In the United States, the issue is inextricably entwined with state funding of the arts and its intersection with the expression jurisprudence, the cornerstone of which is the principle of so-called 'viewpoint neutrality'. For example, in 1989 the National Endowment for the Arts ('NEA') funded a Robert Mappelthorpe exhibition which included homoerotic photographs and a work by Andre Serrano entitled 'Piss Christ'.[3] Certain members of congress condemned the NEA's funding as state sponsorship of pornography, and Congress reacted with a reduction of the NEA grant and legislative amendments to prevent future incidents. This

[1] The Supreme Court has held that obscenity is not constitutionally protected 'speech' under the First Amendment. Expression is not obscene, and therefore does qualify for protection, if it has 'serious artistic value'. Miller v California 413 US 15, 24, 93 SCt 2607, 37 LEd 2d 419 (1973)('Miller v California')(The Court in Miller v California laid down a three part test to determine whether speech is obscene and therefore unprotected: (a) whether 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. This of course begs the question as to what constitutes 'serious artistic value'. To this end, the Court in Pope elucidated the third part of the Miller test as whether a 'reasonable person would find such value in the material, taken as a whole.' Pope v Illinois 481 US 497, 500-501, 107 SCt 1918, 95 LEd 2d 439 (1987)('Pope'). However, as noted by Justice Scalia in his separate concurrence in Pope, this test remains fundamentally flawed: 'I must note, however, that in my view it is quite impossible to come to an objective assessment of (at least) literary or artistic value, there being many accomplished people who have found literature in Dada, and art in the replication of a soup can. Since ratiocination has little to do with esthetics, the fabled "reasonable man" is of little help in the inquiry, and would have to be replaced with, perhaps, the "man of tolerably good taste" — a description that betrays the lack of an ascertainable standard. If evenhanded and accurate decisionmaking is not always impossible under such a regime, it is at least impossible in the cases that matter. I think we would be better advised to adopt as a legal maxim what has long been the wisdom of mankind: De gustibus non est disputandum. Just as there is no use arguing about taste, there is no use litigating about it. For the law courts to decide "What is Beauty" is a novelty even by today's standards.' Pope (supra) at 505.) For further discussion of Miller v California, see § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[2] By virtue of its very nature, it is not coincidental that the performance art genre is difficult to define. It is easier to furnish examples. Amongst the most well known is 'Smut Fest' by the performance artist Annie Sprinkle, formally a career actress in pornographic films. During her performance art routine, Sprinkle, with her legs spread, invited audiences to view her cervix through a speculum. Undoubtedly part of the purpose was commentary on the objectification of pornography intended to shock. A further example is that of Ron Athey's 'Four Scenes in a Harsh Life' which involved making cuts in the back of his co-performer Divinity Fudge, an HIV-positive drag queen. Strips of absorbent paper were placed on the cuts and the blood stained paper was then hoisted into the air. See www.ronathey.com (accessed on 20 October 2008). In general, performance art is characterised by actions of the artists themselves constituting the work of art. For a history and account of performance art, see A Kurzweg 'Live Art and the Audience: Toward a Speaker-Focused Freedom of Expression' (1999) 34 Harvard Civil Rights and Civil Liberties LR 437 (Using the case of performance art, the author argues for what she terms a more 'speaker-focused approach' to freedom of expression protection under the First Amendment, as opposed to an 'audience based' approach which she argues characterises present First Amendment jurisprudence.)

[3] The work featured a photograph of a crucifix immersed in urine.

spawned a series of conflicts in the courts between the legislative branch and artists as the legislature tried to find a restrictive formulation governing allocations of state funding to the arts which did not violate the First Amendment.[1] A legislative formula which allows for a diverse representative body applying a level of subjective content-based criteria was finally upheld in NEA v Finley.[2] In doing so the Supreme Court distinguished between Government action as patron (in NEA cases) and government action as sovereign; Government may allocate competitive funding according to criteria that would be impermissible were direct regulation of expression at stake.[3] In light of Finley, the jurisprudential approach of the US Supreme Court to the problem of subjectivity (or absence of viewpoint neutrality) in criteria employed in state funding decisions is a combination of a weaker standard in the funding context[4] together with an institutional/process solution — the body making the decisions concerned must be representative of diverse artistic and cultural points of view.[5]

Since provocative and subversive social commentary is often at the very heart of the artistic endeavour, it is of fundamental importance that our jurisprudence

[1] See Bella Lewitzky Dance Foundation v Frohnmayer 754 F Supp 774 (CD Cal, 1991)(The Federal District Court struck down as unconstitutionally vague an amendment providing that no NEA funds 'may be used to promote, disseminate, or produce materials which in the judgment of [the NEA] may be considered obscene, including but not limited to, depictions of sadomasochism, homoeroticism, the sexual exploitation of children, or individuals engaged in sex acts and which, when taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.')

[2] National Endowment for the Arts v Finley 524 US 569, 118 SCt 2168, 141 LEd 2d 500 (1998)('Finley')(Upheld an amendment that required 'the Chairperson of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) to ensure that artistic excellence and artistic merit are the criteria by which [grant] applications are judged, taking into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public.' The legislative scheme also provided for an institutional framework whereby recommendations for funding were made by advisory panels which are required to reflect 'diverse artistic and cultural points of view.')

[3] Finley (supra) at 513.

[4] Advocates for the Arts v Thomson 532 F2d 792, 795-796 (CA1)(cert. denied, 429 U.S. 894, 97 SCt 254, 50 LEd 2d 177 (1976)) cited with approval in Finley (supra) at 551 ('[T]he very assumption' of the NEA is that grants will be awarded according to the 'artistic worth of competing applications' and absolute neutrality is simply 'inconceivable.' However, even on the approach of the majority, viewpoint neutrality is still maintained in a weaker form: Government may not 'aim at the suppression of dangerous ideas'. Finley (supra) at 561. The 'dangerous ideas' doctrine is derived from the earliest First Amendment jurisprudence. See American Communications Assn v Douds 339 US 382, 402 (1950)('Douds'); Cammarano v United States 358 US 498 (1959); Regan v Taxation with Representation 461 US 540 (1983).

[5] But see Finley (supra) at 564 (Justice Scalia's held as follows in his separate concurrence: 'The method of compliance proposed by the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) — selecting diverse review panels of artists and nonartists that reflect a wide range of geographic and cultural perspectives — is so obviously inadequate that it insults the intelligence. A diverse panel membership increases the odds that, if and when the panel takes the factors into account, it will reach an accurate assessment of what they demand. But it in no way increases the odds that the panel will take the factors into consideration — much less ensures that the panel will do so, which is the Chairperson's duty under the statute.' (emphasis in original). Justice Scalia would have preferred an approach that relied purely on the relaxation of the requirement of viewpoint neutrality when government makes funding decisions.)

develops conceptual tools that are able to avoid explicit or implicit reliance on subjective content-based criteria for restriction of art. In almost all cases, including the most challenging acts of artistic expression, restrictions based on context rather than content will be sufficient to achieve any legitimate aims of the state in protecting society from a perceived harm. The feature of context restriction that is critical in an open and democratic society where the perceived harm of the artistic act is at its highest is that any restriction must effectively allow for informed choice. This entails first, that those whom an open and democratic society affords full legal capacity, namely adults, must be entitled to choose to view the activity. Secondly, viewing must be voluntary; the context must sufficiently guard against accidental or unintentional viewing. In an open and democratic society, where these criteria are satisfied, few artistic activities will justify further restrictions particularly if such proposed restrictions rely on the content, or supposed merit or value, of the activity.[1]

(f) Academic freedom and freedom of scientific research

The protection of academic freedom and freedom of scientific research is intended to guard against repeating the history of significant state interference in the independence and autonomy of educational institutions, academics and students prior to democracy.[2] Notably, under the Final Constitution the freedom is specifically incorporated under the expressive right and is no longer confined, as it was under the Interim Constitution, to 'institutions of higher learning'.[3] Academic freedom is therefore protected at all educational institutions including schools and colleges.

Most jurisdictions have recognised that the right to freedom of expression includes the right to academic freedom even when it is not expressly protected.[4]

[1] As is apparent from De Reuck, an artistic activity depicting child pornography is an exception which warrants near-categorical restriction based on content. 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC). As noted above, the peculiar consequence of the structure of free speech analysis under the Final Constitution is that even artistic acts that involve child pornography receive constitutional protection though the near categorical restriction imposed by the legislature is easily justifiable. See § 42.3 supra. See further § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[2] Section 25 of the Universities Act 61 of 1995 provides a notorious example. It empowered the Minister to impose conditions on the granting of university subsidies. Regulations published in 1987 pursuant to s 25 required universities to take steps directed towards the prevention and punishment of certain detailed student activities, aimed mainly at suppression of student political activity and what the responsible Minister had termed the suppression of 'the revolutionary onslaught'. The universities succeeded in having a number of these regulations set aside as being void for vagueness. See, for example, University of Cape Town v Ministers of Education and Culture (House of Assembly and House of Representatives) 1988 (3) SA 203 (C).

[3] IC s 14(1) provided: '(1) Every person shall have the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief, and opinion, which shall include academic freedom in institutions of higher learning.'

[4] See, for example, Sweezy v New Hampshire 354 US 234, 262-263 (1957)('Sweezy')(The concurring opinion of Justice Frankfurter is repeatedly quoted as delieneating the scope of the right to academic freedom in the United States as a university's right to 'to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study'.) See also McKinney v The University of Guelph [1990] 3 SCR 229 (SCC).

However, the application and scope of this aspect of the right remain poorly defined.[1] In the United States, for example, it has been held that the right to academic freedom is the institution's right and not that of the teacher/academic.[2] This principle, which is based upon an interpretation of the Supreme Court decision in Sweezy,[3] has been widely deployed by Federal Courts to restrict an individual academic's rights in respect of student grading and curriculum content.[4] While the constitutional protection of academic freedom may come down in favour of the institution in conflicts with academics concerning certain curriculum and grading issues, we submit that a general principle that academic freedom is exclusively that of institutions and not of individual academics cannot hold under our Constitution. As considered above, the class of bearers of the expressive right is broadly defined under the Final Constitution and the right requires generous interpretation.[5] There is nothing in the text that suggests that the right should be limited to institutions and not individuals. Nor is there a basis for a weaker version of the principle, namely, that in the case of conflict, the

[1] Stronach v Virginia State University Civil Action 3:07-CV-646-HEH (ED Va, January 15 2008)('Stronach').

[2] See Urofsky v Gilmore 216 F 3d 401, 414 (4th Cir, 2000)('Urofsky')('Cases that have referred to a First Amendment right of academic freedom have done so generally in terms of the institution, not the individual'); Wozniak v Conry 236 F 3d 888, 891 (7th Cir, 2001); Edwards v Cal Univ of Pa 156 F 3d 488, 491 (3d Cir, 1998)('Edwards'); Brown v Amenti 247 F 3d 69 (3d Cir, 2001)('Brown'); Lovelace v SE Mass Univ 793 F 2d 419, 425 (1st Cir, 1986)('Lovelace'); Sweezy (supra). But see Parate v Isibor 868 F 2d 821, 827-28 (6th Cir, 1989)('Parate').

[3] The Supreme Court did not directly address the issue in Sweezy (supra), but the decision was premised on the right being that of the institution.

[4] See Urofsky (supra) at 415 ('Significantly, the [Supreme] Court has never recognized that professors possess a First Amendment right of academic freedom to determine for themselves the content of their courses and scholarship, despite opportunities to do so'); Wozniak (supra) at 891 (Characterising as 'frivolous' a University of Illinois professor's claim that he had a right to autonomy in grading his students despite conflicts with the university's grading procedures and stating '[n]o person has a fundamental right to teach undergraduate engineering classes without following the university's grading rules'); Edwards (supra) at 491 ('[The] First Amendment does not allow a university professor to decide what is taught in the classroom but rather protects the university's right to select the curriculum'); Brown (supra) at 75 ('a public university professor does not have a First Amendment right to expression via the school's grade assignment procedures); Lovelace (supra) at 425 ('To accept plaintiffs contention that an untenured teacher's grading policy is constitutionally protected . . . would be to constrict the university in defining and performing its educational mission') and Stronach (supra)('No constitutional right to academic freedom exists that would prohibit senior VSU [Virginia State University] officials from changing a grade given by Stronach to one of his physics students against his will.') The only deviation appears to be in the Sixth Circuit, Parate (supra) at 827 ('A university professor may claim that his assignment of an examination grade or a final grade is communication protected by the First Amendment. . . [t]hus, the individual professor may not be compelled, by university officials, to change a grade that the professor previously assigned to her student.') Stronach distinguishes Parate on the basis that in that case the university authorities did not seek to alter the grade themselves but to force the academic himself to alter the grade.

[5] See § 42.3 supra.

academic freedom of the institution should always trump that of its individual members. The interests of the individual and the institution should rather be carefully balanced in appropriate cases.

(g) Protecting the means of expression

Meaningful protection of the right to freedom of expression, particularly in a context of material inequality, requires that there must be access to the necessary resources for effective expression. When applied to broadcasting, FC s 16 must be read in the light of FC s 192 which requires the establishment of an independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest and thereby to ensure fairness and diversity of views broadly representing South African society. The expressive right accordingly recognizes the legacy of inequalities in South African society in which 'not all have equal access to and control of resources, including the electronic media'.[1] This implies a positive right, discussed further below,[2] to support from the state so that voices that would otherwise not be heard can find a meaningful space in the marketplace of ideas.

Protecting the means of expression also has a negative dimension: Any restriction upon or interference with the means of expression constitutes an infringement of the right to freedom of expression that must be justified under the limitations clause. This principle has been recognised in a number of jurisdictions[3] and is a necessary incident of the right to freedom of expression under our Constitution.

(i) Monopolies

Monopolies are one of the most common limitations on the means of expression. Competition law, in so far as it applies to sectors of the economy that are necessary to foster the means of expression, is therefore an important instrument of freedom of expression.[4] In City of Los Angeles v Preferred Communications, for example, the United States Supreme Court held that 'cable television partakes of some

[1] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 45.

[2] See § 42.7*(g)*(iii) infra.

[3] See City of Los Angeles and Department of Water and Power v Preferred Communications Inc 476 US 488 (1986)('Preferred Communication'); Red Lion Broadcasting Co Inc & Others v Federal Communication Commission et al (No 2) 395 US 367 (1969); Autronic AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 485 at para 47 (Protection of freedom of expression 'applies not only to the content of information but also to the means of transmission or reception since any restriction imposed on the means necessarily interferes with the right to receive and impart information'); Retrofit (Pvt) Ltd v Posts & Telecommunications Corp (Attorney-General of Zimbabwe Intervening) 1996 (1) SA 847 (ZS), 1995 (9) BCLR 1262 (Z), 1995 (2) ZLR 199 ('Retrofit').

[4] See Unites States in Associated Press v United States 326 US 1 (1945) at para 20 (Recognised this principle which is undoubtedly applicable in respect of competition legislation under our Constitution.)

of the aspects of speech and the communication of ideas as do the traditional enterprises of newspaper and book publishers, public speakers, and pamphleteers'.[1] Consequently the City's refusal, without good cause, to allow a cable television company to lease space on utility poles because the company had refused to participate in an auction to award a monopoly franchise for provisions of such services in the area was an infringement of the First Amendment.

In the decision of the Zimbabwean Supreme Court in Retrofit[2] it was held that the State Telephone Corporation's monopoly over both fixed line and wireless telephone services violated the constitutional right of every person to receive and impart ideas and information.[3] The evidence showed that the Corporation was incapable of maintaining the fixed line service let alone establishing a viable cell phone network. This was frustrating the access of Zimbabweans cellular phone technology which was rapidly developing elsewhere. After carefully examining the purported objects of the monopoly, the Court found that these could not justify the limitation of the right to freedom of expression.[4] While the decision in Retrofit must obviously be interpreted in light of the particular circumstances[5] and statutory setting in Zimabwe, it is a landmark ruling that will be highly instructive to our own courts when confronted with restrictions on the means of expression.[6]

(ii) Testing the means of expression: the availability of alternative means

Meaningful protection of the right to freedom of expression might, in certain times, have required little more than access, quite literally, to physical space necessary to express oneself; a public place and a speaker's stand to project one's voice.[7] However, changes in technology and the media through which information and ideas are communicated have had a fundamental impact on the protection of expression. Today, meaningful expression often requires access

[1] Preferred Communications (supra) at 494.
[2] Retrofit (supra) at 861H-862A.
[3] Ibid at 861H-862A.
[4] Ibid at 862E-866A.
[5] See SA Post Office Ltd v Van Rensburg 1998 (1) SA 796, 809B-811E (E)(Distinguishes Retrofit but does not articulate clearly the basis for the distinction.)
[6] TS Masiyiwa Holdings (Pvt) Limited & Another v Minister of Information Posts and Telecommunications 1997 (2) BCLR 275 (ZS).
[7] Perhaps the most celebrated defined physical space is the north-east corner of Hyde Park in London which was given over by the Royal Parks and Gardens Act of 1872 as a place for public speaking, now known colloquially as 'Speakers' Corner'. See generally JM Roberts 'The Enigma of Free Speech: Speakers' Corner, The Geography of Governance and a Crisis of Rationality' (2000) 9(2) Social & Legal Studies 271; JM Roberts Tyburn Hanging Tree and the Origins of Speakers' Corner available at http://www.speakerscorner.net/docs/origins.html (accessed on 18 October 2008); and JM Roberts 'Spatial Governance and Working Class Public Spheres: The Case of a Chartist Demonstration at Hyde Park' (2001) 14(3) The Journal of Historical Sociology 308. As Roberts explains, the 1872 legislation was, ironically, intended to curtail the practice of robust protest which had developed in that area of Hyde Park over the preceding 150 years. Many other cities have analogous areas of public spaces dedicated to free speech, for example the Domain, Sydney Australia and Speakers' Corner in Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada.

to extensive financial and advanced technological resources.[1] The mere preservation of physical space in which to project one's message with the human voice may indirectly suppress expression; the soap box in a public park is no match for the nightly news.

This fact appears to have been lost on the Supreme Court of Appeal in Laugh It Off,[2] where the appellant had used the relatively cheap medium of a T-shirt to parody the marketing of a well-known and popular beer brand by slightly altering the beer's trademarked label. The Supreme Court of Appeal, for the first time in our law, tentatively[3] applied an 'alternative means/avenues of expression test' derived from the Canadian and United States[4] jurisprudence:

> The appellant may declaim the message about black labour and white guilt from rooftops, pulpits and political platforms; and it may place the same words (without appropriating the registered mark's repute) on T-shirts, and sell them. In other words, its freedom of expression is hardly affected.[5]

The availability of these alternative means of expression was expressly relied upon by the Supreme Court of Appeal in finding that any infringement of the appellant's right to freedom of expression was justifiable. The test, however, begs the essential question of what constitutes 'adequate alternative means' of expression on the facts of the case. In a crowded market place dominated by the well-resourced and their commercial or ideological interests, it is frequently necessary to compete commercially or unconventionally in order to convey a message effectively. While the opportunity to declaim one's message from 'rooftops, pulpits or political platforms' may once have been sufficient to guarantee protection of expressive rights, that is no longer the case; Laugh It Off would not have reached the same audience, nor done so as effectively as it did, through the sale of its T-shirts. Moreover, the sale of the T-shirts afforded modest resources to continue to convey the critical message.

On appeal, the Constitutional Court recognised the submissions regarding the ambiguity of the 'alternative means' test[6] and expressly refrained from either

[1] Interestingly, there are those who advocate for the establishment of a broadcast centre at Speakers' Corner in Hyde Park which would be open to all to broadcast their views over the electronic media. See http://www.speakerscorner.net/charter.html.

[2] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SA Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International 2005 (2) SA 46 (SCA), [2004] 4 All SA 151 ('Laugh It Off SCA'). For further discussion of this case, see 'Intellectual property restrictions' § 42.9*(d)* infra.

[3] See Laugh It Off SCA (supra) at para 30 (The SCA declined to embrace the test in absolute terms but preferred to treat it as a 'relevant factor'.)

[4] Ibid at paras 30 and 36 (Court referred, inter alia, to Compagnie Générale des Etablissements Michelin & Cie v National Automobile, Aerospace, Transportation and General Workers Union of Canada (CAW-Canada) (TD); Mutual of Omaha Insurance Co v Novak 836 F 2d 397 (1987); Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders Inc v Pussycat Cinema Ltd 604 F2d 200, 206 (1987)).

[5] Laugh It Off SCA (supra) at para 30.

[6] Laugh It Off (supra) at para 63.

endorsing the test as forming part of our expression jurisprudence or deciding the appeal on that basis.[1] While it is likely that our courts will ultimately adopt a version of the 'alternative means' test as relevant to the justification of infringements of the right to freedom of expression, it is critical that the concept of 'adequacy' is a sufficiently rich one that properly takes into account the changing contexts and technologies of expression.

(iii) State support for the means of expression and state broadcasters

The issue, however, can be taken a step further: To what extent should the state be required to provide or supplement existing means of expression where effective expression is denied to disempowered individuals or groups for want of resources or systemic inequality?

The Supreme Court in the United States has interpreted the First Amendment not to require such state assistance, asserting that 'although government may not place obstacles in the path of a [person's] exercise of … freedom of [speech], it need not remove those not of its own creation.'[2] The legislature's decision not to subsidise the exercise of a fundamental right therefore does not infringe the right, and is not subject to strict scrutiny on review.[3] Furthermore, the legislature's decision not to grant a benefit, such as a tax exemption, to a particular organization or endeavour, is, save in exceptional circumstances, not susceptible to judicial review.[4]

In South Africa, a central medium of expression, and a major recipient of state resources, is the state broadcaster: the South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC). It is vital for effective protection of the right to freedom of expression that the SABC adopts true viewpoint neutrality and that it provides a medium for marginalised, disempowered, unpopular, critical and diverse expression. Such expression is otherwise likely to be suppressed by more powerful commercial and political interests. As was noted above,[5] the final text of FC s 16 removed the clause that was incorporated in the Interim Constitution and earlier drafts

[1] Laugh It Off (supra) at para 66.

[2] Harris v McRae 448 US 297, 316 (1980)('Harris'). See also Regan v Taxation With Representation 461 US 540 (1983)('Regan').

[3] Regan (supra) at 549 citing Buckley v Valeo 424 US 1 (1976); Maher v Roe 432 US 464 (1977).

[4] Regan (supra) at 549 citing with approval Cincinnati Soap Co v United States 301 US 308, 317 (1937); Alabama v Texas 347 US 272 (1954); Commissioner v Sullivan 356 US 27, 28 (1958)('For the purposes of these cases appropriations are comparable to tax exemptions and deductions, which are also "a matter of grace [that] Congress can, of course, disallow … as it chooses"'). See also Douds (supra) at 402 (withdrawal of the opportunity to invoke the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board as a result of expressive activities) and Wieman v Updegraff 344 US 183 (1952)(denial of the opportunity for public employment as a result of engagement in certain speech). In general, denial of support is not reviewable where it is 'aimed at suppression of dangerous ideas'. Douds (supra) at 402; Speiser v Randall 357 US 513 (1958).

[5] See § 42.2 supra.

which required that state broadcasting resources be employed to this end. However the Constitution itself[1] and national legislation[2] incorporating the Charter[3] of the SABC give effect to this obligation.[4] The obligation is also necessarily entailed by the right to freedom of expression.

FC s 192 requires national legislation to 'establish an independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest, and to ensure fairness and diversity of views broadly representing South African society'.[5] One of the purposes of public broadcasting is to promote views of those who are marginalised and to resist political co-option or the disproportionate influence of commercial interests and the well-resourced. The independent regulator, ICASA, is explicitly empowered, and obliged, under FC s 192 and national legislation,[6] to monitor and enforce compliance by the SABC with its public service mandate.

To this end, a strong independent regulator is critical to securing meaningful protection of the expressive right. Where the independent regulator is weak, under-resourced or falls under the influence of particular political or commercial interests, the very foundation of freedom of expression is compromised. Since its inception, ICASA has at times been criticised, including recently by the courts,[7] for failing properly to carry out its constitutional mandate. This is cause for constitutional concern. Moreover, recent events within the SABC, including express 'blacklisting' of certain political commentators on the basis of their

[1] FC s 192.

[2] Broadcasting Act 4 of 1999 ('Broadcasting Act').

[3] Broadcasting Act, Chapter IV ss 8-28.

[4] Section 10(1) of the Broadcasting Act provides, in relevant part:

Public service:

(1) The public service provided by the Corporation must—

(a) make services available to South Africans in all the official languages;

(b) reflect both the unity and diverse cultural and multilingual nature of South Africa and all of its cultures and regions to audiences;

. . .

(d) provide significant news and public affairs programming which meets the highest standards of journalism, as well as fair and unbiased coverage, impartiality, balance and independence from government, commercial and other interests;

. . .

(f) enrich the cultural heritage of South Africa by providing support for traditional and contemporary artistic expression;

(g) strive to offer a broad range of services targeting, particularly, children, women, the youth and the disabled;

(b) include programmes made by the Corporation as well as those commissioned from the independent production sector.

[5] The Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act 13 of 2000 ('ICASA Act') gives effect to this constitutional obligation.

[6] Broadcasting Act s 6.

[7] See Islamic Unity (supra) at paras 14-18.

viewpoints,[1] internecine conflict between the Board and senior management which has resulted in repeated litigation between the Chief Executive and the Board,[2] as well as amongst senior management themselves,[3] suggest that the SABC itself is an institution that has been unable effectively to transcend political contestation, to fulfil its public service mandate and to secure independence. The compromising of this central institution of open democracy has potentially dire consequences for the effective protection of freedom of expression.

(iv) The Internet

The Internet is a global medium of expression. It has revolutionised the communication of information and ideas. As the United States Supreme Court noted in Reno v ACLU:[4] 'It is no exaggeration to conclude that the content on the Internet is as diverse as human thought.'[5] The Internet's effectiveness however, is limited by its accessibility. Access has two parts: access to the minimal infrastructure necessary to utilise the Internet and quality or speed of access. Since all aspects of the technology that are necessary to make the Internet possible are privatised in South Africa, both of these components manifest in the cost of access. The

[1] See 'Commission of Enquiry into Blacklisting and Related Matters' reprinted in Mail & Guardian Online (14 October 2006) available at ,http://www.mg. co.za/ContentImages/286848/SABCBLACKLISTREPORT.pdf (accessed on 18 October). The Report found that there was an arbitrary blacklist of outside commentators and that there was a 'climate of fear' in SABC newsrooms. See F Haffajee 'Inside the SABC blacklist report' Mail & Guardian Online (13 October 2006) available at http://www.mg.co.za/article/2006-10-13-inside-the-sabc-blacklist-report (accessed on 18 October 2008).

[2] L Flanagan 'Mpofu had no Power to Axe Snuki' The Star (16 May 2008) available at www.iol.co.za/index.php?click_id=13&set_id=1&art_id=vn20080516055516714C294082; 'SABC Board Slams Mpofu's "Management"' The Star (17 June 2008) available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=3015&art_id=vn20080617124034170C119538 (accessed on 18 October 20008); 'SABC to Appeal Mpofu Court Ruling' Mail & Guardian Online (20 May 2008) available at http://www.mg.co.za/article/2008-05-20-sabc-to-appeal-mpofu-court-ruling (accessed on 18 October 2008); 'SABC Suspends Mpofu again' Mail & Guardian Online (13 June 2008) available at ww2.mg.co.za/article/2008-06-13-sabc-suspends-mpofu-again (accessed on 18 October 2008); F Grobler 'Mpofu, SABC Urged to Resolve Dispute Outside of Court' Mail & Guardian Online (24 June 2008) http://ww2.mg.co.za/article/2008-06-24-mpofu-sabc-urged-to-resolve-dispute-outside-of-court (accessed on 18 October 2008); 'Mpofu Suspended a Third Time' Biz-Community (13 June 2008) available at http://www.biz-community.com/Article/196/15/25473.html (accessed on 18 October 2008); 'Court Awaits Argument in Mpofu Case' Mail & Guardian Online (8 July 2008) available at http://www.mg.co.za/article/2008-07-08-court-awaits-argument-in-mpofu-case (accessed on October 18 2008).

[3] 'Zikalala takes SABC suspension to CCMA' Mail & Guardian Online (11 April 2008) available at http://www.mg.co.za/article/2008-04-11-zikalala-takes-sabc-suspension-to-ccma (accessed on 20 October 2008); J Newmarch 'Zikalala returns as Mpofu fights on' Business Day (8 July 2008) http://www.businessday.co.za/articles/topstories.aspx?ID=BD4A797873 (accessed on 20 October 2008).

[4] Reno v American Civil Liberties Union 521 US 844 (1997)(Court struck down for overbreadth and inconsistency with the First Amendment various statutory provisions enacted to protect minors from indecent and 'patently offensive' communications on the internet)('Reno v ACLU').

[5] Ibid at 849 (Quotes the decision of the District Court in the same proceedings. The judgment contains a useful and detailed summary of the history, growth and operation on the Internet.)

regulatory environment that has secured Telkom Ltd, until recently, a fixed-line infrastructural monopoly has severely curtailed both of these components of accessibility.[1] Relatively few people[2] have access to the Internet and 'high speed' access is disproportionately expensive in comparison with most other countries. Meaningful protection of the Internet as a means of expression requires deregulation of cost sensitive infrastructure components, particularly fixed-line infrastructure as well as, arguably, state expenditure on key infrastructure to improve access. Failure to take these steps will inevitably result in the entrenchment of existing inequalities of access.

Apart from access, the extent to which the Internet facilitates expressive freedom will be determined by the extent to which it remains independent. Although not expressly included under FC s 16, the right to freedom of expression clearly includes freedom from unjustifiable state interference with the content[3] and regulation of the Internet. The South African domain name space, .za, is now regulated by the Electronic Communications and Transactions Act ('ECTA').[4] Prior to ECTA it was unregulated and managed on a goodwill basis by private individuals and entities. This was unsatisfactory as there was no institutional safeguard against conflicts of interest between private interests and the public interest, which the .za domain ultimately serves. ECTA rectifies this problem through the establishment of an independent regulatory body, the .za Domain Name Authority, to regulate the domain.[5] The Authority assumed responsibility as of May 2007[6] and has taken few steps to exercise its authority in terms of ECTA. This is a cause for some concern as the future effective functioning of the .za domain in the public interest depends, as in the case of broadcasting, on effective functioning by an independent regulator.

[1] For a full discussion on the regulatory environment see J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24E.

[2] As of March 2008, approximately 5.1 million South Africans or 11.1% of the population has Internet access (including dial-up access). Increasingly, however, access is measured in terms of broadband access in respect of which only 215 000 households/businesses have access representing approximately 1% of the population. This compares with broadband access in Japan (68.7%), Malaysia (60%), United Kingdom (66.4%), Germany (64.6%), Sweden (77.3%), Turkey (22.5%), United States (71.4%), Canada (65.9%) and Brazil (22.4%). See 'Internet Usage Stats for Africa' available at http://www.internetworldstats.com/stats1.htm and R Wray 'China Overtaking US for Fast Internet Access as Africa gets Left Behind' Guardian Online available at http://www.guardian.co.uk/money/2007/jun/14/internetphonesbroadband.digitalmedia (accessed on 20 October 2008).

[3] Content restrictions that are justifiable in respect of other media, such as those pertaining to child pornography (discussed above) will obviously be similarly justifiable in respect of Internet content.

[4] Act 25 of 2002.

[5] ECTA s 59. The section provides that it would assume responsibility from a date to be determined by the Minister.

[6] GN 458 Government Gazette 29903 (18 May 2007).

42.8 EXCLUDED EXPRESSION: ANALYSIS OF FC S 16(2)

As discussed above, FC s 16(2) carves out certain expression from the protection of the right to freedom of expression contained in FC s 16(1). The categories of expression listed in FC s 16(2) are beyond the boundaries of the right to freedom of expression.[1] These categories are: (a) propaganda for war; (b) incitement of imminent violence; and (c) the advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.

In assessing the meaning of each of the section 16(2) exclusions, it is important to bear in mind the cautionary words of Professor Govender in the context of hate speech:

> [T]he finding that any particular expression amounts to hate speech would in most instances be determinative of the constitutional enquiry. Any test used to assess whether expression amounts to hate speech must acknowledge the seriousness of such a classification.[2]

Accordingly, it is appropriate to adopt a restrictive approach in interpreting the ambit of these exclusions. This approach is particularly apposite in light of the fact that FC s 16(2) applies to the enumerated categories of expression in an unqualified manner. There are, for example, no exclusions (or defences) for speech uttered in private conversation or for statements that the speaker reasonably believes to be true.[3]

(a) FC s 16(2)(a): Propaganda for war

The first exclusion in FC s 16(2) is propaganda for war. This exclusion is taken directly from art 20(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ('ICCPR'), which stipulates that '[a]ny propaganda for war shall be prohibited by [1] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 32 (Langa DCJ). In the first edition of this chapter, the authors suggested that one possible interpretation of FC s 16(2) is that it simply identifies three categories of expression that may be limited by legislation, but that such limitation must still pass the limitations test. G Marcus & D Spitz 'Expression' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS1, 1999) 20-61. They, somewhat tentatively, stated that this interpretation 'would be desirable and may be available'. Ibid. It seems to us that such an interpretation, while having the benefit of limiting the ambit of the FC s 16(2) exclusions, does not give sufficient weight to the language of FC s 16 as compared to the other fundamental rights set out in Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution (that are not limited in this express manner). We agree with the approach in Islamic Unity (supra) that FC s 16(2) limits the ambit of what is meant by 'expression' for purposes of FC s 16(1). We note, however, that such an approach means that it is even more important to interpret FC s 16(2) in a restrictive manner.

[2] Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283, 1289 (SAHRC)('Freedom Front'). Perhaps the strongest advocates of a restrictive interpretation of the s 16(2) carve-outs are the authors of the first edition of this chapter. Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-58 — 20-63. They correctly describe FC s 16(2) as 'an ouster clause and a remnant of parliamentary sovereignty. It deprives the courts of jurisdiction to measure government action in this area against constitutional standards'. Ibid at 20-60.

[3] These exceptions are, for example, contained in the hate speech prohibition that was upheld by the Canadian Supreme Court. See R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697, (1990) 3 CRR (2d) 193('Keegstra').

law'. Not surprisingly, this provision of the ICCPR (coupled with the hate speech provision in art 20(2)) is controversial; its opponents argue, correctly, that it is detrimental to freedom of expression, vague, subjective and ineffective.[1] It is thus important that our courts interpret 'propaganda for war' in a restrictive manner so as not to include contributions to legitimate debates as to whether South Africa, or other states, should engage in international armed conflict. If this were not the case, it would mean that the debate that took place in Parliament and elsewhere in 1939 as to whether South Africa should enter World War II would not merit constitutional protection if it were to take place today.[2] This would be absurd.

The first manner in which FC s 16(2) should be limited is through the meaning given to the term 'war'. This term usually refers to an international armed conflict. Nevertheless, not all armed conflicts are unlawful as a matter of international law, and the meaning of 'war' in FC s 16(2)(c) should thus be confined to armed conflicts that are contrary to international law. This is consistent with the approach of the Human Rights Committee, which states, in its General Comment on art 20(1) of the ICCPR, that the prohibition 'extends to all forms of propaganda threatening or resulting in an act of aggression or breach of the peace contrary to the Charter of the United Nations' but does not prohibit 'advocacy of the sovereign right of self-defence or the right of peoples to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations'.[3] This raises the interesting, and difficult, prospect of South African courts adjudicating on the legality of certain forms of armed conflict. In international law, this is a notoriously difficult and contentious issue, with governments and academics very seldom agreeing on the lawfulness of a particular armed conflict.

The other important term in FC s 16(2)(a) is 'propaganda'. In the context of the ICCPR, it has been described as a word that 'is capable of a very expansive meaning'.[4] Nevertheless, the 'expansive meaning' — the communication of ideas and information for the purpose of achieving a particular purpose — is only one possibility in a range of meanings.[5] 'Propaganda' can also be defined in a more specific manner, as referring to an organised, systematic enterprise of circulating information and ideas to serve a purpose.[6] Given the fact that speech amounting

[1] See D McGoldrick The Human Rights Committee: Its Role in the Development of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1994) 480-491 (Finland, for example, explained that one reason for its reservation in respect of art 20(1) was that it was too vague to be enforced through the criminal law. Ibid at 481-482.)

[2] Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-61.

[3] 'General Comment No. 11: Prohibition of Propaganda for War and Inciting National, Racial and Religious Hatred (art 20)' (Nineteenth session, 1983).

[4] McGoldrick (supra) at 481.

[5] One of the meanings of 'propaganda' in Webster's Third New International Dictionary is: 'dissemination of ideas, information, or rumor for the purpose of helping or injuring an institution, a cause, or a person'.

[6] The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary defines 'propaganda' as: '[a]ny association, systematic scheme, or concerted movement for the propagation of a particular doctrine or practice'. Chambers 21st Century Dictionary defines it as: 'the organized circulation by a political group, etc. of doctrine, information, misinformation, rumor or opinion, intended to influence public feeling, raise public awareness, bring about reform'.

to propaganda for war is excluded from constitutional protection, we submit that the latter, more restrictive, meaning should apply.

As with the other categories of expression excluded by FC s 16(2), s 29 of the Films and Publications Act ('FPA') makes it a criminal offence to broadcast, publish, distribute or present propaganda for war.[1] This legislative prohibition is, however, subject to a range of fairly broad exceptions[2] which, coupled with the limited meaning of 'propaganda for war', render the ambit of the criminal prohibition in s 29 extremely narrow. Ironically, the express exclusion of propaganda for war from constitutional protection results in the criminal prohibition in the FPA being given a particularly narrow interpretation. The meaning given to the phrases in FC s 16(2) — which must be interpreted narrowly — must be the same as the identical phrases used in FPA s 29; the constitutional interpretative exercise of restricting the ambit of constitutionally excluded expression thus also limits the ambit of the legislative prohibition. This is true of not only 'propaganda for war' but also 'incitement of imminent violence' and hate speech.

(b) FC s 16(2)(b): Incitement of imminent violence

FC s 16(2)(b) is the least controversial of the s 16(2) exclusions; few would dispute that it is justifiable to prohibit speech that incites others to imminent violence. Even the United States courts — extremely protective of freedom of expression — acknowledge that the advocacy of the use of force or of a violation of law (which is wider than incitement of violence) may be prohibited where the 'advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action'.[3]

The must important question in relation to FC s 16(2)(b) is what is meant by 'incitement'. Gilbert Marcus and Derek Spitz point out that the 'clear and present danger' test in the United States distinguishes between advocacy and incitement of lawless action; providing constitutional protection to the former but not the latter.[4] They note, however, that the South African common law does not

[1] Act 65 of 1996. Specifically, s 29 prohibits the following acts: knowingly broadcasting or distributing a publication; broadcasting, exhibiting in public or distributing a film; or presenting an entertainment or play in public which, judged within context, 'amounts to propaganda for war'.

[2] FPA s 29(4) provides the follwing exceptions: (a) a bona fide scientific, documentary, dramatic, artistic, literary or religious publication, film, entertainment or play; (b) a bona fide discussion, argument or opinion on a matter pertaining to religion, belief or conscience; and (c) a bona fide discussion, argument or opinion on a matter of public interest.

[3] Brandenburg v Ohio 395 US 444 (1969)('Brandenburg v Ohio'). The US courts apply the 'clear and present danger' test under which limitation of free speech will be justified if the danger of the harm materialising is imminent and there is no time for good speech to counter evil speech. Whitney v California 274 US 357, 378 (1927)(Brandeis J).

[4] Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-29.

distinguish between advocacy and incitement.[1] In this regard, the Appellate Division defined the crime of incitement as follows:

> [A]n inciter is one who reaches and seeks to influence the mind of another to the commission of a crime. The machinations of criminal ingenuity being legion, the approach to the other's mind may take various forms, such as suggestion, proposal, request, exhortation, gesture, argument, persuasion, inducement, goading, or the arousal of cupidity. The list is not exhaustive. The means employed are of secondary importance; the decisive question in each case is whether the accused reached and sought to influence the mind of the other person towards the commission of a crime.[2]

However, we submit that, for purposes of FC s 16(2)(b), 'incitement' involves actively encouraging, calling for or pressuring others to engage in acts of violence where the threat of the violence occurring is imminent.[3] It would not necessarily extend to, for example, expression which advocates the overthrow of the state, even by violent means.[4] In addition, we agree with Marcus and Spitz that FC s 16(2)(b) should be interpreted as requiring both a subjective and an objective element, i.e. the speaker subjectively intends to incite imminent violence; and it is objectively likely that such violence will result from the expression.[5] The context of the publication and the surrounding circumstances will, of course, be crucial considerations to take into account in determining whether these requirements are met.[6] As with propaganda for

[1] Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-29.

[2] S v Nkosiyana & Another 1966 (4) SA 655 (A). See also Dunlop South Africa Ltd v Metal and Allied Workers Union & Another 1985 (1) SA 177, 188 (D) and National Union of Metal Workers of South Africa & Others v Gearmax (Pty) Ltd 1991 (3) SA 20, 25 (A). Marcus and Spitz point out that the Appellate Division's approach to incitement in Nkonsiyana is very wide. Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-29.

[3] C van Wyk 'The Constitutional Treatment of Hate Speech in South Africa' (2003) 18 SAPR/PL 185, 194 ('incitement' means 'to call for, urge or persuade'); Y Burns 'Hate Speech and Constitutional Values: The Limits of Freedom of Expression' in G Carpenter (ed) Suprema Lex: Essays on the Constitution presented to Marinus Wiechers (1998) 35 ('Hate Speech'), 51 (Remarks, with reference to Webster's Dictionary, that it means 'to put in motion', 'to move to action', 'to spur or urge on'.)

[4] Particularly in light of the fact that the term 'incitement' (and the requirement of immediacy) are employed in FC s 16(2)(b), whereas FC s 16(2)(c) refers to 'advocacy'.

[5] Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-62 (It is unclear whether Marcus and Spitz would require the violence to in fact eventuate or whether the likelihood of the violence materialising is sufficient to trigger FC s 16(2)(b) (the latter being our view). They state as follows: 'only expression . . . which objectively and in the prevailing circumstances does indeed incite imminent violence may be denied constitutional protection on the basis of FC s 16(2)(b)'.) For a different view, see K Govender 'The Freedom of Speech' (1997) 1(6) The Human Rights and Constitutional Law Journal of Southern Africa 22 (Objective likelihood of imminent violence is not required.)

[6] Cf Spies v SABC 1 Case 2008/05 available at http://www.bccsa.co.za/templates/judgement_template_433.asp (accessed on 20 October)(The Broadcasting Complaints Tribunal held that an audio-visual clip of a hip-hop song 'Get Out' by the artist Zubz constituted incitement to cause imminent harm: 'had this song been part of a larger dramatic work, the dramatic or documentary merit of the whole might have placed the militant lyrics into perspective. On its own, however, the overwhelming effect of the song is neither purely aesthetic nor documentary'. Ibid at para 14.)

war, incitement to violence is also criminalised under FPA s 29.[1]

(c) FC s 16(2)(b): Hate speech[2]

The clash between freedom of expression and other constitutional values is arguably most apparent on the terrain of hate speech, in which freedom of speech — often political speech — is pitted against the fundamental values of dignity and equality.[3] Contrary to the adage 'sticks and stones can break my bones but words can never hurt me', hateful speech can cause significant harm both to the victims of such speech and society as a whole. In a country like South Africa that has recently emerged from legally sanctioned racism, division and repression, the risk of hate speech inculcating or perpetuating racist and other bigoted views is particularly pressing.

On the other hand, the area of hate speech is a particularly emotive area that is susceptible to overly restrictive measures against freedom of expression. Nowhere is the challenge of the European Court of Human Rights in Handyside v UK more real:

> [Freedom of expression is] applicable not only to 'information' and 'ideas' that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb. . .. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no 'democratic society'.[4]

Prior to assessing the manner in which South African law deals with the thorny issue of hate speech, we briefly examine the reasons for prohibiting hate speech as well as the arguments against such a prohibition.

(i) The arguments for and against hate speech prohibitions

Should the law prohibit hate speech and, if so, how far should it go in doing so? This is one of the most contested issues of freedom of expression currently confronting legislatures, courts and academics. Despite a number of international instruments calling for a ban on hate speech[5] and the enactment of hate speech

[1] FPA s 29 states that a person commits an offence if he or she knowingly broadcasts of distributes a publication; broadcasts, exhibits in public or distributes a film; or presents an entertainment or play in public which, judged within context, 'incites to imminent violence'. This offence is subject to the same exceptions that apply to propaganda for war. See § 42.8*(a)* supra. For other legislative prohibitions on inciting violence, see Rioutous Assemblies Act 17 of 1956 s 17, discussed in I Currie and J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 374; and Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993 s 8(6).

[2] The authors wish to thank Pooja Dela and Laeeqa Soobedaar for research assistance on this section of the chapter.

[3] This should not be taken to suggest that dignity (and, for that matter, equality) is not one of the values underlying freedom of expression.

[4] Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737, 754 ('Handyside v UK') quoted with approval in Islamic Unity (supra) at para 28 (Langa DCJ).

[5] United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1963) art 9; International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1966) art 4; and ICCPR art 20(2).

prohibitions in a number of jurisdictions, there remains much disagreement as to whether such bans are a justifiable infringement on freedom of expression.[1] It is an issue that has sharply divided the Canadian Supreme Court, with only a slim majority of the Court upholding a criminal prohibition on hate speech.[2] The United States Supreme Court reached the opposite conclusion, striking down a hate speech law as an impermissible infringement of freedom of speech.[3] It is also an issue that has divided progressive South African authors; some argue that hate speech should be tolerated,[4] while others argue that it should not.[5] The difficult issues that hate speech gives rise to become apparent when one considers the arguments both for and against hate speech bans.

The argument in favour of prohibitions on hate speech is that the particularly serious harm, both to the group targeted by the speech as well as to society as a whole, caused by hate speech outweighs the concurrent infringement of freedom of expression. The harms associated with hate speech are usefully discussed by the Canadian Supreme Court in its seminal judgment in Keegstra.[6] The Supreme Court upheld a conviction of a teacher for anti-semetic teachings under a law which prohibited the promotion of hatred on grounds of, amongst others, religion.[7] During the course of his judgment on behalf of the majority, Dickson CJC identified two broad categories of harm occasioned by hate speech. The first category of harm is the impact of hate speech on the members of the group that is the target of the speech. Dickson CJC captures this impact in the following terms:

[1] For an overview of the laws regulating hate speech in various jurisdictions, see S Colliver (ed) Striking a Balance: Hate Speech, Freedom of Expression and Non-Discrimination (1992).

[2] R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697, (1990) 3 CRR (2d) 193('Keegstra') (The Court was divided four to three). This case is discussed below.

[3] See RAV v City of St Paul, Minnesota 505 US 377 (1992)('RAV')(Striking down a law that prohibited the placing of a symbol or object, including a burning cross, which one knows 'arouses anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender'). See also Beauharnais v Illinois 343 US 250 (1952)(In the years following World War II, the United States Supreme Court upheld a statute criminalising group defamation based on race or religion, on the basis that libel fell beyond First Amendment protection. The Court upheld a conviction of a white supremacist for accusing blacks of, amongst other things, rape, robbery and other violent crimes. Although this decision has never been explicitly overruled, it is at odds with subsequent decisions of the Court. See New York Times v Sullivan 376 US 254 (1964), Brandenburg v Ohio 395 US 444 (1969) and RAV (supra).) For a particularly pro-speech approach to hate speech bans in the United States jurisprudence, see Collin v Smith 578 F2d 1197 (1978)(Striking down a municipal ordinance that would have prevented a march by Neo-Nazis through a predominantly Jewish area of Chicago.) But see Virginia v Black 538 US 343 (2003)('Virginia v Black')(Upholding a prohibition on cross burning with intent to intimidate). For a useful, recent discussion of the position in the United States, see M Rosenfeld 'Hate Speech in Constitutional Jurisprudence: A Comparative Analysis' (2002-2003) Cardozo LR 1523, 1529-1541.

[4] Meyerson 'No Platform' (supra).

[5] A Cockrell ' "No Platform for Racists": Some Dogmatism Regarding the Limits of Tolerance' (1991) 7 SAJHR 339.

[6] Supra.

[7] Canadian Criminal Code s 319(2). See also R v Andrews [1990] 3 SCR 870.

> It is indisputable that the emotional damage caused by words may be of grave psychological and social consequence. . .. [W]ords and writings that wilfully promote hatred can constitute a serious attack on persons belonging to a racial or religious group, and in this regard the [Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada] noted that these persons are humiliated and degraded. . . . A person's sense of human dignity and belonging to the community at large is closely linked to the concern and respect accorded the groups to which he or she belongs. . . . The derision, hostility and abuse encouraged by hate propaganda therefore have a severe impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance. This impact may cause target group members to take drastic measures in reaction, perhaps avoiding activities which bring them into contact with non-group members or adopting attitudes and postures directed towards blending in with the majority. Such consequences bear heavily in a nation that prides itself on tolerance and the fostering of human dignity through, amongst other things, respect for the many racial, religious and cultural groups in our society.[1]

The harm of hate speech is greater than other forms of insult. Neisser offers several explanations for this, including that one's race, gender or religion is fundamental to one's sense of identity and the very real fear, based on historical experience, of physical violence or discrimination that is implicit in much of hate speech.[2] The special nature of the harm caused by hate speech seems to have been recognised by the United States Supreme Court in Virginia v Black.[3] In concluding that it is constitutional for a statute to criminalise the burning of a cross with intent to intimidate, the Court examined the history of cross burning in the United States, its close association with the Ku Klux Klan and violent attacks against blacks, and the fear of impending violence inspired by cross burning.[4]

The second broad category of harm associated with hate speech is the impact of such speech on society as a whole. Hate speech can increase social tensions, and the risk of violence, discrimination and other anti-social behaviour both because the hateful message may persuade (or incite) people to hateful views and actions[5] and because the targeted persons may react violently to the speech.

[1] Keegstra (supra) at 227-8, quoted, in part, in Freedom Front (supra) at 1293.

[2] E Neisser 'Hate Speech in the New South Africa: Constitutional Considerations for a Land Recovering from Decades of Racial Repression and Violence' (1994) 10 SAJHR 336, 339-40. See also Burns 'Hate Speech' (supra) at 48-49. As Justice Stevens stated in his dissenting judgment in the United States Supreme Court decision of RAV, the legislative judgment that 'harms caused by racial, religious, and gender-based invective are qualitatively different from that caused by other fighting words — seems to me eminently reasonable and realistic'. RAV (supra) at 424. See also D Feldman 'Content Neutrality' (supra) 170-171.

[3] 538 US 343 (2003).

[4] Ibid at 363 (The reasoning of the majority of the Court is reflected in the following statement of O'Connor J: 'The First Amendment permits Virginia to outlaw cross burning done with the intent to intimidate because burning a cross is a particularly virulent form of intimidation. Instead of prohibiting all intimidating messages, Virginia may choose to regulate this subset of intimidating messages in light of cross burning's long and pernicious history as a signal of impending violence.')

[5] See Keegstra (supra) at 228 (Dickson CJC remarked: 'hate propaganda can attract individuals to its cause', with the possibility that the 'prejudiced messages may gain some credence, with the attendant result of discrimination, and perhaps even violence, against minority groups in Canadian society'.)

Hate speech also undermines the values of pluralism and diversity, by communicating a message that some members of the community are less worthy than others merely by virtue of their membership of a particular group. In the South African context, hate speech thus undermines the pressing goals of overcoming our divisive past and pursuing the tasks of reconciliation and the building of a democratic society. As Neisser says, hate speech may weaken 'the community-building necessary for democracy to be sustained'.[1]

The two harms discussed above have been recognised in the only hate speech case that has thus far come before the Constitutional Court — Islamic Unity.[2] During the course of his judgment on behalf of a unanimous Court, Langa DCJ emphasised our divided past and the need for promoting dignity, equality and national unity:

> There is no doubt that the state has a particular interest in regulating [hate speech as contemplated in FC s 16*(2)(c)*] because of the harm it may pose to the constitutionally mandated objective of building the non-racial and non-sexist society based on human dignity and the achievement of equality.
>
> . . .
>
> It is indeed true that the appropriate regulation of broadcasting by the government and its organs, in the public interest, serves an important and legitimate purpose in a democratic society. . . . This is because of the critical need, for the South African community, to promote and protect human dignity, equality, freedom, the healing of the divisions of the past and the building of a united society. South African society is diverse and has for many centuries been sorely divided, not least through laws and practices which encouraged hatred and fear. Expression that advocates hatred and stereotyping of people on the basis of immutable characteristics is particularly harmful to the achievement of these values as it reinforces and perpetuates patterns of discrimination and inequality. Left unregulated, such expression has the potential to perpetuate the negative aspects of our past and further divide our society.[3]

Set against these significant harms of hate speech are the arguments against the prohibition of such speech. These arguments can again be divided into two: the argument that hate speech bans are such a serious infringement of freedom of expression so as to outweigh any harm that the speech may cause; and the argument that hate speech bans are ineffective or, worse, counter-productive.

The first argument is that freedom of expression is an important, perhaps pre-eminent, fundamental right, and that a hate speech ban amounts to a significant infringement of that right because it prohibits speech based on the point of view

[1] Neisser (supra) at 343. See also Freedom Front (supra) at 1293 ('Our Constitutional order proceeds from the premise of inclusivity and nation building and seeks actively to prevent the marginalization of any community. This is expressed in the sentiment in the Preamble to the Constitution that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, united in our diversity'.)

[2] Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity').

[3] Ibid at paras 33 and 45.

that is expressed. In the language of the United States Supreme Court, it amounts to 'viewpoint discrimination'.[1] Viewpoint discrimination is particularly problematic in this context given the fact that a great deal of hate speech amounts to political expression, and thus goes to the core of protected expression. Strong proponents of this view argue that hate speech advances all the key rationales for why we protect freedom of expression. As McLachlin J stated on behalf of the minority in Keegstra:

> In short, the limitation on freedom of expression created by [the hate speech prohibition] invokes all the values upon which s 2*(b)* of the Charter [the right to freedom of expression] rests — the value of fostering a vibrant and creative society through the marketplace of ideas; the value of the vigorous and open debate essential to democratic government and preservation of our rights and freedoms; and the value of a society which fosters self-actualization and freedom of its members.[2]

It seems to us that this is an overstatement in relation to most hate speech, which is of questionable value in furthering the goals of freedom of expression.[3] Racial abuse is unlikely to advance the goals of pursuing the truth or promoting an effective democracy. While it may promote the self-fulfilment of the hate monger, it is difficult to understand why this rationale is sufficient to justify the harm inflicted on the target group.[4]

The other argument against prohibitions on hate speech — that they are ineffective or counter-productive in combating the spread of hatred — has several related strands. The first strand is the absence of any empirical evidence that hate speech bans reduce racism, sexism or other forms of bigotry. Critics of hate speech laws regularly point to instances in history where racism and religious hatred has grown despite the presence (and enforcement) of hate speech laws. The most prominent example is Germany in the period leading up to World War II.[5] The second strand of the argument is that the suppression of hate speech

[1] RAV (supra) at 391. The Supreme Court's concern over viewpoint discrimination is shared by a number of authors. See, for example, RA Posner 'The Speech Market and the Legacy of Schenck' in L Bollinger & G Stone (eds) Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era (2002) 145.

[2] Keegstra (supra) at 311. See also Niesser (supra) at 346-347 (notes that certain forms of hate speech could further the free speech rationale of self-fulfilment as well as the aims of the search for the truth and democratic government).

[3] See Keegstra (supra) at 239 (Dickson CJC, on behalf of the majority, states that expression intended to promote hatred against certain groups 'is of limited importance when measured against free expression values.') See also Burns 'Hate Speech' (supra) at 54 (hate speech 'does not advance any of the recognized goals of freedom of expression.')

[4] See J Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression: The Modern Actio Injuriarum (1998) 35 ('[s]ome may say that the catharsis of expressing one's view is a vital aspect of autonomy, but why should one person's catharsis be allowed to become another person's indignity?'). For a useful discussion of the link between hate speech and the rationales for freedom of expression, see Rosenfeld (supra) at 1532-6.

[5] See Keegstra (supra) at 304-5 (McLachlin J). A number of hate speech prohibitions also existed in apartheid South Africa. See, for example, Black Administration Act 38 of 1927 s 29; the Publications Act 42 of 1974; and Internal Security Act 74 of 1982 s 63.

does not permit the open airing and debate of hateful invective, and makes it more likely that racism and other forms of bigotry will surface in violent action.[1] In other words, the 'safety valve' of free speech is not allowed to operate.[2] A third argument is that prosecutions for contraventions of hate speech bans only serve to attract more attention (and media publicity) to the bigoted views, make the accused appear as a martyr for his or her views, and provide a platform for the accused to spread his or her hateful message.[3] According to the final strand, history indicates that hate speech bans are often used in an attempt to silence minorities who are opposed to the status quo — the very groups that hate speech laws are meant to protect. The prosecution of black power advocates in the United Kingdom is often cited as an example of this,[4] as is the experience under apartheid in which hate speech laws were used to silence critics of the government.[5]

A comparative analysis of hate speech laws in various jurisdictions reveals a sharp divide between the approach in the United States — in which courts generally strike down hate speech prohibitions as violating the First Amendment — and the approach taken in international conventions and in other jurisdictions, such as Germany, France, Denmark, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland, Israel, India, Australia and Canada — which are sympathetic to, and supportive of, hate speech bans.[6] This can, to some extent, be explained by the individualistic approach to freedom of speech that prevails in American jurisprudence compared with the more communitarian approach adopted in other jurisdictions which seeks to balance freedom of expression with other values such as multi-culturalism, equality and dignity.[7] It is not surprising, given South

[1] Meyerson 'No Platform' (supra) at 397 ('To the extent that racial animosities will continue to plague us, it is better to let them be played out at the level of words rather than to bottle them up, thereby not only increasing their virulence, but also making more likely a more dangerous kind of discharge'.)

[2] See § 42.5 supra.

[3] Keegstra (supra) at 304 (McLachlin J)(The Justice also made the related argument that the prohibition may fuel conspiracy theories to the effect that there is truth in the hateful expression, i.e. listeners may believe 'that there must be some truth in the racist expression because the government is trying to suppress it'. Ibid at 304. Dickson CJC, on behalf of the majority in Keegstra, disputed McLachlin J's views, saying that the prohibition on hate speech 'serves to illustrate to the public the severe reprobation with which society holds messages of hate directed towards racial and religious groups. The existence of a particular criminal law, and the process of holding a trial when that law is used, is thus itself a form of expression, and the message sent out is that hate propaganda is harmful to target group members and threatening to harmonious society'. Ibid at 244.)

[4] See Niesser (supra) at 348-349.

[5] G Marcus 'Racial Hostility: The South African Experience' in Colliver (ed) (supra) at Chapter 24; L Johannessen 'A Critical View of the Constitutional Hate Speech Provision' (1997) 13 SAJHR 135, 136-7.

[6] See Rosenfeld (supra) at 1523 (In the realm of hate speech, there is 'a big divide between the United States and other Western democracies'.) The European Court on Human Rights has also indicated that egregious hate speech does not enjoy protection under the right to freedom of expression in art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950). See, for example, Jersild v Denmark 19 EHRR 1, 28 (1994)('Jersild').

[7] Rosenfeld (supra) at 1529 and 1541.

Africa's past and the egalitarian nature of our Constitution, that our law has rejected the United States approach and is generally supportive of hate speech laws. It seems to us that this is both because of a desire to avoid the harms associated with hate speech as well as the symbolic effect of hate speech prohibitions. Such prohibitions send a clear message that hateful speech which disrupts the goals of dignity, equality and the building of a united society will not be tolerated.[1]

(ii) The constitutional treatment of hate speech

(aa) The express exclusion in FC s 16(2)(c)

As noted in the previous section, many jurisdictions have grappled with the appropriate constitutional balance in cases involving hate speech. The drafters of South Africa's Constitution have, to some extent at least, settled the debate in this country by stipulating, in FC s 16(2)(c), that freedom of expression does not extend to 'advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm'.[2] The effect of this provision is that particularly egregious hate speech is excluded from constitutional protection, notwithstanding the fact that such speech undoubtedly falls within the ordinary meaning of 'expression'.[3] As Langa DCJ stated in Islamic Unity: '[s]ection 16(2) defines the boundaries beyond which the right to freedom of expression does not extend'.[4]

Not surprisingly, this constitutional carve-out of hate speech was controversial. Lene Johannessen, for example, argues that it is jurisprudentially unsound to exclude a portion of expression from the protection of the Constitution. He adds that there was in fact no need for the drafters to exclude hate speech from FC s 16, since the courts would, in any event, have found that a prohibition on egregious hate speech would be saved by the self-standing limitations clause in FC s 36(1).[5]

However, it bears emphasising that FC s 16(2)(c) sets a high threshold for hate speech; it only applies where the expression amounts to advocacy of hatred and constitutes incitement to cause harm. The advocacy of hatred is not, in itself, sufficient to trigger this provision.[6] It follows that, while FC s 16(2)(c) removes

[1] Niesser (supra) at 350; Burns 'Hate Speech' (supra) at 54.

[2] The wording of FC s 16(2)(c) is based on art 20(2) of the ICCPR, which reads as follows: 'Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited by law'. See § 42.2 supra.

[3] See § 42.3 supra.

[4] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 32.

[5] Johannessen (supra) at 138-142.

[6] The Canadian legislative provision that was at issue in Keegstra does not set such a high threshold. It simply prohibits the promotion of hatred (without the additional requirement of incitement). Compare also s 8(5) of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993.

the debate, at the level of constitutional principle, as to whether hate speech laws are permissible, it opens up some significant interpretive difficulties. The most pressing are what amounts to 'advocacy of hatred' and 'incitement to cause harm'.

(bb) 'Advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion'

The first requirement in FC s 16(2)(c) — 'advocacy of hatred' — suggests that the speaker must actively 'advocate' hatred. In other words, the speaker must promote hatred or attempt to instill hatred in others. As Iain Currie and Johan de Waal state: '[t]o advocate hatred is to propose or call for it, to make a case for it'.[1]

The next question is what is meant by 'hatred'. The following statement of Cory JA in the Canadian decision of R v Andrews has been cited on numerous occasions on this issue:

> Hatred is not a word of casual connotation. To promote hatred is to instill detestation, enmity, ill-will and malevolence in another. Clearly an expression must go a long way before it qualifies.[2]

This requirement was found to be satisfied in the decision of the appeal committee of the South African Human Rights Commission ('the SAHRC') in Freedom Front.[3] The appeal committee held that the chanting of 'kill the Farmer, kill the Boer' at an ANC Youth League rally and at an ANC leader's funeral, amounted to hate speech. Professor Govender, who penned the decision on behalf of the SAHRC committee, remarked that '[c]alling for the killing of people because they belong to a particular community or race must amount to the advocacy of hatred, unless the context clearly indicates otherwise'.[4]

FC s 16(2)(c) is limited to the advocacy of hatred based on the listed grounds of race, ethnicity, gender or religion. There are two important points here. First, hate speech does not extend to speech which simply advocates hatred of a particular person (which more ordinarily falls within the domain of defamation) but rather

[1] The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 375. See also C van Wyk 'The Constitutional Treatment of Hate Speech in South Africa' (2003) 18 SAPR/PL 185, 182 (Advocacy includes 'an element of exhortation, pleading for, supporting or coercion'); Keegstra (supra) at para 120 (Considering the similar phrase 'promotes hatred' in the Canadian hate speech statute, Dickson CJC, on behalf of the majority, stated that 'promotes' indicates active support or instigation. . . [it] indicates more than simple encouragement or advancement. The hate-monger must intend or foresee as substantially certain a direct and active stimulation of hatred against an identifiable group'.)

[2] 43 CCC (3rd) 193, 211, quoted with approval in Freedom Front (supra) at 1290. See also Keegstra (supra) at 250 (Dickson CJC added as follows: 'Hatred is predicated on destruction, and hatred against identifiable groups therefore thrives on insensitivity, bigotry and destruction of both the target group and the values of society. Hatred in this sense is a most extreme emotion that belies reason; an emotion that, if exercised against members of an identifiable group, implies that those individuals are to be despised, scorned, denied respect and made subject to ill-treatment on the basis of group affiliation'.)

[3] Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283 (SAHRC)('Freedom Front').

[4] Ibid at 1290.

consists of advocating hatred based on group characteristics. Hate speech is thus sometimes referred to as 'group defamation'. Second, FC s 16(2)(c) does not cover all forms of hate speech, but only those that are based on the specified grounds of race, ethnicity, gender or religion.[1] FC s 16(2)(c) does not, therefore, include hate speech based on analogous grounds such as homophobic speech.[2]

(cc) 'Incitement to cause harm'

Perhaps the even more difficult question is what is meant by 'incitement to cause harm' in FC s 16(2)(c). It is clear that 'harm' includes physical violence. The important question is whether it extends beyond violence. The authors of the first edition of this chapter emphasised the fact that FC s 16(2)(c) is an exclusion from constitutional protection and should thus be narrowly interpreted; they expressed the view that harm should be limited to physical harm.[3] Other writers disagree, saying that 'harm' should include psychological and emotional harm.[4]

The nature of the harm contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c) arose squarely in Freedom Front, because the SAHRC did not find a causal link between farm attacks and the chanting of the 'kill the Farmer, kill the Boer' slogan. Whereas the SAHRC had initially held that FC s 16(2)(c) was limited to physical harm, the appeal committee disagreed, holding that it extended to psychological and emotional harm for [1] These grounds are a sub-set of the listed grounds for unfair discrimination enumerated in FC ss 9(3) and (4). For a discussion of the grounds of unfair discrimination, including the meaning of the terms race, ethnicity, gender and religion, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 35.

[2] This view is shared by Currie and De Waal. Hate speech based on 'gender' refers to speech that advocates hatred based on the social constructs of maleness and femaleness, and is probably wide enough to include hate speech against transgendered persons. Nevertheless, it does not, in our view, include hatred based on homosexuality (or other forms of sexual orientation) — despite the fact that the need to prohibit homophobic hate speech is just as pressing as the need to prohibit hate speech based on the grounds listed in FC s 16(2)(c). While there is no reason in principle to distinguish between hate speech aimed at gays and lesbians and hate speech aimed at men or women, it would, in our view, be an overly forced interpretation of FC s 16(2)(c) to read it as extending to homophobic speech (particularly where FC s 9(3) lists sexual orientation as a separate ground of discrimination to that of gender (and sex)). Currie & De Waal (supra) at 375 n 88. See also van Wyk (supra) at 193-4. Yvonne Burns expresses a contrary view. While accepting that a textual interpretation of FC s 16(2)(c) points to the exclusion of speech based on sexual orientation, Burns argues that a generous, purposive interpretation of this provision (i.e. taking into account the values of the Constitution) favours the extension of hate speech to that aimed at gays and lesbians. Burns 'Hate Speech' (supra) at 48-49.

[3] Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-63 (Marcus and Spitz add that '[t]his is not to say that social and psychological harms caused by hate speech are not real harms which can and should be combated. However, they may be combated by legislation capable of satisfying the requirements of [the limitations clause]'.)

[4] Currie & De Waal (supra) at 376-377 and Burns 'Hate Speech' (supra) at 51-52. See also Human Rights Commission of South Africa v SABC 2003 (1) BCLR 92 (BCCSA) at para 39. These are the types of harms identified by the Canadian Supreme Court in Keegstra (supra) in the different context of interpreting a statutory prohibition (rather than interpreting a constitutional exclusion).

three reasons:[1] (a) the textual consideration that limiting FC s 16(2)(c) to physical violence would render FC s 16(2)(b) — which prohibits incitement of 'imminent violence' — redundant;[2] (b) it makes no sense to limit incitement to violence only to speech that advocates hatred on the limited grounds set out in FC s 16(2)(c); and (c) a broader meaning of 'harm' better serves the constitutional objectives of building a non-racial and non-sexist society and protecting dignity.[3] The SAHRC appeal committee, however, emphasised that the harm must be 'serious and significant' and it is not enough that the speech is merely offensive.[4] It added that it must be shown that the expression itself causes the harm or is likely to cause the harm.[5] Turning to the facts, the committee found that the slogan 'kill the Farmer, kill the Boer', in the context in which it was chanted, fell foul of FC s 16(2)(c) as:

> [it] would harm the sense of well being, contribute directly to a feeling of marginalisation, and adversely affect the dignity of Afrikaners. The slogan says to them that they are still the enemy of the majority of the people of this country. It contributes to the alienation of the target community and conveys a particularly divisive message to the majority community that the target community is less deserving of respect and dignity.[6]

While there is much to commend the reasoning of the appeal committee in Freedom Front, the difficulty is that it focuses primarily on the harm caused to the target group by the speech. It does not specifically deal with the meaning of the phrase 'incitement to cause harm' in FC s 16(2)(c). This phrase suggests that one should not look to the harm caused by the speech itself but rather to the impact of the speech on third parties, i.e. does the speech encourage, stimulate or call for others to cause harm? This is the ordinary meaning of 'incitement'.[7] Despite this ordinary meaning, Currie and De Waal argue that 'incite' in the context of

[1] Freedom Front (supra) at 1292.

[2] This is not, strictly speaking, correct. This interpretation would not render FC s 16(2)(b) redundant any more than any other sensible interpretation of FC s 16(2)(c). One must accept that 'harm' includes, at a minimum, physical violence. Whatever interpretation is given, FC s 16(2)(b) covers the incitement of violence (whatever the basis for that incitement), provided that the violence is imminent, while FC s 16(2)(c) covers incitement of violence only on the grounds of race, ethnicity, gender or religion, although the violence need not be imminent. In relation to physical violence, FC s 16(2)(c) is therefore in one respect wider and in another narrower than FC s 16(2)(b). Nevertheless, what is important is that the use of the word 'violence' in FC s 16(2)(b) indicates that the 'harm' in FC s 16(2)(c) is not limited to physical violence, as the drafters chose to use a different term to that used in FC s 16(2)(b).

[3] Freedom Front (supra) at 1292-1295.

[4] Ibid at 1295. See also Van Loggerenberg v 94.7 Highveld Stereo 2004 (5) BCLR 561 (BCCSA) at para 6. But see V Bronstein 'What You Can and Can't Say in South Africa' (Unpublished paper, 2007)(on file with the authors) 32 and 37-42 (Criticises a number of decisions of the BCCSA for apparently equating offensiveness with hate speech.)

[5] Freedom Front (supra) at 1295 (Professor Govender goes on to state that the question 'is whether a reasonable person assessing the advocacy of hatred on the stipulated grounds within its context and having regard to its impact and consequences would objectively conclude that there is a real likelihood that the expression causes harm'. Ibid at 1298.)

[6] Ibid at 1299.

[7] See § 42.8*(b)* supra.

FC s 16(2)(c) means 'directed at' or 'intended'.[1] If this interpretation is correct, speech may fall within FC s 16(2)(c) if the speech itself causes harm to the targeted group by, for example, inflicting serious psychological harm.

While we acknowledge that an overly textual interpretation is not always appropriate to the task of giving meaning to the Bill of Rights, it seems to us that equating 'incitement' with 'intention' is an unduly strained reading of FC s 16(2)(c). If the constitutional drafters had intended to hit speech that causes harm directly, they could easily have drafted FC s 16(2)(c) to do so. The use of the word 'incitement' indicates that the speech must instigate or actively persuade others to cause harm. This interpretation is supported by two further textual factors: 'incitement' is coupled with 'to cause' harm in FC s 16(2)(c); and the use of the word 'incitement' in FC s 16(2)(b), which refers to 'incitement of imminent violence'.

If 'incitement' bears its ordinary meaning, as we suggest it does, the harms contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c) must be concrete. This does not mean, on the one hand, that 'harm' is confined to physical harm or, on the other hand, that 'harm' extends to expression which merely stirs up feelings of hatred in the audience.[2] The harm contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c) includes various forms of serious harm that are capable of incitement in an audience, including incitement of violence (whether against persons or property), discrimination, harassment and verbal abuse.[3] It covers, for example, not only hateful statements at a neighbourhood meeting that call for the lynching of blacks, but extends to the instigation of harassing phone calls to black neighbours or encouraging the conclusion of agreements not to sell houses in the neighbourhood to black persons. If this interpretation is correct, the harm ultimately caused to the target group extends to serious psychological or emotional harm, but it must be harm that is incited by speech.

The requirement of incitement, particularly when coupled with the word 'advocacy' in FC s 16(2)(c), indicates that expression only falls foul of this provision if the speaker intends to engage in hate speech. It is difficult to envisage how one can advocate hatred and incite to cause harm without intending to do so.[4]

Finally, whatever interpretation is given to FC s 16(2)(c), it is important that it is not given too wide a meaning. Not only is a broad approach to this provision

[1] Currie & De Waal (supra) at 377 (In most instances of hate speech, '[i]t is the speech itself, and not the audience who may or may not be sufficiently fired up to translate the message into violent action, that causes the social and psychological harm'.)

[2] The latter approach would undermine the separate requirement in FC s 16(2)(c) of advocating hatred.

[3] This position is similar to ICCPR art 20(2). ICCPR art 20(2) proscribes the advocacy of hatred that incites discrimination, hostility or violence.

[4] But see Freedom Front (supra) at 1297 (Suggests that this is not the case, stating that the focus should be on whether the expression causes the harm or is likely to cause the harm, rather than on the subjective intention of the speaker.)

unsound as a matter of constitutional interpretation but it creates the danger, as Professor Govender puts it, 'that speech that is vitally important to the advancement of our constitutional democracy may be classified as hate speech, because our society is still, in respect of significant social issues, divided on racial lines'.[1]

(iv) Legislative prohibitions on hate speech

Since the advent of the Constitution, Parliament has passed two statutes containing prohibitions on hate speech.[2] We discuss these statutes after first setting out some brief comments on the general approach to the assessment of hate speech legislation.

(aa) The general approach to assessing the constitutionality of hate speech legislation

The starting point in assessing the constitutionality of hate speech legislation is to establish whether or not the prohibited expression falls within the meaning of FC s 16(2)(c). If the prohibition is synonymous with, or more limited than, the type of hate speech contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c), the legislation will pass constitutional muster. If, however, the legislative prohibition is wider than FC s 16(2)(c), it limits the general right to freedom of expression in FC s 16(1) and must be justified under the limitations clause. In conducting the limitations analysis, it is important to bear in mind that there is a need to balance the right to freedom of expression against the rights to dignity and equality.[3]

Some guidance on this issue can be found in the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Keegstra, in which the majority of the Court upheld a criminal prohibition on hate speech. In summarising the majority's conclusion, Dickson CJC emphasised that the legislation created a narrowly confined offence

[1] Freedom Front (supra) at 1297.

[2] See also Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993 s 8(5), assented to on 14 January 1994 (Shortly before the Interim Constitution came into effect). It came into force on 15 November 1996. It reads: 'No person present at or participating in a gathering or demonstration shall by way of a banner, placard, speech or singing, or in any other manner incite hatred of other persons or any group of other persons on account of differences in culture, race, sex, language or religion.'

[3] The assessment of the constitutionality of hate speech legislation in other jurisdictions does not necessarily involve a clash between constitutional rights. This is because most constitutions only confer rights against the state, so that the hate speech legislation enacted by the legislature infringes the constitutional right to freedom of expression, while the hate speech does not itself infringe the constitutional right to equality. As McLachlin J emphasised in her dissenting judgment in Keegstra, the Canadian hate speech prohibition at issue in that case did not infringe the constitutional right to equality. McLachlin J thus pointed out that the conflict was 'not between rights, but rather between philosophies'. Keegstra (supra) at 290. The position is markedly different in South Africa, in light of the so-called horizontal application of the Bill of Rights and, in particular, the fact that FC s 9(4) expressly extends the unfair discrimination prohibition to non-state actors. See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 31.4.

which was neither overbroad nor vague. He pointed out, further, that the prohibition 'possesses a stringent mens rea requirement, necessitating either an intent to promote hatred or knowledge of the substantial certainty of such', as well as the fact that the meaning of 'hatred' is restricted to 'the most severe and deeply-felt form of opprobrium'.[1] This conclusion was supported by the following: private conversation was excluded from the statutory prohibition; the promotion of hatred had to be focussed on an identifiable group; and the prohibition contained various exceptions.[2]

While Keegstra is an example of a sufficiently narrow hate speech prohibition, in Islamic Unity the Constitutional Court was confronted with a provision that was overly broad. The unanimous Court struck down a provision of the broadcasting code[3] that prohibited the broadcasting of material that was 'likely to prejudice … relations between sections of the population'. Deputy Chief Justice Langa pointed out that the prohibition was cast in absolute terms, that it was 'so widely-phrased and so far-reaching that it would be difficult to know beforehand what it really prohibited or permitted', and that it 'would deny broadcasters and their audiences, the right to hear, form and freely express and disseminate their opinions and views on a wide range of subjects'.[4]

(bb) Section 29 of the Films and Publications Act

Following the lead of FC s 16(2)(c), s 29 of the FPA[5] stipulates that a person commits an offence if he or she knowingly broadcasts or distributes a publication; broadcasts, exhibits in public or distributes a film; or presents an entertainment or play in public, which, judged within context, 'advocates hatred that its based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and which constitutes incitement to cause harm'. Although this prohibition replicates the phrase used in FC s 16(2)(c), s 29 prohibits a narrower range of expression than that contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c). This is because s 29(4) contains three important exceptions to the prohibition: (a) a bona fide scientific, documentary, dramatic, artistic, literary or religious publication, film, entertainment or play; (b) a bona fide discussion, argument or opinion on a matter pertaining to religion, belief or conscience; and (c) a bona fide discussion, argument or opinion on a matter of public interest.[6] These broad exceptions would appear to remove a large amount of hateful speech from the ambit of the criminal prohibition. It is likely, for example, that much of hate

[1] Keegstra (supra) at 256.
[2] Ibid.
[3] The Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services, contained in Independent Broadcasting Authority Act 153 of 1993 sched 1.
[4] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 44.
[5] Act 65 of 1996.
[6] FPA s 29(4).

speech against a religious group would form part of a bona fide religious publication or a good faith discussion, argument or opinion on 'a matter pertaining to religion'. Section 29 should therefore survive constitutional challenge.

(cc) Section 10 of the Equality Act

A further, and apparently wider, prohibition on hate speech is contained in s 10 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('the Equality Act').[1] This legislation, unlike the FPA, does not impose a criminal prohibition on hate speech, but rather treats hate speech as a type of civil wrong for which a victim can claim relief. This is, in principle, to be welcomed. As the Canadian Court stated in Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor:

> The chill placed upon expression in [the context of a human rights statute] will ordinarily be less severe than that occasioned where criminal legislation is involved, for attached to a criminal conviction is a significant degree of stigma and punishment, whereas the extent of opprobrium connected with a finding of discrimination is much diminished and the aim of remedial measures is more upon compensation and protection of the victim.[2]

Section 10(1) of the Equality Act provides as follows:

> [N]o person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words based on one or more of the prohibited grounds, against any person, that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to —
> (a) be hurtful;
> (b) be harmful or incite harm;
> (c) promote or propagate hatred.

The 'prohibited grounds' are defined in the Equality Act as the listed grounds for unfair discrimination set out in FC ss 9(3) and (4), including, for example, sexual orientation, age, disability and language[3] as well as any other ground where discrimination based on that ground 'causes or perpetuates systemic disadvantage'; 'undermines human dignity' or 'adversely affects the equal enjoyment of a person's rights and freedoms in a serious manner that is comparable to discrimination on [a listed ground]'. This considerably broadens the grounds of hate speech from those enumerated in FC s 16(2)(c).

The broad prohibition in s 10(1) of the Equality Act must be read subject to the proviso in s 12, which states that this provision does not preclude:

[1] The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.
[2] [1990] 3 SCR 892.
[3] The complete list is: 'race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth'.

> the bona fide engagement in artistic creativity, academic and scientific inquiry, fair and accurate reporting in the public interest or publication of any information, advertisement or notice in accordance with section 16 of the Constitution.

A first noticeable characteristic of s 10(1) is that it does not envisage that the hate speech must incite or persuade others. It prohibits speech that itself gives rise to the harms envisaged in the section. Although this aspect of the s 10(1) prohibition goes wider that FC s 16(1)(c), which requires 'incitement' of harm, we are of the view that this extension would, in itself, be reasonable and justifiable and would thus survive constitutional scrutiny.

There are, however, several difficulties with the prohibition in s 10(1). First, it does not require intention on the part of the speaker. A statement will fall foul of this prohibition if it meets the vague test that it 'could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to…'. This test is overly broad and vague. The second, and perhaps more important, difficulty is that the harms contemplated in this section are, on their face, very wide. Speech is prohibited if it appears to be intended to promote or propagate hatred, to be harmful or to incite harm or to be hurtful. The phrases 'hatred', 'harmful' and 'harm' are, if given the meaning accorded to these phrases in the context of FC s 16(2)(c),[1] not problematic. The difficulty is the use of the phrase 'hurtful'. If interpreted literally, this phrase (particularly when used together with 'harmful') would prohibit a wide range of expression such as robust opinions on racial issues or gender-insensitive jokes. Such an approach would run counter to the constitutional commitment to freedom of expression, and should be avoided.

One way of minimising the impact of s 10(1) on freedom of expression would be to interpret the phrases 'be harmful' or 'incite harm' as referring to physical violence and, perhaps, other concrete forms of harm such as discrimination, and to interpret the phrase 'be hurtful' as capturing serious and significant psychological and emotional harm.[2] While this may not be the ordinary meaning of 'hurtful', any other interpretation would probably mean that s 10(1) is unconstitutional.

The other way in which s 10(1) may survive constitutional scrutiny is through the s 12 proviso. The problem is that this proviso is, like s 10(1) itself, vague. While the exclusion of 'fair and accurate reporting in the public interest' is to be welcomed,[3] phrases such as 'bona fide engagement in artistic creativity' are uncertain, particularly as notions of art are subjective and changeable over time. Even more unclear is what is meant by the exclusion of 'any information, advertisement or notice in accordance with section 16 of the Constitution'. This phrase suggests that any speech that falls within the constitutional right to freedom of expression (i.e. speech which does not amount to propaganda for war, incitement of imminent violence or hate speech contemplated in FC s 16(2)(c)) does not fall foul of the hate speech prohibition in s 10(1) — provided that the speech takes the form of 'any information, advertisement or notice'. This would collapse the enquiry under the Equality Act into an enquiry as to whether the hate speech falls within FC s 16(2)(c), which would be bizarre given that the wording of s 10(1) is very different to that of FC s 16(2)(c). Another way of interpreting this phrase is to read it as excluding constitutionally protected speech but only to the extent that the infringement of that speech would not amount to a reasonable and justifiable infringement of the right to freedom of expression under FC s 36(1). This too would be a most unsatisfactory result, as it would lead to great uncertainty and would mean that the legislature would effectively have put in place an overbroad prohibition on expression and then require the courts to draw the boundaries of the prohibition.

[1] See § 42.8*(c)*(iii) supra.

[2] See A Kok 'The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act: Why the Controversy?' 2001 TSAR 294, 299-300.

[3] Such a defence avoids the situation that arose in Jersild. In Jersild, a television journalist was convicted for the broadcast of a documentary containing extracts of interviews with racist youths expressing strong racist and xenophobic views. The purpose of the programme was to demonstrate the pressing problems of racism and xenophobia and did not endorse the views of the youths. The journalist's conviction was eventually set aside by the European Court of Human Rights.

The drafting of the hate speech prohibition in s 10(1) read with s 12 of the Equality Act therefore leaves a great deal to be desired. In the critical area of hate speech in which the tension between the fundamental rights of freedom of expression, dignity and equality is at stake, it is imperative that the legislature intervene to remedy the matter by producing a more coherent hate speech prohibition. In its current form, the Equality Act is vulnerable to a range of constitutional challenges.

42.9 Major restrictions on freedom of expression

The following section does not purport to examine in detail the plethora of laws that restrict free speech. Rather, the approach taken is to examine a number of major restrictions on freedom of expression, with a focus on those restrictions that have engaged the attention of the courts following the enactment of the Interim Constitution. The restrictions that are considered here are defamation; privacy; restrictions designed to protect the administration of justice; restrictions to protect intellectual property rights; sexually explicit speech; commercial speech; national security restrictions; and prior restraints.

(a) The law of defamation[1]

The law of defamation greatly curtails what a publisher may write or say about individuals or juristic persons, and thus represents a major restriction on freedom of expression. In principle it is of course desirable for a democratic society to protect persons' reputations through laws such as the law of defamation.[1] Indeed, the right to reputation has always been jealously protected at common law,[2] and has also been recognised by our courts as forming an aspect of the constitutionally protected right to dignity, entrenched in FC s 10:[3]

[1] For a detailed analysis of how the values underpinning the conflicting rights of reputation and freedom of expression ought to affect aspects of the law of defamation, see D Milo Defamation and Freedom of Speech (2008)('Defamation').

> The value of human dignity in our Constitution is not only concerned with an individual's sense of self-worth, but constitutes an affirmation of the worth of human beings in our society. It includes the intrinsic worth of human beings shared by all people as well as the individual reputation of each person built upon his or her own individual achievements. The value of human dignity in our Constitution therefore values both the personal sense of self-worth as well as the public's estimation of the worth or value of an individual.[4]

The law of defamation thus has to balance two constitutional rights, neither of which can be regarded as being of greater a priori significance in South Africa: the right to reputation, protected under the right to dignity, and the right to freedom of expression.[5] In our view, the common law of defamation sought to balance these rights in a manner that unjustly favoured the right to reputation.[6] This is particularly true of two main pillars of the South African law of defamation: the onus rule, which requires defendants to prove a defence to an action for defamation on a balance of probabilities;[7] and the strict liability rule, in terms of which media defendants could not rely on absence of fault to escape liability.[8] As will be discussed in greater detail below, the strict liability rule has now been revisited by the Supreme Court of Appeal, and a new defence of reasonable publication has been introduced.[9]

[1] For the classic analysis of the value of reputation, see RC Post 'The Social Foundations of Defamation Law: Reputation and the Constitution' (1986) 74 California LR 691. See generally L McNamara Defamation and Reputation (2007)(Provides a compelling modern justification of the values underpinning reputation.)

[2] The leading text on the common law of defamation remains JM Burchell The Law of Defamation in South Africa (1985)('Defamation').

[3] Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (1) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo') at para 28. Cf National Media Ltd & Others v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1195, 1216 (SCA)('Bogoshi').

[4] Khumalo (supra) at para 27. For further discussion of this point, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 36-55 — 36-58.

[5] Of course, the conflict between these two rights characterised the common law of defamation even before the advent of the Interim and then the Final Constitution. But this conflict must now be resolved through the prism of the proper balancing of two constitutional rights. Cf Bogoshi (supra) at 1216-1217 (the Supreme Court of Appeal revisited and reformulated the common law of defamation, and declared that this formulation was consistent with the Interim Constitution).

[6] See Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd 1996 (2) SA 588, 611 (W)('Holomisa'). For a detailed discussion of the pre-constitutional law of defamation, see Burchell Defamation (supra).

[7] Neethling v Du Preez; Neethling v The Weekly Mail 1994 (1) SA 708 (A)('Neethling').

[8] Pakendorf v De Flamingh 1982 (3) SA 146 (A)('Pakendorf').

[9] See § 42.9*(a)*(iv) infra.

The remainder of this section is structured as follows. The question of standing to sue for defamation is addressed first, followed by a discussion of developments in the law of defamation in regard to determining when a statement is defamatory. The challenges to the onus rule and the strict liability rule are dealt with thereafter. This is followed by a consideration of aspects of defences that have been considered in recent cases, and finally a few issues relating to remedies.[1] While a number of important developments must be welcomed, it is arguable that the law of defamation remains an unreasonable limitation on freedom of expression in certain significant respects. In addition, room remains for the development of defamation law in light of the values of the Bill of Rights.

(i) Standing to sue for defamation

One way in which to ensure that freedom of expression receives maximum protection is to regard a particular class of plaintiff as simply having no standing to sue for defamation. Thus, in Die Spoorbond & Another v South African Railways, the South African Railways and Harbours, as a governmental body, was not entitled to sue for defamation in regard to allegations that it had endangered the lives of members of the public.[2] Schreiner JA held that 'it would involve a serious interference with the free expression of opinion … if the wealth of the State, derived from the State's subjects, could be used to launch against those subjects actions for defamation'.[3] Allowing the state to sue for defamation would effectively be sanctioning a seditious libel regime, the absence of which lies at the heart of freedom of political speech.[4]

The exact ambit of the rule that the government may not sue for defamation must be appreciated. Firstly, it does not follow from Die Spoorbond that government officials such as Cabinet ministers should not be allowed to sue for

[1] The issues discussed here are those that most profoundly implicate the balancing between freedom of speech and reputation. See generally Milo Defamation (supra) especially chs V, VI and VII (argues that the presumptions of falsity, fault and harm to reputation should not survive constitutional scrutiny). For a useful analysis of the constitutionality of the crime of defamation, see C Walker 'Reforming the Crime of Libel' (2005-6) 50 New York L School LR 169. The Supreme Court of Appeal has recently held that the crime of defamtion is consistent with the Constitution. Hoho v The State [2008] ZASCA 98.

[2] Die Spoorbond & Another v South African Railways; Van Heerden & Others v South African Railways 1945 AD 999, 1009 ('Die Spoorbond') (The Appellate Division left open the possibility of the plaintiff suing for malicious falsehood, which is a far more onerous cause of action as compared to defamation.)

[3] Ibid at 1013. The same disabling rule applies in a number of other jurisdictions. See, for example, Posts and Telecommunications Corporation v Modus Publications (Pty) Ltd 1998 (3) SA 1114, 1123 (ZS)(McNally JA set out useful criteria to determine whether an artificial person is part of the governance of the country)(Zimbabwe); Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers Ltd [1993] AC 534 (HL)('Derbyshire')(England); City of Chicago v Tribune Co 307 Ill 595 (1923) (US); Ballina Shire Council v Ringland (1994) 33 NSWLR 680 (New South Wales).

[4] H Kalven Jr 'The New York Times Case: A Note on the "Central Meaning" of the First Amendment' [1964] Supreme Court Rev 191.

defamation.[1] This is clearly correct: To non-suit public officials from suing for defamation would not only pay scant regard to the right to reputation, and undermine the quality of public discourse, but may also deter individuals from entering public office.[2]

Secondly, the High Court has held that the state is entitled to provide financial assistance to public officials who sue for defamation. This holding is questionable. To the extent that the defamatory allegations are truly aimed at the government rather than a particular individual, the action should, of course, not be entertained as it would breach the rule in Die Spoorbond.[3] The facts of Ritchie are illustrative of such a scenario. Various defamation actions had been brought around the same time by a range of public officials against the same newspaper, editor and journalist; these actions had been funded by the Northern Cape Provincial Government. The Court erred, in our view, in not recognising that the specific factual context gave rise to an inference that the provincial government was seeking to silence criticism through the mechanism of the defamation actions. The decision to fund the various plaintiffs should have been set aside. Where, however, it cannot be contended that the true plaintiff in a defamation case is the government as opposed to an individual public official, the fact that the action is funded by the government is not necessarily objectionable.

Finally, it is competent for political parties, including the ruling party, to sue for defamation.[4]

(ii) Defamatory statements

A number of courts have examined the question of whether a publication is defamatory in light of constitutional values. The basic test is the objective one of [1] Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian Ltd & Another 2004 (6) SA 329 (SCA)('Mthembi-Mahanyele'). See also Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd & Others v Esselen's Estate 1994 (2) SA 1 (A)('Argus Printing')(judges may sue for defamation).

[2] See D Milo 'Cabinet Ministers Cannot Sue for Defamation' (2003) 120 SALJ 282; Ritchie & Another v Government of the Northern Cape Province & Others 2004 (2) SA 524 (NC)('Ritchie') at para 16.2; Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 40; J Neethling 'Die Locus Standi van 'n Kabinetminister om vir Laster te Eis, en die Verweer van Redelike Publikasie van Onwaarheid op Politieke Terrein: Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian Ltd 2004 6 SA 329 (HHA)' (2005) 68 THRHR 321, 323.

[3] For criticisms of South African Associated Newspapers Ltd & Another v Estate Pelser 1975 (4) SA 797 (A) see Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 39. See also New York Times v Sullivan 376 US 254, 291-292 (1964)('Sullivan'); The Queen on the Application of Comninos v Bedford Borough Council & Others [2003] EWHC 121 Admin at para 39 (The Bedford Borough Council had agreed to provide financial support to libel claims brought by three council officers. In an application for judicial review of this decision by the Council, Sullivan J agreed that the important public policy expressed by the House of Lords in Derbyshire (supra) should not be circumvented. 'If a local authority's true purpose is to sue for damage to its own reputation . . . then it will have acted for an improper purpose and/or taken irrelevant considerations into account and its decision will be liable to be quashed on normal public law principles'.)

[4] Argus Printing (supra); African National Congress v Inkatha Freedom Party [1999] 3 All SA 47 (W)(government different from ruling political party). The position is different in England. See Goldsmith v Bhoyrul [1998] QB 459 (in our view, this decision articulates the correct approach.)

whether a reasonable person of ordinary intelligence might reasonably understand the words to convey a meaning that tends to lower the plaintiff in the estimation of members of the community.[1] Even before the advent of the Interim Constitution, the common law exhibited a hesitancy to regard statements in regard to political matters as being defamatory. In Argus Printing & Publishing Co Ltd v Inkatha Freedom Party,[2] the Appellate Division held that 'the law's reluctance to regard political utterances as defamatory no doubt stems in part from the recognition that right-thinking people are not likely to be greatly influenced in their esteem of a politician by derogatory statements made about him.'[3]

This generous approach has been extended to speech in regard to other matters of public interest, as is evidenced in a few recent High Court decisions. In Rivett-Carnac v Wiggins, Davis AJ stated that the principles of the Constitution 'must be seen as essential to the determination of the values and views held by reasonable members of the community' and this community 'must be construed as one which is interested and concerned with transparency and deliberation. . .. The reasonable reader is prepared to draw a distinction between a robust exchange of views and material which goes further and damages a person's reputation and dignity'.[4] Similarly, in Sokhulu v New Africa Publications Ltd & Others, Goldstein J held that the right-thinking person for the purposes of determining whether a statement is defamatory is one who subscribes to the norms and values of the Constitution.[5] Such a person would not regard an allegation that the plaintiff had cohabited with a person for two years as being defamatory.[6]

But taking account of constitutional values in this context cuts both ways and so will not always result in greater protection for free speech. Where a publication by the defendant clearly imputes conduct at odds with the values of our Constitution, the publication will be defamatory. Thus an article that attributed to the plaintiff gratuitous use of racially derogative language ('white trash') and racial vilification would be regarded by right-minded members of South African society as reprehensible and conduct that must be eradicated; the allegations were therefore defamatory.[7]

[1] See Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 25. Cf Mahomed & Another v Jassiem 1996 (1) SA 673, 707 (A)(Test refers not to the general community but to the particular community of which the plaintiff was a member.)

[2] 1992 (3) SA 579, 588 (A).

[3] See also Mangope v Asmal & Another 1997 (4) SA 277, 287 (T). Cf Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 57 at para 42.

[4] 1997 (3) SA 80, 89-90 (C)(And later the court wrote: 'The danger with equating robust criticism and defamatory material is that the onus then rests on [the] defendant to [escape liability]. If this is done too easily, the Court becomes a particularly accessible forum for potential litigants with the consequence that debate and deliberation can be stifled'. Ibid at 91.)

[5] 2001 (4) SA 1357 (W).

[6] Ibid at 1359. See also Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane 2002 (6) SA 512 (W) at para 13; Dendy v University of the Witwatersrand 2005 (5) SA 357 (W) at para 65.

[7] Sindani v van der Merwe & Others 2002 (2) SA 32 (SCA). Cf Botha & Another v Mthiyane & Another 2002 (1) SA 289 (W), 2002 (4) BCLR 389 (W) at para 49.

(iii) The challenges to the onus rule and the strict liability rule

Following the enactment of the Interim Constitution, a number of defendants argued that aspects of the common law position were unjustifiable restrictions on inter alia freedom of expression. Their primary targets were the onus rule (which means that the plaintiff need not establish falsity) and the strict liability rule (that holds a faultless defendant liable). These arguments had varying levels of success, and left the law in a considerable state of uncertainty.[1] Many of the challenges sought to introduce into South African law the speech protective principles that have been developed by the US Supreme Court in its rich though complex defamation jurisprudence. The US Supreme Court has afforded greater protection to speech where the plaintiff is a public official or figure, or where the speech is on a matter of public interest.[2] Thus the First Amendment requires that a public official or figure must prove with convincing clarity that the defendant acted with 'actual malice', i.e. with knowledge of, or reckless disregard for, the falsity of the publication; this also implies that the plaintiff must establish falsity.[3] And because 'debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open',[4] even where a private figure sues for defamation in relation to a matter of public concern, the plaintiff must establish falsity,[5] as well as some form of fault (at least negligence).[6] Moreover, actual damage must be proved by the plaintiff.[7] Thus the presumptions of falsity and damage have not survived constitutional scrutiny in the US, and defamation liability, at least in cases involving public interest speech, must be based on fault. The US position thus provides an obvious foundation for arguments by media defendants that the South African position unjustifiably infringes freedom of expression.[8]

[1] See Marcus & Spitz (supra) at § 20-32, 20-38 (Consider these developments in detail.)

[2] For a useful summary of the US position, see RL Weaver, AT Kenyon, DP Partlett & CP Walker The Right to Speak Ill: Defamation, Reputation and Free Speech (2006) 39-75.

[3] See Sullivan (Actual malice rule first established by the Supreme Court where a public official had sued for defamation.) See also Curtis Publishing Co v Butts; Associated Press v Walker 388 US 130 (1967)(Extends Sullivan to public figures); A Lewis Make No Law: The Sullivan Case and the First Amendment (1992)(The best description of these developments, especially the social and political background to Sullivan.)

[4] Sullivan (supra) at 270.

[5] Philadelphia Newspapers Inc v Hepps 475 US 767 (1986)('Hepps').

[6] Gertz v Robert Welch Inc 418 US 323 (1974).

[7] Presumed and punitive damages may only be awarded if actual malice is proved by the plaintiff. Ibid at 349.

[8] See, for example, Holomisa (supra) at 613-614.

To understand these challenges it is useful to contrast two South African cases from this period. Cameron J's ground-breaking judgment in Holomisa remains a model of clarity for judges and lawyers considering how to balance competing constitutional rights. Cameron J held that the Interim Constitution required 'the fundamental reconsideration of any common-law rule that trenches on a fundamental rights guarantee'.[1] In regard to defamation law, a proper balance between free speech and reputation requires that, in cases involving political activity,[2] the plaintiff bears the onus of proving that a defamatory statement is not entitled to constitutional protection.[3] The plaintiff will discharge this onus by showing that, in all the circumstances of the case, the statement was unreasonably made.[4]

A decision that is in sharp contrast to Holomisa is that of Eloff JP in Bogoshi v National Media Ltd & Others.[5] The judge gave short shrift to the argument that freedom of expression compelled a change to any features of the common law of defamation. He held that the right to reputation takes precedence over the right to free speech, and that the latter right was in any event given adequate protection by the common-law rules of defamation.[6]

The Supreme Court of Appeal finally resolved the inconsistent approaches of the lower courts to whether the Interim Constitution compelled changes to media defamation law in Bogoshi,[7] the appeal from Eloff JP's decision. The Court adopted a controversial methodology; rather than testing common-law rules against the Interim Constitution, the Court preferred to assess whether previous decisions of the Appellate Division stated the common law correctly.[8] The Court held that the strict liability principle that had previously been upheld by the

[1] Holomisa (supra) at 603.

[2] This restriction on the ambit of the decision was warranted because the Interim Constitution explicitly gave greater protection to speech relating to free and fair political activity. See Marcus & Spitz (supra) at 20-10. Cameron J stated obiter in Holomisa that the reversal of the onus rule should as a matter of principle apply in all defamation cases. Holomisa (supra) at 611.

[3] Holomisa (supra) at 613.

[4] Ibid at 618. See also Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E)(Plaintiff bears onus of proving that the statement was false and not in the public interest, or was unfair comment or not protected by privilege). Cf Hall v Weltz & others 1996 (4) SA 1070 (C)(Holomisa not applicable where ordinary citizens sue for defamation); Buthelezi v South African Broadcasting Corporation 1997 (12) BCLR 1733 (D)(Concept of public interest should be broadened but the defendant should have to prove the reasonableness of the publication).

[5] 1996 (3) SA 78 (W).

[6] Ibid at 83-4. See also Potgieter & 'n Ander v Kilian 1996 (2) SA 276 (N), 1995 (11) BCLR 1498 (N)(Interim Constitution does not apply horizontally); McNally v M & G Media Limited & Others 1997 (4) SA 267 (W), 1997 (6) BCLR 818 (W)(Rejected contentions that plaintiff should bear the onus of disproving a defence, and should have to prove actual malice or negligence).

[7] 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA)('Bogoshi'). For detailed discussion, see J Burchell 'Media Freedom of Expression Scores as Strict Liability Receives the Red Card: National Media Ltd v Bogoshi' (1999) 116 SALJ 1 ('Media Freedom'); JR Midgley 'Media Liability for Defamation' (1999) 116 SALJ 211.

[8] This approach can be criticised. See J van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights: Towards a Co-operative Relation between the Common Law and Constitutional Jurisprudence' (2001) 17 SAJHR 341.

Appellate Division in Pakendorf[1] had incorrectly stated the common law. That decision did not, Hefer JA held, properly reflect freedom of expression and of the press, rights which always existed at common law, 'although [their] full import … might not always have been acknowledged'.[2] The Court continued: 'If we recognise, as we must, the democratic imperative that the common good is best served by the free flow of information and the task of the media in that process, it must be clear that strict liability cannot be defended'.[3] Hefer JA then, confusingly, turned to consider the question of unlawfulness, where he believed similar policy considerations applied,[4] concluding that 'the publication in the press of false defamatory allegations of fact will not be regarded as unlawful if, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it is found to have been reasonable to publish the particular facts in the particular way and at the particular time'.[5] Adding to the confusion, Hefer JA then reverted to the issue of fault for media defamation. He held that the media should not be treated on the same footing as individual defendants, for whom the absence of animus injuriandi (the intention to defame) means that they escape liability. It would thus be appropriate to hold the media liable unless they were not negligent, though the burden of proving lack of negligence or reasonableness of conduct lies with the defendant.[6]

(iv) The defence of reasonable publication

The decision of Hefer JA in Bogoshi is far from a model of clarity. Courts and commentators have especially struggled to understand how the judgment preserves the traditional distinction between fault and unlawfulness.[7] There has also been some debate as to whether the standard of fault postulated by Bogoshi is that of negligence or a form of animus injuriandi.[8] Two further issues may be identified: the ambit of speech to which the defence applies, and whether the decision has altered the law with respect to non-media defendants.

[1] Pakendorf & Andere v De Flamingh 1982 (3) SA 146 (A).
[2] Bogoshi (supra) at 1210.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at 1211.
[5] Ibid at 1212. The Court then mentioned a number of factors that would be relevant in regard to determining reasonableness, such as the nature, extent and tone of the allegations, the reliability of sources and the opportunity given to the victim to respond. Ibid at 1213.
[6] Ibid at 1214-1216. The Court therefore rejected the approach adopted by Cameron J in Holomisa (supra) in regard to the onus of proof. This approach, the Court reasoned, attached excessive importance to freedom of expression. Ibid at 1217.
[7] See especially Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at paras 45-47 (Lewis JA attempts to elucidate the distinction); Sayed v Editor, Cape Times, & another 2004 (1) SA 58, 63 (C)('Sayed')(Overlap between requirements.)
[8] See JM Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression: The Modern Actio Injuriarum (1998)('Personality Rights') 226 (supports a negligence test). Cf Midgley (supra)(supports an attenuated test based on intention). See also JR Midgley 'Intention Remains the Fault Criterion Under the Actio Injuriarum' (2001) 118 SALJ 433.

In regard to the first two issues, it is submitted that much of this debate is misplaced. There is merit in distinguishing lack of fault in the form of reasonable mistake as to the truth of the statement,[1] from general considerations of unreasonableness for purposes of the wrongfulness enquiry. But at bedrock Bogoshi should be recognised as articulating a defence based on reasonable publication in regard to speech on matters of public interest.[2] Attempts to clinically distinguish between fault and unlawfulness in this context have not, it is submitted, been persuasive. The most extensive attempt at reconciling Bogoshi in this regard is the judgment of Lewis JA in Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian Ltd:

> Bogoshi indicates that the reasonableness of the publication might also justify it. In appropriate cases, a defendant should not be held liable where the publication is justifiable in the circumstances — where the publisher reasonably believes that the information published is true. The publication in such circumstances is not unlawful. Political speech might, depending upon the context, be lawful even when false provided that its publication is reasonable. (See in this regard the test for reasonableness in Bogoshi . . . .) This is not a test for negligence: it determines whether, on grounds of policy, a defamatory statement should not be actionable because it is justifiably made in the circumstances.[3]

The objection to Lewis JA's analysis is that the test for lack of unlawfulness — which Lewis JA essentially states to be whether the publisher held a reasonable belief in the truth of the publication — on the one hand, and the negligence enquiry envisaged at the stage of fault, on the other, overlap to such a great degree. This is especially evident where Lewis JA applies the law to the facts. Thus, after discussing the unlawfulness stage of the enquiry, Lewis JA moves on to the fault stage, and states that 'much of what has been said above is relevant here too'.[4] This confusion is unhelpful to the development of our law of defamation. The key policy test to be applied is that of reasonableness: in all the circumstances, can it be said that the publication was reasonable?[5]

[1] The same applies to other mistakes that relate to elements of the plaintiff's cause of action, such as whether the defendant thought the statement was defamatory, or the availability of other defences, such as qualified privilege or fair comment.

[2] D Milo 'The Cabinet Minister, the Mail & Guardian, and the Report Card: The Supreme Court of Appeal's Decision in the Mthembi-Mahanyele Case' (2005) 122 SALJ 28 ('The Cabinet Minister') at 38-9.

[3] Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 47. See also NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)('NM v Smith') at paras 96-7 (Langa CJ attempts to explicate the distinction in the context of privacy).

[4] Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 72.

[5] The authors differ on this point. One response, expressed by Dario Milo, is that our courts should resist drawing nice distinctions between fault and unlawfulness for purposes of media defamation law, and that the defences of reasonableness at the level of unlawfulness, and absence of negligence at the level of fault, in practice conflate into the same enquiry, namely, whether the defendant has acted reasonably. See Milo 'The Cabinet Minister' (supra) at 38-39 and Milo Defamation (supra) at 196. Another perspective, favoured by Glenn Penfold, is that it is important for our courts separately to recognise the defences of reasonableness and absence of negligence. According to this view, the reasonableness defence (as part of wrongfulness) is an open-ended policy enquiry that depends on all relevant considerations, and a defence of absence of negligence is qualitatively different; most importantly, it adds the defence of reasonable mistake, which means that the defendant is not liable if he or she reasonably believed that the material was true at the time of publication, without any further enquiry into the broad policy considerations on which a wrongfulness enquiry may depend, such as the tone of the article. G Penfold 'Aspects of Freedom of Expression in South

As to the second issue flagged above, the form of fault that now applies in media defamation law is clearly negligence. This has been acknowledged by the Constitutional Court in Khumalo[1] as well as the Supreme Court of Appeal in Mthembi-Mahanyele.[2] A jurisprudence is already developing in regard to the ingredients of reasonable conduct.[3] We support this move as a negligence standard accords with recent foreign jurisprudence in a number of jurisdictions,[4] adopts a flexible standard with which our courts are familiar, and, unlike the actual malice rule in Sullivan,[5] represents a reasonable balance between the right to free speech and reputation.[6] When applying the standard, courts should be careful to not demand too much of the defendant: the reasonable publication defence rightly protects the publication of defamatory statements even though they cannot be proved to be true, provided the publisher has acted reasonably. And, as has been recognized recently by the House of Lords, in assessing whether a publisher has acted responsibly on the facts, considerable weight should be accorded to the editorial judgment of the publisher.[7]

Africa's Democratic Transition' in C Jenkins, M du Plesssis & K Govender (eds) Law, Nationbuilding and Transformation in South Africa (2009, forthcoming)('Aspects'). See also J Burchell 'Media Freedom of Expression Scores as Strict Liability Receives the Red Card: National Media Limited v Bogoshi' (1999) 116(1) SALJ 1, 5-7; and J Neethling 'The Protection of False Defamatory Publications by the Mass Media: Recent Developments in South Africa against the Background of Australian, New Zealand and English Law' (2007) 40 CILSA 103 ('Recent Developments') at 123-124.

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 20.

[2] Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 46.

[3] In a few cases, the courts have held that the reasonable publication defence availed the publisher. See, for example, Sayed (supra); McKay v Editor City Press & Another [2002] 1 All SA 538 (SE); Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra)(Lewis JA, Howie P); Roberts v Johncom Media Investments Ltd [2007] JOL 19012 (C); Burchell v Johncom Media Investments Ltd unreported decision of the Eastern Cape High Court, Case No 1092/2004. In other cases, the reasonable publication defence has failed. See, for example, Lady Agasim-Pereira v Johnnic Publishing Eastern Cape (Pty) Ltd & Others [2003] 2 All SA 416 (SE); Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra)(Mthiyane JA, Mpati DP); Mothlasedi v New Africa Investments Ltd unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division (29 March 2007).

[4] For example, the developments in Australia. See Lange v Australian Broadcasting Corporation (1997) 189 CLR 520 (Australian High Court held that the common law defence of qualified privilege could in principle be invoked to political communications to the public where the publisher had established the reasonableness of its conduct.) Cf Theophanous v Herald & Weekly Times Ltd (1994) 182 CLR 104 (HC). A test of responsible publication also informs the extended defence of qualified privilege that is now recognised in England. See Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd [2001] 2 AC 127, 202 (HL). See also Loutchansky v Times Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [2002] QB 783 (CA) at para 36. A Canadian court has recently introduced a similar defence in Ontario. Cusson v Quan 2007 ONCA 771.

[5] The Sullivan test has been trenchantly criticized by academics and judges. The most eloquent rejection of the Sullivan test in South Africa is Cameron J's decision in Holomisa (supra) at 613-6. For an excellent academic critique, see RA Epstein 'Was New York Times v Sullivan Wrong?' (1986) 53 U Chicago LR 782.

[6] On the desirability of a negligence test as a means of balancing reputation and freedom of speech, see Milo Defamation (supra) at 206-211.

[7] Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe Sprl [2007] 1 AC 359 (HL) at paras 51, 111 and 142.

The final two issues that require brief analysis are whether the reasonable publication defence applies to all types of speech, and whether it affects non-media defendants as well as media defendants. Bogoshi clearly postulates that the defence applies to speech on all matters of public interest.[1] However, an interesting development in this regard is the decision of Lewis JA (with whom Howie P concurred) in Mthembi-Mahanyele. Lewis JA, building on Bogoshi, upheld a special political speech defence — which she termed 'justifiable political speech' — the effect of which is to negative the presumption of unlawfulness.[2] Lewis JA appeared to regard such speech as information, opinion and arguments concerning government and political matters that affect the public.[3] The learned judge grounded her decision on the reach of this defence, on the principle that members of government must be accountable to the public. There can be no issue taken with Lewis JA on the need for political speech to be strongly protected in a democratic society. But to restrict this protection to the category of explicit political speech in modern circumstances, where there is no clear distinction between private and public power, poses a threat to freedom of expression.[4] Bogoshi already protects public interest speech that goes beyond purely political speech, as Mthiyane JA in his dissenting judgment recognises.[5] It may be that Lewis JA simply views political speech as a crystallisation of the general principle in Bogoshi, but if this is the case, it was superfluous for Lewis JA to introduce the political speech defence.[6] In our view, Lewis JA's judgment should be interpreted as correctly emphasizing the significance in our democracy of political speech, but it is confusing and unnecessary for this significance to result in a special defence being created for political speech to the exclusion of speech on other matters of public interest.[7]

In regard to the later issue, there are strong arguments of principle that support the view that the media should not be placed in a stronger position than ordinary members of the public.[8] Less clear is whether the media, because of their

[1] Bogoshi (supra) at 1208. The contours of 'public interest' are broad. Cf London Artists v Littler [1969] 2 QB 375 (CA)(Lord Denning). For an attempt to distinguish between speech on matters of public interest and private speech, see Milo Defamation (supra) at 138-154.

[2] Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 69.

[3] Ibid at para 57.

[4] In Australia and New Zealand, extended protection to false defamatory statements is limited to explicit political speech. This approach has been trenchantly criticised. See M Chesterman Freedom of Speech in Australian Law: A Delicate Plant (2000).

[5] Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra) at para 117 (Mthiyane JA saw no need for the introduction of a special political speech defence. This conclusion is correct.)

[6] Lewis JA's reliance on decisions of the European Court of Human Rights in carving out an enclave of protection for political speech is, we submit, misplaced. See Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843 at para 64 (Court stated that 'there is no warrant in case law for distinguishing … between political discussion and discussion on other matters of public concern').

[7] See further Milo 'The Cabinet Minister' (supra) at 37; Neethling 'Recent Developments' (supra) at 119.

[8] See, for example, Holomisa (supra) at 610 (Cameron J); Midi Television (supra) at para 6 (Nugent JA).

potential to inflict greater damage to reputation as a result of widespread dissemination, should as a matter of constitutional law be placed in a less advantageous position than other defendants.[1] We point out that, while in principle defensible (and in our view preferable), it is in practice difficult to make distinctions based on the identity of the defendant (as opposed to, for example, how widespread the dissemination is): there are formidable difficulties in defining who qualifies as a member of the media, and this is exacerbated by the convergence of technologies and digital publication. Further, if the motivating factor for the distinction is the capacity of the media to inflict greater harm because of widespread publication, anomalies would arise where individual defendants publish statements widely.[2]

A related issue is the standard that should be applied to non-media defendants. The Bogoshi defence has been developed by the High Court to require that the appropriate standard of fault for non-media defendants is gross negligence.[3] This is a significant development of the common law because it restricts the erstwhile free speech rights of non-media defendants and is not necessarily appropriate.[4]

(v) Falsity as an ingredient of the plaintiff's cause of action

The traditional position as regards falsity in the South African law of defamation is that the defendant bears the burden of proving the truth of a statement for the public benefit.[5] This principle was attacked by defendants in a series of exceptions brought in terms of the Final Constitution. In these varied cases, it was urged —

[1] This was, of course, historically the position at common law in South Africa, where the strict liability rule applied.

[2] See NM v Smith (supra) at para 177 (O'Regan J)(given the scale of damage to an individual that can be caused by widespread publication, appropriate to confer special obligations upon media). The Privy Council has recently held that the Reynolds defence is not limited to media defendants. See Seaga v Harper [2008] UKPC 9 at para 11.

[3] See Bogoshi (supra) at 1214-1245 (The Court left the point open.) See also Marais v Groenewalt 2001 (1) SA 634, 646 (T)(Marais)(There is nothing in principle to distinguish media publications from non-media publications. Thus animus injuriandi should now be interpreted as being satisfied with evidence of gross negligence on the part of the defendant.) Cf Heyns v Venter 2004 (3) SA 200 (T). See generally J Neethling 'Nalatigheid as aanspreeklikheidsvereiste vir die actio injuriarum by laster' (2002) 65 THRHR 260; JC Knobel 'Nalatigheid persoonlikheidskrenking' (2002) 65 THRHR 24. The majority of the Constitutional Court did not need to reach the issue of whether the reasonable publication test applies to non-media defendants in the context of the disclosure of private medical facts in NM v Smith (supra) at para 99 (Langa CJ) and para 182 (O'Regan J)(These judges appear to apply the traditional intention test to a non-media defendant.) For further analysis of this case, see 'Privacy' § 42.9*(b)* infra.

[4] In terms of the traditional position, non-media defendants escape liability if they lack intention to defame. Applying a gross negligence standard requires more of non-media defendants than a standard based on intention.

[5] The 'public benefit' aspect of the defence is not a requirement of the law in many other jurisdictions, such as England and Australia. See P Milmo & WVH Rogers Gatley on Libel and Slander (10th Edition, 2004) 267 (Considers the position in England, and the uniform legislation that was passed in the Australian states and territories in 2005, such as 25 of the New South Wales' Defamation Act, 2005.)

unsuccessfully — that freedom of expression required that public officials,[1] or corporations,[2] or individuals suing in relation to a matter of public concern,[3] should bear the burden of proving falsity. One difficulty for the defendants in these cases was that the Supreme Court of Appeal had already commented in Bogoshi — albeit obiter and in a case decided under the Interim Constitution — that falsity is not an element of the delict of defamation.[4] For instance, in Khumalo HC, van der Westhuizen J held that although the onus rule could be regarded as a limitation on the right to free speech and that he was tempted to rule that it 'may well not always pass the test of a reasonable and justifiable limitation in all situations', the court was bound by Bogoshi.[5] But the judge added that he was 'not necessarily convinced that the existing common law position on the burden of proof regarding … falsity … as a general rule would be in accordance with the Constitution in all cases, and a fresh look may be warranted'.[6]

The fresh look desired by van der Westhuizen J was provided by the Constitutional Court in the appeal: Khumalo v Holomisa. O'Regan J, for a unanimous Court, rejected the argument that the plaintiff should have to show falsity. The Court acknowledged the inequities of the present position where the defendant must establish truth:

> [The common law] does not directly protect a powerful constitutional freedom of expression interest for there is no powerful interest in falsehood. Nor does it provide necessary protection for the constitutional value of human dignity. For, in the main, a person's interest in their reputation can only further constitutional values if that reputation is a true reflection of their character.[7]

The Court also recognised that the rule that the plaintiff need not establish falsity is invasive of free speech:

> The difficulty of proving the truth or otherwise of defamatory statements, and the common-law rule which lets the risk of the failure to establish truth lie on defendants, in the absence of a defence of reasonable publication, does cause a 'chilling effect' on the publication of information. A publisher will think twice before publishing a defamatory statement where it may be difficult or impossible to prove the truth of that statement and where no other defence to defamation would be available.[8]

[1] Holomisa v Khumalo & Others 2002 (3) SA 38 (T)('Khumalo HC'); Selemela & Others v Independent Newspaper Group Ltd & Others 2001 (4) SA 987 (N).

[2] Times Media Ltd v Franki Africa (Pty) Ltd Unreported, Witwatersrand Local Division (2 August 2000).

[3] Isaacs v Independent Newspaper Group (Pty) Ltd Unreported, Witwatersrand Local Division (3 November 2000).

[4] Bogoshi (supra) at 1218.

[5] Khumalo HC (supra) at 66 (The Court found that the clear differences in application between the Interim and Final Constitutions were not sufficient to warrant a different approach to the law of defamation.)

[6] Ibid at 69.

[7] Khumalo (supra) at para 36.

[8] Ibid at para 39.

But, the Court held, this 'chilling effect' is reduced considerably by the Bogoshi defence of reasonable publication, so much so that '[w]ere the Supreme Court of Appeal not to have developed the defence of reasonable publication … a proper application of constitutional principle would have indeed required the development of our common law to avoid this result'.[1] Therefore, because the Bogoshi defence struck the appropriate constitutional balance between freedom of expression and reputation, there was no need for the law to be further developed in this regard.[2]

The Constitutional Court's judgment is disappointing not least for its failure to engage meaningfully with the subtleties of the newspaper's contentions. The case presented an opportunity for the Court to forge a greater protective regime for speech on matters of public interest by endorsing a rule that, for this type of speech, the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing falsity. This is the position adopted by the Supreme Court of the US in Philadelphia Newspapers Inc v Hepps, where the Court found that the rule was necessary to ensure that true speech on matters of public concern is not deterred.[3] And there is a substantial body of empirical evidence from England that suggests that the chilling effect caused by the burden of proof is not exaggerated.[4] A good argument can therefore be made that a rule based on Hepps more properly balances the importance of freedom of speech on matters of public interest with the right to reputation.[5]

(vi) Truth for the public benefit

It is well-known that a number of defences to a defamation action exist under common law.[6] One of the crystallized defences is truth for the public benefit or interest.[7] The notion of public benefit has always been interpreted widely; thus in [1] Khumalo (supra) at para 43.

[2] Ibid.

[3] 475 US 767, 776 (1986). Cf McVicar v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 22 at para 86 (General rule that publisher establish truth not an unjustifiable infringement of art 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights.)

[4] See, for example, E Barendt, L Lustgarten, K Norrie & H Stephenson Libel and the Media: The Chilling Effect (1997) 191 and 196; RL Weaver & G Bennett 'Is the New York Times "Actual Malice" Standard Really Necessary? A Comparative Perspective' (1993) 53 Louisiana LR 1153, 1172.

[5] See further Milo Defamation (supra) at 162-83. Cf J van der Vyver 'Constitutional Free Speech and the Law of Defamation' (1995) 112 SALJ 572, 599 (Pre-eminence of dignity means that the onus should be on the publisher to justify his conduct.) One of the authors of this chapter adopts a slightly different view, supporting the approach of the Constitutional Court in Khumalo as striking an appropriate balance between freedom of expression and the right to reputation. It allows the reasonableness defence effectively to operate as a tie-breaker between these interests where the truth or falsity of allegations cannot be proved. Penfold, however, points out that there may be scope for placing the onus in respect of both negligence and unreasonableness on the plaintiff, at least in relation to political speech — contrary to the position of the SCA in Bogoshi. See Penfold 'Aspects' (supra).

[6] See generally Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 207-300.

[7] These terms are used interchangeably, as is the modern practice.

Graham v Ker,[1] De Villiers CJ stated that '[a]s a general principle, I take it to be for the public benefit that the truth as to the character or conduct of individuals should be known'.[2]

The decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Independent Newspapers Holdings Ltd & Others v Suliman represents a sharp contrast to the broad approach to 'public benefit' that is frequently adopted in the common law.[3] The case concerned the notorious Planet Hollywood bombing in Cape Town in 1998. The Cape Times published articles accompanied by photographs a few days after the bombing, which gave rise to a defamation claim by the plaintiff. The defamatory meaning of the articles was that the plaintiff was suspected by the police of being implicated in the bombing and had been arrested at the airport while attempting to leave South Africa.[4] Marais JA (with whom Scott JA and Mthiyane JA concurred) stated that he had 'no hesitation in finding that the defamatory aspects of the articles were true'.[5] The 'troublesome aspect of the case' was the issue of public benefit or interest, which the judge thought was 'wholly unhelpful in failing to provide any indication of what is meant by public benefit or interest'.[6] In Marais JA's opinion the clash between free speech and the rights to dignity and privacy means that even if there is a legitimate public interest in a particular topic, it would not follow that any information of relevance to that topic may be published. Instead, what is required is an ad hoc assessment of what weight should be assigned to the respective interests in the particular circumstances of the case.[7] The consequences of the premature disclosure of the identity of a suspect are, Marais JA held, so traumatic to the person concerned that greater weight in this context should be given to the rights of dignity and privacy; all the press are at liberty to do until the suspect appears in court is to inform the public that an unnamed suspect has been arrested and questioned by the police. In addition, it

[1] (1892) 9 SC 185, 187 ('Graham').

[2] Ibid (The Court in Graham qualified this point in its pronouncement that it is not in the public interest to rake up past transgressions after a long lapse of time.) See also McBride v The Citizen 1978 (Pty) Ltd unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division, Case No 03/15780 (6 February 2008) at para 13 (The Court, incorrectly, applied this qualification to editorials in a newspaper that commented on the suitability of a public official, Robert McBride, for the office of Chief of Police for the Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality, by referring to his role in the Magoo bombing in 1986. The Court also held that the defence of fair comment did not avail the defendant inter alia on the basis that it had omitted to mention in the impugned articles that McBride was awarded amnesty by the Truth & Reconciliation Commission for his role in the Magoo bombing; the factual substratum for the newspaper's strident opinions about McBride was therefore absent. In our view the Court erred in not according sufficient breathing space to editorial opinions published about a public official. The newspaper had not fabricated any facts upon which it based its bona fide comments. Further, McBride's amnesty was common knowledge and in our view did not have to be specifically mentioned in each editorial piece in order to claim the benefit of the fair comment defence.)

[3] [2004] 3 All SA 137 (SCA)('Suliman').

[4] Ibid at para 30.

[5] Ibid at para 38 (Thus reliance on the Bogoshi defence was unnecessary. Ibid at para 41.)

[6] Ibid at para 42.

[7] Ibid at para 44.

would not generally be in the public interest for the identity of a suspect to be known prematurely.[1] In so far as the photograph of the suspect is concerned, the fact that legislation restricts at a criminal law level the publication of the photograph 'leaves little, if any, room for the conclusion that it is in the public interest to publish such a picture'.[2] Nugent JA (with whom Ponnan AJA concurred) disagreed with the majority in regard to the 'public benefit' aspect of the decision.[3] His view was that the arrest of a person on a serious charge is always a matter of public concern, and this applies no less to the identity of that person.[4]

The restrictive interpretation of the 'public benefit' aspect of the truth defence adopted by Marais JA constitutes a restriction on freedom of speech that, we submit, is difficult to justify. Marais JA's approach is effectively to segment the defamatory information into specific items that are each then separately tested against the 'public benefit' requirement. Thus general information on the prevention of crime is in the public interest, but disclosing a suspect's identity (including his photograph) is not.[5] This results in the undesirable position that a true statement (the suspicion of involvement of the plaintiff) conveyed in regard to a matter of general public interest (the Planet Hollywood bombings) may not be published without being mulcted in damages, because that statement includes details that are regarded as not being in the public interest (the details of the identity of the plaintiff). Marais JA's consolation to the press — that the identity of the suspect can be revealed once he appears in court — does not adequately value freedom of the press.

A better conception of press freedom is proffered by Nugent JA, who stated that 'the protection that is afforded to press freedom must mean that it will generally be in the public interest for truthful matter to be published'.[6] A similar

[1] Suliman (supra) at para 47 (This will especially be the case where the plaintiff is not a public figure. Ibid at para 49. Marais JA was prepared to accept that exceptions could arise where the publication of the identity of a suspect might be for the public benefit. One instance is where the crime is such that the public may be entitled to be informed of the suspect's identity 'so that they can steer clear immediately of the person'. Another exception might be where a person's discharge of a high profile public office requires him to be above suspicion. Ibid at paras 45 and 46.)

[2] Suliman (supra) at para 50. The provision in question was South African Police Services Act 68 of 1995 s 69.

[3] The judge agreed, however, with the result. He held that the information that had been published had not been proved to be true.

[4] Suliman (supra) at para 72.

[5] Ibid at para 59 (Somewhat paradoxically, Marais JA did not segment the information in this restrictive sense when it comes to the privacy aspect of the case. The judge stated that the facts and circumstances of the arrest of the plaintiff were not private matters; he also wrote (obiter) that the disclosures of his name and photograph were 'not, in my opinion, private information of a kind which the law should regard as worthy of protection'.)

[6] Ibid at para 70. The difficulties presented by the case emanate to a significant degree from the principle that truth is not on its own sufficient to justify a defamatory publication in South African law. There is merit in the courts revisiting whether a 'public benefit' requirement should constrain the defence at all.

approach was adopted in the leading decision of the House of Lords: Jameel.[1] An article identified the claimant as a corporation whose account was being monitored to prevent it from being used for terrorist funding. As Lord Hoffmann ruled, the issue of public interest had to be determined by looking at the article as a whole, rather than by isolating the defamatory statement.[2] The thrust of the article was clearly in the public interest.

In our opinion, a similar approach should be applied in South African law. If the broad approach sanctioned in the Jameel case was adopted, it would follow that Suliman was wrongly decided; the thrust of the article — about the arrest of a suspect in the Planet Hollywood bombing in Cape Town — was clearly in the public interest.[3]

(vii) Remedies: Interdicts, damages and the amende honorable

The final issue to highlight in regard to the impact of the Constitution on the law of defamation relates to the remedies that the plaintiff may obtain.[4] These remedies also need to balance the importance of the competing interests of freedom of expression and reputation. We discuss, in turn, prior restraints on speech, damages, and apologies and retractions.

The commitment to freedom of expression means that prior restraints on expression should be sparingly granted in defamation cases, particularly where the statements concern matters of public interest.[5] It was for this reason that in Mandela v Falati, Winnie Mandela failed in her application to restrain the respondent from making defamatory statements about her.[6] Van Schalkwyk J held that 'in general no politician should be permitted to silence his or her critics. It is a matter of the most fundamental importance that such criticism should be free,

[1] Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe Sprl [2007] 1 AC 359 (HL)(The case concerned the responsible publication defence, but its approach to the issue of public interest should inform our courts' approach to the truth and public benefit defence.)

[2] Ibid at para 48 and at para 34 (Lord Bingham); para 111 (Lord Hope); para 143 (Lord Scott); para 148 (Baroness Hale).

[3] See Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others; Zuma & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2008] ZACC 13 at paras 50-51 (This recent decision provides some support for the proposition that the majority in Suliman (supra) adopted the wrong approach. In the context of a discussion of whether a letter of request to authorities in Mauritius for information required in the pending prosecution of Jacob Zuma for corruption invaded Zuma's dignity, the Court stated that '[t]he right to dignity . . . does not necessarily extend to the right not to be named as a suspect, once there is a reasonable suspicion that a crime has been committed' and 'there is no right not to be named as a suspect in a criminal matter'. It is difficult to square these comments — which the Constitutional Court made without qualification — with the proposition adopted by the majority in Suliman that it is not in the public interest to name a suspect to a crime before they appear in court.)

[4] On constitutional remedies generally, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 8.

[5] The general position in regard to prior restraints is dealt with at § 42.9*(h)* infra.

[6] 1995 (1) SA 251 (W).

open, robust and even unrestrained.'[1] One of the most compelling factors that should weigh heavily against the granting of interim interdicts in the context of defamation was identified by the court in Lieberthal:

> The Court must also take into account that even though the applicant seeks only temporary relief at this stage the effect of granting the remedy will be to stop 702 [a radio station] from broadcasting on this matter until the defamation action is completed. This could conservatively take more than two years. Granting temporary relief at this stage is therefore tantamount to granting final relief. The balance of convenience therefore favours 702.[2]

The rule in defamation cases has traditionally been that publication will not be restrained if the defendant has a sustainable case.[3] However, as a result of a significant obiter dictum of the Supreme Court of Appeal in a non-defamation case, Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape), courts faced with applications for interim interdicts in defamation cases should now enquire whether:

> the prejudice that the publication might cause . . . is demonstrable and substantial and there is a real risk that the prejudice will occur if publication takes place. . . . [E]ven then publication will not be unlawful unless a court is satisfied that the disadvantage of curtailing the free flow of information outweighs its advantage.[4]

The result of the proper application of the Midi Television test is that interim interdicts against defamatory publications should now only be granted in the most exceptional of cases, where the merits clearly favour the applicant, and [1] Ibid at 260. See also Manyatshe v Mail & Guardian Ltd unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division (21 September 2006).

[2] Lieberthal v Primedia Broadcasting (Pty) Ltd 2003 (5) SA 39, 48 (W)('Lieberthal'). See also Hix Networking Technologies v System Publishers (Pty) Ltd & Another 1997 (1) SA 391, 402 (A). In contrast, final interdicts that forbid the repetition of defamatory material that has been held by a court to have been published unlawfully do not unjustifiably infringe freedom of expression. But in a case where the applicant sought final relief in respect of future, unknown statements on an Internet website that the applicant alleged would be defamatory (as a result of the background circumstances), the High Court rightly regarded the relief sought as constituting a major restriction on the right to freedom of expression. Tsichlas & Another v Touch Line Media (Pty) Ltd 2004 (2) SA 112 (W). See also Petro Props (Pty) Ltd v Barlow & Another 2006 (5) SA 160 (W) at para 57 (rejecting application for final interdict that would have had the effect that the respondents 'may no longer speak out, may no longer champion their cause, may no longer seek to persuade.')

[3] Lieberthal (supra) at 43; Van Zyl & Another v Jonathan Ball Publishers & Others 1999 (4) 5 SA 571 (W). In England, however, a defendant who asserts that he will defend the allegations to be published will only on very rare occasions be injuncted; to allow injunctions in this context would offend one of the most basic aspects of free speech, the freedom to 'publish and be damned'. See Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, CA; Greene v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2005] QB 972, CA. For a recent articulation of the speech-protective Australian approach, see Australian Broadcasting Corporation v O'Neill [2006] HCA 46.

[4] 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)('Midi Television') at paras 19-20. For a full analysis of this decision, see § 42.9*(c)*(iv)(bb) infra.

where an award of damages or a right of reply[1] will not adequately remedy the harm caused to the applicant's reputation.[2]

The major remedy sought in defamation cases is an award of damages. In quantifying these damages, courts need to calibrate the impact the award will have on freedom of expression, not just in relation to the particular defendant, but also in regard to other publishers. The Supreme Court of Appeal has recognised the restrictive effect of a substantial damages award: 'too high an award of damages may act as an unjustifiable deterrent to exercise the freedom of expression and may inappropriately inhibit the exercise of that right'.[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal has also effectively jettisoned the notion that punitive damages may be awarded in defamation cases.[4] Courts should accordingly exercise great care to ensure that damages awards are not set at a level that would inhibit the future exercise of freedom of expression.[5]

Finally, we should mention the remedy known in Roman-Dutch law as the amende honorable. Under this remedy, the plaintiff could claim an apology and retraction from the defendant instead of damages. The leading modern case that adopts this remedy is Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane.[6] The plaintiff sought an interdict and damages in regard to allegations made by the defendant and published in various newspapers that the plaintiff was incompetent and dishonest. At trial, counsel for the plaintiff argued that the defendant should be ordered to pay damages unless he published an advertisement containing an apology in The Business Day. This raised the crisp issue of whether relief such as that sought by the plaintiff was competent. Willis J held that the amende honorable,

[1] See Lieberthal (supra) at 48.

[2] Courts have nevertheless been prepared, despite the threshold set in Midi Television, to grant interdicts in defamation cases. See, for example, Els v Media 24 (Pty) Ltd [2008] ZAGPHC 39 (Sutherland AJ granted an interdict against You and Huisgenoot magazines in respect of an article alleging that the applicant was a child molester. The judge ruled that the alternative remedy of a damages claim offered cold comfort to the incalculable damage to the applicant's reputation that the publication would cause. Ibid at para 13.)

[3] Mogale & Others v Seima [2005] JOL 16040 (SCA)('Mogale') at para 9. See also Van der Berg v Coopers & Lybrand Trust (Pty) Ltd & Others 2001 (2) SA 242 (SCA) at para 48; Dikoko (supra) at paras 54, 92. But see Dikoko (supra) at para 141 (Skweyiya J).

[4] Mogale (supra) at para 12 (The Court quoted with approval Didcott J's decision in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC) at para 80 (Damages claims that have as their object some punitive or exemplary result have not been authoritatively recognised.) He also cited Hattingh J's express repudiation of punitive damages in Esselen v Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd & Others 1992 (3) SA 764, 771 (T)(Punishment aim of criminal law not the law of delict). This disapproval of punitive damages in defamation cases also broadly accords with the jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court. See Gertz v Robert Welch Inc 418 US 323, 350 (1974); Dun & Bradstreet Inc v Greenmoss Builders Inc 472 US 749 (1985)(Punitive damages in relation to speech on matters of public concern may only be granted if the plaintiff proves actual malice.) For a different (and most undesirable) approach, see Afrika v Meltzer 1997 (4) SA 531, 539 (NmH)(Publishers will be more mindful to exercise restraint if 'substantive (sic) exemplary/punitive damages could be visited upon them if they defame another.')

[5] The European Court has recognised that excessively high damages awards constitute an infringement of art 10 of the ECHR. Tolstoy Miloslavsky v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 442. See also Independent News and Media v Ireland (2006) 42 EHRR 46.

[6] 2002 (6) SA 512 (W)('Modibane').

though it had fallen into desuetude, had not been abrogated by disuse;[1] it was merely forgotten: 'a little treasure lost in a nook of our legal attic'.[2] According to the judge, even to the extent that the remedy was no longer part of South African law, the Constitution allowed such a remedy to be developed. [3] Damages awards often fail to achieve an appropriate balance between free speech and reputation; not only may damages ruin defendants financially, but they will often not operate to vindicate the reputation of the plaintiff effectively.[4] Willis J thus granted relief in the form of damages but made that relief effective only in the event that the defendant did not publish an apology (the wording of which was suggested by the plaintiff) in a national newspaper.

This creative decision by Willis J represents a salutary reminder that in defamation cases the relief needs to achieve a harmonious balance between vindicating the reputation of the plaintiff, and only restricting free speech to the extent necessary.[5] Damages awards are often blunt instruments to achieve this balance.[6] Alternative remedies such as rights of reply,[7] apologies and retractions, and declarations of falsity,[8] should in principle be considered as discretionary alternatives to damages awards, depending on the facts of the case.[9] The potential development of an apology remedy has recently received renewed impetus in the judgments of Mokgoro J and Sachs J in Dikoko. As Mokgoro J stated:

> A remedy based on the idea of ubuntu or botho could go much further in restoring human dignity than an imposed monetary award in which the size of the victory is measured by the quantum ordered and the parties are further estranged rather than brought together by the legal process.[10]

(b) The law of privacy

Like defamation, the protection of individual and corporate privacy often comes [1] Modibane (supra) at para 23.

[2] Ibid at para 24.
[3] Ibid at para 28.
[4] Ibid at paras 25 and 28.
[5] See also University of Pretoria v South Africans for the Abolition of Vivisection 2007 (3) SA 395 (O) at para 17 (The court went even further than Willis J had done in the Modibane case. The court granted a declaration of falsity, and ordered the publication of a retraction and apology.) Cf Young v Shaik 2004 (3) SA 46, 57 (C)(declaration of apology as remedy disapproved of.)
[6] See generally JG Fleming 'Retraction and Reply: Alternative Remedies for Defamation' (1987) 12 U British Columbia LR 15; New South Wales Law Reform Commission Defamation (Report 75, 1995).
[7] See generally JA Barron 'Access to the Press — A New First Amendment Right' (1967) 80 Harvard LR 1641.
[8] On the potential for declaratory relief to effect an appropriate balance between free speech and reputation, see, for example, MA Franklin 'A Declaratory Judgment Alternative to Current Libel Law' (1986) 74 California LR 809.
[9] See generally Milo Defamation (supra) at Chapter VIII.
[10] Dikoko (supra) at para 68. Ibid at paras 113-116 (Sachs J).

into conflict with the right to freedom of expression.[1] Many of the constitutional issues echo the problems encountered in defamation law where a reconciliation of reputation and free speech must be effected, and will not be repeated here.[2] However, two issues that have recently engaged our courts require further attention as a matter of free speech law. The first is whether the action for invasion of privacy should be developed to hold the media to a negligence standard.[3] The second is how the defence of 'public interest' has been interpreted to justify either an intrusion into private life or the publication of private facts.

(i) Lack of negligence in media privacy cases

At common law, liability for invasion of privacy is based on animus injuriandi, the intention to invade the plaintiff's privacy.[4] Some commentators have opined that the liability of media defendants for invasion of privacy should parallel the position that applies in defamation; negligence on the part of such defendants would be sufficient for the imposition of liability.[5] The Constitutional Court had occasion to consider this issue in NM v Smith.[6] The plaintiffs had been involved in controversial clinical HIV trials at the University of Pretoria which Patricia de Lille, a prominent opposition politician, had investigated. Several years later the plaintiffs were identified as being HIV-positive in de Lille's biography where the trials were discussed. They sued de Lille, the author of the biography and the publisher in the High Court, arguing that the disclosure of their identities and HIV status had been made without their consent and was therefore unlawful. They also argued that the defendants had acted intentionally or alternatively they had been negligent and that the common law should be developed to recognise liability for negligent disclosures of private medical facts. The defendants argued that they did not act with fault because they believed that the plaintiffs had consented to the disclosure. The basis for this argument was that the plaintiffs had consented to the disclosure of their HIV status for purposes of an external report commissioned by the University of Pretoria following complaints about the clinical trials. The High Court held that the principles in Bogoshi

[1] For a detailed discussion of the constitutional right to privacy, see D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M, Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2003)('Privacy'). The classic monograph in South African law on the common law of privacy remains DJ McQuoid-Mason The Law of Privacy in South Africa (1977)('Law of Privacy'). See also J Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression: The Modern Actio Injuriarum (1998)('Personality Rights').

[2] See 'Defamation' § 42.9*(a)* supra. Thus the defences to a defamation action (such as truth for the public benefit, qualified privilege and consent) and the remedies available are for the most part of equal application in privacy cases. See McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' (supra) at 38-13 and 38-17.

[3] See 'Defamation' § 42.9*(a)* supra.

[4] J Neethling, JM Potgieter & PJ Visser Neethling's Law of Personality (2nd Edition, 2005) 252.

[5] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 429; McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' (supra) at 38-16.

[6] 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)('NM v Smith').

applied.[1] Schwartzman J held that the defendants had not acted intentionally and were not negligent before they were notified about the error because there was nothing in the University of Pretoria report that indicated that the names of the plaintiffs were confidential.

The Constitutional Court's decision revealed a sharp division amongst certain members of the Court.[2] The judges were unanimous that confidential medical information lies at the core of a person's right to privacy, and the majority accepted that one's HIV status in the South African context deserves heightened protection against disclosure, especially given the potential intolerance and discrimination that may result.[3]

The disagreement in the Court concerned the issue of whether the defendants were liable for the initial publication of the book. The majority judges, led by Madala J, held that the defendants were liable for breaching the privacy and dignity of the plaintiffs on the basis of intention. The defendants were, according to the majority, 'aware that they had not obtained the express informed consent of the [plaintiffs] to publish their HIV status',[4] or at least 'foresaw the possibility that consent had not been given'.[5] Madala J therefore did not need to consider whether defendants in privacy cases should be liable for the negligent disclosure of private facts.[6]

Langa CJ concurred with the result reached by the majority but for different reasons. According to him, the evidence fell short of establishing that the defendants had acted with intention.[7] However, the common law had to be developed under the Constitution so that negligence becomes the basis for liability for media defendants in privacy cases: a media defendant would have to show that it acted without negligence to escape liability, whereas the traditional approach of intention continues to apply to non-media defendants. In Langa CJ's words: 'It is … constitutionally appropriate that the media should be held to a higher standard than the average person'. Langa CJ regarded the author and publisher as media defendants because they were 'professionals involved in the distribution of information for commercial gain'.[8] In his view, it was not sufficient for the defendants

[1] [2005] 3 All SA 457 (W) at para 36 (Thus a defence of reasonable publication is available, and the appropriate fault standard is negligence. Schwartzman J did not distinguish for purposes of the application of the Bogoshi test between media and non-media defendants. Ibid at para 41.)

[2] For critique of the Court's failure to analyse with any rigour whether the case raised a constitutional matter at the outset, see S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762; G Penfold & D Milo 'Media Freedom and the Law of Privacy: NM and Others v Smith and Others (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening as Amicus Curiae*)*' (2007) 1 Constitutional Court Review (forthcoming)('Media Freedom').

[3] For criticism of this aspect of the case, see J Steinberg 'Generous Judgment Instills Stigma' in Notes from a Fractured Country (2007) Cf Jansen van Vuuren & Another NNO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842 (A).

[4] NM v Smith (supra) at para 59 (Madala J).

[5] Ibid at para 64. (The Court awarded the plaintiffs damages in the amount of R35 000 each.)

[6] Ibid at para 67.

[7] Ibid at para 93.

[8] Ibid at para 98 (On the facts, Langa CJ held that both the author and the publisher had acted negligently in failing to take steps to determine the exact terms of the consents given by the plaintiffs for purpose of the University of Pretoria report.)

to rely simply on the University report; they had an additional duty to ensure that the plaintiffs had consented to disclosure outside the report.

Like Langa CJ, O'Regan J — the lone dissenter in the case — also held that the defendants lacked intention.[1] At least 'for purposes of this case', it was also necessary to develop the law of privacy to include a test of negligence for media defendants; the media are immensely powerful and it is appropriate to confer special obligations on the media.[2] But, unlike Langa CJ, O'Regan J did not find that the facts disclosed negligence on the part of the author and publisher; the author's reliance on the University of Pretoria report was defensible on free speech grounds.[3]

What to make of NM v Smith? The majority's puzzling and, with respect, incorrect approach to the factual question of intention[4] had the disappointing result that the judges did not engage with the central free speech issue at the heart of the case — whether in privacy cases the media should be burdened with liability for negligence, in contrast to the more generous standard of intention that traditionally applies to non-media defendants. We contend that Langa CJ and O'Regan J in this regard are in principle correct: as Sachs J stated in his concurring judgment, 'the principles developed in [Bogoshi] are eminently transportable to the law of privacy'.[5] There are sound justifications for the view that the negligence standard of liability is appropriate in balancing the demands of freedom of expression with the rights to dignity, privacy and reputation.[6] There is also a formidable argument to support the view that persons who publish to the world at large in a professional capacity should bear special obligations to check their facts;[7] an approach that allows such publishers to rely on lack of [1] NM v Smith (supra) at paras 156-168.

[2] Ibid at para 177.

[3] Ibid at para 187,

[4] The majority's finding that intention on the part of the defendants could be inferred not only undermines the principle that appeal courts — a fortiori the Constitutional Court — should only interfere in findings of fact in the rarest of cases. NM v Smith (supra) at para 169 (O'Regan J)(dissenting). It is also in our view based on unconvincing reasoning. The majority bases its conclusion that the defendants knew that no consent had been given by the plaintiffs on factors such as that the author went ahead and published even though she had made unsuccessful earlier attempts to find the consents; that de Lille failed to take sufficient steps to ascertain whether consent had been given; and that both the author and de Lille assumed that the report was confidential. Ibid at paras 59-60. These are, we submit, hardly factors that lead to the inevitable conclusion that the defendants subjectively foresaw that the plaintiffs did not give consent, more especially in light of the contrary evidence given by the author and de Lille, and their proven track records in matters concerning HIV/Aids. Ibid at para 58. See also Penfold & Milo 'Media Freedom' (supra); S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 4.

[5] NM v Smith (supra) at para 203. See also Penfold & Milo (supra). For a different view, see H Scott 'Liability for the Mass Publication of Private Information in South African Law: NM v Smith (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae)' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch LR 387, 398-399.

[6] See generally Milo Defamation (supra) at 206-211.

[7] A sharp distinction can no longer be easily made between media and non-media defendants. See generally DA Anderson 'Freedom of the Press' (2002) 80 Texas LR 429. Cf Marais (supra) at 646.

intention to escape sanction would undermine the right to human dignity of the plaintiff.[1]

(ii) The public interest defence

A crucial consideration in reconciling the conflict between the right to privacy and the right to freedom of expression is whether the publication complained of is in the public interest.[2] The leading pre-constitutional case that articulated this defence was Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd v Sage Holdings Ltd & Another, where the Appellate Division held as follows:

> [I]n a case of the publication in the press of private facts about a person, the person's interest in preventing the public disclosure of such facts must be weighed against the interest of the public, if any, to be informed about such facts.[3]

There is a paucity of authority on the limits of the public interest defence after the enactment of the Interim Constitution. Three decisions set the ground rules. In the first decision, MEC for Health, Mpumalanga v M-Net & Another,[4] the applicant launched an eleventh hour application to prevent the broadcast of an exposé by Carte Blanche, an investigative journalism programme, concerning alleged malpractices in the treatment of women who underwent voluntary abortions at a hospital in Groblersdal that fell under the jurisdiction of the applicant. The Court held that even on the assumption that the Carte Blanche team used questionable methods to obtain the information,[5] this should not prevent it from carrying out its constitutional obligation to inform the public of information of clear public concern, especially given that no patient's right to privacy had been infringed.[6] The right of privacy of the hospital staff had to be outweighed by the right of the public to be informed of alleged malpractices at the public hospital.[7] Bertelsmann J continued:

[1] This is, after all, the raison d'etre of the Bogoshi defence. Bogoshi (supra) at 1214.

[2] The public interest limitation on the right to privacy was accepted in the classic discussion of the right by SD Warren and LD Brandeis. SD Warren and LD Brandeis 'The Right to Privacy' (1890) 4 Harvard LR 193, 214. See also WL Prosser 'Privacy' (1960) 48 California LR 383; TI Emerson 'The Right to Privacy and Freedom of the Press' (1979) 14 Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties LR 329. For a modern discussion, see H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) 778-805; Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 230-246.

[3] 1993 (2) SA 451, 462-3 (A)(On the facts of Financial Mail, the Court granted an interdict restraining the publication of confidential and sensitive commercial information about the applicant. There was no overriding public interest to justify the publication. Ibid at 466.)

[4] 2002 (6) SA 714 (T)('MEC for Health').

[5] The Court, however, made no finding in this regard. It was not in a position to do so, given the urgency with which the application had been brought.

[6] Ibid at paras 24 and 27.

[7] Ibid at para 28.

> The enshrinement of the freedom of expression in s 16 of the [Final] Constitution now places a much greater emphasis upon the public's right to know and will consequently weigh the scale more firmly in favour of the right to disseminate news and the media's obligation to inform. The information at issue here is of the kind which is essential to enable the public to judge the performance of public officials and the politicians responsible for them.[1]

The Court also articulated a powerful argument against even temporary bans on publication: 'It is of the very essence of news that, as the word implies, current events should be brought to the attention of the public as soon as possible.'[2]

The second major decision on public interest gestured at the significance of the status of the plaintiff in balancing privacy and freedom of expression. An entertaining set of facts confronted the court in Prinsloo v RCP Media Ltd t/a Rapport.[3] The applicant and his partner were advocates based in Pretoria. They had achieved some notoriety, not least because of stories that had been published concerning the applicant's partner's breast implants and her aspirations to be a singer, actor and model.[4] The applicant sought an order directing the Rapport newspaper to return to the applicant an index print containing photographs of the applicant, his partner and a third person allegedly engaged in various sexual adventures.[5] Van der Westhuizen J correctly accepted that the information at issue was private: 'a photographic image of people involved in conduct of an intimate sexual nature … represents a view, or a peep … of a split second into the most intimate privacy of the persons involved.'[6] In balancing this interest against the right to freedom of expression, van der Westhuizen J accepted that the right protected publication of even mundane issues and gossip but that, in intimate sexual cases, the rights to dignity and privacy 'would weigh much heavier in the competition with free expression'.[7] On the facts, claims by Rapport that it could invoke the public interest defence were rightly rejected by the Court; it mattered not, for example, that the applicant and his partner were advocates, or were to some extent in the public eye.[8] 'It is not clear to me', held van der Westhuizen J, 'whether it is the public interest which is at stake here, or rather the

[1] MEC for Health (supra) at para 28.

[2] Ibid at para 29. See also Observer and Guardian v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 153 (imposition of a delay may deprive a story of its value and interest); see also 'Prior restraints' § 42.9*(h)* infra. For criticism of the MEC for Health decision, see J Neethling 'Indringing in Privaatheid en die Openbare Inligtingsbelang' 2003 *TSA*R 572.

[3] 2003 (4) SA 456 (T)('Prinsloo').

[4] The applicant's partner had been nicknamed 'Advocate Barbie'.

[5] The index print had apparently been handed to Rapport after the applicant had taken the film on which the images were recorded to a photography shop for development.

[6] Prinsloo (supra) at 468.

[7] Ibid at 469.

[8] Ibid at 472-474.

curiosity of a bored and frustrated public, and perhaps specifically of the readers of Afrikaans newspapers and magazines'.[1]

The final noteworthy case is perhaps the leading post-constitutional discussion of the concept of public interest: Tshabala-Msimang v Makhanya.[2] The Sunday Times published an article entitled 'Manto's Hospital Booze Binge' in which it claimed that the Health Minister's medical records of two hospital stays revealed the (large) amounts of alcohol she had consumed both before and after her shoulder surgery. The Health Minister (and the hospital) sued the newspaper principally for the return of the copies of the records, and also urged the court to interdict it from further commenting on the records. On the first issue, Jajbhay J concluded that the National Health Act,[3] which in general prohibits access to, and disclosure of, medical records,[4] buttressed by the constitutional rights to privacy and dignity, meant that the Minister's medical records had to be returned to the hospital.[5]

The real significance of the decision for media freedom, however, lies in Jajbhay J's approach to the Minister's claim for an interdict to prevent the newspaper from further commenting on the medical records. Although, in the view of the Court, public interest 'is a mysterious concept' that can be likened to 'a battered piece of string charged with elasticity',[6] the public has a right to be informed about public figures and the facts showed that the 'revelations made are relevant to the [Minister's] performance of her constitutional and ministerial duties'.[7] Even though the information was unlawfully obtained, 'there was in fact a pressing need for the public to be informed about the information contained in the medical records'. Jajbhay J held, further, and echoing the democracy rationale for freedom of speech,[8] that 'the publication … was capable of contributing to a debate in our democratic society relating to a politician in the exercise of her functions.'[9] He therefore refused to grant an interdict.

[1] Ibid at 473. Curiously, despite this line of reasoning, van der Westhuizen J ultimately permitted Rapport to retain possession of the index print on pragmatic grounds; a number of legal proceedings between the parties in relation to the index print were pending and Rapport may have needed to refer to the index print in the course of these proceedings. Ibid at 476.

[2] [2007] ZAGPHC 161 ('Tshabalala-Msimang').

[3] Act 61 of 2003 ('Health Act').

[4] Health Act ss 14 and 17.

[5] Tshabalala-Msimang (supra) at para 33. One could argue that the Health Act is unconstitutional to the extent that it does not provide for a defence of public interest with respect to the disclosure of medical records. See, for example, P de Vos 'Advertisements, Acts and a Right to Know the Truth' Business Day (26 September 2007).

[6] Tshabalala-Msimang (supra) at para 37.

[7] Ibid at para 44.

[8] See § 42.5(b) supra.

[9] Tshabalala-Msimang (supra) at para 46 (However, the judge later states obiter, in a section headed 'General comments on the conduct of journalists', that the newspaper 'should have thought long and carefully about suitable alternatives before they chose to release this information'. Ibid at para 54. This observation not only contradicts Jajbhay J's earlier findings on public interest, but, derives from a narrow understanding of media freedom. To suggest that the media must elect not to publish matters of public interest and must rather, for example, report the allegation to the police, is to undermine the role of the media in our democracy.)

Some concluding remarks that flow from this troika of post-Constitution privacy cases are appropriate. First, both Tshabalala-Msimang and MEC for Health endorse the proposition that even where the media has unlawfully obtained or accessed information of public concern, this factor is not necessarily of sufficient weight to restrain publication. This is surely right, though the media should take note that journalists and editors can still be held criminally liable and, in the criminal context, the public interest value of the information is likely to mitigate sentence, rather than to negate liability.[1]

Second, as illustrated most strikingly by the Prinsloo case, even public figures are entitled to object to the disclosure of intimate information, such as the graphic details and photographs depicting their sex lives. The intensity of the invasion of privacy has always played a role in balancing privacy and public interest.[2] To provide one example, a politician who packages himself to the public as happily married cannot complain if the media expose his extra-marital affairs, though he would be entitled to object to the publication of intimate photographs evincing the affair.[3]

Third, it is desirable that issues such as alleged hypocrisy on the part of public officials be properly ventilated and debated. Thus in Tshabalala-Msimang, the broader context of the article concerning the Health Minister's medical records was reportage by the Sunday Times that alleged that the Health Minister was an alcoholic coupled with her numerous public statements about the dangers of alcohol abuse.[4] Exposure of hypocrisy on the part of public officials or figures is quintessentially in the public interest; such publication serves the democracy and truth rationales for freedom of expression.[5]

[1] However, there is some merit in the proposition that as a matter of constitutional law, a public interest defence should operate in regard to criminal offences such as trespass that are committed by members of the media in the bona fide exercise of their right to inform the public on matters of public concern.

[2] See Neethling Law of Personality (supra) at 248.

[3] See, for example, Greeff v Protection 4 You (Pty) Ltd, Unreported, Transvaal Provincial Division (9 March 2007)(DVD containing footage of Springbok rugby players in the nude restrained); Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] 2 AC 457 (HL)('Campbell')(publication of photograph and details of drug addiction treatment not justifiable); Theakston v MGN Ltd [2002] EMLR 22 (Publication of article about role model's visit to brothel in the public interest, but photograph not justifiable); Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1 (Photographs of Princess Caroline depicting aspects of her daily life violated her privacy). Cf A v B plc [2003] QB 195 (CA)(Article concerning details of footballer's extra-marital affairs in the public interest).

[4] Tshabalala-Msimang (supra) at para 12.

[5] The recognition of the hypocrisy principle is well-rehearsed in English law. See, for example, Campbell (supra)(publication of allegation of drug addiction of model, where she had previously stated that she had no drug problem, in the public interest). Cf McKennitt v Ash [2007] EMLR 113 (CA) (alleged inconsistency with broad statements of aspirations of celebrity on her website not sufficient to permit book publisher to rely on public interest defence). See generally Milo Defamation (supra) at 144-54 (Arguing that one guiding principle when dealing with the private lives of public figures is the notion of trustworthiness in public life.)

Finally, as many of these observations illustrate, the status of the plaintiff is of crucial significance in reconciling the tensions between free speech and privacy.[1] In cases involving private figures, for instance, a publisher will need to ensure that it can point to the public interest value of the story to mount an argument that it was justifiable to identify the plaintiff, even though he or she is a private figure.[2] That task will be much easier in the case of people who are already public figures, particularly if they are government officials.

(c) Restrictions designed to serve the administration of justice

Speech concerning the judicial process is subjected to significant restrictions in our law. These restrictions hamper the ability of members of the public and the media to comment on the judiciary and its decisions or on forthcoming or on-going criminal or civil trials, and, in some instances, exclude the media and the public entirely from judicial proceedings. Restrictions such as these clearly impact upon the right to freedom of expression, but the assessment of whether the restrictions are justifiable is particularly fraught because, as with many other areas of free speech law, a number of competing values are implicated. For example, in the case of the sub judice rule, the right of an individual to a fair trial and to privacy may be undermined by adverse publicity, and, in the case of the offence of scandalising the court, the broader value of the maintenance of the administration of justice is at play.

The first major area of law of relevance we discuss here is the open justice principle — including broadcasting the courts and tribunals — and the exceptions to that principle. Thereafter, two areas within contempt of court law are analysed: the crime commonly known as 'scandalising the court' and the sub judice rule.

(i) The principle of open justice

'Every Court of justice is open to every subject of the King'.[3] So held Lord Halsbury in the locus classicus in English law that expostulated the principle of open justice.[4] In general, this principle has been followed in South African law; court proceedings are usually open to the public,[5] though numerous exceptions

[1] See, for example, M Tugendhat & I Christie The Law of Privacy and the Media (2002) 361-363; Neethling Law of Personality (supra) at 246-247; Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 416. However, the US approach, which justifies privacy invasion based on the 'newsworthiness' test, is over-broad and should be rejected. For a summary of US law in this regard, see P Siegel Communication Law in America (2002) 90-95.

[2] See, for example, NM v Smith (supra) at para 154 (The publisher could not justify the identification of three private figures who were HIV-positive as being in the public interest.) See also Peck v UK (2003) 36 EHRR 41 (CCTV footage of private figure who cut his wrists on a public street unjustifiable invasion of his privacy.)

[3] Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, 440.

[4] For a detailed discussion of the English position, see J Jaconelli Open Justice: A Critique of the Public Trial (2002). See also Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) 338-351.

[5] See, for example, Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959 s 16; Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 152; FC ss 34 and 35(3)(c); R v Maharaj 1960 (4) SA 256 (N); Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd v Registrar of Insurance 1966 (2) SA 219, 221 (W); Prinsloo (supra) at 462.

exist.[1] The leading case that articulates the principle of open justice in South African law is the decision of the Constitutional Court in South African Broadcasting Corporation Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others.[2] The case is discussed in greater detail below when we consider the broadcasting of court hearings.[3] Suffice to say for present purposes that the Court accepted that open justice is a constitutional principle that emerges from the co-incidence of a number of rights and values that are entrenched in the Constitution: the right to freedom of expression, especially the right of the public to receive information and ideas;[4] the rights to a fair criminal trial and public hearing;[5] and the foundational values of accountability, responsiveness and openness.[6] The Constitutional Court has also accepted the following laudatory rationales for the open justice principle:

> Closed court proceedings carry within them the seeds for serious potential damage to every pillar on which every constitutional democracy is based .... Seeing justice done in court enhances public confidence in the criminal-justice process and assists victims, the accused and the broader community to accept the legitimacy of that process. Open courtrooms foster judicial excellence, thus rendering courts accountable and legitimate.[7]

Open justice thus serves a number of the rationales that reflect the traditional justifications for freedom of expression:[8] it enhances the pursuit of truth; promotes democracy; allows the public to understand how courts work; facilitates the extension of courtroom debates to other areas of society;[9] and provides an outlet

[1] For some of the more important exceptions, see § 42.9*(c)*(ii) infra.

[2] 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC)('SABC v NDPP').

[3] See 'Broadcasting of enquiries and judicial proceedings' § 42.9*(c)*(iii) infra.

[4] SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 24.

[5] Ibid at para 30. For discussion of the open justice principle in the context of the rights to a fair civil hearing and criminal trial, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) 59-83 – 59-85; F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) 51-120 – 51-123.

[6] SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 32. See also ibid at paras 97-8 (Moseneke DCJ). The Court's recognition of the right to open justice as an independent right that is based upon other rights and values in the Constitution is regarded as a 'judicial innovation' by Robert Danay and Jake Foster, 'The Sins of the Media: The SABC Decision and the Erosion of Free Press Rights' (2006) 22 SAJHR 263, 572. Much international jurisprudence houses the principle within the right to freedom of expression. See, for example, H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) 168.

[7] Shinga v The State & Another 2007 (4) SA 611 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC) at paras 25-6 (Although these comments were made in the context of criminal proceedings, they apply with equal force in civil cases.) See also SABC v NDPP (supra) at paras 29-32 (Open courtrooms ensure accountability, limit high-handed behaviour by judicial officers, and prevent railroaded justice); ibid at para 139 (Sachs J)(there should be greatest degree of public involvement); S v Mamabolo (e-TV intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC) at para 29 (Openness ensures that citizenry know what is happening in courts so that they can discuss the conduct of courts). See, generally, Jaconelli (supra) at 34-48. For more on the principle of openness, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 31.7.

[8] See § 42.5 supra.

[9] See Named Person v Vancouver Sun 2007 SCC 43 ('Named Person') at para 81.

for the public to vindicate its sense of justice in regard to criminal and civil matters.[1]

To the extent that open discussion enhances the right to a fair criminal or civil trial, the right of the media to report on court proceedings and the litigant's rights go hand in hand. But the issue of open justice from the perspective of freedom of expression becomes most acute where these interests conflict, for example, when a litigant wishes the details of the proceedings to remain private, or where interests such as national security are invoked by the state. Where the state or parties to litigation do not wish the proceedings to be transparent, do the public and the media have a freedom of expression right — in its crystallized open justice form — to attend and report fully on the court proceedings?[2]

As the Constitutional Court has recently acknowledged,[3] the presumption should be in favour of open proceedings and full reportage.[4] That presumption should be rebutted only if cogent reasons exist that show why the desire of the state or the parties to keep information from the public should prevail.[5] Two High Court examples that emphasise this point of departure are worthy of mention; the first concerned privacy interests, and the second, nuclear secrets. In Prinsloo v RCP Media t/a Rapport, the applicants argued that the hearing of their application should take place in camera because of the salacious facts of the case.[6] Van der Westhuizen J held:

> Intimate personal details are often disclosed in courtrooms in front of members of the public and the media. This is unfortunate for the individuals involved, but their privacy is in such cases outweighed by values such that courts in a democratic country function with transparency, so that any member of the public can see that justice is being done. It is not

[1] Press-Enterprise Co v Superior Court of California 464 US 501, 509 (1984). For a useful analysis of how open justice celebrates these values, see I Cram A Virtue Less Cloistered: Courts, Speech and Constitutions (2002) Chapter 1.

[2] This raises the difficult theoretical point of whether the right to free speech envisages a positive obligation to provide access in this context. For some discussion on this point, see Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 339-340.

[3] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening as Amicus Curiae*)* 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC) at para 54 ('Independent Newspapers')('Ordinarily, the starting point is that court proceedings and so too court records must be open to the public'). This case is discussed in detail in § 42.9*(c)*(iii) infra.

[4] The principle of open justice has been extolled in numerous jurisdictions. For US law, see the US Supreme Court's decisions in Richmond Newspapers v Virginia 448 US 555 (1980) and Globe Newspaper Co v Superior Court 457 US 596 (1982). The Canadian Supreme Court has pronounced upon the importance of open justice on numerous occasions. See, for example, Canadian Broadcasting Corp v New Brunswick (Attorney General) [1996] 3 SCR 480 at para 22; Re Vancouver Sun [2004] 2 SCR 332 at para 23; Named Person (supra) at para 81.

[5] See Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 44-5 (Limitations on the open justice principle could occur by way of a law of general application (such as s 56 of the Childrens' Act 38 of 2005 which provides that proceedings of a childrens' court are closed), or may be attenuated by a court exercising its inherent power under FC s 173 to regulate its own process, in the interests of justice.)

[6] Prinsloo v RCP Media Ltd t/a Rapport 2003 (4) SA 456 (T). See § 42.9*(b)* supra, where this case is discussed in greater detail.

> uncommon for a nervous, embarrassed and emotionally fragile plaintiff in a divorce court to have to explain under oath in a courtroom filled with a large number of onlookers, how a spouse committed adultery or how alcoholism, drug abuse, family violence, or even incest wrecked a marriage, and for the victims of violent crime to have to explain in front of the public and the media how the death, rape or mutilation of oneself or a loved one, such as a child, was experienced and how it may have ruined people's lives.[1]

In the nuclear secrets case, S v Geiges,[2] the state sought an order under, inter alia, s 52(1) of the Nuclear Energy Act[3] that the trial of persons accused of smuggling nuclear technology be heard in camera. The effect of such an order would have been to exclude all members of the public (including the media) from the trial, prohibit the disclosure of the evidentiary record adduced at the trial, and to prevent the disclosure of the identities or identifying information of expert witnesses. The Court rejected the state's application. Labuschagne J affirmed that the public has a legitimate interest 'in all criminal trials and are entitled to be kept informed in that regard'. The Final Constitution requires courts to observe the principle of open justice in the conduct of proceedings, recognizes the central role of the media in ensuring open justice and permits 'only the narrowest demonstrably justifiable infringement of the right of access to open court proceedings'.[4] Significantly, the 'starting-point should … be that trial proceedings should be held in open court unless there are compelling reasons to close the doors of the court to the media and/or the public'.[5] Further, the blanket orders sought in regard to the names of witnesses and nuclear experts who would be testifying were clearly overbroad; all the State had done was to articulate a 'general apprehension of recruitment of the witnesses by elicit nuclear proliferation networks', without alleging or proving any causal link between the act of testifying and harm to the witnesses.[6] The state had also failed to distinguish between witnesses whose identity was already in the public domain and those that were not.[7]

The cases that we have discussed thus far concern the classic illustration of the open justice principle: that courts must be open to the public. One specific application of open justice that requires special mention is access to court documents. In the leading case, Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence, the Constitutional Court confirmed, for the first time in South African law, that '[f]rom the right to open justice flows … the right to have access to papers and

[1] Prinsloo (supra) at 462.
[2] [2007] ZAGPHC 46 ('Geiges').
[3] Act 131 of 1999.
[4] Geiges (supra) at para 61.
[5] Ibid at para 80. The Court also stated that it was 'probably obliged' to release non-sensitive documentation and evidence under the open justice principle. Ibid at para 71.
[6] Ibid at paras 74, 77.
[7] Ibid at para 79.

written arguments which are an integral part of court proceedings'.[1] The case concerned an application by a newspaper group to compel disclosure to the public of certain documents that formed part of the record of proceedings before the Constitutional Court, brought by the former Director-General of the National Intelligence Agency, Billy Masetlha, against the President of South Africa.[2] A day before the hearing of the Masetlha application, the Registrar of the Court was directed by the judges to remove the entire record, including the parties' written argument, from the Court's website and not to make them available to the public because certain of the documents in the record appeared to be classified on national security grounds. Independent Newspapers then moved an urgent application to access the written argument of the parties as well as the record of proceedings. The Court ruled that the record and written arguments be made available, but that any party who wished to object to the disclosure of any part of the record could do so within a certain time period. The Minister for Intelligence then objected to the disclosure of certain documents contained in the record, citing national security interests. The ultimate decision before the Court was whether the documents ought to be released in accordance with the principle of open justice, or whether they should remain secret on the grounds of national security.[3]

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 39. For foreign law recognising the same principle, see Edmonton Journal v Alberta (Attorney General) [1989] 2 SCR 1326 at para 86 ('Edmonton Journal'); Named Person (supra) at para 81. See also Nixon v Warner Communications Inc 435 US 589, 597 (1978)(general right to inspect and copy public records and documents including judicial records and documents); Press-Enterprise Co v Superior Court 478 US 1 (1986)(access to transcripts of preliminary hearing in criminal proceedings). Cf Chan U Seek v Alvis Vehicles [2004] EWHC 3092 (Ch) at para 30 (general tenor of cases is in favour of disclosure to the public of materials which through proceedings in open court have entered the public domain). In our view, rule 62(7) of the Uniform Rules of Court falls foul of the open justice principle in this context. It provides that 'any party to a cause, and any person having a personal interest therein, with leave of the registrar on good cause shown, may at his office, examine and make copies of all documents in such case'. This has been interpreted as precluding a stranger to the case (such as the media) from having access to the documents prior to the judgment. See, for example, Abt v Registrar of the Supreme Court (1899) 16 SC 476, 479 ('[C]ases which may never come into Court in no ways concern the public'); Transvaal Chronicle & Another v Roberts 1915 TPD 188, 192. There can be no justification for such a ban on access. The better approach is that adopted in the Rules of the Constitutional Court that permit any person to obtain such access on payment of the required fee. Rule 4(6).

[2] See Masetlha v The President of South Africa & Another 2008 (1) SA 566 (CC)(the former Director-General unsuccessfully challenged the suspension and termination of his employment contract.)

[3] The majority of the Court dismissed an interlocutory application by the newspaper group in which the group argued that its lawyers and senior editors should obtain access to the documents sought to be kept secret, on strict conditions of confidentiality, in order to prepare its case on the merits of the continued secrecy. The Court reasoned, inter alia, that 'the release of the restricted materials at the interlocutory stage would have created the untenable rule that when a member of the public questions the confidentiality of information kept by the state, she or he would in effect gain the right to receive the information in order to decide whether to prepare a court challenge'. Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 30. But see Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 137-49 (Yacoob J).

Moseneke DCJ's first significant ruling for the majority of the Court[1] was his rejection of the argument of the Minister for Intelligence that once documents have been properly classified under operative legislation as being harmful to national security, courts have no discretion to order the disclosure of such documents:

> The mere fact that documents in a court record carry a classification does not oust the jurisdiction of a court to decide whether they should be protected from disclosure to the media and public . . .. It follows that where a government official objects to disclosure of a part of the record before a court on grounds of national security, the court is properly seized with the matter and is obliged to consider all relevant circumstances and to decide whether it is in the interests of justice for the documents to be kept secret and away from any other parties, the media or the public.[2]

Moseneke DCJ also enunciated relevant factors that a court should take into account, which, we submit, should apply to any claim that court documents should be kept secret:

> [A] court will have regard to all germane factors which include the nature of the proceedings; the extent and character of the materials sought to be kept confidential; the connection of the information to national security; the grounds advanced for claiming disclosure or for refusing it; whether the information is already in the public domain and if so, in what circumstances it reached the public domain; for how long and to what extent it has been in the public domain; and, finally, the impact of the disclosure or non-disclosure on the ultimate fairness of the proceedings before a court. These factors are neither comprehensive nor dispositive of the enquiry.[3]

We submit that the factors set out by Moseneke DCJ in Independent Newspapers for assessing whether a court record should remain secret represent a reasonable

[1] Sachs J agreed with Moseneke DCJ's approach to the legal issues involved. Ibid at para 152. Yacoob J suggested that the majority's test for whether a court could limit the right of open justice — whether such a limitation was in the interests of justice — might not give appropriate protection to constitutional rights. Ibid at para 83. Van der Westhuizen J preferred a limitations test employing, by way of analogy, the factors set out in FC s 36. Yacoob, Sachs and Van der Westhuizen JJ dissented from the majority's conclusion on the facts that all but one of the documents objected to should remain secret. See further § 42.9*(g)* infra.

[2] Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 51 and 55. The Court also rejected a procedural solution, suggested by the Freedom of Expression Institute, including a requirement that courts hear submissions from interested parties before making a non-disclosure order. Although the Court agreed with the principles behind the procedure, it felt that it was better to leave the issue to the discretion of courts. Ibid at paras 57-58. While the benefit of the Freedom of Expression Institute's approach is that public participation in decisions to close proceedings or restrict access to documents is guaranteed, it is difficult to fault the logic of the Court that these salutary guidelines should not be elevated to inflexible rules of procedure. Courts should, however, as a default principle, strive to accommodate public participation in these contexts, to the extent possible. It is always competent, of course, for interested parties to intervene in court proceedings where the right to open justice is threatened, as in Independent Newspapers. Procedural safeguards in this context exist in Canadian and US jurisprudence. See In re Washington Post 807 F 2d 383, 391-392 (1986) (CA Fourth Cir); Named Person (supra) at para 51.

[3] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 55.

attempt to balance the competing interests at stake, against the background of a general principle of openness.[1]

We differ, however, with the judgment of the majority in its articulation of the relevant test for assessing whether courts may limit rights based on FC s 173 — the courts' inherent power to regulate their own process. We agree with Yacoob J that it is incongruous for Parliament to be held to a different (presumably higher) standard of justification — the limitations clause — and yet permit courts to 'limit rights more easily'.[2] There is in our view merit in Van der Westhuizen J's proposal that an exercise analogous to the limitations enquiry is required in this context.[3] The majority's approach to the facts of the case, especially in view of the detailed factual analysis of the documents concerned by Yacoob J,[4] is also open to criticism.

(ii) Restrictions on the open justice principle

There are many exceptional cases[5] — usually in the criminal law context — where the principle of open justice must give way: either by excluding the public (and the media) from court proceedings, or limiting reportage and access to documents in some way.[6] While many of these restrictions will withstand scrutiny — most obviously those that protect children who are either accused or

[1] See Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 153 (SachsJ)(openness 'is an integral part of the constitutional vision of an open and democratic society'.)

[2] Ibid at para 84.

[3] Ibid at paras 172-173 ('[T]he balancing of competing interests that has to be done is not unrelated to a consideration of the reasonableness and justifiability of the limitation of the right, as required by section 36'.)

[4] Ibid at paras 90-136.

[5] Even before the advent of the Interim Constitution, courts regarded restrictions on access or reportage as only justifiable in exceptional circumstances. See, for example, Botha v Minister van Wet en Orde & Andere 1990 (3) SA 937 (W)(Desirable for public to see how court dealt with order of detention in terms of Internal Security Act 74 of 1982; application for in camera hearing refused). See, generally, Geiges (supra) at paras 54-56.

[6] The courts' power to impose restrictions on access to proceedings is contained in various statutory and common law rules. For instance, in terms of Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ('CPA') s 153(1), a judge or magistrate has a discretion to exclude the public or any portion of the public from attending proceedings in the interests of state security, law and order, public morals or the administration of justice. Courts also have discretion to restrict access in order to protect witnesses (CPA s 153(2)) and the complainant (CPA s 153(3)). These restrictions generally serve legitimate societal objectives (though some of the concepts are ambiguous and questionable (for example, 'public morals')) and, provided they are applied correctly, are in our view not generally unconstitutional. Less easy to defend are those provisions that regulate what may be reported in open proceedings. See especially CPA s 154(2)(b)(prohibition on the publication of information related to offence of extortion or indecency before accused has pleaded); South African Police Services Act 68 of 1995 s 69 (offence to publish a photograph of person who is in custody pending (i) the decision to institute proceedings against him or (ii) the commencement of criminal proceedings in which he is the accused, until he pleads to the charge.)

witnesses in criminal proceedings[1] or a party or witness in civil cases,[2] as well as genuine concerns regarding national security[3] — each restriction will need to be tested on a case by case basis in regard to whether the restriction justifiably restricts freedom of expression.[4]

An example of a reporting restriction that has not survived constitutional scrutiny is the overbroad restriction on reporting information disclosed in divorce proceedings contained in s 12 of the Divorce Act.[5] In terms of this provision, all that may be reported in regard to a divorce hearing is the names of the parties, the fact that a divorce is sought and the court's order at the conclusion of the proceedings. In Edmonton Journal, the Canadian Supreme Court was concerned with a similar though in some respects less restrictive statutory provision — the provision in question allowed the publication of the names and addresses of parties and witnesses, a brief statement of the charges and defences, the legal submissions and the court's summing-up or judgment in divorce and related proceedings.[6] Cory J held that the provision had a 'sweeping effect':

> The dangers of this type of restriction are obvious. Members of the public are prevented from learning what evidence is likely to be called in a matrimonial case, what might be expected by way of division of property and how that evidence is to be put forward. Neither would they be aware of what questioning may be expected. . . .
>
> As well the comments of counsel and the presiding judge are excluded from publication. How then is the community to know if judges conduct themselves properly?[7]

The impugned provision in Edmonton Journal significantly reduced the openness of courts because it went further than was necessary to protect the privacy of persons involved in proceedings when less restrictive measures — such as granting a

[1] See CPA s 153(4) which provides that where an accused is under 18, the only people allowed at the trial are the accused, his legal representative, his parent or guardian, and any other person who is necessary or allowed by the court. See also Re Southam and the Queen (No 2) (1986) 53 OR (2d) 663 (CA)(a statutory provision that granted to a judge a discretion to exclude the press from attendance at trials of young offenders was upheld as a reasonable limitation upon free speech. The court stated obiter that an absolute ban would not have constituted a justifiable limitation.); SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 141 (Sachs J). Cf In re S (FC) (a child) [2005] 1 AC 593 (HL)(press could identify the (adult) defendant in a criminal trial even though this would also identify her child.)

[2] See General Law Amendment Act 68 of 1957 s 5(1).

[3] For extensive discussion on the English position, see Jaconelli (supra) at 130-55.

[4] Restrictions that will also pass the limitations analysis include rules that the identities of rape victims and other victims of sexual violence may not be divulged without the prior consent of the victim concerned. Cf Canadian Newspapers Co v Canada (A-G) [1988] 2 SCR 122, 52 DLR (4th) 690 (mandatory ban on publication of the names of complainants in sexual assault cases constitutes a reasonable limitation on freedom of expression; it furthers the legitimate interest in having complaints reported by protecting the identities of complainants); SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 141 (Sachs J).

[5] Act 70 of 1979.

[6] The impugned provision was section 30 of the Alberta Judicature Act, RSA 1980.

[7] Edmonton Journal (supra) at paras 88-89.

trial judge a discretion to prohibit publication or to hold in camera hearings where appropriate — existed.[1]

The South African High Court took a similar line when it declared s 12 of the Divorce Act unconstitutional in Mandel v Johncom Media Ltd.[2] Acting Judge Cassim held that s 12 contained what amounted to an absolute prohibition on court reporting that undermined 'the general rule that the courts are open to the public.... [Publication of matters] of public interest which are raised in a divorce action [even] where there are legitimate reasons for such issues to be raised in public are prohibited'.[3] The Court further held that its finding that s 12 is unconstitutional would not cause injustice, as judges retain a discretion to order the non-publication of 'material which unduly and unfairly infringes the private life of a litigant … Similarly, the rights of children are protected'.[4]

(iii) Broadcasting of enquiries and judicial proceedings

The principle of open justice postulates that members of the public or the media should in general be able to have access to court proceedings. How should courts assess a claim by a member of the broadcast media that it has a freedom of speech right to broadcast proceedings to the public via television or radio — and also, in this age of convergence, over the Internet?[5] A few variants on this controversial issue have been considered by South African courts. The first case, Dotcom Trading 121 (Pty) Ltd t/a Live Africa Network News v King NO & Others,[6]

[1] Edmonton Journal (supra) at para 102.

[2] [2008] ZAGPHC 36.

[3] Ibid at para 9.

[4] Ibid at para 12. The Constitutional Court has reserved judgment on proceedings for confirmation of the High Court's order of constitutional invalidity. See also, South African Law Commission Publication of Divorce Proceedings: Section 12 of the Divorce Act (Act 70 of 1979) Project 114 (August 2002) para 3.84 (Concludes that s 12 of the Divorce Act is overbroad). Cf Kerzner v Jonathan Ball Publishers (Pty) Ltd unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division (10 December 1997) 25 (S 12 not contrary to the Interim Constitution.)

[5] The argument that court proceedings should be televised has not been well-received internationally and, as a matter of principle, it constitutes a weak free speech claim. See Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 347. For a masterful survey of the position in comparative jurisdictions, see South African Broadcasting Corporation v Thatcher [2005] 4 All SA 353 (C) at paras 51-109 (Van Zyl J). In many jurisdictions, appeals to the right to televise as a matter of constitutional right have been rejected. See, for example, Petition No 2 of the BBC [2000] HRLR 423 (In Scotland, an application by the BBC to televise the Lockerbie bombing trial was rejected by the Scottish High Court of Judiciary); R v Squires (1992) 78 (3d) CCC 97 (A majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled that prohibiting the media from filming parties as they enter and leave court constitutes a justifiable infringement of free speech. Cf Phillips & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others 2001 (4) SA 849 (W)); BVerfGE 44 (2002)(The German Constitutional Court has also rejected arguments that a law prohibiting the filming of court proceedings is unconstitutional.) Even in the US, where cameras are routinely allowed into courts as a matter of state law, the First Amendment case for their presence has yet to be made.

[6] 2000 (4) SA 973 (C)('Dotcom'). For commentary on the case, see C Plasket 'Unconstitutional Administrative Action: The Case of the King Commission and the Media' (2001) 118 SALJ 659; DM Pretorius 'Freedom of Expression and the Broadcasting of Public Enquiries and Judicial Proceedings' (2006) 123 SALJ 40.

concerned arguments for live radio broadcasts of a topical commission of inquiry into match-fixing by the former South African cricket captain, Hansie Cronjé.[1] The full bench of the Cape High Court held that the prohibition by the chairperson of the direct radio transmission of proceedings constituted a limitation 'on what is essential to the activities of that medium of communication'. The judges were alive to the important differences between various media of communication: Unlike print media, radio permits not only the words spoken, but the emphasis, the tone of voice, the hesitations, etcetera to be recorded and communicated. Although the chairman's desire to ensure that witnesses would not be inhibited from testifying was laudable, he had nevertheless underestimated the importance of freedom of expression and had not exercised his discretion in accordance with the proportionality demanded by the Constitution's limitations analysis. In addition, the Court noted that the enquiry was dealing with an important matter of public interest and that radio constitutes the only access to information for many South Africans.[2] Moreover, the chairman had painted television and radio with the same brush where it would have been possible for him to impose restrictions that would render the presence of radio broadcasting and recording equipment less obtrusive.[3]

In our view, Dotcom was correctly decided on its facts. But the decision does not necessarily make the argument for televising courts and other proceedings stronger. Indeed, judges in a number of subsequent cases rejected applications that enquiries or criminal trials be televised. In South African Broadcasting Corporation v Public Protector, the national broadcaster, SABC, and a commercial broadcaster, e-TV, failed in their application to review the decision of a panel to disallow radio and television broadcasts of its public hearing into the acquisition by the government of arms and connected allegations of misconduct.[4] According to the Court, the panel had properly weighed the free speech concerns of the media against its obligation to protect the integrity of information and the interests of witnesses. Its resulting cautious approach could not be set aside on review.[5] An application by

[1] The enquiry was set up in terms of the Commissions Act 8 of 1947. Section 4 of this Act provides that commissions of enquiry are heard in public, though the chairman has a discretion to depart from this in whole or part.

[2] Dotcom (supra) at paras 57-60.

[3] Ibid at para 61.

[4] 2002 (4) BCLR 340 (T).

[5] Ibid at 353 (Bertelsmann J opined that he might have taken a different view had the matter been an appeal rather than a review. The court should have interrogated the reasoning of the panel more closely in relation to radio broadcasts; although much of the panel's reasoning might preclude television broadcasts, it is not clear why radio broadcasts should also have been banned, especially, as pointed out by the applicants, in circumstances where many South Africans cannot read. Ibid at 352. It is appropriate, as in Dotcom, for courts to be especially robust when scrutinising administrative action where fundamental rights are impinged. For further discussion, see JR de Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (Revised 1st Edition, 2005) 192-193. See also, generally, J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 62.)

e-TV to televise the high-profile criminal trial of businessman Shabir Shaik, former Deputy President Jacob Zuma's financial advisor, for corruption also failed, principally on the basis of the privacy interests of witnesses, who may have been intimidated or inhibited in giving evidence:

> Contrast [print publications] with a permanently-captured moment of inadvertent folly, embarrassment or humiliation that will appear time after time, if thought desirable, in the living rooms of the country's television watchers when every pause, every frown, every hesitation, every unguarded response or unavoidable disclosure of some private fact is preserved on tape or film for as long as thought desirable.[1]

The SABC achieved greater success in South African Broadcasting Corporation v Thatcher, which concerned the broadcasting of aspects of a court proceeding related to the alleged involvement of Mark Thatcher, the son of the former British Prime Minister, in an attempted coup in Equatorial Guinea.[2] The application was narrow in its scope: the SABC sought permission to broadcast an edited daily highlights package for purposes of delayed television news and current affairs programmes. Van Zyl J granted the application. The Court held that any limitation on the right of privacy of the litigants 'is reasonable and justifiable'. It was significant in this regard that the traditional arguments that applied against broadcasting court proceedings — that witnesses could be negatively influenced — did not apply on the facts, as the issue was to be decided as an opposed application on the papers.[3] Thus only an edited package of counsels' arguments and the delivery of judgment would be broadcast. 'On a case-by-case basis', van Zyl J concluded, a court should feel free, 'within its inherent power to arrange its own procedures, to allow, wholly or partially, the recording and televising of its proceedings'.[4]

As Thatcher indicates, while flexibility is the touchstone, the argument for televising courts is far stronger where what is sought to be broadcast is counsels' arguments and the ruling of the court rather than the testimony of witnesses; indeed, in that narrow context, it is difficult to conceptualise countervailing considerations that would rebut the right to televise. It is therefore disappointing that, even in this narrow context, both the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court provided little analysis of the substantive issues when they were finally called upon to decide the scope of a right to televise court proceedings.[5]

In South African Broadcasting Corporation Ltd v The National Director of Public Prosecutions,[6] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the SABC could not broadcast,

[1] Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Downer Unreported, Durban Local Division (12 October 2004) at 11. Squires J subsequently rejected a further application by e-TV for permission to make mechanical sound recordings of the trial for broadcasts. Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Downer unreported decision of the Durban Local Division (16 November 2004).

[2] [2005] 4 All SA 353 (C)('Thatcher').

[3] Ibid at paras 111-112.

[4] Ibid at para 115.

[5] We accept that the analysis of the Courts in this case was no doubt affected by the very short time periods within which both Courts prepared their judgments.

[6] [2006] ZASCA 90, [2006] SCA 89 (RSA)('SABC v NDPP SCA').

live and as edited highlight packages, on radio and television, the argument in Shabir Shaik's appeal before that Court.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal engaged in a balancing of rights analysis facilitated by the existence of s 173 of the Constitution which declares this court's inherent power to regulate its 'own process'.[2] Although there was no general rule when it came to a contest between the right to freedom of expression of the broadcaster, and the appellate litigants' fair trial rights, Howie P adopted the test that 'live or recorded sound broadcasting should not be allowed unless the court is satisfied that justice will not be inhibited'.[3] Given the 'long and demanding appeal … [and the fact that] there is a great deal at stake', to permit live television would add an 'inhibiting dimension' and create the 'material risk that justice will be impaired'.[4] The SABC appealed the decision to the Constitutional Court.

A majority of the Court, in a judgment handed down in an admirably short time,[5] elected not to interfere with the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision. It assumed, without deciding, that the right to freedom of expression includes a right to record and broadcast court proceedings.[6] The narrow issue, according to the majority of the Court, was whether the Supreme Court of Appeal's discretion as to how to discharge its responsibility of ensuring that proceedings before it were fair should be interfered with.[7] In the circumstances of an appeal from another court's decision not to allow broadcasting, the majority held that an appeal court should only interfere with the discretion in narrow circumstances, in part because the case required a value judgment from the original court.[8] The test was whether the Supreme Court of Appeal had committed a demonstrable blunder or reached an unjustifiable conclusion.[9] In the majority's view the test adopted by the Supreme Court of Appeal, far from being a demonstrable blunder, established an 'appropriate relationship of proportionality' between freedom of expression and the court's obligation to ensure that its proceedings are

[1] The trial judgment in Shaik is reported as S v Shaik [2005] 3 All SA 211 (C). Shaik ultimately failed in his appeal against his conviction before both the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court. S v Shaik 2007 (1) SA 240 (SCA); S v Shaik 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC).

[2] SABC v NDPP SCA (supra) at para 15.

[3] Ibid at para 20. As a matter of previous practice, the Supreme Court of Appeal had granted the broadcaster the right to make visual recordings without sound.

[4] Ibid at para 25. It also mattered to the Supreme Court of Appeal that, in Jacob Zuma's possible criminal trial, most of the witnesses whose testimony was led in the Shaik trial would need to give evidence; 'exposure of such witnesses … might cause them to refuse to testify in the Zuma trial'. Ibid at para 27.

[5] The Constitutional Court handed down judgment eight days after argument in order to ensure that the Shaik appeal before the SCA was not delayed.

[6] SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 25.

[7] Ibid at para 34.

[8] Ibid at para 40.

[9] Ibid at para 41.

fair.[1] The decision had been reached judicially and, therefore, could not be interfered with.[2]

The conservative approach adopted by the majority of the Constitutional Court, perhaps partly because of the time constraints under which it was operating, should be contrasted with the dissenting judgment of Moseneke DCJ.[3] The Deputy Chief Justice correctly identified the issue: the case was about a publication ban that 'silences speech. Images may flourish but the spoken word may not'.[4] In examining whether the Supreme Court of Appeal exercised its discretion properly, it was important to adopt the point of departure that the right to free speech would serve little purpose 'if the media, though entitled to convey information and broadcast footage and recordings, were not entitled to gather information, footage and recordings.'[5] Moseneke DCJ stressed that the vast majority of citizens prefer to rely on the media rather than personal attendance at court proceedings and receive news by means of radio and television.[6] The test adopted by the Supreme Court of Appeal privileged the right to a fair trial over open justice and free speech, 'which from the outset prejudices the rights of broadcasters'.[7] He dismissed the concern that fair trial rights would be in jeopardy because it had not been 'shore[d] up with facts'. In addition, less restrictive means existed to prevent any mischief at which the prohibition was directed.[8]

The judgment of Moseneke DCJ is to be preferred to that of the majority. With respect, the substantial deference accorded by the majority to the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal — which effectively foreclosed the Court's analysis of the substantive issues — resulted in an impoverished approach to the open justice and free speech issues that lay at the heart of the case.[9] It is precisely in the context of appeals and applications — where there is generally no oral testimony

[1] SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 46.

[2] Ibid at para 67. Langa CJ et al for the majority also commented in passing that the judiciary and the media should co-operate in regard to broadcasting court proceedings in the future, and suggested that coverage on a trial basis might be a starting point. Ibid at paras 71-72. 'It is . . . not in the interests of . . . the viewing public in general for the process to be impelled by a last-minute application followed by hastily improvised procedures'. Ibid at para 72.

[3] Mokgoro J concurred with the decision of Moseneke DCJ, and Sachs J essentially concurred in his reasoning, but agreed with the majority's order on account of the SABC's tardiness in bringing the application. For strident and persuasive criticism of the majority's decision, see Danay & Foster (supra) at 576-585.

[4] SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 83 (the SCA allowed visuals of the proceedings, unaccompanied by audio, to be recorderd for television).

[5] Ibid at para 96.

[6] Ibid at para 101. Ibid at para 133 (Mokgoro J)(Broadcast would 'bring the courtroom into their houses'); Ibid at para 140 (Sachs J).

[7] Ibid at para 103. Ibid at para 128 (Mokgoro J).

[8] Ibid at paras 106 and 110 ('There is no evidence that the [Supreme] Court [of Appeal] considered whether it could allow sound broadcast to some extent or under particular circumstances.')

[9] See Danay & Foster (supra) at 576 (Regard the majority's approach as 'a profound abdication of the responsibility to ensure that the rights enshrined in the Constitution are upheld'.)

— that the justifiable concerns about rights to fair trials hold little sway. As Sachs J put it: 'As a general rule . . . appeal courts are under a constitutional obligation to facilitate public understanding of how they work, and this ordinarily would require granting of full access to electronic media.'[1] Moseneke DCJ correctly recognised that when balancing open justice and freedom of expression with fair trial rights it is simply not enough to speculate as to what prejudice might result if appeals are televised.[2] As is consonant with a number of areas of our free speech jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court should rather have demanded cogent evidence as to the harm that televising proceedings would cause.[3]

(iv) Balancing freedom of speech against the administration of justice

There are a number of criminal offences that are variously described as contempt of court. Many of these, such as the disobeyance of orders of court, do not engage the right to freedom of expression, or, if they do impinge on free speech, are defensible.[4] There are, however, two variants of contempt of court that are clear restrictions on freedom of speech. These are the crimes of scandalising the court, and unfairly prejudicing legal proceedings (sub judice). Each of these will be considered in turn.[5]

(aa) Scandalising the court

In many other jurisdictions, the crime of scandalising exists in much the same form as it does in South Africa. The question of whether the crime is compatible with freedom of speech has been considered in a number of these jurisdictions.[6] The most speech-protective response to these challenges is unsurprisingly epitomised by the stance of the US Supreme Court. That Court requires that, in

[1] SABC v NDPP CC (supra) at para 148.

[2] Ibid at para 106 (Moseneke DCJ).

[3] Cf the markedly different and interventionist approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)('Midi Television') discussed in § 42.9*(c)*(vi)(bb) infra. See also Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) at § 42.9*(d)* infra.

[4] Examples of contempt restrictions on freedom of speech that are generally justifiable are the offences known as contempt in the face of the court, such as where a person in court threatens, insults or interferes with the judge. For a recent example of a case where the court overturned a contempt conviction, see Lewis v The State [2007] SCA 3 (RSA).

[5] At the outset, it is significant that, while there may be an overlap between the two crimes in some instances, the typical scandalising case concerns publications that do not comment upon specific pending court proceedings, but about litigation that has been completed or about the judiciary or individual judges in general. The right to comment about pending or current cases — limited by the sub judice rule — raises issues that are in many ways qualitatively different to those involved in the scandalising sanction, and hence will be treated separately.

[6] For a review of the legal position in England and Wales, Ireland, Germany, Austria, Belgium, France, Denmark, Iceland, the Netherlands, Italy, Greece, Russia and Hungary, see MK Addo (ed) Freedom of Expression and the Criticism of Judges: A Comparative Study of European Legal Standards (2000).

scandalising cases concerning pending or current proceedings, an exceedingly high threshold must be satisfied in order for the offence to be triggered. In Pennekamp v Florida,[1] Reed J adopted the clear and present danger test, namely that the evil consequences of the comment must be 'extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished'.[2] In relation to concluded proceedings, even unrestrained criticism will be protected.[3] The result is that a scandalising-type offence is effectively a dead letter in the United States.[4]

A similar approach to the US articulation of the clear and present danger test appears from the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in R v Kopyto.[5] The five-judge panel unanimously overturned a conviction for scandalising in circumstances where the accused, a solicitor for the failed litigant, said after the case, 'This decision is a mockery of justice. It stinks to high hell'. Two judges — Cory JA and Goodman JA — thought the offence could pass constitutional muster, provided that the threat to the administration of justice was real and substantial and constituted a present or immediate danger to the administration of justice.[6] One judge would have eradicated the offence in its entirety on constitutional grounds.[7] Dubin JA (Brooke JA concurring) articulated the offence as requiring a serious risk that the administration of justice would be interfered with. This test does not demand as much as the clear and present danger formulation, but nevertheless sets the threshold relatively high.[8]

The Supreme Court of Zimbabwe has conducted a thorough examination of whether the crime of scandalising infringes the right to freedom of expression entrenched in s 20(1) of the Zimbabwean Constitution.[9] In a well-reasoned judgment, the Court held that the 'serious risk' test that Dubin JA adopted in Kopyto reflected Zimbabwean law, and that this test had the result that the limitation on freedom of expression posed by the offence was reasonably justifiable in a democratic society.[10]

The Privy Council has also had occasion to assess the limits of scandalising-type offences in a number of cases; the lesson from these decisions appears to be

[1] 328 US 331 (1946).

[2] For the first articulation of the clear and present danger test see Schenk v US (supra) at 52. See further § 42.9*(g)* infra.

[3] Bridges v California 314 US 252, 273 and 291 (1941)('Bridges v California').

[4] B van Niekerk The Cloistered Virtue: Freedom of Speech and the Administration of Justice in the Western World (1987) 57. It is also significant that in the US, judges are generally elected, which enhances the argument that speech should in this context be given maximum protection. See I Cram A Virtue Less Cloistered: Courts, Speech and Constitutions (2002) 169.

[5] (1987) 47 DLR (4th) 213 ('Kopyto').

[6] Ibid at 241 (Cory JA), 263 (Goodman JA). Cf ibid at 282 (Dubin JA).

[7] Ibid at 255 (Houlden JA).

[8] Ibid at 285. Dubin JA and Brooke JA nevertheless did not consider that contempt of court in general constituted an infringement of freedom of expression.

[9] In re Chinamasa 2001 (2) SA 902 (ZSC)('Chinamasa').

[10] Ibid at 920-921.

that imputing improper motives to judges is particularly objectionable.[1] For example, in Badry v Director of Public Prosecutions of Mauritius, the Privy Council upheld a contempt conviction on the basis that the comments imputed improper motives to a judge who had dismissed a worker's compensation claim.[2] Finally, the European Court of Human Rights, in a few criminal libel cases, has upheld convictions of publishers for statements imputing incompetence or corruption on the part of judges, on the basis that the state has a legitimate interest in the protection of the reputation of its judges.[3] However, in general, this attitude 'sits uneasily alongside the Court's rhetoric about the importance of tolerating a broad range of political speech in a democracy'.[4]

In South Africa, the Constitutional Court has analysed the constitutionality of the crime of scandalising the court in one of its seminal free speech decisions, S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening).[5] Mamabolo, an official in the Department of Correctional Services, was convicted of contempt of court in the Pretoria High Court for making statements about an order of that court. The order concerned Eugene Terre Blanche, the notorious leader of the AWB (a right-wing political party), who had earlier been sentenced for attempted murder and assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm. Terre Blanche had been serving his gaol sentence for the assault offence while appealing to have the attempted murder conviction reduced to one of assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm. Because of Terre Blanche's belief that his release on parole in relation to the assault charge was imminent, he had applied for and been granted bail by Els J, pending the outcome of the attempted murder appeal. Mamabolo was quoted in a newspaper report as stating that Els J had acted erroneously by granting bail to Terre Blanche, because, according to the Department, Terre Blanche was not yet eligible for parole. Els J thereafter summarily tried and convicted Mamabolo, stating in his oral judgment: 'I have no doubt that this was a scandalous comment and it impugned on the integrity of this court'.

The Constitutional Court's judgment was authored by Kriegler J. The first major issue was the nature and purpose of the offence of scandalising the court. Kriegler J held that the judiciary is different from the other branches of government; it is an independent pillar of state, on an equal footing with the executive and legislative pillars of state in theory, but in terms of 'political, financial or military power it cannot hope to compete'.[6] It must rely instead on moral [1] See, for example, Ambard v Attorney-General for Trinidad and Tobago [1936] AC 322. See also Ahnee v DPP [1999] 2 AC 294.

[2] [1983] 2 AC 297.

[3] See, for example, Barfod v Denmark (1989) 13 EHRR 493; Prager and Oberschlick v Austria (1995) 21 EHRR. But see De Haes v Belgium (1998) 25 EHRR 1 (Allegations of political bias on the part of judges political opinion entitled to strong protection unless no factual basis.) In England, while the offence remains in existence, there has been no conviction for contempt on this basis since 1930. See, for example, R v Commissioner of Police, ex parte Blackburn (No 2) [1968] 2 QB 150 (Failed prosecution of Quintin Hogg QC for his article in Punch).

[4] Cram (supra) at 175.

[5] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC)('Mamabolo').

[6] Ibid at para 16.

authority. Hence, the confidence of the public is crucial for the proper functioning of the judiciary and, in turn, the preservation of rule of law.[1] The crime of scandalising is one of the devices that are necessary to 'protect the authority of the courts'.[2]

The Court emphasised that the offence had to be viewed as one that exists to protect the moral authority of the judicial process, rather than the dignity of the individual judicial officer.[3] More importantly for our purposes, the offence has to be viewed against the importance of freedom of expression in relation to the functioning of the courts. Free and frank debate about judicial proceedings is important for a number of reasons: for citizens to debate the conduct of their courts; to promote impartiality, accessibility and effectiveness of the judiciary; to act as a democratic check on the judiciary's power; and to promote peace and stability in society by convincing its members that the legal process is effective.[4]

It did not follow, however, that the crime of scandalising had no place in South Africa's constitutional democracy. The main issue is one of determining how a line between permissible comment on judicial affairs and comment that exceeds the bounds of permissibility should be drawn.[5] The recognition by the Constitution itself of the need to protect the dignity of the courts[6] meant that any argument that the crime of scandalising should either be jettisoned entirely or materially attenuated had to fail.[7] The clear and present danger test that had been adopted in the United States and also, in essence, by certain judges of the Ontario Court of Appeal, was therefore unacceptable in South African jurisprudence.

The Court further held that the focus should be on the consequences of the statement; the test is now 'whether the offending conduct, viewed contextually, really was likely to damage the administration of justice.'[8] This creative interpretation of the limits of the crime[9] allowed Kriegler J to conclude, in the part of his judgment that is of most practical importance, that the test for scandalising will not now lightly result in a conviction:

[1] Mamabolo (supra) at para 19.
[2] Ibid at para 20.
[3] Ibid at para 25. A judge is in the same position as anyone else in regard to the law of defamation; hence a judge may sue to protect his or her reputation in relation to any unlawful, defamatory publication. See, for example, Argus Printing (supra) at 29-30 (possible overlap with scandalising discussed by Corbett JA.)
[4] Mamabolo (supra) at paras 29-31.
[5] Ibid at para 38. Kriegler J concedes that drawing a clear line in this respect is impossible. Ibid at para 32.
[6] FC 165(4).
[7] Mamabolo (supra) at paras 38-39.
[8] Ibid at para 45.
[9] I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 394 (Regard this interpretation as a reading-down of the common law offence.)

> the scope for a conviction . . . must be narrow indeed if the right to freedom of expression is afforded its appropriate protection. The threshold for a conviction . . . is now even higher than before the superimposition of constitutional values on common law principles; and prosecutions are likely to be instituted only in clear cases of impeachment of judicial integrity.[1]

Although there would still exist a narrow category of 'egregious cases' where the crime could be committed, and this would limit the right to freedom of expression, the Court regarded this limitation as eminently justifiable. The narrowness of the category of cases to which the crime still applied, the fact that the language that would fall foul of the offence would need to be 'serious', and, finally, the importance of maintaining the integrity of the judiciary, meant that retaining the 'tightly circumscribed' crime of scandalising was appropriate.[2]

Sachs J authored a concurring judgment that is significant for its wide-ranging statements on free speech. The first important point that Sachs J made is that bruising criticism of the judiciary may lead to an improvement in the administration of justice, rather than undermining it. Sachs J then relied on an important argument that is often invoked in free speech jurisprudence, namely that the 'chilling effect' of a fear of being prosecuted for criticising the courts may increase the deterioration of the administration of justice.[3] The judge essentially agreed that the North American position should apply, namely that the expression must be likely to have an impact of 'a sufficiently serious and substantial nature as to pose a real and direct threat to the administration of justice'.[4] On the facts of the case, all the judges agreed that Mamabolo's conviction had to be quashed as the statements attributable to him did not impair the dignity of the judiciary.[5]

A number of points can be made about the Mamabolo decision. Kriegler J and Sachs J's decisions must be welcomed for their recognition that citizens have the right to engage in robust criticism of the judiciary, and for striking a more appropriate balance between freedom of expression and the administration of justice than had previously been the case under the common law. But in our opinion both judgments should have taken matters further. The crime of scandalising constitutes a severe restriction on free speech, precisely because speech concerning the judiciary is a quintessential illustration of political speech.[6] As has been argued above, political speech rightly receives extensive protection in our democracy.[7] The crime of scandalising is in principle analogous to the crime of sedition;

[1] Mamabolo (supra) at para 45.

[2] Ibid at para 48-9 (The Court also held that the summary procedure for the conviction of the accused was an unconstitutional infringement of the right to a fair trial set out in FC s 35(3).) Cf Lewis v The State [2007] SCA 3 (RSA).

[3] Mamabolo (supra) at para 70.

[4] Ibid at para 75.

[5] Ibid at para 61.

[6] Van Niekerk (supra) at 52 (Criticism of an office of public administration should never entail penal consequences in a functioning democracy.)

[7] See § 42.5 supra.

just as this crime is wholly incompatible with a commitment to freedom of expression, so too is the very existence of a crime of scandalising.[1] Although Kriegler J's reinterpretation of the crime, and his repeated observations that it is now to be narrowly construed, provide solace, the crime nevertheless remains in force, and the vagaries of its actus reus will inevitably portend an undesirable chilling effect on freedom of expression.[2] Thus, even the strict threshold test set out in the North American jurisprudence and effectively adopted by Sachs J, does not go far enough in protecting freedom of speech in this context. South Africa's history is replete with examples of how the sanction of contempt was employed by the apartheid state to stifle academic and media criticism.[3] The very existence of the crime of scandalising played a role in maintaining the hegemony of apartheid. This history should give pause to the proposition endorsed in Mamabolo that the sanction is necessary, even if only in egregious cases.[4] In any event, the fear that the administration of justice will be threatened by overly robust and ill-considered criticism is probably exaggerated. In the words of Cory JA of the Ontario Court of Appeal, 'the courts are bound to be the subject of comment and criticism. Not all will be sweetly reasoned. … But the courts are not fragile flowers that will wither in the heat of controversy.'[5]

Critics of the absolutist position advocated here — that there should be no crime of scandalising — might emphasise that Kriegler J's repeated articulation that the sanction for contempt should only apply in the most egregious of cases inevitably means that the crime will begin to gather dust. This response does not withstand scrutiny. Either the crime is justifiable in principle or it should be discarded. It is also significant that there have been at least two reported convictions for scandalising after Mamabolo. In one of these cases, S v Bresler & Another, the accused had mounted a racist attack on the (coloured) magistrate who had convicted his daughter of a traffic offence, writing, inter alia, that the magistrate was unqualified, insane and incompetent, and had applied 'bush law'.[6] While the accused's comments were clearly reprehensible, and would have provided solid grounds for a defamation action by the magistrate as well as a complaint before the Equality Court, the conviction for contempt of court was not, in our view, a [2] This remains the case even though a number of defences, such as truth for the public benefit and fair comment may apply. Mamabolo did not address these issues. Mamabolo (supra) at para 23. Just as the defence of truth does not save the constitutionality of a sedition offence, so the same can be argued of the offence of scandalising. See Sullivan (supra); Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 319 (Crime may be necessary in jurisdictions where judges are career civil servants or do not enjoy security of tenure).

[1] See further Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 319 (Argues that it is hard to distinguish attacks on the judiciary from political speech, which lies at the core of a freedom of speech guarantee.)

[3] See, for example, Van Niekerk (supra) at 59-60.

[4] Mamabolo (supra) at paras 76-77 (Point is eloquently expressed by Sachs J.)

[5] Kopyto (supra) at 227.

[6] 2002 (4) SA 524 (T).

justifiable restriction of free speech. As Satchwell J herself remarked, '[y]ou may hold that belief, no matter how farcical it is, no matter how grotesque it is, no matter how offensive it may be to this Court or to anyone else. This is a democracy and you are entitled to your views and your opinions. You are as entitled to be a racist as the next person is entitled to be a communist or another a liberal.'[1]

In the second post-Mamabolo case, S v Moila, the accused had alleged that two judges of the High Court were, inter alia, biased, racially intolerant, and guilty of clandestine collusion and dishonesty.[2] The Court held that accusations that a judge is guilty of personal favouritism and is corrupt have a tendency to bring the administration of justice into disrepute; the allegations 'amounted to unbridled vituperative attacks on the Judges … in which they are vilified and held up to public obloquy for making findings that did not suit the accused'.[3] The facts of the case demonstrated to the Court 'the need for the retention of this form of contempt of court'.[4] While it is easy (and correct) to condemn the behaviour of the accused in this case, it is submitted that it is constitutionally suspect to employ the heavy hand of the criminal law to punish such speech.

The fact that at least two successful reported prosecutions for scandalising have occurred after Mamabolo should give pause to the view that the crime will only be invoked infrequently. We submit that to support the existence of the crime in any incantation is to countenance a regime where a form of seditious libel is acceptable. If we are correct in this regard, the importance of free speech for democracy impels us to reject such a proposition.

(bb) The sub judice rule

Rules that prevent the prejudicing of pending proceedings traditionally require the courts to balance the right of freedom of expression with the right of the litigant to a fair criminal or civil trial or hearing. These latter rights also receive protection under the Constitution.[5] One rationale[6] for the sub judice rule is that prejudicial

[1] S v Bresler and Another (supra) at 534. But Satchwell J's later comments undermine this proposition: 'But, when you express those views in public, when you act upon them and when your behaviour and actions impact upon other persons, then this Court is entitled to and will examine your actions to determine whether any offence has been committed'. Ibid.

[2] 2006 (1) SA 330 (T).

[3] Ibid at 346-347.

[4] Ibid at 348.

[5] FC ss 34 an 35. See generally J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59; F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51.

[6] Another common rationale for the sub judice rule is the general objection to trial by the media. See generally Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 323-328. This consideration certainly weighed with the House of Lords in one of the leading cases. Attorney-General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1974] AC 273. But this rationale lacks a principled basis. See also Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 326 ('the view that the press is usurping the functions of the courts will rarely be sustainable'.) To the extent that the rationale dissolves into the proposition that the integrity and reputation of the courts need protection from adverse publications, similar objections can be made as apply to the offence of scandalising. See § 42.9*(c)*(iv)(aa) supra.

publicity may impact on the litigants' case, principally by influencing the judges or the jury deciding the case,[1] though also, more generally, by prejudicing the administration of justice.[2] The rationale that argues that prejudicial publicity will influence decision-makers is stronger where juries as opposed to judges decide cases. In so far as judges are concerned, the argument that prejudicial publicity might influence judges cannot be sustained on policy grounds without conceding that it would then be 'impossible to find an impartial judge for a high profile case'.[3] Hence the argument based on prejudicial impact on the decision-maker cannot justify sub judice restrictions in South Africa, where there is no jury system.[4] On the other hand, it is conceivable that publicity concerning, say, the identity of the accused where identity is in issue, or details concerning witnesses, who might then be intimidated, may undermine the administration of justice.[5] We submit that the many circumstances in which the administration of justice could be interfered with in regard to a pending or current case, justify the retention of the rule, provided that the appropriate constitutional test is crafted. We revert to the appropriate test below.

The balance between the right to free speech and the litigant's right to a fair trial is resolved differently across various jurisdictions. The leading case in England is Attorney-General v Times Newspapers Ltd where the plaintiffs in pending civil litigation (before a judge and not a jury) alleged that they had been born with deformities as a result of their mothers' consumption of a drug called Thalidomide.[6] They alleged that the drug had been manufactured negligently by the defendants. The Sunday Times, which had previously published an article on the case, wished to run another article that effectively imputed negligence to the defendants. The Attorney General obtained an injunction preventing this article from being published on the grounds that it would constitute a contempt of court. The case eventually reached the House of Lords which agreed with the

[1] G Robertson QC & A Nicol Media Law (4th Edition, 2002) 346.

[2] H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) 247.

[3] Banana v Attorney-General 1999 (1) BCLR 27, 36 (ZS)(only remote possibility of judge being influenced by extraneous matter; assessors in a similar position). On the other hand, the recent controversy over the prosecution's phrase 'generally corrupt relationship', which the media repeated extensively and which the SCA wrongly attributed to the trial court in describing the relationship between Shabir Shaik and Jacob Zuma, arguably illustrates that even appeal judges may be subconsciously influenced by publicity. See Shaik v The State (2) [2006] SCA 134 (RSA) at para 8.

[4] See Chinamasa (supra) at 923 (only remotest possibility exists of judge being consciously or subconsciously influenced by extraneous matter). Even in the context of juries, this justification for the sub judice rule may be challengeable. Recent studies in New Zealand and Australia suggest that the impact of prejudicial media coverage on jury decisions is minimal. See Fenwick & Phillipson (supra) at 272-273. On the empirical research in the US, see Fenwick & Phillipson (supra) at 275.

[5] See, for example, C Cleaver 'Ruling Without Reasons: Contempt of Court and the Sub Judice Rule' (1993) 110 SALJ 530, 534.

[6] [1974] AC 273.

Attorney General on the basis that the article prejudged the issues in pending litigation, even though there was little likelihood of the article influencing the judges that would hear the action.

The Sunday Times appealed to the European Court of Human Rights.[1] That Court held that the conviction for contempt violated the right to freedom of expression in art 10 of the ECHR and that the blanket prejudgment test applied by some of the judges in the House of Lords was not necessary in a democratic society for maintaining the authority of the judiciary. The Court noted that the debate about Thalidomide was a matter of undisputed public concern, the publications had been balanced and couched in moderate terms, and there was little possibility of the judges being influenced by the publications.[2] Following this defeat in Strasbourg, the British government enacted the Contempt of Court Act 1981, which sought to address the deficiencies of contempt law. Section 2(2) of this Act states that contempt is committed where a publication creates a substantial risk that the course of justice will be seriously impeded or prejudiced.[3]

The Canadian Supreme Court's jurisprudence in regard to the sub judice form of contempt is strikingly similar to the test set out in the UK's Contempt of Court Act. In Dagenais, the Court held that a proper balancing between the Canadian Charter rights to a fair trial and to freedom of expression requires that a publication ban on media publicity is only permissible where the ban is necessary to prevent a real and substantial risk to the fairness of the trial and where reasonably available alternative measures will not prevent the risk.[4]

The US Supreme Court has adopted the clear and present danger test: is there such a danger that the administration of justice will be seriously prejudiced?[5] In the leading case of Bridges v California, the Supreme Court held that a newspaper editorial that urged that a sentence of imprisonment should be meted out to union members who had assaulted non-union employees, could not be punished.[6] The position with respect to publication bans is even more onerous. In Nebraska Press Association v Stuart, the Supreme Court ruled that a trial court's

[1] (1979) 2 EHRR 245.

[2] Cf Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454 at para 50 (the Court upheld a conviction of a journalist for suggesting that a politician facing tax evasion charges was guilty; the article was unbalanced and there was a probability that it would influence the lay judges that would hear the matter.)

[3] For a full discussion of the Contempt of Court Act, 1981, and how it attempts to address the European Court of Human Rights' concerns in Times Newspapers, see Fenwick and Phillipson (supra) at chapter 6.

[4] (1995) 120 DLR (4th) 12 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 835, 881. These alternative measures include changing venue, postponing the trial until the impact of pre-trial publicity has eroded, and sequestering the jury during the trial. A similar test applies in Australian law. See Hinch v Attorney-General (Victoria) (1987) 164 CLR 15. See also S Walker 'Freedom of Speech and Contempt: The English and Australian Approaches Compared' (1991) 40 ICLQ 583.

[5] See generally DR Pember & C Calvert Mass Media Law (2007) Chapter 11.

[6] Bridges v California 314 US 252 (1941).

decision to prohibit the publication of confessions or admissions given by the accused and other prejudicial evidence in a high profile murder trial infringed the First Amendment.[1] Although the Court accepted that prior restraints in this context might be competent in some circumstances, a trial court is under a very heavy burden to show that the order was necessary to avoid the harm to the administration of justice.[2]

Closer to home, the Lesotho High Court considered the sub judice rule against the importance of free speech in *Moafrika Newspaper re: rule nisi (*R v Mokhantso & Others).[3] A criminal trial was in progress concerning the murder of the Deputy Prime Minister a number of years before. The Moafrika newspaper published a caption alleging that the murderers of the Deputy Prime Minister had not been arrested or charged. This suggested that the present accused had not committed the murder. Peete J called on the newspaper to show cause why the newspaper should not be punished as having breached the sub judice rule. On analysis, Peete J decided that the caption, even though 'seemingly outrageous, offensive or intemperately worded', was expressed on a matter of public interest and came within the protection of the constitutional right of free speech.[4] On the facts, there was no real possibility of the judge being consciously or subconsciously influenced by the caption[5] and neither did it impugn the authority or dignity of the court.[6] The court opined that courts should be disinclined to be seen to gag or muzzle the media and, while the sub judice rule was necessary, it only protected against publications that constituted a substantial risk of prejudice or interference with court proceedings.

Now to the position in South Africa. Historically, the sub judice rule proscribed publications where, in the words of the Appellate Division in S v Van Niekerk, 'the statement or document in issue tends to prejudice or interfere with the administration of justice in a pending proceeding'.[7] In the other leading case, S v Harber, Van Heerden JA confirmed that the question of whether the tribunal was in fact likely to be influenced by the publication was irrelevant.[8] The question

[1] 427 US 359 (1976).

[2] One point that remains unclear in the US, however, is whether this protective regime is limited to media publications. The Supreme Court has, for instance, upheld the conviction of a litigant's lawyer who made statements outside court that were substantially likely to materially prejudice the proceedings. Gentile v State Bar of Nevada 501 US 1030 (1991). In this context, the First Amendment's demands are less exacting.

[3] 2003 (5) BCLR 534 (LesH)('Moafrika').

[4] Ibid at para 23. This right is protected under s 14 of the Lesotho Constitution 1993.

[5] Ibid at para 21 (The judge conceded that this was 'despite multitudinous misgivings which formerly crossed my mind when I first read the caption after this trial had begun.')

[6] Ibid at para 25. This appears to be a consideration of the 'scandalising' form of contempt. See § 42.9*(c)*(iv)(aa) supra.

[7] S v Van Niekerk 1972 (3) SA 711, 724 (A)('Van Niekerk'). This test was also adopted in S v Harber & Another 1988 (3) SA 396, 419 (A)('Harber').

[8] Harber (supra) at 419.

is whether if the facts set out in the publication 'were to be accepted by the tribunal they could influence the proceedings before it'.[1] Applying this test, the Appellate Division in that case confirmed the conviction of the editor of The Weekly Mail for contempt in regard to an article published during the course of the Delmas treason trial in 1986; the article in question, amongst other things, listed '[n]ew evidence which could shake the State's case'.

The sub judice rule as formulated in the Van Niekerk and Harber cases constituted a clear and unjustifiable restriction on freedom of expression;[2] any controversial speech on current and pending civil and criminal cases — including appeals — was effectively banned. It is therefore of great moment that in a recent decision the Supreme Court of Appeal effectively jettisoned the Van Niekerk and Harber tests and brought our law into line with the position in other jurisdictions such as England, Canada and Zimbabwe. Although dealing with an application for a prior restraint, the ruling in Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) is of clear application to both pre- and post-publication contempt of court proceedings.[3] e-TV, a commercial broadcaster, wished to broadcast a documentary relating to a pending criminal case that had attracted wide publicity: the 'Baby Jordan' murder.[4] The documentary included interviews with persons who were likely to be state witnesses in the prosecution. The DPP sought an interdict permitting it to view the documentary in order to determine whether the programme would prejudice the forthcoming criminal trial, and if necessary, thereafter to bring further legal proceedings to interdict the broadcast. The Cape High Court granted the interdict.[5] On appeal, Nugent JA, for a unanimous bench, quashed the interdict.[6] The right of e-TV to broadcast the documentary had to be weighed against the common-law contempt rule that the proper administration of justice may not be prejudiced or interfered with, as buttressed by the constitutional rights to fair civil hearings and criminal trials.[7] 'What is … relevant', Nugent JA continued, 'is to determine when the risk of

[1] Harber (supra) at 420. Moreover, although the media are not strictly liable for contempt, negligence on the part of an editor suffices. Ibid at 418.

[2] The approach historically taken by the South African courts was rejected as encroaching too deeply into freedom of expression by the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe. S v Hartmann & Another 1984 (1) SA 305, 311 (ZS)(proper test for contempt of court whether real risk that publication likely to prejudice fair trial; approach in Van Niekerk too restrictive of free speech). See also Moafrika (supra) at para 11. For further criticism, see G Marcus 'Freedom of Expression under the Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 140; G Hill 'Sub judice in South Africa: Time for a Change' (2001) 17 SAJHR 563.

[3] 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)('Midi Television').

[4] One reason for the significant public interest in the trial was the factual matrix. One of the accused was the former girlfriend of Baby Jordan's father; she was ultimately found guilty of murder, having engaged assassins to murder Baby Jordan.

[5] Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) v Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV [2006] 2 All SA 286 (C).

[6] The case had been overtaken by events (the accused had all been convicted and e-TV had broadcast the documentary), but the Court nevertheless thought that the case raised 'important questions of law on which there is little authority'. Midi Television (supra) at para 4.

[7] Ibid at para 12.

prejudice will be sufficient to constitute an interference with the administration of justice that justifies a corresponding limitation being placed on press freedom.'[1] The Court articulated the new rule in terms that are solicitous to free speech:

> In summary, a publication will be unlawful, and thus susceptible to being prohibited, only if the prejudice that the publication might cause to the administration of justice is demonstrable and substantial and there is a real risk that the prejudice will occur if publication takes place. Mere conjecture or speculation that prejudice might occur will not be enough. Even then publication will not be unlawful unless a court is satisfied that the disadvantage of curtailing the free flow of information outweighs its advantage. In making that evaluation it is not only the interests of those who are associated with the publication that need to be brought to account but, more important, the interests of every person in having access to information. . . . [I]f a risk of that kind is clearly established, and if it cannot be prevented from occurring by other means, a ban on publication that is confined in scope and in content and in duration to what is necessary to avoid the risk might be considered. [2]

On the facts, the Court concluded that there were no grounds for apprehending that the broadcast would be unlawful; the arguments that there might be discrepancies between what state witnesses said in their interviews with e-TV and what they told the police, and that their safety might be endangered, were 'no more than conjecture that falls altogether short of justifying an outright ban on publication'.[3] In any event, no law obliged e-TV to furnish the proposed broadcast to the DPP prior to it being broadcast: '[t]he law generally allows freedom to publish and freedom is not subject to permission.'[4]

This momentous decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal has radically altered our contempt of court law. Its significant impact can be illustrated with reference to the facts of the Midi Television case. Prior to Midi Television publishing interviews with witnesses before their testimony in court constituted a classic instance of a breach of the sub judice rule.[5] In Midi Television, the Court insisted that conjecture as to whether this would result in prejudice to the trial would not be accepted; proof of a real risk of demonstrable and substantial prejudice will be demanded as a threshold test. The Court went further than simply adopting the real risk test: even if the threshold real risk test is established, 'the disadvantage of curtailing the free flow of information must outweigh its advantage', which in turn requires attention to be focused on the right of the public to receive the information. Nugent JA's decision gives necessary and long-overdue breathing space to the media in reporting on pending proceedings.[6]

[1] Midi Television (supra) at para 13.
[2] Ibid at para 19.
[3] Ibid at para 22.
[4] Ibid at para 25.
[5] See, for example, Y Burns Communications Law (2001) 229.
[6] Apart from the recasting of the actus reus of the crime, there are other areas of contempt law that could be used to ensure that freedom of expression is not unjustifiably restricted. For instance, the mens rea requirement should be intention, and courts should in this regard reject the negligence standard applied to editors in Harber. Moreover, there is merit in the development of a public interest defence; where a story that would otherwise constitute contempt is overwhelmingly in the public interest, the publisher should escape liability. Cf Attorney-General v Times Newspapers [1973] QB 710, 739-740 (Lord Denning). See also Walker (supra) at 598-599.

(d) Intellectual property restrictions

One area of law that has traditionally enjoyed something of an immunity — even to a degree in the US — from the impact of freedom of speech principles is the law of trademarks and copyright, and related rights. This is surprising; as we have seen, even fundamental human rights such as reputation, privacy and the right to a fair trial have to be balanced against free speech considerations. This 'immunity' for intellectual property law is now breaking down as aspects of this law are being subjected to restrictions to cater for freedom of expression. This has happened in South Africa in what is now one of the leading cases on the relationship between freedom of speech and trademark law in the English-speaking world, the Constitutional Court's decision in Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a SABMark International.[1] This case is analysed next. Thereafter, the focus shifts to copyright law and especially a few UK cases where the defences to copyright infringement have been revisited from the perspective of freedom of speech.

(i) Parodying famous trademarks[2]

In Laugh It Off, the business of the applicant ('Laugh It Off') consisted of altering the images and words on trade marks and printing them onto T-shirts which were then sold for profit. The respondent in the case ('SAB') was the holder of the trademark for Carling Black Label beer, one of the leading beer products in South Africa. The applicant had adapted the respondent's trade mark on one of its T-shirts by changing the wording 'Black Label' to 'Black Labour', 'Carling Beer' to 'White Guilt', 'America's lusty lively beer' to 'Africa's lusty lively exploitation since 1652', and 'Enjoyed by men around the world' to 'No regard given worldwide'.

SAB sought an interdict against the applicant on the basis that it had infringed the respondent's trade mark by violating s 34(1)(c) of the Trade Marks Act.[3] This section provides that a trade mark may be infringed by the unauthorized use in the course of trade of a identical or similar mark, provided the trade mark is well known and the use of the mark would be likely to 'take unfair advantage of, or be detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the registered trade mark'. Laugh It Off's argument that s 34(1)(c) did not oust its constitutional right to comment on or make fun of trade marks and brands did not find favour with either the High Court[1] or the Supreme Court of Appeal,[2] both of which granted SAB relief.

[1] 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC)('Laugh It Off'). For commentary on the decision, see T Illsley 'How to Tell a Take-Off from a Rip Off: Trade Mark Parody and Freedom of Expression in South Africa' (2006) 22 SAJHR 119; BR Rutherford 'Trade-mark Protection and Freedom of Expression' (2006) 18 SA Merc LJ 355; W Alberts 'The Future of Trade Mark Dilution in South Africa' (2006) TSAR 212; G Devenish 'We Are Amused: Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International' (2005) 122 SALJ 792; J Brickhill 'Breaking Down the Boardroom Doors with a Snigger and a Smirk — Laugh It Off Laughs Last' (2006) 21 SAPL 214.

[2] Apart from parodies and satires in respect of trademarks, another area of trademark law that may give rise to free speech concerns is where a trader employs the trademark of his competitor for purposes of comparative advertising. See, for example, Boehringer Ingelheim Ltd & Others v Vetplus Ltd [2007] FSR 29 (CA)(No doubt that freedom of expression is engaged in a comparative advertising case.)

[3] Act 194 of 1993.

Harms JA in the Supreme Court of Appeal accepted that the statutory provision in issue had to be 'interpreted in the light of the Constitution and its application must be such that it does not unduly restrict a party's freedom of expression', and that this required 'the weighing-up of the freedom of expression and the trademark owner's rights of property and freedom of trade, occupation or profession'.[3] It was particularly at the stage where the trade mark owner must show unfair detriment that concerns relating to free speech may be taken into account.[4] The key issue was whether the use by Laugh It Off would be likely to take unfair advantage of, or be detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the Black Label mark, and this depended mainly on its message. The Court accepted that the message created the impression in the mind of the public that SAB has always been and still is guilty of exploiting its black labour.[5] This message is materially detrimental to the repute of the trademarks concerned.[6] Harms JA then considered what he termed 'the freedom of expression justification'.[7] Although T-shirts 'provide a powerful medium for making socio-political comments',[8] Laugh It Off's right to free speech was not unjustifiably curtailed by the statutory provisions as it 'may declaim the message about black labour and white guilt from rooftops, pulpits and political platforms; and it may place the same words (without appropriating the registered mark's repute) on T-shirts, and sell them'.[9] Even if Laugh It Off's T-shirt could be regarded as a parody, that on its own could not be regarded as a defence to trademark infringement but merely a relevant factor to be put in the balance.[10] On the facts, Laugh It Off had not exercised but abused its right to freedom of expression.[11]

Happily, however, the last laugh in the case belonged to Laugh It Off. The Constitutional Court unanimously rejected Harms JA's approach and refused SAB the interdict it had sought. The Court explained that s 34(1)(c) of the [1] SAB International t/a Sabmark International v Laugh It Off Promotions [2003] 2 All SA 454 (C).

[2] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International 2005 (2) SA 46 (SCA)('Laugh It Off SCA').

[3] Ibid at paras 20-21.

[4] Ibid at para 23. Paradoxically, Harms JA does not take this point to its logical conclusion in his decision, but treats freedom of expression as an independent issue.

[5] Ibid at para 26.

[6] It follows that Harms JA restricted his analysis to the 'likely to be detrimental to the repute of a registered trade mark' aspect of s 34(1)(c). His decision (and that of the Constitutional Court on appeal) thus did not concern the alternative bases for infringement under the section, namely 'likely to take unfair advantage of' and the 'distinctive character' aspects to the section.

[7] Laugh It Off SCA (supra) at para 28.

[8] Ibid at para 29.

[9] Ibid at para 30.

[10] Ibid at para 37.

[11] Ibid at para 41.

Trade Marks Act introduced the principle of dilution and serves a vital purpose of protecting the unique identity and reputation of the mark, which clearly underpins the economic value that inheres in the selling power of the mark.[1] The form of dilution in casu was the alleged tarnishment of the trade mark by Laugh It Off creating unfavourable associations with the trade mark.[2]

The approach taken by Harms JA was rejected on a number of grounds. First, as a matter of methodology, Harms JA had wrongly followed a two-stage approach, enquiring first whether an infringement of the s 34(1)(c) had taken place, and only thereafter whether freedom of expression justified the infringement. This approach is flawed because a finding of unfair use or likelihood of detriment to the repute of the trade mark is intimately connected with whether the expression is protected by FC s 16(1) and therefore effectively prevented a proper interpretation of s 34(1)(c) in light of the Constitution.[3] Although the Court held that s 34(1)(c) limits the right to free expression by ousting certain expressive conduct, the terms of the dispute before it — Laugh It Off had not challenged the constitutionality of the section — required the Court to assume that the limitation was reasonable and justifiable and compelled a construction of the section that was most compatible with freedom of expression.[4] In doing so '[c]ourts must', Moseneke J noted, 'be astute not to convert the anti-dilution safeguard of renowned trade marks usually controlled by powerful financial interests into a monopoly adverse to other claims of expressive conduct of at least equal cogency and worth in our broader society'.[5]

Moseneke J for the Court further held that 'unfair detriment' will need to be assessed on a case by case basis, but the general principle is that the trademark owner bears the burden to demonstrate likelihood of substantial harm or detriment which amounts to unfairness.[6] Harms JA's decision inferred detriment solely on the basis of the meaning that the judge had attributed to the message on the T-shirts. As evidence, however, this meaning was 'at best scant and unconvincing as an indicator of substantial economic harm'.[7] Indeed, even if the message is unsavoury, unwholesome or degrading, Moseneke J held that, in general, the message should be protected by the free speech clause.[8] Thus a claim under s 34(1)(c) must go further than showing some notional or assumed harm to the

[1] Laugh It Off (supra) at para 40.
[2] Ibid at para 41 (Moseneke J observes that this differs from another form of trade mark dilution, that of blurring, which occurs where the distinctive character of the trademark is weakened; with tarnishment, on the other hand, the object of protection is the repute of the mark.)
[3] Ibid at para 44. Harms JA had suggested the same approach earlier in his judgment, but seems to have ultimately opted for the two-stage approach. Laugh It Off SCA (supra) at para 23.
[4] Laugh It Off (supra) at para 48.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at paras 49-50 (our emphasis).
[7] Ibid at para 55.
[8] Ibid.

general reputation of the trademark owner;[1] what has to be proved is the substantial likelihood of economic and trade harm.[2] There was no evidence that the message on Laugh It Off's T-shirts was likely to tarnish the selling power of SAB's trademark.[3] Because this threshold had not been met by SAB, Moseneke J considered that it was unnecessary to assess whether the message conveyed by the T-shirt amounted to parody,[4] although he noted that the fact that a work is parody will be a relevant though not decisive factor in determining whether the use of the senior work is fair for purposes of s 34(1)(c).[5]

Sachs J felt 'that something more needs to be said'.[6] The judge thought that the appeal should be upheld not just on the 'clip-board evidence' basis sanctioned by Moseneke J — although he concurred in Moseneke J's judgment. Rather, the issue that lay at the heart of the case was that of the constitutional value of parody. Sachs J agreed with Moseneke J that classifying a message as a parody will be a factor in the overall analysis of whether, in the specific context, an independent observer 'would say that the harm done … to the property interests of the trademark owner outweighs the free speech interests involved'.[7] Apart from the nature of the message as parody, other factors that are relevant (though not decisive) will be whether the activity is primarily communicative or primarily commercial; whether the message could have been conveyed by means other than parody, bearing in mind that the medium could well be the message; the actual medium used and its context; and whether the parody is deemed unsavoury.[8] On the facts, Sachs J held that the only possible complaint SAB could have from a trademark law perspective was that the T-shirts negatively impacted on the image of Black Label beer. But 'it is difficult to imagine that black working class drinkers would raise an eyebrow at the suggestion that together with virtually every other enterprise of the time, SAB benefited from the use of cheap black labour'.[9] SAB would in any event have other remedies at its disposal even if Laugh It Off's use had harmed the repute of the beer, such as injurious falsehood and defamation.[10] On the facts, the scales came down clearly in favour of Laugh It Off; no harm

[1] Under the law of defamation, defamatory statements — statements that, objectively viewed tend to lower the estimation of the plaintiff — are rebuttably presumed to cause harm to the reputation of the plaintiff.

[2] Laugh It Off (supra) at para 56.

[3] Ibid at para 58 (No evidence had been led to establish this likelihood of harm; there was not even the slightest suggestion that the market dominance enjoyed by SAB had been reduced.)

[4] Ibid at para 66.

[5] Ibid at para 64.

[6] Ibid at para 73.

[7] Ibid at para 82.

[8] Ibid at paras 85-88 (These are non-exhaustive factors that need to be evaluated in a fact-sensitive and contextual manner against the backdrop of the values of an open and democratic society. Ibid at para 89.)

[9] Ibid at para 98.

[10] Ibid at para 101 (The defence of fair comment would probably have been available to Laugh It Off had it been sued for defamation (assuming the words could be regarded as defamatory at the outset).)

was caused to the marketability of Black Label beer, and the T-shirt parody was necessary because the message was precisely the dislocated use of the trademark.

Sachs J concluded with two significant points in relation, first, to trademark law and freedom of speech generally and, secondly, to the role of laughter in society. Firstly, even the threat of litigation can stifle legitimate debate:

> Large businesses have special access to wealth, the media and government. Like politicians and public figures, their trademarks represent highly visible and immediately recognizable symbols of societal norms and values. The companies that own famous trademarks exert substantial influence over public and political issues . . .
>
> [T]he tarnishment theory of trademark dilution may in protecting the reputation of a mark's owner, effectively act as a defamation statute. As such, it could serve as an over-deterrent. It could chill public discourse because trademark law could be used to encourage prospective speakers to engage in undue self-censorship to avoid the consequences of speaking.[1]

Secondly, in the present case 'subversive humour' was used 'as a means of challenging economic power, resisting ideological hegemony and advancing human dignity', a goal that the law should protect:

> A society that takes itself too seriously risks bottling up its tensions and treating every example of irreverence as a threat to its existence. Humour is one of the great solvents of democracy. It permits the ambiguities and contradictions of public life to be articulated in non-violent forms. It promotes diversity. It enables a multitude of discontents to be expressed in a myriad of spontaneous ways. It is an elixir of constitutional health.[2]

Laugh It Off deserves to be celebrated as a great freedom of expression case, a powerful articulation by the Constitutional Court of the right to freedom of speech. This is especially true of the judgment of Sachs J, though even the more cautious decision of Moseneke J must be welcomed for its emphasis of the importance of properly taking free speech considerations into account in interpreting otherwise restrictive statutory provisions.[3] In the particular context of trademark dilution, Moseneke J has effectively read into the relevant statutory provision of the Trade Marks Act a requirement that the trademark owner must show that actual damage to the selling power of the trademark owner is almost inevitable.[4] Although this arguably conflicts with the literal interpretation of the provision, it is a far better balance between free speech interests and the protection of a trademark than the literal approach adopted by Harms JA in the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[1] Laugh It Off (supra) at paras 105-106.
[2] Ibid at para 109.
[3] See Devenish (supra) at 801; Illsey (supra) at 125.
[4] Cf the legislative scheme in the UK, where the dilution provision stipulates that infringement occurs where the use of the sign takes unfair advantage of or is detrimental to the distinctive character or repute of the mark. Trade Marks Act 1994 s 10(2). The South African provision stipulates that infringement embraces the likelihood of unfair advantage or detriment.

Although much of Sachs J's decision is strictly unnecessary, given his agreement with the narrow ground of decision of the rest of the Court, his sophisticated reading of the core issues implicated by parody and laughter will greatly assist in the further development of the balancing between intellectual property law and freedom of speech. Of particular significance is Sachs J's recognition of the potential chilling effect of trademark dilution law on free speech, and the analogies he drew with the law of defamation.[1] There is a rich jurisprudence on the use of law (especially libel law) in England and the US to silence critics of corporate power.[2] In the US, the term 'Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation' or SLAPPS has been coined to describe these types of actions.[3] Sachs J is right to identify the need to enhance the protective regime for these critics regardless of the cause of action chosen by the corporate plaintiff.[4] It is also important to afford greater breathing space to genuine parodies or satires, especially those that implicate matters of public importance.[5] This clearly applied to the use of SAB's trademark by Laugh It Off; as Sachs J was quick to appreciate, Laugh It Off's T-shirts were poking fun at the trademark-saturated nature of our consumerist society.[6]

(ii) Copyright: Defences to infringement

The copyright cases that threaten freedom of expression are, like Laugh It Off, not the typical commercial piracy actions where copyright protection is defensible and necessary. Most of the copyright cases that engage the attention of a freedom of expression guarantee are those involving defendants, typically the media, seeking to inform the public as to matters of public importance, in circumstances where [1] For arguments in relation to the chilling effect of the law of defamation see § 42.9*(a)* supra. Cf the conservative approach of the English High Court to trademark rights and free speech. Levi Strauss v Tesco Stores [2002] EWHC 1556.

[2] A high-profile example is the famous 'McLibel' case in England. See generally on this litigation, J Vidal McLibel: Burger Culture on Trial (1997). For more on other libel cases involving corporate (and other) claimants, see D Hooper Reputations Under Fire: Winners and Losers in the Libel Business (2000).

[3] The leading study of this phenomenon is FJL Donson Legal Intimidation: A SLAPP in the Face of Democracy (2000).

[4] Cf Steel & Morris v UK (2005) 41 EHRR 22 (Failure to provide legal aid to the impecunious defendants sued by McDonald's Corporation for defamation was a breach of the art 10 right to freedom of expression.) It is not suggested that trademark law should always yield to free speech considerations; much of trademark is defensible, especially the classical instances of infringement such as using in the course of trade an identical or similar mark in relation to identical or similar goods or services. See Trade Marks Act s 34(1)(a) and (b). To argue that the free speech right always precludes the right of the trademark owner to legitimately protect his or her business interests would be tantamount to undermining the existence of trademark law in its entirety.

[5] For a useful discussion of the US position in regard to the protection accorded to parodies of trademarks, see K Levy 'Trademark Parody: A Conflict between Constitutional and Intellectual Property Interests' (2001) 69 George Washington LR 425; JST Kotler 'Trade-mark Parody, Judicial Confusion and the Unlikelihood of Fair Use' (1999-2000) 14 Intellectual Property J 219.

[6] For a powerful perspective on this phenomenon, see N Klein No Logo: Taking Aim at the Brand Bullies (2000).

the impact of the story is argued to require the reproduction of a substantial part of the copyright-protected work of the plaintiff.[1] Existing defences may do some of the work required by freedom of expression in this context, especially the constructs of 'fair use', as many of the defences are termed in the US,[2] or 'fair dealing' as they are termed in the UK and South Africa,[3] which can be given content in accordance with the values of freedom of speech. A few cases from England and the US are illustrative.

In Pro Sieben Media AG v Carlton UK Television Ltd, the plaintiff had conducted an exclusive TV interview with a person who had chosen to persist with her pregnancy after it had been revealed that she was carrying eight live embryos.[4] The interviewee, as is common for stories of this kind, had been paid a large sum of money by the plaintiff. The defendants had included a 30-second extract from this interview in its own programme, 'The Big Story: Selling Babies', which criticised the phenomenon of 'cheque-book journalism'. The interview was used to exemplify this form of journalism. The Court of Appeal upheld a defence of fair dealing for purposes of criticism or review, which it accepted should be interpreted liberally.[5] The defence was not limited to criticism of the interview represented by the copyright work as such; rather, it included criticism of the ideas found in the work and its social or moral implications.[6]

Another leading case involving a related fair dealing defence is Ashdown v Telegraph Group Limited, where the Daily Telegraph published unauthorized extracts from a confidential diary minute that related to a secret meeting between Paddy Ashdown, the former leader of the Liberal Democrats, and Tony Blair, the Labour Prime Minister.[7] The minutes suggested that Mr Blair had seriously intended to form a coalition government with the Liberal Democrats, despite his public denials. About two years after the meeting, when Mr Ashdown intended to publish his diaries, the minute was leaked to the Daily Telegraph. The Court of [1] For a general discussion of the impact of a freedom of expression right on copyright law, see Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 247-63; G Robertson QC & A Nicol QC Media Law (5th Edition, 2008) chapter 6; H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) Chapter 18. See also C Visser 'The Location of the Parody Defence in Copyright Law: Some Comparative Perspectives' (2005) 38 CILSA 321.

[2] Copyright Act 1976 s 107.

[3] In regard to the UK, see Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 s 30. For South African defences, see Copyright Act 98 of 1978 s 12(1). The UK and SA defences recognize a defence of fair dealing for the purposes of criticism or review or for reporting current events.

[4] [1999] 1 WLR 605.

[5] Ibid at 614.

[6] Ibid at 614. See also Hubbard v Vosper [1972] 2 QB 84 (substantial reproduction of books and letters written by plaintiff, the founder of the Church of Scientology, could be used by the defendant, an ex-member of the Church in his critical book). See also Fraser-Woodward Ltd v BBC & Another [2005] FSR 36 (Ch)(fair dealing where photographs of David and Victoria Beckham used in a television programme criticising tabloid journalism).

[7] [2002] Ch 149 ('Ashdown'). For a full account of copyright and defences seeking to protect freedom of speech, where other jurisdictions are also examined, see G Davies Copyright and the Public Interest (2nd Edition, 2002).

Appeal considered that the defence of fair dealing for purposes of reporting current events normally provides courts with the necessary scope to reflect the public interest in freedom of expression.[1] The Court confirmed that 'current events' should be liberally interpreted to include events of 'current interest', even though they may have occurred some time in the past.[2] The Court then considered the residual defence of public interest that the legislation had preserved. Lord Phillips MR recognised that in most cases the fair dealing defences will be adequate to balance the interests of infringers and creators of works. The Court held that, in principle, the use of the exact words is not justifiable by reference to the right to freedom of speech, but that circumstances can arise where freedom of expression will only be effective if it is permissible to reproduce the very words used.[3] This was generally the case on the facts: reference to Ashdown's exact words was necessary for the newspaper to give an authentic account of the meeting. But Lord Phillips MR held that the newspaper had gone too far. Only shorter quotations from the Ashdown minute were necessary and therefore justifiable. In addition, 'the minute was deliberately filleted in order to extract colourful passages that were most likely to add flavour to the article'.[4]

It is submitted that the defence of 'public interest' should be given far more prominence in copyright law than is evidenced by the approach of the Court in Ashdown.[5] We submit that the correct approach is reflected in what appears to be the only statement on the issue in South African law, the obiter remark in the High Court decision in Prinsloo v RCP Media t/a Rapport: 'The public interest and the related freedom, duty and responsibility of the media can of course outweigh considerations regarding copyright'.[6]

In the US, uncharacteristically, the First Amendment has seldom provided shelter for copyright infringers. In the leading case of Harper & Row v The Nation, The Nation published extracts from former President Gerald Ford's unpublished

[1] Ashdown (supra) at para 33.

[2] Ibid at para 39.

[3] Ibid at para 39. For a conservative and, with respect, incorrect approach, see Hyde Park Residence Ltd v Yelland [2001] Ch 143, [2000] 3 WLR 215 (CA)(The Sun published stills of photographs from a security video that depicted the late Princess Diana and Dodi Fayed paying a brief visit to a French villa. The newspaper sought to make the point that Dodi's father, Mohamed al Fayed, had been lying in regard to his comments about how long the couple had spent at the villa. The Court held that this point could be made without reference to the copyright-protected photographs, and there were no circumstances that justified invoking the public interest argument to protect the publication. Ibid at 168. In Ashdown, Lord Phillips MR commented that the Court of Appeal in Hyde Park had defined the 'public interest' too narrowly by confining its application to instances of serious wrongdoing by the claimant.)

[4] Ashdown (supra) at para 82.

[5] For a persuasive critique of Ashdown, see Fenwick & Phillipson (supra) at 910-915.

[6] Prinsloo v RCP Media Ltd t/a Rapport 2003 (4) SA 456, 465 (T). See also Lion Laboratories Ltd v Evans & Others [1985] QB 526, 536 and 550 (CA). Cf Verlagsgruppe News Gmbh v Austria (No 2) [2007] EMLR 413 (Little scope for absolute prohibition to publish a person's photograph where article on a matter of public concern.)

memoirs discussing why he had pardoned his predecessor, Richard Nixon.[1] The majority of the Supreme Court denied the fair use defence to the publisher, albeit primarily on the basis that the memoris were unpublished.[2] Brennan J authored a spirited, and in our view correct, dissent in favour of the right to publish, arguing that the majority's restrictive interpretation of the fair use doctrine ill-served the 'progress of arts and sciences and the robust public debate essential to an enlightened citizenry'.[3]

In the context of parody, however, the US Supreme Court has denied copyright owners complete hegemony.[4] The classic case is Campbell v Acuff-Rose Music Inc which involved the rap group 2 Live Crew's spoof of Roy Orbison's song, 'Oh, Pretty Woman'.[5] The Supreme Court unanimously upheld the right of 2 Live Crew to parody the rock song, though it confirmed that the nature of the song as parody could not be elevated to an independent defence — it had, instead, to house itself within the general fair use defence.[6] On the facts of the case, the 2 Live Crew song was a transformative work that furthered the goal of copyright law (this would often be satisfied by parodies) and deserved protection even though it copied the heart of the original song (the opening lyrics and bass riff of the song). Parodies often necessarily aim at the most important parts of the original work, and copying, the Court held, 'does not become excessive in relation to parodic purpose merely because the portion taken was the original's heart'.[7] Moreover, the market for the parody differed from the market for the original song, and in any event, parodies may legitimately aim at undermining demand for the original through social criticism thereof.

It is submitted that South African courts dealing with similar issues as those confronting the courts in cases such as these should be alive to the impact copyright protection will have on freedom of expression. As the US and English

[1] 471 US 539 (1985)('Harper & Row').
[2] Ibid at 551.
[3] Ibid at 579 (Brennan J was joined by White and Marshall JJ).
[4] See, for example, Hoffman v Capital Cities / ABC Inc 255 F 3d 1180 (9th Cir, 2001)(Computer artists had modified shots of Dustin Hoffman, amongst other well-known actors and actresses, in order to depict these actors and actresses as wearing the spring fashions of famous designers. The Court upheld the speech because, although it was aimed at commerical gain, it was inextricably entwined with humour and visual and verbal editorial comment); Mattel Inc v MCA Records 296 F3d 894 (9th Cir, 2002)(The then little-known Danish band Aqua, had produced a song entitled 'Barbie Girl' which lampooned and parodied the Barbie doll and its image, the intellectual property rights to which are owned by Mattel. Mattel attacked this use on a number of grounds including trademark dilution in the form of tarnishment and blurring. The Court held that while MCA Records used the Barbie Girl name to sell records, it also lampooned the Barbie Girl image and commented humourously on American cultural values. It was therefore not purely commercial speech and was entitled to full First Amendment protection); Mattel Inc v Walking Mountain Productions 353 F 3d 792 (9th Cir, 2003)(An artist, Forsythe, took photos portraying nude Barbie dolls in sexualised positions being attacked by vintage household appliances. Mattel argued that this constituted a violation of its trademark and copyright. The Court rejected Mattel's claim, holding that the photopraphs constituted 'fair use' through parody.)
[5] 510 US 569 (1994)('Campbell v Acuff-Rose').
[6] Ibid at 582.
[7] Ibid at 588.

jurisprudence indicates, freedom of expression considerations can usually be taken into account within the umbrella of existing copyright defences, provided that these defences are interpreted generously and in a manner that gives meaningful protection to the publication of significant copyright-protected material on matters of public concern, or parodies or satires that constitute social commentary. Campbell v Acuff-Rose offers an instructive precedent for South African law in regard to the importance of protecting parody.[1] However, our courts should be more solicitous to free speech interests than the courts in Ashdown and Harper & Row, both cases where the speech was clearly political in nature and the publishers were performing their vital constitutionally-sanctioned roles of informing members of the public of such speech.[2]

(e) Sexually explicit expression

Sexual expression is one of the traditional battlegrounds for freedom of expression. This section first summarises the primary legislation regulating sexual expression. It then discusses the protection of pornographic expression and the limits on that protection, particularly the value of pornography and the harms that criminalising it is meant to avoid. Finally, we discuss nude dancing as protected expression.

(i) The statutory framework

The main statute that regulates sexually explicit expression is the Films and Publications Act ('FPA').[3] This statute replaced two notoriously repressive censorship laws, the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act ('IOPMA'),[4] and the Publications Act,[5] both of which were subject to challenges under the Interim Constitution.

The scheme of the FPA is broadly as follows. Three levels of classification are most relevant for freedom of expression purposes: complete prohibition, XX and X18. Complete prohibition applies only to the possession, creation, production,

[1] Of course, a more potent argument in favour of greater parody protection in trademark or copyright law is made by Sachs J in Laugh It Off. See § 42.9*(d)(i)* supra.

[2] But see Fressoz and Roire v France (2001) 31 EHRR 2 (Journalist entitled to publish confidential documents relating to tax assessments of head of Peugeot to give credence to article about his salary.)

[3] Act 65 of 1996.

[4] Act 37 of 1967.

[5] Act 42 of 1974. For a discussion of this Act and cases decided in terms of it, see JCW van Rooyen Censorship in South Africa (1987). For a general discussion on the history of media regulation in South Africa, see PL Rivers 'A Genealogy of Media Regulation in South Africa Since 1892' (2007) 124 SALJ 491.

importation, exportation, distribution or broadcast of a film or publication that contains child pornography.[1] Films will be classified as XX if they contain a scene or scenes (simulated or real) of bestiality, incest or rape; explicit sexual conduct which violates or shows disrespect for the right to human dignity of any person or which degrades a person or constitutes incitement to cause harm; or the explicit infliction of extreme violence or effects of extreme violence which constitutes incitement to cause harm.[2] A film will be classified as X18 if it contains a scene or scenes (simulated or real) of explicit sexual conduct which, in the case of sexual intercourse, includes an explicit visual presentation of genitals.[3] Substantially similar provisions apply to the classification of publications.[4] It is an offence to distribute films and publications that have been classified as XX or X18[5], or publications that contain visual presentations or descriptions that would result in the XX or X18 classifications were they to be classified.[6] A number of exemptions are articulated under the FPA. Licensees of adult premises are exempt from the prohibitions relating to X18 films and publications.[7] There is also an exemption application procedure for publications classified or classifiable as XX or X18, or from the child pornography provisions, where 'bona fide purposes will be served by such an exemption'.[8] Holders of broadcasting licences are exempt from the duty to apply for classification of films.[9] Further, in a necessary concession to freedom of expression, the XX or X18 classifications will not be applied in respect of a 'bona fide scientific, documentary, literary or … artistic' publication or film.[10]

(ii) Pornographic films and publications as protected expression

The Constitutional Court has had two occasions to consider the constitutionality of pornography. In Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others,[11] the

[1] FPA s 27(1).
[2] FPA sched 6.
[3] FPA sched 7. In turn, 'sexual conduct' is broadly defined as including male genitals in a state of arousal or stimulation, the undue display of genitals or of the anal region, masturbation, bestiality, sexual intercourse (real or simulated), sexual contact involving the direct or indirect fondling or touching of the intimate parts of a body, the penetration of the vagina or anus with any object, oral genital contact or oral anal contact. FPA s 1.
[4] See FPA scheds 1 and 2.
[5] FPA ss 25-26.
[6] FPA s 28. While films must be classified before they are distributed, in general publications may be classified only after their publication. See § 42.9*(b)* infra.
[7] FPA s 24.
[8] FPA s 22.
[9] FPA s 23(3).
[10] FPA scheds 5 and 9. The Films and Publications Amendment Bill B27B-2006 proposes significant amendments to the legislation. For instance, if enacted in its present form, publications other than certain newspapers which contain, inter alia, descriptions of sexual conduct, will be subjected to pre-publication classification. Such a classification regime will not be constitutionally justifiable.
[11] 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)('Case').

applicants, who had been charged with the contravention of s 2(1) of IOPMA — they were allegedly in the possession of sexually explicit videos — challenged this provision against a number of rights in the Interim Constitution. The prohibition in s 2(1) was limited to the possession of indecent or obscene material. This material was defined in IOPMA to include photographic matter 'depicting, displaying, exhibiting, manifesting, portraying or representing sexual intercourse, licentiousness, lust, homosexuality, lesbianism, masturbation, sexual assault, rape, sodomy, masochism, sadism, sexual bestiality or anything of a like nature'.

The majority judgment was authored by Didcott J who struck down s 2(1) on the basis that it unjustifiably violated the privacy guarantee in IC s 13:

> What erotic material I may choose to keep within the privacy of my home, and only for my personal use there, is nobody's business but mine. It is certainly not the business of society or the State. Any ban imposed on my possession of such material for that solitary purpose invades the personal privacy.[1]

Although s 2(1) was also challenged on the basis that it infringed the right to freedom of expression contained in IC s 15(1), the majority preferred to leave that question open.[2] However, Mokgoro J, in an insightful analysis, was prepared to rule that the ban contemplated by s 2(1) of IOPMA also violated the right to freedom of expression. The first enquiry in this regard was whether sexually explicit expression fell within the right articulated in IC s 15(1). Mokgoro J rightly accepted that the correct approach was to interpret the right generously to include sexually-explicit material and to postpone consideration of any possible ground for excluding ultimate protection of the expression to the limitations stage of analysis.[3] Mokgoro J accepted that the act of possessing protected material is itself constitutionally protected by a freedom of expression guarantee: 'my freedom of expression is impoverished indeed if it does not embrace also my right to receive, hold and consume expressions transmitted by others'.[4] This aspect of [1] Case (supra) at para 91 (Didcott J emphasized that the 'preposterous definition' of indecent and obscene material aggravated the violation of IC s 13; it was so wide as to cover famous works of art that are readily displayed in major galleries around the world. Furthermore, the provision was not saved by the limitations clause (IC s 33); although criminalising the production and even the possession of truly obscene material could be justifiable, s 2(1) also hit less obnoxious material. Ibid at para 93.) See further D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) at 38-23. For commentary on the decision, see N Smith 'Policing Pornography' (1997) 13 SAJHR 292.

[2] Case (supra) at para 92. Ibid at para 98 (Langa J) and para 102 (Madala J).

[3] Mokgoro J contrasted this approach to that adopted in the US. In that jurisdiction (where, of course, the US Constitution does not contain a limitations clause), courts' interpretative energy resides at the stage of determining whether material is obscene; if so, it is simply not covered by the First Amendment. On the structure of free speech analysis, see § 42.3 supra.

[4] Case (supra) at para 25. This argument is clearer under the Final Constitution. Whereas IC s 15(1) did not specifically protect the right to receive and impart information and ideas, this protection is now explicit in FC s 16(1).

free speech was necessary at least on the basis of the rationale that the right to receive others' expression is 'foundational to each individual's empowerment to autonomous self-development'.[1] There was, however, no need to demarcate protected from unprotected sexually-explicit speech, because s 2(1) of IOPMA was clearly overbroad; the 'indecent or obscene' definition covered 'a virtually limitless range of expressions, from ubiquitous and mundane manifestations like commercial advertising to the most exalted artistic expressions'.[2]

One category of pornography that clearly and rightly troubled members of the Court in Case was child pornography. Thus Madala J stated in his concurring judgment that 'children should not be exposed to or participate in the production of pornography, and … possession by them and exposure to pornographic material should be prohibited'.[3] Madala J was clearly of the opinion that limiting even the possession of such pornography was constitutionally legitimate.[4] The Court dealt with just such a category of pornography a few years later under the Final Constitution, in De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division).[5]

In De Reuck, a film producer had been charged with contravening s 27(1) of the FPA, which prohibits the knowing creation, production, distribution, importation and possession of a film that contains a scene of child pornography.[6] Langa DCJ for a unanimous Court summarized the proper interpretation of the offence contemplated in s 27(1) thus:

[1] Case (supra) at para 26. Cf Stanley v Georgia 394 US 557, 565 (1969) (Prohibition on possession of pornography infringes the First Amendment; state 'has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch').

[2] Case (supra) at para 59. Mokgoro J's approach to the case — engaging the free speech issue directly — is commendable. As she put it, 'I do not believe it would be appropriate to dispose of a matter so prominently implicating crucial freedom of expression issues without attending to the arguments in that regard'. Ibid at para 66. See also ibid at para 112 (Sachs J)('The infringement of privacy becomes harder to countenance when it targets communicative matter'.)

[3] Ibid at para 105.

[4] Ibid at para 107, (Madala J, with the majority, confined his discussion to the right to privacy rather than the right to freedom of expression.)

[5] 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck').

[6] At the time of De Reuck, child pornography was defined in FPA s 1 as 'any image, real or simulated, however created, depicting a person who is or who is shown as being under the age of 18 years, engaged in sexual conduct or a display of genitals which amounts to sexual exploitation, or participating in, or assisting another person to engage in sexual conduct which amounts to sexual exploitation or degradation of children'. The Court confirmed that on a proper interpretation, this definition contained an exhaustive list of what constitutes child pornography. Ibid at para 21. The current definition of child pornography extends the net wider: it includes any image, however created, or any description of a person (real or simulated) who is or is depicted as being under 18 and who is engaged in, participating in or assisting another to participate in sexual conduct, or showing or describing the body or parts of the body of such a person in a manner or circumstances which amount to sexual exploitation, or where it is capable of being used for these purposes. For a discussion of the current regime, see M Watney 'Regulation of Internet Pornography in South Africa Part 1' (2006) 69 THRHR 227 and M Watney 'Regulation of Internet Pornography in South Africa Part 2' (2006) 69 THRHR 381.

> The overarching enquiry, objectively viewed, is whether the purpose of the image is to stimulate sexual arousal in the target audience. This entails considering the context of the publication or film in which the image occurs as a visual presentation or scene. The court conducts the enquiry from the perspective of the reasonable viewer.[1]

In regard to whether FC s 16(1) had been infringed, Langa DCJ confirmed that expression that was not excluded under FC s 16(2) fell to be protected under FC s 16(1).[2] Child pornography clearly constitutes expression; indeed, the Court appears to accept that such expression qualifies as artistic expression.[3] Furthermore, FC s 16(1) is not limited only to rights of speakers, it also covers the right of recipients to receive child pornography.[4] Section 27(1) of the FPA thus clearly limited freedom of expression. The question that remained was whether such a limitation was justifiable; an issue that this discussion will postpone until later.[5] First, we examine in some detail the claim that pornography should be treated as protected expression.[6]

The generous approach adopted by the Court to the ambit of the right to freedom of expression is consistent with its approach to rights analysis in general and is also in accordance with the approach adopted in similar jurisdictions where rights are subject to a conceptually distinct limitations analysis.[7] In Canada, for instance, in R v Butler, the Supreme Court held that a prohibition on the sale and possession of obscene material clearly infringed s 2*(b)* of the Canadian Charter as a content-based restriction on expression.[8] The Canadian Supreme Court has taken a similar approach to prohibitions on child pornography.[9] The European Court of Human Rights, in its seminal obscenity decision of Handyside v UK, confirmed that freedom of expression is applicable 'not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb'.[10]

[1] De Reuck (supra) at para 38.
[2] Ibid at para 47. See generally § 42.3 supra.
[3] De Reuck (supra) at para 48.
[4] Ibid at para 49, quoting FC s 16(1)(b). See also IC s 15(1) and Mokgoro J's decision in Case (supra).
[5] See § 42.9*(e)*(iii) infra.
[6] It should be noted that Langa DCJ also held that FPA s 27 limited the right to privacy in FC s 14. De Reuck (supra) at para 52, relying on the reasoning in Case (supra). This dual free speech/privacy approach has also been endorsed by the Supreme Court of Canada. R v Sharpe 2001 SCC 2, (2001) 194 DLR (4th) 1 ('Sharpe')(Criminal Code penalizing possession of child pornography engaged privacy as well as free speech protection).
[7] See generally S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.
[8] [1992] 1 SCR 452, (1992) 89 DLR (4th) 449 (SCC)('Butler')(Meaning sought to be expressed through pornography).
[9] Sharpe (supra) at para 27 (Guarantee of free expression extends even to offensive speech).
[10] Supra at paras 48-49 (The case concerned The Little Red School Book, a reference book for 12-18 year olds that contained chapters on sex, drugs and pornography in quite graphic detail.)

The major jurisdiction that provides a contrasting approach is, again, the United States, where courts, in the absence of a limitations clause, have been compelled to exclude certain speech from the protective coverage of the First Amendment.[1] Speech that is properly classified as 'obscene' receives no constitutional protection and is regarded as 'utterly without redeeming social importance'.[2] In the leading case of Miller v California, the Supreme Court articulated a strict threshold test for determining obscene speech: a work is obscene where: (1) the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (2) the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by applicable state law; and (3) the work lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.[3] Where the US Supreme Court rules that a particular form of pornography is obscene (as it appears to have done in the case of child pornography)[4] its decision that the speech should not be protected is tantamount to what, for example, South African and Canadian courts do when they assess limitations on protected speech as justifiable. We turn to consider how courts have assessed limitations on sexually explicit speech next.

(iii) Assessing limitations on sexually explicit material: pornography as low-value speech

As in the case of other low-value speech such as commercial speech, the approach of South African and other courts engaging restrictions on sexually explicit expression is to consider the value of the speech at issue within the limitations analysis.[5] That pornography lies at the periphery of the right to freedom of expression is widely accepted in various jurisdictions, which has the result that limitations upon such expression are more easily countenanced.[6] In a recent House of Lords decision, for example, Lord Hoffmann made the point that '[t]he

[1] The results achieved under the US approach and those that follow from an explicit limitations analysis often coincide. It is only the methodology of the analysis that differs.

[2] Roth v United States; Alberts v California 354 US 476, 484 (1957)(Brennan J, emphasising, however, that the standards for judging obscenity safeguard freedom of speech and the press. Ibid at 488.)

[3] 413 US 14, 24 (1973)('Miller v California'). The most famous judicial pronouncement on obscenity is Stewart J's comment in an earlier case, Jacobellis v Ohio. 378 US 184, 197 (1964)(Conceding that he may never be able to describe the forms of hard-core pornography that could be banned but 'I know it when I see it'.) For a discussion of how the Supreme Court has provided further guidelines in regard to each leg of the obscenity test, see DR Pember & C Calvert Mass Media Law (2007) 532-38. But see the test under the UK's Obscene Publications Act, 1964 s 1(1) (The publication for gain of an article which tends, taken as a whole, to deprave and corrupt a significant portion of those likely to see or hear it). For a comprehensive account of UK obscenity law from a free speech perspective, see H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) 422-47; R Stone Textbook on Civil Liberties and Human Rights (5th Edition, 2004) 302-317.

[4] New York v Ferber 458 US 747, 764 (1982)('Ferber').

[5] For the position in regard to commercial speech, see § 42.9*(f)* infra.

[6] One argument that should be rejected is that pornographic speech qualifies as hate speech and hence does not attract any constitutional protection. See D Meyerson Rights Limited: Freedom of Expression, Freedom of Religion and the South African Constitution (1999) 129-31 ('Rights Limited')(pornography does not qualify under any of the requirements for hate speech.) See further § 42.8*(c)* supra.

right to vend pornography is not the most important right of free expression in a democratic society',[1] or, as Baroness Hale put it, '[p]ornography comes well below celebrity gossip in the hierarchy of speech which deserves the protection of the law'.[2] This low-value speech approach is also reflected in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, which affords a wide margin of appreciation to domestic courts in considering the constitutionality of restrictions on sexually explicit speech.[3]

Our Constitutional Court has also addressed this issue, in the context of child pornography. In De Reuck, the Constitutional Court considered whether the child pornography prohibition contained in the FPA survived the limitations analysis. The first point made by Langa DCJ was that child pornography did not implicate the core values of freedom of expression, namely 'its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally'.[4] This is a significant point; the claim that hard-core pornographic images, especially child pornography, serves the democracy rationale for free speech, or that wide dissemination of child and other hard-core pornography aids in the discovery of truth, is simply implausible.[5] As Barendt puts it, '[m]ost pornography is non-cognitive; it does not make claims which might be true'.[6] In Miller v California, Burger CJ stated that 'to equate the free and robust exchange of ideas and political debate with commercial exploitation of obscene materials demeans the grand conception of the First Amendment'.[7] Or, even more to the point, '[n]o one is denied an equal voice in the political process … when he is forbidden to circulate photographs of genitals to the public'.[8]

It is nevertheless the case, as Ronald Dworkin argues, that government censorship of pornographic speech engages fundamental concerns of moral independence that lie at the heart of a free speech clause:

[1] Miss Behavin' Ltd v Belfast City Council [2007] 3 All ER 1007 (HL) at para 16 (Judicial review refused of decision not to grant sex establishment licence in particular area).

[2] Ibid at para 38. See also supra at para 83 (Lord Neuberger)(This may, however, be an overstatement of the relative value of celebrity gossip and pornography to the free speech enterprise.)

[3] Handyside (supra) at para 48. See also Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212 at para 35 (Criminal conviction of artist for exhibition of explicit paintings, including depicting sexual relations between men and animals, upheld).

[4] De Reuck (supra) at para 59, summarizing the Court's decision in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC). See also Sharpe (supra) at para 24 (Child pornography does not contribute to search for truth or to social and political discourse; may not even engage the value of self-fulfilment).

[5] See § 42.5 supra. For an excellent summary and discussion of the rationales for freedom of expression in the context of pornography, see Fenwick & Phillipson (supra) at 392-408.

[6] Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 356.

[7] Miller (supra) at 34. See also Butler (supra) at para 102 (Pornography does not stand on equal footing with other kinds of expression that directly engage the core of freedom of expression).

[8] R Dworkin A Matter of Principle (1985) 336.

> Liberals defend pornography, though most of them despise it, in order to defend a conception of the First Amendment that includes, as at least one of its purposes, protecting equality in the processes through which the moral as well as the political environment is formed.[1]

If it is accepted that pornographic speech engages the right to freedom of expression, albeit at its periphery, the query that must next be interrogated is what the harm is that is sought to be avoided by censoring pornography.

(iv) Assessing limitations on pornography: harms sought to be avoided through criminalizing pornography

Langa DCJ in De Reuck considered that the objective of the prohibition on child pornography in the FPA was sound:

> The purpose of the legislation is to curb child pornography, which is seen as an evil in all democratic societies. Child pornography is universally condemned for good reason. It strikes at the dignity of children, it is harmful to children who are used in its production, and it is potentially harmful because of the attitude to child sex that it fosters and the use to which it can be put in grooming children to engage in sexual conduct.[2]

Furthermore, the Act's prohibition on child pornography was not overbroad; although there were no specific defences — for example, for researchers who possess child pornography — there were other safeguards in the Act such as an exemption application which would cater for deserving cases.[3] Similar restrictions

[1] R Dworkin Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution (1996) 238. For a recent discussion of the rationales for protecting pornography, see J Weinstein 'Democracy, Sex and the First Amendment' (2007) 31 New York University Rev of Law and Social Change 865, 878-96 (Argues that the democracy rationale presents the most promising justification for obscenity; it is used to attempt to change people's attitudes about sexual mores.) See also A Koppelman 'Free Speech and Pornography: A Response to James Weinstein' (2007) 31 New York University Rev of Law and Social Change 899, 906-7 (Restrictions on pornography aim precisely at preventing citizens from thinking certain thoughts).

[2] Ibid at para 61. Cf Sharpe (supra) at paras 87-94 (Accepting that the evidence showed a reasonable apprehension of at least four forms of harm caused by child pornography: the changing of attitudes of possessors in ways that makes them more likely to sexually abuse children; the fuelling of fantasies and making paedophiles more likely to offend; the use of child pornography to groom or seduce victims; and the abuse of children who are used in the production of pornography.)

[3] FPA s 22. Indeed, a more specific 'legitimate purposes'-type defence was not an effective less restrictive means to achieve the purpose; such a defence would in any event be open to abuse. De Reuck (supra) at para 82. The Court left open the issue of whether lawyers, judicial officers and police officers were hit by the prohibition when possessing child pornography for purposes of their occupations. Ibid at para 87. An argument can be made that the FPA is unconstitutional to the extent that it does not permit of exceptions in relation to, for instance, the possession of child pornography for legitimate and necessary journalistic purposes. Thus there is no similar exemption as applies to material that would otherwise be classified as XX or X18, if they are bona fide scientific, documentary, literary or artistic publications or films. FPA scheds 5 and 9. So a broadcaster or newspaper whose confidential source provided it with examples of child pornography used by a public official could not possess the pornography without arguably violating the FPA. Cf US v Mathews 209 F 3d 338, 345 (4th Cir, 2000)(journalist may not possess child pornography for purpose of doing research for future story; argument to the contrary misses fundamental distinction between child pornography and other pornography.) Such a position may be on the possession and production of child pornography have been upheld on constitutional grounds in other jurisdictions.[1]

Although limitations on child pornography are fairly easy to justify,[2] it is less clear on what basis restrictions on other forms of pornography may be sanctioned. It is in this context that courts will have to engage the difficult question of the harms sought to be prevented through the restriction of pornography. There is a substantial body of literature that seeks to locate this harm in the context of violence against women. The main arguments here are that there is a link between pornography and sexual harm and that pornography is a form of gender discrimination: it 'presents women purely as objects for men's sexual needs and so demeans and disparages them'.[3] The jurisprudential high-point of this argument was the implementation of an ordinance drafted by Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin in Indianapolis that sought to create a civil remedy for harms caused to women by pornography, defined inter alia as 'the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women, whether in pictures or in words'. The victory was short-lived; the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit considered that this definition violated the First Amendment. Easterbrook J held that the ordinance was an unconstitutional instance of 'thought control'. Further, susceptible to constitutional challenge on free speech grounds (although the decision in De Reuck indicates that such a challenge would not succeed). There is a defence to the publication of hate speech for a film, publication, entertainment or play that amounts to a bona fide discussion, argument or opinion on a matter of public interest. FPA s 29(4). See also Sharpe (supra) at paras 70-71 (Describing the legislated 'public good' defence to a charge of possession of child pornography). For a critique of De Reuck see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at Chapter 36.

[1] For the US position, see Ferber (supra)(conviction under state statute for sale of films depicting boys masturbating constitutional; states have greater leeway on the regulation of pornographic depictions of children and obscenity test of Miller v California not applicable); Osborne v Ohio 495 US 103 (1990)(even possession of child pornography may be criminalised; reasonable for state to conclude that it will decrease production of child pornography if it criminalizes possession). Cf Ashcroft v Free Speech Coalition 535 US 234 (2002)(Child Pornography Prevention Act, 1996 extended prohibition against child pornography to sexually explicit images that appear to depict minors but were produced without using real children; unconstitutional because virtual child pornography not intrinsically related to sexual abuse of children and no artistic work exemption). For discussion on this case, see DR Dallas 'Starting with the Scales Tilted: The Supreme Court's Assessment of Congressional Findings and Scientific Evidence in Ashcroft v Free Speech Coalition' (2007) 44 Willamette LR 33.

[2] That is not to say that the ambit of child pornography is uncontroversial. For a discussion of childhood sexuality within motion pictures that may trigger US child pornography law, see JE Bristol 'Free Expression in Motion Pictures: Childhood Sexuality and a Satisfied Society' (2007) 25 Cardozo Arts and Entertainment LJ 333, 358 (arguing that not all child nudity should be treated the same for purposes of child pornography law). Nor is it necessarily the case that simulated child pornography causes the same harms as real child pornography.

[3] Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 379. The literature on this topic is enormous. A useful collection is contained in D Cornell Feminism and Pornography (2000). Classic works that should be consulted include A Dworkin Pornography: Men Possessing Women (1981); C MacKinnon Feminism Unmodified: Discourse on Life and the Law (1987); C MacKinnon Only Words (1993); N Strossen Defending Pornography; Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women's Rights (2000); N Strossen 'Is "Minnesota a Progressive?" A Focus on Sexually Oriented Expression' (2006) 33 William Mitchell LR 51; C MacKinnon & R Dworkin 'Pornography: An Exchange — Comment/Reply' New York Review of Books 3 March 1994; R Dworkin Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution (1996) chapters 9 and 10; and C Itzin (ed) Pornography: Woman, Violence and Civil Liberties (1994).

the ordinance did not exempt works of literary, artistic, political or scientific value.[1] Indeed, US First Amendment law remains tolerant of much pornography, provided it cannot be classed as obscene under Miller v California. Thus, even legislation that is designed to prevent the dissemination to children of indecent — though not 'obscene' — material via the Internet could not be upheld where such legislation would inevitably infringe the freedom of adults to access indecent material because '[t]hat burden on adult speech is unacceptable if less restrictive alternatives would be at least as effective in achieving the legitimate purpose that the statute was enacted to serve.'[2]

The objective of preventing harm to women through pornography has had a better reception in Canada. In Butler,[3] Sopinka J for the Supreme Court held that 'degrading or dehumanizing materials place women (and sometimes men) in positions of subordination, servile submission or humiliation. They run against the principles of equality and dignity of all human beings'.[4] A substantial body of opinion existed to the effect that the portrayal of persons in such positions 'results in harm, particularly to women and therefore to society as a whole'.[5] While a direct link to such harm could not be shown, the Court accepted that 'it would be reasonable to conclude that there is an appreciable risk of harm to society in the portrayal of such materials'.[6] The Court stated:

> [I]f true equality between male and female persons is to be achieved, we cannot ignore the threat to equality resulting from exposure to audiences of certain types of violent and degrading materials. Materials portraying women as a class as objects for sexual exploitation and abuse have a negative impact on 'the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance'.[7]

[1] American Booksellers Assoc, Inc v Hudnut 771 F2d 323, 328 (7th Cir 1985). The Supreme Court affirmed the decision without hearing oral argument. 475 US 1001 (1986).

[2] Reno v American Civil Liberties Union 521 US 844, 874 (1997)(provision in Communications Decency Act 1996 unconstitutional because less restrictive means such as software was available by which parents could prevent children accessing certain material). See also Ashcroft v American Civil Liberties Union 542 US 656, 669 (2004)(Child Online Protection Act declared unconstitutional; use of blocking and filtering software less restrictive means than employing criminal sanctions for purpose). Cf US v Williams 553 US (2008)(statute that prohibited offers to provide and requests to obtain child pornography not infringing the First Amendment).

[3] [1992] 1 SCR 452, (1992) 89 DLR (4th) 449 (SCC)('Butler')(The facts of the case were that: the owner of a video shop that sold and rented hard-core pornography was charged under the Criminal Code with the sale, and possession for purpose of sale, of obscene material. 'Obscenity' was defined as 'any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence'. The Court upheld the provision, in part, because it only minimally impaired freedom of speech — the test for obscenity set a high threshold, and works with scientific, artistic or literary merit were not caught. Ibid at paras 117-118.)

[4] Ibid at para 51.

[5] Ibid at para 52.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at para 90 (The objective of avoiding harm associated with the dissemination of pornography was, according to the Court, sufficiently pressing and substantial to warrant some restriction on freedom of expression. Ibid at para 94.)

In order to determine if a rational connection exists between the objective of preventing harm and the impugned measures, the Court held that it is sufficient if Parliament has a reasonable basis for believing that there is a link between pornography and harm to society.[1]

The Butler Court's acceptance of a link between pornography and harm to women and society has been criticised.[2] Nadine Strassen has argued, for instance, that the Court's approach is a 'dangerous intuitive' one, and that, even if it is assumed, contrary to the available evidence, that seeing pornography leads to sexist and violent actions, 'it still would have to [be proved] that pornography has a corner on the sexism and violence market, and that pornography is in fact entirely suppressible'.[3] Butler should therefore not be regarded as a persuasive precedent. Where the state seeks to restrict even low-value speech such as pornography on the basis of harm to society, it is surely right to require that this harm be demonstrated in a reasonably compelling manner. While defences that protect speech that constitutes, for example, valuable artistic or literary works,[4] or publications made on matters of public concern, are desirable, the a priori question that must be answered in these cases is whether it is at all justifiable in principle to restrict pornography. In the absence of evidence of specific and non-speculative harm, such restrictions should be carefully scrutinised, and may well not survive a constitutional challenge.

(v) Nude dancing as protected expression

One specific category of sexually explicit expression that has received the attention of our Constitutional Court is nude dancing. The proposition that nude dancing is a form of protected expression was accepted in Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division & Others,[5] which concerned the constitutionality of s 160*(d)* of the Liquor Act.[6] This provision made

[1] Ibid at para 112. Butler's rationale has been extended to books and magazines, and harm to the dignity of gays and lesbians, through degrading hard-core pornography. See Little Sisters and Art Emporium v Minister of Justice and Attorney-General of Canada [2000] 2 SCR 1120.

[2] For compelling criticism, see, for example, Fenwick & Phillipson (supra) at 450-462.

[3] Strossen (supra) at 249. The question as to the link between pornography and harm is a complex one which, to be properly assessed, would require an analysis of all available evidence. It is not a link which, in our view, exists simply as a matter of 'reason or logic' (to use the phrase adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court for assessing the rationality of limitations on fundamental rights where the rationality of the limitation has not been proved on the basis of empirical evidence. RJR-MacDonald v Attorney-General of Canada [1995] 3 SCR 199.) See § 42.9*(f)* infra.

[4] Cf FPA scheds 5 and 8. Cf also the UK's Obscene Publications Act 1959 s 4(1) (defence if publication for public good in interests of science, literature, art or learning). This provision was, for example, probably responsible for the eventual unbanning in England of DH Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover. For accounts of this and other famous obscenity trials where s 4(1) was employed, see A Travis Bound and Gagged: A Secret History of Obscenity in Britain (2000).

[5] 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC)('Phillips').

[6] Act 27 of 1989.

it an offence for a holder of an on-consumption liquor licence to allow a person 'who is not clothed or not properly clothed to perform or to appear' or any person 'to perform an offensive, indecent or obscene act . . . on licensed premises where entertainment is presented or to which the public has access'.[1] The applicant, the owner of a club known as The Titty Twister, was charged for allowing striptease dancing on the premises. Yacoob J for the majority held that the provision limited freedom of expression:

> The prohibition applies to all entertainment of every description, provided only that the conduct covered by the subsection is part of it. It . . . therefore limits the freedom of artistic creativity and the freedom to receive and impart information and ideas protected by s 16(1)(b) and (c) of the Constitution. Even though the performers and audiences themselves are not guilty of any offence in terms of the subsection, the inevitable consequence of its enforcement is to restrict the performance of all entertainment within this broad category and to impact negatively on performers and potential audiences alike.[2]

Sachs J, in a separate concurring judgment, reminds us that '[t]he problem of whether it is constitutionally permissible to prohibit the combination of tipples and nipples has divided judicial minds in many open and democratic societies'.[3] The majority of the US Supreme Court in Barnes v Glen Theatre, Inc held that nude dancing was protected by the First Amendment, though only at its outer perimeter, and 'marginally so'.[4] Because the value of the expression in issue is far removed from the core of freedom of expression, there is greater scope for the government to justify limitations on nude dancing. Hence in Barnes, for instance, an Indiana public indecency statute that was enacted to address the perceived evil of public nudity was upheld; nudity was not proscribed 'because of the erotic message conveyed by the dancers and the dancers remained free to communicate erotic expression, albeit that they had to wear pasties and G-strings in doing so'.[5]

Even in Phillips, although the Constitutional Court ultimately ruled that s 160*(d)* of the Liquor Act was unconstitutional, it did so on a very narrow

[1] See also Sexual Offences Act 23 1957 s 19*(b)* (Offence for person who willfully and openly exhibits himself or herself in an indecent dress or manner at any door or window or within view of any public street or place to which public have access). The common law offence of public indecency — unlawfully, intentionally and publicly performing an act which tends to deprave or corrupt the morals of others or which outrages the public sense of decency — is also relevant. For discussion of this offence, see J Burchell Principles of Criminal Law (3rd Edition, 2005) 874-9.

[2] Phillips (supra) at para 15. Ibid at paras 54-55 (Ngcobo J in dissent: 'I have grave doubts whether there is any connection between the striptease dancing involved in this case and the constitutional right to freedom of expression. . . . Whether freedom of artistic creativity guaranteed by our Constitution includes nude dancing for the primary purpose of stimulating liquor sales is not free from doubt'.)

[3] Ibid at para 64.

[4] 501 US 560, 566 (1991)('Barnes'). See also City of Erie et al v Pap's AM 529 US 277, 292-294 (2000)('City of Erie')(although being in a state of nudity not inherently expressive conduct, nude dancing is expressive conduct that falls within outer ambit of First Amendment).

[5] Barnes (supra) at 571. See also City of Erie (supra) at 279(A similar result was reached. The ban on nudity in that case was also a general ban that did not have the purpose of suppressing the erotic message of the dance, and dancers were free to perform wearing pasties and G-strings.)

basis: the provision was overbroad; its coverage extended beyond bars and places at which the sale of liquor is the primary activity to, for example, performances at theatres as well as clubs.[1] Had the prohibition been narrowly tailored to, for instance, only prohibit nude dancing at places where the primary business is to sell liquor, the position, according to the majority, 'might well have been different'.[2]

(f) Commercial expression

The United States Supreme Court has defined commercial expression as 'expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience'.[3] This definition has been quoted with apparent approval by Davis J in one of the two reported commercial speech cases decided thus far by South African courts.[4]

The most common type of commercial speech is advertising.[5] It must, however, be interrogated in each case whether the advertisement is related solely to the economic interests of the parties. Speech on matters of public concern should not be regarded as commercial speech simply by virtue of its being couched in the form of a traditional advertisement. The best illustration of this point is the speech at issue in one of the US Supreme Court's seminal free speech cases, New York Times v Sullivan.[6] In this case, the plaintiff sued for libel in respect of allegations contained in a paid advertisement published in the New York Times. The advertisement called for contributions to pay the legal expenses of a number of black student protesters who had been arrested for allegedly falling foul of the opprobrious racial laws then in place in Montgomery, Alabama. This was clearly

[1] Phillips (supra) at para 28.

[2] Phillips (supra) at para 27 (Madala J would have held the limitation on freedom of expression justifiable even given the breadth of the provision: 'Given the potential dangers that arise when drunkenness and nudity are combined, it is both reasonable and justifiable for the Legislature to require theatres to refrain from selling liquor on the days when such performances are being held'. Ibid at para 46.)

[3] Central Hudson Gas & Electric v Public Services Commission 447 US 557, 561 (1980)('Central Hudson'). Cf the narrower definition previously proffered in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council 425 US 748, 761 (1976)('Virginia State Board of Pharmacy')(Speech that proposes a commercial transaction.)

[4] City of Cape Town v Ad Outpost (Pty) Ltd 2000 (2) SA 733, 748 (C)('Ad Outpost'). The only other reported commercial speech case is North Central Local Council and South Central Local Council v Roundabout Outdoor (Pty) Ltd & Others 2002 (2) SA 625 (D)('Roundabout Outdoor'). These cases are discussed below.

[5] Other forms of speech such as expression in the context of unlawful competition (for instance, disparagement of a competitor's products) and expression inducing another to breach a contract, would appear also to qualify as commercial speech. With regard to restrictions on unlawful competition, it is submitted that the common law, and especially the elasticity of the 'wrongfulness' requirement of the delict, should give sufficient protection for the genuine exercise of free speech.

[6] 376 US 254 (1964)('Sullivan'). The best analysis of this case, together with its socio-political backdrop and reproducing the advert, is in A Lewis Make No Law: The Sullivan Case and the First Amendment (1992). See also SD Ross & RK Bird 'The Ad that Changed Libel Law: Judicial Realism and Social Activism in New York Times Co v Sullivan' (2004) 9 Communication L & Policy 489. See further § 42.9*(a)* supra.

speech on a matter of public interest that was entitled to robust protection ('it communicated information, expressed opinions and recited grievances'), rather than commercial speech that did not enjoy such protection.[1]

Similarly, speech is not 'commercial' simply because money is spent in producing it or merely because it is sold for a profit.[2] If this were the case, all material published by the press or traditional media would only be entitled to protection as commercial speech, irrespective of the content of the speech. This would be absurd. Speech is also not 'commercial' simply because it covers a commercial issue. Much speech on commercial issues concerns matters of compelling public interest and is not only related to advancing the commercial interests of the speaker and its audience, such as the exposure of corporate governance failures or product defects.

Although, as will be seen, courts in various jurisdictions regard commercial speech as covered by a freedom of speech guarantee and valuable in society, courts also invariably adopt the position that restrictions on this form of speech are easier to justify than is the case with many other forms of speech, most obviously, political speech. These two points are dealt with in turn.

(i) Commercial speech as protected expression

The first enquiry is whether (and why) commercial speech receives protection under a free speech guarantee. Our courts have held that judges should interpret the scope of the right to freedom of expression generously so as to cover freedom of commercial speech. Thus in Ad Outpost, Davis J concluded that 'it is clear that advertising falls within the nature of expression and hence stands to be protected in terms of s 16(1) of the Constitution'.[3] The court reached a similar conclusion in Roundabout Outdoor, emphasising that the advertising restrictions in that case impeded the freedom to impart and receive information and ideas entrenched by FC s 16(1)(b).[4]

The same approach has been adopted in other jurisdictions. The first unequivocal extension of free speech protection to commercial speech by the US

[1] The line between commercial speech and speech that should be treated as predominantly public concern speech is difficult. This is illustrated by the recent controversy in the US in relation to whether Nike's press releases responding to allegations that the company mistreated workers outside the US, constituted commercial speech. The Californian Supreme Court held that this was commercial speech. Nike Inc v Kasky 123 SCt 2554 (2003). For commentary, see RL Kerr 'From Sullivan to Nike: Will the Noble Purpose of the Landmark Free Speech Case be Subverted to Immunize False Advertising?' (2004) 9 Communication L & Policy 525. Cf Barthold v Germany (1992) 15 EHRR 244 (veterinary surgeon's advertisement that pointed out lack of proper night service a matter of importance to the community).

[2] Virginia State Board of Pharmacy (supra) at 761.

[3] Ad Outpost (supra) at 749.

[4] Roundabout Outdoor (supra) at 633.

Supreme Court occurred in the Virginia State Board of Pharmacy case.[1] Commercial speech has also been regarded as falling within the scope of freedom of speech by, for example, the Supreme Court of Canada[2] and the European Court of Human Rights.[3]

Despite the approach of most jurisdictions in extending the protection of freedom of expression to commercial speech, the theoretical basis for this protection is uncertain and contested. One critic of the notion of freedom of commercial expression puts it in the following strong terms:

> Freedom of commercial expression is a constitutional fraud. It does not have sound grounding in legal precedent. The normative arguments adduced in its favour are without exception invalid and unsound.[4]

This criticism is, we submit, an overstatement. While we accept that certain of the arguments for free speech (such as the argument from democracy, the self-fulfilment of the speaker,[5] the 'safety valve' theory and the development of a culture of toleration) are generally inapposite to commercial speech, this is not true of all the rationales. It seems to us that the protection of commercial speech can be justified by focusing on the importance of commercial information to consumers. Promoting freedom of commercial speech empowers consumers to make informed choices as to products and services.[6] As the Canadian Supreme Court remarked in Ford:[7]

[1] Virginia State Board of Pharmacy (supra)(Striking down a statute that stipulated that it was unprofessional conduct for a pharmacist to advertise the price of prescription medicines). See also, for example, Carey v Population Services international 4331 US 768 (1977). Previous decisions of the US Supreme Court excluded commercial speech from the protection of the First Amendment. See, for example, Valentine v Christensen 316 US 52 (1942) and Pittsburgh Press v Human Relations Commission 413 US 376 (1973).

[2] Ford v Attorney General of Quebec [1988] 2 SCR 712 ('Ford'); Irwin Toy v Attorney-General of Quebec [1989] 1 SCR 927('Irwin Toy').

[3] Market Intern & Beerman v Germany (1990) 12 EHRR 161 ('Market Intern').

[4] RA Shiner Freedom of Commercial Expression (2003) 328 (Shiner engages in a detailed and thought-provoking examination of the merits of protecting freedom of commercial expression and concludes that none of the rationales for the protection of freedom of expression apply to commercial speech.) See also CE Baker 'Commercial Speech: A Problem in the Theory of Freedom' (1976) 62 Iowa Law Rev 1.

[5] It is, generally speaking, difficult to argue that commercial expression advances the self-fulfillment of the speaker as it is mostly corporate entities that engage in commercial speech (such as advertising). See Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 15. For a criticism of the application of this rationale to commercial expression, see Shiner (supra) at 163-191.

[6] D Meyerson Rights Limited (supra) at 93 ('Advertising clearly raises freedom of expression concerns, because it imparts information about goods and services that people have an interest in receiving'). Cf Virginia State Board of Pharmacy (supra) at 763 (Blackmun J)(the consumer's 'interest in the free flow of commercial information. . . may be as keen as, if not keener by far, than his interest in the day's most urgent political debate'.)

[7] Ford (supra) at 767.

> Over and above its intrinsic value as expression, commercial expression which, as has been pointed out, protects listeners as well as speakers plays a significant role in enabling individuals to make informed economic choices, an important aspect of self-fulfilment and personal autonomy.[1]

The free flow of commercial information enables us to know more about commercial subjects, products and services, and thus serves individual choice and the proper functioning of a free market economy. The 'market place of ideas' thus promotes the efficiency of the economic market (by, amongst other things, assisting in the search for commercial truth).[2] This is, in particular, the case in relation to commercial speech that conveys information (such as so-called informational advertising) but is less apposite, if at all, to more emotive commercial speech like 'lifestyle' advertising (advertising that associates the product with an attractive lifestyle).[3] An additional argument in support of the protection of freedom of commercial expression is that a failure to protect it would inevitably 'chill' other forms of speech in circumstances where courts may incorrectly categorise speech.

Although it is difficult to argue that commercial expression should enjoy the same level of constitutional protection as other forms of speech — such as political expression, journalistic endeavour and artistic creativity[4] — we submit that it is correct that restrictions on freedom of commercial speech engage the reasons that we value freedom of expression and thus fall within FC s 16(1).[5]

(ii) Assessing limitations on commercial expression

The second important question with regard to commercial expression is how limitations on such expression are to be assessed. The broad point here — again, one accepted in various jurisdictions — is that commercial speech receives weaker protection than other forms of speech. In the words of Kondile J in Roundabout Outdoor, commercial speech 'occupies a subordinate position in the

[1] See Central Hudson (supra) at 563 (1980)('the First Amendment's concern for commercial speech is based on the informational function of advertising'); Shiner (supra) at 308 and 328 (criticises this rationale on the basis that much of advertising does not provide information, but rather appeals to emotions and conjures up associations. While this is true of much lifestyle advertising, it is not necessarily true of much advertising that is informational in nature.)

[2] For a criticism of this argument, see Shiner (supra) at 299-301. See also RC Post 'The Constitutional Status of Commercial Speech' (2000) 48 U California LR 1, 8 (courts should not protect the values of market economy through free speech).

[3] See Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 399 ('Very little commercial advertising is intended to assert anything which could be regarded as truth, rather than persuade consumers to do something'.)

[4] We would note that certain commercial speech would amount to artistic expression.

[5] The Constitutional Court adopts a wide approach to 'expression' for purposes of FC s 16(1). See § 42.4 supra.

scale of constitutional rights values'.[1] Davis J in Ad Outpost, however, sounds the following cautionary note:

> The tendency to conclude uncritically that commercial expression bears less constitutional recognition than political or artistic speech needs to be evaluated carefully. So much speech is by its very nature directed towards persuading the listener to act in a particular manner that artificially created divisions between the value of different forms of speech requires critical scrutiny.[2]

Certain in-built limitations on the protection for commercial expression flow from a proper consideration of the major rationale for its protection — that it empowers consumers by providing them with a free flow of information of relevance in a market economy. This rationale cannot countenance the dissemination of, for instance, false and misleading advertisements, for which there can thus be no constitutional protection.[3] To the extent that numerous restrictions on advertising goods prohibit false and misleading advertisements, these will qualify as justifiable limitations of free speech.[4] But restrictions on truthful claims, say, comparative advertising or restrictions on professional advertising,[5] will be more difficult to defend.

How have South African courts assessed limitations on commercial speech? The two reported cases that are discussed next both deal with restrictions on

[1] Roundabout Outdoor (supra) at 635 (Kondile J endorses the view expressed by Gilbert Marcus and Derek Spitz that most commercial speech is of peripheral constitutional value. Ibid at 634 citing Marcus & Spitz 'Expression' (supra) at 20-50—20-51.) See also Central Hudson (supra) at 562 (Constitution accords lesser protection to commercial speech than other speech protected by the First Amendment); Markt Intern (supra) at para 33 (states enjoy greater discretion in regulation of commercial speech). But see Ad Outpost (supra) at 749. It is not universally accepted that commercial expression should enjoy lesser protection than other forms of expression. See 44 Liquormart v Rhode Island 517 US 484, 518 (1996)('44 Liquormart')(Thomas J stated: 'I do not see a philosophical or historical basis for asserting that 'commercial' speech is of 'lower value' than 'non-commercial' speech'.)

[2] Ad Outpost (supra) at 749.

[3] Cf A Nicol QC, G Millar QC & A Sharland Media Law and Human Rights (2001) 167. In contrast, with regard to defamatory speech implicating matters of public concern, publishers escape liability in South Africa and elsewhere even for publishing false statements of fact, provided the publication is reasonable. See § 42.9*(a)* supra.

[4] Cf Code of Advertising Practice of the Advertising Standards Authority para 4.2. Electronic Commincations Act 36 of 2005 s 55 requires that all broadcasting licensees adhere to this Code. Some statutory examples of (it is submitted, justifiable) restrictions on false and misleading advertising are: Merchandise Marks Act 17 of 1941 ss 6 and 7 (prohibiting false and forged trade marks, and false trade descriptions); Foodstuffs, Cosmetics and Disinfectants Act 54 of 1972 s 5; Trade Metrology Act 77 of 1973 s 37; Plant Improvement Act 53 of 1976 s 33; Trade Practices Act 76 of 1976 s 9(1) (prohibition on display of advert that is false or misleading in material respects); and Animal Improvement Act 62 of 1998 s 18.

[5] Restrictions on professional advertising have attracted judicial attention in a number of jurisdictions. See, for example, Ohralik v State Bar Association 436 US 447 (1978); In re Primus 436 US 412 (1978); Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario (1990) 71 DLR (4th) 68 (SCC); Casado Coca v Spain (1994) 18 EHRR 1.

billboard advertising. Thereafter, the approach to restrictions on commercial speech adopted in other jurisdictions is briefly considered.[1]

In Ad Outpost, the first respondent had been interdicted from erecting an advertising sign on property of the second respondent that was adjacent to the N1 highway. A by-law provided that any person who intended to display an advertising sign had first to seek permission from the City of Cape Town and that the sign itself could only contain stipulated details, such as the name and contact details of the occupier of the property. This effectively disallowed third parties such as the first respondent from advertising on premises occupied by others. Davis J held that the by-law breached the respondents' right to freedom of expression 'by prohibiting any form of a particular mode of advertising which it is seeking to communicate to a segment of the public'.[2] The crucial enquiry then became whether the limitation was justifiable in terms of FC s 36(1). Although restrictions on outdoor advertising to protect the environment were in principle defensible, it was significant that on the City's own evidence, the existing by-law was inadequate, especially in regard to advertising on others' premises. Davis J concluded that the blanket nature of the prohibition 'is contrary to the constitutional requirement that a desired result should be achieved by means which are least damaging to the constitutional right in question'.[3]

Ad Outpost should be contrasted with Roundabout Outdoor. This case also dealt with the erection of an advertising billboard in breach of by-laws. The Court distinguished this case from Ad Outpost on the ground that, while that case dealt with an absolute prohibition on a certain form of commercial speech, the by-law in Roundabout Outdoor only involved restrictions on the location of billboards. 'It is therefore sufficient' Kondile J held, 'if the restriction broadly advances the applicant's interest'.[4] The Court accepted that the measures adopted by the applicant were designed to achieve the twin objectives of ensuring traffic safety and preserving the appearance of the locality. These were substantial interests and the measures taken in the by-laws were 'rationally connected to a legitimate, substantial and pressing purpose of promoting public safety and welfare. They directly advance that purpose. They are the least restrictive measures that could have been employed by applicant to accomplish its purpose'.[5]

[1] Other significant areas within advertising law that may impact on free speech are political advertising restrictions and requirements that adverts should be decent. For discussion, see G Robertson QC & A Nicol QC Media Law (4th Edition, 2002) 712-714.

[2] Ad Outpost (supra) at 749. Cf Ramsden v Corporation of the City of Peterborough (1992) 7 CRR 288 (Ontario Court of Appeal)('Ramsden')(Third party advertising a form of communication protected by free speech).

[3] Ad Outpost (supra) at 750-1 (The applicant had conceded in a policy document that a new, balanced policy was required that would allow certain types of third party advertising.)

[4] Roundabout Outdoor (supra) at 635.

[5] Ibid at 635-6 (The Court referred with approval to the similar conclusions accepted in Ramsden (supra)(concern for traffic safety and aestheticism of city are pressing objectives), and by the Californian Supreme Court in Metromedia Inc v San Diego 453 US 490 (1981)(traffic safety and appearance of city substantial government goals).)

The United States position on the compatibility of restrictions on commercial speech with the First Amendment is set out in Central Hudson. The issue in this case was whether a ban on promotional advertising for gas and electricity services that sought to reduce the demand for electricity in the context of the 1970s energy crisis was constitutional. The Supreme Court laid down the following test for the constitutionality of commercial speech restrictions: commercial speech that concerns lawful activity and that is not misleading may only be restricted where the government interest in its regulation is substantial, the regulation directly advances the government interest, and the regulation is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest.[1] Although the ban in question served the substantial government interest in energy conservation, and advanced that interest, it covered all promotional advertising and hence was more extensive than was necessary.

In another leading US case on advertising restrictions, 44 Liquormart, the Supreme Court used its Central Hudson test to strike down statutes that prohibited advertisements publishing information concerning the price of alcoholic drinks.[2] The legitimate objective of moderating alcohol consumption was not significantly advanced by the total ban as no clear evidence had been led to show that the restriction reduced consumption.[3] Furthermore, according to the Court, steps less invasive of freedom of expression could have been taken to achieve the objective, such as an increased taxation on alcoholic products.[4]

The approach of the Supreme Court of Canada to advertising restrictions is reflected in Irwin Toy.[5] The starting point for the Court is that 'expression' is given a broad meaning for purposes of s 2*(b)* of the Canadian Charter so that virtually any material that conveys or attempts to convey a meaning is protected. Advertising aimed at children attempts to convey meaning and therefore amounts to protected expression. The next step is whether the purpose or effect of the legislation is to control, or attempt to control, the conveyance of meaning. If so, the legislation infringes the right to freedom of expression, and one must then assess whether the limitation is justified (or reasonable). On the facts of Irwin Toy, the

[1] Central Hudson (supra) at 566. The last leg of the Central Hudson test suggests that one applies a least restrictive means test to limitations of commercial expression (i.e. similar to the limitations test adopted under the Canadian Charter). This test was, however, qualified in a subsequent decision of the US Supreme Court. Board of Trustees of the State University of New York et al v Todd Fox 492 US 469, 109 SCt 3028, 3035 (1989)(Test requires simply a reasonable fit between the legislature's ends and the means adopted to accomplish those ends, which 'employs not necessarily the least restrictive means but . . . a means narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objective.')

[2] Supra.

[3] Ibid at 505.

[4] Ibid at 531 (Stevens J, with three other justices, correctly rejected the approach taken by the Court in Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v Tourism Co of Puerto Rico 478 US 328 (1986)(Court accepted the argument that if a state is permitted to ban a particular product, it could legitimately ban advertising for that product, even though the product remained legal.))

[5] Supra.

Court held that a statutory prohibition on all advertising directed at children under 13 was a reasonable limitation on the right to free speech as such advertising was inherently manipulative and advertisers could still target parents and other adults.[1]

The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights is also instructive in regard to the discretion afforded restrictions on commercial speech. In Markt Intern, a sharply-divided Court concluded that art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights had not been violated.[2] The applicants had published a bulletin including an article about the dissatisfaction of a customer who had not received the promised reimbursement of a beauty product ordered from a mail-order company that fell foul of a German statute prohibiting unfair competition. The Court held that states have a wide margin of appreciation in regard to regulating matters such as unfair competition and that the restriction on competition was proportionate.[3]

One specific topic that excites much controversy in this area is restrictions on tobacco advertising. In South Africa, s 3(1) of the Tobacco Products Control Act[4] prohibits the advertising of tobacco products in broad terms.[5] In assessing the constitutionality of this provision, guidance will no doubt be sought from the Canadian Supreme Court, particularly the decision in RJR-McDonald Inc v Attorney-General of Canada.[6] In this case, the Court narrowly rejected a blanket ban on all forms of tobacco advertising, except at the point of sale.[7] The majority of the Court (per McLachlin J) held that the prohibition's objective — the reduction of [1] It should be noted that the test adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court is the same as that adopted in cases not involving commercial expression. See, for example, Keegstra (supra) at 215-6 (Involving hate speech).

[2] Markt Intern (The Court was split 9-9, with the President exercising his casting vote in favour of the German government. The dissent was particularly concerned with the effect a deferential approach may have on the openness of business activities. Ibid at 177.) Other cases on unfair competition also indicate a deferential approach. See Jacubowski v Poland (1994) 19 EHRR 64 (Restraint from sending critical articles concerning former employer to journalists justifiable on the basis of unfair competition laws); Krone Verlag GmbH & Co KG (No 3) v Austria 2003 (Restraint on newspaper publishing comparison of its selling price relative to competitor a disproportionate interference with art 10).

[3] Markt Intern (supra) at para 32.

[4] Act 83 of 1993.

[5] Section 3(3), however, provides that a retailer of tobacco products may (in accordance with regulations) post signs at the point of sale that 'indicate the availability of tobacco products and their price'. A similar prohibition is contained in the United Kingdom Tobacco Advertising and Promotions Act 2002. See also R (On the application of British American Tobacco & Others) v Secretary of State for Health [2004] EWHC 2493 (Admin). Advertising bans on tobacco are called for in the International Framework Convention on Tobacco Control (2003).

[6] [1995] 3 SCR 199, (1995) 127 DLR (4th) 1 (SCC), 31 CRR (2d) 189 ('RJR-McDonald'). The issue has not been expressly considered by the US Supreme Court, though its rulings in Rubin v Coors Brewing Co 514 US 476 (1995) (restrictions on advertising alcohol content on beer compatible with First Amendment) and 44 Liquormart (supra) suggest that at least a total ban on the truthful advertising of a lawful product would not survive a First Amendment challenge. Cf also Lorillard Tobacco Co v Reilly, Attorney-General of Massachusetts 533 US 525 (2001).

[7] See Canadian Tobacco Products Control Act, 1988.

consumption and thus the reduction of smoking-related risks to health — was legitimate, but that the ban was wider than necessary. According to the majority of the Court, although tobacco advertisements that associated smoking with an attractive lifestyle (so-called lifestyle advertising) could be linked to increased consumption of tobacco, this connection had not been proved, and did not follow as a matter of 'reason or logic', in relation to other forms of advertising such as brand-preference advertising (which generally consists of the depiction of a product pack or trade marks) and informational advertising (which provides factual information about the product).[1] McLachlin J emphasised that the blanket ban deprived those who lawfully chose to smoke of information on 'price, quality and even health risks associated with the different brands'.[2]

Following the decision in RJR-McDonald, the Canadian Parliament enacted the Tobacco Act, 1997. This Act prohibits the advertising and promotion of tobacco products other than by means of 'information advertising' or 'brand-preference advertising' in adult publications or adult places.[3] The Act expressly carves out 'lifestyle advertising' and advertising that could reasonably be construed as appealing to young persons, from the provision allowing for information and brand-preference advertising.[4] In the sequel to RJR-McDonald, a challenge to this legislation again went all the way to the Canadian Supreme Court.[5] This time, in JTI-MacDonald the Court upheld the revised advertising and promotion ban, emphasising the deference that should be paid to the legislature in this area as well as the significant harms associated with tobacco consumption. McLachlin CJC explained the Court's attitude as follows: '[w]hen commercial expression is used, as alleged here, for the purposes of inducing people to engage in harmful and addictive behaviour, its value becomes tenuous'.[6]

The advertising ban in s 3(1) of the South African Tobacco Products Control Act goes further than the legislation which formed the subject of JTI-MacDonald and is more akin to that contained in the predecessor legislation that was considered in RJR-McDonald. The South African legislation includes within its ambit so-called brand-preference and informational advertising and, on the authority of RJR-McDonald, in our view goes too far in limiting freedom of expression. If challenged, s 3(1) may well not survive constitutional scrutiny.

[1] RJR-McDonald (supra) at para 164.
[2] Ibid at para 170. RJR-McDonald also dealt with whether manufacturers could be compelled to insert heath warnings on cigarette packets. The majority of the Court held that this also offended freedom of expression. This view accepts the proposition that a right to freedom of expression also includes a right not to speak. In the US, a requirement that lawyers had to disclose certain fee information was held not to infringe the First Amendment. Zauderer v Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Ohio 471 US 626 (1985).
[3] Sections 22(1) and (2).
[4] Section 22(3).
[5] Canada (Attorney General) v JTI-MacDonald Corp 2007 SCC 30.
[6] Ibid at para 47.

(g) Restrictions in the interest of national security, defence and intelligence

The intersection between legitimate state restriction of information in the interests of national security and freedom of expression in a democratic society is a fault line that yields inevitable conflict. The legitimacy of unsupervised state national security restriction rests on a premise that owes allegiance to a particular conception of democracy: the executive elected by and accountable to a democratic Parliament may be entrusted with restricting information in the best interests of society. However, this conception must compete with the libertarian conception that such power may be abused and must therefore be carefully regulated. The very nature of information restriction makes it difficult to regulate; without access to information it is difficult to challenge the basis or legitimacy of any particular restriction. Moreover, in the context of national security there is a risk, perhaps more so than in any other context, that the government will restrict the flow of information in its own, as opposed to the national, interest. As will appear from the discussion that follows, courts and legislatures alike struggle to articulate principles to delineate the legitimate restriction of information on national security grounds in a democratic society. In this section, we first critically examine the various sources of restrictions and then consider the approach of courts to conflicts between national security claims and freedom of expression, particularly media freedom.

(i) General national security restrictions

The sources of South African national security restrictions are to be found not in a single coherent statutory setting but under cover of a variety of statutes, regulations, directives, policy instruments and other materials. Some of them, as described below, are quite secretive and obscure.

(aa) The Constitution

As the Constitutional Court has recently affirmed,[1] the Constitution itself imposes upon legislative and executive organs of state the powers and duties to preserve the peace of the Republic and secure the well-being of its people,[2] to defend and protect the Republic,[3] to maintain national security,[4] to establish and maintain intelligence services[5] and to combat crime.[6] Chapter 11 of the Constitution, in particular, sets out the framework for the establishment and conduct of the

[1] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening as Amicus Curiae*)* 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC) at para 49 ('Independent Newspapers').
[2] FC s 41(1)(a) and (b).
[3] FC s 200(2).
[4] FC ss 44(2)(a), 146(2)(c)(i) and 198.
[5] FC s 209(1).
[6] FC s 205(3).

security services and, notably, articulates specific principles which govern national security.[1] Effect is given to these obligations 'through legislation, the establishment of institutions as permitted by law and by the exercise of executive authority vested in the President and the Cabinet.'[2]

(bb) Minimum Information Security Standards

In the exercise of this executive authority, the Cabinet, in 1996,[3] approved the Minimum Information Security Standards ('MISS') as the national security policy. MISS was adopted to replace the Guidelines for the Protection of Classified Information[4] which were a product of the apartheid cabinet. MISS has not been published in any official document nor is it generally publicised[5] though it is applicable to all departments and organs of state.

The preface and introduction to MISS, which sets the context for the guidelines, indicate some awareness of the need for openness in an open and democratic society,[6] but the same cannot, as we explain below, be said of the restrictive classification regime that it sanctions. The MISS guidelines themselves are extensive and detailed, dealing with wide-ranging aspects of national security policy.

[1] FC s 198 provides:

Governing principles

The following principles govern national security in the Republic:

(a) National security must reflect the resolve of South Africans, as individuals and as a nation, to live as equals, to live in peace and harmony, to be free from fear and want and to seek a better life.

(b) The resolve to live in peace and harmony precludes any South African citizen from participating in armed conflict, nationally or internationally, except as provided for in terms of the Constitution or national legislation.

(c) National security must be pursued in compliance with the law, including international law.

(d) National security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive.

[2] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 49.

[3] Curiously there is some discrepancy about when precisely MISS was adopted by Cabinet. The face of the MISS document itself reflects that it was adopted on 4 December 1996. The Minister, however, in his answering affidavit before the Constitutional Court in Independent Newspapers (supra) indicated that it was adopted on 4 December 1998 and this is the date recorded in the judgment. See Independent Newspapers (supra) para 49.

[4] SP 2/8/1 (March 1988).

[5] Conspicuously, MISS does not appear amongst the official documents and legislation published on the National Intelligence Agency or the Ministry of Intelligence websites. See www.nia.org.za or www.intelligence.gov.za (accessed on 14 September 2008).

[6] The Preface records:

> The world and especially South Africa has changed dramatically during the last few years, with profound implications for our society, our government, the South African Police Service, the Defence and Intelligence Communities. Our understanding of the range of issues that impact on national security is evolving.

While the Introduction states:

> The need for secrecy and therefore security measures in a democratic and open society, with transparency in its governmental administration, is currently the subject of much debate, and will continue to be for a long time.
>
> However, the issue need not be controversial, since the intended Open Democracy Act (not yet promulgated at the time of going to press) itself will acknowledge the need for protection of sensitive information, and therefore, will provide justified exemption from disclosure of such information.

These include provision and application of security measures,[1] document security (including all aspects of classification),[2] personnel security (including vetting and security screening),[3] communication security,[4] computer security,[5] physical security,[6] breaches of security[7] and division of responsibilities with respect to the practice of security.[8] It is remarkable in itself that, in a constitutional democracy founded in part on openness, a document so broad in scope and setting out the detailed constraints upon the exercise of power to withhold information from the public domain, which has the form of regulations or legislation, and which potentially results in the imposition of severe criminal sanctions[9] should not be published through the standard mechanisms for government publication and, at the very least, gazetted.

The heart of MISS is the document classification regime.[10] Four levels of classification are introduced and defined.[11] The definitions of each level of classification are obscure, employing extremely vague concepts and requiring the official applying her mind to classification to draw distinctions. For example, 'confidential' is defined as information which may be used 'by malicious/opposing/hostile elements to harm the objectives and functions of an individual and/or institution',[12] as opposed to 'secret' information which may be used by the same elements to 'disrupt' the same individuals or institutions.[13] The thresholds for classification are also set at impermissibly low levels; classification is permissible if harm or disruption 'may' result. This has the constitutionally impermissible result that speculative harm to national security may be used as a cloak for secrecy.[14]

[1] MISS chapter 3.
[2] MISS chapter 4.
[3] MISS chapter 5.
[4] MISS chapter 6.
[5] MISS chapter 7.
[6] MISS chapter 8.
[7] MISS chapter 9.
[8] MISS Appendix A
[9] While no criminal sanctions are set out in MISS it is arguable that the legislation that we discuss below, and that criminalises the disclosure of classified information, applies to the disclosure of documents that are classified under MISS. See §§ 42.9*(g)(i)(cc) and 42.9(g)*(ii). This contention was advanced by the Minister for Intelligence in Independent Newspapers (supra), but the Constitutional Court did not need to deal with its correctness.
[10] MISS chapter 4, ss 1-17.
[11] MISS chapter 2 defines these categories as 'restricted', 'confidential', 'secret' and 'top secret'.
[12] MISS chapter 2 s 3.4.2.
[13] MISS chapter 2 s 3.4.3.
[14] Our highest courts have eschewed the ability of government to restrict free speech based on speculative harm in numerous contexts. See, for example, S v Mamabolo (e-TV & Another intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC) at para 45 ('Mamabolo'); Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) at para 50 ('Laugh It Off'); Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA) at para 19. See also Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 165 (Sachs J). See also § 42.4 supra. Many foreign jurisdictions also require more than a possibility of harm to national security before classification can occur. See, for example, USA Executive Order 13292 (25 March 2003) s 1.2; UK's Official Secrets Act, 1989 s 1(4); and New Zealand's government policy entitled 'Security in the Government Sector' available at http://www.security. govt.nz/sigs/html/index.html (accessed on 18 June 2008).

Moreover, in terms of MISS, responsibility for classification rests with the author or head of the state institution concerned, or his delegate.[1] This casts the net of those authorised to impose classification, and therefore remove information from the public domain, widely. In our opinion, not only does MISS not contain adequate safeguards against intentional abuse but its lack of clarity means that there is also little chance of consistent application of these classification concepts by decision-makers acting with the best of intentions.

MISS itself does not create offences, but a range of offences, with severe penalties, for unlawful disclosure of classified information are created under a number of different pieces of legislation, including the Protection of Information Act.

(cc) Protection of Information Act

It is striking that the central legislative pillar of information restriction in South Africa, the Protection of Information Act ('PIA'), was enacted and applied in the apartheid era.[2] It is equally striking that this Act is notable for its paucity. It is almost exclusively dedicated to the creation of a myriad of complex and serious offences connected with the unlawful disclosure of restricted and classified information,[3] as well as legal mechanisms, such as evidentiary presumptions, for facilitating easier conviction.[4] This is, in and of itself, unsurprising in an Act intended to be used under an undemocratic, oppressive dispensation which perceived threats to its existence everywhere and which was intended to shore-up the tyranny of the executive. The less said by Parliament under those circumstances, the easier it would be for the executive to act without constraint.

However, that this legislation has been allowed to remain for so long on the statute books is, at the very least, neglectful. Parliament has now signalled its intention to repeal the Act and to replace it with new legislation by the same name. This is to be welcomed, at least in principle, as is the much more detailed and extensive nature of the Protection of Information Bill presently under consideration.[5] This new Bill aims to formalise in legislation and subsequent regulations much of what has up to now been unarticulated or left to executive discretion, policy and directives. The Bill also intends to consolidate in a single legislative instrument some of what is presently to be found across a disparate body of sources. This too is to be welcomed, although we submit that the Bill in its current form falls short of this objective.[6]

[1] MISS chapter 4 s 1.2.
[2] Act 84 of 1982.
[3] PIA ss 2-7.
[4] PIA ss 8-10.
[5] B28-2008, published in GG 30885 (18 March 2008).
[6] The Bill, in its current form, would, for instance, not disturb the classification regime created by the Defence Act 42 of 2002, or that set out in the Intelligence Services Act 65 of 2002. These regimes are discussed in § 42.9*(g)*(ii)(aa) and (cc) respectively.

In too many respects, the content of the Bill shares too much in common with its apartheid namesake and, in certain respects, including aspects of its most fundamental conceptual apparatus, it surrenders even more ground to vaguely defined executive power. Viewed from the perspective of democratic theory, the Bill places increased strain on the legitimising premise: 'trust your democratically elected government to act in the national interest'.

We submit that any legislation that is ultimately passed should embody at least three core characteristics. First, classification (and any restriction of information more generally) should be predicated only on 'national security' threats and not upon broader concepts such as 'the national interest'. Moreover, 'national security' should be clearly and narrowly defined. Secondly, the threshold tests for harm that may arise from the disclosure of the information concerned must be similarly clearly defined in respect of each level of classification that may be imposed, and the harm that may result must be of a significant nature.[1] In particular, mere speculative harm — which, as we observed above, is sufficient under the current MISS guidelines — should not be a sufficient basis for classification.[2] Thirdly, in order to strike the correct balance between the legitimate interests of national security and the constitutional value of openness (including guarding against abuse of classification), it is crucial that the legislation should provide for a 'public interest defence' to permit disclosure of classified information where it is demonstrated that there was a legitimate public interest for such disclosure.[3]

(ii) Other legislative entrenchment of national security restrictions

(aa) The Defence Act

The Constitution provides for a separate intelligence division of the Defence Force[4] which, along with the other intelligence agencies, is to be regulated by

[1] In its present form, we would submit that the harm upon which classification is predicated in the Bill is too vaguely defined and speculative. A classification of (1) 'confidential' is required where the information concerned is 'sensitive information' the disclosure of which may 'be harmful to the security or national interest of the Republic or could prejudice the Republic in its international relations.' (2) 'secret', where it is also 'sensitive information' which may 'endanger' rather than 'harm' the 'national interest' or 'jeopardise' rather than 'prejudice' international relations and (3) 'top secret' where it is 'sensitive information' which may cause 'serious or irreparable harm' to the 'national interest' or cause states to sever their relations with the Republic. Protection of Information Bill ss 20(1), (2) and (3). In this form we would submit that there is a real danger that the legislation is constitutionally overbroad.

[2] It is noteworthy that even the equivalent United States security laws, enacted by the Bush Administration after September 11 2001 and in an atmosphere of fear and repression, as well as a state of war, sets a higher standard for restrictions requiring, for example, that a classification of 'top secret' requires that unauthorised disclosure of the information concerned could reasonably be expected to 'cause exceptionally grave damage to the national security' which the classifying authority is 'able to identify and describe'. Executive Order 12958 (March 25 2003) s 1.2. Each of the three levels of classification is predicated on 'national security' only and the classifying authority is required to articulate the nature of the threat. Moreover, the authority to classify as 'top secret' and 'secret' are restricted to a select group of senior members of the executive (in the case of 'top secret' only the President, the Vice President or an agency head or their delegate). US Executive Order s 1.3.

[3] In its present form there is no such provision in the Bill.

[4] FC s 209.

national legislation. Chapter 6 of the Defence Act[1] preserves the Intelligence Division that was previously in existence[2] and requires it to 'gather, correlate, evaluate and use strategic intelligence', inter alia, for the purpose of ensuring national security. [3] The Defence Act furthermore provides in considerable detail for levels of security clearance for personnel and the review of such levels of security clearance.[4] It also provides for civilian monitoring of the Intelligence Division through an inspector as required by the Constitution.[5] The Defence Act criminalises the disclosure of information[6] classified in terms of the Act and a wide range of activities associated with 'classified facilities,'[7] and provides severe penalties for contraventions.[8] Curiously however, the Defence Act does not expressly provide for the manner of classification of information, levels of classification, the standards or criteria for classification nor identify those with the power to classify. These fundamental constraints on the abuse of this power are left unregulated and subject to a vague implied power which is presupposed by the above provisions.

(bb) The National Key Points Act

The National Key Points Act[9] is apartheid era legislation that empowers the Minister in a broad array of specified circumstances, including when it is considered to be in the 'public interest', to declare a place or area a 'national key point'. The consequence of this classification is that a range of special security measures may be attached to the area concerned. The Act creates a number of offences in relation to certain activities associated with a 'key point' including, for example, the disclosure of any information concerning security measures at a key point.[10] There is, furthermore, no requirement that key points be publicly identified and there is no publicly available list of places that have been declared key points.[11] Moreover, the Act criminalises conduct by reference to repealed apartheid legislation,[12] notably the notorious Official Secrets Act.[13] While such offences may be argued to be defunct, the continued reference to them is testimony to the dubious

[1] Defence Act 42 of 2002 ('Defence Act').
[2] Defence Act s 33.
[3] Defence Act s 34.
[4] Defence Act ss 37-41.
[5] FC s 210*(b)*; Defence Act s 42.
[6] Defence Act s 104(7) even if such disclosure is by way of 'gesture'.
[7] Defence Act s 104(19).
[8] 5 years imprisonment under s 104(7) and 25 years under s 104(19).
[9] National Key Points Act 102 of 1980 ('Key Points Act').
[10] Key Points Act s 10(2)(b).
[11] This lacuna in the law has obvious implications for the publicity requirement of the rule of law.
[12] Key Points Act s 10(1).
[13] Act 16 of 1956.

pedigree of the Act. Parliament has indicated its intention to repeal the Key Points Act under the revised PIA, referred to above. However, the intention is that the operative features of the Key Points Act will be preserved in the new legislation.

(cc) The Intelligence Services Act

Disclosure of classified information is also an offence under the Intelligence Services Act.[1] There are a number of concerning aspects to the regulation regime under the Act. For example, the Minister of Intelligence has promulgated extensive regulations governing various aspects of the intelligence services[2] but which, conspicuously, do not deal with classification. In addition, in terms of this Act the Director General of any of the intelligence services may, subject to the approval of the Minister of Intelligence, issue 'functional directives' applicable to the protection of classified information.[3] However, it is unclear whether any of the Directors General has issued functional directives as contemplated. There is no record of this in any government notice, nor is it apparently recorded in a Government Gazette. On the assumption that such functional directives have been issued, it would, it is submitted, be contrary to the rule of law and unconstitutional on this basis alone, for the fact of such directives not to be publicised. An essential element of law is that it must be publicised and readily ascertainable.[4] Moreover, secret directives would be contrary to the requirements of an open and democratic society.

(dd) Other legislation

A range of other legislation gives effect to national security restrictions. The Promotion of Access to Information Act provides for refusal of a request for information on grounds of national security.[5] Moreover, where the disclosure of the existence of information may itself endanger national security, the relevant official may refuse to confirm or deny its existence.[6] While the exercise of these powers is undoubtedly reviewable under the Constitution for legality, there are considerable practical obstacles to any such review. It is difficult to review the restriction of information the content of which one is ignorant, let alone where one is ignorant of its very existence. Although not in the context of PAIA, the Constitutional Court has refused an interlocutory application[7] for limited access

[1] Intelligences Services Act 65 of 2002 s26.
[2] Intelligence Services Regulations GN R1505 GG 25592 (16 October 2003)
[3] Intelligences Services Act s 10(3)(d)
[4] See F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constituiton' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS March 2005) Chapter 11.
[5] Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000 ('PAIA') s 41.
[6] PAIA s 41(4).
[7] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 21.

to documents by a party and its legal representatives in order to challenge restrictions on the disclosure of the document, even though the restricted material concerned had been in the public domain for several weeks and had already received wide circulation to the clerks and administrators of the court,[1] the lower court as well as the attorneys and counsel for the State. Undoubtedly, the courts themselves may require sight of such information even where it is denied to those who seek to challenge its restriction.[2] Notably, PAIA also provides for a general public interest override under which the relevant information officer is required to disclose information which would otherwise be justifiably withheld when such disclosure meets a high public interest threshold.[3]

Various provisions in legislation governing nuclear power[4] provide for national security restrictions, create serious offences for transgression and provide for a judicial discretion in proceedings under these statutes to restrict public access to the court and to the record. This however was found in Geiges[5] not to entitle the prosecution to a blanket restriction on public access to proceedings. Moreover, any claims to state restriction of nuclear secrets would, for the same reasons articulated above, be susceptible, at least in principle, to scrutiny by the courts.

Finally, various other pieces of apartheid legislation that contain restrictions on information and are arguably arbitrary and overbroad, remain on the statute books. These provisions are of doubtful constitutional validity.[6]

(iii) Case law

The conception of separation of powers which the Constitution embodies does not preserve for the legislature or executive the ultimate determination as to whether a matter is necessary for national security.[7] This reflects one of the fundamental changes between the pre- and post-constitutional dispensations: Today, the courts are the final arbiters of the exercise of state power even, or perhaps more particularly, where such power is exercised in the name of national security. This is the necessary effect of constitutional supremacy[8] and the role of the courts as the institution ultimately responsible for the interpretation and application of the Constitution.[9]

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 143 and 149.

[2] Independent Newspapers, discussed in greater detail below, stating that the state's claims to restriction on grounds of national security are not decisive and do not oust the Court's jurisdiction.

[3] PAIA s 46.

[4] Nuclear Energy Act 46 of 1999 ('the NEA') in particular s 21(2)(b); Non-Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction Act 87 of 1993 ('the NPWMDA') in particular s 52(1).

[5] S v Geiges & Others (M & G Media Ltd & Others Intervening) 2007 (2) SACR 507 (T)('Geiges'), discussed further above. See § 42.9*(c)*(i) supra.

[6] See, for example, The National Supplies Procurement Act 89 of 1970 in particular s 8B.

[7] For more on separation of powers generally, see S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[8] FC s 2.

[9] FC s 165.

Although these doctrines are easy enough to assert at the level of high principle, it is the manner in which the courts interpret and apply them in particular cases at particular historical moments that defines the true contours of this fundamental judicial power in a constitutional democracy. For example, the courts in the United States, which enjoy similar constitutional powers of interpretation and review,[1] have at certain times strongly and dramatically asserted this power in blocking government action premised on uninterrogated claims of national security or the national interest, but at other times they have extended broad deference to such actions.[2] In the influential Pentagon Papers case, the Court declined to grant a prior restraint on publication of material that the government contended would be damaging to the national security if disclosed.[3] In a string of separate concurring judgments the majority judges laid down or reaffirmed principles that emphasised the readiness of the courts to interrogate government claims of national security or national interest over the right to freedom of expression.

Although these judgments are examined in more detail elsewhere in this chapter,[4] there are a few noteworthy points at this stage. The first is the refusal of the Court to recognise any residual or inherent power to obtain a prior restraint on the basis of a general assertion of national security. The state was required to point to specific powers extended to it. This it could not do.[5] There was no doubt of the President's power, for example, to classify information.[6] However, that power was not relied upon in Pentagon Papers. Secondly, the court emphasised the heavy presumption in favour of the First Amendment and press freedom over national security.[7] The presumption arose, inter alia, from the paramount responsibility of the free press to prevent government from deceiving the people.[8] Thirdly, surmise and conjecture was not acceptable. The government could not approach the court with mere statements of conclusions[9] that a particular act would damage national security. Only governmental allegation supported by proof that publication must 'inevitably, directly and immediately'[10] cause the perceived harm to national security would be sufficient to support even an interim restraining order restricting the media's freedom to publish.

[1] Though implied rather than express, and exercised on the authority of the seminal judicial precedent of Marbury v Madison. 5 US (1 Cranch) 137 (1803).

[2] Focusing more pertinently on fair trial rights and national security rather than freedom of expression, see Hamdan v Rumsfeld 548 US 557 (2006)(Made limited inroads into the military commissions established in terms of the United States Military Commissions Act of 2006 and particularly the ability of Guantanamo Bay prisoners to challenge their classification as 'enemy combatants'). But see, more recently, Boumediene v Bush 553 US — (2008)(United States Supreme Court, by 5-4 majority, ruled that Guantanamo Bay prisoners do enjoy the protection of the United States Constitution.)

[3] New York Times v US 403 US 713 (1971), 91 W Ct 2140, 29 LEd 2d 822 ('New York Times v US', also referred to as 'Pentagon Papers').

[4] For more on Pentagon Papers, see § 42.9*(h)* infra.

[5] New York Times v US (supra) at 720-724.

[6] Ibid at 741 (Marshall J concurring).

[7] Ibid at 723 (Douglas J concurring).

[8] Ibid at 717 (Black J concurring).

[9] Ibid at 727 (Brennan J concurring).

[10] Ibid at 726-727 (Brennan J concurring).

Our own jurisprudence dealing with the clash between the state's national security claims and fundamental rights, particularly freedom of expression and open justice, is in its infancy. In the few cases that have arisen, our courts have laid down some promising foundational principles, though in the application of these principles there is evidence of a deference to the executive's national security assertions.

An important preliminary principle flows from the Constitutional Court's decision that whether legislation is necessary for national security purposes is objectively justiciable in the context of separation of powers between national and provincial legislatures.[1] If the question is objectively justiciable in that context then it is difficult to see how it would not be held to be justiciable also in other contexts where the issue may arise.

The most important case in this area is Independent Newspapers[2] where the Constitutional Court for the first time asserted a number of important foundational principles. The case is considered in detail earlier in this chapter,[3] but it is useful to summarise these principles again here. One, and most significantly, the Court (both the minority and majority)[4] rejected the state's contention that the classification of a document ousts the courts' jurisdiction to consider the justification for such classification and, if necessary, to lift it: The 'mere ipse dixit of the minister concerned does not place such documents beyond the reach of the courts'.[5] Two, while the Court accepted that openness of court proceedings — and the necessary corollary of freedom to publish — is the 'default position',[6] the Court rejected the principle that restrictions on public access to court proceedings, and accordingly media freedom to report, is permissible only in exceptional circumstances.[7] Three, the Court refused to mandate a formal application procedure whenever the state seeks a restriction on this ground or to find that the state bears a true onus of demonstrating that the restriction is justifiable. The Court preferred to adopt a weaker and, in our opinion, more ephemeral test of 'balancing' or 'weighing' the competing rights or interests in favour of restriction versus the right to report, under the rubric of an ultimate determination of the interests of justice in the circumstances of each case.[8] While the Court was prepared to set

[1] Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly, Ex p: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the RSA 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 155 (The statement was made in the context of applying the 'tie-breaker' provisions under FC s146. FC s 146(2)(c) provides in effect that national legislation prevails over provincial legislation when 'the national legislation is necessary for. . . the maintenance of national security'.)

[2] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening as Amicus Curiae*)* 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC) para 49 ('Independent Newspapers').

[3] See § 42.9*(c)(i)* supra.

[4] In his dissenting judgment Yacoob J agreed with this finding. Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 89.

[5] Ibid at paras 53-54.

[6] Ibid at para 43.

[7] Ibid.

[8] Ibid at paras 55-56.

out some actors[1] that may be relevant to the determination of the 'interests of justice' test, it was reluctant to articulate firm principles.[2]

Elsewhere in this chapter,[3] we have expressed a preference for the approach of the minority in Independent Newspapers, namely, to apply a test akin to the limitations analysis to determine whether rights to open justice and freedom of expression should be curtailed in the interests of national security. Despite the majority's finding to the contrary,[4] we are of the view that an approach that permits limitation only to the extent demonstrably 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society' is more in keeping with the constitutional entrenchment of open justice and media freedom.

The correctness of this approach, even where the case involves potential disclosure of nuclear secrets, is supported by Geiges. In this case, decided before Independent Newspapers, the prosecuting authority sought to conduct an entire criminal trial, concerning serious charges of unlawful disclosure of nuclear secrets and sale of associated technology, in camera. Referring extensively to the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence in respect of open justice and media freedom, the Court held that such a blanket secrecy order was hopelessly overbroad and that restrictions on disclosure should be evaluated and ordered in the course of the criminal proceedings themselves.

Morevoer, at the jurisprudential level, as we have argued earlier,[5] the Independent Newspapers majority's repeated resort to a vague balancing of interests and rights under the umbrella of the interests of justice introduces much uncertainty and has ultimate consequences for the rule of law. This is illustrated by the difference between the minority and majority judgments in Independent Newspapers. While the minority preferred an approach akin to the limitations enquiry, it was prepared

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 55 (The court will have regard to 'all germane factors' which include 'the nature of the proceedings; the extent and character of the materials sought to be kept confidential; the connection of the information to national security; the grounds advanced for claiming disclosure or for refusing it; whether the information is already in the public domain and if so, in what circumstances it reached the public domain; for how long and to what extent it has been in the public domain; and, finally, the impact of the disclosure or non-disclosure on the ultimate fairness of the proceedings before a court.' The Court emphasised that these factors are neither comprehensive nor dispositive of the enquiry.)

[2] Ibid at paras 56-57.

[3] See § 42.9*(c)(i)* supra.

[4] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 44. This finding flows from what we would submit to be a fundamentally flawed premise which grounded the Court's reasoning; namely, that the Court was confronted by equal and competing constitutional claims, on the one hand the rights to press freedom and open justice and on the other hand 'government's obligation to pursue national security'. Ibid at para 56. The government's obligation to ensure national security is regulated by legislation under the Constitution. It is not of comparable status to the fundamental rights with which it is 'balanced' by the Court. Implicitly, the Court found that the executive enjoys an inherent and residual right to assert national security at any time. This type of 'right' has been rejected by the courts in the United States. See New York Times v US.

[5] See § 42.7*(d)*(ii)(bb) supra.

to apply, for the sake of argument,[1] the 'interests of justice' approach preferred by the majority. Applying the majority's test, Yacoob J came to a starkly different conclusion on the facts. Yacoob J undertook a careful analysis of the documents which the Minister persisted in objecting to forming part of the public record.[2] Yacoob J rigorously demonstrated that in many instances the contents of the remaining restricted materials were already in the public domain, having been widely reported on previously. This tipped the balance decisively against restriction.[3] Moreover, Yacoob J demonstrated that in the case of some of the restricted material, a primary motivation for the state's objection appeared to be avoiding embarrassment.[4] This too was not a legitimate factor to weigh in the balance.[5] Notably, while both the minority and majority recognised that much of the material which the Minister sought to restrict was not classified[6] — and peculiarly in the case of one of the documents, was classified in the course of the proceedings themselves — this fact did not feature in the majority's evaluation. This is in stark contrast to the approach adopted by the United States Supreme Court, where the failure to point to a specific power — rather than an 'inherent' or 'residual' power — under which documents were restricted would be a decisive factor against allowing them to be withheld from publication.[7]

Compared to the majority's interests of justice 'balancing' approach, limitations analysis requires a far more careful analysis. The requirements of a limitations analysis are considered in considerable detail elsewhere in this work,[8] but, in essence, the limitations analysis involves an investigation into the proportionality between the object sought to be achieved (which must be legitimate) and the constitutionally invasive means of achieving that object.[9] As indicated above, Yacoob J did not in fact apply the limitations analysis test for which he advocated, but a limitations-type approach would presumably have excluded issues of embarrassment and the fact that material was already in the public domain as bases for

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 82 and 85.

[2] Ibid at paras 90-136.

[3] This principle has been applied in the United Kingdom where restraints on publication have been sought based on national security claims. See Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers (Ltd) & Others (No 2) [1988] 3 All ER 638 ('Spycatcher Case').

[4] The National Intelligence Agency operatives, on instructions from their seniors, had engaged in an unlawful surveillance operation of Sakumzi Macozoma. They had been exposed early in the operation when they were observed by a private security company in their own vehicles, rather than unmarked NIA vehicles, who summoned the police.

[5] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 118.

[6] Ibid at para 51.

[7] New York Times v US (supra) at 720-724.

[8] S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[9] See, for example, National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 556 (CC) at para 33; S v Manamela (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC) at para 33.

allowing restriction because there would be no rational connection between the restriction and the legitimate object of national security. Moreover, as the minority demonstrated, in many instances the restrictions were overbroad and capable of being more narrowly-tailored, such as by redaction of the names of sensitive individuals, in order to achieve the legitimate national security objects. The search for less restrictive means is an explicit part of the limitations analysis that makes it more likely that courts using this approach will consider alternative options that do not tread as heavily on freedom of expression.

Perhaps the most critical distinction between the judgments of the minority and majority in Independent Newspapers was in the approach to the background circumstances of the proceedings themselves. Yacoob J was at pains to emphasise as a foundation of his reasoning that the newspaper had not approached the Court on self-interested grounds but in fulfilment of its constitutional obligation to keep the public informed.[1] It had come to court urgently, in circumstances where an appeal record and heads of argument had been removed from the public domain, when none of the parties to the proceedings in the courts below had sought to restrict the materials from the public record[2] and where the appeal in which the record was restricted concerned matters which were of the highest public interest. The underlying proceedings involved the suspension and dismissal of the Director General of Intelligence by the President following abuse of the state intelligence structures including the unlawful surveillance of a private citizen.[3] There were, furthermore, suggestions that these activities had been carried out in furtherance of political objectives. Yacoob J's careful analysis of the material reveals that a discrepancy between one particular document over which the Minister asserted secrecy[4] and the version of the document released to the public was deliberately calculated to conceal the unlawful activities of the National Intelligence Agency and was an exercise in public deceit.[5] This background was critical to the interests of justice enquiry for Yacoob J, though it received little express consideration in the balancing of the majority. As Yacoob J articulated it:

> [T]he circumstances in which an intelligence agency came to improperly and unlawfully infringe upon the privacy of an innocent citizen are not merely matters of public curiosity. They would be issues of immense public interest. The degree of public interest is an important factor to be put into the balance and would, in my view, not be of insignificant weight if the interest is one that must be fulfilled.[6]

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 142.

[2] These facts (public importance and the removal of an otherwise unrestricted record only on appeal) were recognised by the majority. Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 3-7 and 42.

[3] Ibid at para 103.

[4] The report of the Inspector General of Intelligence into the unlawful activities undertaken by the NIA operatives. The IGI's report was restricted while a 'sanitised' version was released to the public. As Yacoob J's analysis demonstrates, the sanitised version did not simply remove security sensitive information, but had distorted certain elements of the report. Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 127.

[5] Independent Newspapers (supra) at paras 127-136.

[6] Ibid at para 88.

(h) Prior restraints on publication

Prior restraints impose restrictions on speech before the speech is ventilated in the public domain; they seek to ensure that the affected speech never sees the light of day. We have already considered prior restraints in the context of defamation, privacy and contempt of court law.[1] In this section we briefly consider a number of other areas of free speech law in which prior restraints may be used to silence speech. The most common are film and video censorship regimes, and judicial interdicts prohibiting publication.[2]

(i) The presumption against prior restraints

In principle, a commitment to freedom of expression requires that courts view prior restraints as unconstitutional unless exceptional factors are present. Historically, freedom of expression and especially the right to a free press have been regarded as encompassing, at their very basic level, the freedom to publish first and suffer the consequences, if any, thereafter.[3] This basic point of departure has been eloquently articulated by Blackstone:

> Every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public … but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity.[4]

The contrast is therefore between restraints on publication at the outset, and subsequent criminal or civil sanctions that may be visited upon the speech once it has been published. It is submitted that prior restraints are clearly more invasive of free speech than subsequent sanction; while the latter may be said to 'chill' free speech, the former can legitimately be regarded as freezing speech.[5] There are a number of reasons for the hostility towards prior restraints:[6] they replace speech

[1] See §§ 42.9*(a), 42.9(b)* and 42.9*(c)*(iv)(aa) supra.

[2] Other forms of prior restraint are discernable. For example, permit requirements that regulate public meetings could be regarded as prior restraints on free speech. See, for example, Re Munhumeso & Others 1995 (1) SA 551 (ZS)(regulations requiring consent to public processions not reasonably justifiable in interests of public safety); Mulundika v The People (1996) 1 BHRC 199 (SC Zambia)(requirement to obtain prior permission for public gatherings infringes the freedom of speech and assembly). See generally V Blasi 'Prior Restraints and Demonstrations' (1970) 68 Michigan LR 1481. See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 43.

[3] F Abrams 'The Press Is Different: Reflections on Justice Stewart and the Autonomous Press' (1979) 7 Hofstra LR 563, 576.

[4] W Blackstone Commentaries on the Laws of England Book IV (1765) 151-152. See also Greene v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2005] QB 972 (CA)('Greene') at paras 42-43.

[5] A Bickel The Morality of Consent (1975) 61; H Fenwick & G Phillipson Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) 153. For a provocative contrasting view, see Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 119-121.

[6] See generally Marcus & Spitz 'Expression' (supra) at 20-25–20-26.

with state-sanctioned silence; they are issued in circumstances where courts are, at least to a degree, engaged in speculative adjudication based on hypothetical harms that may or may not occur;[1] and, as with other forms of censorship, they result in self-censorship as citizen-critics check their behaviour to avoid having such restraints visited upon them.[2]

(ii) Legislative prior restraint

The Films and Publications Act[3] regulates films by means of a classification system; all films must be submitted for classification before they may be screened or distributed.[4] Films classified as XX or X18 may not be screened in public or distributed.[5] The classification committee may also compel the excision of certain parts of the film.[6] Comparative jurisprudence indicates that such administrative controls on speech are acceptable provided that these controls contemplate procedural safeguards against adverse rulings, such as a right to a prompt judicial determination on the merits.[7] The South African legislation appears to be compliant with this jurisprudence; for instance, there are provisions that afford affected persons rights of appearance and representation before the committee, and provision is made for rights of appeal to a Review Board and then to the High Court.[8] This is not to say that the substantive provisions of the FPA that regulate when films may be banned or scenes excised necessarily escape unscathed; these will have to be tested independently, as has happened, for instance, to the prohibition of child pornography.[9] While films are subjected to [1] See Greene (supra) at para 57.

[2] See generally the discussion in G Robertson & A Nicol Media Law (4th Edition, 2002) 19-27.

[3] Act 65 of 1996 ('FPA').

[4] FPA s 18(1).

[5] FPA ss 25*(a)* and (b). A film classified as X18 may, however, be exhibited by a holder of a licence to conduct the business of adult premises. FPA s 24(1). For discussion of the various classifications of films and publications, see § 42.9*(e)* supra.

[6] FPA s 18(4)(b).

[7] Freedman v Maryland 380 US 51, 58 (1965)(Censors bear the burden of proving that the film is unprotected expression, and banning a film ultimately requires a prompt judicial determination); Little Sisters Book & Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice) [2000] 2 SCR 1120 at paras 70-107 (While customs legislation responded to a pressing objective to prohibit the import of obscene material into Canada, importers of obscene material entitled to fair customs procedure prior to classification and banning). Ibid at paras 230-39 (In a powerful dissent, Iacobucci J argues that the customs legislation displays all the hallmarks of unjustifiable prior restraints). See also R v Glad Day Bookshops Inc (2004) 239 DLR (4th)(An Ontario judge ruled that the overbroad film censorship system in that province was not a justifiable restriction of the constitutional right to freedom of speech. The legislation applied to all films and in respect of all viewers; further, other expressive media in Ontario do not have to be approved prior to publication. Ibid at paras 144, 155.)

[8] FPA ss 19, 20 and 21.

[9] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck'). See also § 42.9*(e)* supra. For an argument that prior restraints may be objectionable even in the context of film classifications, see Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 131-133.

a prior restraint regime, the same does not apply generally to publications.[1] Members of the public may complain about certain publications, which are then referred to a classification committee for classification.[2]

(iii) Judicial prior restraints

The jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court endorses the salutary principle that judicial prior restraints constitute severe restrictions on free speech that are only exceptionally justifiable.[3] In the leading case Near v Minnesota,[4] state legislation permitted a court to enjoin as a public nuisance any malicious, scandalous, obscene or defamatory publication. The statute was held to constitute an unconstitutional prior restraint. The Supreme Court, however, left open the possibility that such restraints could be issued in exceptional cases, such as the location of troops.[5] In the most resounding expression of the principle against prior restraints — the Pentagon Papers case[6] — the majority of the Supreme Court overturned temporary orders that had been granted against newspapers preventing them from publishing classified state documents relating to the government's involvement in the Vietnam War because as Brennan J held, 'I cannot say that disclosure of any of [the documents] will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people'.[7]

[1] Except where a publisher intends to distribute a publication that is likely to contain material which would be classified as XX or X18. FPA s 17(4).

[2] FPA s 16. Clause 16(1) of the controversial Films and Publications Amendment Bill 27B-2006 proposes to require that publishers ('other than a newspaper that is published by the Newspaper Association of South Africa') must submit a publication for classification if the publication contains 'visual presentations, descriptions or representations' amounting to, inter alia 'sexual conduct'. This provision would introduce a general prior restraint regime for publications (with the exception of certain newspapers), and, if enacted, would be vulnerable to constitutional attack. See generally I Jamie SC Opinion furnished to Parliament in respect of the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions in the Films and Publications Amendment Bill (B27B-2006) (5 December 2007, on file with the authors) 17-24.

[3] Bantam Books Inc v Sullivan 72 US 58, 70 (1963)('Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity'.)

[4] 283 US 697 (1931)('Near'). See also Lovell v Griffin US 444, 58 SCt 666 (1938)(city ordinance prohibiting the distribution of literature of any kind, at any place, and in any manner, without a permit from the City Manager, strikes at the very foundation of freedom of the press by subjecting it to licence and censorship); Nebraska Press Association v Stuart 427 US 539, 96 SCt 2791 (1976)(court order prohibiting the reporting of the existence or nature of any confessions or other information implicating a person accused of murder is an unconstitutional prior restraint on reporting news about crime).

[5] Near (supra) at 716.

[6] New York Times v US 403 US 713 (1971)('New York Times v US'). See also Organization for a Better Austin v Keefe 402 US 415 (1971).

[7] New York Times v US (supra) at 730. Ibid at 714-24 (Concurring judgments of Black and Douglas JJ). For an example of a justifiable prior restraint in US law, see US v The Progressive Inc 467 F Supp 990 (1979)(Article describing method of manufacturing and assembling hydrogen bomb could be restrained.) The presumption against prior restraints also applies in English law. See Human Rights Act, 2000 s 12(3)(No relief must be granted to restrain publication before trial unless applicant likely to establish that publication should not be allowed); Cream Holdings Ltd & Others v Banerjee & Others [2004] WLR 918 (HL)(Applicant's prospects of success at trial must be sufficiently favourable to justify prior restraint.)

There have been a number of decisions in South Africa that, it is submitted, support the presumption against the constitutional validity of prior restraints.[1] An important decision in this regard is Joffe J's ruling in Government of the Republic of South Africa v 'Sunday Times' Newspaper & Another.[2] The government sought an interdict preventing the publication by the Sunday Times of the findings of a commission of inquiry into whether any irregularities had occurred during the allotment and cancellation of a state tender for soya-based products. It based its argument on a governmental regulation made under the Commissions Act[3] that prohibited publication of the findings of a commission of inquiry until the State President had released the commission's report for publication or it had been laid before Parliament. The Sunday Times challenged the constitutional validity of this regulation on the basis of the right to freedom of expression.[4] Joffe J held that the Commission was investigating a matter 'pre-eminently of public concern and interest and of which the public is entitled to be fully informed'.[5] The regulation, in Joffe J's opinion, constituted a prior restraint because it was 'cast in such a manner that the report may never see the light of day. If the President does not release it for publication or lay it upon the table of Parliament, a matter of public interest could well be kept from the public forever'.[6] Quoting with approval from the US Supreme Court's decision in Near v Minnesota, the Court ruled that, though prior restraints may be acceptable in some circumstances, the allegations of irreparable harm that had been made by the government were speculative and offered no compelling basis for suggesting that the right to free speech should be limited.[7]

A further High Court case that is intuitively supportive of the general principle against prior restraints is Romero v Gauteng Newspapers Ltd & Others.[8] The Business Practices Committee had published a report under the auspices of the Ministry of Trade and Industry declaring that a harmful business practice involving the applicant was unlawful. The applicant launched proceedings challenging the findings of [1] Some of these decisions were made in the specific context of defamation or privacy law and have been addressed at §§ 42.9*(a)* and 42.9*(b)* supra.

[2] 1995 (2) SA 221 (T), 1995 (2) BCLR 182 (T)('Sunday Times').

[3] Act 8 of 1947.

[4] The case was brought under the Interim Constitution (IC s 15(1) protected free speech), though the case is equally authoritative under the Final Constitution. See Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 23.

[5] Sunday Times (supra) at 228.

[6] Ibid at 229.

[7] Ibid. Cf Mandela v Falati 1995 (1) SA 251, 259 (W)('Mandela')(Prior restraints should not survive constitutional scrutiny save in exceptional circumstances). For examples of a case raising exceptional circumstances, see Santam Ltd v Smith 1999 (6) BCLR 714 (D)(The court restrained the respondent from continuing with a blackmail campaign against Santam Ltd); Treatment Action Campaign v Rath & Others 2007 (4) SA 563 (C)(Interim interdict granted to prohibit the publication by respondents of allegation that the applicant a front for pharmaceutical companies.)

[8] 2002 (2) SA 431 (W)('Romero'). The date of the report is deceptive; judgment in the case was handed down in 1997.

the Committee. Meanwhile the respondents planned to publish an article referring to the pending review proceedings. The applicant tried to prevent publication primarily on the basis that it was wrongful for the respondents to publish papers that had been filed at court before the matter was called in court. Wunsh J rejected this argument. To allow the argument would lead to 'a most peculiar and remarkable result. A newspaper can freely publish a report that a judgment … has been given against a person … but the newspaper cannot publish an article saying that the aggrieved party has appealed against the judgment … and the reasons why he or she says it is wrong'.[1] There was no suggestion that the publication would impede the administration of justice if it were published, nor could it be argued that the proposed report was defamatory.[2]

A significant contrast with the decisions that stress general antipathy for prior restraints is the Prophet Mohammed cartoons case: Jamiat-Ul-Ulama of Transvaal v Johnnic Media Investments Ltd & Others.[3] The context of the case was the world-wide controversy over the publication of Danish cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammed, such as a cartoon depicting the Prophet Mohammed as a suicide bomber. The applicant, a voluntary religious association, sought to interdict the respondents from publishing any cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammed. Jajbhay J granted the interdict on the grounds that the cartoons were 'demeaning' and 'undignified'. Depicting the Prophet Mohammed as a terrorist, he held, 'shows a lack of human sensibility and … advocate[s] hatred and stereotyping of Muslims on the basis of immutable characteristics'.[4] Finally, the publication would 'demean the dignity of an individual whom the Muslim community hold in highest regard'.[5]

It is our view that Jamiat-Ul-Ulama was wrongly decided. Jajbhay J's decision to grant the applicant a prior restraint severely impacts upon the right to freedom of expression. For instance, even the publication of one or two of the cartoons in the context of a serious discussion describing the controversy over the cartoons would be hit by the interdict.[6] Even where the content of speech could be classified as hate speech, the jurisprudence of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission of South Africa correctly recognises the right of the media to broadcast the [1] Romero (supra) at 437-8.

[2] Ibid at 443-4. Although the judge reached the correct result, the decision is surprising for its lack of any reference to the right to freedom of speech and to cases such as Mandela (supra) and Sunday Times, both of which had been decided before Romero.

[3] [2006] ZAGPHC 12.

[4] Ibid at 8.

[5] Ibid at 9. For discussion of the decision, see NMI Goolam 'The Cartoon Controversy: A Note on Freedom of Expression, Hate Speech and Blasphemy' (2006) 39 CILSA 333; G Carpenter 'Freedom of Speech and Cartoons Depicting the Prophet Mohammed' (2006) 69 THRHR 684 ('Cartoons'); R Malherbe 'The Mohammed Cartoons, Freedom of Expression and the Infringement of the Right to Religious Dignity' (2007) TSAR 332.

[6] For example, the publication of one of the cartoons in the Mail & Guardian of 3 February 2006 would have been hit.

speech in the context of a discussion about the controversy.[1] In any event, we submit that Jajbhay J offers no proper basis for restraining the publication. First, it cannot be correct that the dignity of the Prophet Mohammed or, for example, Jesus Christ can be vindicated in our courts.[2] Secondly, to the extent that Jajbhay J regarded the cartoons as constituting hate speech, the judgment is devoid of any analysis as to why such a categorisation is appropriate. No evidence existed, for example, to show that the publication of the cartoons would constitute an incitement to cause harm to Muslims. Thirdly, although Jajbhay J is on stronger ground where he regards dignity as encompassing the values of a religious group,[3] this factor must be regarded as in general insufficient to outweigh the right of a newspaper to inform its readers of a topical controversy on a matter of public interest. On the facts, a report on the cartoon controversy without the ability to publish some of the cartoons impoverishes the debate. Precluding a newspaper from publishing material to give colour to a story is an infringement of editorial integrity.[4] There is in any event a world of difference between, for instance, the publication of the cartoons in a magazine dedicated to arguing that all Muslims are terrorists, and a balanced report on the cartoon controversy in a respected newspaper. Moreover, the Court in Jamiat-Ul-Ulama was concerned with a prior restraint; this form of censorship is qualitatively different as a matter of free speech law from a prosecution after the fact for the publication of hate speech or even blasphemy.

Cases such as Jamiat-Ul-Ulama should now be regarded as aberrations. The Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions[5] has been discussed earlier.[6] In an obiter comment,[7] the Court proffered an approach to prior restraints in free speech cases that, if applied, will have the result that these orders should not be granted, unless , first, the prejudice

[1] See, for example, Human Rights Commission of SA v SABC 2003 (1) BCLR 92 (BCCSA) at para 40 (In public interest that listeners were informed of content of objectionable song by Mbongeni Ngema so that there could be an informed discussion). It is not without significance that at the time of the Danish cartoon controversy, many of those outraged by the cartoons distributed chain emails attaching the cartoons, to illustrate the extent of the insult. This act ironically illustrates the potency of allowing debate to flourish, rather than banning the cartoons. See P Stein & D Milo 'Media Rights Forged in Battle' Sunday Times (10 December 2006).

[2] See Carpenter 'Cartoons' (supra) at 689 ('Only living human beings can have rights; it is therefore impossible to infringe the Prophet Mohammed's right to dignity'.)

[3] Cf S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) at 36-10, 36-14, 36-15 (explaining one meaning of dignity as equal concern and respect and dignity to the realm as a whole). See also Malherbe (supra) at 333 (argues that the right to religious freedom includes the right to religious dignity, and that this right was violated by the cartoons).

[4] See, for example, Fressoz and Roire v France (2001) 31 EHRR 2 (publication of photocopies of tax assessments of high profile businessman necessary to give credibility to story highlighting disparity in pay increases between management and other employees).

[5] 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)('Midi Television').

[6] See §§ 42.9*(a)* and 42.9*(c)*(iv)(bb) supra.

[7] Midi Television (supra) at paras 19-20.

'that the publication might cause … is demonstrable and substantial and there is a real risk that the prejudice will occur if publication takes place'[1]. The court must, second, be satisfied that 'the disadvantage of curtailing the free flow of information outweighs its advantage.'[2] Attempts to obtain interdicts on public interest speech should, after Midi Television, be subjected to very strict scrutiny.[3]

The presumption against prior restraints will be easier to rebut in cases where the speech interest is weak when compared with competing considerations. For instance, in cases where the media seeks to publish private information about an individual that clearly does not implicate a matter of public concern, and where the individual has proved that substantial harm to his or her dignity or privacy will otherwise result, it would be appropriate for courts to interdict publication.[4] Thus, in the English case involving the wedding of the celebrities Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones, the Court of Appeal indicated that a differently constituted Court of Appeal was wrong in its earlier conclusion that unauthorized photographs of the wedding in Hello! magazine could not be restrained. The Court's conclusion rested on the absence of any public interest in the photographs and the infringement of the privacy rights of the celebrities.[5] While we concur in principle with the decision, it must be emphasised that in the absence of clear evidence of the damage that will be suffered, courts should as a matter of principle be loathe to grant interdicts that will stifle speech, especially where the speech implicates matters of public concern.

42.10 Special protection of speech in the legislature

As discussed above, a number of the rationales for protecting freedom of expression are contentious.[6] The one rationale that is, we submit, beyond dispute in a democracy such as ours, is the idea that freedom of expression promotes — and is, in fact, a prerequisite for — the proper functioning of a system of representative democracy. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the protection that democracies grant to freedom of speech in the legislature.[7] This protection has

[1] Midi Television (supra) at para 19.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Despite the Midi Television case, Eugene de Kock, the former apartheid police assassin, obtained an urgent ex parte interim interdict against the publisher and author of a book that he alleged defamed him. De Kock v Struik Publishing (Pty) Ltd unreported decision of the Transvaal Provincial Division Case No 54066/2007 (9 January 2008). The interdict was later discharged by Seriti J, who ruled that De Kock had not acted in the utmost good faith in failing to disclose the detail of his criminal history to the Court and that the allegations complained of were true and in the public interest. Ibid at 15 and 18.
[4] See Prinsloo v RCP Media t/a Rapport 2003 (4) SA 456, 476 (T)(obiter that publication of details of the sex lives of private individuals may be prevented by courts). See § 42.9*(b)* supra.
[5] Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 2) [2003] EMLR 28 (CA). See also Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] QB 967 (CA).
[6] See § 42.5 supra.
[7] See Matatiele Municipality and& Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC) at para 109 (Sachs J described Parliament as 'the engine-house of our democracy'.)

a very long pedigree, with the English Bill of Rights of 1688 proclaiming that 'the freedome of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament'.[1] Parliamentary privilege also has a long history in South Africa, with the Parliament of the Cape of Good Hope enacting a statute safeguarding this privilege in its first session in 1854.[2]

The special protection of speech in legislatures is now expressly entrenched in the Final Constitution. The Final Constitution records that members of the national and provincial legislatures (as well as Cabinet members and members of the provincial executive committees) have freedom of speech in the relevant legislative body (the National Assembly, the National Council of Provinces and the provincial legislatures) and its committees, subject to the rules and orders of the relevant body.[3] It goes on to provide that such persons 'are not liable to civil or criminal proceedings, arrest, imprisonment or damages' for anything 'said in, produced before or submitted to' the legislative body or its committees as well as anything revealed as a result of anything that they have said in, produced before or submitted to that body or its committees.[4]

In relation to local government, FC s 161 states that provincial legislation, within the framework of national legislation, may provide for privileges and immunities of municipal councils and their members. The national framework legislation in respect of municipal councils is s 28 of the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act,[5] which essentially repeats the language of the sections of the Final Constitution on the privilege of the national and provincial legislatures. This national legislation is then given effect to by identical legislative provisions in each of the provinces.

Two justifications are traditionally advanced for the principle of Parliamentary privilege. First, Parliament should have complete control over its own proceedings and its members and therefore that 'matters arising in this sphere should be examined, discussed and adjudged in Parliament and not elsewhere'.[6] This is

[1] The Bill of Rights of 1688 describes this as an 'ancient' right and declares the position that had, by that time, already existed for many years. See Poovalingham v Rajbansi 1992 (1) SA 283, 286 (A) ('Poovalingham')(Corbett CJ); E Wade & A Bradley Constitutional and Administrative Law (10th Edition, 1985) 212.

[2] Act 1 of 1854. For a useful discussion of the chronological history of laws of Parliamentary privilege, see Poovalingham (supra) at 286-291.

[3] See FC s 58(1)(a)(Applies to Cabinet members and members of the National Assembly in the Assembly and its committees — this would not include Cabinet meetings); FC s 71(1)(a) (applies in the National Council of Provinces ('NCOP') and its committees and covers delegates to the NCOP, Cabinet members and Deputy Ministers who attend and speak in the NCOP or an official in the national executive or provincial executive who the NCOP requires to attend a meeting of the NCOP or a committee of the NCOP in terms of FC s 66(2), and part-time representatives of local government who participate in the proceedings of the NCOP in terms of FC s 67); and FC s 117(1)(a) (applies to members of the provincial legislature and the province's permanent delegates to the NCOP in the legislature and its committees.)

[4] FC ss 58(1)(b)(National Assembly), 71(1)(b)(NCOP) and 117(1)(b)(provincial legislatures).

[5] Act 117 of 1998.

[6] Poovalingham (supra) at 286 (Discussing the rationale for the rule of absolute Parliamentary privilege in England.)

essentially a separation of powers concern. Second, complete freedom of speech in the legislature promotes a proper functioning democracy.[1] As Mokgoro J stated on behalf of the Constitutional Court in Dikoko:

> Immunising the conduct of members from criminal and civil liability during council deliberations is a bulwark of democracy. It promotes freedom of speech. It encourages democracy and full and effective deliberation. It removes the fear of repercussion for what is said. This advances effective democratic government.[2]

Implicit in the blanket immunity contained in these provisions is an acceptance that legislatures cannot function effectively if those who participate in their proceedings do so under the threat of litigation (particularly for defamation) if they criticise or debate in an overly robust manner. The Final Constitution thus recognises that, in these institutions that are most vital to the democratic process, the remedy for bad speech is more speech, not legally enforced silence.[3]

While this carved-out sanctuary of free expression is fundamentally important to democracy, it is necessary to bear in mind that the potentially negative effects of this carve-out are also significant. The exclusion of the application of civil and criminal law means that, apart from the sanctions contemplated in the rules of the legislature, a member of the legislature cannot be held liable for anything he or she communicates in the legislature and its committees. This includes not only liability for defamation and breach of privacy but also criminal offences such as breaches of national security, incitement of violence and hate speech. Moreover, the effect of these provisions is effectively to oust the courts from adjudicating on what is said (or otherwise communicated) in the legislatures.[4] Accordingly, care should be taken in assessing whether Parliamentary privilege applies in a particular situation.

In the context of a defamation claim against an executive mayor, the Constitutional Court in Dikoko emphasised that, although the legislative immunity is 'an important bulwark of constitutional democracy', it prevents those who have been defamed from seeking recourse through the courts and thus 'raises important and difficult questions of constitutional principle'.[5] In this case, the Court assessed whether the chief executive officer of a municipality could sue the mayor

[1] Dikoko (supra) ('a Member must have a complete right of free speech in Parliament without any fear that his motives or intentions or reasoning will be questioned or held against him thereafter').

[2] 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 39.

[3] See Whitney v California (supra) at 377.

[4] This consideration seemed to weigh heavily with the Appellate Division in the pre-constitutional case of Poovalingham(The Court held that the communication to Parliamentarians of allegations relating to a private dispute between two members of the House of Delegates did not amount to the business of Parliament and thus fell outside Parliamentary privilege. As Corbett CJ stated: 'in determining the ambit of Parliamentary privilege the Court should, while giving full attention to the need for comity between the Courts and Parliament, not be astute to find reason for the ousting of the jurisdiction of the Court and for the limitation or defeat of the litigant's legitimate claims'. Ibid at 294.)

[5] Dikoko (supra) at para 1.

(a member of the municipal council) for defamatory allegations made before the North West Provincial Public Accounts Standing Committee (a committee of the provincial legislature). The mayor made the defamatory allegations in relation to a dispute regarding the mayor's outstanding cellular telephone account (he alleged that the CEO had deliberately allowed the mayor's account to accumulate so that the outstanding amount could be used by political opponents to attack the mayor's integrity). The difficulty for the mayor was that the statements were not made in a meeting of the municipal council (of which he was a member) but rather in a meeting of the provincial legislature (of which he was not). He therefore argued, first, that the immunity of municipal councillors extends to statements made outside the council in the course of the business of the council[1] and, second, that the immunity in the provincial legislature extended to non-members of the legislature that made statements in the committees of that legislature.[2]

The Court's decision on the first argument turned on the fact that the mayor's statements related to a personal dispute with the CEO and not to the real and legitimate business of the council.[3] It was therefore unnecessary for the Court to decide whether the privilege extends to the business of the council outside of the council and its subcommittees, and the Court left this question open.[4] Nevertheless, during the course of her judgment, Mokgoro J referred to a number of decisions of the Canadian courts which reason that Parliamentary privilege can extend beyond the walls of Parliament, provided that the conduct is an extension of the Member of Parliament's real or essential Parliamentary functions.[5] Although this approach may, in principle, be salutary, such an approach would appear to result in an unduly strained reading of the privileges provided for in the Final Constitution and the relevant legislation. It is difficult to see how a statement made outside the council (and its committees) is 'said in, produced before or submitted to the council or any of its committees'.[6]

[1] This argument was based on Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 s 28 and North West Municipal Structures Act 3 of 2000 s 3.

[2] This argument sought to rely on s 117 of the Constitution (see above) as well as sections of the North West Provincial Legislature's Powers, Privileges and Immunities Act 5 of 1994.

[3] Dikoko (supra) at para 40.

[4] Ibid. The Court also left open whether or not the privilege extends to the executive (as distinct from the legislative) functions of a municipal council. Ibid at para 41. Although we accept that it may be difficult to delineate the legislative and executive functions of a municipal council, the extension of the privilege to executive functions would mean that municipal councilors would enjoy greater protection in relation to executive functions than the equivalent bodies at a national and provincial level. For example, although Cabinet members are protected by the privilege when they speak in the National Assembly (FC s 58), this provision does not extend to meetings of the Cabinet itself.

[5] Ibid at para 36. See, for example, Roman Corp Ltd v Hudson Bay Oil Co Ltd (1971) 18 DLR (3d) 134, 138; Stopforth v Goyer (1978) 87 DLR (3d) 373, 381; and Re Clark v Attorney General of Canada (1977) 81 DLR (3d) 33, 55.

[6] To use the wording of Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 s 28.

In dealing with the second argument, the Constitutional Court took a stricter — and, we submit, correct — approach to the wording of the relevant privilege. Mokgoro J rejected the argument that a purposive approach required the Court to interpret the privilege for provincial legislatures as extending to persons who are not members of the provincial legislature but who participate in its proceedings, such as witnesses before the legislature or its committees. As Mokgoro J pointed out, the text specifically only extends the protection to members of the provincial legislature and cannot reasonably accommodate a broader construction that extends to non-members.[1]

The one constraint on expression in the legislature is that it must accord with the rules and orders of the relevant legislature. This qualification raises the threat of the legislature sanctioning speech through the use of its rules. This issue arose in De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly, in which the Cape High Court (Hlophe J) held that the suspension from Parliament of Patricia de Lille (then a PAC Member of Parliament) for a period of 14 days for asserting that various ANC MPs had spied for the apartheid government — statements for which she subsequently apologised — amounted to an unjustifiable infringement of freedom of expression.[2] Hlophe J therefore set aside her suspension.[3]

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 45 (Mokgoro J points out that this is not an entirely satisfactory state of affairs and may lead to unfairness: '[A] situation is created where others who participate in the same deliberations as witnesses, promoting the same role and functions of the legislature and advancing the same business of the legislature are not protected. That leaves them exposed to criminal and civil proceedings on the basis that they are not members of the legislature. It might be argued that this does not seem to accord with the basic principle of fairness.' Mokgoro J thus seems to suggest that privilege should be extended to non-members of legislature who participate in their proceedings. She adds that this could be done on the basis of a qualified privilege (which was not raised by the defendant in Dikoko). While it may be appropriate to extend absolute privilege for civil liability to persons that are not members of the legislature, it seems to us that it would not be appropriate to extend criminal immunity to such persons. This would, for example, allow a person who is not a Member of Parliament to make statements jeopardising national security, provided he or she does so in a Parliamentary committee.)

[2] 1998 (3) SA 430 (C) at para 38. Hlophe J also held that the suspension failed the limitations test because it was not in terms of a law of general application. The suspension was not authorised by either the Powers and Privileges of Parliament Act, 1963 or the Standing Rules of the National Assembly. The so-called Parliamentary privilege does not qualify as a law of general application. Ibid at para 37.

[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the High Court. Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA). The SCA, however, confined itself to holding that Parliament lacked the power to suspend one of its members. The SCA therefore decided the case on the ground of legality and did not directly consider the freedom of expression challenge (although freedom of expression played a role in guiding the legality enquiry).

43 Freedom of Assembly

Stuart Woolman

43.1 Introduction 43–1
43.2 The History and the regulation of assembly 43–4
(a) Apartheid and the old statutory framework 43–4
(b) Democracy and the new statutory framework 43–6
(i) Provenance of the Regulation of Gatherings Act . . 43–6
(ii) Analysis of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 43–7
43.3 Assembly analysis 43–17
(a) The content of the right 43–17
(i) Internal modifiers 43–19
(aa) Peacefully 43–19
(bb) Unarmed 43–20
(ii) Assembly 43–21
(iii) Demonstrations. 43–22
(iv) Picketing. 43–24
(v) Petitions 43–25
(b) Limitations on the right 43–26
(i) Private property 43–26
(ii) Security and order 43–28
(iii) Content neutrality 43–29
(iv) Time, place and manner restrictions 43–31

43.1 INTRODUCTION

Protests, assemblies and mass demonstrations played a central role in South African liberation politics. Now that the battle for liberation has been won, and all possess the franchise, there might be a sense that demonstrations have diminished in pitch and frequency. They have.

Still, mass protests continue to be an important form of political engagement. Organized labour, landless people, anti-privatisation movements, students, squatters, and even the police, have used demonstrations to press their demands. The continued vitality of assembly in the newish South Africa bespeaks its essential role in any liberal democracy.[1]

Freedom of assembly creates the space both to speak and to be heard. A single voice is likely to be drowned out in our polity. A choir is far more likely to get its message across.[2] Moreover, power in modern nation states invariably concentrates in and around large social formations: meaningful dialogue between these large social formations often requires the collective efforts of demonstrators, picketers and protestors.[3]

Consider, for a moment, the nature of this particular species of communicative action: dialogue. The genus speech — and by that I mean all forms of symbolic representation — makes us human. Dialogue raises us above the primitive. For it is only in dialogue with competent speakers that we are able to assert truth claims about the physical, and moral claims about the social. Only dialogue enables us to wring out of our shared endowment of working assumptions and half-truths the agreements that define the ends of our polity. This is a windy way of saying that dialogue, not the franchise, is the sine qua non of democracy. Some confuse this indispensability with instrumentality. That gets things back to front. Without

* I would like to thank Simon Deloneg for helping me to better understand how assembly law in South Africa works — and doesn't — in practice.

[1] S v Mamabolo (E TV and others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 50 ('That freedom to speak one's mind is now an inherent quality of the type of society contemplated by the Constitution as a whole and is specifically promoted by the freedoms of conscience, expression, assembly, association and political participation protected by ss 15 - 19 of the Bill of Rights.' (Emphasis added).) See also Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737 (European Court describes assembly as an ineradicable feature of democratic politics); Johnson v Cincinnati 310 F 3d 484 (6th Cir 2002) citing Shapiro v Thompson 394 US 618, 643 (1969)(Court recognizes that the constitution's commitment to liberty — freedom simpliciter — must protect rights to travel through public spaces and on roadways and rights to protest in those same spaces. Such rights are 'virtually unconditional.')

[2] See S v Turrell and Others 1973 (1) SA 248, 256 (C)('Free assembly is a most important right for it is generally only organized opinion that carries weight and it is extremely difficult to organize it if there is no right of public assembly.')

[3] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU') at para 8 ('[F]reedom of expression [FC s 16]. . . freedom of religion, belief and opinion [FC s 15], the right to dignity [FC s 10], as well as the right to freedom of association [FC s 18], the right to vote and to stand for public office [FC s 19] and the right to assembly [FC 17] . . . taken together protect the right of individuals not only individually to form and express opinions, of whatever nature, but to establish associations and groups of like-minded people to foster and propagate such opinions. The rights implicitly recognise the importance, both for a democratic society and for individuals personally, of the ability to form and express opinions, whether individually or collectively, even where these views are controversial.' (Emphasis added).) See also South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 2004 (4) SA 10 (T); National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC); NUMSA v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC).

dialogue, there are no human subjects, no citizens. The relationship between democracy and dialogue is thus best understood in terms of reciprocal effect: dialogue is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition of democracy; democracy deepens our capacity for dialogue.

By foregrounding dialogue, I want to shift our attention, albeit briefly, away from the standard account, and that chestnut of democratic theory which tells us that although 45 million South Africans can get it wrong, the more we discuss the ideas we seek to put into practice, the better our decisions are likely to be.[1] Assemblies and demonstrations, on the standard account, generate debate and thereby improve our deliberative processes. That they may do. But they only do so because dialogue, and a commitment to reasoned discourse about the ends of life, has already made agreement and disagreement possible. What assemblies and demonstrations really force us to do is attend to situations where power — inequality in power, or abuse of power — has distorted our capacity to engage in reasoned discourse, and has valourized the interests of one segment of the polity over another.

This last observation suggests why freedom of assembly provides an effective means of communication for those who feel that their demands are not being given serious consideration by the state. Discrete and insular minorities – or so-called 'out-groups' — find it difficult to present their concerns within the confines of representative politics.[2] As we have already seen, size matters. For these 'out-groups', the freedom to assemble makes democracy visible and counters feelings of helplessness and isolation.[3] One of the primary consequences of minorities'

[1] See SANDU (supra) at para 7 (Freedom of expression — and related guarantees of assembly, association, belief, and the franchise — lie 'at the heart of a democracy.' Freedom of expression 'is valuable for many reasons, including its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally. The Constitution recognises that individuals in our society need to be able to hear, form and express opinions and views freely on a wide range of matters.') See also Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd 1996 (2) SA 588, 608 (W) citing R Dworkin 'The Coming Battles over Free Speech' New York Review of Books (11 June 1992) 55, 56 ('A second kind of justification for [expressive conduct] . . . supposes that [such] freedom is valuable, not just in virtue of the consequences it has, but because it is an essential and 'constitutive' feature of a just political society that government treat all its adult members, except those who are incompetent, as responsible moral agents.')

[2] Put another way, marginal viewpoints, beliefs and practices may not command the attention they deserve because their proponents lack adequate political representation in Parliament. Freedom of assembly thereby provides a corrective to simple majoritarian rule. See, for example, Seeiso v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1998 (6) BCLR 765 (LesCA). While the formal features of freedom of assembly analysis differ somewhat under the Lesotho Constitution, the substantive considerations remain the same. The Lesotho Court of Appeal in Seeiso found that the State's assertion that the 'security of the state', the 'protection of the public interest' and 'the maintenance of law and order' required the curtailment of a such a core constitutional right as freedom of assembly could not be vindicated without clear and convincing evidence. The Seeiso Court held that such overwhelming proof was presented neither to the High Court nor to the Court of Appeal. In granting the applicant the desired relief — permission to hold the assembly — the Court of Appeal held that the freedom of assembly was far too essential for the formation of public opinion in a free, open and democratic society to permit the courts to simply accept the State's contention that speech alone constitutes a serious threat to the commonweal.

[3] Brokdorf 69 Bverf GE 315, 345 (1985)('The unrestricted exercise of this freedom . . . has the effect of preventing a feeling of impotence and dangerous tendencies of general dissatisfaction with the state.') subjective experience of empowerment is that majority rule is stabilized. By allowing minorities to express their disenchantment with the majority's decisions, the state's general exercise of power becomes more legitimate.[1]

In addition to providing an alternative mode of democracy for marginal groups, freedom of assembly also ensures the continuation of communication between voters and representatives. Assemblies enable the government to identify pressing problems that arise in the time between elections. Freedom of assembly thereby furthers accountability and responsiveness.

These rather arid, academic arguments miss much of that which makes assemblies, demonstrates, pickets, processions and marches truly dynamic and powerful. And that is the nature of the crowd. The crowd draws its power, as Cannetti notes, from its erasure of borders between individuals, the gravitational pull that an expanding, living, moving group has on those around it, and the incipient threat of violence that causes all around to sit up and take notice.[2]

Cannetti's observations about crowds suggest why, in South Africa, assemblies remain a potent tool. In the advanced western democracies, most communication is electronically disseminated. Citizens withdraw into private spaces and watch. Assembly has, consequently, a greatly diminished role to play with respect to political mobilization. In South Africa, many citizens lack meaningful access to such goods as computers, televisions and newspapers. Connections stay corporeal; television is no synecdoche for community. Assembly, the poor person's media, remains the best means for making the needs and the will of the majority heard. Pickets, marches, demonstrations and processions are fires that cannot be so easily put out — or turned off.

[1] The claim is descriptive, not normative. See JN Pandey Constitutional Law of India (29th Edition, 1996) 118 (Expressive rights enable a political system to negotiate social change and forestall revolution.) Habermas calls this 'grant' of political space for protest 'compensatory legitimation', because by abdicating power over 'mere' expression, the state enhances its own stability. J Habermas Legitimation Crisis (1975).

[2] E Cannetti Crowds and Power (1962) 22:

> [E]ruption . . . the sudden transition from a closed into an open crowd . . . is a frequent occurrence. . . . A crowd quite often seems to overflow from some well-guarded space into the squares and streets of a town where it can move about freely, exposed to everything and attracting everyone. But more important than this external event is the corresponding inner movement: the dissatisfaction with the limitation of the number of participants, the sudden will to attract, the passionate determination to reach all men.

See In Re Munhumeso and Others 1995 (1) SA 551, 557 (ZS), 1995 (2) BCLR 130 (ZS), 1994 (1) ZLR 49 (SC)('Munhumeso')(The Munhumeso Court dryly observes that: 'A procession, which is but an assembly in motion, is by its very nature a highly effective means of communication, and one not provided by other media. It stimulates public attention and discussion of the opinion expressed. The public is brought into direct contact with those expressing the opinion'); Ezelin v France [1991] EHRR 362 at para 32 (Right of assembly often exercised through public procession); H v Austria [1989] EHRR 70. But see Fourways Mall (Pty) Ltd v South African Commercial Catering 1999 (3) SA 752, 759 (W)(Neither LRA nor FC s 17 provides protection for pickets that violate conditions of court order and proceed in a manner that interferes with the rights of the public and other tenants of a shopping mall. Assault and intimidation are not acceptable forms of expressive conduct.)

Crowd action — loud, noisy, disruptive, and sometimes dangerous — ought to be viewed, as Kraemer persuasively argues, as a direct expression of popular sovereignty.[1] By creating space for crowd action, FC s 17 vouchsafes a commitment to a form of democracy in which the will of the people is not always mediated by political parties and the elites that run them.

So much for the arguments from democracy. The philosophical justifications for freedom of assembly are not, however, exhausted by the freedom's political utility. All individuals develop their personality and unique talents in the context of groups.[2] Goods such as companionship and recreation are as important as any other[3] and are worthy of constitutional protection.[4]

43.2 The History and the Regulation of Assembly

(a) Apartheid and the old statutory framework

While assemblies may have played a central role in anti-apartheid politics, they played that role almost entirely without legal sanction. From the 1920s onward, the government enacted repressive law after repressive law in a largely successful

[1] See L Kraemer The People Themselves: Popular Constitutionalism and Judicial Review (2005). Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman have argued that the co-ordinate branches of government — the legislature, the executive and the judiciary — actually share the responsibility for constitutional interpretation. See M Dorf & B Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) 2000 Sup Ct R 61. See also S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3*(b)*(vi); S Woolman & L Yu 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing & Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law — Kraemer's view is that such ecstatic expressions of the will of the people transform constitutional interpretation into an enterprise shared with the people themselves. See also B Ackermann We the People (1991).

[2] The notion that associations — of which assemblies are a subset — are constitutive of the self is developed at length elsewhere in this work. See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) §§ 44.1*(b)*(i)-(ii).

[3] See, eg, Coates v Cincinnati (1961) 402 US 611, 615 (US Supreme Court notes that the freedom to assemble protects the 'right to gather' for purely social aims. Moreover, that such aims may serve no meaningful political end and may annoy non-participants is not a legitimate basis for restricting a gathering.) See also Stankov and the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden v Bulgaria [2001] ECHR 563 at para 86 ('Freedom of assembly as enshrined in Article 11 of the Convention protects a demonstration that may annoy or give offence to persons'); Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria [1988] ECHR 15; AE Schilder Het recht tot vergadering en betoging (1989) 120 (On the relationship between assembly and personality development); T Mauntz & G Durig Grundgesetz Kommentar 8 (1991) 88. As always, I am indebted to Johan De Waal for his patient explanation of German jurisprudence.

[4] It is, of course, another question as to whether assemblies that promote individual flourishing ought to trigger the protection afforded by FC s 17. There are good reasons to hesitate before we extend the ambit of FC s 17 to cover assemblies that lack even the most attenuated connection to the political process. As I note below, § 43.3*(a)* infra, extending the protection of FC s 17 to gatherings without any political dimension means that FC s 17 might, at least notionally, protect any meeting of 2 or more persons. We can rely on other constitutional guarantees as well as non-constitutional bodies of law to protect such recreational, religious, cultural or commercial gatherings. See, eg, FC ss 15, 18, 30, 31. Too broadly construed a right to assemble has the potential to weaken our commitment to assembly as a form of political participation.

effort to stifle dissent.[1] The promulgation of anti-assembly legislation accelerated dramatically after the National Party took power in 1948.

The National Party launched its campaign to eviscerate the freedom to assemble with the Suppression of Communism Act ('SCA').[2] SCA s 9 allowed the Minister of Justice to prohibit a gathering or an assembly whenever there was, in his opinion, reason to believe that the objects of communism would be furthered at such a gathering.[3] A few years later the government — in response to the ANC's 1952 defiance campaign — passed the Criminal Law Amendment Act ('CLAA').[4] The CLAA increased penalties for crimes committed in the context of political protest.[5] More serious limitations followed the enactment of a new

[1] Before 1950 assembly was, to some extent, permissively regulated by common law. At common law, the individual was entitled to all rights not expressly prohibited or limited by statute or by the common law itself. The crime of public violence served as the primary limitation on the freedom to assemble. See L Ackermann Die Reg insake Openbare en Staatsveiligheid (1984) 153 (Section 52 of the Internal Security Act 74 of 1982 repealed the common law with regard to open-air assemblies.) The law of assembly, even prior to 1950, was not so permissive with respect to black South Africans. See Black Administration Act 38 of 1927, ss 25 and 27 (Allowed the President to promulgate regulations with reference to 'the prohibition, control or regulation of gatherings or assemblies of Blacks' and 'the observance by Blacks of decency'); Black (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act 25 of 1945, s 38(3)(r)(Conferred power to the Bantu administration boards, under the supervision of magistrates, to control and restrict the meetings of 'Bantus'); Development Trust and Land Act 18 of 1936. See also A Mathews Law, Order and Liberty in South Africa (1971) 240–2, 249–50; J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 186–91. Incidentally, the first regulatory framework for assembly after the Union was formed — the provisions of the original Riotous Assemblies Act 27 of 1914 — was adopted to enable the government to deal with white labour unrest.

[2] Act 44 of 1950. The Act was later incorporated into the Internal Security Act 74 of 1982.

[3] The Minister could, in terms of SCA ss 9 and 5, (which applied to listed persons), give notice to a person prohibiting him from attending any gathering. The provisions gave rise to a number of court cases that turned on the definition of the word 'gathering'. See, eg, S v Meer En 'N Ander 1981 (4) SA 604, 606 (A)(Court accepts premise of the statute — namely that the threat of communism, breakdowns in the security of the State, and the maintenance of public order were real enough to justify radical restrictions on gatherings. Having accepted the premise, the court then articulates a taxonomy of gatherings in which prohibited 'social gatherings' does not 'include the family … activities of the restricted person.') See also C Forsyth In Danger for Their Talents (1985) 148–67; Dugard (supra) at 162–3. The bench's blinkered world-view and its efforts to compartmentalize law and politics meant apartheid-era judges could, with a straight face, state that:

> freedom of speech and freedom of assembly are part of the democratic right of every citizen of the Republic, and Parliament guards these rights jealously for they are part of the very foundation upon which Parliament rests. Free assembly is a most important right for it is generally only organized public opinion that carries weight and it is extremely difficult to organize it if there is no right of public assembly.

S v Turrel 1973 (1) SA 248, 256 (C)(Magistrate's prohibition of a meeting in terms of Riotous Assemblies Acts s 2(1) reversed on grounds that the order did not identify the meeting at issue with sufficient clarity.) See also S v Budlender & Another 1973 (1) SA 264 (C); E Kahn 'Freedom of Assembly' (1973) 90 SALJ 18. Not until the late seventies did academic lawyers begin to criticize, ever so tentatively, both assembly legislation and the manner in which such legislation was construed by the courts. See, eg, J Van der Vyver Die Beskerming van Menseregte in Suid-Afrika (1975); J Van der Vyver Seven Lectures on Human Rights (1976).

[4] Act 8 of 1953.

[5] The Internal Security Act was designed to achieve a similar result. Act 74 of 1982, ss 58 and 59. See Ackermann (supra) at 164–8. The judiciary, on occasion, saw a political motive as an aggravating factor in sentencing. See E Cameron 'Civil Disobedience and Passive Resistance' in H Corder (ed) Essays on Law and Social Practice in South Africa (1988) 219, 231.

Riotous Assemblies Act in 1956.[1]

Open opposition to the government met with further restrictions in the 1960s and 1970s.[2] By the late 1970s it became almost impossible to obtain permission to assemble.[3] Attempts at reform in the early 1980s failed.[4] In the mid-1980s, as South Africa's political crisis deepened and it appeared that assembly law could get no worse, the government responded by issuing extremely restrictive 'emergency' regulations under the Public Safety Act.[5]

Real change began only in February of 1990, with the agreement of most political parties to the National Peace Accord ('NPA'). The NPA marked South Africa's first successful attempt to reconcile the rights of assemblers with the state's interest in public order.

(b) Democracy and the new statutory framework

(i) Provenance of the Regulation of Gatherings Act

The next two attempts to bring South African assembly jurisprudence into the twentieth century took place under the auspices of the Commission of Inquiry

[1] Act 17 of 1956. Initially, the Act allowed the Minister of Justice to prohibit any public gathering in order to maintain public peace or to prevent the engendering of racial hostility. However, the 1974 amendments to the Act extended the Minister's prohibitory powers to private gatherings. See Riotous Assemblies Amendment Act 30 of 1974, s 2(1). The Riotous Assemblies Act, s 17, states that a person commits the crime of incitement to public violence if the natural and probable consequences of his act, conduct, speech or publication would be the commission of public violence by others. At the time of writing, the Act was still in force. Demonstrations near Parliament were outlawed by the Gatherings and Demonstrations Act 52 of 1973.

[2] The General Law Further Amendment Act required that assemblies receive both the local authority's consent and the approval of a magistrate in the district in which the assembly was to take place. Act 92 of 1970, s 15. See Dugard (supra) at 187. Under the Internal Security Acts of 1976 and 1982, the Minister issued annually a notice that declared outdoor gatherings illegal — save for bona fide sporting and religious purposes — unless permission was obtained from a magistrate. Demonstrators often ignored the permission requirement, despite the fact that the requirement featured quite prominently in the state's strategy to suppress political protest.

[3] See H Corder & D Davis 'A Long March — Administrative Law in the Appellate Division' (1988) 4 SAJHR 281, 289.

[4] Not only did the Rabie Commission fail to deliver the hoped for reform, it could be argued that it led to an even more repressive regime of laws. See, eg, Internal Security Act 74 of 1982; Demonstrations in or near Court Buildings Act 71 of 1982. For a comprehensive analysis of the statutes, see Mathews (supra) 52–6, 139–47; Ackermann (supra) at 149–68.

[5] Act 3 of 1953. Regulation 7(1), Proclamation 109 of 1986 issued in terms of the Public Safety Act, held that '[t]he . . . Commissioner may for the purpose of the safety of the public . . . issue orders . . . (*b*A) whereby any particular gathering, or any gathering of a particular nature, class or kind, is prohibited at any place or in any area specified in the order.' A few challenges to the assembly regulations were successful. See, eg, Natal Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v State President of the Republic of South Africa 1986 (4) SA 1109 (N)(Court struck down Regulation 7(1)(d)). The majority were not. See, eg, Van der Westhuizen NO v United Democratic Front 1989 (2) SA 242 (A)(Court upheld regulation 7(1)*(b*A).) See E Mureinik 'Pursuing Principle: the Appellate Division and Review under the State of Emergency' (1989) 5 SAJHR 60; D Basson 'Judicial Activism in a State of Emergency: An Examination of Recent Decisions of the South African Courts' (1987) 3 SAJHR 28; M Kidd 'Meetings and the Emergency Regulations' (1989) 5 SAJHR 471. See also J Dugard, N Haysom & G Marcus The Last Years of Apartheid: Civil Liberties in South Africa (1992).

Regarding the Prevention of Public Violence and Intimidation ('Goldstone Commission'). The Goldstone Commission's first endeavour was to convene a multinational panel of experts to thrash out a new approach to assembly.[1] The Commission and its multinational panel then drafted new legislation intended to give effect to the principles enunciated in the panel's testimony. The result was the Goldstone Commission's greatest achievement: the Regulation of Gatherings Act ('RGA').[2]

(ii) Analysis of the Regulation of Gatherings Act

To Parliament's credit, the legislation retains the most interesting aspect of the panel's report: namely, the notion of 'demonstration as of right'. Demonstration as of right means that the ability to hold a public gathering, assembly or demonstration is not contingent upon approval by the state. Unfortunately, the RGA qualifies this 'right' in a manner that largely vitiates its significance.[3] Several other

[1] See P Heymann (ed) Towards Peaceful Protest in South Africa: Testimony of a Multinational Panel Regarding the Lawful Control of Demonstrations in the Republic of South Africa before The Commission of Inquiry Regarding the Prevention of Public Violence and Intimidation (1993)('Heymann Report'). The panel's conclusions flowed from a single basic axiom: the right to assemble, demonstrate, protest and petition is a necessary condition for making good a democratic society's commitment to universal political participation. The Heymann Report should be viewed as part of the drafting history of the Regulation of Gatherings Act and as a corrective to errant readings of the Act by a variety of state actors.

[2] Act 205 of 1993. The RGA repeals the following statutes and sections of statutes dealing with assembly: Gatherings and Demonstrations in the Vicinity of Parliament Act 52 of 1973 (as amended in 1992); Demonstrations in or near Court Buildings Prohibition Act 71 of 1982; ss 46(1) and (2), 47, 48, 49, 51, 53, 57, 62 Internal Security Act 74 of 1982; Gatherings and Demonstrations in or near the Union Buildings Act 103 of 1992. Despite the manifest need for the repeal of these laws in order for the right to assemble to be meaningfully exercised in the run-up to the 1994 elections, the RGA was not enacted until 1996. See J Rauch & D Storey 'The Policing of Public Gatherings and Demonstrations in South Africa 1960–1994' Truth Commission Research Unit (May 1998) available at www.csvr.org.za/pubslist/pubspd.htm and www.csvr.org.za/papers/papjrds.htm, (accessed on 25 December 2004). The RGA states that it should not be understood to repeal any part of the following statutes: Arms and Ammunition Act 75 of 1969 (Section 38A sets out the requirements for carrying a gun in public); Dangerous Weapons Act 71 of 1968 (Section 2 permits the Minister to prohibit a person or class of persons from bearing arms in public); Control of Access to Public Premises and Vehicles Act 53 of 1985 (Allows the state to control — and completely restrict — access to public property); Civil Protection Act 67 of 1977; Public Safety Act 3 of 1953; Intimidation Act 72 of 1982; and Prevention of Public Violence and Intimidation Act 139 of 1991.

[3] Under the RGA, demonstrations require no notification at all. But do not be misled. Demonstrations consist of 15 people or less. See RGA s 1 ('[D]emonstration' includes any demonstration by one or more persons, but not more than 15 persons, for or against any person, cause, action or failure to take action; . . . 'gathering' means any assembly, concourse or procession of more than 15 persons in or on any public road as defined in the Road Traffic Act, 1989 [Act 29 of 1989], or any other public place or premises wholly or partly open to the air.') Gatherings, however, are subject to more onerous conditions. RGA s 4(3) reads, in relevant part: 'If a convener has been notified in terms of subsection (2) (a) or has not, within 24 hours after giving notice in terms of section 3(2), been called to a meeting in terms of subsection (2)(b) of this section, the gathering may take place in accordance with the contents of the notice and in accordance with the provisions of section 8, but subject to the provisions of sections 5 and 6.' The notice of gathering must be given either seven days in advance or 48 hours in advance. If the latter, the authorities have the right to prohibit the gathering. The ability of the drafters to assert that the legislation protects 'demonstration as of right' has as much to do with a definitional exercise that limits the scope of demonstrations as it does with any principled commitments.

provisions blunt, in a similar fashion, the potentially revolutionary vision of mass action envisaged by the RGA, and reflect the difficulty that present political actors have had in making a complete break with the past.[1]

The RGA requires that notice for gatherings be provided to local authorities and police seven days in advance.[2] This notice period creates doctrinal problems and practical difficulties.

Assembly doctrine must take account of the fact that assemblies are often an immediate response to actions — by the state or by private parties — that touch a raw nerve in some segment of the body politic.[3] Recall that we protect assemblies because of their capacity to communicate (some part of) the public will to the state, and in so doing, prevent the government from undertaking or continuing a particular course of action which lacks either public support or some other form

See § 43.3*(a)*(iii) infra (On the constitutionality, under FC s 17, of the RGA's construction of the term 'demonstration'). Put more bluntly, the intention of the legislature was to limit the number of people who could assemble freely, without requiring prior notice to the authorities.

The motivation for the distinction is laid bare in the penalties that attach to non-compliance with the notification requirements. Ask yourself, for example, whether 150 protesters, with the same grievance, assembled in groups of 15, say, 50 metres apart, constitute a demonstration or a gathering. Assume not one person in any of the 10 groups of 15 attempted to give notice. After all, a group of 15 is not required to provide notice. Should, however, this scenario be deemed a gathering, then each protester, if convicted, could receive a fine of up to R20 000 and/or a sentence of up to one year in prison. (The fines and sentences actually imposed under the act are not insignificant. Ten persons accused of failing to provide proper notice for a protest of over 100 persons were each — after a plea bargain — fined R3000 or sentenced to 3 months, suspended wholly for 5 years. Correspondence with S Delaney, Staff Attorney, Freedom of Expression Institute ('FXI')(25 February 2005)(On file with author).) The law thereby creates an incentive for 'guerilla'-type protests, consisting of small units of mobile, vociferous protestors. But perhaps the state is willing to take its chances with groups of 15, even if such groups are actually more difficult to control by law and by the exercise of police power.

[1] J Duncan 'Where is the Debate on Civil and Political Rights? The State of Censorship in South Africa' (Paper Presented on World Press Freedom Day, University of the Witwatersrand)(May 3, 2003) available at www.fxi.org.za, (accessed on 31 January 2005)(Even though the Landless Peoples Movement had scrupulously complied with the requirements of the RGA, the police used the RGA to censor expression rather than enable it. Having given notice of a peaceful demonstration in Ermelo, and having not received a reply from the police within 24 hours, the convener exercised his right to proceed with the march. On the day of the march, the police arrested half of the marchers for 'failing to disperse'. The arrests occurred after the demonstration had ended.) See also Freedom of Expression Institute Newsletter 'Landless Peoples Movement's ('LPM') Leaders Arrested' (2004)(Overzealous enforcement of the RGA is often exacerbated by police abuse subsequent to arrest.) It is difficult not to conclude that the security forces are intent on scaring the protest out of the LPM. The police have also used s 18*(b)* of the Electoral Act to prevent any gatherings of any kind on election-day.

[2] RGA s 3(2) reads, in relevant part: 'The convener shall not later than seven days before the date on which the gathering is to be held, give notice of the gathering to the responsible officer concerned: Provided that if it is not reasonably possible for the convener to give such notice earlier than seven days before such date, he shall give such notice at the earliest opportunity: Provided further that if such notice is given less than 48 hours before the commencement of the gathering, the responsible officer may by notice to the convener prohibit the gathering.'

[3] According to Article 8(1) of Germany's Basic Law, no permission from the state is necessary for using public streets for protests. See T Feldmeier Politische Meinungsäusserung auf Offentlichen Strassen (1982) 164. More importantly for the purposes of our analysis of the RGA's notice requirements, the German Constitutional Court has held that the administrative procedures surrounding the right to assemble must be assembly-friendly. See Brokdorf 69 BVerfGE 315, 355 (1985). The German Constitutional Court has even derived duties to co-operate and to facilitate from statutory notification requirements.

of legitimacy. The seven day notice period not only works to suppress dissent, it grants the government a grace period within which the government can turn intention into action before the public can register its collective ire.[1] The manner in which the RGA seven-day notice period frames our nascent assembly jurisprudence is difficult to square with how our courts have, heretofore, construed the Final Constitution's commitment to expression, in particular, and an open and democratic society, in general.[2]

In terms of practice, the RGA thwarts many a convener who, in fact, complies with the 7-day notice period. Take the recent experiences of the Thembelihle Crisis Committee ('TCC'). The TCC has adopted the practice of filing a notice — on a Friday — 10 days in advance of an assembly scheduled for two Mondays hence. On Monday, the local authorities set up a meeting for Tuesday. On Thursday, the TCC conveners receive notice that their assembly has been prohibited. On Friday, the TCC files an urgent application in Magistrate's Court to have the prohibition set aside. The Magistrate summarily dismisses the application, and rules as follows: (a) Rule 55(1) of the Magistrate's Court Rules requires that an application shall be delivered on 10 day's notice; (b) Rule 9 (14) states that this 10-day notice period may be reduced if an application shows 'good cause' and thereby satisfies the requirements for urgency; (c) since the applicants could not demonstrate the requisite risk to life or liberty, the application does meet the conditions for reduced notice; (d) no other remedy is contemplated in the rules; (e) the date of the proposed gathering possesses no particular significance;[3] and [1] But see RGA s 12(2): 'It shall be a defence to a charge of convening a gathering in contravention of subsection (1)(a) that the gathering concerned took place spontaneously.' While the defence of spontaneity creates some breathing room, it is a decidedly narrow exception to the notice provisions and the penalties for non-compliance.

[2] Our courts have recognized the need to create rules that simultaneously encourage expression and protect those who interests might otherwise be prejudiced. See, eg, Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane 2002 (6) SA 512 (W) at para 25 citing National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196, 1210 (SCA); 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA)(Court finds that damages in defamation cases do not always strike the proper balance between expression and reputation, that 'nothing can be more chilling than the prospect of being mulcted in damages for even the slightest error' and that a public apology provides a remedy that will 'set the record straight, restore the reputation of the victim, give the victim the necessary satisfaction, avoid serious financial harm to the culprit and encourage rather than inhibit freedom of expression.') For a somewhat more sanguine view of the legal framework created by the RGA, although uninformed by the actual practice of local authorities, see 'Politics in Public: Freedom of Assembly and the Right to Protest in South Africa' Democratic Dialogue Working Paper (1998) available at www.democraticdialogue.org, (accessed on 25 December 2004)('[P]erhaps the most interesting facet is the recognition of the inherent political nature of such public gatherings. This is acknowledged through the interlocking structure of the decision-making process which links the organisers, the police and the civil authorities as mutually responsible participants in the democratic process. In so doing it demands that each party recognise their role in maintaining the balance between human rights and social responsibilities.')

[3] It may be trivially true that the march date selected has no historic significance. But that does not mean that the local authorities are entitled to prohibit a protest, a picket, or a procession as it suits them. The default position ought to be that the time selected by conveners is meaningful — from the perspective of both effective communication and logistics. Only overridingly important government interests — an imminent threat to life and public order — ought to trump the right to demonstrate in public forums. Anything short of such a demonstrably significant interest requires that the state make every effort to vindicate both the expressive interests of the demonstrators and the interests of third parties in going about their normal, everyday business. See § 43.3*(b)*(iv) infra (Discussion of the appropriate conditions for time, place and manner restrictions.)

(f) future applications must observe the Magistrate's Court Rules with respect to proper notice periods.

The local authorities have, as the above account suggests, found themselves the unintended beneficiaries of a number of provisions in the RGA, the Magistrate's Court Rules and the Uniform Rules of Court. RGA s 4(3) requires local authorities to set up a meeting with the conveners and other interested parties within 24 hours of receipt of notification. Once the meeting takes place, the local authorities are, under RGA s 5(2), given a significant degree of discretion in deciding whether or not to prohibit the gathering.[1] Although the authorities are required, under RGA s 5(3), to give reasons for the prohibition, local authorities tend to generate form letter refusals; the RGA's provisions for judicial review conspire, along with the Magistrate's Court Rules, to prevent proper ventilation of the assembly issues raised by these form letter refusals. How do these procedures prevent proper review? RGA s 6(3)(c) bars magistrates from awarding costs when a convener seeks to have an order prohibiting a gathering set aside. The High Court can, under the RGA, still award such costs. So although the High Courts may be better suited to assess competing expressive and public order interests, the RGA channels the impecunious conveners toward the Magistrates Court.[2] The Magistrate, unfamiliar with the RGA, and taking the Magistrate's Court Rules on 'urgent' applications at their word, turns down the convener's application to have the prohibition set aside.[3] All the parties — from convener, to local authority, to magistrate — have complied with the required procedures and yet no

[1] See RGA s 2*(d)*: 'The responsible officer shall endeavour to ensure that such discussions take place in good faith.'

[2] In some respects, the RGA's attempt to channel cases into the Magistrate's Court may be less of a barrier to litigation in the High Court than the drafters of the RGA anticipated. Costs are generally not awarded in cases in which the litigant seeks to vindicate a constitutional right. To the extent that an applicant has a bona fide constitutional claim, and has not engaged in an abuse of the legal process, she should not have costs awarded against her. As a result, the RGA does not create a meaningful set of disincentives with respect to the launching of constitutional challenges in the High Court. See Motsepe v Commissioner For Inland Revenue 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC) at para 30 (Holds that general rule is that caution must be exercised 'in awarding costs against litigants who seek to enforce their constitutional right against the State, particularly where the constitutionality of the statutory provision is attacked, lest such orders have an unduly inhibiting or 'chilling' effect on other potential litigants in this category.') See also Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at paras 43–44 (No order as to costs should have been made against applicant in the High Court even though 'resort to the Constitution had failed.' Therefore, 'the appellant is entitled to a reversal of that part of the order in the High Court condemning him to pay . . . costs and [he] should not have to bear the costs in this Court.') But see Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In Re Financial Services Board v Van Der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC)(Submission of record that failed to comply with Rules would warrant an order of costs.) However, it is not clear that an applicant who seeks to have a prohibition order made in terms of the RGA set aside in terms of the RGA itself, and not in terms of some provision of the Final Constitution, is similarly entitled to be immunized from an order of costs in the High Court.

[3] I am indebted to Simon Delaney — of the Freedom of Expression Institute ('FXI') — for his patient explanation of the procedural problems created by the interaction of the RGA, Magistrate's Court Rules and the Uniform Rules of Court when conveners attempt to secure prompt and adequate judicial review of a responsible officer's prohibition of a gathering. See Juta's Supreme Court Act and the Magistrates' Courts Act and Rules (3rd Edition, 2003).

gathering, and no meaningful assessment of the grounds for prohibition, takes place.

I have, in the above account, assumed 'good faith' efforts by all parties in order to illustrate the procedural problems created by the interaction between the RGA and the rules of court. However, the recent record of local authorities with respect to their statutory and constitutional obligations to facilitate assemblies suggests an attitude malign.

Local authorities often take more than a week to reply to a properly filed notice. This practice violates the 24-hour response requirements of RGA s 4 (3). Similarly, meetings with responsible officers and members of the South African Police Services (SAPS) — as required by RGA s 4(2)(b) — do not appear to be designed 'to discuss any amendment of the contents of the notice and such conditions regarding the conduct of the gathering as he may deem necessary.' In more than one instance, TCC conveners have proffered a variety of conditions, pursuant to RGA s 4(4)(b), that would allow for a peaceful demonstration that does not compromise the interests of third parties.[1] Responsible officers have demonstrated little inclination to meet their statutory obligation to facilitate these events and have refused to negotiate conditions with TCC conveners. Instead, requests to demonstrate peaceably are met with blanket prohibitions. The TCC received the following letter from a responsible officer:

> You are hereby advised that your notice for a gathering on Monday, 29 November 2004 is prohibited because of the following reasons: . . . 1. The proposed times for the gathering from 06:00 until 09:00 will result in serious vehicular traffic because it is peak hour period. 2. There is also reasonable suspicion that your gathering will result in lawlessness and damage to property. Your gathering on Monday November 29, 2004 is thus prohibited.[2]

This prohibition is noteworthy in several respects. First, RGA s 4(4)(b) actually acknowledges that gatherings will, inevitably, disrupt traffic and contemplates an agreement between the responsible officer, the convener and the police that will ensure that 'vehicular or pedestrian traffic, especially during traffic rush hours, is

[1] The TCC volunteered to submit itself to the following constraints: Restricting the picket to a designated area; limiting the number of picketers to 60 persons, the majority of whom are over 50; cordoning off the picket; requiring picketers to stand in a straight line behind the cordon; designating 20 marshals, by name, and by identifiable marks such as armbands, to ensure that the picket complies with all stipulated conditions and statutory requirements. See Founding Affidavit, Segodi, Miya and Thembelihle Crisis Committee v City Of Johannesburg & Minister of Safety and Security (High Court, Witwatersrand Local Division, 26 November 2005)(Document on file with author.) The responsible officers neither agreed to nor engaged with these proposals — as RGA s 4(2)(b) would appear to require — during the meeting to discuss the proposed march.

[2] An application by the Anti-Privatization Forum to demonstrate on a weekend elicited a similarly spurious set of reasons for prohibition. The Chief of Police of the Johannesburg Metropolitan Police Department, Chris Ngcobo, justified the ban on the following grounds:

1. Your proposed gathering will result in serious disruption of vehicular traffice because of . . . the tendency of your participants, who deliberately stop while marching, to obstruct traffic.

. . .

3. The making of fire in a public place with the intention of burning . . . account statements.

Reply to Application for a Gathering, Sunday, March 21 2004, at the Constitutional Court in Johannesburg (18 March 2004)(On file with author).

least impeded.' Second, reasonable suspicion 'of lawlessness and damage to property' is not the standard set out in the RGA for the prohibition of a gathering. RGA s 5(1) demands 'credible information on oath … brought to the attention of a responsible officer.'[1] Third, the timing of the picket is, in fact, one of its essential features. Only by timing the picket for the morning rush hour are the picketers in any position to communicate to their fellow citizens — through banners with various slogans printed thereon — their concern about the lack of delivery of basic services in Thembelihle. A picket or demonstration at another time has no audience and serves no purpose.[2]

The RGA imposes more onerous provisions on gatherings scheduled with less

[1] US assembly jurisprudence sets a similarly high threshold for the state. US courts recognize the state's substantial interest in safeguarding its citizens against violence. See Hill v Colorado 530 US 703, 715 (2000)('It is a traditional exercise of the States' 'police powers to protect the health and safety of their citizens') quoting Medtronic, Inc v Lohr 518 US 470, 475 (1996). This substantial interest in public safety does not end the inquiry. The state must provide 'tangible evidence' that speech-restrictive regulations are 'necessary' to advance the proffered interest in public safety. See Bay Area Peace Navy v United States 914 F 2d 1224, 1227 (9th Cir 1990). Generalizations about groups or kinds of groups are insufficient. See City of Chicago v Mosley 408 US 92, 100–1 (1972)(Court rejects state's 'argument that . . . it may prohibit all non-labour picketing because, as a class, non-labour picketing is more prone to produce violence than labor picketing. Predictions about imminent disruption from picketing involve judgments appropriately made on an individualized basis, not by means of broad classifications.') See also Project 80's Inc v City of Pocatello 942 F 2d 635, 638 (9th Cir 1991)(Court rejects city's public safety argument after finding 'little evidence' in the record that the ordinances banning door- to-door solicitation actually protected citizens from crime); Hodgkins v Goldsmith 2000 WL 892964 (SD Indiana 2000)(Court finds unconstitutional a curfew restricting minors' constitutional rights to assemble in public streets, parks and other traditional public fora. The mere 'common sense' justifications of the city council — married to its apparent lack of interest in providing the court with evidence linking security concerns and the behaviour of minors — elicited a withering critique.) But see Grider v Abramson 180 F 3d 739 (6th Cir 1999)(Court states that interests of security — and the high probability of violence — warrants upholding the following limits on two cotemporaneous demonstrations: (1) mandatory magnetometer searches as prerequisite to admission either to KKK rally or counter-demonstration, (2) physical segregation of KKK rally and counter-demonstration (which prevented attendees' simultaneous discourse with other attendees at both events), (3) exclusion of all private citizens from restricted police-occupied buffer zone, and (4) prohibition of all unscheduled oration within restricted area.)

[2] This account is based upon a founding affidavit drafted by the Freedom of Expression Institute on behalf of the TCC. See Founding Affidavit, Segodi, Miya and Thembelihle Crisis Committee v City Of Johannesburg & Minister of Safety and Security (High Court, Witwatersrand Local Division, 26 November 2005)(Document on file with author.) The TCC — with assistance from the Freedom of Expression Institute — is revising its litigation strategy in order to demonstrate how responsible officers, metropolitan police and local authorities abuse the discretion afforded them by the RGA. If convenors initiate the notice procedures well in advance of the scheduled date for the assembly, the state cannot so easily exploit the manner in which the RGA, the Magistrate's Court Rules and the Uniform Rules prevent the Magistrates Courts' — or High Courts — from reviewing the merits of the prohibition order. Either the local authority renders its decision within several days of a timeously called meeting or it delays issuance of the order for several weeks. If the local authority acts reasonably expeditiously and still prohibits the gathering, the Magistrates Court will have sufficient time to hear the merits of the application to have the prohibition set aside. If the local authority delays issuance of the prohibition until the very last minute, then it will be difficult to hide its facile reasons for the prohibition behind the RGA's procedures or the Magistrates' Court Rules. At a minimum, an established pattern of delay and dissembling will become part of the record of any application to a Magistrate's Court or a High Court.

than 48 hours notice.[1] Failure to meet the 48-hours-in-advance deadline for notice gives the local authorities almost unfettered discretion to issue prohibitions.[2] This extraordinary power to silence opposition places an unnecessarily blunt cudgel in the hands of individuals unlikely to place expressive interests on par with public order concerns.[3]

The 48-hour notice provisions bode ill for freedom of assembly.[4] Even expedited judicial review — which, as we have seen, is almost impossible to secure —

[1] RGA s 3(2).

[2] Ibid.

[3] Prior to the enactment of the RGA in 1996, several courts found unconstitutional the exercise by authorities of relatively unfettered powers to prohibit public assemblies. See, eg, ANC (Border Branch) v Chairman, Council of State, Ciskei 1992 (4) SA 434 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 145, 165 (Ck)(Unfettered powers of prohibition of public assemblies given to magistrates and police found to be unjustifiable restriction of freedom of assembly) quoting Dillon v Municipal Court for Monterey-Carmel 49 P 2d 945 (1971) ('Any procedure which allows licensing officials wide or unbounded discretion in granting or denying permits is constitutionally infirm because it permits them to base their determination on the content of the ideas sought to be expressed.') See also In re Munhumeso & Others 1995 (2) BCLR 125 (ZS)(Impugned legislation clearly at variance with freedom of assembly; regulating authority had uncontrolled power to impose conditions which may amount to an absolute ban, irrespective of traffic flow or likelihood of a breach of the peace or public disorder); § 43.3*(b)*(iv) infra (On the constitutionality of statutory provisions that grant state officials untrammelled discretion with respect to time, place and manner restrictions.)

[4] The RGA does, however, have gaps with respect to adherence to the notice requirements that can be exploited by savvy protestors. According to RGA s 12(2): 'It shall be a defence to a charge of convening a gathering in contravention of subsection (1) (a) that the gathering concerned took place spontaneously.' See Affidavit of Na'eem Jeenah, Palestinian Solidarity Committee (3 November 2004)(On file with author)('On Wednesday, 20th October 2004 I was present at a protest outside the Sandton Convention Centre in Sandton. The protest was against the imminent arrival at the Convention Centre of Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his signing of a protection of investment treaty with South Africa's Minister of Trade and Industry, Mandisi Mpahlwa. The protest was organised spontaneously in the morning of the 20th October 2004, when we confirmed that we would exercise our constitutional right to hold a peaceful protest.' (Emphasis added).) It seems clear — therefore — that a failure to notify the authorities in advance of a (planned) gathering can serve as a 'get out of jail free' card. A savvy protest organizer will leave no paper-trail. She will neither advertise the event with posters nor circulate e-mails that might ultimately contradict the defence of spontaneity. Of course, too many 'spontaneous' gatherings may lead both prosecutors and the courts to view the defence of 'spontaneity' with a healthy degree of scepticism. See US v Masel 54 F Supp 2d 903 (WD Wisconsin 1999)(US Courts will not allow demonstrators to escape time, place and manner restrictions on the grounds that the protestors are not, ostensibly, part of a formal association. Just as the absence of formal structures does not deny assemblers the protection of the First Amendment, the absence of formal structures does not absolve the demonstrators of the responsibility for complying with notice requirements and other facially neutral regulations. The Masel Court refused to allow demonstrators to hide behind the 'fiction' of non-association when they were, on the facts, clearly engaged in collective action.)

Or consider another way of complying with the notice requirements that avoids the possibility of both prohibition and conviction. Assume a group of 20 persons plan a march at 06h00 on Monday. At 15h30 on the preceding Friday, the convener faxes an RGA s 3 notice to the responsible officer. These offices have already closed at the appointed hour of 15h00. The offices only re-open at 07h00 the following Monday. By the time the responsible officer reads the timeously filed fax, the gathering is in full swing. The convener has complied fully with RGA s 8. The police proceed to arrest the marchers under RGA s 12(1)(a). But since RGA s 12(1) has not, in fact, been breached, the accused must be acquitted. Correspondence with S Delaney, Staff Attorney, FXI, (25 February 2005)(On file with author.)

is no match for local authorities bent on stamping out the spread of dissent through the use of blanket prohibitions.[1]

Another powerful set of mechanisms for chilling assembly are the provisions made in Chapter 4 of the RGA for the imposition of civil liability.[2] If riot damage occurs as a result of a demonstration, each member of the demonstration is jointly and severally liable for the damage caused. Joint and several liability for riot damage creates the potential for significant personal liability. How many members of the public are willing to risk personal bankruptcy to challenge some undesirable state of affairs? Only those, I suppose, who have little or nothing left to lose. However, the freedoms guaranteed in the Final Constitution

[1] The Constitutional Court has recognized that the use of expedited procedures poses a unique threat to the exercise of fundamental rights. See, eg, S v Mamabolo (E TV and others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)(Court holds that while the protection of reputation justifies placing limits on speech that scandalises a court, the protection of reputation does not justify expedited procedures that fail to take account of the expressive interests at stake.) As I have noted above, several Magistrates Courts have refused to hear the statutorily guaranteed expedited appeal of a prohibition because the urgent applications made by conveners failed to satisfy the criteria for urgent applications established by the rules of court. Interview with J Duncan, Director, FXI, (3 February 2005). Interview with S Delaney, Staff Attorney, FXI, (10 February 2005). The absence, practically speaking, of a meaningful avenue of appeal, both where that gathering has and has not met the 7-day notice requirement, creates a regulatory framework inimical to the right to assemble.

[2] RGA ss 11(1) and (2) read, in relevant part: '(1) If any riot damage occurs as a result of (a) a gathering, every organization on behalf of or under the auspices of which that gathering was held, or, if not so held, the convener; (b) a demonstration, every person participating in such demonstration, shall, subject to subsection (2), be jointly and severally liable for that riot damage as a joint wrongdoer contemplated in Chapter II of the Apportionment of Damages Act, 1956 (Act 34 of 1956), together with any other person who unlawfully caused or contributed to such riot damage and any other organization or person who is liable therefor in terms of this subsection. (2) It shall be a defence to a claim against a person or organization contemplated in subsection (1) if such a person or organization proves- (a) that he or it did not permit or connive at the act or omission which caused the damage in question; and (b) that the act or omission in question did not fall within the scope of the objectives of the gathering or demonstration in question and was not reasonably foreseeable; and (c) that he or it took all reasonable steps within his or its power to prevent the act or omission in question: Provided that proof that he or it forbade an act of the kind in question shall not by itself be regarded as sufficient proof that he or it took all reasonable steps to prevent the act in question.' See Freedom of Expression Institute 'Annual Report for 2004' (2004) available at www.fxi.org.za, (accessed on 28 January 2005)(Suggests, without argument, that RGA s 11(1) and (2) are constitutionally suspect); R La Grange 'Opinion for the Freedom of Expression Institute on the Regulation of Gathering Act (12 July 2004) at para 117 ('[T]he provisions of section 11(1) and (2) extend ordinary civil liability on grounds that would not normally be recognised in a delictual action and also place the onus on the defendant to disprove liability. . . [T]his latter effect reverses the traditional onus for civil liability and constitutes a serious infringement of the common law rights of a defendant in an action for damages.') are intended to protect the expressive interests of all, not just those on the margin. The official response to this concern that civil liability requirements chill assembly is that demonstration organizers can take out demonstration damage insurance prior to a march. That line of argument appears reasonable until one asks whether controversial groups will be able to secure insurance, or whether even a mainstream political group can convince their insurers that they will not attract a violent response for which they may ultimately be held liable. In many instances both controversial and mainstream groups will find insurance either unavailable or too costly.[1] These groups may decide to take their chances.[2] If they do, however, they run the risk that the police will incite a violent response and that any subsequent damage will both discredit and bankrupt the organization and its membership. Civil liability makes assembly a high-stakes game that most assemblers either are bound to lose or not permitted to play.[3]

The US Supreme Court has rejected the imposition of joint and several liability on participants in an otherwise lawful boycott simply because some participants engaged in acts of violence. See NAACP v Claiborne Hardware Co 458 US 886, 915–920 (1982)(Claiborne Court wrote that '[c]ivil liability may not be imposed merely because an individual belonged to a group,' a gathering, an assembly or an association. Claiborne Court held that 'only those individuals who participated in violent or unlawful activities that proximately caused the damages could be held liable.') See also US v Masel 54 F Supp 2d 903 (WD Wisconsin 1999) N Jarman & D Bryan 'General Principles Governing Freedom of Assembly and Public Events Institute for Conflict Research: Comparative Assessment of Assembly Law in England, Scotland, Republic of Ireland, France, Italy, Israel, Palestine, USA, Canada and South Africa' Institute for Conflict Research Working Paper (2000) available at www.conflictresearch.org.uk, (accessed on 25 January 2005).

At first glance, the RGA gives every indication that Parliament had solved problems associated with of the use of deadly force to disperse demonstrators. RGA s 9(2)(e) provides that the force necessary to prevent the killing or serious injury of persons or the destruction or serious damage to immovable property or valuable movable property must be 'necessary', 'moderated' and 'proportionate to the circumstances'.[4] It thereby places some philosophical limits on deadly force. However, RGA s 9(2)(d) expressly allows the use of 'firearms and other weapons' for crowd control and permits the use of force where there are apparently 'manifest intentions' to kill or to seriously injure persons, or to destroy or seriously damage property.[5] RGA ss 9(3) and 13(1)(b) insulate the common-law defences

[1] See V Blasi 'Prior Restraints on Demonstrations' (1970) 68 Mich LR 1481 (Blasi argues that a municipality's use of large fees for policing and sanitation constitute unconstitutional prior restraints on public assemblies. Civil liability provisions function in a comparable manner.)

[2] So taken is Parliament with the potential efficacy of civil liability as a form of social control with respect to assemblies and demonstrations that the Security and Constitutional Affairs Select Committee, has recommended that the South African Law Reform Commission investigate the possibility of a specific civil action in respect of consequential damages arising from 'terrorist' hoaxes. See Protection of Constitutional Democracy Against Terrorist and Related Activities Bill [B 12B–2003].

[3] B Rutinwa 'Freedom of Association and Assembly: Unions, NGOs and Political Freedom in Sub-Saharan Africa' Article 19 Working Paper (March 2001) available at www.article19.org/docimages/986.htm, (accessed on 25 December 2005). Rutinwa accepts the thrust of my criticism but suggests that the appropriate response is to reform the RGA along the lines of Ghanaian Law. Under Ghanaian law, he says 'responsibility for any damage occurring in the course of demonstrations is borne not by all demonstrators jointly and severally, but by those individuals proved to have caused it.' See Public Order Act 491 of 1994. I may be mistaken, but on my reading of the Ghanaian Public Order Act, ss 3(1) and 3(2) hold both organizers and any other person responsible for the property damage liable for that damage.

[4] See, eg, Barney v Eugene 20 Fed Appx 683, 2001 WL 1153441 (9th Cir 2001)(Court holds that use of tear-gas constituted a permissable use of force after violence erupted and that the use of tear-gas on non-violent demonstrators — after several hours of peaceful protest — did not violate the rights to free speech and assembly of the non-violent demonstrators.)

[5] RGA s 9(2)(d) reads: 'If any person who participates in a gathering or demonstration or any person who hinders, obstructs or interferes with persons who participate in a gathering or demonstration- (i) kills or seriously injures, or attempts to kill or seriously injure, or shows a manifest intention of killing or seriously injuring, any person; or (ii) destroys or does serious damage to, or attempts to destroy or to do serious damage to, or shows a manifest intention of destroying or doing serious damage to, any of self-defence, necessity and protection of property from the effect of RGA s 9(2)(e).[1] Read together, these provisions create innumerable opportunities for the police to use deadly force to curb 'potentially violent' or 'potentially destructive' demonstrations.[2] After the Constitutional Court's judgment in Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: In Re S v Walters & Another[3] and the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Govender v Minister of Safety and Security,[4] it is hard to imagine that our appellate courts would not find these RGA provisions constitutionally infirm. The Walters Court held that s 49(2) of Criminal Procedure Act[5] was unconstitutional to the extent that it authorized the use of deadly force where there was no threat of serious bodily harm.[6] In light of Walters, RGA s 9(2)(d)'s authorization to use firearms where there is merely an intention to 'destroy … or damage property' must be viewed as constitutionally suspect. RGA s 9(3)'s insulation of common law doctrines that sanction the use of deadly force in order to protect private property should likewise fail the Walters test. As for the other provisions in the RGA that permit the use of deadly force for the purposes of crowd control, both Govender and Walters suggest that, at a minimum, such provisions must be read down so as to 'exclude the use of firearm or similar weapon' unless a law enforcement officer has 'reasonable grounds for believing (a) that the immovable property or movable property considered to be valuable, such a member of the Police of or above the rank of warrant officer may order the members of the Police under his command to take the necessary steps to prevent the action contemplated in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) and may for that purpose, if he finds other methods to be ineffective or inappropriate, order the use of force, including the use of firearms and other weapons. (e) The degree of force which may be so used shall not be greater than is necessary for the prevention of the actions contemplated in subparagraphs (d)(i) and (ii), and the force shall be moderated and be proportionate to the circumstances of the case and the object to be attained. The power to use such deadly force has the potential to create a duty to use to it.' See Mpongwana v Minister of Safety and Security 1999 (2) SA 794, 805 (C)(High Court found that a duty imposed on the police by RGA s 9(1)(f) to take all reasonable steps to protect persons and property might well be a factor in deciding whether police had duty of care, for the purpose of proving a cause of action in delict, where use of deadly force results in harm.) See also Rail Commuter Action Group v Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail (No 1) 2003 (5) SA 518, 573 (C)(Court imposed legal duty on state-owned railway, in terms of FC ss 11 and 12(1), to minimise the extent of violent crime and lack of safety on a public commuter rail service.)

[1] RGA s 9(3) reads, in relevant part: 'No common law principles regarding self-defence, necessity and protection of property shall be affected by the provisions of this Act.'

[2] The Independent Complaints Directorate ('ICD') has recommended that police officers who fired into a crowd of demonstrators and killed one person be charged with murder. The ICD report states that the use of birdshot and buckshot is unlawful. Correspondence with J Duncan, Director, FXI (15 May 2005).

[3] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters').

[4] 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 197 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA)('Govender').

[5] Act 51 of 1977.

[6] Walters (supra) at paras 40, 41, 45, 46. The conditions for exercise of this license also stand in direct conflict with international instruments on the subject. The Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials, s 9, reads, in relevant part: 'Law enforcement officials shall not use firearms against persons except in self-defense or defense of others against the imminent threat of death or serious injury or to prevent the perpetration of a particularly serious crime involving grave threat to life … In any event, intentional lethal use of firearms may only be made when strictly unavoidable in order to protect life.' Proceedings of the United Nations 8th Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (1990) available at www.uncjin.org/Documents/8comm/index.html, or www.asc41.com/8th%20UN%20Congress%20on%20the%20Prevention%20of%20Crime/8th_congress.htm (accessed on 28 February 2005).

suspect poses an immediate threat of serious bodily harm to him or her, or a threat of harm to members of the public; or (b) that the suspect has committed a crime involving infliction or threatened infliction of serious bodily harm.'[1] To the extent that they cannot be read down, these provisions violate the right to dignity, FC s 10, the right to life, FC s 11, and the right to freedom and security of the person, FC s 12.[2]

The RGA provides for summary intervention by a judicial officer.[3] While summary judicial interventions per se are not constitutionally infirm, the Constitutional Court in Mamabelo found 'broadly similar procedures' — in the context of expressive conduct and contempt of court — unconstitutional.[4]

43.3 Assembly Analysis

> Everyone has the right, peacefully and unarmed, to assemble, to demonstrate, to picket and to present petitions.[5]

(a) The content of the right

The approach to assembly analysis adumbrated in this chapter tracks the Constitutional Court's preferred approach.[6] This two-stage process requires that we first establish the categories of assembly, demonstration, picket and petition that

[1] Govender (supra) at paras 21 and 24. See also Walters (supra) at paras 38–39.

[2] Walters (supra) at paras 3–7, 40–41, 45–46.

[3] See RGA ss 4(4) and 6 (1). RGA s 4(4) reads, in relevant part: 'If a local authority does not exist or is not functioning in the area where a gathering is to be held, the convener shall give notice as contemplated in this section to the magistrate of the district within which that gathering is to be held or to commence, and such magistrate shall thereafter fulfil the functions, exercise the powers and discharge the duties conferred or imposed by this Act on a responsible officer in respect of such gathering.' RGA, s 6(1)(b) reads, in relevant part: 'Whenever an authorized member in terms of section 4(4)(b) requests that a particular condition be imposed and the request is refused, or whenever information contemplated in section 5(1) is brought to the attention of a responsible officer and the gathering in question is not prohibited, an authorized member may, if instructed thereto by the Commissioner or the district commissioner of the South African Police for the area where the gathering is to be held, apply to an appropriate magistrate to set aside such refusal or to prohibit such gathering, as the case may be, and the magistrate may refuse or grant the application.'

[4] S v Mamabolo (E TV and others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at paras 53–58 (Court finds summary procedures for contempt of court committed in facie curiae inquisitorial, inherently punitive, unfair, and not reconcilable with the basic standards of fairness called for by FC s 35(3)).

[5] Section 17 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'). Section 16 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution') read: 'Every person shall have the right to assemble and demonstrate with others peacefully and unarmed, and to present petitions.'

[6] That approach is a value-based or purposive approach. A value-based approach to rights interpretation is profitably compared to a notional approach to rights interpretation. A notional approach to rights interpretation holds that any activity or status falling 'notionally' within the ambit of a right is protected. The applicant would then merely have to demonstrate a restriction of the protected activity before the analysis moved on to the limitation clause. See, eg, Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)(Court assumes violation of FC ss 15 and 31); Benaish v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)(FC s 34, access to court, means 'access to court'); Ferreira v Levin NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Ackermann J assumes that 'freedom' in IC s 11 means freedom in its broadest possible sense). For more on the conceptual confusion associated with a notional approach, see S Woolman 'The Right serve the values which animate the freedom and those categories of assembly, demonstration, picket and petition that fall without the freedom's protective ambit. The second step, if necessary, requires a demonstration that a protected FC s 17 activity has been impaired. Only then may we assess the merit of arguments in support of laws that limit the exercise of this right.[1] A good example of the consequences of failing to distinguish between the distinct requirement of rights analysis and limitations analysis in the context of the right to assemble is Acting Superintendent-General of Education of KwaZulu-Natal v Ngubo.[2] In deciding that the freedom of assembly — IC s 16 — 'implicitly extends no further than is necessary "to convey the [demonstrator's] message",' the Ngubo court collapses the determination of the scope of the right with what ought to be the subsequent analysis of the conditions under which that right may be justifiably restricted.[3]

Consistency: Benaish v Ernst & Young (1999) 15 SAJHR 166; S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 34. On the other hand, a value-based approach: (a) takes seriously FC s 39(2)'s admonition that the provisions of Chapter 2 be interpreted in light of the 'values which underlie an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, freedom and equality'; (b) permits us to screen out those forms of behaviour that clearly do not merit constitutional protection; (c) ensures that only genuine and serious violations of a constitutional right make it through to limitation clause analysis; (d) possesses the virtue of having both rights analysis and limitations analysis driven by service to the same five fundamental values; and (e) demands that courts provide an adequate explanation for rules it derives from the rights enshrined in the Final Constitution. See also L Weinrib 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Section One of the Charter' (1988) 10 Sup Ct LR 469, 477; E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 32–33.

[1] Indeed, it is now trite law that one must first establish the scope of the right and its contravention, before one proceeds to the justificatory stage of the analysis. See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401, 414 (CC)(Fundamental rights analysis under IC Chapter 3 'calls for a two-stage approach. First, has there been a contravention of a guaranteed right? If so, is it justified under the limitation clause?') See also S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665, 707 (CC).

[2] 1996 (3) BCLR 369 (N).

[3] Ibid at 375. Canadian expressive conduct jurisprudence sounds a similar cautionary note with respect to the proper allocation of tasks in a Bill of Rights that bifurcates fundamental rights analysis. See Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139, 77 DLR (4th) 385 ('CCC') (For an extended discussion and critique of Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada, see S Woolman & J De Waal (supra) at 292.) At issue in CCC was the plaintiffs' freedom to distribute handbills and carry placards promoting their political positions in a public airport terminal concourse. An airport regulation prohibited all expressive activity and made no distinction between commercial solicitation and political advocacy. Lamer CJ's opinion ignores the structural imperatives of the Charter and analyses both the expressive interests and governmental interests within the freedom alone. Part of the reason, if not the entire reason, that Lamer locates his test for expressive conduct in public spaces solely within Charter s 2*(b)* is that he decides that the regulation in question is not a 'law' within the meaning of s 1, the limitation clause. He is, therefore, unable to do the necessary assessment of the government's justification in the context of s 1. Our jurisprudence on the meaning of law of general application, though under-developed, would appear to contemplate treating published government regulations as laws of general application. L'Heureux-Dubé J's opinion — and her notional approach to rights analysis — contradicts her stated belief that not all public property is appropriate for expressive activity and results in the use of two overlapping balancing tests in the context of her s 1 analysis. L'Heureux-Dubé's judgment suffers not so much from incoherence as a lack of elegance. Her 'balancing' tests do, ultimately, address the central question of the case: whether the expressive activity in question is compatible with the property's purpose and whether other 'public arenas' in the vicinity are available and adequate for the expressive activities.

(i) Internal modifiers

Much is made of the violence implicit in every act of state and every rule of law.[1] It would be churlish, however, to deny that crowds of demonstrators, protestors and picketers are not moved by violence, do not communicate through violence or do not use violence to seduce. The internal modifiers in FC s 17 recognize 'violence' as an intrinsic element of assembly and seek not to suppress it, but to channel it, to make it a part of the cut and thrust of democratic politics.

(aa) Peacefully

One readily identifiable class of assemblies, demonstrations and pickets excluded from the protection of the right are those that are not peaceful. So, for example, the High Court in Fourways Mall (Pty) Ltd v South African Commercial Catering found that neither the LRA nor FC s 17 countenance assault and that picketers may not employ tactics that intimidate the general public and thereby interfere with the rights of other tenants of a shopping mall.[2]

German assembly jurisprudence offers additional guidance. In Germany, an assembly is deemed non-peaceful only if acts of physical violence against person or property are committed or threatened.[3] Consistent with concerns regarding out-groups and intra-election voter-representative communication, Hoffmann-Riem argues that it should be kept in mind that assembly is primarily used by those who are dissatisfied with the status quo.[4] A generous interpretation of the 'peaceful' proviso is therefore necessary to prevent the state from exploiting this

[1] See, eg, R Cover 'The Bonds of Constitutional Interpretation: Of the Word, the Deed and the Role' (1986) 20 Georgia LR 815, 818 ('Violence is so intrinsic a characteristic of the structure of [law] that it need not be mentioned: Read the Constitution. Nowhere does it state the obvious: that the government thereby ordained has the power to practice violence over its people.')

[2] 1999 (3) SA 752, 759 (W).

[3] In German assembly jurisprudence, not every unlawful disturbance of law and order or infringement of the rights of others is understood to be 'violent'. An assembly is deemed non-peaceful only if acts of physical violence against person or property are committed or threatened. See Brokdorf 69 BVerfGE 315, 360 (1985); Mutlangen 73 BVerfGE 206, 248 (1986). ECHR jurisprudence is somewhat more restrictive — if only because the margin of appreciation requires the ECHR Court to defer, where appropriate, to the understanding of a domestic court. See Stankov (supra) at para 90 ('Where there has been incitement to violence against an individual or a public official or a sector of the population, the State authorities enjoy a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression.') See also Incal v Turkey [1998] ECHR 48 at para 48; Sürek v Turkey (No 1) [1999] ECHR 51 at para 61. However, recent ECHR decisions have found that authorities may restrict or prohibit assemblies only where the state can demonstrate violent intent. The mere assertion that a dissident group may destroy property, disturb the peace, or propagate separatist ideas are insufficient grounds for limiting the right. See Stankov (supra) at paras 77–112 ('Article 11 of the Convention only protects the right to 'peaceful assembly'. That notion — according to the Commission's case-law — does not cover a demonstration where the organisers and participants have violent intentions.' However the Commission found no evidence of such intent in the instant case and rejected alleged past incidents as grounds for prohibition.) See also Christians against Racism and Fascism v The United Kingdom (1980) 21 DR 138; G v Germany (1989) 60 DR 256.

[4] See W Hoffmann-Riem Reihe Alternativkommentare Kommentar zum Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (1984) 753.

requirement in order to suppress unpopular positions.[1] This generous interpretation ensures that if some members of an assembly resort to violence, while the majority of the participants remain peaceful, the assembly remains protected. This result is necessary to prevent a peaceful assembly from being hijacked by violent supporters, opponents or agents provocateurs. When such a hijacking does occur, the police must attempt to act solely against the violent minority and to avoid depriving the rest of the assembly of FC s 17's protection.[2]

(bb) Unarmed

Another readily identifiable class of assemblies, demonstrations and pickets excluded from the protection of the right are those in which the participants are armed. Once again, German assembly jurisprudence enhances our understanding of this internal modifier.[3]

In Germany, the use of protective devices by demonstrators (such as shields) has been prohibited by the Assembly Act on the grounds that they stimulate aggression among participants and onlookers by showing a readiness to engage in violence.[4] The carrying of defensive devices by demonstrators, however, may be grounds for police action against the whole assembly — as opposed to acting solely against the individuals carrying the defensive devices — only when it can be shown that the majority of demonstrators intend to provoke a response and are gearing themselves up for a reaction from counter-demonstrators or the police.[5] So understood, the modifier 'unarmed' might even be read to prohibit the use of masks. Certainly anyone familiar with the history of the Ku Klux Klan in the United States would understand that the wearing of masks can be read as an explicit threat.[6]

[1] The use of sit-ins to blockade entrances, roads, and railway lines — initially characterized as 'violent' by ordinary German courts — are now constitutionally protected. See S Woolman and J de Waal 'Voting with Your Feet' in D van Wyk, B de Villiers, J Dugard & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 292 citing BGH (1969) NJW 1770, 1773 (In upholding convictions of students who disrupted lectures, a German administrative court found that while pressure to listen was constitutionally protected, outright coercion is not.)

[2] See Brokdorf (supra) at 361.

[3] See Article 2.3 VersammlG (Prohibits the transportion, provision, or distribution of weapons to assemblies.) The definition of 'arms' obviously embraces guns and knives. But bottles and sticks may — depending on the intention of the carrier — also qualify as arms. Rotten eggs, tomatoes, or paint — when used to embarrass opponents — ought to fall outside the definition. See Schilder (supra) at 150.

[4] Article 17a VersammlG.

[5] See Maunz and Dürig (supra) at 26.

[6] Not all masks are veiled threats. Any law that treats all masks as such ought to be viewed as void for overbreadth. See South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Another 1999 (2) SA 735, 746 (T)(A 255 word definition of 'act of public protest' covered conduct ranging from 'holding or attendance of a meeting which is calculated to support or oppose any policy or conduct of the government or of a foreign government' to any indication of 'private or public support or opposition regarding any policy, conduct or principle' or any event of national or public concern.' The long but still non-exhaustive definition of public protest could capture complaints made by a defense force member to her husband in relation to absolutely any 'an event of national or public concern.' Such a complaint could never be accurately described as a public protest. Section 126B(4) of Defence Act 44 of 1957 was therefore deemed void for overbreadth. Although the court did not make this point expressly, the breadth of the definition of public protest would extinguish the entire range of expressive and political rights of each

(ii) Assembly

Courts accord different kinds of expressive activity different levels of protection. Comparative constitutional analysis suggests that of all the expressive rights — speech, voting, political participation, religion, association — assembly may receive the least amount of judicial solicitude. Part of the explanation for this diminished protection is that assembly — like other forms of conduct — is often viewed merely as a condition for freedom of speech, and that it is the content of the speech itself that is thought to be of paramount importance. Stated another way, the courts have tended to view a political or social gathering as important for what is said at the gathering rather than for the fact of the gathering itself.[1] This tendency in rights discourse towards (artificially) separating the speech act from the surrounding conduct reflects a widespread and deeply embedded bias against extending constitutional protections to groups.[2]

History is, of course, no argument. The introduction to this chapter sets out various independent grounds for a right to assemble: (a) to create space for large, vocal social formations that service representative democracies; (b) to act as a catalyst for debate; (c) to supplement representative democracy through a form of direct democracy; (d) to empower out-groups; (e) to enhance the stability and the legitimacy of the political processes by allowing for the articulation of minority and every member of the military.) See also Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 631, 643 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)(Court held a statutory provision providing for imprisonment for non-payment of civil debts to be unconstitutional because it was overbroad); Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 587 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 49 ('Overbreadth analysis is properly conducted in the course of application of the limitations clause. To determine whether a law is overbroad, a court must consider the means used in relation to its constitutionally legitimate underlying objectives. If the impact of the law is not proportionate with such objectives, that law may be deemed overbroad'); Reitzer Pharmaceuticals (Pty) Ltd v Registrar of Medicines &d Another 1998 (4) SA 660, 669 (T)(On the nature of overbreadth for the purposes of constitutional analysis.) See, further, 'FXI Supports the Right of Gay and Lesbian People to March in Their Outfits' FXI Newsletter (17 September 2004). The FXI report noted that the Johannesburg Metropolitan Police Department threatened to arrest drag queens wearing any form of disguise that obscures their facial features. The police asserted that their authority to make such arrests flowed from the RGA. RGA s 8(7) reads: 'No person shall at any gathering or demonstration wear a disguise or mask or any other apparel or item which obscures his facial features and prevents his identification.' The construction of this section by the police suggests that RGA s 8(7) may be void for overbreadth. The section does not appear to lend itself to reading down.

[1] Cf De Jonge v Oregon 299 US 353 (1937)(Court recognizes the right of free assembly as separate and distinct from those of free speech and free press, and 'equally fundamental'); Thomas v Collins 323 US 516 (1945)(Court not only recognizes the right of free assembly as a separate and distinct right but also extends its protection to any peaceable assembly, be it public, private, political, economic, or social.) See also CE Baker 'Unreasoned Reasonableness: Mandatory Parade Permits and Time, Place and Manner Regulations' (1983) 78 Northwestern U LR 937 (Argues that there are strong and independent grounds for protecting assembly and that it should not be treated as an adjunct of speech.)

[2] For a set of arguments designed as a corrective for such methodological individualism, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) §§ 44.1*(b)*(i)-(ii). See also Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (Attorney General) (1989) 39 CRR 193, 229 (SCC)('[I]f the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee.')

views; (f) to improve government accountability and responsiveness between elections; (g) to channel the violence inherent in mass action into a less dangerous form; and (h) to facilitate self-actualisation. None of these grounds is, I think, entirely reducible to or exhausted by their service to expressive ends. All of these grounds, read together, establish the protective ambit of the freedom of assembly.

A freedom to assemble defined in terms of the aforementioned goods — and one that includes ground (h) — is open to the critique that there is very little by way of collective activity that FC s 17 does not notionally protect. As a result, I am inclined towards a view of FC s 17 that emphasizes its broadly political dimensions.[1] Ground (h) may well warrant the extension of the protection of FC s 17 to gatherings that serve purely recreational, developmental, spiritual, cultural, commercial or academic ends. But a court should do so advisedly.[2]

(iii) Demonstrations

What is the difference between an assembly and a demonstration? Resort to dictionary definitions has always struck me as rather jejune. However, in the absence of any textual indication, or discussion in the travaux preparatoires, as to the meaning of each word, common sense understandings supplemented by their use as legal terms of art are as good a place as any to start.

Demonstrations are associated with some form of support or opposition for a moral or political position. Assemblies are gatherings that may or may not have political content. South African case law offers no gloss or variation on this distinction.

The only definition of 'demonstration' in South African law appears in the Regulation of Gatherings Act ('RGA'). RGA s 1 defines 'demonstration' as 'any demonstration by one or more persons, but not more than 15 persons, for or against any person, cause, action or failure to take action.' RGA s 1 defines 'gathering' as 'any assembly, concourse or procession of more than 15 persons in or on any public road as defined in the Road Traffic Act . . . , or any other public place or premises wholly or partly open to the air.' The RGA distinguishes demonstrations from gatherings solely in terms of size. As a purely abstract matter, there is no reason to limit the extension of the term 'demonstration' to groups of 15 or less. The purpose of the RGA's construction of 'demonstration' is to differentiate the conditions under which a group must subject itself to the advance notification requirements of the Act from the conditions under which groups are not so subject. Demonstrations — 15 people or less — are not perceived to be threats to public order. Convenors are therefore not required to provide advance notification. Gatherings of any greater size, whatever their purpose, are.

[1] Even if the right is limited to assemblies with political dimensions, it will still protect an array of practices in public and in private. See, eg, Djavit An v Turkey [2003] ECHR 91 at para 56 ('Freedom of assembly . . . should not be interpreted restrictively. As such this right covers both private meetings and meetings in public thoroughfares as well as static meetings and public processions; in addition, it can be exercised by individuals and those organising the assembly.')

[2] The contraction of assembly's ambit to serve political ends suggests that a whole host of activities do not fall under the aegis of FC s 17. The point is not that these activities do not deserve protection, but rather that they are best protected by other rights or well-established non-constitutional bodies of law.

Contrary to the Goldstone Commission's recommendations, this numerical definition of demonstration does not protect 'demonstration as of right'.[1] The apparent intention of the legislature was to limit the number of people who could assemble freely without providing prior notice. The RGA offers no insight into this distinction between demonstrations and gatherings. The RGA does not engage the different types of assembly nor does it attempt to craft regulatory regimes that actually fit the varying aims of such assemblies. Given the absence of any explanation in the RGA for the distinction made between demonstrations and gatherings, the 15-person threshold for demonstrations must be viewed as arbitrary. The consequences of the distinction between demonstrations and gatherings under the RGA, however, are quite real. Persons convicted of participating in a gathering without giving proper notification may receive a fine of up to R20 000 and/or a term of imprisonment of up to one year.[2]

Given the history of this country, and, in particular, the prominence of demonstrations as a mode of mass political action, the drafters of the Final Constitution would have been unlikely to invest 'demonstration' with a narrow numerical extension. Even if we accept the proposition that the state may legitimately restrict demonstrations as of right, the definitions of 'demonstration' and 'gathering' under the RGA not only inhibit the exercise of assembly but criminalize gatherings that pose no absolutely threat at all to order, property or other public goods. So while the definition of demonstration is constitutionally suspect because it is radically under-inclusive, the definition of gatherings may well be found void for vagueness and overbreadth.[3]

[1] See § 43.2*(b)*(ii) supra.

[2] See RGA s 12(1).

[3] The definition of 'gathering' under the RGA subjects to notice requirements every public congregation larger than 15 persons intended 'to mobilize or demonstrate support for or opposition to the views, principles, policy, actions or omissions of any person or body of persons or institution.' Did Parliament mean to require every convenor of a church convocation in a public park — during which issues of moment may be debated and the considered opinion of the community canvassed — to apprise local authorities of the meeting in advance or risk the imposition of a banning order or the dispersal of the persons assembled? The RGA, as I noted above, makes no attempt to distinguish between that different kinds of social gatherings in which beliefs and practices — social, economic, spiritual or political — are engaged (and sometimes contested.) The RGA's potential threat of criminal sanctions in the context of a church convocation ought to be sufficient for a court to find the applicable provisions of the RGA void for overbreadth. Similar considerations support invalidating the applicable provisions of the RGA on the grounds of vagueness. The definition of 'gathering' in the RGA would seem to be 'so vague, wide and subject to subjective or arbitrary interpretation that it is impossible to read the wording down to a constitutionally acceptable definition.' De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2003 (3) SA 389 (W), 2002 (12) BCLR 1285 (W) at para 72 (On vagueness.) See also Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 47 ('It is an important principle of the rule of law that rules be stated in a clear and accessible manner.') No reasonable person could determine — on the basis of the RGA's definition alone — whether the RGA's requirements applied solely to party political protests or to such events as a church convocation.

(iv) Picketing

The right to picket is a noteworthy addition to our assembly jurisprudence.[1] Primary and secondary picketing are often used by organized labour to bring management to heel.[2] One might have expected, therefore, that the right to picket

[1] Canada recognizes picketing as one of many expressive and political rights that serve a range of political, social and economic ends. See Retail Wholesale & Department Store Union, Local 580 v Dolphin Delivery Ltd (1986) 33 DLR 174, 183, [1986] 2 SCR 573 (Explains the Canadian Charter's commitment to picketing as follows: 'It is one of the fundamental concepts that has formed the basis for the historical development of the political, social and educational institutions of western society. Representative democracy as we know it today . . . depends upon its maintenance and protection.')

[2] The Labour Relations Act ('LRA') affords trade unions and their members significant statutory protection with respect to the right to picket in and about the private property of an employer. Act 66 of 1995. LRA s 69 reads, in relevant part: (1) A registered trade union may authorise a picket by its members and supporters for the purposes of peacefully demonstrating- (a) in support of any protected strike; or (b) in opposition to any lock-out. (2) Despite any law regulating the right of assembly, a picket authorised in terms of subsection (1), may be held- (a) in any place to which the public has access but outside the premises of an employer; or (b) with the permission of the employer, inside the employer's premises. [Sub-s. (2) amended by s. 20 of Act 42 of 1996.] (3) The permission referred to in subsection (2) (b) may not be unreasonably withheld.'

However, the LRA does not permit pickets that employ physical intimidation unrelated to a given labour dispute. See Minister Of Correctional Services v Ngubo 2000 (2) SA 668, 673 (N)(LRA protection of strikes and picketing does not extend to forms of physical intimidation intended not to communicate opposition to a labour practice but to coerce others into action — say the resignation of a member of management — that does not fall within 'the purview of the LRA'); Modise v Steve's Spar, Blackheath 2001 (2) SA 406 (LAC) at paras 118–119. (Although 'strikers' conduct is mitigated by the fact that 'they abided by the terms of the interdict prohibiting picketing within a defined distance of the trading premises, but they did not, despite the interdict, stop striking. . . . Obedience to a court order is foundational to a State based on the rule of law'); Jacot-Guillarmod v Provincial Government, Gauteng, & Another 1999 (3) SA 594, 599 (T) quoting from Mondi Paper v Paper Printing Wood & Allied Workers Union & Others (1997) 18 ILJ 84, 90 (D)(LRA permits 'a registered trade union to authorise a picket by its members and supporters for the purposes of peacefully demonstrating in support of any protected strike.' However, 'the incidents relating to the intimidation of non-striking employees at home are . . . examples of improper demonstrating in support of a strike.')

Distinguishing those conditions of assembly which compel others to reconsider their positions from those conditions of assembly that employ coercion to effect the actual desired outcome is difficult to do. It is also difficult, ex post facto, for courts to assess competing accounts of strike actions. In South African Commercial Catering And Allied Workers Union & Others v Irvin & Johnson Ltd, the Labour Appeals Court concluded that conduct of the demonstrators was intimidatory and 'carried out with a disregard for the economic rights of the employer and the right to security and tranquility of its employees.' 2002 (3) SA 250 (LAC) at paras 25, 27–28. The court reached this conclusion based on testimony that suggested that 'the demonstrators had . . . breached just about every condition of the 'picketing' agreement with the Cape Town City Council. They did not picket in the street in which they had permission to do so; they were many more than the 46 demonstrators for whom permission had been requested; they did not remain on the pedestrian walkways; they did not stand five metres apart (in fact, they did not stand still at all, but surged from one gate of the factory to another).' Ibid at para 21. It is impossible to gainsay the court's conclusions on the merits. But a reasonable scepticism — born of experience — must attach to measuring the 'lawfulness' of a demonstration in terms of its compliance with conditions established by a responsible local authority. The primary interest of the local authority will always be order. The facilitation of a potentially destructive demonstration courts entropy — and no officer of the peace has an interest in that.

would have been placed within FC s 23. However, for reasons that remain unclear, the right to picket wound up in FC s 17.[1]

One obvious explanation for the placement is that the drafters wanted the right to picket extended beyond the sphere of employer-employee relations. FC s 17 invites us to move from the particular — picketing in labour disputes — to the general — picketing as a form of social protest directed by one private party against another.[2] The private character of this form of social protect also suggests why both the state and the courts will tolerate primary picketing but not sanction secondary picketing.[3]

(v) Petitions

FC s 17 protects the right to petition.[4] As Du Plessis and Corder note:

> While some might regard the right to petition as somewhat archaic, its importance historically as a means of registering grievances seems to have diminished little in present circumstances.[5]

Many of our fellow citizens lack access to the capital necessary to exploit electronic forms of communication, to employ lobbyists or to make campaign contributions that will secure an audience with the right government official. Petitions remain the most cost-effective means for tabling their concerns.

Of course, neither Parliament nor a provincial legislature nor a municipal council can be expected to respond in detail to each and every petition. The administrative burden would be too great. However, for the right to retain any purchase, government ought to acknowledge receipt of the petition and offer a

[1] In their motivation for including the right to picket in FC s 17, Theme Committee Four wrote: 'Picketing in labour disputes is not dealt with in s 27 of the Interim Constitution. If it were not included in a new section dealing with labour relations, it would be covered by the horizontal application of the proposed right which is a non-contentious issue.' Theme Committee Four 'Schematic Report on Freedom of Assembly, Demonstration and Petition' (9 October 1995). What the Theme Committee probably meant to say was that if the right to picket were not included in the labour rights provision of the Final Constitution, FC s 17's right to picket would afford constitutional protection to workers in private disputes with their employers. FC s 17 would provide such protection because — according to the theme committee members — the right to picket will be understood to apply horizontally.

[2] Unlike the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution does apply to some private disputes governed by common law. See Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC); S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. However, the Bill of Rights' provisions are not infinitely elastic and the Bill will not apply directly to all private disputes that might notionally fall within the ambit of a right. For some general background on the subject of pickets, see JR Midgley 'Boycotts and Similar Action: A Comparison of German and South African Law' (2002) 119 SALJ 352; AA Landman 'The New Right to Picket' (1999) 6 Contemporary Labour Law 41.

[3] See Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v Dolphin Delivery Limited (1986) 33 DLR (4th) 174, [1986] 2 SCR 573 (Since Charter found not to engage private conduct governed by common law, secondary picketing not protected by Charter.)

[4] FC ss 56 and 105 oblige the National Assembly and each provincial legislature, respectively, 'to receive petitions, representations or submissions from any interested persons or institutions.'

[5] H Corder & L Du Plessis Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 160. See D Davis 'Assembly' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law (2002) 239, 242 (Identifies petitions as a distinctly South African form of political participation.)

considered, if abbreviated, response.[1]

(b) Limitations on the right

Once the applicant can demonstrate that a gathering is entitled to the protection of FC s 17 and that some rule of law impairs the exercise of the right, the analysis shifts to FC s 36. This section breaks the justificatory analysis down into categories that engage particular constellations of public order, private property and expressive interests.

(i) Private property

Assemblies on private property ought to be the easiest for the government to regulate. In such circumstances, privacy and property interests compete on a rather equal constitutional footing with assembly and other expressive rights. For example, a local ordinance may legitimately require a private homeowner's consent before commercial solicitation is permitted.[2]

Shopping centres — or malls — with their open spaces, mock boulevards and strolling crowds challenge this public-private divide. In Amalgamated Food Employers v Logan Valley, the US Supreme Court held that given the 'public' nature and function of shopping malls, such malls were subject to the same First Amendment standards as any downtown business block.[3] As a result, the Logan Valley

[1] The restrictive approach to 'petition' in the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature Rules — 141 and 148(2)(f) — permits submission of a petition only when all other legal avenues for relief have been exhausted by a petitioner and thus looks to be constitutionally infirm. The Gauteng Petitions Act is substantially more generous. Act 14 of 1998. It defines 'petitioner' as a natural or juristic person acting: (a) on his or her or its interests; or (b) in the interest of another person who is not in position to seek relief in his or her or its own name; or (c) as a member of or in the interest of a group or class of persons; or (d) acting in the public interests. The Act also provides for a Public Participation and Petitions Committee to deal with petitions and a Public Participation Office to enable under-resourced communities to participate in the legislative proces. Gauteng Petitions Act s 8. Tthe German Federal Constitutional Court has held that 'the right to petition . . . implies a corresponding obligation of the state to accept the petition, to consider it, and to inform the petitioner of its decision — but (in order to avoid undue burdens) not to give reasons.' D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 174 citing 2 BVerfGE 225, 230 (1953).

[2] See Breard v City of Alexandria 341 US 622 (1951); Wisconsin Action Coalition v City of Kenosha 767 F 2d 1248, 1258 (7th Cir 1985)(Court holds that municipality may lawfully act to protect the peaceful enjoyment of local homes by its citizens.) However, while the US Supreme Court has let stand ordinances which bar picketing or demonstration in front of private residences, it has taken a very different tact with respect to prohibitions on non-commercial forms of communication by groups who lack other, adequate means of expression. See, eg, Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, Inc v Village of Stratton 536 US 150 (2002)(After noting that for over 50 years unduly burdensome restrictions on door-to-door canvassing and pamphleteering have been deemed unconstitutional, Supreme Court concludes that with respect to groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses, who lack significant financial resources, the ability to communicate effectively and meaningfully requires the kind of personal contact at issue and that such contact is protected by the freedom of assembly. No other form of communication would be adequate to the task); Heffron International Society for Krishna Consciousness 452 US 640 (1981)(Solicitation is protected form of expressive conduct.) See also Ohio Citizen Action v City of Seven Hills 35 F Supp 2d 575 (ND Ohio 1999)(Court invalidated local ordinance imposing a 5:00 pm curfew on canvassing); National People's Action v Village of Wilmette 914 F 2d 1008, 1012 (7th Cir 1990)(Court holds time restrictions on canvassing — limiting them to particular hours — are constitutionally infirm because '[e]ven a temporary deprivation of a First Amendment [freedom] is generally sufficient to prove irreparable harm.')

[3] 391 US 308 (1968). The Logan Valley Court was effectively applying and extending the 'public function' doctrine developed in Marsh v Alabama. 326 US 501 (1946). The Marsh court, however, was concerned with expanding the judiciary's understanding of the state action doctrine in order to protect speech, not assembly.

Court found that picketing, within a mall, of a store charged with unfair labour practices fell within the protection of the First Amendment. Four years later the US Supreme Court severely curbed the application of the 'public function' doctrine to commercial property. In Lloyd v Tanner, the Court found that the handing out of anti-war leaflets in a shopping mall did not warrant constitutional protection.[1] Whereas the Logan Valley labour protest had targeted a specific store, the Lloyd Court felt that the aims of a more general protest could just as easily have been accomplished in an alternative public location such as the street in front of the mall.[2]

In South Africa, the privatisation of public space — and our shopping malls are good examples of such privatisation — suggests that our courts ought not to allow property rights to trump automatically assembly rights.[3] Malls offer only the illusion of privacy. Where a protest is directed at a particular vendor, and not a state actor, the protest must take place within reasonable proximity of the place of business in order for the protest to have any purchase. The Labour Relations Act ('LRA'), for example, recognizes the right of trade unions and their members — in support of a strike — to picket in and about the private property of an employer. LRA s 69 reads, in relevant part:

> (2) Despite any law regulating the right of assembly, a picket authorised in terms of subsection (1), may be held- (a) in any place to which the public has access but outside the premises of an employer; or (b) with the permission of the employer, inside the employer's premises … (3) The permission referred to in subsection (2) (b) may not be unreasonably withheld.[4]

Note that the LRA does not limit such pickets to public property. Members of trade unions may picket 'in any place to which the public has access.' This

[1] 407 US 551 (1972).

[2] See also Hudgens v NLRB 424 US 507 (1976)(Striking labourers do not have First Amendment right to picket in front of store in mall.) But see Pruneyard Shopping Center v Robins 447 US 74 (1979)(US state constitutions may grant more expansive protections to speech and assembly than the US Constitution, and thus permit and protect political solicitation in a private shopping centre, as long as the restrictions on the use of the private property do not amount to a taking of property without compensation or contravene some other federal constitutional provision); JC Harrington 'Free Speech, Press and Assembly Liberties under the Texas Bill of Rights' (1990) 68 Texas LR 1435.

[3] The Constitutional Court has expanded the notion of what constitutes a 'public purpose' with respect to it analysis of deprivations and expropriations of property under FC s 25. See First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB') at para 50 (Constitutional Court holds that overriding purpose of the constitutional property clause is to strike 'a proportionate balance' between existing property rights and the promotion of the public interest.) See also T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46. Extending the definition of 'public purpose' under FC s 25 to matters that fall within the purview of FC s 17 is, admittedly, a stretch.

[4] Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995. LRA s 69 reads: '(1) A registered trade union may authorise a picket by its members and supporters for the purposes of peacefully demonstrating- (a) in support of any protected strike; or (b) in opposition to any lock-out. (2) Despite any law regulating the right of assembly, a picket authorised in terms of subsection (1), may be held- (a) in any place to which the public has access but outside the premises of an employer; or (b) with the permission of the employer, inside the employer's premises. [Sub-s. (2) amended by s. 20 of Act 42 of 1996.] (3) The permission referred to in subsection (2) (b) may not be unreasonably withheld.'

language clearly embraces such 'private' venues as shopping malls. The right to picket on private property is further reinforced by the language of the next two subsections: namely, that employers may not unreasonably withhold permission to picket within their business premises. To the extent that provision for non-labour related protests is not made manifest in other pieces of legislation, our courts are well placed to craft rules that permit such protests to take place at the same time as they secure the rights of a business to carry out its commercial activity with limited interference. Businesses are not entitled to monopolize the use of places that function as 'public' spaces.[1] The LRA provides initial, if not ample, support for this thesis.

(ii) Security and order

Where assemblies and demonstrations pose an imminent and a direct threat to public security, the government is well within its rights to ban them.[2] The catch, of course, is not to allow the mere assertion that such a threat exists to censor unpopular or unconventional views.[3] The relative ease with which government's claim to be under siege explains why courts — from Zimbabwe to the US to Germany — take a dim view of banning.[4] They generally require the state to demonstrate that no other means of dealing with a threat to public order — say, relocation to another venue — is available.[5]

[1] The horizontal application of the right to picket reinforces the conclusion that FC s 17 does engage private disputes on private property. See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. The doctrines of 'public purpose' and 'public function' also appear in FC s 238 'organ of state' analysis.

[2] See RGA s 5(1). See also Article 15.1 VersammlG.

[3] See Cisse v France [2002] ECHR 400 at para 52 (ECHR recognizes that public order concerns alone do not justify state intervention with respect to a peaceful sit-in by undocumented persons who sought and received sanctuary within a church. However, the Court concluded that after two-months the applicants had made their point — literally and symbolically — and that the deterioration of sanitary conditions gave the state sufficient reason to bring the demonstration to a halt.)

[4] See In Re Munhumeso & Others 1995 (1) SA 551 (ZS), 1995 (2) BCLR 130 (ZS), 1994 (1) ZLR 49 (SC)('Munhumeso'). Section 6(2) of Law and Order (Maintenance) Act makes official conduct the measure of the constitutional right, and not the constitutional right the measure of official conduct — thus reversing the accepted hierarchy of legal authority in a constitutional order: 'Its effect is to deny such rights unless a certain condition is satisfied, namely that the public procession it is sought to form is unlikely to cause or lead to a breach of the peace or public disorder. If there is the slightest possibility of it doing so, permission is refused.' The default position for assembly analysis under the Law and Order Act was banning. Only proof that a march would, in fact, be peaceable could overcome that presumption. Such a showing is logically impossible to make. The Zimbabwe Supreme Court held s 6(2) to be an unjustifiable infringement of the right to assemble.

[5] US courts recognize the state's substantial interest in safeguarding its citizens against violence. See Hill v Colorado 530 US 703, 715 (2000). The substantial interest in public safety does not end the inquiry. The state must provide 'tangible evidence' that speech-restrictive regulations are 'necessary' to advance the proffered interest in public safety. See Bay Area Peace Navy v United States 914 F 2d 1224, 1227 (9th Cir 1990). Generalizations about groups or kinds of groups are insufficient. See City of Chicago v Mosley 408 US 92, 100–1 (1972)('Predictions about imminent disruption from picketing involve judgments appropriately made on an individualized basis, not by means of broad classifications.') See also Project 80's Inc. v City of Pocatello 942 F2d 635, 638 (9th Cir 1991)(Court rejects city's proffered interest in public safety after finding 'little evidence' in the record that the ordinances banning door- to-door solicitation actually protected citizens from crime); Hodgkins v Goldsmith 2000 WL 892964 (SD Indiana 2000)(Court finds

(iii) Content neutrality

At various points in this discussion, I have alluded to the fact that assembly jurisprudence is primarily concerned with conduct. This emphasis on form, however, should not be understood to mean that assembly concerns do not engage matters of substance.

Where government restrictions on assembly go to the point of view, or the political ends, of the participants, courts ought to be loath to accept any restrictions, let alone prohibitions.[1] For starters, the only acceptable content-specific restrictions on assemblies held in public streets and parks ought to be on forms of expression left unprotected by FC s 16(2).[2] However, content-based restrictions on assembly may also pass constitutional muster (a) where the purpose of the public space is inconsistent with the subject matter of the speech[3] or unconstitutional a curfew restricting minors' rights to assemble in public streets, parks and other traditional public fora because the state produced no evidence demonstrating link between security concerns (read crime) and the behaviour of minors.)

German courts take a very similar line. See Brokdorf (supra) at 352. See also Woolman & De Waal (supra) at 329 citing BVerw (1982) NJW 1008, 1009 (Federal Administrative Court held that banning is not permitted where resort may be had to measures that will avert the alleged danger. Where participants carried banners with inscriptions that insulted members of the Chilean government, and in so doing committed a criminal offence, the court held that the confiscation of banners was the appropriate and proportional response. The court also noted, as a general matter, that where the objective of the assemblers is to obstruct the flow of traffic the assembly is not protected. Where, however, the hindrance of traffic is an unavoidable and an incidental effect of the exercise of the freedom to assemble, then it must be tolerated.)

[1] See Ward v Rock Against Racism 491 US 781, 791 (1989)('The principal inquiry in determining content neutrality, in speech cases generally and in time, place, or manner cases in particular, is whether the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of disagreement with the message it conveys'); Clark v Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 US 288, 293 (1984)(An ordinance is content-neutral if it can be 'justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech'); Deboer v Village of Oak Park 267 F 3d 558 (7th Cir 2001)(Court declared village ordinance unconstitutional because it created the conditions for viewpoint discrimination by vesting in village clerk unbridled discretion to decide whether an assembly in village hall would benefit the public as a whole or some sectarian (read religious), interest.) See also Stankov (supra) at para 86 (Article 11 of the ECHR does not permit state prohibit or restrict 'an assembly or an association . . . [solely because of] the views held or statements made by participants or members.') So while the RGA, for example, is content-neutral with respect to the kinds of political demonstrations and gatherings it governs, the State's application of the RGA suggests that it engages in view-point based discrimination. Marches and protests organized by COSATU are generally permitted and even facilitated. The official response to groups on the margin, such as the APF or the LPM, is often desultory compliance with notice requirements and a pro forma letter of prohibition.

[2] See Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)(Court explains relationship between protected speech under FC s 16(1) and unprotected speech under FC s 16(2) in order to demonstrate how legislation — Clause 2*(a)* of the Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services (Schedule 1 to Independent Broadcasting Authority Act 153 of 1993) — that presumes to restrict unprotected speech, in fact, trenches on protected speech.) For more on content neutrality and content-based restrictions on speech, see D Milo & A Stein 'Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 42; G Marcus & D Spitz 'Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 20.

[3] McCook v Springer School District 44 Fed Appx 896, 168 Ed Law Rep 710, 2002 WL 1788529 (10th Cir 2002)(Right to assemble and to associate does not entitle parent to have access to school property without limitation.)

(b) where the subject matter of the speech — or the mere fact of political speech — is inconsistent with employment in the public service.[1]

The Constitutional Court in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence provides a coherent account of the relationship between the general commitment to content-neutrality and the appropriate conditions under which the content of speech by public servants may be restricted.[2] The SANDU Court states that the purpose of the mutually supporting expressive rights found in Chapter 2 — FC ss 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 — is to enable:

> groups of like-minded people to foster and propagate such opinions. The rights implicitly recognise the importance, both for a democratic society and for individuals personally, of the ability to form and express opinions, whether individually or collectively, even where those views are controversial. The corollary of the freedom of expression and its related rights is tolerance by society of different views. Tolerance, of course, does not require approbation of a particular view. In essence, it requires the acceptance of the public airing of disagreements and the refusal to silence unpopular views.[3]

Public servants, especially those in the security services, have obligations and duties that may legitimately restrict their expressive conduct. FC s 199(7) states that:

> Neither the security services, nor any of their members, may, in the performance of their functions — (a) prejudice a political party interest that is legitimate in terms of the Constitution; or (b) further, in a partisan manner, any interest of a political party.[4]

[1] See Bethel School District v Fraser 478 US 675 (1986)(Since public-schools are not public forums, schools can control the content of assemblies or gatherings for legitimate pedagogical reasons.)

[2] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU').

[3] Ibid at para 8.

[4] For a recent case that engages directly the limits of expressive conduct by members of the security services, see Van Dyk v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuritait Case No 4268/2002 (TPD 29 April 2003, Du Plessis J)('Van Dyk'). The High Court held that a police officer was legitimately terminated from his employment because he stood for election as a member of the Democratic Alliance. For a more detailed discussion of this case and limits of political expression by members of the security services, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.3*(c)*(vii). The officer argued that because his position in the police force — that of a budget analyst — did not require him to engage the public directly, the officer's candidacy could not prejudice the administration of justice or give the appearance of impropriety. The High Court found that the purpose of the South African Police Service Act was to eliminate any perception on the part of the public that the administration and the enforcement of the law advanced the fortunes of any given political party. Act 68 of 1995, s 46. The elimination of the perception of bias in the police force in order to instil greater public confidence in government justified the limitation of the rights of the particular officer in question. Van Dyk (supra) at 10 ('The need for a police force that is seen to be impartial speaks for itself.') See Ahmed v United Kingdom [1998] ECHR 76 at paras 52–53 (ECHR concludes that state is entitled to restrict the partisan political activities of local government officers — including the right to assemble — in order to strengthen the tradition of bureaucratic neutrality, to enhance the appearance of impartiality and to diminish potential for abuse of political power); Civil Service 39 BVerfGE 334, 349, 359 (German Constitutional Court holds that loyalty requirements for civil servants found in the Basic Law, Articles 33(4) and 33(5), permit state to exclude from public service persons 'who reject and oppose the free democratic order, the rule of law and the social state. Moreover, the rights of expression, association and assembly do not, necessarily, entitle a civil servant to be a 'member of a political party pursuing goals inimical to the Constitution.') See also D Currie (supra) at 221–224.

The SANDU Court concludes that 'members of the Defence Force may not, in the performance of their functions, act in a partisan political fashion.'[1] However, the 255 word definition of 'act of public protest' found in Defence Act, s 126B(2) read with Defence Act, s 126B(4) covered conduct ranging from 'holding or attendance of a meeting which is calculated to support or oppose any policy or conduct of the government or of a foreign government' to any indication of 'private or public support or opposition regarding any policy, conduct or principle' or any event of national or public concern.'[2] The long but still non-exhaustive definition of public protest could capture complaints made by a defence force member to her husband in relation to absolutely any 'event of national or public concern.' Such a complaint could never be accurately described as public protest or partisan political conduct. As a result, the Constitutional Court held that the Defence Act's gloss on the term 'public protest' in s 126B(2) and the extension of its definition of 'act of public protest' in s 126B(4) were unconstitutional. It then severed both subsections from the Defence Act.[3]

(iv) Time, place and manner restrictions

For the most part government restrictions on assembly will appear neutral with respect to the content of the expression. Facially content-neutral regulations may still impair the right to assemble in a variety of ways.

Foreign and international assembly jurisprudence make it clear that citizens ought to have 'guaranteed access' to public streets and parks.[4] A universal or [1] SANDU (supra) at para 11.

[2] Act 44 of 1957.

[3] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 2004 (4) SA 10, 29 (T)(High Court finds that Regulation 8*(b)* in Chapter 20 of the General Regulations of the South African National Defence Force and Reserve — which provided that the right of members to assemble, to demonstrate, to picket and to petition was subject to the limitation that such right could not be exercised 'in respect of any matter concerning either the employment relationship with the Department of Defence or any matter related to the Department of Defence' — failed to satisfy the test for expressive conduct by members of the security services set out by the Constitutional Court in SANDU. The regulation was, therefore, an unjustifiable 'limitation of the right of assembly.')

[4] South African legislation on the subject seems rather outré. The Control of Access to Public Premises and Vehicles Act does not guarantee such access. Act 53 of 1985. Indeed, it would seem to give the state untrammeled authority to control ingress and egress. Section 2 reads, in relevant part:

> Notwithstanding any rights or obligations to the contrary and irrespective of how those rights or obligations arose or were granted or imposed, the owner of any public premises or any public vehicle may- (a) take such steps as he may consider necessary for the safeguarding of those premises or that vehicle and the contents thereof, as well as for the protection of the people therein or thereon; (b) direct that those premises or that vehicle may only be entered or entered upon in accordance with the provisions of subsection (2). (2) No person shall without the permission of an authorized officer enter or enter upon any public premises or any public vehicle in respect of which a direction has been issued under subsection (1) (b), and for the purpose of the granting of that permission an authorized officer may require of the person concerned that he — (a) furnish his name, address and any other relevant information required by the authorized officer; (b) produce proof of his identity to the satisfaction of the authorized officer; (c) declare whether he has any dangerous object in his possession or custody or under his control; (d) declare what the contents are of any vehicle, suitcase, attaché case, bag, handbag, folder, envelope, parcel or container of any nature which he has in his possession or custody or under blanket prohibition on such access — though facially neutral — would constitute an unjustifiable infringement of FC s 17.[1]

That said, the government is entitled to place time, place, and manner restrictions on assemblies in an attempt to mediate conflicting interests in safety, privacy, property and expression. US courts employ a three-part test for restrictions on assemblies in a public forum:[2] (1) the restriction must be content-neutral;[3] (2) the restriction must not burden the expressive conduct more than is absolutely necessary to further a 'significant government interest';[4] (3) any restriction must provide for 'alternative channels for communication' — that is, they must permit the assembly to take place elsewhere, or at another time, or allow the his control, and show those contents to him; (e) subject himself and anything which he has in his possession or custody or under his control to an examination by an electronic or other apparatus in order to determine the presence of any dangerous object; (f) hand to an authorized officer anything which he has in his possession or custody or under his control for examination or custody until he leaves the premises or vehicle; (g) in the case of premises or a vehicle or a class of premises or vehicles determined by the Minister by notice in the Gazette, be searched by an authorized officer.

Despite the apparant desuetude of the Act, s 2 remains constitutionally infirm.

[1] See Hague v CIO, 307 US 496, 515–16 (1939)('Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions. Such a use of the streets and public places has, from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights and liberties of citizens. The privilege to use the streets and parks for communication on national questions may be regulated in the interest of all: it must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied.')

[2] Frisby v Schultz 487 US 474, 481 (1988)(Court holds that while reasonable time, place and manner restrictions may be necessary to further significant governmental interests, an ordinance that fails to satisfy any leg of the three-part test will be declared unconstitutional.)

[3] See Chicago Police Department v Mosely 408 US 92 (1972)(Ordinance allowing labour picketing near schools, but barring other grounds for picketing, is declared invalid as a content-based restriction); Boos v Barry 485 US 312 (1988)(Law forbidding display of banners or signs critical of a foreign government within 500 feet of said government's embassy is constitutionally invalid as a content-based restriction.) See also Collin v Smith 578 F 2d 1197, 1206 (7th Cir 1978) quoting Street v New York 394 US 576, 592 (1969)(Court finds ordinances designed to prevent demonstrations by neo-Nazis unconstitutional, despite the potential 'infliction of psychic trauma on the resident Holocaust survivors', because 'public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers'); Terminiello v Chicago 337 US 1 (1949)(Words that simply make the listeners angry insufficient ground to bar speech; words must be sufficient to incite violence.)

[4] See Ward v Rock Against Racism 491 US 781 (1989)(Ordinance requiring performers appearing at city theatre to use city-owned sound equipment is a regulation narrowly tailored to effect the city's significant interest in preventing excessive noise); Clark v Community for Creative Non-Violence 468 US 288 (1984)(Significant government interests include traffic safety, sanitation, public peace and order, noise control, and personal privacy.) But see Edwards v South Carolina 372 US 229 (1963)(Supreme Court reverses convictions because protest took place in an historically recognized public forum — in front of the state legislature — and that there had been no threat of violence by the demonstrators nor evidence of the use of 'fighting words'); Brown v Louisiana 383 US 131 (1966)(Court overturns breach of peace convictions of African-American students who had peaceably assembled in a public library to protest silently against whites-only policy); National People's Action v Village of Wilmette 914 F 2d 1008, 1012 (7th Cir 1990)(Court holds time restrictions on canvassing — limiting them to particular hours — are constitutionally infirm because '[e]ven a temporary deprivation of a First Amendment [right] is generally sufficient to prove irreparable harm.') message to be conveyed in a comparable form.[1] All laws purporting to regulate the time, place and manner of assemblies are subject to two further provisos: (1) they must provide clear guidelines for the conduct being regulated;[2] (2) they cannot give a public official unfettered discretion to decide what kinds of expressive conduct are and are not permissible.[3]

The Zimbabwe Supreme Court, in In Re Munhumeso & Others, was confronted with a piece of legislation that contravened each of these five accepted standards for the regulation of assemblies and demonstrations.[4] Section 6 of the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act read, in relevant part, as follows:

> (1) A regulating authority may issue directions for the purpose of controlling the conduct of public processions within his area and the route by which and the times at which a public procession may pass.
>
> (2) Any person who wishes to form a procession shall first make application in that behalf to the regulating authority of the area in which such procession is to be formed and if such authority is satisfied that such procession is unlikely to cause or lead to a breach of the peace or public disorder, he shall, subject to the provisions of s 10, issue a permit in writing authorizing such procession and specifying the name of the person to whom it is issued and

[1] See Edwards v City of Coeur d'Alene (9th Cir 2001) 262 F 3d 856, 867 (Court declared unconstitutional an ordinance banning the attachment of 'any wooden, plastic or other type of support' to signs carried during parades and public assemblies on city streets because they could, according to the ordinance, be used as weapons. Court rejected the city's contention that the ability to 'hand out, leaflets, carry signs (without supports and made of non-rigid materials), sing, shout, chant, perform dramatic presentations, solicit signatures for petitions and appeal to passersby' constituted adequate alternatives); Metromedia, Inc v San Diego 453 US 490 (1981)(Ban on all billboards eliminated a well-established means of communication used to convey a broad range of different kinds of messages, and a means of communication for which there was no surrogate.)

[2] See Lakewood v Plain Dealer Publishing Co 486 US 750, 758–59 (1988)(Court finds that standardless discretion on the part of government officials is dangerous for two reasons: (1) affected parties will censor their own speech to avoid potential, if uncertain, punishment; (2) absence of criteria for exercise of official discretion makes it impossible for the court to review meaningfully the official's decision. Moreover, standardless discretion increases the likelihood that a government official will be able to discriminate against demonstrators 'by suppressing disfavored speech or disliked speakers.')

[3] See Cox v Louisiana 379 US 536, 554, 557 (1965)(US Supreme Court holds that 'the rights of free speech and assembly, while fundamental in our democratic society, still do not mean that everyone with opinions or beliefs may address a group at any public place and at any time. The constitutional guarantee of liberty implies the existence of an organized society maintaining public order, without which liberty itself would be lost in the excesses of anarchy . . . [However,] it is clearly unconstitutional to enable a public official to determine which expressions of view will be permitted and which will not or to engage in invidious discrimination among persons or groups either by the use of a statute providing a system of broad discretionary licensing power or, as in this case, the equivalent of such a system by selective enforcement of an extremely broad prohibitory statute.') See also Gregory v Chicago 394 US 111 (1969)(Convictions for disorderly conduct of a group of peaceful demonstrators pressing for school desegregation overturned because statute gave the police almost unlimited discretion to decide what constituted a 'diversion tending to a breach of the peace'); Shuttlesworth v Birmingham 394 US 147, 149 (1969)(US Supreme Court invalidates ordinance for lack of specificity — permits could be refused on such vague grounds as 'public welfare, safety, health, decency and public morals' — and for granting city commission unbridled power to prohibit assemblies); Khademi v South Orange County Community College District 194 F Supp 2d 1011 (CD California 1999)(Court held that requiring prior approval of president to hold of meetings in specified areas unconstitutional due to absolute discretion given to president to allow or disallow meetings.)

[4] 1995 (1) SA 551 (ZS), 1995 (2) BCLR 130 (ZS), 1994 (1) ZLR 49 (SC).

such conditions attaching to the holding of such procession as the regulating authority may deem necessary to impose for the preservation of public order.

(3) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-s (2), the conditions which may be imposed under the provisions of that subsection may relate to — (a) the date upon which and the place and time at which the procession is authorised to take place; (b) the maximum duration of the procession; and to any other matter designed to preserve public order.

The Supreme Court distils from this language three elemental infirmities. First, the Act does not assume that the public may, as a matter right, demonstrate or assemble in public streets and parks. The Act instead 'imposes a prohibition on the right to take part in a public procession unless permission is first applied for and obtained from a regulating authority.'[1] In short, the Act makes an absolute ban on 'public processions' in 'public places' the departure point for assembly analysis.[2] Second, the regulating authority may issue a banning order on just about any grounds whatsoever: 'the discretionary power of [the] regulating authority is uncontrolled.'[3] The absence of any criteria to be used by the regulating authorities in the exercise of their discretion turns the Act into an 'instrument for the arbitrary suppression of the free expression of views.'[4] Third, the Act makes no effort to burden the expressive conduct only as much as is absolutely necessary to further a significant government interest: 'the regulating authority is not obliged to take into account whether the likelihood of a breach of the peace or public disorder could be averted by attaching conditions upon the conduct of the procession in the issuance of a permit relating, for instance, to time, duration and route … rather than an outright ban.'[5] The Munhumeso Court concludes that while 'the power to control … a public procession [in a public place may be] necessary in the interests of public safety or public order', such power had to be exercised in a manner far 'less restrictive and authoritarian' than provided for in the Act.[6]

Government may legitimately claim greater latitude with respect to the restrictions imposed on public or state-owned venues not normally associated with, or conducive to, assemblies or demonstrations.[7] However, South African courts

[1] See Munhumeso (supra) at 561 (Emphasis added).

[2] Ibid at 563 ('Although the rights to freedom of expression and assembly are primary and the limitations thereon secondary, s 6(2) of Chap 65 reverses the order.')

[3] Ibid at 562.

[4] Ibid at 562.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 563. See Maestri v Italy [2004] ECHR 76 (Unfettered discretion granted authorities to prohibit Freemasons from associating or assembling violates Article 11); Djavit An v Turkey (supra) at paras 64–69 (Exercise of administrative authority — without reference to any law or regulation — that prevents Turkish Cypriot from meeting with Greek Cypriots violates Article 11 because it is not an exercise of power prescribed by law.)

[7] For example, while the Constitutional Court accepts the proposition that many forms of political protest by members of the security services are constitutionally protected, it is likely to view partisan political protests by members of the security services on a military base as justifiably restricted by the provisions of the Defence Act. See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC). See also Adderly v Florida 385 US 39, 41 (1966)(US Supreme Court held that demonstrators, should take care not to base assembly doctrines primarily on place. Too great an emphasis on the nature of the forum — public, non-public, private — tends to result in 'tests' that are both over-inclusive and under-inclusive with respect to the vindication of assembly interests.[1]

How then might a court best approach time, place and manner restrictions on assemblies so as to avoid definitional traps? It might begin by asking whether the however peaceful, did not have the right to gather on jail grounds: 'Traditionally, state capitol grounds are open to the public. Jails, built for security purposes, are not.' The Court noted, however, that had the sheriff ordered the crowd's dispersal based upon the content of the speech, the order would not have been content-neutral and would have been a violation of the right to free speech); Greer v Spock 424 US 828, 838 (1976)(Court upheld two regulations barring political activities on a military base. The Court wrote that the purpose of a military base is 'to train soldiers, not to provide a public forum . . . The notion that federal military reservations, like municipal streets and parks, have traditionally served as a place for free public assembly and communication of thoughts by private citizens is historically and constitutionally false.') But see United States v Grace 461 US 171 (1983)(Petitioners challenged a statutory provision that barred display of organizational banners on Supreme Court grounds and sidewalks. The Court did not address the constitutionality of the actual statutory provision, but only its effect on the right of the petitioners and public to use the surrounding sidewalk to carry out their expressive activities. The Court held that public property that abuts government property does not lose its character as 'public forum property.')

The preoccupation with place in US assembly jurisprudence distorts the courts' treatment of content based restrictions. Speech in non-public forums need only be 'viewpoint-neutral'. See Widmar v Vincent 454 US 263 (1981)(Court holds that since state college allows various student groups to use classrooms for meetings, it cannot restrict use based on the view-point of a group's speech, and therefore cannot prohibit religious groups from using the classroom.) The doctrine of view-point neutrality operates as a surrogate for the two-fold proposition that not all state-owned spaces are equally appropriate for assemblies, and that the primary purpose of a state-owned property may justify a significant narrowing of both the conditions under which an assembly may take place and subject matter engaged at an assembly. See Bethel School District v Fraser 478 US 675 (1986)(Since public-schools are not public forums, schools can control the content of assemblies or gatherings for legitimate pedagogical reasons); Courtemanche v General Services Administration 172 F Supp 2d 251(DMass 2001)(Court upholds denial of organization's permit application because demonstration would both interfere with primary purpose of the federal building and compromise the security of other members of the public.)

[1] The 'geographical' analysis reflected in public forum and non-public forum doctrines diverts attention from the real interests at stake: the value of the expressive activity and the countervailing interests in privacy, property or public order. Two cases reflect this subordination of substance to form. In Brown v Louisiana, the court employed the public forum test in finding unconstitutional the breach of peace convictions of African-American students who had engaged in peaceful silent protest within a public (whites-only) library. 383 US 131 (1966). In Adderly v Florida, on the other hand, the court employed the non-public forum doctrine and held that protesting African-American students did not have the right to gather on a jail driveway. 385 US 39 (1966). It is hard to understand why the inside of a library — a place for quiet contemplation — is declared a public forum and thus a potentially appropriate venue for public protest, while a government driveway fronting a jail is a non-public forum and a more easily restricted venue. Given the nature of the two locations, one might be forgiven for thinking that the assignations 'public' and 'non-public' should have been reversed. These two cases suggest that '[c]lassifying a medium of communication as a public forum' will weight the analysis heavily in favour of the speaker and 'may cause legitimate governmental interests to be thoughtlessly brushed aside.' See DA Farber & JE Nowak 'The Misleading Nature of Public Forum Analysis: Content and Context in First Amendment Analysis' (1984) 70 Virginia LR 1219, 1224. Conversely, identification of a venue as a non-public forum may tilt the analysis too heavily in favour of the government's interest in the protection of property and public order and often leads 'courts to ignore the incompatibility of challenged regulations' with' constitutional commitments to an open and democratic society. Ibid.

public is ordinarily admitted to the property in question as a matter of right. A negative response tilts the analysis in favour of the governmental or private interest asserted. An affirmative answer prompts a further enquiry as to whether the property in question is traditionally open to expressive activity. If this follow-up question is answered in the affirmative, then the assembly interests are to be privileged. It may be, however, that the place in question is open to the public, but is not normally associated with expressive activity. Since not all publicly accessible places are easily transformed into assembly or demonstration grounds, the next question might assess the compatibility of the property's purpose with such expressive activity. If the property is government-owned, the court might ask to what extent the restriction on gatherings simply ensures that the property can be effectively used by the government and other members of the public for its intended purpose, and to what extent the restriction effectively suppresses expression.[1] This functional approach suggests that FC s 17 ought to afford protection to demonstrations on privately owned property. Not only does the Final Constitution contemplate the extension of the guarantees in the Bill of Rights to relationships between private parties, the privatisation of public space in South Africa demands that courts interrogate both the extent to which a piece of private property serves a public function and the extent to which the expressive conduct in question actually impairs the property rights and the privacy rights of the owner.[2]

Authorities often attempt to relocate assemblies and demonstrations to 'more suitable' venues, at 'more suitable' times. With respect to restrictions on place, a court might first ask whether, in fact, other forums in the vicinity are available for expressive activities. If such alternative forums are not available, then one might ask more generally whether adequate alternative media, forms or manner of expression can be meaningfully exploited by the demonstrators.[3] Of course, it must be remembered that sites for demonstrations are often selected because of the nexus between the place and the issue. Alternative sites or forms of expression may diminish significantly the impact of the protest.[4] The court must, therefore, inquire into the symbolic significance of the property for the message being

[1] For further discussion of time, place and manner restrictions on assembly in the United States, see WE Lee 'Lonely Pamphleteers, Little People and the Supreme Court: Time, Place and Manner Regulations of Expression' (1986) 54 Geo Wash LR 757.

[2] See Marsh v Alabama 326 US 501 (1946)(Company town — though privately owned — possesses all the indicia of municipality and thus is subject to constitutional norms.) See § 43.3*(b)*(i) supra (Discussion of the relationship between private property and its public function.)

[3] It is all well and good to speak of alternative media, but that media must be a real alternative. Most alternative forms of mass communication are prohibitively expensive. See, eg, Metromedia, Inc v San Diego 453 US 490 (1981)(Ban on all billboards eliminated a cost-effective formal communication for which there was no meaningful alternative.)

[4] US Courts have made it quite clear that not all alternatives are equal and that the alternative must be capable of reaching the same audience as the prohibited medium. See Edwards v City of Coeur d'Alene (supra) at 867. In Edwards, the Seventh Circuit declared unconstitutional an ordinance banning certain kinds of signs carried during parades and public assemblies and rejected the city's contention that the ability to 'hand out, leaflets, carry signs (without supports and made of non-rigid materials), sing, shout, chant, perform dramatic presentations, solicit signatures for petitions and appeal to passersby' constituted adequate alternatives. It wrote:

conveyed as well as the medium being used to convey that message.[1] The more closely related the property is to the message, the greater the weight to be given to the expressive interests sought to be exercised there. It must also be remembered that many South Africans will not, in fact, have access to other 'adequate' forms of communication. The means of the demonstrators are just as important as the means of demonstration.

Similar considerations attach to time. The inconvenience a demonstration may cause to others during rush hour traffic is a legitimate concern. Assemblies cannot be used to coerce others into listening by obstructing their passage. However, assemblies are, at bottom, meant to convey the political position of one set of citizens to their fellow citizens and to those who govern. This conversation requires the presence of believer and non-believer alike. The selection of time is, therefore, a relevant consideration in the planning of an assembly or a demonstration. The right of the public to use the streets — married to the functional significance of time — demands that authorities compromise with conveners on the place and the time at which a demonstration takes place.

Various provisions of the Regulation of Gatherings Act ('RGA') have already had their constitutionality appraised in this chapter.[2] However, the questions set out in the previous two paragraphs throw into somewhat sharper relief several of the RGA's many fault-lines. Neither the 7-day notice provision nor the 48-hour notice provision privilege assembly rights in public streets. Like Zimbabwe's Law and Order (Maintenance) Act, the RGA generally allows regulating authorities to prohibit a gathering unless permission is first applied for and obtained. While regulating authorities may be required to act in 'good faith' and to limit banning orders to a relatively identifiable set of circumstances under the 7-day notice period, the forty-eight hour notice provision grants the authorities almost unfettered discretion to ban an assembly:

> if . . . notice is given less than 48 hours before the commencement of the gathering, the responsible officer may by notice to the convener prohibit the gathering.[3]

As a general rule, parades and public assemblies involve large crowds and significant noise. While some of these mass gatherings are less populated and more orderly than others, it is often difficult to see more than a few feet in any direction, or to hear anyone who isn't standing nearby. These circumstances make it difficult for individual protestors or participants to convey their messages to the broad audience they seek to attract. . . .[Only] signs attached to supports such as poles or sticks are effective tools by which to overcome the communication problems endemic to these types of situations. A sign that can be hoisted high in the air projects a message above the heads of the crowd to reach spectators, passersby, and television cameras stationed a good distance away.

[1] See Adderly v Florida 385 US 39, 49 (1966)("The jailhouse . . . is one of the seats of government, whether it be the Tower of London, the Bastille or a small county jail. And when it houses political prisoners or those who many think are unjustly held, it is an obvious centre for protest.")

[2] For a section by section analysis of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993, see § 43.2*(b)* supra.

[3] RGA s 3(2). Prior to the enactment of the RGA in 1996, several courts found unconstitutional the exercise by the authorities of relatively unfettered powers to prohibit public assemblies. See, eg, ANC (Border Branch) v Chairman, Council of State, Ciskei 1992 (4) SA 434 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 145, 165 (Ck)(Unfettered powers of prohibition of public assemblies given to magistrates and police found to be unjustifiable restriction of freedom of assembly.)

Local authorities have also discovered that the RGA can be manipulated in such a manner as to thwart the best intentions of a convener who, in fact, complies with the 7-day notice period.[1] Because conveners rarely have the opportunity to plan a demonstration more than a week in advance, and because the notice period for urgent applications that do not meet the requirements for expedited review is 10 days, local authorities have been able to issue banning orders without having to concern themselves with the possibility that a court of law might reverse their decisions. More importantly, the reflexive use of banning orders by local authorities hardly comports with the dictates of FC s 17. FC s 17 demands that local authorities be willing to engage in nuanced assessments of the symbolic significance of the property for the message being conveyed, the relationship of the time of a gathering to the ability to convey a political position, and the extent to which the expressive conduct in question impairs the property rights and the privacy rights of others.[2]

[1] See § 43.2*(b)* supra (For an account of how local authorities have learned to exploit the judicial review provisions of the RGA and the manner in which these provisions interact with the Magistrates' Court Rules and the Uniform Rules of Court. In short, the local authorities understand that neither Magistrates Courts nor the High Courts are apt to act on urgent applications prior to the date of the planned assembly.)

[2] See § 43.2*(b)* supra (Explanation of how local authorities violate, with impunity, the 24-hour response requirements of RGA s 4(3), the good faith requirements of RGA s 4(2)(b), the objective conditions for prohibition requirement of RGA, s 4(4)(b) and RGA s 5(1)'s insistence that a prohibition be based upon 'credible information on oath . . . brought to the attention of a responsible officer.') The authorities are keenly aware of the significance of time. Only a picket at rush hour allows demonstrators to communicate with their fellow citizens. Because a picket or a demonstration at another time often has no audience and serves no purpose, local authorities regularly ban peaceful protests during rush hour. See Founding Affidavit, Segodi, Miya and Thembelihle Crisis Committee v City Of Johannesburg & Minister of Safety and Security (High Court, Witwatersrand Local Division, 26 November 2005)(Document on file with author).

44 Freedom of Association

Stuart Woolman

44.1 Introduction to association 44-1
(a) Associations as correlative 44-6
(b) Associations as constitutive 44-9
(i) Associations as constitutive of the self 44-9
(ii) Associations as constitutive of social life 44-12
(c) Associations and capture 44-14
(i) Entrance 44-17
(ii) Voice 44-19
(iii) Exit 44-21
(iv) Social capital, fragility, switching costs and transaction costs 44-23
(v) Permeability, flexibility, contestability and the problem of shifting boundaries 44-25
(vi) Some problems in capture analysis 44-26
(d) Association and Dissociation 44-30
44.2 Grounds for and models of infringement 44-32
(a) Banning 44-33
(b) Equality and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA') 44-33
(c) Democracy 44-39
(d) Coercion 44-41
44.3 Association analysis 44-42
(a) The content of the right 44-42
(i) Within the ambit 44-42
(ii) Without the ambit 44-45

(b) Limitations on the right 44-47
(i) The complex character of the analysis 44-47
(ii) Grounds for limitation 44-48
(c) Analysis in context 44-49
(i) Political associations. 44-49
(ii) Intimate associations 44-53
(iii) Cultural associations 44-53
(iv) Economic associations 44-56
(v) Empowering associations 44-58
(vi) Small social associations 44-59
(vii) Security service associations 44-60
(viii) Religious associations 44-62
(ix) Voluntary associations and fair hearings 44-65
(x) Sexual associations. 44-66

44.1 Introduction To Association*

Some 170 years ago Alexis de Toqueville wrote that no one and especially 'no legislator can attack [the freedom of association] without impairing the very foundations of society'.[2] If Michael Walzer is to be believed, de Toqueville's fears of impaired foundations have been realized. Walzer asserts that 'associational life in the advanced capitalist and social democratic countries seems increasingly at risk. Publicists and preachers warn us of a steady attenuation of everyday cooperation and civic friendship . . . The Hobbesian account of society is more persuasive than it once was.'[3] If we continue to ignore the foundational nature of associations, Walzer concludes, we do so at our own peril.[4]

---

* I would like to thank Gavin Andersson, Danie Brand, Anton Kok, Anthony Stein and David Zefferttt for comments on earlier drafts of this chapter.

[2] Democracy in America (1835) 222.

[3] 'The Civil Society Argument' in Chantall Mouffe (ed) Dimensions of Radical Democracy (1992) 89, 90.

[4] Concerns about the fragility of associational life are not unique to advanced Western democracies. South Africa is fortunate to have a reasonably rich array of trade unions, civics, media, political parties, universities, legal structures, traditional communities, financial facilities and religious institutions. There is, however, a thinness about South African civil society.

This palpable thinness may be a function of a number of different historical antecedents. First, Apartheid was enormously successful in disrupting traditional ways of life, in flattening out, if not eliminating, the public space necessary for the spontaneous creation of a variety of secondary and tertiary associations and in re-inscribing invidiously exclusive communities. Second, much of the foreign money and energy that sustained the fight against Apartheid has disappeared. Third, as those once outside government have become part of government, the institutions from whence they came have lost some of their robustness. Fourth, the dominance of unbridled global market capitalism over the last decade may be responsible for the ongoing debasement of associational life.

That said, recent studies of South African civil society suggest a richness that is not readily apparent. See Mark Swilling and Bev Russell 'The Size and the Scope of the Non-Profit Sector in South Africa' in Johns Hopkins Comparative Nonprofit Sector Study (2002). In their contribution to the Johns Hopkins Study, Swilling and Russell broadened the definition of Non-Profit Organization (NPOs) to fit South Africa's transition from exclusive authoritarianism to constitutional democracy. Co-operatives, burial societies and stokvels all provide kinds of community that standard analytical markers would not have captured. The study shows that the NPO sector has a full-time equivalent (FTE) workforce of 645,316, as compared with 534,000 in mining or 436,187 in national government departments. That number places South Africa well above the average of the 28 countries surveyed. South Africa's NPO FTE workforce percentage (7.9%) compares favourably with the US (11.9%), Norway (9.1%), Germany (8.0%) and more than favourably with Japan (4.6%), Italy (3.2%), Brazil (2.5%) and Mexico (0.7%). These South African NPOs have been in existence for an average of 19 years, with religious NPOs (38 years) and health NPOs (31 years) showing remarkable staying power. Moreover, NPO management is predominantly black (73%) and female (59%).

But as Swilling, Russell and others are quick to admit, those numbers don't tell the whole story. More than 53% of South Africa's NPOs must be classified as informal, voluntary community-based organizations (CBOs). The size and capacity of such CBOs will vary. As a general rule, however, their limited size and institutional capacity place significant limits on their ability to source funding and partnerships — whether public or private — that would enable them to survive, let alone flourish. See Gavin Andersson, 'Partnerships between CBOs, NGOs and Government in South Africa' (1999) USAID Policy Paper (Manuscript on file with author). Gerhard Kraak 'The South African Voluntary Sector in 2001' (2001) 3 Development Update 44.

At least one working assumption in this chapter is that a successful social democracy must be willing to provide various kinds of support for the creation and the maintenance of primary, secondary and tertiary associations. It may have to support associations that compete with one another in both the public and the private realm. Mr Justice Dennis Davis and I have argued that state support for various associations is a necessary pre-condition in South Africa both for rational public discourse and individual

In the first edition of this book, I argued that associations were essential components of a well-ordered society because they made good the promise of a variety of other rights and freedoms. I still believe that proposition to be true. However, the general framework for my defense of associational rights has shifted markedly.

I now claim that casting associational freedom as a correlative — or even a derivative — of other constitutional rights seriously underestimates the importance for individual and group identity of the constitutive attachments rooted in our associations. Given the centrality of associations for both the creation and the maintenance of identity — and the heterogeneaity and arationality of choice in the domain of identity formation[1] — we should tread very carefully when we decide which associations merit constitutional solicitude.[2] This second set of justifications is not a function of arid, philosophical considerations. It flows from some immediate concerns raised by the jurisprudence of our courts.

This revised and enhanced appreciation for the freedom of association has led to the identification of a third strand of justifications for associational freedom: capture. Capture, unlike the correlative or the constitutive justifications for association, is unique to freedom of association. It is a function of — one might even say a necessary and logical consequence of — the very structure of associational life. In short, capture justifies the ability of associations to control their association through both exclusionary membership policies and the manner in which they order their internal affairs. Without the capacity to police their membership and their internal affairs, many associations would face such threats as hostile transformation or even extermination. Individuals, groups or even states opposed to the values of a given association could use ease of entrance, flexibility of voice or difficulty in discharge to change fundamentally the nature of an association. In a and group flourishing, see Stu Woolman and Dennis Davis 'The Last Laugh: Du Plessis v De Klerk, Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights under the Interim and Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361. See also Stu Woolman and Li Yu, 'The Selfless Constitution: Arationality and Agency in Identity Formation, Social Change and Constitutional Theory' (Forthcoming 2004). South Africa has developed a remarkably sophisticated legal framework for engaging civil society organizations in the development of public policy. See, eg, the Nonprofit Organizations Act 71 of 1997, the Lotteries Act 57 of 1997, the National Development Agency Act 108 of 1998, the Taxation Laws Amendment Act 30 of 2000, the National Economic Development and Labour Council Act 35 of 1994 and the Local Government Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000. While these Acts favour established and institutionalized NPOs, they still create the basis for a broader participatory democracy. The challenge for South Africa is to create mechanisms that tap the 53% of NPOs that lack the institutional capacity to engage both the state and other actors in civil society.

A second working assumption of this chapter is the modern Toquevillian inclination to valorize private, formalized associations is unwarranted. There is no reason that public entities — statutory bodies or organs of state – cannot serve as meaningful settings for associational activity. Cf Law Society of the Transvaal v Tloubatla 1999 (11) BCLR 1275, [1999] 4 All SA 59 (T).

[1] The extension of the term 'arationality' is discussed below in § 44.1*(b)*.

[2] As I note below in §44.1*(b)*, constitutive attachments are not just of instrumental import and are not just important for the preservation of individual identity. The various associations that are the loci for such attachments provide the setting for all meaningful action and are a necessary pre-condition for any society, let alone a well-ordered one.

world without high transaction and switching costs for the creation of associations, this risk of penetration and alteration would be a tolerable state of affairs. We could form and unform associations as we liked.[1] However, we do not live in such a world. In our world, because the costs of creating and maintaining associations are quite high, the fragility of associations means that most associations have an intrinsic interest in controlling entrance, voice and exit.[2]

Dissociation or the right not to associate is often viewed as an inevitable component of and thus fourth justification for the right to associate. Concerns about capture reveal, in part, why this is so. However, the domain of cases engaging the issues of compelled or forced association does not fall neatly or entirely within the domain of cases engaged by capture. Dissociation therefore demands a distinct line of analysis.[3]

The foregoing grounds for protecting associations ought to suggest the fairly high degree of imprecision with which we often use the term 'association'. Associations may be formal or informal. They may be ascriptive in character or [1] With regard to our constitutive attachments, most of the associations that give our life meaning are not chosen by us nor created by us nor structured by us. See § 44*(b)* infra.

[2] For more precise definitions of entrance, voice and exit see § 44.1*(c)* infra. See also Albert Hirschman Exit, Voice and Loyalty (1970); Evelyn Brody 'Entrance, Voice and Exit: The Constitutional Bounds of Freedom of Association' (2002) 35 UC Davis LR 821.

[3] Freedom simpliciter is a fifth justification often offered for associational rights. Many people have a gut sense that they must be free to choose those persons with whom they wish to associate. To some extent, it is just plain obvious that a liberal democratic society must be committed to some level of associational choice. However, as I have already intimated above and as I will argue further below, there are significant descriptive and prescriptive constraints on associational freedom. That is, we are not as free as we would like to think with regard to the associations to which we belong, nor are we as free to structure associations however we might like, nor, finally, should we be able to simply associate with whomever we please, however we please, whenever we please. The extent of and the limits of the 'freedom' in freedom of association shall become clear as we discuss the other grounds for protecting and sometimes limiting associational rights.

A sixth, and related, justification is the public/private distinction. The notion is that freedom of association is intended to protect a sphere of individual, and often private, autonomy. This justification is so under-inclusive and over-inclusive as to lack meaningful content. Though we want our intimate associations protected, we clearly also want to safeguard associations which are quite public — political parties, universities, trade unions, civics, professional regulatory bodies, park boards. Some of our intimate associations, the family, for example, control a range of social (read public) goods that may demand state intervention (read children). Most importantly, a public/private distinction fails to explain how many associations host mechanisms that distribute a broad array of goods. For example, a university can supply cultural goods, economic goods, intellectual goods, recreational goods, intimate goods, empowerment goods and so on. A university is not unique in this regard — a museum or an internet site might well do the same. The point then is a simple one. Associations often provide a range of goods beyond those with which they are identified. Those secondary goods may be as important to the members as the primary goods.

voluntary. They may be incorporated or unincorporated.[1] They may be public or private or some mix of the two. Consider the following list:

> Nuclear families, extended families, friends, acquaintances, burial societies, fellow workers, neighbours, citizens, civics, lovers, sexual partners, religions, sects, book clubs, dinner guests, bowling clubs, fraternities, political parties, political action groups, stokvels, political lobbies, trade unions, corporations, non-governmental organizations, charities, guilds, professional regulatory bodies, schools, universities, committees, museums, park boards, economic trade associations, parent-teacher associations, school boards, tenant associations, co-op boards, landless peoples movements, co-operatives, internet forums, foundations, trusts.

The manifestly manifold nature of associations reflected in this list reveals, in turn, the brute fact that all human activity, well almost all human activity, involves some form of associational behaviour.

The plethora of associational forms makes it difficult to fit all associations into a single analytical framework.[2] One can try. One might be inclined to break down the above list into three distinct categories. We can identify primary associations — such as families — where the contact is relatively intimate and our choice relatively limited. We can identify secondary associations — a parent-teacher association — where the engagement is focused, somewhat less intimate and somewhat more voluntary. We can identify tertiary associations — the Reproductive Rights Alliance – where our involvement is intermittent and our connection as transitory as we might like. As we shall see, however, even this thin schematic has limited heuristic value. Each member of the broad church of associations identified above possesses dimensions of involuntariness, choice, intimacy, recreation, politics, inclusion, participation and exclusion. No tripartite division addresses such core concerns in advance.

On the other hand, one can identify a golden thread running through all four primary justifications for associational freedom. This leitmotif might best be

[1] Some commentators have asserted, without argument, that 'associations must have some sort of constitution, or at least a structure of decision-making before they will be protected.' Johan De Waal, Iain Currie and Gerhard Erasmus 'Association' in The Bill of Rights Handbook (2001) 341, 343. With respect, neither the grounds for protecting associational freedom nor the variety of South African associations that deserve protection warrant such a cramped understanding. (Likewise the author's unjustified asymmetrical treatment of the freedom to associate and the freedom to dissociate — the former must satisfy some set of formal requirements, the latter need not — underscores the need for analysis and not mere assertion.)

Of course, associations may need a constitution in order to satisfy statutory requirements for tax benefits or public funding. See, eg, the Nonprofit Organizations Act 71 of 1997, the Lotteries Act 57 of 1997, the National Development Agency Act 108 of 1998 and the Taxation Laws Amendment Act 30 of 2000. But that descriptive fact about statutory recognition has no bearing on the prescriptive character of constitutional protection.

[2] David Cole notes that because 'virtually all conduct is at least potentially associational', we are presented with 'serious challenges to crafting a coherent jurisprudence.' 'Hanging with the Wrong Crowd: Of Gangs, Terrorists and Freedom of Association' (1999) Sup Ct Rev 203, 204. This difficulty does not prevent one from identifying an array of justifications for the freedom. To give up on a unified theory of everything associational does not require one to give up on theory.

described as social capital.[1] Social capital is – and is a function of – our collective effort to build and to fortify the things that matter. It is our collective grit and elbow grease, our relationships and their constantly re-affirmed vows. Social capital emphasises the extent to which our capacity to do anything is contingent upon the creation and maintenance of forms of association which provide both the tools and the setting for meaningful action.[2] Social capital is often treated as ephemera. That makes sense. It is so hard to see. In fact, it is this elusive quality that makes social capital so fragile. It is made up, after all, not of bricks and mortar, but of relationships and commitments and the trust, respect and loyalty upon which they are dependent.[3] Social capital links up the four primary justifications for the protection of associational life in the following manner. Social capital cuts across the various forms of associational life buttressed by other rights — the correlative. Social capital is what keeps our intimate, economic, political, cultural, traditional, reformist and religious associations going. Without it, nothing works. Social capital explains at least part of what is at stake for both individual identity and social cohesion — the constitutive. Social capital recognizes that we store the better part of our meaning in fundamentally involuntary associations. Squander that social capital, nothing that matters is. Social capital recognizes the dominant rationale for ceding control over membership and purpose to the association — capture. Social capital recognizes both the real and the figurative sense of ownership that animates associational life. If anyone and everyone can claim ownership of and in an association, then no one owns it. Social capital takes seriously the threat of various kinds of compelled association. Trust, respect and loyalty have no meaning where the association is coerced. These several

[1] In the course of writing this chapter, I contrived 'social capital' as an apt neologism for what is ultimately at stake in most associational conflicts. But it is no neologism at all. Upon completion of this chapter, Gavin Anderson and Brahm Fleisch kindly directed me to the growing body of literature in sociology, political science and development studies on the definition, the value and the history of 'social capital'. See, eg, Robert Putnam Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community (2000) and Making Democracy Work: Civic Traditions in Modern Italy (1993); James Coleman Foundations of Social Theory (1990); Pierre Bourdieu 'Forms of Capital' in JC Richards (ed) Handbook of Theory and Research for the Sociology of Education (1986) 241. In Bowling Alone, Putnam defines social capital as follows:

> Whereas physical capital refers to physical objects and human capital to the properties of individuals, social capital refers to social networks and the norms of reciprocity and trustworthiness that arise from them. In that sense, social capital is closely related to what some have called 'civic virtue'. The difference is that social capital calls attention to the fact that civic virtue is most powerful when embedded in a sense network of social relations. A society of many virtuous but isolated individuals is not necessarily rich in social capital.

Bowling Alone (supra) at 19. There is a signal difference between Putnam's account of social capital and the one developed in these pages. First, in this chapter, social capital is not assumed to be desirable primarily because of its instrumental link to civic virtue and the well-ordered society. Social capital is simply a cause and an effect of all stable associational frameworks. It is a predicate good for most other social goods. Second, because associational life is the necessary setting for most meaningful action, it makes little sense to speak, as Putnam does, of virtuous individuals in isolation. Virtue is a feature of human life that can exist only in the context of a densely woven fabric of social practices that define the good life.

[2] Our deployment of our social capital is how things get done. In the absence of significant stores of social capital, the only tool for collective action is coercion.

[3] See Anette Baier 'Trust and Antitrust' in Moral Prejudices (1995) 95, 96, 98, 128–129.

virtues can be earned, but never commanded. No trust, respect or loyalty: no social capital. No social capital: none but the most debased association.[1]

The obvious importance of social capital aside, I am not going to force some grand theory about the necessary conditions for a social democracy into the limited confines of a chapter on freedom of association. Rather, in the pages that follow, I hope to show how each of the four aforementioned grounds for protecting associational life support both social capital and different indicia for determining the level of support a particular kind of association should receive. The notions of the 'constitutive', the 'correlative', 'capture' and 'dissociation' should also enable us to unpack some of the reasoning behind existing South African case law on association.

(a) Associations as Correlative

Associational freedom makes participatory politics meaningful and genuinely representative politics possible. An individual is unlikely to have either the ability or the resources necessary to mount an effective campaign to convince large numbers of his peers that his position on a particular subject is correct. However, a like-minded group of individuals — with their collective insight, effort and resources — is far more likely to make itself heard. Once heard, they have the opportunity to influence fellow members of society. If they are able to influence a sufficiently large number of their fellow citizens, they can, perhaps, translate their influence into the election of representatives. These representatives, who wield the real power, may then effect the desired political change. Associations thereby provide the bridge from individual efforts to collective political action.[2]

[1] The rhetoric should not be mistaken for the following logically transitive proposition: (1) if a = b; (2) if b = c; (3) then a = c. Trust, respect and loyalty may be pre-condition for social capital, but social capital is not reducible to those virtues.

[2] The argument for constitutionally protecting political association might also be stated in the negative. That is, associational freedom acts as a brake on majoritarian tyranny by making it possible for individuals and minorities to challenge existing political majorities. The first challenge consists simply of a demonstration of numerical strength. The second challenge consists of developing arguments designed to persuade members of the existing majority to switch their allegiance and ultimately turn the present minority into the majority. Associations, on this account, make majorities fluid. And the more fluid the majority, so the argument goes, the less likely it will be to squash a minority: members of a fluid majority may well recognize that they could be on the receiving end should allegiances shift once again. See de Toqueville (supra) at 223. See also Dennis Davis 'South Africa and Transition: From Autocracy to What?' (1992) 18 Centre for Applied Legal Studies Working Papers 23 (only local and intermediate political associations can apply the sort of pressure necessary to spur the party elites into action and thereby ensure that the benefits of political liberation result in economic and social liberation); Robert Dahl Polyarchy: Participation and Opposition (1971).

Associational freedom also secures so-called private goods. Most of us believe that our intimate associations are crucial to our self-understanding.[1] The freedom of association prevents the state from exercising too substantial an influence over our decisions about whom to love and how to love them.[2]

Associational freedom protects cultural goods. Cultural practices and affiliations — like intimate relationships — often form an integral part of our self-understanding.[3] Cultural associations sustain these practices and affiliations. If, therefore, we wish to safeguard these basic or primordial attachments from undue state interference, then we must be willing to place cultural associations securely within the freedom's protective sphere. We might also wish to protect cultural associations for more instrumental reasons. For one thing, cultural associations often act as effective buffers between the individual and state power. For another, the greater the number of and more varied our cultural associations, the more enriched our national culture and our individual lives tend to be. For a third, cultural associations, like other associations, tend to fill the breach left by the decline of familial hierarchies and the concomitant increase in market-driven individualism. They mediate the anomie of modern society, often perform welfare functions the state is unable or unwilling to undertake, and generally function as the glue preventing social disintegration.

Associational freedom realizes economic goods. Business associations, for example, may realize certain efficiencies or advances through the sharing of price, product and technical information. Optimally, and ultimately, the benefits of such shared knowledge should flow to the consumer in the form of lower prices and better products.

Associational freedom advances social goods. The freedom enables individuals and communities to organize around particular issues of concern. It thereby permits these groups to contest and ameliorate the structure of social power in ways that are not directly political. It also allows them to organize in pursuit of activities that they just happen to enjoy.

---

[1] But that self-understanding does not mean that we, as individuals, do have or should have relatively unfettered control over decisions about intimate relationships. See § 44.1*(b)* infra. See also Jed Rubenfeld 'The Right of Privacy' (1989) 102 Harvard LR 737 (The general effect of anti-contraception, anti-abortion, anti-homosexuality or anti-miscegenation laws is to force one's life into extremely limited patterns—patterns which inform, if not dictate, the totality of one's life. Seen this way, a right to intimate association is not about 'the freedom to do certain, particular acts' but rather the 'freedom not to have one's life too totally determined by a progressively more normalizing state'.)

[2] See Roberts v United States Jaycees 468 US 609, 615, 104 SCt 3244 (1984)(that intimate 'personal relationships [enjoy] a substantial measure of sanctuary from unjustified interference by the State . . . reflects the realization that individuals draw much of their emotional enrichment from close ties with others'). See also Lawrence v Texas –US — , 123 SCt 2472, 156 LEd 2d 508 (2003)(Homosexual sodomy protected by right to privacy); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice and others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 912) BCLR 1517 (CC) (Homosexual sodomy protected by rights to equality, dignity and privacy).

[3] See Kenneth Karst 'Paths to Belonging: The Constitution and Cultural Identity' (1986) 64 North Carolina LR 303. Karst notes that cultural groups establish many of our 'primordial affinities'. These affinities 'not only provide a tie to other people, but also offer us our very selves'.

Associational freedom realizes social-uplift or substantive-equality goods. It frees labour to bargain collectively so that it may compete with capital on a more equal footing.[1] It frees women to form educational institutions suited to their particular needs. If we believe that the economic empowerment of subordinated groups is a sufficiently pressing social goal, then we may want to insulate such associations from significant state interference so that these groups can advance their historically subordinated interests.[2]

The foregoing list of goods should suggest that the sphere of liberty secured by the freedom of association is important for three very basic reasons. First, individuals (and groups) are freed to pursue or maintain those attachments which they believe are constitutive of their being. Such attachments might be intimate, cultural, religious or social. Secondly, individuals (and groups) are further freed to realize — spontaneously, if not consciously — a most important instrumental goal: a rich and varied civil society. This rich and varied civil society in turn serves many ends: facilitating social debate and participatory politics, providing a buffer between the individual and the state, sustaining a vibrant culture, and ensuring economic progress and advancement. Thirdly, the foregoing list of goods should also imply that if we withdraw constitutional protection from these various forms of association, our ability to protect individuals from the abuses of state power, as well as unchecked social and economic power, will be significantly diminished.[3]

[1] This chapter's treatment of association reflects several notable lacunae: it does not discuss closed-shop agreements, management bargaining units, or codetermination statutes mandating employee participation in corporate policy-making structures. These specialized areas of labour association law are at a distance from traditional associational concerns, are largely subsumed by the provisions governing labour relations entrenched in s 23 of the Final Constitution and the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995, and are therefore best dealt with in the chapter on Labour Relations. See Carole Cooper 'Labour Rights' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz and Stuart Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition March 2004) ('Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition)') Chapter 53. The chapter will engage trade unions in so far as their practices shed light on associational issues generally. See also Report on Freedom of Association, Theme Committee Four, Fundamental Rights, Constitutional Assembly (1995)('The freedom in so far as it affects trade unions and employer associations should be dealt with separately under the rights and freedoms concerning labour relations.')

[2] See Deborah Rhode 'Association and Assimilation' (1986) 81 Northwestern University LR 106 (associations of individuals from historically disadvantaged groups may engage in exclusionary practices, that would be deemed unjustifiable in associations made up of individuals from advantaged groups, where the social meaning of the association and exclusion is not invidious). See also Cathi Albertyn, Beth Goldblatt and Chris Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (2001) 123 for an allusion to the Act's potential for asymmetrical treatment of exclusionary practices in historically disadvantaged and non-disadvantaged associations. Thus, discrimination is not, ipso facto, an evil. What Professors Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roederer do not engage – and in fairness, cannot do so adequately given the limits of space – is the necessity of discrimination for life generally and for meaningful association in particular. However, when they do engage association-based discrimination, it seems to be given unduly short shrift. Too egalitarian an orientation so flattens and distorts associational life as to make it unintelligible. See § 44.2*(b)* infra.

[3] For a general discussion of freedom of association under the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') as well as a detailed analysis of US, Canadian and German jurisprudence up through 1994, see Stu Woolman and Johan de Waal 'Freedom of Association: The Right to Be We' in David van Wyk, John Dugard, Bertus de Villiers & Dennis Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 338-86.

(b) Associations as Constitutive

(i) Associations as Constitutive of the Self

Associational freedom is often justified on the ground that it enables individuals to exercise relatively unfettered control over the various relationships and practices deemed critical to their self-understanding. But autonomy as the basis for associational freedom overemphasizes dramatically the actual space for self-defining choices. In truth, our experience of personhood, of self-consciousness, is a function of a complex set of narratives over which we exercise little in the way of (self) control.

Our notion of 'selfness' is a function, a very useful by-product, of a complex array of semi-independent neural networks that control the body's journey through life. This complex set of dispositional states are a function of both the deep grammar of our brains and the social endowments that have evolved over time to determine various patterns of behaviour. It should be apparent from this brief account that the self or the mind is a valuable abstraction and not an entity — or an internal observer or a boss — that stands back from experience and then dictates to the body what it does in response to various stimuli.[1]

Each self then is just a centre of narrative gravity. Each centre of narrative gravity — each self — is a set of different, but overlapping narratives. Each narrative, or storyline, reflects a complex set of experiences and dispositional states organized around a particular form of behaviour. 'I' consist of narratives around my roles as a male, as an academic, as an English speaker, as a son, as a sexual being, as an American, as a tennis player, as a sleeper, as a cook, as a Jew, as a disabled person, as a friend of Anthony, as a listener, as a teacher, as a New Yorker, as bald, as the Managing Editor of Constitutional Law of South Africa. The list of narratives is not infinite — but it is almost as long and as varied as my life. The self then is that centre of narrative gravity, that self-representation, which holds together and organizes information, various storylines and dispositional states that make up my sense of 'me'. It is unique. The variety of narratives that make up 'me' is different in a sufficiently large number of respects to allow me to differentiate my 'self' from any other 'self'. It is relatively stable. Though my narratives and dispositional states are always changing, my self-representations enable me to see my 'self' as remaining relatively consistent over time.[2]

[1] This understanding of the self draws heavily upon contemporary analytic theories in the philosophy of mind. These accounts often rely, in turn, upon current studies in empirical psychology and neurophysiology. See, in particular, the works of Daniel Dennett Elbow Room (1984), Consciousness Explained (1991) and Freedom Evolves (2003). See also Andrew Pessin and Sandy Goldberg (eds) The Twin Earch Chronicles (1996); Derek Parfit Reasons and Persons (1984). (This account elides the extensive debate around consciousness and identity. A literature review of that debate clearly does not belong here.) This 'de-centered' characterization of the self also features in many contemporary psychoanalytic, post-structuralist and post-modern theories of personhood. However, this functionalist account of the self does not share many of the epistemic commitments — and the anxieties of doubt – of much of what counts as post-modern.

[2] Individuals who have suffered through accidents or illnesses often experience a radical break in terms of the self. A sense of self 'before' and a sense of self 'after'. Such is the difference between these different self-representations that an individual will often say 'I am not the same person'. Of course, they are correct. The different set of dispositions makes them a different person. (Many of us will have a similar sense of otherness when we think back upon our childhood.)

It is socially and physically determined. The self, and its various narratives, is thoroughly a function of physical capacities and social practices over which we have little control or choice.[1]

The conclusions we draw from this account of the self for our understanding of associational life are fairly straightforward. This account of the self should dispel the notion that individuals are best understood as 'rational choosers' of the ends they seek. The self should be seen as the inheritor and the executor of a rather heterogenous set of practices — of ways of responding to or acting in the world. The centrality of inherited practices or social endowments for both the creation and the maintenance of identity introduces an ineradicable element of arationality into the domain of individual decision-making. That is, despite the dominance of the enlightenment vision of the self as a rational agent, the truth of the matter is that the majority of our responses to the world are arational. They are not reflective. They are not critical. They are not chosen. They just are.[2] It is this heterogeneous variety of associations and practices into which we are born and in which we continue to reside that determine substantially our responses to various events or phenomena. If this is so, then as a constitutional matter, the model of a rational individual moral agent which undergirds much of our current jurisprudence ought to be supplanted with a vision of the self that is more appropriately located in the associations to which we all belong.

Take for example the way in which our courts have dealt with Rastafarians in Prince[3], homosexuals in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality I and [1] See Richard Dawkins The Selfish Gene (1976) and The Extended Phenotype (1982) for a useful account of how patterns of learned behaviour — memes — replicate themselves over time through individuals, groups and societies. Like genetic replication, we need not be aware of the process of memetic replication for it to occur. Of course, human beings differ meaningfully from other species in their capacity to exercise some control over both genetic and memetic replication.

[2] This use of the term arational may strike some as deeply counterintuitive. It may seem to sweep into the ambit of the arational, various processes most people are apt to describe as falling within the domain of the rational. The point is not to argue about terms. I would be happy to concede various natural and social processes as counting as amongst the many kinds of rational operations in which we engage. The point is the authorship of the processes themselves. We employ many natural and social processes in a fashion clearly intended to secure various ends. The fit between our means and ends, as well as the choice of the ends themselves, is often just what we mean by rational. We did not, as individuals, and often as groups, consciously create many of these processes. They are not the product of any one person's capacity to reason (though various individuals will have contributed to this vast array of processes). In this respect, they are arational. So when I say these responses 'just are', I am not denying that there might not be good reasons for them being so. I only deny that the ultimate source of the reasons, evolutionary adaptation or social adaptation, does not lie within the individual alone. Cf Edmund Burke 'Speech on Conciliation with America' (22 March 1775) (Burke wrote that 'it is a great mistake to imagine that mankind follows up practically any speculative principle, either of government or freedom, as far as it will go in argument or logical illation.') Like me, Burke is sceptical of reasoning from the bottom up. Unlike me, Burke is deeply cynical about our collective capacity for rational discourse.

[3] Prince v President, Cape Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) ('Prince') (Rastafarian use of cannabis in religious ritual justifiably impaired by criminal sanctions because the legislature has power and duty to enact legislation prohibiting conduct considered by it to be anti-social — whether court agrees with this assessment or not).

II[1] and sex workers in Jordan.[2] What links all of the judgments — majority and minority alike — is the model of the self as a rational moral agent.[3] The result of this dominant mode of analysis is that it overestimates the capacity of the individual to choose his or her own ends. Conversely, it underestimates the centrality of associations, endowments and practices for the formation of individual identity. If we were to shift our constitutional analysis to one in which we see associations as constitutive of the self, then we might be willing to treat individuals who participate in non-dominant forms of behaviour with greater respect. Eliminate the notion that individual Rastafarians 'choose' to smoke an elicit substance and supplant it with the assessment that Rastafarians simply engage in a marginal, but not especially dangerous, form of life. The result should be that we are willing to take more seriously the need to create a space for what many in our society view as aberrant practices.[4] Exemptions for other ways of being in the world supplant the desire to sanction non-conformist or non-dominant forms of behaviour. Judicial solicitude for rational individual choice — a stance that often inclines toward the belief in a single justifiable form of behaviour — is displaced by judicial solicitude for the arational, constituitive attachments that form the better part of our identity.

The recognition of the self as a function of arational, constitutive attachments does not mean that we must give each of these attachments our imprimatur of constitutional approval.[5] Within the constraints of these social endowments, we

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice and others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) ('NCGLE I'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) ('NCGLE II').

[2] See S v Jordan (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force and others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC) ('Jordan') (Women's right to engage in commercial transactions involving sex, though private and often involving economically marginalized classes, insufficient to outweigh state's interest in proscription through criminal sanction).

[3] See NCGLE I (supra) and NCGLE II (supra).

[4] See Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) ('Case') at para 99. In Case, Justice Langa distinguishes permissible from impermissible pornography. Criminal sanctions for child pornography make sense on the grounds of coercion and an inability to provide consent. Criminal sanctions on pornography featuring bestiality are not be justified on the same grounds. But what if they were? Animals, or those persons with their interests at heart, would, at best, be indifferent to any distinction between our use for them as food and as sexual objects. Justice Sachs provides the putative grounds for such distinctions in NCGLE I (supra) at para 118: 'There are very few democratic societies, if any, which do not penalize persons for engaging in inter-generational, intra-familial, and cross-species sex, whether in public or in private ... The privacy interest is overcome because of the perceived harm.' Aside from the fact that most societies, historically, have not only permitted but promoted inter-generational sex, neither tradition nor the status quo is an argument. With respect, it is just this sort of non-argument argument about 'perceived harm', that makes it so difficult for minority/aberrant practices to be taken seriously. Justice Sachs uses 'democratic societies' — and thus majority rule — as a screen. But as the honorable justice knows, it is accepted wisdom that a primary justification for judicial intervention in a constitutional democracy is to protect discrete and insular minorities against laws animated by the trivial 'harms' experienced by the majority.

[5] We might begin with a predisposition in favour of creating a space for non-conformist behavior: let us say the disposition to smoke cannabis as a part of Rastafarian religious ritual. However, if this disposition were linked to a disposition to sell cannabis and other drugs to individuals outside the Rastafarian community, and this disposition led to behaviour that endangered the general welfare of society, then we would be well within our rights to ask that the sale of cannabis outside the Rastafarian community be legally proscribed.

still possess the capacity to make critical assessments. Within the constraints of these social endowments, we still possess the capacity to make reasoned judgments about right and wrong, good and evil.[1] Indeed, it is the varied forms of attachments and dispositions that make up the self which provide each of us, and our society collectively, with the critical leverage necessary for discriminating between more and less valuable forms of behaviour.

Thus, the recognition of associations as constitutive of the self does not mean that we eschew hard constitutional choices. It means, rather, that we ought to think twice before we differentiate individiously between our preferred way of being in the world and that way of being preferred by others. Freedom of association rightly understood forces us to attend to the arationality of our most basic attachments and to think twice before we accord our arational attachments preferred status to the arational attachments of others.

(ii) Associations as Constitutive of Social Life

The constitutive nature of our attachments forces us to attend to another often overlooked feature of associations. We often speak of the associations that make up our lives as if we were largely free to choose them or make them up as we go along. I have suggested why such a notion of choice is not true of us as individual selves. It is also largely not true of associational life generally. As Michael Walzer has convincingly argued, there is also a 'radical givenness to our associational life.'[2] What he means, in short, is that most of the associations that make up our associational life are involuntary associations. We don't choose our family. We

[1] The emphasis in this section on the arational sources of the self should not be understood as diminishing the place of reason in ethical, political and legal thought (or most fields of human inquiry for that matter). First, the place of instrumental reason and the ability of human beings to recognize regularities in the world means, at the very least, that we are able to discriminate between better and worse ways of realizing our preferred ends. Second, the more de-centered the self, the more varied forms of life the self draws upon, the more tools the self will have when deciding upon the preferred vision of the good life. Third, this account is not averse or opposed to the existence of some deep grammar of human reason — married to long-standing social conventions – that commits us to such varied ends as the family, the collective and the individual. Some may think it convenient that such a species of naturalism results in a commitment to such imperfectly reconcilable goods as freedom, equality, dignity and democracy. However, putting aside the current dominance of liberal and social democracy, these values or ends have competed with one another for primacy of place for several millennia. How one settles, in a rational manner, the differences between these ultimate ends is the very meat of ethical and political thought. Fourth, though there may be plenty of instances in which the evidence for our beliefs about the world leaves room for a certain amount of theoretical indeterminacy, I take it as given that most of our beliefs about the world are true and that we, humans, share most of those beliefs. Only under such general conditions of shared understanding does it even begin to make sense to talk about disagreement. Thus, though Ptolemy and I may not share certain theories about the solar system, we certainly would share most other beliefs about things in this world. This identity of belief sets between Ptolemy and myself would be obvious if you were able to watch — and to interrogate – both what we do and say. Moreover the near identity of belief sets would enable us to settle many an 'apparent' dispute. See, for example, Donald Davidson Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation (1985), 'On the Very Idea of a Conceptual Scheme' (1974) 47 Proceedings and Addresses of the American Philosophical Association 1; Wilfred VO Quine Word and Object (1960); Daniel Dennett The Intentional Stance (1987).

[2] Michael Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' in Amy Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 64, 67.

generally don't choose our race or religion or ethnicity or nationality or class or citizenship. Moreover, even when we appear to have the space to exercise choice, we rarely create the associations available to us. The vast majority of our associations are already there, culturally determined entities that pre-date our existence or, at the very least, our recognition of the need for them. Finally, even when we overcome inertia and do create some new association (and let me not be understood to underestimate the value of such overcoming), the very structure and style of the association is almost invariably based upon an existing rubric. Corporations, marriages, co-edited and co-authored publications are modelled upon existing associational forms. So gay marriages may be a relatively new legal construct — but marriage itself is a publicly recognized and sanctioned institution for carrying on intimate or familial relationships. Even in times of transformation and revolution, reiteration and mimicry of existing associational forms are the norm.[1]

Perhaps Walzer's most interesting challenge flows from his invitation to think about what it might mean for individuals to lack involuntary associational ties, to be 'unbound, utterly free?'[2] One image, he suggests, might be that of wild horses. But this very image is the antithesis of what makes us human. We are human, and not merely feral, because of the involuntary associations into which we are born and which have been sustained and developed over time. Even schools designed to enable us to make the most of our freedom do not let us do whatever we so wish. We have to learn to be free. And even then, our freedom is predicated upon associations which were and continue to be involuntary in important respects.

As with the above account of the self, this account of the involuntariness of associational life is not meant to undermine the importance of associational freedom for a truly democratic society. Issues of access, of coercion, of choice, of voice, of exit must be constantly negotiated in order to ensure both fairness and flourishing for all members of a society. The emphasis on involuntariness in associational life is meant to bracket that conception of freedom which suggests that any impediment to free association is a denial of that which is most fundamentally human. Those impediments are, in many respects, the precondition for such freedom. A reasonably equal and democratic society must, it would seem, mediate the givenness of our associational life and the aspirations of all of us to discriminate (and sometimes choose) between those associational forms which still fit and those which do not. It is often the case that not choosing to leave an association, but to stay, is what we truly cherish as freedom.[3] Indeed, as Walzer suggests, we ought to call such decisions to reaffirm our commitments 'freedom simply,

[1] The French Revolution returns to direct democracy. The Cambodian revolution looks to traditional forms of communal or agricultural organization. Less radical revolutions, like the American and the South African, harken back to the republicanism of the Greek polis or iterate the modern idiom of a constitutional democracy committed to universal human rights.

[2] Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' (supra) at 70.

[3] We commit and recommit to marriages, friendships, religions, countries, employers. We stay with people or institutions out of loyalty, and because this is just who we are. Sometimes we fight for our country. At other times, we carry on the fight, generally peaceably, within our country. Both fights reflect our loyalty and commitment to our country.

without qualification.'[1] It is, for the most part, he concludes, 'the only freedom that free men and women can ever have.'[2]

The constitutional insights to be drawn from this account of involuntary association are much the same as the naturalized account of the self above. To understand what 'freedom' actually means requires us to pay particular attention to the unchosen conditions of such freedom: to the real space in which choice obtains. This understanding in no way diminishes our responsibility to engage in a casuistic, case-by-case analysis of associational claims. It does, however, sound a cautionary note both for those who trumpet freedom as the ultimate trump and for those who would treat all associations as suspect and therefore as instruments to advance the egalitarian ends of the state.[3]

(c) Associations and Capture

There is something about the very structure of associations that makes them worth protecting: capture.[4] Capture is a function of — one might even say a necessary and logical consequence of — the very structure of associational life. In short, capture justifies the ability of associations to control their association through selective membership policies, the manner in which they order their internal affairs and the discharge of members or users. Without the capacity to police their membership and dismissal policies, as well as their internal affairs, associations would face two related threats. First, an association would be at risk of having its aims substantially altered. To the extent the original or the current raison d'être of the association matters to the extant members of the association, the association must possess the ability to regulate the entrance, voice and exit of members. Without built-in limitations on the process of determining the ends of the association, new members, existing members and even outside parties could easily distort the purpose, the character and the function of the association. Second, and for similar reasons, an association's very existence could be at risk. Individuals, other groups or a state inimical to the values of a given association

[1] Walzer, 'On Involuntary Association' (supra) at 73.

[2] Walzer, 'On Involuntary Association' (supra) at 73.

[3] On how one chooses between due recognition for the various associational sources of the self and the need for the state to intervene in order to ensure that its citizens have adequate access to those associations deemed preconditions for liberal democracy as well as individual and group flourishing, see § 44.2 infra.

[4] An association's control over selective membership policies (entrance), its internal affairs (voice), exclusionary or discharge procedures (exit) would seem to explain much, though not all, of the content of the right to disassociate. But the converse is not the case: the grounds for dissociation do not explain the notion of capture. Cf Johan De Waal, Iain Currie and Gerhard Erasmus 'Association' in The Bill of Rights Handbook (2001) 341. The authors describe the right to dissociate as including 'the rights not to establish an association, to stay out of existing associations, to dissolve an association and to resign from an association.' Ibid at 343. For a more precise account of dissociation or forced association, see § 44.1*(d)* infra. See also Nicholas Haysom 'Association' in Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis and Nicholas Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 247, 251; Halton Cheadle 'Labour Relations' in Cheadle et al (supra) at 363.

could use ease of entrance into and the exercise of voice in an association to put that same association out of business.

In a world without high transaction and switching costs for the creation of associations, the risk of such penetration and alteration might be a tolerable state of affairs. (Then again, in a world of pre-dominantly involuntary association, we might rather fight than switch.[1]) But, it almost goes without saying, in the real world the costs of creating and maintaining associations is quite high. Just starting an association — be it religious, cultural, economic, political or intimate — takes enormous effort. To fail to take such efforts seriously, by failing to give individuals 'ownership' over the fruits of their continued labour is to risk creating significant disincentives to form, to build and to maintain their relationships. Thus, whether we are talking about a marriage, a corporation, a church, a political party, a cricket board, a dinner party, a trade union, a golf club, or a law society, we will want to give them a certain amount of room to govern their affairs and to operate without interference by outside parties. And this is what we do. Marriages are subject to a contract — a contract that, vis-a-vis monogamous relationships anyway, excludes other parties from the family. Private corporations are structured — through articles of incorporation and by-laws – to exclude non-members from participation in the operation of the corporation without the appropriate approval. Such participation may occur, amongst other ways, through the legally sanctioned purchase of shares of ownership or ownership outright or through being hired by an existing member or empowered employee of the corporation. A church may have a covenant or articles of faith to which a member must swear in order to gain entrance and to which they must adhere to retain membership. A golf club membership may require nomination and fees. A law society might require a test or a period of training to secure admittance. It might require community service, dues and fairly strict law-abiding behaviour in order remain a practitioner in good standing. To fail to permit a marriage, a corporation, a church, a golf club or a law society to govern its boundaries and its members in appropriate ways would make these arrangements impossible to maintain. It would, in some respects, be equivalent to saying that anyone and everyone owns these associations — which is, of course, tantamount to saying that no one owns them.

I use the notion of property in both a literal and a figurative sense. In a quite literal sense, most associations have tangible property that makes the pursuit of its ends possible. Thus, for example, if a Congregationalist Church is to pursue its mission of imparting the received wisdom of the Church and enabling its members to engage in shared devotion, then it will often require buildings, a parsonage, books, musical instruments and furniture. The Church may also run schools and host events designed to promote the church's teachings amongst the young and the masses. How it disposes of such property — and who owns that property — can be said to be governed by the constitution that governs the Church's financial affairs as well as the legal regime that governs property generally. In a quite literal sense, we might want to prevent capture of the Church's property by, let us say, a group of persons who wish to create a similar appreciation for the Korean language and culture. The normal regime of property in a liberal democratic state would be one means of preventing the use of unsavoury means for the realization of such ends.

[1] Moreover, as I have already argued, many, if not most, of the associations to which we belong are involuntary associations. They are involuntary in the sense that they preexist us and constitute who we are as individuals and communities. They are involuntary in the sense that we have a limited range of associations to which we can belong. They are involuntary in the sense in that even when we are as free as can be we are generally not free to disown all of the associations of which we are a part. Some may choose to be Thoreau, others forced to be Crusoe. But even the Thoreaus and Crusoes amongst us are not unencumbered.

There is also a figurative sense of ownership and property bound up with, but not identical to, the literal sense. This figurative sense involves the capacity of like-minded individuals to work together to realize shared ends and to share in the gratification of such ends. In the case of a marriage or a religious entity or a cultural formation, the goods are often identical to the means of attaining them. Thus, the coming together to pray in a Congregationalist Church is both a means of making manifest individual faith and an end in itself. These means and ends are governed by articles of faith. The manner of prayer, the content of belief and the binding rituals are set out in rules. Adherence to this set of rules, and the capacity to generate new rules, should matter as much as the rules which govern more tangible forms of property. For if there is no set of rules said to express the beliefs of the members — even if this set of rules is unwritten — then there is a real sense in which anything goes and anyone belongs. The figurative property regime of associational membership in a liberal democracy should ensure that a Congregationalist Church is able to define and maintain itself as such, and that it need not worry about a sudden transformation into some other denomination.

Both senses of property and ownership matter. It is the purpose of freedom of association to ensure that both are protected from capture by those who would use them for ends at a variance with the existing and rightful members of the association.[1]

[1] As least part of what animates those concerned with 'freedom' in freedom of association is what we describe here in terms of capture: the notion that like minded individuals ought to be free to do what they like with whom they like and to set up associations to that end without fear of undue interference or penetration. Capture, and its dual metaphors of property and ownership, captures this first meaning of 'freedom'. The power to exclude from one's associational property and to prevent its capture by others reflects a second notion of 'freedom' — the right not to be forced to associate with others. This ground for 'freedom' of association is exhausted by notions of capture and disassociation. A third justification for 'freedom' is autonomy and self-realization. It would seem that our account of association in terms of the correlative, the constitutive and the dual senses of ownership intrinsic to capture provide ample room for a self to fashion itself to the extent it can and the extent it will.

(i) Entrance

As we have seen, associations pursue a variety of different ends. In the pursuit of these ends, associations may require the control of a substantial amount of property or may be charged with the distribution of a wide variety of goods. In any case, the kind of association under scrutiny will often dictate the kind of control we wish to give it over entrance.

Marriages will generally be exclusive affairs — entrance to which may be determined by the individuals involved or, in some cases, the families of those individuals. Trade unions may likewise limit entrance to those who are employed in the given trade and are willing to use collective bargaining to determine the terms of their employment. Religious institutions may be entitled to restrict entrance to individuals who have sworn to uphold the tenets of the faith and agree to demonstrate continued adherence through the performance of required ritual. Likewise, only by keeping out persons who might not have the commitments of the Reproductive Rights Alliance or the Alliance Francaise at heart — only by controlling entrance — would each Alliance be assured of maintaining some control over the means necessary to pursue their respective ends.[1] The literal and figurative sense of property and ownership does real work because only this dual understanding of property enables the various associations to carry out their various ends.

How much control do we cede to the existing members of an association to determine who is entitled to entrance? Again, it depends. We tend to cede a great deal of control over entrance to marriages to the parties concerned. We can easily [1] If the Alliance Francaise is to pursue its mission of teaching the French language and creating a greater appreciation for French culture, then it will require buildings, books, musical instruments, cinemas, computers and furniture. The Alliance Francaise may also give away scholarships or host events designed to promote the language and culture. Let us assume that a group of persons wished to create a similar appreciation for the Korean language and culture. One possible step towards the realization of such a goal would be to gain control of the Alliance Francaise. While French dictionaries might not prove useful, the buildings and other goods under the current control of the Alliance Francaise certainly would.

One obvious objection to this example is that associations such as the Alliance Francaise often do not have members in the deliberative and quasi-political sense that we have been using the notion. Many tertiary associations are not run by their members. They may be established by trusts and run by trustees. In such cases (and such cases may represent a large percentage of associations), the concerns about permeability, contestability and capture may have limited purchase. The example is, however, designed to highlight what is at stake for those associations which have not put their basic principles beyond the reach of the shifting viewpoints of the individuals who pay dues, participate in the management of the association or simply make use of the association's goods and services.

Another objection, it must follow, is that such associations rarely undergo the kind of hostile takeover we tend to attribute to Wall Street kingpins. Perhaps so. Perhaps not. Struggles for control, I would argue, are a salient feature of all associational settings. Sometimes the strife is limited to the control of a law faculty and the aims it pursues. Sometimes it is takes place between various parties to a marriage and individuals outside a marriage. Sometimes insiders and outsiders collude to take control of a country. Control over entrance is one way we control the manner in which associations may, over time, come to view their mission differently and how we account for — or indeed control — such change.

imagine intervention where a party is being coerced into such an arrangement.[1] We tend to cede a great deal of control over membership in religious institutions. A liberal democratic state is on very shaky ground when it starts to decide on matters we tend to believe belong to some transcendental domain — even where such rules run counter to liberal democratic principles. However, when we move on to more public institutions such as trade unions or universities or law societies, then we may want such institutions to bear some sort of burden of demonstrating that the grounds for exclusion are reasonably or even inextricably linked with the purposes of the institution. The state should accept my exclusion of a potential mate from the bonds of matrimony on the grounds that she snores, or even from a religious denomination on the alleged grounds that snoring is the devil's work. But because snoring seems wholly unrelated to the aims of a trade union, a university or a law society (unless, of course, it happens on the job, in the class, or during trial), the state should be willing to interfere with the entrance requirements of any such institution that uses snoring as a bar.[2] The basis for the distinction between the two groups of associations should be obvious. It is not clear what, if anything, a state would gain through interference in snoring-based entrance criteria for marriages and religions. It is, however, clear that issues of power, participation and opportunity in a liberal democratic society may require that institutions designed to deliver such goods — trade unions, political parties, universities and so – must do so in a fair manner — a manner that is in some sense is congruent with the values of a liberal democratic society.[3]

[1] Westerners tend to be more uneasy about polygamous unions than monogamous ones. But we seem ready to create conventions to cover those kinds of marriages — and cede the requisite control over them — to the extent we are convinced that coercion is less of an issue.

[2] See Martin Redish and Christopher McFadden 'HUAC, the Hollywood Ten and the First Amendment Right of Non-Association' (2001) 85 Minn LR 1669. The members of the Hollywood studios that shunned or boycotted persons with previous connections to the Communist Party did not have an associational purpose bound up with such anti-Communist precepts prior to the exclusion of the Hollywood Ten. On my account, therefore, the studios would be hard pressed to show any connection between their exclusionary practice and their associational purpose. The only question, hypothetically, would be the grounds for the state's intervention on the Hollywood Ten's behalf.

[3] Nancy Rosenblum 'Compelled Association, Public Standing, Self-Respect and the Dynamic of Exclusion' in Amy Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 75-108. While Rosenblum recognizes the logic of congruence, she is absolutely adamant that state intervention take note of two other associational dynamics. First, liberal democracies by their very nature must make provision for exclusion, and for exclusion that does not necessarily require rational defence. Second, a primary problem for liberal democracies is not exclusion per se but social anomie, a failure to connect that is not a necessary outgrowth of exclusionary practices. Histories of exclusion and histories of dislocation may overlap with one another in South Africa. But one must take care not to mistake the one for the other and assume that the appropriate corrective is simply to eliminate all vestiges of exclusion. The proper response may be for the state to develop institutions that create opportunities for greater participation and that serve the associational needs of historically disadvantaged communities. That the drafters of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 have conflated exclusion and dislocation seems relatively self-evident. See § 44.2*(b)* infra.

(ii) Voice

Part of the purpose of the Reproductive Rights Alliance is to give voice or expression to the virtues of reproductive choice. Suppose, however, that reproductive choice is anathema to a large number of individuals. Assume that these individuals join the Alliance in order to shift its message — to change its voice. Only by giving the Alliance — and its existing leadership or trustees — the power to control its message, and if need be expel members whose views conflict with its stated mission, can the Alliance be certain that it can continue to voice its support for reproductive rights. Similarly, freedom of association, and related freedoms of expression, thought, conscience, assembly or petition, would be relatively hollow if the state could simply intervene in order to alter the Alliance's message in a manner that suited the majority of citizens and their representatives.[1] Thus, capture analysis is tied to the belief that many associations exist both to give expression to various ways of being in the world and to provide a setting in which such ways of being may continue to flourish.

But 'voice' throws up at least five difficult questions. First, what is the voice of an association? Second, how is that voice established? Third, how does one account for shifts in the positions of the members of an association that would require a shift in voice? Fourth, on what grounds would a state be entitled to interfere in the internal affairs of an association to change the message or alter the manner in which the message is formed? Fifth, how much expression or clear articulation must an association give to its values in order to be understood to actually possess an expressive component — or is the generally accepted conduct of its members sufficient?

What is the voice of an association? The voice of an association must have as least two dimensions: (1) what the association says it is about; (2) what the association does in the world. The two should be relatively co-extensive. That is, there should be a relatively tight fit between word and deed. In this respect, the voice of an association may be judged in much the same way as a person. If a person says they believe in reproductive choice, but thwarts the ability of others to secure such services – either by bombing clinics or funding pro-life campaigns – then we might have cause to wonder whether they mean what they say.[2]

[1] It is critical to note that exclusionary practices often protect unpopular minority views. See Katherine Moerke and David Selden 'Associations Are People Too' (2001) 85 Minn LR 1495.

[2] Of course, it goes without saying that word or deed alone will not necessarily establish what an individual believes. Self-deception, weakness of the will, cognitive dissonance can all create disjunctions between word and deed, word and word and deed and deed. Nor is there any simple way to determine a person's or an entity's beliefs or propositional attitudes. Perhaps the best approach is to adopt an intentional stance: a strategy of interpretation that presupposes the rationality and the relative transparency of the people that we hope to understand.

How is an association's voice established? Of course, saying that the voice of an association is established through both word and deed oversimplifies the exercise. Associations are often made up of members who do not share exactly the same set of beliefs and who do not believe in the same course of action. Moreover, there may be no clear annuciation of belief nor a clear mechanism for such articulation. Or, as if often the case, persons in a position to articulate the association's beliefs to the public may not, in fact, reflect the beliefs of the members. Many associations are not set up like little democracies. They may not have structures for debate. The members may not possess equal status in determining the message. When we think about how hierarchical families, churches, fraternities and corporations often are, we should take care before we attempt to introduce democratic principles into the mix. Indeed, part of living in a liberal democratic society means a certain level of acceptance for associations that do not conform to the basic, organizing principles of a liberal democratic state.

This apparent difficulty in determining the message of an association suggests two somewhat compatible strategies to deal with questions three, four and five above. First, we should be reluctant to attribute a clear set of beliefs or values unless we have clear evidence of such beliefs or values. Second, we should be reluctant to interfere in the spontaneous construction of such a set of beliefs or values by the members of an association. That is, we should be chary about imposing a state-sanctioned value on an association unless we have clear evidence that the association in question has no apparent belief regarding the subject under scrutiny.

How does one account for and respond to shifts in the positions of the members of an association that would require a shift in voice? The two prophylactic rules in the paragraph above offer a start. Moreover, unless a good reason exists to interfere in the internal affairs of the association in question in order to determine the message, we should be reluctant to push the analysis any further.

On what grounds would a state be entitled to interfere in the internal affairs of an association to change the message or alter the manner in which the message is formed? With certain kinds of association the threshold for interference in determining the voice ought to be quite high. With families, religious groups and traditional communities, the first inclination of a liberal state ought to be to allow the members to work out their voice on their own. Only in circumstances of obvious coercion, and where parties concerned have little opportunity to articulate their voice through exit, should the state show a willingness to intercede.[1] Such an approach adheres to the logic of associational life: associations are both constitutive and involuntary in important respects, but we can never allow them to use their involuntariness as a mechanism for abuse. So a liberal state should be willing to intervene where children's well-being is at stake because they do not control either the voice of the family or their own exit. A liberal state should be willing to intervene where women in traditional communities likewise lack a voice or a meaningful opportunity to exit — and where a desire to be heard or to exit is made express.[1] With other kinds of association, the threshold for interference in determining the message should be quite low. For example, because political parties are essential for the effective operation of most liberal democracies, we would want a relatively unfettered accounting of just what the members of a party advocate. That means we can reasonably require a party to be open to all those who wish to belong and who can satisfy some basic conditions of membership.[2]

[1] See the discussion of coercion as a ground for state interference at § 44.2*(d)* infra.

The articulation and the control of voice becomes can become an issue even for those associations which do not have — as with a particular party — a particularly expressive function. Take the Boy Scouts, for example. They have a very elaborate set of structures, codes and activities designed to raise virtuous and publicly-spirited young men. But what if a homosexual scoutmaster — who heretofore has not made his sexually orientation known — is 'outed' by a newspaper? Can the central leadership of the Boy Scouts — who heretofore have not made sexually orientation an explicit part of their code — now argue that all their previous actions and statements have demonstrated that homosexuality has always been anathema to the Scouts and that the mere sexual orientation of the homosexual scoutmaster makes such a person an inappropriate leader of young men? As I discuss below, such a scenario does not lend itself to a simple resolution.[3] Competing interests within the organization, the lack of clarity of institutional purpose (which could be said to bind members in advance) and the quasi-public, quasi-private nature of the organization all make both the construction and the attribution of voice a difficult exercise.

(iii) Exit

Controlling entrance and voice is only possible if an association controls exit. The Reproductive Rights Alliance, or any such association, must be able to determine whether a person has complied with the basic dictates of the association. If not, it must also be able to expel her from the association. That is not to say that every association ought to be able to discipline and punish members however it sees

[1] How express such intent should be will be a matter for debate. But paternalism in the guise of correcting 'false consciousness' is always a danger when intervening on behalf of adults.

[2] The problem of multiple voting and membership — that is, persons belonging to all parties in an effort to skew all results towards their singular preferences — is at least partially controlled by only permitting registration with a single party. Thus, if I am really an ANC stalwart masquerading as a DA supporter, then a registration restriction locks me into a particular organizational setting. I lose, at least publicly, my ability to influence the construction of an ANC voice. Some broad commitment, in advance, to the positions of the party coheres with arguments from capture and democracy. But no advance set of commitments can control wilful deception nor wilful deception en mass.

[3] See § 44.1*(c)*(vi) infra.

fit. For classically voluntary, secondary associations in which members have a legitimate expectation of ongoing participation, the association's expulsion procedures may have to satisfy two basic requirements: (a) the grounds for the expulsion ought to be tied directly to the purpose of or the management of the association; (b) a member of the association should receive some form of fair hearing should she wish to contest the expulsion.[1]

As our discussion of involuntary associations should have made clear, exit is also critical for the members of an association. No association can be truly said to be free if its members are coerced into remaining. It goes without saying that some associations are easier to walk away from than others. Families, religions, ethnic groups, races and states are notorious difficult to shrug off.[2] Thus, as we have already noted, sometimes the walking away is notional — one never 'really' leaves. Constitutional law in a liberal democracy must take such notional departures seriously. And it must make real breaks possible. Just as a liberal democratic state must be willing to intervene where the coercive conduct of association threatens the physical well-being of a member, it must also be willing to create some measure of opportunity for its citizens to leave associations. That cannot possibly mean an obligation to find everyone the job, the family, the religion, the community that best fits him or her. But it may mean creating institutions — say the Human Rights Commission or the Commission for Gender Equality — that help to foster awareness of situations in which involuntary associations become intolerable. It may also mean that we give all citizens the resources — primarily through education — needed to make meaningfully 'free' decisions about where they want to be, what they want to do and who they want to do it with: even if such decisions often simply re-affirm the associations that such persons have already entered.

[1] See, eg, Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T) ('Cronje'); Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club 1998 (2) SA 487 (C) ('Ward') and Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, and Others 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T) ('Wittmann') and discussion of these cases at § 44.3*(c)*(ix) infra. Again, the complex nature of associational life requires a caveat. With respect to membership in many tertiary associations — where, say, a R50 annual fee to belong to the World Wildlife Fund is the sum total of the relationship — membership would seem sufficiently attenuated that fair hearings are generally unwarranted and undesirable. (The issue again is less the kind of association and more the ability of members to participate in its affairs.) With respect to membership in religious and traditional forms of association, the imposition of fair hearings — unless part of the accepted practice — would be a rather gratuitous imposition. To the extent that an expulsion would be about a matter of faith — and not access to property — a member should be expected to understand and to have accepted the conditions for remaining within the fold as well as the conditions for being asked to leave.

[2] It should go without saying that not all ascriptive associations — race and ethnicity — are themselves constitutionally protected association. Such a definition would most certainly be overly broad. Rather the point is to draw attention to the circumstances in which the state intervention in 'involuntary associations' is justified. See § 44.1*(d)* — Association and Dissociation – and § 44.2*(d)* — Coercion – infra.

(iv) Social Capital, Fragility, Switching Costs and Transaction Costs

The foregoing discussion should make clear why we care about forestalling the capture of associations — and the concomitant ability of associations to retain their autonomy through control of entrance, voice and exit. In a world of insignificant transaction and switching costs, one might be inclined to answer that we would not. Individuals and groups would be literally free to leave, join, dissolve and reform associations without any of the time, effort, and money that the creation and maintenance of associations require. But we do not live in such a world. Nor is it really possible to understand what it is to be human in a world of completely 'free association'. Human beings are only human, only become human, through a complex engagement of physically and socially constructed dispositions. (This treatment ignores, it goes without saying, the manner in which the physical and the social influence one another over time). And each set of such dispositions is significantly, if not entirely, a function of processes of replication over which we have only a modicum of control.

But what if we were to start acting as if we were creatures capable of 'free association'? What would an approach that failed to take the protection of existing associations seriously be likely to yield? My sense is that even with enormous sums of economic capital, the fragility of associations would make large scale intervention a failure. Most associations are built on trust and respect. Conditions that undermine the tenuous bonds of trust and respect between individuals and groups are likely to make many forms of association quite difficult to maintain.[1]

[1] The jurisprudential argument developed herein is simple. A robust associational life is a necessary pre-condition for a well-ordered and just society. Trust is both a necessary pre-condition for a robust associational life and a product of that associational life. A well-ordered society is one that does not allow trust to attrite. See, eg, Sisela Bok, 'Truthfulness, Deceit and Trust' in Lying (1978) 31 ('Whatever matters to human beings, trust is the atmosphere in which it thrives.') This chapter can be read as an extended meditation — grounded in constitutional theory — on the primacy of this virtue and the political conditions necessary to sustain it. Put another way, trust's ubiquity and necessity only become apparent to us upon its destruction, much as we 'notice air only when it becomes scarce or polluted.' Annette Baier 'Trust and Antitrust' in Moral Prejudices (1995) 95, 129. This chapter sounds a cautionary note on taking trust and associational life — much as we take air — for granted.

Likewise, the pre-conditions for trust are such that they do not lend themselves to demands for clearly articulated rules of distributive justice (or clearly articulated rules period) that a well-ordered society is often said to require. The reasons for this are three-fold.

First, unlike rules of distributive justice, which require fairly rigorous institutions designed to facilitate the transparency, accountability and openness of social interactions (eg, courts, legislatures, newspapers, universities), trust is 'a fragile plant, which may not endure inspection of its roots, even when they were, before the inspection, quite healthy.' Baier (supra) at 130. For example, a marriage is not likely to survive for long, if, at the nightly repast, the first question is 'so were you faithful today dear?'

Second, and for reasons already assayed, trust cannot be commanded. A system of distributive justice — say that portion of Rawls' second principle that requires that all economic arrangements must provide some benefit to the least well-off — generates a fairly abstract set rules to be followed by the governors and the governed. The instantiation of these rules is parasitic upon existing forms of inarticulate and indeterminate social coordination such as trust.

When I say inarticulate, think of what it means when someone says 'Trust me'. While it may be superfluous where you are already likely to heed the advice or guidance of a friend, it is, in fact, more often a danger signal, a thinly veiled threat or, even when sincere, a potential overestimation of the trustee's capacity to make good. Think of what the words 'Trust me' would add to a provision of a contract. Nothing. On the one hand, the clause would be meaningless because there could be no

One can view the market, which places a premium on efficiency, fungibility and mobility, as a kind of large-scale intervention that can, without adequate brakes, eviscerate bonds of trust and respect. This view of markets holds equally for intervention by the state. No one with even a passing familiarity with the abuses of Apartheid can fail to appreciate the destruction wrecked on the better part of South African society. Moreover, the constant presence of the state in many areas of social life made the continuation of all but the most non-threatening forms of associational life difficult if not impossible.

The fragility of associational life and the difficulty of deploying social capital to new ends under conditions of constant change or interference underscores a expectation of performance: it is based upon trust and it just goes with the territory that the truster may be let down by the trustee. On the other hand, the prefatory imperative — 'Trust me' – must be read out of the provision in order for the remainder of the clause to be understood by both parties to be binding.

When I say indeterminate, the nature is of trust is such that the trustee must grant wide 'discretionary powers to the trusted, to let the trusted decide how, in a given manner, one's welfare is best advanced, to delay the accounting for a while, to be willing to wait and see how the trusted has advanced one's welfare.' Annette Baier, 'Trust and Its Vulnerabilities' in Moral Prejudices (1995) 131, 136. While rule-governed systems may rely, in part, upon discretion, discretion is at the very heart of trust.

When I say a system of rules is parasitic on trust, the formation of rules — or a system of rules – is based upon the ability to exercise good judgment. This good judgment, in turn, is contingent upon the capacity to make determinations about the kinds of situations in which trust is to be extended or withheld. (This capacity to make such determinations is predicated upon such 'primitive' practices as noting that shifty eyes elicit suspicion or that a shoulder shrug reflects acquiescence.)

The conclusion to be drawn from this brief meditation has two-parts.

First, where there is 'little or no mutual trust . . . it is hard to see how trust could get started without the help of some third party. Only if trust is there in some form can we increase it by using what is there to contrive conditions in which it can spread to new areas.' Annette Baier, 'Sustaining Trust' in Moral Prejudices (1995) 152, 176. (Parents employ this model with their children all the time. It goes without saying that they can likewise build up large reservoirs of distrust that make coordination impossible.) Moreover, it is impossible to simply supplant the enormous reservoirs of trust created and reinforced by associational life with rules designed to rupture and reorganize social life along radically different lines without incurring substantial costs in social capital and cohesion. (How one strikes the proper balance between conservation and transformation is at least part of what this chapter aims to answer).

Second, Jurgen Habermas has noted that securing agreement in modern societies subject to both perpetual pluralization and disenchantment with the world puts enormous strain on collective democratic deliberation. See Theory of Communicative Action (1984) and Between Facts and Norms: Contributions towards a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (1996). As William Rehg writes:

> reaching agreement communicatively [and constructively] requires a large background consensus on matters that are unproblematic for group members. The implicit agreement represented by such a lifeworld background stabilizes a communicatively integrated group insofar as it removes a large body of assumptions from challenge — as it were fusing validity with facticity of a given cultural background. This is because the background not only provides its members with shared resources for managing conflict; as a source of shared identities it lessens the number of issues that are likely to be contested at any given time, so that large numbers of social action rest on a stable basis of unquestioned consensus.

'Introduction' Between Facts and Norms: Contributions towards a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (1996) xvi. Given the limits of 'unquestioned consensus' in the South African polity, and the need for consensus to transform society, reinforcing and extending the implicit understandings that perpetuate trust and associational life is an absolutely necessary, if not sufficient, condition for the success of the South African political project.

conservative tack towards associational life and intervention therein.[1] That does not mean intervention is never justified. The examples of legitimate intervention offered thus far suggest otherwise. But if we place make efficiency or equality the basis for all of our social planning, then it seems relatively obvious that we place certain aspects of and kinds of associational life at risk. How we come up with a method of analysis that helps us to decide what kinds of state intervention in associational life are justified — and may actually improve associational life — is a project begun in the following two subsections.

(v) Permeability, Flexibility, Contestability and the Problem of Shifting Boundaries

The choice of the Reproductive Rights Alliance as one of our primary examples for capture analysis is apt to occlude some very important characteristics of associations. First, entrance criteria may expand or contract. The Alliance itself only appears to have a relatively static voice. What counts as paradigmatic conditions for reproductive choice are bound to change over time. What the Alliance members or the board of trustees valued in 1993 may not be what they value now in 2003. Second, associations possess varying degrees of flexibility. The Alliance has a certain amount of flexibility: within the parameters of promoting reproductive rights quite a number of different messages may be conveyed. The African National Congress, on the other hand, would appear to have the potential for an even more varied content. As it stands, the ANC is home to various strains of nationalism, neo-liberal politics and the invidiously characterized 'ultra-left'. In addition to the varied ends of its eclectic membership, the ANC as a political party has as a raison d'etre the continued control of the levers of power. The combination of differing optimal visions and the need to secure the support of the electorate means that the ANC's entrance criteria and its voice criteria are going to be flexible and contestable. Third, associations will vary in terms of their permeability. A housing association may be as permeable as the geographical location, and the resultant housing units, it intends to cover. A water access movement in Alexandra must have a narrow brief, but be open to as many residents of Alexandra as are interested in access. A marriage seems relatively impermeable. It is a quite classically a union of two — one women and one man — and two only. Or is it? We now know marriages can move form the monogamous to the polygamous; from heterosexual to homosexual; from common law to customary to religious to secular. Likewise, some religious institutions have been historically averse to homosexual leaders. However, as the recent elevation of a homosexual clergyman in the Anglican Church points up, even the most hide-bound associations can change, can shift their boundaries.

[1] The argument is hardly inimical to transformation. It simply sounds a cautionary note as to the kinds of intervention in associational life that are likely to be successful. For example, various attempts at Black Economic Empowerment ('BEE') are entirely consistent with this account. BEE recognizes existing stocks of social capital and creates incentives for new relationships of trust and respect that extend the access to those stocks to persons heretofore excluded from them. Whether BEE is the best possible engine for transformation is not something upon which this chapter need take a view.

How then is a court to decide when it should intervene on behalf of an association seeking to enforce some pre-determined vision of what the association means and represents? One answer would be the kind of functional response I have begun to outline in this introductory section. One could attempt to identify a correlative right that supports the particular kind of association in question. One could attempt to determine the relative weight an association might have in the lives of its members (taking care that such weights will vary from person to person). One could attempt to determine whether the attempts at controlling the entrance to and voice of the association are consistent with the express or objective meanings of the association (attentive to the fact that such ascriptions of value are as flexible and contestable as the boundaries of the association are permeable and shifting). Against such valuations of the existing membership of the association in question one would then have to assess how compelling the justification would be for overriding the association's exclusionary criteria. As we shall see, one overriding interest, though by no means the only one, is the state's interest in ending discriminatory practices. It is trite that all efforts at exclusion are discriminatory. The real questions for us in South Africa are two-fold: (1) Does the discrimination in question impair the dignity of the person or persons being excluded? (2) Even if the dignity of the person is so impaired, does the impairment warrant compelling the members of the association to alter its criteria for entrance and thereby changing, if the intervention would in fact do so, its voice.

(vi) Problems with Capture Analysis

As the discussion in subsections (i)–(v) above suggests, controlling entrance, voice and exit is not without its difficulties. The Boy Scouts, as we have already begun to suggest, offers a suitably complex setting to test some of our interim conclusions about association analysis. It pursues particular goals – the pursuit of certain virtues by young men. It distributes various goods — opportunities to learn skills, to participate in organized events and to secure a certain status within the broader community. Given these goals and goods, should the Boy Scouts of America be free to include and exclude whomever they like? As our 'functional' analysis suggests, the Scouts' freedom to exclude individuals raises three-related concerns. First, such rules may discriminate against individuals and groups in ways wholly unrelated to the ends of the association. Second, such rules may discriminate against individuals and groups in ways that offend the rules to which a society is committed. Third, a rigid adherence to existing articles or by-laws of an association may preclude the association from a natural or spontaneous evolution into an organization that pursued a somewhat modified or a dramatically different set of ends.

In recent litigation, the Boy Scouts have had their desire to exclude homosexuals vindicated by the United States Supreme Court.[1] The US Supreme Court believed there to be a relatively clear nexus between the right of the Boy Scouts of America to represent themselves as a standing for a particular set of values

[1] Boy Scouts of America v Dale 530 US 640, 120 SCt 2446 (2000) ('Dale').

(whether they actually expressed them or not) and the right to exclude individuals whose behaviour apparently subverts those stated values. Although not employed by the Court, the three-part analysis suggested in the paragraph above does some work in explaining what was at stake in Boy Scouts of America v Dale.[1] The first concern links the Gay scoutmaster's exclusion to the association's ends. The second concern engages the issue of privileging the constitutive nature (and meaning) of the Scouts to (a majority of) its members over egalitarian concerns of the society in general. The third concern determines the extent to which the Scouts' governing authority may declare — albeit through fiat — what all affiliates of the Scouts may declare to be both the exclusionary criteria and the ends of the association.[2]

While the US Supreme Court has been forced to grasp the nettle of membership practices, it is relatively clear from the outcome in Dale that it has not been willing to press down particularly hard on the Boy Scout's stated justifications for exclusion. It is not clear how, if at all, the sexual orientation of a Scoutmaster (and former Eagle Scout) runs counter to the general ethos of the Scouts. Likewise, it is not clear that the vast majority of members believe that the virtues promoted

[1] The US Supreme Court, however, employs a set of doctrines that rests upon distinctions between 'expressive associations', 'intimate associations' and those associations which are neither expressive nor intimate. These doctrines are articulated in a quartet of public accommodation cases beginning with Roberts v United States Jaycees 468 US 609, 615, 104 SCt 3244 (1984) ('Roberts') and extending through Board of Directors of Rotary International v Rotary Club of Duarte 481 US 537, 107 SCt 1940 (1987) ('Rotary Club'), New York State Club Association v City of New York 487 US 1, 108 SCt 2225 (1988) ('City of New York') and Dale (supra).

[2] Four points need to be made about the Dale litigation. First, the stakes were deemed to be so high for associational rights generally that sixty-three associations and 18 states filed amicus briefs with the court. Second, the amicus briefs filed by various Boy Scout affiliates and sponsors could be found on both sides of the case. For example, some Methodist church sponsors saw no conflict between the presence of a Gay assistant Scoutmaster and the basic values the Boy Scouts are said to espouse. Some Methodist Church sponsors did. Third, in terms of US jurisprudence, the Boy Scouts had to rely on the 'expressive' content of their association in order to find protection under the First Amendment. That the Boy Scouts had not expressed clear views on homosexuality as part of their broader social message did not detain the Court. Expression was deemed to be an ineluctable consequence of the association. The need to force association into the parameters of existing constitutional doctrine around expression points up the limits of US associational jurisprudence. Moreover, it should put South African courts on notice that what is truly at stake is not expression but 'capture': the ability of associations to control both their membership (entrance and exit) and their member's behaviour (voice). Fourth, as a matter of New Jersey constitutional law, the New Jersey Supreme Court found that Mr. Dale could rely upon New Jersey's Anti-Discrimination laws and that the State's constitutional commitment to equality took precedence over the expressive (if any) interests of the Boy Scouts and their (purely associative) interests in having the ability to exclude Mr. Dale from participation. Since it could not supplant its own assessment of what the New Jersey Constitution requires, the US Supreme Court was thus forced to hold that the US Constitution's 1st Amendment protection of expressive association trumped the State's interest in public accommodation anti-discrimination laws. South African Courts, on the other hand, will have to decide solely on the fit between membership practices, the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, and ss 9 and 18 of the Constitution.

by the Boy Scouts are in any manner undermined by the sexual orientation of a Scout or a Scoutmaster.[1]

Perhaps a better example of fit between exclusionary practices and associational ends is on display in Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals ['RSPCA'] v Attorney-General.[2] The RSPCA sought vindication of (1) a membership policy designed to remove and exclude members who wished to change the association's policy on hunting; and (2) a convenient administrative scheme for enforcing this policy. The Court held that the policy was not inconsistent with the Human Rights Act of 1998. In short, the charity retained the freedom under Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights to exclude from the association those persons who it believed might ultimately damage its interests. The court's decision is consistent with the three-part test adumbrated above. First, the humane treatment of animals — the clear and unequivocal purpose of the RSPCA — is squarely at odds with the adoption of a policy designed to support blood sport. To prevent the 'capture' of the RSPCA by individuals — and even members — inimical to the associations' core concerns, the RSPCA had little choice but to adopt its chosen exclusionary mechanisms. Second, it seems relatively clear that individuals who wished to press for changes in hunting laws were not prevented from doing so simply because they were not permitted to use the RSPCA as a vehicle for such change. Thus, the exclusion policies are not an affront to any basic principles of justice. Third, it would render the freedom to associate absolutely meaningless if an association founded to ensure the humane treatment of animals was compelled to adopt a policy most often associated with the inhumane treatment of animals.[3]

To the extent that a South African court has engaged the substance of control over membership policies, it has failed to employ a similarly complex set of [1] It is difficult to understand why homosexual status simpliciter should be understood to constitute expression or advocacy. To suggest that it does possess such expressive content, and then to find the status/expression to be of secondary constitutional import, is to suggest that the label 'homosexual' 'is tantamount to a constitutionally prescribed symbol of inferiority.' See Donald Hermann 'Homosexuality and the High Court' 51 De Paul LR 1215, 1223. See also Dale (supra) at 696 (Stevens J dissenting). The US Supreme Court has, in Lawrence v Texas – US — , 123 SCt 2472, 156 LEd 2d 508 (2003)('Lawrence'), found that the right to privacy now protects intimate homosexual relationships. Though there is no necessary consequence of this new-found right to privacy for associational rights, it may mark a shift in the Court's willingness to interrogate more vigorously the rationales behind public and private rules that result in the exclusion of gays and lesbians. Moreover, despite assurances from the Lawrence majority that its decision would not have any necessary consequences for its treatment of other claims by gays and lesbians for equal treatment, at the very least it must go some distance towards eradicating the constitutionally mandated badge of inferiority re-inforced by Dale.

[2] [2002] 1 WLR 448. See also 'Current Survey — Freedom of Speech' [2002] Public Law 355-6.

[3] That said, shifts in policy that identified the culling of herds for the benefit of the wildlife concerned with the putting down of animals in order to spare them pain might fall within the domain of contestable policies consistent with the over-arching purpose of the RSPCA.

criteria. In Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa ['UCB'] [1], the court concluded, simply, that an association 'has the same right as anybody else to resolve not to associate with a third party.' The court was not at all vexed by such questions as whether the grounds for exclusion served a basic policy of the association or whether the membership policy of the association offended basic principles of justice to which our society is now committed. Instead, the court relied upon rather tried, tired and true commitments of the common law to 'freedom of contract'. Harking back to the turn of the last century, the court quoted with approval the holding of the Witwatersrand Local Division in Johnson v Jockey Club of South Africa:

> '(N)o member of the public has any claim against the Jockey Club for damages merely because the club refuses to admit him to any of its privileges or refuses to have anything to do with him. That is also the reason why such an association is entitled, when it receives an application from a non-member, with whom it has no contractual relationship, for membership or permission to use facilities, simply to refuse the application.'[2]

Of course, the South African court could have employed, without fear, a more nuanced approach to the analysis of membership policies on display in Cronje. First, the exclusion policies were connected directly to the goals of the association. The UCB has a direct interest in making certain that its members abide by the rules of the game: throwing games is just not cricket. Second, these exclusion policies are not an affront to any basic principles of justice and certainly not to any reasonably new commitment to equality. Third, the exclusion policies with regard to corruption are not contested aspects of what it means to be a member of the UCB.[3]

South African courts are not likely to be able to simply fall back on the common law in the near future. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair

[1] Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T)('Cronje').

[2] 1910 WLD 136, 140. See also Ricardo v Jockey Club of South Africa 1953 (3) SA 351, 357 (W); Marlin v Jockey Club of South Africa 1951 (4) SA 638, 649 (T); Carr v Jockey Club of South Africa 1976 (2) SA 717, 721 (W).

[3] But see Ward (supra) and Wittmann (supra). Though neither case raises constitutional freedom of association issues directly, both cases uphold the rights of members of an association to challenge their expulsion from a voluntary association. However, in both cases the grounds for reversing the expulsion have more to do with the procedural failure to grant the member a fair hearing, than with some substantive measure of whether the expulsion occurred for some politically or morally reprehensible reason. Indeed to the extent that Wittmann weighs in on the power of an association to terminate membership when the member acts in a manner contrary to the decisions of the association's board and engages in expressive conduct that leads to criticism of the association, it decides that the association does possess such power. While both cases appear to move away from the anachronistic stance of Cronje, one might simply read these two cases as standing for the proposition that a member has vested interests in the club that, at a minimum, require a fair termination hearing. A non-member, on the other hand, possesses no such rights. Read this way, Wittmann, Ward and Cronje seem of a piece. See § 44.3*(c)*(ix) infra.

Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA')[1] has as its stated aim 'the eradication of social and economic inequalities, especially those that are systemic in nature, which were generated in our history by colonialism, apartheid and patriarchy, and which brought pain and suffering to the great majority of our people.'[2] No one escapes the grand sweep of the Act. It binds state actor and private actor alike. All associations — from political to business to social to religious to recreational — fall expressly within its purview. Moreover, should a complainant be able to make a prima facie showing that an association has discriminated on any one of the prohibited grounds stated in the Constitution and the Act, then that association will have the burden of demonstrating that the discrimination is justifiable.[3] The Act goes even further. It presumes that any discrimination on grounds analogous to those found in section 9 of the Constitution is unfair. Associations are now on notice. The time when a right to exclude was presumed to be legal is over.

(d) Association and Dissociation

For reasons already assayed under the headings of 'the correlative', 'the constitutive' and 'capture', the right to associate must include the right not to associate with third parties.[4] The right to dissociate — as a specific feature of the more general right to associate — tends to be asserted in three primary settings.

In the first setting, an association with a clear raison d'etre — i.e., collective bargaining or professional oversight[5] — also takes up a more controversial agenda — political mobilization around issues unrelated to the association's organizing principle. A union may decide that its members not only have an interest in legislation related directly to workers' rights but also to a whole host of other social issues. Some courts may recognize a right to dissociate with respect to

[1] Act 4 of 2000 (Act 52 of 2002 as amended).

[2] Ibid at Preamble.

[3] For more on the content of the Act and its interplay with s9, Equality, and s10, Dignity, of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') see Cathi Albertyn, Beth Goldblatt and Chris Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (2001); Gretchen Carpenter 'Equality and Non-Discrimination in the New South African Order' (2002) 65 THRHR 177,183-185; Anton Kok 'Motor Vehicle Insurance, The Constitution and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act' (2002) 18 SAJHR 59; Anton Kok 'The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act: Why the Controversy?' (2001) TSAR 294; Grete Vogt 'Non-Discrimination on the Grounds of Race in South Africa — With Special Reference to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act' (2001) 45 J of African Law 196; Marius Pieterse 'The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000: Final Nail in the Customary Law Coffin?' (2000) 117 SALJ 627. See also § 44.2*(b)* infra.

[4] See Law Society of the Transvaal v Tloubatla 1999 (11) BCLR 1275, 1280-1281, [1999] 4 All SA 59, 66-67 (T)

[5] See Society of Advocates of Natal v De Freitas and Another 1997 (4) SA 1134 (N); De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal 2001 (3) SA 750 (SCA), 2001 (6) BCLR 531 (SCA); De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal 1998 (11) BCLR 1345 (CC); General Bar Council of South Africa v Van der Spuy 1999 (1) SA 577 (T). These cases reflect, by my lights, uncontroversial examples of compelled association of members of regulatory bodies. See discussion at § 44.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

'ideological union expenditures not directly related to collective bargaining.'[1] Other courts might find ideological union expenditures unrelated to collective bargaining to be justified on the grounds that it promotes internal union democracy as well as a fostering of union participation in broader political debates.[2] Similarly, a professional regulatory body — a law society or a medical association — may elect to conduct political activities not directly related to its regulatory function. Again, a court could take the view that fees for activities unrelated to the associations primary purpose may not be mandatory. Or a court might just as well conclude that as long as the compulsory membership in a regulatory association does not restrict the membership from disagreeing with the association's views, then neither the right to associate (or to dissociate) nor the right to expression is being infringed.[3]

In a second setting, an association, as a creature of statute, may force individuals to engage in activities in which they would prefer not to participate. In Chassagnou v France, farmers with relatively small holdings were forced by law to become members of municipal hunting associations and to transfer hunting rights over their land to these hunting associations and their members.[4] The European Court of Human Rights held that the forced association contemplated by French law violated the right not to belong to an association and the right not to be compelled to join an association fundamentally at odds with a person's convictions.

---

[1] See, eg, Abood v Detroit Board of Education (1977) 431 US 209, 97 SCt 1782. This 'fair share' doctrine is articulated in a long line of cases beginning with *International Associational Machinists v Street (*1961) 367 US 740, 81 SCt 1784; Ellis v Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks 466 US 435,104 SCt 1883 (1984); Chicago Teachers Union v Hudson (1986) 475 US 292, 106 SCt 1066; Communications Workers of America v Beck (1986) 487 US 735, 108 SCt 364; Lehnert v Ferris Faculty Association 500 US 507, 111 SCt 1950 (1991). Cf Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v Virginia (1963) 377 US 1, 84 SCt 1113; United Mine Workers v Illinois Bar Association 389 US 217, 88 SCt 353 (1967); United Transportation Union v State Bar of Michigan 401 US 576, 91 SCt 1076(1971). These three cases stand for the principle that associations have the right to litigate in the interests of itself and individual members even where the primary aims of the association are not at stake.

For a current overview of US federal and state case law engaging forced association, as well as federal and state anti-discrimination statutes, see Kevin Francart 'No Dogs Allowed: Freedom of Association v Forced Inclusion: Anti-Discrimination Statutes and Their Applicability to Private Organizations' (2000) 17 Thomas Cooley LR 273. For a nuanced account of dissociation, see William Marshall 'Discrimination and the Right of Association' (1986) 81 Northwestern University LR 68. Few commentators argue that the freedom of association embraces an absolute right to dissociate. But see Thomas McGee 'The Right to Not Associate: The Case for an Absolute Freedom of Negative Association' (1992) 23 University of Western Los Angeles LR 123.

[2] See, eg, Lavigne v OPSEU (1986) 33 DLR (4th) 174. Three judges in Lavigne held that the right to associate does not include the right to dissociate. Another judge held that non-collective bargaining political positions do not implicate the right to dissociate because there is too attenuated a relationship between the union dues paid by the member and political positions ultimately adopted by the unions. The dues could not, on this reading, be accurately characterized as coerced association. See also Association of Professional Engineers of Saskatchewan v SGEU (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 694 (Compulsory dues not compelled association, merely condition of employment, and employment not coerced). For more on the Canadian rejection of the fair share doctrine, see Steven Thorncroft 'Compulsory Payment of Union Dues — Use for Collective Bargaining and Non-Bargaining Purposes' (1992) 71 Canadian Bar Rev 153.

[3] Morrow v State Bar of California (1999) 188 F3d 1174.

[4] Chassagnou v France (2000) 29 EHRR 615 (Application Nos 25088/94).

In a third setting, political entities may attempt to coerce participation or agreement. Indeed, political entities may attempt to use the language of voluntary association in order to mask repressive politics. In Communist Party of India (Marxist) v Bharat Khumar, the Indian Supreme Court held that the calling of a bundh inevitably violated the constitutional rights of community members who did not wish to participate in a political event, while the calling of a hartal – peaceful mass action based on the principles of passive resistance – did not.[1] The predictable result was that instead of calling for a bundh, political organizations began calling for a hartal. In Kerala Vyapari Vavasayi Ekopana Samithi v State of Kerela, the Court found that the Communist Party's call for a hartal was simply a call for a bundh by another name and thus an unconstitutional infringement of the associational rights (including the right not to participate in political activities) of the citizens of Kerela.[2] Closer to home, Commercial Farmers Union v Minister of Lands, Agriculture And Resettlement, Zimbabwe and Others supports the recognition of a constitutional right to disassociate in the context of coerced political participation.[3] The Zimbabwe Supreme Court held that the forced attendance of farmers and farm-workers at meetings organised by the local ZANU (PF) branch violated the right of freedom of association guaranteed by s 21 of Zimbabwe's Constitution.

44.2 Grounds For and Models of Infringement

As some of the aforementioned cases suggest, associational freedom is not an unalloyed good. Associations have their dark sides. They may pursue ends that threaten the well-being of society or some of the individuals therein. They may gain a monopoly of power over an area of social life that enables them to dictate the distribution of goods associated with that sphere of social life and preclude others from the pursuit and receipt of such goods. They may be sufficiently insular and exclusive that their mere existence reinforces prevailing prejudices. The state may wish, in such circumstances, to interfere with the freedom to associate in order (a) to secure the safety of society, (b) to realize substantive equality, (c) to promote tolerance, and (d) to facilitate greater political participation.[4]

State intervention in the service of these three ends is likely to take one of four forms: (1) an outright banning of the association on the grounds that its professed aims and current practice threaten a well-ordered society, or more profoundly, the continued existence of the free, democratic and constitutional order itself; (2) a requirement that the association open up its membership to include all interested members of society on the grounds that membership exclusivity is inconsistent with the overridingly important goal of equality; (3) a requirement that the internal organization of certain associations must conform to basic democratic principles; and (4) a requirement that an association refrain from coercion.

[1] 1998 AIR 184 (SC).
[2] 2000 AIR 389 (SC) ('Kerela').
[3] 2001 (2) SA 925 (ZS), 2001 (3) BCLR 197 (ZS).
[4] As it happens, these four ends are largely of a piece with the civic equality principle recently articulated by Amy Gutmann in Identity in Democracy (2003).

(a) Banning

The banning of certain criminal associations per se is unlikely to generate controversy.[1] Controversy is only likely to be aroused when the government seeks to ban political or expressive associations.[2] Certain democratic states — fighting democracies such as Germany — believe that banning is a legitimate response to associations that aim to undermine or destroy the state's free and democratic constitutional order.[3] However, even these fighting democracies are highly circumspect in employing such a drastic measure. They generally require very clear evidence of a concerted effort to destroy the constitutional order before they will impose a ban.[4] Such an evidentiary requirement is rarely satisfied in well-ordered and stable democracies.

(b) Equality and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA') [5]

A more likely form of state interference is the requirement that certain associations open themselves up to a wider potential membership because they control

[1] But see below, § 44.3*(b)*, for a lengthier account of the argument that most criminal associations are per se unconstitutional, Professor Haysom's critique of my position and my reply.

[2] I am not suggesting that bannings of non-political associations should not engage the court. Given this country's history, all laws criminalizing association should be carefully scrutinized. Apartheid legislation clearly infringed everyone's general freedom to associate. See, eg, the Group Areas Act 41 of 1950 (compelling black, white, Indian and coloured South Africans to live separately); Separate Amenities Act 49 of 1953 (required aforementioned groups to use separate public facilities); Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act 55 of 1949 (denying individuals the freedom to choose a sexual partner or spouse). The abuse of law to proscribe political association was particularly profound in the Apartheid era. In 1950 the National Party Parliament passed its first major piece of anti-political association legislation—the Suppression of Communism Act 44 of 1950. This Act was successfully employed for more than twenty-five years to suppress almost all opposition to Apartheid. Over the next thirty years Parliament passed numerous pieces of legislation delegating to the executive relatively unfettered powers to silence any association deemed a threat to the State. See, eg, Unlawful Organisations Act 34 of 1960 (ANC and PAC were banned on the grounds that 'they seriously endangered the safety of the public [and] the maintenance of the public order'); Prohibition of Foreign Financing of Political Parties Act 51 of 1968 (Act prevented new opposition from forming by cutting off foreign funding); Internal Security Act 74 of 1982 (in terms of the emergency regulations passed under the Act, the Minister could, without giving notice or hearing to anyone, prohibit all the activities of an association). In light of this repressive history, great caution should be exercised before resort is had to the banning of any political entity.

[3] Article 9(2) of the Basic Law (Grundgesetz) reads: 'Associations, the purposes of which conflict with criminal laws or which are directed against the constitutional order . . . are prohibited.' See BVerwG 1954 NJW 1947 (prohibition of FDJ—communist youth movement—declared constitutional). Cf Brandenburg v Ohio 395 US 444, 89 SCt 1827 (1969) (First Amendment values—and by implication association—permit Ku Klux Klan to articulate virulently racist and anti-semitic beliefs and do not allow the state to proscribe advocacy of force to effect political, social or economic change save where advocacy will produce imminent lawless action.)

[4] For a discussion of this question in relation to the status of subversive advocacy, see Gilbert Marcus & Derek Spitz 'Expression' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz and Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition RS5 1999) Chapter 20 ('Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition)').

[5] Act 4 of 2000 ('PEPUDA').

access to important social goods. As we noted above, PEPUDA does just that. But the Act goes further. The Act makes equality per se an overridingly important goal. A requirement of equality because an association provides access to a particular set of social goods and a requirement of equality because a society believes all individuals and groups are entitled to substantively equal treatment will likely generate different outcomes.[1] PEPUDA makes equality a trump and the distribution of social goods a subsidiary concern.

This conflation of instrumental and ideological grounds for egalitarian intervention is only one reason that PEPUDA is likely to meet resistance and inspire a host of challenges based upon associational freedom. It will meet such resistance because, as I have argued above, control over membership policies and internal affairs goes directly to the heart of associational freedom.[2] Membership policies

[1] For example, a group of Xhosa gay and lesbian activists might wish to participate in a Xhosa Heritage Day Parade. The organizers may balk — on the alleged ground that homosexuality is not part of Xhosa heritage. It may be hard to identify a clear set of social goods to be secured through participation in a parade. If so, then equality per se is the only grounds for state intervention to ensure Xhosa gay and lesbian participation as gays and lesbians. Should it be sufficient? It is a close call. After all, it is likely that the only thing motivating the exclusion of these activists is prejudice. If there is no clear connection between the purpose of the parade and the basis for the exclusion, then the exclusion seems harder to sustain. What if it were an Easter Sunday parade? The connection of religious belief to the parade would place religious belief — as it currently stands – squarely at odds with a basic political commitment to equality. The Act does not seem to recognize (1) the distinction between wanting equality for instrumental reasons — the access to social goods — and (2) wanting equality for purely ideological reasons — wanting equality for equality's sake. In the US, anti-discrimination laws reach deep into the private realm but not in so all-encompassing, so totalizing a manner as PEPUDA. Thus, when the US Supreme Court heard Hurly v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston ['GLIB'] (1995) 515 US 557, 115 SCt 2338 ('Hurly') and had to adjudicate the claim by GLIB to allow them to be included in Boston's annual St. Patrick's day parade, it faced a bit of a quandary. The Court had to decide whether a largely recreational associational activity with largely recreational benefits could justifiably exclude any group it so desired. Instead of facing squarely the legitimate ends of recreational activity for associational life or the value of GLIB's egalitarian claims, the US Supreme Court hid behind the alleged expressive content of the parade and the alleged fit of that expressive conduct with the parade organizer's exclusionary practices. GLIB was the only such group excluded. A rightly decided Hurley might have held that where no link could be established between the association's purpose and its practice, then the State might exercise a presumption in favour of intervention on the grounds of equal treatment and respect.

[2] To the extent that membership policies are about exclusion, the freedom of association must be understood include a correlative freedom not to associate. The US Supreme Court has recognized the freedom not to associate or to dissociate. See Abood v Detroit Board of Education 431 US 209, 97 SCt 1782 (1977) (dissenting employees possess a right to refuse to associate with respect to ideological expenditures not directly related to collective bargaining). A more difficult question is when, if ever, the freedom to dissociate implies a right to discriminate. See Norwood v Harrison 413 US 455, 93 SCt 2804 (1973) ('Invidious discrimination may be characterized as a form of exercising freedom of association protected by the First Amendment . . . [but] it has never been accorded affirmative constitutional protection'). The US case law seems to suggest that two general classes of association may discriminate: expressive associations and intimate associations. See NAACP v Alabama 357 US 449, 78 SCt 1163 (1958) (expressive associations protected); Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479, 85 SCt 1678 (1965) (right to privacy and intimate associations protected). However, where association is neither expressive nor intimate, the right to dissociate and discriminate may fall before some important state interest. See Roberts (supra) at 615; Rotary Club (supra); City of New York (supra). The Canadian Supreme Court appears split on whether the freedom to associate includes a freedom to not to associate. Lavigne v OPSEU [1991] 2 SCR 211, 81 DLR (4th) 545. It has, however, never endorsed a right to discriminate. European Convention of Human Rights jurisprudence appears equally divided on the subject. See Young, James & Webster v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 38.

and internal affairs are, after all, about how the association chooses to constitute itself.

Because the membership policies and the organization of internal affairs are often critical — though not necessarily essential — to an association's identity, one must be aware that laws which force a change in these policies may alter the essential character of that association. If one believes that political pluralism, cultural diversity, individual autonomy and social upliftment may be threatened by forced changes in associations' membership criteria, then one might want to give some associations the power to police their boundaries and thereby prevent the capture of the association by individuals or groups who might wish to change the association's aims. That is, one may wish to give the individuals and groups whose lives are substantially shaped by the associations of which they are a part, or who invest significant resources and effort in the maintenance and creation of particular kinds of enterprises, the power to police the membership of the organization in order to ensure that it remains true to its founding tenets. The question then is: When, or under what conditions, is an association entitled to exercise its right to determine its membership criteria free from external intervention? Or conversely: When might society's commitment to equality trump an association's control over its membership criteria?

PEPUDA would appear not to engage directly the complicated cluster of issues raised by conflicts between equality and association. Associations are mentioned briefly in the schedule to s 29: an illustrative list of unfair practices in certain sectors.[1] They would also seem to be engaged in s 27. This section requires that companies, partnerships and clubs develop 'equality plans'.[2]

[1] See the schedule for s 29 of PEPUDA, especially Item 10. It reads, in pertinent part, as follows: Clubs, Sport and Associations:

(a) Unfairly refusing to consider a person's application for membership of the association or club on any of the prohibited grounds.

(b) Unfairly denying a member access to or limiting a member's access to nay benefit provided by the association or club . . .

It doesn't take an especially discerning eye to see how little intrinsic merit associations are believed to possess by the drafters of PEPUDA when they are lumped together with — and indeed follow — clubs and sport. Of course, the mention of both clubs and associations may have been intended to ensure that PEPUDA is understood to cover all associations — and, in particular, such notoriously discriminatory entities such as business clubs or golf clubs. See also Item 9 of the Schedule: Provision of Goods, Services and Facilities.

[2] See s 27(2) of PEPUDA. These 'equality plans' must be fleshed out in the regulations to the Act. Section 25(4)(b) reads, in relevant part, that 'preparing equality plans [must take place] in the prescribed manner.' These regulations remain to be promulgated. Section 26 does not contain this qualifier. Courts could step in and decide what an 'appropriate' (section 26*(a)*) equality plan would be.

Despite the paucity of express references, PEPUDA poses an imminent threat to associational freedom.[1] That it does so is especially evident from Sections 13, 14(2) and 14(3). Section 13 reverses the evidentiary burden. Once the complainant makes out a prima facie case, the evidentiary burden shifts to the respondent to show that its discriminatory actions are fair.[2] Section 14(2) and (3) set out the conditions that must be met by the respondent in order to show that the discrimination is fair. Section 14(2) states the test a respondent must meet to discharge his, her, their or its burden. It reads:

> In determining whether the respondent has proved that the discrimination is fair, the following must be taken into account:
> a. The context;
> b. The factors referred to in subsection (3);
> c. Whether the discrimination reasonably and justifiably discriminates between persons according to objectively determinable criteria, intrinsic to the activity concerned.

Section 14(3) lists a host of factors to be considered by the Court when making its determination. They are:

a. Whether the discrimination impairs or is likely to impair human dignity;
b. The impact or likely impact of the discrimination on the complainant;
c. The position of the complainant in society and whether he or she suffers from patterns of disadvantage or belongs to a group that suffers from such patterns;
d. The nature and the extent of the discrimination;
e. Whether the discrimination is systemic in nature;
f. Whether the discrimination has a legitimate purpose;
g. Whether, and to what extent, the discrimination achieves its purpose;
h. Whether there are less restrictive means and less disadvantageous means to achieve the purpose;
i. Whether or to what extent the respondent has taken such steps as being reasonable in the circumstances to —
   (i) address the disadvantage which arises from or is related to one or more of the prohibited grounds or
   (ii) accommodates diversity.

[1] PEPUDA will be dealt with at length in Janet Kentridge 'Equality' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition) (supra). See Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roederer (supra) for an extensive commentary on the Act and Cathi Albertyn, 'Equality' in Cheadle et al (supra) ('Equality') §4, 118 - 121 for a brief discussion of the Act.

[2] I am grateful to David Zeffertt for his patient explanation of PEPUDA's evidentiary burdens. Any remaining errors in analysis are mine alone. It must be said that the burden reversal is largely of a piece with our constitutional equality jurisprudence.

For those who might wish away all traces of discrimination violently re-inscribed by Apartheid and subtly re-inforced by traditional ways of life[1], nothing could appear more reasonable than the tests laid out in ss 14(2) and (3). But some of the most obvious constructions of the tests are not reasonable. Section 14(2) may appear to provide the kind of ill-defined and gymnast-like flexibility of a standard South African constitutional balancing test — context, factors, reasonableness and justifiability. Section 14(2)(b), however, takes us to s 14(3). Subsections 14(3) a–e and h–i are read by some commentators to load the dice in favour of the complainant. The alleged discrimination can simply detrimentally affect the complainant personally — b — and need not impair the complainant's dignity. The actual position of the complainant may actually be of less importance than some set of ascriptive features of the complainant — c. The inquiries in h and i place the burden squarely on all associations to find less restrictive and disadvantageous means of realizing their ends and further require all associations to address historical disadvantage and to accommodate diversity. Failure by an association to take factors a–e or h–i seriously, in advance of litigation, could lead to changes in an association's structure that go well beyond the kinds of actions that might have justified the discrimination in question.

Although, on this construction of the Act, the analysis in ss 14(2)(b) and 14(3) may tilt sharply in favour of the complainant, some solace would appear to be on offer from s 14(2)(c). Section 14(2)(c) looks a bit like a limitations test. It relies upon the respondent's capacity to explain the discrimination in terms of objectively identifiable criteria linked clearly to the association's purpose. Reasonable enough. But that is not how Professors Albertyn, Goldblatt, Roederer and their collaborators read s 14(3).[2] 'Objectively identifiable criteria' is another way of saying that the differentiation may not be on 'prohibited grounds' of discrimination under the Act. 'Intrinsic to the activity concerned' means that the respondent 'must demonstrate an indispensable causal link between the 'objectively identifiable criteria' and the activity.'[3] Consider the authors' example:

[1] Apartheid is the rightful punching bag for much of South Africas current ills. Apartheid is the unabated source of untold suffering. Apartheid squandered the enormous wealth of this country. But to ascribe to Apartheid all patterns of disadvantage must be false. What it certainly did do – and still does do – is arrest South Africa's development. Of course, one could argue that from the perspective of the pursuit of an egalitarian society, it does not matter what the starting point is, only that we get there. That may be true. But that level of abstraction is not the primary departure point for most justifications of egalitarian measures. It is the history of radical inequality that justifies the current pursuit of equality.

[2] Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roederer (supra) at 46 — 48. This subsection was added to the Act in order to meet some of the concerns of the insurance and the banking industry. These industries were concerned that 'commercial differentiation' would fall foul of the Act. Earlier drafts of the Bill attempted to distinguish between discrimination and differentiation. Insurance companies wanted a complete defence. Human rights groups did not want any defence at all. The subsection is perhaps best read as an inelegant attempt to ensure that 'commercial discrimination' is more likely to be found fair than unfair.

[3] Ibid at 47 (emphasis added).

> Assume that a black waiter, with twenty years experience, is turned down in favour of a waiter of Chinese origin (with two years experience) for a job at a Chinese restaurant.[1]

Given the relatively equal experience and the potentially pertinent difference in origin (and one is led to assume language), one could be forgiven for reaching the conclusion that is just the kind of situation in which discrimination may be fair.[2] Not so. Or not so fast. First, the mere fact that race plays a role – and objectively identifiable criteria means no prohibited grounds such as race may 'feature' in the differentiation — makes it look like unfair discrimination. Second, since 'intrinsic to the activity concerned' means 'must demonstrate an indispensable causal link between the "objectively identifiable criteria" and the activity',[3] the respondent is placed in the position of having to demonstrate that choosing the Chinese waiter is a necessary pre-condition for the restaurant's continued existence. That is simply impossible. Thus, what looks at first blush like a mechanism for taking into account the interests of the association turns out to be anything but.

In fairness to the authors, they make an effort to drag s 14(2)(c) back from the brink by holding that this subsection's requirement of reasonableness and justifiability means that all the factors in s 14(3) — they say s 14(2)(b) which is just to say s 14(3) — come back into play. That is to say that we can count the factors twice if we so choose.[4] This double counting is supposed to save the Chinese waiter. Somehow, the alleged need to maintain the illusion of authenticity — in the face of de jure discrimination and a very dispensable causal link — may be a factor that tips the analysis back in favour of 'fair discrimination'. But as I have argued above, it hard to see how an authenticity predicated upon the prejudices of the non-Chinese world can be used to save bias that is not an absolutely necessary

[1] Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roedever (supra) at 46.

[2] The authors employ a very faulty set of intuition pumps. Ostensibly, 20 years of experience invariably trumps 2 years of experience. With respect to waiters everywhere, and as a former member of the fraternity/sorority, I am not convinced that the learning curve remains all that steep after two years. Secondly, the choice of a Chinese waiter for a Chinese restaurant draws on an odd sociological/psychological phenomenon. It is designed to get us to buy some 'Sandton Square is really a Tuscan piazza' sort of authenticity. (Which, perversely, is exactly how the authors find their way to justifying the discrimination.) One would think that the only legitimate grounds for choosing the Chinese waiter would be actual use of a common language in the restaurant – knowledge of the language being an integral part of communicating with the kitchen and/or other staff – or that the waiter comes from the community — here or elsewhere - of which the owners and the other employees are a part — links to the community being one of the ways in which the restaurant sustains itself. Otherwise, the grounds for justification are our pre-existing prejudices based upon race.

[3] Ibid at 47.

[4] Though this approach may lack analytical precision, it does echo the Constitutional Court's equality jurisprudence. See President of the Republic of South Africa and another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41; Harksen v Lane NO and others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC).

pre-condition for the restaurant's survival. The only real arguments ought to be the need of the restaurant to draw on Chinese staff in order to run the restaurant effectively. Unfortunately, the authors have so narrowly construed the meaning of s 14(3)'s other components that this argument becomes impossible to make.[1]

The difficulties with the construction of s 14 proffered by Professors Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roederer only reinforce more general concerns about the consequences of PEPUDA for associational life.[2] But suppose we bracket the discussion of the conflict between equality and association as it plays itself out in PEPUDA. That does not mean we give associations, and any attendant discriminatory policies, a free ride.

At a minimum, any association wishing to justify exclusion on grounds expressly recognized as discriminatory, or grounds analogous to those expressly recognized as such, will have to engage the tests of discrimination already built up by the Constitutional Court.[3] An association is likely to have to discharge the burden of showing: (1) a rational connection between its discriminatory policy and the association's ends and (2) that where such a rational connection exists, that the ends of the association are worth maintaining despite the discrimination inherent in its membership policies.

(c) Democracy

A third form of government interference will involve attempts to require political associations — and perhaps other associations — to structure their internal

[1] More desirable constructions of s14 are available. As the Constitutional Court has recently pointed out in De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) and others, an apparent statutory imperative that a Court must consider the factors laid out in a statute does not mean that they must do so in a mechanical fashion or that they may not take other considerations into account. CCT5/03 (15 October 2003). This canon of statutory construction could result in a PEPUDA test for discrimination that achieves a nuanced assessment of associational and egalitarian concerns. For example, s14(2)(c) could accord great weight to an association's ability to demonstrate how a discriminatory practice serves the association's purpose. Even the inevitable double counting of factors has a potentially benign explication. The Constitutional Court determines the impairment of the complainant's fundamental human dignity and whether it ultimately amounts to an impairment of a sufficiently serious nature in much the same manner. See President of the Republic of South Africa and another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41. See also Arthur Chaskalson 'Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193.

[2] These concerns about PEPUDA are bolstered by the Act's treatment of hate speech. The Act goes far beyond the Final Constitution's prohibition on the advocacy of hate speech to proscribe any speech act 'that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention — (a) to be hurtful; (b) to be harmful' on any one of the seventeen prohibited grounds or analogous grounds. PEPUDA, s10.

[3] For the test for discrimination generally see, eg, Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC); Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC). For excellent general discussions of the requirements of equality analysis see Cathi Albertyn, 'Equality' in Cheadle et al SA Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (supra) § 4; Johan De Waal, Iain Currie and Gerhard Erasmus, 'Equality' in The Bill of Rights Handbook (2001) § 9; Janet Kentridge, 'Equality' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition) (supra) § 17.

affairs in a more democratic and egalitarian fashion.[1] Here the basic question is to what extent the state's interest in the integrity of a democratic process and a democratic society justifies the infringement of a political party's associational right to order its affairs as it wishes. If you start from the premise that political parties and associations are largely 'private orderings' created to pursue private ends, then the state will have to go some distance to demonstrate its need to meddle.[2] If, on the other hand, your departure point is that political parties and associations are essential for a functioning representative democracy, then you would argue that party structures must be democratic in order to serve democracy and that any deviation from democratic principles in the party's internal affairs must themselves be justified.[3]

A party must likewise refrain from commandeering the apparatus of the state in order to discipline members of the party. It seems especially critical that where, as in South Africa, a single party controls the most important levers of power, that the same party must not be able to use that power in order to further the interests of a faction within the party. What justifies the state's intervention within party politics to ensure democratic processes also justifies the prevention of the state's interference with party politics in order to undermine democratic processes.

[1] Efforts at democratization of associational structures need not be limited to political parties. One can equally imagine legislative attempts to democratize shop floors and corporate boardrooms. See Martin Brassey and Carole Cooper 'Labour Rights' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition) (supra) § 30. See also Catherine O'Regan 'Possibilities for Worker Participation in Corporate Decision Making' 1990 Acta Juridica 113. However, as noted at § 44.1*(c)*(iv) supra, the entrance to and voice of an association may not be democratic simply because democracy may be inconsistent with the very goals and values of the association. Should religious associations be democratised? To what end? On the other hand, a national chess federation that distributes public goods in a game of skill might be susceptible to intervention that requires both non-discrimination and some form of democratic rule by those who possess a sufficient familiarity and proficiency in the game.

[2] US case law tends to support a 'liberal' view of political parties. Tashjian v Republican Party of Connecticut 479 US 208, 107 SCt 544 (1986) (statute barring independent voters from participating in Republican Party primaries violated the Party's 'First Amendment right to enter into political associations with individuals of its own choosing'); Democratic Party of the United States v Wisconsin 450 US 107, 101 SCt 1010 (1981) (Wisconsin law requiring delegates to vote in compliance with results of the state's open primary violates the Party's associational right to choose its delegates as it sees fit). See also Eu v San Francisco County Democratic Central Committee 489 US 214, 109 SCt 1013 (1989); Cousins v Wigoda 419 US 477, 95 SCt 541 (1975). But see Marchioro v Chaney 442 US 191, 196, 99 SCt 2243 (1979) (upholding Washington law requiring that the major parties have a state committee with two representatives from each county on grounds that a state's interests in conducting elections in a 'fair and orderly fashion is unquestionably legitimate').

[3] The German Basic Law expressly recognizes that the integrity of political parties and the integrity of the democracy of which they are a part are inextricably linked. Article 21(1) states, in relevant part: 'The political parties shall participate in the forming of the will of the people. They may be freely established. Their internal organization must conform to democratic principles.' The rules which govern the internal order must meet the democracy requirement in the following ways: (1) rules must specify that party issues are reserved for resolution at membership meetings; (2) members must be able to participate actively and on an equal basis in the decision-making process; (3) free expression of opinion must be possible at membership meetings; (4) the will of the majority must prevail; (5) the party rules must provide for the formation of the party structures from the bottom up; (6) the executive must answer to the general membership at general meetings; (7) exclusions from the party may not be arbitrary.

Finally, the state's interest in opening up political associations flows from considerations of involuntariness. If our citizenship or membership in a given state is largely involuntary and exit is difficult if not impossible, then our capacity to leave a given set of political institutions is by necessity limited. The involuntariness of our political associations makes its incumbent upon the state to create meaningful avenues for political participation. Without such avenues — and the franchise is insufficient — the citizenry are no better than hostages (however benign their caretakers).

The state's interest in the democratic process may also take the form of exclusionary rules. The state may prevent members of the police force, the security forces, the civil service and other government employees from direct participation in the affairs of political parties and electoral politics.[1] The reason for such exclusion is two-fold. First, in countries such as South Africa, the police and security forces have, historically, been actively involved in the suppression of political activity at the behest of the state. A newly formed democratic state may, therefore, have a substantial interest in demonstrating that the police and security forces are no longer tools of repression nor vehicles for the realization of state policy by untoward means. Exclusion of police and security force members from politics demonstrates the commitment of the state to the impartial enforcement of the law, the willingness of politicians to bow to the electorate's desire for democratic change and the recognition that the de-politicization of the security forces fosters a culture in which the military does not see itself as having an interest in particular political outcomes. Second, the exclusion of civil servants and other government employees from direct political activity — running for office and canvassing for votes — serves the state's interest in not having the electorate view the government as serving the narrow interests of a given political party.[2] Moreover, it prevents individuals and groups from using the apparatus of the state — say the postal system — to serve the ends of a particular political party.

(d) Coercion

It would seem relatively uncontroversial to argue that the State will be entitled to interfere in associational life where members of an association are clearly coerced into participation. The difficulty with coercion as a justification for the infringement of associational freedom lies not with those actions that constitute physical abuse. It is rather with those situations in which even the most limited choice appears impossible, but necessary, to exercise. With children, one difficulty with such intervention is that we generally give parents a great deal of autonomy with respect to the manner in which they raise their children.[1] With adults, one difficulty is the paternalistic presumption that government can substitute its judgment of what is best for that of its citizenry. Inquiries into non-physical coercion of children and adults are united by considerations of exit.[2] One must take great care, however, when we interfere in associational life that we are not too quick to allow attributions of 'false consciousness' to masquerade as concerns about the inability of children or adults to vote with their feet.

[1] See FC s199(7); South African Police Force Act 68 of 1995, s 46. The Act's and the Constitution's limitations on political association by members of the police force are assayed in § 44.3*(c)*(vii) infra in the context of Van Dyk v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit, Case No. 4268/2002 (TPD 29 April 2003, Du Plessis J).

[2] But see, eg, Vogt v Germany (1996) 21 EHRR 205 (ECHR held that the State had a legitimate interest in ensuring an unbiased civil service. However, the dismissal of a civil servant — in this case a secondary school teacher — for her refusal to resign from the German Communist Party (DKP) constituted a violation of her right to association and a sanction disproportionate to the aim pursued).

44.3 Association Analysis

(a) Determining the content of the right[3]

(i) Within the Ambit

This chapter has identified four basic grounds for associational freedom: the correlative, the constitutive, capture and dissociation.[4] It has also identified a unifying theme: social capital. The question at this stage is: how does each of these underlying justifications enable us to determine the content of the right and those associations that might thereby claim its protection?

By the correlative, we mean that that though there exist independent justifications for the freedom, associational freedom is often most powerfully justified by

[1] See Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) ('Christian Education'). The Constitutional Court said that parents had no constitutional right to raise their children however they might like. However, the judgment, while denying the right of teachers to dole out corporal punishment in schools, assures parents that they still possess that same privilege within the home. Another example, as suggested to me by Danie Brand, makes the problem — and the resolution — of non-physical coercion of children a bit clearer. Imagine a summer camp established for white children only. Racist beliefs are inculcated by their adult counsellors as a matter of course. Imagine also that all South African children have access to summer camps so that no child is denied access to this particular good. The reason that the state would be justified in interfering in the voice, if not the entrance, of this camp is that the state has an interest in the creation of citizens who treat other citizens with equal concern and respect. This problem raises invariably a related problem of inculcating exclusive religious beliefs in children. A potentially acceptable justification for a difference in outcome is that the Constitution clearly contemplates religious freedom and religious education. A failure to treat discriminatory religious doctrines differently from racial supremacist doctrines would have the inevitable consequence that the state could interfere with the construction of the most basic tenets of many religions. It might mean that the state would be free to police public and private schools, as well as religious institutions, to ensure that children were not exposed to doctrines that gave clear preference to one set of religious practices because one deity is to be preferred over another. However, while the grounds for interfering with the non-physical doctrinal coercion of children are the same for both religion and race, the centrality of religious life in South Africa makes any significant state interference in the inculcation of religious supremacy unlikely. See the discussion of religious associations at § 44.3*(c)*(viii) infra.

[2] See S v Jordan (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force and others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC)('Jordan').

[3] FC s 18 reads: Everyone has the right to freedom of association.

[4] See § 44.1 supra.

reference to other constitutional guarantees.[1] With respect to some kinds of association — newspapers, parties and black empowerment entities — the correlative rights — expression, political rights and equality — may be deemed so foundational for our constitutional politics that no recourse need be had to the right of association itself. However, other associations — churches, corporations, traditional communities — may be sufficiently peripheral to our constitutional politics that the correlative rights — religion, trade, property and cultural rights — might be strengthened or reinforced by reference to association.[2] Of course, this second correlative position assumes that associations actually provide goods in [2] See the discussion at § 44.1*(a)* supra. That associational rights are often buttressed by reference to other rights is evident in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC). The Constitutional Court was asked to determine the constitutionality of a provision of the Defence Act 44 of 1957 which prohibits members of the armed forces from participating in public protest action and from joining trade unions. The court held that prohibiting participation in acts of public protest infringed the right to freedom of expression of SA National Defence Force members and that prohibiting SANDF members from joining a trade union infringed the constitutional right of 'every worker' 'to form and join a trade union'. As Justice Sachs noted in his concurring judgment, implicit in the court's decision was the conviction that freedom of association entitled SANDU members to form a body that could publicly articulate their collective concerns and that would look after their collective economic interests. See also Mohamed Chicktay 'Mission Impossible: Trade Union and Protest Action Rights in the Military: South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence' (2000) 16 SAJHR 324.

[2] The Constitutional Court often deploys rights simultaneously in the service of its arguments — and it often describes rights as interdependent and symbiotic. In Khumalo v Holomisa, the Court twinned privacy and dignity in support of personality rights in a suit for defamation. 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC). In Christian Education (supra), the mutually reinforcing rights of religion and culture were deemed to be in conflict with, and ultimately subordinate to a constellation of equality, dignity, freedom and security of the person and children's rights considerations. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice the Court, in finding the common law criminalization of sodomy a violation of the right to dignity, wrote: '[I]t is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society.' Moreover, the court argued, 'the rights of equality and dignity are closely related, as are the rights of dignity and privacy'. 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) ('NCGLE I') at paras 28-30. The language echoes Justice Ackermann's emphasis in Ferreira v Levin, on the inextricable link between dignity and the need for individual freedom from state intervention: 'Human dignity cannot be fully valued or respected unless individuals are able to develop their humanity, their 'humanness' to the full extent of its potential. Each human being is uniquely talented. Part of the dignity of every human being is the fact and awareness of this uniqueness. An individual's human dignity cannot be fully respected or valued unless the individual is permitted to develop his or her unique talents optimally. Human dignity has little value without freedom; for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.' 1996 (1) SA 984, 1013-1014 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). Individual freedom — negative liberty — thus becomes the foundation for dignity. Dignity, in turn, becomes the basis for equality. As the Court writes in Prinsloo v Van der Linde: 'In our view unfair discrimination [the linchpin of equality analysis] principally means treating people differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, who are inherently equal in dignity'. 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC). And if the interdependence of and reinforcement between individual freedom and dignity and then equality is still not clear, the Court, in President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo writes: '[D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society. . . [E]quality means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of their differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative some sense independent of their dominant feature. As I have argued, they clearly do. Social capital. If the associations in question do not provide social capital, or do not serve constitutive attachments, or do not create either real or figurative senses of ownership, then they probably are not worth protecting. But then again if they are not worth protecting, the likelihood is that no one will be fighting for them.

By the constitutive, we mean that: (1) associations are integral to self-understanding, and there can be no self without the host of associations that give the self content; (2) associations are necessary for social cohesion, and are the indispensable settings for meaningful action. This two-fold recognition is meant to give us pause before we decline to grant any association some minimal level of constitutional protection.[3] For the purposes of associational rights analysis, the two dimensions of the constitutive prompt two obvious questions: Is the association in question important for individual and group identity? Is the association the setting for meaningful action? Most associations — certainly any worth trying to get into or remaining a part of — must be so. The deep background considerations that a court should keep in mind when considering challenges to associational freedom are two-fold. First, the court should be quite wary of supplanting an association's preferred vision of the good life with one of its own or that of a democratically-elected majority. Second, and perhaps more importantly, a court must be take great care before it opens up, interferes with or dismantles existing associations. Such interventions must be carefully calibrated to preserve existing social capital at the same time that the imperative of transformation grants access to that capital and its concomitant opportunities.[4]

By capture, we mean that in order for most associations to function as associations, they must possess some degree of control over who belongs to the association and some degree of control over the ends the association pursues.[5] So long as the association as currently constituted possesses a figurative and/or real sense of ownership, so long as there is real social capital at stake, a court must cede to the association some significant level of control over entrance, voice and exit.[6]

By dissociation, we mean that individuals must also be free to not to associate with others: whether it be through forced acceptance, forced membership, or distinctions that treat certain people as second class citizens' 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) For further analysis of the relationship between equality and dignity see C Albertyn 'Equality' (supra); Susannah Cowan 'Can Dignity Guide Our Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34; David Liebowitz and Derek Spitz 'Dignity' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition) (supra) § 17; Susannah Cowan and Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition) (supra) § 36.

[3] See the discussion at § 44.1*(b)* supra. Some exceptions to that rule are discussed at § 44.3*(a)*(ii) infra.

[4] This defence of associational freedom might strike some as a conservative brake on transformation. It is not. This chapter is, rather, a simple attempt to point out what is at stake in association cases.

[5] See the discussion at § 44.1*(c)* supra.

[6] Again, this is not a license to discriminate. While the demonstration by an association of some link between its exclusionary policies and its varied purposes may be sufficient for prima facie constitutional protection, the state may still have compelling reasons to alter those policies and thus justify intervention in the association's internal affairs.

forced financial and ideological support.[1] Courts may be less inclined to find that negative associational freedom mirrors positive associational freedom. Compelled political association is clearly out of bounds. No one may be forced to participate in a political activity or a cause in which they do not believe. However, a court may find that obligatory membership in a union or law society does not mean that political or social action taken by such an entity — against the wishes of a member – constitutes the kind of coercion that merits constitutional intervention. How much coercion a court may be willing to tolerate will likely vary according to a court's assessment of the association's contribution to the vibrancy of our democracy or the necessity of the forced association for some compelling public interest.

(ii) Without the ambit

The eclectic grounds for associational freedom should strongly suggest that there are few kinds of association which enjoy no constitutional protection.[2] Given the freedom's wide protective ambit, it is perhaps more appropriate to ask what kinds of associations clearly do not serve the values which animate the freedom and should not, therefore, enjoy any constitutional protection. Two candidates suggest themselves: criminal associations and associations which directly threaten the constitutional order.

Criminal associations arguably fall outside the clause's protective ambit because they do not help to realize a rich and varied civil society or any of the macro-social ends which flow from such a society. While one should not wish to underestimate the positive contributions of some subversion for social growth and social capital, or even for personal identity, we would be on safer ground arguing that criminal associations actively undermine the open and democratic society to which the Constitution aspires.[3] Similarly, while criminal associations may aid certain subversive forms of self-realization, these forms of self-realization cannot be safeguarded without threatening the rule of law and a democratic constitutional order. Thus, the failure to realize either positive social ends or acceptable forms of self-realization justify the categorical exclusion of criminal associations from the freedom's protective ambit.

This approach is open to the criticism that by excluding criminal associations from the protection of the freedom we suppress artificially the very sort of question the Constitution requires the court to ask, namely: is the criminal statute in question unconstitutional on the grounds that it violates the freedom to associate? There are four possible responses to the problem.

[1] See the discussion at § 44.1*(b)* supra.

[2] Of course, it goes without saying that every action, including my writing alone in a room in anticipation of you reading this text, involves a form of association. It would however be absurd to conclude that every such association warrants some level of constitutional protection.

[3] It is one thing to admit that a certain type of crime is desirable or necessary, because the costs of any attempt at perfect enforcement are both too high and highly likely to be over-inclusive. It is quite another, and quite wrong, to argue that criminal associations are therefore entitled to any constitutional protection.

The first is the most compelling. One obvious distinction is between those associations that advocate a change in the criminal law and those associations whose aim is the pursuit of criminal ends. It should be uncontroversial to claim that associations that simply seek to alter the law through the political process in order to de-criminalize a certain form of behaviour are entitled to constitutional protection. It should be equally uncontroversial to claim that associations whose aim is the pursuit of criminal ends are not — as a general matter — entitled to such protection.

Our analysis of per se excluded criminal associations could stop there. And nothing much would be lost. That said, the threshold test for criminal associations need not always entail a mechanistic application of the existing criminal law to the association in question. What counts as a criminal association excluded from the protection of the freedom may be the subject of a more subtle discrimination by the court as to which criminal associations definitely do not and cannot serve the values underlying the freedom and which criminal associations might just serve those values.

Even if the criminal association which we wish to see protected did not survive under a more subtle threshold test, it is more than likely that the association in question could find solace elsewhere. The associations which warrant constitutional protection are almost invariably protected by some other constitutional right.

Finally, we could, quite mistakenly, reject a wholesale categorical exclusion for criminal associations. Under this last and least desirable option, we would then be faced with the choice of excluding criminal associations from the ambit of the freedom on an ad hoc basis or affording all criminal associations prima facie protection and then deciding whether restrictions on the association's freedom are justified under the limitation clause.[1]

[1] In his otherwise very generous account of my previously articulated position on associational freedom, Nicholas Haysom accuses me of adopting a loose definition of criminality that forecloses 'any examination of the type of criminality or the reasons why the type of limitation or violation of the right is justified' (presumably by some law). Nicholas Haysom, 'Association' in Cheadle et al South African Bill of Rights (supra) at 255. Professor Haysom's objections are just those recognized in the second and third responses to excluding criminal associations from the protected ambit of the right. As I argue in this text, as well as the text to which Professor Haysom has referred, where it is difficult to identify in advance those criminal associations which should not receive prima facie judicial solicitude, then the state may rely on the limitation clause to vindicate its claims. However, for reasons that have to do with maintaining a meaningful distinction between rights analysis and limitations analysis, we should be wary about collapsing all 'ambit of the right' examinations into the justificatory framework of the limitation clause. Professor Haysom also worries that I have somehow collapsed the distinction between the criminal association and the individuals engaged in the criminal association. With respect, I fail to see the sting — or the fruit – in this line of criticism. For example, Professor Haysom wonders about the ability of members of a banned organization to meet — and therefore to associate — in order to contest the banning of their association. Without splitting too many logical hairs, the purpose of the two associations

Failure to effect acceptable forms of self-realization, the furtherance of group identity or the accretion of social capital also justifies the categorical exclusion of associations that directly threaten the constitutional order. Our judicious approach to exclusions suggests that only those organizations which possess the military capacity to subvert that order and which have demonstrated clearly their intent to use that capacity ought not to enjoy constitutional protection.[1] This rule draws a distinction between associations that merely advocate the government's overthrow — which deserve at least prima facie protection — and associations that demonstrate through military preparation and action that they are bent on non-peaceable governmental change. The former deserve at least prima facie protection under both freedom of expression and freedom of association. If these associations are going to be restricted, then the government must be able to justify the restriction under the limitation clause.

(b) Limitations on the right

(i) The Complex Character of the Analysis

If many associational rights are buttressed by other constitutional rights, then the nature of the limitations review they receive will, in substantial part, be contingent upon the level of constitutional importance accorded the buttressing right. As a result, varying degrees of protection will exist for different kinds of associations. Political associations will receive a high level of judicial solicitude. But intimate associations, if buttressed by dignity, or cultural associations, if buttressed by religion, might also receive equally significant constitutional protection. Economic associations may not receive the highest level of protection, buttressed as they are by property rights or economic activity rights. However, the mere fact that other constitutional imperatives support economic associations suggests that they will receive greater judicial solicitude than associations that lack such correlative support.

Even this rendering of the scrutiny afforded associational rights does not capture the truly complex character of the analysis. On closer inspection we see that is different. The first set of members of the banned associations are pursuing the ends of the banned association. The second set of members of the banned association are simply pursuing a legal case or a political strategy regarding the status of the association. Though the members of the two sets might well be identical, the ends of the two associations are not. Thus, the latter 'association' is protected while the 'former' is not. Indeed, Professor Haysom's point about the common law and its control of criminal conspiracies makes this very point. Ibid at 255.

[1] Article 9(2) of the German Basis Law provides that an association may be dissolved if it threatens the democratic constitutional order of the state. However, as Gerrit Pienaar has suggested: 'This does not mean that organizations may not criticize the government or constitutional order, but that violent aggressive negation of and attempts to destroy the democratic, constitutional order are factors which may lead to the prohibition of the organization.' 'Freedom of Political Association in South Africa, Germany and USA' 1993 TSAR 233, 238.

the success of the state in providing justifications for its interference may not necessarily correlate with the level of protection afforded the association by reference to some other provision in the Bill of Rights. Some highly protected associations may be very susceptible to state intervention. On the other hand, some associations that receive little express judicial solicitude may be less likely to be interfered with justifiably.

At first blush this result seems counter-intuitive, if not contradictory. However, the result begins to make sense when one recalls that the proportionality of a limitation does not depend solely upon the value of the associational interest asserted, but also depends upon the importance, intensity or weight of the interest offered as justification for the limitation. Thus, the public nature of the functions fulfilled by political associations not only legitimises the higher level of protection offered to them but also serves as the justification for significant state interference with such associations. Conversely, although associations which serve few if any public or quasi-public functions may not be deserving of any special degree of constitutional protection, they are less apt to be the object of state interference because the state possesses fewer compelling reasons to interfere in their affairs. The more public goods distributed by an association or the more public its function, the more likely it is to be subject to legitimate state intervention.[1]

(ii) Grounds for Limitation

Many of the grounds for limiting the right to associate have been covered in § 44.2. None is without controversy. Banning a political association in a state committed to openness and democracy must be reserved for only the clearest and most imminent threats. Altering the internal affairs of an association in order to make them more democratic can be justified most readily when the association serves quite directly the ends of our democratic state. Intervention in an association's affairs to prevent coercion is warranted when the coercion of a member is physical. It is less clearly so when the coercion straddles the line between false consciousness and a sense that the person in question may have nowhere else to go. Egalitarian concerns raise the most complex and contentious set of issues. At a minimum, a court should show limited tolerance for membership criteria that both discriminate against individuals and groups in ways wholly unrelated to the ends of the association and offend the basic rules to which a society is committed.

[1] But as I suggested above in § 44.1, a crude public/private distinction fails to account for the array of goods any given association might distribute. Though one might associate political parties or universities with public goods, we would be missing a large part of the picture if we failed to account for the many different kinds of good such an association provides. Likewise, classically intimate associations — such as the family — may be the setting for a similar range of goods. Children, for example, as future citizens are a public good and the state has an interest in their preservation and their education.

Where appropriate, a court might likewise be on solid ground in rejecting claims of associational autonomy where existing by-laws of an association both discriminate unfairly against individuals and groups and preclude the association from a natural or spontaneous evolution into an organization that pursued a somewhat modified set of ends.[1] It would be one thing — and potentially a good thing – for the courts (or the state) to use such egalitarian concerns to intervene in the affairs of an entity that controls the distribution of important public goods — a business, a university or a political party. It would be quite another thing — often a bad thing — for the courts to intrude on those associations where such goods are not the primary goods at stake — a religious institution, a small social club or a family gathering.

The pertinent grounds for enforcing the right and limiting the right will vary from associational context to associational context. The discussion below looks at how the competing justifications play out in different settings and in the constitutional case law already on the books.

(c) Analysis in context

(i) Political associations

There are at least two likely situations in which the interest behind the restriction a political organization's associational freedom.

The first situation is one in which the state wishes to alter the internal affairs of political parties. Generally, the state will attempt to justify its interference by arguing that the close nexus between political parties and the state requires intervention in the party's internal affairs to ensure that the party serves its representative function in a representative democracy. For example, in some jurisdictions representative democratic politics demands that the members of political parties elect the candidates of their political party to represent them in elections.[2]

[1] This three-fold analysis works in the opposite direction as well. Associations with a tight fit between purpose and exclusion, which do not offend our basic political commitments and which create space for dissent and change go some distance towards the potential burden of state intervention.

[2] In Germany, for example, Article 21 of the Federal Electoral Act requires that candidates for federal elections be elected by a meeting of the members, or a representative group of such a meeting, or the permanent representation of such meeting.

The Constitutional Court has yet to be drawn into a discussion of what democracy actually requires. In United Democratic Movement v President of the RSA and Others 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) ('UDM'), the Court held that while floor-crossing legislation must comply with constitutional requirements, it was not unconstitutional per se. Cf De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)(High Court held that a suspension of a member of Parliament for contempt constituted a denial of democratic rights to participation). To the extent that the floor-crossing legislation did not clearly violate rights of participation and association, the Court was quite right not to interfere with minor changes to the political edifice. However, as I have argued above, given the involuntariness of our basic political associations, it is quite fair to hold the state to a much higher standard in ensuring that the capacity for political association is real and the capacity of such associations to be heard is meaningful.

The second situation is one in which the state attempts to open up restrictive party membership policies. The state might argue that democracy requires that political demands are made by representative groups of interested individuals. On this account, political parties or associations which excluded individuals on the basis of race, creed, colour, sex, sexual orientation or some other invidious characteristic would not be representative.[1] The compelling counter-argument is that in cases where the discrimination and exclusion actually serves the expressive ends of the association — and where state intervention would alter those expressive ends — then we may wish to permit expression to trump the state's interest in representivity and equality.[2] Though perhaps unpalatable, this position is entirely consistent with the notion that associational freedom demands that we give associations the power to police their membership in order to ensure that the association remains true to its founding tenets.

The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act might be understood to require a commitment, by all those exercising state or public power, to realize the ends of substantive equality and articulate policies designed to redress discrimination.[3] Such a statutory imperative could be used to ensure that persons who have historically been denied access to the levers of political power be able to belong to the political party of their choice and to participate meaningfully in that party's deliberations.[4]

The crisp question is: does the Constitution permit racially exclusive parties? The answer this analysis suggests is a qualified yes: to the extent that all citizens can still participate meaningfully in the affairs of state. However, where racially exclusive political practices actually impair democratic deliberation and participation, the answer should be no.

[1] See Smith v Allwright 321 US 649, 64 SCt 757 (1944) (Democratic Party rule barring blacks from participating in primaries declared unconstitutional on grounds that election of Democratic candidate would legitimate the racially discriminatory and unrepresentative practices of the party); Terry v Adams 345 US 461, 73 SCt 809 (1953) (political association which determined Democratic Party nominations and discriminated against blacks violates right to vote).

[2] See William Marshall 'Discrimination and the Right of Association' (1986) 81 Northwestern University LR 68.

[3] See ss 25, 26 and 27 of PEPUDA.

[4] How far the Constitutional Court will go in this area is unclear. The decision in UDM can be read as a demonstration of a reasonable reluctance by the Court to interfere in the co-ordinate branches considered judgment about what counts as multi-party politics and representative, participatory democracy. Or it can be read as a very technical judgment that abjured any unnecessary judgments about matters not squarely before the Court. However, the US Supreme Court, in an opinion that could reflect meaningfully on the extent to which the courts should intervene in party politics, held that state laws that prohibited 'fusion candidates' (candidates running under the banner of more than one party) could not be said to unduly burden third party candidates. Timmons v Twin Cities Areas New Party (1997) 520 US 351, 117 SCt 1364. The effectiveness of fusion candidates is an empirical matter — and it is not clear if or how they help third parties — but the Court's decision demonstrated a marked deference to the state's choice to limit how parties are organized, who they choose to represent them and, effectively, to stack the electoral odds in favour of the two major parties.

(ii) Intimate associations

With associations that are supported by some other constitutional right or imperative, distinctions are rarely made between state regulation of the association's goals and state regulation of the association's a means of achieving those goals. Consequently, the degree of protection afforded the association is often derived from the constitutional protection for the association's objective. This conflation of goal and means is hardly problematic with respect to intimate associations. The intimate associational goal and its means are inextricably linked. As a result, intimate associations normally receive the strong constitutional protections that flow from rights to privacy, human dignity and equality.

If we take sexual congress or traditional partnerships as the paradigmatic examples of intimate association, there appear to exist few good reasons for state regulation or interference.[1] Few public goods seem to be at stake. Moreover, considerations of identity, constitutive attachment, capture and social capital strongly militate against interference. Where equality is an issue, it usually cuts against, and not in favour of, traditional forms of state intervention. As NCGLE I and NCGLE II illustrate, the Constitution is committed to sexual orientation equality.[2] In NCGLE II, the Constitutional Court found that failure of the Aliens Control Act to include permanent same sex life partners in its definition of married person violated s 9(3) of the Constitution.[3] In NCGLE I, the Constitutional Court found that the common law offenses of sodomy and statutory provisions criminalizing homosexual acts violated both the right to equality and the right to privacy.[4] These express commitments to equality and to privacy

[1] US case law on state interference with intimate association has been inconsistent, if not incoherant. Compare Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479, 85 SCt 1678 (1965) (striking down law impairing private heterosexual relations) with Bowers v Hardwick 478 US 186, 106 SCt 2841 (1986) (upholding law impairing private homosexual relations). However, in the recent case of Lawrence v Texas — US –, 123 SCt 2472, 156 LEd 2d 508 (2003) ('Lawrence'), the US Supreme Court has now found that homosexuals possess the same rights to privacy as heterosexuals. In addition, the US Supreme Court has, in Roberts v United States Jaycees 468 US 609, 104 SCt 3244 (1984) ('Roberts'), and its progeny, identifed four relatively useful criteria for determining whether an association qualifies as an intimate association: (1) small size, (2) private purpose, (3) selectivity of membership, and (4) insularity of the group. Read together Lawrence and Roberts should buttress the claim that homosexuals and heterosexuals possess the same kind of intimate associational rights. But see Shahar v Bowers (1997) 114 F3rd 1097 (11th Cir. 1997)(Allowing state attorney to withdraw offer of employment upon learning that offeree intended to enter into a homosexual union.) For a general discussion of this case see Shane Wetmore 'Shahar v Bowers: The Eleventh Circuit's One Step Forward, Two Steps Back' 30 U Toledo LR 159. The express protection for sexual orientation under s 9 of the South African Constitution should trump any arguments from state-enforced morality that homosexuals are not entitled to make use of the same legal institutions as non-homosexuals.

[2] NCGLE I (supra) (Common law offence of sodomy and statute criminalizes homosexual acts found unconstitutional). National Coalition for Gay And Lesbian Equality And Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000(1) BCLR 39 (CC) ('NCGLE II') (Failure of definition of married person in terms of s 25 of Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991 to include same sex life partners found unconstitutional); For more on the incoherence of the Court's jurisprudence on sexual associations, see § 44.3*(c)(x)*. See, expecially, S v Jordan and Others (Sex Workers Education And Advocacy Task Force And Others As Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC) ('Jordan').

[3] NCGLE II (supra).

[4] NCGLE I (supra).

undermines directly the state's attempt to restrict intimate homosexual relationships.[1] Moreover, they suggest that little, if any, room exists for denying homosexuals use of the same legal institutions and arrangements on offer to non-homosexuals.

However, not all intimate associations are partnerships based upon sexual union. Many intimate associations are nuclear and extended family structures.[2] Despite the constitutive nature of intimate familial attachments and such buttressing rights as privacy, religion or language and culture, plenty of potentially good reasons exist for state intervention.[3] First, children are usually not in any position to protect their interests or even determine those interests. Second, the state has an interest in making certain that its future citizens are in a position to discharge their responsibilities to the state and to others. At a minimum, the state has a clear interest in making certain that the protection of the intimate association of the family is not a cover for abuse or neglect.

[1] See S v H 1995 (1) SA 120 (C) and S v Kampher 1997 (4) SA 460 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1283 (C) (Common-law or statutory offences which proscribe private homosexual acts between consenting adult males cannot survive constitutional scrutiny). Although the court's view in Kampher was grounded on the prohibition against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation contained in the equality provision of the Interim Constitution, the protection of intimate association entrenched in the right to privacy also applied. The application of these other provisions of the Bill of Rights to an intimate association underscores the argument that associational rights are frequently buttressed by other constitutional rights.

[2] The US Supreme Court is inclined to protect intimate family household structures against state intervention, but permit state intervention where a household does not possess the requisite level of insularity and selectivity. Compare Moore v City of Cleveland (1976) 431 US 494 (Striking down zoning laws because they struck too deeply into well-protected sphere of domestic autonomy) with Village of Belle Terre v Boraas (1973) 416 US 1 (Upholding zoning laws because rationally related to legitimate state interest and household of college friends did not constitute an intimate arrangement deemed worthy of constitutional protection).

[3] The Constitutional Court has demonstrated a willingness to extend the definition of the family in order to protect basic constitutive attachments. See Du Toit v Minister of Welfare and Population Development 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC)('Du Toit')(Court held that lesbian partners in a long-standing relationship had successfully challenged the constitutional validity of various sections of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 and the Guardianship Act 192 of 1993 on the ground that the Acts only provided for the joint adoption and guardianship of children by married persons only); Booysen and others v Minister of Home Affairs and another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)('Booysen')(Foreign national spouses seeking to work in South Africa successfully challenged statutory provision requiring that they apply for a work permit while outside the country and barring them from re-entry until permit issued); Dawood, Shalabi and Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs 2000(3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) ('Dawood') (Constitutional Court found constitutionally infirm provisions of the Aliens Control Act that regulated the circumstances in which foreign spouses — especially the poor – of South African residents were allowed to reside temporarily in South Africa pending the outcome of their applications for immigration permits.) All three cases turned on a finding that the dignity of the family unit was impaired. As O'Regan J writes in Dawood: 'It cannot be said that there is a more specific right that protects individuals who wish to enter into and sustain permanent intimate relationship than the right to dignity in s 10. There is no specific provision protecting family life as there is in other constitutions and in many international human rights instruments.' Ibid at paras 35 – 37. The learned judge is wrong in two respects. First, association must, in fact, be that more specific provision of the two provisions. It possesses a much more circumscribed ambit than dignity. Second, many other jurisdictions do rely upon freedom of association to protect intimate associations.

The knottier question is whether the state is entitled to ensure that children receive the best possible outcome.[1] Both the minimalist and maximalist approach recognize that children are not the sole property of their parents. The minimalist approach seems to recognize actual harm, perhaps only actual physical harm, as grounds for intervention. The 'best interest of the child' test, as manifest in the Constitution and the case law, would seem to demand more. But how much more? The maximalist approach, while taking children very seriously, runs the risk of not being able to find a suitable environment for children outside a family structure. The Constitutional Court has recognized both the importance of the family structure and its limits. It has intervened to support parental relationships with children born out of wedlock and the adoption of children by non-citizens.[2] On the other hand, it has suggested that corporal punishment within the home is constitutionally permissible and that families with children are not entitled to any special treatment vis-a-vis emergency housing.[3] Its decisions have thus far steered a path between minimalism and maximalism.[4]

(iii) Cultural associations

To the extent that cultural associations confine themselves to bona fide cultural activities, they should be relatively immune to state intervention.[5] By permitting

[1] See Troxel v Granville (2000) 530 US 57, 120 SCt 2054; In re Custody of Smith, 969 P2d 21 (Wash. 1998). The US Supreme Court affirmed the Washington Supreme Court declaration that the statute that enabled non-custodial relatives to secure visitation rights was unconstitutional as a violation of the custodial parents right to be free from state intrusion so long as the children were not subject to actual harm. See also David Herring, 'Troxel and the Rhetoric of Associational Respect' (2001) 62 U. Pitt. LR 649.

[2] See Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)(Court finds that unwed fathers in non-Christian marriages entitled to same rights of access as other fathers); Minister of Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (7) BCLR 713 (CC).

[3] Compare Christian Education (supra) (Children may not be subject to corporal punishment in private schools; but Court finds that same such punishment may occur within the sanctity of the home) with Government of the Republic of South Africa and others v Grootboom and others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) reversing in part Grootboom v Oostenberg Municipality and Others 2000 (3) BCLR 277 (C)(High Court held that vulnerability of children supports — in terms of s 28(1)(c) — decision to put municipality on terms to produce shelter for those families in desperate need; Constitutional Court reverses, in part, and finds no independent claim under s 28(1)(c), only a general claim to housing under s 26.) See also Angelo Pantazis and Adrian Freeman 'Children's Rights' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition) (supra) Chapter 47.

[4] As I have already discussed at § 44.2(d) supra, coercion in the context of intimate familial associations is not the sole province of children. It seems trite, but still worth noting, that when faced with physical coercion, the rights of women to freedom and security of the person, to freedom from servitude, to equality and to dignity all trump any and all benefits that might accrue from sustaining traditional ways of life that re-inscribe such abuse. Female genital mutilation and forced labour are obvious candidates for the trash-heap of history. But polygamy and lobolo? It is easy — and in most cases quite right — to identify such practices with the continued subordination of women. Women are chattel. The more difficult question is whether such practices can be reconfigured so as to sustain legitimately both intimate familial associations and cultural practices.

[5] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill Of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC). The Court held that s 32*(c)* of the Interim Constitution permitted communities to create schools based upon common culture, language and religion. It further held that IC 32*(c)* provided a defensive right to persons who sought to establish such educational institutions and that it protected that right from invasion by the State. It did not, however, confer on the State an obligation to establish such educational institutions. Ibid at para 7.

communities to create schools based upon a common culture, language or religion, the Constitutional Court in *Gauteng School Education Bill e*xpressly recognized the importance of such constitutive attachments and associations for both individual and group identity (and implicitly endorsed their importance for maintaining social cohesion and conserving social capital). However, the High Court in Laerskool Middelburg v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys has quite correctly added the corollary that the right to single-medium public schools does not and cannot automatically trump the right of all public school students to education in the official language of their choice.[1]

If a cultural association can demonstrate that its discriminatory membership policies legitimately help to preserve a community's cultural life, then the associational right to determine membership should trump most other interests.[2] As the High Court in Wittmann v Deutscher Shulverein, Pretoria and Others reasoned, the right

[1] But see Laerskool Middelburg en 'n ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys, en andere 2003 (4) SA 160 (T). The Court was clearly troubled by the conflict between the right to a single-medium school and the right to be educated in the official language of one's choice. In deciding that the 'minority' students must be accommodated, the Court correctly concluded that the right to a single-medium public educational institution is clearly subordinate to the right which every South African has to education in a similar institution and to a clearly proven need to share education facilities with other cultural societies. The Court seems to be on far shakier grounds when it suggests that it is an open question as to whether the exercise of one's own language and culture was better furthered where provision was made in a school for the exclusion of other cultural societies or not. Moreover, it quite wrongly argued that a claim to a single-medium institution was probably best defined as a claim to emotional, cultural, religious and social-psychological security. This trivializes the desire to maintain basic, constitutive attachments. It seems clear that the desire to sustain a given culture — especially a minority culture, as Afrikaaner culture now is – is best served by single medium institutions that reinforces implicitly and expressly the importance of sustaining the integrity of that community. As a result, the Court must also be wrong, if not terribly confused, when it claims that the conversion of a single-medium public institution to a dual-medium school cannot per se diminish the force of each ethnic, cultural and linguistic communities claim to a school organized around its language and culture. Ibid at 173A/B - F/G. That is, with respect, exactly what the conversion to a single medium per se does.

[2] Three of the Roberts (supra) intimate association criteria could help to identify protected cultural groups: (1) cultural purpose, (2) selectivity of membership, and (3) insularity of the group. The last criterion is, however, somewhat problematic. The US Supreme Court's thinking seems to have been driven by successful litigation undertaken by Amish and Native American groups. The peripheral contact of mainstream society with these groups leads the Court to the conclusion that group insularity itself is what warrants protection. But it is hard to see why withdrawal ought to animate our thinking about which cultural groups are entitled to protection. Cultural groups are entitled to protection whether they participate actively in the affairs of the commonweal or not. First, the South African polity takes great pride in its diversity. It would be perverse to penalize direct contributions to South Africa's rich cultural tapestry. Second, most cultural groups are sufficiently small that their control over their own cultural destiny is relatively limited. Thus, whether the group is insular or not is unlikely to affect their control over the levers of political power.

At least part of what underwrites cultural autonomy claims is the belief that cultures themselves have a right to survive. See, eg, Charles Taylor 'The Politics of Recognition' in Gutmann (ed) Multiculturalism and the Politics of Recognition (1996) 57, 61. ('More societies today are turning out to be multicultural, in the sense of including more than one culture that wants to survive'). With regard to the force of such claims in South Africa, the injustices of Apartheid and colonial rule are so legion as to make them impossible to ignore. However, righting the wrongs of a long legacy of violence, theft, forced removal and the often all too real cutting out of the mother tongue does not give cultural autonomy claims an automatic trump over other claims in a democratic society.

Two points need be made here. First, cultures are not entities that remain static over time. (They evolve both spontaneously and self-consciously.) A defense of cultural autonomy then is a call to support key features of a culture — say language — that makes the culture's survival in some form possible.

to maintain a private German school educational institutions based upon culture, language or religion is predicated upon the capacity to exclude non-speakers, non-believers or non-participants.[1] This rationale is entirely consistent with justifications for associational freedom based upon constitutive attachments and capture. One cannot maintain either group identity or the institutions that support that identity if everyone has access to, a claim upon and some control over the property and workings of an association. Moreover, the state's interest — and anyone else's interest – in equality here is rather weak. The goods provided by such associations are far less public than those provided by political and economic associations and that are legitimately subject to far greater state control.[2]

Occasionally, however, the Constitution's compelling interest in equality may justifiably outweigh the values served by particular intimate and cultural associations. The status of polygamous unions raises such a conflict.[3]

That said, the link between culture, social capital and hard capital throws up a most complex set of problems. Communities often support financially other members of their community. Quite often the access to capital comes with terms extraordinarily favourable to the borrower. How should we treat such standing cultural compacts? Such culturally-based economic arrangements are easily subject to charges of bias. That goes without saying. The question is: what can we do about it? Neither outlawing such funds nor opening them up is likely to have the desired outcome. In either case, the fund goes underground or out-of-existence. Unlike banks, whose aim is the bottom line and who profess to serve the broader public, these rotating capital funds are designed, most often, to support members of the community in need or in need of backing to start a business. The aim is the strengthening of community life. To the extent that the Second, the spontaneous growth of culture suggests that what we, in democratic societies, wish to protect is not culture per se, but the rights of individuals qua members of a community to participate in various cultural practices. Only if individuals wish to continue to participate in cultural practices — with the requisite state support — does it even begin to make sense to talk of cultural survival. If no one wants to continue to speak Sepedi, it would certainly count as a loss. But it could hardly be said to amount to an injustice.

[1] 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T). But see Matukane and others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T)(Court found that discriminatory entrance policies based upon language and culture (read race) violated the right to equality of the complainants and could not be justified on the grounds of cultural, minority or associational rights).

[2] See Wisconsin v Yoder 406 US 205, 92 SCt 1526 (1972) (Amish parents permitted to educate their children at home); Pierce v Society of Sisters 268 US 510, 45 SCt 571 (1925) (Catholics allowed to educate their children in private school); Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez 436 US 49, 98 SCt 1670 (1978) (prohibiting undue state interference with Native American tribal autonomy). Santa Clara Pueblo is a perfect example of the double-edged sword of cultural autonomy. Pueblo women contested the traditional and quite discriminatory manner of treatment they endured under the governing Pueblo political council. The Court upheld the autonomy of the council against the equality claims of the female petitioners on the grounds of Pueblo political sovereignty.

[3] See, eg, Kalla & another v The Master & others 1995 (1) SA 261 (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79 (T). In Kalla the issue raised, but not decided, was whether the freedom of religion guaranteed by s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution afforded recognition to potentially polygamous unions according to Muslim rites. The issues raised by the case pertain, however, not only to religious freedom but also to freedom of association. In the absence of PEPUDA, one might have argued that such unions ought to enjoy prima facie constitutional protection. Whether PEPUDA reverses the 'burden' and grants prima facie protection to the party alleging discrimination, the substantive constitutional analysis of such unions, and any potential justification for them, should remain the same.

fund continues to serve such an aim — one that ultimately promotes cultural life and social capital — the grounds for overriding its discriminatory and exclusionary policies and aims are limited.[1]

(iv) Economic associations

Quite a different set of considerations apply to business associations. In most constitutional jurisdictions the state is entitled to place substantial burdens upon economic association.[2] The primary reason is that business associations control the distribution of important social (public) goods and must be subject to rules of [1] But see s 31 of the Final Constitution, Cultural, religious and linguistic communities. It reads as follows: (1) Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may not be denied the right, with other members of that community — (a) to enjoy their culture, practise their religion and use their language; and (b) to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society; (2) The rights in ss (1) may not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights.' Section 31(2) could be construed to preclude all exclusionary and discriminatory policies. But that assumes that all such practices are inconsistent with various provisions in the Bill of Rights, in particular, equality and dignity. The Constitutional Court has made it quite clear that not all discrimination is unfair discrimination. See, eg, *Pretoria City Council v Walker*1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC).

Several possible approaches exist to test the constitutionality of the accretion and distribution of economic capital in cultural collectives.

First, one could permit the accumulation and re-distribution of such capital within the particular community subject to the proviso that such capital could not be used by community members to achieve either dominance or monopoly power with respect to the distribution of social goods — say political power — in non-economic domains. See, eg, Michael Walzer Spheres of Justice (1981). Of course, the policing of the mechanisms for distribution of goods across different spheres is difficult when, in fact, it is possible to identify different criteria for the distribution of such goods and when the spheres themselves overlap.

Second, according to Amy Gutmann's civic equality principle, the acid test for such cultural community-based funds would be whether they still permitted the state to discharge its obligation to provide for: (1) equal citizenship or political participation; (2) equal liberty and (3) equal, basic opportunity to live a preferred vision of the good life. Amy Gutmann Identity in Democracy (2003) 26-27.

Third, one could talk about the entitlements of such cultural collectives in terms of protection or parity, rather than privilege. See Laurence Sanger 'The Free Exercise of Culture: Some Doubts and Distinctions' Daedalus (Fall 2000) 193. Sanger offers a number of justifications for this approach. First, protection rests on the settled judgments of the modern political community. (Sanger's analysis here seems of a piece with Rawls' thesis that an overlapping consensus must underwrite any given liberal democratic society. John Rawls Political Liberalism (1993)). Second, protection or parity avoids the 'normal objection that cultural impulses are being indefensibly privileged over other human concerns.' Ibid at 203. Though Sanger is not particularly clear as to the nature of the indefensible advantage, he appears to be suggesting that cultural formations and practices are often not rationally defensible. That claim cannot be gainsaid. The real question is to what extent cultural practices — and the funds here under scrutiny — can be both immune form rational scrunity and benefit from constitutional protection. At a minimum, we might agree that moral practices that are morally repugnant independent of the cultural predilections of the majority and which cannot offer independent grounds for the continuation — other than 'this is just what we do' — are not entitled to constitutional solicitude. This is quite a minimalist position. The cultural practices that a community under attack is apt to defend is likely to be morally repugnant to the majority, but still capable of justification by reference to widely shared values such as freedom, equality, social cohesion, community, order, virtue, spirituality and tradition.

[2] See, for example, Oostelike Gauteng Diensteraad v Transvaal Munisipale Pensioenfonds en 'n ander 1997 (8) BCLR 1066, 1077G–H (T), where Cameron J rejected an associational challenge under IC s 17 to compulsory membership of a pension fund: '[Ek is van mening] dat die applikant geen aanspraak uiteengesit het wat gekoppel kan word aan 'n krenking van enige reg wat deur artikel 17 omvat word nie. Dit blyk inteendeel uit die stukke dat die assosiasie- kwessie in die huidige geval suiwer 'n finansiële kwessie is, sonder enige verdere dimensie.'

fair play. In addition, where existing regulations strike far into the heart of an association's membership policies or limit the associational choices of an individual, a constitutional attack is more likely to be based upon infringements of the rights to trade, profession or occupation or the right to property.[1]

Two kinds of power exercised by economic associations — practice requirements by legal regulatory bodies and restraints of trade by private businesses — have attracted recent judicial scrutiny. The courts have largely resisted direct constitutional engagement.[2]

Attempts by advocates to gain direct access to the market for legal services have occupied the courts on a number of occasions.[3] In all three De Freitas decisions — in the High Court[4], the Supreme Court of Appeal[5] and the Constitutional Court[6] — the courts gave constitutional challenges to rules barring direct access 'short shrift'.[7] The High Court relies heavily on the traditional rationales for the distinction between the bar and side-bar and holds that the distinction between attorneys and advocates remains manifestly rationale because clients were indemnified with regard to loss of trust money by attorneys but not by advocates. Neither the economic acitivity rights in s 26 of the Interim Constitution nor some notion of the right to associate with clients of one's own choosing on terms of one's own choosing (or not to associate with the Law Society) features in the High Court judgment. The Supreme Court of Appeal judgment likewise does not engage in any serious analysis of either the economic rights or the associational rights raised in De Freitas. Judge Cameron, in a concurring judgment, merely points out that the rules of such regulatory bodies must comply with the constitutional requirements of rationality and non-arbitrariness.[8]

Despite the limited constitutional value of the De Freitas judgments, two High Court cases have recognized at least some of the implications of legal regulatory bodies for freedom of association. In General Council of the Bar of South Africa v Van der Spuy,[9] the High Court contrived a three-part test to measure the compatibility of practice rules with constitutional dictates.[10] The last leg of the test — that

[1] See Dennis Davis 'Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition December 2003) Chapter 54.

[2] For an excellent as well as comprehensive discussion of both constitutional challenges to professional regulatory bodies and to restraints of trade, see Robert LaGrange 'Economic Activity Rights' in H Cheadle et al South African Bill of Rights (supra) at 337, 344-359.

[3] Ibid at 345.

[4] Society of Advocates of Natal v De Freitas and Another 1997 (4) SA 1134 (N)('De Freitas I')..

[5] De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal 2001 (3) SA 750 (SCA), 2001 (6) BCLR 531 (SCA) ('De Freitas III').

[6] De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal 1998 (11) BCLR 1345 (CC) ('De Freitas II').

[7] LaGrange (supra) at 345.

[8] De Freitas III (supra) at 762-763, citing, with approval S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at paras 34-35.

[9] 1999 (1) SA 577 (T) ('Van der Spuy')

[10] The three part test holds that: (1) minimum standards of integrity will be presumed rational; (2) qualification standards must serve the public interest and must be fairly enforced; (3) qualification regulations may not in reality be barriers to entry which prevent a person from practicing in the desired profession.

regulations may not really be barriers to entry masquerading as qualifications — engages the substance of commercial association. In Law Society of the Transvaal v Tloubatla,[1] the High Court concluded the freedom of association includes the right to dissociate. However, because the High Court chose to read the internal limitation of FC s 22(2) into FC s 18, the requirement that a member of the Law Society must possess a fidelity fund certificate to practice did not even amount to a prima facie infringement of the right to associate.[2] The limited scope of the courts' rulings in Van der Spuy and Tloubatla signal that regulations of commercial association, in particular professional association, need only satisfy some minimal level of rationality to pass constitutional muster.

The majority of cases in the area of restraint of trade have largely followed the same form. That is, they have failed to engage directly the Constitution. Where they have done so, they have primarily held that the common law tradition of 'sanctity of contract' reflected in restraint of trade clauses trumps any countervailing economic activity rights or associational rights.[3] Only in Coetzee v Comitis has a court proved bold enough to suggest that a restraint of trade clause must give adequate content to the public policy requirements made manifest in the Constitution.[4] Coetzee echoes Van der Spuy by holding that contractual provisions that act as barriers to entry will be treated as rebuttably unconstitutional. In general, however, for economic associations to engage constitutional imperatives, the economic regulation in question will have to make the desired economic association all but impossible.

(v) Empowering associations

Associations that aim to empower historically disadvantaged groups support the Constitution's commitment to affirmative action and substantive equality. These associations may need to have discriminatory membership policies if they are to be able to police their resources and be in a position to achieve their constitutionally protected objective. When faced with such an association, the state may be hard pressed to show that it has an interest in regulating the membership policies and internal affairs of such an association on racial or gender equality grounds. After all, it is the constitutionally protected goal of realizing real racial

[1] 1999 (11) BCLR 1275, [1999] 4 All SA 59 (T) ('Tloubatla').

[2] I say 'would appear' because it is not clear whether the Court believes that there has been an infringement of the right and because the Court writes that 'one need not consider whether under s 36(1) of the Constitution a limitation of s 18 to provide for the matters in the Attorneys Act is warranted.' Ibid at 66. All the Court does say is that a fidelity fund certificate, like rules regarding admission, conduct, contribution and the like, is deemed to be a normal and acceptable limitation of the right to dissociate in the foreign jurisdictions surveyed by the Court.

[3] See, eg, Waltons Stationary v Fourie 1994 (4) SA 507 (O), 1994 (1) BCLR 50 (O); Kotze v Potgeiter 1995 (3) SA 783 (C), 1995 (3) BCLR 349 (C); Knox D'Arcy v Shaw 1996 (2) SA 651 (W), 1995 (12) BCLR 1702 (W); Gero v Linder 1995 (2) SA 132 (O); Reeves v Marfield Insurance Brokers 1996 (3) SA 766 (A).

[4] 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C) ('Coetzee').

and gender equality through affirmative action that justifies the exclusion in the first place.[1]

However, to pass constitutional muster, the exclusive empowering association should have to demonstrate two things.[2] First, it should have to show that its membership is historically disadvantaged and continues to be disadvantaged. Secondly, it should have to show that the exclusive membership policy promotes the goal of substantive equality.

Neither inquiry is simple. The first question may beg questions of both ongoing disadvantage as well as relative historical disadvantage. Excluded parties could well wind up competing with an exclusive empowering association in an attempt to demonstrate in whose favor the weight of historical disadvantage actually falls. The second question throws up the problem of what counts as an association of historically disadvantaged persons designed to redress various forms of inequality. Is any association of such historically disadvantaged persons insulated from attempts by excluded parties to secure access? Would a black South African only club committed to black nationalism, but not to any clear remedial efforts to eliminate vestiges of apartheid, be entitled to exclude non-black applicants?[3] It might be.[4] But the only acceptable grounds for its exclusionary practices would be those related to expression and not to the constitutionally or statutorily mandated goal of equality. The reason for reliance on expression — and not equality — is clear. The club in question has a primarily expressive purpose. It is not engaged, directly, in empowerment.

(vi) Small social associations

Small social associations, despite the absence of additional direct constitutional support, are unlikely targets for state interference. Empirically, they are unlikely to attract state attention because the state has limited resources and will generally have much larger fish to fry. Secondly, even if the state, or applicants using a civil rights act[5], did wish to challenge such an association, there are few good substantive reasons for the interference. In most instances the small social club will not control the distribution of any important shared, social good. It will simply be

[1] See Cathi Albertyn, Beth Goldblatt and Chris Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (2001) 132 (Alluding to the possibility that a similar justification of discriminatory practices by historically disadvantaged groups will place such associations beyond the reach of the Act.)

[2] See Deborah Rhode 'Association and Assimilation' (1986) 81 Northwestern University LR 106, 108 (exclusionary practices justified only where association actually challenges existing disadvantage.)

[3] See Shawn M. Larsen 'For Blacks Only: The Freedom of Association of Private Minority Clubs' (1999) 49 Case Western L Rev. 359.

[4] See New York City Commission on Human Rights v United African Movement, No. MPA95-0851/PA95-0031 (NYCCHR June 30, 1997) (The Commission held that the exclusion and the harassment of a white woman at a public event sponsored by the UAM amounted to discrimination, warranted compensation, and required that all future UAM events either meet the definition of 'private event' or announce clearly in the media that such events are limited to UAM members. This case stands for the principle that historically disadvantaged groups are not, ipso facto, entitled to discriminate.)

[5] For example, The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.

the setting for friendly human relations. Where the small association serves the 'purely' local and social ends of its members, the state's interest in opening up the membership is 'purely' ideological. Unless we wish to grant the state the power to enforce its ideology at every turn — thus truly raising the spectre of totalitarianism — such purely ideological grounds for interfering in an association's affairs should be rejected.[1]

That a small social club or an informal gathering may not control the distribution of any important shared social good does not mean that it is not the setting for the creation and perpetuation of important social goods. A small neighbourhood chess club informally created by a group of eight year old girls most certainly does enable these girls to build friendships and hone their chess skills. Even if such a club is of limited duration, it is a crucible in which the girls learn about the loyalty such kinship creates and the trust sustained bonds require.[2] Much the same might be said of the 'dinner party' that features so often in discussions about association and exclusion. It must be the case that such arrangements between friends (and acquaintances) allow us to develop the kinds of qualities critical to more general, and more public, social relationships. And lest we think that all associations must either work to achieve justice or provide the setting for the development and refinement of character, sometimes girls just want to have fun. It is an impoverished jurisprudence (of association) that forgets that.

(vii) Security forces

In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence ('SANDU I')[3] the Constitutional Court held that a provision of the Defence Act[4] prohibiting members of the armed forces from participating in public protest action and from joining trade unions violated the members' right to freedom of expression and their right 'to form and join a trade union'. Implicit in the majority's decision — and explicit in Justice Sachs' concurrence — was the notion that SANDU members' freedom of association had been infringed. The question for the court was whether these infringements were justifiable. With respect to the soldier's right to freedom of expression, the court found the provisions' limitations a grave incursion on the soldiers' expressive rights and patently unjustifiable. With respect to [1] See West Virginia State Board of Education v Barnette 319 US 624 at 642, 63 SCt 1178 (1943) ('If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein'). See also Note 'State Power and Discrimination by Private Clubs: First Amendment Protection for Non-expressive Associations' (1991) 104 Harvard LR 1835.

[2] As I have argued above, this kind of loyalty and trust are the pre-conditions for more sophisticated relationships of loyalty and trust as well as the formation and conservation of social capital. Such clubs also provide the constitutive attachments critical for identity formation and social cohesion.

Of course, if this small girls only chess club grew into a large provincial federation — still supported privately — that ran nationally sanctioned tournaments that enabled participants to secure internationally recognized grandmaster points, then some good grounds for state intervention — to ensure equal opportunity — would exist.

[3] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC).

[4] Act 44 of 1957, s 126.

the soldiers' 'right to form and join a trade union', the court rejected the Minister's contention that an infringement of the right was justified by the constitutional imperative to structure and manage the South African National Defence Force ['SANDF'] as a 'disciplined military force'.[1] As the current provision of the Act stood, it was a constitutionally unjustifiable limitation. However, while deciding that the requirement of strict discipline would not necessarily be undermined by permitting SANDF members to join a trade union, the court did note that the structure of a trade union might well differ in a military environment and that appropriate legislation might justifiably limit the scope of a soldier's trade union rights.[2]

In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence ('SANDU II')[3], the High Court was asked to assess the constitutionality of a subsequent set of regulations.[4] The SANDU II Court found that the regulations that specified conditions for peaceful demonstration, prohibited union affiliation or closed shop agreements, barred members from securing union-sponsored legal representation and allowed for withdrawal of union recognition without notice violated SANDU's and SANDF members' rights to collective bargaining (s 23), assembly (FC s 17) and association (FC s 18).[5]

In Van Dyk v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuritait, the High Court held that a police officer was legitimately terminated from his employment because he stood for election as a member of the Democratic Alliance.[6] The officer argued that because his position in the police force — that of a budget analyst – did not require him to engage the public directly, the officer's candidacy could not prejudice the administration of justice or give the appearance of such impropriety.[7] The Court found that the purpose of the South African Police Force Act 68 of

[1] See FC s 199 (7). It reads, in pertinent part: 'Neither the security forces, nor any of its members, may, in the performance of their functions — (a) prejudice a political party interest that is legitimate in terms of the Constitution; (b) further, in a partisan manner, any interest of a political party.'

[2] With that difference clearly in mind, the order of invalidity was suspended for 3 months in order to give the Minister of Defence the opportunity to devise an appropriate regulatory framework for military trade unions.

[3] 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T).

[4] Government Gazette Number 998 (20 August 1999).

[5] At the time of writing, the SANDU II High Court's orders of invalidity awaited confirmation by the Constitutional Court.

[6] Case No. 4268/2002 (TPD 29 April 2003, Du Plessis J). While on the police force from 1995 to 1999, Van Dyk had represented the Freedom Front on the Greater Pretoria Metropolitan Council (GPMC). In 2000, Van Dyk switched to the Democratic Alliance and openly ran for a seat on the GPMC as a DA candidate.

[7] Van Dyk also argued that while the South African Police Force Act 68 of 1995, s 46, and the Final Constitution, s 199(7), set identifiable limits on party political activity, those limits should be read, and if necessary modified, by the political rights found in the Final Constitution, s 19. The Court found that even if section 46(1) was deemed to have infringed FC s 19, the infringement was patently reasonable and justifiable under s 36.

1995 was to eliminate any perception on the part of the public that the administration and enforcement of the law advanced the fortunes of any political party or undermined the claims of members of other parties to justice.[1] The Court found that the elimination of any taint of political party bias in the police force in order to instil greater public confidence in government justified the limitation of the political and associational rights of the particular officer in question.[2] Such a finding is consistent with the needs of a nascent democracy committed to the principle that all are equal before the law and that all can be expected to be treated without favour or prejudice.[3]

(viii) Religious associations

Despite the correlative right to freedom of religion and the profoundly constitutive nature of religious attachments, religious associations have not fared particularly well in the few cases to reach the Constitutional Court.

In Prince v President, Cape Law Society, a sharply divided Constitutional Court held that although a Rastafarian's right to freedom of religion in terms of s 15(1) of the Final Constitution of the permitted him to engage in Rastafarian rituals, the state was justified in proscribing the ritual use of cannabis.[4] In reaching its conclusions about the requirements of general welfare and international obligation, the majority relied heavily on the state's evidence that even limited dagga smoking could lead to broader drug use and greater narcotics trafficking. In large part, this assessment relied upon an under-interrogated assumption that no meaningful exemption to existing laws could be carved out for ritual dagga use.

---

[1] Section 46 of the South African Police Force Act reads as follows:

(1) No member must not

(a) exhibit support or swear allegiance openly or associate himself or herself with a political party, organization, movement or body,

(b) hold any position or office in a political party, organization, movement or body,

(c) carry any symbol or any means of identification in respect of any party, organization, movement or body,

(d) promote or denigrate party political interests,

(2) Subsection (1) does not mean that a member is prohibited from

(a) joining a party, organization, movement or body or his or her choice,

(b) attending a meeting of a political party, organization, movement or body: on the understanding that no member may attend such a meeting in uniform; or

(c) exercising his or her right to vote.

(My translation). Section 46(1)(a) replaced section 35(1)(a) of the Police Act 7 of 1958. The Police Act stated that no member of the Police Force, while still a member of the Police Force, may engage in political activity, stand for election or participate in a municipal council.

[2] See Van Dyk (supra) at 10 ('The need for a police force that is seen to be impartial speaks for itself.')

[3] See § 44.2*(c)* supra for various democratic rationales for the limitation of associational rights. A number of eastern European nations have placed similar laws on the books in order to diminish the public's understandable resultance to trust a security apparatus that had all too recently used all manner of surveillance and violation of bodily integrity to enforce the repressive policies of the state. Of course, as South Africa's history of overt politicization of the security services recedes into the past, the rationale for barring party political activity will lose at least some of its force.

[4] 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) ('Prince').

When viewed through the lens of association analysis, the rationale for the majority judgment seems rather opaque. On the basis of little more than assertion by the state, the majority is willing to bar a member of a religious association from engaging in practices that the association's members deems central to their way of being in the world. There is no issue of an exclusionary practice. There is no issue of discrimination. There is little question about the import of the ritual for the association in question. At best, the Court's discourse pits a vague sense of danger to the commonweal against the very real commitments of a discrete and insular religious minority. Given that the state's interest is an abstraction in the very worst sense of the term, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that had a more mainstream entity sought protection for an 'illegal' ritual, a creative solution might have been found.

The minority judgment offers some solace. As Justice Ncgobo writes:

> Apart from this, as a general matter, the Court should not be concerned with questions whether, as a matter of religious doctrine, a particular practice is central to the religion. Religion is a matter of faith and belief. The beliefs that believers hold sacred and thus central to their religious faith may strike non-believers as bizarre, illogical or irrational. Human beings may freely believe in what they cannot prove. Yet that their beliefs are bizarre, illogical or irrational to others, or are incapable of scientific proof, does not detract from the fact that these are religious beliefs for the purposes of enjoying the protection guaranteed by the right to freedom of religion. The believers should not be put to the proof of their beliefs or faith. For this reason, it is undesirable for courts to enter into the debate whether a particular practice is central to a religion unless there is a genuine dispute as to the centrality of the practice.[1]

For the purposes of association analysis the above paragraph is important in several respects. While Justice Ncgobo uses the term 'irrational' to describe how outsiders may perceive a religious belief or practice, he may just as well have used the word arational. He goes on to note that however irrational — or arational — a religious belief or practice might be, the centrality of that belief in the life ofits holder is what secures the religious belief, practice or association, constitutional protection. Thus, the minority judgment recognizes: (1) how associations are constitutive of the beliefs and practices of individuals; and (2) how the fact of their being constitutive entitles them to constitutional protection. The minority judgment is remarkable in that it does not rely upon a model of rational moral agency to describe the beliefs entitled to judicial solicitude.[2]

---

[1] Prince (supra) at 813.

[2] Of course, one might argue that religious associations are unique for reasons that even the minority judgment suggests: namely that religion is the realm of faith and not reason. As such, it goes without saying that for both the majority and the minority that the beliefs or practices will be arational. However, the ascription of arationality to constitutive beliefs that merit constitutional protection is important: because it is the centrality of the belief — and its concomitant association — to the adherents' lives that warrants its protection and not some basic assumption of rationality (or reasonableness).

That said, one must take care not to give adherents to any religious faith a free pass (an exemption) simply because a deity allegedly stands behind their deeply held convictions. Either a deeply held conviction that fits into a community's comprehensive vision of the good life warrants an exemption or it does not. The presence of a deity itself adds nothing to the analysis. For a similar view vis-à-vis cultural association exemptions see Sanger (supra) at 193, 204-6.

The Constitutional Court's decision in Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education would appear to be of greater use vis-a-vis the vindication of associational rights.[1] The judgment contains valuable language about how equality jurisprudence tolerates legal asymmetries. The essence of equality under the South African Constitution, so says the judgment, is that it does not require that we treat everyone the same way, but that we treat everyone with equal concern and respect.[2] And that's just a fancy way of saying that we need not all act the same way in order to enjoy the benefits — including the associational benefits — of a liberal constitution.

Unfortunately, the Court does not extend the benefit of this understanding of equality to religious or cultural associations. It refuses to give ss 15 or 31 of the Final Constitution any meaningful content. The judgment assumes that for the purposes of analysing the constitutionality of s 10 of the South African Schools Act[3] — which bars the use of corporal punishment by teachers — ss 15 and 31 of the Constitution have been infringed. Upon moving to the limitations analysis under s 36, the Court explains why the state is justified in barring corporal punishment in schools and why the court is justified in not crafting an order creating an exemption for such punishment.

The problem with the judgment is not its result. It is perfectly reasonable to override religious dictates and to bar the corporal punishment of children in schools. Children are in no position to determine the desirability of a set of religious practices that may result in harm to themselves. The problem is with the distinction between the practice of religion in schools and the practice of religion elsewhere, i.e., the home. If children lack the capacity to decide for themselves whether religious practices will prove deleterious to their health — and it therefore becomes incumbent upon the state to intervene on their behalf — then it would seem reasonable to conclude that barring religion sanctioned corporal punishment at home should be no different than barring religion sanctioned corporal punishment at school. But that is not what the Court concludes. Instead, it rather sanctimoniously argues that the parents 'were not being obliged to make an absolute and strenuous choice between obeying a law of the land or following their conscience. They could do both simultaneously.'[4] That is, parents could follow their conscience at home — and beat their children — but still obey the law of the land by having their children attend school free from corporal punishment. Moreover, save for the imposition of corporal punishment, says the Court, the religious schools were not prevented from maintaining their

[1] Christian Education (supra).
[2] Ibid at para 42.
[3] Act 84 of 1996.
[4] Christian Education (supra) at para 51.

specific Christian ethos. The Court cannot have it both ways. Either the scope for religious autonomy and the religious community's constitutive attachments is sufficient to justify corporal punishment in school and at home or a child's right to dignity is of such paramount importance for the state to bar it when deployed at school or at home. To say that the crux of the matter is the use of a teacher as the instrument of religious discipline is pure sophistry. If the teacher was the parent or the school was at home, then the court's basis for enabling the parents' 'to do both simultaneously' would evaporate. Thus, whereas the minority judgment in Prince leaves a reader with a sense that just less than half the court takes religious associations seriously, the Christian Education judgment leaves one with a sense that both the parents and the children in question and the public at large are not being taken seriously.

These two decisions also seem to drive one to the conclusion that the courts have not made a meaningful distinction between largely ascriptive associations such as a religious association and voluntary associations such as a cricket board. The notion, underlying both Prince and Christian Education, is that these religious associations could, if they wanted to, jettison a doctrine or two in order to comply with broader social and political norms. Certainly we might expect the United Cricket Board to align itself with these broader social and political norms (though not without difficulty), because the team it sends out represents the nation. But we cannot have such expectations of a religious denomination in a liberal society. Quite often to belong to such an ascriptive association is to have one's identity and life shaped in a manner that does not readily permit the alteration of either belief or act.[1] To be a member of a liberal society is to live in a state committed to not so readily dictating the ends of its citizens. That is not to say that the state cannot intervene in the affairs of a church. Only that it must have regard for the unique character of such associations as well as for the fairly high threshold for such intervention.

(ix) Voluntary Associations and Fair Hearings

South African Courts have engaged associational rights and fair hearings in three relatively recent cases. In all three cases — Cronje v United Cricket Board of South

[1] It goes without saying that not all religions will provide nor will all believers adhere to a comprehensive view of the good life that warrants political or legal deference. First, religions are so varied in their doctrine — and their comprehensiveness and adherents so varied in their level of commitment — that one cannot presume that religious participation simpliciter justifies violation of laws that bind every citizen. Second, while many religions are ennobling, religious doctrine underwrites quite a lot of bigotry and hatred. See Sanger (supra) at 194, 205-206 ('Religiously motivated conduct is far too vast and far too varied a category to be a plausible candidate for a presumptive exemption from the laws that bind the rest of us.') Cf Paul Farlam 'Freedom of Religion' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition December 2003) Chapter 41 (Advocate Farlam is inclined to give sincere believers a presumptive right to an exemption. Although he does not say as much, perhaps Advocate Farlam's inclination in this regard is buttressed by the notion that a Court can always find that the state's prima facie infringement of s 16's freedom of religion is reasonable and justifiable under s 36.)

Africa[1], Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club[2], and Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, and Others[3] — the courts have upheld the rights of associations to control the grounds for expulsion so long as they met basic standards of procedural fairness. In Cronje, the court deferred to the United Cricket Board when it came to deciding how and whether to deal with Hansie Cronje once he had been expelled from the association. In Ward and Wittmann, the courts reversed the expulsion. They did not do so on the ground that the expulsion occurred for some politically or morally reprehensible reason. The associations were simply found to have failed to comply with the dictates of procedural fairness. To the extent that Wittmann weighs in on the power of an association to terminate membership when the member acts in a manner contrary to the decisions of the association's board and engages in expressive conduct that leads to criticism of the association, it decides that the association does possess such power. All three cases can be read as standing for the proposition that a member has vested interests in the association that, at a minimum, require a fair termination hearing. A non-member, on the other hand, possesses no such rights. Read this way, Wittmann, Ward and Cronje seem of a piece. Indeed, what ties them together at a theoretical level is the notion that once a person has been granted entry into an association, he or she accepts the basic principles upon which the association operates and thus the principles that may lead to his or her exclusion. The potential for exclusion is part of the consideration the member offers in return for admittance.[4]

(x) Sexual Associations

All sexual associations involve an exchange of some sort. Love, pleasure, rage, humiliation, and, yes, even wealth, all form part of the currency of sexual association.

In NCGLE I and NCGLE II,[5] the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution's express commitment to equality with regard to sexual orientation meant that the statutory and common law rules that invidiously distinguished homosexuals from heterosexuals were constitutionally infirm. In short, the two judgments place these sexual associations — and the correlative rights to equality, dignity and privacy as well as the constitutive attachment of homosexual intercourse — at the centre of protected associational activity.

But in another recent judgment, S v Jordan,[6] the Court withheld constitutional

[1] 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T).
[2] 1998 (2) SA 487 (C)
[3] 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T).
[4] The ability of these kinds of voluntary associations to exclude members whose behaviour is at odds with the basic tenets of the association is consistent with my belief that concerns about 'capture' stand at the heart of associational freedom.
[5] NCGLE II (supra); NCGLE I (supra).
[6] S v Jordan and Others (Sex Workers Education And Advocacy Task Force And Others As Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC) ('Jordan').

protection for consensual sexual associations. The apparently critical difference between NCGLE I and II and Jordan is that the latter turns on the presence of a monetary exchange and the traditionally despised occupation of prostitution. Upon closer analysis, none of the Court's distinctions between the various kinds of sexual association hold up. At least part of the rationale for the rejection of the equality arguments raised in Jordan rests on both the prostitute and the john being subject to criminal sanction — albeit very different sanctions in kind and degree.[1] But were different legal sanctions for the same kind of sexual act visited upon homosexuals and heterosexuals, it would be hard to imagine the post-NCGLE I and II Court sustaining this 'separate but equal' treatment. Similarly, the Court holds that sexual association of a prostitute and a john — or between any two persons involving some pecuniary exchange — lies at the periphery of the right to privacy and not at its core. But this distinction between core and periphery is illusory. Aside from its invidious characterization of prostitution, the Court makes no effort to describe those kinds of heterosexual and homosexual sexual association that belong at the core and those kinds that fall at the periphery.[2] The Court neither weighs in on the various kinds of indiscriminate sexual behaviour that heterosexuals and homosexuals engage in for the sheer fun of it nor does it take a view about the many kinds of intimate sexual intercourse where some other kind of bargain has clearly been reached.[3] But it is hard to imagine the Court describing such 'private' relationships as lying at the periphery of the right to privacy. Likewise, the Court's judgment that the criminalization of prostitution could not be said to impair the dignity of the prostitute because 'the diminution arose from the character of prostitution itself' – the commodification of one's body — is difficult to understand in a liberal, market-based society such as ours.[4] So much of what we do involves the commodification of our bodies. A day-labourer is entitled to some level of constitutional protection of his dignity despite the fact that he has chosen to sell his body for the wages needed to pay for food and shelter. A Constitutional Court judge, while commodifying her body in the natural course of listening to arguments and writing opinions, is likewise entitled to some level of constitutional solicitude. It cannot be that the commodification of one's body per se bothers the Court. All of us gainfully employed do just that.

[1] Jordan (supra) at paras 15 and 18.

[2] The majority simply asserts, without argument, this distinction. Ibid at para 29. The minority does not contest the assertion. Ibid at para 117.

[3] See Narnia Bohler-Muller 'Drucilla Cornell's 'Imaginary Domain': Equality, Freedom and the Ethic of Alterity in South Africa' (2002) 65 THRHR 166. See also Max Du Plessis 'Between Apology and Utopia' (2002) 18 SAJHR 1, 19–21.

[4] Jordan (supra) at para 74.

It must be a particular form of commodification — or the commodification of a particular body part — that provokes the Court. But when the offending commodification just happens to be a form of behaviour that attracts the censor of many South Africans, then it is hard not to conclude that the Court has confused commodification with moralization.[1]

[0] Ibid at para 105.

[0] From the general perspective of associational freedom, the Court fails to give the correlative rights of an association to equality, dignity and privacy equal weight in these three cases. It also fails to take seriously the variety of sexual association necessary for identity formation and, dare I say, social cohesion. See, eg, Kate Weston, Families We Choose: Lesbians, Gays and Kinship (1991) 103 — 136. Only those traditional models of biological union — or those made easily analogous to them — secure the Court's approval.

45 Political Rights

Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch

45.1 Introduction 45-1
45.2 Interpretation of political rights 45-2
(a) Historical background 45-2
(b) Drafting history 45-4
(c) Constitutional context 45-7
(i) Relationship between FC s 1*(d)* and FC s 19 45-7
(ii) Other relevant constitutional provisions 45-7
(d) International law 45-8
(e) Foreign law 45-11
(f) Statutes embodying political rights 45-12
45.3 Horizontal application of political rights 45-13
45.4 Standing to sue in political rights cases 45-14
45.5 Justiciability of political rights 45-16
(a) Separation of powers concerns 45-16
(b) Standard of review in political rights cases 45-18
(c) Remedies in political rights cases 45-23
45.6 The broad and narrow rights to participate in public affairs . . 45-26
45.7 Structure of FC s 19 45-29
45.8 FC s 19(1): the freedom to make political choices 45-30
(a) The right to form a political party 45-32
(b) The right to participate in the activities of a political party . 45-34
(c) The right to campaign for a political party 45-35
(i) General 45-35
(ii) State funding of political parties 45-36
(iii) Political parties and the media 45-37
45.9 FC s 19(2): the right to free, fair and regular elections 45-38
45.10 FC s 19(3): the active and passive right to vote 45-41
(a) The right to vote, the electoral system and the mandate of representatives 45-41

(i) General 45-41
(ii) The mandate of representatives and loss of membership 45-42
(iii) Proportional representation. 45-44
(b) The active right to vote 45-46
(i) Equal voting rights 45-46
(ii) Secrecy of the ballot 45-48
(iii) Exclusion of classes of citizens from the right to vote . 45-48
(c) The right to stand for election to public office 45-51

FC s 19 provides:

(1) Every citizen is free to make political choices, which includes the right —
   (a) to form a political party;
   (b) to participate in the activities of, or recruit members for, a political party; and
   (c) to campaign for a political party or cause.
(2) Every citizen has the right to free, fair and regular elections for any legislative body established in terms of this Constitution.
(3) Every adult citizen has the right —
   (a) to vote in elections for any legislative body established in terms of this Constitution, and to do so in secret, and
   (b) to stand for public office and, if elected, to hold office.

45.1 INTRODUCTION*

As with all rights in the Final Constitution, the political rights enshrined in FC s 19 must be read in context. South Africa's history of denying political rights to certain racial groups, discussed in Chapter 2 of this work[1] and briefly in § 45.2(a) below, is well known and provides one important context in which FC s 19 must be understood. FC s 19 must also be read alongside the other provisions of the Final Constitution relating to democracy.[2] Finally, to fully understand the workings of FC s 19 — specifically FC s 19(2) and FC s 19(3) — one must understand South Africa's electoral system, and, in particular, its system of proportional representation.[3]

This chapter begins by placing the FC s 19 guarantees within their proper interpretive context. § 45.2 discusses South Africa's unique historical background regarding political rights and voting, surveys the other constitutional provisions which influence the interpretation of FC s 19, and briefly analyzes the impact that both foreign and international law may have on the courts' understanding of political rights. Given the sparse case law adjudicating FC s 19 directly, and the fact that the constitutionally-enshrined political rights are couched in broad terms, these various contexts provide important lenses through which to understand FC s 19's guarantees.

§§ 45.3-45.5 explore the application of FC s 19: the people or groups to whom it applies and who have standing to rely on this section, and the general approach that the Constitutional Court has adopted in FC s 19 disputes within the context

* We would like to thank Johan de Waal, the author of the chapter on Political Rights in the 1st Edition of this work, for allowing us to draw significantly on the contents of that chapter. We would also like to thank Theunis Roux for his guidance, helping to light the way.

[1] See S Woolman, H Klug & R Babiuch 'Constitutional History' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 2.

[2] See the preamble, and FC ss 1, 7, 36, 39, 57, 59, 61, 70, 72, 116, 118, 152, 160, 195, 234, and 236, and the whole of Chapter 9. For a full exploration and discussion of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

[3] For a detailed discussion of election law, see G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 29.

of the separation of powers doctrine. These sections give essential perspective on the right, showing that the guarantees are broadly applicable (§ 45.3) and can be relied on by an expansive array of parties — even if they are not directly affected by an alleged violation (§ 45.4). § 45.5 documents the deferential standard adopted by the Constitutional Court in FC s 19 cases and then shows how the difficulty of devising a proper remedy constrains the Court's ability to protect FC s 19 rights.

§ 45.6 considers the implied right to political participation, and the relationship it bears to the narrower right contained in FC s 19. The implied right to political participation maps much of the territory covered by Chapter 10 of this work. (Chapter 10 — 'Democracy' — considers the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law.) This right is nevertheless worthy of separate consideration in light of the important decisions in Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others[1] and Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[2]

While FC s 19 protects several specific rights, when a question or controversy does not fit neatly into the ambit of one of these rights, the Constitutional Court has shown a willingness to refer to FC s 19 political rights in a more general sense. In particular, the Court has read FC s 19 along with FC s 1*(d)* to stand for the proposition that ambiguous electoral laws must be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement. § 45.7 analyzes the Court's treatment of the specific rights in FC s 19, and then discusses the general meaning given to FC s 19. Finally, §§ 45.8-45.10 break down the constituent parts of FC s 19, explaining each of them in turn and analyzing the case law in each area.

45.2 Interpretation of Political Rights

As stated above, FC s 19 rights must be read in their proper context. Since the case law regarding FC s 19 remains fairly thin, the historical background of the right to vote and the related provisions of the Final Constitution are particularly important to unlocking the meaning of FC s 19.

(a) Historical background

The Constitutional Court's understanding of FC s 19 is deeply intertwined with South Africa's history of denying political rights to black people. Initially, each of the territories that were to form the Union of South Africa had different voting restrictions. For instance, the Cape allowed men of all races to vote, provided that they met certain economic qualifications, while the Transvaal discriminated along racial lines, not allowing non-white citizens to vote — and sometimes placed limitations on the voting privileges of white men. Many Africans expected the non-racial voting standards of the Cape to be extended as a 'reward' for supporting the British in the Anglo-Boer South African War of 1899-1902. However, the

[1] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life').
[2] 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele (II)').

Treaty of Vereeniging explicitly stated that non-whites could only be granted the franchise through the consent of the white population.[1]

Over the next several decades, blacks were stripped completely of their right to vote. The union between the Afrikaner governing party and the white Labour Party in 1924 precipitated the slide towards black disenfranchisement.[2] In 1936, the Representation of Natives Act[3] took blacks completely off of the voters roll, effectively taking away their right to vote in those territories where it once existed. By contrast, the franchise was extended to white women in 1930. By 1931, the economic qualifications limiting the right to vote for poorer white citizens were dropped. These changes effectively enfranchised all white citizens regardless of sex, economic status or social standing.

The enfranchisement situation of Indians and coloureds was a bit more complicated. Although an Act was introduced to Parliament in 1946 that would have provided Indians three representatives to Parliament,[4] the Indian community viewed the law as a slap in the face and undertook a boycott. Soon afterwards, the boycott was no longer necessary. Apartheid policies stripped Indians of even this minimal political representation.

Apartheid efforts at disenfranchisement of black people were met, in addition to political protest, with legal challenges. Some of the most well-known judgments to emerge from apartheid South Africa were delivered during this period, all tellingly related to political rights. In Ndlwana v Hofmeyr, a challenge to the Representation of Natives Act failed, the Appellate Division basing its decision on the notion of parliamentary supremacy.[5] However, in the famous pair of Harris cases, the Appellate Division twice struck down legislative attempts to disenfranchise blacks. In Harris I,[6] the Appellate Division struck down the Separate Representation of Voters Act,[7] which provided for 'the separate representation of European and non-European voters in the Province of the Cape of Good Hope'.[8] Outraged, the government sought to circumvent the judgment by passing the High Court of Parliament Act. The Act purported to turn Parliament itself into the highest court in constitutional matters, with the power to review and set aside, by simple majority vote, any Appellate Division decision declaring an Act of [1] Article 8 of the Treaty of Vereeniging.

[2] This pact was precipitated by the economic crisis between 1919 and 1921. The lowered price of gold initially led many mining employers to lay off skilled white labour in favour of cheaper, black labour. Seeing their fortunes rapidly declining, the working class Labour Party entered into a coalition with the governing party in order to consolidate political power and improve the lots of the newly-expendable workers.

[3] Act 12 of 1936.

[4] Asiatic Land Tenure and Indian Representation Act 28 of 1946.

[5] 1937 AD 229.

[6] Harris v Minister of the Interior 1952 (2) SA 428 (A).

[7] Act 46 of 1951.

[8] The basis of the decision was that the Act was not passed in conformity with the provisions of the South Africa Act of 1909, the constitution of the day, which required more than a two-thirds parliamentary majority, and special procedures, when legislating to disqualify any person as a voter on the ground of race.

Parliament invalid. The 'High Court of Parliament' proceeded to declare Harris I wrongly decided. Thus followed Harris II,[1] in which a unanimous Appellate Division struck down the High Court of Parliament Act.

The government, going back to the drawing board, used a two-step legislative strategy, passing two Acts by ordinary majority, in order, first, to restructure Parliament to give it the majority necessary to amend the Constitution;[2] and, secondly, to amend the Constitution by removing the constitutional protection of black voting rights.[3] These steps allowed it to re-enact the Separate Representation of Voters Act. At the same time, the government passed legislation to increase the quorum of the Appellate Division bench for cases concerning the validity of legislation. The majority of the enlarged bench of the Appellate Division then dismissed the challenge to these new statutes in Collins.[4] The sole dissenting judge was Schreiner JA.[5]

The 1983 Constitution created a tricameral legislature that included Indians and coloureds. The 1983 Constitution allotted voting power to whites, Indians and coloureds in a ratio of 4:2:1, respectively, but gave no representation to Africans. This Constitution lasted a mere ten years before being repealed by the Interim Constitution, which affirmed, for the first time in South Africa's history, the principle of universal adult suffrage.[6]

(b) Drafting history

In addition to embodying new political rights, the Final Constitution was itself the product of a multi-staged process of participatory political decision-making. It is therefore useful to consider briefly the drafting history leading up to the enactment of FC s 19.

Before the multi-party negotiations commenced, there were confidential discussions, referred to as 'talks about talks', to test the waters between the African National Congress (ANC) and the ruling National Party (NP).[7] These talks

[1] Minister of the Interior v Harris 1952 (4) SA 769 (A).

[2] The Senate Act 53 of 1955 effectively enlarged and restructured the upper house of Parliament (the Senate) so as to give the government the two-thirds parliamentary majority necessary to amend the entrenched provisions of the South Africa Act.

[3] The South Africa Act Amendment Act 9 of 1956, passed with a two-thirds majority, repealed s 35 of the South Africa Act, which protected black voting rights.

[4] Collins v Minister of the Interior 1957 (1) SA 552 (A).

[5] In the view of many in the legal profession at the time, Oliver Schreiner JA was subsequently passed over for appointment as Chief Justice on the basis of his dissenting views in cases such as Collins.

[6] For a more complete history, see S Woolman, H Klug & R Babiuch 'Constitutional History' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 2.

[7] Z Motala & C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (2002) 4. Cyril Ramaphosa chaired the Constitutional Assembly, the democratically elected legislative body which drafted and adopted the Final Constitution.

established the ground rules for the negotiations that followed. In particular, the initial meetings between the ANC and the NP led to the adoption of the Groote Schuur Minute.[1] This Minute was the first agreement between the two organisations: in the Minute, the NP agreed to meet the ANC's demands contained in the Harare Declaration,[2] and the ANC agreed, in turn, to help to reduce the levels of violence in the country. The next formal agreement was the Pretoria Minute. In this second Minute, the government agreed to release political prisoners and the ANC agreed to suspend the armed struggle.

These two agreements paved the way for the CODESA talks[3] and, thereafter, the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum 'MPNF') held at the World Trade Centre, Kempton Park. The MPNF ultimately culminated in the adoption of the Interim Constitution on 18 November 1993. The Interim Constitution was enacted by the tricameral parliament, signed into law by the State President, FW de Klerk, and came into force on 27 April 1994. Ironically, therefore, the principle of universal franchise was introduced by the act of an undemocratic legislature.

Section 21 of the Interim Constitution, the predecessor to FC s 19, provided:

(1) Every citizen shall have the right —
   (a) to form, to participate in the activities of and to recruit members for a political party;
   (b) to campaign for a political party or cause; and
   (c) freely to make political choices.
(2) Every citizen shall have the right to vote, to do so in secret and to stand for election to public office.

At the second plenary session of CODESA, the major parties had agreed that a democratically elected Constitutional Assembly (CA) should draft the new constitution. However, as noted by the Constitutional Court:

> [i]nstead of an outright transmission of power from the old order to the new, there would be a programmed two-stage transition. An interim government, established and functioning under an interim constitution agreed to by the negotiating parties, would govern the country on a coalition basis while a final constitution was being drafted. A national legislature, elected (directly and indirectly) by universal adult suffrage, would double as the constitution-making body and would draft the new constitution within a given time. But — and herein lies the key to the resolution of the deadlock — that text would have to comply with certain guidelines agreed upon in advance by the negotiating parties. What is more, an independent arbiter would have to ascertain and declare whether the new constitution indeed complied with the guidelines before it could come into force.[4]

[1] The Groote Schuur Minute was signed on 2 May 1990. See Motala & Ramaphosa (supra) at 4.

[2] The Harare Declaration, a document adopted by the Organization of African Unity in 1989, contained the ANC's understanding of the process towards a negotiated settlement.

[3] Convention for a Democratic South Africa.

[4] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly, In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 13 (First Certification Judgment).

The 'guidelines' referred to were the Constitutional Principles (CPs) contained in the Interim Constitution, and the 'independent arbiter' was to be the Constitutional Court. A number of the CPs referred to political rights and democracy, in particular CP VIII, CP XIV and CP XVII. It is appropriate to remember them, as the CPs still find an echo in FC s 19 and the principle of democracy underlying the Final Constitution:

VIII There shall be representative government embracing multi-party democracy, regular elections, universal adult suffrage, a common voters' roll, and, in general, proportional representation.

XIV Provision shall be made for participation of minority political parties in the legislative process in a manner consistent with democracy.

XVII At each level of government there shall be democratic representation. This principle shall not derogate from the provisions of Principle XIII.

When FC s 19 was drafted, a number of changes, some of significance, were made to IC s 21. FC s 19 nevertheless received no objections during the certification process and was certified by the Constitutional Court as complying with the CPs set out above.[1] Where a provision of the Final Constitution was drafted so as to differ from its Interim Constitution predecessor, courts interpreting the Final Constitution should regard such textual changes as deliberate and intended to have some effect. There are two significant differences between IC s 21 and FC s 19. First, the structure of rights in sub-sec (1) is conceptually altered: FC s 19(1) provides that an overarching right to make political choices includes the rights to form a political party; to participate in the activities of, or recruit members for, a political party; and to campaign for a political party or cause. IC s 21(1) treated the right to make political choices as a discrete right and treated the other three rights as separate, rather than subordinate, rights. Secondly, the insertion of the right to free and fair elections in FC s 19(2) was wholly new.

The upgrading of the right to make political choices broadens the right extensively. When interpreted as part of IC s 21(1), this right would not have included the rights in IC s 21(1)(a) and (b) to form, to participate in the activities of and to recruit members for a political party; and to campaign for a political party or cause. Under the Final Constitution, these rights form part, but not the whole, of the right to make political choices. Forming and participating in the activities of and recruiting members for political parties, and campaigning for a political party or cause are now instances of the making of political choices. These activities also help us to understand what else amounts to a protected political choice, as other instances of political choices should have characteristics in common with these examples. One such characteristic is that all of the rights in FC s 19(1), which constitute instances of the right to make political choices, involve the relationship between citizens and political parties or causes. Arguably, therefore, the right to make political choices is limited to choices implicating political parties or causes: rights fitting within a representative model of democracy in which political rights of citizens against the state are mediated by political parties. This construction of FC s 19 may mean that, if our constitutional conception of democracy has both participatory and representative dimensions, the participatory dimension must be found in provisions outside FC s 19(1) (and possibly outside FC s 19 as a whole). This conception of a broader right to participate in political processes, which is found in provisions outside FC s 19, and a narrower right embodying the classical protections necessary in a representative democracy, in particular the right to vote, is discussed in more detail in § 45.6 below.

[1] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at Annexure 3: Summary of Objections and Submissions; Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly, In re: Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

(c) Constitutional context

(i) Relationship between FC s 1(d) and FC s 19

Several provisions of the Final Constitution are particularly helpful in placing FC s 19 in its proper context. FC s 1*(d)* states that 'universal adult suffrage, a national common voters [sic] roll, regular elections, and a multi-party system of democratic government' are foundational values of the new South African constitutional order. As a result, democratic values must be promoted when a court interprets the provisions of FC s 19.[1] If the court finds that the FC s 19 rights are infringed, these values must also be used to determine whether that limitation is reasonable and justifiable.[2]

(ii) Other relevant constitutional provisions

As will be discussed in § 45.6 below, FC s 19 entrenches a set of political rights that constitute a subset of a broader right to political participation that runs through the Constitution. Part of that right to political participation is the right of public involvement in legislative processes, contained in FC s 59(1)(a) in respect of the National Assembly, FC s 72(1)(a) in respect of the National Council of Provinces, and FC s 118(1)(a) in respect of provincial legislatures. These provisions, and the broader right of political participation of which they form part, are discussed in § 45.6 below.

FC s 19 must also be considered within the constitutional framework regulating elections. FC ss 46(1) and 105(1) set forth the broad constitutional requirements governing the national and provincial legislatures, respectively, and give the national legislature regulatory power over the non-fixed details of the two systems. FC s 157 provides for the election of members of Municipal Councils. While these provisions give the national legislature the responsibility of creating a working regulatory framework for elections, it is the Court's responsibility to ensure that the laws and regulations passed by the legislature are consistent with the Constitution's guarantees.

[1] C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.
[2] See FC ss 39 and 36.

Also, the constitutional provisions dealing with the rights of freedom of expression,[1] assembly, demonstration, picket and petition, [2] association,[3] the provisions regarding the electoral system, the electoral commission,[4] the mandate of representatives and traditional leaders,[5] and the provision for referendums[6] are integrally linked with FC s 19.

(d) International law

In terms of FC s 39(1)(c), when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court must consider international law. It is incumbent on courts, therefore, to have regard to the protection afforded to political rights in international law when interpreting FC s 19 and the other provisions of the Final Constitution that protect political rights.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) entrenches political rights in art 25, which provides:

> Every citizen shall have the right and the opportunity, without any of the distinctions mentioned in article 2 and without unreasonable restrictions:
> (a) To take part in the conduct of public affairs, directly or through freely chosen representatives;
> (b) To vote and to be elected at genuine periodic elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret ballot, guaranteeing the free expression of the will of the electors;
> (c) To have access, on general terms of equality, to public service in his country.[7]

[1] FC s 16. For more on freedom of expression, see D Milo, A Stein & G Penfold 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 42.

[2] FC s 17. For more on freedom of assemnly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

[3] FC s 18. For more on freedom of association, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[4] FC ss 190 and 191.

[5] See ANC v Minister of Local Government and Housing 1997 (3) BCLR 295 (N). The High Court refused to invalidate a proclamation, issued in terms of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993, which entitled traditional leaders to become ex officio members of regional councils. The applicants' argument that IC s 182 only allowed traditional leaders to be nominated to 'elected local government' was rejected. Since local governments in rural areas are not wholly elected, the argument meant that traditional leaders could only participate in the cities and towns, where almost none of them lived. FC schedule 6, item 26(1) makes it clear that traditional leaders are ex officio entitled to be members of the local government structures, wherever they reside, until 1999 or until an Act of Parliament provides otherwise.

[6] FC s 84(2)(g) grants the President the power to call for a referendum in terms of an Act of Parliament. That Act now seems to be the Electoral Commission Act 51 of 1996 and no longer the Referendums Act 108 of 1983. The former does not explicitly repeal the latter, but s 2(2) provides that the President may, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any other law, declare that a referendum shall be held to ascertain the views of voters on a matter, determine who shall be entitled to vote, and determine the questions to appear on the ballot paper.

[7] United Nations Human Rights Committee, General Comment 25 'The Right to Participate in Public Affairs, Voting Rights and the Right of Equal Access to Public Service' (Article 25 of the Covenant)(57th session, 1996) CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.7 ('GC 25').

In General Comment 25, the United Nations Human Rights Committee commented on art 25, noting that 'whatever form of constitution or government is in force, the Covenant requires States to adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to ensure that citizens have an effective opportunity to enjoy the rights it protects.'[1] As is appropriate in international instruments, the ICCPR provides flexibility to nation states as to how they must respect this right. For example, the reference to participation in public affairs directly or through elected representatives, reflects the range of democratic models between the participatory and representative polar extremes.[2] However, it is clear that art 25 contemplates a form of democracy, and General Comment 25 states further that '[a]rticle 25 lies at the core of democratic government based on the consent of the people and in conformity with the principles of the Covenant.'[3] Significantly, art 25 adopts a standard of reasonableness as the internal measure for testing restrictions of the rights that it contains.[4] In NNP, as is discussed in § 45.5(b) below, the Constitutional Court adopted the much more deferential standard of rationality.

In Doctors for Life, the Court emphasized the entitlement of citizens in terms of art 25 to participate in public affairs, and held that art 25 must be understood in the light of art 19 of the ICCPR, the right to freedom of expression, which includes the 'freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas'.[5] The Court held that arts 19 and 25 guarantee not only the positive right to political participation, but simultaneously impose a duty on states to facilitate public participation in the conduct of public affairs.[6]

The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ('the African Charter') protects political rights in art 13 and, like the ICCPR, refers to 'participation' in political processes:

1. Every citizen shall have the right to participate freely in the government of his country, either directly or through freely chosen representatives in accordance with the provisions of the law.
2. Every citizen shall have the right of equal access to the public service of his country.

[1] GC 25 (supra) at para 1.

[2] See GC 25 (supra) at para 3: people have the right to freely determine their political status and to enjoy the right to choose the form of their constitution or government.

[3] Ibid.

[4] GC 25 (supra) at para 25: 'Any conditions which apply to the exercise of the rights protected by article 25 should be based on objective and reasonable criteria. For example, it may be reasonable to require a higher age for election or appointment to particular offices than for exercising the right to vote, which should be available to every adult citizen. The exercise of these rights by citizens may not be suspended or excluded except on grounds which are established by law and which are objective and reasonable. For example, established mental incapacity may be a ground for denying a person the right to vote or to hold office.' GC 25 (supra) at para 10 states: 'The right to vote at elections and referenda must be established by law and may be subject only to reasonable restrictions, such as setting a minimum age limit for the right to vote. It is unreasonable to restrict the right to vote on the ground of physical disability or to impose literacy, educational or property requirements. Party membership should not be a condition of eligibility to vote, nor a ground of disqualification.'

[5] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 91.

[6] Ibid at para 92.

3. Every individual shall have the right of access to public property and services in strict equality of all persons before the law.[1]

The inclusion of rights of access to the public service and to public property and services in the same provision as the right to participate in the government of one's country perhaps reflects a concern of many young African democracies regarding the abuse of political power, especially in respect of employment, public resources and state services. In Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court read art 13 (the right to participate in government) together with art 25, which provides that '[s]tates parties … shall have the duty to promote and ensure through teaching, education and publication, the respect of the rights and freedoms contained in the present Charter and to see to it that these freedoms and rights as well as corresponding obligations and duties are understood.' By implication, the Court was suggesting that states parties to the African Charter must take steps, through teaching, education and publication, to ensure that citizens are able to exercise their right to participate in the government of their country.

The Doctors for Life Court concluded that the international law position in respect of political rights is as follows:

> The international law right to political participation encompasses a general right to participate in the conduct of public affairs and a more specific right to vote and/or be elected into public office. The general right to participate in the conduct of public affairs includes engaging in public debate and dialogue with elected representatives at public hearings. But that is not all; it includes the duty to facilitate public participation in the conduct of public affairs by ensuring that citizens have the necessary information and effective opportunity to exercise the right to political participation.[2]

The Court held that, while the right to political participation in international law can be realized in multiple ways, it 'does not require less of a government than provision for meaningful exercise of choice in some form of electoral process and public participation in the law-making process by permitting public debate and dialogue with elected representatives'.[3]

The Court noted that the international law right to political participation, being an open-textured 'programmatic' right (one which must be realized through the programmes and policies of individual states) will undoubtedly evolve, gathering its meaning and content from historical and cultural experience.[4] As will be seen in § 45.6 below, the international law position heavily influenced the Doctors for Life Court. The evolving international law on political rights, particularly the emerging right to democratic governance in international law,[5] will therefore continue to be particularly

[1] African (Banjul) Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, adopted on 27 June 1981 (Acceded to by South Africa on 9 July 1996).

[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 105.

[3] Ibid at para 106 (emphasis added).

[4] Ibid at paras 96-97.

[5] See, in general, G Fox 'The Right to Political Participation in International Law' (1992) 17 Yale Journal of International Law 539; T Franck 'The Emerging Right to Democratic Governance' (1992) 86 American Journal of International Law 46; H Klug 'Guaranteeing Free and Fair Elections' (1992) 8 SAJHR 263.

relevant as our domestic law in this area develops. Insofar as these norms become part of customary international law, they also become the law of South Africa.[1]

(e) Foreign law

In terms of FC s 39(1)(c), when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court may consider foreign law. It is appropriate, therefore, to have regard to the constitutional protection afforded to political rights in other constitutional regimes.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms contains a cluster of 'democratic rights' in ss 3 to 5. Section 3 provides: 'Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.' This provision is similar to FC s 19(3), which also couples the right to vote with the right to stand for election to legislative bodies, and Canadian jurisprudence on the interpretation of s 3 is accordingly useful to South African courts. The Canadian Supreme Court, like the South African Constitutional Court, has been criticized for adopting a highly deferential approach to limitations of the right to vote.[2] The Canadian Supreme Court's deference flows from its notion that the purpose of the right is to confer on each citizen 'effective representation' in the legislature.[3] Sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Charter are concerned respectively with the duration of the terms of the House of Commons and Parliament, and the sitting of Parliament and the legislatures.

The German Basic Law (Grundgesetz) does not contain a provision equivalent to FC s 19 in its Fundamental Rights chapter, although it does entrench the rights to freedom of expression,[4] association,[5] assembly[6] and petition.[7] However, Chapter III, dealing with the Bundestag (legislature), provides for elections and specifically entrenches the right to vote and be elected in art 38:

> (1) Members of the German Bundestag shall be elected in general, direct, free, equal, and secret elections. They shall be representatives of the whole people, not bound by orders or instructions, and responsible only to their conscience.
> (2) Any person who has attained the age of eighteen shall be entitled to vote; any person who has attained the age of majority may be elected.
> (3) Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

In addition, Chapter II of the Basic Law, dealing with the Federation and the Länder (provinces) contains the following articles, which carry more than an echo of Germany's own painful history of abuse of political rights:

[1] For a discussion of FC s 39(1)(b) and FC s 232, see H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law and International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30.
[2] PW Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992) 1001.
[3] Re Prov Electoral Boundaries (Sask) [1991] 2 SCR 158.
[4] Article 5.
[5] Article 8.
[6] Article 9.
[7] Article 17.

Article 20 [Basic institutional principles; defence of the constitutional order]

(1) The Federal Republic of Germany is a democratic and social federal state.
(2) All state authority is derived from the people. It shall be exercised by the people through elections and other votes and through specific legislative, executive, and judicial bodies.
(3) The legislature shall be bound by the constitutional order, the executive and the judiciary by law and justice.
(4) All Germans shall have the right to resist any person seeking to abolish this constitutional order, if no other remedy is available.

Article 21 [Political parties]

(1) Political parties shall participate in the formation of the political will of the people. They may be freely established. Their internal organization must conform to democratic principles. They must publicly account for their assets and for the sources and use of their funds.
(2) Parties that, by reason of their aims or the behaviour of their adherents, seek to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany shall be unconstitutional. The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule on the question of unconstitutionality.
(3) Details shall be regulated by federal laws.

In providing for public participation in political processes in constitutional provisions falling outside of a Bill of Rights, the German Basic Law is structurally similar to the Final Constitution, as will be seen when the right to political participation is considered in § 45.6 below.

The Doctors for Life Court noted that a growing number of national constitutions, in particular those adopted after the ICCPR entered into force, endorse the principle of participatory democracy. The Court referred to a number of constitutions 'which, like our Constitution, include provisions that promote public participation in law-making'. In the context of a consideration of the right to participate, specifically, in the law-making process, the Court referred to the law of England, the United States of America, Germany, Tanzania, Portugal, Colombia and Belarus. It also noted the growing trend among states to embrace the principle of participatory democracy.[1]

(f) Statutes embodying political rights

Finally, the interpretation of FC s 19 should also take place within the context of relevant domestic legislation. Domestic legislative efforts to realize political rights include the Referendums Act,[2] the Electoral Act,[3] the Electoral Commission Act,[4] the Abolition of Restrictions on Free Political Activity Act,[5] the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act,[6] the Independent Media

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 102-104.
[2] Act 108 of 1983.
[3] Act 73 of 1998.
[4] Act 51 of 1996.
[5] Act 206 of 1993.
[6] Act 13 of 2000.

Commission Act,[1] the Labour Relations Act,[2] the Protected Disclosures Act,[3] the Promotion of Access to Information Act,[4] the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act,[5] and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act.[6] While, of course, none of these Acts can limit the rights in FC s 19 unless that limitation is saved by FC s 36, they are relevant to the extent that, if a right is embodied in legislation, it is not necessary to rely directly on FC s 19.[7] In addition, in interpreting these statutes, FC s 39(2) requires courts to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill or Rights', an interpretive process in which FC s 19 will play a significant role. Accordingly, the relationship between these Acts and FC s 19 cuts both ways.

45.3 Horizontal Application of Political Rights

According to FC s 8(2), a constitutional provision applies horizontally to a natural or juristic person to the extent that it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the duty imposed by the right.[8] Although the Constitutional Court has not had to answer this question explicitly, FC s 19(1) and (3) should have horizontal applicability. As far as an infringement on these rights is concerned, it matters little whether it is a state or a private person that is denying a person the right to vote in secret, to stand for public office, to participate in the activities of a political party, or to campaign for a political cause. Horizontal applicability may prove to be very important since many potential infringements may come from political rivals, or even private employers, rather than the government.

Currie and De Waal contend that FC s 19(2), which effectively gives content to the right to vote, is not applicable horizontally because the duty to create free, fair, and regular elections falls only on the government.[9] We disagree. It may be that the duty to ensure regular elections falls only on the state. Intuitively, however, the fairness of any game or contest depends both on the role of the referee or umpire and on the conduct of the competing players. The players are obliged to 'play fair', even if the role of enforcing the rules of the game rests solely on the arbiter. FC s 19(2) should similarly be regarded as imposing duties on the political parties contesting an election. It may be that FC s 19(2) imposes only negative horizontal duties on private persons to respect the right: for example, by not engaging in acts of political violence, intimidation or electoral fraud. By contrast, the state will bear

[1] Act 148 of 1993.
[2] Act 66 of 1995.
[3] Act 26 of 2000.
[4] Act 2 of 2000.
[5] Act 3 of 2000.
[6] Act 4 of 2000.
[7] See S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59; Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) at para 7; Ferreira v Levin NO, Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 199.
[8] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 10.8*(a)*(ii).
[9] See I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 447.

positive obligations to take steps to protect, promote and fulfil the right to free and fair elections, discharged primarily through the Independent Electoral Commission, which is obliged in terms of FC s 190 to ensure that elections are free and fair. The horizontal application of FC s 19(2) may also become vital where the Independent Electoral Commission fails, refuses or lacks the institutional capacity to intervene to prevent violations by political parties or other private persons.

In Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Others v African National Congress & Others ('IDASA'), the applicants were IDASA, a non-governmental organization, and two private citizens. The applicants launched a High Court application against a number of political parties, seeking to compel them to disclose the sources of the substantial donations they receive.[1] The respondents were the African National Congress (ANC), the Democratic Alliance (DA), the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) and the New National Party (NNP), all political parties registered in terms of s 15 of the Electoral Commission Act.[2] The High Court held that political parties, for the purposes of the request for access to their donations records, are 'private bodies', rather than 'public bodies', as defined in the Promotion of Access to Information Act.[3] The IDASA court held that some of the provisions of the Final Constitution relied upon by the applicants, which fell outside the Bill of Rights, were not enforceable as against private parties, including political parties.[4] However, the High Court proceeded to consider and apply FC s 19. It ultimately concluded that the applicants did not require access to the requested records for the purpose of protecting their FC s 19 rights. Nevertheless, the IDASA Court's approach strongly suggests that it regarded FC s 19 as binding not only the state, but also political parties. Thus, FC s 19 applies, for the time being, horizontally.

45.4 Standing to Sue in Political Rights Cases

At a textual level, FC s 19 excludes non-citizens from its application, and is one of the few rights in the Final Constitution to do so.[5] But what about political parties? Most of the cases decided to date have been brought by political parties, and yet on its face the right is extended to citizens only. How then do political parties have standing to sue under FC s 19? The answer lies in the distinction between the holder of a right (in this case, citizens) and the persons who have standing in terms of FC s 38 to enforce the right.[6] FC s 38 provides:

[1] 2005 (10) BCLR 995 (C)(IDASA). IDASA is discussed further at § 45.7 infra.
[2] Act 51 of 1996.
[3] IDASA (supra) at para 32.
[4] Ibid at para 40.
[5] For a full discussion of the beneficiaries of the various rights found in the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.
[6] For a full discussion of standing, see C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 7. The broad approach to both standing and application rests, to a significant degree, on the Court's doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. For more on this doctrine, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

> Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are —
> (a) anyone acting in their own interest;
> (b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name;
> (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons;
> (d) anyone acting in the public interest; and
> (e) an association acting in the interest of its members.

The Constitutional Court has also granted political parties standing to sue under FC s 19. For example, it has heard cases over the disparate impact that a voter identification requirement[1] and floor-crossing legislation[2] have had on political parties, over the interpretation of election statutes,[3] and over the amount of discretion possessed by the Electoral Commission.[4] In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO), the Court granted standing to a national non-profit organization to bring an application on behalf of two convicted prisoners who were unable to register or vote in an upcoming election.[5] As noted above, in IDASA, a High Court application was brought by a non-governmental organization and two private citizens. The three applicants brought the proceedings in terms of FC s 38 'on their own behalf, in the interests of all South African citizens, and in the public interest.'[6] The High Court did not question their standing.

In appropriate cases, litigants will have standing to seek relief under FC s 19 on any of the bases provided for in FC s 38. Persons would thus have standing in their own interest, as citizens and as voters. They could also institute proceedings on behalf of other persons who cannot act in their own name (for example, on behalf of soldiers on active duty outside the country during an election or mentally handicapped persons or unrehabilitated insolvents who lack the legal capacity to institute proceedings). One could sue as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons, such as prisoners. Arguably, whenever the right to a free and fair election is threatened, public interest standing would arise. One can also imagine that a political association — not a political party — could claim standing as an association acting on behalf of its members.

[1] See New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party'); Democratic Party v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC).

[2] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae*) (No 2)* 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM').

[3] See African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission & Others 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party').

[4] See Liberal Party v Electoral Commission & Others 2004 (8) BCLR 810 (CC)('Liberal Party').

[5] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

[6] Ibid at para 3.

In Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J stated that there are two extraordinary standing requirements for an application to strike down legislation due to a failure to facilitate public involvement in its enactment: first, the applicant must have sought and been denied an opportunity to be heard on the relevant Bills; and, secondly, the applicant must have launched the application as soon as practicable after the Bills were promulgated.[1] However, Doctors for Life was not decided on the basis of FC s 19, and these standing requirements would, therefore, appear only to apply to cases under FC ss 59(1)(a), 72(1)(a) and 118(1)(a): the duty of legislatures to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process.

Section 96 of the Electoral Act provides, under the heading 'Jurisdiction and Powers of Electoral Court', that '[t]he Electoral Court has final jurisdiction in respect of all electoral disputes and complaints about infringements of the Code, and no decision or order of the Electoral Court is subject to appeal or review.' In Liberal Party v the Electoral Commission & Others, the Constitutional Court left open the question whether this provision ousts the Court's jurisdiction to hear electoral matters.[2] Noting that FC s 167 confers jurisdiction on the Court in all constitutional matters, and noting the rights guaranteed in FC s 19, the Liberal Party Court assumed in favour of the (ultimately unsuccessful) applicant that the matter was constitutional and that the Court had jurisdiction.[3] In African Christian Democratic Party, the Court was able to avoid the question again, holding that the Electoral Act does not govern municipal elections, which are regulated instead by the Municipal Electoral Act, and therefore that s 96 of the Electoral Act did not apply.[4] It may be that the Court will seek to avoid what appears to have been intended as an ouster provision in s 96 by holding that s 96 only confers exclusive and final jurisdiction on the Electoral Court in matters based directly on the Electoral Code. Where a complaint of infringement of constitutional rights arises, the Constitutional Court will retain jurisdiction.

45.5 Justiciability of Political Rights

(a) Separation of powers concerns

In United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others ('UDM'), the Constitutional Court adopted a strongly deferential approach in considering a constitutional challenge to floor-crossing legislation. The Court set the tone for its consideration of the merits of the challenge by noting that '[t]his case is not about the merits or demerits of the disputed legislation, [which] is a political question and is of no concern to this Court.'[5] The Court held that if defection is permissible, the details must be left to Parliament.[6] The Court further held that the frustration of the will of the electorate (by allowing floor-crossing)

[1] NICRO (supra) at para 216.
[2] Liberal Party (supra) at para 15.
[3] Ibid at paras 12-15.
[4] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 15.
[5] UDM (supra) at para 11.
[6] Ibid at para 47.

does not infringe FC s 19 because all the rights in this section 'are directed to elections, to voting and to participation in political activities. Between elections, however, voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives.'[1] In addition, the UDM Court held, multi-party democracy is not undermined by floor-crossing because FC s 1*(d)* does not prescribe a particular form of electoral system, and the commitment to multi-party democracy is not incompatible with a system of proportional representation that allows floor-crossing between elections.[2] When it reached the question of remedy, the Court emphasized that '[o]ne of the considerations that must be kept in mind by a Court in making orders in constitutional matters is the principle of the separation of powers and, flowing from it, the deference it owes to this Legislature in devising a remedy.'[3] Separation of powers and deference are, in this sense, the central themes of UDM.

The reasoning in UDM reflects a shallow, pluralist conception of the principle of democracy under the Final Constitution. It is also at odds with the Court's other dicta on the nature of South African democracy. As contended in Chapter 10 of this volume,[4] the ratio of UDM does not affect the content of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law, but rather stands for a meta-principle that the judiciary should defer to the legislature in politically sensitive cases concerning the design of the electoral system. If this is so, then UDM also does not qualify the standard or level of review in political rights cases. Instead, it provides for a strong principle of deference in a narrow set of cases implicating political rights: those involving the electoral system. Although the UDM Court did proceed to apply a rationality test to the floor-crossing provisions, it did so to determine whether they were consistent with the rule of law. It did not apply to the provisions a test for an infringement of FC s 19 or any other right.[5] It ultimately concluded that the impugned provisions were rational.[6]

In relation to the right to vote, a particular version of the counter-majoritarian argument has been advanced by some judges of the Constitutional Court. The argument is that, by interfering in the legislative process or invalidating legislation adopted by democratically elected legislative bodies (even if doing so in order to enforce the right to vote), the Court is undermining the right to vote itself.[7] The answer to this concern lies in the supremacy of the Final Constitution. In Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J explained:

> This Court has emphasised on more than one occasion that although there are no bright lines that separate its role from those of the other branches of government,

[1] UDM (supra) at para 49.
[2] Ibid at para 35.
[3] Ibid at para 115.
[4] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10, 10-64 — 10-65.
[5] UDM (supra) at para 55.
[6] Ibid at para 70.
[7] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 339 (Yacoob J) and at para 239 (Sachs J).

> 'there are certain matters that are pre-eminently within the domain of one or other of the arms of government and not the others. All arms of government should be sensitive to and respect this separation.'
>
> But at the same time, it has made clear that this does not mean that courts cannot or should not make orders that have an impact on the domain of the other branches of government. When legislation is challenged on the grounds that Parliament did not adopt it in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, courts have to consider whether in enacting the law in question Parliament has given effect to its constitutional obligations. If it should hold in any given case that Parliament has failed to do so, it is obliged by the Constitution to say so. And insofar as this constitutes an intrusion into the domain of the legislative branch of government, that is an intrusion mandated by the Constitution itself. What should be made clear is that when it is appropriate to do so, courts may — and if need be must — use their powers to make orders that affect the legislative process.[1]

In the area of election law, the courts play a special role as the 'referees' of the democratic process.[2] Rather than having the usual counter-majoritarian function of ensuring that the popular will of the people as expressed through legislative enactments is in accord with the Final Constitution, the duty of the 'referee court' (including the Independent Electoral Commission and Electoral Court) during elections is to ensure that the popular will of the people is fairly represented in the outcome.[3] As such, the courts can be seen as the guardians of democracy and their supervision helps to extend the legitimacy of the democratic process.

(b) Standard of review in political rights cases

The Constitutional Court, at least rhetorically, has recognized the profound importance of political rights. In New National Party, for example, the Court remarked: 'The importance of the right to vote is self-evident and can never be overstated … without it there can be no democracy.'[4] In August, Sachs J held:

> Universal adult suffrage on a common voters roll is one of the foundational values of our entire constitutional order. The achievement of the franchise has historically been important both for the acquisition of the rights of full and effective citizenship by all South Africans regardless of race, and for the accomplishment of an all-embracing nationhood. The universality of the franchise is important not only for nationhood and democracy. The vote of each and every citizen is a badge of dignity and of personhood. Quite literally, it says that everybody counts.[5]

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 199 citing Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC) at para 98.

[2] I Ebsen Das Bundesverfassungsgericht als Element gesellschaftlicher Selbstregulierung: eine pluralistische Theorie der Verfassungsgerichtbarkeit im demokratischer Verfassungsstaat (1985) 340; J Ely Democracy and Distrust (1980) 73. The last author refers to the famous footnote of Justice Stone in United States v Carolene Products 304 US 144, 152-53 (1938) n 4: 'It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation.'

[3] The framers of the Canadian Charter recognized the different function fulfilled by the courts in this area by not subjecting the right to vote (s 3) to the override power afforded Parliament in s 33.1 of the Charter.

[4] New National Party (supra) at para 11.

[5] August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August') at para 17.

And in African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission & Others, the Court held that it will interpret legislation 'to promote enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement and participation rather than exclusion'.[1]

The Court's rhetorical statements about the importance of political rights have not, however, been translated into a strict standard of review. Quite the opposite. In New National Party, the Court adopted a highly deferential standard of review in relation to a constitutional challenge to certain provisions of the Electoral Act. The provisions in question required a particular kind of bar-coded identity document as a precondition for registration as a voter in national and provincial elections, as well as for the exercise of the right to vote itself. Yacoob J for the majority tested the impugned legislation by asking, first, whether the regulatory scheme was rationally related to a legitimate government purpose, holding that reasonableness only became relevant during limitations analysis.[2] Yacoob J then went further, holding that to succeed in establishing that the Act infringed the right to vote, a litigant would have to show that, 'as at the date of the adoption of the measure, its probable consequence would be that those who want to vote would not have been able to do so, even though they acted reasonably in pursuit of the right.'[3] On this test, citizens must prove the reasonableness of their conduct in pursuing their rights, but legislation need only be rational to pass constitutional muster. On the facts, Yacoob J found that the requirement of the bar-coded identity document as the principal method of identification was, on the face of it, rationally connected to the legitimate governmental purpose of enabling the effective exercise of the vote.[4] This degree of deference to the legislature does not sufficiently protect the right to vote and is discordant with the rhetorical importance that the Court places on the right to vote in other cases.

O'Regan J issued a compelling dissent in New National Party, holding that mere rules and regulations, some of which may restrict certain people's ability to exercise their right to vote, do not limit the right to vote. They constitute a necessary form of regulation.[5] According to O'Regan J, the primary obligation imposed by FC s 19(2) and (3) is not negative but positive. It requires government to take positive steps to ensure that the right is fulfilled.[6] Matters such as the location of the polling booths, the hours of voting and the requirements of proof of identity must be regulated by law. When creating this regulatory framework, Parliament should seek to enhance democracy, not to limit it.[7] Citizens must comply with reasonable regulation: unreasonable regulation will infringe the right to vote.[8] The following passage lies at the heart of her reasoning:

[1] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 23.
[2] See New National Party (supra) at paras 23-24. For further discussion of the relationship between the rights analysis and the limitations analysis in New National Party, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.
[3] New National Party (supra) at para 23.
[4] Ibid at paras 26 and 31.
[5] Ibid at para 123.
[6] Ibid at para 118.
[7] Ibid at para 122.
[8] Ibid at para 124.

> Given the constitutional obligations imposed upon Parliament to enhance democracy by providing for free and fair elections, it seems incongruous and inappropriate that this Court should be able to determine whether citizens have acted reasonably, but not Parliament. Citizens, of course, have an obligation to comply with reasonable regulations made by Parliament and the Commission in order to exercise their right to vote. This Court must, however, determine whether Parliament (and the Commission) has acted reasonably in making such regulations. If citizens do not comply with reasonable regulations, they cannot complain that their right to vote has been infringed. The test proposed by Yacoob J may also be difficult to apply. South Africa is a diverse society. Some of its citizens are fully literate and live in wealth and comfort, many, however, are disadvantaged both educationally and materially. What is reasonable for one group of citizens may be quite unreasonable for another. It is not clear to me how the test established by the majority can accommodate sensitively the realities of South African society. Related to this difficulty with the test is the problem that the test may be evasive of application in relation to those citizens who are unaware of legislative provisions which qualify the right to vote. In this case, evidence was produced which showed that in July 1998, almost 60% of South Africans were unaware of the fact that they would need a bar-coded ID to vote. Many of them may still be unaware of that fact. Ignorance will lead to non-compliance. Is such non-compliance always to be considered unreasonable conduct? It seems to me therefore that the test adopted by the majority may be difficult to apply.
>
> In my view, the proper approach is to require legislative regulation of the right to vote to be reasonable. As a test, it is less difficult to implement than the test adopted by the majority. It will enable appropriate scrutiny of legislative measures regulating elections before they are held and it emphasises not only the importance of the right to vote but also the importance of the obligation imposed upon Parliament to enact measures in a manner which will enhance, not inhibit, the growth of democracy in South Africa.[1]

The simple rationality test adopted by the majority in New National Party is far too deferential a standard to apply to such a profoundly important right. It also rests on two incorrect assumptions. The first is that the principle of separation of powers prohibits courts from determining whether the legislature acted reasonably. This is not the case, as the Court's later decisions in Doctors for Life and Matatiele II illustrate. Indeed, in Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J emphasized the appropriateness of reasonableness as a review standard and its frequent use as such throughout the Final Constitution.[2]

The second incorrect assumption in New National Party is that the validity of a statute is ordinarily determined with reference to the circumstances that existed at the time of its enactment.[3] Although the majority of the Court conceded that the circumstances prevailing at the time when the validity of the provision is considered by a court are not irrelevant, the majority clearly favoured 'putting itself in the position of the legislature at the time when the legislation was passed'. The Court develops this approach from the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality, ie the principle that a pre-existing law becomes invalid the moment the Constitution comes into force.[1] This doctrine of objective unconstitutionality in turn follows from the principle of constitutional supremacy. It is normally used to explain one of the consequences of constitutional invalidity, which is that, in theory, a court merely 'confirms' that a statute is invalid and that its order of invalidity therefore operates retrospectively. While it may be the correct approach in theory, it should never be rigidly adhered to in practice. The Court's jurisprudence on the retrospectivity of orders of invalidity makes manifest this inherent flexibility. In any event, the doctrine is of doubtful assistance in the interpretation stage of analysis. If strictly applied it would mean that the court must not only put itself in the shoes of the legislature at the time when the law was passed but also ask itself what the Final Constitution meant when the law was passed. In so far as an applicant alleges that the effect of a law is unconstitutional, it seems strange to decide the matter by trying to predict the effects of the legislation when the law was passed, rather than simply looking at what they really are.

[1] New National Party (supra) at paras 126-127.
[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 126.
[3] New National Party (supra) at para 22.

The Court's decision to approach the matter from the time when the law was passed leads it to make artificial distinctions between the constitutional validity of the statutory provisions and the constitutional validity of their implementation. When the effect of a law is considered, this distinction seldom makes sense. The way in which a law is implemented may provide insight into its eventual effects. Thus, requiring proof of identity with the bar-coded ID undoubtedly had the effect of making it more difficult for people to exercise their right to vote. As O'Regan J concluded in her dissenting judgment,[2] this requirement was unreasonable. In New National Party, the Court should have balanced the extent of the infringement against the importance of the purpose of the legislation under the limitations clause.

In August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others,[3] which was decided before New National Party, the Court had appeared to upgrade the level of review in respect of the right to vote from rationality to reasonableness. The question before the August Court was whether the Electoral Commission had an obligation to take affirmative steps to ensure that prisoners awaiting trial and sentenced prisoners could register and then vote in an upcoming general election. The Court held that the right to vote 'by its very nature imposes positive obligations on the legislature and the executive',[4] that the Electoral Commission had an 'obligation to take reasonable steps to create the opportunity to enable eligible prisoners to register and vote',[5] and that any limitation on the right to vote must pass scrutiny under the limitation clause. The August Court found the inaction of the legislature and the Commission unconstitutional. It ordered the Electoral Commission to make 'all reasonable arrangements' to ensure that people who were imprisoned during the registration period could register, and that all

[1] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek v Powell 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 25-30.
[2] New National Party (supra) at para 158.
[3] August (supra) at para 3.
[4] NICRO (supra) at para 16.
[5] Ibid at para 22.

registered prisoners could vote in the upcoming election. However, the references to 'reasonableness' appear to be obiter dicta, as the case was decided on the basis that the right to vote in FC s 19 was obviously limited, and that such limitation could only be justified under FC s 36 if effected by means of a law of general application.[1] Accordingly, the level of review to which a statute limiting the right to vote would be subjected did not really arise.

In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others, the standard for testing infringements of the right to vote again did not need to be addressed. The Minister of Home Affairs had, correctly in the view of the NICRO Court, conceded that legislation that precluded prisoners sentenced to imprisonment without the option of a fine from voting in upcoming elections limited the right to vote, but sought to justify the limitation under FC s 36. Due to this concession, the Court said nothing about the level of review under FC s 19. The Minister bore the onus to justify the conceded limitation of the right, and the Court held that this onus had not been discharged by the two lines of justificatory argument advanced. First, the NICRO Court held that the main thrust of the government's justification of the provisions in question was directed to logistical and cost arguments which, on the evidence before the Court, could not be sustained.[2] Secondly, as to the policy issues raised as justification (that at the level of policy it was important for the government to denounce crime, particularly crimes involving violence and even theft, and to communicate to the public that citizens' rights are related to their duties and obligations as citizens), the NICRO Court held that the legislation was not narrowly tailored to such crimes, and that in any event insufficient evidence had been placed before it by the Minister.[3] Due to the Minister's concession, the Court did not have to consider these justifications as against FC s 19. Arguably, given a proper evidentiary foundation, these bases might justify depriving certain prisoners of the vote in terms of a rationality testing. But they would appear to remain unreasonable.

In UDM, although it ultimately adopted a very deferential approach, the Court nevertheless referred to reasonableness as the applicable level of review in considering whether floor-crossing was inimical to the multi-party system of government established by FC s 1*(d)*. The Court held:

> A multi-party democracy contemplates a political order in which it is permissible for different political groups to organise, promote their views through public debate and participate in free and fair elections. These activities may be subjected to reasonable regulation compatible with an open and democratic society. Laws which go beyond that, and which undermine multi-party democracy, will be invalid. What has to be decided, therefore, is whether this is the effect of the disputed legislation.[4]

[1] NICRO (supra) at paras 3 and 31.
[2] Ibid at para 66.
[3] Ibid at para 67.
[4] UDM (supra) at para 26.

In Doctors for Life and Matatiele II, the Court applied a standard of reasonableness to the state's duty to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process.[1] The right to such public involvement in the law-making process forms part of the broader 'right to political participation', as does FC s 19.[2] It remains to be seen whether reasonableness will be the yardstick for all obligations arising out of the broad right to political participation (outside of the right to vote), or even what the content of this right will be. A further question is what the standard of review will be where a litigant relies on both FC s 19 and the right to participate in the law-making process (for example, where legislation impacting on the right to vote is passed without sufficient public involvement). In such a case, the challenge as to the substantive complaint and the procedural complaint would be closely related. It seems paradoxical that such legislation could be tested for reasonableness as to process requirements, but merely for rationality as to its substance.

The dissenting approach of O'Regan J in New National Party fits much more comfortably with the dicta of the Court in August and UDM regarding reasonableness and with the majority's conception of the nature of South African democracy in Doctors for Life and Matatiele II. Unfortunately, however, absent a departure from precedent, the majority decision in New National Party will remain valid in respect of challenges to electoral statutes allegedly infringing the right to vote.

(c) Remedies in political rights cases

The difficulty of issuing effective remedies exerts a strong influence over the Constitutional Court's FC s 19 jurisprudence. If a complaint is lodged timeously, an interdict or some other effective remedy can often be fashioned prior to an election, even if it requires the Court to push back electoral deadlines for a political party to register for an election.[3] The Court has shown a pragmatic willingness to quickly consider time-sensitive electoral issues.[4] Once an election has taken place, however, the possibilities for remedy shrink considerably. Absent a severe infringement that could clearly have changed the outcome of an election, it is difficult to conceive of a post-election remedy for the prevention of a qualified voter from voting — whether or not FC s 38 requires that an effective remedy must be found.

Setting aside an election is a drastic remedy. It is particularly so in a system of proportional representation, where it is not possible to limit the order to the [1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 146; Matatiele (II) (supra) at para 50.

[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 105-08.

[3] In African Christian Democratic Party, the Court ordered the Electoral Commission to ignore its deposit deadline to allow the ACDP to register to contest the Cape Metro elections.

[4] In New National Party, NICRO, African Christian Democratic Party and Liberal Party, the Court expedited its procedures in order to deal with a time-sensitive electoral matter.

constituencies affected.[1] Accordingly, save in the most extreme circumstances, where the effect of the unconstitutional law or conduct outweighs the cumulative effect of the mechanisms meant to ensure that the election is free and fair, the Court is unlikely to set aside an election. Where a substantial period of time has elapsed since the election, the public interest in the finality of the result will outweigh the interests of the litigants.[2] A mere declarator may at least serve the purpose of condemning the breach. The Court could also consider awarding constitutional damages, in place of an order setting aside election results.[3]

Several statutes, such as the Electoral Act and the Labour Relations Act, provide remedies when political rights are violated by private persons. The statutes afford the individual, in some respects, broader rights than FC s 19. Whether the courts will develop remedies beyond those conferred by these statutes depends on the approach to the scope and limitation of political rights and the interpretation of FC s 8(3). For example, the Labour Relations Act does not oblige an employer to grant a worker leave for the purpose of standing for public office.[4] If the request for leave is refused, a court is likely to hold that FC s 19 is not infringed because the right to stand for public office does not entitle a worker to leave. Similarly, it does not entitle a candidate to financial support for his or her campaign. This interpretation of FC s 19 makes it unnecessary to consider a common-law remedy to give effect to the right. The Electoral Act, to use another example, creates several criminal offences to prevent horizontal infringements of the right to vote. However, the Act provides no civil remedies.[5] A court is unlikely to hold that the existence of these criminal prohibitions disposes of the need to develop a civil remedy. Even if one considers them to be 'remedies', they hardly offer 'appropriate relief' to the complainant. In such cases (for example, where one private person unlawfully prevents another from voting on election day), a declarator coupled with an award of damages seems to be the only remedy appropriate to vindicate the right to vote and deter infringements in future.

[1] See Dongo v Mwashita & Others 1995 (2) ZLR 228 (HC). The Zimbabwean High Court held that trivial deviations from laws governing the conduct of elections would not lead to the setting aside of an election. However, the court found that the irregularities in the present case were substantial and had affected the result of the election, and that the election therefore had to be set aside. However, the court was only considering a single constituency within a general election.

[2] Zimbabwean cases support this proposition. See, eg, Mandava v Chigudu & Others 2000 (1) ZLR 679 (HC); Makamure v Mutongwiza 1998 (2) ZLR 154 (H); Kutama v Town Clerk, Kwekwe 1993 (2) ZLR 137 (S). In these cases, delay weighed heavily against granting the relief sought. See also DTA of Namibia v Prime Minister of the Republic of Namibia 1996 (3) BCLR 310 (NmH).

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae*)* 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC). See also M Bishop, J Klaaren, M Chaskalson & S Budlender 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 9.

[4] The Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 merely affords employees who are office bearers of representative trade unions the right to take reasonable paid leave during working hours to perform their functions. See LRS s 15.

[5] See Electoral Act 73 of 1998 ss 87-94 read with ss 97-99.

45.6 THE BROAD AND NARROW RIGHTS TO PARTICIPATE IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS: DOCTORS FOR LIFE AND MATATIELE II

In Doctors for Life and Matatiele II, the Constitutional Court discovered in the Final Constitution a broad, general principle of public participation in the political process. At lease some aspects of the principle are justiciable. One component of the right to political participation is the right to public involvement in the law-making process. Another component of the right is FC s 19 read with FC ss 16 to 18. In Doctors for Life, the Court held that the international law right to political participation encompasses a general right to participate in the conduct of public affairs and a more specific right to vote and/or be elected to public office.[1] The Court went on to find a domestic equivalent of this international law position in the Constitution, holding:

> In our country, the right to political participation is given effect not only through the political rights guaranteed in section 19 of the Bill of Rights, as supported by the right to freedom of expression but also by imposing a constitutional obligation on legislatures to facilitate public participation in the law-making process.

As discussed in § 45.2(d) above, in international law the broad and narrow rights are both located in the text of art 25 of the ICCPR. In the Final Constitution, however, only the narrower right is contained in FC s 19. To find the broader right to political participation, therefore, the Doctors for Life Court had to go further afield, both to international law itself and to the right to public involvement in the legislative process in FC s 59(1)(a) (in respect of the National Assembly), FC s 72(1)(a) (in respect of the National Council of Provinces), and FC s 118(1)(a) (in respect of provincial legislatures).[2]

The applicant in Doctors for Life impugned a cluster of health-related statutes — the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Amendment Act,[3] the Sterilisation Amendment Act,[4] the Traditional Health Practitioners Act[5] and the Dental Technicians Amendment Act[6] — on the grounds that, during the legislative process leading to their enactment, the National Council of Provinces (NCOP) and provincial legislatures had not complied with their constitutional obligations under FC ss 72(1)(a) and 118(1)(a). In terms of FC s 72(1)(a), the NCOP 'must … facilitate public involvement in [its] legislative and other processes… and [those of] its committees'. FC s 118(1)(a) imposes a similar obligation on the provincial legislatures.[7]

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 105.
[2] Doctors for Life (supra) and Matatiele II (supra).
[3] Act 38 of 2004
[4] Act 3 of 2005.
[5] Act 35 of 2004.
[6] Act 24 of 2004.
[7] Ngcobo J delivered the judgment of the majority. Sachs J filed a separate concurring judgment, and Yacoob J (with the concurrence of Skweyiya J) and Van der Westhuizen J filed dissenting judgments.

At the outset, Ngcobo J, writing for the majority, addressed the issue of separation of powers, noting that this principle is one of the essential features of South African democracy.[1] While the courts must observe the constitutional limits of their authority, and not interfere in the processes of other branches of government unless so mandated by the Final Constitution,[2] the Final Constitution is the supreme law and binds all branches of government, including Parliament.[3] Accordingly, the Court has the power and responsibility to ensure that Parliament fulfils its constitutional obligations: it would require clear language in the Final Constitution to deprive the Court of this power.[4]

Ngcobo J considered the right to political participation under international law and foreign law. He concluded that, under international law,[5] while the right can be achieved in many ways, it 'does not require less of a government than provision for meaningful exercise of choice in some form of electoral process and public participation in the law-making process by permitting public debate and dialogue with elected representatives'.[6] Ngcobo J held that the duty to facilitate public involvement in the legislative process under the Final Constitution must be understood as a manifestation of the international law right to political participation. Under the Final Constitution, he explained, the right to political participation is given effect to not only through FC s 19, as supported by the right to freedom of expression, 'but also by imposing a constitutional obligation on legislatures to facilitate public participation in the law-making process'.[7] This public involvement in the legislative process, noted Ngcobo J, is a more specific form of political participation than that provided for by art 25 of the ICCPR, which provides for participation in the conduct of 'public affairs' more generally.[8]

As a backdrop to his consideration of the content of the right to public involvement in the law-making process, Ngcobo J for the majority espoused the Court's own principle of democracy:

> The democratic government that is contemplated in the Constitution is thus a representative and participatory democracy which is accountable, responsive and transparent and which makes provision for the public to participate in the law-making process.[9]

Ngcobo J went on to consider by what standard to test the state's obligations to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process. He emphasized that Parliament will have considerable discretion in determining how best to fulfil its duty

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 36.
[2] Ibid at para 37.
[3] Ibid at para 38.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at paras 90-106. See § 45.2(d) and (e) infra for a more detailed consideration of international law and foreign law.
[6] Ibid at para 106.
[7] Ibid at para 106.
[8] Ibid at para 107.
[9] Ibid at para 121.

to facilitate public involvement.[1] He concluded, however, that a legislature must act reasonably in discharging its duty to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process.[2] In determining whether a legislature has acted reasonably, relevant factors will include: the nature and importance of the legislation and the intensity of its impact on the public; practicalities such as time and expense, which relate to the efficiency of the law-making process; [3] and rules, if any, adopted by the legislature to facilitate public involvement.[4] However, practicalities alone will not justify failure to involve the public.[5] In evaluating the reasonableness of the conduct of a legislature, the Court will nevertheless pay particular attention to what the particular legislature considers reasonable.[6]

Ngcobo J held that there are two aspects to the constitutional duty of legislatures to take reasonable steps to facilitate public involvement: first, 'the duty to provide meaningful opportunities for public participation in the law-making process'; and, secondly, 'the duty to take measures to ensure that people have the ability to take advantage of the opportunities provided'.[7] This second, broader requirement has at its core public education and other such measures.[8] The purpose of such measures is to 'create conditions … conducive to the effective exercise of the right to participate in the law-making process.'[9] Ngcobo J discussed the various practical means of providing opportunities for public participation: he observed that the conventional methods are the submission of written or oral representations,[10] and held that public participation can be achieved through either method.[11] Again, the ultimate question is whether what the legislature has done is reasonable in the circumstances.[12]

On the facts, Ngcobo J found that the NCOP had failed to discharge its constitutional duty to facilitate public involvement in respect of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Amendment Bill[13] and the Traditional Health Practitioners Bill,[14] but that it had discharged its obligations in respect of the Dental Technicians Amendment Bill.[15] The basis for the finding of breach concerning two of the Bills was that the NCOP had decided that public hearings should be held in relation to the two Bills, and that they should be held in the provinces, but that neither the NCOP nor a majority of the provinces had in fact held the promised hearings.[16]

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 122-24.
[2] Ibid at paras 125-26.
[3] Ibid at para 128 and para 146.
[4] Ibid at para 146.
[5] Ibid
[6] Ibid
[7] Ibid at para 129.
[8] Ibid at paras 130-34.
[9] Ibid at para 132.
[10] Ibid at para 142.
[11] Ibid at para 144.
[12] Ibid at para 146.
[13] Ibid at para 189.
[14] Ibid at para 181.
[15] Ibid at para 192.
[16] Ibid at para 193.

In considering the remedy, Ngcobo J held that the obligation to facilitate public involvement is a manner and form requirement of the law-making process. Non-compliance renders the resulting legislation invalid.[1] However, he suspended the Court's order of invalidity for eighteen months to enable Parliament to re-enact the impugned legislation by following the correct procedure.[2] Ngcobo J further adopted a restrictive approach to standing. He held that there are two extraordinary standing requirements for such an application to be heard: first, the applicant must have sought and been denied an opportunity to be heard on the relevant Bills; and, secondly, the applicant must have launched the application as soon as practicable after the Bills had been promulgated.[3]

Yacoob J dissented.[4] He held, for largely textual reasons, that 'public involvement' does not mean 'public participation'.[5] Moreover, he reasoned that the Final Constitution does not require public involvement as a requirement for valid enactment of legislation;[6] that to infer such a requirement when it is not expressly provided for would impermissibly undermine the legislature and the right to vote;[7] and that, in the circumstances, the failure to hold public hearings 'though regrettable [was] of no constitutional moment'.[8] Van der Westhuizen J's dissenting judgment held that public involvement is not a constitutional requirement for passing legislation. His judgment tracked the logic of Yacoob J's dissent.[9] Separation of powers concerns feature strongly in both dissenting judgments.[10]

In the judgment of Sachs J, who concurred in the majority judgment, the separation of powers doctrine sounds a central theme. Despite his concurrence, Sachs J called for caution:

> New jurisprudential ground is being tilled. Both the separation (and intertwining) of powers in our Constitution, and the notions underlying our participatory democracy, alert one to the need for a measured and appropriate judicial response. I would prefer to leave the way open for incremental evolution on a case by case [basis] in future. . . .I fear the virtues of participatory democracy risk being undermined if the result of automatic invalidation is that relatively minor breaches of the duty to facilitate public involvement produce a manifestly disproportionate impact on the legislative process.[11]

In Matatiele II, which was delivered the day after Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J again delivered the majority judgment. The majority essentially applyied the principles established in Doctors for Life to the facts of Matatiele II. Matatiele II concerned a constitutional challenge to the Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act[12] and the

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 209.
[2] Ibid at para 214.
[3] Ibid at para 216.
[4] Skweyiya J concurred in the judgment of Yacoob J.
[5] Ibid at para 308.
[6] Ibid at paras 317-20.
[7] Ibid at paras 338-39.
[8] Ibid.
[9] Ibid at paras 241-245.
[10] Ibid at para 244(7) (Van der Westhuizen J) and at para 338 (Yacoob J).
[11] Ibid at para 239.
[12] Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act of 2005.

Cross-boundary Municipalities Laws Repeal and Related Matters Act.[1] The constitutional amendment and the related act had the effect of re-demarcating the boundary of the municipality of Matatiele so as to transfer it from KwaZulu-Natal to the Eastern Cape. Ngcobo J affirmed the ratio of Doctors for Life: legislatures must take reasonable steps to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process.[2] Ngcobo J found on the facts that, although the Eastern Cape legislature had discharged its obligations by holding public consultations, the KwaZulu-Natal legislature had failed to do so.[3] He declared invalid the offending legislation, but suspended the order of invalidity for eighteen months.[4] Skweyiya, van der Westhuizen and Yacoob JJ filed separate dissenting judgments that reaffirmed the dissenting position they had adopted in Doctors for Life.

It is clear from these two cases, therefore, that South African democracy has a participatory dimension. Out of this broad right to political participation some justiciable rights arise. One segment of this broad right consists of the political rights in FC s 19. Another is the duty of legislatures to take reasonable steps to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process.

45.7 Structure of FC s 19

FC s 19, whilst forming part of the broad right to political participation, is itself divided into three subsections, each of which deals with a separate category of political rights: the freedom to make independent political choices, the right to free and fair elections, and the right to vote and run for elective office. It is significant that the first two rights are granted to 'every citizen', while the third is granted to 'every adult citizen'. Not only does this mean that only adult citizens may vote, but it makes explicit that the freedom to make independent political choices and the guarantee of free and fair elections are a constitutional right of every South African citizen, regardless of age.[5] As such, the text of FC s 19 makes political freedom and the entitlement to live in the particular type of constitutional democracy created by the Final Constitution core components of South African citizenship.

In addition, where a case does not neatly fit into any one of these categories, the Constitutional Court has shown a willingness to resort to FC s 19 as a whole, bolstering its interpretation by reference to the founding values in FC s 1*(d)* and the principle of democracy. In African Christian Democratic Party, for example, the Court held that FC s 1*(d)* and FC s 19 mean that electoral statutes, where ambiguous, should be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement and against disenfranchisement.[6] In Doctors for Life and Matatiele II, the Court, having considered

[1] Act 23 of 2005.
[2] Matatiele II (supra) at para 50.
[3] Ibid at paras 83-84.
[4] Ibid at para 114.
[5] New National Party (supra) at para 12.
[6] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 23.

various provisions, including FC s 19 and FC s 1*(d)*, concluded that South African democracy has both representative and participatory dimensions. Against this background, the Court relied on the provisions of the Final Constitution that require legislatures to facilitate public involvement in the law-making process and held that the legislatures have a duty to take reasonable steps to do so.[1]

One possible challenge that might not fit neatly under any one of the subsections of FC s 19 is a challenge to the requirement that a deposit be paid by parties wishing to contest an election. Requiring the payment of a deposit for electoral participation constitutes a baseline property or wealth qualification and thereby infringes FC s 19 as a whole, especially when read together with the principle of democracy established in Doctors for Life and Matatiele II. However, in African Christian Democratic Party, the Court delivered an obiter dictum that appears to endorse the requirement of a deposit, noting that it ensures that the participation of political parties in elections is not frivolous, and that the payment of a deposit complements the duty to inform the electoral authorities of the party's intention to participate and of the details of its candidates.[2] Nevertheless, if a political party were able to show that its participation in an election was not frivolous and that it had complied with the other procedural requirements, such as furnishing the prescribed notifications and information, it might have some prospects of success in a challenge to the deposit requirement. While the currently prescribed deposit for local government elections is not unreasonably high, the total amount escalates according to the number of municipalities contested. This escalation of fees may be prohibitive for new or emerging parties.

45.8 FC s 19(1): The Freedom to Make Political Choices[3]

The purpose of FC s 19(1) is to ensure that citizens are able freely to align themselves with the political cause or party of their choice without fear of adverse consequences. As such, FC s 19(1) is essentially a freedom right and a special political species of the rights to equality, freedom of expression, belief, opinion, assembly and association.

Anticipating that the freedom to make independent political choices may be infringed in the workplace, FC s 197(3) stipulates that no employee of the public service 'may be favoured or prejudiced only because that person supports a particular political party or cause.' The Labour Relations Act also aims to protect employees from being forced to toe a certain political line. In terms of s 186 of the Act, a dismissal is automatically unfair if the employer unfairly discriminated against an employee on the basis of political opinion. Section 26(3) of the LRA provides that a closed shop agreement is only binding if no amount of the [1] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 125-126; Matatiele II (supra) at para 50.

[2] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 31.
[3] The freedom to make political choices was protected by IC s 21(1).

worker's salary is deducted to benefit a political party or contributed to the campaigning costs of a candidate standing for political office.[1]

In IDASA, the applicants sought to establish the principle that political parties, or at least those holding seats in the national, provincial or local government legislatures, are obliged in terms of FC s 32(1) (the right of access to information) and ss 11 and 50 of the Promotion of Access to Information Act (PAIA),[2] to disclose details of the substantial donations that they receive, on due and proper request to do so by any South African citizen. In support of the application, the applicants relied on FC s 19(1) and (2). FC s 19(1) and (2) guarantee the rights 'to make political choices' and to 'fair and regular elections' respectively. The High Court held that the respondent political parties were private, and not public, bodies for the purpose of a PAIA request for access to information.[3] Accordingly, the applicants had to show that they reasonably required the respondents' donation records in order to exercise or protect those particular rights.[4]

The applicants contended that the right 'to make political choices' entailed 'the right, in the first place, to choose between political parties'.[5] They argued further that, in order to exercise this choice, citizens require relevant information about a party, its policies and its finances. It was further contended on behalf of the applicants that an election is only 'fair' if the electorate can make informed choices. Implicit in these submissions is a deep conception of democracy, one in which citizens actively participate in and through the medium of political parties.

The High Court held that the applicants had failed to explain how the respondents' donation records would assist them to exercise or protect their rights in terms of FC s 19(1) and (2). It held that donor secrecy did not impugn any of the rights contained in either of these subsections. In doing so, the High Court adopted a narrow, literal interpretation of FC s 19(1) that holds that the provision was 'intended to prevent any restrictions being imposed on a citizen's right to make political choices, such as forming a political party, participating in the activities of and recruiting members for a party, and campaigning for a political cause.' This interpretation limits FC s 19(1) to the formal aspects of political activity by citizens. The High Court held further that 'the emphasis in section 19(2) lies upon the elections and the nature of the electoral process and not so much upon the persons or parties participating in those elections.'[6] This reasoning echoes the Constitutional Court's dictum in UDM that all the rights in FC s 19 'are directed

[1] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; C Cooper 'Labour Relations in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 53.

[2] Act 2 of 2000.

[3] Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Others v African National Congress & Others 2005 (10) BCLR 995 (c)(IDASA) at para 32.

[4] Ibid at para 33.

[5] Ibid at para 42.

[6] Ibid at para 47.

to elections, to voting and to participation in political activities [and that]… [b]etween elections … voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives.'[1]

The IDASA Court accordingly declined to interpret the right to make political choices, and FC s 19 as a whole, in accordance with a deliberative conception of democracy in which informed citizens actively engage in a genuine dialogue with their elected representatives and with the political parties campaigning for their votes.[2] Instead, the High Court adopted a check-box conception of the right to make political choices, limited to the formal, external choices in respect of forming a political party, participating in the (formal) activities of and recruiting members for a party, and campaigning for a political cause. There is much to be said for the contention that these acts are worth less (perhaps even worthless) if performed by an uninformed, disengaged citizenry. In Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J emphasized that '[p]ublic involvement in the legislative process requires access to information and the facilitation of learning and understanding in order to achieve meaningful involvement by ordinary citizens.'[3]

(a) The right to form a political party

FC s 19(1) protects the right to form a political party and the freedom to determine the purpose and objectives of that party. The Electoral Commission Act makes provision for political parties to register.[4] In order to take part in an election, a political party must give the Electoral Commission notice of its intention to contest the election, provide the Commission with a party list, and pay a deposit via a bank guaranteed cheque.[5] The requirements for registration therefore pose no substantive barriers to a person wishing to form a political party. They are merely procedural. It is not even clear whether a political party has to be registered in terms of this Act. The objective of the provisions may simply be to enable the Electoral Commission to maintain a register of parties.

Access to the ballot is controlled in terms of the provisions of the Electoral Act. These provisions require parties wishing to participate in elections to register in terms of that Act.[6] The biggest restriction on access to the ballot remains the payment of a deposit, the amount of which is determined by the Electoral Commission. The deposit is forfeited if the party fails to secure at least one seat in the elections it is contesting. As discussed in § 45.7, a deposit, which has the effect of substantially limiting access to the ballot, may be regarded as a property qualification and therefore unconstitutional.

[1] UDM (supra) quoted in IDASA (supra) at para 49.
[2] See S Bosch 'IDASA v ANC — An Opportunity Lost for Truly Promoting Access to Information' (2006) 123 SALJ 615 (Offers a useful criticism of the decision.)
[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 131.
[4] See ss 15-17 of the Electoral Commission Act 41 of 1993.
[5] See s 17 of the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000.
[6] See ss 26-31 of the Electoral Act.

The requirement to pay a 'deposit' to contest elections was considered in African Christian Democratic Party. The applicant ('ACDP') sought leave to appeal against a decision of the Electoral Court refusing to interfere with a decision by the Electoral Commission to exclude it from contesting the local government elections in the Cape Town Metropolitan area. The Electoral Commission held that the ACDP had not complied with ss 14 and 17 of the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act,[1] because it had failed to pay the prescribed deposit. The ACDP had made a bulk payment to the National Office of the Electoral Commission, as was permitted by the Electoral Commission, in respect of a list of municipalities which accompanied the payment. In error, the ACDP failed to include the Cape Town Metropolitan area on the list. After paying the bulk deposit, the ACDP decided not to contest seats in certain municipalities that appeared on the list. As a result, the Commission had surplus funds of R10 000 that were not specifically allocated as a deposit to any particular municipality. However, the ACDP failed to request that the Electoral Commission allocate a portion of the surplus to the Cape Town Metropolitan area. The Commission took the view that it had not received a deposit in respect of the Cape Town Metropolitan area and refused to allocate a portion of the surplus funds to that area. The Electoral Court upheld the Commission's view and dismissed the ACDP's complaint. The ACDP appealed to the Constitutional Court on the basis that it had paid the necessary deposit. The Electoral Commission opposed the appeal and contended that the ACDP had not.

O'Regan J, for the majority, held that, when interpreting electoral statutes, courts should seek to promote enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement, within the limits of the interpretive exercise.[2] Adopting this approach, O'Regan J held that ss 14 and 17 did not prevent the Electoral Commission from establishing a central or 'bulk' payment facility.[3] O'Regan J concluded that the surplus paid by the ACDP constituted compliance with these provisions and that the ACDP had, therefore, already paid the requisite deposit. No condonation of non-compliance was in issue.[4] After determining that an order for the applicant would not disrupt the upcoming election,[5] O'Regan J made an order declaring that the ACDP was entitled to participate in the elections and directing the Commission to facilitate its participation.[6]

The decision is to be welcomed. Procedural requirements for participation in elections, such as the payment of a deposit, though important both for practical

[1] Act 27 of 2000.
[2] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 23.
[3] Ibid at para 28.
[4] Ibid at paras 33-34.
[5] The Court stated that it must balance the disruption caused by the order and the fundamental importance of political rights. The closer the dispute to the date of the election, the more disruption such an order would cause.
[6] Ibid at para 37. Skweyiya J dissented, holding that the ACDP had failed to comply with the mandatory requirement of paying the deposit, and that conferring a discretion on the Electoral Commission would threaten the integrity of the elections and the democratic process.

purposes and to ensure that elections are, in fact, free and fair, should not overshadow the real purpose of elections: to provide citizens with an opportunity to participate directly, albeit periodically, in governance.

A further question is whether the Electoral Commission would be entitled to refuse to register a political party on the basis that its values, proposed policies or internal governance are unconstitutional. As noted above, the German Basic Law requires parties to be internally democratic and denies any protection to those that seek to undermine the constitutional state.[1] Section 16(1)(c) of the Electoral Act provides that the chief electoral officer may not register a party if the proposed name, symbols or the constitution or deed of foundation of the party contains anything propagating or inciting violence or hatred, or which causes serious offence to any section of the population on the grounds of race, gender, sex, or other listed grounds, or which indicates that persons will not be admitted to membership or welcomed as supporters on the grounds of their race, ethnic origin or colour. This statutory restriction is self-evidently a reasonable and justifiable limitation of the right to form a political party.

(b) The right to participate in the activities of a political party

The right to participate in the activities of a political party forms part of the freedom to make political choices and must be interpreted in this context. Just as the right to freedom of expression does not necessarily entitle a person to have his views published in the newspaper of his choice, FC s 19(1) does not entitle a person to participate in any particular activity of the party of her choice. In so far as the constitutions of the various political parties constrain members of political parties or other individuals from participating, FC s 19(1) will be of limited assistance. It will not enable applicants to challenge admission criteria or members to dispute intra-party decision-making mechanisms or disciplinary procedures. FC s 18, the freedom of association, is likely to form a more fertile constitutional basis for the review of admissions policies and expulsion proceedings.[2] Administrative law remedies, in particular judicial review, in terms of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act,[3] read with the constitutional rights to equality and to

[1] Article 21 [Political parties] of the Basic Law provides:
(1) Political parties shall participate in the formation of the political will of the people. They may be freely established. Their internal organization must conform to democratic principles. They must publicly account for their assets and for the sources and use of their funds. (2) Parties that, by reason of their aims or the behaviour of their adherents, seek to undermine or abolish the free democratic basic order or to endanger the existence of the Federal Republic of Germany shall be unconstitutional. The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule on the question of unconstitutionality. (3) Details shall be regulated by federal laws.

[2] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44 (Contends that control over entrance, voice and exit are essential for the protection of associational rights, and that the case law supports the proposition that fair hearings are a necessary feature of most public associations.)

[3] Act 3 of 2000.

just administrative action,[1] may also provide a more fruitful basis to challenge such party procedures.

Section 9(2) of the Electoral Code prohibits the use of threats or rewards to prevail upon persons to participate in political activity. Section 108 of the Electoral Act criminalizes holding or taking part in political meetings, marches or demonstrations on voting day. It also provides that no political activity other than voting is allowed at a voting station on voting day. These limitations are clearly constitutional. By limiting political activities during and shortly before the voting period, the statutory provisions seek to protect the right freely to make a political choice.

(c) The right to campaign for a political party

(i) General

The citizen's right to campaign for a political party aims to prevent intimidation and other forms of interference with free political canvassing and campaigning. Section 87 of the Electoral Act makes it an offence to prevent reasonable access to voters and unlawfully to prevent the holding of political meetings, marches, demonstrations and other political events. In so far as political rights are violated by rival political parties, the Code of Conduct addresses the situation.[2] Every party and every candidate participating in an election must subscribe to the Code.[3] The Act confers extensive powers on courts to deal with political parties and candidates acting in breach of the Act, including the Code of Conduct.[4] Vicarious liability of political parties is not regulated by statute and parties are therefore liable for acts committed by their members only when facts are proved which give rise to such liability at common law.[5]

It is unclear whether the right to campaign extends to the workplace. When trade unions engage in political activities it has to be kept in mind that, in terms of the Labour Relations Act, members of a trade union have the right to take part in

[1] The right to form a political party was protected by IC s 21(1)(a).

[2] See Schedule 2 of the 1998 Electoral Act. In terms of item 3*(c)* political parties are enjoined to take reasonable steps to prevent their members from contravening the Code or any other law. See African National Congress v National Party (Independent Electoral Commission Intervening) 1994 (4) SA 190, 202 (ENC). Kriek JP held, in respect of a similar provision of the 1993 Code, that this does not make the party responsible for all forms of illegal conduct perpetrated by party officials. In this case officials of the National Party unlawfully issued temporary voters' cards to 146 individuals in the Victoria West region. The court held that, as the National Party could not foresee the situation arising, its failure to warn its officials not to issue the cards was not unreasonable and no penalty was therefore imposed. Some of the provisions of the Electoral Act have an indirect bearing on the right to campaign for a political party by placing limitations on other fundamental rights. The right of political parties to freedom of expression is limited by s 9(1) of the Electoral Code. According to this section, false or defamatory remarks and the use of language which may lead to violence and intimidation are prohibited.

[3] See Electoral Act s 99.

[4] The penalties range from a warning to R200 000 fines to disqualification of candidates or even to the cancellation of the registration of a political party. See Electoral Act s 96.

[5] National Party v Jamie NO & Another 1994 (3) SA 483, 494 (EWC); Inkatha Freedom Party v African National Congress 1994 (3) SA 578, 588 (EN). For a discussion of the liability of political parties at common law, see Hamman v South West African People's Organisation 1991 (1) SA 127 (SWA).

the legal activities of the union and the representatives of the union have the right of access to the employer's premises.[1] Employee protest actions to promote or to defend socio-economic interests of workers are also protected.[2]

(ii) State funding of political parties[3]

FC s 19(1) clearly implies that there may be no restrictions on citizens' rights to make financial or other contributions to political parties, unless such restrictions meet the requirements of the limitations clause. Since it forms part of a freedom right, the right to campaign does not entitle a political party to claim support from the state. However, FC s 236 provides that, 'to enhance multi-party democracy, national legislation must provide for the funding of political parties participating in national and provincial legislatures on an equitable and proportional basis'.

The Public Funding of Represented Political Parties Act gives effect to FC s 236.[4] The Act establishes a special fund, managed by the Electoral Commission, from which money is allocated from time to time to the political parties represented in the National Assembly and the provincial legislatures. The amount parties receive depends on two considerations: the party's proportional number of seats and the principle of equity. The latter principle dictates that each represented party must receive a fixed minimum amount of money. The funds must be used for purposes compatible with the functioning of a political party in a modern democracy.

Unrepresented parties do not qualify for state funding. Since there is no constitutional entitlement to state funding, the exclusion of unrepresented parties does not violate FC s 19. However, the FC s 9(1) right to equal benefit of the law may form the basis for such a challenge.[5] FC s 9(1) requires that the differentiation between represented and unrepresented parties bear a rational connection to a legitimate government objective. The purpose of the Public Funding of [1] See LRA ss 4 and 12.

[2] See LRA s 77.

[3] See G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 29-21.

[4] See Act 103 of 1997.

[5] The constitutional guarantee of equal opportunity for political parties is merely a special application of the FC s 9 general equality clause. Some constitutions have special clauses which protect equal opportunity for political participation. Article 33(1) of the German Basic Law guarantees equal political rights and duties to every German in every federal state. See S Woolman & J de Waal 'Freedom of Association: The Right to be We' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 374. For the position in the United Kingdom, see A Birch 'The Theory and Practice of Modern British Democracy' in J Jowell & D Oliver The Changing Constitution (2nd Edition, 1989) 98.

In a decision of the Zimbabwean Supreme Court — United Parties v Minister of Justice, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs & Others 1998 (2) BCLR 224 (ZS) — a patently unfair system of funding political parties was held to violate the applicant party's right to freedom of speech. The statute provided that parties with less than fifteen elected members of Parliament were not entitled to any state funding at all. This threshold resulted in only one party, the majority party, qualifying for funding. In striking down the statute the court remarked that 'in poorer societies, where private funding is either not available or offers inadequate assistance, the inability to obtain state funding, because the qualification is set too high, causes a reduction of the effective freedom of expression of political parties'. Ibid at 237.

Represented Political Parties Act, and FC s 236, is to promote multi-party democracy. It is not clear why the achievement of this objective demands a differentiation between represented and unrepresented parties. An equality challenge is nevertheless unlikely to succeed for two reasons. First, the Public Funding of Represented Political Parties Act satisfies the requirement in FC s 236 that national legislation be enacted to regulate public funding of political parties. The legislation contemplated by FC s 236 is expressly required to provide for the funding of parties 'participating in national and provincial legislatures': that is, the parties actually represented in those bodies. Secondly, it could be argued that the differentiation between represented parties and unrepresented parties is not arbitrary since it is difficult to ascertain the support for unrepresented parties, and therefore the amount of state support that should be given to them.[1]

(iii) Political parties and the media

The right to campaign for a political party does not entitle the political party or an individual to access state-controlled media or privately owned media.[2] When a party is treated unfairly by the media, a challenge based on FC s 9, in conjunction with FC s 19, may be more sensible. During the 1994 elections the relationship between the media and the political parties was regulated by the Independent Media Commission. This body was dissolved and the Independent Broadcasting Authority (IBA) took over its function to determine the duration of, and other issues pertaining to, party political broadcasts during the election period.[3] The IBA has since been replaced by the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA).[4] The underlying principle remains that political parties must be treated equitably when the election is covered. For example, no broadcaster may be compelled to broadcast a political advertisement, but in making time available the broadcaster may not discriminate against a political party.

There are also statutory restrictions on publication during the period from the date on which an election is called to the date the result of the election is determined and declared. Section 107 of the Electoral Commission Act 51 of 1996 provides requirements in respect of any printed matter intending to affect the [1] Section 74 of the Electoral Act 202 of 1993 provided that parties qualified for 50 per cent of an initial grant if they submitted a list of 10 000 signatures (of National Assembly voters) or 3 000 signatures (of provincial legislature voters). The full initial grant was given to parties that could show, with a poll based on scientific methods and evaluation, potential support of at least two per cent of voters. The latter provision led to disputes about the representativity and scientific nature of a poll. See Workers International to Rebuild the Fourth International v IEC 1994 (3) SA 277 (SPE).

[2] See, eg, Woolman & De Waal 'Freedom of Association' (supra) at 372 n152 for the position in Germany. Small parties receive less television time than the larger parties in Germany

[3] The Independent Media Commission was established in terms of Act 148 of 1993. This Act, and therefore the Commission, ceased to exist when the Independent Electoral Commission was dissolved.

[4] ICASA was established in terms of the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act 13 of 2000. Section 2 provides that one of the objects of the Act is to regulate broadcasting in the public interest and to ensure fairness and a diversity of views broadly representing South African society, as required by FC s 192. See J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskaslon & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E.

outcome of an election.[1] No person may print, publish or distribute any printed matter or publication that does not comply with these requirements. This provision limits the right to freedom of expression, but this limitation is probably reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36. The right of political parties to freedom of expression is also limited by s 9(1) of the Electoral Code, which prohibits false or defamatory remarks and the use of language which may lead to violence and intimidation. At common law, political bodies fall within the class of non-trading corporations that can sue for defamation.[2]

45.9 FC s 19(2): The Right to Free, Fair and Regular Elections

The right to free, fair and regular elections in FC s 19(2) gives content and meaning to the right to vote.[3] As the Constitutional Court has held, 'the right to vote is indispensable to, and empty without, the right to free and fair elections'.[4] Whereas FC s 19(3) guarantees the existence of the right to vote, FC s 19(2) obliges the government to make proper arrangements for its effective exercise. Read together, these subsections entitle every South African citizen to vote in a free and fair election.[5]

One essential ingredient for a free and fair election is the creation of an independent commission to manage the elections.[6] Such a commission has been established by the Electoral Commission Act.[7] The two main functions of the Electoral Commission are to manage elections of national, provincial and municipal legislative bodies and to ensure that those elections are free and fair.[8] As far as the management of the elections is concerned, the role of the Commission is not merely supervisory.[9] Rather, its functions 'relate to an active, involved and detailed management obligation over a wide terrain'.[10] Moreover, the Commission is solely responsible for organizing elections. It must of course do so in terms of legislation and the Final Constitution,[11] but the Electoral Commission is not

[1] Section 107 provides that any printed matter intending to affect the outcome of an election must state clearly the full name and address of the printer and publisher. The provision also requires the publisher of certain publications originating from political parties and related persons to head an article in that publication with the word "advertisement" if inserted in the publication on the promise of payment to the publication.

[2] Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd v Inkatha Freedom Party 1992 (3) SA 579 (A) at 600.

[3] See N Steytler, J Murphy, P de Vos & M Rwelamira Free and Fair Elections (1993).

[4] New National Party (supra) at para 12.

[5] As the Constitutional Court observed in New National Party, the right to free, fair and regular elections is guaranteed to all South African citizens irrespective of their age. New National Party (supra) at para 12.

[6] Ibid at para 16.

[7] Act 51 of 1996.

[8] It goes without saying that if the independence of the Commission — and therefore FC s 19(2) — is undermined, then any individual has standing to approach a court for appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights, even if the Commission itself does not seek or even oppose such an application. See § 45.4 supra, on standing.

[9] New National Party (supra) at para 76.

[10] Ibid.

[11] The fact that it is responsible for running the elections does not entitle it to write the electoral laws. That is the function of Parliament and not the Commission. If legislation infringes the independence of the Commission, it may of course be challenged.

part of any government department. As with other Chapter 9 Institutions — state institutions supporting constitutional democracy — its independence is entrenched under FC s 181(2).[1] Although accountable to the National Assembly,[2] the Final Constitution requires the Electoral Commission to perform its functions impartially.

The existing legislative framework within which the Electoral Commission operates may not fully protect the independent functioning of the Commission. First, there appears to be a lack of 'financial independence'.[3] The Commission must be afforded an adequate opportunity to defend its budgetary requirements before Parliament and must then have the ability to access funds allocated to it in order to discharge its functions.[4] No member of the executive should have the power to stop transfers of money to an independent institution such as the Electoral Commission without the existence of appropriate safeguards for the independence of the institution. Secondly, there may be problems with the 'administrative independence' of the Commission. The Commission must retain operational control over the functions it is required to perform. No state department may tell the Commission how to perform functions such as the registration of voters. However, if the Commission asks the government for assistance, then it must be provided.[5]

If the management of the election by an independent commission is an essential ingredient of a free and fair election, it follows that legislation and government conduct which undermine the independence of the Commission violate the FC s 19(2) right to free and fair elections. But not every failure of the government to assist the Commission undermines its independence. In many cases the Commission will be able to resist interference with its independence. For example, in New National Party, the NNP sought declaratory relief in consequence of actions by the government which allegedly interfered with the independence of the Commission. Despite holding that the government failed to appreciate the true import of FC ss 181 and 190, which provide for the independence of the Commission and require that all organs of state must assist and protect the Commission to ensure its independence and effectiveness,[6] the Constitutional Court refused to grant relief on the basis that the applicant lacked standing to rely on these sections of the Final Constitution.[7] Implicit in the Court's finding was the view that FC s 19(2) was not violated since the Commission managed to assert its independence

[1] See Electoral Commission Act s 3.
[2] See FC s 181.
[3] For more on the absence of financial independence of Chapter 9 Institutions generally, and the ability of government to undercut their respective mandates, see S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Religious, Linguistic and Cultural Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.
[4] New National Party (supra) at para 98.
[5] Ibid at para 99.
[6] Ibid at para 100.
[7] Ibid at paras 106-107.

without resort to the courts.[1] Individuals, even political parties, will seldom persuade the courts to interfere in disputes between organs of state in the absence of an allegation that a fundamental right is infringed or threatened, since the principles of cooperative government — and, in particular, FC s 41(3) — envisage that intergovernmental disputes must be resolved through other means.

While it is a necessary ingredient, the existence of an independent Electoral Commission is, in itself, not sufficient to secure free and fair elections. According to the Constitutional Court, the requirement of 'fairness' has at least two further implications. The first is that each citizen must not be allowed to vote more than once in the elections, and the second is that any person not entitled to vote must not be permitted to do so. Regulation of the exercise of the right to vote is therefore necessary to ensure a free and fair election.[2] The Final Constitution recognizes the necessity of such regulation by requiring a properly functioning voters' roll.[3] Registration on the voters' roll must be viewed in this context. According to the Court, it is a constitutional requirement to vote and not a limitation of the right to vote.[4] The same applies to the provisions of the Electoral Act that govern proof of identity. Some form of easy and reliable identification is necessary to facilitate the process of registration and voting. The legislature is obliged to make provision for such a form of identification in order to ensure the fairness of the elections. As was discussed above, the majority of the New National Party Court held that legislative regulation of the exercise of the right to vote will not be unconstitutional as long as the provision is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. In our view, the standard of reasonableness advocated by O'Regan J in her dissenting judgment is more appropriate. FC s 19 is of signal importance to South Africa's constitutional democracy and abridgements of its requirements ought to be subject to more searching analysis on the part of our courts.

While individuals may of course challenge legislation and state conduct which undermines their right to free and fair elections, it may sometimes prove difficult to find an appropriate remedy for a violation of FC s 19(2). The most intrusive remedy, setting aside the results of an election, seems to be available only when the effect of the unconstitutional law or conduct outweighs the effect of the mechanisms meant to ensure that the election is free and fair.[5] Individuals and political parties wishing to enforce the right to free and fair elections should therefore act timeously, ensuring that violations can be remedied through

[1] See Sithole & Others v Minister of Justice & Others 2000 (1) ZLR 246 (HC). The applicants sought to set aside the appointment of the Registrar-General on the grounds of previously demonstrated bias, partiality and lack of transparency and because he had an interest in the outcome of the referendum, since the draft constitution would abolish his office. The application ultimately failed on the basis that the President ought to have been cited in the application, as it was the exercise of the President's power to appoint the Registrar-General that was in issue.

[2] New National Party II (supra) at para 12.

[3] See FC ss 1*(d)*, 46(1), 105(1) and 157(5).

[4] New National Party II (supra) at para 15.

[5] See DTA of Namibia v Prime Minister of the Republic of Namibia 1996 (3) BCLR 310 (NmH). See § 45.5(c) supra.

interdicts or other appropriate forms of relief.[1] As far as the regularity of elections is concerned, the Final Constitution determines the duration of the National Assembly, provincial legislatures and municipal councils in FC ss 49, 108 and 159 respectively.[2]

45.10 FC s 19(3): The Active and Passive Right to Vote

(a) The right to vote, the electoral system and the mandate of representatives

(i) General

Many of the constitutional provisions applicable to elections since the first democratic elections in 1994 have expired and been replaced by other provisions and by way of a detailed matrix of saving and suspending provisions in the Interim Constitution and Final Constitution.[3] The constitutional and statutory framework for elections is now far less complex.

FC s 46(1) provides that the electoral system is prescribed by national legislation, is based on a common voters' roll, with a minimum voting age of 18 years, and results, in general, in proportional representation. FC s 105(1) provides the same in respect of provincial elections.[4]

In this electoral system, the electorate has no choice between candidates, only between parties. Each party creates a candidate list from which representatives are installed into office in accordance with the proportion of the vote which that party received in the election. The electorate is not given a formal role in the selection of names on the candidate list or the determination of the order in which the names appear. This selection process is left solely to the discretion

[1] See § 45.5(c) supra, on remedies.

[2] The Assembly and the provincial legislatures may be dissolved before their expiry date in the circumstances envisaged in FC ss 50 and 109. If the Final Constitution is amended to extend the life of a legislative body, the right to regular elections may be impaired. The requirements for amending FC s 19 will then have to be met. It is slightly more difficult to amend the Bill of Rights than the other provisions of the Constitution. See FC s 74.

[3] In respect of the first election of the National Assembly under the Final Constitution (held in 1999), the Final Constitution saved the provisions of the Interim Constitution, which therefore applied to that election despite the repeal of the Interim Constitution. At the same time, FC s 50(1) was suspended until the second election of the National Assembly under the Final Constitution. In addition, Schedule 2 of the Interim Constitution applied to the filling of vacancies in the legislatures until the second election of the National Assembly under the Final Constitution. As amended, Schedule 2 provides that the next available person on the list of the party which nominated the vacating member shall fill the vacant seat. FC s 47(4), which foresees national legislation to deal with this issue, was explicitly suspended by FC Schedule 6, item 6(4), until after the second election under the Final Constitution. Those saving and suspending provisions are no longer applicable.

[4] However, FC Schedule 6, item 6 provided that the first election of the National Assembly and the provincial legislatures would take place in accordance with IC Schedule 2, as amended by Annexure A to Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution. Schedule 2, as amended, essentially provides for a list system of proportional representation for the election of both the National Assembly and the provincial legislatures. For example, in respect of the National Assembly, items 1 and 3 of the Schedule provide that the parties shall nominate candidates and must do so by submitting regional and national lists or only regional lists.

of the party. And parties have used very different methods to create and to order their party lists.[1]

The election of members to municipal councils must be in accordance with national legislation. This system — now provided for in the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act[2] — must provide for the list system of proportional representation or a combination of lists and ward representation.[3]

(ii) The mandate of representatives and loss of membership

As far as the mandate of representatives is concerned, FC s 47(3) provides that a person loses membership in the National Assembly if at any time that person fails to meet the eligibility requirements in FC s 47(1) or is absent from the Assembly without permission in contravention of the established rules of the legislature. Similar provisions regulate the loss of membership and the filling of vacancies in the provincial legislatures.[4] Schedule 6, item 6 provides that Schedule 2 of the Interim Constitution[5] applied to the loss of membership and the filling of vacancies in the National Assembly until the second election of the Assembly under the Final Constitution. Schedule 2 of the Interim Constitution was then amended by the insertion of item 23A, which introduced an additional ground for the loss of membership of a legislature in circumstances other than those provided for in FC ss 47(3) and 106(3). As item 6(3) of Schedule 6 provides that Annexure A applied only until the second election of the National Assembly under the Final Constitution, the anti-defection provision in item 23A and the power to amend that provision within a reasonable period had a maxim lifespan ending in September 2004, the latest date by which the second election under the Final Constitution had to be held.

The additional ground for loss of membership introduced by item 23A was that a representative loses membership of a legislature to which the Schedule applies if that person ceases to be a member of the party which nominated him or her as a member of the legislature.[6] However, Schedule 2, as amended by item 23A(3), provided that an Act of Parliament could be passed, within a reasonable period after the Final Constitution took effect, to provide for a manner in which it would be possible for a member who ceased to be a member of the party which nominated him or her to retain membership of a legislature.

[1] See P de Vos 'South Africa's Experience with Proportional Representation' in J de Ville & N Steytler Voting in 1999: Choosing an Electoral System (1996) 29.

[2] Act 117 of 1998. See s 22 and Schedule 1 of the Act.

[3] See FC s 157.

[4] See FC s 106(3) and (4).

[5] As amended by Annexure A to Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution.

[6] Legally speaking, the constitutional provisions do not preclude a Member of Parliament or a member of a provincial legislature from criticizing his or her party or even from voting across party lines. Cf H Steinberger 'Political Representation in Germany' in P Kirchhof & D Kommers (eds) Germany and its Basic Law (1993) 126. In practice, however, the extent to which an MP or MPL will be able to differ from the 'party line' will depend on whether parties can expel such members and the extent of control courts will exercise over disciplinary procedures in terms of FC s 33 (the right to just administrative action).

Parliament passed such a law in 2002, entitled the Loss or Retention of Membership of National or Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002 ('the Membership Act'), which provided for a limited system of floor-crossing in the national and provincial legislatures. In UDM, the Constitutional Court declared the Membership Act invalid because it was not passed within a reasonable time after the adoption of amendment 23A(3) to Schedule 2.

Parliament was nevertheless able to introduce the amendments originally contained in the Membership Act by way of a constitutional amendment. Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 2 of 2003 repealed the Membership Act and introduced a new Schedule 6A of the Final Constitution. The new Schedule introduces the amendments attempted by the Membership Act and provides for floor-crossing in national and provincial legislatures. In most instances, floor-crossing is subject to a window-period and 10 per cent threshold requirements.

In UDM, the Court also considered the First Amendment Act[1] which allowed floor-crossing in local governments during two fifteen-day periods in the second and fourth year after an election and the accompanying Local Government Amendment Act,[2] which reconciled the Amendment with already existing legislation. Under the First Amendment Act, 10 per cent of the representatives of a party must disaffect from that party in order for the floor-crossing to be legitimate. The legislature waived this requirement for the first fifteen-day period in order to accommodate the break-up of the Democratic Alliance. The UDM Court heard a multi-pronged challenge from the applicant. It rejected every argument put forth. Perhaps, the most important of these rejections were the Court's conclusions that floor-crossing did not interfere with the founding values or basic structure of the Final Constitution[3] and was not inconsistent with the provisions of FC s 19(3).[4] The UDM Court held that FC s 19(3) is agnostic with regard to the constitutionality of floor-crossing:

> [T]he rights entrenched under section 19 are directed to elections, to voting and to participation in political activities. Between elections, however, voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives.[5]

Lastly, the Court applied a rationality test to ensure that the floor-crossing provisions were consistent with the rule of law.[6] It found that having two fifteen-day periods in between election cycles and a 10 per cent minimum to allow a cross-over permitted some cross-over flexibility while still promoting stability,[7] and that the provision excluding application of the 10 per cent minimum from the first cross-over period was a rational response to the dissolution of the Democratic Alliance.[8]

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002 ('Constitution First Amendment Act').
[2] The Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002 ('Local Government Amendment Act').
[3] UDM (supra) at paras 15-17.
[4] Ibid at para 49.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at para 55.
[7] Ibid at para 69.
[8] Ibid at para 70.

(iii) Proportional representation

The only remaining constitutional requirements of significance as far as the electoral system is concerned are the provisions which require, in general, proportional representation.[1] The entrenchment of proportional representation is difficult to reconcile with the traditional approach to the interpretation of political rights. It is normally accepted that political rights may be realized within a variety of electoral systems. All electoral systems have advantages and disadvantages.[2] Judiciaries around the world have therefore seldom interfered with a legislative preference for a particular electoral system.[3] The entrenchment of proportional representation, however, places limits on the ability of South African legislatures to experiment with different types of electoral system. It therefore becomes necessary to delineate the boundaries of legislative discretion in this area. The central feature of proportional representation, which may not be abrogated, lies in the notion that votes should count substantively the same. In other words, in contrast to majoritarian or pluralistic systems, proportional representation means that all votes are equal and no votes are wasted.[4] There are many alternatives to [1] See FC s 46(1)(d) (National Assembly); FC s 106(1)(d) (provincial legislatures). A somewhat stricter requirement of proportionality, it seems, applies to municipal councils in FC s 157(3).

[2] See, eg, K Asmal & J de Ville 'An Electoral System for South Africa' in N Steytler, J Murphy, P de Vos & M Rwelamira (ed) Free and Fair Elections (1993); D Horowitz A Democratic South Africa? Constitutional Engineering in a Divided Society (1991); A Reynolds Voting for a New South Africa (1993). Commentators often do not mention one of the central shortcomings of the list system of proportional representation: since party bureaucrats acquire decisive powers, the system makes it possible for party elites to 'fix' results. Thus, whether or not such 'deals' were made in the first South African election, the list system lends itself to this sort of abuse more than the other systems of political representation.

[3] The European Commission has rejected an argument that electoral rights necessarily translate into a system of proportional representation. See Application 7140/75, 7 Eur Comm'n HR 95, 97 (1977).

[4] See Louw v Matjila & Others 1995 (11) BCLR 1476 (W). The High Court considered the meaning of proportional representation. The court held that the real question was whether an election yielded a result which was broadly proportional to the interests of those who participated therein in the sense that it could be demonstrated that the results were representative of the society whose interests were intended to be served by the election. The underlying purpose of a system of proportional representation, the court said, is to ensure the equitable representation of minorities in the organs of government. Ibid at 1482. The Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 displayed a commitment to accommodate as effectively as possible the diversity of South African society. The intention was that organs of government would be as inclusive and representative as possible at all levels. Turning to the facts of the case, the court held that the procedure adopted for the election of members to the executive council of the Transitional Metropolitan Council of Johannesburg was plainly defective. The respondents not only failed to comply with any recognized system of proportional representation but in fact failed to demonstrate the nature of the system which they sought to rely upon. But, as the invalidation of the election would cause great inconvenience, the court merely made a declaratory order for the guidance of future elections. The plaintiff was awarded costs.

In Democratic Party v Miller, the High Court invalidated reg 74(5) of the Local Government Election Regulations 28 of 1996 in Kwazulu-Natal. 1997 (1) SA 758 (D), 1997 (2) BCLR 223 (D). The regulation provided that if a party list contained fewer candidates than the proportional share the party was entitled to, the party would forfeit its entitlement to representation. The court held that 'once a vote is cast it is to be counted for purposes of determining the proportional representation quota . . . that is consistent with the fundamental right to vote accorded to every citizen in terms of s 21(2) of the [interim] Constitution. Any legislation which detracts from this or results in a distortion of the voting falls to be struck down as inconsistent with both the fundamental right to vote and the principle that the election is to be conducted democratically.' Ibid at 226.

the present electoral system which will meet this criterion. The list system of proportional representation is therefore not immune from constitutional reform.

Nonetheless, the Constitutional Court has made it clear that it will police closely the bounds of any reform of the electoral system, at least in the context of provincial constitution-making. In a proposed provincial constitution, the Western Cape legislature provided for an electoral system that expressed a form of proportional representation: however, its proposed proportional representation system divided the province into a number of geographic multi-member constituencies. In Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Province of the Western Cape, the Constitutional Court found this system to be inconsistent with the Final Constitution.[1] The Court reasoned that such a form of proportional representation was inconsistent with the single list system provided for in Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution read with Schedule 2 of the Interim Constitution.[2] Further, the electoral system did not qualify as a legislative structure and thus could not fall within the scope of the permissible deviation allowed by FC s 143(1)(a).[3]

The courts have also considered the extent and applicability of the requirement of proportionality in two further cases. In Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others,[4] the Cape High Court was asked to decide whether FC s 160(8) requires the party-political composition of a municipal council's committees, including the executive

In Crowther & Andere v Plaaslike Oorgangsraad v Bethlehem & Andere, the High Court was less forgiving and the election of the executive committee of a transitional local council was set aside. 1997 (8) BCLR 1011 (O). The court held that s 16(6) of the Local Government Transition Act, as amended, dictated that if a transitional local council chose to elect an executive committee, it had to do so in accordance with a system of proportional representation. In other words, the provision was peremptory. The court found the respondent's method of election, which amounted to a majority vote, to be inconsistent with the statutory requirement of proportional representation. The fact that the transitional local council described the system as one of proportional representation was irrelevant, as was the fact that the result of the election might have brought about a measure of proportional representation.

A disproportionate result was, however, the crucial consideration in the invalidation by the High Court of the election of an executive committee in Nasionale Party in die Oos-Kaap & 'n Ander v Port Elizabeth Oorgangsraad & Andere. 1998 (2) BCLR 141 (SE). The court disagreed with the approach in Louw v Matjila to the extent that it permitted a result which was merely 'broadly proportional to the interests of those who participated' in the election. According to the court, a stricter approach was necessary. In any event, a distortion that allowed a political party to obtain a two-thirds majority on the executive committee, the majority needed for decisions of the committee, in circumstances where the same party did not have a two-thirds majority on the transitional council, was unacceptable.

[1] 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC)('Western Cape, First Certification Judgment'). For more on this judgment, and on provincial constitutions generally, see S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 20.

[2] Ibid at paras 43 and 46. The Court apparently saw the inconsistency deriving solely from the operation of the transitional provisions of Schedule 6. Ibid at para 43 n69. It thus remains possible that geographic multi-member constituencies are consistent with the Final Constitution's command for in general proportional representation. Ibid at paras 45 and 47-49.

[3] Western Cape, First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 45 and 47-49. For more on this aspect of the judgment, see S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 20.

[4] 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C).

committee, to be proportional to the parties' support in the council. FC s 160(8) requires that members of a municipal council are entitled to participate in the proceedings of the council and its committees in a manner that must be 'consistent with democracy'. FC s 160(8) makes no explicit requirement of proportional representation. The High Court, seemingly heavily influenced by the decision in UDM delivered shortly before, remarked that, due to the political sensitivity of the case, a high degree of judicial deference was necessary.[1] The court ultimately held that the requirement that municipal councillors' participatory rights be consistent with democracy imposes an imprecise standard that would be satisfied by any number of arrangements, including a winner-takes-all system.

A similar issue arose in Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another.[2] Masondo concerned the question as to whether FC s 160(8) applied to mayoral committees. The majority of the Masondo Court held that these bodies are executive in nature, not legislative, and therefore that the requirement of participation 'consistent with democracy' was not applicable. However, Sachs and O'Regan JJ issued separate dissenting judgments. They wrote that mayoral committees are mixed executive and legislative bodies that do implicate the democracy requirement in FC s 160(8). By deciding that FC s 160(8) did not apply, Sachs and O'Regan JJ contended, the majority had failed to indicate what sort of minority party participation will be 'consistent with democracy'.

(b) The active right to vote

The active right to vote is protected by FC s 19(3).[3] The right may not be transferred. No duty to vote may be derived from FC s 19, but the introduction of such a duty by statute will not necessarily be unconstitutional.[4] Section 87 of the Electoral Act prohibits undue influence in respect of other persons registering to vote, voting, voting for particular candidates, and associated conduct.

(i) Equal voting rights

As the Constitutional Court has stated, most electoral laws have the potential directly or indirectly to affect different categories of people in different ways: by reason of where they live, their standard of literacy or political beliefs.[5] In South Africa, the anti-discrimination provision does not require applicants to show that such laws intentionally discriminate against them, but merely that the law affects a listed or analogous group negatively and results in unfair discrimination against them.[6] A violation of FC s 9(3) may nevertheless be difficult to show

[1] Democratic Alliance v ANC (supra) at 41B-F.
[2] 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC).
[3] The right to vote was protected by IC s 21(2). The franchise is also protected in FC s 1. When it comes to amendment of the Final Constitution, FC s 1 may be of significance. In terms of FC s 74, FC s 1 requires a higher majority of the National Assembly to amend than FC s 19, and, to the extent that the two provisions correspond, the higher degree of entrenchment also extends to FC s 19.
[4] See Maunz-Dürig-Herzog's Grundgesetz Kommentar (1991)(Commentary on art 38 of the Basic Law.)
[5] See Democratic Party v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC)('Democratic Party') at para 12.
[6] See City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) para 43.

since the Constitutional Court appears to require proof that the law in itself resulted in fewer people of the affected group exercising the right to vote and not merely that the law made it more difficult for them to exercise the right to vote.[1] In other words, an applicant is required to show a factual causal connection between the law and the diminished number of people exercising the franchise. In our view, this approach fails to focus on the impact of the discriminatory law or conduct on the litigants and instead focuses, inappropriately, on the indirect consequences of that impact. But that is not generally how our equality jurisprudence works. Once a law affects a listed or analogous group negatively, it discriminates. Moreover, a facially discriminatory law that affects a group identified in FC s 9(3) is presumed to be unfair. The burden then shifts to the state or other party defending the discriminatory provision to prove that the provision is unfair. In considering the issue of unfairness, the number of affected groups who did not vote may be a factor to take into account, but it cannot be decisive precisely because people fail to vote for various reasons. The appropriate question is whether the impact on the group is unreasonable in the light of the purpose of the legislation. For example, a property qualification will unfairly discriminate. It is not necessary to show that such a law actually resulted in fewer poor people voting and that, in the absence of the qualification, more poor people would have voted.[2]

The constitutional entrenchment of proportional representation makes it unlikely that South African courts will be confronted with the apportionment[3] and

[1] In Democratic Party, the Court held that it was not enough to show that the requirement of a green bar-coded identity document affected a greater proportion of white potential voters, rural voters and young voters. Democratic Party (supra) at para 12. It was necessary to show that the requirement resulted in smaller numbers of the affected groups registering than those outside the categories.

[2] Cf Harper v Virginia Board of Elections 383 US 663, 86 SCt 1079 (1966). The case concerns the constitutionality of a $1.50 poll tax. The court described the tax as capricious and found that it violates the equal protection clause. Lines drawn on the basis of wealth or property are, as those on the basis of race, traditionally disfavoured. In overturning the statute, the Supreme Court described wealth as a 'suspect classification' and stated that the vote was a 'fundamental interest'. Both strands of equal protection jurisprudence in the US were therefore applied in this case. See also Hill v Stone 421 US 289 (1975)(Use of the franchise to achieve unrelated state, objectives — such as the enforcement of the tax laws — declared unconstitutional); Cipriano v City of Houma 395 US 701 (1969); City of Phoenix v Kolodziejski 399 US 204 (1970)(Difference between the interests of property owners and non-property owners found insufficiently substantial to justify the exclusion of the latter from the franchise); Dunn v Blumstein 405 US 330 (1972)(Durational residence requirements found unconstitutional.)

[3] The term 'apportionment' is used to describe deviations from the 'one person, one vote' principle. The courts in the US have increasingly been confronted with such disputes ever since the Supreme Court decided in Baker v Carr that apportionment disputes are justiciable and are not covered by the 'political question' doctrine. 369 US 186, 82 SCt 691 (1962). The courts seem to tolerate significant deviations at state and local level. See White v Regester 412 US 755, 93 SCt 2332 (1973); Abate v Mundt 403 US 182, 91 SCt 1904 (1971); Mahan v Howell 410 US 315, 93 SCt 979 (1973); Brown v Thomson 462 US 835, 103 SCt 2332 (1983); Board of Estimate of City of New York v Morris 489 US 688, 109 SCt 1433 (1989)). In elections for Congress, on the other hand, the Supreme Court requires almost mathematical equality. See Reynolds v Sims 377 US 533, 84 SCt 1362 (1964); Kirkpatrick v Preisler 394 US 526, 89 SCt 1225 (1969); Wesberry v Sanders 376 US 1, 84 SCt 526 (1964); Karcher v Daggett 462 US 725, 103 SCt 2653 (1983). The Canadian courts have adopted a more flexible approach. Apportionment legislation is upheld as long as it guarantees 'effective representation' to the electorate. As a result, courts have tolerated considerable gerrymandering disputes[1] which led to so much litigation in Canada and the United States. The major advantage of a system of proportional representation is that, in theory at least, it guarantees almost exact equality of the vote.[2]

(ii) Secrecy of the ballot

FC s 19 provides that every citizen has the right to vote in secret.[3] Several provisions in the 1998 Electoral Act deal with the secrecy of the vote.[4] Section 90(1) provides that no person may interfere with a voter's right to secrecy. Section 98 makes such interference an offence. These provisions give effect to the constitutional imperatives and the international human rights law norms relating to secrecy.[5]

(iii) Exclusion of classes of citizens from the right to vote

Under the Electoral Act, only South African citizens who are 18 years old or older are eligible to vote.[6] In order to exercise this right, each citizen must register with the Electoral Commission to ensure that their name is placed on the voters' roll.[7] Permanent residents are no longer entitled to vote. These provisions, which merely confirm similar restrictions appearing in the text of the Final Constitution, deviations from the equality principle. Rural voters have most often been the beneficiaries of court-sanctioned deviations. See Attorney-General for Saskatchewan v Carter (1991) 81 DLR (4th) 16; Reference Re: Electoral Boundaries Commission Act (Alberta) 86 DLR (4th) 447, [1991] 2 SCR 158. But see Dixon v British Columbia (1989) 59 DLR (4th) 247. (The deviations were found to be unconstitutional.) In the United Kingdom the judiciary has been reluctant to interfere with the proposals of the Boundary Commissioners. See D Butler 'Electoral Reform' in J Jowell & D Oliver (eds) The Changing Constitution (2nd Edition, 1989) 373.

[1] 'Gerrymandering' describes the drawing of constituency lines in a manner so as to dilute the support for particular political parties, cultural or racial groups. The US Supreme Court has been more sympathetic to claims from racial minorities than to claims from political parties. See Davis v Bandemer 478 US 109, 106 SCt 2797 (1986); Gaffney v Cummings 412 US 735, 93 SCt 2321 (1973). In order to support a claim of racial gerrymandering, the Court merely requires a showing of discriminatory effect and not discriminatory intent. See Thornburgh v Gingles 478 US 30, 106 SCt 2752 (1976). Recently, however, the Court has also set limits on legislatures' ability to secure representation of minority groups. In Shaw v Reno the US Supreme Court struck down a voting district that had an extremely irregular shape (substantial parts of the district consisted solely of a highway). 509 US 630, 113 SCt 2816 (1993). The Court said that the district plan resembled 'political Apartheid'.

[2] The German Constitutional Court, in dealing with equality of the vote within the list system of proportional representation, has said that every ballot must have the same potential value and that every voter must have an equal opportunity to influence the outcome of the election. See 1 BVerfGE 208, 242; 34 BVerfGE 81, 98.

[3] The right to vote in secret was protected by IC s 21(2).

[4] Legal provisions dealing with the secrecy of the vote include ss 38, 39, 70 and 90 of the 1998 Electoral Act. Section 90(2) provides that no person may, except as permitted under the Act, disclose any information about voting or the counting of votes, or open any ballot box or container sealed in terms of the Act, or break its seal. See also ss 5 and 15 of the Referendums Act 108 of 1983.

[5] For the position in international law, see art 25 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights, art 21 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. See also s 17 of the Namibian Constitution and art 38(1) of the German Basic Law.

[6] See Electoral Act s 1.

[7] See Electoral Act s 8(1).

are relatively uncontroversial.[1] The Act also prevents persons subject to a court order declaring them to be of unsound mind, mentally disordered, or detained under the Mental Health Act,[2] from registering to vote.[3] Excluding these classes of mentally-handicapped citizens is a clear limitation of the right to vote and arguably constitutes unfair discrimination on a listed ground.[4] As such, the provisions must be justified under FC s 36. Since the Act provides no provision for a mentally-handicapped person to challenge their ineligibility to vote, a court could find the law to be overbroad by excluding mentally-capable citizens from voting.

Although the 1993 Electoral Act excluded certain classes of prisoners from voting in the 1994 elections,[5] when the 1998 Electoral Act was enacted it made no mention of the voting rights of prisoners.[6] The Electoral Commission therefore made no arrangements to register South African citizens who were in prison and created no special voting procedures to allow incarcerated citizens to vote. This omission could have resulted in the effective disenfranchisement of all

[1] FC s 46 read with FC s 19(3), which guarantees every 'adult citizen' the right to vote. Elsewhere legislatures have extended the vote to foreigners at, for example, the local level. In BverfGe EuGRZ 1990, 438, the German Constitutional Court invalidated such legislation on the basis that constitutional amendment was the only permissible means to extend the vote to foreigners. Considerable problems were caused with the deprivation and restoration of South African citizenship to Africans who became 'citizens' of the Bantustans: Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei. See P Ncholo 'The Right to Vote' in N Steytler, J Murphy, P de Vos & M Rwelamira Free and Fair Elections (1993) 60.

[2] Act 18 of 1973.

[3] See 1998 Electoral Act s 8.

[4] See FC s 9(3): 'disability' is a ground for unfair discrimination.

[5] One of the most contentious issues during the negotiations process concerned the right of prisoners to vote. The final compromise, brought about after several uprisings and considerable loss of life in the prisons, was written into law only on the day before the first democratic election took place. On 25 April 1994, Mr F W de Klerk, then State President, amended s 16*(d)* of the 1993 Electoral Act by Proclamation 85 of 1994 in order to limit the category of prisoners not entitled to vote to those convicted for murder, robbery with aggravating circumstances, and rape, and attempts to commit those offences. Initially s 16*(d)* excluded those in prison for murder, culpable homicide, rape, indecent assault, childstealing, assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm, robbery, malicious injury to property, breaking and entering any premises with intent to commit an offence, fraud, corruption, and bribery, and any attempt to commit the offences referred to. The Transitional Electoral Council then apparently agreed to extend the vote to all prisoners. But President De Klerk refused to sign the Proclamation containing this far-reaching amendment of the Electoral Act. Instead, the more limited version of the amendment was signed into law. The implementation of this last-minute deal was by no means uniform. It is therefore not possible to say how many and which classes of prisoners voted in the first democratic election.

Lawyers for Human Rights sponsored two prisoners to take the relevant organs of state to court. In Masuku & Mbonani v State President & Others, the two prisoners contended that s 16 of the 1993 Electoral Act was inconsistent with the Interim Constitution's political rights and right to equality. 1994 (4) SA 374 (T). The prisoners, who were both convicted of murder, were disqualified from voting in the April 1994 general elections. The Transvaal Provincial Division of the Supreme Court held that it had no jurisdiction to consider the validity of the Electoral Act. Since convicts had to vote by special vote on 26 April 1994 and the Interim Constitution only came into operation on the 27th, the court held, that, even before the coming into effect of the Interim Constitution, the time for convicted persons to vote would have expired, and to give an order in favour of the applicants would be a brutem fulmen. The last part of the reasoning cannot be accepted. If there was a violation, a court could have considered other forms of appropriate relief, including an award of damages.

[6] For further discussion of the voting rights of prisoners, see G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 29-3.

prisoners. Prior to the election, the omission was challenged by two prisoners in August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others.[1]

The question before the August Court was whether the Electoral Commission had an obligation to take affirmative steps to ensure that prisoners awaiting trial and sentenced prisoners could register and then vote in an upcoming general election. The Constitutional Court reasoned that the right to vote 'by its very nature imposes positive obligations on the legislature and the executive',[2] that the Electoral Commission had an 'obligation to take reasonable steps to create the opportunity to enable eligible prisoners to register and vote',[3] and that any limitation on the right to vote must pass scrutiny under the limitation clause. Since this infringement on the prisoners' right to vote was not brought about by a law of general application, but was rather the result of the legislature's silence and the subsequent omission of the Electoral Commission, the Court found the resulting restriction unconstitutional.[4] It then ordered the Electoral Commission to make 'all reasonable arrangements' to ensure that people who were imprisoned during the registration period could register, and that all registered prisoners could vote in the upcoming election.

The two main counter-arguments rejected by the August Court were that prisoners forfeited their right to vote by denying themselves the opportunity to register and/or vote by becoming incarcerated and that making special provision for prisoners to vote on election-day presented the Electoral Commission with excessive logistical difficulties. With respect to the first argument, the Court stated that the common law establishes that, while certain restrictions on a prisoner's freedom must necessarily follow from imprisonment, a 'substantial residue of basic rights' — in this case, the right to vote — cannot be denied prisoners.[5] The Court answered the second argument by stating that since prisoners are a 'determinate class of persons, subject to relatively easy and inexpensive administrative control', they should pose no excessive administrative difficulties when compared with other groups for whom special voting procedures are made.

The Court explicitly stated that its judgment in August should not be read as suggesting that Parliament was prevented from disenfranchising certain categories of prisoners.[6] In 2004, this notion was tested in NICRO. Parliament amended the 1998 Electoral Act[7] to prohibit prisoners serving a sentence without the option of a fine from voting.[8] The Court struck down this part of the amendment. It found

[1] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) ('August') at para 3.
[2] Ibid at para 16.
[3] Ibid at para 22.
[4] For a discussion of the meaning of 'law of general application' in FC s 36 and its consequences in August, see S Woolman and H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.
[5] August (supra) at para 18.
[6] Ibid at para 31.
[7] The Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2003.
[8] The effect of s 24B of the Act was that imprisoned citizens awaiting trial enjoyed the presumption of innocence and were thus permitted to vote, citizens imprisoned with the option of a fine were allowed to vote so as to not discriminate against poorer citizens who are only in prison due to their lack of ability to pay the requisite fine.

that the government's justifications were insufficient to uphold a limitation on the right to vote. In particular, the NICRO Court found the that provision was overbroad,[1] that providing registration and voting accessibility to this group of prisoners would not create excessive financial or logistical strain,[2] that making special arrangements for prisoner registration and voting does not disfavour other groups who have some logistical difficulty registering and voting,[3] and that the government could not provide an adequate policy explanation for this limitation.[4] As a result, the Court ordered the voters' roll to be temporarily opened for all prisoners serving sentences without the option of a fine and for these prisoners to be afforded the opportunity to vote.

August and NICRO make it explicitly clear that at least some prisoners must be afforded the right to vote. Given this imperative, it seems clear that no limitation can be placed on prisoners' right to vote based on logistical or financial constraints: that is, the additional administration necessary to allow the remainder of the prisoner population to vote is not sufficiently burdensome to justify such a limitation. It remains an open question, however, whether a more narrowly-tailored ban on prisoner voting rights — such as disenfranchising only those prisoners found guilty of a certain category of more serious crimes — may be constitutionally permissible. By a vote of 5-4, The Canadian Supreme Court in Sauvé struck down a law disenfranchising prisoners serving prison terms of at least two years.[5] The outcome of any further such legislative attempt to limit the voting rights of prisoners in South Africa will depend to a large extent on the vexed question of the standard of review applicable to FC s 19 cases. Rationality review may not present a sufficiently strong shield to protect the voting rights of prisoners from future legislative curtailment.

(c) The right to stand for election to public office

FC ss 47 and 106 provide that every citizen who is qualified to vote for the National Assembly is eligible to be a member of the Assembly or a provincial legislature. Unrehabilitated insolvents, persons declared to be of unsound mind, and anyone convicted of an offence and sentenced to more than twelve months' imprisonment, without the option of a fine, are disqualified. More controversially, 'anyone who is appointed by, or is in the service of, the state and receives remuneration for that appointment or service' may not become a member. This provision does not apply to the President, Deputy President, Ministers, Deputy Ministers and other office bearers whose functions have been declared compatible with membership by national legislation.

[1] See Minister of Home Affairs v. National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO') at para 67.
[2] Ibid at para 49.
[3] Ibid at paras 52-53.
[4] Ibid at para 65-66.
[5] Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer) 2002 SCC 68.

FC ss 47 and 106 technically do not limit the right to stand for election to public office. Instead, these provisions prevent a person from being a member of a legislature while working for the state. They prevent a person from holding two jobs paid for by the government. Civil servants' rights to stand for election to public office are limited in many countries. In South Africa, s 36 of the Public Service Act forbids employees of the state to 'draw up or publish any writing or deliver a public speech to promote or prejudice the interests of any political party'.[1] Section 20*(g)* of the same Act provides that members of the public service who make use of their position to promote or to prejudice the interest of any political party shall be guilty of misconduct. These provisions make it impossible for civil servants to run for public office. The justification most often advanced for such limitation is that the state has a legitimate interest in preserving a neutral and professional civil service. However, it is difficult to see why such a limitation should be upheld in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, freedom and equality. The courts, the Public Service Commission and the Office of the Public Protector should provide the citizen with sufficient protection against unreasonable and politically biased decision-making. It is, in any event, doubtful whether the limitation of civil servants' right to stand for public office furthers the attainment of a career-orientated and non-partisan public service.[2]

In O'Meara NO v Padayachi, the High Court referred the issue of whether a provision of the Local Government Transition Act[3] was constitutional to the Constitutional Court.[4] The provision disqualified persons indebted to local government — in respect of assessment rates, rent, service charges or any other moneys for a period of longer than three months — from standing for election. In addressing the question of reasonable prospects of success, the Court stated that the provision was necessary to prevent unsuitable persons from standing who, through their past and present conduct, had shown themselves disruptive of the organs of local government or wilfully to have failed to discharge obligations to local government. However, the disqualification went beyond what was necessary since it embraced all failures to pay, irrespective of their nature or magnitude or the state of mind of the debtor. This Act was, as its name indicates, only applicable to a transitional period, and accordingly the disqualifying provision challenged in O'Meara fell away.[5]

Given that the right to stand for public office is in many ways the twin of the right to vote, the question of the appropriate level of review to test for infringements arises here, too. In our view, mere rationality does not sufficiently protect the right, and reasonableness is the least that should be required of law or conduct limiting the right to stand for election and hold public office.

[1] Act 103 of 1994.

[2] See 44 BVerfGE 125, 138. The German Constitutional Court tried to distinguish between permissible campaign efforts of government officials and the improper use of public means for party political purposes.

[3] Act 209 of 1993.

[4] 1997 (2) BCLR 258 (D). See also Waters v Khayalami Metropolitan Council 1997 (3) SA 476 (W).

[5] In terms of s 94 of the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act 27 of 2000, the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 does not apply to a municipal election held after the expiry of the term of municipal councils referred to in s 93(3) of the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998.

46 Property

Theunis Roux

The property clause 46-1
46.1 The function and structure of the property clause inquiry . . 46-2
46.2 Application 46-6
(a) Application of the property clause to private actors . . . 46-6
(b) Who is entitled to the rights protected by section 25? . . 46-9
46.3 Is the interest at stake constitutional property? 46-9
(a) Introduction 46-9
(b) The nature of the right 46-11
(c) The object of the right 46-15
46.4 Has there been a deprivation of property? 46-17
46.5 Is the law that provides for the deprivation consistent with section 25(1)? 46-20
(a) Law of general application 46-21
(b) Arbitrary deprivation of property 46-21
(c) Deprivation of property and the right to just administrative action 46-25
46.6 Is the deprivation justified under section 36? 46-26
46.7 Does the deprivation amount to an expropriation of property? 46-28
46.8 Does the expropriation comply with sections 25(2) and (3)? 46-33
(a) 'For a public purpose or in the public interest'. 46-33
(b) Just and equitable compensation. 46-34
(i) A just and equitable amount of compensation . . . 46-34
(ii) Payment of compensation in a just and equitable manner. 46-35
(iii) Payment of compensation within a just and equitable time 46-35

46.9 Is the expropriation justified under section 36?. 46-36
46.10 Land rights. 46-37

THE PROPERTY CLAUSE

The property clause of the Interim Constitution, s 28 of Act 200 of 1993 ('IC'), reads as follows:

(1) Every person shall have the right to acquire and hold rights in property and, to the extent that the nature of the rights permits, to dispose of such rights.

(2) No deprivation of any rights in property shall be permitted otherwise than in accordance with a law.

(3) Where any rights in property are expropriated pursuant to a law referred to in subsection (2), such expropriation shall be permissible for public purposes only and shall be subject to the payment of agreed compensation or, failing agreement, to the payment of such compensation and within such period as may be determined by a court of law as just and equitable, taking into account all relevant factors, including, in the case of the determination of compensation, the use to which the property is being put, the history of its acquisition, its market value, the value of the investments in it by those affected and the interests of those affected.

The property clause of the Final Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, s 25 of Act 108 of 1996 ('FC'), reads as follows:

(1) No one may be deprived of property except in terms of law of general application, and no law may permit arbitrary deprivation of property.

(2) Property may be expropriated only in terms of law of general application—

(a) for a public purpose or in the public interest; and

(b) subject to compensation, the amount of which and the time and manner of payment of which have either been agreed to by those affected or decided or approved by a court.

(3) The amount of the compensation and the time and manner of payment must be just and equitable, reflecting an equitable balance between the public interest and the interests of those affected, having regard to all relevant circumstances, including—

(a) the current use of the property;

(b) the history of the acquisition and use of the property;

(c) the market value of the property;

(d) the extent of direct state investment and subsidy in the acquisition and beneficial capital improvement of the property; and

(e) the purpose of the expropriation.

(4) For the purposes of this section —

(a) the public interest includes the nation's commitment to land reform, and to reforms to bring about equitable access to all South Africa's natural resources; and

(b) property is not limited to land.

(5) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to foster conditions which enable citizens to gain access to land on an equitable basis.

(6) A person or community whose tenure of land is legally insecure as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to tenure which is legally secure or to comparable redress.

(7) A person or community dispossessed of property after 19 June 1913 as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to restitution of that property or to equitable redress.

(8) No provision of this section may impede the state from taking legislative and other measures to achieve land, water and related reform, in order to redress the results of past racial discrimination, provided that any departure from the provisions of this section is in accordance with the provisions of section 36(1).

(9) Parliament must enact the legislation referred to in subsection (6).

46.1 The Function and Structure of the Property Clause Inquiry

The decision of the Constitutional Court in First National Bank[1] resolved much of the initial uncertainty surrounding the interpretation of s 25 of the Constitution.[2] The overriding purpose of the constitutional property clause, the Court held, is to strike 'a proportionate balance'[3] between the protection of existing property rights and the promotion of the public interest.

On its own, this holding was nothing new: the balancing of private and public interests in property is the traditional function of property clauses in comparative constitutional law. What the decision in FNB added, however, was greater clarity on how the South African property clause should be interpreted to suit this end. Before FNB, it was theoretically possible that the private/public balance might have been struck at any one or more of six stages in the property clause inquiry — (1) in determining whether the right or interest allegedly protected by s 25 was indeed constitutionally protected property; (2) if so, in deciding whether the law at issue provided for the deprivation of property; (3) if so, in determining whether such deprivation was arbitrary; (4) in deciding whether the law at issue provided for the expropriation of property; (5) if so, in determining the amount, timing and manner of any compensation that might be due, and (6) in determining whether any deviation from the property clause standard could be justified under the general limitations clause. After FNB, it is apparent that the property clause inquiry will focus on stage (3) — the test for arbitrariness. As more fully explained below, the Constitutional Court's analysis in this case telescoped

[1] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) ('FNB').

[2] See AJ van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (1997); Geoff Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights: Overview and Commentary' in Geoff Budlender, Johan Latsky & Theunis Roux Juta's New Land Law (Original Service, 1998) Ch 1; Matthew Chaskalson & Carole Lewis 'Property' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz & Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Ch 31; Johan de Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) Ch 25; and Theunis Roux 'Property' in Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis & Nicholas Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 429. Whilst resolving many of the interpretative debates in these commentaries, the decision in FNB has not necessarily rendered the outcome of future cases more predictable. As explained in § 46.5*(b)* infra, in substituting for the wording of s 25 a foundational test for arbitrariness, the Court has developed a new set of rules that will defy formulaic (as opposed to formalistic) application.

[3] FNB (supra) at para 50.

many of the issues that might have been addressed (and in comparative constitutional law are addressed) at other stages of the property clause inquiry into this stage. This is not to say that the other stages are unimportant, or that they will not determine the outcome of some cases.[1] But the breadth of the Court's arbitrariness test in FNB is such that it will tend to dominate the inquiry.[2]

Viewed in this way, the direction taken by the Constitutional Court in FNB is very similar to that taken in its socio-economic rights jurisprudence.[3] The trend in this area, too, has been to elevate what amounts to an internal limitations test to a position of pre-eminence. This recent trend has had two consequences. The traditional two-stage inquiry into whether a constitutional right has been violated and, if so, whether such violation is justified under the general limitations clause, has largely become a single inquiry: whether the law at issue is justified against a review standard varying in intensity between reasonableness (in the case of socio-economic rights) and arbitrariness (in the case of the property clause).[4] As a result, the general limitations clause has receded into the background.

At a formal level, of course, the classification of the property clause inquiry into distinct stages survives. According to the Court in FNB, these stages may be expressed in the form of the following questions:

(a) Does that which is taken away from [the property holder] by the operation of [the law in question] amount to property for purpose of s 25?
(b) Has there been a deprivation of such property by the [organ of state concerned]?
(c) If there has, is such deprivation consistent with the provisions of s 25(1)?
(d) If not, is such deprivation justified under s 36 of the Constitution?
(e) If it is, does it amount to expropriation for purpose of s 25(2)?
(f) If so, does the [expropriation][5] comply with the requirements of s 25(2)(a) and (b)?
(g) If not, is the expropriation justified under s 36?[6]

[1] Some additional balancing may, for example, occur at stages (4) and (5).

[2] See Nhlabathi v Fick [2003] 2 All SA 323 (LCC) at paras 30-31 (applying the arbitrariness test in the context of land reform) and Geyser v Msunduzi Municipality 2003 (3) BCLR 235, 250B-251H (N) (applying the arbitrariness test to assess the constitutionality of s 118 of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000).

[3] See S Liebenberg 'Socio-economic Rights' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Ch 41; S Liebenberg, 'Interpretation of Socio-economic Rights' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service Dec 03) Ch 33.

[4] The arbitrariness standard mandated by the property clause is itself variable in intensity. See § 46.5*(b)* infra.

[5] The Court in FNB here uses the word 'deprivation'. As explained in § 46.4 infra, all expropriations are also deprivations, and therefore this formulation is not entirely incorrect. Nevertheless, at this stage of the property clause inquiry, the focus has been narrowed to expropriations as a sub-set of deprivations. The word 'expropriation' is accordingly preferable.

[6] FNB (supra) at para 46.

This structure has been described as a 'true algorithm'.[1] That is, it requires the court to assess the law under challenge stage by stage until it is found to be either constitutional or unconstitutional. A close examination of the Court's decision-making tree[2] reveals that this is mostly true. A finding of constitutionality will occur (and terminate the inquiry) if one of the following answers is given: a negative answer to the question in (a) (meaning that the law does not interfere with constitutionally protected property); a negative answer to (b) (the law does not provide for the deprivation of property); a negative answer to (e) (the law does not provide for the expropriation of property); a positive answer to (f) (the law provides for the expropriation of property but is consistent with s 25(2)), and a positive answer to (g) (the law provides for the expropriation of property contrary to s 25(2) but is justified under s 36). Similarly, a finding of unconstitutionality will occur (and terminate the inquiry) if a negative answer is given to (d) (meaning that the law unjustifiably deprives a person of property contrary to s 25(1)), or a negative answer is given to (g) (unjustifiable expropriation of property contrary to s 25(2)).

There is, however, one situation in which the court will have to skip one of the stages. That is where a positive answer is given to (c): meaning that the law provides for the deprivation of property consistent with s 25(1). A law of this type need not pass through the (d) stage of the inquiry since there is no constitutional violation that requires justification. Such a law might, however, provide for the expropriation of property, and therefore it is necessary to pose the question in (e) and continue with the inquiry. The question in (e) is itself ambiguous as to whether it refers back to the answer to the question in (c) or (d).[3] Does the 'it' in (e), in other words, refer back to the deprivation described in (d) (a justified deprivation contrary to s 25(1)), or does it refer back to the deprivation in (c) (a deprivation consistent with s 25(1))? As we shall see below, both types of deprivation could also amount to expropriations, and it is hence necessary to pose the question in (e) in both instances. It follows that the structure of analysis in FNB is not a true algorithm, but one in which it is possible to skip a stage, depending on the answer to the question in (c).

Subject to this qualification, this chapter follows the formal structure of the FNB Court's analysis of the constitutional property clause. The purpose throughout, however, will be to demonstrate in respect of each stage why it is that the focus of the property clause inquiry will tend to fall on the question in (c), or rather on a subset of this question, namely whether the law at issue permits the arbitrary deprivation of property.

[1] Johan de Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, forthcoming, 2004).

[2] See Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at paras 30-1 and Geyser v Msunduzi Municipality (supra) at 250B-251H.

[3] I am indebted to Stu Woolman for drawing this ambiguity to my attention, and for suggesting the idea of representing it by means of a decision-making tree.

THE FNB DECISION-MAKING TREE

46.2 APPLICATION

(a) Application of the property clause to private actors

The constitutional property clause undoubtedly provides protection against the deprivation of property by state actors and by private actors when exercising statutory rights.[1] But does it provide protection against deprivation by private actors activing in terms of the common law? The test for deciding this type of question was laid down in Khumalo v Holomisa.[2] According to this case, the common law does not 'in all circumstances … fall within the direct application of the Constitution',[3] and therefore the Bill of Rights does not apply directly to litigation between private actors in every instance. Rather, ss 8(2) and (3) of the Constitution require a two-stage analysis. First, the court must inquire whether 'the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right' are such that the right can be said to bind a natural or juristic person.[4] If this question is answered in the affirmative, 'a court must apply, or if necessary develop, the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to the right'.[5]

The Constitutional Court has not as yet been required to apply this test to s 25. However, its decision in Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Safety and Security[6] sheds some light on how the Court might decide this issue. In Phoebus, the Constitutional Court was asked to overturn a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal on the grounds that it had failed to develop the common law indirectly, as required by s 39(2) of the Constitution. Three police officers had stolen money that had earlier been stolen from the appellant by an armed gang. The appellant argued that s 25(1) of the Constitution applied because the thefts had deprived it of its property and that, in promoting the 'spirit, purport and objects' of the property clause in accordance with s 39(2), the Supreme Court of Appeal should have extended the State's vicarious liability in delict to this situation.[7] The Constitutional Court rejected this argument. It held that the provisions of the property clause 'are aimed at protecting private property rights against governmental action and are quite irrelevant here where the appellant was originally deprived of its property by robbers and recovery of part of it was later frustrated by three thieves'.[8] This somewhat ambiguous dictum is authority for the proposition that the property clause does not apply to private conduct that is not authorised

[1] See Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at paras 27-35 (property clause applied in constitutinal challenge to land reform law conferring on tenants a statutory right to bury their relatives on the land on which they are residing, where an established practice to this effect exists).
[2] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 772 (CC).
[3] Ibid at para 32.
[4] Ibid at para 31 (quoting s 8(2) of the Constitution).
[5] Ibid.
[6] 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC) ('Phoebus') at para 4.
[7] Ibid at para 3.
[8] Ibid at para 4.

by law[1] or to conduct on the part of government employees when acting outside the course and scope of their employment. The first part of the dictum is also wide enough to suggest that the property clause does not provide protection against deprivation by private actors acting in terms of the common law. Since the direct horizontal application of the property clause was not at issue in Phoebus, however, the correctness of this proposition should not be assumed without further analysis.

In the academic literature written before Phoebus, the only author who came close to saying that the property clause might be binding on private actors when acting in terms of the common law was AJ van der Walt. In his extended commentary on the clause, Van der Walt wrote that 'the fact that section 25(1) refers to "law of general application", as opposed to "a law" … subjects common-law and customary-law authorised deprivations of property to the requirements of section 25(1), namely that they should not be arbitrary'.[2] He then gave two examples that seemed to imply that deprivations of property by private actors acting in terms of the common law or customary law should be subject to s 25(1), namely 'deprivations in the context of customary-law land rights and common-law rules relating to the original acquisition of ownership'.[3] On such an approach, a person who was 'deprived' of property through, say, the attachment of a movable thing to immovable property owned by a private actor, could theoretically challenge the common-law rule in question as providing for the arbitrary deprivation of property contrary to s 25(1).

Quite apart from the fact that it is difficult to conceive of a convincing example where the common law provides for deprivation of property by private actors contrary to s 25(1), it would not be necessary for the court directly to apply s 25 in such cases. According to s 173 of the Constitution, 'the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and High Courts have the inherent power … to develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice'. Faced with an arbitrary deprivation of property sanctioned by the common law, any of these courts would be empowered to develop the common law so as to achieve a just result. In so doing, they would be obliged by s 39(2) of the Constitution to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'. Since one of the objects of the Bill of Rights is to protect people against arbitrary deprivation of property, it would seldom be necessary to consider whether s 25 was directly applicable to the case.

[1] Cf Modderklip Boerdery (Edms) Bpk v President van die Republiek van Suid-Afrika [2003] 1 All SA 465 (T) at paras 42, 44 and 45 ('Modderklip') (holding that a squatter community's refusal to comply with an eviction order amounted to a de facto expropriation of the applicant's land in conflict with s 25 of the Constitution). Modderklip was handed down eight days before the decision in Phoebus. Insofar as it provides authority for the proposition that the property clause applies to private conduct that is not authorised by law, it appears to have been tacitly overruled.

[2] Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 106.

[3] Ibid at 107.

De Waal, Currie & Erasmus have pointed out (and as Phoebus appears to confirm), the words 'deprivation' and 'expropriation' in s 25 have a 'specialised' meaning that limits the obligations imposed by ss 25(1), (2) and (3) to state actors.[1] If the question of the direct application of the property clause to private actors were ever to be decided on the basis of the test laid down in Khumalo, the court would be enjoined to consider both the 'intensity' of the right and 'the potential invasion of that right which could be occasioned by persons other than the state or organs of state'.[2] Arguably, both the right not to be arbitrarily deprived of property and the right not to have one's property expropriated without compensation would pass the first part of this test. However, the potential for invasion by a private actor of these rights is limited. First, there can be no direct challenge to a common law rule providing for the expropriation of property by a private actor, because such a rule simply does not exist. Second, although the term 'deprivation' could conceivably be stretched to cover the examples Van der Walt mentions, in its technical sense this term refers to the regulation of private property by the state, and therefore has no meaning in the context of private law relations.

For the aforementioned reasons, the remainder of this Chapter assumes that s 25 has no direct horizontal application. It also assumes that s 25 is not indirectly applicable between private actors. These two situations must be distinguished from the indirect application of the property clause to state actors. In South Peninsula Municipality v Malherbe NO,[3] for example, s 25 was applied in the interpretation of a town-planning ordinance. Where legislation that provides for the expropriation of property is unclear, the Court held, s 25 requires that it be interpreted in favour of the payment of compensation. And in another, concurring judgment in Premier, Eastern Cape v Cekeshe,[4] the rule in Pretoria City Council v Modimola[5] relating to the non-application of the audi alteram partem principle in certain circumstances was held to be incompatible with s 25. The indirect vertical application of the property clause in this way is an important side effect of the constitutionalisation of property rights in South Africa, and should not be ignored.[6]

[1] De Waal et al The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition) (supra) at 412.

[2] Khumalo v Holomisa (supra) at para 33. On the 'intensity' of fundamental rights, see further Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit NO 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 18 (describing privacy as 'a right which becomes more intense the closer it moves to the intimate personal sphere of the life of human beings, and less intense as it moves way from that core').

[3] 1999 (2) SA 966, 983E-I (C).

[4] 1999 (3) SA 56, 103E-F (Tk).

[5] 1966 (3) SA 250 (A).

[6] See also Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2003 (1) SA 586 (C) at paras 14-29 (interpreting the proviso to s 12(1) of the Expropriation Act 63 of 1975 in conformity with s 25 of the Constitution).

(b) Who is entitled to the rights protected by section 25?

Section 8(4) of the Constitution provides that '[a] juristic person is entitled to the rights in the Bill of Rights to the extent required by the nature of the rights and the nature of that juristic person.' In FNB, the Court offered two independent rationales for extending the protection of s 25 to juristic persons. First, the Court held that 'the property rights of natural persons can only be fully and properly realized if such rights are afforded to companies as well as natural persons.'[1] Second, 'denying companies entitlement to property rights would "… lead to grave disruptions and would undermine the very fabric of our democratic State" '.[2] The first reason is a logical extension of the express protection given to natural persons by s 25. The second amounts to a rule-utilitarian argument in favour of the right to private property.[3] The significance of the Court's use of this argument lies not in the result it defends (which is fairly uncontroversial as a matter of constitutional interpretation), but in what it reveals about the Court's underlying sense of the link between democracy, property rights and economic growth.[4]

Several countries in the developing world, in an attempt to overcome the legacy of colonialism, have limited the protection afforded by their constitutional property clauses to citizens. Although such policies are unlikely to be pursued in the foreseeable future in South Africa, it is worth noting that the plain meaning of s 25 is that anyone who is affected by a deprivation of property is entitled to protection, whether or not they are a citizen, and whether or not they are residing in South Africa at the time of the alleged violation.[5] Similarly, it should not make any difference whether a company's head office is in South Africa or elsewhere. Provided it has interests that are affected by a law of general application in South Africa, and provided further that such interests are recognised as constitutional property,[6] the company will be entitled to the rights protected by s 25.

46.3 Is The Interest at Stake Constitutional Property?

(a) Introduction

Section 25(1) of the Constitution prohibits the deprivation of property 'except in terms of law of general application' and specifies that 'no law may permit arbitrary deprivation of property'. Section 25(2) prohibits the expropriation of property

[1] FNB (supra) at para 45.

[2] Ibid citing Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd (supra) at para 18.

[3] See Jeremy Waldron The Right to Private Property (1988) 5-12.

[4] Although the finding in FNB was limited to juristic persons in the form of companies, both of the lines of reasoning just described are equally applicable to other business entities such as close corporations, trusts, partnerships and the like. All of these forms of business entity should enjoy protection under the property clause.

[5] Generally speaking, when the Constitution intends to distinguish between citizens' and non-citizens' rights it does so expressly. See, for example, s 19(1) (freedom to make political choices).

[6] See § 46.3 infra.

except in terms of law of general application and specifies that property may only be expropriated 'for a public purpose or in the public interest' and 'subject to compensation'. The threshold question in any constitutional property inquiry, therefore, is whether the interest at stake constitutes property as contemplated in s 25(1) and (2). No matter how oppressive or unfair the law at issue is, if it does not interfere with property in this sense, the protection afforded by s 25 is not triggered.

In FNB, the Court declined to furnish 'a comprehensive definition of property for purposes of s 25', on the basis that such an exercise would be 'practically impossible'.[1] Instead, the Court restricted its decision to the narrow holding that ownership of a corporeal movable, together with land ownership, was 'at the heart of our constitutional concept of property'.[2] The first part of this holding was dictated by the facts of FNB: the detention (for the purpose of establishing a lien in terms of s 114 of the Customs and Excise Act 91 of 1964) of three motor vehicles belonging to the appellant. The second part, that relating to the ownership of land, merely confirmed the significance of the stipulation in s 25(4)(b) that 'property is not limited to land'.

Notwithstanding the narrowness of this holding, the decision in FNB does give an indication of how the Court might approach the threshold property question in future cases. In stating that ownership of corporeal movables and land constituted property for the purposes of s 25, the Court held that this was the case 'both as regards the nature of the right involved as well as the object of the right'.[3] This choice of words suggests that the Court's determination of more complex claims will hinge on a composite assessment of these two issues.[4]

In private law, the object of a property right is typically a corporeal thing.[5] This might explain why the Court in FNB was at pains to say that its judgment was 'not concerned at all with incorporeal property'.[6] Then again, there is nothing in the judgment to suggest that, when presented with the appropriate case, the Court will not extend the protection of the property clause to encompass incorporeal property. On the contrary, in outlining its general approach to the meaning of property, the Court quoted with approval AJ van der Walt's argument that it was necessary to break the shackles of private law conceptualism in favour of a

[1] FNB (supra) at para 51.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid (emphasis added).
[4] Section 12(1) of the Expropriation Act makes a distinction between 'property other than a right' (para (a)) and 'a right to use property' (para (b)) and provides for different standards of compensation in respect of each. This distinction is not necessarily incompatible with the Court's approach to constitutional property in FNB, since that approach is broad enough to accommodate both aspects of the property concept, and s 25(3) allows for differential compensation depending on the nature of the property.
[5] See Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 32ff.
[6] FNB (supra) at para 100. See also FNB (supra) at para 54.

more 'dynamic', transformation-oriented, public law conception of property.[1] The Court's endorsement of Van der Walt's pioneering work in this area suggests that it will probably adopt a fairly wide conception of property, one that includes incorporeal property, and that it will seek to strike the private/public balance at other points in the constitutional property clause inquiry.[2]

For analytic purposes, this Chapter follows the Constitutional Court's lead in compartmentalising the question whether a constitutional property right is at stake into a discussion of the nature (or legal form) of the right and the object of the right. This way of proceeding is somewhat artificial since in most cases only one of these two issues will be problematic.[3] Thus, in relation to (rights in) incorporeal property, the question is what categories of incorporeal property (if any) should enjoy constitutional protection. The various legal forms that incorporeal property takes are all very familiar and consequently do not pose any difficulty once this question has been answered. Conversely, there are a range of rights in corporeal property, some of which may be deserving of constitutional protection and others not. Here the key issue is the legal form of the right, since it is settled law after FNB that both movable and immovable corporeal property enjoy constitutional protection. In order to avoid duplication, the section on 'the nature of the right' that follows focuses on the nature of property rights in corporeal property, and the section on 'the object of the right' focuses on the various types of incorporeal property and their claim to constitutional protection.

(b) The nature of the right

Counsel for the respondents in FNB argued that the legal form of the appellant's right — ownership of a corporeal movable — was merely 'a contractual device . . . designed to protect the [appellant]',[4] and that it should therefore not enjoy protection under s 25. The Court rejected this argument, holding that '[t]he fact that an owner of a corporeal movable makes no or limited use of the object in question, is irrelevant to the categorisation of the object as constitutional property.'[5] In particular, the right of ownership reserved by financial institutions when leasing motor vehicles should not be conflated with their 'commercial interest' in the vehicles themselves.[6]

[1] FNB (supra) at para 52, citing Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 11.

[2] Further reasons in support of the extension of the constitutional conception of property to include incorporeal property are given in § 46.3*(c)* infra.

[3] Disputes, such as that in Du Toit v Minister of Transport (supra), over whether what was expropriated constituted a right to use property or the physical thing itself may of course arise, but they will generally not affect the outcome of the threshold property question, ie the question whether a constitutional property interest is at stake.

[4] FNB (supra) at para 53.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at para 55.

The Court was careful to restrict this holding to cases involving ownership of corporeal movables.[1] The Court's reasoning, however, is likely to be extended to other types of rights and other types of things, ie whether the right at issue is ownership, a limited real right, or a personal right to movable or immovable property, the inquiry into the legal form of the right will be objective. According to this approach, the Court will not concern itself with 'the subjective interest' of the claimant in the object of the right, nor with the 'economic value of the right',[2] but with the legal form of the right at the time of the alleged infringement.

The Court's refusal to deal with the subjective interest of the claimant at the threshold stage in FNB does not, of course, mean that this question is irrelevant. It simply means that the Court will deal with it at a later stage of the inquiry.[3] For example, assume that the Department of Housing, as part of its low-income housing strategy, were to target land held for speculative purposes on the periphery of cities and large towns. Before FNB, it might have been possible for the state to have argued that, given the urgent need for suitable land to accommodate the urban poor, land speculation in such areas was socially harmful, and therefore that rights in land held for these reasons should not be protected under s 25. After FNB, this argument will not be possible. Instead, any attempt by the state to target land held for speculative purposes would have to be defended at a later stage of the property clause inquiry.

If the subjective interest of the right-holder is irrelevant at the first stage of the inquiry, what can the legal form of the right tell us about the likelihood that a particular right will be recognised as constitutional property? When referring to this issue in FNB, the Court implied that some rights and interests in property, by their very nature, should not enjoy protection under s 25. Although the Court itself wisely refrained from saying what those rights and interests were, one of the purposes of a commentary such as this is to consider the arguments for and against the recognition of particular rights and interests.

The starting point has to be the distinction drawn in private law between real rights, which are binding on the world at large, and personal rights, which are binding only on the immediate parties to the legal relationship. The law of property as a subject in private law is concerned with the former category of rights, as well as possession (although possession is sometimes regarded as a limited real right).[4] Personal rights, on the other hand, take a number of different forms, and traverse a number of different areas of law. For the reasons given earlier, this section will focus on real and personal rights in corporeal things. The question of which forms of incorporeal property should enjoy constitutional protection will be examined in the next section.

[1] FNB (supra) at para 54.
[2] Ibid at paras 54 and 56.
[3] Ibid at para 54 (remarking that the use to which the property is being put 'may be relevant in deciding whether a deprivation thereof is arbitrary and, if it is, whether such deprivation is justified under s 36').
[4] See DG Kleyn & A Boraine Silberberg and Schoeman's The Law of Property (3rd Edition, 1993) 111-13.

Although the decision in FNB was silent on this issue, there can be little doubt that, in addition to ownership, all of the limited real rights recognised at common law (lease, mortgage, pledge, servitude and lien) should enjoy protection under the property clause, together with limited real rights recognised by statute, such as mineral rights.[1] The fact that a property right has been recognised at common law or by statute means that that the courts or the legislature have already deemed it to be important. The legislature may, of course, wish to adjust the importance accorded to certain classes of property rights, particularly if the recognition of that class is seen as an impediment to social transformation. However, to exclude a particular class of property rights from constitutional protection at the threshold stage would be tantamount to adopting a principle that, in every situation in which rights belonging to that class conflict with the public interest, the latter should prevail. The courts might want to do this in respect of certain interests in property, but not in respect of interests that have already been recognised at common law or by statute. In respect of such interests, the rule of law requires a more subtle form of balancing, one that can be achieved only at other points in the property clause inquiry.

For the same reason, the traditional incidents of ownership (the right to use and enjoy (the fruits of) the thing owned, the right to possess, consume, alienate, and vindicate the thing, and the right to exclude others from it) should enjoy separate protection under the property clause.[2] For example, a zoning law that interferes with the way the owner of a building intends to use that building should in principle be subject to scrutiny under s 25, even though the zoning law does not affect the entire bundle of rights that the owner has in the building.

Further support for this argument may be found in the FNB Court's tacit approval of the 'conceptual severance'[3] approach to property when elaborating its test for arbitrariness under s 25(1). One of the components of that test, as we shall see,[4] is to determine whether the impugned deprivation 'embraces all the incidents of ownership' or 'only some incidents of ownership and those incidents only partially'.[5] Since this determination is made only after the threshold stage

[1] See, for example, s 5(1) of the Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002 (recognising prospecting, mining exploration and production rights granted in terms of the Act as limited real rights). The finding in Lebowa Mineral Trust Beneficiaries Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (1) BCLR 23, 28E-G (T) that, '[i]f the drafters of the Constitution [had] intended to protect mineral rights, they would have done so expressly', is based on a clear misunderstanding of the decision in Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('First Certification') at para 74. It should not be followed.

[2] See Geyser v Msunduzi Municipality (supra) at 249I-J (holding that '[t]he property that is protected by section 25 of the Constitution includes property rights such as ownershp and the bundle of rights that make up ownership such as the right to use property or to exclude other people from using it or to derive income from it or to transfer it to others').

[3] The term was coined by Margaret Radin 'The Liberal Conception of Property: Cross Currents in the Jurisprudence of Takings' (1988) 88 Columbia LR 1667.

[4] See § 46.5*(b)* infra.

[5] FNB (supra) at para 100.

has been passed, the constitutional conception of property must, by implication, include all the recognised incidents of ownership. The clear inference to be drawn from the FNB decision is that the Court will not bar property clause challenges merely because the state has interfered with a few incidents of ownership only. Rather, the Court will entertain the challenge and assess the constitutionality of the law concerned according to the nature and severity of its impact and the number and importance of the incidents the law affects.

Laws that interfere with the traditional incidents of ownership or limited real rights should be distinguished from laws that merely cause patrimonial loss. For example, a law regulating the way in which mineral rights may be held, once assented to by the President, may have an adverse economic impact on the holders of such rights. Until the law is put into operation, however, the impact will affect the holders' subsidiary interest in the market value of their rights, rather than the rights themselves.[1] Such a law will give rise to a claim under the property clause only if the court were prepared to recognise this type of subsidiary interest as property for the purposes of s 25.[2]

The reference in FNB to the possibility that some incidents of ownership may be 'partially' affected by a law suggests that the Court may indeed be prepared to countenance claims of this kind.[3] The reason for extending the constitutional conception of property in this way, however, would not be to erect an artificial hurdle in the way of social transformation, but to postpone the necessary interest-balancing exercise to a later, more flexible stage. The FNB Court thus held that a law that (partially) deprived the claimant of some of the incidents of ownership would be subject to review for arbitrariness, but that a lower standard of review would apply to such a law when compared to a law that deprived the claimant of all of the incidents of ownership.[4] In most cases this would mean that a law (partially) depriving the claimant of one or two incidents of ownership would easily pass constitutional muster. Likewise, the extension of the constitutional conception of property to the traditional incidents of ownership and to subsidiary interests would not necessarily mean that the state would have to pay just and equitable compensation in every case. The duty to pay just and equitable compensation, as explained below,[5] depends on whether the law provides for the expropriation of property. Even if every conceivable strand in the property rights bundle were recognised as property for purposes of s 25, expropriation could be

[1] See the Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002, which at the time of writing had been assented to by the President but not yet put into operation. Item 12 of Schedule II to this Act provides for the payment of compensation for expropriation in certain circumstances.

[2] Such interests have been recognised as property at common law. See Diepsloot Residents' and Landowners' Association v Administrator, Transvaal 1994 (3) SA 336 (A).

[3] FNB (supra) at para 100*(f)*.

[4] Ibid.

[5] See § 46.7 infra.

defined in such a way as to preclude the payment of compensation in cases where this would tilt the private/public balance too far in favour of the claimant.[1]

Outside the private law of property, the most important forms of property are personal rights to performances regulated by the law of contract, including some important commercial rights, intellectual property rights (copyright, trademarks and patents), and certain public-law entitlements (the so-called 'new property'), including welfare rights (pensions and medical aid benefits) and other forms of state 'largesse' (such as licences, permits and quotas).[2] The question whether the constitutional conception of property should be extended to these forms of property depends on whether incorporeal property as such should be protected under s 25 and, if so, whether any distinction should be made between the various forms of incorporeal property. The extension of s 25 to incorporeal property is dealt with in the next section.

(c) The object of the right

As we have seen,[3] the Constitutional Court in FNB was at pains to restrict its holding to corporeal property. In so doing, however, the Court was simply being cautious. Neither this decision nor that in the First Certification case[4] should be taken as an indication that the Court, when confronted with an appropriate case, will not extend the constitutional conception of property to encompass incorporeal property. In addition to the general arguments raised by Van der Walt about the need for a 'dynamic', transformation-oriented, public-law conception of property,[5] there are three specific reasons for extending the protection of the property clause to incorporeal property. First, the blanket exclusion of incorporeal property from the protection of s 25 would be a very crude way of balancing competing public and private interests in property. As with the definitional exclusion of [1] Alternatively, it might be possible for the state to justify the non-payment of compensation where the right expropriated constitutes a very minor strand in the owner's property rights bundle. See Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at paras 32-5 (assuming, without deciding, that the granting of permission to establish a grave by statute might constitute a 'de facto expropriation', but holding that the non-payment of compensation was justified under s 36).

[2] The term 'largesse' to describe these forms of state benefit, and the term 'new property', were coined by Charles Reich 'The New Property' (1964) 73 Yale LJ 733.

[3] See § 46.3*(b)* supra.

[4] In First Certification (supra), the Court held that the fact that the 1996 Constitution does not extend express protection to incorporeal property rights was not contrary to the Constitutional Principles in Schedule 4 of the interim Constitution (Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993) because such rights are not 'universally accepted fundamental rights'. This ruling should not be misunderstood as a ruling that s 25 does not protect incorporeal property. The purpose of the certification exercise was to test the 1996 Constitution against the Constitutional Principles, including the principle that all 'universally accepted fundamental rights' should enjoy constitutional protection. A decision that a particular kind of right in property is not universally accepted and therefore need not have been expressly recognised in the Constitution is not tantamount to a finding that it is not recognised at all. See further the remarks made in § 46.3*(b)* supra in relation to mineral rights, and the finding in Lebowa Mineral Trust Beneficiaries Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (1) BCLR 23, 28E-G (T).

[5] See § 46.3*(a)* supra.

rights and subsidiary interests in corporeal property, such an approach would amount to declaring for all future cases that, where private and public interests in incorporeal property conflict, the latter should prevail. A much more nuanced approach than this is required, one that can only be achieved at a later stage of the property clause inquiry. Second, the overwhelming preponderance of foreign law authority favours the constitutional protection of incorporeal property.[1] And, finally, the second of the two reasons given by the Court in FNB for extending the protection of s 25 to juristic persons — the role that these forms of property have to play in economic growth and the consolidation of democracy[2] — applies equally well to the extension of that protection to incorporeal property.

The main category of incorporeal property, personal rights to performances, including a range of commercial rights, has been widely recognised in foreign law as being in principle capable of constitutional property clause protection. It is impossible to list all of the possible sub-categories here, but some examples are shares in a company,[3] goodwill,[4] rights in a partnership,[5] and the right of management of a company.[6]

Another important category of incorporeal property concerns public law entitlements in the form of welfare rights (including pensions and medical aid benefits) and other kinds of government 'largesse' (including licences, permits and quotas). Such entitlements — collectively referred to as 'the new property'[7] — enjoy constitutional protection in many countries. However, such protection is typically afforded against procedurally unfair deprivation, and not against expropriation.[8] Since these entitlements are by their very nature contingent on mutable government policies or programmes, it would in most cases be nonsensical to impose on the state a duty to compensate individuals in the event of these entitlements being withdrawn. Such an approach would effectively lock the state into an existing set of welfare policies and programmes, thereby unfairly tilting the balance in favour of the current class of beneficiaries at the expense of the state's obligation to promote the public interest by pursuing the best set of policies and programmes for changing circumstances.

[1] See Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 30-71.

[2] See § 46.2*(b)* supra.

[3] Government of Mauritius v Union Flacq Sugar Estates Co Ltd; Government of Mauritius v Medine Shares Holding Co Ltd [1992] WLR 903 (PC).

[4] Manitoba Fisheries Ltd v The Queen (1978) 88 DLR (3d) 462 (distinguishing Government of Malaysia v Selangor Pilot Association [1977] 2 WLR 901 (PC)).

[5] Societe United Docks v Government of Mauritius; Marine Workers Union v Mauritius Marine Authority [1985] LRC (Const) 801 (PC).

[6] Attorney-General v Lawrence [1985] LRC (Const) 921 (St Christopher and Nevis CA).

[7] See Charles Reich 'The New Property' (1964) 73 Yale LJ 733.

[8] On the position in the United States and the Commonwealth in this regard, see Matthew Chaskalson 'The Problem with Property: Thoughts on the Constitutional Protection of Property in the United States and the Commonwealth' (1993) 9 SAJHR 388, 404-7.

The question whether the new property should enjoy protection under the property clause in the interim Constitution was considered in Transkei Public Servants Association v Government of the Republic of South Africa.[1] In this case, the Transkei High Court observed that 'the meaning of 'property' in section 28 of the [interim] Constitution may well be sufficiently wide to encompass a State housing subsidy'.[2] This obiter dictum is no more than persuasive authority, of course, but is nevertheless likely to be followed in cases decided under the 1996 Constitution. After all, it is not the recognition of the new property as such that constitutes the real difficulty, but the degree and nature of the protection afforded to such property. For this reason, it is once again likely that the answer will lie not at the threshold stage of the inquiry, but in the application of the Constitutional Court's test for arbitrariness. As we shall see,[3] a court has tremendous scope in terms of that test to vary the level of scrutiny applied according to the nature of the impugned law and the form of property at stake. Where that law is a welfare law, and the form of property at issue a public law entitlement, a court is likely to give the state a fairly wide margin to adjust the structure, and method of enjoyment, of the entitlement, subject only to the requirement that any adjustments it does make should be effected in a procedurally fair manner. Precisely so as to allow for the enforcement of rights to procedural fairness at the s 25(1) stage, most public law entitlements should be recognised as property. The only real reason for excluding claims based on such entitlements at the threshold stage would be to eliminate cases where the interest has not as yet taken the form of a vested right. This consideration would mainly apply where the remedy sought was compensation rather than the enforcement of the claimant's right to procedural fairness.[4]

Finally, intellectual property rights in the form of patents, trademarks and copyright should, and are likely to be, recognised as constitutional property, for all the aforementioned reasons: the need to subject any interference with such rights to the Court's more flexible balancing test for arbitrariness, their importance to the economic development of South Africa, and the weight of foreign law authority.[5]

46.4 Has There Been a Deprivation of Property?

If the court decides that the right or interest at stake amounts to constitutionally protected property, the next stage of the inquiry requires it to determine whether there has been a deprivation of property. After FNB, it is clear that the term

[1] 1995 (9) BCLR 1235 (Tk).
[2] Ibid at 1246-7.
[3] See § 46.5*(b)* infra.
[4] See Chairman of the Public Service Commission v Zimbabwe Teachers Association 1996 (9) BCLR 1189 (ZS) (holding that a public servant's right to an annual bonus is not expropriated where it is withheld before having vested).
[5] For an overview of these foreign cases see Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 64 n114.

'deprivation' will be given a very wide meaning, and that this stage of the inquiry will consequently play very little role (if any) in future cases. Noting that the term was 'somewhat misleading or confusing',[1] the Court in FNB remarked that '[i]n a certain sense any interference with the use, enjoyment or exploitation of private property involves some deprivation in respect of the person having title or right to or in the property concerned'.[2] Without offering a comprehensive definition, the Court held that 'dispossessing an owner of all rights, use and benefit to and of corporeal movable goods, is a prime example of deprivation in both its grammatical and contextual sense'.[3]

The actual holding in FNB with regard to the meaning of 'deprivation' is therefore quite narrow. Nevertheless, there is enough in the Court's obiter dicta to suggest that very little will turn on whether the law at issue deprives the claimant of property as opposed to interfering in some other way with that property short of an actual deprivation. The more likely scenario is that a court hearing a constitutional property clause challenge will construe almost any interference with the use or enjoyment of property as a deprivation, and will deal with the level of intrusiveness of the deprivation when considering whether the requirements of s 25(1) have been met. For example, a law that interferes with only one or two 'sticks' in the property rights bundle will not for that reason alone be treated as providing for something less than a deprivation.[4] Rather, the fact that the deprivation of property is less than total will be a factor relevant to the court's determination, at the next stage of the inquiry, whether there is 'sufficient reason' for the deprivation.[5]

Although it failed to give a comprehensive definition of the term 'deprivation', the Constitutional Court's judgment in FNB did endorse the view expressed in an earlier version of this chapter that expropriations should be construed as a form of deprivation.[6] Whatever else the term 'deprivation' may mean, therefore, it is certain that a law that provides for the expropriation of property will also constitute a deprivation of property. The significance of this rule is that a law providing for the expropriation of property, in addition to the requirements of s 25(2), will have to satisfy the requirements of s 25(1). Indeed, on the evidence of FNB, it would seem that the Constitutional Court, when confronted with such a law, will first test it for compliance with s 25(1), before moving on, if necessary, to s 25(2).[7]

[1] FNB (supra) at para 57, citing Van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (supra) at 101ff.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 61.
[4] See Geyser v Msunduzi Municipality (supra) at 250B (interference with right to transfer property constitutes deprivation for purposes of s 25(1)); Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at para 29 (appropriation of grave by farmworker tenant constitutes deprivation).
[5] See, in particular, para (f) of the test for arbitrariness laid down in para 100 of FNB (discussed in § 46.5*(b)* infra).
[6] See Matthew Chaskalson & Carole Lewis 'Property' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (supra) at 31-14, cited with approval in FNB (supra) at para 57.
[7] See the set of questions posed by the Court in FNB (supra) at para 46.

Once again, this approach will tend to de-emphasize the potential balancing function performed by other stages of the constitutional property inquiry — in this case the distinction between expropriations and deprivations — in favour of the Court's test for arbitrariness. Whilst in most instances, the privileging of the test for arbitrariness has the effect (and virtue) of introducing greater flexibility into the property clause inquiry, the Court's insistence that a law that provides for the expropriation of property should first be tested against s 25(1) may have the opposite effect. One of the principal means by which an individual's interest in the use and enjoyment of property, and the state's interest in acquiring it, may be balanced is through the payment of compensation. This idea is recognised in the US Supreme Court's takings jurisprudence, which regards compensation as the mechanism through which society shares the burden imposed on property holders by the forced enlistment of their property in service to the public good.[1] An otherwise arbitrary law may be perfectly rational, and indeed proportional, if it provides for the payment of just and equitable compensation. This being so, it would make no sense to assess the arbitrariness of a law that provides for the expropriation of property without also considering what that law says about the amount, time and manner of compensation. In this way, the inquiry mandated by the state's duty to pay compensation in s 25(2)(b) will tend to become sucked into, or at least rendered redundant by, the test for arbitrariness in s 25(1). As explained below,[2] there are several points in that test at which the 'means employed' by the legislature and the 'extent of the deprivation' occasioned by the law need to be assessed.[3] In respect of deprivations that take the form of expropriations, the means employed to effect the deprivation may be a scheme of expropriation that includes the payment of just and equitable compensation. If so, this would make all the difference in the world to the question whether the law permits the arbitrary deprivation of property.

The same conclusion may be reached by means of the following reductio ad absurdum argument. Conceptually, the most severe form of deprivation is an expropriation, which is defined as the forced transfer of a right in property from the individual to the state.[4] If just and equitable compensation is provided, however, the impact of an expropriation may not be so severe. It would therefore be somewhat odd for a court to delay its consideration of this aspect of the law to a later stage. To do so, a court would have to counter-factually assess the law as though no compensation had been offered, and then either find the regulatory [1] See, in particular, Armstrong v United States 364 US 40, 49 (1960) ('[t]he Fifth Amendment's guarantee . . . was designed to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole'). The principle laid down in Armstrong was used to explain the US Supreme Court's ad hoc balancing test for regulatory takings in two more recent cases. See Yee v City of Escondido 118 L Ed 2d 153, 162 (1992) and Concrete Pipe and Products of California Inc v Construction Laborers Pension Trust for Southern California 124 L Ed 2d 539, 580 (1994).

[2] See § 46.5 infra.

[3] FNB (supra) at paras 100*(a)*, (d) and (g), discussed in § 46.5*(b)* infra.

[4] See § 46.7 infra.

scheme to be non-arbitrary, or arbitrary but justified under s 36, or arbitrary and not justified. Where just and equitable compensation was indeed provided, a finding that the law provided for the arbitrary deprivation of property based on such a counterfactual inquiry would be absurd. To avoid this result, the Court would have to take into account the fact that the scheme of expropriation provided for the payment of compensation in the course of applying the test for arbitrariness. This approach would have the effect of sucking the inquiry into the amount, time and manner of payment of compensation into the arbitrariness test.

'Sucking in' will also occur, as in FNB, where a law permits the expropriation of property but does not provide for compensation. Confronted with a law that provided for civil forfeiture (in effect, an uncompensated expropriation) the Court in FNB did not move directly, as it might have done, to consider the question whether the state's failure to pay compensation to the appellant was justified under s 36. Rather, it construed s 114 of the Customs and Excise Act[1] as providing for a 'total deprivation' of property,[2] and then proceeded to measure it against the standard set by s 25(1). The fact that the deprivation was total was central to the Court's conclusion that s 114 permitted the arbitrary deprivation of property. Substantially the same result, however, might have been achieved by construing s 114 as permitting the expropriation of property without compensation, in violation of s 25(2)(b).

Where, as in FNB, the remedy sought is the striking down of the law, it matters little whether the law is found to be unconstitutional because it provides for the arbitrary deprivation of property or because it permits the expropriation of property without compensation. Where, on the other hand, the proper outcome is for the Court to uphold the law, subject to reading in a requirement that the state pay just and equitable compensation, the Court would have to find that the law provided for the expropriation of property, since the duty to pay compensation only arises where property is expropriated. On the approach laid down in FNB, however, such a finding would be unlikely, because the prior finding that the law unjustifiably violated s 25(1) would terminate the constitutional inquiry.

46.5 Is The Law That Provides For The Deprivation Consistent With Section 25(1)?

After the decision in FNB, it is clear that every law that deprives a person of property, including by way of expropriation, must satisfy the requirements of s 25(1). These requirements that the deprivation must occur in terms of law of general application, and that the law in terms of which the deprivation occurs must not be arbitrary.

[1] Act 91 of 1964.
[2] FNB (supra) at para 108.

(a) Law of general application

The term 'law of general application' as used in s 36 of the Constitution is discussed in the chapter on 'Limitation'.[1] As it occurs in s 25(1), the requirement that any deprivation of property must occur 'in terms of law of general application' is intended to protect individuals from being deprived of property by bills of attainder or other laws that single them out for 'discriminatory treatment', or which 'capriciously interfere with [their] property rights'.[2]

The important consequence of this requirement is that the focus of the s 25(1) inquiry, and indeed the entire property clause inquiry, will invariably fall on a law rather than any other type of state action. Administrative action that deprives a person of property without being authorized by law of general application will be reviewable in the first instance under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act,[3] and possibly also under s 33 of the Constitution (the right to just administrative action).[4] Similarly, executive action that deprives a person of property without being authorized by law of general application will be reviewable in the first instance as a violation of the principle of legality.[5]

(b) Arbitrary deprivation of property

The specification in s 25(1) that 'no law may permit the arbitrary deprivation of property' received by far the greatest attention in the FNB decision,[6] and will clearly be central to the balancing of public and private interests in property in future cases. Before the decision in FNB, the consensus of academic opinion, relying on the Constitutional Court's decision in S v Lawrence; S v Negal: S v Solberg,[7] had been that the requirement of non-arbitrariness in s 25(1) was equivalent to the rationality requirement imposed by s 9(1) of the Constitution.[8] This view was conclusively rejected in FNB. The Court, after an exhaustive survey of foreign law, held that the validity of a deprivation depends on 'an appropriate

[1] See Stuart Woolman 'Limitation' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (supra) at § 12.5.

[2] Lebowa Mineral Trust Beneficiaries Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa (supra) at 29H (endorsing the position taken in an earlier version of this Chapter).

[3] Act 3 of 2000.

[4] See Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold 'Administrative Action' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, 2002).

[5] See further § 46.5*(c)* infra.

[6] See FNB (supra) at paras 61-109.

[7] 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC).

[8] See Geoff Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights: Overview and Commentary' in Budlender et al Juta's New Land Law (Original Service, 1998) 1-34–6, Matthew Chaskalson & Carole Lewis 'Property' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 31–13-4, and Theunis Roux 'Property' in Cheadle et al South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 429, 461. But see De Waal et al The Bill of Rights Handbook (supra) at 422 (arguing that a deprivation is arbitrary 'if it follows unfair procedures, if it is irrational, or is for no good reason').

relationship between means and ends, between the sacrifice the individual is asked to make and the public purpose this is intended to serve'.[1] In so doing, the Court made it clear that the test for arbitrariness 'is not limited to an enquiry into mere rationality, but is less strict than a full and exacting proportionality examination'.[2] The precise test to be applied is worth quoting in full:

> [D]eprivation of property is 'arbitrary' as meant by s 25 when the 'law' referred to in s 25(1) does not provide sufficient reason for the particular deprivation in question or is procedurally unfair. Sufficient reason is to be established as follows:
>
> (a) It is to be determined by evaluating the relationship between means employed, namely the deprivation in question and ends sought to be achieved, namely the purpose of the law in question.
>
> (b) A complexity of relationships has to be considered.
>
> (c) In evaluating the deprivation in question, regard must be had to the relationship between the purpose of the deprivation and the person whose property is affected.
>
> (d) In addition, regard must be had to the relationship between the purpose of the deprivation and the nature of the property as well as the extent of the deprivation in respect of such property.
>
> (e) Generally speaking, when the property in question is ownership of land or a corporeal movable, a more compelling purpose will have to be established in order for the depriving law to constitute sufficient reason for the deprivation than in the case when the property is something different and the property right something less extensive. This judgment is not concerned at all with incorporeal property.
>
> (f) Generally speaking, when the deprivation in question embraces all the incidents of ownership, the purpose for the deprivation will have to be more compelling than when the deprivation embraces only some incidents of ownership and those incidents only partially.
>
> (g) Depending on such interplay between variable means and ends, the nature of the property in question and the extent of its deprivation, there may be circumstances when sufficient reason is established by, in effect, no more than a mere rational relationship between means and ends; in others this might only be established by a proportionality evaluation closer to that required by s 36(1) of the Constitution.
>
> (h) Whether there is sufficient reason to warrant the deprivation is a matter to be decided on all the relevant facts of each particular case, always bearing in mind that the enquiry is concerned with 'arbitrary' in relation to the deprivation of property under s 25.[3]

On first reading, this passage appears to be a godsend to practitioners long perplexed by the labyrinthine commentaries on the property clause that predated FNB. Unfortunately, appearances can be deceptive, and never more so than [1] FNB (supra) at para 98. Note the similarity between this formulation of the test and the burden-sharing principle articulated in Armstrong (supra).

[2] Ibid. See also FNB (supra) at para 65: 'In its context "arbitrary", as used in s 25, is not limited to non-rational deprivations, in the sense of there being no rational connection between means and ends. It refers to a wider concept and a broader controlling principle that is more demanding than an enquiry into mere rationality. At the same time it is a narrower and less intrusive concept than that of the proportionality evaluation required by the limitation provisions of s 36.'

[3] FNB (supra) at para 100.

when a court appears to be making the outcome of future cases more predictable. What seems at first blush to be a step-by-step guide to the resolution of virtually any s 25 challenge, on closer examination turns out to be a deliberate retention by the Court of an almost absolute discretion to decide future cases in the manner it deems fit.

To make matters worse, after a lengthy display of comparative law scholarship in the thirty paragraphs leading up to the formulation of this test, the Court in FNB scarcely applied it. Instead, it decided the constitutionality of s 114 of the Customs and Excise Act[1] mainly by distinguishing the facts in FNB from the facts in several Australian cases.[2] The actual application of the test for arbitrariness is contained in two short paragraphs.[3] The precise holding is that, where the state seeks to deprive a third party of property to exact payment of a debt (in this case a customs debt) owed by another party (the debtor) to the state, there must be a close nexus between: (1) the third party and the transaction giving rise to the debt, (2) the property taken and the debt, and (3) the third party and the debtor.[4] So much is admirably clear. The reasoning leading up to this holding, however, hardly amounts to a systematic application of the factors listed in paras (a) to (h) of the passage quoted above. Rather, the Court simply asserts the legitimacy and importance of the state's general need to exact payment of customs debts, and then reduces the means adopted in the Customs and Excise Act to three brief propositions, concentrating on the lack of connection between means and ends.[5] 'In the absence of any such relevant nexus,' the Court concludes, 'no sufficient reason exists for s 114 to deprive persons other than the customs debtor of their goods.'[6]

On this evidence, there are two keys to understanding the Court's test for arbitrariness. First, because it applies to all deprivations, including expropriations, the test will be the focus of almost any property clause inquiry. It will be in the application of this test that courts will seek to strike the required balance between the individual right to property and the public purpose sought to be pursued in, or the public interest underlying, the law in question. Of the remaining stages of the constitutional property clause inquiry, the threshold question concerning the meaning of property may serve to eliminate claims based purely on the impact of the law on the claimant's wealth, rather than on any particular right in property or legally recognised incident of ownership. The only other stages of the inquiry

[1] Act 91 of 1964.
[2] FNB (supra) at paras 101-7.
[3] Ibid at paras 108-9.
[4] Ibid at para 108.
[5] These propositions are: the lack of any connection between the third party and the 'transaction giving rise to the customs debt', the lack of any connection between the property taken and the customs debt, and the lack of any representation on the part of the third party inducing the state to act to its detriment in incurring the customs debt (implying that the claimant might have been estopped from challenging the validity of the law had it indeed made such a representation). Ibid.
[6] FNB (supra) at para 109.

that may be meaningfully applied are the distinction between deprivation and expropriation (to determine whether the additional duty to pay just and equitable compensation arises, where it serves the claimant's interests to raise such an argument) and the inquiry into the adequacy of compensation (where this stage provides a more nuanced method for balancing private and public interests in property).

The second key to unlocking the arbitrariness test in FNB is to accept that it is a test that leaves much scope for judicial discretion. Both the factors that the court must take into account and the level of scrutiny will vary according to the circumstances. No mere formulaic application of the test will be possible, at least not until many more cases have been decided. Even the stipulation in para (e) of the test that, 'where the property in question is ownership of land or a corporeal moveable, a more compelling purpose will have to be established in order for the depriving law to constitute sufficient reason for the deprivation than in the case where the property is something different and the property right something less extensive', is preceded by the qualification 'generally speaking'. One of the main exceptions to this rule may be the most contentious, namely the deprivation of ownership rights in land in pursuit of land reform. In this case, as more fully argued in § 46.8 below, the normative force of the declaration in s 25(4)(a) that the 'public interest includes the nation's commitment to land reform', together with the attempted immunisation of land reform from constitutional impediment in s 25(8), may have the effect of lowering the level of scrutiny, even though 'the property in question is ownership of land'.

All that can be said with any certainty is that the level of scrutiny will vacillate between two fixed poles: rationality review at the lower end of the scale, and something just short of a review for proportionality at the other.[1] Where the deprivation totally deprives the claimant of all his or her rights in land or a corporeal movable (and is not effected in pursuit of land reform or other reforms aimed at broadening access to South Africa's natural resources), the law at issue is unlikely to pass constitutional muster unless it provides for something approximating the prompt payment of market value compensation. Where, on the other hand, only some rights in the property are affected, and the impact of the law does not impose a disproportionate burden on those affected when compared to the purpose sought to be achieved, especially where the purpose of the law is land reform or another kind of reform aimed at broadening access to South Africa's natural resources, then the law is unlikely to be found unconstitutional.

[1] The level of scrutiny applied may, of course, be crucial to the outcome of the case. At the time of writing s 118(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 had been the subject of two contradictory High Court decisions, and was awaiting consideration by the Constitutional Court. See Geyser v Msunduzi Municipality (supra) and Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality; Bisset v Buffalo City Municipality ('Mkontwana') unreported SECLD Cases 1238/02 and 903/02 (judgment of Kroon and Leach JJ). The difference between these two decisions is attributable to the fact that a rational basis test was applied in Geyser, whereas in Mkontwana the Court applied something approximating a proportionality test.

Although s 114 of the Customs and Excise Act was not challenged in FNB on the basis of procedural fairness, the Constitutional Court held in passing that a deprivation of property is also arbitrary where the law in terms of which the deprivation is effected is procedurally unfair.[1] The inquiry into the procedural fairness of a law for the purposes of s 25(1) must be distinguished from the procedural fairness of particular administrative action. Where the deprivation of property occurs in terms of procedurally unfair administrative action, but the law authorizing such action is not on the face of it procedurally unfair, the proper course is to have the administrative action set aside under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[2] The interaction between the right to procedural fairness and the right not to be arbitrarily deprived of property is discussed in the next section.

(c) Deprivation of property and the right to just administrative action

Since the right to just administrative action, including procedurally fair administrative action, in FC s 33 deals with administrative action rather than 'law', there will generally be no overlap between the property clause and the administrative justice clause with regard to allegations of procedural unfairness. A law that provides for the deprivation of property in a procedurally unfair manner will be challengeable under s 25(1) of the Constitution, and administrative action that deprives a person of property in a procedurally unfair manner will be challengeable under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act. There are, however, two possible areas of overlap between the property clause and other parts of the Constitution that need to be clarified.

First, in the opinion of some commentators,[3] delegated rule-making falls within the definition of administrative action in the AJA and also within the concept of administrative action for purposes of s 33. Since delegated rules (such as regulations made under an Act of Parliament) undoubtedly constitute 'law of general application', they will in theory be susceptible to review for procedural fairness both under s 25(1) and the AJA.

The second possible area of overlap between s 25(1) and other parts of the Constitution concerns executive action that effects a deprivation of property without being authorized by a law of general application.[1] Executive action is by definition not reviewable under s 33 or the AJA. However, the Constitutional Court has held that all executive action is subject to the principle of legality, and must be authorised by law.[2] Executive action that effected a deprivation of property without being authorised by a law of general application would therefore be reviewable both under s 25(1) and in terms of the principle of legality.

[1] FNB (supra) at para 100. See further Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 221E (T) and Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C) at para 82.

[2] Act 3 of 2000 ('the AJA').

[3] See Iain Currie & Jonathan Klaaren The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act Benchbook (2001) § 2.38.

In respect of both of these potential areas of overlap, the property clause should be applied only as a last resort. Thus, were it indeed held that delegated rule-making is a form of administrative action, the procedural fairness of a delegated rule that effected a deprivation of property should first be tested against the AJA.[3] Similarly, executive action that effected an arbitrary deprivation of property and which was not authorised by law should be reviewed in the first instance as a violation of the principle of legality.

46.6 Is The Deprivation Justified Under Section 36?

Should the court find that s 25(1) has been infringed, either because the deprivation did not take place 'in terms of law of general application', or because the law authorizing the deprivation was arbitrary, the state could theoretically seek to justify such infringement under s 36 of the Constitution, the general limitations clause.[4] On closer analysis, however, the application of s 36 to infringements of s 25(1) is beset by conceptual difficulties.[5] Deprivations that limit s 25(1) because they do not occur 'in terms of law of general application' cannot be saved by s 36 because the precondition for the application of this section is that the limitation should have occurred 'in terms of law of general application'. And a law that permits the arbitrary deprivation of property, either because it is procedurally unfair or because it provides insufficient reason for the deprivation, is hardly likely to be 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society', as required by s 36(1).

[1] Administrative action that effects a deprivation of property without being authorised by a law of general application will generally be reviewable under s 6(2)(f)(i) of the AJA (because it is not authorised by the empowering provision on which it ostensibly relies). There may be some instances, however, where action undertaken by a member of the administration does not constitute administrative action because it does not amount to the exercise of a public power or the performance of a public function in terms of any legislation. (See the definition of administrative action in s 1 of the AJA.) Such action will therefore not be reviewable under the AJA, but will be reviewable in terms of the principle of legality, therefore precluding the need to resort to the property clause.

[2] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 59.

[3] Of course, if delegated rule-making were found not to constitute administrative action, such action would generally not be reviewable for procedural fairness, except if the law concerned effected a deprivation of property, in which case it would be reviewable for procedural fairness under s 25(1), following the holding in FNB.

[4] See Woolman 'Limitation' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) § 12.5.

[5] See De Waal et al The Bill of Rights Handbook (supra) at 426-8.

In dealing with the issue of justification in FNB, the Court acknowledged these difficulties, but assumed in favour of the state that s 36 was applicable to infringements of s 25(1).[1] The Court then proceeded to apply a pared down version of its s 36(1) justification analysis to the facts as follows:

> FNB's ownership in the vehicles concerned is ultimately completely extinguished by the operation of s 114 of the Act. As against this the Commissioner gains an execution object for someone else's debt. But, as already indicated, there is no connection between FNB or its vehicles and the customs debt in question. Under these circumstances the object achieved by s 114 is grossly disproportional to the infringement of FNB's property rights.

This passage tends to confirm the view that s 36 has 'no meaningful application' to infringements of s 25(1).[2] The issues addressed by the Court in this passage are precisely the same as those addressed in its test for arbitrariness. Thus, the complete extinguishment of First National Bank's ownership of the vehicles is addressed in paras (d) and (f) of the arbitrariness test, which requires the Court to examine 'the extent of the deprivation' and whether it 'embraces all the incidents of ownership'. Likewise, the absence of a 'connection between FNB or its vehicles and the customs debt' was, as indicated above, central to the Court's finding that 'no sufficient reason' existed for the deprivation.[3]

In cases where the test for arbitrariness approximates rational basis review rather than proportionality, the conceptual case for the non-application of s 36 is strongest: a law that infringes s 25(1) for lack of means-end rationality will never be capable of justification under the general limitations clause. At the other end of the scale, where the test for arbitrariness approaches a test for proportionality, the application of s 36 can at best confirm a conclusion already reached under s 25(1), as illustrated by FNB.[4]

For similar reasons, the reference to s 36(1) in s 25(8) of the Constitution is probably redundant. Section 25(8) provides:

> No provision of this section may impede the state from taking legislative and other measures to achieve land, water and related reform, in order to redress the results of past racial discrimination, provided that any departure from the provisions of this section is in accordance with the provisions of section 36(1).

---

[1] FNB (supra) at para 110.

[2] De Waal et al The Bill of Rights Handbook (supra) at 427.

[3] See FNB (supra) at para 109. See also Mkontwana (supra) at paras 60-67 (holding that the limitation imposed by s 118(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 was not reasonable and justifiable for reasons similar to those given by the Court in finding that this section provided for the arbitrary deprivation of property).

[4] See also Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 222E (T). The contrary finding, in Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C), that an infringement of s 25(1) was justified under s 36, is explicable on the basis that the limitations clause was applied to justify the infringement of other rights as well, meaning that the finding in this case that the law was justified was not specific to the finding that the law infringed s 25(1). In addition, Bathgate predated FNB, and accordingly did not apply the arbitrariness test as laid down in that case.

The intention behind this provision was to insulate land reform measures from constitutional impugnment under s 25. Unfortunately, subsection (8) has been formulated in a way that tends to defeat this purpose. The addition of the proviso indicates that the Constitutional Assembly contemplated that certain land reform measures might 'depart' from the provisions of the property clause. The word 'departure' in s 25(8), however, has no meaning other than a limitation of the rights in s 25. Thus, s 25(8) in effect provides that a land reform measure that limits a right entrenched in s 25 must comply with s 36(1). But s 36(2) in any event states that: 'Except as provided in [s 36(1)] … no law may limit any right entrenched in the Bill of Rights.' The proviso to s 25(8) was therefore unnecessary. At most it supports the inference to be drawn from s 36(2).[1]

The only other interpretative weight that can be given to s 25(8) is that the court should apply a lower level of scrutiny when testing land reform measures against s 25 than it does in respect of other measures. After FNB, however, it is clear that the appropriate point in the analysis for this type of 'measure-based' distinction is not the general limitations stage, but the test for arbitrariness. In respect of a land reform measure, for example, the court might decide to depart from the general rule laid down in FNB that 'where the property in question is ownership of land … a more compelling purpose will have to be established'.[2] The normative force of s 25(8) would justify weakening the standard of review in such a situation, even where the measure deprived the complainant of ownership of land. This type of adjustment to the level of scrutiny must, however, be made when applying the test for arbitrariness. Once that test has been applied, the same conceptual difficulties that beset the application of s 36 to infringements of s 25(1) will render the application of s 25(8) redundant.

46.7 Does The Deprivation Amount to an Expropriation of Property?

According to s 25(2) of the Final Constitution, the state may only expropriate property on three conditions. First, it must do so in terms of law of general application. Second, the law authorising the expropriation must be enacted in pursuit of 'a public purpose' or must otherwise be 'in the public interest'. Third, the law must provide for the payment of compensation, either by agreement or as determined by a court of law. Section 25(3) of the Constitution adds more detail to the third condition by specifying the standard that the compensation scheme must meet if it is to pass constitutional muster.

After FNB, it is clear that these requirements must be met in addition to the requirements laid down in s 25(1). Since the requirement that the law should be a law of general application appears in both s 25(1) and (2), a law that provides for the expropriation of property must, in addition to meeting the requirements in s 25(2), provide 'sufficient reason' for depriving the claimant of property by way of expropriation and be procedurally fair. Put differently, the consequence of classifying a law as providing for the expropriation of property is to add two requirements to the list of requirements that the state must meet if the law is to pass constitutional muster. First, the law must have been enacted in pursuit of 'a public purpose' or be otherwise 'in the public interest'. Second, compensation must be paid.

[1] See Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at para 33.
[2] See para (e) of the test for arbitrariness as set out in FNB (supra) at para 100.

In comparative constitutional law, the categorization of a law as providing for the expropriation (or 'compulsory acquisition' or 'taking') of property as opposed to the mere deprivation (or 'regulation') of property is often the main point of contestation between the constitutional complainant and the state. Much of the US Supreme Court's takings jurisprudence, for example, concerns whether a law that purports to be a mere regulation of property 'goes too far',[1] and in so doing amounts to an expropriation of property (or 'regulatory taking'). Similarly, in the Commonwealth, a great deal of energy is put into determining the boundary between the deprivation and compulsory acquisition of property.[2]

In South Africa, by contrast, the distinction between deprivation and expropriation has lost much of its significance. The FNB Court treated expropriations as a form of deprivation[3] and insisted that an impugned law, even where it clearly provided for the expropriation of property, first be tested for compliance with s 25(1). As FNB itself illustrates, a law that totally deprives the claimant of its property, without providing for compensation, is unlikely to survive the Court's test for arbitrariness.[4] From the point of view of the constitutionality of such a law, it matters little whether it is classified as providing for a deprivation of property that does not amount to expropriation, or as a law that provides for the expropriation of property. Similarly, a law that expressly provides for the expropriation of property subject to compensation, but which is not aimed at achieving 'a public purpose or in the public interest', is unlikely to provide sufficient reason for depriving the claimant of property, and therefore unlikely to survive constitutional scrutiny beyond the s 25(1) stage. The only situation in which a claimant might have an interest in persuading the court that the law being challenged provides for the expropriation of property rather than the arbitrary deprivation of that property is where it wishes the court to uphold the law, and to read in a requirement that the state pay at least some compensation (where

[1] Pennsylvania Coal Co v Mahon 260 US 393, 415-16 (1922).

[2] See Thomas Allen 'Commonwealth Constitutions and the Right Not to be Deprived of Property' (1993) 42 ICLQ 523. But see Tom Allen 'The Human Rights Act (UK) and Property Law' in Janet McLean (ed) Property and the Constitution (1999) 147, 151 (arguing that the distinction between expropriation and deprivation in Article 1 to the First Protocol on the European Convention on Human Rights is 'less important than it is in the USA' because compensation is not guaranteed in every case).

[3] FNB (supra) at para 57.

[4] Cf Nhlabati v Fick (supra) at paras 27-31 (law providing for the appropriaton of a grave without compensation found not to amount to an arbitrary deprivation of property). The case illustrates that where the property right affected forms a small part only of the claimant's overall estate, the non-payment of compensation may survive the test for arbitrariness.

none is provided) or more compensation or better structured compensation (where the essence of the complaint is that the amount, time and manner of the compensation is not just and equitable). Where, as in FNB, the purpose of the challenge is to have the law struck down, a finding that the law provides for the arbitrary deprivation of property is as good as (from the claimant's perspective) a finding that the law provides for expropriation and fails to meet the two additional requirements set by s 25(2).

The two leading South African decisions on the distinction between expropriation and other forms of deprivation of property are those in Harksen v Lane NO[1] and Steinberg v South Peninsula Municipality.[2] In Harksen, the Constitutional Court was asked to declare s 21(1) of the Insolvency Act[3] unconstitutional in terms of s 28(3) of the Interim Constitution, which guaranteed the payment of compensation for any expropriation of property. Section 21(1) of the Insolvency Act provides that:

> The additional effect of the sequestration of the separate estate of one or two spouses who are not living apart under a judicial order of separation shall be to vest in the Master, until a trustee has been appointed, and, upon the appointment of a trustee, to vest in him all the property ... of the spouse whose estate has not been sequestrated ... as if it were the property of the sequestrated estate, and to empower the Master or trustee to deal with such property accordingly. ...

Writing for the majority, Goldstone J assumed in favour of the appellant, without deciding, that the effect of this provision is that, on sequestration of an insolvent spouse's estate, 'full ownership in the solvent spouse's property did in fact pass to the trustee of the insolvent estate'.[4] Even if this assumption were correct, Goldstone J held, the appellant's property had not been expropriated. In South Africa, expropriation was generally understood to be 'the process whereby a public authority takes property (usually immovable) for a public purpose and usually against payment of compensation.'[5] Before a law could be said to provide for expropriation, it must be clear that the legislature intended that the public authority should permanently acquire the affected party's property for a public purpose.[6] Section 21(1) of the Insolvency Act did not provide for expropriation in this sense. Rather, it provided for the temporary divestment of the appellant's property, subject to proof of ownership.[7]

[1] 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 CC.
[2] 2001 (4) SA 1243 (SCA).
[3] Act 24 of 1936.
[4] Harksen v Lane NO (supra) at para 31.
[5] Ibid at para 32.
[6] Ibid at para 37.
[7] Ibid.

This decision has been criticised for laying down an inflexible rule that the temporary compulsory acquisition of property by the state can never amount to expropriation.[1] In the US Supreme Court's takings jurisprudence, by contrast, greater emphasis is placed on the economic impact of a law, and whether it is fair to expect the complainant to bear the burden of such impact without compensation.[2] On such an approach, the duration of the expropriation is not necessarily decisive.

Nevertheless, the general approach to the distinction between expropriations and other forms of deprivation in Harksen is likely to be followed in future cases. In short, a law may be said to provide for expropriation where, in addition to whatever other impact the law may have on the claimant's property, an organ of state acquires the property. To this must be added the important qualification that the effect of an expropriation may also be to transfer the property from the claimant to a third party, other than an organ of state, where the benefit thereby extended serves a 'public purpose' or is otherwise 'in the public interest'.[3]

In Steinberg v South Peninsula Municipality — a Supreme Court of Appeal decision handed down after Harksen — the appellant sought an order 'directing the respondent to take all steps necessary "to complete the expropriation process implemented in respect of", or, alternatively, to expropriate, certain immovable property of which she [was] the owner'.[4] The appellant had purchased a residential house that was affected by a road scheme. The scheme had been declared some twenty-five years prior to the purchase. But it had never been implemented. The appellant knew about the scheme when purchasing the house, but claimed that the respondent's continuing failure to implement it amounted to the 'constructive expropriation' of her property.[5] In the course of argument, direct reliance was placed on various decisions of the US Supreme Court in which that Court has elaborated its 'inverse condemnation' or 'regulatory takings' doctrine. In terms of this doctrine, a regulation that goes 'too far'[6] may in certain circumstances be regarded as an expropriation of property.[7]

---

[1] See AJ van der Walt & Henk Botha 'Coming to Grips with the New Constitutional Order: Critical Comments on Harksen v Lane NO' (1998) 13 SAPL 17 and Theunis Roux 'Constitutional Protection of Property and Land Reform' Annual Survey of South African Law 1997 332, 333-4.

[2] See, for example, Armstrong v United States 364 US 40 (1960); Penn Central Transportation Co v City of New York 438 US 104 (1978); and Frank I Michelman 'Property, Utility and Fairness: Comments on the Ethical Foundations of "Just Compensation" Law' (1967) 80 Harvard LR 1165.

[3] See Nhlabati v Fick (supra) at para 32 (law authorising appropriation of grave on landlord's property by farmworker tenant assumed to be a 'de facto expropriation of a servitude over the land concerned').

[4] Steinberg (supra) at para 1.

[5] Ibid.

[6] See Pennsylvania Coal Co v Mahon 260 US 392 415-16 (1922); Penn Central Transportation Co v City of New York (supra).

[7] See further Mugler v Kansas 123 US 623 (1887); Pumpelly v Green Bay and Mississippi Canal Co 80 US (13 Wall) 166 (1871); Goldblatt v Town of Hempstead 369 US 590 (1962); Penn Central Transportation Co v City of New York 438 US 104 (1978); Loretto v Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp 458 US 419 (1982); Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v De Benedictis 480 US 470 (1987); Nollan v California Coastal Commission 483 US 825 (1987).

The significance of the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in response to this argument is not so much the rule laid down — that 'advance notification of a possible intention' on the part of the state to expropriate the complainant's property does not in itself amount to expropriation[1] — but the Court's obiter remark that > there may be room for the development of a doctrine akin to constructive expropriation in South Africa — particularly where a public body utilizes a regulatory power in a manner which, taken in isolation, can be categorized as a deprivation of property rights and not an expropriation, but which has the effect, albeit indirectly, of transferring those rights to the public body.

Although the Court went on to hold that it was not necessary to decide whether 'a doctrine of constructive expropriation can or should be developed in South Africa',[2] this remark is interesting for what it reveals about the Supreme Court of Appeal's preparedness, even after the Constitutional Court's decision in Harksen, to countenance a more complex conception of the distinction between expropriations and other forms of deprivation. Steinberg also raises the pertinent question of whether, after the decision in FNB, South African constitutional property law can be said to have moved closer towards, or further away from, what is sometimes ominously referred to as the 'spectre' of the US Supreme Court's regulatory takings jurisprudence.

For the reasons given in the introduction to this section, FNB has minimised rather than increased the likelihood that something akin to the US Supreme Court's regulatory takings doctrine will be adopted in South Africa.[3] The essential function performed by this doctrine in US takings law is to ensure that a law that has an adverse economic impact on the constitutional claimant should be treated as providing for expropriation where to do otherwise would be to impose a disproportionate burden on the claimant. After FNB, however, such a law is likely to be found to provide for the arbitrary deprivation of property, and would therefore be struck down as a violation of s 25(1), rendering the question whether it also provides for the constructive expropriation of property redundant.

[1] Steinberg (supra) at para 12.

[2] Ibid at para 9.

[3] For a (conceptually confused) contrary view, see Kevin Hopkins & Kate Hofmeyr 'New Perspectives on Property' (2003) 120 SALJ 48, 57-8. The flaw underlying the authors' argument in these pages is the assertion that the test for arbitrariness may produce a finding that the law under challenge provides for the expropriation of property. This is incorrect. The test for arbitrariness may produce at most a finding that the law provides for the arbitrary deprivation of property. Such a finding will terminate the constitutional inquiry, subject to the notional application of s 36. The question whether the law effects a regulatory taking or constructive expropriation of property is a separate question, which is less likely to arise after FNB because laws that are amenable to this type of interpretation will tend to be struck down as arbitrary deprivations of property rather than uncompensated expropriations.

46.8 Does The Expropriation Comply With Sections 25(2) and (3)?

A law that is found to provide for the expropriation of property must, in addition to the three requirements set by s 25(1), satisfy two further requirements. First, it must have been enacted 'for a public purpose or in the public interest'.[1] Second, it must provide for the payment of compensation: the amount, time and manner of payment of which must have been agreed or 'decided or approved by a court'.[2]

(a) 'For a public purpose or in the public interest'

Since all expropriations are to be treated as deprivations, and subjected first to the standard set by s 25(1), it is highly unlikely that a law that provides for the expropriation of property contrary to s 25(2)(a) will in fact be tested against this requirement. Logically, a law that does not serve a public purpose and is not in the public interest is unlikely to provide 'sufficient reason' for any deprivation of property it may authorise, and is therefore unlikely to pass the FNB test for arbitrariness. Conversely, laws that do pass that test are unlikely to be set aside under s 25(2)(a) because of the very broad power given to the state by this paragraph to expropriate property for a public purpose or in the public interest. It is difficult to conceive of a court finding that a law that did not permit the arbitrary deprivation of property was not enacted for a public purpose or in the public interest. The typical example of a law that would fall foul of s 25(2)(a) is a law enacted in pursuit of the interests of a single individual. But such a law would invariably be found to permit the arbitrary deprivation of property, and would thus be struck down before s 25(2)(a) was applied.

The fact that a law permits the expropriation of property for the purposes of transferring it to a third party (rather than the state) would not give rise to a finding of unconstitutionality under s 25(2)(a), provided that the overall purpose of the law was to promote the public interest. For example, Chapter III of the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act[3] provides for the judicial expropriation and transfer of property from one private individual to another. The state at no point acquires the property thus expropriated. The entire scheme of expropriation provided for in the Act, however, is clearly in the public interest, and therefore not unconstitutional. In case there were any doubt about this, s 25(4)(a) of the Constitution expressly provides that 'the public interest includes the nation's commitment to land reform, and to reforms to bring about equitable access to all South Africa's natural resources'.

[1] Section 25(2)(a).
[2] Section 25(2)(b).
[3] Act 3 of 1996.

(b) Just and equitable compensation

The second requirement imposed by s 25(2) is that a law that authorises the expropriation of property must provide for the payment of compensation. Barring an agreement between the state and the party affected, the amount and the time and manner of payment of compensation must be determined by a court of law. Section 25(3) provides that all three aspects of the compensation scheme must be 'just and equitable, reflecting an equitable balance between the public interest and the interests of those affected'. In assessing this requirement, the court is enjoined by s 25(3) to have 'regard to all relevant circumstances'. A non-exhaustive list of circumstances is thereafter provided as follows:

(a) the current use of the property;
(b) the history of the acquisition and use of the property;
(c) the market value of the property;
(d) the extent of direct state investment and subsidy in the acquisition and beneficial improvement of the property; and
(e) the purpose of the expropriation.

(i) A just and equitable amount of compensation

Ordinarily, a reference to just and equitable compensation in a constitution means market value compensation.[1] However, by identifying as issues relevant to the amount of compensation the extent of state investment and subsidy in the acquisition and improvement of the property,[2] the use to which the property is being put, and the history of its acquisition, the Constitutional Assembly clearly contemplated that compensation at less than market value could be awarded in appropriate cases under s 25(3). The Constitutional Court has not as yet been asked to consider this question. In Khumalo v Potgieter,[3] however, the Land Claims Court had occasion to interpret the constitutional compensation standard as incorporated in s 23(1) of the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act.[4] The Court held that just and equitable compensation should be assessed in two stages. First, the court must determine the market value of the property by using accepted valuation methods and principles, including the comparable sales method (where appropriate) and the so-called Pointe Gourde principle, which requires the court to disregard the effect of the scheme of expropriation on the value of the property.[5] After arriving at the market value, the court must next 'consider to what

[1] See A Eisenberg 'Different Formulations of Compensation Clauses' (1993) 9 SAJHR 412; G Erasmus (ed) Compensation for Expropriation: A Comparative Study Vol 2 (1990).
[2] Section 25(3)(d).
[3] [2000] 2 All SA 456 (LCC) ('Khumalo II'). For the background to this case, see the Court's earlier judgment in Khumalo v Potgieter [2000] 1 All SA 24 (LCC).
[4] Supra. Section 23(1) provides that '[t]he owner of affected land or any other person whose rights are affected shall be entitled to just and equitable compensation as prescribed by the Constitution for the acquisition by the applicant of land or a right in land'.
[5] Khumalo II (supra) at paras 23-6.

extent the market value . . . must be adjusted according to the dictates of the other factors referred to in paragraphs (a), (b), (d) and (e) of section 25(3).'[1]

Given the range of factors in s 25(3), some of which are quantitative and others qualitative, it is hard to think how else the task of determining just and equitable compensation could have been approached. By definition, disputes about the quantum of compensation are disputes about rands and cents. Some method therefore has to be found of translating the rather vague criteria in s 25(3) into terms that are readily quantifiable. The method suggested by the Land Claims Court, of first determining the market value of the property according to accepted methods, and thereafter adjusting this value upwards or downwards according to the Court's sense of the equities of the matter, is a commonsense approach that should ultimately be endorsed by the Constitutional Court.

(ii) Payment of compensation in a just and equitable manner

Section 25(2) and (3) require that the manner of payment of compensation must also be just and equitable, reflecting 'an equitable balance between the public interest and the interests of those affected'. It is possible that a law could pass constitutional muster even though it provided for compensation in a form other than cash (for example, government bonds). The test would be whether the private interest in cash compensation was outweighed by the public interest in paying compensation in that other form. Even if that were the case, the overall manner of payment of compensation would have to be 'just and equitable' on the basis of the factors listed in s 25(3).

(iii) Payment of compensation within a just and equitable time

Like the amount and manner of payment of compensation, the time within which compensation is paid must be just and equitable. Ordinarily, prompt payment of compensation would have to follow an expropriation.[2] Sections 25(2) and (3) do, however, leave open the possibility of delayed compensation in circumstances where this is just and equitable. The presence or absence of such circumstances would have to be assessed by the court, taking into account the same factors that are relevant to the quantification of just and equitable compensation. For example, the use to which property was being put could be relevant to the time within

[1] Khumalo II (supra) at para 93. See also Ex parte Former Highland Residents; In re: Ash v Department of Land Affairs [2000] 2 All SA 26 (LCC) at paras 25-38 (applying the same method in assessing just and equitable compensation for the purposes of s 2(2) of the Restitution Act). This decision was cited with approval in Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2003 (1) SA 586 (C) at para 23.

[2] Erasmus (ed) Compensation for Expropriation: A Comparative Study (supra).

which it was just and equitable that compensation be paid. If an owner were not using a particular property and did not intend to derive any material benefit from it in the immediate future, it might be just and equitable to delay the payment of compensation.

46.9 Is The Expropriation Justified Under Section 36?

Given the algorithmic[1] structure of the constitutional property clause inquiry as set out in FNB, the final stage of the inquiry will be reached in exceptional cases only.[2] A law that provides for the expropriation of property will first be tested against s 25(1), in which case s 36 will be applied in the first instance to justify an infringement of this provision. Only laws that are found not to violate s 25(1), or which are saved by s 36, are in principle subject to the discipline of s 25(2) and (3), and only then if they are found to provide for expropriation. This means that the final stage of the constitutional property clause inquiry applies in theory to laws of general application that do not provide for the (unjustifiable) arbitrary deprivation of property, but which are found to authorise the expropriation of property other than for a public purpose or in the public interest, and/or which fail to provide for the payment of just and equitable compensation. Very few such laws will survive constitutional scrutiny until the final stage. For the aforementioned reasons,[3] a law providing for the expropriation of property that is not aimed at achieving a public purpose or is not in the public interest will in all likelihood fail the arbitrariness test mandated by s 25(1). In the unlikely event that it survives constitutional scrutiny to the penultimate stage, it will be struck down for violating s 25(2)(a). Thereafter, the state would be faced with the conceptually impossible task of having to justify, as being reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society, a law that, ex hypothesi, was enacted in pursuit of a non-public, private interest.[4] Similarly, a law that fails to provide for just and [1] See De Waal et al The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, forthcoming, 2004) (supra) and the discussion at § 46.1 supra.

[2] Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) (s 36 applied to justify appropriation of grave without compensation in terms of s 6(2)(*d*A) of the Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997).

[3] See § 46.7 supra.

[4] Cf Hopkins & Hofmeyr 'New Perspectives on Property' (supra) at 61-2. In support of their argument that s 36 may have meaningful application, the authors of this article posit the example of a law providing for compulsory community service for plastic surgeons in order to provide medical assistance to motor vehicle accident victims. Such a law would impose a disproportionate burden on plastic surgeons and would consequently be struck down at the s 25(1) stage. The question whether it served a public purpose or was in the public interest as required by s 25(2) would never arise. If the court made a mistake, and found that the law did not violate s 25(1), it would have to make two further mistakes before s 36 could have meaningful application. First, it would have to find that that such a law was not in the public interest, and, second, it would have to find that a law that was not in the public interest was reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society. To say, as these authors do, that, '[f]or as long as there are arguments available to both sides, there is a possibility that the court may find for the applicants' is equivalent to saying that a wrong argument may be right because courts sometimes make mistakes. Ibid at 61.

equitable compensation will only be reasonable and justifiable under s 36 where the adverse impact of the law is minimal in relation to the object sought to be achieved.[1]

46.10 LAND RIGHTS

Subsections (5), (6), (7) and (9) of s 25 confer certain rights to land. These rights are discussed in a separate chapter.[2]

[1] See Nhlabathi v Fick (supra) at para 35. In this case the Land Claims Court, applying s 36 after a finding that s 25(2) had been violated, upheld a law that granted a farmworker tenant the right to bury a relative on land belonging to someone else. The impugned provision was found to be justified, inter alia, because 'the right [expropriated did] not constitute a major intrusion into the property rights of the landowner.' Ibid.

[2] See Andra Eisenberg 'Land' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Ch 40; Dennis Davis & Julia Kupka 'Land' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, forthcoming, 2004) Ch 46.

47 Children's Rights

Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton

47.1 Introduction 47–1
47.2 Name and nationality 47–3
(a) The right to a name 47–3
(b) The right to a nationality 47–3
47.3 Family care or parental care, or appropriate alternative care 47–5
(a) The meaning of 'family or parent' 47–5
(b) The purposes of FC s 28(1)(b) 47–8
47.4 Basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care and social services 47–9
(a) Shelter defined 47–9
(b) Progressive realisation 47–12
(c) The interaction between FC s 28(1)(b) and FC s 28(1)(c) . 47–14
(d) The State of the law 47–17
(e) Socio-economic rights of children living separately from their parents 47–17
47.5 Protection from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation 47–18
(a) Corporal punishment 47–18
(b) Christian Education and corporal punishment in schools 47–20
(c) Legislative development 47–24
(d) Child pornography 47–26
47.6 Child labour 47–28
47.7 Children and the Justice System 47–29
(a) Imprisonment as a last resort 47–29
(b) Law reform 47–34
47.8 Legal representation in civil proceedings 47–36
47.9 Children and armed conflict 47–39
47.10 The best interests of the child 47–40
(a) Introduction 47–40
(b) The operation of FC s 28(2) 47–40
(c) Paramountcy v limitation 47–43

47.11 The age of a 'child' 47–46
(a) The beginning of a 'child' 47–46
(b) The end of a 'child' 47–47

47.1 INTRODUCTION[1]

Three observations are worth making at the outset because they drive so much of the analysis that follows. First, the provisions of FC s 28 — the primary source of children's rights — are derived from a number of international instruments. The foundational text is the Convention on the Rights of the Child ('CRC'). The CRC was ratified by South Africa in June 1995. The African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child ('ACRWC'), a regional instrument that was ratified by South Africa in January 2000, also informs the interpretation of FC s 28.[2]

Second, although it is the primary focus of this chapter, FC s 28 is not the only section that confers constitutional rights on children.[3] Several cases illustrate this point.[4] In Petersen v Maintenance Officer & Others[5] the High Court considered the common-law rule that did not allow an extra-marital child to claim maintenance from the paternal grandparents (but did allow claims from the maternal grandparents) whilst children born within a marriage could claim from either set of grandparents. The court found discrimination on the ground of birth (in contravention of FC s 9(3)) a violation of the child's dignity (protected by FC s 10), as well as an infringement of the child's best interests in terms of FC s 28(2). The High

[1] For general discussions of FC s 28 or its predecessor, s 30 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'), see A Cockrell 'The Law of Persons and the Bill of Rights' in Bill of Rights Compendium (Service Issue 13, October 2003) paras 3E9-12; J Sloth-Nielsen 'Children' in D Davis & H Cheadle (eds) The South African Constitution: The Bill of Rights (2nd Edition, 2006) 421; A Skelton & P Proudlock 'Interpretation, Objects, Application and Implementation of the Children's Act' in CJ Davel & AM Skelton (eds) Commentary on the Children's Act (OS, 2007) 1-8 — 1-10.

[2] Although the ACRWC bears striking similarity to the CRC, it contains small but important differences. See, for example, S v M (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae) 2008 (3) SA 232 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 539 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1312 (CC)('S v M') at para 31 (the Court identifies a specific provision relating to the importance of avoiding imprisonment of mothers, which appears in article 30(1) of the ACRWC, but does not have a counterpart in the CRC). See, further, B Mezmur 'The African Children's Charter versus the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child: A Zero-Sum Game?' (2008) SAPR/PL 1.

[3] See B Bekink & D Brand 'Constitutional Protection of Children' in CJ Davel (ed) Introduction to Child Law in South Africa (2000) 177-181; J M Kruger 'The Protection of Children's Rights in the South African Constitution: Reflections on the First Decade' (2007) 70 THRHR 239, 241-245.

[4] See, for example, Bhe & Others v Magistrate Khayelitsha & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi & Sithole and Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at paras 95 and 53 (The Court found that the principle of male primogeniture discriminated unfairly against children on the grounds of sex and of birth by preventing them from inheriting the deceased estate of their father. The law also infringed the children's right to dignity. The case also demonstrates the importance of the international instruments: Langa DCJ remarked that the importance of not discriminating against children on the grounds of sex is acknowledged in the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child. Actually this recognition is included in the preambles of both the African Charter and the UN Convention; Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 78 (The applicants were permanent residents who sought grants provided for under the Social Assistance Act for their children who had been born in South Africa. The Court found the impugned provisions to be unconstitutional, as refusing the child support grant or care dependency grant would amount to discrimination against the children on the basis of their parents nationality.) For a detailed discussion, see L Janse van Rensburg 'The Khosa Case — Opening the Door for the Inclusion of all Children in the Child Support Grant?' (2005) 20 SAPR/PL 102.)

[5] 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C), [2004] All SA 117 (C)('Petersen').

Court accordingly developed the common law to allow the extra-marital child's claim against the paternal grandparents. Similarly, in Christian Lawyers South Africa v Minister of Health & Others (Reproductive Health Alliance as Amicus Curiae) the court was concerned with the constitutionality of a law that permitted girls below the age of 18 years to choose whether to terminate their pregnancies — provided that they possessed the intellectual and emotional capacity to grant informed consent.[1] The court rejected the challenge on the grounds that FC ss 12(2)(a) and (b),[2] 27(1)(a),[3] 10[4] and 14[5] apply to 'everyone', including girls under the age of 18 years, and that FC s 9(3) prohibits discrimination on the basis of age. Although this chapter focuses on the rights that are unique to children, it should always be kept in mind that children are protected by most of the rights in FC Chapter 2.

Third, children's rights can be broadly categorised as rights of protection and rights of autonomy. Childhood is a process of development. This gradual process of increasing capacity married to a balanced theory of children's rights should witness the courts' use of a combination of rights to protect their self-determination.[6] FC s 28(1) encompasses rights that are predominantly protective in nature,[7] whilst FC s 28(2) is flexible enough to include rights to autonomy. MEC for Education, KwaZulu Natal v Pillay indicates the willingness of courts to accept children's rights to autonomy, particularly for adolescent children.[8] The Pillay Court found that the wearing of a nose stud by a 16 year old girl, Sunali, was an expression of

[1] 2005 (1) SA 509 (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086 (T)('Christian Lawyers (2004)').

[2] FC s 12(2)(a) and (b) read: 'Everybody has the right to bodily and psychological integrity, which includes the right — (a) to make decisions concerning reproduction; (b) to security in and control over their body.'

[3] FC s 27(1)(a) reads: 'Everyone has the right to have access to — (a) health care services, including reproductive health care'.

[4] FC s 10 reads: 'Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.'

[5] FC s 14 reads in relevant part: 'Everyone has the right to privacy'.

[6] S Human 'The Theory of Children's Rights' in CJ Davel (ed) Introduction to Child Law (2000) 164. See further JM Kruger 'The Philosophical Underpinnings of Children's Rights Theory' (2006) 69 THRHR 436 (The author makes the point that childhood is a process of continuous change which takes place as the child matures. Ibid at 450-451. Children have rights that need to be protected long before they have the capacity to exercise their rights to autonomy. In the author's view a 'Gillick-competency test' — as devised in the English House of Lords case of Gillick v West Norfolk & Wisbech Area Health Authority & the DHSS [1985] 3 All ER 403 — is the most appropriate answer to what the acceptable limits of self-determination are.)

[7] FC s 28(1)(h) provides a right for children to be legally represented in civil matters is something of an exception, because although it has been used by the courts as a protective measure in the appointment of curators ad litem (Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare & Population Development & Others (Lesbian & Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC); S v M (supra); AD & Another v DW & Others (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae; Department for Social Development as Intervening Party) 2008 (3) SA 183 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 359 (CC)('AD v DW') it has also been interpreted as giving children rights to autonomy (Soller NO v G & Another 2003 (5) SA 430 (W)('Soller NO'); Ex Parte Van Niekerk & Another : In re Van Niekerk v Van Niekerk (Unreported, Transvaal High Court Case Number 34054/03, 20880/02, 13 July 2004) ('Ex Parte Van Niekerk'). This issue will be discussed later in the chapter.

[8] 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay'). See also Antonie v Governing Body, Settlers High School & Others 2002 (4) SA 738 (C)('Antonie')(A Rastafarian 15 year old girl brought an application in her own name to challenge the school governing body's decision to find her guilty of serious misconduct for wearing her hair in dreadlocks which she covered with a cap. The Cape High Court set aside the decision of the school governing body, finding that it had not given adequate recognition to the principles of the Constitution, including the child's rights to freedom of expression.)

her Hindu culture and religion, that the girl sincerely identified with the practice and that the practice could be reasonably accommodated by the school granting an exemption to its code of conduct. The Constitutional Court further remarked that children of Sunali's age should increasingly be taking responsibility for their own actions and beliefs.[1] This conception of autonomy animated Christian Lawyers (2004). In Christian Lawyers (2004) the High Court found that the Termination of Pregnancy Act,[2] which was based on capacity for informed consent rather than on a specific age, promoted the best interests of the child because it was flexible and was able to accommodate the individual position of a girl based on her intellectual, psychological and emotional maturity.[3]

47.2 Name and Nationality

(a) The right to a name

The right to a name is primarily enforceable against the state. It imposes a duty on the state to recognise and to register the child's name at birth.[4] Theoretically, the right could be enforced against parents who either fail to name their children or to take the necessary steps to facilitate recognition and registration. In Hadebe v Minister of Home Affairs, the mother of a child applied to court for an order directing the respondent to amend the details of her child's birth certificate after repeated attempts over 18 months had failed to get the department's officials to make the amendment.[5] The High Court agreed:

> [i]t is clear that if a child has, as is provided for in section 28 (1)(a) of the Constitution 'the right to a name from birth', the official of the state who is charged with doing those things that enable his or her name to be recorded must have a correlative duty to facilitate the registration of that name in the records of the state: certainly it is no part of the function of that official to place technical difficulties in the way of such registration.[6]

(b) The right to a nationality

In order to understand the right of a child to a nationality, it is important to distinguish between nationality and citizenship. The concept of 'citizenship' concerns the rights and the obligations of citizens and the state. Its effect is internal.[7]

[1] Pillay (supra) at para 56.
[2] Act 92 of 1996.
[3] Christian Lawyers (2004) (supra) at 528 H. See also H Kruger 'Traces of Gillick in South African Jurisprudence: Two Variations on a Theme' (2005) 46(1) Codicillus 1.
[4] See Marckx v Belgium 2 EHRR 330 (1980) (Sets out the position in the European Union.)
[5] (Unreported Durban and Coast Local Division Case Number 15715/05, 14 December 2006).
[6] Ibid.
[7] See R Keightley 'The Child's Right to a Nationality and the Acquisition of Citizenship in South African Law' (1998) 14 SAJHR 411, 412-3; J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Edition, 2000) 209. See also Kuanda v President of the RSA 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 240 (O'Reagan J, dissenting).

'Nationality' concerns the connection between the state and the individual in the international arena.[1] The effect of such 'diplomatic protection' is external.[2]

There is no existing South African authority on the correct reading of FC s 28(1)(a). There are two possible interpretations of the section.

First, the concepts of 'nationality' and 'citizenship' could be indistinguishable. The provisions of the South African Citizenship Act 88 of 1995 would then help illuminate the meaning of this subsection. If nationality means citizenship, then the Citizenship Act would be one useful source for determining the scope of the right. This is so because the Final Constitution provides that an Act of Parliament must provide for the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship.[3] The Final Constitution therefore anticipates that the details of the right to citizenship may be provided in legislation. If citizenship and nationality is the same thing, the details provided by the Citizenship Act would apply equally to the right to nationality.

This reading is strained at best. The distinction between nationality and citizenship is such an integral part of — and has such a clear meaning in — international law that South African jurisprudence would be ill-served if the two concepts were collapsed. Moreover, FC s 39(1)(b) enjoins the courts to consider international law when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

The better reading is one in which the concept of nationality is kept distinct from the concept of citizenship. On such a reading, FC s 28(1)(a) grants a right to nationality only. Because FC s 28 applies to all children inside South Africa, regardless of where they were born, the section simply guarantees that children resident in South Africa cannot be rendered stateless.[4]

One caveat is in order with regard to this preferred reading. A decision of a South African court on the question of foreign nationality is a legal fiction.[5] No foreign court is bound by the pronouncement of our courts on the question of the nationality of foreigners. Therefore, there seems little that the South African courts or the state could do to promote this right in respect of nationals of other countries. This problem is compounded by the fact that, for the purpose of diplomatic protection, nationality is an objective concept. Each state must determine which people are its nationals.[6] A national is considered an extension of the state itself. As such, a person is either objectively a national or not for the purpose of diplomatic protection.[7] So while any state can declare a person to be its national, such a declaration would have no practical effect if the person did not satisfy the objective test for nationality. The status of being a national in international law has no relevance other than in the context of diplomatic protection.

It would therefore not be entirely useless for the section to be interpreted in such a way as to compel the South African state to grant nationality to stateless

[1] See Dugard (supra) at 208.

[2] An injury to a national of a state is considered an indirect injury to the state itself, incurring state responsibility by the injuring state to the injured state. See Dugard (supra) at 298.

[3] FC s 3(3).

[4] See Keightley (supra) at 424.

[5] Ibid at 421.

[6] Article 1 of the Hague Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 1930.

[7] Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v Guatemala) 2nd Phase 22 ILR 349, 359 (1955)('Nottebohm').

children within its borders. However, such children should satisfy the international law standard to qualify as South African nationals.[1]

47.3 Family Care or Parental Care, or Appropriate Alternative Care[2]

(a) The meaning of 'family or parent'

Section 30(1)(b) of the Interim Constitution guaranteed the right of every child 'to parental care' simpliciter. FC s 28(1)(b) is expressly more extensive. Parental care has been interpreted in the case law to refer not only to natural parents, but also to adoptive parents, foster parents and step-parents.[3]

The court in SW v F held that the right to parental care was not a bar to adoption 'where the care of the natural parents was lacking or inadequate'.[4] In Heystek v Heystek the court ordered a husband to pay maintenance pendente lite to his wife that would include the maintenance of her children — his stepchildren — even though he did not have a duty under the common law or statute to support the children.[5] The court did not need to rely on the Final Constitution as it did to reach its decision. The parties were married in community of property and so the wife's debts were also the husband's debts. The court's second, constitutional, basis for its decision was that the constitutionalisation of the best interests of the child standard in FC s 28(2) required a broad reading of parental care. The exact rationale for this conclusion is unclear. The court does not say whether the section imposes a direct duty on step-parents to support stepchildren because they are parents of a particular 'Kind' or because this 'legal' relationship would be in children's best interests.

Though such a gloss on the court's holding may be a matter for debate, we should be inclined to interpret parental and family care in the light of the functions that parents and family perform and to recognise the many types of family that actually exist in South Africa. The courts have generally followed this line of argument. In Jooste v Botha, 'family' in FC s 28(1)(b) was said to include the extended family.[6] In J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs, & Others,[7] the court a quo interpreted the children's right to family and parental care (jointly) as demanding that the first applicant, as their genetic mother, be recognised by the law as their parent where the children had been born to her lesbian partner,

[1] International law requires a 'real and effective link' between the national and the state invoking diplomatic protection. Nottebohm (supra) at 360.

[2] The most useful foreign jurisprudence here is the interpretation of art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights (1950). Article 8 protects the right of everyone to respect for their family life.

[3] See SW v F 1997 (1) SA 796 (O), 802F-H; Heystek v Heystek 2002 (2) SA 754 (T), 757C-D, [2002] 2 All SA 401 (T) ('Heystek'); Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 18.

[4] SW v F (supra) at 799B-C.

[5] Heystek (supra) at 757C-D.

[6] 2000 (2) SA 199 (T), 208D-E, 2000 (2) BCLR 187 (T) ('Jooste').

[7] 2003 (5) SA 605 (D) at para 22 ('J & Another').

the second applicant, as result of artificial insemination, using the oocytes of the first applicant and the sperm of an anonymous male donor. In terms of s 5 of the Children's Status Act,[1] the second applicant alone was the legal parent. The court proceeded to read in to s 5 those terms that would afford the first applicant appropriate recognition and relied on various grounds of discrimination in terms of the equality provision in granting this relief.[2] In V v V, the court rejected an argument that a mother's lesbianism should exclude her from securing the custody of her children by, in part, relying on FC s 28(1)(b).[3] The court refused to see her sexual orientation as something that would interfere with her status as parent or a part of a family.

In Jooste v Botha, the three kinds of care in FC s 28(1)(b) were defined rigidly: (a) family care is where the child is part of a family, whether nuclear or extended; (b) parental care is where there is no family and only a single parent; (c) alternative care is where the child is removed from the family environment.[4] The court must be incorrect in claiming that a single-parent household is not a family or that two parents provide family care and not parental care. Of greater moment is that the Jooste court found the common denominator for the three types of care to be the child's right to be in the care of a custodian. This interpretation construes FC s 28(1)(b) far too narrowly. A grandparent is a member of the extended family who may not have custody and yet still have the duty to support the child.[5] A non-custodial parent, such as a parent who loses custody upon divorce, remains a parent with parental duties. The Allsop v McCann court extended the definition of parental and family care a step further when it found that the constitutional duty of a non-custodial parent to provide parental care to his legitimate child under FC s 28(1)(b) was said to include the provision of religious instruction.[6]

The facts of Jooste make the flaws in the definitions it proffers that much more obvious. In Jooste, an 11-year-old boy born out of wedlock sued his father for delictual damages for injuria and emotional distress based on his father's failure to acknowledge him and to love him. (No claim for maintenance or support was made in the instant case.) One of the legal foundations for the claim was the right to parental care in the Final Constitution. The court held that since a parent must be a custodian, the child's non-custodian parent fell outside the ambit of the

[1] Act 82 of 1987.

[2] The Constitutional Court also amended s 5 to make it constitutionally compliant, but did not rely on s 28(1)(b) of the Constitution to reach its conclusion. See J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs, & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC).

[3] 1998 (4) SA 169 (C), 190B-C.

[4] Jooste (supra) at 208D-G.

[5] But note that in Petersen the court did not use the right to family care to found a duty on paternal grandparents to support their extra-marital grandchild (the court did not consider the applicability of this right). The High Court relied on the rights to equality, dignity and consideration of the child's best interests.

[6] 2001 (2) SA 706, 713F-H (C).

provision.[1] But surely the child's right to maintenance by his father is a right to parental care? The object lesson of Jooste is that the best way to define family or parental care is not in terms of a narrow set of criteria, but in terms of generous and flexible standards. Different parents or family members may owe different degrees of care to a child. The child has the right to the care of, and to contact with, both parents. This general norm can create serious difficulties where the parents do not live together, particularly where they have re-married and new families have been formed. Such difficulties are on display in B v M.[2] The appellant, the custodian mother of two children from her first marriage, had been prevented by the High Court from relocating from Johannesburg to Cape Town with her second husband because the court had found that it would not be in the interests of the children to be separated from their father: the respondent. The appellant was therefore required to live apart from her new husband, and their baby was consequently separated from his own father. The court found that it was not in the interests of any of the children to be forced into this kind of separation, ordered that the 'nucleur family' be permitted to relocate as a unit, and granted ancillary orders to ensure ongoing contact between the respondent and his children. Satchwell J expressly mentioned that the Final Constitution recognises a right to family or to parental care, and that our courts should be alert to preserve and to protect family units and not to initiate or allow actions or policies which could cause permanent dislocation.[3]

With regard to children and the extended family, the High Court held in Kleingeld v Heunis & Another[4] that a grandparent has locus standi to apply for contact with grandchildren, but has no inherent right to contact. A court may grant such contact where there are grounds indicating that it is in the best interests of the child. The court, citing B v S,[5] reiterated that it is the child who has an inherent right to contact with family members. As there was no evidence to show that such contact

[1] Jooste is authority for the proposition that the extra-marital child does not have a constitutional right to parental care by its father. The leading constitutional case on the issue of the relationship between the extra-marital child and its father is Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC). The Court found that s 18(4)(d) of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 to be unconstitutional because it required the mother's consent alone, and not the father's, to the adoption of the extra-marital child. The basis for this finding was the equality provision. The Court did not directly consider the children's rights section: but the best interests of the child clearly informed its thinking. In Jooste, the second reason that the Court held that the Final Constitution did not create the obligation claimed against the father was that the law will not attempt to enforce the impossible — love. Jooste (supra) at 209G-H.

[2] [2006] 3 All SA 172 (T); 2006 (9) BCLR 1034 (W).

[3] Ibid at para 170. See also F v F 2006 (3) SA 42 (SCA) [2006] 1 All SA 571 (SCA)('F v F')(The SCA dismissed an appeal by a custodian mother against a refusal of permission to relocate to England with her daughter. The Court stated that caution must be exercised that custodian parents should not be prevented from pursuing their lives and careers, especially as differential treatment between custodial and non-custodial parents may often result in gender discrimination. Nevertheless, on the facts of the case the court found that the relocation was not in the best interests of the child as it would separate her from her non-custodian father with whom she had a close relationship.)

[4] 2007 (5) SA 559 (T).

[5] 1995 (3) SSA 571 (A). See also Townsend-Turner & Another v Morrow 2004 (2) SA 32 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 235.

(which was objected to by the child's parents) would be in the best interests of the children, the court dismissed the application.

The Children's Act has codified the common law regarding parental authority. It has reconceptualised them as 'parental responsibilities and rights': (a) to care for the child; (b) to maintain contact with the child; (c) to act as guardian of the child; and (d) to contribute to the maintenance of the child.[1] These responsibilities and rights are acquired automatically and are shared by biological mothers and married fathers, whilst unmarried fathers only acquire such responsibilities automatically in certain specified circumstances.[2] Once such responsibilities and rights are acquired, they must be exercised in accordance with the best interests of the child.

(b) The purposes of FC s 28(1)(b)

FC 28(1)(b) has three purposes.

FC s 28(1)(b) is aimed at the preservation of a healthy parent-child relationship, and guards against intrusions of the family environment by unwarranted executive, administrative and legislative acts. To some extent it fulfils the purpose of a 'right to family life' which was excluded from the Final Constitution.[3] But it does so from a child-centred rather than a parent-centred perspective.[4] For example, the provision operated to protect the family from the state in Patel & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another.[5] The Patel court held that in deciding whether to deport the second applicant from South Africa in terms of the Aliens Control Act,[6] the right of his children to family or parental care had to be taken into account.

In S v M, the Constitutional Court found that FC s 28(1)(b) read with FC s 28(2) requires the law to make the best possible efforts to avoid, where possible, any breakdown of family life or parental care that may put children at risk.[7] The Court

[1] Act 38 of 2005 s 18(2). This section came into operation on 1 July 2007.

[2] Children's Act s 21. The section came into operation on 1 July 2007. The Children's Act also allows for parental responsibilities and rights to be shared with other persons by way of an agreement in terms of s 22.

[3] J Sloth-Nielsen asserts that the SA Constitution deliberately did not embrace a 'right to family life'. 'Children' in D Davis & H Cheadle (eds) The South African Constitution: The Bill of Rights (2nd Edition, 2006) 511. This failure was raised in Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC). The Court found that the absence of this right did not preclude certification because it allowed for flexibility in the recognition of different family forms in a diverse society. Despite the non-inclusion of the right to family life, such a right has been recognised in Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC); Booysen & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC).

[4] The courts have had a tendency to interpret the child's right to family or parental care in a parent-centred manner. See M Pieterse 'Reconstructing the Private/Public Dichotomy? The Enforcement of Children's Constitutional Social Rights and Care Entitlements' (2003) TSAR 1, 14-16; E Bonthuys & T Mosikatsana 'Law of Persons and Family Law' (2000) Annual Survey of SA Law 128, 152-153. See also B v S 1995 (3) SA 571 (A); T v M 1997 (1) SA 54 (A) and Jooste. However, a child-centred jurisprudence is evident in a number of cases. See Heystek v Heystek (supra); F v F (supra); and S v M (supra).

[5] 2000 (2) SA 343, 350E-F (D).

[6] Act 96 of 1991.

[7] S v M (supra) at para 20.

concluded that, when sentencing a primary-care giver, a sentencing court has a responsibility to consider the effect that imprisonment will have on the children's right to family and parental care. Justice Sachs wrote that the impact imprisonment would have on any dependent children's right to care required a sentencing court to give specific and well-informed attention to ensuring that, given the legitimate range of choices in the circumstances, it imposed the punishment least damaging to the interests of the children.[1]

Second, it requires that care of a certain quality be given to all children.

Third, it identifies the parties who must furnish such care. In the first place, the duty falls on parents and other family members. The state's responsibility in this regard is to ensure that there are legal obligations to compel parents (and family) to fulfil their responsibilities in relation to their children. Hence, legislation and the common law impose obligations upon parents to care for their children.[2]

In the absence of such care, such as where the child has been removed from the family, the state has a duty to provide appropriate care. What is the position where the child lives with its parents or family but they are too poor to provide the child with adequate care? A literal reading of FC s 28(1)(b) indicates that the child would not be entitled to state support in terms of its provisions. The Constitutional Court gave the section such an impoverished reading in Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom.[3] The Final Constitution cannot possibly contemplate that a child is entitled to adequate care when its family can provide it or when it is in the state's care, but not when the child is still with its family and the family is unable to provide proper care.[4]

47.4 Basic Nutrition, Shelter, Basic Health Care and Social Services

(a) Shelter defined

The Constitutional Court has been criticised for its failure to define the minimum core content of those socio-economic rights that have seized the court.[5] Instead of assessing the content of the right in question, the Court has simply asked whether the state had penned a 'reasonable' plan to realise a particular right.[6] A partial exception appears in that part of Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom that deals with children's rights. This aspect of the judgment turns on

[1] Ibid at para 33. See also S v Kika 1998 (2) SACR 428 (W); Howells v S [1999] 2 All SA 233 (C).

[2] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 75 ('Grootboom II'). See also Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as amicus curiae) 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 11 (CC) at para 24.

[3] Grootboom II (supra) at paras 76-7. See § 47.4 infra.

[4] For a similar criticism of Grootboom II, see M Pieterse 'Reconstructing the Private/Public Dichotomy? The Enforcement of Children's Constitutional Social Rights and Care Entitlements' (2003) TSAR 1. In any case, the state is committed to providing all needy children with child care grants.

[5] See D Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach to the Minimum Core: Laying the Foundations for Future Socio-economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 19 SAJHR 1.

[6] Ibid at 9-10.

the definition of shelter in s 28(1)(c). As a result, the Court could not avoid an analysis of the content of that part of the right.

The structure of FC s 28(1)(c) makes the act of defining 'shelter' less than straightforward. In terms of FC s 28(1)(c), every child has a right 'to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services'. The insertion of the word 'basic' before 'nutrition' and 'health care', but not before 'shelter', led to a significant difference of opinion between the court a quo[1] and the Constitutional Court on the meaning of the section.

Unlike FC s 26, which entrenches the right to housing, and FC s 27, which entrenches the rights to health care, food, water and social security, FC s 28(1)(c) does not give any indication in its text that the rights are limited by the resources available to the state. As a result, the prevailing view prior to Grootboom was that FC s 28(1)(c) could be used to raise the standard of living in many communities with greater alacrity than FC s 26 or s 27.[2] Indeed, the applicants in Grootboom made this very argument. In the Cape High Court, the applicants argued that the children in their community were entitled to basic shelter — something, concrete, even if less substantial than the right to housing in FC s 26. Moreover, since it was not in their interests to be separated from their parents, their parents should be accommodated as well.

The state argued that the ordinary definition of the word 'shelter' means a 'place of temporary lodging for the homeless poor'.[3] The 1996 amendment to the Child Care Act defines shelter as 'any building or premises maintained to used for the reception, protection and temporary care of more than six children in especially difficult circumstances'.[4] According to the state, FCs 28(1)(c) refers only to a 'place of safety' used to house children without parents or removed from their parents. It follows that no child has a right to be housed with her parents.[5]

Davis J, however, considered the reasoning of the state to apply more appropriately to FC s 28(1)(b). FC s 28(1)(b) contains the right to family care 'or to appropriate alternative care when removed from the family environment'. The definition of 'shelter' in the Child Care Act would seem therefore to apply to what is envisaged in FC s 28(1)(b). Concerning the ambit of FC s 28(1)(c), Davis J wrote:

> If a child's right to shelter in terms of s 28(1)(c) implies that the right exists only in terms of being housed in a state institution, then it would not necessarily offer a significantly different right to that provided for in terms of s 28(1)(b). Accordingly s 28(1)(c) appears to provide for a right to be protected from the elements in circumstances where there is no need to remove such children from their parents.[6]

The court reasoned that, notwithstanding the omission of the word 'basic' before 'shelter', the ordinary meaning of the word suggests that it offers something short

[1] Grootboom v Oostenburg Municipality 2000 (3) BCLR 277 (C) ('Grootboom I').

[2] P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights? Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 12 SAJHR 67, 87-8, 93; De Waal et al (supra) at 412; Cockrell (supra) at para 3E-13; E de Wet Constitutional Enforceability of Socio-Economic Rights (1996) 105-6.

[3] Grootboom I (supra) at 287E.

[4] Act 74 of 1983 (amended by Act 96 of 1996).

[5] Grootboom I (supra) at 287F.

[6] Ibid at 287H-288A.

of the adequate housing contemplated in FC s 26. In the event that parents are unable to provide 'shelter' for their children, FC s 28(1)(c) imposes an obligation on the state to do so.[1]

Without this understanding of the meaning of shelter, the court a quo could not have found as it did. If the omission of the word 'basic' implied that the child's right to shelter meant a right to adequate housing, then the state would be subject to immense budgetary pressure. No court could impose an unqualified obligation on the state to provide housing to children on demand. As a result, Davis J adopted the view that the 'shelter' contemplated by FC s 28(1)(c) must be rudimentary. In this respect, the reasoning of the court a quo in relation to shelter is consistent with the view that FC s 28(1)(c) is not subject to progressive realisation.

Yacoob J, writing for the Constitutional Court, adopted the opposite view on the meaning of shelter:

> I cannot accept that the Constitution draws any real distinction between housing on the one hand and shelter on the other, and that shelter is a rudimentary form of housing. Housing and shelter are related concepts and one of the aims of housing is to provide physical shelter. But shelter is not a commodity separate from housing. There is no doubt that all shelter represents protection from the elements and possibly even from danger. There are a range of ways in which shelter may be constituted: shelter may be ineffective or rudimentary at the one extreme and very effective and even ideal at the other. The concept of shelter in section 28(1)(c) is not qualified by any requirement that it should be 'basic' shelter. It follows that the Constitution does not limit the concept of shelter to basic shelter alone. The concept of shelter in section 28 (1)(c) embraces shelter in all its manifestations. However, it does not follow that the Constitution obliges the state to provide shelter at the most effective or the most rudimentary level to children in the company of their parents.[2]

This conclusion is subject to two criticisms. First, it ignores the use of the term 'adequate housing' in FC s 26 and 'shelter' in FC s 28(1)(c). The drafters' choice of varying terminology suggests that the two concepts have different extensions. Second, it ignores the ordinary understanding of the word 'shelter' as reflected in most dictionaries.[3] Of course, a court is not bound by dictionary definitions. However, in this case they provide compelling evidence of the common understanding of the difference between the two terms.

Prior to Grootboom, there were essentially three viable interpretations of the section: (1) the section provides children with a directly enforceable claim to shelter, which is the same as housing, with or without their parents; (2) the section provides children with a directly enforceable claim to shelter, something less that housing, with or without their parents; (3) The section provides children with a

[1] Grootboom I (supra) at 288B.

[2] Grootboom II (supra) at para 73.

[3] In the court a quo, the respondent pointed to the Shorter Oxford Dictionary: shelter is defined as a 'structure affording protection from rain, wind or sun; any screen or place of refuge from the weather. A place of temporary lodging for the homeless poor.' Grootboom I (supra) at 287E. Chambers Twentieth Century Dictionary defines shelter as: a 'shielding or screening structure, esp against weather: a place of refuge, retreat or temporary lodging in distress.'

claim to shelter, which is the same as housing, to be supplied progressively by the state.[1]

Some academics had hoped for the adoption of the first definition.[2] The third definition was, perhaps, the least expected, but the one ultimately chosen by the Constitutional Court.

(b) Progressive realisation

It is obvious from the three options delineated above that while (1) would impose less of a burden on the state than (2), there would be a burden nevertheless. Indeed, the order of Davis J in the court a quo required that the children of the applicants be provided with shelter, along with their parents, until such time as the parents could provide shelter themselves.[3] The basis for this order was the court's view that:

> [t]he wording of section 28 differs from that of section 26 in that there is no similar qualification [that the right is subject to the resources of the state] as appears, for example, in section 26(2). Section 28(1)(c) is drafted as an unqualified constitutional right. Accordingly the question of budgetary limitations is not applicable to the determination of rights in section 28(1)(c).[4]

By contrast, the Constitutional Court held:

> The obligation created by section 28(1)(c) can properly be ascertained only in the context of the rights and, in particular, the obligations created by sections 25(5), 26 and 27 of the Constitution. Each of these sections expressly obliges the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the rights with which they are concerned. Section 28(1)(c) creates the right of children to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services. There is an evident overlap between the rights created by sections 26 and 27 and those conferred on children by section 28. Apart from this overlap, the section 26 and 27 rights are conferred on everyone including children while section 28, on its face, accords rights to children alone. This overlap is not consistent with the notion that section 28(1)(c) creates separate and independent rights for children and their parents (emphasis added).[5]

It is clear that the Constituional Court, rightly or wrongly, was determined to avoid the political implications, the attendant cost and future interpretive difficulties of Davis J's order.[6] However, if the sections are read literally, the grounds for rejecting the lower court's order are shaky at best.

---

[1] There is, of course, a fourth possibility: that the right is to something less than housing and that right would then be subject to progressive realisation. Since the Constitutional Court found that the right of children is to adequate housing, this interpretation adds nothing. Grootboom II (supra) at para 73.

[2] See for example De Vos (supra) at 87-8, De Waal et al (supra) at 412, Cockrell (supra) at para 3E-13, de Wet (supra) at 105-6.

[3] Grootboom I (supra) at 293I-J.

[4] Ibid at 290G-291B.

[5] Ibid.

[6] This conclusion was reached on the basis that although the parents are not bearers of these rights, it would not be in the best interests of the children to be removed from their parents. Grootboom I (supra) at 289C-D.

If the rights entrenched in FC ss 26 and 28(1)(c) are the same why repeat them? It might be argued that this was done merely to reinforce these rights explicitly for children. This does not explain, however, the plain textual difference between the two sections. Section 26 makes the right to housing subject to available resources. FC s 28(1)(c) does not.

The emphasised part of the last quote lays bare the motive of the Constitutional Court. In the court a quo, Davis J was at pains to point out that the child is the bearer of the rights in FC s 28, and that FC s 28 must be read as a whole: most importantly its provision related to the best interests of the child in FC s 28(2). It would be contrary to the interests of children for them to be removed from their parents and, therefore, their parents must accompany them.[1] The Constitutional Court, however, was not prepared to accept the real implication of the judgment of the court a quo: that FC s 28(1)(c) creates a right for parents. The court makes clear its resistance to this notion in the following passage:

> This reasoning [of the court a quo] produces an anomalous result. People who have children have a direct and enforceable right to housing under section 28(1)(c), while others who have none or whose children are adult are not entitled to housing under that section, no matter how old, disabled or otherwise deserving they may be. The carefully constructed constitutional scheme for progressive realisation of socio-economic rights would make little sense if it could be trumped in every case by the rights of children to get shelter from the state on demand. Moreover, there is an obvious danger. Children could become stepping stones to housing for their parents instead of being valued for who they are.[2]

The court's reasoning is hard to gainsay. The 'carefully constructed scheme for progressive realisation would make little sense if it could be trumped' in the way described. What then to make of the literal interpretation of the two sections, an interpretation that undermines the scheme for progressive realisation? Rather than claiming that the overlap of the rights is inconsistent with the notion that separate rights are created,[3] the court should have made it clear that a purposive, rather than a literal, interpretation of the section made it compatible with a scheme for progressive realisation of housing.

An interesting question is whether all the rights in s 28(1)(c) are subject to progressive realisation. Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign did not deal directly with that question.[4] However, the judgment clearly assumes that the right to basic health care in FC s 28(1)(c) is subject to progressive realisation. The Constitutional Court writes:

> The provision of a single dose of nevirapine to mother and child for the purpose of protecting the child against the transmission of HIV is, as far as the children are concerned, essential. Their needs are most urgent and their inability to have access to nevirapine profoundly affects their ability to enjoy all rights to which they are entitled. Their rights are most in peril

[1] Grootboom I (supra) at 288G-H and 289C-G.
[2] Grootboom II (supra) at para 71.
[3] For an analysis of this aspect of the judgment, see Pieterse (supra) at 10-11.
[4] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) ('TAC').

> as a result of the policy that has been adopted and are most affected by a rigid and inflexible policy that excludes them from having access to nevirapine. (Emphasis added).[1]

The emphasised words are consistent with the approach of the court to other questions of progressive realisation. The court consider whole classes of applicants and holds that a reasonable plan to realise progressively the rights in question must accommodate the most needy applicants.[2] Furthermore, the plan must be balanced, flexible and targeted.[3] The wording of this part of TAC suggests that the Court considered the right to be subject to progressive realisation and that the plan to realise the right was not reasonable.

Khosa too failed to provide any guidance as to the progressive realisation of s 28(1)(c). The case concerned the constitutional invalidity of provisions of the Social Assistance Act[4] that reserved pensions, child support grants and care dependency grants for South African citizens — excluding permanent residents. The impugned sections[5] of the Act were said to be unfairly discriminatory, to breach FC s 27(1)(c)[6] and, in respect of the child-related grants, FC s 28.[7] The Court clearly stated that the denial of support for children in need 'trenches upon their rights under s 28(1)(c)'.[8] Mokgoro J noted that FC ss 26 and 27 contain an internal limitation, and that state action must pass internal limitations requirement of reasonableness. The test of 'reasonableness' in regard to FC ss 26 and 27 is, however, different from the reasonableness requirement in the FC s 36 limitations test. The Court made no mention of the fact that FC s 28(1)(c) does not contain any internal limitation. It chose not to make any findings on the relationship between the two tests as there was no argument before the Court on it, and it was not necessary to decide the case. It appears that whilst FC s 28(1)(c) was thrown into the mix, the Court based its decision on its preferred reading of FC s 27.

(c) The interaction between FC s 28(1)(b) and FC s 28(1)(c)

The interpretation of the interaction between FC s 28(1)(b) and FC s 28(1)(c) was critical to the outcomes in Grootboom and TAC. The United Nation's Committee on the Rights of the Child ('UNCRC') has interpreted the Convention on the Rights of the Child as placing the state under an obligation to provide for children whose parents are unable to do so. The Constitutional Court in Grootboom had a different view:

> The extent of the state obligation must also be interpreted in the light of the international obligations binding upon South Africa. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of

[1] TAC (supra) at para 77.
[2] See Grootboom II (supra) at para 44.
[3] See Grootboom II (supra) at para 43; TAC (supra) at para 68.
[4] Act 59 of 1992.
[5] Technically, the sections had not yet come into operation, but for the sake of convenience the Court refers to them as 'impugned sections'.
[6] FC s 27(1)(c) reads, in relevant part: 'Everyone has the right to have access to — social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance.'
[7] Khosa (supra) at para 39.
[8] Ibid at para 78.

> the Child, ratified by South Africa in 1995, seeks to impose obligations upon state parties to ensure that the rights of children in their countries are properly protected. Section 28 is one of the mechanisms designed to meet these obligations. It requires the state to take steps to ensure that children's rights are observed. In the first instance, the state does so by ensuring that there are legal obligations to compel parents to fulfil their responsibilities in relation to their children. Hence, legislation and the common law impose obligations upon parents to care for their children. The state reinforces the observance of these obligations by the use of civil and criminal law as well as social welfare programmes.[1]

FC section 28(1) must be read in this context. The sections encapsulate the conception of the scope of care that children should receive in our society. Subsections (b) and (c) must be read together. Subsection (b) ensures that children are properly cared for by their parents or families, and that they receive appropriate alternative care in the absence of parental or family care. Subsection (1)(b), therefore, defines those responsible for giving care. Subsection (1)(c) lists various aspects of the care entitlement.

Despite the reference to social-welfare programmes, the Grootboom Court appears to conclude that parents must provide for their children and that the state's job is to make sure that they do so. So long as children are cared for by their parents, the state, according to the Constitutional Court, is not obliged to provide for them. This palpable difference between the Court's and the CRC's conception of the obligations of the state is made clear from the following extract from Grootboom:

> It follows from ss 1*(b)* that the Constitution contemplates that a child has the right to parental or family care in the first place, and the right to alternative appropriate care only where that is lacking. Through legislation and the common law, the obligation to provide shelter in ss (1)(c) is imposed primarily on the parents or family and only alternatively on the state. The state thus incurs the obligation to provide shelter to those children, for example, who are removed from their families. It follows that section 28(1)(c) does not create any primary state obligation to provide shelter on demand to parents and their children if children are being cared for by their parents or families. (Emphasis added).[2]

It could be that the highlighted words show that the Court was merely giving an example of when the state's responsibility would arise. The Court might not have ruled out an obligation on the state where a child is still in the care of her parents but cannot provide for her. However the tone of the judgment and the fact that the applicants' claim based on FC s 28 failed suggest that a child will never have a right enforceable against the state while she is in the care of her parents.[3] The position post-Grootboom but before TAC was as follows: If a child is with her parents, then the parent is responsible for providing all those rights contained in ss (c). The role of the state, in such cases, is to provide the legislative framework for children to enforce their rights against their parents when necessary and to realise progressively the socio-economic rights to which everyone is entitled.[4] If a

[1] Grootboom II (supra) at paras 75-6.
[2] Grootboom II (supra) at para 77.
[3] See Pieterse (supra) at 10.
[4] Grootboom II (supra) at para 78.

child is without her parents, then ss (b) provides that the child is entitled to 'appropriate alternative care'. Once this proviso occurs, the provider of the alternative care becomes duty-bound to provide the rights contained in ss (c). If the provider is the state, which will presumably always be the case, if only temporarily, then the rights in ss (c) are enforceable against it. As soon as appropriate alternative care is found that caregiver becomes the provider of the rights.[1]

While the Court in Grootboom was concerned only with the right to shelter, it did not confine its remarks about the interaction between the two subsections to shelter. This approach does not confront the obvious differences between the various rights contained in ss (c). The implication is that, assuming a child is still in the care of her parents, she could not turn to the state for the provision of social services.[2] If the court was, in fact, concerned only with rights to shelter, its judgment should have been made that clear.[3]

In TAC, counsel for the state, in reliance on Grootboom, argued that the duty is on parents to provide health care for their children so long as the children remain in their care.[4] In rejecting this argument, the TAC Court wrote:

> The state is obliged to ensure that children are accorded the protection contemplated by section 28 that arises when the implementation of the right to parental or family care is lacking. Here we are concerned with children born in public hospitals and clinics to mothers who are for the most part indigent and unable to gain access to private medical treatment which is beyond their means. They and their children are in the main dependent upon the state to make health care services available to them. (Emphasis added).[5]

TAC stands for the proposition that in the case of health care, the child's parent need not be absent but simply be unable to discharge the obligations imposed by the right. If a parent can afford medicine and the other components of health care, then it is his or her duty to provide them.[6] If the parent cannot, then the child can turn to the state for support, assuming the state has sufficient available resources.[7]

In reaching this conclusion the TAC Court referred to Grootboom and reproduced its finding that '[i]t follows from ss 1*(b)* that the Constitution contemplates that a child has the right to parental or family care in the first place, and the right to alternative appropriate care only where that is lacking'.[8] The Court then quoted further from Grootboom and said that '[t]his does not mean . . . that the State incurs no obligation in relation to children who are being cared for by their parents or

[1] The state provides support to foster parents through a cash grant and school fee exemption.

[2] See FC s 28. The child would, like everyone else, have a right to social services in terms of FC s 27, subject to the resources of the state.

[3] See J Sloth-Nielsen 'The Child's Right to Social Services, the Right to Social Security, and Primary Prevention of Child Abuse: Some Conclusions in the Aftermath of Grootboom' (2001) 17 SAJHR 210, 225 (Sloth-Nielsen argues that although parents often provide amenities to their children, it is artificial to describe these as components of social services. By failing to confine its remarks to shelter and perhaps nutrition, the court invited such artificial reasoning.)

[4] TAC (supra) at para 75.

[5] TAC (supra) at para 78.

[6] Ibid at para 76.

[7] The potential problem of, or the solution to the problem of progressive realisation was not made explicit.

[8] TAC (supra) at para 74.

families.'[1] Unlike Grootboom, however, the TAC Court did not see this obligation as being limited to legal mechanisms to force parents to comply with their duties. It was able, therefore, to reach the conclusion that the state must provide the health care that was requested.

(d) The state of the law

The law regarding the provision of socio-economic rights under FC s 28 is as follows. First, all the socio-economic rights contained in FC s 28 should be read in the light of other socio-economic rights and are thus subject to progressive realisation. Second, the parent is the primary provider of shelter and the child is only entitled to shelter by the state when she is not in the care of her parents but in the care of the state. Third, although the parent is also the primary provider of health care, the state must step in, subject to all the requirements of progressive realisation, when the parent is unable to provide fully for the needs of a child.

At first blush, it seems plausible to separate basic nutrition and shelter from health and social services. The latter two objects seem to lend themselves more to state provision and the former more to parental provision. However, there seems no logical reason to conclude that the state should only step in when there are no parents in the case of shelter, but must step in when there are indigent parents in the case of health care. The approach of the Court does not really amount to a dichotomy between (i) services to be provided primarily by the parent and (ii) services to be provided primarily by the state. On the Court's own approach, even health care must first be provided by the parent, if she can afford it. The real dichotomy is between cases where the state must provide to children who are still in the care of their parents and cases where the state must provide only when children are not in the care of their parents. It is ultimately a distinction without a meaningfully different justification.

(e) Socio-economic rights of children living separately from their parents

Post-Grootboom II and TAC, the jurisprudence confirms the direct enforceability of the socio-economic rights of children who are living separately from their parents. Centre for Child Law & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others arose from an urgent application brought on behalf of a group of unaccompanied foreign children who were ear-marked for deportation, and who were, in the meantime, being detained together with adults at a repatriation centre.[2] De Vos J discussed the implications of Grootboom II, namely that the primary duty to fulfil a child's socio-economic rights rests on the child's parents or family. However, she continued thus:

[1] Ibid at para 75.
[2] 2005 (6) SA 50 (T)('Centre for Child Law 2005').

> I agree with the view held by Liebenberg[1] that this suggests that the State is under a duty to ensure basic socio-economic provision for children who lack family care, as do unaccompanied foreign children. There is thus an active duty on the State to provide those children with rights and protection as set out in s 28.[2]

She found the government's behaviour with regard to the children to be a serious infringement of s 28(1)(c).[3]

In a different matter brought by the Centre for Child Law, the socio-economic rights of children living separately from their parents again came under scrutiny. Centre for Child Law & Others v MEC for Education, Gauteng, & Others[4] dealt with the rights of children who had been removed from their parents via care and protection proceedings and had been placed in a school of industries. The application revealed that the children were living in parlous conditions and with no access to psychological support or therapeutic services.[5] The respondents did not deny that the children were suffering the effects of the weather as a result of the poor quality of the building and inadequate clothing and bedding. They nevertheless opposed the applicants' plea that the children be immediately provided with sleeping bags as an interim measure until more long term remedies could be effected. Murphy J noted that the socio-economic rights provisions in FC s 28 do not contain any internal limitation subjecting them to the availability of resources. The respondent's suggestion that the Red Cross or non-governmental organisations might be approached to provide sleeping bags was given short shrift by Murphy J. He noted that the State's response reflected a fundamental misunderstanding of the State's constitutional duty: 'The duty to provide care and social services to children removed from the family environment rests upon the State.'[6] The High Court put in place a structural interdict which dealt with both the short term and longer term aspects of the remedy sought.[7]

47.5 Protection From Maltreatment, Neglect, Abuse or Degradation

(a) Corporal punishment

Section 294 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 formerly allowed the whipping of juveniles as a possible sentence to be imposed by a court. The section did not provide an age limit below which the punishment could not be inflicted. However, judicial practice was not to impose the sentence on children below nine years

[1] S Liebenberg 'Taking Stock — The Jurisprudence on Children's Socio-Economic Rights and its Implications for Government Policy' (2004) 5(4) ESR Review.

[2] Centre for Child Law 2005 (supra) at para 17.

[3] The children had been in detention from February to September 2004, waiting for responses to set of Children's Courts inquiries.

[4] 2008 (1) SA 223 (T)('Centre for Child Law 2008').

[5] Ibid at 226G-227A (The conditions included lack of adequate clothing or bedding, concrete floors, broken windows, no heating, and the court mentioned that at that time of year the night time temperatures dropped to below zero.)

[6] Ibid at 228G.

[7] For more on structural interdicts, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 9.5.

of age.[1] In S v Williams, the applicants challenged this provision on a number of grounds These grounds covered an alleged violation of s 30(1)(d) of the Interim Constitution — the equivalent of s 28(1)(d) of the Final Constitution. The Court did not consider this argument because it declared the statutory provision an unconstitutional violation of the prohibition against cruel and degrading punishment.[2] However, the reasoning of the Court suggests that the section would have been found to have violated Interim Constitution s 30 had the court been required to consider it.

Both parties agreed that whipping was unconstitutional when it was a sentence imposed upon adults. The state attempted, however, to distinguish between juvenile and adult whipping. The Williams Court rejected the basis for such a distinction:

> Differences between adult and juvenile whipping have, in my view, little or no relevance to the enquiry. They are in any event differences of degree rather than kind. To the extent that comment is needed on the argument which has been raised, however, I am of the view that the differences are far outweighed by the similarities. There is a small difference in the dimensions of the instrument used; the adult is stripped naked and trussed, the strokes being delivered on bare flesh while the juvenile's strokes are inflicted on normal attire, without him being tied; there is no limit to the number of times a juvenile may be sentenced to receive strokes while the adult may only be so sentenced twice, and never within a period of three years of the previous sentence of strokes. Both occur in a state institution; the maximum number of strokes that may be imposed is seven in respect of both. Both involve a physical beating with a cane wielded by a State employee, a virtual stranger to the person being punished.[3]

The state attempted to argue that the character of a juvenile is still in the process of development and that whipping might assist in correcting bad behaviour. The Williams Court likewise rejected this line:

> I do not agree. One would have thought that it is precisely because a juvenile is of a more impressionable and sensitive nature that he should be protected from experiences which may cause him to be coarsened and hardened. If the State, as role model par excellence, treats the weakest and the most vulnerable among us in a manner which diminishes rather than enhances their self-esteem and human dignity, the danger increases that their regard for a culture of decency and respect for the rights of others will be diminished.[4]

Having found a constitutional violation, the Court turned to the question of limitation. The state argued that whipping acts as a deterrent and is preferable to jail because of the limited resources of the state.[5] Furthermore, it claimed that whipping is appropriate to 'grey-area crimes,' which are not serious enough for prison but too serious for softer options.[6] The Court rejected these arguments for two reasons.

---

[1] S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 15 ('Williams') relying on S v Du Preez 1975 (4) SA 606 (C).

[2] IC s 11(2).

[3] Williams (supra) at para 44.

[4] Williams (supra) at para 47.

[5] Ibid at para 61.

[6] Ibid at para 62.

First, there has been a shift away from punishment as a means of correction and prevention.[1] The development of this process must not be seen as a weakness, as the justice system having 'gone soft.' What it entails is the application of appropriate and effective sentences. An enlightened society will punish offenders, but will do so without sacrificing decency and human dignity.[2]

Second, the Court's position was at least partly a result of the move to create a new juvenile justice system. The presupposition is that viable alternatives to prison exist. The Court thereby answers the problem of grey-area crimes.[3] The Court pointed to alternatives already on offer in the Criminal Procedure Act:[4]

> In addition to the provisions of section 290 (supra), a juvenile may also be dealt with in terms of other sections of the Act, such as, section 287 [fine]; section 297(1)(a- c) [postponing sentence conditionally or unconditionally, suspended sentence subject to conditions; caution and discharge]; sections 276(1)(h) and 276A [correctional supervision]; and converting the trial to an enquiry in terms of the Child Care Act No. 74 of 1983. The latter course has 4 options, namely: (i) placing the child in the custody of a suitable foster parent; (ii) sending the child to a designated children's home; (iii) sending the child to a designated school of industries; (iv) returning the child to the parent or guardian, under supervision of a social worker.[5]

The judgment in Williams was delivered in 1995. It indicated that a complete overhaul of the law relating to child offenders was required. Now, 13 years later, the Child Justice Act seeks to provide a comprehensive plan to deal with child offenders.[6] The Child Justice Act is assessed below.[7] It should be noted that the Williams Court refrained from deciding on the constitutionality of corporal punishment administered by schools. The Court simply referred to two contrasting views about its acceptability abroad.[8] The matter was resolved the following year by the passing of the South African Schools Act. The Act banned the use of corporal punishment in schools, and provided that anyone who administers it commits an offence.[9]

(b) Christian Education and corporal punishment in schools

In Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education of the Government of the

[1] Ibid at para 65.
[2] Williams (supra) at para 68.
[3] Ibid at para 72.
[4] Act 51 of 1977.
[5] Williams (supra) at para 74.
[6] Act 75 of 2008 was gazetted on 11 May 2009. The Act is expected to come into operation on or before 1 April 2010.
[7] See §47.7(b) infra.
[8] Williams (supra) at para 48 citing Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 EHRR 112 and Ingraham v Wright 430 US 651, 692 (1977)(White dissenting).
[9] Act 84 of 1996 s 10(1) and (2). Following Williams, the Abolition of Corporal Punishment Act 33 of 1997 eliminated corporal punishment as a sentence in a number of statutes and outlawed its use as punishment in customary law tribunals. Corporal punishment was also expressly outlawed in places of alternative care (eg places of safety, children's homes and schools of industry) by an amendment (inserting regulation 31A) to the Regulations to the Child Care Act published under GN R 637 in GG 20076 of 21 May 1999.

Republic of South Africa, the constitutionality of the ban on corporal punishment in schools, imposed by the Schools Act, was challenged by a voluntary association called Christian Education South Africa.[1] By the time of trial, it had limited its challenge to the fact that the definition section of the Act includes independent schools. It limited the challenge still further 'by making it applicable to the applicant's constituent schools only.'[2]

The applicants claimed that their rights under ss 15 and 31 of the Final Constitution, the rights to freedom of belief and practice of religion, were impaired by the ban. In support of this claim, the applicant stated that various passages of the Bible instruct parents to administer corporal punishment to their children. Since teachers act in loco parentis during the school day, the applicants reasoned that schools ought to be allowed to administer corporal punishment on behalf of the parents.[3]

In a clear and well-reasoned judgment, Liebenberg J in the court a quo enunciated the following, and now prevailing, approach to violations of the two religion clauses:

> In cases of this nature a court will in the first place consider whether the belief relied upon in fact forms part of the religious doctrine of the religion practised by the person concerned. Once it has found that the belief does form part of that doctrine, the court will not embark upon an evaluation of the acceptability, logic, consistency or comprehensibility of the belief. But, the court will then enquire into the sincerity of the person's claim that a conflict exists between the legislation and the belief which is indeed burdensome to that person.[4]

The application thus failed at the very first stage of analysis. The High Court found that while it was indeed a part of Christian doctrine for parents to be allowed to chastise their children, teachers were not so allowed.[5] Therefore, the right of schools to administer corporal punishment was not predicated on religious belief. The 'approach adopted by the applicant [was] merely to clothe rules of the common law in religious attire.'[6]

In S v Williams, the Constitutional Court left open the question of corporal punishment in schools. In Christian Education, Liebenberg J compared court-imposed beatings to school-imposed beatings.[7] The court found that the only differences between the two punishments were that the authority administering the punishment was different and that, in the case of the school, the person administering the punishment would not be unknown to the pupil. Since these differences

---

[1] 1999 (4) SA 1092 (SE), 1999 (9) BCLR 951 (SE)('CESA I').

[2] CESA II (supra) at 954D.

[3] Ibid at 956A-G.

[4] Ibid at 958E-F. The court referred to various foreign judgments in support of its judgment. See Presbyterian Church in the United States v Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church 393 US 440, 451 (1969); Thomas v The Review Board 450 US 707 (1981); In re Chikweche 1995 (4) SA 284 (ZS), 1995 (4) BCLR 533, 538F (ZS). See Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231(CC); Christian Education SA v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC), ('CESA II').

[5] CESA I (supra) at 959C.

[6] Ibid at 959E.

[7] Ibid at 964G-J.

were not deemed material, the court concluded that school administered corporal punishment was likewise unconstitutional.[1] The legislature, by passing the South African Schools Act, was simply giving effect to FC s 28(1)(d).[2]

Liebenberg J need not have made this last remark. Having found that the statute did not violate the rights of the applicant, no more need have been said. However, Liebenberg J wanted to make it clear that FC s 31(2) acts as an internal modifier to the right to practise religion: it thereby prohibits a person or a group from practising their religion in a manner inconsistent with other provisions of the Final Constitution.[3] Thus, even if the prohibition on corporal punishment was a prima facie violation of the right to practise religion, because corporal punishment administered by schools was a violation of another provision, FC s 31 itself was not violated.[4]

In the Constitutional Court, Sachs J assumed, in favour of the applicant, that a ban on school-administered corporal punishment in independent religious schools violates FC ss 15 and 31.[5] He then proceeded to FC s 36. The apparent rationale for skipping the rights analysis was that if the limitation were shown to be reasonable and justifiable, it would be unnecessary to take a harder line on the applicant's FC s 15 and FC s 31 claims.[6] While this approach is permitted by the text, the standard two-step approach of Liebenberg J is to be preferred.[7]

In the course of examining the purpose of the limitation, Sachs J pointed to the obligation of the state to 'protect all people and especially children from maltreatment, abuse or degradation'.[8] He pointed to the constitutional requirement that in all matters concerning a child, the child's best interests are paramount.[9] In addition, he stated that FC s 12 — freedom and security of the person — means that all people have the right 'to be violence-free'.[10] The court then said the following:[11]

> As part of its pedagogical mission, the Department sought to introduce new principles of learning in terms of which problems were solved through reason rather than force. In order to put the child at the centre of the school and to protect the learner from physical and emotional abuse, the legislature prescribed a blanket ban on corporal punishment. In its judgement, which was directly influenced by its constitutional obligations, general prohibition rather than supervised regulation of the practice was required. The ban was [1] Ibid at 965A.

[2] Ibid at 965B.
[3] CESA I (supra) at 965C.
[4] For more on the relationship between the FC s 31(2), FC s 31 and other provisions in the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Community Rights: Language, Culture and Religion' S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) in Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 58.
[5] CESA II (supra) at para 27.
[6] Ibid at para 28.
[7] For a critique of Sach's notional approach to rights analysis, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.
[8] CESA II (supra) at para 40.
[9] Ibid at para 41.
[10] Ibid at para 47.
[11] Ibid at para 50.

> part of a comprehensive process of eliminating state-sanctioned use of physical force as a method of punishment. The outlawing of physical punishment in the school accordingly represented more than a pragmatic attempt to deal with disciplinary problems in a new way. It had a principled and symbolic function, manifestly intended to promote respect for the dignity and physical and emotional integrity of all children.

While the approach of the court was meant to favour the applicant and in the end did no harm, it muddied the waters by confusing the order of its analysis. It ought to have confronted these issues of maltreatment, best interest and dignity as part of its assessment of FC s 31. Had it done so, it would have been clear that Liebenberg J was correct in finding that FC s 28(1)(d) was violated and thus FC s 31 could not be. Even if the FC s 15 claim remained, doctrinal coherence would have been better served by pressing down on the faith-based attack and proceeding, if necessary, to the limitations enquiry.

The Court explicitly left the question open of the constitutionality of corporal punishment administered by parents.[1] The South African Law Reform Commission, in its final report on the Review of the Child Care Act,[2] recommended that the Children's Bill should include a clause that would remove the common-law defence of reasonable chastisement. The Children's Amendment Bill,[3] as first introduced in Parliament, included a stronger provision that would actually provide for an outright ban on corporal punishment in the home. This clause became mired in controversy, and was eventually dropped at the eleventh hour.[4]

The possibility remains that a constitutional challenge will be brought against corporal punishment in the home, most likely aimed at the common-law defence of reasonable chastisement. International experience with this problem may be helpful. In A v United Kingdom[5] a unanimous court ruled that repeated corporal punishment of a nine year old boy by his stepfather amounted to inhuman or degrading treatment, and that the UK government should have taken measures to provide protection by disallowing the common-law defence of moderate and justified chastisement in such cases.[6] In Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Attorney General, Canada,[7] the majority found that a law that allowed correction by parents and persons in loco parentis provided that the force used was [1] CESA II (supra) at para 48. For a critique of this piece of legal sophistry, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[2] Project 110 (December 2002) 115-116.

[3] B 19-B of 2006, clause 139.

[4] P Proudlock & L Jamieson 'Guide to the Children's Act 38 of 2005', unpublished paper, Children's Institute (2008) 8.

[5] [1998] 2 FLR 959 ('A').

[6] See A v United Kingdom (2000) De Jure 146 (Argues that South Africa's common law relating to the defence of reasonable chastisement may be in need of reform). See further J Burchell & J Milton Principles of Criminal Law 3ed (2005) 296; B Bekink 'When do Parents go too Far? Are South African Parents Still Allowed to Chastise their Children through Corporal Punishment in the Home?' (2006) 2 SACJ 173, 188-191 (Raises questions about the constitutionality of corporal punishment and the defence of reasonable chastisement.)

[7] Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Attorney General, Canada [2004] 1 SCR 76 ('Canadian Foundation').

reasonable in the circumstances and was not 'unconstitutionally vague'.[1] In the majority's view, the child's best interests was not an overriding principle but only one factor to be considered: the family should not be exposed to intrusion by law enforcement for every trivial spanking. In contrast, the Canadian Foundation minority found that the law was vague and controversial. It also concluded that the common-law defences of necessity and de minimis non curat lex would be sufficient to prevent parents from being prosecuted or convicted for excusable or trivial conduct. Sloth-Nielsen has expressed the view that the minority position in Canadian Foundation is more consistent with a children's rights approach under the Final Constitution.[2]

(c) Legislative development

FC s 28(1)(d) provides that the child has the right 'to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation'.[3] This subsection clearly imposes a positive obligation on the state to prevent harm to children. Since 1994, it has been the view of many lawyers that the Child Care Act[4] is inadequate and fails to vindicate the standards set by the Final Constitution.[5] Changes were made to the Act in the Child Care Amendment Acts of 1996[6] and 1999.[7] However, these alterations were temporary: The new Children's Act,[8] passed in 2005, has been partially brought into operation. When the Act is fully implemented it will repeal the Child Care Act as well as various other statutes.[9]

The Children's Act contains numerous clauses that are relevant to our understanding FC s 28(1)(d). The word 'abuse' is defined in s 1 as —

[1] The court split 6 to 3. The minority judgments were penned by Arbour, Binnie and Deschamps JJ.

[2] J Sloth-Nielsen 'Children' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) The South African Constitution: The Bill of Rights (2nd Edition, 2006) 528.

[3] Emphasis added.

[4] Act 74 of 1983.

[5] See J Sloth-Nielsen & B van Heerden 'Proposed Amendments to the Child Care Act and Regulations in the Context of Constitutional and International Law Developments in South Africa' (1996) 12 SAJHR 247; J Sloth-Nielsen & B van Heerden 'The Child Care Amendment Act 1996: Does it Improve Children's Rights in South Africa?' (1996) 12 SAJHR 649.

[6] Act 96 of 1996.

[7] Act 13 of 1999.

[8] Act 38 of 2005. For technical reasons related to the processing of Bills provided for in FC s 75 and FC s 76 the Children's Bill was divided into two separate Bills. The first one was signed into law in 2006 as the Children's Act 38 of 2005. The second one was signed into law in March 2008, as the Children's Amendment Act 41 of 2007. The Amendment Act adds missing sections. The full Act, thus formed, is called the Children's Act 38 of 2005. On 30 June 2007 the President issued a signed proclamation (proclamation 13, 2007, GG no 30030, 29 June 2007) bringing certain sections of the Act into operation with effect from 1 July 2007.

[9] Children's Act s 313 read with schedule 4 repealed (in entirety) The Age of Majority Act 57 of 1972, the Children's Status Act 82 of 1987, the Guardianship Act 192 of 1993, and the Natural Fathers of Children Born out of Wedlock Act 86 of 1997. When the Act is fully implemented it will also repeal the whole of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983; the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction Act 72 of 1996, the few remaining sections of the Children's Act 33 of 1960, s 1 of the General Laws Further Amendment Act 93 of 1962, and s 4 of the Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993.

> any form of harm or ill-treatment deliberately inflicted on a child, and includes (a), assaulting a child or inflicting any other form of deliberate injury to a child; (b) sexually abusing a child or allowing a child to be sexually abused;[1] (c) bullying by another child; (d) a labour practice that exploits a child; or (e) exposing or subjecting a child to behaviour that may harm the child psychologically or emotionally.

Neglect of a child is defined as 'a failure in the exercise of parental responsibilities to provide for the child's basic physical, intellectual, emotional or social needs'. The Children's Act provides that a parent, guardian or other person caring for a child is guilty of an offence if that parent or care-giver (a) abuses or deliberately neglects the child; or (b) abandons the child.[2] A person who is legally liable to maintain a child is guilty of an offence if that person, while able to do so, fails to provide the child with adequate food, clothing, lodging and medical assistance.[3]

The offences carry heavy penalties, with a fine or imprisonment not exceeding 20 years.[4] Neglect must now be 'deliberate', thus adding a mens rea requirement. Under s 50(1) of the Child Care Act negligence had been sufficient to establish the offence of 'ill-treatment'. This shift is no doubt aimed at protecting parents who neglect their children due to circumstances that are beyond their control, eg, illness or poverty.

When it is suspected that children are abused or neglected, a Children's Court[5] hearing will be held to decide, on the basis of a report from a social worker and any other relevant evidence, whether the child is in need of care and protection. If it is necessary to do so, then the presiding officer of the Children's Court may order the removal of the child to temporary safe care pending finalisation of the matter.[6] The court may, upon deciding that a child is in need of care and protection, select a solution from a very wide range of options. Some options are aimed at keeping children in families and providing services to ensure their care and safety.[7]

The Children's Act contains a variety of innovative strategies aimed at upholding children's s 28(1)(d) rights. The Act makes it compulsory for a wide range of professionals to report child abuse.[8] Controversially, the Act also establishes a

[1] In addition to the provisions of the Children's Act, the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act 32 of 2007 has amended aspects of the Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957, and aspects of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1997. Often referred to colloquially as the 'new Sexual Offences Act', the new legal framework provides a range of redefined sexual offences and penalties, including sexual offences against children. The Act alters the position taken in Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another as Amici Curiae). Masiya had disappointingly extended the common-law definition of rape to include anal rape of girls but not of boys. 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (3) SACR 435 (CC). The new Sexual Offences Act contains a broader, gender neutral definition of rape.

[2] Children's Act s 305(3).

[3] Children's Act s 305(4).

[4] Children's Act s 305(7).

[5] The Children's Court has greatly increased powers. These powers are described, together with the procedural rules, in Children's Act Chapter 4.

[6] Children's Act s 151. Removals may only occur without a court order on grounds that are specified in s 152.

[7] See, generally, Children's Act ss 156-159. The court may also, in suitable cases, make an order that the child be placed in alternative case: eg, foster care or placement in a child and youth care centre.

[8] Children's Act s 110.

register of persons unsuitable to work with children. Any court or any legally constituted disciplinary forum may find a person unsuitable to work with children.[1]

Section 12 of the Act provides that 'every child has the right not to be subjected to social, cultural and religious practices which are detrimental to his or her well-being.' The Act also specifically prohibits, to various degrees: marriage or engagement below a minimum age; marriage without consent; genital mutilation or circumcision of female children;[2] virginity testing;[3] circumcision of male children.[4]

(d) Child pornography

In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others[5] the Constitutional Court upheld the ban on the possession and distribution of child pornography contained in the Film and Publications Act.[6] The Court found there to be an impairment of the rights to freedom of expression[7] and privacy,[8] but considered these limitations reasonable and justifiable.[9]

In reaching its conclusions, the Court relied, in part, on the duty of the state to promote FC s 28(1)(d). It highlighted the various harms that child pornography causes to children:

> The degradation of children through child pornography is a serious harm which impairs their dignity and contributes to a culture which devalues their worth. Society has recognised that childhood is a special stage in life which is to be both treasured and guarded. The state must ensure that the lives of children are not disrupted by adults who objectify and sexualise them through the production and possession of child pornography. There is obvious physical harm suffered by the victims of sexual abuse and by those children forced to yield to the demands of the paedophile and pornographer, but there is also harm to the dignity and perception of all children when a society allows sexualised images of children to be available.[10]

---

[1] Children's Act s 121. Any institution that employs people to work (even in a voluntary capacity) with children such as schools or child and youth care centres, have to check (via the department of Social Development) whether the prospective employee's name is on the register prior to employing anybody. Section 121 provides procedures for dealing with disputes concerning the findings.

[2] Children's Act s 12(3).

[3] Children's Act s 12(4) prohibits any testing of children below 16. However, s 12(5) permits children over 16 to consent to virginity testing after proper counselling. The test results may not be disclosed without the consent of the child, and the child may not be marked to show the result. For more on virginity testing, see E George 'Virginity Testing and South Africa's HIV/Aids Crisis: Beyond Rights Universalism and Cultural Relativism, Toward Health Capabilities' (2008) 96 California LR 1447.

[4] Children's Act s 12(8) prohibits circumcision of children below 16 except if performed for religious purposes or medical reasons. The fact that tradition does not form the basis of an exception leaves this clause open to possible constitutional challenge. Circumcision of children over 16 is permissible with the child's consent and after proper counselling. Children's Act s 12(9).

[5] 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck II').

[6] Act 65 of 1996.

[7] De Reuck II (supra) at para 50.

[8] Ibid at paras 52-3.

[9] Ibid at paras 56-91 (Limitation analysis of the court.) For a critique of the De Reuck Court's limitation analysis, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & S Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[10] De Reuck II (supra) at para 63.

The state argued that child pornography causes harm to children in three ways:[1] (a) it is used to groom children for sexual abuse when the potential offender shows the child images of other children performing sexual acts to make the abuse seem acceptable; (b) it reinforces the belief that sex with children is acceptable; and (c) it is used by paedophiles to fuel their fantasies before committing acts of sexual abuse. The Court accepted evidence from the police of (a) and concluded that although empirical evidence did not support (b) or (c), it was common sense that either (b) or (c) might occur in some cases.[2]

The new Sexual Offences Amendment Act (SOAA)[3] criminalises intentional exhibition of child pornography to either an adult or to a child.[4] The term 'child pornography' is defined[5] widely so as to ensure that all methods that may be used to create child pornography are covered under the definition. The essence of the definition captures everything of a sexual nature related to children (or people being presented as children or even animated depictions of children) whether it is intended to stimulate erotic or aesthetic feelings or not. In addition, the display of any pornography to a child is an offence.[6] The Act targets both those who use children in pornography and those who benefit in any manner from the pornography.[7]

The Act also established a new offence of sexual grooming.[8] Persons may be charged for actively grooming or assisting others to groom children for the purpose of committing sexual offences with them are criminalised. Sexual grooming has already been addressed by the courts. In his minority judgment in S v M, Cameron JA used the term 'domestic sexual predation' to describe the situation in which a vulnerable and dependent 15 year old baby-sitter was gradually entrapped into a sexual relationship by an adult friend of the family.[9] Satchwell J has described grooming as 'an ongoing process aimed at the child accepting sexual activities.'[10] She explained that grooming is wrong and punishable because one of the parties can coerce the child into engaging in sexually related activities.

The constitutionality of a number of sections of the Criminal Procedure Act (as amended by the SOAA) was challenged in Director of Public Prosecutions, Transvaal v

[1] De Reuck II (supra) at para 65.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Act 32 of 2007.
[4] Ibid s 10.
[5] Ibid s 1.
[6] Ibid s 19.
[7] SOAA s 20(1) criminalises use. SOAA s 20(2) applies to pecuniary benefits from pornography. The Films and Publication Amendment Act 3 of 2009 was promulgated in the Government Gazette in August 2009. The Department of Home Affairs views the Amendment Act as part of its bid to end child pornography. Critics say that it paves the way for pre-publication censorship and that the exemptions provided do not go far enough to promote freedom of expression. This Act is likely to give rise to constitutional litigation.
[8] SOAA s 18.
[9] 2006 (1) SACR 135 (SCA) at paras 203-205, 260-263. Cameron JA apparently failed to recognize similar signs of grooming in a subsequent matter. See Geldenhuys v The State 2009 (1) SACR 1 (SCA). In Geldenhuys, the different ages of consent to sexual intercourse for males and females was found to be unconstitutional, with only retrospective effect. Act 32 of 2007 had already provided a prospective legislative solution to the problem of unequal treatment.
[10] S v M 2007 (2) SACR 60 (W) at para 36.

Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development & Others.[1] The provisions dealt with the procedures for the oath or admonition of child victims and witnesses, as well as their testimony being heard via an intermediary using equipment and privacy of the proceedings. The Constitutional Court employed a section 39(2) reading of the provisions, and found that although the impugned sections were not in themselves unconstitutional, they had to be read in a constitutionally compliant manner in order to fully protect children. The Court's structural interdict requires the Minister to provide information and plans regarding resources relating to the system such as the number of trained intermediaries and the requisite equipment being available at courts around the country.

47.6 Child Labour[2]

The most important existing laws are s 52A of the Child Care Act (as amended) and s 43 of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act.[3] Subject to ministerial exemption, no child under the age of 15 years may be employed. The latter provision repeats s 28(1)(f) of the Final Constitution. Both statutory provisions exist on pain of criminal sanction.

There are a number of problems with the current situation in South Africa. First, the above statutory provisions are widely ignored: many children are illegally employed and exemption from the statutory prohibition is seldom sought.[4] Second, the legislative and policy framework is unsophisticated: especially when they are measured against the International Labour Organisation's Minimum Age Convention and Recommendation (1973),[5] and the ILO's Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention (1999).[6] The international documents distinguish between various age-groups and kinds of work,[7] set out criteria for proper enforcement of the law, and require that the conditions under which child labour can be deemed satisfactory. Third, children work largely because of poverty. Child labour will only end when measures are effected to alleviate their poverty. In the meantime, adequate social security must be provided to children. Education for poor children must be improved to protect them from abusive work. School must become a viable and attractive alternative to work and a place from which authorities can monitor the involvement of children in work.[8]

[1] 2009 (4) SA 222 (CC).

[2] See South African Law Commission Discussion Paper 103 Review of the Child Care Act (December 2001) 13.5 ('SALC Review of the Child Care Act').

[3] Act 75 of 1997.

[4] SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at § 13.5.5.

[5] Convention no 138 and Recommendation no 146, ratified by South Africa, available at www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/index.htm.

[6] Convention no 182, ratified by South Africa, available at www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/index.htm

[7] For example, art 3 of the Minimum Age Convention specifies that the minimum age for dangerous work should be 18 years.

[8] SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at §13.5.2.

The Children's Act makes it an offence to use, procure or offer a child for slavery, bondage or servitude or compulsory labour for provision of services,[1] or to use, procure, offer or employ a child for purposes of commercial sexual exploitation, trafficking, or to in any other way involve a child in child labour.[2] A social service professional who becomes aware of any of these activities has a duty to report it.[3] Using children to commit crimes is considered one of the 'worst forms of child labour'.[4] In a high profile case in which a woman had hired others to murder her boyfriend's baby, the High Court recognised that the youngest accused (16 years at the time of the commission of the offence) could be seen to be a child used by an adult to commit a crime.[5] They were all convicted of murder. However, the two youngest (both below 18 years at the time of offence) escaped the minimum sentence of life imprisonment: both received 15 year sentences.

47.7 Children and the Justice System

(a) Imprisonment as a last resort

The requirement in FC s 28(1)(g) that children be imprisoned only as a measure of last resort and, if necessary, for the shortest appropriate period of time is also found in art 37*(b)* of the Convention on the Rights of the Child ('CRC'). The Committee on the Rights of the Child has stated that the CRC must be interpreted in conjunction with other international instruments.[6] The UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (1985), known as the Beijing Rules, is one such instrument. In terms of rule 13.1, 'detention pending trial shall be used only as a measure of last resort'. In 1994 the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959 was amended[7] to conform to international standards. In terms of s 29(1) of the Act, prior to amendment, an accused below the age of 18 could only be detained before his conviction if it was necessary and no suitable place of

[1] Section 141(1)(a). For more on slavery, servitude and forced labour, see S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 64; S Woolman & M Bishop 'Down on the Farm and Barefoot in the Kitchen: Farm Labour and Domestic Labour as Forms of Servitude' (2007) 24 Development Southern Africa 595.

[2] Sections 141(1)(b)-(e). See S Woolman & M Bishop 'State as Pimp: Sexual Slavery in South Africa' (2006) 23 Development Southern Africa 385.

[3] Section 141(2).

[4] See, generally, J Gallinetti An Assessment of the Significance of the International Labour Organisation's Convention 182 in South Africa with Specific Reference to the Instrumental Use of Children in the Commission of Offences as a Worst Form of Child Labour (unpublished LLD thesis, University of the Western Cape, 2007). FC s 35*(h)* read with s 92 of the Child Justice Act 75 of 2008 requires that the court undertake an assessment of the child well being whether the child has been used by an adult to commit a crime, and if so, whether the adult should be referred for prosecution in terms of s 141(1)(d) read with s 305(1)(e). The Children's Act, and the information elicited must be taken into account in determining the treatment of the child in the child justice system.

[5] S v Mfazwe & Others Unreported decision of the Cape Provincial Division, Case Number 07/06 (28 June 2007) (Waglay J)('When sentencing children and juveniles, especially where payment was offered to them to commit an offence, courts should see these children and juveniles not only as perpetrators of the offence but also victims of a serious form of exploitation.')

[6] See S v Kwalase 2000 (2) SACR 135, 139b (C), [2001] 3 All SA 588 (C)('Kwalase'); S v Nkosi 2002 (1) SA 494 (W), 2002 (1) SACR 125, 145e (W), [2002] 4 All SA 745 (W)('Nkosi').

[7] Correctional Services Amendment Act 17 of 1994.

safety was available. The amended section provides that an accused child below 14 cannot be detained in prison, but may be detained in a police lock-up or cell for a period not exceeding 24 hours if the detention is necessary and in the interests of justice and the child cannot be placed in the care of his parents, an institution or a place of safety. A similar rule applies to children between the ages of 14 and 18, except that the maximum period of detention is 48 hours. However, ss (5A) provides for the imprisonment of a child between the ages of 14 and 18 in certain circumstances and lists factors to consider in determining whether imprisonment is in the interests of justice. FC s 28(1)(g) has also had an impact on sentencing. In the first constitutional case to rule on the sentencing of children, S v Williams, the Court found that the provisions allowing for judicially ordered whipping as a sentence for children violated IC ss 10 and 11(2), but did not consider whether corporal punishment also infringed IC s 30 (the IC's children's rights section).[1]

The first case to set out general guidelines for the sentencing of child offenders in the new Constitution era was S v Z en Vier Ander Sake.[2] Five matters came before the High Court on review in the ordinary course: suspended sentences had been imposed upon young offenders. Erasmus J took a very energetic approach: he personally visited the juvenile section of the prison and requested a report from the Director of Public Prosecutions (Eastern Cape). As a result of its investigations, the High Court laid down certain guidelines:

(i) diversion[3] should be considered prior to trial in appropriate cases;
(ii) age must be properly determined prior to sentencing;
(iii) a court must act dynamically to obtain full particulars about the accused's personality and personal circumstances;
(iv) a court must exercise its wide sentencing discretion sympathetically and imaginatively;
(v) a court must adopt, as its point of departure, the principle that, where possible, a sentence of imprisonment should be avoided, and should bear in mind especially that: the younger the accused is, the less appropriate imprisonment will be; imprisonment is rarely appropriate in the case of a first offender; and short-term imprisonment is rarely appropriate;
(vi) a court must not impose suspended imprisonment where imprisonment is inappropriate for a particular accused.[4]

The approach set out in S v Z was followed the following year in S v Kwalase.[5] This judgment is notable for the lengths to which the High Court went to set out

[1] IC s 30 did not include the provision that detention should be a measure of last resort, only that every child in detention should be detained under conditions and treated in a manner that takes account of his or her age.

[2] 1999 (1) SACR 427 (E)('S v Z').

[3] Diversion allows for a conditional withdrawal of charges at the pre-trial stage. If the child completes the diversion programme successfully the charges are withdrawn and the child does not obtain a criminal record. Diversion is premised on there being a prima facie case and an admission of responsibility for the commission of the offence. Diversion has been practised in South Africa since the 1990s but has now been given legal recognition by the Child Justice Act.

[4] See also S v S 2001 (2) SACR 321 (T)(A similar approach appears to have underpinned the Court's decision to set aside a suspended prison term for a 15 year old girl who had falsely accused a 17 year old boy of rape because she was afraid of her father and replace it with a postponed sentence.)

[5] 2000 (2) SACR 135 (C).

a clear legal and philosophical framework for the sentencing of offenders below the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of their offences. Van Heerden J spelt out the centrality of the FC s 28(1)(g) right of a child not to be detained except as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time in sentencing procedures. This right must be interpreted in light of South Africa's international obligations, particularly the UNCRC and the Beijing Rules.[1] The judicial approach towards the sentencing of child offenders, Judge Van Heerden argued, had to be reappraised and developed in order to promote an individualized response that was not only in proportion to the nature and gravity of the offence, but also the offender.

In 2005, the SCA again considered sentencing of child offenders in Director of Public Prosecutions, Kwa-Zulu Natal v P.[2] The state appealed against a non-custodial sentence that had been handed down by the High Court in a case of murder committed by a girl who was only twelve years old at the time of the commission of the offence. The SCA replaced the original non-custodial sentence with a prison term of seven years suspended for five years. The judgment is disappointing. It restates the sentencing principles that were set out in S v B. But instead of taking the opportunity to give clear meaning to the term 'imprisonment as a measure of last resort, and for the shortest appropriate period of time' the judgment simply reiterates the principles and delivers a harsher punishment than that of the court a quo. In addition, it appears to have weakened the principle laid down in S v Z that suspended prison terms should not be used in cases where imprisonment is adjudged to be inappropriate.[3]

The long term impact of P cannot as yet be determined. However, there are signs that it will be interpreted positively. In Mocumi v S,[4] P was referred to in support of a finding that a prison term for a child offender was found to be shockingly inappropriate. In S v M, Sachs J stated that 'P confirmed the need for a re-appraisal of the juvenile justice system in the light of the Constitution'.[5] Sachs J further summarised P as follows:

> [It] pointed out that the overarching thesis of the international instruments and the Constitution was that child offenders should not be deprived of their freedom except as a measure of last resort and then only for the shortest possible period of time [and that] even then the sentence must be individualised so as to prepare the child offender for reintegration into society…. [T]he principles guiding the sentencing of a child are proportionality and the best interests of the child.[6]

The principles for sentencing child offenders were repeated and amplified by the

[1] The UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (1986).

[2] 2006 (1) SACR 243 (SCA)('P').

[3] For further criticism of the judgment, see S Terblanche 'Sentencing a Child Who Murders — DPP KwaZulu Natal v P 2006 (1) SACR 243 (SCA)' (2007) 20 SACJ 243.

[4] (Unreported Northern Cape Division Case Number CASR 2/05, 30 May 2006).

[5] S v M (supra) at para 11.

[6] Ibid at para 16 n 20.

Supreme Court of Appeal in S v N.[1] Cameron JA, writing for the majority, referred directly to the 'last resort' principle and provided this elucidation:

> [It] bears not only on whether we choose prison as a sentencing option, but on the sort of prison sentence we impose, if we must. So if there is a legitimate option other than prison, we must choose it; but if prison is unavoidable its form and duration should also be tempered. Every day he spends in prison should be because there is no alternative.[2]

In addition, the courts have continued to stress the importance of a probation officer's pre-sentence report wherever it is possible that a sentence may include detention.[3] While not a novel legal approach,[4] judgments in the new constitutional era have linked the requirement to the constitutional protection of children.

Detention refers not only to prison or police cells but also to other secure places of detention such as reform schools.[5] In S v Z & 23 Similar Cases,[6] the court reviewed 24 cases, which were referred to by a concerned magistrate in terms of s 304(2)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Act (CPA).[7] In all of these cases, child offenders had been sentenced to a reform school in terms of CPA s 290, but had been in prison for long periods of time waiting to be transferred to a reform school. The court directed the department to report on a range of matters, and ordered the immediate release of 24 child offenders whose two year orders had either lapsed or would soon lapse. Other arrangements were made for those who had not spent a very long duration in prison. The matter was postponed for six months. The subsequent hearing gave rise to a further written judgment.[8] At the High Court's request, the Department of Education had presented a plan for structural alteration of an existing school of industries to create a reform school that could receive sentenced children. The court order included a structural interdict overseeing the Department's fulfilment of their plans. The same scenario that [1] S v N 2008 (2) SACR 135 (SCA). The case concerned a 17 year old who had been sentenced for rape by the magistrates court to a period of 10 years imprisonment, four years of which were suspended. The majority of the court, after anxious deliberation, set aside the sentence and replaced it with a sentence of correctional supervision in terms of section 276(1)(i). The new sentence required the offender to spend one sixth of his sentence in prison before becoming eligible for release on correctional supervision. Maya JA's minority judgment upholds the constitutional principles relevant to sentencing of child offender. However, the judge concludes that an effective six year sentence, while 'undoubtedly robust', was an appropriate punishment under the circumstances. Moreover, it did not deny the child a chance of rehabilitation.

[2] Ibid at para 39.

[3] S v Z (supra); Kwalase (supra); S v J & Others 2000 (2) SACR 310 (C); S v Petersen & 'n Ander 2001 (1) SACR 16 (SCA); S v N & Another 2005 (1) SACR 201 (CkH); S v M & Another 2005 (1) SACR 481 (E).

[4] For the importance of a pre-sentence report, see S v H & Another 1978 (4) SA 385 (EC); S v Ramadzanga 1988 (2) SA 837 (V); and S v Quandu 1989 (1) SA 517 (A).

[5] When the Children's Act 38 of 2005 comes into operation, the term 'reform school' will fall away. The institutions will instead be called 'child and youth care centres'. They will be specifically registered to receive sentenced children. Initially they will remain under the control of the Department of Education. But within 2 years of the Act's implementation they must be transferred to the Department of Social Development. See ss 191 and 196 of the Children's Amendment Act 41 of 2007.

[6] 2004 (4) BCLR 410 (E).

[7] Act 51 of 1977.

[8] 2004 (1) SACR 400 (E)

led to the S v Z judgments has subsequently played itself out twice again in other provinces.[1]

These judgments, taken in toto, have created a progressive constitutional jurisprudence on the sentencing of children. During the same period, however, the actual sentencing of child offenders moved in a contrary direction by the courts' interpretation of the minimum sentencing legislation: the Criminal Law Amendment Act (CLAA).[2] When the CLAA was promulgated, it did not apply to children below the age of sixteen. Sixteen and seventeen year olds were included in the ambit of the Act,[3] although the sentencing procedure for them was different from the procedure for adults.[4]

In a string of cases, the courts debated the interpretation of the provisions related to sixteen and seventeen year olds.[5] Nkosi, for example, considered the international law and constitutional provisions, and enunciated the following principles for sentencing a child offender:[6]

(i) Wherever possible a sentence of imprisonment should be avoided, especially in the case of a first offender;
(ii) imprisonment should be considered as a measure of last resort, where no other sentence can be considered appropriate.

[1] See S v M and S v S (Unreported decision of the Northern Cape High Court, Case Nos. 435/04 and 237/04)(11 November 2005) available at www.childlawsa.com (The judgment arose from an urgent special review of the situation of two children who had been sentenced to reform school. By the date of review, the children had been in prison for 15 and 19 months respectively. Lacock J found that although the sentences were appropriate they could not be carried out. He set them aside and replaced them with prison terms matching the periods already served, and the children were consequently released forthwith.) See also N & Another v the State (Unreported decision of the Natal High Court, Case No AR 359/2006)(14 September 2006), available at www.childlawsa.com (In this matter, two teenage boys had been awaiting designation to reform school in Westville prison for eighteen months. Levinsohn J pointed out that the sentence was a competent one, and he therefore did not set the sentence aside. However, he released the two boys on the grounds that it was in the interests of justice to do so. Lamenting the shortage of reform schools, the judge urged magistrates who sentence young people to reform school to diarise the matter for one month, and to send the matters on special review if the children are not moved timeously. This practice was subsequently included in the Child Justice Act, s 76(4).)

[2] CLAA ss 51 to 53, which came into operation on 1 May 1998. The amendment was initially intended to be a short-term measure, but has recently been further amended by the Criminal Law (Sentencing) Amendment Act 38 of 2007, which provided magistrates sentencing jurisdiction of up to 30 years imprisonment.

[3] See J Kriegler 'Criminal Procedure: Legislation' (2003) Annual Survey of South African Law 786 (The author points out that there is no clear rational for treating 16 and 17 year olds differently from 14 and 15 year olds. He makes this comment in relation to the rules related to automatic appeal as introduced by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 42 of 2003. In our view, the point he makes is equally applicable to the law on minimum sentences.)

[4] CLAA s 51(3)(b) provided: 'If any court referred to in subsection (1) or (2) decides to impose a sentence prescribed in those subsections upon a child who was 16 years or older, but under the age of 18 years, at the time of the commission of the act which constituted the offence in question, it shall enter the reasons for its decision on the record of the proceedings.'

[5] S v N 2000 (1) SACR 209 (W); S v S 2001 (1) SACR 79 (W); S v Blaauw [2001] 3 All SA 588 (C); S v Malgas [2001] 3 All SA 220 (SCA); S v Nkosi (supra); Direkteur van Openbare Vervolgings, Transvaal v Makwetsja [2003] 2 All SA 249 (T).

[6] Nkosi (supra) at 147f-i.

(iii) where imprisonment is considered, it should be for the shortest possible period given the nature and gravity of the offence and the needs of society as well as the particular needs and interests of the child offender;
(iv) if possible the judicial officer must structure the sentence in such a way as to promote rehabilitation and reintegration; and
(v) the sentence of life imprisonment may only be considered under exceptional circumstances.

The applicability of minimum sentences appeared to be resolved by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v B.[1] The case involved a 17-year-old boy who had been convicted of murder. The court a quo had applied the minimum sentence of life imprisonment. The appellant argued that the Final Constitution only permits children to be detained as a last resort, and that a minimum sentence implies a first resort of imprisonment. The S v B Court agreed and held that minimum sentences do not apply to sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds. According to S v B, the traditional aims of punishment for child offenders have to be re-appraised in the light of international instruments. Any sentencing court must have discretion when sentencing a child, in order to give effect to the requirement of individualisation and the need for proportionality. The SCA added, however, that when dealing with sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds, the fact that the legislature has ordained minimum sentences for specific offences should be taken into account as a weighting factor when a court exercises its sentencing discretion.[2]

After this case, the Criminal Law (Sentencing) Amendment Act[3] reinstated minimum sentences for sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds. In the Centre for Child Law v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others[4] the Constitutional Court ruled that the Final Constitution prohibits minimum sentencing legislation from being applied to children aged 16 and 17 years old. The Court confirmed the order of constitutional invalidity declaring sections of the CLAA[5] invalid. The majority of the Constitutional Court found that he minimum sentencing regime constrains the discretion of the sentencing officer by orienting them away from non-custodial options, by de-individuating sentences, and by conducing to longer prison sentences. This breaches their rights in terms of section 28(1)(g), and the Centre for Child Law Court found that no adequate justification had been provided for the limitation.

(b) Law reform

The Child Justice Act provides various alternatives to imprisonment, both prior to and during trial, and at sentencing.[6] It is worth discussing these innovations in some detail. The Act reiterates the rule that children must be detained separately from adults. It also adds additional protections; for example boys must be

[1] 2006 (1) SACR 311 (SCA), [2005] 2 All SA 1 (SCA).
[2] Ibid at para 11.
[3] Act 38 of 2007.
[4] 98/08 [2009] ZACC 18.
[5] As amended by Act 38 of 2007.
[6] Act 75 of 2008, due to come into operation on 1 April 2010.

confined separately from girls.[1] There are special provisions for the protection of children detained in police custody, including the requirement that they be detained in conditions that reduce the risk of harm, that they be permitted visitors and that they be cared for in a manner consistent with the special needs of children.[2]

The Act clearly reinforces the constitutional standard that detention, including pre-trial detention, is a measure of last resort. It provides written notice and summons as alternatives to arrest,[3] and places a variety of restrictions on the circumstances in which children can be arrested.[4] The Act articulates that a unique clause demands that 'when considering the placement of a child' preference must be given to the least restrictive option possible in the circumstances.[5] The detention of children younger than 14 is subject to even more stringent conditions.[6]

All children must be assessed by a probation officer before they appear at a preliminary inquiry.[7] The purpose of the assessment is to provide quality information to make decisions about how the child is to be dealt with, including the possibility of the child's case being 'diverted'. Diversion is a process of channelling cases away from the formal court system to specially devised plans or programmes.[8] Diversion is not treated as a conviction, and the child does not obtain a criminal record. A child can only be diverted if he or she acknowledges responsibility for the offence, and if there is a prima facie case against him or her. The procedure for diversion depends on the seriousness of the offence. A minor offence may be diverted by a prosecutor. If the case is not diverted by the prosecutor, or if the matter is more serious, then the child must appear before a preliminary inquiry. This hearing takes the place of a hearing of first appearance. The palpable difference is that all efforts are made to ensure that appropriate decisions are made about the child. A child may be diverted at this stage, failing which the matter proceeds to trial in the child justice court.[9] If the child does not comply with the

[1] Section 28(1)(a).

[2] Section 28(1)(b)-(d). The section also includes a compulsory reporting procedure if any injury or trauma is complained of or observed.

[3] Sections 17 and 18.

[4] Section 22. Children charged with minor offences are not to be arrested and detained, unless their parents cannot be located or they are deemed to be risk to themselves or others. If such a child is detained, he or she can be released into the care of the parent or an appropriate adult by a police official if the offence is a minor one, or by a police official with the agreement of the public prosecutor if the case is more serious. The offences are arranged according to schedules, with schedule 1 containing relatively minor offences, schedule 2 more serious ones, and schedule 3 the most serious, such as murder, rape and aggravated robbery. Police may not release a child charged with a schedule 3 offence, even with the authorisation of the prosecutor.

[5] Section 26.

[6] If a child is below 14 years of age or if 14 years or older but charged with a schedule 1 or 2 offence, and such child has not been released into the care of a parent or appropriate adult, then the police official must give consideration to the child being accommodated in a suitable child and youth care centre instead of being held in police cells. Chapter 5 of the Bill deals with assessment, and chapter 7 with preliminary inquiry.

[7] Section 34.

[8] Chapter 8 of the Child Justice Bill provides detailed provisions on diversion.

[9] The Child Justice Court is any court before which a child is appearing, bound by the rules set out in the Act, and is held in camera.

diversion order, and has no satisfactory explanation when brought before court, then he or she may then be tried for the offence.[1]

During the preliminary inquiry and trial stages, the Act retains its vigilance regarding detention. Preference is given to the release of children: but if they are to be detained they should preferably be held in a suitable child and youth care centre.[2] Children may only be detained in a prison to await trial if they are over the age of 14 years and charged with serious offences.[3] The Act stipulates that trials of children are to be concluded as speedily as possible and that postponements are to be limited in number and duration.[4] Children in prison are to be brought back to court every 14 days.[5]

The sentencing chapter[6] gets off to a positive start with a list of sentencing objectives: to encourage the child to understand the implications of and be accountable for the harm caused; to promote an individualised and proportionate response; and to promote reintegration of the child into the family and the community.[7] The chapter also embraces a range of sentencing options that can be served in the community and places great emphasis on restorative justice.[8] Another option is for the child to be sentenced to a child and youth care centre for 5 years.[9] To this end, the chapter provides for increased tariffs for residential sentences to these centres.[10] Section 77(1)(a) prohibits the imprisonment of children below 14 years at the time of sentence.[11] Children who are 14 years or older may be sentenced for up to 25 years.

47.8 Legal Representation in Civil Proceedings

According to FC s 28(1)(h):

> Every child has the right to have a legal practitioner assigned by the state and at state expense, in civil proceedings affecting the child, if substantial injustice would otherwise result.

The Constitutional Court has referred to this section on two occasions, both in

[1] Section 55.

[2] These are secure centres that are managed by the Department of Social Development.

[3] Section 30.

[4] Section 66(1).

[5] Section 66(2) Children in child and youth care centres are to appear every 30 days, and for those in the care of parents, postponements are not to exceed 60 days.

[6] Chapter 10 of the Child Justice Act.

[7] Section 69.

[8] The restorative justice options offered in the Act are family group conferences and victim offender mediation. See A Skelton and M Batley 'Restorative Justice: A Contemporary South African Review' 21(3) 2008 Acta Criminologica 37.

[9] Section 76(3). The section also provides for a child to be sentenced to a child and youth care centre and a prison sentence at the same time. The child is then brought back to court after the 5 years to consider release or transfer to an adult prison.

[10] In terms of CPA s 290, a sentence to a reform school (now included in the term 'child and youth care centre)', could be ordered for a maximum period of two years.

[11] The Child Justice Bill had proposed that the relevant age for this prohibition should be under 14 years at the time of the commission of the offence. This was changed to 'at the time of sentence' by the Parliamentary Justice Portfolio Committee.

relation to the appointment of a curator ad litem for very young children.[1] These cases illustrate one manner in which FC s 28(1)(h) may be utilised: it is a measure to protect children caught up in litigation by ensuring that the curator ad litem looks after their interests.

However, of much more interest is FC s 28(1)(h)'s potential to promote the recognition of a child's developing autonomy. As they mature, children's views become more central to the resolution of conflicts concerning them. FC s 28(1)(h) provides a platform for children to be directly involved in civil litigation and for their legal representatives to place the views of the children before the court. The Children's Act confirms this new approach very directly.[2] Every child of sufficient age, maturity and stage of development, must be given the opportunity to participate in matters that concern him or her. Moreover, the child's views must be given due consideration.[3] The Act also grants every child the right to bring, or be assisted in bringing, a matter to court.[4]

The Constitutional Court has on two occasions noted that they would like to hear directly from children (presumably those who are of sufficient age and maturity) in matters where their rights were affected. In Christian Education, the Court commented that it would have been useful to hear the voices of children on the issue of corporal punishment in schools.[5] And while their actual experiences and opinions would not necessarily have been decisive, their voices and presence would have enriched the dialogue between the parties and the Court.

In Pillay, the Court referred to this passage and commented that legal matters involving children often exclude children. Langa CJ remarked: 'The need for the child's voice to be heard is perhaps even more acute when it concerns children of [about 16 years] who should be increasingly taking responsibilities for their own actions and beliefs.'[6]

In Soller NO, the meaning and scope of FC s 28(1)(h) was explored in some detail.[7] The applicant was a fifteen year old boy, referred to as K, who sought a variation of his custody order so that he could be placed in the custody of his

[1] See Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare & Population Development & Others 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 3 (Skweyiya AJ held that where there is a risk of substantial injustice to children a court is obliged to appoint a curator ad litem to represent the interests of children, and that this obligation flows from the provisions of FC s 28(1)(h).) See also AD v DW (supra) at para 11 n 5 (Court relied heavily on the report of the curatrix.)

[2] See C Davel 'General Principles' in CJ Davel & AM Skelton (eds) Commentary on the Children's Act (2007)(Note, in particular, the authors' comments on ss 10 and 14 of the Act.)

[3] Children's Act s 10. The section came into operation on 1 July 2007. The provision is based on art 12(1) of the CRC and art 4(2) of the ACRWC. For further information on the voice of the child, see A Barratt 'The Best Interest of the Child: Where is the Child's Voice?' in S Burman (ed) The Fate of the Child (2003) 145; D Kassan 'The Voice of the Child in Family Proceedings' (2003) 36 De Jure 164; JA Robinson 'The Right of the Child to be Heard at the Divorce of their Parents: Reflections on the Legal Position in South Africa' (2007) 70 THRHR 263.

[4] Children's Act s 14. A child may approach a court directly, as can anyone acting in the interest of the child, anyone acting as a member of or in the interests of a group or class, or in the public interest. These rights appear in s 15 of the Children's Act, and echo directly the standing provisions in FC s 38.

[5] Christian Education (supra) at para 53.

[6] Pillay (supra) at para 56.

[7] Soller NO v G & Another 2003 (5) SA 430 (W).

father. The application was originally brought in terms of FC s 28(1)(h) on behalf of K by an attorney who turned out to have been struck from the roll for what was described as 'piratical recklessness in his approach to important litigation'. Satchwell J decided that although the attorney was unsuitable to represent K, the matter did require the assignment of a legal representative under FC s 28(1)(h). The judge went on to observe the significance of the fact that the legislature inserted FC s 28(1)(h) into the Final Constitution with the full knowledge that the Office of the Family Advocate[1] already existed. She further reasoned that the legal practitioner assigned in terms of FC s 28(1)(h) was surely not intended to appropriate the role and usurp the function of the Family Advocate. The judgment draws a clear distinction between the role of the Family Advocate and the role of a legal representative:

> The family advocate provides a professional and neutral channel of communication between the conflicting parents (and perhaps the child) and the judicial officer. The legal practitioner stands squarely in the corner of the child and has the task of presenting and arguing the wishes and desires of that child.[2]

In Ex Parte Van Niekerk, two girls aged 13 and 11 were granted leave to intervene as parties in an application brought by their father to gain access to them. The court held that to give proper effect to the provisions of FC s 28(1)(h): 'A court is entitled to join minors as parties to proceedings affecting their best interests. Unless the children are joined as parties they will not be able to appeal against an adverse order.'[3] In R v H & Another[4] the court asked whether a child caught up in litigation between divorcing parents should have separate legal representation. A representative was appointed by the High Court in terms of FC s 28(1)(h) after consultation with all the parties. The lawyer later successfully applied to be joined as a second defendant.[5] The approach in Ex Parte Van Niekerk is to be preferred. It joins the children themselves as parties, not the legal representative. Such recognition gives the children better opportunities for participation.

FC s 28(1)(h) requires legal representation where a 'substantial injustice' would otherwise result. The Soller Court's gloss on this term is of particular significance where 'the civil proceedings concerned are of crucial importance to [the child's] current life and future developments.'[6]

---

[1] The Family Advocate was created by the Mediation in Certain Divorce Matters 24 of 1987. Regarding the role of the family advocate, see S Burman & McClennan 'Providing for Children? The Family Advocate and the Legal Profession' (1996) Acta Juridica 69; N Glasser 'Can the Family Advocate Adequately Safeguard Our Children's Best Interests?' (2002) 65 THRHR 74; 'Taking Children's Rights Seriously' (2002) 35 De Jure 223; 'Custody on Divorce: Assessing the Role of the Family Advocate' in S Burman (ed) The Fate of the Child (2003) 108.

[2] Soller NO (supra) at 438 d-e. See further Centre for Child Law (2005) (supra)(confirmed the right of legal representation at state expense in civil cases for foreign unaccompanied minors, and separated out the role of a curator ad litem from that of a legal representative.)

[3] Ex Parte Van Niekerk (supra) at para 8. The Court relied on the Canadian case of Re Children's Aid Society of Winnipeg & AM & LC Re RAM, 7 CRR.

[4] 2005 (6) SA 535 (C), [2006] 4 All SA 199 (C).

[5] The lawyer asked to be joined a nomine officio capacity.

[6] Soller NO (supra) at 435d.

Whilst a fledgling jurisprudence on FC s 28(1)(h) appears to be developing, several questions are left for debate. How is the child to obtain a legal representative? In Legal Aid Board v R, the High Court decided that the Legal Aid Board can appoint a legal representative for a child, and that it is not necessary to approach the High Court in every case.[1] If the matter is an application, then should children file affidavits? If children do not give evidence in court, is it appropriate for a judge to hear them in chambers?[2] How does a legal representative assist a child who is too young or immature to give instructions? We currently possess no clear answers to these questions. However, given the rapid pace of development in child law we can expect them to be addressed in the not to distant future.

47.9 Children and Armed Conflict

The Final Constitution includes both the right of children not to be used directly in armed conflict, and the right to be protected in times of war. The word 'directly' might be open to the interpretation that children could be employed by the South African National Defence Force to do work that would not involve them directly in armed conflict (with due regard to FC s 28(1)(f) which protects children from work that is inappropriate to their age).[3] Domestic legislation accords with the Final Constitution: The Defence Act provides that the minimum age of recruitment into the South African National Defence force is 18 years,[4] this provision may not be derogated from even in times of armed conflict.[5]

FC s 28(1)(i) is above the minimum standard set by art 38 of the CRC. The CRC only prohibits children under 15 years from being directly involved in armed conflict. Much stronger protection can be found in the wording of the ACRWC. The ACRWC provides that 'no child shall take a direct part in hostilities' and obliges the state to 'refrain, in particular, from recruiting the child'.[6] The wording of the Final Constitution is thus more closely aligned to the wording of the ACRWC. The Optional Protocol to the CRC on the involvement of children in armed conflict[7] (which has been signed but not ratified by South

[1] Legal Aid Board v R & Another 2009 (2) SA 263 (D).

[2] This debate is not new. And judges have differing views on the matter. See Martens v Martens 1991 (4) SA 287 (T); McCall v McCall 1994 (3) SA 201 (C). The judges found it most instructive to speak to the children in chambers. However, in F v F, the only SCA judgment to have dealt with this question, the court declined to hear the child in chambers. The reasons were that she had already expressed discomfort with seeing many experts in relation to the case, as well as the prospect of a child having to face five judges in chambers, and the fact that this request occurred in the context of an appeal. Furthermore, Maya AJA raised procedural concerns about whether the children's views would constitute evidence, and, if so, should there be opportunity to lead rebuttal evidence? However, the Court did acknowledge that courts must take into account the child's preferences (where she is old enough to articulate them) and the Court had ample information before them regarding such preferences.

[3] See J Sloth-Nielsen 'Children' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law (2nd Edition 2006) 541.

[4] Act 42 of 2002 s 52(1).

[5] Defence Act s 91(2)(a).

[6] Art 22(2). The ACRWC defines a child as a person below the age of 18. Art 3.

[7] GA/RES 54/263 (signed by South Africa on 8 February 2002).

Africa) establishes a minimum recruitment age of 18 years and also broadens the ambit of the prohibition on the involvement of children through recruitment by armed groups that do not fall under the control of the state. The Optional Protocol opens the door to possible horizontal application against the non-State armed groups.[1] FC s 28(2)(i) can also potentially apply horizontally.[2]

47.10 The Best Interests of the Child

(a) Introduction

FC s 28(2) re-iterates the common-law standard of the best interests of the child. But it is no mere repetition. The common-law standard is applied by the High Court in its position as the upper guardian of minor children. The constitutional standard applies in 'every matter concerning the child'. Furthermore, the wording of the text indicates that the best interests of the child in FC s 28(2) is not limited to the matters in FC s 28(1). This conclusion is born out by a comparison with s 30(3) of the Interim Constitution. Interim Constitution s 30(3) said that the best interests of the child were paramount for the purposes of IC s 30 alone.[3]

The problems with the best interests standard are legion and legendary:

> (i) it is 'indeterminate'; (ii) members of the various professions dealing with matters concerning children . . . have quite different perspectives on the concept . . .; and (iii) the way in which the 'best interests' criterion is interpreted and applied by different countries (and indeed, by different courts and other decision-makers within the same country) is influenced to a large extent by the historical background to and the cultural, social, political and economic conditions of the country concerned, as also by the value system of the relevant decision-maker.[4]

Even if we admit the above, it is hard to see how it could be otherwise. Values with respect to and ideas about children vary over time and place. One would not want to block the flexibility and growth of the law by a need for certainty and neatness.[5] The 'best' one can do is list some basic criteria and flesh out their meaning through application to specific types of situations.

(b) The operation of FC s 28(2)

From the existing case law, it is clear that FC s 28(2) operates in at least three ways.

First, the concept of the child's best interests is used to interpret the protections in FC s 28(1) or vice versa; subsecs (1) and (2) are read together. For example,

[1] For more on children in armed conflict, see B Mezmur 'Children at Both Ends of the Gun: Child Soldiers in Africa' in J Sloth Nielsen (ed) Children's Rights in Africa: A Legal Perspective (2008) 199-218.

[2] For more on the direct horizontal application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 31-62 to 31-74.

[3] A Cockrell 'The Law of Persons and the Bill of Rights' in Bill of Rights Compendium (Service Issue 13, October 2003) at para 3E19.

[4] B van Heerden et al Boberg's Law of Persons and the Family (2nd Edition, 1999) 502-503 (footnotes omitted).

[5] See Minister of Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick & Others 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 713 (C)('Fitzpatrick') at para 18.

in Bannatyne v Bannatyne, the Constitutional Court referred to the child's right to proper parental care (FC s 28(1)(b)): it places an obligation on the state to create the necessary environment for parents to provide proper parental care.[1] One of the state's duties was to enforce the effective payment of maintenance. The Constitutional Court reversed a Supreme Court of Appeal decision that had failed to take the best interests of a child into account in rendering a decision concerning maintenance.[2]

Second, the best interests criteria may be employed to determine the ambit of another right in the Bill of Rights. Alternatively, the best interests criteria are relevant at the limitation stage of application analysis of this other right. For example, the Witwatersrand High Court in De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others[3] held that the ban on child pornography did not contravene the applicant's rights to privacy and freedom of expression. These rights are not absolute and must be interpreted in the light of the paramountcy of children's best interests. Alternatively, if the applicant's rights were violated, the court a quo was of the view that the ban on child pornography was a constitutionally acceptable limitation because of what is in children's best interests. The Constitutional Court[4] did not allow children's interests to decide the ambit of the rights to expression and privacy. These rights were violated by the statutory prohibition. Children's interests, however, justified the limitation of the rights.[5] The judgment of the Constitutional Court may indicate that where children's best interests enter the analysis of a non-s 28 right, they do so only at the limitation stage. However, if a non-s 28 right is a right of a child, then the best interests criteria are inseparable from the determination of whether the challenged law or action violates the non-s 28 right. For instance, in Hay v B & Others the High Court read the child's right to life together with the right to have the child's best interests considered as paramount. As a result, the Court rejected the FC s 15 claim of the parents, who were Jehovah's[6] Witnesses and believed that their religion forbade a blood transfusion which might save the child's life.[7]

Third, FC s 28(2) creates a self-standing right:

> Section 28(1) is not exhaustive of children's rights. Section 28(2) requires that a child's best interests have paramount importance in every matter concerning the child. The plain meaning of the words clearly indicates that the reach of s 28(2) cannot be limited to the rights

[1] 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC) at paras 24-5.

[2] See Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as amicus curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)('Du Toit'). The court found to be unconstitutional statutory provisions that did not allow for joint adoption by same-sex partners in a long-term relationship. One of the grounds for this outcome was that it was in children's best interests to be adopted jointly by suitable parents. Children would be otherwise deprived of the possibility of a family life as required by FC s 28(1)(b). Ibid at para 22.

[3] 2003 (3) SA 389 (W), 2002 (12) BCLR 1285 (W), [2003] 1 All SA 449 (W) ('De Reuck I').

[4] De Reuck II (supra) at para 55.

[5] See Khosa (supra) at para 136.

[6] 2003 (3) SA 492 (W).

[7] See Kotze v Kotze 2003 (3) SA 628 (T)(High Court combined the child's right to religious freedom with its right to its best interests, and refused to make a certain clause part of a divorce order. The parties had sought to educate their child in the Apostolic Church: the offending clause was found infirm because it predetermined and constrained the child's future.)

> enumerated in s 28(1) and s 28(2) must be interpreted to extend beyond those provisions. It creates a right that is independent of those specified in s 28(1).[1]

In Fitzpatrick, the court decided that s 18(4)(f) of the Child Care Act violated FC s 28(2). The section proscribed the adoption of a child born of a South African citizen by persons who are not South African citizens or are persons who qualify for naturalisation but have not yet applied. The court held that the best interests of a child could lie in its adoption by non-South Africans.[2] Another notable illustration of FC s 28(2) as an independent right is to be found in Sonderup v Tondelli & Another.[3] In Sonderup, the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction Act[4] was found not to violate FC s 28(2):

> In normal circumstances it is in the best interests of children that parents or others shall not abduct them from one jurisdiction to another, but that any decision relating to the custody of the children is best decided in the jurisdiction in which they have hitherto been habitually resident.[5]

In AD v DW, an American couple wanted to adopt a South African child. Instead of making an application to the Children's Court, they brought an application to the High Court for sole custody and guardianship with a view to removing the child from South Africa and concluding an adoption in the USA. The case began in the High Court.[6] That court refused to grant the order, and referred the couple to the Children's Court, the forum where domestic adoptions are concluded.[7] The couple appealed both the refusal and the referral in the Supreme Court of Appeal.[8]

The SCA divided three to two, with four written judgments. The majority held that to grant the order sought by the applicants would result in sanctioning an alternative route to inter-country adoption under the guise of a sole custody and sole guardianship application. The majority found this approach to be an unsavoury form of by-passing the Children's Court adoption system and jumping the queue. The court held further that the appeal should in any event fail because

---

[1] Fitzpatrick (supra) at para 17.

[2] Ibid at para 19.

[3] 2001 (1) SA 1171 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC) ('Sonderup'). See also Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, & Others 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 117 (C) at para 20.

[4] Act 72 of 1996.

[5] Re F (Minor: Abduction: Jurisdiction) [1990] 3 All ER 97, 99j (CA), quoted in Sonderup (supra) at para 28.

[6] De Gree & Another v Webb & Others (Centre for Child Law, University of Pretoria, Amicus Curiae) (2006) (6) SA 51 (W).

[7] See Minister of Welfare & Population Development v Fitzpatrick 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC) (Constitutional Court declared section 18(4)(f) of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 unconstitutional. It thus opened the door to inter-country adoptions that the Court envisaged would be concluded via the Children's Court, using the Child Care Act and international law as the legal framework.) For a discussion of some of the problems experienced in the practice of inter-country adoption following Fitzpatrick, see A Louw 'Inter-country Adoption in South Africa: Have the Fears become Fact' (2006) 39(3) De Jure 503.

[8] De Gree & Another v Webb & Others (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 184 (SCA).

of the principle of subsidiarity:[1] insufficient efforts had been made to find suitable care for the child in South Africa and thus inter-country adoption could not proceed. The minority took a different view, holding that that as upper guardian of minors, the High Court had jurisdiction to hear the application. In their view the papers showed that it was overwhelmingly in her best interests for the order of sole custody and sole guardianship to be granted.[2]

The case finally found its way to the Constitutional Court. The child remained in alternative care. The Court had to find a way to ensure that a correct procedure for children was followed (to prevent unlawful adoptions or trafficking in children) whilst upholding the best interests of the individual child concerned. Justice Sachs recognised the importance of the 'subsidiarity' principle, but ultimately found that the principle must yield to the paramountcy principle. The best interests of each child must therefore be examined on an individual basis and not in the abstract:

> Child law is an area that abhors maximalist legal propositions that preclude or diminish the possibilities of looking at and evaluating the specific circumstances of the case.[3]

The Court ruled that unduly rigid adherence to technical matters should play a relatively diminished role, because 'the courts are essentially guarding the best interests of a child, not simply settling a dispute between litigants.'[4]

(c) Paramountcy v limitation

The use of the word 'paramount' in FC s 28(2) has led some courts to pronounce that children's interests can never be trumped by the rights of others.[5] The Constitutional Court in De Reuck decided otherwise:

---

[1] The principle of subsidiarity is based on the notion that inter-country adoption should be subsidiary to domestic solutions for the care of a child. The principle is reflected in numerous international instruments. Art 21 of the CRC describes inter-country adoption as 'an alternative means of child-care, if the child cannot be placed in foster care or an adoptive family or cannot in any suitable manner be cared for in the child's country of origin'. Art 24 of the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child uses similar terminology in its description of inter-country adoption, but is somewhat more extreme: it describes inter-country adoption as being 'a last resort'. The Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption (1993), includes the following language in its preamble: 'Recognizing that inter-country adoption may offer the advantage of a permanent family to a child for whom a suitable family cannot be found in his or her State of origin.'

[2] For a discussion of the judgment by the Supreme Court of Appeal, see P Moodley 'Unravelling the Legal Knots around Inter-country Adoptions in De Gree v Webb' (2007) 3 Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal.

[3] AD v DW (supra) at para 55.

[4] Ibid.

[5] De Reuck I (supra) at para 45; Laerskool Middelburg en 'n Ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys en Andere 2003 (4) SA 160 (T), 178B-C, 2002 (4) All SA 745 (T)(although educational officials' conduct declaring a school dual-medium was not administratively fair, the decision was not set aside because the best interests of the English learners already admitted to the school under the decision were paramount). For more on this judgement, see S Woolman & B Fleisch The Constitution in the Classroom: Law and Education in South Africa (2009). See also S Woolman & M Bishop 'Education' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) in Constitution Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 57.

> [T]he approach adopted by this Court [is] that constitutional rights are mutually interrelated and interdependent and form a single constitutional value system. This Court has held that section 28(2), like the other rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights, is subject to limitations that are reasonable and justifiable in compliance with section 36.[1]

Moreover, many of the children's rights in FC s 28, including FC s 28(2), are derogable in a state of emergency.[2]

Various courts have considered limitations on children's constitutional best interests.[3] Sometimes the reasons for such limitations are other aspects of the children's best interests. So, odd as it may sound, a child's best interests may also limit her best interests. For example, in Sonderup, the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction was found to satisfy the long-term interests of children, but the Court discussed the question whether, assuming children's short-term interests were not satisfied by the Convention, such limitation could be justified under FC s 36. It was. The Court reiterated the important purpose of the Convention — that custody issues should be determined by the court which is in the best position to do so by reason of the relationship between its jurisdiction and the child. It wrote:

> The Convention also aims to prevent the wrongful circumvention of that forum by the unilateral action of one parent. In addition, the Convention is intended to encourage comity between States parties to facilitate co-operation in cases of child abduction across international borders.[4]

Sometimes the reasons for limitations on children's best interests are the interests of other children, or children generally, or of other parties, such as parents or the state. For instance, the court in Harris v Minister of Education found that a ministerial notice stating that only a child who is to turn seven years' old before the 31st of December of any particular year might be admitted to grade one in that school year violated FC s 28(2). The court held that it was educationally unsound to hold back a child who was ready for school. One of the justifications for the limitation on the right to which the court applied its mind was that '[s]cholars below the age of seven years tend to clog the educational system as a result of high failure and repetition rates and that this carries financial implications for the government'.[5] The court held this concern not to be relevant for the independent schools which the ministerial notice covered. Had the case been brought in respect of a government school, the limitation might well have been justified.

Sometimes the justifications for the limitations on children's rights may be a mix of the above considerations.

---

[1] De Reuck II (supra) at para 55 citing Sonderup (supra) at paras 27-30.

[2] Section 37.

[3] Sonderup (supra) at paras 29-36; Harris v Minister of Education 2001 (8) BCLR 796, 805-6 (T), [2001] JOL 8310 (T)('Harris'); Du Toit (supra) at paras 31-7.

[4] Sonderup (supra) at para 31. The approach of Sonderup has been followed in two subsequent Supreme Court of Appeal judgments: Pennello v Pennello (Chief Family Advocate as Amicus Curiae 2004 (3) SA 117 (SCA) and Central Authority v H 2008 (1) SA 49 (SCA). See further C Woodrow & C du Toit 'Child Abduction' in CJ Davel & AM Skelton (eds) Commentary on the Children's Act (2007) Chapter 17.

[5] Harris (supra) at 805C.

Since children's best interests may validly be limited, what is the meaning of the phrase 'paramount importance'? Indeed, if a child's best interests are not always supreme, what is the point of FC s 28(2)? How would it be different from a hypothetical right which protected adults' best interests? FC s 28(2) is a highly unusual provision in the Bill of Rights because it applies to a group of people across the entire domain of their existence. Most of the other rights relate to particular spheres of activity. One purpose of the provision is to create a right for children as children — because they are especially vulnerable and because we think they are precious and because their interests have all too often given way to the interests of others. If these considerations lie at the heart of FC s 28(2), then the section must be read to reflect the following three concerns.

First, in every matter where a child's interests are (substantially) involved, those interests must be taken into account. This requirement turns all children's matters into potentially constitutional matters.[1] In J v Director General, Home Affairs,[2] the Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional a statutory provision which recognised the husband of a woman who had been artificially inseminated with his consent as the child's father, but did not recognise the long-term lesbian partner of a woman who had been inseminated with the partner's consent as the parent of the child. The basis of for the finding of unconstitutionality was that the law discriminated unfairly on the basis of sexual orientation.[3] The Court said that since the statute was unconstitutional on this ground, it was unnecessary to consider the other grounds raised by the applicant.[4] With respect, the children's interests must be considered in every relevant case. Indeed, the Court, in crafting a remedy, said that its order met best interests of the child requirements.[5]

Second, under FC s 28(2), children's interests alone are made a constitutional right. The subsection does not create a right for others.[6] It does not create a right of parental responsibilities and entitlements.[7] The interests of persons other than children are not captured by the subsection.

Third, FC s 28(2) involves a weighing-up process of the various interests of children in order to decide what is best for them. In addition, a child's interests have a leg up vis-à-vis other rights and values. That said, it is important to remember that the Final Constitution does not say that a children's interests are 'paramount'. They are of 'paramount importance'.[8] Indeed, the case law recognizes that they can be validly limited.

---

[1] Many reported cases suggest that FC s 28(2) serves as reinforcement for the common-law standard of the best interests of the child.

[2] 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) ('J v Director General').

[3] See FC s 9(3).

[4] J v Director General (supra) at para 15.

[5] Ibid at para 16.

[6] None of the other subsections of FC s 28 provide protection for non-minors.

[7] Cockrell (supra) at para 3E21. But we do not agree with Cockrell that a right of parental responsibilities and duties cannot be located elsewhere in the Bill of Rights (consider, for example, the rights to privacy and dignity.) Some parental responsibilities and obligations must be recognised because we do not want the state to possess sole control over the standards set for our children and families. See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' (supra) at Chapter (Woolman contends that association — and intimate associations such as the family — are best protected by FC s 18.)

[8] But see Reno v Flores 507 US 292, 303-5 (1993)(Scalia J).

In S v M the court provides its clearest articulation to date on the meaning of the paramountcy principle. Sachs J comments that the very expansiveness of the paramountcy principle appears to promise everything but delivers little.[1] Nevertheless, the S v M Court recognised that it is precisely the contextual nature and inherent flexibility Constitutional s 28(2) that constitutes the source of its strength. The Court then attempted to 'establish an operational thrust for the paramountcy principle'.[2] The principle cannot, the Court reasoned, be interpreted 'to mean that the direct or indirect impact of a measure or action on children must in all cases oust or override all other considerations. … [T]he fact that the best interests of the child are paramount does not mean that they are absolute.'[3] S v M dealt with the question of what the duties of a sentencing court are, in light of FC s 28(2), when the person being sentenced is the primary caregiver of minor children. Recognising the negative effects of imprisonment on the children, the judgment pronounced that sentencing officers should pay appropriate attention to the children of a primary caregiver and take reasonable steps to minimise damage:

> The paramountcy principle, read with the right to family care, requires that the interests of children who stand to be affected receive due consideration. It does not necessitate overriding all other considerations. Rather, it calls for appropriate weight to be given in each case to a consideration to which the law attaches the highest value, namely the interests of children who may be concerned.[4]

47.11 The Age of a 'Child'

(a) The beginning of a 'child'

What effect does the 'age' of a child have for the bestowal of the protections in FC s 28 (and in other sections of the Bill of Rights) before birth? The applicants in Christian Lawyers Association of South Africa & Others v Minister of Health & Others[5] argued that the legalisation of abortion in the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act[6] violated the right to life of the foetus.[7] The court held that the right to life did not include the unborn child because FC s 28(3), in part, defines a child as a person under the age of 18 years. As a result, reasoned the court:

> [a]ge commences at birth. A foetus is not a 'child' of any 'age'. Had the drafters of the Constitution wished to protect the foetus in the bill of rights at all, one would have expected this to have been done in section 28, which specifically protects the rights of the child.[8]

[1] S v M (supra) at para 23.
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] Ibid at paras 25-26.
[4] Ibid at para 42.
[5] 1998 (4) SA 1113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T)('Christian Lawyers').
[6] Act 72 of 1996.
[7] FC s 11.
[8] Christian Lawyers (supra) at 1442D.

The literal reading of FC s 28(3) does not, however, necessarily exclude its application to the foetus. The courts would be better served by an evaluation of the real values and interests at stake in abortion cases.[1]

In S v Mshumpa the victim was an unborn baby, who was shot (in the 38th week of pregnancy) through her mother's abdomen, resulting in a still birth.[2] The state argued that the common law should be developed so the definition of murder included the killing of an unborn child, as this conclusion would reflect the medical reality and the convictions of the community. The court noted that the common-law principle of being 'born alive' has never been discarded or developed either nationally or in foreign jurisdictions. It therefore came to the conclusion that no rights are conferred on an unborn child and, therefore, that a person only becomes a legal subject after birth.

(b) The end of a 'child'

The Children's Act[3] has changed the age of majority from 21 years to 18 years. This alteration brings the concepts of 'childhood' and 'minority' in South African law into alignment. Moreover, it resolves earlier debates about whether the Age of Majority Act was unconstitutional.[4] The change in the law reflects a growing recognition of the autonomy of young people, and allows them, for example, to choose their life partners without parental consent once they have turned 18 years of age. Inevitably, they will also lose certain protections. For example, an agreement entered into by a young person over 18 years will be enforceable against her, and the common-law action of restitutio in integrum will no longer be available to a person between the ages of 18 and 21.[5]

[1] For more on this case, see M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition OS, February 2005) Chapter 37.

[2] 2008 (1) SACR 126 (E).

[3] Act 38 of 2005. Section 17 reads: 'A child, whether male or female, becomes a major upon reaching the age of 18 years'. The section came into operation on 1 July 2007. The Age of Majority Act 57 of 1972 was repealed in full.

[4] South African Law Reform Commission Review of the Child Care Act Report Project 110 (December 2002) 23-25; J van der Vyver 'Constitutionality of the Age of Majority Act' (1997)114 SALJ 750, 754.

[5] For a more complete explanation of this change in the law and other issues relating to minority, see T Boezaart 'Some Comments on the Interpretation and Analysis of S 17 of the Children's Act 38 of 2005' (2008) 41(2) De Jure 245.

48 Land

Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill

48.1 Introduction 48–1
48.2 Drafting history. 48–3
48.3 Land rights in the Final Constitution. 48–4
48.4 Interpreting land legislation. 48–5
48.5 Land, culture and customary law. 48–8
48.6 FC s 25(5): Redistribution 48–10
(a) Introduction 48–10
(b) Enabling legislation 48–14
(i) Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996 . . . 48–14
(aa) Beneficiaries 48–14
(bb) Labour tenants' rights. 48–17
(cc) Redistribution of land — acquisition of land rights under Chapter III of the Act 48–19
(ii) Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1993 48–20
(iii) Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998 48–22
(c) Policy documents 48–23
(d) Redistribution programme: brief evaluation 48–24
48.7 FC s 25(6): Tenure reform. 48–25
(a) Introduction 48–25
(b) Enabling legislation 48–26
(i) Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 48–26
(ii) Interim Protection of Informal Rights Act 31 of 1996 48–27
(iii) Communal Property Association Act 28 of 1996 . 48–28
(iv) Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997. . 48–28
(aa) Introduction 48–28
(bb) Beneficiaries 48–29
(cc) The promotion of long-term tenure security . 48–30

(dd) Occupiers' rights 48–31
1. General 48–31
2. The right to family life 48–31
3. The right to freedom of religion and burial rights 48–32
4. The right to legal representation 48–36
(ee) Termination of rights 48–36
(ff) Evictions 48–37
1. General 48–37
2. Procedural requirements 48–38
3. Requirements for eviction 48–38
4. Granting an eviction order 48–40
5. Urgent eviction proceedings 48–41
(gg) Mediation and arbitration 48–42
(hh) Review proceedings 48–42
(v) Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 48–42
(aa) General 48–42
(bb) Application 48–43
(cc) 'Old order' and 'new order' rights 48–44
(dd) Procedure for tenure reform 48–46
1. First steps: structuring the community and conducting a land rights enquiry 48–46
2. The determination phase 48–47
(ee) Formalization of tenure rights 48–50
(c) Tenure reform: brief evaluation 48–50
48.8 FC s 25(7): Restitution 48–52
(a) Introduction 48–52
(b) Role players 48–53
(i) The Commission on Restitution of Land Rights . . 48–53
(ii) The Land Claims Court 48–53
(c) Restitution procedure 48–54
(i) Formal requirements 48–55
(ii) Substantive requirements 48–55
(aa) Standing 48–56
(bb) Dispossession 48–56
(cc) A right in hand 48–58
(dd) After 19 June 1913 48–58
(ee) Discriminatory law or practice 48–59

(iii) The requirements in practice: Richtersveld 48–60
(d) Brief analysis of the restitution programme 48–64
(i) Tempo of land restitution. 48–64
(ii) Number of claims and progress 48–64
(iii) Innovation to expedite the process 48–65
(iv) Budget 48–67
(v) Sustainable development and agriculture 48–67
(vi) Community-related problems 48–68
(e) Outstanding claims 48–68

25. Property. —

. . .

(4) For the purposes of this section —

(a) the public interest includes the nation's commitment to land reform, and to reforms to bring about equitable access to all South Africa's natural resources; and

(b) property is not limited to land.

(5) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to foster conditions which enable citizens to gain access to land on an equitable basis.

(6) A person or community whose tenure of land is legally insecure as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to tenure which is legally secure or to comparable redress.

(7) A person or community dispossessed of property after 19 June 1913 as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to restitution of that property or to equitable redress.

(8) No provision of this section may impede the state from taking legislative and other measures to achieve land, water and related reform, in order to redress the results of past racial discrimination, provided that any departure from the provisions of this section is in accordance with the provisions of section 36 (1).

(9) Parliament must enact the legislation referred to in subsection (6).[1]

48.1 Introduction

The land reservation and segregation that formed the core of apartheid and colonial rule in South Africa led Sol Plaatje, the first General Secretary of the African National Congress, famously to exclaim: 'Awaking on Friday morning, June 20, 1913, the South African Native found himself, not actually a slave, but a pariah in the land of his birth'.[2] That date marked the passage of the Black Land Act 27 of 1913. Ever since, the legal regulation of land rights has had a special social, economic and cultural significance in South Africa. Indeed, much of the struggle to end apartheid can be understood as a struggle to regain land rights that were lost through colonial conquest and apartheid forced removals.

The history of apartheid land law[3] and the negotiations over the inclusion of a property clause in the Interim Constitution[1] have been exhaustively described elsewhere. The purpose of this chapter is to analyse the constitutional framework for land reform adopted by the Constitutional Assembly in the latter part of the constitutional property clause, FC ss 25(4)-(9). The three central provisions in this framework — FC ss 25(5), (6) and (7) — must be understood as part of the cluster of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution.[2] Each subsection provides the constitutional basis for a different sub-component of the land reform programme: FC s 25(5) offers the basis for land redistribution;[3] FC s 25(6) provides for tenure reform;[4] and FC s 25(7) engages land restitution.[5] FC s 25(8) provides for the reform of law related to natural resources.[6] This degree of constitutional protection for land and related rights is rather unusual,[7] but nevertheless understandable given the symbolic importance of land in South Africa.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] ST Plaatje Native Life in South Africa (1916). On Plaatje's response to the Black Land Act, see B Willan Sol Plaatje: A Biography (1984) 143-73.

[3] See, for example, C Cross & R Haines Towards Freehold (1988); G Budlender & J Latsky 'Unravelling Rights to Land and to Agricultural Activity in Rural Race Zones' (1990) 6 SAJHR 155-77; THR Davenport & KS Hunt Right to Land (1987); TW Bennett 'African Land — A History of Dispossession' in R Zimmermann & D Visser (eds) Southern Cross: Civil and Common Law in South Africa (1996) 65; CG van der Merwe & JM Pienaar 'Land Reform in South Africa' in P Jackson & DC Wilde (eds) The Reform of Property Law (1997) 334.

Before proceeding to the main discussion, we proffer a brief history of the drafting of the property clauses. As a further preliminary matter, we also discuss

[1] See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'). The Interim Constitution contained only a limited number of socio-economic rights, whilst IC s 28, the property clause, provided for the protection of rights in property, subject to IC ss 121-123, the framework for land restitution. See G Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights' in G Budlender, J Latsky & T Roux Juta's New Land Law (1998) 1-3; E Lahiff & S Rugege 'A Critical Assessment of the Land Redistribution Policy in the Light of the Grootboom Judgement' (2002) 6(2) Law, Democracy and Development 279-84; AJ van der Walt The Constitutional Property Clause (1997) 7-8; AJ van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (2005) 1-3. For more on the interpretation of IC s 28, see PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg & Schoeman's Law of Property (4th Edition, 2003) 486-487; H Mostert 'South African Constitutional Property Between Libertarianism and Liberationism: Challenges for the Judiciary' (2000) 60(2) ZaöRV 295-330; AJ van der Walt 'Notes on the Interpretation of the Property Clause in the Constitution' (1994) 57 THRHR 193.

[2] See further, S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-1–33-2. For purposes of this chapter, FC s 26 is particularly relevant, especially in relation to access to land for housing and eviction. Since these matters are, however, canvassed in detail in the chapter in this treatise on housing, the discussion of housing and eviction in this chapter is limited. See K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55.

[3] Broadening access to land is the main focus of this programme.

[4] Providing security of title is the main focus of this programme.

[5] Restoring land or rights in land or compensating claimants in certain circumstances is the main focus of this programme.

[6] In this regard, reform has occurred and is still taking place in relation to minerals and water. See PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg & Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Edition, 2006) Chapters 23 and 24; H Thompson Water Law: A Practical Approach to Resource Management and the Provision of Services (2006).

[7] Even Latin American countries, which have been in the forefront of land reform and constitutional mechanisms for providing land reform and agrarian protective measures, have nothing as comprehensive as the South African Bill of Rights. For example, art 171 of the Bolivian Constitution protects the social, economic and cultural rights of indigenous people, especially with regard to communal lands of origin, and guarantees the sustainable utilization of their natural resources, their identity, values, languages, customs and institutions. Article 5 XXVI of the Brazilian Constitution provides merely that small rural properties, when worked by families, cannot be attached in cases of debt.

the proper approach to interpreting legislation enacted to give effect to the constitutional land provisions, and the relationship between land, culture and customary law.

48.2 Drafting History

The Interim Constitution contained positive rights to restitution of land rights in IC ss 121 to 123, but did not provide for rights in respect of redistribution and tenure reform. Indeed, the property clause in IC s 28 did not refer to land or land reform at all. This left land reform measures, especially those falling outside the restitution sub-component of the programme, vulnerable to constitutional challenge under IC s 28. The first draft of the Bill of Rights[1] in the Final Constitution[2] proposed two alternative solutions to this problem: a property clause that included land reform provisions; or no property clause at all.[3] Some submissions thus argued that a separate land clause should be included to provide for all the sub-components of the land reform programmes, and not only for restitution.[4] Other submissions recommended that the property clause provide for positive rights to land, including restitution,[5] redistribution and tenure security.[6] The intention behind these latter submissions was that the property clause should strike a balance between the protection of existing property rights and the promotion of socio-economic rights to land and tenure security.[7] Ultimately, it was this view that prevailed.

In addition to the positive provisions on land reform, an affirmative action or restitutionary justice clause was inserted in FC s 25(8). The intention behind this clause appears have been to place beyond doubt the notion that 'land, water and related reform in order to redress the results of past racial discrimination' constitute a protected constitutional purpose.[8]

[1] Theme Committee 4 was responsible for drafting the fundamental rights provisions of the Final Constitution and Theme Committee 6 was responsible for drafting the provisions concerning the specialized structures of government.

[2] For the historical background to the property clause in the Interim Constitution, see A Eisenberg 'Land' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS3, 1998) 40-1–40-5.

[3] Theme Committee 4 Draft Bill of Rights (9 October 1995). The right to property was not entrenched in the Constitutional Principles in IC Schedule 4, meaning that the exclusion of the property clause from the Final Constitution was notionally possible.

[4] Submission by the Land and Agricultural Policy Centre to the Constitutional Assembly Theme Committee 6 Workshop on Issues Associated with Land Rights (DATE).

[5] IC ss 121-123, which provided for restitution, did not form part of the chapter on fundamental rights.

[6] In addition to these positive measures it was proposed that land be excluded from the property clause, ie that the property clause be qualified by the provision that it would not apply to land. See Constitutional Assembly Theme Committee 6 Specialized Structures of Government: Draft Report by Theme Committee 6 (11 September 1995) 22.

[7] These rights could be used to balance other rights in the Constitution, to test the validity of legislation, as a guide in the interpretation of legislation, and as a criterion to test the justifiability of administrative action. Memorandum to Theme Committee 6.3 Draft Formulation on Land Rights (11 September 1995) See also Van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (supra) 1-4.

[8] Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights' (supra) at 1-73.

48.3 Land Rights in the Final Constitution

The White Paper on South African Land Policy sets out the fourfold purpose of land reform: (a) to redress the injustices of apartheid; (b) to foster national reconciliation and stability; (c) to underpin economic growth; and (d) to improve household welfare and alleviate poverty.[1] These policy objectives are inevitably interconnected with FC s 25. In one of the first cases that dealt with property rights, First National Bank of SA Limited t/a Wesbank v Commissioner for the SA Revenue Services; First National Bank of SA t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance, the Constitutional Court held that:

> The purpose of section 25 has to be seen as protecting existing property rights as well as serving the public interest, mainly in the sphere of land reform, but not limited thereto, and also as striking a proportionate balance between these two functions.[2]

Accordingly, the property clause can be divided into two distinct parts: the first consists of FC s 25(1)-(3), which aims to protect existing property rights and delimit the scope of that protection.[3] The second, FC s 25(4)-(9), deals with land reform and related matters. Whereas the Interim Constitution granted positive rights to restitution only, the Final Constitution grants constitutional protection to land redistribution and tenure reform as well.[4] Although these land rights place legal obligations on the legislator, the exact nature and extent of these obligations are still uncertain. The rights go further than the imposition of negative obligations,[5] and place a positive obligation on the state to enact legislation providing for land redistribution, tenure security and restitution.[6]

In Government of the RSA v Grootboom, the Constitutional Court held that the land rights in FC s 25 form part of the cluster of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution.[7] This idea was further developed in Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign.[8]

[1] Department of Land Affairs White Paper on South African Land Policy (1997) v. The publication of the White Paper was preceded by the publication of the Green Paper on Land Reform in February 1997.

[2] 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 50.

[3] For a discussion of the remainder of FC s 25, see T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46. See also PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (4th Edition, 2003) 489; Van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (supra) at 12-13.

[4] But see Joubert v Van Rensburg 2001 (1) SA 753 (W)('Joubert') at paras 43-44. This decision was later overturned on appeal. See Mkangeli v Joubert 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 316 (CC). For further discussion, see § 48.7*(b)*(iv) infra.

[5] A negative obligation entails that the legislator may not enact legislation which would make people landless or threaten their tenure security, except under very limited circumstances. See G Budlender 'Towards a Right to Housing' in AJ van der Walt Land Reform and the Future of Land Ownership in South Africa (1991) 45-47.

[6] P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights: Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 67.

[7] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at para 19. For more detail, see Liebenberg (supra) at 33-7–33-8 and 33-22–33-23.

[8] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC); 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) 94. See also Liebenberg (supra) at 33-24–33-32.

Even though there is no explicit provision providing for a 'right to land', the second part of FC s 25 provides for inter-connected sub-programmes in which this distinct form of socio-economic right may be realized.[1]

48.4 Interpreting Land Legislation

A plethora of legislation has been enacted to give effect to the constitutional rights underpinning each sub-programme of land reform. We refer to this legislation collectively as 'land legislation' and in this section of the chapter make some brief comments on how the interpretation of this cluster of legislation should be approached.

The first factor that influences the interpretation of land legislation is the historical injustice the legislation seeks to address. These injustices were well captured by Sachs J in Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers:

> [A] cluster of statutes . . . gave a legal/administrative imprimatur to the usurpation and forced removal of black people from land and compelled them to live in racially designated locations. For all black people, dispossession was nine-tenths of the law. Residential segregation was the cornerstone of the apartheid policy. This policy was aimed at creating separate 'countries' for Africans within South Africa. Africans were precluded from owning and occupying land outside the areas reserved for them by these statutes. . . . Differentiation on the basis of race was, accordingly, not only a source of grave assaults on the dignity of black people. It resulted in the creation of large, well-established and affluent white urban areas co-existing, side-by-side, with crammed pockets of impoverished and insecure black ones. The principles of ownership of Roman-Dutch law then gave legitimation in an apparently neutral and impartial way to the consequences of manifestly racist and partial laws and policies.[2]

The next major theme relevant to interpreting land legislation is the constitutional context. In terms of FC s 39(2), courts interpreting legislation must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. What, then, is the 'constitutional matrix' into which the constitutional land provisions fit? Two types of constitutional provision are relevant: the founding values of the Final Constitution; and the (other) rights in the Bill of Rights.

The Court in PE Municipality, interpreting the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act,[3] noted that the 'starting and end point of the analysis must be to affirm the values of human dignity, equality and freedom'.[4] We agree with Budlender that these values are likely to have a 'tilt' effect when interpreting land legislation in favour of an interpretation that gives greater weight to the rights and interests of the vulnerable and landless.[5]

[1] Liebenberg (supra) at 33-1–33-2.
[2] 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC)('PE Municipality') at paras 9-10.
[3] Act 19 of 1998 ('the PIE Act').
[4] PE Municipality (supra) at para 15.
[5] Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights' (supra) at 1-69.

Relevant founding values also include the rule of law, which the Constitutional Court has stated is crucially important in the land reform process.[1] The Court has emphasized that the Final Constitution is strongly committed to orderly land reform, and does not sanction arbitrary seizures of land, whether by the state or by landless people.[2] In President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA & Others, Amici Curiae*)* ('Modderklip'), the Constitutional Court held that the state is 'required to take reasonable steps … to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur in the wake of the execution of court orders [concerning illegal land occupation], thus undermining the rule of law'.[3]

Another constitutional value relevant to the interpretation of land legislation is ubuntu. Ubuntu reflects a commitment to communality and the interdependence of the members of a community, a respect for life and human dignity, humanness, social justice and fairness, and an emphasis on reconciliation rather than confrontation.[4] Ubuntu and its underlying values are certainly relevant when considering customary law notions of communal ownership of land. Although not expressly referred to in the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court has on a number of occasions stated that ubuntu has a place among the founding values.[5] In PE Municipality, the Constitutional Court specifically emphasized the role of ubuntu in the land reform process.[6] Although ubuntu is a multi-faceted value and courts have emphasized different aspects of ubuntu in different cases,[7] in our view it is relevant to land reform in at least two of its dimensions: communality (of land ownership) and a preference for mediation and reconciliation over adversarial confrontation.

The right to dignity in FC s 10 must play a role in the interpretation of land legislation, since FC s 25 seeks to repair the 'grave assaults on the dignity of black people' inflicted by apartheid dispossession.[8] One means of giving effect to the right to dignity when interpreting land legislation is to prefer an interpretation that promotes the autonomy and choice of the landless, whom the legislation seeks to benefit, over an interpretation in terms of which they are to be silent, grateful recipients of whatever benefit the state decides to confer.

[1] PE Municipality (supra) at para 20.
[2] Ibid. See also Grootboom (supra) at para 92.
[3] 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) at para 43.
[4] C Himonga & C Bosch 'The Application of African Customary Law under the Constitution of South Africa: Problems Solved or Just Beginning?' (2000) 117 SALJ 306, 311-12. See also M Pieterse '"Traditional" African Jurisprudence' in C Roederer & D Moellendorf (eds) Jurisprudence (2006) 442.
[5] See Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae*)* 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 45; S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 130, 224-225, 263 and 308; Az*anian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) v President of the Republic of South Africa* 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC) at para 19; Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 38.
[6] PE Municipality (supra) at para 37.
[7] See Pieterse (supra) at 445-47.
[8] PE Municipality (supra) at para 10.

The Court in PE Municipality noted the broad overlap between FC s 25 and FC s 26, and remarked that 'the stronger the right to land, the greater the prospect of a secure home'.[1] In Grootboom, dealing with the right of 'access to adequate housing' in FC s 26, Yacoob J held that '[f]or a person to have access to adequate housing all of these conditions must be met: there must be land, there must be services, there must be a dwelling' (emphasis added).[2] Therefore, land reform is a necessary precondition for the realization of the right of access to adequate housing. In practice, the two programmes complement each other and must be implemented contemporaneously.

Finally, the administrative justice right in FC s 33 (as embodied in PAJA[3]) and the right of access to information in FC s 32 (as embodied in PAIA[4]) will be relevant to the interpretation of the process provisions of land legislation. Decisions taken by organs of state in terms of land legislation may constitute 'administrative action' which may be reviewable in terms of s 6 of PAJA.

FC s 25(5), (6) and (7) (read with FC s 25(9)) provide a constitutional mandate for the enactment of legislation to give effect to the rights contained in these provisions, although each of these subsections does so in different terms. For present purposes, it is sufficient to note that the requirement of super-ordinate legislation has a number of implications. First, the express constitutional mandate for legislation in an area may give that legislation an extra layer of insulation against constitutional attack. Where land legislation implicates conflicting, but constitutionally protected, interests, and the specific Act prioritizes, for example, tenure reform over other property rights, the express constitutional requirement for such legislation may, to some extent, 'tilt' the balance in defence of such a statute, even if not rendering land legislation immune to constitutional challenge.[5] Secondly, the legislation enacted to give effect to constitutional land rights must be interpreted as doing just this. This principle has been established in respect of similar legislation required to give effect to other constitutional rights: the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 ('the LRA'), which gives effect to the labour rights in FC s 23; PAJA, which gives effect to the right to lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair administrative action in FC s 33; PAIA, which gives effect to the right of access to information in FC s 32; and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 2 of 2000 ('PEPUDA'), which gives effect to the right to equality in FC s 9. In relation to these statutes, the Constitutional Court has held that litigants must rely on the relevant Act and may not go behind it and rely directly on the

[1] PE Municipality (supra) at para 19.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 35. See also K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) at 55-34–55-35.

[3] Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 ('PAJA').

[4] Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000 ('PAIA').

[5] See Budlender 'The Constitutional Protection of Property Rights' (supra) at 1-69.

constitutional provision.[1] However, litigants may rely on the constitutional provisions to challenge the relevant statute on the basis that it fails adequately to give effect to the constitutional right, and if found wanting the Court may make a declaration of invalidity coupled with any of the usual remedies.[2] Thirdly, the interpretation and application of legislation enacted to give effect to a constitutional right is always a constitutional matter falling within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.[3] This is so even in cases in which the parties do not contend that the relevant land legislation is constitutionally deficient.

48.5 Land, Culture and Customary Law

The relationship between land, culture (cultural rights) and customary law is crucial to understanding the constitutional commitment to land reform in FC s 25 and the land legislation. It goes beyond mere interpretive relevance: as we shall see in Richtersveld, customary law rights have a substantive affect on the application of FC s 25 and the land legislation.[4]

In 1903, the South African Native Affairs Commission (Langden Commission), which was appointed to determine a 'common understanding' on 'native policy' in the four colonies,[5] recommended the territorial segregation of black and white. It suggested the creation of 'native reserves': distinct territories of exclusively African occupation. The Commission contended that the reserves had a historical and legal basis: natives had 'distinct rights' to the reserved lands as 'ancestral lands held by their forefathers'. These distinct rights of tenure were regarded as a form of communal or group ownership under which the 'Tribal Chief' administered the land in trust for the community. The chiefs, however, had (according to the Report) voluntarily transferred their sovereign rights of administration to the Crown by 'peaceful annexation'.

This account indicates how the colonial authorities set about building a (purported) legal and historical bridge between the existing customary law rights that their occupation had usurped, and a future system based on legislated racial segregation. The Report sought to legitimize this transition and process of dispossession by asserting two main claims: first, that the 'native reserves' to be created were, in fact, the true traditional tribal lands of the black communities;

[1] Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC)('Bato Star') at para 25; Minister of Health v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('New Clicks') at para 96; National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC)('NEHAWU') at paras 14-16.

[2] New Clicks (supra) at para 96.

[3] PE Municipality (supra) at para 7; Alexkor Ltd v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC)('Richtersveld (CC)') at para 23. In the context of the LRA and the right to fair labour practices in FC s 23, see NEHAWU (supra) at paras 14-15; National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa & Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd & Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC) at para 15. In the context of the interpretation and application of PAJA, see Bato Star (supra) at para 25.

[4] See § 48.8*(c)*(iii) below.

[5] For a discussion of the Langden Report, see I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional & Administrative Law (2001) 51-52.

and, secondly, that their chiefs had voluntarily surrendered authority and control over those lands to the Crown. Therefore, to the extent that customary law rights in land were not simply ignored, they were subordinated to the common law and to the authority of the colonial state.

In Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae*)* ('Bhe'), the Court described the place of customary law in the new constitutional dispensation:

> Quite clearly the Constitution itself envisages a place for customary law in our legal system. Certain provisions of the Constitution put it beyond doubt that our basic law specifically requires that customary law should be accommodated, not merely tolerated, as part of South African law, provided the particular rules or provisions are not in conflict with the Constitution. Sections 30 and 31 of the Constitution entrench respect for cultural diversity. Further, s 39(2) specifically requires a court interpreting customary law to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. In similar vein, s 39(3) states that the Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by customary law as long as they are consistent with the Bill of Rights. Finally, s 211 protects those institutions that are unique to customary law. It follows from this that customary law must be interpreted by the courts, as first and foremost answering to the contents of the Constitution. It is protected by and subject to the Constitution in its own right.[1]

Therefore, customary law rights in land are recognized in the same way as common-law or statutory rights in land, provided that they are consistent with the Final Constitution. The pre-constitutional disdain for customary law rights was condemned in Richtersveld:

> While in the past indigenous law was seen through the common-law lens, it must now be seen as an integral part of our law. Like all law it depends for its ultimate force and validity on the Constitution. Its validity must now be determined by reference not to common law, but to the Constitution.[2]

The Final Constitution therefore seeks to revive customary law in respect of land, which had until 1994, been variously distorted, misinterpreted, ignored and made subordinate to both statute and common law. In addition, customary law, which is a 'living' body of law,[3] has developed in its own right.

In Bhe, in the context of the customary law of succession, the Constitutional Court described the customary law of 'ownership' of property as follows:

> Property was collectively owned and the family head, who was the nominal owner of the property, administered it for the benefit of the family unit as a whole. The heir stepped into the shoes of the family head and acquired all the rights and became subject to all the obligations of the family head. The members of the family under the guardianship of the deceased fell under the guardianship of his heir. The latter, in turn, acquired the duty to [1] 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 41 (footnotes omitted).

[2] Richtersveld (CC) at para 51.
[3] Bhe (supra) at paras 86-87.

> maintain and support all the members of the family who were assured of his protection and enjoyed the benefit of the heir's maintenance and support. He inherited the property of the deceased only in the sense that he assumed control and administration of the property subject to his rights and obligations as head of the family unit.[1]

Property is therefore generally owned collectively, although some property is regarded as 'individual property'. Depending on the nature of communal property, collective 'ownership' vests in different units of the community. 'Family' property is managed by the head of the family for the benefit of all members of the extended family; 'house' property is exploited for the sustenance of members of a particular 'house'.[2] Land, too, is common property, allocated to particular community members or family units by chiefs, but remaining the 'property' of the community as a whole.[3] As leaders of their nations, chiefs enjoyed a range of powers over land, including the right to demand a tribute from the harvest or hunt, and to reserve the best land for themselves.[4] Traditionally, they had the power to establish new realms, make out royal homesteads or 'zone' the land for grazing or farming.[5] Today, however, their most important power is to allot plots of land to subjects on which to farm and live, a decision now most often made in practice by local wardheads.[6] The constitutional rights to culture in FC ss 30 and 31, read with FC s 39(3) and FC s 211, which recognize customary law, require the legislature (through land legislation) and the courts to give effect to customary law principles relating to land rights and the roles of traditional leaders and communities in administering communal land.

48.6 FC s 25(5): Redistribution

(a) Introduction

Under FC s 25(5), '[t]he state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to foster conditions which enable citizens to gain access to land on an equitable basis.' This subsection has both a positive dimension and a negative dimension.[7] Although it does not specifically provide that everyone has a right to land, the requirement that the state 'foster conditions which enable citizens to gain access to land' imposes a positive obligation on the state to [1] Bhe (supra) at para 76.

[2] Pieterse (supra) at 454; CRM Dlamini 'The Role of Customary Law in Meeting Social Needs' (1991) Acta Juridica 71, 82.
[3] Pieterse (supra) at 454.
[4] T Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 26-56–26-57.
[5] Ibid at 26-57.
[6] Ibid.
[7] E Lahiff & S Rugege 'A Critical Assessment of the Land Redistribution Policy in the Light of the Grootboom Judgement' (2002) 6(2) Law, Democracy and Development 279, 285.

provide adequate and appropriate assistance to people who do not have access to land. Following Grootboom, this obligation may be used to compel the state to act reasonably, especially in relation to meeting the needs of the most vulnerable members of society.[1] At the same time, the duty to 'foster conditions' places the state under a negative obligation to ensure that there are no impediments to the provision of access to land.[2]

The phrase 'legislative and other means' has been interpreted to mean that the state is under an obligation to take immediate steps towards the realization of the right in question.[3] In international law this formulation is understood to mean that legislation is not mandatory, but that it may nevertheless be highly desirable and in some cases even indispensable.[4] Furthermore, legislation on its own is not sufficient.[5] Other measures include 'administrative, financial, educational and social measures',[6] and 'the establishment of social programmes, the creation of appropriate bodies, and the establishment of other procedures as well as the adoption and implementation of appropriate bodies and detailed plans by the government'.[7]

'[R]easonable legislative and other measures' suggests that measures adopted by the state can be reviewed both for their reasonableness and for the extent to which they make progress in the implementation of the right.[8] In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court found that the state has discretion in determining the nature of the policies to be adopted, the specific legislative measures to be drafted and their

[1] See Grootboom (supra) at 93. In Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC')(both declaratory and mandatory orders were given). Lahiff & Rugege contend that poor people with no access to land or whose access is inadequate or precarious may demand that the state implement a programme which makes secure access to land possible. Lahiff & Rugege (supra) at 285.

[2] Flemming DJP in Joubert v Van Rensburg 2001 (1) SA 753 (W) at para 43.2 interpreted this phrase to mean 'circumstances which make it easier to acquire, for example, subsidised interest rates or purchase prices, or enriched prices for products. It does not mean that a statute may protect an occupier who insists on taking — gratis.'

[3] Such steps should be 'deliberate, concrete and targeted as clearly as possible towards meeting the obligations'. UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment No 3 'The Nature of State Parties' Obligations' (Fifth Session, 1990) UN doc E/1991/23 ('GC 3'). The requirement of immediate steps is reflected in the fact that the drafters omitted to include the qualifying phrase 'towards the progressive realization of the right', which would have given the state the option of achieving the right progressively rather than immediately.

[4] Ibid.

[5] P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights: Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 67, 67.

[6] Constitutional Committee Supplementary Memorandum on the Bill of Rights and party submissions.

[7] GC 3 (supra).

[8] This obligation is similar to the obligation which will in any event be incumbent on South Africa when it ratifies the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1966. In terms of this covenant, legislative measures are needed to establish the framework and to regulate judicial supervision of these rights (art 2(1)). See also A Pillay 'Reviewing Reasonableness: An Appropriate Standard for Evaluating State Action and Inaction?' (2005) 122 SALJ 419, 430.

implementation.[1] The Court, however, found that it was imperative that the programme chosen should be capable of facilitating the realization of the right:[2]

> The precise contours and content of the measures to be adopted are a matter for the Legislature and the Executive. They must, however, ensure that the measures they adopt are reasonable... A court considering reasonableness will not enquire whether other more desirable or favourable measures could have been adopted, or whether public money could have been better spent. The question would be whether the measures that have been adopted are reasonable. It is necessary to recognise that a wide range of possible measures could be adopted by the State to meet its obligations. Many of these would meet the requirement of reasonableness. Once it is shown that the measures do so, this requirement is met.[3]

The Court made it clear that the reasonableness requirement does not only relate to the way the programme is conceived. The programme must also be reasonable in the way it is implemented: 'The formulation of a program is only the first stage in meeting the State's obligations ... An otherwise reasonable programme that is not implemented reasonably will not constitute compliance with the State's obligations.'[4] Thus, in order to determine whether 'reasonable legislative and other measures' have been taken, the conception and design of a programme as well as the manner, pace and extent of its implementation must be considered. The state's capacity to implement its programmes is also a factor. In this regard, the Grootboom Court emphasized the need for co-ordinated action between the different levels of government and the responsibilities of each: a 'reasonable program therefore must clearly allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensure that the appropriate financial and human resources are available.'[5] Although land matters fall within the functional area of national government, this requirement is equally applicable to FC s 25 in so far as the co-operation of different levels of government is necessary for the effective implementation of land reform.

An internal limitation, similar to the one found in the other socio-economic rights, appears in the form of the phrase 'available resources' in FC s 25(5). This phrase qualifies the state's duty to realize the right.[6] In the words of the Grootboom Court:

> The third defining aspect of the obligation to take the requisite measures is that the obligation does not require the State to do more than its available resources permit. This

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 41.
[2] See S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-33–33-35.
[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 41.
[4] Ibid at para 42.
[5] Ibid at para 39.
[6] Liebenberg (supra) at 33-44, 33-55–33-57.

> means that both the content of the obligation in relation to the rate at which it is achieved as well as the reasonableness of the measures employed to achieve the result are governed by the availability of resources.[1]

This proviso does not mean, however, that the state has complete discretion to determine the resources available for the realization of the right in question.[2] The term 'available resources' must be understood as referring to the total available resources of a country, including resources available from the international community through co-operation and assistance.[3]

The phrase 'access to land on an equitable basis' is clearly not restricted to measures aimed at delivering ownership, but may encompass other rights to land as well.[4] The formulation 'on an equitable basis' implies that redistribution programmes are especially aimed at redressing historical imbalances in land ownership. Accordingly, the poor are not the sole focus. Everyone who has been marginalized and excluded from land ownership as a result of past racially discriminatory legislation and practices may benefit from the programme. Portions of the community who are not necessarily poor still stand to benefit, for example, from farmer settlement programmes.

The state's sub-programme of land redistribution is embodied both in legislation and in policy measures dealing with grants, subsidies and other forms of financial assistance. According to the White Paper on South African Land Policy[5] the main aim of the redistribution programme is to provide access to land for the landless for both residential and productive purposes.[6] When the redistribution programme was first embarked on, the intention was to assist particularly the urban and rural poor, farm workers, labour tenants and emerging farmers.[7] The legislation enabling redistribution was directed at a very specific category of beneficiaries.[8] Although access to land may also be linked to the creation of new tenure forms, it is not the main aim of the redistribution programme.[9]

The following section deals with an overview of the enabling legislation and policy measures that have been adopted under the redistribution programme. It

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 46.

[2] De Vos (supra) at 69.

[3] Ibid at 72. This is very important because there are extensive foreign funding resources available for land reform.

[4] See in this regard the concept of 'new order' rights as provided for in the Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004. Although there is no content given to 'new order rights' in this Act, it is clear that not only ownership is intended since some of the use rights that may be acquired can be upgraded to ownership at a later stage. The point of departure seems to be that new order rights have to be secure tenure rights. See § 48.7*(b)*(v) infra.

[5] Department of Land Affairs White Paper on South African Land Policy (1997)('White Paper on Land Policy').

[6] FC s 25(5) should be read with FC s 26(1) and (2).

[7] White Paper on Land Policy (supra) at ix.

[8] Ngcobo v Van Rensburg 1999 (2) SA 525 (LCC), [1997] 4 All SA 537 (LCC)('Ngcobo')(Labour tenants); Venter v Claasen 2001 (1) SA 720 (LCC)(Occupiers: a' specific class of persons that had been exploited in the past and who are still extremely vulnerable in relation to their tenure'.)

[9] See § 48.7 infra.

focuses on the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996 ('the Labour Tenants Act') and the Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997 ('the ESTA').[1] Reference will also be made to the Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1993, as amended by Act 26 of 1998, as well as to the Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998 ('the TCRA'). The Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 ('the CLRA'), which is an attempt to give effect both to FC s 25(5) (provision of access to land) and FC s 25(6) (tenure reform) will be dealt with in the tenure reform section below.

(b) Enabling legislation

(i) Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996

The main aims of the Act are to (a) provide adequate protection against exploitation and eviction of labour tenants;[2] and (b) to provide access to land by enabling acquisition of land or rights in land by labour tenants in particular circumstances.

(aa) Beneficiaries

The Act was drafted to benefit a particular category of land user only:[3] a person who presently has, or had in the past, the right to reside on a farm; has or had the right to use cropping or grazing land on the farm or another farm of the owner, and in consideration of such right provides or has provided labour[4] to the owner or lessee; and whose parent or grandparent resided or resides on a farm or had the use of cropping or grazing land on such farm or another farm of the owner; and in consideration of such right provided or provides labour to the owner or lessee. This category would embrace a successor of a labour tenant,[5] but exclude a farm worker.[6]

[1] Although the ESTA fits equally comfortably in the redistribution and the tenure reform programmes, it will be discussed in more detail as part of the tenure reform programme. See § 48.7*(b)*(iv) infra. Only the sections dealing with access to land will be mentioned in this section.

[2] Sections dealing with the regulation of eviction also provide for tenure security in that the insecure labour tenancy relationship that existed prior to the new land dispensation has been amended by providing secure rights to labour tenants.

[3] Labour Tenants Act s 1. Moshela v Sancor 1999 (1) SA 614 (T)(Confirmed that labour tenancy is not a dictionary term, but a technical one and that the facts have to be specified in order to support the allegation of labour tenancy.) See also JM Pienaar 'Labour Tenancy: Recent Developments in Case Law' (1998) Stellenbosch LR 311; W Freedman 'Labour Tenants Act: Whom Does it Protect?' (2000) 117 SALJ 449.

[4] See Deo Volento Rusoord BK v Shongwe 2006 (2) SA 5 (LCC)(None of the respondents or their families provided labour to the land owner. However, when they were children they did work for the farm owner during the school holidays or over weekends for which they (and not their parents) were paid daily. The labour they provided did not replace that of their parents. The court found that it was a way of earning pocket money only and that it was not in 'exchange for' the right to reside on the property (at 7F).)

[5] Labour Tenants Act s 1.

[6] Ibid. These occupiers are specifically provided for in the ESTA. See § 48.7*(b)*(iv) below.

If all of these elements are present,[1] then it is presumed that such a person is a labour tenant.[2] The benefits of labour tenancy may also be utilized by associates[3] or successors of labour tenants. Since it can be very difficult in practice to establish whether a person is a farm worker or a labour tenant, the combined effect of all agreements entered into is taken into account.[4] Why is it so important to distinguish between farm workers and labour tenants if both these categories of tenants fall within the overall redistribution programme, and recent legislative amendments have sought to remove some of the distinctions and instead to bring these forms of tenancy closer together?[5]

Various reasons for still adhering to this category distinction may be offered. First, the historical context of these two tenancy forms differs: labour tenancy is clearly a tenancy that involves second- or third-generation tenants, whereas farm workers qualify for benefits under the ESTA even if they are only first-generation occupiers.[6] In fact, it is possible that new occupiers will continue to settle on land and that the ESTA will apply to them.[7] Secondly, although the broad aims of the two pieces of legislation are very similar, they do not provide identical protection and benefits. For example, only farm workers (or other occupiers under the ESTA) have burial rights.[8] Labour tenants who have applied for land rights do not need similar protection, since they are land owners in their own right.[9] Thirdly, the underlying idea of the labour tenancy legislation is that labour tenancy is to be

[1] Initially there were split decisions concerning whether all of the requirements in paras (a), (b) and (c) had to be met or whether it was sufficient if only two of the three requirements were met. Since the decision in Ngcobo, it is clear that only beneficiaries that meet all of the above requirements fall within the ambit of the Act.

[2] See Woerman NO & Another v Masondo & Others 2002 (1) SA 811 (SCA), [2002] 2 All SA 53 (SCA). See also M Euijen & C Plasket 'Constitutional Protection of Property and Land Reform' Annual Survey of South African Law (2002) 545.

[3] An 'associate' is a family member of a labour tenant or any other person who has been nominated in terms of s 3(4) as the successor of such labour tenant. This becomes relevant when a labour tenant has died or has become mentally ill or is unable to manage his or her affairs due to another disability or when such a labour tenant leaves the farm voluntarily without appointing a successor. An associate is also a family member that has been nominated to provide labour in the labour tenant's stead, eg as provided for in s 4(1).

[4] Labour Tenants Act s 2(6).

[5] The Land Affairs General Amendment Act 51 of 2001.

[6] Special circumstances can, however, lead to a person being proclaimed to be a 'long-term occupier' under s 8(4) of the ESTA which generally enables that person to retire on the farm and remain there until death. In these circumstances the length of occupation is indeed relevant (10 years or more), but it is not linked to generations of occupiers as such. The other requirement for being identified as a long-term occupier is that the person must be 60 years of age (or older).

[7] Although possible in theory, it is not the existing practice. Fewer occupiers are being housed on farms today than ever before — especially as farm workers. The question can rightly be asked whether ESTA is succeeding, given that evictions from farms are exacerbating the already backlogged provision of housing in urban and peri-urban areas. See M Wegerif, B Russel & I Grundling Still Searching for Security: The Reality of Farm Dweller Evictions in South Africa (2005)(Deals with evictions for the period 1984-2004); W du Plessis, NJJ Olivier & JM Pienaar 'Land Matters' 2005 (2) SAPR/PL 435.

[8] For more detail, see § 48.7*(b)*(iv)(ee)(3) infra..

[9] This proposition holds only if former labour tenants have applied successfully and acquired ownership or other rights in land. In that case, as owners, they are free to utilize their land according to their own needs, within lawful limits.

phased out as a form of land control. The redistributive objectives of the Act are accomplished by enabling labour tenants to apply for land or rights in land and to become land owners themselves.[1] The underlying idea of the ESTA, on the other hand, is not to eradicate the institution of farm workers as such, but to prevent the exploitation of this form of tenancy and to provide protection against eviction. One way of doing so, of course, is through the acquisition of land or land rights. Chapter II of the ESTA provides for this form of redistribution.[2]

In our view, the continued distinctions between various (rural) tenants are not ideal. The different eviction proceedings applicable to each category places an additional burden on applicants to categorize occupiers before instituting eviction proceedings.[3] The lack of progressive development under chapter II of the ESTA (which provides for long-term security), in comparison to chapter III of the Labour Tenants Act, further highlights unjustified discrepancies between the different forms of redistribution contemplated by the two Acts.

Because it may be difficult in practice to determine whether one is dealing with a labour tenant or a farm worker, various guidelines have been developed in the case law. The main difference between a labour tenant and a farm worker is that the latter is paid predominantly in cash or in another form of remuneration, but not predominantly by making use of the property (cropping and grazing rights as well as occupation of land).

Landman & Another v Ndlozi; Landman v Gama & Another held that the evaluation need not necessarily be made from the employee's perspective.[4] Gildenhuys J wrote that in some instances the value (of using the land) would have to be determined from the perspective of the employer, in other instances from that of the employee and in yet other instances by objective standards. The court also found that the whole period of employment had to be considered. In other words, the value of each component for the whole period the person (occupier or labour tenant) ostensibly met the requirements of the relevant Act has to be determined.[5]

[1] Chapter III of the Labour Tenants Act. See § 48.2*(a)*(iii) infra.

[2] Due to the complexity of this procedure and to the fact that numerous role players have to be involved in a successful venture, this method of land redistribution has not been very successful. It would, for example, require a good working relationship and partnership between the land owner, the occupier and invariably also the local authority. Other factors like limited funding, non-availability of land and no or limited capacity on local government level impede its success further.

[3] Yet other unlawful occupiers (squatters or persons holding-over) in relation to residential property or constructions being used for purposes of a home are dealt with in accordance with the Prevention of Illegal Eviction and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 ('the PIE Act'). Thus, three different pieces of legislation become relevant when eviction is intended. Unlawful occupation from business premises is still regulated by common law. See PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Edition, 2006) Chapters 11 and 22.

[4] 2005 (4) SA 89 (LCC)('Landman').

[5] Factors in this determination — as set out in Landman – include the value of maize that they received per month, the value of being allowed to keep cattle and other animals on the land, the use of structures on the land for housing and other purposes; and the value of having a small vegetable garden on the land. In Landman, the value of making use of the property by far outweighed the monetary remuneration that the tenants received per month — thereby establishing labour tenancy. With regard to cropping rights, see *Msiza v Uy*s 2005 (2) SA 456 (LCC)(Moloto J held that it was not the value of the input costs that were relevant, but the value of the benefit derived from the cropping activity that had to be taken into account.)

(bb) Labour tenants' rights

A labour tenant has the right to use and occupy a specific portion of land with his or her family.[1] Labour tenants' security of tenure is promoted in that these rights may only be terminated in accordance with the Act. In practice, a labour tenant's use and occupational rights are usually terminated by a waiver of rights, the death of the tenant, the eviction of the tenant once certain substantive and procedural requirements have been met, or when the labour tenant obtains vested rights in land in his or her own capacity, replacing the relationship between labour tenant and owner/employer.[2] Special provision is made for the appointment of successors to labour tenants in certain circumstances.[3] On the other hand, the landowner has the right to demand labour by the labour tenant, in exchange for these occupational and use rights.[4]

The use and occupational rights may only be terminated in accordance with the Act. Eviction obviously results in permanent deprivation. On the other hand, relocation orders result only in temporary deprivation of rights and only apply to a specific parcel of land.[5] Relocation orders are appropriate where the owner needs the specific parcel of land for agricultural purposes or if the land is needed for development which is, according to the court, of public benefit. Nevertheless, relocation orders will not be granted arbitrarily, but only if the court is satisfied that greater hardship will be done to the owner or lessee if the labour tenant is not relocated.[6] A relocation order may also coincide with an order to pay compensation to the labour tenant, in which case the relocation order will not be executed before the compensation has been paid. If the owner has not used the land for the purposes intended one year after the relocation order was granted, an application may be lodged for the reinstatement of the labour tenant to the original parcel of land.[7]

The labour tenant relationship must be terminated before eviction proceedings can take place. Provision is made for normal and urgent eviction proceedings. In normal eviction proceedings, an eviction order will be granted if it is fair and equitable in the relevant circumstances[8] and (a) if the labour tenant (or associate)

[1] Labour Tenants Act s 3(1). The relevant date for this purpose is 2 June 1995 when the Bill was first published for comment. Since the publication date coincided with large-scale evictions from land it is that date that is relevant and not the date the Act commenced, namely 22 March 1996.

[2] See Labour Tenants Act s 3. See also Badenhorst, Pienaar & Mostert Silberberg (supra) at Chapter 22.

[3] Labour Tenants Act s 3(4). If a labour tenant dies, becomes mentally ill or is unable to manage his or her affairs due to another disability or leaves the farm voluntarily without appointing a successor, then his or her family may appoint a person as his or her successor and shall, within 90 days after being called upon in writing to do so by the owner, inform the owner of the person so appointed. A family member, if acceptable by the owner, may also be appointed as successor. Such an appointment may not be denied unreasonably by the land owner.

[4] Labour Tenants Act s 4.

[5] Labour Tenants Act s 8.

[6] Labour Tenants Act s 8(4).

[7] Labour Tenants Act s 8(5).

[8] Labour Tenants Act s 7.

committed a material breach of any obligation to provide labour and has failed to remedy such a breach after one month's written notice; or (b) the labour tenant (or associate) has committed some other act which amounts to a fundamental breach of the relationship that cannot be remedied.

It is not only the landowner who may initiate eviction proceedings. However, the landowner needs to support eviction proceedings instituted by another person.[1] At least two months' written notice must be given to the labour tenant and the Director-General of Land Affairs[2] and the notice must contain the grounds for eviction.[3]

If the court is satisfied that the following requirements have been met, an urgent eviction order may be granted, pending the outcome of a final order:[4] (a) if there is real and imminent danger of substantial damage to the owner or lessee; (b) if there is no other effective remedy available; (c) if the likely harm to the owner, if the order is not issued, exceeds the likely harm to the person against whom the order is sought; and (d) if adequate arrangements have been made for the reinstatement of a person who has been removed, but the final order was not granted. Requirements for urgent eviction orders under labour tenancy legislation and the ESTA are now identical.[5]

Despite the provision for urgent and normal eviction proceedings, evictions are limited in two important respects: the first concerning the circumstances of the labour tenant and the other dealing with the process of land redistribution and how far along in this process the labour tenant has already progressed. In the first instance, a landowner is precluded from initiating eviction proceedings against a labour tenant merely because he or she has become too old (defined as 60 years or older), too frail or ill to provide labour, or is disabled.[6] If the aged labour tenant dies, the exception is also applicable to his or her associates or family members for a period of 12 months after his death, thus enabling them to find suitable accommodation without needing to be worried about eviction proceedings for at least a year. If the landowner is prejudiced by these provisions, he or she may apply for equitable relief.[7] The other limitation on eviction has to do with applications by labour tenants to acquire land or rights in land under Chapter III of the Act. If such an application is pending, the labour tenant generally may not be evicted.[8] Unfortunately, this provision has been exploited in the past, leading to the rule that the court may, despite the prohibition on eviction, order eviction

[1] Labour Tenants Act s 6(1).
[2] Labour Tenants Act s 11(1).
[3] Labour Tenants Act s 11(2).
[4] Labour Tenants Act s 15.
[5] See § 48.7*(b)*(iv)(hh) infra.
[6] Labour Tenants Act s 9(1)(a)-(b).
[7] Labour Tenants Act s 9(3). No specific provisions are given regarding this form of relief other than that it has to be just and equitable in the circumstances.
[8] Van der Walt v Lang 1999 (1) SA 189 (LCC).

if it is satisfied that special circumstances exist which make it fair, just and equitable to do so, taking into account all relevant considerations.[1]

The right to legal representation for persons whose tenure has been threatened or infringed was confirmed in Nkuzi Development Association v Government of the RSA.[2] Although the labour tenancy legislation and the ESTA were drafted in order to give effect to FC s 25, the court found, the reality was that:

> a very large number of the people for whose benefit the Labour Tenants Act and ESTA were enacted, do not enjoy that entitlement when their right are infringed or threatened with infringement. This is so because they are overwhelmingly poor and vulnerable people with little or no formal education. When their tenure security is threatened or infringed, they so not understand the documents initiating action or the processes to follow in order to defend their rights. On the one hand they cannot afford the fees for a lawyer to represent them because of their poverty. As a result they are quite often unable to defend or enforce their rights and their entitlement under the Constitution, the Labour Tenants Act and ESTA.[3]

Consequently many litigants appeared in court unrepresented. The Nkuzi court accordingly ordered that indigent persons whose tenure security is threatened or infringed under these statutory measures have a right to legal representation or legal aid at state expense if substantial injustice would otherwise result. The state or its agents are entitled to adopt a screening process to establish whether the person concerned is entitled to legal aid or legal representation.

(cc) Redistribution of land — acquisition of land rights under chapter III of the Act

Labour tenants may lodge an application for an award of land or land rights or for financial assistance.[4] Applicants can apply for ownership of the portion of land they are using and occupying, or another portion of land elsewhere that they or their predecessors used and occupied for a period of at least five years prior to 22 March 1996,[5] and of which they had been illegally deprived.[6] It is also possible for labour tenants to apply for another parcel of land elsewhere on the land on which they are staying, as identified by the landowner. In order to utilize the land effectively, the application may be brought together with an application for other limited real rights, such as servitudes of water or right of way. These additional rights will be granted if they are reasonably necessary or reasonably consistent with the rights previously enjoyed by the labour tenant.[7]

The owner of the land subject to such an application must be informed. If he or she does not dispute the status of the applicant, it is presumed that such a

[1] Mwelase v Hiltonian Society 2001 (4) SA 100 (LCC).
[2] 2002 (2) SA 733 (LCC)(Moloto J).
[3] Ibid at para 4.
[4] See Chapter III. See also s 16. Financial arrangements are provided for in s 26 of the Act.
[5] 22 March 1996 was the commencement date of the Act.
[6] Labour Tenants Act s 16(1)(a)-(b).
[7] Labour Tenants Act s 16(1)(c)-(d).

person is a labour tenant, until the contrary is proven.[1] If the status is questioned by the landowner, either party is free to approach the Land Claims Court for a ruling on this issue. Once the applicant's status has been clarified, the landowner may approach the Director-General of Land Affairs with other options for an equitable solution to the application, other than granting ownership to the applicant of the land identified.[2] If such a proposal is rejected by the applicant, which he or she is entitled to do, the original claim is continued. In cases where the matter cannot be resolved by the parties, the court may be approached for an order or other appropriate relief.[3]

The Labour Tenants Act therefore seeks in the first place to achieve a negotiated solution to competing land claims in a way that promotes the dignity of all participants. However, if the owner refrains from initiating settlement proposals, or if the offered proposal is rejected by the applicant, or if any agreements reached by the parties are deemed to be unreasonable or inequitable, applications for ownership and other rights in land will be referred to court or arbitration.[4]

The following factors are taken into account when an application for land rights is considered:[5] the achievement of the goals of the Act, the desirability to assist labour tenants to establish themselves on farms on a viable and sustainable basis, and considerations of equity and justice. The willingness of the owner of the affected land and the applicant to make contributions to the settlement of the application is also considered. Lodging an application, as mentioned before, means that applicants may generally not be evicted.

In line with the constitutional considerations set out in the property clause, particularly FC s 25(3), the land owner is entitled to just and equitable compensation to be determined by court or, if necessary, by an arbitrator.[6]

A successful application for land rights results in the applicant's becoming a landowner in his or her own right — achieving the underlying goal of redistribution. Although the Labour Tenants Act has national application, most of the labour tenancy applications to date have been received from Mpumalanga and KwaZulu-Natal.

(ii) Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1993

In its original form,[7] the Provision of Land and Assistance Act ('PLAA') was a remnant of the pre-constitutional era aimed at designating and subdividing land and settling persons. It was subsequently redrafted,[8] and is currently used as the main mechanism to realize the aims of the redistribution programme.

[1] Labour Tenants Act s 17(5).
[2] Labour Tenants Act s 18.
[3] Labour Tenants Act s 17(4).
[4] Labour Tenants Act s 17(7).
[5] Labour Tenants Act s 22(5).
[6] Labour Tenants Act s 23.
[7] The Provision of Certain Land for Settlement Act 126 of 1993.
[8] The Provision of Certain Land for Settlement Amendment Act 26 of 1998.

Under this Act land is designated by the Minister of Land Affairs for the purposes of redistribution. Both state and privately-owned land may be designated — the latter only after it has been made available by the owner.[1]

Development of privately-owned land may be undertaken by the state or private parties (the land owner or contractor). Afterwards, subdivision of the land takes place. The normal township establishment or subdivision of agricultural land provisions[2] are specifically excluded,[3] resulting in subdivision in accordance with a partition plan providing for small-scale farming and residential, public, community or business purposes.[4] Formal requirements include a survey of the area, approval of the plans and diagrams and filing documents at the deeds registry for registration.[5] Once a deed of transfer has been lodged at the deeds registry, registration of ownership takes place in favour of the beneficiary.[6] Settlement on the land may also be conditional.[7]

The following persons may apply for relief:[8] persons who have no land or who have limited access to land and who wish to gain access to land or to additional land, persons wishing to upgrade their land tenure or persons who have been dispossessed of their right in land but do not have a right to restitution under the Restitution of Land Rights Act.[9] Financial assistance may be used for many purposes. Grants and subsidies may also be used to acquire capital assets, to acquire a share in an existing agricultural enterprise or to facilitate planning and development.[10] Funds may be transferred to provincial governments, municipal councils or other organs of state responsible for planning or development.[11] Subsidies or grants may also be used to acquire land to be used as commonage or to extend existing commonages.[12]

The powers of the Minister to acquire land for redistribution purposes are extensive and also include the possibility of expropriation.[13] If expropriation is

[1] PLLA s 2(1).
[2] See, eg, the Prohibition of Subdivision of Agricultural Land Act 70 of 1970.
[3] PLLA s 2(4).
[4] PLLA ss 5-6.
[5] PLLA s 7.
[6] PLLA s 9.
[7] Over the years, however, the practice has been that the subdivision and utilization of land and the consequential settlement thereon are linked to the requirements of the Conservation of Agricultural Resources Act 43 of 1983 and the National Water Act 38 of 1998. It is also quite common that the densification number (of beneficiaries and settlements) and number of livestock are also regulated.
[8] The 1998 amendments to the Act have had an impact on the category of beneficiaries. The original Act allowed for the granting of an advance or subsidy 'to any person'.
[9] Act 22 of 1994. For more detail concerning the restitution programme, see § 48.8 infra.
[10] See PLLA s 10(1)(a)-(b).
[11] PLLA s 10(1)(e).
[12] PLLA s 10(1)(c).
[13] PLLA s 12(1).

deemed to be an effective tool to acquire a specific portion of land, the landowner has a right to a hearing[1] and compensation must be paid.[2]

(iii) Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998

The Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act ('the Transformation Act' or 'TCRA') is aimed at persons occupying land located only in the former Coloured rural areas. These areas were established under the Rural Areas Act (House of Representatives) 9 of 1987,[3] and originally comprised 23 pieces of land dispersed within the provincial jurisdictions of the present-day Western Cape, Northern Cape, Eastern Cape and Free State provinces. The Rural Areas Act provided for the separation of residential and agricultural zones — all for the exclusive occupation of persons belonging to the Coloured community.

The underlying idea of the Transformation Act is that the different communities should determine when and how the new dispensation in land-holding should occur.[4] It was envisaged that change would be effected independently in the different areas,[5] and should, if effective, result in 'negotiated legal reform'.[6] This commitment to the autonomy and choice of communities promotes the constitutional value of (and right to) dignity.

When implemented correctly, the Act should dismantle the existing rural land tenure regime and replace it with measures in line with the overall land reform programme, while also meeting the needs and aspirations of the community concerned. In this sense, the Act is both a redistributive measure[7] and a tenure reform tool.[8]

Two broad categories of land are relevant: (a) land in a township and (b) land in the remainder. The moment the Transformation Act came into operation, trust land situated in a township immediately vested in the relevant municipality.[9] This automatic transfer of rights did not affect existing registered or registrable rights in relation to the property concerned.[10] Township areas continued to vest in the relevant municipality.

[1] PLLA s 12(2). This position is consistent with FC s 25(1) and (2). See T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Costitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 46-33–46-35.

[2] FC s 25(3).

[3] For more detail, see D Carey-Miller & A Pope Land Title in South Africa (2000) 449-55; PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Edition, 2006) Chapter 22. Forerunners to this Act included the Rural Coloured Areas Act 24 of 1963 and the Rural Coloured Areas Amendment Act 31 of 1978.

[4] Twenty-three former coloured rural areas are identified.

[5] TCRA s 10(2)(b).

[6] See also P Wisbourg & R Rohde 'TRANCAA and Communal Land Rights: Lessons from Namaqualand' PLAAS Policy Brief (April 2003).

[7] Access to land is thereby broadened.

[8] It provides more secure tenure.

[9] TCRA s 2.

[10] Ibid.

The Act is open-ended in the sense that it does not prescribe the specific method to be used for the community to express its preferences. A consultation process resulted in the communities being able to vote in advisory referenda on the following three ownership alternatives: (a) communal property association; (b) transfer to the municipality; and (c) option of own choice — including trust ownership and individual title.

The Minister must decide to which entity or (or entities) the land must be transferred, taking into account the community's stated preference. The Minister has the power to assist the municipality or committee in making a decision.[1] This power introduces the possibility of an extended procedure since it can entail appointing a person with the specific brief to investigate and assist in writing a report indicating which entity should receive the land.[2] If the Minister is satisfied, after the extended process, then the land is transferred accordingly. If the Minister is still not satisfied, the decision lies with the Minister to which entity the property should be transferred and to take steps accordingly.[3]

Referenda in four of five areas showed a clear preference for communal property associations.[4] The low interest in individualized tenure is interesting, reflecting as it does a cultural preference for community ownership. The municipality was the choice of transfer beneficiary in only one instance.

Once the transitional period lapses, all land not transferred vests in the Minister, who holds the land and is empowered to dispose of it.[5] The transformation process has not yet been completed. In all of the relevant areas an extended procedure had to be embarked on. Although the open-endedness of the Act leaves ample room to address the needs of specific communities, it has also led to the process being drawn out.

(c) Policy documents

The policy of the first Minister of Land Affairs and Agriculture, Derek Hanekom, focused on the promotion of subsistence farmers through the provision of [1] Subject to the exclusion of the power to make regulations, the Act also provides for the general or particular delegation of powers by the Minister to either the Premier of the province or to any officer in the service of the national government. See also TCRA s 8(1).

[2] Such a designated person has a wide range of powers; inter alia, settling any disagreements in relation to land or boundaries between the parties.

[3] TCRA s 3(12)(b).

[4] Due to internal conflict the other area, Kommagas, never held a referendum.

[5] TCRA s 3(13).

Settlement/Land Allocation Grants (SLAGs).[1] The second Minister, Thoko Didiza,[2] shifted the emphasis to the promotion of black commercial farmers, through an Integrated Programme of Land Redistribution and Agricultural Development (IPLRAD). Despite the emphasis on commercial farming, there was still room in the IPLRAD for subsistence farmers, albeit at the lower end of the subsidy scale. IPLRAD, which is still in force, aims to redistribute 30 per cent of agricultural land to black owners by 2014. Whereas the initial SLAGs were once-off grants of R15 000 per family, the IPLRAD consists of a sliding scale of state grants which must be matched by a proportionate 'own contribution' by the beneficiary. Depending on the circumstances, this contribution may consist of cash, assets or labour. The main problem with the SLAG was the cost of good agricultural land. Households had to pool their resources to buy land. This need to pool resources often led to rushed attempts to form groups that lacked cohesion. The lack of cohesion led, in turn, to problems of co-ordination and overcrowded settlements.[3]

Although the size of grants has been increased in the IPLRAD, other problems persist. For example, grants are mainly accessed by persons who are literate, and have money, transport or political contacts. The Department of Land Affairs' stance in the White Paper that priority would be given to the 'marginalized and the needs of women in particular' has not been realized in practice.[4]

(d) Redistribution programme: brief evaluation

The period 1995-2005 has seen the redistribution of an estimated 2.9 per cent of agricultural land from white to black ownership.[5] Various reasons have been suggested for the slow pace of delivery. First, projects have not necessarily been designed in line with the needs and skills of the community they are expected to benefit. Secondly, the Communal Property Association has proven to be a problematic legal vehicle. Thirdly, suitable land for redistribution has been

[1] See E Lahiff & S Rugege 'A Critical Assessment of the Land Redistribution Policy in the Light of the Grootboom Judgement' (2002) 6(2) Law, Democracy and Development 279, 291-97; AJ Van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (2005) 354.

[2] Minister Didiza served until 23 May 2006. She was replaced by Minister Lulu Xingwana.

[3] Other problems with SLAG included the fact that the initiative had to come from the land reform beneficiary, which made the grant highly dependent on adequate information dissemination. In addition, the grant application procedure did not take regional planning and land reform needs into account. For more detail, see Lahiff & Rugege (supra) at 291-97; JM Pienaar 'Land Reform and Development: A Marriage of Necessity' (2004) 25(2) Obiter 269.

[4] Lahiff and Rugege argue that the transition from SLAG to IPLRAD has changed the situation dramatically and constitutes a direct reversal of previous policy because an upper limit has now been replaced by a lower limit: '[I]t sends out a strong message to would-be applicants and officials alike that the programme is not aimed at the very poorest, potentially discouraging any applicants and making it unlikely that applications from the very poor will be prioritized.' Lahiff & Rugege (supra) at 313.

[5] It is very difficult to establish exactly how much land has in fact been redistributed. Apart from the absence of a reliable tracking and monitoring system, all indications of race on the title deeds have been removed since 1996.

hard to find. Fourthly, poor co-ordination between various sectors within the Department of Land Affairs has hindered projects. Fifthly, in many instances the co-operation of traditional leaders has been lacking. Sixthly, the budget for redistribution and tenure reform has decreased in real terms over the past six years. Finally, although government funds have been used to acquire shares in farm enterprises, especially in the Western Cape, the mere transfer of shares to land reform beneficiaries has not contributed significantly to changing historically entrenched power relations in the agricultural sector.

Irrespective of the reasons for the lack of redistribution, there is a real risk that the target of redistributing 30 per cent of agricultural land by 2014 will not be reached. The slow pace of land reform was one of the main themes of a national Land Summit that took place in July 2005. The consensus of opinion was that markets by themselves would not redistribute land at the scale, quality, location and price required. The present situation does not correspond to an ideal 'willing-buyer, willing-seller' market since the state is often the only prospective buyer. This market failure has led to suggestions that the state should intervene more purposefully in the market, using expropriation if necessary.[1]

48.7 FC s 25(6): Security of Tenure

(a) Introduction

FC 25(6) provides that a 'person or community whose tenure of land is legally insecure as a result of past discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to tenure which is legally secure or to comparable redress'. FC s 25(9) in turn provides that 'Parliament must enact the legislation referred to in subsection (6)'.

The formulation of both FC s 25(6) (tenure reform) and FC s 25(7) (restitution) is unusual in that the two provisions, on the face of it, give the legislature complete discretion to define the scope and content of the rights. FC s 25(9) leaves the legislature with no option: it must enact legislation to give effect to the tenure reform and restitution rights. Once enacted, however, such legislation cannot be challenged unless it clearly departs from the spirit and purport of the Bill of Rights.[2]

The need for a tenure reform programme has to be placed in perspective. The South African land control system was not only intrinsically linked to race. It was also inherently fragmented and diverse, resulting in land control forms varying from race group to race group and region to region, often consisting only of [1] See AJ van der Walt 'Reconciling the State's Duties to Promote Land Reform and to Pay "Just and Equitable" Compensation for Expropriation' (2006) 123 SALJ 23. Van der Walt emphasizes the constitutional necessity of and justification for expropriation for land reform purposes. Concerning compensation, he shows convincingly that, depending on the relevant factors and circumstances, just and equitable compensation may be below market value.

[2] See § 48.4 supra.

insecure permit-based rights.[1] This approach resulted in a complex, diverse land tenure system, with the security of individual tenure depending on the specific form of control. The phrase 'past discriminatory laws or practices' refers to this complex system of primary and sub-ordinate legislation setting out land control forms, as well as the practices followed in implementing it. 'Tenure reform' therefore entails replacing existing land control forms with other, more secure tenure forms. In this process the ideal is to move away from a permit-based to a rights-based system, to leave scope for persons to choose, as far as possible, their tenure form according to their needs and to recognize de facto land rights.[2]

Various statutes have been promulgated to meet the state's obligation to provide tenure security or comparable redress, most recently the Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 ('CLRA'). The Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights 112 of 1991, promulgated during the pre-constitutional era, is still a valuable tool in addressing tenure reform. Other noteworthy measures include the ESTA, the Communal Properties Association Act 28 of 1996 and the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act 31 of 1996.

(b) Enabling legislation

(i) The Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991('the Upgrading Act')

The Upgrading Act was initially promulgated to provide for the upgrading and conversion of certain rights into ownership and the transfer of tribal land in full ownership to tribes. The Act has been amended a few times to keep up with new developments in the tenure reform programme.

Rights emanating from leasehold, deeds of grant or quitrent[3] in a formalized township were automatically converted into ownership. Ownership is registered in the name of the person who had the specified right to land immediately before the Upgrading Act commenced.[4] Schedule II rights, consisting of various occupational rights derived from legislative measures[5] and tribal occupational rights in

[1] See CG van der Merwe & J Pienaar 'Land Reform in South Africa' in P Jackson & DC Wilde The Reform of Property Law (1997) 334, 348-50; C Cross & R Haines Towards Freehold (1988); G Budlender & J Latsky 'Unravelling Rights to Land and to Agricultural Activity in Rural Race Zones' (1990) 6 SAJHR 155; TW Bennett 'African Land — A History of Dispossession' in R Zimmermann & D Visser (eds) Southern Cross: Civil and Common Law in South Africa (1996) 65; Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 19-21.

[2] Department of Land Affairs White Paper on South African Land Policy (1997) vi.

[3] These rights are also know as Schedule I rights. See Van der Merwe & Pienaar (supra) at 348-52; H Mostert & J Pienaar Modern Studies in Property Law III (2005) 323-25.

[4] The Upgrading Act also provides in s 2(2) for the necessary entries and endorsements to reflect the conversion to ownership.

[5] The following is provided for: (a) any permission granted in terms of reg 5(1) of the Irrigation Schemes Control Regulations 1963 (Proc 5 of 1963) to occupy any irrigation or residential allotment; (b) any permission to occupy any allotment within the meaning of the Black Areas Land Regulations 1969 (Proc R188 of 1969); (c) any right of occupation granted to any registered occupier as defined in s 1 of the Rural Areas Act (House of Representatives) 9 of 1987 (repealed by the Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998 (see § 48.6*(b)*(iii) above); and (d) any right to the occupation of tribal land granted under the indigenous law or customs of the tribe in question.

accordance with indigenous customs and traditions, are not upgraded automatically, but have to go though the procedure set out in s 3 of the Act. This procedure has two requirements. First, where the land is state-owned, conversion will only take place once the Minister is satisfied that the rights and interests of putative holders will be protected. Secondly, where the land is owned by a tribe or has been allocated to a particular tribe for use and occupation, conversion may only take place once a tribal resolution has been reached.

The recently drafted CLRA is therefore not the first Act to provide for the acquisition of tribal (or communal) land by communities or individuals. As long ago as 1991, the Upgrading Act provided that any tribe could obtain ownership in land.[1] The tribe is then able to sell, exchange, donate, let, hypothecate and otherwise dispose of its land.[2] However, the initial commencement of the Act coincided with a general moratorium[3] on disposal to persons other than members of the tribe.[4]

(ii) The Interim Protection of Informal Rights Act 31 of 1996 ('the Interim Protection Act')

Although initially intended to be an interim measure, the slow pace of tenure reform has led to the Interim Protection Act being extended on an annual basis. Although the Act has national application, it is employed mainly in areas that previously formed part of the four national states and six self-governing territories.

Four categories of rights are protected. First, the use or occupation of, or access to land in terms of (i) any tribal, customary or indigenous law or practice of a tribe; or (ii) the custom, usage or administrative practice in a particular area or community where the land at any time vested in the SA Development Trust, the government of any self-governing territory or the former governments of the four national states enjoy protection. The Interim Protection Act also protects the rights or interests in land of trust beneficiaries under arrangements in terms of which the trustee holds a public office, or is a body/functionary established under an Act of Parliament. Beneficial occupation is also protected,[5] provided that it has

[1] Upgrading Act s 19(1).

[2] Upgrading Act s 19(1).

[3] The court could consent to the selling or exchanging of tribal land in certain instances only. See Upgrading Act s 19(3).

[4] This moratorium period expired in 2001.

[5] Defined in s 1 of the Interim Protection Act as being occupation by a person, as if he or she is the owner, without force, openly and without the permission of the registered owner. The two definitions of beneficial occupation in the Interim Protection Act and the CLRA are thus identical. This phrase is also similar to the provisions provided for in the Prescription Act 68 of 1969 in relation to acquisitive prescription. Some of the submissions prior to the passing of the Communal Land Rights Bill voiced concerns that this definition would disqualify women in that their conduct in relation to land was not 'open as if they were the owners thereof' and that this definition would be detrimental to their cause.

endured for a continuous period of not less than five years prior to 31 December 1997. Finally, permission-based 'rights' pertaining to particular units of statutory black land enjoy protection.[1]

(iii) The Communal Property Association Act 28 of 1996 ('the CPA Act')

The legal structures available for common ownership before the commencement of the CPA Act generally entailed complex legal and administrative provisions and ignored the social and economic role communal property plays in traditional communities. Therefore, the use of common or joint ownership, by way of a trust or through a juristic person, was not effectively exploited by certain communities. The CPA Act provides an institutional framework for the registration and functioning of a new juristic structure, namely that of the communal property association.

The CPA Act has been criticized for its complexity and lack of functionality. The process to establish a communal property association is difficult and time-consuming.[2] Registration is dealt with in two phases: the provisional association is registered and then the communal property association is finally registered.[3]

Before the association can be finally registered, the constitution has to be drafted.[4] The constitution must be consistent with the following principles:[5] fair and inclusive decision-making processes; equality of membership; democratic processes; fair access to property of the association and accountability and transparency. The underlying idea is, however, that although certain basic requirements have to be met, the constitution has to reflect the unique needs, values and conditions of the community involved.[6]

(iv) The Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997 ('the ESTA')

(aa) Introduction

The state's constitutional obligation to promulgate legislation dealing with the promotion of secure tenure was in part fulfilled with the enactment of the ESTA in 1997. The aims of the Act are threefold: to promote long-term security

[1] These are set out in Schedule 1 or 2 of the Upgrading Act. This protective category relates to rights listed in the schedules of which the holder is not formally or officially recorded as the rightful holder.

[2] See PJ Badenhorst, JM Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Editon, 2006) Chapter 22; D Carey-Miller & A Pope Land Title in South Africa (2000) 461-67.

[3] See Cary-Miller & Pope (supra) at 473-85; T Scheepers A Practical Guide to Law and Development (2000) 76-79.

[4] CPA Act s 6.

[5] CPA Act s 9.

[6] The final registration takes place by the registration officer once all the formalities have been met. A registration certificate is finally issued that bears the seal of the communal property association after which the association acquires juristic competency. See CPA Act s 8(6)(a).

of tenure; to regulate eviction; and to introduce a set of rights and duties in relation to both occupiers and land owners.[1]

Although the Act has national application, it is limited to rural and peri-urban areas.[2] It is thus clear that the underlying aim is to protect a certain category of rural dwellers: occupiers on farms or farm workers.[3]

(bb) Beneficiaries

Not everyone qualifies as an occupier for purposes of the ESTA. The Act applies to any person residing on land which belongs to another and who has or on 4 February 1997 or thereafter had consent or another right in law to do so; as well as a person who resides on land belonging to another who works for herself and does not employ an outside person.[4] Labour tenants,[5] persons using or intending to use land mainly for industrial, mining, commercial or commercial farming purposes and persons who have a monthly income exceeding R5000 are explicitly excluded from the protection of the ESTA.[6] These exclusions are in line with the main purpose of the Act: to protect vulnerable occupiers.

In some instances persons are presumed to be occupiers: a person who has continuously and openly resided on land for a period of at least one year is presumed to have the consent of the land owner. With regard to persons who occupied the land before 4 February 1997, 'consent' also includes that of the previous land owner. In Landbounavorsingsraad v Klaasen, the court held that consent is more than a mere indication of the inclination of the grantor: it creates legally enforceable rights and obligations.[7] Thus the person claiming rights as an occupier must be or must have been a party to the consent agreement.[8] All

[1] Prize Trade 44 (Pty) Ltd v Isaac Tefo Memane LCC Case 35/01 (Unreported judgment, 21 August 2003)(Confirmed that one of the main functions of the Act is to ensure that evictions are conducted equitably in the interests of both parties.)

[2] ESTA s 2.

[3] See Venter v Claasen 2001 (1) SA 720 (LCC). Limiting the application of the Act to rural areas in general has increasingly led to farm workers being settled in urban areas, thereby avoiding the impact of the Act. This unintended and untoward consequence has been curbed, to some extent, by making the Prevention of Illegal Eviction and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 ('the PIE Act') applicable to all forms of residential occupation — irrespective of location. Although the full force of the ESTA may thus be avoided, the substantive and procedural requirements related to evictions in general, still need to be complied with. See Joubert v Van Rensburg 2001 (1) SA 753 (W) at paras 35-38 (Flemming DJP considered the fact that the Act does not affect all landowners equally, but only owners of farm land as one of the aspects that contributed to the Act being declared unconstitutional. Since the constitutionality of the Act was not in issue in Joubert, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court concluded that Flemming DJP's finding regarding the unconstitutionality of the ESTA was to be disregarded. See Mkangeli v Joubert 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 316 (CC).)

[4] ESTA s 1.

[5] Their tenure position had already been dealt with under the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996.

[6] ESTA s 1(1)(x)(c).

[7] 2005 (3) SA 410 (LCC)('Landbounavorsingsraad').

[8] Ibid at paras 21-23.

persons residing on land would therefore not necessarily qualify as occupiers for purposes of the ESTA — there has to be a legal nexus between that person and the owner or person in charge of the property. Family members residing in the house with occupiers therefore do not automatically qualify as occupiers — they only qualify if there is a legal connection.

Apart from 'ordinary occupiers', s 8(4) of the ESTA also recognizes 'long term occupiers'. Long-term occupiers are persons who have occupied land for a period exceeding ten years and who are 60 years of age or older,[1] or are employees or former employees of the owner or person in charge and are unable to provide labour as a result of ill-health, injury or disability.

(cc) The promotion of long-term tenure security

The ESTA's record in promoting long-term security has thus far been disappointing. Chapter II, which deals with this issue, is phrased in general terms and lacks detail concerning the tenure options available. Given that the ESTA is constitutionally mandated legislation, which is required to provide a framework for tenure reform, one would have expected more substantive provisions.[2] The ESTA nevertheless creates two mechanisms for promoting long-term tenure security: on-site development and off-site development.[3] Off-site development entails occupiers acquiring independent tenure rights on land belonging to someone other than the owner of the land on which they are residing. In cases of off-site development, reasons must be given why the development cannot be undertaken on the farm where the occupiers are residing, especially if the occupiers indicate a preference for on-site development.[4] This in-built preference for on-site development has not, however, led to large-scale developments on farms. In fact, quite the contrary: land owners are very hesitant to make land available for housing on farms.[5] Off-site development has not been that successful either. This form of long-term tenure security requires a good working relationship between land owners and local government, as well as commitment and funding, which are often lacking. In short, the ESTA has proven more effective at protecting against arbitrary eviction and

[1] The courts have interpreted the age requirements strictly. See Rashava v Van Rensburg 2004 (4) SA 421 (SCA)(The court had to determine whether, when interpreted 'correctly', ages of 58 or 59 would also be included under the 60 years of age provision, especially if the long period of employment (in this instance 20 years) was also kept in mind. The court found that the wording was quite clear and that no interpretation — generous, purposive or otherwise — could change the meaning (at para 14).) Other case law has also found that the use of an identity document was not the only method to determine age that would be acceptable in court. Other methods also included testimony to the date of birth, as long as the evidence is reliable. See in this regard Mpedi v Swanevelder 2004 (4) SA 344 (LCC).

[2] See FC s 25(5); § 48.6 supra. It is also problematic if compared to the regulation of redistribution measures in the Labour Tenants Act and the relative success that Act has had in practice.

[3] ESTA s 4(1).

[4] ESTA s 4(2)(c).

[5] M Wegerif, B Russel & I Grundling Still Searching for Security: The Reality of Farm Dweller Evictions in South Africa (2005).

regulating the day-to-day relationship between land owners and occupiers than in promoting long-term security.[1]

In order to promote long-term security, the Minister of Land Affairs and Agriculture has equivalent powers to those exercised under the Expropriation Act 63 of 1975. As soon as the expropriation of land or rights is initiated, a hearing must be held and compensation paid.[2]

(dd) Occupiers' rights

1. General

The fundamental rights listed in s 5 of the ESTA apply to occupiers. Apart from these rights, additional rights and duties are also listed in s 6. These rights must be balanced with the rights of owners or persons in charge. Apart from the rights that emanate from the Act itself, parties are free to include particular rights in the agreement that forms the foundation of the occupier's status.

2. The right to family life

The right to family life was a somewhat controversial omission from the Bill of Rights, but is included in the ESTA. Not many of the rights provided for in ss 5 and 6 have been adjudicated on. The right to family life was, however, one of the focal points in Conradie v Hanekom.[3] In terms of the agreement with the land owner, both the husband and wife stood to lose their residential rights when either spouse's employment contract was cancelled. In contravention of his employment contract, the husband threatened and injured persons on the land and caused damage to property. He was dismissed after a disciplinary hearing. This dismissal also led to the termination of the wife's employment. On review under s 19(3) of the ESTA, the wife was reinstated on the basis that the provision linking the termination of her employment to the conduct of her husband was unreasonable. She could therefore not be evicted for this reason. In addition, on the basis of her right to family life, her husband was allowed to join her on the premises. The court accordingly set both eviction orders aside and ordered that other remedies be sought in respect of the conduct of the husband. The court did not give any indication as to what these remedies might be.

The right to family life in accordance with the cultural background of the family was raised in Wichman v Langa.[4] Applications for the eviction of the long-term occupier's sons and grandson were contested on the basis that leaving

[1] See FC s 25(5) and FC s 26(3). See also S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003).

[2] ESTA s 26(2).

[3] 1999 (4) SA 491 (LCC), [1999] 2 All SA 525 (LCC).

[4] 2006 (1) SA 102 (LCC)('Wichman').

the grandmother would be unacceptable in terms of Zulu culture and tradition. The extended family set-up entailed that the different generations should live together.[1] The court responded that no expert evidence supported the claims made in relation to Zulu customs and culture and that, even if it were true, the respondents had all fallen foul of s 10 (dealing with irreconcilable breach) of the ESTA. On the facts, the conduct of the respondents displayed a blatant disregard for the lives and property of the other employees and owners. The right to family life was thus trumped by the safety and other interests of the rest of the occupiers and owner. In both this decision and Conradie, the courts failed appropriately to balance competing rights. In Conradie, the right to family life was upheld, ruling out the possibility of an eviction order, without seeking to give effect to the rights of the land owner and other occupiers. On the facts the only real difference between the two cases is that Conradie dealt with a husband and wife and the link to family life in that regard, whereas Wichman dealt with parent-child and grandparent-grandchild relationships and an alleged custom that could not be proven. Unfortunately, neither case provides useful guidelines on how to balance the right to family life, on the one hand, and the interests of land owners, on the other. In seeking to balance the right to family life and the (property) rights of land owners, it may be appropriate for courts to seek creative remedies, such as interdicts precluding certain conduct on the part of occupiers, without an order for eviction; alternatively, granting eviction but awarding compensation or other redress to occupiers.[2]

3. The right to freedom of religion and burial rights

As originally drafted, the ESTA did not provide for burial rights but for the right to visit graves. In Serole v Pienaar the applicants argued that the right to visit graves included the right to bury deceased family members, given that the custom of indigenous black people requires the dead to be buried close to the living.[3] The court held that permission to establish a grave would amount to a servitude over the property, which would be different in nature to the kind of right which the legislature intended to grant occupiers.[4] The court accordingly dismissed the application.

Nkosi v Bührman focused on the right to freedom of religion as protected by ss 5 and 6 of the ESTA, before their amendment in 2001.[5] The applicants argued that they were entitled to bury a deceased family member on the land without the [1] Wichman (supra) at para 24.

[2] See President of RSA & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd & Others (Agri SA and Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)(Court awarded constitutional damages to the landowner because it was unable to order eviction.)

[3] 2000 (1) SA 328 (LCC), [1999] 1 All SA 562 (LCC)('Serole').

[4] Ibid at para 16.

[5] 2002 (1) SA 372 (SCA), 2002 (6) BCLR 574 (SCA)('Nkosi').

landowner's consent, on the basis of their religious freedom, which was not an independent right, but an element of the occupier's security of tenure. The court held that the right to freedom of religion had internal limits and did not confer unfettered ability to choose a gravesite or to take a gravesite without the consent of the owner.[1] The court also emphasized that the kind of rights bestowed on occupiers, namely residential and use rights, did not detract permanently from the substance of the land, whereas a gravesite would do exactly that. Consequently, 'use' was use in association with the right of residence which did not confer any right to, or in, the land itself.[2] This reliance on 'permanence', in our view, was misplaced. The impact of indefinite rights of occupiers to occupy land on a land owner's rights may amount to an equally significant deprivation as the establishment of a gravesite.

In 2001 the ESTA was amended to provide for burial rights in certain instances. In terms of a new s 6(2)(dA), an occupier now 'has the right to bury a family member who resided on the land at the time of his or her death, in accordance with their religion or cultural belief, if an established practice in respect of the land exists'. And, according to s 6(5), 'family members of a long-term occupier have the right to bury the occupier on the land on which he or she was resident at the time of death'.

An 'established practice' in relation to the land is defined in s 1(1) as meaning a practice in terms of which the owners or persons in charge (or their predecessors in title) routinely gave permission to people residing on the land to bury deceased family members, in accordance with their religious and cultural beliefs. The practice furthermore relates to the land in question and not the specific family.[3] This provision accordingly recognizes the establishment of custom through practice: that is, living customary law.

Nhlabathi v Fick was the first case to be decided under the amended version of the ESTA.[4] The court considered whether s 6(2) was unconstitutional due to its impact on landowners' rights.[5] Two arguments were advanced in attacking the provision: first, that s 6(2)(dA) fell foul of the protection given to property under FC s 25; and, secondly, that it intruded into the functional area of exclusive local government legislative competence, contravening FC s 44(1)(a)(iii). In view of the focus of this chapter, we consider only the first line of attack.[6]

The respondent argued that the appropriation of a grave deprives the landowner of property. The court thus had to determine if a deprivation or an

[1] Nkosi (supra) at para 49.
[2] Ibid at paras 5 and 51.
[3] See Dlamini v Joosten 2006 (3) SA 342 (SCA)(The concept that the practice relates to the land as such and not the particular family, was again confirmed.)
[4] [2003] 2 All SA 323 (LCC)('Nhlabati').
[5] For an in-depth discussion of this case, see J Pienaar & H Mostert 'The Balance Between Burial Rights and Landownership in South Africa: Issues of Content, Nature and Constitutionality' (2005) 122 SALJ 633 ('The Balance').
[6] Ibid at 644-659.

expropriation had taken place. Deprivations will pass constitutional muster if they result from a law of general application which does not permit arbitrary limitation. Impositions amounting to expropriation must additionally be for a public purpose or in the public interest. Also, expropriation requires the payment of just and equitable compensation, the amount of which must be agreed on or determined by court. Impositions on property generally have to adhere to the requirement of proportionality.[1]

After First National Bank t/a Westbank v Commissioner for the SA Revenue Services,[2] it is generally accepted that an imposition on property rights will be 'arbitrary' for purposes of FC s 25 when the legislative measure employed does not give sufficient reason for the particular deprivation in question or is procedurally unfair.[3] The existence of sufficient reason for the deprivation or imposition can be assessed by a 'means-ends' analysis and a consideration of a complexity of relationships. The connection between the purpose of the deprivation and the affected property-holder and the nature of the property, are also included in this exercise. The proportionality review, as foreseen by FC s 36(1), refers to an assessment of the justifiability and rationality of a particular imposition on property. The separate concepts of non-arbitrariness and proportionality do overlap, however, even if their functions within the constitutional property enquiry vary considerably. In Nhlabathi, the court listed four grounds upon which it had to base its finding relating to arbitrariness:

- The right to appropriate a grave has to be balanced with the rights and interests of the land owner or person in charge;[4]
- The burial is only permitted where there is an established practice in this regard;[5]
- The establishment of the grave and visiting and maintaining it will in most cases only constitute a minor intrusion into the landowner's property rights;[6] and
- The right to burial was introduced by legislation as part of the constitutional mandate to ensure legally secure tenure.[7]

[1] FC s 36(1). See also PJ Badenhorst, J Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Edition, 2006) Chapter 21; H Mostert & PJ Badenhorst 'Property and the Bill of Rights' in Y Mokgoro & P Tlakula (eds) Bill of Rights Compendium (Issue 18, June 2006) concerning deprivations: 3FB40-70 and expropriations: 3FB71-93.

[2] 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC).

[3] Nhlabathi (supra) at para 100. See T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46.

[4] Nhlabathi (supra) at para 26*(a)*.

[5] Ibid at para 26*(b)*.

[6] Ibid at para 26*(c)*. This holding constitutes a major departure from the stances taken in previous case law.

[7] ESTA s 25(6), Nhlabathi (supra) at para 26*(d)*.

With regard to an established practice, the facts in Nhlabathi are especially noteworthy. Two members of the Nhlabathi family had already been buried on the farm previously. The respondent argued that those burials resulted from his 'indulgence'; and that no burial plot as such had been allocated to the family. Despite this averment, the family clearly regarded those plots as their burial grounds and several other burial plots for other families also existed on the land. The court found that the established practice was not in relation to a particular family, but to the land in question.[1] The potential arbitrariness of the provision was therefore tempered by limiting the burial right to certain instances only.

Concerning the extent to which the appropriation of a grave site diminishes the rights of the land owner, Nhlabathi differs radically from previous case law. In contrast to initial declarations in Serole v Pienaar that granting a grave site would result in a permanent diminution of ownership, in Nhlabati, the court referred to 'minor intrusions' only. This finding has a definite impact on whether FC s 25(1) or (2) comes into play and whether compensation needs to be paid. The court in Nhlabathi ultimately held that, although the establishment of a grave amounts to a servitude without the permission of the land owner, compensation is not payable.[2] In our view, the court reached the correct decision on the facts. However, there may be cases in which compensation ought to be payable.

With regard to the arbitrariness enquiry, the court indicated that the constitutional mandate to ensure legally secure tenure is a decisive factor.[3] It furthermore held that burial enables occupiers to live in accordance with their cultural and religious beliefs, which, connected with the underlying purpose of the ESTA, provides sufficient reason to justify an inroad into the landowner's rights. The obligation placed on the landowner is thus reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.[4] During the balancing act however, the court envisages that the right of the landowner may outweigh that of the occupier in some instances.

Finding that the right to burial amounts to a servitude[5] required the court to deal with the argument that establishing such a servitude without consent amounted to expropriation contrary to FC ss 25(2) and (3). Nhlabathi supports the view that expropriations, being a subspecies of deprivation, need to comply with all the requirements for deprivations set out in FC s 25(1) as well as the additional requirements in FC ss 25(2) and (3).[6] Impositions on property are

[1] Also confirmed in *Dlamini v Jo*osten 2006 (3) SA 342 (SCA).
[2] Nhlabathi (supra) at paras 27-30.
[3] Ibid at para 26*(d)*.
[4] This conclusion is reminiscent of the minority judgement of Ngoepe J in Nkosi. Nkosi (supra) at 1161C.
[5] In 'The Balance', Pienaar and Mostert argue that the right to burial is a statutorily defined right and not a servitude since none of the traditional property law requirements dealing with servitudes are met in this instance. If the court had found that these rights are indeed statutory burial rights as determined and set out in ESTA itself, there would have been no need to explain the lack of provision for compensation. Pienaar & Mostert 'The Balance' (supra).
[6] Nhlabathi (supra) at para 29.

regarded as unconstitutional deprivations when they are achieved by way of a law that is not of general application, are arbitrary or cannot pass the proportionality test under FC s 36. A constitutional expropriation would have to meet additional requirements: it must be in the public interest or for public purposes and compensation must be paid. In Nhlabathi, the court tested the provision for proportionality. Given that the court had already confirmed that the provision was not arbitrary, proportionality review was perhaps superfluous. Nevertheless, the court found that there might be instances where the absence of the right to compensation on expropriation is reasonable and justifiable and in the public interest. In the light of the nation's commitment to land reform, granting a burial right need not lead to compensation being paid to the land owner.[1]

4. The right to legal representation

The right to legal representation and legal aid, as developed in Nkuzi Development Association v Government of RSA,[2] applies to occupiers whose tenure is threatened or infringed.[3]

(ee) Termination of rights

Occupiers may be evicted only when certain substantive and procedural requirements have been met. This protection is strengthened by an automatic review procedure in terms of which all eviction orders granted by lower courts are reviewed by the Land Claims Court before the eviction is carried out.[4] The eviction of a person, other than in terms of the Act,[5] constitutes an offence.[6]

The ESTA establishes two groups of occupiers: those who already occupied the land when the Bill was published for comment, that is, on 4 February 1997, and those who became occupiers after this date. The latter group is in a slightly better position, especially in relation to the landowner's responsibility to provide suitable alternative accommodation. Apart from these normal eviction proceedings, the ESTA also provides for urgent eviction proceedings.

[1] See M Euijen & C Plasket 'Constitutional Protection of Property and Land Reform' (2003) Annual Survey of South African Law 437-38.

[2] 2002 (2) SA 733 (LCC).

[3] See § 48.6*(b)*(i)(bb) supra.

[4] ESTA s 19(3).

[5] Keep in mind that, at this stage, a relocation order does not constitute eviction for purposes of the Act. Although it might be argued that a relocation order affects vested rights of long-term occupiers, the Act does not specifically require that such relocation 'arrangements' be reviewed by the Land Claims Court under s 19(3). See Nomthandazo Chagi v Singisi Forest Products (LCC13/05); Pharo's Properties v Kuilders 2001 (2) SA 1180 (LCC), [2001] 2 All SA 309 (LCC); Pretorius v Beginsel 2002 JOL 9238 (LCC). Drumearn v Wager confirmed that a relocation order does not constitute an eviction for purposes of ESTA. 2002 (6) SA 500 (LCC). It has, however, also confirmed that the relocation should be to 'suitable alternative accommodation' as contemplated in the Act.

[6] ESTA s 23(1).

Generally, irrespective of the date of occupation, evictions may take place on any legal ground,[1] including intentional threats against, intimidation of or harm or damage to other occupiers on the land; assisting persons unlawfully to erect dwellings on the land; breach of a material and fair term of any agreement reached by the parties where the owner or person in control of the land did not breach the agreement; and a fundamental breach of the relationship between the occupier and the owner which is impossible to remedy.[2]

A further ground for eviction concerns the situation where the occupier was an employee whose right of residence arose solely from her employment and she voluntarily resigned in circumstances that did not amount to a constructive dismissal in terms of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1965.[3]

(ff) Evictions

1. General

The majority of reported cases under the ESTA have dealt with eviction proceedings. The ESTA is a good example of 'social legislation'. It takes a far less formalistic and adversarial approach to, for example, costs orders[4] and condonation of procedural irregularities.[5]

Depending on the date of occupation, an application for eviction may be lodged under s 10 (if the person was an occupier on 4 February 1997) or s 11 (when the occupier became an occupier after that date). Urgent applications are dealt with under s 15. The right to legal representation when being faced with an eviction application has been clearly established.[6] Under s 19(3) of the ESTA, all eviction orders are automatically referred to the Land Claims Court for review before an eviction order is finally confirmed and executed.[7]

[1] ESTA s 8(1).

[2] ESTA s 6(3).

[3] ESTA s 19(1)(d). In such circumstances, both the employment and the occupational agreement have to be terminated before an eviction order will be considered. See Landbou Navorsingsraad v Klaasen [2001] JOL 9046 (LCC), Jaco Hough Boerdery Trust v Smith LCC Case 15R/04 (Unreported judgment, 3 March 2004).

[4] De Wit v May [2003] JOL 11195 (LCC); SA Baard Boerdery v Grietjie Pofadder LCC Case 97R/04 (Unreported judgment, 26 October 2004).

[5] The question whether a late notice of appeal should be condoned was decided with reference to (a) the possibility of a successful appeal, as well as (b) the particular circumstances of the client in Rashava v Van Rensburg. 2004 (2) SA 421 (SCA). With regard to the latter, the court found that the appellant was an illiterate, impecunious and uneducated woman with no knowledge of the workings of the legal system and that she could not be refused condonation solely on the ground that her legal advisers had been negligent in the performance of their work (at para 9).

[6] Nkuzi Development Association v Government of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (2) SA 733 (LCC); Maas Transport BK v Beukes [2002] JOL 9804 (LCC).

[7] Review proceedings in the Land Claims Court are decided by a single judge. He or she can confirm the order in whole or in part, set it aside, substitute it or remit it to the magistrate. Appeal against a confirmation of a review lies to the Land Claims Court (two judges) and thereafter to the Supreme Court of Appeal. See Magodi v Van Rensburg [2001] 4 All SA 485 (LCC), [2001] JOL 8502 (LCC).

2. Procedural requirements

The owner[1] or person in charge of the property has to give the occupier, the municipality in whose area of jurisdiction the land is situated and the head of the relevant provincial office of the Department of Land Affairs not less than two calendar months' written notice of her intention to obtain an eviction order.[2] The notice must contain the grounds for eviction and must be detailed enough so that no recipient should have any doubt concerning their rights and the consequences of a failure to protect those rights.[3] The notice has to be in a language that is understood by the occupiers.[4]

3. Requirements for eviction

Two sets of considerations are relevant to the question whether to grant an eviction order: first, specific legal requirements and, secondly, the general requirement of fairness. The specific legal requirements include whether the occupation has been terminated in accordance with the Act;[5] whether procedural requirements have been complied with and whether a probation report has been submitted. The purpose of a probation report is to enable the court to determine whether the conditions for eviction have been met.[6] The report should be submitted within a reasonable time,[7] and should provide information relevant to the requested eviction, including the availability of suitable alternative accommodation; the possible impact the eviction might have on affected persons (including children and their education); and the possible hardship it may cause the occupier. On the basis that alternative accommodation and hardship caused were issues to be addressed in each eviction application, Moloto J held in Valley Packers Co-operative Ltd v Dietloff[8] that a probation report is a requirement whether the application for eviction is under s 10[9] or s 11 of the ESTA. However, the impact of

[1] It has to be clear from the documents that the applicant is indeed the owner of the land. See Henri du Plessis Trust v Kammies LCC Case 77R/01 (Unreported judgment, 3 September 2001)(If the owner is a trust, the necessary information concerning the trustees has to be set out clearly in the documents); Remhoogte Boerdery Edms (Bpk) v Mentoor [2001] JOL 9018 (LCC)(Where the owner is a legal person, the person acting on behalf of the owner has to prove his or her authorization to do so); Sparrow v Morementsi LCC Case 116R/03 (Unreported judgment, 25 February 2004)(The Court confirmed that a farm manager cannot institute proceedings under his own name, but would have to set out his authority to do so, or that he is acting on behalf of the owner.)

[2] ESTA s 9(2)(d).

[3] African Charcoal (Pty) v Ndlovu [2002] 2 All SA 19 (LCC), [2000] JOL 6271 (LCC).

[4] Denleigh Farms v Mhlanzi 2000 (1) SA 225 (LCC).

[5] See the whole of ESTA s 9.

[6] ESTA ss 10 and 11.

[7] 'Reasonable time' would depend on the particular circumstances of each case. See Western Investments Company (Ltd) v Van Reenen LCC Case 05R/02 (Unreported judgment, 12 February 2002)(Gildenhuys J found that waiting six months for a probation report would be 'unreasonably long'.)

[8] [2001] 2 All SA 30 (LCC), [2001] JOL 7828 (LCC)('Vallet Packers') at para 8.

[9] ESTA s 10(1) provides for voluntary termination of employment, in which case a probation report would not be necessary. Westminister Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Elgin Orchards v Simons [2000] 3 All SA 279 (LCC). This decision was later overturned in Valley Packers.

the Valley Packer decision has been tempered somewhat by Theewaterskloof Holdings (Pty) Ltd, Glaser Division v Jacobs. The Jacobs court held that a mere request for a probation report would meet that requirement.[1] However a mere request for the report would not enable the court to reach conclusions regarding alternative accommodation or the hardship to be faced by the parties. It would, in fact, defeat the purpose of the submission of the report.

In our view, although an urgent eviction order may, in limited circumstances, be granted without the court studying the probation report, a final order should not be granted in such circumstances.[2] Although the ESTA specifically refers to the position of the occupier when the report is drafted, case law has indicated that the report should reflect the position of both the occupier and the land owner.[3] The report should thus, in principle, be a balanced report and interviews have to be held with both the landowner (or person in charge) and the occupier. With regard to the landowner's interests, the report could, for example, include facts such as having to lease other accommodation and the cost of transporting workers when occupiers refuse to vacate the land.

In considering the general requirement of fairness, relevant factors include the period the occupier resided on the land; the fairness of any agreement or provision of any law on which the owner or person in charge relies,[4] the conduct of the parties giving rise to the termination, the interests of the parties and the fairness of the procedure followed by the owner or person in charge. For persons who were occupiers on 4 February 1997, the court will also consider the efforts of the owner or person in charge to secure alternative accommodation for the occupier, as well as the interests of the parties, including the comparative hardship to the owner and/or person in charge and occupier(s) if an order for eviction is not granted. With regard to persons who became occupiers after that date, s 11(3) provides a list of factors to be taken into account concerning whether eviction would be just and equitable. These factors include whether suitable alternative accommodation is available and the reason for the eviction. Suitable alternative accommodation must be safe and generally not less favourable than the previous situation. The mere fact that accommodation is available is therefore not sufficient.[5]

[1] 2002 (3) SA 401 (LCC).

[2] See Gili Greenworld Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Shisonge [2002] JOL 9930 (LCC)(The court found that it would not have to wait for an unreasonable length of time for the report to submitted in urgent eviction proceedings.)

[3] Terblanche v Flippies LCC Case 36R/01 (Unreported judgment, 25 May 2001).

[4] The provisions of the relevant agreements may also be considered in this regard. See De Wit v May [2003] JOL 11195 (LCC)(One of the provisions entailed that the occupier would be responsible for any costs involved should the occupier be evicted. Apart from the fact that the ESTA is social legislation, meaning that costs orders are generally not made, the provision of the agreement was also found to be unfair in the circumstances.)

[5] See, eg, Botha v Morobane LCC Case 35R/04 (Unreported judgment, 30 April 2004)(The eviction order granted was set aside on review on the basis that the alternative accommodation offered was not acceptable. In this case the occupier ostensibly had a house that was not occupied by her, but was being let. On that basis the eviction order was granted in the magistrate's court. However, on review, it became clear that the house was a mere shack, was already occupied, and was located far from the evictee's workplace. The eviction order was consequently set aside.)

In PE Municipality, the Constitutional Court considered the analogous provisions of the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act, and the factors to be taken into account when considering an eviction application. The Court emphasized that the set of statutory factors is not a closed list, and that the Court has a broad discretion concerning what factors to take into account and what weight to attach to each.[1] The Court stated that technical questions, such as onus of proof, should not play an unduly significant role.[2] Sachs J characterized the nature of the enquiry in this passage:

> The court is not resolving a civil dispute as to who has rights under land law; the existence of unlawfulness is the foundation of the enquiry, not its subject-matter. What the court is called upon to do is to decide whether, bearing in mind the values of the Constitution, in upholding and enforcing land rights, it is appropriate to issue an order which has the effect of depriving people of their homes.[3]

This passage tends to suggest that the enquiry is not a legal question at all, but a moral question based on the Final Constitution's value system, a question located somehow outside (constitutional) land law.[4] However, in our view, the passage is best read, not as suggesting that the eviction enquiry is an extra-legal question, but instead as authority for three propositions. First, proof of unlawful occupation alone is not a sufficient basis on which to grant eviction, though it is a prerequisite. Secondly, the statutory factors relevant to granting eviction orders must be interpreted and applied bearing in mind underlying constitutional values, and are not a closed list. Finally, the court has a broad discretion, both as to procedure and substance, when considering eviction cases.

4. Granting an eviction order

Once the court is satisfied that all the procedural requirements have been met and that it is indeed fair in the circumstances, an eviction order will be granted. The order has to contain two distinct dates: the date on which the house or dwelling has to be evacuated; and the date on which the eviction order will be carried out if the occupiers have not left the land of their own accord.[5] Both dates have to be fair. The Land Claims Court has indicated its dissatisfaction with lower courts granting eviction orders without providing for the two relevant dates.[6] The date has to be determined so that it leaves sufficient time for the automatic review

[1] Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC)('PE Municipality') at paras 30-31.

[2] Ibid at para 32.

[3] Ibid.

[4] The passage suggests a 'natural law' theory of land law in which law is not law unless it is just. See WB le Roux 'Natural Law Theories' in C Roederer & D Moellendorf Jurisprudence (2006) 25ff.

[5] ESTA s 12(1).

[6] See also McKenzie NO & Another v Lukas & Others LCC Case 11R/04 (Unreported judgment, 22 April 2004).

proceedings to be completed.[1] Depending on the circumstances, the eviction order may also include an order granting compensation for structures and buildings erected by the occupier or for improvements or crops planted by the occupier.[2] If there are outstanding wages to be paid, these wages may also be reflected in an eviction order.

Sometimes, eviction applications are overtaken by events. In Modderklip, the Constitutional Court showed its willingness to fashion creative remedies to solve apparently intractable conflicts over land.[3] In this case, the three key players, the land owner, the 40 000 unlawful occupiers and the state, were all in impossible positions: the land owner could neither evict the occupiers nor use its land; the occupiers had no alternative land; and the state could not (as a practical reality) enforce the eviction order or provide alternative land for the occupiers. The Court awarded constitutional damages to the land owner, noting that this remedy resolved the impasse: 'It compensates Modderklip for the unlawful occupation of its property in violation of its rights; it ensures the unlawful occupiers will continue to have accommodation until suitable alternatives are found and it relieves the State of the urgent task of having to find such alternatives.'[4]

5. Urgent eviction proceedings

Section 15 of the ESTA provides for urgent eviction proceedings. Such an order may be granted in identical circumstances to those provided for under the Labour Tenants Act considered above.[5] Although urgent, reasonable notice still needs to be given to the municipality in the jurisdictional area and the relevant office of the Department of Land Affairs.[6] 'Real and imminent danger', as contemplated in s 15(1)(a), relates to both the occupier and the land owner.[7] Although never a final order, urgent orders will only be granted if the court is satisfied that all of the requirements have been met. Applicants should thus have clear evidence of threatening conduct,[8] and applications based on mere assumptions and speculation will not be granted.[9]

[1] Eggersgluz & Another v Trayishile Kethese & Others LCC Case 13R/99 (Unreported judgment, 6 April 1999); Spies v Mahlangu LCC Case 19R/00 (Unreported judgment, 22 March 2000); Vooraus Beleggings (Edms) Bpk v Molefe LCC Case 9R/00 (Unreported judgment, 7 March 2000).

[2] ESTA s 13(1)(a).

[3] President of RSA & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd & Others (Agri SA and Others, Amici Curiae*)* 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 59.

[5] See § 48.6*(b)*(i) supra.

[6] ESTA s 15(2).

[7] Grand Valley (Edms) Bpk v Nkosi LCC Case 73/99 (Unreported judgment, 25 June 1999).

[8] Inhoek Varkboerdery (Edms) Bpk v Kok & Others LCC Case 03R/05 (Unreported judgment, 4 February 2005).

[9] Gili Greenworld Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Shisonge [2002] JOL 9930 (LCC).

(gg) Mediation and Arbitration

As we noted above, the constitutional value of ubuntu provides support for an interpretation of land legislation that prefers mediated solutions to adversarial confrontation.[1] Section 21 of the ESTA provides for mediation proceedings in certain circumstances. Although the decision of Sachs J in PE Municipality dealt with eviction proceedings under PIE, it is clearly relevant to evictions in general. The PE Municipality Court made it clear that whether mediation had occurred or not would be one factor when considering whether the eviction would be fair in the circumstances.[2] If there has been no attempt at mediation, negative inferences may be drawn as regards the fairness of the eviction. A mediator may be appointed by either of the parties[3] or the Director-General of Land Affairs.[4] Disputes may also be referred to arbitration under s 22 of the ESTA, in which case the general provisions of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965 will apply.

(hh) Review proceedings

Although the initial idea was that automatic review proceedings would only be an interim measure while all the relevant parties and the court functionaries were still unfamiliar with the workings of the ESTA, s 19(3) has not been repealed.

The purpose of automatic review proceedings is to ensure that only evictions that have met all of the substantive and procedural requirements are carried out. Recent case law has confirmed that new evidence, facts or correspondence may not be introduced in these proceedings.[5] In cases where new evidence comes to the fore on review, the case is usually remitted to the magistrate.

(v) The Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 ('the CLRA')

(aa) General

Although the CLRA is the embodiment of government's commitment to tenure reform, as set out in FC s 25(6) and (9), various sections also fit within the redistribution programme.[6] The mechanism used to achieve the objectives of redistribution, and tenure security in particular, is to enable 'new order rights' to replace 'old order rights' in communal areas. These rights may be held individually or communally.

[1] See § 48.4 supra.
[2] PE Municipality (supra) at para 43.
[3] ESTA s 21(1).
[4] ESTA s 21(2).
[5] Eikenbosch Farm (Pty) Ltd v Matthews 2003 (4) SA 283 (LCC).
[6] For the aims and functioning of the redistribution programme, see § 48.6 supra. See also H Mostert & J Pienaar Modern Studies in Property Law III (2005) 317-22.

(bb) Application

The CLRA is principally applicable to communal land, namely land occupied or used by a community or its members subject to rules of that community.[1] If land falls within the ambit of s 2, the Act applies and communities have no choice but to participate.[2]

The broad categories of land set out in s 2 all relate to some extent to the pre-1991 land control system.[3] State land that is beneficially occupied[4] and that has vested at any time in the governments of the former self-governing territories[5] or national states[6] form one such broad category. This category also includes non-disposed[7] state land that vested in the SA Development Trust and certain other trusts.[8]

The categories of land to which the CLRA applies reflect its primary application to traditional communal areas. However, the CLRA also goes beyond the pre-1991 land regime by providing that it applies to 'beneficiaries of communal land or land tenure rights in terms of other land reform laws' and by catering for a number of 'new' categories of communal land.[9] Significantly, it also applies to 'any other land, including land which provides equitable access to land to a community as contemplated in section 25(5) of the Constitution'.[10] Under the

[1] See CLRA s 2. 'Community' is defined in the CLRA and the Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994 as a group of persons whose rights to land are derived from shared rules determining access to land held in common by the group. See also Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd 2001 (3) SA 193 (LCC) at 1330A-B; GJ Pienaar 'The Land Titling Debate in South Africa' (2006) TSAR 435, 441-45; GJ Pienaar 'The Meaning of the Concept Community in South African Land Tenure Legislation' (2005) 16 Stellenbosch LR 60.

[2] The default provisions come into effect when the community refrains from constituting a juristic person as determined in ss 3 and 9 of the CLRA.

[3] The list of repealed legislation refers to the land legislation promulgated in the former Bophuthatswana, Venda, Ciskei, QwaQwa, KwaNdebele and Transkei, and amends various sections of the KwaZulu Ingonyama Trust Act of 1994.

[4] Beneficial occupation entails occupation by a person or community for a continuous period of not less than five years prior to 31 December 1997 as if that person was the owner, without force, openly and without the permission of the owner.

[5] QwaQwa, KwaNdebele, Gazankulu, KwaZulu, Lebowa and KaNgwane.

[6] Transkei, Ciskei, Venda and Bophuthatswana.

[7] Under the State Land Disposal Act 48 of 1961. Land that was listed in the Schedule to the Black Land Act before it was repealed and land listed as 'released areas' under the Development Trust and Land Act are also included. Finally, it also relates to land subject to the KwaZulu-Natal Ingonyama Trust.

[8] Development and Trust Land Act 18 of 1936. The SA Development Trust (SADT) was disestablished in March 1992 and land held by the Trust was transferred to the (then) Administrators of the former Transvaal and Orange Free State provinces, to the Minister of Regional and Land Affairs and the governments of the former self-governing territories (Proc R28 in GG 13906 of 31 March 1992). The dismantling of the SADT was a necessary consequence of the White Paper on Land Reform of 1991 and of the impending unification of South Africa's borders under the new constitutional dispensation.

[9] CLRA ss 39 and 2(1)(c) and (d). For example, it incorporates 'land acquired by or for a community whether registered or not'.

[10] Ibid s 2(1)(d).

redistribution programme (and tenure reform programme) it has become possible for communities to become land owners via a communal property association.[1]

(cc) 'Old order' and 'new order' rights

Section 4 of the CLRA gives effect to FC s 25(6) by confronting the issue of rights that are legally insecure as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices. In addressing this issue, the rights and relations of the 'old South Africa' come into play — hence the reference to 'old order rights'. To move from 'old order' rights to 'new order' rights, the CLRA provides for the transfer, confirmation or cancellation of these rights.

'Old order rights' include 'any tenure rights in communal land or any other rights over communal land whether formal or informal, registered or unregistered, derived from or recognized by law (including customary law, practice and usage)'.[2] This definition excludes rights of occupancy,[3] labour tenancy,[4] sharecropping,[5] or rights in terms of an employment contract.[6]

'New order rights', although not clearly defined, generally involve a tenure right in communal or other land which has been confirmed, converted, conferred or validated by the Minister under s 18 of the Act.[7]

Communal land is generally held by the state.[8] The tribal head or 'chief' (or traditional leader) manages the land in trust for the community and allocates land to individual families via the family head. Accordingly, community members occupy the land on a communal basis under the overall authority of traditional leaders. Land allocated to community members usually consists of two parcels of land: one to be utilized for residential and the other for agricultural purposes.[9]

[1] See § 48.7*(b)*(iii) supra. Although s 2(2) of the CLRA states that the Minister will determine the extent of the land affected by this provision by way of notice in the Government Gazette, s 2(2) confuses the scope of the CLRA and CPA Act since the provisions may impact on the same land. The implications of s 2(1)(c) and (d) read with s 39 are much more far-reaching than initially meets the eye.

[2] CLRA s 1 — interpretation clause (emphasis added).

[3] This understanding of occupancy would include instances where occupancy is purely on a contractual basis, with the assumption that the occupancy can be terminated in accordance with the agreement.

[4] These rights have already been dealt with in the context of the Labour Tenants Act. See § 48.6*(b)*(i) supra.

[5] Sharecropping was a form of labour tenancy and has thus also been dealt with under the labour tenancy legislation. See JM Pienaar 'Farm Workers: Extending Security of Tenure in Terms of Recent Legislation' (1998) 2 SAPR/PL 423.

[6] Occupancy may also coincide with employment. The ESTA will deal with these instances. See the discussion above in § 48.7*(b)*(iv). Occupiers whose rights may be terminated at any stage are also included in this category.

[7] CLRA s 18 constitutes an executive act of the Minister. See § 48.7*(b)*(v)(dd)2. infra.

[8] IC s 229 provided that all land that previously vested in the governments of the national states or self-governing territories would, after 26 April 1994, vest in the Republic of South Africa.

[9] See IP Maithufi 'Law of Property' in JC Bekker, JMT Labuschage & LP Voster (eds) Introduction to Legal Pluralism in South Africa: Customary Law (2002) 56-59; TW Bennett Human Rights and African Customary Law (1995) 37-139.

Other 'informal rights' also prevail in relation to the commons and include water and grazing rights. All of these rights fall within the ambit of 'old order rights' since they are derived from customary law, practice and usage.[1]

The legislature has, however, in the past also intervened in the recognition and regulation of rights in relation to communal land.[2] Proclamation R188 of 1969 provides for two forms of tenure, namely quitrent and permission to occupy.[3] Quitrent refers to the registered occupation of surveyed land for which an annual fee is payable. These portions of land are classified as agricultural, commercial or residential. The permission to occupy is a statutory form of land control which involves the occupation of unsurveyed communal land. Use of the land is guaranteed with the payment of rental. As mentioned above,[4] the Upgrading Act provides for the conversion of quitrent and deeds of grant to full ownership. Since these rights relate to surveyed land, the conversion is automatic. Permission to occupy, being over unsurveyed land, falls under Schedule II of the Upgrading Act and may only be upgraded by means of a registration process, and therefore usually takes much longer to achieve. Tenure security has, to some extent, already been provided for in the Upgrading Act in relation to quitrent and permission to occupy. Despite this provision, these rights also fall within the ambit of 'old order rights' for purposes of the CLRA.[5] Moreover, it appears that the CLRA will generally prevail in respect of such rights.

'Old order rights' also include informal land rights. In the former national states and self-governing territories with abundant communal land, land rights were invariably granted outside the prescribed procedures. This resulted in families occupying and using land for generations without a legal basis for such

[1] See § 48.5 supra.

[2] See CG van der Merwe & J Pienaar 'Land Reform in South Africa' in P Jackson & DC Wilde The Reform of Property Law (1997) 348-52.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See § 48.7*(b)*(i) supra.

[5] None of the provisions providing for the upgrading of tenure rights have been repealed or amended by the CLRA. In fact, the whole of s 3, which provides for the conversion of land tenure rights mentioned in Schedule 2 of the Upgrading Act, is also still intact. Because of certain conditions, these rights are not automatically converted into ownership. The fact that these rights usually relate to unsurveyed land or that additional requirements are needed, such as tribal resolutions, mean that these rights are probably still in the process of being transformed. Apart from permission to occupy, Schedule 2 rights also include 'any right to the occupation of tribal land granted under the indigenous law or customs of the tribe in question'. Section 3 of the Upgrading Act provides for the conversion of Schedule 2 rights into ownership by the Registrar of Deeds through registration of such an erf or piece of land in the name of the applicant. It then proceeds by setting out the required procedure. Significantly, s 3(1)(a)(ii) and (b) refer to conversions being conditional on the obtaining of a tribal or community resolution. These rights are exactly the kind of rights that are being dealt with in the CLRA. The tribal areas and related rights affected by both the Upgrading and the CLRA are identical. Under s 39 of the CLRA, it seems as if the latter will prevail. If this is the case, the continued function of those portions of the Upgrading Act that currently also provide for the conversion of tribal land rights to ownership is unclear. Why would there be two different procedures in place? Perhaps, due to the promulgation of the CLRA, the relevance of the Upgrading Act has now been restricted to Schedule I rights?

allocation. The breakdown of the land administration in these areas has also resulted in many grants not being recorded at all or records being lost or destroyed. Since 1996 these rights have, however, been protected by the Interim Protection Act, as discussed above.[1] Because these rights have been recognized by law they also fall within the ambit of 'old order rights' for purposes of the CLRA.[2]

(dd) Procedure for tenure reform

1. First steps: establishing the community and conducting a land rights enquiry

Before the process of formalizing or securing tenure rights can begin, the community has to be established as a juristic person.[3] The actual registration of land in the name of the community only takes place once community rules have been adopted and registered. Should the community fail to adopt rules, which would stall the transformation process, the Minister responsible for Land Affairs is empowered to draft standard rules for the community.[4] Once it is clear that a particular portion of land is affected by the CLRA and the community rules have been finalized, the Minister announces a land rights enquiry.[5] The land rights enquirer, an official of the Department of Land Affairs or another suitable person,[6] has to conduct an investigation into the situation of a particular community or piece of land, in order to recommend to the Minister whether any existing old order rights need to be transferred, validated, cancelled or recognized.[7] The enquiry must deal with 'all old order and other land rights, including conflicting rights.' The broad powers of the enquirer probably extend to investigations into limited real rights vested in the property. The enquirer will have to deal with conflicting rights: conflicts between family members, conflicting tribal affiliations and boundary conflicts. 'Conflicting rights' may also refer to the effect of possible restitution claims on the land and existing rights and interests.[8]

In selecting from among the 'options available for securing rights',[9] it is necessary to consider the rights at stake as well as all available options. As the tenure reform programme has as one of its basic points of departure that beneficiaries

[1] See § 48.7*(b)*(ii) supra.
[2] Ibid, for the four categories of rights that are protected under this Act.
[3] CLRA s 3, read with s 9.
[4] CLRA s 19(5).
[5] CLRA s 14(1). A notice to that effect is published in the Government Gazette.
[6] CLRA s 15(1).
[7] In order to do that successfully, the person (including persons who assist him or her) may, having regard to constitutional rights, compel the provision of written and verbal evidence; enter and search premises and take possession of documents and articles and convene and attend meetings. See, in general, CLRA s 17.
[8] CLRA s 14(2)(a).
[9] CLRA s 14(2)(c).

should be able to choose their particular form of tenure, the preferences of the particular person or community must be taken into account. The enquiry must also look into the provision of land on an equitable basis,[1] and gender equity.[2] The CLRA has been criticized for allowing traditional structures to perform the functions of land administration committees.[3] The role of women in these structures is limited, and there is a real risk that female interests will not be considered.

Spatial planning, land use management and land development[4] make up other essential aspects of the enquiry. The enquirer must obtain the co-operation of local government structures, including traditional leadership structures in conducting the inquiry.

Once the enquiry has been completed a notice is published containing the results of the enquiry.[5] The publication of the results ostensibly introduces a phase of community participation.[6] However, the CLRA does not envisage any appeal procedure against the findings of the enquirer once the final results have been published. Therefore the only option open to affected communities is to participate during the enquiry phase. The community's ability to participate in negotiating their own future will probably depend on the extent to which the land rights enquirer involves them in the enquiry process.

2. The determination phase

Once the land rights enquirer has lodged his report with the Minister, the Minister exercises her discretion to make a determination in terms of the pivotal s 18 of the CLRA. The process of determination is aimed at identifying the best possible solution for every holder of an 'old order' right. If the Minister is satisfied that all the requirements have been met, she may make the determination taking into account the relevant report, all relevant laws (relating to spatial planning, local government and agriculture),[7] the 'old order rights of all affected holders',[8] and the need for the promotion of gender equity.[9]

When making the determination, the Minister also has to take into account the Integrated Development Plan of each municipality.[10] After consultation with the [1] CLRA s 14(2)(d).

[2] CLRA s 14(2)(g).
[3] See A Claassens 'Women, Customary Law and Discrimination: The Impact of the Communal Land Rights Act' (2005) Acta Juridica 42ff.
[4] CLRA s 14(2)(e).
[5] CLRA s 16*(b)*.
[6] CLRA s 17(1).
[7] This places an almost impossible burden on the Minister. It is inconceivable that she would be able to make such a determination in light of the plethora of existing legislation dealing with the matters listed. It is envisaged that this function would probably be delegated to other functionaries.
[8] Many of these old order rights have not been captured in records, databases or other official documents. Use rights bestowed on women would be especially difficult to 'track down' if holders do not come forward and participate in the enquiry.
[9] CLRA s 18(1).
[10] CLRA s 18(4).

Minister of Local Government, municipalities or other land use regulators, the Minister may also decide to reserve a right for the state (or municipality) and stipulate any land use or other conditions which are necessary for public purposes or which are in the public interest; or to protect the affected land, rights in land, an owner of such land or the holder of such rights; or to give effect to the CLRA.[1]

Where applicable, the location and extent of the land to be transferred to a community or person has to be determined.[2] Boundary conflicts must be settled by the Minister. Nothing in the CLRA compels the Minister in such an event to consult or gain the co-operation of the affected communities. However, it is likely that any such decision by the Minister will constitute administrative action in terms of PAJA. If so, affected persons will be entitled to a fair process (including a hearing) leading up to the decision,[3] to request reasons for the decision,[4] and, where applicable, to apply to court for the review and setting aside of the decision.[5]

Section 18(3) of the CLRA determines that in confirming, converting or cancelling 'old order' rights, the Minister may determine that communal land has to be surveyed and subdivided into sections which are then registered either in the name of the community, individuals or the state.[6] The CLRA does not deal with restrictions on the subdivision of land prescribed by the Prohibition on the Subdivision of Agricultural Land Act ('the Prohibition Act').[7] This legislative silence may simply reflect the anticipation of the repeal of the latter Act. But it may also have been envisaged that the Minister could consent to grant an exemption from the Prohibition Act, as provided for in that Act, while making the determination in terms of s 18 of the CLRA. This simultaneous application of the CLRA and the Prohibition Act is by no means textually self-evident.

The constitutional call for tenure reform is especially relevant with respect to s 18(3)(d). Section 18(3)(d) deals with the fate of 'old order' rights. The determination may confirm the right,[8] convert it into ownership or another new order right, or cancel the right, whereupon the land to which such right relates will be incorporated into the land held by a community and the holder awarded comparable redress. The CLRA does not give any indication of the type of rights that may be confirmed. Confirmation could for instance entail that a right in the form of permission to occupy land will be surveyed and registered, or that 'informal' use rights will be formalized and registered. Confirmation could also, however,

[1] CLRA s 18(4).
[2] CLRA s 18(2).
[3] PAJA s 3.
[4] PAJA s 5.
[5] PAJA s 6.
[6] Probably reserved to the municipality that will be providing services.
[7] Act 70 of 1970. If the land in question is not classified as 'agricultural', the Act is in any event not relevant in this context.
[8] CLRA s 18(3)(d)(i).

refer to rights which are already secure, but which nevertheless must go through the determination process because of s 18(3)(a). It is also unclear whether confirmation will result in an 'old order' right being embodied in a new form, or whether such rights continue to exist unaltered. 'New order rights' must, however, be sufficiently secure to give effect to the constitutional imperative of FC s 25(6).

Because section 18(3)(d)(ii) provides for conversion into either ownership and/or new order rights, it implies that not all 'new order' rights will necessarily be ownership. The Act here anticipates diversification of secure rights to land control and holding.[1] However, different signals are sent by other sections of the Act.[2]

The relationship between ss 12 and 13 with regard to a cancellation of rights under s 18(3)(d)(iii) is also unclear. In the case of s 18 cancellations following a ministerial determination, the land will be incorporated into existing communal land and the holder of the cancelled right will then be awarded comparable redress.[3] On the other hand, s 12 refers to cancellation subsequent to an application by the holder of a right contemplated in FC s 25(6) to the Minister. Section 12(2) further indicates the kind of redress that may be considered: (a) land other than land to which the old order rights relate; (b) compensation in money or in any other form; or (c) a combination of (a) and (b). The Act gives no indication of the factors determining when security will be considered 'impossible', how comparable redress will be determined and at what stage it will be paid, or whether it is payable to communities or to individuals only.

Section 18(4)(b) aims to promote gender equality by providing that a 'new order' right can be conferred on a woman who is a spouse of a male holder of an old order right so that the new order right can be held jointly;[4] or on a woman who is a widow of a male holder of an old order right or succeeded to that right,[5] or that such right can be granted to a woman in her own right.[6] This section attempts to recognize and to develop the customary law rule under which a woman could not hold rights in property so as to bring it into line with the Final Constitution — and in particular, the right to equality in FC s 9.

Finally, during the determination phase, the Minister may validate an old order right that was acquired in good faith or invalidate an old order right that was acquired mala fides. Once the old order right has been validated, it presumably has [1] For example, a permission to occupy can be converted into ownership or a new order right that is something less than ownership, but is still formalized, registered and secure — perhaps an occupational right?

[2] See, eg, CLRA s 9.

[3] CLRA s 18(3)(d)(iii).

[4] CLRA s 18(4)(b)(i).

[5] CLRA s 18(4)(b)(ii).

[6] CLRA s 18(4)(b)(iii). The sentence structure of this clause is nonsensical. It is further evidence of the apparent haste with which the text of the CLRA was drafted.

to be converted into a new order right. It is presumed that this section is aimed at addressing those categories of 'informal' rights, which were granted de facto in the absence of any legal basis, and which currently already enjoy protection under the Interim Protection Act.[1]

(ee) Formalization of tenure rights

Security of tenure is one of the main aims of the Act, and is achieved by way of registration.[2] Once the Minister has made the determination under s 18, registration is the next step. This process results in the community's becoming the lawful holder of rights and obligations in respect of land and can be reflected in the deeds registry. As set out above, the community acquires juristic personality in order to gain legal capacity to deal with the land once the necessary community rules have been registered.[3] It is the Minister's task to ensure that the transfer and registration requirements have been met and it is the task of the land administration committee to ensure that new order rights are then allocated to community members and registered.[4]

(c) Tenure reform: brief evaluation

Since embarking on the tenure reform programme, only one Act, the ESTA, has been constitutionally challenged. In view of the interests of both land owners and occupiers and the concomitant balancing of these rights and interests, as well as the fact that burial rights may only be exercised in prescribed circumstances and once various conditions have been met, the court held, in Nhlabathi v Fick, that the Act was constitutionally sound.[5] Before this decision, in Joubert v Van Rensburg,[6] Flemming DJP remarked obiter on the constitutionality of the ESTA, stating that the Act was not generally applicable,[7] and that it allowed arbitrary deprivation of property,[8] which could not be justified in terms of FC s 36(1).[9] Flemming DJP's decision has been criticized in the academic literature for showing a lack of understanding of the effects of apartheid land law,[10] and for failing to consider the impact of tenure security statutes on the development of the common law.[11] On appeal, neither the SCA,[12] nor the Constitutional Court,[13]

[1] See § 48.7*(b)*(ii) supra.
[2] CLRA s 5(2). See H Mostert & J Pienaar Modern Studies in Property Law III (2005) 332-334, 336.
[3] See § 48.7*(b)*(v)(dd)61 supra.
[4] The land administration committee represents the community that owns the communal land and is empowered to allocate new order rights, once determined by the Minister, to community members. It also has to ensure that the communal land is registered. See CLRA s 25.
[5] Nhlabathi v Fick [2003] 2 All SA 323 (LCC).
[6] 2001 (1) SA 753 (W).
[7] Ibid at para 41 (It only applied in rural areas.)
[8] Ibid at paras 26-44.
[9] Ibid. See AJ van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (2005) 340-42.
[10] M Euijen & C Plasket 'Constitutional Protection of Property and Land Reform' (2001) Annual Survey of South African Law 439ff.
[11] Van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (supra) at 342.
[12] Mkangeli v Joubert 2002 (4) SA 36 (SCA)('Mkangeli (SCA)').
[13] Mkangeli v Joubert 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 316 (CC)('Mkangeli (CC)').

considered the constitutionality of the ESTA. Both courts expressed their displeasure at the way in which this issue had been dealt with in the court a quo.[1]

The constitutional principles of equality and democracy lie at the heart of the CLRA. These principles inform the constitutions of the respective communities to be transformed into juristic persons. The principle of equality requires that one-third of the boards and committes must be women.[2] Furthermore, one member of the committee must represent the interests of vulnerable community members, including women, children and the youth, as well as the elderly and the disabled. Although the committee is generally appointed in accordance with community rules, a recognized traditional council may also fulfil these functions if the relevant community has such a council.[3] When recognized traditional councils perform the functions of land administration committees, one member has to safeguard the interests of women, children, the elderly and the youth. In this situation, despite sweeping provisions in the CLRA providing for gender equity, there is a real risk that land-related issues that affect the vulnerable — especially unmarried women — may be overlooked.[4]

Finally, although the CLRA, when it commences, will play an important role in the formalization of insecure land tenure rights, securing title to communal land by means of registration is by no means uncontroversial. Some authors have argued that the land titling paradigm that informs the legislation is inappropriate and is likely to undermine rather than secure land rights for residents.[5] The poor fit between the CLRA and the core features of African land tenure means that it

[1] See Mkangeli (SCA) at para 27. Brand AJA states that 'statements made by the learned Judge in the Court a quo such as those that I have referred to may give the impression that he failed to approach the question regarding the applicability of ESTA in an intellectually disciplined way and with an open mind. These statements should therefore have been avoided.' In the Constitutional Court Chaskalson P wrote: 'Appeals are brought against orders made by a court and not against comments made in the course of a judgement'. Mkangeli (CC) at para 12. The Mkangeli Court continued:

> The finding made by Flemming DJP that the Tenure Act is inconsistent with the Constitution was not the basis for the orders made by him. The finding is moreover of no force and effect. That is clear from the Constitution and there is no need for this Court to make a declaration to that effect or to hear the appeal for purpose of saying so. Should the constitutionality of the Act become a relevant issue in these or other proceedings it can be brought before this Court in accordance with the proper procedures.

Ibid at para 14.

[2] CLRA s 22(3).

[3] CLRA s 21(3).

[4] See B Cousins '"Embeddedness" Versus Titling: African Land Tenure Systems and the Potential Impact of the Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004' (2005) 16 Stellenbosch LR 488 ('Embeddedness') 507-08. For an exposition of recent developments dealing generally with access to land by African women, see JM Pienaar 'Broadening Access to Land: The Case of African Rural Women in South Africa' (2002) TSAR 177; JC Bekker & LN van Schalkwyk 'All African Women May at Last Own Property' (2005) 38 De Jure 395; AM Janse van Rensburg 'The True Capacity of Women under Customary Rule to Acquire Land: An Exposé on the Law, Land and Rules of Succession' (2003) 14 Stellenbosch LR 282.

[5] Cousins 'Embeddedness' (supra) at 488-513 (Makes reference to tenure reform examples in Mozambique (1997) and Tanzania (1999) which recognize and protect existing occupation and use of communal land and give them the status of property rights, but without requiring their conversion to Western notions of private ownership.).

does not provide adequately for the recognition and protection of existing rights of occupation and use; is likely to undermine the rights of female members of households who are not spouses; reinforces distortions of traditional authority bequeathed by colonial and apartheid policies; is likely to generate boundary disputes; and does not adequately address the range of situations, needs and problems in relation to communal land that currently exists.

48.8 FC s 25(7): Restitution

(a) Introduction

FC s 25(7) provides that a person or community dispossessed of property after 19 June 1913 as a result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices is entitled, to the extent provided by an Act of Parliament, either to restitution of that property or to equitable redress.

The date 19 June 1913 is crucial to the restitution programme. The notorious Black Land Act, which commenced at that time, divided the country into scheduled areas (reserved for the exclusive occupation of black persons) and other land available to the white, coloured and Indian populations respectively. Twenty-three years later, the area available for black occupation was extended by the South African Development Trust and Land Act 18 of 1936.[1] In order to effect the division between black and 'other' land, communities were uprooted and moved all over the country — invariably by force. The various Group Areas Acts further entrenched the racially-based land control system.[2]

In terms of IC s 121 and FC s 25(7), the restitution process must be regulated by an Act of Parliament. The Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994 ('the Restitution Act') was enacted shortly after the transition to democracy, and has remained in force, although subject to several amendments, under the Final Constitution.[3] The preamble to the Restitution Act refers to the constitutional right to restitution and states the aim of the Act as being to promote the advancement of persons, groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to promote their full and equal enjoyment of rights in land. The two main role players in the restitution process are the Commission on Restitution of Land Rights[4] and the Land Claims Court.[5]

[1] For background to the Act, see JM Pienaar 'Farm Workers: Extending Security of Tenure in Terms of Recent Legislation' (1998) 2 SAPR/PL 423, 423-428; R Haines & CR Cross 'An Historical Overview of Land Policy and Tenure in South Africa's Black Areas' in CR Cross & RJ Haines (eds) Towards Freehold? Options for Land and Development in South Africa's Black Rural Areas (1988) 73-92.

[2] The Group Areas Act 41 of 1950; the Group Areas Act 36 of 1966.

[3] See T Roux 'The Restitution of Land Rights Act' in G Budlender, J Latsky & T Roux Juta's New Land Law (Original Service, 1998) Chapter 3; V Jaichand Restitution of Land: A Workbook (1997) 53-76; D Carey-Miller & A Pope Land Title in South Africa (2000) 313-97.

[4] See Restitution Act Chapter II.

[5] See Restitution Act Chapter III.

(b) Role players

(i) The Commission on Restitution of Land Rights

The Commission on Restitution of Land Rights consists of the Chief Land Claims Commissioner (appointed by the Minister of Land Affairs), a Deputy Land Claims Commissioner and a number of regional land claims commissioners.[1] The general functions of the Commission are to receive claims lodged under the Restitution Act; to assist claimants in the preparation and submission of claims and to advise claimants of the progress of their claims.[2]

The role of the Commission is investigative,[3] facilitative and mediatory.[4] It is further authorized to monitor and to make recommendations regarding the implementation of orders made by the Land Claims Court, to make recommendations to the Minister with regard to claimants who do not qualify for relief under the Restitution Act, to apply to court for a declaratory order regarding a question of law, and to ensure that priority is given to claims which affect a substantial number of persons.[5] The Commission also has the power to conduct investigations and to demand particulars or documents relevant to restitution claims.

(ii) The Land Claims Court

The Land Claims Court has national jurisdiction, similar to that of a provincial division of the High Court in civil proceedings, as well as all the ancillary powers necessary or reasonably incidental to the performance of its functions.[6] Although some cases can be referred to the Court by the Commission, claimants are also able to approach the Land Claims Court directly.[7] Generally the Land Claims Court has the following powers:[8] to determine the restitution of any right in

[1] Restitution Act s 4(3).

[2] Restitution Act s 6(1).

[3] See Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Agriculture and Land Affairs 2005 (4) SA 212 (SCA), [2005] JOL 14177 (SCA)('Transvaal Agricultural Union') at para 71 (The nature of the investigation undertaken by the Commission prior to the publication of the s 11 notice was investigated. It was found that the phase before publication of the said notice was investigative and not adjudicative and that none of the procedural steps which might culminate in a hearing before the Land Claims Court was clothed with absolute finality.)

[4] Farjas v Regional Land Claims Commissioner, KwaZulu Natal 1998 (2) SA 100 (LCC), 1998 (5) BCLR 579 (LCC), [1998] 1 All SA 490 (LCC).

[5] See PJ Badenhorst, J Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (5th Edition, 2006)('Silberberg 5th Edition') Chapter 22, Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 334-39.

[6] Restitution Act ss 22-38. See Badenhorst, Pienaar & Mostert Silberberg 5th Edition (supra) at Chapter 22, Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 367-88. Provision was made for the establishment of the court in s 123 of the Interim Constitution and the operation of the court is currently regulated by Chapter III of the Restitution Act.

[7] Restitution Act s 38A. See Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 388; Department of Land Affairs v Witz: In re Various Portions of Grassy Park 2006 (1) SA 86 (LCC). When the court is approached directly, it is not necessary to lodge a claim with the Commission as well.

[8] Restitution Act s 22(1).

land in accordance with the Act; to determine compensation; to determine the person entitled to ownership; to grant a declaratory order with regard to a question of law relating to any matter in respect of which the court has jurisdiction; and to determine all matters that need to be determined under IC ss 121-123.

In order to accommodate as many (bona fide) claims as possible and to expedite matters, it was decided that any evidence, including oral evidence, would be admissible.[1] The test is whether the evidence is relevant and cogent to the matter being heard, irrespective of whether the specific evidence would ordinarily be admissible in other courts. In some instances, a pre-trial conference may be convened to expedite matters.

When considering claims, the court will have regard to many factors,[2] including the desirability of providing for the restitution of rights; the desirability of remedying past violations of human rights; the requirements of justice and equity; the feasibility of specific restoration; the desirability of avoiding (another) major social disruption; the amount of compensation or other consideration paid when the dispossession occurred; the history of the dispossession, the hardship caused and the current use of the land; and any other factor that the court considers relevant and consistent with the spirit of the Final Constitution.

The court may order restoration of the claimed land or alternative land or rights in land, award compensation or order that a claimant be declared a beneficiary of a state support programme, or any combination of these orders.[3] Court orders can also be granted conditionally.[4]

(c) Restitution procedure

All restitution claims are first screened by the Land Claims Commission. Disqualified claims are ignored and validated claims processed. This screening process entails the issuance of a compliance certificate and drafting a case report that sets out the basis of acceptance. Aggrieved claimants can at this stage approach the Land Claims Court for review of the Commission's conduct. The aim, however, is to attempt to solve as many claims as possible by way of administrative and mediation procedures. As we noted above, this non-confrontational approach promotes the constitutional value of ubuntu.[5] As a result, the majority of claims are handled by the Commission. Only the complicated claims or those claims that cannot be finalized by way of mediation are referred to the Land Claims Court for adjudication.[6]

[1] Restitution Act s 30.
[2] Restitution Act s 33. See Badenhorst, Pienaar & Mostert Silberberg 5th Edition (supra) at Chapter 22, Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 373-74.
[3] Restitution Act s 35(1)(a)-(e).
[4] Restitution Act s 25(2)(a). See eg In re: Kranspoort Community 2000 (2) SA 124 (LCC).
[5] See § 48.4 supra.
[6] Restitution Act s 14(2).

(i) Formal requirements

A person's claim will be disqualified if:[1] the claim was not lodged between 1 May 1995 and 31 December 1998;[2] the applicant received just and equitable compensation when the dispossession occurred;[3] or any other form of just and equitable consideration.[4] Once the formal requirements have been considered, the second phase of the process, in which the substantive requirements are considered,[5] commences. Once all the requirements have been met, the claim is accepted and processed.

(ii) Substantive requirements

In Richtersveld (CC), the Court set out the requirements to found a restitution claim as follows:

(a) that the Richtersveld Community is a 'community' or 'part of a community' as envisaged by the subsection;
(b) that the Community had a 'right in land' as envisaged;
(c) that such a right in land continued to exist after 19 June 1913;
(d) that the Community was, after 19 June 1913, 'dispossessed' of such 'right in land';
(e) that such dispossession was the 'result of past racially discriminatory laws or practices'; and
(f) that the Community's claim for 'restitution' was lodged not later than 31 December 1998.

Before Richtersveld (CC), the lower courts had placed a fairly restrictive gloss on these requirements. The Constitutional Court reversed many aspects of this parsimonious approach.

[1] Restitution Act s 2(1)(a).

[2] At the end of 2003 it became clear that about 1000 land claims, lodged with the Eastern Cape Land Claims Commissioner, were erroneously rejected. The Minister of Land Affairs confirmed that no further extension of the period for lodgement of claims would be possible. The Minister is currently considering other forms of relief for these persons, inter alia as beneficiaries of the land redistribution programme.

[3] 'Just and equitable' refers to the term as set out in FC s 25(3). In most instances compensation was paid, but it was hardly 'just and equitable'. See Roux 'The Restitution of Land Rights Act' (supra) at 3A20–3A22.

[4] Expropriations under the Expropriation Act 63 of 1975 are also excluded. These expropriations were for public purposes and included the expropriation of land for the building of roads, schools and hospitals. See Ndebele-Ndzundza Community v The Farm Kafferskraal 2003 (5) SA 375 (LCC), [2003] 1 All SA 608 (LCC)('Ndebele-Ndzundza') at para 29 (It was argued that the farm to which the claimants were removed constituted compensation for purposes of the Restitution Act, thereby disqualifying the claim since it did not meet the threshold requirement. The court found that it did not constitute compensation since no compensation was computed at the 'time of dispossession'. Furthermore, the farm had been provided as part of an envisaged homeland consolidation plan (into the subsequent Lebowa homeland) which constituted a discriminatory act in itself: 'to accept as compensation, land given in furtherance of such policies would be tantamount to buttressing the very acts the Constitution and [Restitution] Act are intended to undo.')

[5] These requirements are also set out in Restitution Act s 2.

(aa) Standing

The following persons qualify as applicants: persons, communities or part of communities that had been dispossessed of land or rights in land on or after 19 June 1913.[1] A community is any group of persons whose rights in land are derived from shared rules determining access to land held in common by members of the group,[2] and includes part of a group. These persons' descendants would also qualify as applicants. A spouse or partner in a customary marriage qualifies as a descendant for this purpose.[3] Any person, irrespective of race, may institute a claim as long as all of the requirements in s 2 are met. In principle, no category of citizens is excluded from the Restitution Act.[4]

(bb) Dispossession

The Restitution Act contains no definition of 'dispossession'. It has thus been up to the courts to interpret the concept. Recent case law has indicated that dispossession must be broadly interpreted.[5] It is not a requirement that the claimant have lost actual physical occupation of the property.[6] Nor is a forced removal required.[7] In Ndebele-Ndzundza Community v The Farms Kafferskraal no 181 JS, the court found that the cumulative effect of various laws and practices eroded the rights of the claimants and that this directly or indirectly induced them to vacate the farm.[8] A specific date of dispossession is also not required,[9] since dispossession may occur over a period of time.[10]

[1] See Badenhorst, Pienaar & Mostert Silberberg 5th Edition (supra) Chapter 22; Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 327-30; Roux 'The Restitution of Land Rights Act' (supra) at 3A9–3A13.

[2] This definition is identical to the definition of 'community' for purposes of the CLRA.

[3] Customary marriages were thus recognized for this purpose even before their official recognition in the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act 120 of 1998. .

[4] Department of Land Affairs v Witz, In Re Various Portions of Grassy Park 2006 (1) SA 86, 101A-D (LCC); Randall v Minister of Land Affairs, Knott v Minister of Land Affairs 2006 (3) SA 216 (LCC), [2002] JOL 9682 (LCC)('Randall'). Both these cases involved restitution claims instituted by white persons.

[5] Prinsloo & Another v The Ndebele-Ndzundza & Others 2005 (6) SA 144 (SCA)('Prinsloo') at para 46.

[6] See Dulabh v Department of Land Affairs 1997 (4) SA 1108 (LCC), [1997] 3 All SA 635 (LCC)('Dulabh')(Decided under IC s 121, the question was whether the claimants would qualify as applicants under the Act when they had never lost physical possession of the property concerned. In this instance, the court found that the claimants never indicated their willingness to let go of the property — leasing the property for over 20 years was a clear indication of the family's determination to remain in physical control. It was found that the prohibition on the transfer of property to an heiress and the subsequent sale thereof to the Development Board constituted a dispossession of her right in land, more specifically her right to inherit and take transfer of the property.)

[7] See Ex parte Pillay LCC Case 1/99 (Unreported judgment, 13 September 2004) at para 9; Abrams v Allie & Others 2004 (4) SA 534 (SCA), 2004 (9) BLLR 914 (SCA), [2004] 2 All SA 99 (SCA)('Abrams') at para 11. See also Botha Family Trust (supra) at para 48 (Court found that the loss of control over the area over which for many decades the community had unrestricted access and control amounted to dispossession.)

[8] 2003 (5) SA 375 (LCC) at para 21.

[9] Richtersveld (CC) eliminated the specific date requirement. But see Jacobs v Department of Land Affairs LCC Case 3/98 (Unreported judgment, 28 February 2000)(Court held that there must be a particular moment in time from when the dispossessed person (or community) did not have a particular right anymore.)

[10] Mpehla contradicts the finding in Kranspoort Community concerning the Farm Kranspoort 48 JS 2000 (2) SA 124 (LCC)(Court decided that dispossession could not take place over a period of time.)

Depending on the circumstances, it can be difficult to ascertain whether dispossession took place. For example, what if owners sold their properties, after a particular area had been proclaimed a group area, for fear of its being expropriated? Would that constitute dispossession? In Ex parte Pillay,[1] the property was sold to a private individual (and not an organ of state) two years prior to the declaration as a group area. Here it was clear that the area had been earmarked to be declared a group area. The court found that a sale of property could still constitute a dispossession if 'some outside agency' or some 'element of compulsion' was involved.[2] The emphasis should not be on the party to whom the property was sold, but rather what prompted the sale. The court found that the loss of possession was a result of outside pressure from a racially discriminatory law or practice, which constituted dispossession for purposes of the Act.[3]

Department of Land Affairs v Witz, In Re Various Portions of Grassy Park[4] and Randall v Minister of Land Affairs, Knott v Minister of Land Affairs[5] relate to (white) owners selling properties in terms of the Group Areas Act and legislation regulating the consolidation of national states respectively. In the first case, various properties were affected by a Group Areas Act declaration transferring the properties from a white group area to a coloured group area. A permit allowed the owner to subdivide the properties and to sell them within a period of one year. However, the family concerned managed to sell off the properties piecemeal over a period of 11 years, with the help of an estate agent. Here the court emphasized that the initial owner elected to acquire the properties to sell them under a permit he voluntarily applied for, keeping in mind that, as a disqualified person, he was in principle prevented from handling the properties at all.[6] In these circumstances the court found that there had been no dispossession.

In Randall and Knott, owners were forced to sell off properties under homeland consolidation provisions. In these cases both the manner in which properties were acquired[7] and the structure of purchase prices were problematic. A portion of the purchase price was paid in the form of a registered stock certificate and the balance was paid in cash. Not only did the owners not have a choice in how the funds were to be paid, but the government stock did not bear interest at a

[1] Ex parte Pillay (supra).

[2] Ibid at para 9. See also Abrams (supra) at para 12 (The threat of expropriation if the property was not sold to the Development Board induced transactions in the areas involved, making the land transactions not voluntary.)

[3] Ex parte Pillay (supra) at para 11.

[4] 2006 (1) SA 86 (LCC).

[5] 2006 (3) SA 216 (LCC).

[6] Department of Land Affairs v Witz, In Re Various Portions of Grassy Park 2006 (1) SA 86, 98E-F 99A-C (LCC)('Department of Land Affairs')('Put another way, his election resulted not in his dispossession, but on the contrary in his (taking) possession of the properties and being accorded the opportunity to sell with the possibility of realizing their investment potential, the purpose for which the properties were in any event purchased. The subsequent failure of the purchase price to meet the expected investment potential, if indeed that is what occurred, cannot in my view constitute a dispossession as contemplated by the Act.') competitive rate.[1] The court found that these circumstances hardly qualified as a 'willing-buyer-willing-seller' offer,[2] and thus constituted dispossession for purposes of the Restitution Act. Although these cases seem very similar, the Witz family had far more freedom in alienating their properties, managed to do it over a period of time and were able to get the best prices possible.

[7] Randall (supra) at 22E-226D.

(cc) A right in land

The dispossession of any of the following rights, registered or not, will qualify for purposes of the Act:[3] any right in land, including the interest of a labour tenant, a customary interest, the interests of a beneficiary owner or a trust arrangement, including beneficial occupation of a continuous period of no less than ten years prior to the dispossession in question.[4]

The definition of 'right in land' is thus very broad.[5] It bears emphasizing that ownership is not the only right or interest that qualifies, and that customary law rights in land must be recognized.

(dd) After 19 June 1913

In a Constitution that seeks to right historical wrongs, it is inevitable that cut-off dates must be plucked from among the many past injustices and these will therefore be, to some extent, arbitrary lines that decide how far back the Constitution will cast its gaze. Although many dispossessions and deprivations had occurred under colonial rule before this date, the 1913 date was the one agreed on during negotiations preceding the promulgation of the Interim Constitution. This date was consequently confirmed in the Final Constitution and the Restitution Act.[6]

[1] Randall (supra) at 224E-G. In Knott's case the balance was paid in cash over a period of 12 months without any interest.

[2] Ibid at 226I-J.

[3] See P Badenhorst, J Pienaar & H Mostert Silberberg and Schoeman's Law of Property (4th Edition, 2003) Chapter 22, Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 330-31; Roux 'The Restitution of Land Rights Act' (supra) at 3A13-3A16.

[4] Restitution Act s 1. In order to succeed with a claim based on beneficial occupation, the claimants must prove (a) that they derived some benefit from occupation; and (b) that they had the intention to derive benefit (in other words, it is insufficient if the benefit was coincidental or by accident). See Kranspoort Community In Re: The Farm Kranspoort 2000 (2) SA 124 (LCC)(Court found that the community's use and enjoyment rights constituted beneficial occupation and that they had been dispossessed thereof.)

[5] See TW Bennett & CH Powell 'Restoring the Land: The Claims of Aboriginal Title, Customary Law and the Right to Culture' (2005) 16 Stellenbosch LR 431-45 (The authors investigate and ultimately reject the right to culture as a basis for the institution of land claims. They argue that the right to culture as a basis for claiming rights in land would be too restricted and if based on the aboriginal land rights approach, would effectively only benefit cultures that are currently under threat. In the South African set-up it would effectively only benefit Khoisan communities since African culture is thriving.)

[6] Restitution Act s 2. The case sequence of the Richtersveld community has also indicated that the court is not willing to reject that date as the relevant date for restitution purposes.

However, as we shall see, the Constitutional Court in Richtersveld (CC) used fairly creative legal reasoning to prevent this cut-off date from depriving the community of a claim.[1]

(ee) Discriminatory law or practice

The dispossession has to be both the factual and legal result of a racially discriminatory law or practice.[2] From 1999 the three-step approach set out in Minister of Land Affairs v Slamdien[3] was followed in order to determine whether dispossession falls within the ambit of the Restitution Act.[4] This approach required asking:

1. Was the relevant legal measure that enabled the dispossession a 'racially discriminatory law' as referred to in s 2(1)(a) and defined in s 1 of the Restitution Act? [5]
2. Was the conduct a 'racially discriminatory practice'? and
3. Was the dispossession of the property 'as a result of' the law referred to in (a) or the practice referred to in (b)?[6]

Apart from these questions, two further requirements had to be met: namely that the measure or practice had to relate to the exercise of land rights and that it had to be linked with creating spatial racial segregation.[7] In this respect, the court in Slamdien adopted a purposive approach. This approach entailed examining the historical context of the statutory measure as well as the underlying purpose of the Restitution Act. The court concluded:

> The history of the Restitution Act and section 2(1)(a), as set out above, strongly points to its underlying purpose being to address dispossessions of land rights which were the result of a particular class of racially discriminatory laws and practices, namely those that sought specifically to achieve the (then) ideal of spatial apartheid, with each racial and ethnic group being confined to its particular racial zone. These would then be those laws and practices which discriminated against persons on the basis of race in the exercise of rights in land in order to bring about that racial zoning. It does not, in my view, include any racially discriminatory law or practice whatsoever, regardless of the particular area of human activity where the discrimination had its impact.[8] [emphasis added]

This rather rigid approach required claimants to satisfy at least five criteria in order to show that a measure or practice was in fact racially discriminatory. In [1] § 48.8*(c)*(iii) infra.

[2] Boltman v Kotze Community Trust [1999] JOL 5230. See Badenhorst, Pienaar & Mostert Silberberg 5th Edition (supra) Chapter 22, Carey-Miller & Pope (supra) at 331-32; Roux 'The Restitution of Land Rights Act' (supra) at 3A17 — 3A20.

[3] 1999 (4) SA BCLR 413 (LCC), [1999] JOL 4491 (LCC)('Slamdien').

[4] See JM Pienaar 'Racially Discriminatory Law or Practice' for Purposes of the Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994: Recent Developments in Case Law' (2005) 38 De Jure 195.

[5] In this instance it was the Group Areas Act 36 of 1966.

[6] Slamdien (supra) at para 11.

[7] This requirement was articulated in the first decision of Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd. 2001 (3) SA 1293, 1338D-H (LCC), 2004 (8) BCLR 871 (LCC)('Richtersveld (LCC)'). It was rejected in the Supreme Court of Appeal and Constitutional Court decisions.

[8] Slamdien (supra) at para 26.

addition, Slamdien construed the purpose of the Restitution Act narrowly (as concerned only with laws and practices that sought to achieve spatial apartheid). One of the considerations when formulating this 'test' was that a less strict test might open the floodgates[1] and allow many claimants a second 'bite at the cherry'.[2] After being followed in several subsequent cases, the Slamdien approach was largely abandoned by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Richtersveld Community v Alexkor Ltd.[3]

(iii) The requirements in practice: the Richtersveld scenario

The legal battle for the Richtersveld community began in 2001 when the community instituted a claim against the registered land owners, Alexkor Ltd and the state. The land at the heart of the dispute was a narrow strip of land in the Northern Cape along the west coast from the Gariep River (formerly the Orange River) in the north to Port Nolloth in the south. This area formed part of tribal land that had historically been occupied for centuries by the Richtersveld community and its ancestors.

In its first decision in this case,[4] the Land Claims Court confirmed that the community's ancestors had a form of control over the land in question which constituted beneficial occupation,[5] but found that they had lost that control in 1847 when the land was annexed and proclaimed Crown land.[6] Actual dispossession, according to the Land Claims Court, thus took place long before the 1913 Act commenced, resulting in the claim falling outside the ambit of the Restitution Act. The court also concluded that the community had failed to show that dispossession had occurred as a result of discriminatory laws or practices, and rejected the claim.[7]

[1] Slamdien (supra) at para 10.

[2] Pienaar 'Racially Discriminatory Law' (supra) at 195 ff.

[3] 2003 (6) SA 104 (SCA), 2003 (6) BCLR 583 (SCA)('Richtersveld (SCA)') at para 97 (The Court found that the Slamdien approach was 'too restrictive'.)

[4] For more detail, see H Mostert 'The Case of the Richtersveld Community: Promoting Reconciliation or Effecting Division?' (2002) TSAR 160.

[5] In that the community derived benefit from their occupation (hunting there and gathering materials in order to survive) and that the occupation occurred at least ten years before the dispossession of the land.

[6] Here the court confirmed that the doctrine of aboriginal title did not form part of South African law. For a detailed discussion concerning the benefits and drawbacks of the doctrine and whether it applies in the South African situation, see K Lehman 'Aboriginal Title, Indigenous Rights and the Right to Culture' (2004) 20 SAJHR 86. In this article, Lehman specifically analyses the different approaches to the concept of 'indigenous' and the possible consequences for the spirit of national unity and reconciliation that the Final Constitution seeks to achieve.

[7] The court found that the removal of the community resulted from the area being declared a security area. No one, irrespective of race, was allowed access. This conclusion was reached with reference to the Slamdien approach. Slamdien required that three questions be answered in the affirmative and that there be a clear-cut indication that the measures or practice impacted on the exercise of land rights in furtherance of the purpose of achieving spatial racial segregation. When these requirements were applied to the facts in the first Richtersveld case, none of them were satisfied. Accordingly the court found that the measure isolating the Richtersveld community to one portion of the original land was not racially discriminatory. The fact that the community was deemed no to be 'civilised enough' to acquire and hold land rights in the area was not discussed in the initial case. Cf Pienaar 'Racially Discriminatory Law' (supra).

The Richtersveld community appealed successfully to the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1] The court found that the annexation in 1847 in no way meant the end of the community's control over or occupation of the land. Instead, the community remained on the land, used it for pasture, resided on it, had control over water rights and even granted mineral rights to outsiders. This control over the land continued until diamonds were discovered in the 1920s, after which the area was declared to be a security area and the community was relocated.[2] The land was finally registered in the name of the respondent in 1994.[3] The court concluded that the community's rights to land (including minerals and precious stones) were akin to those held under common-law ownership and constituted a 'customary law interest'.[4] This interest satisfied the requirement that the community be the holder of 'rights in land'. When diamonds were discovered, the state conveniently ignored these rights and instead granted full ownership in the land to Alexkor. Thus, dispossession after 1913 had also been established. Finally, the court found that the manner in which the community had been dispossessed of their customary law interest amounted to a racially discriminatory practice in as much as the state had taken the view that the community was not 'civilized' enough to have rights in land.[5]

The SCA considered the three-step approach that was first developed in Slamdien to determine whether the dispossession in question had occurred under a racially discriminatory act or practice.[6] When these requirements were applied to the Precious Stones Act,[7] a seemingly racially neutral act, no dispossession could be shown. However, the SCA in Richtersveld held that there was no indication in the Final Constitution or the Restitution Act that claims should be limited to 'spatial segregation' cases.[8] Accordingly, the SCA overruled Slamdien and, on an expanded understanding of dispossession, held that all the requirements of s 2 had been met.

Following the Richtersveld community's success in the SCA, Alexkor Ltd appealed to the Constitutional Court. Alexkor argued that the SCA had erred

[1] See H Mostert & P Fitzpatrick 'Living in the Margins of History on the Edge of the Country — Legal Foundation and the Richtersveld Community's Title to Land' (2004) TSAR 309-23 for an in-depth discussion of the SCA and Constitutional Court decision. See also AJ van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (2005) 293-96.

[2] Richtersveld (SCA) (supra) at para 61.

[3] Alexkor is a public company established in terms of the Alexkor Limited Act 116 of 1992. It is owned by the second respondent, the South African government and conducts business in the diamond mining sector.

[4] Richtersveld (SCA) (supra) at paras 28-29. See also Bennett & Powell (supra) at 438-41; Lehman (supra) at 86.

[5] Discriminatory practices also include indirect discrimination. In this case it refers to the fact that this community's rights were treated differently to the rights of the white community. Intention or a motive to discriminate on a racial basis is not required.

[6] Richtersveld (SCA) (supra) at paras 96-110.

[7] Act 44 of 1927.

[8] Richtersveld (SCA) (supra) at para 101.

when finding that the community's rights in land had survived the 1847 annexation; and in holding that dispossession resulted from a racially discriminatory law or practice.[1] Consequently, the Constitutional Court had to determine the nature of the rights in land which the community held before the annexation; and whether these rights survived annexation.

The Court approached the problem with reference to indigenous or customary law,[2] and emphasized that the content of these rights could not be determined by reference to common law. The Court re-emphasized the importance of customary law as a legal source: 'In the result, indigenous law feeds into, nourishes, fuses with and becomes part of the amalgam of South African law.'[3]

The Court stressed that customary law was unwritten, practised and passed on from generation to generation,[4] and that it had its own norms and values.[5] Since the focus in this instance was on the Richtersveld community, the nature of its rights had to be determined with reference to the history and usages of this specific community. Undisputed evidence showed that the community always had a communal approach to land holding and that the prospecting of minerals had always been part and parcel of the land rights package.[6] In light of this, the Court concluded that the real character of the title of the community was a > right of communal ownership under indigenous law. The content of that right included the right to exclusive occupation and use of the subject land by members of the Community. The Community had the right to use its water, to use its land for grazing and hunting and to exploit its natural resources, above and beneath the surface. It follows therefore that prior to annexation the Richtersveld Community had a right of ownership in the subject land under indigenous law.[7]

The Court held that it was 'satisfied that under the indigenous law of the Richtersveld Community communal ownership of land included communal ownership of the minerals and precious stones'.[8]

It was thus quite clear that the community had a 'right in land' as required by s 2. The next questions to be answered were whether any rights in land survived the annexation, and if so what the nature of these surviving rights was. In this regard the Court found that there was nothing that suggested that annexation extinguished existing land rights.[9] On the contrary, there were clear indications

[1] Richtersveld (CC) (supra) at para 10.
[2] Ibid at paras 49,55
[3] Ibid at para 51.
[4] Ibid at para 53.
[5] The Court here correctly held that the customary law recognized by the Final Constitution is the 'living' customary law, not the 'official' customary law found in case law and textbooks. See the discussion of customary law in § 48.5 supra.
[6] Richtersveld (CC) (supra) at para 61 (Outsiders were not entitled to prospect or extract minerals in the area concerned.)
[7] Ibid at para 62.
[8] Ibid at para 64.
[9] Ibid at paras 68-69.

that the community continued to grant grazing and mineral leases to outsiders after the annexation.[1] The community furthermore continued to occupy the land, and to claim and exercise rights of ownership over the whole of the Richersveld area. The Court concluded that 'the indigenous law ownership … remained intact as at 19 June 1913.'[2]

The promulgation of the Precious Stones Act 44 of 1927 was a direct consequence of the discovery of diamonds in the subject land. This Act did not recognize rights of owners of land under indigenous law. Only registered rights were recognized. Holders of unregistered rights immediately lost their right to occupy and exploit the land when the Act commenced. The process of dispossession thus began in 1927, although the community was finally dispossessed at the end of 1993 when Alexkor became the registered owner of the land. The 'dispossession' as required by the Restitution Act consequently occurred after 19 June 1913.

But was it a result of racially discriminatory laws or practices? As mentioned above, when the Precious Stones Act commenced, only registered, common law rights were recognized and protected, while customary law rights were ignored. Inevitably, the impact of this approach was racially discriminatory since only black persons were holders of indigenous rights and such rights were not recognized:

> Although it is correct that the Precious Stones Act did not form part of the panoply of legislation giving effect to 'spatial apartheid', its inevitable impact was to deprive the Richtersveld Community of its indigenous law rights in land while recognizing, to a significant extent, the rights of registered owners. In our view, this is racially discriminatory and falls within the scope of the Act.[3]

The three-step approach as applied in Slamdien has thus been abandoned. Instead, the focus has shifted to the impact of the particular measure. A seemingly racially neutral legislative measure may still have a racially discriminatory impact.[4] This new approach accords with the Constitutional Court's approach to unfair discrimination in FC s 9, where the focus is also on the impact of discrimination.[5]

This decision represents the first occasion on which the Constitutional Court

[1] Richtersveld (CC) (supra) at para 77.

[2] Ibid at para 81.

[3] Ibid at para 99.

[4] Since the Richtersveld (CC) decision, this approach has also been followed in Khumalo v Minister of Land Affairs 2005 (2) SA 618 (LCC). Here, a provision in the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927 led to the claimant's family losing property when a certificate was issued by the Commissioner after an investigation and a payment of R2.00. The argument was that the Black Administration Act was a general regulatory measure and that it did not provide for racial zoning or the exercise of land rights as such. The court confirmed that the Slamdien approach was too narrow and focused on the impact of the measure instead. Section 8 of the Black Administration Act had the effect of depriving registered owners of ownership, 'but only if the registered owner was a Native' (at para 19). Because the same result would never have occurred had the owner been a white person, the Act was found to be a racially discriminatory law or practice, thereby meeting the requirement of s 2 of the Restitution Act.

[5] See, generally, C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, M Chaskalson, A Stein & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007).

has placed such a high degree of emphasis on indigenous (or customary) law — not only as a general source of law, but as the origin of ownership or real rights. In so doing, the Court has shown its determination to move away from the narrow, common-law or 'Western' approach to land rights. This shift in emphasis is likely to be significant in cases where the determination of whether there was a 'right in land' is crucial to the success of the claim.

(d) Brief analysis of the restitution programme

(i) Tempo of land restitution

Initially the process of land restitution was slow and the implementation of the Restitution Act problematic. The establishment of regional commissions was hindered by budgetary constraints, capacity problems and staff issues. Government initially adopted a judicial approach to processing land claims, and all claims were referred to the Land Claims Court for adjudication. It soon became clear that a court-driven process was painstakingly slow and antagonistic.[1] Since the commencement of the Restitution Act, it has been amended seven times. Each amendment has been aimed at streamlining the process and ironing out problem areas.[2] South Africa has been on a steep learning curve.[3]

(ii) Number of claims and progress

Approximately 79 000 restitution claims were lodged before the close of the claims submission process.[4] At the end of March 2006 71 645 of these claims had been settled,[5] and 1 067 152 hectares transferred to 1 003 551 beneficiaries comprising 196 667 households. The largest percentage of settled claims is in the Eastern Cape, with Mpumalanga and the Free State sharing the lowest number of settled claims. Urban claims have mainly been settled by way of financial compensation and comprise 93 per cent of the settled claims. It is projected that all outstanding urban claims (1076) will be settled by the end of 2007 and that 3103 rural claims will be settled by the end of 2007 and a further 2251 by the end of 2008.[6] There are a further 1621 'residual' outstanding claims that have to be settled. These claims have been referred to the Land Claims Court as a result of legal issues, links with community or family disputes, where the claimants are untraceable, or where there are still delays in submitting required information or documentation.

[1] See E Stoddard & H Osodo 'Hunger for Land Grows' This Day (14 January 2004) 11-12.
[2] See § 48.8*(d)*(iii) infra, for discussion of the latest amendment to the Act.
[3] Other jurisdictions dealing with land claims have faced similar problems. In Namibia, the goal was to finalize 40 000 claims by the end of 2001. Only 2000 claims have been finalized to date. In Australia 45 out of 540 claims were finalized over a period of 10 years.
[4] T Milazi 'Quick Change and a Two-Sided Coin' Financial Mail (16 January 2004) 21.
[5] Commission on the Restitution of Land Rights Annual Report (2006) 56.
[6] Ibid.

Urban claims are usually individual claims linked to separate title deeds.[1] Rural claims are fewer in number, but are more complicated since they affect vast tracts of land of which large portions have been extensively cultivated or have well-developed infrastructure. Conflicting land claims, in which documentary evidence is vague or non-existent, are also quite common in rural areas.

It is very difficult to ascertain whether, if at all, racial imbalances in the ownership of land have been addressed since the start of the land reform programme.[2] After 1996, title deeds in South Africa have not recorded the race of the rights-holder.[3] Although the Department of Land Affairs can give some indication of the tracts of land that have been restored, the overall picture is incomplete since land may also have been acquired by black persons through the market. Although some sources say that three per cent of land has been transferred since 1994,[4] others claim that this amount only relates to farm land[5] and that these statistics do not accurately reflect reality.

(iii) Innovation to expedite the process

The target date for the finalization of land claims has been extended to the end of 2008. The most recent development in attempting to meet that deadline is the promulgation of the Restitution of Land Rights Amendment Act 48 of 2003. Before this amendment, claims that could not be solved via mediation or the administrative procedure provided for in the Restitution Act were referred to the Land Claims Court for adjudication. The Land Claims Court would then, if necessary, grant an order that the land or right in land be expropriated and compensation determined. The need to go to court caused delays in the restitution process.[6]

The publication of the Amendment Bill in 2003 was met with fierce criticism from agricultural unions claiming that it was opening the door to the 'Zimbabwe scenario' and that constitutional principles were being sacrificed.[7] The new s 42E provides for the purchase, acquisition in any manner or expropriation of land or a right in land by the Minister of Land and Agriculture — without a court order. These options are available to the Minister in two instances: first, when a valid restitution claim has been lodged and the expropriation is linked to the restoration

[1] There are some well-known community claims, like the District Six claims in Cape Town and the Cato Manor claims in Durban.

[2] Before the land reform programme began, it was generally agreed that 87 per cent of the land was held by the white minority population, whereas the black majority possessed only 13 per cent of the land.

[3] G Coetzee 'Grondsake Wil Rasaanduiding op Aktes Sien' Die Burger (5 February 2004) 2.

[4] R Hall & P Jacobs 'Another Look at Land Reform' This Day (24 October 2003) 13-14.

[5] Stoddard and Osodo mention 2.3 per cent. It is widely acknowledged that less than 5 per cent of the land has been transferred.

[6] See ss 35(5) and (5A) of the Restitution Act, now repealed.

[7] M Louw 'Besware Stuit Nie Wet Oor Grond se Onteiening' Die Burger (3 February 2004) 10; J Joubert 'Staat Kan Grond Vat Al sê Boer Nee' Die Burger (18 September 2003) 4.

or awarding of such land, portion of land or right in land; and, secondly, where no such claim has been lodged, but the acquisition is directly related to or affected by such claim, and the acquisition promotes the purpose of restitution.

Apart from the outcry from landowners that the provision was unconstitutional, concerns were raised that the implementation of s 42E would damage investor confidence and economic and agricultural development. The Department of Land Affairs, however, emphasized that the expropriation powers would be used as a last resort and that the amendments to the Act would expedite the process of restitution.[1]

In terms of the new s 42E, expropriation can take place without the court having granted an order to that effect. If a valid land claim has been instituted, the expropriation has as its purpose restoring or awarding such land, portion of land or right in land to the claimant.[2] These 'acquisition powers' are not, however, limited to valid restitution claims only. Land may also be acquired even if there is no valid restitution claim, but the acquisition of the land is directly related to or affected by a restitution claim.[3] Bearing in mind that the rule of law is a key value to be promoted in interpreting FC s 25(7) and land legislation (and in testing land legislation against FC s 25), permitting expropriation without a court order must raise constitutional eyebrows.

To curb the effect of these provisions, the Amendment Act provides that the amount of compensation, as well as the time and manner of payment, have to be determined by agreement or by the Court in accordance with FC s 25(3). FC s 25(3), which provides that compensation must be just and equitable. The procedure in the determination process is also governed by rules issued under s 32 of the Restitution Act. Although the power to expropriate land now lies with the Minister, aggrieved parties remain free to approach a court in relation to the amount of compensation and to the manner and time of payment.[4] These acquisitions must also serve the aims of the restitution programme, which should [1] See T McLachlan 'Landmark Expropriation Deal' Daily Dispatch (26 April 2006) 10 and T McLachlan 'Land Reform Landmark' Sowetan (26 April 2006) 27 (With regard to the first case where a farmer received an expropriation notice relating to his farm in the North West province. The notice was published after years of unsuccessful negotiations. However, before the land could be expropriated, the land owner accepted an offer of R2 million. According to the Department of Land Affairs this case is a clear indication that expropriation will only be employed as a last resort). The second expropriation notice issued was in June 2006 in the Mpumalanga province after three years of unsuccessful negotiations. See S Yende 'Expropriation Talk Put on Hold' City Press (11 June 2006) 4.

[2] ESTA s 42(1)(a)(i).

[3] ESTA s 42(1)(b).

[4] N Wilson 'Lawyer Allays Fear of Land Grabs' Business Day (28 January 2004) 8. Academic authority suggests that market value is not an overriding factor, but only one of the many factors to be taken into account in determining the amount of compensation. See AJ van der Walt 'Reconciling the State's Duties to Promote Land Reform and to Pay "Just and Equitable" Compensation for Expropriation' (2006) 123 SALJ 23, 23-40. It is thus quite possible that the final amount to be paid could be below market value — depending on the particular circumstances. It has also been suggested that it would be quite legitimate for the legislature to set down a general land reform discount for compensation — provided that the legislature leaves room for adjustments based on individual circumstances.

ensure that acquisitions and expropriations will not occur in a haphazard manner. As administrative action, the whole process is also subject to review by a court in terms of PAJA. In addition, the Minister only needs to fall back on these 'last-resort' powers if the usual mediation procedures fail. For these reasons, s 42E in our view passes constitutional muster under FC s 25, or is saved by the restitutionary justice provision in FC s 25(8) read with the general limitations clause in FC s 36.

(iv) Budget

The funds allocated for land reform have increased from R770 million in the 2000/2001 fiscal year to R1.7 billion in 2003/2004. Expectations are that funding for the restitution programme alone will increase to R1.4 billion by 2006/2007.[1] In the 2004 budget, R933 million was allocated to restitution alone. That increase can probably be ascribed to the fact that 2005 was the initial target date for the completion of restitution claims and that government was hoping that the deadline would be met by allocating more money at that stage.

Despite these increases, critics have commented that the budget is still a 'Cinderella budget'.[2] They point out that national increases do not correlate with the increased operational costs of the Department of Land Affairs and the Land Claims Commission. In the past, the combined budgets for redistribution and restitution have added up to 0.4 per cent of the total national budget. Though the allocation to land reform has increased, it still remains less than 1 per cent of the total budget.

Land restitution for the period 1995-2005 has cost the government approximately R2.8 billion. In comparison to other departments, the Department of Land Affairs is doing very well at spending its funds, with an average of 98 per cent of the budget having been spent, of which about 80 per cent has been spent on land reform.

As set out above, the claims that still have to be settled are sizeable. The cost of settling these claims is conservatively estimated at between R2-billion and R10-billion. It is clear that the current and envisaged budgets fall far short of what is required.

(v) Sustainable development and agriculture

It is estimated that 30-35 per cent of all farm land in South Africa is subject to land claims.[3] This accounts for 20 per cent of land nationally, with two provinces (Mpumalanga and Limpopo) facing land claims that affect about 50 per cent of [1] An additional R750 million over the next three years was also allocated towards supporting newcomers to the agricultural sector forming part of the redistribution and agricultural development initiatives of government.

[2] Mail & Guardian (20 February 2004).

[3] See, eg, W Hartley 'Land Claims 'No Risk to Food Security' Business Day (8 January 2004) 3.

agricultural land. Concern has been voiced over the decline in agricultural production levels after resettlement, and that food production may be compromised. In order to address this issue, government introduced the Agricultural Strategic Plan in 2001 and, in February 2004, announced a new comprehensive agricultural support programme.[1] It is imperative that the redistribution and restitution of land coincide with the redistribution and transfer of capacity and skills.[2] It is abundantly clear that allocating land alone is no longer a guarantee for successful farming in the 21st century.[3]

(vi) Community-related problems

Six years after the Elandskloof restitution claim was settled, hardly any development has taken place on the land. This failure has mainly been due to in-fighting in the community and a lack of skills. The community, consisting of 300 persons, is unable to decide on the priorities to be included in its development plan. Because the community is the owner of the land, the municipality is not part of the initial development process and cannot (or will not) get involved. Recent infighting in Ndabeni, Cape Town, has also resulted in no benefits being provided to persons to whom land was allocated in 2001.[4] These examples highlight a few shortcomings in the process: communities need assistance in drafting development plans and getting the development process up and running. In order to achieve that, the Department of Land Affairs has to remain involved in the communities and should consider implementing monitoring procedures. Merely settling communities on the land after finalization of claims cannot be the end of the process or of the Department's involvement.

(e) Outstanding claims

The outstanding restitution claims to be settled self-evidently include some of the most difficult claims. It remains to be seen whether s 42E of the Restitution Amendment Act will expedite the process so that unnecessary delays in the determination of compensation can be avoided.

The outstanding claims are not only legally complex, but are bound to be costly as well. The implementation of the CLRA will also have an impact on available funding. It has been estimated that the implementation of that Act will cost government about R68.3 million. The real cost however, seems closer to R500 million. Competition for adequate funding within the Department of Land Affairs among the three individual reform programmes is thus envisaged.

[1] The programme centres on the Comprehensive Farmer Support Programme (CASP) and is aimed at the following beneficiaries: LRAD beneficiaries, emerging entrepreneurs, those whose services have collapsed (food production) and beneficiaries of the household food production programme.

[2] For more detail regarding the relationship between land reform and sustainable development, see JM Pienaar 'Land Reform and Sustainable Development: A Marriage of Necessity' (2004) Obiter 269.

[3] The overall picture is more disconcerting when one considers that the funding for agricultural and related research has declined from R338 million in 1997/98 to R262 million in 2002/2003.

[4] W Roelf 'Infighting, Bogus Claims, Buck-Passing, Bureaucracy Snarl Ndabeni Land Restitution' Cape Times (12 July 2006) 4.

49 Sentencing and Punishment

Dirk van Zyl Smit

49.1 Introduction 49-1
49.2 The imposition of punishment 49-2
(a) Legality 49-4
(i) Defining penalties 49-4
(ii) Sentencing guidelines 49-6
(b) Equality 49-7
(c) Proportionality 49-9
(i) Mandatory minimum sentences 49-11
(ii) Preventive sentences 49-17
(iii) Exemplary sentences 49-20
(iv) Punishment for specific crimes 49-21
(d) Dignity: human dignity and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment 49-21
(i) The sentence of death 49-23
(ii) Corporal punishment 49-24
(iii) Imprisonment 49-26
(iv) Life imprisonment 49-27
49.3 The implementation of punishment 49-30
(a) Dignity 49-31
(b) Legality 49-35
(i) During imprisonment 49-35
(ii) On release 49-36

49.1 INTRODUCTION

The Constitution[1] assumes that the State may punish criminal offenders. Section 12(1)(e), for example, sets a relatively high threshold. It allows all punishment, save that which results in individuals being 'treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman and degrading way'.[2] While s 12(1)(e) creates a relatively permissive framework for punishment, a wide of array of other constitutional constraints exist. So even where s 12(1)(e) is not engaged, the State may punish individuals only by means of sentences imposed by the courts following criminal trials that are subject to rigorous constitutional requirements.[3] This chapter will explore how sentencing and punishment are shaped by the fundamental rights recognised by Chapter 2 of the Constitution.

Often, lost among the welter of inquiries into the limits of the State's penal powers is whether the State has a positive constitutional duty to criminalise certain forms of conduct and to ensure that they are punished by appropriately severe penalties. The traditional view is that the State has a wide discretion to decide how to defend the constitutional rights of its citizens. Punishing offenders through the criminal justice system is but one of the options available to it.[4] However, this flexible view of criminal sanctions is increasingly being challenged by the victims' movement. The movement goes to great lengths to point out that the protection of a range of individual rights is normally achieved through the criminal justice system and that, for this modality to be effective, it must be backed by adequate criminal sanctions.[5] South African courts have signalled their acceptance of, though perhaps not fully embraced, the proposition that positive, constitutionally derived duties with respect to criminal sanctions may be placed on the State.[6]

The courts have also indicated that such duties may extend to sentencing and punishment. Azanian People's Organisation (AZAPO) & others v President of the Republic of South Africa & others[7] can be read as authority for the proposition that, other than in the exceptional circumstances of the South African transition to democracy, the family of a deceased person would have a right to seek to

[1] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] See also the reference to sentenced prisoners in FC s 35(2). The provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') corresponding to FC ss 12(1)(e) and 35(1) were IC ss 11(2) and 25(1) respectively.

[3] See F Snyckers 'Criminal Procedure' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) Chapter 27.

[4] For a useful general discussion of the question, 'Kann der Gesetzgeber verpflichtet sein rechtgüterverletzungen zu bestrafen?' see C Roxin Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil (Vol I 1994) 22–23.

[5] For a discussion of the human rights of victims of crime in the context of sentencing generally, see B Emmerson & A Ashworth Human Rights and Criminal Justice (2001) Chapter 18.

[6] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & another 2001(4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[7] 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC). See also S v Makwanyane & another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) ('Makwanyane'). Chaskalson P recognised that the State is obliged to take action to protect human life and held that 'those who commit violent crime should be met with the full rigor of the law'. Ibid at para 117. This passage provides support for the proposition that failure to sanction such action by adequate punishment would be a dereliction of duty on the part of the State.

ensure that the wrongdoers are properly prosecuted and punished. In other jurisdictions such a right has been recognised. In Osman v United Kingdom the European Court of Human Rights commented that the State is enjoined by Article 2(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights 'not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate action to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction'.[1] The Court noted the 'primary duty [of the State] to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the persons backed up by law enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions'.[2]

It is not only the right to life that the State has a duty to protect through the use of criminal sanctions. The Constitutional Court has recognised that the rights of the child should be protected by forceful application of maintenance laws. Such laws may be enforced by contempt of court provisions resulting in the imprisonment of defaulters on maintenance payments.[3] Similarly, the European Court of Human Rights has ruled that children need to be protected by a reformulation of the criminal law to outlaw more effectively assaults in the guise of parental chastisement.[4] Most of these developments deal with an obligation to criminalise behaviour rather than with appropriate sanctions. As a result, the impact such changes will have on constitutional requirements for sentencing law is not yet clear.

A more common question is the extent to which the imposition and the implementation of punishment is restricted by the individual rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights.[5] The analysis of this question forms the bulk of this chapter.

49.2 The Imposition of Punishment

In order to engage questions about the constitutional constraints on the power of the State to punish, one must consider briefly the existing legal framework for sentencing decisions. Historically, exceptionally wide discretion has been granted to courts imposing sentence. Even today no general legislation prescribes the approach to sentencing that courts must adopt.

The restrictions on the exercise of judicial sentencing discretion that do exist are imposed by different means. For many crimes there are statutorily prescribed maximum sentences. More controversially, there are also prescribed minima. For many common-law offences, however, there are no direct statutory limits. The overall range of discretion for such offences is substantial.

[1] See Osman v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 245 at para 115.
[2] Ibid (emphasis added).
[3] See Bannatyne v Bannatyne & another 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 777 (CC).
[4] See A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 611.
[5] The protection of these rights is constrained by s 36, the limitation clause. For further discussion, see S Woolman 'Limitations' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (supra) Chapter 12.

Indirect statutory restriction is achieved by limitations on the punishment jurisdiction of specific courts. The High Court, which has no general restrictions on its punishment jurisdiction, can impose any sentence that it regards as appropriate. Lower courts have sentencing jurisdictions prescribed and limited by statute. While our jurisprudence has attempted to develop sentencing principles within this broad discretionary framework, it is relatively unformed and has only a limited impact on the actual exercise of sentencing discretion.[1] Nevertheless, sentencing decisions are subject to appeal. Appellate courts not only pronounce on the principles of sentencing and whether they have been observed but also consider and sometimes overturn individual sentences. In the process appellate courts have developed some admittedly vague rules that allow them to intervene when sentencing courts are found to have misdirected themselves or imposed sentences that the appellate courts regard as unreasonable.[2]

Constitutional norms add a new dimension to debates about punishment.[3] They address themselves in the first instance to the question of whether the legislative framework of the sentencing system is constitutionally valid. They can also be applied directly to sentencing decisions in individual cases. While constitutional norms apply both to the sentencing process and to substantive sentencing law, most attention has been focussed on the latter. However, in S v Dzukuda & others; S v Tshilo,[4] the Constitutional Court stressed the constitutional importance of fair trial rights. It held that, in relation to sentencing, the right to a fair trial requires, amongst other things, 'a procedure which does not prevent any factor which is relevant to the sentencing process and which could have a mitigating effect on the punishment to be imposed from being considered by the sentencing court'.[5] Both procedural and substantive sentencing practices need to be measured against such general constitutional standards such as legality, equality, proportionality and the protection of human dignity.

[1] See E du Toit Straf in Suid-Afrika (1981) 446–8. See also M A Rabie, S A Strauss & M C Mare Punishment: An Introduction to Principles (5th Edition, 1994) 285–300; D P van der Merwe Sentencing (1991); S S Terblanche The Guide to Sentencing in South Africa (1999) 153-202.

[2] Formulations of the latter grounds of intervention are often couched in particularly vague terms, such as 'inducing a sense of shock' or 'being startlingly inappropriate': See Terblanche (supra) at 495 (and the case and sources cited there.)

[3] See N Steytler Constitutional Criminal Procedure (1998) 403–438.

[4] See S v Dzukuda 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC) ('Dzukuda').

[5] Dzukuda (supra) at para 12. In casu the Court held that the procedure created by s 52 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997, in terms of which an offender who had been tried and convicted by a regional court was referred for sentence in the High Court, was not unconstitutional. The procedure did not create conditions in which the offender's right to a fair trial in the imposition of sentence could not be met. The constitutional right to a fair trial also plays a role in deciding whether an accused person should be informed in the charge sheet of any enhancement of sentencing jurisdiction that the court may use in the event of a conviction. See S v Legoa 2003 (1) SACR 13 (SCA) at para 20; S v Ndlovu 2003 (1) SACR 331 (SCA) at para 11.

(a) Legality

In order for there to be even the possibility of the equal protection of the law guaranteed by s 9 of the Constitution, the law has to be reasonably clear. In criminal law this requirement is captured by the trite common-law proposition, nulla poena sine lege.[1] The Constitution itself now entrenches a general principle of legality.[2] This principle demands that legal powers only be exercised under the law and according to constitutionally appropriate procedures. The Constitution also recognises explicitly the right of accused persons not be convicted, or by extension punished, for acts or omissions that were not offences at the time of their commission.[3] Furthermore, it guarantees specifically the right of accused persons 'to the benefit of the least severe of the prescribed punishments if the prescribed punishment of the offence has been changed since the time that the offence was committed and the time of sentencing'.[4]

In respect of punishment, the legality principle has at least two implications. First, penalties themselves should be reasonably precisely defined. Secondly, the imposition of such penalties should be governed by clear legal rules, which themselves should meet the requirements of the principle of legality.

(i) Defining penalties

The definition of specific forms of punishment may at first glance appear not to be a problem in South Africa. Whatever the constitutional shortcomings of the sentence of death or of corporal punishment, their ambit was clear. Fines, too, are unambiguous in their penal content. At a conceptual level the same applies to sentences of imprisonment. Since the abolition of imprisonment with hard labour,[5] the length of time to be served has been the only factor that distinguishes one sentence of imprisonment from another.

Correctional supervision is far more problematic in this regard.[6] Although correctional supervision is formally defined by s 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, that section refers only to a community-based punishment in accordance with the 1959 Correctional Services Act.[7] More importantly, s 84 of the Correctional Services Act, provides that:

---

[1] See E M Burchell, P M A Hunt & J M Burchell South African Criminal Law and Procedure Vol I (3rd Edition, 1997) 28ff.

[2] See Pharmaceutical Manuacturers Association of SA & another: In re Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa & others ('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') 2000 (2) SA 674, 698D-E (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 50. See also FC s 1(c).

[3] FC s 35(3)(l).

[4] FC s 35(3)(n). See Steytler (supra) at 376-9.

[5] A punishment of hard labour, under the Criminal Law Amendment Act 16 of 1959, would be subject to direct constitutional challenge in terms of FC s 13, which prohibits forced labour.

[6] For a discussion of this issue in an international context, see D van Zyl Smit 'Legal Standards and the Limits of Community Sanctions' (1993) 1 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice 309, 321.

[7] Act 8 of 1959. This Act was still in force in October 2003, as the corresponding provisions of the new Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 had not yet been brought into force.

> every probationer shall be subject to such monitoring, community service, house arrest, placement in employment, performance of service, payment of compensation to the victim and rehabilitation or other programmes as may be determined by the court or the Commissioner [of Correctional Services] or prescribed by or under this Act, and to any such other form of treatment, control or supervision, including supervision by a probation officer, as the Commissioner may determine after consultation with the social welfare authority concerned in order to realize the objects of correctional supervision.

The implication is that when someone is sentenced to correctional supervision any of the varying forms of community-based punishment mentioned may be imposed by a court. A court may also impose 'other programmes'. Moreover, the Commissioner of Correctional Services may add 'any other form of treatment, control or supervision' that will realise the objects of correctional supervision. Because the content of some of these forms of correctional supervision is so unclear, a large number of punishments will not be defined precisely enough to meet the standards of legality.

There are various ways to ensure that standards of legality are met. One solution was suggested by Kriegler AJA in S v R.[1] In that case the judge recognised the perilous position of the person subject to correctional supervision:

> Tydens die uitdiening van sy straf is die toesiggeval in groot mate uitgelewer aan die amptenare van die Departement van Korrektiewe Dienste; om die bepaling daarvan ook aan hulle oor te laat, sou pligsversaking wees.[2]

The solution was for the sentencing court to determine the content of the sentence of correctional supervision and for the correctional authorities to adhere to the sentence.[3] This solution meets the objections to leaving an unstructured and overboard discretion to the correctional authorities. However, it does not constrain the courts themselves. The question of whether the requirements of legality are met where courts have so very wide a sentencing discretion is usually posed in respect of the length of sentence, for example, a term of imprisonment. However, it has equal force in instances where the sentencing court is asked to determine the content of the sentence itself: what, for example, correctional supervision should entail in a particular case.[4]

---

[1] See S v R 1993 (1) SA 476 (A), 1993 (1) SACR 209 (A).

[2] Ibid at 492G: 'While serving his punishment the person under supervision is to a large extent subject to the Department of Correctional Services; also to leave the determination of it to them would be dereliction of duty' (my translation).

[3] Ibid at 492A. See also S v Tsanshana 1996 (2) SACR 157, 160*g–h* (E). In S v Sekoboane 1997 (2) SACR 32 (T), the court stressed the necessity of precisely formulated conditions, but at the same time it was noted that, by analogy with parole, there could be no objection to allowing the Commissioner to mitigate the conditions of sentence, as this could only be to the advantage of the offender and better serve his or her rehabilitation.

[4] It is an established rule of South African law that courts cannot directly create new forms of punishment. See Du Toit Straf in Suid-Afrika (supra) at Chapter 15.

One way in which this latter difficulty can be overcome is for the legislature to provide for a limited number of community-based sentences and to define their content relatively closely. In practice this may be done by a combination of primary and secondary legislation.[1] For example, an Act of Parliament may specify community service as a sentence that may be imposed and regulations may lay down what form it should take in order to ensure that it is not unduly punitive or unduly lenient.[2] Alternatively, the primary legislation could stipulate a closed list of community sentences and describe their content.[3] It therefore does not follow automatically that all community sentences are open to constitutional challenge.

There may be serious doubts, however, whether current legislation defines community sentences precisely enough to meet the constitutional requirement of legality. This concern applies particularly to 'programmes determined by the court'. However, it may also apply to other forms of community sentence mentioned in s 84 of the Correctional Services Act.

Courts also have a very wide discretion to suspend sentences on condition that certain requirements are met. The question that the courts face is: what may be regarded as an 'acceptable penal content' for such sentences or conditions of suspension? The answer is again related to human dignity and the prohibition of degrading punishment. The sanction should be 'of the kind which can be endured with self-possession by a person of reasonable fortitude'.[4] Offenders should not be publicly humiliated[5] or compelled to do or not do things that undermine their dignity as human beings.[6]

(ii) Sentencing guidelines

In most legal systems the sentence to be imposed for a specific offence is determined by a court within a range set by the legislature. The wider the range, the greater scope there is for the sentencing court to exercise discretion and the less certainty the individual offender has about the sentence to expect for a particular offence. Very wide ranges may be justified by the argument that the narrower the [1] It is noteworthy that s 36(1) of the Final Constitution allows rights to be limited by 'law of general application' rather than and not only by 'a law of general application', ie an Act of Parliament, as is the case in article 19 of German Basic Law.

[2] See A Ashworth Sentencing and Criminal Justice (3rd Edition, 2000) 262–99 for a discussion of developments in England in this regard.

[3] Chapter VI of the Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 provides much more detail, although it also needs to be complemented by regulations. This chapter of the Act was not in force by October 2003.

[4] A von Hirsch 'The Ethics of Community-Based Sanctions' (1990) 36 Crime and Delinquency 162, 167.

[5] For example, be compelled to drive a car with a notice declaring that the driver was convicted of drunken driving or to confess publicly to having remorse for a crime.

[6] For example, some suspensive conditions would require that women not fall pregnant as a condition of probation; see S L Arthur 'The Norplant Prescription; Birth Control, Woman Control or Crime Control?' (1992) 40 UCLA LR 1, 101.

range, the greater the risk that a sentence which is disproportionate to the gravity of the offence and the guilt of the individual offender may have to be imposed. The question arises, however, whether the absence of explicit sentencing standards meets the requirements of the principle of legality.

As we have seen, South African sentencing law has traditionally allowed courts a wide discretion in selecting appropriate sentences. A direct challenge to a sentence on the basis that the punishment was not specified in advance is unlikely to succeed on the grounds of lack of legality alone. In the future, however, when consideration is given to the need for sentencing guidelines, or for another sentencing framework that reduces discretion and therefore the risk of arbitrariness, the requirements of legality may well influence legislation.[1]

(b) Equality

Legislative guidelines for sentencing are subject not only to the requirement of legality but also to the related requirements of equality before the law and equal protection of the law.[2] One of the primary motivations in the campaign for legislation to reduce or even eliminate the discretion of sentencing courts in the United States of America was a desire to ensure that factors irrelevant to the sentence were not taken into account and thus to ensure equality in the imposition of sentence.[3]

In the context of the death penalty, the US Supreme Court has wrestled with the question of what legislative framework the Constitution requires in order to ensure equal protection of the law. As the US Supreme Court has never found the sentence of death to be inherently unconstitutional, particular attention has been paid to the question of equal protection. The jurisprudence that has emerged in this context is of wider significance, as it can be applied to sentences other than the death penalty. It is particularly salient in South Africa because of the similarity of the constitutional provisions ensuring equal protection of the law.[4]

---

[1] For such a proposal, see South African Law Commission Report (Project 82) Sentencing (A New Sentencing Framework) (2000); S S Terblanche 'Sentencing guidelines for South Africa: Lessons from elsewhere' (2003) SALJ. It is a moot point whether the legislature must necessarily grant wide sentencing discretion, or indeed any sentencing discretion at all, to the courts. See Mistretta v US 488 US 361, 109 SCt 647 (1989) (US Supreme Court held that the branches of government have an overlapping responsibility for sentencing and that therefore the determination of sentencing guidelines by a commission which included judges, rather than by the courts directly, was not an unconstitutional division of powers.)

[2] Among other things, the right to equal protection of the law requires that 'in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such is prescribed to all for like offences'. See Barbier v Connolly 113 US 27, 31, 5 SCt 357 (1884); Truax v Corrigan 257 US 312, 334–5, 42 SCt 124 (1921).

[3] A von Hirsch, K A Knapp & M H Tonry The Sentencing Commission and its Guidelines (1987).

[4] The phrase 'equal protection and benefit of the law' is used in s 9(1) of the South African Constitution and 'equal protection of the laws' in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. See J Kentridge 'Equality' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (supra) at § 14.4*(a)*.

In Furman v Georgia,[1] the US Supreme Court set aside a death sentence on the basis that it was cruel and unusual only in the narrow sense in that it had been imposed according to a procedure that allowed too much discretion to the sentencers. In short, the procedure seemed subject to an element of arbitrariness. Equal protection of the law could not be ensured without clear standards for imposition of the death penalty.[2]

Equal protection of the law could not be ensured by the opposite extreme either: by legislation providing for mandatory death sentences when certain specified 'objective' criteria were present. In 1978, therefore, the same Supreme Court ruled in Lockett v Ohio that a procedure that prevented a sentencer from considering every possible mitigating factor would be unconstitutional.[3] Since then the hunt has been on for a legislative framework for the imposition of capital punishment that would ensure equality by avoiding the arbitrariness of a totally unstructured discretion, whilst at the same time allowing sufficient flexibility to ensure that all the appropriate information is placed before the court.[4]

More difficult questions are raised by the claim that inequalities in sentencing are a function of systemic or structural bias. Such structural biases complicate legislative interventions. Prominent examples are American cases in which it has been suggested that the criminal justice system in a particular state is racially biased as a whole, and therefore statistically more likely to produce the death penalty for blacks than for whites, or more subtly, for the killers of whites than the killers of blacks. In McCleskey v Kemp,[5] this argument was rejected by the US Supreme Court on the basis that bias would have to be shown in a particular case and that evidence of systematic bias was insufficient. The view adopted by the minority, that systematic bias meant that a particular trial could not be fair, could well be resurrected in South Africa, where the limited evidence available suggests a similar bias, at least where the race of victims is concerned.[6]

[1] See Furman v Georgia 408 US 238, 92 SCt 2726 (1972).

[2] See Makwanyane (supra) endorsing the reasoning of Furman (supra) at paras 41–56 (Chaskalson P), at paras 153–66 (Ackermann J) and at paras 273–4 (Mahomed J). See also S v Williams & others 1995 (3) SA 332 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at paras 45 and 89 (Langa J stressed the arbitrary element in the severity of the pain inflicted by the execution of a sentence of whipping); R v Offen; R v McGilliard; R v McKeowen; R v Okwuegbunam; R v S [2001] 1 WLR 253 (the Criminal Division of the Court of Appeal for England and Wales recognised the prohibition on arbitrariness, in addition to the requirement of proportionality. Both had constitutional status, as they were derived from the European Convention on Human Rights as incorporated into English law by the Human Rights Act of 1998.)

[3] See Lockett v Ohio 438 US 586, 98 SCt 2954 (1978).

[4] See L S Sheleff 'The Arbitrary "Arbitrary" Rule' in Ultimate Penalties (1987) 83–116.

[5] See McCleskey v Kemp 481 US 279, 107 SCt 1756 (1987).

[6] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 48, n 78 (Chaskalson P commented on the way in which race and class affect the operation of the criminal justice system.) See also M C J Olmesdahl in Olmesdahl & N C Steytler (eds) Criminal Justice in South Africa: Selected Aspects of Discretion (1983) 142–8, 201–4.

(c) Proportionality

It is often said that the power of the State to create punishments is limited by the constitutional principle of proportionality. The principle that 'the punishment must fit the crime' is well established in South African sentencing law. However, the Constitution itself does not refer to this principle explicitly. Nevertheless, proportionality in sentencing is clearly required by the Constitution. In S v Makwanyane Chaskalson P identified proportionality as a factor to be considered when deciding whether a particular punishment was cruel, inhuman or degrading.[1]

In his analysis of proportionality or sentencing in the German Constitution, Stree has explained:

> The legislator has to determine penalties which stand in a just relationship to the gravity of the offence and to the blameworthiness of the offender. This principle is derived from the general principles of the Constitution, particularly the Rechtsstaatsprinzip. It is, however, quite justifiably also deduced from art 1.I of the Basic Law (inviolability of human dignity). For an excessively heavy or gruesome punishment or minimum punishment amounts to a disregard of the human personality and therefore infringes against art 1.I of the Basic Law. To some extent further support for the proposition that punishment must be oriented to the degree of blameworthiness can be derived from the equality principle contained in art 3.I of the Basic Law and the related requirement of material justice. However, it is questionable whether such a far-reaching general proposition which binds the legislator can be derived from art 3.I of the Basic Law.[2]

There is also international support for the principle of proportionality in sentencing.[3] The Recommendation by the Council of Europe on Consistency in Sentencing has stipulated:

[1] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 94. The provision in the Canadian Constitution outlawing cruel and unusual punishment or treatment has been interpreted as outlawing both punishments that are inherently contrary to human dignity and punishments that are grossly disproportionate to the gravity of the offence. There is of course a link between the two, as a disproportionately heavy punishment may be seen as denying the human dignity of an offender. P W Hogg states that 'it is clear that the phrase [cruel and unusual] includes two classes of punishment: (1) those that are barbaric in themselves, and (2) those that are grossly disproportionate to the offence'. Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992) 1130. See also Weems v United States 217 US 349, 371 30 SCt 544 (1910) (the court referred to O'Neil v Vermont 144 US 323, 12 SCt 693 (1892) and held that the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments operated also 'against all punishments which, by their excessive length or severity, are greatly disproportionate to the offences charged). The prohibition against legislative disproportionality is undisputed in death penalty cases in the United States of America. It is also recognised by the US Supreme Court in cases involving imprisonment, although it has been interpreted very narrowly in recent Supreme Court decisions. See Ewing v California 123 SCt 1179 (2003), Lockyer v Andrade 123 SCt 1166 (2003), Harmelin v Michigan 111 SCt 2680 (1991). For a more generous formulation of the test, see Solem v Helm (1983) 463 US 277.

[2] W Stree Deliktsfolgen und Grundgesetz (1960) 8 (my translation). See also the decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court of 9 March 1994 in (1994) 24 Neue Juristische Wochenschrift 1577.

[3] See in general D van Zyl Smit 'Constitutional Jurisprudence and Proportionality in Sentencing' (1995) 3 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice 369–80.

> Whatever rationales for sentencing are declared, disproportionality between the seriousness of the offence and the sentence should be avoided.[1]

A constitutional principle of proportionality in sentencing can be deduced from the South African Constitution by a similar process of analysis to that adopted in German law. The principle of the Rechtsstaat is also part of South African constitutional law, while human dignity is explicitly protected by s 10 of the South African Constitution. However, the South African Constitutional Court has used the prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment and treatment in s 12(1)(e) of the Constitution as the key to a classic statement of the rationale for recognising the principle of constitutional proportionality in sentencing. In S v Dodo Ackermann J wrote:

> The concept of proportionality goes to the heart of the inquiry as to whether punishment is cruel, inhuman or degrading, particularly where, as here, it is almost exclusively the length of time for which an offender is sentenced that is in issue . . . Section 12(1)(a) [of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa] guarantees, amongst others, the right 'not to be deprived of freedom . . . without just cause'. The 'cause' justifying penal incarceration and thus the deprivation of the offender's freedom is the offence committed. 'Offence', as used throughout in the present context, consists of all factors relevant to the nature and seriousness of the criminal act itself, as well as all relevant personal and other circumstances relating to the offender which could have a bearing on the seriousness of the offence and the culpability of the offender. In order to justify the deprivation of an offender's freedom it must be shown that it is reasonably necessary to curb the offence and punish the offender. Thus the length of punishment must be proportionate to the offence.
>
> To attempt to justify any period of penal incarceration, let alone imprisonment for life as in the present case, without inquiring into the proportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment, is to ignore, if not to deny, that which lies at the very heart of human dignity. Human beings are not commodities to which a price can be attached; they are creatures with inherent and infinite worth; they ought to be treated as ends in themselves, never merely as means to an end. Where the length of a sentence, which has been imposed because of its general deterrent effect on others, bears no relation to the gravity of the offence (in the sense defined in para [37] above), the offender is being used essentially as a means to another end and the offender's dignity assailed. So too where the reformative effect of the punishment is predominant and the offender sentenced to lengthy imprisonment, principally because he cannot be reformed in a shorter period, but the length of imprisonment bears no relationship to what the committed offence merits. Even in the absence of such features, mere disproportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment would also tend to treat the offender as a means to an end, thereby denying the offender's humanity.[2]

[1] Recommendation No R (92) 17 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, which was adopted on 19 October 1992. The recommendation explicitly takes into account arts 3, 5 and 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

[2] See S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382, 403–4 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 594 (CC) ('Dodo') at paras 37, 38.

Ackermann J goes on to qualify these general propositions by emphasising that 'it would not be mere disproportionality between the sentence legislated and the sentence merited by the offence which would lead to a limitation of the s 12(1)(e) right, but only gross disproportionality'.[1]

(i) Mandatory minimum sentences

The recognition of a doctrine of proportionality derived from the Constitution raises several practical questions regarding South African sentencing legislation. One of these is whether legislation may prescribe mandatory minimum sentences for certain offences. A wide-ranging survey of judicial decisions on this question in the Commonwealth and the United States suggests that courts in these jurisdictions are reluctant to declare that all mandatory minimum sentences are inherently unconstitutional.[2]

Of particular relevance to South Africa in this regard are the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.[3] In Canada, as in South Africa, courts have been allowed an exceptionally wide discretion in deciding on sentence. In Smith v The Queen,[4] the Court was asked to consider the constitutionality of a mandatory minimum seven-year sentence for importing narcotics into Canada. The majority held that if a hypothetical case could be imagined for which the minimum sentence would be grossly disproportionate, the legislation that created the minimum would be unconstitutional. In this instance such a hypothetical case was easily imaginable. The mandatory minimum seven-year sentence was therefore unconstitutional. The Court came to this conclusion even though on the facts before it a sentence of seven years or more might not have been inappropriate.

On the basis of Smith, it seemed as if all minimum sentences might be open to challenge, as it would always be possible to imagine some hypothetical set of facts on which the mandatory minimum sentence would inhibit the discretion of the judge to impose an appropriate sentence. However, in 1991, in R v Goltz,[5] the Supreme Court of Canada adopted a more nuanced stance. Before it was the question of the constitutionality of a mandatory sentence of seven days' imprisonment for driving a motor vehicle when prohibited from doing so. The prohibition, which could give rise to the mandatory sentence, could be imposed only on an offender who had committed several traffic offences. In Goltz, the Canadian Supreme Court upheld the mandatory sentence. Smith was qualified by holding that the hypothetical facts on which the legislation could lead to an unjust

[1] Dodo (supra) at para 39. The meaning of the distinction between 'mere' and 'gross' disproportionality is difficult to discern and Ackermann J does not give any clear indication of how it should be understood.

[2] D Hubbard 'Should a Minimum Sentence for Rape be Imposed in Namibia?' 1994 Acta Juridica 228.

[3] See Dodo (supra) at para 39 (Ackermann J discusses the importance of Canadian and US jurisprudence in this regard.)

[4] See Smith v The Queen 34 CCC (3d) 97 (1987).

[5] See R v Goltz 67 CCC (3d) 481 (1992).

result had to be 'reasonable' and not 'far-fetched'.[1] The result in Canada is that while not all mandatory minimum sentences are unconstitutional, legislative minima that might result in gross disproportionality will not pass constitutional muster.

The Namibian High Court drew on Canadian case law in S v Vries.[2] Section 14(1)(b) of the Stock Theft Act[3] provided for a mandatory three-year sentence of imprisonment for a second or subsequent conviction of stock theft. The accused, Vries, was convicted of stock theft in May 1995. His case was covered by s 14(1)(b) because he had been convicted of stock theft more than 25 years previously in 1969. The High Court found that the effect of s 14(1)(b) in the circumstances of the existing case was shocking in that it was grossly disproportionate to the offence committed by the accused. It accordingly struck down s 14(1)(b) as unconstitutional. In his opinion, Frank J sets out a general approach to the constitutionality of minimum sentences that mirrors that of the Canadian courts:[4]

1. A statutory minimum sentence is not per se unconstitutional.
2. It will be unconstitutional if it provides for a punishment which will be shocking in the circumstances of the specific case before court.
3. Where a statutory minimum sentence results in a shocking sentence there are four options available to the court, namely:
   (a) to declare the provision of no force or effect for all purposes,
   (b) to declare the provision to be of no force and effect only in a particular class of cases i.e. to down-read it,[5]
   (c) to declare the provision to be of no force or effect in respect to the particular case before court i.e. apply a constitutional exemption,
   (d) to allow the legislature to cure the defects in the impugned legislation pursuant to the provisions of Article 25(1)(a) of the Constitution.[6]
4. Where the statutory minimum sentence is found to be shocking in the case before the Court the Court must then enquire whether it will be shocking 'with respect to hypothetical cases which . . . can be foreseen as likely to arise commonly'. If the answer to the second enquiry is in the affirmative then the Court must act in one of the respects set out in 3*(a)*, (b) or (d) above. If the answer to the second enquiry is in the negative the court must act as set out in 3*(c)* above.

[1] R v Goltz (supra) at 503. See also R v Morrissey [2000] 191 DLR (4th) 87.
[2] See S v Vries 1996 (12) BCLR 1666 (Nm), 1996 (2) SACR 638 (Nm) ('Vries').
[3] Act 12 of 1990 (Nm).
[4] See Vries (supra) at 1676G–1677A.
[5] Note that this option would not fall within 'reading down' as it is understood in South African law. The Constitutional Court has emphasized that a statute can be read down only so far as the reading down is consistent with a reasonable interpretation of the language of the statute. See for example S v Bhulwana 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 28. However, the option contemplated by Frank J would be one within the power of the Constitutional Court to define a class of situations to which a law cannot be applied consistently with the Constitution. See for example the order made in Ferreira v Levin NO & others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). The Constitutional Court describes this remedial power as notional severance. See J Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (supra) at § 9.3*(c)*.
[6] The corresponding provision of the South African Constitution is FC s 172(1)(b)(ii).

Another Namibian case, S v Likuwa,[1] tracks closely the approach adopted by Frank J in S v Vries. In Likuwa, the Court found that a minimum sentence of ten years' imprisonment for contravention of s 29(1)(a) of the 1996 Arms and Ammunitions Act was unconstitutional 'because it was grossly disproportionate when seen in the light of the very wide net cast by s 29(1)(a) of the Act'.[2] This section prohibited, amongst other things, the possession of 'machine rifles'. The court found that many rural people possessed such rifles merely in order to protect themselves and their livestock. Infringement of the section in such circumstances was 'likely to be quite common'[3] and ten years' imprisonment an unacceptably harsh sentence for it. The court accordingly applied the general approach suggested by Frank J and struck out the words 'of not less than ten years' that qualified the sentence of imprisonment prescribed by the section. This solution meant that not only the accused before the court but also all future offenders of this section would not be subject to a minimum sentence of imprisonment.

The South African Constitutional Court has declared itself opposed to the notion of a constitutional exemption in individual cases. In S v Bhulwana,[4] O'Regan J emphasised that 'the litigants before the court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants'. Paragraph 3*(c)* of the Vries formulation is therefore unlikely to be adopted in South Africa. However, subject to that proviso, South African law is likely to follow an approach to minimum sentences broadly similar to that of Namibian and Canadian law. Legislative minima were used in the past, in terrorism[5] and drug legislation[6] for example, deliberately to limit the discretion of the courts. Given the opposition of South African courts to restrictions on their sentencing discretion,[7] they may be expected to examine the constitution-

[1] See S v Likuwa 1999 (5) BCLR 599 (Nm), 1999 (2) SACR 44 (Nm) ('Likuwa').

[2] Ibid at 604H.

[3] Ibid at 604D–I.

[4] See S v Bhulwana 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 748 (CC) at para 32.

[5] Section 2(1) and s 3 of the Terrorism Act 83 of 1967 provided for a compulsory sentence of five years, but was repealed by s 73 of the Internal Security Act 74 of 1982, which made no provision for compulsory minimum sentences.

[6] Section 2(1) of the Abuse of Dependence-producing Substances Act 41 of 1971 laid down a compulsory five-year sentence for the offence of dealing in drugs, and a similar provision existed in s 2(iii) and (iv) for the offence of possession of drugs. In addition to these measures, s 8 of the Act provided for compulsory forfeiture. However, this Act was repealed by s 52 of the Prevention and Treatment of Drug Dependency Act 20 of 1992, which did not re-enact the compulsory minimum sentence provisions or the provision relating to compulsory forfeiture.

[7] See S v Gibson 1974 (4) SA 478, 482 (A) (Homes JA) (the imposition of a mandatory sentence 'cuts across traditional considerations of mitigating and reformative factors in a particular case ... [and] unduly puts all the emphasis on the punitive and deterrent factors of sentence, and precludes the traditional consideration of subjective factors relating to the convicted person'.) See also S v Khumbisa & others 1984 (2) SA 670, 684 (N). Because of their belief that minimum sentence requirements are fundamentally unsound, South African courts have shown considerable ingenuity in interpreting them narrowly. See, for example, S v Nel 1987 (4) SA 950 (W); S v Toms; S v Bruce 1990 (2) SA 802 (A).

ality of legislation that might result in disproportionate sentences even more critically than their Canadian counterparts. Relatively few truly mandatory minimum sentences remain on the statute book in South Africa.[1] However, compulsory confiscation orders or compulsory suspension of driving licences, which are not formally regarded as punishments,[2] may have the same disproportionate effect on the offender. Their constitutionality will also have to be examined critically.

In late 1997 the Criminal Law Amendment Act[3] created a range of minimum sentences for a long list of 'serious offences'.[4] The minimum sentences range from life imprisonment for specified aggravated forms of murder and rape[5] to set numbers of years for first offenders and recidivists for offences listed in the schedules to the Act.[6] The sentences have to be imposed on adult offenders unless 'substantial and compelling circumstances exist which justify the imposition of lesser sentences',[7] and are therefore not fully mandatory.

There can be no constitutional objection to the legislature indicating to the courts that it requires severe punishments for serious offences. However, in this instance, the legislature went further and restricted severely the ability of sentencing courts to deviate from specified minimum sentences. Much therefore depended on how the courts interpreted the words, 'substantial and compelling circumstances'. The Supreme Court of Appeal, in S v Malgas,[8] removed any doubts about whether the provision was compatible with the principle of constitutional proportionality.[9] This result was achieved by ruling that when a court is convinced that an 'injustice' would be done by imposing the mandatory sentence, that injustice constituted 'substantial and compelling' circumstances that would allow the court to depart from the prescribed minimum. The tautology of holding [1] Section 283(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 explicitly excludes the discretion of the sentencing court where legislation prescribes a minimum penalty of a term of imprisonment or a fine. Examples of legislation providing minimum sentences are s 27 of the Explosives Act 26 of 1956 and s 39 (2)*(a*A)(i)(aa) of the Arms and Ammunition Act 75 of 1969, substituted by s 1 of the Arms and Ammunition Amendment Act 65 of 1993.

[2] See Du Toit (supra) at 345.

[3] Act 105 of 1997. Section 54 provides that the Act is to come into operation on a date fixed by the President by proclamation in the Gazette.

[4] The heading to s 51 refers to 'Minimum sentences for certain serious offences'. The provision is not designed to be a permanent feature of South African law. Section 53 provides that ss 51 and 52 shall cease to have effect two years after the commencement of the Act. However, the President may extend this period with the concurrence of Parliament, by proclamation in the Gazette, for two years at a time.

[5] Section 51(1) read with Part I of Schedule 2.

[6] Section 51(2) read with Parts II, III and IV of Schedule 2.

[7] Section 51(3)(a).

[8] S v Malgas 2001 (2) SA 1222 (SCA), 2001 (1) SACR 469 (SCA) ('Malgas').

[9] One question remains open. In its interpretation the Court gave 'due weight to the fact that these provisions were not intended to be permanent features of the legislative scene and were to lapse after two years unless extended annually'. Malgas at para 7. However, the legislation was amended by s 36 of Act 62 of 2000 to allow extensions of two years at a time. On 1 May 2003 the legislation was extended until 30 April 2005: Government Gazette 24804 Government Notice R 40, 30 April 2003. This means that by the time it is next considered the legislation would have been in force for seven years. One may doubt whether it can still be justified as a 'relatively short-term response' to 'an alarming burgeoning in the commission of crimes'.

that 'injustice' means 'substantial and compelling' is compounded by further equating 'injustice' with 'disproportionality'.[1]

This reference to proportionality allowed the Supreme Court of Appeal to meet the desideratum stated earlier in the judgment. That is, that the provisions must be 'read in the light of the values enshrined in the Constitution and, unless it does not prove possible to do so, interpreted in a manner which respects those values'.[2] In formulating its conclusions, the Supreme Court of Appeal did not build directly on the many previous decisions of the High Court on the possible interpretation of these provisions.[3] Instead, it summarised its findings on the appropriate approach in a passage that defies further précis:

A. Section 51 [of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997] has limited but not eliminated the courts' discretion in imposing sentence in respect of offences referred to in Part 1 of Schedule 2 (or imprisonment for other specified periods for offences listed in other parts of Schedule 2).
B. Courts are required to approach the imposition of sentence conscious that the Legislature has ordained life imprisonment (or the particular prescribed period of imprisonment) as the sentence that should ordinarily and in the absence of weighty justification be imposed for the listed crimes in the specified circumstances.
C. Unless there are, and can be seen to be, truly convincing reasons for a different response, the crimes in question are therefore required to elicit a severe, standardised and consistent response from the courts.
D. The specified sentences are not to be departed from lightly and for flimsy reasons. Speculative hypotheses favourable to the offender, undue sympathy, aversion to imprisoning first offenders, personal doubts as to the efficacy of the policy underlying legislation and marginal differences in personal circumstances or degrees of participation between co-offenders are to be excluded.
E. The Legislature has, however, deliberately left it to the courts to decide whether the circumstances of any particular case call for a departure from the prescribed sentence. While the emphasis has shifted to the objective gravity of the type of crime and the need for effective sanctions against it, this does not mean that all other considerations are to be ignored.
F. All factors (other than those set out in D above) traditionally taken into account in sentencing (whether or not they diminish moral guilt) thus continue to play a role; none is excluded at the outset from consideration in the sentencing process.

[1] See Malgas (supra) at para 22. Marais JA seeks to explain that 'something more' than a mere discrepancy between what the sentence that law prescribes and the sentence that the sentencer would otherwise be minded to impose is required to justify a departure from the minima:

> 'What that something more must be it is not possible to express in precise, accurate and all-embracing language. The greater the sense of unease a court feels about the imposition of a prescribed sentence, the greater its anxiety will be that it may be perpetrating an injustice. Once a court reaches the point where unease has hardened into a conviction that an injustice will be done, that can only be because it is satisfied that the circumstances of the particular case render the prescribed sentence unjust or, as some might prefer to put it, disproportionate to the crime, the criminal and the legitimate needs of society. If that is the result of a consideration of the circumstances the court is entitled to characterise them as substantial and compelling and as such to justify the imposition of a lesser sentence.'

[2] Ibid at para 7.

[3] The SCA relegates the High Court decisions to a footnote. See Malgas (supra) at para 6, fn 3.

G. The ultimate impact of all the circumstances relevant to sentencing must be measured against the composite yardstick ('substantive and compelling') and must be such as cumulatively justify a departure from the standardised response that the Legislature has ordained.
H. In applying the statutory provisions, it is inappropriately constricting to use the concepts developed in dealing with appeals against sentence as the sole criterion.
I. If the sentencing court on consideration of the circumstances of the particular case is satisfied that they render the prescribed sentence unjust in that it would be disproportionate to the crime, the criminal and the needs of society, so that an injustice would be done by imposing that sentence, it is entitled to impose a lesser sentence.
J. In so doing, account must be taken of the fact that crime of that particular kind has been singled out for severe punishment and that the sentence to be imposed in lieu of the prescribed sentence should be assessed paying due regard to the bench mark which the Legislature has provided.[1]

The constitutionality of this approach was confirmed in S v Dodo. The Constitutional Court noted that the judgment in Malgas was 'undoubtedly correct'.[2] The Constitutional Court commented that the interpretation that Supreme Court of Appeal had given to s 51(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act made it plain that 'the power of the court to impose a lesser sentence than that prescribed can be exercised well before the disproportionality between the mandated sentence and the nature of the offence becomes so great that it can be typified as gross'.[3] It followed, the Constitutional Court explained, that the offender's rights in terms of s 12(1)(e) of Constitution were not infringed, as all that that section, with its prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading punishments, required was that there should not be a gross disproportionality between the punishment and the crime.

The formulation adopted in Malgas and confirmed in Dodo has been followed in other cases, but these have added little of constitutional significance. They have emphasised, however, that life imprisonment, the ultimate penalty in South Africa, which proportionality requires, may be imposed only for the worst category of crimes. Therefore, the ultimate penalty will not be imposed merely because the rape falls into a category where the prescribed minimum sentence is life imprisonment.[4] As Terblanche points out this means that since only a small proportion of rapes are in or near the 'worst category', 'the prescribed sentence will ordinarily be departed from'.[5] Expressed differently, traditional proportionality requirements will succeed routinely in justifying departures from the minima

[1] Malgas (supra) at para 25.
[2] Dodo (supra) at para 40.
[3] Ibid.
[4] See S v Abrahams 2002 (1) SACR 116 (SCA); S v Mahomotsa 2002 (2) SACR 435 (SCA), [2002] 3 All SA 534 (A); Rammoko v Director of Public Prosecutions 2003 (1) SACR 200 (SCA), [2001] 4 All SA 731 (SCA).
[5] S S Terblanche 'Mandatory and minimum sentences: Considering s 51 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1997' 2003 Acta Juridica 194, 215.

where the minimum sentences are substantially higher for a particular form of crime than what would be imposed without the presence of significant aggravating circumstances.

In a similar vein, s 51 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act provides that where a court decides to impose a prescribed sentence on a young offender between the age of 16 and 18 years it must record its' reasons for the decision.[1] Section 51 further stipulates that the prescribed minimum sentences do not apply to children under 16 years of age.[2] Thus, the loosening of sentencing requirements in relation to children between 16 and 18 could have been interpreted as only a procedural requirement demanding that special attention be paid to the cases involving older children. However, the provincial and local divisions of the High Court that have interpreted this provision have read it as a licence to depart freely from the minima[3] and effectively treated this category in the same way that they treat children under the age of 16.[4] The basis for this interpretation has been the extensive recognition granted to the rights of children under 18 in s 28 of the Constitution. Section 28 provides that a child should only be detained as a measure of last resort: one consistent with the best interests of the child.[5] These provisions have allowed courts to develop constitutional limits on the sentencing of children that go beyond those contained in the requirement that sentences should not be grossly disproportionate to the offence committed.[6]

(ii) Preventive sentences

Legislative provision for preventive sentences may provide a framework that encourages the courts to impose sentences that are disproportionate to the offence committed and to the blameworthiness of the offender. A 1993 amendment to the Criminal Procedure Act provides that where a court exercises its discretion to declare a convicted offender a 'dangerous criminal' it must 'sentence such person to undergo imprisonment for an indefinite period'.[7] The danger of disproportionality here is particularly great. On the face of the section an offender may be declared 'dangerous' after being convicted of any offence.

[1] Section 51(3)(a).

[2] Section 51(3)(b).

[3] See S v Blaauw 2001 (2) SACR 255 (C), [2001] 3 All SA 588 (C); S v Nkosi 2002 (1) SA 494 (W), 2002 (1) SACR 135 (W) ('Nkosi I').

[4] Terblanche (supra) at 216.

[5] These rights have been bolstered by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child to which South Africa is signatory, a fact that must be recognised by sentencing courts: see S v Kwalase 2000 (2) SACR 135 (C). Reference has also been made to the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the 'Beijing Rules') as containing further standards that must be considered in conjunction with the Convention on the Rights of the Child. See also Nkosi I (supra) at 503E–F.

[6] General sentencing law has long emphasised the importance of concerns for the rehabilitation of children when imposing sentence. What is new is the constitutional emphasis that is now given to this aspect of sentencing them. See Nkosi I (supra) at 502C–505J.

[7] Section 286B of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 introduced by s 22 of the Criminal Matters Amendment Act 116 of 1993.

How to strike the right balance between punishment necessary for the protection of society and detention that does not offend a person's dignity cannot be answered simply. Protecting society by preventing crime is the primary purpose of punishment. Detaining dangerous individuals and thus removing them from society might achieve such protection. However, it is clear from a constitutional perspective that the individual may not simply be sacrificed for the greater good. Indefinite detention of someone who has not been convicted of an offence, merely because there was evidence that he was 'dangerous', would be unconstitutional. Similarly, if someone were to be convicted of a minor offence and were then to be sentenced to indefinite detention because there was evidence of his dangerousness, the constitutionality of the sentence would be suspect because of the gross disproportionality of the sentence.

Sentences may still be legitimately influenced by considerations of prevention. A violent offender with previous convictions for violence will invariably be given a longer sentence than a first offender. The reasoning may be that because of his previous convictions his personal blameworthiness is increased and that he is therefore liable for a heavier punishment. However, a court may use the scope that this finding gives it to impose a sentence that prevents, for a time at least, the individual from committing further crimes of violence. The preventive sentence would still bear some relationship to present and previous offences of the offender.[1]

A provision allowing for the potentially indefinite detention of dangerous offenders has been upheld in Canada. The Canadian legislation provides that when someone is convicted of a 'serious personal injury offence' and the offender is a threat to the life, safety, physical or mental well being of other persons then, subject to procedural protections, the culprit may be declared a dangerous offender and detained indefinitely.[2] In Lyons v The Queen, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a sentence that was based 'in part' upon preventive considerations was not unconstitutional.[3] However, the Court did not reject the test of proportionality to the crime entirely. It emphasised that the offender had to be convicted of a serious violent offence for him to be considered for an indefinite sentence and that there were other safeguards to protect offenders from being falsely declared to be dangerous or from being detained when they had ceased to be dangerous. Moreover, the Court found that there was a degree of flexibility in the constitutional notion itself. A sentence would be unconstitutional only if it were grossly disproportionate. 'The word "grossly"', La Forest J explained, 'reflects this court's concern not to hold Parliament to a standard so exacting . . . as to require punishments to be perfectly suited to accommodate to moral nuances of every crime and every offender.'[4]

[1] See the argument developed from first principles in this regard by Stree (supra) at 57. See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 128 (Constitutional Court recognised prevention as a legitimate object of punishment, but found that it was an object which could be achieved without capital punishment).

[2] Section 688*(a)* of Part XXI of the Canadian Criminal Code.

[3] Lyons v The Queen (1988) 37 CCC (3d) 1.

[4] Ibid at 33.

In spite of this rather weak formulation, the court in Lyons should not be seen as having effectively abandoned all protection against gross disproportionality of sentence in cases where public protection is required. Lyons was followed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in South Africa in S v Bull & another; S v Chavulla & others,[1] where the constitutionality of the South African provision authorising the indefinite detention of dangerous offenders was challenged. The South African provisions, ss 286A and 286B of the Criminal Procedure Act,[2] are similar to the Canadian provisions. However, they do not limit the inquiry into whether the offender is dangerous to cases where the offender has been convicted of a 'serious personal injury' offence. As mentioned above a South African court could conduct an inquiry into dangerousness and, if it found that an offender were a danger to society, impose an indefinite sentence following a conviction of a minor offence. However, the Supreme Court of Appeal ruled that the constitutional principle against gross disproportionality of sentence had to be respected and the offence for which the offender was convicted 'must clearly be of such a nature as to justify a present determination of continued dangerousness in the future which requires a pattern of persistent or repetitively aggressive and violent behaviour'.[3] In this way the South African Court retained an element of offence proportionality in its decision about dangerousness. These detailed procedures for determining dangerousness, plus the requirement of psychiatric evidence on dangerousness, go some way towards meeting the too-wide-a-net critique. They are designed to ensure that the status of 'dangerous criminal' is not lightly attributed.

Furthermore, the South African legislation provides that the trial court must specify the initial period that the accused must serve before being brought back to court to be considered for release if he has ceased to be dangerous.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Bull, introduced a further element of proportionality into the interpretation of these provisions by holding that this period should be fixed with regard to the nominal determinate sentence that the court would have imposed had it not found the accused to be a dangerous criminal.[5] The actual period should be the time that the offender would have had to serve before being considered for parole.[6]

[1] S v Bull & another; S v Chavulla & others 2002 (1) SA 535 (SCA), 2002 (6) BCLR 551 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 681 (SCA) ('Bull').

[2] Act 51 of 1977.

[3] See Bull (supra) at para 19.

[4] Section 286B of the Criminal Procedure Act.

[5] See Bull (supra) at para 28.

[6] That is, in practice, half the nominal determinate sentence. There is strong parallel between this approach and that adopted by English courts in setting a minimum period or 'tariff' that an offender sentenced to life imprisonment has to serve before being considered for release. See D van Zyl Smit Taking Life Imprisonment Seriously (2002) Chapter 3.

The same question of proportionality arises in a less drastic form when a court exercises its discretionary power to declare someone an habitual criminal,[1] which has the effect of imposing a sentence of between seven and 15 years' imprisonment.[2] The maximum period is essential, for, as the Constitutional Court noted in S v Niemand,[3] otherwise the declaration would be akin to a life sentence. That would be grossly disproportionate for an offender who is neither violent nor a danger to society in terms of s 286A of the Criminal Procedure Act.[4]

A declaration that an offender is an habitual criminal may be made if the court 'is satisfied that the said person habitually commits offences and that the community should be protected against him'.[5] From this formulation it is clear that the offender is not being punished primarily for his current offence. However, the necessity of finding that the offender 'habitually' commits offences means that close attention is paid to his previous record. In this way the general blameworthiness of the offender is taken into consideration, making this special provision to protect the community less open to constitutional objection.

(iii) Exemplary sentences

The imposition of exemplary sentences by the courts raises problems similar to those discussed above in relation to the principle of proportionality. Hitherto the courts have cautioned that exemplary sentences are to be imposed with circumspection. It is acknowledged that inherent in the notion of an exemplary sentence is an element of injustice to the individual accused.[6] The imposition of an exemplary sentence by definition privileges the interests of society in deterrence over the principle of proportionality in relation to the individual offender. The courts have countenanced exemplary sentences in the past. But they have also said that such

[1] In terms of s 286 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[2] The minimum is specified by s 38 of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959. Historically, the maximum was deduced from s 286(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act, which specifies that a court should not declare someone an habitual criminal if it would otherwise have imposed a sentence of more than fifteen years. The Constitutional Court found that the inference that the maximum period was 15 years could not be drawn in this way and held that the maximum period of 15 years should be read into section 65(4)(b)(iv) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959. The maximum period will be regulated directly when the Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 comes into force as s 73(6)(c) of that Act specifies a maximum period of 15 years.

[3] See S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2001 (11) BCCR 1181 (CC), 2001 (2) SACR 654 (CC) at para 25.

[4] An interesting parallel is to be found in para 62 of the German Penal Code, which provides that preventive detention (eine Massregel der Besserung und Sicherung) may not be imposed when it is disproportionate to the offences which he has committed, and is likely to commit, as well as to the degree of danger which he poses. Commentators have suggested that this provision incorporates the principle of proportionality to a satisfactory degree, as long as it is interpreted with the further principle of minimum intervention in mind. See, for example, K Lackner Strafgesetzbuch mit Erläuterungen (23rd Edition, 1993) 466–7.

[5] Section 286(1).

[6] See S v Khulu 1975 (2) SA 518, 521B–H (N).

sentences are justified only in a limited range of circumstances and only to the extent that the injustice to the individual does not outweigh the broad interest of society.[1] In the light of the constitutional principles of equality and proportionality, the test for whether and when an exemplary sentence is justified could well become stricter.

(iv) Punishment for specific crimes

Legislation that permits the imposition of a specific punishment for a crime for which such punishment is inappropriate under all circumstances is another form of disproportionality between crime and punishment that is unacceptable under the Constitution. In South Africa the use of capital and corporal punishment historically was restricted to specific offences. If these punishments had not been declared to be unconstitutional, the question might have arisen whether their imposition was not grossly disproportionate to the gravity of some of the specific offences for which they might have been imposed. Such an argument has been accepted by the United States Supreme Court in respect of the death sentence for rape, which, in the view of that court, would always be disproportionate to the gravity of the offence.[2] Similarly, South African courts (which of course did not have the power to declare legislation unconstitutional) held that corporal punishment, because of its drastic nature, was inappropriate for crimes not involving elements of violence.[3]

(d) Dignity: human dignity and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment

The most direct challenges to legislation on punishment are likely to be directed against specific forms of punishment that may be fundamentally incompatible with a Constitution that guarantees human dignity. As many, if not all, forms of punishment undermine human dignity to some degree, it may be difficult to argue that all such punishments are so fundamentally repugnant that they cannot be considered even for the most heinous crimes.

The South African Constitution contains a number of fundamental rights that are of significance in this regard: s 10's right to human dignity, s 12(1)(d)'s prohibition of torture, and s 12(1)(e)'s prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The wording of s 12(1)(e) is especially important: in particular, the use of 'or' in linking the adjectives describing the types of punishment that are prohibited. Thus, a form of punishment (or a form of treatment) is unconstitutional when it is 'cruel', or when it is 'inhuman', or when it is 'degrading'.[1] The wording of s 12(1)(e) is similar to that in other Constitutions[2] and international instruments.[3]

[1] See Khulu (supra) at 521B–H; S v Matoma 1981 (3) SA 838, 842H–843A (A); S v Collett 1990 (1) SACR 465, 470A–H (A); S v Masekeo 1982 (1) SA 99, 102F (A); S v Reay 1987 (1) SA 873, 877C (A); S v Sobandla 1992 (2) SACR 613, 617F–H (A); S v Potgieter 1994 (1) SACR 61 (A).

[2] Coker v Georgia 433 US 584, 97 SCt 2861 (1977). It is noteworthy that even the dissenting judges, who regarded rape as an offence which was so serious that the court could not intervene if the legislature chose to make it punishable by the sentence of death, accepted in principle that the 'concept of disproportionality bars the death penalty for minor crimes' (Burger CJ, with whom Rehnquist J concurred, dissenting at 604).

[3] See S v P 1985 (4) SA 105 (N).

Value judgments are unavoidable in deciding whether particular forms of punishment are fundamentally repugnant to the rights guaranteed in the Constitution. In a number of jurisdictions judges have agreed that these value judgments cannot merely reflect the predilections of the judges concerned, but that the reasoning and the information on which they are based should be clearly articulated. The issue has been complicated further by the recognition that such decisions cannot be made once and for all, but that they are based on evolving standards of decency.[4] One source of evolving standards of decency is international practice. The specific provision in the South African Constitution[5] that requires the courts to have regard to public international law, where applicable, and which permits them to look to comparable foreign case law means that South African courts, like those in Namibia and Zimbabwe, will pay considerable attention to comparative jurisprudence.[6]

The Namibian courts have suggested that when deciding whether a form of punishment is fundamentally unconstitutional, primary attention must be paid not only to the text of the Constitution and to comparative material in interpreting it but also to the 'social conditions, experiences and perceptions of the people' of the country concerned. In S v Tcoeib O'Linn J analysed earlier dicta and pointed out that these latter factors required the presentation of wide-ranging evidence.[7] There is still some uncertainty as to what evidence, if any, would be presented

[1] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 93 and 276 and S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861(CC) at para 20 ('Williams'). See also the interpretation given by Mahomed AJA to the similar provision in the Namibian Constitution in Ex parte Attorney General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment by Organs of State 1991 (3) SA 76, 86 (NmS), and by Gubbay JA to the similar provision in the Zimbabwean Constitution in S v Ncube; S v Tshuma; S v Ndhlovu 1988 (2) SA 702, 715 (ZS). In South African law, therefore, the debate which has dogged American and Canadian jurisprudence, about whether punishment has to be both 'cruel' and 'unusual' in order to be unconstitutional, will not arise: see W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992) at 1130.

[2] See, in particular, art 8 of the Constitution of Namibia and s 15 of the Constitution of Zimbabwe.

[3] Article 7 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights; art 3 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The latter refers only to 'inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment', but the absence of the word 'cruel' does not mean that its scope is significantly different.

[4] Makwanyane (supra) at para 199 (Kentridge J). In Williams (supra) at paras 36-37, Langa J suggested that the relationship between public opinion and 'contemporary standards of decency' was not clear and questioned whether it was necessary to adopt the American concept of 'contemporary standards of decency'. However, he also stated in the judgment that 'the Constitution ensures that the sentencing of offenders must conform to the standards of decency recognised throughout the civilised world'. Ibid at para 77.

[5] Section 39(1).

[6] See, eg, Makwanyane (supra) and Williams (supra).

[7] See S v Tcoeib 1993 (1) SACR 274 (Nm)('Tcoeib').

about objective factors of this kind and how they would be related to the fundamental value judgment.[1]

(i) The sentence of death

Much has been written about the constitutionality of various aspects of the sentence of death in many jurisdictions. As has been seen above, the death penalty has inspired close analysis of the importance of equality and proportionality in sentencing.[2] On the direct question of whether the death penalty is inherently unconstitutional, international law is equivocal. There is, however, a strong bias towards abolition.[3]

When the constitutionality of the death penalty was raised in S v Makwanyane[4] Chaskalson P surveyed much of the international law and the comparative jurisprudence, but observed that there was little of it which could be applied directly to the question of whether death is an acceptable form of punishment in South African constitutional law.[5] He emphasised that the court had to pay due regard to the South African legal system, to South African history and circumstances, and to the language of the South African Constitution.[6] The latter point was particularly important because of differences in the wording of Constitutions.[7] Many Constitutions either outlaw capital punishment[8] or, conversely, guarantee its existence,[9] thus removing the issue from direct constitutional debate.

In Makwanyane, the Constitutional Court held that capital punishment infringed the rights to life and dignity and constituted cruel, inhuman or degrading punish-

[1] In S v Williams and Five Similar Cases 1994 (4) SA 126 (C) the court gave counsel for the state time to consider whether he wished to lead evidence, in terms of s 102(1) of the Constitution. This may be evidence of the kind referred to in Tcoeib (supra). On the difficulties of providing relevant evidence on these questions, see S v A Juvenile 1990 (4) SA 151, 171B (ZS). On the limited relevance of 'public opinion', see Makwanyane (supra) at paras 87–9.

[2] See § 49.2*(b)* supra on equality and § 49.2*(c)* supra on proportionality.

[3] For an overview, see W A Schabas The Abolition of the Death Penalty in International Law (3rd Edition, 2002). An example of the balance which is being struck is art 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which lays down detailed requirements which the death penalty has to meet, but adds, in art 6(6), that nothing in art 6 'shall be invoked to delay or prevent the abolition of capital punishment'. There is also an optional protocol to the International Covenant, which aims at the abolition of capital punishment.

[4] Makwanyane (supra).

[5] Ibid at paras 37–9 (Chaskalson P).

[6] Ibid at para 39 (Chaskalson P).

[7] In particular, the substantive protection given to the right to life by s 9 was stressed by Chaskalson P in Makwanyane (supra) at paras 38, 78, 80 and 85. See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 154 (Ackermann J) and at para 324 (O'Regan).

[8] For example, art 102 of the German Basic Law or art 6 of the Constitution of Namibia.

[9] Article 5(1) of the Constitution of Malaysia or art 9(1) of the Constitution of Singapore.

ment.[1] The crucial question was whether s 277(1)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Act,[2] which made it a competent sentence for murder, created a legitimate limitation of these rights. The state's principal argument in this regard was that capital punishment was justified by its deterrent effect. The court rejected this argument on the grounds that there was no clear proof that capital punishment served effectively to deter murder.[3] It was pointed out that the deterrence argument tends to ignore the existence of alternative sentences to capital punishment[4] and that it ignored the State's duty to act as a role model in the development of a culture of rights.[5] The court also rejected arguments of the Attorney-General, who sought to justify capital punishment for its retributive function or as a measure necessary to prevent criminals from killing again.[6] In particular, the court emphasised that the retributive element of punishment had to be given less weight under a human rights regime that placed a particular emphasis on the value of ubuntu.[7] Taken cumulatively, retribution, prevention, and a marginal deterrent effect on potential murderers were held to be insufficient to justify the factors 'which taken together make capital punishment cruel, inhuman and degrading: the destruction of life, the annihilation of dignity, the elements of arbitrariness, inequality and the possibility of error in the enforcement of the penalty'.[8]

(ii) Corporal punishment

In S v Williams & others, the provisions of s 294 of the Criminal Procedure Act,[9] were challenged on the grounds that whippings were contrary to human dignity and were cruel, inhuman or degrading. The South African courts had long expressed reservations about corporal punishment and its compatibility with [1] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 95 (Chaskalson P). See also Mohamed & another v President of the Republic of South Africa & others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa intervening) 2001(3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at para 39 (Constitutional Court in an en banc decision confirmed that death penalty was also inconsistent with the values and provisions of the Final Constitution).

[2] Act 51 of 1977.

[3] Makwanyane (supra): Chaskalson P at paras 116–25, Didcott J at paras 181–3, Kentridge J at para 202, Kriegler J at paras 212–13, Mahomed J at paras 286–94, Mokgoro J at para 317, and O'Regan J at para 340.

[4] Ibid at para 123 (Chaskalson P), at para 181 (Didcott J), and at para 287 (Mahomed J).

[5] Ibid at para 124 (Chaskalson P), at 222 (Langa J), and at para 316 (Mokgoro J).

[6] Ibid at para 128 (Chaskalson P).

[7] Ibid at paras 129–31 (Chaskalson P), at para 203 (Kentridge J), at paras 222–7 (Langa J), at paras 237–43 (Madala J), at para 296 (Mahomed J), at paras 307–13 (Mokgoro J), and at para 341 (O'Regan J).

[8] Ibid at para 135 (Chaskalson P).

[9] Act 51 of 1977. Section 294 was subsequently repealed by s 2 of Act 33 of 1997.

human dignity,[1] but had not previously been able to strike down the primary legislation that allowed it to be imposed. In Williams the Constitutional Court noted the rejection of corporal punishment at international law[2] and in the jurisprudence of many national states[3] and declared juvenile whippings to be unconstitutional. The court emphasised the dehumanising nature of whippings:

> The severity of the pain inflicted is arbitrary, depending as it does almost entirely on the person administering the whipping. Although the juvenile is not trussed, he is as helpless. He has to submit to the beating, his terror and sensitivity to pain notwithstanding . . . The fact that the adult is stripped naked merely accentuates the degradation and humiliation. The whipping of both is, in itself, a severe affront to their dignity as human beings.[4]

Langa J proceeded to reject 'any culture of authority which legitimates the use of violence . . . [as] inconsistent with the values of the Constitution'.[5] In so doing he rejected the argument of the State that the dignity of juveniles is not necessarily infringed by the infliction of corporal punishment.[6] The State argued that juvenile whippings were a justifiable limitation of the rights protected by ss 10 and 11 of the 1993 Constitution[7] because of their deterrent value and because they provided a convenient and beneficial alternative to other socially more undesirable forms of punishment.[8] Langa Jrejected these arguments and pointed to the need to utilise

---

[1] See, for example, S v Kumalo & others 1965 (4) SA 565, 574F–H (N); S v Motsoetsoana 1986 (3) SA 350 (N); S v Ndaba & others 1987 (1) SA 237, 245A–C (T).

[2] See Williams (supra) at para 39. International law usually contains only a general prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment. This prohibition is subject to interpretation and development: see N Rodley The Treatment of Prisoners under International Law (2nd Edition, 1999) 309–324. Secondary instruments do outlaw corporal punishment explicitly. Examples are the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules), which outlaw corporal punishment of juveniles (Rule 17.3), and the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, which outlaw corporal punishment of prisoners (Rule 31). In 1993 South African practice was brought into the line with the latter rule, when corporal punishment ceased to be a punishment that could be imposed on prisoners. (See s 17 of the Correctional Services Amendment Act 68 of 1993, which amended s 54 of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.)

[3] See Williams (supra) at para 40. For pronouncements of the constitutionality of corporal punishment for adults in Southern African countries, see S v Petrus & another [1985] LRC (Const) 699 (Botswana CA); S v Ncube; S v Tshuma; S v Ndhlovu (supra); Ex parte Attorney-General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment 1991 (3) SA 76 (NmS).

[4] Williams (supra) at para 45.

[5] Ibid at para 52.

[6] Ibid at paras 41–7. See McNally JA (dissenting) in S v A Juvenile 1990 (4) SA 151, 171E–H (ZS).

[7] That is, the rights to human dignity and freedom from cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment (cf ss 10 and 12(1)(e) of the 1996 Constitution). The court found it unnecessary to consider the appellants' argument that these rights were incapable of limitation. See Williams (supra) at paras 55–6. In Smith v The Queen (1987) 34 CCC (3d) 97 Lamer J notes that there are some punishments which will always 'outrage our standards of decency'. Smith (supra) at 140. He includes in this obiter pronouncement 'corporal punishment, such as the lash, irrespective of the number of strokes'. An even wider version of this proposition is developed by Stuart, who argues that no punishment which in the Canadian context is cruel and unusual, either because of its nature or because it is grossly disproportionate in a particular case, should ever be regarded as being justifiable in terms of the Canadian limitations clause; D Stuart Charter Justice in Canadian Law (1991) 308–9.

[8] See S v Vakalisa 1990 (2) SACR 88, 94G–J (Tk); in S v A Juvenile (supra) at 171I–172A (McNally JA, (dissenting)).

new sentencing options which did not require the sacrifice of decency and human dignity.[1]

S v Williams addressed only juvenile whippings in the context of s 294 of the Criminal Procedure Act. The judgment has had obvious implications for all forms of corporal punishment. Following Williams it is clear that the corporal punishment of adults in execution of criminal sentences will be unconstitutional.[2] It seems likely that corporal punishment at schools will be similarly struck down. Although the Constitutional Court was at pains to stress that the issue of corporal punishment of scholars was not before it,[3] dicta in Williams suggest that the Constitution will not countenance the caning of school children.[4] In any event, legislation subsequent to the decision in Williams outlawed corporal punishment in all schools, including private schools run by non-government bodies.[5] The constitutionality of this provision was challenged by parents of children in religious schools. In Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education,[6] the Constitutional Court held that, even if it were assumed that the prohibition infringed the religious rights of parents, it was saved by the limitations clause, as religious freedom could be limited in this way in order to protect the rights of the child and reduce violence in society generally.

(iii) Imprisonment

Imprisonment, even for a short period, is a harsh form of punishment. The circumstances of imprisonment may mean not only that the offender loses his liberty but also that his human dignity is infringed. However, this is a criticism of the manner in which imprisonment is often implemented rather than of legislation allowing its imposition. In theory at least, imprisonment, properly organised,[7] offers the offender the possibility of retaining his dignity, of reflecting on his conduct, and of returning to society as a full participant. A 'Methuselah sentence' – a term that is so long that a prisoner would have absolutely no chance of being released at the expiry of the sentence or on parole after serving half the sentence – will amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.[8] The absence of a possibility of parole makes it unconstitutional.[9]

[1] See Williams (supra) at paras 64–75.

[2] This proposition was common cause between the parties. Ibid at para 10.

[3] Ibid at para 49.

[4] Ibid at paras 47 and 52. Corporal punishment in Namibian schools was prohibited in Ex parte Attorney-General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment (supra).

[5] Section 10(1) of the South African Schools Act 84 of 1996 provides simply: 'No person may administer corporal punishment at a school to a learner.'

[6] See Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC). For criticism of the Court's inconsistent protection of children's rights in Christian education, see S Woolman 'Association' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition) (supra) at § 44.3(c)(viii).

[7] However, the imprisonment of a person who is not able to cope physically without being humiliated may well be contrary to human dignity. See Price v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 53 in which the imprisonment of a quadriplegic with out inquiring whether adequate resources were available to deal with her needs, was held to violate the prohibition on degrading punishment in art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

[8] Such punishment is prescribed by s 12(1)(e) of the Constitution.

[9] See S v Nkosi & another 2003 (1) SACR 91 (SCA) ('Nkosi II') at para 9.

(iv) Life imprisonment

Life imprisonment, if given its literal meaning, denies the offender the possibility of returning to society. As Levy J explained in the Namibian case of S v Nehemia Tjijo,[1] the effects may be disastrous:

> Life imprisonment robs the prisoner of . . . hope. Take away his hope and you take away his dignity and all desire he may have to continue living . . . The concept of life imprisonment destroys human dignity by reducing a prisoner to a number behind the walls of a gaol waiting only for death to set him free.

For Levy J the logic of these propositions was inescapable. Life imprisonment was unconstitutional because it infringed the human dignity of the offender. Nor was he impressed by the fact that offenders might be released on parole or unconditionally before completing their sentences. It was not sufficient to rely on the wide discretion of the executive to ensure that the human dignity of the offender was safeguarded.[2]

The argument that life imprisonment is a cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment is often rejected outright. It is argued that it does not infringe human dignity significantly more than other long prison sentences and that it is justifiable as a maximum penalty, particularly where the death sentence has been abolished.[3] A much more subtle approach to the question of life imprisonment was developed by the German Federal Constitutional Court in 1977.[4] The Court recognised that the State was entitled to legislate for harsh punishments for serious offences. It said, however, that a punishment that placed the individual permanently in prison and made his release subject to the exercise of executive power was an unconstitutional violation of the human dignity of the offender.[5] What was required, said the court, was a mechanism that gave the offender the assurance that his release would be considered by a judicial body after a set period. This procedure would allow the person serving the sentence to retain some prospect of release and thus to preserve his dignity. Judicial review of all life sentences after the prisoner had served a maximum of 15 years was subsequently introduced by legislation.[6] The constitutionality of that legislation has been upheld in principle

[1] Unreported decision of 4 September 1991 as quoted in Tcoeib (supra) at 275*i*.

[2] Ibid at 275*j*–276*d*.

[3] See the judgment of Ackermann J in Makwanyane (supra) at paras 170–2. See also Tcoeib (supra) and the review of international practice conducted there. It should be noted, however, that life imprisonment is outlawed in a number of countries and that there is a small but active movement that is pressing for its total abolition. For an overview of the international position, see United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch Life Imprisonment (1994).

[4] 45 BVerfGE 187.

[5] It would also fail to meet the requirements of legality.

[6] A new section, art 57a, was added to the German Penal Code in 1982. In its decision of 3 June 1992 the Federal Constitutional Court held that it was acceptable to take into account whether the offender had been particularly blameworthy in respect of the offence for which he had been sentenced when subsequently considering his release in terms of art 57a. 86 BVerfGE 288. However, the trial court should make a finding in this regard in order to guide the tribunal that would eventually decide on his release.

by a later decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court.[1]

In S v Tcoeib[2] the Supreme Court of Namibia held that life imprisonment could not be equated with the sentence of death.[3] Chief Justice Mahomed, who gave the judgment of the Court, adopted the same approach to life imprisonment as had the German Federal Constitutional Court in 1977.[4] Life imprisonment could be justified only if the prisoner retained some hope of eventually being released from prison. Mahomed CJ explained that life imprisonment

> 'cannot be justified if it effectively amounts to a sentence which locks the gates of the prison irreversibly on the offender without any prospect whatever of lawful escape from that condition for the rest of his or her natural life and regardless of circumstances which might subsequently arise'.[5]

Like the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Namibia emphasised that the constitutionality of life imprisonment depended on the recognition of the human dignity of the prisoner. Such dignity would be undermined unless the prisoner had a 'concrete and fundamentally realizable expectation'[6] of release. The difficult question was whether the existing release mechanisms were sufficient to meet that requirement. Mahomed CJ conceded that > if the release of the prisoner depends entirely on the capricious exercise of the discretion of the prison or executive authorities, leaving them free to consider such a possibility at a time which they please or not at all and to decide what they please when they do, the hope which might yet flicker in the mind and heart of the prisoner is much too faint and much too unpredictable to retain for the prisoner a sufficient residue of dignity which is left uninvaded.[7]

Mahomed CJ ruled that the procedures for the consideration of the release of life prisoners created by the Namibian Prisons Act were sufficient, notwithstanding the fact that (a) they gave wide discretionary powers to officials of the Namibian prison administration and (b) empowered the President to make the final decision to release a prisoner serving a life sentence when a Release Board had made a positive recommendation. In this respect the Namibian court did not

[1] 86 BVerfGE 288.

[2] See Tcoeib (supra).

[3] Ibid at 397*b*. The Court found that Levy J in S v Nehemia Tjijo (Unreported decision of 4 September 1991) had been wrong to equate the two.

[4] The 1977 decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court (45 BVerfGE 187) is referred to with approval by Mahomed CJ in Tcoeib (supra) at 398*g*–399*a* and 400*a*.

[5] Ibid at 398*b*.

[6] Ibid at 399*b*, quoting D van Zyl Smit 'Is Life Imprisonment Constitutional? The German Experience' 1992 Public Law 263, 271.

[7] See Tcoeib (supra) at 399*b*–400*a*.

follow the strict standards as set out by the German court. Decisions regarding the release of prisoners serving life sentences could be made by a judicial body. Mahomed CJ did emphasise, however, that:

> The relevant authorities entrusted with these functions have not only to act in good faith but they must properly apply their minds to each individual case, the relevant circumstances impacting on the exercise of a proper discretion, the objects of the relevant legislation creating such mechanisms and the values and protections of the Constitution.[1]

The decision of the Supreme Court of Namibia in Tcoeib may be regarded as strong persuasive authority in South Africa. The relevant provisions of the Namibian Constitution are mirrored by similar provisions in the South African Constitution.[2] One may predict with some confidence that a life sentence without the prospect of parole or other form of release will be found unconstitutional in South Africa.[3] The repeated statements of the South African Appellate Division that, as far as the courts are concerned, life means life,[4] do not therefore reflect the full, constitutionally required reality.

Life imprisonment has not yet been considered fully by the South African Constitutional Court.[5] However, in S v De Kock,[6] Van der Merwe J subjected the Southern African jurisprudence on life imprisonment to a comprehensive review.[7] He cited the decision of Mahomed CJ in S v Tcoeib[8] with approval and concluded that a decision on whether to impose life imprisonment should be taken on the basis that it was not a sentence that left the offender without a prospect of release. Van der Merwe J found that an expectation of release was inherent in the provisions of the Correctional Services Act.[9] He explained that the responsible authorities had to act fairly, justly and responsibly in the light of all the factors that existed at the time of sentence and that might come to the fore in the future.[10] If this did not happen, the courts could be asked to intervene.[11]

---

[1] Tcoeib (supra) at 400*c*.

[2] Article 8 (human dignity) of the Constitution of Namibia may be compared to s 10 in the Constitution of South Africa. Also relevant are the similar provisions relating to personal liberty (art 7 and s 12 in Namibia and South Africa respectively) and to administrative justice (art 18 and s 33 in Namibia and South Africa respectively).

[3] See Bull (supra) at para 23; Nkosi II (supra) at 95*d*. South African prison law does create a mechanism for the consideration of the release on parole of prisoners serving sentences of life imprisonment. Section 65(5) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.

[4] See S v Mdau 1991 (1) SA 169, 177B (A); S v Oosthuizen 1991 (2) SACR 298, 302A (A); S v W 1993 (2) SACR 74 (A); S v Mehlape en andere 1993 (2) SACR 180, 183H (T).

[5] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 170–2.

[6] S v De Kock 1997 (2) SACR 171 (T) ('De Kock').

[7] See De Kock (supra) at 204*d*–211*i*.

[8] See *Tcoeib (supra)*.

[9] See De Kock (supra) at 211*b*. See also S v Smith 1996 (1) SACR 250, 225*b*–256*a* (E).

[10] See De Kock (supra) at 211*b*.

[11] Ibid.

One could not proceed from the position that the responsible authorities would act irresponsibly and in a manner contrary to the Constitution and the Correctional Services Act.[1]

The Supreme Court of Appeal has made clear on a number of occasions that life imprisonment is the ultimate penalty. It should only be imposed on offenders who commit the most serious crimes. Courts should not attempt to ensure that such offenders are detained for longer than the minimum period before prisoners serving life sentences are considered for release, either by declaring offenders dangerous criminals[2] or by imposing exorbitantly long fixed-term sentences.[3]

49.3 The Implementation of Punishment

A sentence that is otherwise constitutionally acceptable may be implemented in a manner that is unconstitutional. In the case of death sentences, the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe[4] and the European Court of Human Rights[5] both declared that the manner in which the death penalty was implemented could amount to inhuman or degrading treatment. Where this has been the case the courts intervened to ensure that the sentence of death was not carried out, even if the Constitution or international instrument that they were interpreting allowed the death sentence to be imposed.[6] If the constitutionality of the sentence of death were ever to be upheld in South Africa, the constitutionality of the way in which it is implemented might be challenged along the same lines.

Constitutional challenges relating to the implementation of sentences are more likely to be directed against those forms of punishment in which the State plays an active part in the supervision and control of the offender over a long period of time, and which require decisions to be made about the termination of the sentence. Imprisonment and, to a lesser extent, correctional supervision, are such forms of punishment. This relationship between the State and the offender lends itself to a wide range of specific constitutional challenges. Most challenges are likely grounded in commitments to human dignity and the principle of legality.

[1] De Kock (supra) at 211*b*. See also the argument for legality in the implementation of sentences infra, § 49.3(b), and D van Zyl Smit 'Taking Life Imprisonment Seriously' in E Kahn (Ed) The Quest for Justice: Essays in Honour of Michael MacGregor Corbett, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of South Africa (1995) 309–27.

[2] See Bull (supra).

[3] See Nkosi II (supra); S v Silvale 1999 (2) SACR 102 (SCA).

[4] Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace in Zimbabwe v Attorney-General, Zimbabwe & others 1993 (4) SA 239 (ZS), 1993 (2) SACR 432 (ZS).

[5] Soering v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 439.

[6] In Soering (supra) the intervention took the indirect form of preventing extradition to the United States, where the European Court feared that the accused would be subject to treatment that would infringe the European Convention.

(a) Dignity

Most rights-based legal systems of prison law recognise that, as a general rule, imprisonment ought not to deny prisoners any other rights, except those of which the negation is the necessary consequence of incarceration. Historically, the recognition granted to prisoners' rights in South Africa has been patchy. Initially their rights were widely recognised. In 1912 in Whittaker v Roos and Bateman; Morant v Roos and Bateman[1] the newly constituted Appellate Division of the Union of South Africa held that prisoners of all kinds were entitled to 'all the personal rights and personal dignity not temporarily taken away by law, or necessarily inconsistent with the circumstances in which they had been placed.'[2] This dictum was restricted in a series of cases dealing with the rights of political detainees and eventually sentenced political prisoners.[3] In Goldberg & others v Minister of Prisons & others[4], the Court held that sentenced prisoners were limited to a few basic rights. However, in Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr,[5] the Appellate Division finally recognised that all the fundamental rights of prisoners survived incarceration and effectively reinstated the 1911 decision in Whittaker.

The decision in Hofmeyr continues to form the basis of South African jurisprudence on prisoners' rights and 'has been given fresh impetus by a number of our constitutional values such as dignity, equality and humanity'.[6] Moreover, the same principles underlie the prisoners' rights articulated in s 35(2) of the Constitution. Amongst these rights is detention in conditions of human dignity. These conditions include 'at least exercise and the provision, at state expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment'.[7] The danger

[1] See Whittaker v Roos and Bateman; Morant v Roos and Bateman 1912 AD 92 ('Whittaker').

[2] Whittaker (supra) at 123.

[3] See D van Zyl Smit ' "Normal" prisons in an "abnormal" society? A comparative perspective on South African prison law and practice' (1987) 6 Criminal Justice Ethics 37–51.

[4] See Goldberg & others v Minister of Prisons 1979 (1) SA 14 (A). The judgment is notable also for the dissent of Corbett JA, who adopted a much more liberal approach to the rights of sentenced prisoners in conformity with the general principles articulated in Whittaker (supra).

[5] See Minister of Justice v Hofmeyer 1993 (3) SA 131 (A). See also Van Biljon & others v Minister of Correctional Services & others 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C) at para 42 ('Van Biljon').

[6] See Minister of Correctional Services & others v Kwakwa & another 2002 (4) SA 455 (SCA) at 469I, [2002] 3 All SA 242 (A), 2002 (1) SACR 705 (SCA).

[7] For a thoughtful discussion of a prisoner's right to adequate medical treatment, see Van Biljon (supra), where Brand J ordered the prison authorities to provide HIV-positive applicant prisoners with the anti-retroviral medication that had been prescribed for them.

is that this list, together with the other rights mentioned in s 35(2),[1] may be considered to be the sum of prisoners' rights.

Some guidance on how prisoners' rights generally may be protected by focusing on the essential human dignity of prisoners may be gleaned from the extensive jurisprudence on prisoners' rights in other jurisdictions.[2] In Conjwayo v Minister of Justice, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs & others[3] the Zimbabwean Supreme Court held that the lawfulness of the actions of the authorities in drastically limiting the exercise period allowed to a condemned prisoner should be judged against '[the] broad and idealistic notion of dignity, humanity and decency'. It derived this principle directly from the provision in the Zimbabwean Constitution that outlaws torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[4] As a general matter, the Court emphasised that it was ill equipped to make decisions regarding the administration of prisons. However, Gubbay CJ, stated that::

> But a policy of judicial restraint cannot encompass any failure to take cognisance of a valid claim that a prison regulation or practice offends a fundamental constitutional protection.[5]

As is the case with imposition of punishment, the question of whether implementation of a sentence of imprisonment, or any other sentence, is contrary to human dignity can be answered by analysing closely whether the sentence

[1] Section 35(2) provides:
Everyone who is detained, including every sentenced prisoner, has the right—
(a) to be informed promptly of the reason for being detained;
(b) to choose, and to consult with, a legal practitioner, and to be informed of this right promptly;
(c) to have a legal practitioner assigned to the detained person by the state and at state expense, if substantial injustice would otherwise result, and to be informed of this right promptly;
(d) to challenge the lawfulness of the detention in person before a court and, if the detention is unlawful, to be released;
(e) to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least exercise and the provision, at state expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment; and
(f) to communicate with, and be visited by, that person's—
(i) spouse or partner;
(ii) next of kin;
(iii) chosen religious counsellor; and
(iv) chosen medical practitioner.

[2] See, generally, D van Zyl Smit South African Prison Law and Practice (1992) 59ff; S Krantz Cases and Materials on the Law of Corrections and Prisoners' Rights (3rd Edition, 1986); D van Zyl Smit & F Dünkel (eds) Imprisonment Today and Tomorrow—International Perspectives on Prisoners' Rights and Prison Conditions (2nd Edition, 2001); A J Fowles Prisoners' Rights in England and the United States (1989). For examples of judicial pronouncements on the retention of civil rights by prisoners, see Raymond v Honey [1983] 1 AC 1 [1981] 2 AIIER 1084 at 10, 14; R v Board of Visitors of Hull Prisoners, Ex parte St Germain [1979] QB 425, 455; Solosky v The Queen (1979) 105 DLR (3d) 745, 760; Meachum v Fano 427 US 215, 225, 96 SCt 2532 (1976); Connecticut Board of Pardons v Dumschat 452 US 458, 468, 101 SCt 2460 (1981); Namunjepo & others v Commanding Officer Windhoek Prison & another 2000 (6) BCLR 671 (NmS).

[3] See Conjwayo v Minister of Justice, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs & others 1992 (2) SA 56 (ZS) ('Conjwayo').

[4] Ibid at 63D–E.

[5] Ibid at 60I.

amounts to torture or a form of cruel inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[1] The prohibition of certain forms of punishment and treatment has also been used as the basis for the protection of prisoners' rights in international human rights law.[2] In this regard the European Court of Human Rights has been particularly active and has emphasised that torture or degrading treatment of punishment are prohibited in absolute terms in democratic societies, irrespective of the circumstances and the victims' behaviour.[3] The Court held that conditions of imprisonment may amount to degrading treatment, and thus infringe art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights,[4] even where the authorities to not intend to degrade the prisoner.[5] Prison overcrowding may be degrading to prisoners in this sense.[6]

It is clear that for any limitations of prisoners' rights to be accepted in South Africa, they have to be imposed by legislation and meet the requirements of the limitations section of the Constitution.[7] This necessary condition does not address the questions of what the full range of prisoners' rights is or of what limitations may legitimately be imposed on prisoners' rights. The answers are difficult to determine in the abstract and will often depend on the circumstances of the case[8] or on whether more specific rights of individual prisoners are involved as well.[9]

One particularly controversial question is the right of prisoners to vote.[10] In August & another v Electoral Commission & others[11] the Constitutional Court recognised the fundamental constitutional importance of the right to vote[12] and declared unconstitutional administrative action that would have deprived prisoners of the right to exercise it. However, the Court carefully left open the question

[1] See s 12(1)(e) of the Constitution as discussed by I Currie & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition) (supra) Chapter 39.

[2] See N S Rodley The Treatment of Prisoners Under International Law (2nd Edition, 1999); S Livingstone, T Owen and A MacDonald Prison Law, (3rd Edition, 2003) 109-140. For an overview of international and regional instruments applicable to prisoners' rights in Africa, see S H Bukurura Protecting Prisoners' Rights in Southern Africa: An Emerging Pattern (2002).

[3] See Kalashnikov v Russia (2003) 36 EHRR 34 at para 95.

[4] Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights provides: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman treatment or punishment.'

[5] See Peers v Greece (2001) 33 EHRR 51; Kalashnikov v Russia (supra); Poltoratskiy v Ukraine (application no 38812/97; unreported judgment of 29 April 2003).

[6] See Kalashnikov v Russia (supra).

[7] 'Imprisonment is a severe punishment; but prisoners retain all the rights to which every person is entitled under Ch 3, subject only to limitations imposed by the prison regime that are justifiable under s 33.' Makwanyane (supra) at para 143 (Chaskalson P) (The reference to s 33 in the passage quoted is to the Interim Constitution. In the Final Constitution the same function is performed by s 36.)

[8] See, for example, Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services and others 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W) (long-term maximum security prisoners had a right of access to electricity where the Department of Correctional Services had allowed the privilege of having electrical appliances in their cells).

[9] See C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292 (T) (prisoner's rights to privacy and dignity infringed when tested to determine whether he was HIV-positive without his fully informed consent.)

[10] See ss 1(d) and 19 of the Constitution.

[11] See August & another v Electoral Commission & others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) ('August').

[12] Ibid at para 17.

of whether legislation disqualifying prisoners or categories of prisoners from voting could be justified in terms of the limitations clause.[1] Given the emphasis on the importance of the right to vote, it is unlikely that a future court will uphold a total denial of the vote to all prisoners. A more limited, prospective restriction, for example, on the voting rights of offenders who are convicted of crimes against the democratic order may pass constitutional muster.[2] However, the logic of recognising the fundamental nature of the right to vote in a democracy makes it more likely that a South African Court will follow the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in finding that the denial of right to vote of any category of prisoners runs counter to the constitutional commitment to the inherent worth and dignity of every individual and therefore cannot be saved by the limitations clause.[3]

It is important to note that the recognition of the right of prisoners to constitutionally acceptable treatment means that prisoners may claim positive performance from the authorities. Prisoners are dependent on the authorities in ways that ordinary citizens are not. The prison authorities have to provide directly for them. For example, the courts in upholding prisoners' explicit constitutional right to be given adequate medical treatment have explained that 'unlike persons who are free, prisoners have no access to other resources to assist them in gaining access to medical treatment' and must therefore be provided with medical treatment even if such treatment would not be available to indigent persons outside prison.[4]

Prisoners' positive rights may be applied even more broadly. The German Federal Constitutional Court has held that the constitutionally protected human dignity of sentenced prisoners gives them an interest in ensuring that prisons are administered in a way that provides them with an opportunity to be resocialized and to lead a crime-free life.[5] Such an approach will have far-reaching implications for the way in which sentences of imprisonment are implemented in South Africa.

With the recognition in South African prison law that the implementation of a prison sentence has as its objective the enabling of prisoners to lead a socially responsible and crime free life, comes also the possibility that certain duties may

[1] August (supra) at para 31.

[2] See N V Demleitner 'Continuing Payment of One's Debt to Society: The German Model of Felon Disenfranchisement as an Alternative' (2000) 84 Minnesota LR 753. There is considerable evidence of partial restrictions being recognised in various jurisdictions. See August (supra) at para 31 n 30. Detailed examples are collected in the minority judgment of Gonthier J in Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer) 2002 SCC 68 at paras 122–134. Gonthier J also points out that the international and regional human rights tribunals have recognised such exceptions to the right to vote.

[3] Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer)(supra).

[4] See Van Biljon (supra) at para 53.

[5] 35 BVerfGE 203 at 235–6. For further comparative material, see E Rotman 'Do Criminal Offenders have a Constitutional Right to Rehabilitation?' (1986) 77 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 1023. Note also that art 10(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides: 'The penitentiary system shall comprise treatment of prisoners the essential aim of which shall be their reformation and social rehabilitation.'

be placed on sentenced prisoners. As such duties restrict rights of sentenced prisoners, it must meet the requirements of the limitation section of the Constitution.[1] An example of legislative provision for such duties is s 37 of the 1998 Correctional Services Act. Section 37 provides that sentenced prisoners must participate in an assessment process and 'perform any labour which is related to any development programme or which generally is designed to foster habits of industry'.[2] However, the Act strictly limits these duties by providing, for example, that prisoners who are ill cannot be compelled to work[3] and that the work may not be a form of punishment or disciplinary measure.[4] Moreover, if prison authorities compel prisoners to work in terms of these provisions, they are obliged, in order to recognise their human dignity, to reward them adequately for their labour.[5]

(b) Legality

(i) During imprisonment

An important component of the principle of legality[6] is that even those rights of prisoners that are restricted as a necessary consequence of incarceration may only be limited if this is done by law, either expressly or by necessary implication. Both the Constitution and the legislation regulating prisons in South Africa must therefore be scrutinized to see whether they provide the necessary authority for the restriction of prisoners' rights.[7] In addition, the restrictions must be formulated sufficiently narrowly to ensure that prisoners are not subject to overbroad discretionary powers.[8]

A further requirement is that in all dealings with prisoners the requirements of administrative justice must be met.[9] The courts have held that these requirements encompass the legitimate expectations that prisoners may form as a result of

[1] See Woolman 'Limitations' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition) (supra) at Chapter 12.

[2] This provision limits s 13 of the Constitution, which protects human dignity by stipulating that '[n]o one may be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour'. Note that by October 2003 the provisions relating to labour in the 1998 Correctional Services Act had not been brought into effect. Their compatibility with the Constitution (and that of the equivalent, less carefully drafted, provisions of the 1959 Correctional Services Act) has not been tested.

[3] Section 37(1)(b).

[4] Section 40(5).

[5] D van Zyl Smit 'Anchoring the Treatment of Sentenced Prisoners in a Rights Discourse: the Example of Prison Labour in German Prison Law' (1999) 116 SALJ 613.

[6] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra).

[7] See Minister of Correctional Services & others v Kwakwa & another (supra) at 473 (court emphasised that the Commissioner had to meet the requirements of legality in determining a system of privileges).

[8] See the seminal decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court of 14 March 1972 (33 BVerfGE 1), which declared the necessity of a statutory framework of sufficient precision to be a constitutional requirement for all restrictions of prisoners' rights. This decision led directly to the enactment of the German Prison Act of 1976.

[9] FC s 33.

the manner in which the prison authorities manage the privileges that they grant.[1] Legitimate expectations should also embrace the requirement of procedurally fair hearings before prisoners are transferred to institutions such as 'C-Max' high security prisons that may affect their privileges and concessions.[2]

(ii) On release

The requirements of legality in respect of the implementation of sentences relate also to the rules determining the release of offenders from the restrictions of their sentence. Difficulties in this regard rarely arise with respect to the final unconditional release of prisoners or those offenders subject to correctional supervision. Much more problematic are the decisions relating to conditional release on parole or correctional supervision. These decisions clearly affect the liberty of offenders. Even though it may be argued that no one has a right to parole, prisoners have a very strong interest in liberty and may often have legitimate expectations with respect to parole.[3]

The problem of expectations is particularly acute where a court has determined, formally or informally, that a person should be considered for release after a set period. In Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v United Kingdom,[4] the ECHR held that detaining prisoners serving discretionary life sentences[5] beyond the minimum period indicated by the trial judge as necessary to meet the punitive aims of the sentence, without having their release considered by a 'court', would be a contravention of art 5(4) of the European Convention on Human Rights. An administrative inquiry by a parole board, which left the final decision to a government minister, was held to be inadequate to meet this requirement. Article 5(4) of the European Convention is analogous to s 12(1)(b) of the South African Constitution. Section 12(1)(b) outlaws detention without trial. If this section is interpreted in a similar way to art 5(4), the constitutionality of current South African procedure in terms of s 65(5) of the 1959 Correctional Services Act for the release of prisoners serving life sentences is open to serious question.[6] The issue will arise

[1] See Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services & others (supra) at 354C-F.

[2] See Nortje en 'n ander v Minister van Korrektiewe Dienste 2001 (1) SACR 514 (HHA), 2001 (3) SA 472 (SCA), [2001] 2 All SA 623 (A).

[3] D van Zyl Smit South African Prison Law and Practice (supra) at 359–69. Whether prisoners have legitimate expectations to be granted parole is disputed. See Greenholtz v Inmates of Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex 442 US 1, 11, 99 SCt 2100 (1979) (the majority of the US Supreme Court ruled that a parole system 'provides no more than a mere hope that the benefit will be obtained'.) The liberty interest of parolees was recognised by Marshal J in his dissent in Greenholtz. Ibid at 23. This latter approach may prove persuasive in terms of the new South African Constitution.

[4] See Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v United Kingdom (1991) 13 EHRR 666.

[5] The same analysis has now also been extended to mandatory life sentences for murder: See Stafford v United Kingdom (2002) 35 EHRR 32 and Regina (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] UKHL 46, [2003]1 AC 837, and Regina v Lichniak, Regina v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47, [2003]1 AC 903.

[6] This question will not arise when Chapter VII of the Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 comes into force as the release on parole of all prisoners serving life sentences will be considered by the court that imposed them after the prisoners have served 25 years of their sentences.

with particular force where the sentencing court has given an indication of what may properly be regarded as the punitive part of a life sentence and the prisoner subsequently completes that part of the sentence.[1]

Procedures for release on parole have to comply with the standards of administrative justice.[2] South African courts are divided on the question of whether the Commissioner of Correctional Services is allowed to issue a general directive that parole boards should only consider offenders who have committed certain offences after they have served two-thirds, three-quarters or even four-fifths of their sentences.[3] The Act, however, allows all prisoners to be considered for release on parole after they have served half their sentences, minus any 'credits' they might be awarded for their behaviour in prison.[4] No authority exists in the 1959 Correctional Services Act for the Commissioner to issue such a directive to parole boards. Moreover, systematic offence-based intervention by the Commissioner is not related to any of the purposes of parole. It amounts to a de facto resentencing by the Commissioner and thus disturbs the relative, ordinal proportionality of the sentences imposed by the courts.[5] Although prisoners do not have a right to be paroled, such additional penalisation infringes the right to procedurally fair and reasonable administrative action. It undermines the prisoners' legitimate expectations, created by the Act, that they will be considered for release after they have served half their sentences, reduced further by the number of the credits they receive.[6]

Where a prisoner who has already been released on parole is alleged to have infringed his parole conditions the liberty interest is even stronger. It may even be argued that he cannot be returned to prison without a full trial-like procedure being followed to determine whether he has in fact infringed his conditions of parole.[7]

The same applies to prisoners serving sentences of correctional supervision. The current position is that prisoners who were sentenced initially to correctional supervision cannot have their sentences converted to imprisonment without the matter being heard by a court.[8] Such are the requirements of due process.

[1] The question was raised but not decided in Namibia, where the release procedures are similar to those currently in force in South Africa. See S v Tcoeib (supra) at 402*e–h*.

[2] See Steele v Warden Mountain Institution (1991) 60 CCC (3d) 1.

[3] Compare Winckler & others v Minister of Correctional Services & others 2001 (2) SA 747 (C), [2001] 2 All SA 12 (C) (which finds that the Commissioner has this power) with Combrink & another v Minister of Correctional Services & One Other 2001 (3) SA 338 (D), 2000 JDR 0607 (D), [2000] JOL 7349 (D).

[4] Section 65(4)(a) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.

[5] The courts will be able to play a much more active role in determining parole outcomes once s 276B of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 and Chapter VII of the Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 have come into force, inter alia, because they will be able to specify a non-parole period as part of the sentence. See S v Leholoane 2001 (2) SACR 297 (T).

[6] See Combrink & another v Minister of Correctional Services & another (supra); contra Winckler & others v Minister of Correctional Services & others (supra).

[7] The constitutional requirement for such a procedure has been widely recognised. See Morrissey v Brewer 408 US 471, 92 SCt 2593 (1972).

[8] Sections 276(1)(h), 286B(4)(b)(ii) or 297(1)(a)(i)*(cc*A), (1)(b) or (4) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 read with s 84B(2) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.

However, prisoners who are initially sentenced to imprisonment, and then have part of their sentences converted to correctional supervision, may subsequently be sent back to prison without the safeguard of a determination of the facts by a court.[1] The constitutionality of this latter procedure is dubious.[2] While the increased flexibility of sentences allows offenders to be subject to different forms of control, it will require the development of new procedural mechanisms to afford prisoners protection against constitutionally proscribed arbitrary exercises of power.[3]

The constitutional powers of the President to pardon or reprieve offenders exists outside of, and in addition to, the parole system.[4] Although this power is traditionally used sparingly, its constitutional status is such that its application will not easily be subject to judicial supervision.[5] However, in Hugo v President of the Republic of South Africa & another[6] the Court held that the President was bound to act in accordance with the Constitution when granting special remission of sentence. He could not discriminate unfairly. Such discrimination would contravene s 8(2) of the Interim Constitution.[7] Accordingly, it was held that the President could not grant remission only to mothers of children under the age of 12 years and thus discriminate against fathers. On appeal the Constitutional Court confirmed that the President could not exercise his power of pardon in violation of the Bill of Rights, but held, on the facts, that there had been no unfair discrimination against fathers.[8]

[1] Sections 276(1)(i) or 287(4)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, and s 84B(1) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.

[2] See D van Zyl Smit 'Degrees of Freedom' (Summer 1994) 13 Criminal Justice Ethics 31–7; P C Vegter 'Stellen de Grondrechten Eisen Aan De Vrijheidsbeperkende Straf' in T H van Veen & G van Essen (eds) Sanktietoepassing Een Nieuwe Ordening (1991) 35. In De Lange v Commissioner of Correctional Services, Eastern Cape 2002 (3) SA 683 (SE), 2002 (2) SACR 185 (SE) it was emphasised that a prisoner has no right enforceable against the prison authorities to compel them to approach the court to ask for a variation of the sanction.

[3] At the very least the decision to send a person back to prison must be subject to some form of substantive review under s 33*(d)* of the Constitution, the right to administrative justice, to ensure that it satisfies the requirements of proportionality. See in this regard Roman v Williams NO 1997 (9) BCLR 1267 (C), 1998 (1) SA 270 (C), [1997] 4 All SA 210 (C). Van Deventer J confirmed the decision of the Commissioner under s 84B(1) of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959 to re-imprison the applicant, but only because the decision was substantively justifiable in relation to the reasons given for it. The Correctional Services Act 111 of 1998 contains much more elaborate procedures in this regard, but by October 2003 they had not been brought into effect.

[4] See s 84(1)(j) of the Constitution, read with s 327 of the Criminal Procedure Act and ss 66 and 70 of the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959.

[5] Gerhardt v State President 1989 (2) SA 499 (T); Kruger v The Minister of Correctional Services & others 1995 (2) SA 803 (T), 1995 (1) SACR 375 (T); Kommissaris van Korrektiewe Dienste v Malaza 1996 (1) SA 1143 (W).

[6] Hugo v President of the Republic of South Africa & another 1996 (2) SA 1012 (D), [1996] 1 All SA 454 (D), 1996 BCLR 876 (D).

[7] Act 200 of 1993. Section 9(3) of the Final Constitution contains the comparable provision.

[8] President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC).

50 Environment*

Morne van der Linde and Ernst Basson

50.1 Introduction 50–1
50.2 International perspectives on the right to a healthy environment 50–2
(a) Importance of international perspectives — nature of the right 50–2
(b) Global level of protection 50–3
(c) Regional level of protection 50–5
(d) National Level of Protection 50–8
50.3 South African Constitution 50–8
(a) Historical context and Interim Constitution 50–9
(b) The Final Constitution 50–10
(i) Constructing the right 50–10
(aa) Meaning of 'environment' 50–12
(bb) Meaning of 'health' and 'well-being' 50–13
(x) Health 50–13
(1) General 50–13
(2) Pollution: Duty of care 50–14
(3) Environmental strict liability . 50–15
(y) Well-being 50–16
(cc) Meaning of 'present and future generations' 50–18
(dd) Meaning of 'ecologically sustainable development' 50–19
(x) Sustainable development 50–19
(1) International Law 50–19
(2) Application in South African law 50–21
(y) Ecologically 50–24
(ee) Meaning of 'reasonable legislative and other measures' 50–26
(w) Reasonable measures 50–26

* This chapter reflects the law as at August 2009. Several important changes in environmental law have occurred since that date, particularly in the areas of environmental impact assessment, regulation of air quality, coastal management and waste management. A future update will address these changes.

(x) Financial constraints 50–27
(y) Legislative measures 50–28
(1) National Environmental Management Act (NEMA) . . 50–30
(2) National Forest Act (NFA) . . 50–31
(3) National Water Act (NWA) . . 50–31
(4) Marine Living Resources Act (MLRA). 50–32
(5) Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act (MPRDA) 50–32
(6) National Environmental Management: Protected Areas Act (NEM: PAA) 50–33
(7) National Environmental Management: Biodiversity Act (NEM: BA) 50–33
(8) National Environmental Management: Air Quality Act (the Air Quality Act) 50–33
(9) National Environmental Management: Waste Act (Waste Act) 50–35
(10) National Environmental Management: Integrated Coastal Management Act (ICMA) 50–36
(z) Other measures: integrated environmental management systems and environmental impact assessments 50–36
(ii) Related Rights and Constitutional provisions . . . 50–41
(aa) Substantive rights 50–42
(u) Equality 50–42
(v) The right to life. 50–43
(w) Human dignity 50–43
(x) Access to housing. 50–44
(y) Access to food and water 50–44
(z) Property Clause. 50–45
(bb) Procedural Rights 50–46
(x) Access to Information 50–46
(y) Administrative Justice. 50–48
(iii) Other constitutional provisions relevant to the environment. 50–51

50.4 Application of the right to a healthy environment: practical considerations 50–52
(a) Considering the appropriate forum for environmental dispute settlement 50–52
(b) The issue of standing 50–54
(c) Scope of application 50–55
(d) Limitation of the environmental right 50–56
(e) Interpretational guidelines 50–56
(f) The role of international law in environmental disputes 50–58
(g) The role of foreign law in environmental disputes 50–59
(h) Remedies in Environmental Disputes 50–60
(i) Choosing a remedy 50–60
(ii) Specific remedies in environmental disputes 50–61
(aa) Judicial Review of State Action 50–61
(bb) Interdicts 50–62
(x) Prohibitory interdict 50–62
(y) Mandamus (mandatory interdict) . . . 50–62
(z) Structural interdict 50–62
(cc) Criminal sanctions 50–64
(dd) Declaration of Rights 50–65
(ee) Contractual Obligations 50–65
(ff) Delictual Damages 50–66
(gg) Constitutional remedies 50–66
(hh) Costs 50–66

Everyone has the right:
(a) to an environment that is not harmful to their health or well-being; and
(b) to have the environment protected, for the benefit of present and future generations, through reasonable legislative and other measures that:
(i) prevent pollution and ecological degradation;
(ii) promote conservation; and
(iii) secure ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources while promoting justifiable economic and social development.[1]

50.1 INTRODUCTION

Our natural environment is finite.[2] This finitude is brought into sharp relief by a host of harmful human activities:[3] 'unsustainable development, irresponsible use of natural resources, neglect, abuse, greed, ignorance or a lack of respect' for nature's delicate ecosystems.[4] Our systemic disregard for our environment has led to a loss of genetic diversity, de-vegetation, desertification, pollution, degradation of fresh water sources, overpopulation, deterioration and erosion of topsoil, climate and atmospheric quality change, ozone layer depletion and acid rain, reduction of non-renewable energy sources, disruption of biochemical cycles and a loss of cultural heritage.[5] Some have gone so far as to characterise the ineluctable course of environmental destruction as a 'global security threat'.[6]

A full blown response to such a global security threat lies beyond the scope of this chapter. What follows is what two South African environmental lawyers can offer: an examination of a person's right to a healthy environment and the right to protection of the environment as made manifest in the Final Constitution. With those more limited goals in mind, we will also briefly consider the origins and recognition of this right in international human rights discourse and its protection at both a global and a regional level. The better part of this chapter goes on to explore the ambit of the constitutional right to a healthy environment against the backdrop of extant environmental legislation in South Africa.[7]

---

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') s 24.
[2] PM Pevato (ed) International Environmental Law (Volume 1, 2003) xiv.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid citing LK Caldwell International Environmental Policy (2nd Edition, 1990) 17-8.
[6] G Handl 'Environmental Security and Global Change: The Challenge to International Law' (1990) (1) Yearbook of International Environmental Law 3.
[7] The need for capacity building in the field of environmental law at a national level was identified in 2002. The Johannesburg Principles on the Role of Law and Sustainable Development stated that 'we [judges] are strongly of the view that there is an urgent need to strengthen the capacity of judges, prosecutors, legislators and all persons who play a critical role at national level in the process of implementation, development and enforcement of environmental law, including multilateral environmental agreements (MEAs), especially through the judicial process.' The Chief Justices of Southern Africa once again reaffirmed this position in 2003 at the Regional Needs Assessment Meeting for Southern Africa. To further these goals, a national symposium on environmental law for judges was held in Pretoria during January 2004. See also Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 at paras 102-104 (The Constitutional Court emphasised the obligation on South African Courts, in terms of the Johannesburg Principles, to protect the environmental rights in the Constitution for the benefit of present and future generations, regardless of the identity of the party seeking such protection.)

50.2 International Perspectives on the Right to a Healthy Environment

Norm setting and protection of the environment takes place on four different levels: the global (United Nations), the regional (African Union), the sub-regional (Southern African Development Community) and the national (South Africa). Many governments commit themselves to implementing — at a national level — norms set at a global, regional or sub-regional level. A common critique of international human rights norms is that if these norms were adequately enforced at the national level, the international norms would be superfluous.[1] This insight rings true, and points to the need to distinguish between international norm setting and domestic enforcement. Thus, the environmental rights found in various international instruments rely for their enforcement on the Final Constitution.[2] That said, the international norms are not without purpose in our polity: the broad and long-standing norms of international law play an essential part in determining the meaning of the constitutional right to a healthy environment.

(a) Importance of international perspectives — nature of the right

Why do we want to protect a right to a healthy environment? Two schools of thought answer this question: anthropocentric and deontological. On the anthropocentric approach a healthy sustainable environment is of purely instrumental value: the environment serves the important ends of man. It promotes health, happiness and social cohesion.[3] The deontological approach, on the other hand, views a healthy, sustainable natural environment as an end in itself. Such broad philosophical debates again fall outside the ambit of this chapter; but they inform — if only at an intuitive level — the explication of our constitutionally entrenched right.

In contemporary rights discourse, environmental rights have been categorised as 'third-generation rights.' First-generation rights are the traditional civil and political rights — the rights to vote, to a fair trial, freedom of expression and so on. Socio-economic rights — rights to food, housing, healthcare, education — are labelled 'second-generation' rights. The third generation of rights emerged only after the adoption of the 1966 human rights covenants[4] and they are often referred to as 'solidarity rights'. In addition to the right to a healthy environment, the category also embraces the right to peace and the right to development.[5]

---

[1] C Heyns & F Viljoen 'An Overview of International Human Rights Protection in Africa' (1999) 15 SAJHR 421.

[2] See FC s 24. See also 1981 African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ('the African Charter') art 24.

[3] For a discussion on the issue of anthropocentrism, see M Anderson 'Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection: An Overview' in A Boyle & M Anderson (eds) Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection (1996) 15. See also C Stone 'Should Trees Have Standing? - Towards Legal Rights for Natural Objects' (1972) 45 USC L Rev 450.

[4] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ('ICCPR') adopted 16 December 1966 (G.A. Res. 2200A (XXI) UN Doc A/6316 (1966) 999 UNTS 171), and the International Covenant on Socio and Economic Rights ('ICESR') adopted 16 December 1966 (G.A. Res. 2200A (XXI) UN Doc A/6316 (1966) 993 UNTS 3).

[5] A Rosas 'So-called Rights of the Third Generation' in A Eide, C Krause & A Rosas (eds) Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1995) 243.

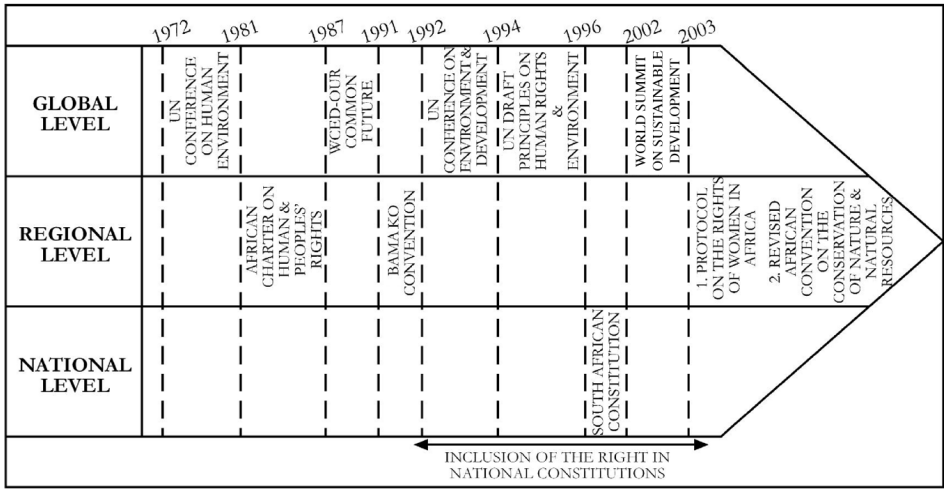
At international law, the content of the broad right to a healthy environment consists of two linked but distinct parts: substantive rights and procedural rights. Substantive rights generally take the form of positive state obligations. They encompass the government's duty to prevent pollution and ecological degradation as well as its obligation to promote conservation and sustainable development. Ultimately, determining the substance of these duties depends upon value judgements made by courts or other decision-makers.

Procedural rights address how decisions about the environment should be made, rather than what decisions are ultimately taken. The most common procedural rights are: (1) the right to information concerning the environment; (2) the right to receive and disseminate ideas and information; (3) the right to participation in environmental planning and decision-making, including any prior Environmental Impact Assessment ('EIA'); (4) the right to freedom of association in relation to environmental protection; and (5) the right to effective remedies and redress for environmental harm in administrative or judicial proceedings.[1] While the procedural rights have been widely acknowledged and accepted, the recognition of the substantive dimension of the right has not, as yet, secured the same level of international consensus.

(b) Global level of protection

The necessity of organized efforts to protect the environment only rose to public awareness in the early 1970s. At that time, people began to appreciate that the environment was being placed under ever increasing pressure and was unlikely to sustain itself without coordinated participation, management practices and regulatory frameworks both globally and locally.

KEY EVENTS IN THE RECOGNITION OF THE RIGHT TO AN ENVIRONMENT



[1] See M Anderson 'An Overview' in A Boyle & M Anderson (eds) Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection (1996) 8.

Increased appreciation for the need for systemic intervention led to a shift from a traditional commitment to conservation, to a co-ordinated approach to 'environmental management'. This shift was formalised when, in 1972, the United Nations General Assembly ('UNGA') convened the United Nations Conference on Human Environment in Stockholm.[1] The Stockholm Declaration[2] provided that 'man has a fundamental right to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in an environment where quality permits a life of dignity and well-being'.[3]

The Stockholm Conference also led to the creation of the United Nations Environmental Programme ('UNEP'), as the primary UN agency responsible for the environment.[4] The leading global environmental authority has as its mission 'to provide leadership and encourage partnership in caring for the environment by inspiring, informing and enabling nations and peoples to improve their quality of life without compromising that of the future generations.'[5] In 1987, the World Commission on Environment and Development developed a new right: 'All human beings have the fundamental right to an environment adequate for their health and well-being'.[6]

Support for the new right continued to grow. In 1990, the UN Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities stressed the 'need to identify new trends in international law relating to human rights dimensions of environmental protection.'[7] Then, in 1991, the Commission on Human Rights held that 'all individuals are entitled to live in an environment adequate for their health and well-being.'[8] In the same year, the UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights and the Environment stressed the need for research into 'the permissible limits to the exercise of certain guaranteed human rights in order to ensure full enjoyment of the right to the environment.'[9] Twenty years after the Stockholm Declaration another important international soft law instrument was created — Agenda 21.

[1] This Conference was held in June 1972 in Stockholm, Sweden ('Stockholm Conference').

[2] Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment available at http://www.unep.org/Documents.Multilingual/Default.asp?DocumentID=97&ArticleID=1503 (accessed on 16 October 2009).

[3] UN doc A/Conf.48/14.rev, Chapter 1 (New York 1972).

[4] The three core 'soft law' instruments that emerged from the Stockholm Conference were presented to the 27th Session of the UN General Assembly ('UNGA') in 1972. These instruments were: (1) the Stockholm Declaration, consisting of 26 guiding principles on current environmental challenges; (2) an Action Plan, consisting of 109 recommendations of international action for environmental management; and (3) a framework for the creation of an organization to implement the Action Plan. See UNGA Res 2997 (XXVII)) and Res 3004 (XXVII).

[5] UNEP (DPDL)/GJS/1/3: UNEP`s Environmental Law Activities: a 30-year Review (From Stockholm to Johannesburg) (2002) 2.

[6] World Commission on Environment and Development Our Common Future (1987) 348.

[7] Preamble, Human Rights and the Environment - Resolution 1990/7 of the Sub-Commission adopted on 30 August 1990.

[8] Rsolution 1991/44 (5 March 1991).

[9] UN doc.E/CN.4/Sub.2/1991/8 of 2 August 1991.

Agenda 21 emerged from the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development ('UNCED').[1] It serves as a comprehensive plan of action for the implementation of sustainable development. However, the right to a healthy environment played a limited role in the plan. Boyle contends that Agenda 21's failure to give greater recognition to the right to environment is indicative of the continuing uncertainty of the role of human rights law in international environmental law.[2] Nevertheless, the right gained greater traction in the final report of the Special Rapporteur of the UN Commission on Human Rights. The 'Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination of Minorities, Human Rights and the Environment' contained 27 principles on human rights and the environment'.[3] A more recent development came at the 2002 World Summit on Sustainable Development. The Summit evaluated progress in environmental protection over the previous 10 years and offered a map of the way forward.

(c) Regional level of protection[4]

The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights provides for a right to a satisfactory environment and creates an internationally binding human rights instrument for African states.[5] However, prior to the adoption of the Charter, environmental concerns in Africa were primarily limited to natural disasters.[6] As a result, it is not surprising that the negotiators did not foresee the importance of the inclusion of the environmental right, nor its potential to address contemporary environmental concerns that can be ascribed to globalisation, industrialisation, unrestricted development, wars, civil conflicts and other humanitarian crises. Article 24 of the African Charter stipulates that 'all people shall have the right to a satisfactory environment favourable to their development'.[7] While its broad outline is promising, the right contains no clear indication as to what the terms 'satisfactory' and 'environment' entail. This ambiguity allows for both broad and restrictive readings.

The African Charter provides for a supervisory body — the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights — to ensure that the rights contained in the Charter are promoted and protected by state parties to the African Charter. The Commission has had two opportunities to consider the meaning of article 24. In

[1] The Conference — also known as the Rio Conference — was held in June 1992 in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

[2] A Boyle 'The Role of International Human Rights Law in the Protection of the Environment' in A Boyle & M Anderson Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection (1996) 43.

[3] UN Doc.E/CN.4./Sub.2/1994/9. These draft principles are reprinted in C Miller Environmental Rights: Critical Perspectives (1998) 3.

[4] For a more comprehensive discussion see M Van der Linde 'Regional Environmental Law under the Auspices of the African Union' in HA Strydom & ND King Fuggle and Rabie's Environmental Management in South Africa (2nd Edition, 2009) 165-189.

[5] The African Charter was adopted on 27 June 1981 in Nairobi, Kenya and entered into force on 21 October 1986. All 53 countries in Africa are members of the African Union.

[6] The natural disasters that elicited the most concern were drought, deforestation, deterioration of water resources, land concentration and desertification.

[7] African Charter art 24.

Free Legal Assistance Group v Zaire,[1] the Commission might have linked article 24 with article 16 (health) in their consideration of the Zairian government's duty to provide such basic services as clean drinking water. However, the Commission preferred to base its decision solely on article 16.

The Commission could not avoid the problem when, in March 1996, it received a communication from the Social and Economic Rights Action Centre ('SERAC') regarding Nigeria's failure to comply with article 24.[2] In particular, it had to determine the extent to which the degradation of the environment through oil pollution violated the citizens' rights to clean air, water and soil. In October 2001, the Commission concluded that Nigeria had violated this contentious right and offered remedial recommendations pertaining to the position prevalent in the Niger Delta.[3] According to the African Commission, the Nigerian government had failed to fulfil its minimum obligations under the African Charter by participating directly in the contamination of the environment (air, water and soil pollution) which, in turn, adversely affected the health of the Ogoni people. Furthermore, the government had failed to protect the local community against the harm caused by an oil consortium and had failed to conduct the requisite impact and risk assessment studies on the environment and local communities.[4] In making these findings, the Commission gave substantial content to article 24. The right to a satisfactory environment, the Commission held, requires a government to:

1 take reasonable measures to prevent pollution and ecological degradation;[5]
2 promote conservation and ensure ecological sustainable development and the use of natural resources;[6]
3 permit independent scientific monitoring of threatened environments;[7]
4 undertake environmental and social impact assessments prior to industrial development;[8]
5 provide access to information to communities involved;[9] and 6 grant those affected an opportunity to be heard and participate in the development process.[10]

SERAC gives content to both the procedural and substantive dimensions of the right. Procedurally, it establishes two rights: (a) the right to access information about the environment or potential threats to the environment; and (b) the right to have one's case heard in the event that one's environmental rights are impaired or threatened. The judgment also delineates the substantive duties borne by the

[1] Free Legal Assistance Group, Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, Les Temoins de Jehovah v Zaire Communications 25/98, 47/90, 56/91 and 100/93.

[2] The Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria Communication 155/96 ('SERAC').

[3] For a detailed discussion on the SERAC decision, see M van der Linde & L Louw 'Considering the Interpretation and Application of Article 24 of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights in Light of the SERAC Communication' (2003) 3 AHRLJ 167.

[4] SERAC (supra) at para 50.

[5] SERAC (supra) at para 52.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at para 53.

[8] Ibid.

[9] Ibid.

[10] Ibid.

government: to (a) prevent pollution, (b) limit ecological degradation and (c) promote conservation and sustainable development. These obligations reflect two central international environmental principles: the preventative principle and the duty of care principle.[1] The SERAC obligations emphasise the socio-economic nature of these rights and are thus contingent upon the financial resources of the Nigerian — or any other African — government.

A number of smaller instruments also provide recognition of the environmental right at the regional level.[2] The most interesting is the Protocol to the African Charter on the Rights of Women. This protocol places an interesting spin on the protection of environmental rights.[3] The Protocol takes cognisance of the intimate relationship between women and the environment; it contains no fewer than five articles that deal specifically with environmental issues and women's rights.[4] The Protocol provides for a woman's general right to live in a healthy and sustainable environment,[5] but then goes on to oblige state parties to involve women in environmental management at all levels, to promote research into new and renewable energy sources and to facilitate women's access to these resources.[6] A number of other provisions give greater content to these obligations.[7]

A particularly intriguing dimension of the protections afforded by the Protocol is its recognition of the value of indigenous knowledge. The role of women in traditional agrarian societies often grants them a deep, if tacit, understanding of ecosystems. Traditional medicines constitute a significant and particularly valuable account of this tacit knowledge. In order to safeguard real, if unregistered, intel-

[1] M Kidd Environmental Law: A South African Perspective (1997) 8.

[2] See, for example, the Convention on the Ban of Import into Africa and the Control of Transboundary Movement and Management of Hazardous Waste within Africa ('Bamako Convention') available at www.chr.up.ac.za/hr_docs/african/docs/oau/oau8.doc (accessed on 16 October 2009). The Bamako Convention was adopted in 1991 and entered into force in 1998. For discussions of this Convention see D Tladi 'The Quest to Ban Hazardous Waste Import into Africa: First Bamako and Now Basel' (2000) 33 CILSA 210 and M van der Linde 'African Responses to Environmental Protection' (2002) 35 CILSA 99.

[3] The Protocol places States under an obligation to regulate the management, processing and storage of domestic waste. States must also ensure that proper standards are followed with respect to the storage, transportation and destruction of toxic waste. Art 19*(a)*. Unfortunately, the Protocol fails to engage the transnational movement of hazardous waste.

[4] Preamble (para 6), arts 15, 16, 18 & 19.

[5] Art 18(1).

[6] Art 18(2) (a) & (b). In this regard, the Protocol reaffirms commitment to women and sustainable development provided for in the Preamble to the United Nations Plan of Action on the Environment and Development.

[7] The Protocol demands that state parties ensure that women enjoy full participation in the development process (art 19*(a)) and in the implementation and evaluation of development policies (art 19(b)). It guarantees women's access to land and their right to property. Art 19(c). Flexible banking and lending systems must be put in place to ensure women's access to credit. Art 19(c)* and (d)). Similarly, the Protocol emphasises the traditional exclusion of women from income-generating activities that relate to the use of natural resources. Women must be in a position to provide sustenance to their families and to participate in economies, micro or macro. Art 19(5). Of perhaps greater moment are obligations on member states to ensure access to clean drinking water, land, sources of domestic fuel and the means of producing nutritious food and a duty to establish adequate storage systems. Art 15.

lectual property rights in such medicines, states are placed under an obligation to ensure indigenous knowledge systems are protected and developed.[1]

A final important, and more recent, African initiative is the Revised African Convention on the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources.[2] This regulatory environmental treaty recognises numerous 'soft' law instruments and treaties. In particular, it vouchsafes the right of all people to a satisfactory environment favourable to their development.[3] It also places procedural obligations on states to disseminate environmental information, to ensure public access to environmental information, grants access to justice, and requires public participation in environmental decision-making.[4]

(d) National Level of Protection

Numerous African countries have constitutionally entrenched some variation on the right to a healthy and a sustainable environment.[5] The protection generally comes in three forms. First, some constitutions require the state to protect the environment. Others grant individual rights to a healthy environment. The third form imposes duties on individuals to protect the environment. Some constitutions require some or all of the above.[6]

A constitutionally entrenched environmental right possesses numerous benefits. First, it can provide a 'safety net' when existing laws or policies fail to address a given environmental problem. Second, an environmental right can place a brake on economic programmes that harm the environment. Third, the provision of procedural environmental rights should promote greater public participation in the process of interpreting and enforcing substantive environmental rights.[7]

50.3 South African constitution

Section 24 of the Final Constitution is the ultimate source of all environmental rights in South Africa. However, FC s 24 must be understood in conjunction [1] Art 18(2)(c).

[2] For a detailed discussion on the 1968 Convention, the revision process and the Revised 2003 Convention see M van der Linde 'A Review of the African Convention on Nature and Natural Resources' (2002) 1 AHRLJ 33.

[3] Art III.

[4] Art XVI.

[5] These countries include: Angola (art 24), Benin (arts 27–29), Burkina Faso (art 29), Cameroon (preamble), Cape Verde (art 72), Chad (arts 47–48), Comoros (preamble), Congo (arts 35–6), Cote d'Ivoire (art 19), Ethiopia (art 44), Gabon (art 1(8)), The Gambia (art 215), Ghana (art 36*(g)*), Guinea (art 19), Lesotho (art 36), Madagascar (arts 35; 39), Malawi (art 13), Mali (art 15), Mozambique (arts 37;72), Niger (art 27), Nigeria (art 20), Sao Tome & Principe (art 48), Senegal (art 8), Seychelles (art 38), South Africa (art 24), Sudan (art 13), Togo (art 41), and Uganda (art 39).

[6] I Koppen & K Ladeur 'Environmental Rights' in A Casesse, A Clapham & J Weiler (eds) 'Human Rights and the European Community: Substantive Law' (1991) 21; JB Ojwang 'Environment Law and the Constitutional Order' (1993) 18; and BT Mekete & JB Ojwang 'The Right to a Healthy Environment: Possible Juridical Bases' (1996) 3 SAJELP 169.

[7] For a discussion on the constitutional entrenchment of the environment see C Bruch, W Coker & C van Arsdale 'Breathing Life into Fundamental principles, Implementing Constitutional Environmental Protections in Africa' (2000) 7 SAJELP 20.

with the primary piece of environmental legislation: the National Environmental Management Act ('NEMA').[1] NEMA creates the enabling environment (pun intended) for environmental protection.

(a) Historical context and Interim Constitution

Prior to 1990, the government made but one attempt to create an environmental right or entitlement. A draft bill that ultimately became the Environmental Conservation Act ('ECA') contained a provision that entitled every citizen to a clean and healthy environment. [2] This provision was regrettably deleted from the final version of the Act.[3]

The next move to create an environmental right came during the negotiation of the Interim Constitution.[4] During the Multiparty Negotiating Forum,[5] the various stakeholders offered a broad array of proposals for an environmental right.[6] The ultimate product — the concise right in IC s 29 — accordingly reflects a number of political trade-offs. In its final form, s 29 granted every person an entitlement to an environment 'which is not detrimental to his or her health or well-being.' The wording of IC s 29 was criticized on the grounds that it was anthropocentric: it protected the environment solely in terms of the needs of human beings. It ignored the inherent value of the environment itself.

The environmental right was engaged, but briefly mentioned, by the Constitutional Assembly. Although the Constitutional Assembly received numerous submissions pertaining to an environmental right, language from the Environmental Portfolio Committee that should have been incorporated into the draft Final Constitution was ignored. At the certification hearings, the Constitutional Court heard that the procedure regarding the adoption of the environmental right did not comply with the Constitutional Principles laid down by the Interim Constitution. Although the Constitutional Court acknowledged receipt of these representations, strangely it made no reference to them in its judgment.[7]

[1] Act 73 of 1998.

[2] Act 73 of 1989.

[3] R Lyster 'The Protection of Environmental Rights' (1992) 109 SALJ 518.

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[5] For more on the negotiating process, see S Woolman & J Swanepoel 'Constitutional History' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) §2.4.

[6] The South African Law Commission had a short environmental right highlighting an entitlement to well-being, conservation, and environmental protection. The Constitutional Committee of the African National Congress proposed an elaborate right consisting of 5 subsections. It articulated entitlements and duties related to environmental management, protection control, conservation, pollution, co-operative governance and penalties relating the environmental degradation. The Inkatha Freedom Party and the Pan Africanist Congress offered further alternatives to the NP and ANC proposals.

[7] T Winstanley 'The Final Constitution and the Environment' (1997) 4 SAJELP 135. See also Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26.

(b) The Final Constitution

The Constitutional Assembly revisited the Interim Constitution's environmental right and eventually accepted a compromise formulation. Section 24 consists of two main parts: the right to a healthy environment and the right to protection of the environment. The Final Constitution notably enhances the content of the environmental right as compared to the Interim Constitution. That said, some have expressed concern about the basic law's ability to achieve the full integration of divergent national and provincial environmental laws.[1] While legitimate concerns, the principles of cooperative government contained in FC chapter 3[2] and chapter 3 of NEMA should go some distance in allaying such fears.

To return to the constitutional text, FC s 24 reads:

> Everyone has the right:
> (a) to an environment that is not harmful to their health or well-being; and
> (b) to have the environment protected, for the benefit of present and future generations, through reasonable legislative and other measures that:
> (1) prevent pollution and ecological degradation;
> (2) promote conservation; and
> (3) secure ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources while promoting justifiable economic and social development.

(i) Constructing the right

Through the word 'everyone', s 24 acknowledges that the right is to be enjoyed by all people in South Africa, citizens and non-citizens alike. Likewise, its emphasis on preventing future harm to the environment encourages a relaxed approach to the already loose rules for standing.[3]

Section 24 possesses characteristics of both civil rights and socio-economic rights. As a civil right, subsection (a) places a negative obligation on government (and other actors): they must refrain from actions that create an environment harmful to an individual's health or well-being. As a socio-economic right, the government must, under subsection (b), take positive action to promote, protect and fulfil the right. Subsection (b) of s 24 envisages sound management strategies, conservation, environmental education and an integrated approach to resource utilization.

At the core of FC s 24 is the concept of sustainable development. Sustainable development drives the remaining elements of the right. Several recent cases have interpreted and explored the content and application of sustainable development.[1] In Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province[2] — which instantly became the locus classicus on sustainable development in contemporary South African law — the Constitutional Court identified and emphasised the inherent inter-relationship between s 24's rights to the environment, on the one hand, and s 24's rights to economic and social development, on the other:

[1] PGW Henderson Environmental Laws of South Africa (Vol 1, 1996) 1-3.

[2] For more on co-operative government, see S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, September 2009) Chapter 14.

[3] For more on standing, see C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness & Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7. For more on benefits, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

> What is immediately apparent from section 24 is the explicit recognition of the obligation to promote justifiable 'economic and social development'. Economic and social development is essential to the well-being of human beings …. But development cannot subsist upon a deteriorating environmental base. Unlimited development is detrimental to the environment and the destruction of the environment is detrimental to development. Promotion of development requires the protection of the environment. Yet the environment cannot be protected if development does not pay attention to the costs of environmental destruction. The environment and development are thus inexorably linked. … Economy is not just about the production of wealth, and ecology is not just about the protection of nature; they are both equally relevant for improving the lot of humankind.[3]

Earlier, in BP Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs, Judge Claassen had held that the constitutional right to an environment is on par with the rights to freedom of trade, occupation, profession and property.[4] As such, when a court engages — often contemporaneously — rights to property, land and freedom of trade and s 24's environmental rights, it must enter into a normative and often empirical assessment of how the rights can best be harmonized. And if the rights cannot be harmonized, then the courts must offer a compelling account of why one right must be given precedence over any other right given the facts in play.[5] Such an ineradicable tension between s 24 and other rights is inevitable: 'By elevating the environment to a fundamental justiciable human right, South Africa has irreversibly embarked on a road, which will lead to the goal of attaining a protected environment by an integrated approach, which takes into consideration inter alia socio-economic concerns and principles.'[6]

---

[1] This was not always the case. See Ex parte Mercer & Another 2003 (1) SA 203 (CC)(The applicants, convicted in the magistrate's Court for harbouring wild animals without the required permit provided for in Nature and Environmental Conservation Ordinance 19 of 1974 (C), challenged the constitutionality of the ordinance in terms of FC s 9 and FC s 24. The application was dismissed by the Court on the grounds that the matter was still pending before the High Court.); Johan de Kock v Minister of Water Affairs & Others 2005 (12) BCLR 1183 (CC), [2005] ZACC 12 (In 2005, the Constitutional Court had the opportunity to consider the positive obligation placed on government in terms of s 24(b), but declined to do so. The applicant approached the Constitutional Court directly under Rule 18 and FC s 167(6)(a). The applicant's substantive claim was the government's failure to implement legislation aimed at containing the pollution or to prosecute the Iron and Steel Company ('ISCOR') for significant environmental pollution. Despite the potential for interpreting this obligation, the Court refused the application for direct access. It did, however, direct the Registrar to bring the judgment to the attention of the Law Society of the Northern Provinces so that they might consider aiding Mr de Kock with a challenge in the High Court.)

[2] 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13.

[3] Ibid at paras 44-45.

[4] 2004 (5) SA 124 (W)('BP Southern Africa').

[5] Ibid at 143.

[6] Ibid at 144.

Socio-economic concerns and principles — including the protection of the environment — will, ultimately, 'test' the limits of the Constitution's commitment to more traditional rights to property and land.

(aa) Meaning of 'environment'

What exactly constitutes the environment? Neither international law, nor academic writing, nor legislation provides a uniform answer to this question. Academic interventions reveal an expansive and a restrictive definition. The restrictive approach limits the extension of the term to nature and natural resources. The expansive — and more widely accepted — definition recognizes that the environment encompasses a variety of physical and social elements.[1] A broad denotation of environment was offered in BP Southern Africa. The BP Southern Africa court defined the environment as 'all conditions and influences affecting the life and habits of man'.[2] That broad definition fits with the Constitutional Court's move in Fuel Retailers to integrate environmental protection with economic development and social cohesion.[3]

As for legislation, NEMA provides a similarly wide understanding. It defines 'environment' as:

> The surroundings within which humans exist and that are made up of:
> (i) the land, water and atmosphere of the earth;
> (ii) micro-organisms, plant and animal life;
> (iii) any part or combination of (i) and (ii) and the interrelationships among and between them; and
> (iv) the physical, chemical, aesthetic and cultural properties and conditions of the foregoing that influence human health and well-being.[4]

The wording of NEMA and our FC s 24 jurisprudence make clear that 'environment' encompasses our natural surroundings and those economic entities and social structures that determine — to a large degree — both our being and our well-being in the world. When determining the extension of the term environment under FC s 24, consideration must be given to the needs, interests and values of both traditional communities as well as the more urbanized South African public.

The decision in Mapochsgronde Action Group v Eagles Quarries (Pty) Ltd & Others provides an indication of what it means to extend 'environment' from the natural

[1] See Environment Conservation Act 73 of 1989 ('ECA') s 1 (Defines the environment as inclusive of 'the aggregate of surrounding objects, conditions and influences that influence the life and habits of man or any other organism or collection of organisms.') For discussion of this approach, see P Sands Principles of International Law (2003) 15; P Birnie & A Boyle International Law and the Environment (2001) 5; RF Fuggle & MA Rabie (eds) Environmental Management in South Africa (1999) 83-92.

[2] BP Southern Africa (supra) at 145.

[3] Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13.

[4] NEMA s 1.

to the cultural.[1] The High Court awarded an interim interdict to halt the commencement of excavations for an open cast granite mine because the mine would not only cause extensive ecological damage to scarce bio-diversity, but also destroy archaeological sites of the Ndundza-Ndebele late Iron Age and 30 Boer forts from the 1882-83 ZAR-Mapoch War. Both sites possess significant educational and historical value.

(bb) Meaning of 'health' and 'well-being'

Subsection (a) grants everyone an entitlement to an environment that satisfies two criteria. First, the environment must not be harmful to a person's health. Second, the environment must not be deleterious to their well-being.

(x) Health

(1) General

'Health' in subsection (a) signifies human health. The term extends beyond the mere physical state to include both social and mental components; to use the World Health Organisation's definition, 'health' is 'a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.'[2] The right to health implies the highest attainable standard of health including both access to health services and healthy living conditions. The Bill of Rights addresses these twin elements of human health through different but related provisions: FC s 27(1) guarantees the rights to access to health services, sufficient food and water and social security; FC s 24*(a)* establishes the right to a healthy environment.

The protection of human health imposes a duty on private parties — as well as organs of state — to prevent and address despoliation of our physical environment. This duty could take the form of the provision of clean uncontaminated water, control of atmospheric emissions, environmental clean-up operations, environmental rehabilitation or integrated waste management. The common law maxim of sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas (literally: 'so use your own as not to injure another's property') expresses the obligation of reasonable use of land and obliges the user of land to extend a certain duty of care towards neighbours — including the prevention of pollution emanating from the land. This rather limited principle — and its close ties to the right to a healthy environment — was confirmed in Minister of Health and Welfare v Woodcarb (Pty) Ltd.[3] The Woodcarb court allowed an application for an interdict by the Minister of Health and Welfare under the Atmospheric Pollution Prevention Act[4] against a company that had been operating a scheduled incineration process without the required registration certificate. Neighbouring tenants complained to the Minister about the smoke

[1] Mapochsgronde Action Group v Eagles Quarries (Pty) Ltd & Others 2002 (TPD)(Unreported decision on file with the authors).

[2] Constitution of the World Health Organization, Preamble, available at www.who.int/governance/eb/who_constitution_en.pdf (accessed on 16 October 2009).

[3] 1996 (3) SA 155 (N)('Woodcarb').

[4] Act 45 of 1965.

emissions from the sawmill plant. The court held that smoke emissions without the necessary certificate were a violation of the neighbours' right to 'an environment that is not detrimental to their health or well-being' contained in the Interim Constitution.[1] Although the Woodcarb court found a violation of the right to an environment that is not detrimental to health or well-being, it did not offer a meaningful interpretation of these concepts.

FC s 24 extends the common law duty of care towards neighbours to excessive 'noise pollution'. In Lasky & Another v Showzone CC & Others, the owner of an existing theatre-restaurant was instructed to reduce the noise from their premise's club which interfered with the applicant's right to undisturbed use and possession of the next door property.[2] The court held that even though the applicant had purchased the property knowing it was next to a theatre-restaurant in a central business district, that did not mean the entertainment facility could not be restrained from causing unreasonable, disturbing noise.[3] Similarly, in Lone Creek River Lodge & Others v Global Forest Products & Others, the High Court handed down an interdict that prevented a sawmill and plywood plant from driving heavy logging trucks that created an unreasonable level of noise past a neighbouring luxury guesthouse at night, over weekends and on public holidays.[4] The court confirmed that the applicants had a 'clear right to use and enjoy their property and to do their business as a guest house free from unlawful interference by others': in this case, that meant to be free from unreasonable noise.[5] For our purposes, it is equally important that the court confirmed that FC s 24 and s 28 of NEMA embraced this 'trite principle of our common law'.[6]

(2) Pollution: Duty of care

Section 28 of NEMA gives content to the right to a healthy environment by codifying the common-law duty of care against the background of two international environmental soft law principles — introduced into South African law through s 2 of NEMA — 'the polluter pays' and 'life cycle management'. Section 28(1) places an extensive general duty of care on polluters to take reasonable measures to prevent significant pollution or environmental degradation and to take remedial steps to minimise and to rectify unavoidable pollution or environmental degradation.[7] NEMA does not expressly define the meaning of 'significant pollution' for purposes of determining when a duty of care would be triggered. However, while a de minimis change in the biological composition of a particular environment would probably not qualify as significant pollution, s 3 of NEMA does expressly cover a wide category of activities that determine whether the duty of care has been discharged:

[1] Woodcarb (supra) at 164 F.
[2] 2007 (2) SA 48 (C).
[3] Ibid at paras 26-28.
[4] [2007] ZAGPHC 307 ('Lone Creek')
[5] Ibid at 8.
[6] Ibid.
[7] See National Water Act 36 of 1998 s 19 for a similar duty of care to prevent pollution of water sources.

(i) Conduct an environmental impact assessment by investigating, assessing, and evaluating the impacts of the pollution or environmental degradation;[1]
(ii) Educate employees of the environmental risks involved in such activities;
(iii) Cease, modify, control the causes of the pollution;
(iv) Contain, prevent movement of pollutants;
(v) Eliminate the source of pollution; and
(vi) Remedy the effects of the pollution or degradation.[2]

In the case of environmental emergencies, s 30 of NEMA sets out a similar duty of care, coupled with an obligation to take specific remedial action, to avoid or minimise the effects of the emergency.[3]

(3) Environmental strict liability[4]

The gamut of legal subjects who are subject to the duty of care is extremely wide. Section 28(2) of NEMA places parties such as the owners, controllers (e.g. lessees) and users (e.g. contractors) of the land or premises under a duty to prevent future or address historical pollution or environmental degradation. The extent of the obligation to remedy past environmental wrongs was the subject of dispute in Bareki NO v Gencor Ltd & Others.[5] The High Court had to decide whether the defendants' environmental duty of care in terms of ss 28(1) and (2) of NEMA rendered them liable for historic asbestos fibre pollution and environmental degradation caused by their mining operations from 1976 to 1981. The court analysed the difference between retrospective and retroactive legal effect of statutory provisions in light of the rebuttable common-law presumption against retrospective statutes and the constitutional endorsement of the rule of law. It concluded that the principle of fairness required that s 28 of NEMA should not have retrospective legal effect before the date of its enactment in 1999. In order to address this limitation on liability for the rehabilitation of historic pollution, the legislature passed s 35 of the National Environmental Management: Waste Act.[6] Section 35 expressly extends the obligation to remediate historically contaminated land to contamination that arose before commencement of the Act.

Section 28 of NEMA also allows the government to intervene if a responsible party fails to adequately remedy environmental degradation and to recover all the costs of the operation. The categories of parties that may be liable under s 28 are:

[1] See Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others (EC)(Unreported Case No 1050/2001)(copy on file with the authors) 31. (Leach J held that this duty is discharged only when an EIA occurs after an identified activity has taken place, i.e. as part of reasonable steps to address significant pollution.) See also JHE Basson 'Retrospective Authorisation of Identified Activities for the Purposes of Environmental Impact Assessment' (2003) 10 SAJELP 133.

[2] NEMA s 28(3).

[3] NEMA s 30. See National Water Act s 20 for the duty of care during emergency incidents that may affect water quality.

[4] Although the provisions of NEMA pertaining to strict environmental liability are considered, thought should be given to similar provisions contained in other environmental legislation.

[5] 2006 (1) SA 432, 436E-445C (T)(De Villiers J).

[6] Act 59 of 2008.

(a) Parties directly or indirectly responsible for the pollution. The latter category may include financial institutions or investors that finance projects that cause significant pollution or degradation (e.g. a mine, road, a dam, a pipeline, an industrial plant or a housing development). These institutions may be liable for environmental rehabilitation costs if they failed to ensure that adequate mechanisms for environmental protection were put in place and strictly adhered to by the borrower who caused the pollution;

(b) The land-owner at the time of the pollution or degradation or his or her successor in title. New property owners of industrial property are at risk and should, as a standard practice, conduct an environmental due diligence investigation and set off their risk for future environmental rehabilitation liability through indemnification, environmental insurance policies, or reduced purchase consideration for the transaction; or

(c) The person in control or using the property at the time when the pollution or degradation occurred; or

(d) Anyone that had negligently failed to prevent the pollution or degradation.

(y) Well-being

The second constitutional criterion, 'well-being', proves to be much more elusive. While well-being does not exclude health (mental or physical), the term captures economic, social, aesthetic and emotional considerations. The desire to protect the 'fynbos' unique to the Western Cape from a hazardous building project might, for example, be captured under an expansive understanding of well-being.[1]

Wildlife Society of Southern Africa & Others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism of the Republic of South Africa offers a good example of a situation in which 'well-being' rather than 'health' is at issue.[2] The applicants had challenged the decision of traditional leaders to grant occupation rights to private individuals in a conservation area on the Wild Coast. The new occupants had caused extensive ecological degradation. Since their health was not ill-affected, the applicants contended that the government had a duty to enforce the protected status of the area in terms of the 'well-being' all South Africans experience in having protected and sustainable ecosystems. Unfortunately, the court did not venture an interpretation of 'well-being' and decided the case on other grounds.

So what then is the source of such an argument from well-being? One answer is that the Constitution and NEMA both recognize the 'aesthetic' dimension inherent in the right to an environment that protects one's well-being.

The courts' response to this proposition has been mixed. In Eagles Landing Body Corporate v Molewa NO & Others,[3] the High Court declined to waive a cost order against a losing party — as provided for by s 32(2) of NEMA — who had brought an application in the interest of environmental protection. Kroon J found that while the applicants had acted in the interest of the environment, it had used that interest 'to achieve another purpose in the interests of its members,

[1] J De Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (1999) 394.
[2] 1996 (3) SA 1095 (Tk).
[3] 2003 (1) SA 412 (T).

viz the protection of the view from the sectional title land.'[1] In a similar vein, the Paola v Jeeva NO & Others court explicitly rejected the applicant's argument that the magnificent view that he enjoyed from his property — which would be obscured by the proposed alterations to his neighbour's property — enjoyed legal protection.[2] The court held that: (a) it would be irrational to bar his neighbours from building a similar house to that of the applicant; (b) it 'would result in chaos and great confusion in the development world'; and (c) it would lead to a 'multiplicity of actions [which] might harm the effective administration of justice by tying the Courts up in the adjudication of a new category of claims' relating to the right of one property to insist that another property must refrain from obstructing its view.'[3]

The reasoning of the two High Court cases fails to take account of that portion of the definition of 'environment' in NEMA that is designed to protect those 'aesthetic properties and conditions' of the physical environment that positively 'influence human well-being.' A room with a view would seem to clearly fall within that definition.[4] This criticism of the High Court decisions was — by implication — endorsed in the appeal of Paola v Jeeva No & Others.[5] The Supreme Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the court a quo by protecting the appellant's exceptional view of the Durban coast that would have been severely obscured by the respondent's approval of plans for extensions to the neighbouring property. Although the case was decided on the basis of the unlawfulness of the approval of the extension plans, the Court held that it was clear from the facts that the proposed execution of the plans will 'significantly diminish the value of the applicant's adjoining property' and was therefore contrary to the applicable legislation.[6] The reduction in the value of the property that would result from the applicant's inability to enjoy the magnificent views from his property forms part of the field of protection of the applicant's right to an environment that is not detrimental to his well-being. The Court's reasoning clearly recognizes that the aesthetic value (of a magnificent view or some other feature of the environment) falls within the protective ambit of FC s 24*(a)*.

That such a split in understanding the meaning of 'well-being' should exist — and may continue to exist — was expressly recognized by the High Court in HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister & Others. The High Court noted that the term 'well-being' is 'open-ended and … manifestly … incapable of a precise definition'.[7] That said, the HTF Developers Court confirmed that FC s 24*(a)*'s [1] Eagles Landing Body Corporate v Molewa NO & Others (supra) at para 106.

[2] 2002 (2) SA 391 (D).
[3] Ibid at 406.
[4] NEMA s 1(1).
[5] 2004 (1) SA 396 (SCA)(Farlam AJ).
[6] Ibid at paras 11-16, 23.
[7] 2006 (5) SA 512 (T)('HTF Developers (HC)') at para 18. The High Court decision was overturned on appeal in HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister of Environmental Affairs 2007 (5) SA 438 (SCA), which was in turn overturned by the Constitutional Court in MEC: Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment and Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Limited 2008 (2) SA 319 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 417 (CC), [2007] ZACC 25. However, nothing in the later decisions contradicts the High Court's wide construction of 'well-being'.

(and NEMA s 24's) recognition of an entitlement to 'well-being' must, at a minimum, be construed as encompassing 'a sense of environmental integrity; a sense that we ought to utilise the environment in a morally responsible and ethical manner.'[1] Thus, however elusive the definition of 'well-being' may be, the Supreme Court of Appeal and one High Court have recognized its aesthetic and moral dimensions.

(cc) Meaning of 'present and future generations'

The concepts of inter-generational equity and intra-generational equity are reflected in FC s 24*(b)*'s reference to 'present and future generations'. Inter-generational equity places present generations under an obligation to ensure that the environment and extant natural resources are equitably preserved and protected for the full enjoyment of future generations.[2] This principle has also been incorporated in a number of treaties and soft law instruments.[3]

In The Director, Mineral Development, Gauteng Region & Sasol Mining (Pty) Ltd v Save the Vaal Environment & Others,[4] the Supreme Court of Appeal heard the objections of the Respondent who opposed, on environmental grounds, an application by SASOL Mining (the mineral rights holder) for a mining license in terms of s 9 of the Minerals Act.[5] The Appellant argued that the respondent would at a later stage have an opportunity to state their objections, i.e. during the approval of the environmental management program ('EMPR') in terms of s 39 of the Act. SASOL Mining intended to start with open-cast, strip mining in an environmentally sensitive area close to the Vaal River. The court accepted evidence that described the irreversible environmental damage that the open cast mine would cause: the destruction of the Rietspruit Wetland, the threat to fauna and flora, constant noise, light, dust and water pollution that would affect the spiritual and aesthetic quality of the area, loss of water quality that would destroy important recreational activities and small businesses and the subsequent devaluation of property in that area.[6]

---

[1] HTF Developers (HC) (supra) at para 18 quoting J Glazewski Environmental Law in South Africa (2000) 86.

[2] See E Weiss 'In Fairness to Future Generations: International Law, Common Patrimony and Intergenerational Equity' in P Hayden (ed) The Philosophy of Human Rights (1989); E Weiss 'The Planetary Trust: Conservation and Intergenerational Equity' (1984) 11 Ecology Law Quarterly 495; E Weiss 'Our Rights and Obligations to Future Generations for the Environment' (1990) 84 AJIL 199; L Gundling 'Our Responsibility to Future Generations' (1990) 84 AJIL 207.

[3] See, for example, the United Nations Convention on Climate Change (1992), text available at http://unfccc.int/resource/docs/convkp/conveng.pdf (accessed on 17 October 2009); the Convention on Biodiversity (1992), text available at http://www.cbd.int/doc/legal/cbd-un-en.pdf (accessed on 17 October 2009); the African Convention on the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources (1968), available at http://www.africa-union.org/root/au/Documents/Treaties/Text/Convention_ Nature%20&%20Natural_ Resources.pdf (accessed on 17 October 2009); Stockholm Declaration (1972), text available at www.unep.org; and the Rio Declaration (1992), text available at www.unep.org. See further, Minors Oposa v Secretary of Department of Environmental and Natural Resources reprinted in International Legal Materials (1994) 173 (Philippine Supreme Court's elucidation of the principle of intergenerational equity).

[4] 1999 (2) SA 709, 719C-D (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 845 (SCA)('Save the Vaal').

[5] Act 50 of 1991.

[6] Save the Vaal (supra) at 714-715.

With respect to the principle of inter-generational equity, the court relied solely upon the Brundtland Commission Report.[1] The court's decision to shape its decision in terms of international 'soft' law comes as something of a surprise given that the principle of inter-generational equity is expressly recognized in FC s 24(b) and s 2 of NEMA. But let's leave that oddity of the judgment aside. Let us ask instead what its benefits might be.

Although inter-generational equity is not a principle of international law that is directly enforceable between the legal subjects of international law, it is generally regarded as a principle of international 'soft' law that forms the context for interpretation of international law rules and principles. The reliance on international law creates a precedent whereby, through analogy, the remaining principles of international environmental soft law may have legal effect in South African law as directly enforceable legal principles. Pace s 2 of NEMA, international environmental soft law might have somewhat greater purchase than mere 'interpretational guidelines'. Secondly, although this principle applies directly to the conduct of an organ of state — the decision of the Director to issue the mining licence in terms of s 9 — it also applies, in result, to the conduct of a private party — the mining rights holder who intended to conduct open cast mining in an environmentally sensitive area. Not only does FC s 24 — read with FC s 8(2)[2] — create directly enforceable legal rights between private parties, but the principles of international environmental soft law can now be said to have direct binding legal effect between private parties. In essence, the principle of intergenerational equity underwrites a set of legal duties to conduct construction or manufacturing or mining activities in an ecologically sustainable manner; to manage waste streams effectively in terms of the 'polluter pays' and 'cradle to grave' principles; and to take adequate steps in terms of the precautionary principle to prevent greenhouse gas emissions and their contribution to global warming.

(dd) Meaning of 'ecologically sustainable development'

(x) Sustainable development

(1) International Law

UNEP's mission statement articulates the basic principles of sustainable development.[3] It describes a co-ordinated set of policies relating to environmental protection and management that enable 'nations and peoples to improve their quality of life without compromising that of future generations.'[4] This proposition captures both the notions of intra-generational equity and inter-generational equity. It echoes the World Commission on Environment and Development's tra-

[1] Save the Vaal (supra) at 719.

[2] For more on direct application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[3] 2 See generally D Tladi Sustainable Development in International Law: An Analysis of Key International Instruments (2007)(discussion of the international dimensions from a South African perspective).

[4] UNEP Capacity Building for Sustainable Development: An Overview of UNEP Environmental Capacity Development Activities (2002) 11.

ditional approach. In short, sustainable development is 'development that meets the needs of present generations without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.'[1]

Sands teases out the content of sustainable development in international law in terms of four basic principles:

(i) the principle of intergenerational equity — preservation of natural resources for the benefit of future generations;
(ii) the principle of sustainable use — the aim of exploiting natural resources in a 'sustainable', 'prudent', 'rational', 'wise' or 'appropriate' manner;
(iii) the principle of equitable use or intra-generational equity — exploitation of natural resources in an equitable manner where exploiting states take into consideration the needs of other states; and
(iv) the integration principle — ensure the integration of environmental considerations into economic and other developmental plans, programmes and projects as well as that development needs are taken into consideration when environmental objectives are applied.[2]

In Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project (Hungary v Slovakia) the International Court of Justice dealt with the rights and obligations of the respective parties under a bilateral treaty between Hungary and Slovakia concerning the construction and subsequent operation of the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Barrage System.[3] The Court attempted to reconcile economic development with a commitment to sustainable development:

> Throughout the ages, mankind has, for economic and other reasons, constantly interfered with nature. In the past, this was often done without consideration of the effects upon the environment. Owing to new scientific insights and to a growing awareness of the risks for mankind — for present and future generations — … new norms and standards have been developed… . Such new norms have to be taken into consideration, and such new norms standards given proper weight, not only when States contemplate new activities but also when continuing with activities begun in the past. This need to reconcile economic development with the protection of the environment is aptly expressed in the concept of sustainable development.[4]

In a separate opinion, Weeramantry J argued that the principle of sustainable development was sufficiently well-accepted to be considered a part of customary international law:

> The principle of sustainable development, in my view, is an integral feature of modern international law. … The principle of sustainable development is thus part of modern

[1] Brundtland (Commission) Report Our Common Future (1987) 43.

[2] P Sands Principles of International Law (2003) 253. Cited in Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 ('Fuel Retailers') at para 51 n 57 and BP Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124, 143-144 (W)('BP Southern Africa').

[3] 37 ILM 162, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/92/7375.pdf (accessed on 17 October 2009).

[4] Ibid at para 140.

international law by reason not only of its inescapable logical necessity, but also by reason of its wide and general acceptance by the global community.[1]

(2) Application in South African law

South African case-law has considered both inter-generational equity and sustainable development.[2] In Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association, the Constitutional Court had an opportunity to consider FC s 24.[3] Heavy rains had destroyed the homes of approximately 300 people living in Alexandria township. A transit camp was to be established on state land, adjacent to Leeuwkop Prison until permanent housing could be provided. A High Court application by existing residents of the area and other stakeholders sought an interdict restraining the respondents from proceeding with the establishment of the camp. The applicants claimed that government's decision was in contravention of the relevant town-planning scheme and applicable environmental legislation. The government contended that it was under a constitutional obligation to assist the flood victims, that this decision by the state as owner of the land was not an administrative decision and that it consequently did not require authorisation or permission. The High Court granted an interim interdict and ordered the Department to consider environmental impact studies and any relevant laws. The Minister appealed directly to the Constitutional Court claiming that the matter raised important constitutional issues.

In a unanimous judgment, the Constitutional Court upheld the appeal. It first found that the government, as owner of the Leeuwkop land, has the same rights and many of the same obligations as other land owners. If the Government complies with binding legislation and works within the framework of the Constitution, then it is entitled to enjoy those rights. Given that government's decision to establish the camp did not violate the rights of residents under environmental, land and township legislation nor infringe s 24 of the Constitution, the government could proceed as it did. Moreover, in considering the correct course of action to be taken, the committee appointed by the government had acted in a procedurally fair manner: it had taken into account the nature of the decision, the rights affected by the decision, the circumstances in which the decision was made, and the consequences of the decision. The constitutional dispute that truly seized the Court was whether the residents' s 26 right to housing had been unconstitutionally limited. Here too the Court found that under the dire and desperate circumstances under which the residents found themselves subsequent to the flood, the government's immediate response to the crisis could not be said to violate the residents' right to adequate housing.

Some commentators have argued that Kyalami Ridge would have been an ideal opportunity for the Court to discuss the principle of sustainable development and to tackle an alleged conflict between economic development and environmental protection.[1] Although the Court could have considered sustainable development, this argument does not properly appreciate the scope and application of sustainable development. The case only raised competing commitments to adequate housing and environmental protection: economic development did not feature.[2] Contemporary definitions of sustainable development recognize three distinct, but necessarily overlapping, domains. Sustainable development must be (1) environmentally appropriate, (2) socially beneficial and (3) economically viable.[3] By framing sustainable development as mediating a tension solely between environmental and economic interests, many commentators fail to engage the second component of sustainable development: the attendant benefit or harm to the community in which the development takes place.

[1] Although formally recognised in 1972, Weeramantry J effectively traces and discusses the elements of sustainable development to around 223 B.C.

[2] See § 50.3(cc) supra for a discussion of intergenerational equity and sustainable development in Save the Vaal (supra).

[3] 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC), [2001] ZACC 19 ('Kyalami Ridge').

The Court had the opportunity to properly address the issue of sustainable development in Fuel Retailers.[4] The case concerned the environmental authorisation for a new petrol filling station in the town of White River. The Court was of the view that the environmental authorities' consideration of the environmental impact study failed to evaluate adequately and consider the socio-economic impact of the new filling station. The Department contended that the need, desirability and sustainability of the new filling station had already been adequately considered by the local authority when it approved the rezoning application for the filling station. This decision ostensibly freed the Department from any obligation to reassess those factors as part of the environmental impact assessment process. Not so, held Justice Ngcobo. The kind of 'triple bottom line' approach that forms an essential part of an environmental impact assessment requires far more of a decision-maker than a mere assessment of need and desirability undertaken by town planners. The environmental impact assessment process used by the environmental authorities is a separate and distinct process from the rezoning processes of local authorities.[5] The environmental authorities should, under s 22 of ECA, have ensured that all of the significant and cumulative environmental, social and economic consequences of the planned development had been investigated. This investigation had to be undertaken, in turn, in terms of the environmental principles in ss 2, 23 and 24 of NEMA in order to achieve the desired goal of sustainable integrated environmental management.

[1] L Ferris & D Tladi 'Environmental Rights' in D Brand & C Heyns Socio-Economic Rights in South Africa (2004).

[2] FC ss 24 and 26.

[3] See M van der Linde & E Basson 'Sustainability Auditing' in I Sampson (ed) The Guide to Environmental Auditing in South Africa (2004); M van der Linde 'Forestry Stewardship, Sustainable Forest Management and Auditing' in I Sampson (ed) The Guide to Environmental Auditing in South Africa (2004).

[4] Fuel Retailers (supra).

[5] Fuel Retailers (supra) at para 85.

The Court's analysis of the constitutional guarantee of sustainable development in FC s 24*(b)* is a tour de force.[1] Firstly, the Court accepted the contemporary meaning of the principle of sustainable development in international law,[2] as part of South African law.[3] Secondly, the Court confirmed the interrelationship and interdependence of environmental, economic and social interests. The Fuel Retailers Court writes:

> The Constitution recognizes the interrelationship between the environment and development; indeed it recognizes the need for the protection of the environment while at the same time it recognizes the need for social and economic development. It contemplates the integration of environmental protection and socio-economic development. It envisages that environmental considerations will be balanced with socio-economic considerations through the ideal of sustainable development. … Sustainable development and sustainable use and exploitation of natural resources are at the core of the protection of the environment… . Sustainable development does not require the cessation of socio-economic development but seeks to regulate the manner in which it takes place. It recognizes that socio-economic development invariably brings risk of environmental damage as it puts pressure on environmental resources. It envisages that decision-makers guided by this concept of sustainable development will ensure that socio-economic developments remain firmly attached to their ecological roots and that these roots are protected and nurtured so that they may support future socio-economic developments… .
>
> NEMA, which was enacted to give effect to section 24 of the Constitution, embraces the concept of sustainable development. Sustainable development is defined to mean 'the integration of social, economic and environmental factors into planning, implementation and decision-making for the benefit of present and future generations. This broad definition of sustainable development incorporates two of the internationally recognized elements of the concept of sustainable development, namely, the principle of integration of environmental protection and socio-economic development, and the principle of inter-generational and intra-generational equity. In addition NEMA sets out some of the factors that are relevant to decisions on sustainable development. These factors largely reflect international experience. But… these factors are not exhaustive… . [NEMA] requires that the interests of the environment be balanced with socio-economic interest. Thus, whenever a development which may have a significant impact on the environment is planned, it envisaged that there will always be a need to weigh considerations of development, as underpinned by the right to socio-economic development, against environmental considerations, as underpinned by the right to environmental protection. …
>
> [NEMA] contemplates that environmental decisions will achieve a balance between environmental and socio-economic developmental considerations through the concept of

[1] The Court's approach, however, is not without its critics. See, for example, T Murombo 'From Crude Environmentalism to Sustainable Development: Fuel Retailers' (2008) 3 SALJ 486; L Ferris 'Sustainable Development in Practice: Fuel Retailers Association of South Africa v Director-General Environmental Development, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment, Mpumalanga Province' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 235; D Tladi 'Fuel Retailers, Sustainable Development & Integrration : A Response to Ferris' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 255 (Tladi specifically criticizes the Court's un-nuanced equation of social rights with economic rights as a single coherent socio-economic right which the author argues is based on an incorrect analysis of the principle of sustainable development).

[2] See §50.3*(c)(i)(dd)(x)*(1) supra.

[3] Fuel Retailers (supra) at paras 46-57.

> sustainable development … NEMA requires that the cumulative impact of a proposed development, together with the existing developments on the environment, socio-economic conditions and cultural heritage must be assessed. The cumulative effect of the proposed development must naturally be assessed in the light of existing developments. A consideration of socio-economic conditions … includes the consideration of the impact of the proposed development not only in combination with the existing developments, but also its impact on existing ones… .
>
> Unsustainable developments are in themselves detrimental to the environment. … It is … not enough to focus on the needs of the developer while the needs of the society are neglected. One of the purposes of the public participation provision of NEMA is to afford people the opportunity to express their views on the desirability of a [development] that will impact on socio-economic conditions affecting [a local population] … . [S]ocio-economic development must be justifiable in the light of the need to protect the environment. The Constitution and environmental legislation introduce a new criterion for considering future developments. Pure economic factors are no longer decisive. The need for development must now be determined by its impact on the environment, sustainable development and social and economic interests. The duty of the environmental authorities is to integrate these factors into decision-making and make decisions that are informed by these considerations. This process requires a decision-maker to consider the impact of the proposed development on the environment and socio-economic conditions. … [Similarly, the developer must] identify and predict the actual or potential impact on socio-economic conditions and consider ways of minimizing negative impact while maximizing benefit. Were it to be otherwise, the earth would become a graveyard for commercially failed developments. And this in itself poses a potential threat to the environment.[1]

(y) Ecologically

FC s 24*(b)*(iii) provides that legislative or other measures must 'secure ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources while promoting justifiable economic and social development'. The meaning of the term 'ecologically' has not been adequately considered in our jurisprudence. The danger exists that without placing special emphasis on ecological interests, as the Final Constitution requires, a mere mechanical evaluation of environmental rights, economic rights and social developmental rights will result in environmental interests being 'balanced away' during the environmental assessment process of s 24 of NEMA. Sachs J's minority decision in Fuel Retailers provides a potential alternative. His approach places greater emphasis on ecological interests during the evaluation of the environmental effect of economic and social interests:[2]

> Running right through the preamble and guiding principles of NEMA is the overarching theme of environmental protection and its relation to social and economic development. This theme is repeated again and again. Economic sustainability is not treated as an independent factor to be evaluated as a discrete element in its own terms. Its significance for NEMA lies in the extent to which it is inter-related with environmental protection. Sustainable development presupposes accommodation, reconciliation and (in some instances) integration between economic development, social development and environ> mental protection. It does not envisage social, economic and environmental sustainability as proceeding along three separate tracks, each of which has to be weighed separately and then somehow all brought together in a global analysis. The essence of sustainable development is [a] balanced integration of socio-economic development and environmental priorities and norms. Economic sustainability is thus not part of a check-list that has to be ticked off as a separate item in the sustainable development enquiry. Rather, it is an element that takes on significance to the extent that it implicates the environment. When economic development potentially threatens the environment it becomes relevant to NEMA. Only then does it become a material ingredient to be put in the scales of a NEMA evaluation.[1]

[1] Fuel Retailers (supra) at paras 44-45, 58-59, 61, 72, 74, 76 and 79-80.
[2] See also Ferris (supra) at 252.

Similarly, Judge Claassen held in BP Southern Africa that sustainable development is

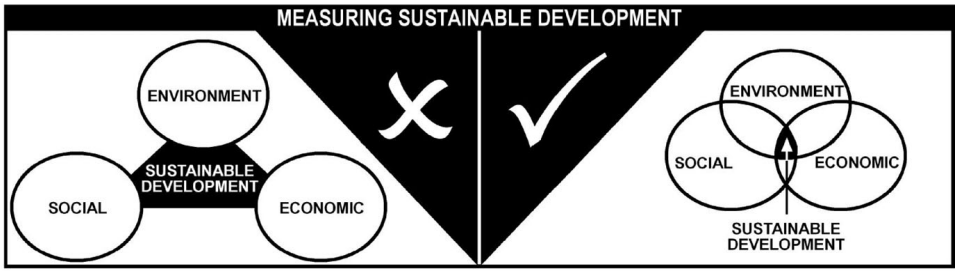
> [t]he fundamental building block around which environmental legal norms have been fashioned, both internationally and in South Africa, and is reflected in s 24(b)(iii) of the Constitution. Pure economic principles will no longer determine in an unbridled fashion whether development is acceptable. Development, which may be regarded as economically and financially sound, will in future be balanced by its environmental impact, taking coherent cognisance of the principle of intergenerational equity and sustainable use of resources in order to arrive at an integrated management of the environment, sustainable development and socio-economic concerns.[2]

According to Sachs J and Claassen J decision-makers (and courts) cannot ignore or undervalue the adjective 'ecologically'. They must ensure a result that allocates ecological benefits their proper weight.

Sustainable development — or 'triple bottom line analysis' — usually lies at the heart of environmental impact assessments ('EIAs'). During this process, decision-makers must strike a delicate balance between the three pillars of sustainable development. The diagram below illustrates how these three concepts must be understood holistically and not hierarchically.



Of course, it may not always be possible to satisfy the differing demands of this tri-partite alliance. Given the inherent tension between economic development and environmental protection, decision-makers may often be forced to choose one dimension of sustainable development over another. That 'hard choice' does not necessarily mean that environmental protection must yield to economic development. As Save the Vaal[1] suggests, decision-makers who take FC s 24 seriously might find that environmental protection trumps economic development in a given set of circumstances. In short, FC s 24 provides a constitutional basis to refuse an application for a proposed development that will negatively impact on the environment.[2]

[1] Fuel Retailers (supra) at para 113.

[2] BP Southern Africa (supra) at 144. This approach was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs v Sasol Oil (Pty) Ltd & Another 2006 (5) SA 483 (SCA) at para 15.

This approach to sustainable development applies both to government and private industry. Over the last two decades, South African businesses have been experiencing growing pressure from stakeholders to maintain acceptable standards of internal corporate governance.[3] The third instalment of the King Report ('King III'), released in 2009, makes sustainable development an integral part of good corporate governance. Sustainable development in this context refers to the 3-pillared approach to environmental management and protection.

(ee) Meaning of 'reasonable legislative and other measures'

FC s 24*(b)* requires reasonable legislative and other measures to prevent pollution and ecological degradation, promote conservation and to secure ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources while promoting justifiable economic and social development. This provision means that the existing regulatory regime relating to the environment and natural resources in South Africa should be complimented by a process of: (1) amending or replacing existing environmental legislation; (2) adopting new legislation that gives effect to the objectives of this subsection; and (3) interpreting existing legislation as well as the common law and customary law in a manner that promotes the spirit, purpose and objects of the Bill of Rights, including FC s 24.[4]

(w) Reasonable measures

Section 24*(b)* of the Final Constitution places an obligation on the state to protect the environment through 'reasonable' measures, legislative or otherwise. Reasonableness can, it should be noted, operate as an internal qualification in that it restrict a party's obligation under FC s 24(b). The Constitutional Court, in Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others, defined reasonableness, in the context of FC s 26, in the following manner:

> The State is required to take reasonable legislative and other measures. Legislative measures by themselves are not likely to constitute constitutional compliance. Mere legislation is not enough. The State is obliged to act to achieve the intended result and the legislative measures will invariably have to be supported by appropriate, well-directed policies and

[1] The Director, Mineral Development, Gauteng Region & Sasol Mining (Pty) Ltd v Save the Vaal Environment & Others 1999 (2) SA 709 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 845 (SCA).

[2] The legal definition of sustainable development in NEMA s 2 is contrary to FC s 24*(b)* and thus unconstitutional, because it omits the adjective 'ecologically'. NEMA s 2 creates the impression that economic, developmental and environmental interests are of equal value in the Final Constitution. That is clearly not the case.

[3] See, for example, 'Institute of Directors in Southern Africa' King Report III on Corporate Governance for South Africa (2009).

[4] FC s 39(2).

> programs implemented by the Executive. These policies and programs must be reasonable both in their conception and their implementation. The formulation of a program is only the first stage in meeting the State's obligations. The program must also be reasonably implemented. An otherwise reasonable program that is not implemented reasonably will not constitute compliance with the State's obligations.[1]

Grootboom suggests that FC s 24*(b)* requires flexible but coherent measures to give effect to environmental protection.[2] However, in BP Southern Africa, Claassen J noted that while 'it is the Court's duty to subject the reasonableness of these [environmental protection] measures to evaluation', the courts should constantly keep in mind that they are generally 'ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where court orders could have multiple social and economic consequences for the community'.[3]

In terms of FC s 24*(b)*, measures and legislation adopted by the state must be acceptable, rational and based on equitable standards and criteria. The legal standard for reasonable (or justifiable) administrative conduct of organs of state was succinctly described in Roman v Williams NO.[4] Firstly this objective test requires the evaluation of the suitability of the conduct. Secondly, the test asks whether the conduct in question was necessary. Finally, the test subjects the conduct to proportionality analysis.[5] Although this statement of the law originates in the very different context of a review of an administrative decision relating to imprisonment, its principles offer our courts useful guidance when they are asked to address FC s 24*(b)* challenges.

(x) Financial constraints

The Constitutional Court's first socio-economic rights case — Soobramoney v Minister of Health (KwaZulu-Natal)[6] — has been used to support the contention that where the state fails to prevent pollution or ecological degradation, the lack of financial resources on the part of government can serve as a justification for such non-compliance.[7] In Soobramoney the Court held that a state hospital could legitimately refuse to provide expensive treatment to a man with a terminal illness. Some commentators might argue that this line of analysis fails to distinguish between rights that grant an individual entitlement, from rights that cannot be reduced to an individual deliverable object. In point of fact, the Court's approach to reasonableness under FC ss 24, 26 or 27 goes to the government's ability to construct and to execute a plan that delivers, over time and within recognizable constraints, these goods to all the members of our polity. Neither FC s 24, nor

[1] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 at para 42 (Yacoob J).

[2] BP Southern Africa (supra) at 142.

[3] Ibid at 143. See also Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15.

[4] 1998 (1) SA 270 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1267 (C).

[5] Ibid at 1276.

[6] 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC), [1997] ZACC 17.

[7] L Ferris & D Tladi 'Environmental Rights' in D Brand & C Heyns Socio-Economics Rights in South Africa (2004). For more on the meaning of the 'within available resources' qualification in other socio-economic rights, see S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) §33.5*(b)*.

FC s 26, nor FC s 27 is generally understood to guarantee individual remedies. Reasonableness with regard to the environmental right relies rather heavily on regulation through legislation. The nature of the legal object (Natur der Sache) of FC s 24 can only be achieved through a variety of measures — integrated environmental management systems, the appointment of qualified officials, environmental education, and conservation programs such as work for water, clean up campaigns, public-private partnership programmes — for which organs of state are mostly, but not solely, responsible.

In addition, the environmental right and the request for reasonableness contained in FC s 24*(b)* does not contain the same internal qualifiers — 'within its available resources' and 'to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights' — as the rights of access to housing and health. In the (likely) event that financial resources are nonetheless raised by the state as a defence in the practical application of the environmental right, the state would, regardless of the limitation of available resources, have an inescapable minimum core obligation under the environmental right to fulfil. Leach J in Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others rejected an MEC's contention that its failure to take steps against an unregistered tannery that caused severe air pollution was justified on the grounds of a lack of technical expertise (read: lack of finances).[1] Leach J described this argument as 'a groundless plea ad misercordiam'. He explained:

> To now come to Court and plead that he lacks the necessary expertise to carry out the functions which the legislature has specifically entrusted to him is really no answer. It is not for the applicant to question the advisability of appointing the [MEC] as the functionary entrusted with certain obligations. That decision was taken by the legislature and, like it or not, the [MEC] is called upon to discharge those functions. … The legislature has entrusted certain obligations upon the [MEC] under s 28, obligations which are not met by 'co-operative governance' [requesting National Government to fulfil the obligations]. What the [MEC] was obliged to do was to carry out the obligations imposed under s 28(4).[2]

(y) Legislative measures

FC s 24 requires enabling legislation. NEMA is South Africa's primary piece of environmental framework legislation.[3] NEMA's environmental framework[4] has been supplemented by a range of specialised environmental statutes that give practical effect to FC s 24. The table of legislation below captures, alphabetically, [1] Unreported decision, (EC) Case No. 1050/2001 (copy on file with the authors) 36.

[2] Ibid at 36-7.

[3] See long title of NEMA.

[4] For a detailed discussion of NEMA and the characteristics of framework legislation see J Nel & W Du Plessis 'An Evaluation of NEMA Based on a Generic Framework for Environmental Framework Legislation' (2001) 8 SAJELP 1.

some of the most important pieces of legislation (as well as their objects) that directly or indirectly give life to the basic aims of FC s 24.

SELECTED NATIONAL LEGISLATION ADOPTED IN ACCORDANCE WITH SECTION 24*(b)* OF THE CONSTITUTION[1]
No	Act	Scope
1	Basic Conditions of Employment Act 3 of 1997	Provides for control measures pertaining to employment, particularly ensuring healthy conditions.
4	Cultural Institutions Act 119 of 1998	Provides a supporting system for institutions such as the zoological gardens.
5	Marine Living Resources Act 18 of 1998	Regulates conservation of the marine ecosystem and the long-term sustainable utilisation of marine living resources.
6	Minerals and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002	Provides for equitable access to and sustainable development of mineral and petroleum resources.
7	National Development Agency Act 108 of 1998	Promotes public private partnerships.
8	National Environmental Management Act 107 of 1998	Provides for co-operative environmental governance.
10	National Forests Act 84 of 1998	Reforms the law on forests.
11	National Heritage Resources Act 25 of 1999	Provides for the protection of heritage resources.
12	National Nuclear Regulator Act 47 of 1999	Establishes the National Nuclear Regulator.
13	National Water Act 36 of 1998	Regulates all matter relating to water.
14	National Veld and Forest Fire Act 101 of 1998[2]	Regulates veld and forest fires.
15	Occupational Diseases in Mines and Works Act 78 of 1973	Provides compensation for persons working in mines or works who are injured due to the dangerous nature of their environment.
16	Nuclear Energy Act 46 of 1999	Establishes the South African Nuclear Energy Corporation Limited.
17	Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000	Provides for the promotion of administrative justice, including actions impacting on the environment.
18	Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000	Promotes access to information, including information pertaining to the environment.
20	Water Services Act 108 of 1997	Regulates the right of access to basic water supply and basic sanitation as well as other related matters.
21	Protected Disclosures Act 26 of 2000	Protects whistleblowers, including those exposing environmental abuse.
22	World Heritage Convention Act 49 of 1999	Incorporates the World Heritage Convention into South African law.

[1] This table is based on the (now somewhat dated) table of South African Environmental Legislation printed in M van der Linde Compendiu*m of South African Environmental Legislation* (2004).

[2] See also Gouda Boedery v Transnet Limited [2004] ZASCA 85.

23	Wreck and Salvage Act 94 of 1996	Regulates the salvage of certain vessels and the application of the International Convention of Salvage (1989) in South Africa.
24	National Environmental Management Act: Protected Areas Act 57 of 2003	Provides for the protection and conservation of ecologically viable areas, representative of the country's biological diversity, its natural landscapes and seascapes.
25	National Environmental Management Act: Biodiversity Act 10 of 2004	Provides for the management and protection of the country's biodiversity within the framework established by NEMA.
26.	National Environmental Management Act: Air Quality Act 39 of 2004.	Provides for an integrated approach to the management and protection of the country's air quality.
27.	National Environmental Management Act: Waste Management Act 59 of 2008	Provides for establishment of a national waste management system, protects health and the environment, prevents pollution and ensures remediation of contaminated land.
28.	National Environmental Management Act: Integrated Coastal Management Act 24 of 2008.	Provides for establishment of a system of integrated coastal and estuarine management.

In the following sections, we discuss a selection of these statutes that most directly affect the implementation of FC s 24.

(1) National Environmental Management Act (NEMA)[1]

NEMA creates the basic legal framework for the environmental rights guaranteed in FC s 24.[2] The Act repeals the greater part of the Environmental Conservation Act ('ECA').[3] NEMA's principles for environmental decision making are drawn from international environmental law and the Final Constitution:[4]

(a) NEMA is a detailed statute. As this chapter focuses on the constitutional environmental right, it is not the appropriate forum to provide a detailed analysis of its contents. However, to give some idea of its scope, we provide a list of its core features.
(b) It promotes ecological sustainable development.
(c) It reconfirms the State's trusteeship of the environment on behalf of the country's inhabitants.[5]

[1] Act 107 of 1998.
[2] BP Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124, 145-149 (W).
[3] Act 73 of 1989.
[4] NEMA s 2.
[5] NEMA s 2(4)(o).

(d) It introduces co-operative governance of environmental matters by establishing the necessary governmental institutions to ensure proper enforcement of environmental protection laws.[1]
(e) It makes provision for fair environmental decision-making and for conciliation and arbitration of conflicts.[2]
(f) As part of the process of integrated environmental governance, NEMA introduces a new framework for environmental impact assessments.
(g) Based on the doctrine of strict liability, NEMA introduces a far-reaching general duty of care to prevent, control and rehabilitate the effect of significant pollution and environmental degradation.[3]
(h) Similarly, it dictates the duty of care to address emergency incidents of pollution.[4]
(i) It permits criminal prosecution of individuals. But more interestingly, it holds managers and directors of companies accountable for 'environmental crimes': that is, for environmental damage caused by juristic persons.[5] NEMA's penalties can also require incarceration for managers and directors.
(j) NEMA permits employees to refuse to perform environmentally hazardous work and protects whistle-blowers.[6]
(k) Finally, NEMA reconfirms the wide standing rules that the Constitution provides in FC s 38[7] and ensures broad access to environmental information.[8]

(2) National Forest Act (NFA)[9]

The NFA reforms and codifies the laws on forests. It repeals previous laws relating to forests and forestry such as the Management of State Forests Act[10] and provides principles to guide decisions affecting forests,[11] the promotion and enforcement of sustainable forest management[12] and the development and implementation of policy pertaining to forests and forestry.[13]

(3) National Water Act (NWA)[14]

The Water Services Act[15] was enacted in 1997 to deal with the rights of access to basic water supply, basic sanitation, and the setting of national standards and norms for tariffs. NWA is, however, the primary legislation pertaining to the

[1] NEMA Chapters 2 and 3. Environmental crimes are contained in the schedules to the Act.
[2] NEMA Chapter 4.
[3] NEMA s 28.
[4] NEMA s 30.
[5] NEMA s 34.
[6] Chapter 7 of NEMA.
[7] For more on standing, see C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) §7.2.
[8] NEMA s 31.
[9] Act 84 of 1998.
[10] Act of 128 of 1992.
[11] NFA s 3.
[12] NFA s 4.
[13] NFA s 46.
[14] Act 36 of 1998.
[15] Act 108 of 1997.

regulation and conservation of water within South Africa.[1] In sum, the purposes of NWA are to: ensure the management of water resources;[2] protect water resources;[3] regulate water usage;[4] create catchment management agencies;[5] and regulate access to, and rights over, land.[6] Section 19 of NWA places a duty of care on polluters, landowners and land users to prevent pollution of water sources similar to that found in s 28 of NEMA.

In Harmony Gold Mining Co Ltd v Regional Director: Free State Department of Water Affairs and Forestry the Supreme Court of Appeal held that Harmony — a gold-mining company — had a legal duty to prevent the pristine aquifers in its mining area from being contaminated by heavy metals through acid drainage from old mines.[7] Section 19 of NWA, the SCA found, imposed an obligation on Harmony to ensure not only that its own operations did not pollute clean water, but also to take expensive measures to prevent polluted water upstream from more shallow and now defunct mines from contaminating its own deeper clean ground water sources. To arrive at this conclusion, Howie P read the common-law duty of landowners in light of the provisions of s 19 of NWA. Harmony establishes the principle that owners or users of property must take reasonable steps to prevent pollution from other sources from polluting the water on their own property.

(4) Marine Living Resources Act (MLRA)[8]

The Marine Living Resources Act regulates the conservation of the marine eco-system, the long-term sustainable utilisation of marine living resources and the exploitation, utilisation and protection of certain marine living resources.[9] It demands that the control over marine living resources be exercised in a fair and equitable manner to the benefit of all citizens.[10]

(5) Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act (MPRDA)[11]

In 1998 the government released a white paper: 'A Minerals and Mining Policy for South Africa.'[12] This position paper reaffirmed the government's commitment to sustainable development in the mining sector. The most important step towards the sustainable development of mineral and mining resources was the promulgation [1] For a comprehensive discussion of the NWA, see H Thompson Water Law: A Practical Approach to Resource Management and the Provision of Services (2006); and HA Strydom & ND King Fuggle and Rabie's Environmental Management in South Africa (2nd Edition, 2009) 425-454.

[2] NWA Chapter 2.

[3] NWA Chapter 3.

[4] NWA Chapter 4.

[5] NWA Chapter 7.

[6] NWA Chapter 13.

[7] [2006] ZASCA 66 (SCA).

[8] Act 18 of 1998.

[9] With respect to the protection of the South Africa marine environment, see generally, Strydom & King (supra) at 455-512.

[10] Long title of the MLRA.

[11] Act 28 of 2002.

[12] Department for Minerals and Energy A Minerals and Mining Policy for South Africa (1998) available at http://www.dme.gov.za/minerals/min_whitepaper.stm (accessed on 17 October 2009).

of MPRDA.[1] It guarantees equitable access to and sustainable development of the nation's mineral and petroleum resources in order to eradicate all forms of discriminatory practices in the mineral and petroleum industries. The Act further emphasises the need to create an internationally competitive and efficient administrative and regulatory regime. MPRDA was recently subjected to comprehensive amendment when the environmental provisions relating to prospecting and mining activities (ie, environmental management programs, environmental assessment authorisation, environmental management, rehabilitation and mine closure, financial provision for mine closure) were repealed from the Act and incorporated into NEMA.[2] The amendment also alters the lines of decision-making and review authority.[3]

(6) National Environmental Management: Protected Areas Act (NEM: PAA)[4]

The Protected Areas Act provides for the protection and conservation of ecologically viable areas representative of the country's biological diversity, its natural landscapes and its seascapes. It further provides for the establishment of a national register of protected areas,[5] the management of these areas,[6] cooperative governance, public participation[7] and matters related to protected areas.

(7) National Environmental Management: Biodiversity Act (NEM: BA)[8]

The Biodiversity Act provides for the management and protection of the country's biodiversity within the framework established by NEMA.[9] It covers the protection of species and ecosystems,[10] sustainable use of indigenous biological resources, equity in bio-prospecting,[11] and the establishment of a regulatory body on biodiversity — the South African Biodiversity Institute.[12]

(8) National Environmental Management: Air Quality Act (the Air Quality Act)[13]

The Air Quality Act, as the name suggests, regulates air quality in order to protect the environment. The Air Quality Act, once fully in force, will repeal[14] the [1] For a background discussion of the management of the environmental impacts of mining activities see Strydom & King (supra) at 513-576.

[2] National Environmental Management Amendment Act 62 of 2008 and Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Amendment Act 49 of 2008.

[3] Environmental management on mines will for a period of 18 months fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Minister of Minerals (except for deciding appeals which falls within the authority of the Minister of Water and Environmental Affairs). Thereafter authority will revert to national or provincial environmental agencies.

[4] Act 57 of 2003.

[5] NEM: PAA Chapter 2.

[6] NEM: PAA Chapter 4.

[7] NEM: PAA Chapter 3.

[8] Act 10 of 2004. Regarding the protection of biological diversity in South Africa, see generally, Strydom & King (supra) at 97-125, 382-393, 394-424.

[9] NEM: BA Chapter 2.

[10] NEM: BA Chapter 4.

[11] NEM: BA Chapter 6.

[12] NEM: BA Chapter 2.

[13] Act 39 of 2004. See generally Strydom & King (supra) at 579-629.

[14] Air Quality Act s 60.

Atmospheric Pollution Prevention Act ('APPA').[1] However, for the time being, APPA applies simultaneously with parts of the Air Quality Act.[2] The Air Quality Act creates reasonable measures for the prevention of air pollution whilst having due regard to the concept of sustainable development. The Act introduces a new dimension to improving air quality in South Africa: regulation of ambient air quality.[3] The Act envisages national norms and national, provincial and local standards to regulate ambient air quality and emission standards[4] and establishes specific air quality measures and objectives.[5] Until the national, provincial and local ambient air quality standards have been established, s 63 of the Act makes provision for temporary ambient air quality standards that cover the most common pollutants.[6] Furthermore, s 18(1) empowers the Minister or MEC to declare an area a 'priority area' if ambient air quality standards are being exceeded or if a significant negative impact on the air quality occurs and specific air management action is required to rectify the situation.[7] The Act requires national and provincial executives to specify what activities result in atmospheric emissions so they can be properly regulated.[8]

For the time being, negative point source emissions are regulated by s 9(1) of APPA. This section prohibits an operator from performing any of the scheduled processes unless it holds a current registration certificate from the Chief Air Pollution Control Officer ('CAPCO'). The courts have had a number of opportunities to consider the consequences — especially the effects of illegal air pollution on third parties — of operating outside the certification system. In Minister of Health

[1] Act 45 of 1965.

[2] The Air Quality Act partially commenced on 11 September 2005 except for ss 21, 23, 36, 49, 51(1) (e) & (f) & (3), 60 and 61. However, it runs concurrently with APPA and secondary legislation published in terms thereof.

[3] Air Quality Act s 2*(b)*.

[4] Air Quality Act ss 9, 10 and 11.

[5] Air Quality Act s 12.

[6] See Air Quality Act schedule 2. See also SANS 69:2004 and SANS 1929:2004 published in GG 27179 (28 January 2005)(the latter adds Benzene (C6H6) as a common ambient pollutant that should be regulated.)

[7] For example, the Vaal Triangle Air-shed Priority Area was declared in GG 28732 (21 April 2006) amended by GG 30164 (17 August 2007) and the HighVeld Priority Area in GG 30518 (23 November 2007).

[8] Air Quality Act s 21 requires the Minister, and authorizes the MEC, to publish lists of activities which result in atmospheric emissions that may be significantly detrimental to the environment. These lists must establish the minimum emission standards resulting from a listed activity (including permissible amount, volume, emission rate or concentration etc.). The Act also introduces a new licensing system where the emitter of a listed activity must obtain an Atmospheric Emissions License from the Licensing Authority in the area where is or will be carried out. Air Quality Act ss 22 and 37. The Minister has undertaken an extensive public consultative process and is presently finalizing the national list. Air Quality Act s 21(4)(a). Until the promulgation of the new lists, the 72 noxious and offensive emission processes contained in the Second Schedule to APPA become Listed Emissions in terms of the Air Quality Act. Air Quality Act s 62. Air Quality Act s 23 makes provision for the Minister or MEC to declare any appliance or activity that may result in atmospheric emissions which may be detrimental to health or the environment as a Controlled Emitter. Similarly the Minister or MEC may, in terms of s 26, declare as Controlled Fuels any substance or mixture thereof which when used as fuel in a combustion process, result in atmospheric emissions that are a threat to the environment or health. The Minister or MEC may in terms of Part 6 of Chapter 4 of the Act adopt measures to control pollution by dust, noise and offensive odours that create public nuisance.

& Welfare v Woodcarb (Pty) Ltd the High Court prohibited the further operation of a scheduled process by a sawmill in the absence of a Registration Certificate.[1] The Court held that the resultant air pollution from the illegal burning of sawdust, chips and wood infringed the neighbours' constitutionally protected environmental rights.

Similarly, in Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others the first respondent illegally operated a tannery by failing to comply with CAPCO's technical requirements. The tannery generated a severe stench, and seriously corroded metal structures and equipment on the applicant's neighbouring premises.[2] To prevent further violations, Leach J ordered the provincial environmental authority to ensure proper compliance with the conditions of the Registration Certificate.

Recently, in Tergniet,[3] the High Court found that the first respondent, a manufacturer of creosole-treated wooden poles, operated a tar process without a valid Registration Certificate. In addition, it found that the tar process caused significant atmospheric vapour pollution through the uncontrolled release of volatile organic compounds. The Court concluded that, despite holding a Registration Certificate for another (wrongly) scheduled process of wood burning and wood drying and having already submitted an internal appeal against CAPCO's refusal to operate a tar process, the creosote business was operating illegally. To protect the applicant's constitutional environmental rights, the Court issued an interdict that barred the first respondent from continuing with its unlawful operations.[4]

As these decisions illustrate, the Air Quality Act will often be invoked to address particularly noxious forms of pollution that cause conflict between neighbours, or between communities and polluters.

(9) National Environmental Management: Waste Act (Waste Act)[5]

The Waste Act consolidated more than 36 laws as well as various policies, guidelines and other reference materials currently used in relation to waste management in the country. In addition, it introduces the more integrated 'cradle-to-grave'[6] approach and secure life cycle management of products, to replace the outdated 'end-of-the-pipe'[7] approach to waste management. Some of the other important topics covered by the Waste Act include: a reduction in natural resource consumption; waste generation; recycling; waste disposal; prevention of pollution; promotion of waste services; remedying land degradation; and achieving integrated waste-management reporting and planning.

---

[1] 1996 (3) SA 155 (N).

[2] 2004 (2) SA 393 (EC).

[3] Tergniet and Toekoms Action Group & Thirty Four Others v Outeniqua Kreosootpale (Pty) Ltd & Others [2009] ZAWCHC 6.

[4] Ibid at par 50.

[5] Act 59 of 2008.

[6] According to Wikipedia, 'cradle to grave' means 'the full Life Cycle Assessment from manufacture ("cradle") to use phase and disposal phase ("grave").' Available at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cradle-to-grave_analysis (accessed on 13 September 2010).

[7] This approach simply tries to solve the problem at the end of the process. The best example is literally putting something on the end of a waste-emitting pipe to limit its polluting effects.

(10) National Environmental Management: Integrated Coastal Management Act (ICMA)[1]

ICMA provides for the establishment of a system of integrated coastal and estuarine management in order to promote conservation of the coastal environment, and to maintain the natural attributes of coastal landscapes and seascapes. The Act also regulates the development and use of coastal areas, and ensures that it is economically and socially justifiable as well as ecologically sustainable. Lastly, ICMA prohibits incineration and dumping at sea, and pollution or inappropriate development of the coastal zone.[2]

(z) Other measures: integrated environmental management systems and environmental impact assessments[3]

In BP Southern Africa, the Court found that the integrated environmental management system ('IEMS') that was administered by the provincial environmental authority — in terms of Chapter 5 of NEMA[4] read with the appropriate environmental impact assessments ('EIAs') provided for in ECA[5] — is an example of the 'other measures' provided for by FC s 24*(b)*.[6] No all-embracing definition of Integrated Environmental Management ('IEM') currently exists. However, s 23(2) of NEMA describes the purpose of IEM as the integration of the fundamental principles of environmental management in s 2 of NEMA into all decisions that may deleteriously effect the environment.[7] IEM systems or activities must, therefore, identify and evaluate the actual and the potential effects of pollutants on the environment, socio-economic development and the preservation of communities and their cultural heritage. They must assess risks, consequences and alternatives in order to mitigate any negative impacts and to maximise potential benefits.[8] IEMs also create structures designed to facilitate meaningful public participation in the environmental decision making process.[9]

As part of the process of integrated environmental governance, NEMA introduces a new framework for EIAs.[10] Those entities that seek to conduct listed activities must consider, investigate and assess the potential impact that their activities will have on the environment and then report their findings to EIA Administrators.[11] The Minister or MEC are empowered to make regulations identifying activities and geographical areas, setting procedures for applying for EIAs, or any other matter, necessary to ensure the effectiveness of the environmental

[1] Act 24 of 2008.
[2] ICMA long title.
[3] See generally Strydom & King (supra) at 971-1045.
[4] NEMA ss 23 and 24.
[5] ECA ss 21 and 22.
[6] BP Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124, 145-149 (W)('BP Southern Africa').
[7] NEMA s 2 gives further effect to FC s24.
[8] NEMA s 23(2)(b).
[9] NEMA s 23(2)(d) & (f).
[10] NEMA s 24(A)-(I).
[11] NEMA s 24(1) as amended by National Environmental Management Amendment Act 62 of 2008 s 2.

authorisation process.[1] The Minister or an MEC may also, in terms of s 24(2)(a) of NEMA, identify prescribed activities that may not commence without their prior authorisation.[2] It is a criminal offence to proceed without authorisation.[3]

Notwithstanding these limitations, authorities are often confronted with cases where prescribed activities commenced or were finalised without prior authorization.[4] In Silvermine Valley Coalition v Sybrand Van der Spuy Boerdery & Others, the court made clear that s 24(1) of NEMA (and s 21 of the ECA) does not make provision for retrospective authorisation: Parties who continue without prior permission not only act unlawfully but also illegally.[5] Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others establishes that South African environmental law makes provision for EIAs in two instances.[6] First, as in Silvermine Valley Coalition, s 24 of NEMA, read with s 21 of ECA, requires an EIA for identified activities to be conducted as part of the authorisation process prior to the commencement of the activity in question. Second, s 28(4)(a) of NEMA requires an EIA to be conducted in the event of significant pollution where the responsible party's duty of care requires it to take reasonable steps to address the pollution. However, conducting such an ex post facto EIA in terms of s 28(4)(a) of NEMA does not constitute retrospective authorization of the identified activities.

---

[1] NEMA s 24 (2), (3), (5) and (6).

[2] The Minister subsequently published, in terms of NEMA s 24(5) and 44, the EIA Regulations. GN R385, R386 and R387 published in Government Gazette No 28753 (21 April 2006). They came into effect on 3 July 2006. Regulation 385 sets out the detailed requirements and procedures that applicants should follow to obtain approval of listed activities prior to their commencement. The first critical step is to determine whether a basic assessment or scoping ('full assessment') is to be applied to the application. A basic assessment must be applied if the authorisation for the planned activity falls into any of the following categories: (a) the planned activity is listed in EIA Regulation 386; or (b) the planned activity is listed in a notice issued by the Minister or the MEC in terms of NEMA s 24D of the Act pertaining to those listed matters referred to in NEMA s 24(2) (e.g. in specific geographical areas that may or may not require an EA). EIA Regulation 385 regs 21(1)(a) and (b). EIA Regulation 385 regs 21(2)(a)(i) and (ii) require that scoping and EIA must be applied to an application if:

(a) the planned activity is listed in EIA Regulation 387;
(b) the planned activity is listed in a notice issued by the Minister or the MEC in terms of NEMA s 24D pertaining to those listed matters referred to in NEMA s 24(2) of (e.g. in specific geographical areas that may or may not require an EA);
(c) the Administrator accepts an application by the applicant that the EAP recommends that scoping instead of a basic assessment should be done due to the nature of information that the Administrator would require to make a decision (EIA Regulation 385 reg 21(2)(b)); and
(d) if there are several activities under the same development, but only one of them qualifies for scoping as set out above, scoping should be applied to all the activities (EIA Regulation 385 reg 21(2)(c)).

[3] NEMA s 24F(1)(a). It is also criminal not to comply with an applicable norm or standard or contravene conditions in an EA. NEMA s 24F(2) as amended by National Environmental Management Amendment Act 62 of 2008 s 5. All these crimes are punishable with a fine of up to R5 million or 10 years' imprisonment or both. NEMA s 24F(4).

[4] These cases were decided prior to the Amendment introducing s 24F into NEMA. Sections 24(A)-24(I) were incorporated into NEMA in terms of the National Environment Amendment Act 8 of 2004. This act, including the amendments, became operational on 7 January 2005.

[5] 2002 (1) SA 478, 448-489 (C)('Silvermine Valley Coalition').

[6] Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others unreported decision (EC) Case No 1050/2001 (copy on file with the authors) 30-31, 33 and 39.

However, in Eagles Landing Body Corporate v Molewa NO & Others, Kroon J reached a seemingly opposite conclusion to Silvermine Valley Coalition and Hichange Investments.[1] The court permitted retrospective authorisation because it concluded that the legislature could not have intended such a partially constructed structure to be demolished, authorised and then rebuilt.[2] To remedy these divergent interpretations — and in light of the hefty volume of EIA applications before administrators — the legislature passed an amending Act. The new s 24G permits parties to rectify the unlawful commencement or continuation of activities — subject to the payment of a substantial penalty.[3]

Despite allowing for rectification of unauthorised activities, this provision has proven controversial. Applicants and decision-makers alike have been frustrated by its scope, its application and operation. The primary problems relate to transitional provisions, time periods, the entitlement to retrospective authorisation, and general difficulties relating to interpretation. For example, some administrators have taken the position that the administrative fine should be interpreted as an 'administrative fee' that still allows for potential prosecution. This interpretation clearly contradicts the terms of s 24G(2) read together with s 24(3) which indicate that the legislature intended to supplant prosecution with an administrative fine. This payment should effectively halt the operation of s 24F of NEMA.

In addition to the difficulties with applying and interpreting the rectification procedure, s 24(G) of NEMA may be unconstitutional on several grounds. First, the principle of the rule of law (in FC s 1[4]), read with the principle of administra-

[1] 2003 (1) SA 412 (T).

[2] Ibid at paras 101-2.

[3] As amended by s 6 of the National Environmental Management Amendment Act 62 of 2008. NEMA s 24G(1) states that any person who has committed an offence in terms of section 24F(2)(a), which includes commencing with a listed or specified activity without prior authorisation, can apply for environmental authorisation from the Minister, the Minister of Mining or MEC. Those authorities may require the applicant to compile a report and submit the following information for his/her consideration:

1. an assessment of the nature, extent, duration and significance of the environmental consequences or impacts, including the cumulative effects, of such illegal activities;
2. a description of mitigation measures that have been or will be undertaken in regard to the environmental consequences or impacts;
3. a description of the public participation process that was followed, including all comments that were received and an explanation how these issues have been addressed;
4. an Environmental Management Program (EMPr); and
5. any other information that may be required.

NEMA s 24G(2) requires the Minister or MEC to consider any reports or information submitted by the applicant and may then either issue a Directive that orders the activity to cease, wholly or in part, and to rehabilitate the affected environment. Otherwise the Minister or MEC may issue an EA subject to specific conditions. NEMA s 24G(2A), however, requires the applicant first to pay an administration fine of up to R1 million before the Minister or MEC may act as above. NEMA s 24(G)(3) makes it an offence not to comply with the Directive of the Minister or MEC or to contravene any condition of the authorization and such a person is liable on conviction of a penalty as contemplated in s 24F.

[4] For more on the rule of law, see F Michelman 'Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11. For more on founding provisions of the Final Constitution generally, see C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.

tive legality found in FC s 33,[1] makes it impossible for a lawful activity to follow from unlawful administrative conduct. The wording of s 24(2) of NEMA — the empowering provision — requires authorisation prior to the commencement of an identified activity. No exception can undo the unlawfulness of a breach. Permitting rectification would not only appear to be inconsistent with the principles of administrative justice, but also with the Supreme Court of Appeal's holding in Oudekraal Estates (Pty) v the City of Cape Town relating to validity of successive administrative decisions.[2]

Secondly, prior authorisation and conducting an EIA before the commencement of activities that may negatively affect the environment form the very essence of the EIA process in s 24 of NEMA and the IEM in s 23 of NEMA. Section 24G of NEMA undermines the very purpose of environmental assessment, integrated environmental management, sustainable development and, ultimately, the fundamental right to environmental protection. Davis J's words in Silvermine Valley Coalition v Sybrand Van der Spuy Boerdery & Others support this proposition with respect to the ECA: '[t]he ECA and the regulations do not envisage that an EIA can be wrenched from its particular purpose as conceived in the legislative structure and be employed as an independent remedy'.[3] A belated EIA would have no effect on the continuation of the existing but illegal identified activity; it might be of a moral value but 'would hold no legal significance in terms of the legislative structure in which the EIA is located.'[4]

Thirdly, it is contrary to South Africa's obligations under international law to conduct an EIA after the fact. Section 2(4)(b) and (i) of NEMA codified the international soft law principle of integrated management and environmental assessment as underlying principles for the interpretation of environmental law in South African law. An environmental assessment prior to the commencement of an activity that may detrimentally affect the environment is an established legal element of the principle of sustainable development. Given that FC s 24*(b)* read with s 2(4)(a) of NEMA makes sustainable development the foundation of South African environmental law, prior authorisation and conducting an EIA must form an essential part of the right to environmental protection. Any illegal conduct that undermines the very essence of the fundamental right to environmental protection violates FC s 24.

Fourthly, the provision would appear to conflict with well-established criminal law principles. One, while the legislature intended the administrative fine to have a penal character, the applicant can still be criminally prosecuted for the same offence in terms of s 24F(2)(a) of NEMA. This outcome conflicts with FC s 35(3)(m). FC s 35(3)(m) prohibits anybody from being convicted twice for [1] For more on FC s 33, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63.

[2] 2004 (6) SA 222 (SCA).

[3] Silvermine Valley Coalition (supra) at 488.

[4] Ibid.

the same crime.[1] Two, it may be contrary to the presumption of innocence[2] and the right against self incrimination.[3] Section 24F(1) states that a person who 'has committed an offence' may apply for a rectification authorisation. By implication, through the mere process of submitting an application, the applicant is presumed by law to have contravened s 24(2)(b) of NEMA. Indeed, officials often use this 'presumption' to justify the imposition of severe administrative fines. Lastly, while the applicant may have a valid defence against a criminal conviction in terms of s 24F(2)(a) of NEMA, the applicant cannot raise that same defence against an administrative fine. The Minister or MEC does not have discretionary powers to waive the fine. For example, an applicant may have acted on the wrong instruction from an official and not have applied for prior authorisation for the listed activity. The applicant could successfully raise the defence of putative authorisation — excluding the required mens rea — to avoid criminal conviction. Yet, on the same facts, the applicant would still be strictly liable to pay the administrative fine.

Fifthly, although s 24G(2A) of NEMA requires the Minister or MEC to be paid an administrative fine before consideration of the application, the mathematical formula according to which the fine is calculated may not have been promulgated by regulation. It may merely be captured in an internal departmental directive. An internal departmental directive is not a 'rule of law'. As a result, any fines imposed would violate any number of provisions in FC s 35 and could not be justified in terms of FC s 36. In any event, punishment without prior publication of the criminal offence would seem to be the quintessential example of a violation of the rule of law to which the Constitution is committed.[4]

In the IEM process, both applicants and administrators/decision-makers must take full cognisance of FC s 24 as well as various important provisions of NEMA[5] in evaluating their impact or proposed impact on the environment. Fuel Retailers Association specifically considered these provisions in relation to the evaluation process.[6] The Fuel Retailers Court wrote:

---

[1] FC s 35(3)(m) reads: 'Every accused person has a right to a fair trial, which includes the right not to be tried for an offence in respect of an act or omission for which that person has previously been either acquitted or convicted'. For more on FC s 35(3)(m), see F Snyckers & J Le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: The Rights of Detained, Arrested & Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) §51.5*(m)*.

[2] FC s 35(3)(h). For more on the presumption of innocence, see Snyckers & Le Roux (supra) at §51.5*(i)*.

[3] FC s 35(3)(j). For more on the right against self incrimination, see Snyckers & Le Roux (supra) at §51.5(j)(i).

[4] FC s 35(3)(l) read with FC s 35(3)(n). FC s 35(3)(l) reads: 'Every accused person has a right to a fair trial, which includes the right- not to be convicted for an act or omission that was not an offence under either national or international law at the time it was committed or omitted'. FC s 35(3)(n) reads: 'Every accused person has a right to a fair trial, which includes the right- to the benefit of the least severe of the prescribed punishments if the prescribed punishment for the offence has been changed between the time that the offence was committed and the time of sentencing'. For more on both rights, see Snyckers and Le Roux (supra) at § 51.5*(l)* and (n).

[5] See NEMA ss 2, 23, 24 (in particular 24(4)) and 28.

[6] Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General: Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment, Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 ('Fuel Retailers').

> [T]he applicant [correctly] contended that the environmental authorities themselves were obliged to consider the socio-economic impact of constructing the proposed filling station. The applicant also [correctly] submitted that this obligation is wider than the requirement to assess the need and desirability of the proposed filling station under the Ordinance. This obligation requires the environmental authorities to assess, among other things, the cumulative impact on the environment brought about by the proposed filling station and all existing filling stations that are in close proximity to the proposed one. This [obligation] in turn required the environmental authorities to assess the demand or necessity and desirability, not feasibility, of the proposed filling station with a view to fulfilling the needs of the targeted community, and its impact on the sustainability of existing filling stations. The applicant relied upon the provisions of section 24*(b)(iii) of the Constitution, as well as sections 2(4)(a), 2(3), 2(4)(g), 2(4)(i)*, 23 of NEMA.[1]

Administrators consider policies, guidelines and specialist reports during the evaluation process in order to ascertain whether the requirements of NEMA and FC s 24 have been met. In MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs v Sasol Oil Pty Ltd & Bright Suns Development CC, the Supreme Court of Appeal reiterated the value to be attached to such policies:

> The adoption of policy guidelines by state organs to assist decision-makers in the exercise of their discretionary powers has long been accepted as legally permissible and eminently sensible. This is particularly so where the decision is a complex one requiring the balancing of a range of competing interests or considerations, as well as specific expertise on the part of a decision-maker. As explained in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs,[2] a Court should in these circumstances give due weight to the policy decisions and findings of fact of such a decision-maker. Once it is established that the policy is compatible with the enabling legislation, as here, the only limitation to its application in a particular case is that it must not be applied rigidly and inflexibly, and that those affected by it should be aware of it. An affected party would then have to demonstrate that there is something exceptional in his or her case that warrants a departure from the policy.[3]

Ultimately, administrators (and applicants) must be satisfied that an 'environmentally responsible' decision has been made.

It must be stressed that once a decision has been approved, an applicant is still under an obligation to obtain additional related environmental authorisations which may fall outside the ambit of Chapter 5 of NEMA. In Earthlife Africa (Cape Town) v Director-General: Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Eskom Holdings Limited the Court reaffirmed this point. It held that Eskom could not commence construction of its new Pebble Bed Modular Reactor 'unless and until it obtains the necessary authorisations in terms of the [National Nuclear Regulator] Act and [the Nuclear Energy] Act.'[4]

(ii) Related Rights and Constitutional provisions

This section briefly considers rights other than FC s 24 that regularly feature in environmental disputes.

---

[1] Fuel Retailers (supra) at para 30.
[2] 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC), [2004] ZACC 15; at para 48.
[3] [2005] ZASCA 76 at para 19.
[4] 2005 (3) SA 156 (C).

(aa) Substantive Rights

(u) Equality[1]

FC s 9 can affect environmental protection in a variety of ways. A local municipality may employ different waste management, environmental management, service delivery, or water use strategies and policies for diverse stakeholders — residential zones; heavy and medium industrial zones; and light commercial zones. Whatever the benefits of this differential treatment might be, it could lead to the perpetuation of existing social inequities.[2]

In a case where the right to equality was specifically engaged in an environmental context — Paola v Jeeva NO & Others — the applicant challenged a decision permitting his neighbour to build a two-storey house that would obscure his view.[3] In dismissing the application, the Court inelegantly applied FC s 9. The applicant argued that any building that detracted from the view of an adjoining property should be prohibited by the relevant local authority. Kondile J held that this approach would endorse 'unequal treatment of neighbouring property owners with regard to the development of their properties, on the basis of the order of the occurrence of the developments. That is arbitrary and clearly inconsistent with the Constitution, which demands the promotion of equality and rationality.'[4] The court would have accomplished its task with greater elan had it employed FC s 33 read with FC s 24.

However, when FC s 9 is properly raised in relation to FC s 24, the dispute must be settled within the terms of the 'equality enquiry' laid down in Harksen v Lane NO[5] and the applicable provisions of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention

[1] FC s 9 reads:

(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.

(2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

(3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

(5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair.

For more on FC s 9, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 35.

[2] For an indication of how a court might approach such a case, see City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC), [1998] ZACC 1 (the City Council applied different rules for the provision of electricity in black townships and white suburbs).

[3] 2002 (2) SA 406 (D)('Paola'). See also §50.3(c)(i)(bb)(y) 'Well-being' above, for a more detailed discussion of this case. See also, Ex parte Mercer & Another 2003 (1) SA 203 (CC), [2002] ZACC 23 (the applicants, convicted in the Magistrates' Court for harbouring wild animals without the required permit, challenged the constitutionality of the law in terms a number of constitutional issues including FC ss 9 and 24. The Court avoided deciding the issue, as the parties were still awaiting the outcome of the High Court.)

[4] Paola (supra) at 404H.

[5] 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC), [1997] ZACC 12.

of Unfair Discrimination Act ('Equality Act').[1] Indeed, ordinarily litigants must rely first on the Equality Act, if it is applicable, before reverting to FC s 9.[2] FC s 9 will, generally, only apply when the court is asked to consider the constitutionality of the legislation governing the conflict between the parties.

(v) The right to life

The Final Constitution grants the right to life to every individual.[3] The right is directly related to the right to a healthy environment where, for example, a person uses contaminated water, or breathes polluted air. Short and long-term health risks due to environmental degradation could be interpreted as an infringement of a person's right to life. The right to life has, rather interestingly, been deployed in other jurisdictions to protect environmental interests in the absence of an enforceable environmental right.[4] In Gabcikovo — Nagymaros Project (Hungary v Slovakia), Weeramantry J held: '[t]he protection of the environment is likewise a vital part of contemporary human rights doctrine for it is a sine qua non for numerous human rights such as the right to health and the right to life itself.'[5]

The Constitutional Court has endorsed the connection between the right to a healthy environment and the right to life. The Fuel Retailers Court emphasised the importance of effective protection of the environmental rights in the Constitution as a pre-requisite for the enjoyment of the other rights in the Bill of Rights:

> The importance of the protection of the environment cannot be gainsaid. Its protection is vital to the enjoyment of the other rights contained in the Bill of Rights; indeed it is vital to life itself. It must therefore be protected for the benefit of the present and future generations. The present generation holds the earth in trust for the next generation. This trusteeship position carries with it the responsibility to look after the environment.[6]

(w) Human dignity[7]

The right to dignity can dovetail with the right to a healthy environment in two discrete ways: (1) the infringement of the right as a result of environmental degradation; or (2) environmental protection at the cost of human dignity. The first

[1] Act 4 of 2000.

[2] MEC for Education: Kwazulu-Natal and Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC), [2007] ZACC 21 at para 40.

[3] Section 11 of the Final Constitution. For a detailed discussion on s 11, see M Pieterse 'Life' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 39.

[4] For a detailed discussion, see M Anderson 'Individual Rights to Environmental Protection in India' in A Boyle & M Anderson Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection (1996).

[5] ICJ (September 1997) General list no.92 Reprinted in UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions on Matters Related to Environment: International Decisions (Vol. 1, 1998) 255, 298

[6] Fuel Retailers (supra) at para 102 (emphasis added).

[7] FC s 10 reads: 'Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.' For a detailed discussion of s 10, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

category of denial of dignity would occur, for example, where industries pollute a river that a community uses for water, washing, recreation or worship. The second could occur where there is opposition to providing emergency housing to a desperate community because of the potential impact on an ecologically sensitive area. The courts have yet to consider, interpret and apply the right to dignity in relation to the environmental right in an environmental dispute. When they do, they should recall the Constitutional Court's dictum in Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others:

> [Dignity] is a value that informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights. This Court has already acknowledged the importance of the constitutional value of dignity in interpreting rights such as the right to equality, the right not to be punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way, and the right to life. Human dignity is also a constitutional value that is of central significance in the limitations analysis. Section 10, however, makes it plain that dignity is not only a value fundamental to our Constitution, it is a justiciable and enforceable right that must be respected and protected. In many cases, however, where the value of human dignity is offended, the primary constitutional breach occasioned may be of a more specific right such as the right to bodily integrity, the right to equality or the right not to be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour.[1]

(x) Access to housing

The Final Constitution grants every person the right of access to adequate housing and requires the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to attain the progressive realisation of this right.[2] The right to adequate housing or access thereto can come into conflict with FC s 24 where residents of a community have been rendered homeless through a natural disaster such as flooding. Government, under such circumstances, is under a constitutional obligation to provide adequate housing to flood victims. A relocation or housing project that gives effect to constitutional obligations under FC s 26 can have adverse affects on the natural environment.[3]

(y) Access to food and water

Section 27 of the Final Constitution provides rights of access to healthcare

[1] 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8 at para 35.

[2] FC s 26 reads:

(1) Everyone has the right to have access to adequate housing.

(2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of this right.

(3) No one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances. No legislation may permit arbitrary evictions.

For a detailed discussion of s 26, see K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55.

[3] See Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC), [2001] ZACC 19.

services,[1] sufficient food and water,[2] and social security.[3] Two rights contained in FC s 27 stand in some tension with the environmental rights in FC s 24: the rights to food and water. Subsistence fishing and hunting often have a negative impact on the conservation of sensitive ecosystems. Agricultural practices — say the use of natural aquifers to increase production — may have an adverse effect on sound environmental management. Moreover, the state's dual obligations to manage the natural environment and to provide the conditions for adequate production of food products can come into conflict.[4] At the same time, the right to access to water may work, hand in glove, with the right to a healthy environment. Access to water implies drinking water free from toxic contaminants, which will require keeping watercourses and the surrounding environment free of pollution.[5]

(z) Property Clause

The Final Constitution grants individuals a limited right to property.[6] If the government wants to restrict the use of a person's property for conservational purposes, then it may, in terms of FC s 25(2), only do so in terms of a law of general application and provided that such a deprivation is not done 'arbitrarily'.[7] However, the term 'arbitrary' in FC s 25(1) has been interpreted by the Constitutional Court to describe a decision-making process that falls somewhere between [1] FC s 27(1)(a) reads: 'Everyone has the right to have access to health care services, including reproductive health care'. For a detailed discussion on the right to healthcare, see D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 56A.

[2] FC s 27(1)(b) reads: 'Everyone has the right to have access to sufficient food and water'. For a discussion on the right to food, see D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 56C. For a discussion on the right to water, see A Kok & M Langford 'Water' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 56B. For the most recent authority on the right to water, see Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others (CCT 39/09) [2009] ZACC 28 (Constitutional Court rejected Soweto residents' objections to the City's water policy).

[3] FC s 27(1)(c) reads: 'Everyone has the right to have access to social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependents, appropriate social assistance.' For a discussion on the right to social security, see M Swart 'Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56D.

[4] For further discussion of the rights to food and nutrition, see G Bekker 'Introduction to the Rights to Food and Nutrition' in Centre for Human Rights Economic and Social Rights Series — A Compilation of Essential Documents on the Rights to Food and Nutrition (Volume 3, 2000) 1.

[5] See United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' General Comment No. 15 on the Right to Water. E/C.12/2002/11 (12 Nov. 2002)(The comment states that everyone is entitled to safe and acceptable water for personal and domestic use.)

[6] FC s 25. For more on the right to property, see T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46.

[7] See AJ van der Walt 'Property Rights, Land Rights, and Environmental Rights' in D van Wyk, B De Villiers, J Dugard & D Davis Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 496.

actual arbitrariness and proportionality.[1] If the state wishes to expropriate property, it must do so for a public purpose or in the public interest and must provide the owner with fair compensation. It is yet to be determined when protecting the environment is a sufficient purpose to expropriate property.

(bb) Procedural Rights

The procedural rights — the rights to access to information and administrative justice — contained in the Bill of Rights are often indispensable in the application, implementation and enforcement of FC s 24. Procedural rights provide a mechanism for gathering information that might affect those concerned with a potential environmental dispute and in adopting reaction strategies to check the reasonableness of government decisions. As Oliver JA wrote in Director: Mineral Development, Gauteng Region, & Another v Save the Vaal Environment & Others: 'Our Constitution, by including environmental rights as fundamental human rights, by necessary implication requires that environmental considerations be accorded appropriate recognition and respect [in terms of the] administrative process in our country.'[2]

(x) Access to Information[3]

The right of access to information provides the public with a mechanism to obtain relevant information on existing or potential threats to the environment.[4] For example, in Van Huysteen v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism, the Cape High Court held that the applicants should have access to state-held documents regarding the development of a proposed steel mill and its potential adverse environmental impact.[5]

---

[1] First National Bank of SA Limited t/a Wesbank v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Services and Another; First National Bank of SA Limited t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC), [2002] ZACC 5. For further discussion, see T Roux 'The "Arbitrary Deprivation" Vortex: Constitutional Property Law after FNB' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 265 and F Michelman 'Against Regulatory Taking: In Defence of the Two-stage Inquiry' in Woolman & Bishop (supra) at 283.

[2] 1999 (2) SA 709, 719 (SCA).

[3] FC s 32 reads:

(1) Everyone has the right of access to-

(a) any information held by the state; and

(b) any information that is held by another person and that is required for the exercise or protection of any rights.

(2) National legislation must be enacted to give effect to this right, and may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state.

For a discussion of FC s 32, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 62. For a discussion of the right's application to environmental law, see W Du Plessis 'Access to Information' in A Paterson & LJ Kotze Environmental Compliance and Enforcement in South Africa (2009) 197-221.

[4] See C Bruch, W Coker & C van Arsdale 'Breathing Life into Fundamental Principles: Implementing Constitutional Environmental Protections in Africa' (2000) 7 SAJELP 21,66.

[5] 1996 (1) SA 283 (C), 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C). See also Aquafund (Pty) Ltd v Premier of the Western Cape 1997 (7) BCLR 907 (C); Goodman Bros (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (4) SA 989 (W), 1998 (8) BCLR 1024 (W); Van Niekerk v City Council of Pretoria 1997 (3) SA 839 (T); and Le Roux v Direkteur-Generaal van Handel en Nywerheid 1997 (4) SA 174 (T), 1997(8) BCLR 1048 (T).

The constitutional right to access information has — as required by FC s 32(b) — been given effect by the Promotion of Access to Information Act ('PAIA').[1] In addition to the general procedure for accessing information, PAIA places a mandatory obligation on both public[2] and private[3] bodies to disclose information if the record would reveal evidence of 'imminent and serious public safety or environmental risk.' In Trustees for the Time Being of the Biowatch Trust v the Registrar: Genetic Resources & Others,[4] the High Court dealt with an application for access to information about genetically modified organisms. The application relied on both FC s 32 and PAIA (because the application was lodged between promulgation and entry into force of PAIA.) The respondents were of the view that the request was premature. Internal remedies, in their view, had not yet been exhausted in terms of s 78 of PAIA. Dunn AJ concluded, however, that s 78 was not applicable because the section did not apply to the bodies from which Biowatch was seeking information. One of the complex array of issues raised in Biowatch was whether the state could refuse to disclose information on the grounds of s 18 of the Genetically Modified Organisms Act.[5] Section 18 prohibited the Registrar from disclosing information gained in his duties, except if ordered to do so by a court or 'insofar as it is necessary for the proper application of the provisions of [the GMO] Act'. Dunn AJ held that the second exception applied:

> the right of access to information is intended to serve a wider purpose, namely to ensure that there is open and accountable administration at all levels of government - a vital ingredient in our new constitutional culture and in an open and democratic society. The disclosure of information, or the granting of access to information, should therefore, in my view, be necessary for the proper application of the provisions of the GMO Act. In other words, the Registrar is not prohibited from disclosing any information acquired by him through the exercise of his powers or the performance of his duties under the GMO Act, if such disclosure is aimed at giving effect to the right to access of information enshrined in s 32(1)(a) of the Constitution.[6]

Dunn AJ, therefore, correctly concluded that Biowatch was entitled to most of the information it had sought under FC s 32(1).

A number of pieces of environmental legislation complement FC s 33 and PAIA.[7] For example, the national environmental management principles of NEMA provide that 'decisions must be taken in an open and transparent manner, and access to information must be provided for in accordance with the law."[8] NEMA further provides for access to environmental information and the protection of whistle-blowers.[9]

---

[1] Act 2 of 2000.
[2] PAIA s 46*(a)*(ii).
[3] PAIA s 70*(a)*(ii).
[4] 2005 (4) SA 111 (T)('Biowatch (HC)').
[5] Act 15 of 1997.
[6] Biowatch (HC) (supra) at para 37.
[7] See National Water Act 36 of 1998 ss 110, 140 –142; National Environmental Management: Biodiversity Act 10 of 2004 ss 7, 61, 82, 89, 99 and 100; Protected Areas Act 57 of 2003 ss 5, 10 and Part 5; and Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002 ss 30, 61 and 88.
[8] NEMA s 2(4)(k).
[9] NEMA s 31.

The right to access information is closely supported by the rights to freedom of expression[1] and freedom of assembly.[2] The freedom to express what may be controversial or unpopular views is particularly relevant when environmental action (or inaction) elicits vociferous protests from environmental activists — often in ways that impinge on private property. The question is, then, how to harmonize, if possible, the rights to property and economic activity of developers and the rights of the public to obtain information about the negative environmental impacts of the planned activity and to voice their displeasure with the development through protests, assemblies or demonstrations on the property at issue. The Court in Petro Props (Pty) Ltd v Barlow and the Libradene Wetland Association faced this very question.[3] A persistent public campaign organised by a community association had halted the development of a Sasol petrol filling station that encroached on a wetland. The campaign was so effective that Sasol withdrew from the development and construction stopped. The developer failed in its application to interdict the respondents from harassing and interfering with its property rights to develop the property into a filling station. Tip AJ rejected the argument that the right to development of the property outranks the right to freedom of expression. Referring to various leading judgments on the importance of freedom of speech in an open and democratic society, he held that as the protest was 'not vexatious, contra bonos mores or actionable', there was no justification in prohibiting a successful public campaign.[4] South African courts 'have on many occasions warned of the perils of curtailing free speech and free association'.[5] This was such a case: Permitting an interdict in these circumstances 'would have a chilling effect on the readiness of persons … and associations … to step forward as active citizens.'[6]

(y) Administrative Justice[7]

FC s 33 and the subsequent promulgation of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA')[8] provide powerful rights to just administrative action. Administrative justice plays a central role in most environmental disputes: the subject of a challenge almost always turns on the legitimacy of the administrative decision

[1] For a detailed discussion of the expression protection found in FC s 16(1), see D Milo, G Penfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 42.

[2] For a detailed discussion of the assembly protection found in FC s 17, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 43.

[3] 2006 (5) SA 160 (W)('Petros Props').

[4] Petro Props (supra) at para 65.

[5] Ibid at para 60.

[6] Ibid.

[7] For a detailed discussion of administrative justice, FC s 33, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Kust Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63. For a discussion of FC s 33's application to environmental law, see Y Burns & M Kidd 'Administrative Law & Implementation of Environmental Law' in HA Strydom & ND King Fuggle and Rabie's Environmental Management in South Africa (2nd Edition, 2009) 222-268; and E Bray 'Administrative Justice' in A Paterson & LJ Kotze Environmental Compliance and Enforcement in South Africa (2009) 152-196.

[8] Act 3 of 2000.

procedures (an EIA, for example) for issuing a licence or permit.[1] PAJA and FC s 33 offer the following three-fold protection: all administrative action must be 'lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair.'[2]

First: reasonableness. The assurance of reasonable administrative action allows courts to consider, within certain parameters, the issue of substantive fairness in the administrative decision-making process. In South African Shore Angling Association & Another v Minister of Environmental Affairs, the parties challenged the validity and constitutionality of regulations that impose a general prohibition on recreational use of vehicles in the coastal zone as unreasonable.[3] Erasmus J rejected the challenge. As the regulations did not constitute an absolute ban — they allowed for exemptions and permitting — they were reasonable. In BP Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs, the applicant challenged a decision not to grant permission to build a new filling station. It argued that the MEC had relied on socio-economic concerns, not environmental ones and had exceeded his mandate by relying on sources outside the ECA. The court rejected both arguments. The BP Southern Africa court held that the constitutional and statutory framework — which expanded beyond ECA to include NEMA and other relevant legislation — made it 'abundantly clear that the department's mandate includes the consideration of socio-economic factors as an integral part of its environmental responsibility.'[4] Claassen J emphasised that the discretionary powers exercised by the MEC during the EIA were reasonable because they enabled the MEC to fulfil her constitutional obligation under FC s 24.[5] In addition, the MEC's discretionary powers were not exhausted by strict adherence to EIA guidelines. Ample room exists for deviation from the guidelines -- provided the applicant has proffered comprehensive supporting evidence. In the instant case it failed to provide such evidence.

The most important decision on reasonableness in the context of environmental decision-making is the Constitutional Court's discussion on the allocation of fishing quotas in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v the Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism.[6] In essence, O'Regan J held that the reasonableness of administrative action depends on the facts of the case. The Court extracted the following (somewhat unhelpful) test from s 6 of PAJA: a decision will be unreasonable if a reasonable decision-maker could not have reached it. The Court reiterated that reasonableness in any particular instance will depend on factors such as the nature of the decision; the identity of the decision-maker; the range of factors relevant to the decision; the nature of the competing interests involved; and the impact of the decision on the lives and well-being of those affected. The Court further 'warned' that judges may not take over the task of the executive branch

[1] See also LJ Kotze & AJ Van der Walt 'Just Administrative Action and the Issue of Unreasonable Delay in Environmental Impact Process: A South African Perspective' (2003) 10 SAJELP 39.

[2] FC s 33(1).

[3] 2002 (5) SA 511 (SE).

[4] Ibid at 151D-E.

[5] 2004 (5) SA 124 (W).

[6] 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC), [2004] ZACC 15. See also Compass Waste Services (Pty) Ltd v The Head of Department, Department Agriculture and Environmental Affairs of the Province Kwa-Zulu Natal & Others unreported case (N) Case No: 2280/2003 (on file with authors).

of government by arrogating 'to [themselves] superior wisdom'. Rather, the sole task of the courts is to establish if a decision was reasonable in terms of the Constitution.[1]

Second: Procedural fairness. Procedural fairness in the decision-making process of environmental matters embraces the audi alteram partem ('hear the other side') rule. In Director, Mineral Development, Gauteng Region and Sasol Mining (Pty) Ltd v Save the Vaal Environment & Others,[2] the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the government's refusal to apply the audi alteram partem rule in a mining licence application. The SCA described the government's position as an overly legalistic interpretation of the relevant legislation and as 'emasculat[ing] the principles of natural justice'.[3] The state's formalistic approach to statutory interpretation was clearly in conflict with the constitutional duty on all bearers of state authority (and even, in some instances, private parties)[4] to concretise FC s 33 and FC s 24. Through contextual-teleological-value based interpretation, the Court found that the issuance of a mining licence in terms of s 9 of the Minerals Act[5] set into motion a series of events that might have serious consequences for the environment because it enabled the licence holder to take preparatory steps to commence actual mining upon the later approval of the environmental management program ('EMPR').[6] Furthermore, the Court found that s 39 of the Minerals Act enabled a license holder to be exempted from the responsibility to conduct an EMPR, or to obtain temporary permission to commence mining pending the approval of the EMPR.[7] If the demand to 'hear the other side' was postponed until the end of the EMPR process, then environmental concerns might never be heard. By applying the audi rule at the s 9 stage, the extensive damage that mining operations might cause to the environment and ecology can be identified and, if necessary, prevented. This approach will ensure that sustainable development will take place in a fashion that ensures intergenerational equity.

The issue of procedural fairness was again considered in Earthlife Africa (Cape Town) v Director General: Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Eskom Holdings.[8] Earthlife argued that the procedure that led to the grant of an Environmental Authorisation ('EA') to construct a pebble bed modular reactor ('PBMR') was unfair. Earthlife had only been permitted to comment on the draft environmental impact report. Moreover Earthlife could only engage the Director-General's consultants: they were barred from approaching the DG himself. The Court took time to stress the great importance of procedural aspects and that EA administrators must give proper consideration to interested and affected parties'

[1] Ibid at 44-46.
[2] 1999 (2) SA 709 (SCA)('Save the Vaal').
[3] Ibid at 717.
[4] See FC ss 8(1) and (2).
[5] Act 50 of 1951.
[6] Save the Vaal (supra) at 718.
[7] Ibid at 718 F-H.
[8] 2005 (3) SA 156 (C)('Earthlife'). See also Evans & Other v Llandudo/Houtbay Transitional Metroplolitan Substructure & Another 2001 (2) SA 342 (C)(the Court dealt with the issue of procedural fairness in the decision-making process where the respondent issued an ECA s 31A directive in order to protect the environment).

participation in the authorisation process. After reviewing the evidence, Griesel J accepted both of Earthlife's arguments: (1) the DG made his decision 'without having heard [Earthlife]' and (2) 'without making himself aware of the nature and substance of [its] submissions.'[1] He set aside the decision and ordered the DG to reconsider the matter after hearing Earthlife's submissions.

Two last, minor points are worth making. One, a license applicant is entitled to written reasons from an environmental authority for the refusal of the license.[2] Two, PAJA provides not only for judicial review of administrative action, but specifies the remedies that can be granted if the decision is deficient. These remedies include: prohibition, setting aside the administrative action, a declaration of rights, granting an interdict, and, in extreme cases, damages.[3]

(iii) Other Constitutional provisions relevant to the environment

Several central structural mechanisms of the Final Constitution that determine the respective competences of the national legislature and provincial legislatures have an important bearing on environmental matters.[4] In short, certain subject areas are assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures,[5] while others are areas of concurrent competence for both national and provincial lawmakers.[6] A detailed regime exists for resolving conflicts between the two spheres of legislative authority. Environmental issues fall into both the exclusive and shared categories. The Final Constitution grants concurrent control over the most important environmental subjects, including 'Environment', 'Nature conservation … and marine resources', 'Pollution control' and 'Soil conservation'.[7] Only a few subjects, with limited environmental relevance, are assigned solely to the provinces.[8] Finally, some environmental issues — including 'Air pollution', 'Municipal parks', 'Noise pollution' and 'Refuse removal and waste disposal'[9] — are reserved for local gov-

[1] Earthlife (supra) at para 78.

[2] PAJA s 5.

[3] PAJA ss 6 and 8.

[4] For a full discussion of the separation between national and provincial governments, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15 and V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux &, M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

[5] These powers are listed in Schedule 5.

[6] These powers are listed in Schedule 4.

[7] Other potentially relevant areas included in Schedule 4 are: (1) Administration on indigenous forest; (2) Agriculture; (3) Animal control and diseases; (4) Cultural matters; (5) Disaster management; (6) Health services; (7) Industrial promotion; (8) Public transport; (9) Regional planning and development; (10) Tourism; (11) Trade; and (12) Urban and rural development.

[8] Potentially relevant areas included in Schedule 5 are: (1) Abattoirs; (2) Museums other than national museums; (3) Provincial planning; (4) Provincial cultural matters; and (5) Provincial roads.

[9] Other potentially relevant areas included in Schedule 4(b) and 5(b) are: (1) Beaches; (2) Cleansing; (3) Control of public nuisances; (4) Electricity and gas reticulation; (5) Fences and Fencing; (6) Fire fighting services; (7) Municipal abattoirs; (8) Municipal planning; (9) Municipal health services; (10) Municipal public transport; (11) Stormwater management systems; and (12) Water and sanitation services.

ernment.[1] If one sphere of government, intentionally or not, intrudes into the realm of another sphere, its actions will be invalid.[2]

Chapter 9 of the Final Constitution establishes several organizations designed to support constitutional democracy. The South African Human Rights Commission ('SAHRC'),[3] the Public Protector and other bodies ensure that relatively impartial institutions monitor, promote, protect and fulfil the rights contained in Chapter 2.[4] For example, the SAHRC must request from relevant organs of state information on measures undertaken by these organs in the realisation of the rights contained in chapter 2, including the right to a healthy environment.[5]

50.4 Application of the Right to a Healthy Environment: Practical Considerations

Although the right to a healthy environment is entrenched in our Bill of Rights, the case-law remains under-developed. What follows are some practical considerations to be taken into account when applying FC s 24 in environmental dispute settlement procedures.

(a) Considering the appropriate forum for environmental dispute settlement

Litigation is but one dispute resolution mechanism; there are many other — sometimes more appropriate — dispute resolution processes. If we think of the possibilities as falling on a continuum with litigation on one end, other options towards the less formal end would encompass negotiation, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, mini-trial, mediation-arbitration, fact-finding and enquiry. Non-litigation procedures are referred to collectively as Alternative Dispute Resolution ('ADR'). Whatever the procedure parties use, the application and the interpretation of FC s 24 remain an integral part of resolving an environmental dispute.

[1] FC ss 155(6)(a) and 155(7) read with Schedules 4*(b)* and 5*(b)*.

[2] See City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Gauteng Development Tribunal & Others [2010] ZACC 11 (a national law that interfered with the provincial power to determine municipal planning was declared invalid).

[3] For more on the Chapter 9 institutions, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux &M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; J Klaaren 'SA Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24C; C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D, J White 'Independent Communication Authority of South Africa (ICASA)' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 24E, S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion & the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 24F.

[4] FC s 184.

[5] FC s 184(3).

ADR will generally be more appropriate if the maintenance of the relationship between the parties is important.[1] The primary advantages of ADR are: more cost effective; less time consuming; the parties generally have the power to determine the outcome of the dispute; the parties can design the procedures involved; and the parties choose an independent mediator or arbitrator with appropriate and expert knowledge. Litigation, on the other hand, will be more appropriate if one wishes to rely on existing precedent or if media coverage is important to the parties. Unfortunately, choosing the appropriate dispute resolution process — especially in environmental disputes — may not fall within the discretion of the adversely affected parties. Quite often the appropriate forum will be decided by statute, by regulation[2] or, in the case of many corporate institutions, by contractual obligations.[3]

NEMA and the National Water Act,[4] however, both require ADR.[5] The National Water Act established a Water Tribunal to hear appeals against decisions taken by institutions operating under the authority of the Act.[6] The Act also provides for environmental dispute resolution through the processes of mediation and negotiation.[7] NEMA further broadens the scope of environmental dispute resolution. Any Minister, MEC or Municipal Council may, in decisions where the environment is concerned, refer the matter for conciliation.[8] Where this procedure proves inappropriate, the matter can be referred to facilitation.[9] NEMA also provides for arbitration[10] and investigation.[11]

Another important consideration in deciding on the appropriate forum in environmental disputes is the relief sought. Given that environmental infringements are often caused by multi-national corporations, it might be more appropriate to file in another country against the mother company than to litigate in South Africa. In Englebert Ngcobo & Others v Thor Chemical Holdings (Pty) Ltd,[12] for example, the applicants filed in the United Kingdom and not in South Africa. The applicants were all temporary workers at the Thor Chemical Holdings plant at Cato Ridge, KwaZulu Natal. They had been exposed at the plant to hazardous and [1] For a discussion on approaches to environmental dispute resolution in South Africa, see Johan van den Berg 'Environmental Dispute Resolution in South Africa — Towards Sustainable Development' (1998) 5 SAJELP 71.

[2] Regulations may require an independent third party to investigate the matter.

[3] A contractual provision may provide that an environmental dispute be referred to an arbitrator for arbitration.

[4] Act 36 of 1998.

[5] Water Act s 150. See Naude & Andere v Heatlie & Andere; Naude & Andere v Worcester-Oos Hoofbesproeingsraad & Andere 2001 (2) SA 815 (SCA)(on competency of the Water Court). See Jansen van Vuuren & Andere v Van der Merwe & Andere 1992 (1) SA 124 (A)(discussion of the jurisdiction and power of the Water Court established under the previous Water Act 54 of 1956). See also Kruger v Le Roux 1987 (1) SA 866 (A); Mathee en Ander v Lerm 1980 (3) SA 742 (C).

[6] Water Act Chapter 16.

[7] Water Act s 150.

[8] NEMA ss 17-18.

[9] Ibid.

[10] NEMA s 19.

[11] NEMA s 20.

[12] No 1994 N 1212 (UK) reprinted in UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions on Matters related to Environment: National Decisions (Volume 1, 1998) 237.

unsafe quantities of mercury, mercury vapour and mercury compounds. Legislation on occupational compensation prevented the applicants from suing in South Africa.[1]

(b) The issue of standing[2]

Standing in environmental litigation is substantially easier to secure as a result of FC s 24. Prior to its inclusion, unless standing was expressly granted under legislation,[3] applicants had to show a direct personal interest in the environmental dispute.[4] This cramped position on standing made environmental public interest litigation virtually impossible. FC s 38 dramatically expands traditional standing rules and permits people to sue in the public interest, on behalf of a class of people, on behalf of others who cannot represent themselves and associations whose members have an interest in a matter.[5] Section 32(1)(e) of NEMA provides even broader standing by allowing any person or group of persons to seek appropriate relief in respect of any breach of NEMA, its s 2 principles, or any provision of any statutory provision pertaining to environmental protection. The only limitation is that the person acts in the 'interest of protecting the environment'.[6]

Pickering J provided powerful early support for wide standing in environmental litigation in Wildlife Society of South Africa v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism:

> One of the principal objections often raised against the adoption of a more flexible approach to the problem of locus standi is that the floodgates will thereby be opened, giving rise to an uncontrollable torrent of litigation. It is well, however, to bear in mind … that it may sometimes be necessary to open the floodgates in order to irrigate the arid ground below them. I am not persuaded by the argument that to afford locus standi to a body such as first applicant in circumstances such as these would be to open the floodgates to a torrent of frivolous or vexatious litigation against the State by cranks or busybodies. Neither am I persuaded, given the exorbitant costs of Supreme Court litigation, that should the law be so adapted cranks and busybodies would indeed flood the courts with vexatious or frivolous

[1] Workmen's Compensation Act 31 of 1941 s 7 prohibited actions by employees against employers for injuries sustained at work. Irrespective of fault a claim must be lodge against the Workman's Compensation Commissioner. Section 8 of the Act, however, permits a workman to sue a third-party tortfeasor. The third-party tortfeasor in this instance was a UK-based company.

[2] For a detailed discussion of standing in Bill of Rights litigation, see C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness & Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7.

[3] See Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Standerton v Nel & Others 1988 (4) SA 42 (W).

[4] For a detailed discussion of this issue, see M Kidd Environmental Law — A South African Guide (1997) 26.

[5] FC s 38 reads:

Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are-

(a) anyone acting in their own interest;
(b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name;
(c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons;
(d) anyone acting in the public interest; and
(e) an association acting in the interest of its members.

[6] NEMA s 32(1)(e).

> applications against the State. Should they be tempted to do so, I have no doubt that an appropriate order of costs would soon inhibit their litigious ardour.
>
> In any event, whilst cranks and busybodies who attempt to abuse legal process do no doubt exist, I am of the view that lawyers are sometimes unduly apprehensive and pessimistic about the strength of their numbers. The meddlesome crank and busybody with no legal interest in a matter whatsoever, mischievously intent on gaining access to the court in order to satisfy some personal caprice or obsession, is, in my view, as has been remarked elsewhere, more often a spectral figure than a reality.[1]

However, notwithstanding the clear and unequivocal broadening of standing under FC s 38 and NEMA, it is often a preliminary issue addressed in environmental litigation. For example, in All the Best Trading CC t/a Parkville Motors v S N Nyagar Property Development and Construction CC the court held that applicant lacked standing because the suit did not turn on the advancement of environmental rights. The suit was crafted solely around the firm's pecuniary interests.[2] However, in two further filling station cases — Capital Motors CC v Shell SA Marketing (Pty) Ltd[3] and Fuel Retailers[4] — applications for protection of business interests as part of the right to economic and social development were successfully based on FC s 24. In Tergniet and Toekoms Action Group & Thirty Four Others v Outeniqua Kreosootpale (Pty) Ltd & Others[5] the court accepted the wider basis for standing provided by FC s 38 and s 32 of NEMA when it allowed an application by an informal residential grouping without a founding constitution or fixed membership and 34 inhabitants or property owners of the affected area. Their complaint, ultimately successful, was against the illegal manufacturing of creosote-treated wooden poles and accompanying unlawful release of offensive and noxious vapours.

(c) Scope of application

FC s 8(1) states that all the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights apply to all law and bind the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state.[6] FC s 8(2) provides that a right 'binds a natural or juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of the duty imposed by the right.' The extension of the environmental right's application to non-state actors means that the parties most likely to impair the enjoyment of the right — the mining sector, industries and corporate institu-

[1] 1996 (3) SA 1095 (Tks).
[2] 2005 (3) SA 396 (T).
[3] Unreported decision (T), Case No. 3016/05 (18 March 2005)(on file with authors).
[4] Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General: Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment, Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 ('Fuel Retailers') at para 109 (Sachs J, dissenting)('It is ironic that the first appeal in this Court to invoke the majestic protection provided for the environment in the Bill of Rights comes not from concerned ecologists but from an organised section of an industry frequently lambasted both for establishing worldwide reliance on non-renewable energy sources and for spawning pollution. So be it. The doors of the Court are open to all, and there is nothing illegitimate or inappropriate in the Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa seeking to rely on legal provisions that may promote its interests'.)
[5] [2009] ZAWCHC 6 (23 January 2009).
[6] FC s 8(1).

tions — can be held directly accountable. FC s 24 can apply to a natural person or a juristic person in two ways. It can apply directly to a legal dispute that engages the constitutionality of an express rule of law as a point of possible infringement. It can apply indirectly to an environmental dispute in which the court is asked to interpret legislation or develop the common law in light of the general spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[1]

In The Director, Mineral Development, Gauteng Region & Sasol Mining (Pty) Ltd v Save the Vaal Environment & Others, the principle of intergenerational equity applied directly to the conduct of an organ of state.[2] But, had there been no express rule of law governing the dispute, FC s 8(2) could have been used to extend the legal force of FC s 24*(a)* directly to the conduct of mining rights holder. Where no express rule of law exists to govern conduct, FC s 8(2) creates the space to apply evolving principles of international environmental soft law to disputes between private parties. For example, courts could create legal duties — in addition to those responsibilities already imposed by legislation — for companies to conduct their construction, manufacturing or mining activities in an ecologically sustainable manner, to manage their waste streams effectively in terms of the 'polluter pays' and 'cradle-to-grave' principles, or to take adequate steps in terms of the precautionary principle to prevent greenhouse gas emissions and contributions to global warming.

(d) Limitation of the environmental right

FC s 36(1) permits a law of general application to limit the environmental rights in FC s 24 to the extent that the limitation is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality, and freedom'.[3] In addition to the general limitation clause, parts of FC s 24 can be viewed as 'internal limitations'. Particularly, the qualifications 'reasonable' and 'ecological' in FC s 24*(b)* could be seen as internal modifiers of an otherwise absolute right. A practical application of the general limitation clause in relation to the environmental right is yet to be considered by the courts.

(e) Interpretational guidelines

In addition to existing rules of statutory interpretation, the Bill of Rights mandates courts to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights

[1] FC ss 8(3) and 39. For detailed discussions of the application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishings Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762; C Sprigman & M Osborne 'Du Plessis is not Dead: South Africa's 1996 Constitution and the Application of the Bill of Rights in Private Disputes' (1999) 15 SAJHR 25; Jan Glazewski Environmental Law in South Africa (2000) 88; I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (2005); Alfred Cockrell 'Private law and the Bill of Rights: A Threshold of Horizontality' (1997) Bill of Rights Compendium 3A1-17. See also Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC), [1996] ZACC 10.

[2] 1999 (2) SA 709, 719 (SCA).

[3] For a detailed discussion of the limitation of the rights contained in the Bill of Rights, and internal limitations found within the rights themselves, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

in the interpretation of legislation.[1] In the environmental context, courts have effectively employed this mandate in order to give effect to both the objective of FC s 24 as well as the Environmental Principles, the Duty of Care and the concept of Integrated Environmental Management envisaged in NEMA.[2] In Sasol, the Supreme Court of Appeal had to decide whether a regulation permitted the government to regulate filling stations generally, or only the storage and use of hazardous substances at filling stations. In rejecting the High Court's conclusion that the regulation only had limited application, Cachalia AJA explicitly relied on FC s 24, particularly its endorsement of sustainable development. He reasoned: 'To attempt to separate the commercial aspects of a filling station from its essential features is not only impractical but makes little sense from an environmental perspective. It also flies in the face of the principle of sustainable development.'[3]

But the clearest example of interpreting legislation in line with FC s 24 — and FC s 33 — is MEC: Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment & Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Limited. In HTF Developers, the question before the High Court was whether the applicant required environmental authorization before it could subdivide its property. The state contended that the land constituted 'virgin ground' and the applicant therefore required authorization. Murphy J avoided deciding the precise meaning of 'virgin ground'. Instead Murphy J interpreted s 31A of the ECA — which permits the state to intervene in emergency situations to prevent damage to the environment — in light of the constitutional imperative of promoting conservation and securing ecologically sustainable development. By so doing, the court granted the MEC the power to intervene in any activity if it was necessary to protect the environment.

HTF Developers appealed to the SCA.[4] By this stage the 'virgin ground' regulation had been repealed. However, the question at the heart of the dispute still required statutory interpretation. HTF argued that the MEC was obliged to follow the procedural requirements in s 32 before acting in terms of s 31A. Section 32 required the government to publish a notice in the Government Gazette and to allow 30 days for comments if it made a 'direction'. Section 31A also used the word 'direction' to describe interventions to prevent individuals causing harm to the environment. The majority agreed with HTF that as the word 'direction' was used in both sections, the procedure in s 32 had to apply to s 31A. Jafta JA was the lone voice of dissent. He argued that the two sections served different purposes: s 32 was meant to 'promote the right to administrative justice, particularly the

[1] FC s 39(2).

[2] See MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs v Sasol Oil Pty Ltd & Bright Suns Development CC [2005] ZASCA 76 ('Sasol') at para 13; HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister of Environmental Affairs (1) 2006 (5) SA 512 (T) (this decision was over turned on appeal on different grounds in HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister of Environmental Affairs 2007 (5) SA 438 (SCA)(A majority of the SCA held that the MEC had failed to follow the procedural requirements in ECA s 32. Jafta JA dissented, concluding that s 31A was for urgent situations and therefore s 32 was not applicable.) which was in turn reversed by the Constitutional Court MEC: Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment and Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Limited 2008 (2) SA 319 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 417 (CC), [2007] ZACC 25 (The Court supported Jafta JA's judgment) These decisions are discussed in detail below.)

[3] Sasol (supra) at para 16 quoting BP Southern Africa (Pty) Ltd v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124, 160A-E (W).

[4] HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs 2007 (5) SA 438 (SCA).

right to procedural fairness' while s 31A's purposes was to ensure a healthy environment as envisaged by FC s 24.[1] Requiring the government to follow the s 32 procedure, which included a 30-day notice and comment procedure, would defeat the purpose of s 31A.[2] The s 31A power would, however, still have to comply with the procedural strictures of PAJA.

The government appealed the SCA's decision. The Constitutional Court preferred Jafta JA's dissenting view.[3] Skweyiya J noted that while words that appeared more than once in a statute should ordinarily be given the same meaning, this rule could and should be abandoned if it would lead to absurd results.[4] That would be the case if s 32 applied to cases where the government had to act promptly to prevent harm to the environment. The Court distinguished between two uses of 'direction': it is employed to refer to decisions that affect the public generally, and to decisions that only engage the interests of individuals. Only in the first case was the 30-day procedure necessary or appropriate.[5] PAJA offered a much better procedural check for the s 31A power as its requirements were flexible, depending on the circumstances of the case.[6] Justice Ngcobo wrote a concurring judgment emphasizing that > the Constitution and the environmental legislation require authorities to adopt an integrated approach to the environment; an approach that protects the environment while promoting socio-economic growth. To this end, the authorities are enjoined to adopt a risk averse and cautious approach and to prevent and remedy negative impacts on the environment.[7]

(f) The role of international law in environmental disputes

Three constitutional provisions create a role for international law in South Africa. One: FC s 39(1) requires any court, tribunal or forum to consider international law when interpreting the Constitution. Two: Customary international law is, FC s 232 tells us, South African law, provided that it is not in conflict with the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament. Three: FC s 233 reads: 'Every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law'.[8] During the application of FC s 24, international environmental law becomes integral to the decision making process for two reasons. First, international law obviously informs the interpretation of the section. Second, the absence of a sound South African environmental jurisprudence that takes contemporary developments in the field of environmental law into account makes international law particularly important in addressing novel problems. The need to consider international law in environmental dispute settlement applies not only [1] HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs (supra) at paras 19-21.

[2] Ibid at paras 22-27.
[3] MEC: Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment and Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Limited 2008 (2) SA 319 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 417 (CC), [2007] ZACC 25.
[4] Ibid at para 33.
[5] Ibid at paras 34-36.
[6] Ibid at paras 43 and 46.
[7] Ibid at para 65.
[8] FC ss 232 and 233.

to the courts, but to the Water Tribunal and the environmental arbitrators required by NEMA.

While international environmental law provides a rich source of jurisprudence, two decisions are worthy of special mention. Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project (Hungary v Slovakia) provides a useful account of sustainable development and may therefore assist courts and counsel in determining the ambit of FC s 24*(b)*.[1] This hermeneutical approach was followed by the Constitutional Court in Fuel Retailers: the Court broadly canvassed the meaning of the concept of sustainable development in international law.[2]

Second, Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria (SERAC) — discussed earlier[3] — offers a lucid explanation of the meaning of a right to a satisfactory environment.[4] The decision of the African Commission in SERAC notes the wide range of government obligations in the environmental arena. These duties run from the obvious — to prevent pollution and ecological degradation — to duties with a longer-term view — to promote conservation and ensure ecological sustainable development and the use of natural resources — to the procedural — to permit independent scientific monitoring of threatened environments, to undertake environmental and social impact assessments prior to industrial development, to provide access to information to communities involved, and to grant those affected an opportunity to be heard and to participate in the development process. The Commission's discussion provides an invaluable touchstone for future engagement of these complex issues.

In addition, and as noted earlier,[5] international environmental law principles can find — and have found[6] — direct application through the constitutional provisions on international law. These principles include: the polluter must pay, biodiversity, intergenerational equity, and Environmental Impact Assessments.

(g) The role of foreign law in environmental disputes

FC s 39(1)(c) provides that a tribunal may use foreign law to assist in interpreting a right. The decision of the Rhodesian Appeal Court in King v Dykes is, for example, often cited in the scholarly literature and in domestic litigation to explain the concept of intergenerational equity.[7] Claasens J, in BP Southern Africa, cites King for the following proposition:

> [t]he idea which prevailed in the past that ownership of land conferred the right on the owner to use his land as he pleases is rapidly giving way in the modern world to the more

[1] See UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions — International Decisions (Volume I, 1998) 255.

[2] Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director-General: Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment, Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 at paras 46-56.

[3] §50.2*(c)* above.

[4] The Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria, Communication 155/96 2001.

[5] §50.3*(c)(i)(dd)(x)*(1) above.

[6] §50.3*(c)(i)(dd)(x)*(2) above.

[7] 1971 (3) SA 540 (RA).

> responsible conception that an owner must not use his land in a way which may prejudice his neighbours or the community in which he lives, and that he holds the land in trust for future generations.[1]

South African courts, particularly the Constitutional Court, have regularly engaged with, drawn on and distinguished foreign law when reasoning their way to a conclusion. They have, however, been careful to note dual constraints that obtain when our courts undertake comparative constitutional analysis. First, foreign jurisdictions possess dissimilar legal frameworks that may work in such a way that facially similar texts produce alternative outcomes. Second, foreign laws and judgments are either tools in getting to grips with similar disputes or rhetorical devices that serve to justify a particular outcome. They never bind a South African court.

(h) Remedies in Environmental Disputes

(i) Choosing a remedy

Before discussing some specific remedial options, we set out some basic principles that should inform the choice of remedy. In environmental dispute resolution, judges, arbitrators and other decision makers must resolve the particular disputes before them and craft a remedy that fits the parties before them and the dispute.[2] That said, judicial, administrative or contractual remedies should take note of the conflicting imperatives of economic growth, social progress and environmental protection and attempt to place the particular outcome on the path towards sustainability.

When crafting a remedy, a court, tribunal or other forum should keep in mind the 'polluter pays' principle. The 'polluter pays' principle requires the offending party to create or to restore that habitat which is necessary for biological diversity.[3] They should, in addition, undertake their work in terms of the following assumptions:

(i) That legal and factual means are present in order to establish liability,
(ii) That they have a statutory/ inherent power to mould the appropriate judgment,
(iii) That courts have the power to enforce decisions through sanctions, and
(iv) Judges (decision-makers) are independent from outside influence.[4]

Remedies in environmental disputes are often complex. Adjudicators should draw on expert testimony in a variety of forms: government reports, court-appointed experts, or independent EIA studies.[5]

[1] J Glazewski Environmental Law in South Africa (2000) 87.

[2] For a detailed discussion of how courts choose a remedy in constitutional cases, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) §9.2.

[3] These considerations are largely based on a PowerPoint presentation of Judge Scott Fulton, Environmental Appeals Board, US Environmental Protection Agency, delivered at the Southern African Judges Needs Assessment Seminar on Environmental Law held in Johannesburg (December 2003.)

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid. See also National Fresh Produce Growers Association v Agroserve (Pty) Ltd 1990 (4) SA 749 (N) (polluter pays principle).

Fulton offers a useful 'remedial hierarchy' for courts to follow when constructing environmental remedies. Firstly, remedies must eliminate violations and present dangers. To eliminate violations, orders may require a halt to activities, emergency clean-ups or renewal.[1] Secondly, remedies should address long-term environmental damage. This desideratum presents adjudicators with the challenge of moving past immediate concerns to focus on mechanisms that reverse the long-term effects of pollution. Such remedies normally entail detailed studies and technical assistance that lay bare the nature of the environmental dilemma and the costs of a range of solutions. Typical remedies at this stage are soil, water and sediment remediation or the treatment of contaminated ground water.[2] Thirdly, remedies should provide adequate compensation. Compensation for damages can be classified into non-restorable natural resource damages and private party damages (i.e. property or health).[3] Lastly, remedies must punish violators and deter future violations. These ends can be met through a combination of criminal sanctions, monetary fines and civil penalties.[4]

(ii) Specific remedies in environmental disputes

The primary remedies in environmental cases are: (1) review of state action; (2) injunctions (pre-emptive or directive); (3) damages; (4) punitive sanctions; and (5) permit revocation and asset forfeiture.

(aa) Judicial Review of State Action

Judicial review of state action allows a litigant to invalidate unlawful government decisions. It can, for example, be used to set aside the granting of mining permits or zoning decisions that might negatively impact on the environment. Although litigants ordinarily seek to have a decision set aside, it is also possible to force government to take a decision, or for the court to replace the state's decision with its own.[5]

[1] Fulton (supra).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid.
[5] UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions on Matters Related to Environment — National decisions (Volume 3, 2001) 3. See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC), [2000] ZACC 1 (extent of powers of judicial review of state action). In the South African Environmental Authorisation context cases dealing with review applications include: Compass Waste Services (Pty) Ltd v The Head of Department, Department Agriculture and Environmental Affairs of the Province Kwa-Zulu Natal and Others unreported decision (N), Case No: 2280/2003 (on file with the authors); Earthlife Africa (Cape Town) v Director General: Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Eskom Holdings 2005 (3) SA 156 (C); Evans & Other v Llandudo/Houtbay Transitional Metroplolitan Substructure & Another 2001 (2) SA 342(C); MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs v Sasol Oil Pty Ltd & Bright Suns Development CC [2005] ZASCA 76; South Durban Community Environmental Alliance v Head of Department: Department of Agricultural and Environmental Affairs, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others 2003 (6) SA 631 (D); and SLC Property Group (Pty) Ltd & Longlands Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Economic Development (Western Cape) & Municipality of Stellenbosch unreported decision (C) Case No. 5542/2007 (on file with the authors).

(bb) Interdicts

Interdicts are powerful instruments in seeking environmental relief. Environmental disputes feature three kinds of interdicts: (1) prohibitory interdict; (2) mandatory interdict; or (3) structural interdict.

(x) Prohibitory interdict

Where an activity or its continuation constitutes a threat to the environment, an injured party may approach the court for relief in the form of a prohibitory interdict. In The Minister of Health and Welfare v Woodcarb (Pty) Ltd & Another, the Minister applied for an interdict to prevent the respondent from operating a sawmill in contravention of the prohibition of carrying out scheduled processes in a controlled area.[1] The court held that the without the registration certificate required by the Atmospheric Pollution Act,[2] the generation of smoke was unlawful and violated the Interim Constitution's environmental rights. The prohibitory interdict was granted.

(y) Mandamus (mandatory interdict)

A mandatory interdict in environmental disputes can be utilised in two ways. First, it can be employed to compel government to commence environmental clean-up or some other remedial action. Second, it can compel environmental authorities to grant a permit or issue a licence. That was the situation in Myburg Park Langebaan (Pty) Ltd v Langebaan Municipality & Others, where the High Court granted a mandatory interdict to compel the respondent to issue a permit giving the applicant the necessary permission to develop his property.[3]

In addition to the normal interdict available when the necessary requirements are met, s 28(12) of NEMA introduces a statutory mandamus to South African environmental law. It allows a person to apply to court for an order directing the Director-General ('DG') of the Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism or the head of the provincial environmental department ('HOD') to take steps specified in s 28(4) of NEMA to ensure a polluter addresses significant pollution or environmental degradation. However, the interdict is only available if he or she informed the DG or HOD of the problem and the DG or HOD failed to provide written confirmation that the responsible party was instructed to take remedial action. Considering the wording of s 28(4), these interdicts are likely to function more like structural interdicts.

(z) Structural interdict

A structural interdict recognises that damage to the environment cannot always be remedied by a 'once and for all' order. Remedial action may require judicial oversight of programs over a relatively long period of time to resolve the problem that gave rise to the dispute. The basic model of a structural interdict requires respondents to present a remedial plan to the court and report at regular intervals on the implementation of the plan.[1] In crafting a structural interdict, one of the important considerations is the period of corrective measures imposed in relation to the restoration of a habitat necessary to preserve biological diversity. Structural interdicts in environmental disputes can aid in fulfilling multiple requirements of Fulton's 'remedial hierarchy': A structural interdict can move past the immediate concern and focus on mechanisms to address the long-term effects of pollution such as clean-up operations and addressing damage to natural resources.

[1] 1996 (3) SA 155 (N).
[2] Act 45 of 1965 s 9.
[3] 2001 (4) SA 1144 (C).

Structural interdicts can involve multiple stages that employ various different techniques: studies, technical assistance, analysis of the environmental dilemma and costing. Although structural interdicts are normally employed to compel government to comply with its constitutional obligations, they may be equally appropriate in private disputes that engage the commercial sector. Pure structural interdicts have not, yet, been employed in the environmental context, although our courts — including the Constitutional Court[2] — have made use of structural interdicts in a variety of other contexts.[3]

However, the environmental statutory interdict procedure introduced in s 28(12) of NEMA was applied in Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products & Others.[4] The environmental authorities failed for some time to prevent effectively the illegal environmental impact of the tannery on the applicant's neighbouring premises. The Court ordered the HOD of the provincial environmental department to instruct the owner of the tannery to investigate, evaluate and assess the impact of gasses emitted from its tannery. The HOD then had to take the necessary steps to ensure that the polluter complied with the tannery's registration certificate and its environmental obligations under NEMA.

---

[1] S Liebenberg 'Judicial and Civil Society Initiatives in the Development of Economic and Social Rights in the Commonwealth' (2001) 19 (unpublished, on file with authors). See also Wim Trengrove 'Judicial Remedies for Violations of Socio-Economic Rights' (1999) 1(4) ESR Review: Economic and Social Rights in South Africa 8.

[2] See, for example, Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (2) BCLR 293 (CC); [2006] ZACC 22; Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions: Johannesburg High Court and Others 2006 (2) BCLR 293 (CC); [2005] ZACC 16; Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions: Johannesburg High Court & Others [2005] ZACC 6, 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2006 (1) SACR 220 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC) (Court granted a supervisory order to monitor the replacement of death sentences); Head of Department: Mpumalanga Department of Education and Another v Hoërskool Ermelo & Another [2009] ZACC 32 (supervisory order to monitor language policy in schools).

[3] See, for example, EN & Others v Government of RSA & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 84 (D); Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W)(The Court found that certain prisoners had a right to electrical plug points in their cells and ordered the Minister to make them available. Schwartzman J required the Minister to submit a report indicating the timeline for completion of the project.); Kiliko & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2007 (4) BCLR 416 (C). For a fuller discussion of structural interdicts, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) §9.4*(c)*.

[4] 2004 (2) SA 393 (EC). See also Lone Creek River Lodge and Others v Global Forest Products & Others Unreported decision (T), Case No. 1994/2005 (6 November 2007)(on file with the authors)(The Court interdicted the DG of DEAT in terms of s 28(12) of NEMA to ensure a comprehensive investigation is undertaken with other organs of state in terms of s 28(4) of NEMA that investigates, evaluates and assesses the negative environmental impacts of the operations of the Respondent against its environmental obligations contained in various statutes and regulations (specified in the interdict).)

(cc) Criminal sanctions

NEMA, like most legislation dealing with the environment,[1] provides a list of environmental crimes. (They appear in Schedule 3.) Section 34(1) of NEMA permits the organ of state or private party that has incurred costs to rehabilitate the environment from damage caused by an environmental crime to reclaim the costs from the convicted criminal in the criminal trial. The successful party need not lodge a separate civil claim.[2] In addition, the criminal court may assess the financial advantage, if any, that the offender gained as a result of the environmental crime and order the offender to pay back the fruits of the crime as damages, compensation or a fine.[3] The offender may even be required to pay the costs of the prosecution of the crime.[4]

One of the most important innovations of s 34 of NEMA is the introduction of strict criminal liability for environmental crimes. It holds employers and directors of companies criminally liable for the environmental crimes committed by their employees or companies if they failed to take all reasonable steps that were necessary under the circumstances to prevent the commission of the offence.[5] All directors of companies, whether executive or non-executive, can be found criminally liable — and fined or imprisoned — if they do not act reasonably in their executive capacity and ensure that the company meets its duty of care to prevent environmental degradation. Liability is not, however, limited to the employer. A manager, an agent or an employee may also be found guilty of the environmental crime and treated as if they were the employer.[6]

Poor enforcement of environmental law by state authorities has been a serious problem for South African environmental law. In an attempt to remedy the problem, s 34 of NEMA was amended to grant Environmental Management Inspectors ('EMIs') extremely broad powers of search, seizure and arrest.[7] The EMIs, also known as the 'Green Scorpions', have already undertaken investigations that have led to the successful prosecution of several environmental crimes.

[1] An exception to this is that a failure to exercise your duty of care to prevent pollution under NEMA s 28 is not listed as an environmental crime in Schedule 3.

[2] NEMA s 34(2).

[3] In terms of NEMA s 34(3).

[4] NEMA s 34(4).

[5] NEMA s (9) reads:

In subsection (7) and (8) —

(a) 'firm' shall mean a body incorporated by or in terms of any law as well as a partnership; and

(b) 'director' shall mean a member of the board, executive committee, or other managing body of a corporate body and, in the case of a close corporation, a member of that close corporation or in the case of a partnership, a member of that partnership.

[6] NEMA s 34(6).

[7] See NEMA ss 34A-34G, inserted by National Environmental Management Amendment Act 46 of 2003 s 7, as amended by the National Environmental Laws Amendment Act 44 of 2008. See generally F Craigie, P Snijman & M Fourie 'Environmental Compliance and Enforcement Institutions' in A Paterson & LJ Kotze Environmental Compliance and Enforcement in South Africa (2009) 88-96.

(dd) Declaration of Rights[1]

In a declaratory order, the court makes a declaration in respect of the rights and duties of the parties in a dispute. The declaration, unlike an interdict, does not direct the parties to take specific action. It merely requires that the parties not act in contravention of the legal position set out by the court's order. In Myburg Park Langebaan (Pty) Ltd v Langebaan Municipality & Others, the applicant sought a declaration of rights that the requirements of s 22(1) of the Environmental Conservation Act relating to written authorisation were not applicable in relation to a proposed development scheme.[2] Selikowitz J used his power under 19(1)(a)(iii) of the Supreme Court Act[3] to grant the declaration. He reiterated the two-stage process for granting a declarator: First, the applicant must be a person 'interested' in an 'existing, future or contingent right or obligation'. Secondly, if the applicant is such an interested person the court must decide whether the case is a proper one in which to exercise its discretion to grant a declarator.[4] In Myburg, only the court could 'clear the decks' to allow the applicant to proceed with its development.[5]

(ee) Contractual Obligations

The entities most likely to violate FC s 24 are corporations in the mining, steel, forestry, construction, engineering and manufacturing sectors. Remedies in environmental dispute settlement will often, therefore, include contractual remedies. Contractual remedies traditionally include: (1) specific performance; (2) interdict; (3) declaration of rights; (4) cancellation; and (5) damages.

Here is but one example of how contractual claims can arise in an environmental context. In Grand Mines (Pty) Ltd v Giddey NO, the respondent, liquidator of Bercon, sued Grand Mines in terms of a contract.[6] The contract required Bercon to mine coal from a site owned by Grand Mines and then deliver it to Grand Mines. Bercon was, in turn, paid for the coal delivered. Bercon sued Grand Mines for not paying for all the delivered coal. Bercon was, however, under a contractual obligation to rehabilitate the site during the mining process. Bercon fell behind with the rehabilitation and did not fulfil its contractual obligations. Grand Mine's defence to the respondent's suit relied on the exceptio non adimpleti contractus. It maintained that Bercon's obligation to rehabilitate was reciprocal to its obligation to pay. Smalberger JA rejected the defence:

> notwithstanding the bilateral nature of their contract and the degree of interdependence between payment and rehabilitation, the parties could not have intended that they would be

[1] For more on declarations of rights in constitutional cases, see Bishop (supra) at §9.5*(b)*.
[2] 2001 (4) SA 1144 (C)('Myburg Park').
[3] Act 59 of 1959.
[4] Myburg Park (supra) at 1153A quoting Reinecke v Incorporated General Insurance Ltd 1974 (2) SA 84, 93A-C (A).
[5] Ibid at 1154C.
[6] 1999 (1) SA 960 (SCA).

reciprocal obligations in the strict sense … [Grand Mines]…could not raise the exceptio as the payment and rehabilitation were not reciprocal obligations.[1]

(ff) Delictual Damages

Delictual damages are awarded to a party based on the foundational principle that a wronged party should be placed in the position that person would have been in had the wrongful act not occurred. In environmental disputes, damages could take the form of eliminating immediate threats to the environment, emergency clean up or renewal operations, long-term clean up operations and addressing damage to natural resources. For instance, in Dews & Another v Simon's Town Municipality, the plaintiff's properties were damaged by 'contained' fires started by the respondent in good faith.[2] The respondent claimed to be exempt from liability in terms s 87 of the Forest Act.[3] The court issued judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.[4]

(gg) Constitutional remedies

As mentioned earlier, under FC s 24 and FC s 38, courts can declare laws, regulations or other measures invalid or unconstitutional. These provisions also empower courts to award damages, order interdicts or administrative remedies or issue a declaration of rights.[5] The relationship between constitutional remedies and their common-law and statutory counterparts is complicated.[6] In short, litigants should always rely first on non-constitutional remedies.[7] Only when those remedies are inadequate to protect the right to a healthy environment should litigants rely on FC s 38 to either expand the reach of the existing remedies or craft a brand new, purely constitutional remedy.

(hh) Costs

Section 32(2) of NEMA encourages the litigation of environmental cases by giving courts a discretion whether to award costs against an unsuccessful applicant. A court can decline to order costs if the applicant acted 'reasonably out of a concern for the public interest or in the interest of protecting the environment

[1] Ibid at 967D-G. See also Government of the Province of the Eastern Cape v Frontier Safaris (Pty) Ltd and Government of the Province of the Eastern Cape v Frontier Safaris (Pty) Ltd 1998 (2) SA 19 (SCA)(The government brought a special plea arguing that a contract that gave a private party control over a game reserve was void ab initio because it was contrary to legislation requiring the government to maintain control of the parks. The High Court rejected the argument on the grounds that the legislation was permissive and that the contract made clear that the government retained residual control.).

[2] 1991 (4) SA 479 (C).

[3] Act 122 of 1984.

[4] Other South African cases in which damages were awarded for harm to the environment include HL & H Timber Products (Pty) Ltd v Sappi Manufacturing (Pty) Ltd 2001(4) SA 814 (SCA); Johannesburg City Council v Television & Electrical Distributors ((Pty) Ltd 1997 (1) SA 157 (A); Louw & Others v Long 1990 (3) SA 45 (E); and Viljoen v Smith 1997 (1) SA 309 (A).

[5] For a detailed discussion of constitutional remedies see J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (2000) 154; M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop(eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[6] See Bishop (supra) at §9.2*(f)*.

[7] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), [1997] ZACC 6.

and had made due efforts to use other means reasonably available for obtaining the relief sought'. This statutory power reflects the general approach to costs in constitutional litigation.[1]

In Silvermine Valley Coalition v Sybrand Van der Spuy Boerdery & Others, Davis J decided not to award costs against the applicant non-governmental organisation ('NGO') that had failed to secure an interdict compelling the respondent to conduct an EIA.[2] Davis J wrote:

> The fact, however, remains that applicant had acted in the public interest, in terms of a reasonable interpretation of the regulations and, furthermore, after a failure on the part of the authorities to protect the precious environment within the Cape Peninsula. The manner in which this case has come before this Court is unfortunate. Had [the state] performed its environmental stewardship, it would not have been necessary for an NGO to have so acted. Unfortunately the manner in which this dispute has been placed before this Court leaves it with no other alternative than to rule on the basis of the relief sought. However, that does not mean that the Court should not exercise its discretion insofar as costs are concerned. In further support of this particular conclusion it seems to me that NGOs should not have unnecessary obstacles placed in their way when they act in a manner designed to hold the State and indeed the private community accountable to the constitutional commitments of our new society, which includes the protection of the environment.[3]

In contrast, the court in Eagles Landing Body Corporate v Molewa NO & Others decided not to waive costs against an unsuccessful applicant.[4] The High Court found that parties had not acted in the public interest in order to protect the environment, but had rather sought to protect their members' individual property interests.

The Constitutional Court — in Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others[5] — recently summarised the appropriate approach to costs in constitutional disputes and constructed clear principles to govern a court's discretion in such disputes. The High Court[6] had granted two adverse costs awards against Biowatch — an 'environmental watchdog'[7] — that was litigating in the public interest to obtain information about genetically modified organisms ('GMO'). The Registrar, Genetic Resources ('the Registrar'), the government authority responsible for the information, had denied Biowatch's request for information. Biowatch had no option but to sue. A company involved in GMO production, Monsanto, intervened in the litigation to prevent Biowatch from gaining access to confidential information held by the Registrar. Biowatch was largely successful in its application and secured access to eight out of 11 categories of information it sought (including the release of some information that Monsanto had attempted to block). However, because it felt that Biowatch had framed its request for information vaguely and ineptly, the High Court did not grant a costs order against the Registrar and [1] For a detailed discussion of costs in constitutional cases, see A Friedman & M Bishop 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS2, October 2010) Chapter 6.

[2] 2002 (1) SA 478 (C).

[3] Ibid at 493.

[4] 2003 (1) SA 412, 445 (T).

[5] [2009] ZACC 14 ('Biowatch').

[6] 2005 (4) SA 111 (T).

[7] Biowatch (supra) at para 2.

other governmental bodies involved. In addition, it ordered Biowatch to pay Monsanto's costs because the vague request for information by Biowatch had forced the company to intervene to protect its interests.

In a unanimous judgment authored by Sachs J, the Constitutional Court reversed both costs awards. First, Sachs J firmly rejected a suggestion by Biowatch that it should be treated differently because it was a public interest NGO:

> Equal protection under the law requires that costs awards not be dependent on whether the parties are acting in their own interests or in the public interest. Nor should they be determined by whether the parties are financially well-endowed or indigent or, as in the case of many NGOs, reliant on external funding. The primary consideration in constitutional litigation must be the way in which a costs order would hinder or promote the advancement of constitutional justice.[1]

In litigation between a private party and the state, the Constitutional Court re-asserted the general rule initially laid down in Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health:[2] if the private party wins, the government must pay its costs, but if the private party loses, each party should bear its own costs.[3] That rule was designed, primarily, so as not to discourage potential litigants from asserting constitutional claims. When it came to constitutional disputes between two private parties, Sachs J argued that constitutional disputes between private parties are 'far more likely to arise' as a result of the state's failure to regulate the relationship between private parties than as pure private disputes with no state involvement.[4] In these cases 'the dispute turns on whether the governmental agencies have failed adequately to fulfil their constitutional and statutory responsibilities.'[5] As the dispute in Biowatch suggests, this situation is particularly likely to arise in environmental disputes where government regulation is all but ubiquitous. Justice Sachs summarised the rule in these cases as follows:

> [T]he state should bear the costs of litigants who have been successful against it, and ordinarily there should be no costs orders against any private litigants who have become involved. This approach locates the risk for costs at the correct door — at the end of the day, it was the state that had control over its conduct.[6]

On the facts, Sachs J stressed that the dispute had not arisen from the conduct of either Biowatch or Monsanto, but from the state's failure to regulate the dispute.[7] He therefore ordered the state to pay Biowatch's costs and Monsanto to bear its own costs. The Biowatch principles ensure that all people or groups with legitimate concerns about harm to the environment can litigate to prevent or remedy without the fear of adverse costs orders.

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 16.
[2] 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC), [2005] ZACC 3 at para 138.
[3] Biowatch (supra) at para 21.
[4] Ibid at para 28.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at para 56.
[7] Ibid at para 59.

51 Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons

Frank Snyckers and Jolandi le Roux

51.1 A framework for criminal procedure rights 51–1
(a) General 51–1
(i) Introduction 51–1
(ii) The due process wall 51–1
(iii) Substantive due process and criminal process 51–8
(iv) Fair trial seepage 51–13
(v) Maintaining the wall 51–17
(b) Interpretation of FC s 35 51–20
(i) General 51–20
(ii) Abdication 51–20
(iii) The common law and FC s 35 51–24
(iv) Limitation 51–30
51.2 'Arrested', 'detained' and 'accused' persons 51–38
51.3 Rights of detained persons 51–46
(a) The right to receive required information in a language one understands 51–46
(b) The right to be informed promptly of the reason for being detained 51–48
(c) The right to conditions of detention consistent with human dignity 51–49
(d) Communication and visitation rights 51–53

(e) The right to challenge the lawfulness of detention 51–54
(f) The right to counsel 51–56
(g) Remedies of detainees 51–68
51.4 The rights of arrested persons 51–70
(a) Statutory lawfulness. 51–70
(b) Silence and self-incrimination 51–71
(i) The seamless web 51–71
(ii) The right to remain silent. 51–73
(iii) The right against compelled self -incrimination 51–79
(c) The right to be brought before a court 51–85
(d) The right to be released (bail). 51–88
51.5 The rights of accused persons 51–100
(a) Introduction 51–100
(b) The right to a fair trial. 51–100
(c) The right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge 51–108
(d) The right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence 51–113
(e) The right to a public trial before an ordinary court. 51–114
(i) Ordinary courts and impartiality 51–114
(ii) The right to a public trial 51–120
(f) The right to a trial within a reasonable time. 51–123
(g) The right to be present when being tried. 51–134
(h) The right to counsel 51–136
(i) The right to be presumed innocent. 51–144
(j) Silence and self-incrimination at trial 51–148
(i) Silence and self-incrimination, and the presumption of innocence 51–148
(ii) The right to silence at trial 51–149
(iii) Self-incrimination at trial 51–153
(k) The right to adduce evidence and challenge evidence . . . 51–160
(l) The right to be tried in a language which one understands 51–167
(m) Retroactivity 51–170
(n) Ne bis in idem (double-jeopardy) 51–173
(o) The right to appeal or review. 51–181

51.1 A Framework for Criminal Procedure Rights

(a) General

(i) Introduction

FC s 35 sets out the rights of arrested, detained and accused persons.[1] These sections are therefore not limited to 'criminal procedure', but relate as well to the rights of detainees who are not arrested for criminal prosecution.[2]

In the pre-constitutional era, due process of law in the criminal sphere was regulated by the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act[3] and by a body of common law principles constituting the procedural safeguards upon which an individual could rely as he or she passed through the criminal justice system. As far as internationally recognized rights of detainees were concerned, the process in pre-constitutional days was often far from 'due'.[4] Part of the challenge of interpreting FC s 35, and one which has much troubled the courts, is determining to what extent the constitutionalization of criminal procedure rights should be regarded as having established rights which went unrecognized before, or as having imbued existing common law principles or statutory safeguards with new content, or as having merely accorded entrenched status to familiar principles and safeguards.[5]

(ii) The due process wall

The reference to 'due process' as the rubric for criminal procedure rights introduces the problem of the proper conceptual and structural framework for

* The authors would like to thank Michael Bishop, Theunis Roux, Anthony Stein and Stu Woolman for their editorial assistance with this chapter.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('FC' or Final Constitution'). See also Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or Interim Constitution') s 25.

[2] Under the European Convention on Human Rights art 5, for example, lawful reasons for detention are conviction, arrest for non-compliance with a court order or to secure the fulfilment of a legal obligation, arrest on suspicion of having committed an offence, or when reasonably necessary to prevent the commission of an offence or to prevent flight after commission, the detention of minors for educational supervision or to be tried, the prevention of disease, the detention of the insane, alcoholics, drug addicts or vagrants, and the detention of illegal immigrants or those to be deported or extradited. The Constitutional Court has rejected the contention, under FC s 12, that the only 'just cause' for which a person could be imprisoned was the prevention or punishment of crime or possibly 'in the broader sense' where necessary for the maintenance of law and order, but not for any other non-punitive coercion. De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at paras 10-11 and 29-41.

[3] Act 51 of 1977

[4] See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

[5] See § 51.1*(b)*(iii) infra. See also L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 3.

criminal justice rights in the South African constitutional context. The criminal justice process constitutes an interference with the liberty of the subject by the state — from the framing of laws prohibiting conduct, to the arrest and detention of suspects, to the process of determining guilt, to passing and enforcing sentence, up to the restoration of the subject's liberty, either upon acquittal, or after the setting aside of a conviction, or after service of sentence, or on parole. It would seem, then, that FC s 35 should be regarded as a specific instance of the right to freedom and security of the person, FC s 12, which includes the right not to be detained without trial. FC s 12 also embraces the right not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause.[1]

If this were the approach adopted by our courts, FC s 12 would assume the character and status of a generic and residual due process right, which would operate independently and would inform the interpretation of all the rights contained in FC s 35. Recourse to American 'due process' and Canadian 'fundamental justice' jurisprudence would then be based upon a structural and conceptual similarity in analytical processes. South African courts could have then allowed for the transplantation of persuasive doctrines and principles with relatively little scope for foundational confusion. Furthermore, such common law rights or safeguards as were based upon this conceptual structure would then be easily assimilated into analyses of constitutional criminal procedure rights. It is therefore of cardinal importance to stress that the Constitutional Court has navigated, perhaps decisively, away from the course set out above. The cumulative effect of the judgments of the court in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others,[2] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others,[3] and De Lange v Smuts NO & Others[4] is to erect a conceptual wall between the right not to be arbitrarily deprived of liberty (FC s 12) and the rights of persons once detained, arrested or accused (FC s 35). This wall prevents 'due process' seepage from FC s 12 to FC s 35 respectively.[5]

In order to understand the different structural relationships pertaining to criminal procedure rights and to due process deprivation of liberty in the South African constitutional framework, a brief look at the conceptual framework of 'due process', and at the relationship between liberty deprivation and criminal procedure rights, in the United States, Canada and Europe is warranted.

In the United States, where 'due process' constitutional jurisprudence was born, the relevant conceptual framework that has developed over the years can

[1] FC s 12(1)(a).
[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira').
[3] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel').
[4] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange').
[5] For more on the analytical problems relating to the degree of 'substantive due process' and of qualification implied in the right to freedom and security of the person, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

be attributed mainly to two factors: first, the fact that there is no general right to a 'fair trial' in any of the enumerated rights contained in the Bill of Rights requires 'due process' seepage from the Fifth or the Fourteenth Amendments into the enumerated rights pertaining to the criminal process contained in the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments in order that a general or residual fair trial right may operate around or within these latter Amendments. Secondly, the complicated interplay between the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, and the consequences for state, as opposed to federal, liability for interpreting the 'due process' clause with 'independent potency',[1] cannot be underestimated as a factor which is as important to American due process jurisprudence as it is idiosyncratic.[2]

In Canada, as in South Africa, there is a general 'fair trial' provision, albeit one less obviously accorded residual status than its South African counterpart. It is contained within a specifically enumerated 'fair trial' right, the right to be presumed innocent.[3] Nevertheless, the Canadian courts have opted for 'due process' seepage from the provision in the Charter relating to deprivations of liberty 'in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice' (s 7) to the specifically enumerated criminal procedure rights found in ss 10 and 11 of the Charter. In other words, the Canadian equivalent to FC s 12(1)(a) is allowed to operate as a general 'due process' provision, with residual operation in the sphere of fair trial rights. In Re BC Motor Vehicle Act Lamer J held that the enumerated criminal justice rights in ss 8–14 of the Canadian Charter were merely 'illustrative' of the generic due process right contained in s 7.[4]

Now, it may well be said that a provision requiring procedure according to the 'principles of fundamental justice' is more conducive to being interpreted as a generic or residual due process right to operate 'with independent potency' than one which either lays down no express procedural requirement at all (the right to freedom and security of the person in FC s 12) or refers merely to a 'trial' (the right not to be detained without trial in FC s 12(1)(b)), or modestly prohibits deprivation of freedom 'arbitrarily or without just cause' (FC s 12(1)(a)). Furthermore, the 'fundamental justice' formulation is clearly more readily afforded the dimension of 'substantive due process' than are its South African counterparts.[5]

Given the extent to which Canadian courts have allowed the due process right contained in the 'fundamental justice' provision in s 7 of the Canadian Charter to determine the ambit of residual or unenumerated aspects of the right to a fair

[1] See Adamson v California 332 US 46, 66 (1947).

[2] See, generally, JH Israel, Y Kamisar & WR LaFave Criminal Procedure and the Constitution: Leading Supreme Court Cases and Introductory Text (1989).

[3] Section 11*(d)* of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives any person charged with an offence the right 'to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent tribunal'.

[4] [1985] 2 SCR 486, 502ff.

[5] For a detailed discussion of 'substantive due process', and the degree of substantive due process afforded by FC s 12, see Bishop & Woolman 'Freedom & Security of the Person' (supra) at § 40.1*(b)*.

trial, it is not surprising that the courts and commentators seem pressed to find any separate raison d'être for the general fair trial right contained in s 11*(d).[1] Peter Hogg does point out that the residual fundamental justice right operates only when life, liberty or property is at stake, and hence affords general fair trial rights only in cases where imprisonment is a competent sentence. As a result, the general fair trial right contained in s 11(d)* operates in other criminal cases.[2]

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms possesses an analytical structure that closely resembles FC s 35 combined with FC s 12. Here, the general right to a fair trial, contained in article 6, is separated from the right not to be arbitrarily deprived of liberty in article 5. However, the latter right is combined with the rights of detained and arrested persons, leaving article 6 to deal only with fair trial rights.[3] The general fair trial right in article 6(1) is not confined to criminal charges, and reads: '. . . [I]n the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing.'[4] Although the specifically enumerated fair trial rights in article 6 are not stipulated as being included under the right to a fair hearing, they are preceded, apart from the presumption of innocence (article 6(2)), by the stipulation that 'everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights' (article 6(3)). The Convention organs have held the 'fair trial' concept to imply unenumerated components – and in this respect the analysis is on all fours with that which obtains in South Africa.[5] So although the article 6 fair trial right

[1] See PW Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992, 1996 supplement) § 48.5*(c)* and § 44.16; D Stratas The Charter of Rights in Litigation: Direction from the Supreme Court of Canada (No 19, August 1997) § 29.

[2] Hogg (supra) at § 44.10*(a)*. This is a strange argument. It concentrates exclusively on the ultimate sentence in determining whether there is a deprivation of liberty. The reasoning seems at odds with the philosophy behind due process seepage in the first place. The coercive process — the criminal process, from arrest or detention to ultimate release — is the paradigmatic deprivation of liberty that requires due process. As Lamer J put it in Re ss 193 and 195.1 of Criminal Code, 'the restrictions on liberty and security of the person that s 7 is concerned with are those that occur as a result of an individual's interaction with the justice system, and its administration'. [1990] 1 SCR 1123, 1173. The resolution of this problem lies beyond the scope of this section. See, generally, Bishop & Woolman 'Freedom & Security of the Persons' (supra) at § 40.1 and 40.2

[3] Robertson and Merrills are at pains to 'distinguish' art 5 rights from fair trial rights. See AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 72 and 74. See also JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 69 ('Art 5 'is at a number of important points linked closely with . . . in particular Article 6, so that it cannot be examined in isolation'.)

[4] For detailed examination of the scope of article 6 regarding proceedings and penalties to which it relates, see S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 1-39.

[5] See Barberá, Messegué and Jabardo v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360 (Illustrates the manner in which the European Court has given effect to a residual operation of the 'fair trial' concept in art 6 jurisprudence. See, generally, Stavros (supra) at 42ff. For the South African take on the subject, see S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 16 (The right to a fair trial was held to be 'broader' than the list of specific fair trial rights listed under it. This interpretation is rendered compulsory by the provision FC s 35(3) that the right to a fair trial 'includes' the specific rights which follow.)

does not apply only to criminal proceedings, from the point of view of criminal procedure, article 5 rights and article 6 rights are to be distinguished on the grounds that they apply to different stages of the criminal process. Once again, the analytical structure of the European Convention resembles that of the South African criminal process rights. However, the fact that the due process right relating to the deprivation of liberty occurs with the rights of detained and arrested persons in article 5 means that due process is able to operate as a residual principle operating with respect to the rights of arrested and detained persons.[1] This phenomenon is absent from the South African framework.

Article 5 'due process' is secured by the interpretation of the phrase 'prescribed by law' as a term of art: the law in question must be 'adequately accessible' and 'formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct'.[2] Furthermore, it is not enough to show that the procedural and substantive rules of domestic law have been applied where these rules have resulted in arbitrary deprivation of liberty.[3] The law must also conform to the Convention's own standards: for example it must be a 'fair and proper procedure', be free from arbitrariness, and be carried out by 'an appropriate authority'.[4] This is, however, 'substantive due process' only in the weaker sense of requiring the law in question to possess certain minimum attributes. These attributes are in turn of a procedural nature or reflect the requirements of the rule of law. They do not reflect 'substantive due process' in the stronger sense of prohibiting certain kinds of criminal laws because their substantive content is thought to infringe a fundamental freedom.

The result of the different attitude of the Canadian courts to due process seepage into the fair trial sphere is that Canadian courts may deal more easily with the relationship between substantive liberty questions and the right to a fair trial than South African courts can. Those principles that flow from an analysis based on the concept of liberty, and which seem to underlie certain residual or potential aspects of the right to a fair trial, may be applied by Canadian courts in the fair trial context as part of an interpretation of the general due process right contained in the 'principles of fundamental justice' without engendering the sacrifice of conceptual coherence. In the South African context, on the other hand, analyses of fair trial principles will find themselves colliding with the conceptual wall erected between freedom rights and criminal procedure rights every time the

[1] See De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1971) 4 EHRR 443 at paras 66 and 76.

[2] See Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245 at para 49 (Court interprets the phrase for the purposes of the right to freedom of expression contained in article 10.) For more on the meaning of 'prescribed by law', and the South African equivalent, 'law of general application', see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] See Bouamar v Belgium (1988) 11 EHRR 1 at para 47; R Beddard Human Rights and Europe (3rd Edition, 1993) 132.

[4] See Winterwerp v Netherlands (1980) 2 EHRR 245 at para 46; Robertson & Merrills (supra) at 60.

analysis is framed in terms of the right to freedom from unjustifiable interference. Furthermore, once a matter has been understood to raise a fair trial question, the Constitutional Court has also accorded the fair trial provision a measure of 'pre-emptive' effect by rejecting recourse to a general right contained elsewhere.[1]

The courts have often not been particularly concerned with this problem of conceptual foundations, and have at times based their reasoning, in the context of IC s 25, squarely upon principles of liberty and due process, thereby smuggling some due process jurisprudence through cracks in the Ferreira and Nel wall.[2] In Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another, the foundations of the right to a trial within a reasonable time after being charged were discussed in terms of liberty.[3] This liberty foundation beneath the right to pass through the criminal justice system within a reasonable period was the sole pivot around which the court in S v Manyonyo constructed its reasoning in deciding whether there had been unreasonable delay in the review of a sentence.[4] The Manyonyo court relied exclusively on common law material, all of which was framed in terms of the liberty of the individual.[5]

In Msomi v Attorney-General, Natal, & Others, the court decided a question involving the taking of fingerprints without consent in terms of the right against self-incrimination contained in IC s 25(3)(d), rather than in terms of IC s 11, but relied on Canadian seepage jurisprudence relating to the 'principles of fundamental justice' to hold that there was no violation of the right against self-incrimination.[6] Its rejection of a possible argument in terms of IC s 11 ostensibly endorsed the views of Claassen J in S v Huma & Another.[7] However, Huma did not consider the freedom component of IC s 11 at all. Huma entertained an argument on IC s 11 only as far as the provision relating to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment (IC s 11(2)) was concerned, and not surprisingly rejected the challenge in

[1] See Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC) at para 34 (The court held the problem of docket privilege to be a fair trial question, rather than an access to information question, and that, once the fair trial question had been answered, it was 'difficult to see how s 23 [could] take the matter any further'.)

[2] In Ferreira itself, Chaskalson P, although expressly rejecting the idea that IC s 11(1) contained a residual fair trial right,, nevertheless held that the due process analysis carried out by Ackermann J in terms of IC s 11(1) at para 79 could 'in substance' be applied to an analysis under IC s 25(3). Ferreira (supra) at para 186.

[3] 1996 (7) BCLR 947, 961, 964 (B), 1996 (1) SACR 675 (B).

[4] 1996 (11) BCLR 1463 (E)('Manyonyo').

[5] See S v Letsin 1963 (1) SA 60, 61 (O), cited with approval in Manyonyo (supra) at 1465–6 ('[D]it [is] een van die hoogste roepinge van ons howe … om toe te sien dat die vryheid van die individu … gewaarborg sal word. Dit is 'n ingrypende aantasting van individuele vryheid om 'n persoon in die gevangenis te laat aanhou … en die indruk moet nooit geskep word dat ons howe onverskillig staan teenoor die vryheid van die individu nie.') See also S v Ramuongiwa 1997 (2) BCLR 268, 270 (V), referring to the dictum in the Indian case of Maneka Gandhi v Union of India (1978) AIR SC 597 ('Procedural safeguards are the indispensable essence of liberty. In fact, the history of personal liberty is largely the history of procedural safeguards.')

[6] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N).

[7] 1996 (1) SA 232 (W).

that regard. It is therefore quite striking to find an obiter remark in the judgment of Grobbelaar J in S v Vilakazi en 'n Ander to the effect that the learned judge could not think of an example which entailed a greater infringement of a suspect's innocence and resulting constitutional rights ('onskuld en gevolglike konstitutionele regte') than the improper taking of a fingerprint.[1] How exactly the suspect's innocence would be infringed and which rights would be affected does not emerge from this dictum. It is would appear that the learned judge had in mind some relation between the presumption of innocence and unlawful interference with liberty. That the extension of due process rights in an area such as the fingerprinting context requires liberty analysis seems to be a very compelling supposition. But the Constitutional Court's due process wall does not permit conceptual clarity in this sort of case. Similarly, the link between the 'right not to assist the state's case' and the 'right to freedom' was recognized in S v Mathebula & Another. However the recognition of the link was ultimately grounded in the accused's right to a fair trial.[2]

The most forthright recognition of the inextricable link between a liberty interest and the presumption of innocence occurred in Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa & Others, where Pickering J declared:

> In my view it is clearly unconstitutional to deprive a person of his liberty upon proof merely on a balance of probabilities.[3]

Uncedo Taxi Service vaults over the due process wall in the most bizarre fashion. The possibility of imprisonment on notice of motion in contempt proceedings was seen as a liberty problem under FC s 12. Instead of determining that the respondent in such proceedings was an 'accused person' for the purposes of FC s 35(3), Pickering J held that the principles underlying FC s 35(3) were relevant to the FC s 36 limitations analysis of the impairment of FC s 12.[4] In this way, fair trial principles can always be rendered applicable to FC s 12 problems. This solution, albeit attractive, does violence to the scheme of rights as set out in FC ss 12 and 35. In any event, it demands that FC s 35(3) apply to liberty analysis only after a finding that FC s 12 has actually been violated, ie at the limitation stage. The logical conclusion of such an approach would eventually drain FC s 12 of its independent content. Still, the approach suggested itself to the court because due process rights are tradtionally understood to be rights that engage the state's regulation of and interference with liberty. A similar example of the difficulty

[1] 1996 (1) SACR 425, 429 (T)('Vilakazi').

[2] 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 147 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W). See § 51.4*(b)* infra.

[3] 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683, 692D (E)('Uncedo'). Of course, this finding contains an additional premise: the presumption of innocence requires not only a burden of proof upon the prosecution but also a particular standard of proof, namely proof beyond reasonable doubt.

[4] The Zimbabwean Supreme Court cited Uncedo with approval in In re Chinamasa. 2001 (2) SA 902, 921E-922F (ZS). The Court used Uncedo to support a finding that contempt proceedings attracted such fair trial protections as the right to be tried by an impartial tribunal. Put differently, Uncedo grounded, what would, in South Africa parlance, be a finding that the person on trial was an 'accused person' in terms of FC s 35.

of heeding the existence of the due process wall occurred in De Lange v Smuts NO & Others.[1] Ackermann J, having helped to entrench the wall, noted that the requirement of an 'ordinary court' for hearings which might lead to imprisonment for criminal offences. He then reasoned that this requirement was an indication that only courts of law were 'appropriate' tribunals for proceedings that might lead to incarceration outside the criminal sphere.[2]

Of course, the issue of the onus (or default position) in the granting of bail – arguably the most important difference between FC s 35 and IC s 25 – can hardly be properly analysed without doing violence to the Ferreira and Nel due process wall.[3] The same can be said of the habeas corpus provision in IC s 25(1)(e) and FC s 35(2)(d).[4] The Free State Provincial Division's rejection of the burden placed on an accused by s 60(11) of the Criminal Procedure Act as 'out of place' in a democratic constitutional regime was, unsurprisingly, built exclusively upon liberty analysis. In defense of its defiance of the due process wall, the High Court in Ramokhosi wrote:

> Dit word algemeen aanvaar en spreek eintlik vanself dat die vryheidsontneming van 'n onveroordeelde persoon weens arrestasie neerkom op 'n ernstige en drastiese inbreukmaking van 'n fundamentele reg. [5]

Such defiance is all the more noteworthy since the Constitutional Court, when certifying the new bail provision contained in FC s 35(1)(f), failed to undertake any form of a liberty analysis in its summary rejection of the challenge to the onus aspect of the right.[6]

(iii) Substantive due process and criminal procedure rights

The relationship between liberty rights and the enumerated criminal procedure rights is put under particular strain in the determination of fair trial or due process questions that contain a strong 'substantive' dimension. The due process wall would, strictly speaking, require objections to the substantive content of criminal provisions to be framed in terms of the infringement of other substantive rights, or in terms of whatever succour might be found in the residual right to liberty contained in FC s 12.[7]

The most striking illustration of this problem occurred in the Constitutional Court's decision in S v Coetzee & Others.[8] The relevant question for our purposes

[1] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange').
[2] Ibid at para 74. The hidden premise of this reasoning is incompatible with the due process wall.
[3] See § 51.4*(d)* infra.
[4] See § 51.3*(e)* infra.
[5] Prokureur-Generaal Vrystaat v Ramokhosi 1996 (11) BCLR 1514, 1524 (O), 1997 (1) SACR 127 (O).
[6] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 88.
[7] See Bishop & Woolman (supra) at § 40.1 and § 40.2. See also De Lange (supra) at paras 22–5.
[8] 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC)('Coetzee'). As far as its IC s 11 and FC s 12 significance is concerned, see Bishop & Woolman (supra) at §§ 40.3*(c)*(ii).

was whether a provision for vicarious criminal liability by an agent of a company for criminal acts of the company –which provided that such liability attached 'unless it [was] proved that he did not take part in the commission of the offence and that he could not have prevented it' — was an infringement of the presumption of innocence, an unlawful interference with liberty, or neither.[1] If the question were framed as a 'reverse onus' question, then the analysis could be confined to the fair trial right to be presumed innocent contained in IC s 25(3)(c) (now FC s 35(3)(b).) This approach required regarding the attribution of liability as a separate criminal offence, guilt or innocence of which would require proof, and such proof would require an onus. If the question were considered in terms of the substantive dimension, it would entail asking whether attribution of criminal liability for someone else's undoubtedly criminal act was constitutionally objectionable. This mode of analysis would then move one into the waters of strict liability and the relationship between mens rea principles and liberty. The interesting thing about the minority judgment of Kentridge AJ is that it opted irrevocably for the latter course. It regarded the addition of a defence, not as bringing the matter back into the world of the reverse onus and IC s 25, but as saving the liability in question from being strict.[2] In this way Kentridge AJ managed to stay on one side of the conceptual wall, but was perhaps thereby prevented from seeing how the IC s 25 question is inextricably bound up with the IC s 11 question.[3]

[1] Section 332(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[2] Coetzee (supra) at para 85ff.

[3] See S v Meaker 1998 (8) BCLR 1038 (W), 1998 (2) SACR 73, 83I–85C (W). In Meaker the state sought to argue that s 130 of the Road Traffic Act 29 of 1989, which presumed the owner of a vehicle photographed while speeding to have been the driver, did not contain a reverse onus, since the state had to prove the offence (speeding), after which the identity of the offender was presumed. In effect, this was Kentridge AJ's argument in another form. Cameron J rejected this argument on the authority of Coetzee. See Osman & Another v Attorney-General of Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC)('Osman'). Osman involved a similar conceptual puzzle. The peculiar offence of being unable to provide a satisfactory explanation for possessing goods reasonably suspected of being stolen, created by s 36 of Act 62 of 1955, was challenged as violating the right to silence, the right against compelled self-incrimination, and the presumption of innocence. See § 51.4*(b)*(iii) infra. The court a quo analysed the offence exclusively in terms of the right to silence and against compelled self-incrimination. 1998 (2) BCLR 165 (T), 1998 (1) SACR 28 (T). The Constitutional Court did consider the possibility that a reverse onus was at stake, but rejected the argument on the ground that the inability to explain was clearly an element of the offence that the prosecution had to prove beyond reasonable doubt. Osman (supra) at para 16. But every reverse onus can be rewritten into an element of a substantive offence and essentially achieve the same result. If the legislature had provided that one who was in possession of goods reasonably suspected of being stolen would be presumed to have been harbouring stolen goods unless he or she could provide a satisfactory account of such possession, then the case would simply have been another reverse onus case. It was, after all, the difficulty of proving that those who possessed goods reasonably suspected of being stolen were harbouring stolen goods that lay behind fashioning the odd offence of being unable to explain one's position. The law is not aimed at those who are unable to explain. It is aimed at thieves and fences. Similar reasoning lay behind the court's reasoning in S v Zondo. 1999 (3) BCLR 316 (N). It found that the offence contained in s 82 of the same Act, of being in possession of housebreaking equipment and unable to explain why, did not cast an onus on the accused, but merely an evidentiary burden, which — unlike the burden struck down in Scagell & Others v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC) — was activated only once the state had proved a prima facie case against the accused. Again the substance of the offence was clouded by its statutory form.

The problem of accommodating substantive due process under the fair trial rights arose again in S v Lavhengwa.[1] The problem, for present purposes, was the proper basis for a challenge to the substantive aspects of the crime of contempt in facie curiae. The court rejected the position put forward in the writing of Professor J M T Labuschagne: namely, that that there was no necessity for the crime. It did so based upon the 'weight of authority' (in the common law) in favour of the existence of the crime.[2] The court ignored the liberty implications behind the challenge and concerned itself entirely with the procedural aspects of the summary conviction peculiar to this offence. The portion of Labuschagne's argument cited by the court is framed in terms of liberty — if other crimes cover all possible excesses, and no other crime is being committed, why criminalize the conduct in question?[3] One further objection which might have been directed against the substantive content of the crime of contempt in facie curiae is the 'chilling' effect the existence of such an offence may have on the vigorous defence by counsel of their clients' fair trial rights. It may be argued, then, that the Damoclean sword of contempt in facie curiae threatens not so much the right of the legal representative as that of the client. In this way a substantive due process liberty problem for one individual becomes a procedural due process fair trial problem for another.

The difference between substantive and procedural questions in Lavhengwa did not end there. The question whether the offence of contempt was excessively vaguely framed in the statute — another charge levelled at the offence by Labuschagne[4] — was dealt with under the fair trial right 'to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge', contained in IC s 25(3)(b). The requirement of certainty in criminal offences is one of the traditional requirements of the rule of law. It straddles the divide between substantive and procedural due process — affecting the content of a provision, as opposed to merely its enforcement, but not reaching all the way into its merits. The fact that it was termed part of 'the first essential of due process of law' in the American decision of Connolly v General Construction Co,[5] cited with apparent approval and as authority by the court in Lavhengwa,[6] does not tell one whether the substantive aspect or the procedural aspect of due process is thereby invoked. And it certainly does not fit in comfortably with the Lavhengwa court's analysis in terms of the right of an accused person

[1] 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W)('Lavhengwa').

[2] Ibid at 472–75.

[3] For the application of similar reasoning in the sphere of free assembly, see Beatty v Gilbanks (1882) 9 QBD 308. See also In Re Chinamasa 2001 (2) SA 902 (ZS)('Chinamasa')(The Zimbabwean Supreme Court was confronted with the offence of contempt ex facie curiae. It relied on, and endorsed, the Lavhengwa assessment, but had, earlier in the judgement analysed the question of the propriety of the existence of the offence in terms of liberty (free speech).)

[4] See Lavhengwa (supra) at 476 (Provision in question was s 108(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 32 of 1944, and the view of Labuschagne that the offence is 'seker die misdaad met die vaagste inhoud wat aan my bekend is' is quoted.)

[5] 269 US 385, 391 (1926).

[6] Lavhengwa (supra) at 484.

to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge. The vagueness of the offence and the vagueness of the charge are very different things, and it is not difficult to conceive of an immaculately formulated charge indicating with fastidious precision exactly how one has breached a very unsatisfactorily vague offence. The peculiar phenomenon of summary conviction for contempt in facie curiae obscures this distinction. This reasoning informed the following finding in Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa & Others regarding contempt ex facie curiae:

> A wide range of conduct may fall within the ambit of contempt of court ex facie curiae . . .. It does not follow therefrom, however, that the 'charge' against the offender cannot be formulated with sufficient clarity and certainty in the affidavits filed in support of the summary procedure. Once the details of the alleged contempt have been so specified the requirement entrenched in section 35(3)(a) will have been met.[1]

In S v Mamabolo (ETV and Others Intervening), the Constitutional Court drew a clear and timely distinction between the substantive and procedural aspects entailed by the offence of contempt ex facie curiae.[2] It analyzed the question of the desirability of the existence of the offence in terms of liberty (FC s 16's protection of free speech),[3] and rejected the inquisitorial aspects of the procedure on the basis of repugnance with the provisions of FC s 35.[4] It may be noted that part of the reasoning was based on the fact that contempt ex facie curiae concerned comment outside of, and after, the proceedings in question, and therefore had no disruptive effect on the proceedings that might warrant special procedures.[5] Whether the analysis would be applicable to the offence of contempt in facie curiae was therefore left an open question.[6] In S v Singo, the summary procedures found in section 72(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act, which deal with an accused who fails to appear, were expressly distinguished from the situation that obtained in Mamabolo.[7] Moreover, decisive consideration was given to the distinction drawn in Mamabolo between an offence that deals with conduct outside the ambit of, and merely pertaining to, court proceedings, on the one hand, and mechanisms to address disruptions to the court's proceedings, on the other hand.[8] The assessment in

[1] 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683, 690A–B (E).

[2] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC)('Mamabolo').

[3] The treatment in the Zimbabwean Supreme Court in Chinamasa was endorsed wholeheartedly as 'lucid and exhaustive' and the observation made that anything beyond adoption would be supererogatory. Ibid at para 20

[4] Mamabolo (supra) at paras 51 to 59. For further treatment of the offence of contempt ex facie curiae, see S v Bresler 2002 (2) SACR 18 (C).

[5] Mamabolo (supra) at para 52.

