(1) Members of a provincial legislature may apply to the Constitutional Court for an order declaring that all or part of a provincial Act is unconstitutional. (2) An application (a) must be supported by at least 20 per cent of the members of the legislature; and (b) must be made within 30 days of the date on which the Premier assented to and signed the Act. (3) The Constitutional Court may order that all or part of an Act that is the subject of an application in terms of subsection (1) has no force until the Court has decided the application if (a) the interests of justice require this; and (b) the application has a reasonable prospect of success. (4) If an application is unsuccessful, and did not have a reasonable prospect of success, the Constitutional Court may order the applicants to pay costs.

[2] In Re: The Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC).

[3] Under the Interim Constitution, the Supreme Court — now the High Court — could hear applications for abstract review of a provincial Bill. See IC s 101(3)(e). Under the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court possesses exclusive jurisdiction over an application by the Premier for abstract review of provincial Bills. See FC s 167(4)(b).

[4] FC s 122(3). For the meaning of 'reasonable prospects of success' and 'in the interests of justice', see, generally, MEC for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC); S v Pennington 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC); S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 277 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC). See also J Klaaren, M Chaskalson & S Budlender 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, October 2005) Chapter 9.

19.7 Powers and Privileges of Provincial Legislatures[1]

(a) Control over the internal proceedings

FC s 116 confers on provincial legislatures the power to control their internal arrangements. This power is constrained by other provisions of the Final Constitution, in particular FC ss 116(1)(b) and 118*(a)*. These provisions oblige provincial legislatures to facilitate public involvement in their processes and to conduct their business openly. While legislatures may regulate public and media access to their proceedings, the general public and the media may be excluded from the proceedings of the committees of the legislatures only when it is reasonable and justifiable.[2] Exercise of the power conferred by FC s 116 is subject to the Bill of Rights.[3]

(b) Rules and orders

Legislatures have the power to make rules and orders concerning the conduct of their business.[4] The Final Constitution constrains this power in two primary ways. First, the rules and order must pay due regard to such imperatives as representative and participatory democracy, accountability, transparency, and public involvement.[5] Secondly, FC s 116(2) prescribes constitutionally-mandated content for the rules and orders. The rules and orders of legislatures must provide for the establishment of committees[6] and for the participation of minority parties in parliamentary proceedings in a manner consistent with democracy.[7] The rules of the legislatures must recognize a role for the leader of the opposition[8] and must ensure that all parties represented in the legislature are given sufficient financial and administrative assistance to operate effectively in the legislature.[9]

(c) Privilege

FC s 117 provides that MPLs and the province's permanent delegates to the NCOP have freedom of speech in the legislatures, subject to the legislatures' rules and orders, and may not be held criminally or civilly liable for any statements made therein.[10] Although provincial legislatures are not expressly directed

[1] FC ss 114, 115, 116, 117 and 118. See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17 (Discussion of this matter in relation to Parliament applies equally to provincial legislatures.)

[2] FC s 118(2).

[3] On the extent to which the exercise of such power is subject to the direct application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.5.

[4] FC s 116(1)(b).

[5] FC s 116(1)(b).

[6] FC s 116(2)(a).

[7] FC s 116(2)(b).

[8] FC s 116(2)(d.)

[9] FC s 116(2)(c).

[10] See De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 929 (C)(Rules and orders of the National Assembly subject to guarantees of freedom of speech.)

by the Final Constitution to promulgate legislation on the powers, privileges and immunities of members of their provincial legislatures, various provincial legislatures have done so.[1] Given that FC s 117(2) provides that other additional privileges and immunities of a provincial legislature and its members are to be prescribed by national legislation, and that the Powers, Privileges and Immunities Act was enacted pursuant to this provision, the provisions in extant provincial legislation on the subject of privilege are probably constitutionally infirm.[2]

(d) Public participation and petitions

Public participation in the legislative process is a constitutional obligation.[3] Effective public involvement enhances representative democracy and secures the benefits of compensatory legitimation that attend to such relatively innocuous grants of power.[4] Many provincial legislative committees encourage this particular form of participatory democracy through open days, public hearings, and submissions on specific bills.[5] Petitions constitute another particularly important form of direct democracy in South Africa.[6] The value of these pre-promulgation forms of participation would be greatly enhanced by post-enactment hearings to evaluate the impact of legislation.[7]

[1] See, eg, Powers, Privileges and Immunities of the Free State Provincial Legislature Act 12 of 1996, Powers, Privileges and Immunities of the Gauteng Provincial Legislature Act 2 of 1995, North-West Provincial Legislature's Powers, Privileges and Immunities Act 5 of 1994 and Powers and Privileges of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature Act 3 of 1995.

[2] Act 4 of 2004. However, those provisions in provincial legislation that determine the procedures for, say, a summons fall within the competence of provincial legislatures and are surely valid. Correspondence with Christina Murray (25 July 2005).

[3] FC s 118.

[4] See T Rapoo 'Reflections on Provincial Government in South Africa since 1994' in Y Muthien, M Khosa & B Magubane Democracy and Governance Review: Mandela's Legacy 1994–1999 (2000) 101–102.

[5] Murray & Nijzink (supra) at 65 ('[I]n KwaZulu-Natal and Gauteng, for instance, closed meetings are rare . . . [I]n some provinces, however, the exclusion of the public is more routine — in some cases probably in violation of the Constitution').

[6] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 43 (Definition of 'petition' under FC s 17.) The restrictive approach to 'petition' in the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature Rules — rule 141 and rule 148(2)(f) — permits submission of a petition only when all other legal avenues for relief have been exhausted by a petitioner. These rules appear to be constitutionally infirm. The Gauteng Petitions Act is substantially more generous. Act 14 of 1998. It defines a 'petitioner' as a natural or juristic person acting: (a) on his or her or its interests; or (b) in the interest of another person who is not in a position to seek relief in his or her or its own name; or (c) as a member of or in the interest of a group or class of persons; or (d) acting in the public interests. The Act also provides for a Public Participation and Petitions Committee to deal with petitions and a Public Participation Office to enable under-resourced communities to participate in the legislative process. Gauteng Petitions Act, s 8.

[7] The KwaZulu-Natal Legislature has initiated post-enactment hearings to determine how the legislation is affecting communities. See KwaZulu-Natal Annual Report 2002/2003 (2004) 3.

19.8 Provincial Legislatures and the National Council of Provinces

The National Council of Provinces ('NCOP') is the second chamber of South Africa's national Parliament. According to FC s 42(4), the NCOP 'ensures that provincial interests are taken into account in the national sphere of government' and provides a national forum for public consideration of issues affecting the provinces. Provincial legislatures determine much of what occurs within the NCOP: they not only selects its members but also control their votes.

Each of the nine provincial legislatures selects ten delegates. Six of the ten delegates are permanent delegates and four are special delegates.[1] Each delegation is led by the Premier or a member of the provincial legislature designated by the Premier.[2] The special delegates represent the provinces on particular matters.[3] The rules of most provincial legislatures make provision for the selection of special delegates.[4]

One especially vexed question with regard to provincial control of NCOP delegations concerns mandates. With respect to 'Section 76' bills — those bills deemed to affect the provinces — each provincial delegation possesses one vote. According to FC s 65 s (1)(a), this vote must be cast in accordance with the express preference of the provincial legislature. FC s 65(2) anticipates an act of Parliament that creates a uniform procedure for the conferral of such mandates by provincial legislatures on their delegations. This Act has not yet been promulgated. At the present time, different legislatures follow different procedures. As [1] Permanent delegates must be appointed by provincial legislatures, in accordance with the nomination of parties in the provincial legislatures, within 30 days after the result of an election of a provincial legislature is declared. FC s 61(2). Section 2(b) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment provides that this procedure should also be done within 30 days if a change of composition of the provincial legislature occurs as a result of a change in party membership, merger between parties, or subdivision of parties. Act 21 of 2002.

A person ceases to be a permanent delegate if, inter alia, that person ceases to be eligible to be a member of the provincial legislature for any reason other than being appointed as a permanent member that person has lost the confidence of the provincial legislature and is recalled by the party that nominated that person or that person ceases to be a member of a party that nominated that person and is recalled by the party. FC s 62(4)a, FC s 62(4)c, FC s 62(4)d. But see Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 21 of 2002 (Enables members who have become members of another party to retain their membership in the NCOP.)

According to FC s 61(2), parties represented in a provincial legislature are entitled to delegates in the provinces' delegation in accordance with the formula set out in Part B of Schedule 3. The number of permanent delegates to which each party is entitled in each provincial delegation is calculated according to an algorithm set out in the Determination of Delegates (NCOP) Act. Act 69 of 1998.

[2] FC s 60(2).

[3] See EFJ Malherbe 'The South African National Council of Provinces: Trojan Horse or White Elephant' 1998 TSAR 77, 88 ('Special delegates [will] . . . normally, but not necessarily . . . be members of the provincial executives.') See also C Murray and L Nijzink Building a Representative Democracy (2002) 46 ('[W]hen representing the province in the NCOP, the members of the executive and legislature on the delegation should not be seen as coming from separate branches of government but as partners mandated to ensure that the province's interest are properly understood in the national sphere.')

[4] See, eg, Rule 77 of the Standing Rules of the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature; Rule 196 of the Standing Rules of the Western Cape Legislature.

Murray and Nijzink note, the provinces differ as to whether provincial parliamentary committees can confer mandates on provincial delegations or whether such a power vests solely in the provincial legislature.[1] Those opposed to committee conferrals argue that FC s 65 makes no mention of committees. Those who favour committee conferrals contend that since FC s 116 permits provincial legislatures to establish their own internal procedures, FC s 116 likewise permits provincial legislatures to delegate the mandate power to a provincial parliamentary committee. Murray and Nijzink suggest that the debate over the mandate flows from very practical concerns: '[P]rovincial legislatures do not meet frequently but mandates may be needed at short notice and at a time when the provincial legislature is not sitting.'[2] So, for example, the rules of the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature allow the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature's National Council of Provinces Matters Committee to confer a mandate upon a provincial delegation provided that 75% of the committee's members agree to the content of the particular mandate.[3] The Gauteng Legislature and the Western Cape Legislature, on the other hand, only allow the provincial legislature, as a whole, to confer mandates on their respective NCOP delegations.

[1] Murray & Nijzink (supra) at 51–52.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Rule 83 of the Standing Rules of the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature.

20 Provincial Executive Authority

Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti

20.1 Introduction 20–1
20.2 Premiers 20–2
(a) Appointment and removal 20–2
(b) Powers and functions 20–5
20.3 Executive Councils 20–6
(a) Composition, appointment and removal 20–6
(b) Powers and functions 20–9
(c) The role of MECs 20–12
(d) The Executive Council and provincial administration . . . 20–13
(e) Oversight by provincial legislatures 20–15
(f) Ethical accountability 20–16
(g) Salaries 20–19
20.4 Provincial executives and multi-sphere government 20–20
(a) Provincial executives and the national sphere of government 20–21
(i) Law-making 20–21
(ii) Provincial budgets, the Budget Council and the annual Division of Revenue Act 20–23
(iii) Subordinate legislation 20–24
(iv) Police 20–25
(v) Oversight 20–26
(vi) Assignment 20–27
(b) Provincial executives and the local sphere of government 20–27
(i) IGR responsibilities 20–30
(ii) Intervention under FC s 139 20–31
(c) Provincial executives and traditional leaders 20–33

20.1 INTRODUCTION

The responsibilities and functions of provincial executives, like all other provincial institutions, are largely determined by the role of provinces in South Africa's system of multi-level government. The primary responsibility of provincial executives is to implement national legislation. The system also expects members of provincial executives to play a substantial role in the adoption of national legislation that falls within the concurrent competence of provinces and the national government.

However, the distinct role of provincial executives is hardly mentioned in the constitutional provisions that determine the formal structure of South Africa's nine provincial executives. Eight of these executives are governed by the Final Constitution and, in particular, FC Chapter 6. The sole exception is the Western Cape. But, although the Western Cape provincial executive is governed by the Western Cape Constitution, there are no significant differences between the Western Cape model and the Final Constitution.

The provisions of FC Chapter 6 relating to provincial government are themselves almost identical to those governing the national executive. Like the national executive, all provincial executives operate on the parliamentary model. The Premier, who is head of the executive, is usually drawn from the majority party in the provincial legislature and selects his or her cabinet — called an Executive Council — from the legislature. The executive is accountable to the legislature and, under FC s 141, can be removed at any time by a vote of no confidence. In the language of the Westminster system, the executive 'serves at the discretion of the legislature' or needs to retain the confidence of the legislature. Even the two most substantial deviations from the national model in the provisions relating to the design of provincial governments in FC Chapter 6 are minor. First, whereas the President is both head of state and head of the national executive, the Final Constitution does not formally create two separate roles for a Premier. Secondly, a Premier remains a member of the provincial legislature after his or her election, while the national President relinquishes his or her seat in Parliament upon election.

The model set out in FC Chapter 6 is also very close to traditional forms of parliamentary government. The most important departure from the parliamentary model of other Commonwealth countries such as India, Canada or Australia is that a provincial legislature, like the National Assembly, may not usually be dissolved for three years after an election. In other words, an election cannot be called within that period. The only exception is that an election must be called if there is a vacancy in the office of Premier and the legislature is unable to reach agreement on the election of a new Premier within 30 days of the occurrence of the vacancy.[1] The three year moratorium on elections after a new legislature is constituted is intended to increase the stability of the system and to prevent governments from dissolving the legislature and calling elections in an opportunistic manner.

[1] FC s 109(2).

However, while the Westminster parliamentary model and the system of government in South Africa's provinces set out in FC ss 125 to 141 are similar, the responsibilities and the functions of provincial executives differ fundamentally from those of the national executive and of executives in other parliamentary systems. The Final Constitution divides power both horizontally and vertically amongst the spheres of government. It is divided vertically by reference to subject matter. It is divided horizontally by reference to function. Provinces, by virtue of the vertical divide, have exclusive authority over certain subject matter (particularly that listed in Schedule 5 of the Constitution) and by virtue of the horizontal divide, have the responsibility to administer much national legislation. The implications for provincial executives of this division of authority in South Africa's system of multi-level government are profound. This division of authority affects the relationship of the provincial executive with the national executive and Parliament as well as the relationship between the provincial executive and the provincial legislature. In addition, although the Final Constitution establishes three distinct spheres of government, it anticipates a role for provincial governments in supporting and regulating local government. In short, the constitutional provisions governing provincial executives must be understood in terms of the system of multi-level government established by the Final Constitution.

This chapter discusses the constitutional role of provincial executives. As the role of the national executive is discussed fully in Chapter 18, here we focus on aspects of the role of provincial executives that distinguish them from their national counterpart. In addition, the manner in which a system of government develops cannot be understood in isolation from its political environment. Accordingly, where it is relevant, we note the way in which different provisions have been implemented in different provincial environments.

20.2 Premiers

(a) Appointment and removal

According to FC s 128, Premiers are elected by the provincial legislatures at the first sitting after the legislature's election. The election must be presided over by a judge designated by the Chief Justice. If the office of the Premier becomes vacant for any reason, the provincial legislature concerned must select a new Premier on a date determined by the Chief Justice.

In the initial version of its provincial constitution, the Western Cape attempted to alter the requirement that the Chief Justice designate a judge. It provided that the Judge President of the Western Cape or a judge designated by him or her would preside over the election of the Premier. The Constitutional Court rejected this alteration on the ground that members of the judiciary wield powers entirely independent of the powers exercised by the provinces. Provinces do not have the competence to alter the powers and the functions that have been assigned to particular judges by the national constitution.[1]

[1] Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape 1997 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) at para 56.

There is, however, an anomaly in FC s 128 that the Western Cape Constitution did not try to rectify. One might expect a provincial constitution to stipulate that the first election in a newly-elected legislature should be that of the Speaker, and that the Speaker would then preside over all other elections. This procedure would accord with the constitutional status of legislatures as bodies which elect the head of the relevant executive and to which the executive must account. Such a variation in a provincial constitution from the provisions of FC Chapter 6 should pass constitutional muster. It would, on all but the narrowest reading of the section, constitute a 'legislative procedure' under FC s 143(1)(a).[1]

The constitutional requirement of an election for the office of Premier is a deviation from the practice of older parliamentary systems in which the leader of the largest party in the legislature is invited to form a government by the head of the state (or head of the subnational unit such as a province) and then becomes Prime Minister or Premier. However, the election does not itself distinguish the system in South Africa's provinces from other parliamentary systems. The largest party will still choose the Premier. In the case of coalition governments, where no single party holds the majority, an agreement must be reached amongst the parties seeking to form a governing coalition as to who should be Premier. The more significant difference between traditional parliamentary systems and that in South Africa lies in current political practice. The policy of the African National Congress (ANC), which commands the majority in all the provinces, is for Premiers to be identified by the party's president and to be 'deployed' to the premiership.[2] This practice — combined with a closed list system of proportional representation that allows voters only a very limited opportunity to express preferences as to who their public representatives should be — weakens the democratic basis of provincial government. In effect, Premiers gain their political legitimacy from and are politically accountable to the president of the ANC and the central party structures rather than the provincial legislature or even regional party structures.

Despite the controversy that has surrounded the ANC practice of allowing the President to identify Premiers, it has been used to good effect to increase the number of women holding the office. After the 2004 elections, the number of women Premiers was increased to four — thus the number of male and female Premiers is almost equal.[1] This outcome is consistent with the ANC's general policy of increasing the representation of women in prominent political posts.[2]

[1] For further discussion of the extent to which provincial constitutions may vary their executive and legislature structures from those structures provided for in the Final Constitution, see S Woolman, 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 21.

[2] Prior to 1997, Premiers were selected from within the party through an electoral list process. However, at the ANC National Conference in 1997, it was decided that the ANC president in conjunction with the National Executive Committee of the ANC should be given the power to 'deploy' Premiers. See D Besdziek 'Provincial Government in South Africa' in A Venter & C Landsberg (eds) Government and Politics in the New South Africa (2006) 117. This power has since caused a number of conflicts within the party, with some regional party structures rejecting their appointed Premiers and appointing other candidates as provincial party leaders. It has also caused a certain degree of factionalism within party structures, particularly in cases where the Premier is different from the elected head of the party in that region. See M Malefane 'Anti-Mbeki Vote Ensures Victory for Free State's Magashule' available at http://www.sundayindependent.co.za/index.php?fSectionId=1042&fArticleId=2600167 (accessed 12 October 2006). See also T Lodge Politics in South Africa: From Mandela to Mbeki (2002) 38.

The terms of Premiers begin when they assume office, which must be within five days after their election.[3] The term ends when a vacancy occurs or when the next Premier assumes office.[4] Like the national President, Premiers may not serve for more than two terms. However, if a person has assumed the office of Premier to fill a vacancy then the period between the vacancy and the next election is not counted as a term.[5]

Premiers may be removed from office in two ways. First, a Premier who has lost the support of the majority in the legislature may be removed through a vote of no confidence by the provincial legislature.[6] Secondly, under FC s 130(3), a Premier who is not fulfilling his or her functions properly may be removed by a vote of at least two thirds of the members of the provincial legislature.[7] Removal may occur 'only on the grounds of (a) a serious violation of the Constitution or the law; (b) serious misconduct; or (c) inability to perform the functions of office'. A Premier who has been removed from office under FC s 130(3)(a) or (b) may not receive any of the benefits of the office and may not hold any other public office in future.[8]

To date no provincial legislature has attempted to remove a Premier through the use of either of the above mentioned procedures. The Premiers that have relinquished their office were forced to resign through decisions taken by the ANC National Executive.[9]

An acting Premier may be appointed if the Premier is absent or temporarily unable to fulfil his or her duties or if the office of the Premier becomes vacant. FC s 131(1) specifies who should be appointed as acting Premier. The first choice

[1] Prior to 2004, only two women had served as Premiers, both in the Free State. Ivy Matsepe-Casaburri held the position between 1996 and 1999. She was replaced by Isabella Winkie Direko, who served from 1999 to 2004. The four current women Premiers are Beatrice Marshoff (Free State), Edna Molewa (North West), Nosimo Balindlela (Eastern Cape) and Dipuo Peters (Northern Cape).

[2] See ANC's Women's Charter for Effective Equality (1994), available at http://www.anc.org.za/ancdocs/policy/womchart.htm (accessed 21 February 2007). Piombo notes that the ANC has a formal requirement that at least 30 per cent of electoral candidates be women. At present, 38 per cent of ANC MPs in both Houses of Parliament are women. See J Piombo 'The Results of the Election 2004: Looking Back, Stepping Forward' in J Piombo and L Nijzink (eds) Electoral Politics in South Africa: Assessing the first democratic decade (2005) 281-2.

[3] FC s 130(1). The period within which a Premier must assume office is dealt with in FC s 129.

[4] FC s 130(1).

[5] FC s 130(2).

[6] We discuss this subject at § 20.3 infra.

[7] FC s 130(3). Note that the section requires two thirds of all the members of the legislature to support the decision to remove the Premier, not merely two thirds of the members present.

[8] FC s 130(4).

[9] T Lodge (supra) at 42-8.

must be a member of the Executive Council designated by the Premier. The second choice is a member of the Executive Council designated by other members of the Council. The third choice is the Speaker of the provincial legislature. An acting Premier has all the powers and may perform all the functions of the Premier.[1]

(b) Powers and functions

Although the Final Constitution does not formally create two distinct roles for Premiers, they have two broad sets of powers and functions: (i) those that are performed by virtue of their status as the head of the province and that are similar to those performed by the President acting as Head of State; and (ii) those that they perform in conjunction with the Executive Council.[2]

Most of the powers of the Premier exercised by virtue of his or her status as head of the province are listed in FC s 127(2). The nature of these powers and the fact that they are listed separately from the 'executive powers' listed in FC s 125(2) suggests that they are to be distinguished from those powers and need not be exercised 'together with' the rest of the Executive Council. Instead, like the President's powers under FC s 84, they may be exercised by the Premier on his or her own. However, FC s 140 stipulates, firstly, that decisions taken by a Premier must be in writing if they are taken in terms of legislation or have legal consequences and, secondly, that written decisions that concern the portfolio of an MEC must be countersigned by that MEC. Some decisions taken under FC s 127(2), such as a decision to establish a commission of inquiry or to refer a bill back to the provincial legislature because of concerns about its constitutionality, will concern the portfolio of an MEC. So although FC s 127(2) does not require the Premier to act 'together with' the Council, under these circumstances FC s 140(2) is usually taken to require the countersignature of the MEC as an indication that the MEC is informed about the decision but not as an indication of his or her agreement.[3]

The powers that the Premier exercises as head of the province include assenting to and signing Bills,[4] referring Bills back to the provincial legislature or to the Constitutional Court for consideration of their constitutionality,[5] summoning the

[1] FC s 131(2).

[2] The functions of the Premier that are exercised in conjunction with the Executive Council are discussed in § 20.3*(b)* infra.

[3] This matter is discussed in greater detail in C Murray & R Stacey 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2007) Chapter 18.

[4] For a brief discussion on this subject, see T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) § 19.2*(c)*.

[5] The power of a Premier to refer provincial bills to the Constitutional Court has been used only once. See In re: Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC). For a brief discussion of this case, see T Madlingozi & S Woolman (supra) at § 19.6.

provincial legislature to extraordinary sittings to conduct special business, appointing commissions of inquiry and calling a referendum. A Premier must also dissolve the provincial legislature if it takes a resolution to dissolve — provided that at least three years have elapsed since the last election.[1] When a provincial legislature has been dissolved, or if its term has expired, the Premier must proclaim the date on which new provincial elections will be held.[2] These powers are distinct from those powers that the Premier exercises together with the Executive Council under FC s 125. The expectation is that they will be exercised in a non-partisan manner. In a number of instances, such as the power to assent to Bills, the Premier possesses no discretion at all.

A number of other functions are specifically allocated to Premiers by the Final Constitution. These embrace heading the province's delegation to the NCOP,[3] nominating a commissioner to serve on the Public Service Commission as a representative of the province and serving on the Judicial Service Commission when a vacancy on the bench in the province exists.[4] In fulfilling these functions, the Premier plays a distinctly political role and acts as head of the provincial executive. In addition, as Froneman J puts it in Magidimisi NO v Premier of the Eastern Cape, under the Final Constitution, the Premier is vested with the 'ultimate executive authority of the province'. What Froneman J means, among other things, is that the Premier 'bears the ultimate responsibility to ensure that the provincial government honours and obeys all judgments against it'.[5] When the Premier exercises such executive authority, he or she must act 'together with the other members of the Executive Council' and thus needs the support of the Council.[6]

20.3 Executive Councils

(a) Composition, appointment and removal

The Executive Council is a province's Cabinet. It consists of the Premier and between five and ten other members (MECs) appointed by the Premier from amongst the members of the provincial legislature.[7] FC s 132(2) expects a Premier to choose the Executive Council for the province. However, in provinces

[1] FC s 109(1).

[2] FC s 108(2). No provincial legislature has ever been dissolved so it has not been necessary to hold fresh elections in any of the provinces. Thus far, the dates on which new elections for provincial legislatures whose terms have expired have coincided with the dates for national elections.

[3] FC s 60(2)(a)(i).

[4] FC s 196(7)(a). This is more of a ceremonial function. In terms of FC s 196(8)(b), the commissioner must be recommended by a committee of the provincial legislature in which all political parties must be proportionally represented and selected by a majority vote of the provincial legislature.

[5] Eastern Cape High Court Case No 2180/04 (Unreported, 25 April 2006) at para 20. See § 20.3*(d)* infra.

[6] FC s 125(2).

[7] FC s 132. This provision is retained in s 42(1) of the Western Cape Constitution.

controlled by the ANC, MECs, like the Premier, are 'deployed' by the national executive of the ANC.[1] Similarly, while the Premier also has the constitutional power to dismiss MECs, ANC control of the provinces means that dismissal occurs at the behest of the national executive of the ANC.[2]

Under the Final Constitution, MECs are accountable both to the Premier, since he or she holds the power to dismiss them, and to the provincial legislature. These arrangements are identical to those for the national Cabinet and, like FC s 92(2), FC s 133(2) spells out the principle of cabinet accountability.[3]

Although FC s 132(2) gives Premiers the power to dismiss MECs, it does not spell out the circumstances under which an MEC can be removed. In keeping with the tradition in parliamentary systems, the Premier may dismiss MECs at will. This power is, of course, subject to political constraints.

The legislature can remove the Executive Council through a vote of no confidence. In terms of FC s 141(1,) '[i]f a provincial legislature, by a vote supported by a majority of its members, passes a motion of no confidence in the province's Executive Council excluding the Premier, the Premier must reconstitute the Council'. If the legislature has lost confidence in the entire Executive Council, including the Premier, then, in terms of FC s 141(2), it can pass a vote of no confidence in the Premier, who must then resign together with the MECs. FC s 141(2) captures a longstanding practice in parliamentary systems. Such a vote of no confidence usually precipitates a change of government: the vote signifies that the party in government is no longer able to command a majority in the legislature. However, FC s 141(1) is unusual — perhaps unique. It is difficult to envisage circumstances in which it would be used. A Premier, sensing discontent amongst backbenchers, is likely to reshuffle the Council before being subject to the indignity of having his or her chosen team dismissed.

The 'no confidence removal' procedure under FC s 141(2) must be distinguished from the procedure under FC s 130(3) which, as discussed above, allows the Premier to be removed for reasons other than loss of confidence. The two are different in four significant ways. First, a two-thirds majority of all the members of the legislature is required to remove a Premier in terms of FC s 130(3) whereas only a majority vote (fifty percent plus one of the members of the legislature) is required to force a resignation through a vote of no confidence. It is therefore significantly more difficult to dismiss a Premier under FC s 130(3). Second, the rest of the Executive Council need not resign if the Premier is removed in terms of FC s 130(3). Third, the consequences for a Premier who has been removed in terms of FC s 130(3)(a) or (b) are more prejudicial, as under FC s 130(4) that person may not receive any of the benefits of the office or assume public office again. Finally, FC s 130(3) would appear to be justiciable. Its precise wording, limiting its use to a few, narrowly defined circumstances, suggests that the Final Constitution is concerned that the process should not be misused and thus contemplates the possibility of judicial review. On the other hand, one could contend that the special majority required for removal of a Premier under FC s 130(3) suggests that the Final Constitution did not intend a court to second-guess the legislature on such matters, but, instead, was content to place full responsibility upon the legislature. This reading would avoid a three-way power struggle between the executive, the legislature and the courts. In any event, the question may be academic. A provision such as this one is likely to be used only in the context of a breakdown of party government. Conceivably, a legislature might rely on it, rather than moving for a vote of no confidence, in an attempt to indicate that it is not calling for a change of government. However, in circumstances where two thirds of the legislature can be rallied to remove a Premier, one would ordinarily expect party structures to ensure that he or she resigns before facing that embarrassment.[1]

[1] For a fuller discussion on politics in the provinces, see T Lodge Politics in South Africa (supra) at 32-53. See also J Arenstein 'Mpumalanga gets New Chief Whip' available at http://www.lowveldinfo.com/news/showstory. asp?story=722 (accessed 22 October 2006).

[2] FC s 132(2).

[3] For a more detailed discussion on collective responsibility, see C Murray & R Stacey 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds), Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2007) Chapter 18.

Members of the Executive Council will ordinarily be members of the provincial legislature. Although the Final Constitution is silent on whether an MEC (including the Premier) may remain in office if he or she leaves the provincial legislature, the obvious interpretation of the FC s 132 requirement that the Premier and other MECs be chosen from the legislature is that, to retain their office, they should remain members of the legislature. This interpretation accords with the parliamentary system of government that the Final Constitution establishes for provinces.

There is one, narrowly circumscribed, exception to the requirement that MECs must be members of the legislature. FC s 135 deals with the situation that arises after an election but before a new Premier has been chosen. It stipulates that, after an election, 'the Executive Council and its members remain competent to function until the person elected Premier by the next legislature assumes office'. For this short period, it is possible that a person who no longer holds a seat in the legislature will serve as an MEC.

[1] FC s 106(3)(c) stipulates that members of provincial legislatures (MPLs) lose their seats in the legislature if they are expelled from their party. One consequence of FC s 106(3)(c) is that a Premier would have to relinquish office on being expelled from the party and having lost his or her seat. FC s 106(3)(c) does however contain the proviso that an MPL who crosses the floor as provided for by FC Schedule 6A — which governs floor crossing in general — will not lose his or her seat. The prospect therefore exists that a Premier could cross the floor to another party and retain the Premiership. However, to avoid being dismissed pursuant to a vote of no confidence, either a majority of the members of the legislature would have to accompany the Premier across the floor or a majority of the members of the legislature — in the form of a new coalition — would have to continue to provide him or her with the requisite level of political support.

(b) Powers and functions

The executive authority of a province is vested in the Premier,[1] who must exercise that authority 'together with the other members of the Executive Council'.[2] As noted above, this arrangement makes the Premier the 'ultimate executive authority in the province'.[3] The phrase 'together with' and the stipulation in FC s 133(2) that the Premier and other MECs are collectively accountable for the government of the province capture the idea of cabinet government that is central to parliamentary systems. In this tradition, a Premier is primus inter pares (first among equals). Thus, despite the fact that the executive power is formally vested in the Premier alone, the responsibility for government is shared. Of course, as studies of parliamentary government in the United Kingdom have shown, the management of cabinet and the amount of authority that a Premier actually wields depends on the particular political context of the time and the personalities involved.[4]

FC s 125(2) outlines the general powers and functions of Executive Councils. These powers and functions are:

(a) implementing provincial legislation in the province;
(b) implementing all national legislation within the functional areas listed in Schedule 4 or 5 except where the Constitution or an Act of Parliament provides otherwise;
(c) administering in the province, national legislation outside the functional areas listed in Schedules 4 and 5, the administration of which has been assigned to the provincial executive in terms of an Act of Parliament;
(d) developing and implementing provincial policy;
(e) co-ordinating the functions of the provincial administration and its departments;
(f) preparing and initiating provincial legislation; and
(g) performing any other function assigned to the provincial executive in terms of the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

Much of this list captures the expected functions of a government: to develop and to implement policy for the polity over which they have authority. However, as we noted in the introduction to this chapter, the role of South Africa's provincial governments is very different from that of most of their foreign counterparts.[5]

[1] FC s 125(1).
[2] FC s 125(2).
[3] Magidimisi (supra) at para 20.
[4] See R Brazier Constitutional Practice (1994); J Simon British Cabinet Government (1999); N Manning Strategic Decision-Making in Cabinet Government (1999).
[5] The role of the governments of Germany's Länder is perhaps closest to that of the provinces. Those governments have more autonomy than the provinces but, like the provinces, their main responsibility is to implement national laws. See C Saunders 'Legislative, Executive and Judicial Institutions: A Synthesis' in K le Roy & C Saunders (eds) Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Governance in Federal Countries: A Global Dialogue on Federalism, Vol 3 (2006) p 361ff.

FC s 125(2)(b), (c) and (g) underscores these differences and points to the extensive responsibility that provincial governments have for the development and implementation of national laws.

FC s 125(2)(b) is the key provision here. It sets out what is currently the main function of the provincial governments — the implementation of national laws in the areas of shared responsibility listed in Schedule 4.[1] Schedule 4 embraces such functions as health services, welfare services, education and housing. These functions, and many of the other functions listed in Schedule 4, are critical to the transformation of the country. In other words, the Final Constitution envisages that many, very significant national laws will be implemented by provincial governments. Currently, most of the national laws concerned are comprehensive and provide detailed instructions to their provincial implementers. Indeed, many pieces of legislation cast provincial governments in the role of implementing agents with little of the discretion that one might expect an elected government to possess. But that may simply be a function of the exigencies of the moment. In due course, and building on their experience in administering these national laws, provincial executives might assume a different role and propose provincial laws that tailor the national laws to suit local needs. The importance of FC s 125(2)(b) might recede as national legislation is restricted to establishing national norms and standards and provinces take fuller responsibility for achieving and maintaining such standards. However, as things stand, the limited capacity of provincial governments and the high level of agreement on what should be done make provincial innovation rare. Most provinces are content to implement programmes within the tight parameters set by the national government.[2]

FC s 125(2)(c) extends the range of provincial governments as executors of national laws still further. It anticipates the provincial administration of national legislation that falls outside Schedules 4 and 5 but which the national government has assigned to the provincial executive. The wording of paragraph (c) suggests that the role of provincial executives in relation to assigned legislation (which they are to 'administer') might be different from that in relation to Schedule 4 and 5 laws (which they 'implement'). However, it is unlikely that this semantic distinction would mean anything in practice. When the 'administration' of legislation is assigned to a provincial government, the precise responsibilities of the province are likely to be set out in the assignment agreement.[3]

[1] Few national laws fall under Schedule 5.

[2] In the seven-year period between 1994 and 2000, the provincial legislatures passed between 46 (Northern Cape) and 78 (North West) Acts. Many of these provincial Acts were routine — for instance, the annual budget and laws relating to salaries. Parliament, by comparison, produced approximately 70 national Acts each year. See C Murray & L Nijzink Building Representative Democracy: South Africa's Legislatures and the Constitution (2002) 74 - 75.

[3] FC s 99 requires an assignment to be agreed to by the provincial MEC concerned. See § 20.4*(v)* infra. For a fuller discussion of the FC s 99 power of assignment, see C Murray & R Stacey 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2007) Chapter 18.

There is one striking omission from the list in FC s 125(2). It does not mention the participation of provincial executives in the formation of the national legislation that they will be expected to implement or in the allocation of revenue to provinces in terms of FC s 214. In fact, provincial executives have a significant national role here, both through their participation in the intergovernmental forums mandated by FC Chapter 3, and in the passage of national legislation, including the annual Division of Revenue Act, in the NCOP.[1]

Although the main responsibility of provincial executives, at least at present, is the implementation of national laws, provinces may develop and implement their own policies and provincial laws. Following the practice of other parliamentary systems, provincial laws are usually prepared and introduced in the legislature by the executive. And, again in line with other parliamentary systems, money bills may be introduced only by the MEC responsible for finance.[2] The power to implement provincial legislation in terms of FC s 125(2)(a) is an exclusive power of the provincial executive and the national government may restrict it only in the circumstances laid out in FC s 100.[3] As we have already noted, provinces have made little use of their law-making power.

Some provinces have attempted to use their FC s 125(2)(d) right to develop and to implement provincial policy. This practice is uncontroversial in relation to Schedule 5 matters over which provinces have exclusive responsibility. However, the power of provinces to make policy on Schedule 4 matters has been controversial, particularly in provinces that were not controlled by the same party as the national government. National government contended that it is the role of the national government to make policy and the role of provincial executives to implement it. This is simply wrong. First, the Final Constitution does not oblige provinces to implement national policy: it obliges them to implement national laws.[4] That means that unless policy is enshrined in law, it does not bind the provinces. Secondly, a province can choose to depart from national policies spelt out in national laws by passing their own provincial laws. In such cases, under FC s 146, the national laws will give way to the provincial laws unless they meet the tests set out in FC s 146(2) and FC s 146(3). These provisions clearly do not anticipate that national policies bind provinces. Certainly, Chapter 3's principles of [3] FC s 125(5). FC s 100(1) empowers the national executive to intervene in a province if the provincial executive fails to fulfil any of the obligations that are imposed on it by the Constitution or legislation. See C Murray & R Stacey 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2007) Chapter 18. FC s 238 may permit a province to delegate responsibility for 'implementing' legislation to another sphere of government, but technically responsibility for ensuring that the law is properly implemented would remain with the province.

[1] See § 20.4 infra.

[2] FC s 119.

[4] See Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at para 24 (Court seems to accept that had the impugned legislation required provinces to adhere to national education policy then the law would have been unconstitutional.)

co-operative government contemplate that provinces will discuss any desire to depart from national policy with the national government. However, FC Chapter 3 does not privilege national policies. Nevertheless, as a general rule, provinces have not implemented policies in Schedule 4 areas that are inconsistent with those of the national government. The most significant exception has been provincial opposition to national HIV/AIDS policy. In 2001, a national policy stated that the anti-retroviral Nevirapene, effective in preventing mother-to-child transmission of HIV, would be tested at only two research sites per province. The drug was not to be made generally available. However, in 2002, Gauteng took the decision to provide Nevirapene to HIV-positive pregnant women at all public hospitals and large community centres.[1]

(c) The role of MECs

The MECs are responsible for the specific areas that are assigned to them by the Premier — eg, finance, health, transport.[2] It is now also common for Acts to stipulate which MEC will be responsible for the Act's implementation. As a result, an MEC, on being allocated the health portfolio, will automatically assume responsibility for the implementation of certain laws. The Premier always has the power to reallocate portfolios. However, the Final Constitution also envisages the transfer of specific functions of MECs in two additional circumstances. First, under FC s 137, responsibility for implementing a particular piece of legislation may be transferred from the portfolio of one MEC to that of another. FC s 137 thus ensures that the Premier is able to change the content of portfolios on the Executive Council and to redefine the responsibilities of MECs. In 2006, this provision caused a dispute in the Eastern Cape when the Premier sought to transfer responsibility for the implementation of an Act from the MEC designated in the Act to another MEC.[3] The legislature's legal adviser objected and suggested that the only way in which such a transfer could be made was through the amendment of the Act. In order to avert a legal dispute, the Premier eventually withdrew her proclamation and transferred the responsibilities back to the MEC designated by the Act.[4] But the objection raised in this dispute appears misconceived because FC s 137 addresses this set of circumstances directly. The section protects the Premier's right to manage the administration of the government of the province. In fact, FC s 137 introduces a limit on the powers of the provincial legislature. This limit, consistent with the doctrine of separation of powers, vests responsibility for decisions concerning how executive responsibilities should be

[1] N Steytler 'Federal Homogeneity from the Bottom Up: Provincial Shaping of National HIV/AIDS Policy in South Africa' (2003) 33 Publius: The Journal of Federalism 59, 65-66.

[2] FC s 132(2). See also Magidimisi (supra) paras 21 and 22 (MECs bear responsibility for decisions and conduct of their departments.)

[3] 'ECDC in Limbo after Sacking of Minister' The Herald (12 April 2006), available at http://www.epherald. co.za/herald/news/n03_12042006.htm (accessed 14 April 2006).

[4] 'Premier Transfers ECDC back to Economic Affairs' Dispatch (14 April 2006), available at http://www.dispatch. co.za/2006/04/14/Easterncape/abal.html (accessed 3 February 2007).

allocated in the Premier. The requirement that transfers of responsibility be formally announced by proclamation is intended to check the Premier's power, albeit in a limited way, and to ensure that the public is aware of who bears responsibility for the law concerned.

FC s 138, headed 'Temporary assignment of functions', deals with a rather different situation. It allows the Premier to deal with the temporary inability of an MEC to do his or her job. Under circumstances such as the illness, travel or vacation of an MEC, another MEC may be asked to bear responsibility for the absent MEC's portfolio for a limited time.

Only two portfolios in provincial executives are identified by the Final Constitution: policing finance. In terms of FC s 206(8) the MECs responsible for policing are members of a national committee that ensures the coordination of police services. In terms of FC s 119, only the MEC responsible for financial matters is allowed to introduce a money bill in the provincial legislature.[1] So although the legislature possesses the power to decline to adopt a provincial budget, it does not have the power to introduce it.[2]

(d) The Executive Council and provincial administration

In terms of FC s 125(2)(e), the Executive Council is responsible for co-ordinating the provincial administration and its departments. The ability of Executive Councils to control the administration in the province is limited by the fact that, in terms of FC s 197(1), there must be one, unified public administration for the whole country. This unified public administration must be structured by national legislation.[3] The provincial government may only recruit, promote, transfer and dismiss employees within the provincial administration:[4] even these powers must

[1] FC s 120(1) defines a money bill as follows:
(1) A Bill is a money Bill if it-
(a) appropriates money;
(b) imposes provincial taxes, levies, duties or surcharges;
(c) abolishes or reduces, or grants exemptions from, any provincial taxes, levies, duties or surcharges; or
(d) authorises direct charges against a Provincial Revenue Fund.'

[2] The question whether a provincial legislature may amend a money bill remains controversial. FC 120(3) states that '[a] provincial Act must provide for a procedure by which the province's legislature may amend a money Bill'. No province has passed such an Act and the received wisdom is that, in the absence of the Act, legislatures may not amend money bills. But this interpretation runs against both the language of the provision and its intention. The language does not suggest that the legislatures may not amend a money bill and, had the Constitution intended this one would have expected s 114(1)(a) which gives provincial legislatures the power to 'consider, pass, amend or reject any Bill before the legislature' to have expressly excluded the power to amend money bills just as, in the following paragraph, it confers on provincial legislatures the power to 'initiate or prepare legislation, except money Bills'.

[3] FC s 197(1) states: 'Within public administration there is a public service for the Republic, which must function, and be structured, in terms of national legislation, and which must loyally execute the lawful policies of the government of the day.' For general comment on this aspect of public service in South Africa, see A M Sindane 'Politicisation of the Public Service: An Unavoidable Consequence of the Political History in South Africa' (2003) 1 Journal for New Generation Sciences 59; TJ Mokgoro 'The Public Service as Promoter and Sustainer of Democracy' (1997) 32 Journal of Public Administration 241. See also A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, T Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

[4] FC s 197(4).

be exercised in accordance with nationally determined standards.[1]

The question of the extent to which provincial governments may exercise control over the structure of the public administration in their province was considered by the Constitutional Court in Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa.[2] The case concerned a dispute between the Western Cape government and the national government about certain provisions of the Public Service Laws Amendment Act,[3] which amended the Public Service Act.[4] The amendments significantly restructured the public administration within the provinces. The Western Cape objected to the amendments on the basis that they infringed the province's constitutionally conferred power to structure its own administration. Its principal contention was that FC s 197(1) should not be interpreted as conferring a power to the national government to structure the public administration as well as the public service. It argued that, instead, a distinction should be made between the public service and the public administration; the former could be structured by the national government, whilst the latter fell within the sphere of the provincial government. The Court rejected this argument. It held that the proper interpretation to be given to FC s 197(1) was that it empowered the national government to structure both the public service and the public administration, and that the two terms were virtually synonymous. It further held that adopting the construction of FC s 197(1) suggested by the Western Cape would be incorrect because it would result in an implied power that contradicted the express provisions of the Final Constitution and would empty FC s 197(1) of its content.[5] However, the Court did find that s 3(3)(b) of the Public Service Act, as amended, was unconstitutional insofar as it gave the Minister of Public Service and Administration the power to transfer the administration of any legislation, including provincial legislation, from a provincial department to a national department without the consent of the Premier. This section was found to be in conflict with the province's power to administer its own legislation.[6]

After Premier, Western Cape, it is clear that the power to structure public administration within the provinces is vested in the national government. However, the Premier, Western Cape Court warned that, in light of the principles of co-operative government outlined in FC s 41, the power vested in the national government

[1] FC s 197(4). FC s 197(2) further stipulates that '[t]he terms and conditions of employment in the public service must be regulated by national legislation.' For a more detailed discussion of the public service, see LP Dicker and GE Devenish 'Public Service' in WA Joubert (ed) The Law of South Africa (First Reissue, 2000) Volume 21, para 414ff. See also A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

[2] 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC)('Premier, Western Cape').

[3] Act 86 of 1998.

[4] Act 103 of 1994.

[5] Premier, Western Cape (supra) at paras 44-48.

[6] Ibid at paras 86-88.

should be exercised very carefully and in a manner that does not undermine the ability of the provinces to carry out their functions.[1]

Although FC s 197 places significant limits on the power of provincial executives to structure their administrations, it does not absolve them of the responsibility for 'coordinating the functions of the provincial administration and its departments' as listed in FC s 125(2)(e). This responsibility entails maintaining oversight over the actual running of the administration within the province and ensuring that their departments fulfil their responsibilities.[2]

(e) Oversight by provincial legislatures

The Final Constitution is unusually emphatic in its insistence that legislatures must oversee the conduct of government. Echoing provisions relating to the national Parliament, FC s 114(2) contains direct instructions to provincial legislatures to oversee the executive. FC s 115 affords the legislatures substantial powers with which to carry out this responsibility. FC s 133(2), which makes members of Executive Councils collectively and individually responsible to the provincial legislature, complements these provisions. Lest this not be clear enough, the Final Constitution takes the unusual step in FC s 133(3)(b) of specifying that MECs must 'provide the legislature with full and regular reports concerning matters under their control'.

Although more detailed than provisions relating to oversight found in most constitutions, these provisions might suggest that the oversight relationship between the provincial legislature and its executive follows the usual pattern in parliamentary democracies. Legislatures usually pass laws introduced by the executive and then oversee their implementation.

However, this division of labour does not exist in South Africa. Because the main responsibility of provincial executives is to implement national laws, provincial legislatures do not hold them to account only for implementing laws that the provincial legislatures themselves have passed. Instead, the greater part of the oversight work of a provincial legislature is to oversee the way in which the provincial executive implements national laws. Thus, provincial legislatures may be seen to be exercising oversight on behalf of the national Parliament.

The consideration of departmental annual reports is the focus of oversight activities in most provincial legislatures. These reports are tabled in terms of s 65 of the Public Finance Management Act (PFMA).[3] The PFMA was enacted to comply with the requirement in FC s 215 that national legislation should ensure, amongst other things, transparency, accountability and sound financial management of national, provincial and municipal budgets. Section 65(1)(a) of the PFMA requires executive authorities to table annual reports together the financial statements and audit report of their departments in their respective provincial legislatures. If an MEC fails to submit the annual report within six months of the end of the financial year, then he or she will have to table a written explanation for the delay.[1]

[1] Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 60. On Chapter 3 and the principles of co-operative government generally, see S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14

[2] Magidimisi (supra) at paras 21, 22, 24 (In particular, MECs are responsible for ensuring that court orders are obeyed.)

[3] Act 1 of 1999. See R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.

At the beginning of each new financial year, every provincial department tables a strategic plan and budget. The annual report focuses on service delivery by indicating the extent to which each government department has met the targets outlined in its strategic plan and in the budget for the preceding year. It provides both a record of the financial performance of the department and a non-financial performance report. It must detail the extent to which service delivery targets have been met.[2] Annual reports are prepared in accordance with guidelines issued by the National Treasury.[3]

(f) Ethical accountability

MECs and Premiers are expected to conduct themselves in an ethical way. FC s 136(2) outlines the basic principles that are applicable in this regard. It states that:

> (2) Members of the Executive Council of a province may not —
> (a) undertake any other paid work;
> (b) act in any way that is inconsistent with their office, or expose themselves to any situation involving the risk of a conflict between their official responsibilities and private interests; or
> (c) use their position or any information entrusted to them, to enrich themselves or improperly benefit any other person.

This section is not intended to be comprehensive. FC s 136(1) anticipates a more extensive code of ethics for MECs stating that '[m]embers of the Executive Council of a province must act in accordance with a code of ethics prescribed by national legislation'.[4]

[1] Section 65(2)(a). As the financial year ends on 1 March, all reports must be tabled by no later that 30 September of each year.

[2] National Treasury *Guideline for Legislative Oversight through Annual Report*s (2005) 12.

[3] Section 76 of the PFMA empowers the National Treasury to make regulations concerning certain matters. This grant of power accords with FC ss 216(1) and (2), which require the Treasury to enforce compliance with nationally legislated standards regarding budgets and expenditure. The National Treasury therefore issues treasury regulations that govern the production of annual reports. These regulations are simplified in the 'Guide for the Preparation of Annual Reports by National and Provincial Departments'. The guide is issued annually by the Treasury. The Treasury also provides guidelines on non-financial reporting. Individual provinces can add their own requirements for the annual report as long as these do not conflict with those of the National Treasury. See National Treasury Guideline (supra) at 23.

[4] Such a code could not depart from the provisions of FC s 136(2).

The national legislation envisaged in FC s 136(1) was passed in 1998 in the form of the Executive Members Ethics Act (Ethics Act).[1] Section 2 of the Ethics Act requires the President, in consultation with Parliament, to publish a code of ethics to govern the behaviour of all MECs, Premiers, and national Cabinet Ministers and deputy Ministers. The Executive Ethics Code was eventually published in July of 2000.[2] The standards outlined in the Code elaborate upon the provisions of FC s 136(2). The Code requires MECs and Premiers to submit a list of their financial interests to the Secretary of the Executive Council. The Secretary then maintains a register of financial interests.

Breaches of the Ethics Code are to be investigated by the Public Protector.[3] The Public Protector must complete the investigation and submit the report within 30 days.[4] If a complaint is lodged against the Premier, then the report of the Public Protector is submitted to the President. However, if a complaint is lodged against an MEC, then the report goes to the Premier of that province.[5] Upon receipt of a report on a complaint against a Premier, the President must submit the report together with his or her comments within 14 days to the National Council of Provinces (NCOP).[6] A Premier who receives a report on an MEC must present it, together with a report on any action to be taken against the MEC, to the provincial legislature.[7]

The requirement in the Act that reports concerning Premiers be submitted to the President is yet another reflection of the prevailing attitude that provincial politicians are accountable to the national government. As Premiers are formally chosen by provincial legislatures, and can be dismissed by them only, it would be most appropriate for the Public Protector to deliver such a report to the Speaker

[1] Act 82 of 1998.

[2] GG No 21366 of 28 July 2000.

[3] Section 3. In terms of s 4(1) of the Ethics Act an investigation must be initiated if a complaint is lodged by:

(a) the President, a member of the National Assembly or a permanent delegate to the National Council of Provinces, if the complaint is against a Cabinet member or Deputy Minister; or

(b) the Premier or a member of the provincial legislature of a province, if the complaint is against an MEC of the province.'

In terms of s 4(3) members of the public may also lodge complaints. However, such complaints must be lodged in terms of the relevant sections of the Public Protector Act 23 of 1994.

[4] Section 3(2) of the Ethics Act.

[5] Section 3(2)(a) and (b).

[6] Section 3(5)(b). See also GG No 21366 of 28 July 2000. In terms of s 4(1) of the Ethics Act an investigation must be initiated if a complaint is lodged by:

'(a) the President, a member of the National Assembly or a permanent delegate to the National Council of Provinces, if the complaint is against a Cabinet member or Deputy Minister; or

(b) the Premier or a member of the provincial legislature of a province, if the complaint is against an MEC of the province.'

In terms of s 4(3) members of the public may also lodge complaints. However, such complaints must be lodged in terms of the relevant section of the Ethics Act.

Section 3(6) of the Ethics Act.

of the provincial legislature.[1] In any event, FC s 182 requires reports of the Public Protector to be made public in all but exceptional circumstances. A report that alleges unethical behaviour by a Premier could hardly warrant secrecy. The requirement that the President should submit reports concerning Premiers to the NCOP rather than to the provincial legislature concerned adds another twist. It acknowledges that it is appropriate for the President to engage with provinces through the NCOP. But, as the NCOP has no power to censure or remove a Premier, it is not clear what the NCOP would do with such a report. As far as MECs are concerned, despite the fact that the Ethics Act does not require the Public Protector to submit his report to the provincial legislature concerned, it is reasonable to assume that any such report will be brought to its attention. The Public Protector has not, however, had occasion to undertake any investigations pursuant to a complaint filed under the Ethics Act with regard to a member of an Executive Council.[2]

The adherence of Executive Councils to the financial disclosure requirements of the Ethics Code was examined in research conducted by IDASA in 2003.[3] The research found that registers are being kept and updated in all the provinces. However, the IDASA report revealed a lack of awareness amongst officials in implementing offices about the requirements of the Ethics Act.[4] In most of the

[1] The Public Protector would be empowered to take such action under s 6(4)(c) of the Public Protector Act 23 of 1994 which empowers the Public Protector

(c) at a time prior to, during or after an investigation-

. . .

(ii) if he or she deems it advisable, to refer any matter which has a bearing on an investigation, to the appropriate public body or authority affected by it or to make an appropriate recommendation regarding the redress of the prejudice resulting there from or make any other appropriate recommendation he or she deems expedient to the affected public body or authority.

[2] Although no complaints have been made against Executive Council members under the Ethics Code, the Public Protector has in the past taken action when necessary. In 1999, prior to the promulgation of the Code, the Public Protector launched an investigation into a public statement that had been made by the erstwhile Premier of Mpumalanga, Ndaweni Mahlangu, to the effect that it was acceptable for politicians to lie. The investigation report concluded that Mr Mahlangu's statement contravened his obligation in terms of FC s 136(2)(b) not to act in a manner which was inconsistent with his office. It recommended that the Mpumalanga Legislature table the matter for debate and take appropriate action against the Premier. The report also expressed the view that, as Premiers are accountable only to provincial legislatures, legislatures have a constitutional obligation to take action against them when necessary. Office of the Public Protector 'Report No 12: Report on the Investigation of a Public Statement made by the Premier of Mpumalanga, Mr N Mahlangu' on 22 June 1999 available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report12.htm#06 (accessed on 16 November 2006).

[3] Institute for Democracy in South Africa 'Government Ethics in Post Apartheid South Africa' available at http://www.idasa.org.za/gbOutputFiles.asp?WriteContent=Y&RID=445 (accessed on 15 November 2006).

[4] Not all the provinces have adhered strictly to the requirement in the Ethics Code that the register be maintained by the Secretary of the Executive Council. In most of the provinces, this function is performed by the Provincial Director General. Gauteng is unique in that the provincial legislature has appointed an Integrity Commissioner to maintain a register of member's interests for all members of the provincial legislature. MECs file the annual disclosures required under the Ethics Act with the Integrity Commissioner.

provinces, it was extremely difficult for members of the public to access the register. In some cases the register was wholly confidential: the Ethics Code expressly provides for both a public section and a confidential section of the register.[1] The IDASA report also notes that although registers are being kept, there is no mechanism in place for evaluating the contents to determine whether the conduct of MECs and Premiers is in order. This omission constitutes a fundamental flaw in the Code as well as the Ethics Act. Attempts by civil society and members of the public to take the initiative in this regard are hampered by difficulties in accessing the registers.

(g) Salaries

FC s 219(1)(b) requires national legislation to be enacted to determine 'the upper limit of salaries, allowances or benefits of members of provincial legislatures, members of Executive Councils and members of Municipal Councils of the different categories'. FC s 219(2) and FC s 219(4) further require an independent commission to make recommendations with regard to salaries, benefits and allowances and further stipulates that the national legislation regarding salaries may be implemented by the provinces only after they have considered the recommendations of the commission.

The Independent Commission on the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers was set up in terms of the Independent Commission on the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act (Commission Act).[2] In accordance with the Commission Act, the Commission publishes its recommendations on the upper limit of [1] See s 7 of the Ethics Code.

[2] Act 92 of 1997. In terms of s 3 of the Commission Act, the Commission consists of eight members appointed by the President. Section 5(1) requires the President to determine the conditions of employment of the members of the Commission. Section 10 requires the Commission to present its annual report directly to the President, who then tables it in Parliament. Section 11(1) of the Act stipulates that the offices of the Commission are to be situated in the office of the President and the administrative requirements of the Commission are serviced by the office of the President. The Act does not provide for any oversight or approval of appointments to the Commission by Parliament or any other independent body. It also does not provide for administrative independence of the Commission and appears to make the Commission answerable to the President by requiring that it submit its activity report directly to him. The only provision in the Act that may protect the independence of the Commission is found in s 5(2) which provides members with security of tenure by stipulating that they will serve for a non renewable term of five years. In light of these provisions, it is uncertain whether the Final Commission meets the requirement of independence stipulated by FC s 219. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held, in the context of the independent institutions established by the Constitution under Chapter 9, that the powers and functions of an institution need to be understood in order to determine whether the provisions for securing its independence are sufficient. First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 160. Issues to be considered include appointment, removal, tenure and institutional independence. We would suggest that the purpose of the Commission is to act as a check against government structures, including the executive, giving themselves exorbitant salaries. In light of this purpose, the Commission Act gives the President an unacceptably high degree of influence over the Commission and it is unlikely that the Act meets the standards that are necessary to secure the independence of the Commission required by the Final Constitution. In Van Rooyen v The State, the Constitutional Court was faced with a challenge to certain provisions of the Magistrates Court Act 32 of 1944. 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC). The applicants challenged, amongst other things, salaries, benefits and allowances of Premiers and MECs in the Government Gazette on an annual basis after tabling the recommendations in Parliament.[1]

Following these recommendations, the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act (Remuneration Act) requires that the upper limit of salaries of MECs and Premiers must be published by proclamation in the Government Gazette by the President.[2] The proclamation must take into consideration, amongst other things, the recommendations of the Commission. Although the President may determine the upper limits of salaries, the specific salaries of MECs in each province are determined and published by the Premier of that province after the upper limits have been published by the President.[3] The Premier cannot, however, dictate his or her own salary. Instead, the provincial legislature of each province determines the salary of the Premier by a resolution taken within 30 days of the presidential proclamation. If the legislature is in recess, then the resolution must be adopted within 30 days after it resumes sitting.[4]

20.4 Provincial Executives and Multi-sphere Government

As we noted above, the South African system of multi-sphere government shapes the role of provincial governments. It draws them into national law-making, requires them to implement many national laws and demands that they support and regulate municipalities. In addition, provinces have acquired responsibilities in relation to traditional leaders.

The boundaries between the three spheres of government have been described as 'soft': there are few bright lines, many responsibilities are shared, and the obligation to cooperate is the system's driving principle.[5] Here we discuss some of the implications of the system for provincial executives.

provisions relating to the appointment of magistrates and the determination of their remuneration and conditions of service. In coming to the conclusion that the provisions of the Act were not unconstitutional, one of the factors that the Court considered was that, even though substantial powers were vested in the Minister, in each case he or she had to consult the Magistrates Commission before taking a decision. Unlike the Magistrates Court Act, the Commission Act does not make provision for the President to consult with any independent body before taking decisions regarding the Commission. This factor, combined with those mentioned above, casts serious doubt on whether the Commission Act complies with FC s 219.

[1] Section 8(4)(b) and (5) of the Commission Act.

[2] Section 6(1) ofAct 20 of 1998.

[3] The salaries of MECs must be published in the Provincial Gazette within 30 days after the presidential proclamation. Remuneration Act s 6(3)(a).

[4] Remuneration Act s 6(3)(b).

[5] For a more extensive discussion of the principles and the case law on co-operative government, see S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14; R Simeon 'Considerations on the Design of Federations: The South African Constitution in Comparative Context' (1998) 13 SA Public Law 42; R Simeon and C Murray 'Multilevel Government in South Africa: An Interim Assessment' (2001) 31 Publius: The Journal of Federalism 65.

(a) Provincial executives and the national sphere of government

(i) Law-making

The Final Constitution expects provincial executives to be deeply involved in the adoption of national legislation on Schedule 4 and 5 matters and a number of other matters listed in FC ss 76(3), (4) and (5). The Final Constitution demands this involvement when laws are considered in the NCOP. In practice, however, provincial involvement in the law-making process starts long before bills reach the NCOP. MECs and staff in provincial departments engage their colleagues in the national government in discussions concerning policy and proposed legislation in an array of intergovernmental forums.

In its description of the system of co-operative government, FC Chapter 3 anticipates intergovernmental forums in which the national and provincial governments interact without competition and in which the different roles of each sphere are respected. In this system, MECs and provincial departmental officials are meant to contribute to the development of national legislation in order to ensure that such legislation reflects the most urgent concerns of the provinces. Intergovernmental forums ostensibly allow for the development of coherent national and provincial policies that are responsive to differing needs across the country. The Final Constitution offers provinces real leverage in such forums: the national government requires the support of the provinces in the NCOP if proposed legislation that falls under Schedule 4 or 5 is to be approved by Parliament. Should the national government not succeed in bringing provincial executives on board in the intergovernmental forums, its bills may not be passed by Parliament.[1]

The actual practice of intergovernmental relations in South Africa — now governed, in part, by the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act[2] — does not reflect the type of relationship amongst the spheres of government contemplated by the Final Constitution. The Act, adopted pursuant to FC s 41(2), seeks to formalise a number of the intergovernmental forums that have been established over the past 12 years. Under the Act the forums established for national-provincial intergovernmental relations are convened by the national government. The national government remains firmly in control of the agenda and rarely uses

[1] It is frequently asserted that the NCOP's role in Parliament is limited because, under FC s 76(1)(e), the National Assembly can override an NCOP veto with a two-thirds majority. However, this argument overlooks the likely political dynamics in such a situation. A Bill rejected by the NCOP will not have been able to secure the support of five of the nine provinces. It seems unlikely that the National Assembly will be able to, or even desire to, override the wishes of so large a part of the country.

[2] Act 13 of 2005.

the forums as an opportunity to collaborate with the provinces.[1] While the degree of participation and influence of provinces in these intergovernmental forums varies, the provinces have come to accept the role of subordinate entities.[2]

A number of factors led to this distortion of the system. First, all of the provinces are controlled by the ANC. As a result, MECs are willing to accept the leadership of the national government. MECs may also be more comfortable with discussion of policy matters in party structures than in more formal ones. Secondly, the capacity and the skills of provincial executives are severely limited. In no more than a handful of cases have the provinces engaged fully with proposed national legislation.

Once a national bill has been considered by the relevant intergovernmental forums and approved by the Cabinet, it is introduced in Parliament. Provincial executives have a leading role in the NCOP and are expected to participate fully in this process. The Premier of a province is the leader of the provincial delegation to the NCOP.[3] Three other delegates, referred to as 'special delegates', are chosen from time to time by the provincial legislature 'with the concurrence of the Premier'.[4] In theory, the Premier and the three 'special delegates' constitute the most important part of the 10-person provincial delegation. The remaining six are 'permanent' delegates. They are based in Cape Town and are expected to manage the day-to-day business of the NCOP and to ensure that their provincial legislatures are adequately briefed on matters of importance. However, because the permanent members are based outside the province, they are often ill-equipped to deal with those matters in which the provincial government have a strong interest.[5]

Each time a provincial delegation in the NCOP votes in support of a piece of national legislation that falls under Schedule 4 or 5, it also affirms its willingness and ability to implement that new law. Such laws have obvious funding and other capacity implications for the provinces — thus the mandatory participation of provincial executives in the provincial delegation. Ideally, provinces would choose specialists to send to the NCOP. Special delegates would discuss the law that

[1] The language of ss 7 and 11 of the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act reflects this proposition. Section 7, dealing with the President's Co-ordinating Council, describes the Council as a forum 'for the President to raise matters of national interest with provincial governments and organised local government and to hear their views on those matters' (emphasis added). Section 11 is similarly worded in relation to the Cabinet Ministers and MECs intergovernmental forums (Minmecs). It provides that Minmecs are consultative forums in which Cabinet ministers responsible for the relevant functional area can raise matters with provincial and local government in order to hear their views on those matters. The legislation does not envisage that the Minmecs or the President's Council will be available to provincial executives as forums for the discussion, formulation or pursuit of provincial goals.

[2] See, eg, L Malan 'Intergovernmental Relations and Co-operative Government in South Africa: The Ten Year Review' (2005) 24 Politeia 226.

[3] FC s 60(3).

[4] FC s 61(4).

[5] See C Murray & R Simeon 'From Paper to Practice: The National Council of Provinces after its First Year' (1999) 14 SA Public Law 96, 113; C Murray, Y Hoffman-Wanderer & K Saller NCOP Second Term 1999-2004: A Review (Report for the NCOP 2004).

enages their expertise in select committees. One would also expect provincial delegations to send the relevant MEC. Once again, the system does not work as it should. The participation of provincial MECs in the NCOP is largely restricted to making speeches in plenary, not to hammering out the details of laws in the committees.[1]

Some argue that it is a breach of separation of powers for MECs to participate either in deliberations in provincial legislatures on those national bills on which their delegations must vote in the NCOP or in the NCOP select committees themselves. But this approach misapprehends the role of provincial MECs at the national level. The provincial delegations to the NCOP deliberately include both members of the provincial legislature and MECs to ensure that provincial interests are properly represented in the NCOP. Separation of powers concerns are irrelevant here because the issue of limiting the powers of the provincial executive does not arise in the NCOP. On the contrary, the balance of powers that the NCOP is intended to maintain is that between the national sphere and the provincial sphere of government. To ensure that this balance is maintained, provinces need to draw on the experience of both their MEC and their legislators in their participation in the NCOP.

A second common justification for minimal participation in the NCOP by MECs is that all relevant issues will have been dealt with in intergovernmental forums. Often that is true. But many pieces of legislation are altered in Parliament and provincial executives need to be alive to — and present for — such eventualities.[2]

(ii) Provincial budgets, the Budget Council and the annual Division of Revenue Act

The annual Division of Revenue Act divides revenue collected nationally amongst the national, provincial and local spheres of government and then allocates an equitable portion of the provincial share to each province.[3] As provinces have very limited revenue raising power, the allocation of revenue to provinces by the Division of Revenue Act largely determines provincial budgets. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court addresses the question whether the Division of Revenue Act should be passed according to the procedure prescribed by FC s 75 or s 76. It notes that the Act does not deal with the appropriation of revenue or direct charges against the national revenue fund, and thus is not a money bill.[4]

[1] Permanent delegates tend to dominate select committees in the NCOP.

[2] The failure of provinces to engage fully in NCOP procedures is the most important reason for the NCOP's failure to contribute as it should to the national law-making process. It seems wrong to argue, as the 1999 Intergovernmental Relations Audit does, that the size of the NCOP is a major cause of its ineffectiveness. In fact, through the appointment of special delegates, the NCOP can draw on every member of each provincial legislature to contribute to its work. See Department of Provincial and Local Government The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government (1999) 4-8; S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' (supra) at § 14(4)(b).

[3] See FC s 214(1).

[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 420-1.

Instead, as a bill which affects the financial interests of the provincial sphere of government, it must be passed according to FC s 76. FC s 76 requires the support of at least five provincial delegations in the NCOP for a bill to pass and thus gives provinces — and accordingly their executives — real influence over the law.

The role of provincial MECs responsible for finance in the adoption of the Division of Revenue Bill starts in the Budget Council. The Budget Council was established in terms of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act[1] and consists of the finance MECs from each province, the national Minister of Finance, the Deputy Minister of Finance and officials from the provincial and national treasuries. The Council serves as a forum for negotiation on how revenue will be divided amongst the provinces.[2] The process is concluded when the Division of Revenue Bill is approved in the NCOP.

(iii) Subordinate legislation

Hidden away in FC s 146 are three provisions concerning provincial and national subordinate legislation on matters that fall under Schedule 4. FC s 146 deals, generally, with conflicts between national laws and provincial laws that fall within the concurrent jurisdiction of provinces and the national government set out in FC Schedule 4. It stipulates that, in the case of a conflict between a national law and a provincial law, the provincial law will prevail unless the national law meets certain criteria set out in subsections (2) and (3). Subsection (6) adds an additional requirement for subordinate legislation to prevail.[3] It states that in the case of a conflict, a piece of subordinate legislation can prevail only if it has been approved by the NCOP. This proviso applies both to subordinate legislation adopted by provinces and to subordinate legislation adopted by the national government.

This provision places a dual responsibility on MECs. First, they should ensure that their delegation to the NCOP tables provincial regulations and other instruments of provincial subordinate legislation in the NCOP. Secondly, they should scrutinise national regulations (many of which they will have to implement) to ascertain whether or not their delegation should support them when they are referred to the NCOP for approval.

[1] Act 97 of 1997

[2] For a discussion of the allocation of equitable shares to provinces, see R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.

[3] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16, 16-25. Bronstein suggests that under FC s 239 subordinate legislation 'becomes part of' the Act in terms of which it was adopted. With respect, Bronstein misreads FC s 239. That section defines the terms 'provincial legislation' and 'national legislation' in terms that cover both Acts and subordinate legislation. That does not mean that subordinate legislation becomes part of the Act. The definition is important because some constitutional provisions require the adoption of law. When the Final Constitution requires 'legislation' rather than an Act, it implies that either an Act or subordinate legislation is acceptable.

(iv) Police

FC Chapter 11 deals with the three branches of the security establishment — the defence force, the police and the intelligence services. Its opening provision states unambiguously that '[n]ational security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive'.[1] However, the provisions relating to the police impose a number of responsibilities on provincial executives.

This division of powers reflects one of the compromises embodied in the Final Constitution. The Constitutional Principles with which the Final Constitution was to comply stipulated that the powers of provinces should be no less than those in the Interim Constitution. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court found that the powers of provinces had been reduced and identified provincial powers in relation to the police as one area in which this uncertifiable diminution had occurred.[2] In fact, the Final Constitution reflects a totally new conception of the roles of the national government and provincial governments in relation to policing. Under the Interim Constitution, provinces were responsible for most policing services. The version of the Final Constitution first presented to the Constitutional Court for certification effectively nationalised policing. It vested the responsibility for policing, and the determination of national policy with regard to all policing, with the Minister. In addition, by requiring provincial police commissioners to report directly to the National Commissioner, it gave the National Commissioner considerable influence over provincial police policy. The role of provinces was reduced to monitoring police conduct in the province, exercising an oversight role in policing including receiving reports on police service, and liaising with the national Minister with regard to crime and policing in the province.

In response to First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Assembly increased the role of provinces and, in particular, provincial executives. The Final Constitution restores provincial participation in the appointment of provincial police commissioners,[3] allows provincial executives to initiate proceedings for the 'removal or transfer of, or appropriate disciplinary action against' a commissioner in whom the province has lost confidence, and permits a province to investigate complaints against the police.[4]

Despite these changes, the arrangement remains one in which the national government controls the police and the provinces fulfil what is essentially an oversight or monitoring role. Provinces have very limited authority to deal with problems that they may identify and must rely on the National Commissioner and national Minister.[5]

[1] FC s 198*(d)*.

[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 401.

[3] FC s 207(3) requires the concurrence of the provincial executive in the choice of provincial commissioner and, if agreement cannot be reached, requires the national Minister to mediate. The Final Constitution is silent on what is to happen in the face of unsuccessful mediation.

[4] FC s 206(5).

[5] For a description of these complicated relationships, see J Rauch 'The Role of Provincial Executives in Safety and Security in South Africa: A Policy Analysis' Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation (1998) http://www.csvr.org.za/papers/paprovex.htm (accessed 25 Sept 2006).

(v) Oversight

As we note above, the Final Constitution requires members of Executive Councils to account to provincial legislatures. However, the relationship between provincial executives and their provincial legislatures differs from that in most parliamentary systems. Under FC s 114, provincial legislatures are expected 'to maintain oversight of … the exercise of provincial executive authority in the province, including the implementation of legislation'. Because provincial executives are largely concerned with implementing national legislation, this provision puts provincial legislatures in the unusual position of overseeing the implementation of legislation that they have not passed.

The national executive also has an interest in overseeing the implementation of such legislation. This interest is indirectly acknowledged in FC s 100. FC s 100 authorises the national executive to intervene in provincial matters when a province does not fulfil its responsibilities. Implicit in the intervention power of the national government is a responsibility to see that provinces are functioning properly. This means that the national executive must have some power to monitor the way in which provinces carry out their functions. The Final Constitution does not address the ways in which the national sphere of government may monitor provincial governments. However, FC Chapter 3 provides a principled framework within which any such monitoring (or oversight) should occur.[1]

A related need for interaction between the national and provincial executives occurs when provinces encounter problems in the implementation of national laws which they themselves cannot remedy. For instance, a province may discover that it does not have the resources to fulfil obligations imposed by a national law, that it cannot provide services expected within an imposed timeframe or that aspects of a programme established under a national law are simply impractical in the particular context of the province. The usual practice in a parliamentary system when legislation needs revision is for the executive to introduce an amendment. But here authority to amend the law itself lies outside the jurisdiction of the province. One possibility may be for the provincial executive concerned to introduce a provincial bill that would prevail over the national law to remedy the problem. However, the solution will often lie in the hands of the national sphere of government.

Initially MECs should raise such issues at the relevant intergovernmental forum. If the national executive fails to take heed, the NCOP becomes the appropriate forum in which to articulate concerns. Indeed, in some ways the NCOP is a better forum to address such issues. It certainly avoids some of the problems of executive intergovernmental forums[1] because it offers a platform for the public discussion of matters of provincial interest and the opportunity for other interested parties (including members of opposition parties and the public) to engage with the contested issue.

[1] The responsibility of the national executive to oversee the way in which provinces implement laws is discussed more fully in C Murray & R Stacey 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 18.

(vi) Assignment

We note above that FC s 125(2)(c) anticipates that a provincial executive will administer legislation that falls outside Schedules 4 and 5 but which is assigned to it in terms of an Act of Parliament.[2] This provision is complemented by FC s 99, which authorises national Ministers to make such assignments. However, a difficulty arises in reading these two sections together. FC s 125(2) anticipates that functions will be assigned 'in terms of an Act of Parliament'. FC s 99 appears merely to require that the assignment be 'consistent with the Act of Parliament in terms of which the relevant power or function is exercised or performed'. One reading of the two provisions is that there are two forms of assignment — one authorised by an Act of the national Parliament without the concurrence of the provincial executive, the other agreed to by the provincial MEC but not necessarily expressly authorised by an Act. However, it would be inconsistent with the principles of co-operative government in FC Chapter 3 to suggest that a national Act could, in effect, order an independently elected member of a provincial government to fulfil functions that fall outside the constitutional mandate of the provinces. The better interpretation seems to be that, read together, FC s 125(2) and FC s 99 require that all assignments are authorised in a national Act and in an agreement with the province concerned.[3]

(b) Provincial executives and the local sphere of government[4]

FC s 152(1) spells out the role of municipalities:

> The objects of local government are—
> (a) to provide democratic and accountable government for local communities;
> (b) to ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner;
> (c) to promote social and economic development;
> (d) to promote a safe and healthy environment; and
> (e) to encourage the involvement of communities and community organisations in the matters of local government.

[1] These problems include lack of transparency and self-interested decision making. See FW Scharpf 'The Joint-Decision Trap: Lessons from German Federalism and European Integration' (1988) 66 Public Administration 239.

[2] FC s 125(2)(g) appears to repeat this provision.

[3] Assignment of executive powers or functions by provinces to municipalities can take place under FC ss 126 and 156(4). Sections 9 and 10 of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 (Systems Act) set out requirements for FC s 156(4) assignments. See also Department of Provincial and Local Government A Guideline Document on Provincial Local Intergovernmental Relations (undated) http://www.thedplg.gov.za/index.php?option=com_docman &task=doc_view&gid=27 (accessed 28 February 2007).

[4] For more on local government, see, generally, N Steytler & J de Visser 'Local Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 22.

The establishment of municipalities, with special responsibility for social development across the entire country, is one of the most ambitious projects in the Final Constitution. Under apartheid, local government had been patchy at best. White urban municipalities were well serviced by representative bodies and skilled administrators. Other areas were more or less neglected. Recognising the challenge of establishing democratic structures with effective administrations at the local level, the Interim Constitution put in place a process of gradual transition to democratic local government.[1] This process was formally completed in 2000 with the new municipal elections.

The construction of effective administrations in the 283 newly demarcated municipalities was to take much longer than their design and formal establishment. Anticipating this, the Final Constitution accordingly places responsibility on both the national and provincial spheres of government to ensure that municipalities develop the capacity to fulfil their substantial responsibilities. The implications of such provincial oversight and assistance responsibilities are considerable. In part, the relationship between provincial governments and municipalities mirrors that between the national government and provinces. Just as under FC s 125(3) the national government is expected to assist provinces to develop their administrative capacity to fulfil their functions properly, FC ss 154(1) and 155(6) require provinces to support municipalities and to promote their ability to fulfil their responsibilities. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court commented that the competencies of provinces in relation to local government > are considerable and facilitate a measure of provincial government control over the manner in which municipalities administer those matters in parts B of NT schedules 4 and 5. This control is not purely administrative. It could encompass control over municipal legislation to the extent that such legislation impacts on the manner of administration of [local government] matters.[2]

[1] IC s 245 provided that until elections were held in terms of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 (LGTA), local government would not be restructured except in terms of the LGTA. Any 'transitional' councils established in terms of the LGTA were deemed to be institutions or bodies established by the old order Provincial Government Act 32 of 1961, and any laws applying to local authorities were to be read as applying also to transitional councils. IC s 245(2) required that any restructuring of local government after local elections in terms of the LGTA would have to be in accordance with chapter 10 of the interim Constitution. FC s 155 establishes the structures of local government, providing for different categories of municipalities. In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that the draft of the new constitutional text (NT) did not comply with the requirement in Constitutional Principle XXIV that the Final Constitution establish a framework for local government. The Court wrote:

> At the very least, the requirement of a framework for LG [local government] structures necessitates the setting out in the NT of the different categories of LG that can be established by the provinces and a framework for their structures. In the NT, the only type of LG and LG structure referred to is the municipality. In our view, this is insufficient to comply with the requirements of the CP XXIV. A structural framework should convey an overall structural design or scheme for LG within which LG structures are to function and provinces are entitled to exercise their establishment powers. It should indicate how LG executives are to be appointed, how LGs are to take decisions, and the formal legislative procedures demanded by CP X that have to be followed.

First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 301.

[2] Ibid at para 371.

The constitutional relationship between provincial governments and municipalities is complex. It demands both engagement and restraint on the part of the provincial executive. The newness of municipalities, the fragility of their political and administrative structures, and the importance of the services that municipalities must provide mean that the provincial support required is considerable. But provinces must always also respect the integrity of municipalities. The Constitutional Court describes the relationship this way:

> What the [final Constitution] seeks ... to realise is a structure for LG [local government] that, on the one hand, reveals a concern for the autonomy and integrity of LG and prescribes a hands-off relationship between LG and other levels of government and, on the other, acknowledges the requirement that higher levels of government monitor LG functioning and intervene where such functioning is deficient or defective in a manner that compromises this autonomy. This is the necessary hands-on component of the relationship.[1]

The fact that this responsibility is shared with the national government adds a further layer of complexity to the manner in which provinces discharge their duties. Under FC s 154(1), both provinces and the national sphere of government must 'by legislative and other measures ... support and strengthen the capacity of municipalities to manage their own affairs, to exercise their powers and to perform their functions'. FC s 155(7) also gives both the national and provincial governments 'the legislative and executive authority to see to the effective performance by municipalities of their functions'. The most explicit requirement of support for municipalities remains, however, directed exclusively at provinces. FC s 155(6) requires provinces to '(a) provide for the monitoring and support of local government in the province; and (b) promote the development of local government capacity to enable municipalities to perform their functions and manage their own affairs'.

In practice, the national government has taken the lead. In a comprehensive set of laws governing municipal government, the national government has attempted to delineate the respective responsibilities of the national sphere and the provincial spheres towards municipalities. National legislation governing areas such as health services instructs provinces on their responsibilities towards municipalities.[2] In addition, a substantial programme to manage struggling municipalities,

[1] First Certificaton Judgment (supra) at para 373.

[2] For example, the Systems Act requires municipalities to draw up 'integrated development plans' (IDPs), sets out the 'core contents' of these IDPs, and establishes processes for the planning, drafting, adopting and review of IDPs. Provinces are to monitor and to support municipal activities in regard to IDPs (ss 31-3). Similarly, chapter 2 of the Local Government: Municipal Finance Management Act 56 of 2003 ('MFMA') is headed 'Supervision Over Local Government Finance Management', and sets out the roles to be played by national and provincial treasuries in assisting municipalities to meet their obligations in terms of the MFMA. Section 32 of the National Health Act 61 of 2003 provides that provincial Executive Councils are to assign responsibility for such health services to municipalities as are contemplated in FC s 156(4). Some element of control or oversight is implicit in this assignment process.

developed by the National Department of Provincial and Local Government in 2004, carefully stipulates the role of provinces.[1] Although the Final Constitution anticipates national and provincial legislation contributing to the development of municipalities, the responsibilities of provinces are chiefly executive. The provincial responsibility for municipalities, in practice, falls on the MEC for Local Government.

(i) IGR responsibilities

As we note above, FC s 41(2) requires the national Parliament to set up institutions to 'promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations' and to 'provide for appropriate mechanisms and procedures to facilitate settlement of intergovernmental disputes'. The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act, which implements this provision, does not limit itself to national forums. It also establishes a Premier's intergovernmental forum in each province[2] and identifies other forums which provinces may establish. In so doing, it spells out the specific responsibilities of Premiers and MECs responsible for local government.[3]

A Premier's forum follows the model of the President's Co-ordinating Council and includes the Premier, the MEC responsible for local government affairs and mayors of metropolitan and district councils in the province. Although the Premier is free to draw up the agenda of the forum, the controlling hand of the national sphere of government is evident in the description of the role of Premier's forums set out in the Act. The forum is intended to consider 'matters arising in the President's Co-ordinating Council and other national intergovernmental forums affecting local government interests in the province; …draft national policy and legislation relating to matters affecting local government interests in the province; [and arrange for] the implementation of national policy and legislation with respect to such matters'.[4] A Premier's forum must report annually to the President's Co-ordinating Council on 'progress with the implementation of national policy and legislation within the province.'[5] Presumably, this report is generated by the forum's chairperson, the Premier.

[1] The Department of Provincial and Local Government's initiative in this regard is known as 'Project Consolidate'. The Department describes it as a 'Hands-on Local Government Engagement Programme for 2004-2006'. The base document for the project requires the national govenment and the provincial governments to 'find new, creative, practical and impact-oriented modes of engaging, supporting and working with local government', and goes on to list a number of ways that this should be done. See Project Consolidate: A Hands-on Local Government Engagement Programme for 2004 — 2006 (May 2004) http://www.projectconsolidate.gov.za/docs/Base_Document.pdf (accessed 23 February 2007).

[2] Section 16.

[3] For a more detailed discussion on provincial and local government relations, see Department of Provincial and Local Government A Guideline Document on Provincial Local Intergovernmental Relations Department of Provincial and Local Government A Guideline Document on Provincial Local Intergovernmental Relations (undated) http://www.thedplg.gov.za/index.php?option=com_docman &task=doc_view&gid=27 (accessed 28 February 2007).

[4] Section 18*(a)*(i)-(iii).

[5] Section 20.

These provisions in the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act structure and direct a province's intergovernmental relations. They are also clearly drafted against the background of the current dominance of the national governing party and its 'trust' that provincial politicians will serve the national interests in their consultations with local government. It is not clear how effective these forums would be if views on appropriate policy diverged greatly. It is unlikely that the national government would want to rely on the results of a consultation process conveyed by a provincial government that is controlled by an opposition party.

There is also no reason for a provincial executive to restrict its relationships with local governments to the structures established under the Act. The Act acknowledges the provinces' discretion in a catch-all provision which 'allows' a provincial Premier to establish other intergovernmental forums in the province.[1] The overriding constitutional responsibility of provincial executives is to support the municipalities within their jurisdiction. To do so, they need to employ whatever institutions are most effective.

(ii) FC s 139

FC ss 154 and 155(6) and (7) set out the responsibility that provinces have in monitoring and providing support to municipalities. In allowing provinces to 'regulate' the affairs of municipalities, FC s 155(7) suggests that the scope of provincial involvement is fairly wide.[2] Nevertheless, FC s 139 goes a great deal further. It ensures that provinces may, and, in some cases must, respond to situations in which municipalities are failing to fulfil obligations.

FC s 139(1) identifies those circumstances in which a provincial executive has the discretion to intervene in a municipality: namely, when a 'municipality cannot or does not fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation'. The province may then take 'appropriate' steps including —

> (a) issuing a directive to the Municipal Council, describing the extent of the failure to fulfil its obligations and stating any steps required to meet its obligations;
> (b) assuming responsibility for the relevant obligation in that municipality to the extent necessary to—
> (i) maintain essential national standards or meet established minimum standards for the rendering of a service;

[1] Section 21. For a more detailed discussion on intergovernmental forums in the different provinces, see N Steytler, Y Fessha & C Kirkby Status quo Report on Intergovernmental Relations Regarding Local Government (undated) http://www.cage.org.za/documents/pdf/UWC.%20Community%20Law.%20Paper%20on%20status%20quo%20of%20IGR%20forums.pdf (accessed 28 February 2007).

[2] In the context of the power of the national government to 'regulate' the provincial taxing power the Constitutional Court has said: '"Regulation" however, is habitually used in statutes in conjunction with the word "control" to signify the object of legislative authorisation, the directing and commanding of that which has been authorised to be regulated'. First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 439. For a discussion of the ambit of the powers to monitor and to support, see First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 366ff.

(ii) prevent that Municipal Council from taking unreasonable action that is prejudicial to the interests of another municipality or to the province as a whole; or
(iii) maintain economic unity; or

(c) dissolving the Municipal Council and appointing an administrator until a newly elected Municipal Council has been declared elected, if exceptional circumstances warrant such a step.

No Constitutional Court case deals directly with FC s 139. However, the Constitutional Court discusses its national counterpart, FC s 100, in both certification judgments.[1] In the judgments, the Court emphasises the strictness of the test for an intervention by the national government that requires the assumption of the responsibilities of a provincial government. The high threshold for intervention is reflected in the use of the word 'necessary' in FC s 139*(b)* and the closed list of circumstances in which such an intervention may be undertaken. The Court also notes that FC s 100(1) sets out a process in which the assumption of responsibilities by the national government cannot occur before a directive has been issued giving the province an opportunity to fulfil its obligations.[2]

These observations about FC s 100 apply to interventions under FC s 139. However, an amendment to FC s 139 in 2003 extended provincial powers and obligations considerably. The amendment confers on provinces the power (in FC s 139(1)(c)) to dissolve municipal councils and imposes an obligation on provincial executives to intervene in municipalities under certain circumstances.[3] The obligation to intervene is contained in new ss (4) and (5). Both relate to the financial management of municipalities. Subsection (4) provides a mechanism to deal with a situation in which a municipality fails to approve a budget or raise taxes. As both the adoption of a budget and the imposition of taxes require legislative action, the provinces did not apparently possess the power to intervene under FC s 139 as it was originally drafted. Now the Final Constitution not only makes it clear that a provincial executive can put a budget in place for a municipality, it also requires the provincial executive to do so if a municipality has not

[1] FC s 100 gives the national government the power to intervene in provinces and its wording is very close to that of FC s 139. Before the amendment of FC s 139 in 2003, the two sections were almost identical. In 2000, the Department of Provincial and Local Government issued a Manual for the Application of FC s 139 to clarify the manner in which provinces are to apply FC s 139 and to promote a uniform procedure for intervention. The guidelines are still relevant to the extent that they have not been affected by the amendment. See N Steytler, J de Visser and J Mettler Manual for the Application of Section 139 of the Constitution (2000) http://www.thedplg.gov.za/subwebsites/annualreport/reports/igrmanual.pdf (accessed 28 February 2007).

[2] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC); 1997(1) BLCR 1 (CC) at paras 111 — 127

[3] For a discussion of the power to dissolve Municipal Councils under FC s 139, see Y Hoffman-Wanderer & C Murray 'Suspension and Dissolution of Municipal Councils under s 139 of the Constitution' 2007 TSAR 141.

adopted its own budget or tax laws or if a municipality in a financial crisis does not adhere to a recovery plan imposed by the province. Subsection (5) provides a process for replacing councils with administrators when the financial management of a municipality is in 'crisis' and, again, obliges the provincial executive to act in such cases.

(c) Provincial executives and traditional leaders

'Traditional leadership' and 'indigenous law and customary law' fall under FC Schedule 4.[1] National government and provincial governments therefore have concurrent legislative authority over traditional leaders. The national Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act imposes considerable responsibilities on provinces in relation to traditional leaders.[2] Most provinces with traditional leaders have passed legislation implementing the Act.[3] Among other things, the Act grants premiers an important role in granting and withdrawing recognition from traditional communities, senior traditional leaders, headmen and headwomen. The Act also enables provinces to establish (new) local houses of traditional leaders capable of settling disputes.[4]

[1] Both are 'subject to chapter 12 of the Constitution'. For a general discussion of traditional leadership, see T Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 26, 26-34ff.

[2] Act 41 of 2003.

[3] See, for example, the North West Traditional Leadership and Governance Act 2 of 2005, the Eastern Cape Traditional Leadership and Governance Act 4 of 2005, the KwaZulu-Natal Traditional Leadership and Governance Act 5 of 2005, the Limpopo Traditional Leadership and Institutions Act 6 of 2005, the Free State Traditional Leadership and Governance Act 8 of 2005, and the Mpumalanga Traditional Leadership and Governance Act 3 of 2005. See also T Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' (supra) at 26-21–26-26.

[4] Sections 2, 11, 12, 17 and 21.

Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development,
University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional,
Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
Advocate of the High Court and Member of the Cape Bar
Honorary Research Associate, Department of Public Law, University of Cape Town
Junior Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JUTA

Second Edition, Revision Service 5 2013

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by ANdtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 5: 01–13]

Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development,
University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional,
Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
Advocate of the High Court and Member of the Cape Bar
Honorary Research Associate, Department of Public Law, University of Cape Town
Junior Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JUTA

Second Edition, Revision Service 5 2013

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by ANdtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 5: 01–13]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART I

COURTS, PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT & STRUCTURES OF GOVERNMENT

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
	Volume 1
Structure of Constitutional Analysis
1	A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa	Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop
2	Constitutional History	Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel
3	Constitutional Litigation	Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop Courts
4	Jurisdiction	Sebastian Seedorf
5	Rules & Procedure in Constitutional Matters	Kate Hofmeyr
6	Costs	Michael Bishop
7	Standing, Ripeness & Mootness	Cheryl Loots
8	Amicus	Geoff Budlender
9	Remedies	Michael Bishop
Principles of Government
10	Democracy	Theunis Roux
11	Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution	Frank Michelman
12	Separation of Powers	Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda
13	Founding Provisions	Chris Roederer
14	Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations	Stu Woolman & Theunis Roux
15	Legislative Competence	Victoria Bronstein
16	Conflicts	Victoria Bronstein

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Structures of Government
17	National Legislative Authority	Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga
18	National Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Richard Stacey
19	Provincial Legislative Authority	Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman
20	Provincial Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti
21	Provincial Constitutions	Stu Woolman
	Volume 2
22	Local Government	Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser
23A	Public Administration	Anshal Bodasing
23B	Security Services	Stu Woolman
23C	War Powers	Stephen Ellmann
24	Chapter Nine Institutions:
	24A Public Protector	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
	24B Auditor General	Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte
	24C SA Human Rights Commission	Jonathan Klaaren
	24D Commission for Gender Equality	Cathi Albertyn
	24E Independent Communication Authority of South Africa	Justine White
	24F Commission for the Promotion & the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities	Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo
25	Public Procurement	Glenn Penfold & Pippa Reyburn
26	Traditional Leadership	Tom Bennett & Christina Murray
27	Public Finances	Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem
28	Transitional Provisions	Matthew Chaskalson
29	Elections	Glenda Fick
30	International Law & International Agreements	Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART II
The Bill of Rights

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Operational Provisions
31	Application	Stu Woolman
32	Interpretation	Lourens du Plessis
33	Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights	Sandra Liebenberg
34	Limitations	Stu Woolman & Henk Botha

Volume 3

Substantive Provisions
35	Equality	Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt
36	Dignity	Stu Woolman
37	Reproductive Rights	Michelle O'Sullivan
38	Privacy	David McQuoid-Mason
39	Life	Marius Pieterse
40	Freedom and Security of the Person	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
41	Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion	Paul Farlam
42	Freedom of Expression	Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein
43	Freedom of Assembly	Stu Woolman
44	Freedom of Association	Stu Woolman
45	Political Rights	Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch
46	Property	Theunis Roux
47	Children's Rights	Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton
48	Land	Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill
49	Sentencing and Punishment	Dirk Van Zyl Smit

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
50	Environment	Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson
51	Criminal Procedure: Rights of Detained, Arrested & Accused Persons	Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux
52	Evidence	PJ Schwikkard
	Volume 4
53	Labour Relations	Carole Cooper
54	Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession	Dennis Davis
55	Housing	Kirsty McLean
56	Socio-Economic Rights:
	56A Health	David Bilchitz
	56B Water	Malcom Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa
	56C Food	Danie Brand
	56D Social Security	Mia Swart
57	Education	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
58	Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion	Stu Woolman
59	Access to Courts	Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman
60	Citizenship	Jonathan Klaaren
61	States of Emergency	Nicole Fritz
62	Access to Information	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
63	Just Administrative Action	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
64	Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
65	Official Languages	Iain Currie
66	Movement and Residence	Jonathan Klaaren

21 Provincial Constitutions

Stuart Woolman

21.1 Introduction 21–2
21.2 The content of a provincial constitution 21–5
(a) The basic architecture of the FC ss 142 and 143 21–5
(b) The requirement of legislative competence. 21–9
(c) The limits of difference: structures and procedures and powers. 21–11
(d) Consistency clauses 21–13
(e) Suspensive clauses 21–13
21.3 Certification of a provincial constitutional text 21–14
21.4 Provincial constitution certification cases 21–15
(a) Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal. 21–15
(b) First certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape 21–17
21.5 Conflicts between provincial constitutions and national legislation or the Final Constitution. 21–18

Provincial Constitutions[1]

Adoption of provincial constitutions[2]

142. A provincial legislature may pass a Constitution for its province or, where applicable, amend its constitution, if at least two thirds of its members vote in favour of the Bill.

Contents of provincial constitutions

143 (1) A provincial constitution, or constitutional amendment, must not be inconsistent with this constitution, but may provide for —

(a) provincial legislative or executive structures and procedures that differ from those provided for in this Chapter; or

(b) the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch, where applicable.

(2) Provisions included in a provincial Constitution or constitutional amendment in terms of paragraphs (a) or (b) of subsection (1) —

(a) must comply with the values in s 1 and with Chapter 3; and

(b) may not confer on the province any power or function that falls-

(i) outside the area of provincial competence in terms of Schedules 4 and 5; or

(ii) outside the powers and functions conferred on the province by other sections of the Constitution.

Certification of provincial constitutions

144 (1) If a provincial legislature has passed or amended a constitution, the Speaker of the legislature must submit the text of the Constitution or constitutional amendment to the Constitutional Court for certification.

(2) No text of a provincial Constitution or constitutional amendment becomes law until the Constitutional Court has certified —

(a) that the text has been passed in accordance with section 142; and

(b) that the whole text complies with section 143.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'), ss 142–145. See also Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution'), s 160. IC s 160, Adoption of Provincial Constitutions, read as follows:

(1) The provincial legislature shall be entitled to pass a constitution for its province by a resolution of a majority of at least two-thirds of all its members. (2) A provincial legislature may make such arrangements as it deems appropriate in connection with its proceedings relating to the drafting and consideration of a provincial constitution. (3) A provincial constitution shall not be inconsistent with a provision of this Constitution, including the Constitutional Principles set out in Schedule 4: Provided that a provincial constitution may — provide for legislative and executive structures and procedures different from those provided for in this Constitution in respect of a province; and where applicable, provide for the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch in the province, and shall make such provision for the Zulu Monarch in the case of the province of KwaZulu/Natal. [Sub-s. (3) substituted by s. 8 (a) of Act 2 of 1994 and amended by s. 1 of Act 3 of 1994.] (4) The text of a provincial constitution passed by a provincial legislature, or any provision thereof, shall be of no force and effect unless the Constitutional Court has certified that none of its provisions is inconsistent with a provision referred to in subsection (3), subject to the proviso to that subsection. [Sub-s. (4) substituted by s. 8 (b) of Act 2 of 1994.] (5) A decision of the Constitutional Court in terms of subsection (4) certifying that the text of a provincial constitution is not inconsistent with the said provisions, shall be final and binding, and no court of law shall have jurisdiction to enquire into or pronounce upon the validity of such text or any provision thereof.

[2] See also IC s 160(1). A provincial constitution adopted before the commencement of the Final Constitution had to comply with the requirements of the Interim Constitution. See Item 13 of Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution.

Signing, publication and safekeeping of provincial constitutions

45. (1) The Premier of a province must assent to and sign the text of a provincial constitution or constitutional amendment that has been certified by the Constitutional Court.
(2) The text assented to and signed by the Premier must be published in the national Government Gazette and takes effect on publication or on a later date determined in terms of that constitution or amendment.
(3) The signed text of a provincial constitution or constitutional amendment is conclusive evidence of its provisions and, after publication, must be entrusted to the Constitutional Court for safekeeping.

Other conflicts

147. (1) If there is a conflict between national legislation and a provision of a provincial constitution with regard to (a) a matter concerning which this Constitution specifically requires or envisages the enactment of national legislation, the national legislation prevails over the affected provision of the provincial constitution; (b) national legislative intervention in terms of section 44(2), the national legislation prevails over the provision of the provincial constitution; or (c) a matter within a functional area listed in Schedule 4, section 146 applies as if the affected provision of the provincial constitution were provincial legislation referred to in that section.

21.1 INTRODUCTION

FC ss 142 and 143 grant each province a constitution-making legislative competence. This competence appears to extend the legislative competence conferred on a provincial legislature by FC s 104.[1] However, the judgments of the Constitutional Court in provincial constitution certification cases suggest that this textually distinct competence may be only notionally different than the legislative competence conferred on the provinces by other sections of the Final Constitution. Put pithily, FC ss 142 and 143 do not create a meaningfully independent basis for the exercise of power by the provinces. Unless the Constitutional Court alters fundamentally its reading of the apposite provisions of the Final Constitution or those provisions are amended, provincial constitutions will never amount to anything more than window-dressing.[2]

[1] For more on the legislative competence of the provinces, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15; T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 19.

[2] Provincial constitutions, as currently conceived, can only serve to limit the exercise of provincial power. Provincial legislation or executive conduct in a province without a provincial constitution is measured only against the Final Constitution. Provincial legislation or executive conduct in a province with a provincial constitution would have to satisfy the requirements of both the provincial constitution and the Final Constitution. This potential contraction of the space for action suggests that it is not in the interest of any of the 8 provinces without a constitution to bother promulgating one.

One interlocutor, Professor Robert Williams, wondered whether this assessment of the possibilities for provincial constitutions was not overly pessimistic and whether it failed to take account of the Constitutional Court's recognition that a province could extend its own Bill of Rights beyond the minimum floor established by Final Constitution. Communication with RF Williams, Rutgers University (11 March 2005). Professor Williams misconceives my point. The additional rights enshrined in a provincial constitution will, potentially, subject state action — and private action — to additional constraints. Viewed through the prism of provincial legislature authority, it is hard to see why a province

The Constitutional Court is neither solely nor even primarily culpable for the superfluity of provincial constitutions. Responsibility must be properly apportioned. History, party politics, the electoral system, and, finally, the constitutional text have all conspired to blunt federalist ambitions within the provinces.

The historical moment stretching from CODESA and the MPNF, onto the Interim Constitution and the 1994 elections, through the Constitutional Assembly ('CA') to the certification process for the Final Constitution represented the high-water mark for provincial possibilities. Brinkmanship by the Inkatha Freedom Party ('IFP') from CODESA through the drafting of the Interim Constitution forced the African National Congress ('ANC') to embrace constitutional principles for the drafting of the Final Constitution that accorded far more power to the provinces than they would have otherwise been inclined to provide. Indeed, the Constitutional Court refused to certify the first draft of the Final Constitution in large part because the draft failed to satisfy the minimum conditions for provincial power set out in the Constitutional Principles ('CPs'). But the IFP overplayed its hand. By refusing to participate in the negotiations around the drafting of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution, the IFP surrendered what little control they might have had over how the relationship between national government and provincial government would be structured. So although the would employ a relatively static document — a provincial constitution — to do its bidding when it can realize the very same ends through normal legislation. The rest of this chapter functions as my considered response to Professor Williams' ruminations. As we shall see, FC s 143's consistency requirement sets an extraordinarily high bar for provisions that differ materially from those found in the Final Constitution. Moreover, a province has no authority to pass a constitution that arrogates to the province powers for which it has no pre-existing competence in terms of the Final Constitution. Second, we have no independent set of provincial judiciaries that might develop a more progressive rights-based jurisprudence — grounded in a provincial document — than that found in the national judiciary. Third, South African politics is already beset by problems of unfunded mandates and limited provincial administrative capacity. Just where would the provincial resources — fiscal and human — be found to make a meaningful dent in social domains left untouched by the Final Constitution? Fourth, to the extent that any new provincial initiative conflicts with nationally set imperatives, the provincial initiatives will have a rough go of it. In strictly legal terms, FC s 147 tells us that conflicts between provisions of a provincial constitution and national legislation and/or the Final Constitution will be resolved in favour of the national law. In purely political terms, the ANC's national executive still calls the shots.

Perhaps the differences in our positions are differences in emphasis and I am guilty of overemphasizing the differences. But I think Professor Williams' own writings tend to support my assessment. Professor Wiliams claims, as a general matter, that 'it is a set of political choices as to whether to take advantage of available subnational constitutional space.' Communication with Professor Williams, Rutgers University (11 March 2005). At the same time, he himself notes that when one measures > in legal terms the quantity of subnational constitutional space . . . the United States and Switzerland, at one end, represent[s] a very high quantity of subnational constitutional space . . . The other end of this quantitative continuum might be represented, for example, by South Africa, in which the subnational constitutionmaking space is relatively restricted, with most of the structure of the subnational units (provinces) being contained or 'embodied' within the national constitution itself.

See RF William & GA Tarr 'Subnational Constitutional Space: A View from the States, Provinces, Regions, Länder and Cantons' in GA Tarr, RF Williams & J Marko (eds) Federalism, Sub-national Constitutions and Minority Rights (2000) 3, 5. I simply fail to see how such limited legal space, married to a highly centralized closed list proportional representation system thoroughly dominated by one party, can provide any cause for optimism.

Constitutional Court 'found the provincial powers in the first draft . . . insufficient and sent back the text' so that these powers might be increased, the IFP lacked the ability to influence the re-drafting process.[1] The Constitutional Assembly quite consciously limited its brief to curing the text of the defects identified by the Constitutional Court. As Carmel Rickard notes, once the Constitutional Court had certified the amended text the IFP's goose was cooked:

> [A]s a mechanism to increase provincial powers in the final constitutional text, the CPs (on which Inkatha had pinned some hope) had become a spent force; the CA, which at least to some extent was fuelled by the impetus of negotiation, had completed its work; in Parliament, where the federalists are hopelessly outnumbered, the dictating force is, increasingly, power politics and no longer, as in the past, consideration for negotiation partners or pressure to finalise a mutually agreeable text.[2]

The IFP's failed political strategy not only torpedoed its overweening, over-reaching provincial constitution. It sabotaged any possibility that South Africa would opt for a political system with robust provincial powers. Our political system, grounded firmly in a closed-list proportional representation electoral scheme, concentrates power in political parties. The party chooses the candidates that appear on its lists. As a result, power moves inexorably from the periphery to the centre, or if you prefer, from the bottom to the top. Whatever your preferred locution, the ANC's control of the national government and all nine provincial governments turns the ANC's National Executive Committee into the ultimate arbiter of all political disputes. The consequent absence of political independence in the provinces diminishes the likelihood that any province will bother to draft a provincial constitution that might test the limits of the text or previous certification judgments.[3]

[1] C Rickard 'The Certification of the Constitution of South Africa' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 224, 283. For two first-rate accounts of the federalist debates in both sets of constitutional negotiations, see K Govender 'Federal Features of the Interim Constitution' (1996) 111 Revue d'Etudes Constitutionelles 77; N Haysom 'Federal Features of the Final Constitution' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 504.

[2] Rickard (supra) at 283–284.

[3] This conclusion may strike some as overly speculative. But only two provinces have attempted to draft a provincial constitution. Both provinces — the Western Cape and Kwa-Zulu Natal — were controlled at the time of the drafting of the provincial constitutions by parties other than the ANC. All nine provinces are currently under ANC control. A true test of provincial autonomy — and perhaps of provincial constitution-making power — will only occur when provinces possess the political independence and the political will to test the centre.

Kwa-Zulu Natal is taking another stab at drafting a provincial constitution. Three drafts — by the ANC, the IFP and the DA — are currently on the table. See Draft Constitution of Kwa-Zulu Natal, 2004, Kwa-Zulu Natal Provincial Gazette No 6300, Notice A (10 November 2004). The desire to accord some form of permanent recognition for the King appears to be driving this project. Although the IFP has, historically, identified itself as the party of the Zulu people, the ANC has close political ties with the reigning King. Thus both parties have a horse in this race. Whether the significant differences in the ANC and IFP drafts can be overcome is another matter. Neither party has the votes necessary to pass the provincial constitution on its own. However, the ANC has suggested that if agreement cannot be reached on constitutional recognition of the King, then legislation designed to achieve the same ends will be passed by a simple majority. Interview with Professor W Freedman, University of Kwa-Zulu Natal

That we have but one written provincial constitution may not be such a bad thing. Indeed, the proposition that we have but one written provincial constitution is not entirely correct. As the Constitutional Court has noted, Chapter 6 of Final Constitution lays out a detailed blueprint of provincial structures, processes and powers. This blueprint is the functional equivalent of a provincial constitution. Whether this general blueprint — married to the 'unwritten' constitution sourced in each set of provincial statutes — is an adequate substitute for nine stand-alone provincial constitutions is an inquiry that lies beyond the scope of this chapter.

21.2 The Content of a Provincial Constitution

(a) The basic architecture of the FC ss 142 and 143

In Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 1996, the Constitutional Court confirmed that FC ss 142 and 143 guarantee that a province has the power to design a constitution that regulates the structures, responsibilities and relationships of organs of provincial government.[1] In Ex Parte Speaker of the Provincial Legislature of the Western Cape: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997[2] the Constitutional Court placed the following gloss on provincial constitution-making powers:

> [T]he power is a significant one, enabling a province to regulate its governance in its own fashion, subject to the provisions of [FC] 143. It includes organising the provincial government, regulating, distributing and circumscribing the functions of its different departments, and prescribing the manner in which the powers it derives from the [FC] are to be exercised. It also includes powers incidental to such competences and making provision for or regulating other powers of the type normally found in a Constitution that are not inconsistent with the [FC] or the power relationship it establishes.[3]

The First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape Court is, however, quick to add that provinces need not enact a provincial constitution. The Court notes that:

(15 March 2005). (I am indebted to Professor Freedman for his patient explanation of KZN constitutional politics.) The ANC's fallback position underscores the largely symbolic purpose of the provincial constitutional, its limited practical consequences and the relatively equal status of a provincial constitution and provincial legislation with respect to conflicts with national legislation or the Final Constitution. See § 21.5, infra, on conflicts between provincial constitutions, subsequent amendments to the Final Constitution and national legislation.

[1] 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) at para 4 ('Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal').

[2] 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) at para 8 ('First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape').

[3] See First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 36.

> [C]hapter 6 provides a complete blueprint for the regulation of government within provinces which provides adequately for the establishment and functioning of provincial legislatures and executive.[1]

It seems fair to ask how 'significant a power' provincial constitution-making can, in fact, be, when Chapter 6 of the Final Constitution provides a 'complete blueprint for the regulation of government within provinces.'[2] FC s 143 provides a partial answer to this question.[3]

[1] First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (1997) (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) at para 15. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 350 ('What is contemplated by [FC] 142 and 143 is not a provincial constitution suitable to an independent or confederal State but one dealing with the governance of a province whose powers are derived from the [Final Constitution].') See also RF Williams 'Comparative Sub-national Constitutional Law: South Africa's Provincial Experiments' (1999) 40 South Texas LR 625, 642, 635 ('To this extent, the new South African Constitution serves both as a national and a provincial constitution. It is therefore, much less 'incomplete' than the American and some other federal constitutions. . . . . In the American federal system, there are few national requirements governing the structure and relationship of state government institutions. States are not even . . . required to have constitutions. The American states remain relatively free to devise and change governmental institutions as their citizens see fit.') I M Rautenbach and E F J Malherbe write that: '[I]n contrast, the American, Australian, Canadian and German Constitutions do not contain such provisions and every state of the federation must have its own Constitution in order to function effectively.' Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, 1999) 271. With respect, Professors Rautenbach and Malherbe overstate two distinct propositions: (a) the extent to which other national constitutions contain provisions comparable to FC ss 142 and 143; and (b) whether every state or province in these federations require their own constitution to function effectively. The German Basic Law, in articles 28, 30 and 31, does set out parameters for Lander constitutions similar to those found in FC ss 142, 143 and 147. At the same time, it is not clear that the Lander constitutions contribute meaningfully to governance. See U Karpen 'Subnational Constitutionalism in Germany' Center for the Study of State Constitutions Conference on 'Federalism and Subnational Constitutions: Design and Reform' (2004) available at http://www-camlaw.rutgers.edu/statecon, (accessed on 5 February 2005). The Canadian Constitution permits written provincial constitutions. Only one province — British Columbia — has one. See C Sharman 'The Strange Case of a Provincial Constitution: The British Columbia Constitution Act' (1980) 27 Canadian J of Political Science 1. Even this provincial constitution has a status not substantially different from that of an ordinary statute. Yet, by all accounts, the provinces in Canada — aided by a detailed list of enumerated powers in the federal constitution — possess a significant degree of autonomy. The absence — or presence — of a provincial constitutions would appear to have no palpable effect on the ability of a province to function effectively. See N Wiseman 'Clarifying Provincial Constitutions' (1999) 6 National J of Constitutional Law 269; E Forsey 'Powers of the National and Provincial Governments' How Canadians Govern Themselves (5th Edition, 2003).

[2] First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 15 (emphasis added).

[3] See C Saunders 'Constitutional Arrangements of Federal Systems' (1995) 25 Publius 1; C Saunders 'Legacies of Luck: Australia's Constitution and National Identity in the 1990s' (1999) 15 SAJHR 328. Professor Saunders observes that in those jurisdictions where the states/provinces predate the creation of the federation, very few direct controls of sub-national Constitutions exist. Section 106 of the Australian Constitution, for example, recognizes the continued validity of the constitution of each state. This observation is of limited value. First, the simple fact of pre-existing state constitutions seems to have had little influence on Australian High Court doctrine regarding the relationship between the national and sub-national spheres of government. Australian constitutional law is tilted decidedly in favour of the federal government. See Amalgamated Society of Engineers v Adelaide Steamship Company (1920) 28 CLR 129. The federal structure of the Australian Constitution can, perhaps, be read to allow the states to contest those actions of the national government that 'threaten the existence of the state government institutions or their capacity to function.' C Saunders 'The Relationship Between National and Sub-national Constitutions' (1999) 1, 11 available at http://www.kas.de/db_files/dokumente/7_dokument_dok_pdf_5112_2.pdf, (accessed on 29 November 2004). Second, no more than a handful of existing

According to FC s 143, a provincial constitution cannot be inconsistent with the Final Constitution. As we shall see, the Constitutional Court's construction of this rule has proved the primary inhibitor of provincial constitution-making power.

There are two exceptions to FC s 143's general rule. Under FC s 143(1)(a), a provincial constitution may create legislative or executive structures and procedures that differ from those provided for in the Final Constitution. Under FC s 143(1)(b), a provincial constitution may provide for a traditional monarch.

These two exceptions are, themselves, subject to the following two provisos. First, according to FC s 143(2)(a), any provision in a provincial constitution authorized by FC ss 143(1)(a) and (b) that differs from a comparable provision in the Final Constitution must comport with FC s 1 and FC ss 40 and 41.[1] nations are made up of pre-existing sub-national units that were actually independent entities already in possession of written and entrenched constitutions that governed their internal affairs. For example, the British North America Act of 1867, s 3, created one dominion of Canada out of its several provincial parts. But those provincial parts were never truly autonomous. Moreover, these pre-existing Canadian provinces were granted only those powers enumerated in the British North America Act. The federal government retained all residual powers. That distribution of power is repeated in the Constitution Act of 1982. See P Hogg 'Peace, Order and Good Government' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition, 2001) Chapter 17. Canadian constitutional and political history serves as a cautionary note to those who would make too much of the text. Canadian provinces can flex their muscles today because they have a long history of doing so. More recently, the crisis Quebecois contributed to the mobilization of regional interests elsewhere that, in turn, led to the increased exercise of political independence in other provinces.

So while the National Education Policy Bill Court correctly notes that the drafters of the Final Constitution did not contemplate independent or confederal states, that intent is hardly dispositive. See Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC)('National Education Policy Bill')('Unlike their counterparts in the United States of America, the provinces in South Africa are not sovereign states. They were created by the Constitution and have only those powers that are specifically conferred on them under the Constitution.') Moreover, the National Education Policy Bill Court's comparative constitutional history lesson does not do the work claimed on its behalf. Whatever the status of the 13 former colonies between 1776 and 1791 — the period between the Declaration of Independence and the ratification of the US Constitution — the American Civil War put paid to any notion that state sovereignty entails a correlative right of succession. Many students of South African history would likewise claim that a number of provinces were, at one time, independent states, without claiming that they still possess some residual right of succession.

[1] Requirements in a national Constitution that subnational constitutions must comply with certain principles or values are not uncommon. Article 28 of the Federal Republic of Germany's Basic Law reads: 'The constitutional order of the Lander must conform to the principles of republican, democratic, and social government based on the rule of law, within the meaning of the Basic Law'. Article 28 not only sets general normative limits in the Lander's constitutional autonomy, it ties the understanding of those norms to the Basic Law. In so doing, the Basic Law — and its interpretation by the Constitutional Court — is made the measure of the provisions in a Lander's constitution. Moreover, while article 30 states that 'all government powers not expressly granted in the Basic Law are matters for the Lander,' article 31 holds that '[f]ederal law takes precedence over Land law.' Because the federal government in practice is the dominant political partner, article 30's grant of residual power to the Lander means very little. Articles 28 and 31, read together, ensure that that a provision in the Basic Law will trump a comparable, but conflicting, provision in a Land constitution. See Karpen (supra) at para 13. The federal constitutions in Brazil, Spain, Austria, Russia, Ethiopia and Australia impose similar constraints on sub-national constitutions.

The United States remains a partial, but meaningful, exception to this rule. Although the US Constitution places few express constraints on federal power, many provisions presuppose 'the separate and independent existence' of the states. National League of Cities v Usery 426 US 833, 845 (1976)('National League'). Moreover, unlike article 30 of the German Basic Law, the residual power clause in the US Constitution retains its teeth. The Tenth Amendment of the US Constitution reads: 'The powers not reserved to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.' Over time, the Tenth Amendment — read with other 'tacit postulates' of state power found in the US Constitution — has been interpreted to mean that Congress may not exercise power in a fashion that impairs a state's integrity or its ability to function effectively in the federal system. See Nevada v Hall 440 US 410, 433 (1979)(That general statement echoes South Africa's own understanding of the principles of co-operative governance.) Debates over the exact contours of state sovereignty — and what federal government action is inconsistent with such sovereignty — have roiled constitutional waters for the last 70 years. Before 1936, American courts regularly struck down federal legislation that attempted to ensure better working conditions for women, children and the poor on the grounds that said legislation violated state or local government sovereignty. After Carter v Carter Coal Company, four decades passed in which the US Supreme Court did not invalidate a single federal statute on such grounds. 298 US 238 (1936). Many thought the Tenth Amendment had lost its value as an independent check on federal power. But in 1976, the Supreme Court, in National League, held that the Tenth Amendment prevented the national government from making federal minimum wage law applicable to state and local government employees. The Tenth Amendment was back in business. Then a range of cases litigated in the 1980s cut back the effect of National League. In Garcia v San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, the Supreme Court held that if Congress, acting pursuant to the Commerce Clause power, regulated the states, the Supreme Court would view such regulation in the same manner as regulation of a private party. 469 US 528 (1985)('Garcia'). Garcia remained good law for all of seven years. The Supreme Court's 'new federalism' once again prevents the federal government from coercing states into creating or promoting federal regulatory schemes. See, eg, New York v United States 505 US 144 (1992); Arden v Maine 527 US 706 (1999).

Extant South African case law on legislative competence suggests that our own federalism doctrines could follow a similar trajectory. See DVB Behuising (Pty) Limited v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347(CC)('DVB Behuising') at para 17 (Constitutional Court holds that '[i]n the interpretation of the schedules [governing legislative competence] there is no presumption in favour of either the national legislature or the provincial legislatures. The functional areas must be purposively interpreted in a manner which will enable the national Parliament and the provincial legislatures to exercise their respective legislative powers fully and effectively.') See also Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Liquor Bill'); V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15 (Bronstein suggests that the functional approach of the Constitutional Court to competence questions is best captured by the language of Constitutional Principle XX1.1: 'The level at which decisions can be taken most effectively in respect of the quality and rendering of services, shall be the level responsible and accountable for the quality and the rendering of the services, and such level shall accordingly be empowered by the Constitution to do so.')

Perhaps more germane for our analysis of South African provincial constitutions is the relative status of US state constitutions vis-à-vis the US federal constitution. Neither the 'certification' process nor the canons of interpretation for US state constitutions constrict subnational constitutional space to quite the same degree as South Africa's Final Constitution.

The US Constitution enables the US Congress — and the President — to place some conditions on US state constitutions. Article IV, s 3, reads, in relevant part: 'New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.' Article IV, s 4, reads, in relevant part: 'The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government.' Should a state constitution 'contain provisions of which Congress or the President disapprove', they can force the state to alter the offending provision before consenting to the enabling legislation granting their admission. See RF Williams & GA Tarr 'Subnational Constitutional Space: A View from the States, Provinces, Regions, Länder and Cantons' in GA Tarr, RF Williams & J Marko (eds) Federalism, Sub-national Constitutions and Minority Rights (2000) 3, 5. But this power is of limited duration. For example, as Professors Williams and Tarr note, Congress was able to dictate the terms of constitutions that 'southern states adopted in the aftermath of the Civil War' by 'requiring an acceptable constitution as a condition for 'readmission' to the Union.' (The irony, if course, was that the Union had not recognized the secession.) Ibid at 6. These states soon

Second, according to FC s 143(2)(b), no provision in a provincial constitution may confer on a province more powers than it already possesses under the Final Constitution.[1]

(b) The requirement of legislative competence

The Constitutional Court has given this second proviso both a narrow reading and an expansive reading. The Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal Court held that a provincial constitution could not contain provisions on any matters upon which the Final Constitution does not already give the province the power to legislate.[2] So, for example, a provincial constitution may purport to arrogate powers to the province by repeating verbatim averments in the Final Constitution. However, to the extent that the Final Constitution does not actually grant the provinces the power to exercise authority over such matters — say, because they fall within the purview of another sphere of government — disowned these documents and supplanted them with constitutions designed to entrench white political power. However, neither Congress nor the President sought to use Article IV, s 4 to thwart the obvious threat such changes posed to the US Constitution's commitment to republican government. Ibid. See also JVE Ely Jr An Uncertain Tradition: Constitutionalism and the History of the South (1989). The initial power over admittance does not grant Congress or the courts the authority to supervise and to certify, on an ongoing basis, the consistency of a state constitution with the US Constitution. That said, other provisions of the US Constitution do constrain subnational constitutional space. Under the Supremacy Clause, Williams and Tarr write, 'national law is superior to state law, so that in cases of conflict, valid national enactments — be they constitutional provisions, statutes or administrative regulations — prevail over state constitutional provisions.' Williams & Tarr (supra) at 7.

With respect to the interpretation of a state constitution, it is the state's highest court, and no federal court, not even the US Supreme Court, that is the ultimate arbiter of its meaning. See, eg, Michigan v Long 463 US 1032 (1983)(Where an adequate and independent state ground for a decision exists, US Supreme Court exercises no appellate jurisdiction); Murdoch v Memphis 87 US 590 (1874). See also R Althouse 'How to Build a Separate Sphere: State Courts and Federal Power' (1987) 100 Harvard LR 1485 (Adequate and independent state ground doctrine protects the autonomy of states at the same time that it ensures supremacy and uniformity of federal law). When it comes to the content of the state constitutions, state constitutions can provide more rights than the US Constitution. See Pruneyard Shopping Centre v Robbins 447 US 74 (1980)(State constitution may provide more rights, and those rights may constitute adequate and independent grounds of a state court decision so long as they do not impair the exercise of a right guaranteed in the US Constitution.) See also W Brennan 'State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights' (1997) 90 Harvard LR 489. They cannot, as a practical matter, provide less. Were a state court to interpret its own constitution as providing fewer rights than the federal constitution, it would still have to 'enforce the higher federal standards' because those standards are the supreme law of the land. R F Williams 'American State Constitutional Law' Center for the Study of State Constitutions Conference on 'Federalism and Sub-national Constitutions: Design and Reform' (2004) available at http://www-camlaw.rutgers.edu/statecon, (accessed on 5 February 2005).

[1] See Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 8. See also Minister of the Interior v Harris 1952 (4) SA 769, 790 (A)(Court, in striking down the Separate Representation of Voters Act, held that 'No legislative organ can perform an act of levitation and lift itself above its own powers by the bootstraps of method.') identically worded provisions in a provincial constitution that purport to grant the province such authority cannot be certified.[1]

[2] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 24.

The First Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape Court, on the other hand, held that it was permissible for a provincial constitution to contain certain kinds of provisions not expressly contemplated by the extant legislative competence of the province.[2] Such matters range from qualifications for membership in provincial legislatures to the creation of procedures that would enable members of the provincial legislature to seek abstract review of a piece of provincial legislation.[3]

The First Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape Court explains its willingness to depart from the Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal Court's strict construction of FC s 143(2) as follows. The proposed Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal ('KZN text') repeated phrases from the Final Constitution Court that 'had nothing to do with provincial powers or competence.'[4] The proposed Constitution of the Province of Western Cape ('WC text') repeated phrases from the Final Constitution Court that 'directly affect governance within the province.'[5]

---

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 26. For example, because the creation of a court system does not fall within the purview of the provinces, provinces cannot meaningfully protect the right to a fair trial. Similarly, since a province has no authority to call for a state of emergency, the provincial constitution cannot purport to regulate the conditions for a state of emergency. So while the language of the two constitutions with regard to these provisions might be perfectly consistent, or even identical, the purpose of the provisions is not. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at paras 349–350 citing Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 5:

> [I]n the proceedings for the certification of the KwaZulu-Natal Constitution, we . . . said: '. . . whatever meaning is ascribed to 'structures and procedures' they do not relate to the fundamental nature and substance of the democratic State created by the interim Constitution nor to the substance of the legislative or executive powers of the national Parliament or Government or those of the provinces.' We also make clear in that judgment that a provincial legislature manifestly does not have the power, through adopting a constitution, to alter the power relationship between itself and the national level of government, or to usurp powers which are not vested in it under the IC. It follows that . . . [FC] 143(2) is no different in substance from IC 160(3). It is true that in . . . [FC] 143(2)(a) there is a directive that provincial constitutions must comply with . . . [FC] chapter 3 and the values in . . . [FC] 1, but in the context of . . . [FC] 142 and 143 this does not mean that what is contemplated is a constitution in which these values must be separately identified. What it does mean is simply that nothing in a provincial constitution may conflict with . . . [FC] chap 3 or the values in . . . [FC] 1. It makes clear that the inconsistency referred to in . . . [FC] 143(1) extends to such matters and that they do not fall within the exemption made in . . . [FC] 143(1)(a). In the result, what is contemplated by . . . [FC] 142 and 143 is not a provincial constitution suitable to an independent or confederal State but one dealing with the governance of a province whose powers are derived from the . . . [FC]. On that analysis there is no real departure from the power of constitution-making which a provincial government enjoys in terms of IC 160. That power, properly analysed, is a power subject to the same limitations and the same potential which we have identified in . . . [FC] 142 and 143.

See also Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature, & Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 62 (Supports proposition that any attempt to make Parliament's legislative authority subject to the will of a province is unconstitutional.)

[2] See First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 36. See also Iain Currie & Johan De Waal The New Constitutional & Administrative Law (2001) 205.

[3] See First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at paras 24–25, and 51.

[4] Ibid at para 22.

[5] Ibid.

(c) The limits of difference: Structures and procedures and powers

FC s 143(1)(a) allows a provincial constitution to provide for 'legislative or executive structures and procedures that differ from those provided for in' the Final Constitution. The First Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape Court held that this limited exception to the consistency principle goes to the form of provincial legislative or executive structures and procedures, and not their substance.

'Form as structure' captures the 'composition and organization of a province's institutions.'[1] The WC text changed the numbers of members in both the Western Cape legislature and the Western Cape executive from those prescribed by the Final Constitution. Since these alterations went solely to form of the institutions and had no effect on the kind of power they exercise, the Constitutional Court found the changes to be unobjectionable.[2]

'Form as procedure' captures 'the manner in which [provinces] exercise their powers.'[3] The WC text allowed members of the Western Cape legislature to seek abstract review of a piece of provincial legislation. Since these provisions had no effect on the substance of provincial legislation, but merely regulated the process by which legislation is vetted and passed, the Constitutional Court found the modifications to be innocuous.[4]

But neither 'form as structure' nor 'form as procedure' is infinitely elastic. The First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape Court refused to certify the WC text because the WC text attempted to substitute a geographic multi-member constituency system for the closed-list proportional representation system set out in the Final Constitution. The province contended that a variation in the electoral system was a matter of form. The Court did not view this mutation as simply incidental to the province's constitution-making powers. Though the Court's reasoning remains somewhat opaque, the judgment must stand for the proposition that the manner in which votes in elections are converted into the seats of representatives goes to the heart — the substance — of the power exercised by the legislature.[5] But why, exactly, is abstract review of legislation a matter of procedure and the electoral system a matter of power? Or better still, why is an increase in the number of legislators a matter of form, but the manner of selection a matter of substance?

The Court's first answer is that 'the choice of electoral system has a material

[1] First Certificate of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 16.
[2] Ibid at paras 51 and 59–61.
[3] Ibid at para 16.
[4] Ibid at paras 24–26.
[5] Ibid at para 48 ('When [FC] 143(1)(a) permits a provincial Constitution to provide for a provincial legislative structure different from that provided for in [FC] chap 6, it permits no more than a difference regarding the nature and number of the elements constituting the legislative structure. An electoral system not only does not constitute one of these elements but also has no effect on the nature or the number of such elements. It is accordingly not encompassed within the permissive provisions of [FC] 143(1)(a).') bearing on the degree of correspondence between votes cast and seats won.'[1] Well, on those terms, the increase in the number of legislators also has a 'material bearing on the degree of correspondence between votes cast and seats won.' Increase the number of seats in a provincial legislature and the degree of correspondence between votes cast and seats won also increases. The Court's first answer proffers a distinction without a difference.

The Court's second answer is that the electoral system is not a legislative or an executive structure: a change to the number of MPLs does change the legislative structure; a change in the electoral system does not change the legislative structure. This is an unadulterated boot-strapping exercise. The change in the electoral system is held not to alter 'the nature or the number of . . . constitutent elements' in a legislative structure because the extension of the terms 'nature' or 'constituent elements' — for the purposes of FC s 143 analysis — embraces only numbers, seats, or posts. So, ipso facto, a change in the electoral system cannot be a change in the legislative structure.[2]

This test may, as the First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape Court asserts, have the virtue of being clear.[3] Whether the test amounts to much more than a tautology is another matter. What the Court really seems to want to say — but has a hard time saying straight out — is that the selection of representatives — and thus the issue of who governs whom — is too inextricably bound up with actual substantive outcomes to be treated as mere window dressing.[4]

[1] First Certificate of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at para 45.

[2] The Court's logic is reflected in the following passage:

> When [FC] 143(1)(a) permits a provincial constitution to provide for a provincial legislative structure different from that provided for in [FC] chapter 6, it permits no more than a difference regarding the nature and number of the elements constituting the legislative structure. An electoral system not only does not constitute one of these elements but also has no effect on the nature or the number of such elements. It is accordingly not encompassed within the permissive provisions of [FC] 143(1)(a).

Ibid at para 48.

[3] Ibid at para 49.

[4] The Court's rejection of a system of 'geographic multi-member constituencies' suggests that members of the Court had not forgotten how instrumental the gerrymandering of geographic constituencies had been in creating the requisite political environment for apartheid. However, the Constitutional Court's subsequent judgment in United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa (No 2) reflects its reluctance to make pronouncements on the link between electoral systems and substantive outcomes. 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM'). The UDM Court rightly noted that the political institutions of a multi-party democracy can take many forms commensurate with the general dictates of the Final Constitution. (FC ss 46 (1) and 105 (1), governing the composition of and election to the National Assembly and provincial legislatures, respectively, require electoral systems that 'result, in general, in proportional representation.') The UDM Court could finesse the more treacherous question as to whether the floor-crossing legislation met the minimum requirements for the kind of democracy contemplated by the Final Constitution because Parliament had failed to satisfy the technical timing requirements for floor-crossing legislation. See also Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 5 ('Whatever meaning is ascribed to "structures and procedures," they do not relate to the fundamental nature and substance of the democratic State created by the interim Constitution nor to the substance of the legislative or executive powers of the national Parliament or Government or those of the provinces.' (Emphasis added).)

(d) Consistency clauses

The crafty drafters of the Constitution of KwaZulu-Natal ('KZN text') sought to circumvent IC 160(3)'s consistency requirement by including two consistency requirements of their own. Chapter 1, s 1(9) of the KZN text stated that

> This Constitution, to the extent that it is not inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, shall be the supreme law of the Province.

Chapter 4, s 1(1) of the KZN text read, in relevant part:

> Any provision of this Constitution . . . including the allocation of powers and functions, but excluding the provisions relating to legislative and executive structures and procedures as set out in s 160(3) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, which is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, shall have no force and effect.

The Constitutional Court rejected these attempts both to pre-empt the Constitutional Court's assessment of all the provisions of the KZN text and to ensure that any constitutionally suspect provisions in the KZN text did not prevent certification. In short, the Constitutional Court held that it was obliged to evaluate every provision of the provincial constitutional text, and that IC s 160 prevented the Court from certifying anything except a complete and a compliant constitutional text.[1] Ironically, even if that the rest of the KZN text had been consistent with the Interim Constitution, these clauses themselves would have prevented certification because they conflicted with the desiderata of IC s 160(4).

(e) Suspensive clauses

Another clever, if defective, dodge by the authors of the KZN text took the form of two suspensive clauses. Chapter 4, s 1(2) of the KZN text stated that Chapters 5 and 8 of the KZN text would come into effect (a) 'only when the interim Constitution is replaced by the Final Constitution'; (b) 'only to the extent that their provisions are consistent with the Final Constitution'; and only if the powers of KZN are 'not . . . substantially reduced' by the provisions of the Final Constitution. Chapter 14, s 2(12), read, in relevant part:

> The provisions of this Constitution shall have no force and effect if and to the extent that they are not consistent with the constitution referred to in chapter 5 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, provided that the powers and functions of this Province with regard to its legislative authority and its power to pass a constitution are consistent with the constitution referred to in chapter 5 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, and further provided that such powers are not substantially inferior to those provided for in the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993.

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at paras 36–38.

Chapter 14, s 2(12) was not, strictly speaking, a suspensive clause. It bears more than a passing resemblance to the consistency clauses in the KZN text. What turns this clause into a suspensive clause is the proviso that the KZN text must be consistent with the provisions of the Final Constitution. Given that the Final Constitution itself had yet to be certified, final certification of the KZN text was effectively suspended. These two suspensive clauses, along with the clauses they alleged suspended, were held to be constitutionally infirm on three distinct grounds.

First, the KZN text could not make its certification contingent upon the content of the Final Constitution. IC s 160 only empowered a provincial legislature to adopt a constitution consistent with the constitutional order governed by the Interim Constitution. IC 160 could not govern — nor did it make provision for — the certification process under the Final Constitution. To the extent that the KZN text was contingent upon the content of the Final Constitution, it could not be certified. Second, the text of the suspended provisions — found in Chapters 5 and 10, Chapter 6, s 2(1) and Chapter 13 — were patently inconsistent with the Interim Constitution and could not be certified under the Interim Constitution. Third, the KZN text suspended numerous provisions for a period of six months from commencement of the KZN Constitution. The enactment of these provisions was made contingent upon the outcome of various future votes within the provincial legislature and the House of Traditional Leaders.[1] The Constitutional Court held that satisfaction of IC s 160 required 'a constitutional text that has been adopted; not one that might be adopted or might be repudiated dependent on decisions still to be taken.'[2] Once again, the Constitutional Court held that IC s 160 prevented the Court from certifying anything except a complete and compliant constitutional text. The suspensive clauses, like the consistency clauses before them, made the KZN text anything but final.

21.3 Certification of a Provincial Constitutional Text

FC s 144 attempts to create greater certainty in provincial law.[3] It does so in the following manner. FC s 144(2)(b) precludes the Constitutional Court from certifying a provincial constitution in a piecemeal fashion. It must certify the entire document or nothing at all.[1] Once certified by the Constitutional Court, the exercise of provincial power in terms of the provisional constitution is not vulnerable to constitutional challenge on the grounds that the provincial constitution in toto is invalid.[2] However, as FC 147 makes abundantly clear, the Final Constitution contemplates the possibility that subsequent amendments to the Final Constitution and both extant and future pieces of national legislation may conflict with a provision of a provincial constitution.[3] The problem — apparently unnoticed by the Constitutional Court and commentators alike — is that FC s 147 contemplates conflicts between extant national legislation and a provincial constitution. As I note below, such a conflict, if resolved in favour of the national legislation would render a provision of the provincial constitution inoperative, as an objective matter, from the very moment that the provision of the provincial constitution is certified.[4]

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 45 ('Chapters 1 and 3, and certain provisions of chapter 9, were suspended for a period of six months from the commencement of the KZN Constitution, and will not come into force if during that period a resolution to that effect is passed by 40% of the members of the provincial Legislature; at the same time it is provided that chapter 8 and certain provisions of chapters 9, 12 and 13 will have no force and effect unless they are approved during that period by the provincial Legislature by two-thirds of all its members after consideration of the relevant provisions by a Constitutional Commission; and certain other provisions of chapter 9 only if, in addition, the House of Traditional Leaders has been consulted.')

[2] Ibid at para 46 (Emphasis added).

[3] Ibid at paras 11 and 37.

21.4 PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTION CERTIFICATION CASES

(a) Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal[5]

The KZN text, as we have already seen, was fatally flawed.[6]

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 10.

[2] IC s 160(5) barred expressly any court from enquiring into the validity of a provision of a provincial constitution once that provincial constitution had been certified. Such a provision does not appear in the Final Constitution. The lack of consistency between the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution in this regard could have created two distinct legal regimes for provincial constitutions. Provincial constitutions certified under the Interim Constitution would have been immunized entirely — at least in the abstract — from constitutional challenges as to the validity of all those provisions certified under the Interim Constitution. Provincial constitutions certified under the Final Constitution are not so immunized. Fortunately, no provincial constitutions were certified under the Interim Constitution. No inconsistency in treatment can arise.

[3] See § 21.5 infra, on conflicts between provincial constitutions, subsequent amendments to the Final Constitution and national legislation.

[4] See § 21.5 infra, on how such a conflict can be squared with the certification requirements of consistency and finality.

[5] 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC). Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal was brought under the Interim Constitution, s 160. However, the Court's reasoning applies to certification cases brought under the Final Constitution. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 350 (Court stated that the constitution-making power of a province under the Final Constitution was subject to the same limitations as it had been under the Interim Constitution.) For an illuminating account of the political machinations behind the KZN text, see G Devenish 'The Making and Significance of the Draft Kwazulu-Natal Constitution' (1995) 9 Yearbook of South African Law 3.

[6] So flawed was the KZN text that the Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal Court felt obliged, at the end of its judgment, to note that the grounds upon which the Court refused certification did not exhaust the grounds for such refusal. It wrote:

The KZN text's greatest offence was to attempt to structure relationships and to assign powers that fell well beyond the competence of a provincial constitution. Chapter 1, s 1(1) described KwaZulu as a 'self-governing province'. Chapter 1, s 1(5) revised the relationship between the province and the national government. Chapter 1, s 1(8) asserted that the KZN text set out the basis of interaction between the province and the rest of the Republic. Chapter 5 conferred certain exclusive powers on the province and vested other exclusive powers in the national government. As the Certification of the Constitution of the Province of Kwa-Zulu-Natal Court noted, 'the provinces are the recipients and not the source of power' and 'no provision in the Interim Constitution … empowers a province to regulate its own status' or 'its relationship to the national government.'[1] These provisions violated, with a vengeance, the consistency requirement of IC s 160.[2]

The KZN text's other major sin, as discussed at length above, were its efforts to circumvent the Constitutional Court's certification process through consistency clauses[3] and suspensive clauses.[4] In short, the inclusion of suspensive clauses and consistency clauses defeated the ends of 'finality and certainty' that the Interim Constitution's certification process was designed to achieve.[5]

Our analysis has been directed to the flaws relating to what we have categorised as the usurpation of national powers, the consistency clauses and the suspensive conditions. It is necessary to emphasise that our discussion does not purport to be an all-embracing one, for to have done so would have been supererogatory, given the widely flawed nature of the provincial constitution. It should therefore not be seen as definitive, either in regard to the three categories we have identified or in other respects. Should the KZN Legislature decide to adopt a new or amended provincial constitution, and in the interest of avoiding disputes over the future certification of a replacement, account will no doubt be taken of the detailed objections lodged this time and on which we pass no judgment now.

Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 47. See also Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 35 (After identifying some of the many ways in which the KZN text usurped national power, the Court wrote: 'We have not attempted to detail all the offending provisions. It is not necessary to do so.')

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at paras 14 - 16. See also Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 Of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC)('Unlike their counterparts in the United States of America, the provinces in South Africa are not sovereign states. They were created by the Constitution and have only those powers that are specifically conferred on them under the Constitution.')

[2] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at paras 14–35. The Court described each of these violations as a usurpation of national powers. However, it should be clear from our discussion of the requirement of legislative competence that not every assertion of a novel legislative competence in a provincial constitution constitutes a usurpation of national government prerogatives. See § 21.2*(b)* supra.

[3] See § 21.2*(d)* supra.

[4] See § 21.2*(e)* supra.

[5] The Constitutional Court rejected the KZN text because the suspensive conditions and consistency clauses in the provincial constitutional text barred (or at least attempted to bar) the 'Court from testing any provision in the provincial Constitution against the requirements of [IC s] 160(3)' and prevented the Court from finding that any of the provincial constitution's provisions were either consistent or inconsistent with the Interim Constitution. Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 36.

Finally, the KZN text contained provisions within its Bill of Rights on the right to a fair trial and states of emergency.[1] These provisions neither fall within FC s 143(1)(a) or (b)'s exceptions nor comply with FC s 143's consistency requirement.

(b) First certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape

The Constitution of the Western Cape ('WC text') fared far better than the KZN text. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court declined to certify the WC text on three separate grounds. First, the geographic multi-member constituencies endorsed by the provincial constitution could neither be squared with the closed list proportional representation system found in the Final Constitution nor saved by the legislative structure exception found within FC s 143(1)(a).[2] Second, the WC text's insistence that the Judge President of the High Court of the Western Cape perform certain ceremonial functions and administer various oaths of office was inconsistent with the Final Constitution's requirement that that the President of the Constitutional Court discharge these same duties.[3] Third, WC text s 46(3) did not simply restate the Final Constitution's bar on paid work by MECs: it went on to grant the provincial legislature the power to promulgate legislation governing the meaning of paid work. The Constitutional Court held that ethical concerns about unpaid work by MECs did not fall within FC s 143(1)(a)'s executive structure or procedure exception.[4] The Constitutional Court then found that FC s 136(2) proscribed paid work by MECs, that 'paid work' could only have one meaning and that any debate over the meaning of 'paid work' would have to be decided by the courts. The WC text's assertion that the province could weigh in on the meaning of 'paid work' created the possibility that each province would arrive at a different conclusion about the meaning of 'paid work'. The Constitutional Court held that because 'paid work' under the Final Constitution could have only one meaning, any potential for deviation from that univocal — but still undetermined — definition created the conditions for inconsistency.[5]

This final argument over 'paid work' is not particularly coherent. It is not clear that only one meaning can be attached to 'paid work' — compensation takes many forms. It is not clear that FC s 136(2) bars parties other than the courts from giving content to the term 'paid work'. It is hard to understand how the Constitutional Court can assert simultaneously that that there is but one definition for paid work and that the courts alone are empowered to resolve disputes about the meaning of 'paid work'. There is either one meaning or there isn't. If only the courts have the power to decide the meaning of 'paid work', how would a

[1] See Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at paras 17–31.
[2] For a more detailed discussion of the Constitutional Court's objection to geographic multi-member constituencies, see § 21.2*(c)* supra.
[3] See First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at paras 52–56.
[4] Ibid at para 65.
[5] Ibid at para 66.

dispute ever arise? Normally, one would expect some disagreement between state actors over the correct understanding of a term of art like 'paid work' to give rise to a dispute. One would expect that disagreement to arise, in part, out of legislation that gives the term content. Moreover, FC s 136(2) does not say that determining the extension of the term 'paid work' by MECs is the prerogative of national government or the object of super-ordinate legislation promulgated by Parliament.

What may actually drive the Western Cape Court's conclusion is not FC s 143(1)(a) or FC s 136(2), but FC s 143(1)(b) and FC s 136(1). The refusal to allow the provincial government to pass such legislation makes some sense if viewed in the context of legislative competence. Neither FC Schedule 4 nor FC Schedule 5 speaks to codes of ethics or conditions of employment. Thus, FC s 143(1)(b) offers no safe harbour for a provision of a provincial constitution that engages the meaning of 'paid work'. FC s 136(1) makes legislation on the ethical conduct of MECs the prerogative of national government. It seems reasonable to assume — from the text alone — that national legislation will engage the meaning of 'paid work' in the context of a code of ethics.[1] But FC s 136(2) does not demand that national legislation do so. This textual silence around the content of super-ordinate national legislation on a code of ethics and whether the meaning of 'paid work' is to be addressed in the legislation contemplated by FC s 136(1) means that FC s 143's consistency requirement is not expressly violated.

The three 'defects' in the WC text identified by the Western Cape Court were easily remedied. The amended WC text was submitted for certification without opposition and duly certified.[2]

21.5 Conflicts between Provincial Constitutions and National Legislation or the Final Constitution

FC s 147 contemplates the possibility of conflicts between certified provincial constitutions and (a) subsequent amendments to the Final Constitution; (b) super-ordinate national legislation (c) national override legislation and (d) national legislation in areas of concurrent legislative competence. Such conflicts are dealt with at length elsewhere in this work.[3] It is worth noting that FC s 147 limits,

[1] The Executive Members Ethics Act 82 of 1998, s 2(1), contemplates the prohibition of other paid work by MECs in the context of a code of ethics: 'The President must . . . publish a code of ethics prescribing standards and rules aimed at promoting open, democratic and accountable government and with which Cabinet members, Deputy Ministers and MECS must comply in performing their official responsibilities. (2) The code of ethics must — (b) include provisions prohibiting Cabinet members, Deputy Ministers and MECS from — (i) undertaking any other paid work.' See the Draft Code of Ethics for Members of Cabinet, Deputy Ministers, and Members of Executive Councils (National Council of Provinces, 16 May 2000)(The code has not yet been promulgated).

[2] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Western Cape 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC)('Second Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape'). For a brief account of the drafting history of the WC text, see D Brand 'The Western Cape Provincial Constitution' (2000) 31 Rutgers LJ 961.

[3] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 16.

even if it does not quite defeat, the Constitutional Court's efforts to guarantee that the certification of a provincial constitution is both final and certain.[1]

As I suggested above, a strong reading of FC s 147 would make a provincial constitution's certification contingent upon its consistency with the extant national legislation identified in categories (b), (c) and (d).[2] Any such conflict resolved in favour of the national legislation would render the provision of the provincial constitution inoperative, as an objective matter, from the very moment that the provision of the provincial constitution was certified. Any provision of a provincial constitution that will be stillborn at the moment of birth hardly satisfies the general conditions of finality and certainty said to govern this process.

Two good reasons explanations exist, however, for why the Constitutional Court has not remarked upon this possibility and why no one ought to be particularly vexed by the interaction between FC s 147 and FC ss 142, 143 and 144. First, as a strictly technical matter, certification of a provincial constitution or a provincial constitutional amendment only requires that they not be inconsistent with the Final Constitution. Certification does not require consistency with national legislation. Second, were the Constitutional Court to treat provisions of a provincial constitution that could be inconsistent with national legislation in the same manner as it has treated suspensive clauses and consistency clauses in a [1] Recall that one of the primary grounds for rejecting the KZN text was the presence of clauses that made it 'impossible' to determine whether a given provision in the provincial constitution was 'inconsistent with provisions of the interim Constitution.' Such a result, the Constitutional Court said, could not be tolerated because it would defeat '[t]he objectives of finality and certainty.' Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 36. At the same time, the Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal Court states that:

> If the conflict is resolved in favour of one of the conflicting laws the other is not invalidated, 'it is subordinated and, to the extent of the conflict, rendered inoperative'. A law so subordinated is not nullified; 'it remains in force and has to be implemented to the extent that it is not inconsistent with the law that prevails (and) (i)f the inconsistency falls away the law would then have to be implemented in all respects.

Ibid at para 9 citing Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at paras 16 and 19. Even if a provision in a provincial constitution cannot be invalidated in terms of FC s 147, a result in favour of the national government under FC s 147 would have the effect of rendering inoperative a provision of a provincial constitution. See also Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 272 ('[FC] 147 does not encroach upon the legitimate political autonomy of the provinces. It does no more than preserve the relationship between the [FC] and provincial constitutions. It makes clear that a provincial constitution cannot alter the power relationship established by the [FC], that it cannot increase the powers vested in the provincial government under the [FC] and that it cannot reduce or otherwise seek to modify the powers vested in Parliament by the [FC]. In doing so it gives effect to CP IV which states: 'The Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. It shall be binding on all organs of State at all levels of government.' The provisions of [FC] 147 do not in our view encroach upon the legitimate autonomy of the provinces.') provincial constitution, it would make the certification process inordinately more complicated. Provincial constitutions would have to be tested against the text of the Final Constitution and the texts of existing pieces of national legislation. FC s 147 should be read, therefore, as recognizing the potential for such conflicts with national legislation, but wisely disaggregating such assessments from the certification process.[1]

[2] See § 21.3 supra.

[1] FC ss 149 and 150 lend some support to this proposition. FC s 150 provides a canon of interpretation for conflicts between national legislation and a provincial constitution. It reads: 'When considering an apparent conflict between national and provincial legislation, or between national legislation and a provincial constitution, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation or constitution that avoids a conflict, over any alternative interpretation that results in a conflict.' So until a real conflict arises, we should not anticipate one. FC s 149 suggests that there is a signal difference between a conflict that renders a provision inoperative, and a conflict that renders a provision invalid. FC s 149 reads: 'A decision by a court that legislation prevails over other legislation does not invalidate that other legislation, but that other legislation becomes inoperative for as long as the conflict remains.' Thus a provision of a provincial constitution that falls before a piece of national legislation does not offend the Final Constitution. It is, therefore, not inconsistent with the Final Constitution for the purposes of certification analysis. It is merely inoperative. Some might argue that the status of a provincial constitutional provision that remains dormant for the duration of a conflict with national legislation bears a striking similarity to the status of the KZN text suspensive provisions that ran afoul of the IC's consistency requirement. The answer, I think, is that such a hypothetical provision would not offend the Final Constitution. Suspensive conditions do.

22 Local Government

Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser

22.1 Introduction 22–1
(a) History 22–1
(b) Comparative constitutional recognition 22–5
(c) Process of constitutionalization 22–7
(d) Statutory framework 22–12
(e) Constitutional amendments 22–13
(f) Local self-government 22–15
22.2 Municipal Governance 22–16
(a) Establishment of municipalities 22–16
(i) Boundaries 22–17
(ii) Categories of municipalities 22–18
(iii) Types 22–20
(iv) Official languages 22–23
(b) Municipal elections 22–24
(i) Term of office of municipal councils 22–24
(ii) Electoral system 22–24
(iii) Membership 22–27
(c) Political structures and procedures 22–32
(i) Constitutional development 22–32
(ii) Municipal Council 22–35
(iii) Executive 22–40
(iv) Traditional leaders 22–41
22.3 Municipal Powers and Functions 22–42
(a) Introduction 22–42
(b) FC section 151(3) 22–43
(i) 'Right to govern' 22–43
(ii) 'On its own initiative' 22–45

(iii) 'Local government affairs of its community' 22–46
(iv) 'Subject to national and provincial legislation' 22–49
(v) 'As provided for in the Constitution' 22–50
(vi) National powers and provincial powers over original local government matters 22–51
(c) Division of powers and functions within local government 22–58
(d) Additional powers and functions 22–58
22.4 Municipal Services 22–63
(a) Scope of municipal services 22–64
(b) Obligation to provide basic services 22–66
(c) Realising socio-economic rights through service provision 22–72
(d) Method of providing services 22–73
(e) Reciprocal nature of providing services: duty to pay for consumption 22–73
(i) The power to charge fees 22–73
(ii) The nature of the tariff setting 22–75
(iii) The duty to charge fees? 22–76
(iv) Duty to pay fees 22–77
(v) Duty to collect debts and the constitutionality of enforcement mechanisms 22–78
22.5 Municipal Revenue Raising Powers 22–81
(a) Introduction 22–81
(b) Fiscal powers and responsibility for financial health . . . 22–82
(c) Constitutional nature of the revenue-raising powers . . . 22–85
(i) Original powers 22–85
(ii) Legislative powers 22–85
(iii) Division of powers between district and local municipalities 22–86
(iv) Discretionary powers 22–87
(v) Authorisation of further taxing powers 22–88
(d) Supervision of the exercise of a municipality's revenue-raising powers 22–89
(i) Regulatory framework 22–89
(ii) Procedure for adoption 22–90
(iii) Material impact of the exercise of revenue-raising powers 22–92

(e) Rates 22–95
(i) Defining property rates 22–95
(aa) Municipal powers over the setting and collection of rates 22–95
(bb) The process of determining market value of properties 22–98
(f) Surcharges 22–100
(g) Other taxes, levies and duties 22–100
(h) Borrowing 22–101
(i) Short-term debt 22–102
(ii) Long-term debt 22–103
(i) Transfers 22–104
(j) Equitable share 22–104
(i) Nature of entitlement 22–104
(ii) Prescribed process 22–106
(iii) Substantive principles 22–106
(iv) Payment and withholding of equitable share 22–108
(v) Usage of equitable share 22–110
(k) Conditional grants 22–110
(l) Provincial transfers 22–111
22.6 Supervision of Municipalities 22–111
(a) Introduction 22–111
(i) Increasing of supervisory powers 22–112
(ii) Supervision as a single process 22–113
(iii) Dual responsibility for supervision 22–114
(b) Supervision process: monitoring and support 22–115
(i) Monitoring 22–115
(ii) Support 22–116
(c) Interventions 22–118
(d) Regular intervention in terms of FC s 139(1) 22–118
(i) Substantive requirement 22–118
(ii) Measures of intervention 22–119
(iii) Issuing a directive 22–120
(iv) Assumption of responsibility 22–120
(v) Dissolution of council 22–122
(e) Dissolution of council after failure to pass a budget or revenue raising measures in terms of FC s 139(4) . 22–123

(f) Imposition of a financial recovery plan after a financial crisis in terms of FC s 139(5) 22–125
22.7 Co-operative Government 22–126
(a) Constitutional framework 22–126
(i) Local government as a sphere of government . . . 22–126
(ii) Organised local government 22–127
(iii) National Council of Provinces 22–128
(iv) Financial and Fiscal Commission 22–130
(b) Principles and statutory provisions of cooperative government 22–131
(c) Duty of support 22–132
(d) Duty to consult 22–133
(i) Information sharing 22–134
(ii) Consultation 22–134
(iii) Providing opportunities for representation 22–135
(iv) Consultation — seeking out the views of other parties 22–135
(v) Use of consultative forums 22–136

22.1 INTRODUCTION[1]

Local government as an identifiable institution of government has been in existence from at least 1836 when an ordinance of the Cape Colony provided for municipal boards in towns and villages. Until the new dispensation, local authorities were termed "creatures of statute", wholly subject to the direction and control of central and, subsequently, provincial governments. Upon commencement of the Interim Constitution[2] and then the Final Constitution,[3] however, local government has undergone a formal and substantive revolution. It is now recognized as a distinct sphere of government existing alongside the national and provincial governments:[4] a municipality, as the constituent unit of this sphere of government, 'has the right to govern, on its own initiative, the local government affairs of its community'.[5]

While no longer the handmaiden of the national or provincial governments, local government autonomy remains a relative matter. It is to be exercised 'subject to national and provincial legislation, as provided in the Constitution."[6] This limitation on local government autonomy is, itself, subject to three conditions. First, this national and provincial legislation must be provided for in the Final Constitution: thus setting the parameters of legislative oversight. Second, the nature and the quality of such intervention is subject to an inner core of local autonomy. FC s 151(4) reads as follows: 'The national or a provincial government may not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions.' Third, the local government's 'right to govern' imposes a duty on the other two spheres of government to allow a municipality to govern within its demarcated space.

(a) History

The constitutional history of local government is short but not sweet.[7] During the colonial era, municipalities were creatures of colonial laws. An exception was the 1889 Grondwet of the Zuid Afrikaansche Republiek ('ZAR').[8] The Grondwet granted the white population the power to establish district councils and town or [1] This chapter draws substantially on the loose-leaf work of the authors: Nico Steyler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007).

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').
[4] FC s 40(1).
[5] FC s 151(3).
[6] FC s 151(3).
[7] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 1-3.
[8] 19 November 1889.

village management structures where they so desired.[1] When the Union of South Africa was formed in 1910, a very attenuated form of decentralized government was established. Four provinces possessed limited legislative authority: one area of such authority was over local government.

This arrangement followed the pattern established in several other British dominions. The Canadian Constitution Act of 1867 listed municipal institutions as falling within exclusive provincial competencies.[2] The federal constitution of Australia of 1901 followed a different route but with the same effect. As the constitution made no mention of local government, the matter was deemed to fall squarely within the states' residual powers.[3] Following the Canadian model of the allocation of competencies, s 85(vi) of the South Africa Act of 1909 empowered provincial legislatures to make ordinances on 'municipal institutions, divisional councils, and other local institutions of a similar nature'. Given South Africa's centralized form of government, the assent by the Governor-General-in-Council was required for the validity of any ordinance. Moreover, in any conflict between an ordinance and a national law, the latter prevailed. Following the model of the Cape local government laws, the provinces in due course passed ordinances regulating almost all aspects of local government.[4]

All local government institutions were creatures of statute, possessing such rights and powers as were expressly or impliedly granted to them by the ordinances. It also rendered all their actions, including the passing of by-laws, administrative in nature and thus subject to review.

Because the national government could legislate on all matters, it could also do so in the area of local government — even though such legislation was, ostensibly, a provincial competence. The national government increasingly asserted its authority over local government in order to realize the broad and brutal constitutional architecture of apartheid. The entrenchment of apartheid at the level of local government meant that the vast majority of South Africans — black, coloured, Indian and others, could be moved about and displaced by an array of ignominious national acts and policies (eg, the Group Areas Act of 1950.)

[1] Art 140. The district council was to be elected by the burghers of the district but headed by the landdrost ex officio. Some basic principles resonate with today's debates on local government. Self-sufficiency was an objective and all expenses of the district council (except salaries determined by law) were to be borne by the district itself (art 142). The supervision by the central government was, however, paramount. The annual budget, adopted by the district council, had to be approved by the central Executive Council. The annual financial statements had also to be submitted to the Executive Council. For the levying of taxes a district council had to obtain the approval of the Volksraad (art 142). The same principles applied to town and village managements (art 143).

[2] See Harvey Lazar & Aron Seal 'Local Government: Still a Junior Government? The Place of Municipalities in the Canadian Federation' in Nico Steytler (ed) The Place and Role of Local Government in Federal Systems (2005) 28.

[3] See Cheryl Saunders 'Constitutional Recognition of Local Government in Australia' in Steytler The Place and Role (supra) at 48.

[4] Local Government Ordinance 10 of 1912 (Cape); Local Government Ordinance 9 of 1912 (Transvaal); Local Government Ordinance 4 of 1913 (Orange Free State); and Municipal Ordinance 11 of 1918 (Natal).

The 1961 Constitution, while heralding a republican form of government for the white minority, reaffirmed in identical language the position of local government as a subject of provincial governance.[1] However, this arrangement was restricted to 'white' local government. The governance of the majority of South Africans — coloureds, Indian and blacks — remained subject to the central government.

Despite the ideology of 'separate development' and the creation of black ethnic homelands, the governance of blacks in white urban areas proved the Achilles heel of apartheid. In response to the 1976 uprisings, elected community councils with limited powers were introduced in 1977. By 1982 black local authorities had powers similar to white municipal bodies. However, they lacked any sustainable funding base or legitimacy. In the homelands, tribal authorities, under the leadership of traditional leaders, provided some local services.

The 1983 Constitution[2] employed a new divide and conquer strategy in order to further entrench the division between white, coloured, and Indian South Africans, on the one hand, and black South Africans, on the other. The white, coloured and Indian groups were represented in their own legislative chamber to deal with their 'own affairs', namely 'matters which specially or differentially affect a population group in relation to maintenance of its identity and the upholding and furtherance of its way of life, culture, traditions and customs'.[3] As the provision of sewage, water and electricity was conceived of as essential to maintain group identity if not the furtherance of culture, traditions and customs, 'local government' appears on the list of 'own affairs'. As before, all matters dealing with black South Africans, including local government, were 'general affairs'. The 1983 Constitution further galvanized black opposition to urban apartheid. Much of the open rebellion in the 1980s was focused on black local authorities. The declaration of successive states of emergency rendered inert most of those local authorities.

The only move towards a non-racial form of local government was the establishment of regional services councils and joint services boards in Natal and KwaZulu. These councils and boards provided bulk services to municipalities and assistance to black local authorities. The councils, consisting of representatives of the various race-based local authorities, were the first, faltering step towards an inclusive local authority.

During the early days of multi-party constitutional democracy and a universal franchise in 1994, a wide variety of race-based local authorities covering mainly the urban and built-up areas remained in place. However, virtually no local institutions existed in rural areas. Cameron JA describes existing local authorities thus:

[1] Constitution Act 32 of 1961 s 84(1)(f)(i).
[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 110 of 1983.
[3] Ibid at s 14(1).

> Under the pre-constitutional dispensation, municipalities owed their existence to and derived their powers from provincial ordinances. Those ordinances were passed by provincial legislatures which themselves had limited law-making authority, conferred on them and circumscribed by Parliamentary legislation. Parliament's law-making power was untrammeled, and it could determine how much legislative power provinces exercised. The provinces in turn could largely determine the powers and capacities of local authorities. Municipalities were therefore at the bottom of a hierarchy of law-making power: constitutionally unrecognised and unprotected, they were by their very nature 'subordinate members of the government vested with prescribed, controlled governmental powers'.[1]

As a result, all municipal actions, including the passing of by-laws, were subject to administrative law review.

These creatures of statute reflected the inequities of a prolonged and pernicious period of discrimination. In the words of the Constitutional Court:

> Those in historically "White" areas were characterized by developed infrastructure, thriving business districts and valuable rateable property. Those in so-called "Black", "Coloured" and "Indian" areas, by contrast, were plagued by underdevelopment, poor services and vastly inferior rates bases.[2]

The consequences of apartheid at local level were profound:

> The apartheid city, although fragmented along racial lines, integrated an urban economic logic that systematically favoured white urban areas at the cost of black urban and peri-urban areas. The result are tragic and absurd: sprawling black townships with hardly a tree in sight, flanked by vanguards of informal settlements and guarded by towering floodlights, out of stonethrow reach. Even if only a short distance away, nestled amid trees and water and birds and tarred roads and paved sidewalks and streetlit suburbs and parks, and running water, and convenient electrical amenities . . . we find white suburbia. How did it happen? Quite simply: '. . . in reality the economic relationship between the white and black (African, coloured and Indian) halves of the city was similar to a colonial relationship of exploitation and unequal exchange'.[3]

The de-racialization of local government was one of the more important consequences of the process of democratization ushered in by the Interim Constitution. In reconstructing these institutions from the ruins of apartheid, the participation of local communities was of the utmost concern. From the liberation movement side, the Freedom Charter spoke of institutions of self government.[4] The critical role that community organizations in the townships played in the struggle against apartheid demanded that the entrenchment of democracy occur from the bottom up.

[1] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA) at para 33 (footnotes omitted).

[2] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at para 2 (Chaskalson P, Goldstone & O'Regan JJ). See also City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at paras 19 and 46.

[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 122 (footnotes omitted)(Kriegler J).

[4] See Rudolf Mastenbroek & Nico Steytler 'Local Government and Development: The New Constitutional Enterprise' (1997) 1(2) Law, Democracy and Development 233.

(b) Comparative constitutional recognition of local government

The constitutional recognition of local government as an order of government in federal or decentralized systems of government is a modern phenomenon. The first federal constitutions of the modern era did not mention local government as a sphere of government. The Constitution of the United States, from 1791, is silent on the matter. Local government thus falls under the residual powers of the states. They are 'creatures of the state' and in terms of the so-called Dillon-rule, formulated in the 19th Century,[1] municipal corporations have and can exercise only those powers expressly granted, those powers necessarily or fairly implied there from, and those powers that are essential and indispensable to their corporate status.[2] As noted above, the Canadian Constitution of 1867 mentioned local government only as a field of competence of the provinces. The Australian federal constitution of 1901 was entirely silent on the matter. Only after the Second World War did the importance of local government as an institution of state come to the fore. And it was primarily motivated by the desire to deepen democracy.

Although the constitution of the Weimar Republic of 1919 guaranteed local government the right of self-government within the limits of the law, only the post-war Basic Law of 1949 guaranteed a meaningful measure of local autonomy. Article 28(2) reads:

> The Municipality shall be guaranteed the right to manage all the affairs of the local community of their own responsibility within the limits set by law. Within the framework of their statutory functions the association of municipalities likewise has the right of self-government in accordance with the law. The right of self-government shall include responsibility for financial matters. The municipalities have the power to levy trade taxes according to the rates for assessment determined by them.

The second wave of federal constitutions confirming local self-government also coincided with the return to democracy. The Spanish Constitution of 1978 focused on the creation of the 'Autonomous Community'. In art 137 the general principle concerning the territorial organization of Spain is stated as follows:

> The state is organized territorially into municipalities, provinces and any Autonomous Communities that may be constituted. All these bodies shall enjoy self-government for the management of their respective interests.

Article 140 also provides that 'the Constitution guarantees the autonomy of the municipalities, which shall enjoy full legal personality.' Further regulation may occur, through law, at both the state and the regional level.

Although the Nigerian Constitution of 1979, reintroducing democracy after years of military rule, was short lived (1978-1981), the local government provisions, entrenching it as an order of government, was faithfully reproduced twenty years later in the 1999 constitution. The position of local government independent, but still subordinate is expressed in section 7(1) as follows:

[1] City of Clinton v Cedar Rapids and Missouri River RR Co 24 Iowa 455 (1868).

[2] Ronald K Vogel 'Multilevel Governance in the United States' in Harvey Lazar & Christian Leuprecht (eds) Spheres of Government: Comparative Studies of Cities in Multilevel Governance Systems (2007) 258.

> The system of local government by democratically elected local government councils is under this Constitution guaranteed; and accordingly, the Government of every State shall . . . ensure their existence under a Law which provides for the establishment, structure, composition, finance and functions of such councils.

Brazil's return to civilian rule was also marked by the extensive protection of local self-government in the Constitution of 1988. Article 1 proclaims that the Federal Republic of Brazil is 'formed by the indissoluble union of States, municipalities (municipios), as well as the federal district'. The elevation of municipalities as a constituent element of the state is reiterated in article 18: 'The political and administrative organization of the Federal Republic of Brazil includes the Federal Government (Uniao), States, Federal District and Municipalities, all autonomous, in terms of this Constitution.'

In India, democracy from the bottom up through local government structures, called panchayats, was an article of faith of the independence movement. The Constitution of 1947, however, ineffectually reflected this principle. One of the 'Directive Principles of State Policy', section 40, provides: 'The State shall take steps to organize village panchayats and endow them with such powers and authority as may be necessary to enable them to function as units of self-government.' The 1993 constitutional amendments, prompted by development concerns, constitutionalized the system of panchayat — defined as 'institutions of self-government'.[1] The 73rd Amendment dealt with rural local government. The 74th Amendment was concerned with urban municipalities. The structures created by the two amendments are, however, very similar: they provide an outline of the general form and the election of local authorities, but leave the range and substance of their powers to state legislation.

The common themes in the more modern constitutions are decentralized local governance driven by local participatory democratic institutions that aim at the realization of an array of developmental concerns. That said, nowhere are the institutions of local government given the same level of autonomy as states or provinces. They generally continue to operate within the framework set by provinces or states.[2] However subservient they are to states or provinces, their recognition has redefined multi-level government functions. The constitutional recognition of local government has opened the space for two new sets of emerging relationships: local-provincial; and local-central. The result has been that it has made governance more complex but also more inclusive.

[1] IC s 243*(d)*.

[2] See Christian Leuprecht & Harvey Lazar 'From Multilevel to 'Multi-order' Governance?' in Lazar & Leuprecht (supra) (2007) 18.

In comparison to other multi-level governments, the Final Constitution has taken the recognition of local government a step forward. The Final Constitution has entrenched local autonomy by listing the powers of municipalities, limiting the oversight powers of the other spheres of government and, most importantly, securing a stable base for municipal revenue. These features were the key issues during the process of constitution making.

(c) Process of constitutionalization[1]

Local government was never at the heart of the constitutional negotiations during the early 1990s. Other structures of state captured the attention of the political parties. Yet local government authority ultimately proved to be the most difficult to negotiate. It not only generated the majority of changes during the drafting of and the certification process of the Final Constitution: it has also undergone a radical transformation, through constitutional amendments, over the past decade.

A National Local Government Negotiating Forum (NLGNF) was established in March 1993. It was composed of representatives of the main stakeholders — half of them drawn from statutory bodies (the then existing municipal authorities) and the other half from non-statutory bodies (the civic movements in the townships).[2] Functioning alongside the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum that produced the Interim Constitution, it delivered, among others things, the Local Government Transition Act (LGTA)[3] and the provisions of IC Chapter 10 — "Local Government". The LGTA, adopted by the tri-cameral Parliament, came into operation on 2 February 1994, with the aim of providing the mechanisms of moving from a race-based system of local government to a non-racial system.[4] This initial transformation would occur in three phases. The first, the pre-interim phase, commenced with the coming into operation of the LGTA and the establishment of the negotiating forums in local authorities pending the first local government election. The second phase was the first local government elections: these elections established integrated, although not yet fully democratically elected, municipalities. The third, and final, phase would commence with the local government election in terms of the Final Constitution.[5]

[1] See further Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 1-10ff.

[2] See further Fanie Cloete 'Local Government Transformation in South Africa' in Bertus de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994); Gideon Pimstone 'Local Government' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz & Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1998) 5A-2; Mirjam van Donk & Edgar Pieterse 'Reflections on the Design of a Post-apartheid System of (Urban) Local Government' in Udesh Pillay, Richard Tomlinson & Jacques de Toit (eds) Democracy and Delivery: Urban Policy in South Africa (2006) 107, 112.

[3] Act 209 of 1993.

[4] See Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council Western Cape') at para 6 (Chaskalson P).

[5] See Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 162*(e)* and (f) (Kriegler J).

The Interim Constitution set the scene for placing local government on an entirely different constitutional footing.[1] First and foremost, IC s 174(1) provided that local government received constitutional recognition: 'Local government shall be established for the residents of areas demarcated by law of a competent authority.'[2] More importantly, IC s 174(3) provided that '[a] local government shall be autonomous and, within the limits prescribed by or under the law, shall be entitled to regulate its affairs.'[3] Such autonomy was, however, subject to national and provincial regulation in that '[t]he powers, functions and structures of local government shall be determined by law of a competent authority.'[4] However, the essential content of the autonomy should remain untrammeled: 'Parliament or a provincial legislature shall not encroach on the powers, functions and structure of a local government to such an extent as to compromise the fundamental status, purpose and character of local government.'[5] One method of guarding against such an encroachment was the duty of the superior legislatures, before enacting legislation affecting the status, powers, functions or boundaries of local governments, to provide local government, including organized local government, with a reasonable opportunity to comment thereon.[6]

The purpose of local government was focused on service delivery. Given the regulation of local government powers, the two superior legislatures were under an obligation to assign 'such powers and functions as may be necessary to provide services for the maintenance and promotion of the well-being of all persons within its area of jurisdiction.'[7] Within the framework of enabling national or provincial legislation, local government had to make provision for access by all persons within its jurisdiction 'to water, sanitation, transportation facilities, electricity, primary health services, education, housing and security within a safe and healthy environment, provided that such services and amenities can be rendered in a sustainable manner and are financially and physically practicable.'[8]

To finance its service mandate, local government was competent to levy property rates, levies, fees and taxes and tariffs, 'based on a uniform structure for its area of jurisdiction'.[9] Such self-generated revenue was to be supplemented by unconditional grants by the provincial governments.[10]

[1] Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at para 153 (Ackermann & O'Regan JJ).
[2] IC s 174(1).
[3] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 359; Fedsure (supra) at paras 35-37.
[4] IC s 175(1). See Pimstone (supra) at 5A-21; Jaap de Visser Developmental Local Government (2005) 63.
[5] IC s 174(4).
[6] IC s 174(5).
[7] IC s 175(2).
[8] IC s 175(3).
[9] IC s 178(2).
[10] IC s 178(2).

Local governments were to be elected democratically. They were to use an electoral system which included both proportional and ward representation.[1] Traditional leaders in the homelands were not excluded from the system and were given ex officio membership of municipal councils established in their area of jurisdiction.[2]

In the same manner as the executives at national and provincial level, inclusive decision-making was also the objective in municipal councils. The budget was to be adopted by a council with the support of two-thirds of all its members.[3] Councils had to elect, on the basis of proportional representation, an executive committee.[4] This committee, in turn, had to 'endeavour to exercise its powers and perform its functions on the basis of consensus among its members.'[5]

While the Interim Constitution gave direction to the transformation process, the restructuring of the local government would primarily occur in terms of the LGTA.[6] After the first elections, transformation could proceed in terms of legislation that complied with the principles embodied in the Interim Constitution.[7] For the first election forty percent of the councillors were to be elected on a proportional basis and the remaining 60 percent in wards.[8] Of the ward councillors, 50 percent had to be elected in areas that fell under the jurisdiction of the abolished three Houses of the tri-cameral Parliament (white, coloured and Indian local government authorities). The remaining 50 percent would be elected from all other areas (Black administration areas).[9] The two areas were referred to as 'statutory' and 'non-statutory' areas respectively.

As the precursor to the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Principles in the Interim Constitution also contained a broad framework for local government. First of all the status of local government as a constitutionally recognized level of government was to be entrenched: 'Government shall be structured at national, provincial and local levels.'[10] The most pertinent provision was Constitutional Principle XXIV:

> A framework for local government powers, functions and structures shall be set out in the Constitution. The comprehensive powers, functions and other features of local government shall be set out in parliamentary statutes or in the provincial legislation or both.

[1] IC s 179(2).
[2] IC s 182.
[3] IC s 176*(a)*.
[4] IC s 177.
[5] IC s 177*(b)*.
[6] IC s 245(1); Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at para 162 (Kriegler J); First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 356.
[7] IC s 245(2).
[8] IC s 245(3)(b).
[9] IC s 245(3)(b).
[10] IC sch 4 CP XVI.

This framework had to make provision 'for appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories of local government.'[1] A further source of local government revenue was the entitlement to national transfers.[2] A final principle that became relevant in the certification process was Constitutional Principle X: 'Formal legislative procedures shall be adhered to by legislative organs at all levels of government.'

The text adopted on 8 May 1996 rang in significant changes to the position of local government. The most important change was that local government was removed as a functional area of competence of the provinces.[3] Moreover, the status of local government was enhanced and placed alongside national and governments as a 'distinctive' sphere of government that was 'interdependent and interrelated' to the other two.[4] Of the word 'sphere of government', the Natal High Court commented:

> [It] is suggestive of an equality as between the concepts of national, provincial and local governmental structures, as opposed to the more traditional hierarchical levels of power and importance.[5]

The autonomy of local government was dramatically increased. A municipality 'has the right to govern, on its own initiative, the local government affairs of its community, subject to national and provincial legislation, as provided for in the Constitution.'[6] In view of local government's self-governing status, the national and provincial government must respect this right and 'may not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions.'[7] This new form of democratic local government was extended to the entire country.[8] This change effectively excluded the possibility of full-membership of traditional leaders in democratically elected municipal councils.[9]

[1] IC sch 4 CP XXV.

[2] IC sch 4 CP XXVI.

[3] On the political reasons for the change in approach to local government, see Rudolf Mastenbroek & Nico Steytler 'Local Government: The New Constitutional Enterprise' (1997) 1(2) Law, Democracy and Development 233, 238; De Visser (supra) at 66-68. Robert Cameron advances a number of reasons why local government was promoted in the FC, including the following: First, the ANC fears that white dominated local authorities would become the last bulwark of apartheid largely dissipated with the creation of non-racial integrated municipalities after 1995/6 and ANC victories in most of the major municipalities. Second, cities became to be seen as dynamic arenas for economic, social and cultural development, participating in the global marketplace. Third, strong local government was seen as a way of empowering people. Fourth, given that some provinces were struggling to find their feet, local government was generally in a better state than provincial administrations. 'The Upliftment of South African Local Government?' (2001) 27(3) Local Government Studies 97, 110-111.

[4] FC s 40(1).

[5] Uthukela District Municpality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2002 (5) BCLR 479, 485G-H (N). See further De Visser (supra) at 65-66.

[6] FC s 151(3).

[7] FC s 151(4).

[8] FC s 151.

[9] See Tom Bennett & Christina Murray 'Traditional Leadership' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Chaskalson, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 26.

When the May 1996 text was reviewed by the Constitutional Court for compliance with the Constitutional Principles,[1] the local government provisions raised three issues.[2] The most important was that the enhanced status of local government ostensibly meant a diminution of provincial powers. Second, there was, allegedly, a failure to set up an adequate framework for local government powers, functions and structures. Third, the provision that municipalities could impose 'excise taxes' was challenged on the ground that such powers of taxation were not an 'appropriate fiscal power' for municipalities

On the question of an appropriate framework, further discussed below,[3] the Court faulted the text for not providing an adequate one. On the third issue regarding 'excise taxes', the Court found that the ordinary meaning of 'excise taxes' usually entails a retail tax targeted at specific commodities such as alcohol, tobacco and fuel. This understanding of excise taxes made these commodities inappropriate vehicles for municipal taxation.[4] The main complaint that the powers of provinces were substantially diminished through, among other provisions, the removal of local government as a competency of provinces, placed the new status of local government in dispute. The Constitutional Court agreed that 'LG structures are given more autonomy in the NT than they are in the IC' but that this autonomy was at the expense of both Parliament and provincial legislatures. The effect of the new text is that 'the ambit of provincial powers and functions in respect of [local government] is largely confined to the supervision, monitoring and support of municipalities.'[5] Although the Court found that these powers were not insubstantial, they still constituted a diminution of provincial powers and functions.[6] Furthermore, the national government was also given regulatory powers over local government, thereby precluding or circumscribing provincial powers.[7] When the Court weighed up all the instances where there was a diminution of provincial powers, it reached the conclusion that provincial powers were substantially less than those powers found in the Interim Constitution and thus refused to certify the new text also on this ground.

In response to the Court's critique of the local government provisions, the Constitutional Assembly effected three changes in the amended text. First, a framework for the establishment of three categories of municipalities was provided. While Category A was a self-standing municipality, 'shared' local authority was created for Category B and C municipalities.[8] Second, the framework for the

[1] IC s 71(1).
[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 299. See also Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 1-16.
[3] See § 22.2*(a)* infra.
[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 305.
[5] Ibid at para 367.
[6] Ibid at para 374.
[7] Ibid at para 380.
[8] FC s 155(1)(c).

functioning of municipal councils was considerably expanded. Third, the levying of 'excise taxes' was replaced by the power to impose 'surcharges on fees for services provided by or on behalf of a municipality'.[1] Of great significance for local government was the fact that the Constitutional Assembly, in addressing the complaint that provincial powers were significantly diminished, did not change the status of local government. It merely effected a few minor adjustments to the relationship between the provinces and the national government. When the Constitutional Court reviewed the amended text,[2] it concluded that there was no change in the powers of provinces in respect of local government. The amended text constituted the same degree of diminution of provincial powers as before.[3] However, because of other changes to provincial powers unrelated to local government, the Court certified the amended text.[4]

The Final Constitution provided that key sections relating to the establishment, powers and functioning of municipalities[5] were subject to the LGTA. Under the Final Constitution, the LGTA would remain in force until 30 April 1999:[6] the date for municipal elections.[7]

(d) Statutory framework

The slow process of constructing a new system of local government commenced with the White Paper on Local Government of 1998. The paper charted a new course for 'developmental local government'.[8] This constitutional goal was defined as 'local government committed to working with citizens and groups within the community to find sustainable ways to meet their social, economic and material needs and improve the quality of their lives.'[9] This policy goal was grounded on four premises.[10] First, the municipal powers and functions should be exercised to ensure social development by meeting basic needs through the provision of government services and the promotion of economic development. Second, development can only be effected through the integrated and coordinated effort of all role players (both public and private) in local governance, notably through integrated development planning. Third, while municipal councils play a central role in promoting local democracy, they must involve citizens and community groups in the design and delivery of municipal programmes. Finally, in playing a strategic policy-making and visionary role, the developmental municipality must mobilize a range of resources to meet the basic needs of the community.

[1] FC s 229(1)(a).
[2] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Second Certification Judgment').
[3] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 171, 172 and 175.
[4] Ibid at paras 203-204.
[5] FC ss 151, 155, 156 and 157.
[6] FC sch 6 item 26(1)(a).
[7] The Constitutional Court found that the transition period was reasonable to ensure the orderly transition to the new dispensation. Second Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 85-87.
[8] On the drafting of the White Paper on Local Government, see Van Donk & Pieterse (supra) at 114-117.
[9] White Paper on Local Government (1998) 17.
[10] Ibid at 18-22.

The White Paper laid the policy framework for the laws that followed shortly afterwards. First came the Local Government: Municipal Demarcation Act of 1998.[1] It established the Municipal Demarcation Board — which was tasked with drawing municipal boundaries. The Local Government: Municipal Structures Act[2] set out the details of the categories of municipalities, the criteria for their demarcation and internal governance structures. In preparation for the election scheduled for 2000,[3] the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act[4] was passed in 2000. Barely a month before the 5 December 2000 elections, the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act (Systems Act)[5] came into being. The final phase of the local government transition commenced with the election of 284 councils on 5 December 2000. The statutory framework was, however, still incomplete. The Local Government: Municipal Finance Management Act (MFMA)[6] was only adopted in 2003 and the Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act in 2004.[7] Completing the suite of new legislation was the Local Government: Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Act of 2007.[8] During this time, the constitutional framework for local government was also in flux. Of all the subject matter covered by the Final Constitution, local government has been subject to the most amendments. Some of these amendments shrink the constitutional space for local self-government.

(e) Constitutional amendments

The first amendment of 1998 was inauspicious. It indirectly provided for the dissolution of a municipal council:[9] by providing that if a municipal council is dissolved in terms of national legislation, an election must be held within 90 days.[10]

In a second constitutional amendment of that year, the functionality of municipalities was asserted. By entrenching the provincial boundaries of the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution had thwarted the creation of functional municipalities in a number of places. Using the magisterial districts as the building blocks of the provinces, apartheid spacial configurations were used in a manner that separated black townships from white town centres. Moreover, to establish functional municipalities, several municipalities had to cross provincial boundaries. A provision was thus added to the Final Constitution.[11] It permitted a municipal boundary to extend across a provincial boundary if

[1] Act 27 of 1998.
[2] Act 117 of 1998.
[3] In 1998, the life of the LGTA was extended to 30 April 2000 (Constitution Second Amendment Act of 1998).
[4] Act 27 of 2000.
[5] Act 32 of 2000.
[6] Act 56 of 2000.
[7] Act 6 of 2004.
[8] Act 12 of 2007.
[9] Constitution Amendment Act 65 of 1998.
[10] FC s 159(2). Section 34(3) of the Structure Act 117 of 1998 provided for the dissolution of a municipality.
[11] Constitution Amendment Act 87 of 1998.

that is the only way to fulfil the criteria for demarcating municipal boundaries.[1] The boundary could only be determined with the concurrence of the provinces concerned and after national legislation has authorized the provincial executives to establish a municipality in that municipal area.[2] Such national legislation would provide for the establishment in that municipal area of a municipality of a type agreed to between the provinces concerned.[3] It could also provide a framework for the exercise of provincial executive authority in that municipal area and with regard to that municipality.[4] It might finally provide for the re-determination of municipal boundaries where one of the provinces concerned withdraws its support of the municipal boundary.[5] This constitutional framework proved to be a totally unworkable solution. FC s 155(6A) was repealed in 2005.[6]

The constitutional amendments of 2001 were a mixed bag. On the one hand, they extended a municipality's borrowing power by enabling a council to bind itself and future councils in order to secure long term loans and investment.[7] The same amendment, however, gave the national government a freer hand to regulate the raising of loans. The amendment removed the limitation that national legislation may impose only 'reasonable conditions' on the raising of loans by municipalities.[8] In a second amendment, in the same year, the power of organized local government to 'nominate' persons to the Financial and Fiscal Commission, was watered down; the President now selected two persons from a list compiled by organized local government.[9]

Unlike the attempt to permit the crossing of the floor in the National Assembly and provincial legislatures through ordinary legislation,[10] the creation of two window periods in which councillors could change party allegiance was effected through a constitutional amendment.[11] The most far reaching amendment affecting local government was the amendment of FC s 139 in 2003.[12] First, the dissolution of councils was placed on a more secure footing. Second, it watered

[1] FC s 155(6A).
[2] FC s 155(6A)(a).
[3] FC s 155(6A)(b)(i).
[4] FC s 155(6A)(b)(ii).
[5] FC s 155(6A)(b)(iii).
[6] Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act of 2005 and Cross-boundary Municipalities Law Repeal and Related Matters Act 23 of 2005. See further Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)(On the constitutionality of the adoption of the Amendment Act.)
[7] Constitutional Amendment Act 34 of 2001 s 17, inserting FC s 230A. See further § 22.5*(b)* infra.
[8] See Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, M Chaskalson, A Stein & J Klaaren (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.
[9] Constitutional Amendment Act 61 of 2001 s 7, amending FC s 221(1) and (1A). See further De Visser (supra) at 243.
[10] United Democratic Party v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC).
[11] Schedule 6A was added by s 2 of Constitutional Amendment Act 18 of 2002. The following year, when a constitutional amendment authorised the crossing of the floor in the national and provincial legislatures, the Schedule was renumbered as 6B by s 6 of Constitutional Amendment Act 2 of 2003.
[12] Constitutional Amendment Act 3 of 2003 s 4.

down the two-fold review process by the Minister responsible for local government and by the NCOP that occurs when a provincial executive assumes the responsibility for an unfulfilled executive obligation. Third, it excluded the review process altogether when drastic measures are adopted in times of a financial crisis.[1]

(f) Local self-government

Despite the slow narrowing of constitutional space over the past decade, the constitutional recognition of local autonomy is one of the central innovative aspects of the Final Constitution. Kriegler J had — prior to the certification of the Final Constitution — already remarked that 'for the first time in our history, provision was made for autonomous local government with its own constitutionally guaranteed and independent existence, powers and functions.'[2] He described the new status of local government as follows:

> The constitutional status of a local government is thus materially different to what it was when Parliament was supreme, when not only the powers but the very existence of local government depended entirely on superior legislatures. The institution of elected local government could then have been terminated at any time and its functions entrusted to administrators appointed by the central or provincial governments. That is no longer the position. Local governments have a place in the constitutional order, have to be established by the competent authority, and are entitled to certain powers, including the power to make by-laws and impose rates. [3]

While the Interim Constitution materially changed the nature of local government, the Final Constitution consolidated that status.[4] The result was that '[t]he Constitution has moved away from a hierarchical division of government power in favour of a new vision, in which local government is interdependent, and (subject to permissible constitutional constraints) inviolable and has latitude to define and express its unique character.'[5]

---

[1] See further §§ 22.6*(e)* and (f) infra.

[2] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 126.

[3] Ibid at para 38.

[4] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA)('CDA Boerdery') at para 38.

[5] Ibid. In constitutional theory a major shift has taken place. However, the statutory framework giving effect to the constitutional mandate and the policies that breathe life into local government may hark back to the pre-constitutional paradigm of central control and direction. David Schmidt argues that there has been an ambivalent acceptance by national government of the concept of 'spheres of government'. In reality they are still cling to the hierarchical notion of 'tiers of government'. 'From Spheres to Tiers — Conceptions of Local Government in South Africa in the period 1994-2006' in Mirjam van Donk, Mark Swilling, Edgar Pieterse & Susan Panell (eds) Consolidating Local Government: Lessons from the South African Experience (2008) 109. He argues that the Final Constitution is an expression of the so-called 'network governance' model, a model in competition with the earlier models of the traditional public administration approach and the 'new' public management. The traditional public management paradigm which emphasised hierarchy, rules and procedures, was complemented by the 'new' public management emerging in the 1970s which sought to introduce private sector management practice and private involvement in the provision of services. In reviewing the way the national government has regulated local government, Schmidt argues that the traditional public administration approach still prevails. While the Systems Act may reflect the new public management ethos with an emphasis on public-private partnerships, the MFMA is pure old-style bureaucracy.

22.2 Municipal Governance

(a) Establishment of municipalities[1]

FC s 151(1) provides that the local sphere of government consists of municipalities that must be established for the whole of the territory of the Republic. The Final Constitution thereby establishes the notion of 'wall-to-wall' local government. With regard to the establishment of municipalities, the Final Constitution performs a two-fold function. First, it provides for a division of responsibilities between the national and provincial sphere with regard to the establishment process. Second, the Final Constitution outlines the parameters for the determination of certain municipal features, namely the municipal boundary, the municipal category, the municipal type and the official languages. The establishment process has mainly been regulated in the Local Government: Municipal Demarcation Act[2] ('Demarcation Act') and in the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act ('Structures Act').[3]

The Final Constitution sets out the responsibilities of national and provincial governments as regard the establishment process. In Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development,[4] it was argued, on the basis of FC s 44(1)(a)(ii), that national government has concurrent powers with provincial and local government with regard to all powers dealt with in FC Chapter 7. This conclusion would have entitled national government to deal with all matters related to the establishment of municipalities. The Constitutional Court dismissed the national government's argument with reference to FC s 164 — this provision empowers national government to deal with matters 'untouched' in FC Chapter 7. This provision would serve no purpose in the context of concurrent powers over Chapter 7. The Court's holding underscores the importance of a division of responsibilities between national and provincial governments as regards the establishment process.

The ultimate executive act of establishing a municipality is a provincial responsibility. FC s 155(6) instructs each provincial government to 'establish municipalities in its province'. However, provinces must operate in terms of the national legislation that regulates the boundaries, categories and types of municipalities, as well as the division of powers between district and local municipalities.[5]

National legislation must establish criteria and procedures for the determination of municipal boundaries and ward boundaries through an independent authority.[6] The Constitutional Court expressed the rationale for an independent authority as follows:

[1] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) Chapter 2.
[2] Act 27 of 1998.
[3] Act 117 of 1998.
[4] 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council Western Cape') at paras 34–59.
[5] FC s 155(6).
[6] FC s 155(3)(b).

> The purpose of section 155(3)(b) is 'to guard against political interference in the process of creating new municipalities.' For, if municipalities were to be established along party lines or if there was to be political interference in their establishment, this would undermine our multi-party system of democratic government. A deliberate decision was therefore made to confer the power to establish municipal areas upon an independent authority.[1]

The Final Constitution itself introduces three municipal categories.[2] FC s 155(3)(a) requires national legislation to establish criteria for determining whether an area should have a single category A (metropolitan) municipality or when it should have municipalities of both category B (local municipalities) and C (district municipality). FC s 155(3)(c) requires national legislation to make provision for an appropriate division of powers and functions between municipalities when an area has municipalities of both category B and category C.

National legislation must define the different types of municipality that may be established within each category.[3] Provincial legislation must define the types of municipality that may be established in the province.[4]

National legislation may provide criteria for determining the size of a municipal council.[5] As a result of the electoral system of ward and proportional representation, an important 'knock-on effect' of determining the size of the municipal council is that it determines the number of wards that must be delimited in a municipality.

The above scheme puts beyond doubt that local governments are established in terms of a national constitutional and statutory framework. Provincial governments primarily play an implementation role. Provincial legislation on typology remains the only area where provincial governments exercise legislative authority.[6]

(i) Boundaries

An essential feature of the transformation of local government was the demarcation of municipal boundaries. Local government boundaries needed to be demarcated afresh in order to ensure redistribution of wealth and financially viable and accountable municipalities.[7] The Final Constitution thus required the

[1] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the RSA & Others 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC)('Matatiele I') at para 41 (footnotes omitted) as discussed in Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-3. See O'Regan J's dissenting opinion in Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 164-169 where she downplays the need for an independent arbiter in boundary determinations. See also Rob Cameron 'Local Government Boundary Reorganisation' in Udesh Pillay, Richard Tomlinson & Jacques du Toit (eds) Democracy and Delivery Urban Policy in South Africa (2006) 84 (Cameron indicates that independent boundary arbiters are a rarity in Africa.)

[2] FC s 151(1).

[3] FC s 155(2).

[4] FC s 155(5).

[5] FC s 160(5)(a).

[6] See Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 39-43, 70-76 and 82.

[7] For an analysis of the Municipal Demarcation Board's first term of office, including the demarcation of 843 interim local government structures into 284 new municipal areas, see Cameron 'Boundary Reorganisation' (supra) at 84ff.

establishment of an independent authority that demarcates municipal boundaries. It establishes criteria and procedures for this process.[1] An independent authority is also required to delimit the wards within a municipality.[2] The Demarcation Act provides for a Municipal Demarcation Board. The independence of the institution is secured through the appointment procedure for its members,[3] the limited grounds for removal from office,[4] the criminalization of any efforts to improperly influence its decision making[5] and the fact that it is accountable to Parliament and not to the national executive.[6]

In Matatiele, the Constitutional Court dealt with aspects related to the limits on the Demarcation Board's powers. When a constitutional amendment was passed altering provincial boundaries in a way that affected municipal boundaries, it was argued that Parliament had usurped the powers of the Board to determine municipal boundaries. The Constitutional Court disagreed. It ruled that the Board's powers to demarcate municipal boundaries are limited by Parliament's authority to establish provincial boundaries.[7] The Court found that 'once provincial boundaries have been redefined, it is the task of the Board to demarcate municipal boundaries in terms of the Demarcation Act'.[8]

Because the Municipal Demarcation Board is an independent organ of state, it is in a similar position to the IEC, in respect of which the Constitutional Court held that it does not fall within the purview of FC Chapter 3.[9] Consequently, the Municipal Demarcation Board, like the IEC and other Chapter 9 Institutions, is not bound by the obligation of cooperative government set out in FC Chapter 3. Where there is a dispute between a municipality and the Demarcation Board, there is no need to avoid disputes being settled in court.

(ii) Categories of municipalities

FC s 155(1) establishes three categories of municipalities:

(a) Category A: metropolitan municipalities that have exclusive authority over their jurisdiction;
(b) Category B: local municipalities that share authority with district municipalities; and
(c) Category C: district municipalities that share authority with local municipalities.

[1] FC s 155(3)(b).
[2] FC s 157(4).
[3] Demarcation Act s 8.
[4] Demarcation Act s 13(4).
[5] Demarcation Act s 42.
[6] Demarcation Act s 39.
[7] Matatiele I (supra) at para 49.
[8] Ibid at para 51. Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-4.
[9] See Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Langeberg') at para 22.

The original text of FC s 155(1) submitted for certification by the Constitutional Court did not make reference to any categories of municipalities. Instead, the issue of categories was relegated to statutory legislation.[1] The Court reviewed this delineation of responsibility in First Certification Judgment.[2] CP XXIV required a framework for local government powers, functions and structures be set out in the Constitution.[3] In addition, CP XXV required that this framework make provision for appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories of local government. The Court held that the requirement of a framework for local government structures necessitated 'at the very least' the setting out in the Final Constitution of the different categories of local government that can be established by the provinces, as well as a framework for their structures.[4] This requirement had not been met.[5] The requirement of appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories had also not been met. No such provision appeared in the text. The Constitutional Assembly then amended FC 155(1) to provide for the above three categories. In Second Certification Judgment,[6] the Court reviewed and approved the amended text. In this judgment, the Constitutional Court labeled the three categories as follows:

(a) self-standing municipalities,
(b) municipalities that form part of a comprehensive co-ordinating structure, and
(c) municipalities that perform co-ordinating functions.[7]

Municipal governance in a specific area is thus provided either by a metropolitan municipality[8] or by a combination of district and local municipalities. The choice between these two modes of municipal governance is governed by FC s 155(4). This provision requires national legislation to establish criteria in terms of which the choice is made. Furthermore, the Final Constitution requires an

[1] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-19.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 301.

[3] IC sch 4 CP XXIV provided: 'A framework for local government powers, functions and structures shall be set out in the Constitution. The comprehensive powers, functions and other features of local government shall be set out in parliamentary statutes or in provincial legislation or in both.'

[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 301.

[5] Ibid. See Nico Steytler 'District Municipalities: Giving Effect to Shared Authority in Local Government' (2003) 7(2) Law, Democracy and Development 228.

[6] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Second Certification Judgment') at paras 73–82.

[7] Ibid at para 77.

[8] For a discussion of the objectives of introducing the unitary metropolitan system, see Robert Cameron 'The Upliftment of South African Local Government' (2001) 27 Local Government Studies 105.

appropriate division of powers and functions between the two tiers of local government that operate outside of metropolitan areas. The need to provide municipal services in an equitable and sustainable manner must be taken into account by this legislation.[1]

Section 2 of the Structures Act provides that an area must be regarded a metropolitan municipality if it can reasonably be regarded as a conurbation featuring areas of high population density, intense movement of people, goods and services, extensive development, multiple business districts and a number of industrial areas. An integrated development plan for the entire single area must also be desirable. Finally, the social and economic linkages between the constituent units should be strong. An area that does not comply with these requirements must, instead, be regarded as a combination of district and local municipalities.[2]

The question as to who decides which category applies to a specific municipal areas became an area of contestation soon after the promulgation of the Structures Act. In its original iteration, the Act provided that the national Minister for local government was vested with the power to declare metropolitan municipalities. This scheme was deemed unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court.[3] The Court held that the Minister should not be vested with the power to determine municipal categories because such a power interfered with the power of the independent Demarcation Board. The Court remarked that 'the Demarcation Board can only determine boundaries if it knows what it is determining boundaries for.'[4] The Structures Act was amended to locate the power to decide on the appropriate municipal category in the Municipal Demarcation Board.[5]

The Structures Act provides for a division of powers and functions between district municipalities and local municipalities as required by FC s 155(3)(c).[6] This division will be further discussed below.[7]

(iii) Types

The Final Constitution requires national legislation to define the different types of municipalities that may be established within each category.[8] In Second Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court dismissed the argument that Constitutional Principle XXIV required the Final Constitution to describe the types of municipalities. The Court held that this reading of CP XXIV was only one of many possible readings of the phrase 'framework for local government … structures'.[9] The types of municipalities are thus described in the Structures Act.

[1] FC s 155(4). See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-20.
[2] Structures Act s 3. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-20.
[3] Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 34–59.
[4] Ibid at para 51.
[5] See Structures Act s 4; Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-20; Cameron 'Boundary Reorganisation' (supra) at 86.
[6] See Chapter 2 of the Municipal Structures Amendment Act 33 of 2000.
[7] See § 22.3 (d) infra.
[8] FC s 155(2).
[9] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 82.

Whereas the category of municipality determines whether or not powers and functions will be shared, the type of municipality determines three other issues, namely:[1]

(a) the institutional relationship between the municipality's executive and its legislative function. This relates to whether the municipality's council must exercise municipal executive authority itself (plenary executive system), whether it may elect an executive committee (collective executive system) or whether it may elect an executive mayor (mayoral executive system);[2]

(b) whether a metropolitan or local municipality is permitted to establish ward committees,[3] and

(c) whether a metropolitan municipality is permitted to establish subcouncils that exercise delegated powers for parts of the municipality.[4]

The content given by national legislation to the typology means that it also responds to FC s 160(5). FC s 160(5) envisages national legislation that will provide criteria for determining, amongst other things, whether a municipal council may elect an executive committee.

FC s 155(5) (and section 12 of the Structures Act) instructs provinces to produce legislation to 'determine the different types of municipality to be established in the province'. These sections confer both the legislative and executive power to establish types of municipality upon the provincial government. In an earlier version of the Structures Act, the national Minister for local government could promulgate guidelines to assist MECs for local government in selecting a type of municipality for a municipal area. The MEC was obliged to take them into account. When this provision was challenged before the Constitutional Court,[5] the Court observed that it 'tells the provinces how they must set about exercising a power in respect of a matter which falls outside the competence of the national government'.[6] The fact that the guidelines were not binding was not important, according to the Court: national government had legislated on a matter which fell outside of its jurisdiction and the provision was declared unconstitutional.

National limits on provincial decision-making with regard to typology are thus to be found only in the national law envisaged in FC s 155(2). Are there, however, implicit limits informed by the notion of local government autonomy? When the constitutional scheme for selecting the municipal typology was challenged in the Constitutional Court, the Court wrote:

[1] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-24.
[2] Structures Act s 7*(a)*, (b) and (c).
[3] Structures Act s 7*(e)*.
[4] Structures Act s 7*(d)*. See also Bernard Bekink Principles of South African Local Government Law (2006) 126-135.
[5] Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 77-84.
[6] Ibid at para 83.

> The provisions to which objection is taken are those dealing with typology and they are sanctioned by section 155(2). The municipal power to elect executive or other committees is therefore subordinate to these provisions and to the provincial power to select types of municipalities. If this has the effect of precluding particular municipalities from electing executive or other committees, that results from the provisions of the Constitution itself and cannot be challenged as being a breach of section 160(5)(b).[1]

From this remark of the Constitutional Court, it could be deduced that the determination of a municipality's executive structure is indeed within the provincial executive's discretion.[2] However, the challenge to which the Court responded was not directed at the power of the MEC to determine the typology but at sections 7, 10 and 33 of the Structures Act. These sections provide a national menu of types and criteria for the establishment of committees. The MEC's decision on the municipal typology takes place in the context of a different provision: FC s 155(6). FC s 155(6) engages the establishment of municipalities.

Another significant dimension to the discussion of the provincial power to determine municipal executive structures vis-à-vis municipal autonomy is the fact that the proclamation of a municipal type does not necessarily determine the executive structure. The effect of the provincial decision on a type for a municipality is that it permits that municipality to decide to establish a particular structure.[3] This decision-making power is particularly relevant with regard to ward committees and subcouncils. In the absence of a municipal decision, no ward committees or sub-councils will be established in the municipality, regardless of the fact that the type permits their establishment. With regard to the executive structure, the typology may be 'open-ended' in theory but not in practice: in reality, a municipality that is permitted to establish an executive committee does not have a choice but to establish an executive committee. Similarly, a municipality that is permitted to elect an executive mayor cannot but elect an executive mayor.[4] Not to follow the provincial suggestion on the executive structure, embedded in the typology, would be tantamount to the absence of an executive structure. That is not an option. Nevertheless, the scheme set out by the Act is clearly premised on the notion that the municipal type does not become a reality without the concurrence of the municipality. This balance of powers must be interpreted to mean that the Act calls for a relationship of co-operation between the provincial government and the municipality when it comes to determining the executive structure. An MEC, in exercising this power, is subject to the principles of co-operative government. These principles require respect for the institutional integrity of local government.[5] This provision, read together with

[1] Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at para 87. As discussed in Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-26.
[2] See Nico Steytler & Jaap De Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 2-26.
[3] See Structures Act ss 43(1), 55(1), 61(2) and 72(2).
[4] That said, a municiplity may forego such an election, if its council is small enough to operate as an executive structure.
[5] See Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Bernard Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

the message sent out by the balance of powers set forth in the Act, should prevent an MEC from exercising this power unilaterally without the concurrence of the municipality.[1]

(iv) Official languages

The choice of official languages is a critical aspect of the establishment of a municipality's presence in a particular area.[2] The Final Constitution lists the official languages of the Republic and instructs the state to take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of these languages.[3] The Final Constitution does not state explicitly, in the same way as it does for national and provincial governments,[4] that a municipality may use any of the 11 official languages 'for the purposes of government'.[5] However, section 21(2) of the Systems Act, in dealing with communication with the local community, provides that the municipal council must determine the official languages of the municipality. It is suggested that these official languages must be used 'for the purposes of government', that is for both internal and external communication. The Final Constitution provides two criteria that municipalities must take into account when dealing with the issue of official languages. The first is a demographic criterion, namely the language usage of the residents of the municipality. The second is an attitudinal criterion, namely the preferences of their residents.[6] In dealing with national and provincial governments, the Final Constitution lists more criteria, such as practicality and expense. The question then arises whether the absence of those factors in FC s 6(3)(b) removes them from the ambit of municipal decision making on the issue. Strijdom argues for an integrated reading of FC s 6. He argues that the effect of this reading is that factors such as practicality, expense, parity of esteem and equitable treatment must be taken into account by municipalities. This view appears correct, especially in relation to the integrated reading of FC ss 6(3)(a) and 6(3)(b). FC s 6(3)(a) provides that national and provincial governments may use any two official languages. Although it further provides that municipalities must take certain criteria into account, it still follows that municipalities have some degree of choice — even though the extent of this discretion is not made explicit.[7] An important question is whether the integrated reading also applies to the requirement of a minimum of two official languages that applies to national and provincial governments.[8] While the two languages requirement

[1] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 2-26.
[2] Ibid at 2-28.
[3] FC s 6(1) and (2).
[4] FC s 6(3)(a).
[5] FC s 6(3)(a).
[6] FC s 6(3)(b).
[7] For a different view, see Iain Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 65.
[8] FC s 6(3)(a).

makes sense for national and provincial governments, its rationale is not so compelling with regard to municipalities. One language may be so dominant in a municipality that it merits a single language policy. However, we believe that a municipality may not employ only one official language. The integrated reading, as well as the fact that section 21(2) of the Systems Act refers to 'official languages' (plural), indicates that at least two languages must be identified and used.[1]

(b) Municipal elections

The Final Constitution was adopted so as to lay the foundations for a democratic and open society in which government is based on the will of the people.[2] Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multiparty system of democratic government are foundational values underpinning the functioning of the state at all three levels.[3] FC s 152(1) specifically commits local government to transparency and accountability. The right to vote in local government elections is extended to all who are registered on the municipality's segment of the national common voters roll.[4]

(i) Term of office of municipal councils

National legislation determines the term of office of a municipal council. However, the Final Constitution sets the limit at five years.[5] When an earlier version of the Structures Act empowered the Minister to determine the term of office of municipal councils by notice in the Government Gazette, the Constitutional Court ruled that Parliament could not have delegated such power to the Minister.[6] General elections must be held within 90 days of the expiry of a council's term.[7] If a council is dissolved,[8] an election must be held for that council within 90 days of the date that the council was dissolved.[9]

(ii) Electoral system

FC s 157(1) states that a municipal council must consist of elected members, appointed members or a combination of elected and appointed members.

[1] Once again, Iain Currie demurs from this interpretation.
[2] FC Preamble.
[3] See Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10; Chris Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.
[4] FC s 157(5).
[5] FC s 159(1) as amended by Constitution Second Amendment Act, 1998 and Structures Act s 24(1).
[6] Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 120–127.
[7] FC s 159(2).
[8] A council may dissolve itself, as long as it has been in office for a minimum of two years. Structures Act s 34(1)-(2). A council can also be dissolved by the provincial executive in terms of an intervention. FC s 139. See further § 22.6*(d)*(v) infra.
[9] FC s 159(2).

FC s 157(2) provides that the system for electing members of municipal councils must be based on proportional representation (PR) elections or on PR elections combined with constituency (ward) elections. PR elections must be based on that municipality's segment of the national common voters roll and provide for the election of members from lists of party candidates drawn up in a party's order of preference.[1] A choice to combine PR with ward representation is subject to the requirement of general proportionality found in FC s 157(3). FC s 157(3) requires that the electoral system 'must result, in general, in proportional representation'.[2] If the system includes ward representation, then an independent authority must delimit the wards in terms of procedures and criteria prescribed by national legislation.[3]

The Structures Act determines the percentages for ward and PR elections: 50 percent of councillors are elected from party lists on a proportional basis[4] and 50 percent of ward councillors are elected in a 'winner-takes-all' system in Category A (metropolitan) council and Category B (local) councils.[5] Candidates for a ward election can be independent or nominated by a political party.[6]

The provision for appointed members enables Parliament to regulate the composition of Category C municipalities. Category C municipalities encompass more than one local municipality.[7] Whether or not the council of a Category C municipality is made up of only appointed members or of a combination of appointed and directly elected members is left for legislative determination. The Final Constitution does provide that the latter category of councillors must be appointed 'by other municipal Councils',[8] which presupposes an appointment procedure that entails decision making by the full council. Furthermore, these councillors 'must represent those other councils',[9] indicating that the appointees do not enjoy a free mandate. Finally, any legislation dealing with the appointed councillors must ensure that parties and interests reflected within the council that makes the appointment are fairly represented on the council to which the appointment is made.[10] This provision rules out the appointment of officials to the other council

[1] FC s 157(2)(a).

[2] Before it was amended in 2002, FC s 157(3) required that the electoral system ensure 'that the total number of members elected from each party reflects the total proportion of the votes recorded for those parties'. The principle of proportionality was thus relaxed to accommodate changes in the electoral system that would allow party representatives to 'cross the floor'.

[3] FC s 157(4)(a).

[4] Structures Act item 6*(b)* sch 1.

[5] Most local municipalities comprise wards. According to s 22(4) of the Structures Act, a municipality that has a council of fewer than seven members has no wards. These municipal councils consist of PR councillors only. See also Structures Act sch 1 item 7. Structures Act s 22(1)-(3) and sch 1 item 6*(a)*. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-10–4-13 for the calculation of seats.

[6] Municipal Electoral Act s 16(1).

[7] FC s 155(1).

[8] FC s 157(1)(b)(i).

[9] FC s 157(1)(b)(i).

[10] FC s 157(1)(b) and (6).

and makes the appointments by the council subject to the principle of 'fairness'. The constitutional principle of fairness demands more than simple majority rule; a procedure that allows a council majority to determine the appointment is thus not in keeping with the Final Constitution. At the same time, following the holding adopted in Democratic Alliance v ANC,[1] fairness does not necessarily demand proportionality[2] but connotes a notion of meaningful participation.

The Structures Act provides for the system envisaged in FC s 157(1)(b)(ii), i.e., a combination of appointed and directly elected members of a district council. Voters in the district elect 40 percent of the district council according to a party list system.[3] The remaining 60 percent is made up of representatives of local municipalities[4] and, if applicable, district management areas (DMA).[5] The number of district council seats to which a local council or a DMA is entitled, depends on the number of registered voters that reside in that particular area.[6]

In dealing with the system for appointing representatives, the Structures Act stays well within the limits set by FC s 157(6). It establishes a system that is based on proportionality: an internal election based on lists of candidates submitted by parties or individuals represented on the council determines the composition of the delegation of appointees.[7] The composition of a local council's delegation to the district council will thus reflect the composition of the local council. The system of proportionality in district representation is important when it comes to dealing with the 'recall' of a district representative by a local municipality. According to section 27*(e)* of the Structures Act, the local council can, by majority decision, 'replace' a district representative. When this occurs, a vacancy arises on the district council. The term 'replace' in the Structures Act could be interpreted to mean that the local council can appoint its new representative in the same resolution as the one that recalls its existing representative. Such an interpretation would, however, result in proportionality being replaced by majority rule — and that interpretation runs counter to the intention of the Structures Act. Therefore, the process outlined in the Structures Act for the filling of district council vacancies should be used.[8] This means that the new district representative must be selected from the candidate list that produced the district representative that was recalled. This method preserves the degree of proportionality envisaged by the Structures Act. The fact that the Structures

[1] 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C).

[2] The general principle of proportionality, put forward in FC s 157(3), does not apply to the system of appointments.

[3] Structures Act s 23(1)(a) read with s 23(3).

[4] Structures Act s 23(1)(b).

[5] Structures Act s 23(1)(c). District Management Areas are sparsely populated areas in which the establishment of a local municipality is not viable. Structures Act s 6. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-13–4-16 for the calculation of seats.

[6] Structures Act item 15 sch 2.

[7] See Structures Act part 2 sch 2.

[8] Structures Act sch 2 items 11 and 23.

Act goes beyond the constitutional instruction of 'fairness' and demands such proportionality ought not to be viewed as constitutionally suspect. The Structures Act does not violate FC s 157(6) by providing greater protection for minorities than the constitutional provision requires.

(iii) Membership

Anyone who is registered on a municipality's segment of the national common voters' roll is eligible to be a member of that council.[1] The exceptions are listed in subsections 158(1) of the Final Constitution.[2] They concern:

(a) Paid municipal staff members.[3]
(b) Paid provincial or national government staff members who have been disqualified in terms of national legislation.[4]
(c) Members of the National Assembly, National Council of Provinces or any of the provincial legislatures.[5]
(d) Members of another municipal council.[6]
(e) Anyone who is disqualified from voting for the National Assembly.[7]
(f) Unrehabilitated insolvents, persons declared to be of unsound mind and persons convicted of an offence and sentenced to more than 12 months imprisonment without the option of a fine.[8]

Despite these disqualifications, anyone who is registered on a municipality's segment of the national common voters' roll can be a candidate, with the exception of the categories referred to under (e) and (f) above.[9]

A PR councillor also vacates his or her office if he or she ceases to be a member of the political party. Of course, floor-crossing is an obvious exception to that rule.[10] The same applies to ward councillors. Party-aligned ward councillors vacate office if they lose party membership outside of the scheme for floor-crossing.[11] Independent ward councillors vacate office if they become members of a political party

[1] FC s 158(1) read with s 157(5).
[2] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-8.
[3] FC s 158(1)(a).
[4] FC s 158(1)(b).
[5] FC s 158(1)(d). This disqualification does not apply to members of a municipal council representing organised local government in the National Council of Provinces.
[6] FC s 158(1)(e). This disqualification does not apply to appointed council members.
[7] FC s 158(1)(c).
[8] FC s 158(1)(c) read with s 47(1)(c), (d) and (e). The latter disqualification applies only to people convicted after the 1996 Constitution took effect (7 February 1998) and lapses five years after the sentence has been completed. Section 119(4) of the Systems Act seeks to reiterate the disqualification mentioned under FC s 158(1)(c) read with FC s 47(1)(e). However, it contradicts the Final Constitution by providing that the disqualification is applicable 'during a period of five years as from the conviction' (emphasis added). Therefore, not only is section 119(4) of the Systems Act superfluous (as the issue is fully governed by the Constitution), it is also unconstitutional. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-8 n 47.
[9] FC s 158(2) read with Structures Act s 21(1)(a).
[10] FC item 1(1) sch 6B.
[11] FC item 1(2)(a) sch 6B.

outside of the scheme for floor crossing.[1] The Structures Act provides for other instances where a councillor vacates office.[2]

Whether or not councillors should have the ability to change party allegiance without losing their seats has long been a contentious issue.[3] Generally, the ability to cross the floor creates tension with the general principle of proportionality.[4] National and provincial parliamentarians were not permitted to cross the floor in terms of the Interim Constitution.[5] The same principle obtained under the Local Government Transition Act;[6] on losing party membership, a councillor lost his or her seat.[7] The principle of an imperative mandate still applied in an unmitigated way until 2002.[8] In 2002 amendments to both the Final Constitution and the Structures Act, permitting floor-crossing, were passed. The principle of proportionality in FC s 157(3) was reworded to state that the electoral system 'must result, in general, in proportional representation'.[9] A new schedule 6A[10] was inserted in the Final Constitution to deal with changes in party membership in between general elections.[11] The significance of the opening up of the ability to cross the floor in the context of the overall proportionality requirement lies in the fact that crossing of the floor inevitably results in a degree of disproportionality.

In United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa (1) the United Democratic Movement (UDM) challenged the floor crossing legislation.[12] The UDM argued that the amendments affected the basic values of the Final Constitution contained in FC 1 and that the amendments should therefore have been passed in terms of FC s 74(1)[13] instead of FC s 74(3).[14] In its substantive argument, the UDM put forward the proposition that proportional representation

[1] FC sch 6B item 1(2)(b).

[2] Structures Act s 27.

[3] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-21. It is important to note that, at its latest Conference, the African National Congress adopted a resolution that floor-crossing be abolished. The discussion of the legal framework for crossing of the floor is thus discussed against the backdrop of this intention to remove it. At the time of writing, the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill 2008 and the Constitutional Fifteenth Amendment Bill 2008 were under discussion in Parliament. They seek to abolish floor-crossing in all three spheres of government.

[4] See also Glenda Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 29-12.

[5] See IC ss 43*(b), 51(1)(b)* and 133(1)(b).

[6] Act 209 of 1993.

[7] See, for example, s 82(1) of the Election Regulations (Western Cape), referred to in Villiers v Munisipaliteit van Beaufort-Wes 1998 (9) BCLR 1060 (C).

[8] Structures Act s 27*(c)* and (f) provided that ward or PR councillors who changed party allegiance have to vacate office.

[9] Emphasis added.

[10] Later amended into schedule 6B by Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 2003.

[11] Originally, the schedule could be amended by ordinary legislation passed in accordance with FC s 76(1). This provision was repealed by s 5 of Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 2003.

[12] 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM').

[13] FC s 74(1) requires a 75 percent majority in the National Assembly and the support of at least six provinces in the NCOP.

[14] FC s 74(3) requires a two-thirds majority (66 percent) in the National Assembly and the support of at least six provinces in the NCOP.

is protected by the anti-defection clause, and that it is a fundamental element of South Africa's multi-party democracy. The party — not the member — is entitled to the seat. If a member is allowed to defect, then the proportionality of the elected body is distorted. The challenge was directed at the entire suite of legislation on floor-crossing at national, provincial and municipal level. A distinction can be made, and was made, between local government and the other two spheres of government. National and provincial elections are based on a closed list PR system while municipal elections have, in the words of Glenda Fick, 'a majoritarian element which more readily accommodate[s] floor crossing'.[1] Nevertheless, the Final Constitution makes no distinction between PR councillors and ward councillors in setting out the possibilities and criteria for floor-crossing. Neither the Constitutional Court nor the parties before it in UDM sought to make the distinction.[2]

In UDM, the Constitutional Court disagreed with most of the arguments leveled against the floor-crossing legislation. It held that the changes do not affect the founding values of the Final Constitution and concluded that multi-party democracy, as required by FC s 1*(d)*, is not the same as proportional representation.[3] Furthermore, the Court observed that the system of proportional representation as envisaged by the Final Constitution does not necessarily require a prohibition on floor-crossing.[4] An important consideration for the Court in this respect was the notion that voters, in any jurisdiction, have no control over the conduct of their representatives once they have been elected: 'The fact that political representatives may act inconsistently with their mandates is a risk in all electoral systems.'[5] When the argument was raised that the 10 per cent formula benefited larger parties, the Court observed that the fact that an electoral system works in favour of particular parties does not necessarily make it unconstitutional.[6] The Court also dismissed the argument that schedule 6B (formerly schedule 6A) was inconsistent with FC s 157(3)'s 'general' requirement of proportionality.

Item 2(1)(b) of schedule 6B provides that a party-aligned ward councillor can change party membership or become independent without losing his or her seat. It also provides that an independent ward councillor can join a party without losing his or her seat. Item 2(1)(a) stipulates that a PR councillor can change party membership without losing his or her seat.

[1] Fick (supra) at 29-16 and 29-25. For a fine-grained reading of UDM, see Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

[2] Fick (supra) at 29-16–29-18 (criticises the absence of the distinction and argues that the Court should have addressed the tension between a closed-list PR system and floor-crossing.)

[3] See Christopher Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 13-23.

[4] UDM (supra) at para 53. See also Fick (supra) at 29-16.

[5] UDM (supra) at para 50.

[6] See Roederer (supra) at 13-23.

The Final Constitution does place restrictions on floor crossings.[1] Firstly, councillors may only change party membership (or become independent) if 10 percent of their party's total members in the council simultaneously cease to be members.[2] This percentage prevents, as far as possible, individual defections and the instability and possibility of political corruption that attach to such individual defections.[3] Secondly, a councillor may only cross the floor during a so-called 'window period'. These 'window periods' are:

(a) from 1–15 September of the second year after a general election; and
(b) from 1–15 September of the fourth year after a general election.[4]

Thirdly, a councillor may only change party membership, become a party member or cease to be a party member once during such a 'window period'.[5]

In Julies v Speaker of the National Assembly, the High Court dealt with the matter of the 10 percent requirement, albeit in the context of the National Assembly.[6] The court held that compliance with this requirement is to be determined immediately prior to the commencement of the relevant window period. The outcome of that assessment remains static throughout the window period, notwithstanding any floor-crossing during that window period. The rationale for the window period is 'to freeze membership of the National Assembly for a period of 15 days, during which a member who wishes to change his party allegiance would nevertheless retain his seat in the Legislature'.[7] It is suggested that the same principles apply to municipal councils.

During a window period, a party is prevented from suspending or terminating a councillor's membership without the written consent of the councillor. Similarly, a party may not do anything that may cause a councillor to be disqualified from holding office without such written consent.[8]

The fact that a councillor enjoys 'immunity' only during the window period begs the question as to what may happen if a political party becomes aware of a councillor's intention to resign prior to the start of the window period. Expulsion before the window period is clearly possible. But what happens if the councillor appeals against the party's decision, by using internal party appeal procedures or by resorting to the courts when internal means have been exhausted? Such an

[1] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 4-23.
[2] FC sch 6B item 2(1)(b)(ii). The 10 percent-rule naturally cannot be applied to an independent ward councillor who joins a party. It also did not apply for the first round of floor-crossing immediately after the constitutional amendments came into effect (item 18 Constitution Amendment Act 18 of 2002).
[3] It is suggested that, in the translation of the 10 percent into actual members, fractions must be rounded upwards. For example, if a party has 15 members on a council, the 10 percent requirement would mean that two members must cross together. To disregard fractions would not be in keeping with the intention of the requirement, which is to restrict floor crossing.
[4] FC sch 6B item 4(1)(a).
[5] FC sch 6B item 4(2)(a).
[6] 2006 (4) SA 13 (C), [2006] 4 All SA 457 (C).
[7] Ibid at para 14.
[8] FC item 4(2)(c) sch 6B. Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 4-24.

appeal procedure generally suspends the expulsion and may very well last until the window period has ended. The councillor may then still cross the floor without losing his or her seat. The importance of 'timing' the crossing in the context of a pending appeal came to the fore in Mathew Shunmugam & Others v Newcastle Local Municipality & Others.[1] If the councillor crosses the floor prior to the conclusion of the appeal, the seat is lost to the party from which he or she resigned. In Shunmugam, eighteen councillors, who were members of NADECO, had been expelled prior to the window period. They challenged this expulsion in court and obtained interim relief that set aside the expulsion. NADECO then sought an application reconsidering the interim relief. As the matter could not be finalized before the commencement of the window period, the court set aside the interim order and ruled that, pending the final outcome, the members remained suspended and that NADECO would not replace them before the commencement of the window period. The matter was set down for argument on a date within the window period so as to enable the Court to finalize the matter before the end of that period. During the window period and before the matter could be finalized before the court, the chickens flew the coop and joined other parties. The central question was thus whether they were members of NADECO on the eve of the window period. Rall AJ decided that they were not. They had abandoned their right to challenge their expulsion by joining other parties. In the words of the learned judge:

> To me there can be no clearer and more unequivocal statement by conduct of a wish to no longer have anything more to do with their political home, NADECO, than their joining other political parties. If they were still members of NADECO, then this amounted to a resignation from that party and if they were no longer members this was a statement that they had no intention of regaining their membership. This conduct is plainly inconsistent with an intention to enforce the right to set aside their expulsion from the party and hence regain membership thereof.[2]

If the councillors had waited for the finalization of the court proceedings and had obtained an order setting aside the expulsion, then they could have crossed without losing their seats. By jumping the gun they effectively waived their right to challenge the expulsion and rendered the argument about their expulsion moot.

The somewhat unfortunate wording of the order, referring to the continued 'suspension' of the councillors pending final outcome, was the subject of another argument. A suspended member of a party remains a member of it and is capable of resigning from that party (and if this is done in a window period, to carry the seat along). However, the court interpreted the word 'suspended' to be a synonym for 'expelled': it did so mainly because of the quid pro quo arrangement. The 'suspension' continued and NADECO, in turn, was not able to replace the 'suspended' councillors. Clearly, it is only an 'expelled' councillor who requires protection against replacement.

[1] [2007] ZAKZHC 16 (4 December 2007).
[2] Ibid at para 19.

The question arises as to whether expulsion is permissible during the window period if the transgression of the councillor was detected before the window period commenced. A remark in passing of Davis J in Diko v Nobongoza[1] appears to deal with this issue. The High Court stated that immunity 'in respect of offences genuinely raised before the window period' may 'not be correct'. Even though the judgment deals with members of Parliament and members of provincial legislatures, it found that a party may expel a councillor during the window period, but only if the offence was 'genuinely raised' before the window period. For an offence to be 'genuinely raised' it requires clear evidence of the offence. This evidence must be dated before the commencement of the window period. It is not sufficient to use the benefit of hindsight and link a manifestation of disloyalty during the window period with acts or omissions that took place before the window period began.

Finally, is expulsion or termination of party membership completely ruled out during the window period? Does it apply to the termination of membership for reasons that have nothing to do with party allegiance? Schedule 6B suggests otherwise: the title of the schedule is 'Loss or Retention of Membership of Municipal Councils after a change of Party Membership'. It follows that the immunity is intended to prevent political parties from undermining a councillor's (relatively) free mandate during the window period. Its intention is not to prevent political parties from exercising 'normal' disciplinary oversight over councillors. A party may thus still expel or suspend its members for offences that are manifestly unrelated to party allegiance (e.g., corruption, sexual harassment).

(c) Political structures and procedures

(i) Constitutional development

The Final Constitution provides a broad framework for a municipal council's political structures and procedures. Much of what councils do is left to national legislation.

CPs X and XXIV form the background for this framework. CP XXIV demanded that the Constitution deals with a framework for local government powers and functions. CP X demanded that 'Formal legislative procedures shall be adhered to by legislative organs at all levels of government'.

When the Constitutional Court first measured the original text of the Final Constitution against these principles, it concluded that they were not met.[2] In First Certification Judgment,[3] the Court held that the Principles required the Final

[1] 2006 (3) SA 126, 137A-B (C).
[2] Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 3-7.
[3] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 301.

Constitution to indicate how local government executives are to be appointed, how local governments are to take decisions, and the formal legislative procedures that have to be followed. The amended text, which was subsequently submitted by the Constitutional Assembly, was approved by the Court in Second Certification Judgment.[1]

A variety of provisions in the Final Constitution — and an entire chapter, Chapter 7 — establish the necessary framework for local government. For example, FC s 160(6) provides that a municipal council may make by-laws which prescribe rules and orders for its internal arrangements, its business and proceedings and the establishment, composition, procedures, powers and functions of its committees. In interpreting the scope of FC s 160(6), the Constitutional Court compared FC s 160(6) with FC s 57. FC s 57 deals with Parliament's powers to determine its 'rules and orders'.[2] The comparison produced a number of important limits on the scope of councils to determine 'rules and orders'. Firstly, the power of the council to regulate the internal proceedings of its committees does not relate to the power to regulate the establishment or the functioning of the executive of municipal councils.[3] Secondly, it naturally excludes the structural components of the council: these components are fully regulated by the Final Constitution. Instead, it extends only to those working committees which the council may decide to establish, and also disestablish, from time to time.[4] Thirdly, it does not relate to the power to regulate the office of the speaker.[5] Fourthly, it does not regulate the legislative process. That process is detailed elsewhere in the Final Constitution.[6] The DA v ANC Court therefore concluded with regard to FC s 160(6) that > its scope is relatively narrow and does not relate to the power to regulate the establishment or functioning of the executive of municipal councils, whatever form that executive may take, or any other committee of the municipality which is a key part of its democratic structure. It relates only to task and working committees which may be established and disestablished from time to time.[7]

However, it is clear that national or provincial legislation, detailing the manner in which a municipal council must conduct its meetings or establish its working committees (in the way the pre-1994 local government ordinances did) is no longer permitted. There is, therefore, no support for Bekink's contention that municipal rules and orders 'may [not] be different from provisions regarding such aspects that have been determined in the legislation of the two higher spheres of government'.[8] Such legislation is required by the Final Constitution to respect a municipality's rights in terms of FC s 160(6).

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 73-82.
[2] Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development 2000(1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council Western Cape') at para 99.
[3] Ibid at para 100.
[4] Ibid at para 100.
[5] Ibid at para 110.
[6] Ibid at para 111.
[7] Ibid at para 101.
[8] Bernard Bekink Principles of South African Local Government Law (2006) 266.

An essential part of the framework set forth in the Final Constitution can be found in FC s 160(8). This section provides that members of the council are entitled to participate in its proceedings and those of its committees in a manner that allows fair representation of all parties and interests reflected in the council. In Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others[1] the Cape High Court sought to give meaning to the phrases 'fairly represented' and 'consistent with democracy'.[2] It accepted that, in the context of the composition and the functioning of council committees, the latter requirement can be equated with majority rule.[3] However, the principle of fairness is more elusive. Our interest in fairness may not necessarily accord with the principle of proportionality that underpins local government electoral systems. The potential for a conflict between these two principles yields an interesting question: do minority parties have the right to a certain minimum level of participation on council committees?[4] The High Court accepted that fairness does not entail an entitlement to a specific number of seats. It does not even demand a rational connection between a party's representation in the council and the number of seats it is afforded on a particular committee. The High Court did not proffer a definition of fairness. It limited itself to the proposition that the principle of fairness 'can be met by a system of representation other than proportional representation or a system approximating one of proportional representation'.[5] An important consideration for the High Court was the notion that fairness generates a right to participate as opposed to a right to a particular composition.[6] Textually at least, this approach does not dovetail neatly with the requirements of FC s 160(8).

In Democratic Alliance v Masondo,[7] the Constitutional Court determined that the requirements of democracy and fairness in FC s 160(8) 'finds expression in the municipal council and those committees elected by it'.[8] Other committees, not established and elected by the municipal council, but that may still exist within a municipality are not subject to this principle. Examples of such committees are the mayoral committee,[9] a ward committee[10] or an audit committee.[11] The primary focus

[1] 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C)('DA v ANC').

[2] See Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 10-40.

[3] DA v ANC (supra) at 11. In this context, Roux warns that the term 'democracy' will be understood as a reference to majority-rule, rather than the deeper principle of democracy. He also argues that this case highlights the court's reluctance to super-impose its own conception of democracy and (therefore) the limited normative effect of unqualified references to 'democracy' in the Constitution. Roux (supra) at 10-40.

[4] See FC s 157(3).

[5] DA v ANC (supra) at 27.

[6] Ibid at 25.

[7] 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC)('DA v Masondo').

[8] Ibid at para 18.

[9] Structures Act s 60.

[10] Structures Act ss 72-78.

[11] Municipal Finance Management Act 56 of 2000 s 166.

of those committees is not the deliberative process that characterizes the municipal council and its committees.[1]

(ii) Municipal Council

The Final Constitution does not separate legislative and executive roles at local government level: FC s 151(2) vests both the executive and legislative authority of a municipality in its municipal council. The Constitutional Court has described local government as 'a hybrid' system'.[2] Consequently, the council makes decisions concerning the exercise of all the powers and the performance of all the functions of the municipality.[3] In Democratic Alliance v Masondo, two different interpretations of the absence of a constitutional separation of powers at local government level were offered.[4] O'Regan J, in her dissenting judgment, explained the difference between local government and the other spheres of government (as regards the separation of powers) in the light of the nature of the functions of local government:

> They are not the high affairs of state — defence, foreign affairs, justice and security, but matters concerning delivery of services and facilities to local communities: power, water, waste management, parks and recreation and decisions concerning the development and planning of the municipal area. Thus executive decisions of municipal councils will ordinarily be decisions which have direct effect on the lives and opportunities of those living in the area.[5]

O'Regan J further elaborates on her view of the exclusive nature of the executive mayoral committee when she writes:

> Those tasks involve primarily municipal planning as well as the provision of services such as power, water, waste removal, municipal clinics and fire-fighting services and the provision of amenities such as sports grounds, parks, libraries, markets and municipal transport. Without doubt, these are important services and facilities relied upon by all members of the community. They are not areas of executive authority which require the confidentiality and political cohesion of an exclusive executive team modelled on the cabinet for national government.[6]

Sachs J, in his concurring judgment, took a more pragmatic approach and observed that '[b]ecause the Constitution is silent on the question of the kind of executive leadership that councils may have, I regard it as one of the areas not dealt with in the Constitution and accordingly left for legislative determination.'[7]

[1] DA v Masondo (supra) at paras 19-33. See also Roux (supra) at 10-40 and Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 3-40.
[2] DA v Masondo (supra) at para 21.
[3] FC s 160 (1).
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at para 60.
[6] Ibid at para 77.
[7] Ibid at para 48.

Justice Sachs' interpretation is to be preferred, particularly in light of the variety of local governments that exist in terms of the Final Constitution. Firstly, all but one of Justice O'Regan's examples of 'high affairs' are exclusive national government functions. That they are exclusive national powers undercuts the juxtaposition of local government and provincial governments. Furthermore, the emergence of metropolitan municipalities with more autonomy, the responsibility to oversee the lion's share of national economic activity and bigger budgets than some provinces, suggests a somewhat different landscape than the community services view espoused by Justice O'Regan.

The consolidation of both legislative and executive roles in the council does not mean that the council takes all decisions.[1] Decision-making powers may be delegated to other structures and office-bearers within the municipality.[2] However, the council makes decisions concerning the exercise of all powers and the delegation of powers does not divest the council of any of its responsibilities. The Final Constitution provides that certain functions may not be delegated by the council. They are —

(a) the passing of by-laws;
(b) the approval of budgets;
(c) the imposition of rates and other taxes, levies and duties; and
(d) the raising of loans.[3]

The absence of a constitutionally determined separation of powers at municipal level should be viewed in light of a municipality's specific developmental mandate. The Final Constitution charges a municipality with the duty to provide 'democratic development' in its area of jurisdiction.[4] The objects of local government, as provided in FC s 152, are useful in the interpretation of this mandate. The Final Constitution not only formally instructs a municipality, in FC 152(1)(b),(c) and (d) to guarantee adequate service delivery, social and economic development and a safe and healthy environment — it provides some substantive guidelines as to how a municipality should go about fulfilling these responsibilities. FC s 152(1)(a) and (e) make it clear that a municipality should do so in a manner that not only enhances and nurtures democracy, but in a fashion that also promotes participation and inclusiveness. Consistent with these desiderata is the notion that the municipal council, where a variety of parties, interests and views prevalent in the municipality are present, is the organ that 'makes decisions concerning the exercise of all powers'. The Final Constitution's intention here is not to limit the imperative of open debate in a transparent setting only to legislative decisions. Instead, the [1] We believe that Bekink is wrong on this point. See Bekink (supra) at 229 n 73.

[2] See also DA v Masondo (supra) at para 21.
[3] FC s 160(2).
[4] As Cameron puts it, '[t]he role of local government has to shift from traditional local service delivery and administration to local socio-economic development'. Robert Cameron 'The Upliftment of South African Local Government' (2001) 27 Local Government Studies 104.

Final Constitution sought to extend this imperative to all council decisions. The fact that a council may delegate powers to organs within the municipality does not undermine this duty to provide open, accountable and transparent government. The ultimate responsibility for decisions taken in terms of delegated authority remains with the council. In the same vein, the council has the ability to revisit any decision taken in terms of delegated authority[1] or revisit the delegation of authority.

The Final Constitution provides that national legislation may provide criteria for determining the size of a municipal council.[2] The Structures Act provides that the councils of local and district municipalities may not be bigger than 90 members.[3] Metropolitan councils may not be bigger than 270 members.[4] The Act[5] instructs the Minister for local government to promulgate a formula, based on the number of voters in the municipal area, which produces the size of a particular municipal council.[6] The MEC for local government eventually determines the size of the council when he or she establishes the municipality.[7] Under certain circumstances, the MEC can deviate from the Minister's formula.[8]

A majority of the members of a council must be present at a meeting of the council before a vote may be taken on any matter.[9] The question arises as to whether the phrase 'a majority of the members of a Council' refers to a majority of council seats or to a majority of councillors. In other words, does the meaning of 'a majority of the members of a Council' change when the total number of councillors is (temporarily) reduced due to a vacancy? In Oelofse v Sutherland, the High Court interpreted the quorum requirement as set out in FC s 160(3)(a) as follows: '[A] municipal council must have at least one half plus one of the number of potential council seats, allocated to the particular council by the MEC for local government, to be filled by incumbents before the council can function.'[10] The quorum therefore does not change when the total number of councillors is reduced due to a vacancy.[11]

Council decisions are taken by a majority of the votes cast.[12] That means that a majority of the councillors present in a (quorate) council meeting must vote in

[1] The principle of inclusivity has found further expression in s 59(3)(a) of the Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 which provides that a quarter of the municipal council can demand a review of a decision taken in terms of delegated authority.

[2] FC s 160(5)(a).

[3] Structures Act 20(1)(b).

[4] Structures Act 20(1)(c).

[5] Structures Act 20(1)(a).

[6] See Executive Council Western Cape (supra) at paras 89-95 (Constitutional Court dismissed a claim that this section is unconstitutional because it encroaches on provincial powers by providing a 'mandatory formula' instead of criteria to be taken into account.)

[7] Structures Acts 18(3).

[8] See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 3-2.

[9] FC s 160(3)(a); Structures Act s 30(1). See also Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 3-12.

[10] Oelofse & Others v Sutherland & Others 2001 (4) SA 748, 751 (T).

[11] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 3-12. See also Bekink (supra) at 264.

[12] FC s 160(3)(b).

favour of a particular proposal before a decision can be taken. The Structures Act provides for a solution in the event of an equality of votes, namely that the presiding councillor casts an extra vote.[1] Certain matters can only be determined by a majority vote of the councillors. With regard to those matters, a majority of all the councillors must vote in favour of a particular proposal before a decision can be taken. All those matters are listed in FC s 160(2):

(a) passing of by-laws;
(b) approving the budget;
(c) imposing rates and other taxes, levies and duties; and
(d) raising loans.[2]

In line with the interpretation of FC s 160(3)(a) offered above, FC s 160(2) must refer to a majority of seats and not councillors.

FC s 160(1)(b) provides that a municipal council must elect its chairperson. The implementation of this provision in the Structures Act has resulted in a separation of the chairperson of the council (speaker) from the mayor.[3] In nearly all municipalities,[4] the chairperson is called a speaker and is not the same person as the mayor. This is not the inevitable consequence of the Final Constitution's requirement that each municipal council elects a chairperson. The legislator can still opt to collapse the chairperson and the mayor into one office — as often occurred prior to the Structures Act. The fact that, in some limited instances (the so-called 'plenary-type' municipalities) the two offices are occupied by one office-bearer bears out this thesis.

The Final Constitution provides two important principles that support open and transparent debate at council meetings. Firstly, it provides for the privileges and immunity of councillors. Secondly, it provides that council meetings must be open to the public.

FC s 161 provides that national legislation can determine a framework for provincial legislation on the privileges and immunity of municipal councils and their members.[5] Section 28 of the Structures Act provides this national framework. It states that this provincial legislation must provide at least:

(a) that councillors have freedom of speech in a municipal council and in its committees, subject to the rules and orders;[6] and

[1] Structures Act s 30(4).
[2] FC s 160(3)(b).
[3] Structures Act s 36.
[4] Municipalities of the plenary type are not included. See § 22.2 (a)(iv) supra. See also Structures Act ss 9*(c)* and 36(5).
[5] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 3-15.
[6] Structures Act s 28(1)(a). Cf Bekink (supra) at 270. Bekink appears to suggest that the freedom of speech does not exist if not provided for in a municipality's rules of order when he advises councils to make provision for privileges and immunities in view of the phrase 'subject to the rules and orders'. This view cannot be supported: (the absence of) a by-law cannot trump a constitutional right or some other constitutional protection. The phrase 'subject to the rules and orders' refers to the limits on freedom of speech imposed by such rules and not to the granting of freedom of speech.

(b) that councillors are not civilly or criminally liable for anything that they have said in, produced before or submitted to the council or any of its committees or for anything revealed as a result of anything that they have said in, produced before or submitted to the council or any of its committees.[1]

In provinces where this provincial legislation has not (yet) been enacted, section 28(1) applies as the basis for privileges and immunities of councils and councillors.[2]

Can a councillor be held personally liable for a vote he or she cast in a council meeting or for statements made during a council meeting? Swartbooi v Brink dealt with an appeal against a High Court ruling, setting aside an unlawful council resolution and holding all councillors who voted in favour of the resolution personally liable for damage caused by the resolution.[3] On appeal, the councillors invoked FC s 161 (and Structures Act s 28). The Constitutional Court had to consider a number of arguments. The first contention was that these provisions protect legislative functions (i.e., deliberations on a proposed by-law) only and do not extend to executive and administrative functions. The Court disagreed and held that the protection offered by said provisions is not dependent on whether the councillor participated in legislative, executive or administrative activities.[4] It was also argued that section 28 of the Structures Act exceeds the parameters set by the Final Constitution because it includes conduct in committees, while FC s 161 makes no mention of committees. As the conduct in question took place in full council, the Court did not need to address this issue. However, it hinted that the function or the purpose of the committee may be relevant to the question as to whether a participating councillor is exempted from liability for anything said or done in that committee.[5] The third argument was that immunity could not apply to conduct in support of acts later set aside. This argument, too, was dismissed by the Court: protection of lawful acts only would be too limited to fulfil the provision's purpose of encouraging open debate.[6] Importantly, the Court ruled that the statements made by the mayor outside the council meeting fell outside of the immunity protection offered by the Final Constitution and the Structures Act. Conduct is protected if it is related to the council: statements or submissions must be made to the council or things must be produced before the council.[7]

[1] Structures Act s 28(1)(b).
[2] Structures Act s 28(2).
[3] Swartbooi & Others v Brink & Another (2) 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC).
[4] Ibid at paras 13-16.
[5] Ibid at para 17.
[6] Ibid at paras 19-20.
[7] See also Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) (Constitutional Court held that a councillor's immunity does not extend to his or her appearance in the provincial legislature, pursuant to FC 115.)

The municipal council must conduct its business in an open manner, and may close its sittings only when it is reasonable to do[1]. The same principle applies to its committees.[2] Not all committees provided for in the Structures Act are subject to this principle. Whether or not a committee is a committee 'of the council' is the deciding criterion. In Democratic Alliance v Masondo, Langa DCJ, writing for the Court, investigated the various provisions in the Constitution that refer to committees of the council.[3] He concluded that 'the committees referred to in sections 160(6)(c) and 160(8) (the committees of a municipal council) are the same committees that are referred to in sections 160(1)(c) and 160(5)(b), namely, committees which are elected by the municipal council.'[4] For example, the mayoral committee, established for the purpose of assisting the executive mayor, and made up of councillors selected by the executive mayor, is not a committee 'of the council'. It is therefore not bound by FC s 160(7).[5] The executive committee, however, is constituted by councillors elected by the council, and is bound by FC s 160(7).

(iii) Executive

As discussed earlier, the Final Constitution does not deal elaborately with executive leadership at local government level. As Sachs J noted in Democratic Alliance v ANC,[6] the exact contours of executive leadership was left for legislative determination. Only three provisions make direct reference to executive leadership. FC s 160(1)(c) provides that a municipal council may elect an executive committee (and other committees) subject to national legislation. FC ss 160(5)(b) and (c) state that national legislation may provide criteria for determining (a) whether municipal councils may elect an executive committee, and (b) what the size of the executive committee may be. The national legislation, envisaged by all three provisions, is the Structures Act. This Act entitles only a municipality of the 'collective executive type' to elect an executive committee. In Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development, it was argued that FC s 160(5)(b) limits section FC s 160(1)(c).[7] That is, the applicant contended that national legislation on executive committees may only deal with the size of executive committees and may not preclude municipalities from electing an executive committee. The Constitutional Court dismissed this argument by pointing out that FC s 160(1)(c) clearly conveys the message that 'the right of municipalities to elect committees will not prevail where there is national legislation to the contrary'.[8]

[1] FC s 160(7).
[2] FC s 160(7).
[3] 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC)('DA v Masondo').
[4] Ibid at para 20.
[5] See, for example, Bernard Bekink Principles of South African Government Law (2006) 268.
[6] DA v Masondo (supra) at para 48.
[7] Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at paras 86-88.
[8] Ibid at para 87 (emphasis added).

(iv) Traditional leaders

Since the adoption of the Interim Constitution, there has been considerable contestation in local government about the role of traditional leadership.[1] The undisputable trend, however, is that the transformation of local government has resulted in a progressive curtailment of traditional authority in local government matters.[2]

Prior to the Local Government Transition Act (LGTA),[3] traditional authorities often performed local government functions in the former 'homelands'.[4] When Interim Constitution s 179(1) stipulated that 'a local government shall be elected democratically', the writing appeared on the wall for the role of traditional authorities in local government. However, two aspects of the transitional system for local government offered practical solutions that served to maintain much of the status quo. Firstly, the LGTA provided for the possibility that traditional authorities could be recognized as local government bodies.[5] Secondly, Interim Constitution s 182 afforded traditional leaders the right to be ex officio members of the municipal council in their area (with full voting rights).[6]

The Final Constitution limited the official role of traditional authorities by providing that municipal councils be elected and by requiring the establishment of democratic local government for all parts of South Africa.[7] However, the delay associated with many of the Final Constitution's provisions on local government postponed, temporarily, the traditional authorities' fate. The provision in FC Chapter 12 that national legislation may provide a role for traditional leadership as an institution at local level on matters affecting local communities did little to clarify the status of traditional authorities.[8]

The demarcation of 'wall-to-wall' municipalities in 2000, pursuant to the instruction in the Constitution, did away with the recognition of traditional authorities as local government bodies. The simultaneous coming into operation of the Structures Act closed the chapter on the voting rights of traditional leaders by reducing the role of traditional authorities in municipal councils to an advisory capacity.

[1] See Bekink (supra) at 195-211.

[2] After the writing of this chapter, the Constitutional Court considered the role of traditional leaders in Shilubona & Others v Nwamitwa [2008] ZACC 9 (4 June 2008).

[3] Act 209 of 1993.

[4] See Tom Bennet & Christina Murray 'Traditional Leadership' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 26-39.

[5] LGTA s 1(2).

[6] See Bennet & Murray (supra) at 26-35 fn 4.

[7] Ibid at 26-36.

[8] FC s 212(1).

Traditional leaders, identified by the MEC for local government,[1] may participate in the proceedings of the municipal council in the municipal area where they 'traditionally observe a system of customary law'.[2] That said, they possess no right to vote. In addition, before a municipal council takes a decision affecting the area of a traditional authority, it must give the relevant traditional leader an opportunity to express a view on the matter.[3] This right exists independently of the rights of selected traditional leaders to participate in the council.

22.3 Municipal Powers and Functions

(a) Introduction

The Final Constitution repositions local government in the intergovernmental arena. It does so by not only introducing local government as one of the three 'spheres' of government but also by investing local government with constitutionally protected powers.

Before the constitutional scheme for these powers is examined, it is necessary to consider the judgment of the Constitutional Court in Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others.[4] Even though the matter was decided in terms of the Interim Constitution[5], the judgment is important because of the statement made by the Constitutional Court about the status of local government in the post-1994 constitutional framework.

The parties in the conflict were the insurance company Fedsure and the four metropolitan substructures and the metropolitan council of Johannesburg. Fedsure agitated against revenue raising measures imposed by one of Johannesburg's substructures. It argued, amongst other things, that the municipality's decisions were ultra vires.[6] Alternatively, Fedsure argued, the budgets of two of the four substructures of the metropolitan area had been approved in an irregular manner. On appeal, the Constitutional Court had to determine whether or not the above resolutions constituted 'administrative action' and were therefore subject to IC s 24 — the right to just administrative action. The relevant municipal councils contended that the resolutions constituted legislative rather than administrative action, and accordingly were not subject to IC s 24.

The Court agreed with the councils and held that the power of a municipal council to set taxes or rates or make an appropriation out of public funds 'is a

[1] See Bennet & Murray (supra) at 26-37 (The authors seem to suggest that the local House of Traditional Leaders has the power to identify the traditional leader eligible for participation. We would argue that the Act places that authority with the MEC for local government with an advisory role for the local House.)

[2] Structures Act s 81(1).

[3] Structures Act s 81(3).

[4] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure').

[5] At the time when the proceedings were instituted, the Interim Constitution was in force.

[6] Jonathan Klaaren 'Redlight, Greenlight: Fedsure Life Assurance v Greater Johannesburg Metropolitan Council; Premier, Mpumalanga v Executive Committee, Association of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal' (1999) 15 SAJHR 200, 211.

power peculiar to elected legislative bodies'.[1] This finding prompted the Court to examine the status of municipal legislation. Prior to 1994, the principle of parliamentary sovereignty rendered legislation duly enacted by Parliament immune from any form of judicial review. 'Subordinate legislation', however, was subject to judicial review. In terms of such review, a court would establish whether the subordinate legislature had exceeded its powers or whether it had exercised them 'in a manner inconsistent with the limitations ordinarily attaching to the delegation of legislative power'.[2] Municipal legislative powers were delegated powers, and by-laws were subject to judicial review on the basis of reasonableness and the rules of natural justice. Moreover, they were treated as if they were executive acts.[3]

The Interim Constitution did away with the supremacy of Parliament. Parliament's legislation and every exercise of public power is now subject to constitutional control. The Interim Constitution further recognized and made provision for three levels of government. Thus, as the Fedsure Court stated, the constitutional status of a municipality is materially different from what it was when Parliament was supreme. The Fedsure Court made it clear that 'local government is no longer a public body exercising delegated powers. Its council is a deliberative legislative assembly with legislative and executive powers recognized in the Constitution itself'.[4] Thus, the Court concluded that the enactment of legislation by an elected local council acting in accordance with the Constitution is a legislative and not an administrative act, and is therefore not subject to challenge by 'every person' affected by it on the grounds of administrative justice.[5]

In sum, the Court made two things clear.[6] Firstly, the institution of local government as a sphere of government and the powers of municipalities are now recognized and protected by the Final Constitution. Secondly, the exercise of municipal legislative power is no longer a delegated function subject to administrative review, but a political process that represents the will of the municipal residents.

(b) FC section 151(3)

(i) 'Right to govern'

A municipality has the right to govern. Two observations can be made with regard to this phrase. Firstly, the Final Constitution does not employ a 'rights

[1] Fedsure (supra) at paras 44–46.
[2] Ibid at para 29.
[3] 'The rules of administrative justice are of cardinal importance in matters affecting local government. These are the rules which determine the validity of both the legislative and the executive acts of local bodies'. Gretchen Carpenter Introduction to South African Constitutional Law (1998) 433 (emphasis added).
[4] Fedsure (supra) at para 26.
[5] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) at 5-10ff.
[6] Ibid at 5-11.

terminology' with reference to national or provincial government authority but uses the word 'right' in FC s 151(3) and (4). The Final Constitution thus emphasizes the existence of a municipal entitlement to govern that can be legitimately claimed and defended in terms of the Final Constitution. Secondly, the use of the verb 'govern', which again does not appear elsewhere in the Constitution, connotes a regulatory and policy making role. The two most appropriate dictionary meanings given to the word 'govern' are 'to conduct the policy and affairs' and to 'constitute a rule, standard, or principle'.[1] Both suggest that a municipality's right to govern is more than the right to implement or to administer laws.

The Final Constitution gives further content to a municipality's right to govern by presenting three instruments that a municipality may employ. Firstly, FC s 156(1) provides that a municipality has 'executive authority', which, in the case of a municipality can be defined as the authority to implement national, provincial and municipal laws. Secondly, the same provision affords municipalities 'the right to administer', which connotes the daily running and management through planning and decision-making of a particular public service or matter. Finally, FC s 156(2) complements the executive authority and the administrative authority with the authority to 'make and administer by-laws'. In somewhat circular reasoning, the Final Constitution affords the municipality the authority to administer by-laws for the effective administration of the matter which it may administer. The emphasis on administration in FC s 156(2) is sometimes interpreted as an indication that the legislative role of municipalities is subservient to its administrative role.[2] However, in Fedsure, the Constitutional Court made it clear that municipal councils are deliberative legislative assemblies with legislative powers that are guaranteed in the Final Constitution. The linking of municipal legislative powers to the administration of various matters does not limit local government's legislative power.[3] The phrase 'matters which the municipality may administer' is aimed at delineating the functional scope of municipal legislative authority rather than inserting an inherent qualification into a municipality's power to legislate within that functional scope. In addition, an inferior legislative role for municipalities cannot be reconciled with FC s 43. This provision vests the Republic's legislative authority in Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils. In doing so, it does not treat a municipal council differently from its provincial or national counterparts.

The Final Constitution contains a number of provisions that relate to the 'manner and form' of municipal law making. As explained earlier, the first text

[1] South African Concise Oxford Dictionary (2002).

[2] See Christina Murray 'The Constitutional Context of Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa' in Norman Levy & Chris Tapscott (ed) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 66, 71. See also Bernard Bekink Principles of South African Local Government Law (2006) 216 and 229 (Bekink even goes so far as argue that 'the authority to exercise legislative authority follows from the authority to exercise executive authority'.)

[3] See further Jaap de Visser Developmental Local Government — A Case Study of South Africa (2005) 114.

that was submitted for certification to the Constitutional Court did not comply with CP X.[1] CP X demanded that '[f]ormal legislative procedures shall be adhered to by legislative organs at all levels of government'. In the Second Certification Judgment, the Court was satisfied that the amended text met the demands of CP X.[2] The Final Constitution demands due process during the law making process by, firstly, providing that, before the adoption of a by-law, members of the Council must be given reasonable notice.[3] A municipality's internal rules should give precise content to the term 'reasonable notice'. Bekink contends that national legislation should prescribe a minimum notice period.[4] However, we suggest that this falls within municipal autonomy. Municipalities have the discretion to determine a notice period, provided that the period satisfies the reasonableness requirement of FC s 160 (4) in the Final Constitution. This requirement governs both the time period for councillors to familiarize themselves with the draft before the relevant council meeting and the manner in which councillors are given access to the draft by-law. In addition, the Final Constitution places a high premium on transparency and consultation before and after the adoption of a by-law. A proposed by-law must be published for public comment[5] and, once it is in force, it must be accessible to the public.[6] A by-law may be enforced only after it has been published in the official gazette of the relevant province.[7] The provincial authorities that manage a provincial gazette must publish a municipal by-law upon request by the municipality.[8]

(ii) 'On its own initiative'

When the Final Constitution provides, in FC s 151(3), that a municipality may govern 'on its own initiative', it marks the end of the era when municipalities were the implementers of national and provincial legislation and had no policy making authority of their own. Under the Final Constitution, municipalities do not have to await legislative or executive instruction before using their legislative, executive and administrative authority.

When Bekink contends that 'the detailed powers and functions of local governments have to be determined by laws of a competent authority', he assumes

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 301.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 73-82.

[3] FC s 160(4).

[4] Bekink (supra) at 231. The author seems to contradict himself when he suggests that municipal rules and orders should address issues such as 'reasonable notice'. Ibid at 232.

[5] FC s 160(4).

[6] FC s 162(3).

[7] FC s 162(1).

[8] FC s 162(2).

that such detail in statutory law is required before a municipality may exercise any of its original powers. This assumption is not correct: it constricts a municipality in its right to exercise powers 'on its own initiative'. This view is supported by the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the meaning of 'original powers'. In Robertson, for example, the Constitutional Court made it clear that the original power to levy rates is not dependent on enabling national legislation.[1]

Original powers are not boundless. A municipality must exercise its legislative, executive and administrative authority within the parameters set by national and/or provincial law. An important consequence of the constitutional encouragement to municipalities to govern on their own initiative is that, should there be no national or provincial law on an original local government matter, there is no limit on the municipality's scope to determine the content of its legislative, executive or administrative decisions. The only limits are those limits imposed by the Final Constitution itself. That said, limits on municipal powers may still be imposed after the exercise of original municipal powers by national legislation and/or provincial legislation.

(iii) 'Local government affairs of its community'

A municipality's right to govern, using its own initiative and employing the governance instruments available to it, extends to the 'local government affairs of its community'. It could be argued that this phrase in FC s 151(3) suggests that municipalities possess plenary powers over local government affairs. On such a reading, a municipality would then have authority over any matter that concerns the local affairs of its community. The granting of autonomous plenary powers to local government in the Final Constitution is not out of step with international practice. The Constitution of the Netherlands, for example, grants municipalities the authority 'to regulate and administer their domestic affairs'.[2] This phrase refers to local matters that have not attracted any provincial or national regulation.[3] However, we would contend that FC s 151(3) does not contain a separate description of the functional scope of municipal powers. Such a residual or plenary power interpretation would not accord with the structure of the Final Constitution. The Final Constitution allocates plenary, residual powers to the national government alone. It limits provincial and municipal authority to matters listed in schedules 4 and 5. The phrase 'local government affairs of its community' must, therefore, be read to refer to the functional scope of municipal authority as defined in the relevant sections of the Final Constitution.

[1] City of Cape Town v Robertson 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC)('Robertson') at para 60. See § 22.5*(c)*(i) infra.

[2] Constitution of the Kingdom of the Netherlands art 124(1) translated in Leonard Besselink Kingdom of the Netherlands Charter and Constitution (2004).

[3] E Brederveld Gemeenterecht (7th Edition, 2005) 9.

FC s 156(1) defines the functional scope of municipal authority by linking the governance instruments (i.e., legislative, executive and administrative authority) to the local government matters listed in schedule 4B and 5B of the Final Constitution and any other matter assigned to a municipality by national or provincial legislation. These provisions make clear the distinction and the difference between original powers and assigned powers. The Constitutional Court has stated that: '[A municipality's] power may derive from the Constitution or from legislation of a competent authority or from its own laws'.[1] The Final Constitution allocates a further set of original powers in the form of fiscal authority. A municipality's right to impose rates on property and surcharges on fees for services rendered is constitutionally guaranteed.[2] This provides local government with a firm base for generating revenue from property rates and charges on user fees (especially electricity). National legislation can authorize local government to impose other taxes, levies and duties.[3] The obvious significance of the notion of original powers lies in the fact that these powers of local government cannot be removed or amended by national or provincial legislation. They cannot be changed other than by an amendment to the Final Constitution itself. Moseneke J recognizes the import of these original constitutional powers for local government's institutional integrity when he writes:

> A municipality under the Constitution is not a mere creature of statute otherwise moribund save if imbued with power by provincial or national legislation. A municipality enjoys 'original' and constitutionally entrenched powers, functions, rights and duties that may be qualified or constrained by law and only to the extent that the Constitution permits.[4]

Whereas the Final Constitution protects these original local government powers, it does not define them. There is considerable overlap between the functional areas, mentioned in schedules 4B and 5B and the functional areas mentioned in schedules 4A and 5A. Often, the Final Constitution distinguishes a local government competency from a national and/or provincial competency by the mere addition of the word 'municipal' — schedule 4A's 'health services' and schedule 4B's 'municipal health services' being a case in point. Another phenomenon is the appearance of national and/or provincial competencies that are inclusive of a local government competency. For example, schedule 4A's 'pollution control' is inclusive of schedule 4B's 'air pollution'. The Final Constitution itself does not offer clear solutions for the uncertainty created by these overlapping powers.[5]

[1] Robertson (supra) at para 60.
[2] FC s 229(1). See also Robertson (supra) at para 61.
[3] FC s 229(1)(b).
[4] Robertson (supra) at para 60.
[5] Cf Bekink (supra) at 216 (Bekink suggests that the Constitution provides 'an exact indication of such powers and functions'. He appears to underestimate the difficulties surrounding the interpretation of the Schedules.) For a discussion of the type of solutions for overlap between competencies, see Nico Steytler & Yonatan Fessha 'Defining Provincial and Local Government Powers and Functions' (2007) 124 SALJ 320.

FC s 156(5) affords local government 'incidental' powers: 'A municipality has the right to exercise any power concerning a matter reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective performance of its functions'.[1] This section should not be interpreted in a narrow or literal sense.[2] Instead, local government's developmental mandate should be broadly construed.[3]

The incidental power doctrine was applied in Ex parte Western Cape Provincial Government and Others: In re: DVB Behuising (Pty) Limited v North West Provincial Government and Another[4] — albeit in respect of provincial powers. In DVB Behuising, the Constitutional Court concluded that certain tenure and deeds registration provisions in a provincial proclamation, although strictly falling within a national competence, were within the competence of the provincial government. It arrived at this conclusion on the basis of the fact that these provisions were 'inextricably linked to the other provisions of the Proclamation and were foundational to' the planning, regulation and control of settlements, which the Court had already held to be of provincial competence. [5]

The incidental powers may include legislative powers.[6] The only requirement would be that the by-law is promulgated in terms of FC s 156(5) and is therefore 'reasonably necessary for, or incidental to the effective performance of its functions'. Some incidental matters, when subject to a literal interpretation, fall outside local government's core competencies. They remain, however, critical to the success of the administration of a particular matter. For example, while the Final Constitution does not explicitly grant local government criminal jurisdiction, the ability to impose penalties for transgressing a by-law may be enforced by the courts. Few would argue that this power is not 'incidental to the effective performance' of a local government function.[7] FC s 156(5) is not intended to increase the number of functional areas upon which local government can legislate.[8] It serves rather as an instruction to the courts to adopt a purposive approach to interpreting local government powers.

The interpretation of FC s 156(5) should be informed by two principles. Firstly, the purposive interpretation should clearly be linked to local government's developmental mandate. When plumbing the depths and limits of a municipal power, the constitutional promise of a local government that is equipped to initiate and to facilitate development should always be on the horizon. Secondly, FC s 156(5) should not be used to increase the functional ambit of local government's powers but rather to enhance the efficacy of administering an existing functional area.

[1] See also Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 s 8(2).
[2] Victoria Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 15-20.
[3] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-6ff.
[4] 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('DVB Behuising').
[5] Ibid at para 96. See also Bronstein (supra) at 15–14.
[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-7 ff.
[7] See, for example, Bekink (supra) at 235 fn 105.
[8] See, generally, Jaap de Visser Developmental Local Government — A Case Study of South Africa (2005).

The authority of a municipality to establish and to direct municipal administration is an area that may be regarded as incidental to the performance of its functions. It is nevertheless afforded specific attention in the Final Constitution. The Final Constitution stipulates that a municipal council makes decisions concerning the exercise of all the powers and functions of the municipality.[1] In the same vein, it provides that the municipal council may employ the personnel it needs for the effective performance of its functions.[2] The municipality's autonomous authority over personnel affairs sets it apart from provincial government. Both national and provincial administrations are part of a single public service 'which must function, and be structured, in terms of national legislation'.[3] This requirement embraces the terms and conditions of employment in the public service. Even though provincial governments are responsible for the recruitment, appointment, promotion, transfer and dismissal of members of the public service in their administrations, such actions must occur within a uniform national framework.[4] This unique aspect of municipal autonomy is unlikely to be long-lived. At the time of writing, legislative amendments designed to realize a single public service, including local government, are on the cards.

(iv) 'Subject to national and provincial legislation'[5]

FC s 151(3) also makes it clear that municipal authority is not boundless; the right to govern is subject to national and provincial legislation. With respect to assigned powers, it follows from the nature of the power that the legislative or executive act of assignment may place parameters on the exercise of municipal authority. These parameters determine the scope of the assigned authority. With respect to local government's original powers, it is important to note that these powers are not only constrained by the Final Constitution itself (e.g. by the Bill of Rights) but may also be constrained by national government and the provincial governments. As noted above, local government has authority over schedule 4B and 5B matters. However, the Final Constitution does not allocate the matters in schedule 4B and 5B exclusively to local government. National government and provincial government may still regulate those matters.[6] The local government matters listed in schedule 4B are part of the concurrent provincial and national legislative competence 'to the extent set out in section 155(6)(a) and (7)'.[7] Similarly, the local government matters listed in schedule 5B are part of the exclusive provincial competence 'to the extent set out for provinces in section 155(6)(a) and (7)'.[8]

[1] FC s 160(1)(a).
[2] FC 160(1)(d).
[3] FC s 197(1).
[4] FC s 197(4).
[5] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 5-1.4 and 3.3.
[6] See ibid at 5-16ff.
[7] FC schedule 4.
[8] FC schedule 5.

Furthermore, national government and provincial governments have the authority to ensure that municipalities adequately perform in respect of these matters.[1] FC s 156(3) provides that, subject to FC s 151(4), a by-law that conflicts with national or provincial legislation is invalid.[2] Thus 'interference' by national government and provincial government in terms of schedule 4B and 5B matters is not only constitutionally permitted — it is required by their oversight responsibilities. In the words of the Constitutional Court:

> The powers and functions of municipalities are set out in section 156 but it is clear from sections 155(7) and 151(3) that these powers are subject to supervision by national and provincial governments, and that national and provincial legislation has precedence over municipal legislation. The powers of municipalities must, however, be respected by the national and provincial governments which may not use their powers to 'compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions'.[3]

(v) 'As provided for in the Constitution'

When FC s 151(3) subjects local government authority to national legislation and provincial legislation, it immediately continues by emphasising that these limits on local government authority must be 'provided for in the Constitution'. A similar approach is followed in FC s 156(3). FC s 156(3) establishes precedence of national legislation and provincial legislation over municipal legislation, provided that this legislation, in turn, does not contradict FC s 151(4). It is argued that the phrase 'as provided for in the Constitution' in FC s 151(3) refers to the constitutional basis and reach of national and provincial authority over local government.[4] The Final Constitution provides a general principle for determining the reach (and overreach) of national authority and provincial authority by providing that the national government and provincial governments 'may not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its power or perform its functions.'

This principle applies to both assigned and original powers. The reach of national or provincial authority over assigned powers may be contained in the legislative or executive act of assignment. However, the authority of the national or provincial government to set parameters on an assigned power is not unfettered. For example, the assignment of a power without ensuring the necessary resources would fall foul of FC s 151(4). Similarly, the assignment of a power that is made subject to unduly restrictive or burdensome criteria, conditions or monitoring requirements would constitute a breach of FC s 151(4).

[1] White Paper on Local Government (1998) 30.

[2] FC s 156(3).

[3] Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 29.

[4] This combination is not, as Bekink argues, a contradictio in terminis. There is no contradiction in the constitutional imposition of limits on how far national and/or provincial governments may go in circumscribing local government powers. Bekink (supra) at 220.

The reach of national or provincial authority over original powers requires careful examination and is considered in detail below.[1] This discussion of the validity of provincial and national legislation concerning original local government power differs from the debate on the concurrency of powers between provincial and national spheres on schedule 4A matters.[2] The concurrency of powers between provincial and national spheres means that both spheres share the same legislative competency. The override provisions found in FC ss 146, 148-150 determine which law prevails in a case of conflict. National and provincial authority over schedules 4B and 5B is not held concurrently with local government. National government and provincial governments are afforded certain legislative powers over local government. But these powers are themselves constrained,[3] as will be explained below. These powers and the concommittant constraints explain why Gideon Pimstone remarks that local government powers 'cannot in truth be termed concurrent with other spheres'.[4]

At times, national and provincial law-makers interpret their supervisory powers to mean that their legislation always prevails over municipal law. They err in this regard. For example, s 29(1) of the National Building Regulations and Building Standards Act[5] provides that 'the provisions of any law applicable to any local authority are hereby repealed in so far as they confer a power to make building regulations or by-laws regarding any matter provided for in this Act'. The provision aimed at 'sweeping up' any authority over building regulations that had been conferred on local government by any law in order to relocate that authority within national government. It is very hard to reconcile this intention with the Final Constitution's express grant of original legislative and executive authority to local government over 'Building Regulations' in schedule 4B. The Final Constitution does not give blanket regulatory power concerning schedule 4B and 5B matters to national and provincial government. National legislation or provincial legislation on local government matters must be enacted within, and are limited by, their respective FC Chapter 7 competencies.[6]

(vi) National and provincial powers over original local government matters

FC s 151(3) both sanctions and limits the national and provincial constraints on original local government matters. What follows is an analysis of the provisions in [1] See § 22.3.6 (vi) infra.

[2] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-17.

[3] See Basson & Others v City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality & Others and Eskom Pension and Provident Fund v City Of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2005 JDR 1273 (T) at paras 40–42. The Development Facilitation Act 67 of 1995 was challenged as a violation of local government's power over 'municipal planning' (a schedule 4B competency). The Court rejected the argument with, amongst others, an interpretation that incorrectly assumes that local government powers are held concurrently with other spheres of government.

[4] Pimstone (supra) at 5A-28.

[5] 103 of 1977.

[6] See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-17.

the Final Constitution that inform these constraints. In our analysis, the location of a matter in either schedule 4B or schedule 5B of the Final Constitution has important consequences for the extent to which national or provincial governments can regulate that particular matter.

National government derives law-making powers over local government matters from two sources, namely FC ss 155(7)[1] and 44(1)(a)(ii). FC s 155(7) affords national government the power to 'regulate' the exercise by municipalities of their executive authority. This power is circumscribed by the qualification that it may be used to 'see to the effective performance by municipalities of their functions in terms of schedule 4 and 5' and by the use of the term 'regulating'. The legislative authority to regulate schedule 4B and 5B matters refers to the power of Parliament and provincial legislatures to enact legislation. The executive authority to regulate schedule 4B and 5B matters refers to the power of national and provincial executives to enact subordinate legislation. The executive authority to regulate schedule 4B and 5B matters should not be read so as to enable national executives and provincial executives to enact subordinate legislation without any empowering provisions in a national law or provincial law. The term 'regulating' in the context of FC s 155(7) has been held by the Constitutional Court to connote 'a broad managing or controlling rather than direct authorization function'.[2] The fact that it may be used only to see to the effective performance of functions reinforces this qualification. Thus, in terms of FC s 155(7), the powers of national government and provincial government are not meant to extend to the detail of schedule 4B matters, but rather envisage a framework within which local government is to exercise these powers. In other words, the regulatory power enables national government and provincial government to set essential national standards, minimum requirements, monitoring procedures, etc.[3]

National government may also legislate on schedule 4B matters on the basis of FC s 44(1)(a)(ii). The fact that there is no limitation in this provision could be construed as meaning that the national government possesses a broad legislative power that encompasses every aspect of the schedule's matters. However, the introduction to schedule 4B stipulates that the schedule contains local government matters that are of concurrent national and provincial legislative competence 'to the extent set out in section 155(6)(a) and (7)'. This raises two questions: does this qualification also apply to Parliament's legislative power in terms of s FC s 44(1)? Does FC s 155(7) qualify FC s 44(1) or is FC s 44(1) limited only by the general principles of FC ss 151(4) and 41*(g)*?

One might, on the text also, be inclined to argue that FC s 155(7) does not qualify FC s 44(1). Schedule 4B limits the competence of national government to FC s 155(7). However, FC s 155(7) in turn makes its application 'subject to section 44'. FC s 44 forms the bedrock of national law-making and it mentions the power of Parliament to legislate on schedule 4B immediately after the power to amend the Final Constitution itself. The argument that FC s 155(7) qualifies FC s 44(1) would not be consistent with the critical position FC s 44 occupies in the Final Constitution.

[1] See the heading of FC sch 4B.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) ('First Certification Judgment') at para 377.

[3] Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-21.

However, in Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v President of the RSA & Others,[1] the Constitutional Court made a remark that implies that Parliament's powers over schedule 4B are limited. The Court stated that '[l]ocal governments have legislative and executive authority in respect of certain matters but national and provincial legislatures both have competences (. . .) for overseeing its functioning.'[2] The use of the term overseeing is important — as is the reference to FC s 155(7) in the footnote. It would appear that the Court views national government's role in schedule 4B matters as regulatory rather than determinative and that the source for this limitation is FC s 155(7). In Langeberg, the Constitutional Court confirmed this view:

> [N]ational legislative authority includes the power to make laws for the country concerning all matters except the functional areas described in Part 2 (sic) of Schedule 4 and Part 2 (sic) of Schedule 5. In these areas, Parliament has limited legislative authority.[3]

These hints as to Constitutional Court's position can be supplemented by an argument based on the mandate of developmental local government. This mandate guides the interpretation of local government powers in a manner that recognizes the need for sufficient municipal discretion in regulating these matters while simultaneously maintaining the need for national oversight and regulation. Therefore, the answer to the question of whether or not FC s 155(7) qualifies FC s 44(1)(a)(ii) must be that it does. In sum, national government's legislative power concerning schedule 4B matters does not extend to the detail of schedule 4B matters. Rather, it is limited to the setting of a legal framework, including minimum standards and monitoring requirements.[4]

Not all national legislation on schedule 4B matters meets this standard. Provisions that offend the allocation of powers and functions set forth in the Final Constitution can, for example, be found in statutes that predate the Final Constitution. Section 29(8)(a) of the National Building Regulations Act is a case in point.[5] It provides that '[a] local authority which intends to make any regulation or by-law which relates to the erection of a building, shall prior to the promulgation thereof submit a draft of the regulation or by-law in writing and by registered post to the Minister for approval.' Section 29(8)(b) of the Act makes the consequences of non-approval clear by providing that '[a] regulation or by-law referred to in paragraph (a) which is promulgated without the Minister previously having approved of it shall, notwithstanding the fact that the promulgation is effected in accordance with all other legislative provisions relating to the making and promulgation of the regulation or by-law, be void'.

[1] 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 51 (emphasis added).
[3] Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 25 (emphasis added).
[4] See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-22ff.
[5] Act 103 of 1977.

In a recent decision, the Supreme Court of Appeal was asked to assess the requirement in the Cape Ordinance 20 of 1974 that a municipality obtain the Premier's approval for the imposition of property rates.[1] The imposition of property rates is another original competency of local government: it is conferred on municipalities in FC s 229 but subject to national regulation. The CDA Boerdery Court concluded that the requirement of prior approval did not survive the radical change to local governments powers brought about by the Final Constitution. The CDA Boerdery Court held that said provisions were 'impliedly repealed'. The Court made it clear that its judgment does not render unconstitutional all provisions that require provincial approval of municipal legislative acts. Its judgment 'does not pre-judge the different question whether the enactment of such a requirement within the new constitutional framework would be constitutionally valid'.[2] Therefore, even if it were assumed that a requirement of national approval would receive the same treatment as a requirement of provincial approval, the judgment does not provide finality on the question as to whether section 29(8) of the National Building Regulations is constitutional. However, the judgment is instructive, particularly in light of the pre-constitutional rationale and spirit of the National Building Regulations Act described above. The CDA Boerdery Court reached its conclusion by comparing the local government context that prevailed during the enactment of the approval requirement with the vastly different local government context that prevails now. With regard to the now impugned role for the Premier in the Cape Ordinance, the Court stated that > the Administrator's role in approving or disapproving rates must be understood in that specific pre-constitutional setting. . . . The approval requirement was a specific product of the old-order constitutional scheme, tailored to its hierarchy and matched to the Administrator's supervisory control over municipalities and his executive role in relation to them.[3]

The requirement of prior approval of building regulations in terms of the National Building Regulations Act must be interpreted, and set off against the new constitutional dispensation for local government, in much the same way. It is a product of the pre-constitutional era. It must be modified or tailored to meet the new local government dispensation. In terms of this new dispensation, the operation of FC s 156(3) would render a by-law on building regulations that has not been approved invalid unless the National Building Regulations Act violates FC s 151(4). The National Building Regulations Act would appear to offend FC s 151(4). To require the national approval of or concurrence with a municipal by-law goes much further than regulation. National government is permitted by the Final Constitution to regulate the municipal exercise of its functions related to building regulations with a view to seeing to the effective performance of it. As outlined above, the Constitutional Court has described this power as 'a broad managing or controlling rather than direct authorisation function'. It is hard to see the requirement of prior approval of all municipal by-laws on a particular original competency as anything other than direct authorization. It replaces a municipal decision with a national decision. That arrangement is inconsistent with the express wording of the Final Constitution and its scheme of co-operative government.

[1] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA).
[2] Ibid at para 41.
[3] Ibid at paras 34-35.

The sources of provincial power to legislate on schedule 4B and 5B matters can be found in two provisions: FC ss 155(6)(a) and 155(7).[1] In terms of FC s 155(7), provincial government has a regulatory power. The same considerations that apply to national government's powers under FC s 155(7) apply here: provincial legislation on schedule 4B and 5B matters must be limited to framework legislation that does not extend to the detail of these local government matters. Section 26 of the KwaZulu-Natal Road Traffic Act[2] is an example of provincial legislation that exceeds the limits set by section 155(7). It states that local authorities can only make by-laws 'with the concurrence of the MEC for Transport'. For the same reasons as outlined above with regard to the National Building Regulations Act, this provision is unconstitutional. Similarly, any provision whereby automatic provincial 'overrides' are built into the regulatory framework, or any provision that permits the provincial government to ignore municipal law, would go further than the Final Constitution currently permits.[3]

FC s 155(6)(a) states that provincial government has a duty to monitor and support local government in its jurisdiction. This responsibility can entail legislative measures that are aimed at either establishing a monitoring framework or influencing the manner in which local government administers such matters. The Constitutional Court has held that:

> the legislative and executive powers to support [local government] are . . . not insubstantial. Such powers can be employed by provincial governments to strengthen existing [local government] structures, powers and functions and to prevent a decline or degeneration of such structures, powers and functions.[4]

The First Certification Judgment Court held further that this power is to be understood in conjunction with the legislative and executive role granted to provincial government in FC ss 155(6)(b) and 155(7). In terms of these sections, the provinces must assert legislative and executive power in order to promote the development of local government's capacity to perform its functions and to manage its affairs. They may do so by regulating municipal executive authority, thus ensuring the municipalities' effective performance of their functions in respect of listed local government matters:

[1] See the heading of FC sch 4B.
[2] Act 7 of 1997.
[3] See, for example, Jaap de Visser 'Demarcating Provincial and Local Powers regarding Liquor Retail' (2004) 19(2) SA Public Law 376.
[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 371.

> Taken together, these competences are considerable and facilitate a measure of provincial government control over the manner in which municipalities administer those matters in part B of [Schedules] 4 and 5. This control is not purely administrative. It could encompass control over municipal legislation to the extent that such legislation impacts on the manner of administering local government matters.[1]

The word 'monitor' (used in FC s 155(6)) was not interpreted by the Court as bestowing additional or residual powers of provincial intrusion on the domain of local government. 'Monitor' should be read as the power to measure or test, at intervals, its compliance with national and provincial legislative directives or with the Constitution itself.

Schedule 5 matters are of 'exclusive provincial legislative competence'. The heading of schedule 5B bears testimony to this when it includes local government matters 'to the extent set out for provinces in section 155(6)(a) and (7)'.[2] This exclusivity is, however, subject to FC s 44(2). FC s 44(2) enables national government to makes laws on schedule 5B matters when it is necessary for one of the grounds mentioned in FC s 44(2).

The next question is whether the Final Constitution prevents Parliament from extending its legislative efforts concerning schedule 5B to the 'details' of these local government matters. There appears to be no textual indication in the Final Constitution that could justify this conclusion. The heading of schedule 5B is of no use because it does not envisage national legislation on schedule 5B. On a purposeful reading of FC s 44(2), it must be concluded that such constraints have not been built into the constitutional scheme for national laws on schedule 5B matters.[3] In view of the fact that FC s 44(2) affords Parliament the power of legislative intervention, it should be able to extend its legislation to the particular details as well. In summary: if national legislation on a Schedule 5B matter passes the test outlined in the FC s 44(2), it is valid with respect to all aspects of the functional area.[4]

The example of 'traffic and parking' may be instructive. 'Traffic and parking' are local government matters on account of their location in schedule 5B. The power to pass framework legislation for the municipal exercise of lawmaking on these matters is reserved for provinces. However, Parliament can intervene if necessary for one of the reasons mentioned in FC s 44(2). The National Road Traffic Amendment Act enables, through s 80A(1)(c), municipalities to make by-laws, with the concurrence of the Premier of the relevant province, on the appointment and licensing of parking attendants.[5] Local government's lawmaking

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 371. See also Pimstone (supra) at 5A-30.

[2] Emphasis added.

[3] This argument runs counter to what was previously argued by one of the authors. See Jaap de Visser 'Local Government Powers' (2002) 17 SA Public Law 232.

[4] See Nico Steytler & Jaap De Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 5-25.

[5] Act 21 of 1999. Section 80A(1)(c) of the National Road Traffic Amendment Act enabales municipalites to undue by-laws.

power concerning parking attendants is thus made subject to the concurrence of the Premier. The constitutionality of this requirement must be gauged by its necessity for and satisfaction of one of the grounds listed in FC s 44(2) (because, as outlined earlier, national legislation on Schedule 5B in terms of FC s 44(2) can extend to the detail of local government matters). It would defy common sense to maintain that the licensing of parking attendants requires national intervention in order to achieve national security or economic unity, to maintain national standards or to establish minimum standards. On the contrary, local government's developmental mandate provides a strong argument for the issue of parking attendants to be left to the municipality's discretion without requiring provincial approval. The maximization of the developmental impact of such policies whilst ensuring order and safety on municipal roads requires localized solutions. Thus, sound reasons exist to entrust municipalities with the authority to arrive at innovative approaches that are tailored to local circumstances. Section 80A(1)(c) of the National Road Traffic Amendment Act thus goes beyond what is constitutionally permitted.[1]

The limits imposed on national and provincial legislation in respect of the local government matters discussed above must be understood in light of the principle established in FC s 151(4). The protection of local government powers afforded by FC s 151(4) extends beyond the mere question as to whether or not authority to deal with a particular matter exists; it also deals with the manner in which the power is exercised.[2] This distinction is derived the Constitutional Court's holding in Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v President of the RSA.[3] The Constitutional Court emphasized that FC s 41(1)(g), which contains the same message, is concerned with the way power is exercised, not with whether or not a power exists. The competency requirement deals with the question of whether or not the national or provincial government has the power to make laws on schedule 4B or Schedule 5B matters. Once it has been determined that national or provincial authority indeed extends to the subject matter at hand, FC s 151(4) protects local government against the use of that authority in a way that unduly interferes with a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions.

If, for example, a provincial government enacts legislation containing a monitoring regime regarding the manner in which municipalities perform their function in relation to child care facilities (a schedule 4B matter), it is within the province's constitutional powers to do so. However, if this monitoring regime

[1] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-26.

[2] Bekink argues that FC s 151(4) represents the only protection for municipal law-making when he argues that it is 'the only protection given to municipalities regarding a total domination by national or provincial laws'. Bernard Bekink Principles of South African Local Government Law (2006) 220. The foregoing discussion on the limits to national and provincial law-making imposed by the headings to schedules 4B and 5B in conjunction with FC ss 155(6) and (7) point towards a broader protection than the one found by Bekink.

[3] Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v President of the RSA & Others 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC) at para 29.

is unduly burdensome — and compromises or impedes a municipality's ability to perform its functions — it falls foul of FC s 151(4)[1]

(c) Division of powers and functions within local government

The powers and functions discussed above are vested in local government as a sphere of government. Metropolitan municipalities have exclusive authority over these powers and functions.[2] However, the Final Constitution provides that a local municipality 'shares municipal executive and legislative authority in its area with a [district] municipality within whose area it falls'.[3] The Final Constitution requires that national legislation must make provision for an appropriate division of powers and functions between municipalities when an area has municipalities of both categories B and C.[4] The division does not have to be symmetrical; a division between one local municipality and a district municipality may differ from the division between another local municipality and the same district municipality. However, despite such differences, the legislation must take into account the need to provide municipal services in an equitable and sustainable manner.[5]

(d) Additional powers and functions[6]

The 'local government affairs of [a] community' embraces both original and assigned functions. That is, the Final Constitution envisages that additional powers and functions may be transferred to local government. Two modes of transferring powers and functions to local government need to be distinguished: namely assignment and delegation.[7] Assignment is the most important instrument for transferring additional functions to local government that national and provincial governments may employ. FC s 156(1)(b) provides that a municipality has authority over matters assigned to it by national or provincial legislation. Matters may be assigned to local government, in general, and individual municipalities, in particular. The legal regime for assignment is regulated in the Final Constitution and in the Municipal Systems Act.[8] Delegation is provided for in FC s 238*(a). FC s 238(a)* provides that an executive organ of state in any sphere of government may delegate a power or function to any other executive organ of state.

[1] Cf Bekink (supra) at 220. Bekink contends that FC s 151(4) is triggered in the context of conflicting laws 'when national or provincial legislation is mainly directed at or has the effect of compromising or impeding a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions'. To the extent that this interpretation underwrites the survival of legislation that compromises or impedes the authority and the autonomy municipalities, Bekinks reading cannot be supported.

[2] FC s 155(1)(a).

[3] FC s 155(1)(b) and (c).

[4] FC s 155(3)(c).

[5] FC s 155(4). Parliament has provided for this legislation in Chapter 5 of the Municipal Structures Act. See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at ch 5 para 4.

[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at ch 5 para 5.

[7] Contractual agreements, such as agency, may also be utilized as a means of transferring certain operational elements of a national or provincial function.

[8] Act 32 of 2000 ss 9 and 10.

An assigning agent may set the parameters for the exercise of the assigned authority in the legislative act of assignment. However, these parameters may not be set in a manner that contravenes FC s 151(4). Conditions such as prior approval of municipal decisions or the imposition of national or provincial overrides of municipal decisions are not in keeping with FC s 151(4) — they conflict directly with the intention in the Final Constitution to separate assignment from delegation. As Gideon Pimstone notes: 'Sight should not be lost of the significance of the word 'assign', which contemplates not a delegation of the power but a taking over'.[1] The assignment is intended to be a complete transfer of the function: and it entails the final decision-making power in individual matters. The instrument of assignment is unsuitable for a transfer of power that leaves the final say in individual matters with the national government or the provincial government.

In terms of FC ss 44(1)(a)(iii) and 104(1)(c), the national legislature or provincial legislatures can assign any of their legislative powers to specific municipal councils.[2] Parliament may assign any matter listed in schedule 4A, or any matter that falls within its residual competence. For example, Parliament could assign the power to regulate 'animal control' (a schedule 4A matter) to a municipality. This would give that municipality the right to regulate those matters within its area of jurisdiction. Provincial legislatures may assign any matters listed in schedules 4A or 5A.[3]

The question arises whether Parliament or a provincial legislature can assign powers and functions to local government in general. The abovementioned provisions refer to assignments to individual municipal councils. It would, however, be unduly rigid to hold that there is no constitutional basis for assignment of legislative powers to local government in general.[4] An Act of Parliament could assign a matter that falls outside schedules 4B or 5B to the entire local government sphere or to a category of municipalities. A provincial legislature can do the same and assign a matter to local governments in the province.[5]

For as long as the assigning Act is in force, a municipal council would possess the relevant legislative powers. The repeal of an assigning Act does not affect the validity of a municipal by-law that has already been passed.[6] A legislative power, whether original or assigned, is always discretionary. The municipality 'on the

[1] Pimstone (supra) at 5A-27.

[2] For Parliament, this power to assign excludes the power to amend the Final Constitution.

[3] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-40.

[4] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-40.

[5] See also 'Guidelines on Allocation of Additional Powers and Functions to Municipalities' GN 490, Government Gazette 29844 (26 April 2007)('Assignment and Delegation Guidelines') item 1. The item defines a 'legislative assignment' as an assignment in a national or provincial Act to local government in general or to a category of municipalities.

[6] Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 19, 19-14.

receiving end' of the assignment is therefore not compelled to legislate. The assignment Act may, of course, circumscribe the scope of the municipality's legislative power.[1]

FC ss 99 and 126 allow Cabinet members and provincial MECs to assign executive powers to specific municipal councils. The assignment must be consistent with the Act in terms of which the relevant power or function is exercised or performed.[2] It takes effect upon a proclamation by the President or the Premier.[3] This mode of assignment differs from the aforementioned assignments. Firstly, it concerns executive powers only. Secondly, it entails compulsion; the relevant sections speak of the assignment of a matter 'that is to be exercised'. Therefore, whereas the assignment of legislative power allocates discretionary powers, the assignment of executive power allocates a duty to undertake a particular action. FC ss 99 and 126 executive assignments must be concluded by means of an agreement with a specific municipality.[4]

The requirement of an agreement means that the national government or a provincial government cannot be compelled to assign the relevant powers and functions to a municipality. Similarly, without consensus, a municipality cannot be compelled to accept the assignment of such powers and functions.[5] The requirement of an agreement also means that the assignment is terminated when either of the parties withdraws from the agreement.[6]

The discretionary nature of the assignment of powers and functions by the executive is curtailed by FC s 156(4). FC s 156(4) is a manifestation of the principle of subsidiarity. Generally, the principle of subsidiarity requires that the exercise of public power takes place at a level as close as possible to the citizenry. National government and provincial governments must, in terms of FC s 156(4), assign the administration of a matter listed in schedules 4A or 5A to a municipal council if four conditions are met:

(a) The matter in question 'necessarily relates' to local government;
(b) the matter would most effectively be administered locally;
(c) the municipality has the capacity to administer it; and
(d) the municipal council agrees to the assignment.

The subsidiarity principle applies only to the functional areas of schedule 4A and schedule 5A. Residual matters that fall within the sole domain of national competency[7] are not the proper subject of the subsidiarity principle.[8]

[1] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-40.
[2] FC ss 99*(b)* and 126*(b)*.
[3] FC ss 99*(c)* and 126*(b)*.
[4] FC ss 99*(a)* and 126*(a)*. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-40 ff.
[5] See Assignment and Delegation Guidelines (supra) items 9(2), 10(3) and 11(2). See also Bekink (supra) at 218 n 16.
[6] See Assignment and Delegation Guidelines (supra) item 9(4).
[7] See FC s 44(1).
[8] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-41.

A number of questions arise surrounding the intersection of FC s 156(4) and the above modes of assignment. The difficulties in harmonising FC s 156(4) and the other provisions on assignment may be solved by viewing FC s 156(4) as a principle or standard, rather than the articulation of a specific set of procedures. Does FC s 156(4) permit, for example, the assignment of legislative power? The provision itself deals with the assignment of the 'administration' of a matter. It does not refer to the assignment of legislative powers. However, this appears to be of little consequence as FC s 156(2) states that a municipality can make by-laws for the effective administration of the matters which it has the right to administer. The right to make by-laws flows from the right to administer a matter assigned in terms of FC s 156(4). Others contend that the act of an 'agreement' through which power is transferred points towards a limitation of FC s 156(4) to executive powers. Yet again, FC s 156(4) is directed at national and provincial 'governments': governments are generally understood to include their legislatures. Is FC s 156(4) then a basis for assignment that exists in addition to the legal basis offered by FC ss 44, 99, 104 and 126? We suggest that it is not. It refers to the assignment, by agreement, of the administration of a schedule 4A or 5A matter to a specific municipality. All of these ingredients point towards the assignments that have their basis in FC ss 99 and 126. Again, FC s 156(4) is not an additional procedure or basis for assignment, but is rather a principle or a set of standards that sets out the circumstances under which assignment in terms of FC ss 99 or 126 becomes compulsory.

Another important question is whether, as a principle, FC s 156(4) is justiciable. In principle, the provision is, as any other provision in the Final Constitution, justiciable. However, the arguments we offer below point out that, due to the phraseology and nature of this provision, as well as its position within the intergovernmental context, the level of scrutiny applied by the courts may be so low as to make the provision unenforceable. Firstly, the fact that an assessment of effective governance is central to the application of the principle renders it less open to judicial interpretation.[1] The courts may be reluctant to be drawn into debates on the technical merits of locating a function at municipal level. Such reluctance turns on the technical nature of such issues such as the efficiencies generated by municipal performance of the function, intergovernmental fiscal ramifications of the transfer, economic imperatives such as spill-over effects and intergovernmental efficacy and capacity assessments of municipalities. Secondly, FC s 156(4) requires assignment 'by agreement'; the impact of this proviso on judicial enforceability is unclear. It is common for a court to order parties to return to the negotiating table and work towards a settlement. However, it is not possible for a court to determine and to impose upon the parties the content of an agreement. Judicial enforceability of FC s 156(4) suggests that after a court order requires 'assignment', it must be left up to the parties to formulate an agreement. Thirdly, whose obligation is it to assign schedule 4A matters?

[1] Dawid Van Wyk 'Subsidariteit as Waarde wat die Oop en Demokratiese Suid-Afrikaanse Gemeenskap ten Grondslag lê' in Gretchen Carpenter (ed) Suprema Lex: Opstelle oor die Grondwet aangebied aan Marinus Wiechers (1998) 257.

Schedule 4 matters are concurrent national and provincial matters. Both national and provincial executives thus have the authority to assign a schedule 4A matter to a municipality within their jurisdiction. Arguably, a municipal claim for assignment can be exercised against both national and provincial executives — but which one of the two must be compelled to do so under the operation of FC s 156(4)? For example, can a provincial government, when confronted with a legal challenge on the basis of FC s 156(4), escape liability by arguing that national government must assign the power in question? Fourthly, a calculated, programmatic approach to devolution that is managed through intergovernmental relations fits in better with a functional approach to the division of powers and functions adopted by the court. Thus far the jurisprudence condemns an automatic bias or a presumption in favour of any sphere of government.[1] This approach fits the dictates of our scheme of co-operative government — in which courts are always a last resort for the resolution of disputes — better than a 'rights-based' approach that enables courts to determine decidedly political issues. A rights-based approach creates the spectre of 'slapstick asymmetry'. FC s 156(4) would be used by individual municipalities in a manner that had functions and powers 'tumbling up and down'. It would leave — as FC Chapter 3 says it should not — courts in the unenviable task of mediating the endless intricacies of governance. The Constitutional Court has made it clear, in the context of national/provincial relations, that cooperative government, rather than 'competitive federalism' is the guiding principle.[2] A competition for competencies, refereed by the courts, does not accord with this trend in our jurisprudence. That said, as a guiding principle it should play a role in the adjudication of disputes over competencies if they do reach the courts. David Van Wyk, for example, argues that the Final Constitution leaves room for 'a competency bias in favour of the smaller sphere', especially where there is uncertainty about the interpretation of the scope of competencies.[3]

FC s 238*(a)* provides that an executive organ of state in any sphere of government may delegate a power or function to any other executive organ of state. The Final Constitution does not offer a definition of delegation. However, it is possible to highlight a number of features that distinguish delegation from assignment. Firstly, the fact that FC s 238 is located under the heading 'Other matters' in FC Chapter 14, which is the very last chapter of the Final Constitution and is entitled 'General Provisions' suggests that it is not meant to be a basis for devolution of powers across spheres. Any provision that intends to be the basis for fundamental alterations to a constitutional division of powers between spheres would have been given a more prominent location in an earlier chapter.[4] Secondly, assignments transfer the individual responsibility and accountability to the

[1] See Nico Steytler & Jaap De Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 5-18.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 287.

[3] See Van Wyk (supra) at 268.

[4] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-47.

municipality, and the municipality acts in its own name when it exercises powers or performs functions in terms of an assigned power.[1] Thirdly, the assignment of a function also transfers the financial risk to the municipality. The corollary is that the municipality attracts financial streams in terms of the annual appropriation of funds from national government to local government. If a function is delegated, then the risk and funding obligations remain with the delegating agency. Fourthly, after a function has been assigned, it is no longer possible to issue individual instructions. In contrast, a delegating agency can issue instructions at any given time after a function has been delegated.[2] It is clearly permissible for national government or a provincial government to ensure the success of an assignment through legislating a regulatory framework consisting of minimum norms and standards. This is, however, different from the issuing of individual instructions. After a function has been delegated, however, the delegating authority remains competent to issue individual instructions. Finally, the assigning agency can no longer perform the function — barring the event of intervention in terms of FC s 139. If the assigning agency were still able to perform the function, then it would subvert the transferring of authority. It would in essence mean that individual instructions can be given. Once a function has been assigned, the assigning agency is responsible only to the extent that it has regulatory and supervisory powers. Its supervisory powers are limited to intervention in terms of FC s 139. By contrast, delegating a function does not absolve the delegating agency of the responsibility for the entire function[3] and, if need be, the delegating agency may revoke the delegation and resume performing the function.

Must the municipality agree to the delegation for it to be valid? FC s 238 does not mention agreement as a requirement. Surely a delegation of authority must be able to ensure that a local government performs certain tasks. FC ss 99 and 126, which deal with the assignment of executive powers, speak directly to this issue of compulsion and suggest that delegation requires agreement by the municipality. In our view, FC s 238 must be interpreted harmoniously with FC ss 99 and 126 and be read to require the agreement of the municipality.[4]

22.4 Municipal Services

The provision of services by a municipality is not merely a matter of defining competences. Rather it is an issue that defines and constitutes the very nature of [1] Assignment and Delegation Guidelines (supra) at item 2*(a)*(i)-(ii) and (b)(ii)-(iii).

[2] Ibid item 12(3)(a).
[3] Ibid item 12(3)(b).
[4] Ibid schedule 1, item 12(5) suggests 'that agreement should, as a matter of principle, always be sought before powers and functions are delegated to municipalities'. Item 33 provides that 'delegations should be effected by agreement and that a municipality cannot be obliged to accept a delegation'. See also Assignment and Delegation Guidelines (supra) at item 13. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 5-49.

this state institution. Of all the three spheres of government, the notion of a government in service of its community is perhaps most compelling with respect to local government. Not only is the role of the municipality that of service provider, but also, very distinctively that of developer of the community. The notion of developmental local government should therefore be the leitmotif in interpreting the constitutional mandate with regard to municipal services. In addition, local government provides the best opportunity for citizens to assist government in the shaping of solutions to problems of local concern.

The developmental mandate raises a number of important questions: first, what is the scope for providing services that make sense within a developmental paradigm? second, what are the duties to provide such services? The obligation to provide services to the community also highlights the relationship of the municipality with the residents as recipients of services. The municipality's provision of 'sustainable' services is inevitably bound up with the consumers' duty to pay for such services.

(a) Scope of municipal services

A municipal service is usefully defined in the Municipal Systems Act ('Systems Act') as 'a service that a municipality in terms of its powers and functions provides or may provide to or for the benefit of the local community irrespective of whether … fees, charges or tariffs are levied in respect of such a service or not.'[1] The definition correctly indicates that municipal services are primarily determined by the general powers of a municipality as demarcated and protected in FC schedules 4B and 5B.[2] The scope of services is thus confined to what a municipality may legally do. Second, the activity is directed to or for the benefit of the local community. Municipal services are thereby distinguished from those activities that are aimed at the internal functioning of the municipality. Third, municipal services include both services for which fees are charged to identifiable consumers and those services provided for the benefit of the community in general.

Schedules 4B and 5B contain a list of 38 functional areas: some important and others trivial. Central to any municipality are the services delivered directly to residents on a daily basis that meet the necessities of life, such as water, sanitation, electricity and refuse removal. A key focus of the schedules is the management of the built environment, including municipal planning, the building and maintenance of roads and stormwater systems, fences, public places and street lighting. Complementing the physical side of the built environment is the management of its use. Functional areas in this regard include traffic and parking, the control of public nuisances, the control of selling of liquor and food to the public and street trading. The responsibility for the built environment speaks to the object of social and economic development, e.g., tourism and trade regulations. In order to realize

[1] Act 32 of 2000 s 1(1).

[2] The power to provide local policing is less secure. FC s 206(7) provides that national legislation may provide a framework for the establishment, powers, functions and control of municipal police services.

the object of promoting a safe and healthy environment, municipal functional areas encompass municipal health services, air pollution, noise pollution, the burial of animals, fire fighting and cleansing.

Some functions and powers are located outside the schedules. The primary example is municipal police services.[1] As required by FC s 206(7), the South African Police Services Amendment Act sets out the legal framework for the establishment of municipal police services.[2] The Act identifies the functions of a municipal police service as follows: traffic policing; the policing of municipal by-laws and regulations; and the prevention of crime. The first two provisions — traffic policing, policing municipal by-laws and regulations — are not new. Those powers would be implicit in the functional areas of road traffic and any of the other functional areas. Crime prevention is, however, a significant new area of municipal policing.[3]

The key question that has surfaced in assessing the functional areas is whether they indeed enable municipalities to execute their developmental mandate.[4] The central theme in the White Paper on Local Government of 1998 was that developmental local government should work for and through citizens.[5] Municipalities should exercise its powers and functions in a way that has a maximum impact on economic growth and social development of communities. Local government should also become the vehicle through which citizens work to achieve their vision of the kind of place in which they wish to live. Consequently, municipalities should build social capital, stimulate the finding of local solutions for increased sustainability, and stimulate local political leadership.

The functional competences of local government should reflect the constitutional vision of developmental local government. The decentralized developmental strategy can only bear fruit if the institutional framework for local government gives expression thereto. Part of this expression must be the allocation of powers and functions that are relevant to the developmental mandate of local government.

Before the Final Constitution, a wide variety of functions were performed by municipalities. A municipality's functions depended on, inter alia, the institutional framework of the various local government ordinances, the administration's capacity and which racial group it was supposed to serve. FC schedules 4B and 5B list functions that the majority of municipalities were already performing (with some additions, such as child care facilities and air pollution). Some functions were

[1] See Okeyrebea Ampofo-Anti, Kim Robinson & Stu Woolman 'Security Forces' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 23B.

[2] Act 83 of 1998.

[3] See further Nico Steytler 'Municipal Police Services: Towards a Safer Environment' (1999) 1(2) Local Government Law Bulletin 5.

[4] See Jaap de Visser & Annette Christmas 'Review of Schedules 4B and 5B' (2007), Community Law Centre, UWC, available at www.communitylaawcentre.org.za.

[5] Ibid at 17-20.

removed from local government. For example, prior to the Final Constitution, municipalities in a number of provinces were responsible for libraries, a competence the Final Constitution allocated to provinces.[1] The result has been that the listed local government functional areas do not enable municipalities to maximise the social and economic impact envisaged by the Final Constitution and the White Paper on Local Government. There has been a growing concern in government about this mismatch between the goal of developmental local government and the allocated powers of local government. The President's Coordinating Council PCC) resolved on 14 December 2001 that FC schedules 4 and 5 should be reappraised. In July 2007, the Department of Provincial and Local Government (DPLG) embarked on a White Paper process for provincial government and a review of the White Paper on Local Government. This process envisages a review of the two schedules.[2]

Two key functional areas that have been at the core of the debate about equipping local government with the necessary competencies to give effect to its developmental mandates have been housing and transport. Given the primary concern of local government with the built environment, housing should be a primary municipal competency. In State of the Cities Report 2006, this link was formulated as follows: 'Local government is … responsible for livelihoods contextualized within the framework of built environment functions: municipalities are responsible for basic service provision and the creation of an enabling environment for the growth of business enterprises.'[3] In urban South Africa, a critical connection exists between housing and transport. These two competencies are located at the provincial level.[4] A further area of contention is that despite the fact that 'local economic development' is one of the objects of local government,[5] there is considerable confusion about local government's role in economic development.

(b) Obligation to provide basic services

FC s 156(1) bestows on a municipality the authority and the right to administer the matters listed in schedules 4B and 5B. The use of the terms 'authority' and 'right' immediately suggests that a municipality may exercise its powers in the demarcated functional areas, but that a municipality has no obligation to do so. On its 'own initiative'[6] a municipality may decide to provide a sport facility or a public park. But what of the basic needs of its citizens? When it comes to the

[1] FC Schedule 5A.

[2] See Nico Steytler 'President's Coordinating Council Sets Agenda for Local Government' (2002) 4(1) Local Government Law Bulletin 1, 2.

[3] South African Cities Network State of the Cities Report 2006 (2006) 5-23.

[4] See Peter Wilkinson 'Reframing Urban Passenger Transport as a Strategic Priority for Developmental Local Government' in Mirjam van Donk, Mark Swilling, Edgar Pieterse & Susan Panell (eds) Consolidating Local Government: Lessons from the South African Experience (2008) 203.

[5] FC s 152(1)(c).

[6] FC s 151(3).

questions of the provision of potable water and municipal health services, these functional areas invoke the obligation of local government to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights',[1] including, say, the rights of access to 'sufficient water' [2] and 'health care services'.[3] Some socio-economic rights clearly intersect with local government competencies. And in some instances, the full realization — or at least the ultimate administration — of programmes designed to make good the promise of these rights rests on municipalities.[4] However, these rights are limited, and given the uncertainty of their reach, a limited number of municipal services can be reinforced through socio-economic rights. The basis for a wider range of services, such as electricity, paved roads and recreational facilities, lies in the broad development objects and duties of a municipality to prioritise the basic needs of the community.[5]

Both the Final Constitution and dicta from the Constitutional Court suggest that there is an obligation to provide basic municipal services, an obligation that is broader than the focus and application of socio-economic rights. First, one of the objects of local government is 'to ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner'.[6] While this is an 'object' and not a function or obligation, the developmental duty of a municipality includes 'giving priority to the basic needs of the community' by structuring and managing 'its administration and budgeting planning processes' to this end.[7] The language in which local government's entitlement to an equitable share of the revenue raised nationally is couched is a bit more forthright. The very purpose of local government's entitlement to the equitable share is, in terms of FC s 227(1)(a), 'to enable it to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to it.' If the provision of basic services is discretionary, then the claim to an equitable share becomes a function of a municipality's decision to provide a particular service or not. Such a reading runs counter to FC s 227(1)(a)'s logic for determining the equitable share.[8] Importantly, the entitlement to an equitable share is linked to the notion of providing 'basic' services.

The direct reference to an obligation to provide basic services is the result of an amendment to FC s 139 in 2003. One of the grounds for a provincial intervention in a municipality, including the dissolution of its council, is when a municipality, 'as result of a crisis in its financial affairs, is in serious or persistent material breach of its obligations to provide basic services'.[9] A provincial executive must then

[1] FC s 7(2).
[2] FC s 27(1)(b).
[3] FC s 27(1)(a).
[4] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 9-8ff.
[5] The statutory duty to provide a service, such as referred to in s 73(1) of the Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 can only be sustained on a sound constitutional footing.
[6] FC s 152(1)(b).
[7] FC s 153*(a)*.
[8] See § 22.5*(j)*(i) infra.
[9] FC s 139(5) (emphasis added).

impose a recovery plan 'aimed at securing the municipality's ability to meet its obligations to provide basic services'. The underlying assumption of FC s 139(5) is that there is an obligation to provide basic services and the failure to do so because of a financial crisis provides a basis for an intervention.

Some of the dicta in Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another, & Other Cases proceed from the premise that there is indeed a constitutional duty to provide basic services.[1] O'Regan J placed this duty in a historical context. With reference to the constitutional objects of local government,[2] she wrote:

> Local government thus bears the important responsibility of providing services in a sustainable manner to their communities. This task is particularly important given the deep divisions in our towns, the scars of spatial apartheid which still exist and the fact that many poor communities are still without access to basic facilities such as water, adequate sewerage systems, refuse collection, electricity and paved roads. The ability of local government to carry out its constitutional mandate depends on its financial stability.[3]

In the same case, Yacoob J said that municipalities were obliged to provide water and electricity to the residents in their areas 'as a matter of public duty'.[4] As authority for this 'public duty', Yacoob J refers[5] to the right of access to sufficient food and water,[6] the service objects of local government listed in FC s 152(1), the development duties of local government in FC s 153 and s 73(1) of the Municipal Systems Act.[7]

While using socio-economic rights as the basis for the provision of some basic municipal services is useful, thus far the relief any applicant can secure is rather

[1] 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC)('Mkontwana').

[2] FC s 152(1).

[3] Mkontwana (supra) at para 105. See also Beck v Kopanong Local Municipality Case No 3772/2002 (Unreported, Orange Free State). Having listed a number of well-known municipal functions (from water services to recreational parks service) Rampai J wrote: 'It is the constitutional imperative of the local municipality to provide these various community services and many more to its own community, and to ensure that these services are provided in an effective and systematic and sustainable manner.' Ibid at para 19.

[4] Mkontwana (supra) at para 38. See also Mkontwana (supra) at para 52.

[5] Ibid at para 38, fn 49.

[6] FC s 27(1)(b).

[7] Act 32 of 2000 s 73(1) reads: 'A municipality must give effect to the provisions of the Constitution and (a) give priority to the basic needs of the local; (b) promote the development of the local community; and (c) ensure that all members of the local community have access to at least the minimum level of basic municipal services.' In Occupiers of 15 Olivia Rd, Berea Township v City of Johannesburg 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC) at para 16 Yacoob J, for the Constitutional Court, reiterated this broad brush approach. In dealing with an eviction matter, he wrote as follows:

> The City has constitutional obligations towards the occupants of Johannesburg. It must provide services to communities in a sustainable manner, [FC s 152(1)(b)] provide social and economic development, [FC s 152(1)(c)] and encourage the involvement of communities and community organisations in matters of local government [FC s 152(1)(e)]. It has an obligation to fulfil the objectives mentioned in the preamble to the Constitution to '[i]mprove the quality of life of all citizens and free the potential of each person". Most importantly, it must respect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.

limited. Moreover, only some services are regarded as basic: water and health services.[1] Finally, if the right of access to water is conceptualized as a claim by those who cannot afford to pay for this commodity, then the claims of the business community for the supply of water to their factories and enterprises are bound to flounder. The objects of local government in FC s 152 are by themselves a weak basis for an enforceable duty. As they provide no authority upon which to base a plenary municipal power or function, they can a fortiori not sustain a claim for an obligation to act. While FC s 153 uses the term developmental duties in the title to the section, it deals with priorities rather than duties. Section 73(1)(c) of the Structures Act would also appear to beg the question of what duties are enforceable: it creates a statutory duty that a municipality must 'ensure that all members of the local community have access to at least the minimum level of basic municipal services'?

While neither FC ss 152(1)(b) or 153 by themselves provide a sufficient constitutional basis for an enforceable duty, the language of FC ss 139(5) and 227(1)(a) is much clearer and to the point. Both sections work on the assumption that there is a duty to provide services, but that such services are limited to those that can be labeled as basic. This view reflects the very purpose of a municipality standing in the service of its community; it runs counter to any notion of a municipality being able to claim that the provision of water, electricity, refuse removal or road maintenance is a matter of discretion. This reading also has important consequences for the implementation of FC s 139. A provincial executive's power of intervention is premised on the failure of a municipality to fulfil a a constitutional obligation.[2]

The obligation to provide services does not make a municipality liable for the provision of services in all 38 functional areas. Both FC ss 139(5) and 227(1)(a) limit such claims to services that are 'basic'.

The notion of a basic municipal service is a recurrent theme in local government legislation.[3] As yet, a precise and concrete definition has not been offered by our courts. The White Paper on Local Government, however, views the provision of 'good basic services' as follows:

[1] Key services such as road building and maintenance and streetlighting in a dangerous area would, at first blush, appear to fall outside their ambit of basic services underwritten by a duty to fulfil fundamental rights. However, the FC s 12(1)(c) right not to be subjected to public or private violence might imply a duty to provide streetlighting. There is no reason, in principle, why only the traditional socio-economic rights can impose positive duties to provide service delivery on municipalities.

[2] FC s 139(1).

[3] In terms of the Municipal Finance Management Act 56 of 2000 s 14(1) a municipality may not transfer ownership as result of a sale or other transaction or in any way permanently dispose of a capital asset needed to provide the minimum level of basic municipal services.

> Local government is responsible for the provision of household infrastructure and services, an essential component of social and economic development. This includes services such as water, sanitation, local roads, storm water drainage, refuse collection and electricity. Good basic services, apart from being a constitutional right, are essential to enable people to support family life, find employment, develop their skills or establish their own small business. The provision of household infrastructure can particularly make a difference to the lives of women, who usually play the major role in reproductive (domestic) work which sustains the family and the local society.[1]

What this description indicates is that a basic service entails more than a service that provides a resident with a consumable commodity. Household infrastructure such as refuse removal, roads, and stormwater drainage are required for a secure and healthy environment. When the White Paper was translated into law, 'basic services' were given a more generic definition. The Systems Act defines the concept of 'basic municipal services' as a service that is 'necessary to ensure an acceptable and reasonable quality of life and, if not provided, would endanger public health or safety or the environment'.[2] The Municipal Finance Management Act ('MFMA') gives an identical definition.[3]

While the criterion of 'acceptable and reasonable quality of life' may be too vague to be of much value, the second part of the definition provides more promising possibilities. The quality of life that relates to the health or safety of communities narrows the scope. The first element of the definition is that the measuring rod is not the individual but the public. The reference is to public health and safety, not that of an individual. Second, the quality of life must relate to public health and safety. Refuse removal and the control of air pollution are essential components of a healthy environment, while they could not be easily fit within the currently narrow definition of the socio-economic right of access to health services. On this account, some services would also by definition not accrue to individuals. An individual would hardly be entitled to a stormwater drainage system; a community may well be entitled to such a system where its absence would place the physical security of the community in danger.

However, as we noted above, some constitutional benefits might well accrue to individuals. The provision of 'streetlighting', for example, speaks directly to an individual's FC s 12 right to be free from public and private forms of violence.

Where the focus is no longer on the physical security of the individual, additional constitutional obligations might still be said to flow to the community. FC s 24*(b)* sets out the right 'to have the environment protected, for the benefit of present and future generations, through reasonable legislative and other measures that (i) prevent pollution and ecological degradation; (ii) promote conservation; and (iii) secure ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources while promoting justifiable economic and social development.'[1] Such environmental duties would fall within such functional areas as 'municipal planning', 'refuse dumps and solid waste disposal', 'municipal parks', 'fences and fencing', 'domestic waste-water and sewage disposal systems'.

[1] White Paper on Local Government (1998) 23.
[2] Systems Act s 1(1) 'basic municipal service'.
[3] Act 56 of 2000 s 1(1).

We have demonstrated, in the above passages, that both individual claims and communal claims can be made for the provision of a basic service and that such claims are justiciable. If a province can intervene by imposing a financial recovery plan and, if need be, dismiss a municipal council that fails to provide basic municipal services,[2] then perhaps less drastic measures such as a court action should first be entertained. What should the test for judicial intervention be? Given that the required relief would be the provision of a particular service, the similarities with enforcing socio-economic rights are obvious. In interpreting the obligation to fulfil the socio-economic rights, as qualified with reference to reasonable measures, progressive realization and available resources, the Constitutional Court has crystallized a number of principles that delineate their reach.[3] First and foremost, there is no minimum core obligation that would entail the provision of a commodity.[4] In both Grootboom[5] and Treatment Action Campaign,[6] the Court rejected arguments that an individual can claim a commodity such as shelter or medical treatment. While it rejected the core content argument, the Court is willing to review the reasonableness of policies, legislation and other measures that are said to reflect the state's commitment to the discharge of socio-economic rights. Reasonableness review itself will be guided by the following criteria:[7]

(a) There must be a comprehensive, coherent and coordinated programme to give effect to a right;
(b) The programme must be capable of facilitating the realization of the right in the long run;
(c) The programme must be reasonable in conception and implementation;
(d) The programme must be able meet both short-, medium-, and long-term needs; and

[1] See Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson 'Environment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 50.

[2] FC s 139(5).

[3] See Sandra Liebenberg 'South Africa's Evolving Jurisprudence on Socio-Economic Rights: An Effective Tool in Challenging Poverty?" (2002) 6(2) Law, Democracy and Development 159, 189.

[4] But see Mazibuko & Others v The City of Johannesburg & Others [2008] ZAGPHC 128 (30 April 2008).

[5] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

[6] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721(CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC).

[7] See Sandra Liebenberg 'Evolving Jurisprudence' (supra) at 171; Danie Brand 'Between Availability and Entitlement: The Constitution, Grootboom and the Right to Food' (2003) 7(1) Law, Democracy and Development 7, 7-10. See also David Bichitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 56A; Kirsty McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55; Anton Kok & Malcolm Langford 'Water' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 56B.

(e) The programme must be able to provide relief for those in desperate circumstances, although not for individual relief.[1]

Given the Court's current approach, the reasonableness review of a municipal programme will likely be guided by similar criteria. Residents can expect from their municipality a programme to deliver a particular service that is comprehensive, coherent and coordinated. However, no one can claim relief in the form of an order of immediate implementation. A plaintiff can ask that the programme must be capable of facilitating the provision of the claimed service and that it would meet the short-, medium- and long-term needs of the community. Most importantly perhaps, and as close to a minimum core requirement as the Court has come, an applicant could ask a court to order a municipality to conceive of a programme that responds to members of a community in urgent need or in desperate circumstances.

(c) Realising socio-economic rights through service provision

A municipality's duties in relation to the realization of socio-economic rights are circumscribed by its defined areas of competence.[2] The critical question for municipalities is whether there is an intersection between the socio-economic right and the particular functional area of a municipality. Two types of intersection can be identified. The first is a direct intersection where the realization of the right falls foursquare within a municipality's functional areas. In the second, the functional area does not cover the right directly but a municipality nevertheless plays an important contributory or supportive role in its realization.

In the first type of intersection the nature and the scope of a socio-economic right corresponds with a municipality's functional area or areas. The schedule 4B functional area of 'water and sanitation services limited to potable water supply systems and domestic waste-water and sewage disposal system' intersects directly with the right of access to sufficient water. Local government is then responsible for the full spectrum of responsibilities to implement this right.[3]

In the second type of intersection, a socio-economic right does not directly overlap with a local government functional area, but the fulfillment of that right is dependent on local government playing a supportive role. For example, the right of access to housing does not directly intersect with any municipal functional area, but the Constitutional Court emphasized in Grootboom that all spheres of government 'must ensure that the housing programme is reasonably and appropriately implemented in the light of all the provisions of the Constitution.'[4]

[1] This duty has been described by Brand as follows: 'On paper, a policy may not leave out of account, and must make at least some provision for those who, for what ever reason, whether temporarily or permanently, find themselves in dire straights regarding access to housing, food, water and health care services.' Brand (supra) at 8 (emphasis in the original).

[2] See Jaap de Visser, Edward Cottle & Johann Mettler 'Realising the Right of Access to Water: Pipe Dream or Watershed?' (2003) 7(1) Law, Democracy and Development 27, 29.

[3] Ibid at 29.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 82.

The Grootboom Court noted, that '[e]ach sphere of government must accept responsibility for the implementation of particular parts of the [national housing] programme.[1] The right to housing entails more than 'bricks and mortar' and includes 'appropriate services such as the provision of water and the removal of sewage'.[2] The particular parts of a national housing programme that a municipality must perform are thus the provision of water and sanitation.

(d) Method of providing services

The Final Constitution does not describe how municipal services should be delivered, but there is an indirect reference that the municipality need not be the actual provider. FC s 229(1)(a) authorizes a municipality to impose 'surcharge on fees for services provided by or on behalf of the municipality'. This phrase suggests that a municipality need not be the only institution or organ of state that is authorized to provide a service; some other institution or body may do so on its behalf. In the White Paper on Local Government one of the strategies for addressing the backlog in services was the use of the private sector to provide services on behalf of a municipality.[3] This service provision could occur through partnerships with non-governmental organizations or contracting out to the private sector. The White Paper adopted, however, a neutral position. The paper favoured neither inhouse service provision nor externalising the services. Instead it presented a range of options from which a municipality could choose.[4]

The Systems Act has established an elaborate system for choosing a service provider, be it an inhouse service or an external provider.[5] However, the details of the system have made the option of outsourcing services difficult to exercise. In addition, the MFMA has added further provisions and regulations where the use of an external service provider entails a public-private partnership.[6] The inevitable conclusion is that the current system demonstrates a clear bias in favour of continuing to provide services through internal mechanisms; this result does not offend the policy position taken in the White Paper.[7]

(e) Reciprocal nature of providing services: duty to pay for consumption

(i) The power to charge fees

One of the objects of local government is 'to ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner'.[8] Although the charging of fees for the

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 40.
[2] Ibid at para 35.
[3] White Paper on Local Government (supra) at 97ff.
[4] Ibid at 92, 101. See Victoria Johnson Outsourcing Basic Municipal Services: Policy, Legislation and Contracts (2005) (Unpublished LLM thesis, University of the Western Cape), 15.
[5] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 9-23–9-35.
[6] Ibid at 9-35–9-42.
[7] Johnson (supra) at 62.
[8] FC s 152(1)(b) (emphasis added).

so-called trading services (services where there is an identifiable consumer) is one of the long standing methods of generating municipal income,[1] it has not been given the imprimatur of direct constitutional approval. However, the constitutionally entrenched right to impose a surcharge on fees for services provided by or on behalf to the municipality[2] necessarily implies the constitutional power to charge fees for those services.[3] The basis of this power is best conceived as flowing from the incidental power with regard to matters reasonably necessary for or incidental to the effective exercise of a schedule 4B or 5B competence.[4] This power is now forthrightly expressed in s 4(1)(c) of the Systems Act: a council has the right to 'finance the affairs of the municipality by (i) charging fees for services; and (ii) imposing surcharges'. In a 2002 amendment to the Systems Act this power has been made more explicit: a municipality has the power to levy and recover fees, charges or tariffs in respect of any function or service it provides.[5]

As the power to charge fees does not arise from FC s 229(1)(a) (the right to levy rates on property or a surcharge on fees) or FC s 229(1)(b) (any other tax authorized by national legislation), it does not fall under the regulatory regime envisaged in that section.[6] The tariff set for the fees charged for services then falls to the discretion of the municipality. However, on the basis that the charging of fees is an incidental power flowing from the right to administer and to legislate on matters listed in schedules 4B and 5B, the national and provincial governments may regulate the exercise of such powers in terms of FC s 155(7).[7] Such regulation is effected by the Systems Act which structures the setting of tariffs for service fees.[8] The MFMA also assumes that the capping of tariffs is possible; a national or provincial organ of state may impose such measures in terms of national or provincial legislation.[9] The question that follows is how is this propositoin to be squared with the ability of a municipality to agree to a tariff increase with an external service provider which exceeds the cap?[10] The MFMA's answer to the question is to provide that the capping of a tariff may not interfere with a municipality's long term contractual or debt obligations.[11] If such obligations provide for an annual or periodic escalation of payments by the municipality, then the capping of the tariff does not apply. The imposition of an upper limit

[1] See Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 27-10.
[2] FC s 229(1)(a).
[3] Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) at para 71.
[4] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 438. See also Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-10.
[5] Systems Act s 75A(1)(a). See Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2006 (1) SA 496 (SCA) at para 15.
[6] See § 22.5*(d)*(i) infra.
[7] On the ambit of FC s 155(7) see § 22.3 supra.
[8] Systems Act ss 74-75A.
[9] MFMA s 43(1).
[10] See Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-11.
[11] MFMA s 43(3).

would impair the municipality's ability to meet the escalation of its payment under the contract.[1] This is, of course, the only constitutional way out of the conundrum. Where a capping of a tariff would have infringed on a municipality's contractual obligations, it would be a prime example of a national organ of state falling foul of the basic principle of local autonomy. The national organ of state would be compromising or impeding the municipality's ability to exercise its powers.[2]

(ii) The nature of the tariff setting

In Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Metropolitan Council & Others, the Constitutional Court held that when a government, be it national, provincial or local, > exercises the power to raise taxes or rates, or determines appropriations to be made out of public funds, it is exercising a power under our Constitution which is a power peculiar to elected legislative bodies. It is a power that is exercised by democratically elected representatives after due deliberation.[3]

Thus when the legislature raises revenue through the imposition of taxes and determines how such income is to be spent, it engages in a legislative act. Consequently, not being an administrative act, the levying of rates or the appropriation of revenue is not subject to administrative review. As the decision in Fedsure dealt with the narrow question of levying rates and the imposition of levies, the question of whether the determination of tariffs is also a legislative act is not answered. Kriel and Monadjem simply assume, on the basis of Fedsure, that 'tariff setting is a legislative act'.[4] The underlying argument is that in as much as appropriations out of the revenue fund of a municipality are legislative acts, so must be all revenue-raising measures done in terms of legislation. A number of contra-indications exist to this reading of Fedsure. First, Fedsure dealt with the Interim Constitution — where all revenue-raising powers (property rates, levies, fees, taxes and tariffs) were lumped together.[5] The Final Constitution has made a clear distinction between the taxing powers and the power to charge fees. FC s 229 makes no mention of fees.[6] Second, when the Constitutional Court asserted in the First Certification Judgment that provinces had the power to charge user fees in terms of an implied power, this power was described as the power 'to enact legislation authorising the imposition of user charges'.[7] One might conclude that such legislation authorizes the setting of tariffs, and not the tariffs themselves. Third, FC s 160(2) requires only that the approval of the budget and the imposition of rates and other taxes, levies and duties must be determined by the council. It makes no reference to fees and tariffs. FC s 160(2) indicates that this decision may be delegated to another body.

[1] MFMA s 43(3).
[2] FC s 151(4).
[3] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at para 45.
[4] Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-12.
[5] IC s 178(2).
[6] See Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-10.
[7] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 438 (emphasis added).

The question turns, it would seem, on whether there is any fundamental difference between raising revenue by fees and charges in terms of a tariff and levying rates, duties and levies. In our view there is a difference. The difference is that fees and tariffs relate to a business transaction where the intention is to recoup the cost of the service provided. For a municipality to function, tariffs must relate to the actual costs of providing a particular service.[1] Rates and other taxes are fundamentally different. They are policy driven and not designed to fund a particular service. As long as there is legislation authorising the imposition of a service fee and a tariff policy that guides the determination of the tariffs, the actual tariff setting can be an administrative act undertaken on the basis of projected input costs. The Systems Act prescribes just such an arrangement. After adopting a policy on tariffs,[2] the policy must be captured in a by-law.[3] On the basis of such a by-law, then, the actual amounts of the tariffs are set by resolution passed by the supporting vote of a majority of the councillors.[4] That tariff resolution, then, unlike that of a resolution setting rates,[5] is an administrative act.

(iii) The duty to charge fees?

The power to levy fees and tariffs for services rendered falls within the discretion of the municipality and gives effect to the constitutional principle that a municipality may govern on its 'own initiative'.[6] In Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town the applicants argued that where the cost of consumption of a service can be attributed to individual ratepayers, such costs should be recovered not through the imposition of property rates but through individualized service charges.[7] Consequently, it was argued that the City's policy of charging for sewage and refuse removal in terms of both a consumption charge and a property rate was invalid. The High Court rejected the claim and made it clear that nothing in the Final Constitution or the Systems Act supported this contention.[8] The Systems Act made it clear in the definition of a 'municipal service'[9] that there is no obligation on a municipality to levy fees, charges or tariffs in respect of all the services it provides.[10] The High Court concluded that the City was 'entitled to impose property rates to recover its costs in relation to services which it provides and it is also entitled to impose user charges. There is no reason why it may not do both.'[11] The Supreme Court of Appeal likewise confirmed this approach.[12] In sum, the Systems Act does not preclude the levying of a property rate as a general 'charge' for services.

[1] Systems Act s 74(2)(d).
[2] Systems Act s 74(1).
[3] Systems Act s 75(1); Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act 6 of 2004 s 6.
[4] Systems Act s 75A(2).
[5] See § 22.5*(e)*(iii) infra.
[6] FC s 151(3).
[7] Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C)('Rates Action Group HC').
[8] Ibid at para 56.
[9] Systems Act s 1(1).
[10] Rates Action Group HC (supra) at para 58.
[11] Ibid at para 76.
[12] Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2006 (1) SA 496 (SCA).

(iv) Duty to pay fees

The duty of residents to pay for the services they receive corresponds to the right of communities to basic services.[1] While the Final Constitution is silent on the imposition of any such duty, the Systems Act has made it explicit. In as much as members of the local community have a right 'to have access to municipal services', there is also the corresponding duty of payment for such services.[2] The Systems Act thus provides that members of the local community have a duty, where applicable, 'to pay promptly services fees [and] surcharges on fees' that the municipality may impose.[3] Such a duty is, however, subject to the municipality's credit control and debt collection policy: that policy must make provision for indigent debtors.[4]

The Constitutional Court has taken a dim view of residents who fail to pay for services as a political stratagem out of protest against poor service delivery. The 'culture of non-payment' that existed before 1994 the Constitutional Court has explained as 'political protest against discriminatory policies under apartheid and an expression of dissatisfaction regarding the low standard of services which were provided.'[5] After 1994 whites, the main beneficiaries of apartheid, also sought to ventilate grievances about services through the withholding of payment for services.[6] For Langa DP, as he then was, non-payment was a practice that had 'no place in a constitutional state in which the rights of all persons are guaranteed and all have access to the courts to protect their rights.'[7] Langa DP nudges the Court towards articulating a reciprocal duty between the resident and the municipality in the following terms:

> Local government is as important a tier of public administration as any. It has to continue functioning for the common good; it however cannot do so efficiently and effectively if every person who has a grievance about the conduct of a public official or a government structure were to take the law into their own hands or resort to self-help by withholding payment for services rendered. That conduct carries with it the potential for chaos and anarchy and can therefore not be appropriate. The kind of society envisaged in the Constitution implies also the exercise of responsibility towards the systems and structures of society. A culture of self-help in which people refuse to pay for services they have received is not acceptable.[8]

Where a council charges a fee for a service, the question that inevitably comes to the fore in a country with massive income disparities is how to provide services to millions of people living in poverty. From a constitutional perspective, the

[1] See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 9-45ff.
[2] Systems Act s (1)(g) with reference to Act s 5(2)(b).
[3] Systems Act s 5(2)(b).
[4] Systems Act s 5(2)(b) read with s 97(1)(c).
[5] City of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker') at para 92.
[6] See, for example, Walker (supra); Senekal Inwonersvereniging en 'n Ander v Plaaslike Oorgangsraad 1998 (3) SA 719 (O).
[7] Walker (supra) at para 92.
[8] Ibid at para 93.

question is whether there is a principle that instructs municipalities to accommodate the indigent by providing services even when they cannot pay for them. This principle is recognized in our statutes. The obligatory tariff policy must reflect the principle that 'poor households must have access to at least basic services'.[1] This policy can be achieved by setting tariffs that cover only operating and maintenance costs, 'life line tariffs for low level of use or consumption of services or for basic level of services', or other direct or indirect methods of subsidization for poor households.[2] The focus is again on 'basic services' and the constitutional basis can be twofold: a socio-economic rights basis or a community right basis.

(v) Duty to collect debts and the constitutionality of enforcement mechanisms

In order to provide 'sustainable service', a municipality is under an obligation to collect fees that are due. This obligation, which is implicit in the Final Constitution, has been expressly articulated by the Constitutional Court. Given the ever rising debt burden of municipalities, Yacoob J emphasized in Mkontwana that it is 'imperative for municipalities to do everything reasonable to reduce the amounts owing, [o]therwise, the sustainability of the delivery of municipal services is likely to be in real jeopardy.'[3] In a similar vein, O'Regan J said that 'municipalities bear an important constitutional obligation and a statutory responsibility to take appropriate steps to ensure the efficient recovery of debt.'[4]

The Systems Act equips municipalities with a range of measures to enforce payment of fees due, including the termination or restriction of the provision of services.[5] These measures, the Constitutional Court said, should be used by municipalities to guard against an unreasonable accumulation of outstanding consumption charges: 'The municipality has a duty to send out regular accounts, develop a culture of payment, disconnect the supply of electricity and water in appropriate circumstances, and take appropriate steps for the collection of amounts due.'[6] A further measure is a temporary delay in the transfer of property where there are unpaid service charges.[7]

Where the municipal service that is to be terminated or restricted has a socio-economic rights dimension, constitutional issues come to the fore.[8] In Residents of Bon Vista v Southern Metropolitan Local Municipality,[9] the applicants challenged the

[1] Systems Act s 74(2)(c).
[2] Systems Act s 74(2)(c).
[3] Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another, & Other Cases 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC)('Mkontwana') at para 62.
[4] Ibid at para 124.
[5] Systems Act s 102(1)(c) read with s 97(1)(g).
[6] Mkontwana (supra) at para 47 (Yacoob J). The Court also wrote: 'The municipality must comply with its duties and take reasonable steps to collect amounts that are due.' Ibid at 49.
[7] Systems Act s 118(1).
[8] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 9-53.
[9] 2002 (6) BCLR 625 (W)('Bona Vista').

threatened termination of their water supply by the municipality as a violation of the right of access to adequate water. The question was whether the municipality was in breach of its duty to respect the applicants' rights of access to water by disconnecting their existing water supply. Budlender AJ held that the act of disconnection was prima facie in breach of the council's constitutional duty to respect the community's existing right of access to water.[1] However, such a deprivation may be justified in terms of FC s 36 — assuming that the deprivation occurred in terms of a law of general application. The onus then falls on the council to justify the deprivation. The Water Services Act provides that a service provider must set the conditions in terms of which water services may be provided: including the circumstances and procedures for limiting or discontinuing them.[2] However, this procedure must be 'fair and equitable' and provide for reasonable notice of the intention to limit or to discontinue the water services and for an opportunity to make representation.[3] Furthermore, the procedure may 'not result in a person being denied access to basic water services for non-payment, where that person proves, to the satisfaction of the relevant water services authority, that he or she is unable to pay for basic services.'[4] Because of the latter requirement, a genuine opportunity to make representations must be afforded before a person is denied access to water because of the inability to pay for such services.[5]

A mandatory enforcement mechanism of many years standing has been the preferential claim for outstanding rates, taxes and fees when property ownership is sought to be transferred.[6] Section 118(1) of the Systems Act places a temporary restriction on the ability of an owner of property to alienate that property if there are outstanding charges owed to the municipality. A registrar of deeds may not register the transfer of property unless the municipality issues a certificate stating that 'all amounts that became due in connection with that property for municipal service fees, surcharges on fees, property rates and other municipal taxes, levies, and duties during the two years preceding the date of the application for the certificate have been fully paid.'[7]

In Mkontwana, the Constitutional Court held that the charges 'in connection with' the property are not confined to those incurred by the owner only, but apply also to the charges of all occupiers of the property.[8] The effect of the provision is that where the owner of a property wants to transfer the property to another

[1] Bona Vista (supra) at para 20
[2] Act 108 of 1997.
[3] Water Services Act s 4(3)(a) and (b). These procedural requirements do not apply where other consumers would be prejudiced, there is an emergency situation, or the consumer has interfered with a limited or discontinued service. Water Services Act s 4(3)(b)(i)-(iii).
[4] Water Services Act s 4(3)(c).
[5] Bona Vista (supra) at para 26.
[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 9-54.
[7] Systems Act s 118(1)(b).
[8] Mkontwana (supra) at paras 30-31.

person, all outstanding charges on the property for the two-year period must be paid before transfer can take place, including those charges incurred by occupiers other than the owner. The constitutionality of s 118(1) was thus contested as being a violation of the right to property as enshrined in FC s 25(1). The South Eastern Cape Local Division of the High Court declared the provision inconsistent with FC s 25(1) because the section permitted an arbitrary deprivation of property.[1] This view was not shared by the Natal High Court.[2]

Having found that the requirement of a certificate as a precondition for transfer constituted a deprivation, albeit it temporary, of property within the meaning of FC s 25(1), the Constitutional Court addressed the question as to whether the deprivation contained in s 118(1) was arbitrary. A law is arbitrary when it fails to provide 'sufficient reason' for the deprivation or is procedurally unfair. The sufficiency of the reason for a permitted deprivation entails the evaluation of the relationship between the purpose of the law and the deprivation effected by that law.[3] If the purpose bears no relationship to the property or owner, then the law is arbitrary.[4] There must be a relationship between the means and the end; the more invasive the deprivation, the closer the relationship between the means and the end must be.[5]

For the Mkontwana Court, the object of s 118(1) was the furnishing of a form of security to municipalities for the payment of amounts due in respect of consumption charges.[6] It effectively places the risk — when non-owner occupiers fail to pay consumption charges — on the owner rather than on the municipality. The Court found that this purpose was 'important, laudable and has the potential to encourage regular payments of consumption charges and thereby to contribute to the effective discharge of municipalities of their constitutional mandated functions.'[7] In addition, the measure had 'the potential to encourage owners of property to discharge their civic responsibility by doing what they can to ensure that money payable to a government organ for the delivery of services is timeously paid.'[8]

Because the consumption of electricity and water on the property is part and parcel of the enjoyment of the occupation of the property, a close relationship exists between deprivation of the property and the consumption charges.[9] This relationship applies irrespective of the status of the occupiers, be they tenants,

[1] Mkontwana (supra) at para 3.
[2] Geyser & Another v Msunduzi Municipality & Others 2003 (5) SA 18 (N), 2003 (3) BCLR 235 (N).
[3] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Services and Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 4 SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 100; Mkontwana (supra) at para 34. See, generally, Theunis Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 46.5.
[4] Mkontwana (supra) at para 34.
[5] Ibid at para 34.
[6] Ibid at para 38.
[7] Ibid at para 38.
[8] Ibid at para 38.
[9] Ibid at para 39.

persons exercising rights of usufruct, or fideicommissum, squatters or other unlawful occupiers. Even in the case of unlawful occupiers, the Court said that it is the duty of owners to safeguard their property by taking reasonable steps to ensure that it is not unlawfully occupied,[1] and given the available measures of evictions, the owner should bear the risk of the unpaid consumer charges by such occupiers.

However, the assertion that s 118(1) entailed an unfair procedure — because there was no obligation on the municipality to keep property owners informed of the amounts owing by occupiers at reasonable intervals when this is requested by owners in writing — met with some success. The Court held that '[f]airness requires that a municipality provide an owner of property with copies of all accounts if the owner requests them.'[2]

Having s 118(1) as a lever for extracting charges from owners, the Court stressed, did not relieve a municipality from its duty to collect consumption charges. A failure to do so, the Court warned, could lead to the municipality's liability for the delictual damages if its inefficiency to collect charges amounted to negligence that occasioned damage to property owners.[3]

22.5 Municipal Revenue Raising Powers

(a) Introduction

A major component of local government's ability to govern on its own initiative is that municipalities have significant original revenue-raising powers entrenched in the Final Constitution.[4] Unlike provincial governments, which are almost exclusively dependent on national transfers to fund their functioning,[5] municipalities are by and large self-sustainable. They raise, on average, 76 percent of their revenue.[6] That said, local government is also dependent to varying degrees on national transfers to sustain their activities.[7]

[1] Mkontwana (supra) at para 59.

[2] Ibid at para 67.

[3] Ibid at para 62. O'Regan J noted: 'Should a municipality not perform its statutory or constitutional obligations [of recovering debt], appropriate relief should be sought.' Ibid at para 124.

[4] See Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.

[5] National Treasury Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review 2003/04-2009/10 (2007) 4.

[6] National Treasury Local Government Budgets and Expenditure Review 2001/02-2007/08 (2006) tables 2.1 and 2.2.

[7] Philip van Ryneveld 'The Development of Policy on the Financing of Municipalities' in Udesh Pillay, Richard Tomlinson & Jacques de Toit (eds) Democracy and Delivery: Urban Policy in South Africa (2006) 157, 160; Dave Savage 'Key Themes and Trends in Municipal Finance in South Africa' in Mirjam van Donk, Mark Swilling, Edgar Pieterse & Susan Parnell (eds) Consolidating Local Government: Lessons from the South African Experience (2008) 285, 297-299.

The principal sources of revenue for municipalities are service fees, rates on property, surcharges on service fees, other taxes and duties and transfers. Service fees — mainly for electricity and water — make up 38 percent of income on average, property rates 18 percent, other charges, taxes, duties and levies 30 percent and transfers 14 percent. Of the transfers, two thirds was contributed by local government's equitable share of revenue raised nationally and a third from conditional grants.[1] An additional source of income — mainly for the large metropolitan municipalities — is borrowing in the open market.[2]

The source of local government's fiscal prowess lies in FC s 229. FC s 229 entitles municipalities to impose rates on property and surcharges on fees for services, and, if authorized by national legislation, other taxes, levies and duties 'appropriate to local government'. Excluded from the latter category are income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax and customs duty.[3] The power to levy property rates and user surcharges is subject to the general limitation that it may be not be exercised 'in a way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across municipal boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour' and may be regulated by national legislation.[4] Local government is entitled to an 'equitable share of the revenue raised nationally to enable it to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to it'.[5] Municipalities may also receive conditional grants from the national government.[6] Finally, a municipality's borrowing powers are governed by FC s 230A.

(b) Fiscal powers and responsibility for financial health

What is distinctive about local government's revenue streams is that most of the income is derived from municipalities' own efforts of charging and collecting fees and taxes. The entitlement to an equitable share of revenue-raised nationally serves only as a supplementary income (although in the poorer municipalities it constitutes the bulk of income). One leitmotif of the Final Constitution is that a municipality's access to significant sources of revenue is accompanied by the responsibility for its own financial health.[7] Municipalities must exploit the direct access given to significant revenue streams of rates and surcharges on fees. The comfortable situation of relying on the national government to provide the necessary funding, while their own taxing sources lie fallow, is not to be tolerated. FC s 227(2) provides that there is no obligation on national government 'to compensate … municipalities that do not raise revenue commensurate with their fiscal

[1] National Treasury Local Government Budgets (supra) at 8.
[2] Ibid at 17. See further Savage (supra) at 306.
[3] FC s 229(1).
[4] FC s 229(2).
[5] FC s 227(1).
[6] FC s 227(1)(b).
[7] See Robert Cameron 'Central-local Financial Relations in South Africa' (2002) 28 Local Government Studies 113, 122.

capacity and tax base'. This provision enforces the notion of local accountability: residents taxed by their own municipality are more likely to demand from their civic leaders to account for spending of their taxes. Conversely, municipalities receiving transfers from the national government for the bulk of their income may fail to be accountable to their residents and place the responsibility for a lack of services on national government.[1]

Having access to a variety of revenue streams should enable municipalities to balance their books. In this endeavour the constitutional principle is that revenue must be real, rather than borrowed. Kriel and Monadjen argue convincingly that the limitation on short-term borrowing only for bridging purposes and long-term debt only for capital projects[2] means that a municipality cannot borrow to cover a deficit in its current expenditure.[3] This limitation sets many municipalities up for financial failure: they will not be able to pay accounts due if funds do not come from sources other than debt. Moreover, the national or provincial governments are not standing in as guarantors for municipal debt. If municipal 'insolvency' does occur, FC s 139 provides the out: the mandatory intervention by the provincial executive where a municipality either fails to approve the necessary revenue-raising measures to give effect to its budget,[4] or where the municipality fails to meet its financial commitments.[5] The MFMA, in turn, states that where a municipality fails to meet its financial commitments, a provincial intervention must take place and the municipality may approach a court to terminate its financial obligations to its creditors.[6]

The constitutional principle of financial responsibility has also been enforced by the courts. First, the Supreme Court of Appeal has ruled that there is no implicit guarantee that the national or provincial government will step in as guarantor of a local debt.[7] In MEC for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Union (IMATU), a municipality was not able to meet its salary commitments to employees due to its dire financial position.[8] Acting on [1] Savage observes that the growth of municipal reliance on intergovernmental grants 'increasingly blur lines of accountability to citizens as "the point of origin and destination of funds do not match", which can create ambiguities about the actual expenditure preferences of residents.' Savage (supra) at 295 (reference omitted).

[2] FC s 230A.

[3] Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 27-35.

[4] FC s 139(4).

[5] FC s 139(5).

[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-51.

[7] See Public Finance Management Act ss 66 and 77 on the issuing of guarantees by the national and provincial governments.

[8] 2002 (2) SA 76 (SCA).

the knowledge that the municipality could not meet any claim, IMATU, the trade union acting on behalf of its members, sought an order against the provincial government to effect payment of the amounts due. Their claim was based on FC ss 139 and 154. The Court found that FC s 139 (as it then read)[1] was not applicable: a province's decision to intervene in a municipality lay within the province's discretion. FC s 154, imposing a duty on national and provincial government to support and strengthen the capacity of municipalities,[2] was also not of assistance. Assuming a court could order a province to support and strengthen a municipality, the Court held that the duty to support does not entail providing security for unpaid debts. The MFMA confirms this approach. MFMA s 51 explicitly provides that the national or provincial government guarantees a debt of any municipality only to the extent provided in chapter 8 of the Public Finance Management Act.

Failure to meet its financial commitment may further lead to the eventual attachment of municipal property to satisfy creditors' claims. Where judgment is given against a municipality, a private party may execute the judgment by means of the usual civil remedies, including the attachment and the sale in execution of municipal assets. In Mateis v Plaaslike Munisipaliteit Ngwathe & Andere[3] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that a municipality was not covered by the State Liability Act, because the Act only gives the national or provincial government immunity from attachment.[4] While the Supreme Court of Appeal is correct that the Act, dating from 1957, makes no mention of municipalities, the elevation of local government to a sphere of government in the Final Constitution places the Act at odds with the new constitutional dispensation. The Mateis Court could have read the Act so that local government is, for the purposes of the Act, to be regarded as forming part of the state.

No correction of the State Liability Act followed. Instead the MFMA, adopted after Mateis, sought a compromise — only non-core assets are subject to liquidation. As it is not a viable option to liquidate municipalities which must continue to deliver basic municipal services, there should be a limit to the extent that a monetary claim can be recovered by liquidating municipal assets. The MFMA establishes the general principle that where a municipality cannot meet its financial commitments, assets not necessary for the delivery of basic services may be liquidated in order to pay creditors. Where a municipality seeks debt relief in terms of the MFMA, it may only liquidate non-core assets.[5] Non-core assets

[1] See § 22.6*(a)*(i) infra.
[2] See § 22.6*(b)*(ii) infra.
[3] 2003 (4) SA 361 (SCA).
[4] State Liability Act 20 of 1957 s 3. After the writing of this chapter, the Constitutional Court declared s 3 of the State Liability Act unconstitutional. Nyathi v MEC for Department of Health, Gauteng & Another [2008] ZACC 8 (2 June 2008).
[5] MFMA s 154.

are defined as assets not reasonably necessary to sustain effective administration or to provide the minimum level of basic municipal services. Given this limitation on a municipality's power to meet its financial obligations, a creditor should have no greater powers of liquidating municipal assets through attachment and sale in execution.

(c) Constitutional nature of the revenue-raising powers

(i) Original powers[1]

The power of a municipality to impose a rate on property or a surcharge on user fees stems from the Constitution[2] and can thus be described in terms of the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence as an 'original' power.[3] In contrast, before the Interim Constitution, all municipal powers, including the rating power, were 'delegated' powers conferred on a local authority by another organ of state.[4] The new status of local government, first recoggnized by the Constitutional Court in Fedsure in terms of the Interim Constitution, has thus been strengthened by the revenue raising powers found in the Final Constitution.

As an original power, a municipality's power to levy rates or impose a surcharge is not dependent on enabling national legislation. This power sets it apart from a province's comparable power which, in terms of FC s 228(2)(b), must be regulated in terms of an Act of Parliament. In the absence of national legislation, a municipality may, on the basis of FC 229(1)(a) alone, levy rates and impose surcharges. The Constitutional Court thus stated: 'Now the conduct of a municipality is not always invalid only for the reason that no legislation authorizes it. Its power may derive from the Constitution or from legislation or a competent authority [national government] or from its own laws.'[5]

(ii) Legislative powers[6]

The exercise of the power to impose rates and taxes, the Constitutional Court held in Fedsure,[7] constituted a legislative act:

> It seems plain that when a legislature, whether national, provincial or local, exercises the power to raise taxes or rates, or determines appropriations to be made out of public funds,

[1] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 13-6; Kriel & Monadjem (supra).

[2] City of Cape Town v Robertson 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC)('Robertson') at para 62; CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & 'n ander v Nelson Mandela Metropolitaanse Municipaliteit en andere [2005] JOL 14785 (SE)('CDA Boerdery SE') at para 6.

[3] Robertson (supra) at para 56.

[4] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at para 39.

[5] Robertson (supra) at para 60.

[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 13-7.

[7] Fedsure (supra) at para 53-59. See also Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) at para 17. See also § 22.3*(a)* supra.

> it is exercising a power that under our Constitution is a power peculiar to elected legislative bodies. It is a power that is exercised by democratically elected representatives after due deliberation.[1]

The fact that the setting of rates is a legislative act does not imply, however, that such act is unbounded. The Constitutional Court emphasized in Fedsure that a council is still bound by the principle of legality, a core element of the foundational constitutional commitment to the rule of law.[2] The principle of legality requires that a council functions in terms of the Final Constitution and the constraints it imposes on the local government, and that any legislation is legitimately adopted in terms of the Final Constitution. To the extent that a local government acts 'in breach of one of the direct and mandatory provisions of chapter 10 [of the Interim Constitution relating to local government] it is clear that that infringement will be in breach of the Constitution and subject to constitutional challenge.[3] The same principle applies to relevant regulatory provisions imposed constitutionally by the national legislature or provincial legislatures.[4] In addition, any legislative act of a council, including the setting of rates, must be consistent with the Bill of Rights.[5]

The proposition that the imposition of taxes is a legislative act also necessitated changes to the rules for the supervision of municipalities. In its initial form, FC s 139 confined provincial intervention in a municipality only to the non-fulfilment of an executive obligation.[6] The statutory failure to impose a budget and taxes to meet the budget thus fell outside the scope of provincial intervention. To meet this failure in municipal governance, the Final Constitution was amended to mandate an intervention where a municipality fails to pass a budget or to impose sufficient revenue-raising measures.[7]

As the legislative acts of approving a budget and imposing revenue-raising measures lies at the heart of municipal governance, they are functions that only the municipal council may perform. FC s 160(2) thus determines that such functions as approving a budget, imposing rates and other taxes, levies and duties and raising loans may not be delegated by a municipal council. Moreover, given the importance of the function, these decisions must be taken by a municipal council with the supporting vote of a majority of council members.[8]

(iii) Division of powers between district and local municipalities

Because jurisdiction is shared by district and local municipalities in non-metropolitan areas, the fiscal powers and functions must also be divided among the

[1] Fedsure (supra) at para 45.
[2] Ibid at para 56. See also CDA Boerdery SE (supra) at para 6.
[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 53.
[4] Ibid at para 53
[5] Ibid at para 54.
[6] See further § 22.6*(d)* infra.
[7] See further § 22.6*(e)* infra.
[8] FC s 160(3). See § 22.2*(c)* infra.

two. The Final Constitution thus requires that 'an appropriate division' of these powers be made in terms of national legislation.[1] This division may be made after Parliament has taken into account at least the following criteria:[2]

(a) the need to comply with sound principles of taxation;
(b) the powers and functions performed by each municipality;
(c) the fiscal capacity of each municipality;
(d) the effectiveness and efficiency of raising taxes, levies and duties; and
(e) equity.

The first criterion deals with general principles of sound taxation that should include the avoidance of double taxation. In the case of property rates, the Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act has allocated this power to local municipalities, allowing districts to impose rates only on those areas falling outside the jurisdiction of local municipalities, namely district management areas.[3] The second criterion follows on the division of functions; where a district municipality is the direct service provider to end-users, such as water and sanitation, the power to impose a surcharge should flow from the power to charge fees for services rendered. The third criterion introduces a measure of flexibility; the legislation should be flexible enough to allow for differentiation between municipalities. Such flexibility suggests a certain degree of executive discretion in accommodating fiscal capacity. Whereas fiscal capacity relates to the available revenue base, the next criterion seeks to accommodate the skill and the capacity of a municipality to collect taxes. Again, this criterion promotes individualized assessment. The last criterion is a broad all-encompassing consideration. The term 'equity' is used in the Final Constitution to denote fairness in the allocation of resources as judged from the perspective of need.[4] However, a strict division of powers is not necessary. The Final Constitution explicitly provides that '[n]othing in this section precludes the sharing of revenue raised in terms of [FC s 229] between municipalities that have fiscal power and functions in the same area.'[5] This provision allowed the district municipalities to share the RSC levies they collected in the district with the local municipalities. In terms of the Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Act, the Minister of Finance may make regulations regarding an appropriate division of fiscal powers and functions between district and local municipalities having the same fiscal powers and functions with regard to the same area.[6]

(iv) Discretionary powers

As we have noted, the power to impose taxes is an 'original power': it grants a municipality the authority to decide how and when to exercise the power. The

[1] FC s 229(3).
[2] FC s 229(3).
[3] Act 6 of 2004 s 2(2)(a).
[4] See Nico Steytler 'Public Funding of Represented Political Parties Act 103 of 1997 and the Implementation of section 236 of the 1996 Constitution' (1998) 2 Law, Democracy and Development 243.
[5] FC s 229(4).
[6] Act 12 of 2007 s 10(1)(b).

decision not to impose taxes is constrained by the need to raise sufficient income to balance the budget. A failure to balance the budget may lead to a provincial intervention in terms of FC s 139. Where a municipality does not fulfil an obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation to approve any 'revenue-raising measures necessary to give effect to the budget', the provincial executive is obliged to intervene, including taking the necessary steps to ensure that those revenue-raising measures are taken.[1]

How the municipality balances its books through the use of its revenue-raising powers falls to the discretion of the municipality. Budlender AJ's view is that there is no principle of law that a property rate could not be charged to cover the cost of services where the costs of consumption of the service can be attributed to individual ratepayers.[2] This assumption is given further expression in the Systems Act. The definition of a municipal service makes it clear that a municipality is not obliged to levy fees, charges or tariffs in respect of the services it provides.[3] A municipality therefore has a choice as to whether to recover costs of a service through levying rates or charging service fees.

(v) Authorization of further taxing powers

In terms of FC s 229(1)(b) a municipality's access to other taxes may be authorized by national legislation. However, such a tax falls within in the discretion of the national government; there is no constitutional claim that the national government must give such authorization. This position is apparent when contrasted with the taxing powers of provinces. In terms of FC s 228(1), a province may impose taxes, levies and duties (excluding some taxes and duties) and a flat-rate surcharge on some national taxes. This power cannot be exercised in the absence of some regulatory national legislation.[4] However, one could argue that the national government is under a constitutional obligation to provide such regulatory legislation. It cannot deny a province its constitutional taxing power by simply failing to adopt such legislation. In contrast, a municipality cannot claim that it is entitled to any additional taxing powers. The language of the Final Constitution is clear: only 'if authorized' does the taxing power arise.

It may be further argued that the national government must exercise its discretion in a rational way. Where local government is starved of resources with ever increasing obligations to provide basic services (and especially free basic services to the indigent[5]), a blanket refusal to authorize further taxes may be tested against the criterion of rationality. Where authority for a new tax is given in national legislation, the detail of such taxing powers may be further regulated in that legislation.[6] As we will argue below, such regulations should allow some

[1] FC s 139(4). See further § 22.6*(e)* infra.
[2] Ratepayers Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BLCR 1328 (C) at para 56.
[3] Systems Act s 1(1) 'municipal service'.
[4] FC s 228(2)(b).
[5] On the government policy of free basic services, see Tim Mosdell 'Free Basic Services: The Evolution and Impact of Free Basic Water Policy in South Africa' in Udesh Pillay, Richard Tomlinson & Jacques de Toit (eds) Democracy and Delivery: Urban Policy in South Africa (2006) 283.
[6] FC s 229(2)(b).

scope for municipalities to determine the contours of such taxes. The national government does not have the authority to grant additional taxing powers to local government (e.g., to charge income tax, value-added tax, general sale's tax or customs duty.)[1]

(d) Supervision of the exercise of a municipality's revenue-raising powers

The exercise by a municipality of its revenue-raising powers is subject to supervision by both the national government and provincial governments. At the national level, a regulatory framework may be provided for the exercise of 'original' taxing powers. Such a framework should, however, be informed by intergovernmental relations. However, national or provincial intervention may still occur when the manner in which the power exercised falls foul of the normative framework provided in the Final Constitution.

(i) Regulatory framework

The supervisory power of the national government is restricted to regulating the power to impose rates on property, surcharges or any other authorized tax, levy or duty. The Constitutional Court has accepted that the ordinary meaning of the word 'regulate' connotes 'a broad managing or controlling rather than direct authorization function.'[2] In exercising its regulatory function, Parliament is not at liberty to impose any type of limit or restriction on municipal powers to levy rates. Any prescription that compromises or impedes a municipality's ability to discharge its powers or to perform its functions is inconsistent with FC s 151(4) and thus open to constitutional challenge.

The regulatory framework for property rates is provided by the Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act of 2004 ('Rates Act').[3] The surcharges and other authorized taxes, levies and duties are now governed by the Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Act of 2007 (MFPFA).[4] Given that most aspects of municipal revenue raising are now governed by new order national legislation, the relevance of old order provincial ordinances has largely become moot. It has been argued that in terms of FC Chapter 13, provincial legislatures are no longer competent to deal with the regulation of municipal finances and thus provincial ordinances regulating the area were impliedly repealed.[5] Such a view of the constitutionality of provincial ordinances has not been supported by our courts. The [1] FC s 229(1)(b). The broad rubric of 'income tax' encompasess both personal income tax and corporate income tax. The reference to value-added tax and general sale's tax deals with consumer taxes at the point of sale or production. Customs duties refer to the levying of a tax or duty on the importation or exportation of goods or services.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 377. For a discussion on the regulatory framework of FC s 155(7), see § 22.3*(d)* supra.

[3] Act 6 of 2004.

[4] Act 12 of 2007.

[5] Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-46.

courts generally ask not whether an entire old ordinance or new ordinance is invalid, but rather whether specific aspects of the ordinance in question undermine the Final Constitution's treatment of local government as an autonomous sphere of government.[1]

In CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others,[2] the High Court was confronted with a provision in the Cape Provincial Ordinance[3] that required the permission of the provincial administrator (now premier) before a rate over two cents in the Rand could be imposed. Froneman J found that requiring the premier of a province to give such approval was inimical to the new constitutional dispensation: the Final Constitution clearly grants a municipality power to impose a rate.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal agreed.[5] In the majority judgment,[6] Cameron JA held that, in view of the new status of local government in terms of the Final Constitution, the requirement of obtaining the Premier's permission was impliedly repealed when s 10G of the Local Government Transition Act ('LGTA')[7] was enacted after the IC took effect and when s 10G was re-enacted after the FC took effect.[8] The approval requirement was a product of the pre-1994 dispensation, 'tailored to its hierarchy and matched to the Administrator's supervisory control over municipalities and his executive role in relation to them.'[9] Under the Final Constitution, the judge continued, the Premier enjoys no 'special supervisory powers over the exercise of local government functions, or special duties in relation to the determination of rates.'[10]

As the phasing in of the new order legislation is completed, old order provincial ordinances are either explicitly or by implication repealed. The focus of attention has shifted to the nature and the approach of the new order national legislation Courts will ask whether the manner in which municipal finances are regulated overreaches constitutionally mandated parameters. We will return to questions of regulatory overreach when dealing with rates, surcharges and other taxes below.

(ii) Procedure for adoption

Before national legislation is enacted authorizing additional taxing powers or providing a regulatory framework, the Financial and Fiscal Commission (FFC)[11]

[1] Provincial ordinances could exist side by side with the LGTA and were not repealed by implication by the LGTA. Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) at paras 44-48; Howick v uMngeni Municipality [2005] JOL 13714 (N) 7. See also CDA Boerdery SE (supra) at para 11.

[2] CDA Boerdery SE (supra).

[3] Ordinance 20 of 1974 (Cape) s 82(1).

[4] CDA Boerdery SE (supra) at para 11.

[5] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA)('CDA Boerdery').

[6] Conradie JA, in his minority judgment, argued that during the transition period no untrammelled rating powers were conferred on municipalities, thus retaining the premier's power to grant permission.

[7] Act 209 of 1993.

[8] CDA Boerdery (supra) at para 44.

[9] Ibid at para 35.

[10] Ibid at para 40.

[11] See generally Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 27-51ff.

and organized local government must have been consulted and any recommendations of the Commission must have been considered.[1] The object of consultation with the FFC is to obtain objective expert advice from a body that is concerned with intergovernmental fiscal relations. The duty to consult organized local government flows from the principle of co-operative government that when legislation affecting local government is considered, the latter's view on the matter must be sought.[2]

The duty to consult defines the form and the process of the legislative process and failure to comply with this duty may lead to the invalidation of the legislation. In Robertson v City of Cape Town & Another; Truman-Baker v City of Cape Town, the applicants argued that the Structures Amendment Act,[3] containing a provision dealing with a municipality's fiscal powers, was invalid because there was no consultation with the FFC.[4] The Cape High Court agreed. It held that since the amended section of the Structures Act was legislation envisaged by FC s 229(5),[5] consultation was required. Parliament did not request the FFC's comment on the draft provision in question, and the FCC could not, as required, formulate a response. Because consultation is a bi-lateral process, no consultation took place.[6] The High Court concluded that the law was not passed in a manner consistent with the Final Constitution and was thus invalid. In the confirmation hearing, the Constitutional Court held that the impugned legislation served only to clarify the law and thus did not invoke the consultation requirement of FC s 229(5). It thus declined to consider the constitutionality of the legislation with regard to the manner and the form of its adoption.[7]

The consultation process raises a number of questions. First, what bodies must consult with the FFC and organized local government? In Robertson, the challenge was based on Parliament's failure to consult with the FFC. Would it have mattered if the National Treasury had consulted with the FFC before the bill was tabled in Parliament? We would argue that the body consulting with the FFC is not outcome determinative. The answer to the question of whether proper consultation has occurred should, as the Constitutional Court noted, turn on the substance of the legislation. The general consultation duty in FC 154(2) suggests that legislation that affects the status, the institutions, the powers or the functions of local government must be published — as draft legislation — for public comment before it is introduced in Parliament. FC 154(2) contemplates a process that affords organized local government and the FCC, among other interested

[1] FC s 229(5).
[2] See FC s 154(1) and § 22.7*(d)* infra.
[3] Act 51 of 2002, amending s 93 of the Structures Act by adding a number of subsections dealing with provisions of LGTA s 10G(6) pertaining to the imposition of property rates.
[4] 2004 (5) SA 412 (C), 2004 (9) BCLR 950 (C)('Robertson HC').
[5] Robertson HC (supra) at para 93.
[6] Ibid at para 109.
[7] City of Cape Town & Another v Robertson & Another 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC) at paras 76-77.

parties, the opportunity to make representations regarding the substance of the bill. If substantive provisions of the bill are changed in Parliament after the consultation process (and not as a result of the consultation), then a further round of consultation should follow. FC 154(2)'s object is to ensure that these two stakeholders — amongst others — can comment on the substantive provisions of the bill.

The duty of consultation required by FC s 229(5) is more onerous than the general consultation process demanded by FC s 154(2). While the latter provision merely requires that stakeholders be afforded the opportunity to make representations (which they may or may not avail themselves of), consultation in terms of FC 229(5) entails an approach that requires the views of the stakeholders to be actively sought out. The definition of consultation in the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act (IGRFA) is instructive in this regard: consultation 'means a process whereby the views of another on a specific matter are solicited, either orally or in writing, and considered.'[1] The emphasis falls on the positive act of 'soliciting' comments and not waiting passively for representations.[2]

What are the implications of the requirement that 'recommendations of the Commission [must] have been considered'?[3] The omission of any reference to the need to consider recommendations of organized local government certainly does not mean that Parliament or the National Treasury may simply ignore any views that the South African Local Government Association (SALGA) may offer. The IGRFA definition, quoted above, correctly embraces a definition of consultation in which the solicited views of a party must be 'considered'. Thus the National Treasury can only demonstrate that the views of the FFC have been considered by giving reasons as to why the FCC's recommendations have or have not been accepted. In fact, the National Treasury does employ such a process: when introducing the annual Division of Revenue Bill, the National Treasury provides a detailed set of comments on the FFC's recommendations.

(iii) Material impact of the exercise of revenue-raising powers[4]

FC s 229(2)(a) provides that a municipality may not exercise its power to levy rates, surcharges or taxes in a way that 'materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across municipal boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour.' The provision reflects the view that the economy of the country functions as an integrated system and that actions taken at local level could have a spillover effect that could harm the national economy. The tax regime of large metropolitan municipalities, if poorly conceived, could easily have a negative impact on the national economy. National

[1] Act 13 of 2005 s 1(1) 'consultation'.

[2] See further § 22.7*(d)*(ii) infra.

[3] A similar requirement is included in the consultation process with regard to the enactment of the annual Division of Revenue Act (FC s 214(2)).

[4] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 13-23.

interests are captured, in the Final Constitution and in relevant statutes, by such terms expressed as 'national economic policies' and the 'national mobility' of goods, services, capital and labour.[1] Municipal tax policies could also be deemed constitutionally suspect if they have a much more localized detrimental effect. The exercise of taxing powers that prejudices 'economic activities across municipal boundaries' is also proscribed. The proscribed conduct in both cases should be both material and unreasonable. For example, if a small municipality with an insignificant impact on the national economy increases its rates above the national government's inflation targets, it may be deemed unreasonable (in so far as it formally appears to prejudice national economic policy). However, given the insignificance of the tax, the court may find that the requirement of materiality has not been met.

The prohibition applies to the exercise of original and authorized taxing powers and deals with the manner in which they are exercised. Two issues have emerged in this context. First, can the courts give effect to the principles of good tax behavior? Second, how can the national government police tax behaviour proactively and reactively?

The first question was addressed in CDA Boerdery v Nelson Mandela Metro.[2] The applicants claimed that the drastic increase in rates on agricultural land would prejudice national economic policy. While not giving a final answer to the question, Froneman J suggested two reasons why courts should be cautious when approaching this question. First, a matter of national economic policy (or any of the matters listed in FC s 229(2)(a)) must be set within the context of cooperative government set out in FC Chapter 3. With reference to the duty to avoid litigation in settling intergovernmental disputes, the judge noted that courts have a limited role to play in the settlement of such disputes. Because the dispute before court centred around 'national economic policies', the matter could not be resolved without identifying the relevant national organs of state in the different spheres as parties. Second, given the nature of the matters listed in FC s 229(2)(a), the courts are not well equipped to judge when a rates policy materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies or activities. In as much as courts generally do not want to pronounce on the merits of policies decisions that raise complex questions and create polycentric conflicts, the separation of powers doctrine grants courts the space to avoid difficult problems raised by disputes over the matters listed in FC s 229(2)(a).[3] Appropriate remedies regarding such policies tend to lie outside the courts: in our democratically accountable institutions, in the commitment to cooperative government and, finally, in regularly held democratic elections. With no national organs of state joined in the proceedings,

[1] In the MFPFA 'national economic policy' is defined as including 'the tax policy for the Republic as determined by the national government' (s 1(1)).

[2] [2005] JOL 14785 (SE) at para 12.

[3] See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 46.

the High Court concluded that a judgment could thus not be made since there was no evidence of what the national economic policies were. On appeal, Cameron JA shared Froneman J's reservations about the justiciability of FC s 229(2)(a). He refrained, however, from expressing a final view on the issue.[1] He also agreed that it would be wrong for the SCA to decide on the matter without first hearing the national government's view on the subject.[2]

Two conclusions can be drawn from CDA Boedery. First, the courts are naturally reluctant to become parties to disputes over macro-economic policy. Second, since the primary actors in the matter are the national government and the municipality, FC Chapter 3 requires that a political solution should first be sought before the courts are approached.[3]

Can the national legislation prescribe beforehand what should be regarded as taxing behaviour falling foul of FC s 229(2)(a)? In the legislation on municipal finance, the constitutional restrictions on the imposition of taxes are repeated in the Rates Act [4] and the MFPFA.[5] The details of the enforcement mechanisms are discussed under rates[6] and taxes.[7] In seeking to enforce the prescripts of sound taxing practice, the national government can preemptively prescribe what behaviour would fall foul of FC 229(2)(a) by using its regulatory powers in terms of FC s 229(2)(b). To deal with national economic policy concerns, such as inflation targeting, it should be permissible to set maximum increases in rates and taxes. It is thus constitutionally permissible to state that one of the objects of the MFPFA is to ensure that municipal fiscal powers and functions are exercised in a manner that accords with FC s 229(2)(a).[8] In seeking to regulate the potentially deleterious consequences of surcharges, the MFPFA focuses on setting an upper limit for all municipalities (or a class of municipalities). However, as argued below, such regulatory prescriptions should not impede the ability of a municipality to perform its functions. A further question is whether, given the regulatory nature of supervision, the Minister of Finance can intervene with respect to an individual municipality to assert the principle and interests articulated in FC s 229(2)(a)? This question is addressed in the discussion of capping rates of a specified municipality.[9]

[1] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA) at para 46.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See Uthukela District Municpality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC). See, generally, Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Barry Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 14-8.
[4] See also Rates Act s 16(1).
[5] See MFPFA s 2*(b)*.
[6] See § 22.5*(e)*(ii) infra.
[7] See § 22.5*(g)* infra.
[8] MFPFA s 2*(b)*.
[9] See § 22.5*(e)*(ii) infra.

(e) Rates

(i) Defining property rates

Property rates have historically been associated with local government in most countries.[1] It has developed a standard meaning overtime, a meaning that the Supreme Court of Appeal has endorsed.[2] The Supreme Court of Appeal accepted the dictionary and ordinary meaning of rates as 'the assessment levied by local authorities at so much per pound of assessed value of buildings or land owned'.[3] There are thus two elements to rates: the property must be valued and a rate in a money unit (so many cents in the Rand) is set. The rates due are then the value of property multiplied by the rate. This meaning of rates, the Gerber Court found, was not changed by the new constitutional dispensation.[4] However, the constitutional power of levying property rates has acquired an independent meaning. For example, a service 'charge' based not on consumption but as a rate against the value of the property, is a property rate, whatever it may otherwise be called.[5]

(ii) Municipal powers over the setting and collection of rates

The Rates Act sets out in detail how a municipality ought to proceed to set and to collect property rates. A municipality must first adopt a rates policy which is then translated into a by-law. Each year the council must adopt a resolution that sets the rates for the next financial year. However, this chapter limits its analysis to the constitutional dimensions of this process.

In setting a rates policy, the municipality makes choices with regard to properties that may be excluded from being rated, that may differentially rated with respect to different categories of property and categories of residents that may receive rebates on the rates due. While the Rates Act gives considerable scope for local policy choices, it structures a council's discretion to a limited degree. Firstly, a rates policy must allow the municipality to promote the objects of local government, namely local, social and economic development.[6] In pursuing these objects, the Constitutional Court said in Fedsure that 'it is a legitimate aim and function for local government to eliminate the disparities and disadvantages that are a consequence of the policies of the past and to ensure, as rapidly as possible, the upgrading of services in the previously disadvantaged areas so that equal services will be provided to all residents.'[7]

---

[1] Richard Bird & Enid Slack 'Introduction and Overview' in Richard Bird & Enid Slack (eds) International Handbook of Land and Property Taxation (2004) 10.

[2] Gerber & Others v MEC for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng, & Another 2003 (2) SA 344 (SCA) ('Gerber'). See also Ratepayers Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C)('Ratepayers Action Group') at para 52.

[3] Gerber (supra) at para 23.

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ratepayers Action Group (supra) at para 68.

[6] Rates Act s 3(3)(i).

[7] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at para 80.

The second broad requirement is that the policy must treat ratepayers 'equitably'.[1] In contrast to the right to equal treatment of persons in the same position, 'equity' refers to the broad concept of fairness. Fairness possesses at least three connotations. The first connotation, as used in the Final Constitution[2] and by the Constitutional Court,[3] refers to acting in the interest of those in need. Owners of valuable properties cannot complain that they must pay a form of wealth tax that will be used to cover the costs of services for the poor. The second connotation relates to the differential treatment of different categories of ratepayers. How should the proper balance be struck between promoting industrial development — by offering businesses low rates on industrial properties — and residential property owners who are often asked to carry the bulk of the overall rates charged? The third connotation engages the exchange relationship between the ratepayer and the municipality: is it fair that agricultural land, which receives hardly any services, is rated in the same manner as urban properties that receive extensive municipal services? While this elusive concept of 'equity' is justiciable,[4] a court will be reluctant to interfere in a council's view of what is equitable. Rate policies entail, by definition, policy choices which lie at the core of municipal autonomy.

While the Rates Act provides an open structure for the development of local policy, it also permits the Minister to prescribe, by regulation, a framework that may deal with such important features as exemptions, rebates and reductions.[5] The Minister may also determine that the rate on non-residential properties may not exceed a prescribed ratio to the rate on residential properties.[6] However, such a national framework should not have the effect of compromising or impeding a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers.[7] It follows then that the

[1] Rates Act s 3(3)(a).
[2] See FC ss 155(4), 214 and 236.
[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 80.
[4] See also Howick District Landowners Association v uMgeni Municipality [2005] JOL 13714 (N) 19.
[5] Rates Act s 3(5).
[6] Rates Act s 19(1)(b).
[7] An example of regulation that may fall foul of the constitutional parameters are draft regulations (Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act (6/2004) Government Gazette 30584, GN 1172 (19 December 2007)) proposing rate ratios between residential and non-residential categories of properties, including that rates on state-owned properties may not be more than 25% of the rate on residential properties. Apart from questions about the rationality of the ratios proposed, in imposing a very low maximum on the rate for state-owned properties, the national government may be compromising or impeding a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or to perform its functions within the meaning of FC s 151(4). A municipality is entitled to impose rates as long as it does not unreasonably prejudice national economic policies; economic activities across boundaries; or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour. None of these goals is served by the proposed ratio for state-owned property. The regulations have the effect of depriving municipalities who service substantial state properties from legitimate and much needed revenue collection. While it may be argued that the rates bills for national, provincial and other state-owned properties are settled from the same national revenue fund from which local government grants are apportioned, such settlements can not eclipse the obvious violation of FC s 151(4).

framework should not have the effect of removing policy choices from a council and determining all rate-making outcomes. Should the national legislation have such an effect, it will not be regarded as merely regulating the rating power of a municipality in terms of FC s 229(2)(b) and should be found constitutionally infirm.

In terms of the Rates Act, the annual rates resolution may also be structured by national intervention. The Minister for Local Government may, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, set an upper limit on the percentage by which rates in general or on a specific category of property may be increased. The Minister has a wide discretion and may set different levels for different kinds of municipalities. These different levels may reflect the different categories of municipalities or take some other consideration into account.[1] In individual cases, the Minister may also exempt a municipality that has, in writing, shown good cause why it should be exempted from the upper limit set.[2] Again, the key question is whether an imposed maximum allows a sufficient discretion for the municipality to exercise its constitutionally recognized powers. If the maximum in effects predetermines the outcome of the municipality's choice, by allowing little or no discretion, the bounds of permissible regulation may well be overstepped.[3]

The Rates Act also empowers the Minister for Local Government to intervene in an individual municipality when he or she deems that the rate does not comply with FC s 229(2)(a).[4] The process may be iniated by complaints from the private sector or the Minister may initiate the process. Where the Minister is convinced that the rate on a specific category of property materially and unreasonably prejudices any of the matters listed in FC s 229(2)(a), the municipality must be given notice that the rate will be limited as specified in the notice.[5] The notice must give reasons why the rate is in conflict with FC s 229(2)(a)'s criteria.[6]

Is the ministerial power consistent with the Final Constitution? That is, given that the determination of a rate is a legislative act, can the minister intervene in a

[1] Rates Act s 20(2)(a).

[2] Rates Act s 20(3).

[3] Another good example of regulatory overreach are the recent draft regulations: 'Local Government: Municipal Property Rates Act (6/2004)' Government Gazette 30583, GN 1171 (19 December 2007). These regulations prescribe an upper limit on the percentage by which rates on properties or a rate on a specific category of properties may be increased. The upper limit, proposed in the draft regulations, is the Consumer Price Index (excluding interest rate on mortgage bonds) as published by Statistics South Africa. Where the actual upper limit that is prescribed provides insufficient scope for municipalities to set their rates in a manner that allows them to meet their expenditure, a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers is compromised and the upper limit falls foul of FC s 151(4). We would argue that the determination of a generic ceiling, linked to a standard inflation benchmark, such as the Consumer Price Index, deprives municipalities of any flexibility in effecting policy choices through rates increases. A municipality that, for example, wishes to differentiate rates increases among categories of property will be prevented from doing so as a result of this regulation. Increasing property rates on a specific class of properties to finance special infrastructure projects is not possible under this new configuration.

[4] Rates Act s 16(2)(a).

[5] Rates Act s 16(2)(a) and (3)(b).

[6] Rates Act s 16(4).

municipality's legislative domain? In CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others,[1] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the requirement in the Cape Provincial Ordinance[2] requiring that the premier of a province had to approve municipal rates was impliedly repealed by the LGTA because it was inconsistent with the new status of local government. The CDA Boerdery court quite consciously expressed no opinion as to whether legislation enacted in terms of FC s 229(2)(b) can allow the premier to approve — or reject — municipal rates.[3] The CDA Boerdery court also expressed no opinion on the curbs on municipalities' rating powers in terms of the Property Rates Act. It does, however describe s 16 of the Property Rates Act as conferring 'limited and carefully defined powers of supervision and limitation regarding rates on the Cabinet member responsible for local government.'[4]

In our view, the constitutionality of this power is questionable. This power does not constitute regulation, as permitted by FC s 229(2)(b). It does not set a framework in terms of which all municipalities must operate. It is exercised in respect of a single municipality in the form of a directive with which a municipality must comply. Such regulatory interference by the Minister flies in the face of the Constitutional Court's clear attempt in Fedsure to protect the integrity of the council's legislative authority.

(ii) The process of determining market value of properties

A key element of property rates is the value of the rated property. The rated value is the market value of the property and any improvements.[5] As the market value is a highly contested issue, the Rates Act has provided for an elaborate system of determining such value. The valuation is done by a municipal valuer who is appointed by the municipality. After the compilation of the valuation roll, it is opened for objections by the public and the municipality. If a complaint is not upheld by the valuer, then an appeal lies with a valuation appeal board. The decision of the board is final and binding on the municipality. The composition of this body, charged with giving an independent and impartial reassessment of the valuer's decision, raises constitutional questions regarding municipal autonomy. Under the current scheme, the provincial government plays an important role in the creation of the appeals boards.

The MEC for Local Government establishes a number of valuation appeal boards required for the needs of the municipalities. He or she appoints between two and four members to each board as well as its chairperson. All serve for a

[1] CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk & Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA)('CDA Boerdery').
[2] Ordinance 20 of 1974 s 82(1).
[3] CDA Boerdery (supra) at para 41.
[4] Ibid at para 42 fn 27.
[5] Rates Act s 11(1)(a).

renewable period of four years.[1, 2] The MEC, in addition, may remove a member on the ground of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence.[3] The boards have the same investigative powers as a municipal valuer, and its hearings are not merely appeals on the record of the lower tribunal. They are full rehearings of the entire matter. All costs incurred in the adjudicatory forum, including review in a High Court,[4] are borne by the municipality.[5]

This framework raises two questions. First, what is the justification for the provincial intervention? The appointment of valuation appeal boards creates provincially appointed structures that take a final decision on municipal actions. The presumable rationale for this method of appointment is that a body other than the municipality must ensure that an independent and impartial body is the final decision-maker on valuations. The underlying assumption is that a municipality could not be trusted to make such appointments because it has a vested interest in the outcome of any appeal. In the past, under the various provincial ordinances, this task was given to a valuation court presided over by a judicial officer.[6]

Second, what is the constitutional basis for the provincial entry into the valuation process? Whatever merit this 'independence' rationale may have, there does not appear to be a sound constitutional basis for provincially appointed appeal boards. The constitutional scheme of local autonomy places a large amount of discretion in the hands of the municipalities to make decisions on a wide range of issues. Yet, no right of appeal to the provincial government (or bodies appointed by the provincial or national government) is afforded residents on other matters. For example, no right to appeal to provincial government exists with respect to municipal planning or zoning matters. As we have already noted, the national government and provincial governments have limited powers of supervision: namely regulation, monitoring, support and intervention. The appointment of appeal boards exceeds the accepted understanding of regulation — and it constitutes neither monitoring nor support. Finally, it is also not an intervention in terms of FC s 139. Does it matter that it is not the MEC that makes the decision but a body independent from the MEC that is entrusted with the task of making a final determination? Does the fact that the boards do not fall under the control of the provinces make a difference? We think not because final decisions on local government matters are made by institutions falling outside the domain of local government. Furthermore, if independence and impartiality are the objectives, the national framework could easily have provided for appeal tribunals appointed by the municipalities themselves. In the absence of a clear constitutional basis for the boards, the provincially appointed appeal boards are certainly constitutional suspect.

[1] Rates Act ss 58(1) and 60.
[2] Rates Act s 51. The Minister for local government provides a regulatory framework for the conditions of appointment of the members.
[3] Rates Act s 63(1)(c) and (2).
[4] Rates Act s 76(2).
[5] Rates Act s 76(2).
[6] See, for example, Natal Local Authorities Ordinance 25 of 1974 s 160.

(f) Surcharges

The second original taxing source is 'surcharges on fees for services provided by or on behalf of the municipality'.[1] A surcharge is defined in the Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Act ('MFPFA') as 'a charge in excess of the municipal base tariff that a municipality may impose on fees for a municipal service provided by or on behalf of a municipality'.[2] A municipal base tariff is defined, in turn, as 'the fees necessary to cover the actual cost associated with the rendering of a municipal service'.[3] This tax is a charge not in return for a service and, consequently, can be used for a purpose not necessarily related to the service for which it has been collected.

The imposition of surcharges is now regulated by the MFPFA. Recognizing that the competence of a municipality to impose a surcharge flows from the Final Constitution, the object of the Act, on its face, is merely to regulate the exercise of this power. The Act thus provides that the Minister of Finance may prescribe 'national norms and standards' for imposing municipal surcharges. Such surcharges may include maximum surcharges.[4] The norms and standards relating to maxima on surcharges may also provide bands or ranges within which municipal surcharges may be imposed.[5] This statutory authorization for further regulation by the Minister of Finance provides a very loose structure. As we have argued above, the essential aspect of the regulation is that it must provide for a framework within which municipalities can determine outcomes. The reference to national norms and standards appears to meet this criterion. It does not prescribe outcomes. However, the actual determination of such maxima or bands or ranges in which surcharges may be set will determine whether the municipal surcharges are permissible. If they leave little or no discretion, the rate of municipal surcharges has effectively been set. Such a result would appear to be beyond the constitutionally permissible regulatory competence of the national government.

(g) Other taxes, levies and duties

The MFPFA follows an even more restrictive approach to the imposition of other taxes, duties and levies. This approach may likewise exceed constitutionally permitted regulation of municipal affairs.

[1] FC s 229(1).

[2] Act 12 of 2007 s 1(1).

[3] MFPFA s 1(1). 'Actual costs' include the following: '(a) bulk purchasing costs in respect of water and electricity reticulation services and other municipal services; (b) overhead, operation and maintenance costs; (c) capital costs; (d) a reasonable rate of return, if authorised by a regulator of or the Minister responsible for that municipal service.' MFPFA s 1(1).

[4] MFPFA s 8(1). The maximum may be expressed as a ratio, a percentage of the municipal base tariff or a Rand value. MFPFA s 8(2)(a)(i).

[5] MFPFA s 8(2)(a)(ii).

As we have argued above, the granting of additional taxing powers falls within the discretionary competence of the national government. The MFPFA s 4(1) enables the Minister of Finance, on his or her own initiative or at the request of a municipality, a group of municipalities or organized local government, to authorize a municipal tax. The Act further prescribes a consultative and timely process that the Minister must follow before he or she authorizes a municipal tax by prescribing it in regulations. Where the process is initiated by local government, the Act prescribes an extensive list of requirements the application must meet. These desiderata require the municipality to demonstrate that the proposed tax complies with FC s 229(2)(a) and does amount to a tax prohibited by FC s 229(1)(b).[1] Where the Minister rejects an application, reasons must be provided for such a decision.[2] The Minister's decision must, however, be framed by a number of constitutionally-relevant considerations. Principles of co-operative government, in terms of FC s 154(1), require that the national government must by legislative measures support and strengthen the capacity of municipalities to manage their own affairs and exercise their powers and functions. Where the additional revenue is important to this end, it becomes a compelling reason for ministerial approval. On the other hand, the taxation principles of FC s 229(2)(a) could weigh against the further imposition of taxes. Unless the Minister can show that the proposed tax would prejudice any of the stated tax objectives of FC s 229(2)(a), the Minister may be bound — by the Final Constitution — to grant the application.

Where the Minister approves an application, the new tax is extensively regulated. It is in the extent of this tax regulation that the contrast with the regulation of a surcharge is apparent. Not only must the regulations determine the tax base on which the tax is to be levied but also the rate at which the tax may be levied.[3] The only exception is where the tax is not a specific purpose tax or a tax levied on the same tax base as that of national taxes. In such cases, the Minister may determine the bands or ranges within which the tax may be imposed.[4] As the Minister determines the most important outcome of the tax by setting the rate, it is no longer regulation but amounts to determination. As we have argued above, original and authorized taxing powers are subject only to regulation.[5] Statutory powers which exceed the express constitutional parameters of regulation ought to be found constitutionally infirm.

(h) Borrowing[6]

FC s 230 initially provided a similar framework for provincial and local government borrowing. In a constitutional amendment in 2001, municipal borrowing

[1] MFPFA s 5(1)(c) and (d).
[2] MFPFA s 5(3).
[3] MFPFA s 6*(c)*(i) and (ii).
[4] MFPFA s 6*(c)*(ii)(bb).
[5] FC s 229(2)(b).
[6] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 12-27.

was removed from the section and placed in FC s 230A. The amendment effected a number of important changes.[1] First, whereas the old FC s 230 provided that national legislation could only impose 'reasonable conditions' for the raising of loans for capital or current expenditure, FC s 230A omits any reference to 'reasonable conditions'. This omission may give Parliament a freer hand to impose conditions as it pleases. Second, in a new paragraph, a municipal council may 'bind itself and a future Council in the exercise of its legislative and executive authority to secure loans or investments for the municipality'.[2] The object of this provision is to provide greater security for long-term loans.

The constitutional framework for municipal loans entails, first, that the council's power to raise loans must the exercised in accordance with national legislation.[3] Second, loans may be raised for current expenditure,[4] but only when necessary for bridging purposes during a financial year. Third, loans for capital expenditure are permissible. In such a case, a council may bind itself and a future council in the exercise of its legislative and executive authority to secure loans or investments for the municipality.[5] Fourth, before enacting any authorising national legislation, any recommendation of the Finance and Fiscal Commission must be considered.[6] Fifth, listed among the functions that a municipal council may not delegate to any other body or person is 'the raising of loans'.[7]

(i) Short-term debt

In giving effect to the Final Constitution, the Municipal Finance Management Act ('MFMA') provides that a municipality may incur short-term debt only when necessary to bridge shortfalls within a financial year and in expectation of specific and realistic anticipated income to be received within that financial year.[8] A short-term loan may also be incurred for capital needs within a financial year when they will be repaid from specific funds to be received from an enforceable transfer[9] by another organ of state or long-term debt commitment.[10]

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 34 of 2001 s 17.
[2] FC s 230A(1)(b).
[3] FC s 230A(1).
[4] See Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 27-35 (Current expenditure is defined by the authors as salaries, wages, goods and services utilised by government and transfers and subsidies.)
[5] FC s 230A(1)(b).
[6] FC s 230A(2). See Robertson v City of Cape Town & Another; Truman-Baker v City of Cape Town 2004 (9) BCLR 950 (C)(On the meaning and significance of the consultation duty.).
[7] FC s 160(2)(d).
[8] Act 56 of 2000 s 45(1)(a).
[9] A transfer or an allocation refers to a municipality's equitable share, a conditional grant from the national government, a grant in the provincial budget or an allocation from another municipality or organ of state which is not in terms of a commercial or business transaction (MFMA s 1(1) 'allocation').
[10] MFMA s 45(1)(b).

(ii) Long-term debt

The primary purpose of a long-term loan, defined as a debt 'repayable over a period exceeding a year',[1] is for capital expenditure on property, plant or equipment that will be used in pursuit of achieving the constitutional objects of local government.[2] A secondary purpose may be to re-finance existing long-term debt.[3] Capital expenditure may include financing costs,[4] costs of professional services directly related to the capital expenditure and such other costs as the National Treasury may prescribe.[5] An elaborate process must be followed before a municipality binds itself to long-term debt: this process allows for public input and input from the National Treasury.[6]

The import of the provision that a council has the authority to 'bind itself and a future Council in the exercise of its legislative and executive authority to secure loans or investments for the municipality' is not clear.[7] The redemption of many, if not most, long-term loans would extend beyond the five year term of the council. All loans taken out in the last year of a council's term would burden the next elected council. Where a council concludes a long-term loan contract, the municipality is bound by such contract beyond the life of the council that passed the resolution. If the successor council fails to honour its predecessor's contractual obligations, then it would be legally liable. If a successor council reneges on the loan by passing a legislative act to cancel the contract, then it could still be liable for a constitutional claim for the deprivation of property. The failure to meet its financial commitments may also lead to a provincial intervention.[8] The impetus for this constitutional provision most likely lies in the desire of the drafters of the Final Constitution to enable a municipality to maintain a predetermined tariff policy in order to repay a loan.[9]

A municipality may provide security for any of its debt obligations, any debt obligation of a municipal entity under its sole control, or contractual obligations of the municipality undertaken in connection with the outsourcing of municipal services.[10] Security may be provided for through a wide variety of measures.[11] Any security commitment must be approved by a resolution of the council.[12] The

[1] MFMA s 1(1).
[2] MFMA s 46(1)(a).
[3] MFMA s 46(1)(b).
[4] Such finace costs include capitalised interest for a reasonable initial period, costs associated with security arrangements, discounts and fees in connection with the financing, fees for legal, financial, advisory, trustee, credit rating and other services directly connected to the financing. MFMA s 46(4)(a).
[5] MFMA s 46(4).
[6] MFMA s 46(3).
[7] FC s 230A(1)(b).
[8] FC s 139(5).
[9] See Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-12.
[10] MFMA s 48(1). See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 12-30.
[11] MFMA s 48(2).
[12] MFMA s 48(1).

council bears the obligation to ensure that any security given does not impede its constitutional mandate of providing basic municipal services. The council resolution must state whether the asset, or right subject to the security, is necessary for providing the minimum level of basic municipal services.[1] If it is, then the resolution must indicate the manner in which the availability of the asset or right for the provision of basic services will be protected.[2] The use of the secured asset or right by the lender or investor is also restricted. Where the resolution reflects a determination that the secured asset or right is necessary for providing the minimum level of basic services, the security holder may not deal with the asset or right in a manner that would preclude or impede the continuation of that minimum level of service provision.[3] Where the council resolution reflects no such determination, the council remains bound to pay the secured debt in full.[4]

(f) Transfers

The Final Constitution provides for two forms of transfers: (1) an entitlement to an equitable share of the revenue raised nationally and (2) other grants (either conditional or not) from the national government's share of the revenue raised nationally. Provinces may also provide grants to municipalities.

(g) Equitable share

Local government is entitled to an 'equitable share of the revenue raised nationally to enable it to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to it'.[5]

(i) Nature of entitlement

The use of the term 'entitlement' to an equitable share suggests an enforceable claim on the revenue raised nationally. It would appear that the standard employed to determine whether such a claim is enforceable is the rather vague principle of equity elaborated in FC s 214. However vague this principle may be, local government's claim to an equitable share is justiciable. At least that was the conclusion reached by the Natal High Court in Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[6] In the first Division of Revenue Act (DORA)[7] after the December 2000 local government elections and the establishment of local and district municipalities, no allocations were made with respect to district municipalities. This omission was challenged by a number of district municipalities in KwaZulu-Natal. The High Court held that FC s 214

[1] MFMA s 48(3)(a). See s 1(1) MFMA for the definition of 'basic municipal service'.
[2] MFMA s 48(3)(a).
[3] MFMA s 48(4).
[4] MFMA s 48(5).
[5] FC s 227(1). See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 12-7.
[6] 2002 (5) BCLR 479 (N)('Uthekela HC').
[7] Act 1 of 2001.

did not allow an entire category of municipality to be deprived of an equitable share where the clear intention of FC s 214 was that an entitlement accrued to local government as a whole.[1] District municipalities, forming part of the local sphere of government, are thus entitled to their equitable share because without such a share these municipalities would not be able to discharge the duties they have to their community. Moreover, the High Court concluded, a denial of an equitable share would likely threaten the very existence of many municipalities.[2] The High Court declared s 5(1) of the DORA 2001 invalid. When the confirmation hearing before the Constitutional Court took place, the 2001 DORA had already been repealed and the 2002 DORA did not exclude district municipalities in the equitable share division. The Constitutional Court declined to exercise its discretion to consider the invalidity of the repealed provision because, among other factors, the applicants did not seek to resolve the dispute by other means before approaching the High Court.[3]

The High Court's decision is certainly correct. Apart from the general proposition that virtually all of the provisions of the Final Constitution are justiciable, an enforceable claim to revenue raised nationally gives effect to the overall constitutional scheme of decentralized government. If the principal recipient of income tax is the national government, and the national government controls the conditions of additional sources of revenue, the only means of securing access of adequate funding to enable local government to 'perform basic services',[4] is to have a claim to a portion of the money in the national fiscus. This argument is a fortiori most compelling for provinces. The provinces are almost entirely dependent on national transfers. It is equally compelling for those municipalities without an adequate tax base.

In contrast to the entitlement of each province, FC s 227(2) refers only to 'local government' in general. In Uthekela, a category of municipalities, the districts, successfully argued that local government includes all the categories of municipalities. The question is, now, whether the entitlement can be enforced by individual municipalities for their own individual benefit. Could it be argued that when a municipality turns a surplus on its budget, that, as long as transfers are made to all categories of municipalities, individually well-resources municipalities could be omitted? We submit that such an argument cannot stand. FC s 227(2) clearly indicates that an equitable share is an individual entitlement: additional revenue raised by 'municipalities may not be deducted from their share of the revenue raised nationally'. Individual effort and industry may thus not lead to a loss of the slice of the national pie. The size of that slice is determined by a constitutionally prescribed process.

[1] Uthekela HC (supra) at 491E.
[2] Ibid at 492D.
[3] Uthukela District Municpality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BLCR 1220 (CC)('Uthekela') at para 14.
[4] FC s 227(1)(a).

(ii) Prescribed process

In terms of FC s 214(1), the vertical allocation of the equitable shares between the three spheres of government must be done in terms of an Act of Parliament, the annual DORA.[1] While the horizontal split between the nine provinces of the provincial share must be included in the Act,[2] the horizontal split among the 283 municipalities is not explicitly required. The Act must also provide for any other allocation to provinces, local government or municipalities from the national share.[3] The horizontal split of local government share may take a variety of forms.

The national legislative process that must precede the adoption of the Act first requires an intergovernmental consultative process and, then, requires the consideration of a list of specified factors. This Act may be enacted only after the provincial governments, organised local government and the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been consulted.[4] The FFC is an independent institution providing advice to government and Parliament on, among other things, the allocation of the equitable shares.[5] Organised local government is represented in the FCC.[6] Again, because of the centrality of the FFC to fiscal decentralization, the duty to consult requires consideration of the FFC's proposals.[7]

(iii) Substantive principles

The substantive principles underpinning the entitlement to an equitable share are set out in the factors listed in FC s 214(2). Of the ten factors listed, four refer directly to local government. The first is 'the need to ensure that provinces and municipalities are able to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to them.'[8] Of relevance in this context would be the provision of basic municipal services and the obligations imposed by socio-economic rights.

The second factor is 'the fiscal capacity and efficiency of the provinces and municipalities'.[9] While the Act is primarily concerned with the division of revenue between the three spheres of government and the horizontal split between provinces, this factor underscores the basic law's legitimate concern about the individual fiscal capacities of municipalities. While FC s 214(2)(e) states the factor in a

[1] FC s 214(1)(a).
[2] FC s 214(1)(b).
[3] FC s 214(1)(c).
[4] FC s 214(2).
[5] FC s 220.
[6] FC s 221(1)(c).
[7] See § 22.5*(d)*(ii) supra. The constitutional process has been elaborated upon by the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997 The Act establishes a Budget Forum in which the Minister of Finance consults with the MECs for finance and organized local government. Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act s 5.
[8] FC s 214(2)(d).
[9] FC s 214(2)(e).

neutral manner, FC s 227(2) fleshes out the basic principles relating to fiscal capacity and efficiency. Any additional revenue raised by municipalities 'may not be deducted from their share of revenue raised nationally, or from other allocations made to them out of national government revenue.'[1] The Natal High Court has thus noted: 'The clear intention is that local government structures should not be penalized for showing industry and initiative in revenue gathering.'[2] The reverse applies equally. Because municipalities are entitled to raise their own revenue through property rates and surcharges, 'there is no obligation on the national government to compensate … municipalities that do not raise revenue commensurate with their fiscal capacity and tax base.'[3] Even if the Act does not make allocation to individual municipalities, the objectively determined overall capacity to raise their own income with the required measure of efficiency is a relevant factor.

The third factor is the 'developmental and other needs of provinces, local government and municipalities'.[4] It should be noted that, as with the previous factor, the needs of individual municipalities are relevant. The abstract notion of the developmental needs of 'local government' is only sensible when those needs are the sum of the needs of individual municipalities.

The fourth factor is: 'obligations of the provinces and municipalities in terms of national legislation'.[5,6] This factor implicitly recognizes the practice of unfunded mandates. Unfunded mandates occur when the national government or provincial governments delegate functions to municipalities through legislative assignment without providing them with funding necessary for the execution of the mandate.[7] Although the inclusion of the factor is necessary, it provides a weak form of protection from unfunded mandates. It does not expressly establish the constitutional principle that no obligation can exist without corresponding financing. The statutory rules in the Municipal Systems Act[8] pertaining to assignment, where the cost implications of any assignment to local government must be determined and met, are more robust.[9]

Each municipality's equitable share is calculated according to a formula. Currently, the formula consists of five components:[10] (i) a basic service component to enable municipalities to provide water, sanitation, electricity, refuse removal and other basic services; (ii) an institutional support component to enable particularly poor municipalities to fund the basic costs of administration and governance;

[1] FC s 227(2).
[2] Uthukela HC (supra) at 487G.
[3] FC s 227(2).
[4] FC s 214(2)(f).
[5] FC s 214(2)(b).
[6] As delegation of functions is effected and removed by the executive, the delegation of such functions falls outside this factor. On the assignment and delegation of functions, see § 22.3*(f)* supra.
[7] See Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-22.
[8] Act 32 of 2000.
[9] See § 22.3*(f)* supra.
[10] National Treasury Local Government Budgets and Expenditure Review 2001/02-2007/08 (2006) 232.

(iii) a development component; (iv) a revenue-raising capacity correction; and (v) a correction and stabilization factor to ensure that municipalities are given what they are promised in the two year budget projections.

Given the broad factors that bind the DORA, the question arises as to whether a court will be willing to entertain an argument that Parliament (or the National Treasury with regard to the horizontal split) have not taken into account all the factors or have not done so adequately. While a demonstrable failure to consider a listed factor should invite judicial review of the legislative process, the courts will try to avoid cases that would require them to determine the appropriate division of the national fiscus.

(iv) Payment and withholding of equitable share

A clear distinction is drawn in the Final Constitution between provinces and local government when it comes to the transfer of the equitable share. First, a province's equitable share is 'a direct charge against the National Revenue Fund.'[1] A 'direct charge' is defined by the National Treasury as a statutory or standing appropriation entailing funds earmarked, by prior legislation, for specific purposes and which may not be used for other regular annual expenditure.[2] A direct charge 'must be paid regardless of whether or not [it has] been budgeted for in the national budget.'[3] The object is to give provinces 'a measure of financial autonomy vis à vis the national budget process'.[4] The fact that local government's equitable share is not a direct charge to the National Revenue Fund implies that it does not possess the same level of autonomy and the same degree of insulation from the national budget process.

FC s 227(3) reinforces the distinction between the payment of provinces' equitable share and payment of municipalities's equitable share. FC s 227(3) refers only to provinces when it determines that the equitable share 'must be transferred promptly and without deduction, except when the transfer has been stopped in terms of section 216.' No such constitutional obligation applies to municipalities. Although municipalities receive less constitutional protection with respect to the vicissitudes of national government budget priorities, the national government is still under the overall constitutional obligation not 'to compromise or impede the ability or right of a municipality to exercise its powers or perform its functions.'[5] Any tardiness in transfers or unnecessary delays could fall foul of this obligation. While the payment schedule may be manipulated by the National Treasury, it may not have the effect of depriving a municipality of its equitable share.

[1] FC s 213(3).
[2] National Treasury Budget Review 2001 (2001) 46, quoted in Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 27-32.
[3] Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-32.
[4] Ibid at 27-33.
[5] FC s 151(4).

As the entitlement to an equitable share flows from the Final Constitution, any withholding of such revenue can only be undertaken in terms of constitutionally-sanctioned grounds. FC s 216 provides for the stopping of the transfer of funds to all organs of state that 'commit [ ] a serious or persistent material breach' of the measures prescribed by the National Treasury to ensure both 'transparency and expenditure control'.[1] While FC s 216 imposes specific safeguards when the National Treasury stops the transfer of the equitable share to provinces,[2] no such safeguard is provided to local governments.

However, as the law currently stands, the safeguards enjoyed by the provinces also apply to errant municipalities. First, a stopping is only a temporary measure; a provincial share cannot be stopped for longer than 120 days at a time;[3] a stopping cannot have the effect of depriving a province permanently of its equitable share. Second, some form of review of the decision should take place; the national Treasury's decision is reviewed by Parliament following the procedure for FC s 76 legislation (which gives the NCOP a significant participatory role).[4] Third, this rational process of decision-making must reflect the input of the Auditor-General and the affected province.[5] The MFMA reflects Parliament's decision to make a stop of transfer to a municipality subject to the same constitutional safeguards enjoyed by the provinces.[6] The National Treasury's decision must be submitted to Parliament for review. Unless Parliament approves the decision within 30 days of the Treasury's decision to stop the transfer, the stopping lapses. If the National Treasury enforces its decision immediately, as it may, the stopping lapses retrospectively if Parliament fails to approve the decision.[7] If Parliament approves of the decision, the stopping may last for only 120 days.[8] In reviewing the decision, Parliament must follow a process substantially the same as that established in terms of FC s 76: both the National Assembly and the NCOP must approve the decision. In the NCOP, provinces vote in their delegations and in a case of conflict between the two houses, the conflict settlement process must first be followed, failing which the National Assembly may override the decision of the NCOP by a two-thirds majority. Parliament may renew the decision for 120 days at a time, following the same procedure.[9] In deciding whether to approve or renew a decision, Parliament may request that the Auditor-General issues a report, and, must give the affected municipality the opportunity to answer the allegations against it.[10]

[1] FC s 216(1).
[2] FC s 216(3)-(5).
[3] FC s 216(3)-(4).
[4] FC s 216(3).
[5] FC s 216(5).
[6] FC s 216(3) and (5).
[7] MFMA s 39(1)(b).
[8] MFMA s 39(1)(a).
[9] MFMA s 39(2).
[10] MFMA s 39(3).

As the stopping of funds may undercut the objects of local government, the provincial executive must monitor the continuation of the services.[1] If as a result of the stopping of a transfer, the municipality cannot or does not fulfil its obligations with respect to the provision of those services, the provincial executive may intervene in terms of FC s 139.

(v) Usage of equitable share

While the equitable share is an entitlement to cover the costs of providing services, the actual use of the funds falls to the discretion of the municipality.[2] DORA cannot prescribe conditions for municipal spending.

(h) Conditional grants

In contrast to the equitable share transfer, additional grants, whether conditional or not, run contrary to the financial autonomy of municipalities. These grants are used by the national government to incorporate national priorities into the municipal budgets. These priorities include the promoting of national norms and standards, addressing service delivery backlogs and eliminating regional disparities in municipal infrastructure.[3]

FC s 227(1)(b) provides that local government (and each province) 'may receive other allocations from national government revenue, either conditionally or unconditionally.' In addition to providing for 'the equitable division of revenue raised nationally', an Act of Parliament must also provide for 'any other allocations to provinces, local government or municipalities from the national government's share of that revenue, and any conditions on which those allocations may be made.'[4] This Act may be enacted only after the provincial governments, organized local government and the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been consulted.[5] The conditional allocations to local government are set out in the annual DORA. The horizontal division of the allocated amounts for the grants is done administratively by the National Treasury through a notice in a government gazette. The notice indicates the share of each municipality as well as the framework for each allocation. [6] The framework refers to the conditions for and other information about each grant.[7]

While stopping the transfer or the equitable share is linked to the supervisory conditions of FC s 216(1) and subject to external safeguards, in the case of discretionary national grants, stopping is linked to the proper compliance with the conditions of the grants. The stopping can either be temporary or permanent.

[1] MFMA s 38(3).
[2] Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-18.
[3] National Treasury Local Government Budgets (supra) at 237.
[4] FC s 214(1)(c).
[5] FC s 214(2).
[6] DORA 2006 s 8(3) read with s 15(1)(b).
[7] DORA 2006 s 1(1) 'framework'.

The transferring department may withhold a transfer for a period not exceeding 30 days if (i) a municipality does not comply with conditions of the DORA or any conditions attached to the grant; or (ii) expenditure on previous transfers during the same financial year 'reflects significant under-spending, for which no satisfactory explanation is given.'[1] The permanent stopping of a transfer by the National Treasury may take place on two grounds. The first ground is persistent and material non-compliance with the DORA or a condition of the grant.[2] The second is the likely under-utilization of the grant where the National Treasury anticipates that the municipality will substantially under-spend on the allocation in that financial year.[3] In both cases there is only post-hoc parliamentary scrutiny. The national department which stopped the transfer must reflect the stopping, together with reasons, in the annual financial statements of the department.[4]

(i) Provincial transfers

The scheme of FC Chapter 13 suggests that the main function of provinces is the transmission of funds from the national government to municipalities. FC s 226(3) provides that revenue allocated through a province to local government in that province in terms of FC s 214(1) is a direct charge against the province's Revenue Fund. As outlined above, a direct charge to a provincial Revenue Fund means that the transfer is protected from the provincial budgetary process. While it would be possible to transmit a municipality's equitable share through a province, practice indicates that only some conditional grants follow this route. In a 2001 constitutional amendment, a fourth subsection was added to section 226 which provides, among other things, that national legislation may determine a framework within which revenue allocated through a province to local government must be paid to municipalities.[5] The amendment was designed, it has been suggested,[6] to maintain national regulatory control over direct charges at provincial level. No such legislation has yet been passed.

22.6 Supervision of Municipalities

(a) Introduction

The radical innovation of elevating local government to a sphere of government with its own distinctive powers and functions, including considerable original revenue-raising powers, is countered by a system of supervision in terms of which both the national government and the provincial governments exercise

[1] DORA 2006 s 18(1).
[2] DORA 2006 s 19(1)(a). MFMA s 38(1)(b) adds the general ground of the serious and persistent breach of sound financial management encapsulated in FC s 216(1).
[3] DORA 2006 s 19(1)(b).
[4] MFMA s 40.
[5] FC s 226(4) added by Act 61 of 2001 s 8.
[6] Kriel & Monadjem (supra) at 27-33.

limited but nevertheless significant control over municipalities.[1] On the balance struck between municipal autonomy and supervision by 'higher' levels of government, the Constitutional Court in the First Certification Judgment commented as follows:

> What the [New Text] seeks hereby to realise is a structure for [Local Government] that, on the one hand, reveals a concern for the autonomy and integrity of LG and prescribes a hands-off relationship between LG and other levels of government and, on the other, acknowledges the requirement that higher levels of government monitor LG functioning and intervene where such functioning is deficient or defective in a manner that compromises this autonomy. This is the necessary hands-on component of the relationship.[2]

The power of supervision, defined as 'the power of one level of government to intrude on the functional terrain of another',[3] the Constitutional Court further contended, 'may be particularly important in the field of LG, where administrative and executive structures are likely to be in need of greater support than are comparable structures in higher spheres of government.'[4]

That there was indeed need for supervision was evidenced by the number of municipalities running into trouble with respect to the management of their finances and the satisfaction of their constitutional obligations. Such basic obligations as the passing of an annual budget and the necessary revenue-raising measures to cover the budget have, at times, simply not been undertaken in newly established municipalities. Given the central role envisaged by the Final Constitution for municipalities in service delivery, these failures undercut a core strut of the developmental state. Given these repeated failures — as documented by the Auditor-General[5] — pressure has steadily increased on both the national government and the provincial governments to intervene in the governance of municipalities.

(i) Increasing of supervisory powers

The mainstay of supervision has been FC s 139. In its original form FC s 139 was almost identical to the limited powers of the national government to intervene in a province in terms of FC s 100; it only permitted a provincial executive to

[1] See Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 20-29.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 373.

[3] Ibid at para 370.

[4] Ibid.

[5] See Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte 'Auditor-General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B.

intervene in a municipality when the latter failed to comply with an executive obligation. This provision excluded the possibility of corrective measures when a municipality failed to pass a budget and revenue-raising measures: both are legislative acts.[1] Moreover, an intervention was confined to an assumption of responsibility by a province for the execution of the obligation. Two constitutional amendments increased the scope for interventions.

In a 1998 amendment of FC s 159 dealing with the terms of municipal councils,[2] the new provision provided for dissolution of councils contemplated by FC s 139. Without expressly empowering a province to do so, FC s 159(2) simply requires that in the event that a council 'is dissolved in terms of national legislation', an election must be held within 90 days. FC s 159(3) assumes that such dissolution takes place in terms of FC s 139. Accordingly, on this rather weak basis, the Structures Act provided that an MEC could dissolve a council if 'an intervention in terms of section 139 of the Constitution has not resulted in the council being able to fulfil its obligations in terms of legislation.'[3] In 2003, FC s 139 was significantly amended to enable provinces (and the national government) to intervene in municipalities that are experiencing financial problems. The amendment possesses three important features. First, as with FC s 100, the supervisory role of the NCOP is limited. Second, the power to dissolve a council is explicit. Third, two additional grounds for intervention now exist: both impose mandatory action from the provinces.[4]

(ii) Supervision as a single process

Supervision is broadly defined as the power of national and provincial governments to exercise hierarchical control over municipalities. At a foundational level, the national government establishes the broad legislative framework in terms of which local government functions are exercised. Likewise, provinces have powers of establishment of municipalities. Both spheres of government also have regulatory powers over the exercise by municipalities of their executive powers.[5] With respect to individual municipalities, supervision entails, first, the monitoring of their performance, second, support if required to exercise their functions and powers, and third, entering the autonomous domain of a municipality through acts of intervention when there is a failure in governance.

[1] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC). See also Jaap de Visser Developmental Local Government (2005) 129.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 65 of 1998 s 1.

[3] Structures Act s 34(3)(b). Section 34(4) added the procedural requirements that such dissolution may only occur with the permission of the Minister for local government and the approval of the NCOP.

[4] See Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 15-17.

[5] FC s 155(7).

At first the Final Constitution equated intervention with supervision. The headings of FC ss 100 and 139 authorizing intervention in provinces and municipalities respectively, referred to the 'National supervision of provincial administrations' and 'Provincial supervision of local government'. The Constitutional Court thus appropriately viewed 'supervision' as a concept distinct from 'monitoring' and 'support'.[1] In the constitutional amendment of 2003, the word 'supervision' in the headings of FC ss 100 and 139 was replaced by the narrower, but correct, concept of 'intervention'.

Supervision encompasses the practice of monitoring. The Constitutional Court describes monitoring as follows: 'The monitoring power is more properly described as the antecedent or underlying power from which the provincial power to support, promote and supervise LG emerges.'[2] Monitoring reveals whether the legislative regulation is complied with, whether support is needed and, if need be, whether an intervention is required.

(iii) Dual responsibility for supervision

From the foregoing it is apparent that the supervision of local government is not neatly divided between national government and provincial governments. Supervision is, in effect, a concurrent power.[3] Where a division of supervisory labour exists, the hierarchy between the national government and provincial governments becomes rather evident. The national government is the dominant actor in establishing frameworks for local government. The provinces are generally confined to the establishment of municipalities in their jurisdictions.[4] However, provinces must monitor and support municipalities at the same time as they promote the development of local government capacity to manage their own affairs.[5]

Reflecting the traditional hierarchical model of municipalities falling under the auspices of provinces, the intervention powers of FC s 139 are almost exclusively reserved for provinces. The clear hierarchical lines have somewhat been blurred by the 2003 amendments; the national government has reserved the right to intervene in a municipality should a province fail to exercise its duty to do so. In contrast, the supervisory measure of controlling municipal financial management, the temporary stopping of transfers, falls solely under the control of the National Treasury.

[1] See, for example, First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 367, 370.
[2] Ibid at para 372.
[3] See Murray & Ampofo-Anti (supra) at 20-29.
[4] FC s 155(5) and (6).
[5] FC s 155(6).

The dual nature of supervision has made for a complex system. The system has not been simplified by statutory elaboration. The MFMA, for example, requires overlapping reporting duties to both the National Treasury and provincial treasuries. At provincial level, separate reporting lines exist to the MEC for finance and to the MEC responsible for local government. The end result is a complex and at times confused supervisory framework.

(b) Supervision process: monitoring and support

(i) Monitoring

Unlike the reference in FC s 155(6)(a) to the provinces' duty to monitor municipalities, the Final Constitution places no such duty on the national government. Such a duty is, however, implicit in the National Treasury's responsibility to enforce financial measures that ensure both transparency and expenditure control in all spheres of government;[1] without a system of monitoring, breaches of the measures would not be detected. Does the absence of an explicit reference to a general monitoring power preclude the national government from doing so in non-financial terrain? The strongest basis for a general monitoring power is FC s 155(7).[2] The national government has the legislative and executive authority 'to see to the effective performance by municipalities' of their functions, but then only 'by regulating the exercise by municipalities of their executive authority'.[3] As FC s 155(7) authorizes only regulatory measures, it would only provide a basis for a general system of monitoring: it imposes routine duties of reporting, rather than allowing for individualized monitoring actions. This approach is also followed in the Systems Act. The Minister for local government may require municipalities to submit information concerning their affairs to a specified national organ of state. This instruction must be done by notice in the Government Gazette. The Minister can make distinctions in the notice between municipal categories, municipal types or any other kind described in the notice. The notice can require municipalities to submit the information at certain intervals or within a specified period.[4] No power is conferred on the Minister to monitor individual municipalities.

The Systems Act gives full effect to the provinces' mandate of monitoring as provided for in FC s 155(6)(a). The MEC for local government must establish mechanisms, processes and procedures to monitor municipalities. The Act refers specifically to the need for monitoring the ability of municipalities to manage their

[1] FC s 216(2).
[2] See De Visser Developmental Local Government (supra) at 180.
[3] Emphasis added.
[4] Systems Act s 107.

own affairs,[1] the need for monitoring municipal capacity[2] and the need for assessing the support requirements of municipalities.[3]

(ii) Support

While the duty to support local government falls on both the national government and the provincial governments, a distinction should be drawn between support that takes place in terms of co-operative government and support that occurs within the framework of supervision.[4] The duty of support in terms of FC s 41(1)(h)(ii) is reciprocal. The support contemplated by FC s 154(1) reflects the guardianship that the higher levels of government have over local government. While both forms of support would require the participation of the receiving municipality, different consequences could follow a failure to fully participating in the planned supervision. For example, if a municipality does not implement a financial recovery plan suggested by a province, then the province may impose it on the municipality and take further steps including the dissolution of the council. The Constitutional Court in the First Certification Judgment also placed support firmly within a supervisory framework:

> The legislative and executive powers to support [local government] are, again, not insubstantial. Such powers can be employed by provincial governments to strengthen existing LG structures, powers and functions and to prevent a decline or degeneration of such structures, powers and functions. This support power is to be read in conjunction with the more dynamic legislative and executive role granted provincial government. . .. In terms hereof, the provinces must assert legislative and executive power to promote the development of LG capacity to perform its functions and manage its affairs and may assert such powers, by regulating municipal executive authority, to see to the effective performance by municipalities of their functions in respect of listed LG matters. Taken together these competences are considerable and facilitate a measure of provincial government control over the manner in which municipalities administer those matters in parts B of . . . schs 4 and 5.[5]

The duty of support that seeks to 'to prevent a decline or degeneration' of local government 'structures, powers and functions',[6] flows from the overall supervisory relationship that both the national government and provincial governments have with local government. This relationship is very different from the mutual duty to assist one another: with respect to co-operative government, where the

[1] Systems Act s 105(1)(a).
[2] Systems Act s 105(1)(b).
[3] Systems Act s 105(1)(c).
[4] Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-15.
[5] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 371.
[6] Ibid.

starting premise is the equality of the spheres. The obligation to render supervisory support may also be justiciable and a court may review the reasonableness of steps that the national government or a provincial government has taken in executing their duty of support.[1]

The Municipal Finance Management Act ('MFMA') in chapter 5 on cooperative government expands on the duty of support.[2] The national government must assist municipalities by agreement in building their capacity for efficient, effective and transparent financial management.[3] Support must also be given to a municipality's efforts to identify and to resolve its financial problems.[4] The failure to give effect to these duties does not, however, affect the responsibility of the municipality to comply with the demanding duties of the MFMA.[5]

In light of their significant intervention powers, provincial governments shoulder the principal obligation of support. Like the national government, the provincial government must assist municipalities by agreement in building their capacity for efficient, effective and transparent financial management.[6] Likewise, support must be given to a municipality's efforts to identify and to resolve its financial problems.[7]

Practice has shown that provinces have not been very successful in discharging their financial obligations. The national government has had to step into the breach. In the main the provincial Departments of Local Government (DLG) have the responsibility to oversee the institutional health of the municipalities. However, serious question marks hang over their capacity to do so effectively. They have limited financial resources: the lack of resources leaves little room to develop programmes on monitoring and intervention. Their incapacity is also apparent from their lack of adequate human resources. Most DLGs are carrying a staff complement that does not match their mandate of high level support and oversight of local government. The limitations of provincial supervision has resulted in a gradual displacement of provincial supervision by national initiatives (eg, DPLGs's Project Consolidate). It has thus been suggested that Project Consolidate permits the national government to do what provinces should do in terms of FC s 139.[8] This assessment seems accurate. In 2004 and 2005 provincial interventions in municipalities became more frequent. However, that trend came to a halt with the introduction of Project Consolidate.[9] This intrusion has been a sore point for DLGs. They perceive national government intervention in municipal affairs as marginalizing the role of provinces.

[1] See IMATU v MEC Local Government, Mpumalanga 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA).
[2] Act 56 of 2000.
[3] MFMA s 34(1).
[4] MFMA s 34(2).
[5] MFMA s 34(4).
[6] MFMA s 34(1).
[7] MFMA s 34(2).
[8] See Christina Murray & Yonina Hoffman-Wanderer 'The National Council of Provinces and Provincial Intervention in Local Government' (2007) Stell LR 28.
[9] Ibid at 18.

(c) Interventions

The most powerful form of supervision is intervention. Three modes of intervention are now provided for in FC s 139. FC s 139(1) authorizes such drastic measures of assumption of responsibility for a municipal executive obligation and the dissolution of a council. The 2003 constitutional amendments provided a further two forms of intervention. The first relates to the failure of a municipality to adopt a budget or impose revenue-raising measures — two legislative instruments without which the municipality cannot properly function. As the source of the problem is the council's failure to adopt these legislative instruments, the mandatory intervention is the dismissal of the council. The second refers to a crisis in a municipality's financial affairs. As such problems tend to be deep-seated, the solution is a directive to implement a financial rescue plan and, depending on causes of the crisis, measures that may include the dissolution of the council. Given this constitutional basis, the MFMA has regulated the application of the latter two forms of intervention.[1]

(d) Regular intervention in terms of FC s 139(1)

A provincial executive may intervene in a municipality if it cannot or does not fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Final Constitution or legislation. The intervention can consist of 'any appropriate' step, including —

(a) the issuing of a directive to the municipality that describes the extent of the failure and the steps to be taken;[2]
(b) the assumption of responsibility for the relevant obligation;[3] and
(c) the dissolution of the municipal council.[4]

The importance of this intervention is that it is confined to failures to comply with executive obligations. True to preserving the distinctiveness of a municipality, intervention in the legislative domain of a council is not tolerated. Only in very exceptional circumstances may a council be dissolved and its legislative function taken over by the province.

(i) Substantive requirement

The crucial requirement is the failure to fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Final Constitution or legislation. The reference to constitutional obligations should [1] MFMA s 137 provides for a third mode of intervention, which combines elements of FC s 139(1) with the latter two. This intervention refers to general financial problems, mainly relating to the inability of a municipality to meet its financial commitments. This is a discretionary intervention which may commence with a directive to the municipality to implement a financial recovery plan, failing which the council may be dissolved. See further Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-29–15-38.

[2] FC s 139(1)(a).
[3] FC s 139(1)(b).
[4] FC s 139(1)(c).

include the duty to provide basic municipal services.[1] Legislation refers to an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act, a national and provincial regulation,[2] or any of the municipality's own by-laws. Whether a statutory obligation is executive or not is not always apparent: the council performs both executive and legislative functions. Rather than attempting to carefully define the term 'executive obligation', it is more useful to define the legislative function and conclude that anything that does not fall within that definition is executive in nature and therefore falls within the ambit of FC s 139(1).[3] The legislative functions of a municipal council are threefold: approving by-laws; approving a budget; and imposing rates, taxes, levies, duties and surcharges on fees.[4] Any other function or activity of the municipal council is not legislative in nature and the failure to fulfil obligations in that regard could therefore trigger an intervention in terms of FC s 139(1).

Whether a statutory provision creates an obligation is not always apparent from the statutory text as the use of the word 'must' may not necessarily imply an enforceable obligation. In Weenen Transitional Local Council v Van Dyk[5] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the use of the word 'must' or 'shall' was not determinative of the matter and instead adopted a much more contextual approach.[6]

(ii) Measures of intervention

FC s 139(1) empowers a provincial executive to take any 'appropriate' measure. For the Constitutional Court such measures, or 'steps', must be authorised by the Constitution or by constitutionally compatible legislation.[7] FC s 139(1), mentions three steps: the issuing of a directive, the assumption of responsibility and the dissolution of the municipal council. The Second Certification Judgment Court, commenting on the original version of FC s 139(1), has indicated that a provincial executive cannot freely choose from these steps. The steps are a process whereby the first step is the issuing of the directive. When the Constitutional Court considered FC s 100, it held that the assumption of responsibility is not possible without first issuing a directive.[8]

[1] See § 22.4*(b)* supra.
[2] FC s 239 'national legislation' and 'provincial legislation'.
[3] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-19.
[4] See § 22.3*(a), 22.4(e)(ii) and 22.5(c)*(ii) supra.
[5] 2002 (4) SA 653 (SCA).
[6] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 13-21.
[7] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Second Certification Judgment') at para 124. Although paragraph 124 of the judgment deals with FC s 100, the equivalent of FC s 139 for national intervention into provincial government, the Court's remarks are apposite with respect to the meaning of FC s 139.
[8] Ibid at para 120; Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-20.

A further measure is judicial relief. The Constitutional Court held that court proceedings could possibly constitute an appropriate step towards securing fulfilment of such obligations.[1] For example, where a directive is not followed and the other substantive requirements for the assumption of responsibility or the dissolution of the council are not met, judicial relief could be the only viable measure.[2]

(iii) Issuing a directive

The issuing of a directive imposes a legally binding obligation on the municipality to fulfil an identified executive obligation. The directive plays a key function in any later intervention measures: it defines the scope of the intervention. Moreover, given the Court's view of the progressive approach to intervention, starting with the least intrusive measures and ending, if need be, with the most intrusive measures, the directive is the usual starting measure. However, it is not necessarily a sine qua non for an assumption of responsibility. Where the issuing of a directive would be futile, for example if there is no quorum in the council to lawfully implement the directive, the provincial executive may immediately proceed to the next level of intervention.[3]

(iv) Assumption of responsibility

Where a municipality fails to fulfil an identified executive obligation at the direction of the province, the latter may proceed to fulfil that obligation itself by assuming responsibility for that obligation. The municipality's powers in that regard are thus ousted to the extent of the assumption of responsibility. Because this is such a drastic measure, one of three threshold requirements listed in FC s 139(1)(b) must be met. First, the assumption of responsibility must be necessary to maintain essential national standards or to meet established minimum standards for the rendering of a service. Second, it must be necessary to prevent a municipal council from taking unreasonable action that is prejudicial to the interests of another municipality or to the province as a whole. Third, the assumption of responsibility must be necessary to maintain economic unity.[4] The requirements of FC s 139(1)(b) have consequences for both the aim and the scope of the assumption of responsibility. The aim of the assumption of responsibility is to lift the municipality to the required minimum standards, to prevent it from harming the interests of other municipalities or the province or to maintain economic unity in the province. The provincial executive can only assume responsibility to [1] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 124 fn 116.

[2] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-20.
[3] Ibid at 15-21.
[4] Ibid.

the extent necessary to achieve the above goals. In commenting on FC s 100, which provides for a similar national intervention measure in provinces, the Constitutional Court has stressed that a high threshold would apply. This high threshold requires that the intervention must be 'necessary' and that one of a closed list of circumstances must prevail.[1]

Given the fact that the functional integrity of a municipality is ruptured, a review process is automatically triggered comprising of two components — a review by the national executive and a peer review by the NCOP. In line with the underlying hierarchical structure of the Final Constitution, the national minister responsible for local government reviews the decision of a provincial executive and makes a binding decision. Even if such approval is obtained, a second review by the provincial executive's peers ensues. The NCOP, representing all the provinces (including the intervening province), must review the conduct of one of its members. A built-in bias may be inevitable; a very strict interpretation of the circumstances justifying an intervention would eventually bind all the provinces, while a more accommodating approach would stand all of them in good stead when they venture to intervene in the future.[2]

In its original form, the review mechanisms were extremely strict.[3] However, the amendments to FC s 139 in 2003 considerably watered down the tight time frames of the review mechanisms. Within 14 days after the notice of assumption of responsibility has been issued, the provincial executive must notify the Minister for local government of the intervention and request him or her to approve the intervention.[4] The intervention will end automatically if the Minister does not approve the intervention within 28 days or has explicitly disapproved the intervention within 28 days.[5]

The NCOP must also be notified within 14 days after the assumption of responsibility.[6] Even if the Minister has approved the intervention, the intervention ends automatically if the NCOP does not approve or explicitly disapprove the intervention within 180.[7] The NCOP must also 'review the intervention regularly' and can make appropriate recommendations to the provincial executive.[8]

[1] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 111-127.

[2] This structural bias is diametrically opposite the 'bias' that occurs when the NCOP reviews an intervention by the national government in one of the provinces; a strict reading of the Constitution would then be in all provinces' interest.

[3] The Minister responsible for local government had to approve the intervention within 14 days, failing which it ended. Even if such approval was obtained, a second hurdle had to be cleared: Notice had to be given to the NCOP and the intervention had to end unless the NCOP approved it within 30 days of its first sitting after the intervention began.

[4] FC s 139(2)(a)(i).

[5] FC s 139(2)(b)(i).

[6] FC s 139(2)(a)(ii).

[7] FC s 139(2)(b)(ii).

[8] FC s 139(2)(c).

The provincial executive assumes responsibility only for the identified executive obligations. It cannot perform legislative acts, that is, the passing of by-laws, the approval of budgets or the imposition of rates, taxes or other levies. If the provincial executive needs the municipal council to perform a certain legislative act — for example, the approval of an adjustments budget — it requires the cooperation of the municipal council. However, the fact that the provincial executive has the power to dissolve the municipal council in exceptional circumstances provides an additional incentive for the municipal council to cooperate.[1]

The question has been raised whether in terms of FC s 139(1)(b) the provincial executive can also suspend the council. The constitutional difficulty with this proposition is that the suspension is then based on the non-fulfilment of an executive obligation but encroaches on both the executive and legislative function of the council. The justification for such overreach is that in order to facilitate an executive intervention the provincial executive may need to prevent the council from obstructing provincial intervention through legislative action. Thus, while the province has no power to assume the legislative role, proponents argue the provinces possess a power to suspend the municipality's legislative function.[2] The problem with this argument is that, in the end, the removal of legislative power is not materially different from the assumption of legislative power. Both constitute an inroad into the legislative powers of the council for which FC s 139(1)(b) offers no basis.[3]

(v) Dissolution of council

The provincial executive can dissolve a municipal council 'if exceptional circumstances warrant such a step'.[4] While the jurisdictional fact of 'exceptional circumstances' is not defined, the Structures Act gives an indication of its reach. In a provision pre-dating the 2003 constitutional amendment, a dissolution was possible when 'an intervention in terms of FC s 139 has not resulted in the council being able to fulfil its obligations'.[5] The import is clear; if the failure of the intervention is due to the council's unwillingness to comply with its obligations and resolve its problems, 'exceptional circumstances' exist and the dissolution is warranted. The general principle should be that dissolution is an instrument to deal with the situation where the municipal council's conduct is the cause of the continued failure to comply with an executive obligation. This reflects the general principle that intervention comprises a set of successive steps, each more intrusive than the one before. It should be only in rare cases that a council is dissolved where no other steps have been taken prior to the dissolution.[6]

[1] See further Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 15-24.
[2] See Yonina Hoffman-Wanderer & Christina Murray 'Suspension and Dissolution of Municipal Councils under s 129 of the Constitution' (2007) TSAR 141.
[3] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-25.
[4] FC s 139(1)(c).
[5] Structures Act s 34(3)(b).
[6] Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-26 ff.

Given the drastic nature of the intervention, some significant procedural safeguards are provided. The process commences with the provincial executive serving a notice on the municipality, the Minister for local government, the NCOP and the provincial legislature. The dissolution takes effect unless the NCOP or the Minister sets it aside within 14 days from the date of receipt of the notice.[1] The Final Constitution thus provides for a 14 day window period within which the Minister and the NCOP have the opportunity to set aside the dissolution. Importantly, both the Minister and the NCOP can set aside the dissolution, independently from one another.[2] If no decision is made by either body, then the dissolution becomes effective.

After dissolution, the provincial executive must appoint an administrator.[3] His or her task will be to ensure the continued functioning of the municipality until a new municipal council has been declared elected.[4] The powers and functions of the administrator are determined by a combination of two legal instruments, (a) the provisions in the Final Constitution and the Structures Act and (b) a notice published by the MEC in the Provincial Gazette. In terms of the Structures Act, the MEC determines the scope of the administrator's functions and powers in the Provincial Gazette.[5] Considering that the municipal council has been 'replaced' by the administrator, the latter is thus vested with all legislative and executive powers that were previously exercised by the municipal council. The provincial executive, could, however, also decide to limit the administrator's powers in the notice.[6]

(e) Dissolution of council after failure to pass a budget or revenue-raising measures in terms of FC s 139(4)[7]

Because the approval of a budget or the raising of rates and taxes are legislative acts,[8] provincial executives were, before the 2003 constitutional amendment,

[1] FC s 139(3)(b).

[2] Structures Act s 34(3)(b), providing for the dissolution of a council, conflicts with FC s 139(3) in a number of respects. The Final Constitution provides that the dissolution takes effect unless the Minister or the NCOP sets it aside. The Structures Act, on the other hand, provides that the provincial executive first needs the Minister's and the NCOP's positive approval. FC s 139(3) states that the dissolution is effective 14 days after the NCOP received the notice while the Structures Act suggests that the day of publication of the notice is decisive. These days do not necessarily coincide: it may not be possible to publish the notice on the same day as the municipal council received the notice. These differences emerged because s 34(3)(b) of the Structures Act has been overtaken by the new provisions of FC s 139(3). FC s 139(3) has rendered section 34(3)(b) of the Structures Act invalid to the extent of these inconsistencies. See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-27ff.

[3] FC s 139(1)(c).

[4] FC s 139(1)(c) and Structures Act s 35(1).

[5] Structures Act s 35(2). In terms of the Final Constitution, the provincial executive, and not the MEC for local government, is vested with the power to appoint the administrator FC 139(4)(a). Section 35(2) of the Structures Act must be interpreted accordingly.

[6] Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-28.

[7] Ibid at 15-38ff.

[8] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC). See further § 22.5*(c)*(ii) supra.

constrained from intervening in legislative matter even when a council was so dysfunctional that it could not agree upon a budget. The amendment of FC s 139 has made it possible for provinces to intervene in the legislative authority of a municipality for a limited purpose. Since the council, in exercising the legislative authority of the municipality, is the source of the financial crisis (a municipality cannot properly function without an approved budget), the solution proferred is the appointment of an administrator — until a new council is elected — and the approval of a temporary budget which operates until the new council approves a final one.

This form of intervention is premised on a municipality's failure to comply with the statutory obligation to adopt an annual budget and the necessary revenue-raising measures to cover it before the commencement of the financial year.[1] The adoption of an annual budget is central to the entire functioning of a municipality. Municipal expenditure may be incurred only in terms of an approved budget.[2]

Where a municipality has failed to adopt a budget or revenue-raising measures, the provincial executive must take 'any appropriate steps' to ensure that the budget or revenue-raising measures are approved, including dissolving the council.[3] Are there any other 'appropriate steps' apart from dissolution? The steps mentioned in FC s 139 are directives and the assumption of responsibility. Neither may be appropriate. After the commencement of the new financial year, there is no legal basis for the municipality to adopt a budget: a directive regarding the budget would therefore be invalid.[4] The only appropriate step in the absence of a budget is, then, the dismissal of the council.

Unlike FC s 139(3), which makes specific provision for the automatic review of a dissolution of a council by senior bodies (the Minister for local government and the NCOP), FC s 139(6) puts only a notification procedure in place. The provincial executive must submit within seven days of the dissolution a written notice of the intervention to the Minister for local government, the relevant provincial legislature, and the NCOP. Why the absence of procedural safeguards? Some might argue that the trigger for a dissolution in terms of FC s 139(3) is 'exceptional circumstances' and that such circumstances require an automatic review procedure to control broad discretion. But the basic law reads otherwise. Dissolution in terms of FC s 139(4) is very specific — the council has failed to approve a budget or revenue-raising measures and the MEC must intervene through the dissolution. If the MEC is obliged to dissolve the council, then the Minister or the NCOP lack any grounds for review.

[1] MFMA ss 16(1) and 24(2)(a).
[2] MFMA s 15*(a)*.
[3] FC s 139(4).
[4] This may, however, be an option where the only problem is the imposition of inadequate tariffs, as the determination of fees and tariffs could be done, as argued above, administratively.

On dissolution of the council, the provincial executive must fill the vacuum by appointing a caretaker administrator and approving a temporary budget. The administrator assumes the executive authority of the council. After the dissolution of a council, the notification duties play an important function. The Minister is informed of the intervention because the national government must monitor the province's performance. If the provincial executive does not perform its supervisory role adequately, then the national government may intervene in its stead.[1] The provincial legislature must be informed as it performs its usual oversight function over the provincial executive. Although the NCOP is not called upon to review the dissolution, the institution should be kept informed of the intervention as part of its overall oversight role with regard to monitoring of and intervention in municipalities.

(f) Imposition of a financial recovery plan after a financial crisis in terms of FC s 139(5)[2]

The second financial intervention involves a financial recovery plan. The plan structures the financial conduct of the municipality and is imposed by the provincial executive. If the municipality is unable to implement the plan, the more intrusive measures may follow, including the dissolution of the council.

For an intervention in terms of FC s 139(5) to take place, the municipality must be, as a result of a crisis in its financial affairs, in serious or persistent material breach of its obligations to provide basic services or to meet its financial commitments. FC s 139(5) further provides that the admission by the municipality that it is unable to meet its service obligations or financial commitments will suffice.[3] In determining whether these conditions are present, the MFMA gives some guidance by providing a non-exhaustive list of factors, which singly or in combination, may indicate whether the conditions for intervention are met.[4]

Once the jurisdictional facts are present, the provincial executive must act in terms of FC s 139(5). FC s 139(5) envisages a two stage process. The first stage entails the imposition of a financial recovery plan prepared in terms of national legislation.[5] The second stage follows if the municipality cannot or does not implement the plan. The intervention then constitutes a dissolution of the council or the assumption of responsibilities by the provincial executive — depending on whether or not the plan entails both legislative and executive directives. The central component of this process is the recovery plan. In terms of the MFMA, the National Treasury through the Municipal Financial Recovery Service prepares the plan for the province.[6]

[1] FC s 139(7).
[2] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 15-43ff.
[3] FC s 139(5).
[4] MFMA s 140(2).
[5] FC s 139(5)(a)(i).
[6] MFMA s 139(1).

When FC s 139(5) has been invoked, FC s 139(6) imposes certain notification requirements. The provincial executive must submit within seven days a written notice of the intervention to the Minister for local government, the provincial legislature, and the NCOP. As with budgetary intervention, the Minister must be informed of the intervention because the national government must monitor the province's performance. If the provincial executive does not perform adequately, then the national government may intervene in its stead.[1]

Should the municipality fail to implement the plan for whatever reason, the province must proceed to the second stage of the intervention: the dissolution of the council or the assumption of the responsibility for the implementation. In both cases an administrator is appointed. The provincial executive must dissolve the council if the latter does not implement the legislative aspects of the plan within the time frames set in the plan.[2] This act of intervention becomes necessary only because, short of a dissolution of the council, the provincial executive cannot, in terms of FC s 139, impose its will on the legislative authority of a municipality.

The substantive requirement reflects a failure on the part of the council to implement the budgetary and revenue-raising measures contained in the recovery plan. The assumption is that there is a budget in place with some revenue-raising measures but both are inadequate to solve the municipality's financial crisis. If there were no budget, then the appropriate route would be an intervention in terms of FC s 139(4).

Because the problem at hand is the unwillingness of the council to amend its budget and revenue-raising measures (and the existing budget is part of the financial problems of the municipality), the provincial executive must set aside the existing budget by approving a temporary budget and revenue-raising measures.[3] The new council must then adopt a new budget upon its election. The Final Constitution further empowers the provincial executive to take any other measures giving effect to the recovery plan to provide for the continued functioning of the municipality.[4]

If the problem flows not from legislative measures (the council has approved the proposed budget or revenue-raising measures), but from the ability or the capacity to implement the plan, then the provincial executive may assume responsibility for the implementation of the executive aspects of the plan.

22.7 Co-operative Government

(a) Constitutional framework

(i) Local government as a sphere of government

In FC Chapter 3 on Co-operative Government, government in the Republic is described as being constituted 'as national, provincial and local spheres of

[1] FC s 139(7).
[2] MFMA s 136(3)(a).
[3] MFMA s 146(3)(a)(ii).
[4] FC s 139(5)(b)(ii).

government which are distinctive, interdependent and interrelated'.[1] In sharp contrast to the Interim Constitution, where local government was a competence of provincial government, the radical innovation of the Final Constitution was to make local government 'equal partners' of national government and provincial government. However, as has been shown above, the relationship between local government and the other spheres is complex. It simultaneously exhibits elements of autonomy and hierarchy. In attributing meanings to the words 'distinctive, interdependent and interrelated',[2] it can be said that 'distinctiveness' refers to the elements of local autonomy, 'interrelatedness' to the supervisory role of national and provincial government over local government, and 'interdependence' to connote the cooperative relationship that must be pursued when the other two characteristics are being played out in practice. Co-operative government thus serves as a constraining principle on all three spheres of government when they exercise their distinctive powers and functions.

In FC s 41, the principles of co-operative government and intergovernmental relations are sketched in broad brush strokes. Given this minimalist approach to co-operative government, the Final Constitution mandates national legislation to '(a) establish or provide for structures and institutions to promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations, and (b) provide for appropriate mechanisms and procedures to facilitate settlement of intergovernmental disputes.' After limited sectoral interventions,[3] the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act[4] was eventually passed in 2005 in response to this constitutional mandate.

In constructing a cooperative system of decentralized government, three additional elements complement FC Chapter 3. First, given the need to draw local government into national governance, and the inevitable large numbers of municipalities, the organization of municipalities into a collective is required. Second, organized local government is given participatory rights in the National Council of Provinces (NCOP) and a representative on the Finance and Fiscal Commission (FFC). Third, the supportive and consultative duties of the national government and provincial governments towards local government are regularly invoked in various constitutional provisions and statutes.

(ii) Organised local government

For a large number of municipalities to participate effectively in the system of co-operative government, they must act as a collective to make the voice of local government heard. The Final Constitution thus recognizes and entrenches the

[1] FC s 40(1). See Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Barry Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 14-8.

[2] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 16-3.

[3] Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997.

[4] Act 13 of 2005.

need for organized local government to represent municipalities. FC s 163 requires an Act of Parliament to provide for the recognition of national and provincial organizations representing municipalities.[1] The Act must also create procedures through which local government may consult with the national or provincial government, designate representatives to participate in the NCOP, and nominate persons to the FFC.[2]

The Organised Local Government Act[3] authorizes the Minister responsible for local government to recognize a national organization representing the majority of provincial associations.[4] The Minister must also recognize the provincial association representing the majority of municipalities in each province, with the concurrence of the relevant MEC for local government, provided that all the different categories of municipalities are represented.[5]

The South African Local Government Association (SALGA), a voluntary body representing all nine provincial local government associations, was established in 1996. It was recognized, along with its nine constituent provincial members, by the Minister as the body representing local government on 30 January 1998.[6] SALGA is not a statutory body, but has official status through the executive act of recognition. It has a number of statutory and constitutional consultation duties which it executes with varying degrees of success.[7]

(iii) National Council of Provinces

The primary function of the NCOP is to serve as the intergovernmental forum for the provincial legislatures in Parliament. This constitutional object is articulated as follows: 'The National Council of Provinces represents the provinces by ensuring that provincial interests are taken into account in the national sphere of government.'[8] The 'lobbying' of provincial interests, FC s 42(4) suggests, takes two distinct forms. The first is a narrow legislative form: the NCOP enables the provinces to participate 'in the national legislative process on matters affecting provinces'.[9] The second is a more general function: it provides 'a national forum for public consideration of issues affecting provinces.'[10] In the elaboration of the [1] FC s 163*(a)*. The legislation must be enacted in accordance with the procedure established by FC s 76.

[2] FC s 163*(b)* read with FC s 221(1)(c).

[3] Act 52 of 1997.

[4] Organised Local Government Act s 2(1)(a).

[5] Organized Local Government Act s 2(1)(b). The Minister may also withdraw recognition of an organisation if it ceases to meet the recognition criteria. Organised Local Government Act s 2(2)(a).

[6] Government Gazette 18645, Regulation Gazette 6087, GN R175 (30 January 1998).

[7] See Robert Cameron 'The Upliftment of South African Local Government' (2001) 27 Local Government Studies 97, 108; Mirjam Van Donk & Edgar Pieterse 'Reflections on the Design of a Post-Apartheid system of (Urban) Local Government' in Udesh Pillay, Richard Tomlinson & Jacques Du Toit (eds) Democracy and Delivery: Urban Policy in South Africa (2006) 107, 124.

[8] FC s 42(4).

[9] FC s 42(4).

[10] FC s 42(4).

functions of the NCOP, additional powers are given to the NCOP. First, it co-determines the ratification of international treaties.[1] Second, it serves as a brake on intervention by the national government in provincial affairs.[2] It also reviews provincial interventions in municipalities.[3] Overall, the NCOP integrates provinces into the national legislative process and some executive processes. Not only do provinces bring their perspective to bear on national legislation that affects their interests, but by being part of the national legislative process, they are also drawn into and made to understand the national agenda that extends beyond parochial provincial interests.

Given the strong provincial focus of the functions of the NCOP, local government's participation in this body would appear to have been an afterthought. FC s 67 perfunctorily provides that '[n]ot more than ten part-time representatives designated by organised local government in terms of section 163 to represent the different categories of municipalities, may participate when necessary in the proceedings of the National Council of Provinces, but may not vote.' In terms of the Organised Local Government Act, each provincial organization may nominate up to six councillors as representatives.[4] SALGA must, then, in terms of criteria determined by it, designate not more than ten persons from the nominees as its representatives.[5]

What is striking about FC s 67 is that it does not articulate the intention behind organized local government participation in national government affairs. The logic behind its inclusion lies in FC s 40(1): recall that FC s 40(1) emphasizes the interrelatedness and the interdependence of the three spheres of government. If there is a need for provinces to articulate and present their interest for consideration in a national public forum,[6] then local government, as a sphere of government, should also be accorded such an opportunity. The hierarchical nature of the spheres does, however, surface and prevail. Local government is not an equal partner of the provinces and their participation in the legislative process is merely consultative. They may make their views known to their provincial colleagues and trust that these NCOP colleagues take local government concerns on board when they interact directly with the National Assembly. It is therefore not surprising that SALGA has put little effort into participating in the NCOP. Direct consultation processes with the national executive or using the public participation opportunities granted by the National Assembly are generally more productive.[7]

[1] FC s 231(2).
[2] FC s 100.
[3] FC s 139.
[4] Organised Local Government Act s 3(1).
[5] Organised Local Government Act s 3(2)(a).
[6] FC s 42(4).
[7] Nico Steytler 'National, Provincial, and Local Relations: An Uncomfortable Ménage à Trois' in Harvey Lazar & Christian Leuprecht (eds) Sphere of Government: Comparative Studies of Cities in Multilevel Governance Systems (2007) 239.

Nevertheless, some value could be gained by mingling in the corridors of power in Parliament. Organized local government's entitlement to participate in the NCOP turns on the phrase 'when necessary'. However, 'when necessary' should be generously interpreted to allow SALGA to take its seat whenever a matter that affects, or may affect, the interest of local government is before the NCOP — either when the NCOP sits alone or jointly with the National Assembly. In the first place, any legislation that affects local government triggers the participation right. Second, when the NCOP reviews a provincial intervention in a municipality,[1] organized local government has a palpable interest. Finally, when the NCOP exercises its oversight function over intergovernmental relations, the involvement of local government in the system co-operative government should also trigger the need to participate.

(iv) Financial and Fiscal Commission

In contrast to local government's ambiguous participation in the NCOP, the constitutional mandate for its participation in the FFC is more forthright. The NCOP is a political institution designed to represent the provincial legislatures and to articulate political positions. The FFC is an advisory body. It consists of experts who ensure the protection of both provincial interests and local government interest in the area of intergovernmental fiscal relations and the national division of annual revenue.[2]

The FFC consists of the following persons appointed by the President:

(a) a chairperson and deputy chairperson,
(b) three persons appointed after consultation with the Premiers,
(c) two persons selected, after consultation with organised local government, from a list compiled by organised local government; and
(d) a further two persons.[3]

Participation in the FCC is not premised on having a mandate from the nominating constituency. Its representatives need not be councilors. SALGA's two nominees must bring an independent local government perspective to the FCC.[4] The FFC is not an intergovernmental relations structure on par with the Budget Forum. It is not a meeting of executives but is an independent expert body advising government on the conduct of intergovernmental relations in the field of finance.

[1] FC s 139.
[2] FC s 220. In terms of the Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 s 9(1)(a) and (2)(a) the FFC must also play an advisory role when a national minister (or MEC) initiates legislation assigning a function or a power to municipalities.
[3] FC s 221 as amended by Seventh Constitutional Amendment Act 61 of 2001 s 7.
[4] See Finance and Fiscal Commission Act 99 of 1997 s 2: the FFC is 'independent and subject only to the Constitution, this Act and the law'.

(b) Principles and statutory provisions of cooperative government

In addition to the general principle of intergovernmental relations and cooperative government listed in FC s 41(1),[1] the Final Constitution imposes two specific co-operative government duties related to local government. Under the heading of 'Municipalities in co-operative government', FC 154(1) places a duty of support on the national government and provincial governments in respect of local government. FC s 154(2) affords local government the opportunity to make representation on any national or provincial draft legislation affecting local government. These principles have been developed in a number of laws over the past decade.

The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act[2] created the Local Government Budget Forum for consultation by organized local government with the Minister of Finance and the MECs for finance on the allocation of revenue raised nationally. The Municipal Systems Act of 2000 refers to co-operative government by merely repeating the general principles of FC Chapter 3. Section 3(1) asserts that municipalities 'must exercise their executive and legislative authority within the constitutional system of co-operative government envisaged in section 41 of the Constitution.' Conversely, national and provincial governments must exercise their executive and legislative authority 'in a manner that does not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its executive and legislative authority.'[3]

In the chapter devoted to 'Co-operative Government', the MFMA confuses supervision with the mandate of cooperative government. The MFMA correctly views as cooperative government the national government's and provincial governments' duty of support and capacity building,[4] the timely transfers of funds to local government, the sharing of information,[5] the predictable allocation of resources to municipalities[6] and municipalities' reciprocal duties in these matters.[7] However, the chapter incorrectly contains provisions relating to the stopping of transfers of funds, including the equitable share, to municipalities due to non-compliance with Treasury norms and standards.[8] The stopping of transfers is a

[1] FC s 41(1)(b) instructs all spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere to 'cooperate with one another in mutual trust and good faith by —
(i) fostering friendly relations;
(ii) assisting and supporting one another;
(iii) informing one another of, and consulting one another on, matters of common interest;
(iv) co-ordinating their actions and legislation with one another;
(v) adhering to agreed procedures; and
(vi) avoiding legal proceedings against one another.'

[2] Act 97 of 1997.

[3] Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 s 3(2).

[4] MFMA s 34.

[5] MFMA s 35.

[6] MFMA s 36.

[7] MFMA s 37.

[8] MFMA ss 38-40.

hierarchical measure that punishes (and seeks to correct) errant municipal conduct — the antithesis of co-operation premised on a relationship of equality. Likewise, national powers and provincial powers of capping municipalities' taxes and tariffs[1] are the epitome of top-down regulation, a key aspect of supervision.

The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act of 2005 ('IGRFA' or 'IGR Framework Act')[2] contains many provisions pertinent to local government. However, the IGRFA provides a default position only. If a provision of another Act regulating intergovernmental relations conflicts with IGRFA, then the former prevails.[3] Thus, the provisions of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act[4] will trump the IGRFA. However, the Act prevails over any by-law,[5] a provision clearly inconsistent with FC s 156(3). This section provides that a by-law is invalidated by conflicting national legislation or provincial legislation. This provision is subject to FC s 151(4)'s proviso that prohibits national government or provincial government from compromising or impeding a municipality's right to exercise its powers or perform its functions.[6] The IGRFA is concerned only with executive intergovernmental relations. It excludes the national legislatures and provincial legislatures from its reach.[7] In the case of local councils, where no institutional division is made between legislative and executive actions, both are subject to the Act. The Act further institutionalizes a number of intergovernmental forums at national, provincial and district levels and determines local government's participation therein.[8]

(c) Duty of support

FC s 41(1)(h)(ii) instructs all spheres of government to 'co-operate with one another in mutual trust and good faith, by … assisting and supporting each other.' Under the heading 'Municipalities in co-operative government' FC s 154(1) imposes a specific duty on national and provincial governments to 'support and strengthen the capacity of municipalities to manage their own affairs, to exercise their powers and to perform their functions.' Both the section heading and coupling the duty of support in FC s 154(1) with local government's entitlement in FC s 154(2) to make its views known on national legislation and provincial legislation affecting its interests, confuse the conceptual distinction between co-operation and supervision.

[1] MFMA s 43.
[2] Act 13 of 2005, coming into operation on 15 August 2005.
[3] IGR Framework Act s 3(1).
[4] Act 97 of 1997.
[5] IGR Framework Act 3(2)(a).
[6] See further § 22.3*(e)* supra.
[7] IGR Framework Act s 2(2)(a)-(b).
[8] See § 22.7*(d)*(v) infra.

FC s 41(1)(h)(ii) is a general provision. It indicates no hierarchical duty of support. It could be cited as a ground for a metropolitan municipality supporting a province on a specific matter. It could even be used to sustain a claim that one municipality has a duty to assist a neighbour. For example, one municipality should be under an obligation to make available its fire fighting services in the case of a major fire. Any such assistance occurs with the consent and cooperation of the recipient municipality. Thus, the co-operative duty to assist and to support also applies on a horizontal level. Municipalities must be mutually supportive of one another and may also assist provinces and national government should the need arise.

FC s 154(1), on the other hand, is based upon a different premise. The duty of support flows from the hierarchical position that both the national government and provincial governments occupy in relation to local government, and not because they are equal partners in the great endeavour of providing coherent government to the country as whole. Moreover, unlike FC s 41(1)(h)(ii), there is no mutual obligation of support. The national government owes a duty of support because it sets the frameworks and benchmarks within which municipalities must operate. The provincial support is reflected in both the establishment powers of FC s 155 and the intervention powers of FC s 139. Appropriately, then, the other provision imposing on provinces the duty to support municipalities forms part of FC s 155. This section is devoted to the establishment by the national government of the broad framework for municipalities, the provinces establishing municipalities, and the overall regulatory power of both the national and provincial government over municipalities.[1] In the case of provincial governments, the establishment power is linked to the duty to get and keep municipalities on their feet. Furthermore, the duty of support is coupled with monitoring. As shown above,[2] the Constitutional Court has placed the duty of support firmly in the context of supervision. We would contend that FC s 154(1) reflects a supervisory hierarchical relationship rather than the more egalitarian co-operative government contemplated by FC s 41(1)(h).

There are, however, similarities between 'supervisory support' and 'cooperative support'. Common to both is the notion that support is a bi-lateral enterprise: the active participation of the recipient is required. In as much as communities cannot be developed as objects and the success of development projects is more assured when such communities are part of the decision-making process, the municipality must actively engage in the support measures. In the case of 'supervisory support', the choice of the municipality is constrained; as shown above, if the proffered assistance is not taken, then an intervention may follow.

(d) Duty to consult

The grundnorm of cooperative government is probably the duty in FC s 41(1)(h)(iii) of 'informing one another of, and consulting one another on matters of common interest.' FC s 154(2) has concretized this duty for local government as follows:

[1] FC s 155(7). See § 22.3*(e)* supra.
[2] See § 22.6*(a)*(ii) supra, on supervision.

> Draft national or provincial legislation that affects the status, institutions or functions of local government must be published for public comment before it is introduced in Parliament or a provincial legislature, in a manner that allows organised local government, municipalities and other interested persons an opportunity to make representations with regard to the draft legislation.

Both provisions establish the obligation to consider the views of the other party before a decision is taken. The two sections indicate that there are differences in the manner in which the views of the other party may be sought.

(i) Information sharing

The duty of informing other spheres of government or organs of state, serves a very different function than that of consultation. In the case of consultation, the organ consulting seeks views or information from another party to inform its own decision-making. Such consultation should lead to better decision-making. With information-sharing the direction of influence is the other way. The organ disseminating the information does not seek a response. Rather, the receiving organ of state may take such information into consideration if and when it makes a decision on a related matter.

(ii) Consultation[1]

'Consultation' has been defined in IGRFA as 'a process whereby the views of another on a specific matter are solicited, either orally or in writing, and considered.'[2] This definition reflects the common-law understanding of the concept. In Robertson & Another v City of Cape Town; Truman-Baker v City of Cape Town,[3] the Cape High Court favourably referred to the following definition: 'The essence of consultation is the communication of a genuine invitation, extended with a receptive mind, to give advice …'[4] While there is no prescription on the form of consultation, the High Court in Hayes & Another v Minister of Housing, Planning and Administration, Western Cape & Others[5] stated that 'as long as the lines of communication are open and the parties are afforded a reasonable opportunity to put their cases or points of view to one another, the form of such consultation will usually not be of great import.' These dicta suggest three basic elements: (1) an invitation to hear the views of a particular party (or public in general) on a specified matter; (2) an adequate opportunity to submit considered views; and (3) the party inviting views must consider those views in good faith.

[1] See Nico Steytler & Jaap De Visser Local Government Law in South Africa (2007) 16-12.
[2] IGR Framework Act s 1(1) 'consultation'.
[3] 2004 (9) BLCR 950 (C)('Robertson HC') at para 108.
[4] With reference to Maqoma v Sebe NO & Another 1987 (1) SA 483, 491E (Ck).
[5] 1999 (4) SA 1229, 1242J-1243A (C).

The invitation to hear the views of other parties can take one of two forms. In its passive form, the party consulting extends a general invitation to interested parties or the public in general. By setting a closing date for responses, it leaves the addressees to decide whether or not to respond. The more active approach is to solicit actively the views of particular parties.

(iii) Providing opportunities for representation

The duty to consult in terms of FC s 154(2) is of the passive kind. It requires only the issuing of a general invitation to comment. It is also limited in a number of respects. First, it deals only with national legislation and provincial legislation passed by Parliament or a provincial legislature. Although 'legislation' is defined in FC s 239 as including both legislation passed by Parliament and a provincial legislature and subordinate legislation made in terms of a national or provincial act, the reference in FC s 154(2) to legislation introduced in Parliament or a provincial legislature excludes subordinate legislation. Second, although the substance of the draft legislation is ostensibly concerned only with 'the status, institutions or functions of local government', most aspects of local government would be covered by the broad term 'functions'. Third, draft legislation must be published for public comment before it is introduced in Parliament or a provincial legislature. Any changes affected during the legislative process would not elicit a further opportunity to make representations. However, we might argue that a fundamental change to the legislation during the legislative process should trigger a duty to call for further comments. Fourth, a call for comments is an open invitation to all and sundry, including organised local government and municipalities. Fifth, the duty is to facilitate the participation of local government. Where the deadline for submitting representations is too short for meaningful participation, the legislative process may be invalidated.[1] Sixth, while there is a duty to consider any representations in good faith, the failure to use the opportunity to make representations is no bar to proceed with the introduction of the draft legislation in the legislatures.

(iv) Consultation — seeking out the views of other parties

The active form of consultation entails more effort to secure the views of stakeholders. For example, FC s 229(5) requires that national legislation that regulates the powers of municipalities to impose revenue-raising measures may be enacted only after organised local government has been consulted. In Robertson v City of Cape Town; Truman-Baker v City of Cape Town,[2] the High Court, after defining consultation, noted that consultation was a 'bi-lateral process' that required the engagement with the other party whose advice is sought. In the instant case, the High Court found that there was no consultation on amendments to the Structures Act because neither the Minister for local government nor Parliament 'sought to engage the FFC in consultation'.[1] No formal request was sent to the FFC and the latter's attitude was that it would only engage in consultation if Parliament requested it to do so. This case supports the proposition that when there is a duty to consult with a particular body, there must be conscious effort, directed to that party to achieve that end. Second, it could also be argued that, while the consultant's decision-making cannot unreasonably be delayed by dilatory conduct by the party whose views are being sought, 'an engagement to consult' should amount to more than a simple invitation to submit views.

[1] For more on the requirements of public participation in the legislative process, see Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC); Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC) and Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others [2008] ZACC 10.

[2] Robertson HC (supra) at para 108.

Where a province considers legislation affecting municipalities (or a particular municipality), the IGFRA has sought to structure both the consultation and the way in which received information must be considered.[2] The consultation must 'be appropriately focused and include a consideration of the impact that such policy or legislation might have on the functional, institutional or financial integrity and coherence of government in the local sphere of government in the province.'[3] Such in-depth consultation suggests more than merely an invitation to comment. It requires bi-lateral engagement.

Given the large number of municipalities, active consultation by the national government or provincial government is usually restricted to organised local government. A wide variety of laws thus require that organised local government be consulted before legislation affecting local government is adopted.[4]

(v) Use of consultative forums

In giving effect to the constitutional mandate of establishing structures to promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations, the IGRFA has created a number of forums for the purposes of consultation and discussion. The Act provides specifically that where there is any statutory obligation to consult with organised local government, the consultation may be conducted through an appropriate intergovernmental forum or support structure.[5] An appropriate forum or structure would be one where organised local government is a member. However, where organised local government is not represented on such a forum, the Act provides that it is entitled to participate through a representative with full speaking rights when the relevant matter is discussed.[6]

[1] Robertson HC (supra) at para 109.
[2] IGR Framework Act s 36(1)(c).
[3] IGR Framework Act s 36(2).
[4] See Steytler & De Visser (supra) at 16-15ff.
[5] IGR Framework Act s 31(1) read with IGR Framework Act s s 1(1) 'intergovernmental structure'.
[6] IGR Framework Act s 31(2).

From 1994 onwards, a large number of forums have sprung up, all aimed at promoting co-operative government. They were mostly informal and primarily linked the provinces up with the national government. Local government's participation was ad hoc and by invitation only in the President's Coordinating Council and the various sector forums called MinMECs. At provincial level there was a wide variety of forums where the premiers met with organised local government in the province. At district level there was the uneven and sporadic establishment of intergovernmental forums bringing the mayors of the district and local municipalities together.[1] The only statutory body with mandatory representation from organised local government was the Budget Forum. The Budget Forum was established in terms of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act of 1997.[2]

With the passing of the IGRFA, the intergovernmental forums were grounded by statute. At the pinnacle is the President's Co-ordinating Council ('PPC'), consisting of the President, the deputy president and four additional ministers, the nine premiers and a representative of organised local government.[3] At the national level, any cabinet minister may establish a forum with his or her counterparts in the provinces, the so-called MinMECs, and a representative of organised local government, if the subject so requires.[4] At provincial level, every premier must establish a Premier's Intergovernmental Forum, consisting of the premier, a number of MECs, the mayors of metropolitan and district municipalities, and a representative of organised local government in the province.[5] Finally, at the district level, there must be a district intergovernmental forum comprising the mayors of the district and local municipalities.[6]

The national IGR forums are hierarchical structures that affirm the command of the national government.[7] The PCC is conceived as a consultative forum 'for the President'[8] and not a forum where the President, premiers and organized local government operate as equals. The President determines the agenda for the meetings of the PPC.[9] The premiers and SALGA are, however, not totally passive recipients; they may submit suggestions for inclusion on the agenda, but then only through the Minister responsible for provincial and local government and only in terms of a framework determined by the President.[10] The PCC also

[1] See Coel Kirkby, Nico Steytler & Janis Jordan 'Towards a More Cooperative Local Government: The Challenge of District Intergovernmental Forums' (2007) 22(1) SA Public Law 143.
[2] See § 22.7*(a)*(i) supra.
[3] IGR Framework Act s 6.
[4] IGR Framework Act s 9.
[5] IGR Framework Act s 16.
[6] IGR Framework Act s 24.
[7] See Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) 20-21.
[8] IGR Framework Act s 6.
[9] IGR Framework Act s 8(1)(a).
[10] IGR Framework Act s 8(2).

aims to perform a monitoring function with respect to the implementation of policy and legislation and the realisation of national priorities.[1] In addition to the PPC being a forum for consultation with the provinces and organised local government on matters of national interest, the President may use the forum 'to discuss performance in the provision of services in order to detect failures and to initiate preventive and corrective action when necessary'.[2] To this end, the President may use the forum to consider reports 'dealing with the performance of provinces and municipalities.'[3] Instead of focusing on common issues, the focus is on the performance of provinces and local government and their problems.

The same approach is followed with regard to MinMECs. Their role is described as 'a consultative forum for the Cabinet member responsible for the functional area'.[4] Again, the national cabinet minister determines the agenda, with the proviso that an MEC may suggest agenda items in terms of a framework determined by the minister.[5] As a forum of consultation for the minister, the MinMEC is to be used for co-ordination and alignment within the sector for strategic and performance plans as well as to discuss performance in the provision of services in the sector.[6]

The role of the Premier's Intergovernmental Forum is 'a consultative forum for the Premier of a province and the mayors of metropolitan and district municipalities in the province'.[7] The same inclusive and egalitarian approach is followed with district intergovernmental forums: 'The role of a district intergovernmental forum is to serve as a consultative forum for the district municipality and the local municipalities in the district to discuss and consult each other on matters of mutual interest'.[8]

[1] IGR Framework Act s 4.
[2] IGR Framework Act s 7*(c)*.
[3] IGR Framework Act s 7*(d)*(ii).
[4] IGR Framework Act s 11 (emphasis added).
[5] IGR Framework Act s 13(1)(b).
[6] IGR Framework Act s 11*(b)-(c)*.
[7] IGR Framework Act s 18 (emphasis added).
[8] IGR Framework Act s 24(1) (emphasis added).

23A Public Administration

Anshal Bodasing

23A.1 Principles and objectives of public administration in a constitutional democracy 23A–3
23A.2 Structure and function: FC Chapter 10 . . . . . 23A–7
23A.3 FC s 195: Values and principles governing Public Administration 23A–8
23A.4 Judicial constructions of FC s 195 . . . . . 23A–9
23A.5 Application of FC s 195(1) 23A–16
23A.6 FC s 196: The Public Service Commission 23A–17
23A.7 The Public Service Commision Report 23A–20
23A.8 FC s 197: The Public Service. 23A–22

195. Basic values and principles governing public administration

1. Public administration must be governed by the democratic values and principles enshrined in the Constitution, including the following principles:
   a. A high standard of professional ethics must be promoted and maintained.
   b. Efficient, economic and effective use of resources must be promoted.
   c. Public administration must be development-oriented.
   d. Services must be provided impartially, fairly, equitably and without bias.
   e. People's needs must be responded to, and the public must be encouraged to participate in policy-making.
   f. Public administration must be accountable.
   g. Transparency must be fostered by providing the public with timely, accessible and accurate information.
   h. Good human-resource management and career-development practices, to maximise human potential, must be cultivated.
   i. Public administration must be broadly representative of the South African people, with employment and personnel management practices based on ability, objectivity, fairness, and the need to redress the imbalances of the past to achieve broad representation.
2. The above principles apply to
   a. administration in every sphere of government;
   b. organs of state; and
   c. public enterprises.
3. National legislation must ensure the promotion of the values and principles listed in subsection (1).
4. The appointment in public administration of a number of persons on policy considerations is not precluded, but national legislation must regulate these appointments in the public service.
5. Legislation regulating public administration may differentiate between different sectors, administrations or institutions.
6. The nature and functions of different sectors, administrations or institutions of public administration are relevant factors to be taken into account in legislation regulating public administration.

196. Public Service Commission

1. There is a single Public Service Commission for the Republic.
2. The Commission is independent and must be impartial, and must exercise its powers and perform its functions without fear, favour or prejudice in the interest of the maintenance of effective and efficient public administration and a high standard of professional ethics in the public service. The Commission must be regulated by national legislation.
3. Other organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the Commission to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness of the Commission. No person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the Commission.
4. The powers and functions of the Commission are —
   a. to promote the values and principles set out in section 195, throughout the public service;
   b. to investigate, monitor and evaluate the organisation and administration, and the personnel practices, of the public service;

c. to propose measures to ensure effective and efficient performance within the public service;

d. to give directions aimed at ensuring that personnel procedures relating to recruitment, transfers, promotions and dismissals comply with the values and principles set out in section 195;
e. to report in respect of its activities and the performance of its functions, including any finding it may make and directions and advice it may give, and to provide an evaluation of the extent to which the values and principles set out in section 195 are complied with; and
f. either of its own accord or on receipt of any complaint —
   i. to investigate and evaluate the application of personnel and public administration practices, and to report to the relevant executive authority and legislature;
   ii. to investigate grievances of employees in the public service concerning official acts or omissions, and recommend appropriate remedies;
   iii. to monitor and investigate adherence to applicable procedures in the public service; and
   iv. to advise national and provincial organs of state regarding personnel practices in the public service, including those relating to the recruitment, appointment, transfer, discharge and other aspects of the careers of employees in the public service; and
g. to exercise or perform the additional powers or functions prescribed by an Act of Parliament.

5. The Commission is accountable to the National Assembly.
6. The Commission must report at least once a year in terms of subsection (4)(e)
   a. to the National Assembly; and
   b. in respect of its activities in a province, to the legislature of that province.'
7. The Commission has the following 14 commissioners appointed by the President:
   a. Five commissioners approved by the National Assembly in accordance with subsection (8)(a); and
   b. one commissioner for each province nominated by the Premier of the province in accordance with subsection (8)(b).
8.
   a. A commissioner appointed in terms of subsection (7)(a) must be —
      i. recommended by a committee of the National Assembly that is proportionally composed of members of all parties represented in the Assembly; and
      ii. approved by the Assembly by a resolution adopted with a supporting vote of a majority of its members.
   b. A commissioner nominated by the Premier of a province must be —
      i. recommended by a committee of the provincial legislature that is proportionally composed of members of all parties represented in the legislature; and
      ii. approved by the legislature by a resolution adopted with a supporting vote of a majority of its members.
9. An Act of Parliament must regulate the procedure for the appointment of commissioners.
10. A commissioner is appointed for a term of five years, which is renewable for one additional term only, and must be a woman or a man who is —
    a. a South African citizen; and
    b. a fit and proper person with knowledge of, or experience in, administration, management or the provision of public services.
11. A commissioner may be removed from office only on —
    a. the ground of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence;

b. a finding to that effect by a committee of the National Assembly or, in the case of a commissioner nominated by the Premier of a province, by a committee of the legislature of that province; and
c. the adoption by the Assembly or the provincial legislature concerned, of a resolution with a supporting vote of a majority of its members calling for the commissioner's removal from office.

12. The President must remove the relevant commissioner from office upon —
    a. the adoption by the Assembly of a resolution calling for that commissioner's removal; or
    b. written notification by the Premier that the provincial legislature has adopted a resolution calling for that commissioner's removal.
13. Commissioners referred to in subsection (7)(b) may exercise the powers and perform the functions of the Commission in their provinces as prescribed by national legislation.

197. Public Service

1. Within public administration there is a public service for the Republic, which must function, and be structured, in terms of national legislation, and which must loyally execute the lawful policies of the government of the day.
2. The terms and conditions of employment in the public service must be regulated by national legislation. Employees are entitled to a fair pension as regulated by national legislation.
3. No employee of the public service may be favoured or prejudiced only because that person supports a particular political party or cause.
4. Provincial governments are responsible for the recruitment, appointment, promotion, transfer and dismissal of members of the public service in their administrations within a framework of uniform norms and standards applying to the public service.[1]

23A.1 Principles and Objectives of Public Administration in a Constitutional Democracy

The relationship that a democratic state has with its inhabitants manifests itself in two ways: it exercises immense power and control over them on the one hand, and it is duty bound to protect them and provide them with public goods on the other. Its duty to protect and to distribute public goods has long been restricted and controlled by a multitude of common law and statutory sources. The entrenchment of the right to just administrative action[2] and a constellation of other constitutional and statutory mechanisms have brought the bureaucratic processes of government into line with the values and the principles enshrined in the Final Constitution.

Public administration encompasses the delivery of public services to citizens in a manner that contributes to the country's general survival and prosperity.[3] Public administration is, for the purposes of this chapter, a field of study concerned with administrative processes and the practical implementation by government of policies, laws and orders of court.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').
[2] FC s 33.
[3] See G Van der Waldt & A Hembold The Constitution and a New Public Administration (1995) 1-2, 6-7. Van der Waldt and Hembold note that when the state comes into being as a physical and organisational entity, it must be in a position to deliver such basic goods as health care, education, and physical protection.

In recent years, public administration theory has occasionally shown a heavy orientation toward critical theory and post-modern philosophical notions of government, governance, and power. However, most working public administration scholars support a classical definition of the term 'public administration' that gives appropriate weight to constitutionality, service, bureaucratic forms of organisation, and hierarchical government.[1]

The adjective 'public' usually denotes 'government' (serving the public interest), though it may encompass non-profit organisations such as those of civil society, or any entity and its management not specifically acting in self-interest. In practice, then, public administration is concerned with the day-to-day running of the state through the implementation of laws and policies. It does not include the affairs of policy-making organs like the Cabinet, the President and Deputy-President, or with provincial Premiers and Executive Councils. But it does embrace the various so-called line departments at national and provincial level, such as the Trade and Industry, Justice, Agriculture. The carrying out of public administration and the provision of public services gives rise to 'administrative action'.[2]

Public administration, at minimum, involves what Hoexter refers to as administrative 'acts'.[3] An 'administrative act' (which is a component of 'administrative action') is an act (conduct) which implements or gives effect to a policy, a piece of legislation or an adjudicative decision.[4] In Grey's Marine Hout Bay, Nugent JA held that:

> Whether particular conduct constitutes administrative action depends primarily on the nature of the power that is being exercised rather than upon the identity of the person who does so … Administrative action is rather, in general terms, the conduct of the bureaucracy (whoever the bureaucratic functionary might be) in carrying out the daily functions of the State which necessarily involves the application of policy, usually after its translation into law, with direct and immediate consequences for individuals or groups of individuals.[5]

This definition emphasizes the operational side of the state: since policies, laws and judgments are not self-executing; they have to be put into operation by public authorities responsible for administering them. Administrative acts include 'every conceivable aspect of government activity' — 'granting a licence, promoting a clerk, stamping a passport, arresting a suspect, [and] paying out a pension.'[6] In fact, as Boulle, Harris and Hoexter put it:

[1] Van der Waldt & Heinbold (supra) at 6-7.

[2] For more on FC s 33, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2002) Chapter 61. See also C Hoexter The New Constitutional & Administrative Law, Vol II (2002) 28; L Baxter Administrative Law (1984) 94-101.

[3] See Hoexter (supra) at 28.

[4] See Hoexter (supra) at 28; Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others (Treatment Action Campaign & Another as Amici Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('New Clicks') at para 592 (Sachs J).

[5] Greys Marine Hout Bay (Pty) Ltd & Others v Minister of Public Works & Others [2005] 3 All SA 33 (SCA) at para 24.

[6] Hoexter (supra) at 28-31.

> A feature of the modern state is that the administration is the most active branch of the state system, and in terms of the extensive authority delegated to it performs all of the functions which characterise contemporary government: formulating policy, regulating, policing, providing services, settling disputes, acting entrepreneurially, consuming, and controlling the economy.[1]

The public administration thus wields enormous power. Where the public administrators' conduct is administrative action, the conduct falls to be dealt with in the realm of administrative law, with its ensuing consequences. But when is the conduct of the state public and what is the exercise of public power? In Police and Prison Unions v Minister of Correctional Services, Plasket J noted that 'what makes the power involved a public power is the fact that it has been vested in a public functionary who is required to exercise it in the public interest, and not in his or her own private interest or at his or her own whim.' [2] The learned judge went on to assert that if a power is derived from statute, the body exercising that power is 'presumptively public'.[3] Thus, public power is exercised by a government actor or the state that derives its force from the Final Constitution as well as legislation. In Steenkamp, Moseneke DCJ wrote:

> When a tender board procures goods and services on behalf of government it wields power derived first from the Constitution itself and next from legislation in pursuit of constitutional goals. It bears repetition that the exercise and control of public power is always a constitutional matter. Section 195 of the Constitution further qualifies the exercise of public power by requiring that public administration be accountable, transparent and fair.[4]

In a similar vein, this chapter offers a functional account of the constitutional parameters of public power. It does not proffer a forensic analysis of the 'idea' of the South African bureaucracy.

The wording of FC Chapter 10 suggests that the public service is a narrower concept than public administration. The Constitutional Court has found, however, that > 'Public administration' and 'public service' are not terms of art which have such clearly distinct meanings. On the contrary, they are expressions which are often used interchangeably to connote the organisation as well as the public officials through which an executive implements that which it is empowered to implement.[5]

Presently, public administration in South Africa, as envisaged by the Department thereof, embraces three types of agencies:

[1] L Boulle, B Harris & C Hoexter Constitutional & Administrative Law (1989) 85.

[2] [2006] 2 All SA 175 (E) at para 51.

[3] Ibid at para 55.

[4] Steenkamp NO v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape CCT 71/05 (28 September 2006, as yet unreported)('Steenkamp') at para 20 (footnotes omitted).

[5] See Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v President of the RSA, 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC), 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC)('Premier, Western Cape') at para 47. The Court, in this instance, made the point that public administration and public service are necessarily linked to each other and are not entirely independent. It therefore rejected the opposite proposition proffered by the applicants. Following the Premier, Western Cape Court, I use the terms public administration and public service interchangeably in this chapter.

1. Administrative agencies, such as the Department of Public Service and Administration ('DPSA')[1], which provide services directly to other national departments and provincial administrations but not directly to the public;
2. Service delivery agencies, such as the departments of Health, Home Affairs and the South African Revenue Services, which deliver services directly to the public;[2] and
3. Statutory agencies, such as the Public Service Commission ('PSC') and the Auditor-General, which are established in terms of the Constitution or other legislation as entities independent from the executive with regulatory and monitoring functions in respect of the public service.[3]

To frame the significance of the public administration and the requirement of a functioning public service, it is worth pausing to consider how differently South Africa's apartheid state ran its government. That administration governed all South Africans in a manner that bore the taint of racism and other forms of discrimination. As the Constitutional Court pointed out in SARFU III:

> Public administration, which is part of the executive arm of government, is subject to a variety of constitutional controls. The Constitution is committed to establishing and maintaining an efficient, equitable and ethical public administration which respects fundamental rights and is accountable to the broader public. The importance of ensuring that the administration observes fundamental rights and acts both ethically and accountably should not be understated. In the past, the lives of the majority of South Africans were almost entirely governed by labyrinthine administrative regulations which, amongst other things, prohibited freedom of movement, controlled access to housing, education and jobs and which were implemented by a bureaucracy hostile to fundamental rights or accountability.[4]

The idea of organizing the administration of the state around the values and principles set out in the Final Constitution marks a major departure from the sinister manner in which many apartheid laws were executed. In our recent past, the emphasis was on power, not on duty. The contents of FC s 195-197, then, are crucial for two reasons. First, they reinforce the fact that we have moved away, both in theory and in practice, from the secretive law-making and the discriminatory policies of the pre-constitutional era. Our new dispensation requires transparency, accountability openness and responsiveness to the public.[5] Secondly, by making itself accountable, the public service, and therefore the public administration, theoretically raises public confidence in the government's ability to create and to maintain a functioning democracy.

[1] The DPSA manages the development of administrative policies and the legislative framework for transforming the public service. The policy and the legislative transformation process of recent years has moved from restructuring the fractured employee component to focussing on the restructuring and the modernisation of the public service.

[2] The service delivery agencies are presumably the agencies which the public have the most interaction with, and would be the agencies which perform 'administrative acts' and carry out 'administrative actions'.

[3] DPSA Green Paper on Transforming Public Service Delivery (17 December 1996) at para 7 available at http://www.info.gov.za/greenpapers/1996/transformingpublic.htm (last accessed, 14 April 2007).

[4] President of the Republic of South Africa v South Africa Rugby Football Union 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC)('SARFU III') at para 133.

[5] See New Clicks (supra) at paras 620-625.

However, while we have experienced a move away from apartheid-style state conduct, all indications are that the current government and its public administration have yet to observe fully the principles of transparency, accountability and responsiveness. Reports of negligence, fraud and corruption are seldom out of news headlines. Moreover, the Public Service Commission has consistently found that the public service and public administration have failed to meet their obligations in terms of FC s 195.[1]

The sometimes wayward nature of current government officials has not left us in disarray. The Final Constituion, various statutory sources and the common law have all operated as an effective check on abuses of power and omissions of duty.

23A.2 Structure and Function: Chapter 10

Public administration is structured around and functions according to the provisions of FC ss 195-197 and the attendant enabling legislation, the Public Service Act ('PSA'), the Public Service Commission Act ('PSCA') and their respective regulations. The Constitutional Court pointed out in Premier, Western Cape that:

> Chapter 10 applies to all aspects of public administration prescribing the basic values and principles that have to be adhered to, making it clear that they apply to 'administration in every sphere of government'. The public service is one of the administrations referred to, but the administrations of public enterprises and other organs of state by which 'public goods' are provided, are also subject to the general requirements of the chapter. Special requirements are laid down for the public service as a distinct administration, and it is in this context that the public service is referred to as being 'within public administration'.[2]

The three sections of Chapter 10 are organised as follows:

1. FC s 195 sets out the principles which 'must' apply to public administration, describes who such principles apply to, and provides for the enactment of national legislation in order to give effect to the principles as well as to provide for the organisation and structure of the public administration;
2. FC s 196 provides for the creation of the Public Service Commission ('PSC'); the PSC must promote the values and principles laid out in FC s 195, investigate the public administration and public service, and report its findings on the public service to the National Assembly or provincial government; and
3. FC s 197 provides for the creation of a public service which functions within the public administration. National legislation must provide for the structure and the organisation of the public service.

Chapter 10 would appear to envisage the enactment of at least three pieces of enabling legislation in order to provide for the requisite amplification and adequate implementation of its provisions: Thus far, only two pieces of enabling legislation have been enacted — the PSA in 1994 and the PSCA in 1997.

[1] See Public Service Commission White Paper on Transforming Public Service Delivery Government Gazette 18340 18 Sept 1997. Ideally the White Paper would serve as the practice manual for the public service.

[2] Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 44.

23A.3 FC s 195: Values and Principles Governing Public Administration

FC s 195 makes it peremptory for South Africa's public administration to take account of and implement its enumerated values and principles. Furthermore, the notion of good and efficient management of the public administration forms a crucial aspect of running government as a business enterprise: that is, the state is required to provide specific services to its client (the public), and the public pays for such services upfront, or by way of rates and taxes. The Final Constitution, enabling legislation, and where applicable, the common law, frame the relationship between the state (represented by government) and the public. These 'constants' are there to ensure that the government, which has been put into power by the people, does its job of serving the public in a just and fair manner, without fear or favour, and within the parameters laid down by the law.

FC s 195 (3) requires enactment of national legislation which gives effect to the principles contained in FC s 195(1). As yet, no single piece of legislation designed to cover the principles and the values enumerated in subsection 1 has been enacted.

That said, various pieces of other legislation give voice to 'fragments' of subsection 1: the Public Service Act[1] ('PSA'), the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act[2] ('PAJA'), the Promotion of Access to Information Act[3] ('PAIA'), the Public Finance Management Act[4] ('PFMA'), the Municipal Systems Act[5] ('MSA') and the Public Service Commission Act[6] ('PSC Act').[7] Moreover, the Department of Public Service and Administration and the PSC have a number of internal policy documents that incorporate the provisions of subsection 1 and thus seek to regulate the public service from within.[8]

The main objective of the PSA is to look after the actual machinery of public administration. This machinery provides the structural configuration of the public

[1] Act 103 of 1994.
[2] Act 3 of 2000.
[3] Act 2 of 2000.
[4] Act 1 of 1999.
[5] Act 32 of 2000. This Act is a component of the legislation which governs local government. The Act emphasises the requirement of an efficient, effective and transparent local public administration which is resonant with the constitutional principles of public administration and which aims to provide a framework for local public administration and human resource development. See Johannesburg Municipal Pension Fund & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2005 (6) SA 273 (W) ('Johannesburg Municipal Pensoin Fund') at para 13.
[6] Act 46 of 1997.
[7] See Democratic Alliance Western Cape v Western Cape Minister of Local Government and Another [2006] 1 All SA 384 (C) at para 5.
[8] As noted by the Constitutional Court in SARFU III, the public administration is subject to a variety of constitutional controls. SARFU III (supra) at para 133. The various pieces of legislation to which I have referred have all been enacted pursuant to constitutional instruction. The Protected Disclosures Act seeks to promote accountability, prevent corruption and protect so-called 'whistle-blowers'. Act 26 of 2000. The policy documents are usually internal, but some are available on goverment websites and on request.

service and the regulatory mechanisms thereof at national and provincial levels. It does not seek to provide South Africans with protection when there is a violation by the 'administration' of the requirements of FC s 195.

Of course, other legislation like PAJA and PAIA, promote FC s 195(1) values and principles. For example, the preamble of PAJA states that it was enacted pursuant to the promotion of an efficient administration and good governance; and to create a culture of accountability, openness and transparency in the public administration or in the exercise of a public power or the performance of a public function, by giving effect to the right to just administrative action.[1] These objectives clearly resonate with FC s 195.[2] Other sections within PAIA recognise that the secretive and the unresponsive culture of public bodies in the past led to abuses of power and human rights violations. PAIA, generally, fosters a culture of transparency and accountability in public and private bodies by granting citizens an effective right of access to information. The PSA — the enabling legislation envisaged by FC s 197 — requires that public administration must 'function' and 'be structured' by national legislation and that national legislation must regulate the 'terms and conditions of employment in the public service'.

Does the lack of a single piece of legislation to 'guard' these ideals leave an unconstitutional gap in our law? Or are FC s 195, FC s 196[3] and other applicable legislation — operating in conjunction with one another — sufficient for the present? While extant constitutional and statutory provisions may go a long way towards defining what ethical and accountable conduct means in the context of public administration, the absence of the super-ordinate legislation contemplated by FC s 195 would appear to constitute an unconstitutional abdication of responsibility by our national government. It goes without saying that the absence of such a statute has been a hindrance to the development of meaningful FC s 195 jurisprudence.

23A.4 Judicial Constructions of FC s 195

In Trend Fashions (Pty) Ltd v Commissioner for SARS and Another, the Cape High Court found that 'the Commissioner [of SARS] (and his officials) as part of the public administration, are obliged by virtue of the provisions of section 195(1) of the Constitution of South Africa, 1996, to apply the democratic principles enshrined in the Constitution and should act both ethically and accountably

[1] See also Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000.

[2] Unlike FC ss 32 and 33, FC s 195 does not form part of the Bill of Rights. It is, however, like the rest of the Final Constitution, covered by and enforceable under FC 2, the supremacy clause. FC s 2 reads: 'This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct which is inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it, must be fulfilled.'

[3] Section 196 establishes the PSC. The PSC operates as a watchdog over the public service as a whole and attempts to enforce FCs 195(1).

and without arbitrariness.'[1] As a result, the Trend Fashions court found that the existence of a tacit term is to be inferred into any contract with SARS — this tacit term could be inferred from a duty resting on organs of state to act ethically and accountably in terms of FC s 195(1). In Commissioner for SARS v Hawker Air Services (Pty) Ltd; In Re Commissioner for SARS v Hawker Aviation Services Partnership and Others, the High Court reached a similar conclusion.[2] It wrote, of SARS and of the public administration in general, that:

> Even, if SARS has a lawful and justifiable claim against a particular party then the applicant must surely act within the bounds of the law and not to subvert the law by misusing the process of the court actuated by impermissible ulterior purpose. The applicant and concomitantly SARS are part of the nation's public administration and they should act both ethically and accountably and not with an ulterior purpose. The very essence of public accountability is encapsulated in section 195(1)(f) of the Constitution which provides succinctly: 'Public administration must be accountable'. The doctrine of public accountability is one of the most important facets of modern public law. Its fundamental purpose is to check the over-zealous and sweeping misuse of power by the public administrator in a democratic State.[3] (My emphasis)

The Trend Fashions court and Hawker Aviation Services court reinforce two basic principles: that state conduct must be subject to public scrutiny in a functioning democracy; and that courts must be alive to the manner in which state power is exercised.

The Constitutional Court has played an active role in shaping our understanding of how the state, in a constitutional order committed to the rule of law, must respond to its citizens. In S v Makwanyane, Ackermann J wrote:

> We have moved from a past characterised by much which was arbitrary and unequal in the operation of the law to a present and a future in a constitutional State where State action must be such that it is capable of being analysed and justified rationally. The idea of the constitutional State presupposes a system whose operation can be rationally tested against or in terms of the law. Arbitrariness, by its very nature, is dissonant with these core concepts of our new constitutional order.[4]

[1] 2006 (2) BCLR 304 (C). This matter involved the demand of payments by the respondents upon the detention of imported shoes pending certain investigations. In respect of the claim for repayment of the provisional payments made in respect of two of the detained consignments, the court held that it was a tacit term of the agreement concluded between the respondents and the applicants (at the time of releasing the consignments when the provisional payments were made) that the provisional payments should be refunded in the event that the Commissioner failed to complete his investigation.

[2] [2005] 1 All SA 215 (T).

[3] The learned judge goes on say:

> The revenue service indeed plays a vital role in the public interest of collecting revenue because the economic well-being of the nation is a legitimate imperative to attain developmental goals to improve the quality of life of all citizens. In pursuit of this objective the revenue service is required to act in a highly principled way. It has an overriding duty to collect taxes in an efficient and effective manner from the one who is really owning rather than engaging in an illegitimate punitive expedition against another even though where the two are separate entities but may be inter-connected in some way or another. Unless provided for by law, the revenue service cannot willy-nilly shift the tax liability of one entity to another. To do so constitutes misuse of fiscal power. In such certain circumstances a court of law will not come to the assistance of the applicant when the applicant acts with an ulterior purpose by not only misusing its fiscal powers but also abusing the process of the court.

Ibid at para 25.

[4] S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 156.

This need to create a culture of justification — especially in relationships between state and subjects — was articulated most powerfully by the Constitutional Court in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers:

> It is a requirement of the rule of law that the exercise of public power by the executive and other functionaries should not be arbitrary. Decisions must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given, otherwise they are in effect arbitrary and inconsistent with this requirement. It follows that in order to pass constitutional scrutiny the exercise of public power by the executive and other functionaries must, at least, comply with this requirement. If it does not, it falls short of the standards demanded by our Constitution for such action.[1]

The Constitutional Court has, therefore, consistently held that the constitutional standard for the exercise of state power is (a) non-arbitrariness and (b) a rational connection between the public power exercised and the decision rendered or the objective to be achieved. In Police and Prison Unions v Minister of Correctional Services & Others, Plasket J, in traversing the source and the meaning of public power and the exercise thereof, found that courts play a critical role in determining whether public power has been properly exercised:

> [O]ne of the important roles that courts play in societies such as ours, and in our legal tradition, is to ensure that when statutory powers (and other public powers sourced in common law or in customary law) are given in trust to public functionaries for the purpose of furthering the public interest, those public functionaries do not abuse the trust reposed in them, remain within the bounds of their empowerment and exercise their powers reasonably and in a procedurally fair manner.[2]

For our immediate purposes, it is interesting to note that when matters regarding the conduct of public officials or organs of state have come before South African courts, they have used FC 195(1) values and principles as benchmarks against which state actions are measured.

In Steenkamp NO v The Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape, the Constitutional Court had to grapple with the issue of government liability for conduct that led to a monetary loss by the complainant. The Constitutional Court split as to the government's responsibility. However, of greater import than the outcome is that FC s 195 informs both the majority and the dissenting judgments. As Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke writes:

> There are indeed other cogent reasons why the application involves constitutional issues. First, when a tender board procures goods and services on behalf of government it wields power derived first from the Constitution itself and next from legislation in pursuit of constitutional goals. It bears repetition that the exercise and control of public power is always a constitutional matter. Section 195 of the Constitution further qualifies the exercise of public power by requiring that public administration be accountable, transparent and fair.[3]

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In re: ex parte President of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 85.

[2] [2006] 2 All SA 175 (E)('Police and Prison Unions') at para 56. See also Kate v MEC for Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape [2005] 1 All SA 745 (SE) at paras 1-6; Johannesburg Municipal Pension Fund (supra) at para 9 and paras 15–17.

[3] Steenkamp (supra) at para 20 (footnotes omitted).

Lower courts have made similar use of FC s 195. In Waters v Khayalami Metropolitan Council, the High Court found that FC s 195(1)(g) requires that transparency be fostered through the provision of timely, accessible and accurate information to the public.[1] The High Court struck down the Khayalami Council's actions on the grounds that they were inconsistent with constitutional principles of transparency, the right to lawful, fair and reasonable administrative action, the right to freedom of expression and a founding commitment to multi-party democracy. Navsa J wrote that the Khayalami Council, in coming to > grips with how an open and accountable society ought to operate[,] . . . has to recognise that in a democratic society those who hold power and are responsible for public administration ought to be open to criticism. It is the very cornerstone of democratic government.'[2]

However, courts have also held that there are limits to what the public should expect from the state in effectively and in efficiently carrying out its functions. In Eastern Metropolitan Substructure v Peter Klein Investments (Pty) Ltd, the municipal council had decided to launch a summons to recover rates due to it.[3] The High Court decided that the launch of a summons was not administrative action. It rather signalled the start of a court process. The High Court wrote:

> There is a constitutional obligation to foster a public administration which is efficient, effective and accountable to the broader public. To expect the plaintiff to afford its debtors a hearing prior to employment of the ordinary civil process to enforce payment is unreasonable and would create administrative inefficiency, a consequence that runs counter to the aforesaid constitutional objectives.[4]

Unfortunately, the Eastern Metropolitan Substructure court failed to consider whether the decision of the Municipality to recover the debts constituted a 'decision' for the purposes of PAJA, and if so, whether that may have had a bearing on the outcome. Plasket J put it neatly when he wrote that:

> The subservience of the [Department of Correctional Services] to the Constitution generally and section 195 in particular, the public character of the Department and the pre-eminence of the public interest in the proper administration of prisons and the attainment of the purposes specified in section 2 of the Correctional Services Act all strengthen my view that the powers that are sought to be reviewed in this matter are public powers as envisaged by the common law, the Constitution and the PAJA.[5]

The inextricable link between FC s 195 and FC s 33, as well as PAJA, cannot be overstated. When a public entity is alleged to have misused or abused its powers, a whole range of legal controls come into play: first, a public entity is 'subservient' to FC s 195; second, it may be that FC s 33 was infringed; third, legislation

[1] [1997] JOL 1305 (W).
[2] Ibid at page 24.
[3] 2001 (4) BCLR 344 (W).
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] Ibid at para 54.

governing the specific power of that entity may have been infringed; and fourth, the action brought by the aggrieved party may be governed by PAJA. A combination of any or all of these controls may be applicable in a specific matter. Such was the case in Steenkamp. In this regard, Moseneke DCJ held that the requirement of FC s 217 (which deals with state procurement), must be read together with administrative justice right in FC 33 and the basic values governing public administration set out in FC s 195(1).[1] In fact, all legislation enacted pursuant to constitutional directive, and which grants certain powers to the state when it interacts with the public in its various forms, implicates the right to administrative action[2] and every impugned action of the state must be assessed in light of the duties imposed by FC s 195.

In Reuters Group PLC & Others v Viljoen NO & Others, the applicants' launched a constitutional attack on the National Prosecuting Authority's honesty and integrity.[3] The High Court characterized the applicant's argument in terms of five inter-related propositions regarding the role of public officials in a constitutional state committed to the rule of law: (1) public officials are bound to act honestly and ethically; (2) they are bound by their lawful undertakings; (3) they may not embark on a course of conduct calculated to mislead or to create a false impression; (4) they are bound to make full disclosure of all material facts before seeking to exercise or to invoke the exercise of any power in circumstances where the affected parties are denied a hearing; and (5) they are bound to act fairly and lawfully.[4] The applicants contended that the respondents had undertaken to give

[1] Steenkamp (supra) at para 33.

[2] See PSC State of the Public Service Report 2006 (April 2006) 34. The Report notes that with regard to the public service specifically, the principle of acting without bias, and with fairness and impartiality, PAJA plays an essential role:

> A distinguishing feature that sets our democracy apart from Apartheid is the constitutional commitment to Just Service Delivery that is embodied in this principle. Not only is the capacity for this in the Public Service fundamental to redressing the legacy of the past, but it is also important for legitimising public administration thereby stabilizing our democracy. Here again, the necessary legal, normative and regulatory framework is in place. The primary legal instrument is the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act (PAJA) of 2000. At a normative level, the White Paper on the Transformation of the Public Service has been translated in the Batho Pele principles.
>
> With the PAJA, the Public Service is as yet to abide by it. Work needs to be done to enable the Public Service to comply with the PAJA, and senior management seriously needs the capacity to inculcate the Batho Pele principles as the underlying ethos of the Public Service.
>
> The PAJA requires departments to have mechanisms for explaining administrative action and redress where necessary. Most critically this Act requires public officials to understand what constitutes lawful administration and what does not.
>
> The capacity to establish mechanisms for explaining administrative actions and redress as envisaged in the PAJA is totally lacking in public service. This needs urgent attention particularly at senior management.

Ibid at 34.

[3] [2001] JOL 8645 (C)('Reuters'). The applicants were members of the press who challenged the respondents' decision on the grounds of honesty and integrity in public administration. The respondents were members of the National Director of Public Prosecutions and were attempting to obtain a certain videotape for the purposes of the trial, and had allegedly undertaken to give the applicants prior notice should they apply for international assistance. However, the National Director of Public Prosecutions then went ahead and applied for international assistance without informing the applicants.

[4] Ibid at paras 2-4.

timeous notice of any application for international co-operation, and, in giving such undertaking, had created a legitimate expectation that it would be honoured.

The High Court held that respondent's failure to honour that undertaking violated the principles enunciated above, and, in particular, FC s 33, FC s 195 and the rule of law.[1] The Reuters court specifically found that the correspondence between the parties showed that the respondents had made certain promises to the applicants as alleged and failed to honour them.[2] The court further found that the respondents' disingenuous behaviour constituted a breach of their obligation to behave in an open and transparent manner.[3] The court concluded that a declaration of invalidity was the only appropriate remedy under the circumstances.[4]

Treatment Action Campaign v Minister of Health offers a further example of the courts' interpretation of FC s 195(1).[5] In this matter, counsel for the applicant argued that FC s 195 creates justiciable rights. The High Court, in finding the respondent Ministry accountable,[6] agreed and noted that this point of law had been recognised in several decisions.[7]

[1] Reuters (supra) at para 4.
[2] Ibid at paras 34-36.
[3] Ibid at para 44.
[4] Ibid at para 47.
[5] 2005 (6) SA 363 (T)('Treatment Action Campaign v Minister of Health'). This matter turned solely on the liability for costs of an application made by the TAC for access to certain information. In making its finding, the High Court held that the Minister and her department had not complied with the constitutional obligations imposed upon them by FC s 195(1)(a), (which compels a high standard of professional ethics), FC s 195(1)(f), (which compels that public administration acts with accountability) and FC s 195(1)(g), (which requires transparency as well as the furnishing of timely and accurate access to information to the public.) The Minister had published references to 'annexures' in the version of the operational plan they released to the public in November 2003 when such annexures were not part of the operational plan. They failed to correct these errors in the published version of the operational plan and continued to make the incorrect version available to the public from their website until as late as October 2004. (The application was heard in November 2004.) For all these reasons, the court held the Ministry in breach of its constitutional obligations.
[6] Ibid at 369.
[7] See Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 44; Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape, and Another v Ngxuza and Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039) at para 15 n 23; Reuters Group plc and Others v Viljoen NO and Others (supra) at para 46; Nextcom (Pty) Ltd v Funde NO and Others 2000 (4) SA 491, 506J - 507E (T); Carephone (Pty) Ltd v Marcus NO and Others 1999 (3) SA 304 (LAC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1326 (LAC) at paras 9–14; SARFU (supra) at para 133. In Johannesburg Municipal Pension Fund v City of Johannesburg, the High Court offered a similar assessment of the justiciability of FC s 195:

> There appears to be merit in the applicants' contention that PAJA is not and cannot be exhaustive of the right to administrative justice. To hold otherwise would be subversive of the principle of constitutional supremacy. . . . But even if the conduct in question does not constitute 'administrative action' as defined in PAJA and that s 33 of the Constitution cannot be invoked directly, the conduct is subject to constitutional scrutiny under s 195 of the Constitution. Constitutional review is independent of the guarantee of administrative justice, and public administration is subject to a range of other constitutional controls including the Bill of Rights and s 195. . . . Section 195 expresses the broad values and principles upon which public administration is founded. This, however, does not lead to the conclusion that it does not also give rise to justiciable rights: the requirements of s 195 are expressly incorporated into the [Municipal] Systems Act and they have been relied upon in several cases.

Ibid at paras 15-17.

An opposite conclusion was reached on this point of law in Institute for Democracy in SA and Others v African National Congress and Others[1] ('IDASA'). The High Court in IDASA held that the language and syntax of FC s 195(1) is 'not couched in the form of rights, especially when compared with the clear provisions of Chapter 2 [the Bill of Rights].'[2] The judge therefore found that reliance upon FC s 195(1) for the purposes of demonstrating the infringement of a right was inapposite.

The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Transnet v Chirwa, has subsequently found that FC s 195(1) does not confer a right – even though the cause of action in the instant matter was against an organ of state bound by FC s 195.[3] The concurring judgment agreed with this conclusion.[4]

IDASA and Transnet offer a minority view on this point. The better part of the extant jurisprudence on public administration suggests that courts are not reluctant to hold the state accountable where it engages in conduct contrary to any of the nine principles enunciated in FC s 195(1). The Constitutional Court has yet to offer a definitive statement on the subject.

It may be that FC s 195(1) serves merely as an interpretative tool which guides a court's finding that the rule of law doctrine, FC s 33, or another justiciable right in the Bill of Rights has been violated. However, it would be absurd to contend that the phrasing of FC s 195(1), or its location in the Final Constitution (outside the Bill of Rights), makes its justiciability constitutionally impossible.[5]

The crisp question then is whether individuals – who are not the direct bearers of any rights that might be found in FC s 195, but who are, importantly, the beneficiaries of a duty owed by the government – can claim that FC s 195 creates justiciable rights? At the very least, the existence of the duties delineated in FC s 195 create an expectation on the part of the public that government will act in a certain manner. Were a member of the public or a state employee to lack legal recourse where an abrogation of FC s 195 duties occurs, FC s 195(1) would lack meaningful content. So while there may not as yet be a straightforward answer to the question of whether FC s 195(1) confers 'rights', it seems impossible to deny

[1] [2005] 3 All SA 45 (C).

[2] Ibid at para 40.

[3] Transnet Ltd v Chirwa (2006) 27 ILJ 2294 (SCA)(Mthiyane JA) at para 16. That FC s 195 contained justiciable rights was an argument offered in the alternative by the applicant.

[4] Conradie JA, in his concurring judgment, cited Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention (NICRO) & Others. 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO') at para 21. NICRO held that FC s 1 did not create discrete rights upon which litigants could rely. With respect, this holding was incorrectly relied on by Conradie J. FC s 1 is an explanatory provision. See C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds*) Constitutional Law of South Africa* (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13. The values contained in FC s 1 are expressed as rights and duties elsewhere in the Final Constitution. The text of FC s 1 is therefore materially different from that of FC s 195(1). Conradie J's reliance on the text of the former to interpret the latter is, as a result, inapt. The Supreme Court of Appeal decision was, at the time of writing, under appeal in the Constitutional Court.

[5] Again, many of the High Court judgments reinforce the incontrovertible proposition that public power is constrained by the Final Constitution, and that many of these constraints are spelled out in FC s 195. The principle of legality, the rule of law doctrine as well as FC s 33 turn these FC s 195 duties into justiciable constitutional obligations.

that it creates legitimate expectations that the state will indeed conduct itself in a particular manner. If the super-ordinate legislation contemplated in FC s 195(3) existed, then it would, inevitably, provide for causes of action related to the abrogation of FC s 195(1) principles. The failure of the state to promulgate such constitutionally-mandated legislation cannot free the state of its obligation to discharge the duties FC s 195 imposes. The failure to promulgate the super-ordinate legislation contemplated in FC s 195(3) leaves an unusual gap in the law with respect to the operation of the better part of the 'government machinery'. That gap must be viewed as constitutionally suspect.[1]

23A.5 Application of FC s 195(1)

FC s 195(1)'s values and principles should apply to the administration in every sphere of government,[2] organs of state,[3] and public enterprises.[4] The relationship between the three spheres of government — national, provincial and local — are described in Chapter 3 (FC ss 40 and 41.)[5] Organs of state are defined, as follows, in FC s 239:

(a) any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government;[6] or
(b) any other functionary or institution —
  (i) exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or
  (ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation, but does not include a court or a judicial officer.

The definition of 'organ of state' is dealt with a length in Chapter 31 — Application — of this treatise.[7] 'Public Enterprises' is used twice — in Chapter 10 and in [1] Whether we should be alarmed by the absence of enabling legislation for FC s 195(1) depends upon one's view of the rate at which 'enabling legislation' has been churned out by Parliament. It took Parliament almost 9 years to pass the enabling legislation for cooperative governance required by FC s 41(2): Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005. The absence of that legislation was neither an impediment to cooperative governance nor a barrier to judicial enforcement of the principles set out in FC Chapter 3. For more on the judicial construction of Chapter 3, and in particular FC s 41(2), in the absence of enabling legislation, see S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds*) Constitutional Law of South Africa* (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14. Similarly, the absence of enabling legislation in Chapter 10 does not in any way derogate from obligation of state, as represented by its public service within its administration, to comply with the principles articulated in Chapter 10. That said, PAJA and PAIA engage directly Chapter 10, and the gap in the law is made manifest when a matter that engages PAIA or PAJA also engages FC s 195(1).

[2] FC s 195(1)(f).

[3] FC s 195(1)(k).

[4] FC s 196(1)(l).

[5] For a discussion of FC ss 40 and 41 — FC Chapter 3 — see Woolman, Roux & Bekink 'Co-operative Government' (supra) at Chapter 14. Each distinct sphere is further described in FC Chapter 5 (the President and the National Executive), FC Chapter 6 (Provinces) and FC Chapter 7 (Local Government).

[6] Departments are created by and disestablished through the provisions of the Public Service Act.

[7] For a detailed discussion of FC s 239 and the meaning of 'organ of state', see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

Part 4 of Schedule 4 — but it is not described anywhere in the Final Constitution. The Department of Public Enterprises lists the following as 'state-owned enterprises': Alexcor, Denel, South African Airways, Eskom, Transnet and Safcol. The PFMA would appear to expand that list when it refers to 'national government business enterprises' and 'national public entities'.[1]

FC s 195 contemplates a sophisticated and nuanced framework — in the form of national legislation — for working out the manner in which FC s 195 applies to spheres of government, organs of state and public enterprises. Such 'national legislation' must provide for the regulation of public administration,[2] must regulate the appointment of persons who will serve in the administration,[3] may differentiate between different sectors, administrations and institutions,[4] and should take into account various factors when determining the regulation of public administration.[5]

23A.6 FC s 196: The Public Service Commission

The Public Service Commission ('PSC' or 'Commission') oversees the government's interaction with the South African public. The Commission's role is not exclusively that of watchdog. It also acts as investigator, counsellor and whistleblower.

In Premier, Western Cape, the Constitutional Court noted that the current PSC has less control over the public service than its predecessors.[6] While the PSC carries out the various functions listed above, the 'directions' that it may give to the public service are confined to ensuring that procedures relating to employees of the public service comply with the principles set out in FC s 195.[7] The Premier, Western Cape Court raised, but did not answer, the question of how the PSC might

[1] For a discussion of public enterprises in the context of public finance, see R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27. 'National government business enterprise' is defined, in the PFMA, as an entity which —

(a) is a juristic person under the ownership control of the national executive;
(b) has been assigned financial and operational authority to carry on a business opportunity;
(c) as its principal business, provides goods or services in accordance with ordinary business principles; and
(d) is financed fully or substantially from sources other than —
  (i) The National Revenue Fund; or
  (ii) By way of tax, levy or other statutory money.'

'National public entity' is defined, in the PFMA, as meaning:

(a) a national public entity; or
(b) a board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity (other than a national government business enterprise) which is —
  (i) established in terms of national legislation;
  (ii) fully or substantially funded either from the National Revenue Fund, or by way of tax, levy or other money imposed in terms of national legislation; and
  (iii) accountable to Parliament.

PFMA s 1.

[2] FC s 195(3).

[3] FC s 195(4).

[4] FC s 195(5).

[5] FC s 195(6).

[6] Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC)('Premier, Western Cape').

[7] Ibid at para 24. See also FC s 196(4)(d).

implement such directions since this question was not squarely before the Court. That question continues to hover over the PSC.

The PSC is required to work in conjunction with other bodies, like the Auditor-General, to ensure that the Public Service complies with its constitutional mandate. As was noted by the Constitutional Court in Second Certification Judgment, '[t]he PSC's primary function is to promote a high standard of professional ethics in the public service'.[1] But while the PSC has important supervisory and watchdog functions, much of the PSC's work remains of 'an advisory nature.'[2] The PSC Act provides for an elaboration on the monitoring and reporting role of the Commission.[3] These functions encompass inspections, inquiries, and rule-making. The Act also provides for penalties for obstruction of the Commission and for the assignment of functions by the Commission.

As far as inspections are concerned, the Act provides that the Commission may inspect departments and other organisational components in the public service.[4] It grants the PSC access to official documents and to information from heads of those departments or organisational components or from other officers in the service of those departments or organisational components as may be necessary for the performance of the functions of the Commission under the Final Constitution or the Public Service Act.

In fulfilling its functions, the PSC may conduct an inquiry into any matter in respect of which it is authorised by the Final Constitution or the Public Service Act to perform.[5] For the purposes of the inquiry, the Commission may summon any person who may be able to give information of material importance concerning the subject of the inquiry or who has in his or her possession or custody or under his or her control any book, document or object which may have a bearing on the subject of the inquiry, to appear before the Commission.[6] The PSC may

[1] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97) (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 142.

[2] The PSC generally submits annual reports. It also submits and publicises other reports which weed out improper and inefficient administration. For example, in August 2006 the PSC released their annual financial misconduct report (2004-2005 financial year). In it, the PSC revealed that five national departments (Trade and Industry, Public Works, Justice and Constitutional Development, Home Affairs and Environmental Affairs and Tourism) failed to submit financial misconduct cases to it in terms of the Public Finance Management Act. In terms of financial irregularities found, the highest number of reported irregularities occurred in the Defence department, followed by Correctional Services and the Police Service. Fraud, theft, misappropriation of funds, gross negligence and bribery were the most common forms of misconduct found, while the positions within the Public Service most abused include Senior Accounting Clerks, Chief Financial Clerks, and in the case of the Police Service, Inspectors. Many cases of abuse were also found at senior managerial levels. This report also indicated that although 77% of state employees who were charged were found guilty, only 33% were fired. Criminal charges were instituted against 155 public servants. In the light of this widespread abuse, the PSC declared that it wished to report on national and provincial departments twice annually, not once. See A Musgrave 'Department not Reporting Misconduct' Business Day (4 August 2006), available at http:/www.businessday.co.za/Articles/TarkArticleaspx?id=216634 (last accessed 18 April 2007).

[3] The Act is mandated by FC s 196 and is called the Public Service Commission Act 46 of 1997.

[4] PSC Act s 9.

[5] PSC Act s 10(1).

[6] PSC Act s 10(2)(a).

also call upon and administer an oath to, or accept an affirmation from, any person present at the inquiry who has or might have been summonsed.[1] Finally, the PSC may examine or require any person who has been called upon to produce any book, document or object in his or her possession or custody or under his or her control which may have a bearing on the subject of the inquiry.[2]

Any person who is obliged to appear, or to produce any document or information, and contravenes that obligation without sufficient cause shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to both such fine and such imprisonment.[3] Further, any person who hinders or obstructs the Commission in the performance of its functions under the Final Constitution or the Public Service Act shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to both such fine and such imprisonment.[4]

The PSC may make rules which are not inconsistent with the Act or the Final Constitution regarding:

(a) the investigation, monitoring and evaluation of those matters to which section 196 (4) of the Constitution relates, the procedure to be followed at any such investigation, the documents to be submitted to the Commission in connection with any such investigation, and the manner in which and the time within which the documents shall be submitted;

(b) the powers and duties of the chairperson, the deputy chairperson or any other commissioner, and the delegation or assignment of any power and duty entrusted to the Commission by or under the Act, the Constitution or the Public Service Act to a commissioner referred to in section 196 (7) (b) of the Constitution;

(c) the manner in which meetings of the Commission shall be convened, the procedure to be followed at those meetings and the conduct of its business, the quorum at those meetings, and the manner in which minutes of those meetings shall be kept; and

(d) any matter required or permitted to be prescribed by rule under the Act.[5]

The PSC may delegate to one or more commissioners, or to an officer or officers, any power conferred upon the Commission by or under the Act, the Final Constitution or the Public Service Act, excluding the power to delegate or the power to make rules.[6] The PSC may also authorise one or more commissioners, or an officer or officers, to perform any duty assigned to the Commission by or under the Act, the Constitution or the Public Service Act, excluding the duty to report to the National Assembly and provincial legislatures in terms of section FC s 196 (6).[7]

[1] PSC Act s 10(2)(b).
[2] PSC Act s 10(2)(c).
[3] PSC Act s 10(4).
[4] PSC Act s 12.
[5] PSC Act s 11.
[6] PSC Act s 13(1)(a).
[7] PSC Act s 13(1)(b).

The PSC may revoke or amend any delegation or authorisation at any time.[1]

The PSC, although not a Chapter 9 Institution, certainly functions like one.[2] The PSC is also accountable to the National Assembly, to which it must submit a report annually. The PSC must also report to a provincial legislature when it has undertaken activities in that province.

As far as the staffing of the PSC goes, the Final Constitution provides that fourteen commissioners will make up the Commission. All the Commissioners are appointed by the President. Five of the Commissioners are approved by the National Assembly. These five persons are recommended by a committee of the National Assembly, and must be representatives from all parties represented in the National Assembly. The Assembly will then adopt a resolution which must be supported by a vote by a majority of the members for appointment of those persons by the President.

The Premier of each of the nine provinces chooses one Commissioner. These nine Commissioners are chosen through the same process as in the National Assembly.

Commissioners are appointed for a five-year term, renewable only once. They may be removed from office due to misconduct, incapacity or incompetence. They may only be removed by the President after the National Assembly has adopted a resolution supported by a majority vote of the Assembly.[3]

23A.7 The Public Service Commisson Report

In its 2006 State of the Public Service Report, the PSC notes that:

> The four State of the Public Service Reports preceding this one, although focusing on broader issues, consistently raise the critical issue of the capacity of the Public Service. To ensure that the issue receives urgent and dedicated attention this edition of the State of the Public Service Report focuses singularly on the assessment of its strengths and weakness, and recommends ways in which it can be enhanced. The analytical approach of the report is

[1] PSC Act s 13(2).

[2] For a detailed discussion of Chapter Nine Institutions, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; J Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24C; C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D; J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24E, S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

[3] See PSC Act ss 3-7 for more detail on the appointment of Commissioners.

> predicated on the nine Constitutional values and principles for public administration that are enshrined in Chapter 10 of the Constitution as fundamental imperatives for our Public Service.[1]

As part of its constitutional mandate, the PSC produces and publicises an annual report that casts a critical eye on public administration and the public service. It does so by measuring the public service's conduct and performance against each of the nine principles and values of FC s 195(1). In doing so, the PSC gives meaning to each of the enumerated principles. The 2006 State of the Public Service Report briefly explains how the Commission evaluates the Public Service in terms of FC s 195(1)'s utilising the nine constitutional principles and values of public administration in order to determine how each of the 'nine principles and values can reinforce a systematic and holistic approach to strategies to gird the capacity of the Public Service.'[2]

As mentioned above, the Commission bases its evaluation of the public service on the 'fundamental imperatives' contained in FC s 195(1). The first principle, which imposes a duty to promote a high standard of ethics, is important for maintaining a reliable public service. The Commission notes that this duty is particularly crucial for ensuring that economic growth and service delivery are not jeopardised by tardy or dishonest officials. With regard to the requirement for efficiency, economy and effectiveness in the use of resources, it is the Commission's view that the public service should have the capacity for sound financial management and that the respective departments and agencies should have the ability to understand government's plans about service delivery. Departments should also have the capacity to determine success and failure in the course of implementing those plans. The principle of development orientation requires government departments to have the ability to design and to implement effective socio-economic interventions aimed at poverty reduction. The fourth principle, which deals with impartiality, fairness and equity in service delivery, requires the public service to have the ability to show an understanding of what kinds of actions and conduct would constitute bias, how bias should be prevented, and how to interface with the public on an equitable basis. Participatory responsiveness of the public service, which is the fifth of the nine principles, requires the public service to show that, in meeting the needs of the public, it has the capacity to promote and to sustain public participation in its activities.

The next principle has been the subject of a fair amount of litigation against the public service and other organs of state. This is the principle of accountability. From the Commission's perspective, this principle 'requires the public service to have the capacity to hold itself up to scrutiny and be answerable for its conduct and activities.' The PSC expects there to be credible mechanisms in place in order to assess a specific department's accountability. Good management and the ability to provide comprehensive reports are deemed to foster accountability. On fostering transparency, the PSC has stated that the activities of the public service must empower the public to exercise its rights fully.[1]

[1] 'Executive Summary' 2006 State of the Public Service Report (2006).
[2] Ibid at 12.

The last two principles are those of good human resource management and representivity. These principles speak to both the capacity of and the management of the public service and its ability to implement government policies and become a legitimate service provider.

From a practical and statistical point of view, the PSC report purports to be a crucial gauge for use by both government and the public as to whether and to what extent the public service is complying with its constitutional mandate. It is, in fact, the sole gauge in respect of the performance of the public service. Unfortunately, the PSC lacks the resources to carry out its immense oversight responsibilities. As far as watchdogs go, its bark is worse than its bite. That said, it is alive and barking loudly.

23A.8 FC 197: The Public Service

FC s 197 establishes a Public Service for the Republic. The Public Service operates within the Public Administration. The content of FC s 197 is therefore closely linked to the content of FC s 195. Indeed, the provisions of FC s 195(4)-(6) overlap with the provisions of FC s 197.

The Public Service, once established according to FC s 197(1), is to 'lawfully execute the policies of the government of the day.' FC s 197 requires national legislation to cater for the structure and functioning of the public service. FC s 197 also requires that those who make up the public service execute their duties loyally, regardless of their political affiliation, and should, in turn, not be favoured or prejudiced by such affiliation.

The long title of the Public Service Act states that it was enacted to 'provide for the organisation and administration of the public service of the Republic, the regulation of the conditions of employment, terms of office, discipline, retirement and discharge of members of the Public Service, and matters connected therewith.' FC s 195(4)-(6) also speaks to the 'organisation and administration' of the Public Service. Thus, it would seem that at least part of the FC s 195's 'enabling legislation' requirements have been satisfied by the Public Service Act.

The Public Service Act should be viewed as the organisational backbone of Chapter 10. It creates, as per FC s 197's instructions, a single public service that functions as part of the public administration of the national, provincial and local governments. In Premier, Western Cape, the Court explained the rationale for this requirement:

[1] The report goes on to note that the absence of timely and accurate information can severely handicap the ability of the public to benefit from the services provided by the Public Service.

> The Constitution requires that one public service be established to implement national and provincial laws. It is presumably for this reason and in order to avoid any dispute thereon that the competence concerning the structure and functioning of the public service is dealt with specifically in the Constitution, and was not left to be dealt with under the general legislative power conferred on parliament by section 44(1)(a). If the Constitution had provided that the structure and control of all aspects of the public service would reside solely at national sphere, personnel would be employed by and answerable to national functionaries, and as was pointed out in the First Certification Judgment, that would have detracted materially from the legitimate autonomy of the provinces. On the other hand, if each province and the national government had the power to structure and control their respective segments of the public service, there would in substance be several public services and the concept of one public service would be a fiction. The compromise struck by the Constitution is that the framework for the public service must be set by national legislation, but employment, transfers etc. are the responsibility of the various administrations of which the public service is composed. That compromise was certified by this Court as being consistent with the [Constitutional Principles].[1]

A single public service is consistent with the constitutional principles envisaged by the framers. Given the economic and social disparities which exist amongst the nine provinces, a uniform framework that serves the Republic is preferable to disparate services that offer uneven and unequal service delivery.[2] From a practical point of view, the same conditions of service should apply to all public servants. In addition, monitoring compliance with the requirements of the Act is made substantially easier if one is asked to engage a single entity. That said, each province manages its own employment and dismissals — and thus, the provinces create, to some degree, nine different systems of public service.

The PSA applies to persons within the public service and to persons who were previously employed in the public service. The PSA does not apply to certain persons in the employ of 'state educational institutions',[3] 'the services',[4] the 'Academy',[5] the 'Service'[6] or the 'Agency'.[7] The public service is described in [1] Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 46. This judgment dealt with FC ss 196 and 197 in some detail because the Western Cape challenged the 1998 amendments to the Public Service Act.

[2] Mashavha v President of the RSA & Others 2005 (2) SA 476, (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC) at paras 20 and 59.

[3] The PSA defines 'state educational institution' in section 1 as 'an institution (including an office controlling such an institution), other than a university or technikon, which is wholly or partially funded by the State and in regard to which the remuneration and service conditions of educators are determined by law'.

[4] The PSA defines 'the services' as 'the Permanent Force of the National Defence Force', 'the South African Police Service' and 'the Department of Correctional Services'.

[5] The PSA defines 'the academy' as 'the South African National Academy of Intelligence as defined in section 1 of the Intelligence Services Act, 2002'.

[6] The PSA defines 'service' as 'the Service as defined in section 1 of the Intelligence Services Act, 2002'.

[7] The PSA defines 'Agency' as 'Agency defined in section 1 of the Intelligence Services Act, 2002'.

section 8 of the PSA as consisting of persons who hold posts in the fixed establishment[1] and those persons in state educational institutions, the services, the Agency, the Service or the Academy to whom the Act does apply. Public officials for the purposes of public administration constitute both a broader and a distinct category of employee.

The PSA also provides for the creation and the abolition of departments within the national and provincial spheres. The different departments are identified in column 1 of the two schedules to the PSA and the heads of each department are identified by their designation in column 2 of the two schedules.[2] The creation or the abolition of a national department is a power granted to the Minister of Public Service and Administration. The Minister may advise the President on whether a department should be created or abolished. The President may then amend the relevant schedule accordingly.[3] The Premier of a province also has powers to create or to abolish provincial departments in terms of the PSA.[4]

[1] The PSA defines 'the public service' as 'the posts which have been created for the normal and regular requirements of a department'.

[2] Schedule 1 is a list of the national departments and their respective heads while Schedule 2 is a list of the Provincial departments of all nine provinces and their respective heads. Schedule 3 refers to the Organisational Components and Heads thereof.

[3] PSA s 3(3)(a). The Minister may also transfer and allocate of functions of the different departments in consultation with the executing authorities concerned.

[4] PSA s 3A*(a)* read in conjunction with s 7(5). The Premier also has the power to transfer and allocate functions of the different departments.

23B Security Services

*Stu Woolman

23B.1 Introduction 23B–1
23B.2 Historical Background: Transformation and the Development of the Post-Apartheid Security Services 23B–4
23B.3 The South African Police Service 23B–9
(a) Composition, structure and mandate 23B–9
(b) Control and management 23B–11
(c) The SAPS and fundamental rights 23B–12
(i) Use of force by the police. 23B–12
(aa) Govender and Walters. 23B–13
(bb) Changes to CPA s 49 in light of Walters. . . 23B–15
(cc) Shoot to Kill? Proposed Amendments Designed to Undermine Constitutionally Mandated Changes to CPA s 49. . . . . 23B–16
(ii) Human rights violations by the police 23B–18
(iii) Duty to protect the public. 23B–21
(aa) Carmichele and K. 23B–21
(bb) F: The rollback of Carmichele and K? 23B–25
(cc) Novel uses of cost orders as constitutional remedies. 23B–29
(d) Limitations on the rights of SAPS members 23B–31
(e) Accountability and Oversight 23B–35
(i) Executive and parliamentary oversight. 23B–35
(ii) Independent Complaints Directorate. 23B–37
(iii) Community Policing Forums 23B–41
(iv) Police malfeasance, incompetence and corruption 23B–41
(aa) The Auditor-General's Report on Police Service Delivery (2009). 23B–42
(bb) Public Protector's Report (2011): Against the Rules 23B–42
(cc) Special Investigative Unit 2011 Preliminary Reports 23B–43
23B.4 The South African National Defence Force. 23B–44
(a) Composition, structure and functions 23B–44
(b) Civil military relations 23B–45

(c) Military discipline 23B–47
(d) Limitations on the rights of SANDF members 23B–48
23B.5 South African Intelligence Services 23B–54
(a) Composition, structure and functions 23B–54
(b) Control, oversight and accountability 23B–56
(i) Parliamentary oversight 23B–56
(ii) Inspector-General 23B–57
(iii) The National Intelligence Co-ordinating Committee 23B–61
(iv) Executive control and oversight 23B–61
(c) Rights issues facing the intelligence agencies 23B–66
(i) Interception of private communications 23B–66
(ii) Compliance with the principle of open justice . . 23B–68
(aa) MISS and the missing Open Democracy Bill 23B–68
(bb) Independent Newspapers and the principle of open justice 23B–68
(iii) The Protection of Information Bill: A necessary evil with potential constitutional infringements . . 23B–76
23B.6 Other Role Players in the Security Sector 23B–81
(a) The Directorate for Special Operations ('DSO' or 'Scorpions') 23B–81
(b) Directorate of Priority Crimes Investigation ('DPCI' or 'Hawks') 23B–83
(i) Powers and functions of the DPCI 23B–83
(ii) Glenister I: Not ripe enough 23B–84
(iii) Between Glenister I and Glenister II: Legality, rationality review and an anti-domination doctrine 23B–85
(iv) Glenister II: Rights, duties, international law, reasonableness review and a principle of anti-corruption 23B–88
(c) Electronic Communications (Pty) Ltd ('Comsec') 23B–91
(d) National Communications Centre ('NCC') 23B–92
(e) Office for Interception Centres ('OIC') 23B–92

23B.1 INTRODUCTION

South Africa has, over the past seventeen years, transformed itself from a rascist, fascist state ruled by a white minority into a non-racial constitutional democracy whose twin grundnorms are respect for human dignity and for the rule of law. Nowhere have these changes had a more profound effect in South African society than on our security services: the police, the military and the intelligence agencies.[1]

From Hobbes onward, the western philosophical tradition has engaged in an ongoing conversation regarding the need to trade off liberty against security, and security against liberty. However, as Jeremy Waldron has noted:

> Trading off liberty against security has a treacherous logic. It beckons us in with easy cases — the trivial amount of freedom restricted when we are made to take our shoes off at the security checkpoint when we board an airplane is the price of an assurance that we will not be blown up by any imitators of Richard Reid. But it is also a logic that has been used to justify spying without a warrant, mass detentions, incarceration without trial, and abusive interrogation. In each case, we are told, some safeguards must be given up in the interests of security.[2]

---

* I would like to express my gratitude to Kim Robinson and Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti for their significant contributions to the first iteration of this chapter. Juha Tuovinen's research assistance proved invaluable for this second iteration of the chapter. I save my profoundest thanks for Michael Bishop and Jason Brickhill. Both understand that the vocation of editing requires time-consuming, substantive engagement with a text, that the true calling of editing demands that they ensure that every line scans, that their efforts may cause their authors some consternation and that their hard work will ultimately disappear into the author's final text. The quality of their work is on display throughout this chapter. All errors, however, remain my responsibility alone.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') s 1 provides: '[t]he Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values: (a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms. (b) Non-racialism and non-sexism. (c) Supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law. (d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.' The composition of the security services is dealt with in FC s 199(1). Whether South Africa is best described as a multi-party democracy or a one-party dominant democracy is a question taken up by Sujit Choudhry in '"He had a mandate": The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in a Dominant Party Democracy' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 1.

Choudhry's views shape, in part, this chapter's analysis of the relationship between the political branches of our constitutional democracy, the judiciary and our security services. See also H Klug 'Finding the Constitutional Court's Place in South Africa's Democracy: The Interaction of Principle and Institutional Pragmatism in the Court's Decision-making' (2010) 3 Constitutional Court Review 1. For the ur-text with respect to institutional analysis of the Constitutional Court, see T Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa (2008) 7 I-CON 106. See also See T Roux The Politics of Principle: The First South African Constitutional Court 1995-2005 (forthcoming 2012).

[2] J Waldron 'Is this Torture Necessary?' (2007) 54(16) The New York Review of Books 40. See also D Cole & J Lobel Less Free, Less Safe: Why America is Losing the War on Terror (2007); I Loader & N Walker Civilizing Security (2007); L Lazarus Security and Human Rights (2007); R Posner Not a Suicide Pact: The Constitution in a Time of National Emergency (Inalienable Rights) (2006); C Sunstein The Laws of Fear: Beyond the Precautionary Principle (2005); R Posner Preventing Surprise Attacks: Intelligence Reform in the Wake of 9/11(2005); J Waldron 'Safety and Security' (2006) 85 Nebraska Law Review 454; N Fritz 'States of Emergency' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 61. If our Constitutional Court's vaunted jurisprudence on the right and the value of human dignity is to retain its currency, it must be able provide a bulwark against the dehumanisation associated with the security state. See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

And yet, physical security, is undoubtedly a prerequisite for the meaningful exercise of democracy and human rights in today's South Africa. In speaking both to the ugliness of our past, and the present's current dangers, former President Mbeki stated that:

> We cannot erase that which is ugly and repulsive and claim the happiness that comes with freedom if communities live in fear; closeted behind walls and barbed wire, ever anxious in their houses, on the streets and on our roads, unable freely to enjoy our public spaces.[1]

The Final Constitution gives additional voice, in manifold ways, to this most basic desire to live in a secure, yet free, environment. FC s 198*(a)* provides: 'National security must reflect the resolve of South Africans, as individuals and as a nation, to live as equals, to live in peace and harmony, to be free from fear and want and to seek a better life.' FC s 12(1) reads, in relevant part: 'Everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right … to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources.' FC s 200(2) states: 'The primary object of the defence force is to defend and protect the Republic, its territorial integrity and its people.' FC s 205(3) declares: 'The objects of the police service are to prevent, combat and investigate crime, to maintain public order, to protect and secure the inhabitants of the Republic and their property, and to uphold and enforce the law.' Finally, the same agencies that denied us our fundamental rights under apartheid are under a general obligation — found in FC s 7 — to respect, protect, promote and fulfil our fundamental rights.[2]

With respect to the security services, the drafters of the Final Constitution were actually more ambitious than even FC s 7 suggests. The Final Constitution imposes positive obligations on members of the security services to entrench the normative underpinnings of our basic law. Under FC s 199(5), '[t]he security services must act, and must teach and require their members to act in accordance with the Constitution and the law, including customary international law and international agreements binding on the Republic.'[3]

An exemplary Constitution, a robust Bill of Rights, model pieces of legislation, and oversight mechanisms constitute only the beginning of South Africa's formal efforts to strike the right balance between liberty and security. The proof is, however, in the pudding. Have the policies and the practices of our security services met the demands of the Final Constitution[4] and the statutes that govern their daily operations?[5] According to the first iteration of this chapter, penned in 2007, the interim reviews were 'decidely mixed'. Four years on, and new reviews are in. They are largely negative.

---

[1] T Mbeki 'State of the Nation Address' (9 February 2007) available at http://www.polity.org.za (accessed on 5 November 2007).

[2] FC s 7(2) states: 'The State must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.'

[3] FC s 199(5).

[4] FC ss 198–210.

[5] See, eg, J Rauch 'The South African Police and the Truth Commission' (2005) 36(2) South African Review of Sociology 224, available at http://www.kas.de/db_files/dokumente/7_dokument_dok_pdf_4865_2.pdf (accessed 28 October 2007)(Suggests that, despite substantial efforts to effect the transformation and the reformation of a brutal culture, the SAPS has some distance to go.)

In 2007, I suspected that the Directorate for Special Operations, 'the Scorpions', might well be 'victims of their own success.' And indeed, this highly successful police unit, embedded in the National Prosecuting Authority, was disbanded in 2009. Both its independence and it achievements in rooting out corruption in our one party dominant state made its continued existence politically undesirable. A pale facsimile, the Directorate of Priority Crimes Investigations, or 'the Hawks', supplanted the Scorpions. In observing the Machiavellian maxim, 'keep your friends close and your enemies closer,' the government -– fearful of further revelations — placed the Hawks under the watchful eye of one our most corrupt and inept government agencies: the police.

If virtue and justice have a place in our government today, then recent reports by the Public Protector, the Auditor-General and the Special Investigating Unit ('SIU') on rampant police corruption demonstrate that some members of government are watching the watchers. Indeed, the corruption is so deep and so widespread that the SIU initially stated that it only had the capacity to investigate the top 20 worst cases.

The Constitutional Court has also been quite alive to the damage that a non-independent (and palpably corrupt) police force can inflict on a constitutional democracy committed to the rule of law. In Glenister II, the Constitutional Court found the disbandment of the Scorpions unconstitutional.[1] In a somewhat convoluted judgment, the Court held that FC s 7(2), when read with various substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights, South Africa's obligations under international law, and the constitutional obligation of the police, required the creation and the maintenance of an independent investigatory unit that operates free of fear, favour or prejudice.[2] While the government has agreed to abide by the order, precisely how it will do so over the next eighteen months is a matter of conjecture. One can be forgiven for forecasting the inevitable arrival of a Glenister III on the Constitutional Court's docket in two year's time.

A final area about which this chapter expressed some concern turns on the Executive's involvement in and control over the Intelligence Services. In a well-functioning constitutional democracy, intelligence services provide relatively unbiased information about potential threats to the commonweal. The danger, of course, exists that the government of the day will manipulate and coerce intelligence into the service of political ends both domestic and foreign. (In this regard, South Africa's intelligence services have suffered no worse a fate than the intelligence services of the United States or the United Kingdom in having their offices and the proper scope of their activities subverted by the office of the President or Prime Minister.) The Constitutional Court's response has been rather muted, given the complexity of the cases

[1] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6.

[2] As I discuss later, Glenister II tracks my (pre-Glenister I and II) circa 2007 claim that the police, and the security forces generally, are subject to FC s 7(2)'s obligation to respect, protect, promote, and fulfil our fundamental rights and FC s 199(5)'s duty to 'teach and require their members to act in accordance with the Constitution and the law, including customary international law and international agreements binding on the Republic.'

that have come before it. However, in Independent Newspapers,[1] the Court extended the principle of open justice first articulated in Shinga and SABC. This principle should allow citizens greater access to the information used (and sometimes abused) by our intelligence services and the Executive in the context of judicial proceedings. In developing this principle of open justice, the Court has revealed a willingness to subject the national security claims of, and the classification of documents by, the Executive to judicial scrutiny. What remains to be seen is whether this principle of open justice will be robust enough to counter the deleterious conduct of a government whose actions occasionally leave the impression that it believes itself to be above the law and unaccountable to the people of South Africa. What the courts are certain to entertain in this domain in the not too distant future are challenges based upon provisions similar to those that underpin the principle of open justice principle when the controversial Protection of Information Bill[2] currently tabled in Parliament finally becomes law.[3]

The remainder of this chapter provides a brief history of South Africa's post-apartheid security services. It then sets out the powers and the functions of the security services as adumbrated in the Final Constitution and more fully elaborated in enabling legislation. In each functional area, the courts have been deeply engaged with both the constitutional and the statutory constraints placed upon our security forces. They have, in addition to what I have sketched out above, generated a substantial body of jurisprudence about how we should watch the watchers.

23B.2 Historical Background: Transformation and the Development of the Post-Apartheid Security Services

Prior to 1994, the South African security state suppressed political protest and denied basic liberties to the majority of its citizens through a network of highly repressive security legislation and a security service committed to legal forms of law enforcement and extra-legal forms of oppression, abuse and humiliation. The enforcement of apartheid's grossly inhumane system of pass laws, separate amenities arrangements and separate development programmes demanded close co-operation — and constant vigilance — by the armed forces, the police, and the intelligence agencies. Prior to the transition to a democratic South Africa, the security services were 'the face of apartheid': they were brutal, sadistic, corrupt and merciless.

[1] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) In re: Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6.

[2] B 6-2010.

[3] As Jason Brickhill notes, much of the public criticism of the POI Bill is overwrought and levelled by persons and organizations unfamiliar with the text of the Bill. South Africa needs new legislation. As matters stand, the antiquated, apartheid-era 1984 POI Act applies. The irony of the criticism levelled against the current POI Bill is that its delay has already led to the replacement of a functional initial draft (prepared during Ronnie Kasrils' tenure) by a somewhat problematic piece of proposed legislation. So while provisions that create criminal offences for the possession of classified information need to be eliminated and loose definitions need to be tightened, the Bill needs to be passed. (E-mail Correspondence with Jason Brickhill, 5-6 May 2011.) The promulgated Act's constitutional infirmities, if any are left, can then be properly assessed in a court of law.

After 1978, upon PW Botha's assumption of the Presidency, the National Party employed all the means at its disposal to destroy the liberation movements and the putative 'total onslaught' of foreign and domestic communists. The 'total strategy' deployed to contain this Orwellian threat was a co-ordinated approach that drew upon the collective expertise of the entire security establishment. A complex network of security committees known as the National Security Management System ('NSMS'), with about 500 regional, district and local branches, was established to complement the already existing State Security Council ('SSC'). The SSC consisted of the heads of the military, police, intelligence agencies, certain cabinet ministers and the President. The SSC, guided by the NSMS, was responsible for all security related policy and strategic decisions. In this virtually totalitarian security climate, all government policies were seen as potential security issues and could be subjected to scrutiny and to control by the SSC. The various components of the security establishment, namely the police, security agencies and the military, played an increasingly pivotal and pernicious role in policy formulation.[1] And when the security establishment was not meddling in the law-making functions of the state, it busied itself with operations carried out beyond the reach of the law.

The South African Police ('SAP') as they were then known, were trained and equipped for confrontational and militaristic policing. The emphasis of policing, particularly in 'non-white' residential areas, was not crime prevention, but rather the enforcement of the plethora of discriminatory legislation that underpinned the apartheid state.[2] They turned arbitrary detention, torture and the excessive use of force in effecting arrests and quelling demonstrations into the norm for 'law enforcement'.[3] Three quarters of police stations in the country were located in 'white' areas. Townships and other 'non-white' residential areas possessed little or no community orientated police presence.[4] The role of the police in 'non-white' residential areas was to conduct raids and to control political unrest.

Racial discrimination was perpetuated within the ranks of the police force. Although, by the early 1990s, sixty per cent of policemen were black, the officer corps remained ninety per cent white. Women of all races were also heavily underrepresented: and those women who were recruited were consigned to administrative positions or relegated to handling female accused and witnesses.[5]

Police accountability to the general public, particularly the black majority, was virtually non-existent. The generally accepted culture of bigotry and brutality, together with the absence of an independent body for oversight of police activities, cultivated an environment where police officers abused the rights of citizens with impunity. In the limited instances where allegations of violations were investigated, the investigation occurred through commissions of enquiry. These commissions, staffed primarily by the police, seldom handed down findings that resulted in dis-

[1] J Kuzwayo 'Developing Mechanisms for Civilian Oversight over the Armed Forces' (1998) 7 African Security Review 55–56.

[2] M Shaw Crime and Policing in Post-Apartheid South Africa: Transforming Under Fire (2002) 10–13.

[3] G Cawthra Policing South Africa: The South African Police and the Transition from Apartheid (1993) 113–117.

[4] Shaw (supra) at 11–12.

[5] Cawthra (supra) at 78–81.

ciplinary action against the accused.[1] Inquests into the deaths of political activists in custody, presided over by Magistrates, invariably led to the exculpation of police and other members of the security services — even in the face of overwhelming evidence of torture, assault and murder.[2]

The South African Defence Force ('SADF') had a similar image to that of the police. It worked closely with the SAP and was deployed extensively to control unrest in the townships. It was also involved in warfare in other southern African nations: the so-called 'front line states' that provided military bases for the training of the armies of the liberation movements. Elements within the SADF such as the Civil Co-operation Bureau and the notorious 32 Battalion engaged in illegal activities such as assassinations and chemical and biological warfare.[3] The SADF did not have many black members and was composed primarily of white male conscripts.[4]

The intelligence agencies consisted of the SAP Security Branch, the Directorate of Military Intelligence and the Bureau of State Security (later the National Intelligence Service).[5] Like the SADF, the intelligence community worked closely with the SAP. Indeed, most National Police Commissioners were appointed from the SAP Security Branch.[6] As with the SADF and the SAP, the intelligence agencies were virtually unaccountable — to anyone.[7] The covert activities of the intelligence agencies — and the desire of politicians to be able to deny culpability for untoward actions — actually served as justification for this absence of accountability.

---

[1] Cawthra (supra) at 174–175. See also N Haysom 'Policing the Police: A Comparative Survey of Police Control Mechanisms in the United States, South Africa and the United Kingdom' (1989) Acta Juridica 144–151.

[2] G Bizos No One to Blame: In Pursuit of Justice in South Africa (1998).

[3] Cawthra (supra) at 173. See also G Cawthra & R Luckham Governing Insecurity: Democratic Control of Military and Security Establishments in Transitional Democracies (2003) 34.

[4] Transformation has to be understood in terms of the transition from, and the change of priorities of, the apartheid state to the democratic state. See L Heinecken 'South Africa's Armed Forces in Transition: Adapting to the New Strategic and Political Environment' (2005) 36(1) Society in Transition 74 ('The defence budget, which in 1989 increased to 4,3 % of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) of which most went on internal deployment alongside the police, plummeted to a mere 1,6 % of the GDP in years to come.') See J Cilliers 'From a "Siege Mindset" to a Popular Force: The Evolution of the South African National Defence Force' (1998) 38(3) Africa Quarterly 27, 35–36. Heinecken further writes:

> [The transition] meant not only realigning its forces to the new security environment, but reintegration into the political world and in particular African society, as well as a new political dispensation. This affected virtually every facet of the SANDF's being and sparked a process of radical transformation unsurpassed in the history of South Africa. The transformation process covered four main areas: transformation of civil-military relations; organisational restructuring; normative and cultural transformation; and constitutional and legal transformation. Clearly these issues are not mutually exclusive, as the entire process of transformation hinges on the imperatives spelt out in the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996.

Heinecken (supra) at 79 citing Department of Defence White Paper on Defence and Defence Review (1998) 74–76. Despite these pressures, the soldiers who make up the SANDF were (as of 2005) 64 per cent black and 29 per cent white. Department of Defence Personnel Statistics (15 February 2005). The critical structural problem remains in the middle ranks – major to colonel: whites still occupy more than half of those positions. Heinecken (supra) at 79.

[5] K O'Brien 'Controlling the Hydra: A Historical Analysis of South African Intelligence Accountability' in H Born, L Johnson & I Leigh (eds) Who's Watching the Spies? Establishing Intelligence Service Accountability (2005) 200.

[6] Shaw (supra) at 11–12.

[7] O'Brien (supra) at 200.

The future of the security services under the new democratic order featured prominently in the various talks that led to South Africa's democratic transition.[1] In 1991, a National Peace Accord was signed by the various parties involved in the negotiations to create a framework for greater police accountability. Although discussions between the military wings of the liberation movements and the SADF took place during this period, these talks were largely informal. In 1993, a Transitional Executive Council, established to govern the country in the period leading up to the 1994 elections, set up the Joint Military Co-ordinating Committee. This committee, which consisted of the heads of the military forces in the homelands, the SADF and the armies of the liberation movements, began the process of integrating and restructuring the SADF.[2]

The Multi-Party Negotiating Forum crafted an Interim Constitution[3] and 34 Constitutional Principles that would guide a representative Constitutional Assembly's drafting of the Final Constitution.[4] Constitutional Principle XXXI dealt directly with the security services and provided that 'every member of the security forces (police, military, and intelligence), and the security forces as a whole, shall be required to perform their functions and exercise their powers in the national interest and shall be prohibited from furthering or prejudicing party political interest.'[5]

During the certification process for the Final Constitution, neither Constitutional Principle XXXI nor the security forces themselves occasioned much controversy. However, in Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996,[6] the original draft of the Final Constitution was found not to comply with the Constitutional Principles because it conferred insufficient powers on the provinces with respect to, among other things, the police.[7] The Constitutional Assembly thereafter submitted an amended text that was certified by the Constitutional Court.[8]

The Final Constitution wrought a radical reformation of the security services. Under the Final Constitution, the security services are: subject to the rule of law,[9] accountable to Parliament and the national executive,[10] precluded from partisan

[1] Cawthra (supra) at 165–172.

[2] Cawthra & Luckham (supra) at 36–37.

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[4] See IC Schedule 4.

[5] See IC Schedule 4.

[6] 1996 (4) 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ('First Certification Judgment').

[7] Ibid at paras 395–401. For a brief discussion on this particular ground for refusal to certify, see C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) § 20.4.

[8] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 24.

[9] FC s 198*(c)* states: 'National security must be pursued in compliance with the law, including international law.'

[10] FC s 198*(d)* states: 'National security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive.'

conduct in the performance of their duties,[1] subject to parliamentary oversight,[2] subject to civilian authority,[3] prohibited from carrying out illegal orders,[4] and enjoined to protect and to promote fundamental rights.[5]

The Final Constitution has brought about other significant changes in the structure of the security services. We now have a single defence force and a single police service.[6] Any intelligence service other than that of the police and the military must be established by the President under the terms of the Final Constitution.[7] Any military force in the country other than the South African National Defence Force ('SANDF') is unlawful.[8] Armed organisations or services other than the SAPS, the SANDF, and constitutionally authorised intelligence agencies must be created in a manner consistent with national legislation.[9]

In a clear departure from apartheid South Africa, the Final Constitution explicitly places political responsibility for the security services under civilian authority.[10] Likewise, the Final Constitution mandates civilian secretariats for both the military[11] and police.[12] Civilian monitoring of the intelligence agencies occurs through inspector generals appointed in terms of national legislation.[13] The operational command of the police and the military is no longer subject to political control.[14]

Perhaps the most significant paradigm shift with respect to South Africa's security forces is evinced in FC s 198*(a)*: 'National Security must reflect the resolve of South Africans, as individuals and as a nation, to live as equals, to live in peace and harmony, to be free from fear and want and to seek a better life.' This paradigm shift, to which the Final Constitution aspires, is further reflected in a series of

[1] FC s 199(7) states: 'Neither the security services, nor any of their members, may, in the performance of their functions (a) prejudice a political party interest that is legitimate in terms of the Constitution; or (b) further, in a partisan manner, any interest of a political party.'

[2] FC s 199(8) states: '[T]o give effect to the principles of transparency and accountability, multiparty parliamentary committees have oversight of all security services.'

[3] FC s 204 and FC s 205 require civilian secretariats for defence and police to be established pursuant to national legislation. However, no such constitutional requirement exists for the intelligence agencies. Rather, in terms of the Intelligence Services Control Act 40 of 1994, an Inspector-General must be appointed for each intelligence service. The absence of such a constitutional provision may reflect the desire of the drafters to make the activities of the intelligence services less likely to be subject to judicial oversight and constitutional review.

[4] See FC s 199(6).

[5] See FC s 7(2) and FC s 199(5).

[6] See FC s 199(1).

[7] See FC s 199(1).

[8] See FC s 199(2).

[9] See FC s 199(3).

[10] See FC ss 201, 206, and 209.

[11] See FC s 204; Defence Act 44 of 1957 s 7A.

[12] See FC s 208; South African Police Service Act 68 of 1995 ss 2–4

[13] See FC s 210.

[14] See FC s 202 and FC s 207.

white papers on safety and security, defence and intelligence.[1] The extent to which the aspirations of both the Final Constitution and the white papers have been met is another matter. The amalgamation of apartheid security services with the security and defence forces of the homelands and liberation movements, skills shortages, redistribution of resources, high crime levels and overcoming the culture of impunity entrenched under apartheid, have all proved to be significant barriers to the transformation of the security services.

23B.3 The South African Police Service

(a) Composition, structure and mandate

The SAPS emerged from the amalgamation of the 10 police agencies of the former 'independent homelands' of Transkei, Bophutatswana, Venda and Ciskei, the former 'self-governing homelands' of KwaZulu, Lebowa, QwaQwa, KwaNdebele, KaNgwane and Gazankulu and the South African Police. In 1990, South Africa had 140,000 police officers, of which 112,000 were members of the South African Police.[2] The new SAPS therefore consisted mainly of police officers who had operated under the apartheid regime. The functions, powers and training of these police officers prior to 1994, as discussed above, constituted a major hurdle to establishing a new police service that was suitable for the needs of the new democratic nation. In 2002, the SAPS launched a new recruitment drive that increased the numbers of police officers substantially, decreased the numbers of previous SAP and homeland police officers, and thereby substantially altered the composition of the service.[3]

As a result of its history, the primary challenge facing the newly created SAPS was securing its legitimacy. The SAPS initially met this challenge in three symbolic ways. First, the South African Police became the South African Police Service.

[1] Accordingly, the first White Paper considered the following objectives and the need for enabling legislation in order to realise their varied ends:

> The overarching challenge of transforming defence policy and the armed forces in the context of the Constitution, national security policy, the RDP, and international law on armed conflict. Civil-military relations, with reference to the constitutional provisions on defence; transparency and freedom of information; defence intelligence; the structure of the Department of Defence (DOD); military professionalism; civic education; the responsibilities of government towards the SANDF; and the rights and duties of military personnel. The external and internal strategic environment and the importance of promoting regional security. The primary and secondary functions of the SANDF. Human resource issues, including integration; the maintenance of an all-volunteer force; the Part-Time Force; rationalisation and demobilisation; equal opportunity, affirmative action, non-discrimination and gender relations; and defence labour relations. Budgetary considerations. Arms control and the defence industry. Land and environmental issues.

Department of Defence Defence in a Democracy: White Paper on National Defence for the Republic of South Africa (May 1996) 4–5.

[2] See J Rauch 'The South African Police and the Truth Commission' (2005) 36(2) South African Review of Sociology 224, available at http://www.kas.de/db_files/dokumente/7_dokument_dok_pdf_4865_2.pdf (accessed on 28 October 2007).

[3] See G Newham 'Strengthening Democratic Policing in South Africa through Internal Systems for Officer Control' (2005) 36(2) South African Review of Sociology 160, available at http://www.csvr.org.za/docs/policing/strengthening.pdf (accessed on 9 March 2009).

Second, military ranks were eliminated and replaced with new designations.[1] Finally, the menacing Ministry of Law and Order became the Ministry of Safety and Security. Recently, however, some of these symbolic reforms were reversed. The Ministry was renamed 'the Ministry of Police' and military ranks were reintroduced for the SAPS leadership — the National Commissioner now goes by the honorific 'General'.

The police are constitutionally mandated to prevent, to combat and to investigate crime, to maintain public order, to protect and to secure the inhabitants of South Africa and their property and to uphold and enforce the law.[2] The powers and the functions of the police are determined by constitutionally-mandated national legislation: the South African Police Service Act ('SAPS Act').[3]

In terms of FC s 205(1), the SAPS must be 'structured to function at national, provincial and, where appropriate, local spheres of government.' The SAPS does not have separate branches within each province. Provincial priorities are integrated into the SAPS through the control and the management of the SAPS at provincial level. Up until 2006, each province was also divided into 'areas'. Each area consisted of about 26 police stations. However, pursuant to a restructuring process undertaken in 2006, 'areas' have now been replaced with smaller units of approximately six police stations.[4]

FC s 206(7) provides for legislation to govern the establishment of municipal policing. Initially, the SAPS Act did not provide for the establishment of municipal police services ('MPS').[5] However, a 1998 amendment to the SAPS Act introduced this possibility.[6] In terms of s 64(1) of the SAPS Act, a municipality can now establish a municipal police service on application to the relevant MEC in the province concerned. Subsequent to the local government elections of 2000, most of the large municipal councils have created an MPS. An MPS must be funded by municipalities, must comply with national policing standards and may not derogate from the powers and duties of police officers conferred by national legislation.[7] Municipal councils are obliged by the Act to establish civilian oversight mechanisms.[8] MPS do not have the same range of powers as the SAPS

[1] Under the new democratic order, 'general' became 'commissioner'; 'brigadier' became 'director' and 'colonel' became 'senior superintendent.' See J Rauch 'Police Reform and South Africa's Transition' Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation Working Paper 6, available at http://www.csvr.org.za/docs/policing/policebeformandsouth.pdf (accessed on 9 March 2009).

[2] See FC s 205(3).

[3] Act 68 of 1995. FC s 205(2).

[4] Rauch 'Police Reform and South Africa's Transition' (supra) at 1. The restructuring process was motivated by a need to increase efficiency within the SAPS by removing excessive layers of authority which served as an impediment to service delivery. Ibid.

[5] Shaw notes that the Final Constitution's provision with regard to municipal policing was inserted at the behest of the Democratic Party. He contends that the reason for the African National Congress ('ANC') government's initial reluctance to allow for the establishment of municipal policing was the fear that municipal police would be used by local government structures for political purposes. Shaw (supra) at 123.

[6] South African Police Service Amendment Act 83 of 1998.

[7] SAPS Act ss 64(2)(b) and 64(6).

[8] SAPS Act s 64(2)(d). In terms of SAPS Act s 64J Municipal Councils are also required to appoint a special committee of the council to maintain oversight of the MPS.

and are limited to traffic policing, the enforcement of municipal by-laws and the prevention of crime.[1]

(b) Control and management

Political power over the police vests in the national Minister of Police. The Minister determines national policing policy subsequent to consultation with provincial governments.[2] At provincial level, a member of each provincial government, an MEC, has political responsibility for the police in that province.[3] Co-ordination of the police service and cooperation among the spheres of government is facilitated through a committee comprised of the Minister of Police and the provincial MEC for police.[4] Although FC Schedule 4 lists policing as a concurrent national and provincial competence, the actual concurrency of this authority is limited by the terms of FC Chapter 11. Under FC Chapter 11, the national government retains significant authority over the provinces. For the most part, provincial power has been limited to oversight functions. Beyond this role, the provinces exercise primarily those powers assigned to them in national legislation or by national policing policy.[5]

The National Commissioner, who is appointed by the President, exercises operational and managerial control over the police service at the national level.[6] This power must be exercised in a manner consistent with national policing policy and the directions of the Minister of Police.[7] The removal of a National Commissioner is not mentioned in the Final Constitution. However, in terms of s 8 of the SAPS Act, a National Commissioner can be removed if he has lost the confidence of Cabinet.

Provincial commissioners have operational and management control in their respective provinces, subject to the authority of the National Commissioner.[8] Provincial commissioners are required to report annually to the provincial legislature and to provide a report to the National Commissioner.[9] The provincial MEC responsible for policing has one power that the Minister of Police does not. Where the provincial MEC has lost confidence in the Provincial Commissioner, the MEC may initiate proceedings for the removal of, or disciplinary action against,

[1] SAPS Act 64E. MPS are not empowered to investigate crime, merely to prevent it. SAPS Act s 64H requires that suspects arrested by a municipal police officer must be handed over to the SAPS as soon as possible.

[2] See FC s 206(1).

[3] See FC s 206(4).

[4] See FC s 206(8).

[5] See FC s 206(3) and 206(4).

[6] See FC s 207(1). See also IC s 218. In terms of FC Schedule 6 item 24(1), certain provisions of the Interim Constitution remain in force: IC ss 218 and 219. These sections set out the responsibilities of the National Commissioner and Provincial Commissioners.

[7] See FC s 207(2).

[8] FC s 207(4). See also IC s 219.

[9] See FC s 207(5).

the Provincial Commissioner.[1] With respect to the National Commissioner, that power rests with Cabinet as a whole.

(c) The SAPS and fundamental rights

(i) Use of force by the police

Some theorists like to speak of the state retaining a monopoly over the use of force and violence in order to safeguard the physical wellbeing of its citizens. It follows, on this line of thinking, that in order to maintain 'control' and to minimize conflict, citizens may only legitimately use physical force in a limited number of circumstances. The police, on the other hand, are specifically empowered to use force, and even lethal force, where necessary, in order to protect the public.

This discretion to use lethal force creates the potential for abuse. The legislature and the courts face a difficult task in granting the appropriate degree of authority to, and imposing the requisite degree of constraint upon, the police when they use force in life-threatening or otherwise dangerous circumstances. Since 1977, the use of force by the police (or any other person authorised to make an arrest) in effecting arrests of suspected criminals has been governed by s 49 of the Criminal Procedure Act[2] ('CPA'). Prior to its amendment in 2003, CPA s 49 stated that:

> (1) If any person authorized under this Act to arrest or to assist in arresting another, attempts to arrest such person and such person—
> (a) resists the attempt and cannot be arrested without the use of force; or > (b) flees when it is clear that an attempt to arrest him is being made, or resists such attempt and flees, the person so authorized may, in order to effect the arrest, use such force as may in the circumstances be reasonably necessary to overcome the resistance or to prevent the person concerned from fleeing.
>
> (2) Where the person concerned is to be arrested for an offence referred to in Shedule 1 or is to be arrested on the ground that he is reasonably suspected of having committed such an offence, and the person authorized under this Act to arrest or to assist in arresting him cannot arrest him or prevent him from fleeing by other means than by killing him, the killing shall be deemed to be justifiable homicide.[3]

[1] See FC s 207(6) and SAPS Act s 8(2). Section 8(2) of the SAPS Act requires the Executive Council of a province that has lost confidence in a Provincial Commissioner to notify the Minister of Safety and Security who, if he deems it 'necessary and appropriate', will in turn notify the National Commissioner. A board of inquiry is then established by the National Commissioner to look into the matter. The procedure appears to conflict with FC s 207(6), which expressly confers the power to institute proceedings for the 'removal or transfer of, or disciplinary proceedings against' a Provincial Commissioner on the provincial executive. Although this power is required to be exercised 'in accordance with national legislation', the reference to national legislation should be interpreted as a reference to procedural rules to be established in national legislation. The procedure in s 8(2) of the SAPS Act goes even further and subordinates the decision of the provincial executive council to that of the Minister of Safety and Security. It confers on the Minister the discretion not to take further steps against the provincial commissioner concerned unless he deems it to be 'necessary and appropriate'.

[2] Act 51 of 1977.

[3] Schedule 1 includes serious offences such as murder and rape but also non-violent offences such as fraud, forgery, receiving stolen goods and theft.

CPA s 49 — as articulated above — confers a fairly broad degree of discretion on police officers to use force, and if necessary lethal force, as a means to effect an arrest. This degree of discretion has attracted judicial scrutiny for quite some time.

In Matlou v Makhubedu, decided some 30 years ago, the Appellate Division (now the Supreme Court of Appeal) held that CPA s 49 demanded that the force used be proportionate to the crime that the suspect had allegedly committed.[1] Despite this holding, the police could still justify the use of lethal force in circumstances where — though the crime was serious — the suspect did not pose a mortal danger to any person and was merely resisting arrest. Even after the advent of the Final Constitution, the statutory framework only changed after judicial intervention by the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court.[2]

(aa) Govender and Walters

CPA s 49 was first subject to constitutional challenge in Govender v Minister of Safety and Security.[3] The case turned on the shooting of an unarmed 17-year-old boy by the SAPS. The boy, who was involved in the theft of a motor vehicle, was shot by the police whilst trying to evade arrest. In an attempt to prevent his escape, the police officer pursuing the boy attempted to shoot him in the legs. Instead, the officer shot him in the back, rendering him permanently disabled. The initial delictual action for damages by the boy's father was dismissed in the Durban High Court on the basis that the action taken by the police officer was reasonably necessary to prevent the boy's escape and was therefore permitted under CPA s 49(1).[4]

The appellant did not directly challenge the constitutionality of CPA s 49(1). He argued instead that the statute needed to be interpreted in accordance with FC s 39(2) and the values that animated the rights to life, to dignity, to physical integrity, to the presumption of innocence and to equality before the law.[5] The Minister contended that CPA s 49(1) provided a legitimate justification for the

[1] 1978 (1) SA 946, 957 (A).

[2] In 1997 the SAPS issued a Special Service Order in terms of which police officers were instructed to limit their use of lethal force to a specific list of serious offences that were set out in the Order and that were more limited than those listed in Shedule 1 of the CPA. The Order was made in an attempt to bring s 49(2) in line with the provisions of the Final Constitution. Although it was a step in the right direction, the Order did not override s 49(2) and police officers could not be convicted of murder if they could show that they had acted within the bounds of s 49(2). In 1998 Parliament adopted a new constitutionally compliant version of s 49 through the Judicial Matters Second Amendment Act 122 of 1998. The Act provided that the President would fix the date on which the Act would enter into force. However, due to persistent objections from the Ministry of Safety and Security and the SAPS, who insisted that the new provisions were unworkable and impractical, the Act remained dormant until 2003. D Bruce 'Killing and the Constitution – Arrest and the Use of Lethal Force' (2003) 19 SAJHR 430.

[3] 2001 (4) 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA)('Govender').

[4] Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2000 (1) SA 959 (D), 1999 (5) BCLR 580 (D).

[5] FC s 39(2) states that 'When interpreting any legislation and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum, must promote the spirit purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.'

police officer's actions and that the officer's conduct, properly understood, had not been wrongful.

The Supreme Court of Appeal found for the appellant. The court correctly pointed out that the state possessed both a legitimate interest in apprehending criminals, and a duty to protect its citizens (even those citizens attempting to escape arrest.)[1] It held that the words 'reasonably necessary' in s 49(1) should be read to require proportionality both with respect to the offence and the force used, and with respect to the force used and the threat that the suspect posed to the police officer and to the general public.[2]

In Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security: In re S v Walters, the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of CPA s 49(1) and CPA s 49(2).[3] In the underlying matter, a father and a son had fatally shot a burglar who had broken into their bakery. It was argued, in their defence, that the homicide was justified by CPA s 49(2). The High Court had declared both CPA s 49(1) and CPA s 49(2) unconstitutional on the grounds that they were inconsistent with the rights to life (FC s 11) and to dignity (FC s 10). The High Court then referred the decision to the Constitutional Court for confirmation.[4]

The Constitutional Court identified the rights to life, dignity and bodily integrity (FC s 12) as the principal rights limited by the use of lethal force under CPA s 49(2).[5] The Walters Court wrote:

> [T]he right to life, to human dignity and to bodily integrity are individually essential and collectively foundational to the value system prescribed by the Constitution. Compromise them and the society to which we aspire becomes illusory. It therefore follows that any significant limitation of any of these rights would for its justification demand a very compelling public interest.[6]

As to whether the limitation of rights by CPA s 49 was constitutionally justifiable, the Walters Court first held that the Supreme Court of Appeal's reading down of CPA s 49(1) in Govender avoided the need for a finding of invalidity. It declined to confirm that part of the High Court's judgment.[7] With regard to CPA s 49(2), however, the Walters Court found that restricting the use of deadly force to Schedule 1 offences failed to introduce an appropriate test for proportionality. Schedule 1 offences ranged from violent crimes such as murder and robbery to non-violent crimes such as fraud and forgery.[8] The Walters Court also emphasised that the purpose of arrest is to bring a suspected criminal before a court: that purpose would be frustrated if the suspect were to be killed. While the Walters Court recognised the high levels of crime in our society, it found that this troublesome fact did not justify the use of lethal force in all the circumstances contemplated by [1] Govender (supra) at paras 12–13.

[2] Ibid at para 21.
[3] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), [2002] ZACC 6 ('Walters')
[4] S v Walters & Another 2001 (2) SACR 471 (Tk), 2001 (10) BCLR 1088 (Tk).
[5] Walters (supra) at paras 5–7 and 29–30.
[6] Ibid at para 25.
[7] Ibid at para 39.
[8] Ibid at para 41.

CPA s 49(2) and Schedule 1.[1] The Court stated that lethal force can only be used when the police officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious bodily harm to themselves or to another person, or that the person has committed a crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm.[2] The Walters Court concluded that CPA s 49(2) was not a justifiable limitation of the rights to life, dignity and bodily integrity and confirmed that part of the High Court's order striking down the section.

(bb) Changes to CPA s 49 in light of Walters

According to the order, the state was obliged to pass an amendment to CPA s 49 in line with the holding in Walters. The new s 49, promulgated in 2003, states that:

> (2) If any arrestor attempts to arrest a suspect and the suspect resists the attempt, or flees, or resists the attempt and flees, when it is clear that an attempt to arrest him or her is being made, and the suspect cannot be arrested without the use of force, the arrestor may, in order to effect the arrest, use such force as may be reasonably necessary and proportional in the circumstances to overcome the resistance or to prevent the suspect from fleeing: Provided that the arrestor is justified in terms of this section in using deadly force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to a suspect, only if he or she believes on reasonable grounds—
>
> (a) that the force is immediately necessary for the purposes of protecting the arrestor, any person lawfully assisting the arrestor or any other person from imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm;
>
> (b) that there is a substantial risk that the suspect will cause imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm if the arrest is delayed; or
>
> (c) that the offence for which the arrest is sought is in progress and is of a forcible and serious nature and involves the use of life threatening violence or a strong likelihood that it will cause grievous bodily harm.

Govender, Walters, and the new text of CPA s 49(2) generate the following principles with regard to the use of force by police officers when effecting an arrest:

(i) Police officers should avoid using force when arresting a suspect unless such force is necessary to overcome the suspect's resistance.

(ii) If force is necessary, then only the minimum force necessary to overcome the suspect's resistance should be used.

(iii) Lethal force may only be used if the suspect poses a danger to the police officer or to members of the public, or if the suspect is suspected of having committed a crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm. The second justification for the use of lethal force turns on the assumption that if the suspect has (allegedly) committed a violent crime, he poses a danger to the public which justifies the use of force to prevent him or her from committing another violent crime.

[1] Walters (supra) at paras 43–50.
[2] Ibid at para 52.

(cc) Shoot to Kill? Proposed Amendments Designed to Undermine Constitutionally Mandated Changes to CPA s 49

At the time of writing, May 2011, the National Assembly has tabled a further amendment to CPA s 49.[1] The amendment was introduced to Parliament shortly after controversial statements made by National Commissioner Bheki Cele about the SAPS' new 'shoot to kill' policy for suspected criminals.[2] Such a policy would be manifestly unconstitutional. Members of the public have expressed concern that the amendments reflect the 'shoot to kill' policy by granting greater leeway for the state's use of lethal force.

A close examination of the text — not to mention statements of the National Commissioner and the Minister[3] — lends credence to these fears. While the preamble to the Bill claims that the amendments are designed to bring the law into line with Walters (a dubious proposition given that the 2003 amendments have already done so), the new wording of CPA s 49 certainly broadens the scope for lawfully injuring or killing a person in the course of arrest in a manner not contemplated by the Walters Court. The Bill's amended text reads as follows (the text to be removed is placed in square brackets):

> Use of force in effecting arrest
>
> 49. (1) For the purposes of this section
>
> (a) 'arrestor' means any person authorised under this Act to arrest or to assist in arresting a suspect; [and]
>
> (b) 'suspect' means any person in respect of whom an arrestor has [or had] a reasonable suspicion that such person is committing or has committed an offence; and
>
> (c) 'deadly force' means force that is intended or likely to cause death or serious bodily harm.
>
> (2) If any arrestor attempts to arrest a suspect and the suspect resists the attempt, or flees, or resists the attempt and flees, when it is clear that an attempt to arrest him or her is being made, and the suspect cannot be arrested without the use of force, the arrestor may, in order to effect the arrest, use such force as may be reasonably necessary and proportional in the circumstances to overcome the resistance or to prevent the suspect from fleeing: Provided that the arrestor is justified in terms of this section in using deadly force [that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to a suspect,] only if he or she believes on reasonable grounds—
>
> (a) that the force is [immediately] necessary for the purposes of protecting the arrestor [or any person lawfully assisting the arrestor] or any other person from imminent or future death or [grievous] serious bodily harm; or
>
> (b) [that there is a substantial risk that the suspect will cause imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm if the arrest is delayed; or] that the suspect is suspected on reasonable grounds of having committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened

[1] Criminal Procedure Amendment GG 33526 of 5 October 2010.

[2] See, eg, SAPA 'Cele Tells Police to Use Deadly Force' Business Day (7 December 2009), available at http://www.businessday.co.za/articles/Content.aspx?id=88947 (accessed on 5 May 2011).

[3] See, eg, W Hartley 'Give Police More Firepower, Cele Tells MPs' Business Day (6 August 2009), available at http://www.businessday.co.za/articles/Content.aspx?id=77850 (accessed on 5 May 2011); E Ferreira 'Cele Calls for Greater Power for Cops' Mail & Guardian (5 August 2009), available at http://mg.co.za/article/2009-08-05-cele-calls-for-greater-powers-cops (accessed on 5 May 2011).

infliction of serious bodily harm and there are no other reasonable means of carrying out the arrest, whether at that time or later.

[(c) that the offence for which the arrest is sought is in progress and is of a forcible and serious nature and involves the use of life threatening violence or a strong likelihood that it will cause grievous bodily harm.]

The amendments constitute a blatant roll-back of the 2003 amendments that gave effect to Walters. First, the force employed is no longer 'immediately' necessary. The new amendments would not limit deadly force to instances in which a serious crime has occurred and the police responded 'immediately' in an attempt to apprehend and to arrest the suspected criminal. Deadly force could be used — it would appear — during routine investigations or during attempts to arrest a person that are not subject to the same degree of uncertainty associated with the arrest of a person who has just committed a crime and apparently used deadly force. Second, the potential danger to the arrestor or to a third party need only be serious harm — not grievous bodily harm as currently contemplated. Again, this alteration suggests that the arrestor or a third party need not themselves be in mortal danger. Third, the proposed amendment no longer requires that 'substantial risk [exists] that the suspect will cause imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm if the arrest is delayed.' The existing text contemplates an armed suspect who might turn on police and other standers-by shortly after commission of a crime or a person known to be so dangerous that no chances can be taken when attempting to effect his or her arrest. The current provision draws a clear nexus between the force employed and the circumstances of employment of that force and the immediate danger posed by the suspect. The proposed amendment eliminates the carefully considered justification for the use of deadly force: namely that, in the heat of the moment, a clearly dangerous person poses a genuine risk to the lives of law enforcement officials. The proposed amendment intimates that a mere physical tussle between law enforcement officials and a suspect that occurs long after the crime could justify the use of deadly force.

However, the most obvious departure from the views of the Walters Court and the existing provisions is reflected in the excision of the following words: 'that the offence for which the arrest is sought is in progress and is of a forcible and serious nature and involves the use of life threatening violence or a strong likelihood that it will cause grievous bodily harm.' Once again, the Walters Court's carefully calibrated balance between the use of deadly force by police and the use of deadly force by a suspect in flight is entirely ignored. Recall that in Walters,[1] Kriegler J reasoned that an arrest was never an end in itself, but merely one means of ensuring that a suspect appeared in court. As a result, force could only be justified when an arrest was necessary to achieve that goal. If an arrest is necessary,

[1] Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re Ex Parte Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), [2002] ZACC 6. For a more detailed account of the constitutional dimensions of arrest, see F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51. See also I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 309; M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

then the force employed must be the minimum necessary to effect the arrest,[1] and must be proportionate with respect to the offence committed or the continued threat of violence.[2] The proposed amendments appear to ignore the actual goal of arrest, the notion of minimum force necessary to secure arrest and the belief that the use of deadly force could only be justified when death or grievous harm to the police or the public was imminent.

(ii) Human rights violations by the police

Despite the tremendous strides made in reforming a police service modelled in many respects upon Nazi Germany's SS, problems inevitably remain in a police force still in transition. The police are faced with enormously high levels of crime, placed in regular mortal danger and are invariably tempted by the power of their position. They engage in rent-seeking behaviour, bribery and more damaging forms of corruption. In 1999, Hamber suggested that the culture and practices of policing in South Africa had changed little after 1994 and the revelations of the TRC:

> The TRC has been relatively successful at uncovering the truth about atrocities of the past through its trade of truth for justice. However the exact impact of amnesty … on ongoing

[1] Walters (supra) at para 54 ('Where force is necessary, only the least degree of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest may be used.')

[2] Ibid ('In deciding what degree of force is both reasonable and necessary, all the circumstances must be taken into account, including the threat of violence the suspect poses to the arrester or others, and the nature and circumstances of the offence the suspect is suspected of having committed; the force being proportional in all these circumstances.') See also Govender (supra) at paras 19–20 (Court interprets statute to only allow use of force when there are reasonable grounds to believe that the suspected offence involved the infliction or threat of serious bodily harm or where the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious bodily harm to him or her, or a threat of harm to members of the public.)

The requirement of proportionality echoes the sentiments of Justice White in Tennessee v Garner 471 US 1 (1985) 11–12 ('It is not better that all felony suspects die than that they escape. Where the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so. It is no doubt unfortunate when a suspect who is in sight escapes, but the fact that the police arrive a little late or are a little slower afoot does not always justify killing the suspect. A police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead. The Tennessee statute is unconstitutional insofar as it authorises the use of deadly force against such fleeing suspects. It is not, however, unconstitutional on its face. Where the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force. Thus, if the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given.')

The High Court has twice considered whether allowing the police to order the surgical removal of a bullet from a suspect's leg amounted to a violation of FC s 12(1)(c). See Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Xaba 2003 (2) SA 703, 708H (N)(Finding a violation); S v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654, 658H (C) (Finding no violation).

The dual duties of the police become particularly complicated when two opposing protesting groups resort to violence. The European Court of Human Rights held that the police have a duty to interfere, with force if necessary, to prevent the two private groups from causing further violence. See Platform Ärtzte fur das Leben v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 204; S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 43.

> levels of impunity is not yet fully understood … perpetrators have not been punished for gross violations of human rights … As a result, a subtle, but stubbornly residual air of impunity still lingers in South African society and in its police service.[1]

A more sanguine view is offered by Bruce:

> [The] moral climate in South Africa [has changed] from one where police abuse went primarily unsanctioned to one where the potential for that sanction is far greater. The TRC existed at a particular watershed moment, a moment where it was important to demarcate what had happened in the past, from what was to come. Insofar as the new society is willing to, and has the means to, sanction police abuses, the TRC is an important part of what makes such sanction legitimate. The question now is whether South African society has the means and the will to impose such sanction for abuses by the police.[2]

As we shall see below, the South African courts have been quite aggressive in altering the landscape for liability for police brutality. Whether the revolution wrought by the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal translates into a more profound change in behaviour remains to be seen. As things stand, the police still fail to handle suspects properly;[3] they impair the ability of protestors to assemble peaceably;[4] they remain responsible for a large number of deaths in police custody;[5] and are viewed by the public as failing to combat crime effectively.[6] Of particular concern is the maltreatment of foreigners: little

[1] B Hamber 'The Past Imperfect: Exploring Northern Ireland, South Africa and Guatemala' in B Hamber (ed) Past Imperfect: Dealing with the Past in Northern Ireland and Societies in Transition (2002) 6.

[2] D Bruce 'Police Brutality in South Africa' in N Mwanajiti, P Mhlanga, M Sifuniso, Y Nachali-Kambikambi, M Muuba & M Mwananyanda (eds) Police Brutality in Southern Africa: A Human Rights Perspective (2002).

[3] See Human Rights Watch Prohibited Persons: Abuse of Undocumented Migrants, Asylum Seekers, and Refugees in South Africa (1998).

[4] See M Memeza 'A Critical Review of the Implementation of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993: A Local Government & Civil Society Perspective' (July 2006); S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 43; S Woolman 'My Tea Party, Your Mob, Our Social Contract: Freedom of Assembly and the Constitutional Right to Rebellion in Garvis v SATAWU (Minister for Safety & Security, Third Party) (2010) 6 SA 280 (WCC) (2011)' 27 SAJHR — (forthcoming)('My Tea Party').

[5] Amnesty International Report 2007: South Africa (2007) available at www.thereport.amnesty.org/eng/Regions/Africa/South-Africa (accessed on 9 November 2007).

[6] M Harris & S Radaelli 'Paralysed By Fear: Perceptions of Crime and Violence in South Africa' (2007) available at http://www.markinor.co.za (accessed on 6 November 2007)(Despite the fact that official crime statistics have fallen, '[c]urrently only one third of the adult South African population (33%) believes that government is handling the issue of fighting crime well. South Africans of all population groups view government's ability to fight crime considerably more negatively since the last poll in November last year. Only one in every 10 from minority groups (whites, coloureds and Indians) believes that government is doing very or fairly well in handling crime.') exists by way of legal control for officers who engage foreigners, whether the foreigners are in South Africa legally or not.[1]

Over the last several years, 2007 through 2011, the police have either exacerbated township violence through their palpable absence during service delivery protests (qua xenophobia) or poured fire on the flames by firing live ammunition into angry crowds.[2] The deaths of hundreds, the rapes of innumerable women, and the displacement of well over a 100,000 denizens (both foreign and South African) during township unrest from 2007 through 2010 at the hands of other South Africans,[3] as well as the police slaying of Andries Tatane in 2011 during

[1] B Harris 'A Foreign Experience: Violence, Crime and Xenophobia during South Africa's Transition' (2001) 5 Violence and Transition Series 51, available at http://www.csvr.org.za/wits/papers/papvtp5.htm (accessed on 9 March 2009)('The law thus allows for the apprehension of suspected undocumented foreigners. If a foreigner cannot "satisfy" the officer of his/her legal status, then the officer may apprehend him/her. In this way, the law gives strong powers of apprehension to police officers. These powers rest on subjective terms such as "reasonable grounds" and "satisfy such officer". Consequently, there is scope for abuse within the law. For example, a personal vendetta or extortion-scheme may lie behind the "reasonable grounds" on which a person is apprehended. Alongside the legal potential for abuse, it seems that arresting officers do not always work within the confines of the law. The HRC found that "there was a substantial failure of enforcing officers to comply with even [the law's] minimal requirements". For example, it is not a legal condition that individuals carry proof of identification and the "official policy adopted by the SAPS is that individuals should be accompanied to retrieve their ID if an officer suspects that they are illegally in the country but they allege they do have valid documents". However, in practice, it appears that apprehending officers seldom do this. Suspects are rarely given the opportunity to collect any valid documents that they might have. Rather, they are apprehended immediately. This practice has been criticised as a new form of apartheid because it effectively forces foreigners to carry documented proof of their legal status, in much the same way as black South Africans were obliged to carry pass books to prove their status during the apartheid era. Even if suspects are able to identify themselves, this is no guarantee that they will not be arrested. HRW and HRC report that documents are regularly destroyed by enforcing officers.') See also Human Rights Commission Report on the Arrest and Detention of Persons in terms of the Aliens Control Act (1999).

[2] See L Landau 'Loving the Alien?: Citizenship, Law, and the Future in South Africa's Demonic Society' (2010) 109 African Affairs 213; JP Misago with L Landau & T Monson Towards Tolerance, Law and Dignity: Addressing Violence against Foreign Nationals in South Africa (2009) available at http://www.migration.org.za/sites/default/files/reports/2009/Addressing_Violence_against_Foreign_Nationals_IOM.pdf (accessed on 5 May 2011); S Woolman 'Is Xenophobia the Right Legal Term of Art? A Freudian and Kleinian Response to Loren Landau on Township Violence in South Africa' (2011) 23 Stellenbosch Law Review (forthcoming).

[3] See Landau 'Loving the Alien?' (supra) at 1-2 citing T Polzer & V Igglesdon 'Humanitarian Assistance to Internally Displaced Persons in South Africa: Lessons Learned following Attacks on Foreign Nationals in May 2008' Forced Migration Studies Programme Report (2009)('On 11 May 2008, residents of Alexandra township turned on their neighbours. The conflict soon spread across Gauteng Province to informal settlements and townships around the country. During two terrible weeks, citizens murdered more than 100 people, raped dozens, wounded close to 700, and displaced over a hundred thousand.') a demonstration in Ficksburg, bespeak a culture of incompetence and impunity within the police force.[1]

(iii) Duty to protect the public

The duty of the police to ensure that members of society are able to fully enjoy their right to be free from violence goes beyond mere apprehension of suspects after crimes have been committed. In certain instances, it gives rise to positive obligations to take reasonable steps to secure the safety of the public. Furthermore, as guardians of the safety of the public, and in terms of the recently revised law of delict, police officers have a duty of care with respect to delicts committed by themselves whilst acting in their official capacity. When the police commit a delict under colour of law, members of the public are entitled to seek redress from their employer, the Minister of Police.

(aa) Carmichele and K

Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security[2] and K v Minister of Safety and Security[3] illustrate the Constitutional Court's commitment to stamping out the culture of impunity that still exists within the police force. Both cases concerned brutal and violent attacks on women that turned on police negligence or complicity. A third case, Minister of Safety v Luiters, further clarified the extent to which the Minister of Police can be held vicariously liable for the delicts committed by police officers.[4]

In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, the perpetrator had previously been convicted of house breaking and indecent assault. At the time of the attack, he was facing charges of rape and had been released on bail upon the recommendation of the investigating officer. Despite a number of requests that the perpetrator be kept in custody, subsequent complaints about his suspicious behaviour, as [1] 'Andries Tatane Killed by South African Police: 13 April 2011' available at www.youtube.com (accessed on 5 May 2011)(Video leaves no doubt as to the circumstances of Tatane's murder by the police.) As to government complicity, violent service delivery protests have become a regular occurrence in South Africa since 2007. Under such circumstances, national government policy ought to be inclined towards the most limited use of force necessary to protect protestors, onlookers and public and private property. Tatane's death suggests that police General Cele's unofficial 'Shoot to Kill' policy has permeated normal police activities. The use of rubber bullets at a distance of roughly a metre constitutes the use of lethal force where lethal force is clearly neither required nor lawful. (Indeed, police policy proscribes the use of rubber bullets at distances of less than 20 metres.) As to the general, inappropriate response of the state (and the courts) to demonstrations, protests, assemblies and gatherings, see Woolman 'My Tea Party' (supra). That General Cele remained in office despite Tatane's death, the Public Protector's finding of an illegitimate R500 million building lease in Pretoria (with which General Cele 'appears' to have been involved) and the SIU's finding of rampant corruption in the tender for the construction of more than 30 police stations around the country supports charges of complicity in such behaviour by the national government. According to Transparency International, South Africa ranks 54th out of 178 nations on its corruption perception index. Transparency International Corruption Perceptions Index 2010 (2011) available at www.transparency.org/policy_research/surveys_indices/cpi/2010/results (accessed on 5 May 2011).

[2] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC), [2001] ZACC 22 ('Carmichele').

[3] K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC), [2005] ZACC 8 ('K').

[4] 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC), [2006] ZACC 21 ('Luiters'). See also Minister of Safety & Security v Luiters 2006 (4) SA 160 (SCA).

well as evidence that he suffered from psychological problems, neither the police nor the prosecutor opposed his continued release on bail. The perpetrator then committed a brutal and life-threatening assault on Ms Carmichele. Ms Carmichele brought a delictual action against the Minister of Safety and Security based on the failure of the police and prosecutor to oppose bail. She argued that the police and the prosecuting authority had a duty to ensure that she enjoyed her constitutional rights to dignity, freedom and security of the person, privacy and freedom of movement.

Her action failed in both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. The Constitutional Court in Carmichele recognised Ms Carmichele's claim and effectively ordered the High Court to extend the existing duty of care owed by the police and the state prosecutor so that the duty would now, and in the future, cover the kinds of harms suffered by Ms Carmichele. In reaching its conclusions, the Constitutional Court quoted approvingly the following statement by the European Court of Human Rights in Osman v United Kingdom:

> It is common ground that the State's obligation in this respect extends beyond its primary duty to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person backed up by law-enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions. It is thus accepted by those appearing before the Court that art 2 of the Convention may also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual.[1]

The Court was unequivocal in linking a woman's physical safety with a woman's rights to dignity and to freedom and security. It wrote:

> In addressing these obligations in relation to dignity and the freedom and security of the person, few things can be more important to women than freedom from the threat of sexual violence… . Sexual violence and the threat of sexual violence goes to the core of women's subordination in society. It is the single greatest threat to the self-determination of South African women.[2]

The Carmichele Court held that the rights to dignity and to freedom and security of the person impose affirmative duties on the police to prevent violations of physical integrity. The prosecuting authorities also have an affirmative duty to disclose to the courts information pertinent to the decision of whether to grant bail. Further, these rights mandated that the duty of care imposed on the state in delictual actions be expanded to ensure that the state did not allow known violent offenders to jeopardise the rights of its citizens. The Court stated that the possible 'chilling effect' that the imposition of such liability might have on the ability of the police and the prosecutors to perform their functions is minimised by the requirements of proportionality, foreseeability and proximity.[3] One might ask, however, why the imposition of liability for omissions would have such an effect? If police officers and their superiors knew that they would be held liable for omissions, then one would expect them to be more, not less, vigilant in the discharge of their duties and the protection of ordinary citizens.

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 45 quoting Osman v United Kingdom [1998] EHRR 101.
[2] Ibid at para 62.
[3] Ibid at para 49.

In employing FC s 39(2), the Court stated that the common law in this matter had to be developed but declined to do so itself.[1] Instead, it referred the matter back to the High Court for final determination.

In K, three uniformed police officers raped the applicant in the back seat of a police vehicle after offering to provide her with a safe ride home. After the High Court and Supreme Court of Appeal rejected her suit, the Constitutional Court found the state vicariously liable under the common law of delict. The K Court provided three primary grounds for this conclusion. First, the Court held that the police have a duty under the Final Constitution to protect South Africans and to prevent crime.[2] Second, the rights to security of the person, dignity, privacy and substantive equality are 'of profound constitutional importance' and require that the ordinary common law or statutory law give them full force and effect.[3] To give the rights full force and effect, the Final Constitution required that the common law be developed in a manner consistent with Chapter 2's rights and freedoms and their underlying values.[4]

The K Court stated that the new test for vicarious liability has two stages. The first stage determines whether the employee was carrying out his duties or whether he was simply pursuing his own ends. This stage turns on a purely factual determination. The second stage is an enquiry into whether, notwithstanding that the employee may have been pursuing his own ends, the employer should still be held liable because there exists a sufficiently tight nexus between the business of the employer and the conduct of the employee. It is at this second stage that policy considerations play a role and constitutional values are taken into consideration.[5]

In order to determine whether the Minister was vicariously liable, the Court considered the fact that Ms K reasonably relied on an offer of assistance from the uniformed officers, assistance that they are under a duty to provide, and which Ms K would not have sought but for the trust that she placed in these police officers. The Court emphasised that such trust in the police is essential if the police are to fulfil their obligations to protect the public. The rape occurred in the context of the police acting under colour of law and was, in fact, facilitated by their position of authority. The K Court wrote:

> [T]he opportunity to commit the crime would not have arisen but for the trust the applicant placed in them because they were policemen, a trust which harmonises with the constitutional mandate of the police and the need to ensure that that mandate is successfully fulfilled. When the policemen — on duty and in uniform — raped the applicant, they were simultaneously failing to perform their duties to protect the applicant. In committing the crime, the policemen not only did not protect the applicant, they infringed her rights to dignity and security of the person. In so doing, their employer's obligation (and theirs) to prevent crime was not met. There is an intimate connection between the delict committed

[1] Carmichele (supra) at paras 34–6.
[2] K (supra) at para 51.
[3] Ibid at para 18.
[4] Ibid at para 15.
[5] Ibid at para 32.

> by the policemen and the purposes of their employer. The close connection renders the respondent liable vicariously to the applicant for the wrongful conduct of the policemen.[1]

The Court then held that the rights to dignity, freedom and security of the person required that the interpretation of vicarious liability be broadened to ensure that the state was responsible for the conduct of police officers acting under the colour of law.

In Luiters, the Court clarified the extent to which the Minister is to be held vicariously liable for the delicts committed by police officers. Mr Luiters had been shot and permanently paralysed by a police constable, Lionel Siljeur, who had gone on a shooting spree during which he injured a number of innocent civilians. While Siljeur was, at the time of the shooting, officially off-duty, the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal found that he had subjectively placed himself on-duty in order to arrest certain individuals who had allegedly robbed him.[2] The courts arrived at this conclusion on the strength of testimony from a Mr Davidse who, together with a companion, arrived on the scene soon after the shootings began. Siljeur approached their vehicle and informed them that he was looking for robbers. He did not identify himself as a police officer, and he was not in uniform. However, Mr Davidse's companion noted that the fire arm Siljeur was carrying was of the type usually issued to police officers. Based on this information they concluded that he was a police officer looking for robbers. Siljeur later opened fire on the two men when they attempted to assist Mr Luiters. After the shootings, Siljeur fled the scene.

The Constitutional Court accepted the Supreme Court of Appeal's factual finding that Siljeur had placed himself on duty. The Minister contended that a different test than the one developed in K was needed for such situations involving off-duty officers. The Minister argued that when an off-duty officer places himself or herself on duty, the enquiry ought to be whether their conduct (though subjectively intended to be within the scope of their employment) was so far removed from the purpose for which they were employed that the Minister could not be held liable. In the Ministers view, because the police exercised a different level of control over on-duty and off-duty officers, different standards for vicarious liability ought to be set.[3]

The Luiters Court rejected the Minister's proposed alteration of the test for vicarious liability, and held that the level of control that an employer has over the employee is already a relevant factor to be considered in the second leg of the test.[4] It also rejected the Minister's suggestion that the standard of care be based on the impunity with which the police officer had acted: 'What it would mean is that the more improper the conduct of the police officer, the less likely the Minister will be held liable. This result is not one that accords with a Constitution that seeks to render the exercise of public power accountable.'[5]

[1] K (supra) at para 57.
[2] Police officers are authorised to place themselves on duty when the need arises.
[3] Luiters (supra) at paras 20–21.
[4] Ibid at para 32.
[5] Ibid at paras 34.

The legal conclusions of the Constitutional Court are sound. However, the factual findings of the lower courts appear somewhat misguided. The High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal in Luiters were content to conclude that Siljeur had placed himself on duty simply on the basis of his statement that he was 'looking for robbers' and that he possessed a firearm issued by the police. In so doing, the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal conflate the two-stage vicarious liability analysis developed in K. When employing the two-stage test set out in K, courts should be careful not to confuse the factual enquiry contained in the first leg of the test, ie, whether the police officer was on a frolic of his own, with the policy considerations in the second leg of the test, ie, whether the Minister should be held liable for the police officer's actions.

After the decisions in Carmichele and K, it is clear that the duty of the police to ensure the safety of the public entails a positive duty to take action to prevent possible crimes. The decisions in K and Luiters indicate that the duty imposed upon the police to protect the public is abrogated when police officers violate the rights of citizens through the commission of crimes themselves. Expanding the scope of vicarious liability for the Minister takes into consideration the considerable power and trust placed in the hands of the police and the concomitant potential for abuse that such power creates. However, protecting the public from unruly police officers should not, and will not, translate into liability for the Minister in all cases where crimes are committed by police officers.

(bb) F: The rollback of Carmichele and K?

Several cases handed down in 2011 engage two critical developments, noted above, in the law of delict as it relates to the police and their (notional) employers.

First, Carmichele and K made it patently clear that the constitutional rights to dignity and to freedom and security of the person impose affirmative duties on the police to prevent violations of physical integrity and ensure that a police officer's constitutional obligations do not necessarily end when he or she clocks out. These principles may seem quite abstract. Not so. They are decidedly well-grounded in the real world of South Africa — a country with one of the world's highest levels of sexual assault and rape (not currently in a war zone.) The Carmichele Court's words, in this regard, are worth rehearsing: 'Sexual violence and the threat of sexual violence goes to the core of women's subordination in society. It is the single greatest threat to the self-determination of South African women.'[1] Second, Carmichele and K may, at the same time, have led to some conceptual confusion regarding the difference between personal delictual liability and vicarious delictual liability for police officers who have breached their constitutional duties.

In Minister of Safety and Security v F, the Supreme Court of Appeal was seized with a case that engaged both developments.[2] In short, a 13-year-old girl was raped by a police detective (who had mendaciously described himself as a private detective, but whose police radio and cases files led the girl to conclude correctly that he was a police officer.) As in K, the police officer's status led the girl to accept the offer of a lift home. (It is worth noting that despite her fear of this officer — she had previously lept from the car — the girl's predicament (out on the road in the dead of night) and the notion that our police remain our thin blue line between order and chaos — led her to accept a second invitation of a ride home.) The critical difference between F and K for three judges on the Supreme Court of Appeal panel was that the police officer in F was not officially on duty, but was only 'on call'. This status meant that the officer had an obligation to make himself available for duty should his services be deemed necessary. That he may have been neither fish nor fowl did not, however, influence the girl's decision. Indeed, that the police force allowed him to use an official car while 'on call' did — both courts accepted — (ultimately) convince the girl that a lift from a police officer was a reasonably safe bet.

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 62.

[2] The Minister of Safety and Security v F [2011] ZASCA 3 (Supreme Court of Aappeal, 22 February 2011)('F').

In a judgment that challenges, fascinates and disturbs, Nugent JA found that the Constitutional Court in Carmichele, K and Luiters (and other courts that had followed its lead) had collapsed the distinction between direct liability and vicarious liability with respect to the delictual actions of police officers. In his view, the Supreme Court of Appeal decisions[1] spawned by Carmichele K and Luiters — Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden,[2] Van Eeden v Minister of Safety and Security,[3] and Minister

[1] The change in this constitutionally driven domain of delict has been dramatic. Van Duivenboden, Hamilton, Van Eden – noted above and below — speak to the extent to which the Supreme Court of Appeal has followed Carmichele's break with tradition.

[2] 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA), [2002] 3 All SA 741 (SCA)(Nugent J) at para 22 ('Where there is a potential threat of the kind that is now in issue the constitutionally protected rights to human dignity, to life and to security of the person are all placed in peril and the State, represented by its officials, has a constitutional duty to protect them … We are not concerned in this case with the duties of the police generally in the investigation of crime … In this case we are concerned only with whether police officers who, in the exercise of duties on behalf of the State, are in possession of information that reflects upon the fitness of a person to possess firearms are under an actionable duty to members of the public to take reasonable steps to act on that information in order to avoid harm occurring … There is no effective way to hold the State to account in the present case other than by way of an action for damages and, in the absence of any norm or consideration of public policy that outweighs it, the constitutional norm of accountability requires that a legal duty be recognised. The negligent conduct of police officers in those circumstances is thus actionable and the State is vicariously liable for the consequences of any such negligence') Although the facts in F and Van Duivenboden differ, the most palpable difference appears to be in Nugent J's approach to vicarious viability.

[3] 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA), [2002] 4 All SA 346 (SCA) at paras 17-18 (Our Courts have in a number of recent decisions recognised that the entrenchment of the right to be free from violence in s 12(1)(c), read with s 205(3), would, in appropriate circumstances, be strongly indicative of a legal duty resting on the police to act positively to prevent violent crime. In Van Duivenboden this Court held that certain police officers who were in possession of information that reflected adversely upon the fitness of a person to possess firearms owed a legal duty to members of the public to take reasonable steps to act on that information in order to prevent harm. In the majority judgment Nugent JA, after referring to the entrenchment of the rights to equality, personal freedom and privacy, to the State's positive duty under s 7 to act in protection of these rights and to the principle of public accountability, went on to say: "However where the State's failure occurs in circumstances that offer no effective remedy other than an action for damages the norm of I accountability will, in my view, ordinarily demand the recognition of a legal duty unless there are other considerations affecting the public interest that outweigh that norm."

of Safety and Security v Hamilton[1] — should best be understood as instances of direct liability, not vicarious liability. Following his own novel finding in constitutional law, Nugent J held that the defendant — the Minister of Safety and Security — could not be held vicariously liable for the actions of a policeman (on standby duty) who had raped a minor.

While Nugent JA may have, bravely, chosen this case to draw attention to what he, two other judges on the panel and a brace of academics[2] perceive to be a problem in this relatively new, constitutionally driven development of the law of delict, his judgment suffers from three relatively apparent weaknesses. First, to (ostensibly) set an established body of constitutional law right, one could have legitimately expected the judge to offer a substantially longer and more nuanced expatiation of the legal issues in play, especially given the Constitutional Court's extended exploration over several cases of the constitutional rights at stake Second, as the minority judgment of two members of the SCA panel makes clear: the evidence adduced by the lower court (not the evidence as re-read by Nugent JA, despite his denial of such a re-reading) reflects the actions of a police officer on standby duty, whose identity as a police officer became known to the rape victim during the course of the evening of the untoward events, and who gained the trust, subsequently abused, of the victim through the very nature of his office. Third, Nugent J seems tone deaf to the particular constitutional implications of the matter. The Constitutional Court made it patently clear that police officers have positive duties to uphold the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and that the Minister has a constitutional obligation to 'teach and require their members to act in accordance with the Constitution and the law, including customary international law and international agreements binding on the Republic.'[3] Moreover, Nugent JA seems unmoved (though not entirely oblivious) to the implications of K and F and Carmichele: that we have a largely male police force that acts with

[1] 2004 (2) SA 216 (SCA), [2003] 4 All SA 117 (SCA) at paras 35 ('[T]he individual's right to life, bodily integrity and security of the person must be balanced against policy considerations such as the efficient functioning of the police, the availability of resources and the undoubted public importance of the effective control of firearms. To my mind, in the present case, as in Van Duivenboden, it can be stated that one is not dealing with a situation involving "particular aspects of police activity in respect of which the public interest is best served by denying an action for negligence". Here too, there "is no effective way to hold the State to account … other than by way of an action for damages". Moreover, the spectre of the opening of the "floodgates of litigation" and the resultant "chilling effect" of potential limitless liability on the efficient and proper performance by the police of their primary functions — relied on very heavily by the appellant as a ground for denying the existence of a legal duty on the relevant police members in the circumstances of the present case — is no A more convincing here than it was in either Van Duivenboden or Van Eeden. In the words of Vivier ADP in the latter case: '[O]ur Courts do not confine liability for an omission to certain stereotypes but adopt an open-ended and flexible approach to the question whether a particular omission to act should be held unlawful or not. In deciding that question the requirements for establishing negligence and causation provide sufficient practical scope for limiting liability.' (footnotes omitted).)

[2] See S Wagener 'K v Minister of Safety and Security and the Increasingly Blurred Line between Personal and Vicarious Liability' (2008) 125 SALJ 673; A Fagan 'Reconsidering Carmichele' (2008) 125 SALJ 659; F du Bois 'State Liability in South Africa: A Constitutional Remix' (2010) 25 Tulane European & Civil Law Forum 139. Whatever reservations one may have about Nugent JA's judgment, he draws down on a compelling body of academic literature.

[3] FC s 199(5).

impunity and, as the case law he reviews suggests, seems pathologically bent on continuing to commit sexually violent acts against women.

Other readers may find the judgment thorough and persuasive on one of the legal points at issue: that the Constitutional Court, and subsequent Supreme Court of Appeal decisions, have collapsed the distinction between direct liability and vicarious liability in these matters. Nugent JA clearly wishes to return to the halcyon days in which the terms of vicarious liability were clear and unambiguous:

> While 'risk creation' might indeed be capable of giving rise to liability on the part of the employer, … the true basis for liability in [vicarious liability] cases is the failure of the employer, acting through the instrument of the employee, to fulfil the duty that is cast upon the employer to avoid harm occurring through the risk that has been created. For on the traditional approach vicarious liability arises from the existence of the relationship alone and not from any failure of duty by the employer.[1]

And it may well be possible that the Constitutional Court could have given clearer direction on the law in this domain. But to leave matters there would be to miss two critical aspects of the Court's jurisprudence on delicts involving sexual assault and the police. First, the Court has been quite cognizant of its specialized jurisdiction and its (consciously) limited role in the development of the common law. It thus left much of the development of the common law in this domain to lower courts. Second, irrespective of whether South Africa's pre-constitutional law of delict had clearly distinguished between direct liability and vicariously liability, the Constitutional Court has made it palpably clear that it will not tolerate a police force that abuses its powers, especially when those powers are used to sexually abuse women. Nugent JA's opinion would have been decidely more compelling if it had taken to heart the central learning of Carmichele and K: the objective, normative value system established by the Final Constitution clearly sets its face against systemic, degrading violence against women and that the police have an essential role to play in ridding South African society of one of its most frightful and demeaning features. Seventeen years into our constitutional experiment, and the police appear no closer to accepting direct or vicarious responsibility for this inhumane state of affairs. By engaging in a rather formalistic attempt to narrow the grounds for a finding of vicarious liability, Nugent JA misses the rot at the heart of South African society and the Constitutional Court's attempt to place responsibility for rectifying that wrong where it belongs: with a government and a police force (Ministers of Safety and Security and police detectives alike) charged with vouchsafing our security of the person. In Nugent JA's own words on vicarious liability, the Constitutional Court can be read as finding that persistent neglect by the Minister and the Commissioner has created an ongoing 'material risk' of sexual assault by police officers in the line of duty and on the margins of that line of duty.

A final perplexing feature of Nugent JA's judgment flows from his apparent desire to cabin most delictual claims against the police within the framework of direct liability. Direct liability claims are certainly appropriate for individual police officers. Elements of wrongfulness and fault are more readily established. Nugent JA does not say, however, how such elements of a delictual action would be established with respect to a Minister of Safety and Security or a Police Commissioner. One might be forgiven for thinking that Nugent JA had a responsibility to delineate the contours of his preferred understanding of delictual actions flowing from crimes committed by police officers — on and off duty. Instead, he concludes that since no claim of direct liability was brought by the plaintiff/respondent against the Minister of Safety and Security, the Supreme Court of Appeal was not obliged to develop the law in this area.

[1] F (supra) at para 34.

Three things are certain. The Constitutional Court will be obliged to take the measure of Nugent JA's claim that the two forms of delictual action must be clearly distinguished and that direct liability is the preferred form in police driven delictual matters. The Court will have to assess whether its current doctrine of vicarious liability retains its merit as it stands, whether it needs to be tweaked or, as Nugent JA has it, whether it should be largely discarded. The Court will have to decide whether it wishes to reverse the Supreme Court of Appeal on its errant re-reading of the facts or on its refusal to follow Constitutional Court precedent.[1]

(cc) Novel uses of cost orders as constitutional remedies

Two recent judgments in the North Gauteng High Court demonstrate that other judges are alive to the creative doctrines and remedies available to courts committed to rooting out the rampant ruthlessness reflected in the ranks of our police force. In Coetzee v National Commissioner of Police & Minister of Safety and Security,[2] Du Plessis AJ found that the unlawful arrest and illegal detention of a person not suspected of any crime (initially) constituted a clear violation of the Constitution that warranted unusual measures by way of remedy and costs. The case is not entirely straightforward. Although he had committed no crime and was not suspected of committing a crime, Coetzee refused to pull his car over at a roadblock and subsequently skipped a red light. (Coetzee justified his action on the grounds that such roadblocks, constructed late at night, had been used by criminals passing themselves off a police officers. He claimed that he feared for the safety of his family.) As a result of his actions at the roadblock and redlight, the SAPS and Metro police officers forced his car off the road and arrested him. Following his arrest, he found himself unable to secure the police bail normally granted in such circumstances. An urgent rule nisi order had to be issued by a judge in order to secure his release. In coming to his conclusion about the parties responsible for this injustice, and their respective degree of liability, Du Plessis AJ writes as follows:

> The Constitution places a very high premium on the right to human dignity and freedom. It is essential that the courts should protect these rights in the most effective way possible. The level of crime in South Africa should not justify a departure from the democratic and constitutional principles enshrined in our Constitution, safeguarding the population from any excess use of power and deprivation of freedom by government institutions and authorities. The spirit of the Constitution, the recognition of basic human rights, and the right to freedom in particular, enshrined in the Constitution should not be compromised in any way whatso> ever through the actions of government officials. The courts should therefore jealously guard these rights and act decisively upon the infringement thereof. Furthermore it is important that those who act with impunity, and who think that they can do as they please, simply because they have the force of the whole law enforcing system behind them, should be brought to book and restrained. The whole wrath of the legal system, the rule of law, the courts and the public should be brought upon such officials. It does not appear from the huge amount of damages claims instituted against the second respondent, the Minister of Safety and Security, that a damages claim constitutes a deterrent of any nature whatsoever in respect of unlawful behaviour on the part of the security forces. In fact, the only party being prejudiced as a result of damages claims based on unlawful arrest and detention, is the taxpayer, and therefore the public, who also bears the brunt normally of unlawful actions by the police services. It is in fact those who expect that the hard fought and precious rights to freedom, dignity and not to be detained unnecessarily, should be upheld and enforced, who eventually have to pay for the breach of these rights, by state officials mostly acting with impunity. It is ironic further, that those who sometimes are subjected themselves to such unlawful breach of the aforesaid rights, form part of the taxpayers who have to pay in the form of damages for such breaches. In my view other possibilities should be considered to deter police services and metro police services from breaching the enshrined rights held dear by everybody in this country. The public must be protected. Therefore, if a preferable method of an accused's attendance is through a summons, that procedure should be employed. In this regard the risk of the suspect absconder or committing further crime should be considered. An arrest without any rational reasonable basis therefore should not occur indiscriminately. It does not matter how severe the alleged criminal offence may be. The person to be arrested is still an innocent person whose right to freedom, dignity and right to fair treatment should be upheld. I therefore come to the conclusion that the arrest in this matter was unlawful. His detention in the holding cells at the Pretoria West police station was therefore also unlawful. As I have mentioned above, those responsible for consideration of granting the applicant bail refused to do so. It follows that the applicant was held unlawfully and detained unlawfully at the Pretoria West police station.[1]

[1] At the time of writing, the Constitutional Court has set F down for hearing (31 May 2011).
[2] Coetzee v National Commissioner of Police & Others 2011 (2) SA 227 (GNP)('Coetzee').

However, in a striking departure from form, the Judge does not dig into the deep pockets of the state and thus the taxpayer, in awarding costs. Instead, using constitutional powers granted him under FC s 38 and FC s 173, he writes:

> I have no hesitation to come to the conclusion that appropriate relief in this matter, with reference to the costs of the application, that should never have been brought and that should never have been necessary, is that those responsible therefor, and who were derelict in their duties, and who did not act in accordance with their constitutional obligations, should carry the costs of the application. Furthermore there is no reason why the taxpayer should carry the costs of the actions of these officials. Senior Superintendent Moodley and his assistant, Superintendent Klopper who were on duty at the Pretoria West Police Station that day and evening, should not have allowed the arrest, and should have acted in such a fashion that the infringement of the rights of the applicant had not occurred. The Metro policemen responsible for the arrest, namely Constable Frans Moosa Sivayi had acted completely outside his authority and acted unlawfully by arresting the applicant. Constable Mandla Steven Ntsweni who is the deponent to the opposing affidavit filed, and who tried to justify the actions of the respondents, and who acted together with Constable Sivayi is > similarly responsible. The original complaints commander and the commander who took over from him namely Captain Nhlazo and thereafter Inspector Duledu, similarly did not act in accordance with their duties, namely to consider bail and to consider the position and rights of the applicant.[1]

[1] Coetzee (supra) at paras 43 – 51.

The police officers themselves are held jointly and severally liable for the infringement of fundamental rights and costs incurred by the illegal arrest and the subsequent litigation.[2] The Police Commissioner and the Minister remain on the hook only to the extent that the officers found culpable cannot cover the costs incurred by the applicant and by the two respondents in litigating the matter before the High Court.[3] Although there is nothing new about an order of costs de bonis propriis, the use of the award in the context constitutes a novel constitutional remedy for a constitutional breach. At the same time the remedy remains true to the spirit of Fose and declines to make the taxpayer liable for the unconstitutional acts of public employees.

The facts, the holding and the order in Prinsloo v Nasionale Vervolgingsgesag En Andere track Coetzee extremely closely.[4] Once again, an ordinary citizen was deemed to be detained without trial in terms FC s 12 because the responsible police officers failed to bring the accused to court before the expiration of 48 hours (as required by the Criminal Procedure Act). Such mindless and arbitrary deprivations of freedom could not be tolerated and warranted a penalty designed to ensure that future failures of a similar ilk would not occur again. Thus, as in Coetzee, the Prinsloo court held that costs for litgation can be imposed upon those members of the South African Police Service who have acted, as in the extant matter, mala fide, intentionally, unreasonably and improperly, and thus entirely beyond the scope of their powers.

(d) Limitations on the rights of SAPS members

The SAPS Act contains a number of limitations on the rights of police officers.

SAPS Act s 41(1) prohibits police officers from striking or inducing or conspiring with other officers to strike. The section empowers the National Commissioner, or the Provincial Commissioner, to issue an ultimatum to an officer to desist from engaging in such behaviour. Should the officer fail to stop, she may be dismissed without a hearing.[5] The procedural safeguards provided by the section

[1] Coetzee (supra) at para 107.
[2] Ibid at para 107.
[3] Ibid.
[4] 2011 (2) SA 214 (GNP).
[5] SAPS s 41(2) and 41(3).

are quite limited. The officer must be informed in writing of the reasons for the discharge. After such reasons are provided, the officer is afforded the opportunity to make written representations to the Minister for reinstatement.[1] The Constitutional Court's conclusions in SANDU CC I and SANDU CC II suggest that SAPS Act s 41 should pass constitutional muster. Not even POPCRU contests the proposition that members that provide 'essential services' can be prohibited from striking.[2]

The rights of police officers to demonstrate, to assemble and to form unions are entirely different matter. While SANDU CC I and SANDU CC II are concerned with the rights of members of the SANDF, they offer a glimpse on what the Court will and will not tolerate with regard to members of the SAPS.

In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence ('SANDU CC I') the Constitutional Court held that a provision of the Defence Act prohibiting members of the armed forces from participating in public protest action and from joining trade unions violated the members' right to freedom of expression and their right 'to form and join a trade union'.[3] Implicit in the majority's decision — and explicit in Justice Sachs' concurrence — was a finding that SANDU members' freedom of association had been infringed. The question for the Court was whether these infringements were justifiable. With respect to the soldiers' right to freedom of expression, the Court found the provisions' limitations a grave incursion into the soldiers' expressive rights and patently unjustifiable. With respect to the soldiers' 'right to form and join a trade union', the Court rejected the Minister's contention that an infringement of the right was justified by the constitutional imperative to structure and to manage the SANDF as a 'disciplined military force'.[4] As the Act stood, it was a constitutionally unjustifiable limitation. However, while deciding that the requirement of strict discipline would not necessarily be undermined by permitting SANDF members to join a trade union, the SANDU CC I Court did note that the structure of a trade union might well differ in a military environment and that appropriate legislation might justifiably limit the scope of a soldier's trade union rights.

In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others ('SANDU CC II'),[5] the Constitutional Court consolidated several separate High Court and

[1] SAPS s 41(3).

[2] See South African Police Services v Police and Prison Civil Rights Union & Another [2010] 12 BLLR 1263 (LAC), [2010] ZALAC 17 (Currently on appeal, in 2011, in the Constitutional Court.) See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[3] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC), [1999] ZACC 7 ('SANDU CC II').

[4] See FC s 199 (7). It reads, in pertinent part: 'Neither the security forces, nor any of its members, may, in the performance of their functions – (a) prejudice a political party interest that is legitimate in terms of the Constitution; (b) further, in a partisan manner, any interest of a political party.'

[5] 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC), [2007] 9 BLLR 785 (CC), (2007) 28 ILJ 1909 (CC), [2007] ZACC 10 ('SANDU CC II').

Supreme Court of Appeal cases[1] in which SANDU had challenged the constitutionality of a constellation of subsequent regulations. The SANDU CC II Court rejected virtually all of SANDU's challenges to the regulations (most of which concerned rights regarding collective bargaining.) It did, however, uphold a limited right for SANDU members to assemble or to demonstrate (out of uniform) with regard to employment conditions in terms of regulation 8(b),[2] and rejected a claim by SANDF that 'the regulations do not impose an obligation upon it to exhaust the [collective bargaining] procedures set out in the regulations [because] the very purpose of the regulations is to prevent unilateral action by the SANDF in respect of the areas of permissible bargaining until the procedures provided for in the regulations have been exhausted.'[3]

The second noteworthy limitation concerns the political activities in which SAPS members may engage. In terms of SAPS Act s 46(1), members are prohibited from holding posts in, wearing the insignia or identifying mark of, or publicly displaying support for any political party, organisation, movement or body. SAPS Act s 46(2) qualifies the broad prohibition in SAPS Act s 46(1) by providing that SAPS Act s 46(1) does not prohibit membership of a political organisation, nor does it prohibit attendance at meetings of such an organisation. However, the officer may not attend in uniform.

In Van Dyk v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit, the High Court held that a police officer was legitimately terminated from his employment because he stood for election as a member of the Democratic Alliance.[4] The officer argued that because his position in the police force — that of a budget analyst — did not require him to engage the public directly, the officer's candidacy could not prejudice the administration of justice or give the appearance of such impropriety.[5] The High Court found that the purpose of the SAPS Act was to eliminate any perception on the part of the public that the administration and enforcement of the law advanced the fortunes of any political party or undermined the claims

[1] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others; Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union & Others 2007 (1) SA 402 (SCA), 2007 (4) BCLR 398 (SCA); Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union; Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union & Another 2007 (1) SA 422 (SCA); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T).

[2] SANDU CC II (supra) at paras 81-82.

[3] Ibid at para 72.

[4] Unreported, RPD case no 4268/2002 (29 April 2003)('Van Dyk'). See further Woolman 'Freedom of Association' (supra).

[5] While on the police force from 1995 to 1999, Van Dyk had represented the Freedom Front on the Greater Pretoria Metropolitan Council (GPMC). In 2000, Van Dyk switched to the Democratic Alliance and openly ran for a seat on the GPMC as a DA candidate. Van Dyk also argued that while s 46 of the SAPS Act and FC s 199(7), set identifiable limits on party political activity, those limits should be read, and if necessary modified, by the political rights found in the FC s 19. The court found that even if s 46(1) was deemed to have infringed FC s 19, the infringement was patently reasonable and justifiable under FC s 36.

of members of other parties to justice.[1] The court found that the elimination of any taint of political party bias in the police force in order to instill greater public confidence in government justified the limitation of the political and associational rights of the particular officer in question.[2] Such a finding is consistent with the needs of a nascent democracy committed to the principle that all are equal before the law and that all can be expected to be treated by the police without fear, favour or prejudice.[3]

A third limitation concerns the right of police officers to resign from the SAPS. SAPS Act s 49(1) states that once a state of emergency or state of national defence has been declared, no member can resign without the written permission of the National Commissioner. Further, in terms of SAPS Act s 49(2), during any period when it becomes necessary to maintain public order in the country, the National Commissioner may declare a 30 day period during which no police officer may resign without written permission. This limitation ensures that the SAPS properly performs its functions and that its ability to do so is not compromised by diminished numbers during a national emergency.

The rationale for this last limitation is consistent with the limits placed on the ability of SAPS members to strike: an issue engaged only glancingly above. As Carole Cooper notes:

> The 1995 [Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 (LRA)] … limits the right to strike in essential services and minimum services. The ILO recognises that it might be necessary to prohibit strikes in essential services but that such services should be restrictively defined. Without a restrictive definition, the notion would lose all meaning. The ILO defines essential services as those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. It was not prepared to draw up a definitive list of which services could be determined as essential… . Critically, the ILO requires that where a strike is prohibited, there should be access to quick and impartial mediation

[1] Section 46 of the SAPS Act reads as follows:

(1) No member shall—

(a) publicly display or express support for or associate himself or herself with a political party, organisation, movement or body;

(b) hold any post or office in a political party, organisation, movement or body;

(c) wear any insignia or identification mark in respect of any political party, organisation, movement or body; or

(d) in any other manner further or prejudice party-political interests.

(2) Subsection (1) shall not be construed as prohibiting a member from—

(a) joining a political party, organisation, movement or body of his or her choice;

(b) attending a meeting of a political party, organisation, movement or body: Provided that no member shall attend such a meeting in uniform; or

(c) exercising his or her right to vote.

Section 46(1)(a) replaced s 35(1)(a) of the Police Act 7 of 1958. The Police Act stated that no member of the Police Force, while still a member of the Police Force, may engage in political activity, stand for election or participate in a municipal council.

[2] See Van Dyk (supra) at 10 ("The need for a police force that is seen to be impartial speaks for itself.')

[3] A number of eastern European nations have placed similar laws on the books in order to diminish the public's understandable reluctance to trust a security apparatus that had all too recently used all manner of surveillance and violation of bodily integrity to enforce the repressive policies of the state. Of course, as South Africa's history of overt politicisation of the security services recedes into the past, the rationale for barring party political activity will lose at least some of its force.

> and arbitration procedures for workers hit by the prohibition… . The 1995 LRA basically adopts the definitional approach to essential services. It defines as essential a service 'the interruption of which endangers the life, personal safety or health of the whole or any part of the population'.[1] It also specifically declares as essential the parliamentary service and the South African Police Service. The prohibition of strikes in essential services (including minimum services) provided for in the LRA should pass the requirements of the limitations test in the Final Constitution, particularly as the prohibition is consonant with ILO requirements.[2] The Act's definition of an essential service replicates that of the ILO. Both provide for a prohibition on strikes only in very restricted circumstances. The specific inclusion of parliamentary and police services as essential services, thereby removing the right of employees in these services to strike, is also defensible in terms of the public importance of these functions, and is accepted by the ILO and is common elsewhere. The ILO states that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited in the public service in so far as such a strike could cause 'serious hardship' to the 'national community' and provided that the limitations are accompanied by certain compensatory guarantees.[3]

Our labour courts have largely tracked Cooper's analysis. However, their judgments also reflect a number of subtle distinctions. SA Police Services v POPCRU turns on the reach of s 65(1)(d) of the LRA.[4] Section 65(1)(d) prohibits employees engaged in essential services from striking. The matter arose in 2007 when POPCRU called on its members in the SAPS to join a general strike. The Labour Court held that only those officers employed under the SAPS Act (actual police officers) were barred from striking. As a result, employees engaged by the SAPS in the service in terms of the Public Service Act retained the right to strike.[5] On appeal, the Labour Appeals Court ('LAC') largely upheld this finding. It noted that the term 'essential service' applies to particular functions performed by that employer: The functions assigned to SAPS by the Constitution are 'to prevent, combat and investigate crime, to maintain public order, to protect and secure the inhabitants of the Republic and their property and to uphold and enforce the law'. These functions constitute the 'essential service' contemplated by s 71(1) of the LRA. The LAC held that, unless non-SAPS member are deemed members, non-members employed by the SAPS cannot perform police functions, and therefore do not form part of the police service. The LAC concluded that the SAPS' view that all its employees are prohibited from striking would constitute an unreasonable limitation on non-member employees' constitutional right to strike.

(e) Accountability and Oversight

(i) Executive and parliamentary oversight

The executive exercises overall policy control over the SAPS at the national level through the Minister of Police and at the provincial level through an MEC with [1] LRA s 213.

[2] LRA s 65(1)(d)(i).

[3] C Cooper 'Labour Relations' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 53–54 – 53–55 citing ILO Freedom of Association (1996) 110 at para 533. See also C Cooper 'Strikes in Essential Services' (1994) 15(5) ILJ 903–29.

[4] [2010] 12 BLLR 1263 (LAC).

[5] SAPS v POPCRU (2007) 28 ILJ 2611 (LC).

a comparable brief. The Final Constitution provides for the establishment of a national secretariat for the SAPS to 'function under' the responsible Minister. With respect to the provinces, s 2(1)(b) of the SAPS Act mandates the establishment of provincial secretariats for safety and security.[1] FC s 208 does not specify the functions that the national secretariat is meant to perform under the guidance of the Minister. However, s 3(1) of the SAPS Act states that these functions encompass advising the Minister on the exercise of his powers and performance of his functions, advising the Minister on constitutional matters, promoting accountability and transparency within the SAPS, monitoring the implementation of policy and directions issued by the Minister, conducting research into policing matters and evaluating the functioning of the SAPS. The secretariat is also given certain powers to facilitate the performance of its functions. It can obtain information and documents from the SAPS, enter buildings controlled by the SAPS and is entitled to receive 'all reasonable assistance' from SAPS members.[2]

The mandate of the secretariat, as articulated in the SAPS Act, ought to make it the backbone of executive oversight of the SAPS. Unfortunately, the national secretariat has been largely under-utilised. Pursuant to a policy decision taken in 1999 to decrease the size and the resources of the secretariat, it is no longer in a position to make a meaningful contribution to policy development and oversight.[3] Some commentators have noted that the sidelining of the secretariat reflects a shift in government policy away from building the accountability and the legitimacy of the SAPS to crime fighting.[4] Whatever the reasons may be, the weakening of the secretariat has left an undesirable lacuna in our system of policing.

At the provincial level, provincial executives have an additional oversight mechanism available to them. FC s 206(5)(a) permits provincial executives to establish commissions of inquiry into alleged inefficiencies in the SAPS within their province or breakdowns in the relationship between the SAPS and communities. FC s 206(5)(b) states that after conducting the inquiry the province 'must make recommendations to the Cabinet member responsible for policing'. FC s 206(5)(b) should not be read as a limitation of the ability of the province to take independent action to remedy problems that are identified through an inquiry. On the contrary, FC 206 makes it clear that the steps provided for in FC 206(5)(a) and (b) are carried out 'in order to perform the functions set out in subsection (3)'. Under FC 206(3) a province is entitled:

(a) to monitor police conduct;
(b) to oversee the effectiveness and efficiency of the police service, including receiving reports on the police service;
(c) to promote good relations between the police and the community;

[1] In terms of s 3(5) of the SAPS Act, the functions and the powers of the provincial secretariats are the same as the functions and the powers of the national secretariat.

[2] SAPS Act s 3(2).

[3] See D Bruce, G Newham & T Masuko 'In the Service of People's Democracy: An Assessment of the South African Police Service' Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation (2007)('CSVR Study') available at http://www.csvr.org.za/wits/papers/papsaps.htm. See also M Shaw Crime and Policing in Post-Apartheid South Africa: Transforming under Fire (2002) 38–40.

[4] Bruce et al 'CSVR Study' (supra) at 46.

(d) to assess the effectiveness of visible policing; and
(e) to liase with the Cabinet member responsible for policing with respect to crime and policing in the province.

The appropriate interpretation to be given to FC s 206(5)(b) is that once an inquiry initiated by the province has been completed, a report must be provided to the Minister. However, the province is also empowered to take whatever steps it deems necessary to remedy the problems in accordance with its entitlements under FC 206(3).

Parliamentary oversight of the SAPS is given effect through a Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security . In terms of FC s 205, provincial commissioners must present annual reports to the provincial legislature.[1] The effectiveness of the parliamentary portfolio committee in monitoring the SAPS has been limited. Portfolio committees tend to accept government policy and offer little critique.[2]

(ii) Independent Complaints Directorate

The Independent Complaints Directorate ('ICD') is the statutory body that investigates complaints against the SAPS.[3] The ICD was established to satisfy the requirements of IC s 222. IC s 222 provided for the establishment of 'an independent mechanism under civilian control, with the object of ensuring that complaints in respect of offences and misconduct allegedly committed by members of the Service are investigated in an effective and efficient manner.' The Final Constitution does not contain a provision comparable to IC s 222. However, FC s 206(6) indirectly requires the establishment of such a body by stating that 'on receipt of a complaint lodged by a provincial executive, an independent police complaints body established by national legislation must investigate any alleged misconduct of, or offence committed by, a member.'

The ICD is headed by an Executive Director. The Executive Director is appointed for a renewable term of five years.[4] The staff of the ICD is appointed by the Executive Director in consultation with the Minister. The staff is subject to the same terms and conditions of employment as ordinary members of the public service.[5] Provincial Heads of the ICD are appointed by the Executive Director. However, this post is not specifically created in the SAPS Act. The ICD's funds come directly from Parliament and are allocated to it by the Minister of Finance through the national budget.

[1] These reports must also be handed to the National Commissioner.

[2] Bruce et al 'CSVR Study' (supra) at 46.

[3] The ICD is created by Chapter 10 of the SAPS Act. For a critique of the structure and the powers of the ICD as conferred by the SAPS Act, as well as a comparison to practices in other jurisdictions, see B Manby 'The Independent Complaints Directorate: An Opportunity Wasted' (1996) 12 SAJHR 417. The ICD is not the only means by which police officers can be held accountable. The SAPS also conducts internal disciplinary enquiries. SAPS Act s 40.

[4] In terms of s 51(1) of the SAPS Act, the Minister is responsible for nominating a candidate for the post of Executive Director. SAPS s 51(2) then provides that the nominee must be confirmed by the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security before he or she can be appointed.

[5] SAPS Act ss 52(1) and 52(2).

The investigative mandate of the ICD is primarily derived from s 53(2) of the SAPS Act:

> In order to achieve its object, the directorate
> (a) may mero motu or upon receipt of a complaint, investigate any misconduct or offence allegedly committed by a member, and may, where appropriate, refer such investigations to the Commissioner concerned;
> (b) shall mero motu or upon receipt of a complaint, investigate any death in police custody or as a result of police action; and
> (c) may investigate any matter referred to the directorate by the Minister or the member of the Executive Council.

The ICD has also been granted the authority to exercise the same investigative powers over municipal police services.[1]

An important part of the ICD's mandate arises from s 18 of the Domestic Violence Act.[2] In terms of s 18, if a police officer fails to comply with any of the obligations imposed on her in terms of the Domestic Violence Act, then such failure must be treated as misconduct and referred for investigation by the ICD. (The failure to comply may also provide the grounds for delictual actions against the negligent police officer and the vicariously liable Minister.[3]) The Act also requires that disciplinary proceedings must be initiated against such a police officer unless the ICD directs otherwise. This process is overseen by Parliament. Parliament is meant to receive reports from the ICD every six months concerning investigations and recommendations made under s 18. The National Commissioner is also required to present reports to Parliament indicating the steps taken as a result of the recommendation made by the ICD.

The procedure established by s 18 of the Domestic Violence Act has the potential to be a very effective oversight mechanism. But it has not served that function in practice. In its 2005 report on the ICD, the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security noted that the ICD had fallen behind in the provision of its reports on domestic violence and that the SAPS was not meeting s 18's reporting requirements.[4]

To facilitate its investigations, personnel within the ICD can be designated to perform the functions and to exercise the powers of an ordinary SAPS member.[5] The ICD can, thereby, develop its own internal investigative unit. However, chronic shortages of resources and of staff have severely limited the investigative capacity of the ICD and resulted in a serious backlog of complaints. In addition,

[1] Regulations for Municipal Police Services Government Notice N R710 Government Gazette 20142 (11 June 1999).

[2] Act 166 of 1998.

[3] See Minister of Safety and Security v Venter [2011] ZASCA 42 (Delictual action against the police for failing to perform their duties under the DVA: currently on appeal to the Constitutional Court.)

[4] Report of the Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security on the Independent Complaints Directorate (ICD) (17 August 2005) available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2005/comreports/050824pcsafetyreport.htm (accessed on 18 September 2007).

[5] Such a designation must be made by the Minister upon a request by the Executive Director. SAPS Act s 53(3)(a).

the ICD has complained of delays in ministerial approval of police powers for investigators: these delays have further hampered their investigative efforts.[1]

The Executive Director has the power to 'request and obtain' information from police officers, police commissioners and the National Director of Public Prosecutions and must receive the co-operation of any police officer.[2] These provisions are rather weak, as they do not specifically compel SAPS members to co-operate with investigations.[3] The ICD has, in the past, called for legislation granting it the specific power to access all documents held by the police. No such legislation is in the pipeline.[4] In addition, members of the SAPS are able to frustrate an ICD investigation, particularly investigations into deaths in police custody, by simply invoking their right to remain silent.[5]

Once an investigation has been completed, the ICD can make recommendations to the commissioner, the Minister, or the MEC concerned.[6] If the matter involves a potential criminal action, then the recommendations may be referred to the National Director of Public Prosecutions for further action.[7] The ICD has no power to compel the National Commissioner to initiate or to participate in disciplinary action. The lack of an effective enforcement mechanism for the recommendations of the ICD is a serious shortcoming of the legislative framework. The implementation of the ICD's findings is effectively left within the discretion of the police commissioners, prosecutors and responsible ministers. The absence of enforcement mechanisms and remedial powers undermines the very purpose for creating an independent body to deal with police misconduct. In order to give its findings real bite, the ICD should be given genuine powers of intervention and control over disciplinary proceedings.[8]

A lack of public awareness is another matter of concern. In order for the ICD to adequately perform its various tasks, the public must be able to contact the ICD and be cognisant of the existence of a complaint mechanism. A further challenge to the effectiveness of the ICD has been the lack of an adequate number of satellite offices in the provinces and rural areas. The lack of sufficient local

[1] ICD Strategic Plan 2006-2009 available at http://www.icd.gov.za/documents/strategic_documents/2006-2009/StragicPlan2006_2009.pdf (accessed on 18 September 2007).

[2] SAPS Act ss 53(6)(b), 53(6)(d) and 53(6)(f).

[3] The weakness of these provisions is especially evident when compared with the investigative powers granted to the Inspector General of Intelligence under s 7(8) of the Intelligence Services Oversight Act 40 of 1994. See § 23B.5*(c)*(ii) infra.

[4] Independent Complaints Directorate First Annual Report on the Activities of the Independent Complaints Directorate for the Financial Year Ending March 31, 1997 (1997).

[5] See D Bruce, K Savage & J De Waal 'A Duty to Answer Questions? The Police, the Independent Complaints Directorate and the Right to Remain Silent' (2000) 16 SAJHR 71 (The authors argue in favour of the development of a duty to answer questions posed by the ICD during its investigations. The proposed duty would be made subject to the exclusion of incriminating testimony from any future criminal trial.)

[6] SAPS Act ss 53(6)(i) and 53(6)(j).

[7] SAPS Act s 53(6)(g).

[8] For a critique of the structure and powers of the ICD see B Manby 'The Independent Complaints Directorate: An Opportunity Wasted' (1996) 12 SAJHR 417.

offices makes it substantially more difficult for members of the public to lodge complaints of abuse and misconduct.[1]

In recent years, the ICD has undertaken a number of initiatives designed to improve the performance of its mandate. In 2005, a Proactive Oversight Unit was established to conduct research into and analysis of trends in police conduct to make recommendations for policy changes where necessary. Importantly, an Integrity Strengthening Unit was also established in 2005 to oversee ethical conduct within the ranks of the ICD. In an effort to root out police corruption, an Anti-Corruption Command ('ACC') was set up in 2004. Given the scathing reports emanating from the Auditor General in 2009 and the Public Prosecutor in 2011, and the 2011 investigation of the Special Investigation Unit into rampant tender violations, neither the ICD nor the ACC would appear to have responded effectively. The ACC in particular has no presence in the provincial offices and suffers from an ongoing lack of capacity. The ACC has three offices: hardly sufficient to handle complaints emanating from the entire country.[2]

Aside from its external constraints, the ICD has experienced some internal management problems. These difficulties prompted the Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security to table a sharply critical report on the ICD to Parliament.[3] One of the problems identified was an over-centralisation of resources: 47 per cent of the ICD's budget went to national investigations whilst the remainder was distributed between the nine provinces. Over-centralisation of power at the national level has clearly hampered service delivery at provincial level. In terms of reporting, the Portfolio Committee noted inconsistencies in the quality of the reports as well as the information contained therein and specifically pointed out that the ICD appeared to be presenting a rosy picture of its activities and was only willing to present certain information upon specific requests by the Portfolio Committee. These observations, particularly with regards to 'white-washed' reporting, are somewhat troubling.

Moreover, in recent years political support for the ICD appears to have waned. In 2006, the National Commissioner — himself the subject of corruption investigations — publicly expressed doubt about the necessity for the continued existence of the ICD.[4] These comments are more than unfortunate: They reflect the absence of an accountable and transparent police force whose clear mission is to protect the denizens of our fragile democracy.[5]

[1] Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security Report on the Independent Complaints Directorate (ICD)(17 August 2005).

[2] Indpendent Compliants Directorate Annual Report on the Activities of the Independent Complaints Directorate for 2005/2006 (2006) 44.

[3] Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security Report on the Independent Complaints Directorate (2006). The Portfolio Committee required the ICD and the Ministry to report back to it within three months on the measures taken to remedy the problems that had been identified.

[4] Amnesty International Report 2007 (2007) available at http://web.amnesty.org/library (accessed on 18 September 2007).

[5] Ibid.

(iii) Community Policing Forums

Community policing forums were first established in the early 1990s during the transition.[1] The main purpose of establishing these forums was to boost the legitimacy of the police by providing communities with an opportunity to become involved in policing activities in their area. However, the forums are really not oversight or accountability mechanisms. They lack the authority to control the police or to take action against errant police officers. Since their establishment, the forums have served more as a consultative platform where police and communities are able to discuss their mutual concerns (and grievances). In some cases, however, the police and the communities have used the forums to develop joint strategies to take action against crime.

The forums have been formalised through the adoption of provisions within the SAPS Act that govern their establishment and composition.[2] The Act provides for the forums to exist on three levels: community, area and provincial.[3] The provincial forums are controlled by provincial commissioners, in consultation with the relevant MEC.[4] The forums are not democratically elected bodies. Rather, they consist of members of the public who volunteer their services.[5]

The forums have a mixed record of success. Police officers tend to see the forums as platforms for the community to criticise the police or view them as 'talk shops' that do not affect day-to-day policing. Another serious problem has been the forums' lack of representivity. Members of the public who become involved in the forums do so on a voluntary basis. Not surprisingly, wealthy sectors of the community or specific interest groups are sometimes overrepresented: the poor and marginalized are generally under-represented.[6]

There have been recent moves towards restructuring the forums to provide for greater community involvement in crime fighting.[7] Whilst the suggested changes may prove useful in enhancing democratic interaction between local government, the police and the communities they serve, broadening the spectrum of issues they engage may actually undermine the forum's focus on policing.

(iv) Police Malfeasance, Incompetence and Corruption

Allegations of police corruption and claims of a systemic failure by the police to provide adequate protection to South Africa's denizens have attracted

[1] G Cawthra Policing South Africa: The South African Police and the Transition from Apartheid (1993) 165.

[2] SAPS Act Chapter 6.

[3] SAPS Act ss 19, 20, 21.

[4] SAPS Act ss 19(1), 20(1), 21(1). The Minister of Safety and Security is, however, empowered by SAPS Act s 22(2) to make regulations to ensure the proper functioning of the forums.

[5] SAPS Act ss 19(3), 20(3) and 21(3).

[6] See G Newham 'Strengthening Democratic Policing in South Africa through Internal Systems for Officer Control' (2005) 36(2) South African Review of Sociology 160, 173–4. See also J Rauch 'Police Reform and South Africa's Transition' Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation Working Paper 6, available at http://www.csvr.org.za/docs/policing/policebeformandsouth.pdf (accessed on 9 March 2009) 61-62.

[7] L Johns 'South Africa; New Future Mapped out for Community Police Forums' AllAfrica.com (9 September 2007) available at http://allafrica.com/stories/200709100345.html (accessed on 21 September 2007).

investigations and condemnation from two Chapter Nine Institutions and the Special Investigative Unit ('SIU'). The Auditor-General, the Public Protector and the SIU reports paint a bleak picture of malfeasance, incompetence and an absence of sufficient training throughout the ranks of those charged with securing our safety and security.

(aa) The Auditor-General's Report on Police Service Delivery (2009)

The Auditor-General's investigation took place during 2007 and 2008 and assessed the 'basic measures, processes or systems that should be in place at police stations and the police emergency phone line 10111'.[1] By 'basic measures', the Auditor-General's report means sector policing, vehicle management, training, community service centres, and the provision of bullet-proof vests. The report concluded that the existing practices in all of these areas fell short of the standards required by the Constitution. The short-falls ranged from the lack of an approved policy for sector policing to inadequate training and inadequate recording of cases of domestic violence. The Auditor-General found that many of these shortfalls are a result of inadequate training, a lack of funds, or both. The Auditor-General concluded that an underfunded, unskilled police force could not discharge its constitutional responsibility to protect the general population.

(bb) Public Protector's Report (2011): Against the Rules

In 2011, the Public Protector Thuli Madonsela released a damning report on irregularities related to the lease of two properties by the SAPS in Pretoria and Durban.[2] The report — Against the Rules — strongly suggests that the leases for the buildings were executed because of an untoward relationship between SAPS National Commissioner Bheki Cele and a private property owner. However, the Public Protector's findings of a potentially corrupt relationship are not nearly as important as her conclusions regarding the manifold constitutional breaches reflected in this 'property deal'.

With respect to the SAPS, the Public Protector identified the following constitutional and statutory improprieties:

1. 'Although the SAPS did not sign the lease agreement, its involvement in the procurement process was improper, as it proceeded beyond the demand management phase

[1] Auditor-General Report on a Performance Audit of Service Delivery at Police Stations and 10111 Call Centres at the South African Police Service 2007-2008 (March 2009)('A-G's Report') 2, available at http://www.agsa.co.za/audit-reports/SAR.aspx (accessed on 10 April 2011).

[2] Public Protector Against the Rules: Report of the Public Protector in terms of Section 182(1) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 and Section 8(1) of the Public Protector Act, 1994 on an Investigation into Complaints and Allegations of Maladministration, Improper and Unlawful Conduct by the Department of Public Works and the South African Police Service relating to the Leasing of Office Accommodation in Pretoria (2011) Report Number 33 of 2010/2011, available at www.info.gov.za/view/DownloadFileAction?id=142293 (accessed on 6 May 2011)('Against the Rules').

and it further failed to implement proper controls, as required by the PFMA and relevant procurement prescripts.'[1]

2. 'The SAPS failed to comply with section 217 of the Constitution, the relevant provisions of the PFMA, Treasury Regulations and supply chain management rules and policies. This failure amounted to improper conduct and maladministration.' [2]
3. 'The conduct of the accounting officer of the SAPS was in breach of those duties and obligations incumbent upon him in terms of section 217 of the Constitution, section 38 of the PFMA and the relevant Treasury Regulations. These provisions require from an accounting officer to ensure that goods and services are procured in accordance with a system that fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost effective. This conduct was improper, unlawful and amounted to maladministration.'[3]

Based upon these findings, the Public Protector recommended that the National Treasury determine whether there had been any fruitless or wasteful expenditure, that the Minister of Police should take action against the responsible official and that the SAPS should take steps to ensure that the same types of contraventions do not occur again.[4]

(cc) Special Investigative Unit ('SIU'): 2011 Preliminary Reports

After having assisted the Public Protector in the production of the report Against the Rules, the SIU announced its own preliminary findings regarding corruption in the SAPS. Willie Hofmeyr, head of the SIU, identified two primary areas of fraud and racketeering in an appearance before the National Assembly's Justice Committee:

> First: 'A lot of the stations are being built on three quotes, not on a tender process. … We have cases where the lowest quotations are not accepted, where the winning bid didn't submit a quote, possible cover quoting and BEE fronting.'[5]
> Second: 'SAPS officials [seem to have] interest in the companies to whom work was given. In many cases the payments exceeded budgeted costs.'[6]

Hofmeyr finished his initial announcement of the preliminary findings by stating the fraud was so widespread that the SIU had decided to concentrate its energies on the 20 most egregious cases.

These findings may seem rather mild. However, given an environment of rather rampant corruption, and the involvement of such role players as General Cele

---

[1] T Madonsela Address by the Public Protector, Adv Thuli Madonsela, During a media Briefing on the Release of the SAPS Lease Report (22 February 2011) available at http://www.pprotect.org/media_gallery/2011/23022011_sp.asp (accessed on 6 May 2011).

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] T Mokone 'More Dodgy Tenders Found: SIU Tells Parliament that It Uncovered Serious Irregularities in the Building of 33 Police Stations Which Cost the Country R330,000' The Sunday Times (30 March 2011) available at www.timeslive.co.za/politics/article995872.ece/more-dodgy-tender-found (accessed on 6 May 2011); P Craven 'COSATU Welcomes SIU Fight against Corruption' PoliticsWeb (1 May 2011) available at www.politicsweb.co.za/politicsweb/view/politicsweb/en/page71654?oid (accessed on 10 May 2011; E Ferreira 'SIU Uncovers Massive State Corruption, Says Hofmeyr' Mail & Guardian (31 March 2011) available at http://mg.co.za/article/2011-03-31-siu-uncovers-massive-state-corruption-says-hofmeyr (accessed on 6 May 2011).

[6] Mokone (supra).

(a close confidant of President Zuma), both the SIU and the Public Protector deserve credit for discharging their duties without fear, favour or prejudice.

23B.4 The South African National Defence Force

(a) Composition, structure and functions

The SANDF is comprised of a permanent force and a part-time reserve component.[1] The SANDF derives its primary authority from the Final Constitution. However, like the SAPS, it is governed by national legislation: the Defence Act.[2] The Final Constitution requires the SANDF to be set up and trained as a disciplined military force capable of carrying out its functions and of meeting international standards of competency.[3]

The SANDF was created by merging the SADF with the military forces of the homeland states, the ANC's armed wing, Umkhonto we Sizwe ('MK'), the armed wing of the PAC, the Azanian People's Liberation Army ('APLA'), and parts of the Inkatha Freedom Party's self-protection units.[4] The merger of the different armies, who had previously been enemies, as well as the implementation of affirmative action policies, created a significant amount of racial tension within the SANDF. That tension persists.[5] In addition, the merger vastly increased the size of the SANDF — far beyond what was necessary. One consequence of the transformation and downsizing process has been the loss of a large number of experienced SANDF members. Thus, despite its initial overcapacity, the SANDF currently struggles with a significant skills shortage.[6] During 2003, a new strategy, Human Resource Strategy 2010, was launched to eliminate human resource problems.[7] It is not yet clear what impact, if any, the strategy has had.

The primary function of the SANDF is to 'defend the Republic, its territorial integrity and its people in accordance with the Constitution and the principles of international law regulating the use of force'.[8] In terms of FC s 201(1)(a), the SANDF may also be employed in support of, or in co-operation with, the [1] IC s 226(1). See s 11 of the Defence Act. The SANDF encompasses the South African Army, the South African Navy, the South African Air Force and the South African Military Health Service. See s 12 of the Defence Act.

[2] Act 42 of 2002. See IC s 226(2) and 226(3). The 2002 Act replaces the Defence Act 44 of 1957.

[3] See IC s 226(4) and 226(5) and FC s 200(1).

[4] G Cawthra & R Luckham Governing Insecurity: Democratic Control of Military and Security Establishments in Transitional Democracies (2003) 41.

[5] L Heinecken 'South Africa's Armed Forces in Transition: Adapting to the New Strategic and Political Environment' (2005) 36(1) Society in Transition 74, 81–85. In an effort to assist and equip SANDF members to cope with the transformed military environment, a Civic Education Task Group was set up to provide training on the Final Constitution, civil-military relations, civil rights, humanitarian law as well as cultural and gender sensitivity. Cawthra & Luckham (supra) at 43. The SANDF has also had to eliminate gender-based discrimination. Women now receive the same training and are eligible to occupy the same positions, including combat positions, as their male counterparts. As a result of these changes there are now women serving in the Army, Navy and Air Force. However, Heinecken notes that a lot more still needs to be done to change attitudes towards female officers in the SANDF. Heinecken (supra) at 85–86.

[6] Heinecken (supra) at 81–85.

[7] Ibid.

[8] FC s 200(2).

SAPS.[1] The Defence Act further increases the field of activity of the SANDF by authorising the Minister of Defence or the President to employ the SANDF to

(a) preserve life, health or property in emergency or humanitarian relief operations;
(b) ensure the provision of essential services;
(c) support any department of state, including support for purposes of socio-economic upliftment; and
(d) effect national border control.[2]

Any such employment must be reported to Parliament. Parliament retains the power to amend the terms of the employment or to cancel it altogether.[3]

Members of the SANDF have substantially the same powers and immunities as members of the SAPS.[4] However, they are specifically precluded from investigating crimes and are obliged to hand over any arrested persons or seized articles to the SAPS, or any other authorised person, as soon as possible.[5] In recent years, the SANDF has been employed primarily to assist the SAPS and national departments, to control national borders and to participate in peace-keeping missions in other African countries.[6]

(b) Civil military relations

The Minister of Defence exercises overall political responsibility for the military through the Department of Defence.[7] However, only the President has the authority to employ the military to defend the country, to serve internationally, or to uphold law and order within the country in conjunction with the SAPS.[8] The President is required to inform Parliament 'promptly' when the SANDF is so employed and must provide reasons for and details about the employment.[9] Parliament has the authority to terminate any of these employments.[10]

---

[1] The Minister of Defence must approve a code of conduct and operational procedures to be applied in every operation where the SANDF is employed to co-operate with the SAPS. Defence Act s 19(3) (c) (i).

[2] Defence Act s 18(1).

[3] Defence Act s 18(5).

[4] Defence Act ss 20(1), 20(2), 20(5), 20(6) and 20(7).

[5] Defence Act ss 20(3) and 20(4). SANDF members who are involved in border patrolling are specifically authorised to arrest and to detain persons who are 'reasonably suspected' of being illegal immigrants and to request that such persons produce evidence that they are authorised to be in the country. Defence Act s 20(9)(a) and (b).

[6] Heinecken (supra) at 76–77.

[7] FC s 201(1).

[8] FC s 201(2). In terms of FC s 203(1) the President also has the power to declare a state of national defence. When doing so he is required to inform Parliament of the reasons and to provide relevant details about deployment of the SANDF. In terms of FC s 203(2), if Parliament is out of session, then it must be summoned to an extraordinary session. Parliament must then approve the declaration or it lapses within seven days.

[9] FC s 201(3). In addition to the requirement that the President must report any employment of the SANDF in conjunction with the SAPS to Parliament, s 19(2) of the Defence Act also requires the Minister of Defence to publish a notice to this effect in the Government Gazette.

[10] IC s 228(5).

The President is also the Commander-in-Chief of the SANDF and appoints the Military Command of the SANDF.[1] The Military Command exercises operational control. However, command of the SANDF is subject to the direction of the Cabinet member responsible for defence under the authority of the President.[2] Unlike the Secretary of Defence, the Military Command does not have any financial responsibility and does not report to Parliament.

Further civilian control is provided by the Defence Secretariat. The secretariat serves as the administrative arm of the Department of Defence.[3] The Secretary of Defence, who must be a civilian, is appointed by the President. The Secretary is the head of the Defence Secretariat, and is the accounting officer for the SANDF under the Public Finance Management Act.[4] In addition, the Secretary serves in an advisory capacity, monitors implementation of defence policy, and possesses investigative powers.[5]

Although the establishment of civilian control over the military through the Department of Defence has been largely successful, problems with striking the right balance between oversight and cooperation persist. Few civilians possess the requisite levels of military expertise to meet the requirements of the job. Consequently, the personnel of the Department of Defence consists of a combination of civilians and SANDF members.[6]

Parliamentary oversight is conducted through a multiparty Joint Standing Committee on Defence ('JSCD'). This committee is empowered to investigate and to make recommendations regarding the budget, functioning, organisation, armaments, policy, morale and state of preparedness of the SANDF. The Minister for Defence is accountable to Parliament. Parliament also approves the annual budget for the SANDF.

A Military Ombudsman currently operates out of the Office of the Public Protector. The Ombudsman must address any matters related to military personnel that cannot be resolved through other existing mechanisms. According to Heinecken, the Ombudsman's placement outside defense structures 'has left a vacuum in terms of reporting complaints and malpractice within the DOD.'[7] That role has, instead, been assumed by the South African National Defence Union.[8]

---

[1] FC s 202(1).

[2] FC s 202(2).

[3] FC s 204(1). Defence Act s 6 establishes the Defence Secretariat.

[4] Defence Act ss 7(1) and 7(3) and 8*(a)*.

[5] These powers encompass the ability to order investigations by the Chief of the Defence Force or the Military Police. Defence Act s 8. The Military Police consists of SANDF members who perform a police function within the SANDF. Their primary duty is to prevent and to investigate crimes as well as to maintain law and order within the SANDF. They possess the same powers as the SAPS. See Defence Act ss 30–31.

[6] Cawthra & Luckham (supra) at 40. See also Heinecken (supra) at 79.

[7] Heinecken (supra) at 79.

[8] As Heinecken notes:

> SANDU requested an investigation against the Officer Commanding of the South African Military Academy for unilaterally transferring several academic assistants back to their units, racism and mismanagement of the unit's affairs. The union used the media to bring these matters to the attention of the public and the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Defence and Minister of Defence.

Heinecken (supra) at 79. Other countries have a military ombudsman that operate within the defence forces. On the ombudsman in the Canadian armed forces, see 'National Defence and Canadian Forces Ombudsman' available at http://www.ombudsman.dnd.ca/au-ns/faq/index-eng.asp (accessed on 6 May 2011).

(c) Military discipline

In Minister of Defence v Potsane; Legal Soldier (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Defence, the Constitutional Court ruled on two cases that raised related issues regarding military discipline.[1] Potsane was an appeal by the Minister of Defence ('the Minister') against a judgment declaring sections of the Military Discipline Supplementary Measures Act unconstitutional.[2] Potsane argued that provisions of the Act were inconsistent with FC s 179. Section 179 provides that '[t]here is a single national prosecuting authority' in South Africa headed by the National Director of Public Prosecutions ('NDPP'). The soldiers asserted that the prosecuting authority of the military courts infringes an exclusive power of the NDPP and was, therefore, unconstitutional. The exercise of such power by the military court was also alleged to be a violation of their right to equality under FC s 9.[3] The soldiers argued that the plain language of FC s 179 makes it clear that military courts could not retain any prosecutorial authority.

The Minister rejected the superficial reading offered by the soldiers and contended that historical context and contemporary reality were essential for a proper interpretation of FC s 179. The purpose of FC s 179 was not to preclude military courts from exercising prosecutorial power. The intent of FC s 179 was, rather, to consolidate the multiple prosecutorial offices established under apartheid into one national office in a unified South Africa.[4] The Minister then asserted that FC s 179 must be read in light of other constitutional mandates and the unique role of the military.[5] An efficient and effective system of military justice is a prerequisite for maintaining military discipline.[6] Thus, whereas the priority for a civilian prosecutor is to prosecute civil and criminal claims, military prosecutions are designed to maintain military discipline. The Minister concluded that inserting the NDPP into the military justice process would undermine military discipline.[7]

The Potsane Court found that FC s 179 did not render prosecutorial authority within military courts invalid. It agreed with the Minister and reasoned that such

[1] 2002 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1137 (CC), [2001] ZACC 12 ('Potsane').

[2] Act 16 of 1999. The armed forces have also developed the following Code of Conduct (2000) for SANDF members: 'I pledge to serve and defend my country and its people in accordance with the Constitution and the law and with honour, dignity, courage and integrity. I serve in the SANDF with loyalty and pride, as a citizen and a volunteer. I respect the democratic political process and civil control of the SANDF. I will not advance or harm the interests of any political party or organisation. I accept personal responsibility for my actions. I will obey all lawful commands and respect all superiors. I will refuse to obey an obviously illegal order. I will carry out my mission with courage and assist my comrades-in-arms, even at the risk of my own life. I will treat all people fairly and respect their rights and dignity at all times, regardless of race, ethnicity, gender, culture, language or sexual orientation. I will respect and support subordinates and treat them fairly. I will not abuse my authority, position or public funds for personal gain, political motive or any other reason. I will report criminal activity, corruption and misconduct to the appropriate authority. I will strive to improve the capabilities of the SANDF by maintaining discipline, safeguarding property, developing skills and knowledge, and performing my duties diligently and professionally.'

[3] Potsane (supra) at para 4.

[4] Ibid at para 20.

[5] Ibid at para 22.

[6] Ibid at para 23.

[7] Ibid at para 40.

authority was indispensable for the objects of military justice.[1] In order to make sense of the word 'one' in FC s 179, it found that it referred solely to prosecutorial power with respect to civilian matters. FC s 179 did not go so far as to create an exclusive prosecuting authority that would apply in all contexts.[2] The Court concluded that if such a sweeping change had been intended, then it would have been made explicit in the text. (It noted that military prosecutions are not referred to in FC s 179.[3]) The Court recognised that the military constitutes a distinct subculture. The Court continued: 'Although the overarching power of the Final Constitution prevails, and although the Bill of Rights is not excluded, the relationship between the SANDF and its members has certain unique features.'[4] (The Court found it noteworthy that the soldiers could not find any precedent for the system of military prosecution by civil authorities that they sought.[5])

The Potsane Court reached two discrete conclusions. First, it held that FC s 179 did not render the challenged sections of the Act unconstitutional. Second, it concluded that military prosecution did not violate the right to equality as it was 'rationally connected to the legitimate government purpose of establishing and maintaining a disciplined military force with a viable military justice system' and did not discriminate on a prohibited ground.[6]

(d) Limitations on the rights of SANDF members

The Constitutional Court has recognised that members of the SANDF are generally entitled to the same constitutional solicitude that ordinary civilians receive. In SANDU CC I, the Court stated that '[m]embers of the Defence Force remain part of our society with obligations and rights of citizenship.'[7] And yet, the Court has simultaneously acknowledged that the Final Constitution demands that we differentiate between those in military uniform and those without.

The Defence Act contains a number of limitations on the rights of SANDF members:

(i) members of the permanent force are precluded from holding office in any political party or political organisation or serving in any legislative body;[8]

(ii) the rights of members to join or participate in the activities of trade unions and to demonstrate or picket can be subjected to limitations;[9]

(iii) their private communications with people inside or outside of the SANDF may be subjected to screening 'to the extent necessary for military security and for safety of members of the Defence Force and employees'.[10]

[1] Potsane (supra) at paras 24, 26.
[2] Ibid at para 26.
[3] Ibid at para 30.
[4] Ibid at para 21.
[5] Ibid at para 41.
[6] Ibid at para 44.
[7] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) ('SANDU CC I') at para 12.
[8] IC s 226(6). See also Defence Act s 50(8)(a).
[9] Defence Act s 50(6) and (4).
[10] Defence Act s 50(2)(b).

It is noteworthy, ironic, and perhaps symbolic of progress in South Africa, that the members of the armed forces, who were once centrally involved in resisting the transition to democracy, have been fairly active in asserting their rights under the Final Constitution. This activism has been particularly evident in the field of labour rights.

In 1994, the South African National Defence Union ('SANDU') was formed. The government vigorously opposed unionisation of the SANDF. However, through a series of constitutional challenges launched by SANDU, the courts have confirmed the right of SANDF members to form a trade union and to engage in collective bargaining.

In SANDU CC I, the Constitutional Court upheld the rights of members of the defence force to participate in public protest and to join trade unions.[1] The Transvaal High Court had found s 126B of the Defence Act 44 of 1957 unconstitutional and invalid to the extent that it prohibited defence force members from participating in protest action and becoming members of trade unions. The Minister of Defence and the Chief of SANDF only challenged the lower court order with respect to the prohibition on trade union membership. However, the court was obliged to analyse the public protest issue so that it could confirm the lower court's order.

The impugned section regarding public protest is worth quoting in full. Section 126B of the Act provided that:

> (1) A member of the Permanent Force shall not be or become a member of any trade union as defined in section 1 of the Labour Relations Act, 1956 (Act 28 of 1956). Provided that this provision shall not preclude any member of such Force from being or becoming a member of any professional or vocational institute, society, association or like body approved by the Minister.
>
> (2) Without derogating from the provisions of sections 4*(b)* and 10 of the Military Discipline Code, a member of the South African Defence Force who is subject to the said Military Discipline Code, shall not strike or perform any act of public protest or participate in any strike or act of public protest or conspire with or incite or encourage, instigate or command any other person (whether or not such person is a member of the South African Defence Force or an officer or employee referred to in section 83A(2) serving in the South African Defence Force or a member of any auxiliary or nursing service established under this Act) to strike or to perform such an act or to participate in a strike or such an act.
>
> (3) A member of the South African Defence Force who contravenes subsection (1) or (2), shall be guilty of an offence.
>
> (4) For the purpose of subsection (2) 'act of public protest' means any act, conduct or behaviour which, without derogating from the generality of the aforegoing, includes the holding or attendance of any meeting, assembly, rally, demonstration, procession, concourse or other gathering and which is calculated, destined or intended to influence, support, promote or oppose any proposed or actual policy, action, conduct or decision of the Government of the Republic of South Africa or another country or territory or any proposed or actual policy, action, conduct or decision of any public or parastatal authority of the Republic or another country or territory or to support,

[1] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC), [1999] ZACC 7 ('SANDU CC I').

> promote, further, oppose or publicise any real or supposed private or public interest, object, principle, cause, concern, demand or claim, grievance, objection or outrage or to indicate, demonstrate or display real or supposed private or public support for, opposition or objection to, dissatisfaction, sympathy, association or solidarity with, or concern or outrage regarding any such policy, action, conduct, decision, interest, object, principle, cause, concern, demand or claim, grievance, objection or outage, or to do so in relation to any event or occurrence of national or public concern, importance or significance, or eliciting national or public concern or interest, in such manner as to attract or direct thereto, or be calculated, destined or intended to attract or direct thereto, the attention of (i) any such Government or authority; (ii) any other country, territory or international or multinational organization, association or body; or (iii) the public or any member or sector of the public, whether within or outside the Republic; 'strike' means any strike as defined in section 1 of the Labour Relations Act 1956.

The Constitutional Court in SANDU CC I provides a coherent account of the relationship between the general commitment to freedom of expression (and its concomitant commitment to content-neutrality) and the appropriate conditions under which the content of speech by members of the military may be restricted. SANDU CC I holds that the purpose of the mutually supporting expressive rights found in Chapter 2 — FC ss 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 — is to enable > groups of like-minded people to foster and propagate such opinions. The rights implicitly recognise the importance, both for a democratic society and for individuals personally, of the ability to form and express opinions, whether individually or collectively, even where those views are controversial. The corollary of the freedom of expression and its related rights is tolerance by society of different views. Tolerance, of course, does not require approbation of a particular view. In essence, it requires the acceptance of the public airing of disagreements and the refusal to silence unpopular views.[1]

That said, the Final Constitution makes its plain that public servants, especially those in the security services, have obligations and duties that may legitimately restrict their expressive conduct. FC s 199(7) states:

> Neither the security services, nor any of their members, may, in the performance of their functions — (a) prejudice a political party interest that is legitimate in terms of the Constitution; or (b) further, in a partisan manner, any interest of a political party.

The SANDU CC I Court concludes that FC s 199(7) stands for the proposition that 'members of the Defence Force may not, in the performance of their functions, act in a partisan political fashion.'[2] However, the prolix 255 word definition of 'act of public protest' found in s 126B covered conduct ranging from 'holding or attendance of a meeting which is calculated to support or oppose any policy or conduct of the government or of a foreign government' to any indication of 'private or public support or opposition regarding any policy, conduct or principle' or 'any event of national or public concern.' The long but still nonexhaustive definition of public protest could capture complaints made by a defence force member to her husband in relation to absolutely any 'event of national or public concern.' Such a complaint could never be accurately described as public protest or partisan political conduct. So while the SANDU CC I Court recognised the constitutional imperative of an impartial military, the Court found that these provisions were unnecessary to achieve that objective and unreasonably infringed the soldiers' fundamental rights.[1] As a result, the Constitutional Court held that the Defence Act's gloss on the term 'public protest' in s 126B(2) and the extension of its definition of 'act of public protest' in s 126B(4) were unconstitutional. It severed both subsections from the Act.

[1] SANDU CC I (supra) at para 8.
[2] Ibid at para 11.

Regarding the outright ban on trade union membership, the respondents argued that it was reasonable and essential because of the constitutional mandate of a 'disciplined military'.[2] The respondents so argued despite the applicant's concession that such a right, with respect to the military, did not embrace the right to strike.[3] Pace Potsane, the Court was unpersuaded by the respondents' reasoning. The Court found that the term 'worker' in FC s 23 encompassed SANDF members and concluded that the relationship between the soldiers and the military was 'akin', although not identical, to a normal employment relationship that would entitle SANDF members to the protections of FC s 23.[4] O'Regan J then concluded that an outright ban on trade union membership could not be justified in terms of FC s 36.[5]

In SANDU HC I,[6] the High Court reviewed the constitutionality of a set of regulations promulgated in response to the decision of the Constitutional Court in SANDU CC I.[7] The High Court held that the regulations that specified conditions for peaceful demonstration, prohibited union affiliation or closed shop agreements, barred members from securing union-sponsored legal representation and allowed for withdrawal of union recognition without notice infringed SANDU's and SANDF members' constitutional rights to collective bargaining (FC s 23), assembly (FC s 17), and association (FC s 18).

The High Court, in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence ('SANDU HC II'), found several additional provisions of the Military Regulations[8]

[1] SANDU CC I (supra) at paras 11–13. The Court concluded that a well-tailored prohibition regarding the free expression rights of uniformed defence force members might be constitutionally acceptable under the limitations clause. Ibid at para 18.

[2] FC s 200(1) reads: 'The Defence Force must be structured and managed as a disciplined military force.'

[3] SANDU CC I (supra) at para 33.

[4] Ibid at paras 35–36.

[5] The Court noted that the unique nature of the military might require certain constraints on a trade union and that such constraints might pass constitutional muster if they met the requirements of FC s 36. For more on SANDU CC I, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 43; S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, M Bishop, & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; M Chicktay 'Mission Impossible: Trade Union and Protest Action Rights in the Military: South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence' (2000) 16 SAJHR 324.

[6] 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T).

[7] Government Gazette No 998 (20 August 1999).

[8] Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve Government Gazette Vol 411 No. 20425 (1 September 1999).

constitutionally infirm.[1] The SANDU HC II court held that regulation 37(1) and (2) contravened the right to engage in collective bargaining protected under FC s 23(2)(b). Under FC s 23(2)(b), 'every worker has the right to participate in the activities and programmes of a trade union.' The SANDU HC II court, per Smit J, also ruled that regulation 37 violated the right to engage in collective bargaining. Furthermore, regulation 13*(a)'s total ban on military trade unions' affiliating or associating with any labour organisation, labour association, trade union or labour federation that is not recognised and registered infringed the right of a trade union to form and join a federation protected under FC s 23(4)(c)*. Again, the Minister of Defence invoked the constitutional imperative of a 'disciplined military'[2] to argue that the regulation's restrictions on association rights were proper. The Minister asserted that the proscriptions were justified in the interest of keeping the force politically independent.[3] The SANDU HC II court dismissed both arguments by the Minister and ordered the constitutionally repugnant provisions severed from the regulations.[4]

In yet another SANDU decision — South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others — ('SANDU HC III') — the High Court, per Van der Westhuizen J, was asked to determine whether the Final Constitution, and FC s 23(5), imposed any duty on the Minister and the Department of Defence to bargain

[1] Unreported, TPD case no 15790/2003 (14 July 2003).

[2] See FC s 200(1).

[3] See FC s 199(7).

[4] SANDU HC II (supra) at 41 - 42. Regulations 3*(c), 8(b), 13(b), 19(b), 25, 27, 36, 37(1), 37(2), 41, 53 and 73 were declared unconstitutional in terms of FC ss 16(1), 17, 18, 23(1), 23(2)(b), 23(4)(c), 23(5), 27(b), 33(1), 34, 35(3). The High Court, as a remedy, either varied the regulations so that they would conform with constitutional dictates or severed them from the rest of the regulations. The order read, in pertinent part, as follows: 'It is declared that the first respondent is under a duty to negotiate with the first applicant within the Military Bargaining Council and otherwise on all matters of mutual interest (including the contents of, and amendments to, the General Regulations promulgated or to be promulgated in terms of the Defence Act) that might arise between the first respondent in his official capacity as the employer on the one hand, and the first applicant and/or its members on the other; The first respondent is directed with immediate effect to negotiate with the first applicant within the Military Bargaining Council and otherwise on all matters of mutual interest that might arise between the first respondent in his official capacity as the employer on the one hand, and the first applicant and/or its members on the other; Subsection 8(b)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and such subsection is severed from the Regulations; Subsection 13*(a)* of the Regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and such subsection is severed from the Regulations; Section 19 of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and such section is severed from the regulations; The words 'but not to representation' in ss 25*(a)* of the regulations are declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and such words are severed from the regulations; The omission of the words 'and represent' after the word 'assist' in ss 25*(a)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution, and ss 25*(a)* of the regulations is to be read as though the following words appear therein after the word 'assist': 'and represent'; The omission of the words 'and represent' after the word 'assist' in ss 25*(b)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution, and ss 25*(b)* of the regulations is to be read as though the following words appear therein after the word 'assist': 'and represent'; The proviso to s 27 of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and it is severed from the Regulations; The omission of the words 'and represent' after the word 'assist' in ss 27*(a)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution, and ss 27*(a)* of the regulations is to be read as though the following words appear therein after the word 'assist': 'and represent'; The omission of the words 'and represent' after the word 'assist' in ss 27*(b)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution, and ss 27*(b)* of the regulations is to be read as though the following words appear therein after the word 'assist': 'and represent'; collectively with a military trade union.[1] The High Court held that although FC s 23(5) recognises the right to engage in collective bargaining, it does not impose a corresponding duty on any of the parties to do so. (Of course, the absence of a duty did not mean that that the employer could 'capriciously, at its mere whim or simply because of inconvenience or difficulty, decide not to negotiate.'[2]) What is, perhaps most striking about SANDU HC III is the tone. The High Court found that SANDU's behaviour was unacceptable and could seriously undermine the morale and the discipline within the SANDF. Moreover, the government — in this case, the Minister and the Department of Defense — were viewed as having acted reasonably in setting the preconditions for a new round of negotiations.[3]

The Supreme Court of Appeal, in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence ('SANDU SCA I') revisited the question of whether there is a legally enforceable duty on the SANDF to engage in collective bargaining with SANDU.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal confirmed the reasoning of Van der Westhuizen J in SANDU HC III — and set aside the unreported decision of Bertelsmann J in SANDU HC I. In short, the Supreme Court of Appeal, per Conradie JA, held that:

> [T]he Constitution, while recognising and protecting the central role of collective bargaining in our labour dispensation, does not impose on employers or employees a judicially enforceable duty to bargain. It does not contemplate that, where the right to strike is removed or restricted but is replaced by another adequate mechanism, a duty to bargain arises.[5]

The SANDU SCA I court went further and found that 'one cannot read an intention to impose judicially enforceable bargaining on the SANDF into the regulations.'[6]

Section 37 of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and such section is severed from the regulations; The word 'certain' in s 3*(c)* of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, and this word is severed from the regulations; Section 36 of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it purports to limit the right of military trade unions to engage in collective bargaining to the matters listed in ss (a)–(e); Section 73 of the regulations is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it empowers the first respondent to appoint the members of the Military Arbitration Board.'

[1] The applicant (SANDU) was a trade union which represented somewhere between 33 per cent (according to the applicant) and 28 per cent (according to the respondents) of the SANDF. The applicant was the only military union which, along with the Department of Defence (DOD), as employer, had been admitted to the Military Bargaining Council (MBC). It was the only union which, at that stage, satisfied the required threshold of 15 000 members. The negotiations in the MBC had met with very little progress. A series of threats and counter-threats followed. An ultimately calmer view of the need for continuing negotiations prevailed — but the nature and the conditions for negotiation were viewed differently by the two sides. Those differences led to litigation over the constitutional, the statutory and the regulatory issues raised in the instant matter.

[2] SANDU HC III (supra) at 256–257.

[3] Ibid at 261.

[4] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others; Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union & Others 2007 (1) SA 402 (SCA)('SANDU SCA I').

[5] Ibid at para 25.

[6] Ibid at para 29.

In Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union; Minister of Defence & Others v South African National Defence Union & Another ('SANDU SCA II'), the Supreme Court of Appeal revisited many of the issues raised in SANDU HC II.[1] The SANDU SCA II court found that almost all of the regulations in the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve held to be invalid in SANDU HC II were, in fact, constitutionally permissible. The sole regulation held to be constitutionally invalid was regulation 19. As Nugent JA, for the SANDU SCA II court, wrote:

> Regulation 19 is clear in its terms. The matters that it purports to exclude from collective bargaining (the negotiation of a 'closed shop or agency shop agreement') are undoubtedly legitimate labour issues … Counsel for the SANDF sought to persuade us that the exclusion of these matters from permitted bargaining was justified in a military establishment, but was not able to articulate precisely why that was so. Whether a closed shop or agency agreement is antithetical to a military establishment seems to me to depend on the terms of the particular agreement, and in particular on the bargaining unit to which such an agreement applies. While it is not difficult to envisage a closed shop agreement that is incompatible with a military establishment, it is also not difficult to envisage such an agreement that is compatible with it. I can see no reason, in the circumstances, why a total prohibition on negotiating such an agreement is reasonable and justifiable, and in my view the regulation was correctly declared to be invalid.[2]

As noted above, the Constitutional Court, in SANDU CC II, consolidated all the various SANDU cases that had percolated up through the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal. The SANDU CC II Court rejected virtually all of SANDU's challenges to the regulations (most of which concerned rights regarding collective bargaining.) It did, however, uphold a limited right for SANDU members to assemble or demonstrate (out of uniform) with regard to employment conditions in terms of regulation 8*(b)*,[3] and rejected a claim by SANDF that 'the regulations do not impose an obligation upon it to exhaust the [collective bargaining] procedures set out in the regulations [because] the very purpose of the regulations is to prevent unilateral action by the SANDF in respect of the areas of permissible bargaining until the procedures provided for in the regulations have been exhausted.'[4]

23B.5 South African Intelligence Services

(a) Composition, structure and functions

The intelligence services consist of two civilian intelligence agencies, the National Intelligence Agency ('NIA') and the South African Secret Service ('SASS'), together with the military intelligence division of the SANDF and the Crime Intelligence Division ('CID') of the SAP. The military intelligence division of the SANDF and the CID are autonomous entities falling under the control and the direction of the Departments of Defence and of Police respectively, whilst the [1] 2007 (1) SA 422 (SCA)('SANDU SCA II').

[2] Ibid at para 16.
[3] SANDU CC II (supra) at paras 81-82.
[4] Ibid at para 72.

NIA and SASS were specifically created under the Intelligence Services Act.[1] A National Intelligence Co-ordinating Committee ('Co-ordinating Committee') is responsible for co-ordinating intelligence emanating from these different agencies. As to the membership of the current intelligence services, it is composed primarily of former operatives from the National Intelligence Service of the apartheid regime, the Department of Intelligence and Security of the ANC, the Pan-Africanist Security Service of the PAC, and the intelligence forces of the Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei.[2]

The President has the sole authority to establish an intelligence service. However, he possesses no authority to establish an intelligence division within the military or the police.[3] In addition, the President is required to appoint the head of the NIA and the SASS.[4] The President may choose to exercise political responsibility for any intelligence services he establishes. Or he can appoint a member of Cabinet to exercise this function.[5] In practice, the President has appointed a Minister for Intelligence Services, recently renamed the 'Minister for State Security', who works together with a Cabinet Committee on Security and Intelligence Affairs.

The principal task of the NIA is to inform government of threats to domestic security.[6] The SASS is responsible for foreign intelligence, excluding foreign military intelligence, and conducts intelligence regarding external threats, opportunities and other issues with the aim of promoting the national and security interests of South Africa.[7] The CID is restricted to the gathering of intelligence on crime.[8] The military intelligence division of the SANDF is responsible for domestic and foreign military intelligence.[9]

---

[1] Act 38 of 1994. This Act has since been repealed and replaced by the Intelligence Services Act 65 of 2002.

[2] K O'Brien 'Controlling the Hydra: A Historical Analysis of South African Intelligence Accountability' in H Born, L Johnson & I Leigh (eds) Who's Watching the Spies? Establishing Intelligence Service Accountability (2005) 200, 207.

[3] FC s 209(1).

[4] FC s 209(2). The NIA and SASS are each headed by a Director General appointed by the President. See Intelligence Services Act ss 3*(a)* and (b).

[5] FC s 209(2).

[6] National Strategic Intelligence Act 39 of 1994 s 2(1). Counterintelligence broadly refers to 'the protection of the state and its secrets from other states and organizations.' S Boraz & T Bruneau 'Reforming Intelligence: Democracy and Effectiveness' (2006) 17 Journal of Democracy 28, 30. The National Strategic Intelligence Act defines counterintelligence as '… measures and activities conducted, instituted or taken to impede and to neutralise the effectiveness of foreign or hostile intelligence operations, to protect intelligence and any classified information, to conduct security screening investigations and to counter subversion, treason, sabotage and terrorism aimed at or against personnel, strategic installations or resources of the Republic'.

[7] National Strategic Intelligence Act s 2(2).

[8] National Strategic Intelligence Act s (2).

[9] National Strategic Intelligence Act s 2(4). Domestic and foreign military intelligence are separately catered for and defined in the Act. Domestic military intelligence refers to intelligence required for the planning and conduct of military operations within the country to ensure the safety of South Africans. Foreign military intelligence refers to intelligence regarding the war potential and military establishments of foreign countries that can be used by South Africa to plan its military forces in times of peace and for the conduct of military operations in times of war. The conduct of domestic military intelligence is restricted and proper authority must be obtained before the intelligence division of the SANDF can conduct intelligence covertly to support police within South Africa. See National Strategic Intelligence Act s 2(4) read with s 3(2).

The intelligence agencies serve a function quite distinct from that of the SAP and SANDF. Their work is often done surreptitiously, requires close communication with the national executive, and is highly specialised. Moreover, intelligence gathering is inherently political in nature: its ultimate aim is to guide the executive in constructing policy decisions on sensitive issues concerning security and relations with other sovereign nations. Consequently, the constitutional provisions governing political control over the intelligence services differ somewhat from the nature of the oversight of other security services. Thus, while the duties and the responsibilities of the police and the defence forces are expressly provided for in the Final Constitution, these details, with respect to the intelligence services, are enumerated in national legislation.[1] Whereas a secretariat exercises civilian oversight over other services, an Inspector-General of Intelligence ('IG') fulfils this role with respect to the intelligence services.[2] Furthermore, with the exception of the intelligence services for police and defence, the President may exercise direct political control over the intelligence services.[3]

(b) Control, oversight and accountability

Oversight refers to the process of holding the intelligence services accountable to the public for their actions and is largely an ex post facto exercise. An oversight mechanism for the intelligence services can be considered effective if it 'has an independent status from the executive, investigative powers, access to classified documents, and a committee able to keep secrets and sufficient expertise.'[4] Control, on the other hand, refers to the 'day-to-day management' of the intelligence services.[5] Control of intelligence agencies commonly rests with the executive. However, as with all government entities, specific officials are charged with the direct day-to-day functioning of the agencies.

(i) Parliamentary oversight

As with the SANDF and the SAPS, a parliamentary committee, known as the Joint Standing Committee on Intelligence ('JSCI'), is responsible for monitoring the intelligence services.[6] The JSCI is empowered to investigate the intelligence community's activities on its own accord or upon receipt of complaints from the public.[7] In

[1] See FC s 210.

[2] See FC s 210*(b)*.

[3] Compare FC s 201(1) and FC s 206(1), which require the appointment of Cabinet members to exercise political responsibility for the defence force and the police, with FC s 209(2), which grants the President the option of assuming direct political responsibility.

[4] H Born & L Johnson 'Balancing Operational Efficiency and Democratic Legitimacy' in Born et al (supra) at 226.

[5] Ibid at 236.

[6] Intelligence Services Oversight Act 40 of 1994 ('Oversight Act') s 2. The composition of the JSCI is determined by the proportional representation of the political parties in Parliament. Oversight Act s 2(2)(a). The deliberations of the JSCI are not open to the public.

[7] Complaints from the public can be referred to the head of an intelligence service or the IG for investigation. Oversight Act s 3*(f). If the JSCI is of the opinion that a matter relates to the protection of constitutional rights, it may also refer the matter to the Human Rights Commission. Oversight Act s 3(g)*.

carrying out its task, the JSCI is permitted to hold hearings, to subpoena witnesses, and to receive any information that is necessary for the performance of its mandate.[1] The JSCI receives annual reports from the Inspector General of Intelligence and the various intelligence services.[2] The committee itself must report annually to Parliament on its activities and those of the intelligence services.[3]

(ii) Inspector-General

The Final Constitution requires that civilian monitoring of the intelligence services take place in the form of an Inspector-General appointed by the President and approved by a resolution adopted by at least two-thirds of the National Assembly.[4] In terms of the Intelligence Services Oversight Act ('Oversight Act'), an IG must be nominated by the JSCI and approved by two thirds of the members of the National Assembly. Section 7(1) of the Oversight Act states that the President 'shall' appoint a person who has been duly nominated and approved by Parliament. The import of this wording is that the President has no discretion when it comes to the appointment of an IG. He or she must implement the decision taken by Parliament.

In light of these provisions, the procedure for removal of the IG seems anomalous. Section 7(4) of the Oversight Act empowers the President to remove the IG from office on the basis of '… misconduct, incapacity, withdrawal of his or her security clearance, poor performance or incompetence as prescribed.' No specific provision is made for the JSCI to be consulted with regard to the dismissal of the IG. However, s 7(5) of the Oversight Act states that '[i]f the Inspector-General is the subject of an investigation by the [JSCI] in terms of sub-s (4) he or she may be suspended by the President pending a decision in such investigation.' One might infer from s 7(5) that the JSCI is empowered to undertake an investigation to establish whether the conduct of the IG satisfies any of the grounds for dismissal under s 7(4).

Although the Oversight Act may contemplate two discrete mechanisms for removal, the better reading of the aforementioned section requires that s 7(4) and s 7(5) be read together. Such a reading would permit the President to remove the IG only if the JSCI has undertaken an investigation and concluded that the IG's conduct meets the requirement of s 7(4). Such an interpretation better fits the National Assembly's powers of approval of the IG in terms of FC s 210. So although FC s 210*(b)* does not provide for the removal of the IG, once the National Assembly has approved a particular person for the post of IG, it makes sense that it should be consulted about his or her removal. Furthermore, this reading of the Act and FC s 210 possesses the added virtue of protecting the [1] See Oversight Act ss 3*(j)*, 4(1) and 4(3). The intelligence services may withhold information concerning the identities of intelligence operatives as well as the identities of sources of intelligence under certain circumstances. Oversight Act s 4(2).

[2] Oversight Act ss 7(6) and 7(11)(d).

[3] Oversight Act s 6(1).

[4] See FC s 210*(b)*.

independence of the IG and of preventing him or her from being subject to undue pressure from the President through the threat of unilateral dismissal.[1]

In addition to oversight, the IG handles complaints from the public, as well as members of the intelligence services, about various forms of misconduct on the part of the intelligence services.[2] In order to carry out these functions, the IG has the power to enter any premises under the control of any intelligence service or any civilian premises that he or she deems it necessary to enter, and to demand intelligence information from members of the intelligence services or civilians in the possession of such information.[3] Over and above his investigative powers, the IG receives information in the form of annual reports as well as reports on '… any unlawful intelligence activity or significant intelligence failure' from the heads of the security services.[4] The IG is supported in his task by staff specifically assigned to him from the office of the Minister of Intelligence.[5] It seems obvious that such an assignment of intelligence staff undercuts the IG's independence. The IG can hardly be called independent when he or she takes direction or relies on operational assistance from the very executive entities he or she may be called upon to investigate.[6] One can owe loyalty to but one master.

Some measure of independence — at least on paper — is secured by Parliament's control over the IG's budget.[7] (Of course, that last proposition assumes an independent Parliament with respect to budgetary matters: thus far, the Executive has demonstrated that it exercises the lion share of power over annual budgets and line items within the budget.)

[1] A further anomaly with regard to the dismissal of the IG is that, in terms of s 8(1)(d) of the Oversight Act, the Minister of Intelligence is empowered to make regulations with regard to the suspension or removal of the IG as well as the termination of employment of the IG. As discussed above, the Oversight Act appears to place the decisions regarding the appointment, dismissal and suspension of the IG with the President and the JSCI. The Minister does not have any role to play in this regard. It is therefore unclear how the regulations to be made by the Minister would fit into the sections discussed above. It is suggested that as s 7(4) of the Oversight Act requires that the President may remove the IG on the basis of '… misconduct, incapacity, withdrawal of his or her security clearance, poor performance or incompetence as prescribed' such regulations should be limited to defining the scope of the factors for dismissal listed in s 7(4) and defining the procedural aspects relating to suspension of or dismissal of the IG.

[2] Oversight Act s 7(7)(cA).

[3] Oversight Act s 7(8). In the case of civilians, the IG is only entitled to information if it is 'necessary' for the performance of his functions. An appropriate search warrant under the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 must also be obtained before civilian premises can be entered. Oversight Act s 7(8)(c). The same principles do not apply to information held by intelligence agencies. On the contrary, the Oversight Act s 7(9) specifically states that '[n]o access to intelligence information or premises contemplated in sub-s 8*(a)* may be withheld from the Inspector-General on any ground.'

[4] Oversight Act s 7(11).

[5] Oversight Act s 7(12). The Minister is responsible for the appointment of such staff: but he or she is required to consult with the IG with regard to such appointments.

[6] Ultimately, the report of the IG was rejected by the National Executive Council of the ANC. The ANC's NEC chose to launch its own investigation. Institute for Security Studies (supra) at 27. The rejection of the IG's report may indicate a lack of confidence and trust in the office. However, the rejection of the report may merely be a function of the hard-ball politics that have become a regular feature of the ANC presidential succession debate. It may not reflect a genuine lack of confidence in the IG.

[7] Oversight Act s 7(13).

The office of the IG has been faced with a number of challenges. Prior to the commencement of the tenure of the previous IG in 2004, the office of the IG remained largely vacant. Government apparently could not attract a suitable candidate to hold down the position for more than a few months at a time.[1] The reason for this high turnover in the post remains unclear. However, the lack of a stable occupant in the post initially stunted the development of the IG's office.[2] The difficulties faced by an office operating under such limitations — and the dangers it posed to an intelligence community serving a constitutional democracy — were candidly summarized by Imtiaz Fazel in 2009:

> Recent investigations conducted by the office have highlighted a number of abuses and malpractices in sections of the intelligence community, which has severely tested our oversight capacity and ability to access information. While we believe that we have acquitted ourselves well under very difficult circumstances, the challenges inherent in pioneering intelligence oversight in South Africa were amplified and many valuable lessons were drawn. In the process, the cardinal requirement upon which the democratic functioning of intelligence hinges, the rule of law and due process, was re-established, and the notion of bending the rules was banished from the philosophy of intelligence conduct, while the intelligence mandate was re-examined and tightened up in certain areas.[3]

The position was ultimately given the solidity and stability that it required. ZT Ngcakani held the post for a period of six years — from 2004 through 2010. As a high level ministerial report recognized, however, even a stable IG at the helm cannot make up for other deficiencies if 'there is a substantial gap between the Office of the Inspector-General's legislative mandate and its organizational capacity.'[4] Even with a current complement of 14 staff members — and a potential doubling of that staff to 28 — the report concluded that the IG lacked the manpower necessary to 'prevent and detect misconduct and illegality in the intelligence community … without additional resources.'[5] It deemed the proposed budget increases insufficient to meet the IG's substantial responsibilities (even as it suggested reducing those responsibilities to solely those discharged by an ombudsman). Without substantially significant increases, the report found that the office of the IG could not carry out investigations into illegal or corrupt activity with the requisite independence. Moreover, as already noted above, its dependence on the NIA for both finances and administration compromised its capacity to review objectively the behaviour of the NIA.[6]

Such shortcomings in the office of the IG, and indeed in the intelligence services as a whole, were revealed in 2005 when the office of the IG undertook its

[1] See O'Brien (supra) at 214.

[2] The position was ultimately given the solidity and stability that it required. ZT Ngcakani held the post for a period of six years – from 2004 through 2010.

[3] I Fazel To Spy or Not To Spy? Intelligence and Democracy in South Africa Institute For Security Studies Monograph No 157 (February 2009)(emphasis added)(OIG'S COO Fazel's admission regarding 'the bending of the rules' – and the abuse of the rule of law — within the intelligence services is noteworthy.)

[4] J Matthews, F Ginwala & L Nathan Intelligence in a Constitutional Democracy: Final Report to the Minister of Intelligence Services, Ronnie Kasrils, Ministerial Review Commission on Intelligence (10 September 2008) 116.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 117.

first big investigation. Then Director-General of the NIA, Billy Masetlha, was accused of using the NIA to conduct surveillance operations on a number of South African civilians and abusing NIA structures for partisan political purposes. The alleged surveillance encompassed both physical surveillance by NIA agents and the interception of private communications in the form of telephone calls and e-mails. A prominent businessman and ANC politician complained to the Minister for Intelligence Services that he had been placed under surveillance. The Minister, in turn, requested that the IG conduct an investigation.[1] After examining the report on the Masetlha affair tabled by the IG, the JSCI noted that the office of the IG lacked a standard operating procedure for dealing with such investigations and that the office also suffered from a lack of adequate resources.[2] As I have already noted, the ability of the IG to perform his or her functions effectively hinges on the willingness of Parliament to provide a budget that will guarantee that the IG has a sufficient number of suitably qualified staff members.

[1] See Institute for Security Studies 'Submission on Intelligence Oversight and Governance in South Africa' Document submitted to the Ministerial Review Commission on Intelligence (May 2007) available at http://www.iss.co.za/uploads/intelsubmitmay07.pdf (accessed on 6 May 2011) at 10–11. The surveillance was conducted as part of 'Project Avani'. Project Avani was an intelligence operation that was meant to investigate possible security risks to the country posed by the presidential succession debate within the ANC as well as the protests against poor service delivery that had erupted in many communities across the country. The operation was initiated by Masetlha in his capacity as the DG of Intelligence, allegedly upon the instruction of Cabinet. However, the Minister of Intelligence was never informed of its existence. The report of the IG found that Masetlha had not followed the correct NIA procedures in ordering the surveillance and that the interception of private communications had been illegal because no judicial authorisation was sought as required by s 16 of the Regulation of Interception of Communications and Provision of Communication Related Information Act 70 of 2002. The IG also found that Masetlha had been involved in the so called 'hoax e-mail' saga. The hoax e-mails were a number of e-mails that purported to outline a political conspiracy against the former Deputy President of the country, Jacob Zuma. The IG's investigation concluded that Masetlha and various accomplices had fabricated the e-mails. Institute for Security Studies (supra) at 11–12. Masetlha was charged with fraud. However, the charges were eventually dismissed. In the wake of the Masetlha scandal, the Minister of Intelligence established an independent Ministerial Review Commission on Intelligence to assess the current structure and functioning of the civilian intelligence services. According to the Commission's terms of reference, the purpose of the review was to 'strengthen the mechanisms of control over the civilian intelligence structures in order to ensure compliance and alignment with the Constitution, constitutional principles and the rule of law, and particularly to minimise the potential for illegal conduct and abuse of power'. The Commission reviewed all the relevant legislation and policies around the security services and received submissions from the intelligence services, interested parties, civil society organisations and individual members of the public. The Commission handed its final report to the Minister of Intelligence Services in September 2008. See J Matthews, F Ginwala & L Nathan Intelligence in a Constitutional Democracy: Final Report to the Minister of Intelligence Services, Ronnie Kasrils, Ministerial Review Commission on Intelligence (10 September 2008), available at http://www.ssronline.org/edocs/ review_commission_final_report20080910.doc (accessed on 18 May 2011).

[2] Institute for Security Studies (supra) at 27.

(iii) The National Intelligence Co-ordinating Committee

FC s 210*(a)* requires that legislation provide for the coordination of all intelligence services. Accordingly, the National Strategic Intelligence Act[1] established the National Intelligence Co-ordinating Committee. Its primary function is to co-ordinate the intelligence supplied by the four intelligence services and to interpret that information so that it might be employed by policy-makers.[2] As a clearing house for the intelligence supplied by different agencies, the Co-ordinating Committee is meant to limit the ability of various intelligence services to manipulate information and, in so doing, to influence improperly the political decisions taken by policymakers.

The Co-ordinating Committee is comprised of the Intelligence Co-ordinator[3] and the Director Generals of the NIA and SASS, the head of the intelligence division of the SANDF, and the head of the CID of the SAPS.[4] The Co-ordinating Committee's direct clients are the President, Cabinet, and the Cabinet Committee for Security and Intelligence Affairs. Other clients include government departments, Premiers, provincial governments and parliamentary committees.

(iv) Executive control and oversight

Direct executive control of the NIA, SASS, crime intelligence and military intelligence is exercised by the Ministers of Intelligence, Police and Defence.[5] The Ministers report to the Cabinet Committee for Security and Intelligence Affairs. Since 2000, a National Security Council — comprised of the President, the Deputy President, and the Ministers for Safety and Security, Finance, Home Affairs, Defence, Intelligence and Foreign Affairs — has taken responsibility for general formulation of security policy.

The Masetlha scandal brought into stark relief some of the internal problems within the NIA. The litigation that ensued reflected an additional problem: a lack of clarity, in both the Final Constitution and the legislation on intelligence services, with respect to the suspension and the dismissal of the head of an intelligence service.

In Masetlha v The President of the Republic of South Africa & Another, the applicant, former NIA head Billy Masetlha, challenged his suspension and dismissal as Director-General of the NIA by President Mbeki.[6] The suspension was communicated by way of a letter signed by the Minister for Intelligence Services.[7]

[1] Act 39 of 1994.

[2] National Strategic Intelligence Act s 4(2).

[3] The Intelligence Co-ordinator is appointed by the President at his sole discretion. National Strategic Intelligence Act s 5(1).

[4] National Strategic Intelligence Act s 4(1).

[5] Oversight Act s 7(11)(a) requires the heads of all the intelligence agencies to submit annual reports to the Minister in charge of that agency.

[6] [2006] ZAGPHC 107 ('Masetlha HC').

[7] Masetlha contended that the decision to suspend him had been taken by the Minister and not by the President and was consequently unlawful. The High Court found it unnecessary to decide this issue on the grounds that determining the validity of the dismissal rendered the suspension issue moot. Masetlha HC (supra) at 6.

However, the President later recorded the decision as his own by way of a Presidential Minute.[1] Masetlha contended that the Presidential Minute was a belated attempt by the President to legalise Masetlha's suspension by passing it off as his own. The dismissal was effected through a notice bringing forward the date on which Masetlha's term of office was due to expire from 31 December 2007 to 22 March 2006.

Masetlha argued that the suspension and the dismissal constituted administrative action subject to the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA')[2] and that the actions taken had been procedurally unfair. The High Court rejected this argument. It found that — taking into consideration that there are no constitutional or other legislative provisions dealing with the dismissal of the head of the NIA — the President's power to dismiss the head of the NIA was inherent in his power to appoint him in terms of FC s 209(2). As a result, the President's power to dismiss fell within FC s 85(2)(e)'s grant of executive power and was not subject to PAJA.[3]

However, the High Court noted that while the powers of the National Executive in FC s 85(2)(e) are expressly excluded from the definition of action subject to review under PAJA, the courts still retained the authority to review the President's conduct in terms of the principle of legality or the rule of law doctrine.[4] The High Court concluded that for the exercise of executive power to be lawful, the power must not be exercised in bad faith, arbitrarily or irrationally.[5]

As a factual matter, it was common cause that the relationship of trust between the former Director-General and the President had broken down. (The degree of the breakdown remained a matter of dispute.) The President asserted that the relationship had been compromised by Masetlha's actions subsequent to the Inspector General's report and Masetlha's attacks on the President's integrity.[6] Masetlha contended that the breakdown was not irreparable and the relationship could be repaired if the President made 'appropriate amends' for the harm that the President had caused to Masetlha's reputation by suspending and then dismissing him.[7]

---

[1] FC s 101(1) requires all legally binding decisions of the President, or those taken in terms of national legislation, to be in writing.

[2] Act 3 of 2000.

[3] Masetlha HC (supra) at 13–14. FC s 85(2)(e) provides: '[t]he President exercises the executive authority, together with the other members of the Cabinet, by performing any other executive function provided for in the Constitution or in national legislation.' The definition of administrative action in s 1 of PAJA specifically excludes the 'executive powers or functions of the National Executive'.

[4] Masetlha HC (supra) at 14. FC s 1*(c)* provides: '[t]he Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on … supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law.' As authority for this proposition, the High Court relied on the decisions of the Constitutional Court where it has held that the exercise of all public power must conform with the principle of legality. See, eg, President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [1999] ZACC 11 at paras 142–8. For more on the principle of legality and the rule of law doctrine, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.

[5] Masetlha HC (supra) at 15.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid.

The High Court ruled that, based on the role and the functions of the NIA in ensuring national security, the mutual trust between the Director General and the President is essential for the proper functioning of the NIA and for the safety of the public.[1] Given that Masetlha did not argue that the President acted in bad faith, the High Court held that the breakdown of trust — whatever its dimensions — was a rational basis for dismissal. The President's dismissal of Masetlha therefore constituted lawful executive action.[2] Masetlha took the matter on direct appeal to the Constitutional Court.[3]

A majority of the Constitutional Court found that the President — as a matter of fact, not law — had specifically relied on ss 12(2) and 12(4) of the Public Service Act[4] to shorten Masetlha's term of office. The President had not, in fact, relied on his powers of dismissal in terms of FC s 209(2).[5] Moseneke DCJ then held that s 12(2) and 12(4) of the PSA does not confer on a member of the executive the power to appoint or to dismiss a head of department. The provisions simply create a framework for the manner in which such appointment or dismissal may take place. The Masetlha Court further concluded that in view of the fact that no written employment contract was entered into with Masetlha, the ordinary principles of employment contracts were applicable to the manner in which the contract could be terminated. The President, as the employer, could not unilaterally change the terms of the contract.

However, the Masetlha Court then found that the dispute between the parties could not be reduced to a private law dispute about the unlawful termination of an employment contract. The power to appoint and to dismiss the head of the NIA is a public law power derived from FC s 209(2). So although, as a matter of fact, the President had not relied upon FC s 209(2), as a matter of law, the dispute had to be resolved by first determining whether this power had been properly exercised.[6]

---

[1] Masetlha HC (supra) at 15–16.

[2] Ibid at 17. Since the dismissal was found to be within the President's legitimate powers and lawful, it was unnecessary for the court to address the issue of the suspension.

[3] Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa [2007] ZACC 20, 2008 (1) SA 566 (CC), 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Masetlha'). The Court was willing to grant leave to appeal despite Masetlha's failure to approach the Supreme Court of Appeal on the basis that the issues did not involve development of the common law and there was thus no significant disadvantage in not having the benefit of a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[4] Act 103 of 1994.

[5] The relevant portions of PSA s 12(2) and 12(4) state: '(2) As from the date of commencement of the Public Service Laws Amendment Act, 1997 (a) a person shall be appointed in the office of head of department in the prescribed manner, on the prescribed conditions and in terms of the prescribed contract between the relevant executing authority and such a person for a period of five years from the date of his or her appointment, or such shorter period as that executing authority may approve … . (4) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (2), a contract contemplated in that subsection may include any term and condition agreed upon between the relevant executing authority and the person concerned as to … (c) the grounds upon, and the procedures according to which, the services of the head of department may be terminated before the expiry of his or her term of office or extended term of office, as the case may be; and (d) any other matter which may be prescribed.' PSA s 3B(1)(a), in pertinent part, reads: 'Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this Act, the appointment and other career incidents of the heads of department shall be dealt with by, in the case of (a) a head of a national department or organisational component, the President.'

[6] Masetlha (supra) at paras 58–63.

Some disagreement exists in academic circles as to the coherence of that last proposition. In Minister of Education v Harris, the Constitutional Court specifically held that if an official only has the power to do 'X' under a provision in Statute A, but relies on a provision in Statute B, the decision is invalid.[1] That, as the argument goes, is precisely what happened here. The Masethla Court mentions Harris in passing but avoids the logical consequences of a Harris-inflected syllogism. As Michael Bishop contends: 'The President picked the wrong section. End of story.'[2]

Other commentators such as Jason Brickhill and Jacques de Ville view the Harris-inflected position as unduly rigid and overly formalistic. De Ville writes:

> It may occur that a public authority exercises its powers purportedly in terms of a specific statutory provision or it fails to state in terms of which statutory provision it had exercised its powers. [Questions arise] where a specific provision was mentioned [and] that that specific provision does not authorise the action, although another provision does, or — where none was mentioned — that there is in fact a provision that authorises such action. Would the action taken in such instance[s] be invalid? The approach of the courts is that such exercise of powers is not invalid provided the action is indeed authorised by another enabling provision.[3]

The Court agreed with the High Court that the power to dismiss the head of an intelligence service is a necessary corollary to the power to appoint and read this power into FC s 209(2) when read with s 3(3)(a) of the ISA[4] It rejected Masetlha's argument that allowing the President to rely on FC s 209(2), as an afterthought, violated the principle of certainty — a core component of the principle of legality. The actual certainty of the President's decision was reflected in his use of s 12(2) and 12(4) read with s 3B(1)(a) of the PSA — even if the statute itself did not grant the President the power to dismiss Masetlha. It held that although the President had — improperly — used the mechanism of the PSA to effect the dismissal, the source of the power exercised was ultimately to be found in FC s 209(2).[5]

The Masetlha Court then considered the question of whether the President's decision — taken in terms of FC s 209(2) — was nevertheless subject to review for procedural fairness. The majority held that the requirement of procedural fairness could hamper the ability of the executive to take appropriate policy decisions in such a sensitive domain as national security.[6] That said, the Deputy Chief Justice agreed with the High Court that executive decisions must comply with the requirements of the principle of legality. These principles require the exercise of

---

[1] 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC).

[2] E-mail Correspondence with Michael Bishop (5 May 2011).

[3] J De Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (2003) 101-102, fn 107. Further support for this proposition can be found in Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC) at paras 62-63. I am grateful to Jason Brickhill for bringing this line of argument, and this body of literature, to my attention. E-mail Correspondence with Jason Brickhill (6 May 2011).

[4] Masetlha (supra) at para 68.

[5] Ibid at para 71.

[6] Ibid at para 77.

power by the President to be rationally related to the purpose for which they were conferred.[1]

The Masetlha Court concluded that the decision by the President to dismiss Masetlha based on an irretrievable breakdown of trust complied with the principle of legality. The Masetlha Court noted that even if procedural fairness had been required, those requirements had been satisfied. Masetlha had had a number of meetings with the Minister at which he gave his version of events, had been given a chance to hand in a report stating his views on the unauthorised surveillance, and had met with the President to discuss the matter prior to his dismissal.[2]

As far as the breach of the employment contract was concerned, the Constitutional Court held that the breakdown of trust did not entitle the President to terminate the contract unilaterally. However, it also found that reinstatement would not be an appropriate remedy given the trust that must exist between the head of the NIA and the President. Having regard, in particular, to the fact that the President had made a tender to pay out Masetlha for the duration of his contract (an offer which Masetlha declined), the majority then held that Masetlha was still entitled to some form of compensation commensurate with his position.[3] Given its general ratification of the President's dismissal of Masetlha, the majority found it unnecessary to engage the issues surrounding Masetlha's suspension.[4]

[1] Masetlha (supra) at paras 78–82.

[2] Ibid at paras 84–6.

[3] Ibid at paras 87–9.

[4] In his dissent, Ngcobo J found that Masetlha's employment had not been validly terminated. The minority was of the view that FC s 209(2) does not deal with the term of office or the terms and conditions of service of the head of a security service. Rather, FC s 209(2) contemplates that such issues would be dealt with in terms of the provisions of the PSA. Ibid at para 152. This conclusion was bolstered by reference to various provisions of the PSA which indicate that members of the NIA – including the Director-General of the NIA — fall within the purview of the PSA. The minority concluded that the power to appoint and dismiss the Director-General is regulated by s 12(2) and 12(4) of the PSA read with s 3B(1)(a). They give effect to FC s 209(2) and are not limited to determining the manner in which such appointment and dismissal is to take place. Ibid at paras 153–7. The minority agreed with the majority that the power to appoint implies the power to dismiss. However, with regard to the question of whether the decision taken by the President is subject to review, the minority decided that any such test of the President's exercise of power warranted much more than mere legality. It concluded that the Final Constitution contemplates that all exercise of public power must not only avoid arbitrariness but must also comply with the principle of fundamental fairness. Ibid at para 179. The minority offered FC s 33, which provides for the right to just administrative action, and FC s 34, which provides for access to courts, as evidence that that the Final Constitution contemplates review of executive decisions that is substantive in nature. Ibid at para 180. According to Ncgobo J, the Final Constitution embodies an objective normative value system that requires fairness, not mere rationality, from its political office bearers. Ibid at para 183. Ngcobo J then concludes that the President does not have the power to unilaterally and arbitrarily alter the term of appointment of the head of the NIA and that the opportunities given to Masetlha to meet with the Minister and the President and to submit a report on the unauthorised surveillance were insufficient to meet the requirement of fairness. Ibid at para 205. Professor Cora Hoexter has criticised the majority decision in Masetlha, for 'set[ting] the law of procedural fairness back twenty years'. C Hoexter 'Clearing the Intersection? Administrative Law and Labour Law in the Constitutional Court' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 209, 210.

(c) Rights issues facing the intelligence agencies

(i) Interception of private communications

The intelligence agencies operate primarily in a covert manner. Their intelligence gathering operations encompass the secret surveillance of individuals and organisations and, as a consequence, the interception of private correspondence and communications between individuals. Such surveillance engages directly FC s 14*(d)*'s express protection of private communications.[1]

The Regulation of Interception of Communications and Provision of Communication-Related Information Act ('Interception Act') was adopted to ensure a proper legal framework for interception of private communications.[2] The preamble offers a glimpse of the sweeping nature of the powers granted to the Intelligence Services and the SAPS:

> To regulate the interception of certain communications, the monitoring of certain signals and radio frequency spectrums and the provision of certain communication-related information; to regulate the making of applications for, and the issuing of, directions authorising the interception of communications and the provision of communication-related information under certain circumstances; to regulate the execution of directions and entry warrants by law enforcement officers and the assistance to be given by postal service providers, telecommunication service providers and decryption key holders in the execution of such directions and entry warrants; to prohibit the provision of telecommunication services which do not have the capability to be intercepted; to provide for certain costs to be borne by certain telecommunication service providers; to provide for the establishment of interception centres, the Office for Interception Centres and the Internet Service Providers Assistance Fund; to prohibit the manufacturing, assembling, possessing, selling, purchasing or advertising of certain equipment; to create offences and to prescribe penalties for such offences; and to provide for matters connected therewith.

A number of the Act's provisions give the reader cause for immediate pause. In many instances, a law enforcement officer is able to intercept any communication — without a warrant — if he or she believes that the interception of the

[1] The right to privacy, FC s 14, states: 'Everyone has the right to privacy, which includes the right not to have
(a) their person or home searched;
(b) their property searched;
(c) their possessions seized;
(d) the privacy of their communications infringed.'
For more on FC s 14, see D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 38.

[2] Act 70 of 2002. The Act has been amended three times. See Prevention and Combating of Corrupt Activities Act 12 of 2004 (effective as of 20 May 2005); Protection of Constitutional Democracy against Terrorist and Related Activities Act 33 of 2004 (effective as of 20 May 2005); Electronic Communications Act 36 of 2005 (effective as of 19 July 2006).

communication is reasonably necessary.[1] In many instances, judicial oversight, by a designated judge, is ex post facto — to the extent that it is required at all. In other cases, the interception is vindicated by the permission of another party to the communication. These provisions, on their face, would appear to constitute prima facie violations of the right to privacy. Whether these 'reasonably necessary' incursions into private communications are constitutionally justifiable under FC s 36 is another matter. We live, sadly, in an age when all electronic communications can be — and are — analysed by intelligence agencies and private commercial entities around the world. While such incursions cannot be stopped, the courts can assert some authority with respect to the manner in which such private communications are used.

[1] Interception Act ss 4 and 5 read, in pertinent part:

4…

(2) Any law enforcement officer may intercept any communication if he or she is —

(a) a party to the communication; and

(b) satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the interception of a communication of another party to the communication is necessary on a ground referred to in section 16 (5) (a), unless such communication is intercepted by such law enforcement officer for purposes of committing an offence.

5. Interception of communication with consent of party to communication

(1) Any person, other than a law enforcement officer, may intercept any communication if one of the parties to the communication has given prior consent in writing to such interception, unless such communication is intercepted by such person for purposes of committing an offence.

(2) Any law enforcement officer may intercept any communication if—

(a) one of the parties to the communication has given prior consent in writing to such interception;

(b) he or she is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the party who has given consent as contemplated in paragraph (a) will

(i) participate in a direct communication or that a direct communication will be directed to him or her; or

(ii) send or receive an indirect communication; and

(c) the interception of such direct or indirect communication is necessary on a ground referred to in section 16(5)(a), unless such communication is intercepted by such law enforcement officer for purposes of committing an offence.

(4) The law enforcement officer who intercepts a communication under subsection (1) or (2) must, as soon as practicable after the interception of the communication concerned, submit to a designated judge

(a) a copy of the written confirmation referred to in subsection (3)

(b) an affidavit setting forth the results and information obtained from that interception; and

(c) any recording of the communication that has been obtained by means of that interception, any full or partial transcript of the recording and any notes made by that law enforcement officer of the communication if nothing in the communication suggests that bodily harm, attempted bodily harm or threatened bodily harm has been caused or is likely to be caused.

(5) A telecommunication service provider who, in terms of subsection (2), has routed duplicate signals of indirect communications to the designated interception centre must, as soon as practicable thereafter, submit an affidavit to a designated judge setting forth the steps taken by that telecommunication service provider in giving effect to the request concerned and the results obtained from such steps.

(6) A designated judge must keep all written confirmations and affidavits and any recordings, transcripts or notes submitted to him or her in terms of subsections (4) and (5), or cause it to be kept, for a period of at least five years.

(ii) Compliance with the principle of open justice

(aa) MISS and the missing Open Democracy Bill

It is somewhat ironic that with the end of the apartheid security state, we should then witness the construction of a new security apparatus with powers almost equal to its predecessor. On 4 December 1996 Cabinet approved the Minimum Information Security Standards ('MISS') document as national information security policy.[1] The MISS' purpose, as reflected in its introduction, is:

1. The need for secrecy and therefore security measures in a democratic and open society, with transparency in its governmental administration, is currently the subject of much debate, and will continue to be for a long time.
2. However, the issue need not be controversial, since the intended Open Democracy Act (not yet promulgated at the time of going to press) itself will acknowledge the need for protection of sensitive information, and therefore, will provide for justified exemption from disclosure of such information.
3. Although exemptions will have to be restricted to the minimum (according to the policy proposals regarding the intended Open Democracy Act), that category of information which will be exempted, as such needs protection. The mere fact that information is exempted from disclosure in terms of the Open Democracy Act, does not provide it with sufficient protection. Such information will always be much sought after by certain interest groups or even individuals, with sufficient access to espionage expertise, and highly sophisticated technological backing. The extent of espionage against the new South Africa should never be under estimated - it has actually escalated alarmingly during the past few years.
4. Where information is exempted from disclosure, it implies that security measures will apply in full. This document is aimed at exactly that need: providing the necessary procedures and measures to protect such information. It is clear that security procedures do not concern all information and are therefore not contrary to transparency, but indeed necessary for responsible governance.

At the time of press, the Open Democracy Act remains the Open Democracy Bill.[2] Thus, we continue to have the apparatus of a security state in place without an Act that vouchsafes an open and democratic society. We need an act that grants citizens access to documents of public interest that do not pose any threat to the nation's security. That Act ought to enable civil servants and judges to determine which documents may be released and which documents must remain classified.

(bb) Independent Newspapers and the principle of open justice

A good example of the consequences of the absence of such an Act — and the absence of political commitment to the principle of open justice — was reflected in Independent Newspapers.[3] Prior to the hearing — concerning the

[1] Available at http://right2info.org/resources/publications/SA_Minimum%20Information%20Security%20Standards.pdf (accessed on 7 May 2011).

[2] B67-98.

[3] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) In re: Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6 ('Independent Newspapers').

President's dismissal of the Director General of the NIA — various government documents from the intelligence services forming part of the record were made publicly available on the Constitutional Court's website. A few days before the hearing, the Court noticed that some of the documents were marked 'Secret' and 'Confidential'. It removed all documents related to the case from its website and refused to make them available to journalists. The Independent Newspapers filed an urgent application requesting that the government documents and the record again be made public. Following a hearing on merits of the urgent application, and with the consent of the Minister for Intelligence Services, the better part of the record was again made public. However, the Minister continued to object to the disclosure of a limited set of documents that had been deemed classified or which contained classified information.

The released documents were quite benign. Moreover, most of the documents had not been classified in the first place. Those facts invariably begged the question as to why the Minister objected to their release to the editors and the lawyers of Independent Newspapers. As counsel for Independent Newspapers and the Freedom of Expression Institute argued:

> [T]his Court's commitment to open justice in the conduct of its proceedings … requires a challenge to the grounds for the Minister's continuing objection to the remaining restricted documents. Such a challenge can only be mounted by a party fully apprised of its target. Accordingly, Independent Newspapers' legal representatives and senior editors should be afforded sight of the remaining restricted documents, on the conditions specified or other reasonable conditions, in order to frame their submissions to this Court on whether the Minister's objection thereto should be sustained.

Only such in camera access would enable the senior editors to make a meaningful assessment as to whether the public would benefit from their release.

Counsel for Independent Newspapers grounded their claim for in camera review — or some mechanism that furthers public access to important political documents — in terms of a constitutional principle of 'open justice'. This principle, they argued, is a necessary consequence of a Bill of Rights committed: in FC s 16 to '(a) freedom of the press and other media; (b) freedom to receive or impart information or ideas'; in FC s 34 to the resolution of 'any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court'; in FC s 35(3)(c) to a 'public trial before an ordinary court' and in FC s 1*(c)*; to the 'rule of law'. Counsel did not create this principle out of whole cloth. The Constitutional Court had previously articulated the grounds and content of this principle in SABC[1] and Shinga.[2] The Shinga Court wrote:

> Closed court proceedings carry within them the seeds for serious potential damage to every pillar on which every constitutional democracy is based… . Seeing justice done in court enhances public confidence in the criminal justice process and assists victims, the accused and the broader community to accept the legitimacy of that process. Open courtrooms foster judicial excellence, thus rendering courts accountable and legitimate. Were criminal

[1] South African Broadcasting Corporation Limited v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC), [2006] ZACC 15 ('SABC').

[2] S v Shinga 2007 (4) SA 611 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), [2007] ZACC 3 ('Shinga').

> [matters] to be dealt with behind closed doors, faith in the criminal justice system may be lost. No democratic society can risk losing that faith. It is for this reason that the principle of open justice is an important principle in a democracy.[1]

In SABC, the Court explained the principle of open justice in the following terms:

> [O]pen justice is observed in the ordinary course in that the public are able to attend all hearings. The press are also entitled to be there, and are able to report as extensively as they wish and they do so … . Courts should in principle welcome public exposure of their work in the courtroom, subject of course to their obligation to ensure that proceedings are fair. The foundational constitutional values of accountability, responsiveness and openness apply to the functioning of the judiciary as much as to other branches of government. The values underpin both the right to a fair trial and the right to a public hearing (i.e. the principle of open courtrooms). The public is entitled to know exactly how the judiciary works and to be reassured that it always functions within the terms of the law and according to the time-honoured standards of independence, integrity, impartiality and fairness.[2]

After a further hearing, a majority of the Court rejected the interim request without reasons. Nevertheless, the Independent Newspapers Court then proceeded to hear the main question: Should the documents in question be made publicly available?

Independent Newspapers claimed that the Constitutional Court's commitment to the principle of open justice would require — with respect to allegedly classified documents — that:

(a) Restrictions on public access to proceedings or any part thereof, should be an exceptional occurrence and occur only to the extent demonstrably justifiable;
(b) Any restriction to all or a part of open court proceedings may be imposed only by court order following:
    (i) a formal application to court;
    (ii) on notice to interested parties;
    (iii) a hearing in open court on the issue of whether the proceedings or any part thereof should be subject to restriction;
(c) where necessary the application to close proceedings may be heard partially, or entirely in camera;
(d) this does not, however, dispense with the need for notice and the opportunity to oppose;
(e) in exceptional circumstances the application may be brought ex parte under the usual condition that notice is subsequently given and that any party wishing to oppose may do so subsequently.

When the Constitutional Court did finally opine on the merits of this argument, it handed down a judgment with ramifications many had feared: namely, that in the absence of the promised Open Democracy Act, courts will be forced into constructing, ab initio, security classifications and rights to revelation that ought to have first been captured in legislation.

In a split decision, the Constitutional Court in Independent Newspapers offered up a number of different visions of the relationship between the principle of open justice and the protection of information deemed necessary for national security.[1] The majority judgment by Moseneke DCJ crisply captured the issues before the Court:

[1] Shinga (supra) at paras 25–26.
[2] SABC (supra) at paras 31–32.

(1) Does the right to open justice entitle Independent Newspapers to access to the restricted materials in the court record?
(2) Does the Minister's objection premised on national security constitute adequate justification?
(3) What is the proper approach to harmonising these competing constitutional claims? and
(4) Is it desirable to set guidelines on a procedure to be adopted when a court record is sought to be withheld from the public?[2]

Moseneke DCJ, tracking Shinga and SABC, begins his analysis by noting that a constellation of fundamental rights inform the Court's determinations as to whether court documents ought to be released:

> There exists a cluster … of related constitutional rights which … may be termed 'the right to open justice'. … First, [FC] s 16(1)(a) and (b) provides in relevant part that everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes freedom of the press and other media as well as freedom to receive and impart information or ideas. [FC s] 34 does not only protect the right of access to courts but also commands that courts deliberate in a public hearing. This guarantee of openness in judicial proceedings is again found in [FC s] 35(3)(c), which entitles every accused person to a public trial before an ordinary court. [Moreover], this systemic requirement of openness in our society flows from the very founding values of our Constitution, which enjoin our society to establish democratic government under the sway of constitutional supremacy and the rule of law in order, amongst other things, to ensure transparency, accountability and responsiveness in the way courts and all organs of State function.[3]

One might have thought that the Deputy Chief Justice would then go on to analyze the restrictions placed on the material in question in terms of this constellation of fundamental rights reinforced, as he notes, by FC s 1's commitment to an open and democratic society based upon the rule of law, constitutional supremacy and other founding values such as transparency, accountability and responsiveness. Not so.

Having noted the jurisprudential basis for the principle of open justice, the Deputy Chief Justice appears to change tack. Rather than analyze the applicant's request in terms of open justice, he writes:

[1] For further analysis of this case, see J Klaaren 'Open Justice and Beyond: Independent Newspapersv Minister for Intelligence Services: In Re: Masetlha' (2009) 126 SALJ 24; D Milo, G Penfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2008) §§42.9*(c)* and 42.9*(g)*. See also J Klaaren 'Dominant Democracy in South Africa: A Reply to Choudhry' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 87; J Klaaren 'Structures of Government in the 1996 Constitution: Putting Democracy Back into Human Rights' (1997) 13 SAJHR 3. Klaaren's work is notable for its unwavering commitment to understanding constitutionalism in terms of the interaction of the political institutions the basic law creates, and not simply assessing a constitutional jurisdiction's virtues in terms of the judgments that emanate from its highest court.

[2] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 15.

[3] Ibid at paras 39-40.

> The 'exceptional circumstances' standard advanced is inconsistent with the design of our Constitution and the jurisprudence of this court on several counts. The better approach, I think, is to recognise that the cluster of rights that enjoins open justice derives from the Bill of Rights and that, important as these rights are individually and collectively, like all entrenched rights, they are not absolute. They may be limited by a law of general application provided the limitation is reasonable and justifiable. It is not uncommon that legislation and the common law in this country, and elsewhere in open and democratic societies, limit open court hearings when fair trial rights or dignity or rights of a child or rights of other vulnerable groups are implicated.[1]

But what law of general application does the Deputy Chief Justice have in mind? He does not say.[2] Were there to exist a law of general application in the matter, the first stage of analysis would require the Court to determine whether the law in question impaired the right to open justice or any one of the express substantive rights in the Bill of Rights that give the judicially created principle of open justice substance. Were a limitation found, the Court would then proceed to FC s 36 and determine whether the limitation of the rights asserted was justified.

No such analysis takes place in the majority's judgment.

Instead, Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke rejects the 'exceptional circumstances' argument proffered by the applicants on the grounds that other constitutional and statutory imperatives place duties upon the state to secure information vital to the well-being of the commonweal:

> The Constitution imposes upon the government the duties, amongst others, to preserve the peace and secure the wellbeing of the people of the Republic; to maintain national security; to defend and protect the Republic; to establish and maintain intelligence services; and to prevent, combat and investigate crime. Effect is given to these constitutional obligations through legislation, the establishment of institutions as permitted by law and by the exercise of executive authority vested in the President and the Cabinet. The Minister draws attention to the national information security policy, known as Minimum Information Security Standards (MISS), which was adopted by the Cabinet on 4 December 1998. It applies to all departments of State that handle classified information in the national interest. It provides for measures to protect classified information and empowers the Minister to protect information by classifying it as 'restricted' or 'confidential' or 'secret' or 'top secret'. In addition national legislation and regulations prohibit the disclosure of certain classified information.[3]

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 44.

[2] In his heads of argument, the Minister relied on s 4 of the 1982 Protection of Information Act: 'Section 4 of the Protection of Information Act 84 of 1982 prohibits the disclosure of protected documents or information in relation to, inter alia, security matters… . We submit that the definition of "security matter" which includes, but is not limited to, any matter dealt with by the Intelligence Services and any matter which relates to the functions of the Intelligence Services is wide enough to accommodate a legal prohibition on the unauthorised disclosure of information protected in terms of the MISS.' The Deputy Chief Justice would seem to accept the Minister's contention that s 4 authorized the restriction of access to documents that speak to national security concerns. See Independent Newspapers (supra) at fn 50. However, as we shall see, he later states that no statute or rule of law governs or speaks directly to the release of the documents under review. Ibid at para 55.

[3] Ibid at para 49.

One might have thought that the principle of open justice would have to be harmonized with these competing constitutional dictates, or that national information security policy — MISS — that restricted access to classified information would have to be tested against the principle of open justice in the context of judicial proceedings. Both approaches would reflect accepted forms of constitutional analysis. Again, the Deputy Chief Justice refuses to follow his own analysis of the matter before him. Instead, he contends that the analysis of the matter before the Independent Newspapers Court > must begin with the fact that ordinarily court proceedings and hence the record are open to the public. A mere classification of a document within a court record as 'confidential' or 'secret' or even 'top secret' under the operative intelligence legislation or the mere ipse dixit of the minister concerned does not place such documents beyond the reach of the courts. Once the documents are placed before a court, they are susceptible to its scrutiny and direction as to whether the public should be granted or denied access.[1] … . The classification of a document as classified does not in itself place these documents beyond the reach of the Court. As part of their inherent power to regulate their own process in terms of section 173, the Court may decide whether to make the documents available to the public or other parties.[2]

The Deputy Chief Justice then dispenses of the remaining leg of the argument advanced by the amicus curiae, the Freedom of Expression Institute: namely that the Court should establish clear procedures for the analysis of those documents that should remain classified and those documents that should enter the public domain. Though sympathetic to the request for clear guidance, the Deputy Chief Justice refuses this invitation. Instead, he falls back on the overused canard that each matter will raise different issues and no rubric for declassifying documents can be laid out in advance of the specific facts brought before a court.[3]

Having refused to engage in rights analysis or establish guidelines for dealing with cases in which a court record is sought to be withheld, the Deputy Chief Justice falls back on FC s 173: Is it in the interests of justice for a court record to be opened or to be withheld? This test, according to the Deputy Chief Justice, becomes an entirely factual matter to be decided on a case-by-case basis:

> It follows that where a government official objects to disclosure of a part of the record before a court on grounds of national security, the court is properly seized with the matter and is obliged to consider all relevant circumstances and to decide whether it is in the interests of justice for the documents to be kept secret and away from any other parties, the media or the public. This forms part of a court's inherent power to regulate its own process that flows from section 173 of the Constitution. In my view, a court in that position should give due weight both to the right to open justice and to the obligation of the state to pursue national security within the context of all relevant factors. As in the present matter,

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 54.

[2] Ibid at para 53.

[3] Ibid at 48. Could it be that the reason the Court refused to accept FXI's submission is because it would require the Court to admit that it had acted improperly in removing the record from the public domain? Had they not done so, it is quite likely that nobody would have noticed (or cared) that a few of the documents had been deemed classified. After all, they were already in the public domain. See M Bishop 'Stamped: A Comparative Analysis of Access to Classified Documents in Court Records' (April 2009)(Paper on file with author.)

> it would not be concerned with a statute or other law of general application as the basis for restricting the disclosure of the material. In deciding whether documents ought to be disclosed or not, a court will have regard to all germane factors which include the nature of the proceedings; the extent and character of the materials sought to be kept confidential; the connection of the information to national security; the grounds advanced for claiming disclosure or for refusing it; whether the information is already in the public domain and if so, in what circumstances it reached the public domain; for how long and to what extent it has been in the public domain; and, finally, the impact of the disclosure or non-disclosure on the ultimate fairness of the proceedings before a court. These factors are neither comprehensive nor dispositive of the enquiry.[1]

Moseneke DCJ goes on to hold that the grounds for refusal need not be 'exceptional':

> I am, however, unable to agree with the submission that a restriction placed on public access to proceedings is only permissible as an exceptional occurrence and that the party seeking to restrict the court record bears a true onus of demonstrating that the restriction is justifiable. The logical consequence of this stance is that all court records may not be restricted except in exceptional circumstances, by a court order after a formal application, on notice to interested parties and after a hearing in an open court. In other words, I accept that the default position is one of openness. My difficulty arises in defining the circumstances in which that default position does not apply.[2]

Since the majority cannot define standards in terms of which the default position would not apply, it concludes that it can offer no standards at all. Its standard-free analysis results in the release of some documents and the refusal to produce others deemed to contain sensitive information, such as the names of agents. The Deputy Chief Justice suggests that the Court's decision to release some documents while denying access to others was motivated, at least in part, by the Minister's determination to protect only those documents 'necessary to achieve specified national security objectives'.[3]

The dissenting judgments are substantially more sanguine about the ability to undertake fundamental rights analysis of open justice matters and to establish frameworks with which other courts could operate when asked to determine whether openness or security should win out. All three dissenting judgments agreed that 'the issue of the appropriate test should … remain open to be decided on another day.'[4] It is an invitation that one trusts the Court will later take up.

One might also hope that any future judgment will be informed by Justice Yacoob's clear commitment to 'openness' and his witty 'Catch-22' take on the notion of 'secrecy' that animates the Minister's objections and the majority's concerns about national security with respect to documents already made public. His Helleresque approach to such matters is expressly reflected in the following broadside that he delivers regarding the Court's ostensible inability to impose appropriate limits and sanctions on the use and the publication of sensitive documents:

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 55.
[2] Ibid. at para 43.
[3] Ibid at para 77.
[4] Ibid at para 81 (Yacoob J).

> I was convinced that the responsible legal representatives and senior newspaper editors would handle the matter with sensitivity and care. I was also persuaded that all were bona fide and would comply with their undertaking not to publish the material. I accordingly concluded that the material should be made available to them. The NIA and the government would have been embarrassed by the information. I saw no possibility that the newspapers would have revealed the bungling, the identity of Mr Fichot, the foreign French intelligence service known as the DGSE, the names of the junior operatives or any information which might endanger them. The legal representatives and the newspaper editors are responsible citizens as much interested in the security of the South African State as anyone else might be, including the NIA, the Minister's attorneys and counsel, Mr Masetlha's attorneys and counsel in the High Court, the prosecuting team in the Hatfield Community Court, Mr Masetlha's legal team in the criminal proceedings before the Hatfield Community Court, certain staff members in the magistrates' court, certain staff members in the High Court, as well as 24 South African clerks and four foreign clerks employed in this court at the time.[1]

To find otherwise, Yacoob J intimates in his disarmingly cheeky concluding paragraph, would force one to describe all the parties to the matter — including the prosecuting authorities and Constitutional Court clerks — as potential 'enemies of the state.' But the true devious genius of his dissent flows from his ability to steal the case from the majority by making all of the interesting information in the documents public through his searching analysis — in the judgment — of why the majority was wrong not to disclose the previously classified information (as expressly revealed in the judgment).

Yacoob J's final words — on viewing ordinary citizens as enemies of the state — really belong to Justice Sachs. His dissent not only lays out the philosophical foundations for the 'open and democratic society' contemplated by the Final Constitution, but constitutes a sweeping rejection of the majority's conclusions. In rebuffing the majority's cramped understanding of the Court's role in promoting an open and democratic society, while highlighting its failure to acknowledge the damage done by the security services under apartheid, Sachs J writes that 'special attention [must] be paid to the importance of openness, a theme that until now has not been given much attention in our jurisprudence.'[2] Sachs J writes that 'an open and democratic society', cannot, by definition, 'view its citizens as enemies.'[3] He continues:

> Nor does it see its basic security as being derived from the power of the State to repress those it regards as opponents. Its fundamental philosophy is quite opposed to the authoritarianism of the past. Its starting point is not repression, but the promotion of positive elements of social stability, such as food security and job security. Above all, [our] society is bound together not by ties of arrogance combined with fear, but by a shared sense of > security that comes to all citizens from the feeling that their dignity is respected and that each and every one of them has the same basic rights under the Constitution.[1]

[1] Independent Newspapers (supra) at para 149.
[2] Ibid at para 153.
[3] Ibid at para 155.

Contrary to the holding of the majority, Sachs J concludes that the default position for government documents is disclosure and that those instances that justify non-disclosure are, in fact, exceptional.

Van der Westhuizen J's dissent departs from the Deputy Chief Justice's opinion on the grounds that 'the test put forward in the majority judgment lacks specificity and provides insufficient guidance to courts on how to balance the competing interests of open justice and national security'.[2] His opinion comes closest to identifying the basis upon which future courts should assess the conflicting demands of the principle of open justice and the need for national security. After finding that the withholding of documents constitutes a limitation of the principle of open justice in terms of MISS, Van der Westhuizen J writes:

> Upon a prima facie demonstration that the failure to disclose would implicate the right to a fair trial or any other right in the Bill of Rights, the government has to show that those individual rights are not implicated, or only minimally interfered with, or that non-disclosure is necessary for the preservation of national security. The number of documents withheld, the type of information withheld (such as individual names, locations of military installations, etc), and the percentage of the document withheld have to be evaluated. … A court should take into account the availability of the information in the public domain, how the documents came to be in the public domain … and whether further disclosure would increase the risks to national security… . Even if it is shown that national security requires non-disclosure, it must be shown that the non-disclosure that is specifically being sought is the least restrictive method to achieve the purpose. A court [faced with such a matter should] look favourably upon alternatives to full disclosure, or absolute non-disclosure, for example, redaction of highly sensitive materials, or summaries of documents that allow the public to understand the substance if not the specifics of the material. [Finally], [r] edaction is an especially attractive option when the material sought to be withheld relates to individual names. [3]

Van der Westhuizen J's dissent: (a) fits comfortably with approaches to disclosure of sensitive documents in foreign jurisdictions; (b) gives the principle of open justice appropriate recognition; and (c) suggests that standard two-stage Bill of Rights analysis could provide sufficient guidance to other courts faced with the challenge of whether and how to release sensitive documentation into the public domain.

(iii) The Protection of Information Bill: A necessary evil with potential constitutional infringements

The Constitutional Court is likely to be confronted with far greater challenges to the principle of open justice, along with the constitutional ideals of transparency and accountability and the right of access to information, should the Protection of [1] Independent Newspapers (supra).

[2] Ibid at para 170.
[3] Ibid at paras 179-182.

Information Bill become law.[1] The bill gives various organs of state — from the intelligence services to the police force to tourism boards to parastatals to Chapter Nine Institutions to parks boards and virtually every government ministry — broad powers to restrict access to information that they deem sensitive. The bill — as currently structured — is unlikely to pass constitutional muster in its entirety. At the same time, most of the commentary about the content of the bill has generated far more heat, than light. For example, when Nichola de Havilland, director of the Centre for Constitutional Rights contends that 'the Bill facilitates a culture of opacity and its corollary, the abuse of power,'[2] can she really be understood to prefer the out-dated 1982 apartheid-era act currently in place? We need new legislation to handle appropriately the classification of documents and to ensure that the public has access to information essential for well-informed decision-making and necessary for meaningful self-governance. We desperately need new legislation to provide the kinds of mechanisms for handling and revealing sensitive information commensurate with the requirements of a constitutional democracy, as Jason Brickhill contends, flawed as the current bill may currently be.[3]

Human Rights Watch ('HRW') offers a nuanced provision by provision assessment of the Bill. HRW submitted its review to Parliament's Ad Hoc Committee on the Protection of Information Legislation for its consideration in November 2010.[4] Human Rights Watch's evaluation and primary critiques read as follows:

1. As it currently stands, the bill raises serious concerns about its compatibility with South Africa's human rights obligations under both international treaties to which it is a party and its own Constitution… . South Africa's obligations regarding freedom of information and expression derive from a number of sources: Articles 16 and 32 of the Constitution, Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), and Article 9 of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights. While these rights may be subject to restrictions on grounds of national security, the restrictions must be provided for in law, necessary to achieve a specific, permitted purpose, and be proportionate to the aim.
2. The burden of demonstrating the validity of the restriction rests with the government, which must show that: (a) the expression or information at issue poses a serious threat to a legitimate national security interest; (b) the restriction imposed is the least restrictive means possible for protecting that interest; and (c) the restriction is compatible with democratic principles.
3. In addition, the Johannesburg Principles state that laws on public information must be accessible, unambiguous, and drawn narrowly and with precision so as to enable individuals to foresee whether a particular action is unlawful. The laws should also provide for adequate safeguards against abuse, including access to prompt, full, and effective judicial scrutiny by an independent court or tribunal of any imposed restriction.
4. Weaknesses of South Africa's Proposed Protection of Information Bill:

[1] Protection of Information Bill, B 6-2010 (5 March 2008).

[2] L Donnelly 'The Right to Demand Answers' Mail & Guardian (29 April 2011) 13, available at http://mg.co.za/article/2011-04-29-the-right-to-demand-answers/ (accessed on 7 May 2011).

[3] E-mail Correspondence with Jason Brickhill (7 May 2011).

[4] Human Rights Watch 'South Africa: Revise Protection of Information Bill – A Letter to Mr CV Burgess, Chairperson of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Protection of Information Legislation (November 23, 2010), avaliable at www.hrw.org, (accessed on 1 April 2010.)

a. Based on these standards and principles, we believe that South Africa's proposed Protection of Information Bill as currently drafted is overly broad and vague and would promote secrecy over transparency … Its curtailing [of] the right of access to information to an extent that would be very damaging for public participation and good governance, which are central to South Africa's democracy. These concerns are compounded by the bill's proposed creation of a series of broad offences that impose substantial criminal penalties, and the absence of a public interest defense clause.[1]

b. We therefore welcome the indications Minister Cwele has already given that sections … of the Bill, relating to the withholding of information in the 'national interest' and protection of 'commercial information,' respectively, may be withdrawn… . As provided for in the Johannesburg Principles, the law should sanction the restriction of information only to protect a legitimate national security interest that is specifically and narrowly defined (Principle 12).

c. Amend the scope of sections …, which, taken together, allow a very wide category of persons to determine what information may be subject to classification, a situation which is likely to lead to over-classification and abuse. Moreover as pointed out by the Human Rights Commission, the scope of persons empowered under section 16 is inconsistent with the Promotion of Access to Information Act.

d. Amend Chapter [12]: [they] create overly broad offences. These offences, which range from 'hostile activity offences' to 'prohibition of disclosure of state security matter,' are punishable for up to 25 years, yet are very broad, with ill-defined concepts of intent. Under such provisions, a person could face criminal sanctions, for example, for unauthorized communication, delivery, collection, or copying of 'top secret' information without knowledge of the potential harm the information could pose. No person should be punished on national security grounds for disclosure of information if (1) the disclosure does not actually harm and is not likely to harm a legitimate national security interest, or (2) the public interest in knowing the information outweighs the harm from disclosure.

e. No person may be subjected to any detriment on national security grounds for disclosing information that he or she learned by virtue of government service if the public interest in knowing the information outweighs the harm from disclosure.

f. Once information has been made generally available, by whatever means, whether or not lawful, any justification for trying to stop further publication will be overridden by the public's right to know.

g. [The Act ought to embrace] a public interest defense clause that recognizes the standard codified in principle 13 of the Johannesburg Principles: … . all laws concerning the right to obtain information, the public interest in knowing the information shall be a primary consideration.

h. [The Act ought to provide] an effective mechanism to oversee classification decisions that would result in information not being subject to disclosure. Any decision to classify information so that it cannot be disclosed should be reasoned and in writing and subject to a review of the merits by an independent judicial authority.[2]

[1] See, eg, POI Bill Chapter 12, ss 44–56.
[2] Ibid.

Human Rights Watch's request for an 'effective mechanism' brings to mind a number of the specialist courts, commissions, tribunals and Chapter Nine Institutions that work so well in various realms of the South African legal system (those fora that engage, for example, issues of competition, labour, tax, human rights, gender relations and alternative dispute resolution). A system in which each and every government information-related request (or denial or punishment) had to be reviewed by a court of law would be unduly cumbersome. An independent, specialized tribunal would likely prove superior in terms of efficacy, efficiency and justice. Thus far, the Minister for State Security has rejected this proposal and only committed the state to the creation of an advisory board that assist the Minister with requests for declassification.

Perhaps the most balanced account of the Bill, as it currently stands, is offered by media law experts Dario Milo and Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti.[1] Milo and Ampofo-Anti credit State Security Minister Siyabonga Cwele for engaging the public on the Bill and for making some necessary changes. That said, they take the Minister to task for doing no more than narrowing the 'overly broad' definition of national interest found in the Bill. (The Minister's failure to keep his word in this regard will disappoint Human Rights Watch as well.) The absence of a public-interest defence is also difficult to explain. Such a defense does not automatically immunize a person who discloses information from potential prosecution. As Milo and Ampofo-Anti note: 'Editors and whistleblowers will have to apply their minds diligently to whether a public interest justification may reasonably be employed to reveal the information, and if they get it wrong there is a risk of imprisonment.'[2] The absence of a carefully crafted defence will invariably chill the ability of the media and other social actors to expose 'wrongdoing, hypocrisy, mismanagement, criminality and gross negligence.'[3] Perhaps the most disheartening provision of the bill can be found in Chapter 13 (said to govern the protection of information in courts). Whereas the principle of open justice currently allows courts to regulate their own processes when it comes to the public disclosure of court documents, the proposed bill would require the court submissions from the 'classifying authority; providing that these submissions 'may not be publicly disclosed'; and that any hearing 'must be held in camera'.' According to Milo and Ampofo-Anti, the public gets the wrong end of the stick: the state should be the party that offers justification for maintaining the secrecy of the classified documents.[4]

Milo and Ampofo-Anti analysis also buttresses the claim made above that a POI Act so constructed will clash directly with the Court's principle of open justice: either the courts may, under FC s 173 and other constitutional provisions, control their own processes and the documents in their possession or they may not. As matters currently stands, the Bill and the principle are on a collision course that cannot but result in constitutional litigation that potentially pits the Constitu-

[1] See D Milo and O Ampofo-Anti 'A Baby Step when a Quatum Leap is Needed' Business Day (9 September 2010) available at http://www.businessday.co.za/Articles/Content.aspx?id=122234 (accessed on 11 May 2011).

[2] Milo and Ampofo-Anti (supra).

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

tional Court against the Executive in the never-ending battle between security and liberty that takes place in societies that claim to be 'open and democratic'.

The Freedom of Expression Institute ('FXI') has added its own well-considered criticism to the mix.[1] FXI identifies a number provisions in the Bill as particularly worrisome and suggests a number of positive mechanisms for engagement between the state and the public over ostensibly sensitive documents:

1. The 'double blind provision' is … fundamentally unconstitutional. It invites an element of untruthfulness, equivocation and obstruction of fair and reasonable enquiry. It is virtually impossible to make any reasonable headway in discovering the true state of affairs when such provisions are in operation. The provision allows public servants rights which are directly contradictory to the obligations that the Bill imposes on all citizens not to provide false information to Intelligence Services.
2. The crucial role of the media … will be adversely affected by the omission of a 'public interest clause.' The severe penalties included in the Bill will have a powerful disincentive effect on investigative journalism. It is cold comfort to purport that prosecutions would not be lightly undertaken since the threat constitutes a proper Sword of Damocles.
3. The creation of an Ombud type office would go a long way to allaying the disquiet of the public regarding intelligence affairs. [An] Ombud would [be] a … cost effective method of addressing inquiries and complaints in respect of the status of classified information.[2]

The concerns expressed by HRW, FXI, Milo and Ampofo-Anti constitute neither idle speculation nor overheated rhetoric.[3] They strike, as Jason Brickhill would have it, the proper balance between constitutionally mandated rights of access to various kinds of information and undue interference with the government's discharge of its responsibilities to protect the commonweal. All agree that the need for a post-apartheid era Act is a matter of pressing concern. As HRW noted in its 2011 Country Report on South Africa, government intimidation of journalists has taken on the appearance of official ANC party policy:

> On August 4, 2010, Mzilikazi Wa-Afrika, a prominent journalist with the Sunday Times who had exposed corruption by officials, was arrested without a warrant by 20 policemen in six vans. He was then taken to a secret location in Mpumalanga and interrogated at 2 a.m. without a lawyer. The police also searched his home and took notebooks without a search warrant. Wa-Afrika was eventually released on R5,000 (US$725) bail after his newspaper went to the High Court; the charges cited upon his arrest have since been dropped. The [1] Freedom of Expression Institute 'Comprehensive Submission to the Ad Hoc Committee on Intelligence Legislation in respect of the Protection of Information Bill (20 June 2008) available at www.fxi.org. D Steward 'South Africa's Orwellian Information Bill' PoliticsWeb (14 July 2010) available at www.politicsweb.co.za.

[2] Ibid.

[3] At the time of press, several other prominent voices expressed their opposition to the Bill, including former Intelligence Minister Ronnie Kasrils, the Public Protector, Thuli Mandosela, and ANC-alliance partner COSATU. See South African Press Service 'Rushing Info Bill is Worrying' — Kasrils News24 (1 June 2011) available at www.news24.com/South Africa/Politics/Rushing-info-bill-is-worrying-kasrils-20110601; SAPA 'COSATU: Proposed Info Bill "Goes Against Will of the People"' Mail & Guardian (4 June 2011) available at www.mg.co.zaarticle/2011-06-01-proposed-bill-goes-against-will-of-the-people.

incident heightened fears that such politically motivated intimidation of the press could become the norm if the ANC-proposed tribunal is established.[1]

23B.6 Other Role Players in the Security Sector

(a) The Directorate for Special Operations ('DSO' or 'Scorpions')[2]

The Scorpions were, until 2009, the most 'visible' law enforcement operation in the country. And by visible, I do not mean their 'day-to-day' operations. Rather, the Scorpions made their mark by laying the foundation for the prosecution of a broad array of organized crime syndicates, political officials and prominent private figures.

Jean Redpath, the author of the leading monograph on the activities of the DSO,[3] described the manner in which the DSO decided whether a matter fell within their operational mandate as follows: 'In deciding whether to declare an investigation, … the first criterion [was whether] the matter concerned [fell] within the strategic focus areas of the DSO. The DSO … refined these as being: drug trafficking, organized violence (including taxi violence, urban terror and street gangs), precious metals smuggling, human trafficking, vehicle theft and hijacking syndicates, serious and complex financial crime, and organised public corruption… . A further fourteen general criteria or factors [then had to be] taken into account.'[4] The DSO's broad brief, and the apparent independence with which the DSO operated, garnered significant attention. The DSO initiated or had been drawn into investigations associated with the arms deal, the accusations of bribery surrounding Jacob Zuma, Hout Bay Fishing Industries, Nigerian 419 scams, and high levels of fraud within both the Road Accident Fund and the Land and Agricultural Development Bank of South Africa. Redpath makes out an extremely compelling case for the DSO being quite good at what it was asked to do:

> On average, 90% of cases prosecuted result in convictions. In one region of the DSO, the rate is even higher, at 97%. This suggests that the DSO is astute in choosing to prosecute

[1] Human Rights Watch 'Report on South Africa' Country Reports (2011) available at www.hrw.org (accessed on 1 April 2011.)

[2] The Scorpions had a long, venerable and complicated legislative history. Their first predecessor – The Office for Serious Economic Offences ('OSEO') – was established during 1992 in terms of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act 117 of 1991. The OSEO was then incorporated into the National Prosecuting Authority as an Investigating Directorate in terms of s 43(7) of the Act. Proclamation R123 of 1998, Government Gazette 19579 (4 December 1998) identifies the categories of offences that fall within the mandate of the Investigating Directorate Serious Economic Offences ('IDSEO'). The Investigating Directorate Organised Crime and Public Safety ('IDOC') was established by Presidential Proclamation R102 of 1998, Government Gazette 19372, (16 October 1998). The IDSEO was granted fairly broad discretion to identify and to investigate areas deemed essential for national safety. On 8 July 1999 the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, on behalf of the President, announced the establishment of the DSO. A further Investigating Directorate — the Investigating Directorate Corruption ('IDCOR') – was established in terms of Proclamation R14/2000, Government Gazette 20997 (24 March 2000). The DSO, although able to operate in terms of the other Investigating Directorates, only came into being in terms of a further Amendment to the National Prosecuting Authority Act. R3/2001, Government Gazette 21976 (12 January 2001).

[3] J Redpath The Scorpions: Analysing the Directorate of Special Operations Institute for Security Studies Monograph 96 (March 2004) available at http://www.iss.co.za/uploads/Mono96.pdf (accessed on 7 May 2011).

[4] Ibid at Chapter 6.

> only those cases likely to be successful in court. The data also suggests that the DSO is unlikely to make a frivolous arrest: the ratio of envisaged and finalised prosecutions to arrests is 92%, suggesting that almost all arrests lead to prosecutions. The DSO also appears to have been somewhat restrained in carrying out searches: only 166 searches were conducted, which works out to about one per finalised investigation. Again, this suggests that searches are conducted only where necessary, thereby not squandering resources.[1]

In 2007, I opined that the DSO might find itself the victim of its own success. The high conviction rate and the high profile of its targets led many politicians to call for its incorporation into the SAPS.

The relationship between the DSO and the SAPS was particularly acrimonious. While the reasons given for the disputes vary, most turned on the overlap of their respective jurisdictions.[2] By 2005, the relationship was so severely impaired that the President appointed an independent commission headed by Judge Sisi Khampepe ('Khampepe Commission') to inquire into the mandate and the location of the DSO.[3] The Khampepe Commission was asked specifically for advice as to whether the DSO should be relocated from the NPA and incorporated into the SAPS.[4]

The SAPS contended that the DSO, as an entity carrying out investigations and law enforcement, ought to be located within the SAPS and to operate under the political control of the Minister of Safety and Security. The DSO opposed this suggestion.[5] Other parties drew attention to 'excessive' media attention given to the work of the DSO. Still others complained that the DSO and the NIA failed to cooperate sufficiently with regard to intelligence gathering activities.[6]

Ultimately, the Commission recommended that the DSO remain within the NPA. It found that no constitutional restriction existed on having a law enforcement agency located within the prosecuting authority: the only constitutional imperative was that the prosecuting authority remain independent.[7]

The Commission offered a number of recommendations to improve the working relationship between the DSO and other security agencies. The most significant of these suggestions was that the political responsibility or oversight responsibility for the DSO be shared by the Minister of Safety and Security and the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development. The Minister of Safety and Security would exercise control over the law enforcement component of the DSO's activities. The Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development would

[1] Redpath (supra) at Chapter 7.

[2] P Mashele 'Will the Scorpions Still Sting? The Future of the Directorate of Special Operations' (2006) 17 SA Crim Quarterly 25, 25.

[3] Government Communications 'Statement on the Report of the Khampepe Commission' (29 June 2006) available at www.info.gov.za/speeches/2006/06062915451001.htm (accessed on 22 October 2007).

[4] F Blandy 'Khampepe: Leadership must Walk the Same Walk' Mail & Guardian (13 October 2005) available at http://mg.co.za/article/2005-10-13-khampepe-leadership-must-walk-the-same (accessed on 7 May 2011). See also E Mabuza 'Report on Elite Unit Still with Mbeki' Business Day (19 August 2005) available at http://www.armsdeal-vpo.co.za/articles08/elite_unit.html (accessed on 7 May 2011).

[5] Blandy (supra).

[6] Mashele (supra) at 25–26.

[7] The report is available at http://www.thepresidency.gov.za/docs/reports/khampepe/ (accessed on 7 May 2011).

oversee the DSO's work for the NPA. The Commission further found that the Ministerial Co-Coordinating Committee ('MCC') set up under the NPA Act to co-ordinate the activities of the DSO and the SAPS was not functioning properly. It recommended that a new committee be set up to support the MCC.

With regard to the SAPS, the Khampepe Commission recommended that the SAPS's investigations and law enforcement capacity be enhanced so that it possessed capacity comparable to that of the DSO. The Commission was critical of the DSO's media strategy and recommended that the organisation should refrain from publicising its investigations in a manner that could be prejudicial to the rights of the person under investigation. The Commission also recommended that the Independent Complaints Directorate be empowered to receive and to investigate complaints against the DSO.[1]

The recommendations of the Khampepe Commission were approved and accepted by Cabinet and the National Security Council.[2] But the acceptance and approval of the Commission's recommendations proved hollow indeed. A resolution of the African National Congress' December 2007 National Conference in Polokwane called for the dissolution of the DSO. The ANC-led government ultimately disbanded the DSO in 2009. The National Prosecuting Authority Amendment Act,[3] assented to on 27 January 2009, repealed the enabling provisions that had created the DSO.[4] The DSO was replaced with the Directorate of Priority Crimes Investigation ('DPCI' or 'Hawks') through amendments to the NPA Act and the SAPS Act.

Was the DSO a 'victim of its own success'? While one would rather not entertain idle speculation, the series of events described above — from the Polokwane Conference to the (ignored) Khampepe Commission report to the subsequent disbandment of the DSO — suggest, at the very least, government discomfort with the DSO method of operation and its targets. Moreover, while the Constitutional Court is in no position, as an institutional matter, to discuss the 'naked preferences' that may have motivated the dissolution of the DSO, its finding in Glenister II that the subsequent creation of the DPCI failed to meet the constitutional desiderata and the demand for an effective independent law enforcement unit lend some support for the view that the DSO was, in fact, a victim of its own success at rooting out public and private corruption.

(b) Directorate of Priority Crimes Investigation ('DPCI' or 'Hawks')

(i) Powers and Functions of the DPCI

The DPCI was created shortly after the dissolution of the DSO through an amendment to the SAPS Act.[5] The DPCI was quite consciously designed to assume the [1] Government Communications 'Statement on the report of the Khampepe Commission' (29 June 2006). www.info.gov.za/speeches/2006/06062915451001.htm (accessed on 22 October 2007).

[2] Ibid.
[3] Act 56 of 2008.
[4] Preamble.
[5] SAPS Amendment Act 57 of 2008.

'powers, investigations, assets, budget and liabilities of the DSO'.[1] It would be, however, incorrect to infer from the words of the SAPS Amendment Act that the DPCI is identical in function and power to the DSO. The pertinent differences between the two entities are made clear in the Constitutional Court's judgments in Glenister I and Glenister II.

(ii) Glenister I: Not ripe enough[2]

The Glenister litigation began in 2008 when Hugh Glenister, a South African businessman, challenged a bill tabled in Cabinet designed to disband the DSO. Glenister's initial challenge in the North Gauteng High Court was dismissed on 27 May 2008.[3] The High Court held that it did not have jurisdiction to hear the matter. Glenister then appealed directly to the Constitutional Court.

The Chief Justice in Glenister I requested argument solely on one point: '[W]hether, in the light of the doctrine of the separation of powers, it is appropriate for this Court, in all the circumstances, to make any order setting aside the decision of the National Executive that is challenged in this case.'[4] The case turned almost entirely on the timing of the application. That is, the Constitutional Court expressed concern about its involvement in the legislative process prior before a bill was enacted as an Act of Parliament. The Glenister I Court held that such abstract review should occur only on exceptional occasions and that intervention would only be appropriate 'if an applicant can show that there would be no effective remedy available to him or her once the legislative process is complete, as the unlawful conduct will have achieved its object in the course of the process. The applicant must show that the resultant harm will be material and irreversible.'[5] That standard was not met. The legislation could always be challenged after it was enacted.

Given that Glenister I has been supplanted by Glenister II, and that the Glenister I Court, following Doctors for Life, was absolutely correct for dismissing the claims before they were ripe, one might be inclined to overlook (entirely) the Glenister I Court's refusal to engage the substantive grounds for the action. In addition to timing issues, the Glenister I Court was asked to address substantive concerns regarding the status of ostensibly 'independent' entities — such as the DSO — under the Final Constitution and the extent to which such entities could be undermined by a dominant political party. The question can hardly be said to be new. In the Court's ur-text — Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (First Certification Judgment)[6] – the most

[1] Preamble.

[2] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 287 (CC), 2009 (2) BCLR 136 (CC), [2008] ZACC 19 ('Glenister I').

[3] [2008] ZAGPHC 143.

[4] Ibid at para 9.

[5] Ibid at para 43.

[6] 1996 (4) 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ('First Certification Judgment'). See also Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 24 ('Second Certification Judgment').

important grounds for refusing certification of the Constitutional Assembly's New (Constitutional) Text were that the New Text failed to vouchsafe the independence of such entities as the Auditor-General and the Public Protector and fell short with respect to the special majority amendment requirements necessary to protect the Bill of Rights. Both shortcomings were deemed to undermine the 34 Constitutional Principles' clear commitment to a constitutional democracy based upon the rule of law and constitutional supremacy. When the question of the politicization of independent organs of state such as the DSO was put before the Glenister I Court, it offered a somewhat puzzling answer:

> The role of this Court is established in the Constitution. It may not assume powers that are not conferred upon it. Moreover, the considerations raised by the UDM do not establish that irreversible and material harm will eventuate should the Court not intervene at this stage.[1]

Again: the issue here is not about timing — for the Court's approach is irreproachable on that score. However, it did feel obliged to respond to the quite brazen formulation of the problem by the United Democratic Movement: the Constitutional Court must act 'because nobody else will'.[2]

(iii) Between Glenister I and Glenister II: Legality, rationality review and an anti-domination doctrine

As Jason Brickhill and others have asked, what if the Glenister I Court had been in a position to address the substantive concerns raised by the United Democratic Movement? For starters, as Theunis Roux has repeatedly made clear, the Court in such a charged case would have had to navigate between the Scylla of principal and Charybdis of pragmatism in order to maintain its moral, social, political and institutional legitimacy. [3] But, of course, that would only be a start. Had it concluded that a principled basis existed for the challenge, it would have had to identify the constitutional principle that would support such a challenge. Brickhill suggests that one consequence of a successful constitutional challenge — again assuming the time was right — might have been a more robust conception of the legality doctrine and rationality review. That contention, it turns out, is not an idle arm-chair rumination. Support for Brickhill's intuition pump can be found in recent work by Sujit Choudhry on constitutional courts that operate in a one party dominant democracy. Choudhry's arguments amplify many of Roux's points on the challenges that face our Constitutional Court in our 'one party dominant democracy'.[4] In his analysis of South Africa's Constitutional Court and similarly situated apex courts, Choudhry begins by noting that a social-liberal constitutional

[1] Glenister I (supra) at para 43.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See T Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International Journal of Constitutional Law 106. See also See T Roux The Politics of Principle: The First South African Constitutional Court 1995-2005 (forthcoming 2012); F Michelman 'On the Uses of Interpretive Charity: Some Notes on Application, Avoidance, Equality and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1.

[4] S Choudhry '"He had a mandate": The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in a Dominant Party Democracy' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 1.

system characterised by the (largely unopposed) dominance of a single party over the political system almost invariably suffers from a common mix of pathologies — from rent-seeking behaviour, corruption in the public domain and the private domain and the use of the political dominance for the economic gain of the party and its further entrenchment as the only party in town.[1] Choudhry does not deny the difficulties faced by constitutional courts that operate in such a political environment. Instead, he identifies legal strategies that can be deployed by a court faced with blatant abuses of power and furtive attempts to skirt the dictates of the basic law. A court with constitutional jurisdiction might well expand its actual jurisdiction by relying, as I noted above, on the kind of rule of law arguments that drove the Constitutional Court's conclusions in the First Certification Judgment and in subsequent path-breaking 'legality doctrine' decisions in Fedsure[2] and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers.[3] The rationality arguments that underpin the legality doctrine are narrow enough so that it can accommodate allegations of corruption without appearing to unnecessarily intrude on domains that clearly remain within executive and legislative prerogatives.[4] Choudhry describes this new spin on the legality doctrine as an 'anti-domination doctrine':

> Anti-domination is a doctrine that would render illegitimate any exercise of public power that has as its principal goal the preservation, enhancement or entrenchment of the dominant status of a dominant political party. Deliberate attempts to co-opt and fragment the opposition are two examples of measures that would trigger the operation of the doctrine, although a range of different policies might achieve the same end. The focus is on the purpose underlying the challenged measure. The doctrinal roots of the anti-domination doctrine accordingly lie in the doctrine of rationality.[5]

In brief, the doctrine of rationality emerged from the jurisprudence on the principle of legality, which holds that 'the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law'. (Although originally set out by the Constitutional Court under the Interim Constitution, the principle of legality was later held to operate under the terms of the Final Constitution.) The principle applies to both the legislature and the executive — that is, to primary legislation and the whole range of exercises of public power (eg, promulgation of

[1] For an 'only game in town' case, see United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1086 (CC), [2002] ZACC 21.

[2] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC); 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1999] ZACC 17 at para 58 (Applies the principle of legality to: (a) 'the legislature … in every sphere'; and (b) for each kind of administrative decision to which applicable.)

[3] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241(CC), [2000] ZACC 1 (Applies legality to all executive action).

[4] For more on the possibilities of the legality doctrine and the rationality doctrine, see M Bishop 'Rationality is Dead! Long Live Rationality! Saving Rational Basis Review' (2010) 25(2) SAPL 313; A Price 'The Content and Justification of Rationality Review' (2010) 25(2) SAPL 346; M Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? The Listening Constitution and Merafong v President of the Republic of South Africa' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 313; A Price 'Rationality Review of Legislative and Executive Decisions: Poverty Alleviation Network and Albutt' (2010) 127 SALJ 580.

[5] Choudhry (supra) at 34-35.

secondary legislation, exercise of statutory discretion) undertaken by the executive. The doctrine of rationality is one limb of the principle of legality, and at its core, bars arbitrary state action. At its most abstract level, the requirement of rationality, or non-arbitrariness, holds that all public power must be rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. But the heart of rationality review, as Michael Bishop has argued, is a commitment to root out improper motives, either by holding that the stated motive is illegitimate, or by determining that the stated motive is not the true motive.[1] Spun out as a test of the exercise of public power, rationality review should be understood to have two limbs. As Choudhry notes:

> The first is a requirement of means-ends rationality: that a public power be exercised for the purpose for which it was given. If the means chosen do not further the stated objective, then the measure is arbitrary or irrational. The second is a requirement that the purpose for which power has been exercised itself be legitimate. These two limbs are analytically distinct. The means chosen may further an end that is illegitimate; or the means may fail to further a legitimate end. But the two dimensions of arbitrariness are closely related in practice. In situations where there is a poor fit between means and ends, this is often because the reason proffered in support of a measure is pretextual, and that the true reason for the measure is to be found elsewhere. This true reason has been concealed, because it is illegitimate. The search for a rational relationship between means and ends often culminates in exposing an ulterior motive.'[2]

Clearly then, rationality review can be employed to expose 'naked preferences' and attempts by a dominant party to further entrench its power.

The facts of NICRO provide a good example. At issue was a denial of the right to vote to prisoners who were imprisoned without the option of a fine. The reasons advanced in support of the denial of the right to vote were the logistical challenges and expense involved in arranging for special voting facilities (eg mobile voting stations) for those prisoners. But as the Court pointed out, there were two categories of prisoners who retained the right to vote — those who were incarcerated because of their failure to pay a fine, and those awaiting sentence — on whose behalf precisely such arrangements had to be made at the same facilities which housed the excluded prisoners. The government failed to adduce evidence regarding the additional logistical and financial hurdles associated with expanding these arrangements to encompass the excluded prisoners. The objective offered by the government was a pretext. The real justification for the measure was to dispel the 'concern that if prisoners are allowed to vote that will send a message to the public that the government is soft on crime'.[3] The Court rightly deemed this motive to be an illegitimate purpose.

Had the Glenister I Court possessed jurisdiction to hear the untimely matter, it might been alive to legality doctrine concerns. It might then have developed an anti-domination conception of the principle of legality that would not have allowed the country to be left without an independent anti-corruption unit for almost three years. That's not how matters panned out, however. Instead, the Court revisited Glenister I's original concerns in Glenister II.

[1] Bishop 'Rationality is Dead! Long Live Rationality! Saving Rational Basis Review' (supra).

[2] Choudhry (supra) at 35-36 citing, in particular, Y Dawood 'The Anti-domination Model and the Judicial Oversight of Democracy' (2008) 96 Georgetown Law Journal 1411 and Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC), [2004] ZACC 10.

[3] Choudhry (supra) at 36.

(iv) Glenister II: Rights, duties, international law, reasonableness review and a principle of anti-corruption[1]

The laws contested in Glenister I were ultimately enacted. Glenister then renewed his challenge. The High Court dismissed the application for lack of jurisdiction.[2] However, it did so on a palpably erroneous interpretation of FC s 167(4)(e). Glenister then appealed to the Constitutional Court. In total, the applicant challenged the impugned laws on five different grounds:

(1) The laws were irrational;
(2) The flawed public participation process that preceded the passing of the two Acts;
(3) The laws were structural unconstitutional because they undermined the NPA and the functions of the NDPP.
(4) The laws infringed the bill of rights;
(5) The laws violated South Africa's international treaty obligations.

Glenister II is an extraordinary judgment. The Court unanimously rejected the challenges based on rationality,[3] public participation[4] and structural unconstitutionality.[5] But the majority's judgment[6] upheld Glenister's challenge on a mix of grounds 4 and 5. In sum, the majority found that both the Constitution as a whole and South Africa's commitments based on international law required that the security services possess the necessary degree of independence to root out corruption. The majority held that the Hawks were not sufficiently independent and that the state had therefore failed to fulfil its duty under FC s 7(2) to respect, protect and promote the rights in the Bill of Rights.

Although the majority opinion does not track Choudhry's deft analysis of both the constitutional text and the Court's own precedent, its message is much the same. Our constitutional regime, with its commitment to the rule of law and the protection of basic fundamental rights, will not tolerate the capture of its police force by a single party. The police, as a creature of the Constitution, must serve the people of South Africa by upholding the various provisions of the Constitution without fear, favour or prejudice. The critical paragraph in the opinion penned by Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke and Justice Cameron reads as follows:

[1] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II').

[2] Glenister v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others [2009] ZAWCHC 1.

[3] Glenister II (supra) at paras 55-70.

[4] Ibid at paras 23-39.

[5] Ibid at paras 71-82.

[6] Froneman, Nkabinde and Skweyiya JJ concurred with the majority. Ngcobo CJ wrote the dissenting judgment (although it is the majority judgment for all the other issues) in which Mogoeng and Yacoob JJ and Brand AJ concurred.

> That the Republic is bound under international law to create an anti-corruption unit with appropriate independence is of the foremost interpretive significance in determining whether the state has fulfilled its duty to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights, as section 7(2) requires. Section 7(2) implicitly demands that the steps the state takes must be reasonable. To create an anti-corruption unit that is not adequately independent would not constitute a reasonable step. In reaching this conclusion, the fact that section 231(2) provides that an international agreement that Parliament ratifies 'binds the Republic' is of prime significance. It makes it unreasonable for the state, in fulfilling its obligations under section 7(2), to create an anti-corruption entity that lacks sufficient independence.[1]

Much will be made of the novel use of FC s 7(2) to find a statute unconstitutional. It is somewhat disconcerting given that the majority identifies a panoply of rights, several paragraphs later, that have been violated by the legislation under attack:

> [The] failure on the part of the state to create a sufficiently independent anti-corruption entity infringes a number of rights. These include the rights to equality, human dignity, freedom and security of the person, administrative justice and socio-economic rights, including the rights to education, housing, and health care.[2]

One can be forgiven for thinking that straightforward fundamental rights analysis might have done all the heavy lifting necessary in order to find the laws in question infirm. (It seems fair to ask, on the other hand, whether the analysis of any given right would have yielded even a prima facie violation: rights to equality before the law and freedom and security of the person might have shouldered such a load.) Likewise, much will be made of the use (or misuse) of international law in both judgments: the Court seems content to treat international law as an aid to constitutional interpretation in terms of FC s 39. However, the judgment possesses moments in which the majority appears to conflate the binding of the Republic by international agreement (FC s 231(2)) with the incorporation of international law into municipal law (FC s 231(4)). Such moments suggest that the Court may have mistakenly made too much of international law rather than too little. Such criticism — while formally correct, and worthy of the Court's consideration in future cases — misses the dramatic constitutional developments contemplated by Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke and Justice Cameron.

---

[1] Glenister II (supra) at para 194. The minority opinion, authored by Chief Justice Ncgobo, in canvassing the same terrain reaches a different conclusion with respect to the need for genuine (politically uninflected) independence of the police force:

> Yet more insight is gained by comparing the relative level of political insularity called for by the Constitution with respect to different governmental institutions. The courts, for example, are required to be "independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice." The prosecuting authority, on the other hand, must exercise its functions "without fear, favour or prejudice." By contrast, the constitutional provisions related to the police service are silent as to the need for the service to operate either independently or without fear, favour or prejudice. This distinction is drawn not to support a conclusion that the police, or a specialised unit within the police, may lawfully operate with fear, favour and prejudice. Far from it. The distinction is significant merely because it reflects the Constitution's determination as to the appropriate level of independence from the political system of particular governmental institutions. These determinations must be kept in mind in assessing the specific provisions of the SAPS Act.

Glenister II (supra) at para 131.

[2] Ibid at para 198.

In a form of analysis strikingly similar to the logic employed to develop the principle of legality and the rule of law doctrine, the majority rely on the structure and the basic commitments of the Constitution as a whole. The Bill of Rights, duties imposed upon the state to protect, respect, promote and fulfil those rights, international agreements that require South Africa to possess independent police and prosecutorial entities capable of fighting corruption and positive duties imposed upon the police 'to prevent, combat and investigate crime, to main public order, to protect and secure the inhabitants of the Republic and their protect, and to uphold and enforce the law' (FC s 205) constitute a constellation of constitutional obligations out of which the majority tease out a principle of anti-corruption. So while the Court unanimously found that rationality review was not up to the challenge of finding the apposite provisions of the NPA Act and SAPS Act unconstitutional,[1] the majority do think, as does Choudhry, that the Constitution (read as a whole) is committed to 'anti-domination, anti-corruption, anti-capture, non-usurpation, anti-seizure, and anti-centralisation.'[2] In Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke and Justice Cameron's words:

> The Constitution is the primal source for the duty of the state to fight corruption. It does not in express terms command that a corruption-fighting unit should be established. Nor does it prescribe operational and other attributes, should one be established. There is however no doubt that its scheme taken as a whole imposes a pressing duty on the state to set up a concrete and effective mechanism to prevent and root out corruption and cognate corrupt practices. As we have seen, corruption has deleterious effects on the foundations of our constitutional democracy and on the full enjoyment of fundamental rights and freedoms. It disenables the state from respecting, protecting, promoting and fulfilling them as required by section 7(2) of the Constitution.[3]

The majority found five fatal constitutional flaws in the statutory construction of the DPCI. First, unlike their predecessors in the DSO, the members of the DCPI do not enjoy security of tenure. Second, their remuneration and their conditions of service are subject to the whims of the Minister.[4] Third, the DPCI's activities are co-ordinated by a ministerial committee composed of members of Cabinet. The committee determines the policy guidelines for the DPCI. As the Court notes: 'The guidelines could, thus, specify categories of offences that it is not appropriate for the DPCI to investigate — or, conceivably, categories of political office-bearers whom the DPCI is prohibited from investigating.'[5] Fourth, the committee also has the power to engage in hands-on supervision. While the majority accepts that 'financial and political accountability of executive and administrative functions requires ultimate oversight by the executive[,] … the power given to senior political executives to determine policy guidelines … lays the ground for an almost inevitable intrusion into the core function of the new entity by senior politicians, when that intrusion is itself inimical to independence.'[6] Finally, given

[1] Glenister II (supra) at paras 55-70.
[2] Choudhry (supra) at 34.
[3] Glenister II (supra) at para 175.
[4] Ibid at paras 217-227.
[5] Ibid at para 230.
[6] Ibid at para 236.

the lack of independence granted the DPCI under the NPA Act and SAPS Act, and the potential for its capture without such independence, it follows for the majority that the DPCI cannot discharge its constitutional obligation to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

Having found the enabling provisions for the DPCI constitutionally infirm, it does not follow that the majority's opinion requires the resurrection of the DSO. The Court afforded Parliament 18 months to promulgate legislation that creates an independent police task force capable of combating corruption in all sectors of South African society. The new entity may still be housed in the SAPS. However, it must then possess the specific attributes of independence that the Court holds the Constitution to require.

This decision is not, as Pierre de Vos would have it, an outright victory for the poor.[1] (That this 'structural' constitutional argument services any discernable commitment to immediate basic service delivery (when no breach of any specific fundamental rights has been found) seems implausible.) But it does signal a willingness on the part of the Constitutional Court to push back against a government rightly beleaguered by charges of rampant corruption and a failure to make good on the promise of liberation.[2] Such a reading fits a Rouxian understanding of a pragmatic Court that knows exactly when to take a principled stand.[3]

(c) Electronic Communications (Pty) Ltd ('Comsec')

The Electronic Communications (Pty) Ltd Act ('Comsec Act')[4] establishes a communications company wholly owned by the state and commonly known as Comsec. Comsec's primary function is to cater for the electronic communications security needs of the state.[5] With the state as its only shareholder, Comsec is controlled by a board of directors appointed by the Minister of Intelligence. The

[1] P de Vos 'Glenister: A Monumental Judgment in Defense of the Poor' (18 March 2011) available at http://constitutionallyspeaking.co.za/glenister-a-monumental-judgment-in-defense-of-the-poor/ (accessed on 9 May 2011) ('If one understood that section 7(2) … requires the state to respect protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights' it becomes clear that the failure on the part of the state to create a sufficiently independent anti-corruption entity infringes on the rights to equality, human dignity, security of the person, administrative justice and socio-economic rights – including the rights to education, housing, and health. Corruption was there an assault on the poor and those who suffered from discrimination in the past.')

[2] Have other courts picked up the scent? On 1 June 2011, the Supreme Court of Appeal ordered the Public Protector to re-open an inquiry into 'Oilgate' on the grounds that the previous inquiry was 'cursory' at best. Public Prosecutor v Mail & Guardian [2011] ZASCA 108 (Nugent J's strongly worded judgment suggests a complete abdication of responsibility by the previous Public Protector and accused him of 'disemboweling the complaints right from the start'.

[3] For a slightly more extended engagement with Choudhry and the degree to which we can, and should, tease out an 'anti-domination doctrine' from Glenister II, see M Bishop & N Raboshakga 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS3, May 2011) Chapter 17. Moreover, it is important to note that not everyone would describe Glenister II as a principled stand. As Michael Bishop notes, we might like the outcome (as opposed to the argument) in Glenister II, but that does not make the majority's conclusions any more principled than the conclusions arrived at by Chief Justice Ncgobo when writing for the Glenister II minority.

[4] Act 68 of 2002.

[5] Comsec Act ss 3 and 4(2).

Minister of Intelleigence also appoints a Chief Executive Officer to manage the affairs of the company.[1]

Comsec's core business is the provision, the development and the vetting of systems designed to protect the electronic communications of organs of state against unauthorised access.[2] Its principle clients are government departments and organs of state.

Comsec is funded in two primary ways: by budgetary allocations made by Parliament and by payments for services it renders to government departments and organs of state.[3] The financial affairs of Comsec are reviewed annually by the Auditor General. Comsec's CEO is also required to prepare an annual report in accordance with the Public Finance Management Act for review by the Minister of Intelligence and the JSCI.[4]

(d) National communications centre ('NCC')

Despite its rather benign designation, the NCC is responsible for the coordination of all of the government's communication interception activities. Among other things, the NCC plays a role in the development of technology to be used for this purpose. The NCC also provides advice to the Minister for Intelligence Services on matters related to signals intelligence procurement, management and direction.[5]

(e) Office for interception centres ('OIC')

The Regulation of Interception of Communications and Provision of Communication Related Information Act is the enabling legislation for the OIC.[6] The OIC 'reports to the Minister for Intelligence Services' and 'provides a centralised interception service to law enforcement agencies involved in combating threats to national security.'[7]

[1] Comsec Act ss 8 and 13.

[2] Comsec Act s 7.

[3] Comsec Act s 18(1) and (2).

[4] Comsec Act s 18(10).

[5] Information on the NCC is available at http://www.intelligence.gov.za/Functions/national_communications_centre.htm (accessed on 6 November 2007).

[6] Act 70 of 2002.

[7] The tasks of interception and collation of data had previously been undertaken by the Law Enforcement Agency (LEA). The ostensible motivation for the creation of the OIC was improved management of interception, minimal duplication of resources, and increased control over state-sponsored interception.

23C War Powers

Stephen Ellmann

23C.1	Introduction	23C–1
23C.2	Procedural requirements for a State of National Defence	23C–4
23C.3	Powers granted by the Declaration of a State of National Defence	23C–9
	(a) Presidential powers in a state of national defence	23C–9
	(b) Parliament's authority to limit the President's powers	23C–11
	(c) Limits on human rights during a state of national defence	23C–13
23C.4	Hostilities without a Declaration of a State of National Defence	23C–17
23C.5	Power of the purse: Parliament's budgetary powers	23C–21
23C.6	War powers as constitutionally exceptional powers	23C–26

23C.1 INTRODUCTION*

It may seem strange to inquire into the nature of war powers under South Africa's Constitution[1] — for surely South Africa is not a nation that considers itself embarked on a policy of war. The topic is important nonetheless.

As a matter of principle, there are few greater destroyers of rights, or creators of utter and arbitrary inequality, than war. It demands that soldiers kill, sacrifices others, and potentially rips apart the fabric of civil society. The power to make war is the power to protect and to destroy perhaps the most fundamental right of all: the right to live in an ordered society. A state that leaves this power loosely governed is a state where rights are not entirely secure, no matter how extensively that state protects rights in situations short of war.

Nor are these abstract considerations for South Africa. South Africa is not a warlike state, but it is, compared to other nations in Africa, a well-armed state.[2] Its spending to maintain that military strength is at the heart of a bribery scandal that threatened to derail Jacob Zuma's candidacy for President and may taint others as well.[3] Its troops are already serving, or have served, in peace-keeping or election-support missions in several other African states: Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), the Comoros, Côte d'Ivoire, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Lesotho, Liberia, Mozambique, Sudan (Darfur), and Uganda; South African forces have ventured as far as Nepal.[4] Some, fortunately a small

* This chapter is a revised version of an essay originally published as Stephen Ellmann 'War Powers under the South African Constitution' in Penelope Andrews & Susan Bazilli (eds) Law and Rights: Global Perspectives on Constitutionalism and Governance (2008) Chapter 19. Earlier drafts were presented at conferences at the University of KwaZulu-Natal and the University of Florida, and I thank the conference organizers for those opportunities and the participants, as well as other readers, for their helpful comments. Thanks also to Sarah Valentine (now at CUNY School of Law) and Michael McCarthy of New York Law School's Mendik Law Library for their timely help with research.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] While recognizing that South Africa is a peaceful state, we should not overlook the considerable military force it is accumulating. See, for example, Shaun Benton 'First of SA's Three New Submarines Cruises into Simonstown After 49-Day Voyage' AllAfrica.com (7 April 2006)(available on Westlaw WIRES database).

[3] See, for example, Mandy Rossouw, Matuma Letsoalo & Rapule Tabane, 'Mbeki Faces Amnesty Pressure' Mail & Guardian Online (20 March 2008), available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=335115&area=/insight/insight__national/; 'Cabinet Dismisses Arms-Deal Allegations Against Mbeki' Mail & Guardian Online (20 March 2008), available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=335107&area=/breaking_news/breaking_news__national/; Sam Sole & Stefaans Brummer, 'Arms Broker Did Give Cash to the ANC' Mail & Guardian Online (14 March 2008), available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=334629&area=/insight/insight__national/(all accessed on 20 April 2008).

[4] 'Foreword by the Honourable MGP Lekota, Minister of Defence' Department of Defence Annual Report FY 2006 — 2007 (2007) xiii-xiv, available at http://www.info.gov.za/annualreport/2006/defence_annual_rpt07.pdf (accessed on 20 April 2008); Parliamentary Monitoring Group 'Transformation Management Developments; SANDF Deployment to West Indies, Nepal, Mozambique', available at http://www.pmg.org.za/node/9056 (accessed on 20 April 2008); Mosiuoa Lekota 'Address by the Minister of Defence, the Honourable Mosiuoa Lekota, at Media Breakfast at the Defence Headquarters, Pretoria' (5 September 2005), available at http://www.info.gov.za/speeches/2005/05090712451003.htm (accessed on 3 March 2007); Clive Ndou 'South Africa Beefs Up Peace Missions in Africa' AllAfrica.com (23 March 2006), available at http://www.buanews.gov.za/view.php?ID=06032311151002&coll=buanew06 (accessed on 7 July 2009). SANDF troops have also been employed in the Central African Republic. Shaun Benton 'South Africa: Cabinet Approves number, have died in combat outside its borders (in an intervention in Lesotho in 1998 and more recently in the DRC.[1]) War is not entirely absent from South Africa's politics. South Africa's peacekeeping efforts in fact have stretched the nation's current military resources,[2] and the goal of establishing an African Union peacekeeping force will certainly call on South African resources as well.[3]

The Final Constitution addresses the possibility of war, and the deployment of troops, but not at great length. The brevity of these provisions is entirely understandable. South Africa's constitution writers — like their counterparts in every nation — wrote a constitution not for abstract review but for the governance of their nation with its particular and painful history. The legacy of human rights abuses, especially in states of emergency, was fresh in the drafters' minds. They addressed these dangers in detail in the new Constitution, but they did not envision their renewed country as a war-making state. Perhaps they also did not expect that the new South Africa would play as active a role as it does in deploying military force on behalf of peace — a constructive and admirable role, but one not without risks.

War is hell. It is also extremely hard to govern constitutionally. The pressures of military necessity drive the meaning of constitutional language in ways that only experience may fully reveal. South Africa so far has, happily, had little occasion to encounter these questions in its own governance. But war is a great danger, even in a country that takes pride in its commitments to peace. While this chapter SANDF Deployment in Uganda' BuaNews (Tshwane) (20 March 2008), available at http://allafrica.com/stories/printable/200803200328.html (accessed on 27 Sept 2009).

[1] At least nine South African soldiers died in the intervention in Lesotho in 1998. Suzanne Daley 'How Did Pretoria Err? Lesotho Counts the Ways' New York Times (27 September 1998) 16. Ten have died in the Democratic Republic of the Congo more recently, mostly not in combat. See Boyd Webb 'Defence Chief Visits Injured Soldiers' SAPA (10 June 2004); 'Five of Six Soldiers Drowned in DRCongo to Be Buried Saturday' SAPA (16 April 2004); 'Full Military Honours for SANDF Soldier Killed in DRC' SAPA (6 April 2004); 'South Africa: Army to Investigate Officer's Death' UN Integrated Regional Information Networks (31 March 2004)(all available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

[2] These resources have also been affected by AIDS. An estimated 23 % of SANDF troops — and perhaps more — are HIV positive. Xan Rice 'South African Army Facing HIV Crisis' The Times (UK) (19 August 2004)(all available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

[3] See Peter Honey 'Defence. Battle for Force Readiness' Financial Mail (16 September 2005) 46 (available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database); Shaun Benton 'Darfur Peace Mission Is Hurting AU, SA, Financially' AllAfrica.com (16 March 2006), available at http://www.buanews.gov.za/view.php?ID=06031616151004&coll=buanew06 (accessed on 7 July 2009). In 1999, South Africa anticipated employing one battalion in peacekeeping operations outside its borders at any one time. See Department of Foreign Affairs White Paper on South African Participation in International Peace Missions ('White Paper on Peace Missions')(approved by Cabinet, 21 October 1998; tabled in Parliament, 24 February 1999), 25 available at http://www.info.gov.za/view/DownloadFileAction?id=70438 (accessed on 27 September 2009). A battalion 'is made up of between 700 and 1200 personnel and support staff, as well as weaponry and transport'. Prakash Naidoo 'African Peacekeeping Force. SA Stretched to Its Limits' Financial Mail (18 June 2004) 24 (available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database). In 2004-05, South Africa had approximately three battalions, rather than one, stationed in other nations on such missions. Ibid. South African troops are also part of the Southern African Development Community 'stand-by brigade', officially launched in 2007 and part of the larger African Union stand-by force. See David Masango 'Southern Africa: Stand-By Brigade to Maintain Peace in SADC' BuaNews (Tshwane)(17 August 2007), available at http://allafrica.com/stories/20070817075.html (accessed on 27 September 2009).

offers few prescriptions, it aims to provide a guide to the interpretation of those constitutional provisions governing this nation's powers of war.

It should surprise no one that South Africa's constitutional provisions dealing with war and fighting have some ambiguities — all texts have some ambiguities. I do not mean to score debater's points by highlighting linguistic possibilities that may be grammatically coherent but are inconsistent with the fundamental themes of the Final Constitution. On the contrary, where ambiguity in specific clauses can be interpreted by reference to general principles of South African constitutional law, I hope to do just that.

Three such general principles are particularly important. First, and most fundamental, all acts of the South African government are subject to the Final Constitution. The notion of war powers that are wholly beyond the reach of judicial review is implausible.[1] Moreover, the protection of human rights is an absolutely integral part of the South African constitutional order.[2] Second, the Final Constitution contains a specific commitment to subject military power to law. The Final Constitution declares that the security services (including military, police and intelligence services) 'must act … in accordance with the Constitution and the law'.[3] This provision is not just an abstract sentiment. The issue of the armed forces' loyalty during the constitutional transition was both critical and delicate for the negotiating parties.[4] Third, the Final Constitution rejects the idea that war is the province of the executive alone. FC s 198(d) lays out, as one of the 'governing principles' for the security services, that '[n]ational security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive'.[5]

As important as these general principles are, however, they do not remove the need to look carefully at the specific provisions of the Final Constitution that deal with war. We will first look at the provisions governing the declaration

[1] See, for example, Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 78 (Chaskalson CJ). However, where issues primarily for other branches are involved — as is surely the case with foreign affairs and war — the Courts' review will be relatively more deferential. Ibid at para 244 (O'Regan J). I am grateful to a reader for calling this decision to my attention.

[2] Ibid at para 66 (Chaskalson CJ); para 159 (Ngcobo J); para 221 (O'Regan J). See FC s 7(2), '[t]he state must respect, protect, promote, and fulfill the rights in the Bill of Rights'.

[3] FC s 199(5). See generally South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC)(both examining the constitutional rights of members of the South African National Defence Force). For more on the security services, see O Ampofo-Anti, K Robinson & S Woolman 'Security Services' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 23B. (Ed.)

[4] See Nico Steytler & Johann Mettler 'Federal Arrangements as a Peacemaking Device During South Africa's Transition to Democracy' Publius (1 October 2001) 93, 95-96. Assuring the military's loyalty to civilian rule is essential in any democracy, and may still require attention in South Africa. See Max du Preez 'SANDF is a Crumbling Excuse for an Army: Strong Leadership and Discipline Are Needed to Validate This Force and Massive Expenditure' Daily News (14 February 2008), available at http://www.dailynews.co.za/index.php?fArticleId=4253049 (accessed on 7 July 2009). Indeed, an August 2009 demonstration by unionized soldiers prompted government accusations of 'mutiny'. 'Zuma: Unions can't control the army' Mail & Guardian Online (17 September 2009), available at http://www.mg.co.za/article/2009-09-17-zuma-unions-cant-control-the-army (accessed on 28 September 2009).

[5] Moreover, the Final Constitution provides that '[t]o give effect to the principles of transparency and accountability, multi-party parliamentary committees must have oversight of all security services'. FC s 199(8).

of a state of national defence — the clearest route provided by the Final Constitution for South Africa to enter or to initiate a war. As we will find, the procedural requirements for such declarations are distinctly less demanding than those governing the declaration of a state of emergency. At the same time, the substantive powers conferred on the President by such a declaration — though not beyond Parliament's authority to regulate — are potentially far-reaching, both in military terms and in terms of their impact on at least some human rights. Next, we will ask whether South Africa can become involved in military action without a declaration of a state of national defence. The answer seems to be 'yes'. Moreover, it appears that the President has the authority to initiate a range of potentially risky military involvements without any direct approval by Parliament — although, again Parliament may approve or disapprove this decision, if it so chooses. Finally, in light of the extent of military and Presidential authority that this analysis has identified, the chapter will consider the role of Parliament's power over the budget as a check, albeit an imperfect one, on executive military decisions.

23C.2 The Procedural Requirements for a State of National Defence

The Final Constitution gives no explicit power to anyone to declare 'war'. Perhaps such an authority is still implicit in the general powers of the President and Parliament, but probably not. Instead, it appears that the Final Constitution's drafters carefully avoided giving the nation a power to declare war, and instead gave it a power to declare a 'state of national defence'.[1] Does this mean that South Africa cannot fight a war, or engage its troops in combat 'hostilities'?[2] Surely not. There is no sign that South Africa chose to abandon its military when it abolished apartheid, and a country with a military is a country prepared, at least in some circumstances, to fight. If the country were to be attacked, then the declaration of a state of national defence must have been intended to serve as a means for [1] FC s 203. This language may owe something to the German Constitution's provision for declaration of a 'state of defence', though the relevant South African and German sections differ in many ways. See generally Grundgesetz arts. 115a-115l (available in English translation at http://www.psr.keele.ac.uk/docs/german.htm) (accessed on 15 September 2006). The same may be said of the Namibian Constitution. See Constitution of the Republic of Namibia 1990 art 24, reprinted in Gisbert H Flanz (ed) & Patricie H. Ward (assoc ed) Constitutions of the Countries of the World [Namibia] (2003) 19-20. In any event, as a reader pointed out to me, South Africa's Final Constitution here elaborates on an idea that appeared in the Interim Constitution as well. Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution') s 82(4)(b)(i)(Section empowers the President 'with the approval of Parliament, [to] declare a state of national defence). This Interim Constitution provision retained a tenuous legal existence under FC Schedule 6, Item 24(1). See Iain Currie & Johan de Waal, with Pierre de Vos, Karthy Govender & Heinz Klug, The New Constitutional & Administrative Law (Revised Edition, 2002) vol I, 252 n 163. The last Constitution of apartheid South Africa, by contrast, had authorized the 'State President' to 'declare war and make peace'. Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983 s 6(3)(g).

[2] This chapter does not seek to precisely define the term 'war'. My focus is on the Final Constitution's provisions for the engagement of South African troops in combat, short or prolonged. Exactly when the term 'war' becomes applicable to these engagements is not the central issue, for the Final Constitution itself does not make it so.

declaring that the nation was going to fight in order to defend itself.[1] It may well be that South Africa has no constitutional power to fight a war of aggression.[2] But, as we will see, even that constraint still leaves room for many potential military engagements.

What are the procedural requirements for the declaration of a state of national defence? The first part of the answer to this question is explicit, or almost explicit. FC s 203(1) says that '[t]he President as head of the national executive may declare a state of national defence'. Although this language doesn't expressly prohibit Parliament from issuing such a declaration on its own, the overall content of FC s 203 (with its focus on the President's reporting to Parliament, and Parliament's approving the declaration after it has been made) makes it clear that only the President has this authority.

More precisely, only the President, or whoever may be serving as Acting President, can exercise this authority. Because the authority is transferable, it is quite possible that a declaration of a state of national defence could be made by someone chosen by the President to serve as Acting President rather than by someone elected by Parliament to play this role.[3] In actual fact, South Africa's intervention into Lesotho in 1998, though apparently not based on a declaration of national defence but simply on a decision to send troops on the mission, was ordered by Mangosothu Buthelezi in his capacity as Acting President while President Nelson Mandela was out of the country.[4] (Mandela's choice of Buthelezi surely was related to the ANC's efforts to improve relations with this long-time opponent.[5])

It is striking that this power is given to the President. Clearly, explicitly, he or she can declare the nation's involvement in war without any prior approval from Parliament. (It may be that the President must obtain the approval not only of the relevant Cabinet minister but also, for a decision of this magnitude, of the [1] Again, whether South Africa can also fight without a declaration of a state of national defence is a separate question, to which we will return.

[2] Currie and de Waal point out that wars of aggression are now violations of international law as well. Currie & de Waal (supra) at vol I, 252.

[3] See FC s 90(2). The Acting President could even be a Minister chosen from outside Parliament, and thus entirely unelected. FC ss 90(1) and 91(2)-(3).

[4] Buthelezi reportedly did, however, consult with both President Mandela and Deputy President Mbeki (who also was out of the country at the time), before ordering the military entry into Lesotho. Both 'approved the operation'. Gilbert A Lewthwaite 'South Africa Weighs Withdrawal from Messy Lesotho Intervention [–] Resistance Was Fiercer, and Intelligence Less Reliable Than Expected' Baltimore Sun (26 September 1998) at 7A (available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database). South Africa apparently expected its entry to be quite uneventful, and initially its troops were supplied only with blank ammunition.) Ibid. I have included the dispatch of troops to Lesotho in this chapter's list of peacekeeping missions, but clearly it was initially seen by many in Lesotho as deeply partisan and aggressive. See also Gilbert A. Lewthwaite 'Lesotho military operation criticized in South Africa Newspapers, opposition say peacekeeping mission is botched and misguided' Baltimore Sun (24 September 1988) at 20A (available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

[5] See Steytler & Mettler 'Federal Arrangements' (supra) at 102; Richard Ellis 'Zulu Chief Keeps Low Profile on the Campaign Trail' Scotsman (2 June 1999)(available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

Cabinet as a whole.[1]) Presumably the war can then be prosecuted. However, the declaration 'lapses unless it is approved by Parliament within seven days of the declaration'.[2] This requirement of affirmative approval by Parliament means that a formal declaration of the nation's martial intent rests on the approval of both of the political branches of government. But it must be said that within a week a lot can happen, politically and militarily. If the President begins the war on Monday, and South African troops have fallen by Saturday, will Parliament be prepared to withhold its approval? It has often been suggested that the ability of the United States President to involve the United States in fighting presents Congress with something approaching a fait accompli.[3] In any event, the more firmly the executive maintains political control of Parliament, the less likely it is that Parliament will fail to give its approval.

Though Parliamentary approval is required for a declaration of a state of national defence, it is clear that the Final Constitution imposes much clearer and more stringent requirements for a declaration of a state of emergency than it does for the declaration of a state of national defence.[4]

- First, FC s 37(1) specifies the grounds on which a state of emergency can be declared (a threat to 'the life of the nation'), whereas no specific grounds are spelled out for declaring a state of national defence. A state of emergency can only be declared in terms of an Act of Parliament,[5] but no statute is required as a basis for declaring a state of national defence. So while the Defence Act does set out grounds for declaring a state of national defence,[6] these procedures are not mandated by the constitutional text.
- Second, while a state of emergency can last for 21 days without legislative endorsement — compared to 7 days for a state of national defence — once initial approval (the 'first extension') has been issued by Parliament for a state

[1] Currie & de Waal maintain that the President must obtain the countersignature of the relevant Cabinet minister for any action within the sphere of that Minister's authority. See FC s 101(2). In addition, they explain, '[i]f the issue has implications for government as a whole or concerns matters of real political importance, the President cannot act with the concurrence of a Minister, but the approval of Cabinet must be obtained'. Currie & de Waal (supra) at vol I, 246. See FC s 85(2). Thus the President would need the signature of the Minister of Defence for orders to the troops, FC ss 201(1), 202(2), and perhaps the approval of the Cabinet as a whole for a declaration of a state of national defence or other commitments of troops to potential combat. It seems unlikely that these requirements would ordinarily prevent a President convinced of the need for warlike action from proceeding.

[2] FC s 203(3).

[3] In the United States, if the President undertakes military action without a declaration of war, the War Powers Resolution (a statute) normally requires an end to the operation if it does not receive Congressional approval – but 60 days can elapse before that approval is obtained, and by then the fighting may have advanced too far to be easily halted. War Powers Resolution, § 5(b), 50 USC § 1544(b) (2006).

[4] See generally N Fritz 'States of Emergency' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 61. (Ed.)

[5] FC s 37(1).

[6] Defence Act 42 of 2002 ('Defence Act') s 89 (The President may declare a state of national defence 'if, among other things, the sovereignty or territory of the Republic — (a) is threatened by war, including biological or chemical warfare, or invasion, armed attack or armed conflict; or (b) is being or has been invaded or is under armed or cyber attack or subject to a state of armed conflict.') of emergency, this approval must be renewed at least every three months.[1] A state of national defence, once approved by Parliament, appears to extend indefinitely.

- Third, FC s 37(2) spells out which chamber of Parliament has the power to give or withhold approval of a state of emergency — the National Assembly. The allocation of this authority for states of national defence, however, is not made explicit. What FC s 203(3) says is that 'Parliament' must approve the declaration. FC s 42(1) declares that Parliament consists of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces (NCOP).[2] It is not easy to see why the National Assembly should be relied upon to approve or disapprove states of emergency, while the National Council of Provinces as well as the National Assembly are needed for approval or disapproval of states of national defence. But this state of affairs is what the text on its face dictates.[3] Conceivably, however, the NCOP is not meant to play a part in approving a declaration of a state of national defence. It might be argued that the NCOP's powers are limited to 'legislative power', and that approval or disapproval of a declaration of a state of national defence is not actually legislation. Rather, this function might be seen as a form of oversight over executive power, a responsibility apparently reserved to the National Assembly.[4] If, on the other hand, the NCOP does have a role to play in the approval of a declaration of a state of national defence, then how great is that role? If this decision is viewed as a form of legislation, presumably it is legislation of national rather than distinctively provincial concern.[5] If so, then even if the NCOP withholds approval of the declaration after the National Assembly has given its endorsement, the National Assembly can give Parliament's approval by re-enacting it.[6] But if this approval did count as legislation triggering the special NCOP powers applicable to bills 'affecting provinces', then very different dispute resolution provisions would apply.[7] Finally, it could be maintained that the approval of a declaration of a state

[1] FC s 37(2)(b).

[2] I am grateful to a reader for pointing this out.

[3] Abstractly, it might seem harder for the executive to obtain the approval of two houses of Parliament than of just one, and so a requirement of bicameral approval might be seen as a way of slowing the march towards war. It would remain unclear why a similar check on the move to a state of emergency was unnecessary. As a practical matter, however, at least in today's South Africa, the chance of such a disagreement between the two houses of Parliament seems small.

[4] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 17-1, 17-3 ('The national executive is accountable to the National Assembly and not to the NCOP'.)(Ed.) Also, compare FC s 68 (section on 'Powers of National Council' detailing only 'legislative power') with FC s 55 (section on 'Powers of National Assembly' separately describing the Assembly's legislative power and its accountability/oversight power). Even if the NCOP does perform oversight functions in practice, perhaps its oversight role is not sufficiently secured by the Constitution to extend to 'oversight' of the declaration of a state of national defence.

[5] See FC ss 75-76.

[6] FC s 75(1); Budlender (supra) at 17-15.

[7] FC s 76. The NCOP also follows substantially different voting procedures ('one legislator, one vote' or 'one provincial delegation, one vote'), depending on which category of legislation it is considering. See FC ss 65, 75(2); Budlender (supra) at 17-4 –17-6.

of national defence is not governed by either of the two sets of procedures for normal legislation, and that some further process, such as an absolute requirement of approval by each House of Parliament, must be inferred for this very special function. The failure to fully clarify this complex of issues is a significant omission, and a potential source of great difficulty should a state of national defence ever be declared.

- Fourth, FC s 37(2) also forbids the National Assembly from approving or extending a state of national emergency without a public legislative debate. No such rule is imposed for approval of a state of national defence. (Other sections require that Parliament's rules in general must have 'due regard' for 'transparency and public involvement'.[1]) It is hard to accept the idea of a state of national defence being approved without a public debate. The sheer unlikelihood of such a step, however, perhaps makes the absence of this textual requirement less important.
- Fifth, the required majorities for approval differ. The National Assembly can only approve a state of emergency by 'a supporting vote of a majority of the members of the Assembly', and can only extend it by 'a supporting vote of at least 60 per cent of the members of the Assembly'.[2] The Final Constitution imposes no supermajority voting requirement for Parliament's approval of a state of national defence. Presumably, therefore, Parliament is to treat this declaration according to one or the other of the two standard models the Final Constitution provides. If the declaration is treated as equivalent to a 'Bill', then the required quorum in the National Assembly is one-half of the members, and the required vote appears to be simply a majority of those voting.[3] If, on the other hand, the declaration is not treated as a bill, then the required quorum in the National Assembly is only one-third of the members; again, approval or disapproval would require simply a majority of the votes cast.[4]
- Sixth, the Final Constitution explicitly provides for judicial review of the validity of states of emergency — their declaration, the approval and extension of their declaration, and any legislation or action taken in consequence of their declaration.[5] It is likely that some form of judicial review of a state of national defence is also available. The legality principle or the role of law doc-

[1] Budlender (supra) at 17-37, citing FC ss 57(1)(b), 70(1)(b). For more on the constitutional requirement of public involvement in the legislative process, see Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC); Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC); and Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC).

[2] FC s 37(2). Bruce Ackerman characterizes the 60-percent majority requirement for extending a state of emergency as 'the first supermajoritarian escalator in the constitutional world', and sees in it a confirmation of the value of similar structures for the United States. Bruce Ackerman 'The Emergency Constitution' (2004) 113 Yale LJ 1029, 1055.

[3] FC s 53(1).

[4] See FC s 53(1). For the decision rules potentially applicable in the NCOP, see FC ss 65(1), 75(2).

[5] FC s 37(3).

trine subjects all government action to constitutional control. [1] But since the Final Constitution contains no explicit, specific provision for such review, that silence might well support arguments that the available judicial review must be particularly deferential.

23C.3 The Powers Granted by the Declaration of a State of National Defence

To address this matter, we must consider three issues:

(a) If Parliament approves a declaration, without more, what powers does the declaration confer on the President to wage war?
(b) To what extent can Parliament limit the authority that the declaration confers by adding restrictions to that authority?
(c) To what extent can the President and Parliament together limit otherwise-applicable constitutional rights based on a declaration of a state of national defence?

Let us take up these three questions in order.

(a) Presidential powers in a state of national defence

The text does not explicitly answer the first question. The most straightforward inference from the text, however, is that when a state of national defence has been declared and authorized, the President has full authority (acting with the responsible cabinet minister and the cabinet as a whole) to deploy and to direct the troops, as their Commander-in-Chief, at least until Parliament in some way restricts that authority.

The President is always the Commander-in-Chief, of course.[2] But what are the powers of a Commander-in-Chief? The text does not specify the extent or the limits of this authority. But, again, the most plausible answer is that as Commander-in-Chief, the President has the authority to order any lawful military action,[3] from preparation for war to actual fighting. Suppose, for instance, that troops from one of South Africa's neighbors massed along the border. One might imagine that South Africa would move its troops to the border in response, and this positioning of forces would be an appropriate exercise of the Commander-in-Chief's powers under a 'state of national defence'. By the same logic, Parliament's approval of the state of national defence would also authorize the President to launch a preemptive attack on the threatening troops (assuming that such an attack could be justified under international law as self-defence against an imminent invasion). Similarly, it would allow the President to repel an attack and to pursue the attackers deep into the attacking country's territory (assuming that such a response fell within legitimate self-defence under the UN Charter and other binding norms of international law). On the same basis, Parliament's approval of the declaration of a state of national defence could authorize, without further legislative action, the President's taking the attacking country's capital by force and overthrowing the aggressor government.

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufactures Association of South Africa and Another In Re: The Ex Parte Application of the President of the Republic of South Africa and others (2000) (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 20 (Chaskalson P); see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11. But see Ziyad Motala & Cyril Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (2002) 218-20 (The authors suggest that the President's use of defence powers would be largely or entirely non-justiciable.)

[2] FC s 202(1).

[3] Lawful, that is, under South African law and also lawful under the international law of war to the extent South Africa is bound by it. See FC ss 231-32. See also K Hopkins & H Strydom 'International Law and International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30. (Ed.) So, for example, the South African Bill of Rights, domestic legislation or the Geneva Conventions would constrain the President's authority to direct the treatment of prisoners of war who were taken during the fighting that the declaration of a state of national defence authorized.

It might be argued, however, that Parliament's approval authorizes much less than I've just suggested. FC s 203(1), which empowers the President to declare a state of national defence, also requires the President to report to Parliament:

(a) the reasons for the declaration;
(b) any place where the Defence Force is being employed; and
(c) the number of people involved.

Parliament's approval of the declaration might be thought to be limited to approving the particular rationale and the particular level of troop engagement that the President has reported. This is a possible reading but not the most plausible one. FC s 203 does not say that the President's use of troops lapses if it is not approved within seven days; rather, it says that the declaration lapses if not approved within that period. It seems inevitable that in a war, whatever uses are being made of troops in the first seven days will change over the next seven, or seven hundred, and there is no sign in the text that each such change requires a fresh declaration and a fresh Parliamentary approval.

It is important to add that the question of Presidential power is not only a question of 'what powers' but of 'against whom'. Who can be the target of a declaration of a state of national defence? The broader the range of potential targets, the wider the potential occasions when the war powers of the nation can be brought into play under this mantle. The text does not say who the targets of such declarations can be. It seems reasonable to infer, however, that in rejecting the rubric of 'declarations of war', the Final Constitution also puts to one side any possible argument that a declaration can only be directed against another nation-state, as might have been the case with a declaration of war. Assuming that the declaration must be against someone (rather than being, simply, a declaration that the nation is in peril, with no specification of the source of the danger), how well must that someone be specified? Would it be constitutional for the President to declare a state of national defence against, say, all those who participated in an act of terrorism against South Africa, or who aided or harbored those who did? Or all those whom the President concludes or finds participated in the act of terrorism, or aided or harbored those who did?[1] Or who 'might' commit acts of terrorism in the future?[2] The answers to these questions will help measure the breadth of the President's, and Parliament's, authority under a state of national defence.

(b) Parliament's authority to limit the President's powers

Parliament's approval of the declaration of a state of national defence ordinarily operates to authorize all lawful military action that the President may order. Still it might be that Parliament can, if it chooses, impose limitations on this authorization. The text does not make clear whether Parliament has this power, and this ambiguity is important and potentially troublesome. Given that only the President can issue a declaration of a state of national defence, it is possible (as a reader suggested) that Parliament's only power as to declarations is to approve them or disapprove them, since any Parliamentary modification of the declaration might constitute a new declaration, and one issued by Parliament rather than the President. The basic principle that national security is subject to both Parliamentary and Presidential authority, on the other hand, argues in favor of finding that Parliament can amend a declaration before approving it. Even if the division of powers with regard to declarations impliedly limits Parliament's authority in this respect, a sufficiently independent Parliament might be able to compel a President to modify and to re-issue a declaration in order to win Parliamentary approval for it.

In addition, Parliament might well retain authority to approve or to disapprove the broad policies that the President undertakes by virtue of the declaration. So, for example, I would argue that Parliament could choose to forbid the President to invade the aggressor nation imagined earlier, even if the President believed that invasion was necessary to erase the peril that nation posed to South Africa and even though Parliament had approved the declaration of a state of national defence in response to that peril.[3] The constitutional text does not spell out such a power to approve or to disapprove military policies. But it is, likewise, not precluded by the text, and the principle of joint Parliamentary-Presidential responsibility counsels in favor of it. Indeed, precisely because a declaration of a state of national defence can last for an unlimited time, principles of accountability strongly argue in favor of finding Parliamentary power to regulate what is done during the potentially extended duration of hostilities.

In this regard, it is noteworthy that the Final Constitution, in addition to requiring the President to provide Parliament with certain information in connection with a declaration of a state of national defence, also imposes in FC s 201(3) a requirement that the President provide information to Parliament concerning a range of 'employment[s] of the defence force', notably including employment 'in defence of the Republic'.[1] If this section is understood to create an ongoing duty of reporting, even during an already-approved state of national defence, and if the function of this reporting is inferred to be not simply to inform Parliament but to empower it to act, then we have reason to find a continuing Parliamentary authority to regulate the military course of a state of national defence.[2] (Parliament's funding power — though limited — is a further check, as we will see below.[3]) It is important to recognize, however, that this reading affirms Parliamentary review power but does not establish any requirement of [1] These instances of employment of the defence forces are specified in FC s 201(2). and discussed further in § 23C.4 infra. For uses of the military covered by FC s 201(2), s 201(3) requires the President > to inform Parliament, promptly and in appropriate detail, of —

[1] Cf Authorization for Use of Military Force ('AUMF'), Pub L 107-40, 115 Stat 224, § 2(a) (18 September 2001)(US statute authorizing the use of force against those the President 'determines' were connected to the September 11 attacks or to the attackers.)

[2] Proposed language for the AUMF would have authorized the use of force not only against those connected to the September 11 attacks, but also to 'deter and pre-empt any future acts of terrorism or aggression against the United States'. Tom Daschle 'Power We Didn't Grant' Washington Post (23 December 2005)(available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

[3] Though US law on this question is decidedly ambiguous, there are early Supreme Court cases supporting the conclusion that Congress retained a power to limit Presidential warmaking discretion, in undeclared wars and even in declared ones. See Little v Barreme 6 US (2 Cranch) 170 (1804); Brown v US 12 US (8 Cranch) 110 (1814). Language in an important Civil War decision, however, suggests a broader scope for Presidential discretion. See The Prize Cases 67 US (2 Black) 635 (1863).

> (a) the reasons for the employment of the defence force;
> (b) any place where the force is being employed;
> (c) the number of people involved; and
> (d) the period for which the force is expected to be employed.

The Defence Act adds the requirement of a report on 'expenditure incurred or expected to be incurred'. Defence Act ss 18(2)(e) and (4). This information is somewhat more extensive than what the President must report in connection with a declaration of a state of national defence. In that context, FC s 203(1)'s reporting requirements do not include discussion of the period for which the declaration is expected to last or of costs. I would view the several requirements as complementary rather than conflicting.

[2] Defence Act s 18(5) explicitly establishes Parliamentary review power over the President's uses of troops for a variety of purposes. It applies under circumstances specified in s 18(1), which provides:

> In addition to the employment of the Defence Force by the President as contemplated in section 201(2) of the Constitution, the President or the Minister may authorise the employment of the Defence Force for service inside the Republic or in international waters, in order to —
> (a) preserve life, health or property in emergency or humanitarian relief operations;
> (b) ensure the provision of essential services;
> (c) support any department of state, including support for purposes of socio-economic upliftment;
> (d) effect national border control.

In these circumstances, under s 18(5), 'Parliament may by resolution within seven days after receiving information [about the employment of troops in question] from the President or the Minister —

> (a) confirm any such authorisation of employment;
> (b) order the amendment of such authorisation;
> (c) order the substitution for such authorisation of any other appropriate authorization; or > (d) order the termination of the employment of the Defence Force.'

As a reader has pointed out to me, however, this provision appears to cover only the employment of troops in South Africa or in international waters, and only for purposes in addition to those functions, notably including national defence and fulfillment of international obligations, for which FC s 201(2) authorizes the President to employ troops. It appears, therefore, that Parliament has not yet asserted the broader review power which I argue it possesses under the Constitution. Interestingly, a Parliamentary legal adviser has in fact expressed the view that the President's employment of the Defence Force under FC 201(2) 'is not subject to the approval of Parliament and it may not amend, substitute or terminate such employment'. Memorandum – Confidential – to Secretary of the National Assembly from Legal Services Office, 'Employment of the Defence Force' (14 July 2003) at 3, available at http://www.pmg.org.za/files/docs/081024memo.pdf (accessed 4 October 2009). This report was distributed and discussed at a meeting of the Joint Standing Committee on Defence, reported in Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Protection of Civilians during Peacekeeping Operations: ACP/EU Draft; Employment of SANDF under Section 201 of Constitution: Legal Opinion', (29 October 2008), available at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20081024-protection-civilians-during-peacekeeping-operations-acpeu-draft-emplo (accessed 4 October 2009). I discuss the report further at § 23C-18 n 2 infra.

[3] See § 23C.5 infra.

specific Parliamentary approval as a predicate for Presidential action. As long as Parliament does not order otherwise, it seems quite likely that the approval of the declaration of a state of national defence in itself confers, or accepts, unlimited Commander-in-Chief authority bound only by general South African or international law.

Moreover, assuming that Parliament does have this implied authority to limit the President's freedom of action in a state of national defence, it would appear to be subject to a potentially significant limit: Parliament presumably cannot impose modifications that in effect prevent the President from performing the role of Commander-in-Chief. What this limit would entail is by no means certain, and I do not mean to suggest that aggressively expansive notions of executive war-making power would be compatible with South Africa's constitutional order. But still this limit does seem to have at least some content. Parliament probably could not, for example, require that Presidential military orders be co-signed by the Speaker of the National Assembly: the President, not the Speaker, is the Commander-in-Chief.[1] Parliament also cannot order the 'employment' of troops in defence of the nation; '[o]nly the President, as head of the national executive', has that authority, under FC s 201(2).[2] If Parliament cannot order the 'employment' of troops, then its power to order, or to compel the President to order, their 'deployment' during a state of national defence may also be limited. Thus, although I have already urged that Parliament would have the power to regulate the broad outlines of war (for example, to forbid an invasion as a form of self-defence), it is open to question whether Parliament could direct the President in a state of national defence to attack one base rather than another, to defend one town but not a second, or to use armored personnel carriers but not tanks.[3] Once a state of national defence has been declared and approved, some considerable authority may pass to the President in a manner that Parliament cannot restrict.

(c) Limits on human rights during a state of national defence

We can begin to answer the third question by asking another: Does the declaration of a state of national defence also result in the declaration of a state of national emergency? The answer to this question is clearly 'no'. A state of national defence is not a state of emergency, and a state of emergency is not a state of national defence. The brief constitutional text bearing on states

[1] Cf Michael D Ramsey 'Torturing Executive Power' (2005) 93 Georgetown LJ 1213, 1241 (US 'Congress cannot appoint a commander who does not answer to the President.')

[2] I discuss this provision in much more detail below. See § 23C.4 infra.

[3] In the United States, it has been said that '[t]here is ample evidence that the legislature was not meant to make tactical military decisions once war was initiated'. Stephen Dycus, Arthur L Berney, Willam C Banks & Peter Raven-Hansen National Security Law (4th Edition, 2007) 26. But a number of scholars have recently argued that although such tactical choices are normally made by the President as Commander-in-Chief, Congress does have the authority to intervene in many, perhaps even all, of them if it so chooses. See David J Barron & Martin S Lederman 'The Commander in Chief at the Lowest Ebb — Framing the Problem, Doctrine, and Original Understanding' (2008) 121 Harvard L Rev 692; Jules Lobel 'Conflicts Between the Commander in Chief and Congress: Concurrent Power Over the Conduct of War' (2008) 69/477 Ohio State LJ 391; David Luban 'On the Commander-in-Chief Power' (2008) 81 Southern Cal LR 477.

of national defence does not suggest a recognition that constitutional rights would be subject to extensive abridgment. The text addressing states of emergency, on the other hand, focuses elaborately on exactly this prospect. It seems reasonable to say that the only time that constitutional rights can be 'derogated' from is in a state of emergency, although the text of FC s 37 (on states of emergency) does not expressly say so.

As we have seen, the constitutional provisions governing the declaration and continuation of states of emergency are in general more demanding than those governing states of national defence. It appears to follow, therefore, that the government is considerably freer to engage troops in battle than it is to deprive people of constitutional rights. This statement is somewhat startling, but not necessarily cause for concern. It may be that states of national defence are so much less tempting as instruments of potential authoritarian oppression than states of emergency are that — so far as human rights are concerned — fewer constitutional limits need to be imposed on the use of states of national defence; realpolitik itself will protect the nation's liberties. So, at least we may hope.

However, the powers employed in a state of national defence do have important human rights implications. Sending troops into battle risks depriving them of their lives. FC s 11 protects the right to life.[1] This right cannot be derogated from even in a state of emergency.[2] It must follow that orders sending troops into battle in a lawfully-undertaken war are justified under FC s 36 as a limitation on the soldiers' right to life, and so can be issued without effecting a derogation from that right.[3]

There are other ways in which the violent clashes that a state of national defence would authorize would inevitably impair otherwise fully-protected constitutional rights, even if a state of national defence is not meant to authorize limitations of the sort contemplated in states of emergency. I will put aside here the possibility of military conflict so grave that the civil courts cannot stay open. There lies the ultimate recourse of martial law, unmentioned in the Final Constitution, yet still waiting somewhere in the wings.[4]

Far from the realm of martial law, the existence of a state of national defence would raise other issues regarding the limitation of constitutional rights. Suppose, for example, that South Africa faced the likelihood of imminent terrorist attack by a foreign terrorist group, and had declared a state of national defence as a

[1] See generally M Pieterse 'Life' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 39. (Ed.)

[2] FC s 37(5)(c).

[3] FC s 36, to be sure, requires not just a weighing of national need and democratic reasonableness, but also the presence of 'law of general application' or authority elsewhere in the Final Constitution to sustain a limitation on rights. If a statute such as the Defence Act did not provide the necessary legal basis, then Parliamentary approval of the declaration of a state of national defence might, or the Final Constitution itself might indeed be seen as the foundation for orders to fight under such a declaration. For more on the need for a 'law of general application' and its contours, when undertaking FC s 36 analysis, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34. (Ed.)

[4] Cf Ex parte Milligan 71 US 2, 78-82 (1866)(on the circumstances in which martial law may and may not be declared).

result. Unless Parliament enacted limitations, presumably the President would be entitled to use all normally lawful military steps to ward off the attack. In an actual war, the armies of one side monitor the communications of the other, and they do not usually stop to obtain court authorization first. It would seem that the President, as commander-in-chief of the South African National Defense Force, would have the authority to order electronic surveillance of communications among members of this foreign terrorist group abroad, though doing so might impair their privacy of communications under FC s 14*(d)*.[1] Would the President have the same authority as to communications by members of the group abroad to their (known? suspected?) confederates within South Africa, assuming those confederates are also not South African citizens? What about communications from outside South Africa into the country, when either the sender or recipient is a South African citizen? And what about communications going the other way?[2] And, finally, what if the group against which the state of national defence has been declared is a domestic, South African terrorist group?[3]

I don't mean to suggest that these questions are unanswerable, or that the exercise of such wartime authority would be beyond review by the courts or regulation by Parliament. But it is hard to believe that the rules governing surveillance in a state of national defence would always be the same as those rules that apply in ordinary circumstances. Some limitations on normally available rights would likely be justified by the needs of the state of national defence. The power to declare a state of national defence means that military need and domestic constitutional liberty may conflict, and the exact boundaries between them have not yet been worked out.

These inferences may seem feverish. In fact, the Defence Act appears to go considerably further. Section 91(1) of the Defence Act gives the President broad authority to make regulations to deal with the tasks of a state of national defence.

[1] No constitutional question would arise, of course, if the Final Constitution does not apply to actions taken by the South African government outside its own borders and directed at noncitizens whose only connection with South Africa is their intent to attack it. See generally Kaunda (supra) at paras 41-44 (Chaskalson CJ) and para 228 (O'Regan J). For an argument in favour of broad extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31 at 31-113 to 31-122. (Ed.)

[2] These questions of course recapitulate the argument in the United States over whether the President has authority, under the post-9/11 AUMF, to order warrantless electronic surveillance of people suspected of links with Al Qaeda. South Africa has prohibited surveillance inside the country in national security matters absent a judicial order. See Regulation of Interception of Communications and Provision of Communication-Related Information Act 70 of 2002 (RICA) ss 2-3. This statute does, however, permit emergency 'interception' of communications without such an order, for the purpose of locating their sender, when a law enforcement officer, including a member of the Defence Force, 'has reasonable grounds to believe that an emergency exists' because another person is in danger of dying or being seriously injured. RICA ss 1 and 8(1)(b). See also RICA s 7 ('Interception of communication to prevent serious bodily harm'). Moreover, it seems arguable that Parliament did not craft this Act's limits with the needs of a state of national defence in mind, and that the President might exercise the authority granted in the Defence Act (discussed in the text in the remainder of this section) to establish different rules to govern surveillance in that context.

[3] As noted earlier the constitutional text does not make clear against whom a declaration of a state of national defence can be issued. See § 23C.3*(a)* supra. But it is certainly possible to imagine domestic threats that are as grave as foreign ones, and so it is quite conceivable that a declaration could target a domestic group.

Section 91(2) in turn makes clear that such regulations can have a very substantial effect on constitutional rights. It remains to be seen, of course, whether the powers conferred in these sections are constitutional. However, the existence of the statute presumably reflects at least the view of Parliament and the President that the Final Constitution does permit these provisions.

The subsections of s 91 cover a considerable range of issues affecting human rights. To begin with, ss 91(2)(a) — (f) appear to enable the President to impose a draft (referred to as a 'mobilization'). Section 91(2)(g) authorizes regulations dealing with 'the security of national key points and other places that may be designated', but does not specify what steps such regulations might require. Section 91(2)(h) provides for 'censorship of information', clearly a limitation on free speech. Section 91(2)(i) empowers the President to make regulations dealing with 'the evacuation or concentration of persons, including curfew laws'. All such laws impinge on freedom of movement and association. A South African reader may be quickly reminded of pass laws and bantustans or the disease-ridden concentration camps created by the British during the South African War.

Finally, s 91(2)(l) addresses regulations of 'places of custody or detention'. On this score, it is worth noting that FC s 37(8) makes clear that the many provisions of s 37 which protect detainees during states of emergency > do not apply to persons who are not South African citizens and who are detained in consequence of an international armed conflict. Instead, the state must comply with the standards binding on the Republic under international humanitarian law in respect to the detention of such persons.

FC s 37(8) appears to apply whether or not a state of emergency is in place, and seems to say that the rules of detention applicable to foreigners detained in consequence of an international armed conflict are simply those required by international humanitarian law, not those that might otherwise be inferred from other provisions of the Final Constitution. Thus a non-South African detained in these circumstances would have neither the rights of a normal detainee under FC s 35, nor the rights of an emergency detainee under FC s 37 (unless international humanitarian law binding on South Africa provided otherwise, either by directly mandating such protections or by requiring that non-South Africans receive the same protections as South Africans enjoy). And this would be true even if the non-South African was detained or (to use a more military term) taken prisoner on South African soil and thereafter detained inside South Africa as well.

To all of the above, it is important to add that the list of topics in s 91(2) of the Defence Act may not be exclusive. Indeed, the breadth of s 91(1)'s general authorization suggests that the specific powers granted in s 91(2) might be viewed as exemplifying a range of other implicit powers that may impinge, where necessary, on constitutional liberties. Whether s 91(2)'s provisions, or broader implications that flow from them, are constitutional remains to be litigated. But the statute does at least confirm the possibility that states of national defence will involve significant limitations on otherwise protected rights, limitations with some resemblance to the 'derogations' that are authorized, but much more carefully addressed, in the state of emergency provisions of the Final Constitution. It might be argued that the differences do not matter, since South Africa can always declare and approve declarations of a state of national defence and of a state of emergency simultaneously. A state of emergency may be harder to start and is certainly harder to maintain, however, and so the existence of this partially overlapping, less regulated authority is troubling.

23C.4 Hostilities Without a Declaration of a State of National Defence

Although the declaration of a state of national defence under FC s 203 appears to be the way that South Africa can declare its fullest engagement in the use of military force, it is clearly not the only path by which the country can employ its armed forces. Instead, FC s 201(2) creates another route, and one which the President may take the nation along without affirmative Parliamentary ratification. This section declares that:

> Only the President, as head of the national executive, may authorize the employment of the defence force —
> (a) in cooperation with the police service;
> (b) in defence of the Republic; or
> (c) in fulfillment of an international obligation.

Action in defence of the Republic under FC s 201(2)(b) presumably is, or at least may be, taken pursuant to a declaration of a state of national defence. The distinction drawn in FC s 201(2) between such defence and the use of force 'in fulfillment of an international obligation', however, suggests that the latter is not encompassed by a 'state of national defence'.[1] Moreover, this reading of FC ss 201(2) and 203 accords with the natural sense of the words 'national defence' — for surely national defence is not directly implicated by peacekeeping missions far from South Africa's borders. This understanding is also consistent with South African practice, under which South African troops have been sent to a number of countries for peacekeeping purposes without, as far as I am aware, any declarations of a state of national defence.[2]

[1] But are there actually any interventions that are mandated by 'international obligation'? It may be that no international agreements to which South Africa is a party actually demand the commitment of South African troops. It is also true, however, that South Africa, as a member of the United Nations, the African Union, and the Southern African Development Community, has obligations to preserve human rights in other parts of the world. FC s 201(2) can easily be read to refer to this broader, less insistent form of 'obligation', and to authorize the deployment of troops in its service. The White Paper on South African Participation in International Peace Missions also can be read to reflect such a view. See White Paper on Peace Missions (supra) at 34. In any event, it would seem from FC s 201(2)(c) itself that South Africa must have the power to enter into international obligations whose fulfillment will entail the employment of troops.

[2] So, too, it appears that 'employment of the defence force … in cooperation with the police service' does not require any declaration. (It is also noteworthy that the list in FC s 201(2) is not explicitly exclusive. Motala & Ramaphosa (supra) at 218. In fact the Defence Act, s 18(1), provides for other uses of the defence forces as well. See § 23C-12 n 1 (supra).) The question of how deeply the South African military is, or should be, involved in domestic law enforcement has important potential implications for the long-run strength of civilian democracy. The Defence Act as it now stands appears to empower the defence forces to exercise a considerable range of domestic law enforcement authorities. See Defence Act ss 20(1) and 22. For an American response to this problem, see the longstanding, though ambiguous, Posse Comitatus Act 18 USC § 1385 (2006). But these issues are beyond the scope of this chapter.

Peacekeeping missions do not seek combat, but combat can certainly arise. In point of fact, South Africans engaged in interventions of this sort have taken casualties in both Lesotho and the DRC. Once troops are deployed in a situation of potential strife, active fighting and war are always possibilities. Indeed, even deployments under conditions of peace (say, a deployment of troops to Namibia as a check on any potential rise of territorial ambitions against Namibia in other nations) ultimately pose this risk.

Given that peacekeeping missions carry with them some risk of involvement in actual fighting, as might other military deployments ordered by the President,[1] is affirmative Parliamentary approval required for these steps? The answer seems clearly to be 'no'; as long as Parliament does not affirmatively disapprove (and as long as funds are available), the military action can continue. This is apparent from FC s 201(3), which requires the President to 'inform Parliament, promptly and in appropriate detail' of a range of information about any employment of the defence force which he or she has ordered under FC s 201(2). This reporting requirement is a wise one, and has apparently been understood to require the President to provide Parliament with information even on deployments of very small numbers of soldiers. But what the section requires is only reporting; it does not require any vote by Parliament on the matter. In fact, the text does not even explicitly authorize Parliament to vote on the matter, though I believe, as I have already argued in connection with declarations of a state of national defence,[2] that the principle of joint Parliamentary-Presidential control over the military does mean that Parliament can vote if it so chooses.[3]

[1] There would be risks entailed in a variety of actions the President might take as part of routine military protection of the nation, especially if South Africa were actually to face any external threats. Today, fortunately, South Africa 'faces no known immediate threat', according to Major-General Roy Andersen, head of the SANDF Reserve Force. Jonathan Katzenellenbogen 'Overlooked Reservists Bolster Ranks of Cash-Strapped SANDF' Business Day (13 October 2004)(available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database).

[2] See § 23C.3*(b)* supra.

[3] Parliament, however, has not asserted this power in the Defence Act. See § 23C-12 n 1 supra. Vanessa Kent and Mark Malan have pointed out that the White Paper on Peace Missions (which they report was adopted by Parliament in October 1999) envisioned greater responsibility for Parliament than the Defence Act mandates. The White Paper appeared to see Parliamentary approval as a prerequisite to the President's authorising the deployment of troops where 'military enforcement measures' might be required, and seemed to contemplate, as a standard procedure, the President's 'tabling a proposal for ratifying the participation of a South African military contingent in a particular peace support operation'. White Paper on Peace Missions (supra) at 32; Vanessa Kent & Mark Malan, 'Decisions, Decisions – South Africa's foray into regional peace operations', Institute for Security Studies Occasional Paper 72 (April 2003), available at http://www.iss.co.za/index.php?link_id=14&slink_id=576&link_type=12&slink_type=12&tmpl_id=3 (accessed on 3 October 2009).

I have found no instance of such a proposal being presented to Parliament or voted on by it. Kent and Malan in 2003 argued that troop deployment decisions were being taken 'at the level of the Presidency' with little input from Parliament (or other actors). Parliamentary committees, perhaps primarily the Joint Standing Committee on Defence, however, do review these letters. Committee practice in carrying out this review appears to have varied. In one instance, two committees decided jointly to draft and support a resolution approving the already-underway employment of South African troops in Burundi. Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Joint Standing Committee on Defence; Select Committee on Security and Constitutional Affairs: Joint Meeting, 14 November 2001, "Deployment of the SANDF in Burundi"' available at http://www.pmg.org.za/viewminute.php?id=1240 (accessed on 3 October 2009). It is conceivable that this resolution was voted on by Parliament, but in context

It is important that Parliament have this authority. But it is also important to recognize that if Parliament has this authority, and chooses to take no action whatsoever, then the President's decision stands. Only an affirmative decision by Parliament to modify or reject the President's choice constrains his power; inaction constitutes acceptance (at least as long as funds are available). As already suggested, it is also important to recognize that if the President makes decisions that embroil the nation in fighting, Parliament may find it very hard to respond then by demanding a reversal of the President's judgments. The President has the authority, as long as Parliament does not affirmatively object, to take the nation a substantial distance, perhaps politically an irreversible distance, along the road towards war.

Suppose now that in the course of a deployment of troops ordered by the President, and not objected to by Parliament, fighting does break out. Must a state of national defence now be declared, and Parliamentary approval obtained? Parliament might find it hard to withhold its approval, but still it would have a chance, and indeed an obligation, to endorse or not to endorse such a declaration if it was issued. And unless Parliament gave its approval, the declaration would lapse.

---

it seems more likely that the committees themselves adopted the resolution and that Parliament as a whole never voted on it. In contrast, in 2005 the Joint Standing Committee adopted a report on several notifications which took no position at all, and simply declared that the committee, 'having considered the letters from the President on the deployment of the SANDF to areas outside the borders of the country, referred to the Committee, reports that it has concluded its deliberations thereon'. Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Deployment of South African National Defence Force: Notification from President's Office' (16 November 2005) available at http://www.pmg.org.za/node/6745 (accessed on 4 October 2009).

For other instances in which the Joint Standing Committee voted to 'adopt' letters from the State President, see Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Deployment of SA National Defence Force & Report on finalisation of Armscor employee grievance' (13 February 2009), available at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20090211-letters-president-deployment-south-african-national-defence-force-san (accessed 4 October 2009); Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Letters requesting SANDF Deployment; Defence Committee Reports: consideration' (25 June 2008), available at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20080618-committee-reports-and-letters-deployment-consideration (accessed 4 October 2009).

It appears that the Joint Standing Committee has grown increasingly discontented with its role. Members of the Committee voiced sharp concerns at a meeting in August, 2008. Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'SANDF deployment letters: Committee complaints & approval; National Conventional Arms Control Amendment Bill: deliberations' (27 August 2008), available at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20080827-national-conventional-arms-control-committee-amendment-bill-b-43-2008 (accessed 4 October 2009). Two months later, the Committee reviewed opinions of the Parliamentary Legal Adviser concerning its role under FC s 201, and the Chairperson 'explained that it was not the intention of himself or the Committee to be confrontational against the President. However, there were real concerns that Parliament was being required to rubber stamp decisions and actions by the Executive, and accordingly was not fully performing its constitutionally designated role and function'. According to the Parliamentary Monitoring Group summary, '[m]embers finally resolved that the matter should be referred to the Rules Committee of Parliament, as it seemed that this was a matter finally dependent upon the Rules, and that the situation in times of both war and peace needed to be considered'. Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Protection of Civilians during Peacekeeping Operations: ACP/EU Draft; Employment of SANDF under Section 201 of Constitution: Legal Opinion' (29 October 2008), available at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20081024-protection-civilians-during-peacekeeping-operations-acpeu-draft-emplo (accessed 4 October 2009).

But the constitutional text does not say that a state of national defence must be declared whenever actual fighting breaks out. The fact is that the text does not say that a declaration of a state of national defence is required as a prerequisite, or an accompaniment, even to a full-scale war. Nor is it clear that such a declaration plays any international law role (as a declaration of war might have, especially in earlier times), and so it may be that no implied requirement of such declarations can be inferred in the text based on international law. It would have been possible for the Final Constitution to have explicitly forbidden war or fighting in the absence of a declaration, but no such prohibition has been spelled out.[1] I would infer nevertheless that a full-scale war (unlike the sorts of smaller-scale hostilities discussed above) does need to rest on such a declaration, since the declaration process seems designed to provide notice to the nation and to insure that Parliament's assent is obtained as part of the country's going to war — but the point remains debatable because the text is not explicit.

As to lesser military engagements, moreover, I do not think the same inference follows. The Final Constitution empowers the President to send troops abroad for peacekeeping. Peacekeeping can be violent. To authorize a peacekeeping mission, it seems to me, is necessarily to authorize some limited amount of actual fighting in the course of that mission. There may, in addition, be legitimate reasons for a President's not wanting to declare a state of national defence. Such a declaration might trigger domestic responsibilities that the President fears would burden, or upset, the country. It might also carry foreign policy connotations that would fuel a crisis atmosphere internationally that the President would like to dissipate — precisely in order to accomplish the peacekeeping objectives for which the troops have been deployed.[2] Finally, even after South African troops have been shot at, it may not really be the case that 'national defence' is at stake, and so the provision for a declaration of a state of national defence may not truly be applicable in these circumstances. For all of these reasons, it seems to me that some level of combat is possible in the course of an authorized employment of South African troops without the need for a declaration of a state of national defence and therefore, once again, without any need for Parliament to give or to withhold its approval for the enterprise. Exactly what level of combat triggers the need for a declaration remains, inescapably, unclear in the text.

[1] A similar argument has been made by John Yoo to support the inference that the President of the United States does not need a declaration of war by Congress. Yoo notes that the constitutional text does explicitly prohibit the states from making war without Congress' consent, and contrasts that to the absence of any explicit textual requirement that the President obtain consent. John C Yoo 'Exchange: War Powers — War and the Constitutional Text' (2002) 69 U Chicago LR 1639, 1666-67, citing US Constitution art. I, § 10. I would not take this argument so far, either for South Africa or for the United States, but the absence in the Final Constitution of any textual requirement of Parliamentary assent to fighting does have to be reckoned with.

[2] Cf Orlando v Laird 443 F2d 1039, 1043 (2d Cir, 1970), cert. denied, 404 US 869 (1971)(Court notes that a declaration of war might be seen by Congress and the President as 'plac[ing] the nation in a posture in its international relations which would be against its best interests.') The Constitutional Court has recognized 'the government's special responsibility for and particular expertise in foreign affairs'. Kaunda (supra) at para 144(6)(Chaskalson CJ). See also Kaunda (supra) at para 172 (Ngcobo J) and para 243 (O'Regan J).

Suppose, finally, that the President does declare a state of national defence, but Parliament refuses to approve it. Must the fighting then stop? Again, the text does not provide an answer, but surely it must be the case that where a declaration is constitutionally required, its absence means the fighting must come to a halt. As we have just seen, however, it is not by any means certain exactly when a declaration is constitutionally required. Perhaps the President would argue that the fighting in question didn't actually rise to the level (whatever it might be) for which a declaration of national defence was required, and therefore that although he or she had issued the declaration and sought Parliament's approval as a matter of prudence, Parliament's failure to approve did not remove the President's prerogative to continue the fighting. That position would be especially forceful if Parliament did not actually disapprove the declaration, but simply never brought it to a vote and so failed to approve it. So, too, the President's position would have force if Parliament disapproved the declaration, but at the same time rejected a proposal to de-fund the fighting.[1] Or perhaps the President would argue that although Parliament's failure to approve the declaration meant that the fighting had to be brought to an end, Parliament couldn't possibly have meant that South African troops should be placed in jeopardy as the process of disengaging from the enemy took place. It would follow that if necessary, the fighting could continue for a considerable period in order to insure the safe extrication of South African troops.[2] Whatever the correct view of this matter, it is quite clear that the text leaves it ambiguous. This ambiguity means that in a situation where this point became important, the President could claim various forms of authority to continue. Though South African courts could address such claims, it would not be easy for a court to reject a President's claim of authority while the battle actually raged.

23C.5 The Power of the Purse: Parliament's Budgetary Powers

Let us begin our examination of Parliament's power to limit war through restricting spending by considering the related problem of how, once the President has declared a state of national defence, and Parliament has approved it, it comes to an end. No doubt, if the President wages war and achieves victory, then both branches of government will be happy to recognize the end of the state of national defence. But can the President rescind the declaration of a state of national defence without Parliament's approval? If an Acting President declares it, can the President, on returning to his or her duties, revoke it? If the President has some revocation power, does it last only until Parliament has actually approved the state of national defence, or does it go on indefinitely? Perhaps more importantly, can Parliament withdraw its approval once it has given it? Can a single chamber of Parliament withdraw its approval, or must both chambers concur?

[1] Such paradoxical votes are possible. In fact, such votes were cast by the members of the US House of Representatives on Operation Allied Force, the NATO bombing campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1999. See Stephen Dycus, Arthur L Berney, William C Banks & Peter Raven-Hansen National Security Law (3rd Edition, 2002) 412.

[2] For an account of the US courts' unwillingness to second-guess the President's efforts to withdraw from Vietnam, despite the years of continued warfare that took place in the process, see Stephen Dycus et al (4th Edition) at 230-239.

All of these questions are left unanswered by the text. It is plausible to infer that since a state of national defence must rest on the assent of both political branches of South Africa's government, each branch can also revoke its consent. But as a practical matter, it may be very hard for either branch to overturn a state of national defence to which the other is committed, and it may be very hard in particular for Parliament to abrogate a state of national defence to which the President remains committed. Moreover, the logic behind the inference of a power for a single branch of government to revoke the declaration is uncertain: once both branches have assented to the declaration of a state of national defence, it might be argued that only a decision by both branches can revoke it. Or (as a reader has suggested) perhaps the declaration of a state of national defence, once approved by Parliament, is so profound a vesting of authority in the President that only the President can end it.

The most important powers Parliament may have to control executive uses of military force may lie elsewhere. I have already argued that Parliament can disapprove the President's uses of force even after approving a declaration of a state of national defence under FC s 203 (as long as Parliament does not interfere with the President's commander-in-chief authority). So, too, I've argued that Parliament can disapprove any Presidential employment of troops under FC s 201. But Parliament does not have to exercise these powers. In contrast, Parliament also has authority to give or to withhold funding for the nation's military engagements, and this power Parliament at least to some extent cannot escape exercising.

As a general proposition, the President cannot spend money without Parliament's having authorized it. The Final Constitution establishes this rule by requiring that all revenues received by South Africa must be paid into the 'National Revenue Fund', unless Parliament legislates to the contrary.[1] Once revenue has been deposited in this Fund, the Final Constitution specifies that it normally can only be withdrawn if Parliament enacts an appropriation or authorises a 'charge'.[2] Hence even if the President engages in peacekeeping missions for which, say, the United Nations provides reimbursement, those UN funds apparently will go into the National Revenue Fund (unless Parliament reasonably provides otherwise) and then become subject to Parliamentary control rather than unilateral Presidential disposition. At that point, whether the revenues to be spent come from the United Nations or domestic taxes, unless Parliament has provided the President with spending authority, the President cannot carry on.[1]

[1] FC s 213(1)(Section limits exceptions to those 'reasonably' made by Parliament).

[2] Parliamentary may either enact appropriations (FC s 213(2)(a)) or by statute authorize 'direct charge[s]' against the National Revenue Fund (FC s 213(2)(b)). Parliamentary action is not required when a direct charge 'is provided for in the Constitution'. FC s 213(2). The text of FC s 213 does not make clear whether Parliament could also provide – as an exercise of its power under FC s 213(1) to make reasonable exceptions to the general rule that all revenues go into the National Revenue Fund – that certain funds received by the government would not go into this Fund but instead would go directly to the President for spending entirely according to his or her unilateral direction for the conduct of war. But the constitutional commitment to budgetary 'transparency and expenditure control', FC 216(1), to say nothing of the broad principle of joint Parliamentary and Presidential responsibility for national security, would seem to weigh against such a reading of the text.

In principle, this funding authority appears to be the strongest check on Presidential power in the field of war. I would assume — as elsewhere, in part on the basis of the fundamental principle of shared Parliamentary and Presidential authority — that this power applies whether or not the President has obtained approval of a declaration of a state of national defence. The funding power could also be brought to bear even if the President is in the midst of exercising his or her commander-in-chief and foreign affairs authority in the prosecution of some military objective. The President is commander-in-chief only of those forces the legislature provides, as Justice Robert Jackson pointed out in an important war powers case half a century ago in the United States.[2]

Though it is possible to argue for an implied Presidential authority to take otherwise unauthorized action, including spending money, in a dire emergency,[3] I believe that a general argument for an implied Presidential power to fund wars without Parliamentary approval would be alien to South African constitutionalism, and therefore that Parliament can end a war by defunding it. A more difficult issue is whether Parliament can use its funding power to constrict the President's commander-in-chief authority in a war that Parliament has not chosen to end. If there are limits on Parliament's power to directly control the tactical choices the President may make in an ongoing, duly authorized war,[4] then Parliament might well also be barred from using its funding power to impose restrictions on the conduct of the war that it could not directly require. Exactly where the line is to be drawn between Parliament's authority to decide what wars South Africa's money is to be spent on, and the President's authority to decide how to spend the money Parliament has appropriated for war, is no easy question. Despite this ambiguity, the power to end a war by ending its financing is a profound one.

Yet it will undoubtedly be difficult for Parliament to wield this authority, given the degree of executive control of the legislature in South Africa.[5] Two other

[1] The President cannot carry on, that is, unless the spending is a direct charge 'provided for in the Constitution'. FC s 213(2)(b). But FC s 213 itself identifies only one such direct charge, and that one — for revenue sharing with the provinces (FC s 213(3)) — is far from the field of defence.

[2] See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co v Sawyer 343 US 579, 643-644 (1952)(Jackson J concurring). In the United States, this power has on occasion been used with some effect, notably in bringing an end to the late Vietnam War bombing of Cambodia. See generally Holtzman v Schlesinger 484 F2d 1307 (2d Cir, 1973); Dycus et al (4th Edition) (supra) at 235-239. Congress' funding power has also been notoriously circumvented. For an extensive account of Congress' efforts to cut off funding to the Nicaraguan Contras, and the Reagan administration's efforts to evade this cut-off with funds received from covert sales of arms to Iran, see Dycus et al (4th Edition) (supra) at 473-522.

[3] See Motala & Ramaphosa (supra) at 216-217, discussing Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at paras 62 (Chaskalson P) and 149-150 (Ackermann & O'Regan JJ).

[4] See § 23C.3*(b)* supra.

[5] See C Murray and O Ampofo-Anti 'National Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 18. (Ed.)

reasons exist for more hesitation about the efficacy of this power than the text might otherwise encourage. The first is the special legislative authority that the executive commands over budgeting under the Final Constitution.[1] Under FC s 73(2) 'only the Cabinet member responsible for national financial matters may introduce [a money Bill] in the Assembly'.[2] (The United States Constitution, by contrast, provides that 'All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives'.[3]) No member of Parliament seeking to end a war to which the President and the Cabinet are committed, therefore, can introduce a bill proposing to cut off the war's funds.

However, Parliament is not without power to take spending decisions. Most clearly, Parliament can reject the Executive's war when the Executive proposes legislation to fund it. The significance of this authority, however, depends on whether the President will actually need to apply to Parliament for funds in short order. There does not appear to be a constitutional limit on the period of time for which Parliament can appropriate military spending funds (in contrast to the US Constitution's two-year limit),[4] and so, at least in theory, an extended appropriation at one point could fund a considerable length of military activity without further specific approval. Since South African appropriations are in practice enacted on an annual basis, however, the requirement of annual approval does constrain the President's power – though it also leaves the President with a year's discretion.[5]

In addition, Parliament should be able to amend a money bill already introduced, so as to include a provision barring any further spending for the military operation in question, and to revoke, if need be, any previously-granted appropriation. FC s 77(3) seems meant to insure Parliament's authority to amend money bills, since it declares that '[a]n Act of Parliament must provide for a procedure to amend money Bills before Parliament'.[6] Although more than 12 years would pass before this constitutional mandate was carried

[1] R Kriel and M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27. (Ed.)

[2] See also FC s 55(1)(b), giving the National Assembly power to 'initiate or prepare legislation, except money Bills' (emphasis added).

[3] US Constitution art I, § 7.

[4] US Constitution art I, § 8, cl. 12.

[5] Annual appropriations are required under the Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 ('PFMA'), as amended, s 26. The President's discretion is further enhanced because under some circumstances this same statute permits spending prior to specific Parliamentary authorization. See page 23C-25 n 2 infra.

[6] As the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) has pointed out, it is also noteworthy that FC ss 55(1)(a) and 68*(a)*, which describe the legislative powers of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces respectively, both refer to these Houses' authority to amend, or in the National Council of Provinces' case to amend or propose amendments to, 'any legislation' (emphasis added). Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) 'COSATU Submission on the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Bill, Submitted to the Portfolio Committee on Justice and Constitutional Development' (21 September 2001) at para 4.2, available at http://www.cosatu.org.za/docs/2001/const.htm (accessed on 12 May 2008).

out,[1] the Money Bills Amendment Procedure and Related Matters Act[2] was signed by the President on 16 April 2009. The Act provides a detailed procedure for the amendment of money bills, and specifies that its provisions are to be interpreted to 'give effect to the constitutional authority of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces in passing legislation and maintaining oversight of the exercise of national executive authority'.[3]

The second reason for hesitation about the efficacy of the funding power is, perhaps, partly a reminder of the political difficulties of wielding this authority: so far, it appears that the executive has at least on occasion been able to undertake military missions without seeking specific funding approval in advance. At a 2003 parliamentary committee discussion of the White Paper on Peace Missions, General Rautie Rautenbach, Budget Director for the Department of Defence, reportedly > noted that for the most part peace missions were an unforeseen occurrence and that by their very nature there was normally no budgetary provision for this development. He informed the Committee that the DOD had a deficit of R200 million that had been occasioned by peace-keeping expeditions noting that the current budget did not provide for this kind of money.[4]

[1] In early May 2008, a 'tripartite alliance summit' of the African National Congress, the South African Communist Party, and the Congress of South African Trade Unions reportedly decided 'to allow Parliament to amend money bills' — one of several decisions seen as 'suggest[ing] much greater influence of the ANC's leftist allies on economic policy'. Karima Brown & Amy Musgrave 'South Africa: Leftward Leap If ANC Allies Get Their Way' Business Day (Johannesburg) (12 May 2008) available at http://allafrica.com/stories/200805120351.html (accessed on 7 July 2009). COSATU had earlier called for 'the tabling of an adequate money bills amendment procedure bill as a matter of urgency'. 'COSATU Submission' (supra) at 4.2. As COSATU noted in that submission, Article 21(1) of Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution provides that '[w]here the new Constitution requires the enactment of national or provincial legislation, that legislation must be enacted by the relevant authority within a reasonable period of the date the new Constitution takes effect'. Ibid.

[2] Act 9 of 2009.

[3] Money Bills Act s 2*(a)*. A full evaluation of the procedures of the Act is beyond the scope of this chapter.

[4] Parliamentary Monitoring Group 'Minutes for Defence Joint Committee, 26 March 2003, White Paper on Peacekeeping: Discussion' available at http://www.pmg.org.za/viewminute.php?id=2596 (accessed on 26 January 2007). At another Parliamentary committee hearing in 2004, overspending amounts of R25.9 million and R14.3 million for 'peacekeeping support operations' were reported, though 'Mr V Mbethe (National Treasury Chief Director: Justice and Protection Services) pointed out that unauthorized expenditure due to the undertaking of unforeseen peacekeeping missions were [sic] much less likely in the future as such missions were much more regular and well provided for now'. Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'National Government Unauthorised Expenditure 1998 – 2004: Treasury briefing' available at http://www.pmg.org.za/minutes/20050809-national-government-unauthorised-expenditure-1998-%E2%80%93-2004-treasury-briefing (accessed 4 October 2009). For another suggestion of the degree of operational flexibility possible within defence budgeting, see Wyndham Hartley, 'African Peace Burden Cannot Be SA's Alone, Warns Lekota', Business Day (16 February 2005)(available on Westlaw ALLNEWS database). As recently as October 2008, the chair of the parliamentary Joint Standing Committee on Defence observed that 'participation in peace keeping missions had cost implications for South Africa, as although the country in which the intervention had taken place was supposed to reimburse South Africa, there were long delays before this reimbursement might be received, if it was paid at all, and therefore effectively the Department of Defence (DOD) was being called upon to pay the costs, which impacted upon that Department's ability to maintain a budget approved by Parliament and consequently upon Parliament's competence to oversee the Department of Defence, if the Executive, the Department of Foreign Affairs and possibly the Department of Intelligence were making unforeseen calls upon DOD's budget.' Parliamentary Monitoring Group, 'Protection of Civilians during Peacekeeping Operations' (supra).

That deficit may have been unusual, but budget adjustments to cover unanticipated spending are quite permissible under South African law.[1]

The National Assembly does, finally, have one further recourse: it can expel the President from office. First, it can 'remove the President from office' under FC s 89. That step, however, requires a vote of two-thirds of the members of the Assembly. Moreover, it is not entirely self-evident that the President's determination to continue fighting an unpopular war would constitute one of the specified grounds on which a vote to remove the President can be based: serious illegal conduct, serious misconduct or inability to perform the functions of the office.[2]

Second, and more easily, the National Assembly can require the President (and the entire Cabinet at the same time) to resign, by approving a 'motion of no confidence'. But even this step is not altogether simple — even assuming Parliament is prepared to bring down the entire existing executive — because it requires 'a vote supported by a majority of [the National Assembly's] members'.[3] National Assembly members determined to end a war might find it easier to do so by exercising Parliament's appropriations power. To pass a bill cutting off funding for a war, as few as one-fourth-plus-one of the members of the Assembly would be sufficient,[4] though they would also have to vote to override the National Council of Provinces, if that body opposed the legislation.[5]

23C.6 War Powers as Constitutionally Exceptional Powers

The text of the Final Constitution, in short, imposes only partial limits on the power of South Africa's President to involve the nation in fighting or war (within the limits of international law), and on the simultaneous potential for limitation of constitutional rights South Africa otherwise holds dear. Perhaps South Africa will not actually face the agonizing possibilities of war with any frequency. But it is difficult to be confident of such predictions. Moreover, it is hard to be confident that military power, if it exists and is used, will not be subject to misuse as well. In

[1] The statutory basis for such adjustments ultimately lies in the Public Finance Management Act, under which a government department has a number of statutory routes by which it can increase its spending on a particular function, such as peacekeeping, without prior specific Parliamentary authorization. See PFMA (supra) ss 16, 30, 34, 43, & 92. See also Vanessa Kent & Mark Malan (supra) at 72 (discussing PFMA ss 16 & 30). For an illustrative recent funding bill, see 2006/07Appropriation Bill, as introduced, Schedule, Vote 21 (Defence) available at http://www.info.gov.za/gazette/bills/2006/b2-06.pdf (accessed 5 March 2007)(The bill allocates R820 million specifically and exclusively to 'peace support operations' within a 'force employment' budget of R1.41 billion). For an example of a peacekeeping mission whose costs were expected to be covered without the need for new legislation, see TM Mbeki 'Letter from President T.M. Mbeki to Speaker of the National Assembly: Employment of the South African National Defence Force in Sudan in Fulfilment of the International Obligations of South Africa Towards the African Union' (2 July 2004) available at http://www.pmg.org.za/docs/2003/comreports/040729presletters.htm (accessed on 5 March 2007)(Mbeki notes that costs would be accommodated within the Department of Defence's 'current allocation for Peace Support Operations.') South Africa is not unique in providing considerable flexibility for executive spending in the area of national defence. For a description of practice in the United States, see William C Banks & Peter Raven-Hansen, National Security Law and the Power of the Purse 69-85, 168-170 (1994).

[2] FC s 89(1).

[3] FC s 102(2). I am grateful to Christina Murray for calling this section to my attention.

[4] FC s 53(1).

[5] FC ss 77, 75.

other areas of human rights protection, South Africa's constitutional drafters chose to take few chances. They defined a wide range of rights, mandated governmental protection and respect for them, and created a powerful Constitutional Court to make those commitments enforceable. In these areas, South Africa has developed an impressive apparatus for the constitutional protection of individual rights. In the field of war, however, the Final Constitution has taken fewer precautions.

South Africans will need to decide whether to seek changes in the constitutional text or instead to rely on the growing strength of South Africa's constitutional traditions to guide interpretation of the text if and when these issues must be addressed. This chapter has sought both to outline a rights-protective interpretation of the Final Constitution and to point to aspects of that text – notably the procedures for Parliamentary approval of a declaration of a state of national defence, and the absence of a requirement of affirmative Parliamentary approval for Presidential decisions to employ troops, particularly in peacekeeping abroad – where stronger provisions might be desirable. I hope that this chapter will suggest other areas as well that may deserve attention. But I take very seriously a reader's caution that interpretation might be preferable to amendment, because efforts to amend the constitutional text might actually increase rather than limit executive prerogative. Finally, I must close by saying that many centuries of human experience, hard experience, suggest that to regulate killing and chaos – war – by law is always, to some extent, impossible.

24A Public Protector

Michael Bishop
Stuart Woolman

24A.1 Historical background 24A–1
24A.2 Nature of the office 24A–2
24A.3 Independence 24A–4
(a) Appointment and removal 24A–4
(b) Financial independence and political autonomy. 24A–5
24A.4 Complaints and investigations 24A–7
(a) Jurisdiction 24A–7
(i) General 24A–7
(ii) Judicial functions 24A–9
(iii) Legislative and executive matters 24A–10
(b) Manner and method of investigation 24A–12
(i) Types of investigations 24A–12
(ii) Confidentiality 24A–13
(aa) During investigations 24A–13
(bb) After investigations 24A–14
(iii) Powers of search and seizure 24A–15
(iv) Other powers 24A–16
(v) Outcomes of investigations. 24A–16
24A.5 Ancillary functions of the public protector. 24A–17
(a) Public reporting 24A–17
(b) Alternative dispute resolution 24A–17
24A.6 Access, efficacy and forum shopping 24A–18

Functions of the Public Protector

182. (1) The Public Protector has the power as regulated by national legislation —

(a) to investigate any conduct in state affairs, or in the public administration in any sphere of government, that is alleged or suspected to be improper or to result in any impropriety or prejudice;

(b) to report on that conduct; and

(c) to take appropriate remedial action.

(2) The Public Protector has the additional powers and functions prescribed by national legislation.

(3) The Public Protector may not investigate court decisions.

(4) The Public Protector must be accessible to all persons and communities.

(5) Any report issued by the Public Protector must be open to the public unless exceptional circumstances, to be determined in terms of national legislation, require that a report be kept confidential.

Tenure

183. The Public Protector is appointed for a non-renewable period of seven years.[1]

24A.1 HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Nobody has a more sacred obligation to obey the law than those who make the law.[2]

Like most ombudsman around the globe,[3] the Public Protector monitors the [1] Sections 182 and 183 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] J Anouilh Antigone (1942).

[3] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 161 ('The Public Protector is an office modelled on the institution of the ombudsman.') The drafters of the Interim Constitution did not favour the term ombudsman. They objected to both 'man', for its possible sexist connotations, and 'ombud', for an unknown reason. See D Basson South Africa's Interim Constitution: Text and Notes (Revised Edition, 1995) 173; G Devenish The South African Constitution (2005). 'Public Protector' and 'Defenser del Pueblo' have similar connotations. The later term, employed in Spain and some Latin American countries, emphasises the protection of 'the people' and the public good, as opposed to the 'private' or narrow interests manifest in individual complaints. See M Oosting 'The Ombudsman and His Environment: A Global View' in L Reif (ed) The International Ombudsman Anthology (1999)('Reif Anthology') 5.

The original ombudsman — the Swedish Justiteombudsman — was established in 1809. Finland followed suit in 1919, Denmark in 1955 and Norway and New Zealand in 1962. See Oosting (supra) at 1. Although most modern ombudsmen trace their lineage back to Sweden, the Control Yuan of China, the Quadi Alqudat of the Ottoman Empire and the *Tribun*e of Ancient Rome are obvious antecedents. See U Lundvick 'A Brief Survey of the History of the Ombudsman' (1982) 2 The Ombudsman Journal 85. According to the International Ombudsman Institute, most democracies have such an institution and, in 2004, national ombudsmen numbered 120 worldwide. See The History and Development of the Public Sector Ombudsman Office available at http://www.law.ualberta.ca/centres/ioi/eng/history.html (accessed on 1 November 2005). Some writers have described the recent rise in popularity as 'ombudsmania'. See D de Asper y Valdés 'Self Perceptions of the Ombudsman: A Comparative and Longitudinal Survey' (1990–91) 9 The Ombudsman Journal 1, 1. Others note that a substantial number of ombudsmen appear to be mere window-dressing — the result of a trend, rather than a truly effective institution. See U Kempf & M Mille 'The Role and Function of the Ombudsman: Personalised Parliamentary Control in Forty-Eight Different States' in Reif Anthology (supra) 195, 196.

conduct of state officials and agencies with the aim of ensuring an effective and ethical public service.[1] The office reflects, in both conception and execution, a profound improvement upon its precursor: the Advocate-General. The Advocate-General's brief was limited to investigations into the unlawful or the improper use of public money.[2] The Public Protector's brief, as initially adumbrated in the Interim Constitution, and as now determined by the Final Constitution and the Public Protector Act ('PPA'),[3] is to watch the watchers and to guarantee that the government discharges its responsibilities without fear, favour or prejudice.

24A.2 NATURE OF THE OFFICE

The Public Protector's purpose is profitably compared with the role of the judiciary. Courts handle discrete disputes about law and conduct. They rely on correct procedure and solid, sometimes intricate, legal argument. Courts are simply not designed to handle the large number of complaints that arise from simple misunderstandings or bureaucratic red-tape, nor do they lend themselves to the resolution of injustices that turn more on unfairness than illegality.[4]

The Public Protector occupies a middle space in the politico-constitutional landscape. It serves the public and assists the courts and the legislature. It assists the courts by addressing those complaints about the administration of justice that fall beyond the court's purview. It assists the legislature by monitoring the performance of the executive and answering those complaints that elected representatives are unable to address.[5]

The Public Protector performs these functions, in theory at least, free from political pressure. It is not, however, entirely independent. For while the Public Protector enjoys priority over other institutions in the exercise of its functions,[6] it

[1] The Public Protector was originally established in terms of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') ss 100–114.

[2] Ombudsman Act 118 of 1979. For a comprehensive history of the Advocate-General, see JP Fegbeutel An Ombudsman for South Africa (Unpublished LLD thesis, University of South Africa, 1990); DJ Brynard Die Advokaat-Generaal in Publieke Administrasie: 'n Vergelykende Evaluering (Unpublished DLitt thesis, University of Pretoria, 1987). Although it constituted an important step towards greater public accountability, the Advocate-General could not investigate maladministration. Ibid at 230–1. See also L Baxter Administrative Law (1984) 290.

[3] Act 23 of 1994. The Act has been amended four times. See Public Service Laws Amendment Act 47 of 1997; Public Protector Amendment Act 113 of 1998; Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000; Public Protector Amendment Act 22 of 2003. The PPA repeals the Ombudsman Act. See PPA s 14.

[4] See S Owen 'The Ombudsman: Essential Elements and Common Challenges' in Reif Anthology (supra) at 51, 54–5. See also M Zacks 'Administrative Fairness in the Ombudsman Process' (1967–1987) 7 The Ombudsman Journal 55, 55 ('Complainants come to Ombudsmen for help to cut through red tape and to deal expeditiously with their concerns. If they wanted technical, legal arguments and approaches, one can say with some justification that they should hire a lawyer and go to court.')

[5] See Owen (supra) at 53 (Ombudsmen enable politicians to address failures in the state bureaucracy.)

[6] Special Investigating Unit v Ngcinwana & Another 2001 (4) BCLR 411, 413B (E)(When interpreting the competence of tribunals under the Special Investigating Units and Special Tribunals Act 74 of 1996 with respect to the investigation of maladministration and corruption, the court held that '[c]onstitutional priority would thus seem to lie with the institution of the Public Protector. Any interpretation of the Act's purposes must pay heed to that reality.') must still often act together with the courts and other Chapter 9 Institutions to fulfil its mandate.[1]

One of the most common criticisms levelled against the Public Protector, and ombudsmen generally, is that the institution lacks the power to make binding decisions. In truth, however, the ability of the Public Protector to investigate and to report effectively — without making binding decisions — is the real measure of its strength.[2] Stephen Owen explains this apparent paradox as follows:

> Through the application of reason, the results are infinitely more powerful than through the application of coercion. While a coercive process may cause a reluctant change in a single decision or action, by definition it creates a loser who will be unlikely to embrace the recommendations in future actions. By contrast, where change results from a reasoning process, it changes a way of thinking and the result endures to the benefit of potential complainants in the future.[3]

The publication of the Public Protector's findings can shame a body into accepting the validity of its recommendations.[4] Its reports to Parliament enable the national legislature to exercise effectively its oversight function and shape important debates on policy and budgetary matters.[5] Whether our Public Protector has sufficient funds to maintain the high standards of investigation and reporting required to be the 'voice of reason' is discussed below.[6]

Another question of moment, as our government toys with the idea of rationalizing our Chapter 9 Institutions, is whether the Public Protector serves as a 'classical ombudsman' or a so-called 'hybrid ombudsman'. The 'hybrid ombudsman' takes up complaints about maladministration and corruption as well as allegations of human rights violations.[7] Although the Public Protector was not specifically assigned the latter task, the brief of the Public Protector is broad enough to permit such investigations. It has, to date, issued a number of noteworthy reports in this regard.[8] [1] See § 24A.6 infra, on the relationship between the Public Protector, the courts and forum shopping.

---

[2] See Owen (supra) at 52; Oosting (supra) at 10.

[3] Owen (supra) at 52.

[4] See Oosting (supra) at 12 ('[T]he mobilisation of shame can constitute a powerful weapon in his arsenal.')

[5] Ibid ('In this world the sweet voice of reason — a well formulated argument, based on meticulous research — does not always fall on attentive ears. Political support for the ombudsman is therefore essential.')

[6] See § 24A.3*(b)* infra, on 'Financial independence and political autonomy'.

[7] See L Reif 'Building Democratic Institutions: The Role of National Human Rights Institutions in Good Governance and Human Rights Protection' (2000) 13 Harvard HRLJ 1.

[8] Ibid at 66. The Public Protector has considered whether official conduct amounts to a constitutional rights violations in a number of investigations. See Office of the Public Protector Investigation of the Play Sarafina II (1996), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report1.htm (accessed on 29 November 2005)(Rights to privacy and access to information); Office of the Public Protector Report on an Investigation by the Public Protector of a Complaint by Deputy President J Zuma Against the National Director of Public Prosecutions and The National Prosecuting Authority in Connection with a Criminal Investigation Conducted Against Him (2004), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/Report26.pdf (accessed on 29 November 2005)('Zuma Report')(Right to dignity); Office of the Public Protector Report by the Public Protector on the Investigation into Allegations of Homophobic and Unconstitutional Statements by Mr Peter Marais MPL, Erstwhile Premier of the Western Cape (2003), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report21.pdf (accessed on 29 November 2005)(Freedom of expression); Office of the Public Protector Report on the Investigation into Allegations of Underpayment of Beneficiaries of the Venda Pension Fund (2002), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report18.htm (accessed on 29 November 2005)(Right to equality).

24A.3 INDEPENDENCE

(a) Appointment and removal

During the certification of the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court considered whether a provision permitting removal of the Public Protector by a simple majority vote of the National Assembly was sufficient to ensure the independence and impartiality of the Public Protector as demanded by Constitutional Principle ('CP') XXIX.[1] The First Certification Judgment Court found that the Public Protector would not be able to investigate politically sensitive matters and review politically sensitive material that could embarrass public officials if it had to concern itself with calls for its removal that could be effected by a simple majority.[2] The First Certification Judgment removed that particular sword of Damocles,[3] and the Constitutional Assembly redrafted the apposite provision so as to require a two-thirds vote of the National Assembly to secure removal.[4]

The Public Protector is also subject to a more stringent selection process than are members of other Chapter 9 Institutions. The President appoints the Public Protector after having First recieved a recommendation from the National Assembly in the form of a resolution that has secured a 60% majority.[5]

[1] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 162–3. CP XXIX reads: 'The independence and impartiality of a Public Service Commission, a Reserve Bank, an Auditor-General and a Public Protector shall be provided for and safeguarded by the Constitution in the interests of the maintenance of effective public finance and administration and a high standard of professional ethics in the public service.'

[2] Ibid. See also Oosting (supra) at 9 ('[G]overnments regard the ombudsman's attempts to expose the abuse of power on the part of government officials as a threat to their position, and react accordingly.') A similar decision was taken regarding the removal of the Auditor-General. See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 165. See also S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor-General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 24B.2. The Court also considered whether the appointment, removal or tenure of the Governor or Board of Directors of the Reserve Bank should be safeguarded by the Final Constitution. It held that unlike the Public Protector and the Auditor-General, 'its primary purpose is not to monitor government.' First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 166. Given this different purpose, the Court held that CP XXIX did not require the independence of the Reserve Bank to be protected to the same extent as the Public Protector or the Auditor-General. Ibid at 168.

[3] First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 163–164 ('They are entitled to at least the same protection of their independence as magistrates are. Indeed, in the case of the Auditor-General and the Public Protector, whose functions involve matters of great sensitivity in which there could well be confrontation between the functionaries concerned and members of the Legislature and the Executive, a higher level of protection would certainly not be inappropriate.') See also Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC).

[4] FC s 194(2)(a). The Constitutional Court confirmed that this metric met the standard set by CP XXIX. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 134.

[5] See FC ss 193(4) and 193(5). The Public Protector must be a South African citizen and be a 'fit and proper person'. See FC ss 193(1)(a) and (b). The PPA also lays down detailed experience requirements for appointment as Public Protector. See PPA s 1A(3).

(b) Financial independence and political autonomy

Financial dependence has been recognised both in South Africa[1] and internationally[2] as the greatest threat to the efficacy of the Public Protector. Some commentators have gone so far as to say that its current reliance on the executive is 'inconsistent with independence.'[3]

In New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Constitutional Court identified two essential desiderata for financial independence.[4] Firstly, the Chapter 9 Institution must have sufficient funding to fulfil its constitutional mandate.[5] Secondly, the funds must come from Parliament and not from the executive.[6] Although the New National Party Court views the source of the funds as a requirement for financial independence, the source of funds would seem, at first blush, to only become relevant if the funds provided are insufficient. If the funds are sufficient for the discharge of the Chapter 9 Institution's duties, then any issue regarding the source of the funds could, as a logical matter, never arise.

However, the New National Party Court's concerns extend beyond those of mere fiscal viability. The Court's language suggests apprehension over the ability of Chapter 9 Institutions to discharge their oversight responsibilities if the executive retains the discretion to decrease (or increase) funding. When questions of [1] See H Corder, S Jagwanth & F Soltau 'Report on Parliamentary Oversight and Accountability' Report to the Speaker of the National Assembly (1999), available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001/viewminute.php?id=811 (accessed on 10 January 2005)('Corder Report'). The report found that:

> The very direct control by the executive of constitutional institutions can have a devastating effect on the independence and credibility of these offices. . . . In the first place, to make institutions dependent on budget allocations received through the very departments that they are required to monitor is not desirable. Secondly, these institutions must be seen by the public to be independent and free of the possibility of influence or pressure by the executive branch of the government.

Ibid at paras 7.2–7.2.1. See also Woolman & Schutte (supra) at § 24B.2; S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 24F.3 and § 24F.4*(g)*; and C Albertyn 'The Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 24D.3.

[2] See Oosting (supra) at 8 ('The role of the ombudsman as an independent investigator can also be weakened if he is subjected to such budgetary constraints that he cannot perform his role adequately'); de Asper y Valdés (supra) at 256 ('The success of the ombudsmen's mission depends dearly on the material resources granted to the office.')

[3] Corder Report (supra) at par 7.2.1 ('Approval by the executive of budgets, or other issues such as staffing, is thus inconsistent with independence, as well as the need to be perceived as independent by the public when dealing with their cases.')

[4] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party)(Court considered the meaning of 'independence' with respect to the financial and administrative independence of the Electoral Commission. The Electoral Commission, like the Public Protector, is a Chapter 9 Institution.)

[5] Ibid at para 98. ('This implies the ability to have access to funds reasonably required to enable the Commission to discharge the functions it is obliged to perform under the Constitution and the Electoral Commission Act. This does not mean that it can set its own budget.')

[6] Ibid. ('Parliament must consider what is reasonably required by the Commission and deal with requests for funding rationally, in the light of other national interests. It is for Parliament, and not the Executive arm of Government, to provide for funding reasonably sufficient to enable the Commission to carry out its constitutional mandate. The Commission must, accordingly, be afforded an adequate opportunity to defend its budgetary requirements before Parliament or its relevant committees.') sufficiency of funds do arise, whether the executive is, in fact, the source of those funds will enter into the Court's assessment of the independence of the institution.[1] Thus, it is for reasons of political autonomy that the New National Party Court signals its preference for Chapter 9 Institutions such as the Public Protector to be funded directly by Parliament.[2]

Despite constitutional[3] and legislative[4] guarantees of political autonomy, the Public Protector is, today, entirely financially dependant on the executive. The total budget of the Public Protector for 2005 was just over R50 million. All but R1 million of this total was a direct allocation from the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development.[5] Moreover, despite significant increases in the Public Protector's budget allocation since 1996,[6] the Public Protector itself has stated that insufficiency of funds is a 'hindrance' to the fulfilment of its mandate[7] and that its 'very limited budget' prevents it from achieving 'all desired goals.'[8]

[1] The test for independence is whether the relevant body 'from the objective standpoint of a reasonable and informed person will be perceived as enjoying the essential conditions of independence.' Freedom of Expression Institute & Others v President, Ordinary Court Martial, & Others 1999 (2) SA 471 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 261 (C) at paras 23–25. This test was confirmed in Van Rooyen. Van Rooyen (supra) at paras 31–4. See also South African National Defence Union & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10, 38 (T). See also Oosting (supra) at 9 ('[L]ack of finances may lead individual citizens to refrain from voicing their complaints, either out of fear or because they do not believe anything will be done about them.')

[2] See Corder Report (supra) at para 7.2 (Argues that each Chapter 9 Institution's budget should be subject to a separate vote and that genuine independence requires the creation of a parliamentary oversight committee that takes responsibility for their efficacy.)

[3] FC s 181(2) reads: 'These institutions are independent, and subject only to the Constitution and the law, and they must be impartial and must exercise their powers and perform their functions without fear, favour or prejudice.'

[4] PPA s 3(13)(a) obliges all members of the Public Protector's office to serve impartially and independently.

[5] See Office of the Public Protector Annual Report 2004–2005 (2005), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/ annual_report/public_protector_2004_2005.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2005)('2004–5 Annual Report') 110 (R49 163 000 was allocated by the Department; R903 000 accrued from interest on favourable balances; R7 000 000 was rolled over from the previous year.)

[6] The current budget of R50 000 000 compares quite favourably with the budget for the 1996/1997 financial year of R4 168 000. See Office of the Public Protector Second Half-Yearly Report 1996 (1997), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report10.htm (accessed on 1 November 2005).

[7] 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 6 ('We will continue to knock on the doors of the Treasury Department for more funds that will enable us to fulfil our mandate without hindrance.')

[8] Ibid. The most recent annual report offers a number of specific examples of under-funding: 'The target set was to establish nine regional offices but due to financial constraints, approval has been granted to open two additional permanent regional offices.' Ibid at 14. 'A further constraint was the introduction of the Supply Chain Management legislative framework. That required additional compulsory appointment of a manager without additional funding.' Ibid at 18. Earlier reports express similar sentiments. In 1998, the Public Protector wrote that '[a]lthough Parliament and the Department of State Expenditure are continuing to assist us in accessing more resources, we are still not out of the woods in this regard.' Office of the Public Protector Annual Report 1998 (1998), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications /report15.htm (accessed on 1 November 2005). In 1999, the Public Protector wrote that '[t]he combination of limited funds, rise in complaints and lengthier investigations resulted in my staff still being under severe pressure to cope with the workload.' Office of the Public Protector Annual Report 1999 (1999), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report16.htm (accessed on 1 November 2005)('1999 Annual Report').

The political nature of the Public Protector's brief means that it must be able to engage other political actors in relatively robust exchange. The sensitivity of the material handled by the Public Protector often means that its investigations and its reports, even if they have no binding authority, can ruffle feathers and bruise egos. In order to protect the independence of the Public Protector, the PPA contains something akin to a shield law. As a result, neither the Public Protector nor any of his staff can be held liable for any good faith submission in a report.[1]

24A.3 Complaints and investigations

(a) Jurisdiction

(i) General

The Public Protector lacks inherent jurisdiction. The PPA establishes — and limits — the Public Protector's jurisdiction both with respect to the entities it may investigate and the type of conduct it may investigate.[2]

The Public Protector may investigate the following bodies: (a) government at any level;[3] (b) any institution in which the State is the majority or controlling shareholder;[4] (c) any public entity;[5] and (d) persons performing a public function.[6] The Public Protector can investigate the following types of conduct with respect to the above institutions: (i) maladministration;[7] (ii) abuse or unjustifiable exercise of power or unfair, capricious, discourteous or other improper conduct;[8] (iii) improper or unlawful enrichment, or receipt of any improper advantage, or

[1] PPA s 5(3).

[2] Office of the Public Protector Report on an Investigation into an Allegation of Misappropriation of Public Funds by the Petroleum Oil and Gas Corporation of South Africa, Trading as PetroSA, and Matters Allegedly Related Thereto: Report No. 30 (2005), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/ reports_and_publications/ petrosa_report_2005.pdf (accessed on 31 October 2005)('Oilgate Report') at para 5.1.3.2.

[3] PPA ss 6(4)(a)(i), (iv) and (v).

[4] PPA s 6(5).

[5] PPA s 6(5). The Act uses the definition of a 'public entity' provided in s 1 of the Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 ('PFMA'). That act defines a public entity as including a national and a provincial public entity. A provincial public entity is '(a) a provincial government business enterprise; or (b) a board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity (other than a provincial government business enterprise) which is — (i) established in terms of legislation or a provincial constitution; (ii) fully or substantially funded either from a Provincial Revenue Fund or by way of a tax, levy or other money imposed in terms of legislation; and accountable to a provincial legislature.' A national public entity is '(a) a national government business enterprise; or (b) a board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity (other than a national government business enterprise) which is — (i) established in terms of national legislation; (ii) fully or substantially funded either from the National Revenue Fund, or by way of a tax, levy or other money imposed in terms of national legislation; and (iii) accountable to Parliament.' For more on the meaning of public entity in the PFMA, see R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 27.

[6] PPA s 6(4)(a)(ii), (iv) and (v).

[7] PPA ss 6(4)(a)(i) and 6(5)(a).

[8] PPA ss 6(4)(a)(ii) and 6(5)(b).

promise of such enrichment or advantage by a person;[1] (iv) any act or omission that results in unlawful or improper prejudice to any other person.[2] In addition, the Public Protector may investigate any improper or dishonest act or omission or offences referred to in certain sections of the Prevention and Combating of Corrupt Activities Act[3] and must investigate any alleged breach of the Executive Ethics Code.[4] In practice, the most common types of complaints referred to the Public Protector are:

(a) Insufficient reasons given for a decision;
(b) The interpretation of criteria, standards, guidelines, regulations, laws, information or evidence was wrong or unreasonable;
(c) Processes, policies or guidelines were not followed or were not applied in a consistent manner;
(d) Adverse impact of a decision or policy on an individual or group;
(e) Unreasonable delay in taking action or reaching a decision;
(f) Failure to provide sufficient or proper notice;
(g) Failure to communicate adequately or appropriately;
(h) Due process denied;
(i) A public service was not provided equitably to all individuals;
(j) Denial of access to information.[5]

In addition, the Public Protector will not consider a matter referred to it later than two years after its occurrence — unless special circumstances so warrant.[6] Furthermore, he retains the discretion to decline to investigate a matter.[7]

As a general rule, disputes between private persons fall outside the jurisdiction of the Public Protector. However, private persons may attract the scrutiny of the Public Protector if their conduct relates to (a) state affairs; (b) improper or unlawful enrichment or the receipt or promise of any improper advantage by a person as a result of an act or omission in the public administration or in connection with [1] PPA ss 6(4)(a)(iv) and 6(5)(c).

[2] PPA ss 6(4)(a)(v) and 6(5)(d).
[3] Act 12 of 2004.
[4] Section 3(1) of the Executive Members Ethics Act 82 of 1998. This is the only time that the Public Protector can be compelled to investigate a matter. Such an investigation has, in fact, been undertaken and the attendant report recognizes the mandatory duty to investigate imposed on the Public Protector to investigate. Office of the Public Protector Report on an Investigation of a Complaint Regarding the Alleged Failure of Mr M P Lekota, The Minister of Defence, to Comply With Certain Provisions of the Executive Members' Ethics Act, 1998 and the Executive Ethics Code Report 23 (2003), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/report23.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2005) at para 7.
[5] 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 23. See also Office of the Public Protector Annual Report 2003–2004 (2004) 20, available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/annual_report/Annual%20,Report%202003%202004.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2005)('2003–4 Annual Report'); Office of the Public Protector Annual Report 2001–2002 (2002) 19, available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_and_publications/annual_report/AR2001_02,part4.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2005)('2001–2 Annual Report').
[6] PPA s 6(9).
[7] PPA ss 6(4)(a) and 6(5) use the phrase 'shall be competent'.

the affairs of government at any level or that of a public entity; or (c) an improper or dishonest act with respect to public money.[1]

The Public Protector's role in the so-called 'Oilgate' scandal provides an instructive example of how these jurisdictional requirements work themselves out in practice.[2] The Freedom Front ('FF') had lodged a complaint about the alleged improper distribution of public funds between PetroSA, a parastatal, and a private company, Imvume Management.[3] The FF further alleged that Imvume served as a front for the African National Congress ('ANC') and that the ANC itself was responsible for the improper distribution of public funds. The Public Protector considered its jurisdiction over each of the three bodies separately. It found that PetroSA, as a public entity, fell within its jurisdiction.[4] The Public Protector refused to investigate Imvume Management on the grounds that it was a private company and did not perform a public function.[5] The Public Protector concluded that the ANC was not a 'person performing a public action' and was therefore beyond the reach of the Public Protector's powers.[6] Although this narrow construction of the PPA's jurisdiction provisions is plausible, the Public Protector could have brought both Imvume and the ANC within its inquisitorial reach on the grounds that they had allegedly engaged in conduct that related to state affairs and that involved the improper use of public money.

(ii) Judicial functions

The Public Protector does not possess jurisdiction to investigate the 'performance of any judicial function by a court of law.'[7] The term 'judicial function' appears to extend the constitutional prohibition on the investigation of 'court decisions'.[8]

Too cramped a reading of this restriction on the Public Protector's powers would constitute something of a departure from internationally accepted best practices.[9] Many ombudsmen retain jurisdiction over maladministration,

[1] See Oilgate Report (supra) at para 5.1.3.3.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid at paras 6–7.

[4] Ibid at para 5.2. The report states that PetroSA is wholly owned subsidiary of the Central Energy Fund. The Central Energy Fund is listed as a major public entity in Schedule 2 of the PFMA. The PFMA also states that wholly owned subsidiaries of major public entities also fall under schedule 2. PetroSA is therefore a public entity.

[5] Ibid at para 5.3.

[6] Ibid at para 5.4 citing Institute for Democracy in Southern Africa v African National Congress & Others 2005 (5) SA 39 (C)('IDASA')(High Court held that a political party was not a 'public body' for purposes of the Promotion of Access to Information Act.) The report finds that the meaning of a 'person exercising a public function' is similar to that of a 'public body'.

[7] PPA s 6(6).

[8] FC s 182(3).

[9] Sweden, Finland, Austria, Spain, Venezuela and, to a certain extent, Britain permit such oversight. See D Rowat 'Why an Ombudsman to Regulate the Courts?' in Reif Anthology (supra) 527, 532. But a substantial number of ombudsmen do not possess any oversight responsibilities with respect to the judiciary. See T Christian 'Why No Ombudsman to Supervise the Courts in Canada?' in Reif Anthology negligence or inappropriate conduct by judges and other court officials.[1] The benefits that flow from this limited oversight of judicial administration by an ombudsman are said to include: (a) access (b) independence; (c) transparency; and (d) the ability to address 'minor and unintentional bungling, mistakes and delay.'[2] Moreover, an ombudsman can only issue reports and recommendations. She cannot prosecute or punish.[3]

The Public Protector has, it would appear, adopted a rather generous approach to this limitation on its jurisdiction. It regularly entertains complaints related to delays in judicial decision-making,[4] and has undertaken systemic investigations into prisoners' appeals[5] and Maintenance Courts.[6] The Public Protector has also held that it has jurisdiction to investigate the conduct of the National Prosecuting Authority.[7]

That said, the extension of the Public Protector's jurisdiction to judicial conduct might legitimately be found to conflict with the powers accorded the Judicial Services Commission ('JSC').[8] In addition, although the Public Protector is an independent entity, the potential exists for such oversight — and any public reporting in light of that oversight — to be viewed as an impairment of judicial independence.

(iii) Legislative and executive matters

The Public Protector's brief as government watchdog would not, on paper, look to raise concerns about undue interference in the legislative or the executive

(supra) at 539. Christian argues that the supervision of the judiciary by an ombudsman in the Canadian context is

> . . . mixing up constitutional fundamentals . . . The effect of such a move would be to make the judiciary accountable to an agent of the legislator. However, the legislator itself is subject to constitutional supervision by the judiciary. At a conceptual level this is a recipe for serious confusion and conflict.

One critical difference between the Canadian system Christian describes and our own is that the Public Protector is not an agent of the legislature but an independent institution.

[1] See Rowat (supra) at 530; C Sheppard 'An Ombudsman for Canada' (1964) 10 McGill LJ 291, 337.

[2] See Rowat (supra) at 534.

[3] Ibid at 531.

[4] See, eg, Complaint 03/92 in 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 46–7 (Delay by Magistrate's court in setting aside interdict); Complaint 1643/03 in 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 66 (Delay by Magistrate's court in finalising appeal); and Complaint 1996/04 in 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 70 (Delay by Labour Court of over 2 years in delivering judgment.)

[5] 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 54. This type of complaint makes up 17% of the total received by the Public Protector. The investigation is meant to 'identify those courts or institutions where complaints regarding appeals cannot be said to be isolated incidents, but [are] rather due to systemic deficiencies in the administration of appeals, and to address those systemic deficiencies.' Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 55. Because the Commission for Gender Equality ('CGE') has already published a report on the same subject, the Public Protector did not undertake its own investigation. It is, however, working together with the CGE to monitor the implementation of the CGE report's recommendations. Ibid.

[7] Office of the Public Protector Zuma Report (supra) at 48. The Public Protector does not have jurisdiction over attorneys or advocates. Complaint 125/03 reported in 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 34.

[8] The JSC is established by FC s 178. It is responsible for making findings regarding the appointment (FC s 174) and removal (FC s 177) of judges. Although the president has the final say in both these matters, he can only act once he has received a recommendation from the JSC. The JSC is also required to submit an annual report to parliament. Judicial Services Commission Act 9 of 1994 s 6.

domain.[1] However, the effective execution of its brief will, firstly, often require the Public Protector to suggest amendments to existing legislation or regulations,[2] and, secondly, sometimes have a bearing on the articulation of policy.[3]

The Public Protector has had a number of opportunities to consider the appropriate limits of its brief and whether its actions constitute a breach of institutional comity. The Gauteng Department of Education ('GDE') challenged the jurisdiction of the Public Protector to act on a complaint by a group of primary and secondary schools regarding the GDE's allocation of educators.[4] The GDE argued that the matter fell outside the Public Protector's jurisdiction as it concerned policy, not administrative action. The Public Protector found that although his office could not change law or issue policy directives, 'it was clear that legislative prescripts and governmental policies that result in conduct that is alleged or suspected to be improper or to result in any impropriety or prejudice, could be investigated by the [Public Protector].'[5] The Public Protector has, on another occasion, refused to offer an opinion as to the constitutionality of

[1] See Owen (supra) at 57 ('Care must be taken to distinguish administrative policy from legislative policy. Developing legislation is a political task which typically involves debating the relative merits of differing social and economic policies. In this, an ombudsman has no business. Only if legislation offends established principles of fairness in an absolute way does an ombudsman have a responsibility to enter the debate.')

[2] Complaint 311/03 in 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 32 ('GDE Complaint').

[3] The Constitutional Court has distinguished — or attempted to distinguish — administrative functions from legislative or executive functions on a number of occasions. See, eg, Fedsure Life Assurance & Others v Greater Johannesburg Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)(Municipal council's decision to pass a budget and impose levies or taxes is legislative action); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa & Another: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)(President's power to sign legislation into force lies somewhere between administrative and legislative action); Permanent Secretary for the Department of Education and Welfare, Eastern Cape & Another v Ed-U-College (PE)(Section 21) Inc 2001 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 118 (CC)(Allocation of a portion of total budget by an MEC in terms of an explanatory memorandum is legislative action); President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC)(Court holds that the implementation of legislation is administrative action while the formulation of policy is executive action: therefore the creation of a commission of enquiry by the President is executive action.) See, generally, J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) § 63.3*(a)*(iii)-(iv); JR De Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (2003) 59–62.

[4] GDE Complaint (supra) at 31–2.

[5] Ibid at 32. The Public Protector did not issue a finding in the matter. Instead it counseled patience and preferred to wait until the GDE completed its own internal review. As Christopher Milton, a former ombudsman of Bophutatswana, notes '[An ombudsman] cannot order an amendment, cannot change the law, demand an about-face of government policy. But [he] can consider and [he] can recommend.' C Milton 'The Wider Aspects of Ombudsmanship' (1984–1985) 4 The Ombudsman Journal 59, 62. As a result, Milton says, the correct response to a complaint about the actual law in place is: 'I agree with you. At the moment, that is the law and you must abide by the law. However it is a matter we feel worthy of consideration by the Government and we will recommend that.' Ibid at 61.

legislation on the grounds that such advice fell within the proper purview of the courts.[1]

The small number of precedents makes it difficult to construct a useful rubric with which to assess the scope of the Public Protector's powers to 'review' legislative and executive matters. However, the holding in GDE Complaint suggests that the Public Protector's powers of investigation extend further than a court's powers of administrative review under FC s 33 and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[2] Although its remedies in this regard are rather limited, the Public Protector may still provide a useful vehicle for challenges to administrative action that fall beyond the jurisdiction of the courts.

(b) Manner and method of investigation

In addition to determining subject matter competency, the PPA regulates the powers the Public Protector may exercise in carrying out investigations.

(i) Types of investigations

The PPA identifies two main categories of investigation: (1) investigations based on the receipt of a complaint; and (2) investigations undertaken at the Public Protector's own initiative.[3] While the overwhelming majority of investigations conducted are based on actual complaints received, the Public Protector has increased the number of 'own initiative' investigations.[4] Recent 'own initiative' investigations engaged allegations of maladministration with respect to the renewal of drivers licences, misconduct by the head of the Johannesburg Metro Police and the non-compliance, and thus apparent contempt, of the Eastern Cape provincial government with respect to court orders.[5] Own initiative investigations are often related to individual complaints. When the Public Protector receives a number of complaints related to a similar constellations of issues, it will institute an investigation into the 'root cause' of the problem with the aim of pre-empting

[1] See Office of the Public Protector Report on the Investigation into Allegations of Underpayment of Beneficiaries of the Venda Pension Fund (2002), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/reports_publications/report18.htm (accessed on 29 November 2005) at para 5.15. This decision was confirmed in Dabalorivhuwa Patriotic Front & Another v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others. [2004] JOL 12911 (T) at para 30.3. The applicants sought an order declaring Venda Proclamation 9 of 1993 unconstitutional. Before approaching the court, the applicants had approached the Public Protector for an opinion regarding the constitutionality of the pension fund created by the proclamation. He declined to offer one. The High Court agreed that 'this complaint is manifestly a complaint which is incapable of being adjudicated by the Public Protector and which has to be taken to the courts.' This view was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Dabalorivhuwa Patriatic Front & Another v Government Employees Pension Fund & Another. Case No 553/04 (unreported decision of 30 November 2005).

[2] Act 3 of 2000.

[3] PPA ss 6(4)(a) and 6(5).

[4] In the twelve months from April 2004 — March 2005, the Public Protector considered 22 350 individual complaints. 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 20. It conducted 5 'own initiative' investigations. Ibid at 13.

[5] Ibid at 13.

future complaints.[1] In the past year, the Public Protector has embarked on nine new 'systemic investigations.'[2]

(ii) Confidentiality

Issues of confidentiality generate significant tension, if not controversy, within the office of the Public Protector. The office is dedicated to transparency and accountability.[3] At the same time, its effectiveness as a watchdog, and the risk attached to whistle-blowing, demands that the identity of complainants and the information they disclose be kept confidential.[4]

(aa) Confidentiality during investigations

The PPA makes specific provision for the maintenance of confidentiality during an investigation by criminalising the disclosure of any document or the record of any evidence, by anyone involved in the investigation, without the Public Protector's consent.[5] Section 7(1)(b)(i) allows the Public Protector to determine the manner or the method to be followed in any investigation.[6] This power has a direct bearing on confidentiality.

Indeed the power to determine the manner of an investigation and its relationship to confidentiality was the subject of a dispute in South African Broadcasting Corporation & Others v Public Protector & Others. The applicants had applied to broadcast the proceedings of the 'arms deal investigation' jointly conducted by

[1] See D Jacoby 'The Future of the Ombudsman' in Reif Anthology (supra) 15, 27–8 ('Carrying out such investigations is a preventive measure that can actually be helpful to authorities because suggestions can be made to correct deficiencies in standards or administrative procedures.') See also Owen (supra) at 57–8 ('A fundamental aspect of this systemic approach is a belief that public institutions, despite their size and complex responsibilities, are able and willing to respond to individuals in a fair way, on their own initiative. While individual problems will always occur and can be resolved on a case-by-case basis through an ombudsman or internal complaint offices, the vast majority of potential complaints should simply never arise in institutions which are systemically sensitive to their overriding duty to ensure the individual fairness and quality in their administrative actions, decisions and practices.')

[2] 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 54. These systemic investigations embrace such varied concerns as the handling of appeals by the courts, the Compensation Commissioner, social grants in the Eastern Cape, maintenance matters, the protection of 'whistle-blowers', RDP housing, civil pensions, unemployment insurance and the witness protection programme. Ibid at 56.

[3] See Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at paras 72–78 (On the obligation to provide effective, transparent, accountable and coherent government, the Court writes that '[a]ccountability by those exercising public power is one of the founding values of our Constitution and its importance is repeatedly asserted in the Constitution.')

[4] South African Broadcasting Corporation & Others v Public Protector & Others 2002 (4) BCLR 340, 347 (T)('SABC')(Public Protector refused application to broadcast proceedings on grounds that '[c]onfidentiality is paramount in the mandate of the Public Protector and it is necessary to encourage and preserve the confidence and trust in the [Public Protector]'). See also D Jacoby 'Comments on Relations between Ombudsmen and the Media' in Reif Anthology (supra) 711, 714 ('The duty [of confidentiality] is, above all else, one of protecting the complainant, who has a right to assume that neither his or her name will be divulged nor the specifics of his or her dealings with the ombudsman.')

[5] PPA s 7(2) read with s 11(1). The penalty is a fine of R40 000, 12 months imprisonment or both.

[6] PPA s 7(1)(b(ii) specifically empowers the Public Protector to exclude certain people or categories of people from an investigation.

the Public Protector, the Auditor-General and the National Director of Public Prosecutions. A panel — representing the Public Protector, the Auditor-General and the National Director of Public Prosecutions — had refused the application in so far as it concerned live radio and television transmissions of witness testimony. In review proceedings of the panel's decision in the High Court, the applicant's contended that the decision had violated their right to freedom of expression, and in particular, the freedom of the press. The applicant relied heavily on Dotcom Trading 121 (Pty) Ltd t/a Live Africa Network News v King NO & Others: the Dotcom High Court had overruled a decision not to allow television or radio broadcasting of the United Cricket Board enquiry into the Hansie Cronje cricket scandal.[1] The SABC High Court held that the right to freedom of expression included the right of journalists to use the tools of their trade and that the preclusion of the use of cameras by the panel constituted a limitation on that right.[2] The High Court then considered the justifications offered for this limitation. It observed that the PPA, unlike the legislation at issue in Dotcom, did not require public investigations.[3] It found that the purpose of the limitation — 'the fighting of crime and other forms of impropriety' — was a constitutionally valid objective.[4] The Court concluded that the grounds for the panel's refusal to permit televised proceedings — (1) the deleterious effect on witnesses; (2) the violation of contractual confidentiality clauses; and (3) the disclosure of confidential information[5] — were rationally related to the purpose of the PPA's infringement of FC s 16 and therefore constituted a justifiable limitation on the applicant's rights under FC s 16.[6]

(bb) Confidentiality after investigations

Although confidentiality is the norm during an investigation, afterwards it is the exception. Both the Final Constitution[7] and the PPA stipulate that '[a]ny report issued by the Public Protector shall be open to the public, unless the Public Protector can convince the apposite parliamentary committee that exceptional circumstance require that the report be confidential.'[8] The term 'exceptional circumstances' embraces conditions under which release of the report can be said: (i) to [1] 2000 (4) SA 973 (C)('Dotcom').

[2] SABC (supra) at 350.

[3] Ibid. The High Court also distinguished the instant case from Dotcom on the basis that the two decisions engaged dramatically different subject matter and that the latter did not address matters of national security. Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid at 346–7.

[6] Ibid at 354. The High Court held that while it possessed the power to overturn the panel's decision, its powers were limited to rationality review and that neither the particular provisions of the PPA nor the facts of the matter warranted interference with the panel's decision. Ibid at 353. However the use of an administrative standard of review — rationality — in a context that demands a higher threshold — namely reasonableness — goes wholly uninterrogated and unexplained.

[7] FC s 182(5).

[8] PPA s 8(2A)(a)(our emphasis). Section 8(2A) was inserted by the Public Protector Amendment Act 113 of 1998. See also PPA s 8(2A)(b). If the reasons given by the Public Protector are accepted, the document will be treated as a confidential document in terms of the rules of Parliament.

endanger the security of the citizens of the Republic; (ii) to prejudice any other investigation or pending investigation; (iii) to disturb the public order or to undermine the public peace or security of the Republic; (iv) to be prejudicial to the interests of the Republic; or (v) in the opinion of the Public Protector to have a bearing on the effective functioning of his or her office.[1] The Public Prosecutor has, as yet, not deemed it necessary to keep any report confidential.[2]

(iii) Powers of search and seizure

The Public Protector possesses sweeping powers of search and seizure.[3] This

[1] PPA s 8(2A)(c).

[2] A comparable controversy has, however, arisen around the Auditor-General's desire to keep certain records confidential. See CCII Systems (Pty) Ltd v Fakie NNO & Others 2003 (2) SA 325 (T). The High Court had to decide whether a refusal by the Auditor-General to supply documents, related to the Arms Deal Investigation, and requested in terms of the Promotion of Information Act, was justified. The Auditor-General refused the request on the grounds that some of the documents were supplied in confidence, others could potentially jeopardise the security of the Republic and that the work required to sort through the vast quantity of documents that could be relevant would compromise the work of the Auditor-General's office. Ibid at para 4. The High Court rejected the Auditor-General's blanket refusal to comply with the PAIA request: 'It is not good enough to hide behind generalities. If it means that the first respondent has to employ extra staff, it must be done.' CCII (supra) at para 17. The High Court did, however, accept the contention that certain documents could not be disclosed because their disclosure would breach the confidentiality of third parties. Ibid at paras 19–20 ('One can understand that there is a duty to protect such third parties and that the respondents would be remiss if they did not do so.') Hartzenberg J noted that, in terms of the PAIA, the term 'third parties' does not include public bodies in order 'to prevent technical objections based on what department is really in possession of a document.' The High Court also agreed that the release of some documents could prejudice the interests of the defence force or the state. Ibid at para 22 ('I have come to the conclusion that it may cause prejudice to the Defence Force and the Government to order it to produce the whole reduced record.') The High Court therefore concluded that the Auditor-General was obliged to turn over all documents related to the request that did not fall into either of the two aforementioned categories and that it must to furnish a list of the documents it believed ought not to be disclosed and the specific reasons for the non-disclosure. Ibid at para 22. For more on CCII, see Woolman & Schutte (supra) at § 24B.3.

[3] PPA s 7A, inserted by Public Protector Amendment Act 113 of 1998. The original PPA contained no powers of search and seizure. For a discussion of powers of search and seizure under the Final Constitution, see D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 38.3*(a)*(ii). Three conditions must obtain for these powers to be exercised in a constitutionally valid manner. Firstly, they must be properly defined. See Mistry v Interim National Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC)(Court found that the search and seizure procedures were disproportionately broad for the purpose they were meant to achieve). Secondly, the search must be authorised by an independent authority. See Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C)(Section 6 of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act 117 of 1991 permitting search and seizure without a warrant unconstitutional); Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another NNO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC)(Section 7(3) of the Harmful Business Practices Act 71 of 1988, granting wide powers of warrantless search and seizure, unconstitutional.) Thirdly, the independent authority must be provided with information under oath detailing reasonable grounds for the search. See Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others; In Re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Hyundai')(Section 29(5) of the National Prosecuting Authority Act must be read to require proof of the existence of a specified offence before a warrant is granted.)

endowment entitles the Public Protector to search any building or premises and to seize object he believes material to an investigation.[1] The PPA states that a search can only be conducted with a warrant issued by a judge or magistrate convinced by credible information — obtained under oath – that reasonable grounds exist to suspect that the objects relevant to an investigation by the Public Protector are on the premises.[2]

(iv) Power of subpoena

Amongst the assorted powers granted to the Public Protector, the ability to subpoena any person to provide evidence or submit affidavits may be the most important.[3] Without this, her ability to conduct meaningful investigations would be severely limited.[4]

(v) Outcomes of investigations

The complainant must be informed of the outcome of an investigation. The Public Protector possesses a limited amount of discretion with respect to the timing of that disclosure.[5]

As we note below, the Public Protector possesses any number of different tools to resolve disputes.[6] With respect to completed investigations, the Public Protector's primary means of responding to a complainant's legitimate grievance is to refer the matter to the appropriate public body and to make a recommendation

[1] PPA s 7A(1). The search may be conducted by the Public Protector or anyone else authorised by him to do so.

[2] PPA s 7A(3). PPA s 7A(3) is structured identically to section 29(5) of the National Prosecuting Authority Act ('NPAA'). Act 32 of 1998. The NPAA, s 29(8) deals with search warrants for preliminary investigations for certain offences. It specifies the content of the information that must be supplied and then states that a warrant may be granted if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the object sought is on the premises, without ever specifically requiring that the object be related to any offence. In Hyundai, the Constitutional Court held that NPAA s 29(5) can and must be read to permit the issuance of a warrant only where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that an offence has been committed. Similarly, PPA s 7A(3) should only permit a warrant to be issued when there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the objects required are related to the investigation and that there is something worth investigating. It is clear from Hyundai that searches are permissible even when no offence is suspected. See Hyundai (supra) at para 28. ('I should emphasise at this stage, however, that this judgment is concerned only with the constitutionality of search warrants issued for purposes of a preparatory investigation under s 29. It should not be understood as stating that all searches, in whatever circumstances, are subject to the requirement of a reasonable suspicion that an offence has been committed.') The PPA also adumbrates the conditions for the appropriate use of force (PPA s 7A(5)(a) and (b)), delivery of a warrant (PPA s 7A(7)), the timing of the search (PPA s 7A(6)), and the procedure for handling privileged information (PPA s 7A(8)).

[3] PPA s 7(4)(a) read with s 7(5). Any person appearing before the Public Protector is entitled to legal representation. PPA s 7(8).

[4] See Oosting (supra) at 11 ('The ombudsman must, in principle, have unlimited access to information and must be able to rely on the full cooperation of the government in conducting its enquiries.')

[5] PPA s 8(3). The section is subject to the proviso 'when he or she deems it fit but as soon as possible.' The phrase 'when he or she deems it fit' should apply only to the timing of the disclosure, and have no bearing on its occurrence.

[6] See §26A.6 infra, on 'Access, efficacy and forum shopping'.

to that body as to the appropriate form of redress.[1] If the matter under investigation constitutes a criminal offence, the Public Protector can refer the matter to the relevant prosecuting authority.[2]

24A.5 ANCILLARY FUNCTIONS OF THE PUBLIC PROTECTOR

(a) Public Reporting

The Public Protector must table an annual report in both the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces.[3] He may also, under certain circumstances, submit the findings of specific investigation.[4]

(b) Alternative Dispute Resolution ('ADR')

The Public Protector possesses a great deal of latitude with respect to the manner in which it addresses complaints. While the PPA places strict jurisdictional limits on the Public Protector's investigative powers, it simultaneously authorizes the Public Protector 'to endeavour, in his or her sole discretion, to resolve any dispute or rectify any act or omission' in a variety of different ways.[5] The resolution of a dispute or the rectification of a problem can take place in terms of: (a) mediation, conciliation or negotiation;[6] (b) an advisory opinion as to alternative remedies;[7] or (c) a proceedure deemed both efficacious and expedient in the circumstances.[8]

Although some commentators have suggested that this power to employ alternative mechanisms for dispute resolution occur within the context of an investigation and are therefore subject to its jurisdictional limits,[9] we would suggest that this grant of power is distinct from the power to investigate.[10] Moreover, the [1] PPA s 6(4)(c)(ii).

[2] PPA s 6(4)(c)(i).
[3] PPA s 8(2)(a).
[4] PPA s 8(2)(b). The relevant circumstances exist when:
(i) he or she deems it necessary;
(ii) he or she deems it in the public interest;
(iii) it requires the urgent attention of, or an intervention by, the National Assembly;
(iv) he or she is requested to do so by the Speaker of the National Assembly; or
(v) he or she is requested to do so by the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces.
[5] PPA s 7(4)(b)(our emphasis).
[6] PPA s 7(4)(b)(i).
[7] PPA s 7(4)(b)(ii).
[8] PPA s 7(4)(b)(iii).
[9] See L Reif 'Building Democratic Institutions: The Role of National Human Rights Institutions in Good Governance and Human Rights Protection' (2000) 13 Harvard HRLJ 1, 65.
[10] These powers will often be better suited to solving a problem than a finding of right or wrong. See Owen (supra) at 55 ('In keeping with the general principle that it is the proper role of an ombudsman office to strive for the mutually acceptable resolution of a problem rather than necessarily a finding of fault or absence of it, the office should attempt to provide informal mediation services wherever such an approach may be productive. This approach not only tends to result in greater satisfaction among all parties, but frequently provides a more rapid resolution than a full investigation oriented towards a finding of right or wrong.') practice of the Public Protector suggests that it views its ADR powers as a complement to, rather than derivative of, its powers of investigation.[1]

24A.6 Access, efficacy and forum shopping

The Public Protector must take those steps necessary to make it 'accessible to all persons and communities.'[2] While meaningful access dictates that the services provided be free — which the Public Protector's services are — they must also be geographically accessible and expeditiously dispatched.

Although provision is no longer made for provincial Public Protectors,[3] the Public Protector now has offices in every province and a national office in Pretoria.[4] The Public Protector has also instituted an outreach programme to improve access for people in remote areas.[5] The pressure to implement these initiatives indicates that the current level of geographical access is less than adequate.

With regard to the speedy handling of claims, in 2004–2005 the Public Protector carried over 9 292 complaints from the previous year and received 22 350 new complaints.[6] Of the 31, 642 complaints in its docket for 2004–2005, only 17 539 were finalised. Thus, 14 103 complaints will be carried over into 2005–2006.[7] Although a special team of investigators has been created to respond to all complaints older than two years, given that most complaints reach their sell-by date after 24 months, this particular strategy might bear far less fruit than anticipated.[8] The real crisis in the Public Protector's office flows from its limited manpower. The office itself claims that the optimal number of active complaints per investigator is between 20 and 100. In 2003, the average was 111. In some provinces, active complaints per investigator average 157.[9] These numbers reflect inadequate levels of funding and threaten both the public perception of and the actual effectiveness of the Public Protector.[10]

[1] See, eg, Complaint 012/02 NC in 2003–2004 Annual Report (supra) at 57 (Complaint about compensation for electrical damage solved by negotiation); Complaint 64/01 MP in 2004–2005 Annual Report (supra) at 42 (Complainants alleged that government departments were obliged to provide them with a resource centre. The departments countered that the duty rested with a private party. At the mediation, the private party took responsibility for the provision of services. This resolution illustrates the manner in which the power to mediate disputes extends the jurisdiction of the Public Protector.) See also Complaint 1480/03 in 2004–2005 Annual Report (supra) at 65 (Successful mediation with Department of Education for reimbursement of fees.)

[2] FC s 182(4) and PPA s 6(1)(b).

[3] The provisions relating to provincial Public Protectors in the Interim Constitution, IC s 144, and the original PPA not included in the Final Constitution, and were deleted from the PPA by the Public Protector Amendment Act 113 of 1998.

[4] See 2004–2005 Annual Report (supra) at 128–9.

[5] Ibid at 14–5. Forty-three visiting points across South Africa provide service at least once per week. More regional offices are planned.

[6] 2004–5 Annual Report (supra) at 19 and 20.

[7] Ibid at 21 and 22.

[8] Ibid at 13.

[9] 2003–2004 Annual Report (supra) at 11.

[10] See § 24A.3*(b)* supra, for a discussion of the financial independence of the Public Prosecutor.

Although these numbers suggest an overwhelmed and understaffed Public Protector's office, the public appears to be getting good value for money. In 2002, 10% of finalised cases found in favour of the complainant.[1] In 99% of these cases, the state rectified the wrong.[2] When a well-founded and properly registered claim is made, the Public Protector appears to be a very accessible and highly effective alternative to the courts.[3]

The Public Protector's relatively high rate of success in securing adequate redress for complainants raises the question of when, and whether, the Public Protector ought to be treated as the preferred forum for ventilation of disputes between a citizen and the state. As it stands, the law provides only limited disincentives with respect to forum shopping.

On the one hand, the PPA permits the Public Protector to refuse to investigate any matter in which the complainant has not exhausted his legal remedies.[4] This power has been exercised in less than 1% of all complaints.[5] On the other hand, the complainant has no obligation to approach the Public Protector for assistance prior to filing suit in a court of law.[6]

If anything, the current case law suggests that a complainant might be well advised to adopt a two-pronged approach to the resolution of a dispute with a

[1] 2001–2002 Annual Report (supra) at 16. The complainant lost 9% of all cases; 50% of complaints were determined to be either premature or outside the Public Protector's jurisdiction; 4% of complaints were referred to another body to finalise; 1% of complainants were instructed to first exhaust alternative legal remedies; 26% of complaints required no further action due to a deficiency in the claim or the complaint being resolved without the Public Protector's aid. Ibid

[2] Ibid. 98% were finalised before the case closed and a further 1% after the case closed. In only one case did the state refuse to follow the recommendation: it chose to take an alternative route to address the problem.

[3] The Office of the Public Protector increases access through its acceptance of complaints in numerous formats. Personal interviews ensure that persons who are illiterate or who lack sufficient education to draft a document stating the alleged wrong can lay a complaint. Complaints registered by telephone interview ensure that those persons who lack the resources (time or money) needed to travel to a Public Protector's office are still able to file a complaint. Complaints can be also be initiated by letter. See the public information brochure issued by the Office of the Public Protector Public Protector: South Africa (2003), available at http://www.publicprotector.org/brochure_faq/11_lang/english.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2005). The brochure is available in all 11 official languages. A toll free number — 0800 11 20 40 — enables members of the public to speak directly with a member of the Public Protector's office. The office will assess both the merits of the claim and the likelihood of success should the complainant pursue it further. Ibid. Although the Office of the Public Protector will act on a purely telephonic complaint, it prefers a written complaint that includes the following: the nature of the complaint; the background and history of the complaint; the reasons why the complaint should be investigated by the Public Protector; the steps that have been taken to solve the problem; the names of the relevant officials; and copies of any correspondence. Ibid.

[4] PPA s 6(3)(b).

[5] 2001–2002 Annual Report (supra) at 16.

[6] See Ngxuza v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2001 (2) SA 609, 625 (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322, 1333 (E)('[The Public Protector and the Auditor-General] are bodies constitutionally mandated to pursue matters of this kind, but where the State fails to provide them with the means to do so it seems almost bizarre to insist that the Courts are precluded from coming to the assistance of the applicants.') See also Dabalorivhuwa Patriotic Front & Another v Government, RSA & Others [2004] JOL 12911 (T)('Dabalorivhuwa') at para 30.2.

public entity. In Mothibeli, the court held that the lodging of a complaint with the Public Protector does not count as sufficient reason for the late lodging of an application.[1] The complainant, in Mothibeli had first lodged his labour complaint with the Public Protector. After failing to receive a satisfactory response from the Public Protector, he approached the court — some 18 months after the claim arose. The Mothibeli court held that 18 months did not constitute a reasonable time within which to bring suit. The Prescription Act reinforces the view that a complaint to the Public Protector will also not prevent the running of prescription.[2]

The holding in Mothibeli makes the Public Protector a somewhat less attractive substitute for litigation. However, the Public Protector remains a free and effective mechanism for dispute resolution. Those complainants who believe that their best chance at securing the required relief is to be found in the courts are not barred from filing in both forums simultaneously. The cotemporaneous pursuit of litigation and alternative dispute resolution can only be said to defeat the purpose of creating the Public Protector if, in fact, the vast majority of complainants are obliged to adopt such a tactic. The evidence, albeit scant, does not support such a conclusion.

[1] Mothibeli v Western Vaal Metropolitan Substructure [1999] JOL 5678 (LC) at para 18 ('While the applicant may well have been entitled to approach the Public Protector for assistance, that clearly would have been a parallel exercise to the course of legal proceedings … In any event, he could not reasonably have understood that his referral of the dispute to the Public Protector could excuse him from pursuing the matter under the Labour Relations Act, including the filing of the necessary statement of claim in this Court.') See also Prinsloo v Development Bank of Southern Africa Pension Fund &Another [1999] 12 BPLR 439, 443 (PFA)(The Pension Funds Adjudicator denied application for the condonation of late application despite an earlier application to the Public Protector.)

[2] The Prescription Act provides that the running of prescription will only be interrupted by 'service on the debtor of any process whereby the creditor claims payment of the debt.' Act 68 of 1969, s 15. A complaint to the Public Protector does not amount to such service.

24B Auditor-General

Stuart Woolman
Yolandi Schutte

24B.1 Introduction. 24B–1
24B.2 Independence of the Auditor-General. 24B–4
24B.3 Functions of the Auditor-General 24B–7
(a) Constitutional and statutory duties to report 24B–7
(b) Ad hoc investigative powers. 24B–13

Functions of Auditor-General

188. (1) The Auditor-General must audit and report on the accounts, financial statements and financial management of

(a) all national and provincial state departments and administrations;

(b) all municipalities; and

(c) any other institution or accounting entity required by national or provincial legislation to be audited by the Auditor-General.

(2) In addition to the duties prescribed in subsection (1), and subject to any legislation, the Auditor-General may audit and report on the accounts, financial statements and financial management of

(a) any institution funded from the National Revenue Fund or a Provincial Revenue Fund or by a municipality; or

(b) any institution that is authorised in terms of any law to receive money for a public purpose.

(3) The Auditor-General must submit audit reports to any legislature that has a direct interest in the audit, and to any other authority prescribed by national legislation. All reports must be made public.

(4) The Auditor-General has the additional powers and functions prescribed by national legislation.

Tenure

189. The Auditor-General must be appointed for a fixed, non-renewable term of between five and ten years.

24B.1 INTRODUCTION

Unlike the other state institutions supporting constitutional democracy,[1] the Auditor-General antedates both the Interim Constitution[2] and the Final Constitution.[3] And unlike most of the other Chapter 9 Institutions, the unique legislative

* The authors would like to thank Gus Washefort for his invaluable assistance with the research for and writing of this chapter.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution') s 181(1) provides for the creation of the Public Protector; the Human Rights Commission; the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities; the Commission for Gender Equality; the Auditor-General and the Electoral Commission. For a discussion of these institutions elsewhere in this work, see, eg, Stuart Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F; Cathi Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24B; Justine White 'Independent Communication Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E; Michael Bishop & Stuart Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[3] The Exchequer and Audit Act gave South Africa its first office designed to control the public purse. Act 21 of 1911. That Act remained essentially unchanged until repealed by a new Exchequer and Audit Act. Act 32 of 1956. In 1975, the Exchequer and Audit Act expanded the Auditor-General's powers to embrace performance auditing. Act 66 of 1975. The problem with the new Act and subsequent legislation was that the Office of the Auditor-General remained dependent upon the executive for its effective administration. See Auditor-General Act 52 of 1989. Only after the passage environment within which the Auditor-General operates makes this institution the most likely to retain its independence and to discharge its responsibility to ensure that our government operates in an accountable, transparent and equitable manner.[1]

How did the Office of Auditor-General come to be the first among equals? By virtue of its position as 'the supreme audit institution of the Republic,'[2] the Auditor-General must produce financial audits and compliance audits with respect to all national and provincial departments,[3] all municipalities,[4] all public entities and a host of other institutions.[5] The purpose of these audits is to ensure the proper use of public funds. These regular public reports to Parliament and to Treasury — some 1400 annually — provide critical information about how various arms of government are managing their budgets and enable the legislature to

of the Audit Arrangement Act did the Auditor-General finally loose the chains of executive interference. Act 122 of 1992 ('AAA'). See also Office of the Auditor-General Annual Report of 1990–91 ('The unique statutory responsibilities of the Office, supported by the image of autonomy, objectivity and integrity which it has earned over the years, not only places the Office in a position of trust vis-à-vis the general public but also carries special responsibilities in the new South Africa.') The AAA transferred 'overall supervision and related matters [from the executive] to a Parliamentary oversight body, the Audit Commission.' Historical Review of the OAG (2005), available at www.agsa.co.za (accessed on 1 November 2005). See also Premier, Eastern Cape, & Others v Cekeshe & Others 1998 (4) SA 935 (Tk), 1997 (12) BCLR 1746 (Tk)(With respect to public entities in the Transkei, the Corporations Act 10 of 1985 s 10(2) provided that the 'accounts of all corporations shall be audited by the Auditor-General' while s 11(1) required the submission to the National Assembly of a financial report 'signed by the Auditor-General stating that, on the information supplied to him and to the best of his knowledge and belief, such balance sheet and statement of income and expenditure are true and correct: Provided that, if the Auditor-General is unable to make such a report or to make it without qualification, he shall set out in such report either the circumstances which prevent him from making such a report or the qualification itself.')

Whereas the Auditor-General Act ('AGA') served as the enabling legislation for the Auditor-General under the Interim Constitution, the Public Audit Act ('PAA') gives proper expression to the Final Constitution's conception of the Office of the Auditor-General. Auditor-General Act 12 of 1995; Public Audit Act 25 of 2004. Perhaps, the two most significant differences between the PAA and its predecessors are the new Act's grant of sweeping powers of search and seizure and the express expansion of the Auditor-General's authority to cover institutions in the public sector. See PAA s 16 and PAA s 4. The PAA, s 53 read with Schedule 1, repeals the Auditor-General Act and the Audit Arrangement Act in their entirety and the Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 ('PFMA'), ss 58 - 62.

[1] See Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at para 72 ('Accountability of those exercising public power is one of the founding values of our Constitution and its importance is repeatedly asserted in the Constitution.' The Court cites FC ss 1, 41(1) and 195(1)(f) in support of this proposition.) See also South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 4 ('Corruption and maladministration are inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental values of our Constitution . . . If allowed to go unchecked and unpunished they will pose a serious threat to our democratic state.')

[2] PAA s 1 defines 'the supreme audit institution of the Republic'; as 'the institution which, however designated, constituted or organized, exercises by virtue of the law of a country, the highest public auditing function of that country'.

[3] FC s 188(1)(a). PAA s 4(1).

[4] FC s 188(1)(b). PAA s 4(1).

[5] FC s 188(1)(c). PAA s 4(2).

exercise meaningful oversight over the executive.[1] As the Constitutional Court noted in President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union, the Final Constitution is, > committed to establishing and maintaining an efficient, equitable and ethical public administration which respects fundamental rights and is accountable to the broader public. The importance of ensuring that the administration observes fundamental rights and acts both ethically and accountably should not be understated. In the past, the lives of the majority of South Africans were almost entirely governed by labyrinthine administrative regulations which, amongst other things, prohibited freedom of movement, controlled access to housing, education and jobs and which were implemented by a bureaucracy hostile to fundamental rights or accountability. The constitutional goal [of ensuring that the administration observes fundamental rights and acts both ethically and accountably] is supported by a range of provisions in the [Final] Constitution . . . [including the establishment of] the Auditor-General whose responsibility it is to audit and report on the financial affairs of national and provincial State departments and administrations as well as municipalities.[2]

The Auditor-General's powers extend beyond the coercive power of shame and include the threat of forensic audits.[3] Its reports and its forensic audits expose malfeasance, corruption, and incompetence in the discharge of public

[1] See, eg, Lebowa Mineral Trust v Lebowa Granite (Pty) Ltd 2002 (3) SA 30 (T)(Enabling legislation for Trust requires annual audit by Auditor-General and tabling of report before the legislature); Esack No & Another v Commission on Gender Equality 2001 (1) SA 1299 (W), 2000 (7) BCLR 737 (W)(Commission transactions subject to audit by Auditor-General); New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 77 (Court notes that the Independent Electoral 'Commission's necessary expenditure is to be defrayed out of money appropriated by Parliament . . . and its records are to be audited by the Auditor-General. Comprehensive reporting duties are imposed on the Commission and in particular it is required annually to submit to Parliament . . . an audited statement on income and expenditure and a report in regard to its functions, activities and affairs in respect of such financial year.') See also I Rautenbach & E Malherbe Constitutional Law (2002) 212. Of course, someone must watch the watchers. The Auditor-General must submit an annual report to the National Assembly on its activities. See PAA s 10(2)(a)-(b). See also FC s 181(2)("These [Chapter 9] institutions are accountable to the National Assembly, and must report on their activities and the performance of their functions to the Assembly at least once a year.') PAA s 10(3) requires that the National Assembly create the oversight mechanism contemplated by FC s 55(2)(b)(ii). Courts may play a role with respect to the oversight of the Auditor-General. See Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2005 (4) SA 212 (SCA)(Court dismisses applicant's suit against Auditor-General for improper discharge of duties that allegedly led to financial irregularities by other officials.)

[2] President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at paras 133–134.

[3] See Office of the Auditor-General Activity Report for 2003 — 2004 RP 211/2004 (2005) 23 ('Activity Report')('Forensic auditing is an independent process aimed at preventing or detecting economic crime in the public sector. The process mainly comprises an objective assessment of the measures instituted by accounting officers and other relevant role players to prevent and detect economic crime, but it can also include economic crime investigations when this is appropriate and seems necessary . . . [T]he term "economic crime" is used to describe various crime categories, including fraud, forgery, theft and other contraventions of applicable statutes (e.g. corruption).') See also Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 164.

office that enable other law enforcement agencies to launch criminal investigations.[1] Case law suggests that the Auditor-General himself may even possess standing to seek rescission of decisions or contracts that manifest fraud.[2]

Whilst the breadth of its investigatory powers may distinguish the Auditor-General from other Chapter 9 Institutions, another unique feature of the Auditor-General is its fiscal independence. The Auditor-General's ability to generate significant revenue streams from fees charged for audit services ensures that it has the money necessary to discharge its constitutional duties. These financial resources immunize the Auditor-General from some of the budgetary pressures that have undermined the independence of other Chapter 9 Institutions.[3]

24B.2 INDEPENDENCE OF THE AUDITOR-GENERAL

Chapter 9 Institutions often struggle with two distinct but related forms of independence: political autonomy and financial viability.

The Constitutional Court addressed the nature of the political independence required of the Office of Auditor-General during the certification process for the Final Constitution. The crisp question before the Court in the First Certification Judgment was whether the Constitutional Assembly had given adequate effect to Constitutional Principle ('CP') XXIX. CP XXIX read as follows:

> The independence and impartiality of a Public Service Commission, a Reserve Bank, an Auditor-General and a Public Protector shall be provided for and safeguarded by the Constitution in the interests of the maintenance of effective public finance and administration and a high standard of professional ethics in the public service.[4]

[1] Although this chapter speaks generally about the Auditor-General's role in rooting out corruption, the term 'corruption' here is broadly construed. As Sole notes, '[c]orruption may vary from the clearly illegal — such as fraud — to more subtle forms of unethical rent-seeking, patronage and abuses of power that may be just as damaging to the social fabric of a nation.' See Sam Sole 'The State of Corruption and Accountability' in John Daniel, Roger Southall & Jessica Lutchman (eds) State of the Nation: South Africa 2004–2005 (2005) 86. Sole suggests the following definition — one that fits the broad brief of the Auditor-General's Office: 'corruption is the wilful subversion (or attempted subversion) of a due decision-making process with regard to the allocation of any benefit.' Ibid at 87. For example, an Auditor-General's report on Transnet led the National Prosecuting Authority to launch a probe into the inappropriate manner in which medical scheme benefits were handled by officials in the Department of Correctional Services. See Sheena Adams 'Scorpions Probe Medical Aid Fraud' The Mercury (5 October 2004). The corruption uncovered by the Auditor-General and the Scorpions in this matter fits a general pattern of political malfeasance. See John Hyslop 'Political Corruption: Before and After Apartheid' Conference on State and Society in South Africa (University of the Witwatersrand 2004) 17 ('Under Mandela, and even more, under Mbeki, government policy encouraged rent-seeking behaviour by black entrepreneurs through the economic preferences they were given through a whole gamut of policies, especially those relating to the awarding of state contracting and corporate ownership. The tendency of such policies was to create a climate in which the line between legal forms of rent-seeking and outright corruption and cronyism became . . . blurred. . . . [O]ld struggle networks provided political connections which could be parlayed into economic leverage.')

[2] See Minister of Local Government and Land Tenure & Another v Sizwe Development & Others: In re Sizwe Development v Flagstaff Municipality 1991 (1) SA 677, 678 - 679 (Tk).

[3] PAA s 36.

[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 160.

Section 194 of the first constitutional text submitted for certification by the Constitutional Assembly stated that a simple majority of the members of the National Assembly could remove the Auditor-General from office. The Constitutional Court held that this removal procedure was insufficient to vouchsafe the Auditor-General's independence and impartiality. The Court wrote:

> [T]he Auditor-General is to be a watch-dog over the government. However, the focus of the office is not inefficient or improper bureaucratic conduct, but the proper management and use of public money. . . . Against the background of the purpose of the office, it is our view that the dismissal provisions . . . are not sufficient to meet the requirements of CP XXIX.

The dismissal provisions were subsequently amended. The Final Constitution now requires that a resolution for the removal from office of the Auditor-General receive the votes of at least two thirds of the members of the National Assembly.[1]

As we noted at the outset, the Auditor-General's ability to generate additional revenue from fees charged for auditing services enhances its political independence.[2] (It also benefits from income streams derived from investments and the alienation of moveable property.) In 2003 and 2004, Auditor-General earned R525 000 000 and R495 000 000 from auditing fees charged to national, provincial and local government as well as other public and international entities.[3] While other Chapter 9 Institutions constantly complain that they are under-funded and under-resourced,[4] and therefore incapable of discharging their constitutional

[1] The Constitutional Court found that the amended provision complied with CP XXIX, and went on to certify the amended text. Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 134 ('Second Certification Judgement')('The AT substantially enhances the independence of both the Public Protector and the Auditor-General. AT 193(5)(b)(i) now provides that the resolution of the NA recommending their appointment be passed with a supporting vote of at least 60% of the members of the NA and AT 194(2)(a) now provides that the resolution of the NA calling for their removal from office must be adopted with a supporting vote of at least two-thirds of the members of the NA. We are now satisfied that the terms of CP XXIX have been met in respect of both the Public Protector and the Auditor-General.')

[2] PAA s 36.

[3] Activity Report (supra) at 11 (Table 1). However, the fiscal independence promised by these fees is only as good as the ability or the willingness of the audited entitees to make good. Local government has been notorious for its failure to pay its statutorily required fees. See Linda Loxton 'Fakie Seeks R100m from Municipalities' Business Report (12 March 2003).

[4] Under-funding of the Chapter 9 Institutions is a common problem. Parliament has been put on notice that low levels of funding and an executive policy of malign neglect make effective operation of these institutions difficult, if not impossible. The Corder Report is absolutely scathing in this regard. See Hugh Corder, Sara Jagwanth & Fred Soltau 'Report on Parliamentary Oversight and Accountability' Report to the Speaker of the National Assembly (1999), available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001/viewminute.php?id=811 (accessed 10 January 2005)('Corder Report'). Corder, Jagwanth and Soltau write that

> In their submissions to us, many constitutional institutions have also pointed out that the present arrangement may result in a very low priority being given to constitutional institutions as government departments may be slow in recognising the interests of an institution which does not form part of the core business of the department. The very direct control by the executive of constitutional institutions can have a devastating effect on the independence and credibility of these offices. . . . In the first place, duties, the Auditor-General's Office has voiced no similar sentiment.[1] It is, perhaps, the only Chapter 9 Institution to be truly both financially and administratively independent of national government.[2] to make institutions dependent on budget allocations received through the very departments that they are required to monitor is not desirable. Secondly, these institutions must be seen by the public to be independent and free of the possibility of influence or pressure by the executive branch of the government. Approval by the executive of budgets, or other issues such as staffing, is thus inconsistent with independence, as well as the need to be perceived as independent by the public when dealing with their cases. This executive power could render impotent state institutions supporting constitutional democracy through the potential denial of both financial and human resources. Furthermore, the special constitutional features of these institutions are not recognised as executive priorities are set.

'Corder Report' (supra) at paras 7.2 and 7.2.1. The Corder Report suggests that, at a minimum, the budget of each Chapter 9 Institution be subject to a separate vote — a vote distinct from that for the budget for the department with line authority, and a vote distinct from that for the budget of other Chapter 9 Institutions. Ibid at para 7.3. To meet other constitutional imperatives, the Corder Report advocates the passage of legislation — an Accountability and Independence of Constitutional Institutions Act — and the creation of a parliamentary oversight committee — a Standing Committee on Constitutional Institutions. Ibid at paras 1.1, 7.3, 7.4, 8. Parliament has not acted on any of the Corder Report recommendations. Other Chapter 9 Institutions have noted this failure to act with dismay. See N Barney Pityana 'South African Human Rights Commission Presentation to the Justice Portfolio Committee — Budget Review and Programmes 2001/2002' (8 June 2001), available at www.sahrc.gov.za (accessed on 11 January 2005). Chairperson Pityana writes:

After five years of operations, it is very discouraging to have to report that questions about the independence of the Commission have not been resolved. . . . National Treasury continues to relate to the Commission through the Justice Department. This means that we have no direct means of having queries and problems resolved. . . . Since inception, the Commission has constantly raised concerns about the manner in which its budget was set. We pointed out ad nauseum that at no stage was there a proper assessment of the mandate of the Commission and the appropriate level of resources necessary to execute the mandate.

Ibid at 4–5. For more on the under-funding of Chapter 9 Institutions, generally, and the under-funding of the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities, in particular, see Stuart Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

[1] But see Office of the Auditor-General Activity Report for 2003 — 2004 RP 211/2004 (2005) 23 ('I am happy to report that over the last three years we have been able to achieve a significant improvement in the quality of our audits. Unfortunately there was some deterioration in the number of findings with regard to the fieldwork stage of the audit process during 2003-04. This is a matter of grave concern to my office and myself, which will be closely monitored in the next audit cycle. We are also implementing an enhanced quality control process to address quality management more holistically. It is envisaged that these measures will ensure that improvement is attained in the quality of our audits.')

[2] As one of the authors has written elsewhere in this work, the Constitutional Court in New National Party establishes a two-part test for Chapter 9 Institution independence. See Michael Bishop & Stuart Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24A, citing New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('NNP') at paras 98 — 99 (Court defines 'financial independence' as the possession of sufficient funds to discharge its constitutional obligations. 'Administrative independence' denotes the absence of state control over the manner in which the institution performs its functions.) The Constitutional Court identified two essential desiderata for financial independence. Firstly, the Chapter 9 Institution must have sufficient funding to fulfil its constitutional mandate. Secondly, the funds must come from Parliament and not from the executive. Although the New National Party Court views the source of the funds as a requirement for financial independence, the source of funds would seem, at first blush, to only become

24B.3 FUNCTIONS OF THE AUDITOR-GENERAL

(a) Constitutional and statutory duties to report

As FC s 188 makes clear, the Auditor-General must audit all state departments and administrations, all municipalities and any other institution or accounting entity so required by national or provincial legislation.[1] The Auditor-General may, in addition, audit other state institutions that receive public monies for public purposes.[2] relevant if the funds provided are insufficient. If the funds are sufficient for the discharge of the Chapter 9 Institution's duties, then any issue regarding the source of the funds could, as a logical matter, never arise. However, the New National Party Court, without saying as much, would appear to have concerns beyond those of mere fiscal viability. The Court seems somewhat vexed by the ability of Chapter 9 Institutions to discharge their oversight responsibilities with respect to the executive if the executive retains the discretion to decrease (or increase) funding. When questions of sufficiency of funds do arise, whether the executive is, in fact, the source of those funds will enter into the Court's assessment of the independence of the institution. Thus, it is for reasons of political autonomy that the New National Party Court signals its preference for Chapter 9 Institutions such as the Public Protector to be funded directly by Parliament. See also Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Langeberg') at para 27 (On the meaning of independence with respect to the Chapter 9 Institutions, the Constitutional Court wrote that 'independence cannot exist in the air, and it is clear that the chapter [on co-operative government] intends to make a distinction between the state and the government, and the independence of the Commission is intended to refer to independence from government, whether local, provincial or national.')

The courts have also developed an objective test for 'independence' with respect to courts and other tribunals that ought to apply equally to institutions such as the Auditor-General. See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 71 quoting with approval R v Valente (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161 (SCC)('Although there is obviously a close relationship between independence and impartiality, they are nevertheless separate and distinct values or requirements. Impartiality refers to a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case. The word "impartial" . . . connotes absence of bias, actual or perceived. The word "independent" in s 11*(d)* reflects or embodies the traditional constitutional value of judicial independence. As such, it connotes not merely a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions, but a status or relationship to others, particularly the Executive branch of government, that rests on objective conditions or guarantees. . . . Both independence and impartiality are fundamental not only to the capacity to do justice in a particular case but also to individual and public confidence in the administration of justice. Without that confidence the system cannot command the respect and acceptance that are essential to its effective operation. It is, therefore, important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception'); Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 164 (With respect to the independence of Magistrates, 'whose functions . . [like those of the Auditor-General] involve matters of great sensitivity in which there could well be confrontation between the functionaries concerned and members of the Legislature and the Executive, a higher level of protection would certainly not be inappropriate'); Freedom of Expression Institute & Others v President, Ordinary Court Martial, & Others 1999 (2) SA 471 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 261 (C) at paras 23–25 ('[T]he appropriate test is whether the tribunal from the objective standpoint of a reasonable and informed person will be perceived as enjoying the essential conditions of independence'); South African National Defence Union & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10, 39 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1054 (T) (On application of test for 'independence' to a military tribunal.)

[1] FC s 188(1) and PAA s 4 identify the spheres of government and organs of state subject to mandatory audits and reports.

[2] FC s 188(2) and PAA s 5 make provision for discretionary audits and reports.

The Public Audit Act extends these constitutionally-mandated audit functions to all constitutional institutions[1] and to any public entity listed in the Public Finance Management Act and the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act that may require the Auditor-General's services.[2] The Auditor-General demonstrates its even-handedness through the oversight process itself: on the one hand, it provides advice to legislatures and their committees assessing the performance of an agency or department; on the other hand, it assists auditees with their replies to inquiries launched by legislatures subsequent to the legislatures' review of an audit report.[3]

As a general rule, the Auditor-General carries out audits, but does not opine on the merits of particular government programmes. However, while the Auditor-General will not 'question policy laid down by the legislative and executive authority, the arrangements for the implementation thereof, the controls applied, the cost incurred and the results achieved are all legitimate subjects for auditing.'[4] What this means is that although the government's objectives fall beyond the purview of the Auditor-General, the Auditor-General can interrogate the means the government employs to realize its objectives. When it comes to the expenditure of public monies, the Auditor-General has an obligation to state whether the financial audits and the compliance audits reflect a problem with the implementation of a policy or the delivery of services.[5]

[1] PAA s 4(1)(b).

[2] PAA s 4(3)(a). See Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 ('PFMA'); Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 ('LGMSA'). For more on the constitutional and statutory framework to distribute, to control and to monitor the expenditure of public funds, see Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 25.

[3] PAA s 5 (1)(c). The PAA and PFMA place a number of substantive constraints on the auditing activities of the Auditor-General designed to ensure its independence and impartiality. First, it may not undertake audits or offer services — for fees — that compromise its constitutional and statutory obligations. Second, the Auditor-General may not provide advice or services that have a direct bearing on the formulation of policy. PAA s 5(1)(a)(iii).

[4] Office of the Auditor-General Report on the Financial Statements of the Provincial Administration of the Northern Cape (31 March 1998) 7.

[5] For example, the Auditor-General in its Report on the Financial Statements of the Provincial Administration of the Northern Cape found that only 1 of 17 departments warranted an unqualified financial audit report — 7 were qualified and 9 had disclaimers — and only 5 out of 17 departments deserved unqualified compliance reports — 11 were qualified and 1 has a disclaimer. These findings stand as a scathing indictment of the provincial administration and raises serious doubts about the capacity of current personnel asked to carry out policy. Ibid at 9. If the capacity does not exist to execute the policy, then the policy itself must be called into question. Activity Report (supra) at 19. This diagram illustrates the role played by the Auditor-General in the accountability process. Parliament — through legislation like the PFMA — and the Department of the Treasury — through

The general reports, the special reports and the individual audits made publicly available by the Auditor-General over the course of the last five years offer a detailed account of both the achievements of and the maladministration in South African government. In 2000, some 38% of financial audits for national departments received qualified reports.[1] The reasons for the qualifications ranged from 'limited or no audit performed, resulting in a disclaimer of opinion or adverse opinion; liabilities and creditors that could not be verified; loans, debtors and investments that were either misstated, or of which the recovery was doubtful; assets, including stock, stores and inventory, that could not be verified; misstatement of income; irregularities in disclosing expenditure; unacceptable financial statements for trading accounts.'[2] The national departments fared even more poorly with respect to compliance audits: over 57% of national departments received qualified reports because of 'serious shortcomings in internal checking and control; non-compliance with other prescripts, including legislation and Treasury regulations; unauthorised expenditure that was incurred; insufficient control over personnel expenditure; and serious deficiencies in provisioning administration.'[3] The financial state of provincial government and local government was abysmal. So few adequate controls existed at the provincial level that regulations issued in terms of the Division of Revenue Act — establish the reporting requirements that various state actors must follow. The diagram describes this as Process 1. The reporting requirements themselves focus largely 'on the financial performance of the entity.' Ibid. The problem with the information elicited in financial statements — Process 2 — is that the financial statements do not really satisfy the needs of the oversight bodies. What oversight bodies such as the Standing Committee on Public Accounts ('SCOPA') and Treasury really need are qualitative assessments of a public entity's performance. The real benchmark is delivery. Thus, the Auditor-General notes that 'an expectation gap' opens up between what the public entity and the Auditor-General are required by the Final Constitution and statute to provide — financial audits, Process 3 — and what the oversight bodies actually need to determine whether public monies have been well spent. As it stands, while the Auditor-General can undertake the kind of performance audits — Process 4 — meaningful oversight requires, it currently does so only on an ad hoc basis. Ibid at 20.

[1] A financial audit is the examination of financial records of an organization in order to verify that the figures in the financial reports are relevant, accurate, and complete. A financial audit fulfils the 'attest' function: an independent party — in this case the Auditor-General — provides written assurance (the audit report) that financial reports are 'fairly presented in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles.' Unlike financial audits — which interrogate the effectiveness of management — compliance audits examine compliance with statutory and regulatory obligations. A complaince audit requires the review of organizational records so as to determine to test for the adequacy of system controls, to ensure that policy and operational procedures are followed, to detect breaches in security, and to recommend any indicated changes in control, policy and procedures. A qualified report signals the absence of sufficient information, the presence of misinformation or other forms of non-compliance with accepted accounting procedures that does not permit the auditor to come to a meaningful conclusion about the actual fiscal state of the entity under review. A disclaimer indicates a wholesale failure to keep adequate financial records and implies negligence bordering on the criminal.

[2] Office of the Auditor-General General Report for 1999–2000 RP 75/2000 (2001) 15 ('General Report 2000') 3, 15–21.

[3] Ibid at 4, 22–30.

the Auditor-General could not issue a report on the 1999–2000 fiscal year and was obliged to limit his assessments to completed audits from the previous financial year. Even with respect to these audits, the majority had to be qualified because internal departmental audits were largely unreliable and asset registers were either non-existent or incomplete. Given the parlous state of local government at the time — the report noted the 'short-term deteriorating financial position at many municipalities' — some solace could be taken in the fact that 31% of the municipalities audited received unqualified reports.[1]

The most recent general report illustrates both an improvement in the administration of government and the increased vigilance of the Auditor-General.[2] The report noted that nearly 25% of national departments — 8 of 33 — received 'qualified' audit opinions.[3] Of the remaining audits, the Auditor-General identified ongoing problems associated with asset management, administration of transfer payments and internal auditing.[4] Inaccurate asset registers and inadequate administration of transfer payments make national departments susceptible to fraud, irregularities and poor performance and pose a material risk to public funds.[5] Viewed in isolation, the Auditor-General's report would be quite alarming indeed. However, when viewed against the background of earlier reports, the most recent general report warrants a cautious optimism. For not only are the numbers better, the high numbers of qualified audits identified in previous reports have had the intended consequence of forcing improved internal departmental compliance with PAA, PFMA and other statutory reporting requirements.

Even provincial departments — whose history of maladministration regularly elicits calls for their elimination — have fared better. While only 14 out of 27 provincial departments of education, health and social development (52%) received unqualified opinions,[6] that 52% reflects a marked improvement over [1] General Report 2000 (supra) at 6, 36–45. A better indication of the improvement in local government internal control mechanisms is reflected in the number of timeous audits. In the financial year 1997–1998, only 3% of municipalities delivered the required information at the end of the financial year. See Office of the Auditor-General General Report on Local Government (2003) 12. By 2001–2002, that number had increased to 67%. Ibid. The reporting requirements of the Municipal Finance Management Act ('MFMA') provides another rubric through which one might assess local government capacity. Act 56 of 2003. See Office of the Auditor-General R*eport on the Submission of Financial Statements by Municipalities for the Financial Year Ended 30 June 2005* (2005). In the most recent report, the Auditor-General, acting in terms of MFMA s 126, declared that '[o]f the 284 municipalities, only 148 (52 per cent) met the submission date . . . prescribed by the MFMA and a 'further 35 (12 per cent) submitted annual financial statements' within the month thereafter. Ibid at 3. In the preceding year, 2004, only six per cent met the submission date of 31 August 2004, and a mere twenty-nine per cent submitted annual financial statements in the month thereafter. Ibid.

[2] Office of the Auditor-General General Report for 2003–2004 RP 210/2004 (2005)('General Report 2005').

[3] Ibid at 3–11.

[4] See Ted Keenan 'Auditor-General: Fighting Fraud with the Best of Them' Finance Week (12 July 2002) 16 (Explains reports of continued high levels of maladministration in terms of the increase in the Auditor-General's powers, staff and capacity.)

[5] General Report 2005 (supra) at 12–26.

[6] Ibid.

the mere 15% of provincial departments that received unqualified opinions for 1999.[1] The rest of the news from the provinces will not silence critics. The Auditor-General notes that risks associated with the failure to follow basic accounting protocols and the lack of qualified personnel to enforce such protocols pose short-term and long-term risks for the health of the fiscus.[2]

These Auditor-General's reports — and the problems the reports identify — have a critical role to play in the creation of a polity committed to the rule of law and for the restoration of society's faith in a government of, by and for the people.[3] The power of these reports to shame some government officials into taking appropriate action is reflected in several of the cases that have arisen out of normal audits and forensic investigations undertaken by the Auditor-General.[4] It is also echoed in constructive responses to criticism[5] and promises to root out sources of corruption and inefficiency.[6]

[1] To give one a sense of how significant provincial expenditure is — and how critical proper provincial administration is for both service delivery and the public fiscus — the Auditor-General notes that the total expenditure of R119 billion by the provincial departments of Education, Health and Social Development exceeds the total expenditure of R114 billion for all national departments. See General Report 2005 (supra) at 12–26.

[2] Public entities appeared to fare even worse. Most had failed to comply with the public reporting requirements of Public Finance Management Act and an equal number had failed to meet statutory requirements for tabling reports before Parliament. In addition, four public entities received disclaimers of audit opinions. Ibid at 27–35.

[3] Experts ranked the Auditor-General second, after the Special Investigating Unit, with respect to their perceived success in combating official corruption. See Lala Camerer Corruption in South Africa: Results of an Expert Panel Survey Institute for Security Studies Monograph 65 (September 2001) Chapter 6 ('A significant proportion (48%) of the respondents saw the office of the Auditor-General as effective in fighting corruption, with more than a quarter (26%) seeing it as very effective. Slightly more than a tenth (14%) of the respondents regarded the office as not very effective, while a mere 5% saw it as not effective at all. A total of 7% responded that they did not know enough to rank the office.')

[4] See Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian Ltd & Another 2004 (6) SA 329 (SCA), 2004 (11) BCLR 1182 (SCA)(Auditor-General's report of irregularities in tender for housing contract and a call for a commission of inquiry into improper benefits bestowed upon friends of the Minister supported Court's finding that published criticism of the appellant was reasonable under the circumstance and thus not defamatory); Young v Shaikh 2004 (3) SA 46 (C)(Arms deal report by the Auditor-General, the Public Protector, and the Director of Public Prosecutions led to accusations, in the media, of corruption. Court finds accusations made by the defendant — based in part on the report, but otherwise not fully corroborated — to be defamatory.) See also Kruger v Johnnic Publishing (Pty) Ltd & Another 2004 (4) SA 306 (T)(Findings by Auditor-General of mismanagement and irregularities at a school led to allegations of corruption that prompted an ultimately unsuccessful suit for defamation.)

[5] Yearly criticism of the South African Revenue Service ('SARS') by the Auditor-General in annual reports tabled before SCOPA ultimately led SARS to overhaul its internal auditing systems and to procure the technology necessary to manage its assets. The tabling of an unqualified financial audit of SARS before SCOPA was hailed by a SARS commissioner, Pravin Gordan, as a clear indication that SARS is a 'service organization that handles taxpayers' money efficiently.' Linda Loxton 'Gordhan Delighted with SARS Clean Bill of Health' Business Report (24 September 2004).

[6] After receiving two consecutive years worth of disclaimers by the Auditor-General in reports to Parliament, and in the face of mounting evidence that the Unemployment Insurance Fund had failed to comply with the PFMA, the Minister of Labour committed himself to the appointment of managers who would ensure future compliance with the PFMA. See Christine Terrblanche 'Minister under Pressure over UIF' The Mercury (20 September 2004). Similarly, a forensic audit by the Auditor-General that revealed millions of rands in losses at Transnet due to an irregular scrap metal contract that had by-passed normal procurement procedures was hailed by SCOPA — which had called for the investigation — as evidence that corruption could be effectively rooted out of government. See 'Audit Finds Transnet Lost Millions through Irregular Scrap Metal Deal' Business Report (18 July 2003).

The courts have reinforced this power to shame by expressly recognizing that the Auditor-General is the most appropriate arbiter of disputes over the use or misuse of public funds.[1] Whether the directly accountable branches of government — Parliament and the provincial legislatures — will heed the Auditor-General's words or reduce it to the role of Cassandra remains to be seen.[2]

[1] See Ritchie & Another v Government, Northern Cape, & Others 2004 (2) SA 584 (NC) at paras 21 –23 (Court held that that the state's decision to fund the private defamation actions of public officials was an internal provincial government matter not susceptible of review by the courts, and that the matter fell within the domain of the Auditor-General for a determination as to whether the expenditure had been authorized.)

[2] The Office of the Auditor-General has, in the recent past, been quite critical of the government's lassitude with respect to the Office's reports of egregious, and often willful, maladministration by national and provincial departments, municipalities and public entities. In its General Report 2000, the Office wrote:

> The extent to which audit information effectively contributes toward accountability and transparency not only depends on the quality of the information provided in the various audit reports. It is also critically dependent on the success with which such information is further processed and the response it evokes in the concluding phase of the accountability process. In this respect the role of the public accounts committee is vital. . . . The Standing Committee on Public Accounts (SCOPA) is the mechanism through which the National Assembly exercises oversight over the receipt and expenditure of public money. The extent to which the committee appreciates the issues raised in the respective audit reports and pursues them through effective oversight practices will determine whether appropriate and sufficient pressure will be brought to bear on the various accountable authorities. . . . The committee also did not always succeed in following up unresolved matters. Given the reconsideration of roles and processes, to a large extent brought about by the Public Finance Management Act, it may be prudent to examine the weaknesses of SCOPA's post-review processes in order to ensure that its recommendations have the desired impact on financial management in the public sector at national level. As it will be in the interests of accountability and useful for the committee and the public, and given the lack of resources of the committee, I shall in future report periodically on the status of implementation of the committee's recommendations. This is in line with international practice

Office of the Auditor-General General Report of the Auditor-General: Year Ended 31 March 2000 (2001) 10. Recent reports in the media suggest that that SCOPA's post-review process is improving as a result of the pressure applied by the Auditor-General. See Linda Loxton 'Gordhan Delighted with SARS Clean Bill of Health' Business Report (24 September 2004)(After years of qualified reports, and criticism from SCOPA, SARS received an unqualified financial audit.) However, the ANC's decision to 'break with tradition and permanently take over the chair' of SCOPA — thus departing from Commonwealth practice of having the chair come from the ranks of an opposition party — have led to inevitable questions over whether SCOPA possesses sufficient independence to operate as a meaningful check on executive power. See Christine Terrblanche & Mzwakhe Hlangani 'Opposition Dismay as ANC Takes Over Control of SCOPA' Cape Times (10 May 1994); Sam Sole 'The State of Corruption and Accountability' in John Daniel, Roger Southall & Jessica Lutchman (eds) State of the Nation: South Africa 2004–2005 (2005) 107 ('Party heavies were deployed to lay down the party line in SCOPA, thus destroying the tradition of non-partisanship the committee had built up.') A recent report by the United Nations Report on Drugs and Crime underwrites the Auditor-General's scepticism about the capacity of Parliament to rein in errant members of the executive and officials in the state apparatus. See United Nations Report on Drugs and Crime Country Corruption Assessment Report: South Africa (2003)('UN Corruption Report'), available at http://www.info.gov.za/reports/2003/corruption.pdf (accessed on 5 November 2005)('Members of Parliament, who are aware of corruption within the ranks, feel they are supposed to act but, all too often, when a corrupt official is exposed, party discipline is imposed.')

(b) Ad hoc investigative powers

Both the Final Constitution and the Public Audit Act grant the Auditor-General the power to launch ad hoc investigations.[1] The Auditor-General is authorized to carry out any appropriate investigation where the public interest or the gravamen of a particular complaint justifies such an intervention.[2] The Arms Deal Report issued by the Auditor-General, the Public Protector and the National Director of Public Prosecutions offers a portrait of the kinds of challenges that the Auditor-General faces when wielding his investigatory powers in the face of stiff political opposition.[3]

The Auditor-General was involved in the 'arms deal' procurement process from the very beginning. It had recognized the procurement of the Strategic Defence Package ('SDP') as an area fraught with risk as early as November 1998. However, nearly two years elapsed before the Department of Defence ('DoD') and the Parliamentary Standing Committee of Public Accounts ('SCOPA') agreed to a special review of the procurement process.[4] The Auditor-General, the Public Protector and the National Director of Public Prosecutions were then given the authority to conduct a joint investigation.[5] The Auditor-General compared the actual procurement process with the approved process, analyzed possible conflicts of interest and interrogated the reported cost and the real cost of the arms deal to the state.

The Auditor-General's role in the arms deal investigation led to litigation between the Auditor-General and CCII Systems (Pty) Ltd ('CCII').[6] After being

[1] PAA s 5.

[2] PAA s 5(1)(d). These investigations are limited to the bodies identified in PAA ss 4(1) and 4(3). See, eg, Nextcom (Pty) Ltd v Funde No & Others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T)(Regarding a dispute over the tender process for, and the subsequent award by the government of, a 3rd cell-phone operator license, a report by the Auditor-General to Parliament expressed concern about the SATRA CEO's apparent conflict of interests with respect to the tender process.)

[3] During the period 1995–1996, the Ministry of Defence engaged in a strategic defence review. The review analyzed current stock and existing shortcomings in the equipment of the South African National Defence Force ('SANDF'). The Department of Defence developed, cotemporaneously, four different force design options. The Strategic Defence Package approved by Parliament served as the template for the SANDF's acquisition and procurement process. Charges of corruption and tainted tenders have plagued the 'arms deal' for almost a decade. Strategic Defence Packages Joint Report (2001), available at http://www.agsa.co.za (accessed on 15 September 2005)('SDP Joint Report').

[4] Special Review by the Auditor-General of the Selection Process of Strategic Defence Packages for the Acquisition of Armaments at the Department of Defence RP161/2000 (2000), available at http://www.agsa.co.za/Reports/special/Special/RP161_2000.pdf (accessed on 15 September 2005). It was not until 28 September 1999 that the Minister of Defence gave authorization for the SDP audit. The report was signed and finalized on 15 September 2000.

[5] The Heath Special Investigation Unit (SIU) did not form part of the joint task force. In January 2001, long after the fact, the President made his reasons for this decision public. He stated that, given the findings of the Constitutional Court in South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others, the SIU could not, as it was then constituted, contribute meaningfully to an independent investigation of the SDP. 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)(Court held that a judge cannot head a special investigation unit).

[6] CCII Systems (Pty) Ltd v SA Fakie NNO & Others (Open Democracy Advice Centre, as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 325 (T)('CCII').

deselected during the tender process, CCII filed a specific complaint with the joint investigative team. Upon release of the Joint Investigative Team's Report ('JIT Report'), CCII brought suit against the Auditor-General.

CCII had, during the investigation, contended that the product of the contractor chosen for the SDP was inferior to that of CCII, that CCII's competitors were given unfair access to the specifications of CCII products and price structure and that the tender process was rife with irregularities and conflicts of interest.[1] The Joint Investigative Team largely agreed with CCII's contentions. It found that: the list of nominated suppliers did not satisfy the requirement of a 'fair and transparent procurement practice';[2] proper tender procedures were not followed; a 'probable' conflict of interest amounted to non-compliance with good procurement practice;[3] and CCII's bid was solicited solely to lower its competitors' bids.[4]

However, rather than recommend that the DoD initiate a new tender process, the joint report advised that systems be put in place to ensure that such irregularities should not recur.[5] The host of documented irregularities throughout the report married to the Joint Investigative Team's refusal to implicate the government in wrongdoing 'severely compromised' the credibility of the each member of the Joint Investigative Team ('JIT').[6]

CCII was, quite naturally, not satisfied with the purely prospective nature of the remedies recommended in the joint report. In anticipation and in furtherance of litigation to overturn the tender award, CCII applied to the Auditor-General, in terms of s 18 of the Promotion of Access to Information Act ('PAIA'),[7] for access to: (a) all draft versions of the report; (b) all audit files concerning the SDP for the period 1 January 1998 to 20 November 2001; (c) all correspondence concerning the SDP between the Auditor-General and the DoD for the period 1 January 1998 to 20 November 2001; (d) all the documents concerning the SDP between the Auditor-General and the Public Protector, again from 1 January 1998 to 20 November 2001.[8] The Auditor-General denied the request on grounds ranging from an assertion that the document production process was so onerous that it would divert the Auditor-General from its core business, to an unsubstantiated contention that the disclosure of some documents would violate third party confidentiality agreements, to the rather pedestrian defence that disclosure of some documents would prejudice

[1] See SDP Joint Report (supra) at para 11.3.
[2] Ibid at para 11.11.2.3.
[3] Ibid at paras 11.11.3.4–5.
[4] Ibid at paras 11.11.6.2–3.
[5] Ibid at Chapter 14.
[6] Sole (supra) at 86. See also Gavin Woods 'A Critique of the JIT Report' available at http://www.armsdeal-vpo.co.za/special items/reports/accountability_failure.html (accessed on 3 October 2005).
[7] Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000.
[8] CCII (supra) at para 3.

the defence and security of the Republic.[1] The CCII Court found baseless the Auditor-General's blanket rebuff to the PAIA request. Hartzenberg J held that, under PAIA s 81, the onus lay on the Auditor-General to identify the specific documents it wished to withhold and to describe the basis upon which it claimed protection.[2] The Auditor-General's 'overwhelming volume' approach to this document request ran counter to the more nuanced assessment of privilege required by PAIA. As a result, Hartzenberg J held that Auditor-General was obliged to produce the relevant documents and offer reasons for the redaction of or refusal to produce any document.[3] The Auditor-General's role as a government watchdog meant that it had to take extraordinary steps to ensure that it was viewed as impartial and independent — even if that meant the Auditor-General was obliged to employ extra staff.[4]

Despite the rather disconcerting conclusions reached by the Auditor-General with respect to an especially damning body of evidence, the Joint Investigative Team Report led, almost inexorably, to the conviction of Shabir Shaik on three counts of corruption and the axing of former Deputy President Jacob Zuma. Other ad hoc investigations conducted by the Auditor-General have produced probes of correctional services officials by the National Prosecuting Authority,[5] the revocation of the Government Printing Works' overdraft facilities at the Reserve Bank because they contravened national treasury regulations,[6] the identification of several thousand senior and junior officials who had failed to declare their interests in firms doing business with their departments,[7] the mooting of possible criminal charges against a former advisor to the Premier of Mmpumalanga[8] and serious and as yet unresolved allegations of fraud within the Department of Justice and Constitutional Affairs.[9] As we

[1] See CCII (supra) at para 4. Perhaps most disappointing to supporters of the Auditor-General's efforts is the willingness to fall-back on this standard refrain of government actors when it comes to non-compliance with statutes and regulations designed to facilitate good governance: it is too time-consuming. See UN Corruption Report (supra)(UNODC study finds '[s]erious weakenesses and shortcomings in the capacity and the will of public sector bodies to implement and to comply with the laws. For example, certain public bodies view some of the legislation — (eg, Access to Information) — as too demanding of resources.')

[2] CCII (supra) at paras 16–17.

[3] Ibid at para 22.

[4] Ibid at para 17. In addition, Hartzenberg J suggested that given the importance of transparency and accountability in our constitutional democracy, 'one of the objects of [PAIA] must be that citizens can get information regarding wrongs perpetrated against them to enable them to hold the wrongdoers accountable in a court of law.' Ibid.

[5] See Office of the Auditor-General Report on Findings Arising from a special investigation into Alleged Irregularities among senior officials of the Department of Correctional Services RP 123/1999 (1999); Sheena Adams 'Scorpions Probe Medical Aid Fraud' The Mercury (5 October 2004).

[6] See Frank Nxumalo & Wiseman Khuzwayo 'State Printer Castigated for Unauthorized Overdraft' Business Report (23 January 2004).

[7] See Linda Loxton 'Fakie Fingers the Government's Black Sheep of Financial Management' Business Report (20 January 2005).

[8] See Office of the Auditor-General Special Report on Donor Funding and the Remuneration of a Former Adviser in the Office of the Premier of Mpumalanga PR 123/1999 (1999).

[9] See Office of the Auditor-General Report on the Special Review of the Deposit Account Administrated by the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development & Related Matters RP 196/1999 (1999).

noted near the outset, the PAA effectuates such investigations by granting the Auditor-General quite extensive powers of search and seizure.[1]

[1] The Auditor-General may obtain a warrant from a judge or a magistrate to enter and to search the property, premises or vehicle of a person for documents, books or written or electronic records or information or an asset, if the Auditor-General needs this record to properly conduct a specific audit, and the relevant record is hidden or kept on such property, premises or vehicle. See PAA s 15(1)(a)–(b)(When the Auditor-General is performing an audit he will 'have unrestricted access to document, book or written or electronic record or information of the auditee or which reflects or may elucidate the business, financial results, financial position or performance of the auditee; or any of the assets of or under the control of the auditee'.) See also PAA s 16(1)(a); Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 220 (T)(Search and seizure that invades privacy must be endorsed by an independent authority, i.e. in terms of a warrant.) During such a search the Auditor-General may also search any person on the premises. While this grant of power may limit rights to privacy, property and just administrative action, it would appear to satisfy the three primary constitutional requirements for search and seizure provisions: (1) the authorizing provision properly defines the scope of the power; (2) an independent authority issues the warrant; (3) the warrant is based on evidence taken under oath that there are reasonable grounds for conducting the search. See Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 20 (No search and seizure will be constitutionally justifiable in the absence of a reasonable suspicion); South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC); Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC); Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C).

24C South African Human Rights Commission

Jonathan Klaaren

24C.1 Introduction. 24C–2
24C.2 SAHRC after ten years 24C–3
(a) Political and organisational history 24C–3
(b) Institutional structures 24C–5
24C.3 Powers and functions of the SAHRC 24C–6
(a) Overview 24C–6
(b) Promotion: public education and information. 24C–6
(c) Protection: mediation, adjudication, litigation and interpretation 24C–7
(i) Mediation 24C–7
(ii) Adjudication/litigation/interpretation 24C–7
(d) Respect and fulfil: Monitoring 24C–9
(i) Monitoring: socio-economic rights. 24C–9
(ii) Monitoring: remedial orders of court. 24C–10
(iii) Monitoring: investigations and hearings 24C–10
24C.4 SAHRC and Chapter Nine Constitutional Doctrine 24C–11
(a) Separation of powers. 24C–11
(b) Independence and accountability. 24C–13
(c) Duty of state organs to assist and protect 24C–15
(d) Relationship of constitutional empowerment provisions to establishment legislation. 24C–16
(e) Subject matter jurisdiction 24C–17
(f) Appointment and removal of persons 24C–18

Establishment and governing principles

181. (1) The following state institutions strengthen constitutional democracy in the Republic: (a) The Public Protector; (b) The South African Human Rights Commission; (c) The Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities; (d) The Commission for Gender Equality; (e) The Auditor-General; (f) The Electoral Commission.

(2) These institutions are independent, and subject only to the Constitution and the law, and they must be impartial and must exercise their powers and perform their functions without fear, favour or prejudice.

(3) Other organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect these institutions to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness of these institutions.

(4) No person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of these institutions.

(5) These institutions are accountable to the National Assembly, and must report on their activities and the performance of their functions to the Assembly at least once a year.

Functions of South African Human Rights Commission

184. (1) The South African Human Rights Commission must (a) promote respect for human rights and a culture of human rights; (b) promote the protection, development and attainment of human rights; and (c) monitor and assess the observance of human rights in the Republic.

(2) The South African Human Rights Commission has the powers, as regulated by national legislation, necessary to perform its functions, including the power (a) to investigate and to report on the observance of human rights; (b) to take steps to secure appropriate redress where human rights have been violated; (c) to carry out research; and (d) to educate.

(3) Each year, the South African Human Rights Commission must require relevant organs of state to provide the Commission with information on the measures that they have taken towards the realisation of the rights in the Bill of Rights concerning housing, health care, food, water, social security, education and the environment.

(4) The South African Human Rights Commission has the additional powers and functions prescribed by national legislation.[1]

General Provisions

Appointments

193. (1) The Public Protector and the members of any Commission established by this Chapter must be women or men who (a) are South African citizens; (b) are fit and proper persons to hold the particular office; and (c) comply with any other requirements prescribed by national legislation.

(2) The need for a Commission established by this Chapter to reflect broadly the race and gender composition of South Africa must be considered when members are appointed.

(3) The Auditor-General must be a woman or a man who is a South African citizen and a fit and proper person to hold that office. Specialised knowledge of, or experience in,

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') s 184. Section 4 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act, 1998 changed the reference of the Final Constitution from 'the Human Rights Commission' to 'the South African Human Rights Commission'. Act 65 of 1998. The Interim Constitution set up the first manifestation of the SAHRC. See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'), ss 115–118. Under the Interim Constitution, the Commission was called the Human Rights Commission and was set up alongside the Public Protector and the Commission on Gender Equality as well as a provision providing for an Act of Parliament to govern restitution of land rights. The Final Constitution then placed the Commission within the scheme of Chapter Nine.

auditing, state finances and public administration must be given due regard in appointing the Auditor-General.

(4) The President, on the recommendation of the National Assembly, must appoint the Public Protector, the Auditor-General and the members of (a) the Human Rights Commission; (b) the Commission for Gender Equality; and (c) the Electoral Commission.

(5) The National Assembly must recommend persons (a) nominated by a committee of the Assembly proportionally composed of members of all parties represented in the Assembly; and (b) approved by the Assembly by a resolution adopted with a supporting vote (i) of at least 60 per cent of the members of the Assembly, if the recommendation concerns the appointment of the Public Protector or the Auditor-General; or (ii) of a majority of the members of the Assembly, if the recommendation concerns the appointment of a member of a Commission.

(6) The involvement of civil society in the recommendation process may be provided for as envisaged in section 59(1)(a).

Removal from office

194. (1) The Public Protector, the Auditor-General or a member of a Commission established by this Chapter may be removed from office only on: (a) the ground of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence; (b) a finding to that effect by a committee of the National Assembly; and (c) the adoption by the Assembly of a resolution calling for that person's removal from office.

(2) A resolution of the National Assembly concerning the removal from office of (a) the Public Protector or the Auditor-General must be adopted with a supporting vote of at least two thirds of the members of the Assembly; or (b) a member of a Commission must be adopted with a supporting vote of a majority of the members of the Assembly.

(3) The President (a) may suspend a person from office at any time after the start of the proceedings of a committee of the National Assembly for the removal of that person; and (b) must remove a person from office upon adoption by the Assembly of the resolution calling for that person's removal.

24C.1 INTRODUCTION

The South African Human Rights Commission ('SAHRC') is described by many as the first among equals amongst Chapter Nine's State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy.[1] This chapter offers a brief critical history of the [1] Chapter Nine, entitled 'State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy', refers to seven institutions: the Public Protector, the South African Human Rights Commission, the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities, the Commission for Gender Equality, the Auditor-General, the Electoral Commission, and the Independent Authority to Regulate Broadcasting. For a discussion of each of these institutions, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor-General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F; C Albertyn 'The Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D; J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E; G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, institution. It then focuses on those sections in Chapter 9 that establish the SAHRC and enable it to carry out its primary functions: education, mediation, adjudication, litigation, interpretation and monitoring. The chapter then directs its attention to six discrete constitutional issues that affect the operation of the SAHRC and all other Chapter 9 Institutions: (1) the doctrine of the separation of powers; (2) independence and accountability; (3) the duty of state organs to assist and to protect; (4) subject matter jurisdiction; (5) the relationship of the constitutional empowerment provisions to institutional establishment legislation; and (6) appointment and removal procedures.

24C.2 THE SAHRC AFTER TEN YEARS

There has been a curious dearth of empirical and critical work on the South African Human Rights Commission.[1] Even high-profile events such as the Davis-Pityana debate, the withdrawal of the SAHRC as amicus in the Treatment Action Campaign litigation, and the racism in the media inquiry have not sparked such research. What research has been conducted tends to focus on the role of the SAHRC in respect of a particular issue, such as socio-economic rights or the rights and recognition of refugees.[2] This relative lack of research and writing on the Commission cannot be due to the subject matter: a comprehensive history of the SAHRC would operate as a prism through which to view the first ten years of South Africa's constitutional democracy. While such an account is far more ambitious than I can offer in these pages, I will outline briefly the SAHRC's political and organisational history before proceeding to discuss the legal framework within which the SAHRC functions and the novel constitutional doctrines to which its very existence gives rise.

(a) Political and organisational history

While the establishment of a human rights commission in South Africa marked a significant break with the apartheid past, there is a global trend towards national human rights institutions. Such institutions are said to have the effect of

T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 29 (Discusses the Independent Electoral Commission.)

Woolman and Schutte take issue with the description of the SAHRC as the first amongst equals. Unlike the SAHRC, the Auditor-General possesses both political autonomy and financial independence. It produces over 1400 audits per annum that describe, where necessary, malfeasance, maladministration and corruption in government. Its constitutionally-mandated financial audits, compliance audits and forensic audits constitute three of the most powerful tools to ensure transparent and accountable government. The audits have, in many instances, led to dismissals from office and criminal trials. See S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 24B.2

[1] But see K Govender 'The South African Human Rights Commission' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 571 (Govender 'SAHRC').

[2] See J Klaaren 'Contested Citizenship in South Africa' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 571 304 (Discussing work of SAHRC in its first five years in respect of refugee protection.)

improving the legality and fairness of public administration as well as providing a mechanism for the domestic implementation of international human rights obligations.[1] The United Nations resolved in 1993 to encourage member states to develop and strengthen such institutions.[2]

A sketch of the current position between the SAHRC (and other Chapter 9 Institutions) and the government with respect to financial and administrative independence is given below.[3] The remainder of this section will outline the Commission's agenda during its first ten years. Two items have occupied prominent slots on the SAHRC's agenda since its establishment: combating racism and promoting economic and social rights. Together with the less heavily emphasized topic of the rights of non-nationals, these areas have been the subject of more than half of the 28 formal reports (including conference reports) that the Commission has issued between 1999 and 2005.[4]

To combat racism, the SAHRC organized a National Conference on Racism in August/September 2000.[5] The conference was preceded by a provincial consultative process and issued the South African Millennium Statement on Racism and Programme of Action.[6] The South African conference preceded the World Conference Against Racism held in August and September 2001 in Durban.[7] While these conferences were not particularly controversial, the Commission's Inquiry into Racism in the Media held in 2000 certainly was.[8] Some print media organizations particularly resisted the potential use of legal process by the Commission to investigate their operations. By the end of the Inquiry, an uneasy truce had been reached between the media and the Commission as to the appropriate limits of the Commission's investigation and reporting powers.

A second important item on the Commission's agenda has been the constitutionally mandated promotion of economic and social rights.[9] The Commission similarly struggled to find a common understanding with non-governmental organization actors ('NGOs') as it had with the media. NGOs wished both to see a

[1] See L Reif 'Building Democratic Institutions: The Role of National Human Rights Institutions in Good Governance and Human Rights Protection' (2000) 13 Harvard Human Rights Journal 1. For a re-examination of a national human rights institution in an African context, see O Okafor & S Agbakwa 'On Legalism, Popular Agency and "Voices of Suffering": The Nigerian Human Rights Commission in Context' (2002) 24 Human Rights Quarterly 662.

[2] See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A (Suggesting that the creation of Public Protector, like many ombudsmen, reflects a global trend towards such oversight institutions.) See also Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 571.

[3] See § 24C.4*(b)* infra.

[4] All of the SAHRC's publications are available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/sahrc_cms/publish/cat_index_41.shtml (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[5] SAHRC 'National Conference on Racism' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/national_conference_on_racism.htm (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[6] SAHRC 'Full version: South African Millennium Statement on Racism and Programme of Action' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/_racism_and_programme_.PDF (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[7] SAHRC 'World Conference Against Racism' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/world_conference_against_racism.htm (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[8] C Braude 'Faultlines: Inquiry into Racism in the Media' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/faultlines.pdf (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[9] See § 24.C*(d)*(i) infra.

stronger role taken by the Commission and to have greater participation themselves within the investigation process. While it met with some initial resistance, the Commission has employed innovative strategies to increase NGO participation, has solicited more general participation through public education campaigns that have employed cross-generational strategies and has promoted the use of the right of access to information by communities to fulfill socio-economic rights.

(b) Institutional structures

The establishment legislation for the Commission, enacted in terms of the Interim Constitution, is the Human Rights Commission Act ('HRCA').[1] The Commission describes its structure as follows:

> The SAHRC is made up of two sections: the Commission, which sets out policy, and a Secretariat, which implements policy. The Chairperson is overall head, and the Chief Executive Officer (CEO) is head of the Secretariat, accountable for the finances of the SAHRC and has responsibility for the employment of staff. To facilitate the work of the Commission, the Secretariat is divided into departments: Legal Services; Research and Documentation; Education and Training; Media and Communications; Human Resources; and Finance and Administration. The SAHRC has also established provincial offices to ensure its services are widely accessible.[2]

The Commission has had a steady growth in capacity and staff over the ten year period.[3] That said, HRCA s 16's provision for a chief executive officer has led, as both reported in the media and the courts, to conflicts between the CEO and the Commissioner who acts as the SAHRC Chairperson.[4]

In terms of the Interim Constitution, the first round of Human Rights Commissioners were interviewed in 1994 by Parliament and recommended by a 75% special majority. These seven full-time and four part-time commissioners were appointed in 1995 and the Commission was inaugurated on 2 October 1995.[5] The Commissioners elected Commissioner Dr Barney Pityana to serve as the Chairperson of the Commission. After several initial Commissioners had resigned and had been replaced, a second round of recommendations and appointments was conducted in terms of the 1996 Constitution. In 2002, Jody Kollapen was elected as the second SAHRC Chairperson.

[1] Act 54 of 1994. The HRCA has been amended once, in respect to the hiring of staff. See Public Services Laws Amendments Act 47 of 1997.

[2] SAHRC 'About the SAHRC: Structure' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za (accessed on 5 January 2006).

[3] Section 5 of the HRCA provides for committees of at least one Commissioner sitting together with other persons. Several of these s 5 committees have been established in order to pursue specific subject matters as well as liaison.

[4] See Esack NO & Another v Commission for Gender Equality 2000 (7) BCLR 737 (W)(Noting tension between CEOs and Commissioners in other Chapter Nine Institutions.)

[5] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 592. ('Commissioners were drawn from different political backgrounds and race and gender representivity was clearly taken into account when appointments were made.')

24C.3 THE POWERS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE SAHRC

(a) Overview

The powers and functions of the SAHRC flow primarily from the Final Constitution and from the Commission's establishment legislation. Other pieces of human rights legislation (such as the Equality Act and the Promotion of Access to Information Act) confer additional powers and duties upon the SAHRC.

FC s 184(1) gives the SAHRC a general mandate to promote, to monitor and to assess the observance of human rights in South Africa. In particular, FC s 184(1)(a) requires the Commission to 'promote respect for human rights and a culture of human rights'; FC s 184(1)(b) requires the Commission to 'promote the protection, development and attainment of human rights'; and FC s 184(1)(c) obliges the Commission to 'monitor and assess the observance of human rights in the Republic.' FC s 184(2), which is clearly meant to be read in conjunction with FC s 184(1), provides:

> The Human Rights Commission has the powers, as regulated by national legislation, necessary to perform its functions, including the power — (a) to investigate and to report on the observance of human rights; (b) to take steps to secure appropriate redress where human rights have been violated; (c) to carry out research; and (d) to educate.

Finally, FC s 184(4) creates the requisite space for the Commission to acquire additional powers and functions 'prescribed by national legislation.'[1] The subsections of FC s 184 appear to be best read as a whole, granting functions and powers to the Commission already established by FC s 181.[2] The sub-sections below explore the powers of the Commission.

(b) Promotion: public education and information

A significant portion of the Commission's activities thus far has taken the form of public education. In the year ending in March 2002, the Commission conducted 214 workshops and training programmes that reached 8484 people and offered 75 seminars and presentations that reached 11 499 people.[3]

Sectoral specific legislation, such as the Promotion of Access to Information Act ('PAIA'), imposes additional duties on the SAHRC with respect to the promotion of specific human rights. PAIA requires that the SAHRC adopt a promotional role with respect to access to information legislation.[4]

[1] FC s 184(3)(Discussed at § 24C.3 infra).

[2] See § 24C.4*(d)* infra (Discussion of the relationship between these constitutional provisions and the interpretation of the establishment legislation.)

[3] See South African Human Rights Commission Sixth Annual Report (2001/2002) 5. Among other topics, the Commission conducts public education on constitutional rights generally, on socio-economic rights and on the right of access to information.

[4] See J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2002) Chapter 62.

(c) Protection: mediation, adjudication, litigation and interpretation

The SAHRC can protect human rights through a variety of dispute resolution mechanisms.

(i) Mediation

Section 8 of the HRCA gives the Commission the power to endeavour to resolve by mediation, conciliation or negotiation any dispute or to rectify any act or omission in relation to a fundamental right. An important part of these powers lies with the Commission's power to make recommendations and findings. Any recommendation or finding made by the Commission as a result of such a process is not directly binding on a public or private body. However, public bodies are under a constitutional duty to assist the Commission to ensure its effectiveness and, in the Commission's experience, its recommendations made in terms of s 8 — even those calling for specific action in specific circumstances — are usually acted on by public bodies.

Section 20(5) of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA') empowers an equality court to refer disputes to an alternative forum.[1] In many instances, this forum is the SAHRC. Even before the enactment of PEPUDA, the SAHRC had numerous successes in its mediation efforts.[2] It is likely that the SAHRC's mediation docket will increase, given the flow of mediation referrals from the Equality Courts.

(ii) Adjudication/Litigation/Interpretation

To date, the Commission has exercised its power of adjudication in a very limited range of instances.[3] While a decision made in resolving these complaints is not understood to be binding on the parties to the dispute, some state organs have treated the Commission's decisions as binding. The Commission has held adjudication hearings in the context of obtaining information from other state organs

[1] Act 4 of 2000.

[2] For one account of a successful mediation by the SAHRC with respect to tolerance for gay rights in public schools, see K Govender 'Assessing the Constitutional Protection of Human Rights in South Africa during the First Decade of Democracy' in S Buhlungu, J Daniel & R Southall (eds) State of the Nation: South Africa 2005–2006 (2006)(Govender 'First Decade of Democracy') 93, 107. In 1999, the SAHRC intervened successfully on behalf of a nursing sister who had been detained and treated at Sterkfontein Hospital by her colleagues. The nursing sister was released and allowed to write a scheduled examination '(which she passed!).' SAHRC Fourth Annual Report (1999) available at www.sahrc.org.za (accessed on 3 February 2006). In one effort in KwaZulu-Natal, residents living in small flats in the poorest area of Chatsworth faced eviction from their homes for not paying rent: 'Most of them [had] been moved from the Magazine Barracks in terms of the previous Groups Areas Act, and [had] paid rent to the council for more than twenty years. The SAHRC met with the various groups and with their legal representatives to decide on strategy for the defence, reducing issues and preventing unnecessary costs working with the Legal Resources Centre (LRC).' See 'KwaZulu-Natal Evictions' (2000) 2(2) Kopanong available at www.sahrc.org.za/kopanong_vol_2_no_2.htm (accessed on 3 February 2006). For further accounts of such mediation, see the SAHRC website at http://www.sahrc.org.za.

[3] See Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 589 (Noting the example of the SAHRC's finding of discrimination against foreign doctors, which was rejected initially in the High Court, but subsequently vindicated by the Supreme Court of Appeal.)

via subpoena regarding the fulfilment of socio-economic rights. Most often, these SAHRC hearings have concluded with decisions made against state organs that failed to provide timely or adequate information.[1] Here, the Commission has not only initially issued the subpoena but has also decided upon the adequacy of the state organ's compliance with the duty to provide information in terms of FC s 184(3).[2] The Commission has also held adjudication hearings and published judgments in appeals from complaints made to the Commission. For instance, a three member panel chaired by a Commissioner of the Commission upheld an appeal of a hate speech complaint regarding the slogan 'kill the farmer, kill the boer' which the Commission had previously determined was not hate speech.[3]

In terms of its establishment Act, the SAHRC has express litigation powers.[4] In this respect, the SAHRC differs, at least at the level of establishment legislation, from other Chapter 9 Institutions. The only other institution that has engaged in rights protection through litigation is the CGE. Although the CGE has asserted and exercised a power to intervene in the judicial process as an amicus, it has not as yet initiated a case in its own name.[5] By contrast, the SAHRC has initiated litigation[6] — although it does so infrequently.[7] The Constitutional Court has stated that, in its litigation capacity, the SAHRC enjoys no privileged status which would allow it to be exempted from the Court's rules of procedure.[8] But note that such lack of privileged status does not deny the Commission potential influence in the exercise of the Court's discretion within the rules

[1] See J Klaaren 'A Second Look at the South African Human Rights Commission, Access to Information, and the Promotion of Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 27 Human Rights Quarterly 539 (Klaaren 'A Second Look').

[2] See § 24C.3 infra, for discussion of monitoring the implementation of socioeconomic rights.

[3] Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283 (SAHRC).

[4] See HRCA s 7*(e)*.

[5] See S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F, 24–14 — 24–15.

[6] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 589. The Commission has been an amicus or party in numerous cases. See, eg, Bekker & Another v Jika 2002 (4) SA 508 (E), [2002] 1 All SA 156 (E); S v Twala (South African Human Rights Commission Intervening) 2000 (1) SA 879 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 106 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 622 (CC); National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC),1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC); National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1998 (6) BCLR 726 (W), [1998] 3 All SA 26 (W); Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom'). Other cases are not reported. The Commission has acted against a vacation resort that evicted a family accompanied by two black children. See 'Settlement of the Equality Court case against the Broederstroom Holiday Resort' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/media (accessed on 3 Februrary 2006). In the magistrate's court, it has won a case on behalf of a learner who was allegedly assaulted and subject to racist remarks. See 'Landmark Victory: Edgemead Race Case' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/media (accessed on 3 February 2006).

[7] See § 24C.3 infra.

[8] See Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).

of procedure. Lower courts have at times acknowledged the SAHRC's support of litigation in the context of deciding standing and other procedural issues.[1]

One aspect of the SAHRC's role in protecting human rights that may grow more significant is the Commission's power of constitutional interpretation.[2] This interpretive power of the Commission, as a Chapter Nine Institution, is one that the Constitutional Court has acknowledged and encouraged. A five-judge minority of the Court deciding S v Jordan stated:

> In determining whether the discrimination is unfair, we pay particular regard to the affidavits and argument of the Gender Commission. It is their constitutional mandate to protect, develop, promote respect for and attain gender equality. This Court is of course not bound by the Commission's views but it should acknowledge its special constitutional role and its expertise. In the circumstances, its evidence and argument that [the legal provision at issue] is unfairly discriminatory on grounds of gender reinforces our conclusion.[3]

There would seem no reason in principle why this privileged interpretive role should not be extended to the SAHRC and other Chapter 9 Institutions.

(d) Respect and fulfill: Monitoring

(i) Monitoring: Socio-economic rights

While the content of the function may not be (as yet) precise, the Final Constitution does clearly envisage a separate and special role for the SAHRC with respect to socio-economic rights. FC s 184(3) provides:

> Each year, the Human Rights Commission must require relevant organs of state to provide the Commission with information on the measures that they have taken towards the realization of the rights in the Bill of Rights concerning housing, health care, food, water, social security, education and the environment.

FC s 184(3) is the only place in the Final Constitution where a specific list of socio-economic rights is provided.

The nature of this role has been the topic of debate, both academic and, more importantly, between the Commission and non-governmental organisations. The academic debate has focused primarily on whether the appropriate model for the role of the SAHRC in terms of FC s 183(4) should be an international or a national model.[4]

---

[1] See Nqxuza & Others v Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government &Another 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E).

[2] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 3; C Botha 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 32.

[3] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC) at para 70.

[4] See Klaaren 'A Second Look' (supra)(In national jurisdictions with established justiciability of socioeconomic rights, effective promotional strategies for a human rights commission should eschew international models and pursue greater participation, transparency, and access to information); C Heyns 'Taking Socio-economic Rights Seriously: The 'Domestic Reporting Procedure' and the Role of the South African Human Rights Commission in Terms of the New Constitution' (1999) 32 De Jure 195 (Advocating adoption of the international reporting procedures at the national domestic level.) See also S Liebenberg 'Violations of Socio-Economic Rights: The Role of the South African Human Rights Commission' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 405.

While an uneasy compromise has been reached, non-governmental organisations continue to demand greater participation within and access to the intra-governmental reporting process upon which the SAHRC has embarked.[1] All the while, contestation of this role has continued within government, as the SAHRC has attempted to expand its role with respect to socio-economic rights in the face of government inattention.

(ii) Monitoring: Remedial orders of courts

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court endorsed a significant monitoring role for the SAHRC. In its remedy, which took the form of a declaratory order because the applicants had accepted an offer of alternative accommodation, the Court requested that the SAHRC adopt a supervisory role to ensure the government compliance with the Court's order.[2] Such a monitoring role — complementary to the reactive information-gathering function of a court — may become increasingly important in the operation of the Commission. Given the categories of government incompetence, inattentiveness and intransigence identified by Roach and Budlender in their study of government responses to judicial remedies, an enhanced supervisory role for the SAHRC may be necessary to ensure effective rights enforcement.[3]

(iii) Monitoring: Investigations and hearings

The investigations undertaken by the Commission reflect proactive enforcement of human rights. The Commission has produced, at the end of its investigations, reports on a wide range of topics: from the effect of road closures on the right to movement[4] to the conflict between the right to equality and the freedom to associate.[5] These investigations, and the subsequent reports, have occasionally provoked intense controversy. The Investigation of Racism in the Media led to the issuance of subpoenas by the SAHRC and equally unusual litigation-like responses from members of the media.[6] The Commission's early reports on the lack of respect for the rights of non-nationals in post-apartheid South Africa and on the conditions of detention at an official repatriation facility, Lindela, were greeted with harsh words by government and department officials (especially the Department of Home Affairs).

[1] See D Newman 'Institutional Monitoring of Social and Economic Rights: A South African Case Study and a New Research Agenda (2003) 19 SAJHR 189.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 97.

[3] K Roach & G Budlender 'Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When Is It Appropriate, Just and Equitable?' (2005) 122 South African Law Journal 325 (Delineating reasons for government violations in terms of government incompetence, inattentiveness, and intransigence.)

[4] SAHRC 'Report on the Public Hearings into the Use of Boom Gates and Road Closures' available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/sahrc_cms/publish/ article_132.shtml (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[5] SAHRC 'Report on the Public Hearings into Equality and Voluntary Associations' (forthcoming) soon to be available at http://www.sahrc.org.za/sahrc_cms/publish (Manuscript on file with authors.)

[6] K Govender 'The South African Human Rights Commission' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 571, 584–86 (Govender 'SAHRC')(Discussing the Investigation into Racism in the Media.)

24C.4 SAHRC AND CHAPTER NINE CONSTITUTIONAL DOCTRINE

Several constitutional issues of great import are common to the SAHRC and to other Chapter 9 Institutions. This section explores six of these doctrines.[1]

(a) Separation of powers

The first issue concerns the relationship of the SAHRC and the Chapter 9 Institutions to the doctrine of the separation of powers.[2] While a separate chapter treats that doctrine, four points specifically relating to Chapter Nine are worth making here.

A first point relates to the status of the institutions established by Chapter Nine. The six institutions listed and established in terms of FC s 181(1)[3] are not mere creatures of statute. As creatures of the Final Constitution, the SAHRC and the other Chapter 9 Institutions enjoy a status and an authority that can potentially override unconstitutional legislative provisions. (The lone institution referred to in Chapter Nine that is not constitutionally established is the independent authority to regulate broadcasting ('ICASA').)

A second more theoretical point concerns the extent to which the Chapter 9 Institutions are a central part of a uniquely South African scheme of constitutional structuring and separation of powers. The argument made here is that the constitutional establishment of a complex of independent institutions apart from the judiciary in order to promote and protect human rights is a fundamental feature — a basic structure — of South African constitutional democracy.[4] If

[1] Treatment of many of these doctrines, as they relate specifically to the six other Chapter 9 Institutions, can be found in Chapters 24A through 24F. See, eg, M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F; C Albertyn 'The Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D; J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E; G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29 (Discusses the Independent Electoral Commission.)

[2] See S Sibanda & A Stein 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 12.

[3] That section together with FC ss 193 and 194 also covers the Chapter 9 Institutions generally. Although it does not establish ICASA, Chapter Nine does govern the Independent Authority to Regulate Broadcasting once Parliament has acted to establish such an institution. See J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24 E (Noting that the independent authority to regulate broadcasting is not listed in section FC s 181(1)).

[4] While it is not necessary, the constitutional argument made in this paragraph may be bolstered through reference to public international law. In a reading informed by international human rights obligations, Chapter Nine can be seen as part of the national machinery referred to in the Paris Principles as well as in the Beijing Declaration. See K Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 571; C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D.

correct, this basic structure argument has at least one immediate implication. While constitutional amendments to Chapter Nine may (and arguably at times should) change the internal arrangements of these institutions, any amendment that detracted from the capacity of this set of independent human rights institutions to discharge its responsibilities would need, at the very least, to acknowledge its intention to alter the constitutional structuring and separation of powers doctrine of the Final Constitution.[1] And any constitutional amendment that did away with this complex of independent institutions entirely would eliminate this basic structure. The Constitutional Court itself has noted that amendments to the Final Constitution that alter the basic structure of our constitutional democracy could have their constitutionality challenged on substantive and not merely procedural grounds.[2]

Third, a separation of powers doctrine that claims to arise organically out of the text of the Final Constitution must recognize the complementarity of the SAHRC and the Constitutional Court. Both the SAHRC and the Constitutional Court are designed to protect and to promote respect for human rights. The outlines of this complementarity are only beginning to be defined.[3] According to Karthy Govender:

> [I]nternational standards require that the [national human rights] institutions do more than simply function as a surrogate court of law. Their role is to actively protect and promote human rights and not to exist simply as an investigative mechanism which reacts to human rights violations. The institutions must work systematically and holistically towards the attainment of internationally recognized human rights.[4]

Some of the post-Certification judgments of the Constitutional Court have acknowledged the distinctive role that the SAHRC and other Chapter 9 Institutions will play in creating a new constitutional culture in the Republic. In New National Party, Justice Langa wrote:

> The establishment of the Commission and the other institutions under Chapter 9 of the Constitution are a new development on the South African scene. They are a product of the new constitutionalism and their advent inevitably has important implications for other organs of State who must understand and recognise their respective roles in the new constitutional arrangement. The Constitution places a constitutional obligation on the those [1] I use the term 'constitutional structuring and separation of powers doctrine' here to acknowledge narrow readings of the separation of powers doctrine that limit that doctrine to three branches of government. Although the separation of powers doctrine is not identified as a founding value in FC s 1, the case can be, and has been, made that the doctrine is a basic structure of the Final Constitution. See C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.

[2] President of the Republic of South Africa v United Democratic Movement 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC).

[3] See M Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 383; J Klaaren 'Structures of Government and the 1996 Constitution: Putting Democracy Back into Human Rights' (1997) 13 SAJHR 3.

[4] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 572.

organs of State to assist and protect the Commission in order to ensure its independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness.[1]

Finally, a specific strand of the reasoning that should be taken into account in theorizing the position of the SAHRC and other Chapter 9 Institutions vis-à-vis a new separation of powers doctrine is the one that emerges from the Court's decision in Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Muncipality.[2] The Langeberg Muncipality Court reasoned that the IEC was an organ of state, but not one within the national sphere of government.[3] The Court noted that Chapter Nine makes a distinction between the state and the government and that FC s 181 emphasizes the independence of Chapter 9 Institutions.[4] This distinction between the state and the government and the related independence of the Chapter 9 Institutions must be clearly enunciated in any South African doctrine of the separation of powers. In addition to incorporating this Chapter Nine independence, such a doctrine needs to uphold both democracy and human rights, to adopt a historically and culturally contextual approach, and to adopt a critical view of structures of power. The content of this independence for the SAHRC and other institutions is explored further below.

(b) Independence and accountability

A critical constitutional issue concerns the meaning of the independence clearly and fundamentally granted to the institutions referred to in Chapter Nine.[5] The broad outlines of Chapter Nine institutional independence have been sketched by the Constitutional Court in First Certification Judgment[6] and two separate cases involving the Electoral Commission.[7]

[1] New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') at para 78.

[2] 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Langeberg Municipality').

[3] See S Woolman, T Roux, & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

[4] FC s 181(2).

[5] FC s 181(2) decrees that the Chapter Nine institutions established by FC s 181(1) 'are independent'. FC s 181(3) provides that 'other organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect these institutions to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, and effectiveness of these institutions.' FC s 181(4) places a duty of non-interference on persons and other organs of state.

[6] See J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24 E (Noting Constitutional Court discussion of independence and impartiality of Auditor-General, Public Protector, and Public Service Commission).

[7] See New National Party (supra) at paras 98–100 (Discussion of nature of the independence of the IEC); Langeberg Municipality (supra) at para 27 (IEC is independent and not within national sphere of government). For more on the distinction between 'organs of state; and 'spheres of government' see S Woolman, T Roux, & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14. See also G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29 (Discussion of the independence of the Electoral Commission.) Bishop and Woolman state that the test for financial independence of the Chapter 9 Institutions after New National Party Court runs as follows:

Before turning to the Court's pronouncements on the subject, two points are worth making. First, despite (or more likely because of) the complementarity of Chapters Eight (treating the judiciary) and Nine, Chapter Nine 'independence' is qualitatively different from judicial independence. Martin Shapiro's work on the institution of courts in society provides a window on to the independence of the Chapter 9 Institutions that demonstrates that the institutional legitimacy of Chapter 9 Institutions is based not on consent but on the provision of a mediate solution. In this view, the Chapter 9 Institutions do not have the same category of legitimacy problems (in particular, the problems of the perception of bias and the actual introduction of a third interest) as do the courts.[1] Second and relatedly, Chapter 9 Institution independence is grounded in a distinction between the state and the government. As New National Party and Langeberg Municipality made clear, the Chapter 9 Institutions are not part of the government. As a result, they are not bound to follow the cooperative government principles of Chapter Three and, more importantly, may not be managed by any sphere of government.[2] The non-participation of the Chapter 9 Institutions in government further underwrites their independence.

The Court has identified two important but distinct attributes of Chapter Nine independence as financial independence and administrative independence.[3]

In New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Constitutional Court identified two essential desiderata for independence. Firstly, the Chapter 9 Institution must have sufficient funding to fulfil its constitutional mandate. Secondly, the funds must come from Parliament and not from the executive. Although the New National Party Court views the source of the funds as a requirement for financial independence, the source of funds would seem, at first blush, to only become relevant if the funds provided are insufficient. If the funds are sufficient for the discharge of the Chapter 9 Institution's duties, then any issue regarding the source of the funds could, as a logical matter, never arise.

However, the New National Party Court, without saying as much, would appear to have concerns that go beyond those of mere fiscal viability. The New National Party Court seems somewhat vexed by the ability of Chapter 9 Institutions to discharge their oversight responsibilities with respect to the executive if the executive retains the discretion to decrease (or increase) funding in future. When questions of sufficiency of funds do arise, whether the executive is, in fact, the source of those funds will enter into the Court's assessment of the independence of the institution. Thus, it is for reasons of political autonomy that the New National Party Court signals its preference for Chapter 9 Institutions such as the Public Protector to be funded directly by Parliament.

See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, January 2006) Chapter 24A, 24A-5. Justine White identifies similar criteria for any judicial assessment of Chapter 9 Institution independence. See J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24 E, 24E-5:

(1) an independent body is one that is outside government; (2) an independent body is one whose members' tenures are governed by appropriate appointment and removal provisions which ensure that members are appropriately qualified, do not serve at the pleasure of the Executive and can be removed only on objective grounds relating to job performance; (3) an independent body is one that is sufficiently well funded by Parliament to enable it to perform its functions; and (4) an independent body is one that has control over its own functions.

[1] See M Shapiro Courts: A Comparative and Political Analysis (1981). The legitimacy of the Chapter 9 Institutions comes from searching for a mediate solution, not resolving a dispute in an unbiased forum.

[2] See S Woolman, T Roux, & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14, 14–12.

[3] To some extent, the issue of administrative independence overlaps with the duty of state organs to assist and protect the institutions of Chapter Nine, addressed in the next sub-section.

Despite the Constitutional Court's treatment of the issue, the precise content of both these guarantees has remained contested. The Constitutional Court's judgment in New National Party began a process of redefining the relationships between Parliament, government, and the Chapter 9 Institutions.[4] The subsequent political process was supposed to address such problems as under-funding and disparate funding among the Chapter 9 Institutions.[5] Despite the complexity of the institutional issues undoubtedly raised by this process, it is cause for comment that the financial and administrative independence called for by the Constitutional Court for the institutions of Chapter Nine has not, over five years later, been achieved.

(c) The duty of state organs to assist and protect

According to FC s 181(3) other organs of state must 'assist and protect' the Chapter 9 Institutions 'through legislative and other measures.' This duty echoes the duties of cooperative government imposed on organs of state in FC Chapter Three and the duties imposed on organs of state to 'assist and protect the courts' found in FC s 165(4).

Although rendered in rather emphatic terms, this duty appears to be honoured in the breach. SAHRC Commissioner Karthy Govender has argued that this duty must be taken more seriously if the SAHRC and the other Chapter 9 Institutions are to discharge effectively their constitutional mandates:

> The challenge facing [the Chapter Nine] institutions is to convince those exercising power that they are not simply to be tolerated but should be pro-actively assisted. There will be a necessary tension between them and organs of state, as there sometimes is between courts of law and the government. What is required is an understanding that the exercise of power in South Africa is subject to constraints and that these institutions together with the courts have been given a legitimate overseeing role by the drafters. There is an unquestionable acknowledgement that the judgments of the Court must be respected and applied. The Constitution seeks to enhance the reputation and stature of the institutions so that its findings and opinions are afforded the necessary respect.[6]

The Constitutional Court has had occasion to enforce this duty. In New National Party, the Court held that if the Electoral Commission needed the government to provide staff to participate in the voter registration process, the government had a duty to do so.[7] In the view of the New National Party Court, the government had failed to fulfil the duty to assist the Electoral Commission.

---

[1] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 581.

[2] See S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Protection and the Promotion of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F, 24F-8–9 (Quoting SAHRC Chairperson Pityana on five years of discouragement in terms of under-funding). With respect to the institutions directly established by Chapter Nine, the pressing issue has been that of financial independence. Ibid. With respect to the independent authority to regulate broadcasting, the apparently more pressing issue has been that of administrative independence. See J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E.

[3] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 581.

[4] See G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29, 29–29.

(d) The relationship of the constitutional empowerment provisions to establishment legislation

The issue of how to understand the relationship between constitutional establishment provisions and the legislative establishment provisions has two faces: (1) to what extent are legislative enactments subject to constitutional strictures; (2) to what extent are the Chapter 9 Institutions creatures of statute and not creatures of the Final Constitution. Surprisingly enough, in South Africa's brief constitutional history, more attention has been paid to the latter issue. While the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa ('ICASA') benefits from the placement of its empowering provision (FC s 192) within the scheme of Chapter Nine, it lacks the express protection of the general provisions — FC ss 193 and 194. I would, however, argue that once Parliament has acted to establish ICASA, using at least in part the authority of FC s 192, that body then enjoys the benefits of the general provisions of Chapter Nine.

The situation of the SAHRC is the obverse of ICASA. FC s 184 sets out, in some detail (especially when read with FC ss 181, 193 and 194), the functions of the SAHRC, while the establishment legislation first passed by Parliament under the Interim Constitution, the Human Rights Commission Act, constitutes an elaboration of the constitutional establishment provisions.

There are some notable differences among the empowering provisions of the various institutions.[1] In FC s 190(1)(a) and (b), the Electoral Commission 'must manage elections … in accordance with national legislation' and 'must … ensure that those elections are free and fair'.[2] The Auditor-General must audit and report on the accounts of 'all' departments and 'all' municipalities but the coverage of other institutions is to be 'required by national or provincial legislation' in terms of FC s 188(1). The SAHRC and the Commission for Gender Equality have 'the power[s], as regulated by national legislation, necessary to perform [their] functions'.[3] The Commission for the Promotion of and the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities has diminished powers, enjoying only 'the power, as regulated by national legislation, necessary to achieve its primary objects'.[4] The provisions relating to the Public Protector do not have an initial objects or duties clause and state simply that the Protector 'has the power, as regulated by national legislation' to engage in three specifically listed functions.

[1] The one similarity is in the provisions making clear that each institution 'has the additional powers and functions prescribed by national legislation.' See FC ss 182(2), 184(4), 185(4), 187(3), 188(4), and 190(2). This section and national legislation granting such powers and functions should arguably be read in conjunction with FC s 181(3). Thus, where provincial legislation relating to the institutions of Chapter Nine could be interpreted not to conflict with national legislation, such legislation would comply with these sections. Furthermore, the purpose of these provisions may reflect the pre-Final Constitution enactment of establishment legislation.

[2] There is no reference to national legislation in FC s 190(1)(b), while there is in (a) and (c).

[3] See FC ss 184(2) 187(2). The plural is used in FC s 184(2)(SAHRC) and the singular in FC s 187(2)(CGE).

[4] FC s 185(2).

One could, on the basis of these differences, rank the constitutional strength of the Chapter 9 Institutions.[1] Constitutional review would be of varying degrees of intensity for different commissions depending upon their place in the hierarchy. While our jurisprudence could, logically, veer in such a direction, the purposive approach to interpretation adopted by our courts tends to eschew such formal distinctions.

In any case, constitutional challenges to the establishment legislation are not likely to engage questions as to whether the legislation is within the bounds of the 'empowering' constitutional provision. They are more likely to determine whether the legislation is under-inclusive (does not go far enough) with respect to the constitutional provisions.[2] While it is thus broadly correct to regard the establishment legislation as implementing the constitutional provisions with respect to each of the institutions of Chapter Nine, the powers and the functions of the SAHRC and the other institutions are not necessarily congruent with those of their establishment legislation. In some cases, that legislation may fail to recognize the full extent of the institution's constitutional authority. In other cases, that legislation may unduly limit it. In any case, the Chapter Nine constitutional provisions — specific and general — will be of clear assistance in purposively interpreting the details of the establishment legislation.

(e) Subject matter jurisdiction

In terms of the constitutional text, subject matter jurisdiction may, and in some cases, does overlap between various Chapter 9 Institutions. The subject matter of the Public Protector,[3] the CRLC and the CGE overlap with that of the SAHRC.[4] While the SAHRC is clearly the best candidate for having the broadest subject matter, the other institutions enjoy expansive constitutional mandates. This characteristic of overlapping subject matters might support a rather holistic reading of [1] By establishment legislation, one means the legislation referred to in these sections apart from the legislation prescribing additional functions and powers.

[2] In this sense, such establishment legislation occupies an analogous constitutional position to the national legislation referred to in FC ss 32 and 33 and which gives effect to the rights of access to information and just administrative action. Arguably, Parliament's interpretive competence in institutional design should be taken into account in assessing the constitutionality of such legislation. See, generally, I Currie & J Klaaren The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act Benchbook (2001) 29–32. Nonetheless, the significant difference is that several sections of constitutional text — indeed the whole of Chapter Nine — explicitly delineate the structures of the human rights institution that are intended to promote and protect human rights.

[3] Both institutions are involved in implementing the Promotion of Access to Information Act, albeit in different roles.

[4] On overlap of subject matter of CGE with SAHRC, see C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D, 24D-1. On overlap of subject matter of CRLC with SAHRC, see S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Protection and the Promotion of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24 F, 24F-8.

any jurisdictional disputes. Such disputes, however, are likely to be limited since the Chapter 9 Institutions have already put into place referral and other coordination systems so that they may more effectively pursue their individual and collective mandates.[1]

(f) The appointment and removal of persons

The constitutional provisions governing the appointment and removal of members of the SAHRC and the other Commissions as well as the Public Protector and the Auditor-General are contained in the two general provisions of Chapter Nine. The basic template is appointment by the President upon recommendation of the National Assembly. The recommendation follows nomination by a committee proportionally composed of members of all parties represented in the Assembly.

The appointment processes of the various Chapter 9 Institutions do differ. The Final Constitution requires specialized knowledge for the Auditor-General and the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities. Special majorities (60%) are provided for the appointments of the Auditor-General and the Public Protector, but not for members of the various Commissions. Further distinctions are introduced by the establishment legislation for the various institutions. For example, recommendations for appointment to the Electoral Commission are made by a committee comprised of representatives of three other Chapter 9 Institutions and chaired by the Chief Justice.[2]

With respect to the removal provisions, two potentially significant changes were made in the Final Constitution. The Constitutional Assembly chose to adopt wording apparently reducing the discretion of the President, in acting upon the recommendations of the National Assembly, in making the appointment to the Commissions and wording allowing for the Parliamentary recommendations for appointment to be effected by a simple rather than a special majority.[3] These changes have led some commentators to allege that the selection process has been unduly politicised.[4]

Chapter 9 Institution office bearers may only be removed on the grounds of

[1] See S Woolman & J Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Protection and the Promotion of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F, 24F-18.

[2] See G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29, 29–27.

[3] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 573.

[4] J Sarkin 'Reviewing and Reformulating Appointment Processes to Constitutional (Chapter Nine) Structures' (1999) 15 SAJHR 587 (Criticizing selection process as politicized). The selection process may of course be a political exercise in a number of different senses.

misconduct, incapacity, or incompetence. A National Assembly committee must make a finding of the existence of such a ground. Apart from the Public Protector and the Auditor-General (where a two-thirds majority is required), a simple majority of the National Assembly must approve the removal. The two-thirds majority required for removal of the Auditor-General and the Public Protector was a direct response by the Constitutional Assembly to failure of the first draft of the Final Constitution to secure certification from the Constitutional Court.[1]

In some instances, the establishment legislation adds additional procedural steps to the removal process. For instance, s 3*(b)* of the HRCA goes beyond the constitutional requirement and further requires a 75% majority of Parliament to approve the removal resolution for a member of the SAHRC. Similarly, a National Assembly committee finding that a member of the Electoral Commission be removed must be preceded by a recommendation of the Electoral Court.[2]

At least one writer, Karthy Govender, has argued that a Parliamentary resolution effecting the removal of Chapter Nine commissioners must be preceded by a full and fair hearing before a committee with members capable of impartial adjudication since 'the deliberations and determination of the committee would amount to administrative action.'[3] Govender's argument turns on the proposition that parliamentary committee action amounts to administrative action in terms of FC s 33 and that the committee 'is making a specific determination as required by the enabling legislation.'[4] The weakness in this line of reasoning lies in its characterization of parliamentary committee action as administrative action. The committee's power to take such action is sourced directly in FC s 194(1)(b). Whether fair hearings are required would, therefore, appear not to turn on the requirements of FC s 33.[5]

[1] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment'). While the Court justified the differential treatment of the Public Protector on the grounds that '[t]he office inherently entails investigation of sensitive and politically embarrassing affairs of government', Karthy Govender has argued that '[f]rom a perspective of principle, there ought to be no difference between the process used to remove the Public Protector and Auditor General from office and that used to impeach other Chapter 9 office bearers.' Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 574–5.

[2] G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29, 29–27.

[3] Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 574–79 (Justifying this argument on the basis of the holdings in De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers of South Africa & Others In Re: Ex Parte Application of President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v SARFU & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) and the text of FC ss 33 and 194). In Govender's view, in order to be fair (in addition to the committee being impartial): 'there must be notice of the proposed action and the grounds asserted for it; the commissioner concerned must be offered the opportunity to present his or her case; given the seriousness of the matter, the commissioner must be legally represented; there must be an opportunity to lead and test evidence; and there must a statement of reasons for the final decision.'
Govender 'SAHRC' (supra) at 579.

[4] Ibid.

[5] For more on the extent to which the exercise of constitutional powers by spheres of government or organs of state are subject to the strictures of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31, § 31.5.

24D The Commission for Gender Equality

Catherine Albertyn

24D.1	Introduction	24D-1
24D.2	What is the Commission for Gender Equality (CGE)?	24D-1
24D.3	The independent nature of the CGE	24D-3
24D.4	Gender equality	24D-3
24D.5	Scope of mandate and functions	24D-5
	(a) The monitoring function	24D-5
	(b) The educative function	24D-7
	(c) The investigative function	24D-7
	(d) The advocacy and advisory function	24D-8
	(e) The litigation function	24D-9
24D.6	The CGE, democracy and the achievement of gender equality	24D-10

24D.1 INTRODUCTION

Chapter Nine of the Final Constitution[1] creates the Commission for Gender Equality (CGE). As a Chapter Nine entity, the CGE is characterised as a 'state institution strengthening consttutional democracy'[2] that is independent and impartial, subject only to the Constitution and the law.[3]

Section 187 of the Constitution sets out the broad functions of the CGE. The CGE must 'promote respect for gender equality and the protection, development and attainment of gender equality'.[4] In addition, the Constitution identifies specific functions and powers: namely, to 'monitor, investigate, research, educate, lobby, advise, and report on issues concerning gender equality'.[5] These responsibilities are further regulated and amplified by legislation: the Commission on Gender Equality Act[6] ('the Act')[7] and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[8] ('Equality Act').

24D.2 WHAT IS THE COMMISSION FOR GENDER EQUALITY?

The Commission for Gender Equality is an unusual institution in comparative international terms. Its institutional origins lie both in the concept of an independent Human Rights Commission and in the need to establish specific structures both within and outside government to advance gender equality and women's human rights. The major task of these gender structures is to transform the institutions, policies, procedures, consultative processes, budgetary allocations and priorities of government to take account of the needs and aspirations of women.[9] The objective is 'to achieve equality for women as participants, decision-makers and beneficiaries in the political, civil, social, economic and cultural spheres of life'.[10] Such structures may be specific government ministries devoted to gender issues, specialised gender units within government departments, gender committees within Parliament, or independent gender advisory and monitoring institutions.

---

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').
[2] FC section 181(1).
[3] FC section 181(2).
[4] FC section 187(1).
[5] FC section 187(2).
[6] Act 39 of 1996.
[7] FC ss 187(2) and (3). While the Constitution refers to the Commission for Gender Equality, the Act refers to the Commission on Gender Equality. (Emphasis added.)
[8] Act 4 of 2000.
[9] C Albertyn 'Mainstreaming Gender — National Machinery for Women in South Africa: A Policy' (1995) Centre for Applied Legal Studies Occasional Paper 24 ('Mainstreaming Gender'). See also 'The Office on the Status of Women: South Africa's National Policy Framework for Women's Empowerment and Gender Equality' (2000) at para 4.2 ('The Office on the Status of Women').
[10] C Albertyn 'Mainstreaming Gender' (supra) at 6. See also 'The Office on the Status of Women' (supra) at para 4.3.

These gender structures (often referred as 'national machinery') have been promoted by the United Nations and other international agencies concerned with gender equality as the best way of mainstreaming women's concerns with government. Hence the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing, China in 1995 imposed the following obligation on governments:

> Based on a strong political commitment, create a national machinery, where it does not exist . . . for the advancement of women at the highest level of government; it should have clearly defined mandates and authority; critical elements would be adequate resources and the ability and competence to influence policy and formulate and review legislation. Among other things, it should perform policy analysis, undertake advocacy, communication, co-ordination and monitoring of implementation.[1]

The structure, powers and position of 'national machinery' in South Africa were debated extensively within the country in the early 1990s. A consensus emerged that a 'package' of institutions at all levels of the state and in civil society was the most effective means of mainstreaming gender in the new democracy. As a result, several structures in government and parliament, as well as an independent commission, were established after 1994.[2] They are:

1. A parliamentary structure: the Joint Monitoring Committee on the Improvement of the Quality of Life and Status of Women.[3]
2. Government structures; namely, the Office on the Status of Women based in the Office of the Presidency; and Gender Focal Points in national line ministries.[4] These structures are replicated at provincial level.[5]
3. The Commission for Gender Equality: a national, independent monitoring body, which is directly accountable to Parliament.[6]

Overall, '[n]ational machinery acts as a vehicle through which South Africa can meet its constitutional and international commitments to gender equality, human rights and social justice'.[7]

[1] Paragraph 205*(b)* of the Platform of Action (United Nations, 1996 Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, New York: United Nations Department of Public Information).

[2] See C Albertyn 'National Machinery for Promoting the Status of Women' and B Mbete-Kgotsisile 'National Machinery for Promoting the Status of Women' in S Liebenberg (ed) The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa from a Gender Perspective (1995); S Hassim 'The Gender Pact and Institutional Consolidation: Institutionalising Gender Equality in the South African State' (2003) 29 Feminist Studies – (forthcoming).

[3] The Office on the Status of Women (supra) at para 4.4.3.

[4] Ibid at para 4.4.2.

[5] Ibid at para 4.5. The document contained proposals for gender structures in local government. Ibid at para 4.6.

[6] Ibid at para 4.4.4.

[7] Ibid at para 4.2.3.

The Commission for Gender Equality was established in 1997. It works closely with the other arms of national machinery, whose roles and functions were elaborated in a national policy document published by the Office of the Status of Women in 2000.[1] The CGE also co-operates with other Chapter Nine institutions (especially the Human Rights Commission and the Public Protector).[2]

24D.3 The Independent Nature of the CGE

The CGE is designated an independent and impartial institution, able to exercise its powers and perform its functions 'without fear, favour, or prejudice'.[3] It is not accountable to government. Rather, it reports, at least annually, to the National Assembly of Parliament.

Despite this political accountability, and ostensible independence, the Commission has been dependent upon government, and particularly the Department of Justice, for its operational funds. Initially, the moneys allocated by the Department barely covered salaries. Funding has improved in subsequent years.[4] In addition, the CGE has secured grants from international donors for its programmes.[5] The CGE, together with the Human Rights Commission and Public Protector, has argued that its financial dependence upon government interferes with its independence. It has advocated a direct relationship with Parliament for budgetary appropriations.[6]

The selection of commissioners is the task of Parliament. However, the President appoints persons nominated by a joint Parliamentary committee and approved by both houses of Parliament in a joint sitting.[7] Commissioners are expected to be duly qualified in terms of their record of commitment to gender equality and their knowledge and experience.[8] The selection process has attracted criticism for being overly politicised.[9]

24D.4 Gender Equality

The CGE has a broad constitutional mandate of promoting and protecting gender equality. Gender equality is a foundational principle of our constitutional democracy. However, it is not defined in the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has concluded that the Constitution enshrines a commitment to substantive

[1] The Office on the Status of Women (supra).
[2] The CGE is required to do so in terms of section 11(1)(e) and (f) of the Act.
[3] FC section 181(2).
[4] Commission on Gender Equality: Annual Report April 1997–March 1998 (1998) 27 ('CGE 1998'); Annual Report April 1998–March 1999 (1999) 75 ('CGE 1999').
[5] The reliance on independent donors is on all fours with the Commission's status as an independent structure.
[6] CGE 1998 (supra) at 33; CGE 1999 (supra) at 37.
[7] Section 3(2).
[8] Section 3(1).
[9] See J Sarkin 'Reviewing and Reformulating Appointment Processes to Constitutional (Chapter Nine) Structures' (1999) 15 SAJHR 587, 603-606.

equality.[1] The CGE articulated the following understanding of substantive gender equality in its first annual report:

> Gender equality means the equal employment by men and women of socially valued goods, opportunities, resources and rewards. Because what is valued differs among societies, a crucial aspect of equality is the empowerment of women to influence what is valued and share in decision-making about societal priorities. Equality does not mean that men and women are the same, but that opportunities and life chances will not depend on sex.[2]

One of the first tasks of the CGE was also to define a vision of a society free from inequality:

> The [CGE] is committed to creating a society free from gender discrimination and all other forms of oppression, in which all people will have the opportunity and means to realise their full potential, regardless of race, gender, class, religion, sexual orientation, disability or geographic location.[3]

The mention of 'forms of oppression' in this vision refers to the existence of inequalities amongst women beyond those enumerated above. The CGE has sought to prioritise the concerns of the most vulnerable and marginalised groups of women. It states that 'while the constituency of the CGE is all the people of South Africa, its target group is people living on the periphery, especially women in rural areas, on farms, in peri-urban areas, and in informal settlements'.[4]

The constitutional mandate of the Commission grants it a privileged status in promoting gender equality and in representing the interests of women in our society. This eminence was recognised by the Constitutional Court in S v Jordan[5]. In Jordan, the CGE intervened as amicus curiae in support of the decriminalisation of sex work.[6] Writing for the minority that supported decriminalisation, Judges O' Regan and Sachs stated that

> In determining whether the discrimination is unfair, we pay particular regard to the affidavits and argument of the Gender Commission. It is their constitutional mandate to protect, develop, promote respect for and attain gender equality. This Court is of course not bound by the Commission's views but it should acknowledge its special constitutional role and its expertise. In the circumstances, its evidence and argument that section 20(1)(*a*A) is unfairly discriminatory on grounds of gender reinforces our conclusion.[7]

[1] Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 at para 46.
[2] CGE 1998 (supra) at 13.
[3] CGE 1998' (supra) at 3.
[4] Ibid.
[5] S v Jordan and Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force and Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').
[6] Ibid at para 70.
[7] Section 11(1)(a) of the Act.

24D.5 Scope of Mandate and Functions

The Commission's constitutional mandate of promoting gender is both vertical and horizontal. Its monitoring function extends to the state, statutory and public bodies, as well as 'private businesses, enterprises and institutions'.[1] It is also authorised to investigate 'any gender related complaint' in the public or private domains.[2]

The Commission on Gender Equality Act sets out the details of the Commission's functions and powers. These can be summarised as powers: (a) to monitor (the watchdog function); (b) to educate; (c) to investigate and settle complaints; (d) to conduct research; (e) to advocate for gender equality; (e) to report, advise and make recommendations; and (f) to litigate.

(a) The monitoring function

The CGE's most important function is to act as a watchdog for gender equality, and hence of democracy. This watchdog role extends beyond the state to the private sector and civil society. Section 11(1)(a) of the Act explicitly authorises the CGE to monitor and to evaluate the policies and practices of all organs of state, statutory bodies or functionaries, public bodies and authorities and private business, enterprises and institutions.[3] Section 11(1)(c) requires the CGE to evaluate any Act of Parliament or aspect of the common law, with particular emphasis on systems of personal, family and customary law. In terms of s 11(1)(h), the CGE is expected to monitor compliance with relevant international instruments, especially the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. It shares this task with the Office on the Status of Women and Parliament's Joint Monitoring Committee of the Improvement of the Quality of Life and the Status of Women.[4]

The monitoring function is linked to a number of other powers and functions, including conducting research and giving advice and making recommendations on how to improve or promote gender equality. Section 11*(d)* empowers the CGE to recommend to Parliament the adoption of new legislation to promote gender equality and raise the status of women. Often such recommendations may be better made to relevant government departments that have the authority to draft and develop laws in their particular area of jurisdiction.

---

[1] Section 11(1)(e) of the Act.
[2] Ibid at s 11(1)(a).
[3] Ibid.
[4] See The Office on the Status of Women (supra) at para 4.4.3.1. The Office on the Status of Women has the official task of reporting to the United Nations, whereas the other institutions have a more internally focussed monitoring role.

Although the scope of the Commission's monitoring function extends across the entire spectrum of the state and civil society, much of its work has been aimed at the state. It has been especially engaged in the development of the government's legal and policy framework. In 1998, it commissioned an audit of discriminatory legislation to identify gaps in laws.[1] It has also made regular submissions to the South African Law Commission and to Parliament on laws affecting gender equality, including customary laws.[2] More recently, it has addressed the issue of implementing law through the idea of an Annual Report Card of progress by various government departments.[3]

The Commission has evaluated the participation of women in politics,[4] and the gender policies of political parties. It has monitored national and local elections to assess the participation of women in political parties and in voting.[5]

As noted above, the CGE's oversight responsibilities capture relationships within civil society. The CGE monitors traditional practices that are harmful to women: it has conducted research and engaged in dialogue with communities and traditional leaders on issues such as witchcraft and virginity testing.[6] The CGE has also developed a particular focus on gender equality in the private sector. It has recently undertaken a survey of the sector and produced a report entitled 'Best Practice Guidelines for Creating a Culture of Gender Equality in the Private Sector'.[7]

The monitoring function of the CGE is extended in the Equality Act. The innovative remedies section of that Act provides for the CGE to receive regular progress reports as to how a person found guilty of unfair discrimination is implementing the court's order.[8] This delegation recognises the particular expertise of the CGE and reduces the burden of 'supervisory jurisdiction' on a court. Obviously the Commission has no power to enforce a court order. It would have to refer the matter back to the court.

The Commission's monitoring role under this Act also extends to powers to 'request' any part of the state or any person 'to supply information on any measures relating to the achievement of equality, including, where appropriate, on legislative and executive action and compliance with legislation, codes of practice and programmes'.[9]

[1] Centre for Applied Legal Studies: Audit of Legislation that Discriminates on the Basis of Sex/Gender (1998). See also CGE 1999 (supra) at 28-29.

[2] The various annual reports of the CGE list submissions on, inter alia, customary marriages, religious law, domestic violence, sexual offences and traditional courts.

[3] Commission on Gender Equality Annual Report 2000 (2000) at 21-22 ('CGE 2000').

[4] Commission on Gender Equality 'Redefining Politics–Women and Democracy in South Africa' (1999).

[5] Commission on Gender Equality 'Report on the 1999 General Elections: A Gender Perspective' (1999).

[6] Commission on Gender Equality Annual Report 2000/2001 (2001) 9 ('CGE 2001').

[7] Commission on Gender Equality 'Gender and the Private Sector' (1999).

[8] Section 21(2)(m) of the Equality Act (supra).

[9] Ibid at s 25(3)(2).

Finally, the Equality Act permits the Commission to monitor cases that are adjudicated under the Equality Act. Section 25(3)(c) authorises the CGE to 'request from the Department [of Justice] . . . regular reports regarding the number of cases and the nature and outcome thereof'.

(b) The educative function

Section 11*(b)* of the Act requires the CGE to develop and conduct public information and education programmes to foster public understanding of gender equality. In terms of section 25(1) of the Equality Act, the Commission must assist the state 'to develop an awareness of fundamental rights in order to promote a climate of understanding, mutual respect and equality'[1] and 'conduct information campaigns to popularise' the Act.[2] These are important functions in addressing the social norms and attitudes that underpin gender inequalities.

One of the Commission's main programmes has been to engage the media on sexism in the media.[3] The CGE also runs public education initiatives through the media and in rural and urban communities on a range of issues relating to women's rights.[4]

The Commission founded the now annual Sixteen Days of Activism on No Violence Against Women.[5] It has produced a 'Working Women's Manual' on the rights of women in workplace.[6]

(c) The investigative function

The CGE is mandated to investigate any gender-related complaint and resolve it through mediation, conciliation or negotiation.[7] Section 11 makes provision for two types of investigations: (1) those related to individual complaints brought to the Commission; and (2) those initiated by the Commission. This flexibility enables the CGE to identify and act upon significant areas of gender inequality in society.

The complaints function sets up a tension between expending resources on addressing the needs of those who bring their problems to the CGE and ensuring that interventions are strategic and have the maximum transformative impact.[8] In order to diminish this institutional and budgetary strain, the Commission has sought to refer complaints to other institutions where possible, and to address the systemic problems that prevent women from using such institutions effectively

[1] Section 25(1)(a) of the Equality Act (supra).
[2] Ibid at s 25(1)(c)(vi).
[3] CGE 1999 (supra) at 23-25; CGE 2000 (supra) at 31-32.
[4] CGE 2001 (supra) at 6-8.
[5] CGE 1999 (supra) at 37.
[6] CGE 2000 (supra) at 27.
[7] Section 11(1)(e) of the Equality Act (supra).
[8] CGE 1999 (supra) at 29-31.

(eg problems with the maintenance system).[1] In addition, the CGE has sought to prioritise complaints received from its target constituency of disadvantaged women. The Commission reports that the majority of individual complaints relate to maintenance, family issues (divorce and custody), and domestic and other forms of gender violence.[2]

The CGE has powerful investigative powers, including the power to subpoena persons and documents,[3] compel evidence[4] and powers relating to entry of premises and search and seizure.[5] These powers have yet to be used.

The CGE plays an important role in settling complaints on unfair discrimination, harassment or hate speech under the Equality Act. This Act identifies the CGE as an 'alternative forum'. This means that Equality Courts can refer matters to the CGE to be dealt with in terms of the CGE's functions and powers, instead of hearing the matter in an Equality Court.[6] In such cases, the Equality Court retains overall jurisdiction should the dispute resist resolution by the CGE.[7]

Section 21(4) of the Equality Act further provides that a court may either before, during or after a hearing, refer a complaint to the CGE for 'mediation, conciliation or negotiation'. The Commission is also competent to conduct investigations into cases that are referred to them by an Equality Court and to make recommendations as directed by the court regarding those cases or the persistent contravention of the Act.[8]

(d) The advocacy and advisory function

As a constitutional protector of democracy, the CGE is expected to advance gender equality and hence contribute to the consolidation of democracy in South Africa. This responsibility demands engagement with the state and civil society on a broad range of issues relating to gender equality. These interventions have the dual objectives of removing barriers that impede progress to equality and developing positive measures to advance equality.

Chapter five of the Equality Act sets out several duties of the state to promote equality. Constitutional institutions, such as the CGE, are expected to assist in these duties. These duties include taking measures to 'develop and implement programmes . . . to promote equality';[9] developing action plans, codes of practice

[1] CGE 1999 (supra) at 29-31.
[2] Ibid at 20; CGE 2000 (supra) at 25-26; CGE 2001 (supra) at 15-17.
[3] Section 12(4)(b) of the Equality Act (supra).
[4] Ibid at s 12(5).
[5] Ibid at s 13.
[6] Ibid at ss 20(5) -(7).
[7] Ibid at s 20(8).
[8] Ibid at s 25(3)(b).
[9] Ibid at s 25(1)(b).

and guidelines to promote equality;[1] and 'providing advice and training on equality'.[2] Finally, in terms of s 25(4), read with ss 25(5) and (6), the CGE must assist the Human Rights Commission in receiving and evaluating the equality plans of all government departments.

(e) The litigation function

Although the power to litigate is not expressly mentioned in its Act, the CGE has asserted its prerogative to do so with respect to the enforcement of women's rights. It has tended to do so, however, not by initiating cases, but by lending support to, or participating in, cases that raise important gender issues. The CGE intervenes primarily in those cases that relate to systemic gender inequality or the rights of disadvantaged groups of women.

In some instances, the Commission has been invited by the Constitutional Court to make submissions in a particular case. The CGE has also applied to be an amicus curiae in various courts. Here the Commission has argued on behalf of the interests of vulnerable groups of women and/or has placed contextual evidence before the courts on systemic practices of gender inequality. The CGE has also participated as a party in several cases.

The Commission was invited by the Constitutional Court to make representations in Amod v MMF[3] and in S v Baloyi.[4] Baloyi dealt with the constitutionality of a provision of the Prevention of Family Violence Act[5] that arguably placed an onus on a defaulter to prove that he had not wilfully violated an interdict. In finding that this imposed a permissible burden of proof rather than an onus, the Court explicitly recognised that the state was > under a series of constitutional mandates which include the obligation to deal with domestic violence: to protect the rights of everyone to enjoy freedom and security of the person and to bodily and psychological integrity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.[6]

These are constitutional mandates that the CGE is well positioned to monitor.

The CGE has acted as amicus curiae in several cases. In the Supreme Court of Appeal hearing of Amod v MMF,[7] the CGE intervened on behalf of Muslim [1] Sections 25(1)(c)(i) and (iii) of the Equality Act (supra).

[2] Ibid at s 25(1)(c)(iv).
[3] 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC) (dealing with the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal).
[4] 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC) ('Baloyi').
[5] Act 133 of 1993.
[6] Baloyi (supra) at para 11 (Sachs J). See also Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 995.
[7] Amod v Multilateral Vehicle Accidents Fund (Commissioner for Gender Equality Intervening) 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA).

women whose marriages were not legally recognised and who were therefore unable to claim damages from the Motor Vehicle Accident Fund. The CGE argued that the common law should be interpreted to recognise a duty of support in these relationships. The Supreme Court of Appeal found that the appellant's claim was worthy of 'public recognition and protection'.

In Bannatyne v Bannatyne,[1] the CGE was admitted by the Constitutional Court as an amicus curiae to lodge empirical data on the state of the maintenance system in South Africa and its effect on the rights of women and children in seeking effective relief under the Maintenance Act 99 of 1998. The Court commented that

> [t]his evidence proved most useful and gave the necessary context by providing information regarding the frailties inherent in the functioning of the maintenance system and more particularly its effect on the promotion and advancement of gender equality in this country.[2]

The CGE has also supported cases by appearing as a party. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs[3], the CGE supported the National Coalition by appearing as the fourteenth applicant in a case that challenged permanent-residence requirements which discriminated against gay and lesbian partners. The Commission joined the case of Christian Lawyers Association v Minister of Health[4] as a party to assist the government in defending a challenge to women's rights to reproductive choice enshrined in the Choice of Termination of Pregnancy Act 92 of 1996. However, the CGE has not yet initiated a case in its own name to address a gender equality issue directly.

The Equality Act also envisages a litigation function by the CGE. It authorises the Commission to institute proceedings in its own name under that Act.[5] It also mandates the CGE to assist persons wishing to bring proceedings under the Act.[6]

24D.6 The Commission, Democracy and the Achievement of Gender Equality

The Commission's constitutional mandate is to promote democracy through the protection and advancement of gender equality. This duty not only refers to the promotion and protection of women's constitutional rights, but also to the task of achieving gender equality in legal, social, economic and political life. The CGE is accordingly authorised to intervene in the affairs of the state, civil society and the

[1] 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC) ('Bannatyne').
[2] Bannatyne (supra) at para 3. See also paras 26–30 (on the nature of the evidence placed before the Court).
[3] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC).
[4] Christian Lawyers Association of SA and Others v Minister of Health and Others 1998 (4) SA 1113 (T).
[5] Section 20(1)(f) of the Equality Act (supra).
[6] Ibid at ss 20(9) and 25(3)(a).

private sector. This constitutional mandate is, as we have noted above, grounded in, and amplified by, two important laws: The Commission on Gender Equality Act, and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act.

In carrying out this mandate, the Commission is subject to significant fiscal and personnel constraints. As a result it has had to make hard choices about its priorities and the way in which it carries out its mission. It does so through annual planning and review procedures. It does so by co-operating closely with other constitutional institutions and with the governmental and parliamentary structures of the 'national machinery', as well as with civil society organisations. The location of the Commission as an independent, constitutional institution enables it hold government accountable to its mandate of achieving gender equality. Similarly, the Commission facilitates the strengthening of civil society by working independently, and in partnership with other organisations, to ensure that government is accountable, open and responsive to civil society.

24E Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)

Justine White

24E.1 Broadcasting in the apartheid era 24E–1
24E.2 Broadcasting in transition and the independence of the Broadcast Regulator. 24E–2
(a) Interim Constitution 24E–3
(b) Final Constitution 24E–3
(c) International best practise 24E–5
24E.3 The Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA). 24E–7
(a) Appointment and removal of Councillors 24E–7
(b) Legislative provisions regarding the powers, duties and independence of ICASA in the regulation of broadcasting. 24E–9
(c) Legislative provisions regarding the powers, duties and independence of ICASA in the regulation of telecommunications. 24E–11
(d) Policy formation. 24E–12
(e) Regulation making. 24E–12
(f) Licensing and pro-competitive determinations. 24E–13
24E.4 ICASA: The challenge of convergence. 24E–15

24E.1 Broadcasting in the Apartheid Era

Broadcasting in the apartheid era was characterised by the near total monopoly of the South African Broadcasting Corporation ('SABC') over the airwaves.[1] In terms of the Broadcasting Act itself, the SABC operated as a state, as opposed to a public, broadcaster. Its governing structures were under tight political control. The State President appointed the SABC Board as well as the chairman and vice-chairman.[2] State control of the SABC was also evident in the make-up of the SABC staff — the Broederbond determined the appointments of the SABC Board, its Directors General and 'most top level and many other mid-level managers'[3] — and in broadcast content. The SABC's unwritten policy was 'to ensure National Party . . . control and white privilege.'[4] According to the TRC Report, media analysis shows that 'news bulletins maintained and cultivated a mindset among white viewers that apartheid was natural and inevitable'[5] and that SABC programming 'was instrumental in cultivating a "war psychosis" which in turn created an environment in which human rights abuses could take place.'[6]

[1] Apart from the subscription television service M-Net, which carried no news, South Africa radio and television broadcasting activities were carried out entirely by the SABC in terms of the Broadcasting Act 73 of 1976 ('1976 Broadcasting Act'). While there were certain free-to-air broadcasting services based in former TBVC states (Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Ciskei and Venda) that were capable of being received in parts of South Africa, including, Bop TV, Capital Radio and Radio 702, these had limited coverage areas and the majority of South Africans had no access to these services. Radio Freedom, broadcast by the African National Congress ('ANC') from five countries in Africa was capable of being received in South Africa but did not broadcast continuously. Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report Volume 4, (1998) 172 ('TRC Report').

[2] 1976 Broadcasting Act s 4(2) and (3). The 1976 Broadcasting Act contained very little detail as to how the SABC was to go about its broadcasting activities. Section 11*(a)* provided merely that one of the objectives of the SABC was 'to carry on a broadcasting service in the Republic.' As was widely suspected, the proceedings of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission have revealed that the SABC was subject to direct governmental interference in the form of the Broederbond and internal security forces. TRC Report (supra) at para 25–26.

[3] TRC Report (supra) at para 25–26.

[4] Ibid at para 14.

[5] Ibid at para 168.

[6] Ibid. The TRC Report contained detailed confirmation of this assessment. Major Craig Williamson told the TRC that 'a "special relationship" existed between the SABC and the intelligence community's units for STRATCOM. The state, he said, was at a disadvantage because it did not own/control any credible print media. It counteracted this by its use of radio and television.' Ibid at para 25. This programming was not aimed only at whites. Government used the SABC as a key strategic resource in both the white and black communities to support its Apartheid policies. The 1976 Broederbond 'Master Plan for a White Country' stated that the 'mass media and especially the radio will play important parts. The radio services for the respective black nations must play a giant role here.' Ibid at para 28. The so-called Bantu programming arm (nine radio stations and two television stations in 1984) of the SABC was also under tight political control. Of eighty-five senior employees working in these services, only six were black. Ibid at para 27.

24E.2 Broadcasting in Transition and the Independence of the Broadcast Regulator

In 1990, the National Party government appointed the Viljoen Task Group to investigate the future of broadcasting and the SABC embarked on a process of internal restructuring.[1] The ANC and its allies quite naturally responded that 'any restructuring of South African broadcasting could not be considered under the conditions of old-style secret deliberations by an elite white commission.'[2]

In 1993, the political groupings represented at the Kempton Park negotiations on South Africa's future constitutional dispensation agreed on more than the provisions of the Interim Constitution.[3] They also agreed on two other pieces of legislation: the Local Government Transition Act[4] and the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act.[5]

The IBA Act has been described by commentators as a 'radical piece of legislation.'[6] It introduced a number of significant changes to the broadcasting environment, including:

- a three tier broadcasting system composed of community,[7] commercial,[8] and public broadcasting;[9]
- a competitive commercial broadcasting sector with limitations on the number of licences a single person could control[10] and on the levels of foreign ownership;[11]
- a bar on party political control of broadcasters;[12]
- various categories of signal distribution licences, that is, licences for the distribution of signals for broadcasting purposes;[13]

[1] P Horwitz Communication and Democratic Reform in South Africa (2001) 126–7.

[2] Ibid at 129. One of the most important events for the restructuring of broadcasting was the Jabulani! Freedom of the Airwaves Conference. The recommendations coming out of the Jabulani! Conference 'effectively set the terms of the public debate.' Horwitz (supra) at 133. These recommendations included: the need to recognise three levels of broadcasting: (public, commercial and community); the public service broadcaster had to cater for all tastes and be independent of government; all South African indigenous languages had to have access to broadcasting and that education was to be a broadcasting priority. Ibid.

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[4] Act 209 of 1993.

[5] Act 153 of 1993 ('IBA Act'). Broadcasting had been on the agenda of the CODESA negotiations. 'Broadcasting was placed within the terms of reference of CODESA working group 1, Subgroup 3, which was mandated to examine the creation of 'a climate and opportunity for free political participation, including the political neutrality of and fair access to, the state controlled media.' CODESA, and later the Kempton Park ('MPNF') negotiators, wanted to ensure that the broadcasting regime in a post-apartheid South Africa would not operate as it had under the National Party government. The result was the passage of the IBA Act. See Horwitz (supra) at 139.

[6] Horwitz (supra) at 145.

[7] IBA Act s 47.

[8] IBA Act s 46.

[9] IBA Act s 45.

[10] IBA Act s 49 and 50.

[11] IBA Act s 48.

[12] IBA Act s 51.

[13] Chapter V.

- local content quotas for both radio and television;[1] and
- an independent regulator to regulate broadcasting in the public interest — the Independent Broadcasting Authority ('IBA').[2]

Both the ANC and the NP viewed the restructuring of broadcasting as essential to the success of the 1994 elections. Both parties were anxious about the extent to which the other party might exploit the SABC to improve their showing at the polls.

(a) The Interim Constitution

The Interim Constitution engaged the regulation of broadcasting through IC s 15(2)(freedom of expression). IC s 15(2) provided:

> All media financed by or under the control of the state shall be regulated in a manner which ensures impartiality and the expression of a diversity of opinion.

The phrase 'media financed by and under the control of the state' underscores the centrality of the political debates on the future role of the SABC during the transition. The requirement of impartiality and diversity of opinion reflects concerns about past abuse and anxiety over future misuse.[3] The section is, however, oddly silent as to how the state media is to be regulated so as to ensure both impartiality and diversity of opinion.

(b) The Final Constitution

The Final Constitution specifically requires the independent regulation of broadcasting.[4] FC s 192 provides:

> National legislation must establish an independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest, and to ensure fairness and a diversity of views broadly representing South African society.[5]

FC s 192 frames the regulation of broadcasting in manner that differs substantially from its predecessor, IC s 15(2). First, FC s 192 concerns itself with all broadcasting — not only with 'media financed by or under the control of the state.' All broadcasters — not just the SABC — are affected by the provisions of FC s 192. Second, FC s 192 explicitly requires that national legislation establish an independent authority to regulate broadcasting. Third, FC s 192 gives content to the role of the independent regulator. It must regulate broadcasting 'in the public interest, and to ensure fairness and a diversity of views broadly representing South African society.'

[1] IBA Act s 53.
[2] IBA Act s 3 (now repealed).
[3] TRC Report (supra) at para 22.
[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').
[5] FC s 192 is found in FC Chapter 9: 'State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy'.

One fascinating anomaly is that the independent authority to regulate broadcasting provided for in FC s 192 is not mentioned in the general provisions that govern the 'State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy' ('Chapter 9 Institutions').[1] Indeed, informal comments by certain members of the Portfolio Committee on Communications indicate that some members of the ANC believe that the only constitutional protection afforded to the independent authority to regulate broadcasting is contained in FC s 192 itself.

A literal reading of FC ss 181, 193 and 194 suggests that they do not apply to the independent authority to regulate broadcasting. However, a number of other theories of statutory interpretation could lead one to a different result. For example, according to the mischief rule, a 'court may have regard to 'the mischief' that the Act was designed to remedy.' The requirement that the broadcasting regulator be independent, ensure fairness and promote a diversity of views supports a generous reading of FC ss 181, 193 and 194 with respect to their application to the broadcasting regulator.[2]

Even if the courts decide that FC ss 181, 193 and 194 do not apply directly to the independent authority to regulate broadcasting, these sections may play an important role in determining whether super-ordinate legislation does indeed provide for the kind of independent authority required by FC s 192. The appointment and removal procedures provided for in enabling legislation require an examination of those statutory provisions in terms of the 'independence' required by the Final Constitution.[3]

[1] See FC ss 181, 193 and 194. FC ss 193 and 194 deal with, respectively, appointment and removal procedures.

[2] Bolstering the independence of the regulator is important for a number of reasons. First, given the history of abuse in respect of government interference in broadcasting, having an independent authority to regulate broadcasting is essential in order to make a decisive break with the past. Second, given high illiteracy rates in South Africa, a significant number of South Africans rely on broadcasting to meet all of their news and information needs. Independent regulation ensures that broadcasting will meet these needs effectively. Third, the authority to regulate broadcasting is required to fulfil the crucial and ongoing role of regulating broadcasting in the public interest. The independence of the broadcasting regulator is of vital and lasting concern to our democracy if South Africa is to vouchsafe access to a diversity of views in broadcasting.

[3] It is instructive to consider how the Constitutional Court has dealt with other issues relating to regulatory independence. In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that: '[f]actors that may be relevant to independence and impartiality, depending on the nature of the institution concerned, include provisions governing appointment, tenure and removal as well as those concerning institutional independence.' Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1453 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 160. The Constitutional Court found that the removal provisions in the proposed Final Constitution regarding the Public Protector and the Auditor-General did not comply with the Constitutional Principles. The Constitutional Court also found that the fact that the proposed Final Constitution did not specify what the role and the functions of the Public Service Commission would be and did not specify what protections it would have, meant that the Constitutional Court could not certify that the Constitutional Principle requiring the establishment of an independent and impartial public service commission had been met.

(c) International Best Practise

While constitutional provisions securing the independence of the authority to regulate broadcasting are still uncommon, the international trend is toward such basic guarantees.

The Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers has adopted a recommendation to member states on the independence and functions of the regulatory

More recently, the Constitutional Court has commented on the nature of the institutional independence required in respect of the Independent Electoral Commission, another Chapter 9 Institution. In New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others, Langa DP, with respect to the general nature of the IEC's independence, and, with regard to its financial and administrative independence wrote:

> [Financial independence] . . . implies the ability to have access to funds reasonably required to enable the Commission to discharge the functions it is obliged to perform under the [1996] Constitution and the Electoral Commission Act. This does not mean that it can set its own budget. Parliament does that. What it does mean, however, is that Parliament must consider what is reasonably required by the Commission and deal with requests for funding rationally, in the light of other national interests. It is for Parliament, and not the Executive arm of Government, to provide for funding reasonably sufficient to enable the Commission to carry out its constitutional mandate. The Commission must, accordingly, be afforded an adequate opportunity to defend its budgetary requirements before Parliament or its relevant committees . . . [Administrative independence] implies that there will be control over those matters directly connected with the functions which the Commission has to perform under the Constitution and the Act. The Executive must provide the assistance that the Commission requires 'to ensure (its) independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness.' The Department [of Home Affairs] cannot tell the Commission how to conduct registration, whom to employ, and so on; but if the Commission asks the government for assistance to provide personnel to take part in the registration process, government must provide such assistance if it is able to do so. If not, the Commission must be given funds to enable it to do what is necessary.
>
> It follows from what I have said that the Department, the Department of State Expenditure and the Minister of Finance have failed to appreciate the true import of the requirements of the Constitution and the Electoral Commission Act which provide that the Commission be independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, that it has the responsibility for managing elections, that it is accountable to the National Assembly and not the Executive, and that all other organs of State must assist and protect it to ensure its independence and effectiveness.

1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') at paras 98–100. See also Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC); 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Langeberg Municipality') at para 27 (Court held that although the Independent Electoral Commission is an organ of state, it is not within the national sphere of government. It wrote: 'It is a contradiction in terms to regard an independent institution as part of a sphere of government that is functionally interdependent and interrelated in relation to all other spheres of government. Furthermore, independence cannot exist in the air and it is clear that the chapter intends to make a distinction between the State and government, and the independence of the Commission is intended to refer to independence from the government, whether local, provincial or national.') The holdings and the dicta in the First Certification Judgement and Langeberg Municipality' generate the following criteria for an assessment of independence: (1) an independent body is one that is outside government; (2) an independent body is one whose members' tenures are governed by appropriate appointment and removal provisions which ensure that members are appropriately qualified, do not serve at the pleasure of the Executive and can be removed only on objective grounds relating to job performance; (3) an independent body is one that is sufficiently well funded by Parliament to enable it to perform its functions; (4) an independent body is one that has control over its own functions. These criteria suggest that policies or laws that undermine the independence of the broadcasting regulator violate FC s 192. See, further, S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS December 2004) Chapter 24.

authorities for the broadcasting sector.[1] The Recommendation locates the need for independent broadcasting regulation in terms of the predicate conditions of open and democratic societies.[2]

In 2001, a number of participants in a UN/UNESCO conference on the broadcast media developed the Windhoek Charter on Broadcasting in Africa. In respect of regulatory independence, the Windhoek Charter reads:

> All formal powers in the areas of broadcast and telecommunications regulation should be exercised by public authorities which are protected against interference, particularly of a political or economic nature, by, among others, an appointments process for members which is open, transparent, involves the participation of civil society and is not controlled by any particular political party.'[3]

In 2002, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, passed a Resolution on the Adoption of the Declaration of Principles of Freedom of Expression in Africa.[4] Clause VII thereof deals with Regulatory Bodies for Broadcasting and Telecommunications and sets out the following key principles:

- broadcasting and telecommunications must be regulated by a public authority which is independent and protected against interference, particularly of a political or economic nature;

[1] 'Recommendation of the Council of Ministers to Member States on the Independence and Functions of Regulatory Authorities for the Broadcasting Sector' (2000) 23, available at https://www.wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=393649&Lang=en (accessed on 26 May 2005)('Recommendation').

[2] The appendix to the recommendation contains guidelines concerning the independence and functions of the regulatory authorities. In brief these require:

- rules governing membership of regulatory authorities are a key element of their independence and should be defined so as to protect them from any interference, in particular by political forces or economic interests;
- rules regarding dismissal must ensure that dismissals are not used as a means of political pressure;
- arrangements for funding of regulatory authorities be specified in law in accordance with a clearly defined plan, with reference to the estimated cost of the regulatory authorities' activities, so as to allow them to carry out their functions fully and independently;
- regulatory authorities should have the power to adopt regulations and guidelines concerning broadcasting activities and to adopt internal rules, subject to clearly defined delegation by the legislator;
- one of the essential tasks of regulatory authorities in the broadcasting sector is normally the granting of licences;
- regulatory authorities should be accountable to the public for their activities and should publish regular or ad hoc reports relevant to their work;
- in order to protect the regulatory authorities' independence, it is necessary that they should be supervised only in respect of the lawfulness of their activities and the correctness and transparency of their financial activities.

Clauses II–V.

[3] Windhoek Charter on Broadcasting in Africa (2001) Clause 2, available at https://www.alc.amarc.org/legislaciones/africa.pdf (accessed on 26 May 2005).

[4] African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 'Resolution on the Adoption of the Declaration of Principles of Freedom of Expression in Africa, available at http://www.achpr.org/english/_doc_target/documentation.html?/resolutions/resolution67_en.html (accessed on 24 May 2005).

- the appointment process in respect of such a body shall be open and transparent with participation by civil society and it shall not be controlled by any particular political party;
- such a body must be accountable to the public through a multi-party body.

24E.3 The Independent Communications Authority of South Africa

In 2000, the Independent Communications Authority South Africa Act established an independent authority to regulate broadcasting: the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa ('ICASA').[1]

ICASA's mandate is to regulate both broadcasting and telecommunications in the public interest.[2] In so doing, ICASA is required to perform the duties and exercise the powers that had been given to the previous regulators of broadcasting and telecommunications, respectively, namely the IBA,[3] and the South African Telecommunications Regulatory Authority ('SATRA'). These duties and powers are found in three separate pieces of legislation: the Telecommunications Act,[4] the IBA Act, and the Broadcasting Act[5] (collectively, the 'underlying statutes').

(a) Appointment and Removal of Councillors

ICASA Act s 5 read with ICASA Act s 3(2) provides that ICASA acts through a Council of seven members, including the Chairperson, all of whom are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the National Assembly in accordance with the following principles:

- public participation in the public nomination process;
- transparency and openness;
- publication of a shortlist of candidates who must meet required criteria and who are not subject to disqualification.[6]

The criteria for appointment embrace a commitment to fairness, freedom of expression, openness and accountability on the part of those entrusted with the governance of a public service.[7] Councillors of ICASA must be representative of

[1] Act 13 of 2000 ('ICASA Act') s 3.
[2] ICASA Act s 2*(a)* and (b).
[3] ICASA Act s 4(1)(a) and (b).
[4] Act 103 of 1996 ('Telecommunications Act').
[5] Act 4 of 1999 ('Broadcasting Act').
[6] ICASA Act s 5(1).
[7] ICASA Act s 5(3)(a).

a broad cross-section of the population of the Republic[1] and must possess suitable qualifications, expertise and experience of, amongst others, broadcasting and telecommunications policy, engineering, technology, frequency band planning, law, marketing, journalism, entertainment, education, economics, business practise and finance or any other related expertise and qualifications.[2]

Section 8 of the ICASA Act provides for the removal of ICASA councillors. A councillor may be removed from office of the grounds of: misconduct;[3] inability to perform the duties of office efficiently;[4] absence from three consecutive Council meetings without Council permission and without good cause;[5] having other remunerative employment or holding another remunerative office which is likely to interfere with the exercise of the Councillor's duties or which creates a conflict between such employment/office and his or her office as a Councillor;[6] failure of a councillor (or a Councillor's family member or business partner) to disclose an interest in a business on application for a licence;[7] and becoming disqualified as contemplated in terms of section 6(1).[8] Before a Councillor can be removed on these grounds, the National Assembly has to have made a finding that grounds for removal exist and must have adopted a resolution calling for that Councillor's removal from office.[9] The President must remove a Councillor from office upon the adoption of such a resolution by the National Assembly and may suspend a Councillor from office upon the start of the proceedings by the National Assembly for the removal of the Councillor.[10] The current appointment and removal provisions contained in ICASA Act ss 5 and 8 meet the constitutionally required standard of independence laid down in FC s 192 and are sufficiently similar to the appointment and removal procedures for other Chapter 9 Institutions to pass constitutional muster.

The real threat to ICASA's current level of independence is created by the underlying statutes. The three underlying statutes do not satify the criteria for independence required by the Final Constitution and articulated by the Constitutional Court.

[1] ICASA Act s 5(3)(b)(i).
[2] ICASA Act s 5(3)(b)(ii).
[3] ICASA Act s 8(1)(a).
[4] ICASA Act s 8(1)(b).
[5] ICASA Act s 8(1)(c).
[6] ICASA Act s 8(1)(d) read with ICASA Act s 7(6).
[7] ICASA Act s 8(1)(e) read with ICASA Act s 12(2)(a) and (1).
[8] ICASA Act s 8(1)(f).
[9] ICASA Act s 8(2).
[10] ICASA Act s 8(3).

(b) Legislative Provisions Regarding the Powers, Duties and Independence of ICASA in the Regulation of Broadcasting

The IBA Act constituted a 'decisive break from the past'.[1] This decisive break took the following form:

> The Authority shall function without any political or other bias or interference and shall be wholly independent and separate from the State, the government and its administration or any political party, or from any other functionary or body directly or indirectly representing the interests of the State, the government or any political party.[2]

This statement on the nature of the IBA's independence from political interference appears far more fulsome and categorical than comparable provisions of the ICASA Act.[3] Before the IBA Act was amended by the Broadcasting Act in 1999, it was clear that the IBA was free to formulate broadcasting policy within the broad objectives for the broadcasting sector set out in IBA Act s 2.[4]

In respect of policy formulation and implementation, the member of the Executive responsible for broadcasting, the Minister of Communications, had no stated role in the original IBA Act. Major inroads into the independence of the IBA occurred with the coming into force in 1999 of the Broadcasting Act. The Broadcasting Act was primarily intended to deal with the corporatisation and restructuring of the SABC and to provide a legislative framework for the regulation of satellite broadcasting. The Schedule to the Broadcasting Act, however, contains numerous amendments that reflected increasing executive branch control over broadcasting regulation.

Section 13A is headed 'General role and powers of the Minister'. Section 13A(2) empowers the Minister to direct ICASA (then the IBA):

[1] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 262 (The late Mahomed DP's used this felicitous phrase in describing the nature of the Interim Constitution.)

[2] IBA Act s 3(3), repealed by ICASA Act Schedule 1.

[3] See ICASA Act s 3(3) and (4).

[4] The IBA Act empowers ICASA (then the IBA) to hold public enquiries in respect of broadcasting matters. IBA Act s 28. The IBA and ICASA have held many such enquiries which have resulted in the formulation of a number of important policy document. See, eg, the Triple Enquiry Report, the Private Sound, Television Broadcasting, Community Broadcasting Report and the Revised Code of Conduct for Broadcasters Report, available at www.icasa.org.za, (accessed on 30 May 2005). The Triple Enquiry Report was ground breaking. It resulted in the privatisation of six of the SABC's regional radio stations and contained important proposals on local content quotas and cross media control (that is control of both broadcasting and print media) that have reshaped the broadcasting landscape. The IBA's policy formulations have also resulted in regulations governing the operation of broadcasters with regard to the imposition of local content quotas, the definition of advertising and the regulation of infomercials, and programme sponsorship in respect of broadcasting activities. See General Notice 245, Government Gazette 23135 (22 February 2002); General Notice 2247, Government Gazette 25378 (22 August 2003); R 426, Government Gazette 19922 (1 April 1999).

(a) to undertake any special investigation and inquiry on any matter within its jurisdiction and to report to the Minister thereon;
(b) to determine priorities for the development of broadcasting services;
(c) to consider any matter within its jurisdiction placed before it by the Minister for urgent consideration.'

While the Minister is required to consult ICASA before issuing such a direction, ICASA may not refuse to comply with a direction where, for example, it believes that the public interest requires it to undertake a special enquiry or to consider urgently a particular matter.[1] Section 13A(2) violates FC s 192 by subjecting ICASA to direct executive control.

Section 13A(5)(a) empowers the Minister to issue 'policy directions of general application on matters of broad national policy consistent with the objects mentioned in section 2 of the Broadcasting Act.'[2] Before a policy direction is made the Minister must consult ICASA, engage in a notice and comment procedure in the Government Gazette and refer the proposed direction to the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee for comment.[3] In terms of section 13A(5)(b), ICASA 'must consider' a policy direction issued by the Minister in performing its functions. While ICASA must consider a policy direction, that does not mean that it must act in accordance therewith. Although the ICASA Act creates the opportunity for government to interfere with the regulation of broadcasting by ICASA, the Minister has not yet engaged in the kind of mischief FC s 192 was intended to cure.

Government interference, of course, is not confined to actions by the Executive. ICASA's authority to regulate broadcasting has been undermined by the Legislature on at least two occasions.

First, the Telecommunications Amendment Act introduced section 32C to the Telecommunications Act.[4] Telecommunications Act s 32C(1)(b) provides that with effect from 7 May 2002, 'Sentech Limited[5] shall be granted a licence to provide multimedia services to anyone who requests such service.' While this provision appears in the Telecommunications Act, it is clear that a multi-media service, being a quintessentially converged service, involves broadcasting.[6]

[1] IBA Act s 13A(4).
[2] These matters include: the radio frequency spectrum, for the purposes of planning broadcasting and other services, universal service coverage targets of the public broadcasting services and the application of new technologies that interface with broadcasting.
[3] IBA Act s 13A(6).
[4] Act 64 of 2001.
[5] A 100% state-owned company which engages in a variety of broadcasting, broadcasting signal distribution and telecommunications activities, but which is primarily a broadcasting signal distributor.
[6] The broadcasting features in the definition of a multi-media service contained in Telecommunications Act s 1 are as follows: 'a telecommunication service that integrates and synchronises various forms of media to communicate information or content in an interactive format, including. (i) audio; (j) visual content.'

The licensing of Sentech is constitutionally suspect in two respects. The licence to Sentech Limited is granted by Parliament, not ICASA. This legislative grant undermines the independence of the broadcasting regulator because multi-media services by definition involve broadcasting and places under state 'control . . . those matters directly connected with the functions which [ICASA] has to perform under the Constitution.'[1] Any future competition in respect of multi-media services is to be introduced not by the regulator, but by the Minister. In terms of section 32C(3)(a) of the Telecommunications Act, it is the Minister who shall invite applications for other multi-media services on a date to be fixed by the Minister and it is the Minister that grants additional multi-media licences. This grant of power by the Legislature to the Executive violates FC s 192. The second legislative act undermining ICASA occurred when the Broadcasting Amendment Act granted two additional regional television licences to the SABC.[2] ICASA's role in this regard was reduced to drafting licence conditions and determining whether or not these regional services were entitled to draw revenues from advertising.[3]

Despite these legislative incursions into ICASA's ostensibly independent domain, South Africa's broadcasting legislation grants ICASA sweeping powers to regulate broadcasting in a fair and impartial manner. These powers include the ability to: (1) determine important policy issues in a range of position papers; (2) invite applications for licences, evaluate these and proceed to grant and issue licences to the successful applicants; (3) impose licence conditions upon broadcasting licenses;[4] and (4) make regulations on a range of broadcasting-related matters without requiring the assistance of any other person or body.[5]

(c) Legislative Provisions Regarding the Powers, Duties and Independence of ICASA in the Regulation of Telecommunications[6]

FC s 192 does not require all electronic communications to be independently regulated. The requirement of independent regulation applies only to broadcasting. With to the regulation of telecommunications, ICASA lacks meaningful institutional independence.[7] The Telecommunications Act enables the the Executive,

[1] New National Party (supra) at para 99.
[2] Act 64 of 2002.
[3] Broadcasting Act s 22A(3).
[4] IBA Act s 43(2).
[5] IBA Act s 78.
[6] A number of the ideas contained in this section were first published elsewhere. See J White 'South Africa' in C Long (ed) Global Telecommunications Law and Practice (Revision Service 6, 2004).
[7] After the 1994 elections, the first democratically-elected government set to work re-regulating the telecommunications sector. Traditionally, this sector had been controlled by the Post-Master General and, following the incorporation of Telkom SA Limited ('Telkom'), by Telkom, in terms of the Post Office Act. Act 44 of 1958. Telkom was the exclusive provider of all telecommunication services save for mobile cellular telecommunication services.

The Telecommunications Act introduced far-reaching changes in regard to telecommunications. It established: (a) SATRA, an independent body to regulate telecommunications in the public interest; (b) competitive licensing procedures for certain telecommunications services such as Value-Added Network Services ('VANS') and Private Telecommunications Networks ('PTNs') and (c) provided for a period of exclusivity during which no-one other than Telkom could provide certain Public Switched Telecommunication Services ('PSTS') or certain telecommunication facilities.

particularly, the Minister, to so thoroughly determine telecommunications policy that one leading commentator has argued that ICASA has, in respect of telecommunications regulation, been 'capture[d] by government.'[1]

(d) Policy Formation

The signal difference in regard to ICASA's position viz a viz broadcasting and telecommunications policy directions issued by the Minister is that according to section 5(4)(d) of the Telecommunications Act, ICASA 'shall perform its functions in accordance with a policy direction issued under this section.' ICASA is not free to act independently of the Ministerial policy directions in respect of telecommunications even where it is of the view that the public interest so requires.

(e) Regulation Making

The Telecommunications Act does not empower ICASA to make its own regulations. Every regulation crafted by ICASA must be approved and published by the Minister before it takes legal effect.[2]

This lack of institutional independence with regard to telecommunications is not simply a problem in theory. Regulations passed by ICASA often remain unapproved or unpublished for months. At the time of writing, the Minister's refusal to approve and to publish ICASA's regulations with regard to VANS has deleteriously affected a competitive sector of the telecommunications market.

The regulations regarding Facilities Leasing and Interconnection Guidelines provide yet another example of ICASA's lack of institutional independence. While Telecommunications Act ss 43(3) and 44(5) grant ICASA the authority to prescribe such guidelines, the Minister withdrew these guidelines shortly after approving them.[3] In Telkom SA Limited v The Independent Communications Authority in South Africa & Others, the High Court set aside the Minister's withdrawal of the guidelines.[4] The High Court wrote:

> [T]he function of the Minister in respect of an amendment or withdrawal is confined to approving and publishing it. In other words, the amendment or withdrawal cannot emanate from her. It must come from [ICASA]. It would be ludicrous for the Minister to approve a withdrawal of which she is the author. The Minister cannot unilaterally withdraw regulations.[5]

[1] T Cohen 'SA Telecommunications and the Impact of Regulation' (2003) 47(1) Journal of African Law 67, 83.

[2] Telecommunications Act s 96(6) read with Telecommunications Act s 95(3).

[3] The Interconnection Guidelines are contained in Notice 1259, Government Gazette 20993 (15 March 2000) as amended by Notice 3457, Government Gazette 24203 (19 December 2002). The Facilities Leasing Guidelines are contained in Notice 12560, Government Gazette 20993 (15 March 2000).

[4] Telkom SA Limited v The Independent Communications Authority in South Africa & Others 1904/2000 (Unreported, Transvaal Provincial Division, 2000)('Telkom SA').

[5] Ibid at 19.

(f) Licensing and Pro-Competitive Determinations

Perhaps the most troublesome aspect of ICASA's lack of independence with regard to telecommunications is to be found in the licensing regime established by the Telecommunications Act. International norms for independent regulation require that licences be awarded without government interference. South Africa's telecommunications regulatory regime, however, requires Ministerial intervention throughout licencing process.[1] The Minister determines the telecommunications market structure by deciding both when invitations to apply for such licences will be issued[2] and who will be granted these licences.[3]

In terms of section 35(2) of the Telecommunications Act, once ICASA has made a recommendation to the Minister, the Minister may accept or reject the recommendation or may request further information from ICASA or may refer the recommendation back to ICASA for further information. It is clear that the statutory regime does not, in fact, allow the Minister to substitute her or his decision for that of ICASA. However, this provision has not been observed in respect of the licensing of the Second National Operator ('SNO'). It appears that the Minister will grant the PSTS licence despite ICASA having twice recommended that the awarding of a 51% stake therein not be granted.

Section 35A of the Telecommunications Act gives the Minister sweeping powers to ignore entirely the existing regulatory regime for licensing created by ICASA.[4] Section 35A(1)(a) provides that '[n]otwithstanding the provisions of sections 34 and 35 in the case of the major licences,[5] the Minister may, in specific instances, determine the manner in which applications may be made, such as by way of auction or tender, or both, and the licensing process and the licensing conditions that will apply.'[6] Given the apparently unfettered power to do away with the statutory and the regulatory framework set out in sections 34 and 35 of the Telecommunications Act, s 35A(1)(a) may violate both FC s 192 and FC s 44. (The latter provision of the Final Constitution vests national legislative authority in Parliament.) In Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature v President of the RSA, the Constitutional Court held that the grant by the legislature to the executive of '[a]n unrestricted power to amend the Transition Act cannot be justified on the grounds of necessity.'[7] While s 35A of the Telecommunications Act does not

[1] See Telecommunications Act s 34(2)(a): a public switched telecommunications service licence, a mobile cellular telecommunications service licence, a national long-distance service licence, an international telecommunication service licence, a multi-media service or any other telecommunication service as prescribed.

[2] Telecommunications Act s 34(2)(a).

[3] Telecommunications Act s 35(2) read with Telecommunications Act s 35(5).

[4] Telecommunications Amendment Act 64 of 2001.

[5] Telecommunications Act s 34(2)(a).

[6] Note that these 'specific instances' are not defined anywhere in the legislation.

[7] Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature v President of the RSA 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 62.

expressly grant the Minister the power to amend sections 34 and 35 of the Telecommunications Act, her unfettered discretion to determine the applications process, the licensing process and the licensing conditions amounts to such a power.[1]

[1] An instructive example of Ministerial intervention in the licensing process has been the 2002–5 licensing of the SNO to bring about a duopoly in the PSTS market. The South African PSTS market has been dominated by Telkom. Telkom's PSTS monopoly officially ended on 7 March 2002. However the licensing of the SNO has been fraught and at the time of writing we have yet to see the licensing of a competitor to Telkom. In brief, invoking her licensing powers in terms of the Telecommunications Act, s 35A, the Minister set out a three stage licensing process:

- 30% of the SNO would be set aside for the electricity and transport para-statal companies which had their own telecommunication networks.
- 19% of the SNO would be set aside for a black economic empowerment shareholder and issued an invitation to apply for that stake.
- An invitation to apply for the remaining 51% stake was issued by the Minister.

The criteria made it clear that an international operator with capital and extensive experience was sought. Unfortunately, given the depressed international telecommunications market and (no doubt) the convoluted SNO licensing process, no such operator applied. ICASA evaluated both of the applicants and recommended that neither be granted the 51% stake in the SNO. The Minister then again invoked s 35A and announced that the 51% stake would be awarded by the Minister following a non-public process that entirely excluded ICASA. Again, invitations to apply where issued. After finding that two of the applicants who responded to the second invitation to apply had 'qualified' for the 51% stake, the Minister then announced that ICASA would be involved in evaluating the applicants. ICASA once again found that neither met the qualification criteria and again recommended that the 51% stake not be granted but that it be warehoused and invitations reissued when the global telecommunications market had recovered sufficiently. The Minister took some months to consider ICASA's recommendation, and then, contrary to the provisions of section 35(2) of the Telecommunications Act — which do not allow her to substitute her own decision for that of ICASA's — announced that each of the applicants would be given 13% in the SNO and that the remaining 25% would be warehoused until a future date. In fact, each of the applicants was given 12% in the SNO. It appears that the remaining 26% is to be given to a consortium of foreign telecommunications operators.

The Minister is also responsible for determining when the telecommunication facilities provisioning market is to be opened up to competition. One of the key features of the current telecommunications regulatory environment is the fact that Telkom, whose largest shareholder remains the South African government as represented by the Minister, is the exclusive provider of certain telecommunications facilities. For example, only Telkom and/or the SNO may provide telecommunication facilities used by VANS licensees and only Telkom and/or the SNO may provide the fixed lines used by mobile cellular service licensees. This facilities-based exclusivity is entirely in the hands of the Minister. She or he decides when each of these exclusivity periods is to end. The precise wording used is 'until a date to be fixed by the Minister by notice in the Gazette'. Similarly, the Minister is responsible for determining when the provision of voice services will be opened up to competition. Section 40(3)(a) of the Telecommunications Act provides that no person who provides a VANS 'shall permit that service to be used for the carrying of voice until a date to be fixed by the Minister by notice in Gazette'. On 3 September 2004, the Minister made series of determinations ('Ministerial Determinations') in regard to the above, including setting 1 February 2005 as the date upon which, inter alia:

- mobile cellular telecommunications service licensees may utilise 'any fixed lines which may be required for the provision of the service';
- VANS 'may carry voice using any protocol'; and
- VANS 'may also be provided by telecommunications facilities other than those provided by Telkom and the SNO or any of them'.

ICASA then undertook a series of public stake-holder discussions and released a media statement giving its legal interpretation of the Ministerial Determinations, including, in particular, that the effect of section 4*(a)* of the Ministerial Determinations was that from 1 February 2005, VANS 'may self-provide facilities'.

24E.4 ICASA: THE CHALLENGE OF CONVERGENCE

This bifurcated nature of ICASA's independence viz a viz broadcasting and telecommunications regulation, will be especially difficult to manage given the fact that convergence of technologies means that the boundaries between telecommunications and broadcasting are increasingly blurred. It is often difficult to say whether a particular technological innovation should be classified as falling within the domain of broadcasting or telecommunications. Indeed, convergence was the rationale for the merger of SATRA and the IBA and the establishment of ICASA in the first place.

Parliament has recently released the Convergence Bill[1] in an attempt to 'promote convergence in the broadcasting, broadcasting signal distribution and telecommunications sectors.'[2] The Convergence Bill will repeal the IBA and Telecommunications Acts and amend the Broadcasting Act.[3]

The Convergence Bill meets the urgent need for a single electronic communications statute through its rationalization of the existing statutory framework for broadcasting and telecommunications. While the Convergence Bill will undoubtedly go through many iterations prior to promulgation, several provisions of the Bill threaten ICASA's independence and appear to be constitutionally infirm.

First, the Minister determines the date when, as well as the geographical area within which, communications network services licences may be granted.[4] ICASA may only accept and consider such licences from a date to be fixed by the Minister by notice in the Gazette.[5] Because broadcasting signal distribution has a significant impact on broadcasting, the regulation thereof should be carried out by the independent authority envisaged by FC s 192 without involvement by the Minister. Second, ICASA is required to submit to the Minister for approval proposed licence conditions in respect of individual licences.[6] The issuance of broadcasting licences is a quintessentially regulatory function and FC s 192 contemplates the ICASA then set about engaging in a regulation-making exercise to ensure that appropriate VANS licence conditions would be in place before 1 February 2005. Unfortunately, on 25 January 2005, the Minister issued a media statement (which obviously cannot alter the legal status of the Ministerial Determinations made in terms of the provisions of the Telecommunications Act) in which she said, inter alia, '[t]he issue of self provisioning was issued in the government's policy determination only in relation to mobile cellular operators in terms of fixed linksit is the intention that value-added networkoperators may obtain facilities from any licensed operator and as specified in the determinations.' The Telecommunications Act does not empower the Minister to substitute the facilities provisioning restrictions found in the Telecommunications Act with her own facilities provisioning restrictions. The Telecommunications Act allows the Minister only to determine when the particular facilities provisioning restrictions set out in the Telecommunications will come to an end. This she has done in the Ministerial Determinations. However, the Minister has refused to approve and publish ICASA's VANS regulations. The disputes between the two parties regarding the self-provisioning issue, has left the entire VANS sector in a state of flux.

[1] B9-2005, Government Gazette 27294 (16 February 2005).

[2] Convergence Bill, Preamble.

[3] Convergence Bill s 88 read with the Schedule.

[4] Convergence Bill s 5(5).

[5] Convergence Bill s 5(4).

[6] Convergence Bill s 9(2)(a).

discharge of such a duty by an independent authority.[1] Third, ICASA will be obliged to submit any frequency band plans to the Minister for approval.[2] The regulation of frequency spectrum is another aspect of broadcasting that requires oversight by an independent authority. Fourth, while Parliament and the Executive should bear ultimate responsibility for the development of macro-policy, ICASA should remain solely responsible for micro-policy formulation and implementation of the macro-policy developed by Parliament. ICASA alone should be responsible for conducting enquiries as to how best to implement the macro-policy goals determined by Parliament, making regulations, issuing invitations for applications for licences (where appropriate), granting licences, and regulating the frequency spectrum. Where the current Convergence Bill enables the Minister to determine such micro-policy outcomes, its provisions are, at the very least, suspect.

[1] Convergence Bill s 5(2)(c).
[2] Convergence Bill s 34(7).

24F Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities

Stuart Woolman and Julie Soweto Aullo

24F.1 Introduction 24F–1
24F.2 Political background 24F–1
24F.3 Constitutional negotiations, the peculiar history of FC s 185 and the travaux preparatoire for the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Act 24F–4
24F.4 The CRLC 24F–10
(a) Objectives of the CRLC 24F–10
(b) Composition of the CRLC 24F–11
(c) Mandate and functions of the CRLC 24F–12
(d) Public education and information 24F–13
(e) Investigation and dispute resolution 24F–14
(i) Power to intervene 24F–14
(ii) Complaints and complaint mechanisms 24F–15
(iii) Requests for intervention 24F–16
(f) National Consultative Conference 24F–16

(g) Funding 24F–17
(h) Co-operation between the CRLC, other institutions and organs of state 24F–18
(i) Cultural councils 24F–19

THE COMMISSION FOR THE PROMOTION AND PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES

24F.1 INTRODUCTION

The Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC') was the last of the Chapter 9 Institutions to be launched.[1] This chapter suggests why, in this case, the last shall not be first.

Two bodies of law govern the CRLC. FC ss 185 and 186 set out its objects and composition. The Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Act ('CRLC Act') fleshes out the CRLC's mandate.[2] After the setting the historical stage for the advent of the CRLC, we look at how the political environment of this Chapter 9 Institution will shape these two bodies of law and will shrink the actual space within which the CRLC operates.

24F.2 POLITICAL BACKGROUND

The iniquitous policies of apartheid bequeathed a legacy of division. Yet the divide-and-conquer strategy of apartheid also succeeded in creating conditions for social cohesion.[3] Even where apartheid quite consciously attempted to destroy both 'nations' and the spaces they occupied, oppressed communities

[1] Chapter 9 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC'), s 181, provides for the establishment of seven 'state institutions to strengthen constitutional democracy': (a) the Public Protector, FC ss 182–183; (b) the Human Rights Commission, FC s 184; (c) the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities, FC ss 185–186; (d) the Commission for Gender Equality, FC s 187; (e) the Auditor-General, FC s 188–189; (f) the Electoral Commission, FC ss 190–191; and (g) the Independent Authority to Regulate Broadcasting, FC s 192. The Interim Constitution contains no similar set of provisions. See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[2] Act 19 of 2002. The Act came into effect on 30 November 2002.

[3] What explains the resilience of religious, cultural and linguistic communities and their ability to retain a certain level of social cohesion under conditions of enormous economic pressure and political disintegration? Freud's theory of the 'narcissism of minor difference' holds that under conditions of uncertainty and instability, people project their anxiety onto others. These 'others' become the source or the cause of the uncertainty or instability despite the fact that they may bear no responsibility for an internal state or an external state to all affairs. The us/them dynamic reinforces the identification of individuals with the group and turns the group into a safe harbour or a laager. Apartheid drove groups together at the same time as it drove them apart. See S Freud Civilization and Its Discontents (1929) 117 ('It is always possible to bind together a considerable number of people in love, so long as there are other people left over to receive the manifestations of their aggressiveness. I once discussed the phenomenon that it is precisely communities with adjoining territories, and related to each other as well, that are engaged in constant feuds and in ridiculing each other — like the Spaniards and the Portuguese, for instance, the North Germans and the South Germans, the English and the Scots and so on. I gave this phenomenon the name of the "narcissism of minor differences".') See also S Freud The Taboo of Virginity (1918); S Freud Group Psychology and the Analysis of Ego (1921); M Ignatieff The Warrior's Honor (1997). One might go so far as to claim that the 'in-group exists [solely] by virtue of a denied egoism and a deflected demonstrated enormous resilience. They lost neither their voice nor their desire to be heard.[1]

Despite this palpable desire to be heard, the new constitutional dispensation devotes little meaningful political space to the specific aspirations of various volk. And for good reason. Before the velvet revolution of 1994, most political claims based on culture, language, ethnicity and religion were greeted with suspicion, and, sometimes, outright hostility.[2] From the passive resistance of Ghandi, through worker movements of the early 20th century to the Freedom Charter, the preferred language of liberation was that of human rights discourse. The liberation movement's utilisation of rights discourse reflected a considered rhetorical response to romantic assertions of White, Christian, English and Afrikaner supremacy.

The liberation movement's universalist turn provides only a partial explanation for the failure of group-based claims.[3] Much of the white minority political suspicion; the out-group by virtue of the innate suspicion displaced toward it and rationalized on the basis of difference, however minor.' See AG Burstein 'Ethnic Violence and the Narcissism of Minor Differences' (1999) 3 (Manuscript on file with author). On this account, the CRLC's promotion of difference is likely to produce greater enmity, not greater amity. But Burstein's characterization is too strong by half. Freud understood the extent to which individuals are a function of their constitutive attachments and that the individual transcends his basic drives by drawing down on positive group narratives. Freud is neither a methodological individualist nor a pessimist. Freud does, however, sound a cautionary note about the extent to which minor differences obstruct understanding and expedient politicians exploit minor differences. It is an admotion the CRLC ought to take seriously as it sets about this exercise in multi-cultural nation-building. See Dr M Masoga 'Panel on Religious Diversity and Nation Building', National Consultative Conference for the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (Durban, 30 November 2004)('The rainbow is nice. But let's forget about the nation.')

[1] Dr P Madiba 'Opening Remarks' National Consultative Conference for the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (Durban, 29 November 2004)(Text of speech on file with author). Dr Madiba is currently the Chief Executive Officer for the CRLC. See also F Venter 'The Protection of Cultural, Linguistic and Religious Rights: The Framework Provided by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996', Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 19, available at http://www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/VENTER.pdf, (accessed on 1 April 2004).

[2] A Sachs 'Opening Remarks' Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 9 available at http://www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/SACHS1.pdf, (accessed on 1 April 2004); H Giliomee 'The Majority, Minorities and Ex-Nationalities in South Africa and the Proposed Cultural Commission' Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 37, available at http://www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/GILIOMEE.pdf, (accessed on 6 January 2005).

[3] Contemporary human rights discourse demands democratic majority rule. In South Africa, democratic majority rule meant black majority rule. Neither the rhetoric of universal human rights nor the actual demographics of South Africa supported the Swiss-like cantonal arrangements that the more sophisticated apologists for the white right offered up.

posturing in the 1980s over alternatives to apartheid focused on the need for a 'broad-based, multi-racial government to contain possibly explosive ethnic or cultural demands.'[1] Representatives of the white minority insisted on various forms of constitutional protection of existing privilege in exchange for relinquishing political power.[2] The African National Congress ('ANC') rebuffed every attempt to entrench what it termed 'racial group rights'.[3] Political power would have to be traded for peace. That peace, and the retention of economic power by the white minority, would be vouchsafed by a firm ANC commitment to a justiciable Bill of Rights.[4]

The Final Constitution's rejection of group political rights[5] led some commentators to seek solace in the 'notable levels of constitutional significance' to which cultural, linguistic and religious matters were elevated.[6] They note that the Final Constitution contains six different provisions concerned with culture, eight with language and four with religion.[7]

[1] See J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 470. See also Giliomee (supra) at 37.

[2] De Waal et al (supra) at 470.

[3] See I Currie 'Minority Rights: Education, Culture and Language' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 35.

[4] See Giliomee (supra) at 40. The ANC rightly insisted that minority rights qua static, non-demographically representative levels of political representation were unacceptable. The ANC proposed a compromise between two political positions: (1) the demand for unfettered majority rule and (2) the insistence of some whites for structural guarantees. The Bill of Rights is, in large part, the content of that compromise.

[5] See Sachs (supra) at 13 ('The instruments and institutions of government are not based on cultural groups, cultural communities or representation in terms of membership of a particular community.') See also Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Sachs J) at paras 39–42 (Justice Sachs argues that the religious, linguistic and cultural rights found in the Interim Constitution — eg, IC s 32*(c)* — are best understood as efforts to 'concretis[e] . . a certain measure of cultural/linguistic autonomy in the private sphere. . . . Section 32*(c)* appears, therefore, to be an explicit, if limited, acknowledgement of the need in certain circumstances to allow for a departure from the general principles of [non-discrimination found in IC] s 8(2) read with [IC] s 8(4) . . . What appears to be provided for in s 32*(c)* is not a duty on the State to support discrimination, but a right of people, acting apart from, but in practicable association with the State, to further their own distinctive interests.')

[6] See Venter (supra) at 19.

[7] Ibid. Provisions of the Final Constitution dealing with culture, language and religion include, but are not limited to: (a) ss 9, 30, 31, 235 (culture); (b) ss 6, 29, 30, 31, 35, 235 (language); and (c) ss 9, 15, 30, 31 (religion). These various provisions were driven, at least in part, by three constitutional principles enshrined in the Interim Constitution. Two of the principles required recognition of minority rights and another required the inclusion in the Final Constitution of a provision ensuring a right of self-determination by any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage.

The Final Constitution, as a liberal political document, certainly carves out space within which self-supporting cultural, linguistic and religious formations might flourish. However, the drafting histories of FC s 185 and the CRLC Act give the lie to the claim that the basic law sets great store in the vindication of specific group claims based upon language, culture and religion.[1]

24F.3 Constitutional Negotiations, the Peculiar History of FC s 185 and the Travaux Preparatoire for The Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Act

The problem of accommodating minorities in a democratic state dominated the political negotiations that preceded the enactment of the Interim Constitution. Between 1986 and 1991, the South Africa Law Commission investigated mechanisms for the protection of group rights.[2] To this end, it solicited submissions from white right-wing intellectuals on anti-assimilationist strategies.[3] Conservative Party, Afrikaner Volkswag and Boere-Vryheidsbeweging testimony before the Commission reflected deep dissatisfaction with mere 'minority group protection'. These parties favoured 'national group protection'. National group protection meant self-determination 'in its widest form'. This widest of forms was understood by most Afrikaner nationalists to mean a right to secede.[4]

One substantive outcome of this 'debate' was the establishment of a 'Volkstaat Council'.[5] IC ss 184A and 184B gave effect to an informal agreement between the National Party government, the ANC and those Afrikaner groups who wished to pursue the creation of a Volkstaat.[6]

According to IC ss 184A and 184B, the Council was charged with gathering the requisite data necessary to make an informed decision about the contours, the powers and the political structures of a Volkstaat. The constitutional amendment

[1] The one notable exception is land. The Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have recognised the legitimacy of group claims — against both the state and other private parties — grounded largely in dispossession of title based upon racially discriminatory classifications. See, eg, Alexkor Ltd and Another v Richtersveld Community and Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC); Abrams v Allie 2004 (4) SA 534 (SCA).

[2] South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights Working Paper 25, Project 58 (1989).

[3] South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights Interim Report (1991).

[4] Ibid at 39–80.

[5] See Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 1994, s 9 (Inserts Chapter 11A into Interim Constitution). IC ss 184A and 184B created the necessary environment for a Volkstaat Council and established its brief. However, neither IC s 184A nor s 184B required the establishment of either a Volkstaat Council or a Volkstaat.

[6] The exact nature of the bargain is found in the 'Accord on Afrikaner Self-Determination Between the Freedom Front, the African National Congress and the South African Government/National Party' (23 April 1994). This document was signed by General Constand Viljoen, Leader, Freedom Front; Mr. Thabo Mbeki, National Chairman, African National Congress; Mr Roelf Meyer, Minister of Constitutional Development and Communication, Government of the Republic of South Africa. The Accord took note of IC ss 184A and 184B, Constitutional Principle 34 and a previously unsigned that created the Council also introduced a 34th Constitutional Principle. This principle required that the Final Constitution make some provision for the exercise of the right to self-determination by any community 'sharing a common cultural and language heritage, whether in a territorial entity within the Republic or in any other recognised way.'[1]

Enabling legislation for the Volkstaat Council was enacted in November 1994.[2] In March 1999, the Volkstaat Council concluded its activities with a presentation memorandum between the ANC, the AVF and the South African government. It read, in relevant part, as follows: '1. The parties agree to address, through a process of negotiations, the idea of Afrikaner self-determination, including the concept of a Volkstaat. 2. The parties further agree that in the consideration of these matters, they shall not exclude the possibility of local and/or regional and other forms of expression of such self-determination. 3. They agree that their negotiations shall be guided by the need to be consistent with and shall be governed by the requirement to pay due consideration to Constitutional Principle XXXIV, other provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 as amended, and that the parties take note of the Memorandum of Agreement, as referred to above. 3.1 Such consideration shall therefore include matters such as: 3.1.1 substantial proven support for the idea of self-determination including the concept of a Volkstaat; 3.1.2 the principles of democracy, non-racialism and fundamental rights; and 3.1.3 the promotion of peace and national reconciliation. 4. The parties further agree that in pursuit of 3.1.1 above, the support for the idea of self-determination in a Volkstaat will be indicated by the electoral support which parties with a specific mandate to pursue the realisation of a Volkstaat will gain in the forthcoming election. 4.1 The parties also agree that, to facilitate the consideration of the idea of a Volkstaat after the elections, such electoral support should be measured not only nationally, but also by counting the provincial votes at the level of: 4.1.1 the electoral district; and 4.1.2 wherever practical the polling stations as indicated by the parties to, and agreed to, by the Independent Electoral Commission. 5. The parties agree that the task of the Volkstaatraad shall be to investigate and report to the Constitutional Assembly and the Commission on Provincial Government on measures which can give effect to the idea of Afrikaner self-determination, including the concept of the Volkstaat. 6. The parties further agree that the Volkstaatraad shall form such advisory bodies as it may determine. 7. In addition to the issue of self-determination, the parties also undertake to discuss among themselves and reach agreement on matters relating to matters affecting stability in the agricultural sector and the impact of the process of transition on this sector, and also matters of stability including the issue of indemnity inasmuch as the matter has not been resolved. 8. The parties further agree that they will address all matters of concern to them through negotiations and that this shall not exclude the possibility of international mediation to help resolve such matters as may be in dispute and/or difficult to conclude. 8.1 The parties also agree that paragraph 8.0 shall not be read to mean that any of the deliberations of the Constitutional Assembly are subject to international mediation, unless the Constitutional Assembly duly amends the Constitution to enable this to happen. 8.2 The parties also affirm that, where this Accord refers to the South Africa Government, it refers to the South African Government which rules South Africa until the April 1994 elections.' Talk of a Volkstaat represented the ambitions of some white Afrikaans-speaking South Africans — and the willingness of the ANC to accede to those demands necessary to secure a peaceful election and political transition. See D Basson South Africa's Interim Constitution: Text and Notes (1994) 237.

[1] See Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 1994, s 13*(b)*(Inserts Constitutional Principle 34 into Interim Constitution).

[2] The Volkstaat Council Act 30 of 1994. The 20 members of the council provided for in the Interim Constitution were elected from among members of the Freedom Front by a joint session of the National Assembly and the Senate.

to the State President of its 'Final Report' on the logic of and the logistics for an autonomous Afrikaner state.[1]

Express provision for a Volkstaat died with the advent of the Final Constitution.[2] The desire to protect the cultural, religious and linguistic interests of Afrikaners did not. The CRLC is understood by many of the principals in the Constitutional Assembly negotiations to have been the compensation extracted by representatives of white minority parties for the elimination of any textual support in the Final Constitution for a Volkstaat Council or a Volkstaat.[3] The volume of complaints lodged thus far with the CRLC on issues of concern to members of various Afrikaans-speaking communities underwrites this conclusion.[4]

In August 1998, the Department of Provincial and Local Government ('DPLG'), which possessed ministerial authority over the CRLC, initiated discussions on proposed functions and structures of the CRLC. The first pre-commission National Consultative Conference ('NCC') engaged solicited submissions, research by the Human Sciences Research Council ('HSRC'), white papers from government and policy statements from key civil society stakeholders.[5] This process was repeated again, a year later, in September 1999.[6] The second pre-commission NCC debated four theme papers: (1) the appropriate model for the [1] Volkstaat Council Final Report: Findings and Recommendations (31 March 1999).

[2] While a Volkstaat is not mentioned by name in the Final Constitution, FC s 235 still holds out the possibility for 'self-determination' for 'any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage, within a territorial entity in the Republic'. The constitutional basis for the Volkstaat Council disappeared with the certification of the Final Constitution. The Council, as a statutory body, limped on for another two years. The Volkstaat Council Act itself has not been repealed.

[3] Dr C Mulder claims that the Freedom Front engaged the ANC leadership in a vigorous debate about a Volkstaat. The Freedom Front's aspirations for Afrikaner territorial and political self-determination were rebuffed. The ANC would only go so far as to recognise the Freedom Charter's commitment to 'internal' cultural and religious self-determination. Both parties seemed to accept the CRLC as an institution that could satisfy the requirements of 'internal' cultural and religious self-determination. Phone Interview between Dr C Mulder, Spokesman for the Freedom Front, and Dr C Landman (5 January 2005). Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (5 January 2005). Confirmation of this assessment comes in the form of then Minister of Provincial and Local Government FS Mufamadi's statement that the Volkstaat Council would be phased out and its responsibilities handed over to the CRLC. Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (5 January 2005). The brinkmanship of white minority politicians also meant that agreement on official language policy and state-funded education in minority languages eluded the Constitutional Assembly until the very end. For a brief synopsis of the negotiations regarding the constitutional protection of minority rights, see I Currie 'Minority Rights: Education, Culture and Language' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S. Woolman Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 35.

[4] See § 24F.4*(e)*(iii) infra.

[5] The first pre-commission NCC was jointly sponsored by the Minister for the Department of Provincial and Local Government and the Minister for the Department of Arts, Culture, Science and Technology and was held in Pretoria on 24 September 1998.

[6] The second pre-commission NCC was sponsored by the Minister for the Department of Provincial and Local Government and was held in Midrand, Gauteng on 23–24 September 1999.

CRLC; (2) the mandate of the CRLC; (3) the relationship between the CRLC and other institutions; and (4) the relationship between cultural councils and the CRLC.[1]

Deliberation on the CRLC Act began in earnest in August 2001. In terms of the initial draft CRLC Bill,[2] the CRLC possessed only five of the powers now present in the CRLC Act.[3] During parliamentary debate, some members of the Provincial and Local Government Select Committees expressed concern over the CRLC's apparent inability to protect the cultural, religious and linguistic rights of communities.[4] Parliamentarians could not agree about whether the CRLC, as a watchdog of community rights, should have as much 'bite' as 'bark'.[5] Earlier drafts of clause 21 of the Bill included powers to 'facilitate the resolution of conflicts of an inter-cultural, inter-religious or inter-linguistic nature' and to 'investigate complaints of a cultural, religious or linguistic nature against any person or organ of state'.[6] These capacities were omitted from the August 2001 draft Bill. In the end, no mention was made of conflict resolution in the CRLC Act. The word 'conflict' was replaced with the word 'friction'.[7] The majority of parliamentarians ultimately preferred to see the CRLC as a mediator between communities.[8]

Mediation was not to be limited to active disputes. The CRLC was also charged with the responsibility of opening up channels of communication that would identify and diffuse incipient civil unrest.[9] This role as mediator, rather than litigator, meant that the CRLC was only granted the power to bring matters of [1] See 'Final Report: Second National Consultative Conference', Democracy and Governance, Human Sciences Research Council (November 1999) ('Report of the 2nd NCC'). The two most hotly debated issues were the role of the cultural councils and representation on the CRLC. The councils are intended to elicit, to amplify and to mediate local, geographically bounded concerns of religious, linguistic and cultural communities. They are tools for mobilisation and dispute resolution. Stakeholders articulated strong differences about (a) how such councils would be recognised; and (b) the amount of state support they should receive. Conditions of fiscal austerity have largely solved the latter problem. Financial support will be limited. The issue of how councils will be recognised — and thus who speaks for a particular community — still vexes the CRLC. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005). See § 24F.4(i) infra. The second pre-commission NCC was more decisive with respect to representation. A proposal for direct representation of all communities was rejected. Political legitimacy would be conferred on the CRLC through an open nomination process for its full-time chairperson and some 11 to 17 part-time commissioners.

[2] Bill B62-2002, Government Gazette No 22573 (17 August 2001).

[3] Compare CRLC Bill, s 21(1) and CRLC Act, s 5(1).

[4] Debate on the Bill by the Provincial and Local Government Portfolio and Select Committees: Joint Sitting (PLGP Committee) commenced on 25 September 2001.

[5] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 25 September 2001, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 March 2004).

[6] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 24 October 2001, Appendix 1, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 April 2004).

[7] See CRLC Act, s 5*(g)*.

[8] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 24 October 2001, Appendix 1, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 April 2004).

[9] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 25 September 2001, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 March 2004). See the submission by the South African Council of Churches (SACC).

concern to the attention of 'appropriate authorities'.[1]

The weakness of the CRLC reflects concern about its redundancy.[2] The Pan South African Language Board ('PANSALB'), the Youth Commission, the Commission for Gender Equality ('CGE'), the Human Rights Commission ('SAHRC'), the Public Protector, the Judicial Inspectorate, the National House of Traditional Leaders and the Free State Centre for Citizenship, Education and Conflict Resolution have briefs that overlap with that of the CRLC.[3] Many MPs have expressed anxiety about the expenditure of public funds on an entity that duplicates the functions of existing institutions.[4] However, Parliament's stonewalling and token funding suggest that the motivations for creating a toothless institution lie elsewhere.[5] Without putting too fine a point on it, the CRLC's

[1] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 02 October 2001, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 March 2004). The prevailing consensus is made manifest in the CRLC Act. The powers of the Commission enable it to: '(g) facilitate the resolution of friction between and within cultural, religious and linguistic communities or between any such community and an organ of state, and where the cultural, religious or linguistic rights of a community are affected; (h) receive and deal with requests related to the rights of cultural and linguistic communities; (i) make recommendations to the appropriate organ of state regarding legislation that impacts, or may impact, on the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities.' CRLC Act, ss 5(1)(g–i). Passage of the Act did not end debate about its content. Barely a year after the Act came into force, and prior to the actual establishment of the CRLC, a Bill was introduced in Parliament to amend the powers of the Commission under the Act. A van Niekerk (MP), Private Members Legislative Proposal on 'Enforcement Powers for the Section 185 Commission' (12 September 2003), available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2003, (accessed on 04 March 2004).

[2] Minutes of the PLGP Committe Hearings of 24 October 2001, Appendix 1, Submission of the Afrikanerbond, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 March 2004).

[3] See Report of the 2nd NCC (supra) at 10–12. For example, the CRLC is given the power, under FC s 185(3), to investigate any matter that falls within the purview of the South African Human Rights Commission. FC 185 (3) was amended by Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 65 of 1998, s 4.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Under-funding of the Chapter 9 Institutions is a common problem. Parliament has been put on notice that low levels of funding and overweening executive oversight make effective operation of these institutions difficult, if not impossible. The Corder Report is absolutely scathing in this regard. See H Corder, S Jagwanth & F Soltau 'Report on Parliamentary Oversight and Accountability' Report to the Speaker of the National Assembly (1999), available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001/viewminute.php?id=811, (accessed 10 January 2005)('Corder Report'). Corder, Jagwanth and Soltau write that

> In their submissions to us, many constitutional institutions have also pointed out that the present arrangement may result in a very low priority being given to constitutional institutions, as government departments may be slow in recognising the interests of an institution which does not form part of the core business of the department. The very direct control by the executive of constitutional institutions can have a devastating effect on the independence and credibility of these offices. . . .
>
> In the first place, to make institutions dependent on budget allocations received through the very departments that they are required to monitor is not desirable. Secondly, these institutions must be seen by the public to be independent and free of the possibility of influence or pressure by the executive branch of the government. Approval by the executive of budgets, or other issues such as staffing, is thus inconsistent with independence, as well as the need to be perceived as independent by the public when dealing with their cases. This executive power could render impotent state institutions supporting constitutional democracy through the potential denial of both financial and human resources. Furthermore, the special constitutional features of these institutions are not recognised as executive priorities are set.

Corder, Jagwanth & Soltau 'Corder Report' (supra) at paras 7.2 and 7.2.1. The authors then cite a decision by the Constitutional Court in support of the proposition that Parliament, not the executive, is responsible for securing the independence of the Chapter 9 Institutions and for creating oversight mechanisms that ensure that they discharge their duties. See New National Party of South Africa v Government of questionable provenance, its lack of powerful constituencies, and its nominal independence give the government little motivation to take the CRLC seriously.[1] the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 98 ('It is for Parliament, and not the executive arm of government, to provide for funding reasonably sufficient to enable the Commission to carry out its constitutional mandate. The Commission must accordingly be afforded an adequate opportunity to defend its budgetary requirements before Parliament or its relevant committees.') Parliament has largely abdicated those responsibilities. The Corder Report suggests that, at a minimum, the budget of each Chapter 9 Institution be subject to a separate vote — a vote distinct from that for the budget for the department with line authority, and a vote distinct from that for the budget of other Chapter 9 Institutions. See Corder, Jagwanth & Soltau 'Corder Report' (supra) at para 7.3 ('By giving the constitutional institutions a separate budget vote their status as separate constitutional entities is recognised and they would be able to emerge from the shadow of the executive. We regard this as a minimum to achieve and fulfil the requirements of the Constitution.') To satisfy other constitutional imperatives, the Corder Report advocates the passage of legislation — an Accountability and Independence of Constitutional Institutions Act — and the creation of a parliamentary oversight committee — a Standing Committee on Constitutional Institutions. Ibid at paras 1.1, 7.3, 7.4, 8. (These recommendations are grounded in the requirements of FC ss 55(2), 181(1),181(2), 181(3) 181(4) and 196(3)). Parliament has not acted on any of the Corder Report recommendations. Other Chapter 9 Institutions have noted this failure to act with dismay. See N B Pityana 'South African Human Rights Commission Presentation to the Justice Portfolio Committee — Budget Review and Programmes 2001/2002' (8 June 2001), available at www.sahrc.gov.za, (accessed on 11 January 2005). Chairperson Pityana writes:

> After five years of operations, it is very discouraging to have to report that questions about the independence of the Commission have not been resolved. . . . National Treasury continues to relate to the Commission through the Justice Department. This means that we have no direct means of having queries and problems resolved. . . . Since inception, the Commission has constantly raised concerns about the manner in which its budget was set. We pointed out ad nauseum that at no stage was there a proper assessment of the mandate of the Commission and the appropriate level of resources necessary to execute the mandate. Initiatives by the Minister of Finance — such as his requirement in 1996 that we prepare a business plan — . . . .was promptly ignored once it was presented. . . . Another example of this insensitivity to the independence of national institutions is where, without consultation or reference to the affected institutions, the Public Finance Management Act, 1999 prescribes in Section 66(4) that constitutional institutions 'may not borrow money, nor issue guarantee, indemnity or security, nor enter into any transaction that binds the institution or entity to any future commitment'. The effect of this, of course, is that the Commission cannot rent property in its own name, acquire property for its sole use and in its own name. This is unacceptable especially as the Human Rights Commission Act states clearly that the Commission 'shall be a juristic person'. At a stroke the rights and privileges of an independent institution have been removed without the participation of the Commission. . . . [S]uch a cavalier attitude to the law is worrisome. . . . [Another] concern has been about the treatment of the reports of the Commission by parliament. Some progress appeared to be developing when the Speaker commissioned Professor Hugh Corder to advise on the effective functioning of the oversight responsibility of parliament towards Chapter 9 institutions. . . . We are not aware that any action has been taken by parliament on the report. The rules of parliament still do not allow meaningful participation by national institutions, our reports still do not have a portal that fits in parliamentary procedures and there is no committee dedicated to receiving and reviewing the reports of the Commission.

Ibid at 4–5.

[1] For more on the basis for this assessment, see § 24F.4*(g)* infra. This conclusion is grounded, in part, in Parliament's refusal to release any monies for the CRLC in the fiscal year 2004 until September 2004. Parliament agreed to release monies necessary for the CRLC's operation only when several Commissioners made the Minister and Parliament aware that the CRLC could not host its statutorily-required launch within its first year of operation if it did not receive the requisite funds. The government's identification of the CRLC with the Volkstaat Council and its evident disdain for the CRLC's activities further bear out this assessment. See § 24F.4*(g)* infra. Others are slightly more sanguine about government's attitude towards the CRLC, and attribute government's inaction to a belief, however misguided, that Chapter 9 Institutions generally ought to assist the government in carrying out its policies. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

24F.4 THE CRLC

(a) Objectives of the CRLC

The Final Constitution is committed to 'healing the divisions of the past', 'establishing a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights', and building a South Africa 'united in [its] diversity'.[1] The CRLC is similarly tasked. It is responsible for deepening our appreciation for the wide array of South African cultures, languages and religions.[2] As the same time it is obliged to build bridges between communities in a country riven by racial, ethnic, cultural and linguistic strife.[3] The CRLC has used its bridge-building mandate to arrogate to itself a third mandate — national identity formation. At a high enough level of abstraction, multicultural recognition and national identity formation appear compatible.[4] But as the debate at the compulsory launch

[1] See Final Constitution, Preamble.

[2] See CRLC Act, s 4. Section 4 states that the mission of the CRLC is:

(a) to promote respect for and further the protection of the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities;

(b) to promote and develop peace, friendship, humanity, tolerance and national unity among and within cultural, religious and linguistic communities on the basis of equality, non-discrimination and free association;

(c) to foster mutual respect among cultural, religious and linguistic communities;

(d) to promote the right of communities to develop their historically diminished heritage; and

(e) to recommend the establishment or recognition of community councils.

[3] See CRLC Act, Preamble.

[4] We are not convinced that they are compatible. Indeed, for a society in transition, multicultural recognition and national identity formation appear to pull in opposite directions. Even if individual identities are formed in open dialogue, they are largely shaped and limited by a predetermined set of scripts. Collective recognition becomes important, in large part, because the body politic has denied the members of some groups the ability to form — on an individual basis — a positive identity. In a perfect world, the elimination of group-based barriers to social goods would free individuals to be whatever they wanted to be. But even in a perfect world, claims for group recognition do not dissipate so readily. What is the basis for the demand for group recognition? In any multicultural society, two different kinds of claims for equal respect and two different senses of identity sit uncomfortably alongside one another. The first emerges from what Taylor calls a politics of equal dignity. See C Taylor 'The Politics of Recognition' in A Gutmann (ed) Multiculturalism (1996) 1. It is based on the idea that each individual human being is equally worthy of respect. The second issues from a politics of difference. This form of politics tends to revolve, primarily, around the claim that every group of people ought to have the right to form and maintain its own — equally respected — culture. The important distinction between the two is this. The first focuses on what is the same in all of us — that we all have dreams and that we should all be allowed to pursue these dreams. The second focuses on a specific aspect of our identity — our membership in a group or groups — and says that the purpose of our politics ought to be, ultimately, nurturing or fostering that particularity. The power of this second form of liberal politics springs largely from its involuntary character — the sense that we have no capacity to choose this aspect of our identity. It chooses us. See M Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' in A Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 64, 67. The problem we face in our own liberal democracy is that it is difficult, if not impossible, to accommodate both kinds of claims. As Taylor himself notes, while 'it makes sense to demand as a matter of right that we approach . . . certain cultures with a presumption of their value . . . it can't make sense to demand as a matter of right that we come up with a final concluding judgment that their value is great or equal to others.' Taylor (supra) at 16. But the demand for political recognition of distinct cultures amounts to just that. Moreover, such recognition reinforces a narcissism of minor difference that, in turn, provokes anxiety about the extent to which members of other groups secure access to the most important goods in a polity. Such anxiety about a just distribution of goods — and the manner in which of the CRLC in November 2004 suggests, persons and groups silenced by years of oppression often have a greater interest in being heard than they do in pledging allegiance to a nation still in the early stages of gestation. Whether such a broad brief as national identity formation is coherent — or if coherent, even plausible given the political environment and the CRLC's fiscal constraints — will surface and resurface as a theme throughout the rest of this chapter.

(b) Composition of the CRLC

FC s 186(2) provides that the CRLC must:

(a) be broadly representative of the main, cultural, religious and linguistic communities in South Africa;
(b) be broadly reflect the gender composition of South Africa.

Section 9 of the CRLC Act stipulates that the CRLC must consist of:

(a) a Chairperson appointed by the President in terms of the Act; and
(b) no fewer than 11 and no more than 17 other members appointed by the President in accordance with the procedure set out under the Act.[1]

The CRLC Act supplements these compositional desiderata with a requirement that the members of the CRLC be selected in a manner that ensures that it 'collectively possesses sufficient knowledge and experience concerning issues relevant to the promotion and protection of cultural, religious and linguistic communities and nation-building.'[2]

Following an invitation to South Africans to nominate qualified individuals to serve on the CRLC Commission,[3] the first 18 commissioners were appointed by the President of the Republic in late 2003.[4] At present, there are seven female commissioners (including the deputy chairperson).[5] The members of the CRLC group affiliation distorts that distribution — necessarily interferes with national identity formation. The ANC has, for both historical reasons and for reasons associated with its vision of transformation, refused to lend significant support to politics associated with group recognition. The Constitutional Court is also predisposed towards claims of equal respect grounded in a politics of equal dignity. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 28–30 ('[I]t is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society.') See also President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41 ('[D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society... [E]quality means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of their differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second class citizens.')

[1] See FC s 186(1). For the procedure of appointment of the Chairperson and other members of the CRLC Commission, see CRLC Act, ss 12 and 11, respectively.

[2] See CRLC Act, s 4*(c)*.

[3] See CRLC Act, s 11.

[4] Of 196 nominees, 54 candidates were interviewed. The appointments were made on 30 September 2003. See South African Information Service, available at http://www.southafrica.info/ess_info/sa_glance/constitution/culturalrights.htm, (accessed on 4 April 2004).

[5] The CRLC's Chief Executive Officer, P Madiba, is also a woman.

Commission represent a broad range of South African cultural, religious and linguistic groups.[1]

The 'sufficient knowledge' criterion for selection has yet to play a meaningful role in the appointments process. It has, however, become an issue in terms of the operation of the Commission. Administrative officers have argued that the 'nation-building' requirement means that commissioners from a particular demographic group ought not to be used as emissaries to that group. For example, a commissioner who adheres to some form of Judaism ought not to engage members of the Jewish community on matters related to the official business of the CRLC. The ostensible rationale for this policy position is that nation-building requires communication across demographic groups. Several commissioners have rejected this position on the grounds that a commission charged with the protection of cultural, religious and linguistic communities must, in fact, deploy those commissioners best able to understand — from the inside — the concerns of a given community.[2]

(c) Mandate and functions of the CRLC

Given its very recent, and substantially delayed establishment, the CRLC's chief preoccupation is with the consolidation of its power. CRLC commissioners and staff recognize that turning an institution perceived by many as a white elephant into a felt necessity is contingent upon its capacity to discharge its constitutional and statutory obligations.

The CRLC mission statement holds that the CRLC's primary aim is 'to promote and develop peace, friendship, humanity, tolerance and national unity among cultural, religious and linguistic communities. To achieve this mission, the CRLC must:

(a) create channels of communication between the state and communities;
(b) monitor compliance by the state and civil society with its mandate;
(c) mediate in inter-community conflict situations and facilitate harmonious co-existence;
(d) develop programmes that foster sensitivity, respect and understanding for cultural, religious and linguistic diversity;
(e) lobby government departments and legislative authorities in order to recommend amending or repealing laws that undermine its aims or enacting laws in furtherance of its ends.[3]

[1] The profiles of the individual commissioners are available at http://www.crlcommission.org.za/commissioners.html, (accessed on 27 May 2004).

[2] Interviews with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (02 June 2004 and 05 January 2005).

[3] See CRLC website, available at http://www.crlcommission.org.za/about.html, (accessed on 27 May 2004).

Section 5 of the CRLC Act sets out the primary responsibilities of the CRLC.[1] These responsibilities encompass public education and information, investigation and dispute resolution, policy and research, the creation of community councils, and the sponsorship of a national consultative conference.

The CRLC, as an independent state institution supporting constitutional democracy,[2] is expected to perform its functions without fear, favour or prejudice.[3] As the experience of other Chapter 9 Institutions attests, budgetary constraints and dependence upon government largesse can make it difficult to discharge constitutional obligations.[4] The CRLC's own experience with fiscal foot-dragging by the government suggests how easily the independence of these institutions erodes.[5]

(d) Public education and information

Section 5*(a)* of the CRLC Act requires the CRLC to conduct information and education programmes that promote public understanding of its objects, role and activities. To achieve this particular end, the CRLC Commission has depended, quite literally, on the good offices of such older and better-established sister institutions as the South African Human Rights Commission ('SAHRC') and the Commission for Gender Equality ('CGE'). The SAHRC's provincial offices have provided the CRLC with the space and the credibility necessary to hold workshops and conferences designed: (1) to introduce itself to the public and (2) to encourage people to speak to sensitive issues regarding race, culture, language, class and religion.

The CRLC has decided that in order to carry out its mandate, it must become a locus for debate and not merely an oracle making orotund pronouncements on identity politics.[6] As a result, the CRLC views its 'constituencies' as vital to its political success: the more communities it mobilises around language, culture and religion, the more likely it is to succeed in shaping its own agenda.[7] Fiscal limits and the capacity constraints will make it difficult for the CRLC to play such a role. Members of the public have already complained that the CRLC has made little effort to follow up on early initiatives and that the CRLC lacks the staff

[1] See also FC ss 185(1), (2) and (3).

[2] See Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)(Chapter 9 Institutions are independent and thus cannot be a part of the national sphere of government.)

[3] See CRLC Act, s 3.

[4] See Corder, Jagwanth & Soltau 'Corder Report' (supra) at para 7.2.1; Pityana (supra) at 4–5.

[5] Interview with Ms M Bethlehem, Deputy Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (1 December, 2004). Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (5 January 2005).

[6] Interview with Dr MD Guma, Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (14 May 2004)(For example, the Chairperson would like the CRLC to assist in the creation of a receptive environment in traditional communities for debate about AIDs, ARVs and responsible sexual behaviour.)

[7] Ibid.

necessary to maintain connections with the communities to which it has already reached out.[1]

(e) Investigation and dispute resolution

(i) Power to intervene

The CRLC possesses the power to monitor, to investigate and to research any issue concerning cultural, religious and linguistic communities and their rights.[2] Similarly, the CRLC may respond to requests related to the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities.[3] The CRLC must attempt to mediate conflicts between and within cultural, religious and linguistic communities as well as between any such community and an organ of state. These three functions suggest that the CRLC was designed to enable communities to resolve disputes amicably and to diminish the likelihood that communities would use the courts to ventilate grievances.

Unlike the enabling acts of other Chapter 9 Institutions, the CRLC Act grants the CRLC no independent basis upon which to bring a claim to court. This deficiency was the subject of debate prior to and subsequent to enactment of the CRLC's enabling legislation.[4] Parliament's considered opinion appears to be that the CRLC should not possess the power to protect cultural, religious and linguistic communities' rights or to enforce any of its recommendations. The CRLC may only make recommendations to 'the appropriate organ of state regarding legislation that impacts, or may impact, on the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities'[5] or 'bring any relevant matter to the attention of the appropriate authority or organ of state, and where appropriate, make recommendations to such authority or organ of state in dealing with such a matter.'[6]

The limitations placed on enforcement need not be crippling. The CRLC Act leaves open a number of other litigation strategies. The absence of an express right to litigate has not stopped other Chapter 9 Institutions, namely the Commission for Gender Equality ('CGE'), from asserting its right to do so.[7] Although the [1] Interviews with delegates to National Consultative Conference for the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (29 November – 1 December 2004).

[2] CRLC Act, s 5*(e)*.

[3] CRLC Act, s 5*(b)*.

[4] A proposal to amend the Act in this regard was submitted to the Members and Legislative Proposals Standing Committee on 12 September 2003. See Commission for Promotion and Protection of Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Amendment Bill, available at http://www.pmg.org.za/docs/2003/viewminute.php?id=3527, (accessed on 4 March 2004).

[5] CRLC Act, s 5*(i)*.

[6] CRLC Act, s 5*(k)*.

[7] See, eg, Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund (Commission for Gender Equality Intervening) 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA); Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC); S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 499 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC). See also C Albertyn 'The Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) in Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D.

CGE has not yet initiated any case in its own name, it has exercised its litigation prerogative by lending support to or participating in cases that raise important gender issues. The CGE's intervention as an amicus curiae has established institutional precedent that the CRLC may well choose to follow. Another strategy, discussed more fully below, is to use other Chapter 9 Institutions — namely the SAHRC — to initiate litigation on the CRLC's behalf.

The absence of express powers to litigate will inevitably influence the role the CRLC crafts for itself. As it now stands, the CRLC views its role primarily as a consciousness raiser and not an agent of change.[1] Its enabling statute — as well as its current complement of commissioners — has created an institution less inclined to adjudicate competing claims and more disposed towards creating the conditions for mutual respect. Given the sensitive nature of the matters that fall within its purview, Parliament may have been wise to ensure that the CRLC uses the blunt cudgel of the law only as a last resort.

(ii) Complaints and complaint mechanisms

At the time of writing, the CRLC has no procedure for engaging complaints or requests for intervention.[2] Nor does the CRLC have any draft procedures on the table.[3] This failure to construct adequate mechanisms to field inquiries, to investigate disputes, to reach considered conclusions in law and to use such conclusions to facilitate conflict resolution means that the CRLC currently has no way of discharging meaningfully its constitutional obligations. That no script for dispute resolution exists stands as an indictment of the CRLC and reflects an abdication of responsibility by the government.[4]

[1] Interview with Dr MD Guma, Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (14 May 2004).

[2] Complaints are currently assigned to individual commissioners on an ad hoc basis. Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (05 June 2004); Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

[3] That does not mean that Commissioners and staff are without notions about how requests for intervention ought to be handled. The CRLC administration will likely float two proposals. The first would have the Corporate Affairs Officer ('CAO') qua Legal Advisor make the initial findings. A panel of commissioners would sit as an appellate body were a party to the dispute inclined to contest the CAO's finding. A second model — based upon the existing dispute resolution mechanisms at the SAHRC — would have one member of the CRLC staff and two outsiders make the initial finding. The finding would be binding on the CRLC. CRLC commissioners would be tasked with running hearings on issues of broader social import. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

[4] While the CRLC and its administration bear the lion's share of responsibility for this lassitude, the Minister of Provincial and Local Government is equally culpable. As the Constitutional Court made patently clear in New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others, a Chapter 9 Institution is entitled to craft its own procedures to discharge its brief and the state is obliged to provide the requisite financial and administrative support. 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC). The Minister must accept a significant measure of responsibility for both the absence of adequate funding and the failure to supply adequate counsel to develop the necessary dispute resolution mechanisms.

(iii) Requests for intervention

Over the course of its first year of operation, the CRLC has received a number of requests for intervention. At the time of writing, none of the underlying disputes have been resolved.[1] The CRLC's current docket does, however, provide a glimpse of some of the religious, linguistic and cultural fault lines in South Africa.

Not surprisingly, members of Afrikaans-speaking communities have lodged a significant number of complaints. The content of these complaints demonstrates remarkable thematic variation: (1) religious education in secondary schools; (2) government subsidies for former Model C schools; (3) faith-based drug rehabilitation centres; (4) diminution in the status of Christianity; (5) language instruction in secondary school education; (6) a lack of respect for Christianity in advertising copy at an institution of tertiary education.[2] Complaints from other quarters are just as diverse: (1) requests for expansion of the list of 11 existing official languages; (2) a referral from the SAHRC regarding ancestral burial rights; (3) discrimination against a Reformed Presbyterian Church; (4) the predominance of Christian holidays as official holidays; (5) admissions policies for private religious schools; (6) a failure to provide sufficiently for instruction in African languages in public schools curriculum; (7) absence of Department of Education policy on resource allocation for and equity considerations involved in religious studies instruction; (8) a long-standing historical dispute between the Khoi and the San communities.

(f) National Consultative Conference ('NCC')

The CRLC must convene two consultative conferences during each five-year term.[3] The first such conference must take place within 12 months of a new term of the Commission.[4] The dual purpose of the NCC is to evaluate South Africa's progress with regard to the promotion and protection of the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities and to take stock of its success in forging a national identity.[5]

The first official NCC took place in the time period required by statute.[6] Whether the NCC achieved its goals depends upon one's perspective.

That almost 600 delegates — representing the entire spectrum of South Africa's religious, linguistic and cultural communities — attended the NCC certainly counts in its favour. That the CRLC was able to arrange for the plenary sessions to be simultaneously translated into the 11 official languages also stands as a remarkable achievement. Groups long silenced had an opportunity to speak and to be heard.

[1] 'List of Complaints Received' Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (07 January 2005)(On file with author).

[2] Ibid.

[3] CRLC Act, s 13(1).

[4] CRLC Act, s 24.

[5] CRLC Act, s 25. See also CRLC Act, ss 26–29 (Prescribes procedures for and persons who must attend NCC).

[6] The first official NCC took place between 29 November and 03 December 2004 in Durban, KwaZulu-Natal.

While we are loath to play the role of Cassandra, the results of the first official NCC do not augur well. As we have already noted, the CRLC battled to secure the funding for this statutorily mandated event.[1] Only after the CRLC noted that the funds for the conference could be drawn down from the unused balance of the CRLC's budget for the preceding fiscal year did Parliament agree to release the monies necessary to hold the conference. A large amount of money — some R5.5 million — was spent on this five-day affair. Given that the entire allocation for the CRLC in 2005 is a mere R10 million, one might well ask whether such a sum for a conference is warranted. The agenda for the NCC promised that the annual report for the CRLC would both be delivered at the beginning of the conference and be addressed by the CRLC Chairperson. No such report was delivered or addressed.[2] One could have reasonably expected the CRLC to provide some public account of its budget, its management structure, its complaint docket and its accomplishments.[3] This lackadaisical attitude dovetails nicely with the demonstrably equal degree of disinterest displayed by the government. The government's disdain is evident in the failure of the State President, the Deputy President or the Minister of Provincial and Local Government to attend any of the NCC proceedings in which they had agreed to participate.[4] The notable absence of government representatives coupled with foot-dragging on funding intimates strongly that the state would be happy to see the CRLC go the way of the Volkstaat Council. The inability of the CRLC to create mechanisms to capture the information generated by this first NCC and to establish itself, at a minimum, as a clearing-house for concerns about religious, linguistic and cultural communities only serves to reinforce the current government's dim view of the CRLC.

(g) Funding

According to both the Final Constitution and the CRLC's enabling statute, Parliament must supply sufficient levels of funding for the CRLC to discharge its

[1] Interview with Ms M Bethlehem, Deputy Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (1 December, 2004). Interview with Ms P Madiba, Chief Executive Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (30 November 2004).

[2] The only document produced was the text of the Chairperson's speech. The document does not constitute an annual report nor did it contain any meaningful content. The CRLC had also promised to launch a cultural-religious primer at the first statutorily mandated NCC. Interview with Dr MD Guma, Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (14 May 2004). This ecumenical document was supposed to interrogate South African cultural and religious practices and to offer other communities a window into the cultural and religious lives of their fellow citizens. No such primer was produced for the NCC.

[3] The failure to produce such a document after a year of operation bears out the frustration — expressed off the record — of CRLC commissioners with the CRLC's inability to meet even the most minimal indicia of success.

[4] All three accepted the invitation to speak and were accommodated in the NCC programme. All three begged off during the week prior to the launch.

responsibilities. The CRLC Commission may generate additional funding from private sources.[1]

As it stands, it is not clear that Parliament has supplied sufficient funds for the CRLC to operate effectively.[2] The CRLC proposed a budget of R32 million for the fiscal year 2005. Parliament responded with an allocation of R10 million.[3] The political appointees and the administrative staff of the CRLC themselves cannot agree on appropriate levels of funding or the nature of the budget. According to several commissioners, the CRLC administrative staff put forward a budget in which 93% of state monies would support administrative activities and personnel costs and a mere 7% would support CRLC programmes. Moreover, the CRLC administration's decision to put forward a budget without approval by an appropriately constituted CRLC executive body appears to contravene the express wording of the CRLC Act.

(h) Co-operation between the CRLC Commission and other institutions and organs of state

In order to execute its mandate, the CRLC may: (a) 'make arrangements with another constitutional institution or organ of state to assist the Commission in the performance of any of its functions' and (b) 'delegate any of its powers to a constitutional institution or organ of state with which it has made the necessary arrangements for the rendering of the agreed assistance'.[4] In addition, where the functions of the CRLC 'overlap with those of other constitutional institutions or organs of state', the Commission is obliged to co-operate with those institutions.[5]

To avoid the anticipated overlap, a cross-referral docket system for the CRLC, the SAHRC and the CGE is in the offing.[6] The CRLC has already decided that it

[1] CRLC Act, s 24(2). While private funds have the potential to solve some capacity problems, it is difficult to raise money in the absence of a strategic plan stating the aims of the CRLC. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

[2] Other Chapter 9 Institutions have alleged that current levels of funding are inadequate to their respective tasks. See Corder, Jagwanth & Soltau 'Corder Report' (supra) at paras 7.2., 7.3, 7.4; Pityana (supra) at 4–5. However, at least one member of the CRLC does not believe that inadequate funding levels are to blame for the CRLC's and other Chapter 9 Institutions' lack of independence. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005). Advocate Thitanyana suggests that the CRLC and other Chapter 9 Institutions bear part of the responsibility for making themselves irrelevant. Advocate Thitanyana believes that a 'culture of companaros' (our locution) — made up of government officials, NGO staff and academics who all know one another — creates an environment in which little meaningful criticism takes place.

[3] Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

[4] CRLC Act, s 6(1).

[5] CRLC Act, s 6(2).

[6] Interview with Dr MD Guma, Chairperson, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (14 May 2004); Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (05 June 2004).

will only consider 'communal' complaints. Individual complaints are to be referred to the SAHRC and CGE.

(i) Cultural councils

To carry out its mandate, the CRLC must receive significant support from the various religious, linguistic and cultural communities it is meant to serve. To this end the CRLC Act makes provision for the registration of cultural councils.[1] These councils are meant to operate at the coalface of community conflict: serving as a conduit for information to and from the CRLC, and assisting the CRLC in managing disputes. However, issues of 'who' can legitimately represent a community and how many councils can serve any given constituency has led to yet another case of vapour lock at the CRLC. The CRLC has not registered a single cultural council because it still lacks criteria and procedures for their establishment.[2]

[1] CRLC Act, ss 36–38, reads, in relevant part: '36. Recommendation of establishment of community councils: 1.Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society as envisaged in section 31 of the Constitution. 2. The establishment of such a council would be conducive to: a. the promotion and protection of the rights of such a community; and b. the promotion and development of peace, friendship, humanity, tolerance and national unity among and within the different communities in South Africa. The Commission may recommend to a community, which is not organised, to initiate and establish a community council . . . 37. Recognition of community councils. 1. A community council envisaged in section 36(1) or (2) may, in the prescribed manner, apply to the Commission for recognition. 2. The Commission may in writing recognise a community council for purposes of participation in a national consultative conference and section. 3. A community council recognised in terms of subsection (2) may apply to the Commission or any other organ of state for financial assistance. 38. Aims of community councils. 1. The aims of a community council recognised in terms of section 37 should be to: a. preserve, promote and develop the culture, religion or language of the community for which it is recognised; or b. advise the Commission on, and assist the Commission in, matters concerning the achievement of the objects of the Commission.'

[2] Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005).

25 Public Procurement

Glenn Penfold and Pippa Reyburn

25.1 Introduction: public procurement as a constitutional principle 25-1
25.2 The constitutional procurement provisions 25-2
(a) Interim Constitution (IC) 25-2
(b) Final Constitution (FC) 25-3
(c) Application of FC s 217 25-4
(i) 'Organs of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government' 25-4
(ii) 'Any other institution identified in national legislation' 25-7
(iii) The meaning of the phrase 'contracts for goods or services' 25-7
25.3 The five principles 25-8
(a) The implications of the principles for public tenders 25-8
(b) Fairness and equitability 25-9
(c) Transparency 25-11
(d) Competitiveness and cost-effectiveness 25-11
(e) The principles should be taken as a whole 25-12
25.4 Preferential procurement 25-12
(a) Introduction 25-12
(b) Preferential procurement in the Constitution 25-13
(c) The Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Act (PPPFA) 25-13
(i) Application of the PPPFA 25-13
(ii) Preferential procurement policies 25-15
(iii) Preference points system 25-16
(iv) Specific goals 25-17

(v) Other evaluation criteria 25-18
(vi) Remedies for non-compliance 25-19
(d) PPPFA Regulations 25-19
(i) Application of preference points system 25-20
(ii) Permissible preferences 25-21
(iii) Equity ownership as a peremptory preference 25-21
(iv) RDP goals 25-22
(v) Sub-contracting and penalties 25-22
25.5 The role of the tender boards 25-23
(a) Introduction 25-23
(b) Powers of the State Tender Board 25-24
(c) The diminishing role of tender boards 25-25
(d) Consequences of non-compliance 25-26
25.6 Municipal procurement 25-26
(a) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles . . 25-26
(b) Municipal service provision 25-27
25.7 Public-private partnerships 25-29
(a) Introduction 25-29
(b) Legislative framework 25-29
(c) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles and procurement legislation 25-30
25.8 Procurement and the right to just administrative action 25-31
25.9 Remedies for non-compliance 25-34
(a) Introduction 25-34
(b) Invalidity 25-34
(c) Interdict 25-35
(d) Award of the contract 25-35
(e) Damages 25-35

25.1 Introduction: Public Procurement as a Constitutional Principle

With the coming into effect of the Interim Constitution, government procurement was elevated to the status of constitutional principle.[1] This position was confirmed in the Final Constitution.[2] However, it is not only the status of government procurement that has changed since 1994. Whereas the overwhelmingly dominant factor determining the identity of the successful bidder for government contracts before 1994 was price, a number of factors must be taken into account under the new dispensation. Although price is probably still the most important factor,[3] it is not necessarily decisive. Government procurement has been identified as a crucial tool to achieve economic redress for historically disadvantaged persons and the 'empowerment' component of a bid for government contracts is an important factor in determining its likelihood of success.[4]

Not only the factors taken into account in awarding government contracts have changed since procurement became a constitutional issue. The principles applicable to the mechanisms and procedures used to make such awards have also become more complex and nuanced. Fairness, equity, transparency, competitiveness and cost-effectiveness all govern the procurement process, and the award of any government contract can be challenged on the basis that the procedure followed was in violation of those principles.[5]

---

[1] See s 187 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993, which came into effect on 27 April 1994 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[2] See s 217 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[3] See for example Cash Paymaster Services (Pty) Ltd v Eastern Cape Province & Others 1999 (1) SA 324, 351G-H (CkH), [1997] 4 All SA 363 (CkH) ('Cash Paymaster Services'); SA Post Office Ltd v Chairperson of Western Cape Provincial Tender Board & Others 2001 (2) SA 675, 686-7 (C), 2001 (5) BCLR 500 (C).

[4] This policy position is clear from recent proposed legislation, the Broad Based Black Economic Empowerment Bill, voted on by the National Assembly on 20 August 2003 as B27B-2003. Section 9 permits the Minister of Trade and Industry to issue codes of practice by notice in the Government Gazette on broad-based black economic empowerment (the definition of which includes, inter alia, 'preferential procurement'). These codes may include 'qualification criteria for preferential purposes for procurement and other economic activities' (sub-s 9*(b)*). Section 10 of the Bill provides that every organ of state must take into account and, as far as is reasonably possible, apply any relevant code of practice issued in terms of the Bill in, inter alia, 'developing and implementing a preferential procurement policy' (sub-s 10*(b)*).

[5] Although the South African legal system is unusual in entrenching the principles of public procurement in the Constitution, the emphasis that FC s 217 places on principles such as transparency, fairness and competitiveness is consistent with international best practice. A number of regional and international initiatives on public procurement reform are aimed at achieving these same goals. See, for example, the World Trade Organisation (WTO) plurilateral Agreement on Government Procurement (to which South Africa is not a party), the latest version of which came into force on 1 January 1996; also the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Procurement of Goods, Construction and Services ('the UNCITRAL Model Law'), and the Common Market for Southern and Eastern Africa (COMESA) public procurement project. With regard to the latter, see S Karangizi 'Regional Procurement Reform Initiative' (2003), a paper presented at the Joint WTO/World Bank regional workshop on procurement reforms and transparency in public procurement for Anglophone African countries in January 2003. Karangizi's paper is available from the WTO website, www.wto.org (use llinks from 'Government Procurement' page).

Before 1994, government procurement was regulated by national and provincial legislation. The State Tender Board Act[1] governed procurement at national and provincial levels, and various provincial ordinances, dealing with local government in their respective provinces, regulated contracting for goods and services at municipal level. The plethora of statutory provisions regulating procurement in the various spheres of government has been supplemented (and replaced) to some extent to take account of the constitutionalisation of public procurement.[2] There is, however, no single, comprehensive public procurement statute.[3]

It is important to note that a number of constitutional provisions, other than the procurement clause itself, are applicable to government tender processes and the adjudication of public procurement disputes. In particular, the right to just administrative action has been applied in several cases to evaluate the conduct of an organ of state in adjudicating a particular tender.

In this chapter, we will begin with an analysis of the constitutional procurement provisions and, in particular, the five principles of fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective procurement. We will then discuss the legal position relating to preferential procurement under both the Constitution and the relevant legislation. This discussion will be followed by an examination of tender boards, municipal procurement, public-private partnerships and the right to just administrative action in the context of procurement. Finally, we will briefly deal with the remedies for non-compliance with the relevant rules of administrative and constitutional law.

25.2 The Constitutional Procurement provisions

(a) Interim Constitution

The constitutional regulation of public procurement was first provided for in s 187

[1] Act 68 of 1968.

[2] Most notably by the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Act 5 of 2000 (the 'PPPFA'), which is mandated by FC s 217, but also by ss 38 and 51 of the Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 (the 'Public Finance Management Act'), as well as Treasury Regulation 16 promulgated in terms of the Public Finance Management Act (which relates to public-private partnerships), s 10G(5) of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 (the 'LGTA'), and in respect of municipal service delivery, chapter 8 of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 (the 'Systems Act').

[3] The lack of clear legal rules or a generic public procurement law, regulating all aspects of the topic, has been identified as an obstacle to a strong and well-functioning procurement system. See R R Hunja 'Obstacles to Public Procurement Reform in Developing Countries' (2003), a paper presented at the Joint WTO/World Bank regional workshop, available from the website www.wto.org. Other such obstacles identified by Hunja include the absence of 'an institutional arrangement that ensures consistency in overall policy formulation and implementation [and a] professional cadre of staff that implements and manages the procurement function'. Ibid at 2.

of the Interim Constitution.[1] This section envisaged the creation of a legislative framework for government procurement. It required the enactment of national and provincial legislation providing for the appointment of independent and impartial tender boards to deal with the procurement of goods and services for any level of government. Section 187(2) added the proviso that the tendering system established in this manner must be fair, public and competitive and that tender boards must, on request, give reasons for their decisions to interested parties. Subsections (3) and (4) then specified that no person may improperly interfere with the decisions and operations of the tender boards and that all decisions of tender boards must be recorded.

The obligation to ensure fair, public and competitive tendering contained in this provision primarily amounted to a directive to the national and provincial legislatures to enact suitable tendering legislation.[2] At a national level, tenders continued to be governed by the State Tender Board Act, as amended. In addition, pursuant to the constitutional command in s 187, provincial legislation was enacted to regulate the functions of provincial tender boards.[3]

(b) Final Constitution

Section 187 of the Interim Constitution was replaced by s 217 of the Final Constitution. FC s 217 provides as follows:

(1) When an organ of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government, or any other institution identified in national legislation, contracts for goods or services, it must do so in accordance with a system which is fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective.
(2) Subsection (1) does not prevent the organs of state or institutions referred to in that subsection from implementing a procurement policy providing for —
   (a) categories of preference in the allocation of contracts; and
   (b) the protection or advancement of persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.
(3) National legislation must prescribe a framework within which the policy referred to in subsection (2) must be implemented.

[1] IC s 187, headed 'procurement administration', provided as follows:
'(1) The procurement of goods and services for any level of government shall be regulated by an Act of Parliament and provincial laws, which shall make provision for the appointment of independent and impartial tender boards to deal with such procurements.
(2) The tendering system referred to in subsection (1) shall be fair, public and competitive, and tender boards shall on request give reasons for their decisions to interested parties.
(3) No organ of state and no member of any organ of state or any other person shall improperly interfere with the decisions and operations of the tender boards.
(4) All decisions of any tender board shall be recorded.'

[2] See Olitzki Property Holdings v State Tender Board & Another 2001 (3) SA 1247 (SCA), 2001 (8) BCLR 779 (SCA)('Olitzki Property Holdings') at paras 17-22.

[3] See, for example, the Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994; the Tender Board Act 2 of 1994 (Free State); the Western Cape Provincial Tender Board Law 8 of 1994; and the Gauteng Provincial Tender Board Act 2 of 1994.

Subsection (1) sets out a general requirement that public procurement must comply with certain fundamental principles. Subsections (2) and (3), in turn, stipulate that these principles do not prevent a public body from implementing a preferential procurement policy in terms of national legislation.

The transitional arrangements of the Constitution provide that the national legislation envisaged in subsection (3) must be enacted within three years of the Constitution coming into effect, but that this did not prevent the implementation of a preferential procurement policy under subsection (2) before that date.[1] The legislation enacted in terms of s 217(3) is the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Act (PPPFA). It came into effect on 3 February 2000.[2]

(c) Application of s 217

Section 217(1) applies to organs of state 'in the national, provincial or local sphere of government' and 'any other institution identified in national legislation'. The interpretation of these phrases is fundamental to the application of s 217. We will consider each of them in turn.

(i) 'Organs of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'

There are two aspects to the phrase, 'organ of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'. The entity or functionary must be (a) an organ of state; and (b) in a sphere of government. While we suggest that a broad approach should be adopted in respect of the former, this may not necessarily be the case for the latter.

The term 'organ of state' is defined in s 239 of the Constitution as:

> (a) any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government; or
> (b) any other functionary or institution —
> (i) exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or
> (ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation, but does not include a court or a judicial officer.

[1] FC item 21(4) of Schedule 6.

[2] It should be noted that the Parliamentary Select Committee on Finance held public hearings during September 2003 on the effectiveness of the PPPFA, as a result of which a statement was made on behalf of the Cabinet that 'Cabinet examined the issue of procurement reform in line with the objectives of the Public Finance Management Act as well as the Broad Based Black Economic Empowerment Strategy and legislation. A new broad policy proposal was adopted, which includes devolution of responsibility and accountability to accounting officers and/or authorities, uniformity of interpretation across all spheres and minimum reporting requirements. The PPPFA will be revised accordingly'.

There are therefore three categories of organs of state: (a) state departments in any sphere of government (which would include, for example, the Department of Defence and a municipality);[1] (b) functionaries or institutions exercising a constitutional power or performing a constitutional function (for example, the Auditor-General and the Independent Electoral Commission);[2] and (c) functionaries or institutions 'exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation'. The latter category extends the scope of organs of state to entities such as the Financial Services Board, the South African Broadcasting Corporation Limited and other bodies exercising public power or performing public functions in terms of legislation.[3] This last category would seem to embrace regulatory bodies, universities and parastatals.[4]

Although there was some initial disagreement, our courts generally adopted the control test for determining whether an institution amounted to an organ of state under the Interim Constitution. According to this test, an institution that was not a state department was an organ of state if it fell under the control of the state.[5] Nevertheless, in our view, the cases decided under the Interim Constitution are only of limited assistance in determining whether a body amounts to an organ of state for purposes of FC s 239. The reason for this is that, while the Interim Constitution defined an organ of state as 'any statutory body or functionary', the Final Constitution shifts the focus to the public nature of the function or power.[6] Accordingly, the focus should now be on whether the function or power performed by the relevant entity is public in nature.[7]

As noted above, s 217 does not simply refer to organs of state, but rather to organs of state 'in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'. There are three possible approaches to the interpretation of this wording. First, it may be argued that the phrase 'in the national, provincial or local sphere of [1] See Metro Projects CC & Another v Klerksdorp Local Municipality, unreported judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal, case no. 602/2002 (22 September 2003) at para 11 ('Metro Projects')(Court held that a municipality is obliged to comply with FC s 217).

[2] See Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) ('Langeberg').

[3] See Nextcom (Pty) Limited v Funde NO & Others 2000 (4) SA 491, 503 (T).

[4] See, for example, Hoffman v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC); and Transnet Limited v Goodman Brothers (Pty) Limited 2001 (1) SA 853 (SCA), 2001 (2) BCLR 176 (SCA)('Transnet Limited').

[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999)('Application'); J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Access to Information' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) supra at 62-12–62-13 ('Access to Information').

[6] IC s 233(1)(x). See Y Burns Administrative Law under the 1996 Constitution (2nd Edition, 2003) 22-25; I M Rautenbach & E F T Malherbe Constitutional Law (1996) 299. See Klaaren & Penfold 'Access to Information' (supra) at 62-13 (a discussion on the meaning of exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of legislation).

[7] See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 10-62 and Klaaren & Penfold 'Access to Information' (supra) at 62-13. A detailed discussion of the definition of organ of state for purposes of the Final Constitution falls beyond the scope of this chapter.

government' does not qualify the meaning of organ of state and s 217 therefore applies to all organs of state contemplated in the s 239 definition.[1] This approach is unattractive because it fails to give any meaning to the inclusion of the additional phrase. If the constitutional drafters had intended s 217 to apply to all organs of state, it could have excluded the additional phrase and simply referred to 'organs of state'. Second, it may be argued that s 217 only applies to those entities falling within paragraph (a) of the s 239 definition, i.e. departments of state or administration. This interpretation is consistent with the repetition of the phrase 'in the national, provincial or local sphere of government' in both ss 217 and 239. Nevertheless, in our view, this approach is also unsatisfactory in that it fails to explain the reference to organ of state, as opposed to 'department of state or administration', in s 217(1). We would argue that the effect of the additional phrase is that the constitutional procurement provision applies to an organ of state falling within paragraph (a) of the s 239 definition, as well as any other organ of state which is controlled by the state in such a manner that it may be considered to fall within the national, provincial or local sphere of government.[2]

Our preferred approach is also consistent with the decision of the Constitutional Court in Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality. The Court held that the Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) is not an organ of state within the national sphere of government. The reasons for this included, amongst other things, that the IEC is independent of the state and is not subject to executive control.[3] In addition, this approach is consistent with the principal rationale for regulating public procurement, i.e. controlling the expenditure of public funds.[4]

Accordingly, s 217 of the Constitution will only apply to an entity, other than a state department, which exercises a public power or public function in terms of legislation and is controlled by the state. A non-state entity that is not controlled by the state (for example, a law society or a financial exchange) would, therefore, not be obliged to comply with the Constitution's procurement provisions, despite the fact that it may amount to an organ of state.[5] Therefore, although the control

[1] See Goodman Brothers (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (4) SA 989, 993-7 (W), 1998 (8) BCLR 1024 ('Goodman Brothers'). Blieden J applied FC s 239 in assessing whether Transnet Limited qualifies as an organ of state for purposes of s 217. The learned judge simply enquired into whether Transnet amounted to an 'organ of state'. He failed to emphasise the additional wording 'in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'.

[2] Goodman Brothers (supra) essentially employs the control test discussed above.

[3] Langeberg (supra) at paras 27 and 30.

[4] This rationale, rather than the object of controlling the exercise of public power, means that it is not necessary for the procurement provisions to apply to all organs of state.

[5] It should be noted that, to the extent that such a body performs a public function or exercises a public power in engaging in procurement activities, such activities may amount to administrative action and would then be reviewable on administrative law grounds under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 (the 'AJA').

test is no longer determinative of whether an entity amounts to an organ of state for purposes of the Constitution, this test remains important in deciding whether the constitutional procurement provision applies to that entity.[1]

(ii) 'Any other institution identified in national legislation'

The second category of institutions to which s 217 applies is those 'identified in national legislation'. One approach to the interpretation of this phrase is that s 217 applies to any institution named in legislation for any purpose. This approach should be rejected. It leads to arbitrary results as to which institutions are bound by s 217 and has no regard to the underlying rationales for controlling public procurement.

The better approach is that the phrase 'identified in national legislation' means those entities identified in legislation as entities to which s 217(1) applies. The effect of this is that s 217(1) applies to all entities governed by the Public Finance Management Act, which, amongst other things, repeats the procurement principles set out in the constitutional provision.[2]

(iii) The meaning of the phrase 'contracts for goods or services'

Section 217 of the Constitution applies whenever an applicable entity 'contracts for goods or services'. This provision should be broadly read to include situations where an organ of state may have entered into procurement negotiations or put a contract out to tender, irrespective of whether such actions actually result in the conclusion of a contract.[3] If this were not the case, an organ of state would be free of the requirement to act in a fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective manner unless a contract is actually concluded.

The phrase 'contracts for goods or services' should also be interpreted generously. It should apply to contracts for the provision of goods or services to the relevant body as well as contracts for the provision of goods or services on behalf of the body (i.e. the contracting-out or outsourcing of public functions).[4] For example, it would include a contract for the roll-out of anti-retroviral drugs on behalf of the Department of Health. Nevertheless, it would probably exclude

[1] In this chapter, for the sake of convenience and despite the approach suggested here, we generally refer to entities to which FC s 217 applies as 'organs of state'.

[2] See ss 38(1)(a)(iii) and 51(1)(a)(iii) read with the Schedules to the Public Finance Management Act. It may also include entities identified in the PPPFA.

[3] See Transnet Limited (supra) at 862: 'It may well be that the words "contracts for goods and services" must be given a wide meaning, similar to "negotiates for" etc.'

[4] See Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & Others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA) (on outsourcing agreements). See s 83 of the Systems Act, which reiterates the requirements of FC s 217 in relation to contracts for the provision of municipal services by a third-party service provider. See also the discussion on public-private partnerships at §25.7 below.

contracts where the state is providing (rather than procuring) the goods or services or other forms of benefit.[1]

25.3 The Five Principles

Section 217(1) of the Constitution provides that public procurement must be effected in accordance with a system which is 'fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective'. This requirement is repeated in the Public Finance Management Act. A similar requirement is included in various provincial tender board statutes[2] and in the Local Government Transition Act[3] in relation to municipalities.

(a) The implications of the principles for public tenders

The extension of these principles is often difficult to discern. It will, therefore, sometimes be difficult to assess whether a particular procurement process complies with them. The most emphatic manner in which an organ of state can demonstrate compliance with these principles is through a public, transparent tender process in which all tenderers are treated fairly and equitably. A public tender is therefore the preferable means of engaging in public procurement.[4] Nevertheless, this does not mean that the use of a tender process is always required in order to comply with s 217(1).[5] In this regard, it is significant that, unlike s 187 of the Interim Constitution, s 217 does not make specific reference to a tender process (or tender boards), but simply provides that the system used

[1] This interpretation is consistent with the heading of s 217, 'Procurement'. The heading indicates that it only applies where public bodies procure goods or services and not where they supply such goods or services (eg a contract between a public utility and the end-user or for the purchase of a state asset). In this regard, art 2 of the UNCITRAL Model Law defines 'procurement' as 'the acquisition' of goods, construction or services.

[2] See, for example, ss 2(3) and 4(2) of the Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994.

[3] Section 10G(5) of the LGTA. See §25.6 below at p 25-26 for a more detailed discussion on local government procurement.

[4] Some of the benefits of tender procedures are reflected in the following statement of Pickard JP in Cash Paymaster Services (supra) at 350:

> Tender procedures, as we have come to know them over many years, have been the result of vast experience gained in the procuring of services and goods by government. They have evolved over a long period of time through trial and error and have crystallised into a procedure that has become vital to the very essence of effective government procurement. Strict rules have developed over the years in order to ensure that the system works effectively. The very essence of tender procedures may well be described as a procedure intended to ensure that government, before it procures goods or services, or enters into contracts for the procurement thereof, is assured that the proper evaluation is done of what is available, at what price and whether or not that which is procured serves the purposes for which it is intended.

[5] See D Pretorius 'The Defence of the Realm: Contract and Natural Justice' (2002) 119 SALJ 374, 396: '[S 217(1) of the Constitution] does not necessarily mean that the conclusion of each and every contract for goods and services by an organ of state must be preceded by a tender process. The circumstances of each case will dictate whether the requirements of s 217 demand that a tender process be conducted.'

when contracting for goods or services must be 'fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective'.[1] If the drafters of the Final Constitution had intended that an organ of state must always follow a tendering process when procuring goods or services, s 217 would have been drafted in a manner that corresponds more closely with s 187 of the Interim Constitution.

A tender process will generally be the most effective way of complying with the principles of fairness, equitability and competitiveness. It may, however, undermine cost-effectiveness, particularly in relation to contracts that are of a relatively minor value. Accordingly, it appears that low-value contracts need not be put out to tender.[2] Nevertheless, an open tender or some comparable procedure should generally be followed in relation to contracts of a substantial value.

Alternatives to an open tender may include choosing from quotations submitted by a list of preferred bidders, which list has previously been compiled following an open and competitive bidding process. In such a case, it is important that both the compilation of the list of preferred bidders and the final choice of a particular service provider comply with the requirements of s 217(1).[3] In addition, it may be acceptable to deviate from an open tender procedure in certain exceptional circumstances, for example, where there is a sole supplier or where the goods or services must be urgently supplied.[4]

(b) Fairness and equitability

The principles of fairness and equitability indicate that the procurement procedure must be procedurally fair. At a minimum, interested parties (including all tenderers) should be given a reasonable opportunity to make representations relating to the award of the relevant contract.[5] In addition, affected persons should be treated fairly and equally. For example, all tenderers should be furnished with the same information and should be given the same opportunity to make representations. These principles will also be undermined, and s 217 contravened, in circumstances where the decision-maker fails to avoid a conflict of [1] For example, IC s 187 refers to 'the appointment of independent and impartial tender boards' (sub-s (1)); and a 'tendering system' (sub-s (2)).

[2] In fact, the Preferential Procurement Regulations, published under Government Notice R275 in Government Gazette 22549 of 10 August 2001, contemplate that contracts of a value of less than R30 000 need not be put out to tender. In such cases an alternative procedure may include obtaining a limited number of quotations or using a list of preferred suppliers on a pre-announced or rotation basis.

[3] Such a procedure of employing approved tenderers is contemplated in para 10 of the State Tender Board's General Conditions and Procedures (ST36).

[4] Section 10G(5)(c) of the LGTA provides that a municipality may dispense with the calling of tenders in the case of an emergency or of a sole supplier. Article 22 of the UNCITRAL Model Law provides that a procuring entity may engage in 'single-source procurement' in a number of situations, including where the goods or services are only available from one supplier; the goods or services are urgently required; and procurement from a particular supplier is required for purposes of standardisation or compatibility (taking into account a number of specified factors).

[5] This requirement of procedural fairness overlaps, to some extent, with the constitutional right to administrative action that is procedurally fair.

interest or where the procurement procedure is tainted by actual bias or a reasonable suspicion of bias.[1] The observance of these principles also serves the principle of competitiveness, by placing tenderers on an equal footing.

An illustration of a procurement process that could be said to undermine fairness, equitability and competitiveness may be found in Premier, Free State & Others v Firechem Free State (Pty) Limited.[2] In Firechem, the Supreme Court of Appeal struck down a contract for the provision of cleaning materials to the Free State Province on the basis that the contract finally concluded with the relevant provincial department differed from the terms of the invitation to tender and the letter of acceptance produced by the provincial tender board. The effect of this difference was to undermine the fairness of the tender process. In holding that the contract was invalid, Schutz JA reasoned as follows:

> [T]o allow a tender board to withhold from the body of tenderers its intention to conclude a secret agreement with one of them, an agreement which the others have never seen and have had no chance to match, would be entirely subversive of a credible tender procedure. One of the requirements of such a procedure is that the body adjudging tenders be presented with comparable offers in order that its members should be able to compare. Another is that a tender should speak for itself. Its real import may not be tucked away, apart from its terms. Yet another requirement is that competitors should be treated equally, in the sense that they should all be entitled to tender for the same thing. Competitiveness is not served by only one or some of the tenderers knowing what is the true subject of tender.[3]

Another example of a tender process that failed to comply with the fairness requirement is found in the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Metro Projects. In this case, the court struck down the award of the tender on the grounds that a municipal official, who was involved in the tender adjudication process, had allowed the successful tenderer an opportunity to augment its tender. The augmented offer was first concealed from the committee that decided on the tender and was then represented as being the original tender offer. During the course of his judgment, Conradie JA stated as follows:

> The deception stripped the tender process of an essential element of fairness: the equal evaluation of tenders. Where subterfuge and deceit subvert the essence of a tender process, participation in it is prejudicial to every one of the competing tenderers whether it stood a chance of winning the tender or not.[4]

[1] See J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) 63-31–64-32 ('Just Administrative Action') for a discussion of the rule against bias. The most extreme cases in which s 217 would be violated are on payment of a bribe, or a decision-maker having a financial or other interest in the award of the contract.

[2] 2000 (4) SA 413 (SCA), [2000] 3 All SA 247 (SCA) ('Firechem'). This case was not decided on the basis of the constitutional procurement provisions of the Interim Constitution as this was neither pleaded nor explored in evidence. Ibid at para 32.

[3] Ibid at 429-30.

[4] Metro Projects (supra) at para 14.

(c) Transparency

The principle of transparency promotes openness and accountability. This important principle serves to encourage good decision-making in relation to procurement and combats the ever-present possibility of corruption in the adjudication of tenders and the awarding of contracts. In so doing, it instils public confidence in the procurement process.

In light of this constitutional principle of open procurement, it is difficult to justify the award of a contract by an organ of state in the absence of some form of public process. At the very least, the public should be notified that a public body intends negotiating a contract with a particular entity.[1] The case law also indicates that the principles of fairness and transparency require that reasons for the award (or non-award) of a tender should be furnished to unsuccessful tenderers.[2]

(d) Competitiveness and cost-effectiveness

The principles of competitiveness and cost-effectiveness indicate that an organ of state should, while taking into account other factors, attempt to procure goods or services at the lowest possible cost. In other words, organs of state should strive to achieve value for money. For example, in Grinaker LTA Limited & Another v Tender Board (Mpumalanga) & Others ('Grinaker')[3] one of the bases on which the award of the tender for the rehabilitation and construction of a road was struck down was the considerable variance between the higher price of the successful tenderer and the lower price of the unsuccessful tenderer. During the course of his judgment, De Villiers J wrote:

> The award by the first respondent of the tender to a tenderer who has not tendered the lowest price is contrary to the provisions of the guiding document and more particularly s 217(1) of the Constitution in that it results in a contract for services which is not competitive and cost-effective.[4]

[1] Except perhaps where compelling considerations, such as national security, militate against disclosing any issues relating to the proposed contract. This would only arise in highly exceptional circumstances.

[2] See Goodman Brothers (supra). This tender process requirement reinforces to the administrative law requirement to furnish written reasons, in terms of FC s 33(2) and s 5 of the AJA. The requirement to furnish written reasons for tender decisions was expressly included in IC s 187(2).

[3] [2002] 3 All SA 336, 356-7 (T) ('Grinaker').

[4] Ibid at para 70. On cost-effectiveness, see Cash Paymaster Services (supra) at 351: 'The task of the tender board has always been and will always be primarily to ensure that government gets the best price and value for that which it pays. If that were not the prime purpose of the tender board and policy considerations were to override these considerations, the very purpose of the tender board is defeated and no tender board needs to exist.' It should, however, be noted that this view may now overstate the position, given that FC s 217 specifically envisages considerations other than price.

(e) The principles should be taken as a whole

The principles set out in s 217(1) should be taken as a whole in deciding whether a particular procedure is consistent with the provisions of this section. In South African Post Office Limited v Chairperson, Western Cape Provincial Tender Board & Others,[1] the provincial tender board stipulated the criteria to be applied in the evaluation of the tender but did not stipulate the points weighting to be allocated to each criterion. The main reasons for this were to avoid price tampering and to discourage tenderers from concentrating on the criteria that carried greater weight at the expense of others. The court upheld this approach because, on the facts of the particular case, it resulted in the department procuring an efficient service at the most cost-effective price. The court came to this conclusion despite the fact that, taken in isolation, the disclosure of the points allocation would have increased the openness and transparency of the tender process.[2]

25.4 Preferential Procurement

(a) Introduction

South Africa is not unique in permitting preferences in the allocation of government contracts for goods and services.[3] In general, international instruments regulating public procurement articulate such preferences as exceptions to the general rule of non-discrimination and restrict the freedom of member states to apply such preferences. The WTO Agreement on Government Procurement, for example, imposes limitations on the ability of parties to use procurement as a policy tool.[4] It recognises, however, that 'developing countries' may have special needs as regards development, finance and trade. Article V of that Agreement provides for differential treatment of such countries and requires parties to take into account developing countries' needs to 'promote the establishment or development of domestic industries including the development of small-scale and cottage industries in rural or backward areas; and economic development of other

[1] 2001 (2) SA 675 (C), 2001 (5) BCLR 500 (C).

[2] Ibid at 689. The court did emphasise that the system of procurement in this case was accessible, visible and subject to examination and inquiry as well as both open and transparent.

[3] For an examination of the use of public procurement as an instrument of social policy in Great Britain, and an evaluation of the extent to which European Community regulation and the WTO Agreement on Government Procurement restricts the ability of member states to apply differential treatment in procurement in order to benefit local suppliers, see S Arrowsmith 'Public Procurement as an Instrument of Policy and the Impact of Market Liberalisation' (1995) 111 LQR 235. Arrowsmith commences with the following statement: 'Governments have traditionally used their extensive powers of procurement to promote a variety of objectives unconnected with the immediate object of the procurement: these range from the protection and development of national industry, to social policy goals such as promotion of equal opportunities.'

[4] Ibid at 248-252.

sectors of the economy'.[1] This provision serves as an exception to the main objective of the WTO agreement: to open up government business to international competition and ensure non-discrimination against foreign products or suppliers.[2]

The design of the South African preferential procurement framework is located within the history of apartheid. It is aimed at redressing historical disadvantage and increasing opportunities for those previously prevented from actively participating in the country's mainstream economy.

(b) Preferential procurement in the Constitution

If the first leg of the constitutional procurement provision is the five principles described above, the second leg is that of preferential procurement.[3] While subsection 217(1) of the Constitution imposes an obligation on the institutions to which s 217 applies to comply with the five principles, subsections 217(2) and (3) permit (but do not oblige) those institutions to implement a preferential procurement policy.

Subsection 217(3) of the Constitution was amended during 2002.[4] The effect of this amendment is, in our view, to oblige those institutions which are bound by s 217 and which choose to implement a preferential procurement policy to do so in accordance with the constitutionally mandated PPPFA.[5] This amendment does not obligate every institution referred to in subsection 217(2) to implement a preferential procurement policy.

(c) The PPPFA

(i) Application of the PPPFA

The PPPFA applies to all organs of state as defined therein. Somewhat surprisingly, the definition of 'organ of state' in the PPPFA does not precisely mirror the [1] WTO Agreement on Government Procurement, art V: 1*(b)*.

[2] See the preamble to the WTO Agreement on Government Procurement.

[3] Referred to in FC ss 217(2) and 217(3).

[4] Subsection 217(3) was amended by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 61 of 2001 ('2001 Second Amendment Act'). Up to 26 April 2002, when the 2001 Second Amendment Act came into effect, s 217(3) read as follows: 'National legislation must prescribe a framework within which the policy referred to in subsection (2) may be implemented.' (Our emphasis.) This locution implied, by the use of the word 'may', that even if the institutions to which sub-s 217(2) applied did choose to apply a system of preferential procurement as contemplated therein, they would not be bound to apply it in accordance with the national legislation contemplated in sub-s 217(3). The 2001 Second Amendment Act substituted the word 'must' for 'may'.

[5] The PPPFA came into effect on 3 February 2000. It is one of the four pieces of legislation that Parliament was instructed to enact within three years of the date upon which the Final Constitution came into effect. The other three pieces of legislation are the AJA, the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000, and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.

definition contained in FC s 239, nor does it attempt to capture all those institutions that are bound by the five principles identified in subsection 217(1). The term 'organ of state' is defined in s 1(iii) of the PPPFA as meaning:

> (a) a national or provincial department as defined in the Public Finance Management Act, 1999 (Act 1 of 1999);
> (b) a municipality as contemplated in the Constitution;
> (c) a constitutional institution as defined in the Public Finance Management Act, 1999 (Act 1 of 1999);
> (d) Parliament;
> (e) a provincial legislature;
> (f) any other institution or category of institution included in the definition of 'organ of state' in s 239 of the Constitution and recognised by the Minister [of Finance] by notice in the Government Gazette as an institution to which this Act applies.

To date, the Minister of Finance has not published any notices in the Government Gazette purporting to apply the PPPFA to any institution. Therefore, at this stage, the PPPFA applies to a narrower group of entities than do the five principles, since municipal entities[1] and public entities[2] do not fall within the PPPFA definition of 'organ of state'.[3]

[1] Defined in s 1 of the Systems Act as '(a) a company, co-operative, trust, fund or any other corporate entity established in terms of any applicable national or provincial legislation and which operates under the ownership control of one or more municipalities, and includes, in the case of a company under such ownership control, any subsidiary of that company; or (b) a service utility'. 'Service utility' is also defined in s 1 of the Systems Act as 'a municipal entity established in terms of s 82(1)(c)' of the Systems Act. Note that the Local Government: Municipal Systems Amendment Bill, introduced in the National Assembly as B49-2003, proposes that the definitions of 'municipal entity' and 'service utility' be substantially amended. However, the notion of ownership control by the state remains in the new definitions.

[2] Divided into 'national public entities' and 'provincial public entities', both of which are defined in s 1 of the Public Finance Management Act. 'National public entity' is defined as '(a) a national government business enterprise; or (b) a board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity (other than a national government business enterprise) which is (i) established in terms of national legislation; (ii) fully or substantially funded either from the National Revenue Fund, or by way of a tax, levy or other money imposed in terms of national legislation; and (iii) accountable to Parliament'. 'National government business enterprise' is defined as 'an entity which (a) is a juristic person under the ownership control of the national executive; (b) has been assigned financial and operational authority to carry on a business activity; (c) as its principal business, provides goods or services in accordance with ordinary business principles; and (d) is financed fully or substantially from sources other than (i) the National Revenue Fund; or (ii) by way of a tax, levy or other statutory money'. The definitions of 'provincial public entity' and 'provincial government business enterprise' are equivalent, but with supervision and funding at provincial level.

[3] The Parliamentary Monitoring Group minutes of the joint meeting of the Finance Portfolio Committee and the Finance Select Committee, held on 12 January 2000, to discuss the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Bill, state as follows in regard to an amendment proposed by the co-chairperson, Ms B Hogan: 'Clause 1(iv) has changed making the definition of 'organ of state' very specific. Parastatals have been excluded at this stage. The reasoning is that due to privatisation, they have to operate with a commercial interest and this Act would put them at a disadvantage. Their exclusion will allow parastatals more flexibility with regard to deciding what their affirmative action programme will be. The Minister has the power to review this in the future and extend the application of this Bill. In response, Ms J Fubbs (ANC, Gauteng) concurred with this decision saying that the parastatals were involved with strategic development delivery and the country did not want to impede this delivery.' See http://www.pmg.org.za.

As regards the application of the PPPFA, it is important to note that s 3 of the Act provides that the Minister of Finance may, on request, exempt an organ of state (as defined in the PPPFA) from any of its provisions, if: '(a) it is in the interests of national security; (b) the likely tenderers are international suppliers; or (c) it is in the public interest'. It appears that the exemption provision is designed to operate on a case-by-case basis, so that a tendering authority will request an exemption from one or more provisions of the PPPFA in respect of a particular tender or tenders. This fits with the constitutional directive that 'national legislation must prescribe a framework'. The statutorily prescribed framework would be undermined if the Minister had unlimited powers to exempt organs of state from its provisions.[1]

(ii) Preferential procurement policies

Section 2 of the PPPFA provides that an organ of state (as defined) must determine its preferential procurement policy and implement it within the framework established by the PPPFA. The question arises whether this provision obliges all organs of state (as defined) to determine and implement a preferential procurement policy, or whether, like subsections 217(2) and (3) of the Constitution, the PPPFA framework must be used only if an institution to which the Act applies, chooses to implement a preferential procurement policy. The wording of s 2 of the PPPFA is not completely clear in this regard. The latter interpretation is to be preferred because it gives effect to, but does not purport to go beyond, the ambit of the constitutional provision. However, it appears from the minutes of the joint meeting of the Finance Portfolio Committee and the Finance Select Committee held on 18 January 2000, at which the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Bill was formally considered, read with the State Law Advisor's opinion presented at that meeting, that the intention of the drafters was to obligate every organ of state to determine and implement a preferential procurement policy that complies with the framework prescribed by the PPPFA.[2]

[1] The Parliamentary Monitoring Group minutes of the joint meeting of the Finance Portfolio Committee and the Finance Select Committee held on 18 January 2000, record that a legal opinion of the State Law Advisor was presented to the members of the Committees, dealing with various aspects of the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Bill including the constitutionality of the proposed ministerial power of exemption. The view of the State Law Advisor, which was accepted by the Committees, was that 'the exercise of such a power by the Minister could conceivably be construed as a form of subordinate legislation thus requiring parameters to be set by Parliament if it is not to be held to be unconstitutional'. The State Law Advisor's opinion referred to the decision of the Constitutional Court in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature v President of the RSA 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC). For the minutes of that meeting and the State Law Advisor's opinion, see http://www.pmg.org.za.

[2] See the minutes of that meeting and the State Law Advisor's opinion at http://www.pmg.org.za.

(iii) Preference points system

The system of preferential procurement established by the PPPFA is based on the assumption that tenders are awarded according to the following process: an organ of state invites tenders by the issuing of documents; the tenders received are evaluated according to evaluation criteria stipulated in the tender documentation; and tenders are ranked by the allocation of points for each evaluation criterion. The total number of points that can be allocated is assumed to be one hundred.

The PPPFA establishes a dual-scale preference points system. The scale employed depends upon the value of the contract to be awarded. The rationale behind the dual-scale system is that in order to redress historical disadvantage through public procurement, the government will have to pay more than it would if price were the only criterion. In other words, there is an understanding that historically disadvantaged tenderers are unable to compete effectively for government contracts by offering the best price. However, in acknowledgement of the importance of cost-effectiveness as a factor in government procurement, the dual scale system allocates more preferential procurement points for contracts of low value, and fewer preferential procurement points for contracts of significant value.

Section 2 of the PPPFA thus provides that for contracts with a value above a prescribed amount,[1] a maximum of 10 points may be allocated for 'specific goals' as set out in the PPPFA, with 90 points for price being allocated to the lowest acceptable tender. For contracts with a value equal to or below a prescribed amount,[2] a maximum of 20 points will be allocated for 'specific goals', with 80 points for price being allocated to the lowest acceptable tender.[3] The Regulations

[1] The 90/10 preference points system applies to contracts with a value of more than R500 000 in terms of Regulation 4 of the regulations promulgated in terms of the PPPFA, published under GN R725 in GG 22549 of 10 August 2001 (the 'Regulations').

[2] The 80/20 preference points system applies to contracts with a value equal to or above R30 000 but less than R500 000 in terms of Regulation 5.

[3] Section 2*(a)* read with s 2*(b)* of the PPPFA.

to the PPPFA contain formulae for calculating the total number of points to be allocated to each tenderer.[1]

(iv) Specific goals

According to s 2*(d)* of the PPPFA, 'the specific goals may include' contracting with persons or categories of persons historically disadvantaged by unfair discrimination on the basis of race, gender or disability ('HDIs'),[2] and the implementation of the programmes of the Reconstruction and Development Programme (RDP).[3] This provision is permissive rather than prescriptive. Therefore, other 'specific goals' (such as environmental best practice) could also be identified as worthy of preference points (up to a maximum of either 10 or 20 out of 100, depending on the value of the contract).[4]

Even if it is correct that the 'specific goals' for which preference points may be allocated may include other goals or categories of preference, such goals would have to be accommodated within the 90/10 or the 80/20 preference points system. The inflexibility of this framework may place undesirable constraints on [1] Regulations 3(1), 4(1), 5(1) and 6(1).

[2] Regulation 1*(h)* contains a definition of 'historically disadvantaged individual' that is arguably narrower than the description in the PPPFA of persons to whom preferences may be applied. The definition in the Regulations is as follows:

> (h) 'Historically Disadvantaged Individual ('HDI') means a South African citizen —
>
> (i) who, due to the apartheid policy that had been in place, had no franchise in national elections prior to the introduction of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1983, (Act No.110 of 1983) or the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993 (Act No. 200 of 1993) ('the Interim Constitution'); and/or
>
> (ii) who is female; and/or
>
> (iii) who has a disability:
>
> Provided that a person who obtained South African citizenship on or after the coming into effect of the Interim Constitution, is deemed not to be an HDI.

We identify two major potential problems with this definition. The first is that it is framed in terms of individuals rather than groups of persons who/which have suffered historical disadvantage. This could have the result, for example, that a black man born in 1980 (ie too young to vote in 1994) would fall outside the definition because the reason he was unable to vote in 1994 was not because of the apartheid policy in place, but because of his age. The second potential problem is that certain of the qualifications contained in the definition may have unintended consequences. For example, a black Nigerian woman disabled from birth who became a South African citizen on 1 May 1994 will not qualify as an historically disadvantaged individual under this definition, whereas a white South African man disabled in 2002 will qualify as historically disadvantaged.

[3] Section 2*(d)* of the PPPFA. The programmes of the Reconstruction and Development Programme are stated to be those published in Government Gazette 16085 of 23 November 1994.

[4] This view is consistent with FC sub-s 217(2)(a), which refers to unspecified 'categories of preference in the allocation of contracts'. However, the Regulations do not contemplate any goals other than those listed in s 2*(d)* of the PPPFA attracting preference points. In this regard, see Regulations 3(2), 4(2), 5(2) and 6(2). To the extent that the goals contemplated in the Regulations are narrower than the framework created by the PPPFA, the applicable Regulations may be ultra vires. However if the Regulations are in this respect legally valid, the implications of this dual scale system are restrictive, in that they do not permit the allocation of preference points to any category of preference other than the attainment of HDI and RDP goals.

procuring bodies that want to allocate preference points to more than one specific goal.

In sum, it appears that the PPPFA contemplates that the only tender criteria that can be allocated points are: (a) price, and (b) specific goals (HDI goals, RDP goals and possibly other unspecified 'categories of preference').[1]

(v) Other evaluation criteria

Despite the apparent restrictiveness of the points-allocation system contemplated by the PPPFA, a tender put out in terms of that Act could contain evaluation criteria or specifications other than price and specific goals, as long as these are not used to calculate the points to be awarded to a tenderer. These other criteria would operate at the level of a threshold inquiry, or as what are sometimes called 'qualification criteria'.

Indications of this more expansive qualitative analysis are found in the PPPFA definition of 'acceptable tender'[2] and in s 2*(f)* of the PPPFA. Section 2*(f)* provides that the contract must be awarded to the tenderer who scores the highest points, unless objective criteria in addition to those contemplated in ss 2*(d)* (contracting with HDIs and/or implementing the programmes of the RDP) and 2*(e)* (goals specified in the invitation to submit a tender) justify the award to another tenderer.[3]

Commonly applied evaluation criteria, such as technical capability, would therefore fall — if the PPPFA regime is strictly applied — into the category of criteria or specifications to which points are not allocated. However, a failure to comply with such criteria could result in a tender not qualifying as an 'acceptable tender' and therefore not being evaluated for the purpose of awarding points.

This implied distinction between criteria to which points can be allocated, and those to which points may not be allocated, has the effect of turning all criteria other than price and 'specific goals' into so-called qualification criteria. This necessitates a two-stage or two-level process in order to award any tender that has both qualification criteria and points-criteria. The PPPFA does not explicitly distinguish between the various stages that could be involved in a tender process.

[1] Some attempt to change this position is made in Regulation 8 which provides for evaluation on the basis of 'functionality' as well as price and the specified goals, and combines the points for price and functionality so that a maximum of 80 or 90 points may be allocated in respect of both, depending on the value of the contract. However, to the extent that Regulation 8 conflicts with s 2 of the PPPFA, it may be ultra vires. Also, the notion of evaluating functionality with price is not carried through into the formulae set out in Regulations 4, 5 and 6 for calculating the points for price.

[2] 'Acceptable tender' is defined as 'any tender which, in all respects, complies with the specifications and conditions of tender as set out in the tender document'. Therefore, technical capability and other criteria — such as environmental best practice - could arguably be qualification criteria for purposes of identifying compliant tenders, but may not be used in the process of ranking compliant tenders.

[3] See Grinaker (supra) at paras 40–64.

Section 2 of the PPPFA goes on to provide that any specific goal for which a point may be awarded must be clearly specified in the invitation to submit a tender.[1] Furthermore, such goals must be measurable, quantifiable and monitored for compliance.[2]

(vi) Remedies for non-compliance

As far as remedies for non-compliance with the provisions of the PPPFA are concerned, the PPPFA prescribes no consequences for organs of state that implement a preferential procurement policy other than in accordance with that Act.[3] With regard to the consequences of a contract being awarded on account of false information furnished by a tenderer in order to secure preference in terms of the PPPFA, s 2*(g)* provides that any such contract may be cancelled at the sole discretion of the organ of state without prejudice to any other remedies that the organ of state may have.[4]

(d) PPPFA Regulations

The PPPFA permits the Minister of Finance to make regulations in order to achieve the objects of the Act.[5] Regulations have now been promulgated.[6] The Regulations provide considerably more detail than the PPPFA itself, as to the manner in which the preferential procurement framework created by the primary legislation is intended to operate.

The Regulations apply to all organs of state as defined in the PPPFA. They provide that any such organ of state must, unless the Minister of Finance has directed otherwise, only apply a preferential procurement system that accords with the PPPFA and the Regulations. This requirement means that an organ of state can neither apply a preferential procurement system that is more generous to HDIs than that established by the PPPFA and Regulations, nor may it apply a preferential procurement system that is different but equivalent to the system set

[1] PPPFA (supra) at s 2*(e)*.

[2] Ibid at s 2(2).

[3] The accounting authority of a public entity is responsible for the compliance by the public entity with all legislation applicable to it in terms of s 51(1)(b) of the Public Finance Management Act, but the equivalent provision applying to the accounting officer of a department (s 38(1)(n) of the Public Finance Management Act) makes him or her responsible for ensuring compliance only with the Public Finance Management Act itself.

[4] See also Regulation 15, discussed further below, which sets out a more extensive range of penalties that could be applied against a fraudulent tenderer to whom a contract is awarded. Penalties for tender offences have also been proposed in s 7 of the Prevention of Corruption Bill, introduced in the National Assembly as B19-2002.

[5] Section 5 of the PPPFA, which provides as follows:

(1) The Minister may make regulations regarding any matter that may be necessary or expedient to prescribe in order to achieve the objects of this Act.

(2) Draft regulations must be published for public comment in the Government Gazette and every Provincial Gazette before promulgation.

[6] GN R725, GG 22549, 10 August 2001 (the 'Regulations').

out in the PPPFA and Regulations. In practice this requirement is fairly restrictive. Some organs of state are eager to promote the implementation of social and economic objectives (through the award of contracts to HDIs) to a greater extent than is permitted by the preference points system provided for in the PPPFA.

(i) Application of preference points system

As mentioned above in relation to the dual-scale preference points system, the Regulations prescribe that, in respect of contracts with a value equal to or above R30 000 and up to R500 000, the 80/20 preference points system must be used. The 80/20 preference points system permits a maximum of 20 points to be awarded to a tenderer for being an HDI (as defined in the Regulations) and/or sub-contracting with an HDI and/or achieving of the specified goals stipulated in the Regulations. A formula set out in the Regulations is applied to calculate the number of points for price, and these are added to the preference points to calculate the total points awarded to each tenderer.[1] Organs of state may apply the same formula to procurement with a value less than R30 000, if and when appropriate.[2]

The Regulations also prescribe that in respect of contracts with a value above R500 000 the 90/10 preference points system must be used. The 90/10 preference points system permits a maximum of 10 points to be awarded to a tenderer for being an HDI and/or sub-contracting with an HDI and/or achieving any of the specified goals stipulated in the Regulations. Again, a formula is applied and the points scored for price are added to the points scored for the specified goals.[3]

[1] To illustrate the application of the preference points system by hypothetical example: the Department of Health invites tenders for the provision of antiretroviral medication. X, an empowerment company, offers the medication for R10 million. Y, which has no empowerment component, offers the medication for R9 million. Y is the tenderer with the lowest price. The contract is worth more than R500 000 so the 90/10 preference points system applies. Regulation 4(1), titled 'The 90/10 preference point system', provides that the following formula must be used to calculate the points for price:
Ps = 90 (1 — ((Pt — Pmin)—Pmin) where
Ps = points scored for price of tender under consideration
Pt = rand value of tender under consideration
Pmin = rand value of lowest acceptable tender.
X gets 90 (1 — 10 000 000 — 9 000 000) = 80 points for price.
Y gets 90 (1 — 9 000 000 — 9 000 000) = 90 points for price.
Therefore, if X gets 10 out of 10 preference points (for achievement of the 'specific goals') and Y gets none, their scores will be equal. If X gets anything less than 10 preference points, Y will be the tenderer who scores the highest points. The PPPFA does not prescribe how to award a contract if the two tenderers with the highest scores get the same number of points.

[2] Regulation 3.

[3] Regulation 4.

The Regulations go on to provide that the same preference points systems must be used in respect of contracts for the sale and letting of assets.[1] These provisions may be ultra vires, as the PPPFA does not purport to regulate contracts by organs of state for the sale and letting of assets, only contracts for the procurement or obtaining of goods and services.[2]

An organ of state must, in the tender documents, stipulate the preference points system that will be applied in the adjudication of tenders.[3] Although the stipulation of the preference points system to be applied assists in achieving transparency, it could result in an onerous procedure. Regulation 10 goes on to provide that if, in the application of the 80/20 preference points system, for example, all tenders received exceed the value of R500 000, the tender must be cancelled and the organ of state must re-invite tenders and again stipulate the preferencepoints system to be applied (and vice versa as regards the 90/10 preference points system).

The Regulations also provide that, notwithstanding other statements to the contrary in the Regulations,[4] a contract may, on reasonable and justifiable grounds, be awarded to a tenderer that did not score the highest number of points. This provision must be interpreted subject to s 2*(f)* of the PPPFA. Section 2*(f)* contemplates narrower grounds on which a contract may be awarded to a tenderer who did not score the highest points.[5]

(ii) Permissible preferences

As stated above, the PPPFA contemplates preference points for contracting with HDIs or for implementing the programmes of the RDP. The Regulations also make provision for the 80/20 or 90/10 preference points systems to accommodate a preference for the procuring of locally manufactured products (although the precise manner in which such a preference must be accommodated is not prescribed). The intention to award preference points for local manufacturing and/or content must be specified in the tender document sent out by an organ of state.

(iii) Equity ownership as a peremptory preference

Despite the fact that the PPPFA states the specific goals in permissive rather than peremptory terms ('the specific goals may include'), Regulation 13 provides that preference points stipulated in respect of a tender must include preference points

[1] See Regulations 5 and 6.

[2] This reading is consistent with FC s 217. FC s 217, as discussed above, should be interpreted to relate to contracts in terms of which goods or services are supplied to an organ of state. The PPPFA, which provides that the maximum points for price are to be awarded to the 'lowest acceptable tender' (s 2), similarly appears to confine its ambit to the obtaining of goods and services by organs of state by means of tenders.

[3] Regulation 7.

[4] Regulations 3(4), 4(4), 5(4), 6(4) and 8(8) all provide that only the tender with the highest number of points may be selected.

[5] See §25.4*(c)(v)* above.

for equity ownership by HDIs. Equity ownership is equated to the percentage of an enterprise or business owned by individuals or, in respect of a company, the percentage of a company's shares that are owned by individuals who are actively involved in the management of the enterprise or business and exercise control over the enterprise, commensurate with their degree of ownership at the closing date of the tender. Preference points may not be claimed in respect of individuals who are not actively involved in the management of an enterprise or business and who do not exercise control over an enterprise or business commensurate with their degree of ownership. This prohibition is intended to minimise so-called window dressing by corporate entities to meet empowerment criteria. Preference points may not be awarded to public companies[1] and tertiary institutions. Equity claims for a trust may only be allowed in respect of those persons who are both trustees and beneficiaries and who are actively involved in the management of the trust.[2] A consortium or joint venture may, based on the percentage of the contract value managed or executed by their HDI members, be entitled to equity ownership in respect of an HDI.

(iv) RDP goals

Regulation 17 provides that, over and above the awarding of preference points in favour of HDIs, certain activities may be regarded as a contribution towards achieving the goals of the RDP. These activities include but are not limited to the following:

(a) the promotion of South African-owned enterprises;
(b) the promotion of small, medium and micro-enterprises;
(c) the creation of new jobs or the intensification of labour absorption;
(d) the promotion of enterprises located in a specific province or region for work to be done or services to be rendered in that province or region;
(e) the empowerment of the workforce by standardising the level of skill and knowledge of workers; and
(f) the upliftment of communities through housing, transport, schools, infrastructure donations, charity organisations and other methods.

(v) Sub-contracting and penalties

A person awarded a contract as a result of a preference for contracting with, or providing equity ownership to, an HDI, may not sub-contract more than 25% of [1] The rationale for this limitation is not entirely clear.

[2] Again, the restrictions on trusts being awarded points for equity ownership are designed to minimise 'window-dressing'.

the value of the contract to a person who is not an HDI or who does not qualify for such preference.[1]

Finally, the Regulations set out various penalties that must be applied by an organ of state upon detecting that a preference in terms of the Act and Regulations has been obtained on a fraudulent basis, or in the event that any of the specified goals are not attained in the performance of the contract. The penalties embrace the recovery of all costs, losses and damages, cancellation of the contract, imposition of a financial penalty, and restricting the contractor from obtaining business from any organ of state for a period not exceeding 10 years.[2] As mentioned above, these penalties go further than those provided for in the PPPFA itself, particularly by including financial penalties and 'blacklisting'.

25.5 The Role of the Tender Boards

(a) Introduction

Tender boards currently exist at both a national and provincial level. At the national level, the State Tender Board is established in terms of the State Tender Board Act 86 of 1968.[3] In terms of this legislation, the Board is, amongst other things, empowered to procure supplies and services for the state and to invite offers and conclude agreements for this purpose.[4]

The State Tender Board Act was amended during 1987 (Act 18 of 1987) to provide for the establishment of regional tender boards.[5] Regional tender boards were established in each of the then-existing provinces. In 1994, however, with the coming into effect of the Interim Constitution, provincial legislation was enacted in each of the new nine provinces and provided for the establishment of provincial tender boards as contemplated by s 187. In other words, the regional tender boards were replaced by provincial tender boards.[6]

[1] Regulation 13(2). This Regulation may well have unintended consequences. It binds contractors who were awarded contracts as a result of HDI content, to a fairly restrictive sub-contracting regime, while permitting a non-HDI contractor to sub-contract freely to other non-HDIs. Another consequence is that in order for this provision to work in practice, the contractor will have to be informed of the causal link between his or her HDI credentials and the award of the contract — which assumes a measure of transparency in the process that may be practically difficult to achieve in every case.

[2] Regulation 15.

[3] Section 2.

[4] Section 4(1).

[5] In this regard, see s 2A of the State Tender Board Act. Section 2A provides that the Minister of Finance shall, on the recommendation of the [tender] board, establish regional tender boards in respect of such regions as the Minister may determine.

[6] For example, s 2(2) of the Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994 states that the powers exercised, for the procurement of supplies and services prior to the establishment of the Provincial Tender Board, by the Province — being the then Cape Province — or the government of any area which now forms part of the national territory — being the former homelands — are 'deemed to have been exercised or performed' by the Provincial Tender Board.

(b) Powers of the State Tender Board

Section 13 of the State Tender Board Act authorises the Minister of Finance to make regulations in respect of its procedure and the procurement of supplies or services on behalf of the state. The most recent regulations promulgated in terms of this section provide that:

> The Board may, subject to the applicable provisions of any Act of Parliament, issue directives to Government departments in regard to the procurement of supplies and services.[1]

This provision does not mean that the Board has powers to determine government policy on procurement. The Board's powers are merely to adjudicate upon the tender process in an objective manner, applying the rules and criteria as laid down by the relevant government department. The relationship between government departments and the Board in the tender process is succinctly described by Pickard JP in Cash Paymaster Services v Eastern Cape Province & Others:

> The function of the tender board in considering the tenders according to the rules laid down for it is not to prescribe or pre-empt the policy of government nor to determine what government needs and should or should not have. The task of the tender board is a simple one, namely to determine which tender is to be accepted, having regard to what government has laid down in its tender documents as the various criteria in regard to quality requirements, services and the like.[2]

Directives that the Board issues regarding the procurement of supplies and services by government departments will, where applicable, be subject to the provisions of the PPPFA. Where a department follows a policy of preferential procurement in the tender process, the PPPFA requires that the framework of that Act must apply.[3] Consequently, the State Tender Board is enjoined to operate within this framework in coming to a decision regarding procurement for a government department.[4]

Despite the involvement of government departments in the setting of rules and criteria for the procurement of supplies and services, the State Tender Board Act and regulations currently require, subject to limited exception,[5] that all tenders of the national government go through the Board. Regulation 2 states that 'subject

[1] Regulation 3(1) in GN R1237, GG 11382, of 1 July 1988.
[2] Cash Paymaster Services (supra) at 351.
[3] See s 2 of the PPPFA, and Regulation 2(2).
[4] See Grinaker (supra) at 351.
[5] Section 2 of the National Supplies Procurement Act 89 of 1970 stipulates that the Minister of Trade and Industry may, whenever he or she 'deems it necessary or expedient for the security of the Republic', without recourse to the State Tender Board, amongst other things, acquire or hire any goods or services on behalf of the state.

to the provisions of any Act of Parliament, supplies and services for and on behalf of the State, shall be procured only through the Board.'[1]

The regulations promulgated in terms of the State Tender Board Act allow for circumstances in which government departments may contract with service providers without obtaining the prior consent of the Board.[2] One can imagine circumstances where, due to time constraints in providing a particular service, a government department cannot wait for the Board to convene so as to render its decision. These exceptions are narrowly prescribed and are subject to the Board's override powers to resile from the agreement.[3]

(c) The diminishing role of tender boards

The recent trend is to move away from tender boards and for government departments at national and provincial level to engage in procurement themselves under the Public Finance Management Act. At national level, reassignment of procurement decision-making powers has, to some extent, been achieved through delegations and directives from the State Tender Board. At provincial level, it has happened either through the repeal of provincial tender board legislation,[4] or the delegation of certain procurement powers from the applicable tender board to the departments.[5] Cabinet's stated intention is that procurement will ultimately be

[1] GN R1237 in GG 11382 of 1 July 1988. Similar provisions are contained in the relevant provincial tender legislation. For example, s 4(1) of the Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994, provides that: '[T]he board shall have the sole power to procure supplies and services for the province, and, subject to the provisions of any other Act of the provincial legislature, to arrange the hiring or letting of anything or the acquisition or granting of any right for or on behalf of the province, and to dispose of movable provincial property . . .'. See also s 4(1) of the Tender Board Act (Free State) 2 of 1994.

[2] In terms of Regulation 3(4), the Board may approve ex post facto any action of a government department exercising a power conferred upon the Board by the Act or regulations, provided the Board is satisfied that the action of the government department 'took place in circumstances of emergency or otherwise was in the best interests of the State and was done without negligence, provided that the State has not suffered any damage as a result thereof'.

[3] Section 4(1)(*e*A) of the State Tender Board Act.

[4] See, for example, the Gauteng Tender Board Repeal Act 2 of 2002. The Act repeals the Provincial Tender Board Act 2 of 1994 and creates a transitional provincial procurement body for the adjudication and awarding of term contracts and special projects.

[5] For example, the KwaZulu-Natal Procurement Act 3 of 2001 gives effect to FC s 217 by establishing, within each department in the province, internal tender committees. In terms of s 28 of this Act, the accounting officer of a department and of the provincial parliament must establish, within their respective administrations, an internal tender committee comprising a single Tender Award Committee and one or more Tender Evaluation Committees. In addition, s 4 of the Act provides for the establishment of a Central Procurement Committee within the Department of Finance to adjudicate tenders where the value of the contract is above the delegated limit or where there is a dispute between a department's Tender Award Committee and its Tender Evaluation Committee. Provision is also made in s 19 for a Tender Appeals Tribunal and, in s 26, a Procurement Administration Office, which is required to report on the procurement practices within the provincial government.

regulated by the relevant government departments themselves under the Public Finance Management Act.[1]

(d) Consequences of non-compliance

In the meantime, should the relevant tender legislation require tender board approval before a tender is awarded, the failure to obtain such approval would render the contract legally invalid. The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Eastern Cape Provincial Government & Others v Contractprops 25 (Pty) Ltd, reached just such a conclusion.[2] In Contractprops, the Department of Education, Culture and Sport in the Eastern Cape Province purported to enter into lease agreements without reference to the provincial tender board. This action contravened the Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the leases were invalid, irrespective of the harshness that a declaration of invalidity may cause to either the Department or the lessee.[3] Similarly, in Premier, Free State & Others v Firechem Free State (Pty) Limited, the Supreme Court of Appeal decided that a contract concluded with a government department, which subsequently subverts the role of the tender board by contradicting the terms of the tender board's approval, will be invalid.[4]

25.6 Municipal Procurement

(a) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles

Municipalities, as organs of state in the local sphere of government, are bound by s 217 of the Constitution. They are obliged to contract for goods and services in [1] See above for the Cabinet meeting of 17 September 2003. The decentralisation trend appears to be consistent with the objectives of the COMESA public procurement project. See Karangizi (supra). However, as Karangizi states, the decentralised procurement function that is part of the COMESA model is coupled with a 'centralised policy and monitoring function for public procurement; that body, which should not be operationally involved in procurement proceedings, may also conduct other activities to develop procurement capacity, promote proper implementation, and enforce applicable rules'. Karangizi (supra) at 9.

[2] 2001 (4) SA 142 (SCA) ('Contractprops').

[3] Ibid at para 9 (Marais JA): 'As to the consequences of visiting such a transaction with invalidity, they will not always be harsh and the potential countervailing harshness of holding the province to a contract which burdens the taxpayer to an extent which could have been avoided if the tender board had not been ignored, cannot be disregarded. In short, the consequences of visiting invalidity upon non-compliance are not so uniformly and one-sidedly harsh that the legislature cannot be supposed to have intended invalidity to be the consequence. What is certain is that the consequence cannot vary from case to case. Such transactions are either all invalid or all valid. Their validity cannot depend upon whether or not harshness is discernible in the particular case.'

[4] 2000 (4) SA 413 (SCA).

accordance with a system that is 'fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective.'[1] They are also bound by the PPPFA as they fall within that Act's definition of 'organ of state'.[2]

A number of post-1994 statutes have been promulgated to give effect to the constitutional provisions relating to local government.[3] The Systems Act permits the creation by municipalities of 'municipal entities'. Municipal entities, as mentioned above, are juristic persons established by and under the ownership control of a municipality or several municipalities.[4] These entities would fall within the constitutional definition of 'organ of state'.[5] They clearly fall within a sphere of government. They are thus probably bound by FC s 217. However, as we noted above, they are not yet bound by the PPPFA.[6]

Just as the Public Finance Management Act regulates government procurement at national and provincial level, the Municipal Finance Management Bill, 2002[7] will, when it becomes an Act, require municipalities to maintain 'an appropriate procurement and provisioning system which is fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost effective'. Municipal entities will be bound by the same principles.[8] In sum, municipalities themselves are bound by both legs of constitutional procurement: the five principles and preferential procurement. Municipal entities, on the other hand, are at this stage bound only by the five principles. In terms of FC s 217, however, they would not be prevented from determining and implementing a preferential procurement policy.

(b) Municipal service provision

A critical and contentious issue for any municipality is when it should provide municipal services using its own staff and resources and when it should provide services through a separate entity, either in the public or in the private sector.

[1] This obligation was captured in s 10G(5) of the LGTA, which obligates municipalities to award contracts for goods and services in accordance with the five principles, but also permits them to allocate preferences in accordance with national legislation. Section 10G(5) goes on to provide that a municipality may 'dispense with the calling of tenders in the case of an emergency or of a sole supplier or within such limits as may be prescribed by a national law.' Regulations have been promulgated in terms of this section of the LGTA providing for the circumstances in which a municipality may dispense with the calling of tenders. See GN R1224 in GG 19300 of 2 October 1998, as amended by GN R387 in GG 19886 of 26 March 1999, and further amended by GN R750 in GG 20172 of 11 June 1999.

[2] Section 1 of the PPPFA.

[3] Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998; the Systems Act; Local Government: Municipal Finance Management Bill.

[4] See s 1 of the Systems Act.

[5] See FC s 239 and §25.2*(c)*(i) above.

[6] See §25.4*(c)*(i) above.

[7] Introduced in the National Assembly as B1 - 2002 ('the MFMB').

[8] Section 36*(a)(iii) of the MFMB creates this obligation in respect of municipalities, whereas s 59(1)(a)*(iii) of the MFMB does so in respect of municipal entities.

Municipal service delivery is regulated by parts 2 and 3 of chapter 8 of the Systems Act. These provisions set out mechanisms for deciding whether and when to contract with a separate entity for the delivery of services.[1]

When a municipality contracts with another entity for that entity to provide municipal services on its behalf, the municipality is contracting for goods and/or services and will likely be bound by the constitutional procurement principles. It appears that the relevant provisions in the Systems Act have been drafted with FC s 217 in mind. Provision is made in the Act for a deliberative process and for criteria to decide whether to provide the municipal service through an 'internal mechanism'[2] or an 'external mechanism'.[3] If an external mechanism is to be considered, a process of competitive bidding will be required unless certain pre-conditions are met.[4]

Municipal procurement is not merely subject to the Systems Act. A municipality will be obliged, in every case in which it contracts for goods and/or services, to ensure that such goods and/or services are procured in accordance with a system that complies with the five principles and the PPPFA and its Regulations.

There is provincial as well as national legislation — largely dating from the pre-1994 period - which regulates local government generally and which includes provisions on procurement by municipalities.[5] In general, the provincial ordinances provide for a competitive tender process when goods and/or services are required by a municipality. However, in emergencies or sole supplier situations, the municipality may dispense with a competitive process. Where there is a conflict between the national legislation (s 10G(5) of the LGTA or the Systems Act) and the provincial legislation regulating municipal procurement, resort should be had to FC ss 146 to 150. These sections deal with conflicts between national and provincial legislation.[6]

[1] Part 2 of chapter 8 comprises ss 76 to 82, and part 3 of chapter 8 comprises ss 83 and 84. The Local Government: Municipal Systems Amendment Bill (supra) proposes substantial amendments to these parts of the Systems Act.

[2] Section 76*(a)* of the Systems Act.

[3] Ibid at s 76*(b)*.

[4] Section 78 read with ss 80, 83 and 84 of the Systems Act. Since s 10G(5) of the LGTA, which also deals with municipal procurement, is still in operation, it must be read together with applicable provisions of the Systems Act.

[5] See, for example, s 35 of Transvaal Ordinance 17 of 1939, ss 171 and 172 of the Cape Municipal Ordinance 20 of 1974, ss 185 to 189 of the Natal Local Authorities Ordinance 25 of 1974, and s 143 of the Orange Free State Local Government Ordinance 8 of 1962.

[6] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Forthcoming, 2004).

25.7 Public-Private Partnerships

(a) Introduction

A number of transactions between organs of state (usually government departments) and private sector entities, with features typical of public-private partnerships (PPPs), were initiated or implemented before the Public Finance Management Act and the Treasury Regulations came into effect.[1] However, PPPs have become increasingly prevalent as a mechanism whereby national and provincial government departments seek to achieve service delivery objectives in a manner that appropriately allocates risk, makes use of private sector resources and gives value for money.

(b) Legislative framework

PPPs are not referred to in any primary legislation. Nevertheless, Regulation 16 of the Treasury Regulations defines the concept and regulates the implementation of PPPs.[2] 'Public-private partnership' is defined in Treasury Regulation 16.1 as follows:

> . . . a commercial transaction between an institution and a private party in terms of which —
> (a) the private party either performs an institutional function on behalf of the institution for a specified or indefinite period; or acquires the use of state property for its own commercial purposes for a specified or indefinite period;
> (b) the private party receives a benefit for performing the function or by utilising state property, either by way of:
> (i) compensation from a revenue fund;
> (ii) charges or fees collected by the private party from users or customers of a service provided to them; or > (iii) combination of such compensation and such charges or fees.

The institutions to which Treasury Regulation 16 applies are government departments at national and provincial level, constitutional institutions as defined in the Public Finance Management Act and public entities listed in Schedules 3A, 3B, 3C and 3D of the Public Finance Management Act.[3]

[1] The Public Finance Management Act came into effect on 1 April 2000. The Treasury Regulations were published in GG 22219 of 9 April 2001, and amended substantially by GN R740 in GG 23463 of 25 May 2002, with effect from 27 May 2002.

[2] A revised version of Treasury Regulation 16 was published for public comment under GN 1535 in GG 25605 of 24 October 2003.

[3] The public entities listed in Schedule 3 to the Public Finance Management Act are all those other than the 'Major Public Entities' that are listed in Schedule 2 to the Public Finance Management Act. The major public entities listed in Schedule 2, may therefore enter into transactions identical to those regulated by Treasury Regulation 16 without complying with its provisions. Such transactions would likely, however, be subject to other statutory requirements, either in terms of the Public Finance Management Act (in particular s 51(1)(a)(iii) regarding the five principles) or sectoral legislation.

(c) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles and procurement legislation

Where the private party to a PPP performs an 'institutional function' on behalf of an organ of state, in terms of a service delivery or PPP agreement, the procurement provisions in the Constitution may well be applicable.[1] Such a 'partnership' is a contract concluded by a government department for goods and/or services, even though the PPP agreement may provide for the private party to deliver the goods or services to consumers on behalf of the government department (as opposed to delivering the goods or services to the government department for its own use).[2]

PPPs that involve the use of state property for the private party's own commercial purposes, rather than the performance of an institutional function, are arguably not 'contracts for goods or services'. The principles of s 217 may not necessarily apply. On the other hand, the provisions of Treasury Regulation 16 will apply to the PPP. As described below, the application of Regulation 16 means that the principles of openness, transparency, fairness, competitiveness and cost-effectiveness (value for money and affordability) will, invariably, be part of the decision-making process. Since a competitive process is used, the PPPFA will also, generally, be applicable.

Treasury Regulation 16 provides for strict national or (where the institution concerned is a provincial institution and the National Treasury has delegated the appropriate powers to a provincial treasury in terms of s 10(1)(b) of the Public Finance Management Act) provincial treasury supervision of transactions that fall within the definition of PPP set out in the Regulation.

The Regulation provides for a series of national or provincial treasury approvals at specified points in the process of concluding a PPP. The first approval must be granted before commencement of the procurement phase (but after having undertaken a feasibility study) and may not be granted unless the relevant treasury is satisfied that the criteria of value for money, affordability and appropriate transfer of technical, operational and financial risk, have been

[1] 'Institutional function' is defined in Treasury Regulation 16.1 (as amended by General Notice 2012, published in Government Gazette 25229 dated 28 July 2003), as follows:

'(a) a service, task, assignment or other function that an institution performs —

(i) in the public interest; or

(ii) on behalf of the public service generally; or

(b) any part or component of, or any service, task, assignment or other function performed in support of, such a service, task, assignment or other function'.

[2] Treasury Regulation 16.12.1 provides that an agreement between an institution and a private party for the latter to perform an institutional function without accepting significant risks is not a PPP and must be dealt with as a 'procurement transaction'. However, in our view this does not detract from the fact that where a PPP does involve the procurement of goods or services by an organ of state, the constitutional procurement provisions will apply to the process of identifying the private party, as will the provisions of the PPPFA.

met.[1] The criteria applicable to subsequent treasury approvals are in similar terms.[2]

Although Treasury Regulation 16 prescribes certain elements of the procurement procedure for a PPP, the Regulation also states that a PPP agreement 'must be procured in accordance with applicable procurement legislation'.[3] Treasury Regulation 16 does not purport to regulate all aspects of PPP procurement. It must be determined on a case-by-case basis whether the PPPFA or any other legislation regulating procurement is also applicable. Since a tender process will be followed, the PPPFA will likely be applicable to most PPPs.

Treasury Regulation 16 requires that the procurement procedure must include an open and transparent pre-qualification process, a competitive bidding process in which only pre-qualified organisations may participate, and criteria for the evaluation of bids to identify the bid that represents the best value for money.[4] It further states that the procurement procedure may include a preference for categories of bidders, in terms of the relevant legislation, such as persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, provided that this does not compromise the value for money requirement.[5] Treasury Regulation 16.6.7 provides that the procedure may also include incentives for recognising and rewarding genuine innovators in the case of unsolicited proposals. However, these incentives may not compromise the competitive bidding process.

While the oversight role of the applicable treasury, in relation to contracting by government departments, is essentially aimed at verifying the cost-effectiveness of the transaction, it can be seen from the above that the principles of competitiveness, transparency and fairness all assist in achieving this objective. The application of the principles encourages the widest range of bidders possible and is designed to instil confidence in the private sector in its dealings with government. The simultaneous applicability of preferential procurement legislation ensures that regard is also had to the government's job-creation and transformation objectives.

25.8 Procurement and the Right to Just Administrative Action

Section 33(1) of the Constitution provides that everyone has the right to lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair administrative action.[6] The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 (AJA) was enacted to give effect to this constitutional right. The AJA, amongst other things, sets out the requirements

[1] Treasury Regulation 16.3.2.
[2] See Treasury Regulations 16.4.2, 16.6.1, 16.6.5 and 16.7.1.
[3] Treasury Regulation 16.6.3.
[4] Ibid at 16.6.5.
[5] Ibid at 16.6.7.
[6] See, generally, Klaaren & Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' (supra), in relation to the right to just administrative action.

for procedurally fair administrative action, gives effect to the right to written reasons and provides for the grounds on which administrative action can be judicially reviewed and set aside.

The fundamental question as to whether administrative law applies to a particular form of conduct is whether it amounts to administrative action. The AJA's definition of 'administrative action', when read with the definition of 'decision', essentially comprises six elements: (1) a decision of an administrative nature; (2) made in terms of an empowering provision; (3) not specifically excluded from the definition; (4) made by an organ of state or by another body exercising a public power or performing a public function; (5) that adversely affects rights; and (6) that has a direct, external legal effect.[1]

A number of cases decided in recent years have held that the decision to call for, the adjudication of, and the granting of a tender (whether by a tender board or another public body) constitutes administrative action.[2] In Transnet Limited v Goodman Brothers,[3] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the evaluation of a tender by Transnet Limited, in respect of the supply of long-service gold watches for employees, amounted to administrative action for purposes of the Constitution.

The consideration of a tender will amount to administrative action provided that the tender is adjudicated in the course of exercising a public function or performing a public power. In this regard, our courts have taken a broad approach to the circumstances in which the award of the tender is related to a public function. In Transnet Limited, the appellants argued that when Transnet invites tenders for the supply of locomotives, it acts administratively, but when it invites tenders for toilet paper or gold watches, it does not. With regard to the latter type of purchases it was argued that Transnet acts in a purely private, commercial capacity. This argument was rejected by the Supreme Court of Appeal. The tender for the supply of gold watches was held to amount to administrative action.[4] During the course of his separate concurring judgment, Olivier JA emphasised the use of public funds in reaching the conclusion that the adjudication of the tender amounted to administrative action:

[1] Section 1 of the AJA. See Klaaren & Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' (supra) at 63-17.

[2] Claude Neon Limited v Germiston City Council & Another 1995 (3) SA 710 (W), 1995 (5) BCLR 554 (W); Umfolozi Transport (Edms) Bpk v Minister van Vervoer en Andere [1997] 2 All SA 548 (SCA); Aquafund (Pty) Ltd v Premier of the Province of the Western Cape 1997 (7) BCLR 907 (C), [1997] 2 All SA 608 (C); ABBM Printing and Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Limited 1997 (1) BCLR 1429 (W), 1998 (2) SA 109 (W), [1997] 4 All SA 94 (W); Transnet Limited (supra); Olitzki Property Holdings (supra). See also Logbro Properties CC v Bedderson NO & Others 2003 (2) SA 460 (SCA), [2003] 1 All SA 424 (SCA), and Metro Projects (supra).

[3] Transnet Limited (supra).

[4] Ibid at 871. As Schutz JA stated: 'I fail to see how such a distinction is to be drawn, particularly where, as in this case, the purchase of watches is clearly incidental to the exercise of Transnet's general powers. The gold watches are bought so that they may be used to secure the loyalty of employees, much as salaries are paid to secure their services.'

> The power exercised by Transnet arose from the legislation under discussion [the Legal Succession to the South African Transport Services Act] and directly related to affairs not confined to the internal affairs of Transnet. Public funds and eventually State responsibility are involved.[1]

In light of the fact that public procurement invariably involves the expenditure of public funds, it can be said that the award of a contract will be public in nature, provided that the purpose of the contract is incidental to the public powers of the body and is not confined to its internal affairs.[2]

In our view, the AJA does not alter the position that the adjudication and award of a tender amounts to administrative action, notwithstanding the fact that one of the requirements for administrative action under the AJA is that the decision must 'adversely affect the rights of any person'.[3] In our view, 'affect' should be read to mean determine rather than deprive. In other words, administrative action includes decisions which determine one's rights, and not only those decisions which deprive one of a right.[4] Some support for this approach can be found in Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board. In holding that the relevant decision amounted to administrative action, Borochowitz J said:[5]

> [The Public Accountants' and Auditors'] Board's decision has plainly affected the rights and interests of the applicant. It has determined its rights.

If this is the case, a failure to award a tender will amount to administrative action. Such a decision will invariably determine the unsuccessful tenderer's rights (in the sense that the unsuccessful tenderer does not acquire rights it would have had if it had been granted the tender).[6]

In relation to the specific right to administrative action that is procedurally fair, s 3 of the AJA provides that this right only applies where one's rights or legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected by administrative action.[7] For the reasons discussed above, an unsuccessful tenderer would generally be able to rely on this right to procedurally fair administrative action. As De Villiers J stated in Grinaker:[8]

---

[1] Transnet Limited (supra) at 867.

[2] D M Pretorius 'The Defence of the Realm: Contract and Natural Justice' (2002) 119 SALJ 374, 395. Transnet Limited (supra) at 867, 871. The crucial question then becomes whether the contract procurement process affects the rights of interested parties.

[3] See Klaaren & Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' (supra) at 63-20 — 63-22 for a detailed discussion of this requirement under the AJA and the constitutional difficulties that it raises.

[4] Ibid at 63-21.

[5] 2001 (2) SA 980, 997 (W). See also Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) at paras 101-110.

[6] Provided that the other elements of the definition of administrative action are met.

[7] See Klaaren & Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' (supra) at 63-25–63-30 for a detailed discussion on the right to procedural fairness.

[8] Grinaker (supra) at 348.

> Bidders in a tender process are entitled to fair administrative action and have the legitimate expectation that their tender will be evaluated fairly, properly, justly and without bias.

An example of the application of the right to procedural fairness to the adjudication of a tender may be found in Du Bois v Stompdrift-Kamanassie Besproeiingsraad.[1] In Du Bois, a tender for a long lease of a picnic and camping site was not awarded based upon adverse reports relating to the applicant. The court held that the applicant had the right to procedural fairness. It should have been informed of the contents of the adverse reports and been given an opportunity to respond thereto. The decision not to accept the applicant's tender was therefore set aside. In the course of his judgment, Griesel J expressly rejected the argument that the right to procedural fairness cannot be applied to tender procedures because it would make the procedure cumbersome and unmanageable.[2]

An additional implication of a tender process (or other procurement mechanism) amounting to administrative action is that the public body is required to furnish written reasons for the award of the tender to any person whose rights are adversely affected by such decision.[3] An unsuccessful tenderer will therefore invariably be entitled to written reasons for the rejection of its tender.[4]

25.9 Remedies for Non-Compliance

(a) Introduction

A number of different remedies may flow from non-compliance with the constitutional and legislative requirements for public procurement. These remedies include a declaration of invalidity, the granting of an interdict and, in exceptional circumstances, the awarding of the contract or damages. We will briefly discuss each of these in turn.

(b) Invalidity

According to principles of administrative law and the constitutional principle of legality,[5] public procurement that fails to comply with the provisions of the Constitution or relevant legislation will be invalid and may be set aside by a court.[6]

[1] 2002 (5) SA 186 (C). This case did not relate to the procurement of goods or services.
[2] Ibid at 195-6.
[3] FC s 33(2) and s 5 of the AJA.
[4] This conclusion is consistent with the approach of the court in Grinaker (supra) at 348.
[5] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC); and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re Ex parte President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC). See Klaaren & Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' (supra) at 63-39–63-41 for a discussion of the principle of legality.
[6] See, for example, Contractprops (supra); Grinaker (supra); and Metro Projects (supra).

A difficult issue which then arises is whether the entire procurement process should be set aside and new tenders called for or whether existing tenders already received by the relevant body should be reconsidered. The usual course would be to refer the decision back to the relevant body for reconsideration on the basis of the existing tenders.[1] However, in Cash Paymaster Services (Pty) Ltd v Eastern Cape Province & Others, the court held that new tenders were warranted because: (a) circumstances had changed since the original submission of tenders; (b) new directives had subsequently been issued regarding tenders; and (c) it appeared that the original tender document was deficient (in that it did not provide for the weight to be attached to the RDP factors).[2]

(c) Interdict

In appropriate cases, and in accordance with the normal requirements relating to interdicts, a public body could be interdicted from engaging in unlawful procurement activities. For example, an unsuccessful tenderer may apply to interdict the conclusion of the contract pursuant to a defective procurement process.

(d) Award of the contract

If the award of the tender or the conclusion of the contract also amounts to administrative action, the court may, in exceptional circumstances, decide to award the tender to the unsuccessful applicant.[3] In Grinaker, the court held that such exceptional circumstances existed. It was clear to the court, that, on a proper application of the preference points system under the PPPFA, and other documents which were applicable in terms of the tender conditions, the tender board was obliged to award the contract to the applicant. The result of a reconsideration of the tender was, therefore, a foregone conclusion and the court thus ordered that the contract be awarded to the applicant.[4]

(e) Damages

In Olitzki Property Holdings, it was argued that the effect of the procurement provision or the administrative justice clause of the Interim Constitution was to give an unsuccessful tenderer the right to claim damages for lost profit (i.e. the

[1] This was, for example, the approach in Tecmed (Pty) Limited v Eastern Cape Provincial Tender Board & Others 2001 (1) SA 735, 742 (SCA).

[2] Cash Paymaster Services (supra) at 354.

[3] See s 8(1)(c)(i)(aa) of the AJA.

[4] Grinaker (supra) at 361-2. The court stated that, in any event, 'the [tender board] has exhibited such bias and gross incompetence that it would be fair to both sides not to send the matter back to the [tender board]'. Ibid at 362.

profits it would have made had it been awarded the tender). This argument was rejected by the Supreme Court of Appeal, notwithstanding the fact that it was assumed, for purposes of argument, that the tender board had acted irregularly, unreasonably and arbitrarily and that the plaintiff would have been awarded the tender had a proper process been followed.[1]

Although the constitutional claim for lost profits was rejected by the court in this case, the question as to whether an unsuccessful tenderer may be awarded damages for out-of-pocket expenses incurred in submitting or re-submitting the relevant tender was left open.[2] In our view, a public body should be liable in delict for foreseeable, wasted out-of-pocket expenses incurred by unsuccessful tenderers in relation to a tender process that is found to have been unlawful.[3]

[1] It should be noted that this relief was sought on the basis of the particular circumstances of the case which, it was argued, resulted in no other satisfactory remedy being available to the plaintiff for breach of the relevant constitutional provisions.

[2] Olitzki Property Holdings (supra) at 1267.

[3] This conclusion is consistent with the holdings of recent cases that public bodies may be delictually liable for a failure properly to perform their functions. See, e.g. Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies intervening) 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

26 Traditional Leaders

Tom Bennett
Christina Murray

26.1 Introduction 26–1
26.2 The structure of traditional government. 26–4
26.3 Conquest, indirect rule and apartheid. 26–8
26.4 Constitutional negotiations and the Final Constitution 26–15
26.5 Traditional government in the multi-sphere system 26–20
(a) Traditional communities and councils 26–21
(b) The Houses of traditional leaders 26–24
(i) Composition 26–25
(ii) Powers 26–27
(iii) Procedures, privileges and immunities 26–28
(c) Traditional government and the national and provincial spheres 26–30
(d) Traditional government and local government 26–34
(e) Traditional monarchs. 26–41
26.6 Government in traditional areas 26–43
(a) Appointment and succession to office. 26–43
(b) Territorial and personal jurisdiction. 26–48
(c) Separation of powers with checks and balances 26–50
(i) Judicial powers 26–50
(ii) Legislative powers 26–53
(iii) Executive and administrative powers 26–53
(d) Land 26–56
(i) Traditional power to allot land 26–57
(ii) Traditional power to regulate common resources . 26–59
(iii) Traditional powers of expropriation and confiscation 26–59
(iv) The Communal Land Rights Act 26–63
26.7 Traditional leaders: An institution in transition 26–65

Recognition

211. (1) The institutional status and role of traditional leadership, according to customary law, are recognised, subject to the Constitution.

(2) A traditional authority that observes a system of customary law may function subject to any applicable legislation and customs, which includes amendments to, or repeal of, that legislation or those customs.

(3) The courts must apply customary law when that law is applicable, subject to the Constitution and any legislation that specifically deals with customary law.

Role of traditional leaders

212. (1) National legislation may provide for a role for traditional leadership as an institution at local level on matters affecting local communities.

(2) To deal with matters relating to traditional leadership, the role of traditional leaders, customary law and the customs of communities observing a system of customary law —

(a) national or provincial legislation may provide for the establishment of houses of traditional leaders; and

(b) national legislation may establish a council of traditional leaders.

26.1 INTRODUCTION

The Final Constitution deals with traditional leaders in two short sections, a terseness which reflects the dominant view in the Constitutional Assembly that democracy, not traditional leadership, was to take precedence in South Africa. However, the intense political negotiations between the government and traditional leaders over the eight years since the Final Constitution came into effect demonstrate that the role of traditional leaders in South Africa is more complicated, and more deeply entrenched, than constitution-makers were prepared to concede. The role of traditional leaders in local government is the area of greatest dispute, as it is at the local level that traditional leaders formerly exercised most of their powers. Three key pieces of legislation, two relating to local government (Local Government: Municipal Demarcation Act[1] and Local Government: Municipal Structures Act[2]) and one concerned directly with the role of traditional leaders (Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act[3]), have done little to resolve matters. Instead, the context in which traditional leaders now operate is often unclear. Their relationship with the municipal councils that govern the areas within which they fall, for example, remains fuzzy. The impact of the Final Constitution's commitment to equality on succession to leadership positions is contested. The constitutionality of traditional courts is disputed. The power of the provincial and national houses of traditional leaders is the subject of deep unhappiness amongst traditional leaders. The extent to which practices of

* The authors would like to thank Iain Currie for permission to use material from his chapter on 'Indigenous Law' in the first volume of this work and Tendai Nkenga and Coel Kirkby for excellent research assistance. This chapter also relies on material published elsewhere by the authors. See TW Bennett Customary Law in South Africa (2004) and C Murray 'South Africa's Troubled Royalty: Traditional Leaders after Democracy' Law and Policy Paper 23, Centre for International and Public Law, Australian National University (2004).

[1] Act 27 of 1998.

[2] Act 117 of 1998.

[3] Act 41 of 2003.

traditional leaders must be revised in the light of the Bill of Rights (in particular, the provisions relating to just administrative action) is the subject of an increasing number of constitutional challenges.

Underlying all these difficulties are profoundly different understandings of government: on the one hand, those held by traditional leaders, and, on the other, those held by elected representatives in the new South African democracy. In modern states, governmental powers are regulated by various rules which are designed to guarantee what is probably the most important principle in a democracy: accountability to the citizen body.[1] Customary law had no specific rules catering for this principle, but the type of controls associated with a bureaucratic state were irrelevant to the personal style of government typical of traditional African society. A ruler's power was general and all-inclusive.[2] It followed that the business of government was neither differentiated according to the western notions of executive, judicial and legislative functions nor allocated to separate institutions.[3] Instead, all the functions of government were located in one body: the chief-in-council.

When the Interim Constitution was promulgated, traditional leaders still held, more or less unchanged, their all-encompassing powers of government under customary law.[4] Although these powers were, in principle, subject to statutory controls, very few had, in fact, been passed during the years of colonial and apartheid rule. The principal legislation was (and remains) the Black Authorities Act,[5] which provides tribal authorities with all the customary powers of government.[6] FC s 211(1) accepts this position in broad principle by providing that '[t]he institution, status and role of traditional leadership, according to customary law, are recognised.' But then follows a significant proviso: 'subject to the Constitution'.

Because traditional rulers are organs of state,[7] and must comply with the Final Constitution,[8] certain customs will have to change and certain specific customary powers are now superseded or limited. The Final Constitution's commitment to [1] See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'), s 1*(d)*.

[2] The most diverse and far-reaching powers relate to land, including the powers to dedicate new land to commonage, farming or residence, to declare the beginning and end of the agricultural cycle and to impose conservation measures.

[3] See AC Myburgh Die Inheemse Staat in Suider-Afrika (1986) 7; WD Hammond-Tooke *Imperfect Interpreters: South Africa's Anthropologists 1920–199*0 (1997) 64–5; HO Mönnig The Pedi (1967) 253–4; H Ashton The Basuto (1952) 209–10.

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[5] Act 68 of 1951, as amended by the Regional and Land Affairs General Amendment Act 89 of 1993.

[6] Under Black Authorities Act s 4(2) traditional leaders also have the powers given to them by subordinate legislation. The regulations in question are contained in Proc R110 of 1957, as amended by Proc R110 of 1991.

[7] FC s 239 defines an organ of state broadly to include any functionary or institution exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Final Constitution or exercising a public power in terms of legislation. For the definition of 'organ of State', see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds), Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.

[8] See FC s 8(1)(Explicitly binds all organs of state.)

gender equality, for example, has major implications for many customary practices, including succession and the composition of traditional councils. We discuss these matters later in the Chapter. The Final Constitution also explicitly vests the power to raise taxes in national, provincial and local governments.[1] A traditional leader's customary power in this regard is therefore lost.[2] FC s 13, which prohibits servitude or forced labour, would also suggest that rulers must forfeit their power to demand labour from their subjects for public projects.[3]

More general qualifications on the exercise of customary powers flow from the two constitutional frameworks that were designed to differentiate the functions and institutions of government and to ensure limited government in South Africa: separation of powers (accompanied by checks and balances) and multi-sphere government (national, provincial and local). The former is not expressly mentioned in the Final Constitution, but it has been built into the new system of government. Hence, the Constitutional Court has said that there 'can be no doubt that our Constitution provides for such a separation, and that laws inconsistent with what the Constitution requires in that regard are invalid.'[4] The framework of multi-sphere government, on the other hand, is explicit.[5]

[1] See FC ss 228 and 229. See also White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (2003) 43, available at http://www.info.gov.za/gazette/bills/2003/b58-03.pdf (accessed on 20 July 2005)('White Paper on Traditional Leadership').

[2] A distinction may, however, be drawn between tax and tribute. But see Mönnig (supra) at 287 (Customary law makes no such distinction). Tax is a compulsory contribution to the fiscus for use in promoting the public welfare; tribute is a payment made as a mark deference or respect for a ruler. The power to issue compulsory levies (which implies an ad hoc tax) is encoded in regulation 22 of the Regulations for Tribal and Community Authorities. R2779 of 22 November 1991. Government approval must first be obtained. This regulation is now presumably unconstitutional. See also H Kuckertz Creating Order: The Image of the Homestead in Mpondo Social Life (1990) 71–2 (On the general decline of traditional fiscal powers.)

[3] See, generally, S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64. In light of FC s 13, the decision in Sibasa v Ratsialingwa & Hartman NO, that traditional rulers have a right to require their subjects to work their own lands for the production of official income may no longer be valid. 1947 (4) SA 369 (T). However, if the section is read in light of the Forced Labour Convention No 29 of 1930 there may be grounds on which to defend this customary power under FC s 36. Under FC s 36 a right may be limited by 'law of general application' only, and customary law is law of general application. See Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at para 136; President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 96; S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 34 (On meaning, purpose and criteria for 'law of general application' as used in FC s 36). Moreover, while the Convention obliges states party to suppress forced labour practices, it allows various exceptions, notably, 'minor communal services of a kind which, being performed by the members of the community in the direct interest of the said community, can therefore be considered as normal civic obligations.' Article 2(2)(e). In addition, Articles 7 and 10 allow traditional rulers to exact forced labour, provided the work is in the interests of the community, is necessary and not too burdensome, and is in accord with the exigencies of social life and agriculture. The work may include ploughing and harvesting the rulers' own fields.

[4] See South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 22. See also I Currie & J de Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law: Vol 1 (2001) 96.

[5] FC s 40(1). See S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Cooperative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

Traditional leaders are an awkward element in these structures, because, according to customary law, in its pre-colonial form at least, traditional rulers were full sovereigns, with powers limited only by the people and territory under their jurisdiction. This Chapter discusses the constitutional framework within which traditional leaders now operate in South Africa, as well as some of the most difficult issues arising from attempts to accommodate traditional leadership in a democracy. To better understand the uncertainty and controversy that surround their role, the discussion is set against a description of the traditional form of government.

26.2 The structure of Traditional Government

According to the typical legend, traditional polities were founded when a charismatic individual, the head of a clan, together with various other families attached to the group, guided his people to the land on which they were to settle. Whatever the reasons for migration over the vast spaces of Africa, once favourable conditions were found, the group could settle permanently. The process might involve the conquest and absorption (or even expulsion) of the original inhabitants, or it might involve the negotiation of a right to settle within a more powerful nation. In any event, settlement established a territorial framework within which to structure further political and economic relations. Hence, the leader could mark out land for his own homestead and fields, those for other sections of the clan and accompanying families, and then an area for communal grazing.

In the early days, government of this unit would have been a simple matter, given the small number of people involved. As the unit grew, however, a certain stratification and structure would inevitably develop. Decisions would be made by the leader in consultation with an inner clique, usually composed of senior kin of the founding clan. When occasion demanded, the advisory council could be expanded to include leaders of the associated families.

In the parlance of colonial rule, these units were generally described as 'tribes' and their leaders as 'chiefs'.[1] The former denoted a partially stratified political structure, normally containing no more than a few thousand individuals.[2] Members were assumed to be related by ties of kinship, and, because of their common ancestry, they were believed to be homogeneous groups, bound together by common interests, beliefs and goals.[3] Leadership of tribes fell to their most senior members, the chiefs. This word was the English translation for inkosi (Xhosa and Zulu), morena (Sotho) and kgosi (Tswana). In most of southern Africa, the office was hereditary, generally devolving according to the principle of primogeniture in the male line.

[1] See M Mamdani Citizen and Subject: Contemporary Africa and the Legacy of Late Colonialism (1996) 79–82.

[2] See T Earle (ed) Chiefdoms: Power, Economy and Ideology (1991) 1ff. For a useful typology, see B Sansom 'Traditional Economic Systems' in WD Hammond-Tooke (ed) The Bantu-speaking Peoples of Southern Africa (2nd Edition, 1974)('Hammond-Tooke Bantu Speaking Peoples') 249.

[3] See Sansom (supra) at 262–3. It is significant that the courts accepted these criteria for purposes of apartheid legislation. See S v Bhoolia 1970 (4) SA 692 (A)(Relied exclusively on kinship or genetic links to determine the concept of tribe.) See also Mathebe v Regering van die RSA & Andere 1988 (3) SA 667, 692–3 (A); Staatspresident & 'n Ander v Lefuo 1990 (2) SA 679, 685 (A)(Criteria of ethnic and cultural homogeneity.)

Blanket use of the terms tribe and chief obscured not only the true nature of these institutions but also the considerable diversity of political structures in pre-colonial southern Africa.[1] The term tribe is a particularly egregious offender in this regard.[2] Kinship was never the sole basis for membership.[3] Political units might, historically, have been based on ties of blood, but outsiders were always being incorporated, whether by way of conquest, invitation or submission. What is more, from the very earliest days of colonization, traditional polities were divided, merged or reconstituted in order to suit central government policies.[4] Modern tribes therefore bear little resemblance to their pre-colonial forebears.

Chiefs stood at the head of the hierarchy of offices in traditional government. In cases where a particular individual had gained primacy over his neighbours, the colonial powers were sometimes prepared to use the term 'king'.[5] Hence, Sobhuza I, Mswati II, Shaka, Dingane and Moshoeshoe were all referred to as kings of their peoples. Otherwise, where a chief had not yet acquired complete authority over his coevals (as with the Xhosa), or where the polity was simply not considered large enough (as with the Pedi), the principal ruler was described as a 'paramount chief'.[6]

Below the office of chief or king, the polities of southern Africa could, broadly speaking, be divided into two tiers of authority: wardhead and familyhead. Headmen (or wardheads)[7] were normally senior members of leading families within the nation. They controlled clearly defined geographic units, termed 'wards' in the

[1] See EAB Van Nieuwaal 'Chiefs and African States: Some Introductory Notes and an Extensive Bibliography on African Chieftaincy' (1987) 25 & 26 J Legal Pluralism 1, 5ff. See also M Hall The Changing Past: Farmers, Kings and Traders in Southern Africa 200–1860 (1987) 74ff (Historical and archaeological evidence.)

[2] As an analytical concept, 'tribe' is of little value. See Hammond-Tooke Bantu-speaking Peoples (supra) at xv; A Mafeje 'The Ideology of Tribalism' (1971) 9 J Mod Afr Studies 253; and P H Gulliver (ed) Tradition and Transition in East Africa (1969) 7–35. See also P Skalnik in E Boonzaier & J Sharp South African Keywords: the Uses and Abuses of Political Concepts (1988) 68ff. Tribe is additionally objectionable because it carries the connotation of 'tribalism'. See L Vail (ed) The Creation of Tribalism in Southern Africa (1989) 3–4.

[3] See I Schapera Tribal Innovators: Tswana Chiefs and Social Change (1970)('Schapera Tribal Innovators') 5 and 205.

[4] The creation of a Tsonga tribe out of a collection of disparate peoples provides a telling, albeit extreme, example of these processes. See P Harries 'The Emergence of Ethnicity among the Tsonga Speakers of South Africa' in Vail (supra) at 83ff.

[5] King may be translated as ingonyama (Zulu), ikumkani (Xhosa) and marena a maholo (Sotho). See M Gluckman 'The Kingdom of the Zulu in South Africa' in M Fortes & E E Evans-Pritchard (eds) African Political Systems (1940) 24ff.

[6] See WD Hammond-Tooke 'Chieftainship in Transkeian Political Development' (1965) 35 Africa 149, 157–9 (Describes the Xhosa-speaking polities as a 'tribal cluster'). But see J B Peires The House of Phalo: a History of the Xhosa People (1981) 27–31 (Regards them as a more unified structure and argues that Hammond-Tooke's view was formulated at a particular time in Xhosa history, namely, when they were trying to extend their control.) See also RB Mqeke Basic Approaches to Problem Solving in Customary Law: A Study of Conciliation and Consensus Among the Cape Nguni (1997) 69–70. For the Tswana, see I Schapera 'The Political Organisation of the Ngwato of Bechuanaland Protectorate' in Fortes & Evans-Pritchard (supra) at 56ff.

[7] Headman is a term associated with government usage and wardhead with the anthropological literature. They are used to translate induna (Zulu), ibonda (Xhosa), morenana (Sotho) and kgosana (Tswana).

anthropological literature.[1] Wardheads reported directly to the chief, and, in concert with him, they formed a ruling council. Below the wardheads came the patriarchal heads of households, known as 'kraalheads' in colonial parlance, or, more commonly today, 'familyheads'. Each incumbent of the three (or sometimes four) ranks of office — chief, wardhead and familyhead — exercised similar types of power, but obviously at different levels of authority.[2]

In the eyes of his people, the chief was the most important and powerful member of his nation.[3] Even so, people talked about their chiefs in the idiom of kinship. Thus, subjects called their ruler a 'father', and his great wife a 'mother'. Like the patriarchal head of a household, chiefly powers were generalized and diffuse. He was expected to judge disputes fairly, to govern wisely, to provide for the needy and to tend to the welfare of his people.[4]

Many of these powers derived from the belief that the present ruler was a direct descendant of the founder of the nation. Through a notionally unbroken tie of blood, he provided a channel of communication with the ancestors of his people,[5] and, because of this special relationship, he had the spiritual powers necessary to maintain the natural order.[6] In particular, he was able to ensure good rains and fertile crops. By reason of his control over the processes of nature, the ruler presided at the major national rituals. In farming communities, for example, he decided when the agricultural cycle was to begin and end, and, accordingly, when his people could start to plough or harvest.[7]

[1] On the concept of the ward, see AJB Hughes Land Tenure, Land Rights and Land Communities on Swazi National Land in Swaziland: A Discussion of Some Inter-relationships Between the Traditional Tenurial System and Problems of Agrarian Development (1972) 102; J F Holleman 'Some Shona Tribes in Southern Africa' in E Colson & M Gluckman Seven Tribes of British Central Africa (1961) 367–9; I Schapera Native Land Tenure in the Bechuanaland Protectorate (1943)('Schapera Native Land Tenure') 27–32; MFC Bourdillon The Shona Peoples: An Ethnography of the Contemporary Shona with Special Reference to their Religion (1976) 123–4; WJO Jeppe Die Ontwikkeling van Bestuursinstellings in die Westelike Bantoegebiede (Tswana-Tuisland)(1970) 113; VGJ Sheddick Land Tenure in Basutoland (1954) 8–9.

[2] See Sansom (supra) at 145–6; Holleman (supra) at 371–2, 376; Ashton (supra) at 209; M Gluckman Politics, Law and Ritual in Tribal Society (1971)('Gluckman Politics Law and Ritual') 39.

[3] He embodied all the emotions and values that ensured the integrity of the realm. See Hammond-Tooke Bantu-speaking Peoples (supra) at 174. See also Mönnig (supra) at 253; I Schapera A Handbook of Tswana Law and Custom (2nd Edition, 1955)('Schapera Handbook') 62. Note that the chief represented his people in dealings with outsiders. See Schapera Handbook (supra) at 69; Sansom (supra) at 266. Thus, according to Mathiba v Du Toit, the chief had locus standi to sue for restoration of national land. 1926 TPD 126.

[4] See M Hunter Reaction to Conquest (1964) 392; Schapera Handbook (supra) at 68; WD Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus: The Development of Transkeian Local Government (1975)('Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus') 30; Mönnig (supra) at 254. In keeping with this paternal image is the principle that a ruler's reputation was enhanced by giving rather than receiving. See Gluckman Politics, Law and Ritual (supra) at 50; WD Hammond-Tooke Bhaca Society (1962) 199; Ashton (supra) at 212; Mönnig (supra) at 274.

[5] See EM Letsoalo Land Reforms in South Africa (1987) 18; WJO Jeppe Bophuthatswana: Land Tenure and Development (1980)('Jeppe Bophuthatswana') 36; Schapera Handbook (supra) at 61–2; Bourdillon (supra) at 87.

[6] See Earle (supra) at 6–7.

[7] See AC Myburgh & MW Prinsloo Indigenous Public Law in KwaNdebele (1985) 41; MW Prinsloo Inheemse Publiekreg in Lebowa (1983)('Prinsloo Publiekreg') 131; W D Hammond-Tooke Bhaca Society (supra) at 176; Mönnig (supra) at 159–60. The harvest festival was generally the highlight of the seasonal calendar. It was an occasion to celebrate the first fruits, affirm national unity and honour the ruler for his wisdom and benevolence. See BA Marwick The Swazi (1966) 182ff; Hammond-Tooke Bhaca Society (supra) at 179ff; Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 187–8; EJ Krige The Social System of the Zulus (1936) 249; Hunter (supra) at 394.

The ruler also had a range of powers and privileges of a more secular nature. He could order his subjects to work on his lands and provide labour for public works;[1] he could levy taxes[2] and demand tribute from the harvest[3] or the hunt;[4] he was entitled to choose the best land for his homesteads;[5] and he could order his subjects to plough and harvest his fields.[6]

This form of government obviously differed markedly from a modern democracy. Traditional rulers needed no special training; they were qualified for office by their ancestry alone. (Hence the well-known saying, kgosi ke kgosi ka a tswetswe [a king is a king because he is born to it].) As we have already noted, the functions of government were not differentiated into judicial, administrative and legislative categories, nor were rulers subject to the scrutiny of an independent judiciary. What seems an alarming concentration of power in one person was circumscribed, normatively, only by a duty to consult councillors and always to act for the benefit of the people.

The most important limitation on the power of traditional rulers came from the reality of day-to-day politics. As the notion of tribe suggests, most pre-colonial African polities were poised halfway between being state and stateless societies.[7] As a result, few rulers had an uncontested hold on their offices. If an office holder is constantly under threat of usurpation, he has to take great care to cultivate goodwill and to appease hostile factions.[8] Thus, a certain degree of political insecurity explains why an African ruler's power could not, in the past at least, have been absolute. Anyone who attempted tyrannical rule would soon face revolt or secession.[9] The wise leader, therefore, did not dictate to his subjects. A common saying has it that kgosi ke kgosi ka batho [a chief is a chief through his people].[10]

Rulers kept in touch with their people through councillors. As might be expected, the status and function of these officials varied, as did the composition and tasks of the councils they formed.[11] All rulers tended to rely on their senior

[1] See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 8; Ashton (supra) at 207–8; Hughes (supra) at 144.

[2] The taxes often paid for public works. See Ashton (supra) at 208; Krige (supra) at 221–2; Hughes (supra) at 109.

[3] Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 196; Letsoalo (supra) at 19 and 23; H Kuper An African Aristocracy (1947) 150. Cf Marwick (supra) at 164; NJ Van Warmelo & WMD Phophi Venda Law: Parts 1–3 (1948), Part 4 (1949), Part 5 (1967) 1089.

[4] See Holleman (supra) at 378; Bourdillon (supra) at 86; Hammond-Tooke Bhaca Society (supra) at 199; Ashton (supra) at 208; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 141; Krige (supra) at 222; HA Junod The Life of a South African Tribe (1912) 404–7.

[5] See Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 44; Sheddick (supra) at 147; Kuper (supra) at 45 and 149.

[6] The produce was supposed to be used to feed the needy. See Letsoalo (supra) at 18–19; Holleman (supra) at 378, Hughes (supra) at 108; Sheddick (supra) at 33, 148 and 150.

[7] See Fortes & Evans-Pritchard (supra) at 5ff.

[8] See Hall (supra) at 63–4; Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 31ff.

[9] See I Schapera Government and Politics in Tribal Societies (1956) 211 Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 35–6; Ashton (supra) at 217; Hunter (supra) at 393–4.

[10] See Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 161; Schapera Handbook (supra) at 84.

[11] See Schapera Handbook (supra) at 75 (Noted that the councils were not formally constituted and had no fixed membership.) The various types of council and national gathering are described in Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 126–7; Ashton (supra) at 216; Hughes (supra) at 103–4; Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 11–13 and 51–3; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 92–7; Schapera Tribal Innovators (supra) at 22–5. After the enactment of the Black Authorities Act, the government naturally looked to these councils to provide the future 'tribal authorities'. Act 68 of 1951. See Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 120; Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 53–7.

kinsmen for regular advice. These individuals constituted a close-knit council, which generally met in private. A similar, more representative unit, which also met in private, consisted of members of the family council together with leaders of the community, notably, the wardheads.

Meetings of the ruling aristocracy should be distinguished from popular assemblies (imbizo in Xhosa/Zulu or pitso in Sotho/Tswana). At the latter, all (male) adults in the realm were called together for the discussion of nationally important matters, such as the imposition of new legislation or levies, the organization of collective labour parties or, occasionally, the resolution of national disputes. Because no important decision could be taken without discussion in council, kinsmen, wardheads or even the people generally were given opportunities to check self-interested action and to voice public opinion.[1] Hence, a ruler's authority was never continuing and unquestioned; it always had to be recreated for specific issues and in specific contexts.[2]

Because of the constant flux in power and authority in the traditional structures of government, historical and anthropological sources were uncertain about the nature of traditional rule. Was it a primordial form democracy or naked despotism?[3] Perhaps predictably, the colonial authorities tended to regard all indigenous rulers as autocrats.[4]

26.3 Conquest, Indirect Rule and Apartheid

The various forces unleashed by colonial conquest inevitably worked to undermine the checks and balances of traditional government.

Initially, dating from their earliest exchanges with the people living on the eastern frontiers of the Cape Colony, the British aimed at eliminating traditional government. When areas of Ciskei were annexed, a conscious attempt was made to reduce the power of the chiefs, who were believed to be the main obstacle to Britain's civilizing mission in Africa.[5] Thereafter, as colonial rule was extended

[1] See Kuckertz (supra) at 80ff; Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 119ff n12; Hammond-Tooke Bhaca Society (supra) at 205–6; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 153ff, 165; Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 66ff; Ashton (supra) at 215.

[2] See Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 65. See also JL Comaroff 'Chieftainship in a South African Homeland' (1974) 1 Journal for Southern African Studies 36, 41 (Describes traditional authority as follows: '[t]he rights and duties of [a chief] are not immutably fixed: the chief and his subjects are thought to be involved in a perpetual transactional process in which the former discharges obligations and, in return, receives the accepted right to influence policy and command people. The degree to which his performance is evaluated as being satisfactory is held to determine the extent of his legitimacy, as expressed in the willingness of his people to execute his decisions.')

[3] See M Chanock The Making of South African Legal Culture 1902–1936: Fear, Favour and Prejudice (2000) 282ff n5.

[4] See Rathibe v Reid & Another 1926 AD 74, 81. But see AC Myburgh Die Inheemse Staat in Suider-Afrika (1986) 63ff (Notes considerable variation and contradiction in the sources.)

[5] See EH Brookes The History of Native Policy in South Africa from 1830 to the Present Day (1924) 90 and 93–4. More formally, British policy was justified by Ordinance 50 of 1828, which required equal treatment for all people in the Colony. See Mqeke (supra) at 75–8 (Brief history of the imposition of British rule in Ciskei and Transkei.)

beyond the Kei River, a similar, although modified form of government was introduced to the Transkeian territories.

A completely different policy developed in Natal.[1] There, Shepstone persuaded the colonial administration to give chiefs governmental and judicial powers,[2] under the leadership of the Lieutenant-Governor, who was deemed Supreme Chief of the African people.[3] In the Transvaal, during the short period of British rule from 1877 to 1881, the same regime was imposed, and, after the retrocession, it was retained.[4] As in Natal, traditional rulers were given both judicial and local government powers, subject to native commissioners and the overriding authority of the State President, who held the office of Paramount Chief.

The policy towards traditional rulers on the northern borders of the Cape colony was similar. In 1885, when Britain declared southern Bechuanaland a Crown colony and northern Bechuanaland a protectorate, traditional rulers were allowed to continue administering customary law more or less undisturbed.[5] Colonial courts had the power to try Africans only 'in the interests of peace, or for the prevention or punishment of acts of violence to persons or property.'[6] In 1895, southern Bechuanaland was incorporated into the Cape, but no attempt was made to impose Cape policy.

The Orange Free State could not be considered to have any fixed policy on traditional rulers. The rulers of the Rolong were allowed to continue governing their people in the Thaba'Nchu Reserve, and those of the small Witzieshoek Reserve were also given minor civil jurisdiction according to customary law, with appeal to the Commandant.[7]

With the exception of the Cape and the Free State, colonial rule in most parts of southern Africa left the customary powers of traditional rulers more or less intact. Although legally subordinate to settler governments, chiefs continued to be the main providers of law and order for their subjects. Nevertheless, in spite of this structure of indirect rule — a policy that Britain was later to implement throughout Africa — the subtle give-and-take of traditional government was gradually supplanted by a more authoritarian rule.[8]

Once African leaders became functionaries of colonial government, the central administration became the primary source of their power and authority, which in turn eroded any sense of accountability to those being governed.[9] In addition,

[1] See Brookes (supra) at 25.

[2] Ordinance 3 of 1849.

[3] Through this means the colonial government could rule African subjects by executive decree, rather than the normal legislative process. See D Welsh 'The State President's Powers under the Bantu Administration Act' 1968 Acta Juridica 81, 89–90.

[4] Law 4 of 1885. See Brookes (supra) at 130.

[5] Sections 31 and 32 of Proc 2 of 1885.

[6] Section 8 of an Order in Council of 10 June 1891.

[7] Law 9 of 1889. See H Rogers Native Administration in the Union of South Africa (2nd Edition, 1949) 102–3.

[8] See Mamdani (supra) at 52ff (Describes indirect rule as a system of 'decentralised despotism'.)

[9] See, eg, Ashton (supra) at 217; Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 149; Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at Chapter 8.

when the colonial powers imposed new provincial and international boundaries, the most effective method for protesting against unpopular rulers — secession — was lost, because those disaffected with a chief's rule were prevented from leaving the chiefdom to settle elsewhere.[1]

The most determined campaign to undermine traditional government was a scheme launched by the Cape administration in the district of Glen Grey in 1894.[2] For complex reasons to do mainly with excluding Africans from Parliament, people living in the area were subjected to new organs of partially elected location councils and more comprehensive district councils. What came to be known as 'the council system' was then extended to the Transkei,[3] where a general council (or Bhunga)[4] provided a model for future local government in rural areas.

In 1909, the South Africa Act vested control of 'native' affairs in the Governor-General in Council, who henceforth assumed all the special powers previously held by the governors of the colonies.[5] A national Department of Native Affairs was fashioned out of earlier colonial departments, and this body became the Governor-General's main executive authority.[6] One of the new Department's first tasks was to devise a uniform policy of local government for rural Africans.

The Native Affairs Act was passed in 1920.[7] This law, which represented a high-water mark in the policy of Cape paternalism, extended the Glen Grey council system nationwide. The councils set up under the Act were expected to attend to all the duties that elsewhere were performed by municipalities, such as the building of schools and hospitals and the improvement of agriculture. Councils had authority to make by-laws, prescribe fees for the services they rendered, and levy rates on adult males ordinarily resident within their areas of jurisdiction.

Those who drafted the Native Affairs Act envisaged a close cooperation between the councils and the Native Affairs Department, whereby Africans would be trained to achieve a western style of government under the tutelage of native commissioners. Great emphasis was placed on consultation, with mediation by the Native Affairs Commission.[8] As it turned out, however, very few councils were capable of managing the extensive duties prescribed in the Act,[9] and, within a decade, the entire system began to falter.[10]

[1] See Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 29.

[2] Act 25 of 1894 (Cape). See Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 84ff.

[3] Proclamation 352 of 1894. See Rogers (supra) at 40ff.

[4] This Council was formed by an amalgamation of the general councils for Transkei and Pondoland by Proclamation 279 of 1930.

[5] Section 147 of the South Africa Act of 1909.

[6] See Lord Hailey An African Survey: A Study of Problems Arising in Africa South of the Sahara (2nd Edition, 1945) 363ff.

[7] Act 23 of 1920.

[8] The Commission was an advisory body of independent experts (presided over by the Minister) which was established under the Native Affairs Act. Act 23 of 1920.

[9] See Rogers (supra) at 66.

[10] See S Dubow Racial Segregation and the Origins of Apartheid in South Africa, 1919–36 (1989) 107ff.

In any event, a new policy appeared during the course of the 1920s, one designed to 'retribalise' the African population and resurrect traditional rule.[1] In 1927, the government laid the statutory foundation for this policy: the Native Administration Act.[2] Although judicial powers over civil disputes were returned to the chiefs,[3] the state assumed wide powers of control over traditional institutions of government. These powers could be summed up in a single provision: s 1 of the Act made the Governor-General the Supreme Chief of all Africans. Acting in this capacity, he had full authority, with the advice of the Department of Native Affairs, to create and to divide tribes,[4] and to appoint any person he chose as a chief or headman.[5]

The Native Administration Act, although often amended, and now named the Black Administration Act, is still in force.[6] Traditional rulers who opposed the exercise of executive powers, no matter what popular legitimacy they might have enjoyed, could be ousted from office or passed over in matters of succession. Hence, although the Department of Native Affairs was generally prepared to make appointments from the ruling families, it was free to depart from the established order of succession by choosing uncles or younger brothers,[7] or by promoting subordinate headmen.[8] The outcome was a compliant cadre of 'traditional' leaders who provided the personnel needed to realize an increasingly unpopular state policy.[9] Especially after 1948, when the Nationalist Party came to power, chiefs became instrumental in enforcing (or at least facilitating) many of the hated apartheid controls.[10]

For another twenty years, the council system persisted alongside this supposedly traditional form of government, but, in areas where no councils had been

[1] The ultimate aim was to eliminate any vestiges of African participation in central government. This goal was achieved, formally, when the Representation of Natives Act removed Africans from the common voters' roll. Act 12 of 1936.

[2] Act 38 of 1927 ('NAA').

[3] NAA s 12. Later, under NAA s 20, chiefs were given minor criminal jurisdiction.

[4] NAA s 5(1)(a).

[5] NAA s 2(7).

[6] A bill to repeal the Black Administration Act is currently before Parliament: Repeal of the Black Administration Act and Amendment of Certain Laws Bill (2005). The Constitutional Court has commented on the need to repeal the Act on a number of occasions: Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at paras 1, 2, 41 and 93; Moseneke & Others v The Master & Another 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at para 21; Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha; Shibi v Sithole; SA Human Rights Commission v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 62–64.

[7] See W Beinart & C Bundy Hidden Struggles in Rural South Africa: Politics and Popular Movements in the Transkei and Eastern Cape, 1890–1930 (1987) 7.

[8] See I van Kessel & B Oomen '"One Chief, One Vote": The Revival of Traditional Authorities in Post-apartheid South Africa' (1997) 96 African Affairs 561, 563–4.

[9] See T Quinlan 'The Perpetuation of Myths: A Case Study in "Tribe" and "Chief" in South Africa' (1988) 27 J Legal Pluralism 79 (Study of the former homeland of Qwa Qwa.)

[10] Of course, not all traditional rulers were prepared to cooperate. Notable instances of resistance were Albert Luthuli, who was elected ANC president in 1952, and Sabata Dalindyebo and Morwamoche Sekhukune, in Transkei and Lebowa, respectively.

established, chiefs were allowed to continue exercising their customary powers. Eventually, the Bantu Authorities Act signalled the formal demise of the council system and a full return to traditional rule.[1] Under the new Act, the Governor-General could, with due regard to customary law, and after consultation with the tribe concerned, establish three tiers of authority in the reserves (which later became the bantustans): tribal, regional and territorial.[2] A tribal authority, which consisted of a chief (or headman) and his councillors, operated at the lowest level. It was responsible for administering the general affairs of a tribe and for advising and assisting the government.[3] Strictly speaking, the councils set up under the 1920 Native Affairs Act ceased to exist when new authorities were established in their areas of jurisdiction,[4] but, whenever possible, the Bantu authorities were simply grafted onto existing council structures.

The Bantu Authorities Act paved the way for the next stage in the apartheid programme: the creation of independent homelands. In 1959, the Promotion of Bantu Self-Government Act created eight (later nine) national units, and it provided a framework for their transition to self-government and ultimately full independence.[5] Africans now fell under the jurisdiction of one of the 'territorial authorities', and each of these authorities was allotted one or more of the bantustans as a 'national homeland'. Thus, the North-Sotho authority was allotted Lebowa, the South-Sotho Qwaqwa, the Swazi Kangwane, the Tsonga Gazankulu, the Tswana Bophuthatswana, the Venda Venda, the Ndebele KwaNdebele, the Xhosa Transkei and Ciskei, and the Zulu KwaZulu.

The Bantu Homelands Constitution Act of 1971 gave the State President power to create a legislative assembly for an area in which a territorial authority had been established under the Bantu Authorities Act.[6] This assembly could, in turn, be transformed into a fully self-governing territory. By this means, Transkei was granted independence in 1976, soon to be followed by Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei.[7] Chiefs ex officio occupied half the seats in the homeland legislative assemblies, thereby ensuring leading parties a solid basis of support.[8]

The intensified manipulation of traditional leadership under apartheid inevitably led to protest in the 1950s and early 1960s. Thereafter, however, open opposition to the enlisting of chiefs to conduct the business of apartheid government

[1] Act 68 of 1951 ('BAA').

[2] BAA s 2(1). BAA s 3 allowed the Governor-General (later the State President) to recognize tribal authorities that were already functioning according to the laws and customs of the tribes. Under BAA s 3(3), members of regional authority structures were drawn from the traditional rulers who constituted the tribal authorities.

[3] BAA s 4(1). Powers and duties were further specified under Proclamation R110 of 1957.

[4] BAA s 12.

[5] Act 46 of 1959.

[6] Act 21 of 1971, s 1.

[7] Independence was granted in 1976, 1979 and 1981, respectively.

[8] See C Tapscott 'The Institutionalisation of Rural Local Government in Post-Apartheid South Africa' in W Hofmeister & I Scholz (eds) Traditional and Contemporary Forms of Local Participation and Self-government in Africa (1997) 294.

declined until the late 1980s, when, ironically, the relaxation of the pass laws in 1986 led chiefs to become more, not less, authoritarian. Once the rural population could work in cities without passes, chiefs lost a substantial source of revenue that had accrued to them under the registration system. They replaced this income with 'tribal levies'. Sometimes these levies were for public services such as building a school or clinic, but often they were used for the direct benefit of the chief.[1]

Not unexpectedly, following growing anger and resistance to apartheid in the townships, political protests grew massively in rural areas. As Maloka & Gordon write:

> Unlike the 1950s-60s revolts, those of the period 1985–1990 were led by the youth and civic/resident associations against chiefs. These organs of civil society challenged the legitimacy and authority of these chiefs, demanding their resignation from Bantustan structures. Many villages consequently fell under the control of the youth and civic organisations, in line with the countrywide strategy of the ANC-aligned political organisations to render apartheid structures unworkable and create organs of "peoples' power" as an alternative. Thus many chiefs fled from their villages, governing from "exile".'[2]

The attitude of South Africa's internal resistance movement, the United Democratic Front, was clear: 'Chiefs must go and the people must run the villages.'[3] The brief (and influential) set of Constitutional Guidelines for a Democratic South Africa, which the exiled ANC circulated in 1988, was also alert to the problems that traditional leadership posed for its vision of a future democratic South Africa. The ANC, however, was less adamant in its wording: 'The institution of hereditary rulers and chiefs shall be transformed to serve the interests of the people as a whole in conformity with the democratic principles embodied in the constitution.'[4]

Traditional leaders were also adjusting to the times, and, in September 1987, 38 'progressive' chiefs met to form the Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa ('CONTRALESA'),[5] a body aligned to the ANC. CONTRALESA's Constitution stated that the organization:

[1] See Van Kessel & Oomen (supra) at 567 (Document a case in which a levy paid for nappies for the chief's children.)

[2] See T Maloka & D Gordon 'Chieftainship, Civil Society, and the Political Transition in South Africa' (1996) 22 Critical Sociology 37, 42.

[3] See Van Kessel & Oomen (supra) at 568. (Van Kessel & Oomen provide a fuller description of this period.) The United Democratic Front ('UDF') was, in effect, the internal arm of the exiled African National Congress ('ANC').

[4] ANC Constitutional Drafting Committee Constitutional Guidelines (1988) para C.

[5] See Maloka & Gordon (supra) at 42. CONTRALESA was created in 1987 in response to the division among traditional leaders in KwaNdebele on the question of independence. Chiefs who were opposed to independence, allied themselves to the UDF and formed the organization. In 1988 and 1989, CONTRALESA delegations were received by the ANC in Lusaka, and the party's media praised the contribution of the organization to the cause of liberation in the rural areas. See B Oomen 'Talking Tradition: The Position and Portrayal of Traditional Leaders in Present-day South Africa' (Unpublished MA thesis, University of Leiden, 1996)(manuscript on file with authors)(Oomen 'Talking Tradition').

> aim[ed] to unite all traditional leaders in the country, to fight for the eradication of the Bantustan system, to 'school the traditional leaders about the aims of the South African liberation struggle and their role in it', to win back 'the land of our forefathers and share it among those who work it in order to banish famine and land hunger' and to fight for a unitary, non-racial and democratic South Africa.[1]

Van Kessel & Oomen note that 'CONTRALESA emerged on the political scene couched in the discourse of liberation politics'.[2]

By June 1989, more than 80 per cent of the chiefs in the Transkei and 50 KwaZulu chiefs were members of CONTRALESA. The participation of Kwa-Zulu chiefs was especially significant, since Mangosuthu Buthelezi was Chief Minister of the Bantustan, and, after being condemned by the ANC in the early 1980s as 'an enemy of the people', he had become heavily dependent on the apartheid regime. He viewed CONTRALESA as an obvious threat to his power and ambitions, and he warned KwaZulu chiefs against joining.[3]

When, in 1990, the first tangible moves towards liberation were made in South Africa, the inevitable end of the bantustans became evident. Perhaps seeing the writing on the wall, increasing numbers of chiefs joined CONTRALESA.[4]

When the Interim Constitution was being drafted in 1993, views on traditional leadership were, to say the least, ambivalent. As an institution, the chieftaincy was said to encourage tribalism and ethnic division,[5] and, inevitably, it represented the interests of traditionalist males, rather than women, youths or the landless. A similar ambivalence marked views on the personal abilities of the existing chiefs. Obviously, the degree of efficiency and honesty varied from individual to individual, and so, too, did the degree of control exercised by the state, but many rulers were said to be incompetent and corrupt.[6] Even those who were considered competent rulers were usually too conservative and hardly any had the financial and managerial skills needed to perform the tasks of modern public officials.[7]

All of these views could have been anticipated. Chiefly rulers had long been expected to play the difficult, and often quite contradictory, roles of patriarchal

[1] See Van Kessel & Oomen (supra) at 569 quoting from Race Relations Survey 1987–1988 (1988) 922.
[2] See Van Kessel & Oomen (supra) at 569. See also Maloka & Gordon (supra) at 42.
[3] See Maloka & Gordon (supra) at 43.
[4] See Van Kessel & Oomen (supra) at 571.
[5] Ibid at 572.
[6] See Tapscott (supra) at 294–6; CR Cross 'Landholding Systems in African Rural Areas' in M De Klerk (ed) A Harvest of Discontent (1991) 73; CR Cross 'The Land Question in Kwa-Zulu: Is Land Reform Necessary?' (1987) 4 Development SA 428, 437–8; Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 211; WD Hammond Tooke 'Chieftainship in Transkeian Political Development' (1964) 2 J Mod Afr Studies 313, 320–1.
[7] See '1986 Report on Workshop on Land Tenure and Rural Development' (1987) 4 Development SA 375–7.

leaders and state bureaucrats.[1] The result was a serious discrepancy between the demands of central government and local communities.[2] What is more, few chiefs had the resources needed to develop the rural economy or deliver the basic services expected of modern local authorities. Not only was the homeland infrastructure hopelessly inadequate — and, because of apartheid, bizarrely fragmented — but it was also incapable of generating a proper revenue base. For many years, the homelands had relied heavily on handouts from the central government and, of course, remittances from urban workers.

Dissatisfaction with traditional rule was not peculiar to South Africa. At the time of decolonisation, similar views could be found in most parts of Africa.[3] Even so, few of the newly independent states could afford to dispense with traditional authorities, and attempts made to depose or sideline them nearly always resulted in failure.[4] The main reason for the resilience of traditional authority was clearly popular support for the institution, if not the individual office-holder.[5]

What is more, chiefs were well positioned to run an adaptable form of community government.[6] In spite of all its faults, and in the absence of viable alternatives, the chieftaincy is more in touch with local sentiment than a central state bureaucracy. For many ordinary people, their rulers are a 'legal and constitutional horizon', a 'personification of the moral and political order, protection against injustice, unseemly behaviour, evil and calamity'.[7]

26.4 Constitutional Negotiations and the Final Constitution

In 1991, when the Convention for a Democratic South Africa met to negotiate a new constitution, traditional leaders had no formal status, and their demands to [1] See AKH Weinrich Chiefs and Councils in Rhodesia (1971)(For a detailed study); N Miller 'The Political Survival of Traditional Leadership (1986) 6 J Mod Afr Studies 183 (General analysis of role conflicts). See also H Kuckertz Creating Order: The Image of the Homestead in Mpondo Social Life (1990) 74; Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus (supra) at 212; EAB Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 'Chiefs and African States: Some Introductory Notes and an Extensive Bibliography on African Chieftaincy' (1987) 25 & 26 J Legal Pluralism 1 (Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 'Chiefs and African States') 28.

[2] See EAB Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 'State and Chiefs: Are Chiefs Mere Puppets?' (1996) 37 & 38 Journal of Legal Pluralism 39, 64.

[3] See Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 'Chiefs and African States' (supra) at 6–7.

[4] See KO Adinkrah 'Legitimacy and Tradition in Swaziland' (1991) 24 CILSA 226.

[5] See Comaroff (supra) at 38; Haines & Tapscott (supra) at 167–8. Chiefs have also been active in protecting their own interests. In this regard, they have been able to draw on the powerful legitimating force of tradition. See B Oomen 'We Must Now Go Back to Our History: Retraditionalisation in a Northern Province Chieftaincy' (2000) 59 Afr Studies 71ff.

[6] A brief opinion survey conducted in South African in 1994, for instance, showed that two-thirds of the population were willing to support traditional rulers. See N Pillay & C Prinsloo 'The Changing Face of 'Traditional Courts' (1995) 28 De Jure 386 ff. See also RB Mqeke Basic Approaches to Problem Solving in Customary Law: A Study of Conciliation and Consensus Among the Cape Nguni (1997) 166. More recently, evidence is emerging that the failure of local government in rural areas is causing people to turn back to their traditional leaders for basic needs.

[7] See Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 'Chiefs and African States' (supra) at 23.

be included in the proceedings were rejected. They were not without a voice, however, for their interests were represented by the Inkatha Freedom Party, delegations from homeland governments and individual members of political parties. For the ANC, too — despite opposition of organizations aligned to the liberation struggle — chiefs represented an important rural support base. Hence, the ANC was quick to take advantage of the prospect of their support, and the early stages of the transition in government were 'characterised by enthusiasm and co-operation between the ANC and chiefs'.[1]

In 1993, the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum admitted constituencies of traditional leaders, largely as a result of efforts by CONTRALESA and bargains struck with the ANC. Traditional rulers won significant, although temporary, constitutional victories.[2] Under the Interim Constitution, and notwithstanding the constitutional revolution underway, they were allowed to continue exercising all the powers and functions they held under customary law and 'applicable laws', including the Black Authorities Act (although now specifically subject to amendment or repeal).[3]

In addition, they were given new positions in the local, provincial and national spheres of government. At the lowest level, traditional rulers had ex officio membership of the municipal structures being created in their areas.[4] At provincial level, all provinces containing traditional authorities were obliged to establish houses of traditional leaders,[5] and, at national level, a similar provision obliged Parliament to create a council (now called a house) of traditional leaders.[6] Although these new bodies lacked law-making powers, they could advise and make proposals on matters concerning traditional authority and customary law, and any bills on these topics had to be referred to them.[7]

Potentially much more significant than the temporary powers granted to traditional leaders under the Interim Constitution was a guarantee that the status of traditional leaders would be specially protected in the Final Constitution. Constitutional Principle XIII.1 of the Interim Constitution stipulated that the institution

[1] Maloka & Gordon (supra) at 44.

[2] The chiefs' proposals were set out in a document submitted to the Negotiating Council 'Joint Position Paper concerning Role of Traditional Leaders' (13 August 1993). See C Albertyn 'Women and the Transition to Democracy in South Africa' in C Murray (ed) Gender and the New South African Legal Order (1994) 39.

[3] IC s 181(1). The 'applicable laws' in this section referred, inter alia, to the various enactments by the homeland governments specifying the powers and duties of traditional rulers: Transkei Authorities Act 4 of 1965; Bophuthatswana Traditional Authorities Act 23 of 1978; Venda Traditional Leaders Administration Proc 29 of 1991; Ciskei Administrative Authorities Act 37 of 1984; Qwa Qwa Administration of Authorities Act 6 of 1983; KwaNdebele Traditional Authorities Act 2 of 1984; and KwaZulu Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Act 9 of 1990.

[4] IC s 182.

[5] IC s 183(1)(a). IC ss 183(1)(b) and (c) stipulated that the Houses had to be established in consultation with the traditional authorities resident within the province.

[6] IC s 184.

[7] The new organs could delay the passing of a Bill. See IC s 183(2)(d)(Regarding the provincial Houses); IC s 184(5)(c)(Regarding the national Council). A veto on legislation delayed passage of a bill for 30 days.

of traditional leadership, as determined by indigenous law, was to be recognized and protected. Moreover, in an implicit acknowledgement of how anomalous traditional leadership appeared in the new constitutional order, Constitutional Principle XVII provided that, although democratic representation was to prevail in all spheres of government, this principle did not derogate from the provisions of Principle XIII.[1]

Traditional leaders had no formal representatives at the Constitutional Assembly, which drafted the Final Constitution. As a result, the gains of 1993 were largely lost.[2] FC s 211(1) appears to capture Principle XIII.1, almost to the letter: '[t]he institution, status and role of traditional leadership, according to customary law, are recognised, subject to the Constitution.'[3] However, FC s 211(2) significantly qualifies what appears to be a blanket confirmation of the status quo by providing that 'a traditional authority that observes a system of customary law may function subject to any applicable legislation and customs, which includes amendments to, or repeal of, that legislation or those customs.'

FC s 212(2) rounds off the series of provisions on traditional leaders by allowing, but not requiring, a national council of traditional leaders and provincial houses of traditional leaders to be established in order '[t]o deal with matters relating to traditional leadership, the role of traditional leaders, customary law and the customs of communities observing a system of customary law.' As for the political role of traditional leadership, under FC s 212(1), 'national legislation may provide for a role for traditional leadership as an institution at local level on matters affecting local communities.' FC s 143(1) provides a footnote. In accordance with Constitutional Principle XIII.2, it states that a provincial constitution

[1] See A Donkers & R Murray in South Africa' in B De Villiers (ed) The Rights of Indigenous People: A Quest for Coexistence (1997) 39, 47.

[2] For a description, see TRH Davenport The Transfer of Power in South Africa (1998) 70; C Murray 'South Africa's Troubled Royalty: Traditional Leaders after Democracy' Law and Policy Paper 23, Centre for International and Public Law, Australian National University (2004)(manuscript on file with authors). The weakness of the provisions relating to traditional leadership reflect the fact that the champion of chiefly power, the IFP, had boycotted most of the Constitutional Assembly proceedings because the government refused to enter into international mediation over the position of the Zulu monarch in accordance with a Memorandum of Agreement between the erstwhile South African government, the ANC and the IFP (signed on 19 April 1994). An additional factor explaining the absence of any solid entrenchment of chiefly powers in the Final Constitution was the waning influence of CONTRALESA within the ANC and the activities of the organization's controversial president Phatekile Holomisa. CONTRALESA became estranged from the ANC after Holomisa called for a boycott of the local government elections in areas under traditional authority and began associating with senior officials of the IFP. Like the IFP, CONTRALESA opposed certification of the 1996 Constitution on the ground that it made inadequate provision for traditional leadership and customary law. See 'Tension in ANC over Traditional Leaders' Weekly Mail & Guardian (8 December 1995). See, on the relationship between the ANC and CONTRALESA, Oomen 'Talking Tradition' (supra).

[3] FC s 212(1) reads: 'National legislation may provide for a role for traditional leadership as an institution at local level on matters affecting local communities.' The indeterminate language in this section, however, gives Parliament authority to reduce chiefly powers in local government.

'may provide for … the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch, where applicable.'[1]

When the Final Constitution was being drafted, traditional leaders did not revive, with any conviction, claims they had made in 1993 that customary law should be shielded from application of the Bill of Rights and, in particular, the equality clause. The Bill of Rights expressly states that that both the rights 'to use the language and participate in the cultural life of [one's] choice' (in FC s 30) and rights concerning membership of cultural, religious and linguistic communities (in FC s 31) were to be subject to the other provisions of the Bill of Rights.[2]

When it came to certifying the Final Constitution, the IFP argued that FC s 211, and especially FC s 212, failed to realize the Constitutional Principles, because the powers of traditional leaders had been subjected to national legislation and not customary law. In the First Certification Judgment, the Court rejected this argument. The judgment nonetheless contains a clear statement of the tension between the claims of traditional leadership and the values of the Final Constitution:

> In a purely republican democracy, in which no differentiation of status on grounds of birth is recognised, no constitutional space exists for the official recognition of any traditional leaders, let alone a monarch. Similarly, absent an express authorisation for the recognition of indigenous law, the principle of equality before the law … could be read as presupposing a single and undifferentiated legal regime for all South Africans with no scope for the application of customary law — hence the need for expressly articulated CPs [Constitutional Principles] recognising a degree of cultural pluralism with legal and cultural, but not necessarily governmental, consequences.[3]

Because traditional leadership is at odds with republican democracy, the explicit protection of its role in the Constitutional Principles was necessary if it was to survive. The First Certification Judgment Court reminds us that, although the Kempton Park agreement required the Final Constitution to recognize a degree of cultural pluralism, it contained no mandatory requirement that traditional leaders be given a role in government. The Court added:

> The CA [Constitutional Assembly] cannot be constitutionally faulted for leaving the complicated, varied and ever-developing specifics of how such leadership should function in the wider democratic society, and how customary law should develop and be interpreted, to future social evolution, legislative deliberation and judicial interpretation.[4]

[1] Clause 2 was added to Constitutional Principle XIII by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 3 of 1994, following the Memorandum of Agreement between the South African government, the ANC and the IFP (signed on 19 April 1994). The Act also amended s 160 of the Interim Constitution to require that the provincial constitution of KwaZulu-Natal make provision for the institution, status and role of the Zulu monarch.

[2] See I Currie 'Community Rights: Culture, Religion and Language' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 58.

[3] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of SA, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 195.

[4] Ibid at para 197.

The Constitutional Court therefore treated FC ss 211 and 212 as constitutionally entrenching the existence of traditional leadership, leaving the legislature to deal with traditional leaders' future political role. It followed that whatever legislation was to be enacted could provide for a diminished, even a nominal or purely symbolic, function for chiefs, thereby drastically restricting powers under customary law. But the legislature could not abolish the institution of traditional leadership or customary law altogether.

The Court maintained this approach in the Second Certification Judgment, when it addressed an objection that the revised draft of the Constitution did not comply with Constitutional Principle XIII.2 (requiring recognition and protection of provisions in a provincial constitution relating to the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch). It was argued that FC ss 143 and 147(1), dealing with provincial constitutions and with conflicts between national legislation and the provision of a provincial constitution, recognized the power to provide for a traditional monarchy as required by Constitutional Principle XIII.2, but did not give effect to the requirement of protection. The sections meant that provisions in a provincial constitution dealing with traditional monarchs were liable to be overridden by national legislation.[1]

The Court disagreed. It found that Constitutional Principle XIII.2 did not require the provisions about traditional monarchy in a provincial constitution to be given a position of supremacy in the national Constitution, thereby allowing them to prevail over all other protected interests. Instead, the only requirement was that the monarchy be given the recognition and protection needed to carry out its traditional role and to maintain its status and authority, consistent with the constraints inherent in a republican and wholly democratic constitutional order.[2]

Three other constitutional provisions relate to traditional leaders. These are FC s 166, which describes the courts of South Africa and implicitly includes traditional courts, s 219, on remuneration, and Schedule 4. We deal with each of these issues below. Here we should note that only one of these provisions has a direct impact on the powers of traditional leaders. Constitutional questions concerning the powers of national and provincial governments over traditional leaders and traditional communities (of which the remuneration of traditional leaders forms part) are not disputes that concern their powers.

As we have seen, the Constitution is clear on the powers of traditional leaders. It does not grant them powers beyond those contained in their status as guardians of traditional culture. In every sphere of government, their constitutional role has been reduced from that granted under the Interim Constitution. Hence, as noted above, the Final Constitution allows provincial constitutions to make provision for traditional monarchs, and it allows the establishment of houses of traditional leaders at both national and provincial level (although these organs may no longer delay the passing of legislation). Similarly, although traditional leadership may be given a role 'at local level', traditional leaders are constitutionally excluded from voting membership of local councils,[1] and, as the reference in FC s 212(1) to 'local level', rather than 'the local sphere of government' or 'local government', reminds us, they have no constitutionally guaranteed role in local government. The fact that Chapter 12 — Traditional Leaders — is located towards the end of the Final Constitution, and is separated from chapters dealing with the main institutions of government, reflects the view expressed by the Constitutional Court that the role of traditional leadership may not be governmental.

[1] See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of SA, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 96–98.

[2] Sufficient protection for purposes of Constitutional Principle XIII.2 was provided by FC s 143(1), as read with FC ss 74(3) and 41. See First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 99–105.

While the Constitutional Assembly might have been resolute in limiting real grants of power to traditional leaders in the Final Constitution, in practice it has proved much more difficult to reach a workable arrangement between traditional leaders and the government. That the former are still a force to be reckoned with is evident from their ongoing protests, which intensify each time elections approach.

According to unverified figures, there are 12 kings or queens and 773 chiefs, supported by 1 640 headmen.[2] Approximately 18 million people, about 40 per cent of the South African population, are said to be subject to traditional rule.[3] Although this figure may be inflated — a recent poll indicates that in the year under review only eight per cent of black South Africans consulted a traditional leader for an important problem or to express their views[4] — the volatile political situation in KwaZulu-Natal and the perceived ability of traditional leaders to influence elections has ensured that they still have influence.

Section 26.5 considers the institution of traditional leadership in the context of South Africa's system of multi-sphere government. Section 26.6 focuses on government by traditional leaders, paying particular attention to the role traditional leaders play in relation to land.

26.5 Traditional Government in the Multi-Sphere System

Although the Constitutional Court has made it very clear that the Final Constitution does not demand a role in government for traditional leaders, the emerging framework of national and provincial laws establishes them as organs of state with governmental responsibilities. As a result, the principles of co-operative government set out in Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution apply to traditional

[1] See FC s 57(1).

[2] These are the numbers of traditional leaders remunerated by the government. See White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (2003), available at http://www.info.gov.za/gazette/bills/2003/b58-03.pdf (accessed on 20 July 2004) 49.

[3] See C Botha The Role of Traditional Leaders in Local Government in South Africa (Konrad Adenauer Foundation, 1994) 29.

[4] See R Mattes, AB Chikwana & A Magezi South Africa: After a Decade of Democracy (2005), available at http://www.afrobarometer.org/SAF-FinalSummaryResults16MAR05.pdf (accessed on 27 September 2005). The survey was conducted in 2004.

leaders and to their relationships with the national, provincial and local spheres of government. The system of houses of traditional leaders, which is to be expanded under the new Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act,[1] and the repeated assertions in that Act of the responsibility of both provincial and national government to support traditional institutions, confirms the national government's intention to relate to traditional leaders and councils in accordance with the Chapter 3 principles.

The imperative to transform traditional systems of government remains. The preamble to the Traditional Leadership Act obliges the state to 'respect, protect and promote' traditional leaders 'in accordance with the dictates of democracy in South Africa' and requires transformation of the institution of traditional leadership 'in harmony with the Constitution'. The first move towards this change came about with new legislation regulating the composition of traditional houses and councils.

(a) Traditional communities and councils

During the colonial and apartheid eras, indigenous polities and their political structures changed remarkably little. Of course, the territorial expanse of these domains was drastically reduced, and, especially in the Cape and Transkei, attempts were made to remodel chieftaincies on the British idea of a local authority. By and large, however, central government simply grafted new institutions onto what was already there.

The Traditional Leadership Act, together with provincial legislation, has now swept away this entire regime. The Traditional Leadership Act states that 'tribes' which were previously recognized by the state are now deemed to be traditional communities.[2] In addition, under s 2, a community may be recognized as a traditional community provided that it '(a) is subject to a system of traditional leadership in terms of that community's functions; and (b) observes a system of customary law'. Draft provincial legislation in each of the six provinces with traditional leaders gives premiers the authority to recognize (and withdraw recognition from) traditional communities. Following instructions in the Traditional Leadership Act, the draft provincial laws require consultation with the provincial house of traditional leaders, any king or queen under whose authority the community would fall and consultation with the community itself.[3]

[1] Act 41 of 2003 ('TLGFA' or 'Traditional Leadership Act').

[2] TLGFA s 28(3).

[3] See Limpopo Traditional Leadership and Institutions Bill (2005) clause 3; North West Traditional Leadership and Institutions Bill (2004) clause 3; Mpumalanga Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 3; KwaZulu-Natal Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 2; Free State Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 3; Eastern Cape Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 5.

Once a traditional community is recognized, the Act provides that it must establish a traditional council 'in line with principles set out in provincial legislation', and, presumably, in line with the requirements relating to their composition set out in the national Act itself.[1] These latter provisions have been a bitter pill for traditional leaders to swallow, as they require one third of the members of the council to be women and 40 per cent to be democratically elected for terms of five years.[2]

The Act allows the premier to set a lower number for the participation of women 'where it has been proved that an insufficient number of women are available to participate in a traditional council.' It is hard to imagine, however, when this would be the case, since women make up at least half the population of every community in South Africa. Under one possible interpretation, this provision could be used if not enough women make themselves available to serve on councils. The danger with this approach, however, is that it may thwart the goal of involving women. In many rural areas there is strong resistance to women participating in government, and, unless there is real pressure on communities to ensure that women do become involved in the councils, change may never occur.

Some feminists think differently. They argue that, by including women in traditional councils (and the houses of traditional leaders), government can give the appearance of promoting women at no cost and without meaningful change. On this view, the women who serve on these bodies, in a context in which their views are not respected and in which they do not contribute in meaningful ways, will simply serve the purposes of men, thereby legitimating deeply unequal practices. From this perspective, meaningful change will occur only if women are properly empowered — educated and employed — and they should not participate in the new structures until these goals have been achieved. This approach fails to take seriously the reciprocal effect that political power and individual agency have on one another. Because the legislature has few tools with which to change culture in traditional communities, the right to participate in councils is an important way of creating space for women. Although there is disturbing evidence that women are not active participants in many of the bodies on which they serve at the moment, the new legal requirements ensure that, when they wish to engage more actively, they will not have to fight for their place.

Under the Act, tribal authorities already in existence when the Act came into effect were deemed to be traditional councils, but they were given a year within which to comply with the requirements regarding the composition of councils.[3] The implications of failure to observe these provisions are unclear, since the Traditional Leadership Act does not allow recognition of community status to be withdrawn in these circumstances. It may be that councils that do not comply will not be entitled to enter service delivery agreements with the municipalities

[1] TLGFA s 3(1).
[2] TLGFA ss 3*(b)* and (c).
[3] That date passed on 24 September 2005.

under which they fall, but this consequence is not stated expressly.[1] Another possibility is that non-compliant traditional communities will not receive the governmental support contemplated in the Act. But even this is not necessarily the case.

In fact, it is the Communal Land Rights Act that provides the main incentive for transforming the composition of councils.[2] Under this Act, communally-owned land must be administered by a Land Administration Committee, and a traditional council may act as such a Committee only if it is recognized. Indeed, the Communal Land Rights Act supplements the requirements of the Traditional Leadership Act, obliging councils to ensure membership of a person who can represent 'the interests of vulnerable community members, including women, children and the youth, the elderly and the disabled', together with various non-voting members designated by other interested parties in the area.[3]

The newly constituted councils are intended to take over the role of the chiefs' councils of the past. The Act requires them to 'administer the affairs of the traditional community in accordance with customs and tradition' and to advise local government on various matters.[4] The Act does not clarify the relationship between councils and traditional leaders, however, because it appears to assume that this issue will be settled under customary law.

At present, the power to determine the boundaries of traditional areas is still vested in the President,[5] but the imminent repeal of the Black Administration Act will change this situation. The new arrangements have two components. First, the Traditional Leadership Act requires a Commission on Traditional Leadership Disputes and Claims to deal with existing disputes about boundaries.[6] Secondly, it appears that provinces are expected to replace the provisions of the Black Administration Act with their own legislation. The various draft provincial bills on traditional leadership do not have a uniform method for dealing with the boundaries of traditional communities. Some give the Premier the power to determine boundaries,[7] some give the Premier this power only when the Commission on Traditional Leadership Disputes agrees to a boundary change,[8] and one is simply silent on the matter.[9]

[1] The Local Government: Municipal Systems Act allows municipalities to enter service delivery agreements with 'traditional authorities'. Act 32 of 2000. See also TLGFA s 5(3).

[2] Act 11 of 2004.

[3] See TLGFA s 21(3), as read with ss 22 (4) and (5).

[4] See TLGFA s 4(1).

[5] See TLGFA s 1, as read with s 5 of the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927.

[6] See TLGFA s 25(2)(a)(v).

[7] See Limpopo Traditional Leadership and Institutions Bill (2005) clause 20; North West Traditional Leadership and Institutions Bill (2004) clause 5; and Mpumalanga Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 16.

[8] See KwaZulu-Natal Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 16; Free State Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004) clause 17. This approach is problematic, because, under the national Traditional Leadership Act, the life of the Commission is limited to five years.

[9] See Eastern Cape Traditional Leadership and Governance Bill (2004). Presumably the power is implied in the Premier's power to recognize and to withdraw recognition from traditional communities.

(b) The Houses of Traditional Leaders

Although the Final Constitution no longer requires houses to be established for traditional leaders, leaving this possibility entirely within the discretion of the national and provincial governments, the number of houses is set to expand. This is because, in addition to the national and provincial houses of traditional leaders established under the Interim Constitution, the Traditional Leadership Act requires provinces to establish local houses of traditional leaders for each district municipality or metropolitan municipality in which there is more than one senior traditional leader.[1] If one takes into account traditional councils operating at local municipal level, this means that there will be a house or council of traditional leaders at every level of government in South Africa: local, district, provincial and national. Nevertheless, an important distinction is to be drawn between traditional councils and the local, provincial and national houses: the latter have advisory powers only, whereas the traditional councils are intended to be central to traditional community decision-making.

In 1994 and 1995, as required by the Interim Constitution, six of South Africa's new provinces established houses of traditional leaders.[2] None were established in Gauteng or the Western Cape, and, as yet, none have been established in the Northern Cape, where Khoi and San authorities are only now beginning to emerge.[3] In 1997, Parliament constituted a Council of Traditional Leaders for the entire country,[4] which changed its name to the National House of Traditional Leaders in 1998.[5]

[1] See TLGFA s 17.

[2] See Free State House of Traditional Leaders Act 6 of 1994 ('Free State TLA'); KwaZulu- Natal House of Traditional Leaders Act 7 of 1994 ('KwaZulu-Natal TLA'); North West House of Traditional Leaders Act 12 of 1994 ('North West TLA'); Limpopo House of Traditional Leaders Act 6 of 1994 ('Limpopo TLA'); Eastern Cape House of Traditional Leaders Act 1 of 1995 ('Eastern Cape TLA'), as amended by Traditional Affairs Notice 13 ECP 1326 of 8 April 2005; and Mpumalanga House of Traditional Leaders Act 4 of 1994 ('Mpumalanga TLA'). As of 3 May 2005, several bills were awaiting consideration: House of Traditional Leaders Amendment Bill 2004 (Eastern Cape) 18 ECP 1274 of 7 February 2005; House of Traditional Leaders Amendment Bill 2003 (Free State) 5 FSP of 5 September 2003; and House of Traditional Leaders Amendment Bill 2004 (North West) 531 NWP 6086 of 19 November 2004. The remaining three provinces did not establish Houses, as only provinces 'in which there are traditional authorities' were required to do so.

[3] Initially, there was lobbying for the establishment of a seventh House in Gauteng. See B Oomen 'Talking Tradition: The Position and Portrayal of Traditional Leaders in Present Day South Africa' (Unpublished MA thesis, University of Leiden, 1996) 83. See also International Labour Office Project for the Rights of Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Indigenous Peoples of South Africa: Current Trends (1999) 20.

[4] Council of Traditional Leaders Act 10 of 1997 ('CTLA'). This statute repealed Act 31 of 1994 of the same name, which never came into force.

[5] Council of Traditional Leaders Amendment Act 85 of 1998. There are differing views on why the name was changed. The Deputy Chairperson, Kgosi Kutama, has given two reasons: a desire for uniformity with provincial institutions, and the fact that there are many councils and that the name was therefore confusing. (Telephone interview with K Kutama, 3 August 2005.) A more likely reason is that the word 'house' suggests a legislative body (which is what many traditional leaders believe that the Houses should be) while a council is more obviously an advisory body. The Amendment Act refers to the house as 'a council to be known as the National House of Traditional Leaders.' s 2(1). In addition, the Amendment Act changed the name of the CTLA to National House of Traditional Leaders Act ('NHTLA').

As yet, no local house of traditional leaders has been established in district municipalities, as the necessary enabling legislation has not been passed in the provinces. Nevertheless, the Traditional Leadership Act is detailed in its requirements, and, unless a province takes the unusual step of designing local houses to suit its own particular ideas, the houses will have up to 20 members chosen by an electoral college consisting of the traditional leaders in the district concerned.[1] Their relationship to the district municipality within which they fall will be very similar to that of traditional councils to local municipalities.

(i) Composition

The National House of Traditional Leaders has 18 members, each of whom serves five-year terms of office.[2] The number of members in the provincial houses is also usually fixed — the limits range from 18 to 36[3] — and these members also serve five-year terms of office.[4] KwaZulu-Natal is the exception: the enabling legislation sets no limit on the number of members or on the length of the term of office.[5] Under the Traditional Leadership Act, local houses must have between five and ten members.

Membership of the houses is determined by nomination, election or a combination of the two. In the case of the National House, each of the six provincial houses nominates three members.[6] In the case of the provincial houses, however, membership is determined in different ways. In KwaZulu-Natal, some members are nominated by groups specified in the Act and others are elected by regional authorities.[7] In the Eastern Cape, the Premier, assisted by committees of the provincial legislature, is authorized to establish rules for the nomination of members by traditional authorities.[8] Members of the Limpopo House are elected from and by members of districts in the province.[9] In the Free State, members are nominated by the traditional authorities in the province,[10] and in the North West members are elected from defined groups.[11] In Mpumalanga, all the traditional [1] As traditional leadership is a Schedule 4 matter, provincial legislation need not follow the national Act to the letter. Variation is possible, and, if conflicts arise, they would be resolved under FC s 146.

[2] See NHTLA s 3(1).

[3] North West TLA s 3(1) stipulates 24 members; Mpumalanga TLA s 3(1) 21 members; Eastern Cape TLA s 3(1) 20 members; Free State TLA s 3(1) 18 members; and Limpopo TLA s 3(1) 36 members.

[4] See North West TLA s 3(2)(a); Eastern Cape TLA s 3(4); Free State TLA s 3(2); Limpopo TLA s 3(3). Mpumalanga TLA s 3(3), in addition, makes special provision for members to be re-elected.

[5] See KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 5.

[6] See NHTLA s 4.

[7] See KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 5.

[8] See Eastern Cape TLA s 3(2), as amended by Notice 13 ECP 1726 (8 April 2005).

[9] See Limpopo TLA s 3(1). The Act does not specify whether members of the districts should be traditional authorities.

[10] See Limpopo TLA s 3. Cf the House of Traditional Leaders Amendment Bill 2003 5 FSP 74 (5 September 2003).

[11] See North West TLA s 3.

leaders in the province constitute an electoral college, which then elects members to the House.[1] Members of the local houses will be elected by an electoral college composed of all the senior traditional leaders in the district.[2]

No concession is made to the principles of gender equality or popular democracy in the existing statutes establishing the houses. The Traditional Leadership Act, however, intends to correct this. Section 16(3) cautiously requires provincial legislation to provide for 'mechanisms or procedures that would allow a sufficient number of women (a) to be represented in the provincial houses of traditional leaders concerned; and (b) to be elected as representatives … to the National House'. Currently, members of the houses are chosen by their peers, and, in all but one case, the only eligible candidates are traditional rulers.[3] By implication, therefore, members will generally be male and belong to a ruling dynasty.[4]

The North West province permits a minor exception to this rule: the Executive Council may appoint four persons to the House on the basis of their expertise in and experience with customary law. The Traditional Leadership Act also states, rather vaguely, that the electoral college constituted to elect members to local houses must 'seek to elect a sufficient number of women to make the local house of traditional leaders representative of the traditional leaders within the area of jurisdiction in question'.[5] Clearly, no affirmative action is envisaged, but each of the houses apparently has women among its members.

Members of Parliament or a provincial legislature may not be members of the National House.[6] On introducing this provision, the government argued that the disqualification was designed to prevent the Council, whose principal function was to advise the legislature, from being made up of members from the very institutions it would be advising. The National Party (as it then was) and the Inkatha Freedom Party were unimpressed with this explanation. There was no disqualification of members of provincial or national legislatures from serving as members of provincial houses. Indeed, the chairman of the KwaZulu-Natal House of Traditional Leaders — Mangosuthu Buthelezi — was a member of Parliament and a Cabinet Minister. The opponents of the Act treated the disqualification as an 'anti-Buthelezi clause', specifically aimed at keeping Buthelezi out of the Council. Whatever the reason for introducing the disqualification, however, it is based on a sound principle: active membership of a political party, which [1] See North West TLA s 1 of Schedule 1, as read with s 3(2).

[2] TLGFA s 17(2)(b).

[1] Any challenge to the validity of this legislation could presumably be met by the argument that the Constitution makes special provision for the continued recognition of traditional authorities, and, if the agnatic system of succession were abolished, these authorities would no longer be 'traditional'. See AJ Kerr 'Customary Law, Fundamental Rights, and the Constitution' (1994) 111 SALJ 720, 727 (On IC s 211).

[2] See North West TLA s 3*(b). Otherwise, under ss 3(1)(a)* and 3(4)(a), members of the House must be dikgosi, dikgosigadi, dikgosana or regents.

[3] See North West TLA s 17(1)(c).

[4] See NHTLA s 4.

membership of a legislature must mean, is incompatible with the role of traditional leaders (which is to be guided by the general good of the community in all matters, and to fulfil their functions without regard to party affiliation). The same principle should be extended to the provincial and local houses.

(ii) Powers

The powers of the provincial and national houses were initially laid down in the Interim Constitution and their constitutive acts, and were then modified in the Final Constitution. The principal functions of the National House are to advise government or the President,[1] and to make recommendations on questions of traditional leadership, customary law and the customs of communities observing systems of customary law.[2] The House may also investigate these matters and disseminate information.[3] Every year, it must submit a report to Parliament on its activities.[4]

With one significant exception, Parliament and the executive are not obliged to seek advice, although, presumably, the National House is entitled to volunteer its opinion whenever it wishes. Even if advice has been sought and given, neither Parliament nor the President is obliged to take account of it (and the Final Constitution omits any mention of the House's limited power under the Interim Constitution to delay the passage of bills). The House therefore plays a strictly advisory role, even in matters concerning traditional leadership or customary law.

The exception was introduced in 2003 by the Traditional Leadership Act which, in s 18(1), obliges Parliament to refer bills concerning 'customary law or customs of traditional communities' to the National House before they are passed. The House must comment, if it so wishes, within 30 days.

This section was the subject of some controversy in Parliament because certain legal advisers argued that it attempted to add a requirement to the constitutional rules for the passage of legislation. Such changes are not permitted by an ordinary Act, but only by an amendment to the Final Constitution. The opposing view was that the provision did not change the decision-making rules, because it dealt only with Parliament's internal processes. According to this view, the provision (like timetabling, agenda setting and other decisions concerning who should be

[1] See NHTLA s 7(2)(c). The advisory role of the National House (and its provincial counterparts) may be more significant than traditional leaders currently are prepared to admit. For instance, when Bhe, which dealt with the customary law of succession and the principle of male primogeniture was entered on the roll, the Constitutional Court notified the House, hoping that it would make submissions. None, however, were received. See Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha; Shibi v Sithole; SA Human Rights Commission v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 4.

[2] See NHTLA s 7(2)(a). The objects of the House are described, in NHTLA s 7(1), as promoting the role of traditional leadership within a democratic constitutional dispensation, enhancing unity and understanding among traditional communities and enhancing co-operation between the National House and the Provincial Houses.

[3] See NHTLA s 7(2)(b).

[4] See NHTLA s 7(2)(d).

consulted in the law-making process) did not need to be incorporated in the Final Constitution. Evidently — and correctly — the latter view carried the day. It also gave government the best of both worlds: a constitutional amendment to secure chiefly powers for an indefinite period was unpalatable, while traditional leaders would not have been content with a provision in the internal rules of Parliament, because these are too easily changed.

The provincial houses also enjoy a right to insist that provincial legislatures refer to them any bills on customary law or traditional leadership.[1] The houses then have 30 days within which to comment.[2] If they fail to do so, the bill may be passed. If they raise an objection, the bill is, at most, delayed for another 30 days. The legislatures are not obliged, however, to take account of comments or objections.[3]

The provincial houses have no power to generate their own legislation nor do they have any specific power to initiate bills in provincial legislatures. In KwaZulu-Natal, however, the House may make proposals to Cabinet,[4] and, in the North West, the House may propose legislation to the legislature.[5]

The local houses will also have no law-making powers. Moreover, unless provincial legislation or a municipal by-law stipulates otherwise, the legislatures and councils will not be obliged to refer bills to them for consideration.[6] The fact that these houses will be much closer to traditional communities, however, is reflected in a number of functions that differ from those of the provincial and national houses. They are to advise not only on matters relating to traditional leadership and customary law, and on by-laws, but also on 'the development of planning frameworks' that affect their communities. In addition, they are to participate in local community development programmes and in the oversight of government programmes in rural communities.[7]

(iii) Procedures, privileges and immunities

The National House is expressly empowered to make its own rules for the orderly conduct of business.[8] Otherwise, the constitutive Act provides that the House must meet at least once a year, during the sitting of Parliament,[9] that the presence

[1] See North West TLA s 6(2); Limpopo TLA s 8(2); Mpumalanga TLA s 8(2); Eastern Cape TLA s 8(2); Free State TLA s 12B(1); and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 4(2). Section 4(1) of the latter Act gives the House power to comment on a bill or executive action that may have a bearing on customary law and traditional authorities, even if the bill is not referred to the House. The TLGFA now also 'allows' a provincial legislature or municipal council to adopt the s 18(1) procedure. TLGFA s 18(2).

[2] This procedure is in line with IC s 183.

[3] It is an open question as to whether the provincial Houses may insist on the right to comment on national legislation passed on a functional area of concurrent competence under Schedule 4 of the Final Constitution.

[4] See KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 4 (1).

[5] See North West TLA s 6(1)(a).

[6] See TLGFA s 18(2).

[7] See NHTLA s 17(3).

[8] See NHTLA s 10.

[9] See NHTLA s 9(3).

of a majority of members is necessary to constitute a quorum,[1] and that decisions are made by a majority of the members, present and voting.[2]

Like the National House, the provincial houses are also given the power to establish whatever rules, procedures and orders are necessary for the conduct of their business.[3] The North West legislation differs somewhat. It provides that any rules regulating the procedure and the conduct of house business are subject to the Final Constitution and the approval of the Executive Council.[4] In this province, nothing is said about a quorum. Elsewhere, the quorum is at least one third of the members for ordinary house meetings and half when voting on a bill.[5] In all the provinces, decisions are to be taken by a simple majority.[6]

The provincial houses must meet at least once a year,[7] and some are required to do so during the sittings of provincial legislatures.[8] In the North West, the house must meet at least twice annually.[9] Apart from these requirements, the houses are free to determine the dates and times of their sessions.[10]

The houses are clearly not legislatures. Despite demands by traditional leaders that they should have more power, they remain advisory bodies. Nevertheless, the Acts establishing the provincial houses seek to equip them with some of the trappings of legislatures. The most obvious example is an attempt to confer the traditional parliamentary privileges on house members. The Act creating the National House makes no mention of this subject,[11] but three of the provincial enactments contain detailed provisions.[12] The Limpopo Act, for instance, lists a number of privileges and immunities (notably, freedom of speech and debate).[13] The North West Act provides for immunity from legal proceedings,[14] immunity from arrest[15] and control of entry to the house.[16]

It is unlikely that these provisions are constitutional. Immunities were traditionally given to parliamentarians to protect them from the interference of the

[1] See NHTLA s 11.
[2] See NHTLA s 12.
[3] See Mpumalanga TLA s 10; Eastern Cape TLA s 10; Free State TLA s 8; Limpopo TLA s 10; and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 12.
[4] See North West TLA s 7.
[5] See Mpumalanga TLA s 11; Eastern Cape TLA s 11; Free State TLA s 9; Limpopo TLA s 11; and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 13.
[6] See Mpumalanga TLA s 12; Eastern Cape TLA s 12; Free State TLA s 10; Limpopo TLA s 11; and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 13.
[7] See Mpumalanga TLA s 4(2); Eastern Cape TLA s 4; and Free State TLA s 4.
[8] See Limpopo TLA s 4(2) and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 6(2).
[9] See North West TLA s 7*(a)*.
[10] See Mpumalanga TLA s 3; Eastern Cape TLA s 4; Free State TLA s 4; Limpopo TLA s 3; KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 6(3); and North West TLA s 7.
[11] See NHTLA.
[12] See North West TLA; Limpopo TLA; and Mpumalanga TLA s 15.
[13] See Limpopo TLA s 15.
[14] See North West TLA s 10.
[15] See North West TLA s 12.
[16] See North West TLA ss 13 and 14.

executive. Now, in stable democracies at least, this protection is often seen to be unnecessary, and many privileges have been limited. For those that remain another reason is often given: they allow members to speak freely and to act on matters that might otherwise attract the operation of the law of defamation. Because freedom of expression is a necessary condition for robust debate, parliaments can fulfil their function only if their speech is largely unfettered.

The cost of such privilege is that the rights of individuals to dignity and to privacy may be infringed, and the question is whether such infringements are justified. The role of the houses of traditional leaders does not suggest either that the executive would interfere with them or that members need to be allowed greater freedom of speech than is already guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. This view is supported by the fact that, although the Final Constitution deals with privilege for the national Parliament, the provincial legislatures and local councils, it does not mention privilege in the context of the houses. Moreover, under the Final Constitution, provincial legislatures do not have the right to determine what privileges apply to their members. This must be done by national legislation.[1] It seems inappropriate, then, that they should be able to confer such immunities on the houses.[2]

Nevertheless, the Acts constituting the houses of traditional leaders secure at least one of the traditional protections associated with legislatures in parliamentary systems. On the issue of remuneration they are all agreed. The Act establishing the National House provides that members must be paid directly from the national revenue fund,[3] and a similar stipulation can be found in each of the provincial Acts.[4]

(c) Traditional government and the national and provincial spheres

On the basis of long-established usage, it is clear that a chief's customary powers may be exercised only within the local sphere of government. Whatever may have been the situation in pre-colonial times, the functions of traditional leaders now concern the everyday needs of their people. Under the system of multi-sphere government embraced by the Final Constitution, however, traditional leadership is included in Schedule 4 and is thus a function over which the national and

[1] See FC s 117(2).

[2] It might be argued that there is a difference between a provincial legislature determining its own privileges and those of another body. In the latter case, there is no concern about self-interested behaviour. However, the most likely reason for the constitutional rule that privileges must be conferred by national legislation is that the needs of the country in this regard are uniform and that privilege cannot be conferred lightly. There can, therefore, be no reason for different regimes for different provinces (and, as argued in the text, no reason at all for privilege outside the parliamentary context).

[3] See NHTLA s 13.

[4] See Mpumalanga TLA s 13; Eastern Cape TLA s 13; Free State TLA s 11; Limpopo TLA s 13; and KwaZulu-Natal TLA s 114. The Eastern Cape TLA s 13 is an exception. It refers to 'moneys appropriated by the Provincial Legislature as determined by the Premier.'

provincial governments have concurrent legislative (and thus executive) competence.[1] If they enact conflicting laws, provincial law will prevail, suggesting a presumption in favour of provincial authority. There is a major qualification, however. National law prevails if it meets the test set out in FC s 146. The Final Constitution lists a wide variety of circumstances that justify national supremacy, including the need for 'efficient government', which may be secured by nationally established norms and standards.[2]

The implications of including traditional leadership as a concurrent function under Schedule 4 have not been tested, and there is little case law on concurrency from which to extrapolate. In particular, because the provinces have passed few laws, FC s 146 has hardly been used. A key, and as yet undecided, issue is the meaning of FC s 146(2)(b). This section allows national law to trump provincial law, if the former 'deals with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation' and 'provides that uniformity by establishing (i) norms and standards; (ii) frameworks; or (iii) national policies'. Does this mean, for instance, that procedures for managing succession in traditional communities must be uniform, as the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act suggests, or is provincial variation permissible? Would provincial legislation on the recognition of traditional communities, which departs from the model set out in the national Act, prevail over the provisions of that Act?

Moreover, what limits are placed on prescriptions in national laws by the requirement that they may prevail over provincial law only insofar as they establish norms and standards, frameworks and national policies? In a robust system of multi-sphere government, it would be difficult to argue that anything more is required from the national government than a stipulation that succession be properly managed and that the recognition of communities be effective. If such is the case, then there is nothing to prevent provinces from developing their own procedures, even if these diverge from those laid down in the Traditional Leadership Act. The question is academic at present, however, as there is no indication that those provinces with traditional leaders intend to devise procedures for managing succession or any other aspect of traditional leadership at variance with the national law.[3]

But uniformity has not always been the norm. Although the Interim Constitution delegated legislative and executive powers over traditional authorities and indigenous law to the provinces, in 1995, central government sought to establish a degree of political control over traditional leaders by controlling their remuneration.[1] The Remuneration of Traditional Leaders Act provided that the remuneration and allowances of traditional leaders were to be determined by the President, after consultation with the (then) Council of Traditional Leaders and the Commission on Remuneration of Representatives.[2] Payment was to be made out of the National Revenue Fund. A preamble to the Act justified the passage of national legislation on a matter of provincial competence on the ground that 'the subjects and followers of particular tribal hierarchies do not necessarily reside in a single province and the constituencies of traditional hierarchies transcend provincial boundaries.' Remuneration paid by the central government was to be additional to any salaries traditional leaders received from provincial government.

[1] See FC Schedule 4. Indigenous and customary law are also listed in Schedule 4. See also FC s 125 (Provincial executive power.)

[2] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 16.

[3] Some provinces have taken the initiative and dealt with problems that particularly concern them. See, eg, Northern Province Circumcision Schools Act 6 of 1996; Free State Initiation School Health Act 1 of 2004; and Eastern Cape Application of Health Standards in Traditional Circumcision Act 6 of 2001.

In response to the Act and the loss of control over traditional leaders that it entailed, the government of KwaZulu-Natal introduced legislation prohibiting traditional leaders and the Zulu monarch from accepting any remuneration other than that provided for in KwaZulu-Natal legislation. Other payments to the King or traditional leaders were to be deposited by the recipients into the provincial revenue fund, to be distributed by the provincial government for the benefit of traditional leaders. The two bills introduced to effect these policies, the Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Amendment Bill and the KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill, sought to amend legislation which had been enacted by the KwaZulu legislature before the Interim Constitution came into force.[3] Objections by members of the new KwaZulu-Natal legislature to the constitutionality of the Bills were referred to the Constitutional Court for abstract review in terms of IC s 98(9).

The Court in Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill held that the Bills were within the legislative competence of the province, that they did not infringe fundamental rights, and that they were therefore constitutionally valid.[4] Legislation dealing with the appointment and powers of traditional leaders was contemplated by IC s 181 as being within the competence of provincial legislatures. If laws dealing with the appointment and powers of traditional leaders were within the competence of the provinces, then laws providing for payment of salaries and allowances must also be within their competence, since these were matters incidental to the appointment and were attached to the office.[5]

FC s 219 reduces provincial control over remuneration of traditional leaders. It requires an act of Parliament to establish a framework for determining the [1] See IC s 126, as read with Schedule 6.

[2] See Act 29 of 1995 s 2(1).

[3] After the 1994 elections, control over legislation of the disestablished KwaZulu legislature vested in the KwaZulu-Natal legislature. IC s 235(6)(b).

[4] See Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995; Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC)('Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill').

[5] Ibid at paras 20–22.

remuneration of persons holding public office, including traditional leaders,[1] and the establishment of an independent commission to make recommendations concerning such remuneration.[2] In terms of FC s 219(1), provincial legislation (and the provisions unsuccessfully challenged in the Constitutional Court in 1996) would be ineffective if contrary to the remuneration framework established by national legislation.

The framework prompted by the Final Constitution, however, raises new questions. For instance, although FC s 219(1) requires an act of Parliament to establish a 'framework' for remuneration of listed public office bearers, the Act concerned simply allows the President to gazette salaries and allowances from time to time.[3] Whether or not this is what the Final Constitution envisages depends on what 'framework' means. The Act may be said to provide a framework, if the fact that it allows the President to distinguish among the office bearers that it covers and envisages a remuneration package consisting of basic remuneration, pensions and medical aid benefits is thought to be a framework. If, however, the Final Constitution means that the national Act must provide parameters within which salaries are to be determined, then the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act does not comply. This question may become significant if an individual province decided that it wished to have some leeway in its payment of traditional leaders.

In regulations issued under the Remuneration Act, the President sets out annually the exact salaries of kings and traditional leaders.[4] The allocation of the function of determining salaries to the President might also provide the basis for provincial objections. Although the Final Constitution does not state who is to implement the framework in respect of traditional leaders, the inclusion of traditional leadership in Schedule 4 suggests that provinces may claim this power. Final Constitution s 219(4), which requires provincial executives to consider recommendations from the Commission before implementing the remuneration framework legislation, strengthens the argument that provincial legislation concerning remuneration of traditional leaders may prevail over the regulations published by the President under the Act.

[1] 'Traditional leaders' includes traditional monarchs. See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 102.

[2] See FC s 219(2). The commission referred to by FC s 219 is the Independent Commission for the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers established by Independent Commission for the Remuneration of Public Office-Bearers Act. Act 92 of 1997. The Commission has the power to make recommendations regarding the remuneration of traditional leaders, members of provincial houses and the national House of Traditional Leaders. In terms of s 5 of the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act, the President must consult the Commission before determining the remuneration of traditional leaders. Act 20 of 1998.

[3] Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act s 5.

[4] 'Salaries and Allowances Payable to Traditional Leaders, Members of the National House of Traditional Leaders and Members of the Provincial Houses of Traditional Leaders for the 2004/2005 Financial Year' Proclamation R8, Government Gazette 27279 (11 February 2005).

The 2003 White Paper suggested that these concerns may be temporary, as it noted that the current position (which gives all traditional leaders remuneration based on uniform scales determined by the President) is not 'based on clearly defined roles and functions of traditional leaders'.[1] By implication, once more information is available on these roles, a proper framework will be developed.[2]

In addition to opening the way to both provincial and national legislation on traditional leaders, the inclusion of traditional leaders in Schedule 4 means that national bills relating to traditional leaders should follow the procedure set out in FC s 76.[3] This section captures the notion of cooperative government by ensuring that provinces can participate in the passage of national laws relating to areas over which they share competence with the central government. The implementation of this section, however, has been hugely controversial.

In 1998, Parliament decided that the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act[4] should not follow the FC s 76 route through Parliament. Although it dealt with customary law and traditional leaders (both Schedule 4 matters), its main focus was equality in marriage, and therefore not a matter of concern to provinces. A similar decision was taken in 2004 in relation to the Communal Land Rights Act.[5] Despite the fact that it dealt with communal land, most of which falls within the jurisdiction of traditional leaders, it followed the FC s 75 route through Parliament. FC s 75 affords the provinces very limited influence.

The importance of deciding whether a bill should be dealt with under the FC ss 75 or 76 process concerns mainly the balance of powers between the provinces and the central government. Removing matters affecting traditional leaders and their communities from the FC s 76 process, however, also means that there is less chance that the communities affected by such laws will be able to participate in the legislative process. This was borne out by the passage of the Communal Land Rights Act. Traditional leaders had various opportunities to present their views on the bills to Parliament, but few community members had such access. Had the bills been considered by provincial legislatures, as FC s 76 demands, many more of the affected people would have had the opportunity to participate.

(d) Traditional government and local government

Because traditional rulers have always operated as a species of local authority, the challenge to their rule, since the Interim Constitution, has emerged mainly in this sphere of government. In 1994, when the Interim Constitution came into force, a primary aim of the Government of National Unity was to secure democratic

[1] See White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (2003), available at http:\\www.info.gov.za/gazette/bills/2003/b58-03.pdf (accessed on 20 July 2004) 53.

[2] However, the White Paper does not suggest that provinces will be given any role in determining remuneration beyond the requirement in s 5(1) of the Remuneration of Public Office Bearers Act that the President consult premiers when determining remuneration.

[3] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17.

[4] Act 120 of 1998.

[5] Act 11 of 2004.

elections. This principle was immediately put into effect in the national and provincial spheres of government. Reforms in the sphere of local government had to be deferred, however, because of the racially divided nature of apartheid local government, the division of existing authorities among former provinces and homelands and the enormity of the task of establishing new non-racial municipalities.

The Interim Constitution nevertheless stipulated that organs of local government were henceforth to be democratically elected.[1] For the first time, chiefs faced the prospect of having to compete with elected officials.[2] Practical politics and the fact that the traditional leaders provided the only viable authorities in rural areas, however, suggested the wisdom of maintaining the status quo, at least for the time being.[3] As a temporary measure, therefore, IC s 182 allowed traditional rulers both ex officio membership of local government bodies in their areas and eligibility for election to such bodies.[4]

In 1993, in anticipation of imminent conversion to democratic government, but to ease the process, the Local Government Transition Act was passed.[5] This Act established a framework of temporary authorities that were to operate until 2000. Existing local authorities in the non-metropolitan areas of each province were replaced with transitional local councils ('TLCs') for smaller towns, transitional representative councils ('TRCs') and transitional rural councils for rural areas.[6] Provincial MECs were given the power, if they deemed it to be in the interests of people residing within a traditional ruler's area of jurisdiction, to appoint the traditional ruler as a local government body (a traditional council) for purposes of the Act.[7]

[1] See IC s 179(1).

[2] Prior to 1994, local government elections were held only in urban areas and towns. See TE Scheepers, W du Plessis, C Rautenbach, J William & B de Wet 'Constitutional Provisions on the Role of Traditional Leaders and Elected Local Councillors at Rural Level' (1998) 19 Obiter 70. Traditional leaders were especially concerned about the possibility of losing their judicial powers and control over land affairs. Salaries were another controversial matter, for traditional leaders were paid more than municipal councillors and had more perquisites of office. See Oomen Tradition on the Move: Chiefs, Democracy and Change in Rural South Africa (2000) 13–14 and 40–3.

[3] See, eg, Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of SA, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 189.

[4] The ANC claimed that this arrangement undermined democratic government. In particular, it objected to KwaZulu-Natal exploiting FC s 182 by making traditional rulers ex officio members of the new regional councils. The ANC claims were dismissed, however, in ANC & Another v Minister of Local Government and Housing, KwaZulu-Natal & Others 1998 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 399 (CC) at para 19. The Constitutional Court held that FC s 182 validly sought to defuse the tension arising from the imposition of democratic structures in areas formerly governed by hereditary rulers.

[5] Act 209 of 1993 ('LGTA').

[6] The TRCs contained mainly elected members, although, under LGTA s 9C(1), others could be nominated by an 'interest group', if an MEC considered it desirable. Under LGTA s 9A, traditional leaders represented one of four specified interest groups. The others were farm owners, farm labourers and women.

[7] LGTA s 1(2).

In 1996, the Final Constitution reiterated the principle of democratic and accountable local government,[1] and, at the same time, declared that elected local authorities were to be created for all parts of South Africa: the principle of 'wall-to-wall' municipalities.[2] In practice this means that, for all but five metropolitan areas and a number of sparsely populated areas, there are two levels of local government throughout the country. These are local municipalities located within larger district municipalities.[3]

The Final Constitution changed the position of traditional leaders dramatically. Although it confirmed their ex officio membership in TRCs and rural councils until 30 April 1999, their role in local government became dependent on national legislation.[4] FC s 212(1) states that '[n]ational legislation may provide for a role for traditional leadership as an institution at local level on matters affecting local government'.

In 1997, a Green Paper on Local Government investigated, inter alia, the ambiguous position of traditional leaders under both the Final Constitution and the Local Government Transition Act.[5] It noted with dismay the uncertainty about responsibility for service delivery, the lack of rural infrastructure, funding and capacity, and the continuing tension over control of land affairs. The Paper observed that traditional authorities and elected municipalities shared powers, functions, jurisdictions and constituencies. Without specifying how the inevitable conflicts were to be solved, it called for cooperation between the two authorities in order to advance rural development.[6]

A White Paper on Local Government followed in 1998.[7] This confirmed the principle that elected local governments should be established for all areas, including those ruled by traditional authorities. Although the White Paper declared that municipalities should have sole competence over the functions of local government, it was prepared to make some concessions to traditional rulers. It therefore recommended that they should be represented in local government structures[8] and that the functions of local government should depend on the circumstances of each area.

[1] See FC s 152(1)(a).

[2] See FC s 151(1). Section 174(1) of the Interim Constitution had simply required the establishment of local authorities in demarcated areas.

[3] In constitutional terms, under FC s 155(1), the 'metros' are category A municipalities, the local municipalities are category B municipalities and district municipalities are category C municipalities. See Barry Bekink 'Local Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 22.

[4] Item 26(1)(b) of Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution. See Scheepers et al (supra) at 71–7.

[5] Government Gazette 18370 (17 October 1997).

[6] The Paper's position is consonant with the principles of cooperative government and intergovernmental relations laid down in s 41 of the Final Constitution.

[7] Government Gazette 18739 (13 March 1998)('White Paper on Local Government'). Traditional authorities in fact received little attention in the White Paper. See K Shubane 'Chiefs and the White Paper' (1998) 15 Development SA 313.

[8] White Paper on Local Government (supra) at 77.

In 1998, the Local Government: Municipal Demarcation Act started to put into effect the principle of 'wall-to-wall' municipalities.[1] The Demarcation Board created by the Act confronted a number of problems caused by the fragmentation of existing chiefdoms amongst two or more municipalities. Although it was supposed to take account of areas of traditional authority,[2] the Board frequently neglected this requirement or found it impossible to implement. Confusion currently reigns. Traditional authorities may fall into more than one district or local municipality (or, more frequently, more than one ward). The standard of services offered to the subjects of traditional rulers often differs considerably among such municipalities.[3]

In 1998, the process of replacing transitional local authorities also began. Traditional leaders won far less than they had been hoping for. The Local Government: Municipal Structures Act provided that the MEC for local government in a province containing traditional authorities had to request the local House of Traditional Leaders to identify leaders who would participate in local authorities.[4] The leaders so identified could then attend and participate in the meetings of municipal councils.[5] But, significantly, no provision was made for them to vote. The number of traditional leaders entitled to participate in a municipal council was not to exceed 20 per cent of the total number of councillors.[6] After consulting the relevant house of traditional leaders, MECs for local government could regulate the participation of traditional leaders in council proceedings and prescribe their role in municipal affairs.[7]

The White Paper of 1998 had recommended an investigation into traditional affairs, and, to this end, the Department of Provincial and Local Government produced a White Paper on Traditional Leadership in July 2003.[8] The central question posed by this Paper was the extent to which traditional leaders could continue to exercise their pre-constitutional powers. It was assumed that such powers were excluded in the areas for which local government was competent. The White Paper therefore recommended that, in local government, traditional leaders should play, in essence, a support and advisory role.[9]

[1] Act 27 of 1998. ('LG:MDA').

[2] See LG:MDA s 25.

[3] See White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (supra) at para 3.5. For a discussion of the process from the perspective of the Demarcation Board, see C Goodenough Shaping South Africa: Reflections on the First Term of the Municipal Demarcation Board, South Africa 1999–2004 (2004) 25ff.

[4] Act 117 of 1998 ('Municipal Structures Act') s 81. The guidelines for identification are provided in s 81(2)(a), as read with Schedule 6 of the Act: a traditional leader must hold 'supreme office of authority among all the leaders of the traditional authority' and be ordinarily resident within the municipal area concerned. Moreover, Houses of Traditional Leaders have the task of identifying the traditional leaders who will be ex officio members of elected local government. Proc R109 of 1995.

[5] See Municipal Structures Act s 81(1).

[6] The Municipal Structures Amendment Act 33 of 2000 (Amended the original figure set in s 81 from 10 to 20 per cent.)

[7] See Municipal Structures Act s 81(4).

[8] See White Paper on Local Government (supra) at 76.

[9] See White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (supra) at paras 3.2 and 3.3.

This approach was implemented in the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act.[1] The Act lists both the functions of traditional councils and those of traditional leaders. The former have one clear function that authorizes them to act independently: 'administering the affairs of the traditional community in accordance with customs and tradition.'[2] All other items on the list of council functions give them only an advisory role to municipal councils or allow them to 'participate in' municipal activities.[3] The local houses to be established by provinces under the Act will also have only advisory functions and the right to 'participate in' local programmes related to rural communities.[4]

In relation to traditional leaders, the Act vaguely asserts that '[a] traditional leader performs the functions provided for in terms of customary law and customs of the traditional community concerned, and in applicable legislation'. This ambiguity leaves a critical question unanswered: how is local government action and government by traditional leaders to be distinguished? Perhaps the answer to this question will be provided gradually in the future. In a long list of areas, s 20 of the Traditional Leadership Act stipulates that both the national and provincial governments may 'provide a role for traditional councils or traditional leaders', provided that the allocation of the role is consistent with the Constitution. Here, of course, the most difficult issue will be a possible intrusion on local government powers.[5]

The powers of local authorities are specified, in the first instance, by the Final Constitution,[6] and, in the second, by the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act[7] and the Municipal Systems Act.[8] These enactments list matters typically associated with municipalities, such as building regulations, electricity services, cemeteries, trading regulations, control of liquor, fencing, refuse removal, street trading, roads, traffic, parking and pounds. It can be argued that, because the Final Constitution and the two Acts were intended to define the competence of local authorities, they override only those powers enjoyed by traditional leaders under customary law with which the Final Constitution and the Acts deal explicitly.

On this reading, the powers considered critical to the maintenance of traditional authority — judging disputes, allocating land, convening initiation schools

[1] Act 41 of 2003 ('TLGFA').

[2] See TLGFA s 4(1)(a).

[3] Councils may also enter partnership agreements with municipalities (TLGFA s 5), but these would clearly depend on the willingness of the municipality concerned.

[4] These houses will consist of no more than ten representatives of traditional communities in the area of the district council for which they are constituted. It is entirely unclear how they would participate in municipal initiatives save, once again, in an advisory capacity.

[5] Note that FC s 151 protects the right of municipalities to govern and says that neither the national nor provincial governments may 'compromise or impede' this right.

[6] See FC s 156, as read with Part B of Schedules 4 and 5. Under FC s 151(3), municipalities have jurisdiction over local government affairs, but subject to national and provincial legislation.

[7] See Municipal Structures Act s 83(1).

[8] Act 32 of 2000 s 8(1).

and presiding over national festivals — remain intact.[1] The persistent concerns among traditional leaders about their loss of powers may largely be the result of a misunderstanding of the functions that are to be assumed by local government under the new dispensation. Nevertheless, it is clear that local government will formally bear responsibility for many of the functions traditional leaders previously exercised through the system of indirect rule. This means that, whereas in the past, members of traditional communities were dependent on traditional leaders for almost all of the (minimal) services that they received, they will now have another place to which to turn — their municipality. This threatens to reduce considerably the hold that traditional leaders have over their communities.

In practice, however, the new local governments have battled to establish themselves, and, in rural areas, few have the capacity to provide services. (They are often reduced to a single bare office and just one member of staff.) In addition, the newly demarcated municipalities are enormous, usually covering large areas and many communities. Some traditional authorities, on the other hand, have what Oomen has described as 'the material legacy of fifty years of governance-through-chiefs: large tribal offices, tribal cars, tribal secretaries and (as they are called) tribal cleaners'.[2] Stories abound of people appealing to the new local government officials to solve problems, and, then, in the absence of a response, resorting to a traditional authority instead. In these circumstances, it may be that the proposed cooperative relationship between traditional councils and local government will in fact leave much power in the hands of chiefs.[3]

Customary powers may, of course, be superseded by specific national or provincial legislation, but, in the context of local government, the critical issue is whether municipalities have the same authority. The starting point for this inquiry is FC s 211(2). This section provides that traditional leaders 'may function subject to any applicable legislation and customs, which includes amendments to, or repeal of, that legislation or those customs'. Does the term 'legislation' in this section include by-laws?[4] Under the Final Constitution, municipalities may make by-laws for the effective administration of matters they are empowered to

[1] In the White Paper on Local Government, the authority of traditional leaders was taken to include limited legislative and executive powers, presiding over customary courts, maintaining law and order, consulting with communities, advising government through the provincial Houses and the national Council of Traditional Leaders and making recommendations on land allocation and the settlement of land disputes. See White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (supra) at para 3.3.

[2] B Oomen Tradition on the Move: Chiefs, Democracy and Change in Rural South Africa (2000) 14.

[3] See L Ntsebeza 'Rural Governance and Citizenship in Post-1994 South Africa: Democracy Compromised?' in J Daniel, R Southall & J Lutchman (eds) The State of the Nation South Africa 2004 — 2005 (2005) 58.

[4] As a general rule, by-laws are considered legislation. See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31 (On what counts as legislation, by municipalities, for purposes of Bill of Rights analysis); Barry Bekink 'Local Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 22.

administer,[1] but a by-law conflicting with national or provincial legislation is invalid.[2] Thus, whenever customary law is codified in national or provincial legislation — and the two key examples are the Black Authorities Act[3] and the Natal and KwaZulu Codes[4] — it would appear to be immunized from any municipal amendments.

Final Constitution s 156(4) may nullify this effect. It obliges national and provincial governments to assign to municipalities Schedule 4 and Schedule 5 matters (including, therefore, customary law and traditional leadership), if these matters would be most effectively administered in the local government sphere and a municipality has the capacity to do so.

An unanswered question is whether FC s 156(4) requires the transfer of all aspects of a listed function or whether the national or provincial government can retain some aspects and assign others. A literal reading of the text suggests the former interpretation, but this view seems unduly rigid, and would undermine the principle of subsidiarity, which the section clearly intends to capture. However, even on this literal and expansive reading, it is unlikely that the regulation of traditional leadership or customary law would be assigned to municipalities, as these matters include functions related to the administration of justice — a national matter — and the protection of cultural rights, a matter with which local communities should be involved, but of which the national government should have oversight.[5]

If, on the other hand, FC s 156(4) allows the assignment of aspects of the matters listed in Schedules 4 and 5, it is likely that, in due course, municipalities will be able to demand responsibility over some matters relating to traditional leadership and customary law. The danger here is that municipalities will not be persuaded that they should accept a distinction between the incidents of modern and traditional government,[6] and will begin to override the powers of traditional rulers. In these circumstances, traditional leaders will have to rely, like any other group of citizens, on the vagaries and hurly-burly of the democratic political process.

[1] FC s 156(2).

[2] FC s 156(3).

[3] Act 68 of 1951, as amended by Act 89 of 1993. The regulations issued under the Act must also be included. See ss 9, 10 and 11 of Proc R110 of 1957, as amended by Proc R110 of 1991.

[4] Proclamation R151 of 1987 and KwaZulu Act 16 of 1985, respectively.

[5] The concern here would be that local minorities would not be adequately protected if the matter was taken out of the control of the central government.

[6] See A Sachs Advancing Human Rights in South Africa (1992) 77–8. Sachs argued that there was no inherent conflict between traditional and democratic forms of government, provided that each operated within its own sphere. Drawing this distinction is not, however, easy, because the powers of traditional rulers are already ill-defined. Some of them are derived from pre-colonial institutions, while others are of more recent origin and have been arrogated by rulers who assumed the multifarious responsibilities of modern government. It could be argued that all of the latter powers are now customary law, which is constantly adapting to changes in society.

(e) Traditional Monarchs

The clause in Constitutional Principle XIII requiring the new constitution to allow a provincial constitution to 'provide for … the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch, where applicable' was added at the eleventh hour as part of a deal to draw the Inkatha Freedom Party back into the transition process, and, even more important, to secure its participation in the 1994 elections. Twelve years later, despite the urgency attached to this principle in 1994, nothing has come of it.

In 1996, in KwaZulu-Natal's first venture at constitution-making, an attempt was made to constitutionalize the Zulu monarch. However, that constitution failed to secure the approval of the Constitutional Court, as required by IC s 160(4).[1] A second attempt is under way now. In 2004, after the ANC won control of the provincial legislature, it initiated a provincial constitution-making process with the specific goal of resolving persistent disputes about the king. From the ANC's point of view, the status of the monarch was the only matter needing attention in the provincial constitution. The requirement of a two-thirds majority for the passage of a constitution, however, meant that any provincial constitution-making process would involve deals with minority parties, and, as a result, many other issues would be brought into the debate.

In 2004, the ANC, IFP and the Democratic Alliance each produced a draft constitution, and a number of smaller parties submitted memoranda dealing with specific issues. Each draft constitution contains provisions concerning the recognition of the monarch, his role, matters of succession and a 'civil list', that is, a secured annual allowance for the royal household. The most significant differences in the three drafts relate to the extent of the monarch's 'kingdom', whether the monarch should be inviolable, and removal.[2]

On the question of the monarch's kingdom, the DA draft limits the king's jurisdiction to 'the Zulu people',[3] while the ANC and IFP propose that the king should be recognized as monarch of the province.[4] Both approaches seem constitutional. In Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of establishing the Zulu king as monarch of the province, and found that, in terms of IC s 160(3), this was permissible.[5] Because the requirements of the Final Constitution do not differ in any material way from those of the Interim Constitution, the same decision should be expected now.

---

[1] See S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 21 (Argues that provincial constitutions confer no new additional powers and are largely window dressing.)

[2] See K Govender, W Freedman & A Annandale Analysis of Constitutional Proposals for the Province of KwaZulu-Natal (2005) at paras 287–307.

[3] See Draft Constitutions of KwaZulu-Natal (9 February 2005) Democratic Alliance Proposal Clause 3.3.1.

[4] See Draft Constitutions of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) Inkatha Freedom Party Proposal ('IFP Draft') Clause 60(1).

[5] See Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) at para 3.

However, a DA provision declaring the Zulu king 'traditional monarch of the Zulu people' has raised one concern: it may be read as an attempt to extend the authority of the KwaZulu-Natal legislature beyond the borders of the province, thereby infringing FC s 104, which limits the legislative power of the provincial legislature to the territory of the province. This view seems to depend on an overly zealous reading of the Final Constitution, because it is clear that the province does not have legislative power beyond its borders, and this provision could not achieve that power. Instead, the provision is better read as an attempt to limit the reign of the monarch to Zulus (however they may be defined) in the province, leaving other citizens untouched.[1]

Only the IFP draft constitution stipulates that the monarch is 'inviolable', a term which is then defined to mean 'not subject to civil, administrative or political responsibility or authority'.[2] This provision resembles an equivalent in the draft constitution considered by the Constitutional Court in 1996. Although the Court found that the monarch's inviolability was constitutional, if the matter were to be heard again under the Final Constitution, the same conclusion might not be reached. Section 143(2) now provides that provisions in provincial constitutions regarding traditional monarchs must comply with s 1. This section sets out basic values on which South Africa's new constitutional order is founded, notably, accountability and the rule of law. On both counts, a provision that a monarch is to be inviolable would probably fail, since it contradicts the principle that the monarch, like everyone else, is subject to the Constitution and the law.

The question of removal is perhaps the most interesting of the three areas of disagreement. Only the IFP draft makes provision in this regard. The power is granted to the provincial house of Traditional Leaders 'for just and good cause'.[3] Although this provision gives wide powers to the House, exercise of those powers must nevertheless be constitutional, since FC s 143 gives provinces a free hand in determining the status of kings, provided that its requirements are met. The provision also ensures some level of accountability to the traditional elite, if not the people that traditional rulers are intended to serve.

The main constitutional question raised by the IFP's removal provision, however, is a conflict with the provisions for the removal of kings and queens in the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act. Section 10 of that Act allows royal families to request the President to remove kings or queens in certain specified circumstances. The President must comply. The IFP draft, however, leaves the matter entirely in the hands of the provincial house of Traditional Leaders and gives the house a broader discretion than royal families are given under the national Act. Would the provincial Constitution prevail under FC s 147

[1] In essence this is a conflict between principles of territorial and personal rule. See TW Bennett Customary Law in South Africa (2004) 70ff.

[2] See IFP Draft (supra) at Clause 63(7).

[3] Ibid at Clause 66(5).

or would it be overridden by the national Act? For the national Act to prevail, it would have to meet the requirements of FC s 146(2). The national Act claims to fall under FC s 146(2)(b), as it states in its Preamble that it 'set[s] out a national framework and norms and standards'. However, whether the Act meets the other part of the FC s 146(2)(b) test, which states that it must '[deal] with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation', is doubtful.

It is perhaps arguable that uniformity is required in matters concerning recognition of traditional leaders. In an apparent bid to stop the proliferation of traditional leaders, for instance, the Traditional Leadership Act states that, when recognizing kings and queens, the President must take into account 'the need to establish uniformity in the Republic in respect of the status afforded to a king or queen'.[1] It seems unlikely, however, that this argument could be made with any conviction in the context of removal procedures. On the contrary, the very nature of customary law suggests that different practices will have developed in different areas, and, if tradition is to be preserved, this diversity should be maintained.

At the moment, these constitutional disputes are hypothetical, and the chances of the KwaZulu-Natal politicians reaching consensus on a provincial constitution are slight. Until they do, the status of the Zulu king will be subject to national and provincial law.

26.6 Government in Traditional Areas

(a) Appointment and Succession to Office

The legends and traditions of most South African chieftaincies regard the first person to settle the land as the founding father of the nation. Thereafter, according to the principle of patrilineal succession, his office was inherited by his eldest son. If a deceased ruler had contracted a series of polygamous marriages, his heir would be the eldest son of the principal wife,[2] whose rank was usually denoted by the fact that subjects had contributed towards payment of her lobolo.[3]

Although patrilineal succession is considered a cardinal rule of customary law,[4] the transmission of political offices has always been subject to many variations and exceptions. If the eldest son were physically or mentally incapable, for example, he could be barred from taking office.[5] More important, however, was the

[1] TLGFA s 9(1)(b)(i).

[2] She need not be the first wife. Certain systems of customary law allow rulers to nominate their principal wives. See Vikilahle v Zulualiteti (1904) 1 NAC 77; Tyelinzima v Sangqu 4 NAC 375 (1920); Holi v Tyantyaza (1923) 5 NAC 206; and Ngwenya v Gungubele 1950 NAC 198 (S). This power is encoded in s 75 of the Natal and KwaZulu Codes. See Proclamation R151 of 1987 and Act 16 of 1985.

[3] This practice is specifically recognized in s 75(2) of the Natal and KwaZulu Codes.

[4] See B Sansom 'Traditional Rulers and their Realms' in WD Hammond-Tooke (ed) The Bantu-speaking Peoples of Southern Africa (2nd Edition, 1974) 257; I Schapera Government and Politics in Tribal Societies (1956)('Schapera Government and Politics') 50ff; AC Myburgh & MW Prinsloo Indigenous Public Law in KwaNdebele (1985) 5–8; MW Prinsloo Inheemse Publiekreg in Lebowa (1983)('Prinsloo Publiekreg') 113–14.

[5] See S Zungu 'Traditional Leaders Capability and Disposition for Democracy: The Example of South Africa' in W Hofmeister & I Scholz (eds) Traditional and Contemporary Forms of Local Participation and Self-Government in Africa (1997) 162.

reality of power politics. Succession to the chieftaincy seldom went uncontested, and the death of a ruler often occasioned fierce disputes. As a result, the rules of succession were frequently manipulated or even ignored.[1]

The strict rule of customary law has been further undermined by many years of state intervention. Since the promulgation of the Native Administration Act in 1927, and even before, successors to chiefly office needed the support of the Department of Native Affairs. Hence, not only are many of the existing incumbents of office of doubtful ancestry, but so too were their predecessors.[2] Some provincial governments responded to the substantial number of succession disputes in their regions by instituting commissions of inquiry.[3] The best known is the Ralushai Commission, which was established in 1996 by the Premier of Limpopo. The report of this Commission was not made public, but, in a successful court challenge under the Promotion of Access to Information Act,[4] 46 traditional leaders from Sekhukhuneland won access to those portions of the report dealing with them.[5]

The 2003 Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act reflects the national government's intention to settle the backlog of disputes.[6] It establishes a Commission on Traditional Leadership Disputes and Claims to deal not only with questions of legitimate succession to title but also cases in which there is doubt whether a leadership position was established under customary law and cases relating to the establishment of 'tribes' and tribal boundaries.[7] When dealing with disputes about succession, the Commission must 'be guided by customary norms' and, in addition, when considering succession to a kingship, the Commission must consider provisions in the Act concerning the recognition of kings and queens.[8] (These require a nationally uniform approach to the status of kings and queens.)

The task, which the Act anticipates will be completed in five years,[9] is immense. The Ralushai Commission apparently estimated that there were over [1] See M Gluckman Politics, Law and Ritual in Tribal Society (1971) 138ff.

[2] In the event of a dispute about an incumbent of office, s 16(2) of the Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Act 9 of 1990 (KwaZulu) requires the MEC in KwaZulu-Natal to institute an inquiry. Similarly, under s 10(2) of the Natal Code, the State President is obliged to institute an inquiry into any case of a disputed succession. See Government of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal v Ngwane 1996 (4) SA 943 (A). Disputes have been complicated by failure to decide which department of government should have jurisdiction. See I van Kessel & B Oomen '"One Chief, One Vote": The Revival of Traditional Authorities in Post-apartheid South Africa' (1997) 96 African Affairs 561, 577–8.

[3] Eastern Cape, Free State, North West and Limpopo are reported to have established commissions. Ministry for Provincial and Local Government 'Press Statement on the Ralushai Commission's Report' (11 November 2004), available at http://www.dplg.gov.za/speeches/11Nov 2004PR.doc (accessed on 2 August 2005).

[4] Act 2 of 2000.

[5] See Minister for Local and Provincial Government v Unrecognised Traditional Leaders, Limpopo Province 2005 (2) SA 110 (SCA), [2005] 1 All SA 559 (SCA).

[6] Act 41 of 2003 ('TLGFA').

[7] See TLGFA s 25(2).

[8] See TLGFA s 26(3)(b).

[9] See TLGFA s 25(5).

300 disputes in Limpopo, and reports from the Eastern Cape and KwaZulu-Natal suggest a similar number of disputes in those provinces.[1] Although by establishing a Commission and by binding itself to accept its decisions,[2] the national government presumably hoped to move the process out of the political arena, customary law is uncertain enough for any decisions to be perceived as politically motivated.[3]

Another less pressing concern is the issue of retirement and deposition. Customary law has no specific rules or procedures to govern these eventualities. Office holders simply ruled until they died. Those who were incapable or unpopular might be persuaded to abdicate through the pressure of relatives or their councils.[4] Ultimately, however, revolt and secession were the only methods for forcing corrupt or incompetent leaders to relinquish office.[5]

Under the Black Administration Act,[6] executive sanction was needed for the appointment of traditional leaders and for their deposition. In 1994, these powers were assigned by the President to the six provinces with traditional rulers. They now lie with provincial premiers.[7]

[1] Conversation with Professor Thandabantu Nhlapo, Chairperson of the National Commission (15 July 2005).

[2] See TLGFA s 26.

[3] This impression may be bolstered by the fact that the staff of the Commission (which will presumably do most of the work) is drawn from government (the Departments of Justice and Provincial and Local Government and from the National Prosecuting Authority). It is noteworthy that the Act does not require the Commission to consult the provincial or national houses of traditional leaders. This was a wise move, as the involvement of the houses would increase the likelihood of the Commission's work being politicized. But see C Keulder Traditional Leaders and Local Government in Africa: Lessons for South Africa (1998) 308–10 (Keulder argues that it would be unwise to remove illegitimate chiefs, partly because it is impossible to unravel historical claims and partly because some chiefs, regardless of their origins, now have legitimacy in the eyes of their people.)

[4] Cf I Schapera A Handbook of Tswana Law and Custom (2nd Edition, 1955) 84. While Schapera gives examples of rulers being tried in their own courts for abuse of powers, the traditional form of government does not contemplate an independent judiciary holding rulers to account.

[5] See Schapera Government and Politics (supra) at 209–11; WD Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus: The Development of Transkeian Local Government (1975) 35–6; H Ashton The Basuto (1952) 217; M Hunter Reaction to Conquest (1979) 393–4.

[6] Act 38 of 1927.

[7] Under IC s 235(8), the President was given the power to assign by proclamation the administration of certain pieces of legislation to provinces (and was required to do so if the Premier requested it). On 9 September 1994, he assigned ss 2(7), (7)bis, (7)ter and (8) of the Black Administration Act, together with the whole Black Authorities Act 68 of 1951 to the six provinces with traditional leaders. Notice 139 of 1994 Government Gazette 15951. However, the assignment excluded any provisions which fell outside the functional areas listed in IC Schedule 6 'or which relate to matters referred to in paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 126(3) of the [Interim] Constitution'. On the same basis, the Bophuthatswana Traditional Authorities Act 23 of 1978 was assigned to North West province, the KwaNdebele Traditional Authorities Act 2 of 1984 to Mpumalanga, the Transkei Authorities Act 4 of 1965 and Ciskei Act on Administrative Authorities 37 of 1984 to Eastern Cape and the KwaZulu Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Act 9 of 1990 to KwaZulu-Natal. The assignment left matters uncertain, as it did not specify which provisions, if any, fell outside Schedule 6 or within IC s 126(3) and thus remained the responsibility of the national government. That the national government believes that some of these powers at least fell outside the Schedule, and thus were not assigned, is suggested by the fact that the new legislation (the 2003 Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act) seems to assume that matters covered in those laws are matters for which the national government may lay down a framework and provide norms and standards which, under FC s 146, would prevail over provincial laws on the same matter.

The Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act also deals with matters of succession, retirement and deposition. Following s 2(7) of the Black Administration Act, the new Act requires executive sanction for the appointment and deposition of traditional leaders. When leadership positions are to be filled, the royal family concerned must identify a successor 'with due regard to applicable customary law'.[1] The President must formally recognize the new kings and queens identified by the family while provincial legislation must provide for a process under which premiers recognize other traditional leaders. If there are allegations that customary law was not followed properly when a person was identified to fill a leadership position, the President or premier may refuse the certificate of recognition, in which case the matter must be referred back to the royal family concerned for reconsideration.

The President may also refer disputes about succession to the position of king or queen to the National House of Traditional Leaders, while premiers may refer such disputes to the provincial house. Once a house has considered a matter and has identified a suitable candidate, the President (or premier) is obliged to recognize that person, unless there are grounds for thinking that the house did not consider the issue in accordance with customary law. Although the Act is conspicuously silent in this regard, if a dispute cannot be resolved by this process, the matter could presumably be taken to court.

Sections 10 and 12 of the Act deal, respectively, with the removal of kings and queens and other traditional leaders. There are just four circumstances in which removal is possible:

(a) conviction of an offence with a sentence of imprisonment for more than 12 months without an option of a fine;
(b) physical incapacity or mental infirmity which, based on acceptable medical evidence, makes it impossible for that senior traditional leader, headman or headwoman to function as such;
(c) wrongful appointment or recognition; or
(d) a transgression of a customary rule or principle that warrants removal.[2]

In both the case of a king or queen and of a traditional leader, the royal family makes the decision to remove an incumbent of office, and the President (or premier, as the case may be) must then withdraw the certificate of recognition.

[1] See TLGFA s 9(1)(for kings and queens) and s 11(1)(for senior traditional leaders and headmen or headwomen). In the past, although the state intervened in the appointment of traditional leaders whenever it was politically expedient to do so, customary law was never completely disregarded. Indeed, ethnographers in the Department of Native Affairs kept a semi-official register of the genealogies of the 800 ruling families to assist in the appointment procedure. Section 10(1) of the Natal Code provides that the deceased's heir shall be the person whom the Cabinet appoints as successor. Proc R151 of 1987. Section 16(1), as read with s 12, of the Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Act 9 of 1990 (KwaZulu), has a similar provision, although the Minister is obliged to take s 81 of the KwaZulu Code Act 16 of 1985 into account. But see Minister of Native Affairs & Another v Buthelezi 1961 (1) SA 766, 769–70 (D)(Held that nothing limited the President's discretion other than the interests of the public and the people concerned.)

[2] See TLGFA s 10(1). Section 12(1) is similarly worded but substitutes 'senior traditional leader, headman or headwoman' for 'king or queen'.

By dividing responsibility for the appointment and removal of traditional leaders between provinces and the national government, the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act has, temporarily at least, created a complicated situation. Under FC s 239, laws administered by provincial governments, when the Final Constitution took effect in February 1997, are defined as provincial laws. This provision covers laws assigned to provinces, as happened to certain provisions of the Black Administration Act. The national Parliament cannot now amend or repeal such laws. As a result, whenever the new Traditional Leadership Act conflicts with sections of the Black Administration Act which were assigned to provinces, the provincial laws prevail, unless the provisions of the Traditional Leadership Act meet the test in FC s 146. It is clearly the intention of the six provinces having traditional leaders that any such conflict should be remedied, since each of these provinces has tabled legislation which will repeal laws conflicting with the national Traditional Leadership Act. Nevertheless, until these laws are passed, uncertainty will exist.

The Final Constitution introduced a new issue to the question of succession, that of gender discrimination.[1] According to customary law, women may not hold political office. There are certain exceptions to this rule, the most famous being the Lovedu since the reign of Modjadji I,[2] and there is evidence to show that practices are changing in response to new ideas of gender equality.[3] Nevertheless, the general rule still holds true: women may, at most, act as regents during an interregnum or if an heir is under age.[4]

Under the Bill of Rights, however, one might argue that if a traditional leader were to die leaving both male and female descendants, the rule preferring male descendants should be ignored, because it constitutes unfair discrimination.[5] The oldest child would have to succeed, whether male or female.[6] The White Paper is quite clear on this issue. It states that the existing rules are in conflict with the

[1] See K Motshabi & SG Volks 'Towards Democratic Chieftaincy: Principles and Procedures' 1991 Acta Juridica 104; L Bank & R Southall 'Traditional Leaders in South Africa' (1996) 37 & 38 J of Legal Pluralism 407.

[2] See EJ Krige & DJ Krige Realm of a Rain-Queen: a Study of the Pattern of Lovedu Society (1943) 177 and 180.

[3] See Keulder (supra) at 319. On the former Transkei, see DS Koyana & JC Bekker Judicial Process in the Customary Courts of Southern Africa (1943) 258ff.

[4] A famous example was MmaNthatisi of the Tlokwa. See Ashton (supra) at 197–8.

[5] The rule of primogeniture might constitute unfair discrimination because it differentiates on the basis of age. However, the customary rule may be justified, on the ground that a system of inherited offices, although arbitrary as to age, is necessary if certainty and stability are to be achieved in the political order.

[6] See AJ Kerr 'Customary Law, Fundamental Rights, and the Constitution' (1994) 111 SALJ 720, 728–9 (Notes, however, that, if the law governing succession to political office were changed other areas of customary law would also be affected.) See also the South African Law Reform Commission Discussion Paper on the Customary Law of Succession Project 90 Discussion Paper (2000) at paras 4.7.1–2 (Recommends that any legislation aimed at improving the position of widows and children should not be extended to traditional leaders.) But see Kerr (supra) at 727–8 (Further arguments against changing the rule of agnatic succession to the chieftaincy.)

Bill of Rights, notes that women often act as regents for many years (implying that there can be no question of their ability to fulfil the role) and cites South Africa's international obligations to prohibit gender discrimination. It concludes that 'custom and customary law should, generally, be the basis for regulating succession' but that custom must be transformed to allow women (and men) who were discriminated against in the past to succeed as traditional leaders.[1]

Despite this bold statement the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act is silent on the issue of female succession. Although a number of court cases have been brought by women claiming the right to succeed to a leadership position, we know of none that has been upheld.[2] Moreover, although the White Paper states that the right of women to succeed will take effect from 27 April 1994, the day the Interim Constitution came into effect, there is no indication in the Traditional Leadership Act that the Commission on Traditional Leadership could recognize women rather than men when it resolves disputes. It has been left to the Commission and the courts to assert this important principle. There are indications that the courts will. In dealing with the customary law of succession, in Bhe the Constitutional Court could not be more emphatic: '[t]he primogeniture rule as applied to the customary law of succession cannot be reconciled with the current notions of equality and human dignity as contained in the Bill of Rights.'[3] While some different issues are raised by succession to leadership positions, the basic principles remain the same. It is difficult, therefore, to justify a rule reserving positions of leadership to men under the Final Constitution.

(b) Territorial and personal jurisdiction

By using the language of public international law, the traditional concept of sovereignty may be analysed in terms of a ruler's personal and territorial reach of power. Hence, we can say that, although a chief had jurisdiction over all those owing him personal allegiance,[4] the exercise of this power was restricted to the borders of his domain.

Bonds of allegiance were established through the time-honoured processes of birth, marriage, immigration and, in the past, conquest or capture in war.[5] A child born to parents who were already subjects of a particular chief was automatically

[1] White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance (supra) at 52.

[2] There are women in the houses of traditional leaders. See, for example, 'Cheiftainess Nosiseko Gayika elected in 2000 to Eastern Cape House of Traditional Leaders' (2000), available at http://www.info.gov.za/speeches/2000/0009181218p1005.htm (accessed on 20 July 2005). We do not know whether these women are regents or traditional leaders.

[3] See Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha; Shibi v Sithole; SA Human Rights Commission v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 88–97, 187–190 and 210.

[4] See, eg, Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 25.

[5] For what follows, see AC Myburgh Die Inheemse Staat in Suider-Afrika (1986) 11–15; MW Prinsloo Die Inheemse Administratiefreg van 'n Noord-Sothostam (1981)('Prinsloo Administratiefreg') 66–9; Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 2–4.

affiliated to that chiefdom. The significant link was the blood connection, for it was irrelevant whether the child was actually born inside the realm. In the case of marriage, the operative rule was not as clear. The custom of virilocal residence would suggest that a wife should become subject to her husband's chief, because she would be permanently attached to the husband's family.

Immigrants could be accepted as subjects if they were prepared to submit to the authority of a traditional ruler.[1] Submission normally entailed paying some token of submission, which, in earlier times, would have been a beast, but today it is more likely to be cash. Similar, although less stringent, terms applied to the readmission of former subjects.[2] If they lost their original status, because they had rejected the authority of a ruler or had committed a crime, they would be required to settle the issue before being accepted back into the realm.[3]

According to customary law, all subjects resident within a ruler's domain were obliged to submit to local laws (at least those of a public nature).[4] Such laws included a duty to pay taxes, liability to perform public works and, of course, an overall duty to obey the ruler's orders and acknowledge his position.[5] The Regulations Prescribing the Powers and Privileges of Chiefs give traditional rulers additional powers to enforce a range of statutory laws concerning health, the registration of births and deaths, stock dipping, eradication of weeds, and so on.[6] A person failing to comply with the customary or statutory regulations was liable to pay a fine for contempt of authority.[7] Subjects who were persistently disobedient, or those who rejected the authority of the ruler and his council,

[1] See Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 67 (Lists the criteria for admission: evidence from an existing subject that the applicant is suitable, reasons why the applicant left his previous chiefdom, availability of land and payment of an admission fee.)

[2] Ibid at 68.

[3] A subject wanting to leave a traditional ruler's territory must first obtain permission; permission will be given, provided that taxes are paid up to date and outstanding judgments have been settled. Ibid at 69. When the emigrant wants to enter another ruler's territory, he or she will be required to prove an orderly departure from the previous realm.

[4] So far as the central state is concerned, chiefly powers derive from territorial rather than personal jurisdiction. See, for example, Zulu v Mbata 1937 NAC (N&T) 6; Monete v Setshuba 1948 NAC (C&O) 22; and s 3(2) of the Natal Code Proc R151 of 1987. Moreover, regulation 6 of the Regulations Prescribing the Powers and Privileges of Chiefs refers only to persons resident within a traditional ruler's area of jurisdiction. Proc R110 of 1957.

[5] The relationship between the ruler and subject is signified by the use of certain honorific titles, specific to the particular ruler.

[6] Regulation 9 of Proc R110 of 1957, as amended. This Proclamation was assigned to the six provinces with traditional leaders under IC s 235. Notice 139, Government Gazette 15951 (1994). When the provincial bills designed to implement the national Traditional Leadership Act are passed, the Proclamation will be repealed.

[7] Hence, regulation 6 of Proc R110 allows a traditional ruler to 'take such steps as may be necessary to secure from [all Blacks resident within his area] loyalty, respect and obedience.' Proc R110 of 1957. See, too, s 7 of the Natal Code and s 7 of the Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Act 9 of 1990 (KwaZulu).

might be banished, which resulted in the loss of all rights of membership of the polity, especially of access to land.[1]

Since colonization, the rule of territorial jurisdiction has been subject to certain obvious changes. As we explained above, borders are now more precisely described,[2] chiefly domains have been reduced in size[3] and many traditional polities have been divided by local, provincial and even international boundaries.

(c) Separation of powers with checks and balances

In a constitutional democracy, effective and legitimate government is deemed to depend upon different institutions performing different functions and on a system of checks and balances that control the exercise of power. In particular, the courts must remain independent and impartial so that they can check the activities of the other two branches of government, and dispense justice in a way that is not influenced by the interests of the executive or the legislature.[4] However, as we have already noted, under customary law, traditional leaders, together with their councils, perform all functions of government, which includes running courts for any disputes arising within their areas of jurisdiction.

(i) Judicial powers

Predictably, the first reason for objecting to the way in which traditional courts operate was separation of powers. The judicial function of traditional rulers is prescribed by the Black Administration Act, under which the Minister may allow a traditional ruler to constitute the court of a 'chief or headman'.[5] The Act also prescribes the courts' powers of jurisdiction: to hear civil claims 'arising out of Black law and custom brought before [them] by Blacks against Blacks resident

[1] See Myburgh (supra) at 14ff; Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 71 and 194–5; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 136–8. Examples of banishment happening today, however, are rare. In fact, Prinsloo could find no available examples. Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 32–3. See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 29 (Report that banishment is so serious that only immigrants can be punished in this way, and then only for persistent disobedience to the law or contempt for the chief.)

[2] Before the advent of modern techniques of mapping and surveying, boundaries were demarcated with reference to such topographical features as hills, rivers and outcrops of rock: See Myburgh (supra) at 8; Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 185–6; HO Mönnig The Pedi (1967) 245–6.

[3] The indigenous polities that survived conquest were segregated from white cities and farms as 'reserves'. These areas became the so-called 'scheduled' and 'released' areas under the Natives Land Act 27 of 1913 and the Native Trust and Land Act 18 of 1936, respectively. Later, under apartheid, they became the bantustans, and eventually the 'homelands'.

[4] See S Sibanda & A Stein 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds), Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 12.

[5] Section 12(1) of Act 38 of 1927 ('BAA'). The Repeal of the Black Administration Act and Amendment of Certain Laws Bill (2005) anticipates the provisions of the BAA relating to traditional courts being replaced by a new Act. However, there is no draft legislation on this matter yet. Presumably, traditional courts will continue to be governed by the BAA until such a law is passed. Transkei (Acts 13 of 1982 and 6 of 1983), Ciskei (Act 37 of 1984), Bophuthatswana (Act 29 of 1979), and KwaNdebele (Act 3 of 1984) constituted traditional courts along the same lines as South Africa, but with occasional modifications in jurisdiction and procedure.

within [their] area of jurisdiction' and criminal claims where the accused is a black person.[1]

The Final Constitution permits the continued operation of these courts, provided that they are consistent with the Constitution.[2] However, because traditional rulers also exercise legislative and, especially, executive powers, it has been argued that, as judges, they are neither independent nor impartial, as is required by FC s 165(2).[3] In Bangindawo & Others v Head of the Nyanda Regional Authority & Another, the applicants used this argument to object to the Transkeian Regional Courts (which are statutory tribunals, but constituted by traditional rulers).[4] The High Court dismissed the objection on the ground that the usual common-law tests for independence and impartiality were not applicable.[5] It held that, in Africa, although no clear distinction is drawn between the executive, judicial and legislative functions of government, no reasonable African would perceive bias on the part of traditional leaders merely because they exercise executive powers.

The High Court in Mhlekwa & Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another was not prepared to accept this ruling on traditional government.[6] The High Court noted that the Final Constitution does not explicitly mention the doctrine of separation of powers and that FC s 165(2) does not prohibit traditional leaders from being judges simply because they perform other governmental functions. It went on to hold, however, that some of these functions involve controversial public issues and may therefore lead to the perception of an unduly close relationship to the executive.[7]

Mhlekwa's most telling departure from Bangindawo, however, is its insistence that all courts must comply with FC s 165. This means that not only must the courts

[1] BAA s 20.

[2] FC s 16(1) of Schedule 6. During the certification proceedings, a contention that the Final Constitution failed to establish traditional or customary courts (as required by Constitutional Principle XIII) was dismissed. See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of SA, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 199. Under FC s 166*(e)*, the customary courts qualify as 'any other court established or recognised in terms of an Act of Parliament'.

[3] IC s 96(2) was FC s 165(2)'s immediate predecessor.

[4] 1998 (3) SA 262 (Tk), 1998 (3) BCLR 314 (Tk)('Bangindawo').

[5] Despite ostensibly dismissing the common-law tests, the Bangindawo Court held that the idea of judicial independence denoted no 'reasonable apprehension of bias'. In other words, a reasonable person would consider the judiciary independent if it were free from interference by either the executive or the litigants. In this regard, the Court followed the Canadian decision in R v Valente. (1986) 24 DLR (4th) 161 at 169–70 and 172–3. However, while Valente and at least one Constitutional Court judgment require both a perception of independence and impartiality and independence from an objective point of view, Bangindawo was committed to the view that, under an African interpretation of independence, all that was required was a perception of independence in the minds of the public. Cf De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1553 (CC).

[6] 2001 (1) SA 574, 619 (Tk), 2000 (9) BCLR 979, 1018 (Tk)('Mhlekwa').

[7] Ibid at 616–17. Moreover, traditional leaders do not enjoy the security of tenure guaranteed other judicial officers by FC s 177.

be perceived to be unbiased but, objectively assessed, they must be independent of the executive. Relying on the Constitutional Court's decision in De Lange v Smuts,[1] Van Zyl J found that presiding officers in the Transkei Regional Authority Courts did not have sufficient individual independence of the executive. In other words, although the courts themselves were institutionally independent of both the executive and the legislature, the relationship of their presiding officers to the executive was too close. This finding was based on an examination of the many tasks of the traditional leaders who presided over these courts, including powers of search and seizure, general responsibility to maintain law and order, and other policing functions.

Mhlekwa's finding that the Regional Authority Courts were unconstitutional was not sent to the Constitutional Court for confirmation under FC s 172, although there is a strong body of opinion that traditional courts presided over by traditional leaders are incompatible with the Final Constitution.[2] Mhlekwa, however, did not decide that traditional leaders could never preside over a court nor did it attempt to draw the line between the legitimate non-judicial functions that a presiding officer might carry out and those that would undermine the independence of their courts. This decision provides a starting point for considering modifications of the traditional court system to ensure that traditional courts conform to the Final Constitution, but still retain their strengths - accessibility, understanding of customary practices, sensitivity to the needs of the communities they serve and, in many cases, legitimacy.

The Law Reform Commission's Report on Traditional Courts and the Judicial Function of Traditional Leaders suggests some ways in which reforms could be achieved. One option is to allow councillors to be elected to the courts; another is to allow traditional leaders to appoint councillors from panels elected by their communities.[3] There are many possibilities, and it may be best to allow traditional communities to develop their own systems within parameters which require the inclusion of women in the court structure and maintenance of a sufficient distance between court officials and the day-to-day administration of community affairs. One thing seems clear, a current practice whereby traditional leaders delegate authority to preside over customary matters to 'a trusted councillor', but retain a veto over the court's decisions,[4] cannot continue. It may be constitutional to permit a traditional leader to participate in proceedings as one of a

[1] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1553 (CC).

[2] See, for example, I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law Vol 1 (2001) 311; RB Mqeke 'The Rule of Law and African Traditional Courts in the New Dispensation' (2001) 22 Obiter 416, 423.

[3] South African Law Reform Commission Report on Traditional Courts and the Judicial Function of Traditional Leaders Project 90, Report (21 January 2003) 7. Note that elections may bring new problems, as the system of elected judges in many states in the United States has shown. In particular, if the job is paid, councillors will have strong incentives to retain their jobs, which may involve appeasing powerful members of the community.

[4] Ibid at 7–8.

group, but, a traditional leader cannot, on his or her own, have final decision-making power, nor can someone who has not participated in the proceedings retain a veto.

(ii) Legislative powers

Legislation is not a great feature of customary law, which derives its legitimacy from tradition. It follows that those responsible for maintaining and applying the law are more inclined to preserve existing rules than to generate new ones. Even so, customary law obviously permits the making of new laws, and all rulers, depending on their status in the hierarchy of offices, have some degree of legislative power.[1]

This power is now superseded, however, by the Final Constitution. Final Constitution s 43 provides that legislative authority vests in Parliament (in the national sphere), in provincial legislatures (in the provincial sphere) and in municipal councils (in the local sphere).[2] Nevertheless, traditional leaders retain an involvement in law-making both through their participation in the provincial and national houses of traditional leaders and through the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act, which lists as a function of traditional councils 'participating in the development of … legislation at local level'.[3] In these cases, the role of traditional leadership can be advisory only, although in many municipalities traditional leaders will doubtless be very influential.

(iii) Executive and administrative powers

Executive or administrative action in customary law was based on the principles of consultation and rationality. Before making a decision, rulers had to consult their councils, and, for serious matters affecting the commonweal, they had to consult a gathering of all adult males, who represented the interests of the entire nation.[4] Any proposal to be made had to be supported by good reasons, the merits of which would be debated in council.[5] Decisions were supposed to be

[1] See I Schapera Tribal Legislation among the Tswana (1943); I Schapera Tribal Innovators: Tswana Chiefs and Social Change (1970) Chapter 2 (Gives detailed evidence of the legislative activities of Tswana chiefs.) See also FM D'Engelbronner-Kolff in FM D'Engelbronner-Kolff, MO Hinz & JL Sindano (eds) Traditional Authority and Democracy in Southern Africa (1998) 71ff.

[2] In the national and provincial spheres of government, however, special bodies were created to allow traditional leaders to participate in the legislative process by expressing their views on matters of customary law and traditional leadership.

[3] Act 41 of 2003 ('TLGFA' or 'Traditional Leadership Act') s 4(1)(f).

[4] See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 41–2, 63–4; Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 134–5; MW Prinsloo Inheemse Publiekreg in Lebowa (1983)('Prinsloo Publiekreg') 154; Hunter Reaction to Conquest (supra) at 394; Mönnig (supra) at 284–5; Krige The Social System of the Zulus (supra) 219; H Kuper An African Aristocracy (1947) 36–8. What constitutes a 'serious matter' is naturally difficult to define. An early case, Hermansberg Mission Society v Commissioner for Native Affairs & Another, held that alienation of tribal land required consent of only the chief's council (not the greater tribal council). 1906 TS 135. In Mogale v Engelbrecht & Others, the rule in Hermansberg was approved as a matter of principle. 1907 TS 836. In Mathibe v Tsoke the court noted obiter that only a majority of councillors needed to consent. 1925 AD 105, 114–16. See also Rathibe v Reid & Another 1926 AD 74.

[5] See, eg, Kekane v Mokgoko 1953 NAC 93 (NE).

unanimous, and unanimity through persuasion was the ideal.[1] In the final analysis, however, the most important check on abuse of power was the need to maintain political support: a ruler who persisted in acting against a council's opinion was courting disaster.[2]

The Final Constitution now sets out a framework within which all government power must be exercised. Most importantly, it requires accountable and accessible government, and it is here that adjustments to the style of traditional government will be required. The Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act makes a start in this regard by requiring councils to report to their communities at least once a year 'to give account of the activities and finances of the traditional council'.[3] In addition, the Act requires provincial legislation to:

> regulate the performance of functions by a traditional council by at least requiring it to — (a) keep proper records; (b) have its financial statements audited; (c) disclose the receipt of gifts; and (d) adhere to the code of conduct.[4]

These provisions on their own, however, cannot establish a relationship of accountability between leaders and the community, as they give the community no method of holding leaders to account for unsatisfactory performance. This lacuna is most striking in the provisions in the Act dealing with the removal of traditional leaders: no mention is made of a failure to govern in an accountable and responsive way as a ground for removal.[5] In short, a key component of accountability is missing: the power of the person or body to whom account is given to act in case of improper government.[6]

Other elements of accountable government to affect traditional rule concern administrative law. Even before the new Constitution came into force, it was argued that a traditional ruler's administrative powers were subject to the common-law standards. Hence, to the extent that customary law permitted departure from the principles of natural justice, for example, by denying audi alteram partem, it was invalid.[7] The common law was, in its turn, superseded by FC s 33(1), [1] See WJO Jeppe Bophuthatswana: Land Tenure and Development (1980) 128; AJB Hughes Land Tenure, Land Rights and Land Communities on Swazi National Land in Swaziland: A Discussion of Some Inter-relationships between the Traditional Tenurial System and Problems of Agrarian Development (1972) 105.

[2] See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 53 (A traditional ruler may not act contrary to the advice of the national council.)

[3] See TLGFA s 4(3)(b).

[4] See TLGFA s 4(2).

[5] A community that wants to remove a leader who fails to provide accountable government might be able to argue that the offender had transgressed customary law in a way which is serious enough to warrant removal. The removal of leaders was always controversial, however, and a non-accountable government will not be an easy ground to argue given the control exercised by royal houses and the increased formalization of leadership positions under the Traditional Leadership Act.

[6] See White Paper on Traditional Leadership (supra) at 54. The document gives a hint of the reason for this omission. The drafters appear to have been concerned only with accountability to the government, not with accountability (as it is usually understood in the context of the exercise of public power) to the governed.

[7] See TW Bennett 'Administrative-Law Controls over Chiefs' Customary Powers of Removal' (1993) 110 SALJ 276, 288–91.

which provides that administrative action must be 'lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair', and FC s 33(2), which provides that anyone 'whose rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons'.

These provisions were then refined and amplified by the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[1] Under s 3 of this Act, any administrative action that 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person' must be 'procedurally fair'.[2] Although procedural fairness depends upon the circumstances of each case,[3] which allows traditional rulers a certain degree of latitude, it is defined to include adequate notice of an action, opportunity to make representations, a clear statement of the action, notice of a right of review (or appeal),[4] and notice of the right to request written reasons (within 90 days).[5] Apart from the last requirement, which may present some difficulties,[6] the customary procedures can easily be adjusted to comply with these provisions (if they do not already comply). Where administrative action is not procedurally fair, a court may review the action.

Section 3 deals only with the audi alteram partem rule. Under the common law, however, procedural fairness also required an absence of bias, which is expressly recognized in the Act, as well as a provision allowing the courts to review administrative action if administrators were reasonably suspected of bias.[7] Here traditional leaders may be confronted with the same challenges as they face in their judicial role. As decision-makers and administrators, leaders may struggle to show sufficient distance from issues, and may thus fall foul of the requirement of impartiality.

The requirement that administrative action be both reasonable and rational is perhaps more easily met. The Constitutional Court has found that what is reasonable will depend on the circumstances of each case. Factors that assist in the determination of the reasonableness of a decision include the nature of the decision, the identity and expertise of the decision-maker, the complexity and breadth of underlying factors, what reasons are given, the nature of competing interests involved, as well as the impact of the decision.[8] For decisions taken in traditional communities, the participation of a traditional council and the ensuing transparency and openness of the decision-making would be relevant.

[1] Act 3 of 2000 ('PAJA').

[2] See PAJA s 3(1). Section 4 lays down even more stringent requirements for action affecting the public.

[3] See PAJA s 3(2).

[4] See PAJA s 3(2)(b).

[5] See PAJA s 5.

[6] In a predominantly oral culture, governmental acts are not necessarily recorded in writing. Section 5(4) of PAJA, however, allows an administrator to depart from the requirement to give adequate reasons 'if it is reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances'.

[7] See PAJA s 6(2)(a)(iii).

[8] See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 45.

Application of both the Bill of Rights and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act depends on the classification of an act as 'administrative action'[1] and the judicial functions of traditional leaders are expressly excluded from the definition of administrative action in the Administrative Justice Act.[2] The Constitutional Court has affirmed that it is the nature of the function rather than the functionary that must be taken into account in determining whether the requirements of administrative justice apply.[3] Even in this regard, customary law does not clearly differentiate the functions of government, and so it may well happen that statutory requirements are inadvertently breached.

(d) Land

In 2004, the Communal Land Rights Act[4] was passed, primarily with a view to giving landholders under customary law greater security of tenure as required by FC s 25. It is designed to override customary interests over communal land and generate an entirely new system of land tenure, similar to that provided by the Communal Property Associations Act.[5] Because the former Act is not yet in force, we first describe the existing customary powers of traditional leaders and their councils, and then consider the impact of the Final Constitution on this regime. Thereafter we discuss the Communal Land Rights Act.

As leaders of their nations, chiefs enjoyed a range of rights and privileges over land, including a right to demand tribute from the harvest or the hunt and a right to choose the best land for their own purposes. They also represented their people in any dealings with the land. As a result of this conglomeration of powers, certain rulers have, perhaps inevitably, described themselves as 'owners' of their domains, and, therefore, entitled to sell mineral rights and charge rents for businesses.[6] This type of claim, however, is a calculated misinterpretation of the general principles of customary law, because the exercise of customary powers must always be for the benefit of the nation, and all major decisions must be endorsed, at least by the ruling council, if not the national council.

[1] Section 1(1)(a) of PAJA defines 'administrative action' to mean any decision (or failure to take a decision) by an organ of state. A distinction must, however, be drawn between administrative and executive acts, the former denoting implementation of a law or judicial decision and the latter formulation of policy. Although executive acts do not fall within the purview of the Act, they must comply with the broad principle of 'legality' that was developed in Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Transitional Metropolitan Council. 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC). See also Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC). While the content of this principle is still uncertain, it means, at the very least, that a functionary must act rationally within powers granted by the Final Constitution. Ibid at para 85.

[2] See PAJA s 1*(b)*(ee).

[3] See President of the RSA v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at para 141. See C Hoexter New Constitutional and Administrative Law (2001) 93–4.

[4] Act 11 of 2004.

[5] Act 28 of 1996.

[6] See, for example, I Schapera Native Land Tenure in the Bechuanaland Protectorate (1943)('Schapera Native Land Tenure') 258–60; JF Holleman 'Some Shona Tribes of Southern Africa' in E Colson & M Gluckman Seven Tribes of British Central Africa (1961) 379.

(i) Traditional power to allot land

All the chiefdoms in South Africa have been settled for many decades, and all of them are hopelessly overcrowded. Rulers are therefore seldom, if ever, called upon to exercise such traditional powers as establishing new realms, marking out royal homesteads or zoning land into sections dedicated to grazing or farming.[1] Of greater day-to-day importance is the power to allot plots of land to subjects who need places to live and farm.

In practice, however, because most land has already been allotted, the ruler is more often required to do no more than approve a transfer between existing landholders.[2] Although he is under no obligation to accede to a request, the ruler is supposed to behave as a benevolent father with a general responsibility for his subjects' welfare. His power is therefore construed as a duty.[3] What can be done to meet all the demands, however, obviously depends upon the amount of land available, and many rulers must now fall short of the ideal notion that they are providers for their people.

As it happens, everyday allotments are seldom the responsibility of high authority. A subject's entitlement to land within a chiefdom arises not from affiliation to the nation, but, rather, from attachment to one of its wards.[4] The applicant for land on which to build a house, church, store or school, or on which to grow crops must, in the first instance, approach the local wardhead.[5] Unfortunately, the likelihood is that all available land has already been taken. Hence, someone looking for a site will generally be obliged to arrange for a transfer from an existing resident.[6]

[1] See AJ Kerr Customary Law of Immovable Property and of Succession (3rd Edition, 1990) 30 (Botswana is probably the only exception to this rule.) See Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 59ff; NJ Van Warmelo & WMD Phophi Venda Law: Parts 1–3 (1948), Part 4 (1949), Part 5 (1967) 1065–6. Cf Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 22.

[2] The extent to which a ruler intervenes depends largely on his personal power. Weak rulers do little more than rubber stamp decisions that have already been reached by a neighbourhood. See C R Cross 'The Land Question in Kwa-Zulu: Is Land Reform Necessary?' (1987) 4 Development SA 428 (Cross 'The Land Question') 436.

[3] See Hughes (supra) at 110–11; Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 24.

[4] This entitlement is termed a 'right of avail'. See VGJ Sheddick Land Tenure in Basutoland (1954) 32; Hughes (supra) at 62; Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 13–14; P Duncan Sotho Laws and Customs (1960) 86–7; EM Letsoalo Land Reforms in South Africa (1987) 19; I Hamnett Chieftainship and Legitimacy: An Anthropological Study of Executive Law in Lesotho (1975) 65. Wards are clearly defined geographic units that are usually ruled by heads of aristocratic families. On the concept of the ward, see Hughes (supra) at 101–2; Holleman (supra) at 367–9; Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 27–32; MFC Bourdillon The Shona Peoples: An Ethnography of the Contemporary Shona with Special Reference to their Religion (1976) 123–4, WJO Jeppe Die Ontwikkeling van Bestuursinstellings in die Westelike Bantoegebiede (Tswana-Tuisland)(1970) 113; Sheddick (supra) at 8–9.

[5] If no wardhead exists, then the person must approach the authority directly in charge of the area. See C De Wet & M Whisson (eds) From Reserve to Region: Apartheid and Social Change in the Keiskammahoek District of (former) Ciskei 1950–1990 (1997) 17.

[6] See CR Cross Informal Tenure in South Africa: Systems of Transfer and Succession (1993) 16 (Notes that the wardhead then does little more than act as an intermediary to facilitate the claim.)

Although the allotment of land is not governed by set rules or procedures, it is not a matter of pure discretion. Wardheads must achieve at least a fair distribution of the land in their areas so that all householders have enough according to their needs. To this end, decisions to allot land are taken on the advice of elders and the applicant's future neighbours.[1] In common-law terms, this is an administrative act, and is therefore subject to the principles of administrative law.[2]

Strictly speaking, all allotments are gratuitous,[3] but nowadays it is usual to pay some form of consideration. These payments could, of course, be treated as bribes, but they can also be construed as a form of naturalization fee (or thank offering), that traditionally betokened submission to political authority.[4] Proof of corruption is therefore difficult to sustain.[5] Nevertheless, the receipt of gifts in return for services sits uncomfortably with a traditional leader's position as a paid state official. The Code of Conduct in the Schedule to the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act[6] now requires traditional leaders to disclose any gifts received, and this provision may provide an incentive to bring the system to an end.

To provide evidence of a landholder's rights, the act of allotment and a description of the land concerned must, in some way, be publicized.[7] In certain areas, registers of allotments are kept,[8] but, if neither an official document nor a witness to the initial act is available, customary law gives no indication of how landholders are to prove their titles.

[1] See BA Marwick The Swazi (1966) 162; Hughes (supra) at 129; Kuper (supra) at 48–9; Cross 'The Land Question' (supra) at 436. So far as the applicant for land is concerned, the temptation is obviously to shorten this process by simply buying or leasing rights. See CR Cross 'Informal Tenures against the State Landholding Systems in African Rural Areas' in M De Klerk (ed) A Harvest of Discontent (1991) 74.

[2] See FC s 33 and PAJA. Because an applicant has no definite rights before an allotment is made, the decision is administrative, not judicial. See Duncan (supra) at 88 and Nzama v Nzama 1942 NAC (N&T) 8. Regarding allotment by the state, see Gaboetloeloe v Tsikwe 1945 NAC (C&O) 2 and Dlomo v Dlomo 4 NAC 181 (1922). Cf Hamnett (supra) at 63–5.

[3] According to Kuper, the Swazi use the verb kuphakela to describe allotment. Kuper (supra) at 45. This is the same word that is used to denote serving food - and every individual has a right to be fed.

[4] See Hamnett (supra) at 72; RJ Haines & CPG Tapscott 'The Silence of Poverty: Tribal Administration and Development in Rural Transkei' in CR Cross & RJ Haines (eds) Towards Freehold: Options for Land and Development in South Africa's Black Rural Areas (1988) at 169–70; N Bromberger 'Introduction to the land tenure debate from reality' in Cross & Haines (supra) at 208; and Jeppe Bophuthatswana (supra) at 24–5.

[5] Nevertheless, control of land provides good opportunities for bribery, which has been the cause of widespread complaint throughout southern Africa. See WD Hammond-Tooke Command or Consensus: The Development of Transkeian Local Government (1975) 211; WD Hammond Tooke 'Chieftainship in Transkeian Political Development' (1964) 2 J Mod Afr Studies 313, 320–1; Hunter Reaction to Conquest (supra) at 114; H Ashton The Basuto (1952) 147–8; Hamnett (supra) at 76.

[6] Item 1*(l)* of Act 41 of 2003.

[7] See Hughes (supra) at 132–3; Ashton (supra) at 147. Without a public record, officials in control of land are given even better opportunities for corruption. According to Hamnett, they may declare that land had never, in fact, been allotted, or that it had been lent on a temporary basis. See Hamnett (supra) at 69.

[8] See Duncan (supra) at 89. In Lesotho, traditional rulers appoint special officials whose job is to supervise allotments. See Hamnett (supra) at 69.

(ii) Traditional power to regulate common resources

Although all subjects have free access to common resources, in customary practice, rulers may determine when and how these resources are to be used. This power, which may be exercised only for the public good, requires a careful balancing of the people's welfare and a need to protect the environment.[1] Thus, in times of scarcity, rulers may be obliged to impose restrictions on use, and there is ample evidence to show that they have reacted swiftly when the need arose. Over fifty years ago, for instance, Tswana leaders banned the killing of certain species of game,[2] and prohibited the practice of annually burning pasturage to encourage new spring growth.[3]

Formally, customary law gives traditional leaders all the powers necessary to safeguard the environment.[4] However, three factors militate against effective action. First, a coherent policy requires central planning and an administrative infrastructure for implementation. Where political authority is diffuse and decentralized, prompt, co-ordinated action is much more difficult to achieve.[5] Secondly, the very ethic of customary law is to give priority to human needs. Hence, traditional rulers tend to be more concerned with social support networks than the environment.[6] Thirdly, the painful fact remains that very little can be done to conserve natural resources when chiefdoms are suffering all the problems of poverty and overpopulation.[7]

(iii) Traditional powers of expropriation and confiscation

Under customary law, traditional authorities have a general power to order landholders or, occasionally, even whole communities to relinquish the lands they were allotted. The reasons for issuing such orders are various, but they may be loosely grouped into two, or possibly, three categories.

In the first, land may be expropriated for a general public purpose. The tract in question may be needed for constructing public works, such as roads or dams,[8] or the soil may be exhausted and in need of conservation measures.[9] In these

[1] See, eg, B Sansom 'Traditional Economic Systems' in WD Hammond-Tooke (ed) The Bantu-speaking Peoples of Southern Africa (2nd Edition, 1974) 137–8 (On the problem of deciding when grass may be cut.) Although pre-colonial peoples are often depicted as 'children of nature', living in harmony with their environment, scholars today portray them as regulators. See W Beinart & P Coates Environment and History, The Taming of Nature in the USA and South Africa (1995) 3–4.

[2] See Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 257.

[3] See I Schapera A Handbook of Tswana Law and Custom (2nd Edition, 1955)('Schapera Handbook') 209.

[4] Of course, insofar as traditional rulers exercise administrative powers, they must comply with the requirements of FC s 33 and PAJA.

[5] It is noticeable, for instance, that the main examples of environmental control come from relatively centralized polities in Lesotho and Botswana. See Schapera Handbook (supra) at 212; Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 42–4 and 263; Sheddick (supra) at 124; Duncan (supra) at Chapters 37, 46 and 49.

[6] Cross 'The Land Question' (supra) at 438.

[7] See, eg, EM Preston-Whyte 'Land and Development at Indaleni' (1987) 4 Development SA 401, 415.

[8] See AC Myburgh & MW Prinsloo Indigenous Public Law in KwaNdebele (1985) 41–2.

[9] See Sheddick (supra) at 170. See also M Wilson & MEE Mills Keiskammahoek Rural Survey Vol 4 (1952) 26; Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 183.

cases, the dispossessed landholder is compensated with land elsewhere in the realm.

In the second category, a removal order is issued to penalize a landholder for committing an offence,[1] typically a violation of one of the rules governing land use, such as starting to plough before permission was given. In addition, however, this type of order may be made in order to rid the community of the disruptive influence of criminal delinquents. Unfortunately, a more self-serving motive — to put down political dissent — may well underlie the ostensible reason.[2]

In cases of criminal confiscation, no form of compensation is paid, and the offending landholder may even lose whatever improvements were made to the land. At most, he or she will be allowed to dismantle buildings and harvest the crops that happen to be standing in the fields.[3] If the wrongdoing was serious and persistent, the dispossessed holder may lose all entitlement to land in the realm (which is tantamount to banishment or expulsion).[4]

There is, perhaps, a third reason for issuing removal orders. Land may be taken away from holders who are not occupying it beneficially or who have more than is necessary for their subsistence needs.[5]

The power of removal, which is comparable with the common-law doctrine of eminent domain, has both good and bad features. On the one hand, removal orders can be used to achieve an equitable distribution of land, and, for this purpose, they may be issued to penalize absentee landholders and to encourage productive farming.[6] On the other hand, removal orders are a convenient weapon for silencing political opposition, and, in the hands of corrupt and unpopular rulers, they are open to abuse.[7]

[1] See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 42; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 137 (Landholder may be dispossessed only for commission of several serious offences.)

[2] See Ashton (supra) at 149–50; Sheddick (supra) at 62 and 155.

[3] See Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 137; Hughes (supra) at 228–9. See also Sheddick (supra) at 72.

[4] In customary law, banishment is the appropriate sanction for rejecting the authority of a ruler and his council. See Prinsloo Die Inheemse Administratiefreg van 'n Noord-Sothostam (1981)('Prinsloo Administrafiereg') 71 and 194–5; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 136–8. But see Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 29 (Report that banishment is so serious that only immigrants can be punished in this way, and then only for persistent disobedience to the law or for contempt of the ruler.) Cf Kuper (supra) at 149. See, further, Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 107–8; Letsoalo (supra) at 22; Hughes (supra) at 146–9. The customary duties of loyalty and respect for traditional leaders received statutory support in regulation 6 of the Regulations Prescribing the Duties and Powers of Chiefs. Proc R110 of 1957.

[5] See Hamnett (supra) at 68; Ashton (supra) at 145–6; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 137; Sheddick (supra) at 155; Schapera Handbook (supra) at 207; Schapera Native Land Tenure (supra) at 181–2.

[6] By the same token, however, frequent removals can create a sense of insecurity, especially among those who, by hard work and good husbandry, increase their farming yields. See Hamnett (supra) at 75–6; Hughes (supra) at 149; N Vink Systems of Land Tenure: Implications for Development in Southern Africa (1986) 40–1. See also Hughes (supra) at 148 (Notes that fear of banishment in Swaziland tended to inhibit agricultural development, because a man who was too successful ran the risk of being told that he had land surplus to his family's subsistence needs.)

[7] See Haines & Tapscott (supra) at 169–70; DR Tapson 'Rural Development and the Homelands' (1990) 7 Development SA 561, 572. See also Hamnett (supra) at 66. Hamnett argues that the power to issue an order of ejectment is even more effective in controlling people than the threat of criminal prosecution.

Customary law provides no clearly defined restraint on the power to issue removal orders, apart from a procedural requirement that the ruler should consult his council[1] and give reasons for his decision.[2] It is uncertain, however, when a matter should go to council or which council is to be consulted. (And, of course, consultation offers no more than an assurance that an issue is considered; a ruler is not bound by the council's advice.) What is more, customary law does not always give the affected landholder a right of audi alteram partem. He or she may be allowed to make submissions to the ruler in council, but, when land is expropriated for public purposes, there is no automatic right to a hearing.[3]

The former Supreme Court often had cause to consider customary removal orders, which, in the language of the day, were termed 'trekpas'.[4] The Court might have been expected to find the absence of a right of audi alteram partem incompatible with the principles of natural justice,[5] but surprisingly, this was not the view of the leading case: S v Mukwevho; S v Ramukhuba.[6] In general, the courts did little other than to confirm customary practice, namely, that a council had to be consulted and that good and sufficient reasons had to be given.[7]

The Final Constitution and the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act[8] now demand changes to these traditional practices. First, the Act removes the power of removal from traditional leaders, and, instead, vests it in a majority of landholders. Thus, it is provided that, although an individual may be deprived of an 'informal right to land'[9] in accordance with the custom of a community, that custom must be modified to reflect principles of democratic governance. The Act does this by redefining custom to include:

> the principle that a decision to dispose of any such right [namely, a customary interest in land] may only be taken by a majority of the holders of such rights present or represented at [1] If the order involves a number of families, the more representative national council should be consulted. See Myburgh & Prinsloo (supra) at 41–2 and 63–4; Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 134–5; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 154; Hunter (supra) at 394; HO Mönnig The Pedi (1967) 284–5; Krige (supra) at 219–20. Cf Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act 31 of 1996.

[2] The merits of a removal order will obviously be debated in council. See, eg, Kekane v Mokgoko 1953 NAC 93, 97 (NE).

[3] See Prinsloo Administratiefreg (supra) at 70 and 138; Prinsloo Publiekreg (supra) at 154.

[4] See Mokhatle & Others v Union Government 1926 AD 71, 77 ('Mohkatle'). Trekpas was described as 'the power to direct the removal, by means of expulsion from the tribal property, of any natives who have committed acts of insubordination and hostility to the duly constituted authority of the chief or of any sub-chief under him.' Although trekpas is widely reported in the ethnographic literature, S v Mukwevho; S v Ramukhuba held that not all systems of customary law would permit traditional rulers to issue such an order. 1983 (3) SA 498, 501 (V)

[5] See the so-called repugnancy proviso in s 1 of the Law of Evidence Amendment Act 45 of 1988.

[6] 1983 (3) SA 498, 500–1 (V). This case was consistent with previous judgments. See Mokhatle (supra) at 77; Kuena v Minister of Native Affairs 1955 (4) SA 281 (T). Most of the earlier cases, however, dealt with the 'customary' power that used to vest in the Governor-General (later State President), as Supreme Chief, under s 5(1)(b) of the Black Administration Act. Act 38 of 1927.

[7] See Mokhatle (supra) at 78–9; Kekane v Mokgoko 1953 NAC 93, 97 (NE).

[8] Section 2 of Act 31 of 1996 ('Informal Land Rights Act').

[9] See Informal Land Rights Act s 1(1)(iii)(a)(i)(Defines informal land rights to include customary interests.)

a meeting convened for the purpose of considering such disposal and of which they have been given sufficient notice, and in which they have had a reasonable opportunity to participate.[1]

As its name indicates, the Act was initially intended as a temporary measure, and it required annual renewal by the Minister to remain in effect. The Communal Land Rights Act, however, removes the renewal requirement.[2] It now seems that, when this Act comes into force, the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act will lose its temporary nature.

As far as customary law is concerned, this Act has introduced a number of problems. In particular, the requirement that a majority of landholders are to support the removal order raises a problem of determining which landholders are to participate, members of a ward or the entire nation? It also appears improper to have a penal removal order taken by majority vote. Critics of the Act add that customary landholders are already protected by various constitutional rights, most of which guarantee a process of fair decision-making by the chief-in-council. The obvious concern here is that it is difficult for people in rural areas to assert constitutional rights. But this is a difficulty that is not addressed by the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act, as decisions by meetings of landholders will, appropriately, be subject to the same scrutiny under the Bill of Rights as decisions of traditional leaders and their councils — democratic decision-making cannot on its own limit a right.

Removal orders are obviously now subject to the Bill of Rights, as well as the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[3] The undifferentiated powers of government in customary law allow traditional rulers to exercise their removal powers on different grounds without specifying which. In order to assess the lawfulness of an order, however, its reason and purpose must be investigated, for only then will it be apparent which function of government is being exercised, and hence which section of the Bill of Rights is applicable. For instance, if a landholder were deprived of rights for committing an offence, and, if the ruler performed a judicial (or quasi-judicial) function to determine guilt, s 34 of the Constitution would be applicable. The landholder would then be entitled to present a defence at a fair public hearing.[4] Alternatively, guilt may already have been established in a separate hearing, in which case the removal is more likely to be an administrative function. If so, FC s 33, together with the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, is applicable. The landholder would then be entitled to just administrative action.

[1] See Informal Land Rights Act ss 2(2) and (4).

[2] See Informal Land Rights Act Schedule 1, Part 1.

[3] Act 3 of 2000 ('PAJA').

[4] Because the grounds for issuing removal orders vary, the courts have not been consistent in classifying them. See, eg, Gaboetloeloe v Tsikwe 1945 NAC (C&O) 2 (Considered the act to be administrative rather than judicial.) See also Mokhatle (supra) at 77–8; Masenya v Seleka Tribal Authority & Another 1981 (1) SA 522, 525 (T)(Held that it was not an exercise of criminal jurisdiction.)

If land is expropriated so that it can be used for a public cause, FC s 25 (the property clause) may also be applicable.[1] FC s 25(2) permits 'expropriation only in terms of law of general application — (a) for a public purpose or in the public interest; and (b) subject to compensation . . .'.[2] To determine the applicability of FC s 25, however, a distinction must be drawn between expropriation and control of use.[3] The former refers to the removal of private rights for public purposes, whereas the latter refers to regulation of the use of property in order to protect citizen from citizen. Whenever an order is intended to extinguish rights permanently, it falls within the ambit of s 25(2), and the affected landholder must be duly compensated. FC s 25 is not applicable if an order is simply aimed at regulating the way land is to be used.[4]

Regardless of whether a removal order was intended to expropriate land or regulate use, it may still be subject to FC s 33.[5] FC s 33(1) imposes a requirement of 'lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair' action, and subsection (2) provides that anyone 'whose rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons'. Both provisions have been refined by the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, which requires any administrative action[6] that 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person' to be 'procedurally fair'.[7]

(iv) The Communal Land Rights Act[8]

Once implemented, the Communal Land Rights Act will create an entirely new system of land tenure in traditional areas. To this end, land subject to customary

[1] Orders issued pursuant to the commission of an offence fall outside the ambit of this section, because they are acts of penal confiscation. FC s 25(1) allows individuals to be deprived of their property, provided that the deprivation occurs under a law of general application and the law does not permit arbitrary action.

[2] Because FC s 25(2) provides that rights may be expropriated only 'in terms of law', it could be taken to imply a legislative enactment. On this interpretation, the power of removal would no longer be valid. On the other hand, if 'law' is read to include customary law, which appears the more reasonable construction, then removal powers remain valid. In other respects, customary law is consonant with the requirements in FC s 25(2)(b) governing payment of compensation.

[3] See J Murphy 'Property Rights in the New Constitution: An Analytical Framework for Constitutional Review' (1993) 26 CILSA 211, 218–19. See also T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46.

[4] See Cape Town Municipality v Abdulla 1976 (2) SA 370, 375 (C)(On control of resources.)

[5] In this case, the act must be administrative, as opposed to executive, in the sense that it implements a rule or law already issued or promulgated. For the distinction between executive and administrative action, see President of the RSA v South African Rugby Football Union. 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at para 147.

[6] Removal orders intended to expropriate land for public purposes or to regulate its use fall within s 1 of the Act, which defines 'administrative action' as action by 'an organ of state, when exercising a power in terms of the Constitution which adversely affects the rights of any person.'

[7] See PAJA s 3(1). Section 4 lays down the even more stringent requirements for action affecting the public, but the choice of procedures is left to the official concerned. PAJA s 4(1)(d).

[8] Act 11 of 2004 ('CLR Act').

tenure or a permission to occupy[1] is to be transferred to 'communities'.[2] The 'communities' are constituted as juristic persons and thus the registered title-holders of the land.[3] The area of land involved is then to be subdivided into portions, and each portion must be registered in the names of individual persons.[4]

The powers to represent the community, dispose of rights in communal land, allocate and register individual rights and, generally, promote and safeguard the community's interests vest in land administration committees.[5] If a community is already subject to a traditional council (established under the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act),[6] the council may exercise the committee's powers.[7] Otherwise, communities may create new committee structures.[8] The Act does not specify the number of members, but it does provide that one third must be women, one person must represent the interests of vulnerable members of the community (women, children, the elderly and the disabled), and that non-voting members may be designated by the Minister of Land Affairs, the chairperson of the appropriate land rights board, the MECs for agriculture and local government, and the municipality in whose area the committee falls. Subject to the rule allowing a traditional council to perform the functions of a committee, traditional leaders may not be elected.[9]

Section 19 of the Act provides that, prior to establishing a committee, the community must draw up a code of rules to regulate the use and administration of communal land. If it fails to draw up its own set of rules, those prescribed in regulations to be passed under the Act will apply. Provided that the rules comply with the Final Constitution and the Act, they may be registered, and they then become binding.

On the face of it, the Act deprives traditional rulers of all their customary powers over land. However, because traditional leaders are likely to constitute the dominant members of the land administration committees, they will continue to wield considerable influence. This possibility has provoked serious disquiet among women's groups and others doubtful of the value of traditional leadership.[10]

[1] The generalized terms in the text find fuller and more precise definition in CLR Act s 2(1).

[2] 'Communities' are defined in s 1 as groups of 'persons whose rights to land are derived from shared rules determining access to land held in common by such group.'

[3] See CLR Act ss 3 and 5.

[4] See CLR Act ss 18(3)(a) and (b).

[5] See CLR Act s 24.

[6] See Section 3 of Act 41 of 2003.

[7] See CLR Act s 21(2).

[8] See CLR Act s 21(1).

[9] See CLR Act s 22.

[10] See, eg, B Cousins & A Claassens 'Communal Land Rights, Democracy and Traditional leaders in Post-Apartheid South Africa' in M Saruchera (ed) Securing Land and Resource Rights in Africa: Pan-African Perspectives (2004); B Cousins '"Embeddedness" versus Titling: African Land Tenure Systems and the Potential Impacts of the Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004' (2006) Stellenbosch LR — (forthcoming) (manuscript on file with authors).

Research driven by the theory of legal pluralism has shown that statutes such as the Communal Land Rights Act are unlikely to succeed in supplanting the role of chiefs. Members of rural communities will have to be strongly committed to the new regime, otherwise, strict enforcement will be necessary. To this end, the Department of Land Affairs will monitor land administration committees through Land Rights Boards.[1] According to current estimates, however, the Department has neither the finance nor the personnel necessary to ensure a fully effective set of enforcement mechanisms.[2]

26.7 Traditional Leadership: An Institution in Transition

Over the past ten years, attempts to fill out the sparse framework provided by the Constitution have proved to be hugely controversial. The two new laws that are at the centre of the government's attempts to bring the traditional practice of traditional leadership into line with South Africa's new democratic values, the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act and the Communal Land Rights Act, remain deeply problematic. They satisfy neither the traditional leaders who are seeking more security nor those who argue that traditional government needs to transform radically to serve the new democracy.

The main contribution to democracy in the new Acts is their requirement that decisions in traditional communities must be made by groups which include a percentage of democratically elected people and women. Thus, for the development of democratic practices, they rely on increasing pressure from the communities themselves and gradual change in customary practices. Their lack of clarity on the relationships between traditional leaders and their councils, on the one hand, and traditional leaders and local government, on the other, provides little incentive for traditional leaders to reconsider their roles. Admittedly, the new laws show some attempt to develop the accountability of traditional leaders and their councils, but, in general, the accountability provisions are weak, and, with decisions about succession to leadership positions placed firmly in the hands of traditional elites, ordinary community members are left with limited influence.

A number of serious constitutional problems posed by the institution of traditional leadership also remain unresolved by the new legal regime. The first, and most prominent, is probably the rule of patrilineal succession. It seems as if the courts have been left with the problem of finding a solution. Secondly, as Mhlekwa & Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another found, the system of customary courts fails to meet the Constitution's requirements of judicial independence and impartiality.[3] The progress made on passing a new law to regulate customary courts, however, has been painfully slow. Thirdly, for similar reasons, the administrative functions of traditional leaders are also likely to be challenged. This matter appears not to have received attention from the Law Reform Commission, Parliament or the executive.

[1] See CLR Act, Chapter 8.

[2] See A Claassens 'Women, Customary Law and Discrimination: The Impact of the Communal Land Rights Act' 2005 Acta Juridica 42, 77.

[3] 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk), 2000 (9) BCLR 979 (Tk).

Finally, a matter of greater concern to democrats: the new Acts may insert traditional leaders between members of rural traditional communities and their democratically elected representatives. This possibility is most likely to be realized in the local sphere of government, as the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act anticipates considerable interaction between traditional councils and municipalities. There is already evidence, however, that bureaucrats and politicians in both the provincial and national spheres of government assume that consultation with traditional leaders is equivalent to consultation with the communities themselves. This trend is encouraged by the convenience of speaking to chiefs (rather than members of the public), by the fact that they are easily identified as leaders of their communities and by the likelihood that chiefs will be well informed on local affairs (because of their participation in the houses of traditional leaders). As submissions to Parliament on both the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act and the Communal Land Rights Act demonstrated, however, the views of traditional leaders and those of different groups in their communities can differ considerably.

The question is whether the current position, which leaves change in the hands of communities, can serve the goals of the new constitutional framework. Many writers have emphasized the capacity of traditional communities to change, but, change, of course, has no predetermined outcome. In her study of several communities in Limpopo, Oomen gives a persuasive demonstration of this situation. In some cases democracy influenced traditional processes, in others, tradition displaced the democratic practices that had been introduced by the political struggle.

The record of 'living customary law' has a similar message. The idea of a 'living' law was expounded by writers who were concerned that the written law, as applied in the courts, did not reflect the actual practices of communities. Practice, it was argued, is generally progressive, and it adapts law to the needs of a modern society. But the rural women who came to Parliament in 2003 to protest about the chiefly powers protected in the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act described oppressive customary practices which left them destitute, sometimes homeless, and often deprived of their children.

In this regard, it seems that the new laws, rather than allowing for the dynamic development of customary practice, in fact, introduce a rigidity. They offer no framework for the gradual democratization of traditional communities. Instead, there is a real danger that the Acts will maintain the dependence of leaders on government, which was the hallmark of colonial rule and apartheid. It is true that the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act will change the composition of many tribal councils, but, like so much law, neither this nor the Communal Land Rights Act offers a programme for change. What is more, neither suggests ways in which the capacity of communities to change could be harnessed to ensure that hereditary leadership indeed comes to 'serve the interests of the people as a whole' in a democratic way.[1]

It may be that, as local governments develop the capacity to fulfil their constitutional roles, members of traditional communities will come to rely on them for the services that are usually provided by accountable government. Traditional leaders will then exert the cultural influence which is appropriate to their status, not exercise governmental powers.

[1] The Acts might, for instance, have given communities periodic opportunities to choose — and change — their form of government. They could require important decisions to be put to the vote, thereby insisting on community engagement in civic decision-making.

27 Public Finance

Ross R Kriel & Mona Monadjem

27.1 Introduction 27–6
(a) Public finance as a creature of the Final Constitution, statute, state institutions, regulations and practice 27–6
(b) Structure of the chapter 27–7
27.2. Raising revenue 27–8
(a) Sources of revenue 27–8
(b) Raising national revenue 27–8
(c) Raising provincial revenue 27–8
(d) Raising municipal revenue 27–9
27.3 Allocating revenue 27–14
(a) Responsibility for expenditure 27–14
(b) Functional allocation 27–14
(c) Imbalances between revenue and expenditure 27–17
(d) Equitable division of revenue 27–18
(e) Other allocation 27–21
(f) Compliance with grant conditions 27–21
(g) Unfunded mandates 27–22
27.4 The budget process 27–23
(a) Introduction 27–23
(b) Constitutional budgeting principles 27–24
(c) Legislation regulating budgets 27–28
(d) Content of budgets 27–29
27.5 Spending public funds 27–31
(a) Revenue funds 27–32
(b) Contracting 27–33
(c) Government borrowing 27–34
27.6 Monitoring and withholding public funds 27–41
(a) Regulation by National Treasury 27–41
(b) Provincial role in regulating public finance 27–46

(c) Intervention powers of the provinces 27–46
(d) Municipal financial failure 27–50
27.7 Other institutions 27–51
(a) Financial and Fiscal Commission 27–51
(b) Central Bank 27–52
27.8 Local government in South Africa's fiscal structure. 27–53
(a) Decentralised Structure 27–53
(b) Shift to intervention 27–54

213. National Revenue Fund

(1) There is a National Revenue Fund into which all money received by the national government must be paid, except money reasonably excluded by an Act of Parliament.

(2) Money may be withdrawn from the National Revenue Fund only—

(a) in terms of an appropriation by an Act of Parliament; or

(b) as a direct charge against the National Revenue Fund, when it is provided for in the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

(3) A province's equitable share of revenue raised nationally is a direct charge against the National Revenue Fund.

214. Equitable shares and allocations of revenue

(1) An Act of Parliament must provide for—

(a) the equitable division of revenue raised nationally among the national, provincial and local spheres of government;

(b) the determination of each province's equitable share of the provincial share of that revenue; and

(c) any other allocations to provinces, local government or municipalities from the national government's share of that revenue, and any conditions on which those allocations may be made.

(2) The Act referred to in subsection (1) may be enacted only after the provincial governments, organised local government and the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been consulted, and any recommendations of the Commission have been considered, and must take into account—

(a) the national interest;

(b) any provision that must be made in respect of the national debt and other national obligations;

(c) the needs and interests of the national government, determined by objective criteria;

(d) the need to ensure that the provinces and municipalities are able to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to them;

(e) the fiscal capacity and efficiency of the provinces and municipalities;

(f) developmental and other needs of provinces, local government and municipalities;

(g) economic disparities within and among the provinces;

(h) obligations of the provinces and municipalities in terms of national legislation;

(i) the desirability of stable and predictable allocations of revenue shares; and

(j) the need for flexibility in responding to emergencies or other temporary needs, and other factors based on similar objective criteria.

215. National, provincial and municipal budgets

(1) National, provincial and municipal budgets and budgetary processes must promote transparency, accountability and the effective financial management of the economy, debt and the public sector.

(2) National legislation must prescribe—

(a) the form of national, provincial and municipal budgets;

(b) when national and provincial budgets must be tabled; and

(c) that budgets in each sphere of government must show the sources of revenue and the way in which proposed expenditure will comply with national legislation.

(3) Budgets in each sphere of government must contain—

(a) estimates of revenue and expenditure, differentiating between capital and current expenditure;

(b) proposals for financing any anticipated deficit for the period to which they apply; and

(c) an indication of intentions regarding borrowing and other forms of public liability that will increase public debt during the ensuing year.

216. Treasury control

(1) National legislation must establish a national treasury and prescribe measures to ensure both transparency and expenditure control in each sphere of government, by introducing —

(a) generally recognised accounting practice;

(b) uniform expenditure classifications; and

(c) uniform treasury norms and standards.

(2) The national treasury must enforce compliance with the measures established in terms of subsection (1), and may stop the transfer of funds to an organ of state if that organ of state commits a serious or persistent material breach of those measures.

(3) A decision to stop the transfer of funds due to a province in terms of section 214 (1)(b) may be taken only in the circumstances mentioned in subsection (2), and—

(a) may not stop the transfer of funds for more than 120 days; and

(b) may be enforced immediately, but will lapse retrospectively unless Parliament approves it following a process substantially the same as that established in terms of section 76(1) and prescribed by the joint rules and orders of Parliament. This process must be completed within 30 days of the decision by the national treasury.

(4) Parliament may renew a decision to stop the transfer of funds for no more than 120 days at a time, following the process established in terms of subsection (3).

(5) Before Parliament may approve or renew a decision to stop the transfer of funds to a province —

(a) the Auditor-General must report to Parliament; and

(b) the province must be given an opportunity to answer the allegations against it, and to state its case, before a committee.

217. Procurement

(1) When an organ of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government, or any other institution identified in national legislation, contracts for goods or services, it must do so in accordance with a system which is fair, equitable, transparent, competitive and cost-effective.

(2) Subsection (1) does not prevent the organs of state or institutions referred to in that subsection from implementing a procurement policy providing for

(a) categories of preference in the allocation of contracts; and

(b) the protection or advancement of persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

3) National legislation must prescribe a framework within which the policy referred to in (subsection (2) must be implemented.

218. Government guarantees

(1) The national government, a provincial government or a municipality may guarantee a loan only if the guarantee complies with any conditions set out in national legislation.

(2) National legislation referred to in subsection (1) may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.

(3) Each year, every government must publish a report on the guarantees it has granted.

219. Remuneration of persons holding public office

(1) An Act of Parliament must establish a framework for determining—
   (a) the salaries, allowances and benefits of members of the National Assembly, permanent delegates to the National Council of Provinces, members of the Cabinet, Deputy Ministers, traditional leaders and members of any councils of traditional leaders; and
   (b) the upper limit of salaries, allowances or benefits of members of provincial legislatures, members of Executive Councils and members of Municipal Councils of the different categories.

(2) National legislation must establish an independent commission to make recommendations concerning the salaries, allowances and benefits referred to in subsection (1).

(3) Parliament may pass the legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).

(4) The national executive, a provincial executive, a municipality or any other relevant authority may implement the national legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).

(5) National legislation must establish frameworks for determining the salaries, allowances and benefits of judges, the Public Protector, the Auditor-General, and members of any commission provided for in the Constitution, including the broadcasting authority referred to in section 192.

Financial and Fiscal Commission

220. Establishment and functions

(1) There is a Financial and Fiscal Commission for the Republic which makes recommendations envisaged in this Chapter, or in national legislation, to Parliament, provincial legislatures and any other authorities determined by national legislation.

(2) The Commission is independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, and must be impartial.

(3) The Commission must function in terms of an Act of Parliament and, in performing its functions, must consider all relevant factors, including those listed in section 214(2).

221. Appointment and tenure of members

(1) The Commission consists of the following women and men appointed by the President, as head of the national executive:
   (a) A chairperson and deputy chairperson;
   (b) three persons selected, after consulting the Premiers, from a list compiled in accordance with a process prescribed by national legislation;
   (c) two persons selected, after consulting organised local government, from a list compiled in accordance with a process prescribed national legislation; and
   (d) two other persons.

(A) National legislation referred to in subsection (1) must provide for the participation of—
   (a) the Premiers in the compilation of a list envisaged in subsection (1)(b); and
   (b) organised local government in the compilation of a list envisaged in subsection (1) (c).

(2) Members of the Commission must have appropriate expertise.

(3) Members serve for a term established in terms of national legislation. The President may remove a member from office on the ground of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence.

222. Reports

The Commission must report regularly both to Parliament and to the provincial legislatures.

Central Bank

223. Establishment

The South African Reserve Bank is the central bank of the Republic and is regulated in terms of an Act of Parliament.

224. Primary object

(1) The primary object of the South African Reserve Bank is to protect the value of the currency in the interest of balanced and sustainable economic growth in the Republic.

(2) The South African Reserve Bank, in pursuit of its primary object, must perform its functions independently and without fear, favour or prejudice, but there must be regular consultation between the Bank and the Cabinet member responsible for national financial matters.

225. Powers and functions

The powers and functions of the South African Reserve Bank are those customarily exercised and performed by central banks, which powers and functions must be determined by an Act of Parliament and must be exercised or performed subject to the conditions prescribed in terms of that Act.

Provincial and Local Financial Matters

226. Provincial Revenue Funds

(1) There is a Provincial Revenue Fund for each province into which all money received by the provincial government must be paid, except money reasonably excluded by an Act of Parliament.

(2) Money may be withdrawn from a Provincial Revenue Fund only—
   (a) in terms of an appropriation by a provincial Act; or
   (b) as a direct charge against the Provincial Revenue Fund, when it is provided for in the Constitution or a provincial Act.

(3) Revenue allocated through a province to local government in that province in terms of section 214(1), is a direct charge against that province's Revenue Fund.

(4) National legislation may determine a framework within which—
   (a) a provincial Act may in terms of subsection (2)(b) authorise the withdrawal of money as a direct charge against a Provincial Revenue Fund; and
   (b) revenue allocated through a province to local government in that province in terms of subsection (3) must be paid to municipalities in the province.

227. National sources of provincial and local government funding

(1) Local government and each province—
   (a) is entitled to an equitable share of revenue raised nationally to enable it to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to it; and
   (b) may receive other allocations from national government revenue, either conditionally or unconditionally.

(2) Additional revenue raised by provinces or municipalities may not be deducted from their share of revenue raised nationally, or from other allocations made to them out of national government revenue. Equally, there is no obligation on the national government to compensate provinces or municipalities that do not raise revenue commensurate with their fiscal capacity and tax base.

(3) A province's equitable share of revenue raised nationally must be transferred to the province promptly and without deduction, except when the transfer has been stopped in terms of section 216.

(4) A province must provide for itself any resources that it requires, in terms of a provision of its provincial constitution, that are additional to its requirements envisaged in the Constitution.

228. Provincial taxes

(1) A provincial legislature may impose—

(a) taxes, levies and duties other than income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax, rates on property or customs duties; and

(b) flat-rate surcharges on any tax, levy or duty that is imposed by national legislation, other than on corporate income tax, value-added tax, rates on property or custom duties.

(2) The power of a provincial legislature to impose taxes, levies, duties and surcharges—

(a) may not be exercised in a way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across provincial boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour; and

(b) must be regulated in terms of an Act of Parliament, which may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.

229. Municipal fiscal powers and functions

(1) Subject to subsections (2), (3) and (4), a municipality may impose—

(a) rates on property and surcharges on fees for services provided by or on behalf of the municipality; and

(b) if authorised by national legislation, other taxes, levies and duties appropriate to local government or to the category of local government into which that municipality falls, but no municipality may impose income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax or customs duty.

(2) The power of a municipality to impose rates on property, surcharges on fees for services provided by or on behalf of the municipality, or other taxes, levies or duties—

(a) may not be exercised in a way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across municipal boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour; and

(b) may be regulated by national legislation.

(3) When two municipalities have the same fiscal powers and functions with regard to the same area, an appropriate division of those powers and functions must be made in terms of national legislation. The division may be made only after taking into account at least the following criteria:

(a) The need to comply with sound principles of taxation.

(b) The powers and functions performed by each municipality.

(c) The fiscal capacity of each municipality.

(d) The effectiveness and efficiency of raising taxes, levies and duties.

(e) Equity.

(4) Nothing in this section precludes the sharing of revenue raised in terms of this section between municipalities that have fiscal power and functions in the same area.

(5) National legislation envisaged in this section may be enacted only after organised local government and the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been consulted, and any recommendations of the Commission have been considered.

230. Provincial and municipal loans

(1) A province may raise loans for capital or current expenditure in accordance with national legislation, but loans for current expenditure may be raised only when necessary for bridging purposes during a fiscal year.

(2) National legislation referred to in subsection (1) may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.

230A. Municipal loans

(1) A Municipal Council may, in accordance with national legislation—

(a) raise loans for capital or current expenditure for the municipality, but loans for current expenditure may be raised only when necessary for bridging purposes during a fiscal year; and

(b) bind itself and a future Council in the exercise of its legislative and executive authority to secure loans or investments for the municipality.

(2) National legislation referred to in subsection (1) may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.[1]

27.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) Public Finance as a Creature of the Final Constitution, Statute, Institutions, Regulations and Practice

The structure of public finance in South Africa is created by a surprisingly few provisions in FC Chapter 13. These provisions support (and sometimes constrain) a mature body of legislation, policy, institutions and practice that has developed in the last ten years. The rapid development of this public finance regime has been promoted by a confident and assertive National Treasury, itself a product of public finance legislation.

The two primary finance statutes enacted in the last decade are the Public Finance Management Act[2] ('PFMA') and the Local Goverment: Municipal Finance Management Act[3] ('MFMA'). Each of these acts has produced important regulations — the oft-amended Treasury Regulations for Departments, Trading Entities, Constitutional Institutions and Public Entities[4] ('Treasury Regulations') and the recently-promulgated Municipal Supply Chain Management Regulations,[5] Municipal Invest-

* The authors would like to thank Prof David T Zeffertt, Stuart Woolman, Karin Mathebula and Rolfe Eberhard for comments on earlier drafts. The ideas in the article concerning the authority role and assignments and delegations were developed together with Ian Palmer. Any errors remain our own.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] Act 1 of 1999.

[3] Act 56 of 2003.

[4] Originally published as Government Notice No 345 Government Gazette 22219 (9 April 2001), subsequently published in amended form in Notice R 740 Government Gazette 23463 (25 May 2002) and Notice R 225 Government Gazette 27388 (15 March 2005) and most recently amended by Notice R 146 Government Gazette 29644 (20 February 2007).

[5] Notice 868 of 2005 in Government Gazette 27636 (30 May 2005).

ment Regulations,[1] and Municipal Public-Private Partnership Regulations.[2] In addition to the MFMA and the PFMA, another particularly important Act is the Division of Revenue Act ('DORA'). DORA is enacted each year to allocate 'equitable share' and other intergovernmental grants and is typically accompanied by a long memorandum describing developments financial and conceptual in South African public finance. Several other Acts create public finance institutions and regulate public finance: the Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act,[3] the Financial and Fiscal Commission Act[4] and the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act.[5] Finally, there is a large body of guidance and practice notes generated under the PFMA and the annual inter-governmental fiscal reviews. We draw on these instruments to more fully understand FC Chapter 13 and the system of public finance it supports.

(b) Structure of the Chapter

The structure of this chapter attempts to follow a notional 'life cycle' for public funds. That cycle begins with the raising of revenue by the three spheres of government and then considers the allocation of responsibility for public expenditure across governments, the control of budgeting and expenditure, the monitoring and withholding of public funds by national regulators and the intervention by regulators in moments of financial crisis. Chapter 13 does not follow this structure. Indeed, it is difficult to discern an underlying structure in its eighteen provisions. Nevertheless, Chapter 13 covers and controls all these issues.

Because of the lack of case law or literature that considers Chapter 13, our intention is to discuss some basic questions about the structure of South Africa's fiscal system contemplated by the Final Constitution.[6] We also cover (belatedly and in less detail) some of the institutions that have been established to regulate and to shepherd South Africa's public funds — including the Financial and Fiscal Commission and the Central Bank. In addition, the chapter explores the regulatory authority of national government over financial matters in other spheres of government.

[1] Notice No R 308 Government Gazette No 27431 (1 April 2005).
[2] Notice No R 309 Government Gazette No 27431 (1 April 2005).
[3] Act 48 of 1996.
[4] Act 99 of 1997.
[5] Act 97 of 1997.
[6] Such a structure must determine among other things the percentage of total government expenditure made by sub-national governments, the size and character of inter-governmental transfers and the level of fiscal autonomy of sub-national governments. See E Yemek 'Understanding Fiscal Decentralisation in South Africa' IDASA Occasional Paper (July 2005) 3.

27.2 Raising revenue

(a) Sources of Revenue

When it comes to sources of revenue, the language of FC Chapter 13 is terse. FC ss 227(1) and (2) identify three sources of revenue, namely 'revenue raised nationally';[1] 'other allocations from national government revenue';[2] and 'additional revenue raised by provinces or municipalities'.[3] 'Revenue raised nationally' is synonymous with what is termed 'equitable share' and is allocated between the three spheres of government. Prior to allocation, this revenue is not yet 'national government revenue', even though it is received into the National Revenue Fund. Only when national government has received its portion of equitable share, through a constitutionally controlled allocation process, is this revenue called 'national government revenue'. The other spheres of government may receive 'other allocations' from this national government revenue in the form of conditional or unconditional grants (terms later to be elaborated). In practice, however, these other allocations are always conditional. Finally, provinces and municipalities may raise 'additional revenue' of their own — subject to limitations set out in FC Chapter 13.

(b) Raising National Revenue

The Final Constitution is very clear on how revenue is raised (sometimes called 'revenue assignment'). As indicated above, South Africa's fiscal structure is premised on primary collection of revenue by the national government. This revenue is supplemented by some additional revenue raised by provincial governments and local governments. Because Chapter 13 nowhere mentions national government's revenue-raising powers, and mentions provincial and municipal powers in a way that restricts their powers to those expressly mentioned, it is clear that national government has plenary revenue-raising powers. In practice, revenue is raised nationally through several different sources — personal and corporate income tax, value added tax and customs duties. These are all forms of tax that provinces and municipalities are expressly prevented from imposing.[4]

(c) Raising Provincial Revenue

Provincial revenue-raising powers are the most limited of the three spheres of government. Provinces may not impose national forms of taxes — income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax and customs duties; nor may Provinces impose municipal forms of tax, that is, rates on property.[5] Provinces are left with the

[1] FC s 227(1)(a).
[2] FC s 227(1)(b).
[3] FC s 227(2).
[4] See FC ss 228(1) and 229(1)(b).
[5] See FC s 228(1).

capacity to raise revenue through 'other taxes, levies and duties' and 'flat-rate surcharges on the tax bases of any tax, levy or duty that is imposed by national legislation'.[1] Provincial taxation powers are further circumscribed by FC s 228(2):

> The power of a provincial legislature to impose taxes, levies, duties and surcharges (a) may not be exercised in way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across provincial boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour; and (b) must be regulated in terms of an Act of Parliament, which may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.

The national legislation contemplated in FC s 228(2)(b) has been enacted in the form of the Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act.[2] Aside from repeating the limitation imposed in FC s 228,[3] the most important purpose of the Act is to regulate the process that a province must follow prior to imposing a provincial tax.[4] The only extant provincial tax of which the authors are aware is the Cape fuel levy.[5] This tax was approved by the National Treasury in mid-2006. Although other provincial taxes have been mooted from time-to-time, none have been enacted. FC 227(2) prevents additional revenue raised by provincial taxes from being deducted from their equitable share. At the same time, the national government is not required to compensate provinces which fail to 'raise revenues commensurate with their fiscal capacity and tax base'.

(d) Raising Municipal Revenue

There are two primary sources of local government funding: inter-governmental transfers and own revenue. Inter-governmental transfers can be further divided into equitable share and grants from government departments ('other allocations'). Own revenues ('additional allocations') are raised through the imposition of user charges (tariffs) and local taxes (rates on property and, previously, RSC levies).[6] The power to raise municipal own revenues is set out in FC s 229(1)(a): 'a municipality may impose rates on property and surcharges on fees for services provided by or on behalf of the municipality'.[7] In terms of FC s 229(1)(b), municipalities

[1] See FC s 228(1).
[2] Act 53 of 2001.
[3] See Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act s 2(1).
[4] See Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act s 3.
[5] See National Treasury Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review: 2002/03–2008/09 (2004) 6.
[6] The memorandum to the Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Bill explains why RSC levies were phased out (at 15). The bill is available at http://www.treasury.gov.za (accessed on 9 May 2007) ('Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Bill').
[7] The meaning of 'rate' in the context of FC s 229(1)(a) has been elaborated in Gerber v MEC for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng 2003 (2) SA 344 (SCA)('Gerber') at para 23. Gerber emphasizes the requirement that a rate be calculated in relation to the size or value of properties and not on a flat basis. Ibid at para 24.

may also impose 'other taxes, levies and duties appropriate to local government'[1] if authorised by national legislation.[2] However, FC s 229(1)(b) adds the proviso that 'no municipality may impose income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax or customs duty'. Furthermore, the fiscal powers of municipalities are limited in that they 'may not be exercised in a way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across municipal boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour';[3] and that they 'may be regulated by national legislation'.[4] A striking feature of FC s 229 is that it does not empower municipalities to impose fees or charges for services. The heading of FC s 229, 'Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions', suggests a deliberate omission of charges for services — the imposition of such charges not being the expression of a municipal fiscal power. This view is buttressed by the fact that the local Goverment: Municipal Systems Act[5] treats fees for services separately from taxes, levies and duties.[6] Indeed, the tendency to treat rates and fees as distinct has been called 'a recurring theme of the Systems Act'.[7] It might be argued that taxation, as contrasted with fees for services, requires an express empowering provision. By contrast, the municipal capacity to impose user fees is a well-entrenched, long-standing practice that may fall within the description of an 'implied power' in terms of FC s 156(5).

The unsettling omission of charges for services in the Final Constitution is accentuated by the somewhat awkward treatment of user fees in the Systems Act. Prior to amendment, it required Municipal Councils to adopt and to implement tariff policies on the levying of fees for municipal services, but set out the actual power to charge fees for services in passing in a separate chapter of the Act.[8] This lacuna in the Systems Act was subsequently rectified by the insertion in 2002 of a new section 75A.[9] This section enables municipalities to 'levy and recover fees, charges or tariffs in respect of any function or service of the municipality'. Based on our earlier conclusion that tariffs are not covered in FC s 229, it is not clear that a tariff is a tax, levy or duty that the Systems Act could introduce through FC s 229(2)(b). And yet, courts considering the meaning of FC s 229 and the Systems Act do not appear to have been especially vexed by this potential problem.[10]

[1] The distinction between a rate and a levy is alluded to in Gerber. Gerber (supra) at para 28. A rate is proportionate to the size or value of a property; a levy is a flat amount for erf.

[2] The national legislation is being developed in the form of the Municipal Fiscal Powers and Functions Bill.

[3] See FC s 229(2)(a).

[4] See FC s 229(2)(b).

[5] Act 32 of 2000.

[6] See Systems Act s 4(1)(c).

[7] See Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C) at para 73.

[8] See Systems Act s 4(1)(c)(i).

[9] The amendment was made by the Local Government Laws Amendment Act 51 of 2002 s 39. It is possible that prior to the amendment of the Systems Act, the power to impose tariffs arose from section 10G(7)(a)(ii) of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993. See Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C) at para 62.

[10] See Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2006 (1) SA 496, 501 (SCA)('Rates Action Group SCA')(The Supreme Court of Appeal considered whether a municipality has the power to charge for a service by imposing a rate. The court accepted, without hesitation, that the Systems Act is the regulatory legislation contemplated in FC s 229(2)(b).)

Municipal tariff setting is politically and legally complex.[1] The Final Constitution is clear that setting prices for services is a political matter vested in Municipal Councils and is not capable of delegation.[2] Notwithstanding what may be viewed as an affirmation of local democratic control over municipal pricing, the Systems Act allows the national Minister responsible for local government to regulate limits on tariff increases[3] — a power that the Minister has never exercised. The intersecting political control of pricing at both municipal and national level has historically raised concerns about municipal contractual commitments. It is not unusual for contracts with service providers to include provisions that require tariffs to escalate at an agreed rate. The question that arises is whether these contractual undertakings are binding if, at some time after conclusion of the contract, tariffs are levied by a Municipal Council at lower levels than the contract requires or if an agreed tariff escalation is precluded by the Minister under the Systems Act. The MFMA has attempted to answer both questions in the affirmative. In respect of the latter question, section 43(3) of the MFMA provides that if a municipality has entered into a contract which 'provides for an annual or other periodic escalation of payments to be made by the municipality under the contract, no determination of the upper limits of a municipal tax or tariff applies to that municipality in so far as such upper limits would impair the municipality's ability to meet the escalation of its payments under the contract'. While the MFMA may appear to settle contractual concerns that flow from potential ministerial intervention in municipal tariff setting, some may argue that section 43(3) does not, in fact, achieve this intended purpose.[4]

The next question is whether a Municipal Council can bind itself to tariff escalations set out in a contract with a service provider? This question is [1] Because spatial patterns in South Africa are still a proxy for race, tariff and rating decisions which impact different areas disproportionately tend to have discriminatory impacts. Two cases have considered equality challenges in this area: Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C)('R*ates Action Group HC*') and Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker'). R*ates Action Group HC* found that the discrimination arising from a shift towards property rates as a mechanism for paying for services was not unfair discrimination within the meaning of the Final Constitution. Rates Action Group HC (supra) at para 111. By contrast, the Court in Walker found that a practice of imposing different charges on consumers in the 'old' Pretoria and consumers in former black townships did constitute unfair discrimination. Walker (supra) at para 81.

[2] See FC s 160(2)(c).

[3] See Systems Act s 86A(1)(c).

[4] The provision postulates 'municipal payments' to service providers, presumably, in the form of a fee for services. However, it is not unusual for contracts to remunerate service providers by transferring to them the revenue collected from consumers. System Act s 81(2)(a)(vi) expressly allows service providers to be remunerated in this way. The effect of such provisions is to transfer to the service provider the risk of non-payment or short-payment by consumers (so-called 'collection risk'). Indeed, it is particularly in the case of such contracts that investors would be concerned about the prospect of a ministerial cap on tariff increases. However, on a strict interpretation, section 43(3) of the MFMA may not apply to those contracts which do not involve municipal payments (in the sense of a service fee) to service providers. However, it might be argued that the transfer of revenue from the primary account of the municipality to a service provider does constitute a municipal payment for the purposes of section 43(3).

particularly interesting in light of the Constitutional Court's decision in Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others ('Fedsure'). For our purposes, the most important holding in Fedsure is that tariff setting is a legislative act.[1] In light of Fedsure, a Municipal Council may not be able to fetter its legislative discretion by making a contractual undertaking to escalate tariffs at an agreed level. Several interesting questions arise here. First, municipalities as executive bodies may enter into agreements in which they undertake that a certain revenue will be generated from the provision of a service. In our view, such an agreement this is not an undertaking about how the Municipal Council will legislate, but an undertaking that in the event of future legislation that disturbs the revenue stream, the municipality bears the risk of financial loss to the service provider. The MFMA expressly allows for such undertakings. MFMA s 48(1)(c) allows a municipality by resolution of its Municipal Council to provide security for 'contractual obligations of the municipality undertaken in connection with capital expenditure by other persons on property, plant or equipment to be used by the municipality or such other person for the purpose of achieving the objects of local government in terms of section 152 of the Constitution'. MFMA s 48(2)(g) then explains that such security includes an 'undertaking to retain revenues or specific municipal tariffs or other charges, fees or funds at a particular level or at a level sufficient to meet its financial obligations'. Since such a contractual undertaking is made by the municipality qua executive, it does not constrain the municipality qua legislature. Accordingly, this provision should be read as authorising the municipality to indemnify the lender against the political risk of future tariff reductions. There is some indication in the case law that this interplay of contractual commitment and legislative power forms part of a normal set of dilemmas that characterise the budget process.[2] Hence, while the case law has emphasised that Municipal Councils are democratically elected deliberative bodies which are subject to political considerations in adopting budgets,[3] the MFMA makes it clear that the political process involved in adopting budgets and setting tariffs cannot ignore or subvert contractual undertakings that bind the municipality.

[1] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 45 (The Constitutional Court held '[t]hat when a legislature whether national, provincial or local, exercises the power to raise taxes or rates, or determines appropriations to be made out of public funds, it is exercising a power that under our Constitution is a power peculiar to elected legislative bodies.')

[2] The imperative to balance a municipal budget, and a consideration of a range of financial pressures, persuaded the Cape Provincial Division to find that a 19% increase in the levy in respect of property rates violated certain equality rights, but that the violation was ultimately justifiable. See Lotus River, Ottery, Grassy Park Residents Association and another v South Peninsula Municipality 1999 (2) 817, 833B (C). The decision shows that courts may be sensitive to the narrow parameters that confine legislative decisions in respect of tariff setting. Since a municipality may not budget for a year-end deficit on its operating accounts, a contractual undertaking in terms of s 48(2)(g) may compel a Municipal Council qua legislature — by a combination of statutory duty and contractual obligation — to maintain the tariffs at the required level. If it fails to increase tariffs, the contractual commitment may produce a year-end operational deficit.

[3] See Rates Action Group HC (supra) at para 17; Fedsure (supra) at para 41.

A second point is that even if Fedsure characterises tariff setting as a legislative act (and hence insulates it from administrative review), legislation is not immune from constitutional challenge. Indeed, in Fedsure, the Constitutional Court developed the idea that the 'rule of law' is generally understood to be a fundamental principle of constitutional law.[1] According to the legality principle developed in Fedsure, every exercise of government power is subject to the law and the Final Constitution, and the state may perform no function beyond that conferred on it by law.[2] Soon after Fedsure, the Constitutional Court developed the rule of law doctrine further in New National Party of SA v Government of the RSA & Others.[3] Yacoob J, writing for a majority of the Court, stated that that there must be:

> a rational relationship between the scheme which [Parliament adopts] and the achievement of a legitimate governmental purpose. Parliament cannot act capriciously or arbitrarily. The absence of such a rational connection will result in the measure being unconstitutional.[4]

The principle of legality or the rule of law doctrine provides an alternative basis for reviewing primary legislation in addition to inconsistency with the Bill of Rights or the procedural provisions of the Final Constitution. Many constitutional principles fall within the more basic rubric of legality. A Municipal Council which legislates in conflict with its own contractual undertakings, the imperatives of sustainability and its own tariff policy by-laws may act with an impermissible legislative arbitrariness. This conclusion would be more easily reached if the legislation caused significant prejudice to service providers and was not strictly necessary to protect the interests of consumers. The principle of legality and the rule of law doctrine are designed to produce stable and credible legislative institutions, and could perform a useful role in the highly politically-charged setting of tariff increases.

A final technical point arises out of Fedsure. The amended Systems Act in section 75A(2) empowers municipalities to levy tariffs 'by resolution passed by the municipal council with a supporting vote of a majority of its members'. This procedure had been previously imposed by section 10G(7)(a)(ii) of the Local Government Transition Act.[5] However, recall that Fedsure characterised tariff-setting as a legislative act: presumably conducted by enacting municipal legislation. It seems to us that, on a reasonable reading of Fedsure, tariffs cannot be levied by resolution. This conclusion is strengthened by considering section 12 of the Systems Act, which carefully regulates the process of enacting by-laws. The effect of [1] See Fedsure (supra) at para 56.

[2] For more on the legality principle and the rule of law doctrine, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality, and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[3] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 19.

[5] In terms of Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 s 10G(7)(a)(ii): '[a] municipality may by resolution supported by a majority of the members of the council levy and recover levies, fees, taxes and tariffs in respect of any function or service of the municipality.'

section 75A(2) is to remove these procedural controls in respect of tariff setting. It is not at all clear why the Systems Act would reduce the formality of municipal decision-making in the politically sensitive case of tariff setting. If this analysis is correct, then the proper procedure for tariff setting is uncertain. Since Systems Act s 75A(2) may be constitutionally suspect in light of Fedsure, municipalities should take the cautionary measure of enacting tariffs in by-laws and not just by resolution.

27.3 Allocating revenue

(a) Responsibility for Expenditure

While the Final Constitution is clear on how revenue is raised and which spheres of government are responsible for doing so, it struggles, notoriously, to allocate responsibility for public expenditure (also known as 'expenditure assignment'). This is really a struggle about functional allocation: namely, what functions should be allocated to which spheres of government. The link we have drawn between expenditure assignment and functional allocation is not made explicit in the Final Constitution. However, because every allocation of functional responsibility involves expenditure, the link between expenditure assignment and functional allocation has been enshrined in the phrase 'finance follows function' and given the recent imprimatur of the legislature.[1] Moreover, some have proposed an ideal sequencing of function, finance and functionaries in which 'sub-national governments should first be given clarity about their functions and associated expenditure responsibilities and based on these, the proper assignment and design of tax instruments and transfer systems should be done.'[2] When the link between expenditure assignment and functional allocation is severed, so-called 'unfunded mandates result'. Unfunded mandates occur when municipalities become responsible for national or provincial functions without formal assignments. Sections 9 and 10 of the Systems Act have attempted to prevent unfunded mandated of this kind.[3]

(b) The Functional Allocation

The job of functional allocation belongs to schedules 4 and 5 of the Final Constitution which are ill-suited to the task. The language used in the schedules is vague and technically imprecise and often elides critical differences between the separate elements of a service. (For example, the term 'reticulation', used in the context of electricity, elides the difference between 'generation', 'transmission' and

[1] See Division of Revenue Act 7 of 2003 s 27(2).

[2] See J Ahmad, S Devarajan, S Khemani & S Shah 'Decentralization and Service Delivery' World Bank Policy Research Working Paper 3603 (May 2005) 12. See also See E Yemek 'Understanding Fiscal Decentralisation in South Africa' IDASA Occasional Paper (July 2005) 6.

[3] For more on this issue, see § 27.3*(g)* infra.

'distribution'.[1]) The schedules create porous boundaries between spheres of government and in some cases such as 'provincial roads' and 'municipal roads' create vertically integrated functions with question-begging dividing lines.[2] In these cases, the schedules deliberately prevaricate on where the dividing line should be. Finally, several functions fall within what might be termed the 'plenary' legislative and executive powers of national government and are neither listed nor mentioned.[3] These elisions and omissions have created uncertainty about where responsibility falls for key functions. For example, the allocation of responsibility for water and energy resources is unclear. In practice, they have become concurrent national and local functions.[4] Perhaps the drafters of the Final Constitution imagined that the functional allocation would be resolved over time through the natural evolution of best practices. Since functional allocation is a highly complex process, the drafters may have had no alternative in the early 1990s but to accept that experience and a future national legislative process would resolve the matter. Although this resolution has occurred, to some extent, it has placed significant strain on our system of co-operative government.[5] A detailed dissection of the

[1] The meaning of 'reticulation' is pivotal in allocating responsibility between national and local governments for electricity provision and has featured centrally in the reform of the electricity distribution industry. Its meaning was about to be considered by the Pretoria High Court in litigation between the City of Cape Town and the National Electricity Regulator, when another installment in the ever unfolding narrative of political control of the City prematurely settled the litigation.

[2] See IDASA 'Local Government Powers and Functions' IDASA Occasional Papers (February 2004) at 3.

[3] National Treasury's 'Trends in Intergovernmental Finances: 2000/01–2006/07' (2004), refers at 2 to 'National government's exclusive functions' and lists national defence, the criminal justice system, higher education, water and energy resources and administrative functions such as home affairs and the collection of national taxes. However, these functions are not listed in the Constitution which contains no schedule of exclusive national functions. It is accurate to say that the national sphere enjoys 'plenary' legislative powers (an implicit list of exclusive national powers) subject to a list of concurrent provincial and legislative powers set out in Schedule 4 of the Final Constitution and a smaller list of exclusive provincial powers set out in Schedule 5.

[4] For example, in the case of water resources, bulk water systems are currently being transferred to municipalities (examples include assets owned by various Water Boards including Botshelo Water, Lephelle Water, iKangala Water and Amatole Water) and there are existing cases of municipal ownership of bulk assets and involvement in bulk water provision (the primary example being the City of Cape Town). However, Water Boards still continue to provide bulk water as their primary function under the Water Services Act.

[5] A good example is housing. Although housing couples naturally with municipal services, the function was allocated to national government and provincial government as a concurrent function. As a legal matter, municipalities can only become responsible for housing provision if the function is assigned or if municipalities enter into contracts with national and provincial government. Although assignments are possible under the Housing Act 107 of 1997, they have not occurred to date. Nevertheless, even in the absence of contracts, several municipalities have become responsible for housing provision. In principle, their lack of constitutional competence has a range of highly complex implications. See K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55, 55-24 – 55-26.

schedules would take us away from a focus on FC Chapter 13 and will not be further pursued.[1]

An important difference exists between provincial and municipal governments in respect of functional allocation. Provinces are responsible for highly capital intensive, typically non-revenue generating, social services: health care (including academic and regional hospitals as well as primary health care), schooling, housing and roads.[2] And yet they have few of their own tax instruments for raising the requisite funds for these functions. Municipalities, by contrast, provide services that typically are revenue generating — water, sanitation, electricity and waste collection — and have the tax and other revenue-raising powers required for funding those services.[3]

A final point is that functional allocation is not static. Through assignment it is possible to reallocate functional responsibility from one sphere of government to another — typically 'downward' to municipalities. The primary current example is housing. The Housing Act ('Housing Act')[4] envisages the accreditation of municipalities to assume housing responsibility.[5] The assignment of functions to municipalities is carefully regulated in the Systems Act (which ensures that the financial implications of the assignment are vetted by the Financial and Fiscal Commission) and by the annual Division of Revenue Acts (which affirm the 'finance follows function' principle).[6] It is a curious fact that these controls can be side stepped with ease through so-called 'agency agreements' in which municipalities assume contractual responsibility for provincial or national functions. This alternative to assignment, also called inter-governmental delegation, is not precluded by legislation. Indeed, the Final Constitution expressly allows for it in FC s 238*(b). FC s 238(b)* empowers an executive organ of state in any sphere of government to 'exercise any power or perform any function for any other executive organ of state on an agency or delegation basis'. These arrangements are

[1] For discussions elsewhere in this treatise on problems associated with functional allocation, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 15 ; V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16; C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 20.

[2] National Treasury Trends in Intergovernmental Finances: 2000/01 — 2006/07 (August 2004) 5.

[3] Further important differences between provincial and municipal governments are explored below. See § 27.5*(c)* infra, for a discussion of the difference between provincial borrowing and municipal borrowing.

[4] Act 107 of 1997.

[5] Housing is not a local government matter listed in Part B of FC Schedule 4 and 5 respectively. Housing is therefore not a municipal function or service. However, s 9 of the Housing Act 107 of 1997 expressly sets out a clear role for local government in housing delivery. This role is largely supportive of the other spheres of government, and allows municipalities to act as developers and to enter into joint ventures with private developers in executing national housing programmes. See Housing Act s 9(2)(a). See, further, McLean 'Housing' (supra) at Chapter 55.

[6] See, example, Division of Revenue Act 7 of 2003 s 27(2).

temporary in nature and do not transfer the so-called 'authority role' for the function (that is, the responsibility — among other things — for levying tariffs and receiving revenues or grant money).[1] The danger is that municipalities will assume responsibility for functions without necessarily securing the associated revenue. In the case of housing, where municipal responsibility has mushroomed in the absence of assignment, the state of affairs is highly problematic.[2]

(c) Imbalances Between Revenue and Expenditure

Most South African revenue is raised nationally. Expenditure responsibility, however, is assigned across the three spheres of government. Because the fiscal system is characterised by centralised taxation and decentralised service delivery, there are imbalances between revenue and expenditure termed 'vertical fiscal imbalances'.[3] The greatest fiscal imbalance is in the provincial sphere: provinces raise only a fraction of the revenues that they are required to expend. In this section, we discuss the equitable share mechanism created by FC section 214 to correct this imbalance[4] and the attempts of provinces to augment revenues through borrowing.[5]

Before we begin this discussion, it is necessary to clarify the technical language that is used to describe grants. Grants may be conditional or unconditional, direct or indirect, or in cash or in kind. A grant is conditional if conditions are used to direct the spending of the grant in receiving municipalities or provinces, whereas it is unconditional if it has only limited conditions relating to the transfer. In the case of a direct grant, the entire grant flows directly from the transferring department to the receiving municipality or department; whereas in the case of an indirect grant, the grant flows via an intermediary (for example, a provincial department to a municipality). Finally, grant funds in a grant in kind are directly

[1] As organs of state have begun to contract out their institutional functions, South African legislation has introduced a distinction between an 'authority role' and a 'service provider role'. The former role cannot be contracted out and covers areas of essential executive and legislative responsibility. Acting as an authority usually implies the following responsibilities: the statutory responsibility for administering the function; planning to ensure that the function is effectively administered; determination of user fees or the imposition of taxes (such as property rates) to pay for the provision of the service; the entitlement to receive grant funds; developing policy in relation to the function such as service levels and pricing structures; preparing legislation that relates to undertaking the function (in the municipal context, these would be by-laws); contracting with and monitoring service providers; and ownership of the fixed assets associated with the function. See IDASA 'Local Government Powers and Functions' IDASA Occasional Papers (February 2004) 6. For examples of where this distinction is implicit or explicit, see Systems Act ss 11(3) and 81; Division of Revenue Act 1 of 2005 s 9(3)(b); Water Services Act 108 of 1997 s 19; and National Land Transport Transition Act 22 of 2000 s 10.

[2] For further discussion, see McLean 'Housing' (supra) at Chapter 55.

[3] See E Yemek 'Understanding Fiscal Decentralisation in South Africa' IDASA Occasional Paper (July 2005) 18.

[4] See § 27.3*(d)* infra.

[5] See § 27.5*(c)* infra.

administered by the transferring department; whereas the money in cash grants is transferred directly to the receiving municipality or Department. These three main distinctions produce the six kinds of grant that are used in South Africa.[1]

In order fully to describe a grant, each of these three main distinctions will be necessary. The language of 'conditional' and 'unconditional' grants is used in FC s 227(1)(b). The other distinctions have developed through use. It is worth mentioning that only equitable share is an unconditional grant, that is, no conditions are imposed on its use.[2]

(d) Equitable Division of Revenue

Imbalances between revenue-raising powers and expenditure responsibility are corrected by intergovernmental grants which allocate revenue across the three spheres. The most important of these grants is 'equitable share' which is mandated and controlled by Chapter 13. The result of the vertical fiscal imbalance for provinces is a massive transfer of nationally-raised revenue to the provinces. In fact, the bulk of equitable share revenue is allocated to provinces. By contrast, because municipalities have their own taxation powers and source revenue through user fees, the legislature has tended to allocate a smaller portion of equitable share to municipalities[3] and has largely treated municipalities as financially autonomous and capable of financial failure.[4] The equitable share of

[1] See P Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System Paper One: A Researcher's Guide to Local Government Grants' IDASA Occasional Papers (July 2003) 7.

[2] Even though equitable share is unconditional, DORA 2005 imposes duties on the transferring Department and the receiving municipality in respect of these grants. A key requirement is that accounting officers submit information to the transferring Department as part of the monthly budget reports required in terms of MFMA s 71.

[3] For the 2005/06 financial year, provinces received 57.7% of total revenue collected nationally; while municipalities received only 4.7%. See E Yemek 'Understanding Fiscal Decentralisation in South Africa' IDASA Occasional Paper (July 2005) 5. See also Chapter 2 of National Treasury's 'Trends in Intergovernmental Finances: 2000/01 — 2006/07' (2004). Some additional transfers are made from provinces to municipalities so that an average figure of 14% has been suggested for the proportion of municipal budgets consisting of national and provincial transfers. See IDASA 'Local Government in Budget 2005' (9 May 2005) 154 Budget Briefs available at http://www.idasa.org.za/ (accessed on 19 April 2007). However, where a municipality has limited sources of own revenue, the proportion of its budget dependent on national allocations can be significantly higher than the average (over half and up to 92%). See National Treasury Trends in Intergovernmental Finances: 2000/01 — 2006/07 (2004) 30, Table 3.9.

[4] The MFMA makes provision for financial failure — a form of government insolvency — and prohibits long-term borrowing for operational purposes. Although the treatment of provincial government is slightly ambiguous, in practice the national and provincial spheres of government are not capable of financial failure. See, further, § 27.5*(c)* infra.

national revenue is allocated to each sphere based on a formula which is designed to maximise allocations in proportion to levels of indigency (among other factors).[1]

The instrument for allocating nationally raised revenue, and sharing it equitably between spheres of government, is the annually-enacted Division of Revenue Act ('DORA'). The process for enacting DORA and the content of the Act are prescribed in FC s 214. Enacting DORA requires consultation with provincial governments, organised local government (that is, the South African Local Government Association) and the Financial and Fiscal Commission. The consultation process is regulated by the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act.[2] This Act creates two fora for consultation: namely a Budget Council and a Local Government Budget Forum.[3] The former is the body in which the national government and the provincial governments consult on (among other things), 'any fiscal, budgetary or financial matter affecting the provincial sphere of government'.[4] The latter is the body in which the national government, the provincial governments and organised local government consult on (among other things), 'any fiscal, budgetary or financial matter affecting the local sphere of government'.[5] It is an interesting feature of the Act that it creates separate consultation fora to settle provincial and local equitable share. Separate consultation processes are certainly not required in FC s 214(2). The important consequences of two separate consultation processes is that one happens before the other. Under these circumstances, it has been suggested that because the Budget Council meets before the Local Government Budget Forum, the local government portion of equitable share tends in practice to be a fait accompli.[6] If one assumes that the different spheres of government compete for equitable share, the prospect of provincial discussions having priority over local discussions is troubling, even if justified by practical considerations.

In addition to procedural requirements, the annual enactment of DORA is also subject to substantive requirements. FC s 214(2) requires that national parliament take into account several prescribed factors, namely:

[1] The formula for calculating equitable share is calculated using a formula that determines the entitlement of each municipality. The formula has recently been revised in Division of Revenue Act 1 of 2005 ('DORA 2005') and consists of four main components. Instead of several 'windows' which fund different services, the new basic services component supports only poor households earning less than R800 per month and recognises water supply, sanitation, refuse removal and electricity supply as the core services to be funded. Another component the institutional support element, also develops the previous 'I Grant'. This support element offers a 'base allocation' which goes to every municipality in the new basic services component. This base allocation takes account of the size of the municipality the cost of maintaining councilors in their legislative and oversight role. A problem with the application of the formula in practice is that it is based on the data in census 2001 which, in the intervening years since 2001, has become less accurate in its measures of indigency.

[2] Act 97 of 1997.

[3] See Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act s 2 and s 5, respectively.

[4] See Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act s 3*(a)*.

[5] See Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act s 6*(a)*.

[6] See P Whelan 'The Local Government Equitable Share' IDASA Occasional Papers (February 2004) 8.

> (a) the national interest; (b) any provision that must be made in respect of the national debt and other national obligations; (c) the needs and interests of the national government, determined by objective criteria; (d) the need to ensure that the provinces and municipalities are able to provide basic services and perform the functions allocated to them; (e) the fiscal capacity and efficiency of the provinces and municipalities; (f) developmental and other needs of provinces, local government and municipalities; (g) economic disparities within and among the provinces; (h) obligations of the provinces and municipalities in terms of national legislation; (i) the desirability of stable and predictable allocations of revenue shares; and (j) the need for flexibility in responding to emergencies or other temporary needs, and other factors based on similar objective criteria.

It is clear from the above factors that national interests will prevail — particularly national debt and other national obligations.[1] Indeed, when FC s 214 turns its attention to provinces and municipalities, it emphasizes their obligations in terms of national legislation.[2] As regards provinces and municipalities, FC 214 focuses on the provision of 'basic services',[3] performance of allocated functions,[4] fiscal capacity and efficiency,[5] 'developmental and other needs'[6] and national statutory obligations.[7] Mixed in with these factors are principles such as the need for 'stable and predictable allocations of revenue shares',[8] the need to correct economic disparities within and among the provinces (so-called 'horizontal imbalances'),[9] and the need to respond flexibly to emergencies and 'other factors based on similar objective criteria'.[10]

There is an internal tension in FC s 214. On the one hand, it acknowledges that the allocation of revenue is a matter of political judgment and, accordingly, makes the vehicle for allocation an act of Parliament. On the other hand, the section attempts to super-impose on this political process a layer of objectivity and justification. Whether it succeeds in doing so is another matter. Some have suggested that resource distribution across sub-national governments cannot be explained by efficiency and equity considerations alone: for these critics, the interests of central political agents are additional and significant determinants of DORA outcomes.[11] In short, it may be argued that notwithstanding the language

[1] See FC ss 214(2)(a) to (c). As we explore in § 27.5*(c)* below, national government cannot fall into financial failure and hence it can undertake long-term borrowing for operational reasons. FC s 214*(b)* also supports this notion by indicating the priority of national debt obligations.
[2] See FC s 214(2)(b).
[3] See FC s 214(2)(d).
[4] See FC s 214(2)(d).
[5] See FC s 214(2)(e).
[6] See FC s 214(2)(f).
[7] See FC s 214(2)(b).
[8] See FC s 214(2)(i).
[9] See FC s 214(2)(g).
[10] See FC s 21492)(j).
[11] See J Ahmad, S Devarajan, S Khemani & S Shah 'Decentralization and Service Delivery' World Bank Policy Research Working Paper 3603 (May 2005) 7.

of objectivity in FC s 214, the practice of determining the prioritisation for funding remains largely a matter of political judgement.[1] This criticism is belied, to some extent, by the memorandum accompanying DORA. The memorandum offers careful and well-argued justifications for DORA's distributions. Indeed, the formula for equitable share is detailed and sophisticated and enhances the predictability and 'own revenue' properties of equitable share. It is arguable that what FC s 214 produces (and intends to produce) is a political judgment constrained by considerations of efficiency and equity.

(e) Other Allocations

The expression 'other allocations' is the language used in the Final Constitution to describe the forms of intergovernmental grants aside from equitable share. In practice, other allocations are always conditional grants: the conditions specify financial management and institutional requirements, the purpose of the expenditure and the required outcomes from the expenditure.[2] What this means in practice is that municipalities have little discretion with respect to how they spend funds received through conditional grants. Hence if Parliament were to increase conditional grant levels in relation to equitable share, this shift would indicate, rather roughly, that Parliament was not supporting local autonomy or decentralisation.[3] Research indicates that this is not so.[4]

When it comes to conditional grants, there are three broad categories — capital grants, capacity building and restructuring grants and grants in kind. The current trend is towards the consolidation of grants. Hence the municipal infrastructure grant ('MIG') was created in 2003 to consolidate all funds for municipal infrastructure (capital grants).[5] If the primary purpose of equitable share is to cover the operational costs of providing services to indigent households; the primary purpose of MIG is to eliminate basic infrastructure backlogs.[6]

(f) Compliance with grant conditions

Supervising compliance with grant conditions is a key role of National Treasury. We have already mentioned that the Final Constitution introduces a distinction

[1] See P Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System Paper Two: Evaluating the Local Government Grant System' IDASA Occasional Papers (July 2003) 6.

[2] See P Whelan 'The Local Government Grant System Paper One: A Researcher's Guide to Local Government Grants' IDASA Occasional Papers (July 2003) 8.

[3] See IDASA 'Local Government in Budget 2005?' (9 May 2005) 154 Budget Briefs 7, available at http://www.idasa.org.za/ (accessed on 19 April 2007).

[4] Ibid at 7. See, further, § 27.8 infra.

[5] A formula is used to allocate MIG across sectors (eg water and sanitation, electricity and so on) and across municipalities. The B Component (basic residential infrastructure) represents the largest component of MIG and within this component the largest allocation is to water and sanitation.

[6] See National Treasury Trends in Intergovernmental Finance 2000/2001 — 2006/07 (2004) 31–32.

between conditional and unconditional allocations in FC s 227(1)(b). It provides no further content to the notion of a conditional allocation. The elaboration of the conditions and their enforcement falls to DORA. In terms of DORA, National Treasury may withhold conditional allocations if there is a 'serious or persistent material breach of the measures contemplated in section 216(1) of the Constitution'. Conduct relevant to determining whether a serious breach of FC s 216(1) has been committed encompasses 'non-compliance with the conditions to which an allocation is subject and the mismanagement of an allocation'.[1] It must be emphasised that the enforcement of grant conditions does not apply to equitable share. Stopping equitable share allocations to provinces is carefully controlled in FC ss 216(3) to (5). In terms of these controls, the transfer of equitable share may not be stopped for more than 120 days; the decision to stop equitable share is subject to parliamentary approval and the intervention of the Auditor-General who must report to Parliament; and before a decision is taken to stop a transfer, the affected province has the right to a hearing before a parliamentary committee. Moreover, the question of whether there has been a breach of the standards that would warrant stopping equitable share is justiciable.[2] Conditional grants can be stopped without meeting these requirements.[3]

Interestingly, the protections accorded to equitable share in FC ss 216(3) to (5) only apply to provincial equitable share. Equitable share allocated to municipalities is protected by MFMA s 39. MFMA s 39 introduces process requirements for stopping equitable share that are the same as those found in FC s 216. It is not clear why the Final Constitution has protected provincial equitable share allocations and not municipal allocations. MFMA s 39 has, in any event, neutralised this difference.

(g) Unfunded mandates

The term 'unfunded mandate' is used to describe an expenditure assignment that is not funded. In other words, unfunded mandates occur where a government agency has the responsibility of conducting a function but lacks suitable revenue raising capacity or does not receive a grant necessary for the performance of the function. Unfunded mandates are unacceptable within any fiscal structure; hence the principle that 'finance follows function'. This principle has been given the legislature's imprimatur of approval through DORA.[4] DORA requires that equitable share allocations for the funding of a particular function must be paid to the [1] See, for example, DORA 2001 s 23(3)(d).

[2] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 283. The regulatory role of National Treasury in relation to inter-governmental grants is explored in § 27.6*(a)* infra.

[3] See § 27.6*(a)*, infra, 'Stopping Transfers of Grants and Equitable Share'.

[4] See, for example, Division of Revenue Act 7 of 2003 s 27(2).

organ of state that is responsible for the function. Conditional grants, both operating and capital, also follow function. The principle that finance follows function can be taken a step further: it implies that the organ of state responsible for the function should be allocated any revenue-raising powers associated with the function. While such powers must be consistent with national fiscal policy, they would typically include the right to charge users of the service.

The danger of an unfunded mandate typically arises in the context of intergovernmental assignments and delegations, both of which involve the transfer of responsibility for the performance of a function between spheres of government. However, there is a fundamental distinction between assignments and delegations: the former permanently transfers responsibility for the function; the latter merely transfers a temporary contractual responsibility.[1] It is important to distinguish assignments and delegations in respect of intergovernmental grants. While it will often be necessary for the delegating authority to pay operating or capital funds to the municipality undertaking the service on their behalf, such payments do not represent transfers between spheres of government in terms of DORA. They are payments for the provision of a service, and the applicable provisions of the PFMA govern compliance.[2]

27.4 THE BUDGET PROCESS

(a) Introduction

The Final Constitution treats budgeting in three provisions of FC s 215. The first provision articulates abstract virtues to be satisfied by budgets and budget processes. The second provision envisages regulatory national legislation. The third provision sets out primary content requirements for budgets. The rather technical treatment of budgeting in these provisions — in which the language of management predominates — belies a complex political process,[3] the failure of which undermines government.[4] Budgets, as financial plans, show how government's

[1] See IDASA 'Local Government Powers and Functions' IDASA Occasional Papers (February 2004) 8.

[2] Typically an agency agreement will constitute a 'future financial commitment' regulated by PFMA s 66 and will require authorisation by the Act and the signature of the Minister. See PFMA s 66(2)(a)). Furthermore, the department's accounting officer would have to comply with various obligations under PFMA s 38 if it was going to transfer funds to the municipality including written assurances from the municipality in respect of its financial management and control systems. PFMA s 38(1)(j).

[3] The act of budget-making is legislative in nature, whether it occurs at national, provincial and local level. See Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1991 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 45 (Constitutional Court held that the new constitutional order confers on local government the status of an autonomous and distinct component of government, such that the municipal councils are legislative assemblies entitled to carry out legislative acts, which acts include levying taxes and adopting budgets (that is, using the Court's language, determining 'appropriations to be made out of public funds.')

[4] PFMA s 29 deals with a failure to pass a budget. In summary, the province is limited to spending as per the previous budget, and has limitations on how much it can spend in the first six months in which the budget should have been passed, and in each following month. There are no constitutional penalties for a failure to pass a budget.

resources will be generated and used over the fiscal period, and are the key instruments for promoting national objectives, strategies and programs. Our discussion in this section fills out these provisions and attempts to convey the centrality of the budget process in public finance.

(b) Constitutional Budgeting Principles

FC s 215(1) imposes a set of abstract principles on national, provincial and municipal budgets and on budgetary processes, namely that they 'must promote transparency, accountability and the effective financial management of the economy, debt and the public sector.' Because the national legislation envisaged in FC s 215(2) is designed to 'give effect' to FC s 215(1), it is possible to test judicially the extent to which national legislation (and the practice of all governments) satisfy FC s 215(1)'s rather abstract principles.

Transparency

Although the word 'transparency' is rather widely used, in the Final Constitution and in public finance legislation,[1] there has been no judicial consideration of its meaning in the context of public finance legislation and apposite public finance provisions in the Final Constitution. Discussions of the meaning of transparency in other contexts are not illuminating for our purposes.[2] Transparency reflects the government's candour about its structures, functions and operations. International instruments such as the Code of Good Practices[3] on Fiscal Transparency set out in the IMF Manual on Fiscal Transparency[4] ('the Code') provide useful guidance on the meaning of transparency. Three key ideas emerge from the Code: first, the need for clarity on the roles and responsibilities in budget-making with clear mechanisms for the co-ordination and management of budgetary and extra-budgetary activities; second, the need for a clear legal and administrative framework for fiscal management where public spending is governed by comprehensive laws, and the need for openly available administrative rules where revenue raising measures have an explicit legal basis; and third, the requirement that the public be provided with full information on the past, current, and projected fiscal activity of government and that the budget documentation should specify fiscal policy objectives, the macro-economic framework, the policy basis for the budget, and identifiable major fiscal risks.

Our view is that South African legislation and practice meets this standard for [1] See, for example, FC ss 41, 57, 70, 195, 215 and 216 and the objects clause in PFMA s 2.

[2] See Minister of Health and Another NO v New Clicks & Others 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). Chaskalson P refers to transparency, but does not discuss or describe what it means. Sachs J likewise refers to transparency, but refuses to be drawn on the content of principles transparency.

[3] Note that this Code is implemented on a voluntary basis.

[4] International Monetary Fund, Fiscal Affairs Department Manual on Fiscal Transparency (2001).

transparency. The elaborate oversight mechanisms found in the PFMA[1] and the MFMA[2] largely correspond to each of the three requirements in the Code as regards the budget process. As regards the implementation of the budget, the PFMA sets out the roles and the responsibilities of various office-bearers in monitoring expenditure and in achieving spending priorities and service delivery goals.[3] Stringent financial reporting and information requirements enable the National Treasury to track public spending per vote and at all levels of government. Monthly reports on expenditure at all levels of government are standard.[4] Thus, deviations from the budget, whether through under-spending, overspending, or wasteful spending are timeously noted and quick responsive action can be taken in order to control out-of-budget expenditure and to enforce limits on deviation from the budget. Independent regulatory oversight is also provided by the Auditor-General.[5] Although the legislative framework in which budgeting

[1] The national budget-making process is slightly different from the spheres in so far as the national government also undertakes revenue sharing discussions as part of its budget-making process. Chapter 4 of the PFMA introduces national and provincial budgets, but the details of the process are set out in Part 3 of the PFMA Regulations. The regulations are aimed at assisting the accounting officers of departments (national and provincial) to fulfill their responsibilities in relation to budget making. To this end, there are prescriptions as to content as well as format. Chapter 6 of Part 3 of the PFMA Regulations provides, for example, that national and provincial budgets must conform to the formats determined by the National Treasury (regulation 6.2.1). As regards content, departments are limited in their ability to provide for roll-overs (regulation 6.4), and require approval of their treasury before introducing new transfers and subsidies to other institutions (regulation 6.3.1*(b)*). At the provincial level, the budget is tabled before the provincial legislature by the MEC for Finance in the form of a money bill. The money bill is called the Provincial Appropriation Bill. This bill is then discussed by committees of the provincial legislature, with provision for public comment on their reports on the draft Bill. The committees report back to the legislature with their recommendations on adoption of the Bill.

[2] At the level of local government, each municipal council is required in terms of MFMA s 16 to 'approve an annual budget for the municipality before the start of the financial year'. Prior to the legislative act of budget-making lies a consultative process where budgets are determined. The Minister for Finance, acting with the concurrence of the Minister for Provincial and Local Government, may prescribe the format of municipal budgets and their supporting documents. The budget preparation process at local government level is headed by the Mayor and consultation with a variety of stakeholders is envisaged. Local and district municipalities are required to engage in budget-related consultations, and all municipalities are required to engage in consultation with the provincial treasury and, when requested, with the National Treasury. See MFMA s 21(2)(d). Subsequent to the tabling of a local budget, a municipality is required in terms of MFMA s 23 to consider the views of, among others, the local community, the National Treasury and relevant provincial treasury.

[3] See PFMA s 32, where monthly reports are required; PFMA s 39 which sets out the accounting officers' responsibilities in respect of budgetary controls; and PFMA s 40, on accounting officers' reporting responsibilities.

[4] See PFMA s 32 and MFMA s 71.

[5] For more on the Auditor-General, see S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor-General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B. In terms of FC s 193, the Office of the Auditor-General is required to: 'audit and report on the accounts, financial statements and financial management of (a) all national and provincial state departments and administrations; (b) all municipalities; and (c) any other institution or accounting entity required by national or provincial legislation to be audited by the Auditor-General.' The powers and duties of the Auditor-General are set out in the Public Audit Act 25 of 2004 (Section 29 provides that the Auditor-General may carry out investigations and special audits if the Auditor-General considers it to be in the public interest or upon the receipt of a complaint or request.).

takes place has been criticized,[1] the criticism has focused on the allocations of roles and responsibilities by the Final Constitution and not on than the budget process itself.

In addition to legislative prescriptions, a key facet of current government practice is the rolling three-year Medium-Term Expenditure Framework ('MTEF'). This projection of macro-economic assumptions, revenue and expenditure publicizes the government's fiscal policies, spending priorities and expenditure. National Treasury introduced the MTEF for the 1998/99 fiscal year and has entrenched the practice of demonstrating how revenue and spending will develop over the medium term.[2] The MTEF system clearly promotes the virtues articulated in FC s 215(1), particularly transparency and effective financial management through predictability.

Accountability

Accountability requires those responsible for discharging public office to account for or to take responsibility for their actions.[3] In developing this idea, we would suggest that there is an internal setting and an external setting for accountability. On the internal side, public officials are accountable to the executive for their conduct and performance such that 'they can and should be held accountable to (i) obey the law and not abuse their powers, and (ii) serve the public interest in an efficient, effective and fair manner'.[4] Internal monitoring of its own performance, and exposure of failures and misdeeds, is a powerful tool against corruption within the executive. Several actions and mechanisms have been introduced in the PFMA and the MFMA to hold public officials and public servants accountable

[1] See IDASA 'How Transparent is the Budget Process in South Africa?' (1 October 2002) 109 Budget Briefs available at http://www.idasa.org.za/ (accessed on 19 April 2007):

> [S]orting out national and provincial roles and responsibilities and identifying who is accountable for what is by no means a simple task. The allocation of roles and responsibilities is complicated by the following factors: firstly, the constitution requires the equitable division of nationally collected revenues between national, provincial and local government; and secondly, it assigns joint or concurrent responsibilities for a number of important functions to the national and provincial spheres. While there has been progress in clarifying roles, they are still not well known or understood. As a result media, civil society, the public at large and even people within government, struggle to come to grips with the division of roles and responsibilities and have a poor understanding of who is responsible for what. This obviously impedes stakeholders from holding government to account.

[2] The MTEF is not expressly prescribed in the Final Constitution or the PFMA. It was introduced in a budget speech by the Minister of Finance in 1998. The Minister stated the goals of the MTEF as follows: (1) to strengthen political decision-making in the budget process by linking budget allocations and service delivery; (2) to strengthen co-operative governance and decision making; (3) to enhance efficiency in spending so as to improve service delivery; and (4) to enable planning over the medium term. See T Manuel Budget Speech of 1998 (1998), available at http://www.treasury.gov.za/.

[3] C Malena, R Forster & J Singh 'Social Accountability: An Introduction to the Concept and Emerging Practice' Social Development Papers, Participation and Civic Engagement Paper No 76 (December 2004) 31–42.

[4] Ibid at 2.

for meeting their individual responsibilities.[1] Other institutions, such as the Office of the Public Protector, are also intended for this purpose.[2] A consideration of whether the Public Protector is adequately performing this task is dealt with elsewhere in this treatise.[3]

The external setting of accountability considers whether government as an institution is being held accountable for meeting its strategic planning goals and spending priorities. Only when the structure and the functions of government are apparent can it discharge this second form of accountability. Chapter 1 of the Manual on Fiscal Transparency states that '[e]stablishing clear roles and responsibilities for government and the rest of the public sector is a key aspect of fiscal transparency, because it provides a basis on which accountability for the design and implementation of fiscal policy can be assigned'.[4]

Effective Financial Management

The third and final constitutional principle is that of effective financial management of the economy, debt and the public sector.[5] The National Treasury sets financial management norms and standards for state departments. It monitors their performance and reports any deviations to the Auditor-General. The principle of effective fiscal management requires the establishment of a legal and administrative framework for fiscal management, which, in turn, implies a system

[1] One example is the responsibilities of accounting officers set out in PFMA s 38. These responsibilities include ensuring that the relevant department or institution has and maintains effective, efficient and transparent systems of financial and risk management and internal control; reporting on the particulars of any unauthorised, irregular or fruitless and wasteful expenditure to the relevant treasury; and taking effective and appropriate disciplinary steps against any official who fails to comply with the PFMA or makes or permits unauthorised, irregular or fruitless and wasteful expenditure. The financial misconduct provisions in Chapter 10 define financial misconduct. They also provide for disciplinary proceedings against officials guilty of an act of financial misconduct, and offences and penalties for officers guilty of an offence of financial misconduct. Similarly, the MFMA s 32 provides for liability for political office bearers, accounting officers and officials in respect of unauthorised, irregular or fruitless and wasteful expenditure and requires reporting to the MEC for local government in the relevant province as well as to the Auditor-General. The accounting officer is required to report to the South African Police Service in the event that the expenditure constituted a criminal offence or if theft or fraud have occurred.

[2] The Public Protector has the power to investigate and report on a wide range of activities within the public service and to take appropriate remedial action. Such remedial sction is limited in the Public Protector Act to mediation, conciliation and negotiation. The Public Protector may also offer advice on other appropriate remedies. As with the Auditor-General, the Public Protector plays an important role in accessing information and providing public reports on specific instances of alleged public service maladministration or corruption.

[3] For more on the Public Protector, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A.

[4] International Monetary Fund Manual on Fiscal Transparency (2001)('IMF Manual').

[5] See I Abedijan 'Fiscal and Monetary Policy Management in South Africa' 1994-2005 Pan-African Investment and Research Services (October 2005) 11, available at http://www.aprm.org.za/docs/APROct05.pdf (accessed on 4 May 2006)(Provides a history of fiscal policy in post-apartheid South Africa and a review of the reform process undertaken by the government.)

that regulates budgetary and extra-budgetary activities, taxation and ethical standards of behavior.[1] We have shown that the legislative framework in South Africa systematically sets out the roles and the responsibilities of state institutions as regards budgeting, spending, and reporting on public. This legislative framework offersd a performance management assessment framework for budgeting and financial management.[2] The essential elements of the legislative reform process that gave rise to this oversight framework have been described at length elsewhere in the secondary literature.[3]

Municipalities are subject to the Treasury norms and standards contemplated in FC s 216(1)(c) as well as significant national regulation and supervision. Municipalities, however, assume responsibility for their own effective financial management in the budget process.

(c) Legislation Regulating Budgets

FC s 215(2)(a) requires that national legislation prescribe the form of national, provincial and municipal budgets. The 'form' of the budget is something more than the functional layout of the document, although the layout too has been prescribed.[4] The legislation has understood its task in FC s 215(2)(a) in substantive terms and the tendency has been to provide for the minimum content of budgets.[5] At national and provincial level, budget formation is guided by the PFMA and the Treasury Regulations. At local level, this process is governed by the MFMA and National Treasury guidelines.[6]

The Final Constitution requires that national legislation provide a schedule for when national and provincial budgets must be tabled. The PFMA accomplishes this task by requiring the Minister for Finance to table the annual budget (national) for a financial year in the National Assembly before the start of that financial year.[7] Provincial legislatures are required by the same provision to table

[1] IMF Manual (supra) at 26.

[2] Abedijan (supra) at 11.

[3] Ibid: 'The main aims of these legislative reforms may be highlighted as follows: (a) establish an appropriate link between strategic objectives and expenditure plans; (b) ensure fiscal discipline within the constraints of what can be afforded; (c) promote the efficient use of resources, by decentralising and delegating decisions to where they are best made; (d) improve incentives and empowering managers to make effective decisions – while at the same time keeping public sector executives accountable for their managerial decisions. (e) introduce transparency and promotion of accountability; and, (f) introduce accessibility of information and budget estimates.'

[4] A unified approach makes sense in so far as monitoring of diverse forms of budgets is logistically challenging. Coherence promotes greater accountability and transparency in respect of the budgets as the opportunity for comparison between municipalities becomes possible.

[5] See PFMA s 27(3) for national and provincial budgets and MFMA s 17 for municipal budgets.

[6] There are many budget guidelines available for local government. One example is the MFMA Circular No 28 — Budget Content and Format for the 2006/07 MTREF available at http://www.treasury.gov.za/mfma/circulars (accessed on 21 April 2007). This circular provides guidance on content and format for municipal budget documentation for the 2006/07 financial year.

[7] See PFMA s 27.

the provincial annual budget for a financial year in the provincial legislature not later than two weeks after the tabling of the national budget. The MFMA regulates the timing of municipal budgets, requiring such budgets to be tabled 90 days ahead of the new financial year.

FC s 215(2)(c) also requires each sphere of government to show the sources of revenue and the way in which proposed expenditure will comply with national legislation. The specific nature of these requirements are reflected in MFMA s 17 for municipal budgets and PFMA s 27(3) for national and provincial budgets.

(d) Content of Budgets

Requirements relating to the content of budgets are prescribed in FC s 215(3):

> Budgets in each sphere of government must contain (a) estimates of revenue and expenditure, differentiating between capital and current expenditure; (b) proposals for financing any anticipated deficit for the period to which they apply; and (c) an indication of intentions regarding borrowing and other forms of public liability that will increase public debt during the ensuing year.

Estimates of Revenue and Expenditure

Revenue referred to in the constitutional provision refers to all money collected by the government in the course of its operations. For accounting purposes, receipts are divided into taxes, sales, transfers, fines, interest, dividends and rent on land as well as financial transactions in assets and liabilities.[1] Expenditure is categorized[2] and referred to as 'payments' and is divided into three broad categories: namely current payments, transfers and subsidies and payments for capital assets.

[1] See National Treasury Budget Review — 2006 (2006), available at http://www.treasury.gov.za (accessed on 21 April 2007):

> Taxes are classified according to the type of activity on which they are levied, including income, profits, consumption of domestic goods and services, and international trade. Sales are disaggregated into sales of capital assets and other sales. Transfers are unrequited receipts; i.e. the party making the transfer does not receive anything of similar value directly in return. These are classified according to unit, for example, other government units, private corporations, households, etc. Fines consist of all compulsory receipts imposed by a court or quasi-judicial body. Interest, dividends and rent on land includes all revenue associated with ownership of financial assets and land.

Ibid at Annexure D, 'Government Accounts' 205.

[2] Each government payment is classified in two ways, according to its functional and economic characteristics:

> The main function of the economic classification is to categorize transactions according to type of object or input, for example, compensation of employees, interest payment, etc. This is crucial, as data must be classified this way for calculation of the surplus or deficit, as well as government's contribution to the economy in the form of output, value added and final consumption. The functional classification is complementary to the economic classification. It serves to distinguish transactions by policy purpose or type of outlay. This is also referred to as expense by output. Its main purpose is to facilitate understanding of how funds available to government have been spent. Examples would be health, education, administration, judicial services, and so on. The broad categories in the functional classification are listed below: General government services refer to those indispensable activities performed by the state, the benefits of which cannot be allocated to specific groups, businesses or individuals. These include fiscal management, general personnel management,

Current payments encompass compensation of employees, payment for goods and services,[1] interest and rent on land[2] and financial transactions in assets and liabilities.[3]

Transfers and subsidies include funds that are transferred by government to other institutions, businesses and individuals. This item encompasses payments for which no goods or services are received in return. The category is further subdivided into the recipients of funding, separating transfers from expenditure controlled directly by departments (which would fall under current payments). The category includes current as well as capital transfers. The National Treasury has reported that > [i]n the past, capital expenditure included capital transfers. This led to ambiguity, because these numbers could be interpreted as exaggerating the actual contribution to capital formation made by government. By including capital transfers with other transfers, a much clearer picture is provided of government spending on capital.[4]

The third category, 'payment for capital assets', otherwise referred to as capital expenditure, represents expenditure on capital works: such expenditure may cover capital goods or durable goods, and assets such as roads and bridges, dams, power plants, schools and hospitals. This category also covers purchases of new assets, as well as extensions and improvements to existing assets and includes own-account construction. Own-account construction occurs when government units engage in capital projects on their own account.[5] Capital expenditure is stated as a separate item because it shows government's contribution to capital formation and its spending on new infrastructure, including improvements or extensions to existing infrastructure. Capital assets are divided into five categories: buildings and other fixed structures, machinery and equipment, cultivated assets, software and other intangible assets and land and sub-soil assets.[6] and conduct of external affairs, public order and safety. Protection services include all services that ensure the safety and security of communities, namely defence, police, justice and prisons. Social services are supplied directly to the community, households or individuals, and include education, health care, social security and welfare, housing, community development and recreational and cultural activities. Economic services cover government expenditure associated with the regulation and more efficient operation of the business sector. This category incorporates government objectives such as economic development, the redressing of regional imbalances and employment creation. Economic services provided to industries include trade promotion, geological surveys and the inspection and regulation of particular industries.

---

Ibid at 207.

[1] According to the National Treasury, '[t]his item refers to all government payments in exchange for goods and services, but excluding capital assets and goods used by government for construction of and improvements to capital assets'. Budget Review — 2006 (supra) at 205.

[2] Ibid at 205: 'This item is defined as payment for the use of borrowed money (interest on loans and bonds) and use of land (rent). It is distinguished from the repayment of borrowed money, which is classified under financing.'

[3] Ibid: 'This item consists mainly of lending to employees and public corporations for policy purposes. The reason for expensing this payment rather than treating it as financing is that, unlike other financial transactions, the purpose of the transaction is not market oriented.'

[4] Ibid at 206.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

Differentiating between capital and current expenditure

FC s 215(3)(a) requires a distinction between capital and current expenditure. Presumably, this distinction is aimed at improving accountability.[1] Critics argue that such a regime allows governments to hide deficits, especially if annual capital depreciation costs were not charged as current expenses, a normal accounting practice. Another view is that capital budgeting might encourage governments to use debt to finance capital expenditures since most public capital projects that might benefit society do not generate revenues that can be directly seen to cover depreciation and interest expense. Moreover, some capital expenditures are not easy to account for on an accrual basis because of the difficulties in measuring the depreciation of public capital.

Proposals for financing any anticipated deficit

This category, identified in FC s 215(3)(b), refers principally to government debt, whether raised through government bonds, direct loans, foreign loans or otherwise. In the budget, the category 'financing' sets out 'all financial transactions other than financial transactions in assets and liabilities, which are included as part of receipts and payments. Items recorded under financing reflect the sources of funds obtained to cover a government deficit or the use of funds available from a government surplus.'[2] The main items in this category include government borrowing, repayments of the principal component of loans incurred in previous periods, and transactions in government deposits and cash balances.[3] In our view, the terms 'proposals for financing' and 'an indication of intentions regarding borrowing' in FC ss 215(3)(b) and (c) are a reference to the fact that the debt has not been not raised at the time the budget is drafted.

27.5 Spending public funds

Expenditure has many dimensions: control of revenue funds and bank accounts, contracting, liabilities and security, borrowing, investments and wrongful expenditure. Very few of these issues are covered in FC Chapter 13. Chapter 13 covers only national and provincial revenue funds, procurement, government guarantees, and municipal and provincial loans. Some important issues relating to so-called [1] A capital expenditure account should include the flows and stocks related to public assets and liabilities setting out clearly the net capital position of the government. Without capital budgeting, proponents argue that deficit-constrained governments would defer major expenditures on capital programs and maintenance, since the benefits of such expenditures would not be immediate relative to the costs that would be incurred. According to proponents of this approach, governments would be more willing to invest in infrastructure if capital expenditures were accounted for separately over the life of an asset. See J Mintz & R Preston (eds) Capital Budgeting in the Public Sector (1993) available at http://strategis.ic.gc.ca/epic/internet/ineas-aes.nsf/en/ra00003e.html (accessed on 22 June 2006).

[2] See National Treasury Budget Review — 2006 Annexure D 'Government Accounts' (supra) at 206 (Items under 'financial transactions in assets and liabilities' represent transactions in items on the balance sheet.)

[3] Ibid.

'sub-sovereign' liability are suggested but not developed in Chapter 13. These issues have been left for parliament and government to resolve through legislation and regulation. We discuss the manner of government's resolution of these expenditure issues in the remainder of this section.

(a) The Revenue Funds

The treatment of the revenue funds in the Final Constitution has a practical importance that requires further elaboration. There are two dimensions regulating the flow of funds in and out of the revenue funds. The first is that all revenue raised by national government must be paid into the National Revenue Fund.[1] This proposition does not mean that national government has only one bank account, but that all money is accounted for in one government-controlled fund and all money is deemed to have been paid out of the same fund. This first dimension impacts outsourcing and security arrangements in which service providers and lenders often seek to exercise control over the flow of revenue.[2] The second dimension controls withdrawals from the funds. It is a constitutional principle — which might be termed the appropriation principle - that no funds can be withdrawn from a National or Provincial Revenue Fund under the Final Constitution, unless they are 'appropriated' in terms of an Act of Parliament, or a Provincial Act, or are paid by way of a 'direct charge' which is provided for in the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament or a Provincial Act.[3] This requirement is reflected in PFMA ss 11(1)(b)(i) and (ii) and MFMA s 15. 'Appropriation' and 'direct charge' are not defined in the Final Constitution or the public finance legislation.

We understand an 'appropriation' to be an authorisation made by an Act of Parliament directing payment out of the National Revenue Fund for specific purposes.[4] Appropriations are divided into votes. These votes determine the funds available to be spent in a financial year. Parliament debates and votes on how these funds will be spent. By contrast, a 'direct charge' constitutes an authorised payment from the National Revenue Fund for which no appropriation is necessary. Liabilities or payment obligations which involve direct charges must be paid regardless of whether or not they have been budgeted for in the national [1] FC s 213(1). One exception is permitted, namely that of money reasonably excluded by an Act of Parliament.

[2] For example, borrowings are sometimes secured by the inflow of a revenue stream. The creditor has an interest in isolating this inflow of revenue from other income streams of government. Often, a separate bank account will be established for this revenue stream. This separate account satisfies the requirement that the money must first be paid into the revenue fund, before being paid out in terms of an authorized appropriation, while also satisfying the creditor's requirement that the revenue be kept separate from other revenue of the branch of government involved in the deal.

[3] See FC ss 213 and 226 (Apply to appropriations from the national and provincial revenue funds respectively.)

[4] National Treasury describes direct charges as a statutory appropriation. These are called statutory or standing appropriations because they are funds that have already been earmarked, by prior legislation, for these purposes and are therefore not available for other regular annual expenditures. All other appropriations are made by vote and are referred to as 'votes'. See National Treasury Budget Review — 2001 (2001) 46, available at http://www.treasury.gov.za (accessed on 22 April 2007).

budget. This arrangement has important implications for non-national spheres of government and creditors. For example, a province's equitable share is a direct charge against the National Revenue Fund (see FC s 213(3)) and gives provinces a measure of financial autonomy vis a vis the national budget process. The PFMA has also elevated payments 'under a guarantee, indemnity or security' to the level of direct charges.[1] The intention behind the elevation of direct charges is to give government creditors an assurance of immediate payment that need not be mediated by a future legislative process. Prior obligations of the national government are also direct charges against the national revenue fund.[2]

The provincial revenue funds are similarly regulated. Each province has a provincial revenue fund into which all revenue raised by the province is paid.[3] Money is withdrawn by way of appropriations or direct charges. This process is provided for in the province's constitution, if it has one, or other provincial legislation.[4] Direct charges against a provincial revenue fund include revenue allocated through a province to local government in that province in terms of FC s 214(1), that is, equitable share.[5] Once again, this arrangement gives municipalities autonomy vis a vis the provincial budget process. Provincial direct charges are further regulated by FC s 226(4)(a). It provides that national legislation may determine a framework within which a provincial Act may in terms of subsection (2)(b) authorise the withdrawal of money as a direct charge against a Provincial Revenue Fund. This provision was introduced by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 61 of 2001 and is presumably designed to maintain national regulatory control over direct charges at provincial level. We are not aware of any legislation enacted under FC s 226(4).

There is no municipal revenue fund. However, a primary municipal bank account is required by the MFMA.[6] The regulation of the primary municipal account in the MFMA has in common with national and provincial revenue funds the requirement that all money for the provision of municipal services be paid into this account.[7] One clear difference between national and provincial revenue funds and municipal funds if that there is no equivalent of a direct charge at municipal level on the primary municipal bank account.

(b) Contracting

Government contracting is regulated by FC s 217. The section is often-cited in the case law although the individual virtues it imposes on government contracting

[1] See PFMA s 70(2)(a).
[2] The direct charges raised in the 2006 national budget are the state debt cost, provincial equitable share, skills development funds, other statutory amounts, and standing appropriations. See National Treasury Budget Review — 2006.
[3] FC s 226(1).
[4] FC s 226(2).
[5] FC s 226(3).
[6] MFMA s 8.
[7] See MFMA s 8(2).

have not been judicially considered. Aside from the elevation of competition to a constitutional requirement and the allowance made for affirmative procurement, FC s 217 has little practical impact on government contracting. The process of contracting is regulated in an ever-growing body of South African legislation that covers standard procedural and substantive controls[1] and affirmative procurement.[2] In practical terms, the constitutional provisions that are most significant for contracting are those that regulate payments from the revenue funds and those that control borrowing and guarantees.[3]

(c) Government Borrowing

We have placed government borrowing within this section dealing with expenditure because it is not a source of funding recognised in FC s 227. It neither moves through the inter-governmental system nor is it an own source of revenue. Borrowing is also typically tied directly to expenditure. Most other sources of revenue, such as taxes and unconditional grants, flow into a pool of funds that is subsequently allocated for expenditure. Although the treatment of borrowing in the Final Constitution is sparse, the text does set out principles that have implications far wider than borrowing per se.

Borrowing for capital and current expenditure

FC s 230 was amended by the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act[4] and subsequently bifurcated into two rather important provisions dealing, separately, with provincial loans and municipal loans. Both provisions allow provincial and municipal borrowing for capital and current expenditure but restrict borrowing for current expenditure such that these loans 'may be raised only when necessary for bridging purposes during a fiscal year'. This seemingly innocuous

[1] Process and substance controls are set out in the Municipal Supply Chain Management Regulations Notice 868 of 2005 Government Gazette 27636 (30 May 2005), the PFMA and regulation 16A of the Treasury Regulations. In addition, various practice notes have been issued under the PFMA. Practice Note Number SCM 1 of 2003 provides general conditions of contract ('GCC') and standardised bidding documents. Practice Note Number SCM 2 of 2003 provides threshold values for the invitation of price quotations and competitive bids. Practice Note Number SCM 3 of 2003 provides detailed guidelines on the appointment of consultants. In addition, policy statements have been published by National Treasury. See, eg, National Treasury 'Policy Strategy to Guide Uniformity in Procurement Reform Processes in Government' (September 2003).

[2] Affirmative procurement is regulated (not always coherently) by the Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Act 5 of 2000, the Preferential Procurement Regulations, 2001 (Government Notice No R 725 Government Gazette No 22549 (10 August 2001)), the Broad-Based Black Economic Empowerment Act 53 of 2003 and the recent codes issued under the BEE Act.

[3] For a detailed treatment of FC s 217, see P Reyburn & G Pennfold 'Public Procurement' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 25.

[4] Act 61 of 2001.

qualification has profound implications, particularly for municipalities. In order to understand these implications, it is necessary to explain the distinction between capital and current expenditure.

'Capital expenditure' is undefined in the legislation, but has an accounting definition alluded to in regulation 6.7.1*(d)* of the Treasury Regulations.[1] The Economic Reporting Format referred to in regulation 6.7.1*(d)* is set out in Annexure A to the 'Budget 2006 — National Medium Term Expenditure Estimates'. In this document 'capital assets' are defined 'either as a) goods that can be used continuously or repeatedly in production for at least a year and from which future economic benefits or service potential are expected to flow to the owner of the asset or b) land and sub-soil'. In summary 'capital expenditure' is government expenditure on assets that last for a year or more, such as buildings, land, infrastructure and equipment or immovable property. 'Current expenditure', by contrast, largely means salaries and wages, goods and services utilised by the government, and transfers and subsidies.[2] In effect, it deals with those expenses not related to expenditure for capital assets. Finally, the phrase 'bridging purposes' or the equivalent, 'bridging finance', is not defined in the PFMA or the Treasury Regulations. In the Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act ('BPPG'),[3] the phrase is defined as 'funds raised during a financial year in the Republic and denominated in rand to finance current expenditure in anticipation of the receipt of current revenue during that particular financial year, and includes an overdraft on a bank account.'

Given these various meanings for capital expenditure and current expenditure, FC s 230 and 230A make municipal and provincial financial failure a genuine possibility because neither may raise long-term loans to avoid deficits in current expenditure. It is important to note that default of this kind is not envisaged for

[1] Regulation 6.7.1*(d)* states that 'Capital expenditure referred to in the PFMA is the same as payments for capital assets in the new Economic Reporting Format.'

[2] For the more detailed accounting treatment of current expenditure, see National Treasury Budget 2006 Medium Term Expenditure Estimates (2006) Annexure A 6. For a statutory definition of capital expenditure, see the Borrowing Powers of Provincial Government Act 48 of 1996 ('Any payment by a provincial government for the procurement of new or existing tangible or intangible assets with a value higher than a prescribed value and with a normal life expectancy of more than one year, and includes payment for the acquisition of goods and services for the purpose of improving, prolonging the expected working life of, and rebuilding or reconstructing an existing fixed asset; a capital transfer to another person or body; the granting and payment of a money loan of which the proceeds will be used by the recipient of such a loan for capital expenditure; any other expenditure which is from time to time classified by regulation as a capital expenditure; the repayment of an outstanding loan which is due for redemption or conversion, provided that the proceeds of such conversion shall be used for the financing of expenditures contemplated in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), but excludes a payment by a provincial government in connection with the normal maintenance of a capital asset intended to keep such asset in its original state of repair.') national government. The Final Constitution nowhere prohibits national government from raising long-term loans for current expenditure. PFMA s 71*(a)* expressly allows such loans.[1] National legislation has placed a somewhat less onerous gloss on these provisions and, at the same time, has introduced important differences between provincial borrowing and local borrowing.

[3] Act 48 of 1996.

Provincial Borrowing

In principle, provincial borrowing is subject to the same constraints as municipal borrowing: namely, long-term loans cannot be raised for current expenditure. This restriction finds it way into national legislation such as the BPPG.[2] One reason for the restriction at the provincial level may be that Provinces are primarily funded through equitable share, a revenue source that tends to expand to meet expenditure requirements. However, it may also be argued that the Final Constitution does not support provincial fiscal autonomy. Indeed, while FC s 214(2)(b) expressly requires that deliberations around equitable share — that culminate in DORA allocations — take account of national debt and national obligations, there is no equivalent mention of provincial debt or local debt. Accordingly, there is no constitutional guarantee that the legislature will cater appropriately for the debt and other obligations of provincial governments. However, the tendency of equitable share to meet provincial expenditure needs is reflected in BPPG s 2 which concerns the establishment and responsibilities of the Loan Co-ordinating Committee. Section 2*(c)* provides that the Committee 'shall in its deliberations take account of the total debt of each provincial government and the bodies controlled by it and of their contingent liabilities, risks, and ability to service their debt, and which shall report thereon to the Commission'. In short, it is arguable that provincial equitable share is intended to render provincial borrowing largely unnecessary. While this makes the prospect of provincial financial failure unlikely, it has the further consequence of restricting provincial borrowing.[3]

Having provided a legislative basis for maintaining provincial solvency, the BPPG whittles down the enabling constitutional provision for provincial borrowing in FC s 230(1) and imposes legislative barriers to provincial borrowing that are not provided for in the Final Constitution. One extraordinary limitation set out in BPPG s 3(3) provides that, '[a] provincial government shall not commit itself to any financial product other than bridging finance, loans or such other

[1] This section provides that the Minister may borrow money in terms of PFMA s 66(2) to 'finance national budget deficits'.

[2] Act 48 of 1996.

[3] The interaction between the BPPG and the PFMA warrants mention. PFMA s 66(1)(c) clearly subjects provincial loans to the limits set out in the BPPG. This restriction does not apply to other future financial commitments including guarantees, suretyships and other financial transactions.

