 2089 features very prominently. See also I Von Münch Staatsrecht I (6th Edition, 2000) 11-13; DP Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 42-45; Sachs (supra) at 15-19 (The latter approaches the matter somewhat differently compared to the other sources referred to in this footnote.)

[2] See § 32.5*(c)* infra.

[3] See Davis, Chaskalson & de Waal (supra) at 103-120.

[4] See Von Münch (supra) at 13.

[5] See Sachs (supra) at 15-18.

[6] See C Okpaluba Judicial Approach to Constitutional Interpretation in Nigeria (1992) Part I.

[7] Ibid at 8-17. Questions regarding the appropriate relationship between constitutional and statutory interpretation will be dealt with more fully at a later stage. See § 32.4*(a)* infra.

[8] See Archbishop Anthony Okogie & Others v Attorney-General of Lagos State (1981) 2 NCLR 337; Attorney-General of Bendel State v Attorney-General of the Federation & Others (1982) 3 NCLR 1, 77-78.

formulated principles of constitutional interpretation are equally applicable to constitutional and statutory interpretation and do not really reflect a stance sui generis on many of the vexed theoretical questions encountered when reading a constitution. The Nigerian Constitution is to a large extent construed with reliance on the conventional canons of statutory interpretation, including the golden and mischief rules, and rules of restrictive and extensive interpretation, such as the eiusdem-generis and the expressio unius rules respectively. Far be it for me to suggest that the Nigerian model reflects an untenable state of affairs. Relevant to note for the present discussion and for the moment, though, is that the approach just mentioned has not given rise to a clearly discernible, theory oriented discourse and reflection on constitutional interpretation in particular.

In the eye of the South African beholder, the theories of constitutional interpretation in US constitutional jurisprudence and scholarship share a pedigree with English common-law theories of statutory interpretation. US constitutional scholars and adjudicators generally agree on the features and broad categorization of theories of constitutional interpretation. There is, however, no unanimity on exact appellations and detailed classifications. According to a comprehensive yet discerning catalogue of theories of constitutional interpretation, propounded by Walter F Murphy, James E Fleming and Sotirios A Barber,[1] the following types of and specific theories dominate US jurisprudence:

(A) Textualism. Theories of this type all somehow assume that provisions of the Constitution-in-writing (autonomously) bear meaning which is readily discernible through a straightforward and uncontroversial reading of words and phrases:

> Most basically, textualists are readers; their principal tools are dictionaries and grammars. The process is not unlike translating from one language to another, a project that requires talent as well as knowledge.[2]

One version of textualism is clause bound, and focuses on the various parts of the Constitution-in-writing. Structuralist textualism, on the other hand, is alert to the coherent wholeness of the Constitution-in-writing. Purposive textualism may be complementary to the other two versions, but it is also different. It professes to be able to establish, through straightforward and uncontroversial reading, the purpose or goal of either any specific provision of the Constitution or of the Constitution as a whole, and then to give effect to such a purpose or goal. Textualism smacks of literalism — probably due to their shared formalist traits — but it also goes well beyond literalism without, however, shedding its formalism. Faith in the written Constitution's ability to be an autonomous source and bearer of meaning is thus not incompatible with — or a decided obstacle to — a contextualist and purposive reading of it, but the contextualism and purposivism involved will inevitably be attenuated.

[1] WF Murphy, JE Fleming & SA Barber American Constitutional Interpretation (2nd Edition, 1995) 385-414. The authors point out that approaches to constitutional interpretation in the US are often expressed as distinctions or even dichotomies, for example, strict versus liberal construction, judicial activism versus judicial self-restraint, substance versus proceduralism and interpretivism versus non-interpretivism. Though they briefly discuss these four distinctions, they do not find them very useful because they 'lead into blind analytic alleys'. Ibid at 414–418. For further alternative catalogues of theories of constitutional interpretation in the US, see Davis, Chaskalson & de Waal (supra) 11-19.

[2] Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 386.

To call a type of theory — mostly narrow and formalist in its conception and implementation — 'textualism' is in line with what is to be expected in mainstream thinking on constitutional interpretation. However, broad and post-formalist understandings of the word 'text' in contemporary theories of language and interpretation open the possibility for 'textualism' to denote the exact opposite of narrowness and formalism.

(B) Originalism typically maintains that the Constitution must be read and understood as faithfully as possible in accordance with the original intent of its framers. This means that provisions of the Constitution-in-writing must be construed as they were supposedly understood at the time of their adoption. There are two major varieties of originalism, the one focusing on the understanding and the other on the intentions of the Constitution's 'founders' or 'founding generation', in other words, either the people of 1787 to 1789, or the people of the time when the amendment that stands to be construed was adopted.

(C) Doctrinalism. Doctrinalists profess to work with a developing rather than a static Constitution, searching out past interpretations relating to specific problems and then trying to organize them into a coherent whole and fit the solution of current issues into that whole: 'In the style of the common law, the object is to preserve continuity even if affecting change.'[1] The Constitution-in-writing is silent on a number of quite significant constitutional doctrines that have been developed through constitutional interpretation, for example, direct and indirect effects', 'separate but equal' and 'liberty of contract'. Doctrinalism is alert to these 'provisions' of the 'wider Constitution' and draws particular attention to them.

(D) Developmentalism is a historical approach, but unlike originalism it does not see history as a snap shot of the past, frozen in time. Instead it values history as an ongoing process, 'a moving picture which continues into and beyond the present'.[2] It thus combines elements of both doctrinalism and textualism to reap interpretive benefit from broader historical events, for example, informal practices, usages and even political culture.

[1] Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 394.
[2] Ibid at 395-396.

(E) Philosophic approach. This approach draws attention to the fact that the moral and political theory to which an interpreter subscribes engenders assumptions crucial to shaping her or his interpretation of the Constitution. This will happen whether or not such assumptions are openly acknowledged or even if the interpreter is not aware of them. The philosophic approach encourages interpreters to 'theorize', starting with an acknowledgement that her or his interpretive endeavours are inevitably co-determined by often far-reaching theoretical assumptions, and then to engage in philosophical discourse seeking and pursuing the meaning of vital words and phrases 'through an open and open-minded exchange of reasons that other people can respect'.[1]

(F) Systemic and transcendent structuralism. As was pointed out in paragraph (A) above, structuralist textualism capitalizes on the coherent wholeness of the Constitution-in-writing for interpretive purposes. Systemic structuralism does the same with the coherent wholeness of the legal system, seeking out its inner unity and the common end to which its various segments aim. Transcendent structuralism involves including moral and political theories in that wholeness and reflecting on how they can help 'bring the text, practices, traditions, and interpretations into a coherent whole with the normative demands of the relevant … theories'.[2]

(G) Purposivism. In addition to purposive textualism, Murphy, Fleming and Barber,[3] under the heading 'systemic purpose', distinguish five versions of non-textualist purposivism closely connected with developments peculiar to constitutional interpretation in the USA. The first is a prudential approach conceiving of constitutional interpretation as statecraft. It is premised on the assumption that the goal of the Constitution-in-writing and the polity that has developed from it is that the USA must endure and must do so as a constitutional democracy. The second version of purposivism is 'the doctrine of the clear mistake' which 'seeks to maintain a political system that is both democratic and constitutionalist by apportioning interpretive authority in ways congruent with the duality of that objective'.[4] Third, 'reinforcing representative democracy' as a form of purposive analysis 'stresses judges' obligations to support open political processes'.[5] 'A fourth version of a purposive approach, "protecting fundamental rights", operates from the premise that, insofar as the broader constitution embraces constitutionalism, it requires interpreters, particularly judges, to be especially protective not only of rights to political participation but also of substantive rights against

[1] Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 398.
[2] Ibid at 400.
[3] Ibid at 400-409.
[4] Ibid at 403.
[5] Ibid at 404.

threats by officials who were fairly chosen through open elections.'[1] Finally, the aspirational approach 'takes the nation's ideals very seriously and uses them to structure constitutional interpretation'.[2] It sees the Constitution not just as a set of rules for government but, in a very deep sense, as seeking to show the USA how to become a particular kind of society.

(H) Balancing conceives of constitutional interpretation as a process of striking an equilibrium between opposing claims in society. It received its impetus from sociological jurisprudence prominent in the USA during the early years of the previous century.

The aforesaid authors refer to the theories they discuss as 'approaches'. To them an approach to interpretation, put simply, refers 'to the intellectual path an interpreter follows to seek meaning from that "thing" to be interpreted'.[3] The path itself is a theoretical construction, made of the explanatory qualities of theory, and maintained by theory as justification.[4] In this context 'theory' and 'approach' may thus, it would seem, be used interchangeably.[5] The authors also state that the theories overlap and interact with one another and that none of them, nor a combination of them, can turn constitutional interpretation into an exact science.[6] (They do not, however, elaborate on this statement.) This implies that a constitutional interpreter never really pledges exclusive allegiance to any one theory. All interpreters, for instance, work with a constitution-in-writing and this means textualism in some form is an inevitable building-block of all 'intellectual paths' associable with constitutional interpretation.[7]

Frank Michelman,[8] relying on a leaner and less detailed (and more 'conventionally American') list of theories of or approaches to constitutional interpretation, makes a similar point which is worth noting in the South African context, where no theories of constitutional interpretation have so far really crystallized. First on Michelman's 'kind of standard list of interpretative approaches or methods available to constitution adjudicators — from which, it's sometimes

[1] Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 406.
[2] Ibid at 408.
[3] Ibid at 383.
[4] It was pointed out earlier that in legal interpretation the so-called theories of interpretation (and especially theories of statutory interpretation) are explanatory and justificatory at the same time and can also be referred to as 'interpretative approaches'. See § 32.3 supra.
[5] See Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 383–384 (The authors support the proposition without exactly saying so.)
[6] Ibid at 383-384.
[7] Ibid at 383.
[8] See FI Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation with Professor Frank Michelman' (1995) 11 South African Journal on Human Rights 477 (The seminar upon which this article is based took place at the Centre for Applied Legal Studies from 23 to 25 January 1995 and was organised to discuss critical issues relating to the Bill of Rights (Chapter 3) in South Africa's Interim Constitution.)

imagined, a judge chooses one (or perhaps just falls into one)'[1] — is literalism, which applies 'the text to the case according to the ordinary meaning of the words, as … a Martian would construe them who was fluent in the country's standard language usages'.[2] Second is intentionalism, 'applying the clause as one judges the writer of it would have done', and third is purposivism, 'applying the clause in the way that one judges will best accomplish the lawmaker's primary or higher or transcendent purpose, even if the concrete results would somewhat surprise the lawmaker'.[3] Fourth, '[i]nstrumentalism is determining the sense of the application of a legal text or doctrine's application to a particular case by first comparing the predicted social consequences of applying it in one or the other sense, and then preferring the sense that has the preferred consequences, as measured by a kind of ad hoc or pragmatic common sense'.[4] Finally, '[m]oralism is determining concrete applications by reference to a high-level, substantive moral theory supposed to be instantiated by the Constitution as a whole'.[5] How does a judge (or any other constitutional interpreter for that matter) choose between these approaches? Michelman is adamant that he or she does not choose and in actual fact cannot choose: the approaches > cannot be alternatives among which a judge chooses; they are multiple poles in a complex field of forces, among which judges navigate and negotiate. I don't believe that any responsible constitutional adjudicator will end up, over any interesting run of cases ignoring any of the factors: perceived verbal significations, perceived concrete intentions, perceived general purposes, perceived and evaluated social consequences, perceived and intuited normative theories or unifying visions.[6]

For argument's sake, Michelman assumes that the five '-isms' above can broadly be classified into two groups that 'may seem to stand on opposite sides of an important divide', namely objectivist[7] approaches (literalism, intentionalism and purposivism) and non-objectivist (instrumentalist and moralist) approaches.[8] This distinction reflects a popular view which Michelman then criticizes by pointing out that objectivism is by no means a more reliable point of reference to distinguish between interpretive approaches: objectivism more often than not draws on profoundly subjective preferences of the interpreter, while the non-objectivist approaches can quite comfortably be dressed up in the objectivist uniforms of 'external authority'. This observation leads Michelman to the following conclusion:[9]

[1] Michelman 'A Constsitutional Conversation' (supra) at 482.
[2] Ibid at 482.
[3] Ibid at 482.
[4] Ibid at 482.
[5] Ibid at 482.
[6] Ibid at 483.
[7] The 'objectivism' that Michelman here has in mind is the polar opposite of the objectivism previously discussed as an interpretive theory. This theory (also known as the delegation theory) is associated with the freedom for judges to complete and augment the provisions of enacted law through interpretation. See § 32.3*(a)*(vi) supra.
[8] Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation' (supra) at 483.
[9] Ibid at 485.

> On the constitutional level, legal interpretation succeeds by construing legal words, intentions and purposes, yes, but by construing them decidedly in the light of consequences, and by appraising consequences decidedly in the light of an emergent national sense of justice to which the interpretations are themselves, recursively, contributing.

Michelman's observations provide an opportunity to reconsider the role of theories in interpretation, that is, the conventional common-law theories of statutory interpretation, emerging theories of constitutional interpretation and the undeniable affinities between the two. At least Michelman's three 'objectivist' approaches to constitutional interpretation are found among conventional common-law theories of statutory interpretation in South Africa, with perhaps contextualism — that is, determination of meaning by reading words or language or a provision as a whole in context[1] — as a local contender to be added to the list.[2] Judicial flirtation with decidedly 'non-objectivist' approaches to statutory interpretation (such as instrumentalism and moralism) has been rare in South Africa since, as was shown before,[3] the interpretation of enacted law has traditionally been thought of as an apolitical and morally neutral procedure. It was also shown previously how some legal scholars have advocated seemingly (in Michelman's terms) 'less objectivist' approaches to statutory (and, by implication, also constitutional) interpretation, notably the delegation theory and other judicial or free theories of interpretation.[4] These theories recognize and justify judicial activism, premised on the belief that judges have a creative role to play in the realization or concretization of enacted law. Constitutionalism and constitutional interpretation, associated with increased and increasing demands on the judiciary to make and to help ensure the implementation of policy decisions, have thus been conducive to the onset and growth of such 'non-objectivist' theories.[5]

Since a theory is explanatory and justificatory at the same time, a legal interpreter's theory of interpretation may cause him or her to relate, intentionally or intuitively, issues of interpretation in a concrete situation, to broader questions regarding, among others, the role and function of language in law and the possibility of justice through the reading and realization of written law. An interpretive theory also situates an interpreter's interpretive endeavours in a legal and constitutional tradition with its prevailing understandings of matters of interpretive consequence, such as the nature and division of power (as reflected in, for example, trias politica) and the role appropriate to authorized (judicial and other) interpreters of the law in the system.[6] An approach to interpretation is premised

[1] See § 32.3*(a)*(iv) supra.
[2] See § 32.3*(a)*(i)-(iii) and (v) supra.
[3] See § 32.3*(b)*(iii) supra.
[4] See § 32.3*(a)*(vi) supra.
[5] Note once more that in the scheme (and terminology) of the discussion in § 32.3*(a)*(vi) supra, that the 'objectivism' discussed there would probably be described by Michelman as a 'non-objectivist theory'.
[6] See § 32.2 supra.

on and shaped by theoretical assumptions about the matters just mentioned and by numerous other matters too. In constitutional interpretation these matters may, for instance, manifest in what Michelman called 'an emergent national sense of justice to which … interpretations … recursively' contribute.[1]

What a theory of constitutional interpretation is and entails can also be shown by developing the previously referred to 'path metaphor' on which Walter, Fleming and Barber[2] base their straightforward description of an interpretive approach. Someone's approach to or theory of constitutional interpretation may then be described as the intellectual path he or she follows to seek meaning from the Constitution.[3] This path is a theoretical construction, made or built of theory as explanation, and maintained by theory as justification.

When the notion of a 'theory of constitutional interpretation' is thought of as a position based on assumptions about the crucial matters previously referred to, or as the complexly constructed path just described, it becomes clear why one-word depictions and one-sentence definitions — all parading as 'theories' of or 'approaches' to constitutional interpretation — are by themselves wholly inadequate explanations or explications of and justifications for the doings that constitute 'constitutional interpretation'. Neither literalism, maintaining that the meaning of an enacted provision can and must be deduced from the very words in which the provision is couched, regardless of consequences,[4] nor intentionalism, claiming that discerning and giving effect to the real intention of a law-making author is the paramount rule of interpretation,[5] nor contextualism, making meaning crucially dependent on context,[6] can, for instance, really be a theory of constitutional or statutory interpretation. They can at most help determine a theoretical position.

(ii) Theoretical position(s) in relation to interpretive leitmotiv(s)

A theoretical position is constituted by the assumptions referred to above and reflected in the previously described theoretically constructed path that the constitutional interpreter travels to come to understand and implement the Constitution.[7] As Michelman correctly points out,[8] it is a constitutional interpreter's theoretical position, rather than any specific, conventional approach to constitutional interpretation on which he or she may rely, that determines interpretive outcome. Making an assumption involves making a choice. Theoretical positions on constitutional interpretation emanating from choices thus made therefore order and rank interpretive preferences — as Michelman rightly suggests.[9]

[1] Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation' (supra) at 485.
[2] Murphy, Fleming & Barber (supra) at 383.
[3] Ibid at 383.
[4] See § 32.2*(a)*(i) supra.
[5] See § 32.2*(a)*(ii) supra.
[6] See § 32.2*(a)*(iv) supra.
[7] See § 32.3*(c)*(i) supra.
[8] Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation' (supra) at 484-485. See also § 32.3*(c)*(i) supra.
[9] Ibid at 484-485. See also § 32.3*(c)*(i) supra.

A theoretical position, which is a theoretical disposition at the same time, cannot just be rationally or even consciously decided on, and also emanates from, for instance, intuitive perception. Covert and subconsciously held theoretical assumptions, as a matter of fact, precisely because of an interpreter's uncritical unawareness of them, often have a more decisive impact on interpretive outcome than overt and consciously reasoned assumptions.[1] 'Jurists in practice' (including judicial officers), in particular, do not habitually devote time to reflect specifically on (and explain or justify) their theoretical positions, which mostly become visible in the arguments they use to justify specific interpretive outcomes.[2] A theoretical position may nonetheless be reflected on, contested, defended, explained and (consciously) changed. It may also, to at least some extent, be shared with others although, due to the uniqueness of each individual, no two theoretical positions can be identical in detail.

A judiciary as a whole therefore does not 'decide' on a particular theoretical position on constitutional or statutory interpretation, and the theoretical position of a particular judge may, in fact, vary from case to case, depending on the exigencies of each case and the measure of latitude that the law and the canons of construction allow for deciding the specific issues involved in that case.[3] However, it is possible that, within a given jurisdiction or tradition, a certain kind of theoretical impulse can become so dominant that, in time, it falls into place as a template for positions on and approaches to interpretation.[4] As was shown before, literalism-cum-intentionalism, blending literalism and intentionalism into an approach with elements of both, has for a long time held such a dominant position in statutory interpretation in South Africa,[5] with contextualism and purposivism mostly in auxiliary roles.

Since the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa, the dominant discourse suggests that purposivism has displaced literalism-cum-intentionalism as template for theoretical positions on constitutional (and statutory) interpretation. The present discussion again questions the soundness of this proposition, challenging the misapprehension that reliance on a single preferred approach to constitutional or statutory interpretation can eventually 'make all the difference'. Since 1994 it has mainly been 'an emergent [new] national sense of justice' (à la

[1] See S Fish Doing What Comes Naturally: Change, Rhetoric, and the Practice of Theory in Legal Studies (1989) 358.

[2] Ibid at 483-485.

[3] See, for example, Public Carriers Association & Others v Toll Road Concessionaries (Pty) Ltd & Others 1990 (1) SA 925, 943C–944A (A).

[4] See L du Plessis 'The (Re-)systematization of the Canons and Aids to Statutory Interpretation' (2005) 122 South African Law Journal 591. (Showed how such a template position in South Africa occasioned the development of a hierarchical order of primacy involving the canons of and aids to statutory interpretation.)

[5] See § 32.2*(a)*(iii) supra.

Michelman)[1] — and not any particular interpretive approach — that has navigated constitutional and statutory interpretation in South Africa along previously unexplored paths.

Because a theoretical position is so complex, a full picture of it can hardly be given, and it is most often recognized, quite piecemeal, as it were, by effects or consequences in which it manifests (aspects of) itself, and not as a holistic picture of some sort. Theoretical positions, or aspects of them, can and do, for instance, manifest in interpretive leitmotivs detectable as recurring keynote or defining ideas, motifs or topoi lending direction to specific instances of constitutional interpretation. The same leitmotiv can be a manifestation of aspects of different theoretical positions on constitutional interpretation, but it is hardly conceivable that contradicting or conflicting theoretical positions will manifest in a significant number of similar or corresponding leitmotivs.

Conventional approaches to the interpretation of enacted law, such as literalism-cum-intentionalism or purposivism, are not really leitmotivs because they do not present ideas. The two interpretive leitmotivs that will be discussed below, namely, transitional and transformative constitutionalism, are of purposive purport, conceiving of the objectives they pursue as directional ideas. Leitmotivs moreover often manifest as images in metaphors,[2] as is apparent from the two variants of transitional constitutionalism in South Africa. To the one the Constitution is a bridge to a culture of justification. The other works with the Constitution as memory and promise, picturing it as both a memorial and a monument. And as will be seen in due course, transformative constitutionalists criticize the 'bridge version' of transitional constitutionalism with an alternative depiction and explanation of the very metaphor!

(iii) Transitional constitutionalism

The Interim Constitution concluded with an unusual Postamble (or Postscript), an exhibition of efflorescent language, entitled National Unity and Reconciliation and decreed[3] to form part of the substance of the Constitution. The Postamble anticipated that the Constitution would provide 'a historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice, and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex'. It furthermore verbalized a quest for

[1] Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation' (supra) at 477, 485.

[2] See on the significance of metaphoric reasoning in law, especially in relation to transformative constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv, H Botha 'Metaphoric Reasoning and Transformative Constitutionalism (Part 1)' 2002 Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 612 and H Botha 'Metaphoric Reasoning and Transformative Constitutionalism (Part 2)' 2003 Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 20.

[3] IC s 232(4).

'the pursuit of national unity, the well-being of all South African citizens and peace' requiring 'reconciliation between the people of South Africa and the reconstruction of society'.[1]

The Postamble found its way into the Interim Constitution as an attempt to break a deadlock in the negotiations. The deadlock turned on the constitution-makers' inability to agree, in precise terms and in time for the adoption of the Constitution, on how to deal with 'gross violations of human rights, the transgression of humanitarian principles in violent conflicts and a legacy of hatred, fear, guilt and revenge' inherited from colonial and apartheid rule.[2] The Postamble thus envisaged, in broad terms, the eventual adoption of cut-off dates and 'mechanisms, criteria and procedures' for amnesty 'in respect of acts, omissions and offences associated with political objectives and committed in the course of the conflicts of the past'.[3] The Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act[4] was subsequently enacted, stipulating conditions for such amnesty, and laying down the relevant application procedures.

Much of the spirit and tenor of the Postamble has survived in the Preamble to the FC — with implications for the latter as a possible source of transitional constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv.[5]

(aa) The Constitution as bridge: Justificatory constitutionalism

'What is the point of our Bill of Rights?' Etienne Mureinik asked in one of the earliest commentaries on South Africa's first Bill of Rights.[6] He then set out to answer this question, exploring the bridge metaphor in the Postamble to the Interim Constitution as follows:[7]

[1] It continued as follows:

> The adoption of this Constitution lays the secure foundation for the people of South Africa to transcend the divisions and strife of the past, which generated gross violations of human rights, the transgression of humanitarian principles in violent conflicts and a legacy of hatred, fear, guilt and revenge.

These aims can now be addressed on the basis that there is a need for understanding but not for vengeance, a need for reparation but not for retaliation, a need for ubuntu but not for victimisation.

[2] For more on the nature of the compromise the parties reached, see D Dyzenhaus Truth, Reconciliation and the Apartheid Legal Order (1998) 1-6.

[3] The following guidelines were laid down:

> In order to advance such reconciliation and reconstruction, amnesty shall be granted in respect of acts, omissions and offences associated with political objectives and committed in the course of the conflicts of the past. To this end, Parliament under this Constitution shall adopt a law determining a firm cut-off date, which shall be a date after 8 October 1990 and before 6 December 1993, and providing for the mechanisms, criteria and procedures, including tribunals, if any, through which such amnesty shall be dealt with at any time after the law has been passed.

[4] Act 34 of 1995.

[5] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(aa) infra.

[6] IC Chapter 3.

[7] E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 South African Journal on Human Rights 31, 31-32.

> If this bridge is successfully to span the open sewer of violent and contentious transition, those who are entrusted with its upkeep will need to understand very clearly what it is a bridge from, and what a bridge to. What the bridge is from is a culture of authority . . . an indispensable nursery for the feature of apartheid that most people would consider its defining characteristic: the reduction to law of racial discrimination — differentiation on the ground of race that is not justified. Without a culture of authority it is difficult to imagine how its gardeners could have cultivated the forest of apartheid statutes whose most distinctive feature was their want of justification.
>
> If the new Constitution is a bridge away from a culture of authority, it is clear what it must be a bridge to. It must lead to a culture of justification — a culture in which every exercise of power is expected to be justified; in which the leadership given by government rests on the cogency of the case offered in defence of its decisions, not the fear inspired by the force at its command. The new order must be a community built on persuasion, not coercion.
>
> If the Constitution is to be a bridge in this direction, it is plain that the Bill of Rights must be its chief strut. A Bill of Rights is a compendium of values empowering citizens affected by laws or decisions to demand justification . . . The point of the Bill of Rights is consequently to spearhead the effort to bring about a culture of justification. That idea offers . . . a resource with which to resolve the interpretive questions that it [Chapter 3 of the Interim Constitution] raises.

Justification and transition-as-a-bridge are not intrinsically related, but combining them presented an unusually powerful image of the 'culture of justification' that many — like Mureinik — believed to be the quintessence of the new constitutional dispensation in South Africa. To this day Mureinik's articulation of (especially) what 'the new Constitution' clearly 'must be a bridge to' has been cited with approval and appreciation by South African courts and the Constitutional Court in particular,[1] and has thereby indeed established itself as an interpretive leitmotiv of consequence, more aptly depicted as justificatory rather than transitional constitutionalism.

Many administrative law issues that fall within the precincts of 'the culture of justification' have since 30 November 2000 been subject to the regulative authority of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[2] PAJA is original

[1] Here is a list of examples, by no means complete, spanning the constitutional case law between 1994 and 2007: Qozoleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 634E-F (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 80G-81D (E)('Qozoleni'); Phato v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape & Another; Commissioner of South African Police Services v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape & Others 1995 (1) SA 799, 813H-I (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 99, 111I-J (E); Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25; The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA. In re: The Ex parte Application of the President of the RSA 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at para 85 n 107; Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele') at para 100; Union of Refugee Women & Others v Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others 2007 (4) SA 395 (CC), 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC) at para 36. Mureinik's seminal insights, as articulated in the quotation above, manifest a particular view of the justificatory and evaluative significance of judicial review more fully explained by David Dyzenhaus in a posthumous tribute to Professor Mureinik. See D Dyzenhaus 'Law as Justification: Etienne Mureinik's Conception of Legal Culture' (1998) 14 South African Journal on Human Rights 11.

[2] Act 3 of 2000.

legislation required by FC s 33(3) and enacted to give specific effect to the fundamental right to administrative justice entrenched in the Bill of Rights.[1] Some Constitutional Court judgments have, however, also contributed substantially to establish a culture of justification as the benchmark for administrative action.

Perhaps the finest example of justificatory constitutionalism appears in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re ex parte President of the RSA & Others.[2] The Constitutional Court, for instance, proclaimed the essential unity of the Constitution and administrative common law in dealing with the exercise of public power.[3] It rejected a suggestion — of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Rennie Group Ltd trading as Renfreight[4] — that any common law from an era predating the onset of a constitutional culture of justification could survive undisturbed. The judgments in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others[5] and Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amicus Curiae*)*,[6] duly accounting for the effects of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, have also contributed significantly to the culture of justification in administrative law.

Justificatory constitutionalism is of course not only of consequence in relation to administrative justice. The Constitutional Court's judgment in First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance[7] developed a set of guidelines for determining when a deprivation of property is arbitrary and hence unjustified. Despite academic criticism, FNB looks on its face to be the kind of contribution to justificatory Mureinik must have anticipated when he spelt out his understanding of crossing the bridge of transition in South Africa. Adjudicative determination of the issue of arbitrariness was overdue and necessary for the peace of mind of propertied beneficiaries under FC s 25 (the property clause) and to promote legal certainty. The advantages of this landmark judgment have, however, been eroded to some extent in Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another; Bissett & Others v Buffalo City Municipality; Transfer

[1] FC s 33(1).
[2] 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC).
[3] See also §§ 32.4*(c)(i)(ff) and 32.5(b)*(iii)(bb) infra. The judgment predates the commencement of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.
[4] 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (CC), 1999 3 SA 771 (SCA).
[5] 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC).
[6] 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC)('New Clicks').
[7] 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC), 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC)('FNB') at para 100.

Rights Action Campaign & Others v MEC for Local Government and Housing, Gauteng & Others.[1] The flexible and context-sensitive manner in which the FNB[2] guidelines, as conceptual distinctions, were converted into a multi-factor balancing test in Mkontwana[3] probably paved the way for deviation from them in Mkontwana.[4]

If FNB has the potential to ensure property owners' peace of mind,[5] then the Constitutional Court judgment in Alexkor Ltd & Another v The Richtersveld Community & Others,[6] and the preceding judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in the same case,[7] certainly have the potential to kindle the aspirations of the landless, prospective beneficiaries of FC s 25 – especially communities and individuals dispossessed under a colonial and apartheid culture of authority.[8] The Richtersveld judgments have gone a long way in bringing the common law on indigenous title within the ambit of justificatory constitutionalism — just as FNB has accomplished a similar end with respect to Roman-Dutch based common law of property.[9]

A high threshold of justification applies when legislative and administrative action, likely to compromise the rudiments of constitutional democracy, is up for constitutional review. In the course of such review South Africa's two highest courts have emerged as staunch guardians of, for instance, participatory democracy in law-making. Both the Supreme Court of Appeal, in King & Others v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control & Another,[10] and the Constitutional Court, in Doctors for Life v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others[11] and Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others,[12] required the National Assembly's meticulous compliance with its constitutional obligations[13] to facilitate public involvement in its legislative and other processes, and in its committees, and to conduct its business in an open manner. The absence of thorough compliance with these obligations, it was held, renders legislative action

[1] 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC)('Mkontwana'). For a critical discussion of this case, see AJ van der Walt 'Retreating from the FNB Arbitrariness Test already? Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality; Bissett v Buffalo City Municipality; Transfer Rights Action Campaign v MEC for Local Government and Housing, Gauteng (CC)' (2005) 122 South African Law Journal 75.

[2] FNB (supra) at para 100.

[3] See T Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International Journal for Constitutional Law (forthcoming) and § 32.3*(c)*(v) infra.

[4] See AJ van der Walt 'Retreating from the FNB Arbitrariness Test Already?' (supra) at 75-89.

[5] FNB (supra) at para 100.

[6] 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC).

[7] Richtersveld Community & Others v Alexkor Ltd & Others 2003 (6) BCLR 583 (SCA). See, in particular, the Land Claims Court judgment Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd 2001 (3) SA 1293 (LCC).

[8] See Mureinik 'A Bridge to where?' (supra) at 32.

[9] FNB (supra) at para 100.

[10] 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 462 (SCA)('King').

[11] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life').

[12] Matatiele (supra).

[13] FC s 59(1).

and legislation ensuing from it null and void.[1] African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others can also be described as an instance of guarding the rudiments of popular democracy — in this instance, however, not by strictly enforcing procedural requirements, but by relaxing them (through purposive interpretation) in order to 'promote enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement and participation [in] rather than exclusion' from municipal elections.[2]

(bb) The Constitution as memory and promise: memorial constitutionalism

A constitution both narrates and authors a nation's history. A constitution as memory[3] and promise memorialises the past, but is also a monument triumphantly shedding the shackles of what went before, and setting the nation free to take responsibility for the future. Memorial constitutionalism, like justificatory constitutionalism, is transitional constitutionalism, and in particular then the transitional constitutionalism of memory, in a South Africa (still) coming to terms with its notorious past, but eventually also a constitutionalism of promise along the way of (still) coming to grips with the future. The 'still' in brackets suggests that the transition cannot be likened to a non-recurrent crossing of a bridge, from a culture of authority to a culture of justification, for instance, and this means that, in vital respects, memorial constitutionalism comes closer to transformative than to justificatory constitutionalism — as will appear from the discussion below.[4]

Memorial constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv calls attention to and affirms the power of the unspectacular, non-monumental Constitution as vital (co-)determinant of constitutional democracy in the South Africa of memory and promise. The memorial Constitution does not replace the monumental Constitution, but co-exists with it. The image of the Constitution as monument and memorial emerged from legal scholars' engagement with the work of the South African philosopher, Johan Snyman, on the politics of memory.[5] Memorial

[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal in King (supra) could of course not make a declaration of invalidity because adjudication of the National Assembly's fulfilment of this obligation is, in terms of FC s 167(4)(e), within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

[2] African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party') at para 23.

[3] For an exploration of the 'constitution as memory metaphor', see M Bishop 'Transforming Memory Transforming' in W le Roux & K van Marle (eds) Law, Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid: Ten Years after AZAPO v President of South Africa (2007) 33.

[4] See § 32.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

[5] See J Snyman 'Interpretation and the Politics of Memory' (1998) Acta Juridica 312, 317-321. For South African legal scholars' engagement with the work and ideas of Snyman, see L du Plessis 'The South African Constitution as Memory and Promise' (2000) 11 Stellenbosch Law Review 385; LM du Plessis The South African Constitution as Monument and Memorial, and the Commemoration of the Dead in R Christensen, & P Bodo (eds) Rechtstheorie in rechtspraktischer Absicht: Freundesgabe zum 70 — Geburtstag von Friedrich Müller (2008); K van Marle 'Lives of Action, Thinking and Revolt — A Feminist Call for Politics and Becoming in Post-apartheid South Africa' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 605, 607-612; D Cornell & K van Marle 'Exploring Ubuntu: Tentative Reflections' (2005) 5(2) African Human Rights Journal 195, 202-203; W le Roux 'Undoing the Past through Statutory Interpretation: The Constitutional Court and Marriage Laws of Apartheid' (2005) 26 Obiter 526, 529-530.

constitutionalism kindles the hope that duly and simultaneously acknowledged, the co-existence of the Constitution's monumental and memorial modes of being — which, at a glance, may seem to be at odds — will be mutually inclusive, constructive and invigorating.

Monuments and memorials have memory in common, but exercise it in distinct ways: a monument celebrates; a memorial commemorates. The difference in the (potential) meaning(s) of the two may be subtle, and some dictionaries may even indicate that 'celebrate' and 'commemorate' are synonyms. However, according to memorial constitutionalists they are not really or, at least, not exactly synonymous. Heroes and achievements can be celebrated or lionised. The same does not apply to anti-heroes, failures and blunders: they may be remembered, but they can hardly be celebrated. 'Commemorate' is a feasible synonym for 'remember', while 'celebrate' is an exultant or jubilant mode of remembering. The closeness in meaning of 'celebrate' and 'commemorate' need not be lamented, however. On the contrary, their actual connotations allows for their co-existence. The German Denkmal and Mahnmal capture the same tension. A Denkmal can celebrate (and may even commemorate), but a Mahnmal inevitably also warns (and may even castigate). Monuments and memorials are aesthetic creations, and memorial constitutionalism contends that a constitution may, with interpretive consequences, be thought of as such a creation too. Memorial constitutionalism as both transitional and aesthetic constitutionalism manifests what Wessel le Roux refers to as 'the aesthetic turn in post-apartheid constitutional rights discourse':

> [T]he aesthetic turn in post-apartheid constitutionalism could be interpreted as a direct response to the need for a non-scientific and non-formalised style of public reasoning. That the rejection of science as a model of constitutional law should have resulted in a turn towards art (traditionally regarded as the direct opposite of science) is not at all surprising.[1]

The Final Constitution as product of intense constitution-making deliberations over a period of more than three years can, its plain language notwithstanding, hardly be described as 'a modest text'. Its predecessor, the Interim Constitution, was not such a text either. Both constitutions are monumental 'linguistic data'[2] and it is possible to 'tour their provisions', awestruck by how they evince a diverse and divergent South African nation's most extraordinary, peaceful transition to a non-racial democracy after more than three centuries of oppressive racial and racist aristocracy. The unprecedented Postamble to the Interim Constitution verbalized this transition in monumental language[3] and was then echoed (with interpretive implications) by the Preamble to the Final Constitution.[4] The monumental

[1] W le Roux 'The Aesthetic Turn in the Post-apartheid Constitutional Rights Discourse' 2005(1) Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 101, 107.
[2] See § 32.1*(d)* supra (Constitution as linguistic datum.)
[3] See § 32.3*(c)*(iii) supra.
[4] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(aa) infra.

flare of the Final Constitution furthermore manifests in its affluent enactment of operational democratic and constitutional values meant to help ensure the continued existence of constitutional democracy in South Africa.[1]

Some monumental constitutional judgments have also been handed down by the Constitutional Court, the Constitution's own most significant new creature. Foremost among these decisions was the epoch-making S v Makwanyane & Another[2] in which the each of the 11 judges handed down a separate judgment, but all unanimously declared capital punishment unconstitutional.[3] These judgments were remarkably imbued with value statements dealing not only with the rudiments of human rights as enshrined in South Africa's first Bill of Rights, but also with global human rights standards.[4] A number of other remarkable judgments too have, on the superior strength of the nation's monument to its newfound reconciliation, given short shrift to the remnants of long-cherished, undemocratic preconceptions and prejudices, such as denying accused persons access to police dockets,[5] reverse onuses in criminal proceedings,[6] an obligation to answer incriminating questions during liquidation proceedings,[7] civil imprisonment,[8] stereotyped gender roles[9] and parental[10] roles, as well as anti-gay and anti-lesbian bigotry.[11] On the strength of the entrenchment of rights of access to certain commodities and services mentioned in FC ss 26 and 27, the South

[1] See § 32.4*(c)(i) infra. FC s 1 decrees and depicts the (new) polity as 'one sovereign, democratic state', and then continues to locate human dignity, equality and freedom (among others) at its foundation. § 32.4(c)(i)(bb) infra. FC s 7 delineates the features and functions of the Bill of Rights (§ 32.4(c)(i)(cc) infra), while FC s 36 prescribes the value-sensitive manner in which constitutional rights may be limited (§ 32.4(c)(i)(ee) infra). Section 39, with similar sensitivity, marks the way to interpreting these rights (§ 32.4(c)(i)(ff) infra). Chapter 3 verbalises the high values of co-operative government (§ 32.4(c)(i)(gg) infra) and Chapter 10 those values that ensure proper public administration (§ 32.4(c)*(i)(hh) infra).

[2] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane').

[3] For further discussion of this case, see § 32.3*(e)*(iv) infra.

[4] For a discussion of the monumental moments of Makwanyane, see 32.3*(e)*(iv) infra.

[5] See Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)('Shabalala').

[6] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma').

[7] See Ferreira v Levin; Vryenhoek v Powell 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira').

[8] See Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others('Matiso 2') 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC).

[9] See Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 11 1489 (CC)(Sachs J). See also AJ van der Walt & H Botha 'Coming to Grips with the new Constitutional Order: Critical Comments on Harksen v Lane' (1993) 13 SA Public Law 16, 33.

[10] See Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others, 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR (CC). But see President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC).

[11] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)(National Coalition 1999); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('National Coalition 2000').

African Constitutional Court has also, with monumental flair, flexed its judicial muscle, making it clear to organs of state that their failure to provide these basic services will result in more than just a judicial slap on the wrist.[1]

A democrat and constitutionalist, recalling the oppression of the past, can hardly be cynical about the monumental achievements of South Africa's two supreme constitutions since 1994. But he or she also dare not become complacent about these achievements. One of the key tenets of memorial constitutionalism therefore is that while the Constitution is indisputably the supreme law of the Republic of South Africa,[2] it is not (also) an overarching, all-encompassing, super law. The restrained Constitution is the Constitution as memorial — a written law-text that does not profess to constitute the moral high ground of justice all by itself; instead it reminds the nation of their pledge (and provides them with appropriate legal means) to achieve social justice. The human obligation to do justice cannot, however, ultimately be assigned to any law-text, not even the supreme Constitution, and memorial constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv is a reminder, first, that constitutional minimalism[3] and constitutional absolutism are equally unacceptable, and, second, that, on balance and in the long run, restrained constitutionalism is the most propitious mode of deference to constitutional supremacy.

As Mahnmal constitutionalism, memorial constitutionalism has resounded, in post-apartheid South Africa, the 'Nicht wieder!' ('Never again!') that inspired constitutionalism in a post-Holocaust Germany too.[4] On the strength of Mahnmal constitutionalism, human dignity as a value has gained an upper hand in our constitutional project in general, and in our constitutional equality jurisprudence in particular. The 'never again!' motif, for instance, underlies groundbreaking judgments that interrogate issues of identity and difference. A resoluteness not to repeat the injustices of the past has resulted in the affirmation of the status and dignity of several vulnerable groups and categories of persons who, under the culture of apartheid authority, had been marginalized and stigmatized for their non-compliance with 'mainstream' morality and its preconceptions about how societal life is best organized. Emblematic of the Court's affirmative endeavours

[1] See Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom'); Treatment Action Campaign & Others v Minister of Health & Others (1) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC'). For a fuller discussion of these cases, see § 32.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

[2] According to FC s 2: 'law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled'.

[3] Whether minimalist constitutionalism (as opposed to constitutional minimalism) is acceptable, is a different question raised by, amongst others Iain Currie. See I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 South African Journal on Human Rights 138. The concept of 'minimalist constitutionalism' will briefly be looked at in § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra.

[4] L du Plessis 'German Verfassungsrecht under the Southern Cross: Observations on South African-German Interaction in Constitutional Scholarship in recent History with particular reference to constitution-making in South Africa' in F Hufen (ed) Verfassungen–Zwischen Recht und Politik: Festschrift zum 70–Geburtstag für Hans-Peter Schneider (2008) 531.

is the confidence and forthrightness with which, unperturbed by the conventional public-private divide, it has addressed deficiencies in laws regulating intimate relationships.[1]

Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, the Constitutional Court judgment in which the statutory and common-law exclusion of same-sex life partnerships from the ambit of 'marriage' was held to be unconstitutional, constitutes a high-water mark in the evolution of constitutional jurisprudence on issues of identity and difference. Sachs J, handing down the majority judgment, erected the following verbal memorial to 'the right to be different':

> The acknowledgment and acceptance of difference is particularly important in our country where for centuries group membership based on supposed biological characteristics such as skin colour has been the express basis of advantage and disadvantage. South Africans come in all shapes and sizes. The development of an active rather than a purely formal sense of enjoying a common citizenship depends on recognising and accepting people with all their differences, as they are. The Constitution thus acknowledges the variability of human beings (genetic and socio-cultural), affirms the right to be different, and celebrates the diversity of the nation.[2]

Commenting on religious objections to gay marriages, the Court thought that

> [t]he hallmark of an open and democratic society is its capacity to accommodate and manage difference of intensely-held world views and life styles in a reasonable and fair manner.[3]

In MEC for Education: KwaZulu Natal & Others v Pillay & Others, Langa CJ emphasized that our constitutional project does not only affirm diversity, but actively promotes and celebrates it:

> [O]ur Constitution does not tolerate diversity as a necessary evil, but affirms it as one of the primary treasures of our nation[4] . . . [N]either the Equality Act[5] nor the Constitution require (sic) identical treatment. They require equal concern and equal respect.[6]

[1] Landmark judgments that come to mind in this regard are National Coalition 2000 (Court read words into a statutory provision to extend immigration benefits enjoyed by 'spouses' of South African nationals to same sex life-partners); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)(Words were read into a statutory provision conferring financial benefits on a judge's 'surviving spouse' so as to extend such benefits to a same sex life-partner); Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels')(Surviving 'spouse' reaping benefits from a legislative provision for maintenance was held to include a partner in a Muslim marriage).

[2] 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC), 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC)('Fourie').

[3] Fourie (supra) at para 95.

[4] Ibid at para 92.

[5] Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.

[6] 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at 103.

The Chief Justice's assertions amount to proclaiming, with some monumental flair, a concern stemming from memorial constitutionalism. Thus, the Constitution as monument and the Constitution as memorial can profitably co-exist if the Constitution as monument is not allowed to overpower the Constitution as memorial, and the Constitution as memorial does not enervate the Constitution as monument.

The restrained Constitution as memorial, infused with moral values such as ubuntu, has vindicated 'very ordinary citizens' in low profile (non-Constitutional Court) cases, upholding and/or restoring their dignity in an unspectacular but most powerful way. Thus in Du Plooy v Minister of Correctional Services & Others[1] the Pretoria High Court, exploring the memorial potential of the Constitution to protect the 'underdog', ordered the release of a prisoner sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment for armed robbery, when within the first year of his imprisonment it came to light that his chronic myeloid leukaemia was developing into acute leukaemia. He was terminally ill and his life expectancy was drastically shortened. He also needed palliative care which was not available in prison. Finding the prison authorities' reasons for not wanting to release the applicant irrational and unreasonable, Patel J remarked as follows:

> The applicant is critically ill. He is dying. Imprisonment is too onerous for him by reason of his rapidly deteriorating state of health to continue remaining in jail and to be treated at a prison hospital. What he is in need of is humanness, empathy and compassion. These are values inherently embodied in Ubuntu.[2]

In Scott-Crossley & Others v National Commissioner of South African Police Service & Others[3] the applicants, charged with murder, sought to stay the burial of the remains of a deceased who they allegedly assaulted and whose body they then threw to a pride of white lions in an encampment. What remained of the deceased for the funeral were a skull, broken bones and a finger. The applicants claimed that the funeral had to be postponed because they needed a pathologist to examine those remains in order to assess forensic evidence eventually to be adduced at the criminal trial. Members of the deceased's extended family opposed the application, claiming that in view of certain ritual preparations that had already been made, their custom and belief impelled the burial of the deceased at the precise date, time and place that had been determined for this purpose before the application was brought. Looking at the situation clinically, the Court had to weigh the religious and cultural rights and beliefs of the family against the applicants' right to a fair trial.[4] Patel J found that, in the circumstances of the case, both the

[1] [2004] 3 All SA 613 (T). For a discussion of this judgment as an instance of memorial constitutionalism, see L du Plessis 'Die Grondwet as Gedenkteken en die Werkdadigheid van onopvallende, grondwetlike Kragte' (2005) 70 Koers 535.

[2] Du Plooy v Minister of Correctional Services & Others [2004] 3 All SA 613 (T)('Du Plooy') at para 29.

[3] Ibid.

[4] As intimated previously, it was actually not really necessary for the court to make a finding in this regard because it had already found against the applicants on the issue of urgency. However, Patel J did express a view on the constitutional issue.

deceased's and his relatives' right to human dignity trumped the applicants' right to a fair trial, and he advanced ubuntu as the raison-d'être for the refusal of the application, explaining that:

> Ubuntu embraces humaneness, group solidarity, compassion, respect, human dignity, conformity to basic norms and collective unity, humanity, morality and conciliation.[1]

The Court's judgment sought to reclaim humanity for the deceased (posthumously, as it were) and for his extended family, in spite of (and beyond) the gruesome events which reduced him, as a human being, to a plastic bagful of bones, and bereft his family in a most barbaric way. The Court did this by invoking their right to human dignity — infused with ubuntu — in a powerful yet unspectacular (memorial) manner. The applicants' right to a fair trial was taken seriously, but not treated as an entitlement of monumental proportions overpowering the deceased's and the family's rights from beginning to end.[2]

(iv) Transformative constitutionalism

Some critical legal scholars have questioned justificatory constitutionalism's use of the bridge metaphor to depict transition as a one-off, linear progression from 'the old dispensation' to 'the new', and thus from a culture of authority to a culture of justification. André van der Walt contends for a metaphor perceiving law, as a system of tension, to be a bridge which links a concept of reality to an imagined alternative:

> [T]he bridge metaphor . . . allows for another interpretation where the bridge is not simply an instrument for getting out of one place and into another, but an edifice that is inherently related to the abyss which it spans. Here, the focus is not on the two spaces on either side of the abyss, but on the abyss itself — the bridge is functionally and inherently linked to and obtains its significance from the abyss beneath it, so that the bridge is not a temporary instrument for a single crossing, one way, but allows and invites multiple crossings, in both directions, since there is no inherent value attached to being one side of the bridge rather than the other. In this alternative interpretation of the bridge metaphor the danger is to stay on one side, while the bridge allows us to connect one side with the other.[3]

Wessel le Roux adds that it is not the bridge itself which is significant, but the act of bridging, of linking the past and the future, reality and imagination, in order to create new ideas in the present.[4] Memorial constitutionalism as transitional

[1] Ibid at para 18. As pointed out previously, the word 'ubuntu' appeared in the Postamble to South Africa's Interim Constitution. It was used there to buttress the contention that a new South Africa required a commitment to national reconciliation and a desire — through mutual understanding – to overcome the atrocities and the divisions of the past. See § 32.3(c)(iii) supra.

[2] See, for example, Du Plooy (supra) at paras 11-13 for the court's consideration of this right and a discussion of the possibilities for realising it for purposes of the criminal trial.

[3] AJ van der Walt 'Dancing with Codes — Protecting, Developing and Deconstructing Property Rights in a Constitutional State' (2001) 118 South African Law Journal 258, 295-296.

[4] W le Roux 'Bridges, Clearings, Labyrinths: The Architectual Framing of Post-apartheid Constitutionalism' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 629, 634.

constitutionalism of memory and promise makes very much the same point: South Africa is still coming to terms with its notorious past along the way of still getting to grips with the future.[1] The past cannot and should not be left behind — there is in other words no one-off crossing of the bridge — and the promise of the future gains much of significance from engagement with the past.[2]

Michael Bishop calls the bridge that Van der Walt and Le Roux metaphorically envision, 'a transformative bridge', and explains the significance of this bridge as follows:

> [V]an der Walt and le Roux offer a space in which dialogue and transformation are truly possible, in which new ways of being are constantly created, accepted and rejected and in which change is unpredictable and constant. I would call this a transformative bridge because it envisions constant change and re-evaluation without end, rather than a move from one point to another … [T]he transitional bridge is a path, while the transformative bridge is a space.[3]

What emerges from the discussion so far is that transformative constitutionalism has the potential to affect constitutional (and, more generally, legal) interpretation profoundly and comprehensively, steering, as leitmotiv, both the interpretive mindset (also read: theoretical positions) and the interpretive style (also read: modus operandi) of especially judicial interpreters of the Constitution in an irrevocably new direction.[4] South Africa's Constitution is furthermore thoroughly transformative in character and, as was pointed out earlier, in FC s 7(2) it invites (and arguably compels) optimum realization of the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights. According to Theunis Roux[5] there are 'two ways of going about the business of transformation':

> first, by prohibiting past practices that are deemed to conflict with society's new conception of justice, and, second, by specifying new governing norms as a guide to future conduct.

[1] See § 32.3*(c)*(iii)(bb) supra.

[2] See Van der Walt 'Dancing with Codes' (supra) at 296:

> The linear interpretation of the bridge metaphor of transformation unnecessarily restricts both the past and the future of constitutional democracy in the post-1994 era. The first fallacy is to think that we can rid ourselves of the legacy of the past as eassily as crossing a bridge, leaving our accepted version of the past (and the possibilty of other versions) behind us decisively. The second fallacy is to think that we should be eager to get to the other side of the bridge and get the whole thing behind us, leaving no room for imagining alternative futures.

[3] M Bishop 'Transforming Memory Transforming' in W le Roux & K van Marle (eds) Law, Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid: Ten Years after AZAPO v President of South Africa (2007) 37.

[4] On the impact of transformative constitutionalism on constitutional interpretation and adjudication, see K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 South African Journal on Human Rights 146; M Pieterse 'What Do We Mean When We Talk about Transformative Constitutionalism?' (2005) 20 SA Public Law 155; P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 351.

[5] T Roux 'Continuity and Change in a Transforming Legal Order: The Impact of Section 26(3) of the Constitution on South African Law' (2004) 121 South African Law Journal 466, 467.

Karl Klare, in an article on transformative constitutionalism in which he pays tribute to Etienne Mureinik, the principal proponent of justificatory constitutionalism, typifies the South African Constitution as 'post-liberal' because it simultaneously entrenches the conventional hallmarks of liberal democracy and the basic tenets of (and normative preconditions to) an all-out transformation of the South African society[1] — both of which are facets of what Roux would refer to as South African 'society's new conception of justice'. According to Klare,

> [t]ransformative constitutionalism connotes an enterprise of inducing large-scale social change through nonviolent political processes grounded in law. I have in mind a transformation vast enough to be inadequately captured by the phrase 'reform,' but something short of or different from 'revolution' in any traditional sense of the word. In the background is the idea of a highly egalitarian, caring, multicultural community, governed through participatory, democratic processes in both the polity and large portions of what we now call the 'private sphere.'[2]

Distinctive traits of the transformative South African Constitution are said to be (among others) 'the attainment of substantive equality, the realisation of social justice, the infusion of the private sphere with human rights standards and the cultivation of a culture of justification in public law interactions'.[3] Pius Langa, South Africa's Chief Justice, in an extra-curial writing, conceives of such traits as challenges posed by the transformative Constitution, namely to procure equal access to justice for all, to educate law students who will be able to meet the demands of the kind of legal and social order envisaged in the Constitution, to rid the legal culture of its formalism and to create a climate for and, indeed, encourage national reconciliation.[4] The transformative nature of the Constitution has far-reaching implications for its interpretation and necessitates a decisive makeover of legal culture, especially as it manifests in the conventional manners (and assumptions) of adjudicative reasoning pertinent to the interpretation and implementation of enacted law. Klare writes in this regard, with reference to constitutional interpretation, as follows:

> The Constitution invites a new imagination and self-reflection about legal method, analysis and reasoning consistent with its transformative goals. By implication, new conceptions of judicial role and responsibility are contemplated. Judicial mindset and methodology are part of the law, and therefore they must be examined and revised so as to promote equality, a culture of democracy and transparent governance.[5]

According to Klare, the drafters of the Constitution, having dramatically reworked substantive constitutional foundations and assumptions, could not

[1] Klare (supra) at 153. See also M Pieterse (supra) at 163-164.
[2] Klare (supra) at 150.
[3] Pieterse (supra) 161. See also Langa (supra) at 353-354.
[4] See Langa (supra) at 354-359.
[5] Klare (supra) at 156.

have intended the new Constitution to be interpreted with reliance on conventional legalist methods of interpretation, thereby having its transformative qualities restrained by 'the intellectual instincts and habits of mind of the traditional common or Roman-Dutch lawyer trained and professionally socialized during the apartheid era'.[1] Transformative constitutionalism thus inspires a preference for non-formalist, non-legalist and non-literalist approaches to constitutional interpretation[2] and, very importantly, it explodes the myth that a-political or non-political legal interpretation — and constitutional interpretation, in particular — is achievable.

The Constitutional Court has, however, tended to rely on a rather conventional formalist, legalist and literalist approach to constitutional interpretation.[3] Whether their conservative approach dashes Klare's hopes that transformative constitutionalism would go together with an innovative mode of constitutional interpretation, turns on whether the notion of a 'transformative constitutionalism' amounts to nothing more than, as Theunis Roux has it, 'a distinction without a difference'.[4]

The Constitutional Court judgments most directly and conspicuously inspired by transformative constitutionalism as an interpretive leitmotiv are probably those dealing with the state's obligation to implement socio-economic rights. Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others[5] heralded a wholehearted judicial acceptance of the justiciability of the socio-economic entitlements enshrined in the Bill of Rights (in ss 26 and 27 in particular).[6] It furthermore emphasized competent courts' responsibility to enforce these entitlements by carefully crafting appropriate 'orders with teeth' to redress the disinclination and/or incapacity of government authorities to procure access to the commodities to which the said entitlements pertain. Grootboom blazed the trail for the bold and far-reaching declaratory and mandatory orders in Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others,[7] compelling fulfilment of the state's constitutional mandate (and obligation) to supply and administer Nevirapine to HIV-positive women and their babies.

(v) Theoretical accounts and assessments of constitutional adjudication

According to Jacques de Ville,[8] writing in 2000 with reference to the body of constitutional jurisprudence that had accumulated until then, the general approach

[1] Klare (supra) at 156.
[2] Whether this last proposition always holds will be considered more fully in § 32.3*(d)* infra.
[3] See § 32.5*(d)*(ii)(bb) infra.
[4] For a critique of Klare's notion of transformative constitutionalism, see T Roux 'Tranformative Constitutionalim: A Distinction without a Difference (Unpublished manuscript on file with author, paper given at Conference on Transformative Constitution: Stellenbosch University, 8 September 2008.)
[5] Grootboom (supra).
[6] See Grootboom (supra) at para 20. See also § 32.4*(c)*(i)(cc) infra.
[7] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC').
[8] JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 41.

of the Constitutional Court (and other courts) to constitutional interpretation, at the time, was still very much 'traditionally hermeneutic' (read: 'conventionally legalist').[1] De Ville took courage, however, from seven developments in the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on constitutional interpretation. First, 'certain judges have explicitly elaborated on the constitutional theory that informs their interpretation of constitutional provisions'. Second, 'the impact of the governmental structures on individuals and communities is taken account of'. Third, 'the interests of marginalised groups in society play a crucial role in determining the meaning of constitutional provisions'. Fourth, 'the need to attain substantive equality and eradicate deeply entrenched patterns of inequality infuses the interpretation that is given to various constitutional provisions'. Fifth, there is a willingness 'to take the perspective of those marginalised by the law in deciding whether legislative or executive action is unconstitutional'. Sixth, 'the Court undertakes interpretation (and the determination of values) with the realities of South Africa's social, economic and political circumstances and the specific context which is under scrutiny in mind'. And finally, 'the importance of the development of constitutional principles in the light of which cases should be decided is acknowledged'.[2]

De Ville's impressions, even if accurate, did not add up to a theoretically rigorous account and assessment of adjudicative performance in constitutional matters, since criteria to systematically test — and verify or falsify — his 'findings' were missing from his description. However, De Ville's tacit assumption that there are affinities between constitutional interpretation, broadly understood, and (tendencies in) outcomes of constitutional adjudication, posits a point of departure for a theoretical discourse that is indeed not absent from the academic literature on constitutionalism in South Africa.

An 'international group of scholars … studying the role of courts in new democracies' has, for instance, asked why the Land Claims Court, a 'pro-poor' institution established under the Restitution of Land Rights Act[3] to oversee the reversal of 80 years of state-orchestrated land dispossession, during the first ten years of its existence, played no really meaningful role in the land restitution process and indeed contributed to a new version of land dispossession.[4] In other words, the jurisprudence of the 'pro-poor court' has yielded 'anti-poor outcomes'. A number of judgments of the Land Claims Court were analyzed, on the assumption that the capacity of courts to act as agents of social transformation is influenced by institutional indicators, indicators of the voice of poor

[1] See § 32.3*(c)*(iv) supra.

[2] De Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (supra) at 41-45 (Provides elaborate reference in footnotes to sources and examples supporting his claims.)

[3] Act 22 of 1994.

[4] T Roux 'Pro-poor Court, Anti-poor Outcomes: Explaining the Performance of the South African Land Claims Court' (2004) 20 South African Journal on Human Rights 511, 512.

groups, resource indicators and indicators of access to justice barriers. The group concluded that the influence of legal formalism in the professional legal culture of South Africa adequately explained the anti-poor outcomes in most of the cases studied. In a climate of formalism, social transformation legislation, enacted as detailed, prescriptive rules, is more likely to be successful than legislation couched in general, discretion-conferring language.

Theunis Roux has offered an account and assessment of the adjudicative performance of the Constitutional Court, not based on a fully-fledged theory of constitutional adjudication (yet), but with all the makings of a solid and rigorous theoretical endeavour nonetheless.[1] His point is that by striking a judicious balance between principle and pragmatism in its judgments, the South African Constitutional Court has secured for itself a position of relative institutional security, even though it is lacking in public support. The court has moreover built up an enviable reputation for its 'legitimacy in the legal sense', that is the technical quality of its jurisprudence. He explains this position by analyzing some Constitutional Court judgements with reference to the grid-like (rather than linear) relationship between legal legitimacy, public support and institutional security. Theoretical analyses and explanations of this sort are particularly helpful in showing how attitudinal and strategic patterns in adjudicators' approach to various kinds of issues manifest in interpretive outcomes, and feed into 'more conventional' theoretical reflection on constitutional interpretation as 'working with the Constitution-in-writing'. The assumption that legal and, in particular, constitutional language has the inherent capacity to constrain and rein in the proliferation of meaning has become tenuous, in the light of contemporary theoretical accounts of the power of language to generate meaning. This has appeared from the demise of literalism as described in this chapter so far[2] and as will further be elaborated on under the next heading.[3] One of the principal merits of Roux's work is that it accounts for non-linguistic restraints on the proliferation of meaning in constitutional interpretation and, in particular, for socio-political restraints.[4] On the strength and limits of this aspect of his work — and on a need for further reflection — Roux has the following to say:

> [P]olitical science accounts of constitutional adjudication in new democracies have much to teach legal theorists. The limitation of such accounts, however, is that they lack any real conception of legal legitimacy, and consequently have little appreciation for the restraining influence of legal doctrine on the behaviour of constitutional courts. The problem with currently available theories of judicial review, on the other hand, is that none of them is directed at constitutional courts in new democracies. What is required, therefore, is a new account, drawing on some of the political science insights, but expressed in terms of acceptable legal theory.[5]

[1] See T Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International Journal for Constitutional Law — (forthcoming).
[2] See, for example, §§ 32.3*(b)*(i), (ii) and (iv) supra.
[3] See § 32.3*(d)* infra.
[4] See Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism' (supra) at Part 3.
[5] Ibid.

Elsewhere I explained that interpretations of enacted law are justified in the course of complex processes of reasoning constituting and sustained by a matrix of interpretive legitimacy.[1] This matrix is enriched and extended by interpretive argumentation. (It may of course also be impoverished when such argumentation is lacking or of a poor quality.) The advent of constitutional democracy and constitutional interpretation in South Africa has enriched this matrix to such an extent that interpretive reasoning and outcomes that would previously have been unacceptable are now accepted as legitimate, even if they are sometimes energetically contested. The notion of a matrix of interpretive legitimacy is on all fours with Roux's theoretical explanations for the outcomes of constitutional interpretation. It is important to note that legal doctrine — and not just legal and constitutional language — feeds into the matrix too, and has a restraining effect on interpretive outcomes, and that politics in general can have a similar effect. In Roux's account, politics, conventionally experienced as an interpretive predicament, especially in statutory interpretation,[2] has become a significant ally in enhancing our understanding of why courts — and the Constitutional Court in particular — decide controversial cases in a certain manner. A monumental judgment like S v Makwanyane & Another, going against public opinion and therefore lacking public support was, for instance, politically possible (without compromising the institutional security of the Constitutional Court), because the power elite within the ruling party, elected with a considerable majority in South Africa's first democratic election in 1994, supported the abolition of the death penalty.[3] Subsequently, in for instance Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, handed down ten years after Makwanyane, the Constitutional Court, according to Roux,[4] showed sensitivity to public attitudes not only in the way it justified its decision in the latter case, but also in the remedy it gave. On the other hand, in Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amicus Curiae*)*, Roux contends, it was politically feasible for the Constitutional Court to go quite boldly against the will of the ruling elite (also without putting its institutional security at risk) because, in the circumstances of that case, this option enjoyed considerable public support.[5]

In short, then, constitutional interpretation as 'working with the Constitution as written text' makes no sense in isolation from a theoretical understanding of how adjudicative performance and interpretive outcomes are shaped by factors and forces not inherent in the written text itself, but present and powerfully operative

[1] See L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 126-127.
[2] See § 32.3*(b)*(iii) supra.
[3] For further reference to this case and a discussion of aspects of it, see § 32.3*(e)*(iv) infra.
[4] Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism' (supra).
[5] 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC). See also § 32.3*(c)*(iv) supra.

in the social and political context in which the adjudicative interpreter operates. These factors and forces to a large extent determine a constitutional interpreter's theoretical position which, in its turn, may be reflected in the interpretive approach he or she chooses and in a ranking of interpretive preferences.[1]

(d) Contemporary developments: linguistic-turn thinking and the new textualism

Meaning is not discovered in (and retrieved from) a construable text, but is made in dealing with the text.[2] In South Africa the philosophical thinking sustaining this turn — sometimes also referred to as 'reader response theory' — began to take hold only in apartheid's waning moments. Linguistic-turn thinking is associated with postmodernism, post-structuralism and deconstruction, all philosophical appellations (or vogue words, some would say) whose scope, contents and point are contested. Such thinking is controversial among jurists in particular, because it rigorously challenges confidence in the stabilizing ability of language to 'carry' or 'produce' perspicuous, clear and unambiguous meanings, and it saddles the legal interpreter with the ultimate responsibility to work with language in order to attribute or impute meaning to construable law — and this can make for dilemmatic choices.[3] The linguistic-turn discourse moreover focuses on the destabilizing properties of language as an all pervasive, disruptive force. Such an orientation does not sit very comfortably with jurists who count on readily construable law to procure certainty and stability, and who at any rate bemoan the esotericism of a discourse which claims the opposite and is regarded by some as divorced from reality. However, linguistic-turn thinking unleashes explanatory potential which, harnessed with due contemplation, offers the promise of an enhanced understanding of vexed issues of constitutional interpretation in a still youthful democracy. Therefore, though this new position has remained a contestedminority position, it has, in South African constitutional literature, asserted a presence substantial enough to belie its modest following.[4]

According to Jacques Derrida, the openness of language is an incidence of a free interplay of signifiers.[5] Linguistic signifiers do not signify and give meaning to things, events, concepts, phenomena et cetera (in other words, signifieds) 'out there'. Derrida rejects a metaphysics of presence and with that also the distinction between a [1] FI Michelman 'A Constitutional Conversation with Professor Frank Michelman' (1995) 11 South African Journal on Human Rights 477, 484-485. See § 32.3*(c)*(i) and (ii) supra.

[2] See § 32.3*(b)*(ii) supra.

[3] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at xv.

[4] That it remains a contested position appears from the intellectual skirmishes it sometimes ignites. See, for example, D Davis 'Duncan Kennedy's A Critique of Adjudication: A Challenge to the "Business as Usual" Approach of South African Lawyers' (2000) 117 South African Law Journal 697, 710-711; J van der Walt 'The Quest for the Impossible, the Beginning of Politics: A Reply to Dennis Davis' (2001) 118 South African Law Journal 463.

[5] See P Cilliers Complexity and Postmodernism: Understanding Complex Systems (1998) 37-47.

signifier and the signified. Signifieds do not exist — they are not present. Meaning results from a complex to-and-fro movement, an action and reaction, of non-constant, non-lasting and non-metaphysical signifiers which all contain traces of one another. The one gives meaning to the other, but then only incompletely and provisionally so. Meaning is never, at any given point in time, a fixed and stable presence. The interplay of signifiers constitutes it over and over again, and diverts and shifts it as often. And very important: because meaning depends on the breathtaking yet incomplete interplay of signifiers, the meaning of X is always a meaning with reference to Y and Z and ABC and therefore meaning-in-context.

The possibilities for meaning-in-context are boundless. Language is the hyper-complex, open system that makes such a proliferation of meaning inevitable. Meaning is relativized; but language as generator of meaning (and only in this capacity) is not. But note: meaning is open and not arbitrary. It has a context. Moreover, language as generator of meaning is hyper-complex, but it is still a system and, most importantly, it is very powerful.[1] In legal interpretation, for instance, preference for one meaning to the exclusion of others may well be described as an act of violence.[2] It is important nonetheless to emphasize that the legal interpreter cannot escape the responsibility to decide on a meaning lest a failure 'to call a halt to the infinite play of the applicable text'[3] is seen as licensing a counterproductive attitude of 'anything goes'.[4] The responsibility to decide is always momentous and may even be abysmal. It can never be 'doing the obvious' because a decision-maker must cross the abyss of indecision in order to decide.[5]

Meaning (in its openness and complexity) always presents itself as (a) text. This is an insight as significant as the insight that a text does not bear or encode or transfer meaning. The conventional meanings of 'text'[6] all somehow indicate that a text is an entity with an existence of its own. A text can, for instance, be a thematic version of some kind with a message, tantamount to its meaning, encoded in it. This idea probably underpins the use of the word 'text' in the Final Constitution. FC s 240, for instance, provides that 'in the event of an inconsistency between different texts of the Constitution, the English text prevails'. 'Text' here refers to a rendering of the Constitution in a specific language, in other words, a version of the Constitution. The Interim Constitution required the 'new constitutional text' passed by the Constitutional Assembly to comply with the Constitutional Principles contained in Schedule 4 to (and to be adopted in accordance with Chapter 5

[1] See CM Yablon 'Forms' in D Cornell, M Rosenfeld & D Gray Carlson (eds) Deconstruction and the Possibility of Justice (1992) 258-262.
[2] See RM Cover 'Violence and the Word' (1986) 95 Yale Law Journal 1601.
[3] Davis 'A Challenge to the "Business as Usual" Approach' (supra) at 711.
[4] Cilliers (supra) at 115.
[5] See J Derrida 'Justice, Law and Philosophy — An Interview with Jacques Derrida' (1999) South African Journal of Philosophy 279, 281. See also § 32.6 infra.
[6] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 5-7 for a summary of these meanings.

of) that Constitution,[1] and to be certified by the Constitutional Court.[2] 'Text' here signified 'the (written) version of the Constitution agreed on' — the Final Constitution-in-writing, in other words.[3]

Conventionally, a text (preferably, but not inevitably, a written piece as opposed to the spoken word) is also thought of as being textured, in other words, coherent or structured with a 'logic' of its own. The Latin texere, from which 'text' derives, actually means 'to weave, braid, join or piece together in an artistic manner'.

The conventional text breathes a spirit of authenticity or originality — it is not a translation, an annotation, a commentary, marginal notes etc — and it wields authority. That is why 'text' is frequently used in connection with religious writings or passages from them or as synonym for '*text*book' which, in its turn, denotes a standard and thereby an authoritative exposition of a topic or subject. Finally, the conventional text is thought to be traceable to the creative efforts of a demonstrable author expressing his or her thoughts in and through the medium of the text.

In linguistic-turn thinking 'a book, poem, ad poster, television program, or anything else that appears to convey information' is a text: '[A]ll events, all phenomena, are texts.'[4] A text is neither an entity nor a bearer of meaning. It also does not belong to its author and its meaning is by no means tantamount to the intention of the author. Derridathus claims:

> There is nothing outside of the text [there is no outside text; il n'y a pas de hors-texte].[5]

'Text' and 'meaning' are intimately related. Whatever is intelligible and therefore interpretable is a text, but it does not necessarily follow that a text is an autonomous bearer of meaning even though it has most often intentionally been authored to convey meaning. An author of a text cannot control its meaning, for the text as signifier, in a complex interplay with other texts as signifiers and depending on the way it is read, incessantly generates or produces meaning. As linguistic signifier a text is also not (and cannot be) an autonomous entity built of language — even though language may be its life and soul. Since meaning is only possible in the to-and-fro play of signifiers, the latter are dependent on one another for meaning. Their traces are to be found in one another mutually and reciprocally.

> This interweaving results in each 'element' — phoneme or grapheme — being constituted on the basis of the traces within it of other elements of the chain or system. This interweaving, this textile, is the text produced only in the transformation of another text.[6]

[1] IC s 71(1).
[2] IC s 71(2).
[3] See § 32.1*(d)* supra.
[4] H Beard & C Cerf The Official Politically Correct Dictionary and Handbook (1993) 73.
[5] J Derrida Of Grammatology (1976) 158.
[6] J Derrida Positions (1981) 26.

A text itself is, in other words, just like each individual linguistic signifier that generates meaning, a compound[1] signifier in interaction with other signifiers — a writing that refers reciprocally to other writings.[2] This perception of a text has far-reaching implications for grasping what happens when jurists (and others) construe law-texts. Interpretation or construction means working with texts. Jacques de Ville argues this convincingly, contending that the use of linguistic aids in seeking to stabilize the meaning of a law-text (in order to 'understand' it) must fail, because the aids themselves are texts incessantly open to interpretation.[3] Pierre de Vos further elaborates on the consequences of this view and takes a critical look at especially the Constitutional Court's exposition, for interpretive purposes, of a 'grand narrative' of the recent history of South Africa's transition from apartheid to democracy and constitutionalism.[4]

Linguistic-turn thinking has thus yielded the new textualism that was referred to earlier in this chapter, in passing, when textualism as a conventional approach to constitutional interpretation in the USA was described.[5] Traditionally 'text' or 'textual', in discourses on legal interpretation, denotes a narrow and formalistic approach to interpretation which typically manifests in confinement of interpretive doings to an analysis of linguistic signifiers in a text-in-writing as they appear 'on paper'. These signifiers are believed to bear a predefined meaning, derived from an authoritative source such as a dictionary, and they are trusted to be able to convey that meaning because as linguistic givens they are bearers or instruments of meaning.

As appears from the discussion so far 'text' or 'textual' in linguistic-turn discourse signifies just about the opposite. Texts are open, elastic, malleable. They do not have a metaphysical presence, but exist because of and dependent upon an interplay of signifying forces, the one lending meaning to the others partly by showing traces of and partly by distinguishing itself from the others. This new textualism encourages jurists, working mainly and primarily but not exclusively with law-texts, to rethink what working with these texts demands and to get clarity about what a law-text is and how various kinds of law-texts are to be distinguished.

Legal interpretation is much more than just invoking recognized rules or canons of construction to determine the meaning of a contested provision. It also goes beyond subsuming facts under appropriate legal norms. It involves

[1] In contradistinction to uncompounded signifiers such as words, compound signifiers such as texts are necessarily complex.

[2] See M Rosenfeld 'Deconstruction and Legal Interpretation: Conflict, Indeterminacy and the Temptation of the New Legal Formalism' in Cornell, Rosenfeld & Carlson (supra) at 153.

[3] See JR de Ville 'Meaning and Statutory Interpretation' (1999) 62(3) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 373.

[4] See P de Vos 'A Bridge too Far? History as Context in the Interpretation of the South African Constitution' (2001) 17 South African Journal on Human Rights 1.

[5] See § 32.3*(c)*(i)(A) supra.

working actively with law-texts instead, and this vindicates theories of legal interpretation that understand the construction of enacted law, such as the Constitution or statutes, as a process of concretization or even the completion of legal norms.[1] These are mainly the theories in the objectivism-delegation theory camp.

Friedrich Müller's strukturierende Rechtslehre ('structuring theory of law') is a nuanced version of objectivism endeavouring to give an accurate account of the 'realities' of day-to-day practices of adjudication by invoking post-positivistic, linguistic-turn thinking.[2] The salient message of strukturierende Rechtslehre is that legal interpretation is working with texts of various kinds, in different manners and at different levels to bring legal norms to fulfilment. Müller himself explains the rudiments and aims of his theory as follows:

> Since the mid-1960s, structuring legal theory has … developed a new, post-positivistic concept of legal theory according to which the legal norm (Rechtsnorm) has not already been written into legislation. Enactments are but norm-texts (Normtexte), that is formulations that precede legal norms, and they differ significantly from the eventual, 'actual' legal norms generated, constructed or completed for each successive concrete case in order to arrive at a judgment. In addition to this, the normative domain (Normbereich) of legislation constitutes the eventual legal norm. The legal norm is, in other words, a complex phenomenon composed of a norm-programme (Normprogramm) as well as a normative domain (Normbereich). 'Concretisation' no longer means that a general legal norm, found in a statute book, is made 'more concrete'. Realistically seen and reflected on, concretisation is the step by step construction of legal norms (Rechtsnormkonstruktion) for each individual case through which working elements within the text become ever 'more concrete'.
>
> This emphasises the dynamic nature of the efforts of jurists, moving between norm and case. Realistically understood concretisation is a time-bound process involving:
> - the text of the case as a narrative and the norm-texts in the codification (or statute book(s));
> - the text of the norm-programme and that of the normative domain, and
> - the text of the legal norm and that of the decision-norm (being the tenor of a judgment).[3]

As pointed out earlier, a judicial interpreter of enacted law (including the Final Constitution), faced with a plethora of linguistically possible meanings, cannot escape the responsibility to decide on one meaning (the best, in her or his judgment) befitting the case she or he is adjudicating.[4] The case itself acts a check

[1] See H-G Gadamer Wahrheit und Methode: Grundzüge einer Philosophischen Hermeneutik (4th Edition, 1975) 312-313 (Argues in favour of interpretive concretisation in preference to bland subsumption.)

[2] See F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (1999) 10 Stellenbosch Law Review 269. See also F Müller & R Christensen Juristische Methodik I Grundlagen Öffentliches Recht (8th Edition, 2002); F Müller & R Christensen Juristische Methodik II: Europarecht (2003).

[3] F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (supra) at 273.

[4] For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts' see § 32.3*(e)*(i)(ee) infra.

upon judicial licence. There is another check similar in purpose, but deriving from a different consideration, namely, democracy and, in particular, the horizontal division of powers in the state (or trias politica). The judicial interpreter of any enacted law (including the Constitution), partaking in the construction of a legal norm or norms for an individual case, is not an alternative or additional law-maker: she or he is under an obligation to work with and attach due weight to the specific law (possibly) applicable in a given situation, that is to say, the text as worded by the authorized author of the law. The wording of an enacted law-text bounds the judiciary (and actually all state authority) for trias politica purposes: some German authors speak of der Wortlaut als Grenze der Staatsgewalt ('the wording as limit to state power').[1] Amendment of the ipsissima verba of the text ('woordwysigende uitleg') is not precluded per se, but 'should be an exercise in circumspection and restraint with due deference to one of the cornerstones of constitutional democracy, namely the horizontal division of powers in the state'.[2]

The Final Constitution and statutes as enacted law are made and intended (or meant) to be of effect and their provisions must therefore also be construed to be of effect: 'verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat' ['the words of an instrument are to be so construed that the subject-matter may rather be of force than come to naught'.] In this sense the makers of the Final Constitution or a statute have an intention — an intention that what is enacted shall be of force and shall apply. Enacted law is, in other words, effect-directed.[3] This is not just an effect-directedness in the abstract: a provision is also enacted for a reason, and in the case of a constitutional provision this reason may be either to preserve or to transform the legal status quo.[4]

Its effect-directedness makes an enacted law-text — a constitution-in-writing or a statute-in-writing — very much like a piece of sheet music. It cannot be grasped sufficiently simply by reading it. Its 'execution' or 'performance' must also be experienced or at least imagined. The full effect of, for example, a constitutional provision cannot be gauged simply from reading and attaching meaning to the signifiers that appear on paper in the Constitution-in-writing, but rather from the manner in which the provision is (or could be) construed and applied in a real-life situation. Someone who reads music well can also 'hear' the music when reading a score. The interpreter of enacted law-texts,[5] especially someone with experience, reads that text in a similar way. She or he can imagine what a provision will 'sound' like in a concrete, real-life situation. This could be because she or he is seeking a solution to an actual problem or because she or he hypothesizes

[1] See O Depenheuer Der Wortlaut als Grenze: These zu einem Topos der Verfassungsinterpretation (1988); R Ogorek 'Der Wortlaut des Gezetses — Auslegungsgrenze oder Freibrief?' in P Forstmoser et al (eds) Rechtsanwendung in Theorie und Praxis. Symposium zum 70. Geburtstag von Arthur Meier-Hayoz (1993) 21-33.

[2] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) 229. See also JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 135.

[3] See L du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts. The Epoch of Constitutionalism and the Agenda for Statutory and Constitutional Interpretation in South Africa' (2000) 15(2) SA Public Law 257, 275-277.

[4] See T Roux 'Continuity and Change in a Transforming Legal Order: The Impact of Section 26(3) of the Constitution on South African Law' (2004) 121(2) South African Law Journal 466, 467

[5] For a further explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts', see §§ 32.3*(e)(i)(ee) and 32.5(c)*(iii) infra.

(and thus 'conceives of') potentially problematic situations.[1] Actual or potential applications of any law, including provisions of enacted law and also the Constitution, determine their construction decisively: there is a unity in the duality of what has traditionally been known (and distinguished) as interpretation and application.

This discussion of contemporary developments associated with linguistic-turn thinking is not meant to undermine or destabilize (or, for that matter, denigrate) language and its pervasive capacity to generate meaning. It does, however, challenge conventional theories of language that rely, unflectively, on the supposed stability of language. It goes without saying that constitutional interpretation or any other form of interpretation irrespective of or beyond language is unthinkable because it is unsayable — unsignifiable. Conventional canons of construction consistent with an actual acknowledgement of the Final Constitution as complex linguistic datum are therefore unavoidable and, indeed, necessary. What the linguistic turn does do is to reflect both 'contemporary developments' in theories of language and underscore the need for the reformulation or, in some instances, reconceptualization of accepted canons of constitutional (and statutory) interpretation.

(e) The Constitution as text sui generis among law-texts

It is trite that different reading conventions and strategies apply to, for example, a statute, a poem, a novel, a court case, an article in a scholarly journal and a Biblical or Quranic text. To put it differently: the text genre determines the manner in which text is read and understood. This is because text genre has a generative (or productive) and not merely a taxonomic (or classificatory) function. It co-constitutes textual meaning[2] and therefore also the manner in which such meaning is to be determined. For interpretation purposes it is thus vital to establish the genre to which law-texts in general — and the Constitution in particular — belong.

However, the Final Constitution is not just a genre text. Within its genre it is also a unique law-text rendering constitutional interpretation a distinctive mode of legal interpretation and more than just a technique-driven analysis of the provisions of the Constitution-in-writing in order to determine their meaning. Constitutional interpretation is a consequential practice, an observance, sustaining constitutionalism[3] in a democratic, constitutional state (Rechtsstaat) founded on and maintained by a supreme Constitution of the sort envisaged in FC ss 1(c) and 2.[4]

[1] See Du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts' (supra) at 295.

[2] NJC van den Bergh 'Wetsuitleg: quo vadis?' (1982) 15 De Iure 154, 158 ('Genre het 'n generatiewe funksie en nie 'n taksonomiese funksie nie. Die wetsteksgenre is betekeniskonstituerend.'['Genre has a generative and not a taxonomic function. Law-text genre constitutes meaning.'])

[3] See J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (3rd Edition, 2000) 7 ('Constitutionalism is the idea that government should derive its powers from a written constitution and that its powers should be limited to those set out in the constitution'.) See also WF Murphy, JE Fleming & SA Barber American Constitutional Interpretation (2nd Edition, 1995) 3 (Describes 'constitutionalism' as 'a theory that accepts the necessity of both government and limited government. It contends that all power, even that of the people, must be limited.')

[4] See § 32.3*(e)*(iii) infra.

The Final Constitution can be depicted as:

(i) a law-text and, more particularly, a prescriptive, abstractly normative, enacted law-text;
(ii) highest law ie the most decisively and the ultimately prescriptive law-text pervading the legal system;
(iii) a negotiated and negotiating law-text.

Point (i) above pertains to the Final Constitution as genre text (the genre being enacted law) and points (ii) and (iii) above refer to the Final Constitution in its uniqueness. Points (i) to (iii) above all have decided implications for the interpretation of the Final Constitution.

(i) The Constitution as prescriptive, abstractly normative law-text

(aa) Law as text and text(s) as law

Law-texts are compound linguistic signifiers conventionally recognized as 'texts having to do with the law'. In a dynamic and complex interplay with one another (and with other signifiers) these texts render 'law' intelligible and therefore interpretable. Law-texts themselves do not 'bear' meaning and do not tell us 'what the law says'; nor do they express the meaning of legal phenomena 'out there'. Instead, they provide linguistic data to generate meaning in order to deal with the law's business and to find out what the law can be understood to say about the solution of concrete issues or problems. Speaking and thinking about the law are possible only because of law-texts: lawspeak is text and a particular kind of textspeak is law.[1] Random examples of law-texts are constitutions, statutes, reported precedents, contracts in writing, wills, international treaties, heads of argument, pleadings in civil proceedings and so on. These are all texts in writing, but they exist alongside and interact with oral or spoken law-texts, such as ex tempore judgments of courts, oral contracts, the first-hand testimony of a witness in court, oral argument and so on.

The function of the supreme Constitution as law-text is, in a nutshell, to establish and sustain constitutional democracy in South Africa and to render all law relating thereto intelligible and therefore interpretable and realizable. This it does in a dynamic and complex interplay with other law-texts (and texts other than law-texts).[2]

[1] And jurists work with texts and texts work with them. See L du Plessis 'Oor hoe Juriste werk met Tekste. . .en Tekste met hulle. Enkele Gedagtes oor die Postmodernisering van Reformatoriese Regsdenke' (2000) 65 Koers 437 and L du Plessis 'Lawspeak as Text. . .and Textspeak as Law: Reflections on How Jurists Work with Texts — and Texts with Them' (2001) 118 South African Law Journal 794.

[2] A Constitution may, provisionally and somewhat inelegantly, be defined as:
The decisively and ultimately prescriptive, abstractly-normative, negotiated and enacted law-text which pervades the legal system and which, in a dynamic and complex interplay with other law-texts (and texts other than law-texts) establishes and sustains constitutional democracy in the country and renders the 'law' relating thereto intelligible and therefore interpretable and realisable.

(bb) Narrative and normative law-texts

Law-texts can be characteristically narrative or normative. Narrative law-texts profess to be linguistic accounts of (f)actual occurrences pertinent to the functioning of (the) law. 'Normative' could mean (i) establishing, (ii) relating to or (iii) deriving from a norm as prescriptive (general) standard.[1] Normative law-texts, predicated mainly on signification (i) above, verbalize a characteristically law-like expectation that diverse future occurrences, sharing certain predefined attributes, will be entertained in a predictably regular or typical manner.

Jurists engaged in untangling questions of law do not actually work with 'concrete facts' or 'concrete norms', but with linguistic renditions of what they understand to be facts and norms pertaining to 'the law', in other words, narrative and normative law-texts (that they construct). The distinction between narrative and normative law-texts is by no means watertight since all law-texts are always both narrative and normative to some extent. The operational gist or functional thrust of a law-text determines whether to call it 'narrative' or 'normative'. A statutory provision, for example, is to some extent an implicit narrative of the process through which (as part of the more inclusive instrument in which it is contained) it came to exist, and also of factual situations for which it potentially caters, but it is a normative law-text nonetheless because it characteristically purports to provide for the factual situations in a predictably consistent, regular or typical (in other words, a norm-like) manner. An evidentiary narrative, such as the 'story' of a witness during litigious proceedings, on the other hand, has to be adapted, for adjudicative use, to the predictably regular or typical normative standards of, among others, the law of evidence, and then it can exert normative power that co-determines the outcome of the proceedings. It remains a legally processed 'story', nonetheless, and its predominant story-likeness makes it a narrative law-text. A narrative law-text can be a rendition of either an actual or an imaginary (hypothetical) 'story'. Some law-texts are difficult to classify. A contract, oral or in writing, as an account of what the parties agreed to is, for instance, a narrative law-text. However, the contract as a legal instrument activates norms of the law of contract, and its very terms are standards that cater, in a predictably regular or typical manner, for premeditated eventualities, making the contract a normative law-text too.

Law-texts need not be classified rigidly as exclusively narrative or normative. They often have to be named, from case to case, in accordance with their (contingent) mode of operation as co-determined by the peculiarities of the situation in which they are of effect. A distinctive feature of all kinds of law-texts is that they can be and indeed strive to be of effect, because they are resolution-oriented.[2] Any resolution of a legal issue always draws on both narrative and normative law-texts. Normative law-texts are devoid of actual, operational significance in isolation from narrative law-texts, and vice versa.

[1] J Pearsall (ed) The New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998) 1263.
[2] See § 32.1*(d)* supra and § 32.5*(c)*(iii) infra.

(cc) Prescriptive and persuasive (normative) law-texts

Narrative and normative law-texts proclaim their efficacy in distinct ways. The efficacy of a narrative law-text depends on how effectively it poses questions called forth by the exigencies of the situation it narrates. A normative law-text can suggest a solution to a problem in mainly one of two manners: prescriptively or persuasively. In the first instance the text is expected to 'have effect' because it is 'officially' backed by some authority of consequence. In the second instance the effect of the text depends on its power of persuasion in particular circumstances (and on specific conditions). Prescriptive, normative law-texts ('prescriptive texts' for short) are traditionally perceived as instruments or media calling positive law into existence, in other words, as sources of origin of legal rules or norms.[1] In South Africa statutes and the Constitution (enacted law for short), precedent and custom are recognized as such sources of origin. The prescriptivity of enacted law can evidently and directly be attributed to a readily identifiable author-with-authority while custom and precedent and some old Roman-Dutch writings (all belonging to the genre of common law) may acquire prescriptive authority once they have been found to meet certain criteria.

What sets prescriptive, normative law-texts apart is the status formally assigned to them: they are recognized as (and therefore understood to be) the most obvious contenders among normative law-texts to be of effect in a given situation. It is legitimate to argue that what prescriptive texts can be understood to say about a particular situation or issue takes precedence over what other normative law-texts can be understood to say about the same situation or issue. The supreme Constitution, in its turn, ranks highest among prescriptive, normative law-texts.

A persuasive, normative law-text ('persuasive text' for short) will be of effect in the same manner as any prescriptive text if, on account of its persuasive force, its authority as normative text, establishing general standards for dealing with diverse occurrences, is accepted by a decision-making organ of state authorized to concretize law, for instance, an adjudicative forum. Furthermore, if the decision of the said forum has binding force, the persuasive text henceforth becomes a prescriptive text. Statements in textbooks or other writings professing to expound 'the law as it stands', obiter dicta in court judgments, the ratio decidendi in a non-binding judgment, oral or written argument in litigious proceedings and heads of argument are all examples of persuasive law-texts. Courts often accept the authority of persuasive texts, especially judicial precedents, without referring to their status and ranking in the order of normative law-texts.

(dd) Abstract and concretized normative law-texts

Normative law-texts can be either abstract or concretized or, to put it in another way, a law-text can be of force in an abstractly normative or concretely normative manner.[1] An abstract, normative law-text is what is usually referred to as a legal rule or precept, that is, a law-text envisaging — and indeed providing — that multifarious eventualities, sharing certain attributes, will be entertained in a predictably regular or typical manner. A concretized, normative law-text, on the other hand, is designed to cater for the exigencies of and/or regulate a particular, concrete situation and can also be either prescriptive or persuasive. When it is prescriptive such a text must be given effect to on account of the official authority that its author wields. An order of court is an example of a prescriptive, concretized, normative law-text. So is a decision of a duly authorized organ of the executive, pursuant to a discretion to 'apply the law' in concrete instances. On the other hand, contentions in legal argument in a specific case for a court order in certain terms, a legal opinion proposing a normative answer to a specific problem or normative solutions proposed for hypothesized (specific) cases, are persuasive, concretized, normative law-texts.

[1] L du Plessis An Introduction to Law (3rd Edition, 1999) 219.

(ee) The Constitution as genre text

The distinctions aforesaid aid (but do not rigidly prescribe) a broad depiction (and not a watertight compartmentalization) of various kinds of law-texts. The permeability of law-texts and the complexity of the interaction among them preclude the calibration of either a rectilinear (or even a more ingenious and complex grid-like) scale according to which the normativity or narrativity, the presciptiveness or persuasiveness and the concreteness or abstractness of a law-text can be measured.

Plotting the Constitution on such a scale is helpful in determining its genre, but not decisive in depicting it in its exceptionality. In the light of the discussion so far, the Constitution is a prescriptive, abstractly normative law-text, but of course not only the Constitution is distinctly that. Statute law is also that — as are rules of the common law and binding rationes decidendorum in case law. Statute law and the Constitution have in common a feature absent from common and case law, namely that they are enacted law. They have, in other words, been laid down by an authorized 'maker' to whom the business of officially making and carrying into effect law or a Constitution has been assigned. Statute law and the Constitution as enacted (or legislative or legislated) law-texts have consciously, intentionally and authoritatively been authored to be of effect and to this extent there is an authorial intent sustaining them, in other words, an intention of the legislature or of the founding generation of the Constitution.[2] However, 'intention' here does not denote what used to be regarded as the prime determinant of meaning in conventional literalist-cum-intentionalist statutory interpretation,[3] but the operational

[1] The notion of concretization is borrowed from Friedrich Müller's Strukturierende Rechtslehre. See 32.3*(d)* supra.
[2] See § 32.5*(c)(iii) infra. For the notion of a 'founding generation' of a constitution, see § 32.3(c)*(i) supra.
[3] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) and (ii) supra.

intent (or effect-directedness) characteristic of enacted law-texts such as the Constitution and statutes, and key to a purpose-consciousness interpretation of such law-texts.[1]

Having located the Constitution within a particular law-text genre, the next step is to try to depict it in its exceptionality, and to this end one must honour the status of the Constitution as supreme (decisively and ultimately prescriptive) law and as a product of negotiation involving constitution-makers (or a founding generation[2]), coming from the various strata of a profoundly pluralistic nation with often divergent aspirations, interests and identities.

(ii) The Constitution as supreme law

The Final Constitution declares its own supremacy in two ways. In FC s 1*(c), the Republic of South Africa is said to be founded on the values of 'supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law'. In FC s 2 it is stated that the Constitution 'is the supreme law of the Republic' and that 'law or conduct inconsistent with it, is invalid'. Obligations imposed by the Final Constitution must also be fulfilled. One of Frank Michelman's salient contentions in Chapter 11 of this treatise is that constitutional supremacy is a value and not just a rule.[3] The founding statement in FC s 1(c)* proclaims this value status, causing the Final Constitution to pervade all law in the legal system and to direct it towards the pursuit and realization of the values the Final Constitution espouses.[4]

In the 'plain and simple' or 'trumping sense' supremacy of the Constitution (as proclaimed in FC s 2) means that if any law conflicts with a constitutional provision, the latter is given precedence. In this straightforward sense the Constitution has had a decisive impact on the conventional hierarchy and status of legal rules and especially legislation in South Africa. Laws of Parliament that, until the commencement of the Interim Constitution on 27 April 1994, used to sit atop the legal hierarchy and enjoyed a status of non-reviewability by the courts as to their substance, are now subject to a higher law and to full judicial review. In terms of FC s 43*(c)*, municipal councils, that used to be delegated legislatures, have been elevated to the status of original legislatures[5] whose legislation is no longer reviewable in terms of the common-law standards of review for legislative administrative action,[6] but, as far as matters of substance are concerned, only in terms of the Final Constitution.

[1] See § 32.5*(c)*(iii) infra.
[2] For the use of this terminology see § 32.3*(c)*(i) supra.
[3] FI Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 11-34–11-36.
[4] See also Michelman 'The Rule of Law' (supra) at 11-36–11-41 and § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra.
[5] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure Life Assurance') at para 26.
[6] See L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 44-45.

The relevance of recognizing constitutional supremacy as both a value and a trumping force will be dealt with later on when adjudicative subsidiarity is discussed.[1] For the moment some implications of the supremacy of the Constitution as a founding value in terms of FC s 1*(c)* call for further elaboration, for they determine and direct interpretive dealings with the Constitution in its distinctiveness. The supreme Constitution has been designed and enacted to found and uphold a particular kind of politeia (or constitutional dispensation) in South Africa. About the potential of the Constitution, as construable highest law, to help establish and sustain the politeia for which it was intended, the following three observations are apposite:

(aa) The Constitution as 'supreme law' is the long-lasting, enacted law-text at the apex of the legal system and is the nation's solemn and consequential memorandum of agreement. It is also just a written document, however: a law-text-in-writing among others or 'a linguistic datum'.[2] The FC is the supreme law of the Republic of South Africa, but it is not an overarching, all-encompassing,[3] omni-regulative, super-law.[4] Whoever invokes the protective and remedial powers of the supreme Constitution must treat it as a scalpel and not as a sledgehammer.[5] The fact that the Constitution enjoys precedence among normative law-texts does not mean that it totally overpowers other law-texts and takes their place without further ado.

Courts are moreover required to exercise self-restraint when they summon up the powerful, supreme Constitution because decisions of institutions not accountable to an electorate may not simply engulf deliberative decision-making susceptible to the discipline of democratic accountability. This is a predicament of constitutional review also known as the counter-majoritarian difficulty/dilemma. The demand for judicial self-restraint encourages circumspect modes of interpretation such as reading in conformity with the Constitution or deference to subsidiarity.

(bb) The Constitution is justiciable, in other words, a standard for the assessment of the validity of both 'law' and 'conduct' in every legislative and executive echelon of government. As was shown earlier,[6] the Constitution, pursuant to the founding provision in s 1*(c)* (and the binding Constitutional Principles[7] in the IC) provides for its own justiciability. Section 172(1)(a), in a mandatory mood, enjoins any court 'deciding a constitutional matter within its

[1] See § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra.

[2] See Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' (supra) at 269. See also § 32.1*(d)* supra.

[3] On the notion of an 'all-encompassing Constitution', see § 32.5(b)(iii)(bb) infra.

[4] L du Plessis 'The Status of Legislation and the Realisation of Constitutional Values in the new Constitutional Dispensation' (2000) 11 Stellenbosch Law Review 192, 201; Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 28.

[5] Smith v Attorney-General Bophuthatswana 1984 (1) SA 196, 200C (B). See also § 32.1*(a)* supra.

[6] See § 32.2*(a)* supra.

[7] See Constitutional Principles I and IV in Schedule 4 to the Interim Constitution. For a brief historical background, see § 32.1*(a)* supra.

power' to declare 'law or conduct' inconsistent with the Constitution invalid to the extent of such inconsistency. As a check on this power of review, so potently proclaimed, s 172(1)(b) leaves room for a just and equitable reining in of the consequences of declarations of invalidity in terms of s 172(1)(a), and it is in the discretion of the court making the declaration to exercise such restraint. This is how, in one of its early landmark judgments[1] that was previously referred to,[2] the Constitutional Court verbalized its understanding of courts' duties or obligations under s 171(1)(a) and the relationship between this provision and s 171(1)(b):

> Constitutional cases cannot be decided on the basis that Parliament or the President acted in good faith or on the basis that there was no objection to action taken at the time that it was carried out. It is of crucial importance at this early stage of the development of our new constitutional order to establish respect for the principle that the Constitution is supreme. The Constitution itself allows this Court to control the consequences of a declaration of invalidity if it should be necessary to do so. Our duty is to declare legislative and executive action which is inconsistent with the Constitution to be invalid, and then to deal with the consequences of the invalidity in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

The Constitution also provides for and indeed sustains its own justiciability by necessary implication, with s 165, for example, vouching for the independence of the judiciary, and s 165(2), maintaining with supreme authority that the courts are subject only to the Constitution and the law. That this is not a toothless proposition is borne out by s 165(5), which make court orders binding, in a comprehensive manner, on 'all persons to whom and organs of state to which it applies'. It is significant that especially organs of state are mentioned, for justiciability and powers of constitutional review make sense only if non-judicial authorities cannot and do not undo court orders and/or their consequences.

(cc) The Constitution verbalizes and, indeed, proclaims, in characteristically broad, inclusive and open-ended language, certain values and beliefs associated with democracy and the constitutional state (Rechtsstaat) to be law. The kind of language in which the Constitution is couched, distinctive both in form and content, instantiates the uniqueness of the Constitution as enacted law-text. It was shown before how the distinctive style of the Constitution has contributed to an uneasiness with and, in time, a questioning and even a growing dismissal of conventional approaches to statutory interpretation, and has encouraged the blazing of new interpretive trails.[3]

[1] Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 100 ('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1995').
[2] See § 32.1*(c)* supra.
[3] See § 32.3*(b)* supra.

(iii) The Constitution as negotiated and negotiating text

The Final Constitution is a product of negotiation and deliberation; so too is legislation passed by constitutionally authorized legislative bodies. However, the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution played an essential role in brokering a peaceful transition from the racist, white minority apartheid regime to a genuine universal multiparty democracy: they are, at bottom, peace treaties. That said, the Final Constitution is a comprehensive memorandum of agreement designed to last. Its negotiationary origins are thus quite conspicuous — more so than is mostly the case with other enacted law — and these origins show especially in ideological tensions traceable in the written text, and always pertaining to it and to its interpretation.[1]

In the phrase 'ideological tensions', 'ideology' does not denote an abstract system of ideas, but rather the means by which people 'give meaning to all things and events which they encounter, and all feelings which they experience' in response to the exigencies of a particular environment.[2] 'Ideology' not only denotes someone's 'personal philosophy', but can also be 'a shared (world-) view' in terms of which, for instance, political groupings perceive the political interests they seek to promote.

The first ideological tension that becomes visible when the Constitution-in-writing is analyzed — and which also often arises in constitutional interpretation — is that between populism and constitutionalism, rooted in the polarity of participatory (or 'popular') and constitutional democracy, and of legislative and administrative over and against judicial decision-making. Populism denotes rule by the (majority of the) people through voting and thereafter through their elected (and accountable) representatives, and the people's participation in law-making and administrative processes. Constitutionalism 'is the idea that government should derive its powers from a written constitution, and that its powers should be limited to those set out in the constitution,' and furthermore that there must be an independent authority, the judiciary, enforcing limitations to government powers.[3] The tension between populism and constitutionalism is there, in a supreme constitution, simply because that Final Constitution is the highest law and is justiciable, and the said tension raises the spectre of the previously mentioned counter-majoritarian difficulty.[4] The competence of unelected judges to assess the constitutional tenability of laws

[1] On these ideological tensions, see LM du Plessis 'The Genesis of a Bill of Rights in a Divided Society: Observations on the Ideological Dialectic reflected in the Chapter on fundamental Rights in South Africa's transitional Constitution' (1995) 3 Jahrbuch für Recht und Ethik 353; L du Plessis 'Constitutional Construction and the Contradictions of Social Transformation in South Africa' (2000) 72(1) Scriptura 31.

[2] D Nicholson 'Ideology and the South African Judicial Process — Lessons from the Past' (1992) 8 South African Journal on Human Rights 50.

[3] I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005)('Handbook') 8.

[4] See § 32.3*(e)*(i)(aa) supra.

made by democratically elected, deliberative legislatures and then to strike down whatever (in the courts' view) is inconsistent with the Final Constitution, possibly (but not inevitably) runs counter to the horizontal differentiation of legislative, executive and judicial authority in a modern-day, democratic state—hence the call to the judiciary for self-restraint.[1]

The tension just described is between powers that in terms of trias politica are ideally separated horizontally. The Final Constitution also reflects a tension between centralism and federalism pertaining to the vertical division of powers.[2] Historical realities precluded the fullest and purest possible form of federalism in post-1994 South Africa, but this did not result in a total exclusion of everything federalist from the Final Constitution. The Constitution does not establish classical federalist structures, but in ss 146 to 150, dealing with conflicting laws in the various spheres of government,[3] provision is made for procedures bolstering centrifugal forces that determine the relationship between central government and the nine provinces. These centrifugal forces are subject to centripetal checks and balances which do not, however, totally exclude the attainment of a relatively clearly pronounced federalist state. The arrangements in FC s 146 to FC s 150, read with FC Chapter 3 on co-operative government, makes of South Africa a co-operative as opposed to a competitive federation.[4]

One of the most prominent ideological tensions in the South African Constitution—and probably in most national and international systems of human rights protection worldwide—is that between freedom and equality or, in ideological terms, between libertarianism and egalitarianism. This tension shows up most clearly in the written constitutional text in the triumvirate value statements[5]—in the founding provisions,[6] and in the Bill of Rights[7]—proclaiming human dignity, equality and freedom to be crucial guiding values in the interpretation of the Final Constitution, and the Bill of Rights in particular, and in the limitation of rights. In comparable provisions of the Interim Constitution[8] reference was made to [1] See M Tushnet 'Anti-formalism in Recent Constitutional Theory' (1985) 83 Michigan Law Review 1502, 1503; D Davis, M Chaskalson & J de Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism: The Role of Constitutional Interpretation' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 6–19; Currie & de Waal Handbook (supra) at 8.

[2] L du Plessis 'Federalisme as 'n Proses: 'n Evaluering van die Federalistiese Momente in die 1996-Grondwet' (1997) 62 Koers 189.

[3] For a discussion of these provisions, see V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16; S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 21.

[4] I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law Volume 1 (2001) 119-124.

[5] For the meaning of 'triumvirate value statements', see 32.4*(c)(i)(cc)* infra.

[6] FC s 1(a). .

[7] FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1)(a). See § 32.1*(d)* supra.

[8] See IC ss 33(a)(ii) and 35(1).

freedom and equality only. Human dignity entered the picture in the Final Constitution for the first time.

For the freedom-centric libertarian a supreme constitution (and a bill of rights) must basically keep the state at bay, limiting its action vis-à-vis the doings of the autonomous individual, to ensure optimal freedom for the latter. Equality-centric egalitarianism, on the other hand, insists that a constitution and bill of rights must essentially help ensure optimal parity among individuals, and positive state action redressing disadvantage is therefore unavoidable. Libertarians experience such state action, impacting directly on the (re-)distribution of means among citizens, as threatening to their freedom. The counter-argument of egalitarians is that freedom can be, and often is, (ab-)used to perpetuate the prosperity rift and other inequalities between the 'haves' and the 'have-nots' and that the state thus has to intervene to procure a more equal access to the resources needed for the enjoyment of a decent life.

In South Africa, liberation movements that represented the political and economic aspirations of the traditional have-nots were by origin egalitarian, while the 'have parties' that somehow benefited from apartheid's unequal distribution of material means (and this includes the previous regime's liberal opponents) were natural libertarians. For many years (up until about 1986) the previous regime was not even libertarian because it turned a blind eye to human rights in its political thinking and planning, and afforded them no special institutional protection.

The Constitution-in-writing holds out the possibility to alleviate the seemingly perennial tension between freedom and equality, for the crucial triumvirate value statements referred to above allow for reliance on human dignity to negotiate the tension between freedom and equality.

The last ideological tension of note is that between traditionalism and modernism. 'Modernism' roughly denotes the 'enlightened' frame of mind from which the idea and practice of constitutional democracy — as typically modernist phenomenon — emerged. Individualism is a pillar of this liberal modernism which, in South Africa, has come up against manifestations of communitarian traditionalism in customary law, religion and gender issues (manifesting in the last instance as an ideological tension of feminism versus patriarchy). The written Constitution itself caters for possible tensions in these areas. FC a 211, for instance, recognizes the institution, status and role of traditional leadership according to customary law[1] and, in broad terms, authorizes traditional authorities to function, subject to applicable legislation and customs 'which includes amendments to, or repeal of, that legislation or those customs'.[2] FC s 211(3) enjoins courts to apply customary law 'when that law is applicable'. However, FC s 211 as a whole is significantly and explicitly made subject to the rest of the Final Constitution. And FC s 39(2) of course also requires development of customary law in a manner promoting the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

[1] FC s 211(1).
[2] FC s 211(2).

Some examples of how the three pairs of ideological tensions just described manifest in constitutional jurisprudence will, by way of illustration, now briefly be looked at. These tensions are actually or potentially present in just about every constitutional precedent, which means that the compilation of a full catalogue of examples would be a mammoth undertaking. The counter-majoritarian difficulty, for instance, looms (larger or smaller) in every case of constitutional review, and with it the ideological tension between populism and constitutionalism too. In S v Makwanyane & Another[1] the Constitutional Court, called upon to sit in judgment on the constitutionality of capital punishment, was faced with the prospect of having to make a decision with consequences for which, in the view of a connoisseur constitutionalist, a democratically authorized law- or constitution-maker should rather have been made responsible and held accountable.[2] The written text of the Interim Constitution made no reference to the issue of capital punishment, and this omission was deliberate:[3] the constitution-makers left it to the Constitutional Court to resolve this controversial issue. At first glance it may seem as if the constitution-makers thereby addressed the counter-majoritarian difficulty — and eased possible tensions between populism and constitutionalism — by authorizing the Court to cast the die on capital punishment. This, however, is not quite how the Constitutional Court saw it. Mahomed and Sachs JJ, in their separate concurring judgments, were at pains to point out that the Court was not deciding on the desirability, political or otherwise, of capital punishment as a possible sentence for the most serious offences, but on its constitutionality. Mahomed J especially made a point of distinguishing a decision reached by the Constitutional Court as a judicial organ from a political choice by a legislative organ.[4]

The ideological tension between populism and constitutionalism is also visible in the way in which Chaskalson P dealt with the state's contention that what is cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was dependent on attitudes within society, and that South African society did not regard the death sentence for extreme cases of murder as a cruel, inhuman or degrading form of punishment. The gist of the Court's response to this contention was this:

> The question before us … is not what the majority of South Africans believe a proper sentence for murder should be. It is whether the Constitution allows the sentence.
>
> Public opinion may have some relevance to the enquiry, but, in itself, it is no substitute for the duty vested in the Courts to interpret the Constitution and to uphold its provisions without fear or favour. If public opinion were to be decisive, there would be no need for constitutional adjudication.[5]

[1] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane').
[2] For previous references to this case, see § 32.3*(c)*(iii)(aa) and (v) supra.
[3] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 5 and 25.
[4] Ibid at paras 266 and 349 respectively.
[5] Ibid at paras 87 and 88.

Thus the Court, mindful of the tension between populism and constitutionalism, asserted its authority to do what the Interim Constitution required of it and refused to acquiesce in the 'wisdom' of public opinion.

Given the tenacity of the ideological tension between populism and constitutionalism, authorized adjudicators of constitutional matters cannot just take their authority for granted, but must establish their legitimacy by asserting and exercising their authority in a particular manner. Heinz Klug explains:

> Particular histories and contexts — both international and local — play a significant part in setting the stage upon which judicial review is introduced. While its ability to build legitimacy through its formal judicial role is a source of strength, the comparative institutional weakness of the judicial branch . . . requires the judiciary to be circumspect in its exercise of authority over the more resourced and powerful arms of government. In asserting its constitutional powers the judiciary constantly recognizes its ultimate reliance on both the executive and legislative branches to enforce its holdings on the one hand and to protect its independence on the other.[1]

Klug reminds us that in Marbury v Madison,[2] the US Supreme Court asserted, without being granted, a testing right, having earned it through a carefully crafted judgment inspired by an exemplary display of judicious politics. While S v Makwanyane & Another was a judicial tour de force — a 'bold assertion of constitutional rights and powers' — the Constitutional Court's judgment in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others struck Klug as possessing greater parallels to Marbury v Madison.[3]

The particularly sensitive and contentious issue that the Court had to deal with in Executive Council, Western Cape concerned a lively interplay of the conflicting forces of populism and constitutionalism (and centralism and federalism). The case concerned power allocation between the central government, where the African National Congress wielded the sceptre, and the provincial government in the Western Cape, where the 'new' National Party, a remnant of the previous apartheid regime, still dominated the scene. The case was brought by the National Party, which sought to quash presidential action of the popular and respected Nelson Mandela. In the end the Executive Council, Western Cape Court declared the statutory authorization for the President's impugned action unconstitutional, thereby undoing the action itself but without pointing a reproving finger at the President. According to Klug the upshot of this judgment was that the Court 'successfully traversed the dangers of conflicting powers and managed to insinuate itself as an honest broker by avoiding the claim for regional autonomy, while simultaneously disciplining and empowering the national institutions of democracy'.[4] And the President publicly praised this judgment, mentioning

[1] H Klug 'Introducing the Devil: An Institutional Analysis of the Power of Constitutional Review' (1997) 13 South African Journal on Human Rights 185, 189.
[2] 5 US (1 Cranch) 137 (1803).
[3] Klug (supra) at 194.
[4] Klug (supra) at 201.

appreciatively the Constitutional Court's assistance to both the government and society 'to ensure constitutionality and effective governance'.[1]

The issue of direct, horizontal application of the Bill of Rights, as dealt with in the constitutional jurisprudence of especially the Constitutional Court, exemplifies an ideological tension between freedom and equality. This issue will be brought up again in more detail at a later stage and in a different context,[2] and it is also dealt with extensively in Chapter 31.[3] For present purposes, just a few cursory remarks are necessary.

IC ss 7 (1) and (2), read together, left room for either a restrictive understanding of the operation of the Bill of Rights or a reading that permitted direct, horizontal application. In Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another[4] the Constitutional Court opted for the former, more restrictive understanding.[5] However, IC s 7(1) and (2) was thereafter replaced by FC s 8(1) to (3), which provides (in s 8(2) in particular) for the direct application of 'a provision of the Bill of Rights' to 'a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the rights and the nature of any duty imposed by the right'. In Khumalo & Others v Holomisa,[6] the Court confirmed that there is room for the direct, horizontal application of at least certain rights in the Bill of Rights in certain circumstances. However, according to Stu Woolman,[7] the Constitutional Court has in the recent past shown an unwholesome keenness to avoid the direct horizontal application of the Bill of Rights.[8] It is sufficient, for the time being, to point out that the direct horizontal application of the Bill of Rights remains controversial because it tends to pit freedom and equality against each other. A libertarian, maintaining that the most crucial function of a supreme bill of rights is to keep the state at bay and limit state action vis-à-vis the doings of the free and autonomous private individual or entity, will see in the horizontal application of the Bill of Rights an uncalled for threat to 'private freedom'. An egalitarian, on the other hand, will insist that there is no reason why the Bill of Rights cannot be applied to rectify endemic inequalities in 'horizontal relationships' so as to optimize parity among 'private' individuals and entities.

[1] Ibid at 198.

[2] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(dd) infra.

[3] S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[4] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC).

[5] For the full account, see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-16–31-33.

[6] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 33.

[7] S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 South African Law Journal 762.

[8] Woolman analyzes three cases as representative of this interpretive turn: Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC), NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC) and Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions & Others 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya').

The tension between the Final Constitution's classically liberal provisions and radical egalitarian norms reveals itself in case after case. Recently, in Molimi v The State, the Court refused to accept as evidence statements containing solid but inadmissible allegations against an accused person strongly suspected of involvement in a botched armed robbery.[1] The following (freedom-friendly) dictum explained the Court's refusal:

> This Court has said that the right to a fair trial requires a substantive rather than a formal or textual approach and that 'it has to instil confidence in the criminal justice system with the public, including those close to the accused, as well as those distressed by the audacity and horror of crime.'[2] . . . [P]roceedings in which little or no respect is accorded to the fair trial rights of the accused have the potential to undermine the fundamental adversarial nature of judicial proceedings and may threaten their legitimacy.[3]

In Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA & Another,[4] the ideological tension between traditionalism and modernism came to the fore. At issue was the constitutionality of the customary law rule of male primogeniture and statutory provision for the applicability of a customary law regime of intestate succession to black people only. Both challenges were based on equality claims, with gender equality prominent in the primogeniture challenge. In its majority judgment, the Bhe Court upheld both challenges and further held that the rule of primogeniture was not capable of being developed to bring it in line with constitutional values: it had to be struck down. Such a head-on confrontation of primogeniture with the Final Constitution's modernist equality demands had a far-reaching and wide ranging impact on traditional customary law. In a minority judgment Ngcobo J therefore proposed to soften the severity of the blow by not striking down the rule of primogeniture, but by developing it instead to bring it in line with the Bill of Rights' demand for gender equality. According to Ngcobo J, the rule of primogeniture thus had to be construed to include women as intestate heirs.

What then does the constitutional interpreter do once awareness of these unavoidable ideological tensions arises?

Henk Botha, writing about the counter-majoritarian difficulty, concludes that there is no point in trying to resolve this dilemma, and that living with it instead may be wholesome, because the tensions it generates could be creative (rather than destructive) in sculpting the constitutional order.[5] These tensions may, for instance, help to keep an institutionally mediated dialogue between the legislature

[1] 2008 (3) SA 608 (CC)('Molimi') at paras 52-54.
[2] Ibid quoting S v Jaipal 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 29.
[3] Molimi (supra) at para 42.
[4] 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[5] H Botha 'Democracy and Rights: Constitutional Interpretation in a Postrealist World' (2000) 63 Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 561, 578–581.

and the judiciary alive.[1] Botha's advice on how to deal with the counter-majoritarian difficulty, as manifestation of the ideological tension between populism and constitutionalism, is equally sound counsel for dealing with other ideological tensions too. A reconciliation or synthesis of opposing forces in a higher unity might bring closure, for the time being, but this will be a closure devoid of the invigorating and enervating power of contradiction and tension, and vulnerable to an essentialism that inclines toward oversimplified solutions for complex issues.

It helps if an interpreter of the Final Constitution is aware of the inevitability of the ideological tensions discussed above. This awareness prompts an identification of forces beyond ostensibly 'neutral' procedures of interpretation, pulling vigorously against one another each towards an interpretive outcome best suited to its concerns. The said awareness furthermore aids a pinpointing of actual issues and contestations involved in a particular episode of constitutional interpretation, while it kindles an understanding of why opposing trends and tendencies, describable in terms of the ideological tensions previously mentioned and briefly discussed, can meaningfully co-exist in the constitutional text and jurisprudence of a country.

Finally, the Constitution-in-writing, keeping alive the tensions that have shaped it, is not just a negotiated, written law-text; it has also remained a negotiating text — a perennial negotiant. The written text of the Constitution was, in other words, not formulated to suggest that once its wording had been agreed upon, ideological tensions among the constitutional negotiators were settled, and that the negotiators were desirous for the written constitutional text to reflect such a settlement. Agreement on a written text was possible only on the condition that the ideological tensions would remain — and visibly so — to be negotiated and renegotiated every time the text is reread with an interpretive eye.

32.4 The Enacted Constitution-in-writing

It will probably have become clear by now that constitutional interpretation involves quite a bit more than just working with a tangible, readable, written constitutional text in hand (and at hand), but of course it also involves that. How to deal interpretively with the concrete Constitution-in-writing, given its distinctive structural features and peculiar style, is a matter of considerable significance which will now be discussed. First, from the perspective that the supreme Constitution has a far-reaching impact on statute law as existing law, structural and stylistic differences and similarities between the constitutional text and statutory texts will be looked at, also to consider to what extent constitutional interpretation (working with the Constitution-in writing) and statutory interpretation (working with legislation-in-writing) are similar (and dissimilar) procedures. Next the interpretive value of the availability of versions of the written Constitutional text in more than one language will be discussed. Finally, attention will be drawn to the presence of interpretive indicia in the constitutional text and their possible role in constitutional interpretation. Some of these indicia are quite visible and readily available for use. Other less obvious ones have to be searched out in the written text, as will be shown.

[1] JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 20-26.

(a) The Constitution and the construction of enacted law

The nature, operation and effect of — as well as the limits to — constitutional supremacy were dealt with earlier in this chapter, and the ramifications of constitutional supremacy as a value are dealt with by Frank Michelman in Chapter 11. The judicially construed Final Constitution has a decided and far-reaching impact on statute law and its interpretation. Constitutional interpretation is in this way inextricably linked to statutory interpretation. Not only are statutes subject to the Final Constitution, but they also have to be read in the light of the Final Constitution in several ways. First, FC s 39(2) requires a mode of statutory interpretation that promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. Meaning has to be attributed to this section in accordance with the procedures of constitutional interpretation, but whatever meaning is placed upon it, it is bound to have a decisive impact on the manner in which legislation is construed.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal's judgment in Cape Killarney Property Investments (Pty) Ltd v Mahamba, for instance, illustrates how a constitutional injunction for the protection of a fundamental right can prompt a rights-friendly reading of a statutory provision.[2] The court held that s 4(4) of the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act[3] must be read in a manner affording a respondent in eviction proceedings the maximum benefit of effective notice of such proceedings, since s 4(4) 'has its roots' in FC s 26(3).[4] This constitutional provision states that 'no one may be evicted from their home without an order of court made after consideration of all the relevant circumstances'.

Second, constitutional interpretation, in the course of a court's exercise of its testing right, sparks off an interplay between the constitutional text and an impugned statutory text. The scope and effect of the one has to be considered in the light of the other and since the Constitution is supreme, it determines the parameters within which meaning can be attributed to the statute and not vice versa. Third, some aspects of constitutional interpretation as mode of interpretation can, over the course of time, be assimilated into statutory interpretation, especially as differences in style and language between the constitutional text and statutory texts start dwindling.[5] Finally, if there is a possibility that statutory

[1] For a discussion of some implications of FC s 39(2), see § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra. For a fuller version, see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-77–31-99.
[2] 2001 (4) SA 1222 (SCA)('Cape Killarney').
[3] Act 19 of 1998.
[4] Cape Killarney (supra) at para 21.
[5] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.

interpretation can in time be assimilated into constitutional interpretation, then there must certainly always have been vital similarities between these two instances of interpretation. To what extent then can constitutional interpretation be said to be like statutory interpretation — and vice versa?

Statutory and constitutional interpretation are both instances of legal interpretation[1] and, to be more exact, instances of construing enacted law-texts.[2] Since text genre co-constitutes textual meaning and therefore co-determines the manner in which the text is to be read and understood and eventually applied,[3] similarities between statutory and constitutional interpretation — at least to the extent that statutes and the Final Constitution belong to the same sub-genre of law-texts — are to be expected. Not all constitutional theorists, however, subscribe to this proposition.

Some authors emphasize the similarity[4] and others the dissimilarity[5] of constitutional and statutory interpretation as modes of interpretation. In South Africa the latter view currently prevails. A dictum from the Canadian case Hunter et al v Southam Inc— which highlights the distinctive otherness of constitutional interpretation — has met with approval in South African case law:[6]

> The task of expounding a constitution is different from that of construing a statute. A statute defines present rights and obligations. It is easily enacted and easily repealed. A constitution, by contrast, is drafted with an eye to the future. Its function is to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power and, when joined by a Bill or Charter of rights, for the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties. Once enacted, its provisions cannot easily be repealed or amended. It must, therefore, be capable of growth and development over time to meet new, social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers. The judiciary is the guardian of the Constitution and must, in interpreting its provisions, bear these considerations in mind.[7]

[1] See P Schneider 'Prinzipien der Verfassungsinterpretation' (1963) 20 Veröffentlichungen der Vereinigung der Deutsches Staatsrechtslehrer 1; H Ehmke 'Prinzipien der Verfassungsinterpretation' (1963) 20 Veröffentlichungen der Vereinigung der Deutsches Staatsrechtslehrer 53.

[2] See § 32.3*(e)*(i) supra.

[3] See § 32.3(e) supra.

[4] See E Forsthoff Zur Problematik der Verfassungsauslegung (1961) 37-40; R Dreier 'Zur Problematik und Situation der Verfassungsinterpretation' in R Dreier & F Schwegmann (eds) Probleme der Verfassungsinterpretation (1976) 13-17.

[5] S Magiera 'The Interpretation of the Basic Law' in C Starck (ed) Main Principles of the German Basic Law (1983) 89, 91-97.

[6] S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 84; Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148, 161A-B (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198, 208G–H (C); De Klerk v Du Plessis 1995 (2) SA 40, 45E-G (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124, 128A–C (T).

[7] (1984) 11 DLR (4th) 641, 649 (SCC). See also S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 84; Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148, 161A-B (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198, 208G–H (C); De Klerk v Du Plessis 1995 (2) SA 40, 45E-G (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124, 128A–C (T).

The differences between constitutional and statutory interpretation have much to do with the uniqueness of the written constitutional text.[1] To briefly recapitulate:

(i) The Constitution, as supreme law, is a long-lasting, enacted law-text at the apex of all legal norms within the legal order.
(ii) The Constitution is justiciable and therefore a standard for the assessment of the validity of both 'law' and 'conduct' in every legislative and executive echelon of government.
(iii) The Constitution verbalizes, in characteristically broad, inclusive and open-ended language, values and beliefs associated with democracy and the constitutional state (or Rechtsstaat).
(iv) The Constitution is a product of intense negotiation, harbouring ideological tensions of significance.

It is hopefully becoming ever clearer, as this chapter is proceeding, that constitutional interpretation is indeed, as was stated at the outset,[2] an observance emanating from, rooted in and shaping constitutional democracy, and an activator of the values underlying a democratic, constitutional state. It has far-reaching implications for statutory interpretation, in particular, because the supreme Constitution has a comprehensive impact on 'the intention of the legislature'. The Final Constitution constitutes the foundation upon which all ordinary legal rules are to be interpreted.[3]

Constitutional interpretation certainly calls for a novel interpretive approach, but precisely this means that statutory interpretation too can no longer make do with just the conventional methods and canons of construction:

> The constitutional theory which inspires the interpretation of the Constitution should ... also inform statutory interpretation. The principles for the interpretation of statutes are to be derived from the Constitution.[4]

Structurally the Final Constitution and statutes share many features. This is unsurprising because as prescriptive, abstractly normative law-texts they constitute a further sub-genre, namely enacted law-texts.[5] They are products of conscious, planned and deliberative norm-making by a demonstrable, authorized constitution-maker or law-maker. A constitution and statutes are therefore meant or intended to be of [1] See § 32.3*(e)*(ii) and (iii) supra.

[2] See § 32.1 supra.
[3] See T Roux 'Continuity and Change in a Transforming Legal Order: The Impact of Section 26(3) of the Constitution on South African Law' (2004) 121 South African Law Journal 466, 479.
[4] See JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 60, n 292 (Finds support for his contention in S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC) at paras 2-15 and 55; Minister of Land Affairs v Slamdien 1999 (4) BCLR 413 (LCC); and Dulabh & Another v Department of Land Affairs 1997 (4) SA 1108 (LCC).)
[5] For an explication of the terms 'enacted law' and 'enacted law-texts', see § 32.3*(e)*(i)(ee) supra.

effect.[1] By replacing statutes and, in particular, Acts of Parliament as highest normative authority, South Africa's two supreme Constitutions since 1994 have not deprived legislation of its worth, status or force, but have given it new direction and dimension. The Final Constitution and statutes also show similarities both in formal and operational style which makes it appropriate to rely on broadly similar reading strategies (conventional canons of statutory interpretation included) for their interpretation. In constitutional interpretation these strategies can be overridden by more pressing constitutional concerns. This is not really new. Traditionally, reading strategies for statutory interpretation as encapsulated and expressed in the canons of construction have not always and necessarily determined interpretive outcomes: 'more pressing concerns' may in certain situations also trump an interpretation resulting from painstaking implementation of canons of construction.[2]

Courts have since 1994 explicitly — but not too frequently — relied on canons of statutory interpretation to construe the two Constitutions. The Constitutional Court has mostly summoned up presumptions (as opposed to rules) of statutory interpretation to act as canons of constitutional interpretation. First among these presumptions is that enacted law is not unjust and inequitable.[3] It is rather surprising that the Court relied on this presumption, because the standards for just and equitable laws contained in the Final Constitution, and the Bill of Rights in particular, obtain with supreme force and are more to the point than those conventionally embodied in and associated with the presumption. However, the presumption may still cater for some concerns not so directly addressed in the Final Constitution and the Bill of Rights.[4] Second, the Constitutional Court has presumed that the Constitution, like statute law, is not invalid or purposeless.[5] Third, the same Court, in S v Mhlungu & Others, considered the applicability, in constitutional interpretation, of the presumption that an enacted instrument does not apply with retroactive and retrospective effect.[6] Some members of the Court voiced doubt about such applicability, but the court as whole did not come to a clear-cut conclusion. The presumption that statute law does not violate international law is a fourth presumption that has been recognized in constitutional interpretation.[7] Finally, the 'principle of interpretation' — that where two

[1] See § 32.3*(d)* supra.
[2] See L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 123-128.
[3] See Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('De Klerk') at para 123; Mhlungu (supra) at para 36.
[4] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 154-164.
[5] See Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) at para 52.
[6] Mhlungu (supra) at paras 37, 38 and 66-68.
[7] See Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 672 (CC)(AZAPO) at para 26.

subsections deal with the same subject matter they are usually read together — has been afforded similar recognition.[1]

In Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh[2] Flemming DJP assumed that FC s 26(3) should, like any statutory provision, be construed to alter the existing law or interfere with existing rights only to the extent clearly apparent from and allowed by the words used. This reliance on a conventional presumption of statutory interpretation constitutes an approach inappropriate to interpretation of the supreme Constitution[3] (and actually inappropriate to statutory interpretation in a constitutional democracy too). It is also not really an instance of reliance on any conventional canons of statutory interpretation such as the rules that the words of s 16(3) must be afforded their ordinary meaning (but that 'evict/eviction' and 'order of court' — and 'arbitrary' — must be construed as having a technical legal meaning); that the words 'no one' must be understood in their general signification, or that each word of the provision must be afforded a meaning.[4]

Other instances in which courts, and the Constitutional Court in particular, have been clutching at trusted literalist-cum-intentionalist straws in constitutional interpretation[5] can also not be classified as examples of reliance on any of the conventional canons of statutory interpretation. These instances, just like Betta Eiendomme, testify to the hold that literalist-cum-intentionalist statutory interpretation — as an approach to the interpretation of enacted law and not as a canon of construction — still has over judges engaged in constitutional interpretation. However, the fact that, in constitutional interpretation, many courts rely on conventional canons of statutory interpretation and resort to commonplace, interpretive rhetoric, does not warrant either an assimilation of literalist-cum-intentionalist assumptions into constitutional interpretation. I am strenuously arguing the opposite position.[6] It is time for such assumptions to go.

Under the stylistic influence of the Final Constitution, statutes are increasingly couched in expansive and open-ended language,[7] and aids to statutory and constitutional interpretation that were not high up in the traditional hierarchy of primacy nowadays fulfil a most basic function in the interpretive doings of the courts and are relied on unqualifiedly right from the outset. Preambles, for [1] Executive Council of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development of the RSA; Executive Council of KwaZulu-Natal v President of the RSA 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1999').

[2] 2000 (4) SA 468 (W).

[3] See Roux 'Continuity and Change' (supra) at 479.

[4] FC s 26(3) reads as follows: 'No one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances. No legislation may permit arbitrary evictions.' The rules of statutory interpretation mentioned as examples above all fit under the heading 'grammatical interpretation' in § 32.5*(c)*(i) infra.

[5] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.

[6] Ibid.

[7] See the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995, the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.

example, used to occur in statutes quite infrequently.[1] But they have now become regular inclusions in statutory texts, and they are often amplified by other statements of an introductory nature, such as statements of purpose or explicit guidelines to interpretation.[2] The courts often rely on these aids to attribute meaning to specific statutory provisions without even asking whether the language of such provisions is clear and unambiguous. These developments, occasioned mainly by the advent of constitutional supremacy,[3] undermine whatever was left of the credibility of the conventional order of primacy of canons of statutory interpretation. Why? Again, because they unsettle the notion of clear and unambiguous language.

A growing body of statute law has, especially over the last decade, augmented and given fuller and more detailed effect to constitutional provisions. Provision is made in the Final Constitution — and with reference to certain rights in the Bill of Rights in particular — for the enactment of such legislation. FC 9(4), for instance, obliges the national legislature to enact legislation 'to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination'. FC s 33(3), in a similar mandatory vein, requires the national legislature to enact legislation to give specific effect to aspects of the right to just administrative action. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[4] and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act,[5] respectively, have been enacted to comply with the constitutional obligations in ss 9(4) and 33(3). The Labour Relations Act ('LRA')[6] was enacted 'to give effect to and regulate the fundamental rights conferred by section 27 of the [Interim] Constitution'.[7] FC s 23(5) and (6) envisages and authorizes, in a permissive vein, legislation to regulate collective bargaining and to recognize union security arrangements contained in collective agreements respectively. National legislation giving specific effect to constitutional provisions may thus have been enacted either pursuant to a constitutional obligation or a permissive authorisation to do so, or of the legislature's own accord.

From an interpretive perspective there is a special relationship between the Constitution and statutes giving specific effect to its provisions, irrespective of whether these statutes have been enacted pursuant to an obligatory or permissive constitutional authorization, or of a legislature's own accord. First, when action is taken because an infringement of a constitutional right or rights to which a statute gives specific effect is alleged, a litigant cannot circumvent the statute 'by [1] For the interpretive significance of the constitutional Preamble, see 32.4*(c)*(i)(aa) infra.

[2] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 239-244.
[3] See 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.
[4] Act 4 of 2000 required by FC s 9(4).
[5] Act 3 of 2000 required by FC s 33(3).
[6] Act 66 of 1995, another statute in this category, envisaged in FC ss 23(5) and (6).
[7] LRA s 1(a).

attempting to rely directly on the constitutional right'.[1] To do so would be to 'fail to recognise the important task conferred on the legislature by the Constitution to respect, protect, promote and fulfill the rights in the Bill of Rights'.[2] Second, the provisions of a statute giving specific effect to constitutional provisions must, like any other statute, be construed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, and also the specific provision of the Bill of Rights to which the particular statute gives detailed effect.[3] This special nature of such legislation does not, however, mean that the statute must simply be treated as a restatement of the constitutional right, as long as it does not decrease the protection that the constitutional right affords or does not infringe another right.[4] Third, on the two conditions aforesaid, a statute giving specific effect to constitutional provisions 'may extend protection beyond what is conferred by' the particular Bill of Rights and other constitutional provisions to which it gives specific effect.[5]

Can a constitutional provision be understood in the light of a provision or provisions of a statute, and a statute giving specific effect to such constitutional provisions in particular? The rule of thumb is that legislation is to be read in the light of the supreme Constitution and not vice versa. However, statutes and, in particular, statutes giving specific effect to constitutional provisions together with jurisprudence on their interpretation, could (and should be allowed to) shape constitutional interpreters' understanding of some of the expansive and open-ended provisions of the Final Constitution in much the same way as the (subordinate) Interpretation Act[6] may shed interpretive light on provisions of the Final Constitution.[7] However, meanings attributed to words and phrases in legislation dating from the apartheid era ought not to be allowed to dictate the attribution of meaning to the same words and phrases when they are used in the Final Constitution.[8]

[1] See KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education & Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at para 40. See also Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amicus Curiae) 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC)('New Clicks') at paras 96 (Chaskalson CJ) and 434-437 (Ngcobo J); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC)('SANDU') at para 51; NAPTOSA & Others v Minister of Education, Western Cape & Others 2001 (2) SA 112, 123I-J (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 388, 396I-J (C).

[2] SANDU (supra) at para 52. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 96. SANDU can be read as an instance of (adjudicative) subsidiarity: a subordinate, less encompassing and more specific legal norm is relied on to adjudicate certain cases in preference to a superordinate, more encompassing and general constitutional norm. See § 32.5(b)(iii)(bb) infra.

[3] FC s 39(2).

[4] Pillay (supra) at para 43.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Act 33 of 1957.

[7] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(ii) infra and Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589, 599A–B (C).

[8] See Ex parte President of the RSA. In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 59.

(b) Multilingualism

Up to 27 April 1994 South Africa had two official languages, Afrikaans and English, but with the commencement of the Interim Constitution nine more were added: Sepedi, Sesotho, Setswana, siSwati, Tshivenda, Xitsonga, isiNdebele, isiXhosa and isiZulu.[1] Significant for the interpretation of enacted law in a multilingual state is the availability of versions of the Constitution and statutes in various languages. This is a potentially problematic situation because the various versions of a text may differ or may even conflict. It is also a potentially profitable situation, however, because comparison of different versions, each with its own nuances and emphases, can serve as an aid to interpretation. South African Constitutions between 1910 and 1994 each had a 'conflict provision' to cater for the potentially problematic dimension of statutory bilingualism. These provisions held that when the English and Afrikaans versions of a statute were in conflict, the version signed by the State President prevailed.[2] The courts worked quite creatively with the opportunities bilingualism offered, and did not readily conclude that different versions of a statute were in conflict. Generally speaking, when the occasion arose, profitable use was made of differences between the Afrikaans and English versions of statutes for reciprocal clarification.[3] The Interim Constitution contained[4] — and the Final Constitution still contains[5] — conflict provisions relating to statutes, still giving prevalence to the signed version of a statute in the event of conflict. A novelty in both Constitutions has been the inclusion of conflict provisions dealing with the different versions of the written constitutional text itself. Section 15 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act[6] added a conflict provision to the Interim Constitution stating that, notwithstanding the fact that the Afrikaans version of the Interim Constitution was signed by the then State President, its English version had, for the purposes of its interpretation, to prevail as if it were the signed version. FC s 240 provides that '[i]n the event of an inconsistency between different texts of the Constitution, the English text prevails'.

Jurisprudence on the conflict provisions pertaining to either of the new Constitutions has been rather sparse. In Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another,[7] with the Interim Constitution still in place, the Constitutional Court concluded, [1] See I Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 65.

[2] See 1909 South Africa Act (9 Edw 7 c 9) s 67; Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 32 of 1961 s 65; Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983 s 35.

[3] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 215-218.

[4] See IC s 65.

[5] See FC s 82 in respect of national legislation and FC s 124 in respect of provincial legislation.

[6] Act 2 of 1994.

[7] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('Du Plessis').

with s 15 of the 1994 Constitution Amendment Act in mind, that the English phrase 'all law in force' in IC s 7(2) had to be understood extensively with reference to the Afrikaans version 'alle reg wat van krag is'. 'All law in force' can be read as a reference restricted to statute law. The more inclusive Afrikaans word 'reg', however, indicated that 'law' must embrace common law as well as statute law. This connotation of 'reg' was clear from the Afrikaans wording of other sections. In IC ss 8(1) and 33(1) 'reg' was used as the Afrikaans equivalent for 'law'. In Kentridge AJ's interpretation, IC s 7(2) of the Afrikaans version thus in effect 'prevailed' in spite of the s 15 requirement that, for purposes of the interpretation of the Interim Constitution, the English text had to prevail. Preference for the Afrikaans version, Kentridge JA thought (relying on a 'well-established rule of interpretation'), was possible because there was no conflict between the two versions:

> [I]f one text is ambiguous, and if the ambiguity can be resolved by the reference to unambiguous words in the other text, the latter unambiguous meaning should be adopted. There is no reason why this common-sense rule should not be applied to the interpretation of the Constitution. Both texts must be taken to represent the intention of Parliament.[1]

Kentridge AJ finally justified his conclusion on the basis that Afrikaans had remained an official language with undiminished status in terms of IC s 3. Post-Du Plessis, no more than oblique reference to the Afrikaans versions of both Constitutions has been on offer.[2]

(c) Interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text

A waymark, according to the The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary,[3] is 'a conspicuous object which serves as a guide to travellers'. There are statements in the Preamble to and in certain provisions and other textual components of the Constitution-in-writing that explicitly present themselves as such to constitutional interpreters travelling the road to a better understanding of the Final Constitution (or aspects of it). Some conspicuous waymark provisions will first be identified and discussed.

To track or to spoor is also a way of travelling, but the guides to the journey are inconspicuous — and therefore not readily noticeable — but not invisible, and therefore not undiscoverable. The vigilant constitutional interpreter may detect these inconspicuous waymarks, for they are really and effectually there, in the written constitutional text, and they are discoverable. Examples of inconspicuous waymarks will be looked at after the discussion on conspicuous waymarks.[4]

Interpretive waymarks seem to occur in provisions of the Constitution in an injunctive, directive or permissive mood. Here are three examples:

[1] Du Plessis (supra) at para 44.
[2] Langemaat v Minister of Safety and Security 1998 (4) BCLR 444, 448J (T); Wittman v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria 1998 (4) SA 423, 449C (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92, 115H (T).
[3] The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on CD-ROM (5th Edition Version 2.0, 2002).
[4] See § 34.2*(c)*(ii) infra.

- The s 39(1) requirements that a court interpreting the Bill of Rights must promote certain values and must consider international law are, on the face of it, injunctive though the latter requirement — not really requiring a court to apply international law, but just to consider it — is arguably rather directive.
- The basic principles governing public administration in s 195 are directive.
- The s 39(1)(c) commendation of foreign law is permissive.

Not much of interpretive significance, however, turns on a distinction between injunctive, directive and permissive waymarks. The prescriptivity of the language in which a waymark provision is couched may enhance or reduce the initial conspicuity of the waymark, but this will no longer really matter once the waymark is followed.

Waymarks are not typical 'black-letter' legal rules, though, not even those couched in injunctive language. Theunis Roux suggests that the founding values in s 1 of the Constitution must be seen as interpretive guidelines, 'presumptions almost, which favour a certain way of understanding the South African constitutional project and … the nature of the democracy which that project seeks to promote'.[1] To treat value statements as 'presumptions almost' is to honour their normative ubiquity in constitutional interpretation. These 'presumptions' are substantive legal norms which do not obtain in an all-or-nothing manner, but carry sufficient weight to determine interpretive outcomes one way or the other. Conventional wisdom about presumptions in statutory interpretation, namely that they are 'last resorts' or 'tertiary grounds of deduction' to which the interpreter turns if all other interpretive strategies (and especially the literalist-cum-intentionalist ones) have failed, is wholly inappropriate to constitutional interpretation (and is under siege in statutory interpretation too).[2] Constitutional values as presumptions (as well as value-laden presumptions of statutory interpretation) call to mind Ronald Dworkin's[3] distinction between rules of law obtaining in an all-or-nothing manner and principles whose application is less definite though they carry demonstrable weight in the determination of legally reasoned outcomes. The presumptions aforesaid exert whatever interpretive influence they have in a principle-like manner, rather than in a rule-like manner, even though they can probably not be described as fully-fledged principles in a Dworkinian sense.

(i) Conspicuous waymarks

(aa) The Preamble to the Constitution

In statutory interpretation, preambles were traditionally recognized as statements setting out the objects of statutes. They were not frequently included in statutes

[1] T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 10-26.

[2] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 149-154; L du Plessis 'The (Re-)systematization of the Canons and Aids to Statutory Interpretation' (2005) 122 South African Law Journal 591, 598.

[3] R Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously (1977) 22-28.

and introduced mainly statutory texts of a solemn nature, for example, Constitution Acts[1] or private Acts such as University Acts.[2] It was admissible to consult a preamble to shed interpretive light on the meaning of the provisions of the legislative instrument that they prefaced, but then only where individual provisions that stood to be construed were ambiguous or uncertain due to deficient formulations.[3] However, the attitude of the courts regarding the interpretive value of the preambles to the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution (and the Interim Constitution's unprecedented Postamble too) has been open and positive right from the outset. Sachs J, for instance, said the following about the Preamble to the Interim Constitution:

> The Preamble in particular should not be dismissed as a mere aspirational and throat-clearing exercise of little interpretive value. It connects up, reinforces and underlies all of the text that follows. It helps to establish the basic design of the Constitution and indicate its fundamental purposes.[4]

The Constitutional Court[5] and, to a lesser extent, high courts[6] have shown a readiness to rely on constitutional preambles for interpretive purposes without

[1] See Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983; Transkei Constitution Act 48 of 1963.

[2] See University of Stellenbosch (Private) Act (House of Assembly) 107 of 1992; University of Natal (Private) Act 7 of 1960.

[3] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 240.

[4] See Mhlungu (supra) at para 112.

[5] See S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 130, 155, 156, 262, 278, 307, 514 and 363; Mhlungu (supra) at paras 64, 112 and 132; Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1995') at paras 30, 39 and 61; Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)('Shabalala') at paras 25 and 35; Ferreira v Levin; Vryenhoek v Powell 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 255; Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 150; Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature. In re: Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 52; Du Plessis (supra) at paras 75, 123, 125–126, 132, 157 and 159; Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC) at para 13; Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at paras 33 and 44; Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, & Others 1997 (6) BCLR (CC), 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC) at para 20; Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC) at para 32; Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 94; Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 21; Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 123; Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') at para 9; Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker') at para 108; New National Party of SA v Government of the RSA 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 119; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC), 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC)('FNB) at para 50; Kaunda & Others v President of the RSA & Others (2) 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda') at paras 218-221; Minister of Finance and Another v Van Heerden 2004 (6) 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) at para 23.

[6] See Qozoleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 634I-635C (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 79D–E (E)('Qozoleni'); Khala v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 218, 221F-G (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 89, 91F–G (W); Baloro v University of Bophuthatswana 1995 (8) BCLR 1018, 1044H–1045B (B); Holomisa v Argus Newspapers 1996 (2) SA 588, 597G (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 836, 844E (W).

imposing the qualification that such reliance is warranted only where the language of the Constitution is ambiguous and/or unclear. A good example of comprehensive (interpretive) reliance on the Preamble to the Constitution, seeking out the democratic substance in the introductory statements, can be found in Theunis Roux's Chapter 10 entitled 'Democracy'.[1]

The Interim Constitution also included a Postamble[2] which, just like the Preamble to the Interim Constitution, was relied on in an unqualified manner for interpretation purposes.[3] Much of the spirit and tenor of that Postamble has survived in the Preamble to the Final Constitution. The latter, for instance, among other things, recognizes 'the injustices of our past' and honours 'those who suffered for justice and freedom in our land', and furthermore reiterates the need for healing 'the divisions of the past' and for building a 'united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations'. Even the monotheistic confession of faith, gleaned from South Africa's national anthem, which concluded the Interim Constitution's Postamble, has remained in the Final Constitution's Preamble: Nkosi Sikelel' iAfrika (God bless Africa). The Postamble, it will be remembered, was the textual peg on which two versions of transitional constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv — the one picturing the Constitution as a bridge and the other conceiving of it as a monument and a memorial — were first hung.[4] The similarities between the Postamble and the present Preamble buttress the claim that textual support for transitional constitutionalism as interpretive leitmotiv still exists – even though explicit reference to the 'bridge' is no longer made. The more unqualified use of preambles in constitutional interpretation has met with response in statutory interpretation too and it seems to have become a rule of thumb for statutory drafters to include preambles in statutes dealing with a variety of matters.

(bb) The Founding Provisions

FC s 1, reminiscent of article 20 of the German Basic Law, sets out the rudiments of the kind of state (politeia) the Final Constitution is meant to found in South Africa. These provisions are therefore arguably the most fundamental and most salient interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text. Their extraordinary status is underscored by the requirement that an enhanced majority of 75 per [1] See Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-22–10-24.

[2] On this Postamble, see § 32.3*(c)*(iii) supra. As pointed out previously, this Postamble was designed to pave the way for mechanisms and procedures to 'deal with the past' in a manner that best promoted national unity and reconciliation. By virtue of a provision in the Final Constitution itself, namely FC s 232(4), the Postamble was 'deemed to form part of the substance' of the Interim Constitution.

[3] See Shabalala (supra) at para 25; AZAPO (supra) at paras 12–14; President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 73; S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 147; Walker (supra) at paras 46, 102 and 108.

[4] See §§ 32.3*(c)(iii)(aa)* and (bb) supra.

cent in the National Assembly, and the support of six out of the nine provinces in the National Council of Provinces, are needed for the amendment of FC s 1.[1] The whole of Chris Roederer's Chapter 13 is devoted to a discussion of the founding provisions and their ramifications.[2]

(cc) FC s 7 (Rights)

FC s 7 has, to date, mostly been relied on as an ad hoc rhetorical stratagem. This is unfortunate. FC s 7 contains provisions that amplify the meaning of the Bill of Rights and that are very similar to FC s 1 and its founding provisions for the Final Constitution.

Sceptics may object to the depiction of the provisions of FC s 7 as interpretive waymark provisions. Only FC s 7(3) serves as reminder that the fundamental rights in Chapter 2 are subject to limitations contained in FC s 36 or elsewhere in the Bill of Rights — and thus satisfies the desiderata of a typical interpretive instruction. FC s 7 is, admittedly, not an 'interpretation clause' in the same sense as FC s 39. However, it embodies weighty assertions about the Bill of Rights as a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa (FC s 7(1)) and the manner in which the state is required to make good on the promise of the specific substantive rights found in Chapter 2 (FC s 7(2)). The statements in these two subsections will remain abstract ideals if not concretized through interpretation. No extraordinary insight is required to realize that lofty constitutional values and ideals will come to naught if they are not invoked to shepherd and shape the way in which authorized interpreters of the Final Constitution (and the Bill of Rights) give effect to the provisions of the country's supreme law. The value statements in FC s 7 are, like those in FC s 1, essentially presumptions that indicate that some understandings of the Bill of Rights are to be preferred to others.[3]

A triumvirate of values, 'human dignity, equality and freedom', affirmed in FC s 7(1), decisively informs four crucial value statements in the Constitution — one among the founding provisions[4] in FC s 1[5] and three in the Bill of Rights.[6] The fundamentality and centrality of the triumvirate values informing s 7(1) rightly raised expectations that case law pronouncements on this provision would abound. The contrary is true. The case law offers few examples of FC s 7(1)-centred assertions of the triumvirate values and, in general, of systematic analyses of their nature, content and scope, as well as measured assessments of their potential impact. Courts have cited FC s 7(1) to affirm the centrality of human dignity as a constitutional value, but have mostly combined this with simultaneous

[1] FC s 74(1).

[2] See C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.

[3] See Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-26. .

[4] See FC Chapter 1.

[5] See FC s 1(a).

[6] See FC s 7(1)(States that the Bill of Rights affirms these democratic values); FC s 36(1), the general limitation clause; and FC s 39(1)(a), the interpretation clause.

references to the triumvirate value assertions elsewhere in the Final Constitution.[1] The possible meanings and effects of the triumvirate values have mostly been considered in the course of limitations reasoning centred on s 36(1). In paragraph (ee) below it will be explained why the systematic and comprehensive discussions of these values in Stu Woolman and Henk Botha's chapter on 'Limitations'[2] and Theunis Roux's chapter on 'Democracy'[3] suffice (also) for purposes of the present chapter.

The wording of FC s 7(2) admits of and, indeed, invites optimum realization of the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights. The view that a bill of rights may be relied on to respect and protect fundamental rights against interference by the state has traditionally enjoyed wide acceptance in the context of domestic human rights protection. However, to add to this obligation that the state is also enjoined to take positive action to promote and fulfil rights entrenched in a bill of rights will probably raise many a traditionalist eyebrow. And yet, FC s 7(2) has been cited in support of such positive state action.

In S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice Intervening)[4] the Constitutional Court, on a combined reading of FC ss 7(2) and 12(1) — the latter entrenching the right to freedom and security of the person — concluded that the state is obliged to protect the right of everyone to be free from private or domestic violence, even if it meant (preventative and pre-emptive) state intrusion into the privacy of family life. Legislation authorizing such intrusion[5] was therefore held to be constitutional because the intrusion for which it provides fulfils the state's constitutional obligation. In its landmark judgment in Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another, the Constitutional Court laid down guidelines for the development of the common law so as to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[6] Considered in casu was the development of the common law of delict on state liability for injuries suffered by a claimant at the hand of a third party, due to the failure of protective state agencies to take adequate precautionary action. The case originated in the Cape High Court which, on the strength of the 'undeveloped' common law, had previously granted absolution from the instance. The Constitutional Court, having concluded that there was scope for the development of the common law in this area (through FC s 39(2)), referred the case

[1] See, for example, Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at paras 34-35; Pillay (supra) at para 49.

[2] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

[4] S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice Intervening) 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC)('Baloyi') at para 11.

[5] See Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993.

[6] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').

back to the Cape High Court 'so that the trial may continue'.[1] Chetty J, in the latter court, thereupon handed down a judgment in which he applied the Constitutional Court's guidelines for the development of the common law and construed the duties of the state and, in particular, the police and prosecution services, in an activist vein with reference to, among others, the wording of FC s 7(2).[2] In Modder East Squatters & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd; President of the RSA & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd[3] the Supreme Court of Appeal, once again citing FC s 7(2) and FC s 1, emphasized that the extended scope of individuals' entitlement to state protection against harmful action imposes a positive duty on the part of the state to protect every citizen from damaging acts perpetrated by private (third) parties.

In Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others the Constitutional Court confirmed that the explicit (yet somewhat restrained) entrenchment of certain socio-economic rights in the Bill of Rights,[4] read with the state's FC s 7(2) duty to promote and fulfil the rights entrenched in Chapter 2, have put beyond question the issue of whether socio-economic rights are justiciable:[5] '[t]he question is therefore not whether socio-economic rights are justiciable under our Constitution, but how to enforce them in a given case'.[6] The Constitutional Court has also held that the legislature's previously referred to responsibility to enact legislation giving fuller and more detailed effect to fundamental rights entrenched in the Final Constitution[7] is a duty imposed upon it by FC s 7(2).[8]

In Kaunda & Others v President of the RSA & Others (2), a conservative and cautionary construction of FC s 7(2) was held not to authorize the exterritorial application of the Final Constitution.[9] The Court thought that the positive duties that FC s 7(2) imposes on the state do not extend beyond the borders of the Republic per se, and that an answer to the question of whether South African

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 84.

[2] Ibid at para 30.

[3] Government of the RSA v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at para 20.

[4] Socio-economic rights are entrenched in FC ss 26 and 27 not as entitlements to the commodities mentioned in those sections (to wit housing, health care, food, water and social security), but as entitlements to have access to the commodities in question. On the construction of socio-economic rights, see S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33.

[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 20.

[6] The Court's (arguably still somewhat tentative) view on the justiciability of socio-economic rights as expressed in First Certification Judgment (Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC) at para 78) was hereby (also) confirmed, in what may be described as a modestly activist judgment induced by FC s 7(2).

[7] For examples of such legislation, see § 34.2*(a)* supra.

[8] See SANDU (supra) at para 52. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 96.

[9] 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC), 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC) at para 32.

nationals' constitutionally entrenched rights attached to them outside of South Africa is co-dependent on whether the Final Constitution can be construed as having extra-territorial effect. As Stu Woolman notes, the Kaunda Court — with a simple errant reading of a preposition — arrived at the wrong conclusion.[1]

Finally, in Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others the Constitutional Court considered the nature of the duties FC s 7(2) imposes on the state, in order to determine which remedies would be available to someone prejudiced by a breach of such duties.[2] The Court suggested that these duties do not count among the 'constitutional obligations' contemplated in FC s 167(4)(e) and on the fulfilment of which the Constitutional Court has exclusive jurisdiction to adjudicate. Instead, the Court thought that non-compliance with FC s 7(2) duties has to be regarded (and treated) as similar to non-compliance with any other duties imposed by the Bill of Rights. These remarks seem to indicate that FC s 7(2) is justiciable — not as a right, but as a source of duties!

From the somewhat disparate treatment of FC s 7 there so far there emerges a picture of reasonably frequent — but by no means unimpeachable – reliance on FC s 7(2) to impose positive duties on the state. However, a coherent account of the triumvirate values, taking its cue from s 7(1), is by and large still wanting. And even if FC s 7(3) had indeed been designed as general authorization for limitations to Chapter 2 rights only in accordance with FC s 36 or other relevant provisions of the Bill of Rights, the constitutional case law has actually ignored such status. Limitations jurisprudence, since the commencement of the Constitution, has predominantly hinged on the construction of the provisions of FC s 36[3] or, to a lesser extent, Bill of Rights provisions containing or referring to specific limitations.

'This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone for democracy in South Africa'. A coherent and context-sensitive account of FC s 7, going beyond ad hoc explanations of it in the case law so far, presumably has to begin with this crucial opening statement in s 7(1). And yet, judged by the paucity of case law references, this statement seems to be overlooked quite easily. But it does appear, and do some work, now and then. In De Lange v Smuts NO & Others the Constitutional Court, for instance, held it to be one of the constitutional indicia compelling 'a clear separation of powers between the legislature, executive and judiciary'.[4] This reliance on FC s 7(1) forges an inextricable link between rights and democracy on the one hand, and democracy and rights, on the other. If ever a constitution could be found to expressly deny the contermajoritarian problem as a problem, then such a denial is to be found in FC s 7(2). Theunis Roux, in Chapter 10 ('Democracy') rightly

[1] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.
[2] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at paras 17-18.
[3] See Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra).
[4] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 44.

forges a link between the FC s 7(1) cornerstone statement and the rudiments of (constitutional) democracy. He suggests that a democracy with a bill of rights as cornerstone is one in which constitutional review by the courts is afforded its due, to the point of recognising that 'there will be at least some occasions when the vindication of a right at the expense of majoritarian wishes will not be undemocratic'.[1] The notion of the Bill of Rights as cornerstone of democracy furthermore presupposes a particular mode of constitutional review. The primary characteristics of this mode of review appear in FC s 36(1) procedures and conditions for limiting rights.[2]

HM Cheadle, DM Davis and NR Haysom attempt to offer a coherent account of FC s 7 based on the assumption that the section as a whole accomplishes five important objectives:[3]

(i) First, it proclaims the Bill of Rights as a cornerstone of our democracy. It is not the only such cornerstone — FC s 1, for instance, fulfils a similar role — but the status of FC s 7 as cornerstone has profound implications for how the rights contained in the Bill of Rights engage with the democratic governance of the Republic. FC s7 is furthermore entwined with FC s 1 to such an extent that, according to the authors,[4] a dilution of the former will inevitably offend the basis of the latter.

(ii) Second, FC s 7 proclaims that the Bill of Rights enshrines the rights of all who live in the country. That means that such rights pre-exist their inclusion in the Final Constitution. They are, in other words, innate rights as contemplated in the American Declaration of Independence which contains the following phrase (included at the behest of Thomas Jefferson):

> We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.[5]

The Final Constitution is therefore not the source or the origin of the rights that it enshrines, but a record of already existing rights.

(iii) Third, FC s 7 affirms a value system on which the Bill of Rights rests. According to the authors the affirmation of these (what were previously referred to as) triumvirate values provides a basis for the Constitutional Court's claim in Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another[6] that the Constitution is not merely a formal document regulating public power, but that '[i]t also embodies, like the German Constitution, an objective, normative

[1] Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-34.
[2] Ibid at 10-34–10-37.
[3] HM Cheadle, DM Davis & NRL Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2006) 2-1–2-6.
[4] Ibid at 2-1.
[5] Ibid at 2-2.
[6] Carmichele (supra) at para 54.

value system'.[1] The authors are, however, critical of what they perceive to be a skewed development in the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence of the triumvirate values and its over-emphasis of human dignity.[2]

(iv) Fourth, FC s 7 requires the state to take affirmative measures to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights contained in the Bill of Rights. Under this heading — with comparative reference to foreign jurisprudence — the authors endorse the previously described activist trend in South Africa's constitutional jurisprudence. FC s 7(2) saddles the state with certain 'positive' duties.[3]

(v) Fifth, FC s 7 recognizes that the rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited, but only in the manner set out in the Bill itself.

Bringing together what Roux[4] says about the Bill of Rights as cornerstone of democracy, the contentions of Cheadle, Davis and Haysom, and Woolman and Botha's analysis of the role of FC 7(1) in rights interpretation and limitations analysis,[5] it appears that FC s 7 plays, in respect of the Bill of Rights, an anchoring, depictive and interpretive role analogous to that of the founding provisions in FC s 1. FC ss 1 and 7 also complement and sustain each other. The democratic procedures mentioned in s 1 mainly pertain to populist democracy: universal adult suffrage, voters' rolls, regular elections, multi-party democracy and accountable, open and responsive government are the matters and concerns raised in FC s 1*(d)*. In FC s 7 the emphasis is, as Roux rightly argues, on constitutional democracy. The ideological tension between populism and constitutionalism reveal itself when FC ss 1 and 7 are read together. But the tension between them remains. This tension, kept alive, has the potential to release creative (interpretive) energy that could enrich the construction of both populist- and constitutionalist-inclined provisions in the Final Constitution.

(dd) Section 8 (Application)

Application of the Bill of Rights, as provided for primarily in FC s 8, has been dealt with extensively by Stu Woolman in Chapter 31 and there is no need to revisit or to expand upon that exhaustive discussion here.[6] However, it must be pointed out pertinently, in the present chapter dealing with interpretation, that FC s 8 embodies significant waymarks to the interpretation of the Bill of Rights. This is unsurprising, given the unity in the duality of what has conventionally been known (and distinguished) as interpretation and application.[7] Dealing with the [1] See also § 32.1*(c)* supra.

[2] Cheadle, Davis & Haysom (supra) at 2-2–2-4.
[3] Ibid at 2-4–2-6.
[4] 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-34–10-37.
[5] Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at Chapter 34.
[6] Woolman 'Application' (supra) at Chapter 31.
[7] See §§ 32.3*(a)(vi) and 32.3(d)* supra.

overriding question of to whom and to what the Bill of Rights applies, FC s 8 significantly demarcates the ambit and determines the impact of the Bill of Rights on the existing law, the functions of the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and organs of state, and on natural persons and on juristic persons.[1] It goes without saying that such an impact is a matter of fundamental interpretive significance.

However, no application issue illustrates the interpretive ramifications of FC s 8 better than the s 8(2) provision for the direct application of 'a provision of the Bill of Rights' to 'a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the rights and the nature of any duty imposed by the right'. FC s 8(1), it will be remembered, introduces the application clause by making the Bill of Rights applicable to 'all law' and binding upon the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state. FC s 8(3), in order to effect the direct or 'horizontal' application of a right as envisaged in FC s 8(2), provides for the application or, in a manner reminiscent of s 39(2),[2] the development of the common law. It also authorizes the limitation of such a right 'provided that the limitation is in accordance with section 36(1)' FC (the limitations clause).[3]

IC s 7 sub-ss (1) and (2), predecessors to FC s 8(1) to (3), were agreed on after an intense tug of war between enthusiastic proponents and resolute opponents of the horizontal application of the transitional Bill of Rights.[4] These two subsections, read together, left room for either a restrictive understanding of the operation of the Bill of Rights or a more extensive understanding allowing for its direct, horizontal application. In the then landmark (and now obsolete) Constitutional Court judgment of Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another[5] the die was cast in favour of the former, more restrictive understanding of sub-ss (1) and (2) of FC s 7.[6] These two provisions were thereafter replaced by FC ss 8(1), 8(2) and 8(3). In Khumalo & Others v Holomisa,[7] the Court acknowledged the explicit,

[1] See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4.

[2] See § 32.1*(c)* supra and § 32.5*(b)*(iii) infra.

[3] For an elaborate discussion of the possible meaning(s) and implications of FC ss 8(2) and (3), see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-42–31-77 and for an in-depth consideration of FC s 39(2) in relation to FC s 8 see ibid at 31-7731-100.

[4] IC Chapter 3.

[5] Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('De Klerk').

[6] For the full account, see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-16–31-33.

[7] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo') at para 33 with O'Regan J concluding as follows about the possible, directly horizontal application of section 16 of the Constitution:

> In this case, the applicants are members of the media who are expressly identified as bearers of constitutional rights to freedom of expression. There can be no doubt that the law of defamation does affect the right to freedom of expression. Given the intensity of the«PR »constitutional right in question, coupled with the potential invasion of that right which could be occasioned by persons other than the State or organs of State, it is clear that the right to freedom of expression is of direct horizontal application in this case as contemplated by s 8(2) of the Constitution. The first question we need then to determine is whether the common law of defamation unjustifiably limits that right. If it does, it will be necessary to develop the common law in the manner contemplated by s 8(3) of the Constitution.

unmistakable, written constitutional basis for direct, horizontal application of the Bill of Rights.[1]

Ten years after the commencement of FC ss 8(1), 8(2) and 8(3), and five years after Khumalo, the Du Plessis v De Klerk scepticism about the direct, horizontal application of the Bill of Rights has either persisted or has been revived. This, at least, seems to be the most feasible conclusion to be drawn from Stu Woolman's 'Amazing Vanishing Bill of Rights'.[2] Woolman revives the debate about application by looking closely at three 2007 judgments of the Constitutional Court: Barkhuizen v Napier,[3] NM & Others v Smith & Others[4] and Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions & Others.[5] Woolman's consistent objection is that in all three cases rights interpretation gave way to the more amorphous FC s 39(2) process of norm interpretation in circumstances where the former process was logically and pragmitcally to be preffered.[6] Going the inappropriate norm route deprived the Constitutional Court's interpretive reasoning, in all three judgments, of both analytical rigour and nuance.[7] According to Woolman, the root cause of the court's inappropriate interpretive strategy is its reluctance, if not downright unwillingness, to apply rights provisions in the Bill of Rights directly to the action of (non-state) 'natural or juristic persons'[8] as envisaged in FC s 8(2) and in Khumalo.[9] Woolman's analysis demonstrates how an issue of application can decisively determine a strategy of constitutional interpretation. That alone gives Woolman's objections substance.

(ee) FC s 36 (Limitation of rights)

FC s 36 is probably the explicitly articulated interpretive waymark provision in the Bill of Rights (and the Constitution as a whole) relied on most frequently and most openly in constitutional interpretation, for it embodies the operational provisions that set constitutionally passable limits to rights. Rights interpretation will be impossible without (constitutional) provision for the measured limitation of the rights construed. Because of its eminence, the topic 'Limitations' is discussed exclusively in Chapter 34.[10] In that chapter Stu Woolman and Henk Botha extensively consider and canvass the meaning possibilities of — and the meaning(s)

[1] For a full discussion and analysis of this case, see S Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-42–31-56 and 31-62–31-74.
[2] S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124(4) South African Law Journal 762. See also § 32.1(c) supra.
[3] Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC).
[4] NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC).
[5] 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya').
[6] See § 32.1(c) supra.
[7] Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (supra) at 769.
[8] Ibid at 762-763.
[9] Khumalo (supra) at para 33, for example.
[10] Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra).

attached by the courts to — the value-laden phrase 'an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.[1] A FC s 36(1) limitation of rights may be effected 'to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable' in such a society. Theunis Roux, in his discussion of democracy in Chapter 10, reflects incisively, with reference to the written constitutional text and the case law, on the possible meanings of the value-laden phrase above and on its ramifications for democracy.[2] In this chapter, an exercise akin to what Woolman, Botha and Roux have ably and amply undertaken will at best be duplicative. The value-laden phrase above with its incorporation of the triumvirate values can be accessed, in part, in FC s 7(1) and in whole, through FC s 39(1) too. In paragraph (cc) above only case law references accessing the phrase via FC s 7(1) were briefly considered and in paragraph (ff) below the same will be done with references going the FC s 39(1) route. For more detailed discussions of the phrase and the triumvirate values the reader is referred to Chapters 10 and 34.

(ff) FC s 39 (Interpretation of the Bill of Rights)

FC s 39, like FC s 7,[3] has to date also not thoroughly and systematically been analyzed in the constitutional case law.[4] A coherent and context-sensitive construction of the section and its subsections is therefore also still wanting. However, FC s 39(2) is an exception in this regard because, especially since Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another,[5] it has become a prominent, normative launching pad for the development of existing law to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. FC s 39(2) is, in other words, and has fast become, a far-reaching provision dealing with the impact of the Bill of Rights on the interpretation and development of existing law. This topic will be dealt with more fully at a later stage under the heading 'subsidiarity'.[6]

The heading to FC s 39 explicitly states that this operational provision deals with the interpretation of the Bill of Rights though, as was suggested earlier, the section does not encapsulate Bill of Rights interpretation in its entirety. It begins by prescribing the promotion of certain values 'when interpreting the Bill of Rights'[7] and continues by prescribing, in a peremptory vein, reliance on international law[8] and allowing, in a directory vein, reliance on foreign case law[9] in Bill of Rights interpretation. Reliance on these two transnational sources will be dealt with as comparative interpretation (or transnational contextualisation) at a later

[1] Ibid at 34-6734-126.
[2] Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-34–10-37 and 10-65–10-77.
[3] See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(cc) supra.
[4] See § 32.1*(d)* supra.
[5] Carmichele (supra).
[6] See § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra.
[7] FC s 39(1)(a).
[8] FC s 39(1)(b).
[9] FC s 39(1)(c).

stage.[1] Finally FC s 39(3) provides that the Bill of Rights does not entail a denial of existing rights and freedoms deriving from — and provided for in — other sources of law. For present purposes some observations on how ss 39(1)(a) and 39(3) have featured in interpretive constitutional jurisprudence will be appropriate.

FC s 39(1)(a) envisages 'an open and democratic' society based on the triumvirate values, namely, human dignity, equality and freedom, and it enjoins judicial interpreters of the Bill of Rights to promote the values that underlie such a society. This same aspirational society is prefigured in FC s 36(1). As pointed out in paragraph (ee) above there are, with reference to FC s 36(1), accounts in the case law of what this model society might look like. The values that underlie such a society have also been catalogued methodically in the in Chapters 34[2] and 10[3] of this treatise.

Nothing remotely resembling the accounts and the methodical catalogue just referred to, exists in respect of FC s 39(1)(a) in the case law. The courts mainly cite the description in this provision of the model society based on the triumvirate values for rhetorical rather than analytical purposes, and most often in order to lend force to what a judicial interpreter has already concluded, with reference to an issue at hand, an ideal state of affairs in a democratic South Africa should be. In *Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal*Sachs J, for instance, in justifying the Constitutional Court's refusal to interfere with an executive decision not to provide life-saving medical treatment to an ailing applicant, opined (with reference to FC s 39(1)(a)) that:

> [i]n all the open and democratic societies based upon dignity, freedom and equality with which I am familiar, the rationing of access to life-prolonging resources is regarded as integral to, rather than incompatible with, a human rights approach to health care.[4]

In Christian Education SA v Minister of Education the same judge observed that '[t]here can be no doubt that the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion in the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution is important'.[5] In S v Gumede & Others it was stated as a general proposition that FC s 39(1)(a) 'enjoins the court to apply a liberal interpretation to the Bill of Rights; in other words, where possible, to apply a wider rather than a narrower interpretation thereof'.[6] This then, presumably, is the desired approach to Bill of Rights interpretation in 'an open and democratic society'. If FC s 39(1)(a) can be understood to prescribe, as it were, a preferred approach to Bill of Rights

[1] See § 32.5*(c)*(v) infra.
[2] Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at 34-67–34-126.
[3] Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-34–10-37 and 10-65–10-77.
[4] 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC) at para 52.
[5] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) at para 36.
[6] 1998 (5) BCLR 530, 542B (D). See § 32.1*(b)* supra.

interpretation, then it certainly also authorizes reliance on methods of and reading strategies for constitutional interpretation accepted and brought into play in open and democratic societies. This possibility has not been canvassed eo nomine in the case law.[1]

FC s 39(1)(a) has, from time to time, been cited in the case law, mostly ad hoc and in conjunction with the triumvirate value statements in FC ss 1*(a)*, 7(1) and 36(1), and as point of contact for observations on the meaning and effect of the triumvirate values. Among these observations a remark by the Constitutional Court in S v Mamabolo (E TV, Business Day and the Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening) is worth noting.[2] The Mamabolo Court stated emphatically that the Constitution 'proclaims three conjoined, reciprocal and covalent values to be foundational to the Republic: human dignity, equality and freedom'. This dictum is striking because of its even-handed treatment of the triumvirate values — human dignity, for example, is not singled out for special treatment or mention. Langa CJ, in MEC for Education: KwaZulu Natal & Others v Pillay & Others, endorsed the Mamabolo approach, holding that the triumvirate values 'are not mutually exclusive but enhance and reinforce each other'.[3] He did not refer back to Mamabolo though, but to a dictum from the minority judgment of Ackermann J in Ferreira v Levin NO; Vryenhoek v Powell NO.[4]

In S v Makwanyane & Another, Mokgoro J, considering the constitutional significance of the concept of ubuntu, made an interesting move: she placed ubuntu on a level with concepts like 'humanity' and 'menswaardigheid' ('human dignity') and then stated that '[i]t is values like these that [FC s 39(1)(a)] requires to be promoted'.[5] This move was referred to with approval in Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers and was said to require 'the court to infuse elements of grace and compassion into the formal structures of the law'.[6]

In S v Dzukuda & Others; S v Tshilo the Constitutional Court, with reference to FC s 39(1)(a), among others, pointed out that reliance on the triumvirate values — or the 'foundational values of our Constitution' as the court called them — is essential to discover what 'lies at the heart of a fair trial in the field of criminal justice'.[7] In S v Dodo, also in the context of criminal justice, but this time with

[1] But see De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange') at para 85.

[2] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 41.

[3] 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at para 63.

[4] Ferreira (supra) at para 49:

> Human dignity has little value without freedom, for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.

[5] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 308. Mokgoro J here still referred to the corresponding section 35 of the Interim Constitution.

[6] 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at para 37 n 36.

[7] Ibid at para 11.

reference to the notion of 'cruel, inhuman or degrading' punishment as it occurs in s 12(1)(e) of the Constitution, s 39(1)(a) was cited alongside the other constitutional provisions verbalizing the triumvirate values, in support of the contention that the s 12(1)(e) litmus test is whether impugned punitive acts involve 'the impairment of human dignity, in some form and to some degree'.[1]

As to the meaning of FC s 39(3), in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In re ex parte President of the RSA, the Constitutional Court stated that the purpose of this provision is to ensure, together with FC s 39(2), 'that the common law will evolve within the framework of the [Final] Constitution consistently with the basic norms of the legal order that it establishes'.[2] This purpose presupposes that the Final Constitution is the supreme law against which all other law must be tested:

> Section 39(3) should not be taken to establish a legal apartheid with two separate systems of law, only one of which is effected by the rules and principles of the Constitution.[3]

Cheadle, Davis and Haysom are of the opinion that '[FC] s 39(3) embraces what might be termed a presumption of constitutionality'.[4]

Thus far, the case law dealing with FC s 39(1) and (3) offers little more than ad hoc judicial wisdom — though not without some persuasive force. For systemic and comprehensive accounts of the meaning of 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom' the reader should, as previously intimated, look to the more speculative readings of Woolman and Botha in Chapter 34 and Roux in Chapter 10 of this treatise.[5]

(gg) FC Chapter 3 (Co-operative government)

FC Chapter 3 demonstrates that South Africa is a co-operative federal state[6] as opposed to a competitive federation.[7] Chapter 3 and FC ss 40 and 41 embody interpretive waymarks of considerable significance for the construction of FC ss 146 to 150 which set out, with remarkable specificity, how conflicts between laws in the various spheres of government, in this co-operative federation, are to be resolved.[8]

---

[1] 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 35.

[2] 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 49.

[3] HM Cheadle, DM Davis & NRL Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2006) 33-4.

[4] Ibid at 33-4–33-5.

[5] See, for example, Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at 10-31–10-32 and 10-35–10-36.

[6] See S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

[7] I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law Volume 1 (2001) 119-124.

[8] For a discussion of these provisions, see V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16. On the fundamental significance of co-operative government especially between the central and provincial governments, see Doctors for Life v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life') at para 81 and Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele') at para 41.

(hh) FC s 195 (Basic values and principles governing public administration)

FC s 195 embodies vital waymarks for the interpretation of constitutional provisions dealing with public administration.[1]

(ii) FC s 239 (Definitions)

The Final Constitution, like many conventional statutes, has a definition clause with explicit directives as to how certain words and phrases occurring throughout the written text ought to be understood.[2] There are actually only three definitions: of 'national legislation', of 'organ of state', and of 'provincial legislation'. The constitutional definition clause is relied on regularly (most often for its definition of 'organ of state')[3] and it is used in much the same way as definition clauses in ordinary statutes. Its definitions obtain 'unless the context indicates otherwise' or unless some sound reason for their exclusion can be shown to exist.

Definitions in the Interpretation Act[4] have been used for constitutional interpretation much in the same way they have been used for statutory interpretation.[5] The use of the Act's definitions to assign meaning to constitutional provisions is precluded, however, if their use would have the effect of subordinating the Final Constitution to the Act.

The Final Constitution has been held to be 'a law' as envisaged in the Interpretation Act. Section 1 of the Citation of Constitutional Laws Act,[6] however, affirms the uniqueness of the Final Constitution by authorizing one reference only, namely 'Constitution of Republic of South Africa, 1996'. A reference such as 'Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 108 of 1996' is therefore not only inapproproate, but statutorily proscribed. The prescribed mode of reference honours the status of the Final Constitution, as amidst enacted law, the only one of its kind. It is an interpretive waymark of considerable consequence even though it does not appear in the written text of the Final Constitution.

[1] See A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23 A.

[2] FC s 239.

[3] On the meaning of 'organ of state in FC s 239, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31. The cases offer a picture of such reliance: Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 20; Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 22; Van Rooyen v The State (General Council of the Bar Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 100; Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at paras 66-67; Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v Governing Body of Mikro Primary School & Another 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA) at para 18; Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign & Another as Amici Curiae*)* 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC)('New Clicks') at para 121; Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC)('Investments') at paras 30 and 149-50.

[4] Act 33 of 1957. See also Magano v District Magistrate, Johannesburg (2) 1994 (4) SA 172, 177C (W).

[5] See Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei & Others 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC)('Zantsi'), 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC) at paras 36–37; Ynuico Ltd v Minister of Trade and Industry 1996 (3) SA 989 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 798 (CC) at para 7; President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 97.

[6] Act 5 of 2005.

(ii) Inconspicuous waymarks

Inconspicuous interpretive waymarks in the Constitution-in-writing are not immediately traceable, but they are there, nonetheless, available for use, and they have the same force that conspicuous waymarks have. The matters they deal with are also by no means less significant than those that the conspicuous waymarks bring to the fore.

A matter as vital as the separation of powers (or trias politica)[7] is, for instance, not explicitly mentioned in the written text of the Final Constitution, and as an unexpressed or implicit provision,[8] it is detectable with the help of, among others, inconspicuous waymarks in the written constitutional text. Such waymarks may present themselves as, amongst others, inferences drawn from the structure of the written constitutional text and/or from its explicit provisions.[9] In South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others[10] the Constitutional Court per Chaskalson P explained:

> I cannot accept that an implicit provision of the Constitution has any less force than an express provision. In Fedsure, this Court held that the principle of legality was implicit in the interim Constitution, and that legislation which violated that principle would be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.
>
> The constitutions of the United States and Australia, like ours, make provision for the separation of powers by vesting the legislative authority in the legislature, the executive authority in the executive, and the judicial authority in the courts. The doctrine of separation of powers as applied in the United States is based on inferences drawn from the structure and provisions of the Constitution, rather than on an express entrenchment of the principle. In this respect, our Constitution is no different.
>
> In the First Certification Judgment this Court held that the provisions of our Constitution are structured in a way that makes provision for a separation of powers . . . There can be no doubt that our Constitution provides for such a separation, and that laws inconsistent with what the Constitution requires in that regard, are invalid.[11]

Interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text — and especially the inconspicuous ones — do not constitute a numerus clauses, and where pressing interpretive exigencies necessitate a meticulous reading of the text, there is always a possibility that 'new' waymarks may be detected.

The explicit and implicit waymarks in the written text do not function in isolation from one another — but often, when read in conjunction, strengthen the force of one another. Guarantees of judicial independence in the written

[1] On the significance of trias politica, see Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 105. See S Seedorf and S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[2] See South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)('Heath') at para 19.

[3] See First Certification Judgement (supra) at paras 106-113.

[4] Heath (supra) at paras 20-22.

[5] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374, 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure Life Assurance') at para 58.

constitutional text offer an apt illustration of this thesis.[1] In the Final Constitution FC s 165 underwrites most conspicuously and directly the independence of South Africa's courts:

> 165 Judicial authority
> (1) The judicial authority of the Republic is vested in the courts.
> (2) The courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice.
> (3) No person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts.
> (4) Organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the courts to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.
> (5) An order or decision issued by a court binds all persons to whom and organs of state to which it applies.

While FC s 165 is undoubtedly a (if not the) leading waymark provision on how powers of the judiciary, given its independence, are to be construed, other implicit (and no less potent) guarantees of judicial independence exist in the Final Constitution:

(aa) FC s 173's entrenchment of higher courts' 'inherent power to protect and regulate their own process, and to develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice' presupposes the independence of those courts.

(bb) FC s 1*(c)* proclaims the '[s]upremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law' to be two of the values on which the Republic of South Africa is founded. These two founding values, each on its own but especially also in conjunction with each other, are consistent only with a constitutional dispensation in which the independence of the judiciary prevails.[2]

(cc) The 'open and democratic society' identified in the interpretation[3] and limitation[4] of rights in the Bill of Rights can hardly be secured without independent courts.

(dd) FC s 37(3) of the Constitution entrusts 'any competent court' with the power to review the declaration and an extension of — as well as legislation and administrative action consequent upon — a state of emergency. This is a far-reaching constitutional acknowledgment of the independence of the judiciary, particularly in difficult times.

[1] See L du Plessis 'How Fragile is Constitutional Democracy in South Africa? Assessing (Aspects of) the Fourteenth Amendment Debate/Debacle — Part 1: Constitutional Guarantees of the Separation of Powers and the Independence of the Judiciary in South Africa' (2007) 21 Speculum Juris 193, 200-205.
[2] FC s 74(1).
[3] FC s 39(1)(a).
[4] FC s 36(1).

(ee) FC s 233 decrees preference for a reasonable interpretation of legislation consistent with international law over any interpretation not thus consistent. This makes for an observation of international law standards which, in its turn, is likely to result in constitutional interpretation conducive to judicial independence.

(ff) Oddly — and significantly — the definition clause in the Constitution[1] expressly provides that 'a court or a judicial officer' is not an 'organ of state' — even though 'organ of state' also means any functionary or institution exercising a (public) power or performing a (public) function in terms of the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation. Not putting courts and judicial officers on a par with other organs of state is most likely an instance of precautionary, definitional deference to judicial independence.

The six textual indicia above prompt the conclusion that, just like trias politica, the independence of the judiciary may also be deduced from the structure and provisions of the Final Constitution.

Finally, choice of words may also function as interpretive waymark. Having a right to freedom and security of the person (s 12(1)) or to a basic education (s 29(1)(a)) is presumably an entitlement of a different order compared to a right to have access to adequate housing (s 26(1)) or health care (s 27(1)(a)), or not to be denied the right to enjoy one's culture (s 31(1)(a)).

32.5 Methods of Constitutional Interpretation

(a) Method(s) as doing(s)

The concept 'method', in the context of constitutional interpretation, previously came into the picture briefly when theories of constitutional interpretation were discussed.[2] The different methods of constitutional interpretation which German scholars have formulated with reference to the constitutional jurisprudence of their Bundesverfassungsgericht have been briefly assayed, and passing mention was made of the extent to which such methods reflect discernible theoretical orientations or positions. For present purposes the focus will not be this method-theory relationship, but method as a mode or manner of doing as such. 'Method', like 'theory', is used loosely among jurists. However, the dictionary meanings of the word, apposite to the present discussion, are rather to the point. 'Method', in one of its generic significations is, the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on CD-ROM[3] tells us, a 'procedure for attaining an object', and one possible more specific meaning under the generic heading is 'a mode of procedure, a (defined or systematic) way of doing a thing, esp … in accordance with a particular theory or as

[1] FC s 239.
[2] See § 32.3*(c)*(i) supra.
[3] The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on CD-ROM (5th Edition Version 2.0, 2002).

associated with a particular person'. To this it may be added that the procedure is purposive or goal-directed and conscious planning has gone into designing it. However, a method which has become mere routine will mostly obfuscate such conscious planning.

A synonym for 'method' is 'technique' which, in constitutional interpretation, designates a skilful engagement with the Constitution-in-writing to explore its meaning possibilities. Interpretive method-as-technique can also be described as a reading strategy. Preference will be given to the term 'reading strategy' when reference is made to method as interpretive doing, because the word 'method' itself could be understood as a reference to methods of constitutional interpretation as they occur in, for instance, the German context, and it is not these methods (or phenomena akin to them) that will be discussed in the rest of this chapter.

(b) Reading strategies

South Africa's legal system is a hybrid: rather like Romano-Germanic civil law in some respects and like English common law in others. The common-law phenomenon of stare decisis, introduced through colonial British rule, has been the key to the survival and growth of (civil-law oriented) Roman-Dutch law (and all other common law) in South Africa. In respect of content, the South African common law shows traits of both Roman-Dutch and English common law. Traditionally English influence has been strongest in (and English law has actually dominated) areas of the law most closely related to the exercise of political power (constitutional and administrative law), the administration of justice (law of criminal and civil procedure and evidence) and business and industry (company law, bills of exchange, insolvency law).[1] For present purposes the influence of English law in public law and the law of procedure is particularly significant because the idea of having a written constitution as highest law is not indigenous — and arguably even inimical — to English public law.[2]

The discussion of the reading strategies that now follows must be seen against the background just sketched since all of these strategies somehow engage existing law in constitutional interpretation. The strategies themselves are not typically or exclusively 'constitutional'. Reliance on precedents for interpretation purposes, for instance, the first strategy that will be discussed, is apt for the interpretation of [1] For a general background, see L du Plessis 'German Verfassungsrecht under the Southern Cross: Observations on South African-German Interaction in Constitutional Scholarship in Recent History with Particular Reference to Constitution-making in South Africa' in F Hufen (ed) Verfassungen – Zwischen Recht und Politik: Festschrift zum 70 – Geburtstag für Hans-Peter Schneider (2008) 524-525; L du Plessis 'Learned Staatsrecht from the heartland of the Rechtsstaat: Observations on the Significance of South African-German Interaction in Constitutional Scholarship' (2005) 1 Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal, available at http://www.puk.ac.za/opencms/export/PUK/html/fakulteite/regte/per/issues/2005_1__Du_Plessis_art_tdp.pdf (accessed on 6 July 2008).

[2] 'English public law' in itself is, historically speaking at least, somewhat of a misnomer in the absence of an effectual distinction between private law and public law which has always been of fundamental significance in civil-law legal systems and in South African law too.

all enacted law in a case law system, and for an understanding and development of the common law. The second reading strategy to be considered, namely reading in conformity with the Final Constitution, is a manner of ensuring that existing statute law coheres with the Final Constitution and avoiding unnecessary findings of constitutional invalidity. Much the same applies to the strategy of subsidiarity.

(i) Construing the Constitution in a case-law context

As is the case with statute law, the day-to-day application of provisions of the Final Constitution mostly does not emanate from studious interpretive efforts, because the normal rules of stare decisis apply and sustain meanings that courts handing down binding judgments have previously attributed to such provisions. Courts equal in status can depart from an earlier court's judgment only when the earlier court is deemed to have clearly erred.[1] The same rules apply to constructions placed upon constitutional provisions by the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal.[2]

Unfortunately, the stare decisis jurisprudence of especially the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court over the last number of years seems to have compromised the capacity of high courts to develop the common law in terms of FC s 39(2). As matters stand after Afrox Health Care Bpk v Strydom,[3] Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: In Re: S v Walters and Another[4] and Govender v Minister of Safety and Security[5], High Courts must abide by Supreme Court of Appeal, Appellate Division and Constitutional Court decisions where clear precedent exists — unless the challenge to pre-constitutional common law judgments is articulated in terms of a direct application of a substantive provision of the Bill of Rights.[6] These developments are discussed and criticized in Woolman's chapter on 'Application' (Chapter 31), and there is no need to repeat discussion of the issue here.[7] It is enough to say that the advantages of developing constitutional interpretation in a stare decisis context are lost if the rules of stare decisis are employed in too rigid a manner.[8]

[1] Collett v Priest 1931 AD 290, 297; R v Du Preez 1943 AD 562, 583; Robin Consolidated Industries Ltd v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (3) SA 654, 666F–H (SCA).

[2] Ex parte President of the RSA In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 20.

[3] 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox Health Care').

[4] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters') at paras 36-39.

[5] 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA)('Govender').

[6] See S Woolman & D Brand 'Is there a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18(1) SA Public Law 37.

[7] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 31-95–31-100.

[8] Iain Currie and Johan de Waal contend that while developments in the Supreme Court of Appeal's stare decisis jurisprudence may have an adverse impact on the high courts' ability to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights when developing the common law, the same does not necessarily apply to achievement of these FC s 39(2) objectives when interpreting legislation, because the jurisprudence in question deals explicitly just with the former and not with the latter. See I Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 71. However, it is difficult to read Afrox Health Care and Govender as distinguishing common law rules from statutory provisions for the purpose of reading down.

(ii) Reading in conformity with the Constitution

Interpretation of legislation in conformity with a justiciable constitution (Verfassungskonforme Auslegung in German) is a widely adhered to reading strategy associated with constitutional interpretation.[1] It gives specific expression to the 'new canon of statutory interpretation', traceable to FC s 39(2), that legislation must be interpreted 'through the prism of the Bill of Rights'.[2]

Reading in conformity with the Final Constitution is sometimes also referred to as a presumption of constitutionality.[3] A prima facie unconstitutional (and by that token potentially impugnable) provision will survive constitutional scrutiny if it is reasonably possible[4] to read it in conformity with the Final Constitution without distorting or unduly straining its 'plain meaning'.[5] Such a reading is mostly believed to be narrower or more restrictive than other possible readings. It is, in other words, a reading down. A more extensive, non-distortional reading of an impugned provision (or a reading that eliminates ambiguity) to the same end is, however, not precluded.[6] A generous reading could, for instance, sustain and enhance provisions of statutes giving specific effect to constitutional provisions, and designed and enacted to promote constitutional imperatives,[7] such as the achievement of equality and the prohibition of unfair discrimination,[8] access to information,[9] or just administrative action.[10] In Daniels v Campbell NO & Others[11]

[1] See GF Schuppert Funktionell-rechtliche Grenzen der Verfassungsinterpretation (1980); KA Betterman Die Verfassungskonforme Auslegung: Grenzen und Gefahren (1986); L du Plessis 'The Jurisprudence of Interpretation and the Exigencies of a New Constitutional Order in South Africa' (1998) Acta Juridica 8-20, 13; Currie & de Waal Handbook (supra) at 64-67.

[2] See Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd. In re: Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit NO 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Investigating Directorate') at para 21. See also § 32.3(b)(i) supra; Currie & de Waal Handbook (supra) at 65.

[3] See GE Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (1992) 210-212; JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 223-225; HM Cheadle, DM Davis & NRL Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2006) 33-4–33-5.

[4] Investigating Directorate (supra) at paras 22-24; Govender (supra).

[5] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('National Coalition 2000') at para 23; Investigating Directorate (supra) at paras 24–26. See also Laugh it Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International & Another 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC); Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC) at para 29; and Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC) at para 36 n 31 (Where Ngcobo J stated that '[i]t is by now axiomatic that, where possible, legislation ought to be construed in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution'.)

[6] See Currie & de Waal Handbook (supra) at 66.

[7] For more on such legislation, see § 32.4*(a)* supra.

[8] Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 enacted pursuant to FC s 9(4).

[9] Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000 enacted pursuant to FC s 32(2).

[10] Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 enacted pursuant to FC s 33(3). See generally I Currie & J Klaaren The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act Benchbook (2002) 13–20.

[11] 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels').

the Constitutional Court understood the term 'spouse' in the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act[1] extensively to include partners in a Muslim marriage which had not officially been solemnized in terms of the Marriage Act.[2] The majority of the Daniels Court thought that such an extensive reading (or 'reading up') was necessary to vouch for the constitutionality of a provision that would otherwise have to be struck down.

Where one of two conflicting interpretations of a statutory provision better promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights than the other one, the former is to be preferred.[3]

> By the same token, where two conflicting interpretations of a statutory provision could both be said to be reflective of the relevant structural provisions of the Constitution as a whole, read with other relevant statutory provisions, the interpretation which better reflects those structural provisions should be adopted.[4]

The Interim Constitution explicitly authorized the reading down of impugned 'laws' both in relation to the provisions of its Chapter on Fundamental Rights[5] and other constitutional provisions.[6] The Final Constitution contains no similar provision(s). Reading down, and reading in conformity with the Final Constitution in general, are nonetheless valid and, in fact, required reading strategies.[7] They ought not to be confused with FC s 39(2)'s requirement that existing law must be 'developed' in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. And they are certainly not equivalent to the remedy of reading in.[8]

Govender v Minister of Safety and Security[9] provides a good example of reading down a statutory provision in order to sustain its constitutionality. The provision in question in that case was s 49(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act:[10]

[1] Act 27 of 1990.
[2] Act 25 of 1961.
[3] Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd and the Registrar of Deeds, Cape Town (Trustees of the Hoogekraal Highlands Trust and SAFAMCO Enterprises (Pty) Ltd as Amici Curiae; Minister of Agriculture and Land Affairs Intervening) [2008] ZACC 12 at para 46.
[4] Ibid at para 47.
[5] IC s 35(2). This provision read as follows:
No law which limits any of the Rights entrenched in this Chapter, shall be constitutionally invalid solely by reason of the fact that the wording used prima facie exceeds the limits imposed in this Chapter, provided such a law is reasonably capable of a more restricted interpretation which does not exceed such limits, in which event such law shall be construed as having a meaning in accordance with the said more restricted interpretation.
[6] IC s 232(3).
[7] De Lange (supra) at para 85.
[8] AAA Investments (supra) at para 72.
[9] Govender (supra) at para 24. Ibid at paras 19–21.
[10] Act 51 of 1977.

> If any person authorized . . . to arrest or to assist in arresting another, attempts to arrest such person and such person — > (a) resists the attempt and cannot be arrested without the use of force;
> or > (b) flees when it is clear that an attempt to arrest him is being made, or resists such attempt and flees;
> the person so authorized may, in order to effect the arrest, use such force as may in the circumstances be reasonably necessary to overcome the resistance or to prevent the person concerned from fleeing.

The Supreme Court of Appeal thought that the use of a firearm or similar weapon to effect an arrest may be warranted — with due regard to an arrested person's constitutional rights — only if the person authorized to arrest has reasonable grounds for believing

1. that the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious bodily harm to him or her [that is, the person authorized to arrest], or a threat of harm to members of the public; or
2. that the suspect has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious bodily harm.

These conclusions can follow only from a reading down of s 49(2).

In Govender, the Supreme Court of Appeal per Olivier JA remarked as follows on its interpretive modus operandi and then set out a formula for dealing with constitutional challenges to legislation:

> With the enactment first of the Interim Constitution and later of the Constitution and the vast changes it brought about to the juristic landscape, came a need for a method of interpreting legislation in a manner new to South African lawyers. . . This method of interpreting statutory provisions under the Constitution requires a court to negotiate the shoals between the Scylla of the old-style literalism and the Charybdis of judicial law-making. This requires magistrates and judges
> (a) to examine the objects and purport of the Act or the section under consideration;
> (b) to examine the ambit and meaning of the rights protected by the Constitution;
> (c) to ascertain whether it is reasonably possible to interpret the Act or section under consideration in such a manner that it conforms with the Constitution, ie by protecting the rights therein protected;
> (d) if such interpretation is possible, to give effect to it, and > (e) if it is not possible, to initiate steps leading to a declaration of constitutional invalidity.[1]

In Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: In Re: S v Walters and Another[2] the Constitutional Court endorsed the Supreme Court of Appeal's approach in Govender[3] to interpretation in conformity with the Final Constitution, as an instance of restrained constitutionalism wary of over-reliance on the written constitutional text as supposed super law.[1] As has appeared from the discussion so far, this reading strategy can result in either a restrictive or extensive understanding — a 'reading down' or a 'reading up' — of an impugned statutory provision in order to prevent it from being struck down because it is unconstitutional.

[1] Govender (supra) at paras 10-11. The Govender court cited in support of its approach De Lange (supra) at para 85; National Coalition 2000 (supra) at paras 23-24 and S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 28.

[2] Walters (supra) at paras 36-39.

[3] Govender (supra) at paras 10-11.

There are also judicially more 'activist' ways of either restricting or extending the scope of a statutory provision, namely severance and reading-in respectively. Both of these constitutional remedies are dependent upon finding a statutory provision to be inconsistent with the Final Constitution. Through severance the unconstitutional parts (literally: words and phrases) of impugned legislation are severed or cut off from the rest of the legislation, and struck down, in order to preserve the constitutionally consistent remainder. Reading in refers to the opposite of severance, namely an insertion of words and/or phrases into an impugned legislative provision to render it constitutional, thereby averting a declaration of invalidity. The latter modus operandi has been followed in a number of cases dealing with legislation on intimate relationships and the 'meaning of spouse' issue in particular.[2] Again, severance and reading-in are constitutional remedies — as opposed to reading strategies — provided for in FC s 172(1)(b).[3]

It is not obvious when a court should decide to read impugned legislation in conformity with the Final Constitution or when it should rather grant one of the two aforementioned remedies. Much depends on a court's perception of what a 'reasonably possible', 'non-distortive' and/or not 'unduly strained' reading in conformity with the Final Constitution in a particular case can be. A court inclined to read legislation in a literalist way — assuming that language is the bearer of uncontested, pre-given meaning — will generally speaking be reluctant to read in conformity with the Constitution and will tend rather to grant remedial relief. Wessel le Roux[4] is of the opinion that the Constitutional Court, because of some of its judges' 'extremely reactionary approach to constitutional and statutory interpretation',[5] has predominantly opted for remedial activism in preference to interpretive flexibility, especially in its (judged by outcomes) rather progressive jurisprudence on intimate relationships. The basis for this preference is a narrow understanding of 'interpretation' which excludes the alteration of words from its scope. According to Le Roux this narrow view is also an 'unsound political limitation of the democratic process':[6]

[1] The idea of restrained constitutionalism as manifested in subsidiarity is further explained in § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb) infra.

[2] See § 32.3*(c)*(iii)(bb) supra.

[3] See M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[4] W le Roux 'Undoing the Past through Statutory Interpretation: The Constitutional Court and Marriage Laws of Apartheid' (2005) 26(3) Obiter 526.

[5] Ibid at 548.

[6] Ibid at 547.

> The problem is that the constitutional remedies (unlike the interpretive techniques) are reserved for use by the Constitutional Court itself, or under its direct supervision only . . . [T]he centralising tendencies that are built into this distinction pose a threat to the democratisation of legal meaning in post-apartheid South Africa. In fact, the centralised control of meaning in the apartheid state is perfectly mirrored by the juricentric approach to legal interpretation in its post-apartheid successor.

Moseneke J, however, in Daniels v Campbell NO & Others, quite candidly advanced the following institutional (and by that token political) motivation for preferring the remedial rather than the interpretive route to bring statutes in conformity with the Final Constitution:

> Another important consideration relates to the rule of law. The problem of readily importing interpretations piecemeal into legislation is the precedent it sets. Courts below will follow the lead and readily interpret rather than declare invalid statutes inconsistent with the Constitution. However, constitutional re-interpretation does not come to this Court for confirmation. The result may be that high courts develop interpretations at varying paces and inconsistently. This makes for an even more fragmented jurisprudence and would have deleterious effects on how people regulate their affairs. It is highly undesirable to have an institution as important as marriage recognised for some people in some provinces and not in others. The rule of law requires legal certainty.[1]

With both Le Roux's and Moseneke J's remarks in mind, it is hard to escape the conclusion that the choice between reading a statute in conformity with the Final Constitution or remedially rectifying it is at least as much determined by institutional politics as by 'purely interpretive' or 'legally technical' considerations.[2]

(iii) Subsidiarity

> I would lay it down as a general principle that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.[3]

This dictum comes from the minority judgment in S v Mhlungu & Others,[4] one of the earliest judgments of the South African Constitutional Court. Though it is not often cited (both in the literature and the case law) it seems to articulate a 'principle' of significance[5] or a 'salutary rule'.[6] Some authors refer to it as the principle of avoidance according to which (it is said) 'constitutional issues should, where possible, be avoided':

[1] Daniels (supra) at para 104.
[2] See § 32.3*(c)*(v) supra.
[3] S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 59 (Kentridge AJ). See also Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC) at para 21; National Coalition 2000 (supra) at para 21; Minister of Education v Harris 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC) at para 19.
[4] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.
[5] See I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law: Volume 1 (2001) 328; L du Plessis '"Subsidiarity": What's in the Name for Constitutional Interpretation and Adjudication?' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 207.
[6] Zantsi (supra) at para 2. Ibid at para 8.

> The principle requires the court first to try and resolve a dispute by applying ordinary legal principles, as interpreted or developed with reference to the Bill of Rights, before applying the Bill of Rights directly to the dispute.[1]

This principle is also understood as complementing (and, indeed encouraging preference for) the indirect application of the Bill of Rights, assuming that 'the Bill of Rights respects the rules and remedies of ordinary law, but demands furtherance of its values mediated through the operation of ordinary law'.[2]

The dictum in Mhlungu[3] cited above can also be read as instantiating (albeit rather crudely) subsidiarity,[4] a phenomenon hitherto largely unnamed (but arguably not unused) in constitutional interpretation in South Africa. 'A principle of avoidance', invoked to avoid constitutional absolutism, could readily lead to constitutional minimalism.[5] Both constitutional absolutism and constitutional minimalism are unacceptable, and their excesses are best prevented by properly invoking subsidiarity as a constitutional reading strategy.

'Subsidiarity' has sporadically been mentioned by name in the South African case law — and but once in a constitutional case — as a rather 'slender' phenomenon fulfilling the limited function of designating reliance on an exceptional or 'last resort' (subsidiary) norm in instances where no other legal norm enjoying priority is available.[6] Here are three good examples of such a restricted use: (1) in Absa Bank Ltd t/a Bankfin v Stander t/a CAW Paneelkloppers[7] Van Zyl J agreed with two legal scholars' assertion that, in German law, the availability of an action for indirect enrichment only when an action for direct enrichment is not possible or enforceable constitutes a 'subsidiarity principle'; (2) in Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In Re: S v Walters & Another[8] the permissibility of force to make an arrest only where there are no lesser means of achieving the arrest was said to be an instance of 'subsidiarity' and (3) in *AD & DD v DW & Others: The Centre for Child Law (Amicus Curiae) and the Department of Social Development (Intervening Party)* dealt with a subsidiarity principle concerning child adoption:

[1] Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) 25.
[2] Ibid at 32.
[3] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.
[4] On the various versions and instances of subsidiarity, see S Pieper Subsidiarität (1994); D van Wyk 'Subsidiariteit as Waarde wat die oop en demokratiese Suid-Afrikaanse Gemeenskap ten Grondslag lê' in G Carpenter (ed) Suprema Lex: Essays on the Constitution presented to Marinus Wiechers (1998) 251.
[5] See 32.3(c)(iii)(bb) supra.
[6] See H Tilch & F Arloth (eds) Deutsches Rechts-Lexikon Vol 3 (3rd Edition, 2001) 4065 refers to subsidiarity as 'die Nachrangigkeit (der Geltung)' ['being in force at a lower rank']. A subsidiary norm 'kommt . . . nur zur Anwendung, wenn kein vorrangiger Rechtssatz vorhanden ist' ['is applied only when no legal norm higher in rank is at hand'].
[7] 1998 (1) SA 939, 947B (C).
[8] Walters (supra) at para 22.

> If a child cannot be placed in a foster or an adoptive family or cannot in any suitable manner be cared for in the country of origin, intercountry adoption may be considered as an alternative means of providing the child with a family.[1]

The distinctive 'designating' ability of subsidiarity can be harnessed, in the context of constitutional interpretation, in two ways: first, to designate an appropriate person or forum to construe and implement the Final Constitution in a particular instance; and, second, to sustain preference for an appropriate norm or configuration of norms in a particular instance where existing law stands to be construed under the authority of and in relation to the supreme Constitution, and especially pursuant to FC s 39(2). Section 39(2), it will be remembered, requires that legislation be interpreted and that common and customary law be developed to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'.[2] It is arguable that, in its second, norm-designating capacity, subsidiarity is not really a reading strategy in constitutional interpretation, but rather a mode of constitutional application. The latter proposition does not exclude the former, however, due to the unity of interpretation and application.[3]

Before taking a closer look at possible manifestations of subsidiarity in constitutional interpretation and application, the functioning of subsidiarity in other contexts must briefly be sketched out. The New Oxford Dictionary of English describes subsidiarity 'in politics' as 'the principle that a central authority should have a subsidiary function, performing only those tasks which cannot be performed at a more local level.'[4] This dictionary definition implies that subsidiarity — a principle tracing its origins to Roman Catholic social thought[5] and, more particularly, Pope Pius XI's encyclical Quadragesimo Novarum – from the year 1931 — centrifugalizes the power of social institutions or bodies functioning within the ambit of the same social sphere.

According to Stefan Ulrich Pieper, 'logical subsidiarity' (as he calls it) is a methodological criterion designating one of two competing legal norms for application in a given situation, and preferring, as a rule of thumb, the specific to the general norm. The latter ought to be applied only when the former is not applicable.[6] Elsewhere Pieper refers to this criterion as 'the lex specialis rule'.[7] This

[1] 2008 (3) SA 183 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 359 (CC)('AD') at para 37 citing Article 17 of the United Nations Declaration on Social and Legal Principles Relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally adopted by the General Assembly on 3 December 1986.

[2] See §§ 32.1*(a)*, (b) and (d), 32.3*(b)(i), 32.4(a)* and (c)(i)(ff) supra.

[3] See §§ 32.3*(a)*(vi) and (d) supra.

[4] J Pearsall (ed) The New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998). See also The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on CD-ROM (5th Edition Version 2.0, 2002).

[5] DP Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 113; Van Wyk 'Subsidiariteit as Waarde' (supra) at 254; Pieper (supra) at 33-44; Tilch & Arloth (supra) at 4065.

[6] Pieper (supra) at 30.

[7] Ibid at 142.

reminds us that subsidiarity does not only apply when actors (people or entities) in a hierarchy of more and less encompassing social institutions are to be designated, but also when, from a hierarchy of more and less encompassing norms, appropriate norms for problem solving in a particular instance must be decided on.[1] Subsidiarity designating institutional actors is institutional subsidiarity, and subsidiarity designating norms for decision-making is strategic subsidiarity.

Institutional subsidiarity, as a force in societal life, constrains any more encompassing or superordinate institution (or body or community) to refrain from taking power or authority over matters that more particular subordinate institution (or body or community) can appropriately dispose of, irrespective of whether the latter is an organ of state or of civil society.[2] As a legal principle institutional subsidiarity is well established (and readily relied on) in, among others, the law of the European Union and German constitutional law. In European law, for instance, it helps determine whether an organ of the Union or rather an organ of a member state should dispose of a matter.[3] It has, in this format and at the behest of (among others) Germany (the German Länder in particular[4]) and Britain, been incorporated into Article 3b of the Maastricht Treaty. In German constitutional law,[5] institutional subsidiarity has had a decisive effect on federalism.[6] Dawid van Wyk is of the opinion that subsidiarity is an implied (or implicit) constitutional value[7] 'at the root of an open and democratic South African society',[8] and he argues that measured reliance on it (can) largely compensate for the dearth of eye-catching federalist markers in South Africa's written constitutional texts.[9]

[1] PC Bibliothek. Meyers Lexikon: Das Wissen A-Z (1993). In describing Subsidiarität, I envision a situation in which several legal norms are as such applicable, but an explicit legal directive — or a directive established through interpretation — excludes one of the (contending) legal norms from consideration for application in that particular situation — the said norm has to 'step down', as it were. Subsidiarity, in other words, manifests as the law's preference for legal norms A and B and C — and the exclusion of legal norm X from — for possible application in a given situation. Subsidiarity is defined as 'das Zurücktreten einer von mehreren an sich anwendbaren Rechtsnormen kraft ausdrückl. oder durch Auslegung zu ermittelnder gesetzl. Anordnung' ['the retreat of one of a number of legal norms, applicable as such, by virtue of an explicit legislative directive or a directive determined through interpretation'].

[2] See EWM Benda & H Jochen Vogel (eds) Handbuch des Verfassungsrechts II (2nd Edition, 1995) 1051 ('Nach diesem Prinzip soll das, was die kleineren und untergeordneten Gemeinwesen leisten und zum guten Ende führen können, nicht für die weitere und übergeordnete Gemeinschaft in Anspruch genommen werden.' ['According to this principle a comprehensive, superordinate community ought not to take for its account any matter that a smaller, subordinate community can deal with and bring to a good end.']). See also Pieper (supra) at 86.

[3] See Maastricht Case (1993) 89 BVerfGE 155. Article 23(1) of the German Constitution (dating from 1993) provides that Germany's relationship with the European Union is based on subsidiarity. See also H Tilch & F Arloth (eds) Deutsches Rechts-Lexikon Vol 3 (3rd Edition, 2001) 4065.

[4] See Van Wyk 'Subsidiariteit as Waarde' (supra) at 253.

[5] Ibid at 254-259.

[6] See Benda & Vogel (supra) at 1051–1052.

[7] See L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 76.

[8] A 'waarde wat die oop en demokratiese Suid-Afrikaanse gemeenskap ten Grondslag lê' [a' value that underlies the open and democratic South African society'].

[9] See also § 32.3*(e)*(iii) supra.

Strategic subsidiarity engages concrete decisions or issues. In Mhlungu, the Constitutional Court was asked to deal with the nature of referral of cases to it under IC s 102(1).[1] A case could only thus be referred if it involved adjudication of a constitutional issue – and it was with this scenario in mind that Kentridge J briefly dealt with the notion of 'reaching a constitutional issue'. Deciding, with due deference to constitutional supremacy, on less invasive constitutional norms or other conventional legal norms to deal with a question of law in the course of contentious proceedings is therefore (and will henceforth be treated as) an instance of strategic and, more particularly, adjudicative subsidiarity in constitutional interpretation.

(aa) Jurisdictional subsidiarity

Jurisdictional subsidiarity, in the context of constitutional interpretation, is concerned with the apportionment of power and responsibility to adjudicating fora to deal with the interpretation and application (that is, the concretization) of the Constitution in particular instances. It is, for all intents and purposes, an issue of the jurisdiction of courts in constitutional matters, discussed in detail in Chapter 4.[2] However, a discourse on constitutional interpretation will be poorer if the identification and designation of authorized interpreters of the Constitution[3] are not considered (albeit briefly) also from a subsidiarity point of view.

In German constitutional jurisprudence considerations of institutional, and more particularly, jurisdictional subsidiarity preclude the Bundesverfassungsgericht, the highest court in constitutional matters, from adjudicating cases with which other fora can deal.[4] The South African Constitutional Court has made a similar ruling, holding in Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accident Fund,[5] for instance, that the Supreme Court of Appeal was the more appropriate forum to develop the common law in a manner contemplated in IC s 35(3) (the predecessor to FC s 39(2)).[6] Here institutional subsidiarity informed an answer to the jurisdictional question of which court should be designated to read and work with the Constitution given the particular issue at hand (and for the time being). The adjudicator-reader thus designated must be in a position to dispose of the matter, but does not have to do so as a forum of final instance. The fact that it may be an authorized reader for the time being in the sense that some of its findings may be subject to appeal, does not detract from — or reflect adversely on — its authority

[1] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.

[2] See S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 4.

[3] See § 32.2 supra.

[4] See K Hesse Grundzüge des Verfassungsrecht der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (19th Edition, 1993) 143.

[5] 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC), 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC)('Amod').

[6] These provisions enjoin any court developing the common law to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'. FC s 39(2).

as adjudicator-reader.[1] In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security,[2] the Constitutional Court laid down guidelines for strategies to develop the common law.[3] As a result, the Constitutional Court in Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accident Fund cannot be understood to have said that a forum like the Supreme Court of Appeal has a more pivotal say in developing the common law than the Constitutional Court itself has. Rather the Court must be understood as stating that — consistent with subsidiarity — the Supreme Court of Appeal was the more appropriate forum first to deal with the matter.[4] Similarly, in Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, the Constitutional Court did not end up developing the common law itself. The case was referred back to the court of first instance with a very clear and compelling message about that court's duty to develop the common law and, in the particular case, with clear indications of the relevant constitutional dictates that had to be honoured in doing so. This outcome is quite compatible with the exigencies of jurisdictional subsidiarity: the higher, more comprehensive judicial authority provides lower, more localized doer-authorities with justificatory ammunition empowering them to square up to the task of developing the common law. The term 'subsidiarity', however, has not, as yet, been part of the Constitutional Court's lexicon.

The Constitutional Court has since Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security indicated that the Supreme Court of Appeal is still primarily responsible for the development of the common law, and arguments that the common law has to be brought in line with the Bill of Rights have to be considered first by the Supreme Court of Appeal, before going to the Constitutional Court.[5] However, the

[1] In Amod, an appeal would not have been possible. The Constitutional Court referred the case to the Supreme Court of Appeal to dispose of it.

[2] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').

[3] The Carmichele Court held that a court is always under an obligation to develop the common law and 'this duty upon judges arises in respect both of the civil and criminal law, whether or not the parties in any particular case request the court to develop the common law under section 39(2) [of the Constitution],' Ibid at para 36. This obligation is not discretionary, but implicit in FC s 39(2) read with FC s 173. Ibid at para 39. When a litigant contends that, in the light of the Final Constitution, the common law has to be developed beyond existing precedent, a court is obliged to undertake a two-stage enquiry:

> The first stage is to consider whether the existing common law, having regard to the section 39(2) objectives, requires development in accordance with these objectives. This inquiry requires a reconsideration of the common law in the light of section 39(2). If this inquiry leads to a positive answer, the second stage concerns itself with how such development is to take place in order to meet the section 39(2) objectives.

Ibid at para 40.Generally speaking, Carmichele holds that courts have an obligation to develop the common law in the light of constitutional values and to do so in an activist vein. This injunction is reminiscent (without explicitly citing) the constitutional injunction that the 'state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights', verbalised in FC s 7(2). See § 32.4*(c)*(i)(cc) supra.

[4] See, for example, Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA) at paras 2-3; Van Eeden v Minister of Safety and Security 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA), [2002] 4 All SA 346 (SCA) at para 8; Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA) at para 18; Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 120 (SCA) at para 36.

[5] S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC) at para 7.

Constitutional Court is prepared to consider entertaining appeals from the Supreme Court of Appeal when the latter does not consider the possible impact of the Bill of Rights on the existing law in question. The Constitutional Court will do this even if none of the parties has raised the issue in the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1] Given that every court must consider the impact of the Bill of Rights on the matter before it, Sebastian Seedorf rightly notes that every case in which the application of the common law is considered is potentially subject to appeal to the Constitutional Court:[2] So while the Supreme Court of Appeal retains the primary responsibility for developing the common law, the Constitutional Court — as the court of final constitutional jurisdiction — is able to dangle 'a sword of Damocles' over every court seized with a potential constitutional matter.[3]

The Constitutional Court's contradictory indications of when it will entertain appeal cases dealing with the application of the common law, has brought about further uncertainty. In Phoebus Apollo Aviation v Minister of Safety and Security,[4] the Court could find no convincing argument why the common law on vicarious liability needed development and consequently declined to deal with the issue of vicarious liability on appeal. In K v Minister of Safety and Security,[5] on the other hand, the same court held that vicarious liability may have a 'policy laden character … imbued with social policy and normative content', and that the common law in this regard and its application needed development to bring it fully in line with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[6] In Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters the Constitutional Court indicated that when a litigant has explicitly contended for a development of the common law from the outset, the Constitutional Court is forced 'to consider constitutional rights or values' in order to assess, as final court of appeal, the need for such a development.[7]

While FC s 167(4) gives the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction in some matters, the Constitutional Court has frequently stated that it relies on judgments a quo to maximize the quality of its own adjudicative performance:

> It is … not ordinarily in the interests of justice for a court to sit as a court of first and last instance, in which matters are decided without there being any possibility of appealing against the decision given. Experience shows that decisions are more likely to be correct

[1] Phumelela Gaming and Leisure Ltd v Gründlingh & Others 2007 (6) SA 350 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 26.

[2] S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 4.3*(d)*(i).

[3] See also Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-80–31.82.

[4] 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC).

[5] 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)('K') at paras 22-23.

[6] For a fuller discussion of these two cases, see Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at § 4.3*(d)*(i).

[7] 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC) at para 23.

> if more than one court has been required to consider the issues raised. In such circumstances the losing party has an opportunity of challenging the reasoning on which the first judgement is based, and of reconsidering and refining arguments previously raised in the light of such judgement.[1]

The Constitutional Court moreover sometimes prefers to refrain from ruling on the constitutionality of a statutory provision until such time as experienced judges in other fora have had the opportunity to assess the consequences of either retaining or striking down an impugned provision.[2] However, the Constitutional Court does not rigidly insist that even appeal cases must come before it only via the Supreme Court of Appeal. In MEC for Education: KwaZulu Natal & Others v Pillay & Others, the Court, for instance, thought that where the issues in a case had been fully canvassed in both an equality and an equality appeal court a quo, and the Constitutional Court had the benefit of comprehensive argument, presented by the parties and three amici curiae, it would not be in the interest of justice 'to require the parties to incur the additional expense of [first] going to the Supreme Court of Appeal'.[3]

In Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions & Others[4] the Constitutional Court dealt with the power of the magistrates' courts to develop the common law, first, in terms of FC s 8(3), in order to provide for the direct horizontal application of the Bill of Rights, and, second, in terms of FC s 39(2) in order to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[5] The Court held that magistrates' courts do not have such a power because FC s 173 confers the power only on the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and High Court.[6] This conclusion follows from a rather superficial reading of FC s 173. FC s 173 provides for the higher courts' inherent power to develop the common law (and regulate their own processes). The section in no way intimates that only higher courts have the straightforward (as opposed to inherent) power to develop the common law. FC s 8(3) empowers 'a court' and s 39(2) 'every court, tribunal or forum' to develop the common law. Again, nothing in FC ss 8(3) or39(2) prevents magistrates' courts from doing so.

The Masiya Court furthermore referred to s 110 of the Magistrates' Court Act,[7] precluding magistrates' courts from pronouncing on the validity of any law or

[1] Bruce v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC) at para 8. See also S v Bequinot 1997 (2) SA 887 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1588 (CC)('Bequinot') at para 15; Christian Education SA v Minister of Education 1999 (2) SA 83 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC) at paras 8 and 12; Dormehl v Minister of Justice 2000 (2) SA 987 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 471 (CC) at para 5 and Carmichele (supra) at para 50–53. The Supreme Court of Appeal has expressed similar sentiments. See King & Others v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control & Another 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 462 (SCA)('King').

[2] See Bequinot (supra) at para 14.

[3] 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at para 31.

[4] 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya') at paras 64-69.

[5] Ibid at para 66.

[6] Ibid at para 66.

[7] Act 32 of 1944.

conduct of the President, to substantiate its view that it is not competent for magistrates' courts to develop the common law. It is not clear why the Constitutional Court did not at the outset (in relation to s 110) rely on the superordinate FC s 170 to come to the same conclusion. Be that as it may, neither s 110 of the Magistrates' Court Act nor FC ss 170 or 173 of the Constitution excludes the power of magistrates' courts to develop the common law.

To conclude: jurisdictional subsidiarity undeniably — but not rigidly or dogmatically — designates authorized readers of the Final Constitution in particular instances, and delineates their authority. It contributes to making constitutional interpretation and adjudication a sensible team effort and plays an important role in empowering a judiciary (and a legal community in general), for whom reading and applying a supreme constitution came as both a novelty and a challenge within the past decade and a half ago.

(bb) Adjudicative subsidiarity

Adjudicative subsidiarity as an instance of strategic subsidiarity is connected with the adjudication of substantive issues of law. This version of subsidiarity is present in the dictum in S v Mhlungu & Others.[1] Kentridge J referred, albeit by implication, to an adjudicator's responsibility to opt for an appropriate norm (or configuration of norms, one might add) to decide an issue which could also be understood to be 'constitutional'.

Adjudicative subsidiarity is centred on issues: it suggests a preference for an indirectly (or not strictly) constitutional mode of adjudication over a directly (or strictly) constitutional mode of adjudication whenever the solution of a legal question admits of the former (and does not of necessity require the latter). The authority of the Final Constitution is, in other words, not to be overused to decide issues that can be disposed of by invoking specific, subordinate and non-constitutional legal norms, on the crucial condition, of course, that the solution arrived at, as well as the norm putting it forward, can withstand constitutional scrutiny.

In Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei, Chaskalson P explained that the strategy of adjudication just described can allow the law to develop incrementally, and that such incrementalism is desirable in view of the far-reaching implications that attach to constitutional decisions.[2] Adjudicative subsidiarity moreover discourages court rulings 'in the abstract on issues which are not the subject of controversy and are only of academic interest'[3] and also contributes to an appropriate demarcation of the respective spheres of authority of the legislature and the judiciary.[4] Constitutional over-adjudication, especially in reviewing legislation, could, according to the Chaskalson P, deprive the legislature of the opportunity to deal with an

[1] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.
[2] 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC), 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC)('Zantsi') at para 5.
[3] Ibid at para 7.
[4] I Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 75-78.

issue of its own accord, in its own distinctive manner and in response to its mandate from the electorate. Here Chaskalson P's argument draws on the standard view of the separation of different kinds of power between the legislative, the executive and the judicial arms of government which is not an instance of subsidiarity. Subsidiarity engages the apportionment of authority and decision-making responsibility among unequal, 'higher' (more comprehensive) and 'lower' (less comprehensive) authorities, all exercising the same kind of power as organs of the same arm of government.

Bland and unthoughtful overreliance on adjudicative subsidiarity may compromise the supremacy of the Final Constitution, and the Constitutional Court has thus, on occasion, found it necessary to limit reliance on this reading strategy. In Zantsi, Chaskalson P observed that the Constitutional Court will constitutionalize an issue whenever it is necessary to dispose of a matter on appeal.[1] He added that adjudicative subsidiarity cannot stand in the way of 'the interest of justice'. In Harksen v Lane NO, Goldstone J also made it clear that there is no 'hard and fast rule to the effect that in no case should referrals be made to this Court where non-constitutional remedies have not been exhausted'.[2] Adjudicative subsidiarity cannot justify an interpretive preference in any way inconsistent with the Final Constitution. Where there are several normative options equally consistent with the Final Constitution, adjudicative subsidiarity can, at best, advise preference for the option also most consistent with the existing non-constitutional law.

In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In re ex parte President of the RSA,[3] the Constitutional Court rejected the conclusion of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Rennie Group Ltd trading as Renfreight that the review of administrative action has to a large extent remained a procedure determined primarily by common law.[4] Chaskalson P, in no uncertain terms, affirmed the supremacy of the Final Constitution where and whenever the exercise of any form of public power becomes susceptible to judicial assessment:[5]

> The control of public power by the courts through judicial review is and always has been a constitutional matter . . . The common law principles that previously provided the grounds for judicial review of public power have been subsumed under the Constitution, and in so far as they might continue to be relevant to judicial review, they gain their force from the Constitution. In the judicial review of public power, the two are intertwined and do not constitute separate concepts.[6]

[1] Zantsi (supra) at para 4.
[2] Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 26.
[3] 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers').
[4] 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (CC), 1999 3 SA 771 (SCA).
[5] See, for example, Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at paras 17, 20, 27, 33, 44 and 45.
[6] Ibid at para 33.

Pharmaceutical Manufacturers reflects the Constitutional Court's response to the Supreme Court of Appeal's claim that facially constitution-related issues could be disposed of in an 'enlightened', rights-friendly manner without reference to (let alone reliance upon) the Final Constitution.[1] Thus, the South African common law on defamation could conceivably be developed without direct reliance on the 'right' to free speech. The Supreme Court of Appeal did just that in National Media Ltd v Bogoshi.[2] That judgment expressly professed not to draw on constitutional resources. Similarly, the law of evidence relating to sexual offences was also 'modernized' in S v Jackson — by abolishing the so-called cautionary rule of evidence in rape cases — without mentioning 'the Constitution' even in passing.[3]

On the one hand, some may say that such a tendency is an outcome of profitable reliance on adjudicative subsidiarity, giving effect to a preference of the Constitutional Court itself (that is, the preference verbalized in the dicta in S v Mhlungu & Others[4] and in Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei[5]). On the other hand, others may object that the Final Constitution is not meant simply to function as a silent background norm whenever the common law needs to be 'liberalized'. The Supreme Court of Appeal's enlightened judgments on free speech and the cautionary rule in sexual offences would most probably not have been handed down had it not been for the existence of the Final Constitution and its Bill of Rights. Does it become any court to allow itself to be influenced by the Final Constitution and then not acknowledge it? The Constitutional Court in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers suggested that it does not — especially not when the exercise of public power enters the picture.

In response to the two sentiments just juxtaposed, what the Constitutional Court said in the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers case must again be emphasized:

> There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control.[6]

The 'one system of law' embraces statute law, common law and customary law — all geared towards the pursuit of justice guided by an all-pervasive Constitution.[7] To speak of a principle of avoiding constitutional issues, where possible, is thus inappropriate: all issues of law are ultimately constitutional issues and there is no way of avoiding them or the constitutional dimension to them. Equally inappropriate and unacceptable will be a manner of reliance on subsidiarity promoting

[1] Ibid.
[2] 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA).
[3] 1998 (1) SACR 470 (SCA).
[4] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.
[5] Zantsi (supra)at para 5.
[6] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 44.
[7] See also FI Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 11-36–11-41.

constitutional minimalism. Subsidiarity is based on the idea of restrained (memorial) constitutionalism,[1] appropriate to a constitutional jurisprudence of restraint,[2] which is wholeheartedly committed to the Constitution as supreme law of the Republic. Nonetheless, subsidiarity sounds a word of caution about venerating the Final Constitution as an overarching, all-encompassing,[3] omni-regulative, super-law. The Final Constitution certainly enjoys precedence among normative law-texts, but does not overwhelm or totally overpower them or simply take their place.[4] Since both constitutional absolutism and constitutional minimalism are equally unacceptable, on balance and in the long run, restrained constitutionalism is the most propitious mode of give effect to constitutional supremacy.

This conclusion entails, first, the acceptance of the truism that the Final Constitution does not have readymade answers to all legal problems. It could, of course, be assumed that it is logically possible to bring, through subsumption, every conceivable legal problem within the prescriptive ambit of the generally formulated norms of the Final Constitution and then deduce answers to specific questions from these norms. (It must be noted, however, that the Bill of Rights is limited to 26 specific substantive provisions. The Final Constitution itself expressly recognizes that it is not meant to apply to all possible legal disputes: we have a right to housing, but not a right to transport.[5]) But why rely on logical deduction, in the abstract as it were, to find an answer,[6] when somewhere in the legal system there already exists a tried and tested answer — or at least some indicia suggesting one? Subsidiarity, then, suggests preference for first seeking the latter type of answer. Of course, if this answer cannot survive constitutional scrutiny, it is susceptible not only to rejection, but also to nullification. On the other hand, if the answer is by constitutional standards inadequate, development of the law proffering the answer — instead of the downright nullification of such law — is, in terms of subsidiarity reasoning and in terms of the Final Constitution, the required route to follow. Memorial constitutionalism sustains this mode of reasoning: on the way to the future, what was so blatantly offensive in the apartheid legal system of the recent past must be eliminated, if needs be, but at the same time the (continued) existence of the system and its effects must be recognized

[1] See § 32.3(c)(iii)(bb) supra. See also L du Plessis 'The South African Constitution as Memory and Promise' (2000) 11 Stellenbosch Law Review 385.

[2] W le Roux 'Undoing the Past through Statutory Interpretation: The Constitutional Court and Marriage Laws of Apartheid' (2005) 26(3) Obiter 526, 628-630.

[3] On the notion of an 'all-encompassing Constitution', see § 32.5(b)(iii)(bb)(A) infra.

[4] See § 32.3*(e)*(ii) supra.

[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[6] On (other) shortcomings of subsumption as problem-solving mode of legal reasoning, see LM du Plessis 'Legal Academics and the Open Community of Constitutional Interpreters' (1996) 12 South African Journal on Human Rights 214, 216-217.

with due deference to — and in a manner honouring the values and ideals of — the Final Constitution. This recognition may include a slow but sure 'upgrading' of the system by, for instance, developing multifarious aspects of it.

Adjudicative subsidiarity also stands to facilitate compliance with the FC s 39(2)'s constitutional injunction to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights when developing the common law and customary law.[1] FC s 39(2) — which most writers see not as an interpretation provision, but as an (indirect) application provision instead[2] — is thus bound to come up in any discussion of adjudicative subsidiarity as an interpretive reading strategy. FC s 39(2) is, however, not dealt with in all its ramifications in this chapter. Extensive analysis of this provision occurs in Woolman's chapter on 'Application' –Chapter 31[3] – Seedorf's chapter on 'Jurisdiction' — Chapter 4[4] — and Michelman's chapter on 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' — Chapter 11.[5]

A court, with prudent reliance on existing law, can often resolve an issue in a manner quite consistent with — and indeed conducive to — constitutional values (and the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights), without deducing the particular answer directly from the provisions of the Final Constitution.[6] A case in which the Supreme Court of Appeal could have done so, but failed to do so, was Afrox Health Care Bpk v Strydom.[7] Here the question of law was whether an exemption clause in a written standard contract, indemnifying a private hospital against any claim for damages or injury to a patient, even when the hospital or its personnel was negligent, was enforceable against the patient. The Afrox Court gave optimum effect (and recognition) to the parties' freedom of contract,[8] taking it to be an incarnation of the prominence which freedom and human dignity enjoy as guiding values in the Final Constitution,[9] and consequently refused to interfere with terms of an agreement which free-willing parties had entered into consciously. The exemption clause was thus held to indemnify the hospital against all negligence short of gross negligence.

The patient relied upon FC s 27(1)(a)'s right of access to health care to challenge the exemption clause.[10] However, both parties and the Afrox Court failed to [1] FC s 39(2) constitutes a new canon of statutory interpretation. See §§ 32.3*(b)(i) and 32.5(b)*(ii) supra.

[2] Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 161.
[3] Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-77–31-100.
[4] S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 4.3*(d)*(i).
[5] F Michelman 'The Rule of Law' (supra) at Chapter 11.
[6] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59.
[7] 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox Health Care').
[8] Ibid at para 8.
[9] Ibid at paras 22-23 referring to FC ss 1(a), 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1)(a). Human dignity is also the substance of an entrenched right. See FC s 10 and S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.
[10] Afrox Health Care (supra) at paras 15-16 and 19-20.

notice that the even more obvious constitutional right at stake in this case was a patient's right to the security of her or his person, entrenched in IC s 11(1) (which applied at the time) and presently guaranteed in FC s 12(1). A patient going to a hospital typically puts her or his physical (and psychological) well-being in the hands of the hospital and its personnel because she or he needs special and specialist care. A contractual exemption clause construed with due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of the 1993 Bill of Rights[1] could thus hardly indemnify a hospital against negligent non-performance of precisely that which the patient sought to procure by contracting with the hospital, namely diligent and expert care for the security of her or his person.

Tjakie Naudé and Gerhard Lubbe show that it also follows from sound and solid law-of-contract reasoning that it should not be possible to conclude a contract which, via an exemption clause, negates its own essence.[2] Advocates of adjudicative subsidiarity would endorse an argumentative strategy like that of Naudé and Lubbe as appropriate for a case such as Afrox Health Care Bpk v Strydom. But this stratagem does not mean that the Final Constitution and constitutional values exit the picture. On the contrary, the conclusions of Naudé and Lubbe are sustainable precisely because they are in conformity with the 'constitutional conclusion' that the exemption clause in the hospital's standard contract is inconsistent with the protection afforded and the value attached to a patient's constitutional right to security of his or her person. For a court to mention this assessment in support of a finding that the exemption clause should not be enforced would not be tantamount to 'reaching a constitutional issue'.[3] It would rather be a judicial intimation (and a recognition of the fact) that the law of contract, in this particular case, is susceptible to an inherent development that will promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

In contrast with Afrox Health Care Bpk v Strydom,[4] the Supreme Court of Appeal in Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape and Another v Ngxuza and Others[5] prudently developed the common law in response to a constitutional exigency, without using the Final Constitution as the source of the law needed to resolve the actual issue in question. FC s 38*(c)* confers standing in constitutional (and, in particular, in Bill of Rights) litigation on 'anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons'. IC s 7*(b)(iv) first anticipated (and authorized) the use of class actions in constitutional litigation in the same explicit terms as FC s 38(c)* presently does. It thereby created an expectation that the existing common law of civil procedure in respect of this

[1] IC s 35(3).
[2] T Naudé & G Lubbe 'Exemption Clauses — a Rethink Occasioned by Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom' (2005) 122 South African Law Journal 441, 445-453.
[3] Mhlungu (supra) at para 59 (Kentridge AJ).
[4] Afrox Health Care (supra).
[5] 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA)('Ngxuza SCA').

traditionally underutilized mode of litigation would occur in the South African context.[1] Ngxuza[2] provided, first, the Eastern Cape Division of the High Court and subsequently, on appeal, the Supreme Court of Appeal[3] with an opportunity to break fresh ground in this regard.

One of the questions that had to be answered was whether potential litigants, identifiable as members of a class but residing outside the area of jurisdiction of the Eastern Cape High Court, could be recognized as members of a class of plaintiffs bringing an action against the Eastern Cape Department of Welfare consequent upon withholding their disability grants unlawfully. The manner in which both courts dealt with this specific question significantly illustrates proper and prudent reliance on adjudicative subsidiarity. Froneman J explained the court a quo's position as follows:

> Even if the members of the class residing outside the area of jurisdiction of this Court but elsewhere in South Africa are not parties to the action in the strict sense of the word as used in s 19(1)(b) of the Supreme Court Act, they may still be regarded as members of the class in the action in this Court . . . The ratio jurisdictionis connecting them to the case is the class action itself. If this amounts to a development of the common law, I am of the view that such a development is justified and permissible by virtue of ss 172(1) and 173 of the Constitution. In Estate Agents Board v Lek 1979 (3) SA 1048 (A) at 1063F it was stated that the question whether a court has jurisdiction 'depends on (a) the nature of the proceedings, (b) the nature of the relief claimed therein, or (c) in some cases, both (a) and (b)'. Having regard to these factors it is perhaps not even necessary to call ss 172(1) and 173 of the Constitution in aid (compare also s 19(1)(a)(iii) of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959).[4]

This dictum comes from a constitutional adjudicator who, first, deferred to the constitutional exigency to develop the existing law regarding class actions for purposes of constitutional litigation and, second, resorted to a strategy of adjudicative subsidiarity, finding in the existing case law (and not in the written constitutional text) a point of contact (and a catalyst) to get the constitutionally required development going. This strategy led to the conclusion that it may perhaps not even be 'necessary to call . . . the Constitution in aid' to effect the actual development. The Final Constitution as catalyst or agent for (and 'overseer' of) the development of the existing law is therefore not necessarily also the source of the specific norm or configuration of norms that effects the development.

In the judgment on appeal a similar modus operandi was followed. Cameron JA held as follows:

[1] Cameron JA refers to of class actions as envisaged in the Constitution as 'an innovation expressly mandated by the Constitution'. Ibid at para 22.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ngxuza v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2001 (2) SA 609, 628G-629H (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322, 1336F-I (E).

> We are enjoined by the Constitution to interpret the Bill of Rights, including its standing provisions, so as to 'promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. As pointed out earlier we are also enjoined to develop the common law — which includes the common law of jurisdiction — so as to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'. This Court has in the past not been averse to developing the doctrines and principles of jurisdiction so as to ensure rational and equitable rules. In Roberts Construction Co Ltd v Willcox Bros (Pty) Ltd[1] this Court held, applying the common-law doctrine of cohesion of a cause of action (continentia causae), that where one court has jurisdiction over a part of a cause, considerations of convenience, justice and good sense justify its exercising jurisdiction over the whole cause. The partial location of the object of a contractual performance (a bridge between two provinces) within the jurisdiction of one court therefore gave that court jurisdiction over the whole cause of action. The Court expressly left open the further development and application of the doctrine of cohesion of causes. The present seems to me a matter amply justifying its further evolution. The Eastern Cape Division has jurisdiction over the original applicants and over members of the class entitled to payment of their pensions within its domain. That, in my view, is sufficient to give it jurisdiction over the whole class, who, subject to satisfactory 'opt-out' procedures, will accordingly be bound by its judgment.[2]

Once again a constitutional injunction inspired development of the existing common law on class actions, but continentia causae, a recognized legal notion from within the existing law, gave content to it. Ngxuza offers a clear example of adjudicative subsidiarity-in-action.

Subsidiarity-induced preference for not 'reaching a constitutional issue'[3] is not an attempt to deny or eliminate constitutional issues or to ignore the Final Constitution whenever possible. As was pointed out in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, there are certain issues, for instance, the exercise of public power, which are inevitably and only constitutional issues, and whose resolution depends on a proper construction of the written constitutional text as the prime source of constitutional law.[4] The Final Constitution is, however, not just a source of constitutional law. It is ubiquitous. As an ever-present trump, on the one hand, it scouts out 'bad law' that needs to be invalidated. As an all-pervasive source of values, on the other hand, it is providently ubiquitous, enabling and, where appropriate, developing 'good law' to achieve the ends towards which the Constitution encourages and indeed enjoins us to aspire. Subsidiarity, in the context of constitutional adjudication, is a strategy — not a principle (although a principle of devolution of authority can be said to underlie it).

[1] 1962 (4) SA 326 (A).
[2] Ngxuza SCA (supra) at para 22.
[3] See S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 59.
[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 33.

In conclusion, four miscellaneous observations can be made:

(A) Allowance for the all-pervasiveness of the Final Constitution does not require genuflection to an absolutist constitution. The Final Constitution fulfils certain functions (as trump and 'provider of values') for which its considerable power as highest law must from time to time be summoned. This power ought not, however, turn it into an über-law that overwhelms and dislodges all other law in the legal system. Nor is the Final Constitution a 'super source' of law from which answers to all legal issues can be deduced. To pervade all law is also not the same as encompassing and engulfing it. The Final Constitution (like any enacted law — or any other legal norm) can of course and does of course encompass other enactments and legal norms. A good example of such laws are the statutes that have been adopted to give specific effect to constitutional provisions and objectives.[1] The point, however, is that the Final Constitution does not (and should not be seen to) encompass all law per se.

(B) While constitutional minimalism — based on a 'principle' of avoidance — is unacceptable, there may, in certain situations and circumstances, be merit to a restrained constitutionalism that results (in constitutional adjudication) in a judicious avoidance of: (1) decisions that do not have to be made; (2) first-order reasoning when decisions can be made on a deductive or analogical basis, and (3) large-scale theorizing when substantive decision-making is unavoidable.[2]

(C) The written text of the South African Constitution is 'subsidiarity-friendly'. As becomes a supreme constitution, the Final Constitution (in FC ss 2 and 172(1)) makes the necessary provision for doing away with law (and conduct) inconsistent with it, but then also makes ample provision (in FC ss 8(3) and 173 and then, of course, most notably in s 39(2)) for the development of existing law under the auspices and authority of the Final Constitution. Provision for the development of existing law especially paves the way for adjudicative subsidiarity.

(D) Finally, the introduction of legislation giving specific effect to constitutional provisions occasioned a new version of adjudicative subsidiarity in our constitutional jurisprudence. In litigation dealing with issues for which such legislation caters, a litigant cannot circumvent the relevant statute 'by attempting to rely directly on the constitutional right'.[3] To do so would be to 'fail to recognise the important task conferred on the legislature by the Constitution to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights'.[4] A subordinate, less encompassing and more specific statutory norm thus has to be relied on in preference to a superordinate, more encompassing and general norm of the Final Constitution — a telling example of adjudicative subsidiarity.

[1] See §§ 32.4*(a)* supra and 32.5*(b)*(bb)(D) infra.

[2] I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 South African Journal on Human Rights 138.

[3] See MEC for Education, KwaZulu-Natal v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at para 40. See also Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign & Another as Amici Curiae*)* 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC)('New Clicks') at paras 96 (Chaskalson CJ) and 434-437 (Ngcobo J); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC)('SANDU') at para 51; NAPTOSA & Others v Minister of Education, Western Cape & Others 2001 (2) SA 112, 123I-J (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 388, 396I-J (C).

[4] SANDU (supra) at para 52. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 96.

(c) Method(s) as canon(s) and canon(s) as method(s) (of construction): Canon-guided reading strategies

Back in 1973, HR Hahlo and E Kahn intimated a preference for a more modern attitude toward statutory interpretation. They called for due consideration of the textual or literal, the contextually logical, the teleological and the historical aspects of a statutory text being interpreted.[1] Actually, this attitude is not all that modern. It corresponds with the 'methods of interpretation' advanced by FK Von Savigny[2] for the interpretation of pandectaerian Roman law (also known as the 'Von Savigny quartet'[3]). These methods are canon-like reading strategies that are accepted today, mainly on the European continent,[4] for the interpretation of codifications of the law, statutes[5] and constitutions.[6] This quartet has also met with a reasonably positive academic response in South African writings on constitutional interpretation.[7]

The methods or modes of interpretation or, also, canon-guided reading strategies — Labuschagne[8] speaks of 'invalshoeke' (angles of incidence) — modelled on a slightly adapted version of the Savignian model, are the following:[9]

- First, grammatical interpretation which concentrates on ways in which the conventions of natural language can assist the interpretation of enacted law and can help to limit the many possible meanings of a provision.
- Second, systematic interpretation, as a manifestation of contextualism,[10] which calls for an understanding of a specific provision in the light of the text or instrument as a whole and of indicia outside the written text.

[1] See HR Hahlo & E Kahn The South African Legal System and its Background (1973) 180.

[2] See F Savigny System des heutigen Römischen Rechts I (1840) 206.

[3] See JMT Labuschagne 'Regsdinamika: Opmerkinge oor die Aard van die Wetgewingsproses' (1983) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 422; and JMT Labuschagne 'Die dinamiese Regslandskap, Doelaanpassing en — vervanging en die Geregtigheidswaarde van die Normdop by Regsuitleg en — vorming: Opmerkinge oor die anachronistiese kant van die Stelreël cessante ratione legis, cessat et ipsa lex' (2004) Tydskrif vir Hedendaagse Romeins-Hollandse Reg 43, 46.

[4] See, for example, P Côté The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (1984) 193-350.

[5] PB Cliteur Inleiding in het Recht (1992) 196-202; Labuschagne 'Die dinamiese Regslandskap (supra) at 46.

[6] E Forsthoff Problematik der Verfassungsauslegung (1961) 39-40; K Hesse Grundzüge des Verfassungsrecht der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (19th Edition, 1993) 21; DP Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 42-43; F Müller Juristische Methodik (8th Edition, 2002) 269-297, and F Müller 'Basic Questions of Constitutional Concretisation' 1999 10 Stellenbosch Law Review 269, 275-276. W Brugger 'Konkretisierung des Rechts und Auslegung der Gesetze' (1994) 119(1) Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts 1 (redefines the four methods or techniques of interpretation in a creative manner so as to adapt them to his understanding of the modern-day exigencies of (constitutional) interpretation.)

[7] See J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 129-140. The authors relied, for purposes of Bill of Rights interpretation, on an interpretive scheme akin to that of Von Savigny. They no longer do so in the 5th edition of their book. See also L du Plessis 'The Jurisprudence of Interpretation and the Exigencies of a new Constitutional Order in South Africa' 1998 Acta Juridica 8, 13-16.

[8] Labuschagne 'Die dinamiese Regslandskap' (supra) at 46.

[9] For a summary, see L du Plessis 'The Jurisprudence of Interpretation' (supra) at 8.

[10] L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) 111-115. See also § 32.3*(a)*(iv) supra.

- Third, purposive interpretation[1] which sheds light on the possible meanings of a provision with reference to its purpose or ratio. The deepened version of purposive interpretation is teleological interpretation.[2]
- Fourth, historical interpretation which situates a provision in the tradition from which it emerged and allows qualified recourse to information concerning the genesis of the written text in which the provision occurs (and the provision itself), as well as bigger historical events of which the coming into being of the written text was part.
- In the course of time a fifth 'method' was added to the Von Savigny quartet, namely, comparative interpretation, which facilitates the understanding of a provision, first, in the light of standards of international law and, second, in comparison with counterparts in other domestic legal systems — transnational contextualization, in other words.

I believe that the augmented Savignian model provides a feasible point of departure for the systematic classification and, indeed, implementation of (where necessary, refurbished) canons of construction employable in constitutional as well as statutory implementation.[3]

(i) Grammatical interpretation

Grammatical interpretation concentrates on ways in which the conventions of natural language[4] can assist and direct the interpretation of an enacted (statutory or constitutional) provision and helps to contain the proliferation of the possible meanings of such a provision. Natural language is language used for everyday purposes, and its dynamism makes for a proliferation of meaning.[5] Formal language, by contrast, is artificial language — for example, arithmetic, the predicate calculus and COBOL[6] — created for exclusive use by, for instance, mathematicians, logicians and computer scientists. The meaning of its symbols is precisely defined and the symbols are finite. The system is therefore 'closed' and meaning possibilities limited on account of the qualities of the kind of language itself.

> 'Legal language', though interspersed with technical terms, is not formal language, but natural language whose meanings are constantly in flux — thence the 'difficulty inherent in the nature of language' that Innes J spoke of in Venter v R.[7] Grammatical interpretation

[1] On interpretive purposivism, see du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 115-119.
[2] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) supra.
[3] See § 32.4*(a)* supra.
[4] See F Müller 'Observations on the Role of Precedent in modern Continental European Law from the Perspective of "Structuring Legal Theory" ' (2000) 11 Stellenbosch Law Review 426, 432.
[5] See P Cilliers Complexity and Postmodernism: Understanding Complex Systems (1998) 37-47.
[6] For the distinction between natural language and formal language, see R Audi (ed) The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy (2nd Edition, 1999) 318 and 673.
[7] Venter v R 1907 TS 910, 913:
> [N]o matter how carefully words are chosen, there is a difficulty in selecting language which, while on the face of it expressing generally the idea of the framer of the measure, will not, when applied under certain circumstances, go beyond it, and, when applied under other circumstances, fall short of it.

> actually cautions the interpreter to heed the meaning-generative qualities of natural language and of enacted texts as linguistic signifiers.[1] The importance of language as prolific generator of meaning is at odds with any belief in the possibility of 'clear and unambiguous language'. Such a belief in point of fact truncates and downplays the actual role of language in communication and, eventually, interpretation. Clarity and unambiguousness are not attributes of language as such, but of a reader's assessment of the quality of the language of a given text in certain given circumstances, and this assessment, in its turn, is co-determined by the reader's presuppositions and pre-understanding.[2]

It was pointed out previously that the rights and value language of the Final Constitution is expansive and indefinite because rights and values can hardly be expressed categorically or conclusively. Secondly, the Final Constitution is meant to be a long-lasting text and its expansively formulated provisions must have the quality of being able to cater for an inestimable number of unpredictable situations.[3] The Final Constitution by its very nature thus unsettles the assumption of clear and unambiguous language.

The conventional canons of and aids to grammatical interpretation, heeding conventions in the use of language, limit the plethora of (possible) meanings that the language of an enacted instrument can generate. An example of such a convention is that the author of the instrument is assumed to use 'ordinary language',[4] hence the classical rule in statutory interpretation that 'the language of the Legislature should be read in its ordinary sense' — a rule applied in constitutional interpretation too.[5] It is further assumed that technical language has a technical connotation,[6] that the same word or phrase is meant to mean the

[1] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma') at paras 17 and 18 (Kentridge J emphasises that the language of the constitutional text must be respected and such 'respect' is best understood as a word of caution to take the language of the text seriously in the sense just explained.)

[2] S Fish Doing What Comes Naturally: Change, Rhetoric, and the Practice of Theory in Legal Studies (1989) 358. See also Zuma (supra) at para 17.

[3] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.

[4] Union Government (Minister of Finance) v Mack 1917 AD 731, 739 (Solomon JA)(Usually cited as the standard authority for this rule which has found extremely wide recognition in the case law and is still recognised as a basic rule of construction.) See also Mayfair South Townships (Pty) Ltd v Jhina 1980 (1) SA 869, 879 (T); HMBMP Properties (Pty) Ltd v King 1981 (1) SA 906, 909 (N); Nyembezi v Law Society Natal 1981 (2) SA 752, 757 (A); S v Du Plessis 1981 (3) SA 382, 403 (A); S v Henckert 1981 (3) SA 445, 451 (A).

[5] See, eg, S v Makwanyane and Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 26 and 278; Mhlungu (supra) at paras 76–77; Zantsi (supra) at para 37; Ynuico Ltd v Minister of Trade and Industry 1996 (3) SA 989 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 798 (CC) at para 7; Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at para 42; Ex parte President of the RSA. In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 55 and 57.

[6] Beedle & Co v Bowley (1895) 12 SC 401,402; Lonrho v Salisbury Municipality 1970 (4) SA 1, 4 (R); Association of Amusement and Novelty Machine Operators and Another v Minister of Justice and Another 1980 (2) SA 636, 660 (A).

same throughout one and the same enacted law-text[1] et cetera. The Interpretation Act[2] and definition clauses in individual enactments[3] fulfil a similar limiting function and so too do interpretive precepts in the Constitution - even though they are couched in expansive and open-ended language.

If the canons of grammatical interpretation are understood in the sense just explained, they no longer function as incarnations of literalist-cum-intentionalist expectations and the status of some of them (and especially the ordinary-meaning rule) as the most basic or primary rules of statutory interpretation in accordance with the conventional order of primacy, is quite rightly undermined.[4]

As was remarked at an earlier stage, classification of the canons of construction in accordance with the Savignian model is not watertight and some canons of grammatical interpretation overlap with canons under the headings 'systematic' and 'purposive interpretation'. The canons of systematic statutory interpretation dealing with adapting, restricting or stretching language (in accordance with the scheme of an Act) can, and have been applied in constitutional interpretation.[5] The rule that provisions framed in general terms must be understood generally expresses a grammatical truism about the use of inclusive language too.[6]

(ii) Systematic interpretation

Systematic interpretation contextualizes. First, individual provisions of an enacted instrument-in-writing, that is, the Constitution or a statute, are understood in relation to and in the light of one another and of other components of the more encompassing instrument of which they form part, drawing on the 'system' or 'logic' or 'scheme' of the written text as a whole.[7] Von Savigny referred to such intra-textual contextualization as logical interpretation.[8] Second, systematic interpretation requires cognisance of the ('extra-textual') macro-text too - of meaning-generative signifiers beyond but in the 'environment' of the written text that comprises the provision that is to be construed.[9] According to Von Savigny the very task of systematic interpretation is to forge links with this 'extra-' or, rather, 'macro-text'.[10]

[1] Principal Immigration Officer v Hawabu and Another 1936 AD 26, 33; Minister of the Interior v Machadodorp Investments (Pty) Ltd and Another 1957 (2) SA 395, 404 (A); S v Fazzie and Others 1964 (4) SA 673, 680 (A); Sekretaris van Binnelandse Inkomste v Raubenheimer 1969 (4) SA 314, 319 (A); S v ffrench-Beytagh (1) 1971 (4) SA 333, 334 (T); Public Carriers Association and Others v Toll Road Concessionaries (Pty) Ltd and Others 1990 (1) SA 925, 949 (A); S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC) at para 47; Skhosana v Roos t/a Roos se Oord 2000 (4) SA 561 (LCC) at para 9.

[2] 33 of 1957.

[3] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 204-205.

[4] On the conventional order of primacy see § 32.3*(b)*(i) above.

[5] See § 32.5*(c)*(ii) infra.

[6] See § 32.5*(c)*(iii) infra.

[7] See, for example, Janse van Rensburg v The Master 2001 (3) SA 519 (W) at para 7.

[8] See F Von Savigny System des heutigen Römischen Rechts I (1840) 320.

[9] For judicial recognition of both manifestations of systematic interpretation, see Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd 2001 (3) SA 1293 (LCC) at para 88.

[10] See Von Savigny (supra) at 262.

Tribe and Dorf, writing about constitutional interpretation in particular, see intra-textual, systematic interpretation as a process of text-integration and warn against two opposite fallacies.[1] Dis-integration, on the one hand, turns a blind eye to the systematic interconnectedness of text-components and then tries to understand them in splendid isolation from one another. Hyper-integration, on the other hand, links text-components which, according to the scheme of the text, are not inherently coherent.

Systematic interpretation depends on the logical or systematic scheme of the written text, of which much is made nowadays, especially in constitutional interpretation.[2] As far as the conventional canons of construction are concerned, intra-textual, systematic interpretation sustains a restrictive or extensive interpretation of a constitutional (or statutory) provision in certain circumstances, invoking interpretive canons such as the eiusdem-generis rule[3] and the rule cessante ratione legis cessat et ipsa lex[4] (restrictive interpretation) or analogical interpretation, interpretation ex consequentibus and the rule expressio unius est exclusio alterius (extensive interpretation).[5] Restrictive or extensive reading may take place in accordance, first, with the scheme of the specific provision that stands to be construed, second, with a logical scheme generally attributed to provisions of the same kind and, third, with an assumed authorial mode of reasoning associated with the making of provisions of that kind. Intra-textual, systematic interpretation furthermore lays the basis for relying on textual elements such as the preamble, schedules to and the long title of an enacted instrument[6] in the interpretation of any of its specific provisions.

The common-law equivalent of intra-textual, systematic interpretation is the ex visceribus actus rule that requires any particular provision of an enacted instrument (the Constitution or a statute) as a whole to be understood as part of that encompassing instrument in which it has been included.[7] Treating constitutional and statutory language as language-in-context[8] is an intra-textual, systematic reading strategy.

[1] See LH Tribe & MC Dorf On Reading the Constitution (1991) 21-30.

[2] See JR de Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (2000) 143-145 (Provides a detailed yet succinct explanation of schematic constitutional interpretation.)

[3] Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 234-236.

[4] 'Where the reason for the existence of a law ceases, the law itself also ceases'. Ibid at 233-234.

[5] 'Expressly mentioning the one, is excluding the other'. Ibid at 236-239.

[6] Ibid at 239-246.

[7] S v Looij 1975 4 SA 703, 705C–D (RA); Transvaal Consolidated Land and Exploration Co Ltd v Johannesburg City Council 1972 (1) SA 88, 94F–G (W). See also New Mines Ltd v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1938 AD 455; Hleka v Johannesburg City Council 1949 (1) SA 842, 852–853 (A); City Deep Ltd v Silicosis Board (supra) City Deep Ltd v Silicosis Board 1950 (1) SA 696, 702 (A); Soja (Pty) Ltd v Tuckers Land and Development Corp (Pty) Ltd 1981 (3) SA 314 (A).

[8] 1950 (4) SA 653, 662F-663A (A)(Schreiner JA).

In Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others,[1] Ngcobo J explained the need for and significance of systematic (or contextual) constitutional interpretation as follows:

> Our Constitution embodies the basic and fundamental objectives of our constitutional democracy. Like the German Constitution, it 'has an inner unity, and the meaning of any one part is linked to that of other provisions. Taken as a unit [our] Constitution reflects certain overarching principles and fundamental decisions to which individual provisions are subordinate.' Individual provisions of the Constitution cannot therefore be considered and construed in isolation. They must be construed in a manner that is compatible with those basic and fundamental principles of our democracy. Constitutional provisions must be construed purposively and in the light of the Constitution as a whole.
>
> The process of constitutional interpretation must therefore be context-sensitive. In construing the provisions of the Constitution it is not sufficient to focus only on the ordinary or textual meaning of the phrase. The proper approach to constitutional interpretation involves a combination of textual approach and structural approach. Any construction of a provision in a constitution must be consistent with the structure or scheme of the Constitution. This provides the context within which a provision in the Constitution must be construed.

Another truism confirmed by Ngcobo J's observations is that systematic and purposive (or teleological) interpretation are interlinked.[2] A purposive or purposeful reading of the Final Constitution and statutes (and their individual provisions) must be a holistic (and historically sensitive) reading.[3] The preamble to and long title of the Constitution or a statute, for instance, play a recognizable role in the interpretation of individual provisions, because a systematic reading of individual provisions, in the context of the written text as a whole, requires the broadest possible spectrum of textual elements to be taken into account. The preamble and the long title are, however, also statements of purpose and this then goes to show how systematic and purposive interpretation can join forces.

[1] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele') at paras 36-37.

[2] Ngcobo J also suggested this connection in an earlier dictum in Executive Council of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development of the RSA; Executive Council of KwaZulu-Natal v President of the RSA. 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape 1999') at para 52.

[3] This method of reading was also suggested, with reference to statutory interpretation, in Olitski Property Holdings v State Tender Board & Another. 2001 (3) SA 1247 (SCA) at para 12 (Supreme Court of Appeal stated that statutory interpretation 'requires consideration of the statute as a whole, its objects and provisions, the circumstances in which it was enacted, and the kind of mischief it was designed to prevent.') The judgment of Kriegler J in Minister of Defence v Potsane; Legal Soldier (Pty) Ltd provides a telling example of a simultaneously systematic/contextual, teleological and historical(-ly sensitive) reading of a constitutional provision (in casu section FC s 179(1)). 2002 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1137 (CC) at paras 26-42. The Court's articulate reading strategy makes it clear how and why 'excessive peering at the language to be interpreted without sufficient attention to the contextual scene' can actually undermine longer-lasting value and policy objects of a constitutional or a statutory provision that stands to be construed. Ibid quoting Jaga v Dönges NO & Another; Bhana v Dönges NO & Another 1950 (4) SA 653, 664H (A).

But it goes further than that. There may be other less explicit statements of purpose in the written text — part of the inconspicuous interpretive waymarks previously dealt with,[1] for instance — which, only on being read together with other such statements (or other explicit statements), say something purposeful. The purposive potential of all such provisions can only be opened up through a systematic reading of a provision to be construed in the context of the instrument as a whole, and thereby in interaction with the provisions whose purposive potential stands to be released.[2]

The coalescence of systematic and purposive/teleological interpretation furthermore highlights the essential unity of interpretation and application.[3] The interpreter is called upon to make sense of a provision in a purposeful manner catering for the exigencies of an actual or hypothetical concrete situation. The situation poses a question, as it were. An instrument (the Constitution or a statute) is construed to find a possible answer - on the assumption that it can assist finding and formulating an answer. The written text read systematically in relation to the particular situation (and in the expectation that it is purposeful) does not generate any meaning in isolation from the question(s) that the concrete situation poses. Actual or potential applications of a constitutional or legislative provision determine its construction decisively. The provision acquires no meaning in isolation from or irrespective of either its de facto or its conceivable (or hypothesized) realization in specific situations where legal solutions and decisions are called for. 'The jurist makes sense of a law from out of a given case and for the sake of the given case.'[4] Friedrich Müller prefers the appellation Konkretisierung ('concretization') to Auslegung ('interpretation') for this process of bringing to life normative provisions in concrete situations.[5]

The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Sefalana Employee Benefits Organisation v Haslam, expressed a similar line of thinking (referring to statutory interpretation in particular):

> When interpreting a statute one is not obliged, of course, to conjure up all manner of fanciful and remote hypotheses in order to test the implications of a construction which one is considering placing upon it. However, where readily conceivable and potentially realistic situations spring immediately to mind it is a salutary practice to test the proposed construction by applying it to such situations. If the exercise produces startling (as opposed to merely anomalous) results, it may become clear that the proposed construction is not correct. This, in my view, is just such a case.[6]

[1] See § 32.4*(c)*(ii) supra.
[2] See § 32.4*(c)*(ii) supra.
[3] See also §§ 32.3*(a)*(vi) and (d) supra.
[4] H-G Gadamer Wahrheit und Methode. Grundzüge einer philosophischen Hermeneutik (4th Edition, 1975) 308 (Der Jurist faßt den Sinn des Gesetzes von dem gegebenen Fall her und um dieses gegebenen Falles willen'.)
[5] See F Müller Juristische Methodik (8th Edition, 2002) 212-234.
[6] Sefalana Employee Benefits Organisation v Haslam & Others 2000 (2) SA 415 (SCA) at para 6.

It may happen (and the dictum just quoted leaves room for the possibility) that a purposeful concretization of an enacted (constitutional or statutory) provision concludes that the provision in question has nothing or nothing meaningful to say about the specific concrete situation. The interpreter must then consider, first, whether the provision indeed applies in that situation; second, whether the written text perhaps contains a casus omissus; and, third, whether an interpretive alteration of the ipsissima verba of the provision may be appropriate.[1] Concretization may also bring up the possibility of extending ('stretching') or restricting ('shrinking') the meaning(s) that the provision generates - according to the previously referred to procedures of extensive and restrictive interpretation respectively.

Intra-textual, systematic interpretation overlaps with grammatical interpretation, first, insofar as a systematic reading of the written text causes the meaning attributed to linguistic signifiers in, for instance, a definition clause to be spread throughout the written text. The presumption that the same words and phrases in an enacted law-text bear the same meaning throughout fulfils a similar, meaning-distributive function. Second, insofar as recourse to diverse textual elements such as the preamble, long title, and schedules facilitate the attribution of meaning to linguistic signifiers, systematic interpretation sustains grammatical interpretation.[2]

Extra-textual contextualization takes place with reference to meaning-generative signifiers (themselves texts) in the textual environment. There are a great many such signifiers beginning, in constitutional and statutory interpretation, first, with other legal norms and institutions as well as the legal system as a whole. The Final Constitution and statutes are, for instance, always construed as forming part of a wider network of enacted law[3] and other normative law-texts such as precedents.[4] Second, the political and constitutional order, society and its legally recognized interests and the international legal order are all consciously taken account of in constitutional and statutory interpretation. Existing common-law canons of construction do provide for and indeed require cognisance of the 'non-legal' macro-text, for example, the presumption that enacted law promotes the public interest.[5] Actually, it is impossible to separate the written text and macro-text, especially since the macro-text is the 'source of concrete situations' without which, as was argued above, the interpretation of enacted law (the Constitution and statutes) is just not possible. The distinction between intra-textual and extra-textual contextualization is therefore merely a convenient one facilitating a systematization of the canons of construction.

Finally, in order to avoid an enervation of apparently conflicting constitutional provisions, the Constitutional Court has laid down guidelines for dealing — in a

[1] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 228-232.
[2] See § 32.5(c)(i) supra.
[3] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 262-264.
[4] See § 32.5*(b)*(i) supra.
[5] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 165-168.

systematic and context sensitive manner — with such provisions.[1] First, an attempt must be made reasonably to reconcile the apparently conflicting provisions, and to construe them in a manner giving full effect to each.[2] Second, where two provisions in the Final Constitution, one general and the other specific, deal with the same subject, the general provision must ordinarily yield to the specific provision:[3]

> The specific provision must be construed as limiting the scope of the application of the more general provision. Therefore, if a general provision is capable of more than one interpretation and one of the interpretations results in that provision applying to a special field which is dealt with by a special provision, in the absence of clear language to the contrary, the special provision must prevail should there be a conflict.[4]

(iii) Teleological interpretation

The topic of purposive/teleological interpretation has so far been brought up on three occasions. First, in the survey of early post-1994 constitutional case law it was shown how the courts thought of rights interpretation as characteristically purposive and how they associated purposive interpretation with generous interpretation.[5] Second, purposive interpretation was considered when purposivism as common-law theory of statutory interpretation was discussed[6] and, third, it came quite prominently to the fore when teleological interpretation as a possible substitute for conventional literalist-cum-intentionalism interpretation as prime approach to constitutional and statutory interpretation was considered.[7] The time has now arrived to consider purposive interpretation as an interpretive method or mode or reading strategy in constitutional interpretation, mindful of a word of warning that was sounded earlier, namely to desist from affording purposivism pride of place among approaches to constitutional interpretation.[8] In this chapter purposive interpretation is for the most part understood as teleological interpretation attributing meaning to a provision mindful of its possible objective(s) or ratio, and,

[1] See, generally, Doctors for Life v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life') at paras 48-49.

[2] Matatiele (supra) at para 51. See also S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218, 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC) at para 17 (Constitutional Court held that '[i]t was not to be assumed that provisions in the same constitution are contradictory' and that '[t]he two provisions ought, if possible, to be construed in such a way as to harmonise with one another.')

[3] Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC) at para 28.

[4] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 49.

[5] See § 32.1*(b)* supra.

[6] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) supra.

[7] See § 32.3*(b)*(iv) supra.

[8] See § 32.3*(b)*(iv) supra.

beyond that, of the fulfilment of aspirational values upholding the system of constitutional democracy as such.[1]

Purpose-consciousness is necessary in constitutional interpretation in order to honour the operational intent (or effect-directedness) of the Final Constitution belonging to the genre enacted law.[2] The interpreter of an enacted provision (of the Constitution or of a statute) starts with the assumption that the provision has a purpose (ratio legis) that will emerge in the course of interpretation, in other words, as he or she attributes meaning to the provision (relying inter alia on canons of and aids to construction associated with the different modes of interpretation comprising the Von Savigny quartet). This purpose has to be taken seriously (and must eventually, if at all possible,[3] be realized) because it is assumed that an authorized lawmaker had intended the provision to be of effect — there is 'an intention of the legislature' in this sense. This assumption informs the previously referred to mischief rule[4] and the presumption that enacted law is not invalid or purposeless.[5]

The ratio legis that emerges as interpretation proceeds can eventually be developed into a response to the exigencies of an actual or hypothetical concrete situation. Purposive and, beyond that, teleological interpretation join forces with systematic interpretation to emphasize the unity of interpretation and application. The partnership of systematic interpretation and purposivism is not insignificant for the determination of a ratio legis in accordance with the scheme of an enacted instrument as a whole, thereby reining in the preferences and prejudices of the interpreter. These 'subjective factors' can of course not be totally banned from the interpretive arena. However, they might be left unchecked if a purposive reading in the abstract is acceded to without question — a consequence as delusive as denying the effects of an interpreter's 'inarticulate premises'[6] on interpretive outcomes. What may follow in both instances is what Kentridge AJ, in S v Zuma,[7] called 'divination' as opposed to 'interpretation' — and then not necessarily a divination of values (against which Kentridge AJ warned), but of the inarticulate premises of the interpreter. The rule iudices est ius dicere sed non dare[8] (reminiscent of the counter-majoritarian difficulty and the tension between [1] What teleological interpretation is, was explained with reference to the majority judgment in African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission. 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party'). See § 32.3*(b)*(iv) supra.

[2] For more on 'enacted law' as distinct law-text genre, see § 32.3*(e)*(i)(ee) supra.

[3] The purpose of especially a statutory provision can of course not be realised if, for instance, it is unconstitutional or at odds with higher-ranking values of the legal system as a whole. Invalidity of a provision — especially in an all or nothing sense — is, however, not readily assumed. See L Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 187-188.

[4] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) supra.

[5] Du Plessis Re-interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 187-191.

[6] See J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 374.

[7] Zuma (supra) at para 18 quoted at § 32.1*(b)* supra.

[8] See, eg, Seluka v Suskin and Salkow 1912 TPD 258, 270; Union Government (Minister of Mines) v Thompson 1919 AD 404, 425; R v Tebetha 1959 (2) SA 337, 346G (A); S v Khanyapa 1979 (1) SA 824, 835 (A).

populism and constitutionalism associated with it[1]) as well as the rule enjoining an interpreter of enacted law to give general effect to provisions framed in general terms[2] are both canons of teleological interpretation and seek to counter such a divination of the interpreter's preferences and prejudices. The latter of the two canons can also be understood as an injunction to observe the ordinary (grammatical) meaning of a provision.[3]

Teleological interpretation is forward-looking interpretation based on what can be learnt from past experience. While this characterization is a general way of restating the mischief rule,[4] it is also another way of saying that the Final Constitution ought to be construed heedful of the continuing time frame within which it obtains.[5] This observation provides a link between teleological interpretation and historical interpretation.

From Wessel le Roux's depiction of the interpretive modus operandi of the majority of the Constitutional Court in African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others the following guidelines adapted for teleological constitutional interpretation may be deduced:[6]

(aa) establish, through recognized procedures of interpretation, the central purpose of the provision in question;
(bb) establish whether that purpose would be obstructed by a literal interpretation of the provision, and if so
(cc) opt rather for an alternative interpretation of the provision that 'understands' or promotes its core purpose;
(dd) ensure that the purposive reading of the constitutional provision is consistent with other constitutional provisions and with the value system of the Constitution and that constitutional values are indeed promoted with optimal effect.

Purposive interpretation can also be understood as 'purpose driven or actuated interpretation' ('doelgedrewe uitleg'). Here interpreters of the Final Constitution and statutes must mind their p's and q's. The purpose of a provision is to be determined through interpretation and should therefore not drive or actuate interpretation. On the other hand, purposive interpretation can also be 'purposeful or purpose directed interpretation' ('doelgerigte uitleg') because it directs interpretation in such a way that a purpose is eventually arrived at (and understood) without the interpreter knowing or surmising such purpose right from the outset.

[1] See § 32.3*(e)*(iii) supra.
[2] See § 32.5*(c)*(i) supra.
[3] See § 32.5*(c)*(i) supra.
[4] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) supra.
[5] See RWM Dias Jurisprudence (5th Edition, 1985) 170; GE Devenish Interpretation of Statutes (1992) 51. See also § 32.3*(a)*(vi) supra.
[6] See Le Roux 'Directory Provisions' (supra) at 386.

(iv) Historical interpretation

The historical interpretation of enacted law attributes meaning to a provision, and/or the instrument of which it forms part, in the light of its coming into being as a historical event at a particular point in time. According to Von Savigny, historical interpretation requires the interpreter to enter into and identify with the historical situation from which a law emerged.[1] The spirit of this history is more significant than the 'historical facts' (in other words, the events connected with the genesis of such law). From the 'spirit of history' much can be deduced about the ratio legis. Teleological interpretation lacking a historical foundation is in fact empty. The mischief rule, for instance, as manifestation of teleological interpretation,[2] shows alertness to the historicity of an enacted law-text. The provision to be construed is perceived as a response to a mischief that existed as a historical given, and that situation, as well as the law as it then stood, must be appreciated in order fully to apprehend the effects of the provision as the measure aimed at redressing the mischief.[3] The 'new Constitution' has also been described as the remedy to a fundamental tripartite mischief in South Africa's history, namely colonialism, racism and apartheid.[4]

In De Klerk & Another v Du Plessis & Others the Transvaal High Court per Van Dijkhorst J regarded the drafting history of the Interim Constitution as irrelevant to its interpretation.[5] However, in S v Makwanyane & Another[6] the Constitutional Court allowed the clear, undisputed and relevant reports of a technical committee (which advised the drafters of the Interim Constitution) as evidence of why no specific reference to capital punishment was included in the Interim Constitution. Reference to a report in writing, the equivalent of travaux préparatoires in international law, is of course not the same as relying on the ipse dixit of individual constitutional negotiators participating in the making of a constitution. The latter is not an acceptable interpretive aid. Since Makwanyane there have been other instances where interpretive reliance was placed on written background materials shedding light on the genesis of constitutional provisions.[7]

The Final Constitution as remedy to a fundamental mischief in South Africa's history, namely white minority rule under apartheid system,[8] is inevitably part of a [1] F von Savigny System des heutigen Römischen Rechts I (1840) 252-253.

[2] See § 32.3*(a)*(v) supra.

[3] See Thoroughbred Breeders' Association v Price Waterhouse 2001 (4) SA 551 (SCA)(Good example of a judicial endeavour to rectify a particular mischief.)

[4] Qozoleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 634I-635C (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 79D–E (E)('Qozoleni') (Kroon and Froneman JJ, referring to the Interim Constitution.)

[5] 1995 (2) SA 40 (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124 (T).

[6] Makwanyane (supra) at para 17-18.

[7] Ferreira v Levin; Vryenhoek v Powell 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 46, for example.

[8] Qozoleni (supra) at 634I-635C, 81G-H (Kroon and Froneman JJ)(Referring to the Interim Constitution.)

political history that can, to a considerable extent, help determine the meaning and significance of many a constitutional provision, not only in the Bill of Rights, but also provisions concerning, for instance, the structure of government.[1] However, as Pierre de Vos[2] makes clear in critical assessment of the Constitutional Court's 'master narrative' of the recent history of South Africa's transition from apartheid to constitutional democracy, one's choice of narrative must avoid a shallowness and exclusivity that results in an overly narrow reading of the Final Constitution. Reliance on various accounts of history in constitutional interpretation, he contends, will counter the inference that only certain interpretive choices are historically inevitable.

(v) Comparative interpretation (or transnational contextualisation)

According to FC s 39(1) '[w]hen interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum … must consider international law' (section 39(1)(b)) and 'may consider foreign law' (section 39(1)(c)). With these provisions, the Final Constitution acknowledges that the Bill of Rights and the Final Constitution as a whole are embedded also in a transnational constitutional reality that helps determine their meaning in the domestic constitutional reality.

When considering the constitutionality of capital punishment with reference to the kind of transnational (re-)sources envisaged in IC s 35(1) of the Interim Constitution[3] — the predecessor to FC ss 39(1)(b) and (c) — Chaskalson P in S v Makwanyane and Another[4] laid down pertinent and consequential guidelines for reliance on international and foreign law in constitutional interpretation.[5] He wrote:

> In the course of the arguments addressed to us, we were referred to books and articles on the death sentence, and to judgments dealing with challenges made to capital punishment in the Courts of other countries and in international tribunals. The international and foreign authorities are of value because they analyse arguments for and against the death sentence and show how Courts of other jurisdictions have dealt with this vexed issue. For that reason alone they require our attention. They may also have to be considered because of their relevance to s 35(1) of the Constitution.[6]

[1] See Executive Council of the Western Cape 1999 (supra) at para 44. Two telling Bill of Rights examples are Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)('Shabalala') at para 26 and Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 40. For reference to other examples, see I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 152 n 33.

[2] See P de Vos 'A Bridge Too Far? History as Context in the Interpretation of the South African Constitution' 2001 South African Journal on Human Rights 1.

[3] The relevant provisions of IC s 35(1) read as follows:
In interpreting the provisions of this chapter a court. . . shall, where applicable, have regard to public international law applicable to the protection of the rights entrenched in this chapter, and may have regard to comparable foreign case law.

[4] 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (3) SA 391, 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 19.

[5] 'Having regard to' international and foreign (case) law in the language of IC s 35(1) and 'considering' international and foreign law in the language of FC ss 39(1)(b) and (c).

[6] Makwanyane (supra) at para 34.

> Customary international law and the ratification and accession to international agreements is (sic!) dealt with in s 231 of the Constitution, which sets the requirements for such law to be binding within South Africa. In the context of s 35(1), public international law would include non-binding as well as binding law. . . International agreements and customary international law accordingly provide a framework within which chap 3 [the Bill of Rights] can be evaluated and understood, and for that purpose, decisions of tribunals dealing with comparable instruments. . . may provide guidance as to the correct interpretation of particular provisions of chap 3.[1]
>
> In dealing with comparative law we must bear in mind that we are required to construe the South African Constitution, and not an international instrument or the constitution of some foreign country, and that this has to be done with due regard to our legal system, our history and circumstances, and the structure and language of our own Constitution . . . We can derive assistance from public international law and foreign case law, but we are in no way bound to follow it.[2]

These dicta boil down to the following significant points:

First, in construing the Final Constitution, it is competent for a South African court to consider international and foreign authorities (Chaskalson P mentioned them in one breath) regardless of FC s 39(1). Such authorities may be considered because they are of value in their own right. Since FC ss 39(b) and (c) refer only to interpretation of the Bill of Rights, Chaskalson P in actual fact laid down a binding precedent effectively granting constitutional authorisation to consider international and foreign law when interpreting constitutional provisions not found in the Bill of Rights. He does not, however, explicitly say whether, in the interpretation of such provisions, a court is enjoined to consider public international law. Given the language in which the dictum is couched, it is probably not specific enough to read it as imposing such an injunction. It is thus highly advisable (but optional nonetheless) to consider international law in constitutional interpretation, except when, in terms of the 'black-letter' provisions in FC ss 231 and 232 or the presumption in FC s 233 international law must not just be considered but indeed observed as binding with respect to municipal law.[3]

Second, and of far-reaching significance, is the observation that binding as well as 'non-binding' international law[4] provides a framework within which the Bill of Rights 'can be evaluated and understood'.[5] The implications of this 'framework' dictum will be considered more fully when the role of international law in constitutional interpretation is discussed below.[6]

Third, the Court in Makwanyane articulated a warning that, in the post-Makwanyane case law, has been echoed repeatedly: namely that in the interpretation of the Final Constitution — with its own structure and language — transnational

[1] Ibid at para 35.
[2] Ibid at para 39.
[3] On the status of international law, see § 32.5*(c)*(v)(aa) infra.
[4] See § 32.5*(c)*(v)(aa) infra: 'non-binding' international law is strictly speaking a misnomer.
[5] Makwanyane (supra) at para 35.
[6] See § 32.5*(c)*(v)(aa) infra.

authorities must be relied on with due regard to the uniqueness of our Constitution, our history and our circumstances. Though assistance may be derived from both international law and foreign law, a court, according to Chaskalson P, is in no way bound to follow either of them. A court must of course always be alert to the possibility that it is indeed bound to follow certain international law.[1] By not distinguishing between the two bodies of law, Chaskalson P overlooked a critical difference between international law and foreign law for the purposes of constitutional interpretation. International law must be considered. Foreign law may be considered.

In Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape[2] Kriegler J observed, in passing, that '[b]oth the [I]nterim and the [F]inal Constitutions… indicate that comparative research is either mandatory or advisable'. Of course only comparative research is advisable. It is consideration of international law that is mandatory. What Kriegler J in effect did was to label both '(public) international law'. Again, in doing so, he too conflated the mandatory injunction to consider international law and the interpretive suggestion to consult foreign jurisprudence. This error may explain the persistent lack of engagement with international law and the Court's apparent preference for drawing upon case law in other jurisdictions.

The constitutionalization of international law as well as the internationalization of constitutional law, both of which are manifestations of a globalisation of public law, have rendered the strict boundaries between domestic constitutional law, foreign constitutional law and international law somewhat permeable.[3] However, Kriegler's conflation fails to appropriately acknowledge that the Final Constitution is talking about distinct bodies of law and recognizing their different status: many instruments and kinds of international law bind South Africa; foreign jurisprudence does not. In other words, foreign law, in the domestic context, is persuasively normative while international law may well (but will not inevitably) be prescriptively normative.[4] The fact that the latter may have the same, normative binding force as domestic law thus sets international law apart from foreign constitutional law — and that difference must be reckoned with in constitutional interpretation.

(aa) International law

A hundred years prior to the advent of constitutional democracy in South Africa a court in the former Zuid-Afrikaanse Republiek declared that the municipal law of that republic

[1] See § 32.5*(c)*(v)(aa) infra.

[2] 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC), 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC)('Sanderson') at para 26.

[3] See B-O Bryde 'Konstitutionalisierung des Völkerrechts und Internationalisierung des Verfassungsrechts' (2003) 42 Der Staat 61. See also A Peters 'The Globalization of State Constitutions' in J Nijman and André Nollkaemper (eds) New Perspectives on the Divide between National and International Law (2007) 251.

[4] For the distinction between the prescriptive and persuasive normativity of law-texts, see § 32.3(e)(i)(cc).

> must be interpreted in such a way as not to conflict with the principles of international law . . . '[T]he state which disclaims the authority of international law places herself outside the circle of civilized nations.' It is only by a strict adherence to these recognized principles that our young state can hope to acquire and maintain the respect of all civilized communities, and so preserve its own national independence.[1]

This dictum signals a resolve to play a constructive role in international affairs which South Africa, during the first half of the twentieth century, as a faithful member of the League of Nations and as a founding member of the United Nations, indeed did.[2] Since the mid-1940s, however, South Africa increasingly came under attack because of its racist minority rule politics, and became, in obviously quite an unintended and indirect manner, a major contributor to the development of post-World War II international law. Apartheid helped international lawyers and organisations to crystallize and concretize a new body of treaties and customary law designed to promote human rights and racial equality.[3]

South Africa's resolve during the 1990s to negotiate a peaceful and a decided transition to constitutional democracy manifested in, amongst others, an openness to 'influences from outside' and, in particular, a positive attitude towards international law as a potentially formative and informative force in the legal order of a new South Africa. This change in attitude started occurring within the judiciary as well.[4]

A feature of most of the 'newer' constitutional texts in the world today is that their drafters had drawn heavily on international instruments — especially human rights declarations and covenants — in formulating their provisions. For comparative purposes a distinction between 'old constitutions' — predating important international instruments such as the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1966 and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966 — and 'new constitutions' drafted with heavy reliance on these instruments, may 'be particularly fruitful, even if it might be unfamiliar'.[5]

The South African Constitution, and its Bill of Rights in particular, reflects the influence of a wide range of international human-rights law instruments:

[1] CC Maynard et alii v The Field Cornet of Pretoria (1894) 1 SAR 214, 223.

[2] See J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Ed 2000) 19-20.

[3] See Dugard (supra) at 21 ('While apartheid undermined and discredited the law of South Africa, it succeeded, perversely, in injecting notions of racial equality, self-determination and respect for human rights into an international legal order that in 1945 had few developed rules on these subjects.')

[4] See L du Plessis 'International Law and the Evolution of (Domestic) Human-rights Law in post-1994 South Africa' in J Nijman and A Nollkaemper (eds) New Perspectives on the Divide between National and International Law (2007) 309, 310.

[5] See B-O Bryde 'The Constitutional Judge and the International Constitutionalist Dialogue' (2005) 80 Tulane Law Review 203, 208('Çonstitutionalist Dialogue').

international declarations, covenants and conventions.[1] The Constitutional Court in its certification of the written text of the Final Constitution considered Constitutional Principle II[2] which required, amongst other things, that '[e]veryone shall enjoy all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and liberties'. The court concluded that the text complied with this standard as a minimum and in some instances even goes beyond it.[3]

The inclusion in a nation's supreme constitution of provisions derived from international documents and instruments is a direct and most powerful way of incorporating international (human-rights) law into the municipal law of that nation. It gives rise to a somewhat curious situation: constitutional provisions with their origins in international law, are required to be construed considering international law. Recognised procedures for and aids to the construction of international law — for instance, Articles 31-33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties — may be relied on to determine what 'international law' in a given situation and/or with reference to a specific issue is. However, the Final Constitution and Bill of Rights themselves by no means have to be interpreted as if they were forms of international law. They are to be construed in accordance with recognised procedures and reading strategies for the interpretation of domestic highest law.[4] In the South African context a constitutional provision derived from an international law source could thus be found to have a meaning or construction different from its accepted meaning at international law.

FC s 39(1)(b) and (c) are provisions not commonly included in constitutions — and reliance on international and foreign law in constitutional interpretation is, of course, possible without such constitutional authorisation. More commonly and typically, constitutions provide for the recognition — and incorporation into domestic law — of (treaty and customary) international law. The black letter provisions of the Final Constitution geared to achieve these effects (and referred to in passing before) are ss 231 and 232. These provisions are discussed by Strydom and Hopkins in Chapter 30 above.[5] International law thus recognised

[1] In addition to the instruments already mentioned, the Court has freely used the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the American Convention on Human Rights of 1969, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 1981, the International Covenant on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination of 1966, the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women of 1979 and the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1989 (CRC). See Du Plessis (supra) 'International Law' (supra) at 313.

[2] For more on this certification process in terms of the 34 Constitutional Principles in the Interim Constitution, see § 32.2(a) supra.

[3] Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, In re: Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at paras 48-51.

[4] But see Makwanyane (supra) at para 16.

[5] Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins 'International Law & International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30.

and incorporated is often referred to as 'binding' international law to distinguish it from 'non-binding' international law. As a result, the vast body of international law is not brought directly to bear on the domestic legal system by virtue of FC ss 231 and 232.

What then to make of Chaskalson P's observation in S v Makwanyane and Another[1] that 'non-binding' international law was 'public international law' for purposes of IC s 35(1) — and thus FC s 39(1) too? The constitutional injunction to consider international law in Bill of Rights interpretation makes all international law 'binding', but not in the sense that it must be observed as law. It is binding at least to the extent that due regard must be had to it. The presumption in FC s 233, which will be discussed below, could have a similar effect. Chaskalson P's framework dictum — that international law thus broadly conceived provides a framework within which the Bill of Rights 'can be evaluated and understood'[2] — has earned the South African Constitutional Court a complimentary reputation for its "universalist interpretation" of constitutional rights, in a series of judgments relating mostly to criminal processes'.[3]

Neville Botha and Michéle Olivier[4] contend that Chaskalson P's reliance on the writing of John Dugard – which he cited in support of his framework dictum – was not correct. What Dugard, according to the authors, probably had in mind were the (less than 'free for all') 'traditional sources of international law' recognised in Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. Dugard has apparently confirmed this latter reading in a subsequent article.[5] Chaskalson P thus misread the source on which he relied and laid down binding (that is, prescriptive) case law per errorem. This piece of judge-made law has nonetheless turned out to be of considerable consequence in the evolution of South Africa's domestic human rights law drawing on sources of international law in a distinctly direct and monistic manner.[6] As will be shown below, the Constitutional Court in Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others actually retreated from its Makwanyane position, but in time this turned out to be an ad hoc deviation, and openness to and generous reliance on international law has mostly been the default (judicial) disposition in constitutional interpretation in South Africa.[7]

[1] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 35.

[2] Ibid. Mokgoro J, in a similar vein, held that the Interim Constitution 'requires courts to proceed to public international law and foreign case law for guidance in constitutional interpretation, thereby promoting the ideal and internationally accepted values in the cultivation of a human rights jurisprudence for South Africa'. Ibid at para 304.

[3] See Peters, (supra) at 300-301.

[4] See N Botha and M Olivier 'Ten Years of International Law in the South African Courts' South African Yearbook of International Law 29 (2004) 42, 46.

[5] See J Dugard 'International Law and the Final Constitution' (1995) 11 South African Journal on Human Rights 241.

[6] See Z Motala and C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: An Analysis and Cases (2002) 37.

[7] 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 672 (CC)('AZAPO').

Another example of the Constitutional Court's generous predisposition towards international law when undertaking constitutional interpretation is Chaskalson P's justification for recourse to travaux préparatoires for a better understanding of (certain aspects of) the Interim Constitution. Capital punishment was a profoundly controversial issue among the negotiators and drafters of South Africa's Interim Constitution. They eventually opted for the 'Solomonic solution'[1] of not mentioning capital punishment in that Constitution at all, and leaving it entirely up to the Constitutional Court to cast the die on its constitutionality.[2] Chaskalson P thus thought it necessary in Makwanyane to take cognisance of the genesis of the text of the Interim Constitution so as to come to grips with the interpretive implications of the constitution-makers' silence on the issue of capital punishment. However, in seeking to justify his reliance on 'preceding deliberations', Chaskalson P was faced with a South African common law on statutory interpretation prone to pit itself against reliance on preparatory material in the interpretation of enacted law.[3] Proceeding beyond conventional common-law restraints, he argued that reliance on travaux préparatoires is appropriate in constitutional interpretation, because it is accepted in other 'countries in which the Constitution is … supreme law'.[4] 'The European Court of Human Rights and the United Nations Committee on Human Rights,' Chaskalson P then continued, 'all allow their deliberations to be informed by travaux préparatoires.'[5] He cited Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 as authority for the contention that travaux préparatoires may thus be relied on — also in constitutional interpretation. This Vienna 'Convention on Conventions' is 'international law' as contemplated in IC s 35(1) (and FC s 39(1)(b)) , but Articles 31-33 of the Convention is international law applicable (only or, at least, primarily) to the interpretation of international documents and instruments ('treaties') and not to the interpretation of a domestic Constitution. However, since the Constitutional Court, as South Africa's highest court in constitutional matters, has held, albeit probably also per errorem, that the 'Convention on Conventions' may be relied on to guide interpretation of South Africa's Constitution and Bill of Rights, this has become the law (of interpretation) as it stands in South Africa — an entirely persuasive international law-text, turned into prescriptive domestic law through judicial law-making.

On 25 July 1996, one year, one month and nineteen days after Makwanyane,[6] the Constitutional Court's handed down judgment in the politically controversial

[1] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 22 and 25.

[2] See also § 32.3*(e)*(iii) supra. Capital punishment is not referred to in the Final Constitution either. However, the reason for this 'silence' is that Makwanyane is taken to be the authority that has excluded the possibility of capital punishment once and for all.

[3] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 14. See also L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002)268-269.

[4] Ibid at para 16.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Makwanyane (supra) at para 16.

Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others.[1] Save for the absence of Kentridge AJ in AZAPO, the panels of concurring judges in the two cases were identical. Not only did AZAPO retreat from Makwanyane's generous reliance on international law in constitutional interpretation, but arguably also reversed the court's position on international law as a framework within which the Bill of Rights 'can be evaluated and understood'.[2] AZAPO was, of course, not written so as to have such adverse effects for international law in South Africa. Its primary concern was the constitutionality of granting amnesty for the perpetration of atrocities by both erstwhile protagonists and antagonists of apartheid.

The Postamble to the Transitional Constitution emphasised the need for national reconciliation and a healing of the divisions of the past, and required amnesty to be granted 'in respect of acts, omissions and offences associated with political objectives and committed in the course of the conflicts of the past'. The Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act[3] was subsequently enacted, stipulating conditions — and putting in place procedures to apply — for amnesty. An Amnesty Committee was authorised to grant perpetrators of human rights violations immunity from both criminal prosecution and civil liability, provided that their acts of violation could be associated with a political objective (as defined in the Act) and that all relevant facts about such acts were fully disclosed. Section 20(7) of the Act provided that individual immunity against criminal and civil liability would be consequent upon a successful application for amnesty, and discharged the state — and other bodies, organisations or persons — from (vicarious) civil liability for acts thus amnestied. AZAPO, the Applicant, challenged the constitutionality of Section 20(7) alleging that it breached every person's right (guaranteed in IC s 22) 'to have justiciable disputes settled by a court of law or … another independent and impartial forum'.[4] AZAPO contended that a state is required by international law, and a series of Geneva Conventions in particular, to prosecute the perpetrators of gross human rights violations, and that section 20(7) thus breached international law.[5] In terms of the said Conventions:

> The High Contracting Parties undertake to enact any legislation necessary to provide effective penal sanctions for persons committing, or ordering to be committed, any of the grave breaches.

The Constitutional Court thought that '[t]he issue which falls to be determined in this Court is whether section 20(7) of the Act is inconsistent with the Constitution' and 'the enquiry as to whether or not international law prescribes a different

[1] On the politically controversial dimensions of this case, see L du Plessis 'AZAPO: Monument, Memorial. . .or mistake?' in W le Roux & K van Marle (eds) Law, Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid: Ten Years after AZAPO v President of South Africa (2008) 51.
[2] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 35 and 304.
[3] Act 34 of 1995.
[4] FC s 34.
[5] See AZAPO (supra) at para 25.

duty is irrelevant to that determination'.[1] IC s 35(1) —the predecessor of FC s 39(1)(b) — the Court thought, directs it 'only to 'have regard' to public international law if it is applicable to the protection of the rights entrenched in the chapter' [ie the IC Bill of Rights].[2] That is, international law would have to be 'binding' in terms of black-letter constitutional law qualified to be '(public) international law' as envisaged in IC s 35(1) and FC s 39(1). This finding attenuates, if not reverses, the legal effect of Chaskalson P's framework dictum in Makwanyane.[3] Mahomed DP in AZAPO did not treat 'binding' as well as 'non-binding' international law as a framework within which the Bill of Rights 'can be evaluated and understood'. This reading of AZAPO renders provisions like IC s 35(1) or FC s 39(1)(b) largely superfluous. For if a court, tribunal or forum is at any rate bound to follow 'binding' international law, there is no need for any additional provisions to push it to do so.

AZAPO illustrates how domestic political pressures can put a court's (and in casu particularly the Constitutional Court's) otherwise favourable and generous dealings with international law under pressure. AZAPO touched a raw political nerve. Amnesty was central to the politically negotiated truth and reconciliation process in South Africa and held the key to a 'new' democracy memorialising the past without allowing it to eclipse the future. Had the Constitutional Court in AZAPO relied on international law to the same degree as it did in Makwanyane, it would have had to conclude that section 20(7) of the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act was unconstitutional. Had it then, pursuant to this finding, struck down the impugned provision, the truth and reconciliation process would certainly have ground to a halt, with potentially ghastly consequences for the more vital project of a closely negotiated, peaceful transition to constitutional democracy in South Africa.

History has shown that AZAPO did not irreversibly derogate from the Constitutional Court's 'universalist' attitude towards international law in constitutional interpretation.[4] In Government of the RSA and Others v Grootboom and Others,[5] the meaning of FC s 26's right to housing (in the form of passable basic shelter) was at issue. In construing the section, which guarantees everyone's right to adequate housing[6] and enjoins the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to achieve the realisation of this right,[7] the Court considered, amongst others, sources of international law. Yacoob J quoted Chaskalson P's framework dictum in Makwanyane,[8] but added a significant qualification:

[1] AZAPO (supra) at para 26.
[2] Ibid at para 27.
[3] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 35 and 304.
[4] See Peters (supra) at 300-301.
[5] 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC)('Grootboom').
[6] Section 26(1).
[7] FC s 26(2).
[8] Makwanyane (supra) at para 35.

> The relevant international law can be a guide to interpretation but the weight to be attached to any particular principle or rule of international law will vary. However, where the relevant principle of international law binds South Africa, it may be directly applicable.[1]

The Grootboom Court thus honoured — and, bearing AZAPO in mind, indeed restored — the distinction between international law binding on South Africa, and other sources of international law that must, in addition to binding law, be considered in the interpretation of the Bill of Rights. The Grootboom Court concentrated its inquiry mainly on Articles 11.1 and 2.1 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) and pointed out differences of interpretive significance between the formulation of the provisions of the Covenant and section 26 of the South African Constitution.[2] However, the Court also thought that the relevant general comments issued by the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights regarding the interpretation of the ICESCR 'constitute a significant guide to the interpretation of section 26'.[3] The Grootboom Court allowed itself to be guided by the Committee's general comments in order to determine what the notion of 'a minimum core' of socioeconomic rights entails. By doing so, the Makwanyane standard on recourse to non-binding international law was not just restored. The standard was further developed to authorise common sense reliance on an applicable text without making that text prescriptive as international law.

Makwanyane, AZAPO and Grootboom constitute a particular (and probably the leading) storyline in the case law narrative of the Constitutional Court's reliance on international law in constitutional interpretation. Not exactly within — but nonetheless supporting — this storyline, are a handful of judgments of the court evincing a certain adjudicative mindset in dealing with human rights issues which are prominent in international law.

The minority judgment of Sachs J in Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature. In re: Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995[4], with which the majority of the Constitutional Court did not disagree, demonstrated how measured reliance on (relevant) international law can contribute to the resolution of a controversial issue or issues in domestic politics. The petitioners in the case alleged that draft provincial legislation fell foul of guarantees of school learners' right to instruction in the language of their choice,[5] and of a right to establish educational institutions based on a common culture, language or religion.[6] Sachs J considered the petitioners' contentions in the broad domestic historical and constitutional context[7] and made four assumptions in

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 26.
[2] Ibid at para 28.
[3] Ibid at para 29.
[4] 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC), 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC)('Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature').
[5] This right was guaranteed in IC s 32(b).
[6] The right was subject to the proviso that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race. This right was guaranteed in IC s 32(c).
[7] See Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature (supra) at para 45.

their favour. He then contextualised these assumptions and counterbalanced them with reference to three significant considerations highlighted by the Interim Constitution.[1] This analysis was followed by an assessment of the actual constitutional provision in terms of six universally accepted principles gleaned from various sources of international law on the protection of minorities.[2] Having duly contextualised the interaction of international and municipal human rights law on the issues in dispute, Sachs J concluded that the petitioners' misgivings regarding minority rights and education were unfounded.

International law looms large where the protection of the rights of vulnerable individuals finding themselves on foreign soil is at issue. In Mohamed and Another v President of the RSA and Others the Constitutional Court dealt with the unlawful handing over of a foreign national to the United States of America to be prosecuted for his alleged involvement in the bombing of the United States Embassy in Tanzania.[3] The Mohamed court strongly condemned this extradition disguised as the deportation of an unlawful immigrant and adamantly (though alas belatedly) insisted on meticulous compliance with due process in such instances, which in casu would have had to include procuring an undertaking from the US government that the foreign subject would not be executed if eventually convicted in the US.[4]

Kaunda and Others v President of the RSA and Others (2),[5] on the other hand, was, like AZAPO, a politically sensitive matter. Sixty-nine applicants, all South African nationals, arrested and detained in Zimbabwe and then charged with various offences related to their alleged complicity in a plot to overthrow the government of Equatorial Guinea, sought the South African government's intervention on their behalf to secure their release or their extradition to South Africa, and to protect them against assault and detention in atrocious conditions while still in Zimbabwe (and the risk of a death penalty if eventually extradited to Equatorial Guinea). A majority of the Constitutional Court, citing FC s 232 in order to signal reliance on customary international law, narrowly construed the right to diplomatic protection of these South African nationals on foreign soil:

> [t]raditionally, international law has acknowledged that States have the right to protect their nationals beyond their borders but are under no obligation to do so.[6]

The Court attached considerable weight to the opinion of a Special Rapporteur of the International Law Commission on the meaning of 'diplomatic protection',[7]

[1] Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature (supra) at para 50.
[2] Ibid at paras 55-68.
[3] 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC), 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC)('Mohamed').
[4] Ibid at para 68.
[5] 2004 BCLR 1009 (CC), 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC)('Kaunda').
[6] Mohamed (supra) at para 23.
[7] Kaunda (supra) at paras 25-28.

concluding that under current (customary) international law diplomatic protection is not recognised and cannot be enforced as a human right. Diplomatic protection remained the prerogative of the state to be exercised at its discretion.[1]

The Constitutional Court's atypical restraint in drawing on (and its narrow construction of) international law sources in Kaunda,[2] is directly proportionate to the controversy of the political issues that were involved. The controversy flowed from fear of possible interference not only with the affairs of, but especially also with the due process of law in a neighbouring state. This judgment was another sobering reminder that political realities can decisively shape reliance on international law in constitutional interpretation.

In FC s 233 a long-standing, common-law presumption of statutory interpretation is constitutionalised:[3] 'Every court' interpreting legislation is required to 'prefer any reasonable interpretation … consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law'. Erasmus correctly points out that FC s 233, unlike the conventional presumption, is of effect even where there is no ambiguity in the language of the legislation to be construed — all that is needed for the section to take effect is the existence of international law on the topic or issue under consideration against which alternative interpretive outcomes can be assessed.[4] Though it is a rather helpful and significant interpretive aid, FC s 233 has, since the commencement of the Final Constitution, only been referred to twice: almost in passing by Sachs J in S v Baloyi[5] to justify his preferred interpretation of a legislative provision, and by Chaskalson CJ in Kaunda and Others v President of the RSA and Others (2).[6] FC s 233 explicitly mentions the interpretation of legislation (only), but the Constitutional Court, in the latter judgement, had little difficulty finding that the presumption it creates 'must apply equally to the provisions of the Bill of Rights and the Constitution as a whole'.[7] The Kaunda Court set FC s 233 on par with FC s 39(1)(b) — and that can only be done if 'international law' means the same thing in both sections. The effect of FC s 233 will then be that, in the interpretation of the Final Constitution (including the Bill of Rights), due regard to 'non-binding' international law will never be optional: such law will, as a matter of fact, apply whenever the presumption is not rebutted! ('Binding' international law, of course, applies at any rate.) One effect of this far-reaching interpretation is that FC s 39(1)(b) could be rendered superfluous, since FC s 233 applies to the Bill of [1] Kaunda (supra) at para 29.

[2] Ibid.
[3] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 173.
[4] See G Erasmus 'The Incorporation of Trade Agreements and Rules of Origin: The Extent of Constitutional Guidance' South African Yearbook of International Law 28 (2003) 157, 175.
[5] 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (2) SA 245 (CC)('Baloyi') at para 13.
[6] See Kaunda (supra) at para 33.
[7] Ibid at para 33.

Rights too. There are three possible ways of avoiding this consequence. (I) First, section 233 can be understood to refer to 'binding' international law only. (II) Second, the section can be understood as applying to the interpretation of legislation only (and not to interpretation of the Final Constitution too). (III) Third, and by virtue of the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant,[1] FC s 39(1)(b) can be understood as a specific prior provision, pertaining to the Bill of Rights (only), and therefore left unaffected by FC s 233, a general provision similar in substance but pertaining to the Final Constitution as a whole. What the Constitutional Court said about FC s 233 in Kaunda rules out (II), does not rule out but also does not strongly support a possibility as restricted as (I) above, and is most likely to be understood as suggesting a preference for (III).

FC s 233 can of course be invoked only where, in construing legislation (or the Final Constitution), there is indeed international law against which alternative interpretive outcomes can be assessed. On the other hand, not to observe the presumption, when such international law is at hand, is an error in law as Gerhard Erasmus[2] quite correctly points out in his critique of A M Moola Group Ltd and Others v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Others.[3] Given the paucity of references to FC s 233 in the case law, there is every reason to suspect that South African courts commit this error on a regular basis.

(bb) Foreign law

The South African Constitution not only reflects the influence of a wide range of international human rights law instruments: it is fair to say that it in some vital respects it has also been modelled on an array of foreign constitutions, eg the German Basic Law, the Canadian Charter, the US Constitution and Indian Constitution. South African courts (and the Constitutional Court in particular) have furthermore been open to persuasion by comparative (foreign) authorities.[4] O'Regan J in *K v Minister of Safety and Security*eloquently reflected on this openness as follows:

> There can be no doubt that it will often be helpful for our courts to consider the approach of other jurisdictions to problems that may be similar to our own. Counsel for the respondent argued that because our common-law principles of delict grew from the system of Roman-Dutch law applied in Holland, a province of the Netherlands, in the 17th century, we should not have regard to judgments or reasoning of other legal systems. He submitted that the conceptual nature of our law of delict, based as it is on general principles of liability, is different from the casuistic character of the law of torts in common-law countries. These differences, he submitted, render reliance on such law dangerous. Counsel is correct in

[1] See Du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (supra) at 73-74.
[2] Erasmus 'The Incorporation of Trade Agreements' (supra) at 157, 175.
[3] 2003 (6) SA 244 (SCA).
[4] See § 32.5*(c)*(v)(aa) supra.

> drawing our attention to the different conceptual bases of our law and other legal systems. As in all exercises in legal comparativism, it is important to be astute not to equate legal institutions which are not, in truth, comparable. Yet in my view, the approach of other legal systems remains of relevance to us.
>
> It would seem unduly parochial to consider that no guidance, whether positive or negative, could be drawn from other legal systems' grappling with issues similar to those with which we are confronted. Consideration of the responses of other legal systems may enlighten us in analysing our own law, and assist us in developing it further. It is for this very reason that our Constitution contains an express provision authorising courts to consider the law of other countries when interpreting the Bill of Rights. It is clear that in looking to the jurisprudence of other countries, all the dangers of shallow comparativism must be avoided. To forbid any comparative review because of those risks, however, would be to deprive our legal system of the benefits of the learning and wisdom to be found in other jurisdictions. Our courts will look at other jurisdictions for enlightenment and assistance in developing our own law. The question of whether we will find assistance will depend on whether the jurisprudence considered is of itself valuable and persuasive. If it is, the courts and our law will benefit. If it is not, the courts will say so, and no harm will be done.[1]

The disposition evinced by these dicta stands in stark contrast to parochial sentiments that are made manifest in an intense recent debate that has raged in the United States of America over the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation and adjudication. Cheryl Saunders, taking the pulse of this debate, thus remarks:

> The practice [ie the use of foreign law] remains a topic of fierce debate among scholars … and among judges writing extra-judicially. It has been the subject of critical comment in the press. It has attracted the attention of Congress, spawning a series of proposed resolutions seeking, in one way or another, to discourage judicial reference to foreign constitutional experience, with impeachment a veiled threat in the background.[2]

Denunciation of 'the practice of comparison' professes to be principled on two accounts. First, reliance on foreign authority is thought to be necessarily at odds with the original intent of the 'the founding generation' responsible, in the first and final instance, for the making of a constitution believed to be in no need of an interpretive adaptation to 'present circumstances'.[3] Second, it is claimed that foreign law is not an authoritative source of law for (domestic) judges, and those among them who invoke it assume a legislative function which is at odds with the horizontal separation of powers (or trias politica).[4] They moreover import the ideas

[1] 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC), 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC)('K') at paras 34-35.

[2] C Saunders 'Comparative Constitutional Law in the Courts: Is there a Problem?' (2006) 59 Current Legal Problems 91, 92.

[3] See § 32.3*(b)(i) and § 32.3(c)*(i)(B) supra. See also J Murkens 'Comparative Constitutional Law in the Courts: Reflections on the Originalists' Objections' (2008) 41 Verfassung und Recht in Übersee 32, 34.

[4] See Murkens (supra) at 34.

of foreign judges, over which the people of the US have no control, into American (constitutional) law, and that is, ostensibly, counter-democratic.

This debate is not particularly relevant in any constitutional democracy where constitutional comparison as interpretive endeavour is practiced, encouraged and, as in South Africa, explicitly authorised by the Final Constitution. The first objection above is premised on an exploded theory of constitutional interpretation (rejected by the South African Constitutional Court in no uncertain terms[1] and by South African scholars too[2]). As to the second objection, the US opponents of the use of foreign law in domestic adjudication are about the only constitutional interpreters in the world today who see constitutional comparativism as an inevitable and (apparently) insurmountable threat to the separation of powers (and democracy). In no jurisdiction where it is allowed to aid constitutional interpretation is foreign law looked upon and invoked as binding law (this is actually one of its strengths[3]) and courts do not consult it with a 'legislative frame of mind' or with deference to the opinions of foreign legal authorities. Comparative constitutional jurisprudence, in the presence of powerful constitutional mechanisms and reading strategies safeguarding the separation of powers,[4] is a very unlikely candidate to be the Achilles heel of trias politica.

Some commentators, in their account of the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation so far, tend to describe Constitutional Court judges as comparative constitutional law enthusiasts.[5] What then should one make of Kriegler J's cautionary remark in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security[6] that he declines 'to engage in a debate about the merits or otherwise of remedies devised by jurisdictions whose common law relating to remedies for civil wrongs bears no resemblance to ours and whose constitutional provisions have but a passing similarity to our section 7(4)(a)' as both a questioning of 'the value of foreign law' and expression of an opinion in opposition to Ackermann J's readiness to take foreign legal authority into account? Justice Emeritus Laurie WH Ackermann,[7] writing extra-judicially,

[1] See § 32.3*(b)*(i) supra.

[2] See H Corder 'Lessons from (North) America. (Beware the 'Legalization of Politics' and the 'Political Seduction of the Law')' (1992) 8 South African Law Journal 204, 206–214.

[3] LWH Ackermann 'Constitutional Comparativism in South Africa: A Response to Sir Basil Markesinis and Jörg Fedtke' (2005) 80 Tulane Law Review 169, 183-184. See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 39.

[4] See eg § 32.3*(e)(ii)(aa), § 32.4(b)(i)(cc) and (ii) and § 32.5(b)*(iii)(bb) supra.

[5] See HM Cheadle, DM Davis and NRL Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (July 2006) 33-3. See also B Markesinis and J Fedtke 'The Judge as Comparatist' (2005) 80 Tulane Law Review 11, 66-68.

[6] 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1997 (3) 786 (CC) at para 90.

[7] LWH Ackermann, 'Constitutional Comparativism in South Africa: A Response to Sir Basil Markesinis and Jörg Fedtke' Tulane Law Review 80 (1) (2005-2006) 169-193. See also LWH Ackermann 'Constitutional Comparativism in South Africa' South African Law Journal 123(3) (2006) 497-515.

has pointed out, with reference to relevant passages from Constitutional Court cases, that Kriegler J was not really a sceptic when it came to the use of foreign law and that references to foreign authority indeed occur in Constitutional Court judgments authored by him. For instance: in S v Mamabolo (E TV, Business Day and Freedom of Expression Institute intervening), Kriegler J explicitly expressed appreciation for the usefulness of 'comparative study':

> particularly where Courts in exemplary jurisdictions have grappled with universal issues confronting us. Likewise, where a provision in our Constitution is manifestly modelled on a particular provision in another country's constitution, it would be folly not to ascertain how the jurists of that country have interpreted their precedential provision.[1]

Kriegler J's reluctance to refer to foreign law in certain (over-)publicised instances, stemmed from what he perceived to be his own insufficient, personal mastery of foreign material or his belief that he could concur in a colleague's conclusion without reliance on foreign material.[2] Two observations apropos Kriegler J's dictum above will help to take the present discussion further.

First, the dictum reminds us that — as was pointed out above — not only international law sources, but also the domestic constitutional texts of other jurisdictions have had a definite impact on the making the South African Constitution. Such comparative constitution-making inevitably results in a globalisation of constitutional law which, in its turn, begets and conduces comparative constitutional interpretation.[3]

Second, Kriegler J acted as the sentinel among his peers, constantly on the lookout for uses of foreign law that he thought might flout Chaskalson P's admonition in S v Makwanyane and Another that 'we must bear in mind that we are required to construe the South African Constitution … with due regard to our legal system, our history and circumstances, and the structure and language of our own Constitution' .[4] A sentiment that weighed heavily with Kriegler J was his profound appreciation for the unique manner in which a political and constitutional settlement in South Africa had been reached through (the give and take of) negotiations and sustained by a 'Damascene about-turn from executive directed parliamentary supremacy to justiciable constitutionalism', about which he said the following in Du Plessis and Others v De Klerk and Another:[5]

> Nowhere in the world that I am aware of have enemies agreed on a transitional coalition and a controlled two-stage process of constitution building. Therefore, although it is always instructive to see how other countries have arranged their constitutional affairs, I do not

[1] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 133.
[2] LWH Ackermann 'Comparative Constitutionalism' (supra) at 186. See also Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 132-133.
[3] See F Venter 'Globalization of Constitutional Law through Comparative Constitution-Making' (2008) 41 Verfassung und Recht in Übersee 16.
[4] 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (3) SA 391, 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 39.
[5] 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC), 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC)('Du Plessis') at para 127.

> start there. And when I conduct comparative study, I do so with great caution. The survey is conducted from the point of view afforded by the South African Constitution, constructed on unique foundations, built according to a unique design and intended for unique purposes.

Later in the judgment Kriegler J sounded a (further) word of caution, namely that the advent of a new constitution did not warrant 'the wholesale importation of foreign doctrines and precedents'.[1] With constitutional democracy in South Africa still in its infancy at the time, such caution was opportune, for the paucity of home-grown constitutional jurisprudence posed the danger of overreliance on the jurisprudence of others or of reliance on inappropriate foreign sources.

Kriegler J's word of caution, coupled with the last sentence of his dictum above, raises the spectre of unreflective reliance on substantive foreign law, regardless of the peculiar structural environment in which it occurs and/or the distinctive procedural matrix in which it took shape. The Chaskalson P admonition in S v Makwanyane and Another[2] already hinted at the need for vigilance in this regard.[3] Mark Tushnet, for instance, has shown why and how structural and procedural factors inhibit profitable reliance by US courts and comparativists on much of the (exemplary) substantive law on affirmative action in some other jurisdictions.[4]

Difference in context, however, in the light of the previously quoted dicta of O'Regan J in K v Minister of Safety and Security,[5] seems to be no insurmountable impediment to the comparison of the constitutions and constitutional law of two systems. Where the differences between systems go to their historical and conceptual roots, one must simply be careful to avoid the dangers of shallow comparativism and determine — on the merits — whether the foreign jurisprudence is valuable and persuasive.[6]

Comparative constitutional interpretation has since 1994 featured quite prominently in our constitutional jurisprudence and not least of all the jurisprudence of

[1] Du Plessis (supra) at para 144.

[2] Makwanyane (supra) at para 39, see the introductory paragraph to 32.5(c)(v) supra.

[3] See Cheadle et al (supra) at 33-3:

> Great care must be taken to ground comparative borrowing, both within the context of the texts from which that authority emanates and as the nature and purpose of our text. For example, the absence of a general limitation clause in the United States Constitution or the fact that the European Convention of Human Rights is an instrument governing the conduct of national states, has a considerable bearing on the nature of the jurisprudence of the United States Supreme Court and the European Court of Human Rights. To borrow uncritically from these jurisdictions, without considering the appropriate context, is an exercise fraught with danger, a fact which was acknowledged by Chaskalson P in Makwanyane.

See also Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC), 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC)('Sanderson') at para 26.

[4] M Tushnet 'Interpreting Constitutions Comparatively: Some Cautionary Notes, with Reference to Affirmative Action' (2004) 36 Connecticut Law Review 649. .

[5] K (supra) at paras 34-35.

[6] Ibid at para 35.

the Constitutional Court. Laurie WH Ackermann drafted a list of no less than 26 instances and areas in which reliance on foreign law substantially codetermined interpretive and adjudicative outcomes in Constitutional Court cases.[1]

Constitutional comparativism has demonstrable practical value besides and beyond lip-service recognition of the actualities of constitutional globalisation and of the embeddedness of one's own constitution and constitutional dispensation in a transnational reality. At the level of mundanity it makes constitutional interpreters aware of law, and especially foreign precedents, that can be invoked to justify their decisions. Brun-Otto Bryde, speaking from his experience as a constitutional judge, points out that such authority can be particularly helpful in lending additional legitimacy to findings and decisions dealing with difficult issues that might go against public opinion:

> Even an old court with much self-confidence can profit from pointing to persuasive foreign precedents.[2]

Bryde moots the possibility of distinguishing between the interpretive uses of foreign law as inspiration and as legal argument in constitutional adjudication.[3] In the first instance a foreign source is looked at because the way in which it deals with a certain issue 'is interesting' to the same extent (and in the same manner) as the opinion of, for instance, a law professor will be 'interesting'. In this sense there is no numerus clausus of persuasive sources of law and it is mostly broad principles (as opposed to particular rules or norms) that are assessed. Even a foreign text misunderstood or taken out of context can, according to Bryde, be inspirational. When relied on as a legal argument, however, a judge must get the foreign law right. Such an argument can draw on foreign experience in the application of national standards, the application of international standards in foreign (domestic) jurisdictions and transnational constitutionalist principles limiting domestic constitutional law.

Constitutional comparativism fulfils, according to Constitutional Court Justice Emeritus Laurie WH Ackermann, two vital functions. First, it features prominently in the identification of the actual problem or problems in a particular case, in other words, the accurate recognition of issues at hand.[4] Ackermann contends that the formulation of a problem is often more essential than its solution. Foreign law, precisely because it is not binding and therefore does not exert any pressure 'to be of effect',[5] creates room for 'creative imagination' and 'to raise new questions, new possibilities, [and] to regard old problems from a new angle'.[6]

[1] Ackermann (supra) at 187-190.
[2] Bryde (supra) at 207-208.
[3] Bryde (supra) at 213-219.
[4] See LWH Ackermann 'Comparative Constitutionalism' (supra) at 183-185.
[5] On the distinctive 'effect-directedness' of prescriptive law-texts, see § 32.3*(d)* and (e)(i)(bb), § 32.4*(a)* and § 32.5*(c)*(iii) supra.
[6] LWH Ackermann 'Comparative Constitutionalism' (supra) at 185 (Quoting Albert Einstein).

At a critical stage of judicial reasoning, namely where the judge has arrived at a preliminary conclusion or hypothesis, reference to comparative examples assists him or her in vital (and necessary) attempts to falsify such a conclusion or hypothesis.[1]

Second, the comparative legal approach enables the judge to interrogate his or her own prejudices[2] and to engage in a most crucial dialogue with herself or himself, 'in the course of which hypotheses emerge … intellectual, cultural and other predispositions compete' and 'critical rationalism can come into play to test and adapt hypotheses':

> It is at this stage, consciously or not, that one's philosophical, economic and jurisprudential Gestalt enters the picture. At this stage I have found comparative legal concepts to be most helpful.[3]

Another useful perspective on the value of constitutional comparativism is that of AJ van der Walt. He writes:

> Seen as a study of a collection of histories, comparative analysis of foreign property clauses and case law draws our attention to the inevitable and inescapable contextuality of the law and of constitutional property adjudication. As a history of errors, comparative study shows us a range of fallacious doctrines, theories and arguments that have already been discredited and should be avoided. As a history of possibilities, comparative study shows us that certain doctrines, theories and arguments could still be used as possible explanations of or solutions for individual problems. As a history of examples, comparative study shows us the methods, techniques and approaches that are available to us. Like the historical study of law, the comparative study of law liberates us from what we need not do; it cannot and should not enslave us by telling us what we have to do.[4]

Two major challenges face constitutional comparativism (and constitutional comparativists) in South Africa. The first challenge is to account for the comparative significance of South Africa among a number of 'new' constitutional democracies with 'new' constitutions in an era of ever increasing globalisation. 'Newness', as was previously pointed out, can relate to having a Constitution drafted with reference to and drawing on post-World War II international human rights instruments.[5] However, 'newness', alluding to a North-South distinction in comparative

[1] Ackermann 'Comparative Constitutionalism' (supra) at 185.

[2] Ibid at 191:

> No judge is a 'Hercules' or an 'Athena'. The best one can do is to strive consciously to become aware of all one's prejudices, to be aware that, this exercise notwithstanding, one will still have subliminal predispositions, and to toil as honestly as one can in the vineyard.

[3] Ibid at 191-192.

[4] Van der Walt (supra) at 38.

[5] Such as the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Bryde, Brun-Otto 'The Constitutional Judge and the International Constitutionalist Dialogue' Tulane Law Review 80 (1) (2005-2006) 203, 208 ('Constitutionalist Dialogue').

constitutional law, can also relate to renewed processes of democratisation and constitution-making worldwide, referred to by some as 'the third wave of democratisation'.[1] Bryde writes:

> This process started with the disappearance of the last right-wing dictatorships in Southern Europe, was followed by the breakdown of communism in Eastern Europe and has become a world-wide phenomenon most remarkably in Latin America but also in Africa and Asia. While setbacks are common the overall process is significant.[2]

This perspective brings with it an awareness of historical possibility (as Van der Walt[3] would have it) or promise (in the idiom of memorial constitutionalism[4]). Looking forward is distinctively part of a new beginning. At the same time the said perspective evokes memory (à la memorial constitutionalism[5]). Memory is also a 'history of errors' (à la Van der Walt) and serves equally as reminder of the achievements and blunders of other constitutional experiences. The unusual success achieved in South Africa with its peaceful transition — and rightly referred to by Kriegler J in Du Plessis and Others v De Klerk and Another[6] with hardly disguised pride and appreciation — is no cause for complacency. Constitutional triumphalism is always premature: for a 'history of errors' looms (and may again be in the making). The call to alertness does of course not apply to 'new' democracies only (oldness and smugness are comfortable companions too), but where constitutional democracy is tried anew or for the first time, it is of existential urgency that jurisdictions engaged in the endeavour should learn from one another's positive and negative experiences, and share with one another their expectations of future possibilities and promises.

The second challenge is to harness the theoretical strengths and possibilities of (practical experiences of) constitutional comparison and to design and develop a methodology (or methodologies) of comparative constitutionalism.[7] How does the constitutional comparativist, for instance, decide that, as O'Regan J has it in the previously cited dictum from K v Minister of Safety and Security,[8] a certain version

[1] B-O Bryde 'North and South in Comparative Constitutional Law — from Colonial Imposition towards a Transnational Constitutionalist Dialogue' in W Benedek, H Isak and R Kicker (eds) *Development and Developing International and European Law: Essays in Honour of Conrad Ginther on the Occasion of his 65th Birthday (*1999) 697, 701.

[2] B-O Bryde 'Constitutional Law in "old" and "new" Law and Development' (2008) 41 Verfassung und Recht in Übersee 10, 11.

[3] See AJ van der Walt Constitutional Property Clauses (1999) 38.

[4] See § 32.3*(c)*(iii)(bb).

[5] See § 32.3*(c)*(iii)(bb).

[6] 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC), 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC) at para 127.

[7] See Saunders (supra) at 119-126 (Convincingly argues that it is important for courts also to take comparative methodological issues to heart.) See also F Venter Constitutional Comparison. Japan, Germany, Canada and South Africa as Constitutional States (2000); VC Jackson, & M Tushnet (eds) Defining the Field of Comparative Constitutional Law (2002) Both texts attempt to deal with issues of comparative methodology.

[8] 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC), 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC) at para 35.

of comparativism is 'shallow' or that foreign jurisprudence considered in a particular case 'is of itself valuable and persuasive'? As to Chaskalson P's[1] directional and Kriegler J's[2] constant reminders that 'we must bear in mind that we are required to construe the South African Constitution', what are the criteria and conditions that make interpretive reliance on comparative materials at all possible and when are two systems of constitutional law (and/or aspects of them) sufficiently compatible to be comparable for interpretive purposes? How is a 'wholesale importation of foreign doctrines and precedents' to be distinguished from prudent reliance on whatever (legitimate) instructive value these doctrines and precedents might have?[3] Is the debate about the 'transplantation' versus the 'migration' of foreign law relevant in the South African context?[4] As to the suggestion of Bryde about the distinction between the use of foreign sources of law as inspiration and as legal argument, how is it to be decided where the one ends and the other begins? Bryde suggest that for the former mode of reliance 'there are few normative or methodological requirements' while for the latter mode 'the methodology has to be more thorough'.[5] Apart from suggesting that a thorough methodology entails 'getting it right' as far as a judge's understanding of relevant foreign law is concerned, Bryde is silent on the essential difference between the two methodologies — and it will certainly be worthwhile for reliable constitutional comparativism to get that right!

32.6 Constitutional Interpretation in a Constitutional State

Are there, I ask rhetorically, reliable interpretive formulas or recipes upon which a constitutional interpreter can time and again rely? The answer of the preceding pages is a resounding 'no'!

The text of the Constitution-in-writing is open-ended and generates more and more — instead of being limited to only certain — meanings. Methodological pluralism manifesting as multiple strategy interpretation is preferable to methodological monism seeking to establish a one and only correct manner in which to arrive at 'the best' or the 'most correct' interpretation of the Constitution (and, more specifically, any one or more of its provisions).

This 'moreness' or proliferation of meaning does not mean that anything goes or that a distinction between better and worse answers to interpretive questions do not exist. A constitutional state (Rechtsstaat), where legal precepts bind all members of the (legal) community in the same way, is a more vital requirement

[1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 39.
[2] Du Plessis (supra) at paras 127 and 144; Sanderson (supra) at para 26.
[3] Du Plessis (supra) at para 144.
[4] See S Choudhry 'Migration as a New Metaphor in Comparative Constitutional Law' in S Choudhry (ed) The Migration of Constitutional Ideas (2006) 1.
[5] Bryde 'Çonstitutionalist Dialogue' (supra) at 214.

for 'good interpretation' than the availability of 'the right' interpretive methods or techniques. According to Hans-Georg Gadamer, a leading exponent of philosophical hermeneutics, a Rechtsstaat is a prerequisite to legal hermeneutics:

> [I]n an absolutist state, where the will of the absolute ruler is above the law, hermeneutics cannot exist, 'since an absolute ruler can explain his words in a sense that goes against the rules of general interpretation'. . .There is a need to understand and interpret only when something is enacted in such a way that it is, as enacted, irremovable and binding.[1]

The will of a despot can blatantly overtrump the interpretation of authorised legal interpreters such as judges. More subtly, however, legal interpreters themselves can evade their hermeneutic responsibility — in law most clearly manifested as a judicial responsibility — by hiding behind the 'clearly expressed will' of the sovereign. In the latter instance the 'objective adjudicator' assumes that she or he dares not limit or broaden the legislative will, lest she or he lands up in the murky waters of politics. Hermeneutic responsibility, Gadamer argues, requires from the legal interpreter, especially the judge, a concretisation of the legal norm (Konkretisierung des Gesetzes) which includes its application, and which often requires its completion through augmentation (Rechtsergänzung).[2] Judicial decisions may be justified on the strength of either legal dogma or legal hermeneutics, that is to say, either by simply subsuming legal problems under generally applicable legal norms and principles or by concretising normative texts interpretively. Gadamer assigns priority to the latter mode of judicial problem solving and, eventually, decision-making. Interpretive responsibility requires the judicial decision-maker to hermeneuticize rather than simply to dogmatise.

From Gadamer's contentions it follows that, in constitutional interpretation, the intensity of interpretive engagement with the constitutional text, and other relevant sources, determines the quality of the answers to the initial questions posed. They are mostly not the easy (or readily arrived at) answers. A claim that the language of a constitutional provision or its readily discernable purpose clearly manifests its meaning is suspect. Serious interpretive engagement with a provision will, in addition to considerations of its language and purpose, also entail consideration of its context and its coherence with other law in as well as outside of the Constitution, its history and its relationship to transnational sources of law. Language, purpose, context, history and transnational context, as well as interpretive waymarks in the written text of the Constitution, however, constitute but the hallway to the meaning possibilities of constitutional provisions. Constitutional interpretation in the fullest sense have taken place only when the distinctive interpretive demands of a constitutional democracy, such as the observation and activation of constitutional values, judicial self-restraint, subsidiarity and reading in conformity with the Constitution have been brought into play. Meaning in constitutional interpretation is never given. It has to be decided upon. And before the feet of the decision-maker, Jacques Derrida explains, there is always a gaping abyss of uncertainty simply because he or she is faced with making a decision about something which was not certain beforehand. If you already know what you are going to (or should) do, then there is no need for a decision. The decision-maker therefore has to take full responsibility for the leap he or she makes into (and hopefully across) the abyss, starting from the very point where, with incomplete and even deficient knowledge at his or her disposal, he or she considers a decision, and might then end up at a point where, on the other side of the abyss, he or she has made an own decision:

[1] H-G Gadamer Truth and Method (1975) 294.
[2] Ibid at 312-313.

> You have to go through an ordeal of undecidability in order to decide … Something must remain incalculable for a decision to be a decision.[1]

Each and every authorised interpreter of the Final Constitution (and not only the courts or organs of state) bears interpretive responsibility when and wherever he or she construes the country's highest law, for each and every interpretation of the Final Constitution contributes to (the quality of) constitutional democracy, the very precondition to sustained constitutional interpretation. Ultimately, therefore, constitutional interpretation is not just about reading the Final Constitution. It is about doing it.

[1] J Derrida 'Justice, Law and Philosophy — An Interview with Jacques Derrida' (1999) 18(3) South African Journal of Philosophy 279 at 281.

33 The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights

Sandra Liebenberg

33.1 Introduction 33-1
33.2 The inclusion of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution 33-3
(a) Drafting history 33-3
(b) Certification of the Constitution 33-4
(c) Overview of the relevant provisions protecting socio-economic rights 33-5
(i) Categories of socio-economic rights. 33-5
(ii) The duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil socio-economic rights 33-6
33.3 Introduction to the major cases 33-7
33.4 General approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights 33-8
(a) The justiciability of socio-economic rights 33-8
(b) Interpreting socio-economic rights in context. 33-9
(c) International law 33-10
(d) Comparative law 33-16
33.5 Interpreting the socio-economic rights in sections 26 and 27 33-17
(a) The relation between the first and second subsections of sections 26 and 27 33-17
(b) The negative duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights. . . 33-17
(c) The socio-economic rights in sections 26(3) and 27(3) 33-20
(d) The right of 'access to' socio-economic rights 33-22

(e) Do sections 26 and 27 impose minimum core obligations on the State? 33-22
(i) Grootboom: Rejecting minimum core as a primary basis for adjudicating socio-economic rights 33-23
(ii) TAC: No minimum core obligation under section 27(1) 33-24
(iii) Critiques of the Court's approach 33-27
(iv) A future role for minimum core obligations? 33-32
(f) Opting for reasonableness review 33-32
(i) Soobramoney: The standard of rationality 33-32
(ii) Grootboom: Developing the principles of 'reasonableness review' 33-33
(iii) TAC: Applying the 'reasonableness' test. 33-35
(iv) Evaluating reasonableness review 33-38
(g) Progressive realisation 33-41
(i) A national strategy and plan of action 33-42
(ii) Retrogressive measures. 33-43
(h) Within available resources 33-44
33.6 Defending State assistance to vulnerable groups 33-48
33.7 Children's socio-economic rights. 33-48
33.8 The other unqualified socio-economic rights 33-52
33.9 Burden of proof 33-53
33.10 Limiting socio-economic rights 33-54
(a) Justifying limitations to socio-economic rights 33-54
(b) Resource-based reasons for limiting socio-economic rights. 33-55
33.11 The horizontal application of socio-economic rights 33-57
(a) Negative duties. 33-58
(b) Positive duties 33-58
(c) Development of the common law. 33-60
33.12 Remedies 33-61
33.13 The role of the Human Rights Commission and the Commission for Gender Equality 33-64

33.1 INTRODUCTION*

One of the distinguishing features of the final South African Constitution is its far-reaching commitment to the principle of the interdependency of all human rights — civil and political, as well as economic, social and cultural rights. This principle is explicitly endorsed in a number of human rights declarations and resolutions adopted by the international community.[1] It embraces the notion that human rights should be treated holistically in order to protect human welfare.[2] As Craig Scott writes:

> The term interdependence attempts to capture the idea that values seen as directly related to the full development of personhood cannot be protected and nurtured in isolation.[3]

Socio-economic rights are concerned with the material dimensions of human welfare. Their recognition as human rights stems from an acknowledgement that without food, water, shelter, health care, education and social security, human beings cannot survive, live with dignity or develop to their full potential.

The principle of interdependency finds expression within human rights discourse both at a normative and an institutional level. The South African Bill of Rights gives full effect to this principle by delineating a broad array of social, economic and cultural rights[4]. The Constitution ensures that all these rights may be enforced by the courts.[5] Moreover, the Constitution has also created

* In developing this chapter, I was fortunate to have the benefit of a stimulating exchange of ideas and materials with a number of colleagues working in the field of socio-economic rights, particularly Geoff Budlender, Wim Trengove, Danie Brand, Sibonile Khoza, Danwood Chirwa, Theunis Roux and David Bilchitz. Thanks are also due to Stu Woolman for his detailed substantive comments and editorial suggestions.

[1] See, for example, The Proclamation of Tehran 1968, Final Act of the International Conference on Human Rights, Tehran, UN doc A/Conf 32/41, art 13; The Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights, June 1993, UN doc A/Conf 157/23, part I, para 5.

[2] Apart from being intrinsically valuable to the protection of human life and development, socio-economic rights are also necessary to enable the effective enjoyment of civil and political rights and full participation in society. See N Haysom 'Constitutionalism, Majoritarian Democracy and Socio-Economic Rights' (1992) 2 SAJHR 451 ('Constitutionalism'); See also T H Marshall Citizenship and Social Class (1959).

[3] C Scott 'The Interdependence and Permeability of Human Rights Norms: Towards a Partial Fusion of the International Covenants on Human Rights' (1989) 27 Osgoode Hall LJ 769, 786 ('Interdependence').

[4] These social, cultural and economic rights can be found in ss 22 (freedom of trade, occupation and profession), 23 (labour relations), 24 (environment), 25 (property and land) 26 (housing), 27 (health care, food, water and social security), 28 (children's rights), 29 (education), 30 (language and culture), 31 (the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities), and 35(2)(e) (the socio-economic rights of persons deprived of their liberty). Many of these rights illustrate that there is no watertight division between civil and political rights on the one hand, and socio-economic rights on the other. For example, the right to form and join a trade union and the right to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations are specific manifestations of the civil right to freedom of association (s 18 of the Bill of Rights).

[5] In terms of s 38 of the final Constitution, 'Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights.'

institutions designed to promote and protect these rights[1].

The danger exists that a Bill of Rights that privileges civil and political rights will become the exclusive instrument of the rich and powerful for protecting their vested interests.[2] The inclusion of socio-economic rights as justiciable rights in the South African Bill of Rights makes the redress of poverty a matter of fundamental constitutional concern.[3] A formalistic interpretation of the Constitution that privileges negative liberty and existing distributions of power and wealth is foreclosed by this text.[4]

Since the last iteration of this chapter, the Constitutional Court has handed down the landmark decisions in Government of the Republic of South Africa & others v Grootboom & others ('Grootboom')[5] and Minister of Health & others v Treatment Action Campaign & others ('TAC')[6]. These cases laid the foundations for the Court's approach to the interpretation of the socio-economic rights in sections 26, 27 and 28(1)(c) of the Constitution. This chapter aims to elucidate and critique the evolving jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on these socio-economic rights.[7]

[1] For example, the Human Rights Commission, the Commission for Gender Equality, the Public Protector, and the Auditor-General. See § 33.13 below (Human Rights Commission and Commission for Gender Equality).

[2] For example, civil and political rights may be invoked to undermine social reform legislation, as occurred in Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905) (maximum hours legislation for bakers declared unconstitutional). For an account of attempts to immunise agrarian and other social reform legislation against challenges based on the Fundamental Rights chapter of the Indian Constitution (Part III), see B P Jeewan Reddy & R Dhavan 'The Jurisprudence of Human Rights' in D M Beatty (ed) Human Rights and Judicial Review: A Comparative Perspective (1994) 175, 180.

[3] The Preamble of the Constitution states that one of the aims of the adoption of the Constitution is to '[i]mprove the quality of life and free the potential of each person'. One of the most cogent arguments in favour of justiciable socio-economic rights is that their exclusion from the Bill of Rights would relegate the values and interests protected by this set of rights to the margins of constitutional and political concern. See C Scott and P Macklem 'Constitutional Ropes of Sand or Justiciable Guarantees? Social Rights in a New South African Constitution' (1992) 141 U Penn LR 1, 26 ('Ropes of Sand'). According to the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (UNCESCR), excluding socio-economic rights from judicial protection 'would drastically curtail the capacity of the courts to protect the rights of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged groups in society'. General Comment ('GC') 9 (19th sess, 1998), UN doc.E/1999/22, para 10.

[4] Karl Klare characterises the Constitution as 'social, redistributive, caring, positive, at least partly horizontal, participatory, multicultural, and self-conscious about its transformative role and mission'. K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146, 153. As Justice Kriegler has observed, 'We do not operate under a constitution in which the avowed purpose of the drafters was to place limitations on governmental control. Our constitution aims at establishing freedom and equality in a grossly disparate society.' Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at para 147.

[5] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC).

[6] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC).

[7] The focus of this chapter is on ss 26, 27 and 28(1)(c) and the interpretation of socio-economic rights generally. Forthcoming chapters in the 2nd Edition of Constitutional Law of South Africa will engage discrete provisions in the Bill of Rights, from ss 22 (freedom of trade, occupation and profession), 23 (labour relations), 24 (environment), 25 (property and land), 26 (housing), 27 (healthcare, food, water and social security), 28 (children's rights), 29 (education), 30 (language and culture), 31 (the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities), to 35(2)(e) (the socio-economic rights of persons deprived of their liberty). Discussions of these same rights can be found in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999).

33.2 The Inclusion of Socio-Economic Rights in the Final Constitution

(a) Drafting history

The question whether socio-economic rights should be protected in the Constitution and if so, the appropriate form of their inclusion, was the subject of a great deal of academic and public debate in South Africa[1]. The debate was resolved in favour of their inclusion.[2]

During the negotiations process for the final Constitution most of the political parties supported the inclusion of socio-economic rights in some form in the Bill of Rights.[3] The background research relating to the inclusion of socio-economic rights in the Constitution by the Technical Committee advising the Constitutional Assembly on the Bill of Rights are found in their explanatory memoranda.[4]

A perusal of the relevant minutes and memoranda prepared during the drafting process reveals the strong influence of international law on the drafting of the [1] See, for example, D Basson 'Economic Rights: A Focal Point in the Debate on Human Rights and Labour Relations in South Africa' (1989) SAPL 120; C R M Dlamini 'The South African Law Commission's Working Paper on Group and Human Rights: Towards a Bill of Rights for South Africa' (1990) SAPL 91; A Sachs 'Towards a Bill of Rights in a Democratic South Africa' (1990) 6 SAJHR 1; Haysom 'Constitutionalism' (supra) at 451; E Mureinik 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries: Economic Rights in the Constitution' (1992) 8 SAJHR 464 ('Charter of Luxuries'); D Davis 'The Case against Inclusion of Socio-economic Rights in a Bill of Rights Except as Directive Principles' (1992) 8 SAJHR 475; H Corder, S Kahanovitz, J Murphy, C Murray, K O' Regan, J Sarkin, H Smith & N Steytler A Charter for Social Justice: A Contribution to the South African Bill of Rights Debate (1992) 18; SA Law Commission Final Report on Group and Human Rights (Project 58, 1994) 180; B de Villiers 'Social and Economic Rights' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 599; S Liebenberg 'Social and Economic Rights: A Critical Challenge' in S Liebenberg (ed) The Constitution of South Africa from a Gender Perspective (1995) 79.

[2] The drafters of the Interim Constitution (Act 200 of 1993) (IC) followed a more minimalist approach by including only a limited number of socio-economic rights. See, for example, ss 25(1)(b) (conditions of detention), 26 (economic activity), 27 (labour relations), 29 (environment), 30(1)(c) (children), 31 (language and culture), and 32 (education).

[3] A number of civil society organisations also strongly motivated for the inclusion of socio-economic in the Bill of Rights in written submissions to the Constitutional Assembly, and during the public hearing convened by the Constitutional Assembly on 1 August 1995 on the theme of socio-economic rights. For example, the Ad Hoc Committee for the Campaign on Social and Economic Rights, representing a number of respected South African NGOs, petitioned the Constitutional Assembly to include socio-economic rights in the Constitution (document on file with the author dated 19 July 1995). There were also powerful dissenting voices; for example, the Chamber of Mines, and the Institute of Race Relations. See the Memorandum prepared by the Technical Committee to Theme Committee IV entitled Matters Arising from the Public Submissions (7 March 1996).

[4] Constitutional Assembly, Constitutional Committee Subcommittee, Draft Bill of Rights, Vol 1: Explanatory Memoranda of Technical Committee to Theme Committee IV of the Constitutional Assembly (9 October 1995). Based on a survey of international and comparative law, socio-economic rights such as the right to housing were included within the concept of 'universally accepted fundamental rights' for the purposes of Constitutional Principle (CP) II, IC Schedule 4. See Technical Committee (Theme Committee 4), Memorandum entitled The Meaning of 'Universally Accepted Fundamental Rights' in Constitutional Principle II, Schedule 4 to the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 (1995).

relevant sections protecting socio-economic rights. For example, the concepts of progressive realisation and resource availability in sections 26 and 27 were based on article 2 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 1966 (the ICESCR).[1] According to the Technical Committee, this formulation has the dual advantage of facilitating consistency between South Africa's domestic law and international human rights norms, and directing the courts towards a legitimate international resource for the interpretation of these rights.[2]

(b) Certification of the Constitution

During the certification process, objections were raised against the inclusion of socio-economic rights in the Bill of Rights.[3] The objections were that socio-economic rights were not 'universally accepted fundamental rights' for the purposes of Constitutional Principle (CP) II, that they were inconsistent with the separation of powers doctrine in CP VI, and were not justiciable. In rejecting these arguments the Constitutional Court held that although socio-economic rights are not 'universally accepted fundamental rights', 'CP II permits the Constitutional Assembly to supplement the universally accepted fundamental rights with other rights not universally accepted'.[4] Secondly, the fact that socio-economic rights have budgetary implications does not automatically result in a breach of the doctrine of separation of powers. The court pointed out that the enforcement of many civil and political rights such as equality, freedom of speech and the right to a fair trial also often have budgetary implications.[5]

As a consequence of finding that socio-economic rights are not 'universally accepted fundamental rights', the court held that CP II did not require them to be incorporated in the Bill of Rights as justiciable rights.[6] Nevertheless, it observed

[1] See, for example, the Memorandum of the Panel of Constitutional Experts on the meaning of 'progressive realisation' in the Working Draft of the Constitution (6 February 1996); Technical Committee IV Memorandum on Sections 25 and 26 of the Working Draft of the Constitution (14 February 1996). Article 2 of the ICESCR reads as follows:

> Each State party to the present Covenant undertakes to take steps, individually and through international assistance and co-operation, especially economic and technical, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realisation of the rights recognised in the present Covenant by all appropriate means, including particularly the adoption of legislative measures.

[2] Technical Committee IV Memorandum on Sections 25 and 26 of the Working Draft of the Constitution (14 February 1996) at 2.

[3] See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) ('First Certification') at paras 76–8. The main objectors were the SA Institute of Race Relations, the Free Market Foundation and the Gauteng Association of Chambers of Commerce and Industry. The Legal Resources Centre, the Centre for Applied Legal Studies and the Community Law Centre (UWC) ('CLC'), argued in favour of the inclusion of socio-economic rights at the certification hearings. (See Annexure 3 to the judgment.)

[4] First Certification (supra) at para 76.

[5] Ibid at para 77.

[6] Ibid at para 78.

that socio-economic rights 'are, at least to some extent, justiciable'. The fact that socio-economic rights will 'almost inevitably' give rise to budgetary implications is not 'a bar to their justiciability. At a minimum, socio-economic rights can be negatively protected from improper invasion.'[1]

Implicit in this reasoning is the distinction drawn between the positive and negative duties imposed by socio-economic rights, and an indication that the court would, at the very least, be prepared to enforce the negative duties flowing from the rights. The budgetary implications of enforcing socio-economic rights are not in themselves a reason for judicial abstention, but may influence the standard of review applied in particular cases.

(c) Overview of the relevant provisions protecting socio-economic rights

(i) Categories of socio-economic rights

The socio-economic rights found in the Bill of Rights follow three main drafting styles. The first category of rights entrenches the right of 'everyone' to 'have access to' adequate housing, health care services, including reproductive health care, sufficient food and water, and social security.[2] In respect of these rights, the State is explicitly required to 'take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights'.[3] This first category can be loosely described as the 'qualified socio-economic rights'.

The second category entrenches a set of 'basic' rights consisting of children's socio-economic rights,[4] the right of everyone to basic education, including adult basic education,[5] and the socio-economic rights of detained persons, including sentenced prisoners.[6] These rights are not qualified by reference to reasonable measures, progressive realisation or resource constraints.

The third category of rights is articulated in sections 26(3) and 27(3). The former provides that '[n]o one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances'. It goes on to State that '[n]o legislation may permit arbitrary evictions'.

[1] First Certification (supra) at para 78.

[2] Sections 26(1) and 27(1).

[3] Sections 26(2) and 27(2). The sections protecting environmental and land rights (ss 24 and 25(5)) use similar phrases to those contained in ss 26 and 27, although there are important differences in the way they are formulated.

[4] Section 28(1)(c) gives every child the right to 'basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services'. A child is defined in s 28(3) as a person under the age of 18 years.

[5] Section 29(1)(a).

[6] Section 35(2)(e) confers the right 'to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least exercise and the provision, at State expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment'.

The latter States that '[n]o one may be refused emergency medical treatment'. These rights are couched in the form of a prohibition against certain conduct by the State and, arguably, private parties.[1]

Like all the other rights in the Bill of Rights, the socio-economic rights are subject to the general limitations clause, section 36.

(ii) The duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil socio-economic rights

The Constitution places an overarching obligation on the State to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights'.[2] Section 7 establishes that the rights in the Bill of Rights impose a combination of negative and positive duties on the State.[3]

The 'duty to respect' requires the State to refrain from law or conduct that directly or indirectly interferes with people's enjoyment of socio-economic rights, for example, refraining from arbitrary forced evictions of people from their homes. The 'duty to protect' places a duty on the State to take legislative and other measures, including the provision of effective remedies, to protect vulnerable groups against violations of their rights by more powerful private parties (e.g. landlords, banks and insurance companies). The 'duty to promote' is sometimes regarded as a dimension of the duty to fulfil socio-economic rights.[4] It embraces awareness-raising and educational measures concerning the rights, for example, on the available mechanisms for accessing the rights.[5] The duty 'to fulfil' requires the State to take positive measures to ensure that those persons who currently lack access to the rights gain access to them.

[1] See §§ 33.5*(c)* and 33.11 infra ('The socio-economic rights in sections 26(3) and 27(3)', and 'Horizontal application').

[2] Section 7(2). This typology is based on the analysis by Henry Shue of the obligations imposed on States by human rights: Basic Rights: Subsistence, Affluence and US Foreign Policy (1980) 5. It is also used by the UNCESCR to analyse the duties imposed by various rights in the ICESCR: see, eg GC 12 (20th sess, 1999) The right to adequate food (art 11 of the Covenant*)* UN doc. E/2000/22 para 15; GC 14 (22nd sess, 2000) The right to the highest attainable standard of health (art 12 of the Covenant*)* UN doc. E/C.12/2000/4 paras 33–37; GC 15 (29th sess 2002) The right to water (arts 11 and 12 of the Covenant) UN doc. E/C 12/2002/11 paras 20–29. See also Grootboom (supra) at para 20.

[3] For an exposition of these duties, see The Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria Comm 155/96 October 2001, African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights ('SERAC v Nigeria') paras 44–47; The Maastricht Guidelines on Violations of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 691 at para 6; P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights: Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 67, 78 ('Pious Wishes'); S Liebenberg 'Violations of Socio-Economic Rights: The Role of the South African Human Rights Commission' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 405, 410 ('Violations').

[4] See, for example, GC 15 (supra) at para 25.

[5] SERAC v Nigeria (supra) at para 46. In GC 15 on the right to water, the UNCESCR refers to the duty on States parties to the Covenant 'to take steps to ensure that there is appropriate education concerning the hygienic use of water, protection of water sources and methods to minimise water wastage' (supra) at para 25.

The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (UNCESCR) has identified two aspects of the duty to fulfil. The first is a duty to enable and assist communities to gain access to socio-economic rights. This would include, for example, adopting enabling policies and legislation that facilitate and regulate access to the various goods socio-economic rights are designed to deliver. The second is a duty to provide these various goods directly whenever an individual or group is unable, for reasons beyond their control, to gain access to the right through the means at their disposal. The latter aspect of the duty to fulfil is thus targeted at groups in especially vulnerable situations.[1]

33.3 Introduction to the Major Cases

There are now three major Constitutional Court judgments dealing directly with the interpretation of the socio-economic rights in sections 26, 27 and 28(1)(c).[2] To facilitate the discussion of the emerging socio-economic rights' jurisprudence, this section briefly describes the facts and decisions in these three cases.

Soobramoney was the first major Constitutional Court case to consider the enforceability of socio-economic rights.[3] The applicant, an unemployed man in the final stages of chronic renal failure, sought a positive order from the courts directing a provincial hospital to provide him with ongoing dialysis treatment and interdicting the provincial Minister of Health from refusing him admission to the renal unit of the hospital. Without this treatment the applicant would die, as he could not afford to obtain the treatment from a private clinic. He relied primarily on section 11 (the right to life), and section 27(3) (the right to emergency medical treatment). The application was dismissed in the High Court and was taken on appeal to the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court also considered the applicability of sections 27(1) and (2). It found no breach of the aforementioned sections and dismissed the appeal.

Grootboom concerned a group of adults and children who had moved onto private land from an informal settlement owing to the 'appalling conditions' in which they lived.[4] They were evicted from the private land. Following the eviction, they camped on a sports field in the area. However, they could not erect adequate shelters as most of their building materials had been destroyed during

[1] See GC 12 (supra) at para 15; GC 14 (supra) at para 37; GC 15 (supra) at para 25.

[2] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC) ('Soobramoney'); Grootboom (supra); TAC (supra).

[3] Soobramoney (supra).

[4] In the words of Judge Yacoob in the Constitutional Court judgment: 'The root cause of their problems is the intolerable conditions under which they were living while waiting in the queue for their turn to be allocated low-cost housing.' Grootboom (supra) at para 3.

the eviction. Accordingly, they found themselves in a precarious position where they had neither security of tenure nor adequate shelter from the elements.[1]

They applied to the Cape High Court on an urgent basis for an order against all three spheres of government to be provided with temporary shelter or housing until they obtained permanent accommodation.[2] The High Court held that there was no violation of section 26, but found a violation of section 28(1)(c) (the right of children to shelter). On appeal, the Constitutional Court declared that the State's housing programme fell short of compliance with section 26(2), but found no violation of section 28(1)(c).

TAC involved a challenge to the limited nature of the measures introduced by the State to prevent mother-to-child transmission (MTCT) of HIV. Firstly, it was contended that the State unreasonably prohibited the administration of the anti-retroviral drug, Nevirapine, at public hospitals and clinics outside a limited number of research and training sites. This drug was of proven efficacy in reducing intrapartum MTCT of HIV. Secondly, the State failed to produce and implement a comprehensive national programme for the prevention of MTCT of HIV. Both the High Court and the Constitutional Court (on appeal) held that the State's programme to prevent MTCT of HIV did not comply with its obligations in terms of sections 27(1) and (2). The Constitutional Court made both declaratory and mandatory orders against the Government.

33.4 General Approach to the Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights

(a) The justiciability of socio-economic rights

In the First Certification judgment, the Constitutional Court held that, '[a]t the very minimum, socio-economic rights can be negatively protected from improper invasion'.[3] This signalled the Court's willingness to enforce the negative duties imposed by socio-economic rights (the duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights). In Soobramoney, Grootboom and TAC, the Court was called upon to adjudicate the positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights. In Grootboom, the Court indicated that the justiciability of socio-economic rights had been put 'beyond question by the text of the Constitution as construed in the Certification judgment'.[4] The Court also referred to the duties on the State in section 7(2) of the Constitution in relation to the rights in the Bill of Rights, holding that 'the courts are [1] Grootbom (supra) at paras 9-11.

[2] Grootboom v Oostenberg Municipality & others 2000 (3) BCLR 277, 281–282 (C) ('Grootboom I'). Other relief sought by the applicants in terms of s 28(1)(c) was not pursued.

[3] First Certification (supra) at para 78.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 20.

constitutionally bound to ensure that they are protected and fulifilled'.[1] The key issue was the method of enforcement of these rights in a given case. According to Yacoob J, '[t]his is a very difficult issue which must be carefully explored on a case-by-case basis'.[2] Addressing this challenge requires a consideration of 'the terms and context of the relevant constitutional provisions' and their application to the circumstances of the particular case.[3]

(b) Interpreting socio-economic rights in context

In its judgments on socio-economic rights the Constitutional Court has emphasised that, in addition to their textual setting, the rights need to be interpreted in their social and historical context.[4]

In Soobramoney, Chaskalson P commences the judgment by recognising the circumstances of poverty and economic inequality that exist in our country. He notes that these conditions 'already existed when the Constitution was adopted and a commitment to address them, and to transform our society into one in which there will be human dignity, freedom and equality, lies at the heart of our new constitutional order'.[5] This passage is significant because it establishes the strong link between socio-economic rights and the foundational constitutional values of human dignity, equality and freedom.[6] Furthermore it affirms that the commitment to address these conditions of poverty and inequality and transform our society based on human dignity, equality and freedom is a central constitutional purpose. Finally, it acknowledges that as long as these conditions persist, 'that aspiration will have a hollow ring'.[7] Thus the Court recognises that giving meaningful effect to socio-economic rights is indispensable to the success of South Africa's constitutional democracy and to ensuring that the core constitutional values are meaningful to the whole population.

However, the Court gave an early indication in Soobramoney that its approach to the interpretation of the socio-economic rights provisions of the Constitution would be informed by the realities of limited resources, and the 'significant demands' on the State in the light of our historical legacy.[8] It thus held that the rights in sections 26 and 27 'are limited by reason of lack of resources' and that 'an unqualified obligation to meet these needs would not presently be capable of [1] Grootboom (supra) at para 20. See § 33.2*(c)*(ii) supra (on the duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil rights).

[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Grootboom (supra) at paras 22 and 25; TAC (supra) at para 24.
[5] Soobramoney (supra) at para 8.
[6] See ss 1*(a)* and 7(1) of the Constitution.
[7] Soobramoney (supra) at para 8.
[8] Ibid at para 11.

being fulfilled'.[1] The Court's assessment of what is possible in the light of present circumstances informed both its rejection of the notion of a minimum core obligation and its formulation of the reasonableness standard of review.[2]

A key theme emphasised by the Court in Grootboom was the 'interconnectedness' of socio-economic rights. Socio-economic rights serve the foundational values of our society — human dignity, freedom and equality — and enable people to enjoy all other rights in the Bill of Rights.[3] Moreover, there is 'a close relationship' between the various socio-economic rights with the result that a right such as the right of access to adequate housing cannot be seen in isolation.[4] The Court went on to say:

> Their interconnectedness needs to be taken into account in interpreting the socio-economic rights, and, in particular, in determining whether the State has met its obligations in terms of them.[5]

It is not clear how the interconnectedness of socio-economic rights will influence their interpretation. It probably implies, for example, that measures adopted by the State to give effect to the right of access to social assistance (section 27(1)(c)) are also relevant to assessing compliance with the obligations imposed by the right of access to sufficient food (section 27(1)(b)), and vice versa.[6] However, it is important to note that section 27(2) refers to the progressive realisation of 'each of these rights' (the rights in s 27(1)). This proviso suggests that while the measures taken to realise the rights will undoubtedly overlap to some extent, the specificity of each right must be taken into account in designing relevant programmes to give effect to it. The fact that the same measure may sometimes contribute to the realisation of more than one socio-economic right does not diminish the necessity to assess the realisation of each right individually against the criteria in sections 26(2) and 27(2).

(c) International law

The Court affirmed in Grootboom that international law, including non-binding international instruments, was an important guide to interpreting the rights in the

[1] Soobramoney (supra) at para 11.

[2] See, for example, TAC (supra) at para 35, Grootboom (supra) at para 43. See also §§ 33.5*(e)* (on minimum core obligations) and 33.5*(f)* (on reasonableness review) below.

[3] Grootboom (supra). In addition, the Court observed (at para 23): 'The realisation of these rights is also key to the advancement of race and gender equality and the evolution of a society in which men and women are equally able to achieve their full potential.'

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at paras 36 and 78.

Bill of Rights.[1] However, the Court indicated that the weight to be attached to a particular principle or rule of international law would vary. Thus 'where a relevant principle of international law binds South Africa, it may be directly applicable'.[2]

The pre-eminent international treaty protecting economic and social rights is the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966) (the ICESCR).[3] The ICESCR is the sister Covenant to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) (the ICCPR).[4] Although South Africa has ratified the ICCPR, and many other international human rights treaties protecting socio-economic rights[5], it has not yet ratified the ICESCR.[6] Thus the Covenant is neither binding on South Africa under international law nor does it have any direct legal effect in domestic law. However, it remains an important guide under section 39(1)(b) to interpreting the socio-economic rights provisions under our Constitution. As noted above, there are a number of similarities between the formulation of sections 26(2) and 27(2) of the Constitution and article 2(1) of the Covenant: both the Constitution and the ICESCR emphasise the taking of legislative measures, 'progressive realisation', and the limitation of available resources.[7]

[1] See Grootboom (supra) at para 26. The Court referred to its position developed in S v Makwanyane & another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 35. Section 39(1)(b) of the Constitution requires a court, tribunal or forum to consider international law when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

[2] Ibid at para 26. Sections 231(1)–(3) establish the procedures by which international agreements bind the Republic. Section 231(4) regulates the domestic legal effect of international agreements. Thus an international agreement has domestic legal effect when it is enacted into law by national legislation. However, a self-executing provision of an agreement that has been approved by Parliament is legally binding in domestic law 'unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament'.

[3] The ICESCR (1966) 999 UNTS 3 was adopted on 16 December 1966, and entered into force on 3 January 1976. As at 7 July 2003 there were 147 States parties to the ICESCR.

[4] The ICCPR (1966) 999 UNTS 171 was adopted on 16 December 1966, and entered into force on 23 March 1976. As at 7 July 2003 there were 149 States parties to the ICCPR (Of these, 104 States have ratified its First Optional Protocol concerning individual communications, and 49 have ratified its Second Optional Protocol aiming at the abolition of the death penalty). For the history behind the adoption of two separate Covenants, one protecting civil and political rights, the other economic, social and cultural rights, see M C R Craven The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Perspective on its Development (1995) 16 ('ICESCR'); Scott 'Interdependence' (supra) at 791-814; S Liebenberg 'The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and its Implications for South Africa' (1995) 11 SAJHR 359, 360 ('Implications of the ICESCR').

[5] These include: The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981) 21 ILM 59 (acceded to on 9 July 1996); African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child (1990) OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/24.9/49 (ratified on 7 January 2000); the Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) 28 ILM 1456 (ratified on 16 June 1995); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979) 1249 UNTS 13 (ratified on 15 December 1995); the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1966) 60 UNTS 195 (ratified on 15 December 1995). The women's and race conventions deal with gender and racial equality respectively, but include a number of provisions specifically relating to the equal enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights.

[6] However, this treaty was signed on behalf of South Africa in October 1994. Through signature, South Africa has incurred an international obligation to refrain from 'acts which would defeat the object and purpose of the treaty.' Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969) 8 ILM 679, art 18.

[7] See art 2 of the ICESCR.

That said, the Court highlighted in Grootboom the differences in the relevant provisions and indicated that they were 'significant in determining the extent to which the provisions of the Covenant may be a guide to an interpretation of section 26'.[1] These differences in relation to housing are:

(a) The Covenant provides for a right to adequate housing while section 26 provides for a right of access to adequate housing.
(b) The Covenant obliges States parties to take appropriate steps which must include legislation while the Constitution obligates the South African State to take reasonable legislative and other measures.[2]

These differences were identified prior to the Court's rejection of the arguments raised by the amici in relation to the concept of minimum core obligations endorsed by the UNCESCR.[3] However, the Court accepted the Committee's interpretation of the phrase, 'progressive realisation' as being 'in harmony with the context in which the phrase is used in our Constitution'.[4] It thus held that there 'is no reason not to accept that it bears the same meaning in the Constitution as in the document from which it was so clearly derived'.[5]

This confirms that the Court will not adopt concepts from non-binding international instruments that it regards as inconsistent with the text and context of the relevant constitutional provisions protecting socio-economic rights. However, international instruments and their interpretation by treaty bodies remain an important guide in interpreting relevant socio-economic rights provisions, particularly where it can be shown that the particular international jurisprudence is consistent with, if not identical to, our constitutional provisions and is appropriate in the South African context.[6]

---

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 28.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See § 33.5*(e)*(i) below (dealing with the minimum core argument in Grootboom).
[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 45. See § 33.5*(g)* infra (on progressive realisation in Grootboom).
[5] Ibid.
[6] The CESCR is responsible for supervising States parties' compliance with their obligations under the Covenant. The main sources for their interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Covenant are the official records of their review of States parties' reports under Part IV of the Covenant, and the General Comments adopted by the Committee. To date the Committee has adopted fifteen General Comments (GC): GC 1 (3rd sess, 1989) UN doc E/1989/22 Reporting by States parties; GC 2 (4th sess, 1990) UN doc E/1990/23 International technical assistance measures (art 22); GC 3 (5th sess, 1990) UN doc E/1991/23 The nature of States parties obligations (art 2(1)); GC 4 (6th sess, 1991) UN doc E/1992/23 The right to adequate housing (art 11(1)); GC 5 (11th sess, 1994) UN doc E/C 12/1994/13 Persons with disabilities; GC 6 (13th sess, 1995) UN doc E/1996/2 The economic, social and cultural rights of older persons; GC 7 (16th sess, 1997) UN doc E/C 12/1997/4 The right to adequate housing (art 11(1)) - forced evictions; GC 8 (17th sess, 1997) UN doc E/1998/22 The relationship between economic sanctions and respect for economic, social and cultural rights; GC 9 (19th sess, 1998) UN doc E/1999/22 Domestic application of the Covenant; GC 10 (19th sess, 1998) UN doc E/1999/22 The role of national human rights institutions in the protection of economic, social and cultural rights; GC 11 (20th sess, 1999) UN doc E/2000/22 Plans of action for primary education (art 14): GC 12 (20th sess, 1999) UN doc E/2000/22 The right to adequate food (art 11); GC 13 (21st sess, 1999) UN doc E/2000/22 The right to education (art 13); GC 14 (22nd sess, 2000) UN doc E/C.12/2000/4 The right to the highest attainable standard of health (art 12); GC 15 (29th sess, 2002) UN doc E/C.12/2002/11 The right to water (arts 11 and 12).

Of course, the status of the ICESCR or any other international treaty containing socio-economic rights would change once it has been ratified and incorporated into domestic law. The courts would then be obliged to give effect to their provisions, and interpretations of its provisions by treaty-monitoring bodies would be of considerable authoritative weight.[1]

One of the problems in deriving interpretative guidance from international instruments protecting socio-economic rights has been the historical absence of individual complaints procedures generating international 'case law'.[2] The international community has consistently affirmed the equal status of economic and social rights and called for their equal protection. However, in reality the enforcement procedures for socio-economic rights have not been as effective as those available for civil and political rights. Treaties protecting civil and political rights usually make provision for an optional individual complaints procedure. This procedure allows individuals subject to the jurisdiction of a State party which has accepted the procedure (or the jurisdiction of the relevant court) to submit a complaint to an international committee or court, alleging a violation of their rights by the State party.[3]

In contrast, the supervision of States parties' obligations in respect of economic and social rights has generally been limited to a periodic reporting system. This development was due to the perceived difficulty of subjecting socio-economic rights to individual adjudication because they were thought to require extensive [1] On the domestic application of the ICESCR, see M C R Craven 'The Domestic Application of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1993) XL (3) Netherlands International LR 367-404.

[2] Although generally the interpretations of treaty provisions generated by international treaty-monitoring bodies (eg views on individual communications, concluding observations on States' periodic reports and general comments) are not legally binding per se, they carry weight as authoritative interpretations of the relevant treaty. On the status of the General Comments issued by the UNCESCR, see Craven 'ICESCR' (supra) at 91-2.

[3] See, for example, the First Optional Protocol to the ICCPR (1966) 999 UNTS 171; the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1984) 23 ILM 1027, art 22; the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (supra), art 14; the European Convention on Human Rights (1950) ETS 5, arts 25, 46, 48; the American Convention on Human Rights (1969) 1144 UNTS 123, arts 44-51 and ch VIII. Socio-economic benefits may receive indirect protection through the application of the provisions of these treaties in individual complaints procedures. For example, in the cases of Zwaan-de Vries v The Netherlands Comm 182/1984 and Broeks v The Netherlands Comm 172/1984 (decided under the First Optional Protocol of the ICCPR), the UN Human Rights Committee adopted the view that social security legislation enacted by the Netherlands violated art 26 of the Covenant (the right to equality, and the prohibition on discrimination). This legislation required married women to prove that they were either 'breadwinners' or permanently separated from their spouses in order to qualify for unemployment benefits. A similar burden was not imposed on married men. South Africa is a party to the First Optional Protocol to the ICCPR (by accession on 28 August 2002). It has also accepted the individual complaints procedure under the race and torture conventions.

positive obligations and resource implications. There can be little doubt that the absence of individual complaints procedures in relation to economic and social rights has tended to undermine their status as binding individual rights. It has also meant that the relevant treaty monitoring bodies have not had the opportunity to develop their normative content through application in concrete cases.[1] Efforts to provide more effective mechanisms in the ICESCR and other international instruments for the protection of socio-economic rights have gained momentum in recent years.[2] The general trend in international law is now towards providing complaints mechanisms in respect of treaties protecting socio-economic rights.[3]

Another important international treaty containing socio-economic rights of particular relevance to South Africa is the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights. Socio-economic rights appear along with civil and political rights in [1] See P Alston 'No Right to Complain About Being Poor: The Need for an Optional Protocol to the Economic Rights Covenant' in A Eide & J Helgesen (eds) The Future of Human Rights Protection in a Changing World (1991) 79; A R Chapman 'A "Violations Approach" for Monitoring the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1996) 18 Human Rights Quarterly 23, 39 (recommending that the CESCR focus its efforts more closely on identifying and redressing violations of economic and social rights); S Leckie 'Another Step Towards Indivisibility: Identifying Key Features of Violations of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 81 ('Indivisibility').

[2] The Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, UN doc A/Conf 157/23 Part II paras 40 and 75 (encouraging the examination of optional protocols to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the ICESCR). The CESCR has also gradually developed its mandate under the reporting procedure of the ICESCR to include quasi-judicial features in order to provide more effective protection for socio-economic rights. See M Craven 'Towards an Unofficial Petition Procedure: A Review on the Role of the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' in K Drzewicki, C Krause & A Rosas (eds) Social Rights as Human Rights: A European Challenge (1994) 91 ('Towards an Unofficial Petition Procedure'). Also see K Arambulo Strengthening the Supervision of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: Theoretical and Procedural Aspects (1999).

[3] In 1995 an Additional Protocol was adopted to the European Social Charter (1961) providing for a system of collective complaints (European Social Charter and its Protocols, ETS 35, 128 and 142). This procedure allows trade unions and employers' organisations as well as certain non-governmental organisations to refer alleged breaches of the Charter to the Committee of Independent Experts, which monitors compliance with the Charter. Case law of the Committee can be accessed on-line at http://www.europarl.eu.int/experts/default_en.htm (accessed 16 May 2003). See also L Samuel Fundamental Social Rights: Case Law of the European Social Charter (1997). The Revised European Social Charter, which updates and complements the list of rights protected in the Charter, was opened for signature on 3 May 1996 and entered into force on 1 July 1999 (ETS 163). The Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the area of economic, social and cultural rights (1998) entered into force on 29 November 1999 (OAS Treaty Series 69). This Optional Protocol makes provision for individual petitions to the Inter-American Commission and Inter-American Court on Human Rights in respect of alleged breaches of trade union rights (art 8), and of the right to education (art 13). In 1999, an Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women was adopted. It entered into force on 22 December 2000, and provides for both an individual communications procedure and inquiry procedure. In 2001, the UN Commission on Human Rights appointed an independent expert to examine the question of an Optional Protocol to the ICESCR. This was followed, at its 59th session, with the establishment of an open-ended working group with a mandate to consider options regarding the elaboration of an Optional Protocol to the ICESCR. This working group is further mandated to report to the Commission on Human Rights at its 60th session and to make specific recommendations on the Optional Protocol (Commission on Human Rights resolution 2003/18).

the Charter,[1] and no distinction is made between the various rights in the Charter with regard to the submission of communications to the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights.[2] There have been relatively few communications under the African Charter dealing specifically with socio-economic rights.[3] However, in 2001, the African Commission handed down its landmark decision, SERAC v Nigeria.[4] This communication concerned the destruction of Ogoniland natural resources by an oil consortium (in which a State oil company was a majority shareholder), and the destruction of the homes and livelihoods of the Ogoni communities. The Commission held that the State bears responsibility for protecting its populace against violations of socio-economic rights by both quasi-State and non-State entities. It found that Nigeria had facilitated the destruction of Ogoniland both through its direct actions and by failing to adequately protect the Ogoni people against exploitation by the oil consortium. It accordingly found that Nigeria was in violation of articles 2, 4, 14, 16, 18(1), 21 and 24 of the African Charter. Significantly, the Commission found that certain socio-economic rights not expressly guaranteed in the Charter such as the rights to housing and food are implicitly protected through other provisions.[5]

Finally, socio-economic rights are also protected in specialised conventions concluded, for example, under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.[6]

[1] See, for example, arts 15 (work), 16 (health), 17 (education), and 18 (protection of the family, women, children, the aged and the disabled).

[2] See arts 55-9.

[3] For a discussion of the communications dealt with by the African Commission relating to economic, social and cultural rights, see C A Odinkalu 'Implementing Economic, Social and Cultural Rights Under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights' in M D Evans & R Murray (eds) The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights: The System in Practice, 1986–2000 (2002) 178, 209.

[4] Supra.

[5] It derived the right to housing from a combined reading of the right to property (art 14), the right to health (art 16), and the right to the protection of the family (art 18(1)). The right to food was derived from the right to life (art 4), the right to health (art 16) and the right to economic, social and cultural development (art 22). For a discussion of this decision, see D M Chirwa 'A Fresh Commitment to Implementing Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in Africa' (2002) 3 (2) ESR Review 19.

[6] See, for example, ILO Convention 117 concerning Basic Aims and Standards of Social Policy (1962) ILO Conventions and Recommendations Vol I 746; and the Convention Against Discrimination in Education (1960) 429 UNTS 93.

There are also a plethora of international declarations, resolutions and reports relevant to socio-economic rights.[1]

(d) Comparative law

Section 39(1)(c) of the Constitution also provides that the courts 'may consider foreign law' when interpreting the Bill of Rights. Although socio-economic rights are encountered in a number of national Constitutions, it is rare to encounter the South African commitment to a comprehensive range of socio-economic rights married to judicial enforcement. The absence of a commitment to judicial enforcement per force diminishes their value. However, socio-economic rights are often indirectly protected through the application of various civil and political rights. For example, the right to equality is often employed to extend social benefits to vulnerable groups.[2] Another mechanism developed particularly by the Indian Supreme Court is to draw on directive principles of State policy[3] to give civil and political rights socio-economic content, for example, interpreting the right to life to include the right to a livelihood.[4] Our Constitutional Court has relied on recent Indian jurisprudence in determining the ambit of the right to emergency medical treatment in section 27(3) of the Constitution.[5]

[1] See, for example, the reports of the Special Rapporteurs appointed by the UN Commission on Human Rights on economic, social and cultural rights, accessible on-line at: http://193.194.138.190/html/menu2/2/liststudrepts.htm (accessed on 16 May 2003). To date the Commission has appointed special rapporteurs on the rights to education, housing, food, and health. The work of the following international agencies is of particular relevance to socio-economic rights: the World Health Organisation, the Food and Agricultural Organisation, and the United Nations Children's Fund. Important UN Declarations relevant to the achievement of basic socio-economic rights include: the Report and Declaration of Alma Ata adopted by the International Conference on Primary Health Care in 1978; the World Declaration on Education for All adopted in 1990 by the World Conference on Education for All; the World Declaration on Nutrition adopted in 1992 by the International Conference on Nutrition; and the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements adopted in 1996 by the Second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II).

[2] See, for example, the Canadian Supreme Court decision in Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General) (1997) 151 DLR. (4th) 577 (SCC) (the extension of sign-language interpretation to deaf patients as part of a publicly funded scheme for the provision of medical care). For a commentary on this case, see B Porter 'Beyond Andrews: Substantive Equality and Positive Obligations after Eldridge and Vriend' (Spring 1998) 9 Constitutional Forum 71. See also S Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 3, 1998) 41-18–41-21 and cases cited in this discussion. ('Socio-Economic Rights'). For a recent Canadian case in which reduced welfare benefits were unsuccessfully challenged under sections 15 (equality) and 7 (security of the person), see Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney-General) 2002 SCC 84.

[3] These directives are expressly declared to be unenforceable by any court in section 37 of the Indian Constitution .

[4] See Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' 1st Edition (supra) at 41-21–41-24.

[5] See Soobramoney (supra) citing with approval Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity & others v State of West Bengal & another (1996) AIR SC 2426 ('Paschim') at para 18. For a critique of the Court's construal of this case, see C Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobramoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise' (2000) 16 SAJHR 206, 237, 245–248 ('Transnational Context') See also § 33.5*(c)* infra (the socio-economic rights in sections 26(3) and 27(3)).

Given the relative novelty of the constitutional protection of socio-economic rights, the South African courts are likely to regard national case law dealing with socio-economic rights as valuable comparative experiences in interpreting our own constitutional provisions. However, they will naturally be mindful of the differing legal and socio-economic context of comparative case law.[1]

33.5 Interpreting the Socio-Economic Rights in Sections 26 and 27[2]

(a) The relation between the first and second subsections of sections 26 and 27

In Grootboom, the Court established its approach to the interpretation of section 26. Owing to the similar drafting style, this approach is also applicable to section 27. In the first instance, the Court observed that subsections (1) and (2) 'are related and must be read together'.[3] It held that the aim of the first subsection is to delineate the scope of the right. It applies to 'everyone including children'.[4] This first section also imposes an implied negative duty on the State.[5]

The second subsection 'speaks to the positive obligation imposed upon the State', requiring it 'to devise a comprehensive and workable plan to meet its obligations in terms of the subsection'.[6] The Court has emphasised that this positive duty is qualified in terms of three key elements: (a) the obligation to 'take reasonable legislative and other measures'; (b) 'to achieve the progressive realisation' of the right; and (c) 'within available resources'.[7] The second subsection thus both defines and limits the positive duties on the State.

(b) The negative duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights

The Court held that section 26(1) incorporates 'at the very least' an implied negative obligation 'placed upon the State and all other entities and persons to desist from preventing or impairing the right of access to adequate housing'.[8] The [1] See, generally, S. Liebenberg, 'The Protection of Economic and Social Rights in Domestic Legal Systems' in A Eide, C Krause & A Rosas (eds) Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Textbook (2nd Edition, 2001) 55 ('Textbook').

[2] This section is based primarily on the three major cases handed down by the Constitutional Court, interpreting sections 26 and 27. However, the principles enunciated in these three cases apply generally to socio-economic rights. How these principles engage particular rights will be dealt with in each of the chapters on specific socio-economic rights.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 34.

[4] Ibid.

[5] See § 33.5*(b)* infra (negative duties).

[6] Grootboom (supra) at para 38. The UNCESCR has emphasised the duty on the State to formulate and implement a national strategy and plan of action to fulfil socio-economic rights 'on the basis of a participatory and transparent process': GC 4 (supra) at para 12; GC 14 (supra) at para 43*(f)*.

[7] Ibid.

[8] Grootboom (supra) at para 34. Later in the judgment, the Court observed that the manner in which the eviction had been carried out in Grootboom resulted in a breach of this negative obligation. Ibid at para 88.

phrase, 'preventing or impairing' access to the relevant socio-economic rights is broader than the standard international formulation of the duty to respect socio-economic rights. The international standard engages only a direct or indirect interference with people's enjoyment of socio-economic rights.[1] 'Preventing or impairing' access to a socio-economic right could well cover policies that constitute a barrier to an individual or a group's attempt to secure access to socio-economic rights[2] — rather than the mere interference with their existing access to the rights.[3] Locating this negative obligation in sections 26(1) and 27(1) suggests that the qualifying phrases in the second subsection do not play a role in justifying the impairment of access to the relevant rights at the first stage of constitutional analysis.[4]

In TAC, the Court affirmed that the negative duty to refrain from preventing or impairing the relevant socio-economic rights, recognised in Grootboom, applied equally to section 27(1).[5] It indicated that this duty was 'relevant' to the challenges to the measures adopted by the government to combat MTCT of HIV.[6] This negative duty presumably related to the first leg of the challenge to Government's MTCT programme, namely, the prohibition of the administration of Nevirapine at public hospitals and clinics outside the research and training sites.[7] Unfortunately, the decision itself does not reflect such analytical precision. The Court's entire analysis was conducted in terms of section 27(2) — the qualified positive duty to take reasonable measures.

One interpretation of the Court's approach in TAC is that the negative duties imposed in the first subsections of sections 26 and 27 must be read as being subject to the qualifications in the second subsection. However, this reading runs counter to the widely accepted interpretation amongst commentators that negative violations of the duty to respect socio-economic rights are immediate and not subject to resource-based limitations (at least at the first stage of constitutional analysis). The duty to respect requires only State abstention or restraint.[8] It does

[1] See § 33.2*(c)*(ii) above (duty to respect, protect, promote and fulfil socio-economic rights).

[2] A good example would be TAC, where government's policy of restricting the use of Nevirapine for the prevention of MTCT of HIV to a limited number of research and training sites prevented many HIV-positive pregnant women from gaining access to the drug at public hospitals and clinics other than these designated sites. Only 10% of the population was catered for in terms of the test-site policy: TAC (supra) at para 119.

[3] Budlender AJ has held that the disconnection of an existing water supply to consumers by a local authority is prima facie a breach of its constitutional duty to respect the right of (existing) access to water, and requires constitutional justification. Residents of Bon Vista Mansions v Southern Metropolitan Local Council 2002 (6) BCLR 625 (W) at para 27.1. See also paras 11–20.

[4] See Grootboom (supra) at para 38. The Court indicates that the second subsection 'speaks to the positive obligation upon the State' [emphasis added]. It further states: 'The second [subsection] establishes and delimits the scope of the positive obligation imposed upon the State to promote access to adequate housing [emphasis added].' Ibid at para 21.

[5] TAC (supra) at para 46.

[6] Ibid.

[7] As will be recalled the second leg of the challenge related to the State's failure to implement a comprehensive programme for the prevention of MTCT of HIV. See § 33.3 supra (introduction to the cases).

[8] See, eg, Craven 'ICESCR' (supra) at 110–11.

not entail positive conduct or an investment of resources by the State. As Pierre de Vos argues, the internal limitations in the second subsections 'should never be interpreted by the courts as an invitation to water down the negative obligation engendered by the rights'.[1] If the courts accepted this characterisation of the limited insulation afforded negative obligations, it would clearly be to the advantage of litigants to frame their cases, where possible, in terms of a negative violation of socio-economic rights in the first subsection of sections 26 and 27.[2]

However, as TAC illustrates, the analysis of negative and positive duties are often closely intertwined, so much so that the Court often collapses the distinction between the two obligations. Classifying the facts of particular cases as a breach of the negative obligation under the first subsections of sections 26 and 27, or as a breach of the positive obligations under the second subsection, is thus likely to be contentious. The facts of TAC are a good illustration of this point. Was the prohibition on the prescription of Nevirapine to HIV-positive pregnant women throughout the public health sector a breach of the negative duty not to prevent or impair access to health care services, or of the positive duty to ensure reasonable access to health care services?[3] The Court made two orders relating to the first leg of the challenge to Government's prevention of MTCT policy. The first requires Government to 'remove the restrictions', an apparently negative obligation, that prevent Nevirapine from being made available at public hospitals and clinics that were not research and training sites. The second order places a positive duty on Government to '[p]ermit and facilitate' the use of Nevirapine and 'to make it available' where medically indicated.[4] The Court's order suggests that where effective access to the rights requires even a modest allocation of resources by the State, the Court will apply reasonableness review in terms of sections 26(2) and 27(2).[5]

[1] De Vos 'Pious Wishes' (supra) at 93–4. See also E de Wet 'Recent Developments Concerning the Draft Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1997) 13 SAJHR 514, 518.

[2] In Residents of Bon Vista Mansions (supra), Budlender AJ did not apply the qualifications in s 27(2) to the violations of the negative duty to 'respect' the right of access to water in terms of s 27(1)(b). In accordance with the two-stage approach to constitutional interpretation, the burden shifted to the Council to justify the breach in terms of a law of general application. In this case, the applicable law was held to be s 4(3) of the Water Services Act. See paras 20–26.

[3] The stage at which a case comes before court will often prove decisive. In Grootboom, the pleadings were framed in terms of non-fulfilment of the positive duty to ensure shelter to those who were homeless. However, if the original eviction from the private land had been challenged, the case could have revolved around the negative duty not to impair access to housing in terms of ss 26(1) or 26(3). See Grootboom (supra) at paras 88–90.

[4] TAC (supra), orders 3*(a)* and (b), at para 135.

[5] TAC (supra) at paras 67–73 and 80–81. See § 33.5*(f)* below (discussion of the reasonableness test).

(c) The socio-economic rights in sections 26(3) and 27(3)

Both sections 26 and 27 include a third subsection[1]. Neither of these subsections contain the qualifications or internal limitations found in subsections 26(2) and 27(2).

In Grootboom, the Court observed that the negative right that it read into section 26(1) 'is further spelt out in subsection (3) which prohibits arbitrary evictions'.[2] However, this section could also be the source of positive duties on the State to protect the rights in terms of section 7(2). It will be recalled that the duty to protect socio-economic rights requires the State to adopt and implement effective legislative and other measures to restrain third parties from violating the rights of others.[3] These measures would include, for example, legislation protecting people from arbitrary evictions and promoting their tenure security.[4]

The subsection (3) rights could also be the source of positive duties to fulfil the rights, for example, taking measures to establish and maintain sufficient emergency medical facilities in terms of s 27(3). Of course, if the subsection (3) rights were so extended, this positive duty would likely be subject to some kind of reasonableness test.

In Soobramoney, the Court held that the applicant's demand to receive renal dialysis treatment at a State hospital did not fall within the scope of the right against the refusal of 'emergency medical treatment' in section 27(3). It observed that the right is cast in negative terms. Its scope is thus restricted to a right to receive immediate remedial treatment that is 'necessary and available'[5] to avert harm in the case of a sudden catastrophe. It does not extend to the provision of ongoing treatment of chronic illnesses for the purpose of prolonging life.[6]

---

[1] Section 26(3) reads: 'No one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances. No legislation may permit arbitrary evictions.' Section 27(3) reads: 'No one may be refused emergency medical treatment.'

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 34.

[3] See § 33.2*(c)*(ii) above (the duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil socio-economic rights). In its GC 7 dealing with forced evictions (supra), the UNCESCR commented that legislation against forced evictions 'is an essential basis upon which to build a system of effective protection.' It went on to comment: 'Such legislation should include measures which (a) provide the greatest possible security of tenure to occupiers of houses and land; (b) conform with the Covenant; and (c) are designed to control strictly the circumstances under which evictions may be carried out? Moreover, in view of the increasing trend in some States towards the Government greatly reducing its responsibilities in the housing sector, States parties must ensure that legislative and other measures are adequate to prevent and, if appropriate, punish forced evictions carried out, without appropriate safeguards, by private persons or bodies'. At para 10.

[4] A range of legislation has been adopted to give effect to section 26(3) such as the Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997, and the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998.

[5] Soobramoney (supra) at para 20.

[6] According to the Court: 'The purpose of the right seems to be to ensure that treatment be given in an emergency, and is not frustrated by reason of bureaucratic requirements or other formalities'. Ibid.

The restriction of the scope of the right to genuine medical emergencies seems appropriate. More problematic is the suggestion that the scope of section 27(3) is confined to existing services and facilities providing emergency medical treatment. It remains to be determined to what extent section 27(3) may be relied upon to argue for a positive duty on the State to establish emergency medical facilities where none previously existed. Similarly, it is an open question whether this provision can be relied on to challenge the closure of existing emergency facilities, for example, due to budgetary cutbacks. This possibility is particularly important in circumstances where the closure results in communities being denied any access to emergency medical treatment. A purposive reading of section 27(3) does not support a purely negative interpretation thereof, which limits its scope to a denial of access to existing emergency services or facilities.[1]

It is instructive to compare our Court's approach to that of the Indian Supreme Court in Paschim.[2] The Indian Supreme Court derived the right to emergency medical treatment from the right to life protected in article 21 of the Indian Constitution. However, the judgment did not confine itself to ordering compensation to the victim for the negative violation of his right. It also focused on the positive measures needed to ensure 'that proper medical facilities are available for dealing with emergency cases'.[3] The order of the Court included far-reaching positive duties on the State to improve emergency health care infrastructure and services. In this regard the Court considered it necessary for 'a time-bound plan for providing these services' to be drawn up and implemented.[4] This case illustrates that positive measures are essential to ensuring the effective enjoyment of the right to emergency medical treatment.[5]

[1] On the contrary, as Scott & Alston point out, the purely negative interpretation given to s 27(3) would appear to make it a redundant right in the light of the negative duty on the State under s 27(1) to desist from preventing or impairing the right of access to health care services: 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 245–248. As discussed above, this negative duty was recognised in Grootboom in respect of s 26(1) (supra) at para 34. The concurring judgment of Sachs J suggests a more expansive interpretation of the values and purposes underlying s 27(3):

> The special attention given by section 27(3) to non-refusal of emergency medical treatment relates to the particular sense of shock to our notions of human solidarity occasioned by the turning away from hospital of people battered and bleeding or of those who fall victim to sudden and unexpected collapse. It provides reassurance to all members of society that accident and emergency departments will be available to deal with the unforeseeable catastrophes which could befall any person, anywhere at any time.

[Emphasis added, footnotes omitted]; Soobramoney (supra) at para 51.

[2] See Soobramoney (supra) at paras 18 and 20 (court discusses Paschim).

[3] Paschim (supra) at para 15.

[4] Ibid at para 16. For more on Paschim, see Scott & Alston 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 237, 245–248.

[5] It remains to be seen whether the negative duty imposed by section 27(3) also binds private healthcare facilities. At least the negative duty not to turn away someone in need of emergency medical treatment is capable of application to private medical facilities (see s 8(2)).

(d) The right of 'access to' socio-economic rights

The Court in Grootboom held that there was a significant difference between the right of 'access to adequate housing' in section 26(1), and the right to adequate housing protected in the ICESCR.[1] The significance attached by the Court to the formulation of 'access to' the right is twofold. First, it implies that the scope of the right extends beyond a physical structure:

> It recognises that housing entails more than bricks and mortar. It requires available land, appropriate services such as the provision of water and the removal of sewage and the financing of all of these, including the building of the house itself.[2]

Second, the Court suggests that 'access to' implies that the State must empower private individuals and organisations to provide housing. Thus the Court states that 'it is not only the State who is responsible for the provision of houses, but that other agents within our society, including individuals themselves, must be enabled by legislative and other measures to provide housing'.[3] As we have seen, the duty to protect socio-economic rights also implies that the State has a duty to take legislative and other measures to ensure that private parties do not prevent or impair vulnerable groups from enjoying access to socio-economic rights.[4] The significance of the differences in the formulation between our constitutional provisions protecting socio-economic rights and the ICESCR is more apparent than real. For example, the UN Committee reads similar obligations relating to enabling and protective strategies to facilitate access to private housing into the right to adequate housing protected in article 11 of the ICESCR.[5]

(e) Do sections 26 and 27 impose minimum core obligations on the State?

One of the most contentious issues in the development of South Africa's jurisprudence on socio-economic rights has been whether sections 26 and 27 impose minimum core obligations on the State. Crisply put, the Court has been asked to decide whether the socio-economic rights provisions in the Constitution entitle

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.

[2] Ibid. The UNCESCR has interpreted the right to adequate housing in art 11 of the ICESCR to incorporate the aforementioned elements, as well as legal security of tenure, the availability of services, materials, facilities and infrastructure and measures to ensure the affordability of housing. See GC 4 (supra) at para 8.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.

[4] See § 33.2*(c)*(ii) supra. Erika de Wet suggests that 'access to adequate housing' implies a duty to regulate the private housing sector (eg relations between landlords and tenants) to prevent excessive rents and other unacceptable practices from barring access to adequate housing: E de Wet The Constitutional Enforceability of Economic and Social Rights (1996) 118 ('Constitutional Enforceability'). An example of such legislation would be the Rental Housing Act 50 of 1999.

[5] See, for example, GC 4 (supra) at paras 8*(e)*, 14, 17.

individuals to a basic level of goods and services in particular circumstances or only a right to review the reasonableness of government's social programmes.

(i) Grootboom: Rejecting minimum core as a primary basis for adjudicating socio-economic rights

In Grootboom, the amici curiae[1] invited the Constitutional Court to endorse an interpretation of section 26 that would impose minimum core obligations on the State. Although the parties to the case had based their arguments on section 28(1)(c), the amici broadened the issues before the Court to include a consideration of section 26 of the Constitution.[2] They pointed to the unjust results of the reasoning of the Court a quo: namely the exclusion of adults without children from shelter in crisis situations while those with children obtained relief. A central concern of the amici was to advance an interpretation that would reconcile the qualified rights of 'everyone' to adequate housing in section 26 with the unqualified right of children to shelter in section 28(1)(c). They did so by arguing as follows:

1. Section 26(1) read with (2) imposes a minimum core obligation on the State to ensure that those who are truly homeless and in crisis situations receive some rudimentary form of shelter. The State has a burden to demonstrate that it has used all resources at its disposal to satisfy, as a matter of priority, its minimum core obligations. The amici derived support for this core obligation from the interpretation by the UNCESCR of the nature of States parties' obligations under the ICESCR.[3]
2. Section 28(1)(c) is a specific manifestation of this minimum core obligation, and places it beyond doubt that the basic socio-economic needs of children in especially vulnerable circumstances must be satisfied.

The amici located the core within a continuum of positive obligations imposed on the State in section 26(1) read with (2):

> This does not imply that only the 'core' is subject to adjudication, or that meeting the minimum core requirements would satisfy all of the obligations on the State? The 'core' provides a level of minimum compliance to which resources have to be devoted as a matter of priority. This duty clearly has to be balanced with the obligation to put into operation programmes aimed at full realisation of the right, and to move progressively towards full realisation.[4]

[1] The amici were the South African Human Rights Commission and the Community Law Centre (University of the Western Cape) ('CLC'), represented by Geoff Budlender of the Legal Resources Centre. The written submissions are available on-line at: www.communitylawcentre.org.za/ser/docs_2002/Grootboom_Heads_of_Arguments.doc.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 18.

[3] See GC 3 (supra) at para 10:

> The Committee is of the view that a minimum core obligation to ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels of each of the rights is incumbent upon every State party . . . In order for a State party to be able to attribute its failure to meet at least its minimum core obligations to a lack of available resources it must demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations.

[4] Heads of argument on behalf of the amici curiae, 10 September 2002 (supra) at para 27.

The Constitutional Court agreed that the foundational values of our society — human dignity, equality and freedom — are denied to those who lack access to socio-economic rights.[1]

Despite this point of departure, the Court was not prepared to endorse the notion of a minimum core obligation in relation to section 26. It rejected a minimum core largely on the grounds that it would be difficult to determine in the abstract what the minimum threshold should be for the realisation of the rights as the opportunities for fulfilling these rights varied considerably,[2] and needs were diverse.[3] The only role envisaged by the Court for the concept of minimum core obligations was possibly as a factor in assessing the reasonableness of the measures adopted by the State in particular cases (the standard of review ultimately adopted).[4] However, it would be necessary to place sufficient information before a court 'to enable it to determine the minimum core in any given context'.[5] In this particular context, the Court rejected the arguments of the amici to the effect that section 26(2) read with section 26(1) imposed a minimum core obligation on the State.

(ii) TAC: no minimum core obligation under section 27(1)

In TAC, two of the amici curiae adopted a different tack in attempting to persuade the Court to accept the notion of a minimum core.[6] They argued that every individual is entitled to a basic core of health care services comprising the minimum necessary for dignified human existence in terms of section 27(1) read with [1] Grootboom (supra) at para 23. The Court also wrote that the State's constitutional obligations in relation to housing are 'of fundamental importance to the development of South Africa's new constitutional order'. Ibid at para 1.

[2] 'These will vary according to factors such as income, unemployment, availability of land and poverty.' Ibid at para 32.

[3] '. . . [T]here are those who need land; others need both land and houses; yet others need financial assistance.' Ibid at para 33.

[4] The Court wrote: 'There may be cases where it may be possible and appropriate to have regard to the content of a minimum core obligation to determine whether the measures taken by the State are reasonable.' Ibid at para 33.

[5] Ibid at para 33.

[6] The CLC (UWC) and IDASA. The submissions of the amici are available on-line at: www.community lawcentre.org.za/ser/docs_2002/TAC_MTCT_Case_Heads_of_Arguments.doc.

the duty to fulfil the rights in section 7(2).[1] According to this line of argument, the core right is not subject to the limitations of resource constraints and progressive realisation under section 27(2). Over and above this minimum core entitlement, the State is obliged, in terms of section 27(2), to take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve progressively the full realisation of the relevant rights. In other words, section 27(2) is not exhaustive of the State's positive duties. Instead, it supplements the unqualified core duty in terms of section 27(1) to ensure basic levels of the relevant rights with a qualified obligation to achieve more extensive levels of enjoyment of the rights over time.[2]

They further argued that a purposive approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights supported a core entitlement to a basic level of services consistent with human dignity.[3] A purposive approach meant that the courts must attend to the 'practical justiciability' of a right. That is, no provision should be interpreted in a way that makes its enforcement practically impossible. If section 27(2) is interpreted to be exhaustive of the State's positive duties, individual right holders have no direct right to claim anything specific from the State. They can only demand that the State take reasonable measures within its available resources in terms of section 26(2) and 27(2).[4] Grootboom made it clear that any cause of action under the latter provisions 'would almost always be a matter of such factual and legal complexity as to be beyond the capacity of individual right holders, even if they have the benefit of legal representation'.[5]

In the context of the case, the amici argued that the minimum core of health care services to which everyone is entitled to have access includes the provision of Nevirapine to pregnant women with HIV and to their newborn babies. The costs are relatively minor, the potential benefits to mother and child overwhelming.

[1] The position of the amici was summarised as follows by the Court in TAC (supra) at para 28:

> This minimum core might not be easy to define, but includes at least the minimum decencies of life consistent with human dignity. No one should be condemned to a life below the basic level of dignified human existence. The very notion of individual rights presupposes that anyone in that position should be able to obtain relief from a court.

[2] Although the amici agreed that the two subsections of s 27 must be read together, they argued that they should 'not be conflated in a way that deprives subsection (1) of its normative content and reduces it to a mere definition used in the description of the duties imposed on the State in subsection (2).' [Submissions of the CLC and IDASA, April 2003, paras 14 and 23.]

[3] Ibid at paras 30–31.

[4] Ibid at para 26.

[5] Ibid at para 31.

Denying access to the drug to those who are too poor to afford it would be a failure to respect their dignity and intrinsic worth as human beings.[1]

The Constitutional Court rejected this entire line of argument. It held that neither the drafting of the relevant sections, nor a purposive approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights supported the interpretation advanced by the amici. It reaffirmed that section 27(2) defines and limits the full extent of the positive obligations imposed by section 27(1).[2] There is no separate positive right under section 27(1).[3] This means that all positive obligations on the State from the most basic to more extensive levels of fulfilment will be subject to the qualifications in the second subsections of sections 26 and 27.[4]

According to the Court, a purposive reading of section 27 'does not lead to any other conclusion'. It is simply 'impossible to give everyone access even to a 'core' service immediately'.[5] All that can be expected from the State 'is that it act reasonably to provide access to the socio-economic rights identified in sections 26 and 27 on a progressive basis'.[6] The Court confirmed the approach adopted in Grootboom. The minimum core might be relevant to the assessment of the reasonableness of the measures adopted by the State in particular cases, but did not constitute 'a self-standing right conferred on everyone under section 26(1)'.[7]

The Court was at pains to demonstrate that its interpretation of these provisions as developed in Grootboom was consistent with the institutional capabilities and functions of courts in a constitutional democracy. It wrote that courts are not 'institutionally equipped to make the wide-ranging factual and political enquiries necessary for determining what the minimum core standards?should be'.[8] Courts are also 'ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where court orders could have

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 60. They also referred in support of the above to the core obligations identified by the UNCESCR in respect the right to health under art 12 of the ICESCR. See GC 14 (supra) at paras 43–4.

[2] Thus the reference to 'this right' in s 26(2) and 'each of these rights' in s 27(2) refers to the rights in ss 26(1) and 27(1) respectively. See TAC (supra) at paras 29–31.

[3] Ibid at para 39.

[4] According to the Court:

> Sections 27(1) and 27(2) must be read together as defining the scope of the positive rights that everyone has and the corresponding obligations on the State to 'respect, protect and fulfil' such rights. The rights conferred by sections 26(1) and 27(1) are to have 'access' to the services that the State is obliged to provide in terms of sections 26(2) and 27(2). Ibid at para 39.

[5] Ibid at para 35.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at para 34 referring with approval to Grootboom (supra) at para 33.

[8] Ibid at para 37

multiple social and economic consequences for the community'.[1] While determinations of reasonableness may have budgetary implications, they were not directly aimed at 'rearranging budgets'.[2]

(iii) Critiques of the Court's approach

The Court's rejection of the notion of minimum core obligations has attracted a substantial amount of criticism.[3]

Theunis Roux criticises the Court's failure to require the State to prioritise the basic needs of vulnerable groups in accordance with the approach of the UNCESCR in relation to minimum core obligations.[4] He reads this approach as requiring the State to devote all the resources as its disposal first to satisfy its minimum core obligations. He thus argues that the Court failed to engage in 'priority-setting' in the strict sense of requiring the basic needs of vulnerable groups to be met before 'expending scarce resources on relatively privileged groups (temporal prioritisation)'.[5] Although the Court held that a government programme that did not cater for those in desperate need would fail the constitutional standard of reasonableness[6], Roux argues that the required standard is 'merely inclusion':

> Nothing is said about how the State ought to apportion its efforts between competing significant segments or, more importantly, between significant and not so significant segments of society.[7]

In sum, provided the State programme caters in some way for those in desperate need and a reasonable proportion of resources is made available to this

[1] TAC (supra) at para 38.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Prior to the Grootboom judgment, a number of scholars had argued in favour of an implied minimum core obligation in sections 26 and 27. See Scott & Maklem 'Ropes of Sand' (supra) at 77; Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 41-43; De Vos 'Pious Wishes' (supra) at 97; G Van Buren 'Alleviating Poverty through the Constitutional Court' (1999) 15 SAJHR 52, 57; Scott & Alston 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 250. For an argument against the concept of a minimum core obligation, see De Wet 'Constitutional Enforceability' (supra) at 105–117.
[4] T Roux 'Understanding Grootboom – A Response to Cass R Sunstein' (2002) 12 Constitutional Forum 41, 47 ('Understanding Grootboom'). See also C Sunstein 'Social and Economic Rights? Lessons from South Africa' (2001) 11 Constitutional Forum 123. Sunstein praises the Court's approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights as developed in Grootboom for requiring Government to pay 'close attention to the human interests at stake, and sensible priority-setting, but without mandating protection for each person whose socio-economic needs are at risk'. Ibid at 123.
[5] Roux 'Understanding Grootboom' (supra) at 46.
[6] Grootboom (supra) at paras 44, 56, 66 and 68.
[7] at 49.

group, the programme will pass the reasonableness test even though the overall programme may provide greater benefits to more advantaged social groups.[1]

David Bilchitz takes issue with the Court's characterisation of the minimum core obligation in Grootboom as involving complex questions as to the definition of the obligation in the context of the diverse needs and opportunities for the enjoyment of socio-economic rights by different groups. He argues the Court fails to distinguish between 'the invariant, universal standard' that must be met in order for an obligation to be fulfilled, and the varied particular methods that can be adopted to fulfil this standard, and thus comply with a constitutional obligation.[2] He argues that the minimum core obligation represents 'the standard of socio-economic provision necessary to meet people's basic needs'. These needs consist of 'the universal preconditions necessary for human survival'.[3] The obligation to ensure that these needs are met thus represents the universal constitutional standard to which the State must conform. What varies is the ability of different groups in society to access these needs, and thus the measures required of the State to fulfil its obligations in concrete cases. Vulnerable groups 'who are less able to meet their needs from their own resources . . . require greater assistance from the State'.[4] In assessing whether there has been a violation of the minimum core obligation, the actual circumstances of the group affected is thus a relevant factor.[5] Vulnerable groups experiencing severe socio-economic deprivation would have a directly enforceable right to a basic level of material assistance from the State.[6]

Bilchitz views the minimum core obligation as one of two components of the duties imposed by the phrase, 'progressive realisation', in the second subsections of sections 26 and 27. This component requires the State to prioritise the fulfilment of the urgent survival needs of people. The second component refers to the more maximal interest people have in being able to live in 'an environment that is

[1] Roux illustrates this point through a case study of the government's new land distribution policy (as amended in June 2000) which, it is argued, will have the inevitable consequence 'that resources will be diverted away from funding grants to the rural poor towards funding grants to the relatively well off'. Roux 'Understanding Grootboom' (supra) at 47-50.

[2] D Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-Economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and its Importance' (2002) 118 SALJ 484, 487 ('Teeth').

[3] Ibid at 488. He broadens this slightly (at 490) in his discussion of the basic interests that people have in housing to: '. . . an interest in being free from threats to one's survival, being free from severe physical suffering, and not being exposed to serious health risks that impair one's ability to act'.

[4] Ibid at 489.

[5] This is consistent with the interpretation of the UNCESCR of the duty to fulfil socio-economic rights: see GC 12 (supra) at para 15, and GC 14 (supra) at para 37. Another example of where the vulnerable status of the group in question is a factor in determining whether there has been a violation of a constitutional right is the contextual enquiry into whether discrimination is unfair in the circumstances. See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 112; Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 308 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at paras 50–53.

[6] See Scott & Macklem 'Ropes of Sand' (supra) at 77: 'In effect, a priority of attention is mandated for people who would not be able to meet the most basic of health, nutrition and housing needs without direct government assistance. People who would die or suffer serious consequences for their health if no assistance were immediately forthcoming fit in this category.'

conducive to their flourishing and development on physical, emotional and mental levels'.[1] In respect of the latter interest, the State's duty is to improve gradually over time the 'adequacy' (quality) of the basic standard of housing which was guaranteed to all under the first component.

Expanding on this interpretation in a later article, Bilchitz contends that the right in question gives rise to two obligations: 'the first is to realise a certain minimum level of provision without delay, and the second is to improve the level of provision beyond this lower threshold by taking reasonable measures to meet a higher threshold that must be attained if the right is to be fully realised'.[2]

Finally, he takes issue with the Court's contention that a purposive reading of sections 26 and 27 does not support the minimum core obligation due to the impossibility of its fulfilment. According to Bilchitz, the minimum core approach 'is a means to specifying priorities'.[3] It requires the State to give priority to meeting the urgent survival needs of people:

> The approach thus does not expect an overnight solution to the problem of poverty; rather, it specifies a method by which the problem is to be dealt with. This method involves initially raising everyone to a position in which they have sufficient resources to survive and then developing the quality of the services and goods to which they are entitled to have access as resources permit.[4]

Bilchitz points out that the approach developed by the UNCESCR in GC 3 is not an absolute standard, but allows for a situation where fulfilment of core obligations may be genuinely impossible.[5] It places a burden on the State to show that it has marshalled 'all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority,' its minimum core obligations.[6] In other words, the State bears a heavy, but not impossible, burden of showing that resources are demonstrably inadequate to meet these needs.[7] In our own constitutional context, this can occur at the first stage of constitutional inquiry if the proviso in sections 26(2) and 27(2), 'within available resources', is read to apply also to minimum core obligations.[8] The State also has the possibility of relying on the general

[1] Bilchitz 'Teeth' (supra) at para 490.

[2] D Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach to the Minimum Core: Laying the Foundations for Future Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 19 SAJHR 1 at 11 ('Laying the Foundations'). He furthermore argues that the notion of a higher degree of protection for 'core' interests is not unique to the field of socio-economic rights, but also has application in the area of a civil right such as the right to privacy. Ibid at 14. This bears similarities with the argument presented by the amici in Grootboom. See § 33.5*(e)*(i) supra.

[3] Bilchitz 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 15.

[4] Ibid at 16.

[5] Indeed, Bilchitz also criticises as overly rigid a later General Comment of the Committee, which states that 'a State party cannot, under any circumstances whatsoever, justify its non-compliance with the core obligations? which are non-derogable'. GC 14 (supra) at para 47. See Bilchitz 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 17.

[6] GC 3 (supra) at para 10.

[7] In this context, it is clearly inadequate for the Court to confine its inquiry to existing budgetary allocations. These might have been made without proper consideration of constitutional priorities.

[8] This approach accords more with the one adopted by the amici in Grootboom. Locating the minimum core in s 27(1) as argued by the amici in TAC, suggests that justification could only take place in terms of s 36.

limitation clause in section 36(1) to show that its failure to satisfy minimum core obligations is due to genuine lack of resources or capacity. In contrast to the approach of the UNCESCR, requiring proof from the State of its inability to fulfil minimum core obligations, the Constitutional Court simply accepts, without requiring evidence, that it would be impossible to give everyone access to basic services immediately.[1]

It could be argued that the Court has implicitly accepted the notion of minimum core through the component of the reasonableness test that requires short-term relief for those in desperate need.[2] However, an essential difference between the minimum core approach and the reasonableness test as developed in Grootboom is that reasonableness review does not appear to confer a right upon any individual to claim concrete goods and services from the State.[3] The right recognised in Grootboom is a right to demand that the State adopt a reasonable programme. Such a programme must include a component that ensures relief for a significant number of desperate people, although not all of them need receive it immediately.[4]

This distinction has practical implications for poor individuals or communities who want to use litigation as a tool to gain access to socio-economic rights. It means that they will not receive any direct individual relief, although they may indirectly benefit from a positive order handed down by the courts. As Scott and Alston point out, individual claimants 'will understandably wish to see something geared more to their own situation and are unlikely to wish to bring constitutional cases purely to serve as constitutional triggers for general policy processes'.[5]

Furthermore, individual claimants bear a heavy evidentiary burden to show that government's programmes are unreasonable. They will have to review a wide range of measures adopted by the State and to assess their reasonableness in the light of its available resources. In the context of section 26, litigants will

[1] In a country such as South Africa with its highly unequal distribution of income and resources, the State would be hard pressed to demonstrate that it is unable to afford ensuring that each person has essential survival levels of socio-economic rights. In fact it is arguable that State policy is committed to guaranteeing a core of certain basic services such as water to each person. See, for example, J de Visser, E Cottle & J Mettler 'Realising the Right of Access to Water: Pipe Dream or Watershed?' (2003) 7 Law, Democracy & Development 27, 33.

[2] Bilchitz claims that that Yacoob J succeeds in reaching the conclusion he does 'by implicitly building the idea of a minimum core obligation into the notion of reasonableness'. Bilchitz 'Teeth' (supra) at 498.

[3] See Grootboom (supra) at para 95: 'Neither section 26 nor section 28 entitles the respondents to claim shelter or housing immediately upon demand'. See also TAC (supra) at para 125. For a discussion of the implications of the Court's rejection of the concept of minimum core, see S Liebenberg 'South Africa's Evolving Jurisprudence on Socio-Economic Rights: An Effective Tool in Challenging Poverty?' 2002 6 Law Democracy & Development 159.

[4] See Grootboom (supra) at paras 65 and 68, and the critique by Bilchitz 'Teeth' (supra) at 499: 'This is one of the prime reasons for the protection of socio-economic entitlements in the form of rights. Collective goals cannot outweigh protections for the most basic interests of individuals.'

[5] Scott & Alston 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 254–255.

have to consider not only all aspects of the national housing programme, but also a wide range of social programmes adopted by the State.[1]

In contrast, under the minimum core approach, the burden of proof is in favour of the individual litigant seeking relief. The individual will establish a prima facie violation once she shows (1) that she lacks access to basic subsistence needs; and (2) that these basic needs (eg food) are neither physically nor economically accessible to her. The State then has the burden of showing that it has marshalled all available resources to satisfy its core obligations as a matter of priority.[2] In effect, it would be required to show that resource constraints make it impossible to provide access to essential levels of socio-economic rights for those who are unable by themselves to secure such access.[3]

There are ample constitutional mechanisms to ensure that the minimum core does not impose unrealistic demands on the State. First the State may advance convincing reasons as to why it should not be required to fulfil the minimum core in the circumstances raised by a case. If the minimum core obligation is derived from the second subsections of sections 26 and 27, the State can rely on a genuine shortage of resources to show that it is impossible to fulfil this core obligation. As noted, the State also has a further opportunity in terms of section 36 to justify a limitation to its obligation to fulfil core entitlements.

Moreover, an acceptance of the concept of minimum core obligations does not require the Court to define in abstract the basket of goods and services that must be provided. Instead. it could define the general principles underlying the concept of minimum core obligations in relation to socio-economic rights and apply these on a case-by-case basis. This approach also implies that a Court need not prescribe in exacting detail, in every case, the precise services that must be rendered to remedy the violation. A Court could do what the High Court did in Grootboom. It could indicate the broad parameters of what is required to remedy the breach, while leaving a margin of discretion to the State to decide on the most appropriate means of fulfilling its core obligations.[4] In a situation of a community facing starvation. this discretion would allow the State to choose between, for example, cash grants, food vouchers or the direct delivery of food parcels to the affected community.[5]

[1] Among the measures that the Court indicated would be relevant in promoting access to housing were steps 'to make the rural areas of our country more viable so as to limit the inexorable migration of people from rural to urban areas in search of jobs': Grootboom (supra) at para 34. It also indicated that social assistance programmes put in place under s 27 'would be relevant to the State's obligations in respect of other socio-economic rights'. Ibid at para 36.

[2] GC 3 (supra) at para 10.

[3] See, for example, GC 12 (supra) at para 17.

[4] The High Court did this through the medium of a supervisory order: Grootboom (supra) 291– 294.

[5] Both s 38 and s 172(1)(b) vest the courts with a wide discretion to formulate appropriate remedies and to make any order that is 'just and equitable'. Practical obstacles to providing immediate relief can thus be dealt with through formulating an appropriately flexible remedy, eg a supervisory order. For a discussion see Bilchitz of the application of a temporary suspension order in the context of minimum core obligations, 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 18–19.

(iv) A future role for minimum core obligations?

As we have seen, the only role envisaged by the Court for minimum core obligations is as a factor in assessing the reasonableness of government measures.[1] This possible role of the minimum core does not relieve individuals of the formidable burden of establishing the unreasonableness of the State's social programmes, nor does it necessarily entitle them to direct individual relief. Nonetheless it does provide an important opportunity for asserting minimum core obligations as essential components of a reasonable government programme.

Supporters of the minimum core obligation could also argue that a failure to fulfil minimum core socio-economic rights obligations renders a government programme prima facie unreasonable. The burden would then shift to the State to show why a failure to fulfil core obligations is not unreasonable. This would go some way to improving the practical justiciability of socio-economic rights for disadvantaged groups.

(f) Opting for reasonableness review

(i) Soobramoney: The standard of rationality

Having dismissed the appellant's claim under section 27(3), the Court in Soobramoney proceeded to consider his claim under section 27(1)(a), read with (2).[2] The Court indicated that a large margin of discretion would be given to the setting of budgetary priorities by the provincial government, and the 'difficult decisions' made by the hospital administrators in the context of limited resources:

> A court will be slow to interfere with rational decisions taken in good faith by the political organs and medical authorities whose responsibilities it is to deal with such matters.[3]

It held that there was no suggestion that the guidelines drawn up by the hospital authorities for determining which patients qualified for dialysis treatment were unreasonable, or that they had not been applied 'fairly and rationally' in the applicant's case.[4] The Court thus declined to order the provision of dialysis treatment.

This result heralded the Court's adoption of a model of reasonableness review in respect of socio-economic rights' claims under section 27 (and, by implication, section 26).[5] However, the real dispute was not whether the medical authorities

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 33. See also TAC (supra) at para 34.
[2] Soobramoney (supra) at para 22.
[3] Soobramoney (supra) at para 29.
[4] Ibid at para 25.
[5] This model of review is similar to the one proposed by Etienne Mureinik in his seminal article in the SAJHR arguing for the inclusion of socio-economic rights in the Bill of Rights. See: 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries' (supra) at 472-474. According to Danie Brand, this amounts to a 'means-end justificatory model' which asks the basic question whether a particular policy or programme can be justified and 'it will be justified if it is reasonably related to the constitutionally prescribed goal of providing access to' the various socio-economic rights. Within this justificatory model, the Court may use a different 'standard of scrutiny' to interrogate the link between the policy measure and the goal. Thus, in Soobramoney, he argues that the standard used was one of simple rationality: the court 'simply asked whether the policy was rationally conceived and applied in good faith.' D Brand 'The Proceduralisation of South African Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence or "What are Socio-Economic Rights for?" ' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt (eds) Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2004) 33 at 40.

had devised rational guidelines for rationing access to the dialysis treatment that was currently available, but whether sufficient funds had been allocated to provide dialysis treatment to those persons in the appellant's position.[1] A key factor in the Court's reasoning was clearly the degree of interference in social and budgetary policies that an order requiring the State to provide dialysis treatment to the applicant and to all other persons similarly situated would require. The principle would have to be applied not only to all persons suffering from chronic renal failure, but also 'to all patients claiming access to expensive medical treatment or expensive drugs'.[2] This in turn would require the health budget 'to be dramatically increased to the prejudice of other needs which the State has to meet'.[3] While indicating that a wide latitude would be afforded to the State in setting its social and budgetary priorities, scant guidance was provided on the standard of 'rationality review' to be applied and the nature of the circumstances in which the Court would be prepared to intervene.[4] While Soobramoney judgment was critiqued for the thinness of its analysis, few took issue with the ultimate finding of the Court that there was no universal right to kidney dialysis treatment under present conditions.[5]

(ii) Grootboom: Developing the principles of 'reasonableness review'

The High Court in Grootboom held that there was no violation of section 26. According to the court, the respondents had produced 'clear evidence' of a 'rational' housing programme 'designed to solve a pressing problem in the context of scarce financial resources'.[6] It went on, however, to decide in favour of the applicants on the basis of the unqualified right of children to shelter in section 28(1)(c).[7]

On appeal, the Constitutional Court decided the case on the basis of section 26. Having rejected the notion of a minimum core obligation, the Constitutional Court pronounced that the relevant inquiry with regard to the positive duties imposed by section 26 is whether the legislative and other measures taken by the State to realise the rights are reasonable.[8] It emphasised that reasonableness

[1] Soobramony (supra) at para 23.
[2] Ibid at para 28.
[3] Ibid.
[4] For, example, classic rationality review generally requires that the Court do no more than inquire whether the relevant policy or legislation bears a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose. This is the standard applied in relation to the first stage of the discrimination inquiry under section 9(1) of the Final Constitution: see Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at paras 50-53.
[5] See, for example: D Moellendorf 'Reasoning about Resources: Soobramoney and the Future of Socio-Economic Rights Claims' (1998) 14 SAJHR 327 ('Reasoning about Resources'); Scott & Alston 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 233-256. For a discussion of the application of the right to life in the Soobramoney judgment, see M Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red: Socio-Economic Dimensions of the Right to Life in South Africa' (1999) 15 SAJHR 372, 380–385.
[6] Grootboom I (supra) at 286H–I. The High Court relied on the Soobramoney judgment in support of its application of the rationality review standard.
[7] See § 33.7 infra (on children's socio-economic rights).
[8] Grootboom (supra) at para 33.

review does not entail a court substituting its view as to what constitutes a reasonable measure to realise socio-economic rights. Government has the latitude to adopt any particular policy choice it deems fit provided it meets the requirement of reasonableness.[1]

The Court proceeded to flesh out the standard of reasonableness to be applied in assessing the State's compliance with its positive obligations to realise socio-economic rights. It identified a number of factors that it would consider in reviewing the reasonableness of a government programme in the context of socio-economic rights:

1. The programme must be a comprehensive and co-ordinated one, which clearly allocates responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensures that 'the appropriate financial and human resources are available'.[2] Although each sphere of government is responsible for implementing parts of the programme, national government has the overarching responsibility for ensuring that the programme is adequate to meeting the State's constitutional obligations.[3]
2. The programme 'must be capable of facilitating the realisation of the right'.[4]
3. Policies and programmes must be reasonable 'both in their conception and their implementation'.[5]
4. The programme must be 'balanced and flexible and make appropriate provision for attention to housing crises and to short-, medium- and long-term needs'. A reasonable programme cannot exclude 'a significant segment of society'.[6]
5. The programme must include a component that responds to the urgent needs of those in desperate situations. Thus a reasonable programme, even though it is statistically successful in improving access to housing, cannot 'leave out of account the degree and extent of the denial of the right they endeavour to realise'.[7] Elsewhere in the judgment more detail is provided on what this component requires. Thus the State must 'plan, budget and monitor the fulfilment of immediate needs and the management of crises'.[8] According to the Court:

[1] The Court wrote:

> A court considering reasonableness will not enquire whether other more desirable or favourable measures could have been adopted, or whether public money could have been better spent. The question would be whether the measures that have been adopted are reasonable. It is necessary to recognise that a wide range of possible measures could be adopted by the State to meet its obligations. Many of these would meet the requirement of reasonableness. Once it is shown that the measures do so, this requirement is met.

Grootboom (supra) at para 41.

[2] Ibid at para 39.
[3] Ibid at para 40.
[4] Ibid at para 41.
[5] Ibid at para 42.
[6] Ibid at para 43.
[7] Ibid at para 44.
[8] Ibid at para 68.

> This must ensure that a significant number of desperate people in need are afforded relief, though not all of them need receive it immediately.[1]

The Court justified this central component of a reasonable programme on the basis that we value human beings and the Constitution requires us to treat everyone with 'care and concern'.[2] A society based on human dignity, equality and freedom 'must seek to ensure that the basic necessities of life are provided to all'.[3]

It was on the basis of this final criterion that the government's housing programme was faulted. After a comprehensive evaluation of the State's housing programme, the Court concluded that it represented 'a major achievement'[4] and 'a systematic approach to a pressing social need'.[5] However, it failed to meet the Constitutional test of reasonableness in that it was focused only on medium- and long-term objectives and did not include measures to provide short-term relief to those in desperate need.[6] The Court declared that the State housing programme did not comply with section 26(2):

> . . . in that it failed to make reasonable provision within its available resources for people in the Cape Metropolitan area with no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who were living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations.[7]

The Court did not leave the State entirely to its own devices in designing a suitable remedy. It made express reference to the Accelerated Managed Land Settlement Programme (which had been drafted, but not implemented by the Cape Metropolitan Council). It was cited as the kind of measure that would be deemed to be appropriate for this type of short-term relief.[8]

(iii) TAC: Applying the 'reasonableness' test

The TAC and the other applicants alleged that the State programme for preventing MTCT transmission of HIV was unreasonable in two respects. In the first place, it unreasonably prohibited the administration of Nevirapine at public hospitals and clinics outside the limited number of research and training sites (two in each province). Secondly, the State had failed to formulate and implement a comprehensive national programme to prevent or reduce MTCT of HIV. In granting the orders sought by the applicant in substantially the terms sought, the High Court (Transvaal Provincial Division) followed the reasoning in Grootboom.[9] [1] Grootboom (supra) at 68.

---

[2] Ibid at para 44.
[3] Ibid. See also para 83 of the judgment on the relationship between human dignity and assessing the reasonableness of the State's conduct in terms of s 26.
[4] Ibid at para 53.
[5] Ibid at para 54.
[6] Ibid at para 69.
[7] Ibid at para 99 (the order, 2*(c)*).
[8] Ibid at paras 99 (the order, 2*(b)*). See also paras 60–61, and 67.
[9] Treatment Action Campaign & others v Minister of Health & others 2002 (4) BCLR 356 (T) ('TAC (High Court)').

The High Court (per Botha J) held that the policy prohibiting the use of Nevirapine outside the 18 pilot sites in the public health sector constituted 'an unjustifiable barrier to the progressive realisation of the right to health care'.[1] It breached the negative duty to desist from impairing the right to health care.[2] The High Court further held that the State's current MTCT-prevention programme failed the reasonableness test as it did not constitute a comprehensive and co-ordinated plan to prevent or reduce the MTCT of HIV. The State was not prepared to give an 'unqualified commitment to reach the rest of the population in any given time or at any given rate'.[3] According to Botha J, a programme that is 'open-ended and that leaves everything for the future cannot be said to be coherent, progressive and purposeful'.[4]

A bold feature of the judgment is the rejection of the State's arguments that the availability of resources would determine whether there would be a further roll out of a national MTCT-prevention programme. According to Botha J, the obligation to formulate a coherent plan to roll out such a national programme existed independently of the availability of resources. Only once such a plan existed could 'will it be possible to obtain the further resources that are required for a nation-wide programme, whether in the form of a reorganisation of priorities or by means of further budgetary allocations'.[5] The availability of resources could only have an influence on the pace of the extension of the MTCT programme, not on the obligation to devise and implement such a plan.[6]

On appeal, the Constitutional Court considered and rejected the range of reasons advanced by the government for restricting the administration of Nevirapine to the research and training sites.[7] These justifications ranged from doubts about the efficacy of Nevirapine where 'a comprehensive package of care' could not be made available[8], the development of resistance to the drug, the drug's safety, to technical and administrative capacity and budgetary concerns.[9]

The Court found that the policy of restricting the provision of Nevirapine impacted seriously on a significant group of HIV-positive mothers and children who did not have access to the research sites. As they were too poor to purchase Nevirapine, they were effectively deprived of access to a 'simple, cheap and

[1] TAC High Court (supra) at 384E.

[2] Ibid. In this respect the Court applied the negative duties recognised in Grootboom (supra) at para 34. See § 33.5*(b)* above (the negative duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights).

[3] TAC High Court (supra) at 385D–E.

[4] Ibid at 385F.

[5] Ibid at 386C.

[6] Ibid at 386B–C.

[7] TAC (supra) at paras 48–66.

[8] This package would include counselling, provision of formula milk as a substitute for breastfeeding, antibiotic treatment, vitamin supplements, and monitoring, during bottle-feeding, the mother and children who have received Nevirapine. Ibid at para 49.

[9] Ibid at paras 51–66.

potentially life-saving medical intervention'.[1] This restrictive policy was unreasonable because it was inflexible[2] and did not take into account the needs of a particularly vulnerable group.[3] The Court also held that it was implicit that 'a policy of waiting for a protracted period before taking a decision on the use of Nevirapine beyond the research and training sites' was also unreasonable.[4] Government was thus ordered 'without delay' to 'remove the restrictions' that prevent the use of Nevirapine in the reduction of MTCT of HIV at public hospitals and clinics, and to 'permit and facilitate' its use.[5] It was specifically ordered to make the drug available for this purpose at hospitals and clinics where this is medically indicated, 'which shall if necessary include that the mother concerned has been appropriately tested and counselled'.[6]

In relation to the second prong of the attack on government policy (the failure to adopt and implement a comprehensive MTCT-prevention plan), the Court held that the rigidity of government's policy regarding the restrictive use of Nevirapine affected its whole policy on MTCT of HIV.[7] At the time of the commencement of the proceedings a comprehensive policy for testing and counselling HIV-positive pregnant women was in place, but it was not implemented uniformly.[8] The Court held that the training of counsellors should now include training for counselling on the use of Nevirapine. In addition, government was ordered to take reasonable measures to extend the testing and counselling facilities at public hospitals and clinics throughout the public health sector 'to facilitate and expedite' the use of Nevirapine for the purposes of reducing the risk of MTCT of HIV.[9]

Unlike the High Court, the Constitutional Court declined to make an order relating to the provision of formula milk. In the Court's view it raised 'complex issues', and there was not sufficient evidence to justify an order that formula feed 'be made available by the government on request and without charge in every case'.[10]

A welcome feature of the judgment is the addition of the requirement of transparency to the constitutional requirement of reasonableness.[11] It held that

[1] TAC (supra) at para 73.
[2] Ibid at para 80.
[3] The Court considered poverty to be an important indicator of the vulnerability of the group in question: 'There is a difference in the positions of those who can afford to pay for services and those who cannot. State policy must take account of these differences.' Ibid at para 70.
[4] Ibid at para 81.
[5] Ibid at para 135 (orders 3*(a)* and 3*(b)*).
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid at paras 82, 95.
[8] Ibid at para 90.
[9] Ibid at paras 95 and 135 (orders 3*(c)* and (d)).
[10] Ibid at para 128. The complexities referred to include the risks to the infant of using formula milk when the mother does not have easy access to clean water or the ability to bottle feed safely because of her personal circumstances.
[11] The Court reasoned 'Indeed, for a public programme such as this to meet the constitutional requirement of reasonableness, its contents must be known appropriately.' Ibid at para 123.

the enormous challenge that HIV/AIDS poses to all sectors of society could only be met if there is 'proper communication, especially by government'. In order for a programme to be 'implemented optimally' its contents must be made known to all stakeholders. In this context, the Court regretted the fact that national government and six provinces had not disclosed any programme to extend access to Nevirapine treatment to prevent MTCT of HIV.[1]

The TAC case illustrates how the Grootboom jurisprudence of reasonableness review can be used strategically to support a broader campaign to advance access to socio-economic rights. The TAC had the organisational resources and capacity to demonstrate the unreasonableness of government's policies relating to MTCT of HIV. They were able to produce an impressive array of expert medical, public health and economics evidence to support their case.

(iv) Evaluating 'reasonableness review'

Theunis Roux has observed that the standard of reasonableness review developed by the Court in Grootboom, although it incorporates 'means-end rationality' as a minimum requirement, is a stricter standard.[2] Although the Court will not require Government to adopt a particular social programme to give effect to socio-economic rights, it will embark on a substantive review of the measures taken by the State. Thus the Court will evaluate whether the programme is capable of facilitating the realisation of the right, whether it is both reasonably formulated and implemented, and whether it includes reasonable measures to provide immediate relief for those in desperate circumstances.[3]

In both Grootboom and TAC the outcome of the Court's exercise of its review function was that the State was required to extend social benefits to groups that were excluded from the relevant housing and health programmes. In Grootboom, the State's housing programme had to be modified to include reasonable measures to provide short-term relief for those in desperate need of land and housing. The State was opposed to making provision for people in desperate need on the basis that it 'would detract significantly from integrated housing development as defined in the [Housing] Act'.[1] In TAC, the State was required to take reasonable measures to expand a programme reducing MTCT of HIV, including the provision of Nevirapine, throughout the public health sector. As a result, the government had to amend its firmly held policy of confining the provision of Nevirapine to the limited number of test sites catering for only 10% of all births in the public sector.[2]

[1] TAC (supra) at para 123.

[2] T Roux 'Legitimating Transformation: Political Resource Allocation in the South African Constitutional Court' (2003) 10 Democratisation (forthcoming) ('Legitimating Transformation').

[3] Danie Brand observes that taken together the factors referred to by the Court in Grootboom for assessing the reasonableness of a government programme require government to show 'a much stronger link between the policy at issue and its constitutionally mandated goal than in Soobramoney'. It narrows 'the range of policy options that it would be legitimate for government to choose from and thinks about the relative efficiency of different policy options'. Brand 'The Proceduralisation of South African Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (supra) at 41.

According to Roux, the reasonableness test developed by the Court in Grootboom 'undoubtedly requires the Court to substitute its view of what the Constitution requires — the inclusion of the excluded group — for that of the political branches'.[3] However, he goes on to observe that the test stops short 'of a full-blown proportionality test':

> The Court's assessment is thus not directed at such issues as whether the State might have adopted less restrictive measures in pursuing the programme in question, but at whether the claimant group has an equal or better claim to inclusion relative to other groups that have been catered to.[4]

In this way, Roux claims that the Court has struck a skilful balance in its socio-economic rights jurisprudence between the deferential standard of means-end rationality, and the more intrusive standard of a full-blown proportionality test.[5]

It is debatable whether the description of 'relative inclusion' best describes the Court's jurisprudence in relation to the positive duties imposed by sections 26 and 27. It suggests that the State has already adopted a policy to extend a particular socio-economic right, which includes some, but excludes others. This is consistent with the facts of Grootboom where the State had adopted a housing policy geared towards advancing access to housing for all in the medium- to long-term. The programme was faulted on the basis that it excluded those in desperate need from short-term relief. However, in TAC, an important element of the applicant's claim was that the government had not adopted a comprehensive national programme to prevent or reduce MTCT of HIV.[6] The relief sought was not solely directed at the inclusion of an excluded group from an otherwise coherent policy, but rather that Government adopt such a policy. This is in effect what the Court ordered the government to do, although it stopped short of requiring all elements of a comprehensive MTCT-prevention programme as requested by the TAC.[7]

---

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 64.

[2] TAC (supra) at para 62.

[3] Roux 'Legitimating Transformation' (supra) at 7.

[4] Ibid. As the Court wrote in TAC of Government's MTCT policy: 'We have held that its policy fails to meet the constitutional standards because it excludes those who could reasonably be included where such treatment is medically indicated to combat mother-to-child transmission of HIV.' TAC (supra) at para 125.

[5] The standard of proportionality, which is applied under the general limitations clause (s 36), permits the court in reviewing the justifiability of limitations to the rights in the Bill of Rights to consider 'less restrictive means' available to the State to achieve its purposes.

[6] See TAC (supra) at para 8.

[7] As noted above, the order includes extending testing, counselling and training facilities at hospitals and clinics throughout the public health sector to facilitate and expedite the use of Nevirapine for reducing MTCT of HIV. However, it excludes the provision of formula feed as ordered by the High Court.

One can envisage any number of situations where the central issue will not be the exclusion of significant groups from an otherwise coherent social programme, but rather the failure of the State to adopt such a programme. In these cases, the aim of litigation will be to seek to compel Government to initiate such a programme. It is important to bear in mind that this does not automatically entail the Court prescribing particular policy choices to Government. It has remedial mechanisms at its disposal to allow Government an appropriate measure of discretion in its choice of policies to remedy the unconstitutionality.[1]

Consistent with the paradigm of reasonableness review, the TAC Court cautioned that its findings did not mean 'that everyone can immediately claim access to such treatment'.[2] The State's duty was to make 'every effort' to extend access to this treatment 'as soon as reasonably possible'.[3]

The reasonableness test has been criticised for being vague and offering inadequate guidance to the State on its obligations in respect of socio-economic rights. According to Bilchitz, the vagueness of the reasonableness test is partially a consequence of the failing to integrate the first and second subsections of sections 26 and 27. The reasonableness enquiry focuses entirely on the second subsection without providing a role for the first subsection in terms of defining the content of the right concerned.[4] Bilchitz suggests that the Court should first determine the ambit or content of the right. Only then 'should it engage in the enquiry of determining whether the measures adopted by the government were reasonable methods of progressively realising the right'.[5] He persuasively argues that an application of the reasonableness test in the context of a particular case, requires 'a prior understanding of the general obligations government is under by virtue of having to realise the rights in question'.[6]

I have argued that the Court does not escape the interpretative difficulties of clarifying the State's obligations in relation to socio-economic rights by rejecting the notion of minimum core obligations in favour of reasonableness review. The review standard of 'reasonable measures' endorsed by the Court does not readily lend itself to easy definition or application. For example, in the context of high

[1] Davis J observed in Grootboom I: 'Sections 38 and 172 of the Constitution empower a court to issue an order which identifies the violation of a constitutional right and then defines the reform that must be implemented while affording the responsible State agency the opportunity to choose the means of compliance.' Grootboom I (supra) at 292H-I.

[2] TAC (supra) at para 125.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Bilchitz 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 9.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 10.

levels of poverty, it is not easy to identify those groups who should qualify for short-term relief because of their desperate need and intolerable living conditions.[1]

A better approach would be to recognise that the right in the first subsection of sections 26 and 27 gives rises to two types of duties that are delineated in the second subsection. First, the State must ensure that everyone has access to essential levels of goods and services (the minimum core obligation). This requirement would give individuals who are unable to gain access to these essential needs an enforceable claim against the State for basic forms of material assistance. Second, the State must over time, improve the quality of socio-economic rights to which individuals have access. In respect of this second-tier duty, the standard of reasonableness review would be appropriate given that issues of survival will not be at stake.[2]

As I noted earlier, despite the Court's rejection of the minimum core concept as a source of individual entitlement to subsistence requirements, it remains possible to argue that a minimum core of a particular service should be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of the measures adopted by the State.[3]

(g) Progressive realisation

The second subsection of sections 26 and 27 refers to the duty on the State to 'take legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation' of the relevant rights. The concept of 'progressive realisation' was clearly borrowed from article 2 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. As the Court implicitly acknowledged in Grootboom, 'progressive realisation' has a dual function.[4] It acts as a limitation on the pace of fulfilment by the State of its positive duties in that it recognises that the full realisation of socio-economic rights cannot occur immediately.[5] At the same time, it imposes certain duties of conduct on the State. The State must actually take 'legislative and other measures' towards progressively realising the rights. The Court wrote:

> . . . accessibility should be progressively facilitated: legal, administrative, operational and financial hurdles should be examined and, where possible, lowered over time. Housing must be made more accessible not only to a larger number of people but to a wider range of people as time progresses.[6]

---

[1] For a further discussion of this issue in the context of the right to social assistance: see S Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 17 SAJHR 232, 234–237 ('Social Assistance').

[2] This approach is similar to that adopted by the amici in Grootboom and the one proposed by Bilchitz 'Teeth' (supra) at 493 and Bilchitz 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 11– 13.

[3] See § 33.5*(e)*(iv) supra (A future role for minimum core obligations?).

[4] See further in this regard, Liebenberg 'Social Assistance' (supra) at 252.

[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 45.

[6] Ibid. According to the UNCESCR, progressive realisation 'imposes an obligation to move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards the goal of full realisation of the rights in the Covenant'. GC 3 (supra) at para 9.

Government's progress in dismantling the range of obstacles that impede access to socio-economic rights will thus be a factor in assessing the reasonableness of its programmes. The Court did not refer to a possible qualitative interpretation of 'progressive realisation'. This qualitative dimension would require not only that a greater number of people have access to housing over time, but also that there are progressive improvements in the standard of housing to which disadvantaged groups have access. A qualitative dimension is included in the scope of the right through the phrase 'adequate housing' in section 26(1).[1]

Proponents of minimum core obligations argue that 'progressive realisation' should not mean 'that some receive housing now, and others receive it later; rather, it means that each is now entitled to basic housing provision, which the government is required to improve gradually over time'.[2]

(i) A national strategy and plan of action

The UNCESCR has repeatedly emphasised the importance of formulating a transparent, participatory national strategy and plan of action for the progressive realisation of the relevant socio-economic rights. Any such plan should include targets, indicators and benchmarks, which enable the public, institutions such as Human Rights Commissions, and Government itself to monitor progress. Particular attention should be given to vulnerable or marginalised groups in the process of formulating the plan and its implementation.[3] The duty to formulate a co-ordinated, comprehensive housing programme was the first feature of a reasonable programme in terms of section 26 identified by the Constitutional Court in Grootboom.[4] It is also implicit in the Constitutional Court's approval of most

[1] The amici in Grootboom argued that the phrase progressive realisation 'imposes a duty to adopt an incremental approach both as to numbers, and as to what is provided'. Heads of Argument (supra) at para 58.2. The UNCESCR has identified a number of qualitative factors to be taken into account in assessing the 'adequacy' of housing provision. See GC 4 (supra) at para 8.

[2] Bilchitz 'Teeth' (supra) at 493.

[3] See, for example, GC 4 (The right to adequate housing) (supra) at para 12; GC 12 (The right to adequate food) (supra) at paras 21– 30; GC 14 (The right to the highest attainable standard of health) (supra) at para 43*(f)* [Here the duty to formulate a national health plan is regarded as one of the core obligations of States parties]; GC 15 (The right to water) (supra) at paras 37*(f),* 46–54. The latter two General Comments also refer to the importance of 'framework legislation' 'as a major instrument' in the implementation of the relevant national strategy for realising the right: GC 12 (supra) at para 29; and GC 15 (supra) at para 50. See, in this regard, Grootboom (supra) at para 40. On the role of targets, indicators, benchmarks in monitoring the progressive realisation of socio-economic rights, see GC 15 (supra) at paras 53–5. See also: K Tomaševski 'Indicators', A Eide 'The Use of Indicators in the Practice of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights'; and A Eide 'Obstacles and Goals to be Pursued' in A Eide, C Krause & A Rosas (eds) Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Textbook (2nd Revised Edition) at 531, 545 and 553 respectively. See also Leckie 'Indivisibility' (supra) at 93–94.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–41. The Court wrote: 'The measures must establish a coherent public housing programme directed towards the progressive realisation of the right of access to housing within the State's available means. The programme must be capable of facilitating the realisation of the right.' Ibid at para 41.

aspects of the national housing programme in Grootboom.[1] The High Court judgment in TAC endorsed the duty of the State to formulate a comprehensive, coherent and time-bound plan for a roll-out of the MTCT- prevention programme.[2] The Constitutional Court also engaged the question whether the government had a comprehensive plan to combat MTCT of HIV.[3]

The duty on the State to formulate a transparent national plan of action for the realisation of socio-economic rights promotes public accountability and participation in the realisation of socio-economic rights. It also lays the foundation for targeted, purposeful action by the State towards the realisation of these rights.

(ii) Retrogressive measures

A significant aspect of the Grootboom judgment is the Court's endorsement of the views of the UNCESCR relating to an implicit duty on the State to avoid retrogressive measures.[4] According to the Committee:

> . . . any deliberate retrogressive measures...would require the most careful consideration and would need to be fully justified by reference to the totality of the rights provided for in the Covenant and in the context of the full use of the maximum available resources' [emphasis added].[5]

The General Comment suggests that measures that have the effect of reducing pre-existing levels of access to socio-economic rights are prima facie incompatible with the Covenant and require justification by the State.[6] In the South African context such justification would most appropriately take place in the context of the general limitations clause.[7] Scott and Macklem argue that this approach:

> . . . creates a kind of ratchet effect in that lowering the fulfilment level of a right is presumptively prohibited once that level has been achieved. Existing levels of provision can thereby be used as a baseline, adding further precision to the judicial task.[8]

---

[1] The Court observed: 'Allocation of responsibilities and functions has been coherently and comprehensively addressed. The programme is not haphazard but represents a systemic response to a pressing social need.' Grootboom (supra) at para 54. The shortcoming of the programme, as has been discussed, was the failure to include short-term measures of relief for those in desperate need.

[2] See TAC (supra) at 385C–J and 387C–F (paras 3 and 4 of the order).

[3] TAC (supra) at paras 82–89. See also para 123.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 45.

[5] GC 3 (supra) at para 9. The Court in Grootboom wrote: 'The meaning ascribed to the phrase ['progressive realisation' by the Committee] is in harmony with the context in which the phrase is used in our Constitution and there is no reason not to accept that it bears the same meaning in the Constitution as in the document from which it was so clearly derived.' Ibid.

[6] The Maastricht Guidelines on Violations of Economic Social and Cultural Rights (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 691-705 give the following examples of violations under the ICESCR: '(e) The adoption of any deliberately retrogressive measure that reduces the extent to which any such right is guaranteed; (g) The reduction or diversion of specific public expenditure, when such reduction or diversion results in the non-enjoyment of such rights and is not accompanied by adequate measures to ensure minimum subsistence rights for everyone' (paras 14*(e)* and (g)). The Maastricht Guidelines are non-binding, but influential, interpretations of the obligations imposed by the ICESCR adopted by a group of experts in international law.

[7] See § 33.10 infra (Limiting socio-economic rights).

[8] Scott and Macklem 'Ropes of Sand' (supra) at 80.

An example of a possible retrogressive measure would be an amendment to the regulations under the Social Assistance Act, 1992, raising the eligible age limit for the child support grant from 7 years to 10 years.[1] This change would have the effect of reducing the number of impoverished children entitled to the child support grant. It is not clear whether a similar burden of justification would apply to measures that reduce the quality or level of benefit that people enjoy.[2]

(h) Within available resources

The State's positive obligations to fulfil the rights are qualified by reference to its 'available resources' in sections 26(2) and 27(2). Like 'progressive realisation', this phrase imposes both a duty on the State and allows the State to raise a defence to a claim alleging that its progress in realising the rights is unreasonable. The Court in Grootboom indicated that a reasonable programme to realise socio-economic rights must 'ensure that the appropriate human and financial resources are available'.[3] But the resources available for social programmes will be an important factor in assessing the reasonableness of the measures adopted by the State. This means that:

> . . . both the content of the obligation in relation to the rate at which is achieved as well as the reasonableness of the measures employed to achieve the result are governed by the availability of resources.[4]

Two interrelated questions flow from this conclusion. First, how will the

[1] The child support grant is a social assistance benefit. The right of access to social assistance is protected in FC s 27(1)(c) read with 27(2).

[2] For example, reducing the quantum of the child support grant from R160 per child to R100 per child while not altering the age cohort. This may depend on the recognition of a qualitative dimension to 'progressive realisation' as argued for above. See § 33.5(9) above.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 39. Later in the judgment, the Court says that the effective implementation of programmes 'requires at least adequate budgetary support by national government'. A nation-wide housing programme must recognise immediate needs and this requires national government 'to plan, budget and monitor the fulfilment of immediate needs and the management of crisis' [emphasis added]. Ibid at para 68.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 46. Further on, the Court writes:

> There is a balance between goals and means. The measures must be calculated to attain the goal expeditiously and effectively but the availability of resources is an important factor in determining what is reasonable.

Ibid. In Soobramoney, the Court indicated that as the rights in sections 26 and 27 are resource dependent, 'the corresponding rights themselves are limited by reason of the lack of resources'. Soobramoney (supra) at para 11.

availability of resources be assessed?[1] Will the Court's scrutiny be confined to pre-existing budgetary allocations by the relevant spheres of government or will it be prepared to examine the policy decisions underlying budgetary allocations?[2] Second, how stringently will the Court scrutinise the State's allegations that the relevant social programme is reasonable in the light of its resource constraint?

In Soobramoney, the Court considered the claim in terms of section 27(1) and (2) within the context of the budget of the provincial health department in KwaZulu-Natal.[3] Nowhere did the Court suggest that it would be prepared to scrutinise the budget allocation of health resources by the national sphere of government to the provincial sphere.[4] Moreover, as discussed above, the Court applied a very deferential standard of rationality review in respect of the political and medical decisions at issue in the case.[5] However, as Darryl Moellendorf has pointed out, if the scope of the rights in sections 26 and 27 is determined by the State's pre-existing budgetary choices, socio-economic rights could provide no meaningful guide to policy.[6]

As discussed above, the High Court in TAC held that the duty to draw up a coherent, nationwide plan to advance socio-economic rights exists independently of resource considerations.[7] The Constitutional Court in TAC found that resource constraints were not an issue in relation to the first leg of the challenge — the restriction on prescribing Nevirapine in public health facilities where capacity existed to do so. The manufacturers of Nevirapine had offered to make it available to the government free of charge for a period of five years for the purposes of reducing the risk of MTCT of HIV.[8] Government's concern related to the costs of providing the infrastructure and training for the testing and counselling facilities as well as other elements of the optimal package of treatment for HIV-positive pregnant women and their new-born infants.[9] The Court found that

---

[1] As Darryl Moellendorf observes:

> 'Available resources' is, however, ambiguous as it has both narrow and broad senses. It may mean those resources that a ministry or department has been allotted and has budgeted for the protection of the right. Alternatively, it may mean any resources that the State can marshal to protect the right. These are the two extreme senses of the terms. To be sure, between the narrowest interpretation and the broadest lie other senses.

'Reasoning about Resources' (supra) at 330.

[2] This issue is relevant, for example, to claims against local and provincial governments relating to those socio-economic rights falling within their functional areas of competence. As s 214(1)(a) of the Constitution indicates, national government has an important role in ensuring 'the equitable division of revenue raised nationally among the national, provincial and local spheres of government'.

[3] This is evident, for example, from Soobramoney (supra) at paras 24 and 29.

[4] This was perhaps precluded by the fact that the only respondent was the provincial Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal. National government was accordingly not a party to the proceedings.

[5] See § 33.5*(f)*(i) above (Soobramoney: The standard of rationality).

[6] See Moellendorf 'Reasoning about Resources' (supra) at 332: 'A broader sense of "available resources" must be employed if socio-economic rights are to guide policy rather than depend on it.'

[7] TAC High Court (supra) at 386B–C. See also § 33.5*(f)*(iii) above (TAC: Applying the reasonableness test). This is consistent with the views of the UNCESCR: 'The obligation to monitor the extent of realisation, or more especially of the non-realisation, of economic, social and cultural rights, and to devise strategies and programmes for their promotion, are not in any way eliminated as a result of resource constraints.' GC 3 (supra) at para 11.

[8] TAC (supra) at para 19.

[9] Ibid at para 49.

these resource-related concerns were relevant to the provision of a comprehensive package of care, but not to the provision of Nevirapine at those hospitals and clinics where testing and counselling facilities were already in place. Accordingly, it found that its order on this aspect of the claims 'will not attract any significant additional costs'.[1] The uncontested nature of the availability of resources was clearly a significant factor in the Court's finding that the State's blanket policy to limit Nevirapine to research and training sites was unreasonable.[2]

In relation to extending the MTCT programme, the Constitutional Court found that although a comprehensive policy for testing and counselling of HIV-positive pregnant women existed, the policy was not implemented uniformly.[3] The Court also found that it would not be a major burden for government to extend the training of counsellors based at public hospitals and clinics (other than the research sites) to include the use of Nevirapine in reducing the risk of MTCT of HIV.[4] The provincial health authorities responsible for implementing the testing and counselling programme claimed that they faced both financial and capacity constraints in extending the programme. The TAC and the other respondents argued that it was cost-effective to implement a comprehensive policy for the use of Nevirapine, which included testing and counselling. The TAC argued that such a policy would result in 'significant savings' for the State in later years, as it would reduce the number of HIV-positive children who would have to be treated in the public health system.[5]

The Court took the view that it was not necessary to deal with the cost-effectiveness argument, because there had been a significant change in conditions since the proceedings were implemented. Some provinces – such as Gauteng and KwaZulu-Natal — were in the process of expanding their provision of Nevirapine at public health facilitates beyond the test sites.[6] According to the Court, these developments demonstrated that substantial progress could be made 'provided the requisite political will is present'.[7] Moreover, the Court had been informed during the hearing of the appeal that the government has made 'substantial additional funds' available for the treatment of HIV, including the reduction of MTCT.[8] The Court drew the unassailable conclusion that budgetary

[1] TAC (supra) at para 71.
[2] The Court wrote:
> A potentially lifesaving drug was on offer and where testing and counselling facilities were available it could have been administered within the available resources of the State without any known harm to mother or child. [Emphasis added.] TAC (supra) at para 80.

[3] Ibid at para 90.
[4] Ibid at paras 83 and 95. Its' order on this aspect is in sub-para 3*(c)* thereof (at para 135).
[5] Ibid at para 116.
[6] Ibid at para 118.
[7] Ibid at para 119.
[8] Ibid at para 120.

constraints were 'no longer an impediment', and that it should now 'be possible to address any problems of financial incapacity that might previously have existed'.[1] The State was thus required to 'take reasonable measures to extend the testing and counselling facilities to hospitals and clinics throughout the public health sector beyond the test sites to facilitate and expedite the use of Nevirapine for the purpose of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV'.[2]

We can only speculate as to how the Court would have dealt with the resource constraints argument had the positive political developments that occurred just prior to the hearing not occurred. A serious engagement with the cost-effectiveness arguments raised by the TAC would have drawn the Court into a more direct evaluation of resource allocation decisions, a form of review the Court is clearly reluctant to undertake.

Although sections 26 and 27 clearly allow resource constraints to be raised by the State in defending the reasonableness of its measures, the courts should not simply accept unsubstantiated allegations regarding resource shortages. The Court's role is to scrutinise the validity of this defence. As Justice O' Regan has argued in relation to the Soobramoney decision:

> . . . government is under an obligation to show that it acted bona fide and rationally in the circumstances. This carries an evidentiary burden. State officials are required to place evidence before the Court of their policy regarding the rationing of scarce dialysis equipment and their budgets.[3]

The courts are unlikely to be receptive to a direct challenge to Government's macro-economic and budgetary decision-making processes. However, both the Grootboom and TAC decisions illustrate that the orders of the Constitutional Court enforcing socio-economic rights may have indirect budgetary implications. The Court in TAC reasoned that while:

> [D]eterminations of reasonableness may in fact have budgetary implications, [they] are not in themselves directed at rearranging budgets. In this way the judicial, legislative and executive functions achieve appropriate constitutional balance.[4]

---

[1] TAC (supra) at para 120.

[2] Ibid at para 95. Its order on this aspect is in sub-para 3*(d)* thereof (ibid at para 135).

[3] O'Regan 'Introducing Socio-Economic Rights' (1999) 1 (4) ESR Review 2.

[4] TAC (supra) at para 38. Roux makes the following comments on the above quote from the TAC decision:

> According to this sense of things, the motive behind the intrusion into politics is all-important. If the motive for 'rearranging budgets' is to substitute the Court's view on how resources should be allocated for that of the political branches, the intrusion cannot be justified. However, if the primary motive is rights-enforcement, the political branches should (as a matter of constitutional law) and will (as a matter of practical politics) accept the resource-allocation effects of the Court's decision as an inevitable and necessary element of the constitutional compact.

'Legitimating Transformation' (supra) at 9 (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

33.6 Defending State Assistance to Vulnerable Groups

The principles established in Grootboom can also assist the State to defend coming to the aid of vulnerable groups against challenges by powerful private groups. This is illustrated by the case of Minister of Public Works & others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & others.[1] In defending its decision to establish a transit camp to house people from Alexandra Township who had been displaced by severe floods, the State relied on its constitutional obligation (as affirmed in Grootboom) to assist people in crisis situations.

A neighbouring residents' association challenged this decision on the grounds that there was no legislation authorising the government to establish the transit camp and that the decision was unlawful in that it contravened a town planning scheme as well as land and environmental legislation. The Constitutional Court held that none of the laws relied on by the association excluded or limited the government's common law power to make its land available to flood victims pursuant to its constitutional duty to provide them with access to housing.[2]

The Court held that the fact that property values may be affected by a low cost housing development on neighbouring land is a factor that is relevant to the way in which government discharges its duty to provide everyone with access to housing. However, in the circumstances of the present case this factor did not outweigh the constitutional obligation of the government to address the needs of homeless people and to use its own property for that purpose.[3]

Finally, procedural fairness did not require government to do more in the circumstances than it had undertaken to do: namely to consult with the Kyalami residents in an endeavour to meet to meet any legitimate concerns they might have as to the manner in which the development will take place. The Court observed:

> To require more, would in effect inhibit the government from taking a decision that had to be taken urgently. It would also impede the government from using its own land for a constitutionally mandated purpose, in circumstances where legislation designed to regulate land use places no such restriction on it.[4]

33.7 Children's Socio-Economic Rights

The children's socio-economic rights in section 28(1)(c) are neither described as a right of 'access to' the relevant rights, nor are they qualified in a similar form to the second subsections of sections 26 and 27.[5] This absence of qualification has

[1] 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) ('Kyalami Ridge').
[2] Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 51.
[3] Ibid at para 107.
[4] Ibid at para 109.
[5] Section 28(1)(c) reads: 'Every child has the right . . . to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services.'

led many commentators (including this author) to conclude that these rights imposed a direct duty on the State to ensure that those children who lacked these basic necessities of life are provided with them without delay. The commentators inferred that the scope of the rights was confined to a rudimentary or 'basic' level of the various social goods referred to in section 28(1)(c).[1] The more direct nature of the duty owed by the State to children was justified on the basis that children living in poverty are particularly vulnerable and not in a position to meet their own socio-economic needs. Arguments relating to resource and capacity constraints as a justification for not meeting these basic obligations towards children were appropriately raised in terms of section 36. This interpretation gives rise to the difficulty that vulnerable children have a direct claim to material assistance under the Constitution while equally vulnerable adults (for example, persons living with disabilities and the elderly) do not. As discussed above, the amici in Grootboom attempted to resolve this difficulty by the recognition of a minimum core obligation owed to everyone in need under sections 26 and 27. On this reading, section 28(1)(c) is a specific manifestation of the minimum core obligations under sections 26 and 27. Its purpose is to place beyond doubt the core socio-economic entitlements due to vulnerable children.[2]

Having assessed the State's housing programme in terms of section 26, the Constitutional Court in Grootboom considered the applicability of the right of children to shelter in terms of s 28(1)(c). According to the Court, the 'carefully constructed constitutional scheme for the progressive realisation of socio-economic rights would make little sense if it could be trumped in every case by the rights of children to get shelter from the State on demand'.[3] It went on to [1] See, for example, P de Vos 'The Economic and Social Rights of Children and South Africa's Transitional Constitution' (1995) 10 (2) SA Public Law 233, 255 (although not identical, s 30(1)(c) of the Interim Constitution is in similar form to s 28(1)(c) of the Final Constitution); De Vos 'Pious Wishes' (supra) at 87–88; Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 41–43.

[2] See § 33.5*(e)*(i) above (discussion of amici's minimum core argument in Grootboom). For a similar approach, see: G van Bueren 'Alleviating Poverty Through The Constitutional Court' (1999) 15 SAJHR 52, 57. According to Scott & Alston, 'While such core content would exist by necessary implication within s 26 were s 28 not there, s 28 makes certain that there is no chance of the core entitlements of children being lost in the interpretative evolution of the Bill of Rights'. 'Transnational Context' (supra) at 260. The High Court in Grootboom adopted a different approach by holding that a joint reading of ss 28(1)(b), (c) and (2) creates a derivative right for parents to shelter with their children. The Court reasoned as follows:

> As the family must be maintained as a unit parents of the children who are granted shelter should also be entitled to such shelter. The bearer of the right now becomes the family. The justification for such a conclusion is that a failure to recognise the parents would prevent the children from remaining within the family fabric. This would penalise the children and indeed their parents who, to a considerable extent owing to the ravages of apartheid, are unable to provide adequate shelter for their own children.

Grootboom I (supra) at 289C–D.

As argued above, the difficulty with this approach is that adults without children (no matter how vulnerable) are not entitled to direct assistance.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 71.

hold that section 28(1)(b) and (c) must be read together. The former provision defines those responsible for giving care, while the latter 'lists various aspects of the care entitlement'.[1] Thus the primary duty to fulfil a child's socio-economic rights rests on that child's parents or family:

> It follows that section 28(1)(c) does not create any primary State obligation to provide shelter on demand to parents and their children if children are being cared for by their parents or families.[2]

This statement implies that a direct entitlement by children to the provision of the socio-economic rights in section 28(1)(c) only arises when children lack family care: that is, if they have been orphaned, abandoned or removed from their family's care. As the children in Grootboom were in the care of their parents or families, they were not entitled to any relief in terms of section 28(1)(c).[3]

The Court held that the State nevertheless incurred certain obligations towards children who are being cared for by their parents or families. In the first place, the State is obliged to 'provide the legal and administrative infrastructure necessary to ensure that children are accorded the protection contemplated by section 28'.[4] This obligation would 'normally be fulfilled by passing laws and creating enforcement mechanisms for the maintenance of children, their protection from maltreatment, abuse, neglect or degradation, and the prevention of other forms of abuse of children mentioned in section 28'.[5] Secondly, the Court referred to the State's obligation under sections 25, 26 and 27 to provide access to the relevant socio-economic rights protected by these sections 'on a programmatic and co-ordinated basis, subject to available resources'.[6] It mentioned the provision of maintenance grants and other material assistance to families in need as '[o]ne of the way in which the State would meet its section 27 obligations'.[7]

The Court's reasoning suggests that the socio-economic claims of children living in families who are too poor to provide them with the basic necessities of life fall to be determined in terms of sections 26 and 27. As previously noted, these sections do not impose any direct obligation on the State to provide socio-economic goods and services to anyone. They only require a qualified obligation to adopt a reasonable programme.[8] The Court's analysis illustrates quite starkly its

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 76.
[2] Ibid at para 77.
[3] Ibid at para 79.
[4] Ibid at para 78.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid.
[8] For a discussion of the implications of such reasoning, see: J Sloth-Nielsen 'The Child's Right to Social Services, the Right to Social Security, and Primary Prevention of Child Abuse: Some Conclusions in the Aftermath of Grootboom' (2001) 17 SAJHR 210, 227–230 ('The Child's Right').

reluctance to interpret the socio-economic rights provisions in the Constitution to invite individual claims for direct material assistance from the State.[1]

In TAC, the Court clarified that the State's duties to provide children's socio-economic rights were not only triggered when children were physically separated from their families. Thus children are entitled to the protection contemplated by section 28 'when the implementation of the right to parental or family care is lacking' [my emphasis].[2] The Court went on to say:

> Here we are concerned with children born in public hospitals and clinics to mothers who are for the most part indigent and unable to gain access to private medical treatment which is beyond their means. They and their children are in the main dependent upon the State to make health care services available to them.[3]

This approach suggests that the State's direct duties to provide the socio-economic rights in s 28(1)(c) are also triggered when parents are too poor to provide for their basic needs. Unfortunately, the Court in TAC adhered to its reasoning in Grootboom and did not conclude that children had a direct, individual entitlement to basic health care services in circumstances where their parents were too poor to afford these services. Instead the Court relied on the right of children to basic health care services in section 28(1)(c) to support its finding that government's rigid, restrictive policy on Nevirapine was unreasonable because the policy excluded and harmed a particularly vulnerable group.[4] This conclusion was consistent with the Court's central enquiry throughout the case: namely whether the constitutional standard of reasonableness in section 27(2) had been met.[5]

The current jurisprudence has not resolved whether children have direct entitlements to the socio-economic services in section 28(1)(c). Grootboom and TAC can be read to suggest that the State is under a direct duty to provide these rights in circumstances where family care is lacking either in a physical or economic sense.

---

[1] Sloth-Nielsen argues that 'where children's neglect stems from poverty alone' a directly enforceable claim to material support for family preservation can be derived from section 28(1)(d) (the right of the child to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation). She argues for this interpretation on the basis of the close links between parental poverty and child abuse and neglect in South Africa. 'The Child's Right' (supra) at 230–231.

[2] TAC (supra) at para 79.

[3] Ibid.

[4] The Court described their precarious position as follows:

> Their needs are "most urgent" and their inability to have access to Nevirapine profoundly affects their ability to enjoy all rights to which they are entitled. Their rights are "most in peril" as a result of the policy that has been adopted and are most affected by a rigid and inflexible policy that excludes them from having access to Nevirapine.

Ibid at para 78.

[5] Ibid at para 93.

However, the Court has preferred to decide the two cases under discussion on the basis of reasonableness review under sections 26 and 27.[1]

33.8 The Other Unqualified Socio-Economic Rights

The Constitutional Court has not yet decided a case that directly concerns the scope of the positive duties imposed by the right to 'basic education, including adult basic education' in section 29(1)(a) or the socio-economic rights of detained persons, including sentenced prisoners in section 35(2)(e). These provisions are not qualified in terms similar to the second subsection of sections 26 and 27.

In Gauteng School Education Bill, the Constitutional Court held that the Interim Constitution's section 32*(a)* 'creates a positive right that basic education be provided for every person and not merely a negative right that such a person should not be obstructed in pursuing his or her basic education'.[2] This right was specifically contrasted with section 32*(c),* which creates a freedom to establish educational institutions based on a common culture, language and religion. The latter is a 'defensive right' that does not generate a positive claim against the State to establish such institutions.[3]

There have been a number of High Court decisions in which positive orders have been made against the State to provide socio-economic amenities to prisoners in terms of section 35(2)(e). In B & others v Minister of Correctional Services & others,[4] the High Court directed the respondents to supply two HIV-positive applicants with anti-viral medication which had been prescribed for them in fulfilment of their right to be provided with 'adequate medical treatment' at State expense.[5] The positive order by the Court followed a finding that the Ministry had failed to make out a case that they could not afford the relevant treatment.[6]

In another case concerning prison conditions, the High Court ruled in Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services that the applicant and the other occupants of the Maximum Security Section of Johannesburg Prison have the right to have access

[1] Kenneth Creamer has suggested that a 'higher standard of reasonableness' review is appropriate in assessing the State's programmes impacting on children socio-economic rights. He argues for this higher standard on the basis of a reading of the Constitution that requires children's needs to be prioritised. The higher standard of reasonableness review should include such factors as the rapid implementation of relevant programmes and 'the requirement that the programmes are effectively constructed to reach all children in need.' K Creamer 'The Impact of South Africa's Evolving Jurisprudence on Children's Socio-Economic Rights on Budget Analysis' (2002) IDASA Occasional Paper, unpublished.

[2] Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 9 ('Gauteng School Education Bill').

[3] Ibid. See further in this regard R Kriel 'Education' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) Chapter 38.

[4] 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C) at paras 61–6 ('B & others').

[5] Section 35(2)(e).

[6] B & others (supra) at paras 56, 60.

to electricity in their cells. Schwartzman J ruled that access to electricity was not a mere comfort or diversion, but could make the difference between mental stability and derangement given the circumstance in which high security prisoners are held. Noting that they spend 18 hours of each day of what remains of their lives, or a substantial portion thereof, in what is in effect solitary confinement, he held:

> To deprive them entirely and in perpetuity of this prospect could also result in their being 'treated and punished in a cruel or degrading manner' (section 12(1)(c) of the Constitution) or their being detained in conditions that are inconsistent with human dignity (section 35(2) of the Constitution).[1]

It remains to be seen whether the Constitutional Court will interpret these provisions to confer substantive entitlements on individuals.

33.9 Burden of Proof

Generally, the party claiming a constitutional violation bears the burden of proving an infringement of a right in the Bill of Rights. If a prima facie infringement is established at this first stage of constitutional analysis, the party seeking to uphold the provision may seek to invoke the general limitations clause to justify the infringement of the right. The burden of showing that the requirements of section 36 are met rests on the party who seeks to rely on it.[2]

In cases relating to an alleged breach by the State of its positive duties in terms of sections 26(2) and 27(2), the party claiming a constitutional violation would have to establish a prima facie case that the measures taken are unreasonable because they violate one or more of the criteria laid out in Grootboom.[3] The State would seek to rebut the applicant's case by leading evidence of the legislative measures and other programmes it has adopted and attempting to persuade the court that its programme is reasonable in the context of historical factors as well as its current resource and capacity constraints.[4]

An important question that arises in this context is where the evidentiary burden lies in respect of the qualifying phrase, 'within its available resources'. It would be unreasonable to expect ordinary litigants to identify and to quantify all

[1] Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services & others 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W) at para 15 (353A–E).

[2] S v Zuma & others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 21; S v Makwanyane & another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 100–102. See S Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) § 12.3.

[3] See Soobramoney (supra) at para 36. See also TAC (supra) at para 25: 'The question is whether the applicants have shown that the measures adopted by the government fall short of its obligations under the Constitution.'

[4] See Grootboom (supra) at para 47: 'In support of their contention that they had complied with the obligations imposed on them by section 26, the appellants [the State] placed evidence before this Court of the legislative and other measures they had adopted.' See also Grootboom (supra) at para 43.

the resources available to the State for the realisation of particular socio-economic rights. If the State wishes to rely on a lack of available resources to order to rebut an allegation that it has failed to take reasonable measures, it should bear the burden of proving the alleged unavailability of resources. Relevant organs of state are clearly best placed to adduce this type of evidence.[1]

If the applicant succeeds in establishing a breach of the State's duty to taken reasonable measures under sections 26(2) and 27(2), the State could ostensibly argue that it has justifiably limited the right in terms in terms of the general limitations clause.[2]

The application of the accepted two-stage approach to constitutional analysis is more straightforward in the case of the unqualified socio-economic rights.[3] The applicant bears the onus of proving a violation of the right at the first stage. This showing requires that he or she is a legitimate bearer of the relevant right (e.g. a detained person), and that the duties imposed by the right have not been fulfilled. For example, a prisoner may show that the State has failed to provide him with adequate nutrition as required by section 35(2)(e). If the applicant succeeds in establishing a prima facie violation of these rights, the State would bear the burden of proof in respect of the general limitations clause.

The position is similar with regard to a negative violation of the duty not to prevent or impair access to the relevant socio-economic rights.[4] The applicant bears the onus of establishing a breach of this duty at the first stage of constitutional analysis, The State bears the burden in respect of the general limitations clause. This analysis is premised on the argument that the qualifying phrases in the second subsections of sections 26 and 27 do not apply to these negative duties.[5]

33.10 Limiting Socio-Economic Rights

(a) Justifying limitations to socio-economic rights

Section 36(1) establishes that the rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited. Any limitation to a right must be in terms of law of general application and is only permissible 'to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.[6]

[1] See S Liebenberg 'Housing' in D Davis, H Cheadle & N Haysom (eds) Fundamental Rights in the Constitution: Commentary and Cases (1997) 350-1. See also the discussion in De Vos 'Pious Wishes' (supra) at 92–4.

[2] For a discussion of the difficulties in applying s 36 to a breach of the positive duties in ss 26(2) and 27(2), see § 33.10 infra.

[3] Sections 28(1)(c), 29(1)(a) and 35(2)(e). This conclusion is based on the assumption that these provisions confer a direct entitlement on individuals in appropriate circumstances to claim the specified goods.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 34.

[5] See § 33.5*(b)* supra (negative duty to respect rights). For an application of this approach, see Residents of Bon Vista Mansions v Southern Metropolitan Council 2002 (6) BCLR 625 (W) at paras 20–26.

[6] Section 36(1). See further, in this regard, Woolman 'Limitations' (supra) at § 12.2.

The general limitations clause serves an important purpose in relation to all the rights in the Bill of Rights, including socio-economic rights. Should the State decide to limit its obligations in respect of socio-economic rights, the fact of the limitation and its nature and extent would have to be publicly defined and justified. This exercise promotes public accountability in support of the constitutional commitment to advance access to socio-economic rights.[1]

The relationship between the qualified positive duties of the State in sections 26(2) and 27(2) and the general limitations clause is complex. As we have seen, the State's positive duties are defined in terms of the adoption of reasonable measures. Should it be established at the first stage of the constitutional inquiry that the State's conduct or omissions are unreasonable, it is difficult to conceive of situations where it may nevertheless succeed in establishing a reasonable limitation of the right under section 36. Perhaps there are, at the margins, justifications for the measures not captured by the unreasonableness criteria articulated in Grootboom. At the limitations stage of constitutional analysis the justificatory requirements are ostensibly stricter.[2]

In the absence of a law of general application, the State is precluded from relying on the general limitations clause. This situation could arise where, for example, the unreasonableness at the first stage of the inquiry under sections 26 and 27 was found to be a failure to adopt legislation necessary to give effect to the particular right.

(b) Resource-based reasons for limiting socio-economic rights

Resource constraints are likely to be the most common justification raised by the State for limiting socio-economic rights. Under sections 26(2) and 27(2), the State is expressly permitted to rely on a lack of available resources as a factor in defending the reasonableness of its measures.[3] If the State does not successfully rely on a lack of available resources at the first stage of constitutional inquiry, it is difficult to imagine how it could succeed on this ground in terms of the general limitations clause. As we have seen, the socio-economic rights of children and detained persons are not expressly qualified by the phrase, 'within available resources'. The question therefore arises whether resource constraints can be relied on to justify a limitation of these positive rights under section 36.

[1] Etienne Moreinik regarded this 'culture of justification' as one of the primary purposes of entrenching a justiciable Bill of Rights in a Constitution. See Mureinik 'Charter of Luxuries' (supra) at 471–3.

[2] See specifically the factors in s 36(1)(a)–(e). See further, in this regard, Liebenberg 'Violations' (supra) at 405, 423–4.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 46 ('the availability of resources is an important factor in determining what is reasonable'). See also § 33.5*(b)* supra ('Within available resources').

The proposition that costs and administrative burdens will generally not constitute valid reasons for limiting rights has found favour in South African academic writing.[1] However, a court cannot rule out resource-related considerations when assessing whether a limitation to the positive duties imposed by rights is justifiable.

In Eldridge[2], cost-related justifications were expressly considered in the limitations enquiry under section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Canadian Supreme Court found that the failure of the Medical Services Commission of British Columbia to provide sign language interpretation for deaf patients constituted a prima facie violation of their right to equal benefit of the law without discrimination under section 15(1) of the Charter. The Court held that s 15(1) imposed a positive duty on the government to make 'reasonable accommodation' of disadvantaged groups 'adversely affected by a facially neutral policy or rule'. However, this duty extended only to the point of 'undue hardship'. Reasonable limitations to the positive duties inherent in section 15(1) fell to be determined under section 1 of the Charter and 'should not be employed to restrict the ambit of s 15(1)'.[3] During its section 1 (limitations) enquiry, the Court found that the government had 'manifestly failed to demonstrate that it had a reasonable basis for concluding that a total denial of medical interpretation services for the deaf constituted a minimum impairment of their rights'.[4] A key consideration was the 'relatively insignificant sum' that was required to continue and extend the service ($150 000 or 0,0025 % of the provincial health budget of British Columbia).[5] The government raised the argument that the recognition of the appellants' claim would have 'a ripple effect throughout the health care field, forcing governments to spend precious health care dollars accommodating the needs of a myriad disadvantaged persons'.[6] The Court responded as follows:

> The respondents have presented no evidence that this type of accommodation, if extended to other government services, will unduly strain the fiscal resources of the State. To deny the appellants' claim on such conjectural grounds, in my view, would denude s 15(1) of its egalitarian promise and render the disabled's goal of a barrier-free society distressingly remote.[7]

---

[1] See Woolman 'Limitations' (supra) at § 12.6. See also In Re Singh and Minister of Employment and Immigration (1985) 17 DLR 422, cited by D Davis et al Fundamental Rights in the New Constitution (supra) at 311.

[2] Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General) (1997) 151 DLR (4th) 577 (SC) ('Eldridge').

[3] Eldridge (supra) at paras 77-80. The concept of reasonable accommodation to the point of undue hardship is common in human rights (anti-discrimination) legislation in Canada. See, for example, the Ontario Human Rights Code, s 11 (Constructive discrimination).

[4] Eldridge (supra) at para 87. The Court found that 'Other options, such as the partial or interim funding of the program offered by the Western Institute for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing, or the institution of a scheme requiring users to pay either a portion of the cost of interpreters or the full amount if they could afford to do so, were either not considered or were considered and rejected.' Ibid at para 93.

[5] Ibid at para 87.

[6] Ibid at para 91.

[7] Ibid at para 92.

Eldridge was concerned with the positive duties that arise in respect of the right to equality and non-discrimination. The positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights are more far-reaching, given that the State is required to do more than simply guarantee equal access to existing services. It must in fact initiate social programmes to give effect to socio-economic rights as an essential component of the duties imposed by these rights. The mere fact that the fulfilment of a socio-economic right will require an investment of resources by the State is not in itself a sufficient reason for limiting the right. If this were so, it would defeat the purpose of including socio-economic rights in the Bill of Rights. The State is expected to factor the resource requirements of all constitutional rights into the budgetary process.

Nevertheless, the reasoning in Eldridge implies that resource considerations may be a relevant purpose in a limitations inquiry pertaining to the positive duties imposed by constitutional rights. The standard of 'undue hardship' applied in Eldridge could be considered as a basis for evaluating the costs-related reasons for limiting socio-economic rights should the analysis reach the general limitations clause. The State must be required to demonstrate convincingly that the costs implications of fulfilling a socio-economic right will impose an 'undue hardship' on its fiscal resources and prejudice the other legitimate needs it is required to meet in a democratic society. The elements of the proportionality test will also have to be satisfied by demonstrating that the right is limited only to the extent required to avoid an undue strain on the State's resources.

33.11 The Horizontal Application of Socio-Economic Rights

The possibility exists under the South African Constitution for socio-economic rights to apply horizontally (that is, in disputes between private parties).[1] The Constitution provides that the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds all organs of State.[2] A provision of the Bill of Rights also 'binds a natural or juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right'.[3] In order to provide an effective remedy for violations of socio-economic rights by private parties, the courts 'must apply, or if necessary develop, the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to that right'.[4] The horizontal application of socio-

[1] On horizontal application generally see S Woolman 'Application' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) § 10.8.

[2] Section 8(1).

[3] Section 8(2).

[4] Section 8(3). The court may also 'develop rules of the common law to limit the right, provided that the limitation is in accordance with section 36(1)'. On the development of common-law remedies to give effect to socio-economic rights, see De Vos 'Pious Wishes' at 100–101.

economic rights is significant in a global context where powerful private entities are increasingly controlling access to essential social services and resources.[1]

(a) Negative duties

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court affirmed that section 26 (1) of the Constitution imposes 'at the very least, a negative obligation upon the State and all other entities and persons to desist from preventing or impairing the right of access to adequate housing' [emphasis added].[2] Private parties are thus at least required to respect the negative duties imposed by socio-economic rights. For example, landlords should refrain from evicting people arbitrarily from their homes, insurance companies and private health care institutions should not discriminate unfairly against people in their access to insurance or health care services,[3] and industries should not cause an environment that is harmful to people's health.[4] The nature of this duty is capable of application to private parties. It is also appropriate to recognise the horizontal application of this duty given the need to afford effective protection to more vulnerable social groups against being deprived of access to socio-economic rights by powerful social actors.

(b) Positive duties

In contrast to the negative duties, the scope of the positive duties on private parties in relation to socio-economic rights is highly speculative and undeveloped. Sections 26(2) and 27(2) place the duty to take positive measures to improve access to socio-economic rights squarely on the State. The question that arises is whether there are circumstances under which certain private bodies bear positive duties to extend access to the relevant socio-economic rights.[5] This duty may [1] See further in this regard, C Scott 'Multinational Enterprises and Emergent Jurisprudence on Violations of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' in A Eide et al (eds) Textbook (supra) at 563.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 34. See § 33.5*(b)* above (the negative duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights).

[3] In addition to prohibiting unfair discrimination by the State (s 9(3)), the South African Constitution expressly provides that 'no person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone' on a range of grounds such as race, gender, sexual orientation, disability and language (s 9(4)). The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 has been enacted to give effect to s 9(4) of the Constitution. Additional grounds of prohibited discrimination recognised in the Act in the form of directive principles include HIV/AIDS status and socio-economic status (s 34). The ground of 'socio-economic status' has a far-reaching potential for challenging the exclusion of the poor from access to social services and resources by both public and private entities. See in this regard: S Liebenberg 'Advancing Equal Access to Socio-economic Rights: The New Equality Legislation' (1999) 2 (1) ESR Review 12–13.

[4] Section 24*(a)* of the Constitution.

[5] It has been argued that the positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights are not applicable to private actors. See, for example: H Cheadle & D Davis 'The Application of the 1996 Constitution in the Private Sphere' (1997) 13 SAJHR 44. However, other academics have argued in favour of the application of section 8 to socio-economic rights. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 10.7.

arise by virtue of a special relationship or when the body in question has the power to control access to a particular service. Possible examples are duties on —

- parents to provide for the needs of their children[1];
- companies relying on migrant labour to provide decent housing to their employees; and
- multinational pharmaceutical companies holding exclusive patent rights over life-saving drugs to ensure their economic accessibility to poor communities.[2]

An important nexus exists between the duty of the State 'to protect' the socio-economic rights of more vulnerable members of society against powerful private actors,[3] and the imposition of a direct constitutional duty on private actors. In most circumstances the State will be bound to enact and enforce the necessary legislation to regulate the conduct of private actors in socio-economic spheres.[4] Examples of legislation designed to protect people against practices of private parties that could prevent or impair their access to socio-economic rights abound, for example, the Medical Schemes Act 131 of 1998, the Rental Housing Act 50 of 1999 and the Home Loan and Mortgage Disclosure Act 63 of 2000. Litigants will usually seek to enforce such legislation or, where protective legislation is lacking, may seek to compel the State to take the necessary legislative measures. However, as I have attempted to demonstrate, the possibility exists under the Constitution of seeking to hold private actors directly accountable for violations of both the negative and, in certain circumstances, the positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights. In the absence of legislation, the courts must apply, or if necessary develop, the common law to give effect to the relevant socio-economic right.[5]

---

[1] As discussed above, the Court has held that the duties imposed by children's socio-economic rights in s 28(1)(c) are primarily binding on the parents and families of children. See Grootboom (supra) at paras 70–79, TAC (supra) at paras 74–79, and the discussion on children's socio-economic rights in § 33.7 above.

[2] See in this regard, S Ellman 'A Constitutional Confluence: American 'State Action' Law and the Application of South Africa's Socio-Economic Rights Guarantees to Private Actors' in P Andrews & S Ellman (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 444, 459–469. Danwood Chirwa has suggested using the 'State action' doctrine to determine the circumstances in which private actors should be bound by the positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights:

> This benchmark could be used to differentiate the positive obligations of various private actors depending on the right and the nature of the obligations involved. For example, a private actor carrying out the functions of the State would be responsible to bear the relevant socio-economic rights obligations that the State would have borne. Similarly, a private actor not linked to the State but exercising power akin to or more than that of the State should be bound by as much positive obligations as the State would have in the specific area of dominance. The 'State action' test could be extended to hold private actors who, however, small, hold positions in society that can result in serious denials or violations of socio-economic rights, responsible for the relevant positive socio-economic rights obligations.

D M Chirwa, Obligations of Non-State Actors in Relation to Economic, Social and Cultural Rights under the South African Constitution' (2002) Research Series of the Socio-Economic Rights Project, Community Law Centre (UWC) at 25.

[3] See § 33.2*(c)*(ii) supra (duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil).

[4] The Court in Grootboom noted (at para 35):

> A right of access to adequate housing also suggests that it is not only the State who is responsible for the provision of houses, but that other agents within our society, including individuals themselves, must be enabled by legislative and other measures to provide housing.'

[5] See s 8(3)*(a)*of the Constitution.

(c) Development of the common law

Section 8(1) of the Constitution applies to 'all law'. All law is generally understood to encompass common law disputes between private parties.

An illustration of the potential for socio-economic rights to influence the development of the common law is the application of section 26(3) to common law eviction proceedings. In Ross v South Peninsula Municipality, the Cape High Court held that the prohibition against arbitrary evictions in section 26(3) of the Constitution altered established common law principles relating to the pleadings and onus of proof in eviction proceedings brought by the owner of property.[1] The Court held that it was no longer sufficient for the owner of the property simply to allege in pleadings that it is the owner of the property in question and that the defendant is in unlawful possession.[2] The owner is now required to allege and prove the 'relevant circumstances' that would justify an order for the eviction of the defendants from their home.[3] Although the court did not decide the exact nature of these relevant circumstances, it indicated that some guidance could be obtained from legislative provisions, specifically the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 (PIE). The special protection to be accorded in the context of evictions to the elderly, children, persons with disabilities and households headed by women was considered particularly relevant.[4]

In Brisley v Drotsky[5], the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the 'relevant circumstances' in section 26(3) are those that are legally relevant, rather than the personal circumstances of the person facing eviction.[6] The Court affirmed that section 26(3) was not only of vertical, but also of horizontal application.[7] however, in terms of the Brisley decision, a court will only consider those circum-

[1] Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589 (C).

[2] This principle was laid down in Graham v Ridley 1931 TPD 476.

[3] Since the Constitution only protects eviction from a 'home', the onus to allege and prove relevant circumstances would not apply in the case of eviction from, for example, business premises.

[4] Ross (supra) at 599B. The Ross judgment was subsequently overruled by the full bench decision in Ellis v Viljoen 2001 (4) SA 795 (C). The Ellis Court concluded that the right of ownership as recognised before the Constitution has not been affected by s 26(3) at least insofar as it did not place a duty on the owner of property to allege and prove the relevant circumstances that would entitle a court to issue an eviction order. Thus the normal common law rules of pleadings and proof apply where the owner seeks the eviction of an unlawful occupier from his or her property (at 805B—E). Ross was also criticised by Flemming DJP in Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 468 (W).

[5] 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA).

[6] Ibid at paras 41–45. In his concurring judgment, Olivier JA held that the phrase, 'all relevant circumstances' in s 26(3) enjoined the Court to have regard to considerations of humanity before ordering the summary eviction of tenants following the termination of a lease. In appropriate circumstances, reasonableness and fairness could permit a court at least to suspend the execution of an eviction order for a reasonable period. Ibid at para 87.

[7] Ibid at para 40. In this respect, the Court held that Betta Eiendomme (supra) was wrongly decided. Ibid at para 82 (Olivier JA).

stances that are relevant in terms of the common law applicable to eviction proceedings brought by owners of property. In the absence of a statutory discretion[1], a court has no discretion in terms of section 26(3) to refuse an eviction order where the lessee is not entitled to occupation of the property under the common law.

The SCA's narrow rendering of 'relevant circumstances' effectively means that s 26(3) will provide little consolation to persons facing eviction or demolition in the absence of statutory protection. The purpose of section 26(3) must surely have been to place a duty upon the courts to consider the impact of an eviction on the right of access to adequate housing of particularly vulnerable persons and to fashion an order that would take these circumstances into account. Such an order might take the form of staying the execution of the eviction order for a limited period.[2] In certain cases, it may be apparent that evicted persons would find themselves in a crisis situation 'with no roof over their heads'. In these circumstances, relevant organs of State are under a constitutional obligation to assist these persons by providing access to a reasonable programme that provides relief to those in desperate need.[3] In cases where PIE and the Extension of Security of Tenure Act (ESTA) 62 of 1997 are applicable, the courts must ensure that the stringent requirements of procedural fairness in the legislation have been followed.[4] They must also consider substantive factors before granting an eviction order.[5]

An unavoidable consequence of including socio-economic rights in the Constitution is that the complex array of arguments in favour of both property rights and socio-economic rights must be surfaced, and a candid analysis of the competing interests undertaken.[6] Our Constitution should not be read in such a way as to artificially suppress arguments in favour of the socio-economic rights at stake in particular cases.

33.12 REMEDIES

The Constitution gives the courts broad remedial powers.[7] Law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution must be declared invalid to the extent of its inconsistency.[8] In addition, the courts may make any order that is 'just and [1] See, for example, the discretion conferred in s 8 of the Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997.

[2] For example, the judgment by Olivier JA in Brisley (supra).

[3] Grootboom (supra) at paras 52 and 88–90.

[4] See, for example, Cape Killarney Property Investments v Mahamba & others 2000 (2) SA 67 (C). The Supreme Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal against this judgment: Cape Killarney Property Investments v Mahamba & others 2001 (2) SA 67 (SCA).

[5] See, for example, ss 4(6) and (7) of PIE; and ss 8(4), 10(2) and 11(2) of ESTA.

[6] See, in this regard, Woolman 'Application' (supra) at §§ 10.3*(b)* and 10.8*(c)*.

[7] In terms of s 38 of the Constitution, a court may grant 'appropriate relief' in respect of an infringement of threatened infringement of a right in the Bill of Rights.

[8] Section 172(1)(a).

equitable', including an order suspending a declaration of invalidity on any conditions to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.[1] In Fose v Minister of Safety and Security [2], the Constitutional Court held that '[a]ppropriate relief will in essence be relief that is required to protect and enforce the Constitution'.[3] It went on to say that the courts 'may even have to fashion new remedies to secure the protection and enforcement of these all-important rights'.[4]

Wim Trengove has identified a number of unique features of litigation relating to socio-economic rights 'which call for the development and creation of new and more effective remedies'.[5] Among the innovative remedies he proposes are an award of preventative damages against the State made in favour of an independent State institution (eg a Human Rights Commission) or non-governmental organisation with the necessary skills and programmes aimed at preventing future violations of the right in question. Another order that may be more appropriate than awarding monetary compensation is an order for reparations in kind. The motivation for this kind of order is that it is often difficult to quantify the harm done to an individual litigant arising from the long-term structural deprivation of services such as education or health care. The State may thus be ordered to provide appropriate remedial services for the benefit of a whole community that has suffered a long-term violation of their socio-economic rights.[6] Orders of this nature usually require on-going judicial supervision to ensure that they are properly implemented.

A critical issue in the enforcement of the positive duties imposed by socio-economic rights (particularly those subject to 'progressive realisation') concerns the circumstances under which the courts should grant mandatory relief, including the assumption by the court of supervisory jurisdiction over their implementation. In terms of such an order, the State will usually be ordered to devise and present to court a plan of action to remedy the violation, and to report back to the court on its implementation at regular intervals. At both the stages of the approval and implementation of the plan, the applicant and other interested parties (including a possible independent 'court monitor') will be given an opportunity to comment.[7] Trengove points out that redressing systemic violations of socio-economic rights often requires far-reaching institutional and structural

[1] Section 172(1)(b).
[2] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).
[3] Ibid at para 19.
[4] Ibid.
[5] See W Trengove, 'Judicial Remedies for Violations of Socio-economic Rights' (1999) 1(4) ESR Review 8.
[6] Trengove cites Milliken v Bradley II (1977) 433 US 267 as an example where the US Supreme Court approved an order requiring the State to provide remedial education to the victims of past race discrimination in the Detroit school system. Ibid at 9.
[7] See the discussion of 'structural interdicts' by J Klaaren 'Remedies' M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) 9-15–9-16.

reforms over a period of time in a manner determined by the legislative and executive branches of government. They cannot be remedied by a single court order made once and for all. Such orders should strive to preserve the choice of means of the legislative and executive as to the precise manner in which to remedy the situation while not abdicating the court's responsibility to ensure that constitutional objectives are fulfilled.[1] The Court thus retains jurisdiction over the enforcement of the order.

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court confined itself to making a declaratory order.[2] In TAC the Court confirmed its wide remedial powers, including the granting of mandatory relief with or without the exercise of some form of supervisory jurisdiction.[3] The Courts should be guided by '[t]he nature of the right infringed and the nature of the infringement as to the appropriate relief in a particular case'.[4] The critical consideration is what would constitute an effective remedy in the circumstances of the case.[5] Although the TAC Court made both declaratory and mandatory orders against the State, it declined to exercise a supervisory jurisdiction as it was invited to do by the applicants. It held that there were no grounds for believing that the government would not respect and execute the orders of the Court.[6] The High Courts have granted supervisory orders in a number of of socio-economic rights cases.[7]

---

[1] Trengove (supra) at 9.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 99. This order has attracted criticism. See K Pillay 'Implementation of Grootboom: Implications for the Enforcement of Socio-economic Rights' 2002 (6) Law Democracy & Development 255. For a recent case concerning the non-compliance by a local authority with its housing obligations as laid down in Grootboom, see City of Cape Town v Rudolph & others 2003 (11) BCLR 1236 (C).

[3] TAC (supra) at paras 104–106. In this respect the Court rejected the State's contention that the Court's power in the present case was confined to issuing a declaratory order. The State argued that the doctrine of separation of powers precluded the courts from making orders 'that have the effect of requiring the executive to pursue a particular policy.' Ibid at para 97. The power of the Court to make 'supervisory orders' was specifically recognised in Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 96. An order of this nature was made in August & another v Electoral Commission & others 1993 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC). In the latter case, the Electoral Commission was ordered to make all the necessary and reasonable arrangements for prisoners to exercise their right to vote coupled with an injunction to submit a detailed plan for scrutiny.

[4] TAC (supra) at para 106.

[5] Ibid at para 102 (citing Ackermann J in Fose (supra), para 106, and paras 112–113).

[6] Ibid at para 129. In this regard the court indicated that supervisory orders should not be made unless they are necessary to secure compliance with a court order. For a criticism of the Court's reluctance to make a supervisory order in the circumstances of this case, see Bilchitz 'Laying the Foundations' (supra) at 23–26.

[7] In Grootboom I (supra), the High Court found a violation of s 28(1)(c) of the Constitution. In the first part of its order, the Court declared in broad terms that the appropriate organ or department of State is obliged to provide the applicant children, and their accompanying parents, with shelter until such time as the parents are able to shelter their own children. The second part of the order directs the respondent to present under oath reports to the Court on the implementation of the order within a period of three months from the date of the order. The applicants are given an opportunity to deliver their commentary on the aforegoing reports (at 293H-J–294A-C). See also Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services & others 1993 (3) BCLR 342 (W) (respondents ordered to report to court setting out a timetable within which the electrical upgrading of the maximum security section of Johannesburg Prison would be commenced and completed); and TAC High Court judgment (supra) at 386J–387H. Perhaps the proximity of the High Courts to the actual circumstance of the applicants makes them more appropriate venues for supervisory orders. The responsibility for supervisory orders in other jurisdictions often falls on the court of first instance.

33.13 The Role of the Human Rights Commission and the Commission for Gender Equality

The Human Rights Commission has been given a general mandate under the Constitution to promote human rights and to monitor and assess their observance in South Africa.[1] To this end it has been given the powers to investigate and report on the observance of human rights, to take steps to secure appropriate redress where human rights are violated, to carry out research, and to educate.[2] The Constitution also imposes a special duty on the Commission in relation to socio-economic rights. Each year it must 'require relevant organs of State to provide the Commission with information on the measures that they have taken towards the realisation of the rights in the Bill of Rights concerning housing, health care, food, water, social security, education and the environment'.[3] The Commission has thus a specific information-gathering mechanism at its disposal in relation to socio-economic rights. It can use this information for a variety of purposes related to its general mandate to promote, monitor and assess the observance of human rights.[4] The Commission can use the information generated through this process for the following purposes: (1) reporting to Parliament and the President on the observance of socio-economic rights; (2) making recommendations on policy or legislation to the relevant organs of State; (3) attempting to secure appropriate redress for victims of violations of socio-economic rights;[5] and (4) identifying issues requiring further research and investigation.[6]

The Commission can play an especially valuable role in support of the judicial

[1] Section 184(1).

[2] Section 184(2). These powers are further regulated in terms of the Human Rights Commission Act 54 of 1994.

[3] Section 184(3). For an analysis of the monitoring of socio-economic rights by the Human Rights Commission, see DG Newman 'Institutional monitoring of Social and Economic Rights: A South African Case Study and a New Research Agenda' (2003) 19 SAJHR 189.

[4] The UNCESCR has developed creative and innovative approaches to its mandate to supervise States parties' reports under the ICESCR. The Commission could usefully draw on aspects of its work in carrying out its mandate under s 184(3). See Craven 'Towards an Unofficial Petition Procedure' (supra); B Borter 'Socio-Economic Rights Advocacy — Using International Law' (1999) 2 (1) ESR Review 1–6; GC 1 Reporting by States parties (1989) (supra); and GC 10 The role of national human rights institutions in the protection of economic, social and cultural rights (1998) (supra). For an approach arguing against the international reporting system as an appropriate model for the Commission in relation to socio-economic rights, see J Klaaren 'A Second Look at the South African Human Rights Commission, Access to Information and the Promotion of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) (unpublished paper on file with author).

[5] In terms of the Human Rights Commission Act, the Commission can use alternative dispute resolution mechanisms (mediation, conciliation and negotiation) to attempt to resolve disputes and rectify violations of human rights (s 8). It can also take cases to court in its own name, or on behalf of a person or a group or class of persons (s 7(1)(e)).

[6] The power of the Commission to conduct investigations is contained in s 9 of the Human Rights Commission Act.

enforcement of socio-economic rights.[1] The Commission can monitor the progressive realisation of socio-economic rights, identify structural patterns of inequality and provide evidence, where necessary, of the link between State policies and the constitutional violations experienced by disadvantaged groups. The information generated through the monitoring process and the Commission's annual assessment of the progress made by relevant organs of State may also assist in the preparation of appropriate cases for litigation. De Vos points out that through co-operating with the Commission, organs of State may be in a better position to defend a claim that they have failed to make reasonable progress in realising the rights.[2] At the same time, the information generated by the Commission also provides a source of information for litigants and amici in preparing socio-economic rights cases.[3]

There is, furthermore, scope for building a co-operative relationship between the Commission and the courts in the enforcement of orders relating to socio-economic rights. For example, the courts may wish to involve the Commission in the supervision and enforcement of its decisions and orders in respect of socio-economic rights.[4] This potential synergy exists particularly with regard to the supervisory orders discussed above.[5]

Apart from attempting to obtain redress for victims of violations through the courts, the Commission can bring systemic abuses of socio-economic rights to the attention of government and the public. By involving both government officials and civil society organisations in the information gathering and dissemination process, the Commission can gain a greater understanding of the impact of government programmes on disadvantaged communities and whether they are, in fact, being reasonably implemented.[6]

The importance of developing a national strategy and plan of action for the progressive realisation of socio-economic rights cannot be underestimated.[7] The Commission can contribute to the formulation of such plans, drawing on the [1] Despite the extensive provisions in the Constitution protecting socio-economic rights, it is noteworthy that in the seven years since the adoption of the 1996 Constitution, there has been only a handful of socio-economic rights cases. This indicates the need for a body such as the Commission to play an active role in both the promotion and protection of socio-economic rights.

[2] De Vos 'Pious Wishes' (supra) at 100.

[3] For example, in their joint amici submissions in Grootboom, the Commission and the CLC (UWC) relied on the information submitted by relevant organs of State to argue that the relevant government departments (housing and welfare) had not adopted adequate measures to give effect to their obligations in terms of ss 26 and 28(1)(c).

[4] In Grootboom, the Human Rights Commission undertook to monitor and report on the State's compliance with its s 26 obligations in accordance with the judgment Grootboom (supra) at para 97.

[5] See § 33.12 supra ('Remedies'). See also C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, December OS 2003) Chapter 24D.

[6] On the requirement that government programmes must be reasonably implemented, see Grootboom (supra) at para 42.

[7] See § 33.5*(g)*(i) supra (plans of action).

experience is has gained in monitoring socio-economic rights. Although the Commission for Gender Equality does not have an express mandate in relation to socio-economic rights, it has a vital role to play in developing the gender dimensions of these rights. The Commission for Gender Equality and the Human Rights Commission should collaborate closely to ensure that the impact of gender factors are fully integrated in the monitoring of socio-economic rights.[1]

[1] The functions and powers of the Commission for Gender Equality are contained in s 187 of the Constitution, and in the Commission for Gender Equality Act 39 of 1996. See in this regard, K Pillay 'The Commission for Gender Equality: What is its Role?' (1998) 1(3) ESR Review 13–15. See also Albertyn 'Commission for Qender Equality' (supra) at § 24D.

34 Limitations

Stu Woolman and Henk Botha

34.1 Introduction to limitation analysis 34–1
(a) Purpose 34–1
(b) Mechanics 34–3
(c) Shared constitutional interpretation, an appropriate normative framework and hard choices 34–6
34.2 Drafting history. 34–10
(a) Evolution of the clause 34–10
(b) Foreign influences 34–12
34.3 Relationship between fundamental rights analysis and limitation analysis. 34–16
(a) The value-based approach and the notional approach . . . 34–17
(b) The Constitutional Court's approach to two-stage analysis 34–18
34.4 Internal modifiers, and their relationship to rights analysis and limitations analysis 34–30
34.5 Internal limitations, and their relationship to rights analysis and limitations analysis 34–31
(a) Internal limitations and burden shifts 34–33
(b) Internal limitations and general limitations 34–33
(i) Internal limitations in FC ss 15(3)(b), 30 and 31 . . . 34–33
(ii) Internal limitations in FC ss 9, 26 and 27 34–34
(iii) Internal limitations in FC s 25 and the collapse of stage distinctions 34–41
34.6 Burden of justification 34–42
34.7 Law of general application 34–47
(a) The purpose and meaning of 'law of general application'. 34–47
(b) The relationship between law of general application and the rule of law 34–54
(c) The specific features of law of general application. 34–55
(i) Law and conduct. 34–56

(aa) Grant to and exercise of power by officials not constrained by identifiable legal standards 34–56
(bb) Commission and omission 34–58
(x) Conduct carried out under the colour of law but beyond scope of actual legal authority 34–58
(y) The failure to discharge constitutional duties 34–60
(ii) Criteria for law of general application 34–61
(aa) Parity of treatment 34–61
(bb) Non-arbitariness 34–62
(cc) Precision or clarity 34–63
(dd) Accessibility or public availability 34–65
34.8 'Reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom' 34–67
(a) Introduction 34–67
(b) Proportionality 34–69
(c) FC s 36's five factors 34–70
(i) Nature of the right 34–70
(ii) Importance of the purpose of the limitation 34–73
(iii) Nature and extent of the limitation 34–79
(iv) Relationship between the limitation and its purpose 34–84
(v) Less restrictive means 34–85
(aa) Narrowly tailored 34–91
(bb) Costs imposed 34–92
(cc) Extent of the limitation 34–92
(dd) Purpose of the limitation 34–92
(d) Balancing and proportionality 34–93
(i) Balancing as a bad metaphor 34–94
(aa) Definitions of balancing 34–95
(bb) Critiques of balancing 34–95
(w) Pluralism, incommensurability and complexity 34–95
(x) Subjectivity and arbitrariness 34–99
(y) Incrementalism and conservatism 34–100
(z) Science and silence 34–101
(ii) Balancing as a benign practice 34–101
(e) A thick(er) conception of limitations analysis 34–104
(i) Shared constitutional interpretation 34–105

(ii) Norms: 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom' 34–113
(aa) Intersection, convergence, and conflict amongst constitutional values 34–113
(bb) Dignity and democracy 34–116
(x) Primacy of dignity 34–116
(y) Democracy and openness 34–121
(aaa) Principle of democracy 34–121
(bbb) Principle of openness 34–125
(iii) Judicial narratives 34–127
(aa) Prince 34–130
(bb) Jordan and Khosa 34–131
34.9 The purpose of FC s 36(2) 34–133

36. Limitations[1]

(1) The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including —

(a) the nature of the right

(b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;

(c) the nature and extent of the limitation;

(d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and

(e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose.

(2) Except as provided for in subsection (1) or any other provision of this Constitution, no law shall limit any right entrenched in the Bill of Rights.

34.1 Introduction to Limitation Analysis

(a) Purpose

The limitation clause has a four-fold purpose. First, it functions as a reminder that the rights enshrined in the Final Constitution are not absolute.[2] The rights

* We are deeply indebted to both Theunis Roux and Johan van der Walt for their critical and constructive engagement with our chapter.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'). Section 33(1), the limitation clause, of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution') read:

The rights entrenched in this Chapter may be limited by law of general application, provided that such limitation —

(a) shall be permissible only to the extent that it is —

(i) reasonable; and

(ii) justifiable in an open and democratic society based upon freedom and equality; and

(b) shall not negate the essential content of the right in question, and provided further that any limitation to

(aa) a right entrenched in section 10, 11, 12, 14 (1), 21, 25 or 30(1)(d) or (e) or (2); or

(bb) a right entrenched in section 15, 16, 17, 18, 23, or 24, in so far as such rights relate to free and fair political activity, shall, in addition to being reasonable as required in paragraph (a)(i), also be necessary.

[2] See De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2002 (6) SA 370 (CC), 2002 (12) BCLR 1285 (CC)('De Reuck') at para 89 ('I reiterate that the rights contained in the Bill of Rights are not absolute. Rights have to be exercised with due regard and respect for the rights of others. Organised society can only operate on the basis of rights being exercised harmoniously with the rights of others. Of course, the rights exercised by an individual may come into conflict with the rights exercised by another, and where rights come into conflict, a balancing process is required'); Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 930 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 57 ('There is a clear limitation of the right to dignity caused by s 25(9)(b) read with ss 26(3) and (6). Like all constitutional rights, that right is not absolute and may be limited in appropriate cases in terms of s 36(1) of the Constitution. As stated above, there can be no doubt that there will be circumstances when the constitutional right to dignity that protects the rights of spouses to cohabit may justifiably be limited by refusing the spouses the right to cohabit in South Africa even pending a decision upon an application for an immigration permit. As also stated earlier, it is for the Legislature, in the first instance, to determine what those circumstances will be and to provide guidance to administrative officials to exercise their discretion accordingly'); S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela')(No right is absolute, and reverse onus provisions may constitute justifiable limitations of FC s 35 where the risk and the consequences of erroneous conviction are outweighed by the risk and the consequences of guilty persons escaping conviction.)

may be limited where the restrictions can satisfy the test laid out in the limitation clause.[1] Secondly, the limitation clause tells us that rights may only be limited where and when the stated objective behind the restriction is designed to reinforce the values that animate this constitutional project.[2] As we shall see, the same values that inform our understanding of what constitutes a justifiable limitation on a right — openness, democracy, dignity, equality, and freedom — also flesh out the extension of the individual rights themselves.[3] Thirdly, the test set out in the limitation clause — with a bit of judicial amplification — allows for candid consideration of those public goods or private interests that the challenged law sets in opposition to the rights and freedoms enshrined in Chapter 2.[4] Fourthly, the limitation clause could be said to represent an attempt to finesse the 'problem' of judicial review by establishing a test that determines the extent to which the democratically elected branches of government may craft laws that limit our constitutionally protected rights and the extent to which an unelected judiciary may override the general will by reference to the basic law. But the presence of FC s 36 serves as a reminder that the counter-majoritarian dilemma is neither a paradox nor a problem, but an ineluctable consequence of our commitment to living in a constitutional democracy. So while the language of FC s 36 could never provide guidelines for judicial nullification so precise as to resolve this 'dilemma', the section does function as an interpretative prompt that ensures that the courts

[1] S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 72 ('The Constitution makes it clear that freedom of speech is not absolute. . . . [S]ection 36 permits limitations which are reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on dignity, freedom and equality.')

[2] See, eg, Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo') at para 41 ('In deciding whether the common law rule complained of by the applicants does indeed constitute an unjustifiable limitation of section 16 of the Constitution, sight must not be lost of other constitutional values and in particular, the value of human dignity'); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at paras 72–73 ('It could be argued that despite its racist and sexist nature, s 23 gives recognition to customary law and acknowledges the pluralist nature of our society. This is however not its dominant purpose or effect. Section 23 was enacted as part of a racist programme intent on entrenching division and subordination. Its effect has been to ossify customary law. In the light of its destructive purpose and effect, it could not be justified in any open and democratic society. It is clear from what is stated above that the serious violation by the provisions of s 23 of the rights to equality and human dignity cannot be justified in our new constitutional order.') For further discussion of relevant case law, see §§ 34.8*(c)*(ii) and (iv) infra.

[3] See, eg, S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 104 ('In the balancing process, the relevant considerations will include the nature of the right that is limited, and its importance to an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality; the purpose for which the right is limited and the importance of that purpose to such a society.')

[4] See Manamela (supra) at para 32 ('The Court must engage in a balancing exercise and arrive at a global judgment on proportionality. . . . As a general rule, the more serious the impact of the measure on the right, the more persuasive or compelling the justification must be. Ultimately, the question is one of degree to be assessed in the concrete legislative and social setting of the measure, paying due regard to the means which are realistically available in our country at this stage, but without losing sight of the ultimate values to be protected.') For a further discussion of related case law, see § 34.8*(b)* infra.

take the concerns of the political branches seriously enough to offer them appropriate levels of deference.[1]

(b) Mechanics

As a general matter, constitutional analysis under the Bill of Rights takes place in two stages.[2] First, the applicant must demonstrate that the exercise of a

[1] See, eg, Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights (Interim Constitution) Third Report (28 May 1993) 9–10:

> In choosing the exact formulation of such clauses, most human rights documents attempt to define with a fair degree of precision, the guidelines which the judge should follow in fulfilling their duty in this respect. This is particularly so as the judges are generally secure in tenure . . . and so therefore less democratically accountable than the legislature, on whose laws they sit in judgment. Such guidelines may be all the more necessary in a legal system, moving in to judicial review of legislative action for the first time.

See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 104 quoting Reference re ss. 193 and 195 (1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Manitoba) (1990) 48 CRR 1, 62 ('In the process regard must be had to the provisions of [IC] section 33(1), and the underlying values of the Constitution, bearing in mind that, as a Canadian Judge has said, "the role of the Court is not to second-guess the wisdom of policy choices made by legislators."') That there is, despite the volumes of writing on the subject, no solution to the counter-majoritarian dilemma is a trite proposition. Suffice it to say that every theory of interpretation offered as a 'solution' to this problem puts judicial review in a constitutional democracy on more solid footing by alerting us to the kinds of, or styles of, arguments that may justify a court's finding that ordinary law cannot be squared with the commitments of the basic law. But no single theory of interpretation, nor any particular gloss on the text of FC s 36, can substitute for reasoned argument. Every exercise of power requires justification — whether the legislature, the executive or the judiciary exercises that power. The legitimacy of each exercise of such authority rises or falls on a combination of reasons given for law or conduct and the outcomes that law or conduct generate. See Laurence Tribe Constitutional Choices (1985); Stu Woolman 'Riding the Push-Me Pull-You: Constructing a Test that Reconciles the Conflicting Interests which Animate the Limitations Clause' (1994) 10 SAJHR 60 (Any system that permits judicial review invites, by necessity, conflict over the nature of the values said to animate the basic law); Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, Theunis Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 10 (Constitutional democracies protect various forms of democratic participation, and fundamental rights in large, heterogeneous nation-states are necessary conditions for these different forms of participation.) So although no general solution exists to the problem, both the drafters of the Final Constitution and the Constitutional Court have attempted to diminish the difficulties associated with this dilemma by adumbrating a doctrine that makes it somewhat easier for the party seeking to justify an infringement — especially the legislature — to do so. The Theme Committee Four Advisors to the Constitutional Assembly noted that when courts compare the actual limitation in question with other appropriate alternative restrictions on a right, the courts — and by implication the legislature — are not obliged to pick the least restrictive measure: 'Those restricting rights will be left with a discretion to decide on any particular measure within this [acceptable] range . . . . [T]his need not be the least restrictive measure viewed in isolation.' See Theme Committee Four Advisors Memorandum to Constitutional Assembly (Final Constitution)(14 April 1996). In Case & Curtis, Mokgoro J concluded that the distinct roles of the judiciary and the legislature in a constitutional democracy demand that the courts afford the legislature a 'margin of appreciation' with respect to the choice of means required to effect a law's constitutionally permissible ends. Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)('Case & Curtis') at para 62.

[2] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401, 414 (CC)('Zuma')('Fundamental rights analysis under IC Chapter 3 'calls for a two-stage approach. First, has there been a contravention of a guaranteed right? If so, is it justified under the limitation clause?'); Makwanyane (supra) at 707; Ferreira v Levin NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1, 26 (CC)('Ferreira'); Mamabolo (supra) at para fundamental right has been impaired, infringed, or, to use the Final Constitution's term of art, limited. This demonstration itself has several parts. To begin with, the applicant must show that the conduct or the status for which she seeks constitutional protection is a form of conduct or status that falls within the ambit of a particular constitutional right.[1] If she is able to show that the conduct or the

1 ('The first issue was whether the law . . . limited the right to freedom of expression vouchsafed by the Constitution. The second is whether the procedure recognised and sanctioned by our law . . . fell foul of the fair trial rights guaranteed by the Constitution. . . . In respect of each of the first two issues, a finding that the law does indeed limit the fundamental rights in the respects contended for, will in turn require an enquiry whether such limitation is nevertheless constitutionally justified.') We deal, below, with those instances in which all meaningful analysis — of the alleged infringement and justification for the alleged infringement — occurs within the right itself and therefore obviates the need for limitations analysis under FC s 36. For more on internal limitations, see § 34.5 infra. See, eg, First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)(Test for deprivation of property); Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)(Test for unfair discrimination); Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)(Test for progressive realization of a socio-economic right); Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa) at para 83 ('There is a difficulty in applying s 36 of the Constitution to the socio-economic rights entrenched in ss 26 and 27 of the Constitution.') We also engage those instances in which the Court assumes, for the sake of argument, that a rights violation has occurred and then proceeds directly to limitations analysis under FC s 36 — thus only notionally undertaking two-stage analysis. See § 34.3(a) infra. See, eg, Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC); Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC); Ferreira v Levin NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[1] As the Constitutional Court has repeatedly noted, the Bill of Rights' provision on standing, FC s 38, and the Court's doctrine of objective unconstitutionality, mean that the person before the court need not be obliged to show that he or she is the person whose rights have been infringed or threatened with infringement. On the objective theory of unconstitutionality, see National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at paras 28–29 ('On the objective theory of unconstitutionality adopted by this Court a litigant who has standing may properly rely on the objective unconstitutionality of a statute for the relief sought, even though the right unconstitutionally infringed is not that of the litigant in question but of some other person'); Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party & Others 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) at para 64 (In re-affirming its commitment to the objective theory of unconstitutionality, the Court wrote that 'the practice that has been urged upon this Court carries with it the distinct danger that Courts may restrict their enquiry into the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament and concentrate on the position of a particular litigant.') For the purposes of two-stage rights analysis, the relaxed position on standing is important. The demonstration of a prima facie infringement of a right is not necessarily contingent upon a demonstration that the party before the court is having her exercise of the right impaired by law or conduct. Cf Halton Cheadle 'Limitations' in H Cheadle, D Davis & F Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 693, 696. Cheadle asserts, with much merit, that the author of this chapter in the first edition 'confuses issues of locus standi with the determination of scope'. But Professor Cheadle did not deign to describe the exact nature of this confusion. It falls to the same author to clarify what Professor Cheadle did not. Cheadle would have been correct if he had simply noted that the author's language suggests that the only person who could challenge the validity of law or conduct was a person whose own exercise of a protected activity has been limited or impaired. FC ss 38*(b)–(e)* clearly grants standing to parties other than those whose 'own interests' have been impaired or threatened with impairment. However, it would be incorrect to suggest, as Professor Cheadle does, that the rules of standing are so relaxed that the applicant need not 'show any need of constitutional protection.' Ibid at 696. FC s 38 relaxes the requirements for standing. It does not eliminate them. See, eg, Poswa v Member of the Executive Council For Economic Affairs, Environment and Tourism, status for which she seeks protection falls within the value-determined ambit of the right,[1] then she must show, in addition, that the law or the conduct she seeks to challenge impedes or limits the exercise of the protected activity.[2]

If the court finds that a challenged law infringes the exercise of the Eastern Cape 2001 (3) SA 582 (SCA) at para 22 (Although FC s 38 standing requirements are quite generous, the absence of any real interest in the disposition of a matter is manifestly not 'irrelevant to the real question of whether the relief sought and granted was properly sought and granted. The more so when a finding of constitutional invalidity would have to be confirmed by the Constitutional Court for it to have any effect. The prospect of that Court having to devote time and attention to an issue which no longer exists, the resolution of which will have no effect upon the order granted against the appellant and which has not been shown to have any other practical relevance, is a singularly unattractive one. I do not believe that the Constitution requires this Court to inflict so sterile an enquiry upon the Constitutional Court. Generosity in according standing in protection of constitutional values is one thing, profligacy in that regard is another.') Moreover, even taking into account Cheadle's quasi-notional approach to rights interpretation, the activity of the applicant does matter when attempting to determine the scope of the right. It matters in the sense that a court or a commentator committed to a case-by-case approach to rights interpretation often determines the scope of the right, not in the abstract, but in terms of the particular kind of activity, engaged in by the applicant, for which constitutional protection is sought.

[1] See Matinkinca v Council of State, Ciskei 1994 (4) SA 472 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 17, 34 (Ck)('[E]stablish[ing] … the meaning or contents … of the relevant fundamental rights [entails] … a value judgment as opposed to a legalistic or positivistic approach.') However, the Constitutional Court is often reluctant to define clearly the ambit of a right, fearing that such an approach to demarcation will bind them, in some future dispute, to an understanding of the right that they had not anticipated and would not endorse but for the existence of some hypothetical precedent. See, for example, Case & Curtis (supra) at para 94 ('The less we say meanwhile, in short, the better that will be in the long run.') South African commentators are similarly reluctant to specify what two-stage rights analysis actually requires at each stage of analysis. For example, at the same time as he commits himself to a 'generous' approach to rights interpretation that would not unduly circumscribe a right's protective ambit and would leave the ultimate assessment of the value of a particular form of notionally protected activity to the limitations stage of analysis, Cheadle claims that rights analysis — first-stage analysis — ought to take some account of the competing 'social interests' at stake in a constitutional challenge. Even if it is logically possible to do what Cheadle suggests, he remains, as these authors read him, unclear as to the kind of analysis that occurs at the first stage.

[2] There is, of course, an important distinction to be made between law or conduct that limits expressly or intentionally a fundamental right and law or conduct that has the unintended consequence of limiting a fundamental right. See, eg, Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (Attorney General) (1989) 58 DLR (4th) 577 (Sets out different tests for government actions which intentionally restrict the protected activity and government actions which effectively restrict the protected activity); Secretary of State of Maryland v J H Munson Co 467 US 947 (1984)(Law — backed up by the threat of criminal sanction — may intimidate individuals into not engaging in constitutionally protected activity: such law is said to have a 'chilling effect'.) For example, the doctrine of overbreadth holds that laws which sweep into their proscriptive reach both constitutionally forbidden activity and constitutionally protected activity are invalid. See, for example, South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU'). For a discussion of the overbreadth doctrine as articulated in SANDU, see Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

fundamental right, the analysis may move to a second stage.[1] In this second stage of analysis, the party that would benefit from upholding the limitation will attempt to demonstrate that the infringement of a fundamental right is justifiable.[2] This second stage of analysis occurs, generally speaking, not within the context of the fundamental right or freedom, but within the limitation clause.[3]

We say may move to a second stage for two reasons. First, where the limitation does not take place in terms of law of general application, then no opportunity arises to offer a justification in terms of FC s 36. We discuss this threshold issue for justification below.[4] Second, while all rights admit, as an abstract matter, of the possibility of justifiable limitation, not all justification analysis takes place in terms of FC s 36. FC s 9's inquiry into unfair discrimination, in addition to establishing whether a prima facie violation has occurred, exhausts all meaningful inquiry into the justification for any such violation — whether it occurs in terms of law or conduct. Similarly, FC s 25's test for arbitrary deprivation of property consciously incorporates a sliding-scale proportionality assessment — the sine qua non of limitations inquiries — into the rights stage of the analysis. Little, if any, space remains for additional forms of justification to be offered under FC s 36. Finally, FC ss 26 and 27 make express provision for limitations on the socio-economic rights found in those sections. Once again, FC s 36 would appear to afford a party seeking to justify a limitation of a socio-economic right few, if any, additional bases for doing so. We discuss the relationship between these rights — and, in particular, their internal limitations clauses — and the general limitations clause at greater length below.[5]

(c) Shared constitutional interpretation, an appropriate normative framework and hard choices

Let us return, briefly, to three points made above. First, the general limitation clause articulates standards for the justification of restrictions placed by law upon the exercise of fundamental rights. Second, these standards are expressed in rather rarefied rules that courts make concrete through their application to [1] See Zuma (supra) at 414 ('Fundamental rights analysis under IC Chapter 3 'calls for a two-stage approach. First, has there been a contravention of a guaranteed right? If so, is it justified under the limitation clause?') See also Moise v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 19 ('It is also no longer doubted that, once a limitation has been found to exist, the burden of justification under s 36(1) rests on the party asserting that the limitation is saved by the application of the provisions of the section. The weighing-up exercise is ultimately concerned with the proportional assessment of competing interests but, to the extent that justification rests on factual and/or policy considerations, the party contending for justification must put such material before the Court.')

[2] See § 34.6 infra, on why FC s 36 places the burden of justification on the party seeking to uphold the limitation.

[3] See § 34.5 infra, on the manner in which various internal limitations obviate the need for FC s 36 analysis.

[4] See § 34.7 infra.

[5] See § 34.5 infra.

discrete cases. Third, limitations analysis allows for open and candid consideration of competing interests. Taken together, these three statements give expression to what the Constitutional Court has taken to be one of the most basic principles in the Final Constitution: that every exercise of public power derives its force from basic law and needs to be justified by reference to the basic law,[1] and that only open and public processes of rational deliberation produce acceptable forms of justification.[2]

Despite the fact that these standards are produced openly and publicly, or perhaps because of it, they are often hotly contested. Courts cannot, and do not, simply apply the requirements of the text of the limitation clause mechanically. Courts need to explain how they understand the demands of the text and why those demands have certain consequences for the disposition of a case. As a result, judges themselves are subject to the demand for justification. They must be able to explain why they have given the standards the content that they have, and why they have applied them in a given fashion. By doing so, they signal their respect for the parties before them, provide guidance to legislators, fellow judges and prospective litigants, and, perhaps most importantly of all, model rational political discourse through participation in an ongoing debate about the meaning of constitutional norms.[3]

These initial observations suggest that Bill of Rights litigation, rightly conceived, reflects an ongoing dialogue about the meaning of fundamental rights and the cogency of the justifications offered for their limitation.[4] From this perspective, the court's exercise of powers of judicial review are best understood as part of a shared project of constitutional interpretation. This project requires that the courts, through thoroughly reasoned engagement with the constitutional text, produce a normative framework of sufficient density to guide other political actors, organs of state and social agents. At the same time, a doctrine of shared constitutional interpretation encourages other actors to place their own gloss on constitutional norms and to experiment with different policy options consistent with the basic law.

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers').

[2] K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC).

[3] See S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC)(Previous findings of the Constitutional Court do not absolve legislatures from the duty to deliberate about the constitutionality of bills before them, or to justify limitations of fundamental rights. In Steyn, the state had not adduced evidence to support its claim that the requirement of leave to appeal from a magistrate's court was necessary to prevent the clogging of appeal rolls and to ensure that hopeless appeals do not waste the courts' time. Since virtually no attempt was made by the state to justify the limitation — presumably because the Court had upheld a similar provision in relation to appeals from High Courts — the Constitutional Court found that the state had failed to justify the measure in question.)

[4] See S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu') at para 129 (Constitutional interpretation takes the form of 'a principled judicial dialogue, in the first place between members of this Court, then between our Court and other courts, the legal profession, law schools, Parliament, and, indirectly, with the public at large'.) See also Henk Botha 'Rights, Limitations, and the Impossibility of Self-government' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt (eds) Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003) 13, 24-25.

Put slightly differently, powers of judicial review are best understood not as part of a battle for ascendancy between courts and legislatures (though they may turn into that[1]) or a means of frustrating the will of the political majority, but rather as a commitment of our basic law to shared constitutional competence. This shared competence stands, as we shall see, for five basic propositions: (1) it supplants the notion of judicial supremacy with respect to constitutional interpretation — all branches of government have a relatively equal stake in giving our basic law content; (2) while courts retain the power to determine the content of any given provision, a commitment to shared constitutional interpretation means that a court ought to limit consciously the reach of its holding regarding the meaning of a given provision and to invite the political branches of government or other organs of state to come up with their own alternative, but ultimately consistent, gloss on the text; (3) shared constitutional competence married to a rather open-ended or provisional understanding of the content of the basic law means that the Constitutional Court's limitations analysis might be understood in terms of norm-setting behaviour that provides guidance to other state actors without foreclosing the possibility of other effective safeguards for rights or other useful methods for their realization; (4) a commitment to shared interpretation ratchets down the conflict between the courts and the political branches of government, and enables courts and all other actors to see how variations on a given constitutional norm work in practice;[2] and (5) this experimentalist — or dialogic — framework ought to reveal 'best practices' with respect to the realization of constitutional objectives and should offer us regular opportunities to rethink the meaning — and the constraints — of our basic law.

[1] We are grateful to Johan van der Walt for his attention to this parenthetical and his insistence that the parenthetical may mask the fact that politics never fully disappears from such disputes. See Johan van der Walt 'A Reply to Woolman and Botha on Limitations' in M Bishop, D Brand & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Conversations & Proceedings of the Constitutional Law of South Africa Conference and Public Lecture Series (2007). The original reply is available at www.chr.up.ac.za/closa.

[2] See Stu Woolman 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing and Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law (forthcoming). See, especially, Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) 2000 Sup Ct Rev 61. In National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others, the Constitutional Court recognized that the process of interpreting the Labour Relations Act in light of the demands of both FC s 39(2) and FC s 23(1) requires an appreciation of the legislature's and the courts' shared responsibility for interpreting the Final Constitution. It wrote:

> The LRA was enacted 'to give effect to and regulate the fundamental rights conferred by s 27 of the Constitution.' In doing so the LRA gives content to s 23 of the Constitution and must therefore be construed and applied consistently with that purpose. Section 3(b) of the LRA underscores this by requiring that the provisions of the LRA must be interpreted 'in compliance with the Constitution'. Therefore the proper interpretation and application of the LRA will raise a constitutional issue. This is because the Legislature is under an obligation to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights'. In many cases, constitutional rights can be honoured effectively only if legislation is enacted. Such legislation will of course always be subject to constitutional scrutiny to ensure that it is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Where the Legislature enacts legislation in the effort to meet its constitutional obligations, and does so within constitutional limits, courts must give full effect to the legislative purpose. Moreover, the proper interpretation of such legislation will ensure the protection, promotion and fulfilment of constitutional rights and as such will be a constitutional matter. In this way, the courts and the Legislature act in partnership to give life to constitutional rights.

2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC) at para 14 (emphasis added).

In the pages that follow, we assess the ability of the Constitutional Court to delineate clearly rights analysis and limitations analysis, to 'balance' rights, to distinguish the core of a right from its penumbra, and to construct a framework for limitations analysis that both (a) enables the parties before the court to make arguments that fully ventilate the issues raised and (b) reinforces our democratic law-making processes so that they take adequate account of the constitutional imperative to create 'an open and democratic society' based upon the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'. After a critical appraisal of the Court's efforts in this regard, we offer our own thick(er) conception of what limitations analysis ought to look like. We offer this thicker conception not because we think that it is, in the abstract, to be preferred. We proffer the thicker conception because we think that the Court's current approach to rights interpretation and limitations analysis lacks analytical rigour.

That thicker conception begins with an appropriate standard of review for limitations analysis. This standard of review takes the form of, what we called above, a doctrine of shared constitutional interpretation. This doctrine mediates between the doctrine of constitutional supremacy (a doctrine that does not shy away from the necessity of judicial law-making) and the doctrine of separation of powers (a doctrine that often justifies the 'need' for judicial deference). That said, the courts must still articulate a general normative framework that gives the standard of review real purchase and which thereby guides the behaviour of political actors and citizens alike. In the Final Constitution, and in FC s 36 in particular, the creation of a normative framework adequate to the task of limitations analysis turns on giving adequate content to the phrase 'open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'. This task requires that we do something which the courts themselves have only gotten half-right: we offer a description of how the value of dignity and the principle of democracy work — in tandem — to produce, in Theunis Roux's words, a political system in which 'rights . . . lie at the very heart of South African democracy'.[1] Thus, whereas the Court has privileged the value of dignity over the other four values found in the Final Constitution's favourite catchphrase, we reassert the priority of democracy. That reassertion does not, of course, provide an easy algorithm for resolving conflicts between various rights, values and other pressing, constitutionally-mandated, imperatives. Even if, as we have argued previously, and Professor Roux himself notes, fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis are both driven by a commitment to rights and democracy,[2] courts are still left with the

[1] Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 10.3.

[2] For a discussion of the relationship between fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis, see § 34.3(a) infra. See also Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at § 10.3. ('What is often forgotten when thinking about the two-stage approach to constitutional adjudication is that both stages of the inquiry are driven by considerations of rights and democracy: the first stage because it involves an assessment of whether the right in question has been infringed, in a context in which FC s 7(1) provides that the 'Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy' and 'affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'; and the second stage because limitations analysis involves the assessment of whether the right has been reasonably and justifiably limited, measured against the standards of 'an open and democratic society based decidedly difficult task of harmonizing constitutionally-permissible, but conflicting, ends. As we suggest in our critique of balancing, the goods reflected in rights and in laws are often incommensurable. Conflict resolution in the face of value incommsurability requires substantially more than the invocation of such patmetaphors as the 'scales of justice'. In our final, highly speculative section, we defend the use of a particular form of judicial narrative-making — storytelling. The difference between story-telling as the preferred form of judicial narrative-making in hard cases and the reliance on cryptic justifications for hard choices is the difference between a good explanation and a bad explanation for the decisions that we take in terms of FC s 36. The better the explanation, the more persuasive it will be. For those who need persuading, the more persuasive the decision, the more legitimate it will be deemed to be. Storytelling, properly understood, is a rhetorical form that enables judges, in Sachs J's words, to challenge the 'hydraulic insistence on conformity to majoritarian standards'[1] and to consider a range of possible outcomes that might not otherwise have occurred to them or their public.

34.2 Drafting History

The limitation clauses of the Interim Constitution and Final Constitutions have a complex history. The text of both clauses reflects a wide array of indigenous concerns and foreign influences. This section uses the drafting history to illuminate the meaning of various sections of the Final Constitution's limitation clause.

(a) Evolution of the clause[2]

The basic form of the Interim Constitution's limitation clause did not change over the course of the twelve reports generated by the Multi-Party Negotiating on human dignity, equality and freedom'. He continues: 'Of course, resolving the rights-democracy tension is not really this simple. Rights are in tension with democracy, and it will not always be readily apparent when a decision to vindicate a right against the will of the majority will serve the democratic values listed in FC s 7(1), and when it will not. But what FC s 7(1) decisively does do is to put beyond question the idea that there will be at least some occasions when the vindication of a right at the expense of majoritarian wishes will not be undemocratic.')

[1] In Sachs J's view, a reasonable accommodation of conflicting interests must avoid two opposite dangers:

> On the one hand, there is the temptation to proffer an over-valiant lance in defence of an under-protected group without paying regard to the real difficulties facing law-enforcement agencies. On the other, there is the tendency somnambulistically to sustain the existing system of administration of justice and the mind-set that goes with it, simply because, like Everest, it is there; in the words of Burger CJ, it is necessary to be aware of "requirements of contemporary society exerting a hydraulic insistence on conformity to majoritarian standards."

Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC) ('Prince') at para 156.

[2] That the Technical Committee or Ad Hoc Committee notes will 'generally' be of 'some' assistance in understanding the meaning and purpose of a constitutional provision is beyond dispute. See Makwanyane (supra) at 679 (Chaskalson P wrote: 'Such background material can provide a context for interpretation of the Constitution and where it serves that purpose, I can see no reason why it should be excluded. The precise nature of the evidence, and the purpose for which it may be tendered, will determine the weight to be given to it.')

Forum's Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights. In its Second Report, the Committee identified what it believed to be the primary features of a limitation clause: (a) a 'law of general application' threshold test; (b) a reasonableness requirement; (c) a necessity requirement; (d) a 'justifiable in a free, open and democratic society' requirement; (e) a proportionality or balancing approach; (f) a 'non-derogation from the essential content of the right' requirement; and (g) immunization of select rights from any limitation at all. With the exception of the last characteristic, all of these attributes appear in one form or another in the twelfth and final version of the Interim Constitution's limitation clause.[1] That said, the transformation of some of these attributes over twelve drafts gives our exegesis of the text initial direction.

The first significant transformation was the elimination of the immunization proviso. It appeared initially that certain rights would be expressly inviolable.[2] In the seventh draft that proviso — and the concomitant commitment to inviolability — disappeared.[3] However, that certain rights were no longer expressly inviolable did not mean that the drafters believed that these rights were now in fact limitable. By stipulating that no restriction on a fundamental right could negate the essential content of the right, the drafters of the Interim Constitution believed that they had effectively immunized certain rights from limitation.[4]

[1] Cf Etienne Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where: Introducing the Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31 (Argues that the disappearance of a proviso that would immunize select rights from limitation in favour of an analytic structure which would subject all rights to justifiable limitation may overemphasize symmetry at the expense of common sense.)

[2] See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Third Report' (28 May 1993) 8 ('Typical among those which are regarded as absolutely inviolable are freedom from torture and freedom of conscience, religion, belief, thought and opinion.') See also Fifth Report of the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights (11 June 1993) 14 ('With the exception of the rights and freedoms referred to in Section 6(2), 7 (excepting the right not to be subject to forced labour), 9 (excepting freedom of religion), 21 and 27, the rights and freedoms entrenched in this Chapter may be limited by a law of general application, provided that such limitation — (a) shall be permissible to the extent (i) necessary and reasonable, and (ii) justifiable in a free, open and democratic society, and (b) shall not negate the essential content of the right or freedom in question.' (Emphasis added.))

[3] Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Seventh Report' (29 July 1993) 10 ('The rights and freedoms entrenched in this Chapter may be limited by a law applying generally and not solely to an individual case, provided that such limitation — (a) shall be permissible to the extent (i) reasonable, and (ii) justifiable in a free, open and democratic society, and (b) shall not negate the essential content of the right or freedom in question . . .')

[4] Despite the excision of the immunization proviso, the drafters continued to speak of illimitable rights. See Combined Meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee and the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights (14 September 1993) 22 (The combined meeting generated the following list of illimitable rights: human dignity, freedom and security of the person (in so far as it protects against torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment punishment), rights of detained, arrested and accused persons (in so far as they include the rights to reasons for detention, to detention under dignified conditions, to be informed of the right to remain silent and not to be compelled to make a confession if arrested, and the rights if accused to be informed of the charge, to be presumed innocent, to remain silent during plea proceedings, not to be a compellable witness, not to be convicted of an ex post facto crime, not to be subject to two trials for the same crime, to be tried in a language the accused understands, and to be sentenced within a reasonable period of conviction), and the rights of children not to be neglected, abused, or subject to child labour and to be detained in appropriate conditions. How the text was to ensure their illimitability, in the absence of an immunization proviso, the combined meeting did not say.)

The second significant transformation of the limitation clause involved the death and the resurrection of the word 'necessary'. The disappearance of the term from the Fifth Report through the Seventh Report of the Technical Committee signalled either the desire to relax the limitation test or the belief that the term was redundant.[1] The trauvaux préparatoires do not say. In the Eleventh Report, the term 'necessary' reappears and comes to occupy a very different place in the architecture of the limitation clause. The Technical Committee's notes make it clear that the term is meant to subject limitations placed upon a particular set of enumerated rights to a stricter form of judicial scrutiny.[2]

(b) Foreign influences

The undeniable debt our limitation clause owes to the Canadian Charter justified the close attention our courts initially paid to Canadian case law.[3] And despite the

[1] Compare Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Fifth Report' (11 June 1993) 14 (Rights and freedoms may be limited 'to the extent (i) necessary and reasonable') with Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Seventh Report' (29 July 1993) 12 (Rights and freedoms may be limited 'to the extent (i) reasonable.')

[2] See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Tenth Report' (5 October 1993) 30 ('[A] law limiting a right entrenched in sections . . . shall be strictly construed for constitutional validity.' (emphasis added)). The debt to American jurisprudence is made explicit in the draft committee notes. Indeed, the rights in s 33(1)(aa) and (bb) had been subject to a 'strict scrutiny' provision in previous drafts of the interpretation clause — and not in the limitation clause. However, when the drafters got wind of the potential for incoherence that would result from having a 'reasonableness' test in a Canadian-style limitation clause and an American-style shifting of standards of scrutiny in the interpretation clause, they excised the offending text in the interpretation clause and modified the limitation clause accordingly. For a fuller explanation of the problems with the original formulation of the limitation and the interpretation clauses, see Cathi Albertyn, Ronalda Murphy, Polly Halfkenny & Stu Woolman 'Critique of the Tenth Progress Report of the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights' (September 1993)(Memorandum on file with author.) In the Eleventh Report, the Committee explains the change as follows: 'If the Council is of the opinion that laws limiting certain rights should be subject to a stricter form of review than laws limiting other rights, the Technical Committee proposes the inclusion of the second proviso as submitted. This would mean that for the laws limiting rights listed in the proviso, a necessity test will apply in addition to the test for reasonableness already required by clause 34(1)(a)(i). In this way, the further logical development of principles conceived in Canadian jurisprudence will be possible without creating the danger of confusion with the fundamentally different principles enunciated in US jurisprudence.' Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Eleventh Report' (8 November 1993) 14-15. See also Lourens du Plessis 'A Note on Application, Interpretation, Limitation and Suspension Clauses in South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights' (1994) 5 Stellenbosch LR 86, 89 (Committee's attention drawn to potential incoherence of the two clauses by aforementioned memo; offending text in interpretation clause excised and moved to limitation clause.)

[3] The Interim Constitution's limitation clause, the Final Constitution's limitation clause and the Canadian Charter's limitation clause share two important characteristics. First, they apply generally to the constitutionally enshrined rights. (Thus, they differ from those constitutions (and conventions) that have individualized limitation clauses within particular rights, and those constitutions (and conventions) which have no limitation clause(s) at all.) Secondly, the language of the Final Constitution's limitation clause is strikingly similar to the language of the Canadian Charter. Section 1 of the Canadian Charter reads, in relevant part, that the 'guarantees . . . set out in . . . [the Charter are] subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.' The Final Constitution's limitation clause reads, in relevant part, that the 'rights of this Chapter [on Fundamental Rights] may be limited by law of general application provided that such limitation . . . is . . . reasonable . . . and justifiable in an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom.'

fact that our courts have never followed the fairly stringent test laid down by the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Oakes, our jurisprudence has developed along roughly similar lines.[1] Limitations analysis under the Charter and our Bill of Rights possesses such common features as (1) a threshold requirement that a limitation must take the form of a 'law of general application';[2] (2) a threshold requirement that the objective of the impugned law be of sufficiently pressing and substantial import to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right;[3] (3) a proportionality assessment that demands, at a minimum, that a rational connection exist between the means employed and the objective sought,[4] that the means

[1] [1986] 1 SCR 103, 26 DLR (4th) 200, 227–28 ('Oakes'). For a more concise wording of this limitations test, see R v Chaulk [1990] 3 SCR 1302, 62 CCC (3d) 193, 216–17. Cf Edwards Books & Art Ltd v The Queen [1986] 2 SCR 713, 35 DLR (4th) 1, 41 (While the Oakes test required the government to go to great lengths to satisfy each leg, the Edwards Court suggests that the government's showing might be subject to a less exacting standard of proof and that the same questions need not be asked in every case). The Oakes test was cited with approval in a large number of early South African Supreme Court judgments, but largely abandoned as a point of reference after Makwanyane. See Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75 (E); Kauesa v Minister of Home Affairs 1995 (1) SA 51 (Nm), 1994 (3) BCLR 1, 26 (Nm); S v Majavu 1994 (4) SA 268 (Ck), 1994 (2) BCLR 56, 83–84 (Ck).

[2] Compare Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 331 (CC)('Dawood') with Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v Canada (1991) 77 DLR (4th) 385.

[3] Compare National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC), 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC) with Oakes (supra) at 227 (The Oakes Court suggests that laws which serve such values as the dignity of the individual, social justice, equality, tolerance, cultural diversity, and a commitment to representative and participatory politics — constitutive features of a free and democratic society — could be of sufficient import to justify the infringement of constitutional rights. This list echoes our own quintet, captured in the phrase an 'open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'. Neither list of values or objectives is meant to be exhaustive.) See also Vriend v Alberta [1998] 1 SCR 493 (Despite the benevolent and sufficiently pressing objectives of the Alberta Parliament in promulgating a human rights charter, Supreme Court finds that the failure of Alberta's human rights charter to prohibit, expressly, discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation violated, unjustifiably, Charter s 15's right to equality.) But see Little Sisters Book & Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice) [2000] — SCR — (The legislation reflected a pressing and substantial parliamentary objective of prohibiting the entry of socially harmful materials into Canada, and the customs procedures under scrutiny were rationally connected to that objective.)

[4] The requirement that the restrictive measure be rationally connected to the achievement of its objective is a test legislation rarely fails in Canadian jurisprudence. But see Oakes (supra) at 200 (Reverse onus provision requiring individual in possession of drugs to show that she was not trafficking deemed rationally unrelated to objective of stopping trafficking); Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143, 56 DLR (4th) 1 (Holds that citizenship requirements for bar membership were unrelated to the objective of ensuring that lawyers carried out their duties in an honourable and conscientious manner); Benner v Canada [1997] 1 SCR 358 (Stricter requirements for Canadian citizenship placed upon a person born outside of Canada before 1977 to a Canadian mother than those requirement placed upon a person born to a Canadian father before 1977 were found not to be rationally connected to the objective of keeping dangerous people out of the country.) The rational connection requirement — which provides a minimum floor for justification below which government's explanations may not fall — has been dispositive in a relatively large number of South African cases. See, eg, S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at paras 20, 22–23 (Court held that effective prohibition of the abuse of illegal drugs would not be substantially furthered by a legislative presumption that a person found in possession of 115 grams of dagga is a dealer, and thus that there was no logical connection between such possession and the presumption that the person is trafficking); S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (3) BCLR 279, 293–94 (CC)(Court found no rational relationship between a mandatory employed impair the right as 'little as possible',[1] and that the burdens imposed on those whose rights are impaired do not outweigh the benefits to society that flow from the limitation.[2] sentence of life imprisonment and the crime for which it was imposed because state could not demonstrate that the penalty would serve as a deterrent); Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at para 26 (Limitation only minimally related to its purpose.) See, for further references to apposite cases, § 34.8*(c)*(iv) infra.

[1] For examples in Canadian jurisprudence, see Dunmore v Ontario [2001] 3 SCR 1016 (Canadian Supreme Court finds that the exclusion of agricultural workers from the respondent's labour relations statute did not constitute least restrictive limitation on the right to freedom of expression); UCFW v Kmart Canada [1999] 2 SCR 1083 (Prohibition of a peaceful distribution of leaflets by a striking union at sites not included in the labour dispute was found not to be the least restrictive means of minimizing disruption of businesses not involved in the dispute); Thomson Newspapers Co. v Canada [1998] 1 SCR 877 (Prohibition of the publication of opinion polls in the final three days of an election campaign was found not to be the least restrictive means of protecting voters from inaccurate information); Ross v New Brunswick School District [1996] 1 SCR 825 (Recommendation by board of inquiry that a person employed in a non-teaching position by the school board must be fired if he continued with his distribution of anti-semitic leaflets deemed not to be the least restrictive means of rectifying a discriminatory climate in the school); RJR-McDonald v Canada [1995] 3 SCR 199 (Federal ban on all advertising of tobacco products deemed not to be the least restrictive means of reducing the consumption of tobacco.) For examples in South African jurisprudence, see S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC) at para 43 (Purpose of a reverse onus provision, in terms of which someone who had acquired stolen goods was presumed to be guilty of a statutory offence, could also be achieved by a less restrictive means, namely a more narrowly tailored reverse onus provision which was confined to certain categories of more expensive stolen goods); Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at paras 26–28 (Objective of the limitation — to minimise the harm that may result from the consumption of liquor in public places — could be achieved through measures that were less restrictive of the right to freedom of expression.) For further examples of such cases, see § 34.8*(c)*(v) infra.

However, neither the Canadian Supreme Court nor our Constitutional Court requires perfection — or the least restrictive means in the best of all possible worlds. See Reference re ss 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code [1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1138, 56 CCC (3d) 65 ("The legislative scheme . . . need not be the most 'perfect' scheme that could be imagined by this Court or any other Court. Rather it is sufficient if it is appropriately and carefully tailored in the context of the infringed right.') The Constitutional Court, while accepting the Final Constitution's invitation to consider the availability of less restrictive means, has made it clear that such a requirement does not mean that the legislature must, in fact, have identified and enshrined in law the least restrictive means for achieving the objective of a limitation. See Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 62 (Mokgoro J)(Court affords legislature a 'margin of appreciation' with respect to choosing the most effective means of achieving a constitutionally permissible objective.) Moreover, institutional comity cautions against the substitution of its judgment of what constitutes the least restrictive means for the well-considered opinion of the legislature or the executive. For more on 'less restrictive means', see § 34.8*(c)*(v) infra.

[2] The Canadian Supreme Court has found minimum drug sentences (R v Smith [1987] 1 SCR 1045, 40 DLR (4th) 435), laws protecting the confidentiality of matrimonial proceedings (Edmonton Journal v Alberta [1989] 2 SCR 1326, 64 DLR (4th) 577), by-pass and notice provisions for abortions (R v Morgenthaler [1988] 1 SCR 30, 44 DLR (4th) 385), citizenship requirements for bar membership (Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143, 56 DLR (4th) 1), and restrictions on advertising by dentists (Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons [1990] 2 SCR 232, 71 DLR (4th) 68) to impose costs and injuries disproportionate to the alleged benefits. On the other hand, it has found measures intended to prevent drunk-driving (R v Hufsky [1988] 1 SCR 621, 40 CCC (3d) 398; R v Thomsen [1988] 1 SCR 640, 40 CCC (3d) 411), to restrict publication of sex-assault victims' names (Canadian Newspapers Co v Canada (Attorney General) [1988] 2 SCR 122, 52 DLR (4th) 690), and to prohibit picketing outside courthouses (BCGEU v

While both our Constitutional Court and the Canadian Supreme Court state that limitations analysis ought, in general, to follow the model adumbrated above, they have rejected the ostensibly more mechanical approach to limitations delineated in Oakes.[1] Whether the benefits of a flexible test outweigh the potential for confusion with respect to its application by lower courts and its use as a standard by state and private actors is a subject that shall occupy us throughout the remainder of this chapter.[2]

British Columbia (Attorney General) [1988] 2 SCR 214, 53 DLR (4th) 1) to impose costs proportionate to the benefits realized.

In appraising whether the costs imposed by a limitation outweigh the benefits that might otherwise accrue, the Constitutional Court sometimes considers whether the limitation affects the core values underlying a particular right. It has found that the right to be tried in a hearing presided over by a judicial officer is a core component of the right not to be detained without trial. See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 89. Similarly, reverse onus provisions are said to strike at the heart of the right to be presumed innocent, and so require a clear and convincing demonstration that the benefits of such a provision outweigh its costs. See Manamela (supra) at para 49. By contrast, the benefits that flowed from a prohibition of child pornography were found to outweigh considerably the costs imposed upon those persons whose right to freedom of expression had been restricted. See De Reuck (supra) at para 59. For more on the notions of 'the core' and 'the periphery', see §§ 34.8*(c)*(iii) and (d) infra.

[1] See Edward Books and Art Ltd v The Queen [1986] 2 SCR 713, 35 DLR (4th) 1, 41 ('[T]he nature of the proportionality test would vary depending upon the circumstances. Both in articulating the standard of proof and in describing the criteria comprising the proportionality requirement, the Court has been careful to avoid rigid and inflexible standards'); Black v Law Society of Alberta [1989] 1 SCR 591, 58 DLR (4th) 317, 348 ('[L]egislature must be given sufficient room to achieve its objective'); USA v Cotroni [1989] 1 SCR 1469, 1489, 48 CCC (3d) 193 ('[A] mechanistic approach [to the proportionality test] must be avoided'); Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143, 56 DLR (4th) 1, 41 ('The test must be approached in a flexible manner. The analysis should be functional, focusing on the character of the classification in question, the constitutional and societal importance of the interests adversely affected, the relative importance to the individuals affected of the benefit of which they are deprived, and the importance of the state interest.') The Canadian Supreme Court has said that cases involving the criminal justice system are subject to closer judicial scrutiny and a stricter form of the minimal impairment test than labour or business regulations, because criminal justice is an area in which the court can claim greater expertise. See McKinney v University of Guelph [1990] 3 SCR 229, 76 DLR (4th) 545. But in at least one criminal case, the Supreme Court applied a fairly weak version of the minimal impairment test and upheld the extradition of the accused. See USA v Cotroni [1989] 1 SCR 1469, 48 CCC 193. See also Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 12 (Court employs weaker version of Oakes test in criminal context.)

The Oakes test has no special place in South African constitutional jurisprudence. Although the Oakes test featured prominently in the Makwanyane Court's discussion of comparative limitations jurisprudence, Chaskalson P was quick to point out that 'there are differences between our Constitution and the Canadian Charter which have a bearing on the way in which section 33 should be dealt with'. Makwanyane (supra) at paras 105–107, 110. Chaskalson P gave no indication of what the relevant differences might be, but simply echoed the words of Kentridge AJ in Zuma that 'I see no reason in this case . . . to fit our analysis into the Canadian pattern.' See Zuma (supra) at para 35.

[2] With respect to limitations analysis under the Charter, Ruth Colker has suggested that too loose a proportionality test threatens indiscriminate judicial deference to legislative and executive prerogatives. See Ruth Colker 'Section 1, Contextuality and the Anti-disadvantage Principle' (1992) 42 University of Toronto LJ 77, 104. There is also a second danger. A lack of analytical precision may make it more difficult to anticipate the kinds of arguments that would lead the court to conclude that a limitation of a right is (or is not) reasonable and justifiable. The absence of rules of law to which political actors must align their behaviour undermines the ability of other branches of government to comply with the Bill of Rights —

Many of the obvious influences of other constitutional documents on the Interim Constitution's limitation clause have been eliminated from the text of the Final Constitution. IC s 33 required limitations of certain rights to be both 'reasonable' and 'necessary', while other rights could be limited in a manner that was merely 'reasonable'. That distinction, clearly inspired by the doctrines of strict scrutiny, intermediate scrutiny and rationality review found in American equal protection and fundamental rights jurisprudence, was excised in favour of a test that does not pre-judge the importance of the fundamental rights found in Chapter 2. And while the German Basic Law's contribution of the requirement that limitations of fundamental rights can only be justified by reference to a 'law of general application' remains on the books,[1] the drafters of the Final Constitution decided not to retain its proscription of limitations that 'negate the essential content of [a] right'.[2]

34.3 Relationship Between Fundamental Rights Analysis and Limitation Analysis

This section attempts to answer a basic question in Bill of Rights analysis: how does fundamental rights analysis relate to limitation clause analysis? That is, what happens in the first stage of analysis, what remains to be done in the second stage, why do we allocate certain analytical tasks to one stage and not the other, and how do we justify our overall approach to constitutional interpretation?

and places the court in the unnecessarily uncomfortable position of having to reject or to accept government's positions in any given case as if they were ruling ab initio. We believe that such considerations constitute some of the strongest arguments against Sunstein's 'one case at a time' approach or Currie's 'jurisprudence of avoidance'. See Cass Sunstein One Case at a Time (1996); Iain Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138. In addition, the absence of clearly articulated rules undermines rational political discourse. Reasoned disagreement can only take place when the parties agree on the terms of the debate. The Constitutional Court abdicates its institutional responsibility to model rational political discourse by refusing to state, in a comprehensive manner, the reasons that lead to its conclusions. Finally, avoidance undermines the 'integrity' of the legal system. It is impossible to create a more coherent jurisprudence without identifying the rules — and the reasons — that ground decisions.

[1] For more on German constitutional jurisprudence and its contribution to the Interim Constitution, see Matthew Chaskalson, Dennis Davis & Johan de Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism: The Role of Constitutional Interpretation' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 1. See also Johan de Waal 'A Comparative Analysis of the Provisions of German Origin in the Interim Bill of Rights' (1995) 11 SAJHR 1.

[2] Article 19.2 of the German Basic Law reads, in relevant part: '[I]n no case may the essential content of a right be encroached upon.' The inclusion of this clause in the German Basic Law reflects the drafters' belief that legislation under the Weimar Constitution had been interpreted in such a way as to permit the complete evisceration of that constitution's guarantees. The clause was designed to provide a floor below which restrictions on fundamental rights could not fall. See Theodor Maunz & Gunter Durig Grundgesetz Kommentar (1991) Art 19, II-9; Gerhard Erasmus 'Limitation and Suspension' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 629, 650.

(a) The value-based approach and the notional approach

The general nature of constitutional interpretation and the interpretation of fundamental rights are dealt with at length elsewhere in this work.[1] To rehearse the conclusions of those chapters briefly, FC s 39 tells us that the content and the scope of the rights enshrined in Chapter 2 should be determined in the light of the five fundamental values which animate the entire constitutional enterprise: openness, democracy, human dignity, freedom, and equality.[2] FC s 39 thereby confirms that the determination of a right's scope is a value-based exercise. However, the scope-determinative values are not limited to the five identified in FC s 39. For each right there are specific values that can be said to have led to its constitutionalization. The specific values that animate each right, along with FC s 39's more general concerns, determine the right's sphere of protected activity.

On this account, if an applicant can show that the exercise of constitutionally protected activity has been impaired, then she has made a prima facie showing of a constitutional infringement. If the infringement was authorized by law, then the state or the party relying upon this law will have an opportunity to justify its prima facie infringement of the right under the limitation clause.

There is of course another way to go. One could argue that any activity which could notionally fall within the ambit of a right is protected. It remains then to show that law — as opposed to mere conduct — limited the exercise of the right before moving on to the heart of FC s 36 analysis.[3] There are several reasons to prefer the first approach to the second approach. First, it is consistent with the text's admonition that provisions of the Bill of Rights be interpreted in light of the 'values which underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. The Final Constitution was not meant to protect certain forms of behaviour and a value-based approach permits us to screen out those forms of behaviour which do not merit constitutional protection. Secondly, high value-based barriers for the first stage of analysis mean that only genuine and serious violations of a constitutional right make it through to FC s 36. If only serious infringements make it through, then the court can take a fairly rigorous approach with respect to the justification for the impairment. It could then be fairly confident that when it nullified law or conduct there would be something [1] Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 3; Christo Botha & Abdul Fumah 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2007) Chapter 32.

[2] These five values do not operate on the same normative plane: the conditions required for the realization of the first two values — openness and democracy — are contingent on the realization of the next three — human dignity, freedom, and equality. Perhaps, as we discuss below, one should speak of de-linking the first set of values from the second. See § 34.8*(e)*(ii) infra.

[3] See Gerhard van der Schyff Limitation of Rights: A Study of the European Convention and the South African Bill of Rights (2005) 29–124. Van der Schyff defends a notional approach to rights analysis. He argues that 'a wide interpretation should be followed in order to extend protection to as many forms of conduct and interests as possible'. Ibid at 32.

worth protecting. Thirdly, the valued-based approach is consistent with the notion that a 'unity of values' underlies both the rights-infringement determination and the limitation-justification analysis. The language of the interpretation clause and the limitation clause strongly suggests that both inquiries are driven by a desire to serve the five values underlying our entire constitutional enterprise: openness, democracy, human dignity, freedom, and equality.[1]

The desirability of the value-based approach is perhaps clearer when compared with the consequences of the notional or the expansive approach to rights interpretation. First, the notional approach suggests that certain forms of behaviour which we believe do not merit constitutional protection will in fact receive prima facie protection. Secondly, the notional approach expands the number of claims that make it to the second stage of analysis. The result is that if the courts wish to curtail their findings of unconstitutionality, their criteria for the justification of government limitations on rights have to become more flexible. The further possibility exists that in order to make their justificatory criteria more flexible the courts will expand the kinds of objectives which justify limitations on constitutional rights. This result would seem to stand in direct conflict with the textual demand that both interpretation and limitations analysis be undertaken in the light of the needs of an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. Finally, by pushing all of the Chapter 2 analysis into the limitation clause, and forcing themselves to be more flexible with respect to the grounds for justification of a limitation, the courts undercut their ability to articulate analytically rigorous conceptions of rights at the first stage of analysis and useful standards of justification for limitations at the second stage of analysis.[2]

(b) The Constitutional Court's approach to two-stage analysis

For the most part, the problem with the Constitutional Court's current position on the two-stage approach to fundamental rights analysis is that it offers little insight or guidance.[3] The Court has neither described in detail the analytical processes

[1] For a similar discussion of how the 'unity of values' affects the structure of fundamental rights analysis under the Canadian Charter, see Lorraine Weinrib 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Section One of the Charter' (1988) 10 Supreme Court LR 469. See also § 34.8*(e)*(ii).

[2] The value-based approach should result in a more restrictive interpretation of the scope or the ambit. It would, nevertheless, be wrong to characterize this approach as 'narrow' or 'restrictive' — as opposed to generous. The point is not to restrict the protective ambit of constitutional rights but, rather, to make sense of FC s 39(1)'s injunction to interpret constitutional rights in view of the values of democracy, openness, dignity, equality and freedom, and to effect the best possible division of tasks between the first stage and the second stage of fundamental-rights analysis. Nor can this approach be characterized as 'minimalist.' Minimalism, as a judicial stratagem, is designed to permit judges to avoid deciding difficult doctrinal issues. The result is often judgments that are radically under-theorized. The value-based approach requires judges to articulate the basis for their pronouncements at both stages of the inquiry. If anything, the value-based approach to rights interpretation and limitations analysis reflects 'maximalist' orientation towards constitutional interpretation.

[3] See, eg, Makwanyane (supra) at para 100 ('Our Constitution . . . calls for a "two-step" approach, in which a broad rather than a narrow interpretation is given to the fundamental rights enshrined in Chapter 3 and limitations have to be justified through the application of s 33.') that occur at each step nor has it justified the allocation of certain tasks to particular stages of the analysis.[1] Early on in the Court's tenure, two justices had something relatively substantial to say about the relationship between rights interpretation and limitations analysis. Sachs J states his position*(s)* in a concurrence in Coetzee and a concurrence in Ferreira. Ackermann J states his position*(s)* in a dissent in Ferreira and the majority opinion in Bernstein.[2]

In Ferreira Sachs J sets out to develop the Court's largely unarticulated understanding of the relationship between rights analysis and limitations analysis in a manner which ostensibly avoids the alleged 'sterility' of the two-stage approach.[3] Sachs J's rationale for his project flows from his belief that the Court 'should not engage in purely formal or academic analyses, nor simply restrict [itself] to ad hoc technism'.[4] Rather the Court should, when undertaking fundamental rights analysis, 'focus on what has been called the synergetic relationship between the values underlying the guarantees of fundamental rights and the circumstances of the particular case'.[5] The judge then concludes that '[i]n [his] view, faithfulness to the Constitution is best achieved by locating the two-stage balancing process within a holistic, value-based and case-oriented framework'.[6] Beyond these generalizations, Sachs J offers little in the way of clear direction for what a new relationship between rights interpretation and limitations analysis would look like. He simply enjoins his fellow judges to 'exercise … a structured and disciplined value judgment, taking account of all the competing considerations that arise in the present case'.[7]

There are several potential problems with Sachs J's intervention on this subject. First, a two-stage approach is not necessarily 'formal' or 'academic'. The quality of the inquiry depends on the nature of the questions asked, not on their number or their order. Secondly, it is impossible to know what Sachs J means by a 'synergetic relationship' between the two stages of analysis or by the 'exercise … of a structured and disciplined value judgment' when he gives neither examples nor further description of these processes. Thirdly, and most disturbing, is Sachs J's vision of a 'two-stage balancing process within a holistic, value-based and case-oriented framework'.

Sachs J's apparent vision of balancing at both stages ignores the clear intention and the structure of a bill of rights which possesses both fundamental rights and a general limitations clause: that different forms of analysis will take place at different stages of analysis. Intentions and structure aside, as a historical matter few

[1] But see Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 35 (Court recognizes difference between definitional questions asked at the rights infringement stage and justificatory questions asked at the limitations stage).

[2] Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC).

[3] Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison 1995 (4) SA 651 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee') at para 46.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at para 47.

judges and academics view the first stage of analysis as involving a balancing of interests. The first stage of analysis is generally understood to require the judge to determine the ambit of the right. The determination is made by asking what values underlie the right and then, in turn, what practices serve those values. The judge is not required to compare the importance of the values underlying the right allegedly being infringed with the values said to underlie the policy or right or interest said to support the alleged infringement. This comparison is left for the second stage of analysis under the limitations clause. It is under the limitations clause that we ask whether a party's interest in having a challenged law upheld is of sufficient import to justify the infringement of a right.

Another sense of 'value choice' employed during the process of determining the contours of a right is worth discussing: namely, the fact that not all activity that might notionally qualify as a demonstration merits the right's protection.[1] For example, a group of skinheads tossing trashcans through plate-glass windows, shouting racial epithets, and protesting the presence of immigrant communities might be attempting to convey collectively a 'political' message that is generally not countenanced by mainstream parties. The fact that it is not a peaceful conveyance and, indeed, that the primary motivations for the acts are destructive and not communicative may, however, take this demonstration outside the bounds of protected activity.[2]

What should be clear is that the determination made here is one of definition or demarcation, not balancing. We are asking what counts as protected assembly activity, not whether this kind of protected activity, when offset against some competing set of public or private interests, still merits protection. We are deciding what values animate and what practices are protected by a particular right. The problem of value conflict between a right and a law that limits the exercise of that right is played out at the next stage of inquiry — the limitations clause.

At the same time, there are occasions in which it makes sense to talk about value conflict within a right. For example, freedom of expression is generally understood to be grounded, at least in part, in the value of political participation. However, the value of political participation may be served by practices which [1] Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

[2] We have already noted that we are indebted to Halton Cheadle for pointing out that in the first edition of this work one of the authors — Stu Woolman — erred when he suggested that an assessment of the entitlement of the claimant to the benefit of a constitutional right is a part of rights analysis. Cheadle observed correctly that the author had conflated issues of standing and rights analysis. See Halton Cheadle 'Limitation of Rights' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 693, 696. But we must point out that the actual quote from the chapter by Stu Woolman in the first edition of this work, which Cheadle cites in support of this otherwise correct proposition, does not support his subsequent analysis. Ibid at 696.

conflict with one another.[1] Hate speech may be thought by those expressing it to reflect their participation in or contribution to the political process. At the same time the targets of the hate speech — especially when it is directed at small or marginal social groups — may find that the expression of hate speech makes it difficult for them to express themselves fully or equally in the public square. They may feel coerced into silence by the hate speech. They may feel that the hate speech creates invidious conditions in which others will inevitably fail to listen to them or to take them seriously. Hate speech thus creates a paradox. Deny the expression of the hate speakers and you deny them full political participation. Permit the expression of the hate speakers and you deny the targets of their hate speech full political participation. It is a value conflict, under the freedom of expression, which cannot be reconciled. One kind of expression, and its attendant value, must give way to another form of expression, with its attendant value. But this assessment is not a form of balancing. One unconstitutional practice yields to another constitutionally protected practice. So this 'paradox' lends no support to the proposition that balancing occurs at both stages of analysis.

If a general limitations test is cause for concern for those interested in strong rights enforcement, then talk of introducing balancing into the first stage of analysis — where one determines the ambit of the right — should be cause for alarm. Doing balancing at both stages is an open invitation for the worst kind of analytical confusion.[2] How, one must ask, does the balancing at the first stage differ from the balancing at the limitations stage? What 'balancing of what' does one do at each stage? Why have the limitations clause at all? Greater specification of the modalities of both rights interpretation and limitations analysis would seem to be required.[3]

Of course, we may have misinterpreted Sachs J's interventions in Coetzee. In his judgment in Ferreira, Sachs J approaches the meaning of 'freedom … of the person' in IC s 11(1) in a relatively circumspect manner. In contrast to the expansive interpretation of IC s 11(1) offered by Ackermann J, an approach that Sachs J says might force the court to 'test the reasonableness or necessity of each and every piece of regulation undertaken by the state', Sachs J suggests that 'the Constitution … requires the court to focus its attention on real and substantial infringements of fundamental rights.'[4] A charitable reading of this intervention might lead one to conclude that Sachs J believes that the rights interpretation and limitations analysis differ substantially. But we are not

[1] See Robert Post 'The Constitutional Concept of Public Discourse' (1990) 103 Harvard LR 601; Robert Post 'Racist Speech, Democracy and the First Amendment' (1991) 32 William & Mary LR 267.

[2] For a detailed discussion of this danger, see Stu Woolman 'The Limitations of Justice Sachs's Concurrence: Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa' (1996) 12 SAJHR 99, 115–21; Stu Woolman & Johan de Waal 'Voting With Your Feet: The Freedom of Assembly' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 292, 308–14.

[3] See Alfred Cockrell 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 1.

[4] Ferreira (supra) at para 252.

convinced, by any other statement in either opinion, that an integrated assessment of Sachs J's conclusions in Coetzee and Ferreira yields new fruit with respect to our understanding of the relationship between rights interpretation and limitations analysis.

Ackermann J's contributions to this discussion are a bit more difficult to track. Indeed, his decisions in Ferreira and Bernstein seem to point in opposite directions. In Ferreira, Ackermann J starts off as if he might follow a value-based approach to rights analysis. He writes:

> [I]t is necessary, as a matter of construction, to define or circumscribe the s 11(1) right to the extent necessary for purposes of this decision . . . [S]ome attempt must be made at this stage to determine the meaning, nature and extent of the right . . . This court has given its approval to an interpretive approach 'which . . . gives expression to the underlying values of the Constitution'.[1]

But after reading 'freedom' in IC s 11(1) disjunctively from 'security of the person', and then giving a ringing defence of 'freedom' qua negative liberty, Ackermann J's real position on rights analysis and limitations analysis becomes clearer. He argues that while a 'broad and generous interpretation does not deny or preclude the constitutionally valid . . . role of state intervention in the economic as well as the civil and political spheres . . . legitimate limitations on freedom must occur through and be justified under the principles formulated in IC s 33(1), not by giving a restricted definition of the right to freedom.'[2] While some interpreters might characterize this approach to rights analysis as both purposive and generous,[3] it seems to possess the same problems that attach to the notional approach to rights interpretation described above: all the difficult inquiries take place within the rather amorphous frame provided by the limitations clause.[4]

Two particular problems with the notional approach — as it was applied to freedom of the person under IC s 11(1) — are worth mentioning. First, one reason that Ackermann J's judgment is rejected by the majority is the relative unboundedness he imputes to IC s 11(1). Although he describes IC s 11(1)'s right to freedom as being a residual right, he says that if an enumerated right cannot first be found upon which to ground a constitutional challenge to some restriction

[1] Ferreira (supra) at para 252.

[2] Ibid at para 45, quoting Makwanyane (supra) at para 9.

[3] See Halton Cheadle 'Limitation of Rights' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 693, 696.

[4] In fairness to Ackermann J, the problem with his approach to limitations analysis in Ferreira and Bernstein could be entirely a function of his conception of 'freedom'. However, the Court's judgment in FNB, where FC s 25 arbitrariness analysis results in a proportionality test that creates, in Theunis Roux's words, 'a vortex' that captures the entire universe of rights and limitations inquiries, suggests that the Court's — and Ackermann J's — difficulties with maintaining the analytical rigour required by two-stage analysis in Ferreira are not at all exceptional. See Theunis Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46.

of individual liberty, then resort may be had to IC s 11(1). The result, of course, is that Ackermann J's judgment practically begs petitioners to rest at least a portion of all their challenges to some alleged constitutional infringement on IC s 11(1). Secondly, on Ackermann J's understanding, a petitioner might fail to succeed at the first stage of a challenge based on the right to privacy, and yet succeed at the first stage of a challenge based on the unenumerated rights found in IC s 11(1). As Chaskalson P points out, the petitioner would then benefit from the fact that restrictions on IC s 11(1) are subject to the 'necessary' standard of review under IC s 33 and thus have a better chance at ultimately convincing the Court to find the restriction unconstitutional.[1] This anomaly would have meant that an applicant bringing a challenge under the Interim Constitution would actually have preferred to fail on a privacy challenge — which received only 'reasonable' review — and succeed on a residual freedom challenge — which received the higher level of limitations review. Chaskalson P bases at least part of his rejection of Ackermann J's interpretation of IC s 11(1) on the possibility of such a scenario. One might well have agreed with Ackermann J's response that the level of scrutiny a restriction of a right receives under the limitations clause of the Interim Constitution should not affect the court's determination of the content of a right — and that according freedom of the person a higher level of limitations review than privacy is not necessarily anomalous. However, it is Ackermann J's largely notional approach to a right's review — and the dumping of all the important analysis into the limitations clause — that creates the aforementioned problem. For reasons already assayed, the majority of the Ferreira Court rightly avoided the problems associated with this approach.

Perhaps chastened by the majority's rejection of his interpretation of IC ss 11(1) and 33(1) in Ferreira, Ackermann J changes tack in Bernstein in analyzing an attack on the Companies Act based upon IC s 13, the right to privacy. He begins with a brief excursus about the meaning of privacy: he surveys its relationship to autonomy, the dependency of autonomy on community, the common law of privacy in South Africa, international instruments, and the comparative constitutional jurisprudence.[2] He then draws the following conclusions. First, 'the "right to privacy" relates only to the most personal aspects of a person's existence, and not to every aspect of his/her personal experience or knowledge.'[3] Secondly, 'in defining the right to privacy, it is necessary to recognize that the content of the right is crystalized by mutual limitation. Its scope is already delimited by the rights of the community as a whole.'[4]

Bernstein's clearly value-based circumscription of the right to privacy is somewhat startling. Bernstein's mode of rights analysis appears antithetical to the mode

[1] Ferreira (supra) at paras 173–174.
[2] Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein') at paras 65–79.
[3] Ibid at para 79.
[4] Ibid.

of rights analysis adumbrated by Ackermann J in Ferreira.[1] In Bernstein, Ackermann J concludes that not every activity or experience that could notionally count as private deserves constitutional protection under IC s 13. Only those practices that serve the values understood to underlie the right to privacy fall within the sphere of activity protected by the right. While one may disagree with the content Ackermann J ascribes to privacy,[2] he does give the right some discernible value-based content.

But what promise Bernstein offers for a coherent framework for rights interpretation and limitation analysis, Beinash takes back.[3] In Beinash v Ernst & Young, the Constitutional Court addresses the question of whether s 2(1)(b) of the Vexatious Proceedings Act[4] violates the right of access to court under FC s 34.[5] The sum total of the Beinash Court's fundamental rights analysis reads as follows:

> The effect of section 2(1)(b) of the Act is to impose a procedural barrier to litigation on persons who are found to be vexatious litigants. This serves to restrict the access of such persons to courts. That is its very purpose. In so doing, it is inconsistent with section 34 of the Constitution which protects the right of access for everyone and does not contain any internal limitation of the right. The barrier which may be imposed under section 2(1)(b) therefore does limit the right of access to court protected in section 34 of the Constitution.[6]

As a rule, an applicant must run the following gauntlet: (1) ambit determination of the right; (2) impairment of the exercise of the right by law or conduct. Having run this gauntlet, the applicant can rest assured that she has made, at the very least, a prima facie showing of a constitutional infringement. But this is hardly the [1] There is, of course, a more benign interpretation of Ackermann J's approach to the relationship between rights analysis and limitations analysis. One could argue that in Ferreira he takes a purposive and generous approach to rights interpretation because the meaning of 'freedom' in IC s 11(1) warrants such a generous approach. One could then argue that in Bernstein he takes a purposive and non-generous approach to rights interpretation because the meaning of 'privacy' in IC s 13 warrants such a non-generous approach. The problem with this explanation is that Ackermann J does not explain why one right is generously construed while the other is restrictively construed.

[2] See David McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 39.

[3] 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)('Beinash').

[4] Act 3 of 1956.

[5] Fevrier J in the High Court had found the applicants to be vexatious litigants in terms of the Vexatious Proceedings Act. Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (1) SA 1114 (W). This order barred the applicants from bringing any legal proceeding in any court anywhere in South Africa without first securing the appropriate leave from a judge of the High Court. The applicants lodged an appeal with the Constitutional Court. They argued that the provision relied upon by Fevrier J violated their right of access to court under FC s 34. In the alternative, they argued that, as a constitutional matter, Fevrier J had incorrectly exercised his discretion in devising this particular punishment. The Constitutional Court found that the applicable provision of the Vexatious Proceedings Act did indeed infringe the applicants' right of access to court under FC s 34. The Court, however, then held that the Act's infringement of the applicant's right of access to court was both reasonable and justifiable under FC s 36. The Constitutional Court saved the Act on the grounds that the Act establishes an invaluable screening mechanism for the legal system: it ensures that South African courts are not swamped by matters without any merit nor abused by litigants seeking to extort settlements from their innocent adversaries.

[6] Beinash (supra) at para 16.

path traversed by Mokgoro J in Beinash. Mokgoro J does not ask how FC s 34's right of access to court is to be understood in light of FC s 39's five foundational values. Mokgoro J does not inquire into the drafters' motivations for enshrining the right in Chapter 2 or speculate as to the specific practices served by FC s 34.[1] Mokgoro J does not even seriously question whether the applicant's activity was entitled to the protection of the right. Indeed, if she had asked, and answered, any of these inquiries, she might well have held that the applicant's actions were not protected. As we read the facts in Beinash — and the ultimate conclusions of the Court — Mokgoro J ought never to have reached FC s 36.

First, as a matter of logic, it is impossible to guarantee access to court if the court system is awash in frivolous and vexatious litigation. Put another way, one cannot provide access to the courts if such access is blocked by a mountain of pre-existing petty proceedings. If the right of access itself must, of necessity, be understood to exclude those actions which make its exercise impossible, then vexatious litigation is exactly the kind of activity which should not fall within the protective sphere of the right. Secondly, other rights indicate the specific ends which FC s 34 was designed to protect. As Mokgoro J herself notes in her limitation analysis, FC ss 7(2), 34, 35 and 165 constitute a constellation of rights and powers whose very essence demands the ever vigilant protection 'of bona fide litigants, the processes of the courts and the administration of justice against vexatious proceedings'.[2] FC s 35 protects 'arrested, detained and accused persons' with an extraordinarily detailed set of procedures and prohibitions. However, it is quite clear that no matter how explicit FC s 35's protections are, they will not be able to ensure the proper functioning of our system of criminal justice if the courts are tied up with civil matters. FC s 165(3) and (4) make this point expressly clear. FC s 165(3) reads: 'No person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts.' FC s 165(4) reads: 'Organs of state . . . must assist and protect the courts to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.' If these rights and powers of necessity preclude vexatious litigation, then it is difficult to imagine why FC s 34 should be understood to provide any solace to the vexatious litigant. Thirdly, it is difficult to see how vexatious litigation — which undermines the rule of law, democratic institutions and civil society — can be said to serve the five foundational values underlying our constitutional enterprise.[3] One must have a very generous understanding of 'openness' or 'freedom' to find that court actions designed to bring the wheels of justice to a grinding halt actually strengthen our nascent democracy. Fourthly, even if one thought that the applicant had made the case for an expansive interpretation of the right, it is not clear that the applicant's right of access to

[1] FC s 34 reads: 'Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum.'

[2] Beinash (supra) at para 17.

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip')(Meaningful access to a court of law — and that means adequate remedies — is an essential component of a just and well-ordered society based upon the rule of law.)

court has been impaired (or limited) by the provisions in question. As Mokgoro J observes, the applicant has the right to apply to the High Court to lift the order declaring him a vexatious litigant and has the right to approach the High Court for relief should a prima facie meritorious matter arise.

Yet, instead of a careful exegesis of the right and the provisions under attack, Mokgoro J justifies her overly expeditious approach to rights analysis by noting that FC s 34 'does not contain any internal limitation of the right'. But this argument is a red herring in an opinion brimming with lemmings. As we argue at length below, the presence of an internal limitation or an internal modifier does not alter the basic structure of fundamental rights and limitation analysis.[1] That is, even if the section in question possessed an internal limitation, it certainly would not obviate the need for a thorough-going analysis of the ambit of the fundamental right and a finding as to whether the protected activity has indeed been impaired by the law in question.

The Beinash Court's short-circuited rights analysis is saved by its reasoning under the limitation clause. At the time, the upholding of a law at the limitation stage made Beinash entirely unique. No rule of law, up until Beinash, had been upheld by the Constitutional Court after being subjected to limitations analysis under FC s 36.

But this unique feature of the judgment comes at a cost. The first cost is that the Court's notional approach to rights interpretation drives all of the meaningful assessment of the issues raised in the case into the limitation clause. The second cost is that this inappropriate 'dumping' of rights issues forces the court to fudge its analysis of one of the critical legs of the limitation test. At least two steps of the limitation test employed in Beinash reflect determinations that should have been undertaken under the right itself. When considering 'the nature of the right in terms of section 36(1)(a)' Mokgoro J writes: '[A] restriction of access in the case of a vexatious litigant is in fact indispensable to protect and secure the right of access for those with meritorious disputes.'[2] As we argued above, this point is logically connected to a determination of the content of the right and whether the applicant's activity was indeed deserving of constitutional protection. When considering 'the importance of the purpose' of the Act according to FC s 36(1)(b), Mokgoro J cites an array of rights — FC ss 7, 35, and 165 — to support the proposition 'that bona fide litigants, the processes of the courts and the administration of justice' all require the kind of protection the Act offers against vexatious proceedings.[3] Again, the Court should have made the case — much earlier — that these rights inform our understanding of the content of FC s 34.

It is worth remembering that in order for the respondent to succeed at the limitation stage, he or she must satisfy all of the limitations clause's requirements. These requirements run (1) from the presence of a law of general application (2) to showing that a law's objectives merit constitutional salvation (3) to proof of a rational relationship between the law's ends and the means it employs (4) to an appraisal of the costs and benefits of the legal regime under scrutiny (5) to a demonstration that the rule of law in question adopts means that are as narrowly tailored as possible to achieve the objectives of the law.

[1] For more on internal modifiers and internal limitations, see §§ 34.4 and 34.5 infra.
[2] Beinash (supra) at para 17.
[3] Ibid.

When the Beinash Court finally considers leg (5) — FC s 36(1)(e) – and asks whether 'less restrictive means to achieve the purpose' of the Act exist, Justice Mokgoro does not squarely address the issue of whether the Act's aims could have been achieved via a more narrowly tailored remedy. Instead, she remarks that the Act has struck an appropriate balance between means and ends. This is, of course, an answer; but not an appropriate answer to the question actually raised by this particular factor.[1] No alternative scheme is considered. No alternative language for the statute is contemplated.[2] We have no way of knowing, from the Court's express deliberations, whether or not the existing provisions of the Vexatious Proceedings Act constitute some of the least restrictive means of achieving the Act's purpose.[3]

And thus there would appear to be at least some evidence for our second contention: by neglecting to engage in any serious examination of the content of FC s 34's right of access to court and by canvassing all of the consequential constitutional issues under the limitation clause, the Court was actually forced to fudge its analysis of FC s 36(1)(e). The Beinash Court could have averted the analytical confusion that takes place in its limitations analysis if it had undertaken a value-based approach to its determination of the right's ambit in the first place.

Proof, however, that the Constitutional Court is vaguely aware of (ongoing problems with) the appropriate division of tasks between the two stages of analysis and consciously struggles to fashion a coherent approach to fundamental rights and limitation analysis is evident from its decisions in August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others,[4] New National Party of SA v Government of the RSA & Others[5] and Democratic Party v Government of the RSA & Others.[6]

In August, the Court found that FC ss 6 and 19 created an unqualified right of adult suffrage. But the result in August was rather easily reached: the Electoral Commission had failed to put in place any mechanism at all that would enable prisoners to exercise the franchise. There was no law to justify the infringement.

The Court in NNP and DP faced the more daunting task of deciding whether the Electoral Act's bar-coded ID requirement was an infringement of the

[1] Beinash (supra) at para 21.

[2] For example, the Beinash Court could have suggested that the statute's current infirmities be corrected by making certain that any order issued under the Act which barred a vexatious litigant from court include a sunset clause. An order with a sunset clause — unlike an order to which an indefinite time period and penalty attach — would seem to be a less restrictive means of achieving the Act's purpose.

[3] As we note below, the Court does not demand that the law reflect the least restrictive means imaginable, but only that the lawmaker genuinely attempt to employ the least restrictive means in pursuit of its ends. For more on FC s 36(1)(e), see § 34.8*(c)*(iv) infra.

[4] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August').

[5] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('NNP').

[6] 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC)('DP').

franchise, and a justifiable one at that.[1] As was noted above, an applicant must run the following two-step gauntlet when trying to establish a prima facie infringement of a right: (1) ambit of the right determination; (2) demonstration that the law or conduct challenged actually impairs or limits the exercise of the right. What the Constitutional Court in NNP and DP effectively held was that, in order to establish a prima facie infringement of the franchise — for the rights-bearer to show that she was entitled to exercise the franchise — the rights-bearer would have to show that she acted reasonably in an attempt to exercise her right to vote. If her reasonable efforts to exercise the franchise were thwarted by the government's electoral scheme, then she would have demonstrated a prima facie infringement. In short, where the meaningful exercise of a right depends upon the positive action of both government and citizenry, then the rights-bearer may be asked to demonstrate that she 'acted reasonably in pursuit of the right' before the court will grant that she is entitled to the protection afforded by the right.[2] If she succeeds at the rights stage, 'the question would then arise whether the limitation [created by the government's scheme] is justifiable under the provisions of s 36'.[3] While taking into account the peculiar demands the franchise places upon both government and citizen, the NNP and DP Courts were still able to maintain the basic integrity of Chapter 2's two stages of analysis.[4]

[1] Act 73 of 1998. Section 38(2) read with the definition of 'identity document' in s 1(xii) of the Act precluded citizens from voting unless they could prove their identity through an identity document issued under the Identification Act 72 of 1986 or a temporary identity document issued under the Identification Act 68 of 1997.

[2] NNP (supra) at para 23.

[3] Ibid at para 24.

[4] The lone dissenter in NNP and DP, O'Regan J, charts a rather different and undesirable course in her fundamental rights analysis of the franchise. For reasons that are not entirely clear, she imports a reasonableness test for the government electoral scheme into the determination of the ambit of the right to vote. The Justice's departure from form was rejected by the other members of the court — for several good reasons. First, there was no textual basis for this new internal limitations test. The court's overriding commitment to judicial restraint would seem to argue against the creation of internal limitation tests where the text is silent. Secondly, the very test itself is taken almost verbatim from the limitation test devised by the court to reflect the requirements of FC s 36. Thirdly, the reasonableness test does not address the nature of the right itself (or the actions of the rights-bearer) but the relationship between the means the legislation employs and the ends the government seeks to achieve. Fourthly, having previously granted in August that suffrage is a core constitutional right, it remains unclear why the Justice in these two judgments engages in no rights analysis at all, but instead begins and ends with limitations analysis. The ostensible justification for standing the Bill of Rights on its head is that this particular right by necessity demands that Parliament pass legislation which contemplates regulations designed to ensure the right's proper exercise by the citizenry. But this is no answer at all. Of course, Parliament must pass laws to make the exercise of the franchise possible. The question is whether or not rules regarding 'the date of the election, the location of polling booths, the hours of voting and the determination of which documents prospective voters will require in order to register and vote' actually impair a voter's right to exercise the franchise. NNP (supra) at para 142. If any one of them does, then the question should be whether such impairment can be saved under FC s 36. Thus, the Justice could well have found an infringement of the right to vote, and then decided under the limitation clause that the means employed and ends sought were reasonable and justifiable.

One might wish to compare O'Regan J's judgments in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU') with her judgments in NNP and DP. In SANDU O'Regan J spent a significant amount of space attempting to determine the

That's not to say that there isn't occasional backsliding. In Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education, the Constitutional Court simply assumed that the exercise of FC ss 15 and 31 had been impaired by the South African Schools Acts.[1] The rights interpretation was not even notional. It was non-existent.

The Christian Education Court did not have to undertake a less than notional approach to rights analysis — especially with respect to FC s 31. FC s 31(2) affords the party seeking to uphold the law or the conduct in question an opportunity to demonstrate that the conduct for which constitutional protection is sought is inconsistent with the other provisions in the Bill of Rights. Given that the Christian Education Court relied directly upon a constellation of rights — dignity, equality, and freedom and security of the person — in upholding the limitation of FC s 31 in terms of FC s 36, it is difficult to understand why those same rights were not deployed by the Court in terms of FC s 31(2). The only compelling explanation for the failure to undertake FC s 31(2) analysis is that the Court would have been required, in terms of FC s 15, to undertake FC s 36 analysis anyway. Of this reconstruction, two things must be said. First, the necessity of undertaking FC s 36 analysis does not obviate the need to undertake rights analysis. Second, the presence of an internal limitation in the form of FC s 31(2) does not mean that the mere assertion of a conflict with another right in Chapter 2 automatically serves to trump FC s 31. As one of the authors has written elsewhere, dignity interests may inform both the assertion of a right in terms of FC s 31(1) and the defence of the challenged law or conduct in terms of FC s 31(2).[2] The Court must still apply its mind as to whether the right, appropriately understood, protects the religious, cultural or linguistic practice under scrutiny.

ambit of FC s 23, whether the soldiers satisfied the definition of worker therein, and thus whether they were entitled to the protection of the right. Having found that the soldiers were 'workers', the Justice then found that the provisions of the Defence Act under scrutiny did indeed infringe the soldiers' FC s 23(2)(a) right 'to form and join a trade union'. The Justice then moved on to FC s 36 and rejected the Minister's contention that an infringement of the right was justified by the constitutional imperative to structure and manage the SANDF as a 'disciplined military force'. That O'Regan J is aware of a better approach to rights interpretation and limitations analysis is made manifest in the text. After rejecting overbreadth as a constitutional doctrine appropriate to the resolution of this challenge, she writes:

> The first question to be asked is whether the provision in question infringes the rights protected by the substantive clauses of the Bill of Rights. If it does, the next question that arises will be whether that infringement is justifiable. At the second stage of the constitutional enquiry, the relevant questions are: what is the purpose of the impugned provision, what is its effect on constitutional rights and is the provision well tailored to that purpose?

Ibid at para 18.

[1] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 1051 (CC)('Christian Education'). See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC)('Prince').

[2] See Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

34.4 Internal Modifiers, and their Relationship to Rights Analysis and Limitations Analysis

In a world of tersely worded fundamental rights and a general limitation clause we would always proceed in the same way. First, we would make value-based determinations of a right's scope and then assess whether the law or the conduct challenged impaired the exercise of the right; second, if we found that a law had impaired the right in question, we would ask whether that law could be justified in terms of FC s 36. Unfortunately, the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution is not such a world. Many of the rights it contains possess complex qualifications.[1] The immediate question is whether these differences in construction alter significantly the form of constitutional analysis that these rights receive.[2]

For the purposes of this chapter, it is probably sufficient to note that fundamental rights take three basic forms: (1) unqualified rights; (2) rights that contain internal modifiers; (3) rights that contain internal limitations. A remarkably small number — four — of the 27 rights enshrined in Chapter 2 are unqualified.[3] A significant number of rights — sixteen — contain internal modifiers. Internal modifiers are, in short, words or phrases that serve to determine, with greater specificity, the content of the right in question. For example, the phrase 'peaceful and unarmed' clarifies the kinds of assembly that FC s 17 protects.[4] FC s 16,

[1] The Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights (for the Interim Constitution) suggests that this system of internal modifiers, internal limitations, and general limitations was on the cards from the outset. See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Third Report' (28 May 1993) 9.

[2] For early attempts to explain the relationship between internal modifiers, internal limitations and a general limitations clause, see Gretchen Carpenter 'Internal Modifiers and Other Qualifications in Bills of Rights: Some Problems of Interpretation' (1995) 10 SA Public Law 260; André van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (1997) 73–74; Stu Woolman 'Riding the Push-Me Pull-You: Constructing a Test that Reconciles the Conflicting Interests which Animate the Limitations Clause' (1994) 10 SAJHR 60.

Some authors offer no account of internal modifiers at all. See IM Rautenbach & EFJ Malherbe Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, 2000). Other authors correctly note that internal modifiers or 'demarcations' 'circumscribe the right or place certain conditions on its availability', whereas 'special limitations' require the 'state or the person relying on the validity of legislation . . . [to] show that the limitation of the right is justified'. Iain Currie & Johan De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 187. But Currie and De Waal make no effort to spell out the relationship between rights analysis, internal modifiers, internal limitations and general limitations.

More curious, however, is the claim that 'it is wrong to talk about internal limitations'. Halton Cheadle 'Limitations of Rights' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 701. Cheadle then goes on to state the term is 'shorthand for a group of clauses that perform different functions in the different rights, particularly in the more complex rights' and that 'the text always limits the scope of a right'. Ibid. While trivially true, this does not count as an argument except in the sense of the classic Monty Python riposte of 'Yes, it is an argument' to the assertion 'No, it's not an argument'. Cheadle makes no attempt to explain what these different clauses actually do.

[3] Four rights may be described as unqualified: Life, FC s 11, reads: 'Everyone has the right to life'; Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour, FC s 13, reads: 'No one may be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour'; Freedom of association, FC s 18, reads: 'Everyone has the right to freedom of association'; Citizenship, FC s 20, reads: 'No citizen may be deprived of citizenship.'

[4] See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

freedom of expression, contains two forms of internal modifier. While FC s 16(1) recognizes several types of expressive activity that secure constitutional protection, FC s 16(2) identifies several forms of expressive conduct that ought not to receive such protection: (a) propaganda for war; (b) incitement of imminent violence; and (c) advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.[1] The rights to dignity, freedom and security of the person, privacy, expression, political rights, freedom of residence and movement, labour relations, environment, property, children, education, just administrative action, access to information, access to courts and arrested, detained and accused persons all contain words or phrases intended to amplify the content of the right. The rights to equality, expression, education, housing, health care and arrested, detained and accused persons all contain words or phrases intended to exclude expressly certain types of conduct, status or law from constitutional protection.[2]

But whether the phrases in these rights amplify or exclude, the internal modifier analysis fits naturally within fundamental rights, or stage 1, analysis. The internal modifier is concerned with a determination of the content of the right and not with an analysis of competing rights or interests.[3] At least one consequence of identifying a phrase as an internal modifier is that the burden of justification remains upon the party bringing the challenge to demonstrate that the law or the conduct in question impairs the exercise of the 'modified' right.

34.5 Internal Limitations, and their Relationship to Rights Analysis and Limitations Analysis

While internal modifiers concern themselves primarily with the content of a right, internal limitations import a variety of considerations not normally associated with fundamental rights, or stage 1, analysis. The language of FC ss 9(3), 15(3), 24*(b), 25(2), 25(3), 25(5), 26(2), 27(2), 29(1)(b)*, 29(2), 30, 31(2) and 32(2) require forms of justification generally associated with limitations analysis and the comparison of competing constitutional imperatives.

[1] See Dario Milo & Anthony Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2007) Chapter 42.

[2] The kernel of truth in Cheadle's statement that 'it is wrong to talk about internal limitations' is that it may appear difficult to fit the various rights — with their respective modifiers and limitations — into a simple yet powerful explanatory framework. For example, FC s 9(2), the provision for restitutionary measures, is an affirmative defence that carves out of FC s 9 space for inegalitarian measures that pursue egalitarian ends. FC s 9(2) does not expressly modify FC s 9(1) or FC s 9(3) or FC s 9(4), but it does so just the same. However, FC 9 as a whole, like FC ss 26 and 27, does not fit easily into the two-stage model of fundamental rights analysis. See Cathi Albertyn & Janet Kentridge 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 149, 177 (Adopt an assimilationist approach with respect to the treatment of the restitutionary measures provision as an internal modifier that assists in the demarcation of the right to equality.)

[3] Cf Halton Cheadle 'Limitations of Rights' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 701 (Claims, without argument, that the ambit of the right should be determined, at least in part, by social interests that have nothing to do with the purpose or the objective of the right.)

The most commonly employed internal limitation is the unfair discrimination analysis found within the Harksen test.[1] The unfairness assessment required by FC s 9(3) takes into account justifications for discriminatory practices at the same time as it requires the court to take cognizance of systemic discrimination and the impairment of the plaintiff's dignity.

FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) require the court to assess whether the state — or some other party — has taken reasonable steps to ensure the progressive realization of the rights to access to adequate housing, health, food, water and social security. The focus of this inquiry — as laid out in Grootboom and other socio-economic rights cases — is generally on whether the state has created and implemented a comprehensive and coordinated plan to realize progressively the right in question. The primary desideratum of this test is 'reasonableness'. Reasonableness in FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) raises many of the same contextual considerations that would otherwise be the focus of the FC s 36 inquiry.[2] Similar language, that appears to do similar work, appears in FC s 29(1) and (2).[3]

Other internal limitations take a somewhat different form. FC ss 15(3)(b), 30 and 31(2) require that the exercise of the right in question be consistent with the other rights in Chapter 2. In short, the Final Constitution makes it clear that a community's religious, cultural or linguistic practices enjoy constitutional protection only where they do not interfere with — limit — the exercise of other fundamental rights.[4] This formally correct articulation of the relationship between FC s 31 and the rest of the Bill of Rights is often assumed to imply that the other substantive rights — including dignity — trump collective religious, cultural and linguistic concerns. That, however, is untrue. Indeed, rights to dignity and to equality may re-inforce claims to religious autonomy. For example, the Constitutional Court in Gauteng School Education Bill recognized the importance for

[1] For more on the Harksen test, see Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2007) Chapter 35.

[2] For more on internal modifiers and internal limitations and their effect on the interpretation of socio-economic rights, see Sandra Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33. See also Pierre de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights: Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 6, 91 n 97 (Argues that the distinction between internal modifiers and internal limitations does not hold for socio-economic rights.)

[3] With regard to the provision of further education, FC s 29(1)(b) contains the phrase, 'through reasonable measures, must make progressively available and accessible,' while FC s 29(2) states that education in the official language of choice ought to be offered 'where that education is reasonably practicable.'

[4] FC s 31(2) could be construed to preclude all exclusionary and discriminatory policies. But that assumes that all such practices are inconsistent with various provisions in the Bill of Rights, in particular, the rights to equality and dignity. The Constitutional Court has made it quite clear that not all discrimination is unfair discrimination. See, eg, Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC).

individual dignity, and collective claims for equal respect, of granting communities the right to create schools based upon a common culture, language or religion.[1]

(a) Internal limitations and burden shifts

Where an internal limitation is in play there may appear to be a burden shift within the fundamental rights stage of analysis that requires the state or another party to make the requisite demonstration of 'fairness', 'reasonableness' or 'consistency'. But the case law does not support such a global generalization. FC s 9(5) definitely requires a burden shift where discrimination occurs on a prohibited ground in terms of FC s 9(3). It does not, however, appear clear that the state or some other party bears the burden of demonstrating inconsistency in terms of FC ss 15(3)(b), 30, and 31. Nor is it clear that the burden falls, entirely or even in large part, on the state to show that it has taken reasonable steps to discharge its responsibilities to progressively realize the socio-economic rights found in FC s 26, 27, and 29.[2] The more interesting analytical question is whether an internal limitation affects the analysis undertaken under the general limitations clause, FC s 36.

(b) Internal limitations and general limitations

What, if any, analysis will remain for the court to do after undertaking some form of internal limitations analysis will turn on the particular kind of internal limitation at issue.

(i) Internal limitations in FC ss 15(3)(b), 30 and 31

With respect to FC ss 15(3)(b), 30, and 31, the courts often appear to ignore the internal limitation entirely. In Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education, the Constitutional Court simply assumed — without needing to do so — that the exercise of FC ss 15 and 31 had been impaired by the South African Schools Act. It then proceeded to FC s 36 and found that, on balance, the mutually reinforcing rights of religion and culture said to sanction corporal punishment in private schools were in conflict with, and ultimately subordinate to, a constellation of rights that included dignity, equality, and freedom and security of the person.[3]

[1] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Court held that IC s 32*(c)* permitted communities to create schools based upon common culture, language and religion.)

[2] See Government of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Grootboom'). By collapsing FC s 26 (1) and FC s 26(2) analysis (and perhaps FC s 36 analysis) into a single test for reasonableness — the Grootboom Court effectively turns FC s 26(2) into an odd composite of internal modifier and internal limitation of FC s 26(1). For more on the relationship between FC s 26(1) and (2), see Kirsty McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55.

[3] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 1051 (CC)('Christian Education'). See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC).

There are two things to say about Christian Education and the Court's apparent failure to recognize the purpose of FC s 31(2). First, it could just have been a mistake. Second, it is possible that a right to community religious practice could (a) be deemed consistent with the other rights in Chapter 2 and (b) still be impaired by the law in question. If this second possibility is the correct one, then the analysis would proceed to FC s 36, and the party relying upon the law would have the opportunity to demonstrate that another set of interests or values — not expressly manifest in the rights and freedoms of Chapter 2 — justified the infringement of FC s 31(1).

(ii) Internal limitations in FC ss 9, 26 and 27

More interesting, and difficult, questions regarding internal limitations flow from the text of, and the case law surrounding, FC ss 9, 26, and 27. With respect to these provisions, the text and the case law are quite illuminating.

Although the courts have been loath to state categorically that a finding of unfairness under FC s 9(3) ends the court's analysis, in not a single Constitutional Court equality judgment has the Court found that unfair conduct or an unfair law — in terms of FC s 9(3) or FC s 9(4) — can be justified in terms of FC s 36. The Constitutional Court often goes through the motions of FC s 36 analysis, but, as in Kabuki theatre, says nothing. The reason for this artifice is rather clear: the considerations that would be raised to demonstrate fairness under FC s 9(3) would be virtually identical to the considerations raised to demonstrate reasonableness and justifiability under FC s 36.[1] The only judgment on record in which a court has found unfairness in terms of FC s 9(3), but then held the unfair law to be reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36 is Lotus River, Ottery, Grassy Park Residents Association v South Peninsula Municipality.[2] In Lotus River, the High Court found that the differential rates imposed by the municipality upon properties constituted unfair discrimination on the grounds of race. However, Davis J proceeded to find that this unfair discrimination was justified, in terms of FC s 36, by the local government restructuring process. As Iain Currie rightly observes, this justification ought to have formed part of the argument in rebuttal of the presumptive finding of unfair discrimination.[3] Given that the Harksen test does permit such an argument, the High Court could easily have avoided the

[1] The Constitutional Court has stated that there is a difference between unfairness under FC s 9 and proportionality under FC s 36. See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)(Kriegler J, dissenting); Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)(Court holds that FC s 36 'involves a weighing of the purpose and the effect of the provision in question and a determination as to the proportionality thereof in relation to the extent of the infringement of equality.') But as Iain Currie notes, the Court's cursory remarks in this regard do not advance our thinking on the matter. See Currie & De Waal 'Equality' (supra) at 238. Merely stating that there is a difference between the two concepts is not the same as using them in a different manner.

[2] 1999 (2) SA 817 (C), 1999 (4) BCLR 440 (C)('Lotus River').

[3] See Currie & De Waal 'Equality' (supra) at 239.

'awkward implication' that 'it is possible for unfair racial discrimination to be reasonable and justifiable in a society based upon equality.'[1]

In its early socio-economic rights jurisprudence the Constitutional Court simply assumed, without any discussion, that a finding that the state failed to take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realization of the rights in question, precluded a finding that the limitation was, nevertheless, reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36. Once it found that the state had failed to meet its obligations in terms of FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2), the Court proceeded directly to a consideration of appropriate relief, without any inquiry into FC s 36.[2]

The Constitutional Court broke its silence on the relationship between FC ss 26 and 27 and FC s 36 in Khosa[3] and Jaftha.[4] In Jaftha, the Court distinguished between the negative and positive obligations imposed by FC ss 26 and 27. It held that its earlier ruling in TAC — that FC s 27(1) 'does not give rise to a self-standing and independent positive right enforceable irrespective of the considerations mentioned in section 27(2)' — did not extend to negative breaches of FC ss 26 and 27.[5] Where the state fails to honour its negative obligations under these rights — as in Jaftha, where a provision in the Magistrates' Court Act permitted the sale in execution of a person's home for non-payment of debts — there is no reason for the Court to filter its analysis of FC s 26(1) through FC s 26(2). Consequently, the question of the relationship between FC s 26(2) reasonableness and FC s 36 reasonableness does not arise, and the breach of FC s 26(1) may be justified under FC s 36.[6] As it turned out, the Jaftha Court found that the breach of FC s 26(1) was not reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36, given the importance of access to adequate housing, its link to human dignity, the seriousness of [1] Currie & De Waal 'Equality' (supra) at 239.

[2] See, eg, Grootboom (supra); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others No 2 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC'). Similarly, no limitation analysis was undertaken in cases in which it was found that administrative action failed the justifiability test in terms of IC s 24 or the reasonableness test under FC s 33. But see Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Province, Western Cape & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 171 (Mokgoro and Sachs JJ note in dissent that justifiability for purposes of limitation analysis generally requires more persuasive evidence than that required for FC s 33.) See also Masamba v Chairperson, Western Cape Regional Committee, Immigrants Selection Board & Others 2001 (12) BCLR 1239, 1258D-E, 1259A-C (C). Rautenbach argues that the requirements of FC s 33 should, as far as possible, be reconciled with the requirements of FC s 36. In his view, 'section 33 particularises the rules in section 36 in respect of administrative actions that limit rights.' See IM Rautenbach 'The Limitation of Rights and "Reasonableness" in the Right to Just Administrative Action and the Rights to Access to Adequate Housing, Health Services and Social Security' (2005) TSAR 627, 641. But for Rautenbach to be correct, the Court must be willing to enforce a stricter standard of review for administrative action.

[3] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa').

[4] Jaftha v Schoeman & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha').

[5] TAC (supra) at para 39, as quoted in Jaftha (supra) at para 32.

[6] Jaftha (supra) at paras 32–33. See also Marius Pieterse 'Towards a Useful Role for Section 36 of the Constitution in Social Rights Cases? Residents of Bon Vista Mansions v Southern Metropolitan Local Council' (2003) 120 SALJ 41.

the infringement, the existence of less restrictive means, and that the sale in execution satisfied a trifling debt.[1]

While Jaftha is clear that a breach of the state's negative obligation under FC s 26(1) leaves ample room for a consideration of the justifiability of such a breach in terms of FC s 36, Khosa raises doubts as to whether FC s 36 analysis can play a meaningful role in cases concerning a breach of the state's positive obligations under FC s 27(2). In Khosa, the Court found that the Social Assistance Act's exclusion of permanent residents from its benefit scheme constituted unfair discrimination in terms of FC s 9 and an unjustifiable limitation of the right of access to social security in terms of FC s 27. In her discussion of the relationship between FC s 9 and FC s 36, Justice Mokgoro first noted that the > exclusion of permanent residents from the scheme is discriminatory and unfair and I am satisfied that this unfairness would not be justifiable under section 36 of the Constitution. The relevant considerations have been traversed above and need not be repeated. What is of particular importance in my view, however, and can be stressed again, is that the exclusion of permanent residents from the scheme is likely to have a severe impact on the dignity of the persons concerned, who, unable to sustain themselves, have to turn to others to enable them to meet the necessities of life and are thus cast in the role of supplicants.[2]

In short, the very same considerations that informed the finding of unfairness under FC s 9 supported the finding, under FC s 36, that the statutory scheme contemplated by the Social Assistance Act could not be justified. No reasons that might justify the discrimination could be offered in the context of FC s 36 that had not already been offered under FC s 9.

Mokgoro J then moved on to the question of justification, in terms of FC s 36, with respect to the abridgement of FC s 27, and, more particularly, the state's failure to discharge its responsibilities under FC s 27(2). Once again, she concluded that there was no reason for the Court to repeat its assessment, in terms of FC s 36, of the arguments in justification that it had already interrogated in terms of FC s 27(2):

> In my view the importance of providing access to social assistance to all who live permanently in South Africa and the impact upon life and dignity that a denial of such access has, far outweighs the financial and immigration considerations on which the state relies. For the same reasons, I am satisfied that the denial of access to social grants to permanent residents who, but for their citizenship, would qualify for such assistance does not constitute a reasonable legislative measure as contemplated by [FC s] 27(2). . . . There is a difficulty in applying section 36 of the Constitution to the socio-economic rights entrenched in sections 26 and 27 of the Constitution. Sections 26 and 27 contain internal limitations which qualify the rights. The state's obligation in respect of these rights goes no further than to take 'reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation' of the rights. If a legislative measure taken by the state to meet > this obligation fails to pass the requirement of reasonableness for the purposes of sections 26 and 27, section 36 can only have relevance if what is 'reasonable' for the purposes of that section, is different to what is 'reasonable' for the purposes of sections 26 and 27. This raises an issue which has been the subject of academic debate but which has not as yet been considered by this Court. We heard no argument on the matter and do not have the benefit of a judgment of the High Court. In the circumstances, it is undesirable to express any opinion on the issue unless it is necessary to do so for the purposes of the decision in this case. In my view it is not necessary to decide the issue. Even if it is assumed that a different threshold of reasonableness is called for in sections 26 and 27 than is the case in section 36, I am satisfied for the reasons already given that the exclusion of permanent residents from the scheme for social assistance is neither reasonable nor justifiable within the meaning of section 36.[1]

[1] Jaftha (supra) paras 35–49.
[2] Khosa (supra) at para 80.

Mokgoro J does not, as she makes plain, seek to settle the academic debate over whether the proportionality analysis required by FC s 36 could serve any meaningful role once a court has undertaken reasonableness analysis in terms of FC ss 26(2) and 27(2). It is sufficient to note, however, that in so far as the instant matter is concerned, the content of the reasonableness analysis undertaken under FC s 27(2) is understood to be identical to the content of the reasonableness analysis that would be undertaken in terms of FC s 36.[2]

[1] Khosa (supra) at paras 82–84.

[2] That this issue — heretofore purely academic — had troubled the Court in its internal deliberations is clear from both Mokgoro J's musings and the response they elicit from Ngcobo J. On the relationship between FC s 27(2) and FC s 36, Ngcobo J writes:

> But if section 27 governs the present constitutional challenge, the problem of a methodological approach arises. The obligations of the state under section 27(2) are limited to taking "reasonable legislative and other measures." The main judgment regards this as an internal limitation on the right of access to social security. I agree. But is it possible to find that a measure is reasonable within the meaning of subsection 2 yet not reasonable and justifiable under section 36(1), the limitation clause? Let us take a non-controversial group, the temporary visitors, which the main judgment also accepts can legitimately be excluded from the social welfare benefits. If their exclusion would be reasonable under section 27(2), is the state required to show also that their exclusion is reasonable and justifiable under section 36(1)? This raises a number of related questions, including, whether the standard for determining reasonableness under section 27(2) is the same as the standard for determining reasonableness and justifiability under section 36(1) and, if not, what is the appropriate standard for determining reasonableness under section 27(2). . . . Faced with these questions, the main judgment adopts the attitude that the outcome would be the same whether the enquiry is to be conducted under section 27(2) or section 36(1). I prefer to approach the matter differently — by looking first to the enquiry required in section 27 and then, if necessary, to section 36. I should add, though, that the outcome would be the same even if the enquiry were to begin and end in section 27(2).

Ibid at paras 105–07. It is hard to understand Ngcobo J's disagreement with the majority. He correctly identifies the problem: namely, is there a difference in the standard of review under FC s 27(2) and FC s 36? But he does not answer the question. He simply says that he would prefer to do things differently: that is, he would first undertake analysis under FC s 27 and then, if he so desired, proceed to FC s 36. Why he prefers this approach, Ngcobo J does not say. Moreover, he concludes by noting that 'the outcome would be the same even if the enquiry were to begin and end in section 27(2).' Ngcobo J is either committed to the proposition that his distinction between FC s 27(2) and FC s 36 is a distinction without a difference, or that there is a difference in the standard, which he refuses to describe, that leads, coincidentally, in this case and perhaps all others, to the same outcome. Ngcobo J's analysis takes us nowhere.

The problem the Court acknowledges in Khosa — vis-à-vis FC s 26 and FC s 27 and FC s 36 — is, at bottom, a straightforward question of logic. Does the universe of reasons — or kinds of reasons — that the state can offer in justification under FC s 27(2) exhaust the universe of reasons — or kinds of reasons — that could be offered in justification under FC s 36? If the answer to that question is yes, then logically there can be no meaningful basis for a court to undertake limitations analysis under FC s 36 once it has concluded that the state has failed to act reasonably in terms of FC s 27(2). If, however, the answer to that question is no, then there may be some basis, for undertaking a second form of justificatory analysis under FC s 36.

The answer is not grounded solely in logic, however. It turns, in large measure, on the standard*(s)* adopted by our Constitutional Court in socio-economic rights cases, and more specifically, those cases in which the state has failed to take adequate measures to realize progressively the right in question. For example, if the standard for review was that of mere rationality — as suggested by some of the language in Soobramoney — it would, logically, be impossible for FC s 36 to play any meaningful role in the Court's analysis. Put differently, if all FC s 27(2) required the state to do was to show that it had applied its mind to the progressive realization of a socio-economic right, and had done so to the satisfaction of the Court, the matter would end there. There could be no reason — in the sense of necessity — for the Court to progress to proportionality analysis under FC s 36.

But as we now know, the standard of review under FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) is not rationality but reasonableness. After Soobramoney, Grootboom, TAC and Khosa, the question must be whether there are types of reasons — beyond those currently contemplated in those four judgments — that the state (or some other party) could raise under FC s 36 that it could not raise under FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2). Given that the state may justify its failure to make good on the promise of a socio-economic right in terms of a whole host of 'reasonable' grounds, it is difficult to conjure up any additional grounds that might justify the failure to make good a promise in terms of FC s 36.[1] Consider the long list of grounds that the Constitutional Court has already identified when undertaking analysis under FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) (and keep in mind that such a list is by no means exhaustive or closed):[2]

[1] See Rautenbach (supra) at 647–653 (Constitutional Court has incorporated, in its analysis of reasonableness under FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2), FC s 36 criteria such as the importance of the purpose of the restriction, the nature and extent of the deprivation, the relationship between ends and means, the existence of less restrictive means, and cost/benefit analysis.)

[2] See Khosa (supra) at para 43 ('In determining reasonableness, context is all-important. There is no closed list of factors involved in the reasonableness enquiry and the relevance of various factors will be determined on a case by case basis depending on the particular facts and circumstances in question.')

- whether there are available resources;[1]
- whether the requested relief is not for an individual entitlement to the immediate provision of a service or resource, but for a comprehensive and coordinated plan to realize the right;[2]
- whether the state has taken steps towards the right's progressive realization;[3]
- whether the relief requested involves access to services, and not to the resources necessary to possess what the right promises;[4]
- whether 'the appropriate … human resources are available';[5]
- whether the state's plan is 'capable of facilitating the realisation of the right';[6]
- whether the plan is reasonable 'both in its conception and its implementation';[7]
- whether the plan is sufficiently flexible;[8]
- whether the plan attends to 'crises';[9]
- whether the state's plan excludes 'a significant segment' of the affected population;[10]
- whether the state's plan balances short, medium and long-term needs;[11] and
- whether the party could form a legitimate expectation of receiving a socio-economic entitlement.[12]

Is there any reason to think that there may be grounds for justification that the state could assert under FC s 36 that are not available to it under FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2)? In the cases decided to date, ending in Khosa, the answer would appear to be 'no'.

But before we shut the door on what is, apparently, no longer an academic debate, consider the textual differences between FC s 27(2), on the one hand, and FC s 36, on the other. FC s 27 reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (1) Everyone has the right to have access to —
> (a) . . . .
> (c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance.
> (2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights. (emphasis added)

[1] See Soobramoney v Minister of Health, Kwazulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1969 (CC)('Soobramoney') at paras 10, 20 and 22.
[2] See Soobramoney (supra) at para 31; Grootboom (supra) at paras 38, 78, 99; TAC (supra) at paras 81.
[3] See Soobramoney (supra) at paras 13, 19, 21 and 41.
[4] Van Biljoen v Minister of Correctional Services 1997(6) BCLR 789 (C), 1997(4) SA 441, 497 (C)('Van Biljoen').
[5] Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–46.
[6] Ibid at para 52.
[7] Ibid at para 53.
[8] Ibid at paras 63–69.
[9] Ibid at para 74.
[10] Ibid at para 83.
[11] Ibid at paras 39–46, 52, 53, 63–69, 74 and 83.
[12] Van Biljoen (supra) at 497.

FC s 36 reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (1) The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including —
> (a) . . .
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose. (emphasis added)

The language of FC ss 27(2) and 36, on their face, intimate that there are, in fact, different kinds or sources of justification. In FC s 27(2), the reasons for failure to make good the promise of a socio-economic right would seem, at first blush, related to the right itself or the resources that would be required to give effect to the right. For example, either the state may not possess sufficient resources to give everyone with terminal renal failure the dialysis treatment that would extend his or her life, or the state may not be required to distribute a requested form of relief because the right, upon reflection, is not meant to embrace a particular form of entitlement. In FC s 36(1), the failure to make good the promise of a given right may have nothing whatsoever to do with the right itself. For example, the grounds for restricting the expressive activity of a person may have nothing at all to do with advancing freedom of expression: we restrict defamatory statements because of the damage we believe is done to the dignity of the persons affected by such conduct.[1] Thus, whereas FC s 27(2) appears to limit our considerations to those justifications related to the means required to realize the purpose of the right (eg, money) or the end of the right itself (eg, social security), FC s 36 tells us that we may cast our justificatory nets as far as the needs of an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom will allow. In short, under FC s 36, our reasons for restricting access to social security can take account of a range of goods wholly unrelated to that right: dignity, life, privacy, freedom and security of the person, or any of the other rights found in Chapter 2. Our reasons for restricting rights may not, in fact, have anything to do with the other rights found in Chapter 2. In Prince, the grounds for restricting the religious ritual use of cannabis by Rastafarians was the general welfare, and perhaps more specifically, the safety of the commonweal.[2] Thus, although the Court has not as yet made such a distinction grounded in the very text of FC ss 27 and 36, one is on offer.[3]

[1] See Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC).

[2] See Prince (supra) at para 130 (The determination as to whether the scope of religious practice protected by FC s 15 embraced the ritual use of cannabis by Rastafarians was wholly unrelated to any subsequent analysis of the societal interests ostensibly threatened by such use.)

[3] Kevin Iles has articulated a very similar, if not absolutely identical, distinction between the objects of the FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2) reasonableness inquiry and the objects of the FC s 36 reasonableness enquiry. See Kevin Iles 'Limiting Socio-Economic Rights: Beyond Internal Limitations Clauses' (2004) 20 SAJHR 448. With respect to the Court's analysis in Grootboom, he writes:

But as we have already noted, arguments about the nature or the source of justification are as much empirical — a fact about constitutional adjudication in South Africa — as they are logical and textual. A close reading of the socio-economic rights judgments handed down by the Constitutional Court does not suggest that the Court is likely to place constraints on its FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) 'reasonableness' analysis in the service of creating a meaningful allocation of analytical responsibilities between FC ss 26(2) and 27(2), and FC s 36. Indeed, if the rather circuitous route the Court took to avoid FC s 26 analysis in Modderklip offers any indication of the Court's future direction, it is that the Court is unlikely to jettison the freedom that an open-ended reasonableness standard — under FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) — offers in the name of such an 'abstract' good as doctrinal coherence.[1]

(iii) Internal limitations in FC s 25 and the collapse of stage distinctions

Unlike FC ss 9, 15, 26, 27, 30 and 31, FC s 25 does not, on its face, appear to possess an internal limitations clause. Indeed, FC s 25 does not contain an internal limitations clause distinct from another clause that determines the ambit of the right.

> With Grootboom . . . the object of the reasonableness examination is the plan for the progressive realization of the right. Grootboom reasonableness is concerned with such details as the following: how the content of the right is going to be extended and when, the order in which the state plans to cater for those in need, the resources that the state has allocated towards realizing its stated plan including the intergovernmental allocation of tasks and responsibilities, the ultimate comprehensiveness of the plan and those it caters for and the way in which the state seeks to implement the plan. Internal limitations clauses in socio-economic rights cases go to the content and scope of the right they are associated with and define the boundaries as to how much of a particular right can be claimed at a particular point in time. In other words, they are factors that belong at the first stage of the rights interpretation process and not at the second stage.
>
> Section 36 reasonableness is directed not at the plan for realizing rights (as Grootboom reasonableness is) but at an examination of the reasonableness of measures that limit rights. Rights are not limited by plans that are designed to give effect to them. . . . Grootboom reasonableness does not involve choosing one value from a cluster of incommensurable values as [FC] s 36 reasonableness sometimes does. One is not engaging in a selection between a value furthered by a right and a competing value the state seeks to advance by limiting the right. In fact, Grootboom reasonableness does not involve a choice between things at all.

Ibid at 456. While Iles is correct — at a certain level of abstraction — about the distinction between the objects of the two kinds of limitations clauses, it is not so clear that the Grootboom internal limitations analysis can be hermetically sealed in the manner he suggests. In the first place, the introduction of 'available resources' and situating policy choices regarding, say, the delivery of housing in the context of a larger government agenda and budget already takes us into the land of competing values and incommensurability. In the second place, it is not clear that Iles needed to make his claim as strong as he does. All he was required to do was demonstrate that the set of reasons that might justify a failure to make good the promise of a right in terms of FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2) is smaller than the set of reasons that might justify the infringement of a FC s 26 or FC s 27 right in terms of FC s 36.

[1] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC). The Constitutional Court could have addressed the claims brought before it in terms of FC ss 25 and 26. But to do so would have raised thorny questions about the content of both FC s 25 and FC s 26, and technically challenging questions about the relationship between FC s 25, FC s 26(2) and FC s 36.

After FNB,[1] as Theunis Roux argues in this volume,[2] the Court's inquiry into arbitrariness in its FC s 25(1) determinations — 'no law may permit arbitrary deprivation of property' — bears all the hallmarks of an internal limitations test. Moreover, as Roux notes, the FNB Court did not just turn 'arbitrariness' into a kind of internal limitations test. It also collapsed the Court's rights-stage analysis and limitations-stage analysis into a single stage, similar to the approach followed in its socio-economic rights jurisprudence. Our complaint, once again, is that the Court has compromised the analytical rigour of the two-stage approach, and supplanted it with a rather amorphous, if not entirely shapeless, one-stage inquiry into the justifiability of the state's conduct.

34.6 Burden of Justification[3]

During the first stage of analysis under the Bill of Rights, the applicant must establish that a fundamental right has been infringed. That the applicant bears the burden at this first stage of the analysis flows from the generally accepted rule that the person asserting a breach bears the burden of legal justification.[4] It is important to note, however, that the Constitutional Court's objective theory of unconstitutionality[5] and FC s 38's generous standing

[1] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB').

[2] See Theunis Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 46-2–46-3.

[3] In the first edition of this work, 'burden of justification' was called 'burden of proof'. This nomenclature was criticized by both the academy and the bar. The general critique was that the author had borrowed the term from another area of law in which its meaning was well-established and quite different. Iain Currie — himself sensitive to such criticism — has described the subject matter as 'showing' or 'burden of justification': as in, who must show that the right has been infringed, and who must show that a limitation of a right is justified. See Iain Currie & Johan De Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 166. 'Burden of justification' better captures the meaning intended and we follow Professor Currie in employing it for the purposes of our discussion.

[4] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 44 ('The task of interpreting . . . fundamental rights rests, of course, with the courts, but it is for the applicants to prove the facts upon which they rely for their claim of infringement of a particular right in question.')

[5] In its most general form, the doctrine holds that a court's finding of invalidity with respect to a given law is not contingent upon the parties before the court. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at paras 28–29 ('On the objective theory of unconstitutionality adopted by this Court a litigant who has standing may properly rely on the objective unconstitutionality of a statute for the relief sought, even though the right unconstitutionally infringed is not that of the litigant in question but of some other person'); Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party & Others 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) at para 64 (In re-affirming its commitment to the objective theory of unconstitutionality, the Court wrote that 'the practice that has been urged upon this Court carries with it the distinct danger that Courts may restrict their enquiry into the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament and concentrate on the position of a particular litigant'); Ferreira (supra) at paras 26–28 ('The subjective positions in which parties to a dispute may find themselves cannot have a bearing on the status of the provisions of a statute under attack. The Constitutional Court, or any other competent Court for that matter, ought not to restrict its enquiry to the position of one of the parties to a dispute in order to determine the validity of a law. The consequence of such a (subjective) approach would be to recognise the validity of a statute in respect of one litigant, only to deny it to another. Besides resulting in provisions[1] do not require that the party before the court alleging that an infringement of a right has occurred be the party who has suffered the infringement.

Assuming that a prima facie infringement of a right is established at the conclusion of this first stage of analysis, the next question that arises is which party bears the burden of justification under the limitations clause. (We can bracket vexed questions of whether justification can ever meaningfully occur under FC s 36 with respect to unfair discrimination analysis in terms of FC s 9, deprivation of a denial of equal protection of the law, considerations of legal certainty, being a central consideration in a constitutional state, militate against the adoption of the subjective approach.') The generous conditions for standing ensure that the objective theory of unconstitutionality will continue to operate in practice — even if the Court refuses to announce its position on the apparent desuetude of the doctrine. See, especially, Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg & Associates: In re Eisenberg & Associates v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC)(Attorneys' firm which handled mainly immigration matters granted standing — in its own interest and as interested member of the public — to mount constitutional challenge to immigration regulations passed without requisite notice and comment. Although the regulations did not affect the firm's members directly, the Court found that it had an interest in proper notice and comment procedures being followed. Said regulations were found unconstitutional.) See also Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others 2004 (3) SA 599 (CC), 2004 (4) BCLR 333 (CC)(The analysis of the law in terms of the subjective position of the parties 'is incorrect. It is inconsistent with the principle of objective constitutional invalidity enunciated by this Court. . . . This principle is equally applicable under the 1996 Constitution.')

[1] FC s 38 reads, in relevant part: 'Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened . . . The persons who may approach a court are — (a) anyone acting in their own interest; (b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name; (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons; (d) anyone acting in the public interest; and (e) an association acting in the interest of its members. See, eg, Port Elizabeth Municipality v Prut NO & Another 1996 (4) SA 318 (E), 1996 (9) BCLR 1240 (E)(Interest referred to in FC s 38*(a)* need not relate to a constitutional right of the applicant, but may relate to a constitutional right of some other person); Highveldridge Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council & Others 2002 (6) SA 66 (T), 2003 (1) BCLR 72 (T) at para 27 (Applicant association instituted proceedings on behalf of the residents of a township, in the public interest and in the interest of its members deemed to have established locus standi in terms of FC s 38*(b)*, since it was evident that the people affected by the alleged unlawful action were indigent and therefore unable individually to pursue their claims); Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government v Ngxuza 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA)(Applicants had standing, in terms of FC s 38*(c)*, to bring an application on behalf of a large class of persons whose social grants had been cancelled by welfare authorities in a manner that violated requirements of procedural fairness); Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others 2001 (4) SA 396, 424H (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 995 (T)(Magistrate and the Association of Regional Magistrates of South Africa had locus standi in terms of FC s 38*(d)* to attack the validity of legislation which allegedly undermined independence of the magistrates' courts as guaranteed by the Final Constitution); South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)(FC s 38*(e)* enabled applicant association to challenge the constitutionality of search and seizure provisions that threatened to infringe the constitutional rights of its members); Campus Law Clinic (University of KZN Durban) v Standard Bank of SA Ltd & Another 2006 — SA — (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 669 (CC)(Law clinic has standing to appeal a decision of the SCA, to which it was not a party, concerning the execution of mortgaged property in the High Court.) The case law suggests a strong correlation between the objective theory of unconstitutionality and standing. See De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others 2002 (6) SA 370 (W), 2002 (12) BCLR 1285 (W)(Applicant who had been charged, and might be convicted, in terms of a statutory provision had a direct interest in challenging the validity of that provision); National and Overseas Modular Construction (Pty) Ltd v Tender Board, Free State Provincial Government, & Another 1999 (1) SA 701 (O)(Unsuccessful tenderer had sufficient interest to apply for the review of decision-making procedure for awarding tender in terms of the right to just administrative action.) See, generally, Cheryl Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 7.

property analysis in terms of FC s 25(1), or socio-economic rights analysis in terms of FC ss 26(2) and 27(2), having already dealt with them above.[1]) The Constitutional Court in Makwanyane held that '[i]t is for the legislature, or the party relying on the legislation, to establish this justification, and not for the party challenging it to show that it was not justified.'[2] One obvious ground for placing the burden of justification on the state where it seeks to uphold a law that limits a right is that the state will often possess unique, if not privileged, access to the information a court requires when attempting to determine whether a limitation is justified.[3]

That said, the Constitutional Court has, on a number of occasions, stated that the failure by the government to offer any support for a limitation does not relieve a court of the duty to inquire into its justifiability.[4] Not surprisingly,

[1] On internal limitations, see § 34.5 supra.

[2] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 102. See also Ferreira (supra) at para 44. Lower courts were quick to place the burden of justification of a limitation on the party — government or private — seeking to uphold the law limiting the right. See Nortje v Attorney-General, Cape 1995 (2) SA 460 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 236, 248 (C)('[P]arty who seeks a limitation of [the] right bears the onus of establishing the justification for that limitation'); Zantsi v Chairman, Council of State, Ciskei 1995 (2) SA 534, 560 (Ck), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (Ck)('Thereafter the onus is on the party relying on a limitation to prove that it is a lawful limitation'); Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C); Matinkinca v Council of State, Ciskei 1994 (4) SA 472 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 17, 34 (Ck)('Once it is established that a statute does interfere with or limit a fundamental right . . . the onus moves to the person attempting to justify the interference.')

[3] See Moise v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 19 ('It is also no longer doubted that, once a limitation has been found to exist, the burden of justification under s 36(1) rests on the party asserting that the limitation is saved by the application of the provisions of the section. The weighing-up exercise is ultimately concerned with the proportional assessment of competing interests but, to the extent that justification rests on factual and/or policy considerations, the party contending for justification must put such material before the Court. It is for this reason that the government functionary responsible for legislation that is being challenged on constitutional grounds must be cited as a party. If the government wishes to defend the particular enactment, it then has the opportunity — indeed an obligation — to do so. The obligation includes not only the submission of legal argument but placing before Court the requisite factual material and policy considerations. Therefore, although the burden of justification under s 36 is no ordinary onus, failure by government to submit such data and argument may in appropriate cases tip the scales against it and result in the invalidation of the challenged enactment.') Cf Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 691D–E (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E)('It seems eminently reasonable in practical terms (and because, conceptually, justification in terms of s 33 does not arise in a matter concerning competing fundamental rights) to require that a plaintiff who seeks to rely on the precedence of one fundamental right over another should bear the onus of establishing the basis for such precedence. Having done so, it may then still be possible for a defendant to defeat the claim by relying on a defence justified by a rule of law of general application, but the onus of showing that it complies with s 33 (the limitation clause) would then, in that regard, rest on the defendant.')

[4] See Du Toit & Another v Minister for Welfare and Population Development & Others 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)('Du Toit') at para 31 ('The validity of these provisions is a matter of public importance which is properly before the Court and which must be decided'); Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at para 20 ('Phillips')('The absence of evidence and argument from the State does not exempt the court from the obligation to conduct the justification analysis'); J v Director-General, Department of Home Affairs 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 15; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at paras 33–57 (State did not attempt to defend sodomy laws in question, but Court proceeded, at some length, to assess the potential grounds for upholding the laws.)

however, a failure by the state to adduce the requisite evidence will generally result in a rather perfunctory appraisal of the potential grounds for justification[1] and often 'tip the scales against' the state.[2] We know of only one occasion, identified by Hilary Axam, in which the Constitutional Court neither shifted the evidentiary burden to the state nor required any evidentiary showing by the state before going on to find the limitation in question justified.[3]

The Constitutional Court is, not surprisingly, quite reticent about burden shifts within rights that possess internal limitations. With respect to property, as we have seen, the Court's FC s 25 analysis of arbitrary deprivation and expropriation exhausts all plausible justifications.[4] To the extent that burden shifts do occur, they do so in the context of the complicated algorithm the FNB Court has devised for deprivation and expropriation.[5]

[1] See, eg, Minister for Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick & Others 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (7) BCLR 713 (CC) at para 20; Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering, Gauteng 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC) at para 26; S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC) at paras 32–36; S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1181 (CC).

[2] Moise v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 19. See also Phillips (supra) at para 20.

[3] See S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC)(Court upholds a reverse onus provision that requires persons accused of certain kinds of offences to 'satisfy the court' that they are entitled to bail.) On the Court's curious departure from form in Dhlamini, Axam writes:

> In contrast to its past limitations cases requiring the state to bear the onus of justifying with precision 'the particular provisions under attack', the Dlamini Court did not require the state to advance any evidence to justify its statutory approach restricting access to bail based on entire categories of offenses, rather than on factors shown to pose heightened risks to the bail system. Contrary to its cases requiring evidence of a convincing correlation between a limitation and the problems it seeks to address, the Court did not demand any evidence demonstrating that the offences subject to more restrictive bail standards were rationally correlated with heightened risks to the interests of justice pending trial . . . Although the Court noted that the risk of penalty may increase the incentive to flee, it did not require the state to present evidence establishing this correlation or suggesting that the nature of the charge is a reasonably reliable indicator of a risk of flight or other harm to the bail system. Nor did the Court require the state to justify the statute's provision that the state's characterization of the charge 'shall be conclusive' and that the onus is triggered merely by a written confirmation that the prosecution 'intends to charge' the accused with one of the offenses subject to the onus. Although the Court acknowledged that the statute makes the prosecution's characterization of the charge 'decisive' in determining whether bail standards will be restricted, it did not scrutinise the potential arbitrariness or irrationality associated with affording police and prosecutors virtually unfettered discretion to trigger the application of standards more restrictive than those established by the Constitution.

Hilary Axam 'If the Interests of Justice Permit: Individual Liberty, the Limitations Clause and the Qualified Right to Bail' (2001) 17 SAJHR 320, 330–31.

[4] See First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC).

[5] See, generally, Theunis Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46. But see Nhlabathi & Others v Fick 2003 (3) SA 620 (W), 2003 (7) BCLR 806 (W) at paras 33–34 ('As Ackermann J stated in the First National Bank case, neither the text nor the purpose of section 36 suggests that any rights in the Bill of Rights are excluded from limitation under its provisions. On the contrary, section

With respect to burden shifts within socio-economics rights, the text is silent and analysts are split as to whether such shifts can occur.[1] An applicant who wishes to demonstrate that the state has failed to discharge its duty to provide access to adequate housing under FC 26(1) will have to satisfy the court that the state has failed to meet the 'reasonableness' test developed in terms of FC s 26(2).[2] As yet, the Court has refused to distinguish the reasonableness criteria for justification within FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) from the reasonableness criteria for 25(8) of the Constitution is explicit in making section 36 applicable to land, water and related reform measures. Despite the dictum by Ackermann J, no final decision was taken by the Constitutional Court on the point to what extent an infringement of a right to property which is protected by section 25, can be justified under section 36. Professor Van der Walt, in his book on the property clause, argues convincingly that none of the limitations on the deprivation and expropriation of property contained in section 25, are immune from the provisions of section 36. Most South African authors accept that the general limitation provisions of section 36 and the specific limitation provisions of section 25 apply cumulatively. We share that view.') As a statement of the law, the decision in Nhlabathi is simply wrong. The FNB Court expressly rejected AJ van der Walt's cumulative approach. In addition to the author of the chapter on property in this work, many other respected commentators have suggested that little space, if any, now exists for meaningful FC s 36 limitations analysis of FC s 25 violations. See Roux (supra) at 46–36.

[1] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others No 2 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC)('TAC'); Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Grootboom'); Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 83 ('There is a difficulty in applying s 36 of the Constitution to the socio-economic rights entrenched in ss 26 and 27 of the Constitution. Sections 26 and 27 contain internal limitations that qualify the rights. The State's obligation in respect of these rights goes no further than to take "reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation" of the rights. If a legislative measure taken by the State to meet this obligation fails to pass the requirement of reasonableness for the purposes of ss 26 and 27, s 36 can only have relevance if what is "reasonable" for the purposes of that section, is different to what is "reasonable" for the purposes of ss 26 and 27.') See Sandra Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33.

[2] Commentators appear split over whether there is any meaningful burden shift from FC s 26(1) to FC s 26(2), or from FC s 27(1) to FC s 27(2). Kevin Iles states that the Court's refusal to distinguish FC s 26(1) rights content analysis from FC s 26(2) internal limitations analysis means that FC s 26(2) reasonableness analysis is inextricably a part of FC s 26(1) rights analysis. See Kevin Iles 'Limiting Socio-Economic Rights: Beyond Internal Limitations Clauses' (2004) 20 SAJHR 448, 464–65 (Iles further notes that '[f]ailure by our courts to allocate the proper tasks to the correct stage of the two-stage rights interpretation process combined with the reluctance to define the content of socio-economic rights has hampered our understanding of the operation of the internal limitations clause.') Sandy Liebenberg offers a somewhat more nuanced account of burden shifts within FC s 26 and FC s 27. See Sandra Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33. She writes that 'the party claiming a constitutional violation would have to establish a prima facie case that the measures undertaken are unreasonable because they violate one or more of the criteria laid out in Grootboom.' Ibid at 33-53. She goes on to observe that — with respect to the 'within available resources' criterion — '[i]t would be unreasonable to expect ordinary litigants to identify and to quantify the resources available to the State for the realization of particular socio-economic rights. If the state wishes to rely on a lack of available resources in order to rebut an allegation that it has failed to take reasonable measures, it should bear the burden of proving the alleged unavailability of resources. Relevant organs of state are clearly best placed to adduce this type of evidence'. Ibid at 33-53 (citations omitted).

justification within FC s 36.[1] As a result, we have yet to see a genuine burden shift from FC ss 26 and 27 to FC s 36.

As far as equality analysis goes, burden shifts may occur within FC s 9.[2] For example, a demonstration that discrimination occurs on a prohibited ground in FC s 9(3) establishes a rebuttable presumption of unfair discrimination, in terms of FC s 9(5), and forces the respondent to demonstrate that the discrimination was, indeed, fair. If the discrimination is shown to be unfair, and the respondent cannot overcome such a finding or presumption, few if any grounds exist beyond those offered in the context of FC s 9 to justify the repugnant law.[3]

34.7 Law of General Application

(a) The purpose and meaning of 'law of general application'

According to FC s 36(1), only 'law of general application' may legitimately limit the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights.[4] This statement is beguilingly simple and prone to misinterpretation.

The first distinction of import is that between law and conduct. To say that only 'law of general application' may justify the impairment of a fundamental right

[1] Iain Currie and Johan De Waal concur with this assessment. See Iain Currie & Johan De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 165 ('It is, however, difficult to apply the general limitation clause to rights with internal demarcations or qualifications that repeat the phrasing of s 36 or that make use of similar criteria. For example, s 33(1), which provides, inter alia, a right to lawful and reasonable administrative action will be violated by unlawful or unreasonable administrative action. It is hard to think of a way of justifying such administrative action as a 'reasonable' limitation of the right, or of arguing that it is "in terms of law of general application".')

[2] See Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe'); Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[3] See Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2007) Chapter 35. See also Lotus River, Ottery, Grassy Park Residents Association v South Peninsula Municipality 1999 (2) SA 817 (C), 1999 (4) BCLR 440 (C)(Only case of which we are aware in which finding of unfair discrimination under FC s 9 was ultimately found justifiable in terms of FC s 36.)

[4] The phrase 'law of general application' appears to have been borrowed from the German Basic Law ('GBL'). GBL, art 19(1), reads: 'In so far as a basic right may under this Basic Law be restricted by or pursuant to a law, such law must apply generally and not to an individual case.' The phrase 'law of general application' serves the same purpose as the phrase 'prescribed by law' does in the Canadian Charter, the European Convention of Human Rights, and the New Zealand Bill of Rights. On the meaning of 'prescribed by law', see Reference re Manitoba Language Rights [1985] 1 SCR 721, 748–49, 19 DLR (4th) 1; Sunday Times v United Kingdom (1979) 2 EHRR 245 at para 49; Mirielle Delmas-Marty (ed) The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights: International Protection versus National Restrictions (1992) 216–17; Peter Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition, 2001).

means that conduct — public or private — that limits a fundamental right but which is not sourced in a law of general application cannot be justified in terms of FC s 36(1).[1]

If, in fact, law (as opposed to conduct) does the limiting of a fundamental right, the next question is whether the law in question qualifies as 'law of general application'. When determining whether a type of law — and any token of such a type — qualifies as law of general application, it is important to remember that this threshold requirement is designed to promote two primary ends: (1) to give effect to the rule of law;[2] (2) to filter out bills of attainder.[3] To give effect to the rule of law, a law of general application must possess four formal attributes. First, the law must ensure parity of treatment in two respects: it must treat similarly situated persons alike; and it must impose the same penalties on the governed and the governors, and accord them the same privileges.[4] Second, the rule of law — as opposed to the rule of man — requires that those who enforce the law — the executive or the judiciary — do so in terms of a discernible standard. Our rule of law culture sets its face against the arbitrary exercise of state power.[5] Third, the law must be precise enough to enable individuals to

[1] See August v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 23 ('In the absence of a disqualifying legislative provision, it was not possible for respondents to seek to justify the threatened infringement of prisoners' rights in terms of s 36 of the Constitution as there was no law of general application upon which they could rely to do so.')

[2] See Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 47 (On the relationship between the rule of law and a law of general application.)

[3] That the phrase 'law of general application' is meant to serve these two discrete purposes — and, in particular, proscribe bills of attainder — is supported by the drafting history. See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Sixth Report' (15 July 1993)(Includes phrase 'law of general application'); Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Seventh Report' (29 July 1993)(Phrase broken down into its two component parts and reads 'a law applying generally and not solely to an individual case'); Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights 'Tenth Report' (5 October 1993)(Phrase 'law of general application' supplants 'a law applying generally and not solely to an individual case.' The Technical Committee suggests that its word choice was purely a matter of artifice, an attempt at a more natural and elegant use of language, rather than a change in substance that might diminish the force of an argument that bills of attainder were not the object of this proviso.)

[4] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at para 40 (footnotes omitted)('We now have a detailed written Constitution. It expressly rejects the doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament, but incorporates other common-law constitutional principles and gives them greater substance than they previously had. The rule of law is specifically declared to be one of the foundational values of the constitutional order, fundamental rights are identified and entrenched, and provision is made for the control of public power, including judicial review of all legislation and conduct inconsistent with the Constitution.')

[5] Ibid at paras 85–86 ('It is a requirement of the rule of law that the exercise of public power by the Executive and other functionaries should not be arbitrary. Decisions must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given, otherwise they are in effect arbitrary and inconsistent with this requirement. . . . The question whether a decision is rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given calls for an objective enquiry. Otherwise a decision that, viewed objectively, is in fact irrational, might pass muster simply because the person who took it mistakenly and in good faith believed it to be rational. Such a conclusion would place form above substance and undermine an important constitutional principle.') See also President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 101 (In attempting to determine the meaning of 'law of general conform their conduct to its dictates.[1] Laws may not grant officials largely unfettered discretion to use their power as they wish, nor may laws be so vaguely worded as to lead reasonable people to differ fundamentally over their extension.[2] application' Mokgoro J cites with approval McLachlin J's view in Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139, 77 DLR (4th) 385: 'She considered that the 'prescribed by law' requirement was to eliminate from limitations clause purview conduct which is purely arbitrary.' (Emphasis added).) See, further, Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25 ('In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional State is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest "naked preferences" that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional State.' (Emphasis added)); S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 156 (Ackermann J wrote that 'We have moved from a past characterised by much which was arbitrary and unequal in the operation of the law to a present and a future in a constitutional State where State action must be such that it is capable of being analysed and justified rationally. The idea of the constitutional State presupposes a system whose operation can be rationally tested against or in terms of the law. Arbitrariness, by its very nature, is dissonant with these core concepts of our new constitutional order.' (Emphasis added).)

[1] See De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at para 57 ('The first question is whether s 27(1), read with the definition of child pornography, is a "law of general application" as required by [FC] s 36(1). This Court has held that this requirement derives from an important principle of the rule of law, namely that "rules must be stated in a clear and accessible manner". The applicant's complaint concerned clarity: he submitted that the definition of "child pornography" in s 1 was too vague to satisfy this requirement. Having analysed and considered that definition above, I am satisfied that it is sufficiently clear and does constitute a law of general application.') See also Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec [1989] 1 SCR 927, 58 DLR (4th) 577, 606, 617 ('Absolute precision in the law exists rarely, if at all. The question is whether the legislature has provided an intelligible standard according to which the judiciary must do its work.')

[2] See Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 43 (CC) at para 44 ('The next question to be considered is whether the provision is nevertheless justifiable despite its inability to be read in the way that the Board suggests. The prohibition against the broadcasting of any material which is "likely to prejudice relations between sections of the population" is cast in absolute terms; no material that fits the description may be broadcast. The prohibition is so widely phrased and so far-reaching that it would be difficult to know beforehand what is really prohibited or permitted. No intelligible standard has been provided to assist in the determination of the scope of the prohibition. It would deny both broadcasters and their audiences the right to hear, form and freely express and disseminate their opinions and views on a wide range of subjects.') See also Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 47 ('It is an important principle of the rule of law that rules be stated in a clear and accessible manner. . . . It is because of this principle that s 36 requires that limitations of rights may be justifiable only if they are authorised by a law of general application. Moreover, if broad discretionary powers contain no express constraints, those who are affected by the exercise of the broad discretionary powers will not know what is relevant to the exercise of those powers or in what circumstances they are entitled to seek relief from an adverse decision.') There would appear to be a close relationship between the requirement of clarity or precision for laws of general application and the doctrine of overbreadth. In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others the High Court wrote:

> The applicant has attacked the definition of 'child pornography' as . . . overbroad . . . and . . . so vague that it cannot be regarded as a law of general application. . . . To determine whether a law is overbroad, a Court must consider the means used . . . in relation to its constitutionally legitimate underlying objective. . . .The objective of the Legislature was clear. It was to eradicate child pornography in every form. . . . When one has regard to the objectives of the legislation and the spirit of the Constitution, it can never be said that child pornography has any place in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality. Section 27(1), which outlaws the possession of child pornography, cannot be said to be disproportionate to the objectives which the Legislature has sought to achieve. In my view the definition of 'child pornography' is not overbroad.

Fourth, a commitment to the non-arbitrary exercise of power entails that the law must be accessible to the citizenry.[1] Law must be publicly promulgated and available ex ante in order to avoid the appearance that its application and its execution are selective.[2] Finally, as we noted above, the phrase 'law of general application' is meant to prevent any attempt at justification for bills of attainder. Bills of attainder are laws that pick out specific individuals or easily ascertainable members of a group for punishment without judicial trial.[3] Although bills of attainder are a 2003 (3) SA 389 (W) at para 86. Although the court's conclusions about overbreadth and whether the definition in question satisfies the requirements for a law of general application may well be correct, the reasoning does not quite support its conclusions. Overbreadth is concerned, ultimately, with whether a law sweeps up into its proscriptive net both constitutionally protected and constitutionally unprotected activity. It is not clear to us that this overbreadth enquiry has anything to do with an enquiry into the constitutional legitimacy of the law's objective, though this second enquiry is certainly part of limitations analysis. Nor is it clear to us that overbreadth has anything to do with an assessment of proportionality except in the limited sense that in order to know what is and is not constitutionally protected — and thus whether a law is, in fact, overbroad — one may first have to determine what counts as a justifiable limitation on a fundamental right or freedom and what does not. Law of general application analysis is a rather formal affair. The question in all cases of limitations analysis is whether the law in question possesses those features of law required in a polity committed to the rule of law. It is not about the subject matter of the law under scrutiny.

As Lorraine Weinrib notes, by subjecting the exercise of state power to the rule of law through the law of general application test, we reinforce both the constitutional and the democratic nature of our regime of law. First, the law of general application test protects our constitutional regime by requiring that '[a]rbitrary incursions on guaranteed rights must yield in any confrontation with such fundamental values.' Weinrib 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Section 1 of the Charter' (1988) 10 Supreme Court LR 469, 477. Secondly, the law of general application test ensures that the potential reprieve which the limitation clause offers the government is available 'if, and only if, the state has utilized its democratic law-making machinery.' Ibid. Professor Weinrib's reasoning is correct in so far as it concerns limitations analysis under the Charter. And her reasoning certainly sheds light on our own Bill of Rights analysis. However, not all law that is subject to Bill of Rights analysis under our Final Constitution will have passed through our democratic law-making machinery. Common law, customary law and regulations are appropriate objects of limitations analysis — and none of them are the direct product of democratic processes.

[1] See Premier, Mpumalanga, & Another v Executive Committee, Association of State-aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC) at paras 41–42 ('[T]o permit the implementation of retroactive decisions without, for example, affording parties an effective opportunity to make representations would flout another important principle, that of procedural fairness. Citizens are entitled to expect that government policy will ordinarily not be altered in ways which would threaten or harm their rights or legitimate expectations without their being given reasonable notice of the proposed change or an opportunity to make representations to the decision-maker. . . [T]he decision by the second applicant to terminate the payment of bursaries to members of the respondent with actual retroactive effect and without affording those members an effective opportunity to be heard was a breach of their right to procedural fairness enshrined in [IC] s 24*(b)* . . . [and] did not constitute "a law of general application".')

[2] See Dawood (supra) at para 47 ('[I]f broad discretionary powers contain no express constraints, those who are affected by the exercise of the broad discretionary powers will not know what is relevant to the exercise of those powers or in what circumstances they are entitled to seek relief from an adverse decision.')

[3] The US Constitution prohibits both the federal government and state governments from passing any bill of attainder. Article I, ss 9, 10. See US v Lovett 328 US 303 (1946)(Legislation prohibiting payment to three named federal employees on grounds of subversive activity declared invalid as bill of attainder); US v Brown 381 US 437 (1965)(Law making it a crime for member of Communist Party to serve as labour union official declared invalid as bill of attainder.)

species of arbitrary exercises of law-making authority, they identify a class of law that, on the surface, sometimes appears to satisfy the requirements of parity, non-arbitrariness, accessibility and precision. Despite such appearances, bills of attainder reflect an obvious perversion of that which animates the rule of law in the first place.[1]

These general considerations lead us to ask two kinds of questions with respect to 'law of general application' analysis. The first is whether there is, in fact, any law that authorizes the challenged conduct. If the challenge is to law, then, secondly, we must ask whether the law in question is 'law of general application'. As both a doctrinal matter and an empirical matter, the four-pronged test for law of general application will be met by most legislation,[2] regulations,[3] subordinate legislation other than regulations,[4] municipal by-laws,[5] common law

[1] The rationale behind this prohibition against extra-judicial sanctions imposed without the possibility of a fair trial does not support the proposition that laws which single out individuals or groups for benefits suffer from a similar disability. With respect to benefits, the question is whether or not the law in question serves the 'naked preferences' of those exercising power — which is another way of saying that the exercise of public power is being used solely for private benefit without any consideration for the needs of the commonweal. See United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute For Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae)(No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) at para 70 ('The distinction between the first period and all subsequent periods is also rational . . . Whilst other parties would not necessarily have been affected by this event, it cannot be said to be irrational to pass a law of general application to deal with a concrete situation, rather than a law that would apply only to members of the DA, the DP and the NNP. Indeed, to have made provision only for members of those parties might itself have given rise to constitutional objection.')

[2] See Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another; Bissett & Others v Buffalo City Municipality & Others; Transfer Rights Action Campaign & Others v MEC, Local Government And Housing, Gauteng, & Others (Kwazulu-Natal Law Society and Msunduzi Municipality as Amici Curiae)('Mkontwana') 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC) at para 83 n8 ('Section 118(1) is a provision in an Act of Parliament which governs all municipalities in South Africa. It is clearly a law of general application as contemplated by s 36 of the Constitution.') See also Deutschmann NO & Others v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service; Shelton v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service 2000 (2) SA 106, 124 (E)('It is no issue that the IT Act and the VAT Act are laws of general application.')

FC s 25's requirement that a deprivation of property must occur in terms of law of general application has given the courts another opportunity to determine the meaning of this phrase. See First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)(Section 114 of Customs and Excise Act 91 of 1964 deemed law of general application for purposes of FC s 25); Mkontwana (supra) (Section 118(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 and s 50(1)(a) of the Gauteng Local Government Ordinance 17 of 1939 found to be law of general application); Ex parte Optimal Property Solutions CC 2003 (2) SA 136 (C) at para 21 ('The Removal of Restrictions Act 84 of 1967 is a law of general application within the meaning of [FC] s 25.')

[3] See Larbi-Odam & Others v Member of the Executive Council for Education (North-West Province) & Another 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC) at para 27 ('A precondition to the applicability of IC s 33(1) is that the limitation of a right occur "by law of general application". I hold that precondition to be met in this case. Regulation 2(2) is subordinate legislation which applies generally to all educators in South Africa.')

[4] See President of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 96.

[5] See North Central Local Council & South Central Local Council v Roundabout Outdoor (Pty) Ltd & Others 2002 (2) SA 625 (D), 2001 (11) BCLR 1109 (D)(Municipal by-law placing restrictions on advertising and signs, and thus limiting rights of expression, found to be a law of general application for purposes of FC s 36.) See also Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC).

rules,[1] customary law rules,[2]

[1] See S v Thebus & Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) at paras 64–65 ('The Court held that an arrested person had the right to remain silent and that drawing an adverse inference on credibility from silence limited the right. It wrote: 'The rule of evidence that the late disclosure of an alibi affected the weight to be placed on the evidence supporting the alibi was one that was well recognised in the common law. As such, it was a law of general application.') See also Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 735 (CC)('Du Plessis v De Klerk') at para 44 (On the meaning of 'law' in IC 7(2), as well as 'law' in terms of IC 33(1)'s 'law of general application', the Court held that '[t]he term "reg" is used in other parts of chapter 3 as the equivalent of "law", for example in [IC] s 8 ('equality before the law') and [IC] s 33(1) ('law of general application'). Express references to the common law in such sections as [IC] s 33(2) and [IC] s 35(3) reinforce the conclusion that the "law" referred to in [IC] s 7(2) includes the common law and that chapter 3 accordingly affects or may affect the common law. Nor can I find any warrant in the language alone for distinguishing between the common law of delict, contract, or any other branch of private law, on the one hand, and public common law, such as the general principles of administrative law, the law relating to acts of State or to State privilege, on the other.'). See also Du Plessis v De Klerk (supra) at para 136 (Kriegler J)('[IC] Section 33(1) . . . draws no distinction between different categories of law of general application . . . [I]t is irrelevant whether it is statutory, regulatory . . . founded on the XII Tables of Roman Law . . . or a tribal custom'); Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC) at para 23 ('"Law of general application" within the meaning of [IC] s 33(1) would ordinarily include a rule of the common law'); S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') (Common law offence of scandalizing the court is law of general application for purposes of FC s 36); Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd t/a Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853, 862 (SE), 1997 (10) BCLR 1443 (SE)(Insofar as restraint constitutes limitation on rights entrenched in s 22 of Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996, common law complying with requirements of FC s 36(1)); Nortje & Another v Attorney-General, Cape & Another 1995 (2) SA 460, 476 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 236 (C)('There can be no doubt that the common-law [docket] privilege . . . is law of general application'); Jeeva & Others v Receiver of Revenue, Port Elizabeth, & Others 1995 (2) SA 433, 445F (SE)('The law relating to privilege unquestionably limits a person's constitutional right of access to State-held information. It is part of the common law of evidence and hence a law of general application'); Khala v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 218, 227 (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 89, 97 (W)('The fundamental rights in chap 3 may be limited by "law of general application". The word "law" is not defined in the Constitution. [IC] 33(2) provides that save as provided for in ss (1) or any other provision of the Constitution, "no law, whether a rule of the common law, customary law or legislation, shall limit any right entrenched in this chapter." It follows, therefore, that the word "law" in [IC] s 33(1) includes the common law'); Trustees, Brian Lackey Trust v Annandale 2004 (3) SA 281 (C) at para 18 ('[B]oth sides accept that, for purposes of [s 25(1) of] the [Final] Constitution, a "law of general application" includes the common law'); Phato v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, & Another; Commissioner of the South African Police Services v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, & Others 1995 (1) SA 799 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 99 (E)(The common law of docket privilege was a law of general application within the meaning of s 33(1)); Bellocchio Trust Trustees v Engelbrecht NO & Another 2002 (3) SA 519, 524D (C)('Even if I am wrong in coming to the conclusion that the undue delay rule does not limit the right of access to court as envisaged by s 34 of the Constitution, it is my judgment that such limitation is both reasonable and justifiable with reference to the limitations clause contained in s 36(1) of the Constitution.') Foreign courts have reached similar conclusions. See R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613, 645, 18 DLR (4th) 655; Ministry of Transport & Noort Police v Curren [1992] 3 NZLR 260; Sunday Times v The United Kingdom (1979) 2 EHRR 245 at para 47.

[2] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 96 ('The primogeniture rule, . . [a]s the centrepiece of the customary-law system of succession, . . . violates the equality rights of women and is an affront to their dignity. The result is that the limitation it imposes on the rights of those subject to it is not reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society founded on the values of equality, human dignity and freedom.') See also Nwamitwa v Phillia & Others 2005 (3) SA 536 (T)(Customary law rules, viewed in toto, constitute law of general application that ultimately justify the tribal authorities' refusal to rules of court,[1] and international conventions.[2] Whether 'mere' norms and standards, directives or guidelines issued by government agencies or statutory bodies qualify as laws of general application remains unclear.[3] appoint a female chief.) Cf Taylor v Kurtstag NO & Others 2005 (1) SA 362, 385 (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W) ('Whether the internal rules of a religious group are likely to qualify as "law of general application", as referred to in s 36(1), is questionable … What is meant with this expression includes the law in the general sense of the legal system applicable to all which, in this case, allows for contractual freedom to associate and actions flowing from it.')

[1] The authority for this proposition may be described as 'weak' by comparison to the authority that underwrites the recognition of other types of law as law of general application. See Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In re Financial Services Board v Van der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) at para 19 (Although not germane to outcome, Constitutional Court and High Court both appeared to accept the proposition that Rule 35(14) of the Uniform Rules of Court 'was a law of general application which reasonably and justifiably limited the constitutional right'); Sanford v Haley NO 2004 (3) SA 296 (C)(Suggests that rules of court qualify as law of general application); S v Nocuse & Others 1995 (3) SA 240 (Tk)(Rules of court regarding leave to appeal found to be law of general application for purposes of limitations analysis under IC s 33(1)).

[2] See Chief Family Advocate & Another v G 2003 (2) SA 599 (W)(Noting that, in Sonderup v Tondelli & Another 2001 (1) SA 1171 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC), the Constitutional Court found that the Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction Act 72 of 1996, having been incorporated into domestic law, was a law of general application.)

[3] With respect to socio-economic rights, Danie Brand argues, persuasively, that policies and programmes undertaken by the state must often be viewed, along with enabling legislation, as law of general application that governs a particular area of socio-economic life. Brand's argument rests on a distinction between law that imposes a negative duty on the state and law that imposes a positive duty on the state. The test for law of general application in the context of 'negative' rights is characterized by restrictions on how public power may be exercised. However, because the test for compliance in socio-economic rights cases is whether the state has created a comprehensive and coordinated programme to realize progressively a right, and whether it has taken the necessary steps to execute that programme, the test for law of general application in the context of positive rights must be viewed in terms of how the 'law' of that programme — enabling legislation, subordinate legislation and policies — works to effect the desired ends. To be clear, the issue here is whether one can, in fact, separate out, in the domain of socio-economic rights, policies and guidelines from the rest of the state's law-making function. See Danie Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 56C. But see Jacques de Ville 'The Right to Administrative Justice: An Examination of s 24 of the Interim Constitution' (1995) 11 SAJHR 264, 275 (Argues that 'law of general application' covers only laws and not actions pursuant to laws; therefore actions pursuant to laws could not be justified under IC s 33(1).)

South African and Canadian authority is divided on the matter. See Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139, 77 DLR (4th) 385 (Court divided as to whether internal airport rules qualified as law for purposes of Charter s 1 review). See, further, Stuart Woolman & Johan de Waal 'Freedom of Assembly: Voting With Your Feet' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 292, 308–14 (Discussion of Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada and problems that law of general application analysis can raise for Bill of Rights analysis generally.) To the extent that such rules, directives and guidelines satisfy the four rule-of-law criteria, at least two good reasons exist for treating them as law of general application. First, if such rules, directives and guidelines are deemed not to qualify as law of general application, then the government or party relying upon the policy or guideline will not have the ability to justify them under FC s 36. Pressure may then be placed on the court to do justificatory analysis under the right itself. That is, the court may be inclined to change the content of the right in order to save the legal action in question. The result could be either the development of two different bodies of fundamental rights analysis — one entirely under the right, one more naturally divided between the right and the limitation clause. Mokgoro J adopted such a line in President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo. 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo'). Mokgoro J wrote:

(b) The relationship between law of general application and the rule of law

As John Finnis somewhat cheekily puts it, 'the Rule of Law' is 'the name commonly given to the state of affairs in which a legal system is legally in good shape'.[1] Here are some of the features of a legal system in good shape:

> (i) its rules are prospective, not retroactive, and (ii) are not in any other way impossible to comply with; ... (iii) its rules are promulgated, (iv) clear, and coherent one with another; ... (v) its rules are sufficiently stable to allow people to be guided by their knowledge of the content of rules; ... (vi) the making of decrees and orders applicable to relatively limited situations is guided by rules that are promulgated, clear, stable, and relatively general; and ... (vii) those people who have authority to make, administer and apply the rules in an official capacity (a) are accountable for their compliance with rules applicable to their performance and (b) do actually administer the law consistently and in accordance with its tenor.[2]

> I consider it undesirable to take a technical approach to the interpretation of 'law of general application' ... [A] technical approach unduly reduces the types of rules and conduct which can justify limitations ... [E]xclusion from section 33(1) may adversely affect the proper interpretation of the scope of rights in Chapter 3.

Ibid at para 104. Second, if the four-part test is actually satisfied, then a refusal to engage in limitations analysis for norms and standards, policies and guidelines, would mean that persons who had acted in reliance upon these state initiatives and aligned their behaviour accordingly, would have no ability to justify any action taken in light of what would have been understood to be state-sanctioned forms of behaviour. The exclusion of such policies and guidelines from FC s 36 justificatory analysis simply sets the bar too high. Kriegler J, also in dissent, agreed with the general framework adumbrated herein, but differed with Mokgoro J on the application of that analytical framework to the 'law' at issue in Hugo. Kriegler J argued that that exercise of the presidential pardon provided for in IC s 82(1)(k) could not be characterized as law. Kriegler J wrote:

> The exercise of such power is non-recurrent and specific, intended to benefit particular persons or classes of persons, to do so once only, and is given effect by an executive order directed to specific state officials. I respectfully suggest that one cannot by a process of linguistic interpretation fit such an executive/presidential/administrative decision and order into the purview of s 33(1). That savings clause is not there for the preservation of executive acts of government but to allow certain rules of law to be saved.

Ibid at para 76. We are inclined to agree with Kriegler J's characterization of the particular presidential pardons at issue. But the problem is not, as Currie and De Waal suggest, that the pardon picks out particular persons for a benefit. See Iain Currie & Johan De Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 173. Individuation is only a problem where law picks out a readily identifiable set of persons for extra-judicial punishment. It is the star-chamber quality of such an edict that offends the commitment to the rule of law. The problem in Hugo is that the 'law' in question does not create an identifiable standard around which an individual may align his or her behaviour. The presidential commutation of a sentence is an ex post facto assessment of what justice requires. However, Kriegler J's gloss on what constitutes 'law' should not be understood to stand for the proposition that administrative policies cannot count as law. That, unfortunately, is exactly how Currie and De Waal characterize Kriegler J's conclusions. Rather such directives may well count as law if they possess the four formal attributes of law we describe below: parity of treatment, non-arbitrariness, precision and accessibility. Moreover, it strikes us as odd that such government edicts — which are prospective in nature and intended to provide standards for the behaviour of state officials and private persons — should not count as law. It is one thing to exclude from consideration decisions that are retrospective in effect and edicts that remain in the drawer of a bureaucrat. It is quite another to elevate form over substance and exclude from consideration those edicts that, by virtue of their prospective effect, shape public and private behaviour.

[1] John Finnis Natural Law and Natural Rights (1980) 270.

[2] Ibid at 270–271.

Finnis's description of the rule of law coheres with our own account of the formal features of law of general application. Before further adumbrating the contents of that account, it is worth stopping a moment to interrogate Finnis's first remark a little more closely. The rule of law, he says, describes a legal system 'legally' 'in good shape'. Finnis is being neither funny nor tautological. What he means is that in an age such as ours, where the ideals of > legality and the Rule of Law . . . enjoys an ideological popularity, . . . conspirators against the common good will regularly seek to gain and hold power through an adherence to constitutional and legal forms which is not the less 'scrupulous' for being tactically motivated, insincere and temporary. Thus, the Rule of Law does not guarantee every aspect of the common good and sometimes it does not even secure the substance of the common good.[1]

In sum, a commitment to the rule of law — and to the formal features of law identified above — is a necessary but insufficient condition for a just or a fair society.

(c) The specific features of law of general application

The threshold test for law of general application excludes, from the more general justificatory framework provided by FC s 36, two classes of cases. The first class of cases embraces those instances in which the party whose conduct has been found to limit a fundamental right cannot rely upon an existing rule of law as a justification for the limitation. In short, FC s 36 only permits the justification of law.[2] It does not

[1] Finnis (supra) at 274. As Finnis observes, regimes that are exploitative or ideologically fanatical or some mixture of the two could submit themselves to the constraints imposed by the rule of law if it served the realization of their narrow conception of the good. Indeed, both Stephen Ellmann and David Dyzenhaus argue persuasively that South Africa under apartheid was an exploitative and ideologically fanatical regime committed to the rule of law. Stephen Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Security in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992); David Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: South African Law in the Perspective of Legal Philosophy (1991). Why would a fanatic or an ideologue bother? Because by abiding by the rule of law, the ideologue can disguise his malignant intent. That said, while the rule of law did constrain the South African state — and even allowed for a cramped conception of human rights — few would allow that it was fair or just. What was missing was any real commitment to individual dignity and the sense that the purpose of the state was to enable all persons to 'constitute themselves in community'. Finnis (supra) at 274. It should come then as no surprise that the two most important — and somewhat novel — constitutional doctrines developed by the Constitutional Court in its first decade of operation turn on a robust and substantive conception of the rule of law and an account of dignity that makes it the Grundnorm for the Final Constitution. See Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11; Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. Quite unlike the regime of law authorized by apartheid, the new dispensation recognizes that its legitimacy is conditional upon the state's commitment to act for the 'general' welfare and to treat all individuals as worthy of equal concern and respect.

The point of our brief digression into a finer point of legal philosophy is this. Although the obvious concern of the law of general application requirement is that various formal processes be observed — publicity, accessibility, precision, parity — the requirement is, at bottom, concerned with substantive features (the rule of law and individual dignity are but two) of a constitutional state.

