[6] See S v Mbaba 2002 (1) SACR 43 (E)(Finding that the absence of a representative did not properly constitute the offence of contempt in facie curiae and finding that, even if the summary procedure found unconstitutional in Mamabolo as to contempt ex facie curiae were appropriate, it ought to have been terminated where the accused was given no opportunity to be present, essentially left the question of the constitutionality of the procedure in the sphere of contempt in facie curiae unaddressed.)

[7] 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC)('Singo')

[8] Ibid at para 17.

Singo did not rely on a comparison of the liberty impact of the one offence with that of the other, mainly because the situation of failing to appear (as opposed to, say, insulting the judicial officer) is one that does not readily appear to attract liberty.

In S v Ntshwence, the court followed both Lavhengwa and Singo and found that a summary procedure was justifiable in the sphere of contempt in facie curiae.[1] Note that in both S v Solomons[2] and in Ntshwence, the substantive liberty question did not feature in the assessment. Solomons more obviously entailed liberty concerns than did Ntshwence. The former concerned insulting behaviour on the part of the accused as the basis of the contempt. The latter had more to do with disrupting the court's procedures in the true sense of the concept (although even here it was not clear whether the insulting behaviour was more significant than the disruptive effect of the behaviour).

Confusion between substantive rights and criminal procedure rights could also be found in an argument raised but rejected in S v Phallo & Others.[3] The argument was that since false statements might constitute the relevant assistance for the purposes of liability as an accessory after the fact, the right to silence would be violated if the acts entailed remaining silent to shield the perpetrators. This contention was tantamount to claiming that liability for fraudulent non-disclosure violated the right to silence. Whenever the law requires one to disclose and penalizes one for not disclosing, the relevant concern is liberty, not silence.[4]

Rigorous analytical identification of the substantive liberty question at play occurred in S v Thebus.[5] A constitutional challenge was mounted against aspects of the common law doctrine of common purpose. The particular point of law challenged concerned the doctrine's lack of a requirement of a causal link between the conduct of the accused and the consequence for which the law held the accused liable. The doctrine attributes to the accused responsibility for the conduct of others. One difficulty faced by the challenge was to enunciate the objection on the basis of a constitutional right or principle that was violated by the manifestation of causation allowed by the doctrine. The challenge was founded on dignity, liberty and the fair trial incident of the presumption of innocence.[6] Moseneke J was not distracted by the applicant's conceptual confusion: for the judge the issue was one of substance, and, in essence, one of liberty analysis — was the Final Constitution content to allow a person to be deemed criminally liable (and his or her freedom to be affected) on the basis of the attribution to him or her of the conduct of another without the requirement of causation? The essence of the complaint had to be against the criminal norm at issue.[7] Once it

[1] 2004 (1) SACR 506 (Tk)('Ntshwence').
[2] 2004 (1) SACR 137 (C)('Solomons').
[3] 1998 (3) BCLR 352 (B).
[4] See, eg, JW Child 'Can Libertarianism Sustain a Fraud Standard?' (1993-4) 104 Ethics 722. For a discussion of the relationship between silence and self-incrimination, see § 51.4*(b)* infra.
[5] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC)('Thebus').
[6] Ibid at para 17.
[7] Ibid at para 36.

was held that the manner in which the doctrine approached the causation question did not amount to arbitrary deprivation of freedom,[1] the question was settled. The Court was then only required to indicate that analysis in terms of dignity or process did not add to the proper analytical framework.[2] This outcome is a striking illustration of the fact that the due process wall makes irrelevant the criminal procedure rights in FC 35 with respect to due process analysis of the constitutionality of a norm by which criminal liability is attributed to the individual.

(iv) Fair trial seepage

The erection of the due process wall in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek v Powell NO & Others,[3] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others,[4] and De Lange v Smuts NO & Others[5] has the following consequences:

1. The right to a fair trial, and the specific instances of that right contained in FC s 35(3), apply only to accused persons. There is to be no seepage of fair trial rights from FC s 35(3) into other spheres.
2. There should be no due process seepage from FC s 12 into FC s 35. That is, 'deprivation of liberty' analysis should not inform the interpretation of the fair trial right of an accused person under FC s 35(3). It also means that there is no residual due process principle operating around the rights of detainees and arrestees contained in FC s 35(2).
3. The sort of 'trial' one is entitled to under FC s 12(1)(b) differs from the sort of trial one is entitled to under FC s 35(3). The former lays down less rigorous requirements, or requirements less generous to the individual concerned, than the latter.

The most disquieting feature of Nel v Le Roux NO & Others is the logical extension of its reasoning. In its desire to distinguish sharply between the sort of fair trial rights an accused person may expect and the sort of 'trial' that is the minimum requirement for a lawful detention the court has rendered decisive to one's chances of being afforded the 'full' right to a fair trial the degree of arbitrariness or informality in the proceedings which lead to imprisonment. The more arbitrary or informal the proceedings in question, ie the less closely they resemble a criminal trial, the less claim the imprisoned individual has to 'full' fair trial rights under FC s 35. If the state were to embark upon a general practice of instituting summary proceedings which bear little resemblance to criminal trials as its main process to incarcerate those suspected of crimes, the reasoning in Nel would [1] Thebus (supra) at paras 36 to 40. It was not without significance that the inquiry in Coetzee was the point of reference.

[2] Ibid at paras 35, 41, 42 and 43.
[3] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira').
[4] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel').
[5] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange').

hold that the new class of criminal 'accused' would not be entitled to the right to a fair trial with trimmings. The finding of the Constitutional Court in De Lange, that the 'trial' required by FC s 12 was 'a hearing presided over or conducted by a judicial officer in the court structure established by the 1996 Constitution and in which section 165(1) ha[d] vested the judicial authority of the Republic',[1] removed the most serious potential danger of the Nel finding. But the 'full' right to a fair trail remains the privilege of those who can be classified as 'accused' under the Final Constitution. One might have thought the main function of FC s 35 was to prohibit alternative routes to gaol which bypass the fair criminal trial.[2]

One way around this problem is to interpret the term 'accused' generously. Of course, to the extent that courts allow seepage of fair trial rights from FC s 35(3) into the rest of FC s 35, the injunction in Nel is being defied. In Legal Aid Board v Msila & Others[3] the Eastern Cape Division decided to adopt 'as wide and broad an approach as possible' in interpreting the meaning of the word 'accused' in IC s 25(3)(e), thereby achieving the award of the right to counsel as an 'accused' person to a litigant applying for the setting aside of an interdict. Since violation of an interdict created the criminal trial from which the fair trial right could be imported, 'the applicant's envisaged action in seeking to have the interdict set aside [might], in a broad sense, be equated with, and as part of (sic), his defence to the charge laid against him'.[4] How this 'broad sense equation' is to be distinguished from other civil claims — which in some more or less tenuous way are also the subject-matter of criminal proceedings — does not immediately appear clear. One can only remark that the 'broad' interpretation of 'accused' in Msila contrasts rather sharply with the restrictive interpretation of 'trial' in Nel.

Whether a similar extension of the meaning of 'accused person' occurred in S v Sebejan & Others[5] is not altogether clear. In this case, the question was whether a suspect who could not be described as a 'detained or arrested person', let alone an 'accused person', at the relevant time was entitled to be informed of constitutional

[1] De Lange (supra) at para 57.

[2] The recognition by the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe in Mutasa v Makombe NO of Parliament's right to regulate its own affairs by means of disciplinary procedures without being encumbered by 'fair trial' requirements cannot be faulted, but such proceedings may be ominous breeding grounds for conducting criminal trials by means of bills of attainder. 1997 (6) BCLR 841 (ZS). As long as the 'offence' in question as well as the punishment remains Parliament-bound, the danger will be averted. The imposition of fines may involve questions of due process deprivation of property, and, of course, the whole would be subject to requirements of administrative justice. See De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)(Disciplinary proceedings of Parliament were held to be subject to constitutional scrutiny and to the requirements of natural justice. Section 5 of the Powers and Privileges of Parliament Act 91 of 1963, which ousted the court's jurisdiction in respect of some matters of parliamentary privilege, was unconstitutional.) For more on bills of attainder, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] 1997 (2) BCLR 229 (E).

[4] Ibid at 243.

[5] 1997 (8) BCLR 1086 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 626 (W)('Sebejan').

rights upon being questioned by the police.[1] Satchwell J pointed out that the accused had not been 'arrested or detained' at the relevant time, but then proceeded to consider whether she should not, as a 'suspect', have been given due process rights. The learned judge then observed that the 1931 Judges' Rules provided for cautioning suspects upon questioning them and, given the three questions the learned judge posed ('what is a suspect?' 'what rights accrue to a suspect?' and 'was the accused a suspect at the relevant time?'),[2] one would be entitled to think that the result would be rights to which a suspect was entitled qua suspect. But the reasoning ultimately followed left the suspect qua suspect in the hands of the Judges' Rules. Satchwell J proceeded to analyse the position from the point of view of an accused whose right to a fair trial was affected by something which happened while that accused was a suspect. The conclusion was built upon the solid foundations of the proposition that '[t]he requirements of due process extend to the pre-trial conduct of law enforcement authorities', and it is clear that the judgment placed itself within the jurisprudence relating to extending the view backwards in time from the date of trial to determine whether the accused was receiving a fair trial.[3] It is rather unfortunate, then, that the learned judge asked 'how can a suspect have a fair trial where pre-trial unfairness has been visited upon her by way of deception?' (our emphasis). How, indeed, can a suspect have a fair trial at all? Whichever way the matter is considered, Msila and Sebejan must be

[1] It is not clear whether the rights of which the accused claimed she should have been informed were those of an 'arrested person' under IC s 25(2), which include and add to those of a 'detained person' under IC s 25(1), or those of a 'detained' person, which do not include silence and incrimination safeguards or, indeed, whether the complaint related to 'fair trial rights' of an 'accused person' provided by IC s 25(3). The conclusion reached by the court was framed in terms of IC s 25(3).

[2] Sebajan (supra) at 631.

[3] See S v Melani & Others 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335 (E). Later, however, one reads: 'No less than an accused is the suspect entitled to fair pre-trial procedures.' Sebajan (supra) at 636. This does seem to be a return to the perspective of the suspect qua suspect. The right of a suspect to 'the benefit of a caution or a warning' was assumed for the purposes of argument in S v Ndlovu. 1997 (12) BCLR 1785, 1791I-J (N)('Ndlovu'). But the definition of 'suspect' which was laid down for these purposes in Sebejan was viewed obiter as perhaps setting the standard 'too low'. Ndlovu (supra) at 1792B. See Sebejan (supra) at 1092I ('[O]ne about whom there [was] some apprehension that he [might] be implicated in the offence under investigation and, it [might] further be, whose version of events [was] mistrusted or disbelieved.') Magid J made the above assumption in the context of the Judges' Rules, having determined that IC s 25 was 'of no relevance' to the case. Ibid at 1791C. Sebejan was not followed in S v Langa & Others. 1998 (1) SACR 21, 27 (T)(Held that the discussion of a suspect's rights in Sebejan was obiter, given the finding that the accused had not been a suspect at the relevant time.). The accused in Langa, however, had undoubtedly been suspects when questioned concerning their possession of goods suspected to be stolen. They had not, held MacArthur J, enjoyed rights to counsel or silence at that stage. No attention was paid to the effect on their rights as accused persons as to what had happened while they were suspects. The absence of any due process right under IC s 25 or FC s 35 outside the sphere of arrest and detention comes most starkly to the fore in such situations. For a discussion of the right to silence, see § 51.4*(b)*(ii).

classed among those cases that have subverted the seepage prohibition issued by the Constitutional Court.[1]

The approach adopted by the court in S v Mthethwa further illustrates the blurred line between the trial sphere and the pre-trial sphere.[2] Here, the issue was the effect, at the trial, of the absence of any caution that the accused was a suspect (at the time of questioning) and did not have to answer questions. The difficulty was discussed with reference to Sebejan and S v Van der Merwe[3], namely that the 'suspect', before becoming an arrested or detained person as understood in terms of FC s 35, did not appear to enjoy any FC s 35 rights. The court adopted the approach endorsed in Van der Merwe. It regarded the fairness of the treatment of the subject as a question of the fairness of the trial that occurred subsequently[4]. What was interesting for present purposes was that the court still found it necessary to analyse the question whether the accused had indeed been a 'suspect' at the relevant time.[5] The question arose again in S v Orrie & Another.[6] Here, the court squarely confronted the distinction between saying, on the one hand, that there was something about being a 'suspect' that attracted FC s 35 rights, and, on the other hand, saying that the question whether one had been a suspect or not at the relevant time would be a relevant consideration, when one became an accused at trial, in considering the effect upon the fairness of the trial of what had happened while one was a suspect. Bozalek J had no difficulty in ignoring the orthodoxy underpinning the due process wall. The judge found that a purposive interpretation of the FC s 35 rights, with a view to the interests the rights were intended to protect, required according to a suspect the relevant rights of an arrested and detained person in terms of FC s 35.[7]

An instructive decision by the Constitutional Court, and one that, if it did not vault the wall, at least offered a step-ladder, is that in S v Baloyi.[8] What was at issue was the question of whether proceedings to determine violations of family violence interdicts granted in terms of the now superseded Prevention of Family Violence Act were sufficiently criminal in nature to turn those being prosecuted into 'accused persons'

[1] See Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa & Others 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683 (E)(Court did not have to determine that proceedings on motion for 'civil contempt' ex facie curiae were criminal for the purposes of rendering the respondent an 'accused person' under FC s 35(3). Its application of FC s 35(3) in FC s 12 'limitation' analysis clearly subverted the seepage prohibition.) See also § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra.

[2] 2004 (1) SACR 449 (E)('Mthethwa').

[3] 1998 (1) SACR 194 (O)('Van der Merwe').

[4] Mthethwa (supra) at 454G.

[5] Ibid at 454G-J.

[6] 2005 (1) SACR 63 (C)('Orrie').

[7] Ibid at 69I-70C. The reasoning was quite subversive of the due process wall, as it implied that the interests at issue would determine whether (and also which) section 35 rights applied, instead of asking whether one was dealing with the kind of person protected by the right, and then according that person all the rights set out in the relevant section.

[8] 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 81 (CC) ('Baloyi').

for the purposes of FC s 35(3)(h). The noteworthy aspect of the judgement was not the result — namely that the proceedings were indeed sufficiently criminal in nature for the fair trial rights to apply; it was the fact that this result occurred on the premise that the form of the proceedings was 'neither that of a normal civil trial, nor that of an ordinary criminal trial, but of a special enquiry involving elements of both'.[1] What makes this decision so important for present purposes is the fact that it gave comfort that even proceedings that did not form part of the criminal justice system, or were not criminal trials proper, could attract section FC s 35 protection if the character of what the proceedings were aimed at achieving sufficiently approximated that of a criminal prosecution.[2]

(v) Maintaining the wall

The Explanatory Memorandum to the Early Draft Bill of Rights of 9 October 1995 states the following:

> Section 25 deals separately with the rights of detained (including sentenced), arrested and accused persons in the context of the right to freedom of the person (s 11) and the right to fair pre-trial and trial proceedings. This represents a departure from international instruments and foreign Bills of Rights, but it is an innovation which constitutes an improvement on these international and national instruments as it allows for greater clarity and certainty.

If the Ferreira and Nel wall had been scrupulously guarded by the courts, more 'clarity and certainty' might well have resulted. But that clarity would have come at the cost of recourse to liberty analysis and due process principles, and with the result that arrested and detained persons could find no generic principle to flesh out their rights under FC s 35. The interpretation of the residual right to a fair trial to which only accused persons are entitled would then be starved of philosophical foundations in the common law or in comparative human rights jurisprudence.

But the wall has been pierced in so many ways that the time has come for the courts to enforce it or to abandon it. As far as the relationship between liberty, due process, and FC s 35 is concerned, there is no sign currently of the 'clarity and certainty' to which the Explanatory Memorandum refers.

[1] Baloyi (supra) at para 19 (Sachs J). The observation that these special proceedings were necessary because of the inadequacy of the 'criminal justice system' in addressing family violence logically entailed the proposition that what was at issue before the Court was something outside of the 'criminal justice system'. Ibid at para 12.

[2] An examination of a potential state witness in terms of section 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, although aimed at the criminal trial, did not place the witness in the position of an accused vis-à-vis the state and therefore did not attract the protections of FC s 35. See S v Mahlangu 2000 (1) SACR 565 (W). See also Hamata & Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee & Others 2000 (4) SA 621 (C)(A person appearing before an administrative tribunal in a disciplinary inquiry was not an 'accused' for the purposes of enjoyment of section 35 rights such as the right to counsel); Hamata v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee 2002 (5) SA 449 (SCA)(Discussion of the issue on appeal); Mhlekwa v Head of The Western Tembuland Regional Authority And Another; Feni v Head of The Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another 2000 (2) SACR 596 (Tk)(Assumed without any difficulty that those who were prosecuted in these courts were 'accused persons' for the purposes of FC s 35 rights.)

There is one more twist to the problem of due process seepage. The structure and wording of art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights point to an interesting new possibility for due process seepage under the Final Constitution. Article 6(1) is the general fair trial provision. It applies to 'everyone', 'in the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him'. This general fair trial right has been afforded an 'extensive and autonomous' interpretation by the Convention organs.[1] The result is that it not only operates as the residual fair trial right, but may also lift from the confines of liability to criminal conviction those aspects of a fair trial which are specifically provided to accused persons in art 6(2) and art 6(3).[2] The right to be presumed innocent, for example, a right not even contained under the 'minimum' inclusionary umbrella of art 6(3) but granted in isolation to everyone 'charged with a criminal offence', has been held to apply outside the sphere of criminal conviction wherever a penalty may be exacted.[3]

The Final Constitution contains a clause which bears uncanny resemblance to the relevant portion of art 6(1) of ECHR. It is the 'access to courts' provision contained in FC s 34, which reads:

> Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal.[4]

This clause is beyond question capable of performing all the due process seepage into FC s 35 which the Constitutional Court in Ferreira and Nel denied to the deprivation of liberty clause. In fact, its express mention of a 'fair public hearing', as opposed to the unqualified reference in FC s 12(1)(b) to a 'trial', and the modest reference in FC s 12(1)(a) to deprivation of freedom 'arbitrarily or without just cause', would seem to arm this new provision with a greater claim to operating as a general due process clause than the freedom clause.[5] Be that as it may, only the most ardent supporter of due process seepage would hope that the Constitutional Court might allow FC s 34 to do what it took great pains to prohibit IC s 11 from doing. Still, if it is recognized that the courts have to turn to liberty analysis when extending the residual scope of fair trial rights, and that the conceptual wall often hampers a more foundationally secure development of the criminal procedure rights, both of accused persons and of arrested

[1] R Beddard Human Rights and Europe (3rd Edition, 1993) 172.

[2] See S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 1-39.

[3] See Adolf v Austria (1982) 4 EHRR 313; Minelli v Switzerland (1983) 5 EHRR 554; Beddard (supra) at 172.

[4] See A Friedman & I Currie 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 60.

[5] See Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at paras 102-6.

and detained persons, the court may decide to vindicate the wholesale due process smuggling discussed above by taking the jack-hammer of FC s 34 to the due process wall. The Constitutional Court has given a strong indication that it will not use this jack-hammer. In S v Pennington & Another, the unanimous court remarked obiter that FC s 34 did not apply to criminal proceedings. Chaskalson P declared:[1]

> The words 'any dispute' may be wide enough to include criminal proceedings, but it is not the way such proceedings are ordinarily referred to. That section 34 has no application to criminal proceedings seems to me to follow not only from the language used but also from the fact that section 35 of the Constitution deals specifically with the manner in which criminal proceedings must be conducted.

It is nevertheless interesting to note that Chaskalson P justified this obiter finding with regard to FC s 34 by invoking art 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights.[2]

Another possibility for 'due process' seepage is the rather enigmatic provision that is section FC s 173. FC s 173 provides that the Constitutional Court, Supreme Court of Appeal and High Courts have inherent power to protect and regulate their own process, and to develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice. This jurisdictional provision was employed in Hansen v The Regional Magistrate, Cape Town and Another to allow the court to set aside a sentence and to substitute a lesser sentence for it on review, despite the fact that the applicant had exhausted his legal remedies of appeal by the time the application had been brought.[3] The facts were that two brothers had been charged with the same offence, but only the applicant had been prosecuted and convicted, as his brother had absconded. The brother was apprehended, tried, convicted and sentenced some five years later, and received a much lighter sentence than the applicant, who successfully reviewed his heavier sentence. The difficulty was finding jurisdiction for the court in circumstances where the courts were functus officio in relation to the criminal proceedings, and where common law authority stood in the way. The answer was FC s 173. It should be stressed that the possibility of using FC s 173 to establish jurisdiction does not entail the power to augment or to supplant the provisions of FC s 35 with substantive liberty analysis. That said, the precise use to which FC s 173 may be put in filling in possible gaps in the due process wall have not been decisively determined.

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC)('Pennington') at para 46.

[2] Pennington (supra) at paras 47-50. See also Monnell and Morris v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 205. The fact that FC s 34 does not apply to criminal proceedings does not mean it cannot apply in proceedings ancillary to criminal proceedings — such as measuring the fairness of property preservation orders obtained ex parte in terms of section 38 of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act 121 of 1998. See National Director of Public Prosecutions v Mohamed NO 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC).

[3] 1999 (2) SACR 430 (C).

(b) Interpretation of FC s 35

(i) General

Like the other sections in the Bill of Rights, FC s 35 should be interpreted liberally, purposively and in favour of the individual arrested, detained or accused person.[1] The Constitutional Court has clearly endorsed an interpretation in favorem libertatis with respect to FC s 35.[2] However, it has not wholly avoided very narrow constructions. The restrictive interpretation of the word 'trial' in Nel v Le Roux NO & Others discussed above — where the same word's appearance in IC s 25 was insufficient to persuade the court to accord it the IC s 25 meaning in IC s 11 because of the absence of a 'textual link' between the words[3] — is a clear example of an interpretive method which would be regarded as restrictive in whatever field of law it operated. Enough has been said about due process seepage; suffice it to add that the decree in favour of generosity and the due process wall do not pull in the same direction. Furthermore, the extraordinarily cursory treatment meted out to the arguments against the final bail provision in the First Certification Judgment hardly constitutes a ringing proclamation in favorem libertatis.[4] In S v Thebus & Another, the Constitutional Court specifically required a 'generous' interpretation of the application of FC s 35(3)(h). It held that the qualification 'during the proceedings' governed only the right not to testify, and did not limit the operation of the right to silence at issue in FC s 35(3)(h).[5]

(ii) Abdication

The interpretation of difficult or vague provisions in FC s 35 (and IC s 25) has given rise to a phenomenon which can fairly be said to hamper the development of a rigorous constitutional criminal procedure jurisprudence: namely interpretive abdication. The abdication has taken the form either of insistence upon the ad hoc nature of the fair trial right and a concomitant refusal to lay down anything that may be in danger of being regarded as a general guiding

[1] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 3.

[2] S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 15. See Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC)('Sanderson') at para 22 (Constitutional Court unanimously invoked the duty to interpret IC s 25(3) in a 'broad and open-ended' manner as an important substantiation for interpreting IC s 25(3)(a) in a manner contrary to what it regarded as a persuasive textual argument.)

[3] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel') at para 13.

[4] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 88('First Certification Judgment').

[5] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC); 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)('Thebus') at para 104. This conclusion led the court to find 'inappropriate' the drawing of a distinction between the pre-trial right to silence and the right to silence during the trial: 'The right to silence is initially conferred by FC s 35(1)(a) and thereafter by FC s 35(3)(h)'. Ibid at para 104.

principle,[1] or of talk of judicial 'discretion' in the strong sense,[2] or of a non possumus declaration coupled with an appeal to Parliament to fill in the details in

[1] For more on 'flexibility', see S v Nombewu 1996 (12) BCLR 1635, 1659 1661 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E)(Erasmus J found 'nothing' in the Interim Constitution that 'dictate[d] a strict test . . . or for that matter a slack test' as far as the exclusion of evidence in violation of rights was concerned. Erasmus J stated that 'the Canadian test of "disrepute"' [could not] displace our standard of "a fair trial"', but the learned judge went on to say that the Canadian test was a 'useful even necessary check in the exercise of the court's discretion' (emphasis added), only to suggest in the next paragraph that 'consideration of the public mood [ie the 'disrepute test'] [lent] flexibility to the application of Chapter 3'. (emphasis added).) See also Coetzee & Others v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D), 1997 (1) SACR 546, 560 (D)(Thirion J could find 'no virtue in trying to formulate a rule for determining a point in time from which the delay in commencing a trial [had] to be reckoned for the purpose of deciding whether the delay [had] been unreasonable'.) See, further, S v Shaba en 'n Ander 1998 (2) BCLR 220 (T), 1998 (1) SACR 16, 20C (T)('Daar mag mettertyd sekere riglyne uitkristalliseer wat 'n hof behulpsaam mag wees by die ondersoek en beoordeling van die vraag of daar aan die voorskrif van art 25 voldoen was. Sulke riglyne kan egter nooit tot wet of regsreëls verhef word nie' (emphasis added)). Kriegler J's refusal to lay down 'normal periods' for specific kinds of cases of delay in Sanderson should not be regarded as a form of 'abdication' of this sort. Sanderson (supra) at para 34. There is a difference between shying away from the possibility of laying down rules and principles, on the one hand, and refusing to compile a laundry list of acceptable periods of delay for certain kinds of criminal trials, on the other. Strong dicta from the Constitutional Court have entrenched the growing orthodoxy that fairness is a fact-sensitive question essentially to arise on an ad hoc basis, and is not capable of being determined in the abstract with references to rules of thumb, or in a fact-free 'vacuum'. See S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 25 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC) at para 13 (Endorsed by Yacoob J in his separate concurring judgement in Thebus (supra) at para 111.) Very welcome, if atypical, was the endorsement in Thebus by the majority (on the issue in question) of a general principle at the expense of such ad hoc assessment — when it came to the question whether the right to silence was violated by the use in evidence of pre-trial silence on a certain issue, the question was approached as one that yielded a uniformly applied answer. Thebus (supra) at para 85. This question should be distinguished from the different question of whether the violation in the case in question rendered the trial unfair. Ibid at para 93. Yacoob criticized this conclusion and, not without justification, asked why an ad hoc approach should be avoided in the case of pre-trial silence, where fairness was used as a barometer in other cases. Ibid at paras 97 and 109. One might as readily ask why the desirability of forging general rules ought not also to apply to other inquiries into criminal due process rights violations beyond the sphere of the illegitimate use of pre-trial silence.

[2] See R Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously (1977, 1996 impression) 32. Dworkin helpfully distinguishes between 'discretion' in a weak sense and discretion in a strong sense. Weak discretion is not 'discretion' properly so called, and includes: (1) the exercise of a judgment the correctness of which is difficult to ascertain, an example of which is the lieutenant's order to the sergeant to take his five most experienced men on patrol where it is hard to determine which are the most experienced, and (2) someone's having final authority to make a decision which cannot be reversed by someone else. Discretion in the strong sense is 'not merely to say that an official must use judgment in applying the standards set him by authority, or that no one will review that exercise of judgment, but to say that on some issue he is simply not bound by standards set by the authority in question'. The most frequent invocation of strong discretion has been in the area of excluding evidence obtained in violation of rights. See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma'); Ferreira v Levin & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); S v Mathebula & Another 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 133H–135B (W). FC s 35(5), which requires the exclusion of unconstitutionally obtained evidence 'if the exclusion of that evidence would render the trial unfair and otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice', is an excellent example of 'discretion in the weak sense'. It is properly described as a rule calling for judgment, rather than a 'discretion' in the strong sense. It is indeed fortunate for the legitimacy of fair trial interpretation that this distinction was recognized in S v Naidoo & Another. 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D), 1998 (1) SACR 479, 499G-500D (N)('Naidoo'). The High Court rejected the approach adopted in S v Madiba & Another. 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D). The portion from the judgment in Madiba, with respect, confused a decree requiring judgment, on the one hand, with a discretion, on the other. Naidoo (supra) at 499A-D (See the reference in the passage to a discretion, coupled with the notion interpreting the rights in question.[1] It is of the utmost importance to the legitimacy of a judiciary with the power to strike down legislation that it regard itself, when interpreting fundamental rights, not as having a discretion in the strong sense, but as obeying the dictates of the supreme authority, namely the Final Constitution, even if the task calls for judgment rather sweeping in nature. The court in S v Mathebula & Another recognizes this imperative.[2] (However, the court's assumption that if the question of the violation of a right is a matter of constitutional interpretation and not discretion, then the determination of the remedy should likewise be a matter of constitutional interpretation and not discretion, does not necessarily follow.) Similarly, in S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis, the Court held that whether an accused is entitled to representation should 'pre-eminently' of a 'duty' to make a decision which was fair to both sides.) Having to decide what fairness requires does not equal having a discretion in the strong sense. If it did, the courts should grasp the nettle and declare all of FC s 35 to be a matter of discretion — appealable only on the principles applicable to the exercise of a judicial discretion. This is plainly not the case. It is respectfully to be regretted that the Transvaal Provincial Division in S v Makofane — 1998 (1) SACR 603, 617A-I (T) — based its decision that the Interim Constitution had not disturbed the discretion to refuse a discharge under s 174 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 on a passage in Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & Another — 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 786 (CC) — which discussed the tension between the public interest in bringing criminals to book and the public interest in ensuring a fair trial, and which contained the observation that the trial judge was the 'person best placed to take that decision' (concerning the requirements of fairness). Key certainly did not say that every IC s 25 and FC s 35 question boiled down to an exercise of discretion. S v Shongwe & Others reiterated the misinterpretation of Key as laying down a 'discretion'. 1998 (9) BCLR 1170 (T), 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T) 1998 (9) BCLR 1170 (T), 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T). For more on Makofane, see § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra.

[1] See S v Mhlakaza & Others 1996 (6) BCLR 814, 833H (C). Van Deventer J makes the extraordinary complaint that the governing principles and guidelines relating to the exact scope and content of the right to counsel provided in IC s 25(1)(c) should not be left to the courts. See also S v Nortjé 1997 (1) SA 90, 101–2 (C)('[W]hether the system of trapping is to continue in South Africa is obviously a matter for Parliament and the Constitutional Court'. Given that the court had jurisdiction to decide the constitutional question before it, and given that it had embarked on a discussion of the constitutional merits of trapping in the context of the right to a fair trial, its disavowal of responsibility for deciding the question cannot be supported. A finding that the constitutional merits of trapping were not strictly relevant to the decision in the case would of course have been a different matter altogether.) See also S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583, 607D-E (N). The Dube court was confronted with an entrapment question in circumstances where the then newly enacted provisions of section 252A of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, which comprehensively addressed the question, were held not to apply. The court approached the matter as one of determining whether the admission of the relevant evidence harmed the administration of justice and the fairness of the trial. Note that the proliferation of legislative codification of some perennial questions of due process reflected in section 35 (such as section 252A dealing with trapping, and section 342A dealing with unreasonable delays in trials) have the tendency to create doubt about the intended exhaustiveness with which the legislature has seen fit to regulate the topic, and the status of the legislative codification relative to the over-arching constitutional principle the codification seeks to address. The difficult question in each such case would arise where the legislative codification is held, on its own terms, not to apply, and whether that then means that recourse to the constitutional principle would be in conflict with the legislative intention. Of course, since the legislation in question has no constitutional status, it can only, in theory, add to the rights of an accused person, and not limit them by purporting to set criteria for the application of the FC s 35 rights. But courts would naturally tend to approach such questions as if they were comprehensively governed by the statutory provision, at the expense of the development of vibrant self-standing constitutional jurisprudence in these areas.

[2] 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 133–5 (W).

left to the officer trying the case,[1] and should not be read as a reference to a discretion in the strong sense. It is, rather, a reference to the privileged position of the judicial officer trying the case to make the decision required by the Final Constitution.[2]

These generous constructions once again run up against Nel v Le Roux NO & Others. In Nel, the Constitutional Court held that if conducting a trial in private was a violation of the right to a public trial, then leaving the decision as to whether to violate the right to the strong discretion of the trial judicial officer meant that 'the question of an infringement of any right of the applicant in this regard simply [did] not arise' until the discretion was exercised.[3] This conclusion seems to be a very unfortunate violation of the principle that granting a wide discretion to infringe a right is itself an infringement of that right.[4] The judgment of the court as to the question whether unconstitutionally obtained evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice, circumstances that FC s 35(5) decreed 'must' lead to the exclusion of the evidence, was regarded by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v M as 'no doubt' entailing a 'discretion'.[5] Likewise, the Constitutional Court in S v Thebus called the determination in terms of FC s 35(5) a 'discretion'.[6] Both cases relied on a passage in Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & Another.[7] The passage refers to the determination as ultimately a matter for the trial judge to assess. Abdication of responsibility for interpreting the fundamental rights in FC s 35 is not the proper way of engaging issues of institutional comity.[8] The discourse of discretion threatens to engulf

[1] 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC) at para 15.

[2] The same should be said of the decision in Msila v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others. 1996 (3) BCLR 362 (C). The court in S v Maduna en 'n ander admittedly did regard the decision to grant legal representation as one of a discretion in the strong sense. 1997 (1) SACR 646, 664 (T). This conclusion, with respect, is wrong.

[3] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC) at para 17.

[4] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chakalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[5] 2003 (1) SA 341 (SCA) at para 30.

[6] Thebus (supra) at para 108.

[7] 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 786 (CC) at paras 11–13.

[8] The discussion in S v Mathebula of the relationship between public approbation, discretion and constitutional authority, with the greatest respect, seemed to confuse the issue of legitimate authority with that of the public approval rating of a given decision to exclude improperly obtained evidence. 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 135 (W). The argument was that an exclusion which was based upon a rejection of an appeal to IC s 33(1) to save the evidence in question would have less disreputable consequences for the administration of justice than one based upon a discretion. It is true that if a constitutional decision, however much people may disagree with it, is ultimately a bona fide application of the dictates of the Interim Constitution, however that be understood, rather than an exercise in strong discretion, then such a decision, from the point of view of the theory of constitutional democracy, is more justifiable as consonant with the legitimate function of the court. But whether the public will cry 'the law is an ass' on a particular exclusion of evidence will be a question independent of the source of the supposedly asinine activity. A court cannot avoid the unpopular consequences of its interpretation by relying on the fact that it is in fact interpreting.

the fair trial constitutional jurisprudence at the cost of the jurisprudentially important affirmation of the difference between acknowledging a discretionary power on the part of the judiciary and requiring the courts to interpret what a fair trial requires.

(iii) The common law and FC s 35

The relationship between the common law and FC s 35 is the most conceptually challenging problem of interpretation in the sphere of criminal procedure rights. There is, on the one hand, no question that the principles underlying criminal procedure rights have a venerable history in the common law. As Erasmus J put it in S v Nombewu:[1]

> The common law has special significance in the sphere of criminal procedure and evidence. The law in this regard has a long tradition of seeking to achieve much the same objectives as are now entrenched in the Constitution.

On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has made it clear that that foundational common law principles stand to be re-evaluated in light of FC s 35.[2] As Kentridge AJ stated in S v Zuma & Others:

> Constitutional rights conferred without express limitation should not be cut down by reading implicit restrictions into them, so as to bring them in line with the common law (Attorney-General v Moagi 1982 (2) Botswana LR 124 at 184). The caveat is of particular importance in interpreting section 25(3) of the Constitution.[3]

This caveat was heeded in S v Maseko. Borchers J held that, as far as the protection of the right to silence during plea proceedings was concerned, the principles developed in the common law were 'no longer sound reasoning' in light of the Interim Constitution's provisions, and that the court was consequently not bound by precedent based upon them.[4] A similarly pronounced example of basing the interpretation of an IC s 25 right upon a rejection of the governing common law position in favour of a conclusion more in keeping with the underlying principles of the Interim Constitution occurred in Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi. The court rejected the practice of affording deference to the Attorney General's assessment of the risks of bail. The Court's new approach flowed from the values that permeated the Interim Constitution ('[d]ie tussentydse Grondwet en veral Hoofstuk 3 daarvan, is deurdrenk met 'n nuwe en meer demokratiese benadering').[5] Where the courts are called upon expressly

[1] 1996 (12) BCLR 1635, 1656 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E).

[2] Bernstein (supra) at paras 59–64; Nel v Le Roux (supra) at paras 8–9, 18; Shabalala v Attorney-General (Transvaal) 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC) at para 9.

[3] Zuma (supra) at para 19. See also S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC) at para 1 and Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 22.

[4] 1996 (9) BCLR 1137, 1141 (W), 1996 (2) SACR 91 (W).

[5] 1996 (11) BCLR 1514, 1531 (O).

to consider a principle of common law criminal procedure rights protection and to measure its adequacy against the standards of the Final Constitution,[1] the break between the paradigms is most apparent. As was pointed out in S v Thebus:

> [T]he need to develop the common law under s 39(2) could arise in at least two instances. The first would be when a rule of the common law is inconsistent with a constitutional provision. Repugnancy of this kind would compel an adaptation of the common law to resolve the inconsistency. The second possibility arises even when a rule of the common law is not inconsistent with a specific constitutional provision but may fall short of its spirit, purport and objects. Then, the common law must be adapted so that it grows in harmony with the 'objective normative value system' found in the Constitution.[2]

There are, however, several examples of a 'pure codification' approach to the criminal procedure rights — an approach which regards FC s 35 as entrenching common law principles and doctrines. In Davis v Tip & Others[3] Nugent J held that the right to remain silent during trial granted by IC s 25(3)(c) did not 'enlarge upon' the common law right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty beyond reasonable doubt, but merely 'guarantee[d] its future existence'. In S v Malefo en Andere, M J Strydom J held that 'die Grondwet [het] slegs die bestaande beginsels betreffende 'n regverdige verhoor herbevestig soos dit onder andere in die gemene reg gegeld het.'[4] In Msomi v Attorney-General of Natal & Others[5] Moodley J accepted the proposition articulated in S v Huma & Another[6] that IC s 25(3)(d) was 'merely a codification of the common law privilege against self-incrimination and that it did not take the common law principle any further'.[7] The 'weight of authority' that put paid to a constitutional challenge S v Lavhengwa was exclusively common law authority.[8] And in S v Maduna en 'n Ander the analysis of the discretionary nature of the right to counsel was again based exclusively on common law principles.[9]

[1] See, for example, the consideration afforded to the question as to whether the Final Constitution introduced any hardening of the rule against admitting hearsay evidence against an accused person, and the conclusion that the current statutory regime passed muster, in S v Ndhlovu & Others. 2002 (6) SA 305 (SCA). See also Mbambo v Minister of Defence 2005 (2) SA 226 (T)(Testing the common law principle that an appeal lay only where the statute afforded an appeal, against the requirements of the right to an appeal found in section 35(3)(o), as interpreted in S v Twala (SA Human Rights Commission Intervening) 2000 (1) SA 879 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 106 (CC) at paras 9 and 10 and in S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC) at paras 5, 11, 13 and 23.)

[2] Thebus (supra) at para 28.

[3] 1996 (1) SA 1152 (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 807, 811 (W).

[4] 1998 (2) BCLR 187 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 127, 152F (W).

[5] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N)('Msomi').

[6] 1996 (1) SA 232 (W).

[7] Msomi (supra) at 1119 and 1120. The reference to the 'American common law (in so far as it was relevant to the protection afforded by the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution . . .)' is unfortunate: Fifth Amendment jurisprudence is not common law jurisprudence.

[8] 1996 (2) SACR 453, 473 (W).

[9] 1997 (1) SACR 646 (T).

In the context of self-incrimination and silence rights, the common law has proved quite resilient and the adoption of its analyses most comfortable. This approach is reflected in both S v Singo[1] and S v Monyane & Others.[2] The appropriate manner of approaching double jeopardy, and identifying whether it was entailed by impugned conduct or not, as considered in S v Basson,[3] was determined by common law analysis. Important reiterations of codification discourse, occur in S v M, with its reference to 'standards of fairness which the common law recognizes and the Constitution guarantees to an accused person',[4] and in S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening), which refers to the right to silence and the presumption of innocence as 'procedural rights which are central to the adversarial criminal process which was developed under the common law and subsumed into the Bill of Rights.'[5] Importation of common law principles of due process is most natural where the residual fair trial principle is at play, and may occur without much concern about the precise constitutional rubric for the importation.[6]

Sometimes the codification approach, once adopted for the content of the right in question, is taken to apply also to the remedy to be granted. In Klein v Attorney-General, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Another the court adopted a codification approach to the right to a fair trial.[7] Its statement that 'there has … never been a principle that a violation of any of the specific rights encompassed by the right to a fair trial would automatically preclude the trial' was cited with approval in Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another.[8] In Moeketsi, Friedman J seemed to assume that the common law character of a particular right necessitated compliance with the common law attitude to the remedies available upon

[1] 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC) at para 30 (The starting point was one couched in terms of codification — a reference to the rights to silence and against compelled self-incrimination as 'primarily rooted in our common law and statutory law … [and] now constitutionally entrenched'.)

[2] 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T).

[3] 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC) at paras 61-69.

[4] 2003 (1) SA 341 (SCA) at para 28.

[5] 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela') at para 23. See also Thatcher v Minister of Justice & Constitutional Development & Others 2005 (1) SACR 238 (C) at para 86; S v Chabedi 2004 (1) SACR 477 (W) at para 21; S v John 2003 (2) SACR 499, 505B (C).

[6] Several examples come to mind: the idea of an evolution of a more pro-active judicial role, recognized as necessary to ensure the fairness of the proceedings in English common law, and regarded as appropriate in a 'modern South African context' (S v Joors 2004 (1) SACR 494, 500C (C)), or the importation, with reference to the work of Steytler, of the 'common law principle of a fair trial' not to have an 'unduly hasty trial' (S v Chabalala 2002 (1) SACR 5, 6D-E (T)), or the incorporation of the common law principle of nulla poena sine culpa as a 'fundamental rule of a fair trial' (S v Lubisi: In re S v Lubisi & Others 2004 (3) SA 520, 528J-529D (T)).

[7] 1995 (3) SA 848 (W), 1995 (2) SACR 210 (W).

[8] 1996 (7) BCLR 947, 958-9 (B).

violation of that right.[1] This, with respect, is a non sequitur. A failure to be alive to the distinction between the common law character, if any, of the right in question and the common law remedies for violations of the right resulted in a lamentable lack of clarity about the relationship between the doctrine of abuse of process and the right to a fair trial in Coetzee v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others.[2]

The pure codification approach can take some strange turns. In S v Scholtz Basson J held, as far as the right to silence during trial and inferences from silence were concerned, that the failure of the Final Constitution expressly to have altered the right and remedy in question had to be taken as an indication that the common law right had not been altered.[3] In S v Lavhengwa, the only difference that the existence of the Interim Constitution seemed to have made to the merits of the offence of contempt in facie curiae was to have fortified the justifiability of the incursion into liberty entailed by the offence in question, since an affront to the 'authority, dignity and repute' of the courts as 'watchdogs of constitutional rights' had now seemingly become a more serious matter.[4] In Seapoint Computer Bureau (Pty) Ltd v McLoughlin & Others NNO, the court based its decision on a codification approach which regarded the right to silence as the embodiment of the common law privilege against self-incrimination.[5] But it then went on to reject counsel's arguments based upon the common law protection against self-incrimination enunciated in Jamalodien v Ajimudien.[6] It did sopartly on the basis that that case, not being 'concerned with the right to remain silent', was not authoritative in the instant case.[7]

Some courts have attempted a golden mean approach to avoid the Scylla of pure codification and the Charybdis of re-inventing the wheel. In S v Hassen & Another,[8] the Transvaal Provincial Division displayed a sensitivity to the problems discussed above in deciding whether the common law position, that entrapment was not a substantive defence, was still applicable under the Interim Constitution.[9] In S v Kester Friedman JP based his decision on the extent of the [1] For a similar assumption, see S v Malefo en Andere 1998 (2) BCLR 187 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 127, 152F–G (W). The interpretation of FC s 35(5), which provides for the exclusion of unconstitutionally obtained evidence if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice, and the jurisprudence under IC s 25, where no such remedy is expressly granted, is discussed in PJ Schwikaard 'Evidence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 52.

[2] 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D), 1997 (1) SACR 546 (D).

[3] 1996 (11) BCLR 1504, 1508 (NC), 1996 (2) SACR 40 (NC).

[4] 1996 (2) SACR 453, 474 (W).

[5] 1996 (8) BCLR 1071 (W)('Seapoint').

[6] 1917 CPD 293.

[7] Seapoint (supra) at 1081.

[8] 1997 (2) SA 253 (T), 1997 (3) BCLR 377 (T).

[9] The court's main concern was with the evidential consequences of unconstitutional trapping if trapping were to be regarded as unconstitutional and hence it did not exhaustively address the arguments in favour of the American position establishing a substantive defence in the case of entrapment on the basis of Fifth Amendment due process. Ibid at 381f. Cf United States v Russell 411 US 423 (1973). See also S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583 (N), 2000 (1) SACR 53 (N).

information required to be presented to the accused on an incisive exploration of common law principles, and then added that his view was 'fortified' by the provisions of IC s 25(3)(b).[1] An identical attitude was adopted by Claassen AJ in S v Moilwa, where the right of an unrepresented accused to assistance by the court was based on common law and first principles which were then 'supported' ('gesteun') by IC s 25(3).[2] In S v Brown & 'n Ander, the court acknowledged the required reappraisal and refinement of common law principles which constitutionalization entailed, and came to the conclusion that, as far as the right not to testify was concerned, the Interim Constitution had not altered the substance of the law, but had brought about a shift in emphasis ('klem verskuiwing').[3] And in S v Nombewu,[4] Erasmus J noted 'a trend in recent years towards greater recognition of the role of public policy in criminal procedure and evidence',[5] and found that, as far as excluding improperly obtained evidence was concerned, '[t]he Constitution did not leave the existing law unchanged.'[6] He put the matter thus: 'With the enactment of the Constitution, public policy acquired a new dimension.'[7] In S v Letaoana Marcus AJ came to the noteworthy conclusion that the clause in the Final Constitution which decreed the manner of interpreting the common law, FC s 39(2), had the effect of requiring judges to keep their eyes more closely on the Final Constitution in interpreting the common law than was the case under the Interim Constitution.[8] The substitution of a requirement to 'promote' the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights in FC s 39(2) for the requirement to 'have due regard' to these factors in IC s 35(3) led to the following conclusion:

> To 'promote' in this context, means to further or advance. It means more than taking into proper account.[9]

A rare and welcome expression of the 'a fortiori' principle occurred in S v Legoa.[10] This doctrine (an incident of a predilection towards generosity in interpretation) holds that when one interprets the scope of a constitutional due process right, one should afford it at least the scope of its common law parent; or, put differently, the constitutional protection should always at least include the degree of protection afforded by the now codified right under common law. With regard to this principle, Cameron JA made the following observations:

[1] 1996 (1) SACR 456, 470 (B). See also § 50.5*(n)*(iii) infra (On the interpretation of the dictum in McIntyre & Others v Pietersen NO & Another 1998 (1) BCLR 18, 21C (T), sub nomine S v McIntyre en Andere 1997 (2) SACR 333 (T), that one found in the Interim Constitution a 'samevatting' of the ancient right of an accused to avail himself of the defence of autrefoit acquit.)
[2] 1997 (1) SACR 188, 193 (NC).
[3] 1996 (11) BCLR 1480, 1489 (NC), 1996 (2) SACR 49 (NC).
[4] 1996 (12) BCLR 1635 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E).
[5] Ibid at 1657J.
[6] Ibid at 1658D.
[7] Ibid at 1658D
[8] 1997 (11) BCLR 1581 (W).
[9] Ibid at 1591.
[10] 2003 (1) SACR 13 (SCA)('Legoa').

> Under the common law it was therefore 'desirable' that the charge-sheet should set out the facts the State intended to prove in order to bring the accused within an enhanced sentencing jurisdiction. It was not, however, essential. The Constitutional Court has emphasised that under the new constitutional dispensation, the criterion for a just criminal trial is 'a concept of substantive fairness which is not to be equated with what might have passed muster in our criminal courts before the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 came into force'. The Bill of Rights specifies that every accused has a right to a fair trial. This right, the Constitutional Court has said, is broader than the specific rights set out in the sub-sections of the Bill of Rights' criminal trial provision. One of those specific rights is 'to be informed of the charge with sufficient detail to answer it'. What the ability to 'answer' a charge encompasses this case does not require us to determine. But under the constitutional dispensation it can certainly be no less desirable than under the common law that the facts the State intends to prove to increase sentencing jurisdiction under the 1997 statute should be clearly set out in the charge-sheet.[1]

The courts should acknowledge without equivocation that the content of the rights contained in FC s 35 are a matter of constitutional interpretation. The remedies to be granted upon violation are likewise a matter of constitutional interpretation. The questions are distinct. That many, if not all, of the criminal procedure rights have a common law ancestry, and require argument on the basis of the principles which justify that common law ancestry, is beyond question. But the conclusions reached by the common law courts are not authority to bind the courts when it comes to the interpretation of FC s 35. FC s 35 lay down fundamental rights. These rights may mean little without their common law histories, but they may well mean a lot more than their common law histories. The common law principles were developed as a function of public or state interests over procedural safeguards in the interests of individual liberty, and parliamentary intrusion had to be accommodated as smoothly as possible. The Final Constitution shifts the paradigm by listing the individual's rights irrespective of other interests and prohibiting violation of these rights by any means other than those laid down in the limitations clause.[2] The common law equation is unravelled and those interests that accrued on the other side of liberty now require justification to overturn the listed rights. That the answer may often be the common law answer does not change the conceptual picture. Nor does this mean that the wheel will be re-invented for every question: some common law justifications speak with such authority that much of the analytical work will be done, for practical purposes, by that weight of authority. An exploration of the justification process is therefore a useful next step in the analysis.

[1] Legoa (supra) at para 20.

[2] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31 (The Final Constitution — and the doctrine of constitutional supremacy — make the rights found in Chapter 2 — the Bill of Rights — the departure point for analysis.)

(iv) Limitation

According to the general theory of limitation, the court should first determine the scope of FC s 35 rights, then require the applicant to indicate that the right thus interpreted has been infringed, and then allow the state or the party relying upon the law to justify a limitation of that right by discharging the burden of justification under FC s 36(1).[1] This two-stage analysis, asking first whether the individual's right has been infringed, and then asking whether the infringement can be justified by sufficiently weighty state interests, was specifically endorsed for the purposes of criminal procedure rights by the Constitutional Court in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek v Powell NO & Others[2] and Scagell & Others v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others.[3] In fact, the application of the general 'double-barrelled approach' to criminal procedure rights was regarded as 'trite' by the Witwatersrand Local Division in S v Lavhengwa,[4] and expressly insisted upon in S v Mathebula & Another[5] and S v Sebejan.[6]

Nevertheless, the criminal procedure rights, particularly the right to a fair trial, involve a nightmare for limitation analysis. First, the fair trial right and a number of the specifically enumerated criminal procedure rights contain a number of 'internal modifiers' and 'internal limitations' that make two-stage limitation analysis exceedingly difficult.[7] The only true 'internal limitation' in the criminal procedure rights was the bail proviso contained in ICs 25(2)(d), which establishes a right to be released from detention 'unless the interests of justice require otherwise'. But even this 'internal limitation' has a lesser claim to being a limitation proper if the interpretation of this clause in Ellish en Andere v Prokureur-Generaal, Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling[8] and Prokureur-Generaal van die Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling v Van Heerden en Andere[9] — that the clause did not place an onus

[1] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chakalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Applied to compelled self-incrimination).

[3] 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC) at para 19. Naturally, a statutory provision that limits certain rights, in particular rights that do not relate to the fairness of the trial, is more readily analysed in terms of the orthodox two-stage analysis without much ado. See, for example, the analysis of the provisions relating to violent arrest in section 49 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 embarked upon in Ex parte Minister of Safety & Security: In re S v Walters. 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC). On the assessment of the constitutionality of section 37 of the General Law Amendment Act 62 of 1955 in the light of its reversal of the onus, see S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC). The same applies to a rule of the common law that is challenged on the basis of being contrary to the adequate protection of rights. See S v Thebus & Others 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)('Thebus') at paras 29–32; S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 48ff.

[4] 1996 (2) SACR 453, 477 (W).

[5] 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 135 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W).

[6] 1997 (8) BCLR 1086 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 626, 628 (W).

[7] For more on internal modifiers and internal limitations, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chakalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.4 and § 34.5

[8] 1994 (4) SA 835 (W), 1994 (5) BCLR 1 (W).

[9] 1994 (2) SACR 469 (T).

upon the State is accepted. The alteration of this clause to remove the possible burden of justification on the State in IC s 25 and to replace it with a condition ('if the interests of justice permit') in FC s 35 means that there are no 'internal limitations' proper in the Final Constitution's criminal procedure rights.[1]

However, internal qualifications framed in terms of reasonableness, adequacy, sufficiency, or the interests of justice abound.[2] These qualifications, while not distinctly separable from the right concerned as a permissible 'internal limitations', are also not the kind of 'internal modifiers' which Woolman and Botha identify as distinguishable from internal limitations on the basis that they are part of an inquiry into the content of the right.[3] If the right to a fair trial can be transcribed as the right not to receive an unfair trial, then the problem of the relationship between defining the right in question and justifying its limitation may seem identical to that pertaining to the prohibition of 'unfair discrimination' in FC s 9(3).[4] But whether 'unfair discrimination' should be regarded as conceivably justifiable is not the same as asking whether an unfair trial is justifiable. It seems easier in principle to separate the practice of 'unfair discrimination' from the reasons offered to justify it, especially as far as 'indirect discrimination' is concerned,[5] than to separate the fairness of a trial from the interests of the state invoked as justification for conducting a trial in a certain way. This is because the common law notion of a fair trial developed as a function of the interests of the individual accused against those of the state in the first place.

[1] On 'internal limitations', see Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 34.5.

[2] See IC s 25(1)(b), IC s 25(1)(c), IC s 25(2)(b), IC s 25(2)(d), IC s 25(3), IC s 25(3)(e), IC s 25(3)(j); FC s 35(1)(d), FC s 35(1)(f), FC s 35(2)(c), FC s 35(2)(e), FC s 35(3), FC s 35(3)(b), FC s 35(3)(d), FC s 35(3)(g), FC s 35(5).

[3] See Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 34.4.

[4] See C Albertyn and B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chakalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 35.

[5] 'Indirect discrimination' or 'disparate impact' refers to a practice the effect of which is disproportionally to disadvantage members of a protected group. Such a practice, while being recognized as discrimination, allows justification rendering it lawful. It is by no means contrary to the principles of anti-discrimination law to hold that indirect discrimination, while being recognized as 'unfair' from the victim's point of view, is reasonable and justifiable in many cases. If affirmative action is regarded as a form of direct discrimination, then the potential applicability of a two-stage analytical structure to direct discrimination would of course follow naturally. See Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen [1995] IRLR 660 (ECJ)(Absolute tie-break in favour of appointing equally well-qualified women candidates to civil service a violation of EC Equal Treatment Directive, even where Directive contained allowance for affirmative action); Jepson and Dyas-Elliott v The Labour Party [1996] IRLR 116 (Women-only constituencies for election candidates 'direct discrimination' for the purposes of British anti-discrimination statute); B Hepple 'Can Direct Discrimination be Justified?' (1994) 55 Equal Opportunity Review 48; Adarand Constructors Inc v Pena 115 SCt 2097 (1995)(Both state and federal affirmative action programmes in the United States subject to 'strict scrutiny' analysis). In South Africa the matter is complicated by the potential internal limitation structure of FC s 9. See Minister of Finance & Another v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC); Public Servants Association of South Africa & Others v Minister of Justice & Another 1997 (3) SA 925 (T), 1997 (5) BCLR 577 (T). See also C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006).

It is no wonder, then, that when it comes to the right to a fair trial the courts so often introduce the kind of balancing in the definition stage of the analysis which Woolman characterizes as 'the worst kind of analytical confusion'.[1] It is truly unfortunate that the decision of the Constitutional Court in Shabalala v Attorney-General of Transvaal did not indicate exactly to which part of the analysis competing state interests were being attached.[2] In Attorney-General, Eastern Cape v D the Eastern Cape Division was of the opinion that > 'it [was] a misconception that the fundamental right to a fair trial focuse[d] exclusively on the rights and privileges of the accused as those rights [had to] be interpreted and given effect to in the context of the rights and interests of the law-abiding persons who [made] up the bulk of society and, in particular, the victims of the crime'.[3]

In Klink v Regional Court Magistrate NO & others, the South Eastern Cape Local Division, faced with the question whether allowing a child witness to testify through an intermediary violated the accused's right to a fair trial, held that 'in deciding whether [the accused's] rights had been violated it [was] also necessary to take into account the interest of the child witness'.[4] The 'trite' two-stage analysis was also completely absent from the judgment in Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another. In its stead Friedman JP offered, as the method of defining trial within a reasonable time, 'an "ad hoc balancing"' process in certain cases requiring the skill and ability of a juggler',[5] and elaborated, not entirely helpfully, that 'a more vital approach' than an 'all embracing formula' lay in 'an effort to weigh the factors detailed objectively within the inner framework of justice' and that '[t]his process require[d] a constant intellectual communication and interflow of the relevant components as extracted from the authorities'.[6] In Msomi v Attorney-General of Natal & Others[7] Moodley J held that because Sachs J had expressed the view in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others that a practice like compulsory fingerprinting would have far less difficulty in passing IC s 33 scrutiny than would testimonial compulsion,[8] this dictum

[1] S Woolman 'The Limitations of Justice Sachs's Concurrence: Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa' (1996) 12 SAJHR 99, 115-21. See also Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 34.3.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC) at para 52. The analysis should be regarded as maintaining the two-stage structure, but the dimensions of fairness, interest-balancing and 'discretion' were far too inextricably intertwined in the reasoning of the court to allow a clear vision of different analytical stages to emerge. This tension is reflected throughout the judgment. Ibid at para 52, para 56 ('[t]he crucial determinant is what is fair in the circumstances, regard being had to what might be conflicting but legitimate considerations') and para 68 ((by the use of 'moreover') that the impugned rule in question, in addition to impairing the right to a fair trial unjustifiably, could also not be justified under IC s 33.)

[3] 1997 (7) BCLR 918 (E), 1997 (1) SACR 473, 476 (E). See also S v Sonday & Another 1994 (4) BCLR 138 (C), 1994 (2) SACR 810 (C).

[4] 1996 (3) BCLR 402, 412 (SE).

[5] 1996 (7) BCLR 947, 965 (B).

[6] Ibid at 970–1.

[7] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N).

[8] 1996 (1) SA 964 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('Ferreira') at para 259.

meant that the right against self-incrimination did not extend to fingerprinting.[1] The learned judge thereby completely conflated the two discrete questions regarding the scope of the right and the justifiable limitation of the right.

It would seem as if cases introducing an internal balancing act into the definition of the relevant fair trial right threaten the sort of confusion Woolman warns against. In any event, the very idea of balancing the interests of the state against that of the individual in fleshing out the meaning of a right to a fair trial requires scrutiny, whatever objections the general doctrine of limitations might have to such an approach. Procedural due process, the idea of the rights of the accused, arrested or detained individual, operates in a sphere where the interests of the state which rendered the individual an accused, arrested or detained person in the first place are a given background to the question as to how to be fair towards that person and respectful of his or her liberty interests. Due process asks what rights a person has, given that the state has an interest in placing him or her in the position to have the due process question asked. Of course the scope of the individual's due process rights will be determined by his or her status as an accused, arrested or detained person — in other words, the right cannot extend to the point where the individual's status is disregarded. This is the only role that state interests should play in defining the scope of internally qualified criminal procedure rights. It must be remembered that the individual complainant bears the onus of demonstrating a violation of a right. It is to be expected that such a demonstration, where a previously unrecognized aspect of the right in question is argued for, or where 'reasonableness' is to be demonstrated, will have to be sensitive to the parameters allowed by the applicant's status as accused, arrested or detained. But that is a different matter from requiring the applicant to negate the possible weight of state interests against his or her claim.

The idea that the essence of the fair trial right ought to be arrived at by a process of balancing (i.e. in the first stage of the conceptual two-stage analysis), and that what is to be balanced in defining the right are the interests of the state (or of the community) against those of the accused, is sometimes incorrectly attributed to the following passage in the judgement in Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division & Another:

> In any democratic criminal justice system there is a tension between, on the one hand, the public interest in bringing criminals to book and, on the other, the equally great public interest in ensuring that justice is manifestly done to all, even those suspected of conduct which would put them beyond the pale. To be sure, a prominent feature of that tension is the universal and unceasing endeavour by international human rights bodies, enlightened legislatures and courts to prevent or curtail excessive zeal by State agencies in the prevention, investigation or prosecution of crime. But none of that means sympathy for crime and its perpetrators. Nor does it mean a predilection for technical niceties and ingenious legal stratagems. What the Constitution demands is that the accused be given a fair trial.[2]

[1] Ferreira (supra) at 1120.
[2] 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC)('Key') at para 13.

The passage above was delivered in the context of determining the difficult question whether unconstitutionally obtained evidence was to be admitted or excluded in terms of section 35(5), which required an assessment of the question whether the administration of justice would be served by the admission of the evidence. That so much of our constitutional fair trial analysis has, in practice, been reduced to this question is a function of the practicalities of criminal prosecution — the question whether a right has been violated and what ought to be done about it tends to arise in the situation when evidence is sought to be led against the accused, or inferences of guilt are sought to be based on evidence led. But that ought not to confuse the question to what extent the orthodox two-stage analysis is capable of being appropriately applied to the question of violations of, and in particular, the question of the definition of, section 35 rights. An example of use of the passage as authority for the process of defining the right to a fair trial by means of balancing the interests of the accused against those of the state is the following passage from the separate concurring judgement of Yacoob J in S v Thebus & Another:

> Another implication is that all the separate rights in the section must be given meaning in the light of a notion of a fair trial. Although a principal and important consideration in relation to a fair trial is that the trial must be fair in relation to the accused, the concept of a fair trial is not limited to ensuring fairness for the accused. It is much broader. A court must also ensure that the trial is fair overall, and in that process, balance the interests of the accused with that of society at large and the administration of justice.[1]

Whether an unfair trial can ever be justified is a question which has been considered in Canada, in the context of the 'principles of fundamental justice' required for any procedure depriving an individual of liberty.[2] The different approaches are contained in the respective views of Lamer CJ and Wilson J in R v Swain.[3] Lamer CJ, being of the opinion that the state's interests could never operate within the definition of the 'principles of fundamental justice', was inclined to say that these interests were to be considered under the limitation clause.[4] Wilson J expressed the view that violations of the principles of fundamental justice could never be justified under the limitations clause.[5]

The correct approach to this question should be to draw a distinction, first between the general (residual) fair trial right and specific instances of that right, and then between internally qualified specific rights and absolutely framed specific rights. The general right of an accused to a fair trial must be delineated as described above. State interests play the part only of keeping the inquiry within

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 107. The passage was followed by a citation of the passage in Key. See also Thebus (supra) in para 109.

[2] See D Stratas The Charter of Rights in Litigation: Direction from the Supreme Court of Canada (No 19, August 1997) § 17:12.

[3] [1991] 1 SCR 933.

[4] Ibid at 977.

[5] Ibid at 1034.

its parameters. There would seem to be no real room for justifiable limitation.[1] Specifically enumerated rights that state baldly and without qualification that to which the accused, arrested or detained person is entitled are to be treated in the traditional two-stage way. Specifically enumerated rights that contain qualifications (or modifiers) are in principle subject also to the two-stage approach. However, in their delineation, state interests will play a parameter-maintaining part. As a result, in the second stage, justifiable limitation will be more difficult to demonstrate than in the case of the unqualified rights. Nevertheless, justifiable limitation on the right to a trial within a reasonable time is conceivable, and justifiable failure to provide legal representation at state expense where substantial injustice would result equally conceivable. It is not at all incoherent to recognize that the position of indigent accused relative to wealthy accused is a situation of 'substantial injustice', while at the same time acknowledging that state justifications for a failure to rectify the injustice may pass limitation clause muster. If it is recognized that the 'reasonableness' required by the right and the 'reasonableness' of the justifications offered by the state refer to different types of enquiries with different objects of attention, then the seeming paradox of reasonably justified limitations upon reasonably framed rights becomes less daunting.[2]

[1] It is interesting to note that most of the rights of accused, arrested and detained persons were originally included in the list of candidate 'illimitable' rights submitted by The Combined Meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee and the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights (14 September 1993). See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Kllaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.2.

[2] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992; 1996 supplement) § 35.14*(e)*. See Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at paras 25 and 35 (Court referred, without approval or disapproval, to the 'balancing' approach towards speedy trial rights adopted in some jurisdictions including South Africa. Kriegler J did not adopt a balancing approach without more, but did include an assessment of state interests or burdens as factors in determining the 'reasonableness' of the delay. Culpability played a part in this assessment of 'reasonableness'. An 'objective' and an accused-centred assessment of reasonableness might be separated from the 'reasonableness' of the state's actions for two-stage analytical purposes.) For 'objective reasonableness' in the field of delict, see the discussion in PQR Boberg The Law of Delict: Vol I Aquilian Liability (1984; 1989 revision) 39–40. The problem with trying to reserve state interest assessment for the limitation stage, a problem raised in discussion by Anthony Götz, is that few state actions would seem to comply with the requirement in FC s 36(1) of being 'law of general application'. This difficulty probably informed the finding in S v Naidoo & Another — 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D), 1998 (1) SACR 479, 499I-500D (N) — that Claassen J's approach in S v Mathebula & Another 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W) of assessing waiver in the context of unconstitutionally obtained evidence in terms of the limitations clause was not suited to a situation where the potential justifying factor was not a 'law of general application' understood in its natural sense. The 'general application' requirement should be seen as operating as a safeguard against arbitrary or discriminatory action, rather than as requiring a measure which applies to everybody. The status of the action as 'law' need refer only to the legally empowered nature of the action, rather than to its character as a legislative stipulation or common law rule. Such legal empowerment may then entail elements of substantive due process. In this way the two-stage process can be preserved even in cases dealing with 'reasonableness' and with administrative action on a small scale. The advantage is that state interests would require justification by the state, rather than elimination by the accused. See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at paras 95-104. See also Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.7 (For a detailed discussion of the meaning of 'law of general application'.) It must be conceded that such an interpretation faces severe

Admittedly, in Scagell & Others v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others,[1] the Constitutional Court unanimously applied limitation analysis to the residual right to a fair trial contained in IC s 25(3). The limitation in question did not pass muster, but this judgment must be taken as clear authority for the view that the general fair trial right is in principle to be subjected to the two stages of definition and limitation. Still, although O'Regan J made it clear that the right in question was the residual fair trial right,[2] the character of the limitation reasoning adopted seemed to indicate that the court should have regarded the right at stake to have been the presumption of innocence, rather than the general fair trial right. Such a conclusion would then have offered a more satisfactory explanation for the easy applicability of the two-stage analysis to the facts.[3]

The criminal procedure rights belong to that group of rights which could be limited under IC s 33(1) only where limitations were 'necessary' in addition to being 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality'. The 'necessity' hurdle was dropped in the Final Constitution, and the limitation principles in FC s 36 have been altered, seemingly to incorporate the limitation analysis laid down by Chaskalson P in S v Makwanyane.[4] Woolman's observation that the factors as listed in FC s 36(1) reflect a 'continuing failure clearly to separate the stages of fundamental rights analysis and to recognize that not every limitation question involves issues of proportionality'[5] will be especially pertinent in the sphere of criminal procedure rights for the reasons expounded above.

The removal of the requirement of necessity for limitations upon criminal procedure rights should in principle result in the possibility that limitations which would not pass the tests laid down under the 'necessary' regime of IC s 33(1)(b) would not fail the less restrictive requirements of FC s 36(1). Some doubt must therefore be cast upon the persuasiveness of dicta rejecting justification arguments under IC s 33(1)(b). Although the Constitutional Court was wary of entrenching a 'necessity' jurisprudence readily distinguishable from a 'reasonableness' jurisprudence, and indicated in First Certification Judgment that substitution of conceptual difficulties in the light of the finding by the Constitutional Court in Premier of Mpumalanga v Executive Committee of the Association of Governing Bodies of State-Aided Schools: Eastern Transvaal. 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)(Declined to justify ad hoc administrative action, on the basis that such action did not constitute law of general application.)

[1] 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC) at paras 16 and 19.

[2] Ibid at para 16.

[3] The justifiability of an evidential burden seems to require an identical sort of analysis to that pertaining to the justifiability of a persuasive burden. The fact that the possibility of justifiable limitation was framed in terms of facility of proof seems to confirm this view. Ibid at para 19.

[4] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC). See Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.2.

[5] S Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) § 12.13*(b)*.

a general 'proportionality' approach for the two-tier 'necessity' and 'reasonableness' regime should accommodate due allowance for the possibly varying weight of rights claims,[1] such criminal procedure limitations analysis as has been expressly reasoned in terms of the 'necessity' requirement must at the very least be noted as subject to reappraisal. In Scagell & Others v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others, a unanimous Constitutional Court based its rejection of an offered justification for limiting the right not to be encumbered with an evidential burden exclusively on the lack of 'necessity' for the limitation in question.[2] And in S v Mathebula & Another, Claassen J expressly took cognizance of the fact that the fair trial rights were 'of a higher order' because of the presence of a 'necessity' requirement, but held that what the learned judge regarded as a limitation in that case was indeed 'reasonable, justifiable and necessary'.[3]

The removal of the 'necessity' requirement from FC s 36(1) can be saved from meaninglessness on the one hand and ominous significance on the other by isolating the kind of consideration the necessity requirement reflected. The requirement that the state eliminate alternative routes to safeguarding the interests relied upon in an IC s 33(1) or FC s 36(1) argument is the factor most directly affected by the removal of the 'necessity' requirement.[4] In other words, the 'necessity' qualification is not to be regarded as permeating every factor of the limitation analysis; rather, it is to be regarded merely as adding a requirement focused upon the elimination of all reasonable alternatives. Limitation reasoning in the sphere of criminal procedure rights may, therefore, be lifted from its 'necessity' context without doing violence to the reasoning in question, once aspects of the reasoning specifically directed at the requirement of necessity have been disregarded.

But this conclusion should not be taken as far as to allow limitation analysis 'in the air'. The Cape Provincial Division's finding in Dabelstein & Others v Hildebrandt & Others[5] that an IC s 33 justification which was good for the purposes of privacy was equally good for the purposes of self-incrimination played much too fast and

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 at para 90. See Woolman 'Limitation' (supra) at § 12.1*(d)(i)*.

[2] 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC) at para 19.

[3] 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 138 (W).

[4] See S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 104, cited with approval in Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 90 n78.

[5] 1996 (3) SA 42, 66 (C). See also S v Meaker 1998 (8) BCLR 1038 (W), 1998 (2) SACR 73, 88 (W)('Meaker')(FC s 36 analysis in the context of reverse onus provisions). It is in the context of this analysis and the inextricable conceptual relationship between the specific rights in question that Cameron J found that 'whatever justification [might] serve to save the infringement of the presumption of innocence [would] operate likewise to save any violation of the right to remain silent and not to testify during proceedings'. Ibid at 85I.

loose with the requirements of 'proportionality' and the guidelines set out in Makwanyane and in FC s 36(1).[1]

In S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat[2] the Constitutional Court indicated that the justifiability of a statutory provision under FC s 36(1) might depend upon 'the prevailing climate'. How variable such a climate may be, is something that will require further development by the court.

51.2 'Arrested', 'Detained' and 'Accused' Persons

It is clear from the structure and the wording of FC ss 35(1) and (2), that 'detention' for the purposes of the criminal procedure rights must be regarded as the generic reference to coercive physical interference with the subject's liberty, while 'arrest' always involves 'detention'. Moreover, the new wording of FC s 35 adds to 'detention' the dimension of being apprehended 'for the alleged commission of an offence'.[3] Furthermore, the structure of the rights in question and the existence of the due process wall mean that the lawfulness of how one comes to be detained is a FC s 12 question, and the rights one possesses once one is a detainee are a FC s 35 question.[4] This distinction extends also to the merits of continued detention, which must be decided in terms of FC s 12.[5] It is

[1] See Osman & Another v Attorney-General of Transvaal 1998 (2) BCLR 165 (T), 1998 (1) SACR 28, 32GF-H (T); S v Dlamini & Another 1998 (5) BCLR 552, 560C-D (N)('[A] justifiable limitation of the right so as to avoid bringing the entire administration of criminal justice into disrepute' was apparently regarded as sufficient s 36(1) analysis.)

[2] 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC).

[3] See J Kriegler Hiemstra Suid-Afrikaanse Strafproses (5th Edition, 1993) 87 ('Inhegtenisneming is vryheidsontneming met die doel om aan te kla.') This notion was repeated by Kriegler J in the Constitutional Court in Ex parte Minister of Safety & Security: In re S v Walters. 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at paras 49-50 ('The purpose of an arrest is to take the suspect into custody to be brought before court as soon as possible on a criminal charge.Arrest is not an objective in itself; it is merely an optional means of bringing a suspected criminal before court.[T]he fundamental purpose of arrestis to bring the suspect before a court of law, there to face due prosecution before a court' (emphasis added).) See the Canadian jurisprudence in this regard, particularly as regards the meaning of 'detained', discussed in D Stratas The Charter of Rights in Litigation: Direction from the Supreme Court of Canada (No 19, August 1997) § 20:05; Hogg (supra) at § 47.2. It should be stressed, however, that the Canadian provision in question, viz s 10 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, applies to 'arrested and detained' persons, giving these persons identical rights. Once one is 'charged with an offence' one is entitled to s 11 fair trial rights. The arrested person is not specifically given any rights additional to those of a detained person. Hence in Canada self-incrimination problems, and the concomitant right to silence which must be regarded as the raison d'être of the separate rights of an arrested person in the South African constitutional regime, require recourse to the common law or an interpretation of the right to silence as a 'principle of fundamental justice' which seeps into s 10 from s 7. The latter approach enjoys the endorsement of the Supreme Court of Canada. R v Hebert [1990] 2 SCR 151.

[4] See § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra.

[5] This distinction does not mean that a violation of a detainee's rights might not render the detention itself unlawful. Those rights of detainees which are most closely concerned with the period immediately after, or even during, initial apprehension, such as the right to reasons, may render the detention itself unlawful upon their breach. The court in Naidenov v Minister of Home Affairs & Others assumed that the information right contained in IC s 25(1)(a) set down a requirement for lawful detention. Whether killing therefore of some moment that the term 'arrested person' for the purposes of defining the beneficiary of FC s 35(1) is narrower than that of 'arrested person' generically speaking.[1]

The rights one enjoys qua arrested or detained person are to be distinguished from the effect on one's rights qua accused person of things that happened while one was an arrested and detained person.[2] In S v Hlalikaya & Others Van Rensburg J spoke throughout in terms of the right of an 'accused person' to be legally represented at every pre-trial procedure.[3] He relied for his main authority upon the decision in S v Melani.[4] In Melani, the source of the right in question was said to be IC s 25(1)(c) – which pertained to detained persons (almost invariably arrested persons incorporating this right from their status as detained persons). The judgment in Melani then continued to combine IC ss 25(2) and (3) to argue that the right to counsel was a continuing right throughout the criminal process.[5] It does not emerge clearly from the Hlalikaya record whether the procedure in can be regarded as a form of detention or arrest is philosophically intriguing. 1995 (7) BCLR 891, 899 (T). It would be difficult to squeeze the question of the constitutionality of s 49(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, which allows killing in an attempt to effect arrest or to prevent escape concerning Schedule 1 offences, into the confines of FC s 35 (although the wording of s 49(2) certainly seems to assume that killing is a form of arrest). Nevertheless, the question of the amount of force used in effecting arrest straddles the divide between FC s 12 and FC s 35. The ultimate use of force does not, in principle, straddle the divide any less. The practical significance of these questions may lie in a proliferation of causes of action and foundations for compensation. In Raloso v Wilson & Others, an application to refer the constitutionality of s 49(2) to the Constitutional Court was refused in the light of the intended amendment of the section. The court did, however, endorse counsel's contention that 'a manifestly unconstitutional statute remain[ed] on the statute books purporting to give legal authority for the killing of persons in circumstances which [could] not be countenanced by the Constitution', by terming it 'indeed a sorry state of affairs'. 1998 (1) BCLR 26, 35 -36 (NC), 1998 (2) SACR 313 (C). The Constitutional Court in Ex parte Minister of Safety & Security: In re S v Walters remarked upon the irony of the fact that the restraint in Raloso had been partially prompted by the imminence of the legislative amendment, that had, by the time Walters was decided five years later, still not become law. 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC) at para 19. The noteworthy aspect about the treatment of the constitutionality of section 49 by the Court in Walters was that it did not occur under the rubric of the FC s 35 rights, and that Kriegler J expressed what must be taken as a strong caveat about the philosophically intriguing question posed above in this footnote, when pointing out that killing a suspect defeated the fundamental purpose of an arrest, which was to bring a suspect before a court. Ibid at para 50.

[1] See Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights'). The question of FC s 35(1) did not arise, but there was room for debate on whether a person in certain circumstances could be said to have been 'arrested' as envisaged in the Act. It might have been interesting, had silence and self-incrimination rights been at issue, to have argued whether 'arrest' for the purposes of FC s 35(1) required, not only that the arrest be for the alleged commission of an offence, but that it be for the purposes of prosecuting for the alleged commission of an offence. One might have argued that seeking to enter the Republic illegally entailed the commission of an offence, and being arrested for deportation purposes on the basis of seeking to enter illegally entailed being arrested for the alleged commission of an offence.

[2] See § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra.

[3] 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE)('Hlalikaya').

[4] 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335 (E)('Melani').

[5] Ibid at 348-9.

question occurred after the person had been formally charged, but the case does illustrate the fact that, since the main focus of the inquiry in the vast majority of criminal procedure constitutional cases is on the consequences at the trial of an accused person of alleged violations that occurred somewhere during the criminal process, the analysis would tend naturally to drift towards the perspective of the accused at trial and the significance of previous stages from that perspective. Still, determining the ambit of the right of a detainee or an arrestee before he or she has become an accused, or who for some reason or other does not eventually become an accused, is crucial, since violations of the detainee's rights should entail remedial possibilities irrespective of what the consequences might be on the admissibility of evidence at some later date. In Canada and under the European Convention on Human Rights, a person is entitled to fair trial rights upon being 'charged with an offence'.[1] In order to allow for a distinction between arrested and accused persons, and to enable the courts to make appropriate use of comparative jurisprudence in this area, it would make sense to interpret 'accused' in FC s 35(3) to refer to someone who has been formally charged.[2] This bright line rule is always subject to the fact that pre-charge occurrences may affect the right of the accused person to a fair trial.

The structure of the rights of arrested and detained persons in FC s 35(1) and FC s 35 (2), however, casts doubt upon the picture set out above. The rights of an [1] Section 11 and art 6 respectively.

[2] This definition of 'accused' was assumed by all the members of the Constitutional Court in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others. 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). Stavros suggests that the broad definition of 'charged' adopted in the jurisprudence of speedy trial rights should be applied for the purposes of determining when a person is to be treated as 'charged' in order to become a rights holder under art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. But this analysis does not fit the South African framework. The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 72. The broad definition of 'charged' under the ECHR is 'substantially affected by the suspicion against him'. See Foti v Italy (1982) 5 EHRR 313; De Weer v Belgium (1980) 2 EHRR 439. In the Southern African context, a broad definition of 'charged' has been applied for the purposes of determining the scope of the right to trial within a reasonable period after having been charged (IC s 25(3)(a)). See S v Mlambo 1992 (2) SACR 245 (ZS)('[T]he start of the impairment of the individual's interests in the liberty and security of his person'); Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another 1996 (7) BCLR 947 (B)(When accused has knowledge of charge); Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg, & Another 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W)(Endorsing Mlambo); Du Preez v Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape 1997 (3) BCLR 329 (E)(Advised by a competent authority that a decision has been taken to prosecute). Adoption of this definition to define an accused, as opposed to employing it in determining the period relevant to an accused person's right to trial within a reasonable time, would obliterate the distinction between arrested and accused persons. See JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 184. Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi represents an interesting illustration of how the interpretation of the term 'charged' can be narrowed or broadened depending on the purpose for which the interpretation is undertaken. In this case in favorem libertatis interpretation required a narrow meaning ('eng juridiese betekenis') to attach to 'charged' in order to restrict the application of the onus provision in bail applications regarding persons 'charged' with certain offences under s 60(11) of the Criminal Procedure Act. 1996 (11) BCLR 1514, 1532 (O). The extent to which the 'charge' in question must of necessity relate to criminal proceedings as they are known is discussed above in the section on the due process wall. See § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra.

arrested person now appear first in the list of rights, to be followed by the rights of a detained person, and then by those of an accused person. This arrangement by itself already encourages the idea that, consonant with a popular or natural understanding of the distinction between arrest and detention, arrest is a lesser interference with liberty than detention, or that arrest is something that may be followed by detention. The former refers to the act of apprehension only, and the latter to continued restriction in custody.[1] JES Fawcett assumes this latter distinction without more for the purposes of considering a particular question under art 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights.[2] In Van der Leer v Netherlands, however, the generic status of detention and the specific status of arrest, and the fact that a detention need not be an arrest, came starkly to the fore.[3] Since only 'arrested persons' were entitled to being informed of reasons for their arrest and of 'any charge' against them, the Dutch government argued that someone confined (ie detained) in a psychiatric hospital, and thus not 'arrested', was not entitled to reasons. The Strasbourg Court held that 'arrest' was to be interpreted 'autonomously' and that it 'extended beyond the realm of criminal law measures', despite the reference in art 5(2) to a 'charge'.[4]

Application of a similar interpretation to FC s 35(1) would mean that those who are detained but not arrested would presumably also be entitled to protection against compelled statements, the right to silence, and speedy judicial process. But Van der Leer was possible only because the rights of an 'arrested' person, although framed to include reference to a 'charge', are not expressly confined to someone 'arrested' for a particular (criminal) purpose in art 5 of ECHR, as they are in FC s 35(1).[5] Nevertheless, although silence, compelled evidence, and speedy process rights are inextricably bound up with the criminal process, there may be scope for an application of the spirit of Van der Leer in the context of FC s 35. Since 'arrest' refers to 'detention' for the purposes of criminal prosecution, a detainee who is apprehended and detained for the purposes of an investigatory procedure which, although it may lead to imprisonment, does not amount to 'criminal proceedings',[6] would not be entitled to silence, protection from compelled evidence, and speedy process rights. He is neither an 'arrestee', nor an 'accused'.[7] Application of Van der Leer reasoning would

[1] See S v Langa & Others 1998 (1) SACR 21, 27 (T)(MacArthur J, with whom Mynhardt J concurred, held 'detention' in IC s 25(1) referred to incarceration. There was no discussion of the relevant jurisprudence around the term.)

[2] Fawcett (supra) at 87.

[3] (1990) 12 EHRR 567 ('Van der Leer').

[4] Van der Leer (supra) at para 27.

[5] 'For the alleged commission of an offence' — IC s 25(2); 'for allegedly committing an offence' — FC s 35(1).

[6] See Nel v Le Roux 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel') at para 11.

[7] In the circumstances of Nel, there could be no 'arrest' stage between detention for the purposes of answering questions under s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act and summary imposition of a sentence of imprisonment upon failure to comply under s 189. For confirmation of the applicability of Nel in circumstances that could not be plausibly distinguished, see S v Mahlangu 2000 (1) SACR 565 (W)(FC s 32 (the right to access to information) was at issue.)

then mean that detainees who are apprehended for purposes which are quasi-criminal, yet not sufficiently 'criminal' to attract 'fair trial' rights, should be afforded those rights which accrue to an 'arrested' person under FC s 35(1). In other words, 'arrested for allegedly committing an offence' in FC s 35(1) should be interpreted broadly to apply to proceedings which may have a criminal character but are insufficiently criminal to render FC s 35(3) applicable at later stages.[1]

A person who is apprehended for some reason other than 'for allegedly committing an offence' is not an arrested person. However, as soon as his or her detention is based upon his or her suspected responsibility for the commission of an offence such person becomes an arrested person. The problem with the wording of FC s 35(1), as opposed to that used in IC s 25(2), is that the new wording, if anything, narrows the definition of arrest. 'For allegedly committing an offence' must be read as relating to an offence committed by the person apprehended, whereas 'for the alleged commission of an offence' can refer to an offence committed by anybody. Someone apprehended for interrogation purposes will therefore not be an arrested person unless the apprehension can be said to be 'for allegedly committing an offence'. As soon as the detainee becomes a suspect, however, it is submitted that he or she will then be detained 'for the alleged commission of an offence', and henceforth be arrested. In this respect the effect of the finding in Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences[2] on the meaning of the phrase 'for allegedly committing an offence' must be re-considered.[3] The court held that the compulsory detention inherent in inquiries conducted under s 5 of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences[4] did not amount to 'arrest' for the purposes of enjoyment of the rights of silence and self-incrimination granted to arrested and accused persons by IC s 25(2) and (3).[5] The court declared:

> [A]n enquiry under s 5 is not part of any criminal process and cannot be regarded as the investigative stage of criminal process. Non constat that, because such an inquiry takes place, criminal charges are likely to follow therefrom. Nobody is an accused at that stage nor is anyone necessarily likely to be.[6]

[1] It should be noted that the detainee in Nel was expected to rely upon his right against self-incrimination as an accused person in future possible proceedings in which his incriminating answers would operate to his prejudice. This does not mean that he was afforded a right against self-incrimination as a detainee or as an arrestee. It means merely that a violation of his rights as an accused in later proceedings could be invoked as a 'sufficient cause' not to answer questions under compulsion. Nel (supra) at paras 5-9. His status as an accused in the notional later proceedings must not be confused with the denial of this status to him for the purposes of the summary proceedings under s 189 of the Criminal Procedure Act. Ibid at para 11.

[2] 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C)('Park-Ross').

[3] The applicable phrase in Park-Ross was, in terms of IC s 25(2), 'for the alleged commission of an offence'.

[4] Act 117 of 1991.

[5] The compulsory proceedings would, however, be relevant at any criminal trial consequent upon them, to determine whether the affected persons' rights as accused persons were being respected. See Park-Ross (supra) at 164. See also § 51.4(b)(iii) supra.

[6] Park-Ross (supra) at 164 (emphasis added).

A literal interpretation of this finding would lead to great difficulties about the rights of those persons arrested for purposes of interrogation upon the suspicion that they may have committed an offence, where it is by no means clear to anybody that the persons concerned are 'necessarily likely' to become accused persons. It simply cannot be maintained that such persons are not apprehended 'for allegedly committing an offence'.[1]

The structure of the rights of arrestees and detainees has the following consequence: the more the authorities can argue that a particular detention is not effected or continued 'for allegedly committing an offence', the more they can keep self-incrimination and speedy process rights away from the door. But the less the reasons for detention have to do with a desire to prosecute, the more pressed the authorities will be to provide proper justification for the deprivation of liberty in question. It has been held that an arrest which does not comply with the requirements for arrest under the Criminal Procedure Act renders subsequent detention unlawful.[2] But an arrest which does not comply with the requirements of lawful arrest cannot be saved from being declared an unlawful detention by reliance upon its not being an 'arrest'. If arrest is effected 'for allegedly committing an offence', but there is no intention at all to bring the person before a court, the person is still 'arrested' for the purposes of FC s 35(1) rights. The arrest is rendered unlawful for not complying with the requirements of lawful arrest.[3] The significance would be that violations during detention of the rights of an arrested person would entitle a person unlawfully arrested to compensation, irrespective of the remedies available for unlawful arrest.

More important than whether some detained persons should be entitled to the rights of arrested persons is the question whether the omission from FC s 35(1) of the express indication that 'arrest' is to be taken to include 'detention', coupled with the switch in the sequence of the rights of arrested and detained persons, is to be accorded any significance. The answer could have devastating and absurd consequences for arrested persons: they would have no right to counsel, nor to reasons immediately after apprehension, unlike detainees, who enjoy these rights under FC s 35(2)(a), (b) and (c). This rubric would make sense only if FC s 35 were to be read as having engineered a complete transformation of the definitions of 'arrested' and 'detained' persons reflected in IC s 25. If not, then every arrested person is a detained person in any event, and continues to enjoy the rights to reasons and to counsel in that capacity. The latter view is the only reasonable construction of the structure of FC s 35.[1] This was not, however, how Yacoob J visualized the interplay between FC s 35(1) and FC s 35(2) in S v Thebus and Another.[2] Justice Yacoob conceived of detention as something that might follow upon arrest, but did not necessarily do so, thereby rendering an arrested person only a candidate detained person for the purposes of FC s 35(1) and FC s 35(2):

[1] The fact that s 50(1)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Act as amended by Act 85 of 1997 employs 'arrest' as a generic term which includes arrests 'for allegedly committing an offence' and 'for any other reason' is unfortunate in the extreme. More potential confusion is engendered by the reference in subsec (6)(a)(ii) to a person who 'was not arrested in respect of an offence'. This latter formulation seems to suggest that any apprehension 'in respect of an offence' is what is meant by an arrest 'for allegedly committing an offence' in s 50(1)(a). This makes sense. It indicates that the Criminal Procedure Act distinguishes between those apprehended 'for offences' and those apprehended for other reasons. The former category is 'arrested' for the purposes of the Constitution. The latter is detained, but not arrested. The Criminal Procedure Act loosely employs the term 'arrested' for both categories.

[2] See Minister of Law and Order, KwaNdebele, & Others v Mathebe & Another 1990 (1) SA 114 (A) 112.

[3] See Duncan v Minister of Law and Order 1986 (2) SA 805, 820 (A).

> The three subsections intersect, complement each other and demonstrate a logical pattern when viewed from the point of view of the criminal justice process that might unfold in relation to a person who is suspected of having committed an offence. The first step envisaged is the arrest of a person for allegedly having committed an offence. That person is not yet an accused and the arrest itself does not render him a detainee entitled to the right set out in ss (2). The rights in ss (1) and (2) will be applicable to everyone who is arrested and thereafter detained. Every person arrested for allegedly committing an offence has the right, at the first court appearance, to be charged, to be informed of the reason for the detention to continue, or to be released. If she or he is released the process is at an end. Presumably the person may be detained further and informed that the matter is under further investigation. In that event, the person concerned remains a detainee and is entitled to the rights described in ss (1) and (2). It is only if the person is charged that he or she becomes an accused and has the right to a fair trial in terms of ss (3).[3]

This view conflicts with the acceptance of the broader and more generic conceptualization of 'detention' endorsed by the Court in De Lange v Smuts NO & Others.[4] De Lange's conception of 'detention' captures the restriction of physical movement — an essential way of looking at detention if it is to retain its conceptual integrity under the pressure created by the interplay between the subsections in FC s 35. One possible way of giving the new formulation some significance is to argue that, although the important notion that arrest always entails detention is maintained, the new structure should be read as preventing the trivialization of 'detention' for the purposes of FCs 35(2) rights. How restrictions on liberty not amounting to detention should be treated is a matter discussed elsewhere.[5] As far as detention is concerned, if every compelled physical interference with liberty were deemed a 'detention' for the purposes of FC s 35, the consequence would be that the person involved would have to be informed of the right to counsel and be afforded the opportunity of actually

[1] The Constitutional Court has accepted the generic meaning of 'detention' for the purposes of FC s 12. See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 28 (Ackermann J held 'detention' to apply to the 'restriction of physical movement.')

[2] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)('Thebus').

[3] Thebus (supra) at para 103.

[4] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 28.

[5] See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 40.3.

obtaining counsel. The criticism by Peter Hogg of this consequence in Canada seems well founded.[1] FC s 35(2), in setting out the rights of detained persons, does not contain any qualification that restricts the operation of those rights to any particular sphere (such as the criminal process). That means that, apart from the difficulties associated with silence and speedy process rights discussed above, a person detained for reasons other than to deal with him or her as a criminal suspect enjoys the rights of a detained person in terms of FC s 35(2). This consequence is imperiled by any interpretation of 'detention' as being necessarily bound up with 'arrest'. It is disconcerting to read in S v Monyane that 'it is clear that the provisions of s 25(1) and (2) of the Interim Constitution do permit an accused person to have legal assistance from the time of his arrest and during the interrogation process.'[2] Monyane dealt with occasions, in interacting with the agents of the state, the arrested person was entitled to legal representation. But what was absent from the discussion was a consideration of the right to counsel as an incident of being detained, which, after all, is what the Final Constitution makes it.[3] The Constitutional Court in Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs had no difficulty accepting the applicability of FC s35(2) rights to those detained as 'illegal foreigners' for the purposes of deportation, wholly outside the sphere of criminal procedure.[4] The right to legal representation as an incident of the rights of the illegal foreigners being detained did not feature in Lawyers for Human Rights. More's the pity, as it would have been of some interest whether the Court would have held that such rights applied only on the occasion that the illegal foreigner was in danger of incriminating himself or herself. Suffice it to note that it makes little sense to confine this right, an incident of a right that is not confined to the criminal sphere, to occasions for self-incrimination, since these occasions do not feature prominently outside the criminal sphere.[5]

[1] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992; 1996 supplement) § 47.2 citing R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613 (Demand for breath sample authorized by statute); R v Thomsen [1988] 1 SCR 640 (Roadside breath test where denial of right to counsel was justified under limitation clause); R v Hufsky [1988] 1 SCR 621 (Spot checks on motorists for licences); R v Simmons [1988] 2 SCR 495 (Strip search of traveller by customs officer); and the confusion generated by a right to counsel which did not entail the right to exercise it in R v Debot [1989] 2 SCR 1140 (Frisk on reasonable grounds under statutory authority). See also Elliot v Commissioner of Police & Another 1997 (2) SACR 306 (ZS)(Being stopped by policemen and asked to produce one's identification document was held to be a detention and an interference with the right to freedom of movement.) That such interferences involve FC s 12 is beyond question. Whether they should entail counsel rights there and then is a different matter altogether.

[2] 2001 (1) SACR 115, 135C (T)('Monyane').

[3] Although the matter was determined under IC s 25, Borchers J made it clear that the decision would have been the same if considered in terms of FC s 35. Monyane (supra) at 128C.

[4] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at paras 19, 26 and 41. The question was whether there were territoriality problems and whether those with no right to enter the Republic were entitled to the benefits of FC s 35(2), not whether the section had any meaning outside the scope of criminal proceedings. Fortunately for such persons, it was held that 'everyone' meant 'everyone'. Ibid at para 41.

[5] See § 51.3*(f)* infra, for discussion of the link between counsel rights and the risk of self-incrimination.

In S v Shongwe, Preller AJ evinced this predisposition towards regarding detention as a condition which followed upon arrest. However, he indicated that a definition of arrest which did not include detention would have the anomalous consequence of depriving arrested persons of the rights incidental to the right to humane conditions of detention.[1] The learned acting judge also enunciated some concern about the attribution to all arrested persons of all the rights of detained persons.[2] The difficulty is that some of the rights of detainees are clearly aimed at detainees traditionally so called, others are relevant to all apprehended persons, and the entire scheme of the relevant rights makes sense only if all arrested persons are necessarily 'detained'. The problem with reading detention narrowly, however, is that it deprives suspects of any due process rights under FC s 35 in situations where they are being questioned without physical apprehension. The right to silence and against self-incrimination may suffer in such cases, if the absence of physical detention is abused to obtain incriminating statements without the safeguard of a caution.[3] This is part of the reason why there is a perennial difficulty with dealing with 'the suspect' in that capacity.[4]

51.3 The Rights of Detained Persons

(a) The right to receive required information in a language one understands

In FC s 35(4), the right to receive information required in a language the person concerned understands — as required by every other subsection of FC s 35 — is

[1] 1998 (9) BCLR 1170, 1181E-G (T), 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T)('Shongwe'). Such anomalies also occur in the context of the right to counsel. A striking illustration of this phenomenon occurred in S v Ngwenya & Others 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W). Leveson J said:

> When it comes to consideration of [IC] section 25(1) the factor which gives rise to the requirement that the suspect be notified of his right to legal representation is the fact of detention. There is nothing in the section which embraces any other aspect than detention. On that basis it seems to me that the only factor relevant in notifying the suspect of his rights is the simple fact of detention. That is the raison d'être, the very reason for the existence of the section. I cannot read into it any requirement that action is required on any other occasion.

Ibid at 312E-F. The passage demonstrates that Leveson J assumed that it required no elaboration that 'detention' did not include such 'occasions' as identification parades. The traditional meaning of 'detention' retains a strong hold, despite the logic of IC s 25 and FC s 35.

[2] See Shongwe (supra) at 1181G-J ('Aan die ander kant kan dit ook problematies wees as elkeen wat gearresteer is weens besit van 'n daggasigaret of dronkenskap op straat, terwyl hy vervoer word van die plek waar hy gearresteer is na die naaste landdroshof, kan aandring op besoeke van sy lewensmaat, godsdienstige raadgewer, ensovoorts. Te oordeel na die geheel van die artikel en veral subartikel IC s 25(c), behoort hy hierdie voordele te geniet minstens vanaf die oomblik wat hy in 'n sel opgesluit word.')

[3] See S v Langa & Others 1998 (1) SACR 21, 27A-B (T)('The use of the word "detained" in s 25(1) is intended . . . to deal with situations where the person is incarcerated, as for example illegal immigrants. It does not deal with the situation where a policeman stops a person of whom he has cause to be suspicious and asks him what he is doing.') See § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra and § 51.4(b)(ii) infra. The definition of detention as incarceration is clearly too narrow, since all arrests must entail detention.

[4] See § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra.

substituted for the repeated addition of this qualification to some of the information rights contained in IC s 25.[1] The strange discrepancy afflicting IC s 25 between rights to be informed of something in a language one understands and rights merely to be informed of something has therefore been remedied.[2]

In Naidenov v Minister of Home Affairs it was pointed out that the right to be informed of the reasons for one's detention in a language one understood did not mean one had to be addressed in one's own language.[3] In Naienou a Bulgarian's passive understanding of English was regarded as sufficient to have rendered communication to him in English constitutionally adequate. Spoelstra J's explanation that '[h]e never called for or insisted on the services of an interpreter'[4] may be taken as a finding that, even if the Bulgarian's understanding were insufficient, his failure to call for an interpreter amounted to a waiver of his right. Or the failure may be regarded as having precluded the applicant from discharging the burden that his right had been violated.[5] After all, later protestations based upon inadequate understanding may be difficult to refute. Still, the right is violated when one is not informed in a language one understands. If it later emerges that one did not understand the language in question, then enough has been done to prove that the right was violated. It is therefore incumbent upon arresting and detaining authorities to ascertain whether the detainee understands the language they are employing. But the fact that the answer to this question is often within the peculiar knowledge of the detainee should be borne in mind when the state wishes to justify what later turns out to have been insufficient understanding. It is best, therefore, to be alive to the operation of FC s 36(1) in this area.[6]

The phrase 'in a language he understands' occurs in the description of the rights of arrested persons in the European Convention on Human Rights (art 5(2)). Fawcett points out that "informed" must require that the information be

[1] IC s 25(1)(a), IC s 25(2)(a).

[2] See, eg, IC s 25(1)(c)(Right of a detainee to be informed promptly of the right to counsel), IC s 25(3)(b) (Right of an accused to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge), and IC s 25(3)(e)(Right of an accused to be informed of the right to counsel and to state funding where substantial injustice would otherwise result). These rights are conspicuously unadorned with language qualifications, giving rise to the pernicious possibility of expressio unius est exclusio alterius arguments.

[3] 1995 (7) BCLR 891 (T).

[4] Ibid at 899.

[5] The learned judge refers to the absence of any allegation by the applicant that he had indicated his lack of understanding, if any, to those dealing with him.

[6] See S v Soci 1998 (3) BCLR 376, 395 (E), 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E)(Police forms setting out the detainee's rights should be available in the detainee's preferred language.) See also S v Monyane & Others 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T). The accused in Monyane had sought to attach significance to the fact that they had had their rights explained to them in Afrikaans despite the fact that there had been 'a black policeman available at all times'. Ibid at 120. The police testified to their confidence that the accused had understood them, and there had been no evidence to the contrary. Borchers J accepted for the purposes of the judgement that the warnings had been understood (in the circumstances the finding was not decisive), but expressed reservations about addressing arrestees whose home language was clearly not Afrikaans, without an interpreter, given the technicality of constitutional rights. Ibid at 120C-E.

conveyed in language which the person understands, as well as in a language which the person understands.'[1] Robertson and Merrills suggest that quoting an unintelligible statutory provision, even in the detainee's home language, will not be sufficient.[2]

(b) The right to be informed promptly of the reason for being detained

The better view is that the requirement to give reasons for detention is one of common law.[3] Still, in Omar v Minister of Law and Order[4] the majority of the Appellate Division held that a detainee was not entitled to reasons for the 'renewal' of detention, and the general history of granting reasons for detention to detainees is not a happy one.[5] The kind of 'reasons' accepted by the Natal Division in Kloppenberg v Minister of Justice,[6] namely verbatim reproduction of the empowering statutory provision, will obviously not suffice. Since an obligation to 'inform' implies providing as much information as is not known, the extent of the detainee's knowledge of the reason for his or her detention which arises out of the circumstances will naturally enough have an effect on the extent of the obligation to inform.[7] It is doubtful whether one should go as far as Fawcett does in endorsing the proposition laid down by Viscount Simon in Christie v Leachinsky[8] that the requirement 'does not exist if the circumstances are such that he must know the general nature of the alleged offence for which he is detained.'[9] For when one is dealing with a detainee who is not an arrestee, such a detainee might well be more in the dark about the reason for the detention than an arrestee normally is, and is not ensured of promptly being brought before a court to determine the merits of continued detention. The problem will be one of onus: if knowledge from the circumstances amounts to being adequately informed, then the applicant will have to show not only that he or she was not informed but also that the circumstances were not such as to render information unnecessary. In Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs & Another, the right to be informed of the reasons for being detained featured prominently (although not expressly under that rubric) in the context of persons being detained outside the

[1] JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 99-100.
[2] AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 73. See also Kloppenberg v Minister of Justice 1964 (4) SA 31 (N), as discussed in § 51.3*(b)* infra.
[3] Ngqumba v Staatspresident & Others 1988 (4) SA 224, 263-5 (A); Minister of Law and Order v Parker 1989 (2) SA 633, 637-41 (A).
[4] 1987 (3) SA 859, 900-1 (A).
[5] 'Detention' under the Constitution would include the widespread 'banning orders' passed under apartheid, which orders did not tend to come replete with reasons. See Baxter's discussion of 'the notorious case of Dr Manas Buthelezi'. L Baxter Administrative Law (1984) 783.
[6] 1964 (4) SA 31 (N).
[7] See Minister of Law and Order v Kader 1991 (1) SA 41 (A).
[8] [1947] AC 567, 573.
[9] Fawcett (supra) at 99.

criminal sphere, namely 'illegal foreigners'.[1] The matter dealt with the situation where an immigration officer decreed that an illegal foreigner be detained on the 'ship' (which included all vessels) that he or she occupied at a port of entry, pending deportation, in terms of the Immigration Act[2]. Such ship detentions were not subject to the provisions of other sections of the Act that governed, in particular, the early release of a detainee held for the purposes of deportation.[3] The provision was saved from unconstitutionality largely as a result of the Court's interpretation of the relevant section as being subject to the provision that the detainee be notified in writing of the decision to deport him or her and of his or her right to appeal such decision.[4] This finding reveals the main purpose behind the right to being informed — namely being placed in a position to challenge the charge effectively. That this may prove cold comfort to one who is being kept in a hull by the master of his or her ship, while the South Africans are going about their business on the port, is of course quite another matter.

In Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK[5] the European Court held that suspects who had initially been arrested as 'terrorists' and not told of their suspected involvement in specific crimes were nevertheless adequately informed for the purposes of art 5(2) when the fact that they were suspected for the specific crimes appeared from the nature of their interrogation. This holding obviously has significance also for the requirement of 'promptness'.[6]

(c) The right to conditions of detention consistent with human dignity

The inclusion of a reference to conditions consistent with human dignity entails a potentially problematic relationship with the general right to human dignity contained in FC s 10.[7] Furthermore, the relationship with the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment contained in IC s 11(2) and FC s 12(1)(e) seems to entail substantial overlap, particularly as the rights of detained persons apply to sentenced prisoners.[8] However, that the detainee's right to humane conditions, albeit framed in terms of dignity, is not to be equated with the dignity right, nor is it merely an affirmation of the existence of the prohibition

[1] 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights').
[2] Act 13 of 2002.
[3] Immigration Act s 34(8). .
[4] Immigration Act s 34(1)(a). See Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 46. .
[5] (1990) 13 EHRR 157.
[6] Cf P van Dijk & GJH van Hoof Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1990) 270.
[7] See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.
[8] On IC s 11(2) and FC s 12(1)(e), see D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2003) Chapter 49; M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) Chapter 40.

against cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment in detention.[1] The residual right to dignified conditions indicates that the adequacy of accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment is to be interpreted in terms of dignity considerations, and the specified enumerations in their turn act as an eiusdem generis indication of the sort of dignity with which the provision is concerned. In FC s 35(2)(e) the right to exercise has been added to the list, and accommodation has been added to the list of things to be 'adequately' provided. Note that the qualification 'adequate' in FC s 35(2)(e) is to be read as a zeugma governing the full list of nouns following it.[2] The reference to reading material immortalizes the notorious decision in Rossouw v Sachs.[3] In Rossouw v Sachs, the court held that since the purpose of the detention in question was interrogation, the provision of reading material to a detainee would frustrate that purpose by relieving the tedium of the detention, thereby lessening the readiness of the detainee to talk. This reference is a clear indication of the mischief the right was intended to address: the reasons for detention are not to be relied upon to argue for envisaged discomfort on the part of detainees, and conditions of detention are not to be arranged so as to maximize 'tedium'. The insistence on affording detained persons the incidents of human dignity is an important affirmation of the 'residuum' principle, namely that a prisoner remains, as a subject and a human being, entitled to all rights of a citizen save those that have been deprived him or her due to law. This principle was re-affirmed and discussed in Minister of Correctional Services & Others v Kwakwa & Another,[4] in the context of the rights of so-called 'unsentenced prisoners' — i.e. those who were awaiting trial or who had been convicted but were awaiting sentence. In the world we inhabit, these events may take years. More, then, the surprise, as a matter of basic philosophy, at the law's treatment of those who are awaiting trial and have not yet been convicted of anything in the same way as, and even worse than, criminals. The 'residuum' principle is an important caveat when dealing with those whom the law has declared guilty and therefore, depending on one's views of the purpose and legitimacy of punishment, as in some sense deserving of hardship. But when it comes to the rights of those not yet found guilty of anything, it is hard to suppress indignation at an attitude that any aspect of normal life they manage

[1] Van Biljon & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C), 1997 (2) SACR 50, 59 (C)('Van Biljon'). Brand J distinguished American cases relating to the provision of medical care to prisoners on the basis that these cases were based on standards determined by the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment, whereas FC s 35(2)(e) specifically entrenched rights to adequate medical care.

[2] Brand J interpreted it thus in Van Biljon.

[3] 1964 (2) SA 551 (A).

[4] 2002 (4) SA 455 (SCA)('Kwakwa').

to retain must be seen as a privilege.[1] Of course, as with the necessary evil of pre-trial incarceration in appropriate cases, the law must have a way of making sure those it wants to try do not abscond. There ought, however, to be an insistence — when it comes to those who have not yet been convicted — on a regime of treatment that invades their liberty and comfort in as minimal a manner as possible. The misery they suffer must not be a jot greater than is necessary to ensure their continued residence in the waiting rooms of justice. Indeed, the more burdensome the need to cater properly for the as yet unconvicted, the greater the incentive on the part of the state to ensure that their trials begin and end without unreasonable delay. One may wonder to what extent the awful incidents of incarceration (rape and torture by fellow criminals, for example) are tacit fringe benefits of the punishment of prison time. But they are surely not a necessary incident of being kept from running away while the law decides, for several years, whether one is guilty of anything at all. Kwakwa dealt with the inversion of such sentiments. The unsentenced had, for badly or scantily articulated reasons of bureaucratic convenience, been deprived of most of the 'privileges' enjoyed by the convicted and sentenced prisoners. This, it was held, was not right.

In Van Biljon, the Cape Provincial Division rejected the argument that prisoners were not entitled to better medical treatment under FC s 35(2)(e) than would be provided by provincial hospitals to individuals in an identical diagnostic position. The court observed that FC s 35(2)(e) provided more extensive positive rights for detainees than were enjoyed by the population at large, and that, since imprisonment denied HIV prisoners the access to resources to obtain treatment, and put them at higher risk of opportunistic infections, the authorities could not rely on the provincial standard.[2] It is unfortunate that the court regarded budgetary constraints as part of the definition of 'adequacy',[3] since that would in principle require proof by an applicant that funds were available. The court, however, placed the onus to disprove the availability of funds upon the prison authorities,[4] an exercise that should have occurred under FC s 36(1).

[1] The inappropriateness of such discourse in the context of prisoners generally, in the light of the residuum principle, was discussed in Kwakwa. See Kwakwa (supra) at 468H. The court expressed some understanding for the relative lack of sympathy among the public for the discomforts suffered by the unsentenced, and expressed the view that '[i]t is accepted that prison is a bleak place and that prisoners are not entitled to be imprisoned with all the comforts that they enjoyed before their incarceration'. Ibid at para 29. But, apart from the obvious practical need for 'some form of standardisation', how, if one decrees that 'proper effect must be given to the residuum principle', does one ever justify even a largely equivalent treatment between convicted prisoners and those awaiting trial? Ibid at paras 31–32.

[2] The rejection of similar treatment rights to applicants who had not had the treatment in question prescribed to them, on the basis that the court should not dictate to medical practitioners what to prescribe, rested uncomfortably with the finding that those to whom the treatment had been prescribed were entitled to it, not because of their prescriptions but because it was the 'state of the art' treatment according to the weight of expert opinion. See Van Biljon (supra) at 65.

[3] Ibid at 62.

[4] Ibid at 64.

In S v Mpofana the appellant in an appeal against the refusal of bail complained inter alia of a violation of the right to dignified conditions of detention. He had been held in a cell with 14 other prisoners.[1] Testimony confirmed that the cell had been designed for 10 prisoners, with 12 being 'not bad'.[2] Mbenenge AJ did not rule upon the violation question, save to hold that the appellant should first have applied to the prison authorities to remedy his complaints and, upon their failure to do so, could have challenged the constitutionality of the detention or applied for a mandamus.[3]

Illegal foreigners being detained on a ship by their shipmaster at the behest of the South African immigration officers are entitled to the benefits of FC s 35(2).[4] In Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs and Another,[5] the Court held as follows:

> The fact that the s 35(2) safeguards of the Constitution are available to the person detained on a ship avoids detention in intolerable or inhumane circumstances. If the circumstances of detention on a ship render it impossible for s 35(2) to be complied with, the immigration officer will have no option but to cause the detention of the suspected illegal foreigner at a State facility in the exercise of the s 34(8) choice.[6]

This conclusion raises some disconcerting questions. The Court held that the substantive distinction between detentions governed by s 34(1) of the Act and the detentions on the ship governed by s 34(8) of the Act to be that the former related to detentions at state facilities.[7] Part of the reasoning behind this finding was that in the case of ship detention there was no 'officer attending' to whom queries could be directed, and so the provisions relating to queries to officers attending in s 34(1) clearly did not apply to detention on a ship.[8] All of this tended to suggest that the absence of executive control might in practice give rise to difficulties of enforcement of the rights those detained on the ship were said to possess. The ultimate finding that it was reasonable for the ship detainees not to be protected by the provision for release within 48 hours, but that court confirmation of their continued detention after 30 days was required,[9] is cause for some discomfort.

Stanfield v Minister of Correctional Services & Others[10] was a review of a refusal to grant parole for medical reasons.[11] The applicant had been convicted of tax

[1] 1998 (1) SACR 40 (Tk).
[2] Ibid at 43D–E.
[3] Ibid at 45F–I. See § 51.3*(g)* infra.
[4] See Immigration Act 13 of 2002 s 34(8).
[5] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at paras 26 and 41.
[6] Ibid at para 42.
[7] Ibid at para 40. The provisions of s 34(1)(a) were held to apply also to detentions in terms of s 34(8).
[8] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 39.
[9] Ibid at paras 42–46.
[10] 2004 (4) SA 43 (C)('Stanfield').
[11] Such release was governed by the provisions of section 69 of the Correctional Services 8 of 1959.

evasion and had served some months of a six year sentence when he was diagnosed with a form of lung cancer that generally entailed further life expectancy of some six months to one year. He needed treatment of a sort that would render the risk of infection expected from prison conditions fatal. The authorities were concerned about a slippery slope of precedent, as the applicant was, to outward appearances, asymptomatic, and the precise imminence of his expected death was not a matter of certainty — a condition the authorities felt arguably applied to many cases of prisoners infected with HIV/AIDS.[1] The court's finding that 'conditions consistent with human dignity' depended on the circumstances is, perhaps, the most pertinent part of the holding for present purposes.[2] Thus, what may be perfectly humane for a healthy prisoner would not be dignified or humane for a terminally ill prisoner. It was, for example, held to have been inconsistent with dignity not to have afforded the applicant and his condition the degree of individualization it deserved, but rather to treat his case as a precedent along with all other cases of terminal illness.[3] Moreover, the court found it particularly degrading and inhumane to insist that the prisoner remain incarcerated for as long as he was still physically able (in theory) to commit crimes.[4] It was noteworthy indeed that Van Zyl J turned the slippery slope argument on its head and joined in the call of Judge Fagan[5] for more attention to be given to release on the grounds of terminal illness:

> The alternative is grotesque: untold numbers of prisoners dying in prisons in the most inhuman and undignified way. Even the worst of convicted criminals should be entitled to a humane and dignified death.[6]

Finally, the court concluded that the only appropriate remedy of the violation of the right to conditions of detention consistent with human dignity was an order to be released. It might have been argued that the possibilities offered by prison set the outer bounds of what could be demanded by one who was properly imprisoned. The court set no such limits. Rather, the finding amounted to saying that the right to conditions of detention consistent with human dignity sometimes demanded that those who could not be thus detained should therefore not be detained at all.

(d) Communication and visitation rights

Closely aligned to the right to humane conditions is the detainee's right to the opportunity to communicate with, and be visited by, his or her spouse or [1] See Stanfield (supra) at paras 34 and 37.

[2] Ibid at para 89.
[3] Ibid at para 127.
[4] Ibid at para 126.
[5] Pursuant to the Judicial Inspectorate of Prisons.
[6] Stanfield (supra) at para 128 and para 51.

partner,[1] next-of-kin,[2] religious counsellor,[3] and medical practitioner.[4] These rights, apart from also respecting the dignity of the detainee, have an important consequentialist motivation: open channels of communication and frequent access to those who matter to the welfare of the detainee will minimize the opportunities for physical and psychological abuse by allowing complaints to be lodged on behalf of the detainee by those who are concerned for his or her welfare.[5] FC s 38 provide standing to such persons to enforce the detainee's rights.

(e) The right to challenge the lawfulness of detention

FC s 35(2)(d) constitutionalize the right to habeas corpus. The common law remedy, known also as the interdictum de libero homine exhibendo, places the burden on the state to prove that the detention is not unlawful.[6] FC s 35(2)(d)'s proviso — 'if the detention is unlawful' — seems at first blush to be syntactically identical to the new bail proviso contained in FC s 35(1)(f), which allows release 'if the interests of justice permit', and to the right to counsel at state expense 'if substantial injustice would otherwise result', contained in FC s 35(2)(c) and (3)(g). The equivalent provisions in IC s 25(1)(c) and (3)(e) contained 'where' rather than 'if'. It would seem that if an onus attaches to one, an onus, and the same onus, should attach to the others. But there are a number of reasons why the habeas corpus condition should not be read as imposing an onus on the applicant to prove unlawfulness. On the weight of authority, the common law positions regarding onus seem to differ.[7] The effect of the same formulation in the clauses may [1] How close the relationship must be is a question of nicety. Presumably a homosexual partner is included. The detainee alleging a violation of the right will bear the onus of proving that the person in question is the detainee's 'partner'.

[2] Again one may ask whether certain degrees of relation are excluded, particularly when nearer relatives are available. Presumably the right is not so strict as to require only the 'nearest-available-of-kin', nor so generous as to extend to any number of distant relatives.

[3] See P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41. Again, in doubtful cases, the complainant will bear the onus of convincing the court that the person in question is a 'religious counsellor' for the purposes of FC s 35(2)(f)(iii).

[4] See S v Mpofana 1998 (1) SACR 40 (Tk)('Mpofana')(The appellant argued that a refusal to allow him to consult with a medical practitioner of his choice, as opposed to the district surgeon, was a circumstance sufficient to entitle him to bail. Mbenenge AJ held that the magistrate had 'quite correctly' ordered the prison officials to allow the appellant to consult with the medical practitioner of his choice, and that that had put paid to any complaint. Ibid at 45H-I.) See, further, § 51.3*(g)* infra. The reference to a 'chosen medical practitioner' in FC s 35(2)(f)(iv) is clear. A generous definition of 'medical practitioner' should be employed, given the importance of heeding the detainee's wishes in this regard.

[5] The Red Cross' insistence that it be given access to the 'non-combatants' held at the pleasure of the Bush administration at Guantanamo Bay is driven by this very concern.

[6] See Swart v Minister of Law and Order 1987 (4) SA 452 (C); Minister of Law and Order, KwaNdebele v Mathebe 1990 (1) SA 114 (A); Visagie v State President 1989 (3) SA 859 (A).

[7] On the common law onus in the case of bail and the interpretation of the bail clause, see §51.4*(d)* infra.

arguably differ as well, as constitutional formulations should hardly be read as reversing a common law position which constituted a significant safeguard in favorem libertatis. The common law onus in habeas corpus cases clearly reflects the operation, in the least controversial domain of liberty, vis-a-vis freedom of the person, of the 'presumption of liberty'.[1] The pivotal role that this notion plays in the jurisprudence of habeas corpus[2] should not be obliterated by the use in FC s 35(2)(d) of the word 'if'. Most important of all is the grammatical logic of FC s 35(2)(d): it is a mistake to read the clause as providing the right to challenge coupled with the right to be released if a requirement (unlawfulness) is met, the existence of the requirement being a matter of proof. The clause provides the right to challenge the lawfulness of the detention. Nothing is implied about onus. The common law onus therefore operates. If the state cannot prove the lawfulness of the detention, the court declares the detention unlawful and the right to be released follows automatically from the decision of the court. That is what is meant by 'if the detention is unlawful'. The new word order of FC s 35(2)(d) confirms this reading.

The reference to the right to challenge 'in person before a court' is another indication of a specifically focused response to the past: the decision in Schermbruker v Klindt denied a detainee the right to testify in person to allegations of torture.[3] The European Court of Human Rights has stated, as far as the right in art 5(4) of the European Convention is concerned — the right to 'take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court' — that the envisaged proceedings 'need not always be attended by the same guarantees as those required under art 6(1) for civil or criminal litigation'.[4] The European Court of Human Rights also held, in Weeks v United Kingdom:

> The 'court' . . . does not necessarily have to be a court of law of the classic kind integrated within the standard judicial machinery of the country . . . The term 'court' serves to denote 'bodies which exhibit not only common fundamental features, of which the most important is independence of the executive and of the parties to the case . . . but also the guarantees' — 'appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question' — 'of a judicial procedure'.[5]

This approach is in line with Nel v Le Roux NO & Others.[6] It is to be stressed that the merits of a detention will be an FC s 12 question, even if such merits have to be determined under the auspices FC s 35(2). However, a violation of an

[1] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). See also Bishop & Woolman (supra) at § 40.1*(b)*.
[2] See Robertson & Merrills (supra) at 80.
[3] 1965 (4) SA 606 (A).
[4] De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1971) 1 EHRR 373 at para 78.
[5] (1987) 10 EHRR 293 at para 61.
[6] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC).

IC s 25(1) or FC s 35(2) right may well affect the merits of the detention.[1] As pointed out above,[2] the fact that an illegal foreigner being detained on a ship pending deportation had the benefit of notification of such detention and of the right to appeal it was an important reason why the Constitutional Court in Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs & Another[3] upheld the constitutionality of detaining such persons for longer than 48 hours, subject to a requirement of court confirmation after 30 days of such detention.[4] But one might consider what this holding implied for the presumption of unlawfulness. The Immigration Act 13 of 2002 distinguished between those illegal foreigners detained at state facilities and those declared illegal by an immigration officer and detained on the ship on which they arrived, in both cases pending deportation. The former had to be released within 48 hours if no warrant for their continued detention was obtained. The latter not. Why?

This is reasonable and justifiable bearing in mind that it applies to persons who have not formally entered South Africa and have no right to do so. It is reasonable that people who arrive in South Africa without the necessary documents to enable their admission into the country be sent back to the ship in which they arrived. The date of departure of the ship is not under the control of the South African authorities. That the detention of illegal foreigners on a ship is both limited to 48 hours is therefore also reasonable particularly in the context that, according to this judgment, the s 34(1)(a) safeguard[5] will be applicable.

Who is to say that the people in question 'have no right' to enter South Africa? Who is to say that their documents are inadequate? The Immigration Officer? It should have been a court. Yes, there is an appeal. But this is detention without trial of someone entitled to the benefits of FC s 35(2).

(f) The right to counsel

Every detainee is given the right, in the Interim Constitution, 'to consult with a legal practitioner of his or her choice, to be informed of this right promptly and, where substantial injustice would otherwise result, to be provided with the services of a legal practitioner at state expense';[6] and in the Final Constitution, 'to choose, and consult with, a legal practitioner, and to be informed of this right

[1] In Mpofana, Mbenenge AJ held that a detainee with a complaint against the conditions of his or her detention first had to call upon the prison authorities to remedy the complaint, and then, upon the authorities' failure to heed the call, 'it [was] available to the detainee concerned either to challenge the detention before a court of law as being unconstitutional or obtain a court interdict to force the prison authorities to comply with the law'. Mpofana (supra) at 45G-H. It was clearly assumed that violations of a detainee's rights might render the detention unlawful.

[2] See § 51.3*(b)* supra.

[3] 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 46.

[5] This 'safeguard' refers to the right to be notified of the detention and intended deportation and to the right to appeal it.

[6] IC s 25(1)(c).

promptly; [and] to have a legal practitioner assigned to the detained person at state expense, if substantial injustice would otherwise result, and to be informed of this right promptly'.[1]

The detainee's right to counsel should be distinguished from that of the accused provided in FC s 35(3)(f) and (g). Of course, the overwhelming majority of cases will involve arrested persons, and arrested persons tend to become accused persons. Since the effects of an infringement of the right to counsel during the pre-trial stage will most often be regarded from the point of view of the rights of the accused person at trial and in terms of the possibility of the exclusion of evidence obtained by the violation, 'right to counsel' jurisprudence will tend to develop as an aspect of the right to a fair trial, leaving the propriety of extrapolation into the sphere of detention a matter of conceptual concern, given the problem of the due process wall discussed above.[2]

The difference between the detainee's right and that of the accused, apart from the fact that the one has a right to 'consult' and the other a right to be 'represented', will lie mainly in the nature of successful justifications for denying the

[1] FC ss 35(2)(b) and (c). The express stipulation of the right to be informed not only of the right to choose and consult but also of the right to be provided with a practitioner in appropriate cases will presumably render a finding such as that of Gihwala AJ in S v Van der Merwe 1997 (10) BCLR 1470 (O), that there was nothing in the Interim Constitution which required any sort of caution beyond that contained in the Judges' Rules (at 1474F), untenable under the Final Constitution, if it was at all tenable under the Interim Constitution. See Mgcina v Regional Magistrate, Lenasia, & Another 1997 (2) SACR 711, 732 (W)(IC s 25(1)(c) rendered it 'incumbent upon a presiding officer to establish at the earliest opportunity whether these rights have been imparted to an accused person who appear[ed] before him without legal representation'.)

[2] See § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra. See also S v Nombewu 1996 (12) BCLR 1635, 1648-50 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E). In Nombewu, the point emerged starkly: the absence of a warning about the right to counsel before the operation of the Interim Constitution could not be a violation of the detainee's right because he did not have such a right; nevertheless, the pre-trial failure was capable of vitiating the accused's right to a fair trial at the time of trial, although it was held not to have done so. This, as explained by Kentridge AJ in Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at para 12 was the effect of the judgment in S v Mhlungu & Others. 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu'). The approach of the Constitutional Court in Key v Attorney-General, Cape of Good Hope Provincial Division, & Another, however, seemed to be in conflict with this reasoning: the infringement of privacy inherent in searches and seizures conducted in the pre-constitutional era before the right was entrenched could not be held to violate the fairness of the accused's trial conducted under the auspices of the Interim Constitution. 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC). See also S v Khan 1997 (2) SACR 611, 618 (SCA), in which Howie JA clearly regarded himself as bound to apply the dictates of IC s 25(3) in determining whether the admission as evidence of a confession at a trial conducted when the Interim Constitution had come into effect was constitutionally vitiated, but then went on to hold that, since the Interim Constitution had not come into effect at the time of the arrest and confession in issue, the appellant could not rely on his right to counsel under IC s 25(1)(c) to challenge the conduct at arrest. Howie JA held as follows:

> Reliance was placed on numerous passages in the judgments of Mahomed J and Kriegler J in Mhlungu. There is no support in those passages for the suggested retroactivity. What they deal with is the availability of the fair trial right and its related [IC] s 25(3) rights in a trial pending or incomplete as on the date of coming into operation of the Interim Constitution. They do not state, or even suggest, that [IC] s 25(1) rights applied to an arrest and confession-taking which occurred before that date.

Ibid at 618.

right under FC s 36(1) and in the sorts of considerations bringing about 'substantial injustice' on denial of the right to state-funded counsel. Clearly the directive of the Constitutional Court in S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis,[1] that the decision to provide state-funded counsel was 'pre-eminently' that of the officer trying the case, cannot be applied in the sphere of detention, where no case is being tried. Questions about the possibility of 'substantial injustice' are more comfortably answered in the context of the trial than that of detention.[2] In this respect, however, it is submitted that the sort of 'justice' to which reference is made in IC s 25(1)(c) and FC s 35(2)(c) should not be restricted to that which is meant by 'a failure of justice', lest the 'justice' demanded for detainees outside the parameters of the criminal trial be deprived of any content.[3] It is clear that the 'injustice' contemplated by IC s 25(1)(c) and FC s 35(2)(c) involves questions of social justice — ie equality considerations. That the right to have counsel appointed, as opposed to the right to employ counsel, was based on considerations of equal protection of rich and poor has been beyond doubt since the decision of the US Supreme Court in Douglas v California.[4] In S v Melani & Others Froneman J declared:

> The failure to recognize the importance of informing an accused of his right to consult with a legal adviser during the pre-trial stage has the effect of depriving persons, especially the uneducated, the unsophisticated and the poor of the protection of their right to remain silent and not to incriminate themselves. This offends not only the concept of substantive fairness … but also the right to equality before the law.[5]

The importance of the right to be represented during the pre-trial stages, particularly when one is about to be invited to do something incriminating, does not mean that the degree to which a detainee ought to be advised of this right is as extensive as that pertaining to the advice one would expect an accused to be

[1] 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC) at para 15.

[2] S v Gasa & Others 1998 (1) SACR 446 (D) attached decisive significance to the failure to inform arrestees at subsequent procedures (a pointing out and the taking of a statement) of their right to be provided with the services of a legal practitioner at state expense, where there had been a reference to the right to have an attorney present at prior interviews. Nothing was said of the principles relating to substantial injustice. S v Soci 1998 (3) BCLR 376 (E), 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E) illustrated the difficulty of getting the meaning of FC s 35(2)(c) across to a detainee before a pointing out: the inspector who interpreted the caution to the detainee had great difficulty interpreting into isiXhosa the phrase 'waar dit andersins tot wesenlike onreg sou lei'. What was conveyed was something like 'where there can be a want from you'. Ibid at 389G. Again there was no guidance regarding the meaning of 'substantial injustice' in the context of detention.

[3] See the worrying syndrome described in S v Motsasi 1998 (2) SACR 35, 59-60 (W), namely the difficulty experienced by pro Deo counsel in obtaining interpreters for consultations with prisoners, a matter which De Villiers J deemed to require negotiation and resolution between the Bar Council and the Department of Correctional Services. If counsel are to employ their own interpreters in this regard, as suggested by the correctional authorities, then questions of financing come into play. To what extent the state should pay for interpreters in these matters is surely a question which itself raises questions about the sort of 'justice' invoked in this right.

[4] 372 US 353 (1963).

[5] 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335, 347 (E).

afforded about the importance of legal representation at trial. The Full Court in S v Vumase,[1] for example, held that the fact that it was expected of a presiding officer at trial to encourage an accused who wished to remain unrepresented to employ the services of a legal representative in serious cases[2] did not translate into a duty on the part of an arresting officer to encourage an arrested suspect to make use of legal representation for the decision to make a statement or not. The officer need only be reasonably satisfied that the suspect understood the existence of the right and was in a position to decide whether to avail himself or herself of it.

S v Mfene enunciated a clear conception of the right to state-funded legal representation in the sphere of detention in the following terms:

> [I]t is necessary to inform a detainee of his right to be provided with the services of a legal practitioner by the State at least in every case in which the detainee is indigent, in the sense that he is unable to afford the services of his own legal practitioner, and he has been detained in connection with a charge which, in the event of a conviction, might lead to imprisonment.[3]

McCall J dealt as follows with the practical problems inherent in requiring the police officer in question to make the above findings: first, the officer in question must explain the three options available to the detained person: (1) consult with a chosen legal practitioner if in a position to do so; (2) have a lawyer appointed by the state if not able to employ one and if substantial injustice would otherwise result; or (3) dispense with a lawyer, having been fully apprised of all relevant rights, particularly of the right to silence and of the potential consequences of co-operation. If the person concerned does not elect to dispense with a lawyer, he or she should be questioned concerning his or her ability to employ a lawyer. If the person appears to be unable to procure a lawyer, the option of the Legal Aid Board should be explained and the 'necessary arrangements' should be made to enable the detainee to consult with the Legal Aid Board. If a lawyer is thus appointed and is not present when the relevant act is to be carried out, the right to such lawyer's presence should be explained. If a lawyer is not appointed, or an appointed lawyer is not present, the procedure should not be carried out unless the officer in question is satisfied that the detainee wishes to dispense with the services of a lawyer.[4]

The facts of S v Mphala & Another illustrate the function of the right to counsel to protect the right to silence.[5] The family of the accused had employed an attorney on their behalf, and the attorney had requested the police not to take any statements from the accused until he had seen them. The investigating officer, however, '[stole] a march on the accused's attorney',[6] and the court held that both

[1] 2000 (2) SACR 579 (W).
[2] See S v Mbambo 1999 (2) SACR 421 (W).
[3] 1998 (9) BCLR 1157, 1167D (N)('Mfene').
[4] See Mfene (supra) at 1166 and 1164.
[5] 1998 (4) BCLR 494 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W).
[6] Ibid at 501J.

the right to silence and counsel rights had been violated.[1]

In S v Mhlakaza & Others the right of a detainee to consult with a legal practitioner was held to apply to an identification parade.[2] The court's finding that it could not be known what would have happened if the detainees had been allowed the proper opportunity to consult with counsel and to have counsel present at the parade, particularly with reference to the possibility that more people might have been put on the parade,[3] might be read as suggesting that the right to counsel at identification procedures was at least partly motivated by considerations of accuracy. It was on this point that the decision in S v Hlalikaya & Others[4] turned. Van Rensburg J invoked[5] the following dictum of Froneman J in S v Melani & Others:

> The purpose of the right to counsel and its corollary to be informed of that right (embodied in [IC] s 25(1)(c)) is thus to protect the right to remain silent, the right not to incriminate oneself and the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty. Sections [IC] 25(2) and 25(3) … make it abundantly clear that this protection exists from the inception of the criminal process, that is on arrest, until its culmination up to and during the trial itself. This protection has nothing to do with a need to ensure the reliability of evidence adduced at the trial.[6]

The analogy counsel drew between a 'photo identification parade' at which the accused was not present and the identification parade in Mhlakaza was rejected on the ground that the only basis for the analogy would be to ensure the reliability of the evidence adduced at the trial.[7] The court's distinction between the kind of parade where the suspect's co-operation was required and the kind where neither the presence nor the co-operation of the suspect was required was based on the 'self-incrimination' dimension present only in the former case.[8] Two comments are called for: first, Froneman J's dictum in Melani about accuracy should be read as a caveat against regarding issues of fairness solely in terms of accuracy, and ignoring rights violations which do not affect accuracy. It ought not to be read as refusal to acknowledge the role of accuracy safeguards in the rights of arrested a

[1] The accused had been warned of their rights to counsel and to silence. The key to the character of the violation in question is this: withholding the fact that an attorney had already been appointed from the accused meant that their choice to make statements without an attorney was not an informed choice. 'They were as entitled to be informed of facts obviously relevant to the exercise of their election as they were of the express provisions of the Constitution itself.' Ibid at 504A-C

[2] 1996 (6) BCLR 814 (C)('Mhlakaza').

[3] Ibid at 826.

[4] 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE)('Hlalikaya'). Hlalikaya, although dealing with a pre-trial procedure arguably more investigative than that in Mhlakaza, considered the matter from the perspective of an accused. See the discussion in § 51.2 supra. See also S v Zwayi 1998 (2) BCLR 242 (Ck), 1997 (2) SACR 772, 779-8 (Ck), which followed Hlalikaya. S v Mphala & Others 1998 (4) BCLR 494 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 654 (W) was decided on the assumption that the right to counsel applied at an identification parade.

[5] Hlalikaya (supra) at 615-16.

[6] 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335, 348-49 (E)('Melani')(emphasis added).

[7] Hlalikaya (supra) at 617.

[8] Ibid at 616.

and accused persons.[1] Secondly, Van Rensburg J's identification of self-incrimination with an activity which cannot be described as 'communicative' conflicts with the holdings in S v Maphumulo & Another[2] and in Msomi v Attorney-General of Natal & Others[3] that self-incrimination extended only to communicative acts.[4] The danger of Van Rensburg J's interpretation of Froneman J's dictum is that if a restrictive meaning were to be attached to self-incrimination, the right to counsel might be regarded as operating only in spheres accompanied by this restricted notion of self-incrimination. This reading would leave the right to counsel of a detainee who was not arrested and who would not become an accused without any foundation. It would further render FC s 36(1) questions and 'substantial injustice' questions exceedingly difficult to answer.[5] Nevertheless, one can only agree with the observation that a suspect should surely not be entitled to legal representation at investigatory procedures not involving the suspect at all, like pointings out made to the police by state witnesses.[6] The pertinent question about the analogy between photo identification and 'live' identification is whether the former involves an important interaction between the authorities and the detainee. The reason a detainee is afforded the right to counsel at important interactions with the authorities is not confined to avoiding self-incrimination. It is so that his or her interests may be duly protected in the battle between liberty and the power of the state.[7]

Having determined that a detainee had a right to counsel at an identity parade, the court in Mhlakaza proceeded to express extreme concern about the practical and administrative difficulties attaching to the right to counsel at important pre-trial procedures and the duty upon the state to provide legal services to indigent detainees (in the context of their position as arrestees). The court adopted a non possumus attitude to filling in the details of the right in question and called for legislative codification of this area.[8] No attempt was made to provide guidance about the meaning of 'substantial injustice' in the pre-trial sphere.

In S v Mathebula & Another,[9] the Witwatersrand Local Division had to decide

[1] See JH Israel, Y Kamisar & WR LaFave Criminal Procedure and the Constitution: Leading Supreme Court Cases and Introductory Text (1989) 219 (The authors state without qualification that the right to counsel is aimed at 'insuring the reliability of the guilt-determining process', as opposed to 'insuring respect for the dignity or liberty of the individual without regard to the reliability of the criminal process'.)

[2] 1996 (2) BCLR 167 (N)('Maphumulo').

[3] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N).

[4] See S v Mokoena & 'n Ander 1998 (2) SACR 642 (W); S v Ngwenya 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W).

[5] For more on the link between the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, see Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966).

[6] Maphumulo (supra) at 617.

[7] See United States v Wade 388 US 218 (1967)(US Supreme Court based its finding that there was a right to counsel in a 'line-up' on the confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment, and there is much talk of the dangers of inaccuracy.)

[8] Mhlakaza (supra) at 833-34.

[9] 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W)('Mathebula').

whether a detainee who had been warned of his right to silence and to counsel about an hour and a quarter before a crucial pointing out, and in the context of a discussion about the pointing out, should have been warned again of his right to counsel and to silence as the pointing out was about to commence under different police personnel. Instead of asking simply whether one was dealing with two important stages or with only one, and whether, if two, the warning given at the first about the second was to be regarded as effectively governing the second,[1] the court took a more circuitous route. It determined first that the right to counsel and to be informed of this right had been violated at the pointing out itself.[2] Then it observed that waiver could be a justification of this violation under IC s 33(1).[3] It then asked whether there had, at the first warning occasion, been waiver of the rights in question for the purposes of the pointing out. It answered this question in the negative, based on the absence of clear and unequivocal evidence of informed waiver.[4] With respect, the approach of Cameron J in S v Marx & Another is clearly preferable:

> It seems to me that to import the rigours of the law of waiver into the area may be inappropriate and undesirable. It seems to me to be sufficient if the accused or the suspect is informed of his right, and chooses, knowing of it, to proceed to make the statement or pointing out in question.[5]

The wording of FC s 35(2)(b) entrenches the approach adopted by Cameron J, giving as it does the right to 'choose' a legal practitioner. The choice referred to may easily accommodate also the choice whether to consult with a legal practitioner at all.

In S v Brown & 'n Ander, it was said that there was obviously ('ooglopend') no 'yes' or 'no' answer to the question whether the right to counsel should be explained to a suspect at every stage of the investigation and before every interview, and that the answer would depend upon the circumstances of every case. Important factors encompass the intelligence and the 'development' ('ontwikkeling') of the suspect and the period of time between interviews.[6] The finding that there was no onus upon an applicant to show that his or her right had not been explained to him or her, or that he or she had not understood the explanation,[7] is strange. It is odd given the trite status of the proposition that the applicant has to prove a violation before the state must prove justification.

[1] See R v Schmautz [1990] 1 SCR 398 (Canadian Supreme Court regarded pre-detention warning as governing period after detention as part of a single incident.)

[2] Mathebula (supra) at 133.

[3] Ibid at 137.

[4] Ibid at 139ff. Mathebula was followed in S v Gasa & Others. 1998 (1) SACR 446 (D).

[5] 1996 (2) SACR 140, 148 (W). See also S v Shaba & 'n Ander 1998 (2) BCLR 220 (T), 1998 (1) SACR 16, 20E-G (T)('Shaba').

[6] 1996 (11) BCLR 1480, 1502 (NC), 1996 (2) SACR 49 (NC).

[7] Ibid.

In S v Shaba & 'n Ander Spoelstra J went so far as to assert that, although it might sometimes or even always be desirable to warn a detainee of rights to counsel and silence on every potential occasion for self-incrimination, failure to do so could never by itself render elicited evidence inadmissible.[1] This proposition, with respect, cannot be accepted in the absence of further elaboration upon the relationship between violation, remedy and fairness. Apart from recourse to the assertion in Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & Another[2] that questions of fairness are to be decided upon the facts of each case, and that unconstitutionally obtained evidence need not necessarily be inadmissible, little authority exists to support Spoelstra J's conclusion.[3]

The approach adopted in S v Malefo & Andere causes similar disquiet.[4] The admissibility of pointings out and of statements made to magistrates was challenged on the basis that the accused had at no stage been informed of their right to legal representation. Strydom J regarded the admissions as unconstitutionally obtained evidence, and endorsed the Canadian approach of excluding such evidence only if admissibility would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The finding that such exclusion was inappropriate was left unsubstantiated, except for mention of the consideration that the complaint concerning the right to counsel had been dragged in by the hair ('by die hare ingesleep').[5] The finding, with respect, demonstrated a problem inherent in regarding all FC s 35 violations as questions of unconstitutionally obtained evidence. If it could be recognized before the constitutional era that there was value in excluding admissions or confessions which were not freely made as a matter of rule, then it remains to be asked why the addition of constitutional guarantees to the meaning of 'freely made admissions' should result in a denial of that value.[6]

Although S v Mfene & Another expressed a preference for the Shaba approach over the Mathebula approach, McCall J accurately captured the true question: at any given point, the question as to whether the arrested person had been properly informed about his or her right to counsel relative to any particular interaction with the state must be aimed at discovering the extent to which previously given explanations might still be regarded as operative, or by the extent to which the arrested person might properly be said to be aware of his or her right and of its

[1] Shaba (supra) at 20D–E (T).
[2] 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 786 (CC) at para 13.
[3] Shaba (supra) at 20-1.
[4] 1998 (2) BCLR 187 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 127 (W)('Malefo').
[5] Malefo (supra) at 157G–H. Why belated awareness of a violation should be so decisive did not appear from the judgment.
[6] See also the invocation in S v Makofane 1998 (1) SACR 603, 617J-618H (T) of S v Khan 1997 (2) SACR 611 (SCA). A similar approach was adopted in S v Mphala & Another 1998 (4) BCLR 494 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 654 (W), where the absence of counsel during an identification parade was regarded in terms of FC s 35(5). This meant that the delicate question whether the accused had waived their right to counsel, or, more accurately, had decided to participate in the parade without counsel, well aware of their right, was rendered unnecessary to decide, although Cloete J found in any event that the circumstances indicated informed action on the part of the accused. Ibid at 659D-E.

application to the procedure at hand.[1] But then McCall J crafted a rule every bit as peremptory as that applied in Mathebula: if the arrested person was indigent, and if the charge at hand might lead to imprisonment, failure to warn about the right to have counsel appointed at state expense would result in an unfair trial unless the person was, in fact, fully aware of the content of his or her right and elected not to be represented at the relevant procedure (in that case, a pointing-out).[2] Although the conclusion did not follow from the preceding premises, the rule as formulated in Mfene neatly accommodated the suggested approach of regarding this question as one dealing with informed voluntariness.[3]

S v Soci regarded a failure to advise an accused of his right to counsel relative to the particular procedure at hand (a pointing out) as a violation of the right,[4] and correctly, with respect, declined to speculate upon whether the accused would or would not have made the incriminating pointing out had his right not been violated, consequently excluding the evidence under FC s 35(5).[5] Erasmus J decreed that police forms should set out the rights of arrested and detained persons fully, clearly and simply, and that such persons should not merely have the wording of FC s 35(2)(c) repeated to them, but should be informed 'in practical terms of the availability of the services of a legal practitioner at that place and time' and of what should be done to obtain state assistance. The forms should also be available in the detainee's language.[6]

In its decision concerning the constitutionality of the new bail provisions[7] the

[1] 1998 (9) BCLR 1157, 1163 (N)('Mfene').

[2] Ibid at 1167-68.

[3] Ibid.

[4] 1998 (3) BCLR 376, 394G (E), 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E)('Soci').

[5] See the opposite approach adopted in S v Mphala & Another 1998 (4) BCLR 494, 660B-G (W), 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W)(Cloete J, having determined that the absence of counsel during an identification parade was a question of potentially unconstitutionally obtained evidence, held that the absence of an indication that the presence of counsel would have made any difference to the outcome of the parade was a telling factor against excluding the evidence. Cloete J specifically distinguished the position pertaining to confessions and pointings out. This, with respect, begged the question whether parades should not be regarded in a similar light, particularly given the recognition of self-incrimination considerations in S v Hlalikaya & Others 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE).) See also S v Shongwe & Others 1998 (9) BCLR 1170 (T), 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T)(Instead of recognizing that uninformed absence of legal representation rendered statements imperfectly 'voluntary' for the purposes of admissibility, the court first regarded such statements as improperly obtained evidence to be dealt with under FC s 35(5), and then held the question to be essentially a discretionary one. The fact that the court did not invoke public outcry when excluding statements made by the co-accused from admissibility against accused number 3, although accused number 3 was 'most probably the instigator in the murders' ('bes moontlik die aanstigter van die moorde' (at 1195J)) was an indication that the rules relating to the admissibility of confessions were still regarded as sacrosanct by the court. If these 'rigid exclusionary rules' ('starre uitsluitingsreëls') could be upheld without question in the face of probable guilt, but in the absence of a self-incriminatory dimension, it is difficult to see why public disapprobation should be invoked against those who are damned by their own tainted confessions.)

[6] See Soci (supra) at 394I–395C.

[7] Criminal Procedure Act 85 of 1997. See S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC).

Constitutional Court gave its stamp of approval to the approach criticized here. It preferred an ad hoc 'fair trial' test over a decision in principle as to whether a particular statutory procedure violated the right against compelled self-incrimination.[1]

This approach now governs most violations of pre-trial rights: it reduces the entire analysis to an 'analysis' in terms of FC s 35(5). With its stock invocation of Key and its 'balancing of interests', this approach will inevitably lead to a hardening towards admission of cogent evidence on the basis that the violation cannot be demonstrated to have made a difference to the fairness of the trial. The incommensurable relationship between violations of pre-trial rights and the 'fair outcome' of the trial process must lead to a discarding of the weight of violations. Unless violations are treated as having some inherent effect upon the 'fairness of the outcome', the identity of the right violated (counsel right? silence right? self-incrimination?) will matter less and less, and the violation itself will tend to have no weight in the court's utilitarian calculus.

S v Ngcobo illustrates the state of the law.[2] A pointing-out occurred without a warning about its consequences. Key and the interests of society were invoked. The absurdity of allowing a technical violation to result in a successful appeal was mentioned, and the conclusion drawn was that the trial remained fair nevertheless. There was no 'causal link' between the violation and the evidence obtained.[3] Some creativity in the field of constitutional remedies for FC s 35 rights violations is required, as well as a recognition that not every question under FC s 35 is a question under FC s 35(5).[4]

The right to counsel during identity parades[5] was rejected in S v Mokoena & 'n Ander,[6] S v Ngwenya & Others,[7] and S v Monyane & Others.[8] These cases differ significantly in their reasoning.

Claassen J in Mokoena took issue with the notion that an identification parade involved the right against self-incrimination and held that, the detainee being at all times 'passive' and the evidence in question being real and not communicative, the right against self-incrimination was simply not at issue. Yet he did hold that because the detainee had not been warned of counsel rights before the parade, his right to counsel had been violated ('geskend').[9] However, since the court was not dealing with the voluntariness of a confession, it was not a matter for a trial-within-a trial, but a question merely of the weight to be attached to the evidence

[1] See § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra.
[2] 1998 (10) BCLR 1248 (N).
[3] Ibid at 1255A. The absence of a 'causal link' was to be gleaned from the passage recognizing the significance of such a link.
[4] See § 51.3*(g)* supra; § 51.5*(b)* infra.
[5] S v Mhlakaza & Others 1996 (6) BCLR 814 (C); S v Hlalikaya & Others 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE).
[6] 1998 (2) SACR 642 (W)('Mokoena').
[7] 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W)('Ngwenya').
[8] 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T)('Monyane').
[9] Mokoena (supra) at 650G.

in question.[1] The finding that the right did exist, but not because of self-incrimination, freed the existence of counsel rights of a detainee from the requisite presence of a self-incrimination dimension. The effect of rejecting the analogy with involuntary confessions meant that the recognition of the violation of the right in this sphere would tend to have little practical meaning.

In Ngwenya Leveson J agreed that the 'inert' nature of a suspect at an identification parade meant that self-incrimination did not enter the picture.[2] But, more fundamentally, Leveson J found that counsel rights, belonging only to the sphere of detention (under IC s 25(1)) and trial (under IC s 25(3)), did not operate on any 'other occasion'.[3] He assumed therefore that it went without saying that an identification parade did not amount to 'detention' for the purposes of IC s 25(1).[4] The effect of not having been warned of counsel rights was therefore to be tested against the standard of a fair trial. Indeed, Leveson J asked: 'But what is there in the section [IC s 25(3)] that renders it clear that the legislation required anything more than representation at the trial itself?'[5] Leveson J went on to reject the reliance in Mathebula based upon the reasoning in United States v Wade. This reasoning led to the finding that counsel rights should be explained at every important pre-trial interaction between state and suspect. Leveson J held that IC s 25(3) required less than the American Sixth Amendment right to 'have the assistance of counsel for [one's] defence'. The latter right, so he held, was wider in its scope than the right to counsel at trial provided by IC s 25(3). And since IC s 25(1) did not apply outside 'detention', as it was narrowly interpreted by Leveson J, no counsel right applied to the parade.

In Monyane, although IC s 25 was at issue, Borchers J made it clear that the reasoning would not have been different had the mater fallen for consideration under FC s 35.[6] The need to have a self-incrimination dimension present in order to trigger the counsel right was once again affirmed. This affirmation was endorsed in the subsequent decision of Bertelsmann J in S v Thapedi.[7] Borchers J in Monyane saw the counsel right as making sense only in a context where legal advice would serve a purpose. He found that, where a detainee had no right to [1] Mokena (supra) at 650. One might well ask exactly how one is to determine the effect upon the weight (cogency) of the evidence of the uninformed absence of a lawyer. Presumably one should speculate about questions of accuracy and participation, which would almost inevitably lead to ignoring the violation in the determination.

[2] See Ngwenya (supra) at 314D. Interestingly, this was held to be so in United States v Wade — 388 US 218 (1967)('Wade') — even where a suspect is made to speak words at the identification parade. See Ngwenya (supra) at 314.

[3] Ibid at 312E-F.

[4] See § 51.2 supra.

[5] Ngwenya (supra) at 313B.

[6] Monyane (supra) at 128C.

[7] 2002 (1) SACR 598, 602E (T)('Thapedi') This confirmation was somewhat watered down by the finding, citing in support the unreported decision of the full court in S v Bailey (CPD 25/2000), that not being advised of the right to counsel at an identification parade did not 'per se' violate the right to counsel, or that any violation would not be material. Thapedi (supra) at 603H-I.

choose whether to participate in an identification parade, and any hypothetically present legal adviser would have no right to interfere in the manner of its conduct, it made little sense to demand that the right to counsel be triggered on such an occasion.[1] These decisions place some pressure on the foundation for the counsel right as an incident of the right of being a detainee (as opposed to being an accused person or an arrested person). It may also be asked with some pointedness whether the advice of counsel may not be seen as serving a necessary purpose in circumstances other than those where the advice can have an immediate effect on the procedure at hand. It is of immense value to a person who is being taken through the mills of some part of the state machinery to be advised by a lawyer about why some process is taking place and what he or she can do about it — even if he or she cannot lawfully do anything about it.

The finding of Magid J in S v Gumede & Others,[2] that the word 'promptly' in IC s 25(1)(c) and FC s 35(2)(c) '[could] only mean immediately or as soon as possible after the person in question [had] been detained or sentenced', cannot be supported. First, it ignored the ongoing nature of detention. Secondly, it begged the pertinent question in these cases: whether any warning that was given should be regarded as operative at any particular self-incriminatory activity.[3]

It is of course necessary to afford the detainee a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right to counsel.[4] In R v Manninen[5] the Canadian Supreme Court held that if the detainee indicated that he or she wished to exercise the right to counsel, then he or she had to be provided with a reasonable opportunity to retain and to instruct counsel without delay, and that the authorities had to allow the detainee to telephone a relative or to make contact with counsel by telephone or otherwise.[6]

The right to choose a legal representative must obviously be confined to reasonable limits of availability. Normal availability contingencies naturally should

[1] See Monyane (supra) at 129-131. The rejection of United States v Wade was accompanied by an observation that United States jurisprudence generally did not demand counsel rights at identification parades prior to the stage of being formally charged, and the Canadian cases were distinguished on the ground that, since one had the right to refuse to participate in a parade in Canada (unlike the case in South Africa), it made sense to obtain legal advice on such an occasion. See Monyane (supra) at 134H-135B. See also Thapedi (supra) at 603B-E.

[2] 1998 (5) BCLR 530 (D).

[3] The finding ibid at 540I, with respect, was equally questionable: '[IC s 25(1)(c)] has in my judgment nothing to do with the issue in this case, in the light of our unanimous finding as to the voluntariness of the pointings out.' It is submitted that the entrenched counsel rights have added an important gloss to the meaning of voluntariness.

[4] This proposition can be regarded as the ratio in Mhlakaza. See also Powell v Alabama 287 US 45 (1932); S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106, 112I-113A (C)(In the context of the right of an accused to legal representation, Ngcobo J declared '. . . [I]f the right to legal representation is to have any meaning, it must include the right to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to secure it.')

[5] [1987] 1 SCR 1233, 1241.

[6] But see R v Smith [1989] 2 SCR 368 (The detainee should be 'reasonably diligent' in attempting to contact counsel.)

qualify the right, rather than act as a potential source of limitation clause justification. But if the circumstances of detention or the requirements of the authorities render specificity of election impracticable, then these factors are best dealt with as limitation questions.

(g) Remedies for detainees

The overwhelming majority of criminal procedure constitutional cases concern the effect upon admissibility of evidence of violations of IC s 25 and FC s 35. The possibility of a permanent stay of proceedings, which occurs mainly in the context of cases dealing with delayed justice, is similarly concerned with the effect of violations upon the outcome of a criminal trial. One may well be excused for thinking that the jurisprudence around the rights of detained, arrested and accused persons and the jurisprudence of the admissibility of unconstitutionally obtained evidence are one and the same.[1] Employing admissibility as a remedy assumes that there is a trial, and also that an adverse ruling on admissibility possesses a rational connection with the violation in question.[2] But a detainee whose rights are violated must turn elsewhere, and so must the analyst who is to determine what remedies detainees and arrested persons have qua detainees and arrested persons, irrespective of their intended future status as accused persons. Furthermore, as far as an accused is concerned, violations of rights that have no connection with the gathering of evidence often require remedies that are likewise not necessarily connected with the outcome of the trial.

The main weapon that the detainee possesses is the right to challenge the lawfulness of the detention.[3] Some violations of detainee rights should properly render the detention unlawful.[4] Since the applicant bears the onus of proving a violation, but the state bears the onus of proving lawfulness in habeas corpus applications, the state will have to show the otherwise lawful character of the detention in question, the applicant would then have to show that a right has been violated, and the state in its turn should prove that such violation was justified under IC s 33(1) or FC s 36(1). If the violation cannot be justified, it would make most sense to require the state to show cause why the detention should not therefore be regarded as unlawful, and that another remedy would be

[1] See PJ Schwikkard 'Evidence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 52.

[2] Peter Hogg writes of the American approach, that unconstitutionally obtained evidence is inadmissible: 'In favour of the American rule, it could be argued that lawless behaviour by law enforcement officers should not be rewarded by allowing them to use the fruits of such behaviour. On the other side of the argument was the point that when reliable evidence is excluded, a guilty person usually goes free; it is arguable that it would be more sensible to discipline the police officer directly than to confer such a windfall on the undeserving accused.' P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992; 1996 supplement) § 38.2 citing Mapp v Ohio 367 US 643 (1961).

[3] See § 51.3*(e)* supra.

[4] Ibid.

more appropriate in the circumstances. It should be stressed that a minor violation which cannot be justified is easily conceivable; the consequences of violation, the magnitude of violation, and whether violation can be justified being distinct questions. In such cases the remedy of damages may play a very important role.[1] Article 5(5) of the European Convention on Human Rights, for example, establishes an 'enforceable right to compensation' for violations of the rights of an arrested or detained person. The advantage of damages as a remedy is that it avoids the objection of remedying one evil by creating another, and it possesses the flexibility so problematically lacking in all-or-nothing rulings relating to release, or to the admissibility of evidence, or to a stay of proceedings. It should, however, be used only to fill the gaps, and not to deprive an applicant of a more effective remedy in a case where the proceeding or detention in question is vitiated beyond redemption by the violation of rights. It should also be awarded sparingly in situations where an interdict to stop violating, or a mandamus to start fully respecting, the right in question, makes more sense.[2] Litigation of criminal procedure rights should not become a gold rush; nor should the state be encouraged to purchase violations of liberty with rands.

Before the passing of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act, a conflict of authority existed about the power of a court to order release of a detainee pending referral to the Constitutional Court of the question of the constitutionality of the empowering provision.[3] In Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Another, the release of an imprisoned person was ordered pending such a referral.[4] This decision displayed conspicuous concern for liberty. Wehmeyer v Lane NO & Others followed the same approach.[5] Bux v Officer Commanding, Pietermaritzburg Prison, & Others[6] and De Kock & 'n Ander v Prokureur-Generaal van Transvaal[7] did not.

The remedy question fell to be decided in S v Mpofana.[8] The appellant argued that violation of his right to dignified conditions of detention merited a setting aside of the refusal of his bail application. Mbenenge AJ pointed out that, while detainees had certain constitutional rights, 'the proper course to follow when such rights [had] been violated [was] a different matter'.[9] The learned judge also

[1] See J Klaaren, M Chaskalson & S Budlender 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 9.

[2] See, eg, the Van Biljon & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C), 1997 (2) SACR 50 (C)(On the provision of adequate medical treatment).

[3] Act 13 of 1995.

[4] 1994 (3) SA 899 (SE), 1994 (4) SA 592 (SE), 1994 (3) BCLR 80 (SE).

[5] 1994 (4) SA 441 (C), 1994 (2) BCLR 14 (C).

[6] 1994 (4) SA 562 (N), 1994 (4) BCLR 10 (N).

[7] 1994 (2) SACR 113 (T). The Constitutional Court Complementary Act 13 of 1995 added IC s 101(7). IC s 101(7) granted provincial and local divisions of the Supreme Court (now High Courts) jurisdiction to grant an interim interdict or similar relief pending determination of referrals to the Constitutional Court).

[8] 1998 (1) SACR 40 (Tk).

[9] Ibid at 45C.

recognized the possibility of challenging the detention before a court as unconstitutional, and obtaining a mandamus to remedy the complaint.[1] But, with respect, what was open to question in the judgment was the ruling that internal remedies (application to the prison authorities) had first to be exhausted before the violation could be brought to the attention of a court.[2] Such rights violations are justiciable disputes under FC s 34.[3] The fact that a court might well order no more than compliance as a proper remedy in certain cases should not mean that FC s 35 entails some doctrine of exhaustion of internal remedies.[4]

As discussed above,[5] in Stanfield v Minister of Correctional Services & Others[6] the applicant could not be detained in conditions consistent with human dignity, and was therefore released. The order was the result of a setting aside of a refusal of parole on review, rather than an order flowing from an application for release as of right, but the result was nevertheless significant for the remedial question.

51.4 The Rights of Arrested Persons

(a) Statutory lawfulness

An arrested person is a person detained 'for allegedly committing an offence', and as such enjoys the rights of a detained person as well as those specified for an arrested person under IC s 25(2) and FC s 35(1). An arrest is effected under s 39 of the Criminal Procedure Act ('The Criminal Procedure Act').[7] Because the manner of arrest is fully regulated by the Criminal Procedure Act, an arrest is lawful only when it complies with the statute. Physical contact with the arrested person is required for a valid arrest, unless the person in question unmistakably subjects himself or herself to the arresting officer.[8] Section 39(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act requires that the person effecting an arrest shall at the time of [1] Mpofana (supra) at 45H–I.

[2] Ibid at 45G–H.

[3] See Adrian Friedman & Iain Currie 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 60.

[4] See Baramoto & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1998 (5) BCLR 562 (W)(The applicants, who were not detainees, but who were threatened with arrest, detention and deportation under s 44(1) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991, inter alia sought a declarator to the effect that they were refugees under international law. The applicants argued that the informal administrative procedures that had been established for the implementation of South Africa's obligations under international refugee law were inappropriate for the resolution of a rights dispute, for the determination of which FC s 34 demanded an independent and impartial tribunal. Joffe J did not analyse the requirements of independence and impartiality under FC s 34, holding merely that there was no reason to expect the administrative procedures in question to be unfair.) Ibid at 576E.

[5] See § 51.3*(c)* supra.

[6] 2004 (4) SA 43 (C).

[7] Act 51 of 1977

[8] S v Thamaha 1979 (3) SA 487, 490 (O). See E du Toit, FJ de Jager, A Paizes, A Skeen & S van der Merwe Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2004) § 39.

effecting the arrest, or immediately thereafter, inform the arrested person of the cause of the arrest, and entitles the arrested person to demand a copy of the warrant authorizing arrest.[1] According to S v Matlawe,[2] an arrested person becomes an arrested person only upon formal notification of the reason for arrest, whether he or she is aware of it or not.[3]

(b) Silence and self-incrimination

(i) The seamless web

Silence and self-incrimination rights before trial are intimately bound up with the right to a fair trial, and difficult to separate from the perspective of the accused at trial. As long as it is remembered that the question of whether a person's right as an arrested person has been violated can be distinguished from the question of whether that person's right as an accused has been violated, pre-trial silence and self-incrimination from both perspectives may be examined together, especially since the remedies in this case, like the right itself, are sharply focused on the trial. Indeed, the difficulty of separating the spheres for analytical purposes has even led to observations such as the following from Yacoob J in his separate concurring judgment in S v Thebus & Another:

> The distinction between the pre-trial right to silence and the right to silence during trial is inappropriate in our constitutional jurisprudence. The right to silence is initially conferred by s 35(1)(a) and thereafter by s 35(3)(b).[4]

Aspects of silence and compelled self-incrimination which are purely trial-bound will be discussed in the section on the rights of an accused.[5]

The conceptual relationship between the right to silence, the right against self-incrimination, and the presumption of innocence is a jurisprudential minefield. Some hold the view that the right to silence is the governing principle.[6] In R v Director of Serious Fraud Office, ex parte Smith[7] Lord Mustill expressed the opinion that the 'right to silence' did not denote any single right, but referred to 'a disparate group of immunities, which differ[ed] in nature, origin, incidence and importance'. The six identified 'immunities' were: a universal immunity from being compelled on pain of punishment to answer questions, a universal immunity from being thus compelled to answer questions which may incriminate, a

[1] On the right to reasons, which the accused enjoys as a detainee, see § 51.3*(a)* supra.

[2] 1989 (2) SA 883, 884-85 (B).

[3] See §§ 51.2 and 51.3*(e)* and (g) supra, for a discussion of the significance of unlawful arrest upon one's status as 'arrested' for the purposes of FC s 35(1), and for the effect of violations of rights upon the lawfulness of detention.

[4] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC).

[5] § 51.5 infra.

[6] See R v Brophy [1982] AC 476, 481 (The right not to be compelled to incriminate oneself was discussed in terms of the right to silence.)

[7] [1993] AC 1, 30-1 (HL) ('Ex Parte Smith').

specific immunity of suspects undergoing interrogation from being thus compelled to answer questions, a specific immunity possessed by accused persons at trial from being thus compelled to testify and answer questions, a specific immunity by persons charged with an offence from being interrogated, and a specific immunity possessed by an accused in certain circumstances from having adverse comment made on a failure to answer questions before the trial or at the trial. The learned judge commented:

> Each of these immunities is of great importance, but the fact that they are all important and that they are all concerned with the protection of citizens against the abuse of powers by those investigating crimes makes it easy to assume that they are all different ways of expressing the same principle, whereas in fact they are not. In particular it is necessary to keep distinct the motives which have caused them to become embedded in English law; otherwise objections to the curtailment of one immunity may draw spurious reinforcement from association with other, and different, immunities commonly grouped together under the title of the 'rights to silence'.[1]

The view that the principle against self-incrimination, or nemo tenetur se ipsum prodere, is the archetype principle has been expressed by the Cape Provincial Division in Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences,[2] the Australian High Court,[3] and the Canadian Supreme Court.[4] Lamer CJ in R v Jones invoked the 'principle' against self-incrimination, and distinguished it from the 'privilege' against self-incrimination. The latter belongs to the 'narrow traditional common law rule relating only to testimonial evidence at trial', while the former, the principle nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare, possesses the 'status of a principle of fundamental justice'.[5] The fallacy of the argument in S v Phallo & Others,[6] that all instances where silence might lead to criminal consequences involve the right to silence, illustrates the necessary conceptual link between the silence and self-incrimination rights.[7]

The most coherent view is that the governing principle in the triad is the presumption of innocence. Once it is accepted that criminal justice rights flow

[1] Ex parte Smith (supra) at 30-31. Lord Mustill's view is referred to by Ackermann J in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 93 (In the context of the right against self-incrimination. Ackermann J refers to the second listed immunity as that applicable to the privilege against self-incrimination.)

[2] 1995 (2) SA 148, 162 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C)('The underlying right embodied in [IC] s 25(2) and (3) is that no accused person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself. It has its origins in the principle nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare.')

[3] See Pyneboard (Pty) Ltd v Trade Practices Commission (1983) 152 CLR 328, 346 (Murphy J).

[4] See R v Hebert [1990] 2 SCR 151, 57 CCC (3d) 1, 34 (McLaghlin J).

[5] [1994] 2 SCR 229, 249. The explanation was given in the course of a dissenting judgment. The subordination paradigm is often determined by the textual framework within which the particular jurisprudence operates. The US Constitution speaks of the right 'not to be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself' (in the Fifth Amendment), and so silence becomes a question of self-incrimination.

[6] 1998 (3) BCLR 352 (B).

[7] See § 51.1*(a)(iii) supra; § 51.4(b)*(ii) infra.

from a concern with the justification for interference with liberty,[1] and that this concern is most clearly perceived in the foundational status of the presumption of innocence in the criminal process, then the character of the right to silence and that of the right to protection from self-incrimination as natural consequences of the presumption of innocence should be readily visible. The seamless web of rights recognized by the Constitutional Court in S v Zuma & Others, while rendering separate development of the rights in question difficult, clearly illustrates that the 'silence rights' to which Lord Mustill referred are governed by the presumption of innocence:

> [T]he common law rule in regard to the burden of proving that a confession was voluntary has been not a fortuitous but an integral and essential part of the right to remain silent after arrest, the right not to be compelled to make a confession and the right not to be a compellable witness against oneself. These rights, in turn, are the necessary reinforcement of Viscount Sankey's 'golden thread' — that it is for the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt … Reverse the burden of proof and all these rights are seriously undermined.[2]

The conceptual difficulty in reverse onus cases of distinguishing questions that pertain to the presumption of innocence from those questions that relate to silence and (or) self-incrimination questions is further proof of the close link joining these three concepts, and of the foundational status of the presumption of innocence.[3] Madala J put it thus in Osman & Another v Attorney-General, Transvaal:

> Section 25(3)(c) [IC] enshrines both the right to be presumed innocent and the right to remain silent during plea proceedings or trial. The rights contained in the subsection are both integral to the right to a fair trial. That these rights stand side by side in s 25(3)(c) is not accidental; the framers of the Interim Constitution sought to demonstrate that these rights reinforce each other.[4]

(ii) The right to remain silent

IC s 25(2)(a) makes only implied reference to the right to silence, incorporating it into the right to be 'informed … that he or she has the right to remain silent and

[1] R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986) 93-94 (Goes so far as to say that the point of all law is the justification of state coercion.)

[2] 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 33. See also Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Canada (Director of Investigation & Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission [1990] 1 SCR 425, 480 (Right against self-incrimination grounded in the notion that the 'state must have some justification for interfering with the individual and cannot rely on the individual to produce the justification out of his own mouth'.)

[3] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 652 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC) at para 34; S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC) at para 11; S v Meaker 1998 (8) BCLR 1038 (W), 1998 (2) SACR 73, 85D-I (W)(Cameron J assumed for the purposes of argument that a reverse onus provision violated the right to remain silent.)

[4] 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC)('Osman') at para 12. For more on the Court's finding with respect to the presumption of innocence § 51, see.1*(a)*(iii) supra.

to be warned of the consequences of making any statement'. The substantive dimension to the right to silence is expressly provided in FC s 35(1)(a) and is clearly distinguished from the right to be informed of its existence and of the consequences of not remaining silent contained in FC s 35(1)(b)(i) and (ii). What is particularly remarkable about the wording of FC s 35(1)(b)(ii) is that, unlike the reference to 'any statement' in IC s 25(2)(a), the warning about the consequences of 'not remaining silent' can hardly be read as including a reference to the possibly incriminating consequences of indeed remaining silent. The entrenchment of the right to remain silent independently of the information right should now be read as constitutionally prohibiting the use as incriminating evidence of the exercise by the accused of the right to remain silent while he or she was an arrested person. And that is why it is justifiable to omit a reference to the right to be warned, not only of the consequences of not remaining silent, but also of the consequences of remaining silent. The two rights read together compel the interpretation that no grave consequences may attach to exercising the right to remain silent during or after arrest. The abolition of the common-law protection against use of pre-trial silence as incriminating evidence[1] by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act of 1994[2] in the United Kingdom required the caution upon arrest to be amended to a warning, not only that anything said might be used against the apprehended person in a court but also that silence inconsistent with anything relied upon at trial might harm the apprehended person's defence.[3]

The authority in favour of allowing negative inferences from a failure to testify at trial should not be read as allowing the use of pre-trial silence as positive evidence of guilt.[4] There are a number of reasons for this view: first, there is a world of difference between allowing the court to draw inferences from the very course of the trial before it, and allowing conduct by the accused before trial which amounted to the exercise of a right to be used as evidence at the trial. The character of the defence at trial, and whether it involves testimony from the accused to explain matters raised by the state, cannot easily be ignored in the determination of whether the onus has been discharged. What the accused did

[1] At common law an exercise of the right to silence, particularly after a caution about its existence, does not by itself amount to a positive piece of evidence of guilt. See R v Patel 1946 AD 903; R v B 1960 (2) SA 424, 426 (T); S v Maritz 1974 (1) SA 266 (NC). In England this was the position before 1994. See Hall v The Queen [1971] 1 WLR 298 (PC), R v Gilbert [1977] 66 Cr App Rep 237. This general rule is subject to a fine distinction between conduct (including silence) which can be taken as acceptance of an accusation of guilt, and hence as an admission (R v Christie [1914] AC 545 (HL); S v Mogotsi 1982 (1) SA 190 (B)), and a refusal to respond, especially if such silence is an exercise of the right to silence. Furthermore, a distinction, equally fine, has to be drawn between the circumstantial inference that may be drawn from the sudden and belated appearance of a defence like an alibi, on the one hand, and use of silence by itself as evidence of guilt, on the other. See R v Littleboy [1934] 2 KB 408, 413.

[2] Section 34.

[3] See R v Condron and Condron [1997] 1 Cr App Rep 185; R v Bowden [1999] 1 WLR 823 (CA).

[4] See Attorney-General v Moagi (1982) II BLR 124 (CA). See also S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453, 487 (W); § 51.5*(j)*(ii) infra; Osman (supra) at paras 19-22.

not say at some previous occasion, however, can be left out of the reckoning more readily. The accused at trial is fully aware of the fact that he or she is standing trial, that guilt is being determined by what people, including the accused, do or say at the trial, and that his or her testimony, or lack of it, will be his or her side of the story, as far as the court is concerned.[1] Upon apprehension, however, the picture is radically different. The arrested person is in a vulnerable position and has been told that nothing need be said, and that grave consequences may flow from saying anything.[2] Finally, the common law differs

[1] The awareness flows from the nature of the experience itself, as interpreted and explained to the accused by counsel or the court, as the case may be. If the accused is unable with guidance to comprehend the significance of what is going on, he or she would not be competent to stand trial.

[2] For a similar significance attached to the greater vulnerability of a suspect due to uncertainty than that of an arrested person, see S v Sebejan & Others 1997 (8) BCLR 1086 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 626, 633-4 (W). Therefore, if a trick is used to circumvent the arrested person's opportunity to claim the right to silence at a police interview, such evidence as emerges should not be admissible. See R v Hebert [1990] 2 SCR 151. This should apply also to a person not yet arrested, when the activity aimed at extracting the admission should properly have been conducted at a police interview. The vulnerability and ignorance arguments in S v Sebejan are most apposite here. This does not mean that all cases of entrapment violate the right to silence or the right against self-incrimination. But see Mendes & Another v Kitching NO & Another 1996 (1) SA 259 (E), 1995 (2) SACR 634, 646f (E)(Kroon J's view that an accused's right not to incriminate himself or his right to silence was not 'at issue' in a trapping case overstated the case.)

An interesting problem arose in S v Van der Merwe 1997 (10) BCLR 1470 (O), 1998 (1) SACR 194 (O). The accused had been approached by a policeman after a shooting incident, and the policeman had asked him what had happened, ignorant of the fact that the accused had been responsible for the shooting. The accused was not a suspect, and obviously not arrested, at that stage. The accused offered an exculpatory account, upon which the policeman cautioned him 'in terms of the Judges' Rules' and arrested him. The court held the statement to have been admissible. Reasons, or factors, were the exculpatory nature of the statement, the bona fide character of the policeman's actions, the spontaneity of the statement, the fact that the accused was not an ignorant person ('nie 'n oningeligte persoon nie'), the absence of disadvantage to the accused due to the statement, and the present attitude of the community to the scourge of crime. Ibid at 1476-7. The less said about the last factor, the better. 'Spontaneous' the statement was not, having been elicited by questioning by a police officer. 'Exculpatory' it could be only if viewed relative to a statement assuming full responsibility — after all, the statement led to the accused's immediate arrest. What is important is to recognize some similarities between a mala fide trap and a bona fide 'trap'. The misapprehension in the accused's mind as to the character of the questioning in a situation of extreme uncertainty and vulnerability should have led to a finding along the lines of Sebejan. If the conviction was substantially based upon this statement, one might justifiably feel a sense of unease about the turn of events. The absence of a caution was a mistake. The accused should not be the one to pay for it. The problem arose also in S v Ndlovu 1997 (12) BCLR 1785 (N). In this case it was unclear whether an offence had in fact been committed by anybody, but the fact that the appellant was followed and questioned in connection with a motor vehicle suspected to have been stolen, with a trap acting as intermediary in the process, illustrated the dangers of dodging interview safeguards by reliance upon uncertainty. It was disconcerting that IC s 25 could be regarded as 'of no relevance' in such cases. Ibid at 1791C. See also S v Langa & Others 1998 (1) SACR 21, 27 (T). See, generally, §§ 51.1*(a)*(iv) and 51.2 supra. In S v Khan, the accused had not been warned of his right to legal representation upon arrest or immediately before making a spontaneous confession at a time before the Interim Constitution had come into effect. 1997 (2) SACR 611 (SCA). This was lawful, but 'unfair'. Ibid at 620. The court wrote: 'What the unfairness . . . essentially did was to deprive appellant of the opportunity to be advised to remain silent. As against that, here was an accused who spontaneously, voluntarily, without improper influence or ill treatment, knowing of his right to silence and his privilege against self-incrimination, confessed, apparently reliably, to two murders'. Ibid at 621. It is unsurprising that Howie JA proceeded to hold that the factors in favour of admission outweighed those in favour of exclusion. That the seriousness of the charge was employed as a factor in favour of admission is disconcerting, the gravity of the consequences of the 'unfairness' in question surely belongs in the debit column.

in relation to the respective situations. The significance of expressly adding the substantive right to pre-trial silence to the rights of an arrested person must be something other than to deprive the arrested person of a common-law protection.

It is therefore disquieting to note that Jones J in S v Nombewu stressed that, although the warning required by IC s 25(2)(a) would 'extend not only to what was said but also to what was done',[1] the warning did not apply to 'every act or omission by an accused person which [gave] rise to an adverse inference against him because it amount[ed] to a tacit admission', and that the learned judge invoked as illustration the common-law cases concerned with acquiescent silence, on the basis that 'action spoke louder than words'.[2] The learned judge's view that no warning as to silence was required in England[3] did not take into account the fact that the very sort of inference in question required the alteration of the caution in England. It is not suggested that our courts should require a similarly puzzling caution;[4] rather, it should be recognized that the absence of such a caution in our Constitution means that pre-trial silence is not to be used as evidence of guilt.[5]

At which precise occasion one must be warned of the right to silence, and when an earlier warning may still be said to be operative, are questions considered above under the discussion of counsel rights.[6] Where the relevant officer had deliberately refrained from warning the suspect at the scene of the pointing-out of a right to silence (the suspect having been so warned originally upon his arrest), so as not to discourage the suspect from making incriminating statements at the scene, it was hardly surprising that the court in S v Seseane[7] found such failure to

[1] 1996 (12) BCLR 1635, 1644 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E)('Nombewu').

[2] Ibid at 1645.

[3] Nombewu (supra) at 1646.

[4] What a suspect is to make of the following is something for criminal psychologists to ponder: 'You do not have to say anything but it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you say may be given in evidence.' See R v Condron and Condron [1997] 1 Cr App Rep 185 (CA)(For guidelines on inferences from silence in such cases.)

[5] This holding does not mean that every time the omission to speak carries criminal consequences the right to silence is involved. If fraud is perpetrated by means of non-disclosure, criminal liability has nothing to do with the right to silence. See §§ 51.1*(a)(iii) and 51.4(b)(i)* supra. This response is the short answer to the ingenious but, with respect, absurd argument raised in S v Phallo & Others 1998 (3) BCLR 352 (B). In order to get around the binding authority of S v Jonathan & Andere 1987 (1) SA 633 (A) in the context of accessory after the fact liability, the appellants argued that Jonathan was unconstitutional. The principle in Jonathan that was uncomfortable to the accused in Phallo was that one might be held liable as accessory after the fact to a crime which one might have committed oneself. Jonathan recognized that one might assist another to evade his or her crime by means of words as well as deeds. So, the argument went, one might do so also by means of silence. Hence the 'logical conclusion' that Jonathan violated the right to silence, and, lo!, that the holding in Jonathan was unconstitutional. The court evaded the silence question by pointing out that Jonathan did not hold that silence might constitute the actus reus of accessory-after-the-fact liability. Phallo (supra) at 364. The fact that the question could be left there proved the irrelevance of the constitutional argument to the principles from Jonathan that were actually applied in Phallo.

[6] See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[7] 2000 (2) SACR 225 (O).

activate the right at the relevant moment decisive in rejecting the evidence thus elicited. This finding stands in stark contrast with the finding in S v Ndhlovu & Others that an adequate warning given to the relevant accused when he was arrested immediately before setting off to the pointing-out was so 'bound up' with the pointing out as still to have been operative for the purposes of the pointing-out.[1]

S v Thebus & Another concerned the use to be made by the prosecution at trial of the late emergence of an alibi defence — ie, of the fact that an alibi defence had not been asserted on an earlier occasion.[2] The Justices of the Thebus Court adopted four different approaches to the issue. The appellant, on arrest on suspicion of involvement in an offence committed in Ocean View, Cape Town, was asked whether he wished to give an account. His answer was the rather enigmatic one that his family had been in Hanover Park at the relevant time. At trial, the appellant presented an alibi that placed him neither in Ocean View nor in Hanover Park. He was cross-examined on the version he had put about his family's presence in Hanover Park. He explained that he had told the police where his family had been at the time, not where he had been. He could not offer an explanation for why he would have done this. The interesting question was whether this line of cross-examination, and inferences arising from the appellant's performance, violated his right to silence. The view adopted by Ngcobo J and Langa DJP that this had nothing to do with the right to silence, had much to recommend it. The other Justices all dealt with the issue as one involving a deliberate failure to speak (ie not mentioning the alibi earlier). But the judgment of Ngcobo J and Langa DJP implicitly warned against the fallacy that every version offered at trial that differed from a version offered when questioned pre-trial entailed remaining silent pre-trial about the trial version. The fallacy is that every version x is silent about version y to the extent that the two differ. Indeed, quite the contrary is usually true — every version x talks about version y to the extent that the two differ, since version x implies that version y is false to the extent of the difference. When the appellant had told the police officer that his family had been in Hanover Park at the time (on being asked to account in respect of an offence occurring in Ocean View), what was he saying? If he was implying that he had also been in Hanover Park, then his alibi contradicted that statement, and he ought surely to have been cross-examined accordingly, without engaging the right to silence. In testing whether that was indeed what he was implying, cross-examination about the implausibility of merely telling the police where his family had been made perfect sense. All that had happened in the instant case was that the appellant had been tested in cross-examination on his contradictory or nonsensical statements. Silence did not really enter the picture.[3]

[1] 2001 (1) SACR 85 (W) at paras 10–11, 40.
[2] S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC)('Thebus').
[3] See Thebus (supra) at paras 119 and 121.

On the assumption that the case was properly viewed as one concerning the failure to mention an alibi earlier (as the rest of the Court viewed it), the right to silence appeared to score a victory, but one threatened by imminent defeat at the hands of defence discovery. The 'main judgment' (three judges on the silence issue) found the use of a pre-trial failure to mention an alibi to be constitutionally valid. However, the failure must go to credibility and not to guilt.[1] The concurrence of four judges that constituted the majority grouping on this issue found this distinction to be too close for comfort,[2] a logically appealing scruple, and did not countenance cross-examination of an accused on such pre-trial silence — the victory.[3] The threat to the victory was the suggestion that an adequate pre-trial warning that failure to mention an alibi might be used at trial would take care of the violation.[4] This conclusion should give us pause. In the United Kingdom, a suspect is entertained with the following gibberish: 'You do not have to say anything. But it may harm your defence if you fail to say something now on which you later rely at your trial. Anything you do say may be used against you.'[5] Furthermore, why accord an alibi special treatment? Why allow (subject to a confusing warning) making something of the failure to mention an alibi but not making something of the failure to mention other exculpatory evidence? Why tell the suspect he or she has the 'right to silence' at all? One should either tell a suspect that he or she has the right not to say anything, and actually mean it, or scrap the whole idea.

What was particularly welcome, if somewhat atypical, was the avoidance by the majority group on the silence issue of an ad hoc approach to the question whether such silence could legitimately be used or not. In his separate concurring judgment, Yacoob J asked, quite legitimately, why an ad hoc approach should be avoided in the case of pre-trial silence, whilst a fairness barometer was used in other cases.[6] One may point out that a distinction must be maintained between the question of whether a violation occurred and the question whether the trial has been rendered unfair as a result.[7] But the strong insistence on the police discipline principle to justify outlawing the use of pre-trial silence as a deterrent[8] remained noteworthy. Why limit this approach to the use of pre-trial silence?

[1] Thebus (supra) at paras 59-68.

[2] Ibid at para 90.

[3] Ibid at para 91. This group found cross-examination on the Hanover Park statement not to involve the right to silence. Quite how such cross-examination could be sensibly conducted without probing what that statement was meant to imply about the accused's own presence, and therefore to what extent it was different from the trial alibi, was not clear.

[4] Ibid at para 92.

[5] The reservations about confusing warnings expressed by Yacoob J echoed such worries. Ibid at para 111.

[6] Ibid at paras 97 and 109.

[7] Indeed, the majority group held the violation to have occurred, but the trial not to have been rendered unfair as a result. Ibid at para 93.

[8] Ibid at para 85.

(iii) The right against compelled self-incrimination

The link between the right against compelled pre-trial self-incrimination and the context of the trial itself was forged by the Constitutional Court in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell No & Others[1] and Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO,[2] and reinforced in Nel v Le Roux NO & Others.[3] In Ferreira the subjection of company directors to which, inquiries conducted in the course of the liquidation of companies under s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act 61 of 1973 provided no protection against use of the answers elicited in subsequent criminal proceedings, was held to violate the right against self-incrimination. The incrimination would render the envisaged criminal proceedings unfair. The criminally enforceable compulsion to answer was itself justifiable under the limitation clause, but the absence of a use immunity in the criminal proceedings could not be justified under the limitation clause. The result of this approach was the effective transformation of the right against self-incrimination into a use immunity which operated only at the specific proceedings where the incrimination might occur: where the use immunity would apply, the right was exhausted; no complaint based on self-incrimination had any meaning outside that context.[4] Nevertheless, one could still validly refuse to answer questions if other rights would be threatened by the answers. However, the threatened violation would be upheld as justified under limitation analysis.[5]

[1] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira').

[2] 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein') at para 60f.

[3] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel'). See also Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C).

[4] Nel (supra) at para 4 ('In view of the transactional indemnity and use immunity provisions in section 204(2) and (4) respectively of the CPA, the applicant could not validly (and did not) object to answering self-incriminating questions.') See also Dabelstein & Others v Hildebrandt & Others 1996 (3) SA 42, 66 (C), in the context of Anton Piller orders. This was the foundation for the short shrift accorded the arguments in Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2005 (4) SA 543 (C) that the right to silence and against compelled self-incrimincation had been violated in that case. The applicant brought review proceedings against various official acts that amounted to granting consent that he be questioned by officers of a foreign state concerning his knowledge of facts relating to an attempted coup d'etat in that state. Since the applicant was being prosecuted in South Africa in connection with the foreign coup, it was argued that he should not be submitted to such questioning, which would be used both to gather ammunition against him in the South African proceedings and to prepare a case for his possible extradition to face an unfair trial and a potential death penalty in the foreign state, at least until the finalization of his criminal case. The rejection of a similar argument in Mitchell & Another v Hodes & Others NNO 2003 (3) SA 176 (C), which had found that no substantive basis for distinguishing the case from the Ferreira use immunity had been presented, was invoked as almost axiomatically suggesting the untenability of the applicant's argument in Thatcher. Ibid at paras 92 to 94.

[5] See Bernstein (supra) at para 61; Nel (supra) at para 6ff. The striking consequence of this approach is that, because the ability to refuse to answer criminally compelled questions would depend upon a final determination also of the applicability of the limitation clause, a person faced with compulsory questioning is able to avoid criminal liability for a refusal to answer, if and only if the fine balancing entailed by a limitation analysis would be decided in his or her favour. However,a 'just excuse' for the purposes of avoiding criminal liability should be based upon more subjective factors than the possible outcome of a limitation analysis entertaining state interests.

The requirement of compulsion laid down in FC s 35(1)(c) and (3)(j) has been interpreted not to include the Hobson's choice between sacrificing one's interests in non-criminal proceedings and incriminating oneself as far as future or pending criminal proceedings are concerned. In Davis v Tip & Others[1] and Seapoint Computer Bureau (Pty) Ltd v McLoughlin & Others NNO,[2] the courts decided that only coercive compulsion actually to answer questions, as opposed to the exercise of a free choice to defend one's interests in the non-criminal proceedings, amounted to the sort of compulsion required for a violation of the right against self-incrimination.[3] The Davis court based its finding upon IC s 25(3)(c) — the presumption of innocence and the right to silence at trial — rather than on the self-incrimination provision. The Seapoint court first based its decision on the equation of the common law right to silence and the right against self-incrimination, and then, perplexingly, rejected the application of a remedy granted in the self-incrimination sphere at common-law, partly because the authority in question was not concerned with the 'right to silence'.[4] The Seapoint court's identification of the presence of the relevant kind of 'coercive power', as emphasized in a series of Canadian cases,[5] missed the point. The cases in question were at pains to point out that the kind of coercion which the Seapoint court required was not a requirement for the applicability of the self-incrimination right. A lesser form of 'coercion' in the background is deemed sufficient.[6] The lack of an actual compulsion to speak was similarly decisive in Osman & Another v Attorney-General of Transvaal.[7]

[1] 1996 (1) SA 1152 (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 807 (W)('Davis').

[2] 1996 (8) BCLR 1071 (W)('Seapoint').

[3] See S v Mbolombo 1995 (5) BCLR 614 (C)(Bail). Mbolombo's approach was based on dicta in S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 30. On this view, the right against self-incrimination was grounded upon an abhorrence of coercive methods of extracting confessions from accused persons especially by the Star Chamber in the seventeenth century. This is the orthodox view of the right's history. See LW Levy Origins of the Fifth Amendment (1968). In Ferreira, Ackermann J noted that recent scholarship in legal history had cast doubt upon the link between the privilege against self-incrimination and the horrors of coerced extraction of evidence during the seventeenth century. Ibid at para 92 n124. See JH Langbein 'The Historical Origins of the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination at Common Law' (1994) 92 Michigan LR 1047 (Langbein argues, and musters impressive material in support, that the structure of the pre-eighteenth-century English criminal trial was completely inconsistent with the right to remain silent, being focused upon forcing or allowing the accused to tell his side of the story, and that the origins of the right to remain silent and the privilege against self-incrimination must be sought in the development of the adversarial process and the enjoyment of legal representation by the accused.) Ackermann J also refers to the theory offered by Eban Moglen. See E Moglen 'Taking the Fifth: Reconsidering the Origins of the Constitutional Privilege against Self-Incrimination' (1994) 92 Michigan LR 1086. This theory of the justifying principle behind the silence rights supports the status of the presumption of innocence as the governing rationale. The recognition of this governing rationale in Zuma should not be obscured by the references to the history of compelled confessions, given that Zuma itself dealt with the operation of the principle in the context of involuntary confessions, and that the Star Chamber history was apposite to that context.

[4] Seapoint (supra) at 1081 (Rejects the applicability of Jamalodien v Ajimudien 1917 CPD 293.)

[5] Phillips v Nova Scotia (Commission of Enquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy) (1993) 117 NSR (2d) 218; Williams v Deputy Superintendent 18 CRR (2d) 315.

[6] See edcor Bank Limited v Benhardien 2000 (1) SA 307 (C).

[7] 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC)('Osman').

A facial challenge to a statutory provision — that created the offence of being unable to give a satisfactory account of possession of goods reasonably suspected of being stolen — failed on self-incrimination and silence grounds. It failed because the statute did not penalize silence or a failure to account. It penalized an inability to give a satisfactory account, ie being in a position where one was not possessed of a satisfactory explanation. The satisfactory account could have been produced at any time before judgment — hence the court's analogy with the position of an accused unable to rebut a prima facie case.[1] The Osman Court held that the section did not compel anything.[2] Since the real target of the section is harbouring stolen goods, the mechanism of explanation is nothing more than an evidential tool disguised as a substantive offence.[3]

Msomi v Attorney-General of Natal & Others[4] invoked the division between 'real' and 'communicative' evidence emphasized in Canada,[5] and the notion that only the compulsion of the latter could be regarded as violating the right against self-incrimination.[6] In this respect, a distinction should be drawn between real evidence independent of the person of the accused and real evidence intimately connected with the person of the accused. Compulsory production of the former does not by itself amount to self-incrimination.[7] Compulsory production of the [1] Osman (supra) at paras 15, 19–23.

[2] Ibid at para 11.

[3] See § 51.1*(a)*(iii) supra.

[4] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N)('Msomi').

[5] See R v Collins [1987] 1 SCR 265.

[6] See S v Huma & Another 1996 (1) SA 232 (W); S v Maphumulo 1996 (2) BCLR 167 (N), both cited in Msomi (supra). All three cases dealt with fingerprints. See also § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra; S v Vilakazi en 'n Ander 1996 (1) SACR 425, 428 (T). Msomi followed the American decision in Schmerber v State of California 384 US 757 (1966)(Blood sample not self-incrimination). In Canada this reasoning was applied by the Ontario Court of Appeal to a breath sample. R v Altseimer (1982) 38 OR (2d) 783 (CA). But see R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613 (Supreme Court holds that a breath sample amounts to conscription of the accused against himself). See also R v Dersch [1993] 3 SCR 768 (Blood sample) and R v Greffe [1990] 1 SCR 755 (Object extracted from rectum). It should be pointed out that the self-incrimination principles recognized to be involved in these Supreme Court decisions are difficult to disentangle from violations of the right to counsel. In England the privilege against self-incrimination at common law is interpreted as not extending to the compelled production of intimate samples. See R v Apicella (1985) 82 Cr App Rep 295 (CA); R v Smith [1985] 81 Cr App Rep 286 (CA); and R v Cooke [1995] 1 Cr App Rep 318. On the confirmation of the communicative requirement, see S v Mokoena 1998 (2) SACR 643 (W); S v Ngwenya 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W)(Dismissing the notion of a self-incrimination dimension at identification parades, in the sphere of counsel rights.) See also § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[7] The case of the compulsory production of evidence often straddles the line between communicative and real evidence, particularly when the real evidence is documentary evidence. It is important first to separate questions of seizure from questions of compelled production, and then to separate compelled production from compelled disclosure.

(1) Seizure and production: Seizure of pre-existing evidence independent of the person is not compelled self-incrimination. It may violate privacy, and such violation may have evidential consequences. For the privacy question, see Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C)('Park-Ross') and Key v Attorney-General, Cape of Good Hope Provincial Division, & Another 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC)('Key'). For more on the right to privacy, and its relation to search and seizure, see D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 38.3*(a)*(ii). Documents, although containing 'communications' from their maker, do not seem to become latter may be a different matter.[1] The recognition in S v Hlalikaya & Others[2] of a compulsorily produced communicative evidence when they are seized. United States v Fisher 425 US 391 (1976); United States v Doe 465 US 605 (1984). For critical and comprehensive discussion of this issue, see DE Will 'Dear Diary — Can You be Used against Me?' (1994) 35 Boston College LR 965. The compelled production of incriminating pre-existing evidence known to be in existence should also not by itself violate the right against self-incrimination. But see Boyd v United States 116 US 616 (1886)(Reliance upon the Fifth Amendment (self-incrimination) coupled with the Fourth Amendment (unreasonable searches and seizures) led the court to declare compulsory production of documents (incriminating invoices) per se to violate the right against self-incrimination. This aspect of the case was seemingly overruled in United States v Fisher.) In Bernstein, Ackermann J implicitly distinguished the possible privacy infringement inherent in a compelled search and seizure from questions of self-incrimination: 'In the present context a claim to privacy can surely only be founded on the content of the information which the examinee is being forced to disclose, not on his desire not to disclose it.' Bernstein (supra) at para 64. The right against self-incrimination was not directly claimed in Bernstein for the production of documents — as the claim would in any event have been covered by the decision in Ferreira. In Park-Ross, the court dismissed self-incrimination complaints against production and inquisition powers conferred by s 5(8) of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act 117 of 1991 on the basis that the persons concerned were not arrested or accused at the relevant time, and that a use immunity at criminal proceedings against 'evidence given by a person' in such inquiries would provide adequate protection of self-incrimination rights. The court did not distinguish the documents produced, on the one hand, from questions answered and evidence (including documents) discovered as a result of questions answered, on the other. In Key the attack upon seizures of documents was framed on privacy grounds and dismissed on the basis that the seizures were lawfully carried out in the absence of constitutional rights before the passing of the Interim Constitution. The claim to a use immunity based on Park-Ross was therefore primarily a question of the consequences of possible privacy infringements. The Court endorsed the reasoning in Ferreira, Bernstein, and Nel regarding self-incrimination use immunities and held this reasoning to be applicable to the claim before it. Key (supra) at paras 10-11. This should perhaps not too readily be regarded as tacit approval for the notion that the right against self-incrimination did apply to compulsory production of documents per se. Nevertheless, the extension of the privilege against self-incrimination in England to Anton Piller orders and Mareva injunctions seems to cover the very production of the documents themselves, irrespective of any communicative significance in disclosure. See Rank Film Distributors Ltd & Others v Video Information Centre & Others [1981] 2 All ER 76 (HL) and AT&T Istel Ltd & Another v Tully & Others [1992] 3 All ER 523 (HL). For criticism of the Lord Chancellor's Department Consultation Paper, see The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination in Civil Proceedings (1992) at para 30. Approval of the English cases expressed in Dabelstein v Hildebrandt & Others might indicate endorsement of the application of self-incrimination principles to the production of documents per se, although the issue was not addressed. 1996 (3) SA 42 (C)('Dabelstein').

(2) Production and disclosure: Disclosure of (the existence of) documents, which disclosure leads to compelled production or seizure of the documents in question, creates self-incrimination problems, first, because the disclosure may be used as an admission and secondly, because of the problem of the 'derivative use' of compelled testimony (the disclosure) which is entailed by the use of the documents as evidence. See United States v Fisher (supra) at 410). The second problem was addressed in Dabelstein (supra) at 66-67 (Regarding the use of documents obtained by means of interrogation under an Anton Piller order.) See also Baltimore Department of Social Service v Bouknight 493 US 549 (1989)(Supreme Court held that an order addressed to a mother to produce a child to the court involved the Fifth Amendment because of the confessional effect of the act of production. Of course, an order to 'produce' documents the existence of which is unknown or in dispute would amount to an order to disclose and produce, and the communicative aspect of the production would involve self-incrimination problems.)

[1] A bullet lodged in the body of the accused is an alien body the forcible removal of which may entail invasions of bodily integrity, but not self-incrimination. See Minister of Safety and Security v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654 (C); Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Xaba 2004 (1) SACR 149 (D); S v Orrie & Another 2004 (1) SACR 162 (O).

[2] 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE).

self-incrimination dimension to a suspect's standing in an identity parade may well be seen as softening the 'communicative' requirement. And the test laid down in S v Melani[1] — that conscription by the accused against himself 'through some form of evidence emanating from himself' — can be read as authority for a wider definition than that applied in Msomi.[2] But in S v Mokoena[3] S v Ngwenya[4] and S v Monyane,[5] the Msomi requirement of a communicative act was reaffirmed in the sphere of counsel rights. In all of these cases, the WLD held identification parades not to involve self-incrimination at all.[6] Furthermore, the rather firm confirmation of the communicative or testimonial requirement by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Levack v Regional Magistrate, Wynberg,[7] in the context of the compulsion of a voice sample, probably put paid to the extension of the sphere of self-incrimination beyond the truly testimonial. More important, however, is the fact that a recognition of the status of the presumption of innocence as the governing rationale behind the cluster of silence rights would lead courts to acknowledge the argument by counsel in Msomi that these rights extend beyond the principle nemo tenetur se ipsum prodere to a principle that, since the state is to bear the full burden of proving its case, the individual should not be obliged to assist the state in any way in proving its case against him or her.[8] In R v S (RJ)[9] cited with approval by Ackermann J in Ferreira v Levin,[10] the Canadian Supreme Court discussed the right against self-incrimination in terms of protecting the person concerned 'against assisting the Crown in creating a case to meet'. This principle was expressly accepted in S v Mathebula & Another as part of the right to a fair trial.[11] The seamless web of silence rights recognized by the Constitutional Court

[1] 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174, 191 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335 (E).

[2] This is possible especially given the fact that the learned judge did apply his mind to the question of exceptions, and confined these to 'the discovery of existing facts or objects and not to incriminating evidence of the accused himself'. Ibid at 191-92. Evidence emanating from the accused's own body or movements is therefore not to be classed among the 'existing facts or objects' exempted from the scope of the right.

[3] 1998 (2) SACR 617 (W).

[4] 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W).

[5] 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T).

[6] See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[7] 2003 (1) SACR 187 (SCA) at paras 19 and 21.

[8] 1996 (8) BCLR 1109, 1117 (N).

[9] [1995] 1 SCR 451, 26 CRR (2d) 1, 76.

[10] Ferreira (supra) at para 145.

[11] 1997 (1) BCLR 123, 147 (W)('Mathebula'). See the discussion of Msomi (supra), S v Vilakazi 1996 (1) SACR 425 (T) and Mathebula (supra) in § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra. The theory that the right against self-incrimination is based on the right not to be compelled to assist the state was derisively referred to as the 'fox hunt' theory by Jeremy Bentham. Rationale for Judicial Evidence Considered (1827 ed) 238f. Bentham's derision was aimed at the very idea of the privilege against self-incrimination. For judicial recognition of this factor as integral to the right against compelled self-incrimination in the United States, see Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436, 460 (1988); Murphy v Waterfront Commission 378 US 52, 55 (1964). See also JH Wigmore (JH Chadbourn ed) Evidence in Trials at Common Law (1974) § 2251. In Canada further support for this view can be found in Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Canada (Director of Investigation & Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission [1990] 1 SCR 425, 428. For the role of this factor as the foundation of the right against self-incrimination, see M Hor 'The Privilege against Self-Incrimination and Fairness to the in Zuma, although unlikely to please those who prefer to distinguish sharply between the disparate immunities collected under the right to silence,[1] acts as clear authority to employ the golden thread in that web, the presumption of innocence, as the governing principle in determining the extension and the development of the scope of the rights in question.

The use of a principle of not being obliged to assist the state in proving its case has significance for the question of the admissibility of 'derivative evidence' obtained because of compelled statements. This principle is especially relevant where the statements themselves would be subject to the use immunity. In Ferreira v Levin, Ackermann J cited with approval the conclusion of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v S (RJ),[2] that such derivative evidence 'though not created by the accused and thus not self-incriminating by definition' was 'self-incriminating none the less because the evidence could not otherwise have become part of the Crown's case'.[3] Ackermann J further approved of the granting of 'discretion' to exclude such evidence to ensure a fair trial.[4] The term 'discretion' is misleading if it refers to the duty of the trial judge to ensure compliance with the constitutional requirement of a fair trial. The Ferreira majority's statement that derivative evidence was 'subject to "fair criminal trial standards"'[5] is preferable.[6]

In Dabelstein & Others v Hildebrandt & Others[7] the rule applied in England in the context of Anton Piller orders and Mareva injunctions — that self-incrimination was concerned only where there was a 'real and appreciable risk' of criminal proceedings being taken — was accepted by the Cape Provincial Division.[8] The question whether the right against self-incrimination, as opposed to the Accused' (1993) Singapore Journal of Legal Studies 35 ('Conceptually, it would seem that, if there is any single organizing principle in the criminal process, it is the right of the accused to resist any effort to force him to assist in his own prosecution.') See also M Schiller 'On the Jurisprudence of the Fifth Amendment Right to Silence' (1979) 16 American Criminal LR 197, 218ff; C Whitebread & C Slobogin Criminal Procedure (2nd Edition, 1986) 323.

[1] See § 51.4*(b)(i)* supra.

[2] [1995] 1 SCR 451.

[3] Ibid at para 145.

[4] Ibid at para 153. See also Dabelstein (supra) at 66-67 (Court endorses the derivative evidence 'discretion', on the authority of Ferreira, for the purposes of evidence obtained by the use of Anton Piller orders.)

[5] Ferreira (supra) at para 185 (Chaskalson P).

[6] See § 51.1*(b)*(ii) supra.

[7] 1996 (3) SA 42 (C).

[8] See Rank Film Distributors Ltd & Others v Video Information Centre & Others [1982] AC 380 (HL); AT&T Istel Ltd & Another v Tully & Others [1992] 3 All ER 523 (HL); Renworth Ltd v Stephenson [1996] 3 All ER 244 (CA). It is to be stressed, however, that self-incrimination in England is not limited to criminal incrimination. It extends also to 'penalties', which include penalties for civil contempt. See Bhimmji v Chatwani (No 3) [1992] 1 WLR 1158. It extends to penalties imposed by the European Economic Community for breach of the terms of the EEC Treaty (Rio Tinto Zinc Corporation v Westinghouse Electric Corporation [1978] AC 547 (HL)('Rio Tinto')). It does not extend to civil liability, as the Constitutional Court in Bernstein pointed out. Bernstein (supra) at para 115. Ackermann J rejected a claim based on 'equality', alternatively on 'fairness in civil proceedings', that use of compelled self-incriminating evidence at civil proceedings provided the adversary with an unfair advantage. Ibid at paras 102-23.

common-law privilege, was possessed by corporations was avoided in Seapoint Computer Bureau (Pty) Ltd v McLoughlin & Others NNO.[1] The applicant corporation relied on the right against self-incrimination of one of its directors. In England, the better view is that the privilege does apply to corporations.[2] In the United States[3] and Canada the human rights status of the privilege entails its non-applicability to corporations. The common-law rule's applicability to corporations was reversed in Canada as a result of the Charter incorporation of the right.[4] This 'colonization' of the privilege by natural persons because of its human rights status has been recognized even where, as in Australia, there is no Bill of Rights.[5]

(c) The right to be brought before a court

FC s 35(1)(d) entrenches an obligation upon the authorities to bring the arrested person before a court as soon as reasonably possible, but not later than 48 hours after arrest. Allowance is made for the expiry of the period during non-court days.[6] It is therefore possible for the arrested person to claim that his or her right has been violated if he or she is brought before a court within 48 hours of arrest, when it would have been reasonably possible to bring him or her to court sooner.[7] The reference to a 'court' in FC s 35(1)(d), as opposed to an 'ordinary Reliance was placed upon the American decision in Kastigar et al v United States that government might compel testimony from a witness invoking the Fifth Amendment by conferring on the witness use and derivative use immunity in criminal proceedings only. 406 US 441 (1972). For the purposes of this analysis, it is significant that the court did not hold that the right against self-incrimination did not apply to the production of documents in any event.

[1] 1996 (8) BCLR 1071 (W).

[2] See Triplex Safety Glass Co Ltd v Lancegay Safety Glass (1934) Ltd [1939] 2 KB 395, 404 (CA); Rio Tinto (supra)(Where it was assumed to attach without argument); Sociedad N de Co Angola UEE v Lundqvist [1991] 2 QB 310 (CA). But see British Steel Corporation v Granada Telivision Ltd [1981] AC 1096, 1127 (CA)(Dictum to the contrary by Lord Denning does not reflect the weight of authority.)

[3] See Bellis v United States 417 US 85 (1974); Braswell v United States 487 US 99, 109 (1988).

[4] The common-law applicability of the privilege to corporations was recognized in Webster v Solloway Mills & Co [1931] 1 DLR 831, and reversed because of the new status of the privilege as a human right in R v Amway Corporation [1989] 1 SCR 21. See also BC Securities Commission v Branch [1995] 2 SCR 3, 29.

[5] Environment Protection Authority v Caltex (1993) 178 CLR 477.

[6] See also s 50 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 as amended by Act 85 of 1997, which came into force on 1 August 1998. Although gaps left by the provisions of IC s 25(2)(b) and FC s 35(1)(d) are filled by having recourse to the statute, such gaps as exist mean that there is no constitutional protection against adverse amendment of the statute in the areas concerned.

[7] There is a body of jurisprudence under the European Convention on Human Rights relating to the meaning of the right 'promptly' to be brought before a court, but, given that the right in question does not specify a maximum period, the authority in question will be of limited use as far as a 'reasonable possibility' before 48 hours is concerned. See Brogan et al v United Kingdom (1988) 11 EHRR 117 (The ECHR Commission considered a period of four days and eleven hours not to violate the 'promptness' requirement. The contrary opinion of the ECHR Court was decided by a majority of twelve to seven.) See also AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 77-79. See, further, Garces v Fouche & Others 1998 (9) BCLR 1098 (Nm)(Recognized the logical implication of the equivalent provision in the Namibian Constitution: the 48-hour period was a maximum, not an entitlement. A bail application could be brought before that period had expired.)

court of law' in IC s 25(2)(b), presumably has the effect that the kind of court envisaged need not be the kind associated with the full rigours of the right to a fair trial.[1]

According to FC s 35(1)(e) (the right to be charged, informed, or released), at the first court appearance the arrested person is entitled to be charged or informed of the reason for further detention. It is a pity that it is not stipulated how or even by whom the informing is to be done. A strict reading would entitle the authorities to bring the arrested person before a court, not necessarily have anything decided by the court, and then to inform the arrested person of the reasons why he or she is to remain in detention. FC s 35(1)(e) makes it clear that the charging or informing is to be done 'at the first court appearance after being arrested'. The right should clearly be read as requiring the informing of continued detention to be a communication to the arrested person of the decision of the judicial officer by the judicial officer himself or herself.

The structure of the speedy process rights in IC s 25 left a potential gap between IC s 25(2)(b) and (3)(a). The latter right related only to the period after charge. This gap seems to have been filled by the amendment to the right of an accused to trial within reasonable time contained in FC s 35(3)(d). FC s 35(3)(d) omits the qualification 'after having been charged' (IC s 25(3)(a)) and substitutes the right 'to have their trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay'. But the gap has been filled only for the accused person at trial looking back at what went before.[2] Under FC s 35(1)(d) one is still faced with the question as to what speedy process rights the arrested person has after he or she has been brought to a court within 48 hours after arrest and has been informed that his or her detention is to continue. The fact that violations of speedy trial rights may vitiate the fairness of the trial is cold comfort to the arrested person who never reaches trial at all.

Article 5(3) of the European Convention on Human Rights, for example, expressly provides an arrested person with the right (1) to be brought before a court 'promptly' (although no hour limit is provided), and (2) to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. This latter right is to be distinguished from the accused person's right, provided in art 6(1), to a fair and public hearing

[1] For more on De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1971) 1 EHRR 373 and Weeks v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 293, see § 51.3*(e)* supra. The European jurisprudence on the equivalent right in art 5(3) of the ECHR should not be invoked for the meaning of 'court' in the South African context, since art 5(3) expressly allows the arrested person to be brought 'before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power' (emphasis added). Article 5(3) has been held to apply to the Swiss District Attorney acting in his investigative capacity. See Schiesser v Switzerland (1979) 2 EHRR 417. Strasbourg jurisprudence based on allowances for inquisitorial systems of justice should not be permitted to dilute the rights of an arrested person under an adversarial system. See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 57 (The 'trial' required for detention under FC s 12 had to be presided over or conducted by 'a judicial officer in the court structure established by the 1996 Constitution . . . in which s 165(1) ha[d] vested the judicial authority of the Republic.')

[2] On the right of an accused to trial within a reasonable time, see § 51.5*(f)* infra.

within a reasonable time.[1] The speedy trial right in South Africa, as in the United States and Canada, is to be viewed from the perspective of the accused, given that there is no speedy process right for an arrestee. But in the United States the absence of speedy process rights relating to the pre-charge period is easily circumvented by recourse to the due process clause.[2] And in Canada, although the speedy trial right is expressly confined to those 'charged with an offence', due process seepage from s 7 of the Charter may cover pre-charge delay which is not easily accommodated under the general right to a fair trial.[3]

The problem may be solved by extrapolation from the judgment of the Witwatersrand Local Division in Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg & Another.[4] Stegman J decided that an accused person whose trial was being delayed unreasonably could before the trial rely on a 'threatened violation' under IC s 101(3) of his or her right to trial within a reasonable time under IC s 25(3)(a), and that deciding otherwise > would condemn accused persons who had good reason to fear that the trial they were facing would be in violation of their right to a fair trial, to submit to the inconvenience and expense of an unfair trial before being able to persuade this court to do anything about it . . . [I]f a proper case is made out that a trial which is due to start will be a violation of the accused's right to a fair trial, this court should intervene at once and should not leave the accused to be subjected to an unfair trial in the hope that he will be acquitted on some other ground and that the question of his constitutional right to a fair trial may never have to be dealt with.[5]

The arrested person would therefore be able to rely on this reasoning, and under the Final Constitution, the arrested person, or somebody acting for him or her,

[1] See R Beddard Human Rights and Europe (3rd Edition, 1993) 138. JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 105-108 (Describes the rather complicated relationship and overlap between these two undue delay rights.) See also Neumeister v Austria (1968) 1 EHRR 91 (A two-year detention period encompassing a 15-month period without any interrogation amounted to a violation of art 5(3) but not of art 6(1).); Wemhoff v Germany [1968] ECHR 2 (The Court explained that art 5(3) covered persons charged and detained and the period until the judgment of the court of first instance and that art 6(1) extended from the initial arrest to the final determination of the charges, comprising the entire appellate stage. Fawcett (supra) at 107 points out, however, that the application of art 6(1) to the period after arrest and before charge should have no bearing on the applicability of art 5(3) to that period.); Koplinger v Austria (1966) Application No 1850/63, 9 Yearbook 240 (The Commission was of the opinion that 'the reasonable nature of the period concerned should be assessed in a less restrictive manner when the length of proceedings under Art 6(1) and not the period of detention under Art 5(3) of the Convention is being considered'.) See also S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 77.

[2] United States v Lovasco 431 US 783 (1977).

[3] R v L (WK) [1991] 1 SCR 1091. Once again, the concurrent operation of the general right to a fair trial and the principles of fundamental justice seemingly rendered arbitrary the decision whether the question was one under s 11*(d)* or s 7.

[4] 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W)('Bate').

[5] Bate (supra) at 991-92. For more on the aspects of this judgment which deal with an accused person's right to trial within a reasonable time, see § 51.5 infra.

would claim under FC s 38 that the right under FC s 35(3)(d) was 'threatened', and the court in question would then decide this 'constitutional matter' under FC s 172, and 'make any order that is just and equitable' under FC s 172(1)(b). The purpose of the right to be brought to court is to force the state to declare its hand when it is purporting to detain a person 'for allegedly committing an offence'. In other words, the purported purpose — charging the person with an offence, and prosecuting the charge before a court — entitles the arrested person to demand treatment as one who is reasonably soon to become an accused and tried person, and if his or her treatment under detention is such as to vitiate the envisaged trial, the arrested person has reason to complain qua arrested person. FC s 35, however, does not provide a basis for this complaint after the requirements of FC s 35(1)(d) have been complied with, and hence the arrested person who has not been charged is to complain as a future accused person.

(d) The right to be released (bail)

FC s 35(1)(f) — the right of an arrested person to be released in certain circumstances — is distinct from the right to be brought before a court, charged, informed or released. The latter right operates absolutely (in the absence of a limitation justification) to entitle the arrested person to release if not charged or informed within 48 hours. The release right in FC s 35(1)(f) operates independently.[1]

The reference to 'bail' in IC s 25(2)(d) has been dropped in FC s 35(1)(f). Bail (in the pecuniary sense) will therefore be one of the 'reasonable conditions' to which release may be subject.[2] It is significant that, unlike art 5(3) of the European Convention on Human Rights, FC s 35(1)(f) does not confine the grounds upon which bail must be set to 'guarantees to appear for trial'. The problem of 'preventive detention' as a ground for denying bail is therefore left open. In its comprehensive decision on the constitutionality of most of the bail provisions introduced into the Criminal Procedure Act[3] ('the Code'),[4] the Constitutional

[1] Compare the right in art 5(3) of the European Convention on Human Rights, where the right of an arrested person to be charged within a reasonable time or be released subject to reasonable conditions is set out as a unit. In Canada the 'bail' right belongs to an accused (s 11*(e)* — 'not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause') — arrested and detained persons together being given the habeas corpus right (s 10*(c)*). 'Bail' is read to refer to all the conditions of release, whether pecuniary or not, 'just cause' relating to the merits of denying release, and 'reasonable bail' to the conditions of release. R v Pearson [1992] 3 SCR 665. In the United States the right to be released on bail can be read into the prohibition contained in the Eighth Amendment against 'excessive bail'. See Stack v Boyle 342 US 1 (1951). But see United States v Salerno 481 US 739 (1987)(The merits of being granted bail at all were said to flow not from the Eighth Amendment but from the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.)

[2] See Fawcett (supra) at 116 (On the European Convention provision, he writes: 'Bail is not specifically mentioned, perhaps because in some contracting states it is frowned on as unduly favouring persons of means, and seldom used … The amount of bail would be outside the purview of the Commission, unless there appeared to be an element of abuse.')

[3] Act 85 of 1997.

[4] Act 51 of 1977.

Court addressed the role of preventive detention.[1] Kriegler J, for a unanimous Court, held:

> Section 35(1)(f) presupposes a deprivation of freedom — by arrest — that is constitutional. This deprivation is for the limited purpose of ensuring that the arrestee is duly and fairly tried. But s 35(1)(f) neither expressly nor impliedly requires that in considering whether the interests of justice permit the release of that detainee pending trial, only trial related factors are to be taken into account. The broad policy considerations contemplated by the 'interests of justice' test, in that context, can legitimately include the risk that the detainee will endanger a particular individual or the public at large. Less obviously, but nonetheless constitutionally acceptably, a risk that the detainee will commit a fairly serious offence can be taken into account. The important proviso throughout is that there has to be a likelihood, i.e. a probability, that such risk will materialize. A possibility or suspicion will not suffice. At the same time, a finding that there is indeed such a likelihood is no more than a factor, to be weighed with all others, in deciding what the interests of justice are. That is not constitutionally offensive. Nor does it resemble detention without trial, the reprehensible institution really targeted when one speaks of preventive detention. Absent a proper basis for the original arrest, it will be set aside. But if there was a proper cause, one cannot justify release solely on the absence of trial-related grounds.[2]

What the Dlamini Court did not decide was whether such crimes and dangers as might be entailed by release had to have any bearing upon the offence, or the conduct of the case, in respect of which the bail applicant had been arrested. It is submitted that this should be so. Otherwise a person thought to be a dangerous criminal or a recidivist may be incarcerated without trial as long as any arrest for any offence would be justified. Surely such a course of conduct would indeed be detention without trial, and would violate the presumption of innocence?[3]

The Dlamini Court 'reluctantly' accepted the constitutionality of taking into account, in deciding upon bail, the vigilante's veto (the relevance of, broadly speaking, the public reaction to a bail decision) introduced by s (4)(e) and 60(8A) of s 60 of the Code as amended by Act 85 of 1997. The Court found these subsections to be justified limitations under FC s 36(1), mainly because 'it would be irresponsible to ignore the harsh reality of the society in which the Constitution [was] to operate'.[4] This finding, coupled with the rider that

[1] S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC)('Dlamini').

[2] Dlamini (supra) at para 53.

[3] See, eg, Stack v Boyle 342 US 1 (1951); United States v Salerno 481 US 739 (1987)(Minority decision). Contrast the majority decision in Salerno and the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Morales [1992] 3 SCR 711, 12 CRR 2d 31. Morales is cited by Kriegler J in Dlamini. Dlamini (supra) at paras 71 and 72. But note the basis in Salerno for allowing possible criminality to feature as a factor: the state bore a heavy onus to establish 'clear and convincing evidence'. See also the rider accepted in Morales — the denial of bail must be necessary to promote the proper functioning of the bail system and not be undertaken for any purpose extraneous to the bail system. Morales (supra) at 48. Since Morales, section 515(1)(c) of the Canadian Code introduced the possibility of denying bail to 'maintain confidence in the administration of justice'. The argument that this violated the unconstitutionality of extraneous factors was rejected in R v Hall [2003] 2 SCR 309.

[4] Bate (supra) at paras 55-56.

democratic societies would find these subsections 'reasonable and justifiable in the prevailing climate in our country',[1] came very close to a finding that FC s 36(1) might operate as a quasi-emergency provision that would justify a statutory provision the one day, but not necessarily the next, depending on the vicissitudes in the harshness of realities on the ground.[2] Be that as it may, there would seem to be very little scope left for an argument that the Final Constitution directs that certain considerations should not feature at bail applications. One might have thought that, when passion was at its highest, principle should stand at its most firm.[3]

It follows from this finding that the formula — 'the interests of justice' — bears a wide meaning.[4] One cannot argue anymore, it seems, that whether certain people are intent on killing the applicant or raising a riot has nothing to do with the interests of justice relevant to the bail decision.[5] Kriegler J pointed to the unfortunate use of the phrase 'the interests of justice' in s 60 of the Code to mean, at times, all the relevant considerations pertaining to a bail decision, and at other times, those factors within the broader question that are to be weighed against the liberty interest of the applicant.[6] The Constitutional Court has now

[1] Bate (supra) at para 55.

[2] The definition of a 'prevailing climate' may upset the certainty inherent in decisions such as S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC). When does a climate change sufficiently for a different application of FC s 36 to a statutory provision?

[3] The court found that '[e]xperience [had] shown that organized community violence, be it instigated by quasi-political motives or by territorial battles for control of communities for commercial purposes, [did] subside while ringleaders [were] in custody'. The fact that pre-trial detention was inherently temporary and followed upon a judicial determination was a source of comfort, there being 'a close relationship and appropriate fit between the temporary withholding of liberty and the disruption that release would unleash'. Dlamini (supra) at para 56. Kriegler J expressed what is respectfully submitted to have been a sanguine confidence that '[c]ourts [would] no doubt be alive to the danger of public sentiment being orchestrated by pressure groups to serve their own ends'. Ibid at para 56.

[4] See S v Tshabalala 1998 (2) SACR 259, 272C (C).

[5] It appears as if the community reaction indeed did not form part of the 'interests of justice' under FC s 35(1)(f), although its invocation by the legislation was saved from unconstitutionality by the limitation provision. See Dlamini (supra) at para 55. The use of the qualification 'ordinarily' obscured this finding somewhat: 'Ordinarily, the factors listed in s 60(4)(e) and (8A) would not be relevant in establishing whether the interests of justice permit the release of the accused. It would be disturbing that an individual's legitimate interests should so invasively be subjected to societal interests. It is indeed even more disturbing where the two provisions do not postulate that the likelihood of public disorder should in any way be laid at the door of the accused. The mere likelihood of such disorder independently of any influence on the part of the accused, would suffice. Nevertheless, . . . [the subsections are saved by FC s 36(1)].' In other words, the shift of attention on to the community heralded by the amendments to the bail provisions violated FC s 35(1)(f), but justifiably so. Ibid at para 14.

[6] Bate (supra) at paras 47-48.

authoritatively given its blessing to the codification of the 'interests of justice' that is to be found in subsecs (4), (9) and (10) of s 60 of the Code.[1]

In S v Mbolombo, a bail amount was set which would be justified only on the assumption that the applicant was indeed guilty of the crime in question.[2] Whether the applicant was able to afford the R50 000 bail depended upon whether he had taken part in the robbery of a large sum of money. The Cape Provincial Division pointed out that bail proceedings were investigatory, or inquisitorial, in nature ('ondersoekend van aard') — thus rendering hearsay evidence admissible to enable the court to take all factors into consideration[3] — that action upon the risk of guilt informed the very detention of suspects in the first place, and that the possibility that guilt would render a small bail amount absurdly inappropriate could simply not be ignored ('kan tog nie weggedink word nie').[4]

The reference to the 'inquisitorial' nature of bail proceedings introduces the vexed problem of onus.[5] The onus at common law to show why release on bail should be granted lay on the applicant.[6] An important question faced by a number of courts was whether the wording of IC s 25(2)(d), laying down a right to be released 'unless the interests of justice require otherwise', shifted the onus to the state.[7] Magano & Another v District Magistrate, Johannesburg, & Others (1)[8] decided that it had, and so did Southwood J in the minority judgment in Ellish & Andere v Prokureur-Generaal, Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling.[9] The majority in Ellish, however, as well as Eloff JP in Prokureur-Generaal van die Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling v Van Heerden & Andere,[10] decided that there was no such onus placed on the state.[11] The state bore an evidentiary burden, and the proceedings, being

[1] It found that subsec (4), directing when a refusal of bail shall be in the interests of justice, did not interfere with the independence of the judicial determination of the interests of justice in any given case. The court held that the open-ended nature of the factors to be considered in deciding whether a ground in subsec (4) had been established rendered subsec (4) 'permissive', and meant it was not a deeming provision. Ibid at paras 42-44. With respect, it may be objected that the fact that a court is entitled to employ any criteria it pleases in deciding whether one of the grounds in subsec (4) is present can hardly mean it is not obliged by subsec (4), as a matter of law, to regard detention as 'in the interests of justice' once it has concluded, as a matter of fact, that such a ground is indeed present.

[2] 1995 (5) BCLR 614 (C).

[3] Ibid at 616.

[4] Ibid at 617.

[5] See § 51.3*(e)* supra.

[6] See Perkins v R 1934 NPD; Leibman v Attorney-General 1950 (1) SA 607, 611 (W); R v Grigoriou 1953 (1) SA 479 (T); S v Nichas & Another 1977 (1) SA 257 (C); S v Hlongwa 1979 (4) SA 112 (D); S v Mataboge 1991 (1) SACR 539 (B); S v Acheson 1991 (2) SA 805 (Nm); Du Toit et al Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2006) § 60.

[7] See Nieuwoudt & Andere v Prokureur-Generaal van die Oos-Kaap 1996 (3) BCLR 340 (SE)(Court found that formulation of a charge-sheet on 27 September 1995 resulted in the onus being placed upon the applicants to show that they should be released on bail.)

[8] 1994 (4) SA 169 (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 125 (W).

[9] 1994 (4) SA 835 (W), 1994 (5) BCLR 1 (W).

[10] 1994 (2) SACR 469 (W).

[11] See Bolofo & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions 1997 (8) BCLR 1135, 1143ff (Lesotho CA).

inquisitorial, entailed no onus in the real sense of the word. The difficulty that this position entailed for a determination when the probabilities were evenly balanced, or when it could not be said with any degree of satisfaction which way they pointed, was persuasively expounded in the minority judgment in Ellish. The attempt of Edeling J in Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi[1] to reconcile the undeniable force of Southwood J's reasoning[2] with the theory that there was no onus proper in 'inquisitorial' bail applications[3] illustrated the very real conceptual difficulties inherent in the governing approach.[4] Leveson J's remark in S v Mbele & Another[5] that he was 'unable to perceive any mystical significance in the word [ie "unless"]' cannot be comfortably reconciled with the judgment of the Constitutional Court in S v Coetzee that the use of 'unless' in a statute was sufficient for a violation of the presumption of innocence.[6] Although Marcus AJ regarded himself as bound by Ellish in S v Letaoana,[7] the learned judge relied upon the changed wording of the clause referring to the interpretation of the common law under the Final Constitution to imply, without considering it necessary to decide, that Ellish did not 'promote' the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[8] At the very least, Marcus AJ's pertinent digression indicated that Ellish stood to be reconsidered concerning its adherence to the principles of due process.

The pertinent question under the Final Constitution is whether the change in wording heralded by FC s 35(1)(f), an alteration which appeared without qualifying reservations for the first time in the draft of 15 April 1996, can be said to have made any difference. The arrested person is entitled to release 'if the interests of justice permit'. Two questions need to be asked: Does this place an onus on the applicant? Is placing an onus on the applicant unconstitutional?

The Constitutional Court declined to answer these questions in First Certification Judgment.[9] The challenge to the bail provision, based on the onus it was said to place on the applicant, was rejected in a single paragraph as having 'no merit'. The only ground for denying certification to the clause would be if it failed to recognize a 'universally accepted fundamental right', and the right to bail was not universally formulated.

[1] 1996 (11) BCLR 1514 (O).

[2] Having accepted the prima facie right of the applicant to be released as its starting point ('uitgangspunt'), the court pointed out that it went without saying ('spreek vanself') that, where the person opposing bail did not succeed in convincing a court that justice required detention, release was to be ordered and that in that sense there was indeed an onus on the state. Ibid at 1523-24.

[3] Ibid at 1526-27.

[4] Ibid at 1528. The learned judge could not agree with the finding in S v Mbele & Another. 1996 (1) SACR 212 (W)(IC s 25(2)(d) had nothing to do with onus.)

[5] 1996 (1) SACR 212, 215 (W).

[6] 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC). Admittedly the provision in Coetzee included the term 'proved'.

[7] 1997 (11) BCLR 1581, 1590 (W).

[8] Ibid at 1590-91.

[9] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: in re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 88.

If the onus is placed on the applicant, it is a lamentable inversion of the ordinarily operative presumption in favour of liberty in the sphere closest to its core. The discussion in United States v Salerno was premised upon the constitutional necessity of requiring the state to prove the applicability of the grounds for refusing bail.[1] Section 11*(e)* of the Canadian Charter grants the right 'not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause'.[2] The formulation in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (art 9(3)) reads '… it shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial'. Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi[3] regarded the placing of an onus on a bail applicant as something for which there was 'no place' in the new democratic constitutional order. The court in S v Tshabalala[4] disagreed. Comrie J obiter regarded FC s 35(1)(f) as allowing 'Parliament to enact bail legislation which [cast] an onus or burden of proof or persuasion on the arrestee in appropriate circumstances'.[5] Canadian authority[6] was invoked as a fortiori substantiation that the constitutional standard in Canada is 'more generous to an arrestee than our own s 35(1)(f)'.[7]

The Constitutional Court in Dlamini decisively 'harmonized' FC s 35(1)(f) with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act ('the Code')[8] regulating bail. It held that s 60(1)(a) of the Code, which entitled a bail applicant to be released unless it was found that it was in the interests of justice that the applicant be detained, favoured 'liberty more than the minimum required by the Constitution'.[9] The Court recognied that the new constitutional bail provision is less generous than the old and that the old formulation reflected the more generous provision found in s 60(1)(a) of the Code. The 'non-fit' between the default position in s 60(1)(a) of the Code and the new constitutional provision was problematic

[1] 481 US 739 (1987).

[2] Nevertheless, the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Pearson upheld the constitutionality of a provision requiring those accused of drug trafficking to show cause why their detention was not justified. [1992] 3 SCR 665, (1993) 12 CRR 2d 1 ('Pearson'). The Canadian Supreme Court reasoned that the statute itself amounted to a denial of bail, and then proceeded to find that such denial was for 'just cause' in the circumstances, given the ease and frequency with which drug traffickers undermined the bail system. It is submitted that it is at least arguable that s 11*(e)* required the 'just cause' question to be asked at every bail hearing, which logically required an onus upon the prosecution. But see the similar reasoning applied in R v Morales [1992] 3 SCR 711, (1993) 12 CRR 2d 31 in the context of a person accused of committing a crime while on bail. Note the considerations regarded as 'vital' in Pearson and Morales: (1) that bail be denied only in very narrow circumstances; (2) that the denial of bail be necessary to promote the proper functioning of the bail system and not be undertaken for any purpose extraneous to the bail system. Morales (supra) at 20 and 48. Since Morales, section 515(1)(c) of the Canadian Code introduced the possibility of denying bail to 'maintain confidence in the administration of justice'. The argument that this violated the unconstitutionality of extraneous factors was rejected in R v Hall [2003] 2 SCR 309.

[3] 1996 (11) BCLR 1514, 1531 (O).

[4] 1998 (2) SACR 259 (C).

[5] Ibid at 274C-D.

[6] Pearson (supra); Morales (supra).

[7] Morales (supra) at 274E.

[8] Act 51 of 1977 as amended by Act 85 of 1997.

[9] Dlamini (supra) at para 38.

> because the default position changed: whereas previously the starting point was that an arrestee was entitled to be released, the position under s 35(1)(f) is more neutral. Now, unless there is sufficient material to establish that the interests of justice do permit the detainee's release, his or her detention continues.[1]

Despite Kriegler J's Pilatean attempt to avoid the debate, the above paragraph lapses into the miasma of onus discourse.[2] Kriegler J did, however, make it clear that an onus upon the accused was not precluded by FC s 35(1)(f).[3] In fact, his 'default position' language in effect established that FC s 35(1)(f) envisages an onus upon the applicant.[4]

The following propositions emerged from the judgment in Dlamini:

1. The Code and FC s 35(1)(f) must be read together, as a harmonious whole, sanctioned by the Final Constitution.
2. The constitutional provision is 'more neutral' than s 60(1)(a) of the Code, but entails the 'default position' of continued detention.[5]
3. Section 60(1)(a) of the Code (applying to all offences except the serious and the very serious found in Schedules 5 and 6 respectively) 'favours liberty more' than does the 'minimum' required by the constitutional provision.[6]
4. Section 60(11)(a) and (b) (relating to very serious and serious offences respectively) entail a 'formal onus' upon the applicant.[7]
5. There is nothing unconstitutional about an onus on the applicant as such.[8]
6. Section 60(11)(a), requiring something more ('exceptional circumstances') than the constitutional standard ('the interests of justice') before release would be allowed, violates FC s 35(1)(f),[9] but is justifiable under FC s 36(1).[10]
7. The 'public outrage' provisions are saved from unconstitutionality because they entail an onus (upon the state) to 'establish a likelihood' of their applicability.[11]
8. The 'exceptional circumstances' to be proved by an accused under s 60(11)(a) and the 'formal onus' upon an accused laid down by s 60(11)(b) both relate to proof of the applicability of the codified incidents of the 'interests of justice' found in subsections (4)–(9) of s 60 of the Code, and 'exceptional circumstances' include an 'exceptional degree' of applicability.[12]

[1] Dlamini (supra) at para 45.
[2] Ibid at para 45 n74 (Kriegler J accepted that subsec (11) of the Code did indeed cast an onus upon an applicant in respect of the two categories of serious and very serious offences to which it related. The Court also found that 'a formal onus rests on a detainee to "satisfy the court"'. Ibid at para 61.)
[3] Ibid at para 78.
[4] Ibid para 5 n13 ('Under s 35(1)(f), of course, there is no release unless the interests of justice permit it'; and at para 41, '[FC] s 35(1)(f) . . . required something positive to permit release.')
[5] Ibid at paras 5, 41 and 45.
[6] Ibid at para 38.
[7] Ibid at para 61.
[8] Ibid at para 78.
[9] Ibid at para 64.
[10] Ibid at paras 66-77.
[11] Ibid at para 53.
[12] Ibid at paras 76 and 65.

Three questions require serious attention.

(i) Can the state rely on FC s 35(1)(f) as an overall standard that trumps s 60(1)(a) of the Code in cases not dealing with serious offences?
(ii) How are propositions 7 and 8 above to be reconciled?
(iii) If it is true that 'exceptional circumstances' do not necessarily mean something 'above and beyond, and generically different from those enumerated',[1] then why did this test violate FC s 35(1)(f) and require justification under FC s 36?

As far as the first question is concerned, the answer must be 'no'. The key lies in the reference by Kriegler J to a 'minimum' standard.[2] Although one may argue that if IC s 25(2)(d) could not cast an onus upon the state it is odd to find that the similarly worded s 60(1)(a) of the Code does so. However, it can be stated with some confidence that s 60(1)(a) of the Code does indeed cast an onus upon the state.[3] This standard, as Kriegler J pointed out, goes further than the 'minimum' required by FC s 35(1)(f). Section 35(1)(f), being a right, and not a bail test, to apply irrespective of legislation, sets out the minimum entitlement of a bail applicant. The Code simply allows an applicant more than the minimum in cases not concerned with the serious offences of Schedule 5 and the very serious offences of Schedule 6.[4]

The second question is far more difficult to resolve, and entails grave practical problems. If such grounds as require 'likelihoods' must be established on the probabilities by the state, and if these same grounds are the factors constituting 'the interests of justice' in respect of which an applicant bears a 'formal onus' under s 60(11)(a) and (b) of the Code, how does one decide what the 'default position' is in respect of the existence of such grounds? The presence or absence of 'exceptional circumstances' is perhaps an easier question to decide in this regard. If what the applicant adduces is not 'exceptional' in some way or another, then he or she remains in custody. But what of s 60(11)(b)? The problem is particularly vexing because some of the provisions in subsecs (4) and (8A) were saved from unconstitutionality by FC s 36 only because they (also) placed an onus upon the state. If s 60(11)(b) were to be applied so as to require the applicant to negate these grounds, then the reasoning relating to the constitutionality of these grounds would be undermined. All the platitudes about the 'inquisitorial' nature of bail proceedings, and all the clichés about the 'inappropriateness' of questions relating

[1] Dlamini (supra) at para 76.
[2] Ibid at para 38.
[3] See S v Vermaas 1996 (1) SACR 528, 530 (T); S v Tshabalala 1998 (2) SACR 259, 269 (C)('Tshabalala').
[4] But see Tshabalala (supra) at 274A-C (Court regards FC s 35(1)(f) as an overall standard to be invoked 'in every decision allowing or refusing bail'. This approach would allow the state to invoke its default position against the dictates of s 60(1)(a).)

to onus, will not lend coherence to the onus (or 'default') puzzle inherent in s 60 of the Code.[1]

The third question cannot be answered with any satisfaction. Time and precedent will have to build a workable and conceptually acceptable relationship between the 'ordinary' criteria and 'exceptional circumstances'.[2]

The bail provisions newly introduced into the Code[3] survived a number of constitutional attacks in Dlamini. The 'exceptional circumstances' requirement in cases involving the most serious charges was justified under FC s 36(1). First, the extraordinary crime situation was mentioned, with a note of caution that 'one must be careful to ensure that the alarming level of crime is not used to justify extensive and inappropriate invasions of individual rights'.[4] Then the situations in which bail was denied in the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and Australia were explored.[5] In this regard it is notable that the United Kingdom provisions require demonstration of a relevant danger by the state, that the United States provision allows bail to be denied in certain capital cases 'where the proof is evident or the presumption great', and that the Canadian allowance for an onus on the accused in serious drug cases was made subject to the finding that this was 'necessary to promote the proper functioning of the bail system'.[6] The Australian reverse presumption in serious cases was perhaps the closest to our own. The Court concluded that bail was limited in open and democratic societies, and that the limitation in s 60(11)(a) might be more invasive than the comparative limitations.[7] Kriegler J accepted that the 'exceptional circumstances' test retained a flexibility to allow a decision to be tailored to the requirements of a case, and dismissed an objection that the test was unconstitutionally vague.[8] The fact of ultimate judicial control was essentially what saved the 'exceptional circumstances' test under FC s 36.

[1] It is not entirely clear what the Dlamini Court meant when it said that it went without saying that the following did not apply to applications struck by s 60(11). See Dlamini (supra) at para 49 n 80 ('In deciding whether the interests of justice permit the release on bail of an awaiting trial prisoner, the court is advised to look to the five broad considerations mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) of subsection (4), as detailed in the succeeding subsections. And then it has to do the final weighing up of factors for and against bail as required by subsections (9) and (10).')

[2] See S v Coetzee 1998 (2) SACR 721 (C). Coetzee held that if s 60(11)(a) meant that someone who could establish the ordinary criteria for release on bail did not pass the test, then there were serious reservations about the constitutionality of the test. Perhaps the finding that the applicant could with crystal clarity — 'klinkklaar' — establish the ordinary criteria) was the finding Kriegler J had in mind. See Coetzee (supra) at 723G and 726A. But the finding that the legislature could not have intended something additional to the ordinary criteria to be required can, like Kriegler J's finding — Dlamini (supra) at para 76 — not be reconciled with Kriegler J's finding — Dlamini (supra) at para 64 — that the test violated s 35(1)(f) because it required something more than the constitutional norm codified in subsections (4)-(9) of s 60 of the Code.

[3] Act 85 of 1997.

[4] Dlamini (supra) at para 68.

[5] Ibid at paras 70-73.

[6] See Pearson (supra) at 20; Morales (supra) at 48.

[7] Dlamini (supra) at para 73.

[8] Ibid at paras 74-76.

Another attack concerned the combined effect of s 60(11)(a), 60(14) and 60(11B)(c) of the Code. Section 60(14) deprives the bail applicant of a right of access to the docket such as would be enjoyed under FC s 35(3)(a) for the purposes of trial. Section 60(11B)(c) renders the record of the bail proceedings admissible at the criminal trial. As far as s 60(14) and 60(11)(a) together were concerned, the court found as follows: first, s 60(14) did not do violence to the decision in Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another,[1] which established the right to 'docket access' of an accused at trial under IC s 25(3), now FC s 35(3)(a).[2] Kriegler J wrote:

> The judgment makes it clear (in paragraph 56) that disclosure of material in the police docket depends, among others, on the timing of the request, and that the risk of interference with the investigation is a factor to be weighed. The judgment in Shabalala is no authority for the proposition that applicants for bail, or their legal representatives, are entitled to access to the police docket. The case was concerned with the trial and what is fair in relation thereto. It had nothing to do with bail.[3]

Second, the accused faced with the task of satisfying the court of 'exceptional circumstances', or that the interests of justice permitted release, had to be given a 'reasonable opportunity' of doing so, as stipulated in s 60(11) of the Code. So, 'a prosecutor [might] have to be ordered by the court, under sub-s (11), to lift the veil in order to afford the arrestee the reasonable opportunity prescribed there'.[4] Hence, s 60(14) had to be read to be subject to such duty of revelation as might be required to afford the applicant the 'reasonable opportunity' to discharge the burden in cases of serious offences.[5] But there was no general access right corresponding to the right at trial recognized in Shabalala.[6]

The attack on the combined effect of s 60(11)(a) and s 60(11B)(c) was captured neatly in the rhetorical question posed by Slomowitz AJ in the court a quo in S v Schietekat: 'Is it by fashioning this weapon that those who would seek their liberty are to be discouraged from asking for it?'[7]

This court elaborated upon this point as follows:

[1] 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC)('Shabalala').
[2] See § 51.5*(c)* infra.
[3] Shabalala (supra) at para 82.
[4] Ibid at para 84.
[5] See Nieuwoudt & Andere v Prokureur-Generaal van die Oos-Kaap 1996 (3) BCLR 340 (SE)(Court held that because the strength of the state's case was relevant at bail proceedings, an applicant for bail, under IC s 23, was entitled to access to the docket, and that the right to access was particularly important where there was an onus on the accused.) See § 51.5*(c)* infra. Nieuwoudt must now be read subject to the finding in Dlamini.
[6] Shabalala (supra) at paras 84–85.
[7] 1999 (2) BCLR 240, 248F (C).

> The accused is entitled to a reasonable opportunity to make out a case; without the testimony of the accused there is no hope of proving the requisite exceptional circumstances, especially as there is no access to the information in the police docket, and such testimony may be used against the accused at trial. In many cases such circumstances add up to compulsion on an accused to testify.[1]

The Constitutional Court's response was to uphold s 60(11B)(c) on an independent analysis of its self-incrimination and silence implications, rather than to entertain the rhetorical question from the point of view of FC s 35(1)(f). Hence this aspect of the judgment is discussed in the section on self-incrimination at trial.[2]

The most jurisprudentially noteworthy point about the Constitutional Court's bail judgment in Dlamini was its treatment of the presumption of innocence. Although the court found that the 'basic objective' of the institution of bail was to 'maximize personal liberty',[3] its dismissal of objections to placing an onus on the applicant was essentially founded on the unexpressed premise that the presumption of innocence had to do with the determination of guilt, not with the protection of liberty. Kriegler J later declared:

> This Court has in the past unhesitatingly struck down provisions that created a reverse onus carrying the risk of conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt; but what we have here is not a reverse onus of that kind. Here there is no risk of a wrong conviction, the objection that lies at the root of the unacceptability of reverse onuses. All that the subsection does in this regard, is to place on an accused, in whose knowledge the relevant factors lie, an onus to establish them in a special kind of interlocutory proceeding not geared to arriving at factual conclusions but designed to make informed prognoses.[4]

This argument, with respect, ignores the fact that the presumption of innocence is but an incident of the presumption in favour of liberty, and is sacred only because liberty is sacred. We are concerned about dubious convictions because they entail unjustified deprivations of liberty, and we proclaim someone innocent until proved guilty because we demand justification for a deprivation of liberty, not because we have qualms about using the term 'guilty' without adequate justification.

The relationship between the bail right and the right to liberty led the courts at common law to recognize the need to allow bail applications at all hours as a matter of urgency. The court in Twayie & 'n Ander v Minister van Justisie & 'n Ander declared:

> Elke verhoorafwagtende is 'n potensiële onskuldige, en onnodige inperking van die burger se vryheid druis teen alle beskaafde gevoel in … Teen die agtergrond van hierdie algemene beginsels sal al bevredigende antwoord wees dat beide die Hooggeregshof sowel as die

[1] Schietekat (supra) at para 89.
[2] See § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra.
[3] Dlamini (supra) at para 6.
[4] Ibid at paras 11 and 78.

> laerhowe 'n gearresteerde, wat hom oor sy arrestasie beswaard voel, te enige tyd, op sy aansoek, sal aanhoor en dit wel uit hoofde van voormelde artikel 60 [of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 before amendment] ten einde die werking van hierdie artikel ten volle effektief te maak.[1]

The new s 50(6)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Act introduced by Act 85 of 1997 decrees bluntly:

> An arrested person contemplated in paragraph (a)(i) [arrested for allegedly committing an offence] is not entitled to be brought to court outside ordinary court hours.

What value liberty?[2]

Magistrate, Stutterheim v Mashiya was one of those cases that obviously entailed dimensions only hinted at in the report.[3] The respondent had been accused of raping his daughter. He was arrested on Saturday and appeared on Monday, when he applied for bail. The state applied for the seven-day postponement that it was possible to obtain in terms of s 50(1)(b) of the Code. The state's application was refused, and the matter was argued on the Tuesday. The matter was then postponed, for nine days, 'for judgment'. There ensued attempts to have the judgment delivered earlier, which culminated in an application to the High Court for a mandamus (after a rule nisi had been issued) that the matter be 'argued' and judgment be handed down by 16.00 of the day of the mandamus. The matter duly commenced on the day ordered by the mandamus, was argued, but there was no judgment. The matter was postponed, again to the originally intended postponed day, for what was promised to be a 'well-considered judgment'.[4] Further proceedings, including contempt proceedings, ensued, and the respondent was ultimately granted bail by the High Court pending the well-considered judgment of the court below. The Supreme Court of Appeal was careful, whilst affirming the entitlement of a bail applicant to a 'prompt decision one way or another', not to lay down any rule as to what such promptness would require. Indeed, the rigid time-frame decreed by the High Court was held in the circumstances not to have been justified precisely because of its rigidity.[5]

[1] 1986 (2) SA 101, 104E–F (O).

[2] See also Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi 1996 (11) BCLR 1514, 1519-20 (O)(Court holds bail appeals to be prima facie urgent, in spite of acknowledgement that, in the case of appeals, bail had already been judicially considered.) See also Garces v Fouche & Others 1998 (9) BCLR 1098, 1104-05 (Nm)('Garces')(Namibian High Court entrenched an arrested person's right to bring a bail application outside normal court hours in cases of urgency. Hannah J remarked pertinently: 'What is of importance is that we are dealing with the liberty of the individual'. He did, however, stress that 'real grounds for urgency [had to] exist before a court [would] hear a bail application outside normal court hours'. The recognition that the unavailability of prosecutors after hours should not preclude the determination of bail applications was particularly welcome.)

[3] 2004 (5) SA 209 (SCA).

[4] Ibid at para 6.

[5] Ibid at paras 16-25. Several observations left little room for doubt that the Court found it hard to believe that the well-considered judgment required so long to be delivered in the instant case. Ibid at para 17.

51.5 The Rights of Accused Persons

(a) Introduction

In order to distinguish an accused person from an arrested person, the former has to be regarded as someone who has been formally charged with an offence.[1] The fact that pre-charge occurrences are relevant to a determination whether an accused's rights have been violated should not confuse matters.

(b) The right to a fair trial

The fair trial right is expressly set out as a residual right which includes, but is not limited to, the enumerated fair trial rights in FC s 35(3).[2] The Appellate Division in S v Rudman & Another[3] held held that the exhaustive extent of the common-law right to a fair trial was a determination 'whether there ha[d] been an irregularity or illegality', ie 'a departure from the formalities, rules, and principles of procedure according to which our law require[d] a criminal trial to be initiated or conducted'. This view left no room for a residual fair trial right. However, Rudman has been decisively overruled by the creation of a residual fair trial right.[4] In S v Ramuongiwa[5] Noorbhai J said that '[a]bstract notions of fairness and justice' were now the 'acid test' and that Khanyile had been 'resuscitated', infusing and giving 'flesh and bone to the right to a "fair trial" '.[6] In S v Mazingane the High Court observed that the right to a fair trial included no fewer than fifteen rights relating to the procedure and process of a trial, but that it was also broader than this: it had been extended to 'substantive fairness' or a residual fair trial right.[7]

The existence of a residual fair trial right must surely go without saying. How it is to be 'given flesh and bone' is a difficult question.[8] The first conceptual problem is the question whether the fact that the right to a fair trial 'is broader than the list of specific rights set out' below it[9] means:

1. There are unenumerated aspects of a fair trial to be added to the rights set out in FC s 35(3), but the enumerated rights themselves determine their own extension, or

[1] See § 51.2 supra. If arrest is detention with the purpose of charging — 'vryheidsontneming met die doel om aan te kla' — then it can hardly be coextensive with charging itself. See Hiemstra Suid-Afrikaanse Strafproses (5th Edition, 1993) 87.

[2] See § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra.

[3] 1992 (1) SA 343 (A).

[4] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma') at para 16.

[5] 1997 (2) BCLR 268, 272 (V).

[6] On the relationship between the common law and the due process rights, see § 51.1*(b)*(iii) supra.

[7] 2002 (6) BCLR 634, 637 (W).

[8] On the problem of accommodating state interests in the definition of the right to a fair trial, see § 51.1*(b)*(iv) supra.

[9] Zuma (supra) at para 16.

2. There are unenumerated aspects of a fair trial to be added to the rights set out in FC s 35(3), and the residual fair trial principle operates also within the interpretation of the extension of the specifically enumerated rights themselves.

In Nel v Le Roux NO & Others[1] the Constitutional Court decided that the 'trial' referred to in the right not to be detained 'without trial' did not incorporate all the aspects of a fair trial set out in IC s 25(3), but incorporated minimum 'due process' and 'natural justice' principles only.[2] The pertinent question, therefore, is whether this is to be taken to mean not only that the fair trial rights in FC s 35(3) extend further than the minimum requirements of due process and natural justice but also that the residual fair trial right, operating either in a sphere outside the spheres occupied by the specifically enumerated rights or operating in such a sphere as well as in the extension of the specifically enumerated rights themselves, should be interpreted and developed as 'due process and something more', given the reasoning in Nel. If this latter be the case, due process jurisprudence would indeed be relevant to an interpretation of the right to a fair trial, a fortiori to indicate what the right to a fair trial always embraces.[3]

What guidance does one find in the case law regarding the two alternatives set out above? Peter Hogg, writing of the residual operation of the principles of fundamental justice in Canada, where it has been held that these principles have generic status and that the fair trial and due process rights enumerated in the Charter are but 'illustrative' of the generic due process principle,[4] argues that the enumerated rights consequently operate as an eiusdem generis limitation upon the scope of the principles of fundamental justice.[5] This argument is partly motivated by a desire to avoid unlimited and undefined operation of the principles of fundamental justice, and partly by a desire to avoid rendering the specific provisions otiose by allowing vague principles to determine the extension of rights contained in relatively precisely framed clauses.[6]

This reasoning, however, was directly contradicted by the reasoning in S v Nombewu[7] and in Coetzee & Others v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others.[8] In Coetzee the Durban and Coast Local Division declared that the enumerated rights in FC s 35(3) 'should … be interpreted as extending the ambit of the main

[1] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel').

[2] See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) § 40.4*(c). See also § 51.1(a)* supra.

[3] On the 'due process wall', see § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra.

[4] On Re BC Motor Vehicle Act [1985] 2 SCR 486, 502f, see § 51.1*(a)*(ii) supra.

[5] P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992; 1996 supplement) § 44.10*(a)*.

[6] Hogg's argument that the operation of the residual right leads to palm-tree justice and a poverty of principle may be a useful caveat for invocations of the ad hoc and 'flexible' nature of the right to a fair trial. See § 51.1*(b)*(ii) supra.

[7] 1996 (12) BCLR 1635 (E), 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E)('Nombewu').

[8] 1997 (1) SACR 546 (D), 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D).

provision rather than restricting it'.[1] In Nombewu Erasmus J read the specific right to counsel enumerated in IC s 25(1)(c) in effect as being limited by the residual fair trial right in IC s 25(3). The specific right could not be read in isolation, but had to be read 'as determined by the concept of a "fair trial" ', which meant that an apparent infraction of the specific right was not an infraction when read 'with' the residual right.[2] In S v Msenti Snyders J in effect rendered the specific wording of an enumerated right irrelevant, given the overriding importance of 'fairness' in FC s 35 analysis.[3] The learned judge held that the alteration in the wording of a specific right could not have altered its relationship with substantive fairness, since '[FC s 35 was] essentially the same as [IC s 25]'.[4] These decisions, in different ways, conflict with Hogg's argument that the specific rights limit the ambit of the general right.

In Scagell & Others v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others[5] the Constitutional Court interpreted the imposition of an evidential burden on an accused as a violation of the right to a fair trial, rather than of the presumption of innocence set out in IC s 25(3)(c).[6] Other courts have also had recourse to the residual fair trial right in situations where a specifically enumerated right was potentially applicable: S v Mbeje[7], S v Younas[8] and S v Dzukuda & Others; S v Tshilo.[9] The problem with recourse to the residual right in spheres at least prima facie governed by the specifically enumerated rights is that such an approach seriously undermines the development of a jurisprudence incrementally defining the scope of the specifically enumerated rights, and encourages facile and idle invocation of the residual right whenever a hard case arises on any one of the enumerated rights the sort of precipitate ('halsoorkop') invocation of the right to a fair trial that the Free

[1] Nombewu (supra) at 556E.

[2] See Nombewu (supra) at 1654. See also S v Simanaga 1998 (1) SACR 351, 353G-I (Ck).

[3] 1998 (3) BCLR 343 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 401 (W).

[4] Ibid at 347G I. Such reasoning renders all the enumerated rights otiose and reduces all FC s 35 analysis to assessment of 'substantive fairness'. See §51.5*(o)* infra.

[5] 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC).

[6] See § 51.1*(b)*(iv) supra.

[7] 1996 (2) SACR 252 (N)(Failure to allow an unrepresented accused to address the court before judgment as required by s 175(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 was analysed in terms of a general requirement to avoid prejudice to the accused, rather than as a potential violation of the right to adduce and challenge evidence under IC s 25(3)(d).)

[8] 1996 (2) SACR 272, 274 (C)(Failure by a court in proceedings under the Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993 to allow an accused to call a witness was analysed in terms of a denial of the 'fundamental right to a fair hearing', rather than in terms of the right to adduce and challenge evidence under IC s 25(3)(d) although the accused's desire to 'adduce the evidence of others' was specifically referred to by the court.)

[9] 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 443 (CC)(The court considered the constitutionality of s 52 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997, in terms of which an accused could be referred to the High Court for sentencing, with reference to the accused's right to a fair trial, rather than the right to a trial that began and concluded without unreasonable delay (FC s 35(3)(d))). See also S Jagwanth 'Recent Cases: Constitutional Application' (2001) 14 South African Journal for Criminal Law 122.

State Provincial Division decried in S v Strauss,[1] and the Transvaal Provincial Division in S v Vilakazi & 'n Ander[2].

The soundest practice would be to attempt to demarcate spheres of sovereignty for the specifically enumerated rights, in which spheres the applicability of the rights in question must be determined for any challenge by those principles which inform and justify the particular right. A fair trial challenge is therefore to be dissected by attributing aspects of the challenge to particular spheres of sovereignty of particular fair trial rights. If an aspect is fully covered by such a sphere, then a determination that the right in question is not violated exhausts the challenge as far as that particular aspect is concerned. There may be aspects which do not comfortably fit into any of the domains of the enumerated rights. In such a case the question should be entertained whether the challenge should not succeed on the residual fair trial right. Only if an analytically rigorous practice of defining domains of operation for the enumerated fair trial rights is successfully adopted can the residual fair trial right be given meaningful 'flesh and bones'. We should not allow the residual right to impoverish the jurisprudence of the specific rights as the favoured panacea of idle counsel.

One principle that has started to emerge as part of the domain of the residual fair trial right is the right of an unrepresented accused to the assistance of the court in conducting his or her defence.[3] Unfairly obtained evidence which is not accommodated under self-incrimination principles has been regarded from the point of view of the residual right to a fair trial.[4] Aspects of the trial that concern the course of evidence and its effect upon the fairness of the proceedings are most comfortably addressed in terms of the general notion of fairness. In

[1] 1995 (5) BCLR 623, 625 (O).

[2] 1996 (1) SACR 425 428 (T).

[3] See S v Kester 1996 (1) SACR 456 (N); S v Simxadi 1997 (1) SACR 128 (C); S v Mungoni 1997 (2) SACR (VH); S v N 1998 (1) BCLR 97 (Tk), 1997 (1) SACR 84 (Tk); S v Xaba 1997 (1) SACR 194 (W)(In which the principle could be said to have been extended to the accused defended by inexperienced counsel); S v Moilwa 1997 (1) SACR 188 (NC). In S v Malatji & Another 1998 (2) SACR 622 (W)(Cameron J held that an accused's rights had to be explained by the judicial officer through the interpreter, and not by the interpreter with no input from the judicial officer. The judgment was scathing of the conduct of the magistrate relative to the existence of fair trial rights and their explanation. FC s 35(3) was not expressly invoked.) See also S v Shiburi 2004 (2) SACR 314 (W)(The court held that there was a duty incumbent upon judicial officers to inform an unrepresented accused of his legal rights. These rights included the right to the docket or state witnesses' statements. In the instant case the accused was not advised of his right of access to the police docket and was consequently convicted in the court a quo. The Witwatersrand Local Division held this irregularity to be so fundamental as to vitiate the trial proceedings.)

[4] See Pillay & Others v S 2004 (2) BCLR 158 (SCA); D Ally 'Pillay and Others v S: Trial Fairness; the Doctrine of Discoverability; and the Concept of 'Detriment' — the Impact of the Canadian s 24(2) Provision on South African s 35(5) Jurisprudence' (2005) 1 South African Journal for Criminal Justice 66. See also S v M 2003 (1) SA 341 (SCA); Mitchell & Another v Hodes & Others NNO 2003 (1) SACR 524 (C) and N Whitear-Nel 'Evidence' (2003) 16 South African Journal for Criminal Justice 431. See also S v Nortjé 1997 (1) SA 90 (C); S v Hassen & Another 1997 (2) SA 253 (T), 1997 (3) BCLR 377 (T)(Both deal with trapping); S v Manuel 1997 (11) BCLR 1597 (C) at para 20 (Brand J relied upon the general right to a fair

S v Mhlakaza & Others[1] the court determined that the admissibility of identification evidence should be ruled upon before the accused should be required to decide whether to testify or not, because an accused was entitled to know the strength of the case against him or her before deciding whether to testify.[2]

The role of accuracy, or truth, in the determination of fairness is a problematic one. In the context of the exclusion of improperly obtained evidence, for example, courts across the common-law world, both within the operation of rights jurisprudence and outside it, have often determined 'fairness' as very much influenced by the cogency of the evidence in question.[3] Although the dictum of Froneman J in S v Melani & Others,[4] that the rights to counsel, to the presumption of innocence, to silence and to protection from compelled self-incrimination had nothing to do with ensuring the reliability of evidence adduced at trial, was too broadly stated, and has given rise to difficulties,[5] it represents an important caveat that the fairness of a trial should not be measured by its capacity to produce the trial to rule that a confession which had been obtained unfairly on a broader constitutional basis than not freely, voluntarily and without undue influence should not have been admitted. The accused, a juvenile, had been interviewed with his mother present, and then, his mother having been sent away, had been further interviewed until he agreed to confess. The finding upon the general fair trial right was not clearly necessary, given the fact that Brand J seemed to indicate that the circumstances had amounted to 'undue influence' of a special kind.) See, further, S v Khan 1997 (2) SACR 611 (SCA); Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & Another 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC) at para 13; Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 153 and 186; S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 16. Ibid at 618. In Khan the appellant, who was 19 years old at the time, had been arrested and warned of his right to silence before the Interim Constitution had come into effect. He had spontaneously confessed to murder and repeated this confession to a magistrate upon being asked to do so by the police after another caution. The magistrate took the confession after cautioning the appellant. At no stage was the appellant informed of his right to counsel under s 73(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. Howie JA held the right to counsel under IC s 25(1)(c) not to have been applicable at arrest. Khan (supra) at 618. The conduct in obtaining the confession, however, had been 'unfair'. Ibid at 620. Nevertheless, s 217 of the Criminal Procedure Act being concerned with fairness, and the conduct in question revealing 'none of the mischief against which s 217 [was] aimed', the 'factors which justif[ied] admission materially outweigh[ed] those which call[ed] for exclusion'. Ibid at 621.

[1] 1996 (6) BCLR 814 (C).

[2] A similar concern that the accused not be forced into the box by uncertainty about the admissibility of hearsay evidence was expressed by the Appellate Division in S v Ramavhale 1996 (1) SACR 639, 651 (A).

[3] See R v Wray [1971] SCR 272. The distinction between real and self-incriminatory evidence, which is so important in Canada, is influenced strongly by cogency considerations. See R v Collins [1987] 1 SCR 265; R v Burlingham [1995] 2 SCR 869. In England, s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 allows courts to exclude evidence if the admission would have 'such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it'. Reliability is an important factor in determining 'fairness'. R v Smurthwaite [1994] 1 All ER 898 (CA) and the House of Lords in R v Latif and Shahzad [1996] 1 WLR 104 (HL) attached perhaps decisive weight to the cogency of unlawfully obtained evidence in deciding that admission was not 'unfair'. Furthermore, there is the strong influence of the view that 'fairness' means 'fairness at the trial', and should be confined to prejudice in conducting the defence, or to questions of cogency. See the view of Lord Diplock in R v Sang [1980] AC 402 (HL). See also R v Christou and Wright [1992] QB 979.

[4] 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335, 348-9 (E).

[5] See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

truth.[1] The finding by Tshabalala J in S v Simanaga,[2] that the trial was fair because the accused was guilty, with respect, provides a stark illustration of the wrong approach.

Another principle that will cause more harm than good if employed as the governing principle in defining the right to a fair trial is the principle of equality. There is no doubt that equal protection concerns that all accused be afforded equal justice underlie some of the aspects of the right to a fair trial, particularly those dealing with a duty upon the state or the court to assist the accused by providing information or counsel or assistance throughout the conduct of the trial to ensure that accused persons are not disadvantaged in defending themselves because of inequality.[3]

Be that as it may, a concern for equal protection or equal justice for accused persons relative to other accused persons should not be conflated with the notion of 'equality of arms'. The latter term of art refers to the respective positions of defence and prosecution in a criminal trial.[4] 'Equality of arms' is a concrete right formulated by the European tribunals out of the residual fair trial right in art 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights:[5]

> The principle of the equality of arms . . . is an expression of the rule audi alteram partem, and implies that each party to the proceedings before a tribunal must be given a full opportunity to present his case, both on facts and in law, and to comment on the case presented by his opponent. This opportunity must be equal between the parties and limited only by the duty of the tribunal to prevent in any form an undue prolongation or delay of the proceedings.[6]

As Robertson and Merrills point out, the 'equality of arms' principle in criminal trials represents those procedural mechanisms with which the vast inequality in power between the state and the accused is sought to be addressed.[7] The use of the principle in the criminal sphere may have unfortunate consequences if the

[1] See DJ Galligan 'More Scepticism about Scepticism' (1988) 8 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 249; ME Frankel 'The Search for Truth: An Umpireal View' (1975) 123 University of Pennsylvania LR 1031; R Dworkin 'Policy, Principle, Procedure' CFH Tapper (ed) Crime, Proof, and Punishment (1981) 193. See also S v Mtyuda 1995 (5) BCLR 646, 651 (E); S v Zingilo 1995 (9) BCLR 1186 (O), S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106, 118F-G (C).

[2] 1998 (1) SACR 351, 353H-J (Ck)(Court rejects 'no-difference rule').

[3] See S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 105 (CC); S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC); S v Melani & Others 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335, 347 (E); Douglas v California 372 US 353 (1963); Griffin v Illinois 351 US 12 (1956); S v Ramuongiwa 1997 (2) BCLR 268 (V). See also § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[4] See Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 106.

[5] S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 43.

[6] JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 154-55.

[7] AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 95. Leading cases on 'equality of arms' include Unterpertinger v Austria (1986) 13 EHRR 434; Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 175.

'equality' notion is taken too literally: the tendency would be to think an accused should not be entitled to any procedural or evidential privileges to which the prosecution is not entitled, even though those privileges might well have been created to seek to 'equalize' the forces between prosecution and defence in the first place.[1]

An illustration of this phenomenon is provided by S v Chavulla & Andere.[2] Invoking the logic employed in S v Majavu,[3] that giving a 'proper meaning' to equality before the law required 'an equality before the law of both the accused and the state', Lategan J pondered whether an accused person should not be obliged to provide the state with previous inconsistent statements as a tit-for-tat for the right to 'docket access' enjoyed by an accused.[4] Such notions indicate vividly how concepts such as 'balancing' and 'equality' may wreak havoc with the right to a fair trial. Is the presumption of innocence then to be regarded as an unfair advantage to an accused?

Whatever the proper role of 'equality of arms', it has nothing to do with non-discrimination or equal protection. The journey into the fields of equality analysis undertaken in S v Scholtz[5] and S v Lavhengwa,[6] with the greatest respect, produced the sorts of confusion that fair trial analysis could very well do without. It is sincerely hoped that the following sober observation by Cameron J in the Lavhengwa will be heeded in future:

> I have some doubt as to whether an equality issue (from the point of view of the right to 'equality before the law') can really be said to arise when a presiding magistrate tries someone summarily on a charge of statutory contempt.[7]

The question of the appropriate remedy for a violation of the right to a fair trial is touched upon and discussed elsewhere.[8] In S v Shikunga the Namibian Supreme Court was confronted with the question as to what the effect of a violation of the right to a fair trial should be in a case where evidence had been admitted at trial and such admission was contrary to the right to a fair trial, but the conviction obtained was independent of the impugned evidence.[9] Mahomed CJ analysed the South African common-law approach and the constitutional approach adopted in [1] See the rejection of the applicant's claim in Blastland v United Kingdom (1986) 10 EHRR 528 that the use of hearsay evidence of third-party confessions by an accused should be allowed, given the state's ability to rely on the accused's own confessions.

[2] 1999 (1) SACR 39 (C)('Chavulla').

[3] 1994 (4) SACR 268 (Ck).

[4] Chavulla (supra) at 44I-45A.

[5] 1997 (1) BCLR 103 (NmS).

[6] 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W).

[7] Ibid at 496.

[8] See § 51.3*(g)* supra (Concerning the tendency to view the criminal procedure rights as exclusively concerned with whether evidence should be admitted or proceedings be proceeded with.) See also § 51.5*(f)* infra (Concerning the problematic relationship between right and remedy as far as the right to a trial within a reasonable time is concerned.)

[9] 1997 (9) BCLR 1321 (NmS).

other jurisdictions, most notably the development of a possibility of 'harmless constitutional error' in the United States. Mahomed CJ concluded that it might be a mistake to assume that the breach of every constitutional right would have the same consequence.[1] Even if this assumption was valid, the learned judge continued, that did not mean the consequence should be the setting aside of the conviction on appeal. He concluded:

> It would appear to me that the test that is proposed by our common law is adequate in relation to both constitutional and non-constitutional errors. Where the irregularity is so fundamental that it can be said that in effect there was no trial at all, the conviction should be set aside. Where one is dealing with an irregularity of a less severe nature then, depending on the impact of the irregularity on the verdict, the conviction should either stand or be substituted with an acquittal on the merits. Essentially the question … is whether the verdict has been tainted by such irregularity.[2]

In S v Mazingane, the High Court held that violations of the right to a fair trial had to be examined with reference to their causal impact on the verdict.[3] The impact had to be clearly of such a nature that it resulted in an unfair trial or a failure of justice before a convicted person would be entitled to have a conviction set aside purely by reason of an irregularity.[4] The question whether there had been a failure of justice was, in turn, dependent upon whether or not, when the effect of the irregularity was eliminated, there remained sufficient evidence for proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.[5] In S v Khan, Howie JA held as follows:

> Of course we are not dealing here … with unconstitutionally obtained evidence but it is just, I think, to adopt the same approach if evidence is unfairly obtained or said to have been unfairly obtained.[6]

The fact of a rights violation, if not justified under the limitations clause, should always entitle the victim to a remedy. This fact is independent of the question of what to do as far as the trial is concerned, although that question will often be the answer to the remedy problem.[7] A damages claim is always on the cards. It might not be too far-fetched to adjust the punishment a guilty person receives in [1] Shikunga (supra) at 1332G.

[2] Ibid at 1332H-I. This approach was endorsed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Smile & Another 1998 (5) BCLR 519 (SCA), 1998 (1) SACR 688 (SCA)('Smile').

[3] 2002 (6) BCLR 634 (W).

[4] Ibid at 365. See also S v Jaipal 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2005 (1) SACR 215 (CC).

[5] See Tshona & Others v Regional Magistrate, Uitenhage & Another 2001 (8) BCLR 860, 879 (E). See also S v Maputle & Another 2003 (2) SACR 15, 16 (SCA).

[6] 1997 (2) SACR 611, 619 (SCA).

[7] The failure of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Smile to distinguish clearly between the questions whether a right had been violated and what should be done about a rights violation essentially left the appellants without any remedies for what seemed at least to have been some violation of the right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge, in circumstances where it was held that the 'irregularity' did not merit the drastic response of setting aside the conviction.

accordance with the extent to which his or her constitutional rights were violated.[1] In this way violations might be treated as serious wrongs inflicted upon the person concerned without entailing the sometimes dubious consequence of completely absolving such a person of the liability to suffer punishment.[2] Of course, disciplinary proceedings for rights violations are not barred by any of this, and may well be a valuable educating mechanism.[3]

(c) The right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge

The Criminal Procedure Act sets out the extent to which an accused is entitled to particulars of the charge for statutory purposes, entitling the accused to object to the lack of detail, and the court to order further particulars on pain of quashing the charge.[4] The most important constitutional litigation in this area has revolved around the extent to which an accused should be allowed, in the face of the common law litigation privilege, to have access to the police docket relevant to his or her case.[5] The first wave of litigation in this area was concerned with the right of 'access to information' under IC s 23.[6] In Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General of Transvaal & Another,[7] the Constitutional Court declared that the question was a fair trial question, particularly one of the right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge, rather than an access to information question, the exhaustive operation of the former question rendering recourse to the latter incompetent.[8] Mahomed DP, on behalf of a unanimous court, distinguished

[1] See Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 695 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 656 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 1 (CC) at para 36 (Recognizes the possibility of adjustments 'when structuring sentence' to accommodate a rights violation (in that case the right to a speedy trial).)

[2] See the discussion of the tendency to reduce questions of pre-trial violations to FC s 35(5) questions in the context of the right to counsel and its relationship with notions of voluntariness. § 51.3*(f)* above. See also S v Joors [2003] 4 All SA 628, 639 (C)(Order by Binns-Ward AJ).

[3] See S v Philemon 1997 (2) SACR 651, 667 (W)(Claassen J suggested referring to the Magistrates' Commission the conduct of a magistrate who revealed a predisposition to being dismissive about an accused's right to counsel.)

[4] See Hiemstra (supra) at 216ff; E du Toit, FJ de Jager, A Paizes, AS Skeen & S van der Merwe Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (RS, 29, 2003) § 84. The principle that the accused was entitled to as much information as necessary for a proper preparation of a defence was enunciated in R v Moyage & Others 1958 (3) SA 400, 413 (A). See also S v Cooper & Others 1976 (2) SA 875, 885 (T). The wording of FC s 35(3)(a) makes this principle explicit. The sufficiency referred to in IC s 25(3)(b) is qualified by FC s 35(3)(a) thus: 'to be informed of the charge with sufficient detail to answer it'.

[5] The common law litigation privilege attaching to police dockets was authoritatively laid down in R v Steyn. 1954 (1) SA 324 (A). See also Du Toit & Andere v Direkteur van Openbare Vervolging, Transvaal: In re S v Du Toit & Andere 2004 (2) SACR 584 (T).

[6] S v Fani & Others 1994 (3) SA 619 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 43 (E); Qozeleni v Minister of Law & Order & Another 1994 (3) SA 625 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 75 (E); S v James 1994 (3) SA 881 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 57 (E); S v Smith & Another 1994 (3) SA 887 (SE), 1994 (1) BCLR 63 (SE); Khala v Minister of Safety & Security 1994 (4) SA 218 (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 89 (W); S v Majavu 1994 (4) SA 268 (Ck), 1994 (2) BCLR 56 (Ck); S v Botha & Andere 1994 (4) SA 799 (W), 1994 (3) BCLR 93 (W); S v Khoza & Andere 1994 (2) SACR 611 (W); S v Sefadi 1995 (1) SA 433 (D), 1994 (2) SACR 667 (D).

[7] 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC)('Shabalala').

[8] Ibid at para 34.

four categories of statement which were covered by the blanket privilege which attached to the docket at common law:

(1) The statements of witnesses which need no protection on the grounds that they deal with state secrets, methods of police investigation, the identity of informers, and communications between a legal advisor and his or her clients.
(2) The statements of witnesses in circumstances where there is no reasonable risk that such disclosure might lead to the intimidation of such witnesses or otherwise impede the proper ends of justice.
(3) The statements of witnesses made in circumstances where there is a reasonable risk that their disclosure might constitute a breach of the interests sought to be protected in paragraph (1).
(4) The statements of witnesses made in circumstances where their disclosure would constitute a reasonable risk of the nature referred to in paragraph (2).[1]

The following principles were laid down:[2]

(1) Exculpatory material was to be made available to the accused.[3]
(2) The prosecution's ipse dixit that non-exculpatory documents in the docket fell within the third and fourth categories would not defeat a claim for disclosure unless sufficient evidence were placed before the court for it to establish whether this was the case.
(3) The test was whether a reasonable person in the position of the prosecution would believe that the documents indeed fell within those categories. The court might to this end examine the documents without revealing them to the accused.[4]

Where the relevant risk was found to exist, the Shabalala Court held:

> The court should exercise a proper discretion in such cases by balancing the degree of risk involved in attracting the consequences sought to be avoided by the prosecution (if access is permitted) against the degree of the risk that a fair trial might not ensue (if such access is denied). What is essentially involved is a judicial assessment of the balance of risk not wholly unanalogous to the function which a judicial officer performs in weighing the balance of convenience in cases pertaining to interdicts pendente lite.[5]

[1] Shabalala (supra) at para 40.
[2] Ibid at para 55.
[3] This requirement is recognized by English courts: R v Maguire & Others [1992] 2 All ER 433 (CA); R v Ward [1993] 2 All ER 577 (CA). Both cases were discussed comprehensively in S v Scholtz, 1997 (1) BCLR 103 (NmS). This obligation extends also to information the authorities are aware of, but do not wish to record. See S v Xaba 1997 (1) SACR 194 (W)(Witwatersrand Local Division holds that the right to a fair trial included the right to have one's counsel informed of the existence of incriminating confessional evidence lest counsel be unable to avoid embarrassing revelations in cross-examination.)
[4] See the authority for a similar practice in the field of 'Crown privilege' (public interest immunity) in Van der Linde v Calitz 1967 (2) SA 239 (A).
[5] Shabalala (supra) at para 55g.

The Shabalala Court also held that the rule prohibiting consultation with state witnesses was too wide:[1] consultation might be refused on reasonable apprehension that witnesses would be intimidated, evidence tampered with, state secrets or the identity of informers disclosed, or the proper ends of justice otherwise threatened. Once again the court has to balance the respective interests at stake once the accused had approached the prosecution requesting consultation and consultation had been denied. Consultation might, for example, be unnecessary if cross-examination would adequately perform the same task. Witnesses could not be forced to consult with an accused.[2]

In S v Smile & Another,[3] an application by the defence for witness summaries had been dismissed at a time when the relevant provincial division had not yet authoritatively established the entitlement of an accused to such material.[4] After the existence of the relevant right had been authoritatively recognized, the state provided the appellants with statements of witnesses who had testified and of those who were yet to testify. The appellants argued that the fact that the right had not been complied with before the hearing amounted to a violation of the right. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the violation in question was 'potentially remediable' and any unfairness entailed by it had been purged before the state had closed its case:[5] '[T]he defence could have applied to recall witnesses

[1] Shabalala (supra) at para 60f.

[2] It should be noted that aspects of the 'privilege' discussed by Mahomed J refer to public interest immunity rather than litigation privilege. In this regard it is significant to note that the common-law position on public interest immunity in England has shifted radically towards accepting the position argued for in the Scott Report Volume III (1995), that no immunity should be claimable against the accused who wishes to prove his innocence in a criminal case. The innocence exception had been recognized in the sphere of the identity of police informers as early as the case of Marks v Beyfus (1890) 25 QBD 494. See R v Keane [1994] 2 All ER 478; R v Agar [1990] 2 All ER 442; R v Ward [1993] 2 All ER 577 and R v Adams [1997] Crim LR 292. Ward went so far as to suggest that if the public interest to be protected was too sensitive to yield to innocence, the proper course would be to drop the prosecution. The problem with police dockets, however, is that they attract not only the public interest immunity which yields to innocence but also at least litigation privilege, and often legal professional privilege (legal advice privilege) as well, mostly in the form of what is referred to in the United States as 'work product'. For 'work product' at common law, see Kennedy v Lyell (1833) 23 ChD 387. For legal professional privilege attaching to the Department of Public Prosecutions, see Auten v Raynor (No 2) [1960] 1 QB 669. Legal professional privilege has most recently been accorded absolute status, even against the claims of an accused wishing to prove innocence. See R v Derby Magistrates' Court ex parte B [1996] 1 AC 487 (HL), overruling R v Barton [1972] 2 All ER 1192 (Cr Ct). See also Carter v Managing Partner, Northmoore Hale Davy & Leake (1995) 183 CLR 121 (HCA). Ironically, this absolute status of the privilege is based on its being a 'fundamental human right'. It seems as if litigation privilege does not enjoy this absolute immunity. See Re L (a minor) [1996] 2 All ER 78 (HL). See also Els v Minister of Safety and Security 1998 (4) BCLR 434, 439, 443 (NC), 1998 (2) SACR 93 (NC)(Held the Shabalala approach to be 'relevant, not only to docket privilege, but also to informer privilege'. This was in the civil context, where an applicant desired disclosure of the identity of an informer in order to institute an action for damages against the informer. The court held the applicant's interests to be outweighed by the public interest served by the privilege attaching to informers.)

[3] 1998 (5) BCLR 519 (SCA), 1998 (1) SACR 688 (SCA).

[4] But see Phato v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape & Another; Commissioner of the South African Police Services v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, & Others 1995 (1) SA 799 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 99 (E).

[5] Smile (supra) at 524D-F.

who had already testified and sufficient time was available to consider the contents of the statements and to prepare for the further conduct of the trial.'[1] Melunsky JA did add the following rider:

> But it should be emphasized that this does not mean that it is open to the State, as a matter of course, to postpone disclosure of the statements of prosecution witnesses provided only that they are disclosed at some time before the closure of its case. Disclosure of statements should usually be made when the accused is furnished with the indictment or immediately thereafter in accordance with the practice suggested in Shabalala.[2]

The High Court court's reluctance in S v M to allow a possible violation of the right to docket access to upset a conviction in circumstances where such a reversal would seemingly have been outrageous led it to find that no violation had occurred.[3] It did so by requiring evidence of prejudice and a factual basis for a finding that access would have made a difference to the result of the case.[4] The accused had applied 'too late' in the trial for witness statements from the state, ie after the state had closed its case.[5] All of these findings are unfortunate, if they are taken out of context. Sensitivity to the possibility of other ways of addressing violations, rather than by allowing an appeal or excluding evidence, would lead to less anxiety about recognizing violations.[6]

Documents disclosed as a result of the right recognized in Shabalala do not constitute 'further particulars' binding upon the state. They should be requested from the Attorney-General and not sought by invoking the procedure for further particulars of the charge set out in s 87 of the Code.[7]

In S v Scholtz, the Namibian Supreme Court adopted equality analysis as the basis for determining access to police dockets.[8] This approach, criticized above,[9] may well entail the unfortunate development that the prosecution, in fulfilment of [1] Smile (supra) at 524F.

[2] Ibid at 524 referring to Shabalala (supra) at para 56. The degree to which the conduct of the defence up to the point of disclosure had been prejudiced by non-disclosure should have received more attention, particularly given the court's approach of assessing the impact of the irregularity on the verdict. See S v Chikunga & Another 1997 (2) SACR 470 (NmS), 1997 (9) BCLR 1321 (NmS). It was also unfortunate, with respect, that the court did not clearly separate the question whether a violation had occurred from the question what should be done about any violation that did occur. Ibid at 523I-524H.

[3] 1999 (1) SACR 664 (C)('M').

[4] Ibid at 671J-672A and 673D–E.

[5] M (supra) at 672B.

[6] See § 51.5*(b)* supra.

[7] S v Tshabalala 1999 (1) SACR 163, 166 (T)(Van der Walt J held the right to disclosure to flow from FC ss 32 and s 35(3), despite the apparent exclusion of FC s 32 from this sphere in Shabalala. It was pointed out that the legislature was still to lay down a procedure to be adopted for exercising the right to 'docket access'.)

[8] 1997 (1) BCLR 103 (NmS)('Scholtz').

[9] See § 51.5*(b)* supra. The court's proposition, '[t]o achieve equality between the prosecution and the defence is what the Constitution demands when it says "All persons shall be equal before the law"', with respect, is a striking example of confusion between equality of arms and equal protection of the law. Ibid at 112.

its entitlement to 'equality with the accused', is allowed similar disclosures of the defence work product and brief, or at least of the general nature of the defence envisaged. The court's reference to the position in England, where the requirement of prosecution disclosure of exculpatory and other relevant information to the defence was developed without a Bill of Rights, should now be viewed in the ironic light of the recent legislative provisions in that jurisdiction placing an onerous duty upon the accused to disclose in advance the general outline of the defence.[1] It seems the English legislature has partly implemented the kind of 'equality' that the Scholtz court had in mind. It is to be hoped that the observation of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Stinchcombe[2] that account should be taken of the 'fundamental difference in the respective roles of the prosecution and the defence' will be heeded in South Africa and that 'equality' analysis will not be allowed to place the right to a fair trial on a false path.[3]

In S v Angula & Others; S v Lucas the High Court of Namibia held, on the authority of Shabalala, that the principles laid down in Scholtz applied also to proceedings before the lower courts[4] However, fairness did not require access to the docket in every case. The complexity and the possibility of imprisonment are important factors that point towards disclosure. Simplicity and the minor nature of an offence point against disclosure. In Koortzen & Others v Prosecutor-General & Others the High Court of Namibia held that the state bore the onus of showing that no complexities of fact or law were involved necessitating discovery.[5] The court held that where the refusal of a lower court to order discovery had been unjustified, the High Court was entitled in terms of its inherent review power to intervene before the proceedings were completed to direct that discovery be made.

In Nieuwoudt & Andere v Prokureur-Generaal van die Oos-Kaap,[6] where it was assumed that the onus was on the applicant in bail proceedings to persuade the court to release him,[7] the opinion was expressed that the higher the onus on an accused, the greater was the degree of access to information to which such an accused was entitled.[8] This proposition is difficult to accept when an accused is defending himself or herself against a charge and the full onus is generally placed upon the state. Why should the accused defending himself or herself be entitled to less information than the accused upon whom the law has chosen to place an onus? The proposition is also not easily reconciled with the court's argument that the stronger the state's case against the accused, the more difficult it should be to obtain bail.[9] Would an increase in the strength of the state's case,

[1] See Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act, 1996, s 5.
[2] [1991] 3 SCR 326, (1992) LRC (Crim) 68, 73.
[3] See § 51.5*(b)* supra.
[4] 1997 (9) BCLR 1314 (Nm).
[5] 1997 (10) BCLR 1478 (Nm).
[6] 1996 (3) BCLR 340 (SE)('Nieuwoudt').
[7] For more on the onus in bail proceedings, see § 51.4*(d)* supra.
[8] Nieuwoudt (supra) at 344.
[9] Ibid at 344.

rendering discharge of the onus more difficult, have increased the accused's right to information?

Be that as it may, Nieuwoudt held that IC s 23 entitled a bail applicant to insight into the docket because of the relevance to bail proceedings of the strength of the state's case.[1] The finding in Nieuwoudt was left in tatters by the Constitutional Court's judgment in S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat.[2] A constitutional challenge to s 60(14) of the Criminal Procedure Act,[3] which subsection disentitled the bail applicant from such insight into the docket as he or she would have at trial, was dismissed unanimously by the Court.[4]

In S v Kester[5] it was held that the right of an unrepresented accused to be informed of the particulars of charge included a right to be informed of all competent verdicts lest an unrepresented accused be surprised by a verdict based exclusively on a plea explanation under s 115 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.[6] The decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division in S v Lavhengwa[7] to analyse the substantive question of the vagueness of an offence in terms of the right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge is discussed above.[8]

(d) The right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence

This right, which is one of the new rights added by s 35 of the Final Constitution (FC s 35(3)(b)), seems, in its 'facilities' component, to represent a generic principle which is capable of covering access to information and to witnesses and consultation with legal representatives.[9] The most helpful comment is perhaps that of Stavros, who writes:

[1] Nieuwoudt (supra) at 344-45.

[2] 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC). See also H Axam 'If the Interests of Justice Permit: Individual Liberty, the Limitations Clause, and the Qualified Constitutional Right to Bail' (2001) SAJHR 320.

[3] Act 51 of 1977 as recently amended by Act 85 of 1997.

[4] See § 51.4*(d)* supra.

[5] 1996 (1) SACR 456 (N).

[6] See S v Chauke & Another 1998 (1) SACR 354 (V).

[7] 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W).

[8] See § 51.1*(a)*(iii) supra, on the finding in Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa & Others 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683, 690A-B (E).

[9] For a discussion of the identical right in art 6(3)(b) of the European Convention on Human Rights, see AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 110ff; JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 188ff. The main concern, as far as 'facilities' go, is with access to information, the opportunity to consult with one's lawyer, and the opportunity to present evidence. These rights, it would seem, are adequately covered by FC s 35(3)(a), (f), (g) and (i). See the accommodation of the right to adequate information under the 'facilities' right of the Namibian Constitution, effected in S v Kandovasu 1998 (9) BCLR 1148, 1152D (NmS). Counsel for the respondent in National Director of Public Prosecutions v Mohamed & Others 2003 (2) SACR 258 (C) at para 57 argued unsuccessfully that s 26(6) of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act 121 of 1998 was unconstitutional since it infringed the respondent's right to have adequate facilities to prepare a defence.

> The second function of [this right][in addition to the question of time] is to provide a rather broad and flexible rule against which to measure the opportunity of the defence in each particular case to present its case effectively to the court. The proper role of [this right] in this context is similar to that of the fair trial guarantee. The accused may be affected in his enjoyment of the right to adequate facilities for the preparation of his defence in ways which cannot be identified in advance: limited time for preparation for the hearing, failure to order an adjournment and the introduction of surprise witnesses are examples chronicled in the case law.[1]

FC s 35(3)(b) was invoked by the court in S v Nkabinde,[2] in which the 'bugging' of the consultations and telephone conversations between the accused and his legal advisors was held to have compromised this right.

It may be noted that the question of access to state witnesses discussed in Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General of Transvaal & Another[3] would seem more suited to the domain of FC s 35(3)(b) than to that of FC s 35(3)(a). Furthermore, the right to assistance by the court to which an unrepresented accused has been held entitled under the residual fair trial right may well now be accommodated under this right.[4]

An example of what would be a violation under FC s 35(3)(a) of the right to 'adequate time' occurred in S v N,[5] in which the 'remarkable haste' with which a juvenile offender's trial had been conducted was held to violate the residual fair trial right. The right in question serves to remind the authorities that the speedy process requirement is always subject to a prohibition on excessive speed.[6]

(e) The right to a public trial before an ordinary court

(i) Ordinary courts and impartiality

The right of an accused to trial before an ordinary court can be profitably compared with the Nel Court's gloss on the right of any person not to be detained 'without trial' under FC s 12(1)(b).[7] The 'ordinary court' requirement is also

[1] S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 186.

[2] 1998 (8) BCLR 996, 1002B E (N). See also PJ Schwikkard 'Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 777.

[3] 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC).

[4] See § 51.5*(b)* supra. The proliferation of areas of overlap between enumerated rights inter se and between enumerated rights and the residual portion of the fair trial right is not conducive to the development of reasonably stable domains of application for the different fair trial rights and the residual right.

[5] 1998 (1) BCLR 97 (Tk), 1997 (1) SACR 84 (Tk).

[6] Questions relating to the propriety of summary trials such as those for contempt in facie curiae could perhaps also be properly decided under FC s 35(3)(a). See S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W)(Summary proceedings for contempt were upheld as constitutional, although the analysis was undertaken on equality and impartiality grounds.) See also S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC) at para 20.

[7] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel). See § 51.1*(a)(iv) supra; M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa* (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 40.4.

absent from the right of any detainee to challenge the lawfulness of his or her detention,[1] and from the right of an arrested person under the Final Constitution to be brought before a court within 48 hours.[2] It is clear that, in order to lend significance to the more stringent requirement concerning the nature of the tribunal, 'ordinary court' should be interpreted to refer to a tribunal which not only is not specially constituted for the occasion[3] but is also adorned with the power and the facilities to ensure compliance with all the fair trial rights listed in FC s 35. The clear aim of this provision is to ensure that normal criminal trials with full fair-trial protection are the only acceptable method whereby the state may prosecute individuals for committing offences. Exceptions to this rule require FC s 36(1) justification. The possibility that this aim was undermined by the reasoning in Nel has been discussed above.[4]

The 'ordinary court' requirement has to accommodate the requirement laid down in other human rights documents that the tribunal be 'independent or impartial'.[5] Although the sorts of tribunals referred to by the prohibition against detention without 'trial' FC s 12(1)(b) do not need to comply with FC s 35(3), they do need to satisfy standards of impartiality implicit in the minimum requirements of natural justice.[6] The 'ordinary court' standard of impartiality and independence should be read as more rigorous than the minimum standard applicable to detention in a non-criminal context.[7]

The requirement of impartiality was discussed at length by the Witwatersrand Local Division in S v Lavhengwa.[8] Doctrinal clarity in this area of the law was not advanced by the court's decision to analyze 'impartiality' in terms of the equality clause.[9] The result was the creation of two kinds of 'impartiality' analysis: 'equality impartiality' analysis and 'general impartiality' analysis.[10] The question in Lavhengwa was whether a summary conviction by the presiding judge for contempt

[1] See § 51.3*(e)* supra.

[2] See § 51.4*(c)* supra.

[3] The provision in s 148 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 for a specially constituted court by the State President and Minister of Justice in cases of state security or public order must therefore be justified under FC s 36(1) in order to be constitutional.

[4] See § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra.

[5] See Canadian Charter s 11*(d)*; European Convention on Human Rights art 6(1).

[6] See Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC), as discussed in § 51.1*(a)*(iv) supra and Bishop & Woolman (supra) at § 40.4. On the independence and impartiality required for the FC s 12 'trial', see De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange') at paras 67-75.

[7] See § 51.5*(b)* supra. After De Lange, it is going to be very difficult to maintain any conceptual space between FC s 12 and FC s 35 as far as independence and impartiality are concerned. The requirements of independence and impartiality laid down in the Canadian cases to which the court in De Lange referred seem to fill all the conceptual space to which FC s 35(3)(c) entitles an accused.

[8] 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W)('Lavhengwa').

[9] See § 51.5*(b)* supra. The fact that 'equality of arms' jurisprudence under the European Convention on Human Rights quite often involves issues of impartiality, it is respectfully submitted, was probably the reason for the Court's journey into the world of discrimination. See Bönisch v Austria (1985) 9 EHRR 191.

[10] Lavhengwa (supra) at 477f and 492f.

in facie curiae violated the requirements of impartiality: the judge in such cases was, to some extent, iudex in sua causa. The Court held that the situation itself was insufficient without more to render the officer in question not impartial. The Court endorsed the reasoning of the Connecticut state court in Naunchek v Naunchek[1] that evidence of 'personal embroilment' on the part of the presiding officer was required for summary contempt proceedings to violate the impartiality requirement.[2] The Court 'relied extensively' on the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in R v Cohn[3] and rejected the conclusion reached in the Zimbabwean case of In re Muskwe[4] that the summary contempt offence violated the requirements of a fair trial.[5] This attempt to distinguish Cohn and Muskwe would appear to be wrong in law: the principles established in Cohn and in Muskwe as far as impartiality was concerned were the same. Indeed, Muskwe relied on Cohn for its finding that the contempt before it was the sort directed at the magistrate herself and that such a contempt hearing required adjudication by a different judicial officer. It was with respect to the summary nature of the proceedings that Muskwe adopted a different approach. However, no complaint can be made with respect to the Lavhengwa Court's adoption of the common-law test of a 'reasonable apprehension of bias',[6] and the distinction between conviction for contempt directed at the dignity of the court and conviction for contempt directed at the person of the judicial officer is sound in principle. But it is surely arguable that the very fact that the two are in practice so difficult to disentangle should lead to a 'reasonable apprehension of bias' in the very nature of summary convictions for contempt in facie curiae.[7] Such a 'reasonable expectation of bias' cannot be based

[1] 463 A2d 603, 37 ALR 4th 995 at 1001 (1983).

[2] Lavhengwa (supra) at 481. See also S v Ntshwence [2004] 1 All SA 328 (Tk)(Maya J acknowledged that summary proceedings for contempt in facie curiae infringed the right to a public trial before an ordinary court. It was found, in that case that the limitation was justified.)

[3] (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 680 ('Cohn'). See Lavhengwa (supra) at 494.

[4] 1993 (2) SA 514 (ZH)(' Muskwe').

[5] Cohn (supra) at 494.

[6] Ibid at 493. In S v Phallo & Others, an objection to extensive interrogation by assessors was loosely based on the right to a fair trial. 1998 (3) BCLR 352, 357 (B). It was natural in the circumstances that the court would base its enquiry in this regard upon the common law principles relating to judicial intervention and apparent partiality.

[7] In S v Maghuwazuma, Brand J referred to Lavhengwa and extracted the ratio that the encroachment ('inbreuk') upon an accused's right to a fair trial entailed by summary contempt proceedings was justified in a case where such proceedings were necessary to 'protect the dignity, authority and procedural integrity of the Court'. 1997 (2) SACR 675, 680 (C) citing Lavhengwa (supra) at 474. Having determined that the Lavhengwa approach did not differ much from the common-law approach, Brand J regarded the case before him, involving the failure by an attorney to appear in a criminal matter, not to be appropriate for summary proceedings, particularly given the attorney's declared and not unjustified ('nie onredelike') fear of personal bias on the part of the magistrate in question. Ibid at 680-81. An important decision that illustrates the problematic nature of summary convictions for contempt in facie curiae is S v Solomons 2004 (1) SACR 137 (K). See also In re Chinamasa 2001 (2) SA 902, 922 (ZS); S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409) (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC) at para 54 (Court held the summary procedure employed for a summary charge of contempt of court in facie curiae to be irreconcilable with FC s 35(3)(i).)

on the fact that the presiding officer belongs to a different race to that of the accused. The Cape Provincial Division in S v Collier determined that a fair trial did not entitle an accused to be tried by a presiding officer 'more representative of the society from which the accused [came], being the previously disenfranchised majority'.[1]

The requirements of independence and impartiality were discussed in the context of FC s 12 in De Lange v Smuts NO & Others. Ackermann J referred to the requirement of an 'ordinary court' for criminal incarceration in holding that anything but a court constituted or presided over by a judicial officer of the court structure established under the Final Constitution would not be 'appropriate' — in terms of FC s 34 — for a hearing which might lead to non-criminal incarceration.[2] He endorsed the following dictum from R v Valente:

> Although there is obviously a close relationship between independence and impartiality, they are nevertheless separate and distinct values or requirements. Impartiality refers to a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case. The word 'impartial' connotes absence of bias, actual or perceived. The word 'independent' reflects or embodies the traditional constitutional value of judicial independence. As such, it connotes not merely a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions, but a status or relationship to others, particularly the Executive Branch of government, that rests on objective conditions or guarantees.[3]

The three essential conditions of independence identified were security of tenure, a basic degree of financial security free from arbitrary interference, and institutional independence with respect to matters relating directly to the judicial function.[4] Ackermann J also endorsed the elaboration provided in R v Genereux that independence entailed 'not only freedom from interference by the executive and legislative branches of government but also by 'any other external force, such as business or corporate interests or other pressure groups'.[5]

The Cape Provincial Division in Freedom of Expression Institute & Others v President of the Ordinary Court Martial NO & Others followed the Canadian example set in Genereux and struck down as unconstitutional the general court martial.[6] The power of interference by the executive in the constitution of the court and in the prosecution and determination of cases in courts martial constituted the core of the constitutional ill. Allowing lay people the power to convict and to imprison people for up to two years violated the 'ordinary court' provision.[7] In rejecting an

[1] 1995 (8) BCLR 975, 979 (C), 1995 (2) SACR 648 (C)('Collier').
[2] De Lange (supra) at para 74.
[3] (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161, 172.
[4] Ibid at para 70.
[5] (1992) 88 DLR (4th) 110, 118 at para 72.
[6] 1999 (3) BCLR 261 (C)('Freedom of Expression Institute').
[7] Ibid at para 18.

argument that an ordinary court martial was rendered an 'ordinary court' by FC s 166*(e)*,[1] Hlophe ADJP held:

> [W]hether the terminology 'court' is appropriate for [a court martial] in its present form … does not matter. No accused person should be subjected to being tried by just any court. It must be an ordinary court which conforms with the spirit of the Constitution and which affords an accused person a fair trial. By no stretch of the imagination can the ordinary court martial be 'an ordinary court' within the meaning of sections 35(3)(c) and 34 of the Constitution.[2]

There were ways, the Court held, of structuring courts martial without violating the independence standards required by the constitutional right to a fair trial.[3] Common-law principles regulate the extent to which a judicial officer should participate in such hearings — ie, cross-examining an undefended accused — and ensure that the officer's behaviour does not have even the appearance of impropriety or bias.[4]

Some food for thought was provided in the judgment of the full court of the Natal Provincial Division in S v Ngcobo.[5] Having determined that a judge's questioning of an accused to make up for an inept prosecution did not violate the principle of impartiality, Squires J held that the Final Constitution did not hold adversarial principles so sacred as to forbid the intrusion of any elements of an inquisitorial nature.[6] Furthermore, the Ngcobo Court disagreed that the Final Constitution militated against allowing a lack of sophistication on the part of the prosecuting and investigative process to lead to greater intrusion by the judge to avoid travesties of justice.[7] It was held that such an approach, followed in S v Van den Berg,[8] showed 'a realistic and sensible appreciation of the situation that must indeed be faced by courts from time to time in this country, as well as Namibia'.[9] This may be so, but it would be a cause for concern if an accused had to fear an inept prosecutor more than a competent one, since the former might receive more help from the Bench than the latter. Indeed, the Zimbabwe Supreme Court in Smyth v Ushewokunze & Another[10] held the right to a 'fair hearing … by an … impartial court', expressly entrenched in s 18(2) of the Zimbabwean Constitution, to 'include within its scope and ambit not only the impartiality of the decision-making body, but the absolute impartiality of the prosecutor

[1] FC s 166(e) defines the courts as including 'any other court established or recognized in terms of an Act of Parliament, including any court of a status similar to either the High Courts or the Magistrates' Courts'.

[2] Freedom of Expression Institute (supra) at para 21.

[3] See Findlay v United Kingdom 24 EHHR 221, 244-45 at paras 26-27. The panacea was to split functions and to reduce the role and interference of an executive 'convening authority'.

[4] See S v Mosoinyane 1998 (1) SACR 583, 594C-597G (T).

[5] 1998 (3) BCLR 298 (N)('Ngcobo').

[6] 1998 (8) BCLR 996 (N). See § 51.5*(j)*(ii) infra.

[7] Ngcobo (supra) at 305H-306D.

[8] 1995 (4) BCLR 479 (Nm)('Van den Berg')

[9] Ngcobo (supra) at 306D.

[10] 1998 (2) BCLR 170 (ZS).

himself whose function, as an officer of the court, form[ed] an indispensable part of the judicial process'.[1]

Institutional independence is to be distinguished from 'impartiality'. The fact that the right requires the court in question to be an 'ordinary court' means that the question of institutional independence will be ensured by the provisions relating to the separation of powers. In S v Dodo[2] counsel for the accused argued that the provisions of s 51(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act,[3] which prescribed the imposition of minimum sentences in certain circumstances, offended the right to a trial in an ordinary court as entrenched in FC s 35(3)(c) and the separation of powers doctrine. Smuts AJ held that the extent of the infringement was significant, that there was no apparent relation between the limitation and its purpose and that there were less restrictive measures to combat crime.[4] The High Court declared s 51(1) inconsistent with FC s 35(3)(c) and the separation of powers doctrine. It then referred this declaration to the Constitutional Court for confirmation. The declaration of invalidity was, however, not confirmed by the Constitutional Court.[5] Ackermann J, following the approach enunciated in S v Malgas,[6] held that the sentencing court retained the discretion to impose a lesser sentence than that prescribed should there exist 'substantial and compelling circumstances' to do so. The sentencing court was thus not obliged to impose a sentence which would limit the accused's FC s 12(1)(e) right.[7] As to the argument that s 51(1), read with s 51(3) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, constituted a breach of FC s 35(3)(c) because a sentencing court would be bound by s 51(1) and would thus no longer be an 'ordinary court', the Constitutional Court held that this could only hold true if s 51(1) had a material effect on the sentencing court's independence or if it deprived such court of some judicial function to such an extent that it could no longer be classified as an 'ordinary court'. The Constitutional Court rejected this argument.[8] Ackermann J further wrote that there was no absolute separation of powers between the judicial function and the legislative and executive functions under the Final Constitution. The latter two shared an interest in the execution of punishment imposed by the judiciary.[9]

[1] The view expressed by Etienne du Toit SC in the 1st Edition version of this chapter, that impartiality extended also to the role of the prosecutor, was specifically endorsed. Ibid at 178B. Gubbay CJ regarded this as a 'broad and creative' interpretation of the right, which was necessary to avoid the prejudice inherent in being faced with a prosecutor who bore a personal grudge. The reasoning renders problematic the propriety of private prosecutions under the right to be tried by an impartial court. Although the thrust of Gubbay CJ's reasoning was based on the role of a public prosecutor acting on behalf of the state and with its resources at his or her disposal, the fact that such impartiality was grafted on to the accused's right would mean that private prosecutions prima facie violated that right.

[2] 2001 (1) SACR 301 (E)('Dodo HC').

[3] 105 of 1997.

[4] Dodo HC (supra) at 315.

[5] S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 594 (CC)('Dodo'). See also A Pillay 'Recent Cases: Constitutional Application' (2001) 14 South African Journal for Criminal Justice 282.

[6] 2001 (2) SA 1222 (SCA), 2001 (1) SACR 469 (SCA)('Malgas').

[7] Ibid at para 40.

[8] Dodo (supra) at para 50.

[9] Ibid at para 24. See also Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority and Another; Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another 2000 (2) SACR 596 (Tk).

The virtues of the separation of powers doctrine and its relationship to judicial independence and impartiality were subject to further criticism from the bench in Bangindawo & Others v Head of the Nyanda Regional Authority & Another. The Bangindawo Cout saw 'no reason whatsoever for the imposition of the Western conception of the notions of judicial impartiality and independence in the African customary law setting' and rejected an argument that regional authority courts, which had the power to conduct criminal trials, violated the principles of independence and impartiality demanded by IC s 96(2).[1] Madlanga J reasoned that 'the embodiment of all these powers [judicial, executive and law-making] in a judicial officer [would] in the minds of those schooled in Western legal systems, or not exposed to or sufficiently exposed to African customary law, or not believing in African customary law, be irreconcilable with the idea of independence and impartiality of the judiciary.'[2] Bangindawo offers a striking illustration of the contrast between the universalist turn reflected in the Bill of Rights and the Final Constitution's simultaneous attempt to accommodate African customary law.[3] The problem in Bangindawo was not so much one of how to interpret judicial independence and impartiality in the African customary context as one concerning areas of penal sovereignty. It is one thing to say the Interim Constitution insulated certain courts from the strictures of IC s 25. But, with great respect, it is quite another thing to contend that there is some way in which a regional authority court can be regarded as 'independent', or even as 'impartial' in criminal matters.[4] Why IC s 25(3)(a) never rates a mention in Bangindawo remains a mystery. It is particularly odd given that the court found that the right to counsel guaranteed by IC s 25(3)(e) could not yield to the procedures of African customary law — which knew, at that time, of no such phenomenon.[5]

(ii) The right to a public trial

The accused is given the right to a public trial in order that justice be seen to be done. Access to the public ensures the legitimacy of the criminal justice system

[1] 1998 (3) BCLR 314, 327D (Tk), 1998 (2) SACR 16 (Tk)('Bangindawo').

[2] Ibid at 326H-I.

[3] See generally TW Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leadership' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 25.

[4] See Valente v R (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161, cited as (1986) 19 CRR 354 (SC) in Bangindawo (supra) at 325J; R v Beauregard (1986) 26 CRR 59 (SCC) at 68, 1987 LRC 180, 187 (SCC); R v Généreux 8 CRR (2d) 89 (SCC), (1992) 88 DLR (4th) 110. See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at paras 67–75; S v Van Rooyen & Others 2001 (2) SACR 376 (T), 2001 (4) SA 396, 405 (T).

[5] Bangindawo (supra) at 330-331. See § 51.5*(b)* infra. The court could admittedly have arrived at the same finding on independence by holding that the term 'ordinary court' in IC s 25(3)(a) had to be read either as carrying a different meaning in the areas of operation of those courts the existence of which was saved for the interim in IC s 214(1), or simply as subject to such savings. See Bangindawo (supra) at 323ff.

and acts as an important safeguard of impartiality.[1] However, an important distinction exists between democratic and free speech concerns, on the one hand, and the element of publicity inherent in an accused's right to a fair trial on the other. Indeed, publicity and free speech concerns often conflict with an accused's right to a fair trial.[2] These two sometimes opposing interests were, unfortunately, conflated in Klink v Regional Court Magistrate NO & Others. Worse still, the distinct right to challenge evidence (our 'confrontation right') was not extricated from the following jurisprudential cocktail:

> [T]he requirement that the trial must be public amounts to the constitutionalization of a long-recognized principle of transparency in criminal proceedings. The purpose of insisting on a public trial is to enable the public to be fully informed of the evidence, as far as it is possible to do so, so that it may be properly able to evaluate any judgment (S v Leepile & others (4) 1986 (3) SA 661 (W) at 665I J) [free speech interest]. The enshrinement of the right to a public trial ensures that secret trials employed by totalitarian states will not be tolerated under the Constitution [both free speech interest and fair trial interest]: but it does not guarantee the right of the accused and the witness to be physically present in the same room [confrontation problem].[3]

The court left open the question of the constitutionality of ss 153 and 154 of the Criminal Procedure Act providing for trials to be held in camera and for information not to be published in certain cases.[4] The impugned provision in this case, which allowed vulnerable witnesses to testify by video-link and to be cross-examined through an intermediary, had little to do with the right to a public trial.

[1] In Freedom of Expression Institute, an order to convene a court martial in camera and to exclude the media was set aside. But this was based upon the interference of the executive 'convening authority' in the independence of the tribunal, not on any notion of the right to a public trial or the public's right to a free flow of information relating to criminal trials. The press, who had been excluded from a court martial, succeeded in having the institution declared unconstitutional for failing to provide its accused with a fair trial. If the front door is locked, one can always get in by breaking the house down. The right to a public trial does not, however, extend to disciplinary hearings before administrative tribunals. See Hamata & Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee & Others 2000 (4) SA 621 (C).

[2] See Nebraska Press Association v Stuart 427 US 539, 96 SCt 2791 (1976)(A restraining order against the press and broadcasters interdicting publication of confessions made by the accused in a high-profile murder case was struck down as an impermissible prior restraint on free speech, which ironically was more serious given the interest of the public in information about the criminal justice process. The US Supreme Court starkly subordinated fair trial rights to public access. The problem with adverse pre-trial publicity is that the press and public do not generally conduct their discourses with due regard to the presumption of innocence.) Stuart can be contrasted with the approach adopted by the Chancery Division in England in Bunn v British Broadcasting Corporation & Another The Times 23 June 1998 (On grounds of public policy the court protected the confidentiality of a statement made to the police under caution, where the defendants desired to publish the statement after the Maxwell fraud prosecutions had failed to result in any convictions.)

[3] 1996 (3) BCLR 402, 414 (SE)('Klink').

[4] Ibid. See the decision in Richmond Newspapers Inc v Commonwealth of Virginia 448 US 555 (1980)('Richmond'), referred to in Klink (supra) at 413-414 (A blanket ban on public access to a criminal trial was held to violate the First Amendment protection of free speech. Richmond was another case in which the interests of the defence were opposed to the publicity which the newspapers were seeking.)

The Constitutional Court in Nel v Le Roux NO & Others[1] referred, obiter, to the 'well-recognized exceptions in our criminal procedure to the general rule that criminal proceedings [were] to be conducted in open court' and cited s 153 of the Criminal Procedure Act as an example.[2] The court also referred to exceptions recognized by the US Supreme Court to the public's right to access to trials inherent in the First Amendment right to free speech.[3] Exceptions to the public's free speech rights, however, are not the same thing as exceptions to the accused's fair trial rights.

The Zimbabwe Supreme Court in Banana v Attorney-General was 'confronted for the first time with the contention that widespread pre-trial publicity adverse and hostile to an accused person [might] so indelibly prejudice the minds of the judge and assessors at the criminal trial as to negate the constitutional protection of a fair hearing before an independent court'.[4] Gubbay CJ stated categorically: '[T]here can be no doubt that the right to receive a fair trial, which is the central precept of our criminal law, must be given priority over freedom of the press.'[5] He proceeded by acknowledging that the administration of the criminal law in notorious cases could not be allowed to be derailed by the mere fact of publicity. He then added:

> [M]edia reporting of a judicial process, or in advance of it, may, in exceptional circumstances, be so irresponsible and prejudicial as to make the unfairness irreparable and the administration of justice impossible. If that were to occur then there is, quite literally, nowhere to go. The court will have no option but to grant a stay of proceedings; for it is more important to retain the integrity of the system of justice than to ensure the punishment of even the vilest offender.

One would have expected, then, an investigation into the question as to whether Banana reflected the sort of 'exceptional circumstances' that demanded a stay of proceedings. But the judgment did not proceed thus. It detailed the extent of the press barrage of accusation and scandal, and held this to have exceeded the boundaries to be expected even in high-profile cases.[6] But then, having determined the test to be whether a 'real and substantial risk' of an unfair trial had resulted,[7] Gubbay CJ held that, given that judges and assessors could take publicity without being unduly affected by it, the challenge had to be dismissed. The reasoning cannot but be regarded as applicable to all cases, thereby undoing the notional possibility of 'exceptional circumstances', and the acknowledgement of the humanity and fallibility of judges entertained in the judgment:

[1] 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel').
[2] Ibid at para 17. Well-established statutory exceptions and properly justified limitations on rights need not be co-extensive. See §§ 51.1*(b)*(iii) and (iv) supra.
[3] Nel (supra) at para 17.
[4] 1999 (1) BCLR 27, 28J–29A (ZS)('Banana').
[5] Ibid at 32B.
[6] Banana (supra) at 32-34.
[7] Ibid at 34F.

> To accept that there is a real or substantial risk of a judge's mind becoming so clogged with prejudice by what he has read or heard about an accused, would mean that it would be impossible to find an impartial judge for a high profile case; and that such an accused could never receive a fair trial. The result would be nothing less than judicial abdication. The proposition needs merely to be stated to convince of its unsoundness.[1]

(f) The right to trial within a reasonable time

The relationship between the arrested person's speedy process rights and those of the accused person is discussed above.[2] The accused person's right to trial within a reasonable time is one right which quite obviously includes consideration of a period before the commencement of the proceedings — it is, after all, the speed with which such proceedings have come about that is at issue. The right in IC s 25(3)(a) refers to a reasonable time 'after being charged', and much of the IC s 25(3)(a) jurisprudence is naturally concerned with the requirements of 'being charged'.[3] The Final Constitution has dropped the requirement that one be 'charged' before the period of delay can be considered, and has also clarified that the scope of the right to trial within a reasonable time extends to the conclusion of the trial as well as its inception. FC s 35(3)(d) reads, in relevant part, 'to have their trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay'. (IC s 25(3)(j) provided separately for the right to be 'sentenced within a reasonable time after conviction'.) All appellate and review procedures would seem to be embraced by the phrase 'their trial'.[4]

However, S v Pennington & Another the Constitutional Court unanimously left this point open by way of obiter dictum.[5] It was unnecessary for the Pennington Court to decide whether to regard the right contained in IC s 25(3)(a) or that in FC s 35(3)(d) as extending also to appellate delay, since whichever of the two rights were to be applicable, such delay as did occur would not entitle the applicants to have their convictions set aside or their sentences reduced, which was the

[1] Banana (supra) at 36I-37A.

[2] See § 51.4*(c)* supra.

[3] See § 51.2 supra for a discussion of the necessity to keep distinct, on the one hand, the definition of 'charged' for the purposes of determining the relevant period under IC s 25(3)(a) and, on the other hand, the definition of 'charge' for the purposes of determining when a person is to be regarded as an accused person, as distinct from an arrested person.

[4] See Attorney-General, Eastern Cape v D 1997 (1) SACR 473, 475 (E), 1997 (7) BCLR 918 (E)(The Eastern Cape Local Division remarked: 'An appeal is not a re-trial or a trial de novo. It . . . is an extension or a continuation of the lis between the state on the one hand and the accused person on the other.') This seems equally applicable to the case of a review of sentence, delay in the effecting of which concerned the court in S v Manyonyo 1996 (11) BCLR 1463, 1465-1466 (E). The Manyonyo court decided the matter in terms of a common-law concern with not depriving the individual of his or her liberty unless it was necessary, and mentioned the possibility that such a delay might itself amount to a failure of justice. The court did not have recourse to IC s 25(3)(j). See § 51.1*(a)(ii) supra, for more about the common-law liberty analysis adopted by the court. See also D Sing 'The Constitutional Right to a Fair Trial: Understanding Section 35(3)(d)* Through the Cases' (2000) 63 Journal for Contemporary Roman-Dutch Law 121.

[5] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC)('Pennington') at para 41.

relief claimed.[1] The Court did point out, however, that although undue delay in hearing criminal appeals was 'obviously undesirable', it did not follow that such delay constituted an infringement of the constitutional right to a fair trial.[2]

The jurisprudence around the meaning of the word 'charged' need not be abandoned in interpreting the more openly defined right in FC s 35(3)(d). The degree of apprehension on the part of the individual that the state is intent on prosecuting him or her[3] or the extent to which the individual's liberty has been

[1] The Court held that the applicants were not entitled to invoke the provisions of the Final Constitution, which finding rendered the obiter conclusion on relief twice removed. Pennington (supra) at para 36.

[2] Ibid at para 41. The Court's reference to the dispute in the Canadian Supreme Court about the extension of the right to trial within a reasonable time to appeals merits consideration. The minority judgment in the case concerned — S v Potvin [1993] 2 SCR 880, 105 DLR (4th) 214 ('Potvin') — is to be preferred over that of the majority. The different considerations pertaining to appeal would naturally result in different factors of reasonableness. The majority decision, that the relevant right to be tried within a reasonable time did not apply to appeal delays, was decisively influenced by three considerations relevant for present purposes:

1. The general due process seepage from s 7 of the Charter could take care of any due process problems not covered by s 11*(b)*'s domain of the trial proper. Ibid at 229ff. One should not forget that the majority held appellate delay capable of violating the 'principles of fundamental justice' enshrined in s 7. The pertinent American jurisprudence invoked by the Court involves a similar structure: Fourteenth Amendment due process performs a similar sweeping function. Ibid at 228. This difference in doctrine is significant given the due process wall in the South African framework.
2. The Potvin majority 'agreed' with the European Court of Human Rights decision in Wemhoff v Germany (1968) 1 EHRR 55. The right to trial within a reasonable time contained in art 5(3) of the European Convention applies 'only to trial', whereas the right in art 6(1) to a 'fair and public hearing' 'in the determination . . . of any criminal charge against him' applied to appeals as well. It requires little illustration that confining the only 'speedy process' right in a Charter to such circumstances as apply to one of a pair of twin speedy process rights in another Convention is highly questionable. Closer scrutiny of the stages of the criminal process to which art 6(1) and art 5(3) apply reveals complexity, but in any event a framework in which the gaps left by the one right are filled by the other. See § 51.4*(c)* supra.
3. The Potvin majority's decision was based upon the requirement that 'charged' be afforded the same narrow meaning throughout s 11. See Potvin (supra) at 223-26. This finding entails no grave consequences for a system where due process seepage can take care of pre-trial and post-trial delay. The difference for the purposes of IC s 25(3)(a) is that 'charged' requires a broader meaning there than is appropriate for determining the definition of 'accused', in order to allow pre-trial delay to be relevant to an accused's right to a fair trial, and to distinguish accused persons from arrested persons. See § 51.2 supra. For the purposes of FC s 35(3)(d), the purpose and the effect of the alteration of the wording and of the omission of the reference to speedy sentencing after conviction are to overcome the gaps referred to in § 51.4*(c)* supra, and to allow the speedy process right to extend in both directions beyond the confines of the trial itself, to apply to all relevant pre-trial occurrences and to apply until the lis between individual and state is finally concluded as the section demands.

On 'knowledge of the charge', see Du Preez v Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape 1997 (3) BCLR 329, 338 (E)(The person concerned must be 'advised by a competent authority that it has been decided that he is to be prosecuted'.) The Moeketsi report creates the impression that the jurisprudence around the word 'charged' entered our courts through the Canadian decision of R v Kalanj (1989) 1 SCR 1594, whereas the extensive passage quoted ostensibly from that case was derived from the Zimbabwean decision in In re Mlambo. 1992 (2) SACR 245, 249-50 (ZS)('Mlambo').

[3] See Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another 1996 (7) BCLR 947, 963 (B).

interfered with[1] are animated by the same principles that underly the right to trial within a reasonable time and hence should inform our interpretation of FC s 35(3)(d).

In Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, Kriegler J wrote — of IC s 25(3)(a) and FC s 35(3)(d) — that the 'respective sections, though not identical, [were] substantially the same'.[2] Having pointed out that human rights jurisprudence had attached varying meanings to the word 'charged', ranging from 'formal arraignment or something tantamount thereto' to 'broadly and imprecisely … signify[ing] no more than some or other intimation to the accused of the crime(s) alleged to have been committed',[3] Kriegler J proceeded to find it unnecessary to decide where along the continuum of meanings the word fell. The occurrence in question in the instant case (appearing in the dock for the formal remand of a criminal case) clearly fell within the meaning of the provision.[4] What was significant was Kriegler J's intimation that the meaning of the word 'charged' in any given case, being determined by context, could be informed by the degree of 'anxiety, stress and social embarrassment suffered by a public figure accused of a morally reprehensible crime'.[5] Still, the difficulty of basing the significance of the pre-charge period on constitutional grounds, once 'charge' has been defined, has now been remedied.[6]

The right to be tried within a reasonable time was comprehensively discussed in Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, & Another.[7] The court did not indicate clearly whether it was adopting a comparative constitutional approach, or whether its statement that its approach was one 'guided by principles that ha[d] been formulated by the Supreme Court over decades'[8] was to be taken as incorporating the common law into IC s 25(3). It distilled from the Canadian and American case law the following four governing factors:

[1] Mlambo (supra) at 249-250 endorsed the approach of the European Court of Human Rights in Eckle v Germany (Federal Republic) (1985) 5 EHRR 1 and Foti v Italy (1983) 5 EHRR 313 (Relevant period was from the time the situation of the suspect had been materially affected: '[T]he start of the impairment of the individual's interests in the liberty and security of his person.') Mlambo was followed in Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg, & Another 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W). For a discussion of the history and rationale of the right to a speedy trial see B Farrell 'The Right to a Speedy Trial Before International Criminal Tribunals' (2003) 19 South African Journal for Human Rights 99.

[2] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC)('Sanderson') at para 17.

[3] Ibid at para 18.

[4] Ibid at para 19.

[5] Ibid.

[6] See Du Preez v Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape 1997 (3) BCLR 329, 339 (E). See Coetzee & Others v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D), 1997 (1) SACR 546, 560-61 (D)(It was remarked, for the purposes of FC s 35(3)(d), that delay before arrest might be more prejudicial than delay after arrest, there being no safeguards of direct court control before arrest as there are after arrest. The authorities may want to counter that the 'direct court control' after arrest is the consequence of a speedy process right in that sphere, not a reason for having a different speedy process right in another sphere.)

[7] 1996 (7) BCLR 947 (B), 1996 (1) SACR 675 (B)('Moeketsi').

[8] Ibid at 959.

1. the length of the delay alleged;
2. the reasons for the delay;
3. any 'clearly and unequivocally' proved 'waiver of time periods' by the accused; and
4. the degree of prejudice suffered by the accused.[1]

The reasons for the delay were then divided into:

1. those caused by the state;
2. those caused by special circumstances such as complexity;
3. those caused by systemic or institutional factors; and
4. those caused by the accused's conduct (the state to prove this cause).[2]

Liberty, security and a just trial were identified as the interests affected,[3] and 'prejudice' was divided into:

1. oppressive pre-trial incarceration;
2. anxiety and concern; and
3. impairment of the defence.[4]

These considerations were then all to be assessed by an 'ad hoc balancing' act 'requiring the ability and skill of a juggler'.[5] Conceptual problems with this analytical framework abound: the meaning of 'prejudice' and its relationship with the length of the delay (some circularity seeming unavoidable), the operation of a 'reasonableness' element within the determination of the length period itself, which is to act as a factor in determining 'reasonableness',[6] the operation of a more specific species of 'actual prejudice' within the generic category of 'prejudice',[7] the operation of the accused's conduct as a cause within the category of 'prejudice',[8] and whether 'prejudice' is a necessary but not sufficient requirement,[9] or not a necessary but often a sufficient requirement.[10] It had appeared from the judgment in Coetzee & Others v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others that 'trial prejudice' — ie the impairment of the ability to present an adequate defence — was the most important and ultimately decisive factor in the juggler's act.[11] The

[1] Moeketsi (supra) at 961. See also R v Askov (1990) 2 SCR 1199.
[2] Moeketsi (supra) at 965.
[3] Ibid at 961.
[4] Barker v Wingo 407 US 515 (1972).
[5] Moeketsi (supra) at 965.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid at 968.
[8] Ibid.
[9] See United States v Lovasco 431 US 783 (1977), as cited in Moeketsi (supra) at 962-963.
[10] See United States v Marion 404 US 307, 320 (1971), cited in Moeketsi (supra) at 961. See also P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992) § 49.10 ('[A] finding of prejudice is not a necessary condition of a ruling of unreasonable delay'); Coetzee v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D), 1997 (1) SACR 546 (D)(The intensity of prejudice at trial was in effect the governing factor decisively determining whether a fair trial was possible or not.)
[11] 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D), 1997 (1) SACR 546 (D)('Coetzee v Attorney-General').

High Court's adoption of the English abuse of process jurisprudence led to the following conclusion and problem: if undue delay was culpable, a stay of proceedings might be ordered, depending ultimately on the degree of prejudice suffered. If, on the other hand, there was only prejudice (no culpability in the undue delay), a stay could be ordered provided prejudice was sufficient to render the trial unfair. Both tests clearly turned on the degree of 'trial prejudice' suffered by the accused. The threshold for both tests was whether the threat to a 'fair trial' had reached critical mass. This threshold cannot be different for the two cases. It therefore becomes vital to ask what effect, in principle, fault on the part of the authorities should have on the fairness assessment — irrespective of the degree of prejudice. The independent force of the reasonable time right within the fair trial canon must be given some meaning. A question-begging test in terms of ultimate fairness, while perhaps appropriate for a decision on the remedy, is a conceptually unsatisfactory way of establishing whether the right has been violated in the first place.[1] Abuse of process analysis has not yielded clarity.[2] One should also note

[1] See R v Carosella (1997) 142 DLR (4th) 595 at paras 26-40 (The majority held that a determination whether a fundamental right had been breached based upon the degree of resulting trial prejudice conflated the remedy question and the violation question. The court categorically held that the question of the degree of prejudice suffered by an accused was not a consideration to be addressed in the context of determining whether a substantive Charter right had been breached, such prejudice being relevant only to the remedy stage. Whatever the merits of this latter, rather striking pronouncement, a similar effort to distinguish the remedy question from the violation question is crucial for a proper approach to the speedy process rights in South Africa.) The Natal Provincial Division in Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others regrettably allowed the conclusion that there had been no violation of rights under IC s 25(3)(a) to follow from the finding that the drastic remedy of dismissing the case or granting a stay of the prosecution was not called for. 1997 (7) BCLR 974, 987 (N). The Constitutional Court, in Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others, made the following welcome observations about the finding:

> I would respectfully suggest that the finding that there had been no infringement conflates the question of infringement under s 25(3)(a) with that of remedy under s 7(4)(a). Although the successive steps of the analysis should not be performed in watertight compartments, their separate and distinct requirements should not be overlooked. . . . A finding that the consequential relief sought is inappropriate must not be confused with the antecedent finding as to infringement.'

1998 (3) SA 695 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 656 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 1 (CC) at para 28 (per Kriegler J).

[2] On the extensive trawl of common law abuse of process jurisprudence, see Coetzee v Attorney-General The jurisprudence of abuse of process, while accepting the rights of the individual and the fairness of the trial as factors within the inquiry, is concerned with essentially a different question from that posed by the definition of the rights of the individual: the question is whether the execution of a prosecution in a certain manner should be countenanced by the courts. The famous formulation of the principle in S v Ebrahim, requiring the state to come to court with clean hands ('met skoon hande'), indicates that a quasi-estoppel principle operates in the question of abuse. 1991 (2) SA 553 (A). The most recent test for abuse formulated by the House of Lords was whether continuing the prosecution would be 'shocking to the public conscience' R v Latif and Shazhad [1996] 1 WLR 104 (HL). This test suffers from the same problem, were it to be taken seriously, as afflicts the Canadian 'disrepute' test applied to the admission of unlawfully obtained evidence: the abandonment of the proceedings due to delay would almost invariably be more 'shocking to the public conscience' than a continuation of the prosecution despite delay. See Hogg (supra) at § 38.6. The decision of the House of Lords in Latif may well have sounded the death knell to the prospects of success of abuse of process claims in cases involving unlawfully engineered prosecutions: the extraordinary latitude afforded the authorities to lure suspected drug traffickers into the jurisdiction was a direct result of their lordships' concern with the effect a stay of proceedings in serious drug cases would have on the 'public conscience'.

that if 'trial prejudice' is to become the focal point in the inquiry, that such doubt favours the defence, and that 'trial prejudice' caused by delay may often be more serious for the prosecution than for the defence.[1] One form of 'prejudice' which is not relevant — because it is 'too remote from the exigencies of a fair trial' — is the consideration that if the trial had finished earlier, the accused would have been imprisoned earlier, and would have been closer to eventual release.[2]

The question of unreasonable delay, and particularly the kinds of prejudice relevant to the enquiry, came before the Constitutional Court in Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape.[3] Kriegler J asserted in a unanimous judgment that the right to trial within a reasonable time was 'expressly cast as an incident of the right to a fair trial'. Thus, the question in South Africa was whether non-trial-related interests were catered for at all — the inverse of the question in North America. Kriegler J regarded this fact, and the fact that paras (b)-(j) of IC s 25(3) all related directly to the conduct of the trial itself, coupled with the clear emphasis of IC s 25(3) on the trial, in obvious contrast to that of IC s 25(1) and (2), as a persuasive textual argument for the proposition that only trial prejudice was contemplated by IC s 25(3)(a). We would suggest that because the right in question by definition points outwards beyond the confines of the trial as far as 'time' is concerned, one might legitimately draw the conclusion that it is not confined to the trial as far as 'prejudice' is concerned. Be that as it may, Kriegler J held that all three kinds of interest at play — liberty, security and trial-related interests — were protected by IC s 25(3)(a). The pivot for the Court's reasoning was the presumption of innocence.[4] Given the 'punishment' inherent in being taken through the mills of the criminal justice system, and given that the law wished to punish only those found guilty, the right to a trial within a reasonable time served to reduce to a minimum any unnecessary punishment caused by the slow turning of the mill.[5]

[1] See R v L (WK) [1991] 1 SCR 1091, 1100; R v Finta [1994] 1 SCR 701, 875. See also Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 36 n 41. Kriegler J points out that social prejudice might also diminish as the delay progressed. Ibid at para 30 n 31. In Smyth v Ushewokunze & Another the applicant complained of a five-year delay between the occurrence of an incident for which he was being charged with culpable homicide and the proceedings themselves, inter alia on the basis that potential defence witnesses had become unavailable or would have dimmed memories. 1998 (2) BCLR 170 (ZS). The court required the actual unavailability of these witnesses to be proved, as well as any actual loss of memory that they might have undergone. One reads: 'Without their personal say-so, no actual prejudice to the applicant's defence has been shown. An apprehension that there may be prejudice does not suffice. There must be real prejudice to the applicant's ability to mount a full and fair defence resulting from the inordinate delay on the part of the state in charging him with the offences.' Ibid at 181C.

[2] Coetzee v Attorney-General (supra) at 565.

[3] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC)('Sanderson').

[4] Ibid at para 23. See also P Schwikkard 'Arrested, Accused and Detained Persons' in I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 786; S v Dzukuda 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC) at para 51 (Categorized the protected interests in a similar manner.)

[5] Kriegler J made the following important point: 'But the object of the current exercise is not the general disadvantages suffered by an accused in consequence of serious charges being preferred. Our focus is on delay and the prejudice that it causes.' Sanderson (supra) at para 40. He continues: 'One is therefore not so much concerned with the prejudice flowing from the charges and the publicity they initially generated, but with the aggravation of that prejudice ascribable to the delay.' Ibid at para 41.

Indeed, Kriegler J conceived of the possibility of cases where a permanent stay might be appropriate without there being trial prejudice.[1]

In the course of raising a caveat about the usefulness of slavish invocation of comparative jurisprudence in this area, Kriegler J held that the requirement of an 'assertion of right' laid down in Barker v Wingo[2] was inappropriate in South Africa, 'where a vast majority of South African accused [were] unrepresented and [had] no conception of a right to a speedy trial'.[3] The Court's approach to the role of time appears from the following dictum:

> [T]ime has a pervasive significance that bears on all the factors and should not be considered at the threshold or, subsequently, in isolation. Time does not only condition the relevant considerations, such as prejudice, it is also conditioned by them. The factors generally relied upon by the state — waiver of time periods, the time requirements inherent in the case, and systemic reasons for delay — all seek to diminish the impact of elapsed time.[4]

It then emerged clearly that for Kriegler J the most important equation was the function of time and prejudice.[5] Employing the factors as positive and negative influences in a function was Kriegler J's method of defining 'reasonableness' for the purposes of IC s 25(3)(a).[6] One may describe the function thus:

> (un)reasonableness = time x (prejudice + aggravating circumstances — alleviating circumstances)[7]

Alleviating circumstances encompass waiver and contributory responsibility. Kriegler J also included culpability on the part of the authorities as a factor in the equation on the side of aggravating circumstances.[8] One should note that the calculation employed by Kriegler J was exhaustive of the question of violation and

[1] Sanderson (supra) at para 42.

[2] 407 US 515 (1972).

[3] Sanderson (supra) at para 26. It was held that the question was not whether the accused wanted to go to trial but whether he had actually suffered prejudice as a result of the lapse of time. Ibid at para 32. Kriegler J did proceed to explain that this did not mean an accused who had been the primary agent of delay should be able to rely on it in vindicating his or her rights under IC s 25(3)(a).. There was, however, 'no need for an accused to assert his right or actively compel the state to accelerate the preparation of its case.' Ibid at para 33.

[4] Ibid at paras 28-29.

[5] Ibid at para 31.

[6] Ibid at para 27.

[7] A similar sort of exercise obtains in assessments of negligence in the law of delict, in cases where reasonableness = risk x (seriousness of harm + cost of precaution). See Wasserman v Union Government 1934 AD 228 and Bolton & Others v Stone [1951] AC 850 (HL).

[8] On 'systemic delay' being 'probably more excusable' and 'exculpatory', see Sanderson (supra) at para 35. In Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others Kriegler J said of Sanderson: '. . . [T]he judgment makes plain that fault on the part of the prosecution which results in delay is an important circumstance. Although the ultimate enquiry is whether the time between the charge and the trial is unreasonable, it is obviously relevant that the one or the other party is to blame, in whole or in part, for the delay.' Ibid at para 8. Later one reads: 'In a case such as this, where there is a period of ostensibly culpable inactivity on the part of the prosecution, an inference of unreasonableness can more readily be drawn if no explanation is proffered.' Ibid at para 25 citing 1998 (3) SA 695 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 656 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Wild'). The operation of complexity (or simplicity) as an aggravating (or mitigating) factor, is also emphasized in Wild. Ibid at para 7.

justification, and did not fit comfortably into the two-stage analysis of rights interpretation.[1]

Mention was made in Moeketsi of the fact that the only available remedy in Canada and the United States was a stay of proceedings, and that this view had not 'found favour in all quarters'. Commentators such as Amsterdam and Hogg had argued that 'the primary form of judicial relief against a denial of a speedy trial should be to expedite the trial, not to abort it'.[2] This suggestion makes sense in a situation where the suspect or the accused is arrested or charged, and is suffering prejudice (in the broad sense) from a failure on the part of the authorities to get the matter settled. Action on the part of the individual concerned to expedite the trial would seem to be required lest 'waiver of time periods' be an inescapable inference.[3] But where the individual has been surprised by a prosecution after a matter of years, or is suffering under suspicion but can hardly be expected to demand to be arrested,[4] or to be informed of the exact state of the [1] See § 51.1*(b)(iv) supra. Difficulties which such an approach entailed for the question as to whether there had been a violation appeared in para 35 of the judgment: it had to be accepted that South Africa had 'not yet' reached the stage where the undeniably substantial systemic burdens could 'no longer be regarded as exculpatory'. Nevertheless, the right was a right and not an aspiration. See § 51.5(b)* infra, on the remedial value of a finding of a violation which is nevertheless held justified.

[2] Moekesti (supra) at 970. See A Amsterdam 'Speedy Criminal Trial: Rights and Remedies' (1975) 27 Stanford LR 525, 535; Hogg (supra) § 49.10.

[3] See Berg v Prokureur-Generaal, Gauteng 1995 (2) SACR 623 (T)(Discussion about the expectation that the accused exhaust lesser remedies before a stay of proceedings could be considered.) The pronouncement that a stay was an extraordinary and drastic remedy only to be granted exceptionally was seemingly endorsed in Moeketsi. Moeketsi (supra) at 970.

[4] See Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W)(The applicant should have asserted the right to a trial within a reasonable time after it had been 'intimated to him' that he was under suspicion for murder. Before one has been formally charged or at least arrested for an offence the hope that suspicions may pass and not bloom into charges is only reasonable.) See also Du Preez v Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape 1997 (3) BCLR 329 (E) were whether there was any duty upon the authorities to speed up an investigation when there were public suspicions damaging to the person suspected, and whether a certain degree of promptness was required after a decision to charge had been reached, but before it had been communicated in any way to the person concerned, was considered. These questions, it is submitted, are best distinguished from the question of keeping to a minimum the period somebody is denied his or her liberty without having been proved guilty. The Zimbabwe Supreme Court, relying on Coetzee v Attorney-General (supra) at 999G-1000A assumed that the Zimbabwean speedy trial right, which in s 18(2) of the Zimbabwean Constitution was conferred upon someone who had been 'charged', permitted redress where an unreasonable delay on the part of the state in commencing the trial preceded the date upon which the accused person was officially notified that he had committed a criminal offence. Smyth v Ushewokunze & Another 1998 (2) BCLR 170, 180B-C (ZS). This was odd, given the Court's minute attention to the question whether a person had been 'charged' for the purposes of s 18(2) (Ibid at 178-179), and particularly given the following finding: 'The fact that the applicant must have realized that he was under suspicion in relation to allegations of crimen injuria and culpable homicide and that investigations were being undertaken on behalf of the second respondent, did not start the clock ticking against the State. Even the request for a statement concerning the drowning did not amount to an official notification that the applicant had committed a criminal offence'. Ibid at 179H. See also Feedmill Developments (Pty) Ltd & Another v Attorney-General, Kwazulu-Natal 1998 (9) BCLR 1072 (N)(Saw the problem of pre-summons delay in circumstances where complex investigations and vetting have to be carried out in order to determine whether a prosecution should ensue. The facts rendered the complaint of trial prejudice due to the delay rather unpersuasive. But the case illustrated that cases might arise in which the justifiable delay in deciding to prosecute occasioned by complex investigations could give rise to real trial prejudice on the part of the eventually surprised and unprepared accused.)

investigation, or where the delay which has already occurred is 'unreasonable', then expediting the proceedings may only put an end the violation, not remedy it. In such instances, a damages claim may be regarded as more appropriate than a stay of proceedings.[1]

In Sanderson, Kriegler J established authoritatively that, unlike the 'remedial context' in the United States and Canada, our constitutional framework allowed remedies other than a stay of proceedings for violations of the speedy process right.[2] Kriegler J pointed out that '[o]ur flexibility in providing remedies [might] affect our understanding of the right'.[3] This statement should not be understood to conflate the right with the remedy, or as allowing a finding of violation to depend on the appropriateness of the remedy sought. On the contrary, it is to be taken as a cue to separate the question of violation from that of the remedy sought. For while the broad array of remedies available under the Final Constitution does make it easier for a court to find a violation of a fundamental right, one must keep in mind that the finding of a violation need not entail the very drastic remedy of what amounts to unconditional discharge.[4] With a warning that one was not dealing with fixed rules,[5] Kriegler J declared as follows:

> Release from custody is appropriate relief for an awaiting-trial prisoner who has been held too long; a refusal of a postponement is appropriate relief for a person who wishes to bring matters to a head to avoid remaining under a cloud; a stay of prosecution is appropriate relief where there is trial prejudice.[6]

One might add: damages may be appropriate relief for unjustifiable violations that cannot be redressed in any other appropriate manner.

[1] See S v Pennington & Another 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) at paras 41-43 (Dicta of the unanimous Constitutional Court in that whatever 'appropriate relief' the applicants were entitled to under IC s 7 for any unreasonable delay in their appeal, it would be contrary to the public interest and bring the administration of justice into disrepute if such delay were to result in excusing the applicants from serving their sentences. It should be stressed that in Pennington the relevant (and final) appeal had already failed, which meant that the persons concerned could be regarded as having been finally and authoritatively declared 'guilty'.)

[2] Sanderson (supra) at para 27 (Invokes Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).)

[3] Sanderson (supra) at para 27. See also Wild (supra) at para 9 (Kriegler J put it thus: 'Because of the flexibility allowed by [IC s 7(4)(a)], a court can tailor a snug fit between infringement and remedy.')

[4] It should be noted that Kriegler J did not actually rule on whether the delay in Sanderson had been 'unreasonable', and therefore did not give a finding on whether the right had been violated. The ruling that the remedy sought (a stay) was inappropriate put paid to the enquiry. Sanderson (supra) at para 42. See also Wild (supra) at paras 25-26 (Kriegler J remarked that the reasonableness question was 'really beside the point' in a case where the only remedy sought was inappropriate. This was because the remedy of a permanent stay of the prosecution was competent only in cases of trial prejudice or extraordinary circumstances. It may be asked whether the unreasonableness of the delay may not in some cases be relevant to the presence of 'extraordinary circumstances'.)

[5] Sanderson (supra) at para 42.

[6] Ibid at para 41.

The remedy was the focus of the Constitutional Court's judgment in Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others. The focus, however, was not so much on appropriate remedies as on the fact that a stay was inappropriate. It may now be said with some confidence that the possibility of a stay as a remedy will be entertained only where the defence has suffered trial prejudice by the delay, or where 'extraordinary circumstances' are present.[1]

Kriegler J made it quite clear that the jurisprudence of speedy process was not merely a question of stay or no stay:

> On the contrary, the true effect and scope of the protection against unreasonable delay is much wider and more significant than and should not be obscured by the more dramatic and far-reaching remedy of a stay of prosecution. The crucial point of [IC s 25(3)(a)] is that the Constitution demonstrably ranks the right to a speedy trial in the forefront of the requirements for a fair criminal trial. That means that the state is at all times and in all cases obligated to ensure that accused persons are not exposed to unreasonable delay in the prosecution of the cases against them. That, in turn, means that both state prosecutors and presiding officers must be mindful that they are constitutionally bound to prevent infringement of the right to a speedy trial. Where such infringement does occur, or where it appears imminent, there is a duty under [IC s 7(4)(a)] to devise and implement an appropriate remedy or combination of remedies.[2]

In the instant case, a series of remands for 'further investigation' meant that the trial began in the new constitutional era.[3] The obvious advantage of newly minted constitutional rights for the appellants outweighed any prejudice up to that point, and from then on 'the prosecution was dilatory in a number of respects while the defence showed little eagerness for the trial to start'.[4] The process was paralysed

[1] Sanderson (supra) at paras 25-26. The appellants had complained of what the Court a quo called 'prejudice of a personal nature': adverse publicity affecting their careers, personal and family anxiety, expense, and a difficulty in exercising access rights to children. Wild & Another v Hoffert NO & Others 1997 (7) BCLR 974, 987 (N). See McCarthy v Additional Magistrate, Johannesburg 2000 (2) SACR 542 (SCA)(Court decided that a party asserting an unreasonable delay in prosecution was required to show more than average systemic delay and that an indefinite stay of prosecution would seldom be granted in the absence of extraordinary circumstances); Director of Public Prosecutions KZN v Regional Magistrate, Durban & Another 2001 (1) SACR 463, 470 (N)(Hugo J emphasized that a complainant had no legal right to the comfort afforded by a successful prosecution and that such complainant consequently enjoyed no right to be heard before a permanent stay in prosecution was ordered.)

[2] Wild (supra) at para 11.

[3] Kriegler J was at pains to criticize the phenomena of district court trials characterized by a succession of routine postponements 'for further investigation' and 'the curious practice of postponing cases for no other reason than to fix a trial date later'. Ibid at para 30. The failure of prosecutors and magistrates to do what they could to alleviate the administrative chaos was lamented. Ibid at paras 31-34. On the other hand, the legislative efforts to introduce a mechanism for enforcement under s 342A of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 was praised as a step in the right direction, though one that had to be 'mindful of the constitutional context'. Ibid at para 32. See also S v Maredi 2000 (1) SACR 611, 614 (T)(Mynhardt J had to consider a case on review after the accused had been in custody for 17 months before charges of housebreaking with the intent to steal and theft were put to him. He had been in custody for 22 months before the case was finalized. The court found that the delays amounted to a breach of the accused's right to a speedy trial as intended by FC s 35(3)(d) and that the conduct of the prosecutors and magistrates involved in the proceedings was deserving of censure. Disciplinary steps against the prosecutors and magistrates were deemed appropriate.)

[4] Wild (supra) at para 17.

by the introduction of a constitutional defence, and the applications spawned thereby were not attended to with vigorous alacrity. A new front was opened through allegations of grand conspiracy, and the ultimate result was that the magistrate struck the matter from the roll. The focal point of 'unreasonable delay' became the four-month period between the withdrawal of the constitutional application (when the matter was struck) and the fresh prosecution. This period was 'arguably … unreasonably long'.[1] But, absent a showing or an allegation of trial prejudice or extraordinary circumstances, a stay of prosecution was inappropriate.[2] This refusal to grant such a remedy, however, 'by no means [put] paid to [the appellants'] rights under [IC s 25(3)(a)]'. These rights and the duty to devise appropriate remedial relief for their infringement continue throughout the trial.[3] Wild should be recognized as a clear invitation to practitioners to be more selective, realistic, and perhaps inventive, in their quest for remedies for unreasonable delay. But since a stay will remain the Holy Grail, one may expect challenges in future to concentrate on showing 'extraordinary circumstances' where trial prejudice is hard to establish.[4]

The grant of a stay of proceedings — essentially on grounds of 'significant extra-judicial prejudice' — was upheld by the Lesotho Court of Appeal in Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Lebona.[5] The respondent had been summarily 'interdicted' from her civil service position without pay, and for periods at half pay, owing to investigations into alleged fraudulent activities on her part. The intended criminal proceedings underwent the most flabbergasting series of delays and abortions, described by Steyn P as a 'litany of incidents demonstrating the failure of the criminal justice system in respect of this citizen'.[6] Apart from engaging in futile efforts to challenge her 'interdiction' by civil means, the respondent 'was not a willing or even supine accused who [was] content to let her

[1] Wild (supra) at para 25. One matter of concern to which Kriegler J referred was the fact that the withdrawal of a charge was not 'a mere formality nor a device to circumvent the refusal of a postponement' '. . . [I]t can and should be observed', said Kriegler J, 'that a withdrawal can in itself carry considerable weight in any evaluation . . . of the reasonableness of a time lapse, and also in deciding on an appropriate remedy . . ..' Ibid at para 35. This should be particularly true if the refusal of a postponement was in any way due to unreasonable delay. Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Lebona 1998 (5) BCLR 618, 637D (LesCA)(Argument that the respondent complaining of unfair delay should have invoked her right to a discharge where the prosecution did not appear for trial was rejected on the basis that it would be absurd if the right to a trial within a reasonable time could be 'rendered nugatory by a ready recourse to the stratagem suggested by the Crown')

[2] Wild (supra) at para 27. See also Erasmus J in Naidoo & Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2003] 4 All SA 380 (C).

[3] Wild (supra) at para 36.

[4] The trial prejudice should, of course, have a sufficiently serious impact upon the fairness of proceedings to merit the remedy. It is submitted that once it has been determined, using the Sanderson formula, that the right has been violated, and then that the violation would lead to trial prejudice, it should be up to the state to argue why a stay should not be granted.

[5] 1998 (5) BCLR 618 (LesCA)('Lebona').

[6] Ibid at 627C.

criminal trial drag on at a snail's pace determined by the authorities. Her counsel [wrote] about her criminal trial and plead[ed] to 'have this matter finalized so that [the] client [might] know her fate soonest'.[1] The appellant's complaint that extra-trial prejudice was taken into account in granting the stay was dismissed on three grounds. First, extra-trial prejudice was relevant and significant.[2] Secondly, society itself demanded trials within a reasonable time, irrespective of the effect on a particular accused's defence.[3] Thirdly, perhaps fortunately, there was 'a very specific trial prejudice allegedly suffered by respondent which [was] not denied by the appellants'.[4] As a result, a stay was upheld because of the gravity of the extra-trial prejudice suffered. While the judgment did not make a specific finding that the circumstances were 'extraordinary', such a finding would have been appropriate in this case more than in any other. One ironic danger about a test framed in terms of 'extraordinary circumstances' emerged from this matter: if chaos and paralysis become the order of the day, an argument that chaos and paralysis are 'extraordinary' would, strictly speaking, have little purchase. It is to be hoped that the authorities will not be allowed to invoke the frequency and ubiquity of their own failures as an argument that defeats a stay of proceedings in extreme cases.[5]

(g) The right to be present when being tried

This right, found in FC s 35(3)(e), is another right not found in the Interim Constitution. FC s 35(3)(e) has, as its source, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights art 14*(d). Both FC s 35(3)(e)* and art 14*(d)* have a very different purpose than such protection as is afforded by art 6(3)(c) of the European Convention on Human Rights. Article 6(3)(c) of the European Convention on Human Rights grants the accused the right 'to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing'. Fawcett observes that a legally represented accused has

[1] Lebona (supra) at 635D.
[2] Ibid at 632H-635A.
[3] Ibid at 632E, 636C-D.
[4] Ibid at 636E-G. This piece of trial prejudice entailed the unavailability of potential defence witnesses. Steyn P held that the respondent would have been well advised to furnish greater particulars of such prejudice to demonstrate it more sufficiently, but that, since the appellants had not bothered to challenge the averments concerning trial prejudice, these had to be accepted. Ibid at 636F-G.
[5] See S v Motsasi 1998 (2) SACR 35, 39, 48, 49 (W)(De Villiers J discussed at length the shockingly disconcerting ('besonder skokkend en verontrustend') situation prevailing at Johannesburg Central Prison, which led in that case to the late arrival at court of the accused. The court exercised its powers under s 342A(3) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, as amended, in ordering an enquiry into the cause of this particular manifestation of tardiness, symptomatic of what De Villiers J described as the tip of an iceberg threatening to sink the 'Titanic' of South African society. The judgment, and the reports it engendered, would provide some insight to interested persons into the degree of chaos threatening the administration of justice in this country. The extent of the problem, which could be alleviated by the introduction of a modicum of diligence at a general level, is alarming. In the words of a prison official quoted by a newspaper: 'Sekere beamptes doen hulle bes, maar 'n mens kan nie teen 'n muur baklei as jou kollegas net nie wil help nie.')

no article 6 claim to be present at the proceedings.[1] However, if legal representation were regarded as an absolute substitute for the right to appear in person under FC s 35(3)(e), then it should be required that such legal representation be that chosen by the accused person or at least be accepted as competent to act as his or her representative at the proceedings. Unless it is so understood, FC s 35(3)(e) would be in danger of being sidestepped in the few cases where vigilant insistence upon its observance would be required.[2] Justifiable restrictions should be a matter for FC s 36(1). The right in question is one unproblematically framed in positive and absolute terms and thus makes it easily subject to two-stage analysis. The presence requirement is closely related to 'confrontation' or 'challenge' considerations entailed by the right to adduce and challenge evidence in FC s 35(3)(i).[3] Since the right to adduce and to challenge does not guarantee 'confrontation' in the strict sense required by the American Sixth Amendment, the express provision of a 'presence' right may lend a more concrete dimension to the 'challenge' rights.[4]

The accused's constitutional right to be present when being tried is also contained in s 158 of the Criminal Procedure Act. This section, however, does not guarantee the physical presence of the witness and the accused in the same room. Provision is made for the giving of evidence by a witness 'by closed circuit television or similar electronic media'.[5] The circumstances in which criminal

[1] JES Fawcett The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition, 1987) 190.

[2] For a sober reminder of what sorts of legal representation might be offered in lieu of personal appearance, see L Fernandez 'The Law, Lawyers and the Courts in Nazi Germany' (1985) 1 SAJHR 124, 128. See also S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 194-201; X v Norway Application No 5923/72 (Complaint was that defendant's lawyer had agreed with the judge not to examine witnesses, one witness not having been called owing to the defendant's absence. The claim was rejected on the importance of the witness in question. Stavros discusses the case law on trials in absentia and points out that the European Court has moved away from requiring a showing of prejudice and has acknowledged a positive obligation on the part of the authorities to assist in transporting the accused to the proceedings in addition to the requirements of fair notice and opportunity.) Stavros discusses the problems inherent in waiver of this right (particularly if done by the legal representative without instructions from the accused), with particular focus on the case of absconding or malingering accused or those who deliberately render themselves unable to be tried, eg through hunger strikes. The requirement of co-operation by an accused in securing a speedy trial referred to in Berg v Prokureur-Generaal, Gauteng would presumably operate by analogy in cases of in absentia objections where the accused himself or herself has rendered a determination of the trial in his or her presence impossible or severely hampered this possibility. 1995 (2) SACR 623 (T). The Criminal Procedure Act s 159(1) is concerned with exactly such a situation where the accused renders continuation of the proceedings in his presence impracticable. See also Illinois v Allen 397 US 337 (1970). For more on speedy trials, see § 51.5*(f)* supra.

[3] See Klink v Regional Court Magistrate NO & Others 1996 (3) BCLR 402 (SE)(Suggestion that the right to a public trial did not guarantee the presence of the witness and the accused in the same room.)

[4] See Coy v Iowa 487 US 1012 (1988); Maryland v Craig 497 US 836 (1990)(On the literal meaning of 'confrontation' (physical presence face to face with accusers) irrespective of the degree of challenge a particular procedure allows an accused.)

[5] See K v The Regional Court Magistrate NO & Others 1996 (1) SACR 434 (E); S v Stefaans 1999 (1) SACR 182 (E); S v M [2004] 2 All SA 74 (D).

proceedings may be conducted in the absence of the accused are listed in s 159. Section 160 prescribes the procedures to be followed where an accused is absent.

(h) The right to counsel

Many of the considerations that pertain to the right of a detainee to pre-trial counsel apply also to the right of an accused to counsel at the trial.[1] The role of the right to counsel as ensuring respect for equality, the right to silence, the right against self-incrimination and the presumption of innocence[2] must guide the courts in the kinds of protection to be offered the unrepresented accused when the court is providing such an accused with the right to assistance recognized under the residual fair trial right.[3]

The right to be informed of the right to counsel, as well as the right to be informed of the right to have counsel appointed at state expense if substantial injustice would otherwise result, must be regarded as operating independently of the right to counsel itself, given the independent entrenchment of the information rights in FC s 35(3)(f) and (g).[4] Failure to inform the accused accordingly has been held to amount to an irregularity rendering the trial unfair.[5] That one is entitled to have counsel appointed at state expense if substantial injustice would otherwise result might come as a surprise to some accused — and it might well affect the extent to which waiver of the right to counsel represents an exercise of informed choice.[6] The informing duty imposed upon the presiding officer does not entail

[1] See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[2] See S v Melani 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E), 1996 (1) SACR 335, 347-8 (E)(In the pre-trial context.)

[3] See § 51.5*(b)* supra.

[4] The Final Constitution's information right is expressly governed by the general right contained in FC s 35(4) to have all constitutionally required information provided in a language one understands. See § 51.3*(a)* supra.

[5] S v Gouwe 1995 (8) BCLR 968 (B). See S v Pienaar 2000 (2) SACR 143 (NC)(The accused, who was Afrikaans speaking, asked his legal representative, who was English speaking and could not speak Afrikaans, to withdraw, which she then did. The proceedings continued without legal representation for the accused and the accused was accordingly convicted of dealing in dagga. The reviewing court held that the right to a fair trial included that the accused be entitled to the assistance of a legal representative with whom he could communicate in his own language, whether directly or in exceptional cases where this was not possible, by means of an interpreter. The magistrate's failure to explain this right to the accused resulted in a breach of his right to a fair trial, which amounted to an irregularity in the proceedings. The court held further that the magistrate's failure to explain this right to the accused was the same as a failure to inform the accused of his right to legal representation. The end result was that the accused had not received the legal assistance to which he was entitled in the case and the conviction and sentence were set aside.) See also S v M [2004] 2 All SA 74 (D) at para 13; PM Bekker 'The Right to Legal Counsel and the Constitution' (1997) 30 De Jure 219.

[6] See Mgcina v Regional Magistrate, Lenasia, & Another 1997 (2) SACR 711, 732 (W)(Borchers J recognized that being informed by an unspecified 'lady from legal aid' that one might obtain representation through 'the Legal Aid' did not necessarily also entail being apprised of the fact that a lawyer could be appointed at state expense where substantial injustice would otherwise result.) It is submitted that speculation about the accused's probable knowledge of his or her rights given his or her past brushes with the law should not be encouraged, as it waters down an important safeguard and focuses the judicial mind upon matters threatening the presumption of innocence. The finding in S v a formalistic obligation to recite the exact words of the section.[1] Indeed, advice that one is entitled to appointed counsel 'if substantial injustice would otherwise result' might puzzle more than it informs.[2] Although a court should naturally not be required to explain the conditions upon which such a finding might eventuate, some sense that the accused would be entitled to appointed counsel if the court were satisfied that it would be good for justice should be conveyed to the accused. The crucial idea is that this right exists, but that entitlement is not automatic. The question 'are you going to conduct your own defence?' can hardly be said to imply the extent of the entitlement sufficiently.[3] Whether advice of rights given at stages prior to the proceedings may still be operative at the proceedings is a question which involves similar problems to those that obtain during pre-trial procedures.[4] In S v Langa, the Natal Provincial Division was confronted with the situation where an arrested person had been informed of his rights to legal representation and silence upon arrest, but not by the presiding officer at the initiation of plea proceedings under s 119 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.[5] The court regarded itself as bound by the pre-constitutional decision of the Appellate Division in S v Mabaso.[6] Mabaso held that failure to advise of the right to legal representation upon plea proceedings did not amount to a fatal irregularity,

Moilwa 1997 (1) SACR 188, 192 (NC) that such an approach was a complete misdirection ('totale mistasting') must therefore be welcomed. See S v Moos 1998 (1) SACR 372 (C)(Court displayed sensitivity to the difficulty of finding waiver to have constituted an exercise of informed choice in the present context. The accused had intimated that he would arrange his own representation, but this did not come about. After conviction and referral to a regional court for sentencing, it emerged that the accused had been unaware of the possibility of appointed and funded representation, and that he would have wanted to avail himself of it throughout. On review, Van Reenen J pointed out that an awareness of one's right to employ a lawyer did not necessarily entail awareness of the right to have a lawyer appointed in the circumstances set out in IC s 25(3)(e). Ibid at 380G-381A. The learned judge then considered waiver, and was inclined to regard it as inappropriate to the right to legal representation, regarding as more apposite a species of election which did not entail irrevocable abandonment of alternatives not chosen. Ibid at 381F-G. In any event, informed election was essential, and its absence resulted in a failure of justice. Ibid at 381H-383.); S v Orrie & Another 2005 (1) SACR 63 (C)(The accused had been informed of his right to choose and consult with a legal practitioner but the state did not prove that he had been informed that he was entitled to a legal aid lawyer. The accused made use of privately-funded counsel throughout the trial. On an allegation by the accused that his rights were not properly explained to him, the Court held that the omission from the warning given to the accused had not led to his suffering any prejudice at all. Furthermore, no evidence had been led to suggest that the accused would ever have relied on state-provided counsel.)

[1] M en Andere v Streeklanddros, Middelburg, Transvaal, en Andere 1995 (2) SACR 709 (T)(Substantive compliance with the requirement in IC s 25(3)(e) was required.)

[2] See S v Soci 1998 (3) BCLR 376 (E), 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E). See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[3] See S v Ramuongiwa 1997 (2) BCLR 268 (V)(Exclusive employment of this question amounted to a fatal failure to inform); S v Solomons 2004 (1) SACR 137 (C)(Dlodlo AJ held that it would be an extremely dangerous practice to 'assume' that an accused person did not want to be legally represented. On the contrary, the court had to satisfy itself that the accused person's choice to conduct his own defence was indeed an informed decision. Ibid at para 13.)

[4] See § 51.3*(f)* supra.

[5] 1996 (2) SACR 153 (N).

[6] 1990 (3) SA 185 (A)('Mabaso').

the link between the failure to inform and the plea of guilty being 'entirely speculative and remote'.[1] Magid J indicated agreement with counsel's view that the minority judgment in Mabaso, which laid great stress on the court's responsibility to protect the illiterate and unsophisticated accused against the consequences of ignorance, was more 'well reasoned' and more 'in accord with the legal and human rights philosophy … enshrined in the [Interim] Constitution than that of the majority'.[2]

What did not emerge clearly from the report was what kind of advice the accused had received upon arrest. Even more than in the case of different stages of pre-trial procedure, the transition from the pre-trial situation to the plea proceedings requires a reiteration of the right to representation, given that it by no means follows — for the average reasonable person — that the right to have a lawyer present during custody translates into the right to be represented in court proceedings.[3]

The distinction between the right to choose a legal representative and the right to have one appointed at state expense has been held to imply that the latter right does not entitle the accused to choose the representative which the state is to appoint.[4] Nevertheless, the absence of such a right does not mean that the sort of accommodation of the accused's wishes which was respected at common law in the case of pro Deo counsel is no longer required.[5] These accommodating requirements should be seen not as granting the accused the right to 'choose' the representative to be appointed, but as part of an assessment whether substantial injustice would otherwise result. The latter question is relevant both to the question whether to assign counsel and to the question what sort of counsel should be assigned. In S v Manguanyana an indication was given of the extent to [1] Mabaso (supra) at 209F (Hoexter JA).

[2] Ibid at 155-156. A similar stance was taken by the court in S v Mbambo, where an unrepresented accused was not informed of his rights contained in FC s 35(3)(f) and (g) and was not encouraged to exercise them. 1999 (2) SACR 421 (W). The accused faced a severe mandatory sentence upon conviction. Goldstein J held that the failure to inform the accused had the effect that the proceedings were not in accordance with justice in terms of s 52(3)(b) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 and had to be set aside.

[3] The fact that the accused is a lawyer does not mean he or she is not entitled to counsel. See S v Maghuwazuma 1997 (2) SACR 675, 681 (C); S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106 (C).

[4] S v Lombard en 'n Ander 1994 (3) SA 776 (T), 1994 (3) BCLR 126 (T). Although the referral of this matter to the Constitutional Court was held incompetent, the Court, did endorse this aspect of the Lombard decision, stating that it was 'certainly so' that the right to choose pertained to the right to employ, and not to the right to have counsel appointed. S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC) at para 15.

[5] See S v Solo 1995 (5) BCLR 587 (E)(A refusal to allow a postponement when the accused sought more senior and experienced counsel to be appointed upon appreciation by the accused of the seriousness of the charges was declared to be an error, given that dissatisfaction which was neither feigned nor unreasonable should be respected and postponements granted notwithstanding great inconvenience and severe disruption of the court rolls, unless other exceptional circumstances justified refusal.) See also S v Dangatye 1994 (2) SACR 1 (A).

which courts would not allow magistrates to dismiss as 'delaying tactics' reservations or objections an accused might have about the suitability of counsel appointed by the state.[1] Holding that refusal to allow the accused to reject the second of two attorneys assigned to him by the Legal Aid Board amounted to denial of the accused's rights, the court remarked:[2]

> It is so that an accused . . . who has been assigned a legal representative at state expense . . . is generally speaking to accept the practitioner assigned to him. . . . Circumstances may arise where the accused person is quite justified in seeking to dispense with the services of the practitioner assigned.

The line, however, had to be 'drawn somewhere', and a further rejection by the accused would have justified refusal to countenance more.[3] In S v Manale, the accused had been convicted in a regional court of five counts of rape and was committed for sentence to the High Court.[4] Being improvident and having had his right to legal representation and legal aid funding explained to him at his first appearance in the regional court, the accused elected to be legally represented and a local attorney was appointed to conduct his defence. Before the trial resumed, the accused terminated the mandate of his attorney. The High Court held that the regional magistrate had erred in failing to enquire about the reason for the termination of the attorney's mandate and in merely accepting it. The correct attitude would have been to establish the basis on which the choice to waive the right to legal representation had been made.[5] In the circumstances, the conviction was, nevertheless, confirmed. An important decision concerning the degree to which the absence of counsel might be attributed to the accused was that of the Transvaal Provincial Division in S v Maduna.[6] It seems that a misunderstanding between the accused and their families concerning the appearance of legal representatives on the accused's behalf led to a failure by the accused to produce the

[1] 1996 (2) SACR 283 (E)('Manguanyana').

[2] Ibid at 287. See Boesak v Chairman, Legal Aid Board 2003 (2) SACR 181 (T)(Southwood J emphasized that the Board had a very important function in providing legal assistance at state expense in terms of the Constitution and therefore had to act responsibly in allocating funds to deserving applicants. The Board was therefore entitled to a full disclosure of all the facts pertaining to the applicant's financial position.)

[3] Manguanyana (supra) at 287. The facts illustrate how the different counsel rights may operate simultaneously. The magistrate apparently dismissed the accused's assurances that his mother would be able to finance a third attorney for him, and the court held that the magistrate should have been alive to the possibility of loans and donations. This consideration involves the right to choose one's lawyer, rather than the right to have one appointed for one. The court in S & Others v Swanepoel held, likewise, that an accused who declined to be defended by counsel instructed by the Legal Aid Board and selected according to the roster system in force, must accept that the range of choice would be constrained by his or her financial means. 2000 (7) BCLR 818 (O). See also S v Halgryn 2002 (2) SACR 211 (CC) at paras 11-12.

[4] 2000 (2) SACR 666 (NC).

[5] Ibid at 671.

[6] 1997 (1) SACR 646 (T)('Maduna').

representatives they had been intimating would appear.[1] The court pointed out that the magistrate's finding — that the absence of a representative was due to negligence on the part of the accused — ignored the fact that the accused were justifiably under the impression that counsel had been arranged for them by their families.[2] Furthermore, it was not competent to assume that attorneys, if properly instructed, would be present at court, and that their absence indicated negligence or deceit on the part of the accused, who had indicated that they would appear.[3]

S v McKenna saw a public prosecutor convicted of contempt for engaging in a 'go-slow' (or rather 'go-late') campaign in the magistrate's court.[4] On the first occasion of lateness, the accused had been warned to arrange legal representation the next day for possible contempt proceedings, and was not given more than five minutes to arrange representation when the magistrate actually decided to commence the contempt proceedings upon the second occasion. Ngcobo J held that the moment at which the reasonableness of the opportunity to obtain representation was to be assessed was when it was intimated that contempt proceedings were actually to commence, not when these proceedings were threatened as a possibility.[5] Ngcobo J regarded the absolute terms of the following pronouncement as essential to his finding:

[1] The magistrate's finding that the accused were engaging in play-acting and stalling ('toneelspel' and 'halsstarrigheid') seemed on the record at least to possess a modicum of merit. The magistrate's mistake, it seems, was to decide that the accused were not bona fide and then to regard all claims and demands, including the repeated and justifiable demands concerning the absence of their representatives, to be symptomatic of this 'halsstarrigheid'. The trial record was absurdly sparse, yet one word which seemed to occur more than any other in the sea of lacunae was 'prokureur'. The case illustrates, yet again, how slow the courts are to humour the frustrations of magistrates at the expense of the rights of the accused. See also S v Philemon 1997 (2) SACR 651, 656-657 (W)(The accused had told the magistrate at his trial, which had been postponed a number of times over a period of several months, that he had appointed an attorney two days before the trial and that the attorney was not present, so that the accused could not proceed with his plea. The magistrate adopted the attitude that attorneys could not be expected to appear on such short notice, that the accused had had ample opportunity to obtain an attorney, and that the accused's insistence on the presence of his attorney was an improper attempt to organize the court ('[e]k gaan nie toelaat dat jy my hof reël nie') or a kind of game ('jy is besig met 'n speletjie'). Claassen J held that the accused's conduct amounted to a request for a postponement and that it was incumbent upon the magistrate at least to enquire into the reasons for the absence of the attorney and to give the accused an opportunity to obtain his or her services. Given indications during the trial that the accused had expected his attorney to be present and had relied upon such presence, the proper response by the magistrate would have been to grant a postponement.)

[2] Maduna (supra) at 665.

[3] Ibid at 654. See S v Molenbeek en Andere 1997 (12) BCLR 1779, 1784 (O)(Cillié J expressed displeasure at the notion that the defence might postpone a matter at will due to the unavailability of a particular legal representative. The learned judge remarked that tardiness ('sloerdery') in the criminal justice system played a major role in public scepticism about the administration of justice and that legal representatives, be they attorneys or advocates, should endeavour to ensure that a matter proceeded on the date of set-down, which endeavour would entail efforts to arrange alternative representation in case of personal unavailability. What did not emerge clearly from the report was to what extent the accused, as opposed to their representative, had insisted upon their being represented by the particular practitioner at a time convenient to the practitioner.)

[4] 1998 (1) SACR 106 (C)('McKenna').

[5] McKenna (supra) at 113E-G.

> A denial of a reasonable opportunity to secure legal representation where one is demanded is, in my view, a denial of the right to legal representation and it is a denial of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by the Constitution. Where this occurs, the ensuing conviction and sentence cannot stand.[1]

The Court in S & Others v Swanepoel emphasized that the right 'to choose, and be presented by, a legal practitioner, and to be informed of this right promptly' required that an accused person be given a fair and reasonable opportunity to obtain legal representation.[2] According to Cillié J, the circumstances of each case would determine what would constitute a reasonable opportunity. In determining whether an accused person has had 'a reasonable opportunity' the following factors should be considered: the gravity of the charges; the availability of sufficiently experienced practitioners; the amount of preparation required and the complexity of the case.[3] Courts ought to also consider the interests of the complainants, the witnesses and the co-accused, as well as the undersirability of disrupting court rolls and delaying the disposal of criminal cases. The same stance was taken by the court in S v Tsotetsi & Others.[4]

McKenna can be contrasted with the decision in S v Simanaga.[5] In Simanaga, the fact that the accused's trial had proceeded in the absence of intended legal representation was 'a mistake'. Still, held Tshabalala J, this fact did not render the trial unfair. The conviction had to stand, the court held, because the unrepresented 17-year-old accused had proved her guilt by her answers when questioned at the plea proceedings.[6] This finding, with respect, confuses fairness with accuracy and ignores the purpose of questioning an accused after he or she had pleaded guilty.[7]

Guidelines concerning the difficult question of 'substantial injustice' in denying state-funded counsel to an accused were offered obiter by Didcott J in S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis.[8] Indeed, it was the learned judge who had laid down the 'common law' guidelines in this regard in S v Khanyile.[9] In Khanyile, the factors were said to be the 'inherent simplicity or complexity of the case, so far as both the law and the facts [went]', the maturity, sophistication and level of intellect of the accused, and the gravity of the case, including the sentence. The ultimate test, 'vague' and 'fickle' though it was, was whether the accused would be 'placed at a

[1] Mckenna (supra) at 113A.
[2] 2000 (7) BCLR 818 (O).
[3] Ibid at 821.
[4] 2003 (2) SACR 623, 635 (W). See also Pretorius & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 2004 (2) SA 658 (T).
[5] 1998 (1) SACR 351 (Ck).
[6] Ibid at 353F-I.
[7] See NC Steytler The Undefended Accused on Trial (1988) 107-117; § 51.5*(j)*(ii) infra.
[8] 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC)('Vermaas').
[9] 1988 (3) SA 795, 815-816 (N). See D McQuoid-Mason 'Rudman and the Right to Counsel: Is it Feasible to Implement Khanyile?' (1992) 8 SAJHR 96. See also Legal Aid Board v Msila & Others 1997 (2) BCLR 229, 243 (SE)(Similar factors). The 'Khanyile rule' was cited at length in S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453, 490-491 (W)('Lavhengwa').

disadvantage palpable and gross, that the trial would be palpably and grossly unfair, were it to go ahead without a lawyer.' In Vermaas, one reads of the 'ramifications and their complexity or simplicity, the accused person's aptitude or ineptitude to fend for himself or herself in a matter of those dimensions, how grave the consequences of a conviction may look, and any other factor that needs to be evaluated in the determination of the likelihood or unlikelihood that, if the trial were to proceed without a lawyer for the defence, the result would be 'substantial injustice'. Most importantly, the Vermaas Court held that the decision was 'pre-eminently' that of the officer trying the case.[1]

In Msila v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Court held that the application for legal assistance itself was a procedure complicated enough — though it involved essentially an indication of indigence by the applicant — to require state-funded assistance in such application lest 'substantial injustice' should result. On an appeal to a Full Bench of the decision to deny appointed counsel for an application to have an interdict set aside, the South Eastern Cape Local Division interpreted the term 'accused' generously to entitle the applicant to legal representation in the interdict application,[2] and also determined that failing the Legal Aid Board's means test was not the relevant prima facie consideration entitling one to state-funded counsel. The threshold question was simply whether the accused was unable to afford a lawyer.[3] In Bangindawo & Others v Head of the Nyanda Regional Authority & Another, the Transkei High Court upheld the right to counsel in criminal proceedings before regional authority courts.[4]

[1] Vermaas (supra) at para 15. This ruling should not be seen as referring to a discretion. See § 51.1*(b)*(ii) supra. See Mgcina v Regional Magistrate, Lenasia, & Another 1997 (2) SACR 711, 733 (W)(Borchers J held that 'substantial injustice' in IC s 25(3)(e) did not refer to the narrow case where the presiding officer determined that the final decision would be wrong if the trial proceeded without representation, but referred rather to the question 'whether procedurally the trial would be a fair one'.)

[2] See §§ 51.1*(b)(i)* and 51.2 supra.

[3] Msila (supra) at 242-43. It may be pointed out that indigence is a factor of the 'injustice' test, not a necessary precondition to be considered for it. It may be difficult to argue that 'substantial injustice' would result if someone who can afford a lawyer is not provided with one at state expense, but that assumes a particular meaning to be attached to 'injustice'. It may for instance be that in a cut-throat defence involving two co-accused, not providing both with legal aid would threaten substantial injustice, irrespective of the fact that one of them is not sufficiently indigent to be entitled to assistance in other circumstances. 'Substantial injustice' is something every accused may invoke for the purposes of IC s 25(3)(e) and FC s 35(3)(f). Msila left open the position obtaining when an accused was able to contribute towards the defence. Msila (supra) at 243.

[4] 1998 (3) BCLR 314 (Tk). This conclusion was reached despite the court's finding elsewhere in the judgment that there was 'no reason whatsoever for the imposition of the Western conception of the notions of judicial impartiality and independence in the African customary law setting' and the court's recognition that legal representation was 'unknown' in African customary law. Ibid at 327, 330. See § 51.5*(e)*(i) supra. It was, however, pointed out in Hamata & Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee & Others that the right to legal representation did not extend to persons appearing before an administrative tribunal. 2000 (4) SA 621 (C). See also G van der Walt & A van der Walt The Right to Legal Representation When Appearing Before a Disciplinary Enquiry (2004) 538.

The practical difficulty of heeding the right to counsel, even where 'substantial injustice' would result from a failure, is pre-eminently a limitation question. The right to counsel is the closest the criminal procedure rights come to second-generation rights. However, the ability of the state to respect this right should not be regarded as part of the definition of the right. Two-stage analysis is possible, and the question whether substantial injustice would result need not be answered pusillanimously if it is acknowledged that such injustice might be justifiable under the limitations clause. The declaratory force of a prima facie violation, albeit justified, would serve to affirm the continued recognition of the right as a right rather than as a hope.[1]

The Witwatersrand Local Division was asked to accept this argument as persuasive in Mgcina v Regional Magistrate, Lenasia, & Another.[2] Trengove SC argued that imposing the punishment of imprisonment upon an undefended accused would in all cases amount to 'substantial injustice'. Borchers J declined to rule on the issue.[3] He found, instead, that the accused's right to be informed of the right to counsel to have been violated. Stegmann J regarded the argument as 'very persuasive', but remarked that if the framers had intended such a simple and straightforward rule they could, and presumably would, have enshrined it in the Interim Constitution.[4] He also pointed out that the dicta in S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis did not support such a rule.[5] Still, he did offer the following qualification:

> Any magistrate, faced with the trial of an indigent accused who has no legal representation, will be conscious that if he should try the accused and sentenced [sic] him to imprisonment (without the option of a fine or any other non-custodial sentence) there will be a considerable likelihood of an approach being made to the High Court on behalf of the accused for an order setting aside his trial and conviction on the ground that his fundamental rights . . . were infringed. For practical purposes, therefore, although we cannot now enunciate such a rule, we may well find that (apart from a few exceptional cases, such as those in which the accused person is himself legally qualified and experienced) no indigent accused persons will be sent to prison unless they have been provided with a defence at state expense.[6]

[1] See Vermaas (supra) at para 16 (On the lack of any perceptible progress.) The reasoning in Lavhengwa on this issue is hard to follow. The court tracked the gradual recognition of the right to counsel in the United States over 34 years and remarked: 'South Africa may very well require a longer period to reach the ideal of an unqualified right to legal counsel'. Ibid at 489. If the American development referred to was of a practical or economic nature, the conclusion would be sound. But the learned judge was referring to a conceptual development: the development of an argument. If this argument is persuasive, there is no reason to wait 34 years or more to accept it.

[2] 1997 (2) SACR 711 (W)('Mgcina').

[3] Ibid at 733.

[4] Ibid at 739.

[5] 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC).

[6] Mgcina (supra) at 739.

An important decision concerning the duration of the right to legal representation is to be found in S v Mofokeng.[1] The accused was convicted of robbery with aggravating circumstances and sentenced to eight years' imprisonment in the Regional Division of Southern Transvaal. Thereafter his counsel had filed heads of argument on appeal in which he had set out the facts and then submitted that the appellant had correctly been convicted and that the sentence imposed was appropriate. The Witwatersrand Local Division held that the right to legal representation did not end when the trial court pronounced its sentence, but that this right existed during the whole of the legal process until the last court had spoken the last word.[2] The sentenced person was entitled to challenge the court's decision in review proceedings or by way of an appeal. The essence of the right to legal representation is the right to effective legal representation.[3] In the instant case there was no indication that the appellant had withdrawn his appeal or had instructed his counsel to concede the correctness of any of the trial court's findings. Counsel had thus breached his duty of loyalty and had been obliged to withdraw from the case if he felt he could not advance his client's case on appeal.[4]

(i) The right to be presumed innocent

The right to be presumed innocent, in the shape of a right to expect the state to bear the full burden of proving the case and therefore not to be allowed to compel assistance from the accused, should be regarded as the governing principle behind the silence and self-incrimination rights of accused and arrested persons.[5] The presumption of innocence has been linked to the right to counsel[6] and played a pivotal role ascribed in determining the ambit of the right to a trial within a reasonable time.[7] The presumption of innocence exerts the greatest influence,

[1] 2004 (1) SACR 349 (W)('Mofokeng'). See also S v Ntuli 2003 (4) SA 258 (W)('Ntuli').

[2] Mofokeng (supra) at para 17.

[3] Ibid at para 18. See also Beyers v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape & Others 2003 (1) SACR 164, 166-167 (C) and Ntuli (supra) at para 16.

[4] Mofokeng (supra) at para 19.

[5] See §§ 51.4*(b)*(i) and (iii) supra. See, particularly, S v Mathebula 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W)(Held that the principle that an accused need not assist the state in creating a case to meet rendered a discharge under s 174 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 imperative where there was no admissible evidence upon which a reasonable court might convict, but there was a reasonable possibility that the accused might supplement the state's case in his or her defence); S v Jama & Another 1998 (4) BCLR 485 (N)('Jama')(In Jama this principle was applied with some vigour: the accused had all but convicted themselves of rape in their plea explanations, and there was every prospect that they would do so again in their testimony (as indeed they proceeded to do), although there was no admissible evidence at the end of the state's case linking them to the rape of the complainant.) Cf. S v Makofane 1998 (1) SACR 603 (T).

[6] See § 51.5*(g)* supra.

[7] Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC)('Sanderson')(Discussed in § 51.5*(f)* supra.) See also Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa & Others 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683 (E)(On the link between liberty and the presumption of innocence. For more on this link, see § 51.1*(a)*(ii) and (iv) supra. This link was responsible for the court's application of fair trial principles in the sphere of contempt proceedings brought by way of notice of motion.)

however, during the evidential sphere at trial. The presumption of innocence requires the final burden of persuasion to be on the prosecution. It is violated wherever a conviction may follow in a case where there is doubt about the accused's guilt. This aspect of the presumption is discussed in detail elsewhere.[1] The presumption of innocence is by no means confined to this aspect.[2] The presumption is the golden thread which runs throughout the criminal law. A Lord Sankey noted,[3] and, as Sir James Fitzjames Stephen pointed out, the presumption, 'though by no means confined to the criminal law, pervades the whole of its administration'.[4] These observations have significance for the interpretation of evidence as well as for the ultimate burden of proof,[5] and also for the opportunity of the accused to present evidence and have it entertained by the Court.[6] Activity in court premised on the guilt of the accused threatens the presumption of innocence. Procedures designed to protect victims of crime from further victimization place considerable strain upon the presumption of innocence, since the difficult suspension of disbelief entailed by respect for the presumption becomes almost impossible where the procedures adopted assume the accused is guilty as charged.[7]

[1] The main case law in this area has been that concerned with reverse onus provisions. The leading case is S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC). Whether the presumption is at stake should not be mechanically tied to the syntax of a statutory provision, lest reverse onus provisions be easily avoided by creating peculiar statutory offences. See § 51.1*(a)*(iii) supra.

[2] See S v Strauss 1995 (5) BCLR 623, 629 (O)(Rejects the claim that confessional evidence per se violated the presumption of innocence. Hattingh J said: 'Die reg om onskuldig geag te word is, in populêre terme, 'n manier om uitdrukking te verleen aan die feit dat die staat beklee is met die primêre en finale bewyslas om die skuld van die beskuldigde bo redelike twyfel te bewys'.) See also A Skeen 'A Bill of Rights and the Presumption of Innocence' (1993) 9 SAJHR 523.

[3] Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462, 481.

[4] General View of the Criminal Law of England (2nd Edition, 1890) 183.

[5] See McKinley's case (1817) 33 St Tr 275 (Construction of oaths in favorem libertatis was based upon the presumption of innocence.) See also JB Thayer A Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law (1898) 272ff. The proper way to accord respect to the presumption in the forms of reasoning and chains of inference adopted by a court famously exercised the Australian High Court in Chamberlain v R(2) (1984) 153 CLR 521. See also Morin v R [1988] 2 SCR 345; R v Blom 1938 AD 188. See S v Thebus & Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)(The Constitutional Court upheld the constitutionality of the common purpose doctrine as it did not relate to a reverse onus or any presumption relieving the State of any part of the burden of proof.)

[6] See LH Tribe 'Trial by Mathematics: Precision and Ritual in the Legal Process' (1971) 84 Harvard LR 1329, 1370-1371 ('[N]o less important are what seem to me the intangible aspects of that commitment [the presumption]: its expressive and educative nature as a refusal to acknowledge prosecutorial omniscience in the face of the defendant's protest of innocence, and as an affirmation of respect for the accused, a respect expressed by the trier's willingness to listen to all the accused has to say before reaching any judgment, even a tentative one, as to his probable guilt. . . . The presumption retains force not as a factual judgment but as a normative one — as a judgment that society ought to speak of accused men as innocent, and treat them as innocent, until they have been properly convicted after all they have to offer in their defense has been carefully weighed. The suspicion that many are in fact guilty need not undermine either this normative conclusion or its symbolic expression through trial procedure.' (emphasis added).)

[7] On the rejection of a claim that use of a shield between a rape complainant and the accused violated the presumption of innocence, see R v Levogiannis [1993] 4 SCR 475. Levogiannis secured the approval of the court in Klink v Regional Court Magistrate NO & Others 1996 (3) BCLR 402, 415 (SE). In Klink, however, the point was argued and decided on the right to a public trial. Consider the analogous problem

In S v J the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the cautionary rule as applied to the testimony of complainants in sexual cases, on the basis that the rule was outdated, irrational and sexually discriminatory.[1] The court held that the rule in fact increased the burden of the state to an onus to do more than prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.[2] Since the presumption of innocence demanded no more than proof beyond reasonable doubt, there was no basis for the rule.[3]

Violation of the presumption before trial may be difficult to bring under the fair trial right if the accused has not been formally charged, but where such violation would be operative at the trial itself, the accused's right to be presumed innocent is violated at trial. A striking example of this phenomenon occurred in S v Mbolombo.[4] The assumption that the bail applicant was guilty, which led to the high bail amount, would be the direct operating cause of regarding the applicant's payment of the amount as an indication of guilt at the trial. The pre-trial inversion of the presumption, in other words, became a violation of the right of an accused to be presumed innocent at the trial. It is submitted that whether the violation was of having the absence of a witness through fear of intimidation explained to the Court to the great prejudice of the accused's entitlement to the presumption of innocence. English courts have been anxious to avoid such prejudice. See R v Ricketts [1991] Crim LR 915; R v Churchill [1993] Crim LR 285. See also S v Baloyi 2000 (1) SACR 81 (CC), 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC)(Court held that s 3(5) of the Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993, read with s 170 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, did not impose a reverse onus on the accused as it merely invoked the procedure in s 170 and not the reverse onus it included.)

[1] 1998 (2) SA 984 (SCA), 1998 (4) BCLR 424 (SCA), 1998 (1) SACR 470 (SCA)('J'). This decision was affirmed in S v M 2000 (1) SACR 484 (W). A contrary view was, however, taken in S v Van der Ross 2002 (2) SACR 362 (C).

[2] J (supra) at 1008G-1009B.

[3] Ibid at 1009F. It is respectfully submitted that the Court's reasoning, if applied literally, would mean that all rules of procedure designed to act as safeguards to ensure that the presumption of innocence was adequately protected would be unnecessary additions to the state's burden of proof. This could be so only if the 'beyond reasonable doubt' standard could be measured with mathematical precision, which is not the case. See BJ Shapiro 'Beyond Reasonable Doubt' and 'Probable Cause': Historical Perspectives on the Anglo-American Law of Evidence (1991); CR Nesson 'Reasonable Doubt and Permissive Inferences: The Value of Complexity' (1979) 92 Harvard LR 1187. J was not really concerned with a higher (or lower) standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt — it was concerned merely with the merits of some built-in pointers to potential doubt. That there was a strong thread of prejudice and stereotype to the underlying assumptions in the case of sexual complainants cannot really be denied. But the Supreme Court of Appeal, with respect, overwhelmingly over-emphasized the influence of this thread in the development of the rule. The method in the rule's madness was captured in the passage from S v Snyman. 1968 (2) SA 582 (A) as cited in J (supra) at 1007A-E. That the volatile rule will no longer be applied mechanically in every sexual case is probably for the best. But the rhetorical over-emphasis on the offensive aspects of its lineage by the Supreme Court of Appeal may have unfortunate results for the presumption of innocence. It may spawn a self-censored reluctance on the part of judicial officers, in cases where an 'evidential basis' suggests that caution is appropriate, to take into consideration the complainant's peculiar knowledge and particularly 'exculpatory' motives in situations where consensual sex would have entailed serious negative consequences for the complainant.

[4] 1995 (5) BCLR 614 (C). See § 51.4*(d)* supra.

justified at the granting of bail was a different question from whether it should have been allowed to operate at the trial.[1]

The accused's constitutional right to be presumed innocent has prompted the Constitutional Court to declare unconstitutional various provisions that place a reverse onus on the accused.[2] Thus in S v Hoosen the High Court held that s 37 of the General Law Amendment Act,[3] which relieved the state of proving mens rea on the part of the accused, infringed the accused's right to be presumed innocent.[4] It had the effect that an accused could be found guilty in spite of the existence of reasonable doubt as to his or her guilt. This infringement could not be justified, especially since the burden to prove the presence of mens rea was not too onerous for the state. The Constitutional Court later confirmed this proposition in S v Manamela & Another.[5]

Section 21(1)(a)(i) of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act[6] created a presumption that, where an accused was found in possession of more than 115 grams of dagga, such accused had been dealing in dagga and would be so convicted unless the accused could prove that he or she was not dealing in dagga. The Constitutional Court in S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso[7] and in S v Manyonyo[8] declared the presumption unconstitutional as an unjustifiable limitation of the accused's right to be presumed innocent as contained in FC s 35(3)(h).[9]

The Constitutional Court in S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo[10] considered the constitutionality of s 40*(i)* of the Arms and Ammunitions Act.[11] The Act contained a presumption assisting the state in proving the actus reus of 'possession' for a conviction of unlawful possession of arms and ammunition. The Mbatha Court held that this provision was an unjustifiable infringement of the accused's right to be presumed innocent. In another reverse onus matter, the Constitutional Court

[1] For analogous reasoning which fuelled the creation of a use immunity at trial but allowed pre-trial compulsion of self-incriminating evidence, see Ferreira v Levin & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). See also S v Botha & Others 1995 (2) SACR 605 (W); S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC) as discussed in § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra.

[2] Presumptions against the accused are created in numerous statutory provisions. See J Burchell Principles of Criminal Law (2005) 124 (Lists, amongst others, the following examples: s 1(2) of the Prevention of Illegal Squatting Act 52 of 1951; s 2 of the Witchcraft Suppression Act 3 of 1957; s 2 of the Gambling Act 51 of 1965; s 1A(2) of the Intimidation Act 72 of 1982; and ss 217(1)(b)(ii), 245 and 332(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.)

[3] Act 62 of 1955.

[4] 1999 (9) BCLR 987 (N).

[5] 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela'). See also Burchell (supra) at 121.

[6] 140 of 1992.

[7] 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 748 (CC).

[8] 1999 (12) BCLR 1438 (CC)('Manyonyo').

[9] Ibid at para 16.

[10] 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC).

[11] Act 75 of 1969.

in S v Coetzee declared unconstitutional s 245 and s 332(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act as unjustifiable infringements of the accused's right to be presumed innocent.[1]

The constitutionality of s 72(4)[2] of the Criminal Procedure Act was also successfully challenged in S v Singo.[3] The effect of the phrase 'unless such a person satisfies the court that his failure was not due to a fault on his part' was that, if the probabilities were evenly balanced, the accused would fail to satisfy the Court as required and conviction and sentence would follow. This limited the right of an accused to be presumed innocent and the right to remain silent. Although the incursion into the right to silence was found to be justifiable,[4] the legal burden requiring conviction despite the existence of reasonable doubt was not. The Court found it necessary to read in words to establish the evidentiary burden: s 72(4) was to be read as though the words 'there is a reasonable probability that' appeared between the words 'that' and 'his failure'.[5]

Finally, the Transvaal Provincial Division in Lodi v MEC for Nature and Conservation and Tourism, Gauteng, & Others[6] declared unconstitutional reverse onus provisons found in s 37(1)(c)[7] and s 110(1)(b) and (c)[8] of the Nature Conservation Ordinance.[9] Patel J, applying both Manamela and Singo, held that these provisions violated the accused's constitutional right to be presumed innocent and to remain silent.[10]

(j) Silence and self-incrimination at trial

(i) Silence, self-incrimination, and the presumption of innocence

The right to silence at trial is coupled with the right to be presumed innocent in FC s 35(3)(h). But the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence is given separately in FC s 35(3)(j).

That silence and self-incrimination rights at trial are based upon the presumption of innocence requires less argument than that pre-trial silence and self-incrimination rights are based upon the presumption; the endorsement of the latter proposition by the Constitutional Court in S v Zuma & Others[11] must be taken as a fortiori confirmation of the less controversial former proposition.[12] Furthermore,

[1] 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) at para 52 (Langa J).
[2] Section 72(4) provides for a summary judgment procedure.
[3] 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC)('Singo').
[4] Ibid at para 37.
[5] Ibid at para 44.
[6] 2005 (3) SA 381 (T).
[7] Section 37(1)(c) called for 'reasonable cause, proof of which shall be on the accused'.
[8] Sections 110(1)(b) and (c) provided for the application of certain presumptions 'until the contrary is proved'.
[9] 12 of 1983 (G).
[10] Singo (supra) at paras 30 and 35.
[11] 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 33.
[12] See § 51.4*(b)* supra.

silence and self-incrimination are very closely related.[1] The difference for practical and analytical purposes is that silence deals with the prohibition on a compulsion to testify and with the inferences that may be drawn from a failure to testify, and self-incrimination with the extent to which the accused can be said to be compulsorily conscripted against himself or herself by any given procedure. Overlap is difficult to avoid, and elements of self-incrimination are often discussed in terms of the right to silence, and silence in terms of self-incrimination.[2]

(ii) The right to silence at trial

In S v Maseko, the court held that the words 'during plea proceedings' found in IC s 25(3)(c) were not restricted to proceedings following upon a plea of not guilty, but extended also to proceedings held upon a plea of guilty.[3] Thus, the right to be informed of the right to silence applied to such proceedings and any violation of the right entailed the inadmissibility at the trial of what was said during the plea proceedings. The wording in FC s 35(3)(h) refers only to 'the proceedings'. It draws no distinction between 'plea proceedings or trial' (IC s 25(3)(c)). This phrase must be read to include plea proceedings and should not be understood to indicate that the right to silence has been limited to the trial proper.[4]

[1] On the 'seamless web', see § 51.4 (b)(i) supra.

[2] See § 51.4*(b)* supra. For more on the presumption of innocence in the sphere of bail see § 51.4*(d)* supra.

[3] 1996 (9) BCLR 1137 (W), 1996 (2) SACR 91 (W)('Maseko').

[4] The decision in S v Damons & Others — in which Maseko was held to have been 'clearly wrong' — should be regarded as an aberration. 1997 (2) SACR 218 (W)('Damons'). Nugent J's finding that it had not been settled law before the constitutional era that the accused enjoyed the right to remain silent at s 119 plea proceedings flew in the face of Milne JA's pertinent observation in S v Mabaso & Another 1990 (3) SA 185, 211D (A) that S v Nkosi & 'n Ander 1984 (3) SA 345 (A) clearly implied that the right to silence did exist at such proceedings and that this proposition was not questioned (by the Mabaso majority or by the state). Milne JA's principled rejection of the incongruous denial of the right to be informed of this right must now be afforded the full weight of its persuasion, in light of the constitutional authority, to allow the right to silence to make sense — particularly given the sensitivity to rights jurisprudence displayed in the minority judgment in Mabaso. It is remarkable that the Damons judgment could deny the post-constitutional existence of a right while conceding that it was assumed to exist before the Interim Constitution, merely because it was never expressly held to have existed. The argument that 'a right to continue to remain silent [was] inherently incompatible with a plea of guilty' — Damons (supra) at 224 — premised as it was on the notion that a plea of guilty constituted absolute and final incrimination in any event — Nkosi (supra) at 353; Mabaso (supra) at 205; Damons (supra) at 225 — begged the very question which was the only legitimate purpose of questioning under s 112(1)(b) via s 119 — namely whether the accused actually intended to admit guilt on every element of the relevant charge. See Mabaso (supra) at 212. If s 112(1)(b) can only substitute Star Chamber interrogation for adversarial justice, then s 112(1)(b) must go. If it is merely intended to ensure that a guilty plea was really a guilty plea, then that is all it should be allowed to do. See NC Steytler The Undefended Accused on Trial (1988) 107-17. If there is a contradiction between the right to silence or against self-incrimination and the s 112 procedure, then the problem is the procedure, not the right. (It should be stressed that the Damons court was not competent to pronounce upon the constitutionality of s 112(1)(b). Damons (supra) at 220C-D.) It is the height of irony that the procedure in our law which so closely resembles the orthodox source of the self-

The fact that arguments in favour of inferences from silence at trial do not support inferences from pre-trial silence does not mean that those arguments should be accepted in the trial context. The view expressed by Etienne du Toit — that an adverse inference from silence at trial would amount to an unacceptable penalty for the exercise of a right, as persuasively argued in the minority judgments of Kentridge and Baron JJA in Attorney-General v Moagi[1] — was rejected by Claassen J in S v Lavhengwa[2] in favour of the view expressed by Wim Trengove. The latter view holds that such inferences were in line with common sense, affected only the choice to use the right and not the right itself, and were in any event justifiable if violative of the right to silence.[3] The argument on choice was endorsed also by the Northern Cape Division in S v Scholtz & Another.[4] But in S v Brown & 'n Ander[5] the same division held that use of silence at trial as evidence of guilt, as opposed to allowing the silence not to upset a prima facie case based on uncontroverted evidence, would be in direct conflict ('direk in stryd') with the right to silence guaranteed by the Interim Constitution. Moreover, the common law authorities relied upon in Scholtz were subject to reassessment in view of the 'shift in emphasis' brought about by the Interim Constitution:[6] 'Geen nadelige afleiding kan teen die beskuldigde gemaak word, bloot omdat hy sy reg om te swyg uitgeoefen het nie.'[7]

Brown was endorsed in S v Khomunala & Another.[8] There Noorbhai AJ held that the interaction between the right to silence, the right to present evidence, and the consequence of silence should be explained to the accused as set out in Brown.[9] incrimination privilege was regarded as an exception to the exercise of this privilege as a constitutional right. The fact that the relevant guilty pleas in Damons were found to have been improperly offered was the best illustration of the instant abuse of s 112. See, eg, S v Nkabinde. 1998 (8) BCLR 996, 1001D-E (N)('Through our new Constitution those inquisitorial elements in the Criminal Procedure Act are being systematically hunted down and erased, where found to be inimical to the tenets of the Constitution. . . .')

[1] (1982) II BLR 124 (CA).

[2] 1996 (2) SACR 453, 486 (W). See also C Theophilopoulos 'The Historical Antecedents of the Right to Silence and the Evolution of the Adversarial Trial Systems' (2003) Stellenbosch Law Review 183.

[3] See C Theophilopoulos 'The Evidentiary Rule of Adverse Inferences from the Accused's Right to Silence' (2002) South African Journal of Criminal Justice 336.

[4] 1996 (11) BCLR 1504 (NC), 1996 (2) SACR 40 (NC)('Scholtz'). See also PM Bekker 'An Undefended Accused's Right to Silence During a (Fair) Trial' (2004) Journal for Contemporary Roman-Dutch Law 469.

[5] 1996 (11) BCLR 1480 (NC), 1996 (2) SACR 49 (NC)('Brown').

[6] Ibid at 1489-90. The fact that the relevant silence in Brown was silence at a voir dire determination of the voluntariness of a confession must not be confused with the question of the propriety of the use of admissions (including silence) made during a voir dire as evidence of guilt at the main trial. See § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra. The inference sought to be drawn in Brown was a negative inference as to voluntariness, ie an inference the effects of which were to be contained within the confines of the voir dire.

[7] Ibid at 1491. See SE van der Merwe 'The Constitutional Passive Defence Right of an Accused Versus Prosecutorial and Judicial Comment on Silence: Must We Follow Griffin v California' (1994) 15 Obiter 1; T Geldenhuys & G Joubert (eds) Criminal Procedure Handbook (1994) 6-7. Both works were cited with approval by the court. See also Brown (supra) at 1487-89 and 1491 respectively.

[8] 1998 (1) SACR 362 (V)('Khomunala').

[9] Ibid at 365E-366A. It must be respectfully submitted that the magistrate in Khomunala seemed to have done a good job of explaining the situation, apart from a failure to mention the fact that silence as such could not incriminate, and that a plea explanation did not act as evidence for the defence.

The Constitutional Court refrained from ruling directly on this question in Osman & Another v Attorney-General, Transvaal.[1] But it expressed clear approval of the view of the majority in Moagi, and based its decision upon the premise that there was no violation of the right to silence if a court took account of a failure to testify. Madala J cited with approval, as 'aptly put', the following extract from S v Sidziya & Others:

> The right entrenched in [IC] s 25(3)(c) means no more than that an accused person has a right of election whether or not to say anything during the plea proceedings or during the stage when he may testify in his defence. The exercise of this right like the exercise of any other must involve the appreciation of the risks which may confront any person who has to make an election. Inasmuch as skilful cross-examination could present obvious dangers to an accused should he elect to testify, there is no sound basis for reasoning that, if he elects to remain silent, no inferences can be drawn against him.[2]

It is one thing to allow the uncontroverted character of state evidence, especially if it is evidence the cogency of which depends on the degree to which it is unexplained, to ripen into proof beyond reasonable doubt when explanations are not forthcoming.[3] It is quite another to employ silence as positive evidence of guilt. The distinction is fine, but real, and should be insisted upon, not only for pre-trial silence but also as far as silence at trial is concerned. The Final Constitution, after all, entrenches the right to silence separately, in addition to the right against compelled self-incrimination. A suggestion that the reasoning of the US Supreme Court in Griffin v California[4] — which prohibited comment upon and permission for the jury to use inferences from silence — should not apply outside the context of jury trials[5] would ignore the fact that the exposure of a judge who is the trier of fact to inadmissible evidence puts considerable strain on the presumption of innocence. A judge, hardened by a quotidian pageant of hardened criminals, may find it very hard indeed to heed the presumption, so that it may well be more, rather than less, important for rules of evidence to be strictly followed where a judge is acting as the factfinder.[6]

The accused's right to silence is also protected by the rule that he or she need not disclose the nature of his or her defence in advance, and can await developments in the trial to decide whether it is necessary to lead evidence on certain

[1] 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC)('Osman') at para 22.
[2] 1995 (12) BCLR 1626 (Tk) as cited in Osman (supra) at para 20.
[3] See Osman & Another v Attorney-General of Transvaal 1998 (2) BCLR 165 (T), 1998 (1) SACR 28, 31-32 (T)(In the context of a failure to provide a satisfactory account of possession of goods reasonably suspected of being stolen. The facial challenge to s 36 of Act 62 of 1955 failed as a result.
[4] 380 US 609 (1965). See also K van Dijkhorst The Right to Silence: Is the Game worth the Candle? (2001) 33.
[5] See Brown (supra) at 1490.
[6] For a comprehensive discussion of binding judges to rules of evidence, see S Doran, JJ Jackson & ML Seigel 'Rethinking Adversariness in Nonjury Criminal Trials' (1995) 23 American Journal of Criminal Law 1.

points and, frankly, to determine what to say about certain things. As a result, the relevance of what the accused is up to is not always clear to the court. Determining the relevance of questions may prejudice this privilege of passivity. This problem confronted the court in S v M.[1] Because the magistrate did not know that the unrepresented accused was to employ an alibi as his defence to a charge of rape, thereby rendering irrelevant almost all the harrowing questioning of the complainant about the details of the rape,[2] the accused was allowed a nine-hour free run until the alibi defence was revealed. Donen AJ (Davis J concurring) held:

> The value accorded to the right to human dignity stands alongside the right to life in the Interim and Final Constitutions. Before this kind of questioning can be tolerated in cross-examination, its relevance to the issues must first be established from the cross-examiner. There are limits to an accused's right of silence. The protection of the dignity of a rape victim raises an area of reasonable and justifiable limit to an accused's right of silence. . . . In this matter the fairness of the appellant's trial would not have been affected in any way had the relevance of the offending questions to the appellant's defence been investigated and then ruled inadmissible.[3]

This view can be defended on the basis that the asking of a question in cross-examination amounts to a representation of its relevance. If the question is problematic for dignity, it makes sense to ask why it is relevant to the defence, with due sensitivity to the accused's passivity right. In any event, the simple question whether intercourse is at issue or not, or intercourse at a particular time or place or in a particular manner, may be answered as a matter of practice when questions suggesting such a dispute are asked in cross-examination and tacitly place the accused's version in opposition to that of the complainant. It is true that relevance to general credibility does not require relevance to the issue, but there is surely little wrong with limiting invasive and embarrassing questions that go solely to credibility and consistency. Furthermore, the biggest danger of violating this aspect of passivity, namely doing away with the accused's entitlement to be safe until a case is made out by the state, can be addressed adequately if the state may not, when seeking to avoid a discharge under s 174,[4] rely upon the possibility that the accused might supplement the state case, based upon intimations from the defence during the presentation of the state case.[5] In S v Ndlangamandla & Another Willis J held that FC s 35(3)(h) had the following three consequences on the discharge of the accused under s 174 of the Criminal Procedure Act at the close of the state's case:[6] (1) The Court mero motu had to raise the question of possible discharge of the accused where it appeared to the court that there might

[1] 1999 (1) SACR 664 (C)('M'). See § 51.5*(k)* infra.

[2] 'Almost all' because the accused did allege consensual sexual intercourse with the complainant on other occasions, in order to explain the medical evidence.

[3] M (supra) at 673H-J.

[4] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[5] See § 51.5*(j)*(iii) infra.

[6] 1999 (1) SACR 391 (W)('Ndlangamandla').

be no evidence that the accused committed the crime; (2) If the state's evidence was of such poor quality that no reasonable person could possibly accept it, its credibility should be considered at that stage; (3) In the absence of evidence on which a reasonable person would convict the accused, there was no basis for refusing discharge merely because there was a possibility that the defence might supplement the state's case.[1]

In S v Manamela & Another, a majority of the Constitutional Court excised a reverse onus from the offence contained in s 37(1) of the General Law Amendment Act[2] (receiving stolen goods without reasonable cause for believing that the person from whom the goods were acquired was the owner thereof).[3] The provisions were found to constitute a justifiable infringement of the right to silence. The court found further that the provision constituted an infringement of the accused's right to be presumed innocent and the phrase 'proof of which shall be on such first-mentioned person' in s 37(1) was declared unconstitutional. The reverse onus was recast as an evidential burden in that s 37(1) was altered to include an additional sentence: 'In the absence of evidence to the contrary which raises a reasonable doubt, proof of such possession shall be sufficient evidence of the absence of reasonable cause'.[4]

(iii) Self-incrimination at trial

The operation of the right against self-incrimination at the trial itself, according to the orthodox theory of the history of the privilege against self-incrimination, lies at the core of the principle.[5] What is prohibited by this right is compelled self-incrimination at the trial and what is constitutionally relevant is what is meant by self-incrimination at trial and by compulsion at trial.[6] May an accused person be compelled to perform certain activities, or undergo certain tests, at trial?[7] In Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Gaqa the High Court was approached for an order compelling the respondent, who was suspected of having committed attempted robbery, to submit himself for an operation for the removal of a bullet

[1] Ndlangamundla (supra) at 393.

[2] Act 62 of 1955.

[3] 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela'). See also T van der Walt & S de la Harp 'The Right to Pre-Trial Silence as Part of the Right to a Free and Fair Trial: An Overview' (2005) African Human Rights Law Journal 81.

[4] See J Burchell Principles of Criminal Law (2005) 121. The Constitutional Court in Osman held that s 36 of the General Law Amendment Act 62 of 1955 (failure to give a satisfactory account after being found in possession of goods reasonably suspected of having been stolen) is constitutional since it contains no shift in onus or infringement of the right to silence.

[5] See § 51.4*(b)*(iii) supra.

[6] Other aspects of the right against self-incrimination are dealt with in § 51.4*(b)*(iii) supra.

[7] See the discussion on the difference between real and communicative evidence in § 51.4*(b)*(iii) supra, particularly the 'self-incrimination' dimension recognized by Van Rensburg J to distinguish a 'live' identification parade from a photograph identification 'parade'. S v Hlalikaya & Others 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE).

from his leg.[1] The respondent argued, unsuccessfully, that the order sought by the applicant would infringe his constitutionally entrenched right to be presumed innocent, the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence, the right to dignity and the right to bodily and psychological integrity.[2] Desai J held that s 27 of the Criminal Procedure Act, providing for the use of force in order to search a person, as well as s 37(1)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act, permitting an official to take such steps as he deemed necessary to ascertain whether the body of any person had any mark, characteristic or distinguishing feature, permitted the order. Although the order sought involved the limitation of the respondent's rights, his interests were regarded as being of lesser significance. While the intrusion was substantial, community interests had to prevail in that instance.[3] Counsel for the respondent on a number of occasions argued that the removal of the bullet resulted in the respondent's giving self-incriminating evidence, but he did not refer to any authorities in this regard. On the facts this case was also clearly distinguishable from the application the United States Supreme Court had to consider in Winston v Lee.[4] In Levack & Others v Regional Magistrate, Wynberg, & Another[5] Cameron JA held that it would be wrong to suppose that requiring accused persons to submit voice samples infringed their right not to give self-incriminating evidence. The power that the police enjoyed under s 37 of the Criminal Procedure Act thus included the power to request the accused to supply voice samples.[6] However, the formulation of the right in FC s 35(3)(j) would certainly seem to cover such compulsion. The accused would be 'giving evidence' incriminating himself or herself if forced to perform such activities or to undergo tests or experiments before the court. And should this then extend also to presenting himself or herself for identification purposes in court? In principle it should, and, given the dangers of dock identification,[7] the ostensibly compelling reasons to justify such violations under FC s 36(1) do not appear as obvious as they might.[8] Inferences from a refusal to co-operate with the prosecution at trial

[1] 2002 (1) SACR 654 (C)('Gaqa').

[2] Ibid at 658.

[3] Ibid at 659.

[4] 470 US 753 (1985). For a comparative perspective on the right against self-incrimination, see PM Bekker 'The Constitutional Privilege against Compulsory Self-incrimination: A Defendant's Right to Silence in the Criminal Justice System of the United States of America' (2004) 67 Journal for Contemporary Roman-Dutch Law 584.

[5] 2003 (1) SACR 187 (SCA)('Levack').

[6] Levack (supra) at para 26.

[7] See the discussion in C Tapper Cross and Tapper on Evidence (8th Edition, 1995) 797f.

[8] Mention should be made, however, of the decision of the US Supreme Court in Holt v United States, in which the idea that being compelled to fit a shirt as a demonstration to the jury was a violation of the Fifth Amendment was regarded as 'extravagant'. 218 US 245, 252-253 (1910). The Court remarked: '[T]he prohibition of compelling a man in a criminal court to be witness against himself is a prohibition of the use of physical or moral compulsion to extort communications from him, not an exclusion of his body as evidence when it may be material. The objection in principle would forbid a jury to look at a prisoner and compare his features with a photograph in proof.' Ibid. The Court did leave open the question as to 'how far a court would go in compelling a man to exhibit himself'.

seem to demand similar treatment to that relevant to inferences from a failure to testify.

As far as compulsion at trial proceedings is concerned, an important area of concern is the relationship between various stages, or proceedings, within the same trial.[1] The admission of guilt inherent in the payment of a bail amount, which amount was determined on the basis that the applicant had been enriched by the robbery for which he was being charged, led the court in S v Mbolombo[2] to conclude that the dilemma ('verknorsing') with which the applicant was faced as a result of payment of the bail would amount to an admission of guilt was a limitation upon the applicant's rights ('inkorting van die appellant se regte') which he simply had to accept.[3] Although this approach would accord with that of the courts in rejecting a Hobson's choice as a form of compelled self-incrimination,[4] it is not clear whether the court in effect held that there had been a justified violation of the right against self-incrimination, or that the right did not apply. While the finding may be used as authority for the recognition of the violation of the protection against compelled self-incrimination in such circumstances, the court ultimately held the violation to have been justified.[5] In S v Botha & Others (2), the accused had not been informed of his right to silence during a bail application, and the Witwatersrand Local Division held that admissions made during the bail application could not be used against the accused at the trial.[6] In S v Cloete & Another, the court, although not endorsing the blanket exclusion of evidence given by an accused at a bail application from the subsequent trial, recognized that it amounted to compelled evidence where an accused faced incarceration for lengthy periods of time.[7] The dilemma the accused in Mbolombo simply 'had to accept' was regarded as sufficiently objectionable to require a voir dire insulating the bail application from the main trial. The objection that this dilemma does not amount to compulsion may be met by reference to those cases which have sought to protect an accused from being 'compelled' to go into the box to defend admissions elicited during a voir dire determination of the voluntariness of a

[1] See § 51.5*(j)*(ii) supra. See also Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others [2005] 1 All SA 373 (C) at para 89.

[2] 1995 (5) BCLR 614 (C).

[3] Ibid at 617-18.

[4] See § 51.4*(b)*(iii) supra.

[5] On the presumption of innocence dimension in this case, see § 51.5*(i)* supra.

[6] 1995 (2) SACR 605 (W). See also W de Villiers 'The Admissibility at the Subsequent Criminal trial of Evidence Tendered by Accused for Purposes of the Bail Proceedings' (2002) Journal for Contemporary Roman-Dutch Law 208.

[7] 1999 (2) SACR 137 (C).

confession.[1] The following dictum from the House of Lords in R v Brophy[2] suggests that the compulsion may be attributed to the voir dire determination itself:

> It is of the first importance for the administration of justice that an accused person should feel completely free to give evidence at the voir dire of any improper methods by which a confession or admission has been extracted from him, for he can almost never make an effective challenge of its admissibility without giving evidence himself. He is thus virtually compelled to give evidence at the voir dire, and if his evidence were admissible at the substantive trial, the result might be a significant impairment of his so-called right to silence at the trial.

Botha, and the force of the argument in Brophy, suffered a heavy blow in the decision of the Constitutional Court in S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat.[3] In Dlamini; the applicant challenged constitutionality of s 60(11B)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act ('the Code').[4] The provision rendered the record of a bail application admissible at the subsequent criminal trial. The argument was focused particularly upon the plight of the bail applicant accused of an offence under Schedule 6, since such an applicant had to demonstrate, by leading evidence, that 'exceptional circumstances' existed, which, in the interests

[1] See S v De Vries 1989 (1) SA 228 (A); S v Sithebe 1992 (1) SACR 347 (A). See also the reference in S v Ramavhale 1996 (1) SACR 639, 651 (A) to an accused's being 'compelled to go into the box' if uncertain about the admissibility of state evidence. See also S v Mhlakaza & Others 1996 (6) BCLR 814 (C).

[2] [1982] AC 476, 481. The combined effect of the decision in Brophy and that of the Privy Council in Wong Kam-Ming v R was that, prior to the passing of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in the United Kingdom, the position regarding admissions made in the voir dire could be put thus: such admissions could not be used to prove guilt, irrespective of whether the confession which formed the subject-matter of the voir dire turned out to be admissible. [1980] AC 247. If the challenged confession did turn out to be admissible, admissions made in the voir dire could be used, but only as previous inconsistent statements going to credit. If the challenged confession turned out to be inadmissible, admissions could not be used even for the purposes of credit. In S v Sabisa it was suggested that cross-examination to credit should always be allowed. 1993 (2) SACR 525 (Tk). See also S v Gquma & Others (2) 1994 (2) SACR 182 (O); E Du Toit, FJ De Jager, A Paizes, AS Skeen & S Van der Merwe Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2004) § 217. The 'compulsion' and presumption of innocence considerations should operate consistently: they render use at the trial of the admissions elicited at the voir dire repugnant. Either subsequent admissibility should undo this objection both for substantive use of the admissions and for their use as to credit, or such subsequent admissibility should have no effect on the repugnance. Clearly the latter is to be preferred. How can the arguments on 'compulsion' or on respecting the presumption of innocence be affected by what the court decides in the voir dire? Furthermore, the distinction between use as to credit and use as to guilt should either be applied consistently whether the challenged statement is subsequently ruled admissible or not, or should be done away with. It makes no sense to attach significance to the distinction according to whether the statement is admitted or not. The objections to attaching significance to the distinction between credit and guilt when it comes to the accused's own testimony are manifest. Whether the accused is lying when asserting his or her innocence and whether he or she is guilty are not questions liable to yield different answers in a significant number of cases. This distinction should not determine the applicability of the accused's right against compelled self-incrimination or the respect accorded the presumption of innocence.

[3] 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC)('Dlamini').

[4] Act 51 of 1977 as amended by Act 85 of 1997.

of justice, permitted his or her release.[1] The applicant invoked Botha and drew an analogy between the applicant for bail and the accused at the trial within a trial challenging the voluntariness of a confession. Kriegler J held that the argument stood or fell with its invocation of Botha.[2] He held that Botha must fall. First, Botha was distinguishable because it dealt with an accused who had not been warned at the bail hearing of the right against self-incrimination. Secondly, choice was not compulsion, even if it was Hobson's choice:[3]

> It is true that evidence given at a bail hearing may ultimately redound to the prejudice of the accused. It can therefore not be denied that there is a certain tension between the right of an arrested accused to make out an effective case for bail by adducing all the requisite supporting evidence, and the battery of rights under s 35(1) and (3) of the Constitution. But that kind of tension is by no means unique to applicants for bail. Nor does its mere existence sound constitutional alarm bells. Choices often have to be faced by people living in open and democratic societies. Indeed, the right to make one's own choices is an indispensable quality of freedom. And often such choices are hard.[4]

This analysis, with respect, begs the question: when is a choice not a choice? After all, the robber asks one to choose between one's money and one's life. The bail provision asks one to choose between detention and testimony. If the unpleasant consequences attendant upon a choice are such as deserve disapproval of the agent responsible for them, then one is dealing with coercion.[5] Kriegler J qualified the finding by stipulating that the choice had to be an informed choice.[6] The analogy with evidence elicited at the trial within a trial was left tantalizingly unaddressed. After all, the accused attempting to show that a confession was not voluntarily made also has a choice to keep quiet. Yet the protection of the trial within a trial process is accepted as important to advance the presumption of innocence and liberty. Kriegler J avoided the analogy by resorting to the device of regarding a self-incrimination question as a question of potentially unconstitutionally obtained evidence. If the trial would still be fair, the evidence went in. If not, it stayed out. Abuse of cross-examination on the merits might render the subsequent trial unfair if incriminating answers were admitted.[7] The right against self-incrimination did not give an accused 'the right to lie'.[8] Again, one may ask: what exactly is the difference between the concern for the liberty of a bail applicant and

[1] See § 51.4*(d)* supra.
[2] Dlamini (supra) at para 92.
[3] See § 51.4*(b)*(iii) supra.
[4] Dlamini (supra) at para 94.
[5] On the truth of the proposition that the definition of coercion is essentially normative, and depends upon our disapproval of the kind of dilemma put before the patient, see R Nozick 'Coercion' in S Morgenbesser, P Suppes & M White (eds) Philosophy, Science and Method: Essays in Honour of Ernest Nagel (1969) 440.
[6] Dlamini (supra) at para 94.
[7] Ibid at paras 97 and 100.
[8] S v Chavulla en Andere 1999 (1) SACR 39 (C) at para 95.

the concern for the liberty of an accused asserting that a confession had been obtained improperly? Why recognize the need for a rule in the latter case but not in the former? The principle informing the following provision in the Canadian Charter addresses the concerns adequately while entrenching the right against self-incrimination:

> A witness who testifies in any proceedings has the right not to have any incriminating evidence so given used to incriminate that witness in any other proceedings, except in a prosecution for perjury or for the giving of contradictory evidence.[1]

In S v Aimes & Another, the High Court declined to require admissions elicited at bail proceedings in the absence of a warning about silence and self-incrimination rights to be inadmissible at the trial itself.[2] In this case a co-accused desired to cross-examine the accused about the accused's admissions in order to further the co-accused's defence. The court preferred the compromise of allowing the admissions to serve as previous inconsistent statements as far as the co-accused's defence was concerned, but not to be substantively admissible against the accused. The admission of the evidence against the accused would have rendered the trial unfair.[3] In S v Cloete & Another the burden on the presiding officer properly to inform the accused of his or her right against self-incrimination was afforded more weight.[4] In Cloete, the accused was unrepresented during a bail application and was advised of his rights only once by the presiding officer. As a result, the accused gave clear, self-incriminatory evidence. Davis J held this evidence to be inadmissible during the subsequent trial. Also in S v Sejaphale[5] the Transvaal Provincial Division, per Jordaan J, emphasized that the fact that an accused had legal representation during a bail application did not exempt a presiding officer from the duty to explain to the accused his rights in terms of s 60(11B)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act. In the instant case the magistrate failed to explain to the accused his rights in terms of s 60(11B)(c) but such rights were explained to the accused by his legal representative. Jordaan J held that the magistrate did not have a discretion to allow the record of the bail proceedings at the subsequent trial. Non-compliance with the requirements of s 60(11B)(c) thus made the record inadmissible, as was the case in S v Botha & Others (2).

[1] Section 13.

[2] 1998 (1) SACR 343 (C)('Aimes').

[3] Ibid at 350D. Although our courts do not have to consider the prejudicial effect such evidence may have on a jury, it is nevertheless optimistic to expect the judicial officer to keep the two cases separate in the determination of respective guilt. The only way to avoid the conflict of fair trial rights (silence and self-incrimination against the right to adduce evidence) would be to allow a separation of trials. But then the opportunity to cross-examine on the admissions would fall away to the prejudice of the co-accused, and the admissions would become hearsay. This problem has vexed the common law courts in the commonwealth. See R v Beckford and Daley [1991] Crim LR 833; R v Myers [1996] 2 Cr App R 335 (England); McLay v HM Advocate (1994) SCCR 397 (Scotland); Bannon v R (1995) 132 ALR 87 (Australia); R v Crawford [1995] 1 SCR 858 (Canada). In South Africa there would be a strong argument for allowing the admissions to be proved substantively as defence hearsay in terms of s 3 of Act 45 of 1988.

[4] 1999 (2) SACR 137 (C).

[5] 2000 (1) SACR 603 (T).

A much more lenient approach was adopted in S v Thusi & Others[1] where the court per Magid J held that there was nothing in s 60(11B)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Act which required a court hearing a bail application to warn the applicant that the evidence given by him in the course of the application might form part of the record at the subsequent trial. If the applicant were treated fairly during the subsequent trial, the fact that no such warning was given would not render the trial unfair. It remained desirable that an unrepresented accused should be warned, although such warning was not deemed to be a prerequisite for a reference to be made to the record of the bail proceedings during the subsequent trial.[2]

S v Makofane[3] in effect ignored the effect upon the right against self-incrimination of the discretion to refuse a discharge under s 174 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. That a court should wait for an accused person to supplement the state's case against him or her when there is insufficient evidence upon which a reasonable court might convict seems unquestionably to be a prima facie violation of the principle, underlying the right against compelled self-incrimination, that the state should bear the full burden of proof of guilt. Recourse to the 'balancing' nature of fairness cannot, with respect, answer the question whether a discretion to allow a prima facie violation withstood the transition to constitutionalism.[4] Nor, with respect, can the question be answered by invoking principles relating to improperly obtained evidence.[5] It is respectfully submitted that the finding in S v Mathebula & Another,[6] that the constitutional right against self-incrimination displaced the discretion to refuse a discharge where there was no evidence upon which a reasonable court could convict, was unjustifiably rejected as 'clearly wrong' in Makofane.[7] A related question (indeed the real question in Makofane and Mathebula) is whether the possibility that one's co-accused may incriminate one should be regarded as a legitimate ground upon which to refuse a discharge. The questions should not be confused. Self-incrimination problems, while relevant in the latter situation, are not as obviously present as in the former.[8] But the latter situation undoubtedly asks fairness questions. If the material upon which the possibility is based is not admissible evidence against the accused, a separation of trials seems the only fair option, lest the inadmissible evidence, rather than that which it was hoped it would spawn, ultimately convict the accused.

[1] 2000 (4) BCLR 433 (N).
[2] Ibid at 439.
[3] 1998 (1) SACR 603 (T)('Makofane').
[4] See Makofane (supra) at 617 invoking Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & Another 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 786 (CC). See also § 51.1*(b)*(ii) supra.
[5] See Makofane (supra) at 617I-618H, invoking S v Khan 1997 (2) SACR 611 (SCA).
[6] 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W).
[7] Makofane (supra) at 618H
[8] But see R v Machinini & Others (2) 1944 WLD 91, 96. Blackwell J remarks about the accused's dilemma in such a case: 'The prosecution's hope is not only that the co-accused may incriminate the accused but, more probably, that a combination of the co-accused's defence and the accused's efforts to deal with it may achieve what the state has failed to do.'

S v Ndlangamandla & Another[1] provided welcome resurrection of the Mathebula insistence on the constitutional impropriety of allowing the state to avoid a discharge on the possibility that the accused might supplement the state's case. The Canadian decision of Du Bois v R[2] was invoked as substantiation for the proposition that 'the provisions of FC s 35(3)(h) with regard to the presumption of innocence, the right to silence, and the right not to testify' had the consequence of disallowing such reliance by the state.[3] Neither Mathebula nor Makofane was mentioned. Again the close relationship between the presumption of innocence, the right to silence, and the right against compelled self-incrimination was prominent. In an appeal from the Cape Provincial Division the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Lubaxa,[4] referring to both Mathebula[5] and Makofane,[6] confirmed that the failure to discharge an accused where, at the close of the prosecution's case, there was no possibility of a conviction other than if the accused entered the stand and incriminated herself, constituted a breach of the accused's rights contained in FC s 35(3). Nugent AJA opined that this would ordinarily vitiate a conviction based exclusively on the accused's self-incriminatory evidence.[7]

(k) The right to adduce and challenge evidence

In S v Mosoetsa the Transvaal Provincial Division emphasized that an accused had to be informed of his right to dispute any evidence which the state might submit and that he could present any evidence to the contrary should he wish to.[8] This right, however, did not override the right of the co-accused not to incriminate himself or to remain silent.[9] This twofold right, contained in IC s 25(3)(d) and FC s 35(3)(i), may create more constitutional problems than first meet the eye. Clearly, it covers denials of the accused's right to call witnesses. In S v Younas[10] a magistrate's refusal to allow the accused in proceedings under the Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993 to call witnesses, on the basis that the Act gave presiding officers wide powers to depart from normal procedures, that the magistrate was impressed by the complainant's evidence, and that the accused was engaging in 'delaying tactics', was held to have been a denial of the accused's 'fundamental right to a fair hearing'.[11] In S v Mbeje[12] the failure to allow an

[1] 1999 (1) SACR 391 (W)('Ndlangamandla').
[2] (1985) 23 DLR (4th) 503.
[3] Ndlangamandla (supra) at 393G-I.
[4] 2001 (4) SA 1251 (SCA).
[5] Ibid at para 13.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid at para 18.
[8] 2005 (1) SACR 304, 310 (T).
[9] S v Lungile & Another 1999 (2) SACR 597, 605 (SCA).
[10] 1996 (2) SACR 272 (C).
[11] Ibid at 274. It was clearly a case calling for the application of the specific right to adduce evidence.
[12] 1996 (2) SACR 252 (N).

accused to address the court before judgment was regarded as an 'outright denial of the audi alteram partem rule'.[1] In S v Dodo, the Court (per Smuts AJ) held that s 51 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997, which prescribed the imposition of minimum sentences in certain circumstances, did not preclude the accused from adducing evidence.[2]

The right is a twofold right rather than two separate rights because the adduction of evidence by the accused in a criminal trial represents his or her challenge to the state's evidence: the accused is not ordinarily[3] required to bring anything to the Court's attention, and so as much evidence as he or she does adduce amounts to a challenge to the evidence produced by the state in its efforts to justify the deprivation of liberty it is urging. In Canada, the right to adduce and challenge is contained in the single 'principle of fundamental justice' to 'present full answer and defence'.[4] The close relationship between the right to adduce evidence and the right to challenge evidence emerged starkly in the American case of Chambers v Mississippi:[5] an inability to cross-examine a third party about a retraction of the third party's confession to the crime with which the accused was charged was compounded by an inability to adduce evidence of repetitions of the confession made to other parties. The US Supreme Court's finding that the retraction of the confession by the third party amounted to evidence against the accused[6] illustrates the very close relationship between the two parts of the right to adduce and challenge evidence. The inabilities referred to entailed a violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, 'coupled with' the right to confront one's accusers, contained in the Sixth Amendment.[7] The exclusion of evidence sought to be presented by an accused may therefore raise constitutional problems

[1] The court was of the opinion that, since the ultimate question was whether the prosecution could demonstrate that the accused had not been prejudiced, overwhelming evidence against the accused might be sufficient to justify such a violation. This, it is submitted, was a violation of the principle that audi alteram partem should not yield where fairness would make 'no difference'. The point was pertinently made in S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106 (C). On a charge of contempt against a public prosecutrix, the magistrate had relied upon enquiries he had privately conducted to investigate the truth of the accused's explanation. Ngcobo J held that the failure to allow the accused to deal with such evidence was a violation of the right to adduce and challenge evidence. The learned judge made the following welcome comment on arguments from futility: 'There is no place for the so-called no-difference rule under our Constitution.' Ibid at 118G. See also S v Zingilo 1995 (9) BCLR 1186 (O).

[2] 2001 (1) SACR 301, 315 (E).

[3] Whether the imposition of an evidential burden upon the accused violates the presumption of innocence was, strictly speaking, not answered by the Constitutional Court in Scagell v Attorney-General of the Western Cape & Others 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC).

[4] See R v Seaboyer [1991] 2 SCR 577. See generally DM Pacioccio 'The Constitutional Right to Present Defence Evidence in Criminal Cases' (1985) 63 Canadian Bar Review 519.

[5] 410 US 284 (1973)('Chambers').

[6] Ibid at 297. This was despite the fact that the retraction contained no allegations against the accused; it was, however, inconsistent with the accused's innocence if the state's theory that there had been only one killer was accepted.

[7] Ibid at 302.

of much the same kind, involving much the same principles and reasoning, as are entailed by preventing the accused from cross-examining witnesses.[1] The exclusion, for example, of hearsay evidence sought to be adduced by the defence is therefore as much of a potential problem as is the use by the prosecution of hearsay evidence to convict an accused.[2]

Use of hearsay evidence by the state violates the accused's right to challenge evidence by cross-examination.[3] Schutz JA in S v Ramavhale said the following of the discretion to admit hearsay evidence under s 3 of the Law of Evidence Amendment Act of 1988 in criminal trials: 'An accused person usually has enough to contend with without expecting him also to engage in mortal combat with the absent witness.'[4]

In S v Ndlovu & Others[5] the Court held that the provisions of s 3(1)(c) of the

[1] See R v Seaboyer [1991] 2 SCR 577 (A rule prohibiting the defence from cross-examining a rape complainant about certain categories of her past sexual experience irrespective of the relevance of the evidence was struck down as violating the right to 'present full answer'.)

[2] See, on the objections to excluding evidence sought to be adduced by the defence on the basis that it is hearsay, Lucier v R [1982] 1 SCR 28, 32f; R v Finta [1994] 1 SCR 701, 853f; R v Daylight (1989) 41 A Crim R 354 (Queensland Supreme Court); *R v A*still (1992) 63 A Crim R 148, 58. See also the United Kingdom Law Commission Criminal Law Evidence in Criminal Proceedings: Hearsay and Related Topics Consultation Paper No 138 (1995) at paras 1.30, 5.32, 5.39, 7.83 and 7.36 (Expressing concern that exclusion of defence hearsay may violate the United Kingdom's obligations under art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights); Scottish Law Commission Evidence: Report on Hearsay Evidence in Criminal Proceedings Scot Law Com No 149 (1995) at para 4.29; G Williams The Proof of Guilt: A Study of the English Criminal Trial (3rd Edition, 1963) 211; A Choo Hearsay and Confrontation in Criminal Trials (1996) 66, 67, 94, 104, 105, 129, 141, 179 and 196; DM Paciocco (supra); SG Churchwell 'The Constitutional Right to Present Evidence: Progeny of Chambers v Mississippi' (1983) 19 Criminal Law Bulletin 131.

[3] There exists a close link in the United States between the hearsay rule and confrontation clause jurisprudence. See Dutton v Evans 400 US 74, 86 n16 (1970); California v Green 399 US 149, 155 (1976); United States v Inadi 475 US 387, 393 n5 (1986); Idaho v Wright 497 US 805, 814 (1990). Generally speaking, 'firmly rooted' exceptions to the hearsay rule at common law are regarded as justified. See Ohio v Roberts 448 US 56 (1980); Idaho v Wright (supra) at 814. In Canada the position is governed by R v Potvin [1989] 1 SCR 525 (Recognizing the implications for the right to 'full answer and defence' of admitting state hearsay) and R v Khan [1990] 2 SCR 531 (Subjecting the whole exercise to one of determining the 'necessity and reliability' justifying admission of hearsay evidence.) The European Convention on Human Rights art 6(3)(d) provides for the right to 'examine and have examined the witnesses against him'. Although the Convention operates with a 'margin of appreciation', (ie deference to state arrangements on procedural matters, particularly in the area of the laws of evidence and must allow for the co-existence of inquisitorial and adversarial jurisdictions) the European Court of Human Rights has confirmed the fact that the right to 'examine and have examined' the witnesses against one is seriously implicated by the use of statements, particularly of anonymous witnesses, that are not subjected to adverse cross-examination. See Unterpetinger v Austria (1986) 13 EHRR 434; Barberá, Messegué and Jabardo v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360; Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 175; S Stavros The Guarantees for Accused Persons under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights: An Analysis of the Convention and a Comparison with Other Instruments (1993) 230-32 (For qualifications.)

[4] 1996 (1) SACR 639, 651 (A).

[5] 2001 (1) SACR 85 (W)('Ndlovu').

Law of Evidence Amendment Act[1] were not in conflict with the provisions of FC s 35(3)(i) as these provisions did not affect the accused's right to adduce and challenge evidence.[2]

The constitutionality of admitting hearsay documentary evidence against an accused under s 212(4)(a) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 came before the Full Court of the Witwatersrand Local Division in S v Van der Sandt.[3] The documentary hearsay in question was a certificate handed in by a forensic analyst who had taken a blood specimen from the accused and had concluded that the accused's blood-alcohol level while driving had been such as to render him guilty of an offence under the Road Traffic Act 29 of 1989. The provision in question allowed such evidence to state merely the qualifications of the deponent and the fact that the decisive result had been obtained by a process 'requiring skill in chemistry'. The objection was that the right to cross-examine was violated in the context of a statement conclusively deciding the issue before the Court. Van Dijkhorst J held that the mere fact that evidence was tendered by affidavit did not render the proceedings unfair, and that the question lay in the nature of the evidence.[4] The Court observed that the kind of evidence normally provided under s 212 was of a formal non-contentious nature, and that the capacity to admit such evidence on affidavit was 'essential to the proper administration of justice', which was the reason the provision would be justified under FC s 36(1) even if it did violate the right to cross-examine. The Court then focused on the nature of the evidence, particularly its conclusive effect on the issue, and avoided grasping the nettle concerning the untested nature of such evidence by pointing to the provision for calling the expert in question to testify, which would render such a witness, still a state witness, subject to cross-examination. There was therefore no denial of the opportunity to cross-examine, and the question whether such a denial relating to such evidence would be unconstitutional was in effect left open. The Court did require affidavit evidence to be subject to challenge, and held that the provision in question had to be read to require the deponent to attest to the basis of the finding and the workings of the equipment, in order to render

[1] Act 45 of 1988. Section 3(1) stipulates the following:
'3 Hearsay evidence
(1) Subject to the provisions of any other law, hearsay evidence shall not be admitted as evidence at criminal or civil proceedings, unless- (a) each party against whom the evidence is to be adduced agrees to the admission thereof as evidence at such proceedings; (b) the person upon whose credibility the probative value of such evidence depends, himself testifies at such proceedings; or (c) the court, having regard to- (i) the nature of the proceedings; (ii) the nature of the evidence; (iii) the purpose for which the evidence is tendered; (iv) the probative value of the evidence; (v) the reason why the evidence is not given by the person upon whose credibility the probative value of such evidence depends; (vi) any prejudice to a party which the admission of such evidence might entail; and (vii) any other factor which should in the opinion of the court be taken into account, is of the opinion that such evidence should be admitted in the interests of justice.'

[2] Ndlovu (supra) at para 63.

[3] 1997 (2) SACR 116 (W)('Van der Sandt').

[4] Ibid at 132.

meaningful challenge possible.[1] It should be clear that an attempt by the accused to adduce positive evidence would involve the same principle. If the distinction between cross-examination about past experience and adduction of evidence of past experience is one between relevance to credit and relevance to the issue respectively, then there would be a relevant distinction between cross-examination and evidence adduced, but any 'full answer' objection to denial of cross-examination as to credit should apply a fortiori to a denial of evidence relevant to the issue.

The existence of the right to cross-examine must be adequately explained to the unrepresented accused,[2] and the court's duty to fill in the gaps in examining witnesses in the case of an unrepresented accused may be regarded as a fulfilment of the accused's right to adduce and challenge evidence.[3]

A strong line was taken by Khumalo J in S v Motlhabane[4] on the denial of the accused's right exhaustively to cross-examine an adverse witness. A prosecution witness who had already been extensively cross-examined died before cross-examination could be completed. The difficulty of predicting what would have emerged under further cross-examination was sufficient to render a conviction based on such incompletely tested evidence a violation of the right to a fair trial.

An equally strong line was taken in S v Lukhandile[5] to the violation of an accused's right to adduce the evidence of a witness on the ground that the witness had been present in court. Such a situation, the Court held, had to be assessed for weight; it could not be grounds for ignoring the right to adduce evidence. The irregularity was so fundamental that there had been no trial at all, and the proceedings were set aside.[6]

In Klink v Regional Magistrate NO & Others[7] the Court had to determine whether the provision in s 170A of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 for a child witness to be cross-examined through an intermediary was an unconstitutional dilution of the right to cross-examination, particularly as the intermediary could convey merely the general purport of the questions put by the cross-examiner. The Court observed that s 170A did not exclude the right to cross-examine.[8] It added that the right to cross-examine was inevitably limited by a court's discretion to disallow oppressive or irrelevant questioning.[9] Whether a procedure infringed

[1] See Van der Sandt (supra) at 138. See also L Meintjies-Van der Walt 'Expert Evidence and the Right to a Fair Trial: A Comparative Perspective' (2001) South African Journal for Human Rights 301.

[2] In S v Mbeje it was held that a repetition of the right before each witness was not required, the following advice given before the first witness having been sufficient: 'It is vitally important that you put your defence to all the state witnesses. Don't allow anything you dispute to go unchallenged. Do you understand?' Magistrates might do worse than adopt this formula as a practice direction. 1996 (2) SACR 252 (N).

[3] See S v Moilwa 1997 (1) SACR 188 (NC).

[4] 1995 (8) BCLR 951 (B).

[5] 1999 (1) SACR 568 (C).

[6] Ibid at 571A-B.

[7] 1996 (3) BCLR 402 (SE)('Klink').

[8] Ibid at 409.

[9] Ibid at 410.

the right depended on the effect it had on the purpose of cross-examination, viz to elicit favourable evidence and to cast doubt on the state's case, and hence depended on the circumstances.[1] The Court examined the problems of secondary victimization of vulnerable complainants[2] and found that the ordinary procedures of the criminal justice system were inadequate to address the needs and requirements of child witnesses.[3] The Court's finding that the right to cross-examine was not impaired came by a puzzling route: first, the filtering of questions through an intermediary was regarded as no limitation on the right to cross-examine, the intermediary acting as an 'interpreter'.[4] Then the acknowledgement that the forcefulness and full benefits of cross-examination were denied in the circumstances was accounted for by balancing the interests of the child against those of the accused, which 'led' to the conclusion that the right to challenge was 'not impaired'.[5] The Court then returned to the objection about general purport and filtering, and answered it by weaving together the interests of the child and the consideration that the court's control over the filtering proces ensured that the integrity of the questions asked was maintained.[6] Finally, consideration of the importance of truth-finding 'modified' by due process requirements was added to conclude that the right had not been violated, and that no limitation analysis was called for.[7] It is submitted that, whatever the merits of protecting the child's interests, these interests had no logical effect on the extent to which the right was being impaired: they should have been regarded solely as justification for such impairment as was entailed by the filtering process.

A sharp division of the degree of impairment and the extent of justification would have answered the crucial question: how much impairment of the effectiveness of rigorous cross-examination is required before the right to adduce and challenge evidence may be said to be sufficiently adversely affected to require justification of the violation under the limitations clause? That there was some impairment of the cross-examination cannot be doubted. This question should have applied also to the degree of impairment inherent in the introduction of physical or technological barriers between the cross-examiner and the witness, since such measures equally undeniably have an adverse effect upon the full force of cross-examination. It was not conducive to an engagement with the

[1] Klink (supra) at 410.

[2] Ibid. For a caveat about the unfortunate effects of this discourse on the presumption of innocence see § 51.5*(i)* supra. See also F Cassim 'The Rights of Child Witnesses versus the Accused's Right to Confrontation: A Comparative Perspective' (2003) Comparative and International Law Journal of South Africa 63.

[3] The court's balancing of state interests (protecting the witness) against those of the accused within the definition of the right, in the face of its endorsement of the two-stage analytical structure, is discussed in § 51.1*(b)*(iv) supra.

[4] Klink (supra) at 411.

[5] Ibid at 412.

[6] Ibid at 412- 413.

[7] Ibid at 413.

crucial question that the analysis of the procedure concerned — separation by video-link — was undertaken in terms of the right to a public trial.[1] The fact that the American jurisprudence most urgently in point naturally dealt with confrontation issues was employed as grounds for distinguishing the cases, when recognition that the right to adduce and challenge was at issue would have led to a full appreciation of the confrontation issue.[2] The Court admittedly alluded to and endorsed some confrontation reasoning in Maryland v Craig[3] and the 'full answer and defence' reasoning of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Levogiannis,[4] but the focus of its finding remained throughout on the right to a public trial.

The Court in S v Nkabinde was far more focused on the right to confront one's accusers as being integral to the adversarial system, a system that received stirring praise in the judgment.[5]

S v Stefaans[6] cautioned against too unthinking an application of the intermediary procedure without thorough investigation into its necessity and the applicability of the statutory requirements. The following caveats of fairness had to inform the decision, and the accused had to be made aware of his or her right to oppose the procedure:[7]

1. An intermediary may affect the effectiveness of cross-examination.
2. An accused prima facie had the right to confront his or her accusers and to be confronted by them.
3. Human experience shows that it is easier to lie about someone behind his or her back than to his or her face.

The judgment recognized that s 170A made inroads into the right to challenge evidence, and decreed that this be borne in mind in the interpretation and application of the section. A similar sensitivity was displayed in S v F,[8] where it was pointed out that the procedure encroached upon an accused's rights, and where the Court laid down that its jurisdictional facts had to be established on a balance of probabilities.

[1] See § 51.5*(e)(ii) supra. 'Confrontation' aspects of the case which might be accommodated under the right to be present when being tried have been alluded to above. See § 51.5(g)* supra.

[2] For arguments as to whether the 'presence' dimension of the right to confront should have been separated from those arguments related to the 'impairment of cross-examination' dimension of the right — the former being considered under the right to be tried in one's presence and the latter under the right to adduce and challenge evidence — see Coy v Iowa 487 US 1012 (1988); Maryland v Craig 497 US 836 (1990).

[3] 497 US 836 (1990), cited in Klink (supra) at 414.

[4] [1993] 4 SCR 475. See Klink (supra) at 415.

[5] 1998 (8) BCLR 996, 1001B-E (N).

[6] 1999 (1) SACR 182 (C).

[7] Ibid at 188. See the list of guidelines for applying the procedure..

[8] 1999 (1) SACR 571 (C).

A socially explosive question, and one replete with human rights dilemmas, is the clash between the accused's right to challenge evidence and the rape complainant's right to dignity and to freedom from invasive interrogation not reasonably related to the protection of the rights of the accused. A focus on the plight of the 'victim' endangers the presumption of innocence; but allowing the accused a completely free rein tramples the dignity of the complainant and may amount to curial brutality. This is especially problematic when the accused is unrepresented. On the one hand, far more leeway is allowed to ensure that all sources of possible doubt have been addressed, and that an injustice is not done to the innocent accused whose sense of relevance may not be acute. On the other hand, the guilty rapist gets the opportunity of subjecting his victim to another ordeal at first hand, few holds barred. In S v M[1] the magistrate 'seemed to have allowed the appellant a degree of leeway which ethical, moral and legal imperatives would have prevented, were the appellant legally represented. One serious consequence thereof was the failure to protect the dignity of the complainant during cross-examination'[2] It may be that the erection of a screen between the accused and the complainant during cross-examination could be called for, to reduce some of the possible trauma for the complainant.[3]

The main problem in S v M was the irrelevance of the offensive questioning to the accused's defence in circumstances where the irrelevance appeared only once the accused had revealed the nature of his defence (an alibi), after nine hours of cross-examination including intimate interrogation of the complainant about the most delicate and basic details of the trauma.[4]

(l) The right to be tried in a language one understands

The need to understand the proceedings in order to make informed choices in exercising one's rights to defend oneself is not the only rationale for this right. If it were, it could be argued that as long as the accused's lawyer understood the language spoken in court and the accused and the lawyer understood one another (a right inherent in the right to a fair trial as held by Buys J in S v Pienaar[5]), there would be no reason to ensure understanding on the part of the accused. The

[1] 1999 (1) SACR 664 (C)('M').

[2] Ibid at 665I.

[3] See R v Levogiannis [1993] 4 SCR 475; § 51.5*(i)* supra and above in this section. See also R v Brown (Milton) The Times 7 May 1998 (CA), as reported in Archbold Criminal Pleading: Evidence and Practice (1999) 1032, § 8-113. The Court of Appeal reminded judges that a trial was not 'fair' when the unrepresented accused gained an advantage he would not otherwise have had by abusing the rules in relation to relevance and repetition when cross-examining. Suggestions in Brown relating to an examination of the relevance of various lines of enquiry in advance, in the absence of the jury, are of limited assistance in a system where the judicial officer is both factfinder and judge of law.

[4] Since this question was examined from the point of view of the right to silence, it is dealt with in § 27.5*(j)*(ii) above.

[5] 2000 (2) SACR 143, 156 (NC). See also F Cassim 'The Accused Person's Competency to Stand Trial — A Comparative Perspective' (2004) 45 Codicillus 18.

exercise of the coercive power of a criminal trial carries a burden of justifying the coercion to those who are coerced, in order to satisfy as far as reasonably possible the ideal of democratic government, which requires the constructive consent of the governed for the coercive measures attendant upon an exercise of state power. The accused is to be made a conscious participant in the exercise of state power over his or her person, so that the notion that the deprivation of the accused's liberty entailed by the trial is an exercise of collective self-government can be afforded a degree of reality. The trial is the ritual of justification in which the merits of the deprivation of the accused's liberty are authoritatively and finally determined.[1] In the absence of a jury system, the accused must find democratic legitimacy in reasons and justifications from the Bench. Courts are equipped to act as fora of justification. For these reasons, the degree of understanding required by FC s 35(4) for information given to detained, arrested and accused persons in circumstances which do not form part of the ritual of 'being tried' is less strict than that required for participation in the trial itself. The Transvaal Provincial Division in S v Ngubane observed, in relation to the right to an interpreter, where trial in a language one understood was not practicable:

> [T]he interpretation should take place simultaneously with the testimony being given by the witness; . . . the interpretation will be in a language which the accused fully understands and not into a language which he understands partially.[2]

The conviction of the accused, an isiZulu-speaker, was accordingly set aside where the proceedings were interpreted to him in seTswana.[3] The Eastern Cape Provincial Division in S v Siyotula,[4] however, did not interpret the Ngubane judgment as laying down an absolute rule that, if the interpretation was not done simultaneously with the evidence given, there was automatically a failure of justice. There was no unfairness and no miscarriage of justice if this irregularity could be cured without prejudice to the parties.

In S v Ndala[5] the Cape Provincial Division confirmed that the provision for an interpreter required a sound and faithful ('juis en getrou') translation[6] and that, given that the very necessity for an interpreter arose because the linguistic competence of the Court and of the accused did not coincide, the safeguard of requiring an interpreter to be officially appointed after the taking of an oath was the only practically feasible way of ensuring the required peace of mind

[1] See WO Weyrauch 'Law as Mask: Legal Ritual and Relevance' (1978) 66 California LR 699.

[2] 1995 (1) BCLR 121, 122 (T).

[3] See S v Abrahams 1997 (2) SACR 47 (C)(The question of the competence of an interpreter for a 'deaf mute' was determined as one of fairness under s 6(2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 32 of 1944, entirely on the basis of the common law principles laid down in S v Mafu 1978 (1) SA 454 (C) and S v Siwela 1981 (2) SA 56 (T).)

[4] 2003 (1) SACR 154, 158 (E)('Siyotula').

[5] 1996 (2) SACR 218 (C)('Ndala').

[6] Ndala (supra) at 221. See also NC Steytler 'Implementing Language Rights in Court: The Role of the Court Interpreter' (1993) South African Journal for Human Rights 205.

concerning the accuracy of what was being said in Court.[1] Evidence given through an interpreter not thus appointed was therefore not evidence, and the proceedings had to be set aside for a trial de novo before a different magistrate: the violation was irrevocable given the requirement of simultaneity.[2] Noorbhai AJ in S v Chauke & Another[3] sounded the 'caveat to magistrates and interpreters alike' that it had to be clear from the record that an accused was tried in a language he or she understood.[4]

The state is given the option under FC s 35(3)(k) to provide an interpreter only where it is 'impracticable' actually to try the accused in a language he or she understands. The distinction between this formulation and the formulation in IC s 25(3)(i)[5] means that the accused has the opportunity under FC s 35(3)(k) to compel the Court to try him or her in a language he or she understands, rather than leaving the choice entirely up to the state. Of course, the accused bears the burden, according to the formulation, to show that it is not 'impracticable' to accede to his or her demand, a burden which may be difficult to discharge given that the probanda are within the knowledge of the officials concerned, rather than of the accused. Nevertheless, it is by no means inconceivable that an accused would be able to show the practicality of, for example, having a court constituted in such a way as to try the case in a language other than English or Afrikaans, particularly since the provision does not require 'reasonable practicability'.[6]

It seems that the appellant in Mthetwa v De Bruin NO & Another[7] employed this argument, but without success.[8] The appellant, an isiZulu-speaking teacher who

[1] Ndala (supra) at 223.

[2] Ibid at 224. The decisiveness of the interpreter's unofficial status for the ratio of the case was somewhat diminished by the finding that the magistrate had additionally ('daarbenewens') displayed clear reservations about the interpreter's competence ('duidelike bedenkinge oor sy bekwaamheid'). Ibid at 223.

[3] 1998 (1) SACR 354, 357 (V).

[4] The learned judge clearly meant 'tried in a language which he understood' to include 'interpreted in a language which he understood'. Ibid at 357I.

[5] 'Every accused person shall have the right . . . to be tried in a language which he or she understands, or, failing this, to have the proceedings interpreted to him or her.'

[6] See S v Collier 1995 (2) SACR 648 (C), discussed in § 51.5*(e)*(i) supra. Accused persons, it is submitted, should not be allowed to subvert the reasoning in Collier by demanding trials by judicial officers and lawyers who speak their language. The grave consequences of such 'forum shopping' for the kind of impartiality ensured only by a reasonably strong degree of random selection of the most competent officials would seem to outweigh the demands of being tried in one's language where this is practicable. Nevertheless, such arguments, it is submitted, would have to be made under FC s 36(1) in a case where an accused person has shown the 'practicability' of being tried in a language he or she understands. For a discussion of the state's duty to pay for competent interpreters as part of a fair trial at common law, see I Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 65.7. The issues canvassed in Chapter 65 will have an effect on the proper approach a court must take to this potentially problematic provision, but it is to be remembered that the fair trial dimension of the language question is concerned with the right to a fair trial, not with cultural or linguistic equality.

[7] 1998 (3) BCLR 336 (N).

[8] The court referred, without comment, to counsel's argument that rights might be limited only under FC s 36.

understood English, was held not to have been entitled to have his trial conducted in isiZulu, for reasons of impracticability. The impracticability at issue was the linguistic constitution of the court staff and of the judiciary in the case of review or appeal. It may be added, and cannot practically or sensibly be ignored, that Afrikaans and English, apart from being thoroughly entrenched in the textual fabric of our law, are peculiarly possessed of an adequate legal infrastructure and vocabulary.[1]

(m) Retroactivity

The provisions in IC s 25(3)(f) and FC s 35(3)(l) and (n) incorporate the fundamental principle of legality expressed in the maxims nullum crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege. In 1798, Chase J said the following in Calder v Bull:[2] 'Every law that takes or impairs rights vested agreeably to existing laws is retrospective and is generally unjust and may be oppressive.' This overriding principle indicates how closely connected are the prohibition against retroactive creation of crimes and the provision allowing the accused person the benefit of ameliorative alterations in the law relating to punishment.[3]

Whether a particular crime is retroactively created may not always be an easy question to answer since it involves subsidiary questions of legal philosophy about the very meaning of 'law'.[4] In SW v United Kingdom[5] the European Court of Human Rights confronted the problem of judicial transformation of the definition of a crime through incremental common-law development. The applicant challenged his conviction for rape of his wife on the basis that the actus reus had occurred before the decision of the English Court of Appeal, confirmed by the House of Lords,[6] which self-professedly 'changed' the position obtaining at [1] See S v Matomela 1998 (3) BCLR 339 (Ck)(The High Court in Bisho recognized the propriety of proceedings which had been conducted and recorded entirely in isiXhosa as a matter of necessity, but pointed to the practical problems such a practice would create for appeals and reviews. Tshabalala J inclined to the view that one official language of record might be a practical necessity, given the impossibility of heeding linguistic equality in the courts. The matter required the urgent attention of the Department of Justice. Ibid at 342F-G. It is submitted that the sacrifice of Afrikaans, on the basis that its privileged position relative to other non-English South African languages was unwarranted, would amount to an unfortunate and short-sighted denial of the textual, linguistic and historical infrastructure of our Roman-Dutch legal system.)

[2] 3 US 386 (1798).

[3] For the constitutional requirements relating to punishment generally, see D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49.

[4] See the classic debate between Hart and Fuller about the legal merits of arguments that the laws under which Nazi judges and officials acted during the Third Reich were not laws, and that the activities they permitted could consequently be described as crimes. HLA Hart 'Legal Positivism and the Separation of Law and Morals' (1958) 71 Harvard LR 598 and L Fuller 'Positivism and Fidelity to Law' (1958) 71 Harvard LR 630. See also HLA Hart The Concept of Law (2nd Edition, 1994) 208-212.

[5] (1995) 21 EHRR 363 ('SW').

[6] R v R (Rape: Marital Exemption) [1992] 1 AC 599.

common law that a husband could not rape his wife. In other words, retroactive application to the applicant's detriment of the judicial alteration of the common law would violate the prohibition of retroactive criminal provisions contained in art 7 of the European Convention. The Court pointed out that the provision in question embodied the general principle that only the law could define a crime and prescribe a penalty,[1] and proceeded to examine the application of this principle to the very difficult question of judicial development under the common law. The 'inevitable element of judicial interpretation' which was necessary both for the elucidation of the law and for its application to specific facts was held to be an entrenched and necessary part of the English legal tradition.[2] This would of course apply to our system as well. The pertinent finding was that such 'gradual clarification' of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation was not inconsistent with the principle against retroactivity, provided that the resulting development was consistent with the essence of the offence and could be reasonably foreseen.[3] Given this peg upon which to hang the finding, the court proceeded to find that the development finally recognized authoritatively by the English courts was foreseeable at the time the offence was committed, as it had followed a 'perceptible line of case law'.[4]

The clearest principle to be extracted from the case is the idea that it is the surprise entailed by retroactive provisions that is the abhorrent feature. This makes eminent sense in the context of determining moral culpability at the time the offence was committed. It is submitted that this principle should be borne in mind when the exception to retrospectivity pertaining to offences which were crimes 'under international law' is applied.[5] The provision in IC s 25(3)(f) did not allow circumvention of the retrospectivity objection by reliance upon the status of the newly enacted crime as criminal under international law at the time it was committed.[6] The most important questions in this regard will be whether persons who committed acts which were not criminal under the laws of apartheid, but were criminal under international law:

1. may be prosecuted for such acts (with or without enabling legislation);
2. may be prosecuted if they have been afforded some form of amnesty, particularly by the quasi-judicial proceedings of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission; and
3. should be so prosecuted.

[1] SW (supra) at para 35/33.
[2] Ibid at para 36/34.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at para 43/41.
[5] This exception was added to the wording of FC s 35(3)(l).
[6] See Azanian Peoples' Organisation (AZAPO) & Others v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & Others 1996 (4) SA 562 (C); J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (1994) 352 (Dugard International Law); J Dugard 'Is the Truth and Reconciliation Process Compatible with International Law? An Unanswered Question, AZAPO v Truth & Reconciliation Commission' (1997) 13 SAJHR 258 (Dugard 'Unanswered Question').

It is well beyond the scope and purpose of this chapter to answer these questions. To some extent they have been addressed by the Constitutional Court's decision in Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others,[1] which concerned the question whether international law as incorporated by the Interim Constitution permitted the non-prosecution of those responsible for human rights violations under apartheid, a policy that was in turn expressly authorized by the Interim Constitution.[2] What should be noted, however, is that a distinction should be drawn not only between acts criminal under 'positive' laws during apartheid and acts criminal, not under the positive laws of apartheid but under undeniably well-established laws of international criminal law, but also between acts criminal under the undeniably well-established principles of international law and those the criminality of which under customary international law is a matter of controversy.[3] It is submitted, for example, that it cannot be maintained that the 'crime of apartheid', as defined by the General Assembly's 1973 International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,[4] at any stage attained the status of a well-established principle of customary international law rendering it binding upon those, including most of the West, not party to its terms. It is interesting to muse on the significance of the judgment of the Constitutional Court in Key v Attorney-General, Cape of Good Hope Provincial Division, & Another[5] for retrospective trumping by international human rights norms over previously applicable positive law. The unanimous court in Key applied strongly positivist thinking to declare: '[T]here is no warrant in justice for retroactively casting a blanket of illegality over what was properly … [done] according to the law as it stood at the time.'[6] In any event, the extreme jurisprudential niceties involved in establishing the status of an act as criminal under international law where such status is controversial should not be a decisive determinant of the surprise factor underlying the prohibition against retroactive penal laws. The person who acts under the impression that his or her action is sanctioned by law is no less surprised by a law declaring such action criminal if he or she is informed that the source of the criminality is international law. The moral force of the argument at Nuremberg in favour of retroactivity was

[1] 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC).

[2] The extent to which the question of international law was left open by the Court's decision is thoroughly examined in Dugard 'Unanswered Question' (supra). See also C Braude & D Spitz 'Memory and the Spectre of International Justice: A Comment on AZAPO' (1997) 13 SAJHR 269.

[3] The leading Canadian war crimes case, R v Finta, while not possessed of the benefit of clarity on the principles relating to retroactivity, nor of unanimity on whether retroactivity was prohibited by the Canadian Charter, found a violation of Canadian 'positive law' as a basis for its decision, in effect rendering the degree of conflict between domestic and international penal provisions an academic issue. [1994] 1 SCR 70. The case possessed the peculiar complicating feature that the offence itself was criminal in Canada — in the abstract — at the time it was committed, but the acts in question were not committed anywhere near Canada. The relationship between substantive legality and extra-territoriality consequently assumed crucial significance for the retroactivity question in that case.

[4] See Dugard International Law (supra) at 214 and 351f.

[5] 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC)('Key').

[6] Ibid at para 7.

proportional to the extent that those concerned could simply not have been unaware of the criminality of their acts.[1] The subjective state of mind of those concerned, after all, is what the principle of retroactivity is directly concerned with. It is submitted that this dimension should be a governing factor in assessing the extremely sensitive questions involved in the area of retrospectivity.

One problem with the change of wording to accommodate international-law crimes is that the retroactivity clause relating to punishment does not lend itself to similar accommodation. The 'prescribed punishment' for a particular act is pre-eminently a question of domestic law, and the reference in FC s 35*(n)* to a 'change' in the prescribed punishment hardly fits comfortably with arguments about universally prescribed punishments. In any event, what was the 'prescribed punishment' in South Africa for an act which was not criminal under South African law but criminal under international law? Freedom, one might say. The more realistic problem, it seems, is that an indemnity for an act that was criminal and did have a prescribed punishment under apartheid operates as a change for the better as far as the 'prescribed punishment' goes, and a revocation of such an indemnity would therefore violate the right to the optimum position on punishment in the relevant period.[2]

Finally, if amnesty is consequent upon a proceeding as judicial in character as that before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, it may well amount to a violation of the ne bis in idem or 'double jeopardy' provision in FC s 35(3)(m) to attempt to resuscitate the prosecution.

(n) Ne bis in idem (double jeopardy)

(i) General

One possible ne bis in idem problem raised by prosecutions which follow on indemnities or amnesties has already been mentioned.[3] 'Double jeopardy' is the American version[4] of the maxim ne bis in idem upheld in South African law by the defences of autrefois convict and autrefois acquit.[5] In essence, the ne bis in idem maxim stipulates that no person shall be subjected to repeated prosecution for the same

[1] For a discussion of the views of Gustav Radbruch, see HLA Hart 'Legal Positivism and the Separation of Law and Morals (1958) 71 Harvard LR 598; L Fuller 'Positivism and Fidelity to Law' (1958) 71 Harvard LR 630.

[2] See CS Nino 'The Duty to Punish Past Abuses of Human Rights Put into Context: The Case of Argentina' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 2619, 2624. Nino is responding to the seminal article on this question by Dianne Orentlicher. See D Orentlicher 'Settling Accounts: The Duty to Prosecute Human Rights Violations of a Prior Regime' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 2537. See also MP Zimmett 'The Law of Pardon' (1974/5) Annual Survey of American Law 179. For more on indemnity, see R Keightley 'Political Offences and Indemnity in South Africa' (1993) 9 SAJHR 334.

[3] See § 51.5*(m)* supra.

[4] The Fifth Amendment decrees that no person 'shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb'. The American clause stems from the English common law.

[5] See Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ss 106(1)(c) and (d).

criminal act and is recognized in international law.[1] Certain exceptions to the prohibition against double jeopardy do, however, exist.[2] Furthermore, our common law recognizes the exceptio rei judicatae both for civil and for criminal law.[3] In S v Basson[4] the Constitutional Court was afforded the opportunity to adjudicate upon, amongst others, the relevance of the constitutional proscription on double jeopardy contained in FC s 35(3)(m) to the interests of justice in the application for special leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court against certain findings of the Supreme Court of Appeal. It was held (per Ackermann J) that the purpose of the right contained in FC s 35(3)(m) was to protect individuals against the possibility of repeated prosecutions for the same criminal conduct. Such protection was deemed necessary in the interests of fairness and the public interest in the finality of judgments.[5] The conclusion reached was that, since the accused's retrial did not give rise to double jeopardy, the retrial would not amount to an unfair trial violation of FC s 35(3)(m).[6]

(ii) Multiple punishments

It is to be observed that the right in IC s 25(3)(g) and FC s 35(3)(m) is confined to a prohibition against being 'tried', IC s 25(3)(g) referring to 'being tried again for any offence of which he or she has previously been convicted or acquitted', and FC s 35(3)(m) referring to being 'tried for an offence in respect of an act or omission for which that person has previously been either acquitted or convicted'. There is therefore no express prohibition on being punished twice for the same offence, a prohibition comprising one of the pillars of the 'double jeopardy' right recognized by the US Supreme Court.[7] Since it is not a constitutional requirement that a person be 'tried' for the purposes of IC s 25(3) or FC s 35 before imprisonment may be imposed on that person,[8] a second punishment, even

[1] See art 20 of the ICC Statute, art 10 of the ICTY Statute and art 9 of the ICTR Statute.

[2] See Prosecutor v Akayesu ICTR-96-4-T at para 468 and C De Than & E Shorts International Criminal Law and Human Rights (2003) 6.

[3] See E du Toit, FJ de Jager, A Paizes, A Skeen & S van der Merwe Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2004) § 106*;* Hiemstra Suid-Afrikaanse Strafproses (5th Edition, 1993) 260-68. See particularly, on the exceptio rei judicatae, S v Ndou 1971 (1) SA 668 (A).

[4] 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 285 (CC)('Basson').

[5] Ibid at para 66.

[6] Ibid at para 66-67.

[7] See United States v Di Francesco 449 US 117 (1980); United States v Dixon 509 US 688 (1993); Witte v United States 515 US 389 (1995)(The majority of the US Supreme Court held that the double jeopardy clause prohibited not only the imposition of a second punishment at a second occasion but also the imposition of two punishments for the same offence.) See also art 14.7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the relevant part of which has been incorporated into art 4 of the Seventh Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights and declares that 'no one shall be liable to be tried or punished again.' See, further, G Kemp 'The Application of the Principle Ne Bis In Idem in Respect of Judgment Rendered by International Criminal Courts' (2001) 1 Journal for South African Law 147.

[8] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel').

imprisonment, imposed by procedures which do not amount to 'trials' under IC s 25(3) or FC s 35 would at first sight not seem to be unconstitutional under our double jeopardy clause, and such measures would have to be challenged by reference to the rights they affect,[1] or by reference to the 'deprivation of liberty' provision of IC s 11 and FC s 12.[2] Still, if the US courts could extract the prohibition against double punishment from the clause prohibiting a person from being 'subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb', then a similar broadened meaning may well be attached to the term 'tried'. Significant in this regard is the fact that FC s 35(3)(m) has left out the qualification 'again' which occurs in IC s 25(3)(g), which may be taken to suggest that the sort of 'trying' which is prohibited by the clause is not confined to the sort of 'trying' that led to the first peril. In other words, 'tried' in FC s 35(3)(m) may encompass the kind of 'trial' which is not a 'trial' for the purposes of fair trial rights, such as identified in Nel v Le Roux NO & Others.[3] There is nothing conceptually paradoxical about a fair trial provision referring to matters outside the scope of the trial, the right to trial within a reasonable time being the clearest example.[4] It is, after all, the possibility of punishment that most concerns the individual who is accused of a criminal offence, and which animates the anxiety and uncertainty the repetition of which ne bis in idem is designed to avoid. 'Doubt about guilt is immediately translatable into doubt about the justice of punishment.'[5] The absurdity of a position which is indifferent to successive punishments as long as there has been only one trial requires little exposition.

If double punishment is covered by this clause, as it is submitted it should be, then penal aspects of procedures which flow from criminal convictions will require ne bis scrutiny — for example, forfeitures of property,[6] penal

[1] On property or privacy rights, see A Itzikowitz 'Constitutional Validity of the Search and Seizure and Related Provisions of the Exchange Control Regulations' (1995) 11 SAJHR 281.

[2] See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40 (Offers analysis of these sections.)

[3] This argument has significance also for the applicability of the ne bis in idem clause to 'acquittals' entailed by grants of amnesty before a quasi-judicial body such as the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. See § 51.5*(m)* supra.

[4] See §§ 51.4*(c)* and 51.5*(f)* supra.

[5] AAS Zuckerman The Principles of Criminal Evidence (1989) 129.

[6] For a discussion of relevant provisions, see Itzikowitz (supra) at 281. See also People v 1988 Mercury Cougar 607 NE 2d 217 (1992)(An Illinois state court held that forfeiture of a motor vehicle consequent upon a narcotics conviction did not violate the double jeopardy clause because the forfeiture proceedings were in rem proceedings not amounting to a penal measure.) It is to be observed that the peculiar notion in American law of regarding the property involved in crime as itself the wrongdoer was an essential premise for the finding that the forfeiture did not amount to punishment. In South African law this peculiar notion does not exist. This notion has been qualified by the US Supreme Court and cannot be relied upon without more to avoid double jeopardy scrutiny in forfeiture cases. See United States v Halper 490 US 435 (1989); Austin v United States 509 US 602 (1993); Department of Revenue of Montana v Kurth Ranch 511 US 767 (1994). See AD Ronner 'Prometheus Unbound: Accepting a Mythless Concept of Civil in Rem Forfeiture with Double Jeopardy Protection' (1996) 44 Buffalo LR 655.

'taxes',[1] or deportation.[2] It is submitted that the guiding principle in a given case should be whether the administrative, legislative or judicial measure which follows upon conviction and punishment and involves further detrimental consequences for the person punished undermines the exhaustiveness of the sentence passed upon the person by the court as punishment. The sentence, after all, is the result of a careful and precise exercise of judgment applied to the individual's case, and is intended to be the full measure of punishment proportionate to the offence.[3] In order for this principle to be respected, it is submitted, sentencing officials should take into account other possible detrimental consequences the convicted accused may face, in which case the enforcement of these consequences would be less liable to objection on the basis of double punishment.

The merits of taking previous convictions into account when imposing sentence will require consideration under the ne bis in idem clause.[4] It is submitted, however, that a sound distinction in principle can be drawn between punishing a convicted person again for previous convictions by adding to the sentence for the current conviction, on the one hand, and, on the other, regarding the very commission of the later offence in circumstances where one has done it many times before as aggravating the blameworthiness of the later commission. In cases where the latter approach is appropriate, an increase of the sentence on the basis of previous convictions does not amount to double punishment. But in circumstances where it cannot be said that the recidivism inherent in repeat commissions augments blameworthiness, employment of previous convictions as aggravating factors should be regarded as a violation of ne bis in idem.

(iii) Multiple trials

It should be noted that the wording of FC s 35(3)(m) is less restrictive than that of IC s 25(3)(g) regarding the activities covered by the previous peril. Unlike

[1] See Department of Revenue v Kurth Ranch 511 US 767 (1994)(The US Supreme Court held by a majority that a 'tax' on an illegal activity was not immune from double jeopardy scrutiny merely for being a tax, and that the punitive characteristics of such a tax were subject to the double jeopardy clause. The court held that taxes imposed on illegal activities were fundamentally different not only from taxes for pure revenue purposes but also from taxes imposed partly to deter undesirable activities and partly to raise money (such as 'sin taxes' on tobacco).)

[2] See Urbina-Mauricio v INS 989 F 2d 1085 (1993)(The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that deportation of an illegal alien convicted of drug offences did not constitute a second punishment for the purposes of double jeopardy, since deportation was a civil action and not a punishment.) It is submitted that state action detrimental to an accused should always be scrutinized carefully for possible penal elements — the enforcement of a private right by private individuals or the state in a private capacity being a different consideration, less likely to involve 'punishment' problems. In any event, civil action grossly disproportionate to the activity penalized may amount to double punishment if the person has already been punished for the activity. See also United States v Halper 490 US 435 (1989).

[3] For the principles of punishment in the constitutional context, see D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49.

[4] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 271.

s 25(3)(g), which limits the prohibition to being tried again for the same offence, FC s 35(3)(m) prohibits being tried for an offence in respect of an act or omission for which one has previously been either acquitted or convicted. The altered wording is strikingly broad.[1] It means that any criminal charge is vitiated if it relates to acts or omissions which have already to some extent formed the subject-matter of previous charges upon which the accused was acquitted or convicted. The determination of the relationship entailed by 'in respect of', as well as the degree to which the act or omission acted as the subject-matter of the previous acquittal or conviction, is therefore crucial to the meaning of 'for which'.[2] It cannot be assumed without more that the common-law test rides roughshod over these questions. That test, formulated in R v Kerr[3] and Petersen v R,[4] and authoritatively endorsed in S v Ndou,[5] sought 'substantial identity' between the offences concerned, as expounded thus:

> [W]hether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first . . .; or . . . whether, if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction[6]

or:

> Would the facts alleged in the second indictment have sufficed to procure some conviction on the first indictment?[7]

[1] The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights art 14.7, the European Convention on Human Rights, Seventh Additional Protocol art 4, the United States Constitution's Fifth Amendment, and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms s 11*(h)* all refer to the 'same offence', or 'it', or 'the offence'. The Inter-American Convention on Human Rights art 8.4 refers to the 'same cause', which formulation is less exactly coextensive than 'same offence' but certainly not as broad as that in FC s 35(3)(m). See also L Jordaan 'Multiple Trials for Crimes Arising from the Same Facts and the Constitutional Right of the Accused to be Protected Against Double Jeopardy' (1998) 11 SA Journal for Criminal Justice 21.

[2] The facts of a New York case decided by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, United States v Ahmed, provide a useful illustration. 980 F 2d 161 (1992). The prosecution in a drug case introduced evidence of the defendant's failure to appear in court in order to show consciousness of guilt. A later prosecution was brought (in a different state) for jumping bail. The evidence for this offence was the same as that introduced in the drug prosecution. Double jeopardy was not violated. Clearly the omission in question was not an omission 'for which' the accused had already been acquitted or convicted. But if on such facts the bail offence were prosecuted first, might the drug charge not amount to being 'tried for an offence in respect of an act or omission for which that person ha[d] previously been either acquitted or convicted'? The ne bis question in such a case should be distinguished from the possible problems raised by the rule in Hollington v F Hewthorn & Co Ltd [1943] KB 587, which bedevils proof of previous convictions based on the 'opinion' evidence comprised by a court's judgment. See S v Mavuso 1987 (3) SA 499 (A). See, generally, DT Zeffertt, AP Paizes & A St Q Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) Chapter 9.

[3] (1907) 21 EDC 324.

[4] 1910 TPD 859.

[5] 1971 (1) SA 668 (A).

[6] R v Kerr (1907) 21 EDC 324, 340.

[7] See Petersen v R 1910 TPD 859, as cited in S v Ndou 1971 (1) SA 668, 678 (A).

Given the broad sweep of the common-law test, it is clear that this test does amount to a plausible interpretation of the clause in question. It captures the core idea behind that aspect of 'double jeopardy' concerned with retrial, namely that conduct which has placed a person in peril before the courts on one occasion should not be allowed to do so again, once the courts have decided the matter. Be that as it may, the altered wording seems a clear basis for concluding that the Constitution requires, in the case of a 'single transaction' giving rise to multiple offences, that those offences all be dealt with in one prosecution, and that a later retrial of the same issues determined for one offence in order to try another offence is prohibited. In McIntyre & Others v Pietersen NO & Another[1] Eloff JP recognized that FC s 35(3)(m) broadened ('verbreed') the IC right:

> Die klem lê op die handeling wat hom ten laste gelê word, nie so seer op die omskrywing van die misdryf wat ter sake is nie.[2]

In McIntyre[3] Eloff JP said that one found in the Constitution a 'samevatting' of the ancient right of an accused to avail himself of the defence of autrefoit acquit. In the context of the judgment it is clear that the word 'samevatting' should be read to mean 'inclusion' rather than 'summary'. Given the court's liberal interpretation of FC s 35(3)(m), it naturally preferred the approach of Voet 48.2.12 to that apparently endorsed by Ogilvie-Thompson JA in S v Ndou & Others.[4] Voet held that, if one had been acquitted of wounding, one could not later be charged with murder if the wounded person died after the acquittal, because one had already been held innocent of the relevant act; but if one had been found guilty of wounding, one could be charged with murder if the wounded person died after the verdict. Ogilvie-Thompson JA was inclined to regard a murder charge as competent after acquittal or conviction, provided the victim died after the verdict. Eloff JP left open the question whether one could be charged with the consequence which eventuated after one had been convicted of the act.[5] S v Gabriel[6] provided an affirmative answer to this question at common law, but was distinguished in McIntyre.[7] FC s 35(3)(m), however, seems to demand a negative answer. If one distinguishes between act and consequence, the murder charge would be 'in respect of an act … for which that person has previously been … convicted'.

[1] 1998 (1) BCLR 18 (T); sub nomine S v McIntyre en Andere 1997 (2) SACR 333 (T)('McIntyre').

[2] 'The emphasis lies on the conduct for which he is being charged rather than the formulation of the crime at issue.' See Ashe v Swenson 397 US 436 (1970)(Brennan, Marshall and Douglas JJ concurring). This 'single transaction' test is more generous to the accused than the traditional 'same evidence' test laid down in Brown v Ohio. 432 US 161 (1977). Brown asks whether each offence 'requires proof of a fact which the other does not'. The latter test causes problems in cases where the second (greater) offence does not theoretically require proof of a fact required by the first (lesser) offence, but the facts are such that only facts sufficient for the first offence are relied upon in proving the second offence. See Illinois v Vitale 447 US 410 (1980); Grady v Corbin 495 US 508 (1990).

[3] McIntyre (supra) at 21B-C.

[4] 1971 (1) SA 668, 776D-E (A).

[5] McIntyre (supra) at 22G-H

[6] 1971 (SA) 646, 652E-G (RA)('Gabriel').

[7] McIntyre (supra) at 23A-B.

It is only if one reads 'act or omission' as capable of referring to the consequences of an act as well as to the act itself, that one may allow a charge for the consequences where the accused has already been convicted for the act. Interpretation in favorem libertatis compels the more liberal reading. Whether and to what extent the state is prohibited from appealing against an unfavourable finding is possibly the most important question to be asked about the clause. Under the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 as amended, the state may not appeal on a finding of fact, but may on a finding of law,[1] and the Attorney-General may appeal against a sentence.[2] Aspects of the state's right to appeal, or the court's power to increase a sentence mero motu,[3] have been constitutionally assessed, but not directly under the ne bis in idem clause. In S v Van den Berg the Namibian provision entitling the state to appeal on the facts was upheld as constitutional, which was unsurprising given the express provision of the Namibian Constitution allowing for state appeals. In S v Sonday & Another[4] the power of the court to increase a sentence upon an appeal against conviction was upheld as constitutional, on the basis that it did not infringe the general fair trial right contained in IC s 25(3), nor the applicant's right to appeal under IC s 25(3)(h).[5] Nothing was said of the ne bis in idem clause. The Court dismissed as 'nonsense' any suggestion that an increase of sentence on appeal could violate the fairness of a trial,[6] basing its finding on what is respectfully submitted to have been a misconceived 'balancing' definition of the right to a fair trial.[7] It may be pointed out that the sort of 'nonsense' his lordship was referring to has spawned an enormously sophisticated body of double jeopardy law in the United States.[8] In S v Kellerman the full extent

[1] Section 110. The idea that it is repugnant for the Crown to appeal a finding of fact is historically connected with the sovereignty of the jury over acquittals. See Bushell's case (1670) Vaughan 135. See, generally, TA Green Verdict According to Conscience: Perspectives on the English Criminal Trial Jury 1200-1800 (1985); AW Scheflin 'Jury Nullification: The Right to Say No' (1972) 45 Southern California LR 168; P Devlin Trial by Jury (3rd Revised Impression, 1966) 84.

[2] Section 110A. This right gradually developed, from a right granted in 1935 to cross-appeal against sentence upon an appeal by the accused, to a unilateral right to appeal against sentence. See S v Van den Berg 1996 (1) SACR 19 (Nm)('Van den Berg'). Van den Berg concerned the constitutional merits of the even further development in Namibia allowing the state to appeal against a finding on the facts.

[3] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 309(3).

[4] 1994 (4) BCLR 138 (C), 1994 (2) SACR 810 (C)('Sonday').

[5] Presumably, the reasoning behind this claim was that the right to appeal would suffer a 'chilling effect' if exercising it could lead to an increase in sentence.

[6] Sonday (supra) at 822.

[7] Ibid at 820. See the discussion of 'balancing' within the determination of the scope of the right to a fair trial in § 51.1*(b)*(iv) supra.

[8] See P Westen 'The Three Faces of Double Jeopardy: Reflections of Government Appeals of Criminal Sentences' (1980) 78 Michigan LR 1001; CL Cantrell 'Double Jeopardy and Multiple Punishment: An Historical and Constitutional Analysis' (1983) 24 Southern Texas LJ 735. The position and general principles are well summarized in United States v Di Francesco 449 US 117 (1980)(The rule is that appeals on law or reviews on sentencing are prohibited if there is a threat that the procedure would in substance amount to a successive prosecution, or if the person concerned has an 'expectation of finality' in the outcome of the first trial. Explicit enabling statutes generally negate such expectations.)

of the Court's finding that the new unilateral right of the Attorney-General to appeal against sentence was constitutional was contained in the assertion that proper administrative action and a fair trial would include the imposition of a proper sentence and its reconsideration on appeal.[1] In Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape v D[2] the Court was confronted with double jeopardy jurisprudence, in the shape of Benton v Maryland,[3] in a challenge to the constitutionality of s 310A of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. Nothing was said of the ne bis in idem provision, but the Court's reasoning did address its concerns, even though the finding was in the end based on a general sense of fairness.[4] The Court apparently endorsed the force of the folowing dictum from Benton:

> [T]he State with all its resources and power should not be allowed to make repeated attempts to convict an individual for an alleged offence thereby subjecting him to embarrassment, expense and ordeal and compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity as well as enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty.[5]

The Court proceeded to draw a conceptual distinction between a conviction and a sentence,[6] but left the distinction unelaborated,[7] answering the submission that the possibility of an increased sentence entailed similar anxiety and uncertainty with the finding that the appeal provision was saved from constitutional objection by its stipulation that the appeal be brought within 30 days.[8] Can the Court's distinction be read as implying the unconstitutionality of the state's power to appeal against conviction, even on the law? Not if the following dictum is taken seriously:

> An appeal is not a re-trial or a trial de novo. It merely obliges the court to make a decision on a record of the evidence placed before the court a quo. As such it is an extension or continuation of the lis between the state on the one hand and the accused person on the other.[9]

It may be observed that this reasoning has an absolute ring to it: there is nothing in it that would distinguish a continuation of the 'factual' lis from a continuation of the 'legal' lis.

[1] 1996 (1) SACR 89, 93 (T).
[2] 1997 (1) SACR 473 (E), 1997 (7) BCLR 918 (E)('D').
[3] 395 US 784 (1969)('Benton').
[4] D (supra) at 476-77.
[5] Ibid at 476.
[6] Ibid.
[7] The court apparently endorsed the finding in Van den Berg as applicable to a 'similar statutory provision', although the court recognized the fact that the Namibian provision upheld in that case allowed state appeals generally (including appeals on the facts). D (supra) at 476. This endorsement should not be taken as authority for the proposition that a similarly far-reaching provision would be constitutional in South Africa.
[8] Benton (supra) at 476.
[9] Ibid at 475.

(o) The right to appeal or review

Aspects of the right to appeal or review have surfaced in the domain of ne bis in idem.[1] The most important question to answer concerning this right is the degree to which it guarantees an appeal without subjecting such appeal to conditions, such as obtaining leave. In this respect it is important to point out that the wording of FC s 35(3)(o) differs from that of IC s 25(3)(h). Whereas the former speaks of a 'right of appeal to, or review by, a higher court', the latter refers to 'recourse by way of appeal or review to a higher court'. This difference is significant because the decision in S v Rens, which found that limitations on the right to appeal were authorized under the Interim Constitution, turned on the use of the word 'recourse' in IC s 25(3)(h).[2] The following dictum in S v Bhengu[3] endorsed by the court in Rens[4] is evidently crucial:

> If that had been the intention (to create an absolute right of appeal) I should have expected the words 'to have recourse by way' to have been omitted from the provision of [IC] s 25(3)(h).

There can be no stronger argument for the interpretation of FC s 35(3)(o) as having entrenched such an absolute right of appeal than this passage.[5]

The objection in Rens was to the requirement in s 316(1)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 for leave to appeal a decision of a superior court.[6] Apart from equality considerations, the Court's reasoning was not confined to the significance of the word 'recourse'. The Court observed that s 316(1)(b) gave the convicted person 'two bites of the cherry', since a refusal of leave by the trial court allowed the person concerned to seek leave from the Chief Justice, who was required to refer the matter to two members of the Appellate Division. Similarly, the convicted accused had the [1] See § 51.5*(n)* supra. The idea is that the spectre of an increase in sentence on appeal may have a 'chilling effect' on the right to appeal.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC)('Rens') at paras 21-22.

[3] 1995 (3) BCLR 394, 397-8 (D)('Bhengu').

[4] Rens (supra) at para 22.

[5] But see S v Msenti 1998 (3) BCLR 343, 347 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 401 (W)(Snyders J held that the textual argument in Rens was 'superficial and of no persuasive value' when applied to the alteration of the text in FC s 35(3)(o).) The circumvention of the textual dicta in Rens cannot be supported and may set an unfortunately cavalier precedent as far as the wording of specific rights is concerned. See § 51.5*(b)* supra.

[6] The complaint was focused on the fact that such leave was not a requirement in the case of an appeal from lower courts, leaving those appealing from superior courts in a disadvantaged position. The equality question was clearly separated from the merits of the obstacles to appeal as far as IC s 25(3)(h) was concerned, as was the case also in S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC). In Ntuli the Court found a sufficiently relevant differentiation (between unrepresented prisoners and others) for a violation of the equality clause, whereas in Rens the differentiation in question related to different stages of proceedings rather than to relevantly different groups. This question can safely be set aside for the purposes of the analysis. For the constitutional principles of equality, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 35.

opportunity to petition the refusal of leave to two Appellate Division judges on points of law and procedural irregularities. Argument in writing in the petition was provided for. The Court therefore intimated that such a procedure amounted to 'recourse' (or 'resort') to a higher court, and it is but a small step away from reasoning that such a procedure amounts to 'appeal' to a higher court.[1] Finally, the Court's argument that 'it [could] not be in the interests of justice and fairness to allow unmeritorious and vexatious issues of procedure, law or fact to be placed before three judges of the appellate tribunal sitting in open court to rehear oral argument' as 'the rolls would be clogged by hopeless cases'[2] must be seen as applying whether the right is expressed as one of 'recourse' or of 'appeal'.[3]

The small step referred to above suffered a setback in S v Ntuli[4] in so far as the requirement of a judge's certificate for appeals by unrepresented prisoners is concerned.[5] Didcott J directly addressed the question whether the very application for a judge's certificate, irrespective of its result, constituted 'recourse by way of appeal or review to a higher court'. No, was the answer. The minimum implied by the 'recourse' requirement was 'the opportunity for an adequate reappraisal of every case and an informed decision on it'. Since the statute made no provision for such opportunity, and did not ensure that a certificate would not be refused without it, the application itself could not be the requisite 'recourse'.[6] It should be clear a fortiori that an application on a horizontal level cannot amount to an 'appeal' as guaranteed by FC s 35(3)(o). Whether 'vertical' leave would amount to an 'appeal', as opposed to 'recourse by way of appeal', will depend on whether the Rens Court's reasoning about clogging the rolls with hopeless cases prevails over its reasoning based on the significance of the use of the word 'recourse' instead of an unqualified right of appeal.

[1] The Court's reference to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights under art 2 of Protocol 7 (Monnell and Morris v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 205 (cited in para 24) and Axen v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 195; Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272 (cited in para 24n)) may be regarded as endorsing the notion accepted by the European Court that leave to appeal itself amounted to the 'appeal' guaranteed by the article. Of this notion Robertson and Merrills observe that '[t]his is, however, a very limited interpretation of the concept of review and must be regarded as questionable'. AH Robertson & JG Merrills Human Rights in Europe: A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1993) 248 n95. Crucial in this respect is the margin of appreciation required in this context to allow for greatly varying review and appeal procedures by the contracting states. There is no reason for our courts to be equally deferential to established procedures.

[2] Rens (supra) at para 25.

[3] The refusal in S v Msenti to attach any significance to the textual alteration was naturally accompanied by emphasis on these latter considerations in Rens. 1998 (3) BCLR 343, 345–346 (W), 1998 (1) SACR 401 (W). With respect, rather than holding that the alteration in the wording of a specific right could not make any difference to the relationship between that right and 'substantive fairness', it would have been preferable for the Court to have given some effect to the textual reasoning in Rens and to the apparent expression of a deliberate intention by the framers of FC s 35(3)(o), and then to have rendered the clogging considerations decisive by way of FC s 36(1) limitation analysis.

[4] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC).

[5] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 309(4)(a) and s 305.

[6] Bhengu (supra) at para 17.

S v Thobakgale & Others[1] raised the difficult problem of time constraints on the right to appeal. Flemming DJP held that the necessity to show cause for condonation of the late filing of an appeal did not violate the right to appeal.[2]

In S v Kgampe & Others[3] Cameron J expressed reservations about the finding in Thobakgale that prisoners who apply for condonation for the late filing of notices of appeal should have their prospects of success assessed upon the lower court's judgment only, as was the case with applications for condonation from those on bail pending appeal. Cameron J was of the opinion that the reasoning in Ntuli that required a proper reappraisal of an appellant's case would be violated if the usually inept and uninformed applications from inside prison were to be assessed only on the magistrate's judgment, and not on what might lie hidden in the record. The whole record was to be produced for prospects of success to be assessed for the purposes of condonation.[4] Cameron J did not deal with the issue of a time limit on the right to appeal in Kgampe.[5]

In S v Pennington & Another[6] the Constitutional Court remarked obiter that

[1] 1998 (1) SACR 703 (W)('Thobaglale').

[2] Ibid at 710B-C. Flemming DJP seemed to be of the opinion that such limitation upon the right as was entailed by time limits was justifiable (presumably under the limitations clause) and that time limits could not, in principle, be said to violate the right in any event. He reasoned:

> I believe that the normal approach to condonation does not without adequate justification impose a limitation on or a detraction from the 'right' to appeal. Should I be wrong on that score, a reason why the Ntuli decision does not apply is relevant. Time limits do not fall beyond permissibility of the Constitution. When a party wishes to appeal after expiry of the limited time, he no longer has a 'right' to appeal, the Court is dealing with the resuscitating of a right which perished.

With respect, the mere existence of time limits certainly does not necessarily violate the right to appeal. But a time limit is a limit as much as any other. It 'detracts' from the right so limited, unless the very concept of the right implies some sort of period for its exercise which, it is conceded, may arguably be the case as far as appeals go. If the time limit effectively renders the right nugatory, or sufficiently severely 'detracts' from it, one has reached a point of violation requiring justification under the limitations clause. Where this point is, is a question of nicety and judgment. See, for example Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC)(The six-month prescription period for claims against the Defence Force violated the right of access to courts (FC s 34).) The point of the violation requiring justification under s 36(1) will be reached more quickly under FC s 35(3)(o) than under IC s 25(3)(h), given the broader formulation of the right in FC s 35(3)(o).

[3] 1998 (2) SACR 617 (W)('Kgampe').

[4] In some of the cases at issue in Kgampe the discovery of multiple irregularities in the record after Cameron J's order to produce the whole record led to confirmation of his view of the necessity for such full disclosure. See S v Malatji & Another 1998 (2) SACR 622 (W). In Uitenhage Transitional Local Council v South African Revenue Service, Heher JA emphasized the fact that condonation was not a right but a concession granted at the Court's discretion. 2003 (4) All SA 37 (SCA). An application for condonation had to provide a full, detailed and accurate account of the causes of the delay and their effects to enable the Court to understand clearly the reasons and to assess the responsibility. Ibid at para 7. See also Mahlangu v S 2004 (2) All SA 652 (NC) at para 3.

[5] But he did condone a 14-month interval between conviction and filing of the application on the basis of the 'context of imprisonment and the disabilities which that necessarily [brought] about', accepting in the circumstances 'the usual' excuse of ignorance of entitlements and requirements. Kgampe (supra) at 621B).

[6] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC)('Pennington').

FC s 34 did not apply to appeals in criminal cases, and that, since no provision was made in FC s 35(3)(o) for public appeals in person, there was no right to have an appeal heard 'in public', nor to be present when the appeal was heard, and that, although it was settled practice for appeals to be heard in public, there was no constitutional bar to considering applications for leave to appeal in chambers.[1] It may be observed that an interpretation of FC s 35(3)(o) as not providing for appeals to be heard in public nor for the presence of the accused during appeals begs the question whether the right to a fair trial extends to the final determination of the appeal, alternatively whether the specific right to be tried before an ordinary court, and to be present when being tried, extends to appellate stages.[2] It would be odd if the Constitution scrupulously provided for safeguards against secret trials, but had nothing to say about the question whether the decisions reached in these trials could be overturned on appeal in circumstances that would not be countenanced for the first, provisional, determination of the matter.

In S v S[3] the right to appeal or review filled a judicially created gap in the law relating to a convicted prisoner's entitlement to have a sentence reviewed. Courts had interpreted the entitlement to appeal against a sentence 'resulting' from a conviction not to include an entitlement to appeal against an order putting into operation a suspended sentence.[4] With similar parsimony, the Natal Provincial Division[5] had interpreted the provision allowing special review in cases not subject to ordinary review[6] not to include a review of such an order, because such a review would not be a review of the proceedings 'in which a magistrate's court [had] imposed a sentence'.[7] The result was that an order putting a suspended sentence into operation was subject neither to review nor to appeal. In the same vein, the Court in Phillips & Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions[8] had to decide whether a restraint order was appealable or not. The respondent had successfully obtained a restraint order, in terms of the Prevention of Organized Crime Act 121 of 1998, in respect of the first appellant's realizable property. The respondent argued that a restraint order was not appealable since it was not variable or rescindable by the Court that made the order. An appeal was aimed only at decisions that were final and definite and, so the argument went, restraint orders did not finally dispose of any issue. The Court, per Howie P, held that judicial decisions of a High Court had to be 'a judgment or order' for it to be appealable.[9] A judgment or order was, according to the Court, (a) final in effect,

[1] Pennington (supra) at paras 45-51.

[2] See §§ 51.5*(e)* and (g) supra. For more comment on Pennington, see § 51.1*(a)(v)* supra. On the related but not necessarily similarly fated question whether the right to have one's trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay should be confined to pre-appeal stages of the lis between state and individual. see § 51.5*(f)* supra.

[3] 1999 (1) SACR 608 (W)('S').

[4] Ibid at 611E-H.

[5] Gasa v Regional Magistrate for the Regional Division of Natal 1979 (4) SA 729 (N).

[6] Section 304(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[7] S (supra) at 612C.

[8] 2003 (4) All SA 16 (SCA)('Phillips').

[9] Ibid at para 18.

(b) definitive of rights of the parties and (c) dispositive.[1] A decision meeting any of the above would be appealable. A restraint order could not be changed and this unalterable situation made restraint orders appealable.

S v S illustrated, with facts suggesting one of the most bizarre moments of curial injustice ever reported, precisely why such a position did not 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights', as required by FC s 39(2). Nugent and Schwartzman JJ set out the following general principle, to govern the meaning of the right in question:[2]

> In our view it would be a parsimonious construction of the Bill of Rights which confined [the right to appeal or review] only to the immediate consequences of the trial itself. In our view the clear spirit, purport and object of that section is to ensure that no person is condemned to endure a penalty provided for by the criminal law without recourse being had to another court in order to correct any irregularity or injustice which might have occurred in the course of the proceedings which have had that result.

And in S v Lukhandile Ntsebenza AJ offered the following sober reminder:

> Incidentally, not so long ago, opinions and comments were solicited from the Judges, amongst others, about their views on the wisdom of the continued existence of the right to automatic review.[3] This is in view of proposed amendments in the Superior Courts Bill that might do away with this right of the accused. When magistrates deal with the rights of the accused in the way this presiding officer did and give 'reasons' such as he did it becomes clear that some safeguards, in the interests of the proper administration of justice, need to be built into the system to ensure that some monitoring of the process in the lower courts takes place.[4]

In S v Steyn[5] the Court (per Madlanga AJ) considered the constitutionality of ss 309B and 309C[6] of the Criminal Procedure Act with reference to the right to appeal to, or review by, a higher court in terms of FC s 35(3)(o). For an appeal procedure to serve its desired purpose, the Court held that the procedure had to be suited to the correction of error.[7] The unsatisfactory features[8] of the

[1] Phillips (supra).

[2] S (supra) at 612H.

[3] Of an unrepresented accused convicted of an offence carrying a threshold sentence by a magistrate with less than a prescribed number of years experience s 302 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[4] 1999 (1) SACR 568, 569B-D (C).

[5] 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) SA 52 (CC)('Steyn').

[6] Section 309B provides for the application procedure for leave to appeal whereas s 309C stipulates petition procedure where an application referred to in s 309B is refused.

[7] Steyn (supra) at para 23.

[8] The Court held that the paucity of information, which in terms of s 309C(3) must be lodged with the High Court, failed to allow for an adequate reappraisal. Ibid at para 10. This situation was also not much improved by the provisions of s 309C(5), which allowed a presiding officer considering a petition to call for further information. The language of these provisions was permissive and, as a result, some judges might insist on the production of the record while some might not. The court then referred to the following dictum in S v Ntuli:

> No uniform practice prevails there. Some Judges obtain the record habitually, once the case is not the sort where the information already available satisfies them that a certificate should be granted straight away. Others do so rarely, being content by and large to rely rather on the magistrate's account of the procedure made it unsuitable for the purpose envisaged in the Constitution, in that the procedure did not accord with an adequate reappraisal and the making of an informed decision. The procedure accordingly constituted an unjustified limitation of the right of appeal to, or review by, a higher court, as entrenched in FC s 35(3)(o). Sections 309B and 309C were declared inconsistent with the Constitution and accordingly invalid, but the declaration of invalidity was suspended for six months from the date of the order.[1] In S v Danster; S v Nqido[2] the Court (per Davis J) confirmed that this period had come to an end. Sections 309B and 309C are thus no longer valid, and an appellant has the right to appeal in terms of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act read without the invalid provisions. Appeals launched but not completed by 28 May 2001 (six months from the date of the declaration of invalidity in S v Steyn) stand to be governed by s 309(1) and (2) of the Criminal Procedure Act.[3] trial. The refusal of a certificate on that footing worries one. Those Judges who do not read the record will have no means of knowing whether the evidence substantiated the findings made by the magistrate on the credibility of witnesses and other factual issues. They will not learn of any procedural irregularities that may have marred the trial. Nothing dispels their ignorance on those scores. Nothing alerts them to flaws in the magistrate's findings or conduct of the proceedings which are hidden for the time being but the record may in due course reveal. No petition prepared by counsel is there to guide them in that direction. Nor is the possible presence of such defects likely to have been mentioned either by the prisoner or even by the magistrate, the one oblivious to the true character of the features in question, the other failing to attribute any such character to them.

S v Ntuli (supra) at para 15.

[1] Steyn (supra) at para 53.

[2] 2002 (4) SA 749 (C) ('Nqindo').

[3] Ibid at 755. See S v Jaars; S v Williams; S v Jantjies 2002 (1) SACR 546 (C)(The accused had been convicted and sentenced in the magistrate's court before 29 May 2001 — six months from the date of the declaration of invalidity in Steyn. In none of the cases had leave to appeal, as prescribed by ss 309B and 309C, been considered by the magistrate's court. The Court held that the decision by the Constitutional Court in Steyn did not have retroactive effect and that the provisions of ss 309B and 309C were therefore still applicable to their appeals. The applicants thus ought to have obtained leave to appeal from the respective magistrates. See S v Jafta; S v Ndondo; S v Mcontana 2004 (2) SACR 103 (E)(The appellants were also convicted at a time when ss 309B and 309C had required them to appeal to the High Court, either from the trial court or upon petition to the Judge President. Subsequently, the appellants sought to have their appeals heard without having obtained leave to appeal from the trial courts. The Court was called upon to decide in limine whether the appeals were properly before the Court. The Court, per Leach J, held that they were not, since the appellants had been convicted and sentenced prior to the date upon which the declaration of invalidity came into effect and failed to obtain leave to appeal.)

52 Evidence

PJ Schwikkard

52.1 Function and constitutionality 52–1
52.2 The right to a fair trial 52–2
(a) Criminal proceedings 52–2
(b) Other proceedings 52–3
(c) Arrested, detained and accused persons 52–7
52.3 A fair public hearing 52–9
52.4 The presumption of innocence and related rights 52–9
(a) The presumption of innocence 52–10
(i) Content and rationale 52–10
(ii) The scope of the presumption of innocence . . . 52–12
(iii) Reverse onus provisions 52–13
(b) Right to remain silent; right not to testify during proceedings; and right not to give self-incriminating evidence 52–16
(i) Content and rationale 52–16
(ii) Negative inferences from silence 52–17
(iii) Discharge at the close of the state case 52–25
(c) The right not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence; the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence; and the right to legal representation 52–28
(i) The right to legal representation and privilege against self-incrimination 52–28
(ii) Admissions and confessions 52–31
(iii) Ascertainment of bodily features 52–33
52.5 Right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence 52–36
52.6 Right to adduce and challenge evidence 52–41
(a) Cross-examination 52–41
(i) Hearsay 52–42
(ii) Cross-examination of the child witness 52–45
(iii) The hostile witness 52–49
(b) Record of bail application 52–49
(c) State privilege 52–51
(d) Informer's privilege 52–52

	(e) Interpretation	52–53
52.7	Equality and dignity	52–55
	(a) Cautionary rule: Complainants in sexual offence cases	52–55
	(b) Children	52–56
	(c) Previous consistent statements	52–60
	(d) Character of the complainant in sexual offence cases	52–61
52.8	Rule 31 of the Constitutional Court Rules	52–64
52.9	Privacy and privilege	52–68
	(a) Professions	52–68
	(b) Spouses	52–69
	(c) Parents and children	52–70
52.10	Unconstitutionally obtained evidence	52–71
	(a) Scope of discretion and rationale	52–71
	(b) When will the admission of evidence render a trial unfair?	52–73
	(c) When will the admission of evidence be otherwise detrimental to the administration of justice?	52–76
	(d) Entrapment	52–78
	(e) Trial-within-a-trial	52–79
	(f) Civil proceedings	52–80
	(g) Burden of proof and burden of justification	52–81
52.11	Limitations analysis	52–84

52.1 Function and constitutionality

The law of evidence serves many functions. The rationalist tradition recognises the promotion of accuracy in decision-making as its primary function.[1] Evidence rules are also shaped by 'non-rationalist values such as the acceptability of verdicts and the need for efficient resolution of disputes'.[2] Legitimacy constitutes a third important function.[3] It requires rules that are not only directed at maximising factual accuracy but also at giving 'moral and expressive authority'[4] to verdicts.[5] Evidence rules accomplish this end by both excluding inherently unreliable evidence and excluding reliable evidence 'if it carries significant risks of impairing the moral authority of the verdict'.[6] Ashworth and Redmayne suggest that 'legitimacy' amounts to no more than 'accuracy and respect for rights'.[7] In our legal order, the moral authority or the legitimacy of evidentiary rules require that they be consistent with an express set of constitutional rights and values. The rights component of 'legitimacy' forms the focus of this chapter.[8]

The appropriate contextual reference points for determining the legitimacy of legal verdicts will inevitably vary between procedural regimes. For example, the requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt in a criminal trial is a direct product of the presumption of innocence; the absence of the presumption of innocence from civil procedure legitimates a standard of proof expressed as a balance of probabilities. Because the criminal trial is a concrete expression of state power, constitutional issues are far more prominent in criminal proceedings than they are in civil proceedings.

The principle of constitutional supremacy has affected South Africa's law of evidence in a number of ways. A host of common law rights have now been

[1] See ML Siegel 'A Pragmatic Critique of Modern Evidence Scholarship' (1994) 88 Northwestern University LR 995, 996. On the rationalist tradition generally, see W Twining Rethinking Evidence, Exploratory Essays (1990). See also CR Nesson 'The Evidence of the Event? On Judicial Proof and the Acceptability of Verdicts' (1985) 98 Harvard Law Review 1357.

[2] JD Jackson 'Modern Trends in Evidence Scholarship: Is All Rosy in the Garden? 2003 (21) QLR 893, 899.

[3] IH Dennis 'Rectitude Rights and Legitimacy: Reassessing and Reforming the Privilege Against Self-incrimination in English Law' (1997) 31 Israel Law Review 24, 36.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ashworth and Redmayne are sceptical of 'the legitimacy-based account of the criminal trial' and prefer to ground their own theory in retributive justice. A Ashworth & M Redmayne The Criminal Process (3rd Edition, 2005) 25. Despite these plausible reservations, I find Dennis' functional account, which emphasises legitimacy, extremely useful in so far as it is restricted to the law of evidence.

[6] Dennis 'Rectitude' (supra). Both inquisitorial and adversarial procedural models exclude reliable evidence on grounds of public policy. See C Bradley 'The Emerging International Consensus as to Criminal Procedure Rules' (1993) 14 Michigan Journal of International Law 171 (Gives examples of the exclusion of evidence in German courts on the basis of privacy and personality rights.) See also M Damaska 'Evidentiary Barriers to Conviction and Two Modes of Criminal Procedure: A Comparative Study' (1973) 121 University of Pennsylvania LR 500.

[7] Ashworth & Redmayne (supra) at 25.

[8] Although not appropriate for consideration in this chapter, it should be noted that it is not entirely clear whether the promotion of legitimacy can also explain those evidence rules based on the utilitarian function of avoiding undue delay and expense. In order to bring these utilitarian considerations under the legitimacy umbrella it might be necessary to extend the components of legitimacy to include the broader, redistributive demands of social justice.

accorded constitutional recognition: the right to adduce and challenge evidence, the right not to incriminate oneself, and the rights to remain silent and to be presumed innocent. Consequently, any departure from these rights requires justification; the absence of sufficient justification may have a direct impact on admissibility. These fair trial rights, located in FC s 35(3), have altered the shape of rules regulating state privilege, various presumptions and the admissibility of admissions and confessions. The rights to equality, dignity and privacy have also changed the contours of a diverse range of evidence rules. However, FC s 35(5) — which provides for the exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of any right in the Bill of Rights where admission would render the trial unfair or be detrimental to the administration of justice — is the most significant.

52.2 The right to a fair trial

(a) Criminal proceedings

The right to a fair trial was a rather sterile concept prior to 1994. Its character is probably best captured by the following, oft quoted, extract from S v Rudman; S v Mthwana:

> [A court of appeal] does not enquire whether the trial was fair in accordance with 'notions of fairness and justice', or with 'the ideas underlying … the concept of justice which are the basis of all civilised systems of criminal administration'. The enquiry is whether there has been an irregularity or illegality that is a departure from the formalities, rules and principles of procedure according to which our law requires a criminal trial to be initiated and conducted… . What an accused person is entitled to is a trial initiated and conducted in accordance with those formalities, rules and principles of procedure which the law requires. He is not entitled to a trial which is fair when tested against abstract notions of fairness and justice.[1]

In its very first judgment, S v Zuma, the Constitutional Court resoundingly rejected this formalistic approach. It held that the constitutional right to a fair trial embraced 'a concept of substantive fairness' that 'required criminal trials to be conducted in accordance with just those 'notions of basic fairness and justice'.[2] The Zuma Court also held that the right to a fair trial was not restricted to those rights now found in FC s 35(3).[3] That the content of the right to a fair trial extends beyond those rights enumerated in FC s 35(3) and embraces procedural and substantive concerns located elsewhere in the Bill of Rights was first articulated by Justice Ackermann in S v Dzukuda; S v Tshilo:

> [A]n accused's right to a fair trial under s 35(3) of the Constitution is a comprehensive right and 'embraces a concept of substantive fairness which is not to be equated with what might have passed muster in our criminal courts before the Constitution came into force'. Elements of this comprehensive right are specified in paras (a) to (o) of ss (3). The words 'which include the right' preceding this listing indicate that such specification is not exhaustive of what the right to a fair trial comprises. It also does not warrant the conclusion that the right to a fair trial consists merely of a number of discrete sub-rights, some of which have been specified in the subsection and others not. The right to a fair trial is a comprehensive and integrated right, the content of which will be established, on a case by case basis, as our constitutional jurisprudence on s 35(3) develops. It is preferable, in my view, in order to give proper recognition to the comprehensive and integrated nature of the right to a fair trial, to refer to specified and unspecified elements of the right to a fair trial, the specified elements being those detailed in ss (3)… It would be imprudent, even if it were possible, in a particular case concerning the right to a fair trial, to attempt a comprehensive exposition thereof. In what follows, no more is intended to be said about this particular right than is necessary to decide the case at hand. At the heart of the right to a fair criminal trial and what infuses its purpose, is for justice to be done and also to be seen to be done. But the concept of justice itself is a broad and protean concept. In considering what, for purposes of this case, lies at the heart of a fair trial in the field of criminal justice, one should bear in mind that dignity, freedom and equality are the foundational values of our Constitution. An important aim of the right to a fair criminal trial is to ensure adequately that innocent people are not wrongly convicted, because of the adverse effects which a wrong conviction has on the liberty, and dignity (and possibly other) interests of the accused. There are, however, other elements of the right to a fair trial such as, for example, the presumption of innocence, the right to free legal representation in given circumstances, a trial in public which is not unreasonably delayed, which cannot be explained exclusively on the basis of averting a wrong conviction, but which arise primarily from considerations of dignity and equality.[1]

[1] 1992 (1) SACR 70, 100 and 109 (A).

[2] 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), [1995] ZACC 1 ('Zuma') at para 16.

[3] See, for example, S v Msithing 2006 (1) SACR 266 (N); S v Khumalo 2006 (1) SACR 447 (N); S v Muller 2005 (2) SACR 451 (C).

(b) Other proceedings

The right to a fair trial applies only to accused persons.[2] The FC s 35(3) right does not extend to civil trials, nor does it apply to interrogation procedures outside of the criminal process.[3]

Several statutory enactments provide for interrogation procedures that are not directed at a finding of guilt. Many of these schemes authorise designated officials to compel persons to appear before them and to answer questions, whether

[1] S v Dzukuda; S v Tshilo 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 443 (CC), [2000] ZACC 16 at paras 9 and 11. See also Zuma (supra) at para 16; S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC), [1995] ZACC 14; Key v Attorney-General Cape Provincial Division 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 113 (CC), [1996] ZACC 25; Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC), 1998 (1) SACR 227 (CC), [1997] ZACC 18 at para 22; S v Jaipal 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2005 (1) SACR 215 (CC).

[2] Omar v Government Republic of South Africa 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC), 2006 (1) SACR 359 (CC), [2005] ZACC 17, at para 51; Sibiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Johannesburg 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC), 2006 (1) SACR 220 (CC), [2005] ZACC 6 at para 31.

[3] See Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC), [1996] ZACC 6 at para 11 (Court held that the application of s 25(3) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') was restricted to criminal proceedings.) See also Ferreira v Levin and Vryenhoek v Powell NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1993] ZACC 13 ('Ferreira v Levin') at para 41; Bernstein v Bester 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC), [1996] ZACC 2 ('Bernstein'); Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC), [1997] ZACC 5; Key (supra); National Director of Public Prosecutions v Rebuzzi 2002 (2) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (1) SACR 128 (SCA); Parbhoo v Getz 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC); De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC), [1998] ZACC 6; Mitchell and Another v Hodes & Others NNO 2003 (1) SACR 524 (C)('Mitchell v Hodes'); Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2005 (1) SACR 238 (C).

incriminating or not.[1] As the subject of the examination is not an accused person, she cannot claim fair trial rights. However, if an examinee is subsequently charged, and the prosecution seeks to use evidence obtained at such an interrogation in a subsequent trial, then the protections afforded by FC s 35(3) will apply. Even where an examinee has been arrested and charged prior to an examination which occurs independently of the criminal trial, they can only claim FC s 35(3) rights if evidence from the examination is sought to be introduced at the trial.[2] However, where the purpose of the examination relates specifically to the offence charged, the accused may not be summoned for interrogation.[3] If the evidence elicited at an examination is found to have been obtained in contravention of the privilege against self-incrimination, then it may be excluded in terms of FC s 35(5) at a subsequent trial.[4] Thus, the right to a fair trial is protected by use of immunity in respect of evidence arising out of the 'non-trial' interrogation. However, the subsequent use of derivative evidence is less clear cut and its admissibility falls to be determined in terms of a competent court's FC s 35(5) discretion to exclude evidence.[5] This discretion does not mean that an examinee is deprived of the right to procedural fairness prior to becoming an accused.[6] An examinee will still be subject to the residual procedural safeguards to be found in the FC s 12(1) right to freedom and security of person.[7] In addition, a person detained for non-trial purposes — say, for deportation — may nevertheless rely on the FC s 35(2) rights of detainees.[8]

[1] For example, s 65 of the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936; ss 415 and 417 of the Companies Act 61 of 1973; s 66(1) of the Close Corporations Act 69 of 1984, ss 3, 4, 6, 8 and 9 of the Inspection of Financial Institutions Act 38 of 1984; ss 7, 9 and 17 of the Maintenance and Promotion of Competition Act 96 of 197; ss 5(7) and 14 of the Harmful Business Practices Act 71 of 1988; s 6 of the Banks Act 94 of 1990; s 51 of the National Ports Act 12 of 2005.

[2] Mitchell and Another v Hodes and Others NNO 2003 (1) SACR 524 (C). See also Equisec (Pty) Ltd v Rodrigues and Another 1999 (3) SA 113 (W).

[3] See Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2004 (1) SACR 105 (CC), [2003] ZACC 24 at para 19. (The Constitutional Court held that the reference to 'any person' in s 28*(b)* of the National Prosecuting Authorities Act, which permits the Investigating Director to summons any person who is believed to be able to furnish any information in respect of the commission of a specified offence, did not include an accused who is being tried on charges covered by the s 28 summons.) Cf Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2005 (4) SA 543 (C), 2005 (4) BCLR 388 (C).

[4] See Mohamed NO and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another 2003 (1) SACR 286 (W). For a fuller discussion of investigative inquiries, see DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 527; PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) §10.2.4. and PJ Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (1999) 65–75.

[5] See Key (supra); Bernstein (supra); Ferreira v Levin (supra); National Director of Public Prosecution v Mohamed 2003 (2) SACR 258 (C); S v Basson 2007 (3) SA 582 (CC), 2005 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC), 2007 (1) SACR 566 (CC), [2005] ZACC 10.

[6] Nel v Le Roux NO 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC), [1996] ZACC 6 ('Nel') at para 11. See also Bernstein (supra); Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC), 2003 (1) SACR 404 (CC), [2002] ZACC 29.

[7] See, generally, M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40. See also Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC), [1995] ZACC 7 at para 43.

[8] Lawyers for Human Rights and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891 (T).

The Constitutional Court in Nel v Le Roux[1] considered the extent to which the right to a fair trial applies only to accused persons when it engaged with the constitutionality of s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act ('CPA').[2] In terms of this section, a judge or magistrate, upon receiving a request from a Director of Public Prosecutions ('DPP') or public prosecutor, may request a person, who is likely to give material or relevant information about an alleged offence, to appear before them for examination by the DPP or public prosecutor. Such an examination may be conducted in private.[3] The applicants challenged CPA s 205 in terms of the following provisions of the Interim Constitution: IC s 8(1) (equality); IC s 11(1) (freedom and security of person); IC s 11(2) (cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment); IC s 13 (privacy); IC s 15(1) (freedom of speech and expression); IC s 23 (access to information); IC s 24 (administrative justice); IC s 25(3) (fair trial); IC s 25(3)(a) (public trial); IC s 25(3)(c) (the right to be presumed innocent and to remain silent) and IC s 25(3)(d) (the privilege against self-incrimination).

The Nel Court found that CPA s 205 was not inconsistent with any of the above provisions. Arguments pertaining to the infringement of IC s 11(2) and IC s 23 were not pursued before the court and were dismissed by Ackermann J as not being worthy of serious consideration.[4] The Nel Court was also not convinced that IC s 24 was applicable to CPA s 205 proceedings and held that, even if it was, its provisions were not infringed by CPA s 205.[5] In relation to the privilege against self-incrimination the Nel court held that '[i]n view of the transactional indemnity and use of immunity provisions in s 204(2) and (4) respectively of the Criminal Procedure Act, the applicant could not validly object to answering self-incrimination questions'.[6] As to the general strength of the applicant's Bill of Rights challenge, the Nel Court wrote:

> If the answer to any question put to an examinee at an examination under s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act would infringe or threaten to infringe any of the examinee's Chapter 3 rights, this would constitute a 'just excuse' for purposes of s 189(1) for refusing to answer the question unless the s 189(1) compulsion to answer the particular question, would in the circumstances, constitute a limitation on such right which is justified under s 33(1) of the Constitution. In determining the applicability of s 33(1), regard must be had not only to the right asserted but also the State's interest in securing information necessary for the prosecution of crimes. … There is nothing in the provisions of s 205 read with s 189 of the Criminal Procedure Act which compels or requires the examinee to answer a question (or for that matter to produce a document) which would unjustifiably infringe or threaten to infringe any of the examinee's Chapter 3 rights.[7]

---

[1] Nel (supra).

[2] Act 51 of 1977.

[3] Sections 162–5, 179–81, 187–9, 191 and 204 are applicable to proceedings held in terms of s 205. Section 205(4) provides that a person who refuses or fails to give information shall not be sentenced to imprisonment as contemplated in s 189 unless the presiding officer is of the opinion that the furnishing of such information is necessary for the administration of justice or the maintenance of law and order.

[4] Nel (supra) at para 24.

[5] Ibid at para 24.

[6] Ibid at para 4.

[7] Ibid at para 7.

The applicant contended that CPA s 205 infringed the IC s 11(1) right not to be detained without trial: the CPA s 205(3) procedure (incorporating the summary incarceration procedure of s 189) did not, he alleged, constitute a 'trial'. This argument was rejected on the grounds that a 'trial' in the context of IC s 11(1) merely required 'the interposition of an impartial entity, independent of the Executive and the Legislature to act as arbiter between the individual and the State'.[1] The Court found a s 205 enquiry met these requirements. The Nel Court also noted that CPA s 205(4) specifies that presiding officers can only sentence a recalcitrant examinee to imprisonment where they are 'of the opinion that the furnishing of such information is necessary for the administration of justice or the maintenance of law and order'. This limitation on the presiding officer's discretion to jail a recalcitrant witness, Ackermann J held, demonstrated that 'the s 205 provisions are as narrowly tailored as possible to meet the legitimate State interest of investigating and prosecuting crime'.[2]

The Nel Court held that the IC s 25(3) right to a fair trial applied only to accused persons and, as a reluctant CPA s 205 examinee could not be said to be an 'accused', it was not necessary to consider IC s 25(3) in determining the constitutionality of CPA s 205.[3] The Court also dismissed the arguments that s 189 summary imprisonment proceedings denied the applicant his right to a public trial and his right 'to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge'. Noting that there are several recognised exceptions to the rule that criminal proceedings should be held in public, the Nel Court found that there might well be 'important and justified policy grounds for holding the CPA s 205 enquiry in private.'[4] Furthermore, as a presiding officer had a discretion whether to hold such an enquiry in public or private, until such a discretion has been exercised the question of whether a constitutional right had been infringed did not arise. Similarly, the question whether the examinee's right 'to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge' had been infringed could not be decided in the abstract as there was no provision prohibiting a presiding officer from properly informing the examinee of the possible consequences of refusing to answer a question.[5] These two observations suggest that while CPA s 205 itself is not unconstitutional, there may well be circumstances in which its application infringes an examinee's Chapter 2 rights.

The application of FC s 35(3) is not only dependent on the claimant of the relevant rights being an accused; the claimant must also be an accused in criminal trial proceedings. Consequently, an accused in bail proceedings is entitled to claim the rights of an arrested and detained person but not fair trial rights.[6] In [1] Nel (supra) at para 14. See also para 20.

[2] Ibid at para 20.
[3] Ibid at para 11. See also S v Mahlangu 2000 (1) SACR 565 (W).
[4] Ibid at paras 17–19.
[5] Ibid at para 19.
[6] See S v Dlamini, S v Dladla, S v Joubert, S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC), [1999] ZACC 8 ('Dlamini') at para 78 (Kriegler J held that the imposition of an onus on an applicant for bail was not constitutionally objectionable as the question of erroneous conviction did not arise.) Bail is discussed more fully below at § 52.6.

S v Dlamini, S v Dladla, S v Joubert, S v Schietekat, Kriegler J drew the following distinction between bail and trial proceedings:

> [T]here is a fundamental difference between the objective of bail proceedings and that of the trial. In a bail application the enquiry is not really concerned with the question of guilt. That is the task of the trial court. The court hearing the bail application is concerned with the question of possible guilt only to the extent that it may bear on where the interests of justice lie in regard to bail. The focus at the bail stage is to decide whether the interests of justice permit the release of the accused pending trial, and that entails in the main protecting the investigation and prosecution of the case against hindrance.[1]

(c) Arrested, detained and accused persons[2]

FC s 35 specifies particular sets of rights in respect of three categories of people. FC s 35(1) applies to arrested persons, FC s 35(2) to detained persons and FC s 35(3) to accused persons. FC s 35(4) applies to arrested, detained and accused persons. However, FC s 35(5) may not be similarly restricted.[3] In order to determine the scope of FC s 35, it is necessary to understand what constitutes an arrested, detained or accused person. Unfortunately, there are no convenient statutory definitions.

In terms of s 39(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act '[a]n arrest shall be effected with or without a warrant and, unless the person to be arrested submits to custody, by actually touching his body or, if the circumstances so require, by forcibly confining his body'. In terms of s 39(3) of the Criminal Procedure Act '[t]he effect of an arrest shall be that the person arrested shall be in lawful custody and that he shall be detained in custody until he is lawfully discharged or released from custody.' FC s 35(1) specifically refers to accused persons arrested for allegedly committing an offence. Given that the language of FC s 35(1) squares with the underlying requirement for a lawful arrest in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act, FC s 35(1) rights will accrue to a person arrested in terms of CPA s 39.[4] An arrested person will also be a detained person: thus the rights specified in FC s 35(2) will also accrue to an arrested person. But a detained person will not always be an arrested person. Since FC s 35(1) only applies to persons 'arrested for allegedly committing an offence' a person who is detained for other purposes will not be an 'arrested person' for the purposes of FC s 35(1). If the definition of arrest or detention is restricted to those who are in some way physically confined, then the suspect who has not been arrested is potentially in a very vulnerable position. As Satchwell J noted in S v Sebejan:

---

[1] Dlamini (supra) at para 11. See also Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (1) SACR 404 (CC), 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC), [2002] ZACC 29 at para 47 (Court held that '[a] person facing extradition is not an accused person for the purposes of the protection afforded by s 35(3) of the Constitution'.)

[2] See, generally, F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51.

[3] For more on FC s 35(5), see § 52.10 infra.

[4] See, generally, E Du Toit et al Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2011) 5-1 — 5-2.

> The crux of the distinction between the arrested person and the suspect is that the latter does not know without equivocation or ambiguity or at all that she is at risk of being charged. The suspect may herself have an inkling that she is mistrusted by the investigating officer; she may even have been told that she is at some risk of being arrested; but the suspect has not been placed on terms. Indeed the suspect may have no qualms or concerns whatsoever and may therefore continue to operate in a state of ignorance — ignorance that she is mistrusted, may be under surveillance, that the investigator is enquiring into her actions and behaviour, that there may be an attempt to develop sufficient evidence against her. In this situation there is no bliss in ignorance. The suspect is in jeopardy of committing some careless or unwise act or uttering some incautious and potentially incriminating words which would subsequently be used against her in a trial.[1]

Sebejan acknowledges that the right to a fair trial does not begin in court but at the inception of the criminal process.[2] In order to protect the accused's fair trial right not to incriminate herself, Satchwell J held (albeit obiter[3]) that a suspect was entitled to the same warning as an arrested person.[4]

However, the High Courts have diverged on this point. In S v Langa, the court held that IC s 25 did not apply to suspects.[5] Pickering J in S v Mthethwa similarly held that the rights of arrested, detained and accused persons set out in FC ss 35(1),(2) and (3) were irrelevant in respect of a suspect.[6] However, the Mthethwa court found that as the statement had been obtained in breach of the Judges Rules[7] and that the admission of the evidence would render the trial unfair and bring the administration of justice into disrepute, the evidence fell to be excluded in terms of the court's common law discretion.

This vexed question of when fair trial rights kick-in might also be answered in terms of the meaning of 'detention'. The concept of 'detention' extends beyond physical incarceration.[8] For example, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that detention occurs not only when persons are deprived of their liberty by physical constraint, but also 'when a police officer or other agent of the state assumes control over the movement of a person by demand or direction which may have

---

[1] S v Sebejan 1997 (1) SACR 626, 636 (W)('Sebejan').

[2] Ibid at 635d. See also S v Mpetha (2) 1983 (1) SA 576 (C); S v Lwane 1966 (2) SA 433 (A); R v Kuzwayo 1949 (3) SA 761 (A); S v Dlamini 1973 (1) SA 144 (A); S v Agnew 1996 (2) SACR 535 (C); S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W). Cf S v Ngwenya 1998 (2) SACR 503 (W)(Leveson J, referring to the Interim Constitution, held that the IC s 25(3) right to a fair trial did not include pre-trial procedures.)

[3] This line of reasoning did not assist the accused in Sebejan. The court found that she had not been a suspect at the time of making the statement in question.

[4] Sebejan (supra) at 636b. See also S v Van der Merwe 1998 (1) SACR 194 (O); S v Orrie 2005 (1) SACR 63 (C)(The court held that a suspect must be made aware of their status as a suspect.)

[5] S v Langa 1998 (1) SACR 21 (T). See also S v Ndhlovu 1997 (12) BCLR 1785 (N). IC s 25 contained substantially similar provisions to those found is FC s 35 and similarly made a distinction between arrested, detained and accused persons.

[6] S v Mthethwa 2004 (1) SACR 449, 453e–f (E).

[7] See also S v Khan 2010 (2) SACR 476 (KZP). Judges Rule 2 provides: 'Questions may be put to a person whom the police have decided to arrest or who is under suspicion where it is possible that the person by his answers may afford information which may tend to establish his innocence. … In such a case a caution should first be administered. Questions, the sole purpose of which is that the answers may afford evidence against the person suspected, should not be put.'

[8] On the meaning of 'detention' in FC s 12, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

significant legal consequence and which prevents or impedes access to counsel'.[1] The Canadian Supreme Court has held that 'the necessary element of compulsion or coercion to constitute a detention may arise from criminal liability for refusal to comply with a demand or direction, or from a reasonable belief that one does not have a choice as to whether or not to comply'.[2] Were the Canadian gloss on detention to be placed on FC s 35, it would appear that suspects who are questioned by the police in their homes will not be 'detained' and will not be entitled to be advised of their right to legal representation — as the police have no power to compel suspects to answer questions.[3] However, if a suspect reasonably believes that she must answer the question then she will be 'detained' and must be advised of her right to legal representation. On this definition of 'detention' the test for reasonable belief would be subjective. (That fact would hardly make the definition of detention unique: the test for undue influence in relation to confessions also contains an element of subjectivity.[4]) The test then would run as follows: a person who is questioned by the police, and who does not know that she is not obliged to answer the questions, and feels compelled to speak, will be detained for purposes of FC s 35.

52.3 A FAIR PUBLIC HEARING[5]

FC s 34 is viewed by some as the civil proceedings equivalent of FC s 35. Section 34 provides that '[e]veryone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum'. The impact of FC s 34 on the admissibility of evidence has been relatively limited. However, it may play a role in restricting the exclusion of evidence when state privilege[6] is claimed and it may assist the court in determining the admissibility of improperly obtained evidence in civil trials.[7]

52.4 THE PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE AND RELATED RIGHTS

The presumption of innocence in FC s 35(3)(h) traditionally provides the ballast for fairness in criminal justice proceedings. Although the presumption of innocence as a constitutional right has a narrowly defined content, its operational efficacy is dependent on a number of associated rights: The right to remain silent at both trial (FC s 35(3)(h)) and pre-trial stages (FC s 35(1)(a)), and the privilege against self-incrimination at trial (FC s 35(3)(j)) and the right not to make a confession or admission at the pre-trial stage (FC s 35(1)(c)). These rights in turn would be, in many instances, illusory if arrested, accused and detained persons did not have

[1] R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613, 642-645; R v Rahn [1985] 1 SCR 659; R v Trask [1985] 1 SCR 655; R v Thomsen [1988] 1 SCR 640. Cf R v Goodwin [1993] 2 NZLR 153.

[2] Thomsen (supra).

[3] R v Esposito (1985) 53 CR (2d) 356.

[4] See PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) at 339.

[5] See, generally, J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[6] See § 52.6 infra.

[7] Ibid.

the right to be advised of the existence of such rights (FC s 35(1)(b), FC s 35(2)(b), FC s 35(3)(f)) and did not have access to legal representation (FC s 35(2)(b) and (c), FC s 35(3)(f) and (g)) to enable them to effectively exercise those rights.

(a) The presumption of innocence

(i) Content and rationale

The presumption of innocence, as a consequence of poetic licence in Woolmington v DPP,[1] is frequently viewed as an ancient principle of English law. It has, as a consequence of our historical relationship with England, been absorbed into South African law as a fundamental legal principle.[2] However, it seems that the presumption of innocence is neither particularly ancient nor English.[3] That said, it has secured a place in a number of modern constitutions. The rationale for its prominence of place is varied. Rationales range from a concern that individual rights need to be protected from the potentially coercive authority of the state to policy concerns directed at maintaining the legitimacy of the criminal-justice system and the normative force of the criminal law. The most persuasive rationale turns on the recognition that the presumption of innocence is necessary to reduce the possibility of erroneous convictions.[4]

The presumption of innocence is most powerfully expressed in terms of the reasonable doubt standard. The reasonable doubt standard demands that the burden of proof rests on the prosecution to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The correlation between the rationale for the presumption of innocence and the reasonable doubt standard is succinctly expressed by Wilson in the following passage:

> Although the reasonable doubt standard is less a precise formula than it is a symbol it satisfies certain imperatives. It offers society assurance that people innocent of crime shall not be convicted; and although it creates an inevitable margin of error, 'our society [has determined] that it is far worse to convict an innocent man than to let a guilty man go free'. Second, the reasonable doubt standard protects the individual against the state's considerable resources and its potentially oppressive power to secure the conviction of the essentially powerless defendant. Perhaps most important, the reasonable doubt standard has captured society's belief in the security of its own standards of criminal justice. '[I]t is critical that the moral force of the criminal law not be diluted by a standard of proof that leaves people in doubt, whether innocent men are being condemned.' It is also important in our free society that 'every individual going about his ordinary affairs have confidence

[1] Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462 (HL) 481.

[2] See PJ Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (1999) 2–7 (Offers a general discussion of the origins and rationale of the presumption of innocence.)

[3] Ibid.

[4] See S v Dlamini, S v Dladla, S v Joubert, S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC), [1999] ZACC 8 at para 78. See C Collier 'The Improper use of Presumptions in Recent Criminal Law Adjudication' (1986) 38 Stanford LR 423, 457.

> that his government cannot adjudge him guilty of a criminal offence without convincing a proper fact finder of his guilt with utmost certainty.[1]

The South African case law shows that the presumption of innocence is used to describe two different phenomena: (1) a rule regulating the standard of proof; and (2) a policy directive that the subject of a criminal investigation must be treated as innocent at all stages of the criminal process irrespective of the probable outcome of the trial.[2]

Potential definitional difficulties arise if we do not distinguish between those rights that cohere with the presumption of innocence and the presumption of innocence itself. Whilst the rationale of rights such as the right to remain silent and the privilege against self-incrimination may be partially attributable to the presumption of innocence, their existence can also be attributed to policy considerations separate from those applicable to the presumption of innocence. Accordingly their application will give rise to considerations which may not arise when considering the extension of the presumption of innocence. The danger of conflating the presumption of innocence and other separately enumerated rights is that those rights become vulnerable to the argument that in situations where the presumption of innocence is not applicable, or where the burden imposed by the presumption of innocence has been discharged, then those rights no longer apply. For example, the Constitutional Court, in S v Manamela, drew a distinction between an infringement of the right to remain silent and the presumption of innocence.[3] The Manamela Court was required to consider whether the reverse onus in s 37 of the General Law Amendment Act infringed the constitutional right to a fair trial, and, in particular, the right to be presumed innocent, the right to remain silent, and the right not to testify during proceedings.[4]

The Manamela Court held that s 37(1) required the prosecution to prove the following beyond a reasonable doubt: (1) that the accused was found in possession of goods, other than stock or produce; (2) that the goods were acquired otherwise than at a public sale; and (3) that the goods had been stolen. Once the prosecution had discharged this burden the accused must establish on a balance of probabilities that: (1) he or she believed, at the time of acquiring the goods, that the person from whom he or she received them was the owner of the goods or was duly authorised by the owner to dispose of them; and (2) his or her belief was reasonable. Section 37(1) effectively creates statutory liability for the negligent acquisition or receipt of stolen goods. The Manamela Court held that s 37(1) was a justifiable infringement of the right to remain silent but an unjustifiable infringement of the presumption of innocence. It held that the reverse onus justifiably infringed the right to silence because the accused had to establish that they had reasonable

[1] V Wilson 'Shifting Burden in Criminal Law: A Burden on Due Process' (1981) 8 Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 731, 732-3. See also LJ Harris 'Constitutional Limits on Criminal Presumptions as an Expression of Changing Concepts of Fundamental Fairness' (1986) 7 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 308, 310; D Dripps 'The Constitutional Status of the Reasonable Doubt Rule' (1987) 75 California LR 1665, 1670.

[2] See Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (supra) at 35–36.

[3] S v Manamela 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), [2000] ZACC 5.

[4] Act 62 of 1955.

grounds for believing that the seller of the goods was authorised to sell the goods or was the owner of the goods, even where the prosecution had led no evidence regarding the reasonableness of that belief. A failure to adduce evidence of the reasonableness of that belief leads to a reasonable inference that the accused knew of the purloined nature of the goods. However, the presumption of innocence was unjustifiably infringed because s 37 'imposed a full legal burden of proof on the accused'.[1] Similarly, in S v Singo, the Constitutional Court indicated that the presumption of innocence as a constitutional right is restricted to the requirement that guilt be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.[2] Although this burden is a partial product of the right to remain silent, the right to remain silent appears to be a far more malleable right.

(ii) The scope of the presumption of innocence

The Constitutional Court has had ample opportunity to reiterate that the right to be presumed innocent requires the prosecution to prove the guilt of an accused person beyond reasonable doubt.[3] The presumption of innocence applies to those elements of the state's case that must be established in order to justify punishment.[4] The presumption of innocence will be infringed whenever there is the possibility of a conviction despite the existence of reasonable doubt. The arena in which the presumption of innocence has found greatest application is in that of reverse onus provisions. Reverse onus provisions in civil cases merit some attention.[5] However, because the constitutional right to a presumption of innocence arises only in the context of an accused's right to a fair trial, reverse onus provisions attract far greater attention in the context of criminal trials.[6]

Likewise, because the presumption of innocence arises only in the context of an accused's right to a fair trial, the presumption of innocence has been held not to apply to interrogation procedures outside of the criminal process, nor to [1] S v Manamela (supra) at para 25. For a critical discussion of this case, see P Schwikkard 'Evidence' (2000) 13 SACJ 237, 239. Cf Osman v Attorney-General Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC), [1998] ZACC 14. See also PJ Schwikkard 'A Dilution of the Presumption of Innocence and the Right to Remain Silent' (1999) 116 SALJ 462. However, s 37(1) has since been amended to omit the offending phrase. See DT Zeffert, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 555.

[2] S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC), [2002] ZACC 10.

[3] See, for example, S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC); S v Coetzee 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC); S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 748 (CC)('Bhulwana'); S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC) at para 16.

[4] Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (supra) at 40-42.

[5] See, for example, the Constitutional Court's consideration of the allocation of the burden of proof in defamation cases in relation to FC s 16 in Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC). See also Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC), [1995] ZACC 7 ('Coetzee v Government')(Court held the civil imprisonment of debtors unconstitutional.); Laubscher v Laubscher 2004 (4) SA 350 (T).

[6] See Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 752 (CC), [1997] ZACC 5. See also NDPP v Phillips 2002 (4) SA 60 (W).

proceedings that take place after conviction.[1] Quasi-exceptions to this rule are the civil imprisonment of debtors and the contempt of court proceedings instituted by means of civil proceedings.[2]

(iii) Reverse onus provisions

Reverse onus provisions were considered for the first time by the Constitutional Court in S v Zuma.[3] CPA s 217(1)(b)(ii) placed a burden on the accused to prove, in specified circumstances, the inadmissibility of a confession on a balance of probabilities. Kentridge AJ held that the presumption of innocence will be infringed whenever there is a possibility of conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt. Furthermore, where a statutory presumption requires the accused to prove or disprove an element of an offence or excuse on a balance of probabilities, such a presumption would create the possibility of conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt.[4] Finding that the effect of the presumption contained in CPA s 217(1)(b)(ii) was to place a burden on the accused to prove a fact on a balance of probabilities, Kentridge AJ concluded that the section breached the constitutional right to be presumed innocent.

In S v Coetzee,[5] the Constitutional Court had the opportunity to deal with the effect of the presumption of innocence on statutory provisions requiring the

[1] In S v Dzukuda; S v Tshilo 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 443 (CC), [2000] ZACC 16 at para 53 (Court held that while the accused's liberty and security interests were not extinguished during the sentencing phase of the trial, they were reduced in that the presumption of innocence was no longer applicable. However, Ackermann J held that the accused's rights to remain silent and not to testify during proceedings were still applicable at the sentencing stage. Ibid at para 40.) See also NDPP v Phillips 2001 (2) SACR 542 (W)(The court held that proceedings in terms of chapter 5 of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act 121 of 1998, relating to confiscation orders commencing after conviction, could not be affected by the presumption of innocence as guilt or innocence was not in issue.)

[2] Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa 1998 (2) SACR 166 (E). The presumption of innocence has clear application in contempt of court proceedings. See, generally, S v Baloyi 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 81 (CC); S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC); S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC). Cf S v Chinamasa 2001 (1) SACR 278 (ZS).

[3] S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC).

[4] See Bhulwana (supra)(The Constitutional Court similarly found that the presumption contained in s 21(1)(a)(i) of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act 140 of 1992 unconstitutional.) See also S v Ntsele 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC)(Section 21(1)(b) of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act held unconstitutional); S v Mello 1998 (3) SA 712 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 908 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 255 (CC)(Section 20 of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act was struck down); S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC)(The Court held s 40(1) of the Arms and Ammunition Act 75 of 1960 unconstitutional); Lodi v MEC for Nature Conservation and Tourism, Gauteng 2005 (1) 556 SACR (T)(The court found s 37(1)(c) and s 110(1)(b) and (c) of the Nature Conservation Ordinance 12 of 1983 unconstitutional, but favouring the approach taken in Osman v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC) held that s 37(1)(b) which required a person to give a satisfactory account of possession of dead game, did not constitute a reverse onus provision.)

[5] S v Coetzee 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC), 1997 (1) SACR 379 (CC), [1997] ZACC 2. For a further discussion of Coetzee, see G Kemp 'Die Grontwetlikheid van Statutere Vermoedens' (1998) 9 Stellenbosch LR 106.

accused to prove an exemption, exception or defence.[1] The Coetzee Court was required to determine the constitutionality of CPA s 332(5):

> When an offence has been committed, whether by the performance of any act or by the failure to perform any act, for which any corporate body is or was liable to prosecution, any person who was, at the time of the commission of the offence, a director or servant of the corporate body shall be deemed to be guilty of the offence, unless it is proved that he did not take part in the commission of the offence and that he could have prevented it, and shall be liable to prosecution therefore, either jointly with the corporate body or apart therefrom, and shall on conviction be personally liable to punishment therefore.

Langa J (as he then was) held that CPA s 332(5) imposed an onus on the accused to prove an element relevant to the verdict. Whether this element pertained to the offence or to an exemption was not relevant; the issue was the substance of the offence: 'If a provision is part of the substance of the offence and the statute is formulated in a way which permits a conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt in regard to that substantial part, the presumption of innocence is breached.'[2] The Coetzee Court, by implication, rejected the 'greater includes the lesser test'.[3] Consequently, a reverse onus provision cannot be saved by the argument that the legislature, by creating a special defence in respect of which the accused bears the onus, has ameliorated the hardship the accused would otherwise have suffered if it had chosen to create an absolute liability offence.[4]

The Constitutional Court in Scagell v Attorney-General of the Western Cape, without distinguishing between permissive and mandatory evidentiary presumptions, held that an evidentiary burden does not create the possibility of conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt.[5] One of the provisions considered in Scagell was s 6(3) of the Gambling Act:[6]

> When any playing-cards, dice, balls, counters, tables, equipment, gambling devices or other instruments or requisites used or capable of being used for playing any gambling game are found at any place or on the person of anyone found at any place it shall be prima facie

[1] See also S v Nduku 2000 (2) SACR 382 (TkHC). See, generally, A Paizes 'A Closer Look at the Presumption of Innocence in Our Constitution: What is an Accused Presumed to be Innocent of?' (1998) 11 SACJ 409.

[2] S v Coetzee (supra) at para 38.

[3] This American phraseology is used to reflect the argument that since the legislature in formulating offences is not obliged to provide any defence, it is free to determine the rules of proof in relation to any defences it gratuitously creates, ie the greater power to eliminate the defence is seen as including the lesser power of shifting the burden of proof. See D Dripps 'The Constitutional Status of the Reasonable Doubt Rule' (1987) 75 California LR 1665.

[4] While it might not be possible to challenge absolute liability offences on the basis that they infringe the presumption of innocence, they remain vulnerable to challenge on the basis of the constitutional right to freedom and security of person. See S v Coetzee (supra) at paras 93 and 159. O'Regan J held that it was necessary to distinguish between two separate constitutional inquires that may arise where a statutory provision creates a strict liability offence and places a burden on the accused. The first inquiry is whether it is constitutionally legitimate for Parliament to impose the form of criminal liability. The second inquiry focuses on the legitimacy of imposing a burden on the accused. For more on FC s 12, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

[5] Scagell v Attorney-General of the Western Cape 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 579 (CC), [1996] ZACC 18 ('Scagell').

[6] Act 51 of 1965.

> evidence in any prosecution for a contravention of subsection (1) that the person in control or in charge of such place was playing such game at such place and was visiting such place with the object of playing such game.

O'Regan J noted that the words 'shall be prima facie evidence' used in s 6(3) were generally believed to impose no more than an evidentiary burden on the accused. Such an evidentiary burden merely requires 'evidence sufficient to give rise to a reasonable doubt to prevent conviction'.[1] She held that unlike the imposition of a legal burden, an evidentiary burden did not create the possibility of conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt. The Court found it unnecessary to consider whether s 6(3) nevertheless infringed the presumption of innocence by relieving the prosecution of its duty to prove all the elements of the offence charged. It did not have to give the presumption of innocence further consideration because s 6(3) contained sweeping provisions that permitted innocent persons to be brought to trial 'merely upon proof of a fact which itself is not suggestive of any criminal behaviour'.[2]

One of the weaknesses of Scagell is the Court's failure to draw a distinction between permissive and mandatory evidentiary burdens. It is clear that s 6(3) created a mandatory presumption. The presumption requires the court to presume, once certain items had been found, that the person in control of or in charge of such place permitted the playing of a gambling game. There can be no doubt that proof of the basic fact in s 6(3) has a very tenuous relationship with the presumed fact and could in no way be considered to lead inexorably to the conclusion presumed. Consequently, if the accused exercised his constitutional right to remain silent and led no defence evidence, then he would, in the absence of other evidence capable of raising a reasonable doubt, be liable to conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt.[3] In the absence of a mandatory presumption, the prosecution would be forced to lead additional evidence of the presumed fact in order to secure conviction or avoid discharge. The application of such a presumption could lead to conviction despite the existence of reasonable doubt. Ironically, this line of reasoning is implicit in O'Regan J's reasons for holding that s 6(3) infringed the right to a fair trial. O'Regan J held that the effect of s 6(3) was that 'innocent persons, against whom there is no evidence suggestive of criminal conduct at all, may be charged, brought before a court and required to lead evidence to assert their innocence'.[4]

The issue of determining the application of the presumption of innocence to regulatory offences has yet to be properly considered by the courts. However, the Constitutional Court has indicated that the regulatory nature of an offence is better considered as a factor in establishing whether a provision constitutes a justifiable limitation on the right to be presumed innocent rather than in establishing breach. This approach is to be preferred. It allows the court to concentrate on 'the values

[1] Scagell (supra) at para 12.
[2] Ibid para 16.
[3] See R v Wholesale Travel Inc 1992 8 CR (4th) 145.
[4] Scagell (supra) at para 16.

at stake in the particular context'[1] rather than focusing on the unruly distinction between regulatory and criminal offences.[2]

Although the Constitutional Court has made it clear that there may well be instances where a reverse onus provision is justified,[3] it has been remarkably consistent in refusing to find justification for an infringement of the presumption of innocence. The normative value accorded to the presumption as a fundamental right has been underlined by the Court's insistence that any justification for infringing the presumption of innocence would have to be clear, convincing and compelling.[4]

(b) Right to remain silent; right not testify during proceedings and right not to give self-incriminating evidence

(i) Content and rationale

The right to remain silent can be described as the absence of a legal obligation to speak.[5] Its underlying rationale is three-fold: (1) concern for reliability (by deterring improper investigation) which relates directly to the truth-seeking function of the court; (2) a belief that individuals have a right to privacy and dignity which, whilst not absolute, may not be lightly eroded; (3) the right to remain silent is necessary to give effect to the privilege against self-incrimination and the presumption of innocence.[6] The Final Constitution offers its protection with respect to both pre-trial procedures (FC s35(1)(a))[7] and trial procedures (FC s 35(3)(h)). An arrested person must be promptly informed of the right to remain silent and of the consequences of not remaining silent (FC s 35(1)(b)). The advice must be conveyed in a language that is understood by the accused (FC s 35(4)). The failure to properly advise the accused of his or her right to remain silent will constitute a constitutional breach, it may infringe the right to a fair trial[8] and it might lead to subsequent statements made by the accused being deemed inadmissible in terms of FC s 35(5). However, if an accused is aware of his right to remain silent, then the failure to advise him of this right will not necessarily render the trial unfair.[9]

[1] See S v Coetzee (supra) at para 43.

[2] See D Stuart Canadian Criminal Law — A Treatise (3rd Edition, 1995) 160. See also PJ Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (1999) 97–109. Cf S v Fransman 2000 (1) SACR 99 (W).

[3] S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC) at para 41.

[4] See S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC) at para 10. S v Ntsele 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC) at para 4. For a fuller discussion of limitation's analysis in relation to reverse onus provisions, see Schwikkard Presumption of Innocence (supra) at 133–165; PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) 517.

[5] S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC)('Thebus') at para 55; R v Esposito (1985) 49 CR (3d) 193 (Ont CA).

[6] Thebus (supra) at para 55. See also S v Manamela 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC); Osman v Attorney-General Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC).

[7] See S v Mcasa 2005 (1) SACR 388 (SCA) at para 15.

[8] Director of Public Prosecutions, Natal v Magidela 2000 (1) SACR 458 (SCA) at para 18.

[9] Director of Public Prosecutions, Transvaal v Viljoen 2005 (1) SACR 505 (SCA) at para 43. Cf S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106 (C); S v Solomons 2004 (1) SACR 137 (C).

(ii) Negative inferences from silence

In the constitutional context, an issue that has been the subject of both national[1] and international[2] debate is whether a negative inference can be drawn from an accused's election to exercise her right to remain silent. Although the issue of a negative inference will only arise at the trial stage, there are significant policy issues differentiating silence prior to trial and silence at trial.

At common law, the right to remain silent prohibited a court from drawing adverse inferences from silence at the investigative stage of the proceedings. However, at common law, if an alibi defence is raised for the first time at trial, then the court, in determining whether the alibi is reasonably possibly true, may take into account that there has been no opportunity for the state to investigate the alibi properly.[3]

The constitutionality of the common-law approach to the late disclosure of an alibi was considered by the Constitutional Court in S v Thebus. The Thebus Court also applied its mind to the permissibility of drawing an adverse inference of guilt from pre-trial silence and the constitutionality of drawing an adverse inference as to the credibility of the accused from pre-trial silence.

These issues were raised on appeal by one of two co-accused whose conviction on a charge of murder and two counts of attempted murder had been confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal. On arrest, the accused was warned of his right to remain silent but nevertheless elected to make an oral statement in which he described the whereabouts of his family at the time of the shooting. At trial, he testified that this statement was not intended to include himself. (If it did, then it would have contradicted the details of his alibi defence.) After making this initial oral statement, the accused refused to make a written statement and only disclosed his alibi defence two years later when the matter came to trial. The alibi defence was rejected by the trial court and the accused was convicted. The accused's appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal failed and the matter then proceeded to the Constitutional Court. The accused contended that the Supreme Court of Appeal had erred in drawing a negative inference from the accused's failure to disclose his alibi defence timeously. Although the Justices concurred on the ultimate fate of the appeal on this point, it attracted four separate judgments.

Moseneke J (Chaskalson CJ and Madala J concurring) emphasised the distinction between pre-trial silence and trial silence. In terms of this distinction, the objective of the right to silence during trial is to secure a fair trial, whereas '[t]he protection of the right to pre-trial silence seeks to oust any compulsion to speak'.[4]

---

[1] See South African Law Commission, Project 73 Simplification of Criminal Procedure: A More Inquisitorial Approach to Criminal Procedure — Police Questioning, Defence Disclosure, the Role of Judicial Officers and Judicial Management of Trials (2002); K Van Dijkhorst 'The Right to Silence: Is the Game Worth the Candle?' (2001) 118 SALJ 26; RW Nugent 'Self-incrimination in Perspective' (1999) 116 SALJ 501; P Schwikkard 'Silence and Common Sense' (2003) Acta Juridica 92.

[2] See, for example, S Easton The Case for the Right to Silence (2nd Edition, 1998); I Dennis 'Silence in the Police Station: The Marginalisation of Section 34' [2002] Criminal Law Review 25; J Jackson, M Wolfe & K Quinn Legislating Against Silence: The Northern Ireland Experience (2000).

[3] R v Masbele 1944 AD 571; S v Zwayi 1997 (2) SACR 772 (Ck).

[4] Thebus (supra) at para 55.

Moseneke J then categorically stated that '[i]n our constitutional setting, pre-trial silence of an accused can never warrant the drawing of an inference of guilt'[1] as this would undermine both the rights to remain silent and to be presumed innocent.[2] It is the ambiguity of pre-trial silence that prohibits an inference from silence being drawn. On Moseneke J's account, the drawing of an inference would render the mandatory warning of the right to remain silent 'a trap instead of a means for finding out the truth in the interests of justice'.[3]

Moseneke J drew a distinction between an inference as to guilt and an inference pertaining to credibility on the basis of a person's pre-trial silence. The latter would not necessarily infringe the presumption of innocence.[4] This distinction is somewhat tendentious. For example, with respect to the late disclosure of an alibi defence, a negative inference as to credibility will inevitably be a factor taken into consideration in the ultimate determination of guilt or innocence. Moseneke J's judgment also supports a distinction being drawn between an inference as to guilt and the effect of late disclosure on the evaluation of the weight to be accorded the alibi evidence. The latter is simply treated as an unavoidable consequence of adversarial proceedings: late disclosure precludes the prosecution from properly investigating the alibi defence. As a result, the alibi evidence will not be fully tested and less weight must be attached to it. The effect on weight is not a result of a negative inference as to credibility or guilt. It is simply a product of the evaluation of evidence in the context of an adversarial system. Nevertheless, Moseneke J appears to equate this procedural consequence with an inference as to credibility and argues that drawing an inference as to credibility amounts to a compulsion to speak and consequently limits the accused's right to silence. Moseneke J further noted that it is constitutionally mandatory to warn accused of their right to remain silent but that it is not mandatory that they be warned that their silence may possibly be used against them and that their silence will be taken into account in determining the weight to be accorded an alibi. Taking into account the limited use of an inference based on the late disclosure of an alibi, he concluded that the common-law rule is a justifiable limitation of the right to remain silent and that late disclosure of an alibi may have consequences which 'can legitimately be taken into account in evaluating the evidence as a whole'.[5] Moseneke J acknowledged that 'an election to disclose one's defence only when one appears on trial is not only legitimate but also protected by the Constitution'.[6] However, he then held that this protection would not preclude cross-examination on the accused's election to remain silent as such cross-examination would go to credit. Such cross-examination 'would not unjustifiably limit the right to remain silent'[7] provided it was conducted with due regard to the dictates of trial fairness.[8]

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 57. See also S v Maasdorp 2008 (2) SACR 296 (NC).
[2] Thebus (supra) at para 58.
[3] Ibid at para 58.
[4] Ibid at para 59.
[5] Ibid at para 68.
[6] Ibid at para 69
[7] Ibid at para 69.
[8] Ibid at para 70.

Goldstone and O'Regan JJ (Ackermann and Mokgoro JJ concurring) concurred in the result but dissented insofar as they reached the conclusion that drawing an adverse inference from the first appellant's failure to timeously disclose his alibi was an unjustifiable infringement of the right to remain silent. In considering the rationale for prohibiting inferences from silence, they rejected the argument that it is unfair to place the accused in a position where he will suffer adverse consequences whatever his election: hard choices are unavoidable in the adversarial process.[1] But they went no further than suggesting that it is inevitable that there may be adverse consequences from exercising the right to remain silent and avoided concluding that silence itself is an item of evidence.

Goldstone and O'Regan JJ also rejected the argument that drawing an adverse inference infringes the presumption of innocence because it relieves the state of part of its burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. They argued that the Final Constitution 'does not stipulate that only the state's evidence may be used in determining whether the accused person has been proved guilty'.[2] However, taking the historical record of policing into account, they found that the prohibition on adverse inferences was justified insofar as it protected accused persons from improper police questioning and procedures.[3] They held that this rationale does not extend to silence in court. They also endorsed the view that it is unfair to warn accused persons of their right to remain silent in a formulation that implies that there will be no penalty for silence, and then to permit a court to draw a negative inference from that silence.[4] Although it is legitimate for an accused to be compelled to make a choice, that choice must be an informed choice and 'an accused person needs to understand the consequences of remaining silent'.[5] The warning also constitutes a barrier to drawing an adverse inference in that in many cases it 'will render the silence by the accused ambiguous'.[6] Goldstone and O'Regan JJ rejected the distinction between adverse inferences going to guilt and those going to credit. Although they might be conceptually different, the two Justices wrote, 'the practical effect of the adverse inference to be drawn for the purposes of credit, namely, that the alibi evidence is not to be believed, will often be no different to the effect of the inference to be drawn with respect to guilt, namely that the late tender of the alibi suggests that it is manufactured and that the accused is guilty'.[7] They also rejected Moseneke J's conclusion that it is constitutionally permissible to cross-examine accused on their election to remain silent. First, an accused should not be required to explain why she chose to exercise a constitutional right;[8] and, second, it would be unfair in the light of the constitutionally mandated warning in respect of silence.[9] However, the two Justices concluded that, if the warning was revised, an adverse inference from the

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 83.
[2] Ibid at para 83.
[3] Ibid at para 85.
[4] Ibid at para 86.
[5] Ibid at para 87.
[6] Ibid at para 88.
[7] Ibid at para 90.
[8] Ibid at para 91.
[9] Ibid.

late disclosure of an alibi would constitute a justifiable limitation of the right to remain silent.[1]

Yacoob J, although concurring in the result, took a somewhat different approach. He rejected the distinction between trial and pre-trial silence and held that FC s 35(1)(a) and FC s 35(3)(h) 'represent a continuum'.[2] He identified the purpose of the right to silence as being to 'ensure that people are protected from self-incrimination in the process of police interrogation'.[3] However, the ultimate objective of the right to remain silent, Yacoob J held, is to ensure a fair trial. Furthermore, he wrote that

> [the right to a fair trial] is not limited to ensuring fairness for the accused. It is much broader. A court must also ensure that the trial is fair overall, and in that process, balance the interests of the accused with that of society at large and the administration of justice.[4]

Because this broad concept of trial fairness cannot, presumably, be found in FC s 35(3), Yacoob J locates it in FC s 35(5). FC s 35(5) confers a discretion on the courts to admit evidence even if it was unconstitutionally obtained provided that it is fair to do so and its admission is not detrimental to the interests of justice. Consequently, Yacoob J wrote that provided that the drawing of inferences from the exercise of the right to remain silent — or the interrogation of such exercise on cross-examination — does not ultimately render the trial unfair, there is no basis on which to forbid the drawing of such inferences. He reasoned as follows:

> In the exercise of the duty to ensure a fair trial, it would become necessary to balance the rights of the accused, the rights of the victim and society at large. The right to silence of the accused could well become implicated in this balancing exercise when the judicial officer makes decisions concerning the admissibility of evidence, the allowing of cross-examination, as well as the drawing of inferences. Indeed inferences arising out of silence cannot ordinarily be drawn unless there is evidence of the silence of the accused and evidence of the circumstances surrounding the silence. Any investigation around the accused's silence cannot be said to infringe his right to silence unless the trial is thereby rendered unfair. The same goes for all decisions concerning admissibility of evidence as well as the use of silence in the drawing of inferences. The fairness of the trial as an objective is fundamental and key. The right to silence can only be infringed if it is implicated in a way that renders the trial unfair. It is a contradiction in terms to suggest that the right to silence has been infringed if it is implicated in a way that does not compromise the fairness of the trial but enhances it.[5]

The reasoning in this passage ought not to be endorsed. First, FC s 35(5) only becomes applicable once it has been established that evidence has been unconstitutionally obtained. In respect of the right to remain silent, it first needs to be established whether the right to remain silent in FC s 35(1)(a) or FC s 35(3)(h) has been infringed. The right to remain silent attaches only to arrested and to accused persons and does not embrace the rights of the victim and society at

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 34.
[2] Ibid at para 104.
[3] Ibid at para 105.
[4] Ibid at para 107.
[5] Ibid at para 109.

large. The broader notion of trial fairness may possibly be read into FC s 35(5) — but is precluded at any earlier stage of the inquiry. Secondly, by conflating the right to silence and the right to a fair trial at all stages, Yacoob J implies that the only remedy for infringing the right to remain silent is the exclusion of evidence. An arrested person who is subjected to improper police questioning that infringes her right to remain silent must surely (at least theoretically) be able to seek relief for the infringement of this pre-trial right prior to going to trial. Undue emphasis on trial fairness may result in insufficient attention being given to the underlying relationship between the right to remain silent and the right to dignity.

However, there is much to say for the contextual approach taken by Yacoob J in respect of the appropriate warning to be given to arrested persons. He suggests that a more complex warning as to the consequences of remaining silent may well 'tilt the balance in favour of getting [a] person to speak'[1] and that such a consequence may not necessarily be fairer than the constitutionally prescribed warning that 'encourages silence on the part of an arrested person'.[2] As a result, Yacoob J concluded that the more limited warning did not result in any unfairness to the appellant.[3] Contextualising these particular constitutional rights might also lead to the conclusion that a more complex warning will make little difference to the fairness of the trial: it is very likely that neither warning will be properly understood. Therefore adverse inferences should not be permitted in these circumstances as silence in response to an incomprehensible warning would inevitably be too ambiguous to sustain an inference.[4]

Given the divergent judgments, it is difficult to state, with any clarity, what the law now is. Ten judges heard the case: surprisingly, only two of the 10 justices found that it was unnecessary to determine whether the failure to disclose an alibi defence to the police could attract an adverse inference — on the facts of the case, the appellant had not exercised his right to silence and after being duly warned had responded to a question concerning his whereabouts.[5] In effect, the Court treated the matter as a previous inconsistent statement. Seven of the 10 judges held that it was constitutionally impermissible to draw an adverse inference as to guilt from the accused's pre-trial silence. However, four of the seven judges indicated that if the constitutionally mandated warning was rephrased so as to apprise arrested persons of the consequences of remaining silent, an adverse inference for pre-trial silence might be constitutionally justifiable. Three other judges held that although an adverse inference as to guilt was not justifiable, an adverse inference as to credibility was a justifiable limitation on the right to remain silent and that it was permissible to cross-examine the accused on his failure to disclose an alibi timeously. Four justices expressly rejected this conclusion. All eight of the judges dealing with the question of adverse inferences would appear to concur with the view that there may well be acceptable negative consequences

[1] Thebus (supra) at para 111.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Yacoob J, like Goldstone and O'Regan JJ, rejects the distinction between inferences that go to credibility and those that go to guilt.

[5] Ngcobo J, with Langa DCJ concurring.

that attach to remaining silent. It would seem, therefore, that the common law position remains largely intact and that it is constitutionally permissible to take the late disclosure of an alibi into account in determining what weight should be attached to the alibi defence.

As to the drawing of inferences from pre-trial silence, Moseneke J makes it categorically clear that negative inferences are constitutionally impermissible. On the other hand, the concurring judgment of Goldstone and O'Regan JJ suggests that such inferences might be constitutional if arrested persons are warned of the consequences of their silence. One conclusion that would be consistent with both judgments is that the ambiguity of silence (and the impermissibility of drawing any inference) would remain if an arrested person did not understand the revised warning. Such a restatement of the law would make it highly unlikely that a negative inference could ever be drawn from silence at any stage where an arrested person or accused person is not represented by counsel.

The position as regards inferences from trial silence likewise remains unclear. At common law, the prosecution could refer to the accused's silence once a prima facie case had been established. Clear authority exists for the proposition that, in certain circumstances, an accused's refusal to testify, when the prosecution had established a prima facie case, could be a factor in assessing guilt.[1]

The High Court in S v Brown held that whilst the right to remain silent was recognised at common law, its constitutional status required a change in emphasis as regards its application.[2] (The most obvious change is that any infringement of the right to remain silent is required to be justified with reference to the limitations clause.) Buys J, finding that the use of silence as an item of evidence amounted to an indirect compulsion to testify and that the drawing of an adverse inference from silence diminished and possibly nullified the right to remain silent, held that it would be unconstitutional for the court to draw an adverse inference where accused persons elect to exercise their constitutional right to remain silent.[3] However, the court held that this conclusion does not mean that no adverse consequences could arise should an accused exercise the right to remain silent.[4] Where the state has established a prima facie case against the accused, and the accused fails to testify or to adduce any other evidence to rebut the prima facie case, the court is required to base its decision on the uncontradicted evidence of the state. In this situation, it is possible, indeed common, that the prima facie case will be sufficient to sustain a conviction. In other words, although the accused's silence may not be treated as an item of evidence, he or she will have to accept the risk of conviction on the basis of the state's uncontradicted prima facie case. However, let

[1] S v Mthetwa 1972 (3) SA 766 (A); S v Snyman 1968 (2) SA 582 (A); S v Letsoko 1964 (4) SA 768 (A); R v Ismail 1952 (1) SA 204 (A).

[2] S v Brown 1996 (2) SACR 49 (NC).

[3] Ibid at 62.

[4] Ibid at 63.

us be clear: any inference drawn by the court is drawn from the uncontroverted evidence and not from the silence of the accused.[1]

Reaching the opposite conclusion (and without reference to Brown), the court in S v Lavhengwa fully endorsed the view that an adverse inference could be permitted in appropriate circumstances:

> It accords, first, with common sense. The inference is permissible only when the accused fails to give evidence despite the fact that the prosecution evidence strongly indicates guilt, an innocent accused would have refuted evidence against him, and there is no other explanation of his failure to do so. In these circumstances common sense demands that an inference be drawn and human nature is such that one would be all but inevitable. It has indeed been suggested that 'no rule of law can effectively legislate against the drawing of an inference from a failure to testify'. Secondly, it is not mere sophistry to reason … that an accused's right to remain silent is not denied or eroded by an inference drawn from his choice to exercise that right in circumstances where an innocent person would have chosen to do so. It is suggested thirdly that, even if the rule permitting an adverse inference impinged upon the right of the accused to remain silent, it is in any event probably a justifiable limitation. [2]

The Constitutional Court has not expressly ruled on whether drawing an adverse inference from silence at trial would pass constitutional muster. However, it has on more than one occasion pronounced that trial silence may have such untoward consequences. In Thebus, the Court wrote that 'if there is evidence that requires a response and if no response is forthcoming … [then] the Court may be justified in concluding that the evidence is sufficient, in the absence of an explanation, to prove the guilt of the accused'.[3]

The Supreme Court of Appeal, after S v Monyane, also appears prepared to expand the ambit of negative consequences to drawn from silence of an accused.[4] As Ponnan JA writes:

> Secondly, somewhat surprisingly, the fourth appellant did not testify. The presence of his vehicle and the evidence of the second appellant linked him to the crime scene. In those circumstances, a reasonable expectation existed that, if there were an explanation consistent with his innocence, it would have been proffered. He, however, refused to rise to the challenge. For him to have remained silent in the face of the evidence was nothing short of damning.[5]

---

[1] See also S v Hlongwa 2002 (2) SACR 37 (T); S v Scholtz 1996 (2) SACR 40 (NC). See also SE Van der Merwe 'The Constitutional Passive Defence Right to an Accused versus Prosecutorial and Judicial Comment on Silence: Must We Follow Griffin v California' (1994) Obiter 1. See, further, R v Noble (1997) 1 SCR 874, 6 CR (5th) 1 (The Canadian Supreme Court held that using silence as an item of evidence infringed both the presumption of innocence and the right to remain silent.)

[2] S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453, 487 (W) ('Lavhengwa'). Cf S v Mseleku 2006 (2) SACR 574 (D).

[3] S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC) at para 58. See also S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC); S v Mokoena 2006 (1) SACR 29 (W); S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (SE). Cf S v Sithole 2005 (2) SACR 504 (SCA).

[4] 2008 (1) SACR 543 (SCA) at para 19.

[5] Ibid at para 19. Cf S v Mavinini 2009 (1) SACR 523 (SCA); S v Mdlongwa 2010 (2) SACR 419 (SCA) at para 25.

The Supreme Court of Appeal did not have to reach such a conclusion because the state had produced sufficient evidence to establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt. An inference from silence would not have altered the outcome.[1]

Another difficulty arises with drawing inferences from trial silence: what inference should be drawn if the accused remains silent on the advice of counsel? Under such circumstances, it would be seem unjust for any court to conclude that an inference to credibility or to guilt was the only reasonable inference. The Supreme Court of Appeal skirted this vexed issue in S v Tandwa.[2] The accused alleged that his right to a fair trial had been compromised, as a result of incompetent legal representation, because counsel had advised him not to testify. The court, recognising that the constitutional right to legal representation encompassed a right to competent representation, held:

> When an accused … complains about the quality of legal representation, the focus is no longer, as before the Constitution, only on the nature of the mandate the accused conferred on his legal representative, or only on whether an irregularity occurred that vitiated the proceedings — the inquiry is into the quality of the representation afforded.[3]

Two obvious evidential questions arise when the accused lodges a complaint of poor legal representation. First, would admitting an affidavit by the impugned counsel constitute a breach of legal professional privilege? The Tandwa court drew a distinction between implied and imputed waiver of legal professional privilege:

> Implied waiver occurs … when the holder of the privilege with the full knowledge of it so behaves that it can objectively be concluded that the privilege was intentionally abandoned. Imputed waiver occurs where — regardless of the holder's intention — fairness requires that the court conclude that the privilege was abandoned. Implied waiver entails an objective inference that the privilege was actually abandoned; imputed waiver proceeds from fairness, regardless of actual abandonment.[4]

The Tandwa court, following Wigmore,[5] held that waiver must be imputed where a client alleges incompetence on the part of his or her legal representative.[6]

The second evidential difficulty is whether an appeal court will be confronted by conflicting affidavits, one from the accused alleging incompetence and one from the legal representative denying incompetence. The Tandwa court held that such a conflict would not prove an insurmountable difficulty. The court possesses the inherent power to cut the Gordian knot 'in an appropriate case by a commission or [some] other suitable proceeding'.[7] In the instant matter, the Tandwa court found it unnecessary to embark upon such measures because it had readily concluded that the accused's version was improbable at best:

> [W]hen an accused raises a fair-trial complaint involving allegedly incompetent legal representation that raises a dispute about what occurred between him and his lawyer, (a) the

[1] Cf S v Lotter 2008 (2) SACR 595 (C).
[2] 2008 (1) SACR 613 (SCA).
[3] Ibid at para 7 (footnotes omitted).
[4] Ibid at para 18.
[5] Wigmore on Evidence in Trials at Common Law (JT McNaughton rev. 1961) Vol VIII at para 2328.
[6] Tandwa (supra) at paras 19 & 20.
[7] Ibid at para 22.

> lawyer's response to the allegations is admissible in assessing the veracity of the complaint; (b) if the allegations raise a real possibility that there was incompetence or that bad advice was given or that misconduct occurred, it may be necessary for appropriate mechanisms to be developed to establish the facts; (c) in this case, the accused's complaint is inherently contradictory and implausible and must be rejected without further inquiry.[1]

However, no party disputed the claim that the accused did not testify because of the advice of his counsel. The Tandwa court — adopting a similar approach to the Monyane Court — held that this troublesome silence could still give rise to an inference of guilt and assist the court in establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Indeed, this inference led to the accused's conviction.

The troublesome silence, refracted through the Supreme Court of Appeal's views on inference and inadequate legal counsel, raises another troubling conclusion. Given the undisputed fact that the accused remained silent on counsel's uninterrogated advice, the Tandwa court failed to explain why an inference of guilt was the only reasonable inference under such contested facts. A reader is left with the impression that, as a general matter, the possibility of incompetent legal counsel is an inconvenient truth barring the way to a conviction based, in part, on the silence of the accused.

(iii) Discharge at the close of the state case

The rights to remain silent,[2] not to testify during the proceedings[3] and not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence[4] also fall to be considered when dealing with discharge at the close of the state case. Two relatively recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal go some way towards clarifying the limits of judicial discretion in granting a discharge at the close of the state case in terms of CPA s 174. Section 174 reads as follows:

> If at the close of the case for the prosecution at any trial, the court is of the opinion that there is no evidence that the accused committed the offence referred to in the charge or any offence of which he may convicted on the charge, it may return a verdict of not guilty.

Prior to the new constitutional dispensation, a significant body of case authority supported the proposition that the use of the word 'may' in CPA s 174 conferred a discretion on the court to refuse discharge in the absence of evidence supporting a conviction — provided there was a 'reasonable possibility that the defence evidence might supplement the state case'.[5] The correctness of this approach was challenged soon after the Interim Constitution came into force. Claassen J in S v Mathebula held that an accused's right to freedom and security of person as well as his rights to be presumed innocent and remain silent severely curtailed the discretion conferred by s 174 and held that a court did not have a discretion

[1] Tandwa (supra) at para 29.
[2] FC s 35(3)(h).
[3] Ibid.
[4] FC s 35(3)(j).
[5] See S v Shuping 1983 (2) SA 119 (B) 120; R v Kritzinger 1952 (2) SA 401 (W); S v Zimmerie 1989 (3) SA 484 (C); S v Campbell 1991 (1) SACR 435 (Nm).

to refuse discharge when there was no evidence tendered against the accused.[1] However, the court expressly acknowledged that its judgment did not lay down a general rule in those cases where there was some evidence against the accused. This approach was not uniformly adopted by the High Court.[2]

The Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Legote[3] and S v Lubaxa[4] extends the line of reasoning proffered in Mathebula.[5] In Legote, Harms JA held that it was clear that a court had a duty to ensure that an unrepresented accused against whom the state had not made out a prima facie case was discharged and the principle of equality required that this duty be extended to the represented accused. In Lubaxa, Nugent AJA (as he was then) held:

> I have no doubt that an accused person (whether or not he is represented) is entitled to be discharged at the close of the case for the prosecution if there is no possibility of a conviction other than if he enters the witness box and incriminates himself. The failure to discharge an accused in those circumstances, if necessary mero motu, is in my view a breach of the rights that are guaranteed by the Constitution and will ordinarily vitiate a conviction based exclusively upon his self-incriminatory evidence.[6]

However, the dictum of Nugent AJA, albeit obiter, casts some doubt as to whether the relevant threshold to be passed in order to avoid discharge is that of a prima facie nature. It also clearly advocates a different approach in respect of co-accused. The Lubaxa court found that the right to be discharged did not necessarily arise from the rights to be presumed innocent, to remain silent or not to testify but from the constitutional rights to dignity and personal freedom which require the existence of a 'reasonable and probable' cause to believe that the accused is guilty'.[7] However, the court appeared to have difficulty in drawing a clear line between the constitutional rights to dignity, personal freedom and a fair trial. It concluded that the protection afforded by the rights to dignity and personal freedom will be 'pre-eminently' eroded 'where the prosecution has exhausted the evidence and a conviction is no longer possible except by self-incrimination'. Presumably, the privilege against self-incrimination underlies the Lubaxa court's finding that '[t]he same considerations do not necessarily arise, … where the prosecution's case against one accused might be supplemented by the evidence of a co-accused'.[8] The express reason given by the Lubaxa court for this distinction is that as '[t]he prosecution is ordinarily entitled to rely upon the evidence of an accomplice and it is not self-evident why it should necessarily be precluded from doing so merely because it has chosen to prosecute more than one person jointly'.[9] However, it is not self-evident as to why the rights to privacy and to freedom of the person

[1] S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W).
[2] See, for example, S v Makofane 1998 (1) SACR 603 (T).
[3] S v Legote 2001 (2) SACR 179 (SCA).
[4] S v Lubaxa 2001 (2) SACR 703 (SCA)('Lubaxa'). See also S v Zwezwe 2006 (2) SACR 599 (N).
[5] Mathebula (supra).
[6] Lubaxa (supra) at para 18. See also S v Zwezwe 2006 (2) SACR 599 (N).
[7] Lubaxa (supra) at para 19.
[8] Ibid at para 20. See also S v Tusani 2002 (2) SACR 468 (TD); S v Tsotetsi and Others (2) 2003 (2) SACR 638 (W).
[9] Lubaxa (supra) at para 20.

cease to be infringed merely because the prosecution has chosen to prosecute more than one person jointly. One argument that might support this view is that the refusal of discharge is premised, not on the possibility that the accused will incriminate himself, but rather on the likelihood that the co-accused will complete the prosecution's task.[1]

The uncertainties raised by Lubaxa[2] were partially addressed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Nkosi.[3] It was common cause that in the court a quo the state had failed to establish 'any evidence against the first appellant on which a reasonable man could convict him at the end of the case'.[4] (This wording suggests that the state must establish a prima facie case to avoid discharge.) The court a quo refused to recognize that in matters with multiple accused it ought to assess whether conflicting interests and conflicting accounts — or their absence — might constitute adequate grounds for discharge. The Nkosi court held that Lubaxa foresaw the possibility that the failure to discharge a co-accused might amount to an infringement of the right to a fair trial.[5] In the instant matter, the first appellant's right to a fair trial had been compromised by the court a quo's refusal to even hear an application for discharge given that no 'reasonable basis … for an expectation that his co-accused might incriminate him' obtained.[6] Despite this gloss on the holding in Lubaxa, Lubaxa cannot, logically, be invoked as binding precedent for the proposition that refusing to discharge an accused party in a case involving multiple co-accused constitutes a violation of the right to a free trial.

In S v Agliotti, the court reviewed the post-constitutional development of s 174 jurisprudence.[7] It discharged the accused because the sole state witness incriminating Agliotti lacked any semblance of credibility. However, the court, relying in part on S v Mpetha,[8] noted that in s 174 proceedings credibility plays only a limited role and will generally only be taken into consideration where 'it was of such poor quality that no reasonable person could possibly accept it'.[9]

---

[1] In Zuma, Van der Merwe JA refers to Lubaxa and then stands the right to be presumed innocent and the constitutional requirement that an accused's guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt on their respective heads. The learned judge apparently refused discharge on the basis that he was not convinced of the accused's innocence beyond a reasonable doubt. S v Zuma 2006 (2) SACR 191 (W)(The court held that it 'could therefore not find beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not have the required mens rea'. This finding appears to be contrary to the presumption of innocence that requires the State to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.) See also S v Masondo: In Re S v Mthembu 2011 (2) SACR 286 (GSJ)(High Court judgment clearly deviates from SCA precedent). 'Innocence beyond a reasonable doubt' is not a principle of evidence or criminal procedure in any known legal jurisdiction.

[2] For more on the uncertainties that arise from this judgment, see Schwikkard & Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (supra) at 567–568.

[3] S v Nkosi 2011 (2) SACR 482 (SCA).

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ibid at paras 25 and 26.

[6] Ibid at para 26.

[7] 2011 (2) SACR 437 (GSJ)('Agliotti').

[8] 1983 (4) SA 262 (C).

[9] Agliotti (supra) at para 262.

(c) The right not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence; the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence; and the right to legal representation.

(i) The right to legal representation and the privilege against self-incrimination[1]

Arrested persons have the right not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence against them (FC s 35(1)(c)). Accused persons have the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence (FC s 35(3)(j)). Detainees and accused (and inevitably arrested persons as at the moment of arrest they will also be detained) have the right to 'to choose, and to consult with, a legal practitioner, and to be informed of this right promptly' (FC s 35(2)(b) and FC s 35(3)(f)).[2] They must also all be informed of the right 'to have a legal practitioner assigned to … [them] by the state and at state expense, if substantial injustice would otherwise result' (FC s 35(2)(c) and s 35(3)(g)).[3]

In the United States, the Fifth Amendment — which gives constitutional protection to the privilege against self-incrimination — was extended in Miranda v Arizona to incriminating statements made by persons in police custody.[4] In Miranda, the US Supreme Court, relying upon Escobedo v Illinois,[5] found that the right to counsel was essential in order to protect the right against self-incrimination. The holding of the Supreme Court in Miranda can be summarised as follows:

> Statements obtained during custodial interrogation of the accused may not be admitted into evidence unless the prosecution can show the appropriate procedural safeguards were used to secure the privilege against self-incrimination. The appropriate procedural safeguards are that a person must be warned that she has the right to remain silent, that any statement that she makes may be used in evidence against her, and that she has a right to the presence of a legal representative and if substantial injustice would otherwise occur to legal representation at state expense. The failure to inform an accused of these rights will generally result in the exclusion of testimonial communications from evidence.

The link between the right to counsel and the privilege against self-incrimination (and other related rights) was succinctly restated by Froneman J in S v Melani:

> The purpose of the right to counsel and its corollary to be informed of that right … is thus to protect the right to remain silent, the right not to incriminate oneself and the

[1] The constitutional right to legal representation specified in FC s 35 is restricted to arrested, detained and accused persons. This list embraces sentenced prisoners, see Ehrlich v CEO, Legal Aid Board 2006 (1) SACR 346 (E). See also Hamata and Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee and Another 2002 (5) SA 449 (SCA), 2002 (7) BCLR 756 (SCA).

[2] See Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembaland Regional Authority & Another; Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority 2000 (2) SACR 596 (TK)(The court held that s 7(1) of the Regional Authority Courts Act infringed s 35(3)(f) in so far as it provided that neither the complainant nor the accused could be legally represented during criminal proceedings in a regional authority court.)

[3] The constitutional right to legal representation is reflected in s 73 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. The constitutional right to legal representation is not restricted to South African citizens. See S v Thomas 2001 (2) SACR 608 (W)(The court held that it applies to non-South African citizens accused in South Africa.)

[4] 384 US 436 (1966). See, further, G Smith 'The Threshold Question in Applying Miranda: What Constitutes Custodial Interrogation?' 1974 (25) South Carolina LR 699, 735; Harris v New York 401 US 222 (1970); Rhode Island v Innis 446 US 291 (1980); New York v Quarles 467 US 649 (1984).

[5] Escobedo v Illinois 378 US 478 (1964).

> right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty. Section 25(2) and 25(3) of the [Interim] Constitution make it abundantly clear that this protection exists from the inception of the criminal process; that is on arrest, until its culmination up to and during the trial itself. This protection has nothing to do with the need to ensure the reliability of evidence adduced at the trial. It has everything to do with the need to ensure that an accused is treated fairly in the entire criminal process: in the 'gatehouse' of the criminal justice system (that is the interrogation process), as well as in its 'mansions' (the trial court).[1]

There have been conflicting views as to whether it is necessary to advise a person of her right to legal representation at every pre-trial stage. The most pragmatic approach is that in each case the crucial inquiry should be whether the accused, after having been apprised of her rights on arrest, was in a position to decide voluntarily how to exercise her rights at each subsequent pre-trial procedure.[2]

The common law did not recognise a right to legal representation for those unable to afford a lawyer.[3] The Final Constitution only affords detained and accused persons the right to be provided with legal assistance at state expense 'if substantial injustice would otherwise result'.[4] However, if legal representation is necessary to uphold the privilege against self-incrimination (and associated rights) and the protection of the right not to incriminate oneself is necessary to ensure a fair trial, then a person must have access to legal representation to realise the above rights and such representation should not be dependent on her income. The logical conclusion of this line of reasoning is that if the state finds itself unable to provide legal representation to an arrested, detained or accused person, then the police must refrain from interrogating persons who desire legal representation but who are not in a position to obtain it.[5] However, there can be little doubt that the reason for imposing a restriction on the substantive right to legal representation is the concern that the South African state simply does not have the resources to provide legal representation for every indigent accused. The right to legal representation could, otherwise, paralyse an already overburdened criminal justice system. Factors that will be taken into account in determining whether substantial injustice would result through the absence of legal representation include: the complexity of the case,[6] the severity of the potential sentence,[7] the ignorance and

[1] See S v Melani 1996 (1) SACR 335, 348I–J (E); S v Gasa 1998 (1) SACR 446 (D); S v Marx 1996 (2) SACR 140 (W); S v Viljoen 2003 (4) BCLR 450 (T). However, such exclusion is not as automatic under FC s 35(5) as it was under Miranda. See S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N); S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E); S v Orrie 2005 (1) SACR 63 (C). See also DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003); PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2002) 215; S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 19f–20a (W).

[2] See S v Shaba 1998 (1) SACR 16 (T); S v Shongwe 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T); S v Malefo 1998 (1) SACR 127 (W); Shabalala v S 1999 (4) All SA 583 (N); S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E); S v Ngcobo 1998 (10) BCLR 1248 (N); S v Mfene 1998 (9) BCLR 1157 (N); S v Gumede 1998 (5) BCLR 530 (D); S v Nombewu 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E). Cf S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W); S v Marx 1996 (2) SACR 140 (W).

[3] S v Rudman and Another; S v Mthwana 1992 (1) SA 343 (A).

[4] FC s 35(2)(c) and s 35(3)(g).

[5] But see Mgcina v Regional Magistrate Lenasia 1997 (2) SACR 711 (W).

[6] See, generally, Pennington v The Minister of Justice 1995 (3) BCLR 270 (C); Msila v Government of the RSA 1996 (3) BCLR 362 (C); S v Khanyile 1988 (3) SA 795 (N).

[7] See S v Moos 1998 (1) SACR 372 (C)(The court held that substantive injustice would occur if the charge was one which would attract a sentence of imprisonment and the accused did not have legal representation.) See also S v Du Toit 2005 (2) SACR 411 (T).

indigence of the accused.[1] Where the potential for 'substantial injustice' is clear, a trial may not proceed in the absence of legal representation: the accused would have to make an informed decision to waive her right to legal representation.[2]

Where an accused is unrepresented, presiding officers have a duty to ensure that the accused is informed of her rights:[3] eg, the right to legal representation, and that this exercise should occur prior to the commencement of the trial.[4] Depending on the seriousness and complexity of the charge, or on the applicable legal rules, an accused should not only be told of his right to legal representation, he should also be encourage to exercise it.[5] Where there is the possibility of a lengthy term of imprisonment, an accused should be advised of this possibility and encouraged to avail himself of the services of a legal representative.[6] A presiding officer must also ensure that the accused is aware of and understands his right to legal representation at state expense,[7] and where appropriate of his right to appeal against the refusal of legal aid and/or his right to request the court to order that legal representation be provided.[8] The presiding officer must also be satisfied that the accused's choice not to be represented is an informed one.[9] An accused must be given a reasonable opportunity to obtain legal aid.[10] If an accused initially declines legal representation, but subsequently changes his mind, then he must be given the opportunity to obtain legal representation.[11] Similarly, if a legal representative withdraws, then the accused must be given the opportunity of applying to the Legal Aid Board for the appointment of another legal representative.[12] The duty to provide an accused with a fair opportunity

[1] See S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 125 (CC). See also S v Ambros 2005 (2) SACR 211 (C).

[2] S v Manuel 2001 (4) SA 1351 (W).

[3] This obligation embraces a proper explanation of the proceedings and concepts such as 'cross-examination' and 'opportunity to address the court'. See S v Lekhetho 2002 (2) SACR 13 (O). See also S v Matladi 2002 (2) SACR 447 (T); S v Njikaza 2002 (2) SACR 481 (C); S v Mathole 2002 (2) SACR 484 (T); S v Shiburi 2004 (2) SACR 314 (W); S v May 2005 (2) SACR 331 (SCA); S v Mokoena 2005 (1) SACR 594 (T). See also S v Lusu 2005 (2) SACR 538 (E)(Plasket J condemned the magistrate's refusal of a postponement to facilitate an application for legal aid on the basis that the application was unlikely to succeed.) See also S v Fielies 2006 (1) SACR 302 (C); S v Ndou 2006 (2) SACR 497 (T); S v Zwezwe 2006 (2) SACR 599 (N); S v Mseleku 2006 (2) SACR 574 (D); S v Hlangabezo 2008 (1) SACR 218 (E); S v Mabuza 2009 (2) SACR 435 (SCA).

[4] S v Radebe, S v Mbonani 1988 (1) SA 191 (T). See also S v Van Heerden en Ander Sake 2002 (1) SACR 409 (T); S v Thusi 2002 (12) BCLR 1274 (N); S v Mdali 2009 (1) SACR 259 (C). This duty is equally applicable in bail proceedings. See S v Nzima 2001 (2) SACR 345 (C). S v Moetjie 2009 (1) SACR 95 (T).

[5] S v Radebe, S v Mbonani 1988 (1) SA 191, 196g (T). See also S v Manale 2000 (2) SACR 666 (NC); S v Nkondo 2000 (1) SACR 358 (W); S v Sikhipha 2006 (2) SACR 439 (SCA).

[6] S v Ndlovu 2001 (1) SACR 204 (W); S v Mbambo 1999 (2) SACR 421 (W); S v Dyani 2004 (2) SACR 365 (E). See also S v Tshidiso 2002 (1) SACR 207 (W); S v Ndlovu; S v Sibisi 2005 (2) SACR 645 (W) ('Ndlovu').

[7] S v Visser 2001 (1) SACR 401 (C); S v Monyane 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T); S v Ambros 2005 (2) SACR 211 (C); Ndlovu (supra).

[8] S v Ambros 2005 (2) SACR 211 (C); S v Du Toit (2) 2005 (2) SACR 411 (T).

[9] S v Solomons 2004 (1) SACR 137 (C).

[10] S v Lusu 2005 (2) SACR 538 (E); S v Makhandela 2007 (2) SACR 620 (W); S v Saule 2009 (1) SACR 196 (CkHC).

[11] S v Pitso 2002 (2) SACR 586 (C). See also S v Gedezi 2010 (2) SACR 363 (WCC).

[12] S v Kok 2005 (2) SACR 240 (NC).

to obtain legal representation also arises in summary proceedings.[1] A decision of the Legal Aid Board not to provide representation may be reviewed for 'reasonableness'. However, the courts will be slow to overturn a decision of the Legal Aid Board. The Board is specifically designed to make funds available for legal representation and to decide when legal representation to indigent accused is warranted.[2] All that being said, the failure to inform an accused of his right to legal representation will only result in an unfair trial if it can be shown 'that the conviction has been tarnished by the irregularity'.[3]

The right to have legal representation at state expense does not include the right to have a legal representative of the accused's choice.[4] However, an accused is entitled to effective representation[5] and to be legally represented by a 'person who has placed himself or herself in a position to present' his or her case as instructed.[6] The legal representative must be given a reasonable opportunity to adequately represent his or her client.[7] In S v Mofokeng,[8] the court held that '[t]he right to legal representation exists during the whole of the legal process until the court has spoken the last word'.[9]

(ii) Admissions and confessions

The law as it stands makes a distinction between admissions and confessions in respect of admissibility in criminal trials.[10] The only requirement that needs to be met before an admission will be accepted into evidence is that it must be made voluntarily.[11] 'Voluntary' in this context has a very restricted meaning. An admission will be found to be involuntary only if it has been induced by a promise or threat proceeding from a person in authority.[12] FC s 35(1)(c) may well provide the courts with the opportunity for departing from the artificial and technical common-law interpretation of the requirement of 'voluntariness'. FC s 35(1)(c)

[1] S v Solomons (supra).

[2] Legal Aid Board v S 2011 (1) SACR 166 (SCA). This new position would appear to reflect a deviation from rather recent precedent that held that even if an accused does not meet the means test set by the Legal Aid Board, he will still retain his constitutional right to legal representation at state expense and that right must be explained to the accused. See S v Cornelius 2008 (1) SACR 96 (C); S v Makhandela 2007 (2) SACR 620 (W).

[3] S v May 2005 (2) SACR 331 (SCA). See also Hlantlalala v Dyanti NO 1999 (2) SACR 541 (SCA); S v Mshumpa 2008 (1) SACR 126 (E).

[4] See S v Manguanyana 1996 (2) SCR 283 (E); S v Halgryn 2002 (2) SACR 211 (SCA); R v Mochebelele 2010 (1) SACR 256 (LesA).

[5] S v Mofokeng 2004 (1) SACR 349 (W). See also S v Du Toit (2) 2005 (2) SACR 411 (T); S v Halgryn (supra); S v Tandwa 2008 (1) SACR 613 (SCA).

[6] See S v Charles 2002 (2) SACR 492 (E). See also Beyers v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape 2003 (1) SACR 164 (C); S v Ntuli 2003 (1) SACR 613 (W).

[7] B v S 2003 (9) BCLR 955 (E).

[8] S v Mofokeng 2004 (1) SACR 349 (W) at para 17. See also S v Nkosi 2010 (1) SACR 60 (GNP).

[9] Mahomed v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SACR 495 (W) at para 7 (The court with reference to legal professional privilege held that the confidentiality of communications between an accused and his legal representative was fundamental to an accused's right to a fair trial.) See also Bennett v Minister of Safety and Security 2006 (1) SACR 523 (T).

[10] See S v Ralukukwe 2006 (2) SACR 394 (SCA).

[11] Section 219A of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.

[12] R v Barlin 1926 AD 459.

reflects the accused's pre-trial privilege against self-incrimination. It provides that an arrested person shall have the right 'not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence against' him or her.

Nothing in FC s 35(1)(c) suggests that admissions and confessions should be treated differently. CPA s 217 requires a confession to be made freely and voluntarily whilst the maker is in his sound and sober senses and without having been unduly influenced thereto. In R v Barlin, Innes CJ held that the requirement of undue influence pertaining to confessions was elastic and went beyond the ambit of voluntariness. It was restricted to an inducement, threat or promise coming from a person in authority.[1] The constitutional entrenchment of the principles of due process and the right to a fair trial in FC s 35(3), as well as the wording of FC s 35(1)(c), which draws no distinction between admissions and confessions, favours an interpretation of voluntariness which is indistinguishable from undue influence.

In S v Agnew, Foxcroft J questioned the artificial distinction drawn between confessions and admissions.[2] He noted that, historically, one of the reasons for the distinction was the assumption that admissions need not be guarded against to the same extent as confessions.[3] However, in many instances admissions could be just as damaging as confessions.[4] The Agnew court held that '[i]f full effect is given to the maxim that no one should be obliged to incriminate himself, then it is difficult to understand how incriminating statements contained in confessions should be treated differently from words amounting to admissions only'.[5] The obvious reason for taking this approach is that all the reasons for excluding involuntary confessions apply equally to involuntary admissions. Involuntary confessions and admissions are excluded not only because they are potentially unreliable,[6] but also because a conviction based on an involuntary admission or confession would be one obtained without due process of law.[7] The admission of a forced admission or confession would likewise be contrary to the right not to incriminate oneself.[8] As the South African Law Commission has noted, admissions, confessions and pointings out should all be subject to the same requirements of admissibility: namely that they must be made freely and voluntarily, in sound and sober senses

[1] R v Barlin (supra).
[2] S v Agnew 1996 (2) SACR 535 (C)('Agnew').
[3] Ibid at 538.
[4] Cf R v Xulu 1956 (2) SA 288 (A). See also S v Orrie 2005 (1) SACR 63, 76a–c (C).
[5] Agnew (supra).
[6] See S v Radebe 1968 (4) SA 410 (A) at 418-419.
[7] Brown v Allen 344 US 443 (1953).
[8] See R v Duetsimi 1950 (3) SA 674 (A); S v Sheehama 1991 (2) SA 860 (A).

and without undue influence.[1] No admission or confession should be the product of coercion or abuse.[2]

Our highest appellate courts have yet to follow these sage recommendations. The existing distinction between admissions and confessions was first challenged in the Constitutional Court in S v Molimi.[3] Nkabinde J held that 'although the argument may be sound', the Court need not determine the ongoing validity of the distinction because it had not been raised in the lower courts.[4] Despite the express criticism of the rule, the common-law distinction between admissions and confessions was firmly reinforced by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Libazi.[5]

(iii) Ascertainment of bodily features

CPA s 37(1) authorises police officials to take fingerprints, palm prints or footprints of any person who has been arrested or charged. The police are also authorised to take such steps as are necessary to ascertain whether the body of any arrested person has any mark, characteristic or distinguishing feature or shows any condition or appearance. Obviously, evidence of this nature might incriminate the accused. The question then arises whether CPA s 37 is in conflict with the constitutional right not to be compelled to make an admission which can be used in evidence against the maker. Prior to legislative authorisation, there was some authority for the view that the ascertainment of bodily features, without the consent of an accused, infringed the common-law privilege against self-incrimination. In R v Maleke, the court refused to admit evidence of a footprint compelled by force.[6] Krause J expressed his objection to the admission of such evidence as follows: '[I]t compels an accused person to convict himself out of his own mouth; that it might open the door to oppression and persecution of the worst kind; that it is a negation of the liberty of the subject and offends against our sense of natural justice and fair play…' [7]

However, this line of reasoning was firmly reversed by the Appellate Division in Ex parte Minister of Justice: In re R v Matemba.[8] The court considered the admissibility of evidence of a palm-print taken by compulsion and found that the privilege

[1] South African Law Commission Project 73 Simplification of Criminal Procedure: A More Inquisitorial Approach to Criminal Procedure — Police Questioning, Defence Disclosure, the Role of Judicial Officers and Judicial Management of Trials (August 2002). The various rights enumerated in FC s 35 also provide an entirely different basis for the exclusion of admissions and confessions. FC s 35(5) confers a discretion on the court to exclude evidence obtained in violation of any right in the Bill of Rights. So, for example, Leach J in S v Mdyogolo held that the failure to hold a trial-within-a-trial to determine the admissibility of a confession infringed the constitutional right to remain silent and constituted a fatal irregularity. 2006 (1) SACR (E). See also Director of Public Prosecution, Transvaal v Viljoen 2005 (1) SACR 505 (SCA). For further discussion of trial-within-trial procedures, see § 52.10*(e)* below.

[2] See S v January; Prokureur-Generaal, Natal v Khumalo 1994 (2) SACR 801 (A).

[3] 2008 (3) SA 608 (CC), 2008 (5) BCLR 451 (CC), 2008 (2) SACR 76 (CC), [2008] ZACC 2.

[4] Ibid at paras 48–49.

[5] 2010 (2) SACR 233 (SCA).

[6] R v Maleke 1925 TPD 491.

[7] Ibid at 534. See also Gooprushad v R 1914 35 NLR 87; R v B 1933 OPD 139.

[8] Ex parte Minister of Justice: In re R v Matemba 1941 AD 75.

against self-incrimination applied only to testimonial utterances. Watermeyer JA held:

> Now, where a palm-print is being taken from an accused person, he is, as pointed out by Innes CJ in R v Camane (1925 AD 570, 575), entirely passive. He is not being compelled to give evidence or to confess, any more that he is being compelled to give evidence or confess when his photograph is being taken or when he is put upon an identification parade or when he is made to show a scar in court. In my judgment, therefore, neither the maxim nemo tenetur se ipsum prodere nor the confession rule make inadmissible palm-prints compulsorily taken.[1]

This line of reasoning had been used to justify the admission of evidence of a thing or place pointed out, under coercion, by the accused.[2] In S v Sheehama, the Appellate Division found this reasoning to be untenable. It held that 'a pointing out is essentially a communication by conduct and, as such, is a statement by the person pointing out'.[3] Consequently, a pointing out, like any other extra-judicial admission, has to be made voluntarily before it will be admitted into evidence. However, although a pointing out like the ascertainment of bodily features usually results in the production of 'real' evidence, it can be distinguished from the latter in that it involves some degree of active or communicative conduct.[4]

In S v Huma (2), Claassen J held that the taking of fingerprints did not constitute testimonial evidence by the accused and was therefore not in conflict with the privilege against self-incrimination.[5] The Huma (2) court relied heavily on the reasoning of the US Supreme Court in Schmerber v California.[6] In Schmerber, a majority of the Supreme Court held that the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination relates only to the testimonial or communicative acts of the accused and does not apply to non-communicative acts such as submission to a blood test. This approach was adopted by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Levack v Regional Magistrate, Wynberg.[7] In Levack, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that compelling an accused to submit a voice sample infringed neither the right to remain silent nor the right not to give self-incriminating evidence. In S v Orrie, the High Court found that the involuntary taking of a blood sample for the purposes of DNA profiling infringed both the right to privacy and the right to bodily security and integrity, but that the infringement was justifiable.[8] Desai J, in Minister of Safety and Security v Gaqa,[9] confirmed an order compelling the respondent to submit himself to an operation for the removal of a bullet from his leg. In so doing, the High Court rejected the respondent's argument that to do so would infringe his constitutional right not to incriminate himself. The Gaqa court held that CPA ss 27 and 37 sanctioned the violence necessary to remove the

[1] Ex parte Minister of Justice: In re Matemba (supra) at 83.
[2] See s 218 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977.
[3] S v Sheehama 1991 (2) SA 860 (A).
[4] See S v Binta 1993 (2) SACR 553 (C).
[5] S v Huma (2) 1995 (2) SACR 411, 419 (W). See also S v Maphumulo 1996 (2) SACR 84 (N); Msomi v Attorney-General of Natal 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N).
[6] Schmerber v California 384 US 575 (1966).
[7] 2003 (1) SACR 187 (SCA).
[8] S v Orrie 2004 (1) SACR 162 (C) at para 20.
[9] Minister of Safety and Security v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654 (C).

bullet, and that although these procedures constituted a serious infringement of dignity and bodily integrity, they met the requirements of the limitation clause. A similar application was made to the High Court in Minister of Safety and Security v Xaba.[1] The respondent's arguments were, it appears, limited to the right to be free from all forms of violence (FC s 12(1)(c)) and the right to have security and control over one's body (FC s 12(2)(b)). Southwood AJ held that the conclusion of the court in Gaqa was clearly wrong. In the absence of a law of general application authorising the specific constitutional infringements, Southwood AJ reasoned, the requirements of the limitation clause could not be met.

Can a clear distinction be made between the ascertainment of bodily features and testimonial or communicative statements? Black and Douglas JJ, dissenting in Schmerber v California, thought not:

> [T]he compulsory extraction of a petitioner's blood for analysis so that the person who analysed it could give evidence to convict him had both a 'testimonial' and a 'communicative nature'. The sole purpose of this project which to be successful was to obtain 'testimony' from some person to prove that the petitioner had alcohol in his blood at the time he was arrested. And the purpose of the project was certainly 'communicative' in that the analysis of the blood was to supply information to enable a witness to communicate to the court and jury that the petitioner was more or less drunk.[2]

The distinction between 'testimonial' and 'communicative' conduct is perhaps necessary in the absence of a limitation clause. FC s 36 permits the South African courts to take a more generous approach in determining the content of the right against self-incrimination without compromising the effective administration of the criminal justice system.

Another question that arises in relation to the ascertainment of bodily features is whether an accused must be advised of his or her right to legal representation prior to an identification parade being held. At present it appears to be an open question. Leveson J, in S v Ngwenya, held that the right to a fair trial did not require the accused to be advised of his right to legal representation at every stage of the pre-trial process and that the passive role played by the accused at the identification parade did not involve any process of self-incrimination.[3] In S v Mokoena, the court held that the failure to advise the accused of his right to legal representation at an identity parade merely affected the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.[4] However, in S v Mhlakaza, the court found

[1] Minister of Safety and Security v Xaba 2004 (1) SACR 149 (D).

[2] Schmerber (supra) at 921 (Black J). The minority judgment in Schmerber was preferred by the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Stillman (1997) 42 CRR (2d) 189.

[3] S v Ngwenya 1998 (2) SACR 503, 509 (W). See also S v Zwayi 1997 (2) SACR 772 (Ck); S v Monyane 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T); S v Thapedi 2002 (1) SACR 598 (T). See also S v Hlalikaya 1997 (1) SACR 613 (E)(The court held that there was no right to legal representation at a 'photo identification' parade.) However, the court in S v Thapedi 2002 (1) SACR 598 (T) referring to US v Wade 288 US 218 (1967), acknowledged that there may well be circumstances in which the right to a fair trial would require that the accused be represented at an identity parade.

[4] S v Mokoena 1998 (2) SACR 642 (W). Cf S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 654 (W). See SE Van der Merwe 'Parade-uitkennings, Hofuitkennings en die Reg op Regverteenwoordiging: Enkele Grondwetlike Perspektiewe' 1998 (9) Stellenbosch LR 129 (Discusses and compares case law in South Africa, the United States and Canada.)

the failure to advise the accused of their right to representation coupled with the accused's express objection to the absence of any legal representation, rendered the evidence of the identification parade inadmissible; this approach has received little support in subsequent cases.[1]

52.5 Right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence[2]

The central role of access to information in enabling an accused to exercise his or her fair trial rights was recognised by the Constitutional Court in Shabalala v Attorney-General of Transvaal.[3] Shabalala abolished 'blanket docket privilege' and broadened the accused's access to state witnesses. The Shabalala Court's order provides the best summary of the prevailing position and reads as follows:

> A. 1. The 'blanket docket privilege' expressed by the rule in R v Steyn 1954 (1) SA 324 (A) is inconsistent with the Constitution to the extent to which it protects from disclosure all the documents in a police docket, in all circumstances, regardless as to whether or not such disclosure is justified for the purposes of enabling the accused properly to exercise his or her right to a fair trial in terms of s 25(3).[4]
>
> 2. The claim of the accused for access to documents in the police docket cannot be defeated merely on the grounds that such contents are protected by a blanket privilege in terms of the decision in Steyn's case.
>
> 3. Ordinarily an accused person should be entitled to have access to documents in the police docket which are exculpatory (or which are prima facie likely to be helpful to the defence) unless, in very rare cases, the State is able to justify the refusal of such access on the grounds that it is not justified for the purposes of a fair trial.
>
> 4. Ordinarily the right to a fair trial would include access to the statements of witnesses (whether or not the State intends to call such witnesses) and such of the contents of a police docket as are relevant in order to enable an accused person properly to exercise that right, but the prosecution may, in a particular case, be able to justify the denial of such access on the grounds that it is not justified for the purposes of a fair trial. This would depend on the circumstances of each case.
>
> 5. The State is entitled to resist a claim by the accused for access to any particular document in the police docket on the grounds that such access is not justified for the purposes of enabling the accused properly to exercise his or her right to a fair trial or on the ground that it has reason to believe that there is a reasonable risk that access to the relevant document would lead to the disclosure of the identity of an informer or State secrets or on the grounds that there was a reasonable risk that such disclosure might lead to the intimidation of witnesses or otherwise prejudice the proper ends of justice.
>
> 6. Even where the State has satisfied the Court that the denial of access to the relevant documents is justified on the grounds set out in paragraph 5 hereof, it does not follow that access to such statements, either then or subsequently, must necessarily be denied to the accused. The Court still retains a discretion. It should balance the degree of risk involved in attracting the potential prejudicial consequences for the proper ends of justice referred to in paragraph 5 (if such access is permitted)

[1] S v Mhlakaza 1996 (2) SACR 187 (C). See also S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W).

[2] FC 35(3)(b).

[3] Shabalala v Attorney-General of Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC)('Shabalala').

[4] This summary refers to IC s 25(3): the corresponding provision is now found in FC s 35(3).

against the degree of the risk that a fair trial may not enure for the accused (if such access is denied). A ruling by the Court pursuant to this paragraph shall be an interlocutory ruling subject to further amendment, review or recall in the light of circumstances disclosed by the further course of the trial.

B. 1 Insofar as and to the extent that the rule of practice pertaining to the right of an accused or his legal representative to consult with witnesses for the State prohibits such consultation without the permission of the prosecuting authority, in all cases and regardless of the circumstances, it is not consistent with the Constitution.

2. An accused person has a right to consult a State witness without prior permission of the prosecuting authority in circumstances where his or her right to a fair trial would be impaired, if, on the special facts of a particular case, the accused cannot properly obtain a fair trial without such consultation.
3. The accused or his or her legal representative should in such circumstances approach the Attorney-General or an official authorised by the Attorney-General for consent to hold such consultation. If such consent is granted the Attorney-General or such official shall be entitled to be present at such consultation and to record what transpires during the consultation. If the consent of the Attorney-General is refused the accused shall be entitled to approach the Court for such permission to consult the relevant witness.
4. The right referred to in paragraph 2 does not entitle an accused person to compel such consultation with a State witness: —
   (a) if such State witness declines to be so consulted; or
   (b) if it is established on behalf of the State that it has reasonable grounds to believe such consultation might lead to the intimidation of the witness or a tampering with his or her evidence or that it might lead to the disclosure of State secrets or the identity of informers or that it might otherwise prejudice the proper ends of justice.
5. Even in the circumstances referred to in paragraph 4*(b)*, the Court may, in the circumstances of a particular case, exercise a discretion to permit such consultation in the interest of justice subject to suitable safeguards.[1]

The application of this order does not appear to have given the state much trouble. Few cases have arisen out of a refusal to disclose.[2]

Shabalala was decided in terms of IC s 23.[3] The corresponding section of the Final Constitution, FC s 32, significantly departs from its predecessor in a number of ways.[1] For starters, under FC s 32, the right to information held by the state is no longer qualified by the requirement that the information is necessary for the exercise or protection of any other rights. However, FC s 32 needs to be enforced through the legislation enacted in terms of FC s 32(2): the Promotion of Access to Information Act ('PAIA').[2] In terms of s 7, PAIA does not apply to ongoing criminal or civil proceedings.[3]

[1] Shabalala (supra) at para 72.

[2] But see S v Makiti [1997] 1 All SA 291 (B)(The court clearly encourages disclosure as a default position); S v Naude 2005 (2) SACR 218 (W)(The court held that the prosecution retains the duty to bring previous inconsistent statements made by a state witness to the attention of the court.) See also S v Mvelasi 2005 (2) SACR 266 (O)(Regarding the ambit of the state's duty to disclose real evidence at trial.)

[3] IC s 23 read, in relevant part: '[e]very person shall have the right of access to all information held by the state or any of its organs at any level of government in so far as such information is required for the exercise or protection of any of his or her… rights'.

S v Rowand makes no direct reference to the distinction between the contents of the access to information clauses in the Interim Constitution and Final Constitution.[4] However, the content of the judgment implies that the High Court was cognisant of the change in wording. Labuschagne J held that the prosecution could not deny access to information on the basis that it was not contained in the collection of documents labelled the 'docket'.[5] Nor could the prosecution avoid disclosure by attempting to draw a superfluous distinction between the 'prosecution' and the 'state'. These conclusions are entirely in keeping with the purpose of FC s 32 and the holding of the Constitutional Court in Shabalala.

The most interesting finding in Rowand is that the relevance of the requested documents to the accused is not a factor in determining whether they should be disclosed. This part of holding constitutes a notable departure from Shabalala. Shabalala permitted the state to deny access if the accused did not require the information to exercise his right to a fair trial. However, as noted above, FC s 32 and PAIA do not require that the information be necessary to protect a right. Relevance should no longer be seen as a requirement for access. Nevertheless, the state must be able to invoke the limitations clause to protect itself from vexatious requests for information (designed, inevitably, to force the wheels of justice to grind even more slowly.) In Rowand, however, the state did not invoke any legislation to limit the otherwise untrammelled right to access in FC s 32.

Shabalala was not entirely clear about the point in the proceedings at which an accused becomes entitled to access the docket. The right to such information only

[1] FC s 32 reads:

(1) Everyone has the right of access to —
   (a) any information held by the state; and
   (b) any information that is held by another person and that is required for the exercise or protection of any rights.

(2) National legislation must be enacted to give effect to this right, and may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state.

[2] Act 2 of 2000.

[3] But see PFE International v Industrial Development Corporation of SA 2011 (4) SA 24 (KZD)(Motala AJ held that s 7 of PAIA did not exclude the operation of PAIA where it was invoked to facilitate the production of or access to records required for civil litigation where there was no rule of court that made provision for such access. Consequently, it held that PAIA could be invoked where the records required were in the possession of person who was a party to the civil proceedings and the records in question were required prior to trial (eg for the purposes of pleading.) This decision was recently overturned in PFE International Inc (BUI) & Others v Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa Ltd 2013 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2013 (1) BCLR 55 (CC), [2012] ZACC 21. See also Kerkhoff v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2011 (2) SACR 109 (GNP)(The High Court held that the raw data compiled by a third party in order to assist the state in assessing whether it was in the child's interest to testify through an intermediary in terms of s 170A of the CPA did not form part of the police docket. The applicant should have sought access to the documentation in terms of the relevant provisions of PAIA.)

[4] 2009 (2) SACR 450 (W).

[5] Ibid at paras 17–18.

arises once the accused has been charged.[1] However, even then, the right to docket access is not automatic and the prosecution is entitled to resist disclosure.[2] Access to the docket may also be refused when the court is asked to grant bail.[3] Here, as elsewhere, the court retains the discretion to override prosecutorial refusal.[4]

One might be tempted to ask whether courts ought to be in a position to determine whether a refusal, or failure to disclose infringes the right to a fair trial. In S v Crossberg,[5] Navsa JA considered whether the failure to disclose the statements of a number of witnesses had impaired the accused's right to a fair trial and, if so, what the appropriate remedy should be. In canvassing his options, Navsa JA leaned heavily upon the following passages from the judgment of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Taillefer:

> First, the onus is on the accused to demonstrate that there is a reasonable possibility that the verdict might have been different but for the Crown's failure to disclose all of the relevant evidence. The accused does not have the heavy burden of demonstrating that it is probable or certain that the fresh evidence would have affected the verdict. … As this court held in Dixon: "[i]mposing a test based on reasonable possibility strikes a fair balance between an accused's interest in a fair trial and the public's interest in the efficient administration of justice. It recognises the difficulty of reconstructing accurately the trial process and avoids the undesirable effect of undermining the Crown's disclosure obligations. …
>
> Second. Applying this test requires that the appellate court determine that there was a reasonable possibility that the jury, with the benefit of all the relevant evidence, might have had a reasonable doubt as to the acccused's guilt. … [A]n overall effort must be made to reconstruct the overall picture of the evidence that would have been presented to the jury had it not been for the Crown's failure to disclose the relevant evidence. Whether there is a reasonable possibility that the verdict might have been different must be determined having regard to the evidence in its entirety.[6]

Navsa JA noted that, in Taillefer, the Supreme Court of Canada had distinguished between: (a) the inquiry into whether disclosure would have had an impact on the outcome of the trial; and (b) the inquiry into the overall fairness of the trial. In the circumstances of the case, the Crossberg court found that the missing statements were 'highly relevant to the outcome and to the issue of a fair trial'.[7] In sum, the probative value of the undisclosed statements was relevant to the outcome and the dishonesty of the police rendered the trial unfair.

In practice, it seems that the two inquiries will inevitably be closely connected. To demonstrate the difficulty in drawing a distinction between 'outcome' and

---

[1] Park-Ross v Director: Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C).

[2] See, generally, DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 604–615; PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) 171–175.

[3] See s 60(14) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 and S v Dlamini, S v Dladla, S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC). See also PAIA s 39(1)(a)(Permits officials to refuse PAIA requests for information that is covered by s 60(14) of the CPA.)

[4] Presiding officers have a duty to advise unrepresented accused of their right of access to the docket. See S v Shiburi 2004 (2) SACR 314 (W).

[5] 2008 (2) SACR 317 (SCA).

[6] (2004) 114 CRR (2d) 60 (SCC) at paras 81–2 quoted in Crossberg (supra) at paras 77–78.

[7] Crossberg (supra) at para 80 (my emphasis).

'fairness', consider the following question: would the unethical behaviour of the police result in an unfair trial if their actions would have had no bearing on the outcome of the trial? The answer is no. As a result, the two inquiries are invariably linked.[1]

In Prinsloo v Bramley Children's Home, the applicants, who were also the accused in respect of a charge involving two children (cited as the second and third respondents) made application for information not contained in the police docket.[2] The applicants sought access to the personal files of the two children kept by the Children's Home. The applicants sought the files in the hope that they might discover that the children had previously been involved in sexual misbehaviour or improper conduct. The court held that the right to a fair trial included 'the right to information in the possession of the State and possibly State witnesses in order to enable the applicants to prepare properly for their defence'.[3] However, it concluded that the requests for access in the instant matter were 'vague, superficial and unsupported by factual allegations'.[4] Furthermore, the applicants' fair trial rights had to be weighed against the children's right to privacy, emotional and psychological integrity and dignity in the context of a constitutional injunction that '[a] child's best interest is of paramount importance in every matter concerning the child'.[5] The applicants therefore bore the onus of establishing that the resultant infringements of the children's rights in the event of the success of the application were justified. Release of the requested information would be justifiable if the information was essential to the applicants' defence and if access was necessary at this stage of the proceedings to enable them to prepare their defence: '[T]hey must prove on a balance of probabilities that, unless the information sought is obtained immediately, their right to a fair trial will be irreparably infringed.'[6] The court noted that a party wishing to obtain information not contained in the police docket from a third party must establish the relevance of the evidence that is sought and that this showing must be done with reference to the issues between the state and the applicant. This 'test' for the release of documents would, in effect, require the applicants to disclose the basis of their defence.[7] This early disclosure of the applicants' defence did not infringe the right to remain silent as the choice as to whether to disclose remained with [1] Mlambo JA, dissenting, reached the surprising conclusion that the non-disclosure had a minimal impact on the outcome of the trial. For a contrary view, supporting the conclusion of Navsa JA, see Crossberg (supra) at paras 153–156 (Ponnan JA, in a separate judgment, rebuts Mlambo JA's conclusion that non-disclosure was immaterial.) See also Mngomezulu v NDPP 2008 (1) SACR 105 (SCA); S v Rozani; Rozani v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape 2009 (1) SACR 540 (C); S v Makiti [1997] 1 All SA 291 (B); S v Naude 2005 (2) SACR 218 (W); S v Mvelasi 2005 (2) SACR 266 (O).

[2] 2005 (2) SACR 2 (T)('Bramley Children's Home').

[3] Ibid at 8i–j.

[4] Ibid at 7f.

[5] FC s 28(2).

[6] Bramley Children's Home (supra) at 12a.

[7] Given that the applicants hoped to turn up some prior sexual history, they would also have had to satisfy the relevance requirements of s 227 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. See § 52.8*(d)* infra.

the applicant. The applicant had to accept the consequences of disclosure and non-disclosure.[1]

52.6 Right to adduce and challenge evidence

The right to a fair trial includes the right to adduce and challenge evidence.[2] This right affects both the rules governing the admissibility of evidence and the conduct of presiding officers. Presiding officers must ensure that unrepresented accused are aware of their right to adduce evidence and must assist accused in exercising their right to testify.[3] Ntsebeza AJ, in S v Ismail held that a magistrate had been responsible, inter alia, for two gross irregularities: excluding relevant evidence and failing to give the accused an opportunity to address the court on the admissibility of the evidence.[4] In S v Muller, the High Court held that the right to a public trial embraces the right to adduce and to challenge evidence: these rights, in turn, encompass the right to address the court on the merits.[5]

(a) Cross-examination

The failure to allow cross-examination will generally be viewed as a serious irregularity that encroaches upon the accused's right to a fair trial.[6] Presiding officers have a duty to advise unrepresented accused of their right to cross-examine and to provide an explanation as to how this procedure should be undertaken.[7]

What are the consequences if an accused is denied the right to cross-examine? The High Court in S v Nnasolu[8] held that a magistrate's failure to allow the accused to cross-examine a state witness on a relevant aspect of his testimony constituted both an irregularity at common law and an infringement of the accused's constitutional right to adduce and challenge evidence.[9] While the Nnasolu court excluded that part of the evidence that had not been subject to cross-examination, it held that the irregularity had not resulted in a 'failure of justice'. In reaching this conclusion, the court applied the test set out in S v Msithing:

> [A] fundamental irregularity which violates an accused's right to a fair trial must result in a failure of justice. If the irregularity is not of a fundamental nature, the focus shifts to what would have happened but for the irregularity. The setting aside of the conviction based on the violation of the right to a fair trial in circumstances of a minor 'tainting' of the proceedings will undermine the 'pressing social need' to prosecute crime.[10]

---

[1] See S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC). See § 52.4*(b)* supra, for further discussion of the right to remain silent.

[2] FC s 35(3)(i).

[3] S v Matladi 2002 (2) SACR 447 (T).

[4] 2006 (1) SACR 593 (C).

[5] 2005 (2) SACR 451 (C).

[6] S v Heslop 2007 (1) SACR 461, 473 (SCA). See S v Mgudu 2008 (1) SACR 71 (N); S v Kok 2005 (2) SACR 240 (NC); R v Ndawo 1961 (1) SA 16 (N); S v Malatji 1998 (2) SACR 622 (W). See also S v Manqaba 2005 (2) SACR 489 (W)(See further discussion at § 52.6 infra).

[7] S v Ndou 2006 (2) SACR 497 (T); S v Tyebela 1989 (2) SA 22 (A).

[8] 2010 (1) SACR 561 (KZP).

[9] Ibid at paras 16–18.

[10] 2006 (1) SACR 266, 273 (N).

Having set out the above test, the Nnasolu court reached the conclusion that the irregularity was not fundamental. This approach creates some uncertainty as to the proper relationship between the 'failure of justice' standard and the 'but for' test. Stewart AJ's reasoning appears to run as follows. Despite the fact that the 'tainted evidence' was integral to the court a quo's reasoning, cross-examination would have made little difference to the weight accorded the evidence. In any event, sufficient evidence had been adduced to sustain a conviction (without the inclusion of the 'tainted evidence'.) The logic of Nnasolu suggests that deciding whether or not an irregularity is 'fundamental' is inevitably tied to the 'but for' test. For a presiding officer to disallow cross-examination on evidence that he or she clearly regards as important to the fact-finding process surely constitutes a serious violation of the fair trial right. The only reason that it should not, arguably, result in a failure of justice is because, in retrospect, the cross-examination would have made no difference to the outcome. This approach may well be an appropriate way of ensuring that the criminal justice system is not undermined by unduly technical acquittals. However, it would be misleading to suggest that a bright line divides the two inquiries. Moreover, it strains credulity to contend that the right to a fair trial has not been limited — even if reasonably and justifiably so.

That strain is also evident in the Nnasolu court's succinct justification for the exclusion of the tainted evidence: 'In the result, the magistrate's refusal to allow … cross-examination was an irregularity and the evidence elicited by the magistrate with regard to the voice identification must consequently be excluded'.[1] A reader can be forgiven for not tracking the High Court's logic. The voice identification evidence in question did not flow from the magistrate's restriction on cross-examination. This evidence existed prior to the restriction. In reaching its conclusion, the Nnasolu court makes no reference to FC s 35(5) or to the common-law discretion to exclude evidence when prejudicial effect exceeds probative value. Nor does the court refer to FC s 38, which might have been invoked as a ground for excluding evidence as a form of 'appropriate relief'. For the sake of doctrinal coherence, it might have been better if the Nnasolu court had elected to accord no weight to the evidence rather than excluding it altogether.

(i) Hearsay

The effective exercise of the court's truth seeking function in adversarial systems is dependent on the parties' ability to present evidence and to cross-examine witnesses. The right to challenge and to adduce evidence can be fulfilled both by calling witnesses and through cross-examination. However, in S v Ndhlovu, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the right to challenge evidence does not necessarily require the right to cross-examine.[2] In Ndhlovu, the Supreme Court of Appeal was required to consider, inter alia, the constitutionality of s 3 of the Law of Evidence Amendment Act.[3] Section 3 governs the admissibility of hearsay evidence. Section 3(4) defines hearsay as 'evidence, whether oral or in writing, the probative value of which depends upon the credibility of any person other than the person giving such evidence'. It is clear from s 3(1) that the general rule is that hearsay evidence is inadmissible subject to three exceptions: (a) where the party against whom the evidence is adduced consents to its admission; (b) where the person upon whose credibility the probative value of the evidence depends testifies; and (c) where a court is of the opinion that it is in the interests of justice that the hearsay be admitted.

[1] S v Nnasolu (supra) at para 18.

[2] S v Ndhlovu 2002 (2) SACR 325 (SCA)('Ndhlovu SCA'). But see S v Msimango 2010 (1) SACR 544 (GSJ).

[3] Act 45 of 1988.

The court in Ndhlovu identified the following disadvantages that may accrue as a result of the admission of hearsay evidence. First, it is 'not subject to the reliability checks applied to first-hand testimony' and secondly, 'its reception exposes the party opposing its proof to the procedural unfairness of not being able to counter effectively inferences that may be drawn from it'.[1] Presumably it was on the basis of such potential prejudice that counsel for the accused based the assertion that the accused's constitutional right to challenge evidence was infringed. The court noted that s 3 is primarily an exclusionary rule and that its significant departure from the common law was intended to create 'supple standards within which courts may consider whether the interests of justice warrant the admission of hearsay notwithstanding the procedural and substantive disadvantages its reception might entail'.[2] Cameron JA held that the criteria to be taken into account in applying the interests of justice test were 'consonant with the Constitution'[3] and reiterated the court's reluctance to admit or rely 'on hearsay evidence which plays a decisive or even significant part in convicting an accused, unless there are compelling justifications for doing so'.[4]

Cameron JA set out a number of criteria that presiding officers ought to consider in order to ensure that an accused's fair trial rights are upheld when 'hearsay evidence' is offered. These criteria require judges: (a) to actively guard against the inadvertent admission or 'venting' of hearsay evidence;[5] (b) to ensure that the significance of the contents of s 3 are properly explained to an unrepresented accused;[6] and (c) to protect an accused from 'the late or unheralded admission of hearsay evidence'.[7] These requirements are not to be found in the 1988 Act but rather in the courts' application of the Act.

In S v Molimi, the Constitutional Court emphasised the import of the third of these safeguards: the importance of a timeous, clear and unambiguous ruling on admissibility.[8] It stressed that there is no burden on the accused to request clarification from the presiding officer: 'There is no obligation on the defence to assist the prosecution in the execution of its duties and the advancement of its case. If that were so, an unwarranted burden would be imposed on the accused who has to contend with the allegations levelled against him or her. That might

[1] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 13. See also Harksen v Attorney General Cape 1999 (1) SA 718 (C).
[2] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 14. See also Makhathini v Road Accident Fund 2002 (1) SA 511 (SCA).
[3] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 16.
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] See also S v Zimmerie 1989 (3) SA 484, 492 F–H (C); S v Ramavhale 1996 (1) SACR 639, 651c (A).
[6] See also S v Ngwani 1990 (1) SACR 449 (N).
[7] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 18. See also S v Ralukukwe 2006 (2) SACR 394 (SCA).
[8] 2008 (3) SA 608 (CC), 2008 (5) BCLR 451 (CC), 2008 (2) SACR 76 (CC), [2008] ZACC 2.

also have the potential of increasing the risk of convictions which are likely not to be in accordance with justice.'[1] Nkabinde J stressed that the failure to pay proper attention to appropriate procedural guards set out in Ndhlovu — such as the timeous and unambiguous ruling on the admissibility of evidence — would likely undermine the accused's right to a fair trial and threaten the legitimacy of judicial proceedings.[2]

In Ndhlovu, Cameron JA had also underscored the 'rigorous legal framework' created by s 3 and referred to the level of scrutiny to which a decision to admit hearsay evidence is subject.[3] The point is that a decision to admit evidence is not simply an exercise of judicial discretion but a decision of law that can be overruled by an appeal court.[4] The court also noted that the manner in which s 3 regulates the admission of hearsay evidence is 'in keeping with developments in other democratic societies based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.[5] It concluded that the constitutional right to challenge evidence had not been infringed. The crux of the court's reasoning is found in the following passage:

> It has correctly been observed that the admission of hearsay evidence 'by definition denies an accused the right to cross-examine', since the declarant is not in court and cannot be cross-examined. I cannot accept, however, that 'use of hearsay evidence by the State violates the accused's right to challenge evidence by cross-examination', if it is meant that the inability to cross-examine the source of a statement in itself violates the right to 'challenge' evidence. The Bill of Rights does not guarantee an entitlement to subject all evidence to cross-examination. What it contains is the right (subject to limitation in terms of s 36) to 'challenge evidence'. Where that evidence is hearsay, the right entails that the accused is entitled to resist its admission and to scrutinise its probative value, including its reliability. The provisions enshrine these entitlements. But where the interests of justice, constitutionally measured, require that hearsay evidence be admitted, no constitutional right is infringed. Put differently, where the interests of justice require that the hearsay statement be admitted, the right to 'challenge evidence' does not encompass the right to cross-examine the original declarant.[6]

Although not expressly articulated, Cameron JA's interpretation of the right to challenge evidence rejects a notional approach to the interpretation of rights. Woolman describes this (common, if undesirable) approach as follows: 'an interpretive method which holds that any activity … which could notionally fall within the ambit of a right would be protected'.[7] There can be little doubt that the right to challenge evidence must ordinarily include the right to cross-examine. The admission of hearsay evidence, by virtue of the definition of hearsay, excludes the cross-examination of the person upon whom the probative value depends. Therefore we must assume that the Supreme Court of Appeal eschewed a notional approach and adopted what Woolman describes elsewhere as a value-

[1] S v Molimi (supra) at para 40.
[2] Ibid at paras 41-42.
[3] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 22.
[4] See McDonald's Corporation v Joburgers Drive-Inn Restaurant (Pty) Ltd 1997 (1) SA 1, 27E (A).
[5] Ndhlovu SCA (supra) at para 23.
[6] Ibid at para 24.
[7] S Woolman 'Beinash v Ernst & Young: The Right Consistency' (1999) 15 SAJHR 166, 173.

based approach to rights interpretation.[1] Had it not done so, the Supreme Court of Appeal would have been forced to engage in the second, justificatory stage of limitations analysis.[2] This reading of Ndhlovu — and its value-based approach to rights analysis — is confirmed by the Constitutional Court in S v Molimi. Nkabinde J held that the Ndhlovu approach 'may be understood as narrowing the ambit of the right to challenge evidence as guaranteed in [FC s 35(3)(i)]'.[3] The Molimi Court declined to decide whether Ndhlovu was, in fact and in law, correct.

In S v Libazi,[4] the Supreme Court of Appeal adopted a more generous approach to the interpretation of FC s 35(3)(i). The Libazi court had to consider whether the court a quo had correctly admitted an extra-curial admission by a co-accused who had implicated the appellant, but who had died prior to trial. It noted that the right to cross-examine is integral to the accused's capacity to assert actively his rights of defence. The court, whilst questioning the correctness of the Ndhlovu approach, did not disavow it. Instead Mlambo JA distinguished the two cases on the basis that in Ndhlovu the maker of the statement in question had testified but disavowed the content of his 'hearsay' statement, whereas in Libazi the maker of the statement was absent (having died). Furthermore, the absent declarant was an accomplice, to which a well-established cautionary rule applied. These two factors would militate against the admission of the statement, even if one adopted the Ndhlovu approach.

(ii) Cross-examination of the child witness

CPA s 170A permits a court to appoint a person as an intermediary through whom examination, cross-examination and re-examination of a child will take place. In K v The Regional Court Magistrate NO, the court rejected the argument that s 170A infringed the right to cross-examine and consequently concluded that there was no necessity to enter into a limitations analysis.[5] This position accords with the view expressed by the South African Law Commission that the use of an intermediary would not inhibit the purpose of cross-examination: '[t]he purpose of "translated" cross-examination is not to weaken intelligent and even sharp cross-examination, but rather to limit aggressiveness and intimidation towards the [1] See also S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] For a more detailed discussion of this case, see PJ Schwikkard 'The Challenge to Hearsay' (2003) 120 SALJ 63. Challenges based on the right to adduce and challenge evidence were also rejected by the courts in the following cases: S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC) at para 21 (Held that s 72(4) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 did not infringe the right to adduce and challenge evidence); S v Dodo 2001 (1) SACR 301 (E)(The court held that s 51(1) and s 51(3) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 (minimum sentencing provisions) affected the weight to be attached to evidence and did not infringe the right to adduce and challenge evidence); S v Van der Sandt 1997 (2) SACR 116 (W)(The court rejected an argument that s 212 curtailed the right to cross-examine.)

[3] Molimi (supra) at para 47.

[4] 2010 (2) SACR 233 (SCA).

[5] K v The Regional Court Magistrate NO 1996 (1) SACR 434 (E).

child witness'.[1] The child witness also has the right to be protected against unfair cross-examination.[2]

The High Court in S v Mokoena, S v Phaswane ('Mokoena') raised, mero motu, concerns about the constitutionality of legislation regulating the testimony of a child witness.[3] Bertelsmann J concluded that ss 153, 158, 164 (read with ss 162 and 163, 192 and 206) and s 170A of the Criminal Procedure Act[4] ('CPA') were, in terms of FC s 28,[5] unconstitutional.[6] In addition to the specific protections afforded children by FC s 28, Bertelsmann J relied upon the Children's Act,[7] international law and the extensive literature on the topic, to arrive at the conclusion that the child victim and child witness were extremely vulnerable and disadvantaged participants in adversarial criminal procedures. Within this hotly contested framework, courts must ensure that children 'are protected from further trauma and are treated with proper respect for their dignity and their unique status as vulnerable young human beings'.[8]

In terms of s 170A of the CPA, a child witness would only receive the protections afforded by the Act — intermediaries — if the court concluded that testifying would cause the witness 'undue stress'. Unfortunately, the phrase had been interpreted in some High Court cases to require something more than the 'ordinary stress' of a young victim in a sexual offence cases.[9] For Bertelsmann J, the requirement of 'undue stress' placed a limitation upon the best interests of the child that was neither rational nor justifiable when weighed up against the legitimate concerns of the accused, the court and the public interest. The child is entitled as of right to a procedure that eliminates as much as possible of the anguish that accompanies the necessity of having to relive the horror of abuse, violation, rape, assault or deprivation that the child experienced when he or she became a victim or witness. To demand an extraordinary measure of stress

[1] For a more detailed discussion of s 170A and decided cases, see E Du Toit et al Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2011) 22–30A — 32C; PJ 'Schwikkard 'The Abused Child: A Few Rules of Evidence Considered' (1996) Acta Juridica 148. See also S v Domingo 2005 (1) SACR 193 (C); S v Staggie 2003 (1) SACR 232 (C); PJ Schwikkard & SE van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) 381; S v F 1999 (1) SACR 571 (C)(Section 158 may be used to allow other vulnerable witnesses to testify via closed circuit television.)

[2] Tshona & Others v Regional Magistrate, Uitenhage & Another 2001 (8) BCLR 860 (E). The courts have recognized some limits to the protection afforded to the child witness. See, for example, S v Manqaba 2005 (2) SACR 489 (W)(Court held that the presiding officer's refusal to allow cross-examination of the 12 year old rape complainant on the basis of a previous inconsistent statement infringed the accused's fair trial right to adduce and to challenge evidence.) See also R v Ndawo 1961 (1) SA 16 (N).

[3] 2008 (5) SA 578 (T), 2008 (2) SACR 216 (T)('Mokoena').

[4] Act 51 of 1977.

[5] A Pantazis, A Friedman & A Skelton 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, July 2009) Chapter 47.

[6] Many of these provisions had already been amended by the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act 32 of 2007.

[7] Act 38 of 2005 (Section 42(8) 'emphasises that the proceedings of the children's courts should be held in a locality that should be specifically adapted to put children at ease and should be conducive to an informal conduct of proceedings'. Mokoena (supra) at para 43.)

[8] Mokoena (supra) at para 50.

[9] See S v Stefaans 1999 (1) SACR 182 (C); S v F 1999 (1) SACR 571 (C).

or anguish before the assistance of an intermediary can be called upon clearly discriminates against the child and is constitutionally untenable.[1]

The High Court concluded that s 170A(1) was unconstitutional in so far as it granted a court a discretion as to whether to appoint an intermediary in respect of child witnesses in criminal proceedings and ordered that the section be read to mandate the appointment of intermediaries.[2]

The High Court's declarations of invalidity were referred to the Constitutional Court for confirmation. In DPP v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Ngcobo J rejected the High Court's declarations of invalidity.[3] He held that if '[p]roperly interpreted and applied in the light of FC s 28(2)', s 170A(1) served to protect the best interests of the child complainant.[4] The Constitutional Court held that previous inconsistency in the interpretation and application of s 170A by the High Courts[5] should not lead to a finding of constitutional invalidity.[6] Justice Ngcobo sought, instead, to lay down guidelines for a constitutionally consistent implementation of s 170A. First, the meaning of the phrase 'undue mental stress or suffering' should be interpreted in accordance with the objective of s 170A: 'to protect child complainants from exposure to undue mental stress or suffering when they give evidence in court'.[7] Second, 'it must be accepted that a child complainant in a sexual offence who testifies without the assistance of an intermediary faces a high risk of exposure to undue mental stress or suffering'.[8] Third, a child need not 'first be exposed to undue mental or suffering, before an intermediary may be appointed'.[9] Fourth, it should be standard practice for a child to be assessed prior to testifying in order to determine whether an intermediary ought to be appointed.[10] Fifth, presiding officers have a duty in each case to enquire whether an intermediary should be appointed (including where the prosecution fails to bring an application for an intermediary).[11] Presiding officers, in making this determination must 'apply the best-interests principle by considering how the child's rights and interests are, or will be, affected by allowing the child complainant in a sexual offence case to testify without the aid of an intermediary'.[12] Sixth,

[1] Mokoena (supra) at para 79.

[2] Ibid at para 85 (Court ordered that the section should read as follows: 'Subject to subsection(4), whenever criminal proceedings are pending before any court in which any witness under the biological or mental age of eighteen years is to testify, the court shall appoint a competent person as an intermediary for each witness under the biological age of eighteen years in order to enable such witness to give his or her evidence through that intermediary as contemplated in this section, unless there are cogent reasons not to appoint such intermediary, in which event the court shall place such reasons on record before the commencement of proceedings, and the court may appoint a competent person for a witness under the mental age of eighteen years in order to give his or her evidence through that intermediary.')

[3] 2009 (4) SA 222 (CC), 2009 (7) BCLR 637 (CC), 2009 (2) SACR 130 (CC), [2009] ZACC 8 ('DPP').

[4] Ibid at para 177.

[5] Ibid at para 81.

[6] Ibid at para 117.

[7] Ibid at para 100.

[8] Ibid at para 109.

[9] Ibid at para 110.

[10] Ibid at para 111.

[11] Ibid at para 112.

[12] Ibid at para 113.

the inquiry into the desirability of appointing an intermediary is not one which[1] attracts a burden of proof: 'It is an enquiry which is conducted on behalf of the interests of a person who is not party to the proceedings but who possesses constitutional rights.'[2] Seventh, the DPP Court found that a discretion whether or not to appoint an intermediary was necessary in order to ensure that each child's individual interests were met;[3] in some cases it might be in the child's best interest to directly confront the accused.[4]

Despite creating these constitutionally compliant guidelines for reading CPA s 170A, the Court acknowledged that court proceedings were generally traumatic for a child witness, and that, as a result, the appointment of an intermediary would likely enhance the truth-seeking function of the trial court. The Court's goal in saving s 170A was the creation of an environment 'conducive to a trial that is fair to all'.[5]

Although Bertelsmann J was overturned, his objective — ensuring the appointment of intermediaries in all cases involving child witnesses — might yet be achieved. If properly construed, then the principles enunciated by the Constitutional Court in DPP should make it virtually impossible for a court, (particularly in a sexual offence case) to avoid the appointment of an intermediary for a child.[6] However, given the well-entrenched, and somewhat conservative, practices of the bench, the 'best interests of the child' would have been better served if entrenched in amendments to the CPA or in an entirely new piece of legislation.

Section 158(5) of the CPA requires a court to provide reasons for refusing an application for a child complainant to give evidence by means of closed-circuit television, if the child is below the age of 14 years. Section 170A(7) creates an identical obligation when a court refuses an application for the appointment of an intermediary. Bertelsmann J in Mokoena held that the discrimination between children above and below the age of 14 was irrationally discriminatory and unconstitutional. Courts, he held, should always provide reasons.

In DPP v Minister of Justice, the Constitutional Court found that neither sections precluded the giving of reasons for children over the age of 14. Interpreted in light of the Constitution, the sections required the courts to give reasons no matter the age of the child. The wording of the sections merely emphasised the additional vulnerability of younger children by requiring that reasons be given immediately in respect of the younger group. For children over the age of 14, it was acceptable to give reasons at a later stage or at the end of the case.[7] Again the Constitutional Court appears to have avoided a declaration of unconstitutionality but achieved the same objective as the High Court: reasons for all refusals. But here too, it may be that the normative value — and the practical effect — of constitutional interpretation could be enhanced by legislative amendment.

[1] DPP (supra) at para 116. See also P Schwikkard 'The Abused Child: A Few Rules of Evidence Considered' (1996) Acta Juridica 148.
[2] DPP (supra) at para 114.
[3] Ibid at para 123
[4] Ibid at para 127.
[5] Ibid at para 114.
[6] See Kerkhoff v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2011 (2) SACR 109 (GNP).
[7] DPP (supra) at para 161.

(iii) The hostile witness

At common law, a party may not cross-examine their own witness unless the court has declared the witness hostile. In Chambers v Mississipi, the United States Supreme Court questioned the rationale of the rule.[1] Normally, a party who calls a witness vouches for the credibility of that witness. The Chambers Court held that, under the circumstances, the rule infringed the accused's right to defend himself. The lack of a coherent rationale for this rule — inherited from English law — makes it difficult to disagree with Van der Merwe's assertion that the rule needs to be reconsidered in the context of the accused's right to a fair trial.[2]

(b) Record of bail application

The right to adduce evidence includes the right to testify, to call witnesses[3] and if necessary to receive assistance in ensuring that defence witnesses are able to attend court.[4] In S v Aimes, the court was required to solve the following dilemma: could the record of accused No 1's bail application, which had been unconstitutionally obtained, be adduced by accused No 2.[5] It was clear that the admission of the bail record would render the trial unfair in respect of accused No 1, at the same time that its exclusion would render the trial unfair in respect of accused No 2. No 2's right to adduce evidence would be violated. The court ruled that the bail record of accused No 1 could be admitted for the sole purpose of assisting accused No 2 in his defence, subject to the proviso that it was not admissible against accused No 1.[6]

Bail applications often involve unrepresented accused. The courts have repeatedly held that a duty rests upon a presiding officer to assist the unrepresented accused in exercising his or her right to adduce and to challenge evidence.[7]

However, the reach of trial fairness extends beyond the accused. In S v Basson, the Constitutional Court was seized with an appeal against the acquittal of Dr Wouter Basson.[8] One of the issues before the court was the admissibility of the bail record. At the bail proceedings in question, the state had made use of the record of prior proceedings conducted under the Investigation of Serious

[1] 410 US 284 (1973).

[2] Schwikkard & Van der Merwe (supra) at 459. While we believe the rule undesirable, the justification for the rule remains coherent. Witnesses may offer their support in pre-trial depositions and affidavits, and even agree to lend support in open court. However, as both English and American courts have made transparent, a witness may change her story for any number of reasons (ie, intimidation, animus or a genuine inability to stand up to cross-examination in the courtroom.)

[3] See S v Younas 1996 (2) SACR 272 (C); S v Gwala 1989 (4) SA 937 (N).

[4] See Pennington v Minister of Justice 1995 (3) BCLR 270 (C). See, generally, N Steytler Constitutional Criminal Procedure (1998) 345.

[5] S v Aimes 1998 (1) SACR 343 (C).

[6] See also S v Jeniker (2) 1993 (2) SACR 464 (C).

[7] See, for example, S v Simxadi 1997 (1) SACR 169 (C); S v Stowitzki 1995 (2) SA 525 (NmHC); S v Sishi [2000] 2 All SA 56 (N), S v Dyani 2004 (2) SACR 365 (E); S v Mungoni 1997 (2) SACR 366 (V), 1997 (8) BCLR 1083 (V).

[8] 2007 (3) SA 582 (CC), 2005 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC), 2007 (1) SACR 566 (CC), [2005] ZACC 10 ('Basson').

Economic Offences Act ('ISEO').[1] In terms of ISEO a witness examined under s 5(6) may not claim the privilege against self-incrimination.[2] However, the section also provides that the record of the examination may not be used in subsequent criminal proceedings against the witness. Dr Basson had been questioned for 39 days under the ISEO, without legal representation. His examiner turned out to be the same person who represented the state in Basson's subsequent bail proceedings.

At trial, prior to pleading, the defence applied for a ruling on the admissibility of the bail proceedings. The trial court found the record of the bail proceedings to be inadmissible. The state appealed against this ruling on two bases: (1) the trial court should not have heard argument on the admissibility of the bail record at such an early stage; and (2) the trial court should not have made a ruling on the inadmissibility of the entire record. The Supreme Court of Appeal declined to deal with the issue on the ground that it arose from matters of fact and did not concern a question of law.

The Basson Court held that the SCA had erred. It concluded that the admissibility of the bail record was a constitutional matter.[3] Although CPA s 60(11B)(c) stipulates that the record of the bail proceedings should form part of the trial record, the Constitutional Court had previously held in S v Dlamini[4] that the trial court retains a discretion to exclude the bail record if its admission would render the trial unfair. Given the Constitutional Court's clear and repeated view that a trial court 'is best placed to determine what will constitute a fair trial or not',[5] the Justices turned their minds to devising a means of evaluating the trial court's exercise of that discretion. It held:

> [T]he test on appeal is not whether the trial Court was correct in the exercise of its discretion to exclude evidence on the grounds that it may render the trial unfair. The question is whether … the lower Court has not exercised its discretion judicially, or been influenced by wrong principles of law or a misdirection on the facts, or reached a decision which could not reasonably have been made by a court properly directing itself to all the relevant facts and legal principles.[6]

After applying this test to the case at hand, the Basson Court concluded that no grounds existed to interfere with the exercise of the trial court's discretion either in regard to the timing of argument, or the scope of the ruling.[7] The state had not argued that the exclusion of the bail record had rendered the trial unfair. And as the Court noted: 'An allegation that an interlocutory ruling was wrongly made which may have had a material impact on the outcome of a case is not sufficient to demonstrate that the trial was unfair'.[8] The nature of the interlocutory proceedings meant that the ruling 'could have been revisited at any point during the

[1] Act 117 of 1991.
[2] Section 5(8).
[3] Basson (supra) at para 12.
[4] 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC), [1999] ZACC 8.
[5] Basson (supra) at para 109.
[6] Ibid at para 117.
[7] Ibid at para 119.
[8] Ibid at para 120.

trial'.[1] One striking theme running through the Basson Court's deliberations is the acceptance of the proposition that in determining the admissibility of evidence, considerations of trial fairness apply both to the accused and the prosecution.[2]

(c) State privilege

State privilege allows a government to assert that information in its possession is privileged from disclosure in court on the basis that it would be against the public interest to disclose such information. The question that then arises is whether a court can override the claim of state privilege in the interests of justice.

At common law, Duncan v Cammel Laird was taken as authority for the proposition that the executive had the final say in state privilege cases and that the courts had no power to override a clear assertion of privilege by an appropriate executive official.[3] Post-1961, the English courts departed from this position whilst the South African courts remained bound by Duncan. However, 1967 marked a decisive shift. In Van der Linde v Calitz[4] the Appellate Division chose to follow the Privy Council in Robinson v State of South Australia (No 2)[5] rather than the House of Lords in Duncan. The Appellate Division held that the court had the final say as to whether state privilege should be upheld. However, it left open the question as to whether the court also possessed such power with respect to issues of national security. Section 29 of the General Law Amendment Act answered this question. It ousted the courts' jurisdiction in respect of a claim of state privilege pertaining to state security. This ouster clause was incorporated into s 66 of the Internal Security Act.[6] After the repeal of the Internal Security Act in 1996, the common law was reinstated. It must now, however, be interpreted in light of the Final Constitution.

FC s 35(3)'s right to adduce evidence is not the only provision that will influence the interpretation of the common law of evidence regarding state privilege. FC s 165 vests judicial authority in the courts and enables the courts to determine their own rules. FC s 32(1) provides that everyone has the right to access any information held by the state. FC s 34 ensures access to courts and a fair hearing.

[1] Basson (supra) at para 121.

[2] Ibid at para 113 ('When a trial court assesses the question whether the admission of evidence would render the trial unfair, it has to consider a range of factors: the nature of the evidence in question, and how much of it is of advantage to the parties; the need to be fair not only to the accused but also to the prosecution, in the interests of the broader community; the need to ensure that a trial can run efficiently and reasonably quickly; and the reasons underlying the fact that the admission of the evidence may render the trial unfair. These are complex factors which may well pull in different directions. If the evidence is wrongly admitted and the trial is rendered unfair, the accused will clearly have a right to raise that on appeal and the question for an appeal court will be whether the trial was unfair. The more difficult question arises, as in this case, where the evidence is excluded on the basis that its admission may render the trial unfair. An assessment of whether the evidence would have rendered the trial unfair is inevitably hypothetical and difficult to assess in the relatively rarefied atmosphere of an appellate court. It is indeed a matter which the trial court is best placed to judge.')

[3] [1942] 1 All ER 587 (HL).

[4] 1967 (2) SA 239 (A).

[5] 1931 AC 704.

[6] Act 74 of 1982.

Joffe J, in Swissborough Diamond Mines (Pty) Ltd v Government of the Republic of South Africa, held that in light of the Final Constitution the following approach should be taken in dealing with a claim of state privilege:

1. The Court is not bound by the ipse dixit of any cabinet minister or bureaucrat irrespective of whether the objection is taken to a class of documents or a specific document and irrespective of whether it relates to matters of State security, military operations, diplomatic relations, economic affairs, cabinet meetings or any other matter affecting the public interest.
2. The Court is entitled to scrutinise the evidence in order to determine the strength of the public interest affected and the extent to which the interests of justice to a litigant might be harmed by its non-disclosure.
3. The Court has to balance the extent to which it is necessary to disclose the evidence for the purpose of doing justice against the public interest in its non-disclosure.
4. In this regard the onus should be on the State to show why it is necessary for the information to remain hidden.
5. In a proper case that Court should call for oral evidence, in camera where necessary, and should permit cross-examination of any witnesses or probe the validity of the objection itself.[1]

The above five principles track those first formulated by Zeffertt, Paizes and Skeen who add a sixth principle:

> [T]he onus borne by the state is widely regarded as being a heavy one which is not discharged by vague appeals to considerations of candour or emotive reliance on such things as 'national security' and 'diplomatic relations' (or both), but requires the state to show (i) the likelihood (as opposed to the possibility) of particular (as opposed to generic) injury; and (ii) that this injury is greater than that which would be caused to the interests of justice by non-disclosure.[2]

Finally, Van der Merwe suggests that after a court has inspected a document in private, then it should, in certain circumstances, be permitted to grant partial disclosure in order to best accommodate the competing interests of the parties.[3]

(d) Informer's privilege

The informer's privilege can be viewed as a form of state privilege. In terms of this privilege, no question may be asked and no document may be received in evidence that would tend to reveal the identity of an informer or the content of the information supplied by him. The court must ensure that this privilege is upheld regardless of whether the parties to the litigation seek to enforce it.

In Ex parte Minister of Justice: In re Pillay, the court held that the informer's privilege might be relaxed where: (a) it was in the interests of justice; (b) where it was necessary to show the accused's innocence; and (c) where there was no reason for secrecy — say, where everybody knows who the informer is.[1] The constitutionality of this privilege was considered in Els v Minister of Safety and Security.[2] The applicant said that he was entitled to the documents in terms of his constitutional right to access to information. The court found that there was an infringement of the accused's constitutional right of access to information but that it was justifiable. In reaching this conclusion the court took the following factors into consideration: (a) the person who gave the information was an informer who had been used over a number of years and had given information that had led to successful prosecutions; (b) the informer gave the information in confidence; (c) confidentiality was essential to the police-informer relationship; (d) it would be against public interest to expose informers to claims for damages; (e) the police rely heavily on informers; (f) the police had taken adequate steps to ensure that the informer was reliable; (g) disclosing the informer's identity would have far-reaching effects and would be against the public interest in that informers are essential in the battle against organised crime; (h) there was nothing to suggest that the informer was mendacious or malicious; (i) the applicant's interest in claiming damages was outweighed by the public interest in keeping the informer's identity secret. Van der Merwe is of the opinion that the informer's privilege per se is not unconstitutional but that the constitutional right to a fair trial must be considered when deciding whether and when the privilege must yield to constitutional dictates.[3]

[1] 1999 (2) SA 279, 343–344 (T).

[2] DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 655; See also D Zeffertt 'Evidence' (1996) Annual Survey of South African Law 803, 813.

[3] Schwikkard & Van der Merwe (supra) at 164. See also Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Service: In re Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6 (While the Court did not deal directly with state privilege as a rule of evidence, the judgment fully explores the right to open justice.)

(e) Interpretation

The right to adduce and challenge evidence requires compliance with FC s 35(3)(k), which vouchsafes the right 'to be tried in a language that the accused person understands, or, if that is not practicable to have the proceedings interpreted in that language'.[4]

In S v Manzini, Tshiqi J stressed the importance of competent interpretation in ensuring the fairness of a trial.[5] He lamented the 'alarming[ly] poor performance by the interpreter'[6] and concluded that the appellant's constitutional right to a fair trial had been breached as a result. In setting aside the sentence and conviction the court explained:

> A presiding officer … relies on the interpreter to interpret correctly what is being said by a witness. If what is being conveyed to the presiding officer is incorrect, then the presiding officer may not be in a position to make correct findings on contradictions and credibility of witnesses. This would in turn affect the reliability and the evaluation of the evidence of the

[1] 1945 AD 653. See also Khala v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 218 (W); S v Du Toit 2005 (1) SACR 47 (T)(The court refused to grant an order prohibiting the publication of the name of a state witness on the basis that in the circumstances the potential infringement of trial fairness and press freedom outweighed the interests of the witness.)

[2] 1998 (2) SACR 93 (NC). See also Swanepoel v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 1999 (2) SACR 284 (T).

[3] See Schwikkard & Van der Merwe (supra) at 169–170.

[4] For more on FC s 35(3)(k), see F Snyckers & J Le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 51.5(l).

[5] 2007 (2) SACR 107 (W).

[6] Ibid at 108.

> witnesses as a whole. The respective legal representatives, who may not be conversant with the language of the witness, will also not be in a position to conduct proper examination of the witnesses, and may in the end make incorrect submissions to the court.[1]

Binns-Ward AJ raised a similar concern in S v Mponda.[2] Inadequate interpretation had resulted in the poor translation of the accused's evidence into English. Moreover, the evidence adduced against the accused had not been satisfactorily translated into 'a language with which he was sufficiently conversant'.[3] This failure to provide adequate interpretation infringed the accused's right to a fair trial in terms of s 35(3)(k).[4]

The courts' concern with the quality and the regulation of interpretation was reiterated in S v Saidi.[5] Yekiso J noted that s 6(2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act[6] gave effect to FC s 35(3)(k)[7] by providing that if 'evidence is given in a language with which the accused is not in the opinion of the court sufficiently conversant', the court must appoint an interpreter to translate for the accused.[8] This proviso applies irrespective of the language in which the evidence is proferred, and independent of whether the accused's lawyer understands the language in which the evidence is offered. The Magistrates' Court Rules attempt to ensure an appropriate level of interpretation by requiring both permanent and casual interpreters to take an oath that they will interpret 'truly and correctly' and to the best of their ability.[9] Endorsing the approach of Binns-Ward AJ in Mponda, Yekiso J held that a presiding officer should be satisfied that the appointed interpreter has the appropriate expertise, which could be established through questioning, before he or she is sworn in. The record of the court a quo did not reflect any enquiry into the linguistic competency of the interpreter and, in one instance, it remained unclear as to whether the interpreter had been sworn in at all. Yekiso J held that the accused's testimony, as translated by an unsworn interpreter, had the status of unsworn testimony and was consequently inadmissible. This deprived the accused

[1] S v Manzini (supra) at 109.

[2] 2007 (2) SACR 245 (C).

[3] Ibid at para 17.

[4] The court also stressed the importance of ad hoc interpreters being properly sworn in. Ibid at para 34 ('[W]hen the services of an ad hoc interpreter are used in trial proceedings it is essential that the presiding officer formally satisfy him- or herself as to the relevant expertise of the interpreter. This would ordinarily be done by swearing in the interpreter in open court during the proceedings and by appropriately questioning the interpreter to establish his or her linguistic competence before the interpreter commences with the function of interpreting any evidence.') See also S v Naidoo 1962 (2) SA 625 (A).

[5] 2007 (2) SACR 637 (C).

[6] Act 32 of 1944.

[7] Although the reported judgment refers to subsection (c), it is clearly subsection (k) that the court intended to invoke.

[8] Magistrates' Court Act s 6(2) reads: '[i]f, in a criminal case, evidence is given in a language with which the accused is not in the opinion of the court sufficiently conversant, a competent interpreter shall be called by the court in order to translate such evidence into a language with which the accused professes or appears to the court to be sufficiently conversant, irrespective of whether the language in which the evidence is given, is one of the official languages or whether the representative of the accused is conversant with the language used in the evidence or not.'

[9] Magistrates' Court Rule 68(1).

of his constitutional right to adduce and challenge evidence and violated his right to a fair trial.[1]

S v Mbezi represents how extremely deleterious an accused's inability to understand the proceedings can be with respect to her ability to secure a fair trial.[2] During the trial, the presiding magistrate realized that that the accused could neither hear nor understand the proceedings. The accused, who had severely impaired hearing, could neither lip-read nor understand sign language. Despite reasonable attempts by the court a quo to comply with s 35(3)(k) of the Constitution, the accused remained unable to understand the proceedings. This conundrum, Dlodlo J held, meant that it was not possible for the accused to have a fair trial. There was no choice but to conclude that a failure of justice had occurred.[3]

52.7 Equality and dignity

The common law contains a number of rules of evidence that curtail the ability of children and women to give evidence. The invidious distinctions between women and men lack a rational basis and, for the most part, ought to be found constitutionally infirm. The Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act[4] ('Sexual Offences Act') addresses most of these iniquities through significant and much needed changes to the rules of evidence applied in sexual offence cases.

(a) Cautionary rule: Complainants in sexual offence cases

The iniquities of the cautionary rule applicable to complainants in sexual offence cases have been well documented and are, consequently, not repeated here.[5] This rule was soundly rejected by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Jackson. The Jackson court held that the common-law cautionary approach to complainants in sexual offence cases was irrational and had no place in our law.[6] The court in Jackson made it clear that the only instance in which the testimony of a complainant or any witness could be treated with caution was when there was an evidentiary basis for doing so.[7] It was this qualification that led the Law Commission to conclude that Jackson was capable of being interpreted so as to retain the cautionary rule in respect of some sexual offence cases 'because of the nature of the case'.[8] At the time that the Law Commission report was published, this concern about [1] Saidi (supra) at para 21.

[2] 2010 (2) SACR 169 (WCC).

[3] The court ordered that the proceedings be started de novo at the discretion of the Director of Public Prosecutions, 'provided that the apparent disability of the accused 1 be taken care of'. Ibid at para 12.

[4] Act 32 of 2007.

[5] See South African Law Commission, Project 107 Sexual Offences Discussion Paper (2002) at paras 31.2.4.5–31.2.4.10; S Jagwanth & PJ Schwikkard 'An Unconstitutional Cautionary Rule' 1998 (11) SACJ 87; D Symthe & B Pithey (eds) Sexual Offences Commentary Act 32 of 2007 (2011) 23–25.

[6] 1998 (1) SACR 470, 476 (SCA). See also S v Zuma 2006 (2) SACR 191, 212 (W).

[7] See also S v Mponda 2007 (2) SACR 245 (C); S v Cornick 2007 (2) SACR 115 (SCA); S v M 2006 (1) SACR 135 (SCA) (Cameron JA, dissenting) at paras 271–273; S v Gentle 2005 (1) SACR 420 (SCA).

[8] South African Law Commission, Project 107, Sexual Offences Report (2002) 472 at para 31.2.4.7. Cf S v Zuma 2006 (7) BCLR 790, 856 (W).

the exception to the new rule might have been easily dismissed. However, subsequent applications of Jackson by the High Courts appear to have proved the Law Commission right. For example, in S v Van der Ross, Thring J clearly found that the sexual 'nature of the offence' was a matter over and above the single witness status of the complainant and that this single witness status still required the court to take a doubly cautious approach.[1] Any ambiguity that could have been read into Jackson has, hopefully, been eliminated by the Sexual Offences Act. Section 60 of the Act provides that '[n]otwithstanding any other law, a court may not treat the evidence of a complainant in criminal proceedings involving the alleged commission of a sexual offence pending before that court, with caution, on account of the nature of the offence.'

(b) Children

Given the body of literature that indicates that children are able to give reliable evidence,[2] the cautionary rule applicable to the evidence of children is certainly susceptible to constitutional scrutiny. The abolition of the cautionary rule applicable to children was recommended by the Law Commission in its Sexual Offences Report.[3] However, this recommendation does not seem to have found favour with the legislature and is not reflected in the Sexual Offences Act. A possible explanation for the legislature's silence in this regard is that it would not necessarily make sense to abolish the cautionary rule only in respect of children testifying in sexual offence cases. This anomaly could be avoided by providing for appropriate amendments to the Criminal Procedure Act[4] and the Civil Proceedings Evidence Act.[5]

Getting rid of the cautionary rule applicable to children's evidence is by no means a novel idea. In England, the cautionary rule applicable to children's evidence was abrogated by s 34(2) of the Criminal Justice Act of 1988. The Supreme Court of Canada has also rejected the notion that children's testimony is inherently unreliable and consequently needs to be treated with special care.[6]

In line with this international trend, a number of recent cases show a promising shift in the manner in which the cautionary rule is applied to children. In S v MG, the defence challenged the court a quo's findings on credibility on the basis that it had failed to pay sufficient attention to the cautionary rule applicable to a single, child witness.[7] Jones J did not appear to take the age or the single status of the witness, on its own, as cause for diminishing the credibility of the witness. Instead, he took care to sift through the evidence in order to establish the absence or the

[1] S v Van der Ross 2002 (2) SACR 362, 365 (C).
[2] See J Spencer & R Flin The Evidence of Children: The Law and Psychology (1993). See also PJ Schwikkard 'The Abused Child: A Few Rules of Evidence Considered' (1996) Acta Juridica 148.
[3] SALC Sexual Offences Report (supra) at para 5.2.3.
[4] Act 51 of 1977.
[5] Act 25 of 1965.
[6] R v W (R) (1992) 74 CCC (3d) 134. See also S v B (G) (1990) 56 CCC (3d) 200.
[7] 2010 (2) SACR 66 (ECG).

presence of a factual basis for taking a cautionary approach. He summarised his approach as follows:

> It is therefore necessary to examine the quality of the evidence of the single child witness in this case, in the light of the background facts, the inherent probabilities, and her merits and demerits as a witness. What are the weaknesses in the State case? What are the reasons, if any, for the need to apply a cautionary rule to the facts and circumstances of this case?[1]

In South African law, age is not the determining factor in deciding whether a child is competent to testify. Under the Criminal Procedure Act, children will be competent to testify if they can appreciate the duty to tell the truth.[2] The obvious consequence of this state of the law is that presiding officers must inquire as to whether children understand what it means to tell the truth. No similar test is applied to convicted perjurers or to other persons convicted of crimes involving an element of dishonesty. Truth and the duty to tell the truth are abstract notions that a young child might not be able to understand or explain. However, the rarefied nature of such abstractions does not mean that children cannot give a reliable account of relevant events.

Adults are presumed to be competent witnesses and the party alleging incompetence bears the onus of proof.[3] In testing the competence of an adult there may be two inquiries: (i) the witness's ability to understand the nature of the oath; and (ii) the witness's ability to communicate.[4] Where adults do not understand the nature of the oath, they may give unsworn evidence after being admonished to tell the truth.[5] The purpose of administering the oath or admonishing a witness to tell the truth is primarily to encourage the witness to tell the truth.[6] However, in assessing credibility, the court will place little weight, if any, on the fact that a witness took the oath or was admonished to tell the truth. The ability to reason morally does not mean that a person will behave morally. The court, in assessing credibility, will look to such factors as coherence under cross-examination, evidence of surrounding circumstances and demeanour. The fact that a child cannot understand or articulate its understanding of the duty to tell the truth does not necessarily hinder the court in its assessment of credibility. The second leg of the competence inquiry is far more important. Clearly, a child who cannot communicate and who is unable to give an understandable coherent account of the relevant events will be of little assistance to the court. On the other hand, a child who does not understand the duty to speak the truth but who is able to give an accurate account of relevant events will be of great assistance.

---

[1] S v MG (supra) at para 9. See also S v MN 2010 (2) SACR 225 (KZP)(Similar, although less explicit, approach was taken to the cautionary rule.) Cf S v Hanekom 2011 (1) SACR 430 (WCC).

[2] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 164 ('CPA')('Any person, who is found not to understand the nature and import of the oath or the affirmation, may be admitted to give evidence in criminal proceedings without taking the oath or making the affirmation: Provided that such person shall, in lieu of the oath or affirmation, be admonished by the presiding judge or judicial officer to speak the truth.')

[3] See CPA s 192 and s 42 of the Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 25 of 1965.

[4] R v Ranikolo 1954 (3) SA 255 (O). See Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence (12th Edition, 1946); Wigmore on Evidence (Vol II, 3rd Edition) 506, 596.

[5] Section 41 of the Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 25 of 1965, CPA s 164.

[6] S v Munn 1973 (3) SA 734 (NC).

But does the court need to test a child's ability to communicate prior to the child testifying? Wigmore, recognising the difficulties and futility of assessing a child's credibility prior to the child giving evidence, wrote that 'it must be concluded that the sensible way is to put the child upon the stand and let it tell its story for what it may seem worth.'[1] Over a two decades ago in England, the Pigot Committee concluded that the requisite inquiry into the child's ability to tell the truth:

> … appears to be founded upon the archaic belief that children below a certain age or level of understanding are either too senseless or too morally delinquent to be worth listening to at all. It follows that we believe the competence requirement which is applied to potential child witnesses should be dispensed with and that it should not be replaced.[2]

The English legislation was consequently amended to make the sole criterion for competence the ability to communicate with the court.[3]

In the United States, the Federal Rules of Evidence do not distinguish between children and adults, and consequently a child can testify without a preliminary testing of competency.[4] Similarly, in S v Katoo Jafta, AJA (as he then was) held that one way of determining the competency of a 16-year-old 'imbecile' would be to allow the child to testify so that the court could form its own opinion on the witness' ability to provide reliable testimony.[5]

Provided the accused is afforded the opportunity of challenging the evidence of a child witness, it is difficult to see how the abandonment of the competence test could in any way infringe the accused's right to a fair trial. In addition, the requirement that a judge must be satisfied that a child understands the duty to speak the truth before the child is considered a competent witness 'singles out some of society's most vulnerable members for treatment that effectively deprives them of the protection and the vindication of the criminal justice system'.[6] Birch notes that 'child abuse occurs in part because of the inequalities between child and adult in size, knowledge and power' and that these inequalities 'have been institutionalised by one-sided rules of evidence'.[7] The abandonment of the 'competency test' will increase the potential for successful prosecutions and will act as a buttress for a child's constitutional right to security and freedom from abuse.

Consistent with foreign jurisprudence, the South African Law Reform Commission's Sexual Offences Report recommended that the ability to communicate be the sole criterion for determining competence.[8] Once again, this recommendation did not find favour with the legislature.

---

[1] Wigmore (supra) at 509, 601.

[2] Report of the Advisory Group on Video Recorded Evidence (1989).

[3] In England and Wales the applicable legislative provisions are to be found in s 53 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.

[4] See, generally, L McGough Child Witnesses (1994) 98.

[5] 2005 (1) SACR 522, 528a–b (SCA).

[6] A Harvison Young 'Child Sexual Abuse and the Law of Evidence: Some Current Canadian Issues' (1992) 11 Canadian Journal of Family Law 11, 19.

[7] D Birch 'Children's Evidence' (1992) Criminal Law Review 262, 269.

[8] SALRC Sexual Offences Report (supra) at para 4.3.4.

In S v Mokoena; S v Phaswane[1] the High Court declared that the proviso to s 164(1) was unconstitutional and invalid. This result would have made the ability to communicate with the court the sole criteria for competency in respect of children and would have brought South African law into line with other Anglo-American jurisdictions.[2]

Unfortunately, when the Constitutional Court decided the appeal in DPP v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, it found the proviso necessary in order to ensure the accused's right to a fair trial.[3] It reached this conclusion without reference to international law or foreign practice. However, the damage wrought by DPP can be contained if one accepts the proposition that the failure to admonish a child to tell the truth in terms of the proviso in s 164(1) would only render a trail unfair where non-compliance would result in a substantive failure of justice.[4] This gloss on DPP would be one way of promoting the values embedded in FC s 28 without undermining the accused's right to a fair trial.

A closely related question is when should criminal proceedings involving children — whether as accused or as witnesses — be held behind closed doors? The CPA distinguishes between sexual offences and other offences. For sexual offences, s 153(3) permits the complainant (or her parent or guardian) to request that the proceedings be held in camera. Under s 153(3A), when a child testifies in a sexual offence case, the public must be excluded. For non-sexual cases, CPA s 153(5) confers a discretion on the court to hold the trial in camera if one of the witnesses is a child, while s 153(4) requires that the trial must be held in camera where the accused is a child.

The High Court in Mokoena found that there was no rational justification to distinguish between child witnesses and accused children, particularly in relation to sexual offences.[5] For witnesses, the court has a discretion as to whether or not to hold the proceedings in camera. The court has no discretion in respect of a child accused. The Constitutional Court in DPP again disagreed. Ngcobo J (as he then was) held that the child witness and child accused were not similarly situated because a witness would only be in court while she was testifying whereas an accused was required to be present throughout the proceedings. The rational basis for distinguishing between the two categories of children was the amount of time each spent in the courtroom. Ngcobo J argued that the discretion to permit child witnesses to testify in open court was necessary in order to protect the important principle of open justice.[6]

[1] 2008 (2) SACR 216 (T)('Mokoena').

[2] See PJ Schwikkard 'The Abused Child: A Few Rules of Evidence Considered' in R Keightly (ed) Children's Rights (1996) 148.

[3] 2009 (4) SA 222 (CC), 2009 (2) SACR 130 (CC), 2009 (7) BCLR 637 (CC), [2009] ZACC 8 ('DPP') at paras 165–167.

[4] See S v Motaung 2007 (1) SACR 476 (SE); cf S v Swartz 2009 (1) SCR 452 (C).

[5] Mokoena (supra) at para 108.

[6] DPP (supra) at para 146.

(c) Previous consistent statements

At common law, the general rule is that previous consistent statements are considered irrelevant and are therefore inadmissible. One exception to this rule applies to a prior consistent statement made by a complainant in a sexual offence case. The effect of this rule is that if the complainant does not make a report as soon as reasonably possible after the alleged incident, the court can draw a negative inference about her credibility. Even prior to the enactment of the Sexual Offences Act in 2007, some cases expressly acknowledged that no necessary correlation obtains between late reporting and unreliability.[1] However, the approach of our courts has not been uniform.[2] Fortunately, the Sexual Offences Act appears to have acknowledged the strong body of social science evidence that indicates that victims of sexual offences may postpone reporting the offence for a considerable period. Section 58 of the Act provides that a previous consistent statement made by the complainant in a sexual offence case will be admissible and that the court 'may not draw any inference only from the absence of such previous consistent statement'.[3] Section 59 of the Act prohibits the court from drawing an inference from a delay in reporting the offence.[4]

The prohibition on drawing an inference from the absence of a previous consistent statement appears to be a non-sequitur. For the rule to make any sense there would always have to have been a previous consistent statement made in a court of law. However, a previous consistent statement also refers to a statement made out of court that is similar to the statement made by the witness in court. For the matter to have come to court the complainant must have told somebody about the incident. The issue in each instance is not whether (or where) a previous consistent statement was made — but when it was made. Section 59 of the Act may well have the desired effect of making High Court evaluations of delays both consistent and fair to the alleged victim of a sexual assault.[5]

The same effect might have been achieved by simply retaining the general exception that applies to all types of case and allows previous consistent statements to be admitted when there is an allegation of recent fabrication. This approach was adopted by the Canadian legislature.[6] Indeed, it can be argued that if previous consistent statements are irrelevant in relation to other categories of offence, it

[1] See, for example, Holtzhauzen v Roodt 1997 (4) SA 766 (W); S v Cornick 2007 (2) SACR 115 (SCA).

[2] See, for example, S v Van der Ross 2002 (2) SACR 362 (C); S v Zuma 2006 (2) SACR 191 (W); S v Naude 2005 (2) SACR 218 (W).

[3] Sexual Offences Act s 58 reads: 'Evidence relating to previous consistent statements by a complainant shall be admissible in criminal proceedings involving the alleged commission of a sexual offence: Provided that the court may not draw any inference only from the absence of such previous consistent statements.'

[4] Sexual Offences Act s 59 reads: 'In criminal proceedings involving the alleged commission of a sexual offence, the court may not draw any inference only from the length of any delay between the alleged commission of such offence and the reporting thereof.'

[5] Compare the approach taken in Holtzhauzen v Roodt 1997 (4) SA 766 (W) and S v M 1999 (1) SACR 664 (C) with S v De Villiers 1999 (1) SACR 297 (O); S v Van der Ross 2002 (2) SACR 362 (C) and S v Naude 2005 (2) SACR 218 (W). Unfortunately, as matters currently stand in 2013, the positive effect of s 59 on the conduct of sexual offense cases by our trial courts appears to be rather limited: see S v Dyira 2010 (1) SACR 78 (ECG); S v Leve 2011 (1) SACR 87 (ECG).

[6] Section 275 of the Canadian Criminal Code.

is difficult to see why they should be relevant in sexual offence cases. Conversely, another way of ameliorating the different and discriminatory application of the rules of evidence to complainants in sexual offence cases is to narrow the common-law restriction on the admission of previous consistent statements in all cases. Singh argues that the Law Commission did not go far enough in this regard and would have done better to follow the approach adopted in the United Kingdom.[1] Section 120(7) of the United Kingdom's Criminal Justice Act 2003 permits all first reports provided they are made 'as soon as could reasonably be expected' to be admitted into evidence, not only to show consistency but also as evidence of their content.

The difficulty with the UK's approach is this: if we allow all previous consistent statements to be admitted as evidence, there is a high risk of the courts being subjected to a great deal of irrelevant evidence. On the other hand, as soon as the admissibility of first reports is restricted to those made 'as soon as reasonably expected', complainants in sexual offence cases are prejudiced. The social science evidence indicates that there can be no 'reasonable expectation' in respect of the time of reporting a sexual offence. In this respect, the Law Commission proposals as reflected in the Act are to be preferred.

However, Singh's argument extends to the use of previous consistent statements. He favours the recent change in English law which allows a previous consistent statement to be admitted as evidence of its contents. And this is really the nub of the issue. If the sole purpose of admitting the previous consistent statement was to show consistency,[2] then the common law recent fabrication rule would be sufficient. It would have the advantage of circumventing the requirements that the statement be made 'as soon as reasonably expected'. The English approach has merit if it is accepted that an immediate report makes it more likely that the complainant's allegations are true. The difficulty that then arises is that presiding officers, who have previously drawn negative inferences from the failure to report, must now conclude that although an early report makes the allegation more likely to be true, the late reporting in sexual offences does not make the allegations less likely to be true. Given the limited probative value of a previous consistent statements, it may indeed be prudent to interpret s 58 as going no further than permitting previous consistent statements to be admitted to establish consistency.

(d) Character of the complainant in sexual offence cases

In all criminal cases where the complainant testifies he or she may be cross-examined, and the cross-examiner may ask questions that are pertinent to exposing the witness's credibility or lack thereof. However, the character or disposition of the complainant is not relevant to credibility. Consequently, evidence which is solely directed at establishing that the complainant has a bad character is prohibited, as is evidence of good character. Nevertheless, in a few exceptional categories of cases the complainant's character is viewed as relevant. One of these exceptions is the character of the complainant in sexual offence cases.

[1] K Singh 'Evaluating the "First Report": The Persistent Problem of Evidence and Distrust of the Complainant in the Adjudication of Sexual Offences' (2006) 19 SACJ 37.

[2] See, for example, S v Gentle 2005 (1) SACR 420 (SCA) at para 19.

There is a common-law rule that, in a case involving a charge of rape or indecent assault, the accused may adduce evidence as to the complainant's bad reputation for lack of chastity. Prior to 1989,[1] CPA s 227 provided that in sexual offence cases the admissibility of evidence as to the 'character of any woman' would be determined by the application of the common law. In terms of the common law the defence could question the complainant as to her previous sexual relations with the accused.[2] The accused was prohibited from leading evidence of the complainant's sexual relations with other men.[3] However, the complainant could be questioned on this aspect of her private life in cross-examination because it was considered relevant to credibility. Evidence to contradict any denials could be led only if such evidence was relevant to consent.[4] The South African Law Commission in 1985 noted that, in practice, the application of CPA s 227 resulted in few (if any) restrictions being placed on the admissibility of sexual history evidence.[5] In accordance with the recommendation of the Law Commission, CPA s 227 was amended.[6] In terms of the amendment both cross-examination and the leading of evidence on the prior sexual history of the complainant was prohibited except on application to court. Leave to cross-examine or to adduce such evidence would only be granted subsequent to a demonstration of relevance.

Prior to the amendments to CPA s 227 in 1989, the common-law provision had been criticised on a number of grounds: (a) whilst cross-examination concerning prior sexual history traumatised and humiliated the victim, the evidence it elicited was irrelevant and at most established a general propensity to have sexual intercourse; (b) evidence of this nature is held to be inadmissible in other cases and there are no grounds for admitting it where the case is of a sexual nature; (c) the possibility of such cross-examination deterred victims from reporting the offence. The reforms introduced by the 1989 amendment to CPA s 227 did not escape criticism. The objections were simple: the very purpose for which the amendments were enacted was undermined by the discretion conferred on judicial officers.[7] The same judicial officers who in the past failed to exercise their discretion to

[1] The Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure Act Amendment Act 39 of 1989 introduced significant amendments to s 227.

[2] R v Riley 1987 18 QBD 481. As this type of evidence was always considered relevant to the issue, evidence could be adduced to contradict a denial.

[3] R v Adamstein 1937 CPD 331.

[4] R v Cockcroft 1870 11 Cox CC 410; R v Cargill 1913 2 KB 271.

[5] Project 45 Report on Women and Sexual Offences (1985) 48.

[6] By s 2 of the Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 39 of 1989.

[7] See J Temkin 'Sexual History Evidence' (1993) Criminal Law Review 3. Temkin identifies one of the major problems underlying the relevance test, namely, that relevance is an insufficiently objective criterion. She refers to the following apt description by L'Heureux-Dubé J in R v Seaboyer; R v Gayme [1991] 2 SCR 577, 83 DLR (4th) 193:

> Regardless of the definition used, the content of any relevancy decision will be filled by the particular judge's experience, common sense and/or logic … There are certain areas of enquiry where experience, common sense and logic are informed by the stereotype and myth … This area of the law [sexual history evidence] has been particularly prone to the utilization of stereotypes in determinations of relevance.

exclude irrelevant previous sexual history evidence were now asked to exercise the very same discretion, albeit preceded by an application held in camera. Indeed, in S v M, the Supreme Court of Appeal noted that 'the members of this Court are not aware of any instance where s 227(2) has been applied in this country. It seems likely that it is more honoured in the breach that in the observance'.[1] It had been thought that one way of addressing this ongoing problem would be to specify criteria for relevance. The Law Commission, in its Sexual Offences Report, had recommended a set of appropriate criteria endorsed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v M. These recommendations have, subsequently, been enacted as legislation. The Sexual Offences Act amends CPA s 227 so as to provide that the following criteria are taken into account in determining relevance:

> … whether such evidence or questioning —
> (a) is in the interests of justice, with due regard to the accused's right to a fair trial;
> (b) is in the interests of society in encouraging the reporting of sexual offences;
> (c) relates to a specific instance of sexual activity relevant to a fact in issue;
> (d) is likely to rebut evidence previously adduced by the prosecution;
> (e) is fundamental to the accused's defence;
> (f) is not substantially outweighed by its potential prejudice to the complainant's personal dignity and right to privacy; or > (g) is likely to explain the presence of semen or the source of pregnancy or disease or injury to the complainant, where it is relevant to a fact in issue.[2]

The amendment also stipulates that an application to lead or to cross-examine on prior sexual history will not be permitted if the purpose of such evidence is to support an inference that the complainant — '(a) is more likely to have consented to the offence being tried; or (b) is less worthy of belief.'[3] The court is required to give reasons for granting or refusing the application.[4]

The trial court clearly still retains some discretion. That such discretion persists creates the danger that, in the absence of judicial training, old practices will endure. However, the requirement that reasons be given for allowing such evidence should ensure that presiding officers at least apply their minds to the relevance of the evidence. The discretion which requires that the court must be satisfied that the accused's right to a fair trial is not compromised was no doubt in part shaped by the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Seaboyer; R v Gayme.[5] In Seaboyer, the Canadian Supreme Court struck down the so-called 'rape shield' provision in s 276 of the Criminal Code on the basis that its application would permit the exclusion of evidence relevant to the accused's defence.

[1] 2002 (2) SACR 411 (SCA) at para 17. See also S v Zuma 2006 (2) SACR 191 (W)(Section 227 was expressly applied.) For further discussion, see PJ Schwikkard Juta's Quarterly Review 'Evidence' (2006) 2. See also Prinsloo v Bramley Children's Home 2005 (2) SACR 2 (T); S v Katoo 2005 (1) SACR 522 (SCA).

[2] CPA s 227(5).

[3] CPA s 227(6)

[4] CPA s 227(7).

[5] [1991] 2 SCR 577, 7 CR (4th) 117, 66 CCC (3d) 321.

52.8 Rule 31 of the Constitutional Court rules[1]

Rule 31(1) of the Constitutional Court rules[2] provides that any party to any proceedings before the court, and an amicus curiae properly admitted by the court, shall be entitled, in documents lodged in terms of the rules of the Constitutional Court, to canvass factual material which is relevant to the determination of the issues and which does not appear on the record.[3] The proviso, however, is that such facts must be either common cause or otherwise incontrovertible,[4] or of an official, scientific, technical or statistical nature, capable of easy verification.[5] In terms of rule 31(2) all other parties are entitled to admit, deny, controvert or elaborate upon such facts to the extent necessary and appropriate for a proper decision by the Constitutional Court.[6]

Rule 31 should be understood in the context of the distinction drawn between 'adjudicative' and 'legislative facts'. This distinction, recognised by the Constitutional Court in S v Lawrence[7] was first elucidated by Kenneth Culp Davis.[8] He explained the distinction as follows:

> When a court or an agency finds facts concerning the immediate parties — who did what, where, when, how, and with what motive and intent — the court or agency is performing an adjudicative function, and the facts so determined are conveniently called adjudicative facts. When a court or an agency develops law or policy, it is acting legislatively; the courts have created the common law through judicial legislation, and the facts which inform the tribunal's legislative judgment are called legislative facts. Stated in other terms, the adjudicative facts are those to which the law is applied in the process of adjudication. They are the facts that normally go to the jury in a jury case. They relate to the parties, their activities, their properties, their businesses. Legislative facts are those which help the tribunal to determine the content of law and policy and to exercise its judgment or discretion in determining what course of action to take. Legislative facts are ordinarily general and do not concern the immediate parties. In the great mass of cases decided by courts and by agencies, the legislative element is either absent, unimportant, or interstitial, because in most cases the applicable law and policy have been previously established. But

[1] See, generally, PJ Schwikkard & SE van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (3rd Edition, 2009) 493-497.

[2] Government Notice R1675 in GG 25726 of 31 October 2003.

[3] On evidence and amicus curiae, see G Budlender 'Amicus Curiae' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8. On relevant rules and procedures of court regarding the admission of evidence, see K Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedures in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5. See also K Hofmeyr & N Ferreira 'Rules and Procedures in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS6, forthcoming) Chapter 5.

[4] Constitutional Court Rule 31(1)(a).

[5] Constitutional Court Rule 31(1)(b).

[6] Rule 31, contains the same provisions as rule 34 of the Constitutional Court rules under the Interim Constitution. Government Notice, No 16204, 6 January 1995 and rule 30 as set out in Government Notice, No 575, 29 May 1998.

[7] S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 540 (CC), [1997] ZACC 11 ('S v Lawrence'). In drawing the distinction between legislative and adjudicative facts the court held that the question of who bears the burden of proof is less important when dealing with legislative facts than when adjudicative facts are in issue.

[8] K Davis 'An Approach to Problems of Evidence in the Administrative Process' (1942) 55 Harvard LR 364.

> whenever a tribunal is engaged in the creation of law or of policy, it may need to resort to legislative facts, whether or not those facts have been developed on the record … The exceedingly practical difference between legislative and adjudicative facts is that, apart from facts properly noticed, the tribunal's finding of adjudicative facts must be supported by evidence, but finding or assumptions of legislative facts need not, frequently are not, and sometimes cannot be supported by evidence.[1]

Rule 31 cannot be relied upon by the parties in respect of facts which are essentially 'adjudicative'. In respect of these facts, the parties are bound by the evidence on the record and the normal common-law and statutory rules which govern judicial notice. But for purposes of 'legislative facts', the parties may go beyond the record of the case by relying on rule 31. Judicial notice of legislative facts might be necessary when the court must decide upon the constitutional validity of a statute or a common-law rule 'upon grounds of policy, and the policy is thought to hinge upon social, economic, political or scientific facts'.[2]

Rule 31 allows for the submission of evidence similar to that found in American 'Brandeis briefs'. Peter Hogg offers the following support for the 'Brandeis brief':

> There are two justifications for the Brandeis brief. The first is the pragmatic one that the Brandeis brief may be the only practicable way to inform the court of the full range of professional opinion on a particular point of social science. It is true that expert opinion evidence could be adduced, but on many topics no one expert or group of experts could easily canvass the entire range of professional opinion within the limits of the law of evidence, and especially the hearsay rule. Moreover, any attempt to do so by conventional sworn testimony, subject to cross-examination, would be extremely time-consuming and expensive … The second justification for the Brandeis brief is more principled and more conclusive. The nature of judicial review is such that it is not necessary to prove legislative facts as strictly as adjudicative facts. While a court must reach a definitive conclusion on the adjudicative facts which are relevant to the disposition of litigation, the court need not be so definite in respect of legislative facts in constitutional court cases. The most that the court can ask in respect of legislative facts is whether there is a rational basis for the legislative judgment that the facts exist.[3]

The Constitutional Court has on several occasions referred to and relied upon so-called discussion documents submitted by the parties.[4] One useful example appears in S v Lawrence. In Lawrence, the Court was required to determine the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Liquor Act. The appeal was subject to the provisions of the Interim Constitution and the appellants conceded that

[1] K Davis 'Judicial Notice' (1955) 55 Columbia LR 945, 952. See also K Davis Administrative Law Treatise (Vol 3, 2nd Edition, 1980) § 15.2.

[2] EW Clearly (ed) McCormick on Evidence (2nd Edition, 1984) § 328.

[3] P Hogg 'Proof of Facts in Constitutional Cases' (1976) 26 University of Toronto Law Journal 387, 396.

[4] See, for example, S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), [1995] ZACC 3; Shabalala v Attorney-General of the Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC); S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC), [1995] ZACC 14; Ferreira v Levin NO; Vryenhoek v Powell 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1995] ZACC 13; Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC), [2000] ZACC 17; Prince v President, Cape Law Society 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC), [2000] ZACC 28. Cf S v Katamba 2000 (1) SACR 162 (NmS)(O'Linn AJA expressed some disquiet at the extension of the boundaries of judicial notice.)

the magistrate had correctly convicted them. Their sole defence was that the provisions in terms of which they had been convicted were unconstitutional.

No evidence relevant to the constitutionality of the provisions in issue was contained in the appeal record. After the noting of the appeal to the Constitutional Court, the representatives of the appellants and the Attorney-General agreed that 'expert affidavits' would be lodged by the appellants, the Attorney-General being entitled to lodge answering affidavits, and the appellants could then lodge replying affidavits.

Expert affidavits were lodged by the appellants, the Attorney-General and the Minister of Trade and Industry. In addition, appellants' counsel at the hearing tendered numerous extracts from publications purportedly relied upon by one of the appellants' experts. No accompanying affidavit by the expert offered an explanation as to why the extracts had not been dealt with in his affidavit. Counsel for the Attorney-General and counsel for the Minister of Trade and Industry objected to the admission of these extracts as well as the 'expert affidavits' lodged by the appellants on the basis that they exceeded the ambit of rule 34 of the (interim) Constitutional Court rules. In response the appellants made an application in which it was contended that the affidavits were admissible in terms of rule 19[1] and rule 34. Alternatively, the appellants requested that the Court exercise its general power under rule 35 to condone non-compliance with its provisions.

The Lawrence Court rejected the appellants' submission that the general rule, permitting new evidence on appeal only in exceptional circumstances, did not apply to an appeal based on a constitutional question falling exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Chaskalson P (as he then was) held that nothing had prohibited the appellants from placing the evidence on record at the time of their trial: they could also have taken the opportunity of tendering such evidence when appealing to the High Court.[2]

The Lawrence Court also dismissed the appellants' contention that rule 19 of the (interim) Constitutional Court rules (regulating the procedure to be followed in appeals in which leave to appeal is required) permitted parties to supplement the trial record with new evidence. It held that rule 19 'prescribes a procedure for circumscribing the record and not a means for introducing new evidence on appeal'.[3] In the absence of an express provision in rule 19 facilitating the introduction of new evidence, an interpretation of the rule which required all eleven judges of the Constitutional Court to hear disputed evidence could not be justified. The Court held that the circumstances of the cases did not justify the exercise of its powers in terms of rule 33 to admit new evidence and that only those portions of the new evidence that fell within the parameters of rule 34 would be admitted.

[1] Rule 19 of the interim rules is virtually identical with rule 20 of the current rules. For more on the new Constitutional Court rules, and which rules supplant the old rules, see K Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedures in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5.

[2] See also National Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), (2000) 1 BCLR 39 (CC), [1999] ZACC 17; Parbhoo v Getz NO 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC), [1997] ZACC 9. Cf Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 217 (CC), [2000] ZACC 28.

[3] S v Lawrence (supra) at para 19.

In drawing the distinction between legislative and adjudicative facts, the Lawrence Court held that the question of who bears the burden of proof is less important when dealing with legislative facts than when adjudicative facts are in issue. The Lawrence Court then proceeded to take judicial notice of the legislative fact that:

> [E]xcessive consumption of liquor is universally regarded as a social evil. It is linked to crime, disturbance of the public order, impairment of road safety, damage to health, and has other deleterious social and economic consequences.[1]

The appellants, who objected to the restrictions imposed by the Liquor Act on hours during which the holder of a grocer's wine licence may sell table wine, argued that restricted hours do not reduce alcohol-related problems and that such restrictions were therefore irrational. In support of this contention, the appellants submitted an affidavit of an expert witness referring to studies undertaken in other countries. The Minister of Trade and Industry relied on the affidavit of a different expert witness who disputed the correctness of this proposition. The Lawrence Court held that it was inappropriate in the circumstances for the court to prefer one expert above the other. Chaskalson P held that:

> The expert evidence was not placed before the Court in a proper form and the attempt to cure the defect by tendering unverified extracts from publications on which the expert is said to have relied is unacceptable. The proposition relied upon by the appellants is, moreover, not 'common cause or otherwise incontrovertible' nor does it depend on 'official, scientific, technical or statistical' material that is capable of 'easy verification'. In any event the conflict is not decisive of the case. The question to be decided is not whether the policy underlying the Liquor Act is an effective policy; it is whether there is a rational basis for such policy related to the purpose of the legislation.[2]

The Lawrence Court did accept evidence contained in another of the appellants' expert affidavits to the effect that the control of the availability of alcohol is a recognised means of combating the adverse effects of alcohol. That the same expert disputed the efficacy of such measures was not relevant. The Court was required to determine whether there was a rational basis for the policy related to the purpose of the legislation, not the efficacy of the policy.

In Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail O'Regan J held that evidence sought to be introduced in terms of rule 31 was inadmissible since it was 'all put in issue by the respondent …[and] therefore [had] to be excluded on that basis alone'.[3] In short, if the evidence sought to be adduced under rule 31 is controvertible, then it is inadmissible.[4] Even if the evidence is incontrovertible, its

[1] S v Lawrence (supra) at para 54.

[2] Ibid at para 68. See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC), [2002] ZACC 1 ('Prince II').

[3] 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC), [2004] ZACC 20 at para 38.

[4] In re Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC), 2002 (10) BLCR 1023 (CC), [2002] ZACC 13; Mabaso v Law Society, Northern Provinces 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC), [2004] ZACC 8 at para 45; Prince II (supra) at para 11.

admissibility depends on the nature and the substance of the dispute.[1] The facts canvassed in the evidence must be relevant to the dispute.[2]

The Constitutional Court's approach to Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules of Court is also noteworthy. Rule 16A deals with amici curiae and permits them to make 'submissions'. A two-judge bench of the High Court had held that amici curiae could not introduce new evidence. In Children's Institute v Presiding Officer of the Children's Court, District of Krugersdorp & Others, the Constitutional Court overruled this finding.[3] Courts of first instance, it held, should consider all available evidence: 'They should not knowingly leave relevant evidence that could have been received by them to be adduced at the appellate level.'[4] The Children's Institute Court concluded that 'submissions' should be interpreted to include evidence.

52.9 Privacy and privilege

(a) Professions

The legal recognition of a privilege attaching to communications between categories of people inevitably creates two conflicting social goods: (1) a polity's interest in preserving and in promoting certain relationships; and (2) the interest of the legal system (and others responsible for the administration of justice) in ensuring that all relevant evidence is before the court. Historically, preference has been given to the latter interest. Consequently, professional privilege pertains only to the lawyer-client relationship and is not enjoyed (at least to the same degree) by other professional relationships.[5] Bankers possess a limited privilege: they need not produce their books unless ordered to do so by the court.[6] Conversely, while privilege is generally not accorded to a doctor-patient relationship,[7] any statement made by an accused during court-mandated observation by a health care professional for mental observation will be inadmissible in criminal proceedings 'except to the extent to which it may be relevant to the determination' of her 'mental condition'.[8]

Priests, insurers and accountants do not enjoy any professional privilege. Journalists too can be compelled to disclose the sources of their information.[9]

[1] Prince II (supra) at para 10.

[2] S v Shaik 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), 2008 (1) SACR 1 (CC), 2008 (1) SACR 1 (CC), [2007] ZACC 19 at para 19; Prince II (supra) at para 11.

[3] [2012] ZACC 25.

[4] Ibid at para 29.

[5] See, for example, Trust Sentrum (Kaapstad) (Edms) Bpk v Zevenburg 1989 (1) SA 145 (C); Howe v Mabuya 1961 (2) SA 635 (D); Chantrey Martin v Martin 1953(2) All ER 691.

[6] CPA s 236(4); Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 25 of 1965 ('CPEA') s 31 .

[7] Botha v Botha 1972 (2) SA 559 (N); Davis v Additional Magistrate, Johannesburg 1989 4 SA 299 (W).

[8] See CPA ss 77, 78 and 79 and, especially, s 79(7).

[9] S v Pogrund 1961 (3) SA 868 (T); S v Cornelissen; Cornelissen v Zeelie NO 1994 (2) SACR 41 (W)(Court, whilst holding that no legally recognized privilege gave journalists immunity from testifying, found that under the circumstances the journalist had a just excuse for not testifying.) See also Munusamy v Hefer NO 2004 (5) SA 112 (O)(High Court held that Cornelissen should not be interpreted as authority for the view that journalists have the right to be called only as witnesses of the last resort.) For more on the protection afforded journalists and other members of the media under FC s 16, the freedom of expression, see D Milo, G Pennfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 42.

However, it would appear that some relief is available to these professionals if they can establish that they have a 'just excuse' for not testifying.[1]

Despite the limited scope of professionally-based privilege at common law, some professional communications may be protected from disclosure by the constitutional right to privacy. FC 14*(d)* provides that everyone has the right not to have the privacy of their communications infringed. A communication between doctor and patient may well be regarded as a personal and private communication. Where the state seeks to compel disclosure of such a communication, either party might assert that a privilege attaches to their relationship in terms of FC s 14. However, that prima facie recognition of privilege may, of course, be overcome if the state is able to establish that a law of general application reasonably and justifiably limits the alleged privilege (in terms of FC s 36).

A constitutional recognition of privilege grounded in the right to privacy would not necessarily constitute a radical departure from the common law as has been understood in other jurisdictions. For example, the putative FC s 14-based privilege could be squared with Wigmore's preconditions for the recognition of a privilege:[2]

(1) the communication must originate in a confidence that it will not be disclosed;
(2) the element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relationship between the parties;
(3) the relationship must be one that in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered;
(4) the injury that would inure to the relationship by the disclosure of the communication must be greater than the benefit gained through the correct disposal of the litigation.[3]

(b) Spouses

Spouses are entitled to refuse to disclose communications from the other spouse that were made during the marriage.[4] Despite the general decline of personal privacy due to public and private surveillance, and the intrusion of social media into the previously private domain, this privilege remains intact because the public opinion still finds the revelation of intimate exchanges unacceptable and would be outraged if spouses could be forced by the courts to disclose communications received from each other.[5]

The only pre-requisites for the existence of the privilege is that the communication must have been made whilst the spouses were married. The [1] See Cornelissen (supra).

[2] Wigmore (supra) at para 2285.

[3] C Tapper Cross & Tapper on Evidence (10th Edition, 2004) 494. See S v Makhaye 2007 (1) SACR 369 (N)(Court suggested that if these conditions were met, then a privilege between confessant and spiritual adviser might arise.) Cf S v Mshumpa 2008 (1) SACR 126 (E); Smit v Van Niekerk NO 1976 (4) SA 292 (A); S v B 1980 (2) SA 946 (A). See also S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC), [2002] ZACC 7 (Court left the question open.)

[4] See CPA s 198 and CPEA s 10. A marriage encompasses indigenous law marriages as well as a marriages concluded under any system of religious law. See CPA s 195(2) and CPEA s 10A.

[5] DT Zeffert, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 619.

privilege persists after divorce with regard to communications made whilst the couple were still married.[1]

In terms of CPA s 199, each spouse may refuse to answer a question that the other spouse could not have been compelled to answer.[2] However, should the spouse who received the communication wish to disclose it, the other spouse can do nothing to prevent such disclosure: the marital privilege can only be claimed by the spouse to whom the communication was made. The traditionally accepted view is that a third person who hears or intercepts the communication cannot be prevented from disclosing it.[3] This common-law approach may well be challenged on the basis that it infringes the constitutional right to privacy.[4] Indeed, the very loss of private space generally may warrant the expansion of this privilege — especially as it pertains to third parties.

Some commentators may argue that little justification exists for favouring the privacy of marital relationships above other personal or professional relationships. But rather than diminishing the scope of the marital privilege, this contention actually cuts the other way: it suggests that the privilege ought to be extended to persons with whom one shares equally intimate, and integral, aspects of one's life.

It may be true that this common-law privilege originated in a conception of marriage that is no longer shared by the vast majority of us or was originally designed to protect the interest of one spouse (the husband) rather than some idyll of marital bliss. And it is certainly interesting to note that a majority of the Australian High Court has recently found insufficient authority for the existence of the privilege at common law.[5] But whether we should more vigourously defend such private spaces or let all our intimate relationships attrite in the face of ever greater public and private impositions on the self is a matter that our highest courts will invariably be asked to address in due course. Our Constitution invites this very debate.

(c) Parents and children

Section 192 of the CPA (read together with CPA s 206) makes it clear that parents/guardians can be compelled to testify against their children/wards, and vice versa. Our courts do not recognize a privilege pertaining to communications between parent and child. In terms of CPA s 73(3), even when parents participate in and support their child in criminal proceedings against the child, the law offers the parents no sanctuary from prosecutors who might wish the parents to offer testimony that incriminates their progeny.

But surely one might ask whether sound public policy militates against forcing parents to testify against their children. In S v M, the Appellate Division held that CPA s 73(1) and 73(2), read together, conferred a right upon a child to be assisted [1] See CPA s 198(2) and CPEA s 10(2). However, widows or widowers cannot claim the privilege.

[2] Zeffertt, Paizes & Skeen (supra) at 620 ('It has been suggested that the privilege not to answer questions which tend to incriminate the other spouse must be regarded as excluded by implication in those cases in which one spouse is a compellable witness in a prosecution against the other.')

[3] See Rumping v DPP 1962 (3) All ER 256.

[4] FC s 14. See, generally, S v Hammer 1994 (2) SACR 496 (C).

[5] Australian Crime Commission v Stoddart [2011] HCA 47.

by a parent or guardian from the time of the child's arrest, in the same manner as an adult would be entitled to the assistance of a legal adviser[1] If parental assistance is equivalent to the assistance of a legal adviser, then it follows that parent-child communications in this context should be afforded the same privilege as communications between a legal adviser and a client.

However, even where a parent does not appear to assist the child in legal proceedings, constitutional grounds for holding that communications between parent and child should be privileged may still exist. In the United States, the courts have recognized that confidential communications between children and their parents, guardians or other caretakers are privileged from disclosure on the basis of the constitutional right to privacy.[2] When read together with the right to family or parental care in FC s28(1)(b), FC s 14 is surely susceptible to a similar interpretation.[3]

52.10 Unconstitutionally obtained evidence

(a) Scope of discretion and rationale

FC s 35(5) provides a remedy for constitutional breach to arrested, detained and accused persons at the trial stage of criminal proceedings with respect to unconstitutionally obtained evidence. However, this remedy for a constitutional breach[4] is not restricted to arrested, detained and accused persons alone.[5] Moreover, the rationale underlying the rule is far broader than that of providing a remedy for any single aggrieved individual. The rule is seen as playing an integral role in ensuring constitutional and judicial integrity in the criminal justice system as a whole. It is designed to promote a rule of law culture and overall constitutional compliance by the police, the prosecutorial services and other law enforcement agencies.[6] FC s 35(5) provides that '[e]vidence obtained in a manner that violates

[1] 1993 (2) SACR 487 (A). See also S v Manuel 1997 (2) SACR 505 (C)(Court stressed the importance of parental assistance); S v N 1997 (1) SACR 84 (TkSC).

[2] In re A & M 61 AD 2d 426, 403 NYS 2d 375 (1978); People v Fitzgerald 101 Misc 2d 712, 422 NYS 2d 309.

[3] See Neil Van Dokkum 'Unwelcome Assistance: Parents Testifying Against Their Children' (1994) 7 SACJ 213. Article 2(21) of the African National Congress' draft Bill of Rights gave recognition to parent-child privilege. See also S v Hammer 1994 (2) SACR 496 (C)(An 18-year-old accused, whilst in police custody, after receiving permission to write a letter to his mother, asked a member of the South African Police Services to deliver the letter to his mother. The policeman, instead of delivering the letter, read it and handed it over to the prosecution. Although the court did not base its decision on the constitutional right to privacy, it found the evidence to be inadmissible because it had been improperly obtained. The court found that the policeman had, in all probability, committed an injuria against the accused, that he had acted unlawfully and immorally in reading and handing the letter over to the Attorney-General, and that this action constituted a serious and deliberate breach of the accused's common-law right to privacy. The court further concluded that the unfairly obtained evidence had to be excluded because to admit it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.)

[4] For a more extensive discussion of remedies, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[5] See for example, S v Mark 2001 (1) SACR 572 (C)(Exclusion was sought on the basis that the witnesses' constitutional rights had been violated.) See also SE van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' in PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (3rd Edition 2009) 221.

[6] See DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 625–630; Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 182 (Offers detailed discussion of the history and the rationale of the rule.)

any right in the Bill of Rights must be excluded if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice'.

The Interim Constitution did not contain an express exclusionary rule. However, the courts under the Interim Constitution developed an exclusionary rule either through reliance on their common-law discretion to exclude evidence[1] or by invoking s 7(4) of the Interim Constitution, which provided for 'appropriate relief'.[2] The 'exclusionary jurisprudence' developed during this period remains influential in the interpretation and application of FC s 35(5).

Once it has been established that a right in the Bill of Rights was unjustifiably infringed[3] in obtaining the evidence in question, then a court must exclude the evidence if its admission would: (a) render the trial unfair; or (b) otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice. To admit evidence that would render the trial unfair will always be detrimental to the interests of justice. However, if admission would not render the trial unfair, its admission might nevertheless be detrimental to the interests of justice. The section is peremptory in so far as it directs the court to exclude evidence once the court has determined that admission would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice.[4] The court must exercise a value judgement in ascertaining whether either of these two conditions for exclusion exists: it is in this sense that the section is discretionary.[5]

A pre-requisite for exercising such discretion is the establishment of a link between the violation of the right and the procurement of the evidence. This issue has received relatively little attention from South African courts. It would appear that a generous approach is favoured in terms of which evidence obtained subsequent to the breach will be viewed as being obtained as a result of the breach — unless the accused has had an opportunity to re-assert his rights and thereby breaks the chain of events.[6] In order for the evidence to fall within the scope of FC s 35(5), it makes no difference whether the evidence was procured by the state or a private person. As long as the state seeks to use it,[7] then FC s 35(5) holds that

[1] See, for example, S v Motloutsi 1996 (1) SACR 78 (C); S v Mayekiso 1996 (2) SACR 298 (C); S v Hammer 1994 (2) SACR 496 (C).

[2] See, for example, S v Melani 1995 (2) SACR 141 (E); S v Melani 1996 (1) SACR 335 (E).

[3] Where evidence is not obtained in violation of the Bill of Rights, but it is nevertheless determined that its admission would render the trial unfair, then such evidence should be excluded by virtue of the court's common-law discretion to exclude improperly obtained evidence. See S v Kidson 1999 (1) SACR 338 (W); S v Mansoor 2002 (1) SACR 629 (W); S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (SE)(Plasket J held that a non-Chapter 2 breach compounded a Chapter 2 breach.) See also Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 203.

[4] See S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275, 394 (E). See also Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 201; N Steytler Constitutional Criminal Procedure (1998) 36.

[5] See Pillay & Others v S 2004 (2) BCLR 158 (SCA); S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N). See also Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 214; N Steytler Constitutional Criminal Procedure (1998) 36.

[6] See S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275, 293g–294d (E). See also Zeffertt, Paizes & Skeen (supra) at 638; Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 220.

[7] See S v Dube 2000 (1) SACR 53 (N); S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (SE). Cf S v Mansoor 2002 (1) SACR 629 (W). See also Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 223.

it was obtained as a consequence of a constitutional violation.[1] In the absence of a constitutional breach, the evidence may still be excluded in terms of the court's common-law discretion to exclude evidence improperly obtained.[2]

(b) When will the admission of evidence render a trial unfair?

If the admission of evidence would be unfair to the prosecution, should it be excluded on that ground alone? It is clearly the accused's constitutional right to a fair trial which is sought to be protected by FC s 35 as a whole and consequently it would be consistent to interpret FC s 35(5) as being primarily concerned with protecting the accused's right to a fair trial.[3] However, fairness to the prosecution may well be a factor to be taken into account in determining whether the admission of evidence would 'otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice'.[4] Exclusion of evidence that would result in substantial unfairness to the prosecution may well be detrimental to the administration of justice.[5]

The broad formulation of the right to a fair trial in S v Zuma[6] and S v Dzukuda; S v Tshilo[7] provides the grounds for arguing that even if one of the discrete sub-rights enumerated in FC s 35(3) as a component of the right to a fair trial is infringed, the admission of evidence procured as a result of such an infringement will not necessarily render the trial unfair. Although it can be argued that this approach requires a high degree of agility in separating two inquiries — namely (a) has a fair trial right been breached and (b) will admission of the evidence obtained as a result of the fair trial breach render the trial unfair — the courts have clearly shown themselves capable of meeting this challenge.[8] Consequently, if the breach of a recognised fair trial right is neither deliberate nor flagrant, and despite the violation the 'police conduct was objectively reasonable having regard to the facts of the case,'[9] the admission of evidence might not render the trial unfair.[10]

In determining whether the admission of evidence will render a trial unfair, the court will take into account a complex matrix of competing and complimentary

[1] See S v M 2002 (2) SACR 411 (SCA).

[2] See, for example, S v Mthethwa 2004 (1) SACR 449 (E)(The court exercised its common-law discretion to exclude evidence obtained in breach of the Judges Rules on the basis that it would render the trial unfair and bring the administration of justice into disrepute.)

[3] See Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 229.

[4] Cf S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D). See Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 229 (Van der Merwe seems to suggest that unfairness to the prosecution is a factor that can be taken into account in determining trial fairness vis-à-vis the accused.)

[5] See S v Basson 2007 (3) SA 582 (CC), 2005 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC), 2007 (1) SACR 566 (CC), [2005] ZACC 10 at para 113 (The court's approach reflects an acceptance that in determining the admissibility of evidence considerations of trial fairness apply both to the accused and the prosecution.)

[6] 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), [1995] ZACC 1.

[7] 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 443 (CC), [2000] ZACC 16. See also § 52.2 supra.

[8] See S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N); S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D); Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 113 (CC), [1996] ZACC 25; S v M 2002 (2) SACR 411 (SCA); S v Ngcobo 1998 (10) BCLR 1248 (N). Cf S v Naidoo 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N).

[9] Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 229.

[10] See, for example, S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N).

factors. The court must take into account competing societal interests. In Lawrie v Muir, Lord Cooper expressed the conflict as follows:

> From the standpoint of principle it seems to me that the law must strive to reconcile two highly important interests which are liable to come into conflict — (a) the interest of the citizen to be protected from illegal or irregular invasions of his liberties by the authorities, and (b) the interest of the State to secure that evidence bearing upon the commission of crime and necessary to enable justice to be done shall not be withheld from Courts of law on any merely formal or technical ground.[1]

Other factors the court will take into account include: the type and degree of breach;[2] the type and the degree of prejudice to the accused — if any;[3] and public policy.[4]

Partially due to the distinction made between testimonial or communicative acts and non-testimonial conduct resulting in the production of real evidence,[5] and the fact that real evidence inevitably exists irrespective of the constitutional breach, a court is less likely to find that the admission of real evidence will undermine trial fairness.[6] However, the courts are likely to be more cautious in admitting real evidence discovered as a result of a testimonial communication following a breach of the privilege against self-incrimination. In S v Pillay the Supreme Court of Appeal, obiter, appears to have approved the approach taken by the Canadian Supreme Court in Burlingham v The Queen.[7] In Burlingham, the court wrote: 'evidence derived (real or derived) from conscriptive evidence, ie self-incriminating evidence obtained through a violation of a Charter right, will be excluded on grounds of unfairness if it is found that but for the conscriptive evidence the derivative evidence would not have been discovered'.[8] The Supreme Court of Appeal, finding that the real evidence had been discovered as a consequence of an infringement of the accused's right to privacy (and not in breach of a fair trial right), held that the admission of the impugned evidence would not render the trial unfair.[9] Despite the speed of the discovery, the court excluded the real evidence on the basis that its admission would be detrimental to the administration of justice.

In S v Tandwa[10] the accused identified, in court, money and an AK47. The court accepted that the pointing out had been made as a consequence of various acts of [1] Lawrie v Muir 1950 SC (J) 19, 26–27. See, for example, S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E).

[2] S v Seseane 2000 (2) SACR 225 (O). See, for example, S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478, 1483D–E (N)(The court held that a flagrant and deliberate violation of a constitutional right must inevitably result in exclusion.) See also S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W).

[3] S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E); S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N).

[4] Ibid.

[5] See § 52.4*(c)*(iii) supra. Section 218 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 provides for the admission of real evidence discovered as a consequence of an inadmissible admission or confession. However, it remains subject to FC s 35(5).

[6] See D Zeffert, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 639–641; Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 238. See, for example, S v Mkhize 1999 (2) SACR 632 (W); S v R 2000 (1) SACR 33 (W); S v M 2002 (2) SACR 411 (SCA).

[7] Burlingham v The Queen (1995) 28 CRR (2d) 244.

[8] 2004 (2) SACR 419 (SCA) at para 89.

[9] Ibid at para 90.

[10] 2008 (1) SACR 613 (SCA), [2007] ZASCA 34.

police brutality directed at the accused. The trial judge, whilst excluding statements accompanying the pointing out, admitted the real evidence. He reasoned that it would be detrimental to the administration of justice to exclude the real evidence as it had been obtained independently prior to the police brutality and the accused was well positioned to provide an exculpatory explanation for his possession of the real evidence.

The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the trial judge had erred. FC s 35(5), the Court explained, 'plainly envisages cases where evidence should be excluded for broad public policy reasons beyond fairness to the individual accused'.[1] The Court continued:

> Though 'hard and fast rules' should not be readily propounded, admitting real evidence procured by torture, assault, beatings and other forms of coercion violates the accused's fair trial right at its core, and stains the administration of justice. It renders the accused's trial unfair because it introduces into the process of proof against him evidence obtained by means that violate basic civilised injunctions against assault and compulsion. And it impairs the administration of justice more widely because its admission brings the entire system into disrepute, by associating with barbarous and unacceptable conduct.[2]

In S v Mthembu,[3] the source of the evidence in question was not the accused, but a state witness who had been subject to torture during the investigation some four years prior to the trial.[4] The torture led to the discovery of the two highly pertinent items of real evidence. The Supreme Court of Appeal found that there was nothing in FC s 35(5) to suggest that it did not apply to violations of constitutional rights of a person other than the accused. Cachalia JA held the fact that the witness's subsequent testimony was voluntary did not negate the fact that the real evidence was obtained through torture. The fact that the evidence was 'real' in nature and probably reliable could not assist the prosecution in the face of such an 'egregious human rights violation'.[5] To admit the evidence would be > tantamount to involving the judicial process in 'moral defilement'. This 'would compromise the integrity of the judicial process (and) dishonour the administration of justice'. In the long term, the admission of torture-induced evidence can only have a corrosive effect on the criminal justice system. The public interest, in my view, demands its exclusion, irrespective of whether such evidence has an impact on the fairness of the trial.[6]

The Court was, nevertheless, prepared to admit other evidence that was referred to in the statement obtained by torture on the basis that it was discovered independently, prior to any constitutional violation.[7] In sum, while the 'real' nature of evidence might be a factor weighing in favour of admission, it is merely a factor that can be trumped by the right to a fair trial or the interests of the administration of justice.

---

[1] S v Tandwa (supra) at para 116.
[2] Ibid at para 120.
[3] 2008 (2) SACR 407 (SCA), [2008] ZASCA 51.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at paras 31 and 36.
[6] Ibid at para 36.
[7] Ibid at para 35.

(c) When will the admission of evidence be otherwise detrimental to the administration of justice?

The admission of evidence that would render the trial unfair will always be detrimental to the administration of justice. As a result, there will inevitably be an overlap between the two inquiries animated by FC s 35(5). The inquiry as to whether the admission of the evidence would be otherwise detrimental to the administration of justice arises when it is determined that the admission of the evidence would not render the trial unfair. The competing public interests identified in Lawrie v Muir[1] remain and, in relation to this second component of the FC s 35(5) test, were described in S v Mphala as follows:

> So far as the administration of justice is concerned, there must be a balance between, on the one hand, respect (particularly by law enforcement agencies) for the Bill of Rights and, on the other, respect (particularly by the man in the street) for the judicial process. Overemphasis of the former would lead to acquittals on what would be perceived by the public as technicalities whilst overemphasis of the latter would lead at best to a dilution of the Bill of Rights and at worst to its provisions being negated.[2]

Far greater weight is accorded to public opinion in determining whether admission would 'otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice'. Unfortunately the high crime rate in South Africa — and concern about retaining public confidence in the criminal justice system — has resulted in some courts[3] and commentators being reluctant to remain within the parameters of the approach advocated by the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Collins.[4] The Collins approach requires a court to take into account the views of the reasonable person, who is usually the average person in the community, 'but only when the community's current mood is reasonable'.[5] However, the court in exercising its discretion must consider 'long-term community values' and not 'render a decision that would be unacceptable to the community when that community is not being wrought with passions or otherwise under passing stress due to current events'.[6] The danger of not giving due accord to 'long-term community values' is that the educational role

[1] Lawrie v Muir 1950 SC (J) 19.

[2] S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W).

[3] See S v Ngcobo 1998 (10) BCLR 1248, 1254 (W)('At the best of times but particularly in the current state of endemic violent crime in all parts of our country it is unacceptable to the public that such evidence be excluded. Indeed the reaction is one of shock, fury and outrage when a criminal is freed because of the exclusion of such evidence'.) See also Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 235.

[4] R v Collins 1987 (28) CCR 122.

[5] Ibid at 136.

[6] Ibid.

decisions of the court play in promoting constitutional values is sacrificed to the more expedient demands of placating the public.[1]

To date it would appear that the approach taken by the courts in the vast majority of cases has been rather prudent. Indeed, the courts have identified a number of factors that militate against admission. The evidence should not be admitted if its admission would encourage 'police officers to ignore or overlook the constitutional protection afforded to accused persons'.[2] In this regard, the absence of good faith and reasonableness in police conduct would constitute a barrier to admission.[3] However, good faith will not be sufficient where the infringement is a result of systemically poor practices: good faith cannot save improper conduct that arises from incorrect training, instruction or departmental directives.[4] Evidence will be excluded if its admission 'might create an incentive for law enforcement agents to disregard an accused person's constitutional rights'.[5] The good faith must also be reasonable.[6] Reasonable good faith conduct has been identified with the need to promote public safety.[7]

The nature and the extent of the violation will inevitably be factors taken into consideration by the court in the exercise of its FC s 35(5) discretion in regard to both legs of the inquiry.[8] If there were alternative lawful means of obtaining the evidence, then the breach will be regarded as more serious.[9] If it is real evidence that is in issue, which pre-existed the breach, and it would have been discovered in any event, then it is more likely to lead to the conclusion that its exclusion would not be detrimental to the administration of justice. However, even if all these conditions exist in relation to real evidence, the court will still consider its admissibility in relation to all relevant facts. For example, in S v Pillay the court found that the real evidence in question would have been found irrespective of the breach against self-incrimination. (It would have been found in any event as a result of an earlier breach of the right to privacy arising out of an improper

[1] See S v Naidoo 1998 (1) SACR 479, 531a–b (N). McCall J writes:

> There may be those members of the public who will regard the exclusion of the evidence as being evidence of undue leniency towards criminals. The answer to that is that crime in this country cannot be brought under control unless we have an efficient, honest, responsible and respected police force, capable of enforcing the law. One of the lessons which must be learnt from past mistakes is that illegal methods of investigation are unacceptable and can only bring the administration of justice into disrepute, particularly when they impinge upon the basic human rights which the Constitution seeks to protect.

[2] S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478, 1483 (N).

[3] See, for example, S v Naidoo 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N); S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W); and S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (E)(Absence of good faith was taken into account in excluding the evidence.) But see S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D)(Absence of bad faith and clearly reasonable conduct on the part of the police played an important role in the admission of the evidence.) Cf S v Motloutsi 1996 (1) SACR 78 (C); S v Nel 2009 (2) SACR 37 (C); S v Lachman 2010 (2) SACR 52 (SCA); S v Cwele 2011 (1) SACR 409 (KZP).

[4] See, for example, S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E). Cf S v Tsotetsi and Others (1) 2003 (2) SACR 623 (W) read together with S v Tsotetsi and Others (3) 2003 (2) SACR 648 (W).

[5] S v Pillay 2004 (2) SACR 419 (SCA) at para 94.

[6] See DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 639; SE Van der Merwe 'Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence' (supra) at 256.

[7] See, for example, S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D); S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N).

[8] See S v Mark 2001 (1) SACR 572 (C); S v Mkhize 1999 (2) SACR 632 (W); S v Pillay (supra).

[9] S v Pillay (supra); S v Hena (supra).

telephone tap.) The court held that to admit a statement elicited from a person on a false undertaking that they would not be charged 'would be more harmful to justice than advance it'.[1] In reaching its conclusion, the court noted that in a society with a high crime rate the public must be encouraged to assist the police.[2] False undertakings undermine the public's faith in the criminal justice system.

(d) Entrapment

CPA s 252A(3)(a) reads:

> If a court in criminal proceedings finds that in the setting of a trap or the engaging in an undercover operation the conduct goes beyond providing an opportunity to commit an offence, the court may refuse to allow such evidence to be tendered or may refuse to allow such evidence already tendered, to stand, if the evidence was obtained in an improper or unfair manner and that the admission of such evidence would render the trial unfair or would otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice.[3]

However, in those instances where the entrapment evidence was unconstitutionally obtained, FC s 252A(3)(a) remains subject to the provisions of FC s 35(5).[4]

In terms of CPA s 252A(6), 'the burden of proof to show, on a balance of probabilities, that the evidence is admissible, shall rest on the prosecution'. The question of whether a balance of probabilities should indeed be the standard has given rise to some judicial debate. In S v Reeding, Bozalek J found that, on a plain reading of the section, the burden must be discharged on a balance of probabilities, not beyond a reasonable doubt.[5]

Steyn J reached the opposite conclusion in S v Naidoo.[6] However, her reasoning seems to be based on two errors. First, she misquotes the relevant extract from Reeding by inadvertently substituting the word 'appropriate' for 'inappropriate'.[7] Second, Steyn J quotes an extract from the judgment in S v Kotzé[8] in which Wallis AJA, in an obiter dictum, suggests that proof beyond a reasonable doubt was required in order to make s 252A(6) constitutionally compliant. Steyn J incorrectly

---

[1] S v Pillay (supra) at para 96. Cf Wesso v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape 2001 (1) SACR 674 (C).

[2] S v Pillay (supra) at para 96.

[3] Section 252A(3)(b) instructs the court in determining the admissibility of evidence 'to weigh up the public interest against the personal interest of the accused' and lists a number of factors that must be taken into account in engaging in this exercise. For an example of the application of s 252A, see Amod v S 2001 (4) All SA 13 (E).

[4] S v Odugo 2001 (1) SACR 560 (W). See also S v Spies 2000 (1) SACR 312 (SCA); Mendes v Kitching 1995 (2) SACR 634 (E); S v Dube 2000 (1) SACR 53 (N); S v Hassen 1997 (3) BCLR 377 (T); S v Hayes 1998 (1) SACR 625 (O); S v Reeding 2005 (2) SACR 631 (C); S v Van der Bergh 2009 (1) SACR 661 (C) See, generally, DT Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 643; E Du Toit et al Commentary on the Criminal Procedure Act (2007) 24–134.

[5] 2005 (2) SACR 631, 639–640 (C).

[6] 2010 (1) SACR 369 (KZN) at para 5.

[7] The extract reads: 'In my view, however, this standard of proof is inappropriate in the context of determining the admissibility as opposed to the weight of the evidence and, moreover, sets the bar too high. Section 252(6) provides instead that an onus rests on the State to prove the admissibility of evidence on a balance of probabilities. This, in my view, is the correct standard of proof'. Reeding (supra) at 640a.

[8] 2010 (1) SACR 100 (SCA).

refers to this portion of Wallis AJA's judgment as a definitive ruling on the issue. Considering the wording of s 252A(6), her conclusion that proof beyond reasonable doubt is required is difficult to justify in the absence of a finding of invalidity of s 252A(6) by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1]

Nevertheless, even if not definitive, Wallis AJA's obiter assertion that s 252A(6) is unconstitutional will no doubt attract further attention. His argument can be summarised as follows: if the admissibility of a confession must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, then so must the admissibility of entrapment evidence, as both concern evidence necessary to secure a conviction. To apply a different standard infringes the presumption of innocence and the right to remain silent. This reasoning, although superficially attractive, ignores several difficult conceptual problems. If this part of the court's dictum had not been obiter, the court would have paid more attention to the following issues:

(a) In a criminal trial, must the admissibility of all evidence be proved beyond a reasonable doubt? In applying the presumption of innocence, is it necessary to distinguish between the weight to be accorded to evidence and admissibility?
(b) Do confessions constitute a special category since they have been held to amount to the equivalent of a plea of guilty?
(c) Is a standard of proof appropriate in circumstances where the court is required to exercise a discretion?
(d) Should we draw a distinction between evidence excluded on grounds of policy and evidence excluded as a consequence of insufficient relevance?

These questions will have to be answered when a court is confronted directly with the constitutionality of s 252A(6).

(e) Trial-within-a-trial

CPA s 252A(7) states that the determination of admissibility in terms of CPA s 252A(3)(a) should take place in a trial-within-a-trial. As a general matter, the admissibility of all unconstitutionally obtained evidence in terms of FC s 35(5) should be determined by having a trial-within-a-trial.[2] However, the trial-within-a-trial may not be necessary where the facts are not disputed in any material way[3] or where voluntariness is not in issue.[4] In S v Tsotetsi & Others (3), Visser AJ held that a ruling on admissibility in a trial-within-a-trial was interlocutory and could be reviewed at the end of the trial in light of all the evidence.[5] Cloete JA, in S v

[1] Steyn J's interpretation of Kotzé may also be read as obiter, as it is unclear what bearing it had on the court's decision.

[2] S v Ntzweli 2001 (2) SACR 361 (C); S v Mhlakaza 1996 (2) SACR 187 (C); S v Maake 2001 (2) SACR 288 (W); S v Ngcobo 1998 (10) BCLR 1248 (N); S v Mayekiso 1996 (2) SACR 298 (C). Cf S v Vilakazi 1996 (1) SACR 425 (T). See also Director of Public Prosecutions v Viljoen 2005 (1) SACR 505 (SCA)(The court held that the court a quo had erred in holding that the determination of a constitutional violation must be held prior to and separately from a trial-with-in-a-trial to determine the admissibility of a confession or other extra-curial statement.)

[3] S v Kidson 1999 (1) SACR 338 (W); S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (E).

[4] S v Matsubu 2009 (1) SACR 513 (SCA).

[5] S v Tsotetsi and Others (3) 2003 (2) SACR 648, 654 (W). Cf S v Ntuli 1993 (2) SACR 599 (W).

Maputle & Another, noted that the fact that the nature of the impugned evidence becomes known to the court during FC s 35(5) proceedings will not render the trial automatically unfair.[1]

(f) Civil proceedings

The pre-dominant weight of authority holds that FC s 35(5) does not apply to civil proceedings.[2] However, unconstitutionally or otherwise improperly obtained evidence may be still excluded in terms of the common-law discretion to exclude such evidence.[3] Furthermore, since the common law must be developed so as to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects'[4] of the Bill of Rights, evidence may be excluded if it infringes the constitutional right to a fair civil trial.[5] However, an infringement of a constitutional right in the procurement of the evidence will not automatically lead to the exclusion of the evidence.[6] The case law has not developed sufficiently to identify all of the factors that may influence a decision to exclude evidence. However, one factor that appears to have emerged is whether the evidence in question could have been obtained, eventually, by lawful means. If the evidence could not have been so obtained, then a court is likely to be more reluctant to admit the evidence.[7] In Protea Technology Ltd v Wainer, Hefer J held:

> The common law rule is however inconsistent with the Constitution to this extent: it starts with the assumption that all evidence however obtained is admissible subject to the court's discretion to exclude it. If the common law is at odds with the Constitution the courts must, if that can realistically be done, develop the common law in such a manner as to promote the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights. Such development requires the test of admissibility to be formulated differently: any evidence which depends upon the breach of a fundamental constitutional right can only be admitted if the admission of the evidence is justifiable by the standards laid down in s 36(1). Thus if a person proves, whether in civil or criminal proceedings, that a right identified in chap 2 of the Constitution (other than a non-derogable right) has been infringed, the onus lies upon the party who seeks to benefit in any way from that infringement to satisfy the Court that the common law (or a statute as the case may be) provides a limitation of the nature referred to in s 36(1). Prima facie, the complainant has the right to have it excluded. In order to decide whether the right should prevail with unmitigated force or whether it should be regarded as partially or wholly overridden, each case will have to be considered on its own facts and the discretion

[1] 2003 (2) SACR 15 (SCA) at para 11.

[2] See Protea Technology Ltd v Wainer 1997 (9) BCLR 1225 (W) ('Protea Technology'); Zeffertt, Paizes & Skeen (supra) at 28–9 and 644–5; PJ Schwikkard & SE Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) 264; N Steytler Constitutional Criminal Procedure (1998) 38. Cf Tap Wine Trading v Cape Classic Wines (Western Cape) 1999 (4) SA 194 (C).

[3] See Shell SA (Edms) Bpk v Voorsitter, Dorperaad van die OVS 1992 (1) SA 906 (O); Motor Industry Fund Administrators Pty Ltd v Janit 1994 (3) SA 56 (W); Lenco Holdings Ltd v Ekstein 1996 (2) SA 693 (N) ('Lenco Holdings').

[4] FC s 39(2).

[5] FC s 34.

[6] See, eg, Fedics Group (Pty) Ltd v Matus 1998 (2) SA 617 (C)('Fedics Group'); Protea Technology Ltd v Wainer 1997 (9) BCLR 1225 (W).

[7] See Fedics Group (supra); Lenco Holdings (supra).

> exercised with judicial regard to the substance of s 36(1). Thus for example, that the breach of rights occurred in conjunction with the breach of criminal law is not of itself decisive.[1]

Hefer J's reasoning suggests that evidence obtained in breach of a constitutional right would only be admissible if the admission of the evidence was justifiable by the standard laid down in the limitations clause.[2] This approach conflates the limitations inquiry and an admissibility inquiry. And it would appear to be wrong as a matter of law. An admissibility inquiry turns, in large part, on 'the facts' surrounding the manner in which the evidence was secured. Limitations analysis focuses entirely on the justification offered for a 'law of general application' that impairs a constitutional right.[3] In short, admissibility inquiries are fact driven and are properly located within FC s 35(5). Limitations analysis would only occur when the evidence at issue was secured in terms of a law — common law or statute — that infringed a constitutional right. With respect, Hefer J would appear to have misunderstood the purpose of FC s 36 and what it is designed to justify. One would hope that the courts develop more coherent analytical structure regarding the admissibility of evidence in civil trials.

(g) Burden of proof and burden of justification

An accused who wishes to have evidence excluded in terms of s 35(5) of the FC bears the responsibility of objecting to the admissibility of the evidence.[4] Buys J in S v Mgcina[5] held that the state bore the burden of proving that the evidence was obtained without infringing the accused's constitutional rights. The applicable standard of proof was that of beyond reasonable doubt and the burden would arise once the accused alleged that the evidence had been procured as a consequence of an infringement. However, the accused did no have to prove the infringement. The allocation of the burden of the proof thereafter to prove admissibility or inadmissibility remains an open question. There are strong similarities between FC s 35(5) and s 24(2) of the Canadian Charter. Charter s 24(2) provides: Where in proceedings under ss (1) a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

The Canadian approach requires the accused to prove a Charter violation on a balance of probabilities.[6] Stuart asserts: 'Given that the accused has the burden of [1] Protea Technology (supra) at 1241–2 cited with approval by Lewis J in Waste Products Utilisation (Pty) Ltd v Wilkes 2003 (2) SA 515 (W).

[2] Protea Technology (supra) at 1241H–1242F.

[3] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[4] Key v Attorney General, Cape of Good Hope Provincial Division 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), [1996] ZACC 25 at para 14. See also S v Naidoo 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D), 1998 (1) SACR 479 (D)('Naidoo').

[5] 2007 (1) SACR 82 (T).

[6] R v Collins (1987) 56 CR 193 (SCC)('Collins'). See also R v Oakes (1986) 19 CRR 308 (SCC). See further, § 52.11 infra.

establishing a Charter violation, it follows that the accused also bears the burden of justifying a remedy under s 24 or s 52 of the Charter'.[1] There is clear authority for this proposition in relation to s 24(2). In R v Collins, Lamer J held:

> [T]he use of the phrase 'if it is established' that places the burden of persuasion on the applicant, for it is the position which he maintains which must be established. Again, the standard of persuasion required can only be the civil standard of the balance of probabilities. Thus the applicant must make it more probable than not that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.[2]

However, in S v Naidoo,[3] the High Court found that despite the similarities to be found in FC s 35(5) and Charter s 24(2), significant differences remain. Most significantly FC s 35(5) does not contain the words 'if it is established that'. This proviso justified Lamer J's conclusion that the applicant bore the burden of establishing on a balance of probabilities that the evidence should be excluded.[4] McCall J, in Naidoo, whilst taking note of the distinction, made no finding regarding the onus, if any, pertaining to establishing the exclusion of evidence.

Erasmus J in S v Soci[5] endorsing his own judgment in S v Nombewu,[6] seems to express the view that the question of onus does not arise regarding the exclusion of evidence in terms of FC s 35(5):

> In my view, the procedural principles which underlie our accusatorial system of criminal trials are inappropriate for such enquiry. The court at this stage is not required to decide whether the accused did in fact perform the alleged self-incriminating acts or acted voluntarily, or indeed whether he is guilty as charged. The exercise of its discretion requires that the court form a value judgment in regard to the fairness of the trial. A court cannot, I think, arrive at such judgment by way of the general rules relating to issues such as relevancy and judicial cognisance. Importantly, the rules of law relating to the burden of proof do not apply, either for the final decision on the question, or for proof of the individual facts which bear on that decision … .[7]

In determining which approach is to be preferred it is interesting to note that in Canada the defence must prove that 'it [is] more probable than not that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute'.[8] The advantage of taking such an approach is to encourage judicial rigour in the exercise of discretion.[9] It also requires a commitment to the degree of unfairness that will be tolerated within the legal system. If the balance of probabilities standard is applied then it must be accepted that the judicial system

[1] D Stuart Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (3rd Edition, 2001) 42.
[2] Collins (supra) at 209.
[3] Naidoo (supra) at 52.
[4] The other distinctions between the two sections are: unlike s 35(5), s 24(2) does not specifically refer to the concept of a fair trial. (However, it is clear from Collins (supra) that this concept is incorporated in the Canadian exclusionary rule); furthermore s 24(2) refers to 'bringing the administration of justice into disrepute' whereas s 35(5) refers to the admission of evidence being 'detrimental to the interests of justice'.
[5] 1998 (3) BCLR 376 (E)('Soci').
[6] 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E)('Nombewu').
[7] Soci (supra) at 387 quoting from Nombewu (supra) at 420.
[8] Collins (supra) at 522.
[9] See D Mathias 'Fairness and the Criminal Standard of Proof' (1991) New Zealand LJ 159, 160.

is prepared to tolerate a reasonable possibility that the admission of the evidence would be unfair to the interests of justice.

The presumption of innocence clearly demands the exclusion of reasonable doubt as to the factual guilt of the accused determined in accordance with the 'comprehensive principles' of criminal liability. The determination of the relevancy of evidence, and hence its admissibility, plays an important role in ensuring the accuracy of the fact finding process. However, unconstitutionally obtained evidence is not excluded because it otherwise lacks relevance or compromises factual accuracy. It is excluded because its admission compromises constitutionally guaranteed rights. Its exclusion accords with the doctrine of legal guilt, in terms of which > a person is not to be held guilty of a crime merely on a showing that in all probability based upon reliable evidence, he did factually what he is said to have done. Instead, he is to be held guilty if and only if these factual determinations are made in a procedurally regular fashion and by authorities acting within competences duly allocated to them.[1]

If evidence is admitted despite the existence of a reasonable doubt as to fairness or whether it will be detrimental to the interests of justice, then the possibility arises of a conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt as to legal guilt. Simultaneously, the admission of the same piece of evidence may be material in ensuring that the prosecution has proved all the elements of its case beyond a reasonable doubt. An argument can be made that the presumption of innocence only requires the admissibility of evidence pertinent to factual guilt to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt,[2] and it is only when the question of admissibility of evidence is inextricably linked to proof of factual guilt that the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt in respect of admissibility should rest on the state. This rubric would allow the court to distinguish between the different constitutional violations that potentially bring FC s 35(5) into play.

In Mgcina, the constitutional infringement in question pertained directly to the admissibility of a confession.[3] (The right in issue was the accused's FC s 35(2)(b) right to choose and to consult with a legal practitioner, and to be informed of this right promptly.) Would the court's conclusion have been different if it was not the admissibility of a confession that was at stake? A confession is a very special type of evidence in that it is a statement that admits to all the elements of the offence charged. Consequently, if admissibility is not proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the state, there is a risk of conviction despite the existence of reasonable doubt as to factual guilt and consequently the presumption of innocence will also be infringed.[4]

However, where there is no possibility of unreliability, and relevance is not at issue, is it in the interests of the administration of justice to require the state to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that it did not infringe, say, the right to privacy and if it fails this hurdle that the admission of evidence will not be detrimental

[1] HL Packer The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968) 166.
[2] See § 52.4*(a)* supra.
[3] 2007 (1) SACR 82 (T).
[4] S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC), [1995] ZACC 1.

to the interests of justice? There is no possibility of a conviction despite the existence of a reasonable doubt as to factual guilt and neither requiring the accused to establish an infringement of a right nor establishing that admission would be detrimental to the interests of justice seems unduly onerous where the question of factual guilt is not in issue.

Whether the accused must bear the burden of persuading the court that unconstitutionally obtained evidence must be excluded on a balance of probabilities, or the state bear the burden of proving inclusion beyond a reasonable doubt, will no doubt have an impact on the number of successful prosecutions. Whilst the presumption of innocence reflects society's tolerance that a number of guilty persons escape conviction in order to minimise the possibility of an erroneous conviction, such tolerance is not infinitely elastic. A system of criminal justice may still operate effectively where the effect of the presumption of innocence is that X number of guilty escape conviction in order to ensure that one innocent is not erroneously convicted. If X is the optimal number, then the presumption of innocence will reinforce the legitimacy of the criminal justice system. However, where the number of persons erroneously escaping conviction increases significantly, or is perceived to increase significantly, the very opposite will occur. Furthermore, whilst most people would not dispute the abhorrence of wrongly convicting a factually innocent person, there is far more ambiguity when the question of legal guilt is separated from factual guilt.

52.11 Limitations analysis

The burdens and standards of proof applicable in civil and criminal trials are not easily transposed into the context of constitutional breach and justification because the proportionality analysis called for by FC s 36 requires a determination which—> is one of degree to be assessed in the concrete legislative and social setting of the measure, paying due regard to the means which are realistically available in our country at this stage, but without losing sight of the ultimate values to be protected.[1]

Our courts have held that a party alleging the violation of a constitutional right bears a burden of proving 'the facts upon which they rely for their claim of infringement of the particular right in question'.[2] It is not clear whether this burden is merely an evidentiary burden or a burden of proof, and no standard of proof has been specified by the Constitutional Court.[3]

Once a violation is established, the party wishing to establish that the violation is justifiable in terms of the limitations clause bears the burden of proving such

[1] S v Manamela 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC), [2000] ZACC 5 at para 32; Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC), [2000] ZACC 11 at para 31.

[2] Ferreira v Levin NO; Vryenhoek v Powell NO 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), [1995] ZACC 13 ('Ferreira') at para 44; S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), [1995] ZACC 3 at para 26.

[3] For more on burdens in limitations analysis, see Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 34.6.

justification.[1] But again the Constitutional Court has been silent as regards the standard of proof, if any, that must be met.

Dicta to date would suggest that the burden is indeed merely an evidentiary one. For example, in Phillips v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, the burden was described as follows:

> The burden placed upon the State is no ordinary onus. The State should place before a Court evidence and argument on which it intends to rely in support of justification. Although absence of this evidence and argument does not necessarily result in invalidity of the challenged provision, it may tip the scales against the State, but in appropriate cases only. It follows that the absence of evidence and argument from the State does not exempt the Court from the obligation to conduct the justification analysis and to apply what was described by Somyalo AJ as 'the primary criteria enumerated in s 36 of the Constitution'.[2]

The aforementioned paragraph refers to Somyalo AJ's judgment in Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae). The Moise Court observed:

> It is also no longer doubted that, once a limitation has been found to exist, the burden of justification under s 36(1) rests on the party asserting that the limitation is saved by the application of the provisions of the section. The weighing-up exercise is ultimately concerned with the proportional assessment of competing interests but, to the extent that justification rests on factual and/or policy considerations, the party contending for justification must put such material before the Court. It is for this reason that the government functionary responsible for legislation that is being challenged on constitutional grounds must be cited as a party. If the government wishes to defend the particular enactment, it then has the opportunity — indeed an obligation — to do so. The obligation includes not only the submission of legal argument but placing before Court the requisite factual material and policy considerations. Therefore, although the burden of justification under s 36 is no ordinary onus, failure by government to submit such data and argument may in appropriate cases tip the scales against it and result in the invalidation of the challenged enactment.[3]

This approach — which goes no further than placing a duty on a party wishing to justify a limitation to adduce evidence of facts or policies in order to reduce the risk of losing — was endorsed by the Constitutional Court in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO).[4] Here the Court noted the distinction between matters of fact which may be established by drawing of inferences from empirical data and matters of policy that are not always capable of such proof. It held that where a party relies on the underlying policy for justification, it > should place sufficient information before the Court as to the policy that is being furthered, the reasons for that policy and why it is considered reasonable in pursuit of that policy to limit a constitutional right. That is important, for if this is not done the Court may be unable

[1] Ferreira (supra) at para 44; Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2001 (4) 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC), [2001] ZACC 21 ('Moise') at para 19.

[2] 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC), [2003] ZACC 1 at para 20.

[3] Moise (supra) at para 19.

[4] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC), [2004] ZACC 10 ('NICRO').

> to discern what the policy is, and the party making the constitutional challenge does not have the opportunity of rebutting the contention through countervailing factual material or expert opinion. A failure to place such information before the Court, or to spell out the reasons for the limitation, may be fatal to the justification claim. There may, however, be cases where, despite the absence of such information on the record, a court is nonetheless able to uphold a claim of justification based on common sense and judicial knowledge.[1]

As the 'special type' of onus appears to be an evidentiary one, it will inevitably shift between the parties once prima facie proof in respect of a particular issue has been established.[2] This kind of shift of justification would not be the case if a 'real' onus or legal burden were placed on the parties.[3] It seems clear that the Constitutional Court is reluctant to impose any particular standard of proof on what is essentially a balancing process.[4] It would further appear that the burden of justification's functionality is restricted to assisting the court in conditions of uncertainty.

In contrast, the Canadian Supreme Court has clearly held that the party wishing to establish that the limitation of a Charter right is demonstrably justified in terms of s 1 of the Charter must do so on a preponderance of probability.[5] If a standard of proof is to be applied, the civil standard would seem most appropriate as the policy considerations that arise in the determination of guilt are absent.[6] However, it would seem artificial to attempt to impose either the civil or the criminal standard when a party attempts to discharge the burden of justifying the limitation of a fundamental right. It can be argued that the standard is already set by FC s 36: namely, the limitation must be reasonable and justifiable in a specified context, namely an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. It does not seem particularly useful to ask whether on a balance of probabilities (or beyond reasonable doubt) a limitation is reasonable and justifiable. The terms 'balance of probability' or 'beyond reasonable doubt' are not quantifiable measurements but rather the product of historical judicial intuition and there is no reason why a different standard of proof should not apply to limitations analysis.[7] [1] NICRO (supra) at para 36. See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC), [2002] ZACC 1 at para 57; Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering Gauteng 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC), [2001] ZACC 4 at para 7.

---

[2] Burden shifts are discussed in Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.6. Woolman and Botha prefer to use the term 'burden of justification' to describe what is required at each stage of fundamental rights analysis, and to distinguish burdens in fundamental rights analysis from burdens in other forms of legal analysis.

[3] For a discussion of the distinction between legal and evidentiary burdens, see D Zeffertt, A Paizes & A Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 121–124; PJ Schwikkard & S Van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2009) 571.

[4] See NICRO (supra) at para 37. For a critique of balancing, generally, see Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.8.

[5] R v Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103, 50 CR (3d) 1, 24 CCC (3d) 321.

[6] See § 52.4 supra.

[7] See Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.8 (The authors would appear to agree with this assessment.)

Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development,
University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional,
Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
Advocate of the High Court and Member of the Cape Bar
Honorary Research Associate, Department of Public Law, University of Cape Town
Junior Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JUTA

Second Edition, Revision Service 5 2013

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by ANdtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 5: 01–13]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development,
University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional,
Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Advocate of the High Court of South Africa
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JASON BRICKHILL
LLB (Cape Town) MSt (Oxon)
Member of the Johannesburg Bar
Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
Contributing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition, Revision Service 4 2012

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by AN dtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 4: 03–12]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART I

COURTS, PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT & STRUCTURES OF GOVERNMENT

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
	Volume 1
Structure of Constitutional Analysis
1	A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa	Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop
2	Constitutional History	Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel
3	Constitutional Litigation	Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop Courts
4	Jurisdiction	Sebastian Seedorf
5	Rules & Procedure in Constitutional Matters	Kate Hofmeyr
6	Costs	Michael Bishop
7	Standing, Ripeness & Mootness	Cheryl Loots
8	Amicus	Geoff Budlender
9	Remedies	Michael Bishop
Principles of Government
10	Democracy	Theunis Roux
11	Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution	Frank Michelman
12	Separation of Powers	Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda
13	Founding Provisions	Chris Roederer
14	Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations	Stu Woolman & Theunis Roux
15	Legislative Competence	Victoria Bronstein
16	Conflicts	Victoria Bronstein

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Structures of Government
17	National Legislative Authority	Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga
18	National Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Richard Stacey
19	Provincial Legislative Authority	Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman
20	Provincial Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti
21	Provincial Constitutions	Stu Woolman
	Volume 2
22	Local Government	Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser
23A	Public Administration	Anshal Bodasing
23B	Security Services	Stu Woolman
23C	War Powers	Stephen Ellmann
24	Chapter Nine Institutions:
	24A Public Protector	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
	24B Auditor General	Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte
	24C SA Human Rights Commission	Jonathan Klaaren
	24D Commission for Gender Equality	Cathi Albertyn
	24E Independent Communication Authority of South Africa	Justine White
	24F Commission for the Promotion & the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities	Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo
25	Public Procurement	Glenn Penfold & Pippa Reyburn
26	Traditional Leadership	Tom Bennett & Christina Murray
27	Public Finances	Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem
28	Transitional Provisions	Matthew Chaskalson
29	Elections	Glenda Fick
30	International Law & International Agreements	Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART II
The Bill of Rights

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Operational Provisions
31	Application	Stu Woolman
32	Interpretation	Lourens du Plessis
33	Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights	Sandra Liebenberg
34	Limitations	Stu Woolman & Henk Botha

Volume 3

Substantive Provisions
35	Equality	Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt
36	Dignity	Stu Woolman
37	Reproductive Rights	Michelle O'Sullivan
38	Privacy	David McQuoid-Mason
39	Life	Marius Pieterse
40	Freedom and Security of the Person	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
41	Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion	Paul Farlam
42	Freedom of Expression	Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein
43	Freedom of Assembly	Stu Woolman
44	Freedom of Association	Stu Woolman
45	Political Rights	Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch
46	Property	Theunis Roux
47	Children's Rights	Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton
48	Land	Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill
49	Sentencing and Punishment	Dirk Van Zyl Smit

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
50	Environment	Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson
51	Criminal Procedure: Rights of Detained, Arrested & Accused Persons	Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux
52	Evidence	PJ Schwikkard
	Volume 4
53	Labour Relations	Carole Cooper
54	Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession	Dennis Davis
55	Housing	Kirsty McLean
56	Socio-Economic Rights:
	56A Health	David Bilchitz
	56B Water	Malcom Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa
	56C Food	Danie Brand
	56D Social Security	Mia Swart
57	Education	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
58	Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion	Stu Woolman
59	Access to Courts	Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman
60	Citizenship	Jonathan Klaaren
61	States of Emergency	Nicole Fritz
62	Access to Information	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
63	Just Administrative Action	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
64	Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
65	Official Languages	Iain Currie
66	Movement and Residence	Jonathan Klaaren

53 Labour Relations

Carole Cooper

53.1 Introduction 53–1
(a) Application 53–2
(i) Burdens 53–2
(ii) Benefits 53–3
(b) Jurisdiction 53–5
53.2 Right to fair labour practices 53–10
(a) Broad construction of 'everyone' 53–11
(b) Labour practices 53–11
(c) Fairness 53–15
53.3 Freedom of association rights 53–19
(a) Right to form and join trade unions 53–19
(b) Union security arrangements 53–23
53.4 Right to organise 53–28
53.5 Right to engage in collective bargaining 53–32
53.6 Right to strike 53–44
(a) Lockouts 53–57
(b) Picketing 53–58

Labour Relations

23. (1) Everyone has the right to fair labour practices.

(2) Every worker has the right —

(a) to form and join a trade union;

(b) to participate in the activities and programmes of a trade union; and

(c) to strike.

(3) Every employer has the right —

(a) to form and join an employers' organisation; and

(b) to participate in the activities and programmes of an employers' organisation.

(4) Every trade union and every employers' organisation has the right —

(a) to determine its own administration, programmes and activities;

(b) to organise; and

(c) to form and join a federation.

(5) Every trade union, employers' organisation and employer has the right to engage in collective bargaining. National legislation may be enacted to regulate collective bargaining. To the extent that the legislation may limit a right in this chapter, the limitation must comply with section 36(1).

(6) National legislation may recognise union security arrangements contained in collective agreements. To the extent that the legislation may limit a right in this chapter, the limitation must comply with section 36(1).[1]

53.1 INTRODUCTION

FC s 23 regulates labour relations rights,[2] both of an individual and a collective nature. While the labour relations rights in the Final Constitution largely track those in the Interim Constitution,[3] there have, however, been some significant changes: The right to strike is unencumbered,[4] employers' recourse to the lock-out has been excluded; giving effect to the international practice that the right to strike and lockout are not equivalent; labour-related association rights reflect more closely the protections afforded by the ILO;[5] the right to collective

[1] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] The impact of the Final Constitution on labour relations is not confined to the labour relations rights. Other rights are also of relevance, among them the right to equality (FC s 9), privacy (FC s 14), assembly, demonstration, picket and petition (FC s 17), human dignity (FC s 10), freedom of expression (FC s 16), and freedom of association (FC s 18).

[3] See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution'). Section 27 read: '(1) Every person shall have the right to fair labour practices. (2) Workers shall have the right to form and join trade unions, and employers shall have the right to form and join employers' organisations. (3) Workers and employers shall have the right to organise and bargain collectively. (4) Workers shall have the right to strike for the purposes of collective bargaining. (5) Employers' recourse to the lockout shall not be impaired, subject to section 33 (1).'

[4] FC s 23(2)(c). Under the Interim Constitution, the right to strike was granted for the purposes of collective bargaining. This purpose has now been omitted.

[5] (1948) ILO No 87, 68 UNTS 17 (Ratified by South Africa on 19 February 1996). Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention read as follows: Art 2 'Workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and, subject only to the rules of the organisation concerned, to join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation.' Art 3 '1. Workers' and employers' organisations shall have the right to draw up their constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom, to organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. 2. The public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful bargaining has been reformulated, arguably to give effect to the statutory collective bargaining regime;[1] and union security arrangements contained in national legislation are permitted.[2]

The Constitutional Court has, under the Final Constitution, had little occasion to develop jurisprudence on the labour rights — no doubt because of the extensive regulation of labour relations. Nevertheless, the case law that has emerged has been critical to a deeper understanding, in particular, of fair labour practices and the right to strike. The Constitutional Court has also had to consider its approach to the interpretation of labour legislation, where that legislation, such as the Labour Relations Act (LRA),[3] seeks to give effect to and to regulate FC s 23 rights. Finally, the Court has been obliged to determine the constitutional jurisdiction of other superior courts in relation to labour matters arising under FC s 23. Jurisprudence has also been developed by the High Court with respect to constitutional labour rights, but sometimes with a less than satisfactory result. For instance, the High Court has advanced contrasting interpretations of the constitutional right to engage in collective bargaining (see below).[4]

(a) Application

(i) Burdens

The Bill of Rights in the Final Constitution applies to all law and binds the legislature, executive, organs of state and the judiciary. FC s 8(2) provides that the Bill of Rights may be applied horizontally to private persons (including juristic persons), provided it is applicable, thus bringing the conduct of private citizens under constitutional scrutiny.[5] Labour rights are eminently suited to horizontal application. The reference in FC s 23 to workers and employers and their organizations indicates that the rights have primarily to do with the relationship between private citizens.[6] Labour practices, trade unions and employer organizations, organizational activities, collective bargaining, strikes, and union security exercise thereof.' Art 5 'Workers' and employers' organisations shall have the right to establish and join federations and confederations and any such organisation, federation or confederation shall have the right to affiliate with international organisations of workers and employers.' See IC ss 23(2)(a) and (b); (3)(a) and (b); (4)(a), (b) and (c).

[1] FC s 23(5). The Interim Constitution granted the right to collective bargaining; the Final Constitution grants the right 'to engage' in collective bargaining. § 53.5 infra.

[2] FC s 23(6).

[3] Act 66 of 1995.

[4] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2003 (3) SA 239 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 1495 (T); South African National Defence Union & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 2101 (T).

[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. See also Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC).

[6] That labour rights are eminently capable of horizontal application is indicated by international law. Articles 1 and 2 of the International Labour Organization's Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention envisages that the protection accorded to workers and employers and their organizations regarding their activities relates to private conduct as well as to legislative enactments. (1949) ILO No 98, 96 UNTS 257 (ratified by South Africa on 19 February 1996).

arrangements — the subject matter of the FC s 23 rights — all relate to the mediation of private relationships on an individual or a collective basis. As we have seen above, however, little jurisprudence on disputes between employers and workers under the labour rights has emerged because labour legislation regulates, to a large degree, the private conduct between employers and employees, and leaves little space for constitutional contestation.[1]

(ii) Benefits

The labour relations rights in FC s 23 are granted mainly to workers and employers, and their organisations. The use of the term 'worker' rather then 'employee' is significant. The terms are not synonymous. 'Worker' has a meaning that is broader than the term 'employee'.[2]

The constitutional scope of the term 'worker' was examined in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another.[3] The SANDU I Court found that the term 'worker' in FC s 23 was used in the context of employers and employment. It referred to those persons who worked for an employer, which would, primarily, be those who had entered into a contract of employment to provide services to such employer. By comparison, members of the permanent defence force did not enter into contracts of employment. They enrolled in the force.[4] However, the SANDU I Court found that in many respects the relationship between members of the permanent defence force and the military was 'akin' to an employment relationship, which argued in favour of these members being considered 'workers' for the purposes of the right.[5] They could, therefore, claim the protection of the right and were entitled to form and join trade unions.[6]

[1] The Final Constitution instructs a court when applying a right to natural or juristic persons to develop the common law to the extent that legislation does not give effect to the right. See FC s 8(3). The fairly comprehensive scope of labour legislation means that there will probably be little need to develop the common law, and thus the impact of the labour rights on such law will be slight.

[2] Section 213 of the 1995 LRA defines an employee as '(a) any person, excluding an independent contractor, who works for another person or for the State and who receives, or is entitled to receive, any remuneration, and (b) any other person who in any manner assists in carrying on or conducting the business of an employer, and "employed" and "employment" have meanings corresponding to that of "employee"'.

[3] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC), (1999) 20 ILJ 2265 (CC)('SANDU I'). The Court was called on to decide whether prohibiting members of the defence force from forming and joining trade unions was an infringement of the right to freedom of association which applies to 'workers' (and employers).

[4] Ibid at para 22.

[5] Ibid at para 24. The Court stated that members of the armed forces rendered a service for which they received a range of benefits, the latter including salaries and allowances, leave, medical and transport benefits and certain mess expenses. Termination of membership, in general, occurred on the basis of misconduct or retirement and at the request of a member. However, misconduct was punishable in terms of the Military Disciplinary Code. The Code provided that members were criminally liable for specific forms of misconduct and might be sentenced to prison. In that respect, at least, the relationship was different from the employment relationship.

[6] Ibid at paras 35 and 36.

The above finding of the SANDU I Court suggests that the notion of 'worker' contained in FC s 23 should be generously interpreted. It thus could encompass persons who have not entered into a formal contract of employment but are in work relationships 'akin' to the employment relationship governed by a contract of employment. Thus, workers in atypical work relationships could fall within the scope of the term 'worker' and be protected by the right.[1] Currently, many workers are treated as independent contractors, when, in truth, they are workers as they are dependent on the person for whom they undertake the work. In other words, the formal nature of the employment relationship does not conform to its reality. Labour legislation is alert to the problem of workers being falsely portrayed as independent contractors. Both the LRA[2] and the BCEA[3] provide for a process whereby the real nature of the relationship between an employer and a person providing a service may be determined so as to ensure that persons who work in a subordinate and dependent manner are captured as employees in terms of the definition of employee under the Acts.[4] A generous interpretation of the term 'worker' in terms of FC s 23 will protect not only these workers, but other dependent and subordinate workers who might currently lack protection under the existing statutory framework.

Distinct from the other sub-sections in FC s 23, FC s 23(1) grants the right to fair labour practices to 'everyone'. The Constitutional Court has written that FC s 23(1) engages 'broadly speaking, the relationship between the worker and employer'[5] This embedding of FC s 23(1) within the employment relationship inevitably curtails the reach of the term 'everyone'. The Court's characterisation of the right's ambit as 'broadly speaking' encompassing the employment relationship is an indication, nevertheless, that the parameters of the right should remain flexible. As with the expanded notion of the term 'worker', this 'broad' reading

[1] For a detailed exposition of this argument, see H Cheadle 'Labour Relations' in South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights 18-4–18-7.

[2] Section 200A of the 1995 LRA provides that a person who works for, or renders services to, any other person is presumed, until the contrary is proved, to be an employee, regardless of the form of the contract, if any one or more of the following factors is present:

'(a) The manner in which the person works is subject to the control or direction of another person; (b) the person's hours of work are subject to the control or direction of another person; (c) in the case of a person who works for an organization, the person is part of that organization; (d) the person has worked for that other person for an average of at least 40 hours per month over the last three months; (e) the person is economically dependent on the other person for whom that person works or renders services; (f) the person is provided with tools of trade or work equipment by the other person; or (g) the person only workers for or renders services to one person.'

[3] See 1997 BCEA s 83A. The wording of the provision is the same as that found in 1995 LRA s 200A.

[4] See Cheadle (supra) at 18-6. Cheadle argues that the criteria for determining whether a person is a worker is the personal nature of the service and whether the person works for another in a manner which is subordinate and dependent. He relies on the following: ILO Meeting of Experts (2000) 4; The UK's Employment Rights Act 1996 (section 202(3)); P Davies & M Freedland Employees (2000) 267; and Article 1 of the Draft Convention on Contract Labour (1998) ILO Report V (2B).

[5] NEHAWU v UCT (2003) 24 ILJ 95 (CC), 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC), ('NEHAWU') at para 40.

could encompass persons on the margins of the employment relationship, including those in the employee-like relationships mentioned above.[1]

The Final Constitution recognises that 'everyone' may include not only natural persons, but juristic persons as well.[2] Employers are typically either natural or juristic persons depending on the nature of the organisation and the way in which they conduct their business.[3] In NEHAWU, the applicant's argument that 'everyone' in FC s 23*(c)* referred only to workers, and excluded employers, was based on the mistaken view that all employers were juristic persons and thus not embraced by the term 'everyone'. The NEHAWU Court, finding that the right applied equally to workers and to employers, correctly held that not all employers were juristic persons and that the right should apply to all employers, juristic or otherwise.[4]

(b) Jurisdiction

The Final Constitution makes the Constitutional Court the highest court in all constitutional matters. It may decide only constitutional matters and issues connected with constitutional matters, and makes the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter or an issue connected with a constitutional matter.[5] These general terms do not, however, speak to the somewhat unique character of constitutional jurisdiction in matters relating to labour relations.

The jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in relation to labour matters was an issue under the Interim Constitution. Under the latter, provision was made to limit judicial intervention on the grounds that decision-making

[1] The right might protect job applicants from discrimination. While such persons are now protected by the Employment Equity Act 75 of 1998 (section 6(1) read with section 9) and have recourse under the constitutional right to equality, nevertheless it could be argued that they may also rely on the right to fair labour practices.

[2] FC s 8(4).

[3] According to company law, a juristic person comprises incorporated companies, close corporations and foundations, while it excludes partnerships and trusts. See H Cilliers & M Benade Corporate Law (2000) 6.

[4] NEHAWU (supra) at 113.

[5] FC s 167 (3)(a), (b), (c). The Constitutional Court has interpreted the notion of constitutional matters broadly. See S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC) at para 13 ('If regard is had to the provisions of s 172(1)(a) and s 167(4)(a) of the Constitution, constitutional matters must include disputes as to whether any law or conduct is inconsistent with the Constitution, as well as issues concerning the status, powers and functions of an organ of state. Under s 167(7), the interpretation, application and upholding of the Constitution are also constitutional matters. So too, under s 39(2), is the question whether in the interpretation of any legislation or the development of the common law promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. If regard is had to this and to the wide scope and application of the Bill of Rights, and to the other detailed provisions of the Constitution, such as the allocation of powers to various legislatures and structures of government, the jurisdiction vested in the Constitutional Court to determine constitutional matters and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters is clearly an extensive jurisdiction.') on such matters was best managed by specialist courts and tribunals provided for under the statutory labour regime. IC s 33(5)(a) read: 'The provisions of a law in force at the commencement of this Constitution promoting fair employment practices, orderly and equitable collective bargaining and the regulation of industrial action shall remain in full force and effect until repealed or amended by the legislature.' The effect of this provision was to immunize labour law provisions falling within the specified categories from constitutional attack.

This provision reappeared in the draft Final Constitution in a slightly modified form. It stated that the provisions of the LRA 1995 were to remain valid until they were amended or repealed.[1] The Constitutional Court refused to certify this provision. In the First Certification Judgment, the Court found it to be in conflict with Constitutional Principles (CPs) II, IV and VII. These principles, read together, made it plain that all statutory provisions had to be subject to the supremacy of the Final Constitution unless they were made part of the Final Constitution itself.[2] If that latter route were followed, the provisions had to comply with the special procedures as contemplated in CP XV. If not made part of the Final Constitution, then the provisions were subject to constitutional review as contemplated by principles II and VII. The Court found that it could not have been the intention of the drafters of the CPs to shield ordinary statutes from constitutional review and held that the section was not, as a result, in compliance with the CPs.

The LRA provides that the Act has been enacted to give effect to the Constitution.[3] One way of reading this provision is that the LRA is an extension of the Final Constitution and is thus fully constitutive of the constitutional labour rights. On such a reading, the provisions in the LRA would be placed beyond constitutional scrutiny. The Constitutional Court has rejected the view that the LRA is immunized from constitutional scrutiny simply because it purports to give effect to the constitutional labour rights. In National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others, the Court held that our constitutional democracy 'envisages the development of a coherent system of law that is shaped by the Constitution'[4] and to which all law is subordinate. Where an Act is passed to give effect to a constitutional right it will be subject to constitutional scrutiny to ensure that its provisions are not inconsistent with the Final Constitution.[5] It follows that where the constitutional validity of an Act is challenged, a court must first determine the extent of the constitutional right in order to assess whether the legislation gives effect to it. According to the NEHAWU Court, where the legislation falls within 'constitutional limits', a court, interpreting the legislation, must then give full

[1] Draft FC s 241.
[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at 149.
[3] Section 1*(a)* of the1995 LRA.
[4] NEHAWU (supra) at 106.
[5] Ibid at para 14.

effect to the legislative purpose.[1] The 'proper interpretation of such legislation will ensure the protection, promotion and fulfilment of constitutional rights and as such will be a constitutional matter.'[2] If the effect of this requirement, the NEHAWU Court held, was that it would have jurisdiction in all labour matters, then that would be an inevitable 'consequence of our constitutional democracy.'[3] The Court thus unequivocally asserted its right to adjudicate constitutional issues in all labour matters. The Court in National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa & Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd confirmed this assertion of jurisdiction by stating that it would be shirking its constitutional duty if it were to hold that it would never hear appeals from the Labour Appeal Court (LAC).[4]

While the Court has emphasised its judicial responsibility to scrutinize labour matters, it has indicated that it will not always intervene in such matters.[5] The overall test is whether the interests of justice require the Court to hear the dispute. The Court has adumbrated the following factors as relevant to determining whether it will assert jurisdiction:

- the prospects of success on appeal;[6]
- the nature of the constitutional issue and its importance;[7]
- whether the dispute should be left to the specialist courts to resolve.[8]

In addition to determining its own jurisdiction under FC s 23, the Constitutional Court has also considered the constitutional jurisdiction of the Supreme [1] NEHAWU (supra) at para 14. The court has stated that the infringement of a fundamental right by a legislative provision is a constitutional matter.

[2] Ibid at para 14.

[3] Ibid at para 16.

[4] NUMSA v Bader Bop (2003) 24 ILJ 305 (CC), 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), ('NUMSA v Bader Bop') at para 20.

[5] NEHAWU (supra) at para 18.

[6] NEHAWU (supra) at paras 25 & 26, NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 17. See also Xinwa & Others v Volkswagen of SA (Pty) Ltd 2003 (4) SA 390 (CC), 2003 (6) BCLR 575 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 1077 (CC) at para 16 (in which the Constitutional Court declined to consider the matter of an allegedly procedurally unfair dismissal because there were no prospects that the Court would find that the dismissal had been procedurally fair.)

[7] NEHAWU was the first occasion on which the Court was required to consider and define its approach to the interpretation of a provision which was part of legislation designed to give effect to a constitutional right. Moreover, the application would affect some 267 workers who had lost their employment. In NUMSA v Bader Bop, which concerned the alleged limitation of the constitutional right to strike, the Court stated that the restriction would affect all trade unions and their members and thus the issue deserved to be heard on appeal from the LAC.

[8] In NEHAWU, the Court acknowledged the need for labour disputes to be resolved expeditiously in the interests of the economy and labour peace and that the legislature had provided specialist courts for that purpose. Because of this, said the court, it would be slow to hear appeals from the LAC unless they raised important issues of principle, which was the case in the matter under consideration. NEHAWU (supra) at paras 30, 31, & 32. In NUMSA v Bader Bop the Court reiterated this position by stating that the establishment of specialist courts to resolve matters expeditiously in the field of labour relations meant that the Court would be slow to intervene in such disputes. However, where it had been alleged that there had been an infringement of a constitutional right that would be a factor in favour of granting leave to appeal. NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 20.

Court of Appeal (SCA) over labour matters on appeal from the Labour Appeal Court (LAC). A central issue is whether there is an appeal to the SCA from the LAC on constitutional issues in labour matters, or whether the Constitutional Court should be the only court of appeal. The NEHAWU Court held that although the LRA constituted the LAC as a final court of appeal in matters from the Labour Court,[1] it was not the equivalent of the SCA in respect of appeals on constitutional matters.[2] The SCA could decide appeals in any matter and was the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters.[3] While the legislature's intention that labour disputes should be resolved expeditiously and cheaply could be undermined by this finding, the NEHAWU Court showed that it was alive to the potential negative effect of its ruling by holding that there was nothing to prevent a litigant from appealing directly to the Constitutional Court.[4]

The issue of the jurisdiction of the superior courts and the specialist labour courts over constitutional issues is likely to be short-lived. The Superior Courts Bill proposes that the specialist labour courts be abolished and that a specialist labour panel be established within the main court system.[5]

[1] LRA s 167(2) and (3).

[2] NEHAWU (supra) at para 23.

[3] Ibid at para 21. See also FC s 168(3).

[4] NEHAWU (supra) at para 22. See FC s 167(6)(b) read together with s 16(2) of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act 13 of 1995 and rule 18 of the Rules of the Constitutional Court. The Court has also had occasion to consider the constitutional jurisdiction of the High Court (HC) in labour matters, but under different constitutional rights. See Fredericks & Others v MEC for Education & Training, Eastern Cape & Others 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 (CC), (2002) 23 ILJ 81 (CC) ('Fredericks'). In Fredericks, the Court had to consider the HC's jurisdiction where it was alleged that the application of a collective agreement concluded in terms of s 24 of the 1995 LRA infringed the rights to just administrative action and equality in a context where the state was the employer. The LRA provides that disputes over such agreements are to be arbitrated under the auspices of the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration (CCMA) established under the LRA and are not justiciable in the Labour Court (LC). Arbitration awards are binding and there is no appeal to the LC against a ruling of the arbitrator, only a right of review. The Constitutional Court found firstly, that in terms of FC s 169, the HC's constitutional jurisdiction could only be ousted where the legislature had accorded that jurisdiction to a court of similar status. Section 24 of the LRA, the Court found, did not oust the HC's jurisdiction because the CCMA was not a court of similar status to the HC. Secondly, the court then considered whether elsewhere the Act had assigned jurisdiction over the matter to the LC, which the LRA had cast as a court of similar status to the HC [section 151(2)], as that would have had the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the HC. It found that the Act conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the LC to hear all matters [section 157(1)] — which would include constitutional matters — where it was specifically assigned such jurisdiction in the Act. It found that there was no express provision of the Act affording the LC jurisdiction to determine disputes arising from an alleged infringement of constitutional rights by the state acting in its capacity as employer, other than s 157 (2). However, that provision accorded concurrent jurisdiction to the LC and the HC. Thus the provision did not oust the jurisdiction of the HC. Accordingly, the Court found, contrary to the decision of the court a quo, that the HC did have jurisdiction over the matter. This finding of the CC should not be read as granting the HC jurisdiction over disputes of a constitutional nature arising from collective agreements as a matter of course. The Act envisages that disputes over the interpretation and application of agreements should be settled only by binding arbitration. This is not the place to discuss the full ramifications of the decision. Suffice it to say that on policy grounds alone there are good reasons for the HC to demonstrate caution before intervening in such disputes.

[5] B52-2003, s 3(1)(a)(ii) & s 12.

There is a strong case to be made for judicial deference in labour matters. In essence, the relationship between employers and workers is one of power mediated through a variety of mechanisms. Because of their complex and polycentric nature and the trade off in power which lies at their heart, labour disputes are ill-suited to constitutional adjudication.[1] Labour law needs to be responsive to the changing demands of the employment relationship and the context in which it operates. It needs to be negotiated and renegotiated to balance multiple competing interests within an ever-changing economic environment.[2]

Nevertheless, cognisance also needs to be taken of the imperatives of our new constitutional dispensation. Those negotiating the Final Constitution saw fit to include labour relations among its fundamental rights and freedoms. The Court's approach to date is one that strikes the correct balance between the poles of interventionism and abstentionism. It has demonstrated its awareness that principles governing the wage-work bargain should be left more fluid and amenable to change and thus has indicated that it will exercise its constitutional jurisdiction in a supervisory manner, intervening in labour matters only when necessary to do so to fulfil it role as the guarantor of constitutional labour rights.[3]

[1] JM Weiler sums up the case for deference as follows:

> 'I believe our current system of collective bargaining regulating the relations between workers and employers is too complicated and sophisticated a field to be put under the scrutiny of a judge in a contest between two litigants arguing vague notions such as 'reasonable' and 'justifiable' in a free and democratic society. I have no confidence that our adversary court system is capable of arriving at a proper balance between the competing political, democratic and economic interests that are the stuff of labour legislation When we consider that collective bargaining law is polycentric in nature, adjustments to the delicate industrial relations balance in one part of the system might have unanticipated and unfortunate effects in another. The lessons of the evolution of our labour law regime in the past 50 years displays very clearly that the legislatures are far better equipped than the courts to strike the appropriate balance between the interests of the individual employee, the union, the employer and the public.'

JM Weiler 'The Regulation of Strikes and Picketing under the Charter' in Weiler & Elliot (eds) Litigating the Values of a Nation: The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (YEAR) 226, quoted in M Brassey Employment Law note 1 at C3:16 Juta 1998.

[2] For a sceptical view as to whether constitutional adjudication has any positive value at all in resolving labour conflict, see H Arthurs The Constitutionalisation of Labour Rights (2005). Arthur argues that constitutional adjudication purports to lay down the law 'for all time' — which is the antithesis of what is required to resolve labour conflict. Constitutional adjudication, he argues, is ill-suited to contend with the dynamic context of labour law. Thus he states:

> 'Trade offs in labour law involve power, not just logic or ethics. They are dynamic and not static. That is why labour laws have to be negotiated in the first place, then constantly renegotiated over time as power shifts, as the economy changes, as technology and demography changes, as social attitudes change, as we learn from experience, as new insights emerge.'

Ibid at 12. Arthurs's position that constitutional adjudication is unlikely to play any positive role is questionable. In the two cases in which the Constitutional Court has intervened to determine the nature of labour rights, NEHAWU and NUMSA, it has overturned decisions of the LAC which were inimical to the interests of workers, and which were at odds with the intention of the legislature. However, his view that constitutional adjudication is unlikely to play a systemic transformative role is probably true — the transformation of the underlying structures relevant to labour relations is a matter of political will and inclination.

[3] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at paras 13 and 20.

53.2 Right to Fair Labour Practices

While other constitutions contain rights to freedom of association, collective bargaining and the right to strike, it is rare to find a constitution that includes the broad and vague right to fair labour practices. The motivation for its inclusion was a demand by public sector employees for access to the unfair labour practice law on dismissals developed under the 1956 LRA. They viewed such access as an essential means of protecting their jobs during the transition to a new political dispensation.[1] In the constitutional negotiations this concern led to the embedding of this right in Constitutional Principle XXVII and its subsequent appearance as a fundamental right in both the Interim and Final Constitutions.

International jurisprudence is of limited use in providing a definitive interpretation of the right. International law extensively regulates labour rights, in particular through the conventions and recommendations of the International Labour Organisation (ILO). Nowhere, however, do these conventions and recommendations provide specifically for a right to fair labour practices, although many of the practices so protected could be co-incident with the right.[2] A similar point can be made in relation to the rights protected under the European Social Charter.[3] Foreign law is similarly unenlightening. British law, for instance, is unsatisfactory as a guide because its unfair labour practice regime is narrowly linked to its law on unfair dismissal. In the US, the unfair labour practice jurisprudence is concerned primarily with prohibitions relating to collective labour practices.[4] In India, the [1] See H Cheadle 'Labour Relations' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (1st Edition, 2002) 18-9. Cheadle has stated that the provision was inserted in the Interim Constitution as part of the package of provisions to secure the support of the public service for the new constitutional dispensation and in particular for the restructuring and the transformation of the public service into a single public service that would be broadly representative of the South African community.

[2] They embrace such varied concerns as health, safety and social security; working time; minimum wages, equal pay, and other remuneration matters; job security; minimum age and forced labour protections; and discrimination.

[3] The European Social Charter of 1961 guarantees, among other things, the right to just conditions of work (art 2); and the right to a fair remuneration (art 4). The Charter's right to just conditions of work includes reasonable daily and working hours and a progressive reduction in the working week; public holidays with pay; two weeks' annual holiday with pay; weekly rest periods and additional holidays or reduced working hours for those in dangerous or unhealthy occupations. While just working conditions conveys a similar meaning to 'fair labour practices' ('just' includes the notion of fairness, and 'conditions' are the product of practices), the rather arbitrary inclusion of some working conditions and the exclusion of others from the category limits its usefulness as an interpretive guide.

[4] In summary, s 8 of the National Labour Relations Act (NLRA) provides that it is an unfair labour practice by an employer to:

1. interfere with employees' collective bargaining rights;
2. interfere with the formation or administration of any labour organization;
3. discriminate in hiring or regarding any term or conditions of employment as a way of influencing membership of a labour organization;
4. dismiss or discriminate against an employee for exercising rights under the unfair labour practice provision;
5. refuse to bargain collectively with representatives of his employees.

unfair labour practice jurisprudence is limited to victimization for trade union activities and unfair dismissal.[1] A more fruitful avenue for determining the content of the right lies in our own labour law. Specific regard should be had to the unfair labour practice jurisprudence grounded in the 1956 LRA,[2] the 1995 LRA[3] and the 1997 Basic Conditions of Employment Act.[4]

(a) Construction of 'everyone'

As noted above, the Constitutional Court has found that FC s 23(1) refers 'broadly speaking' to the employment relationship. Thus the right may be interpreted as embracing persons on the margins of that relationship. The term 'everyone' should be interpreted within this context.

(b) Labour Practices

Labour relations are essentially concerned with the employer-worker relationship, and labour practices with matters of mutual interest which arise from that relationship. A wide range of matters may potentially fall within the ambit of labour practices covered by FC s 23(1). As we have seen above, international law provides little real guidance as to the ambit of FC s23(1), whereas domestic law constitutes a much richer source for determining the meaning of the right. Under the 1956 LRA, the Industrial Court fashioned an equity based jurisprudence arising from the unfair labour practice provision introduced into the law in 1979.[5] The very broad and vague nature of the initial provision,[6] which stated that an unfair labour practice was 'any labour practice which in the opinion of the industrial court is an unfair labour practice', gave the court wide scope in developing its jurisprudence. Later refinements to the provision gave it greater content, and over time the court developed a body of rights-based rules in terms of which

---

Labour organizations commit an unfair labour practice by

1. coercing or restraining employees in the exercise of collective bargaining rights;
2. causing an employer to discriminate against non-union members;
3. refusing to bargain collectively with an employer;
4. engaging in or pressurizing workers to engage in certain strikes and boycotts;
5. charging discriminatory agency fees;
6. requiring employers to pay for services not performed;
7. picketing where the object is to force an employer to bargain with a labour organization as the representative of his employees.

R Blanpain (ed) International Encyclopaedia of Industrial Relations and Labour Law: Vol 5, USA (Supplement 86, February 1988) 124-7.

[1] Blanpain (supra) Vol 6, India (Supplement 101, June 1989) at 103.

[2] Act 28 of 1956.

[3] Act 66 of 1995.

[4] Act 75 of 1997.

[5] See Commission of Enquiry into Labour Legislation (1979) Part 5 4.127.17 (The Wiehann Commission). The Commission was responsible for the recommendations that led to this change in the LRA.

[6] Industrial Conciliation Amendment Act 94 of 1979.

fairness was seen broadly as encompassing a balancing of employees' and employers' interests in order to achieve the Act's object of labour peace. [1] The Industrial Court's labour practices were, in terms of this new provision, found to cover both individual and collective practices, but were confined to the employer-employee relationship.[2] The generous equity-based jurisprudence developed by the court led to the following findings of unfairness: (a) unfair dismissals because of the absence of a fair reason and procedure;[3] (b) the dismissal of strikers for participating in a lawful strike;[4] (c) failure to reemploy in terms of an agreement; (d) failure to renew a contract where there was a reasonable expectation of such renewal;[5] (e) selective dismissal;[6] (f) racial discrimination;[7] and (g) victimisation for trade union activities.[8] Among the unfair labour practices struck down by the court as conducive to labour unrest and the undermining of the employment relationship were: (a) a refusal to bargain;[9] (b) bad faith bargaining;[10] (c) a failure to accord rights relevant to the bargaining process;[11] (d) the use of unfair bargaining tactics;[12] and (e) the resort to industrial action before deadlock had been reached in negotiations.[13] The court, however, declined to consider matters relating to bargaining topics, bargaining levels, and the wage-work bargain, on the grounds that this would have constituted an unwarranted descent into the collective bargaining arena.[14]

[1] See Consolidated Frame Cotton Corporation v The President, Industrial Court (1986) 7 ILJ 489 (A).

[2] In this body of jurisprudence, 'practice' was interpreted as including both habitual action and a single act or omission. See Trident Steel (Pty) Ltd v John NO (1987) 8 ILJ 27 (W); SAAWU v Border Boxes (Pty) Ltd (1987) 8 ILJ 467 (C). Labour included both mental and physical labour. See Bleazard v Argus Printing & Publishing Co Ltd (1983) 4 ILJ 60, 70 (IC).

[3] See A Rycroft & B Jordaan A Guide to South African Labour Law (1992) Chapter 4.

[4] See NUM v Marievale Consolidated Mines Ltd (1986) 7 ILJ 123 (IC).

[5] See Mtshamba v Boland Houtnywerhede (1986) 7 ILJ 563 (IC).

[6] See Fihla v Pest Control (1984) 5 ILJ 165 (IC).

[7] See MWU v East Rand Gold & Uranium Co Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1070 (IC).

[8] See Mbatha v Vleissentraal Co-operative Ltd (1985) 6 ILJ 333 (IC).

[9] See FAWU v Spekenham Supreme (1988) 9 ILJ 628 (IC); SACWU v Sasol Industries (Pty) Ltd (1989) 10 ILJ 1031 (IC); Buthelezi v Labour for Africa (1991) 12 ILJ 588 (IC); NUM v East Rand Gold & Uranium Co Ltd 1992 (1) SA 700 (A); (1991) 12 ILJ 1221 (A); Macsteel (Pty) Ltd v NUMSA(1990) 11 ILJ 995 (LAC).

[10] See Mawu v Natal Die Casting Co (Pty) Ltd (1986) 7 ILJ 520 (IC).

[11] See NUM v Free State Consolidated Gold Mines (Operations) Ltd (1988) 9 ILJ 804 (IC).

[12] See East Rand Gold & Uranium Co Ltd v NUM (1989) 10 ILJ 683 (LAC).

[13] See NUM v Henry Gould (Pty) Ltd (1988) 9 ILJ 1149 1154-1155 (IC); Olivier v AECI Plofstowwe & Chemikaliee, Bethal (1988) 9 ILJ 1052, 1058-1059 (IC).

[14] The resolution of such disputes, considered to be 'interest' disputes, is left to collective (and individual) bargaining between the parties. While interest disputes generally encompass disputes over new terms and conditions of work, rights disputes, on the other hand, refer to disputes arising from the application or interpretation of an existing law, collective agreement or contract and are usually settled through adjudication. Not all disputes are easily classifiable, and some may migrate from one category to another. Thus under the LRA disputes over dismissals for operational requirements were initially regarded as disputes of right adjudicable in the Labour Court, but now certain of these disputes may be resolved through strike action. Unions may elect to follow one course or the other (sections 189 & 189A of the 1995 LRA). See, more generally, Conciliation and Arbitration Procedures in Labour Disputes ILO 5 and Wiehahn Commission Report: Part 1 (1979) 89-90 para 4.5.

Drawing on the jurisprudence of the Industrial Court on unfair labour practices, the 1995 LRA has codified the following as unfair labour practices: unfair conduct in relation to workers' security (unfair dismissal, including dismissal during a transfer of a business, unfair suspension and the failure to re-employ or reinstate), unfair treatment in relation to work opportunities (promotion, demotion, probation, training and benefits[1] — more recently victimisation arising from whistle blowing has been added to the list[2]), and unfair disciplinary action.[3] However, in contrast to the 1956 Act, the 1995 LRA — while promoting collective bargaining through the creation of the mechanisms for such bargaining, the protection of trade unions and employer organisations, the recognition of organisational rights, the establishment of industrial councils and the right to strike — has not codified a right to collective bargaining and the correlative duty to bargain. Nor does it regulate issues relating to such bargaining, such as bargaining in good faith. The stance of the Act is that these and other bargaining issues, such as bargaining agents and levels, are to be decided by power play. In accordance with the previous regime, the 1995 LRA also leaves to power play the resolution of disputes over the substantive economic demands of the parties. This schema does not ignore the situation of more vulnerable non-unionised workers: they are protected by minimum standards legislation in the form of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act (BCEA), which sets a floor of rights in respect of a wide range of terms and conditions of work, as well as by legislation on health and safety.[4]

The Constitutional Court has held that the right to fair labour practices is incapable of precise definition. Taking into account the development of the law outlined above, the scope of the notion of 'labour practices' may embrace at least the practices set out below. Firstly, the right should provide protection against unfair practices relating to work security and employment opportunities as codified in the 1995 LRA, both of a substantive and procedural nature.[5] Secondly, it

[1] See the recent concept paper by Halton Cheadle, in which he proposes a re-evaluation of the unfair labour practice concept and its boundaries. In particular he suggests that the unfair labour practice over benefits would be better conceived as a wage-work issue subject to collective bargaining, rather than adjudication. H Cheadle 'Regulated Flexibility and Small Business: Revisiting the LRA and the BCEA' (2006) ILJ 27.

[2] In terms of an amendment (s 42 of Labour Relations Amendment Act 12 of 2002) to the LRA, victimization due to whistle-blowing was included as an unfair labour practice (s186(2)(c)). This followed the promulgation of the Protected Disclosures Act 26 of 2000, which protects an employee from victimization for having made a protected disclosure defined in that Act.

[3] Unfair discrimination originally fell under the provision on unfair labour practices in the LRA (Schedule 7 item 2(1)(a)), but is now regulated in terms of the Employment Equity Act. It was always the intention that unfair labour practices would be incorporated into a separate Act. This has occurred in respect of unfair discrimination, while the remaining unfair labour practices have now been included in the main body of the 1995 LRA under s 186(2).

[4] For instance, the Occupational, Health and Safety Act 83 of 1993.

[5] See SANDU & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 2101 (T)('SANDU III'). The High Court found that regulation 73 of the Military Regulations, which provides for the Minister of Defence to appoint 'independent persons' to the Military Arbitration Board, infringed the right to fair labour practices because it amounted to an unfair procedure. The function of the board to determine disputes (referred to it in terms of regulation 71(5)(b)) would should underwrite the minimum standards accorded in the BCEA since one of the BCEA's objects is to give effect to and regulate the right to fair labour practices in FC s 23(1).[1] Whether the right should encompass rights regulated in other labour legislation, such as health and safety rights at work, is debatable, but there is no apparent reason why such protection should be excluded. Thirdly, the right should not engage the wage-work bargain. In other words, it should be concerned with the adjudication of disputes of right as opposed to disputes of interest. A further issue for consideration is whether FC s 23(1) is an overarching right encompassing the other labour relations rights, or whether it should be viewed as distinct from them. The structure of FC s 23 suggests that the subsections are distinct, each traversing a different terrain, and militates against an interpretation which sees the right to fair labour practices as a catchall right, capable of embracing any person and any matter. This was not, however, the approach of the High Court in South African National Defence Union & another v Minister of Defence & Others. Without considering the scope of the right to fair labour practices, the court assumed that it included collective bargaining rights, finding that restrictions in the military regulations[2] on matters over which bargaining could take place infringed both this right and the right to engage in collective bargaining.[3] Sachs J in his minority judgment in include disputes involving the Minister in his capacity as employer. The independence and impartiality of the arbitration board would be compromised as it was appointed by the Minister who would also appear before it in his representative capacity as employer. The Court referred to De Lange v Smuts NO & others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC); Ringeisen v Austria (No 1) (1971) 1 EHRR 455, Series A No 13 at para 95; Campbell and Fell v United Kingdom 28 June 1984 Series A no 80 para 78; Sramek v Austria 22 October 1984 Series A no 84. The Court found that regulation 41 of the military regulations which conferred on the Minister the power to appoint the registrar also violated the right to fair labour practices on the basis that the minister as employer had an interest in the decisions to be taken by the registrar. On an objective test, a reasonable person might believe that the registrar might favour the minister to whom he is beholden for his appointment and continuing office — at 2128E-G.

[1] Section 2*(a)* of the BCEA.

[2] Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve, Government Gazette Vol 411 No. 20425 1 September 1999 Regulation Gazette No 6620 No. R1043. Regulation 3*(c)* provides for collective bargaining on 'certain' issues of mutual interest, while regulation 36 provides that military trade unions 'may engage in collective bargaining, and may negotiate on behalf of their members, only in respect of: 'a) the pay, salaries and allowances of members, including the pay structure; b) general service benefits; c) general conditions of service; (d) labour practices; and e) procedures for engaging in union activities within units and bases of the Defence Forces.' The court found that these provisions derogated from the right of a military trade union to negotiate over all matters of mutual interest between the employer and the military trade union and its members. See SANDU III (supra) at 2123. The provision, it found, infringed the right to fair labour practices and the right to engage in collective bargaining. The Court further found that the minister had failed to justify the restriction. It ordered that the word 'certain' be severed from regulation 3*(c)* and declared regulation 36 inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it purported to limit the right of military trade unions to engage in collective bargaining in respect of the matters in paras (a)-(e).

[3] Similarly, the court, again without considering the nature of the right, found that the prohibition on a military trade union representative representing a member in grievance and disciplinary proceedings in terms of regulation 27 of the Military Regulations infringed the right. This particular claim should have been considered instead under the freedom of association rights, in particular the right to form and join a trade union and the right of a trade union to organize as it falls squarely within the scope of those rights.

SANDU I,[1] also viewed FC s 23(1) as an overarching right, capable of encompassing trade union rights. He proposed such a reading despite the fact that these rights are separately provided for under FC 23. He found that if the military personnel's claim to trade union rights had been considered under the right to fair labour practices — which is granted to 'everyone' — rather than under the provision on trade union rights, it would not have been necessary to have given an expansive meaning to the term 'worker' in order to embrace those personnel, a position adopted by the majority of the court.[2]

A related issue is whether matters specifically excluded from the ambit of one of the other rights as not worthy of constitutional protection could nevertheless be protected by FC s 23(1). There is good reason for holding that interests which have been rejected as not worthy of constitutional protection should not find a home under the section.[3]

(c) Fairness

The Constitutional Court in NEHAWU stated that the focus of FC s 23(1) is, broadly speaking, the relationship between workers and employers and the continuation of that relationship on terms that are fair to both.[4] It held that the right was incapable of precise definition and that problems relating to its definition were compounded by the tension between the interests of workers and employers. Thus it was neither necessary nor desirable to define the right. What was fair would depend on the circumstances of each case and would 'essentially involve a value judgment'.[5] While the concept of fairness does indeed present difficulties of interpretation, nevertheless some understanding needs to be reached on the principles embodied by the right for scrutiny of law and the development of a consistent jurisprudence under the right.

See National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa v Bader Bop 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305, 324 (CC)('NUMSA v Bader Bop')(Constitutional Court, considering a similar issue relating to trade union representation, did so in terms of the constitutional rights to form and join a trade union and to organize.)

[1] SANDU I (supra) at para 48.

[2] The High Court in SANDU III also located a remedy for the prohibition on a military trade union representing its members at disciplinary or grievance proceedings within the right to fair labour practices rather than under the rights to organise or to determine its activities. See § 53.4 infra.

[3] An example would be the right to a lockout. The drafters of the Constitution deliberately chose not to protect the lockout. Given this, it would be anomalous to allow for its protection under the right to fair labour practices. A further example relates to the right to engage in collective bargaining. One interpretation of that right is that it does not impose a correlative duty to bargain, and that disputes over a refusal to bargain, including the related issues of bargaining in good faith, bargaining levels, bargaining topics and bargaining tactics, should be resolved through industrial action rather than adjudication and are excluded from the right to engage in collective bargaining. If this restrictive view of the structure of the right were to be adopted, it should not be possible to seek redress in relation to those matters under the right to fair labour practices instead.

[4] 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 95, 110 (CC)('NEHAWU') at para 40.

[5] Ibid at para 33.

The interests of employers are underpinned by the right to the economic development of their enterprises through enhanced production and efficiency; informing the interests of workers are the principles of social justice and democracy in the workplace. These principles encompass workers' rights to job security and advancement, a democratic work environment, and the right to be treated with dignity and equality. The right indicates that both parties' interests should be considered[1]: however, it does not tell us where the balance between these interests should be struck in any situation. The Constitutional Court, while acknowledging the legitimacy of the commercial requirements of the employer, has pointed to the role the Final Constitution plays in protecting the vulnerable in society. 'Our Constitution,' the Court has said, 'protects the weak, the marginalized, the socially outcast, and the victims of prejudice and stereotyping. It is only when these groups are protected that we can be secure that our own rights are protected.'[2] Although this finding was made under FC s 9, it nevertheless has resonance for many of the rights in the Final Constitution, including labour rights.[3]

[1] As seen above, the scope of the right includes the interests of both employers and workers.

[2] Hoffman v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 34. The Hoffmann Court was asked to consider the refusal of SAA to appoint a flight attendant because of his HIV status. The High Court had upheld the employer's argument that employing an HIV positive person as an attendant would, among other things, have an adverse impact of the airline's commercial interests. The Constitution Court, while acknowledging the legitimacy of employers' commercial interests, nevertheless held that they could not always be paramount, particularly when weighed up against the discrimination and marginalisation of persons with HIV.

[3] As far as international law is concerned, many ILO conventions offer a greater appreciation of where the balance between the interests of employers and workers should be struck so as to give effect to the notion of fairness. The conventions which are relevant to those practices which may fall under the rubric of fair labour practices have in common a focus of on the protection of workers. For instance, the ILO Convention on the Termination of Employment (1982) stipulates the parameters for a fair dismissal or retrenchment, which would be of relevance in testing the constitutionality of the provisions in the LRA on dismissal. An examination of the terms of the convention reveals that the provisions in the LRA closely reflect the requirements for a fair dismissal contained therein. Similarly, other conventions, such as the Holidays with Pay Convention of 1970, Protection of Wages Convention of 1949, and Hours of Work (Industry) of Convention 1919, would be relevant in testing the constitutionality of provisions in the BCEA. Although South Africa has not ratified the conventions mentioned here, they represent universally accepted norms and therefore constitute a touchstone against which the notion of fairness may be gauged. Again, this is not to suggest that the notion of fairness is exclusive of employers' legitimate commercial interests, but indicates that a central purpose of modern employment law is to guarantee the protection of workers. This has been succinctly put by Kahn Freund:

> 'The main object of labour law has always been, and we venture to say will always be, to be a countervailing force to counteract the inequality of bargaining power which is inherent and must be inherent in the employment relationship. Most of what we call protective legislation — legislation on the employment of women, children and young persons, on safety in mines, factories, and offices, on payment of wages in cash, on guarantee payments, on race or sex discrimination, on unfair dismissal, and indeed most labour legislation altogether — must be seen in this context.'

P Davies & M Freedland Kahn-Freund's Labour and the Law (1983 3rd Edition) 18.

In NEHAWU, the Constitutional Court was called on to establish whether the interpretation of s 197 of the LRA by the LAC infringed the right to fair labour practices.[1] The Court held that the purpose of s 197, which regulates the transfer of employees' contracts during the transfer of a business, was to protect workers' rights to job security as well as the interests of employers by facilitating the transfer of the business. The Court found this balance to be consistent with the right to fair labour practices.[2] On this basis, the Court held that the judgment handed down by the majority of the LAC that the contract of employment could be transferred only if an agreement existed between the old and new owners of the business was not reflective of the legislative intent. Nor, however, was the minority's view that the provision was designed solely to protect the interests of workers.[3] In support of its approach, the NEHAWU Court had regard to the purpose of the LRA to promote economic development, social justice and labour peace;[4] the section of the Act protecting workers from unfair dismissal, of which s 197 forms part;[5] and international law on the transfer of a business, designed to protect workers from dismissal during such a transfer.[6]

The Court's approach to the notion of fairness as articulated in the case has much in common with that of the Industrial Court under the 1956 Act. Under this Act, the definition of an unfair labour practice treated the interests of [1] The University of Cape Town (UCT) had outsourced parts of its services to independent contractors, leading to the retrenchment of staff, some of whom were employed by the contractors but on less favourable conditions. NEHAWU sought an interdict and declaratory relief. The legal question was whether in terms of s 197 of the 1995 LRA, which deals with the transfer of a business as a going concern, the workers were automatically transferred without prior agreement. The LC held that s 197 did not provide for an automatic transfer of contracts in the case of the transfer of a business as a going concern. The court's view was that contracts of employment may only be transferred without the consent of the employees if the seller and purchaser of the business agree that the contracts will be transferred together with the business. NEHAWU appealed to the LAC. The majority of that court dismissed the appeal. The LAC held that in terms of s 197 a business is transferred as a going concern only if its assets, including the workforce, are transferred by prior agreement between the seller and the purchaser and the workers are part and parcel of the transaction. As there had been no prior agreement between UCT and the contractors that the workforce would be transferred as part of the transaction, there was no transfer of a business as per s 197(1)(a).

[2] NEHAWU (supra) at paras 53 and 62. The focus of FC s 23, the Court said, was the relationship between the worker and the employer and the continuation of that relationship on terms that were fair to both: 'In giving content to that right, it is important to bear in mind the tension between the interests of the workers and the interests of the employers which is inherent in labour relations. Care must be taken to accommodate, where possible, these interests so as to arrive at the balance required by the concept of fair labour practices. It is in this context that the LRA must be construed.' Ibid at para 121.

[3] NEHAWU (supra) at para 45.

[4] Ibid at para 62.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at paras 47–51. The court referred to the Acquired Rights Directive 77/187 EEC (adopted by the European Commission 1977) and the British Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981/1794 ('TUPE') (enacted pursuant to the directive.). See Landsorganisatioen I Danmark for Tjenerforbundet I Danmark v Ny Molle Kro [1987] ECR 5465 at para 12 (construed the directive as holding that its purpose was to protect workers against the loss of employment in the event of the transfer of a business. The title of the regulations promulgated by the United Kingdom pursuant to the British Directive, the court said, also demonstrated an intention to protect workers against unfair dismissals in the event of the sale of a business).

employees and employers as equivalent:[1] workers were to be protected in relation to work security and opportunities[2] and employers against conduct detrimental to their businesses.[3] Employees relied on the provision to build increased rights in the workplace.[4] In adjudicating the individual rights disputes before it, the industrial court developed over time a jurisprudential standard of fairness that required that both the employer's commercial interests and the legitimate workplace interests of employees be taken into account.

The NEHAWU Court, following the approach in the 1956 LRA, found that although S197 was concluded in similar language to the two international instruments mentioned above, its purpose was not solely to protect the interests of workers, as provided in the instruments. Rather, its purpose was to strike a balance between the interests of both workers and employees. Similarly, even though s 197 forms part of the section of the Act on dismissals, which is specifically designed to protect workers, the court chose not to emphasise this. That said, the Court's finding that FC s 23 required the LRA to be interpreted so as to include workers' interests was critical in rectifying the misconstrual of the section by the LAC.

One implication of the Court's approach to the notion of fairness is that the LRA's provisions on unfair labour practices and unfair dismissal become vulnerable to constitutional attack. This is because, in contrast to the 1956 LRA, protection against unfair labour practices and unfair dismissals in the 1995 LRA is granted to employees only and not vice versa. The 1995 LRA thus reflects the belief that a central object of labour law is to act as a corrective to the generally weaker position of workers.[5] The Labour Court, called on to consider the constitutionality of the provision on unfair labour practices has found, however, that the LRA need not specifically protect the right of employers against an unfair labour practice by employees. The Court held that the Act was not

[1] The notion of equivalence is given expression, for instance, in the holding of the court in National Union of Metalworkers of SA v Vetsak Co-operative Ltd & Others 1996 (4) SA 577, 593G-H (A)(Court wrote: 'The fairness required in the determination of an unfair labour practice must be fairness towards both employer and employee. Fairness to both means the absence of bias in favour of either. In the eyes of the LRA of 1956, contrary to what counsel for the appellant suggested, there are no underdogs.)

[2] The definition stated that an unfair labour practice was any practice which had the effect that '(i) any employee or class of employees is or may be unfairly affected or that his or their employment opportunities or work security is or may be prejudiced or jeopardized thereby'.

[3] As far as employers were concerned, the definition of an unfair labour practice was a practice which had the effect that '(ii) the business of any employer or class of employers is or may be unfairly affected or disrupted thereby'.

[4] It was employees, not surprisingly given the imbalance in power between them and employers, who relied overwhelmingly on the provision to build increased rights in the workplace.

[5] This is not to say that employers have no recourse to the law to defend their conduct in terms of the 1995 LRA: employers may escape a claim of unfairness by demonstrating that there was a substantively fair reason for their actions and that they acted in accordance with a fair procedure. However, they may not prosecute a claim for an unfair labour practice themselves. See 1995 LRA ss 185, 186 and 188, the Code of Good Practice: Dismissal (Schedule 8 of the 1995 LRA); and the Code of Good Practice on Dismissals based on Operational Requirements, promulgated by General Notice 1517, Government Gazette 20254 (16 July 1999).

intended to 'regulate exhaustively the entire concept of a fair labour practice as contemplated in the Constitution'.[1]

A further question is where legislation fails to give effect to the constitutional right, whether the right may be relied upon directly for the fashioning of a remedy. The High Court in NAPTOSA warned against such an approach.[2] It argued that because of the complex social and policy issues which mark the employment relationship, the right to fair labour practices is not a right which may, without 'an intervening regulatory framework, be applied directly in the workplace.'[3] If this were to occur, the High Court reasoned, it would lead to the development of parallel streams of jurisprudence in the labour arena. This stance has much to recommend it, and if the LRA were found to be constitutionally wanting, the better approach would be for the Constitutional Court to direct that the LRA be amended to remedy this limitation.[4]

In general the development of the notion of fairness as it applies to the conduct between employers and workers will take place through the specialist labour courts and the arbitration mechanisms established under the LRA. The NEHAWU Court acknowledged this in stating that the concept of a fair labour practice 'must be given content by the legislature and thereafter left to gather meaning, in the first instance, from the decisions of the specialist tribunals including the LAC and the Labour Court', and, in the second instance, with regard to domestic and international law.[5] Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court retains a supervisory role in assessing whether legislation honours the rights guaranteed in FC s 23(1). Labour legislation, the NEHAWU Court held, will 'always be subject to constitutional scrutiny to ensure that it is not inconsistent with the Constitution.'[6] So too, it follows, will the interpretation of that legislation.

53.3 Freedom of Association Rights

(a) Right to form and to join trade unions and employer organisations

The Final Constitution guarantees every worker the right to form and join a trade union and to participate in the activities and programmes of the union.[7] Similar

[1] National Entitled Workers Union v CCMA (2003) 24 ILJ 2335, 2340 (LC)('NEWU'). The CCMA had refused to hear a case involving the resignation of an employee which the employer held to be an unfair labour practice. The CCMA commissioner's decision was referred to the Labour Court for review. The Labour Court upheld the decision, and found that the applicant had other common law remedies at his disposal.

[2] (2001) 22 ILJ 889 (CC) at 895F-J, 895A-I, 896A-J, 897A-E.

[3] Ibid at 896-7.

[4] In NEWU, the Labour Court held differently, stating that should the employer wish to prohibit a labour practice which is unfair and which is not regulated by a conventional statute, it could approach a court relying on FC s 23 to grant the relief which it sought. NEWU (supra) at 2337.

[5] NEHAWU (supra) at para 34.

[6] Ibid at para 14. This stance was congruent with the Court's statement in First Certification Judgment that the development of labour law would 'in all probability' occur via the labour courts in terms of labour legislation. Nevertheless, the legislation would always be subject to constitutional oversight to ensure that the rights of workers and employers as entrenched in FC s 23 would be honoured.

[7] FC s 23(1)(a) and (b).

provisions apply to employers as regards their own organizations.[1] It also guarantees that these organizations may determine their own administration, activities and programmes.[2] These freedom of association rights[3] constitute the bedrock of the related rights to organise, bargain collectively, and, in the case of workers, to strike.[4] The right to freedom of association has long been recognised internationally both by the International Labour Organization[5] and other international instruments.[6] The individual[7] and collective right[8] to freedom of association protects workers and employers and their organisations from control and undue interference by the state (executive and legislature), and trade unions and their members from victimisation by employers.[9] The fundamental importance of the right to freedom of

[1] FC s 23(3)(a) and (b).

[2] FC s 23(3) and (4).

[3] FC s 23(4).

[4] In separating out the right to form and join representative organisations, the right of those organisations to carry out their activities and to organise, the right to bargain collectively and to strike, the Final Constitution avoids possible conflict over the interpretation of the scope of the right to freedom of association, as has occurred in other jurisdictions. In Canada, the right to freedom of association has been interpreted to exclude the associational activities of collective bargaining, strikes and picketing. The state is not constitutionally required to support or refrain from restricting these activities. Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 161, [1987] 1 SCR 313 ('Re PSERA'); PSAC v Canada (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 249 (SCC); Saskatchewan v RWDSU, Locals 544, 496, 635 and 955 (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 277 (SCC). In Germany the opposite is the case in terms of article 9, section 3 of the Basic Law. R Blanpain (ed) International Encyclopaedia of Industrial Relations and Labour Law: Volume 5 Germany (Supplement 162, September 1994) 122.

[5] Convention Concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise (1948) ILO No 87, 68 UNTS 17 (ratified by South Africa on 19 February 1996) ('Convention 87') and International Labour Organization's Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention (1949) ILO No 98, 96 UNTS 257 (ratified by South Africa on 19 February 1996) ('Convention 98').

[6] The right to freedom of association as it pertains to labour relations is also found in the following international instruments: the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966) (article 8); the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966)(article 22); the Covenant for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950)(article 11); the European Social Charter (1961)(part 1 article 5 and part 2 article 5); and the Additional Protocol to the American Convention in the area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1988)(article 8).

[7] The right of workers to join organizations of their own choosing is guaranteed in ILO Conventions 87 and 98. Convention 87 article 2 reads: 'Workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and, subject only to the rules of the organization concerned, to join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization.' Convention 98 articles 1 and 2 read: '(1) Workers shall enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment. (2) Such protection shall apply more particularly in respect of acts calculated to (a) make the employment of a worker subject to the condition that he shall not join a trade union or shall relinquish trade union membership; (b) cause the dismissal of or otherwise prejudice a worker by reason of union membership or because of participation in union activities outside working hours or, with the consent of the employer, within working hours.'

[8] Convention 87 article 3 protects the collective right by granting organizations the right to draw up their constitutions and rules, freely elect their representatives, and to organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes and to join federations and international organizations. Convention 98 protects organizations from interference from each other and workers' organizations from employer domination.

[9] On freedom of association generally, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

association in the context of labour relations is captured in this cogent and oft-quoted statement by Dickson CJ in Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act:[1]

> Freedom of association is most essential in those circumstances where the individual freedom is liable to be prejudiced by the action of some larger and more powerful entity, like the government or an employer. Association has always been the means by which political, cultural and racial minorities, religious groups and workers have sought to attain their purposes and fulfil their aspirations; it has enabled those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict.

Freedom of association rights are also protected in the 1995 LRA. Individual rights to freedom of association are guaranteed by granting employees the right to participate in forming a trade union[2] (or federation),[3] to join a trade union, subject to its constitution,[4] and to participate in its lawful activities;[5] and by protecting employees and work seekers from victimization for exercising these and other rights under the Act.[6] Similar rights are conferred on employers in respect of their organisations.[7] The 1995 LRA also protects the associated rights of trade unions and employer organizations to determine their own constitutions, to plan and to organize their administration and lawful activities,[8] and to join federations[9] and international labour bodies.[10]

Members of the defence force are not protected by the LRA, and therefore do not benefit from the trade union rights under that Act. In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another, the Constitutional Court was called on to decide whether s 126B(1) of the Defence Act,[11] which prohibited members of the permanent force from becoming members of a trade union, infringed the

[1] Re PSERA (supra).

[2] A trade union is defined in 1995 LRA s 213 as 'an association of employees whose principal purpose is to regulate relations between employees and employers, including any employers' organizations'.

[3] 1995 LRA s 4(1)(a).

[4] 1995 LRA s 4(1)(b).

[5] 1995 LRA s 4(2)(a).

[6] 1995 LRA ss 5 and 187(1).

[7] 1995 LRA ss 6 and 7.

[8] 1995 LRA ss 8*(a)* and (b).

[9] 1995 LRA s 8*(c)*.

[10] 1995 LRA s 8*(e)*.

[11] Act 44 of 1957. Section 126B(1) of the Act provided as follows:

(1). A member of the Permanent Force shall not become a member of any trade union as defined in section 1 of the Labour Relations Act, 1956 (Act 28 of 1956): Provided that this provision shall not preclude any member of such Force from being or becoming a member of any professional or vocational institute, society, association or like body approved by the Minister.

As mentioned earlier, members of the South African National Defence Force, National Intelligence Agency, and the South African Secret Service are excluded from the ambit of the 1995 Labour Relations Act. See § 53.1*(a)*(i).

constitutional right to form and to join a trade union.[1] In order for the Court to find that members of the SANDF were protected by the right, the Court had to find that they were 'workers'. This the Court did. O'Regan J argued that although such members were not employees in the strict sense of the term, their relationship with the defence force was 'akin' to an employment relationship and they could therefore be considered 'workers' for the purposes of the right. Relying on FC s 200(1) — which states that the 'defence force must be structured and managed as a disciplined military force' — the respondents had claimed that allowing members to join and to form trade unions would entitle them to bargain and to strike, which would, in turn, undermine the discipline of the military force and have 'grave consequences' for the security of the South African state.[2] The SANDU I Court disagreed. It held, instead, that union membership would likely have the opposite effect. It would enable the establishment of proper channels for grievances and complaints and thus might enhance the discipline and the efficiency of the force.[3] It found therefore that the total ban on trade unions in the SANDF went beyond what was reasonable and justifiable under FC s 36 and declared s 126B(1) invalid.[4]

The Military Regulations[5] governing members of the defence force have also come under constitutional scrutiny in relation to freedom of association rights. In SANDU III the High Court found that regulation s 37(1) and (2) infringed FC s 23(2)(b). FC s 23(2)(b) provides that every worker has the right to participate in [1] SANDU I (supra) at para 30. The matter came to the Constitutional Court by way of referral from the Transvaal Provincial Division, where Hartzenberg J had declared s126B(1) and (3) unconstitutional and invalid. South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (2) SA 736 (T), 1999 (3) BCLR 321 (T), (1999) 20 ILJ 299 (T). In both courts the case also involved the constitutionality of s 126B(2) of the Defence Act, which prohibited a member of the SANDF from performing any act of public protest. Section 126B(2) also prohibited members of the SANDF from participating in any strike, but in this respect the constitutionality of the section was not disputed in either court.

[2] SANDU I (supra) at para 32. A research memorandum of the respondents showed that in England, the USA, and France no trade unions were permitted in the armed forces. But in none of these countries was there an express constitutional right to form and to join trade unions. Trade unions in the armed forces were permitted in the Netherlands, Germany and Sweden, where they were often not afforded the rights to negotiate on behalf of their members but were only afforded rights of consultation and representation. The Court did not accept the argument that the research supported the view that members of the armed forces could not join trade unions without putting the discipline and efficiency of the armed forces under threat, but rather suggested that a range of different responses to trade unions in the armed forces existed. Ibid at para 34.

[3] Ibid at para 35.

[4] Ibid at para 36. Note, however, that the Court suspended its order of invalidity for a period of three months in order to allow the respondents time to decide how to regulate trade union rights in the SANDF. This period of suspension was three months shorter than the period suggested by the High Court. Justifying the shorter period, the Constitutional Court pointed out that the SANDF had already had five years in which to address the issue of procedures to regulate trade unions in the SANDF, but had failed to do so. It also noted that as the matter could be the subject of regulation by the Minister of Defence rather than parliamentary legislation, an appropriate regulatory framework could be established within three months.

[5] Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve Government Gazette vol 411 No. 20425 1 September 1999 Regulation Gazette No 6620 No. R1043.

the activities and programmes of a trade union.[1] Regulation 37(1) stated that no member 'may participate in the activities of a military trade union while participating in a military operation,' while regulation 37(2) held that no military trade union 'may liaise with its members whilst such members participate in a military operation or exercise.' The justification proffered by the Minister was that it would cause 'a threat to safety and a danger not only to the country concerned, but to the members themselves' if members were permitted to engage in trade union activities whilst engaged in military training'. The Court rejected the Minister's justification as too general, and ordered that the provision be severed from the regulations.

In the same case the High Court held that the prohibition in the regulations[2] on military trade unions' affiliating or associating with any labour organisation, labour association, trade union or labour federation that is not recognised and registered infringed FC s 23(4)(c). FC s 23(4)(c) provides that every trade union has a right to form and to join a federation. The High Court referred to the findings of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association that international trade union solidarity constitutes one of the fundamental objectives of any trade union movement and underlies the principle in article 5 of Convention 87. The Court rejected the minister's reasoning that the limitation was justified because of the need to keep the defence force politically independent and to maintain high standards of discipline. It was, the Court pointed out, regulation 13*(b)*, which prohibits a military trade union from associating with any political party, that spoke properly to the minister's concern. The fact that union federations COSATU[3] and NACTU[4] might be affiliated to political parties did not mean that all labour organisations would be so affiliated and thus the provision was overly broad. The Court ordered that the provision be severed from the regulations.[5]

(b) Union security arrangements

A highly contested issue is whether or not the right to form and join trade unions includes the right not to do so. In other words, does the right to freedom of association as applied to the workplace imply the negative right not to associate? Other jurisdictions, such as Germany and Canada, have found that the [1] SANDU III (supra) at 2123H-J and 2124A-E. The High Court also held that regulation 37 infringed the right to engage in collective bargaining.

[2] Regulation 13*(a)* of the Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve, Government Gazette Vol 411, No 20425 (1 September 1999).

[3] Congress of South African Trade Unions

[4] National Council of Trade Unions

[5] SANDU III (supra) at 2119E-J and 2120A-E.

positive right includes the negative right not to associate.[1] The European Court of Human Rights has reached a similar conclusion.[2] ILO Conventions 87 and 98 on the right to freedom of association and the right to organise and to collective bargaining do not explicitly include the right not to associate, although the exercise of the negative right has been found not to infringe the conventions.[3] Proponents of the approach that the right to freedom of association includes the negative right view the freedom to associate and the freedom from association as symmetrical in nature and as two sides to the same right to autonomy. The negative freedom is said to be part and parcel of the overall protection of human freedoms that mark a democratic state.[4]

The contrasting approach holds that the closed shop, and its lesser form, the agency shop, are justified in that they advance democracy in the workplace. The closed shop, in particular, operates to ensure an equilibrium of power on which the system of labour relations rests. It brings stability to the workplace and prevents friction on the shop floor through orderly and stable collective bargaining by preventing the proliferation of trade unions and by ensuring that the union represents the entire workforce.[5] It also avoids a situation where free-riders enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without bearing any of the costs. The importance attached to the role of trade union membership in furthering the collective bargaining goals of workers is reflected in the Canadian Supreme Court's

[1] The German Federal Labour Court has found that the Freedom of Association provision (article 9) in the Basic Law protects the freedom not to associate and that the closed shop violates the right. See. R Blanpain (ed) International Encyclopaedia of Labour Law and Industrial Relations: Vol 5 Germany (Supplement 162, June 1994) 122. In Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada accepted that the freedom to associate also entails the freedom not to associate. (1991) 81 DLR (4th) 545 (SCC).

[2] See Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHHR 38, (1981) 2 HRLJ 185. The court found that the right to freedom of association guaranteed under article 11(1) of the European Convention of Human Rights protects the freedom not to associate. Although the court invalidated the closed shop agreement on the facts, it did not challenge the legitimacy of the closed shop per se.

[3] In its preparatory work for Convention 87 in 1947 the ILO rejected an amendment to grant workers the right not to join an organization. See ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994)('ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining 1994') 45. At the time of the adoption of Convention 98 the relevant ILO committee agreed that the Convention 'could in no way be interpreted as authorizing or prohibiting union security arrangements, such questions being matters for regulation in accordance with national practice.' The Committee of Experts has found that systems which prohibit union security practices in order to guarantee the right not to join an organization, as well as 'systems which authorize such practices, are compatible with the Convention.' Ibid at 46 para 100.

[4] On this approach, just as the individual's right in the political sphere to join or not to join a political party is essential to the notion of democracy, so too is the worker's right to choose whether to join a trade union or not in the industrial sphere. Critics, however, point to a fundamental fallacy in an approach which equates democracy in the political sphere with the right to join or not to join political parties. In the workplace the right to form or join a trade union is foundational to the exercise of democracy, as it is essentially through the trade union and the process of collective bargaining that workers are able to play a role in determining their terms and conditions of work. The equivalent, in the political sphere, is not the citizen's right to belong to the party of his or her choice, but to exercise the franchise. The trade union is to the worker what parliament is to the citizen. See P Davies & M Freedland Kahn Freund's Labour and the Law (1983) 246.

[5] Davies & Freedland (supra) at 244-5.

decision in Lavigne.[1] In Lavigne, several judges argued that compelled association is necessary to further the collective goals of workers and the more general aims of a social democratic state. The Canadian Supreme Court recognized that to the extent that union security arrangements limit individual freedom as little as possible, they should pass constitutional muster.

Section 23(6) of the Final Constitution recognises the role which union security arrangements may play in the workplace by permitting national legislation to recognise such arrangements as long as they are contained in collective agreements. The import of the provision is that legislative union security arrangements which comply with the requirement will not per se be unconstitutional. To pass constitutional muster, however, the legislation must comply with FC s 36 and limit constitutional rights as little as possible. The fundamental rights which closed shops are most likely to infringe are the general right to freedom of association, the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion, political rights, as well as the labour freedom of association rights.

The 1995 LRA provides for collective agreements containing closed and agency shops. As the provisions in the Act fulfil the requirements of FC s 23(6), they should survive constitutional scrutiny.

We have seen above that the purpose of union security arrangements is the fostering of democracy in the workplace through collective bargaining and the creation of a stable industrial relations environment. Agency shops, representing a lesser form of compulsion — as they do not require workers to join a union but merely to pay an agency fee — are less susceptible to constitutional challenge than closed shop arrangements.[2] The provisions in the 1995 LRA permitting collective agreements that include agency shops should pass constitutional muster. Firstly, there is no compulsion to join a trade union,[3] but merely to pay the union an agency fee. If there is compulsion, then the agency agreement will not be binding on non-members.[4] Moreover, the agency shop is subject to democratic controls that limit the way in which it may operate. Thus, it may be introduced only by collective agreement, and only if the union or unions involved represent the majority of the affected workers. The fee may not be used for party political purposes[5] but only to serve the socio-economic interests

[1] See Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union (1991) 81 DLR (4th) 545 (SCC) ('Lavigne'); Bhindi v British Columbia Projectionists Loc 348 (1986) 29 DLR (4th) 47 (BCCA); Remai Investment Co (1987) 18 CLRBR (NS) 75 (Sask), quoted in G Adams Canadian Labour Law (2nd Edition, Release No 4, November 1995) 3-78 — 3-79. In Lavigne, he copurt required that to pass muster the stautory language must be permissive.

[2] See, eg, Abood v Detroit Board of Education 431 US 209 (1977)('Abood').

[3] 1995 LRA s 25(1).

[4] 1995 LRA s 25(3)(a).

[5] 1995 LRA s 25(3)(d). Foreign jurisdictions have found differently on the political use of agency fees: In Abood, the US Supreme Court, while giving the nod generally to such arrangements, upheld the objection to the arrangement on the grounds that the dues were used for political causes unrelated to collective bargaining. In Lavigne, on the other hand, the Canadian Supreme Court upheld an agency shop agreement in a public sector collective agreement even though a portion of the dues were to go to political and social causes not immediately connected with collective bargaining.

of the workers.[1] It must be paid into a separate account which is subject to scrutiny by the auditor conducting the annual audit of the union's records of account and financial statements.[2] The 1995 LRA makes provision for a conscientious objector to request that the agency fee be paid into a fund administered by the Department of Labour rather than into the trade union's coffers.[3] This exemption should take care of instances where a worker's religion prohibits him or her from supporting secular bodies. Finally, to ensure that the fees are not misused, the 1995 LRA provides for an appeal to the Labour Court over the use of fees.[4]

The ultimate purpose of the closed shop is the same as that of the agency shop: the achievement of democracy in the workplace through orderly and stable collective bargaining. The difference is in the level of compulsion. Closed-shop arrangements compel workers to join a particular union if they wish to work in a particular workplace. The pre-entry closed shop requires workers to join the union before they apply for work with a particular employer. The post-entry closed shop requires membership only once workers have been employed, on pain of dismissal. Because of this compulsion, closed shops have had a more difficult constitutional ride internationally than agency shops. While they have survived constitutional scrutiny in the US and Canada, they have not done so in Ireland, West Germany and the West Indies. The European Court of Human Rights has also found against them.[5]

The closed shop in South Africa is post entry in nature. While this might attenuate the degree of compulsion involved, it does not remove the compulsion and thus the closed shop remains susceptible to constitutional attack. It is for this reason that the 1995 LRA subjects the operation of the closed shop to a series of controls designed to ensure that in achieving its democratic purpose, constitutional rights are limited as little as possible. As in the case of an agency shop, only a trade union or trade unions representing the majority of workers may enter into a closed shop agreement.[6] Moreover, a closed shop will be binding only if a ballot has been held of the employees to be covered by the agreement and two thirds of employees vote in favour.[7] In addition, agreements will be binding only if there is no provision for a pre-entry closed shop and the requirements for membership fees, which are the same as for agency shops, are followed.

One of the chief complaints against the closed shop is that it has drastic consequences for a worker who refuses to join the union. The employer is compelled to dismiss him or her. The 1995 LRA attempts to restrict the circumstances in which this might occur. First, existing employees may not be

[1] 1995 LRA s 25(3)(d)(iii).
[2] 1995 LRA s 98(1)(b)(ii).
[3] 1995 LRA s 25(4)(b).
[4] 1995 LRA ss 24(5), (6) and (7) .
[5] Adams (supra) at 3-82.
[6] 1995 LRA ss 24(1) and (3).
[7] 1995 LRA s 26(3).

dismissed for refusing to join a union party to the closed shop.[1] Second, the 1995 LRA also prohibits a trade union from refusing a worker membership in or expelling a worker from the union unless the refusal or the expulsion is in accordance with the trade union's constitution and the reason for the refusal or the expulsion is fair.[2] Third, the Act protects from dismissal persons who refuse to join a union on conscientious grounds.[3] Both existing employees and conscientious objectors, however, may be required to pay an agreed agency fee.[4] The Act also provides for the termination of the closed shop by a majority of those who voted, after a ballot instigated by a third of those covered by the agreement.[5] These democratic controls should weigh in favour of the closed shop in any limitation enquiry.

The only challenge mounted against the closed shop under the Final Constitution so far has focused on the right to negotiate over the establishment of a closed shop rather than attacking the nature of the closed shop itself. Regulation 19 of the military regulations prohibited military trade unions from negotiating a closed or agency shop with their employer.[6] The South African National Defence Union (SANDU) argued that this prohibition infringed the union's right to engage in collective bargaining.[7] What was at issue, the High Court found, was not the legitimacy of a closed shop in the military but the refusal to give SANDU the opportunity, through negotiation, of persuading the Minister 'that there are circumstances rendering a closed shop agreement appropriate.'[8] The SANDU III

[1] 1995 LRA s 26(7)(a). It thus avoids the obstacle that stood in the way of the survival of the closed shop in Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHHR 38, (1981) 2 HRLJ 185. Although the European Court of Human Rights recognized that the closed-shop provision was advantageous for the union and employer, it found that the compulsion on existing employees to join the closed shop or face dismissal constituted a breach of Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The article includes in para 2 a limitation clause which accepts restrictions on freedom of association which are 'prescribed by law' and 'necessary in a democratic society' for the purpose, among other things, of 'the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.' The closed shop provision in the case breached article 11 on the ground that the infringement was not 'necessary' in a democratic society. The court held that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness were all hall marks of a 'democratic society' and that 'democracy does not simply mean that the views of a majority must always prevail: a balance must be achieved which ensures the fair and proper treatment of minorities and avoids any abuse of a dominant position.' The court's view that majoritarianism in and of itself is not a sufficient justification for curtailing the rights of minorities in the context of a closed shop points to a requirement for additional mechanisms to protect minority rights. The democratic controls in the 1995 LRA should prove sufficient to ensure fair and proper treatment of minorities.

[2] 1995 LRA s 26(5). The expulsion will be fair if the conduct undermines the trade union's collective exercise of its rights. These democratic controls should weigh in favour of the survival of the closed shop in any limitations inquiry.

[3] LRA 1995 s 26(7).

[4] LRA 1995 s 26(8).

[5] LRA 1995 s 26(15) and 26(16).

[6] Regulation 19 of the Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force reads: 'Military trade unions shall not have the right to negotiate a closed shop or agency shop agreement with the employer.' Regulation Gazette 6620, R1043, Government Gazette 20425 (1 September 1999).

[7] South African National Defence Union & Another v the Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 2101, 2120 (T)('SANDU III').

[8] Ibid.

court took issue with — and rejected — the proposition that closed shops and agency shops were undesirable in all contexts. Despite the relatively satisfactory outcome, the judgment contains one notable lacuna: in addressing the minister's arguments on the legitimacy of the closed shop, it fails to make any reference to FC s 23(6).

53.4 Right to Organise

The main difference between the current right of every trade union and every employer's organization to organize and the comparable right in the Interim Constitution is that the right is now granted not to individuals but to organizations.[1] FC s 23(4)(b)'s right to organize refers to the right of an organization to build its structures to enable it to represent its members and engage effectively in collective bargaining. As far as trade unions are concerned, this right embraces the recruiting of members, the granting of stop-order facilities, the right of union representatives to fulfil their duties, and access to necessary information to ensure that bargaining is meaningful.

Rights to organization are guaranteed by ILO conventions and decisions. They protect workers from dismissal for union activities,[2] recognize the right of trade unions to hold trade union meetings, including public meetings,[3] to have access to places of work, especially where employees live on employers premises,[4] enable employees to communicate with management,[5] allow employees to be represented by union officials,[6] permit unions to collect union dues,[7] and enable

[1] FC s 23(4)(b).

[2] Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention (1949) ILO No 98, 96 UNTS 257 (ratified by South Africa on 19 February 1996) article 1 upholds the worker's right to protection against dismissal for participating in union activities outside working hours or, with the consent of the employer, within working hours.

[3] See ILO Digest of Decisions and Principles of the Freedom of Association Committee of the Governing Body of the ILO 1996 ('ILO Freedom of Association 1996') 30.

[4] See Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 57; and ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 198. See also ILO Prelude to Change Industrial Relations Reform in South Africa, Report of the Fact Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa (1992) at para 717. This right is qualified in that there should be no interference with the conduct of work during working hours and appropriate precautions for the protection of the employer's property should be taken. The ILO states that in sectors where trade unions experience particular difficulties, such as agriculture, there is a duty on employers to provide unions with 'facilities for the conduct of their normal activities, including free office accommodation [and] freedom to hold meetings.' Instruments were also adopted requiring governments to 'take concrete steps to obviate these various difficulties in the rural sector by actively facilitating the establishment and functioning of such organizations.' ILO Principles, Standards and Procedures concerning Freedom of Association (1989) 11, with reference to the Rural Workers' Organization Convention 141 and the Associated Recommendation 149 of 1975, as quoted in Du Toit et al The Labour Relations Act of 1995 (2003) at 89.

[5] See ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining 1994 (supra) at 57.

[6] Ibid. The ILO recognises the right of a trade union to engage in any activity involved in the defence of members' interests which would include the right to representation.

[7] See ILO 'The Protection and Facilities to be Afforded to Workers' Representatives in the Undertaking' (1971) Recommendation No 143.

unions to gain access to information for collective bargaining purposes.[1] The right to organize constitutes fertile ground for constitutional contestation because of the potential for conflict between this right and other rights: namely, the constitutional rights to privacy and to freedom of expression and the common-law proprietary rights of employers.

The 1995 LRA gives positive effect to the right to organize by providing for a range of organizational rights for trade unions.[2] In framing the provisions, attempts have been made to balance the potential conflict between these rights, and rights to privacy, property and ownership. Thus a trade union's right of access to an employer's premises is subject to any 'conditions as to time and place that are reasonable and necessary to safeguard life or property or to prevent the undue disruption of work.'[3] Similarly, a trade union's right to relevant information is balanced against the employer's right not to disclose information which could cause substantial harm to his or her business or employees; or private, personal information relating to an employee unless the employee agrees.[4] A concern not to infringe rights to privacy and property is clearly the intention behind the denial of organizational rights of access and disclosure to trade unions in the domestic sector.[5] Even though domestic employees are notoriously difficult

[1] The Committee of Experts has referred with approval to practices communicating to workers information on the economic situation of the bargaining unit. See ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 111.

[2] See Part A of Chapter 3 of the 1995 LRA. It grants unions which achieve a particular level of representation the rights of access to the workplace (section 12), to deduct union dues (section 13), to have elected union representatives in the workplace (section 14), to leave for union activities (section 15), and to disclosure of information (section 16). Unions may also gain organisational rights via a collective agreement (section 20), or by virtue of being a party to a bargaining or statutory council, but only in respect of rights of access and deduction of union dues (section 19). Where there is a dispute over organisational rights unions with the required level of representation may choose to have the dispute settled by arbitration or to strike (sections 22 and 65(2)(a)). Non-representative unions have no right to arbitration but they may strike to try to persuade an employer from granting them organisational rights. See National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa v Bader Bop 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305, 324 (CC).

[3] 1995 LRA ss 12(1), (2) and (4). In Canada, in the context of freedom of association, the right to engage in union activities has generally been held not to include the right to do so in the employer's time. Canadian Charter s 26.

[4] 1995 LRA s 16(5)(c) and (d). The requirement to balance rights is specifically referred to in the Act: in a dispute about the disclosure of information the commissioner is obliged to 'balance the harm that the disclosure is likely to cause to an employee or employer against the harm that the failure to disclose the information is likely to cause to the ability of a trade union representative to perform effectively the functions referred to in section 14(4) or the ability of a representative trade union to engage effectively in consultation or collective bargaining' (s 16(11)). The provision that the employer can request that the information be kept confidential is also a factor which might weigh in favour of disclosure. In Canada a Charter challenge in terms of s 8 (providing protection against search and seizure) was unsuccessful. The labour board's decision that the documents be produced was saved in that it did not require the taking of the documents, that there were built-in provisions for the maintenance of confidentiality, and that the employer's duty to bargain in good faith created an obligation of disclosure in the interests of a full discussion between the parties. See Gainers Inc and UFCW (Re) (1986) 14 CLRBR (NS) 191 (Alta), as quoted in Adams (supra) at 3-93.

[5] 1995 LRA s 7.

to organize because of the isolated nature of their work, the limitation may be justified because of the private character of the home.

A number of points of conflict have emerged in other jurisdictions and may arise here. They relate to whether the right to communicate with and serve members' interests includes the right to political activities,[1] whether the right of access to employers' premises includes lunch and rest periods (are these working or non-working hours?),[2] and whether freedom of expression means that employers can attempt to dissuade employees from joining unions.[3]

The 1995 LRA places limitations on organizational activities according to the level of representativeness of a union or unions acting jointly.[4] For some rights the requirement is that the union or unions acting jointly should represent the majority of members. For other rights the threshold is that of sufficient representativeness. The ILO has found that such provisions are not in themselves contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The ILO finding is subject to two provisos: (1) the determination of the most representative organization must be based on 'objective, pre-established and precise criteria so as to avoid the possibility of bias or abuse';[5] (2) the provisions must not have the effect of entrenching an exclusive union system. In the main, the requirements in the LRA 1995 relating to representation should survive constitutional scrutiny. The test for majoritarianism is clear and objective. While the test of sufficient representation is less clear, its guidelines offer adequate direction to a commissioner called upon to decide a dispute over representativeness.[6] The Act also guards against entrenching a unitary union system by providing that the majoritarian and sufficiently representative requirements may be met by unions acting together.[7] Moreover, a commissioner may withdraw representation rights if another union is found to be more representative. However, whether the section that provides that a majority union and employer may set their own thresholds for the achievement of organizational rights[8] in a binding collective agreement will constitute a

[1] See, eg, Adams Mine, Cliffs of Canada Ltd (1982) Can LRBR (NS) 384 (Ont)('Adams Mine') (Ontario Labour Relations Board refused to allow a trade union to use its exclusive bargaining status to capture an audience for its political activities unrelated to collective bargaining, but warned against a construction on its decision that would be seen as generally condoning a constraint on trade union communication with its members in the workplace).

[2] See, eg, Michelin Tires (Canada) Ltd 80 CLLC 16 009 (NSLRB); United Rubber Workers of America v Michelin Tires (Canada) Ltd 80 CLLC 14 012 (NSSCTD); Re Jarvis and Associated Medical Services Inc 61 CLLC 16 218 (OLRB).

[3] In Canada prohibition on such speech has been found to be justified where it takes the form of threats and coercion. See Placer Development Ltd (1985) 11 CLRBR (BS) 195 (BC); Union Bank Employees and Bank of Montreal (1985) 10 CLRBR (NS) 129 (Can).

[4] 1995 LRA Chapter III part A.

[5] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (supra) at 44-45.

[6] In a dispute as to whether a union is sufficiently representative to achieve certain organizational rights a commissioner, in exercising his/her discretion, must take into account the nature of the workplace, the nature of the organizational rights sought, the nature of the sector, and the organizational history at the employer's workplace. 1995 LRA s 21(8)(b).

[7] 1995 LRA s 21(8)(c).

[8] 1995 LRA s 18.

justifiable limitation of FC s 23 is unclear. It might, as currently construed, operate to prevent weaker unions from exercising their own organizational rights.

In NUMSA v Bader Bop, the Constitutional Court pointed to the desirability of minority unions being able to represent their members, and therefore assert their organisational rights, in the workplace.[1] In this case, a dispute arose over the union's intention to strike because of the employer's unwillingness to recognise the union's shop stewards and to bargain collectively with the union on the grounds that the union was not representative of the majority of its workforce — a requirement for formal recognition under s 14 of the LRA 1995. The Constitutional Court found that the dispute engaged two fundamental principles. The first was the right to freedom of association in FC s 18. This right is given specific content by the right to form and join trade unions (FC s 23(2)(a)) and by the right of trade unions to organise (FC s 23 (4) (b)).[2] Those rights would be impaired where workers were not permitted to have their union represent them in workplace disciplinary and grievance matters, but were required to be represented by a rival union which they had chosen not to join.[3] The second principle raised by the dispute related to the right to strike,[4] in particular, whether workers' right to strike in support of their right to be represented by shop stewards in grievance and disciplinary proceedings had been limited by the Act.[5] The Court found that prohibiting a 'right to strike in relation to a demand that itself relates to a fundamental right otherwise not protected as a matter of right in the legislation would constitute a limitation on the right to strike' in FC s 23.[6] The Court held that s 21 of the 1995 LRA should not be used to deny a minority union the right to pursue organisational rights through the mechanism of collective bargaining and, if necessary, strike action. [7] The implication of the judgment is that a limitation on the right to organise by imposing thresholds on the exercise of legislative organisational rights may be justifiable provided that another means exists for a union to exert pressure to obtain those rights.

[1] (2003) (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), 2003 (24) ILJ 305 (CC)('NUMSA v Bader Bop').

[2] Ibid at para 34. The Court relied on Art 2 of the ILO Convention of Freedom of Association and the Right to Organise which provides that workers have the right to join organisations of their own choosing. The Convention has been interpreted to mean that a majoritarian system of trade unionism would not be compatible with the Convention as long as minority unions were allowed to exist, to organise and to represent members in relation to individual grievances, and could also seek to challenge majority unions.

[3] Ibid at para 34.

[4] While ILO Conventions do not grant a right to strike, the ILO's committees have both asserted that such a right is essential to collective bargaining. The Court held that a reading of the Act which permitted minority unions the right to strike over the issue of shop steward recognition, particularly for the purpose of the representation of union members in grievance and disciplinary hearings, would be more in accordance with the principles of freedom of association in FC s 18 and the rights of workers to form and join trade unions, to organise and bargain collectively, and to strike.

[5] Ibid at para 35.

[6] Ibid at para 35.

[7] Ibid at paras 43 and 44. The Court found that there was nothing in chapter 4 of the LRA of 1995 which regulates strike action, which places a limitation on minority unions' striking to achieve organisational rights.

53.5 Right to Engage in Collective Bargaining

Collective bargaining is inextricably linked to the right to join and form representative organisations, to organise and to strike. These rights — jointly and severally — promote democracy in the workplace and the achievement of worker dignity. While freedom of association rights, more narrowly construed, have a value in and of themselves, their full value may only be achieved through the right to collective bargaining. It is through such bargaining that workers can most effectively challenge the countervailing power of employers.[1]

Collective bargaining comprises a complex system of interlinking elements underpinned by a particular regulatory framework. Collective bargaining is, firstly, a process constituted by the recognition of the representative organisations of the parties, the actual bargaining process — which includes matters relating to thresholds for bargaining, the nature of the bargaining unit, topics for bargaining, and bargaining levels — and the outcome of bargaining. Secondly, collective bargaining comprises the institutions and the mechanisms through which such bargaining takes place.

The Final Constitution recognizes the importance of collective bargaining by granting trade unions, employer organizations and employers the right to engage in collective bargaining.[2] The wording in FC 23 is consonant with that in Constitutional Principle XXVIII. CP XXVIII states that '… the right of employers and employees to join and form employer organisations and trade unions and to engage in collective bargaining shall be recognised and protected.' In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court upheld an objection to the wording of the draft Final Constitution which excluded individual employers from the right.[3] While accepting the exclusion of individual workers was rational on the basis that collective bargaining by workers in their individual capacity was not possible,[4] the Court held that the same could not be said for individual employers. The failure of the text to protect this right of individual employers represented a failure to comply with the language of CP XXVIII.[5]

[1] P Davies and M Freedland Kahn-Freund's Labour and the Law (1983) 69.

[2] FC s 23(5).

[3] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Afrcia, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253, 1405-6 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 69.

[4] Martin Brassey correctly takes issue with the reasoning of the court:

> [t]he issue is where the right should reside and who should be entitled to exercise it. That it can be exercised only in a collective manner can shed light on this question, but cannot determine it. As we have seen, the right in the Interim Constitution was vested in individual workers, and freedom of association, another right whose expression must necessarily be collective, remains individuated in the Final Constitution.

Employment and Labour Law (1998) 1 C3:45.

[5] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 69. The wording of FC s 23 differs from that in the Interim Constitution in two respects: the Interim Constitution granted the right to workers and employers (rather than their organisations) and it granted a right to bargain collectively rather than the right 'to engage' in collective bargaining. The import of these differences is discussed below.

The Final Constitution differs from most other constitutions in that it explicates the different aspects of the broader right to freedom of association[1]. That is, it expressly guarantees the right freely to form and join trade unions and employer organisations, the right of those organisations to conduct freely their activities and programmes, the right to organise, the right to collective bargaining and, in the case of workers, the right to strike. In so doing it has avoided problems that have marked other constitutional jurisdictions where a right to collective bargaining is reliant on the interpretation given to the right to freedom of association. In Canada, the scope of the entrenched right to freedom of association has been a source of considerable contestation. Until recently, the Canadian Supreme Court consistently interpreted the right narrowly to exclude the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike.[2]

While the specific enumeration of labour rights avoids the above mentioned problems of interpretation, questions regarding the nature and extent of the right to engage in collective bargaining have still arisen. Rights are generally viewed as imposing a correlative duty or obligation on another party to ensure the protection of the right. With respect to the right to engage in collective bargaining, the exact nature of that obligation has been the subject of conflicting judgments.[3] At issue is whether the right places on the state and employers a positive duty to [1] Belgium, Spain and Poland are among the few countries whose constitutions also contain a right to collective bargaining. See M de Vos 'Belgium', J Wratny 'Poland' and J Garcia Blasco 'Spain' in R Blanpain (ed) The Actors of Collective Bargaining (2003)('Blanpain The Actors'). In Canada, New Zealand and the Netherlands, constitutional freedom of association rights have been narrowly interpreted to exclude the right to collective bargaining. See T Archibald 'Canada', G Andrews 'New Zealand', and W Bouwens 'The Netherlands' in Blanpain The Actors (supra) at 93, 193 and 277 respectively.

[2] See Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 161, [1987] 1 SCR 313 ('Re PSERA'); Dunmore v Ontario (Attorney General) (2001) 207 DLR (4th) 193 (SCC). In the latter case, the issue was whether the exclusion of agricultural workers from collective bargaining legislation violated the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association and equality. The court held that the failure to protect vulnerable farm workers in the legislative scheme amounted to under-inclusion, but this did not mean that freedom of association automatically required collective bargaining rights. If workers had an alternative means, such as a political avenue, to express an associational voice, or had non-union associations for the representation of their interests, there was no constitutional violation.

At the provincial level, Canadian labour legislation, influenced by the US Wagner Act, generally affords access to collective bargaining. In the main, recognition of the union comprises recognition for bargaining purposes. Employers may recognise a union voluntarily, but more commonly, the union files an application for certification with the Labour Relations Board. Once this is granted, after a determination of the relevant bargaining unit and the representativeness of the union, the union is recognised for the purposes of collective bargaining, with an attendant duty on both parties to bargain in good faith.

While the US Constitution does not provide for a right to collective bargaining, the constitutions of several states, such as Florida, Hawaii, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, New York and Oregon, recognise the right of employees to bargain collectively. Moreover, at the federal level, the National Labour Relations Act declares that it is an unfair labour practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of its employees. Section 8*(a)*(5). See E Render 'United States of America' in Blanpain The Actors (supra) at 303.

[3] Compare South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2003 (3) SA 239 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 1495 (T)('SANDU II') with South African National Defence Union & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 2101 (T)('SANDU III').

bargain.[1] If there is such a positive duty, the question arises as to the extent of that duty. Does it require a delineation of levels of membership for recognition of the parties, bargaining topics, bargaining levels, and the bargaining unit and a requirement to bargain in good faith? Or is it more like a negative right or freedom that requires merely that there should be no impediment to, constraint upon, or interference with, parties' voluntary and autonomous exercise of collective bargaining? In terms of the negative conception, the decision whether to negotiate or not rests with the parties and is underpinned by economic power play and not legal enforcement. The content of the constitutional right has implications for the constitutionality of the current labour law regime, in particular, the Labour Relations Act, as well as the regulations governing members of state sectors excluded from the ambit of the LRA, such as the South African National Defence Force (SANDF).[2]

The 1995 LRA studiously avoids imposing a duty to bargain on employers, employers' organisations and trade unions. This is not because it regards collective bargaining as unimportant. On the contrary, one of the objects of the Act is to provide a framework for collective bargaining within which employees, trade unions, employers and employers' organisations can bargain collectively on matters of mutual interest. A further object is to promote orderly collective bargaining and orderly bargaining at sectoral level.[3]

In support of these objects the Act facilitates the acquiring of the different rights relating to collective bargaining: it protects the right of workers to form and to join trade unions and employers', employers' organisations, and the right of

[1] It has been argued that the right to engage in collective bargaining is in the nature of a freedom rather than a right. The use of this terminology has spawned a somewhat confusing analysis on the differences between a freedom and a right in the Bill of Rights. Thus it has been held, incorrectly, that where the term 'freedom' is used in the Constitution, the relevant provision does not encapsulate a right. See SANDU III (supra) at 2113. What is at issue, no matter the terminology, is the nature of the obligation imposed by a provision. As far as the right to engage in collective bargaining is concerned the issue is whether an obligation is placed on someone to do something, that is on the parties to bargain, or whether this should be something left to the parties freely to decide. Those arguing that the right is in the nature of a freedom rely on the distinction between rights and freedoms characterized by Dickson CJ of the Canadian Supreme Court as follows: 'Rights are said to impose a corresponding duty or obligation on another party to ensure the protection of the right in question, whereas 'freedoms' are said to involve simply an absence of interference or constraint.' Re PSERA (supra) at 192-3. An illustration of such interference would be where legislation was passed which prohibited collective bargaining or which would have the effect of prohibiting it, such as the extension of a collective agreement beyond its expiry date by 'legislative fiat' as in the PSERA case. See H Cheadle 'Labour Relations' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (1st Edition, 2002) 18-25 and 27)

[2] See the amendments to chapter XX of the military regulations set out in Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve, Regulation Gazette 6620, R1043, Government Gazette 20425 (1 September 1999)('Amendment to the General Regulations'), made in terms of section 87(1)(rB) read with section 126C of the Defence Act 44 of 1957. The other state sectors excluded from the 1995 Labour Relations Act are the National Intelligence Service and the South African Secret Service. 1995 LRA s 2.

[3] 1995 LRA s 1*(c)* and (d)(i) and (ii).

those organisations to conduct their own activities and programmes, providing a judicial remedy for the infringement of these rights.[1] The Act also facilitates the acquisition of organisational rights by granting these rights to trade unions which can demonstrate a sufficient level of representativeness. Disputes over the granting of organisational rights may be resolved either by arbitration or strike action.[2] In further support of collective bargaining, the 1995 LRA provides for the voluntary establishment of bargaining councils and their weaker counterpart, statutory councils,[3] and for the products of collective bargaining to be made binding on parties and their members and, on application, non-parties. The Act also provides for the enforcement of parties' demands, if collective bargaining should fail, through industrial action in the form of the strike and the lockout. Finally, the 1995 LRA is not altogether silent on the issue of a refusal to bargain and provides for advisory arbitration where there is a dispute over such a refusal. However, the parties are not obliged to abide by the ensuing arbitration award since, as the 1995 LRA says, it is merely advisory in nature.

Having provided this support for collective bargaining, the 1995 LRA leaves its enforcement to industrial action. Thus, an employer's failure to agree to bargain would be a dispute over a matter of mutual interest to be resolved by recourse to strike action. The right to strike to enforce collective bargaining is a right available to both representative and non-representative unions.[4]

The defence force regulations are cast differently, to take account of the specific nature of the armed forces. While collective bargaining is one of the objects of the military regulations,[5] it is more carefully controlled. In their original form, the regulations prescribed a list of topics for bargaining[6] under the bargaining council established by the regulations.[7] Moreover, there was no compulsion on either party to bargain.[8] A major difference between the regulations and the

[1] 1995 LRA ss 4-10.

[2] 1995 LRA ss 12-16 and 65(2).

[3] The establishment of statutory councils is triggered by one or other of the parties. Once triggered, however, such a council must be established provided the requirements for representation have been met. See 1995 LRA ss 39–41.

[4] See National Union of Metalworkers of SA & Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd & Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305, 324 (CC)('NUMSA v Bader Bop'). In NUMSA v Bader Bop, Constitutional Court underscored the importance of the right to strike for minority unions as a means of forcing employers to the bargaining table over organisational rights (in this instance the recognition of trade union representatives). Granting the right to strike, it said, would avoid a limitation of the right of trade unions to organise and bargain collectively. (at para 36). It thus highlighted the importance of the strike as a lever to enforce bargaining.

[5] Amendment to the General Regulations s 3*(c)*.

[6] Amendment to the General Regulations s 62.

[7] Amendment to the General Regulations s 36.

[8] Ibid. In SANDU III, however, the court read this provision as peremptory in nature and thus enforcing a legal duty to bargain.

1995 LRA is that under the regulations striking is prohibited.[1] Such a prohibition is not unusual in relation to the armed forces worldwide. The absence of both a strike weapon and a duty to bargain led to a constitutional challenge to the regulations on the grounds that the combined effect of these omissions was to deprive members of the opportunity to play any real role in the determination of their terms and conditions of work.

There are persuasive arguments both in favour of and against a legally enforceable duty to bargain at constitutional level.

One of the main arguments in support of such a duty is the consistent stance of the Constitutional Court that a constitutional right should be generously interpreted. Such an approach suggests that as far as the right to engage in collective bargaining is concerned, it should be construed broadly enough to provide protection for all workers, no matter what the applicable regulatory regime. Thus it should be able to protect both those workers who are covered by the LRA, as well as those falling under other employment regulatory regimes, such as that governing the defence force. Where appropriate, limitations on the right may be imposed, but the constitutional right should not be interpreted with unnecessary limitations in mind.

The Constitutional Court has not yet had occasion to consider directly the nature of the constitutional right to engage in collective bargaining. Nevertheless, it has underlined the importance of collective bargaining as a means for workers to defend their interests in the workplace[2] and has stated that the Final Constitution conditions a fair industrial relations environment on the existence of collective bargaining.[3] While recognising the centrality of collective bargaining, the Court has cautioned against 'setting in constitutional concrete, principles governing that bargain which may become obsolete or inappropriate as social and economic conditions change.'[4]

[1] Amendment to the General Regulations s 6.

[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 66.

[3] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 13.

[4] Ibid at para 13. Moreover, as we have seen above, collective bargaining is critical to the achievement of democracy in the workplace and for the dignity of workers, both of which are consonant with the spirit and values underlying the Constitution. Thus narrowing the right would potentially undermine these goals. As already mentioned, the Constitutional Court itself has found that collective bargaining is key to a fair industrial relations system. See NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 13. The negative effect of a refusal to bargain or bargaining in bad faith on democratic values within the workplace has been succinctly put: 'There is nothing so subversive of collective bargaining, however, as to refuse to bargain entirely or to pretend to bargain without doing so, going through the motions with no intention of reaching agreement.' See M Brassey in Brassey et al The New Labour Law (supra) at 151. The Industrial Court was alive to the potential to subvert the process of collective bargaining in this manner, and no doubt this formed an essential factor in its decision to hold, under the unfair labour practice provisions in the 1956 LRA, that there was a duty to bargain. See, on the notion of a general duty to bargain, FAWU v Spekenham Supreme (1988) 9 ILJ 628 (IC); Nasionale Suiwelkoöperasie Bpk v FAWU (1989) 10 ILJ 712 (IC); SACWU v Sasol Industries (Pty) Ltd (1989) 10 ILJ 1031 (IC); Buthelezi v Labour for Africa (1991) 12 ILJ 588; SACTWU v Maroc Carpets and Textile Mills (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1101 (IC); RTEAWU v Tedelex (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1272 (IC); Sentraal-Wes (Ko-op) Bpk v FAWU (1990) 11 ILJ 977 (LAC); Macsteel (Pty) Ltd v NUMSA (1990) 11 ILJ 995 (LAC)). In relation to bargaining in good faith, the following forms of

The view that the constitutional right confers a positive duty to bargain was recognized in SANDU III. Regulations governing members of the military provided for collective bargaining[1] on certain issues only and established a military bargaining council for this purpose.[2] The military regulations, however, did not clearly confer a duty to bargain. They provided only that military trade unions 'may' engage in collective bargaining, and 'may' negotiate on behalf of their members on the specified issues.[3] The applicants sought a declarator from the High Court stating that the Minister of Defence was under a duty to negotiate with SANDU on all matters of mutual interest that might arise between them in his official capacity as the employer and a mandamus directing the minister to negotiate accordingly.[4] The court granted the declarator and mandamus.[5] The High Court's conclusions were grounded in the need to interpret constitutional rights broadly, the essential role of collective bargaining in a fair industrial relations system,[6] the decisions of the Industrial Court under the 1956 LRA that there was a duty to bargain,[7] and the importance of collective bargaining where bargaining conduct were among those deemed to be unfair: unfair or unreasonable preconditions to bargaining (Sentraal-Wes (Ko-op) v FAWU (1990) 11 ILJ 977 (LAC); FAWU v Sam's Foods (1991) 12 ILJ 1324 (IC)); premature unilateral action (NUM v Goldfields (1989) 10 ILJ 86 (IC)); illegitimate pressure tactics; denial of union access (Doornfontein Gold Mining Co Ltd v National Union of Mineworkers (1994) 15 ILJ 527 (LAC)); sham bargaining; inadequate substantiation of proposals; the failure to disclose information; dilatory tactics (MAWU v Natal Die Castings Co (Pty) Ltd (1986) ILJ 520); bypassing a recognized union and negotiating directly with the employees when the union is not in bad faith (NUM v East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd (1991) 12 ILJ 1221 (A)); and unilaterally implementing an unnegotiated proposal (NUM v East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd (1991) 12 ILJ 1221 (A). See A Rycroft & B Jordaan A Guide to South African Labour Law (1992) 132–40. The court, however, drew the line at determining the level at which the parties should bargain, but only in the absence of manifest unfairness. See, for instance, Bleazard v Argus Printing & Publishing Co Ltd (1983) 4 ILJ 60 (IC); SA Union of Journalists v Times Media Ltd (1993) 14 ILJ 387 (IC). In Paper Printing Wood & Allied Workers Union v SA Printing & Allied Industries Federation (1990) 11 ILJ 345 (IC). The court refused to compel an employers' organisation to remain a member of an industrial council. In general it also stopped short of deciding appropriate bargaining topics: the Court intervened only where the bargaining demand was 'unconscionable or so outrageous that one can infer that there was no intention to negotiate'. See Buthelezi v Labour for Africa (1991) 12 ILJ 588, 592G-I.

[1] Collective bargaining is defined in section 1 as 'the process whereby the employer and military trade unions engage in negotiation on matters of mutual interest'. Only a registered military trade union has collective and organisational rights in respect of members (section 9).

[2] Regulation 3*(c)* stated: 'Military trade unions may engage in collective bargaining, and may negotiate on behalf of their members, only in respect of a. the pay, salaries and allowances of members, including the pay structure; b. general service benefits, c. general conditions of service; d. labour practices; and e. procedures for engaging in union activities within units and bases of the Defence Force.'

[3] Regulation 36.

[4] SANDU III (supra) at 2111E-F.

[5] Ibid at 2115H.

[6] The SANDU III Court quoted the Constitutional Court's statement in NUMSA v Bader Bop (at para 13) that 'the Constitution contemplates that collective bargaining between employers and workers is key to a fair industrial relations environment.'w workers were prohibited from striking.[1] The SANDU III court held that the constitutional right to collective bargaining placed a duty on the state as employer to bargain collectively. It stated that if the minister was not 'burdened with an obligation to negotiate in good faith' the union would be deprived of any method of enforcing its right to engage in such bargaining. A right without a remedy, it contended, was meaningless.[2] The High Court also found that the regulations themselves could be read in such a way so as to give effect to the duty to bargain, thus obviating the need to amend them to ensure their consistency with its interpretation of FC s 23.[3] Co-incident with the enquiry over the duty to bargain itself, the court also considered the issue of bargaining topics. It found that restrictions on the matters over which collective bargaining could take place — to 'certain' issues (regulation 3*(c)*), which were specified in regulation 36 — violated the Final Constitution and ordered that the offending provisions be deleted.[4]

[7] SANDU III (supra) at 2112G.

A case can, however, be made that FC s 23 does not impose a legally enforceable duty to bargain. Central to this view is Article 4 of Convention 98 of the ILO which does not prescribe a positive duty to bargain. The Article states:

> Measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements.[5]

The committees[6] of the ILO have highlighted the two central principles of this article: (1) the voluntary and autonomous nature of collective bargaining and (2) that positive action should be taken by public authorities to promote such bargaining.[7] In underscoring the voluntary nature of collective bargaining and the autonomy of the bargaining parties, the committees have rejected recourse to

[1] SANDU III (supra) at 2113H.

[2] Ibid at 2113H. The regulations make provision for a Military Arbitration Board to settle disputes which remain unresolved at bargaining council level. The bargaining council is granted the power to hear disputes over any dispute in respect of a collective agreement, or any other matter which is or could be the subject of collective bargaining. This provision is based on the premise that collective bargaining will occur. A dispute about the fact of bargaining cannot itself be the subject matter of bargaining and therefore may not be referred to the arbitration board.

[3] SANDU III (supra) at 2115I. The court did so by arguing that the word 'may' in regulation 36 which provides that military trade unions 'may engage in collective bargaining and may negotiate on behalf of their members', was the legislature's customary manner of conferring powers. See Paper Printing Wood and Allied Workers Union v Pienaar & Others 1993 (4) SA 621, 640A-B (A), (1991) 12 ILJ 308 (A). Contrary to this view it has been held that the word 'may' reflects a certain amount of discretion and will be interpreted as directory rather than peremptory, unless the purpose of the provision indicates otherwise. See Amalgamated Packaging Industries v Hutt 1975 (4) SA 943 (A). With respect, within the context of the regulations, it is difficult to see how the provision could be anything other than directory in nature.

[4] SANDU III (supra) at 2130J and 2131A.

[5] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 107 para 235.

[6] The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Freedom of Association Committee of the Governing Body of the ILO.

[7] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 106 para 235.

compulsion to ensure that bargaining occurs. The role of authorities is to provide the legal framework and administrative machinery for collective bargaining to which parties on a voluntary basis and by mutual agreement may have recourse.[1] Even when highlighting the importance of collective bargaining as an element of freedom of association, the ILO states that the bargaining should be 'free'.[2] It is not sufficient, however, that bargaining should be permitted. It must be actively encouraged and promoted.[3] The committees have held, in addition, that when bargaining occurs, it must take place in good faith.[4] Even here, it must be noted, the committees envisage that a lack of good faith bargaining is a matter for negotiation between the parties rather than a matter that requires compulsion.[5] Moreover, the committees have stated that the determination of bargaining levels[6] as well as bargaining topics should also be left to the parties and not be imposed by law or by the authorities.[7]

[1] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 110, para 247. See also ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 170-171, paras 844, 845 and 846:

> 'The voluntary negotiation of collective agreements, and therefore the autonomy of the bargaining partners, is a fundamental aspect of the principles of freedom of association' . . . 'Collective bargaining, if it is to be effective, must assume a voluntary character and not entail recourse to measures of compulsion which would alter the voluntary nature of such bargaining,' . . . 'Nothing in Article 4 of the Convention places a duty on the government to enforce collective bargaining by compulsory means with a given organisation; such an intervention would clearly alter the nature of bargaining.'

[2] ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 159 para 782.

[3] The ILO's position is highlighted in its observations on New Zealand's previous regulatory regime (the Employment Contracts Act), to the effect that what was required was not merely that the Act permit collective bargaining, but that it should actively promote and encourage it. See Interim Decision of the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association Case No 1698, Official Bulletin vol 77 series B no 3 at para 137*(e)*. The committee stated: 'Considering that, taken as a whole, the Employment Contracts Act does not encourage and promote collective bargaining, the committee requests the Government to take appropriate steps to ensure that legislation encourages and promotes the development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements.' In its Final Decision, the committee wrote: 'In effect it seems that the Act allows collective bargaining by means of collective agreement, along with other alternatives, rather than promoting and encouraging it.' Ibid at para 255. See G Anderson 'Collective Bargaining and the Law: New Zealand's Employment Contracts Act Five Years On' (1996) 9(2) Australian Journal of Labour Law 107, 107-108.

[4] ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 165 para 814 'It is important that both employers and trade unions bargain in good faith and make every effort to reach an agreement; moreover genuine and constructive negotiations are a necessary component to establish and maintain a relationship of confidence between the parties.'

[5] Ibid at 166, para 817 ('While the question as to whether or not one party adopts an amenable or uncompromising attitude towards the other part is a matter for negotiation between the parties, both employers and trade unions should bargain in good faith making every effort to reach an agreement.')

[6] Ibid at 172, para 851 ('According to the principle of free and voluntary bargaining embodied in art 4 of Convention No 98 the determination of the bargaining level is essentially a matter to be left to the discretion of the parties and, consequently, the level of negotiation should not be imposed by law, by decision of the administrative authority or by the case-law of the administrative labour authority.') See also ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 112 para 249.

[7] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 112-3 para 250. The only time the ILO seems to regard an obligation to bargain as amounting to a legally enforceable duty is where a union is representative of workers in an industry. In these circumstances, the committee has held that employers should recognise the union for the purposes of collective bargaining

Proponents of the voluntary position also base their arguments on the wording of FC s 23 itself.[1] They argue that because FC s 23(5) requires that national legislation may be enacted to regulate collective bargaining and may limit a fundamental right, it is envisaged that the regulation of collective bargaining should be left to the legislature. This position, so the argument goes, is reinforced by the wording of the right that parties may 'engage' in collective bargaining (as opposed to the right in the Interim Constitution which granted the right 'to' collective bargaining). However, several constitutional rights require national legislation to make good their promise and all such legislation must comply with constitutional dictates. Whether the word 'engage' connotes the negative right to bargain rather than a hard right with its correlative duty to bargain has been a matter of some contestation. It was previously argued that nothing material turns on this difference in wording.[2] It does not constitute conclusive proof that the right avoids imposing a duty to bargain.

A further argument against a legally enforceable duty to bargain is that the determination of an appropriate collective bargaining regime is an issue of policy which is best left to the legislature to determine. The regime which finds expression in the 1995 LRA is one which positively promotes collective bargaining at industry level, rather than at enterprise level, although, in compliance with the Final Constitution, bargaining at the latter level is not excluded.[3] The 1995 LRA supports industry-level bargaining because of the benefits attached to such a regime.[4] It eschews a general duty to bargain as it would undermine industry-level bargaining by encouraging bargaining at enterprise level. According to this view, interpreting the constitutional right to give effect to a duty to bargain would

[1] H Cheadle 'Labour Relations' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (1st Edition, 2002) 18-27.

[2] See M Brassey & C Cooper 'Labour Relations' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 30-32. See also South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2003 (3) SA 239 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 1495 (T)('SANDU II'). The High Court relied on the wording to decide that the right did not impose a correlative duty to bargain. However, it did hold that the absence of a duty to negotiate did not mean that participation in the process of negotiation and bargaining was so voluntary that the Defence Force could decide capriciously or at whim not to negotiate. Nor could it refuse because bargaining would be inconvenient or difficult. The reasoning in this judgment was held to be incorrect by the High Court in South African National Defence Union & Another v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), (2003) 24 ILJ 2101 (T)('SANDU III').

[3] The constitutional right to engage in collective bargaining is granted not only to trade unions and employer organisations but to individual employers as well. An attempt to restrict the ambit of the right to employer organisations and exclude individual employers was rejected by the Constitutional Court in First Certification Judgment.

[4] See Cheadle (supra) at 18-28 and 29. Cheadle lists the benefits of industry-level bargaining as follows: it removes conflict from the workplace and lowers the transactional costs for employers and trade unions; it generally sets a floor of standards, allowing for further negotiations at the workplace — a combination which both protects workers and allows for flexibility; by setting industry standards, it ensures that competition does not take the form of a race to the bottom by lowering standards for workers; because it is voluntary it has greater legitimacy; and fewer strikes occur where there is such bargaining and they are less damaging for the individual employer.

conflict with the policy regime embodied in the 1995 LRA. Whether one agrees with the merits of industry-level bargaining or not, there is much to be said for the argument that it should be left to the legislature to determine the appropriate collective bargaining regime. Nevertheless, a policy of complete judicial deference within a constitutional democracy is not defensible.[1]

The case against a duty to bargain is also based on the view that conflicts over bargaining agents, levels of bargaining, bargaining tactics, and the bargaining agenda are best left to power play between the interested parties and not to the courts to resolve.[2] The counter argument is that a legal duty to bargain, rather than impeding bargaining, may clear the way for bargaining to take place.[3] Under the 1995 LRA, potential conflict over bargaining rights is minimised by the existence of organisational rights, in particular trade union representation rights, which drive the process leading up to collective bargaining.[4] Disputes over organisational rights are resolved either by industrial action or arbitration, thus minimising the role of the courts and the possible delays inherent in the judicial process. This legislative approach, however, is less helpful in those sectors where workers are hard to organise, such as the farming sector. A duty to bargain would give such vulnerable workers greater opportunity to determine their terms and conditions of work.

There is a valid concern that the imposition of a legally enforceable duty to bargain — and the consequent determination by the judiciary of levels of bargaining, bargaining partners and bargaining topics — could lead to rigidities in the labour market, with negative consequences for South Africa's ability to compete internationally.[5] A system that allows parties to determine

[1] See National Educators Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 95, 109-110 (CC); National Union of Metalworkers of SA & Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd & Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305, 317-319 (CC). The Constitutional Court has stated that it will be slow to intervene where a statute, such as the LRA, aims to give effect to a constitutional right. Nevertheless it would be shirking its constitutional duty if it did not ensure that the legislation gave proper effect to the right. It would intervene when it was in the interests of justice to do so.

[2] In the US, the duty to bargain has spawned jurisprudence over issues relating to bargaining agents, the manner of bargaining, bargaining units and so on which has led to delays in the actual bargaining itself. See D Leslie Labor Law in a Nutshell (4th Edition, 2000) 181–228.

[3] See Brassey (supra) at 151. Under both the 1956 and 1995 LRAs, the position was/and is more nuanced than the above analysis might suggest. While under the 1956 Act the duty to bargain was juridified, this did not extend to all aspects of the duty. Once a duty to bargain had been established by the Industrial Court, the majority of cases thereafter related to good faith bargaining. See Rycroft & Jordaan (supra) at 132-140.

[4] As the granting of union representation rights is dependent on the union having majority support in the workplace and the extent of the representation is highly regulated, conflict over bargaining agents and the bargaining unit is reduced.

[5] The 'Explanatory Memorandum on the Labour Relations Bill' Government Gazette 16259 (10 February 1995) addresses the problem as follows:

> [T]he fundamental danger in the imposition of a legally enforced duty to bargain and the consequent determination by the judiciary of levels of bargaining, bargaining partners and bargaining topics, is the rigidity which is introduced into a labour market that needs to respond to a changing economic environment. The ability of the South African economy to adapt to the changing requirements of a competitive international market is ensured only where the bargaining parties are able to determine the

the contours of bargaining and bargaining outcomes, and which includes the possibility of such arrangements being amended, is more suited to the imperatives of a globally competitive market to which the South African economy needs to be attuned. The Constitutional Court, as we have seen, has indicated that it is alert to the danger of judicially imposed rigidities that might become obsolete under new economic circumstances.[1]

An interpretation of the right to engage in collective bargaining which imposes a correlative duty to bargain would undoubtedly provide the greatest protection to both private and public sector workers and enhance their ability to determine their terms and conditions of work.[2] It would also give effect to the general approach of the Constitutional Court to interpret fundamental rights in a generous manner. At the same time, however, it would be dissonant with the requirements of international law as well as with the legislative regime in the LRA. The alternative reading — that the constitutional right is a negative right or freedom — accords with ILO Convention 98 and the LRA.

An interpretation of the constitutional right as imposing a correlative duty to bargain would mean that the LRA fails to give effect to that right. It would then have to be shown that this limitation is justifiable under FC s 36. We have seen above that one of the main objects of the LRA is to promote collective bargaining and that that purpose is made manifest through the promotion of representative organisations and their activities, organisational rights, the right to industrial action and the provision of mechanisms and institutions for bargaining. Given nature and the structure of bargaining institutions and the economic outcomes that should bind them, and, where necessary, to renegotiate both the structures within which agreements are reached and the terms of these agreements . . . While giving legislative expression to a system in which bargaining is not compelled by law, the draft Bill does not adopt a neutral stance. It unashamedly promotes collective bargaining. It does so by providing a series of organizational rights for unions and by fully protecting the right to strike.

[1] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 13.

[2] Interpretative assistance in evaluating the competing claims over a duty to bargain may be provided by foreign law. However, the caveat against importing law out of context from other jurisdictions should be borne in mind. Few foreign constitutions contain a specific right to collective bargaining. Where such a right is included, it is not always the case that it translates into a positive legislative duty. Thus in Spain and in Poland, the constitutional right to collective bargaining is reflected in a legislative duty to bargain. See Juan Blasco 'Spain' in Blanpain The Actors (supra) at 241-242 and Jerzy Wratny 'Poland' in Blanpain (supra) at 219-220. Not so in Belgium. See Marc de Vos 'Belgium' in Blanpain The Actors (supra) at 65-66. In Belgium, collective bargaining is voluntary, although that country's constitution guarantees the right to such bargaining. Conversely, it is often the case that even where a constitution does not contain a right to collective bargaining, a legislative duty to bargain nevertheless exists or the courts have interpreted the law to give effect to such a duty. Generally a distinction is made between a duty to bargain and a duty to bargain in good faith. Countries with a legislative duty to bargain include Canada, Poland, Sweden, Turkey and France. Countries with a specific duty to bargain in good faith include New Zealand, Poland, Spain, and Israel. Voluntary collective bargaining systems are found in Belgium, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands, Israel, Great Britain, New Zealand, and Turkey. Thus there is no uniform approach, the collective bargaining regime in any specific country being a result of a mix of policy, legal history and social and political norms unique to that country.

that the 1995 LRA promotes collective bargaining and is reflective of international law, the limitation on the right to engage in collective bargaining arising from the absence of a duty to bargain could be justifiable.

A further issue for consideration is whether the right to collective bargaining may be interpreted as incorporating the right to a lockout. The Final Constitution explicitly protects the right to strike, but there is no equivalent right to lock out. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court found that implicit in a right to collective bargaining was the right to 'exercise some economic power against partners in collective bargaining'.[1] This statement should not be read as providing for an implicit right to a lockout, particularly as the court in the same judgment unequivocally rejected the separate inclusion of a right to a lockout on the grounds that the rights to strike and to lock out were not equivalent. Moreover, it would be anomalous to allow the inclusion of the lockout through 'the back door' via another right once it has been explicitly rejected by the Court as worthy of constitutional protection.

One of the provisions of the LRA most vulnerable to constitutional attack under the right to engage in collective bargaining is section 32 of the 1995 LRA. Section 32 provides that a collective agreement drawn up in a bargaining council can be extended to non-parties within the scope of the council, thereby binding them to the terms of the agreement. The effect of this section is not only to limit non-parties' rights to collective bargaining but also, because parties can agree to exclude industrial action as a means of resolving a dispute, to prohibit non-parties' right to strike where such agreement is reached. The imposition on non-parties of limitations which might infringe their fundamental rights could be open to constitutional challenge. It remains to be seen whether such agreements would, under such circumstances, be found to be justifiable on the grounds that they are based on notions of democratic majoritarianism, contain safeguards on the application of the majoritarian principle, and are designed to ensure the promotion of a stable, sectoral collective bargaining system.[2] While the extension will

[1] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253, 1284 (CC). On the basis that Constitutional Principle XXVIII did not require that the constitutional text should recognize any particular economic mechanism, the Court declined to determine the nature and extent of that right.

[2] Safeguards apply, firstly, to the operation of the bargaining councils: they may only be established voluntarily (1995 LRA s 27), the parties must be sufficiently representative of the interests they purport to represent (1995 LRA s 29(11)(iv)), objections may be raised in relation to their establishment (1995 LRA s 29(3)), the demarcation of the scope of councils must be approved by the National Economic Development and Labour Council (Nedlac) (1995 LRA s 29(8)) or the Minister (1995 LRA s 29(9)), adequate provision must be made in bargaining councils' constitutions for the representation of small and medium enterprises (1995 LRA s 29(11)(3)), and parties which are refused admission to councils may seek redress in the Labour Court (1995 LRA s 56(5)). In respect of collective agreements, the Act requires that for an agreement to be declared binding both parties should vote in favour, and they should represent (in the case of trade unions) and employ (in the case of employers' organisations) the majority of members/employees of the parties to the council (1995 LRA s 32(1)). Moreover, the Minister may not extend the agreement unless the majority of workers to be affected are members of the relevant trade unions, and employers employ a majority of the workers to be covered (1995 LRA s 32(3)(b) & (c)). The Act also provides for exemptions from the terms of an agreement by an independent body according to generally be granted only where unions and employers can fulfil the required majoritarian requirement, the Act does make provision for the extension of agreements where the parties are merely sufficiently representative if the Minister deems this to be in the interests of sectoral collective bargaining. [1] This grants a wide discretion to the Minister, and is more susceptible to constitutional challenge than extension based on the majoritarian requirement.[2]

Collective agreements struck at the level of the enterprise may also be made binding on non-union employees in terms of s 23(1)(d) of the 1995 LRA provided the union represents the majority of employees. This has the effect of depriving non-union employees of the right to negotiate their own agreements. The more limited scope of such agreements, the majoritarian requirement and the objective of stable collective bargaining might ensure the constitutional survival of such agreements.

Collective bargaining is also limited by sectoral determinations in terms of s 51 (1) of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act. However, as the purpose of these determinations is to set minimum conditions of employment to protect more vulnerable employees and are arrived at through a process of public consultation, they are unlikely to be impugnable.

53.6 Right to Strike

The right to strike is widely regarded as fundamental to the protection of workers' interests. Without a right to strike, workers' rights to freedom of association and to collective bargaining are compromised.[3]

Although ILO Conventions do not specifically recognise the right to strike, the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association has held that 'the right to strike is one of the essential means through which workers and their organisations may promote and defend their economic and social interests'.[4] The committee has interpreted the right as integral to the right of trade unions to organise their activities and programmes in order to defend and further workers' interests under the Freedom of Association and Right to Organise Convention.[5] The ILO does permit limitations to be placed on the right to strike under certain fair and objective criteria (1995 LRA s 32(3)(e) and (f)), and that levels of representativeness of bargaining councils in respect of which a collective agreement has been extended must be reviewed annually (1995 LRA s 49(2)). The Act does not limit collective bargaining at enterprise level altogether thus allowing for the exercise of bargaining rights of employees within their own enterprise over terms and conditions not bargained at council level, as well as over terms and conditions which improve on those set at council level.

[1] S 32(5)(a) and (b) of the LRA 1995.

[2] FC s 158(1)(g) read with FC s 3*(b)* and FC s 157 (1).

[3] The right is provided for in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1966; the European Social Charter of 1961; and the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1988.

[4] ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 101, para 475.

[5] Articles 3, 8, and 10 of Convention No 87 of 1948. The committee considers that the ordinary meaning of the word 'programmes' includes strike action. ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) at 65-66, paras 147, 148.

circumstances, but requires compensatory guarantees in the form of impartial and rapid conciliation and arbitration processes, and binding and rapidly implemented awards.[1]

The ILO's Committee of Experts and its Committee on Freedom of Association have confirmed that the purpose of strike action is not confined to addressing demands relating to collective bargaining, but may have a broader focus. Their view is summed up in the following statement:

> The right to strike is one of the essential means available to workers and their organisations for the promotion and protection of their economic and social interests. These interests not only have to do with better working conditions and pursuing collective demands of an occupational nature, but also with seeking solutions to economic and social policy questions and to labour problems of any kind which are of direct concern to the workers.[2]

The ILO distinguishes between strikes for broad socio-economic purposes and 'purely political strikes' which it views as falling outside the scope of freedom of association and thus the right to strike.[3] Recognising that it will not always be easy to draw a distinction between the categories, the ILO, nevertheless, has made it clear that it does not regard as 'purely political' those strikes aimed at criticising a government's economic and social policies.[4] Political strikes, as opposed to socio-economic ones, are not recognised by most other countries whose constitutions contain a right to strike.

In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court stated that strike action was the primary mechanism through which workers exercised collective power and that the capacity to strike enabled them to bargain effectively with employers.[5] The right, it said, was entrenched in many constitutions. More recently, the Court has asserted that the > right is both of historical and contemporaneous significance. In the first place, it is of importance for the dignity of workers who in our constitutional order may not be treated as coerced employees. Secondly, it is through industrial action that workers are able to assert bargaining power in industrial relations. The right to strike is an important component of a successful collective bargaining system.[6]

[1] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 72, para 164.

[2] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 65, para 147; ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 102, para 482. ('[T]rade unions should be able to have recourse to protest strikes, in particular where aimed at criticising a government's economic and social policies.' Ibid at para 484: 'The right to strike should not be limited solely to industrial disputes that are likely to be resolved through the signing of a collective agreement; workers and their organisations should be able to express in a broader context, if necessary, their dissatisfaction as regards economic and social matters affecting their members' interests.')

[3] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 72,t para 165. It would seem that most countries place a limit on purely political strikes.

[4] Ibid at 102 para 482.

[5] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 66.

[6] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at para 13.

The Interim Constitution granted workers the right to strike for the purpose of collective bargaining.[1] The right to strike under the Final Constitution is still cast as an individual right, but is no longer linked to any specific purpose.[2] The effect is to broaden the scope of the right. A purposive interpretation of the right will embrace strikes for social and economic purposes. A conception of the right to strike which narrows its scope to collective bargaining issues strictly defined would offend the requirement that the Final Constitution be interpreted to give effect to international law. The LAC has recognised that the constitutional right to strike should not, in the absence of express limitations, be restrictively interpreted.[3]

The scope of the constitutional right to strike has arisen in relation to strike provisions in the 1995 LRA. In conformity with the constitutional labour rights, an individual right to strike is guaranteed to workers in terms of the Act.[4] The Act also makes provision for protest action to promote or to defend the socio-economic interests of workers,[5] but imposes certain restrictions on such action. Protest action may be called only by a registered union or federation of trade unions, is subject to certain procedures, and may be curtailed by the Labour Court acting according to specified criteria.[6] Although these restrictions may constitute infringements on the right to strike, they would probably be justifiable given the potentially deleterious consequences of protest action on the general public.

Whether the legislative right to protest action over socio-economic issues is protected by the constitutional right to strike was considered in Business South Africa v Congress of South African Trade Unions & Another.[7] The case turned on whether, in calling for protest action over a deadlock in negotiating employment standards within the Labour Market Chamber of NEDLAC, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) had followed the procedural requirements for such action under 1995 LRA s 77, specifically s 77(1)(c). Section 77 provides that an employee has the right to participate in protest action to promote or defend the socio economic interests of workers provided that such action is called by a registered trade union/federation,[8] a

[1] IC s 27(4).

[2] Every worker has the right to strike — FC s 23(1).

[3] See Chemical Workers Industrial Union (1999) 20 ILJ 321 (LAC). On the interpretation of fundamental rights generally, see S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 15.

[4] While the right to strike is granted as an individual right, the definition of strike in the Act casts it as a right which may only be exercised in concert with other workers. 1995 LRA s 213 states:

> 'strike' means the partial or complete concerted refusal to work or the retardation or obstruction of work, by persons who are or have been employed by the same or by different employers, for the purpose of remedying a grievance or resolving a dispute in respect of any matter of mutual interest between employer and employee, and every reference to 'work' in this definition includes overtime work, whether it is voluntary or compulsory.

[5] 1995 LRA s 77.

[6] 1995 LRA s 77(2).

[7] (1997) 18 ILJ 474 (LAC), (BSA).

[8] 1995 LRA s 77(1)(a).

notice has been served on NEDLAC giving the reasons for and the nature of the protest action,[1] the matter giving rise to the action has been considered by NEDLAC or another appropriate forum,[2] and the union/federation has served a notice of the impending action on NEDLAC 14 days before commencing with the action.[3] Business South Africa held that COSATU had not complied with s 77(1)(c), as the matter giving rise to the intended protest action had not been properly considered by NEDLAC. At issue was whether, given the guarantee of a constitutional right to strike, a requirement of compliance with a procedural pre-condition for a strike should be liberally or restrictively interpreted. [4] The Labour Appeal Court (LAC), which heard the matter as a court of first instance, handed down a split decision. The majority was reluctant to find that the constitutional right to strike embraced strikes or protest action over socio-economic issues. The court sought to make a distinction between the right to strike and the right to protest action on a number of grounds. Firstly, it stated that the labour rights in the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution underpinned collective bargaining, while protest action fell outside of that context.[5] Secondly, the court held that the LRA conceptualised the right to strike and the right to protest action over socio-economic issues as mutually exclusive. This approach, the court argued, was supported by international law which drew a distinction between strikes relating to collective bargaining and political strikes.[6] Thirdly, as the committees of the ILO had found that the right to strike over economic and social interests was integral to the right to freedom of association, the existence of both a right to freedom of association and an independent right to strike in the Final Constitution did not necessarily mean that the right to protest action in LRA s 77 formed part of the constitutional right to strike.[7] Finally, the court held that because of the different nature and character of the right to protest action, it needed to be assessed in a context broader than that of the fundamental labour rights. The latter in general related to collective bargaining, and thus were restricted to the relationship between employer and employee. However, the right to protest action had an impact not only on the interested parties, but also on the interests of the public. Consonant with the Act's purpose to advance economic development, the right to protest action should therefore be weighed up against these broader interests.[8]

[1] 1995 LRA s 77(1)(b).
[2] 1995 LRA s 77(1)(c).
[3] 1995 LRA s 77(1)(d).
[4] 1995 LRA s 77(1)(c) reads: '(1) Every employee who is not engaged in an essential service or maintenance service has the right to take part in protest action if — . . . (c) the matter giving rise to the intended protest action has been considered by Nedlac or by any other appropriate forum in which the parties concerned are able to participate to resolve the matter . . .'
[5] BSA (supra) at 479B-480A-B.
[6] Ibid at 480C-D.
[7] Ibid at 480E-F.
[8] Ibid at 481D-F.

On the basis of the above arguments, the BSA court concluded that the purpose of the Act did not necessarily require an expansive or liberal interpretation of 1995 LRA s 77.[1]

The BSA court's arguments are flawed in a number of respects. Firstly, in holding that the scope of the right to strike was constrained by its collective bargaining context, the court ignored the fact that the constitutional right to strike is no longer predicated on the right to collective bargaining. Secondly, the court erred in its interpretation of the ILO's position on the ambit of the right to strike. The ILO sees socio-economic strikes as integral to the right to strike but excludes purely political strikes from its scope. The court argued, incorrectly, that the ILO's view was that socio-economic strikes were coincident with political strikes,[2] and thus fell outside the ambit of the right to strike. Problematic too is the court's view that the right to strike excludes the right to protest action because these rights are dealt with in a mutually exclusive manner in the 1995 LRA. The fact that these rights are dealt with separately in the LRA in contrast to the Constitution does not mean that the scope of the constitutional right to strike should be narrowly construed to include only strikes relating to collective bargaining. It is the Constitution which ultimately sets the boundaries of rights and not legislation. Also open to question is the court's view that protest action does not form part of the right to strike because the ILO views strikes over socio-economic issues as part of the right to freedom of association. The fact that the Final Constitution contains a more general right to freedom of association[3] does not mean that the right to protest action should be disassociated from the constitutional right to strike and be given a home under the general freedom of association right. Finally, in justifying a restrictive reading of 1995 LRA s 77, the BSA court emphasised the economic development purpose of the Act without considering its other purposes, in particular its commitment to the advancement of social justice.[4]

By contrast, the minority judgment found unequivocally that the right to strike did include strikes for socio-economic purposes: 'the fact that s 23 of the new Constitution does not restrict a strike to the purpose of collective bargaining must

[1] The BSA court, with reference to S v Makwanyane & Another , rejected the view that interpreting a legislative provision in a purposive fashion was synonymous with a liberal or expansive interpretation. Depending on the proper purpose of the Act, a particular section might have to be interpreted 'restrictively rather than extensively'. In this case, the purpose of the Act (to advance economic development) did not 'necessarily require an expansive or liberal interpretation of s 77, in the sense that the exercise of the right to protest action must be restricted as little as possible'. The procedural requirement could be interpreted narrowly to mean that the next procedural step could be proceeded with only if one (or both) of the parties was no longer committed to resolving the matter. BSA (supra) at 479A-B.

[2] See BSA (supra) at 480C-D.

[3] FC s 18

[4] 1995 LRA s 1. A consideration of social justice objectives need not necessarily mean that an extensive interpretation of the procedural requirements is called for, but it should have been given due consideration by the court in weighing up the relevant factors.

mean that the word "strike" is used in its widest sense.'[1] This interpretation is preferable in that it reflects ILO findings and is consonant with the Constitutional Court's approach that constitutional rights should not be restrictively interpreted. The minority held, in addition, that the purpose of protest action to advance the cause of unorganised workers and economic victims of apartheid was an embodiment of the constitutional rights to freedom of expression and the freedom to demonstrate. This suggested that a liberal rather than a restrictive construction should be placed on 1995 LRA s 77(1)(c).[2] The minority court argued that although the provisions in LRA s 77 were peremptory, compliance with them would have been fulfilled if this had occurred in a real sense (ie substantively, and not in a strictly legal sense).[3] A broad interpretation of s 77(1)(c) did not mean that an impasse had to occur before the next procedure could be embarked on. The issue in dispute merely had to have been considered. An interpretation that allowed meetings to be prolonged indefinitely could undermine the right to protest action and the other freedoms guaranteed by the Final Constitution.[4] While the minority's view is to be preferred, it is also open to the criticism that it relies on the nature of other protest rights as the basis for its conclusion that s 77(1)(c) should be liberally construed. A better approach would have been for the minority court to locate its analysis solely within the nature of the right to strike and FC s 23's labour rights as a whole.

The LRA places other procedural and substantive limitations on the statutory right to strike that may infringe FC s 23.[5]

The Act requires that specific procedures must be followed before workers can

[1] BSA (supra) at 493E.

[2] BSA Ibid citing S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642, 651A–653B (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), in which the following reference was made to R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 321, 395–6, 18 CCC (3d) 385:

> The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect . . . The interpretation should be . . . a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of a guarantee and the securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection.

[3] BSA (supra) at 500E–F. In support of his argument Nicholson J quoted Van Dijkhorst J in Ex parte Mothuloe (Law Society Transvaal intervening) 1996 (4) SA 1131 (T) at 1137H–1138D who said the following:

> In Maharaj & Others v Rampersad 1964 (4) SA 638, 646C (A) Van Winsen AJA, after having concluded that the legislative provision he was concerned with was peremptory, went on to enquire whether it was fatal that it had not been strictly complied with. The learned judge laid down the following test: 'The enquiry, I suggest, is not so much whether there has been "exact", "adequate" or "substantial" compliance with this injunction but rather whether there has been compliance therewith. This enquiry postulates an application of the injunction to the facts and a resultant comparison between what the position is and what, according to the requirements of the injunction, it ought to be. It is quite conceivable that a court might hold that, even though the position as it is, is not identical with what it ought to be, the injunction had nevertheless been complied with. In deciding whether there has been a compliance with the injunction the object sought to be achieved by the injunction and the question of whether this object had been achieved are of importance.'

[4] BSA (supra) at 501B–C.

[5] The Committee of Experts recognizes that the right to strike cannot be considered an absolute right: not only may it be subject to a general prohibition in exceptional circumstances but it may also be governed by provisions laying down the conditions for, or restrictions on, its exercise. See ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 66-7, para 151.

embark on a protected strike.[1] The ILO has accepted legal procedures preceding a strike as long as they are not so complicated as to make it 'practically impossible to declare a legal strike'.[2] The procedural limitations in the LRA requiring prior conciliation and advance warning of 48 hours (or seven days where the employer is the state) should survive constitutional scrutiny. The requirement for conciliation is in line with the notion of strike action as a weapon of last resort. The notice period is short enough so as not to undermine the effectiveness of the action, while allowing the employer time to reconsider its position or to make provision for the action.[3]

At a substantive level, the Act limits the right to strike during the currency of a collective agreement if the issue in dispute is regulated[4] by the agreement.[5] This limitation is accepted by the ILO on the grounds that collective agreements may be viewed as social peace treaties of fixed duration,[6] as long as workers have recourse to 'impartial and rapid arbitration machinery for individual or collective grievances concerning the interpretation or application of collective agreements.'[7] The rationale for this conclusion is that, having bargained and settled an issue, parties should abide by the agreement until it expires. Peace obligations are also common in other jurisdictions. The Act meets the ILO requirements in that it provides for disputes over the interpretation or application of issues in such agreements to be referred in the first instance to conciliation and, if the dispute is not resolved, to voluntary arbitration. The limitation should be deemed justifiable because it is narrowly tailored to meet the ILO's objective of social harmony and is a product of a voluntary and collective bargain between employer(s) and workers. The provision should also survive constitutional attack as collective agreements often provide for minimum wages only, leaving it to individual enterprises to negotiate actual wages.[8]

[1] 1995 LRA s 64.

[2] ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) at 105 paras 498, 499 and 502.

[3] The ILO permits prior conciliation and mediation provided that the process is not 'so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness'. It also permits a period of advance notice which is shorter than the conciliation period if the conciliation period is lengthy, provided that the period is not an additional obstacle to bargaining. ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 75 para 172.

[4] Peace agreements have been found to include agreements about the implementation and application of the collective agreement, thus precluding a strike over such issues. In Samancor Ltd v NUMSA (2000) 21 ILJ 2305 2314 (LC), the Court stated: 'The issues in dispute, variously described in both the dispute declaration and the strike notice, are issues relating to the application and/or the implementation of those agreements and not to the substance thereof and are accordingly disputes of right, regarding which industrial action is expressly precluded by the collective bargaining agreement within the ambit of which they were concluded.' See also Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd v PTWU [1997] 11 BLLR 1425 (LC) in which the Court held that an issue is regulated by a collective agreement not only where it is substantive in nature but also where it relates to the process for the resolution of the issue.

[5] 1995 LRA s 65(3)(a)(i).

[6] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 73 para 166.

[7] Ibid at para 167.

[8] For apposite decisions under the 1956 LRA, see BAWU v Asoka Hotel (1989) 10 ILJ 167 (IC); SEAWU v BRC Weldmesh (1991) 11 ILJ 1304 (IC); SAWU v Rutherford Joinery (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 695 (IC). For an apposite decision under the 1995 LRA, PSA v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others (2001) 22 ILJ 2303 (LC).

The Act also provides for peace obligations in respect of binding arbitration awards. Parties are precluded from embarking on industrial action where the award regulates the issue in dispute.[1] This limitation should pass constitutional muster on the basis that where the arbitration process is available to parties, they should not be allowed a second bite of the cherry if dissatisfied with the outcome of that process.

More susceptible to constitutional challenge is the prohibition on strike action during the currency of a statutory council agreement where the parties are not representative within the council's scope.[2] Such agreements, if promulgated as determinations by the Minister of Labour, will bind non-parties and thus deprive certain workers of their right to strike without their consent. The provision, however, should survive constitutional scrutiny as the determination may only be made on a recommendation by the employment standards commission after an investigation by the director general of labour. Moreover, the investigation must take cognisance of a wide range of interests, including those of workers deprived of the right to strike.[3] The Act provides, furthermore, for applications for exemption from the terms of the agreement to an independent body appointed by the Minister.[4]

The 1995 LRA provides that parties may contract out of the right to strike by means of a collective agreement.[5] This limitation should be justifiable on the basis that the right to strike is being waived in terms of an agreement which is voluntary in nature, and the result of the collective power of the employees rather than the result of negotiation between the more vulnerable individual worker and employer. Moreover, the Act, in line with ILO requirements, provides for alternative dispute resolution for such disputes through conciliation and arbitration.[6] More problematic is the provision providing that the agreement may be extended to non-parties under certain conditions.[7] These parties will, without their consent, be denied the right to strike during the agreement's currency. Whether such an infringement will pass constitutional muster will depend on whether it can be justified in terms of the imperatives of orderly collective bargaining and the majority principle.

The 1995 LRA states that a person may not take part in a strike if he or she is bound by an agreement requiring the issue in dispute to be referred to

[1] 1995 LRA s 65(3)(a)(i).

[2] 1995 LRA s 65(3)(a)(ii) read with s 44.

[3] 1995 LRA s 44 read with sections 53 and 54 of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act 75 of 1997.

[4] 1995 LRA s 44(3). The Act also prohibits industrial action if the person is bound by a determination in terms of the Wage Act regulating the issue in dispute during the first year of that determination. Act 5 of 1957. The Wage Act has since been repealed, and wage determinations are now sectoral determinations under the Basic Conditions of Employment Act. To the extent that the provision limits the right to strike, similar arguments as above as to its justifiability would apply.

[5] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(a).

[6] 1995 LRA s 24.

[7] 1995 LRA ss 23(1)(d) and 32.

arbitration.[1] The provision refers to both individual and collective agreements. A collective agreement waiving the right to strike in favour of arbitration may be constitutionally justifiable. Less certain is the case of individual agreements as individual employees remain vulnerable in ways union members are not.

According to the 1995 LRA, a person may not strike if the issue in dispute is one that a party has a right to refer to arbitration or to the Labour Court in terms of the Act.[2] Where the Act requires arbitration or adjudication for disputes best left to industrial action for resolution, there may be grounds for challenging the constitutionality of such a restriction.[3] Dismissals over retrenchment, for instance, were originally justiciable in the Labour Court, even though there were strong arguments for their being treated as economic disputes. Subsequent amendments to the LRA have now opened the way for certain workers to have the choice of either striking or going to court where such disputes arise.[4]

Under the 1995 LRA, the choice of arbitration or strike action has always been available to representative unions concerning disputes over organisational rights that they are granted as of right under the Act.[5] Unrepresentative unions, however, are denied organisational rights as of right by the Act, and may not refer disputes over such rights to arbitration. Whether they may strike in order to persuade the employer to grant them such rights was considered in NUMSA v Bader Bop.[6] The Constitutional Court in NUMSA found that denying minority unions the right to strike over trade union representation rights constituted an infringement of the right to strike.[7] There was nothing in the relevant part of the Act that prevented non-representative unions from 'using the ordinary process of collective bargaining and industrial action to persuade employers to grant them

[1] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(b).

[2] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(a). See R Birk 'Industrial Conflict: The Law of Strikes and Lockouts' in R Blanpain (ed) Comparative Labour Law and Industrial Relations in Industrialized Market Economies (4th Edition, 1990) 281.

[3] While not explicit, the Act follows the schema whereby disputes of right are either adjudicated or arbitrated, while disputes of interest (economic disputes) are left for resolution through power play by the parties.

[4] 1995 LRA s 189A.

[5] Where disputes are over organizational rights, the Act grants parties a choice either to resolve the dispute through adjudication or by industrial action. A similar choice is granted to certain workers in relation to disputes over operation requirements dismissals. See 1995 LRA s 189 and s 189A.

[6] 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305 (CC)('NUMSA v Bader Bop').

[7] But see Bader Bop v NUMSA (2002) 23 ILJ 104, 316 (LAC). The LAC had found that the requirements of representativeness for the exercise of organisational rights in s 21 precluded unrepresentative unions from striking in order to conclude a collective agreement with employers over the granting of such rights. The union, which was not sufficiently representative, had sought to obtain the organisational rights in ss12-15 of the LRA. While the employer was willing to grant the union access to its premises and stop order facilities, it was not prepared to recognise the union's shop stewards or to bargain collectively with the union. The union had then indicated its intention to strike over these matters. The employer had sought an interdict preventing the strike. The Labour Court had dismissed the application, but on appeal a divided Labour Appeal Court granted it. The majority argued that unless the union was representative of the majority in the workplace it could not be granted shop steward recognition nor could it strike over such a demand.

organisational facilities.'[1] The Constitutional Court stated that these were matters of 'mutual interest' to employers and unions and thus were capable of forming the subject matter of collective agreements, of being referred to conciliation, and of being resolved through strike action.[2] Support for this view, the Court held, was also found in s 20 of the Act. Section 20 states that nothing in the part of the Act on organisational rights precluded the conclusion of a collective agreement that regulated such rights. The Constitutional Court rejected as narrow and inappropriate in an Act committed to freedom of association and collective bargaining the LAC's view that s 20 of the 1995 LRA merely clarified the position that employers and representative unions might regulate organisational rights.[3] Instead the Court viewed 1995 LRA s 20 as an express confirmation of the internationally recognised rights[4] of minority unions to seek to gain access to the workplace, and the recognition of their shop stewards and other organisational facilities through the techniques of collective bargaining.[5]

The 1995 LRA also limits the right to strike in essential services and minimum services. The ILO recognises that it might be necessary to prohibit strikes in essential services but that such services should be restrictively defined. Without a restrictive definition, the notion would lose all meaning. The ILO defines essential services as those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.[6] It was not prepared to draw up a definitive list of which services could be determined as essential.[7] The method of declaring services as essential differs from country to country. The two main methods are either to list the essential services or to provide a definition and declare services as essential according to that definition from time to time.[8] Both methods have their advantages and disadvantages. Although the list system benefits from its specificity, it may embrace whole services or parts of services which are not truly essential. The definition method allows for an assessment according to consistent criteria as to whether services are essential services or not. The disadvantage is that too many services may be captured by too broad a definition. The benefit of the ILO's definition is that it is restrictively cast and thus allows for the prohibition of strike action in very limited circumstances. Critically, the ILO requires that where a strike is

[1] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at 326.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 327.
[4] The ILO has declared that a ban on strikes relating to recognition disputes is not in conformity with the principles of freedom of association.
[5] NUMSA v Bader Bop (supra) at 327.
[6] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 70 para 159.
[7] Ibid.
[8] See C Cooper 'Strikes in Essential Services' (1994) 15(5) ILJ 903-929.

prohibited, there should be access to quick and impartial mediation and arbitration procedures for workers hit by the prohibition.[1]

The 1995 LRA basically adopts the definitional approach to essential services. It defines as essential a service 'the interruption of which endangers the life, personal safety or health of the whole or any part of the population'.[2] It also specifically declares as essential the parliamentary service and the South African Police Service. The prohibition of strikes in essential services (including minimum services) provided for in the LRA should pass the requirements of the limitations test in the Final Constitution, particularly as the prohibition is consonant with ILO requirements.[3] The Act's definition of an essential service replicates that of the ILO. Both provide for a prohibition on strikes only in very restricted circumstances. The specific inclusion of parliamentary and police services as essential services, thereby removing the right of employees in these services to strike, is also defensible in terms of the public importance of these functions, and is accepted by the ILO and is common elsewhere. The ILO states that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited in the public service in so far as such a strike could cause 'serious hardship' to the 'national community and provided that the limitations are accompanied by certain compensatory guarantees.'[4]

The Act provides for an independent essential services committee to investigate the declaration of services as essential, whether in whole or part, for representations from any interested party, and the variation or the cancellation of the declaration after following the same process.[5] Moreover, it also provides for the committee to investigate disputes over the interpretation or application of the designation of services as essential. In making its decision the committee will be guided by the restrictive definition of an 'essential' service.[6]

[1] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 72 para 164. The ILO also recommends the establishment of an independent body to examine the difficulties raised by the definition of essential services and to issue enforceable decisions. The ILO recognises that under certain circumstances a service which may not amount to an essential service in the strict sense of the term may become essential if a strike in that service exceeds a certain duration or extent so that the life, personal safety or health of the population are endangered. Thus it provides that in such a case it should be possible to establish a minimum service provided that the service is 'genuinely and exclusively a minimum service', and, secondly, as this would limit the right to strike of workers in those services, that workers be allowed to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 71, para 161.

[2] 1995 LRA s 213.

[3] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(d)(i).

[4] ILO Freedom of Association (1996) (supra) 110, para 533.

[5] 1995 LRA s 70; 1995 LRA s 71.

[6] The approach of the British Columbia Labour Board in defining essential services is instructive: See School District No 54 and Bulkley Valley Teachers' Assn (Re) 93 CLLC 16,070 (BCLRB) as cited in G Adams Canadian Labour Law (2nd Edition, Release No 4, November 1995) 10-36.3 ('In summary, the factors that the Board will consider in its investigation and recommendation and in its subsequent designation of essential services, include such matters as the length of the dispute, the timing of the dispute, the type of

The LRA also provides for the resolution of disputes in essential services via simple, impartial and accessible conciliation and arbitration processes, including provision for parties to designate a specific commissioner to resolve their disputes[1] and for the speedy issuing of awards.[2] These conditions, in that they meet the demand for a restrictive limitation of the right to strike and the provision of appropriate compensatory arbitration processes, should render the limitation justifiable in terms of FC s 36.[3] The Act also requires the committee to ratify the designation by collective agreement of parts of an essential service as a minimum service. In such circumstances, only workers in the minimum service are prohibited from striking.[4] This arrangement has the effect of further limiting the restriction on the right to strike, thus conforming to ILO precepts[5] and immunizing the provision against constitutional attack.

In an innovative provision, the LRA limits strikes in what it terms maintenance services. These services are defined as those which, if interrupted, will have the effect of the 'material physical destruction to any working area, plant or machinery.'[6] The difference between the provisions on maintenance and minimum services is that the former are concerned with preventing the potential damage a strike may have on the wealth creating capacity of the business and the latter the effect of a strike on the safety of people. Maintenance services may be instituted in any plant either via collective agreement or, if there is no such agreement, on application by the employer to the essential services committee. The declaration of a service as a maintenance service has the effect of depriving the right of employees in that service to strike.[7] The Act provides that the committee may refer the dispute to arbitration but only if the number of employees employed in the maintenance service is greater than the number who would be entitled to strike.[8] The effect of this requirement is not to deprive the whole workforce of "facilities, production and services" which the employer seeks to have designated, and the actual impact of the dispute on both the parties and the public.' The Board went on to say: 'Finally this Board is not naive with regard to the impact of essential service designations on a dispute. The employer will often seek higher levels than necessary in order to lessen the impact and force a strike. The union will often seek lower designations in order to increase the effectiveness of its strike. The Board in all of this must keep the public interest firmly in its view.')

[1] 1995 LRA s 135(6)(i).

[2] 1995 LRA ss 135 and 136. There are special provisions in the Act relating to time limits for the coming into force of an arbitration award in essential services disputes where the employer is the state and the award has financial implications. As monies have to be voted by Parliament to fulfil awards which have financial implications, the longer period should be justifiable.

[3] See Mbelu & Others v MEC for Health and Welfare, Eastern Cape & Others 1997 (2) SA 823, 835E–836A (Tk)(Upheld s 19 of the Public Service Labour Relations Act Proc 105 of 1994 as a justifiable limitation of IC s 27(4), the right to strike. The Public Service Labour Relations Act has been repealed by the 1995 LRA. Section 19 prohibited strikes in essential services and was not as closely tailored to ILO requirements in this regard as is the 1995 LRA.)

[4] 1995 LRA s 72.

[5] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 69 and 70 para 159.

[6] 1995 LRA s 75(1).

[7] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(d)(ii).

[8] 1995 LRA s 65(1)(ii).

the right to strike if the majority are entitled to do so. Employers who have been granted their application for the declaration of a maintenance service may not use replacement labour in place of those on strike or where they have locked out employees, unless the lockout is defensive in nature. It is unlikely that many employers will make use of this provision, as it limits their ability to keep production in operation through the use of replacement labour. The restriction on the right to strike in a maintenance service should prove to be justifiable because such a service is narrowly defined and includes a ban on the use of replacement labour.

The ILO has stressed the importance of the protection of those who go on strike from dismissal and other retaliatory measures. Legislation, the ILO has held, should provide genuine protection for workers on strike. Without such protection, the right might be 'devoid of content'.[1] The LRA meets this requirement by guaranteeing protection against unfair dismissal and granting immunity from civil liability (delict and breach of contract[2]) to strikers who follow the required strike procedures.[3] The Act protects workers who have been unfairly dismissed by providing that they should be reinstated or re-employed. However, it does grant discretion to the adjudicator not to grant reemployment or reinstatement under certain circumstances.[4] This provision needs to be narrowly construed. If not, it could undermine the right to strike by failing to protect adequately those unfairly dismissed for going on strike.[5]

A generous interpretation of the constitutional right to strike would include secondary strikes. The LRA recognises the legitimacy of such strikes, but places limitations on them. It follows the universal practice of requiring a link between the primary strike and any secondary strike.[6] The requirements should pass constitutional muster on the grounds that the restrictions are based on notions of proportionality and are reflective of common and accepted practice in other jurisdictions.

[1] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 62 para 139.

[2] Although striking is not a breach of contract under the Act, and therefore strikers should be remunerated, the Act deals with this anomaly by providing that the employer is not obliged to remunerate an employee for services that the employee does not render during a protected strike 1995 LRA s 67(3).

[3] 1995 LRA ss 187(1)(a) and 67. The Committee of Experts has found that striking workers should be protected against dismissal or discrimination: 'Since the maintaining of the employment relationship is a normal consequence of the recognition of the right to strike, its exercise should not result in workers being dismissed or discriminated against.' ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 77-8, para 179. However, conduct which amounts to a criminal offence is expressly excluded from protection. 1995 LRA s 67(8).

[4] 1995 LRA s 193(2).

[5] Additional protection for striking workers is provided in s 5 of the Act which protects an employee from discrimination (1995 LRA s 5(1)) or prejudice (s 5(2)(a)(iv)) for exercising a right conferred by the Act, and from being prevented from exercising a right under the Act (s 5(2)(b)), or being advantaged for not exercising such a right (1995 LRS s 5(3)). Our courts have found that a financial reward to non-striking workers should be strictly prohibited. See FAWU v Pet Products (Pty) (Ltd) 2000 (7) BLLR 781 (LC).

[6] Secondary strikes are prohibited unless 'the nature and extent of the secondary strike is reasonable in relation to the possible direct or indirect effect the secondary strike may have on the business of the primary employer'. 1995 LRA s 67(3). See C Cooper 'Sympathy Strikes' (1995) 16(4) ILJ 759-784.

Members of the South African National Defence Force have no right to strike: the military regulations[1] prohibit them from doing so and they are excluded from the protections afforded workers in terms of the 1995 LRA.[2] This infringement of their right to strike will most likely be found to be justifiable on two grounds. Firstly, they are public servants who exercise authority in the name of the state.[3] The ILO accepts that a limitation of the right to strike is acceptable where public servants are concerned. Secondly, as the Constitutional Court noted in SANDU I, the constitutional imperatives of maintaining a disciplined and effective force may justify the different treatment to which military trade unions (and therefore their members) are subject.[4]

(a) Lockouts

One of the most significant changes to the constitutional labour rights in the Final Constitution is the absence of a lock-out right for employers. The Interim Constitution stated that 'recourse to the lock-out for the purposes of collective bargaining shall not be impaired, subject to section 33(1).'[5] The absence of a constitutional right or recourse to a lock-out reflects a worldwide trend.[6] Many countries protect a right to strike without offering employers a right to a lock-out.[7] Support for this view can also be found in the decisions of the ILO's Committee of Experts and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which recognize the right to strike but accord no equivalent status to the lockout.

Opponents of the right to lock-out argue that the employee's 'right or freedom to strike is already balanced by the employer's right of property and his prerogatives to hire and fire at will.'[8] It is the employer's power to act unilaterally that

[1] See Amendment to the General Regulations for the South African National Defence Force and Reserve s 6.

[2] 1995 LRA s 2.

[3] ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 69 para 158.

[4] SANDU v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC), (1999) 20 ILJ 2265, 2281 (CC).

[5] IC s 27(5).

[6] Lockouts are entrenched only in the constitutions of Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Mexico and Sweden. See D Ziskind 'Labour Law in 143 Countries' Comparative Labour Law 223. The absence of a right to a lock-out in the constitutions of France, Italy and Portugal, despite a constitutional right to strike, illustrates the lack of equivalence granted these forms of industrial action in other jurisdictions. The Regulation of Industrial Conflict in Europe, Strikes and Lockouts in 15 Countries EIRR Report No 2 (December 1989).

[7] The right to strike (with various qualifications) is enshrined in the constitutions of many countries, including: Argentina, Bolivia, Burkina Faso, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Cyprus, Ecuador, El Salvador, Dominican Republic, Dahomey, France, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Italy, Malagasy Republic, Mexico, Morocco, Panama, Paraguay, Portugal, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Sweden, Venezuela. ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) at 64 n12; Ziskind (supra) at 222.

[8] R Ben Israel 'Introduction to Strikes and Lockouts: A Comparative Perspective' in 'Strikes and Lockouts in Industrialized Market Economies' (1994) 29 Bulletin of Comparative Labour Relations 14.

is the true equivalent of the strike. Granting the employer an additional economic weapon in the form of the lockout would upset 'the delicate balance created by the recognition of the right or freedom to strike.'[1]

This argument was accepted by the First Certification Judgment Court. Rejecting the employers' case for the inclusion of a right to lock out in the Bill of Rights, the Constitutional Court stated that the ability of workers to act collectively (through collective bargaining and the right to strike) was necessary to enable them to counteract the greater social and economic power of employers. In contrast, the court said, employers have a range of other weapons at their disposal by means of which they may exercise their economic power against workers such as dismissal, the employment of alternative or replacement labour, the unilateral implementation of new terms and conditions of employment, and the exclusion of workers from the workplace.[2] Given that the Constitutional Court has explicitly rejected the inclusion of a right or recourse to the lockout in the Final Constitution, no part of FC s 23 should be interpreted to include such a right.[3]

The 1995 LRA contains an attenuated 'recourse' to a lockout.[4] The absence of a constitutional provision for a lock-out does not render unconstitutional the recourse to the lockout in the 1995 LRA. What it does mean, however, is that employers have no constitutional protection against the curtailing of their recourse to the lock-out in the LRA.[5]

(b) Picketing

Picketing is a common activity engaged in by workers to obtain the support of other workers and the general public for their cause.[6] The right to picket is recognised by the ILO which holds that pickets may be prohibited only if they cease to be peaceful. The right to picket is [1] A Rycroft & B Jordaan A Guide to South African Labour Law (1992) 141.

[2] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR (CC) 1253, 1284 ('First Certification Judgment'). On the basis that a lockout was not a universally accepted right, the Constitutional Court also rejected the argument that the exclusion of the lock-out meant that the text failed to comply with CP II, which requires that 'all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties' shall be provided for and protected in the Final Constitution 'due consideration [having been given] to, inter alia, the fundamental rights' contained in the Interim Constitution. Ibid.

[3] This is particularly relevant in relation to the scope of the right to engage in collective bargaining as it is possible for the lock out to be considered an adjunct to that right. See § 53.5 supra.

[4] Significantly, many other countries accord less recognition to the lock-out than the LRA. Portugal prohibits lock-outs altogether, their use in Spain is strictly curtailed, while in France and Italy they have no statutory recognition. D du Toit et al The Labour Relations Act of 1995 (supra) at 196-7.

[5] First Certification Judgment (supra) at 1285.

[6] See ILO Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994) (supra) 76 at para 174.

provided for in terms of FC s 17 but not explicitly in the labour rights.[1] However, in SANDU III, the High Court read FC s 23(2)(b) as conferring a right to picket on workers. The section states that every worker has the right to 'participate in the activities and programmes of a trade union'. Section 8*(b)* of the military regulations provided that the right of members of the force to assemble, to demonstrate, to picket and to petition was subject to the limitation that such right should not be exercised 'in respect of any matter concerning either the employment relationship with the Department of Defence or any matter related to the Department of Defence.' In declaring the provision invalid, the Court referred to ILO Committee of Freedom of Association findings that workers should enjoy the right to peaceful demonstration to defend their occupational interests.[2]

Picketing in the 1995 LRA takes the form of a trade union right.[3] The limiting of the right to a trade union right where the constitutional formulation grants an individual right is one possible ground for a constitutional challenge. The limitation should survive constitutional scrutiny on the basis of the potentially disruptive effect of a picket on the public and the need to ensure that the parties who call the picket are sufficiently accountable.

The most probable constitutional challenge to the LRA's picketing provision will arise in the context of claims by employers that their common-law right to property has been infringed.[4] The Act provides for picketing on an employer's premises only with the permission of the employer, but states that this permission may not be withheld unreasonably.[5] The CCMA is empowered to assist parties (at their request) to reach agreement on picketing rules, including rules regarding picketing on an employer's premises if the CCMA is satisfied that the employer has withheld permission unreasonably.[6] Thus to it initially falls the difficult task of balancing the right to picket against the employer's property rights. Disputes over picketing which remain unresolved by the CCMA will be heard by the Labour Court.

[1] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson, M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43 (Contains an extensive discussion of the right to picket and conditions for its appropriate limitation.)

[2] SANDU III (supra) at 2118C-D. The High Court found that the Minister of Defence's justification for the provision that 'mass action against the SANDF is usually, if not always, in basic conflict with the type of discipline desired in a defence force', did not fulfil FC s 36's requirements for justification. Ibid at 2118H-J.

[3] 1995 LRA s 69(1). A registered trade union may authorize a picket by its members and supporters for the purposes of peacefully demonstrating in support of any protected strike or in opposition to any lock-out.

[4] See Woolman 'Assembly' (supra) at § 43.7 (Analysis of picketing under the 1995 LRA.)

[5] 1995 LRA ss 69(2) and (3).

[6] 1995 LRA s 69(6).

54 Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession

Dennis Davis

54.1 The history of Interim Constitution section 26 and Final Constitution section 22 54-1
54.2 The logic of section 22 54-2
(a) An overview. 54-2
(b) Comparative Jurisprudence. 54-3
(i) German case law. 54-3
(ii) Japanese case law 54-5
54.3 Section 22 Jurisprudence 54-7
54.4 Restraint of trade clauses 54-9
54.5 The regulation of conduct by professionals and those engaged in trade 54-11

54.1 THE HISTORY OF THE INTERIM CONSTITUTION S 26 AND THE FINAL CONSTITUTION S 22

Section 26 of the Interim Constitution[1] contains a broad, but by no means transparent, formulation of the right to economic activity. It reads:

> (1) every person shall have the right of freely to engage in economic activity and to pursue a livelihood anywhere in the national territory;
> (2) sub-section (1) shall not preclude measures designed to promote the protection or the improvement of the quality of life, economic growth, human development, social justice, basic conditions of employment, fair labour practices and equal opportunities for all, provided such measures are justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality.

Generating a best rendering of IC s 26 was not without difficulty. The Court in S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg was left with two basic choices. As Chaskalson P observed:

> The first [alternative] focuses on a meaning of free participation and an economic activity and the pursuing of a livelihood. In a modern democratic society a right 'freely' to engage in economic activity and to earn a livelihood does not imply a right to do so without any constraints whatsoever. . . . The alternative approach is to read s 26(1) and (2) together as indicating that all constraints upon economic activity and the earning of a livelihood which fall outside the purview of s 26(2) will be in breach of s 26. This construction is less restrictive of 'free economic activity.[2]

The Solberg Court opted for the second, less expansive approach to IC 26.

By contrast, section 22 of the Final Constitution[3] leaves little room for alternative readings. FC s 22 turns the core protections of IC s 26 into a substantially more limited right.[4] That said, the concatenation of the Constitutional Court's

---

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[2] 1997(4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) ('Solberg') at paras 32, 37. Later in the same judgment, Chaskalson warned that:

> [S] 26 should not be construed as empowering a court to set aside legislation expressing social or economic policies infringing 'economic freedom' simply because it may consider the legislation to be ineffective or is of the opinion that there are other and better ways of dealing with the problems. If s 26(1) is given the broad meaning for which the appellants contend, of encompassing all forms of economic activity and all methods of pursuing a livelihood, then, if regard is had to the role of the courts and democratic society, s 26(2) should also be given a broad meaning. To maintain a proper balance between the roles of the Legislature and the courts, s 26(2) should be construed as requiring only that there is a rational connection between the legislation and the legislative purpose sanctioned by the section.

Ibid at 44.

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[4] In examining the ambit of the Interim Constitution s 26, Chaskalson P in Solberg noted that:

> Certain occupations call for particular qualifications prescribed by law and one of the constraints of the economic sphere is that persons who lack such qualifications may not engage in such occupations. For instance, nobody is entitled to practice as a doctor or as a lawyer unless he or she holds the prescribed qualifications, and the right to engage 'freely' and economic activity should not be construed as conferring such a right on unqualified persons; nor should it be construed as entitling persons to ignore legislation for regulating the manner in which particular activities have to be conducted, provided always that such regulations are not arbitrary.

narrowreading of IC s 26, the linguistic similarity of FC s 22 and IC 26 and our courts continued reference to the cases decided under IC s 26 justify our ongoing reliance on the jurisprudence generated by IC s 26.

29.2 THE LOGIC OF S 22

(a) An Overview

FC s 22 provides as follows:

> Every citizen has the right to choose their trade, occupation or profession freely. The practice of a trade, occupation or profession may be regulated by law.

Despite the similar juridical constructions of IC s 26 and FC 22, the difference of wording between s 22 and its predecessor s 26 must represent the starting point for our analysis of FC 22. In short:

(i) the right contained in s 22 appears to be granted only to South African citizens[1];
(ii) the more specific formulation of choice of trade, occupation and profession has replaced the more general phrase regarding engagement in economic activity; and
(iii) the use of every citizen requires that the provision's benefits be restricted to individuals and not extended to juristic bodies.[2]

Finally, IC s 26's expansive language could have been read as a neo-liberal, free market bulwark against interventionist economic policies. FC s 22, on the other hand, must be read as a corrective to historical employment inequities created by Apartheid. In JR 1013 Investments CC and Others v Minister of Safety and Security and Others, Jones J noted:

> We have a history of repression in the choice of a trade, occupation or profession this resulted in disadvantage to a large number of South Africans in earning their daily bread. In the pre-Constitution era implementation of the policies of apartheid directly and indirectly impacted upon the free choice of a trade, occupation or profession: unequal education, the prevention of free movement of people throughout the country, restrictions on where and

[1] The restriction of the right to 'every citizen' was the subject of an objection during the Certification process. The objectors contended that in order to comply with Constitutional Principle II the right of occupational choice should be extended to everyone, irrespective of citizenship. The Constitutional Court rejected this argument on the grounds that even where international human rights instruments recognize the right of occupational choice, there is nothing in these documents that would prohibit States Parties from imposing suitable conditions limiting the rights of non-nationals in respect of freedom of occupational choice. See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 17 and 18.

The Court further observed that this right is not contained in a number of different international instruments. The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms contains no right to occupational choice, and neither does the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Article 6.1 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recognizes the right of everyone to 'the opportunity to gain his living by work which he freely chooses or accepts'. Ibid at 18.

[2] See City of Cape Town v AD Outpost (Pty) Ltd and Others 2000 (2) SA 733, 747 A-C (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 130 (C).

> how long they could reside in particular areas, and the practice of making available structures to develop skills and training in the employment sphere to selected sections of the population only, and the statutory reservation of jobs for members of particular races. The result was that all citizens in the country did not have a free choice of trade, occupation or profession. Section 22 is designed to prevent a perpetuation of this state of affairs.[1]

(b) Comparative Jurisprudence

A number of foreign constitutions possess a right similar to that of FC s 22. Article 12(1) of the German Basic Law provides that all Germans have the right freely to choose their trade, occupation, or profession, their place of work and their place of training. The practice of trades, occupations and professions may be regulated by statute. Japan's 1947 Constitution contains two provisions that guarantee freedom of economic activity: (1) article 22 provides freedom to change residence and freedom to choose an occupation; and (2) article 29 provides for the right to property.

At a minimum, the comparative jurisprudence suggests that a South African court should, in light of the second proviso of s 22, require a rational connection between the purpose of the regulatory statute under scrutiny and the objective it seeks to vindicate.[2] The purpose of this proviso — which authorizes regulation to govern trades, occupation and the professions — thereby gives content to the right itself. FC 22 clearly protects choice. However, the space to exercise such choice is constrained by the legitimate need for the state to police any given market for the common good.

(i) German case law

The German courts have generally taken the view that the regulation of a profession as a commercial practice is easier to justify than barriers of entry into the profession itself. David Currie writes:

> A great many limitations of occupational freedom have been upheld by the [German] courts, such as compulsory retirement ages for chimney sweeps and midwives, the sale of headache remedies to pharmacists, the closure of shops on Saturday afternoons, Sundays, holidays and in the evening and the requirement that employers must hire the handicapped, limit the number of notaries and require them to serve welfare applicants without charge.[3]

Despite upholding this series of limitations upon the right, German courts have insisted on strong measure of rationality review. For example, the German Constitutional Court has held that article 12(1) was unjustifiably infringed when licences to practise law were denied or revoked on the because the applicant engaged in employment thought to be menial and therefore inconsistent with the integrity or image of the legal profession.[1]

[1] 1997 (7) BCLR 950, 980B-E (E)

[2] But see SA Post Office Ltd v Van Rensburg & another 1998 (1) SA 796, 805G–806B (E), 1997 (11) BCLR 1608 (E) ('SA Post Office I') (Lang AJ appears to suggest that any form of licensing system will automatically satisfy the requirements of s 22).

[3] David P Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 303.

This last case suggests that the protection of individual choice remains the departure point for analysis. In German Pharmacy, the German Constitutional Court wrote:

> The practice of an occupation may be restricted by reasonable regulation predicated on considerations of the common good. The freedom to choose an occupation, however, may be restricted only in so far as an especially important public interest compellingly requires . . . [and] only to the extent that protection cannot be accomplished by a lesser restriction on freedom of choice.[2]

At issue in German Pharmacy was the decision of the state of Bavaria to pass laws restricting the number of pharmacies that could be licensed in a given community. The state's Apothecary Act provided for the issue of additional licences only if (a) the new pharmacy was commercially viable and (b) the new pharmacy caused no economic harm to nearby competitors. The applicant — a qualified pharmacist from East Germany — had been denied a licence to open a pharmacy.

In applying article 12 of the Basic Law to the state's Apothecary Act, the court stated that a practice or occupation could be restricted by reasonable regulations predicated on considerations of the common good. However, the freedom to choose an occupation could be restricted only for the sake of > a compelling public interest; that is, if after careful deliberation the legislature determines that a common interest must be protected, then it may impose restrictions in order to protect that interest — but only to the extent that the protection cannot be accomplished by a lesser restriction on freedom of choice. In the event that an encroachment on freedom of occupational choice is unavoidable, law-makers must always employ the regulative means least restrictive of the basic right.[3]

Bavaria's Apothecary Act failed the court's compelling public interest test. The court found that the legislature intended to impose a restriction on admission in order to protect practising pharmacists from competition. Indeed, the court held that the Act reflected a set of naked preferences designed, not to safeguard public health, but to advance the pecuniary interests of existing pharmacies and pharmacists. It wrote:

> . . . between the lines of the legislation, we . . . can discern the political aims of a pharmacy profession at work to protect its [narrow] interests and the traditional concept of the "apothecary".[4]

German Pharmacy stands for the proposition that a relatively strict standard of review must be applied where there is regulation of occupational choice. The state

[1] 87 BVerfGE 287 (1992).
[2] 7 BverfGE 377 (1958) as cited in Currie (supra) at 300.
[3] See Donald P Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (1989) 288. (Emphasis added).
[4] Ibid at 290.

may regulate such choice only in so far as it is necessary to ensure proper and adequate training of an individual wishing to embark upon the trade which the legislature purports to control.

This strict standard of review for occupational choice does not preclude state intervention designed to further the common good. In Long-Haul Truck-Licensing,[1] transportation officials refused to grant permits to certain companies because the quota for such permits, fixed by law, had already been filled. The court found that in the light of the nature, complexity and cost of long-haul freight traffic, this restriction was indeed a justifiable and adequate means of preventing a major threat to a compelling public interest. The court stated that:

> The federal railroad is indispensable for the national economy. This is true not only for passenger transportation but for freight traffic as well, whose protection fixed quotas are meant to serve. The modern economy based on the division of labour cannot do without this means of transportation, which moves great volumes of freight quickly and over long distances . . . [S]upplying the population with vital goods could not be guaranteed without the railroad; thus the railroad helps to safeguard the existence of every individual.[2]

Of additional interest is the social democratic cast of the German Basic Law's economic activity jurisprudence. In Numerus Clausus,[3] the German Constitutional Court declared that the right to obtain a professional education is worthless if the state did not provide one. Access to public education is, therefore, not a matter of legislative discretion. Accordingly, the court has applied art 12(1) together with the equality guarantee in terms of art 3(1) and the social state principle to analyse carefully any restriction on access of applicants to public educational facilities.[4] Given the social democratic or transformative character of the South African Constitution, a South African court would be justified in reading s 7(2)[5] together with s 22 and s 29(1)(b)[6] to arrive at a similar conclusion.

(ii) Japanese Case Law

As I noted above, article 22 of the Japanese Constitution has a similar provision to FC s 22: namely that every person shall have the freedom to choose his or her occupation to the extent that it does not interfere with the common good. The 'common good' proviso has been given content similar to that of our own IC s 26(2).

---

[1] 40 BVerfGE 296 (1975).

[2] Long-Haul Truck-Licensing (supra) at 297-8.

[3] 33 BVerfGE 303 (1972).

[4] See D Currie (supra) at 303.

[5] Final Constitution s 7(2), Rights, reads as follows: '(2) The state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.'

[6] Final Constitution s 29(1)(b), Education, reads as follows:

'(1) Everyone has the right —

(b) to further education, which the state, through reasonable measures, must make progressively available and accessible.'

In Gypsy Taxi Cab,[1] an unlicensed taxi operator was charged with a violation of the road transportation law. The law prohibited the use of private automobiles for such commercial activities as transporting passengers for profit. Upon conviction, the cab operator appealed to the Supreme Court on the grounds that the provision unreasonably restricted his freedom of occupation. The court rejected his appeal. The court observed that the objective of the transportation law was to promote the public welfare by ensuring fair competition and the proper and orderly operation of the road transportation system. The court held that leaving the 'paid transportation business' unregulated by promoting the use of non-commercial vehicles would not only lead to the development of unlicensed business but would render 'regulation less effective under the licensing system'. As a result, the law — which granted a vehicle transportation license only upon compliance with certain standards — did not contravene the constitutional guarantee. The law was a manifestly justifiable restriction designed to improve existing state of traffic and road transportation in Japan. It is worth noting that in reaching its decision, the court emphasized that the justification for its decision flowed from the need to regulate a commercial practice. It did not view its decision through the prism of an individual's right to choose a field of employment.

But regulations of commercial practice do not always justify curtailment of individual autonomy. In 1972, the Supreme Court had to determine the constitutionality of the Retail Business Adjustment Special Measures Act. The Act controlled retail markets by requiring that entrants into new markets be licensed. The court identified two categories of occupational restriction. The first category — a negative restriction — maintains public safety and order. The second category — a positive restriction — advances welfare state socio-economic policies. With respect to this second category, positive or affirmative restrictions will be found unconstitutional if (a) they are patently unreasonable and (b) the legislation reflects the naked preferences of its legislators and some cohort of constituents. However, because the Retail Business Adjustment Special Measures Act was an affirmative restriction enacted to protect small or medium-sized enterprises from economic collapse caused by an excess numbers of retail markets, the court held the law to be constitutional.[2]

In 1975, the Supreme Court had another opportunity to examine economic zoning practices. In its review of the zoning provisions of the Pharmaceutical Business Act, the court first held that a negative restriction's purpose (a) had to be necessary and reasonable and (b) could only impose minimum restrictions on occupational activity. In reviewing the necessity and reasonableness of zoning pharmacies, the court found that zoning criteriator a new pharmacy were

[1] Koizumi v Japan 17 Keishu 12 (1963) 2434, translated and reprinted in Hiroshi Itoh & Lawrence W Beer The Constitutional Case Law of Japan. Selected Supreme Court Decisions, 1961—1970 (1963) 80–1.

[2] See Mutsu Nakamura 'Freedom of Economic Activities and the Right to Property' (1990) 53 Law and Contemporary Problems 1–5. While the infringement of occupational choice in the context of regulation of trade could be examined as a limitation problem in terms of FC s 36, it will, as we shall see, must often be treated as a inquiry engaged by the second proviso of s 22 itself.

negative restrictions designed mainly to protect life and health. Employing a strict reasonableness or strong rationality test, the court rejected the state's purely speculative argument that there was a danger of supplying defective medicine caused by a sudden increase of competition and the instability of the pharmaceutical business.[1]

54.3 Section 22 Jurisprudence

At issue in South African Post Office v Van Rensburg and another[2] was the operation of a private business that collected and delivered letters, accounts and documents. The Post Office sought an interdict restraining the respondent from conducting this service because it contravened s 7 of the Post Office Act.[3] Section 7 grants the Post Office the exclusive power to conduct any and all postal services. Relying on FC s 22, the respondent contended that s 7 of the Post Office Act contravened his right to freedom of trade.

Lang AJ noted that while FC s 22 was the 'direct successor' of IC s 26, 's 26 had both a different title and materially different wording'.[4] Lang AJ observed that the Minister, under s 90A of the Post Office Act, could grant another party permission to run a postal service if he deemed it to be in the public interest. Lang AJ held that the respondent's rights under s 22 had not been infringed or denied, but simply regulated by law.[5]

In Van Rensburg v South African Post Office Ltd,[6] a Full Bench had the opportunity to consider the appeal against the decision in South African Post Office I. In writing for the SA Post Office II court, Jones J stated that:

> the content of the right in s 22 of the Constitution is the right to choose a trade, occupation or profession, within the framework of any lawful regulation which controls its practice. The power of government to control the practice of a trade, occupation or profession necessarily involves the power to place such restrictions on the practice of a particular trade, occupation or profession as are considered necessary or desirable.

The test for such restrictions is that they must 'be reasonable'.[7] In dismissing the appeal, the SA Post Office II court held that it was permissible and reasonable for the Post Office Act to give the Post Office an exclusive franchise over the [1] Nakamura (supra) at 6–7.

[2] SA Post Office I (supra).
[3] Act 44 of 1958 ('the Post Office Act').
[4] SA Post Office I (supra) at 805D.
[5] SA Post Office I (supra) at 805G–806B. In arriving at this conclusion Lang AJ considered and then distinguished the decision in Grand Slam Entertainment Centre v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 1996 (2) BCLR 213 (O). In Grand Slam, an unqualified prohibition in terms of s 6 of the Gambling Act was deemed unconstitutional. In the instant case, the Post Office Act did not impose an unqualified prohibition. S A Post Office I (supra) at 806F. It would appear that the wording of the legislation rather than the practical possibility of running an alternative service by gaining permission determined the conclusion reached by the court.
[6] 1998 (10) BCLR 1307 (E) ('SA Post Office II').
[7] SA Post Office II (supra) at 1322E.

postal service in South Africa. The Act did not negate the appellant's right to trade. In reasoning similar to that of Lang AJ in SA Post Office I, the SA Post Office II court found that the appellant's right was 'reasonably' limited to a range of exceptions set out in s 7(1)(c) of the Act.[1] In coming to this conclusion, the SA Post Office II court implicitly gave the word 'trade' a broad extension. That is, it did not restrict the section to a class of employment, but suggested that that all forms of business or employment fall within the protective ambit of s 22.[2]

Dictum in SA Post Office II that any restriction of trade in terms of a regulation must be reasonable raises, but does not answer, the question of the relationship between such a test and that required by the general limitations inquiry under s 36. Even if the regulation is found to be unreasonable under s 22, the party relying on the regulation could still — technically — have an opportunity to justify the law in question in terms of the general test set out in s 36. Under s 36, reasonableness is but one important part of the analysis.[3] The SA Post Office II court also left open, perhaps wrongly, the question of whether s 22 applies only to natural persons and not corporate bodies.[4]

---

[1] These exceptions relate to any letter —

'(a) sent or conveyed to or from any post office;

(b) exceeding the dimensions prescribed for letters;

(c) continuing process of or proceedings or pleadings in any court of justice or affidavits or depositions;

(d) exclusively concerning goods sent and to be delivered therewith; or

(e) sent by any person exclusively concerning his private affairs or the private affairs of the bearer or the receiver.'

[2] Trade' is given a similar meaning in the Income Tax Act 58 of 1962 as amended. Trade means every profession, trade, business, calling, occupation or venture, including the letting of property. This definition captures SA Post Office II's notion that all forms of business or employment fall within the protective ambit of s 22.

[3] On the relationship between internal limitations and the general limitations clause, see Stu Woolman 'Limitations' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz and Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, 5th Revision, 1999) and Henk Botha and Stu Woolman 'Limitations' in Matthew Chaskalson, Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz and Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, 2004). As a general matter, a failure to satisfy the requirements of 'reasonableness' at the rights stage will make it difficult to satisfy the requirements of the general limitations test.

[4] The court most certainly exercised excessive caution. The section must attach only to natural persons. Chapter 2 of the Constitution employs the words 'every person' and 'citizen' to indicate to whom the any given right attaches. Where 'citizen' is used, the right attaches only to natural persons with South African citizenship.

Note, however, that because of the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality, a corporate applicant will not need to show that a law infringes its own constitutional rights to challenge the validity of that law. If a law unconstitutionally violates the s 22 rights of natural persons, it is objectively invalid, and any corporate applicant with an interest in setting aside the law has standing to challenge its constitutional validity. See Ferreira v Levin NO & others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 27–30 and 158–68. See also Matthew, Chaskalson and Cheryl Loots 'Access to the Courts and Justiciability' and Jonathan Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' in Matthew Chaskalson , Janet Kentridge, Jonathan Klaaren, Gilbert Marcus, Derek Spitz and Stu Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, 5th Revision, 1999).

The phrase 'regulated by law' in s 22 represents an important restriction on the ability of the government to limit the practice of a trade, occupation or profession. In Janse van Rensburg NO en 'n ander v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid en 'n ander[1], the Minister invoked provisions of the Harmful Business Practices Act[2] in order to curtail certain practices of the applicant's enterprise.

Van Dijkhorst J found that the Act was designed to protect consumers. As a result, the general and uniform restrictions placed on business did not breach the provisions of s 22.[3] However, Van Dijkhorst J went on to say that any restrictions imposed under the Act had to be set out in the form of a law of general application. In terms of s 8(5)(a) of the Act, the Minister was empowered to take steps to prevent a business from continuing to operate and to attach and seize assets. The Janse van Rensburg court found that because the section empowered the Minister to take ad hoc administrative action to restrict the activities of individuals, such measures did not fall within the category of regulations authorized by s 22.[4]

54.4 Restraint of Trade Clauses

IC s 26 elicited a number of challenges to covenants in restraint of trade. These challenges foundered on the shoals of dicta set out in the pre-constitutional Magna Alloys and Research (SA) (Pty) Ltd v Ellis.[5] In Magna Alloys, the court wrote that a restraint of trade clause within a contract was prima facie valid and that whoever wished to prove the contrary bore the onus of showing that 'the restriction conflicted with the public interest.'[6].

The more restrictive formulation of FC s 22 has not prevented further challenges to the validity of agreements in restraint of trade. In Coetzee v Comitis and Others[7], the court was confronted with rules of the National Soccer League (NSL) that provided that any footballer wishing to play professional football (1) had to register with the NSL; (2) had to obtain a clearance certificate from his club before he could be registered by the NSL as a player of a new club; (3) had to ensure that after conclusion of a contract with a new club, his former club was duly compensated; and (4) had to remain a registered player of the club with which he was last employed for a period of thirty months (only after this period would the club no longer be entitled to compensation). The applicant asked for an

[1] 1999 (2) BCLR 204 (T) ('Janse van Rensburg').
[2] Act 71 of 1988.
[3] Janse Van Rensburg (supra) at 212A.
[4] Ibid at 221D. See also Janse Van Rensburg NO v Minister of Trade and Industry 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) (Constitutional Court confirms order).
[5] 1984 (4) SA 874 (A) ('Magna Alloys').
[6] For examples of such unsuccessful challenges, see Waltons Stationery Co. (Pty) Ltd v Fourie and Another 1994 (4) SA 507 (O), 1994(1) BCLR (50) (O); Kotze en Genis (Edms) Bpk v Potgieter 1995 (3) SA 783 (C), 1995(3) BCLR 349 (C); AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety and Security 1995 (1) SA 783, 793 (C), 1994 (4) BCLR 31 (C); Knox D'Arcy (Ltd) and Another v Swar and Another 1996 (2) SA 651 (W), 1995 (12) BCLR 1702 (W).
[7] 2001(1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C).

order declaring these restraints unconstitutional. Traverso J began by noting that the jurisprudence generated under IC s 26 had 'been uniformly dismissive of a suggestion that the Interim Constitution necessitated a revision of the restraint of trade law.'[1] She went on to add that:

> [c]onsideration of public policy cannot be constant. Our society is an ever-changing one. We have moved from a very dark past into a democracy where the Constitution is the supreme law, and public policy should be considered against the background of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. . . . If we should therefore find that the regulations of NSL are contrary to public policy, it is self evident that the contract which the applicant has with Hellenic, which incorporates the NSL regulations, is contrary to public policy and that, accordingly, the 'restraint of trade' should not be enforced.[2]

According to Traverso J,

> the rules of NSL were akin to treating players as goods and chattels who are at the mercy of the employer once their contract has expired. In my view, these rules violate the most basic values underlying our Constitution.[3]

By arriving at the conclusion that the contractual regime reflected in the governing rules of the NSL constituted a restraint of trade that was both unreasonable and contrary to public policy, the court altered the approach endorsed in Magna Alloys. The court found that the onus now lay with the NSL to satisfy the court that the contractual regime was a reasonable and justifiable limitation on the freedom of trade, occupation and profession.[4]

Liebenberg J adopted a similar approach in Fidelity Guards v Pearmain.[5] After setting out the Magna Alloys test and confirming that restraint clauses could only be enforceable if they were not in conflict with public policy, Liebenberg J went on to say:

> In terms of Magna Alloys . . . the onus in matters of this nature is on the party wishing to show that the restraint should not be enforced. It seems that the position in terms of the Constitution may now be that onus will be on the party wishing to enforce it to show that it complies with the provisions of the Constitution.[6] (italics added).

Unfortunately Liebenberg J stopped just short of determining exactly where the onus lay.

The significance of these judgments is that they invite an investigation into the nature of the restraint of trade agreement within the context of current public policy considerations. Such considerations were unquestionably not present at the time when Rabie CJ adopted the traditional approach in Magna Alloys.[7] In

[1] Ibid at para 30.
[2] Ibid at para 32.
[3] Ibid at para 38.
[4] Magna Alloys (supra) at para 40.
[5] 2001 (2) SA 853 (SE), 1997 (10) BCLR 1443 (SE).
[6] Ibid at 862 G.
[7] The jurisprudence confirmed in Magna Alloys (supra) and the failure to recognize the effect of power relations in restraint of trade clauses was not greeted with unqualified acceptance even at the time of the judgement. See, for example, Brahm Du Plessis and Dennis Davis 'Restraint of Trade and Public Policy' (1984) 101 SALJ 86.

Comitis, the court correctly examined the effect of the restraint of trade and the nature of the power relations between the contracting parties in coming to the conclusion that the contract violated important public policy considerations made manifest in the Constitution.

54.5 The Regulation of Conduct by Professionals and those Engaged in Trade

The second proviso of s 22 — that the practice of a trade occupation of professionals may be regulated by law — acknowledges that > certain occupations call for particular qualifications described by law and one of the constraint of economic spheres that persons who lack such qualifications may not engage in such occupations.[1]

In Law Society of the Transvaal v Machaka and Others (No. 2)[2], the respondents failed to take such constraints seriously and had their names struck from the roll of attorneys. Respondents raised an issue in limine in which they argued that the Constitution deprived the court of the right to strike an attorney from the roll or to suspend him from practice on the basis that such action, inter alia, would deny respondents 'their right to chose their trade, occupation or profession freely'. In dismissing this argument, Kirk-Cohen J wrote:

> The respondents have in fact exercised their rights under s 22. They have freely chosen their occupation, profession and exercised those rights. The point they overlook is that the Constitution, both old and new, does not provide that a person may abuse the right enshrined on the s 22 of the new Constitution. Taken into its logical conclusion, the submission of the first and third respondents would be that attorneys would be entitled to commit any offence, including theft of trust moneys, but not be liable to be struck off the roll or suspended from practice because the new Constitution has impliedly repealed s 22 of the Attorneys' Act and also the Courts inherent power over practitioners who practice within its jurisdiction.[3]

As Machaka makes clear, the right to choose one's trade, occupation or profession freely does not mean that this right creates an unqualified freedom. In Ernst and Young v Beinash and Others,[4] the applicant sought an order in terms of the Vexatious Proceedings Act[5] against the respondents to the effect that no legal proceedings could be instituted by the respondents against any person in any division of the High Court of South Africa or an inferior court without the leave

[1] Solberg (supra) at para 33.
[2] 1998(4) SA 413, 416 (T) ('Machaka')
[3] Ibid at ???
[4] 1999(1) SA 1114 (W) ('Beinash'). See also Beinash v Ernst and Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC).
[5] Act 3 of 1956.

of that court or any judge of the High Court.[1] The respondents sought sanctuary in s 22. Fevrier AJ rejected their prayer. He correctly held that the order itself would not prohibit any person from choosing a trade, occupation or profession. He noted that there were many cases where an adverse court order may create a perception that a person is an unattractive employee or business associate:

> One need merely consider a person who has been convicted for fraud, theft or other crimes. He may thereby become a most unattractive business associate. An insolvent, against whom a final order of sequestration has been made, may also labour under a disadvantage when seeking employment. It would be ludicrous to suggest that the provisions of the law, pursuant to which such orders and findings are made, should be struck down as being unconstitutional.[2]

In short, the respondents' argument was fundamentally flawed because it was not the Vexatious Proceedings Act that violated a person's choice of trade, occupation or profession. Rather, it was the person's conduct itself that gave rise to an order being granted in terms of the Act.[3]

[1] Beinash (supra) at 1146C. The respondents had launched forty five different proceedings against applicants, only one of which had been successful and all of which turned on events relating to the winding up of a company. In opposing the application respondents argued, inter alia, that were such an order to be granted > one must ask oneself whether anyone would ever become a partner of the respondents and run the risk in due course of finding that a valid and enforceable claim against a third party which would have to be taken in the name of a partnership would not succeed unless the respondents first obtain the permission of the Court to be a plaintiff in such proceedings.

Ibid.

[2] Beinash (supra) at 1146G-H.

[3] See, for a similar treatment of the argument that s 22 provides an unqualified right, Poswa v Member of the Executive Council for Economic Affairs, Environment and Tourism, Eastern Cape 2001(3) SA 582, 589-590 (SCA), 2001 (6) BCLR 545 (SCA).

55 Housing

Kirsty McLean

55.1 Introduction 55–1
55.2 Overview of South African housing policy 1994–2000 55–2
(a) Historical background 55–2
(b) Constitutional and legislative framework 55–3
55.3 FC s 26(1) and (2). 55–8
(a) Overview of Grootboom. 55–8
(b) The relationship between FC s 26(1) and (2) 55–9
(c) The reasonableness standard in Grootboom 55–12
55.4 Housing policy 2000–2006 55–14
(a) Grootboom criteria. 55–14
(b) Evaluation of the housing policy in terms of Grootboom criteria 55–15
(i) Reasonable legislation, policies and programmes . . 55–15
(ii) Reasonable implementation. 55–16
(iii) Flexibility 55–19
(iv) Vulnerable groups 55–20
(v) Co-operative government and local government . 55–24
(c) 'Breaking New Ground'. 55–26
(i) Sustainable human settlements 55–27
(ii) Private sector involvement 55–27
(iii) Informal settlements and backyard shacks 55–28
(d) Social housing. 55–29
55.5 International law of housing. 55–31
(a) 'Adequate' housing 55–34
(b) Progressive realization 55–36
(c) Within available resources 55–38
(d) Minimum core 55–39

55.6 FC s 26(3): Evictions 55–42
(a) The impact of FC s 26(3) on the common law of evictions 55–43
(b) Legislative impact on the common law of evictions . . . 55–45
(i) ESTA 55–46
(ii) PIE 55–46
(c) The reach of FC s 26(3) 55–48
(d) International law of evictions 55–49
55.7 Children's right to shelter 55–51
55.8 Prisoners' right to adequate accommodation 55–54

Housing

26. (1) Everyone has the right to have access to adequate housing.

(2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of this right.

(3) No one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances. No legislation may permit arbitrary evictions.[1]

55.1 INTRODUCTION*

In addition to the housing rights provided for in FC s 26, FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) provide, respectively, for the rights of children to 'shelter'[2] and the rights of prisoners to 'adequate accommodation'.[3]

Until recently, most writing on housing law and policy, and FC s 26, has been undertaken either by legal academics or by housing practitioners. The former tend to focus on the jurisprudence of socio-economic rights and the Constitutional Court's seminal decision in Grootboom,[4] while the latter tend to be preoccupied with the practical implementation of State housing policy, unaware of its nuanced legal interpretations. This chapter attempts to marry these two discourses, and in so doing, develop a more multifaceted treatment of housing law generally. For the lawyer, it contexualizes housing rights and litigation within the practical constraints and difficulties of government bureaucracy, financing and planning. For the housing practitioner, it views policy analysis through the lens of FC s 26's right to adequate housing.

Housing law is animated by a complex network of law, policy, social welfare, politics, international law, macro-economic planning, co-operative government and finance. Today, housing is also about much more than simply providing shelter from the elements. It is about creating sustainable, integrated housing settlements, and generating wealth through asset creation. For the very poor or indigent, it is also about social welfare and access to basic services.

From 1 April 1994 until December 2005, the South African government subsidized the construction of 1 916 918 houses[5] and in so doing, at an average of 4.1 people per household, provided housing to approximately 7 859 363 people in South Africa.[6] As Kecia Rust points out:

* I would like to thank Geoff Budlender, Marie Huchzermeyer, Theunis Roux, Kecia Rust, Hendrik van Rensburg, Alison Wilson, Stu Woolman and David Zeffertt for comments on earlier drafts of this chapter. Any errors remain my own.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] See § 55.7 infra.

[3] See § 55.8 infra.

[4] Government of the RSA & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

[5] These figures are the latest available up to December 2005: see http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 11 May 2006). The website also states that, as of December 2005, the government had approved 2 784 675 subsidies and 1 698 788 beneficiaries.

[6] The average of 4.1 persons per household is based on the figure used by the Department of Housing. National Department of Housing Ten Year Review (2003).

> South Africa has tackled issues of housing finance, social housing, and consumer protection. It has institutionalised the concept of 'people's housing', made space for women in the construction industry, and supported the role of emerging builders. It has built a single, non-racial department of housing out of a previously fragmented and inefficient system. And, perhaps most importantly, it has entrenched the right to adequate housing in its constitution. Each of these developments is a significant achievement. Their combination, especially given South Africa's history, is unparalleled.[1]

Despite this glowing commendation, there remain a number of problems with housing policy and delivery in South Africa. This chapter will examine these problems in light of the constitutional right to adequate housing.

The chapter begins with a brief overview of South African housing policy since 1994. It then moves into a discussion of FC s 26(1) and (2) and the standards established by the Grootboom Court that determine the 'reasonableness' of the State's measures to realize progressively access to adequate housing. These standards are used, in the following section, to examine extant housing policy. The chapter then considers international law on housing. International law provides one of many critical perspectives on our courts' current housing jurisprudence. In the final sections of the chapter, eviction law and the protection afforded by FC s 26(3), a child's right to shelter in terms of FC s 28(1)(c), and a prisoner's right to adequate accommodation under FC s 35(2)(e) are assayed. These latter two provisions are not dealt with in detail as they are discussed more thoroughly elsewhere in this volume.[2]

55.2 Overview of South African Housing Policy 1994–2000

(a) Historical background

In order to chart the State's response to Grootboom, it is essential that one first come to grips with State housing policy from 1994 through to 2000.[3] Indeed,

[1] K Rust 'No Shortcuts: South Africa's Progress in Implementing its Housing Policy, 1994–2002' (Unpublished paper prepared for the Institute for Housing of South Africa, 2003, on file with the author) 7. The Department of Housing has also provided secure tenure to approximately 500 000 families living in old public housing stock. See National Department of Housing Breaking New Ground: The Comprehensive Plan for the Creation of Sustainable Settlements (2004)('Breaking New Ground') 4.

[2] For a general overview of the jurisprudence on socio-economic rights, see S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33. For a more detailed discussion of children's rights, see A Friedman & A Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 47. For more on prisoner's rights, see F Snyckers & J Le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51; D van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49. Knowledge of this material is largely assumed in the writing of this chapter and duplication is avoided where possible.

[3] For a good discussion of pre-1994 housing policy, see P Wilkinson 'Housing Policy in South Africa' (1998) 23 Habitat International 215, 216–24.

housing policy, as it is currently conceived, actually antedates the new dispensation. Discussions about a new housing policy began with the establishment of the National Housing Forum in 1992. The findings of this 'multi-party non-governmental negotiating body'[1] were used by the Government of National Unity in formulating South Africa's National Housing Policy. While the Forum's processes have been criticized for not giving effective voice to the homeless and poor,[2] the primary purpose of the Forum was to reach a working consensus between different interest groups on key issues.[3] It did exactly that — but at the cost of plastering over many unresolved contradictions in the aims and wishes of the various interest groups.[4] In October 1994, a National Housing Accord (known as the 'Botshabelo Agreement') was signed by 'a range of stakeholders representing the homeless, government, communities and civil society, the financial sector, emerging contractors, the established construction industry, building material suppliers, employers, developers and the international community'.[5] In December 1994, the government produced the White Paper on Housing[6] and South Africa's first universal housing strategy.[7]

(b) Constitutional and legislative framework

The documents at the heart of contemporary housing policy are the Final Constitution, the Housing White Paper, the Housing Act[8] and the Housing Code. Other influential documents are the Reconstruction and Development Programme (RDP), the Growth, Employment and Redistribution Strategy (GEAR), the Urban and Rural Development Frameworks, and various other white papers and legislation on local government and the public service.[9] In September 2004, the Minister of Housing announced a refined and renovated housing policy:

[1] National Department of Housing National Housing Code (2000) 3UF.

[2] See M Huchzermeyer 'Housing for the Poor? Negotiated Housing Policy in South Africa' (2001) 25 Habitat International 303, 305–11.

[3] See F Khan 'Introduction' in F Khan & P Thring (eds) Housing Policy and Practice in Post-Apartheid South Africa (2003) 1, 12.

[4] See MR Tomlinson 'South Africa's New Housing Policy: An Assessment of the First Two Years, 1994–96' (1998) 22 International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 137, 144. Some of these conflicts and contradictions are responsible for many of the problems experienced in implementing the housing programme to date, many of which are currently being addressed in Breaking New Ground — the Department's new housing policy.

[5] National Housing Code (supra) at 4UF.

[6] National Department of Housing White Paper: A New Housing Policy and Strategy for South Africa (1994).

[7] See S Gutto 'Housing' in The Law of South Africa 11 (First Reissue, 1998) 1, para 11. The Development Facilitation Act was also pivotal in bringing about the new approach to housing development. Act 67 of 1995. The Act aimed to 'facilitate and speed up the implementation of reconstruction and development programmes and projects in relation to land'. Preamble to the Development and Facilitation Act. See Gutto (supra) at paras 12–17.

[8] Act 107 of 1997.

[9] National Housing Code (supra) at 5UF.

'Breaking New Ground': The Comprehensive Plan for the Creation of Sustainable Human Settlements. Breaking New Ground has significant implications for the Housing Act and the Housing Code as both the Act and the Code are being redrafted in light of this new policy document.[1]

The Housing Act is the central piece of national legislation regulating housing policy. At the heart of the Act is the aim to 'provide for the facilitation of a sustainable housing development process'.[2] 'Housing development' is defined as > the establishment and maintenance of habitable, stable and sustainable public and private residential environments to ensure viable households and communities in areas allowing convenient access to economic opportunities, and to health, educational and social amenities in which all citizens and permanent residents of the Republic will, on a progressive basis, have access to —

> (a) permanent residential structures with secure tenure, ensuring internal and external privacy and providing adequate protection against the elements; and
> (b) potable water, adequate sanitary facilities and domestic energy supply.[3]

The Housing Act lays down 'general principles' for housing development. These include prioritizing the needs of the poor (s 2(1)(a)), consulting with affected parties (s 2(1)(b)), and regulating affordable and sustainable housing development (s 2(1)(c)) through the principles of co-operative government set out in FC s 41.[4] The Act describes in detail the powers and duties of the various spheres of government, and the ways in which they should interact and co-operate in order to give effect to FC s 26. It does not, however, contain a detailed account of actual housing policy. For instance, the Housing Act does not specify that housing delivery should be carried out through project-linked subsidies, or that individual ownership should be given precedence over communal ownership or rental options.

Instead, the Housing Act states that the Housing Minister must publish a Housing Code which contains national housing policy (s 4(2)(a)) that binds provincial and local spheres of government (s 4(6)). The content of the Code is [1] Unfortunately, revised drafts of the Housing Act and the National Housing Code were not available at the time of writing this chapter. These amendments will be dealt with in future revisions of this chapter. Breaking New Ground has been considered, where possible, to indicate future development in housing policy. It should be noted, however, that housing policy is currently (mid-2006) in a state of revision and that caution should be used in relying on the information in this chapter as it may soon become outdated. For a discussion of the relationship between Breaking New Ground and other legislation and policy, see §55.4*(b)* infra. Readers are also advised that the national Department of Housing's website is frequently out of date (for example, Breaking New Ground is not available on the website) and that, if accurate information is required, they should contact the Department directly.

[2] 'Long Title' of the Housing Act.

[3] Housing Act s 1.

[4] For a general discussion of the principles of co-operative government, see S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

determined wholly by the Minister. Moreover, the Minister is not obliged to engage in any deliberative or consultative process in determining national housing policy.[1] The only requirement is that the Minister must publish updated lists of housing programmes and national institutions established in terms of the Act, in the Government Gazette 'from time to time' (s 3(6B)). Furthermore, 'new national housing policy applies notwithstanding that such a policy has not yet been included in a revision of the Code' (s 4(5)).

This framework raises two concerns. First, this requirement 'expressly sanctions the inversion of the usual relationship between policy and legislation'.[2] The typical, and desirable, relationship is that policy documents should state the overall objectives of government strategy, while the detailed rules are set out in primary or secondary legislation. The authorization, by the Housing Act, for virtually all rules pertaining to housing to be contained in the Housing Code — whose terms can be altered by ministerial fiat — is undesirable. The current policy revision process is even more convoluted. Breaking New Ground — the State's new housing policy — is at odds with various provisions of the Housing Act and Housing Code. The latter two documents must now be amended so as to be consistent with the new policy.

The second, related concern involves the democratic and constitutional appropriateness of including most, if not all, of the housing development framework in policy rather than legislation. The Final Constitution mandates the State to take 'reasonable legislative and other measures' (emphasis added) to realize the right of everyone to have access to adequate housing. A purposive interpretation of this injunction would mean that the most important principles and policy choices relating to housing delivery should be deliberated upon in Parliament.[3] Of course, it is always open to government departments to include substantial portions of 'policy' in regulations, and pure 'policy documents', but the more important aspects of policy should be contained in legislation. At present, the Housing Code (and now Breaking New Ground) exhaust the universe of important policy concerns and render the Act superfluous in terms of determining how the State gives effect to the right to adequate housing. This situation arguably amounts to the abdication by Parliament of its constitutionally mandated role, and may, in addition, violate the principle of legality and the rule of law.[4]

[1] The Act, however, does specify that the Code may contain 'administrative or procedural guidelines' regarding 'the effective implementation and application of national policy' or 'any other matter that is reasonably incidental to national housing policy' after consulting with the various provincial housing MECs as well as SALGA. Housing Act s 4(2)(b).

[2] T Roux 'Background Report 2: Review of National Legislation Relevant to Informal Settlement Upgrading' (Unpublished paper written for the National Department of Housing, 2004, on file with the author) 1.

[3] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 327.

[4] For a general discussion of the content of the legality principle and the rule of law, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

Low-income housing development in South Africa is financed primarily through the housing subsidy, predominantly a once-off capital grant through which developers have developed housing for allocation to qualifying beneficiaries. For the poorest households, the housing subsidy was originally set at a maximum of R 16 000, which was then increased in 2002 to R 20 300, and in 2006 to R 36 528 per household.[1] In order to qualify for a housing subsidy, the beneficiary must (1) be married or 'constantly living with another person', or, if single, must have 'proven financial dependents'; (2) be a South African citizen or a permanent resident; (3) be competent to contract and of sound mind; (4) have a (combined) monthly household income that does not exceed R 3 500; (5) not already have received a housing subsidy, either personally or through another member of his or her household; and (6) not previously have owned a house (with certain exceptions).[2] Ideally (and according to the original intention of the policy), beneficiaries should also obtain credit to supplement the subsidy. In practice, however, very few beneficiaries have been able to access formal credit: in 1994 only six per cent of beneficiaries obtained credit, and by 2002, this figure had fallen to less than two per cent.[3]

South African housing policy's primary aim is to deliver housing to the 'poor', defined as those earning under R 3 500 per month. In 1994, the poor accounted for 85 per cent of the population. Today, this percentage is substantially lower. The lowering of this percentage, however, is mostly due to inflation rather than a significant improvement in income in real terms.[4] While the Department of Housing is committed to ensuring that the amount of the subsidy keeps pace with inflation, there is no similar commitment to moving the subsidy bands.

[1] Initially, there were different subsidy bands, depending on what the beneficiary household earns per month. Households earning over R 3 500 per month do not qualify for a subsidy. The new housing policy proposes collapsing the subsidy bands and providing a single subsidy for every household earning under R 3 500 per month, and providing financial assistance in obtaining bank loans to those earning between R 3 500 and R 7 000 per month. See Breaking New Ground (supra) at 8–9. A list of the various subsidies and the amounts granted are available on the Department of Housing website: http://www.housing.gov.za. Note that, at the time of writing, the figures on the website were out of date and the figures cited in this chapter were obtained directly from the Department.

[2] This information was obtained from the Department of Housing website, http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 11 January 2006). Immediately noticeable is the restrictive scope of the beneficiary group. By comparison, the text of the Final Constitution extends the right to 'everyone'. For example, persons who are not in a relationship or with dependants are excluded, which would include many young and elderly people. This restrictive provision of housing benefits may be subject to challenge in the future, where, on the basis of the holding in Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others, the State would have to demonstrate that this restriction was reasonable or did not constitute unfair discrimination. 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa').

[3] See Rust (supra) at 10. Access to formal credit, however, is not solely a problem of financial institutions refusing to grant credit. Rather, there is a range of complex reasons for beneficiaries not wanting or not being able to afford formal credit, which arise independently of the subsidies. See I Melzer 'How Low Can You Go?: Charting the Housing Finance Access Frontier: A Review of Recent Demand and Supply Data' (Unpublished paper prepared for the FinMark Trust, 2006, on file with the author) 31–49, available at http://www.finmarktrust.org.za (accessed on 10 May 2006).

[4] See Rust (supra) at 7.

Initially, housing development was carried out primarily by the private sector, with large, for-profit construction companies undertaking substantial government-subsidized projects on 'greenfields land'. This strategy enabled the State to deliver a significant number of houses. Developers used the housing subsidy to purchase land, build bulk infrastructure and develop a core or starter house. Approximately 46.8 per cent of the subsidy was spent on land and infrastructure.[1] Due to the high costs of infrastructure, policymakers envisaged that beneficiaries would incrementally add to a core house that often consisted of little more than a slab of concrete, a roof on beams with one or two walls, a tap and a toilet.

Some notable shifts in policy have, however, occurred over the last few years. First, by the late 1990s, the State emphasized the delivery of better top-structures and completed houses.[2] Second, the State's housing efforts were frustrated by both the failure to create a secondary market in RDP houses and the lack of proper valuation of the houses by the beneficiaries themselves. (A large number of RDP houses were sold for substantially less than the cost incurred in building them.) As a result, in April 2002, the State began to require beneficiaries to contribute either an amount of R 2 479[3] or an equivalent amount of labour or 'sweat equity' to their houses. (Pensioners, the disabled, and those with proven health problems were not required to make this contribution, and, due to poor households' difficulty in making these payments, Breaking New Ground later amended this to exclude those earning less than R 1 500 per month.) This requirement of 'own contribution' from beneficiaries reinforces the National Department of Housing's renewed emphasis on the 'people's housing process' — the notion that the dignity and responsibility that flow from and attach to home ownership must be matched by a commitment on the part of the beneficiaries themselves to the homes they build and the communities to which they belong. A third development is that the notion of secure tenure has been widened to include rental housing, resulting in increased interest in 'social housing' as a solution for providing low-cost rental stock for the poor.[4] Lastly, local government has been granted a broader mandate for housing delivery, including informal settlement upgrading.[5]

[1] The new housing policy, Breaking New Ground, envisages that the funding for the acquisition of well-located land should no longer come out of the housing subsidy, but should be financed through a separate fund. See Breaking New Ground (supra) at 14.

[2] See S Charlton, M Silverman & S Berrisford Taking Stock: Review of the Department of Housing's Programme, Policies and Practice (1994–2003) (Unpublished paper prepared for the Department of Housing, 2003, on file with the author) 67. Minimum norms and standards for houses were also introduced on 1 April 1999.

[3] This sum is calculated as the difference between what it actually costs to build a $30m^2$ top-structure and the housing subsidy. See Department of Housing 'Memorandum: Adjustment of the Quantum of the Housing Subsidy' (2002).

[4] See Rust (supra) at 9.

[5] The significance of this mandate for the realization of housing rights is discussed in COHRE 'Any Room for the Poor? Forced Evictions in Johannesburg, South Africa' (Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions (COHRE), 2005) 98–99, available at http://www.cohre.org/downloads/ffm-johannesburg-lo.pdf (accessed on 13 May 2006). For a discussion of informal settlement upgrading, see § 55.4*(c)*(iii).

55.3 FC s 26(1) AND (2)

A number of cases have engaged the meaning and the reach of FC s 26(1) and (2). One case alone, however, canvasses the vast majority of issues raised by the Final Constitution's commitment to adequate housing: Grootboom.

(a) Overview of Grootboom[1]

Grootboom began with an informal community's occupation of private land. The community named their new settlement 'New Rust' — and it was, all things being equal, an improvement upon the deplorable conditions of their previous settlement. The owner of the land, however, sought and obtained an order for the community's eviction under the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act.[2] The community then sought shelter on a municipal sports field. After requesting assistance, but receiving none, from the relevant local government authorities, the community sued the local municipality in the Cape High Court for an order granting temporary shelter. In so doing, they relied on FC s 26 and FC s 28. Davis J granted an order in terms of FC s 28(1)(c), instructing the State to provide shelter for the children in the community, as well as their parents. The State appealed against this order to the Constitutional Court. After the intervention of an amicus curiae, the original claim based on FC s 26(1) and (2) was also reargued.[3]

The Constitutional Court held that the rights in FC s 26 and FC s 28 did not entitle 'the respondents to claim shelter or housing immediately upon demand'.[4] At the same time, the Court emphasized that socio-economic rights are justiciable and that the right to housing is enforceable.[5] That enforcement, as a general matter, takes the form of direct regulation of State policy. Proper enforcement, according to the Grootboom Court, required the State to have in place a reasonable plan to realize the right to housing over time and within its budgetary constraints, including a plan to provide relief to those in desperate need. The declaratory order of the Grootboom Court reads as follows:

[1] Grootboom's impact on the evolving jurisprudence around interpretation and enforcement of socio-economic rights generally is discussed in considerable detail in Sandra Liebenberg's chapter. They will not be rehearsed here. See S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33. For the application of the Grootboom criteria to other socio-economic rights, see D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 56C; D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 56A; M Swart 'Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56D.

[2] Act 19 of 1998.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at paras 3–16.

[4] Ibid at para 95.

[5] Ibid at para 94.

(a) Section 26(2) of the Constitution requires the State to devise and implement within its available resources a comprehensive and co-ordinated programme progressively to realise the right of access to adequate housing.

(b) The programme must include reasonable measures such as, but not necessarily limited to, those contemplated in the Accelerated Managed Land Settlement Programme, to provide relief for people who have no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who are living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations.

(c) As at the date of the launch of this application, the State housing programme in the area of the Cape Metropolitan Council fell short of compliance with the requirements in para (b), in that it failed to make reasonable provision within its available resources for people in the Cape Metropolitan area with no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who were living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations.

(b) The relationship between FC s 26(1) and (2)[1]

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court was quick to point out that FC s 26(1) and (2) should be seen as one distinct right and that the two subsections 'must be read together'.[2] Having said that, the Grootboom Court found that FC s 26(1) imposed a negative obligation on the State not to interfere with the right to housing[3] and that FC s 26(2) delineated the State's positive duty to realize progressively the right of all South Africans to adequate housing.[4] FC s 26(1) does not provide a right to housing itself, but only a right to have access to adequate housing. Despite this narrow formulation, the wording of FC s 26(2) indicates that the State's obligation is more extensive than the duty merely to provide an enabling environment for everyone to realize the right to housing themselves. For example, a macro-economic strategy like GEAR alone would be insufficient. Indeed, FC s 26(2) points to a duty on the State to provide housing — either itself or through the private sector.

The Constitutional Court first addressed the nature of the relationship between subsections (1) and (2) of FC s 27 (and its cognate, FC s 26) in Soobramoney, where Chalskalson P wrote that:

> What is apparent from these provisions is that the obligations imposed on the State by ss 26 and 27 in regard to access to housing, health care, food, water and social security are dependent upon the resources available for such purposes, and that the corresponding rights themselves are limited by reason of the lack of resources. Given this lack of resources and the significant demands on them that have already been referred to, an unqualified obligation to meet these needs would not presently be capable of being fulfilled.[5]

[1] For further discussion of the relationship between subsections (1) and (2) of FC s 26 and 27, see Liebenberg (supra) at 33-17 — 33-19.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 34.

[3] Ibid at paras 34–37.

[4] Ibid at paras 38–46. It may perhaps have been preferable for the Constitutional Assembly not to have separated FC s 26(1) and FC s 26(2), but to have drafted them as one right. Such a textual choice might have helped to prevent confusion regarding the relationship between FC s 26(2) and FC s 26(3). See, for example, Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 468 (W) at para 7.3.

[5] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') at para 11.

In this passage, the Soobramoney Court presses a conceptual connection between the obligations imposed on the State by FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2) and the 'corresponding right'. While the obligations on the State are clearly circumscribed by available resources, it is not entirely apparent what the Court means when it states that the 'corresponding rights themselves are limited by reason of the lack of resources' (my emphasis). This sentence could be interpreted in three ways. The Soobramoney Court could be saying that the rights in FC s 26(1) and FC s 27(1) are 'limited' by the nature of the State's obligation. That is, while the content of the right (FC s 26(1)) might remain the same, any relief granted against the State will be contingent upon 'available resources' (FC s 26(2)). In other words, a claim against the State at Time 1 may be less likely to succeed than a similar claim against the State at (the later) Time 2 (because more resources are available at Time 2), but the 'right' remains the same. Alternatively, the Soobramoney Court could be saying that the ambit of the right itself must be restrictively interpreted, that is, 'available resources' truncates or delimits the scope of the right. This would mean that the scope of the right would change over time (or possibly between litigants), depending on available resources. Or, third, in Geoff Budlender's words, FC s 26(1) could create a general right, while FC s 26(2) and FC s 26(3) are best regarded as 'manifestations of the general right'.[1]

One consequence of the first and third readings is that FC s 26(2) acts in the manner of an internal limitations clause with regard to FC s 26(1), in the same way that FC s 36 permits a justifiable limitation of a right. Hence, the 'content of the right is not limited to the duties in Section 26(2) or the prohibitions in Section 26(3)'.[2] On the second (Hohfeldian) reading, the content of the right is determined by FC s 26(2) duties, which are, in turn, determined by issues such as available resources.

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court accepted the approach adopted in Soobramoney, stating that the obligation in FC s 26(2) 'does not require the State to do more than its available resources permit'.[3] Again, the Grootboom language is ambiguous and does not clarify the conceptual distinction between the nature of the duty and its relationship to the scope of the right. The same point was raised again in Khosa in relation to FC s 27. In summarizing the Court's previous jurisprudence, Mokgoro J states:

> This Court has dealt with socio-economic rights on four previous occasions. What is clear from these cases is that section 27(1) and section 27(2) cannot be viewed as separate or discrete rights creating entitlements and obligations independently of one another. Section 27(2) exists as an internal limitation on the content of section 27(1) and the ambit of the [1] G Budlender 'Justiciability of the Right to Housing — The South African Experience' in S Leckie (ed) National Perspectives on Housing Rights (2003) 207, 208.

[2] Ibid.
[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 46.

> section 27(1) right can therefore not be determined without reference to the reasonableness of the measures adopted to fulfil the obligation towards those entitled to the right in section 27(1).[1]

Thus, while the content of the FC s 27(1) right is 'determined with reference' to the duty placed on the State in FC s 27(2), the fact that some of the same factors may be used to determine the right and the duty does not mean that the right and the duty map onto each other in a strict one-to-one relationship. Subsequent paragraphs in the judgment indicate that the Court may still accept a conceptual distinction between the right and the duty and that the scope of the right may be more extensive than the duty. The Khosa Court writes:

> [E]ven where the state may be able to justify not paying benefits to everyone who is entitled to those benefits under section 27 on the grounds that to do so would be unaffordable, the criteria upon which they choose to limit the payment of those benefits (in this case citizenship) must be consistent with the Bill of Rights as a whole.[2]

This passage implies that it is possible to have entitlements under FC s 27 (presumably FC s 27(1)) while the State can justify not extending those benefits to everyone on the basis of budgetary limitations (presumably under FC s 27(2)). Thus, even though the same factors are taken into consideration in determining the right and the duty, these determinations remain discrete inquiries. While it is accepted that the text does not clearly or explicitly favour this interpretation, it is argued that the text is at least ambiguous, and that this interpretation is one which could reasonably be adopted from a reading of these passages.

The question that then arises is why anyone would want to make this conceptual distinction. A claimant would only be entitled to make a claim with respect to the duty imposed on the State by FC s 26(2) (or FC s 27(2)). It can be argued that there are three grounds for preferring this interpretation. First, it seems to be more jurisprudentially convincing to have a stable core interpretation of the right which is not contingent on available resources. The justification for any limitation of the core right then takes place in terms of either the internal limitations in FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2) or through the general limitations clause in FC s 36. This approach would allow the courts to align interpretations of the scope of the right with international and comparative norms, rather than make the scope of the right entirely contingent on immediate exigencies. It also forces the State to justify any 'failure' to realize fully the right.[3] In this sense, then, FC s 26 and s 27 are different from other 'internally-modified' rights in the Constitution, such as the right to freedom of expression, where the text of the right in FC s 16 indicates clearly that the scope of FC s 16(1) is curtailed by the internal modifiers found in FC s 16(2).[1] A second reason for preferring this interpretation is that this approach seems to be consistent with the general approach to rights interpretation in the Bill of Rights where, if a right, such as the right to dignity, is limited by other rights, such as another's rights to free speech, it does not follow that the right to dignity is diminished or extinguished. Rather, a claimant may not be entitled to enforce her right to dignity because, on the merits of the case before the court, another right might be deemed to take precedence. Third, and perhaps most fundamentally, this distinction touches on what we think rights are. If we view rights as simply the corresponding correlation of what we can claim as a legal duty or obligation against the State, then there is no practical point in distinguishing between rights and duties. If, however, we adopt a wider socio-political understanding of rights, then rights can be understood as political or ethical claims against the State which stand, even where the State is not able to realize these rights fully.[2] As the discussion in the following section demonstrates, this line of reasoning has important consequences for how the courts conceptualize the 'reasonableness' test currently used to evaluate the State's compliance with its constitutional obligations in socio-economic rights cases.

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 43 (footnotes omitted). The four judgments referred to are: Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment'), Soobramoney (supra), Grootboom (supra), and Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC').

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 45.

[3] See E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where?: Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31.

(c) The reasonableness standard in Grootboom[3]

In Grootboom, the Court established what Cass Sunstein has described as an administrative law model of socio-economic rights. According to this approach, the courts accord a measure of deference to the executive where reasonable choices have been made to give effect to socio-economic rights.[4] In Khosa, the Court expanded the reasonableness enquiry to include consistency with other rights in the Final Constitution and a range of factors usually considered under FC s 36.[5]

This test has, so far, been used to assess all socio-economic rights claims made on the basis of FC ss 26 and 27. The test is clearly more generous than a Wednesbury-style[6] standard, yet it is difficult to pinpoint its exact nature owing to the limited number of judgments handed down by the Court. Soobramoney and TAC are

[1] On the difference between internal limitations and internal modifiers, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] For a more nuanced account of this proposition, see Bilchitz (supra) at 56A-31 — 56A-34.

[3] See Liebenberg (supra) at 33-32 — 33-41 and Bilchitz (supra) at 56A-1 — 56A-13, for a fuller discussion of the reasonableness test in socio-economic rights jurisprudence. It should be noted, however, that when the chapter by Liebenberg was published, Khosa had not been handed down.

[4] See CR Sunstein Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do (2001) 222, 234.

[5] See Khosa (supra) at para 44.

[6] The so-called Wednesbury test for unreasonableness arises from the oft-cited English case of Associated Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223. The Wednesbury Court makes the standard for (un)reasonableness of administrative action that which is so unreasonable that no reasonable person could have made it. This high threshold for unreasonableness (or low threshold for reasonableness) marks a willingness on the part of the Court to defer to the executive with respect to the legality of its actions.

the least difficult judgments to explain, as the State action was clearly reasonable in the case of Soobramoney and clearly unreasonable in the case of TAC, on any standard of reasonableness which the Court could have devised. In Grootboom, the Court expanded the reasonableness test set out in Soobramoney to include the substantive requirement that the State's housing policy should provide relief for those in desperate need. In Khosa, the Court found that the enquiry into reasonableness should embrace consideration of other rights in the Bill of Rights. What is clear is that the extant reasonableness test allows the Court considerable freedom when assessing the constitutionality of State action.

Unfortunately, this flexible reasonableness test threatens the conceptual distinction which has been argued for between FC s 26(1) and FC s 27(1), on the one hand, and FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2), on the other. By focusing solely on the reasonableness of State action, the Court has systematically failed to give substantive content to the rights to 'adequate housing', 'health care services' 'sufficient food and water' and 'social security'. The test is also sufficiently wide to allow the Court to engage in an analysis of subsection (1) on the grounds of reasonableness and to achieve (arguably — in the light of Khosa) any result it thinks just. In addition to the reasons given in the previous section for maintaining a conceptual distinction between the two subsections, there are three further reasons for maintaining the distinction for the reasonableness test, rather than collapsing the two subsections into a singe reasonableness inquiry. First, it is difficult for a court to determine the reasonableness of State action intended to realize a right without having some point of reference regarding what the State is obliged to achieve. One would think that such a reference point would require that the Court first carve out some normative conception of the right. In Grootboom, however, the Court accepted the State's version of what adequate housing entails and then went on to assess the reasonableness of the State's measures in securing adequate housing in light of these objectives.[1] While the State's current understanding of adequate housing may make such deference — with respect to both means and ends — acceptable, one can easily imagine the difficulties that might present themselves were the State to set its sights considerably lower. (One could argue, for instance, that with respect to social security, such a low threshold already exists.[2]) While a clearly defined ambit for the right to adequate housing will not determine the reasonableness of State action, it will provide a meaningful framework for undertaking the reasonableness enquiry. Second, without the clear articulation of the objective or the purpose of a socio-economic right, it is extremely difficult for the State to make an internal assessment as to whether its action

[1] The requirements set out in Grootboom to assess the adequacy of State policy are discussed below in the chapter's analysis of current housing policy.

[2] For more on the State's current understanding of its obligation to realize progressively the right to social security, see M Swart 'Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56D.

(or inaction) would pass constitutional muster. Third, the failure to articulate clearly the objective or the purpose of a socio-economic right also leaves the courts with far too much discretion. Moreover, the absence of clear guidelines for judicial review of socio-economic rights complicates immeasurably the process by which lower courts assess constitutional challenges brought in terms of FC s 26. For all of these reasons, therefore, it would be preferable for the courts to distinguish conceptually between the nature of the right and the extent of the duty, as well as engage in some discussion of the substantive content of socio-economic rights.

55.4 Housing Policy 2000–2006

Since 2000, and the decision in Grootboom, several shifts have occurred in housing policy. First, 'sustainability' has emerged as a key concept both internationally and within the national Department of Housing.[1] Second, as the Medium Density Housing Programme reflects, Grootboom has been the catalyst for two significant policy developments: the recognition that the State must cater for 'all' housing needs (which resulted in the addition of Chapter 12 of the Housing Code 'Housing Assistance in Emergency Housing Circumstances' and Chapter 13 of the Housing Code 'Upgrading of Informal Settlements'); and the State's commitment to use both market-driven and non-market-driven mechanisms to diversify housing delivery.[2]

(a) Grootboom criteria

Grootboom sets out the criteria by which the discharge of the duties imposed by FC s 26(1) and FC s 26(2) on the State will be determined. In particular, the State is obliged to adopt a coherent, coordinated programme which must be capable of bringing about the realization of the right.[3] While the State is given a measure of discretion in determining the details of the policy, the policy itself must be reasonable. In deciding this question, the Constitutional Court laid down a number of criteria which the policy must meet, namely: it must be adopted through both legislative and policy means; it must be reasonably implemented; it must be flexible and balanced; it must not exclude a significant segment of society; and finally, there must be a clear and efficient assignment of functions to the three spheres of government.

[1] See S Charlton, M Silverman & S Berrisford Taking Stock: Review of the Department of Housing's Programme, Policies and Practice (1994–2003)(Unpublished paper prepared for the Department of Housing, 2003, on file with the author) 31.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See Grootboom (supra) at para 41.

(b) Evaluation of the housing policy in terms of Grootboom criteria

(i) Reasonable legislation, policies and programmes

FC s 26(2) obliges the State to take reasonable legislative and other measures to ensure the realization of the right of access to adequate housing. The Constitutional Court has affirmed that this obligation requires both legislative measures and the adoption of 'well-directed policies and programmes implemented by the executive' to support that legislation.[1] In order to determine whether housing legislation and policies are reasonable, regard must be had to the social, economic and historical context of housing in South Africa, as well as the capacity of the various institutions responsible for implementing housing programmes.[2] In addition, reasonableness must be assessed within the context of the Bill of Rights and, in particular, in light of the values of dignity, freedom and equality.[3]

On the whole, extant housing legislation and policy represents a well-considered and balanced response to achieving the right of access to adequate housing. That is not to say that there are not problems and gaps in housing policy, but these problems have largely been recognized and the National Department of Housing is attempting to address these concerns in its current legislative and policy-review process.

It is important to note that where the State has taken measures to realize the right to adequate housing, the courts have been generally supportive of these steps, even where such measures potentially undermine other rights in the Bill of Rights, notably the right to property.[4] In Minister of Public Works v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association, for example, the State decided to establish emergency temporary housing on State-owned land to assist flood victims until permanent housing could be provided.[5] The neighbouring residents (who were not consulted) challenged this decision on the grounds that it violated their rights to just administrative action. The State (together with one of the flood victims) contended that the State had a constitutional obligation to take reasonable measures to realize the right of everyone to adequate housing. The Constitutional Court, in deciding that the applicant's rights to just administrative action had not been violated, adopted a sympathetic stance to the State's steps to provide for the housing needs of those affected. In deciding that the applicants did not have a right that had been adversely affected (a precondition for a claim of unjust administrative action), the Kyalami Ridge Court rejected arguments based on possible loss of property value or a perceived negative effect on the character of the neighbourhood.[6]

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 42.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 44.
[4] See the general discussion of the State's housing policy, where the Constitutional Court is largely supportive of the State's measures. Ibid at paras 47–56.
[5] See Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC).
[6] Ibid at para 99.

(ii) Reasonable implementation

In addition to adopting reasonable legislative and policy measures, housing legislation and policy must be reasonably implemented.[1] There are four major criticisms of the reasonableness of housing delivery or housing policy implementation: first, the poor location of housing development; second, the poor quality of many of the houses built; third, the lack of effective assistance in maintaining housing stock; and fourth, the failure of housing delivery to address the housing backlog.

First, most new housing developments are located far from the main economic centres. They also often fail to provide adequate 'settlements' and access to other social services, such as schools, clinics and work opportunities, thereby creating 'mono-functional settlements'.[2] In addition, the developments generally lack vegetation, public spaces and other amenities required for a healthy environment.[3] The primary reasons for this are the high cost of well-located land, the cost of developing leftover land (which has not been developed previously because it was found to be unsuitable), and finally, resistance from existing communities who fear the social and economic consequences of living adjacent to a low-cost housing development. The Department of Housing has identified an additional reason for the unsatisfactory location of developments as being the 'poor alignment of budgets and priorities between line function departments and municipalities responsible for providing social facilities in new communities'.[4] The cruel irony of locating housing developments in such far-flung areas is that it reinforces and perpetuates apartheid planning.[5] This risk was anticipated in the Housing Code itself:

> The complexity of our housing crisis requires much more than a straightforward approach to building houses. Our crisis is not just about an enormous backlog, but also about a dysfunctional market, torn communities and a strained social fabric, spatial as well as social segregation, and a host of other problems. Our response to this crisis must be innovative and diverse. If we respond only to the numbers that must be built, we risk replicating the distorted apartheid geography of the past.[6]

The lack of affordable public transport exacerbates this problem, as beneficiaries who have employment often have to rent housing, or set up temporary shacks, close to places of work, leaving other members of their households at home. Poor location of housing may thus have the perverse effect of increasing the housing backlog.

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 42.

[2] L Royston 'On the Outskirts: Access to Well-Located Land and Integration in Post-Apartheid Human Settlement Development' in F Khan & P Thring (eds) Housing Policy and Practice in Post-Apartheid South Africa (2003) 234, 234.

[3] See W Smit Expanding Socio-Economic Rights and Access to Housing (Unpublished paper prepared for the Department of Housing by Urban Sector Network, 2003, on file with the author) 25–26.

[4] National Department of Housing Breaking New Ground: The Comprehensive Plan for the Creation of Sustainable Settlements (2004)('Breaking New Ground') 4.

[5] See M Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing and Commodified Urban Segregation in South Africa' in C Haferburg & J Oβenbrügge (eds) Ambiguous Restructurings of Post-Apartheid Cape Town: The Spatial Form of Socio-Political Change (2003) 115 (Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing').

[6] National Department of Housing National Housing Code (2000) part 1, 15.

The State plans to respond to this problem by seeking to find better-located land and to create integrated settlements.[1] Another key response is the emphasis on the creation of more rental housing stock, primarily through social housing schemes. The new housing policy, Breaking New Ground, also envisages the application of a 'multi-purpose cluster concept' to provide 'primary municipal facilitates such as parks, playgrounds, sport fields, crèches, community halls, taxi ranks, satellite police stations, municipal clinics and informal trading facilities'.[2] All of these responses, if implemented effectively, will help to create sustainable, integrated settlements.[3]

The second major criticism of housing development to date has been the poor quality of the housing produced. Many low-cost houses fail to cope with even normal weather conditions and a number have developed serious cracking.[4] The People's Housing Process envisages the improvement of the quality of housing stock through beneficiary participation.[5] A second way in which the State has sought to improve the quality of top structures is by extending the warranty provided by the National Home Builders Registration Council (NHBRC) to subsidized housing.[6]

Third, the policy can be criticized for its lack of long-term sustainability in the provision of low-cost housing. The receipt of subsidized housing has not always resulted in poverty alleviation. In some instances, it has resulted in deepening poverty and debt, as beneficiaries have to pay for municipal services and increased transport costs.[7] As Alan Gilbert puts it:

> The government's success in providing housing for the very poor has produced ghettos of unemployment and poverty. Many of the new owners cannot afford to maintain the accommodation or pay the charges for their water and electricity. . . . [As a result] many households have decided to move out. . . . Views differ as to the cause of this movement. While some criticise the new owners for trading in the subsidy for quick cash, others believe that the cause lies in the fact that the beneficiaries cannot actually afford to live in the new

[1] See § 55.4*(b)* infra, on Breaking New Ground policy. For a discussion of local government attempts to provide low-cost housing in well-located areas, see A Todes, C Pillay & A Kronje 'Urban Restructuring and Land Availability' in Khan & Thring (supra) at 256; S Charlton 'The Integrated Delivery of Housing: A Local Government Perspective from Durban' in P Harrison, M Huchzermeyer & M Mayekiso (eds) Confronting Fragmentation: Housing and Urban Development in a Democratising Society (2003) 263.

[2] Breaking New Ground (supra) at 15.

[3] See A Todes 'Housing, Integrated Urban Development and the Compact City Debate' in Harrison, Huchzermeyer & Mayekiso (supra) 109. (Critical discussion of urban compaction in South Africa.)

[4] See Charlton, Silverman & Berrisford (supra) at 47.

[5] See K Rust 'No Shortcuts: South Africa's Progress in Implementing its Housing Policy, 1994–2002' (Unpublished paper prepared for the Institute for Housing of South Africa, 2003, on file with the author) 10. See also People's Housing Process at § 55.2*(b)* supra.

[6] Despite this development coming into effect in April 2002, there are still substantial problems with the implementation of this policy.

[7] See R Behrens & P Wilkinson 'Housing and Urban Passenger Transport Policy and Planning in South African Cities: A Problematic Relationship?' in Harrison, Huchzermeyer & Mayekiso (supra) 154, 161 (The authors cite, as an example of the inefficiency of the current system, the fact that, in 1999, the annual bus subsidy for one commuter in Cape Town was the equivalent of one-fifth of the full housing subsidy.)

> housing. Unlike many shack areas, all of the new housing is fully serviced and inhabitants are expected to pay for the services. Given the extraordinary high rates of unemployment in South African cities, many families simply cannot afford the sums involved.[1]

While some (particularly the wealthier) municipalities have introduced indigent policies and free basic services, in the absence of real economic opportunities and job creation, it is simply unrealistic to expect beneficiaries to be able to afford to pay for services, over and above the free basic services offered (if any). It is also unclear, where government does provide subsidized transport and free basic services, whether this is sustainable in the long term, where one of the main contributors to this economic stress is the poor location of housing. Clearly, more consideration ought to be given to the long-term viability of service and housing provision, and more resources should be made available for the provision of free basic services.

Perhaps the most pervasive criticism of housing policy is that it has failed to deal adequately with the housing backlog. Despite the tremendous scale at which housing has been delivered in South Africa, the housing backlog has actually increased. An average of 200 000 more new housing units are required annually.[2] In 2005, the backlog was 1.8 million housing units. The number of people living in shacks in informal settlements and backyard shacks in formal settlements has grown from 1.45 million in 1996 to 1.84 million in 2001.[3] These figures are attributable to high levels of unemployment, an annual population growth of 2.1 per cent, decreasing average size of households from 4.5 people in 1996 to 3.8 in 2001, and rapid urbanization.[4] The increase in the housing backlog may be the aspect of housing policy implementation that is most susceptible to constitutional challenge. The success of such a challenge would turn, in part, on the status of those bringing the application — that is, how long they had been on the housing waiting list — and the State's response in setting out reasonable timeframes for the provision of housing to the applicants.[5]

[1] A Gilbert 'Helping the Poor through Housing Subsidies: Lessons from Chile, Colombia and South Africa' (2004) 28 Habitat International 13, 31–32.

[2] Ibid at 24.

[3] See § 55.4*(c)*(iii) infra, on the Informal Settlement Upgrading Programme.

[4] See Breaking New Ground (supra) at 3–4.

[5] In practice, it appears that many municipalities and provincial governments are moving away from the waiting-list system and delivering housing on a project-by-project basis to specific identified communities. See S Charlton 'An Overview of the Housing Policy and Debates, Particularly in Relation to Women (or Vulnerable Groupings)' (Unpublished report for the Gender Programme of the Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation, 2004, on file with the author) 23, available at http://www.wits.ac.za/csvr/papers/papcharl.htm (accessed on 14 May 2006) (Charlton 'Vulnerable Groupings'). Those who have been on the 'waiting list' for a substantial period of time and who are not set to benefit from any planned projects may have grounds to argue that they have a 'legitimate expectation' of housing within a reasonable period which has not and will not be met. Recently, however, it appears that the government is making renewed efforts to revive the waiting list. See Department of Housing 'Government Starts With the Updating and Verification Processes of the National Housing Waiting List in the City of Cape Town' (7 December 2005), available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 13 May 2006). The Department's website now also allows for a verification process so that potential beneficiaries can check whether they are on the list.

(iii) Flexibility

The third criterion laid down in Grootboom is that the housing 'programme must be balanced and flexible, and make appropriate provision for attention to housing crises and to short, medium and long term needs'.[1] There are two major flaws in the housing policy in this regard.

The first flaw relates to the restricted choice of tenure options and housing types available to beneficiaries. For many beneficiaries of subsidized housing, one of the most significant benefits is secure tenure.[2] Prior to Breaking New Ground, however, housing policy narrowly understood tenure security as individual ownership of freestanding homes. Many commentators have questioned the wisdom of having a housing policy driven solely by individual ownership — especially given such problems as poor location, population mobility and an inability to provide a sufficient quantity of houses.[3] Recent developments in policy have indicated a move away from this narrow conception of 'secure tenure' to one that embraces the creation of rental properties. This development is largely a response to the great demand for inner-city rental accommodation.[4] As Wilkinson notes, the standard conception of a single house with a yard has > dominated public and private residential development throughout South Africa for most of the twentieth century and ... in the context of current patterns of urban growth, almost inevitably confines low income housing projects to the peripheries of urban centres.[5]

Perceptions and expectations of adequate housing should be re-examined to ensure that sustainable housing solutions are not hindered by predefined notions of what people want or need with regard to housing types or tenure options. A related criticism concerns the inflexibility of housing options which arise from the supply-based, project-driven approach: although an individual, demand-side subsidy mechanism does exist as one of the subsidy options in the Housing Code, in reality, potential beneficiaries cannot access individual subsidies to build or buy a house of their own. Beneficiaries are therefore restricted, as a matter of practice, to the housing available in a developer-built project. This restriction is another instance of unreasonable implementation. For although the policy is in place to provide individual subsidies, which could potentially play a major role in delivering housing more quickly, existing institutional mechanisms are simply not accessible for this purpose.

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 43.

[2] See P Wilkinson 'Housing Policy in South Africa' (1998) 23 Habitat International 215, 224.

[3] See M Huchzermeyer 'Consent and Contradiction: Scholarly Responses to the Capital Subsidy Model for Informal Settlement Intervention in South Africa' (2001) 12 Urban Forum 71, 81–93; A Gilbert 'Some Observations on What Might be Done about Rental Housing in South Africa' in Khan & Thring (supra) at 367–377; Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing' (supra) at 26–28.

[4] This development is discussed in greater detail at § 55.4*(d)* infra.

[5] Wilkinson (supra) at 224.

The second major criticism relating to the lack of flexibility in housing policy is that the current housing subsidy is too rigid in the provision of assistance through fixed subsidy bands. The housing subsidy is targeted at those who earn below R3 500 per household per month. This cut-off mark has not increased with inflation, with the result that the population group which stands to benefit from State assistance is shrinking. Many have pointed out that this ceiling may be too low, and that the policy should be extended to those earning up to R 7 000 per month.[1] This rigidity in the benchmark for subsidies has had the effect of placing many of those households earning between R 3 501 and R 7 000 in a worse-off position with respect to housing than their poorer counterparts.[2] In this regard, commercial banks have a significant role to play in providing access to loans to this target group to enable them to access their own housing.[3]

(iv) Vulnerable groups

Grootboom stipulates that a reasonable policy cannot exclude 'a significant segment of society'[4] and that

> [t]o be reasonable, measures cannot leave out of account the degree and extent of the denial of the right they endeavour to realise. Those whose needs are the most urgent and whose ability to enjoy all rights therefore is most in peril, must not be ignored by the measures aimed at achieving realisation of the right.[5]

In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court found that the National Housing Policy was unconstitutional to the extent that it did not establish policy measures 'to provide relief for people who have no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who are living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations'.[6] Although the judgment was handed down in 2000, the national Department of Housing only amended the Housing Code to introduce a chapter dealing with the provision of [1] In 2005, the Minister of Housing announced the introduction of a State-funded subsidy for households who managed to obtain finance from a commercial lender to buy a house, and whose combined monthly income is between R 3 500 and R 7 500. This initiative has yet to be implemented, but has the potential to assist significantly this income group's access to housing. See I Melzer 'How Low Can You Go?: Charting the Housing Finance Access Frontier: A Review of Recent Demand and Supply Data' (Unpublished paper prepared for the FinMark Trust, 2006, on file with the author) 26, available at http://www.finmarktrust.org.za (accessed on 10 May 2006). See also 'Statement by LN Sisulu, Minister of Housing, on the South African Programme of Implementation on the Resolution of the WSSD and the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation as it Relates to Human Settlements: A Ground Breaking Plan to Build Sustainable Communities' (7 September 2004, Johannesburg) available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 13 May 2006).

[2] See Rust (supra) at 19.

[3] See § 55.4*(c)*(ii) infra, for discussion on private sector involvement in housing and the Financial Sector Charter.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 43.

[5] Ibid at para 44.

[6] Ibid at para 99.

housing in emergency situations in 2004.[1] The aim of the programme is to 'provide temporary assistance in the form of secure access to land and/or basic municipal engineering services and/or shelter in a wide range of emergency situations of exceptional housing need'.[2] 'Exceptional housing need' is defined broadly and includes all those who find themselves in need of emergency housing and are living in dangerous conditions.[3] The programme, however, fails to provide adequate short-term relief for those in crisis situations, and relies on a cumbersome set of procedures which do not allow for the immediate accommodation of those in need.[4]

A further difficulty with the emergency housing policy is the failure of many municipalities to put the policy into practice.[5] City of Cape Town v Rudolph serves to demonstrate this systemic weakness.[6] The facts of Rudolph are similar to Grootboom. Both involved an attempt to evict a group of illegal occupiers from State-owned land by the Cape Town municipality.[7] Both groups were living with 'no access to land, no roof over their heads … in intolerable conditions' or crisis situations.[8] Rudolph, however, was decided almost three years after Grootboom and Selikowitz J took great care to apply the holding of the Grootboom Court to the facts of Rudolph. The Rudolph Court found that 'despite the clear statement by the Constitutional Court, applicant has still not implemented the AMLSP [Accelerated Managed Land Settlement Programme] or any equivalent programme' and [1] See National Housing Code (supra) at Part 3: National Housing Programmes: Chapter 12 Housing Assistance in Emergency Housing Situations, available at http://www.housing.gov.za/Content/legislation_policies/Emergency%20%20Housing%20Policy.pdf (accessed on 25 January 2006).

[2] Ibid at 12.2.1. This programme is not restricted to those who would benefit from the usual housing subsidy scheme, and is applicable to anyone 'not in a position to address their housing emergency from their own resources or from other sources such as the proceeds of superstructure insurance policies.' Ibid at 12.3.2.

[3] Ibid at 12.2.2.

[4] In order to apply for relief in terms of this programme, a municipality must investigate and make an application to the relevant provincial housing department, which then collaborates with the municipality in submitting an application to the Emergency Housing Steering Committee in the national Department of Housing. If the Emergency Housing Steering Committee approves the application, it transfers funds to the relevant provincial housing department, which then assists the municipality in implementing the programme. No time frames are established for this process, apart from the 21-day deadline which the Emergency Housing Steering Committee must take to assess the application. Ibid at 12.4. For a discussion of this aspect of the policy, see City of Cape Town v Rudolph & Others (Unreported decision of the Cape High Court, 5 December 2005)('Rudolph II') 5.

[5] See The City of Johannesburg v Rand Properties (Pty) Ltd & Others (Unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division, 3 March 2006) at paras 47, 53 (Discussion of the City of Johannesburg's failure to put in place an emergency housing programme.)

[6] City of Cape Town v Rudolph & Others 2004 (5) SA 39 (C), 2003 (11) BCLR 1236 (C), [2003] 3 All SA 517 (C)('Rudolph I').

[7] In Rudolph I, the primary application was for eviction under the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 by the Cape Town Metropolitan Municipality. The respondents brought a counter-application for an order by the Court that the applicants were in breach of their constitutional and statutory duties. Rudolph I (supra) at 547.

[8] Grootboom (supra) at para 52; Rudolph I (supra) at 552.

that 'applicant has displayed and continues to display, an unacceptable disregard for the order of the Constitutional Court — and therefore the Constitution itself.'[1] It is, however, the order in Rudolph that is most striking:

> The circumstances and, in particular, the attitude of denial expressed by applicant in failing to recognise the plight of respondents as also its failure to have heeded the order in Grootboom … makes this an appropriate situation in which an order, which is sometimes referred to as a structural interdict, is 'necessary', 'appropriate' and 'just and equitable'.[2]

The Rudolph Court then handed down a far-reaching order requiring the City of Cape Town to deliver a report within four months which outlined the 'steps it has taken to comply with its constitutional and statutory obligations'.[3] After this, the respondents were to be afforded an opportunity to respond and the applicants, a further opportunity to reply. A second judgment was recently handed down by Selikowitz J in this matter. The second judgment reveals that the City of Cape Town has generated four reports since the original 2003 judgment and that 'on each occasion when it has reported, the City has shifted its ground in respect of its policy and its implementation of the orders.'[4] Initial reports continued to deny the existence of an obligation on the part of the State to cater specifically and adequately for the applicants. Only the fourth report acknowledged that the city was obliged to take clear steps to house the applicants and that it had fulfilled part of its obligations by providing basic municipal services in a nearby emergency housing project. The City of Cape Town had not, however, adopted a temporary housing programme and it tendered no evidence that it had implemented or had planned to implement this policy. As a result, Selikowitz J issued a declaration that the City of Cape Town had failed to comply with his earlier order, but declined to issue a further structural interdict because the applicants had finally acknowledged their constitutional obligations.

Grootboom focuses largely on the recognition of the poor as a 'vulnerable group'.[5] The general class of persons who might qualify as poor is, however, made up of any number of different sub-classes of persons. Each of these sub-classes — for example, those with physical disabilities, those with HIV/AIDS, and those incarcerated by the State,[6] women, and children[7] — have distinct needs. The current policy does cater for the needs of these vulnerable groups to some extent: those with physical disabilities are provided with physical modifications to their contractor-built house;[8] and those persons with physical disabilities or those persons with 'health stricken problems' (which would

[1] Rudolph I (supra) at 553, 554.
[2] Ibid at 558.
[3] Ibid at 560.
[4] Rudolph II (supra) at 2.
[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 36.
[6] See § 55.8 infra, for a discussion of prisoners' housing rights.
[7] See § 55.7 infra, for a discussion of children's housing rights.
[8] Disability subsidies appear, however, to be infrequently provided. As of June 2003, only 160 disability grants had been approved. See Charlton 'Vulnerable Groupings' (supra) at 16.

presumably include those in the late stages of HIV/AIDS) — and are therefore not able to contribute physically to the building of their own homes — and who earn less than R 1 500 per month, are not required to make a financial contribution to the housing subsidy and receive the full subsidy of R 36 528.

Difficulties remain, however, with the linking of subsidies to nuclear households. This link between subsidy and family structure may not be sufficiently flexible to deal with fluid household formation[1] or to counter systemic gender power imbalances within households. It may compel many women to remain in relationships that they would otherwise leave, say, for reasons of domestic violence. Such compulsion could occur even where the title deed is registered in the name of both parties. While South African housing policy is not expressly discriminatory, studies have shown that some women find it considerably more difficult to access housing or to secure tenure.[2] Moreover, older women and men, who do not have dependants, are not eligible for a housing subsidy. The same is true for those under 21 with children. This criterion deleteriously affects young women because women under 21 account for more than half of pregnant women in South Africa.[3] The United Nations Committee for Economic Social and Cultural Rights has made it clear that the right to housing ought not to be framed solely as a 'family' or household right, and a strong argument could be made that FC s 26 read with FC s 9 requires that the State make provision for the rights of individuals to adequate housing, rather than conferring the benefit on households.[4]

Many social practices also ensure that women are marginalized with respect to housing rights. Customary succession laws, for instance, may result in women loosing their ownership or tenure rights when their male partner dies. Several courts have shown a willingness to interpret legislation so that it will not result in women losing their homes as a consequence of customary law succession rules. In Nzimande v Nzimande, for instance, the Court found that the Director-General of Housing had the discretion to consider the discriminatory effects of the succession rules in the Black Administration Act.[5] In so doing, it overturned a pre-constitutional certificate giving housing rights to the appellant (the brother of the deceased) and granted them to the respondent (the former customary-wife of the deceased).[6] In coming to this conclusion, the Court construed this Act and the Conversion of Certain Rights into Leasehold or Ownership Act 81 of 1988 in

[1] See Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing' (supra) at 127.

[2] See Minister of Housing, Minister Mabandla 'Promoting Access for Women in Housing' (8 August 2003), available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 13 May 2006).

[3] See C Marx 'Supporting Informal Settlements' in F Khan & P Thring (eds) Housing Policy and Practice in Post-Apartheid South Africa (2003) 299, 306–07.

[4] See MCR Craven The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Perspective on Its Development (1995) 334.

[5] Act 38 of 1927.

[6] See Nzimande v Nzimande & Another 2005 (1) SA 83 (W), [2005] 1 All SA 608 (T)('Nzimande').

light of the 'spirit, purport and objects' of the Bill of Rights (FC s 39(2)) and the right to access to adequate housing in FC s 26(1).[1]

While some steps clearly have been taken by the Department of Housing to cater for vulnerable groups,[2] more needs to be done to ensure that there is sufficient flexibility and commitment within housing policy to ensure that the needs of vulnerable groups are met.[3] The courts are particularly well placed to evaluate and to assist the State in developing a rights-based approach to housing policy that adequately caters for the most vulnerable members of society.[4]

(v) Co-operative government and local government[5]

The final criterion laid down in Grootboom for ensuring a reasonable housing policy is a clear and an efficient assignment of functions to the three spheres of government:

> What constitutes reasonable legislative and other measures must be determined in the light of the fact that the Constitution creates different spheres of government: national government, provincial government and local government. . . . The Constitution allocates powers and functions amongst these different spheres emphasising their obligation to co-operate with one another in carrying out their constitutional tasks. In the case of housing, it is a function shared by both national and provincial government. Local governments have an important obligation to ensure that services are provided in a sustainable manner to the communities they govern. A reasonable programme therefore must clearly allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensure that the appropriate financial and human resources are available.[6]

[1] See Nzimande (supra) at paras 43, 63.

[2] See, for example, the following reports: Charlton 'Vulnerable Groupings' (supra); National Department of Housing 'HIV/AIDS: Framework Document' (2003); CSIR 'Integrating Gender in Housing and Human Settlements' (Unpublished report for the National Department of Housing, 2003, on file with the author). A section-21 company has also been established to promote women in the construction industry. See http://www.womenforhousing.org.za (accessed on 13 May 2006).

[3] See Housing Indaba: Social Contract for Rapid Housing Delivery (2005) 2.5.d. This document only discusses the needs of vulnerable groups as an aspect of the commitment of civil society organizations to meet housing needs, and makes no mention of the State's role. The Department of Housing appears to have assumed that the responsibility for providing for vulnerable groups is the responsibility of other departments, in particular, the Department of Social Development. A rights-based approach to this issue, however, would indicate that, while it is highly desirable for departments to co-operate with each other where the needs of vulnerable groups are not being met, it is the responsibility of each department to ensure that vulnerable groups are catered for as far as possible.

[4] See M Wesson 'Grootboom and Beyond: Reassessing the Socio-Economic Jurisprudence of the South African Constitutional Court' (2004) 20 SAJHR 284.

[5] For a fuller, although now somewhat dated, account of co-operative government and housing provision, see K McLean 'Housing Provision through Co-operative Government in Post-Apartheid South Africa' in G Mhone & O Edigheji (eds) Governance in the New South Africa (2003) 146. See also D Pottie 'Challenges to Local Government in Low-Income Housing Delivery' in Khan & Thring (supra) at 429. For a more general statement of the law on co-operative government, see S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

[6] Grootboom (supra) at para 39 (footnotes omitted).

The White Paper on Housing, discussing Schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution, argues that, while national and provincial governments are given concurrent legislative capacity, '[t]he intent … is clearly that appropriate housing functions and powers should be devolved to the maximum possible extent, to the provincial level.'[1] By the time the Housing Act was promulgated, however, the State had begun to include local government in housing delivery. In so doing, it was following the new paradigm laid down in the White Paper on Local Government and the Development Facilitation Act in establishing 'development principles' to be followed by all spheres of government.[2] This 'new' position is set out in the National Housing Code as follows:

> A critical policy challenge for the governance of housing is to facilitate the maximum devolution of functions and powers to provincial and local government spheres, while at the same time, ensuring that national processes and policies essential to a sustainable national housing development process are in place. The Housing Act, No. 107 of 1997, determines roles in respect of such devolution, and defines key national and provincial responsibilities with respect to empowerment at the provincial and local spheres of government.[3]

This 'shift in policy' mostly legitimates an existing situation. Larger metropolitan governments have thus already recognized, and begun to act upon, the socio-political imperative to build low-cost housing. Housing is understood by local government politicians as an essential service and, therefore, necessary for the development of credibility and 'electability'.

In 2002 a 'new procurement regime' — in line with the accreditation process initiated in the Housing Act — shifted the obligation to initiate and to develop housing projects down to local government. Breaking New Ground states that municipalities should lead the process of locating new housing developments because they are better placed to ensure that such developments meet the needs of the beneficiaries.[4] While Breaking New Ground envisages the ultimate accreditation of all municipalities over the next ten years,[5] the national government has been criticized for failing to appreciate fully the financial implications for local government of engaging in housing delivery. In addition to the financial burden of administering a housing programme, the municipalities will bear the

[1] National Department of Housing White Paper on Housing (1994) at para 5.2.1.1. See DVB Behuising v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 374 (CC) at para 17 (Court held that there is no presumption in favour of national or provincial competencies.)

[2] Act 67 of 1995.

[3] National Department of Housing National Housing Code (2000) Part 1, 8.

[4] National Department of Housing Breaking New Ground: The Comprehensive Plan for the Creation of Sustainable Settlements (2004)('Breaking New Ground') 10.

[5] Ibid at 21.

brunt of ongoing maintenance, service and increased infrastructure costs. For smaller municipalities, non-payment for municipal services already results in substantial debt.[1] The 2003 Public Service Commission Report noted that:

> In spite of the evidently high levels of severe poverty in many HSS [housing subsidy schemes] projects local authorities continue to expect payment for rates and services. Only the larger metros have developed indigent policies that allow the poorest households a basic lifeline of water and/or energy supply, and also zero rating for rates payments. Poorly resourced small town municipalities face up to 80 or 90% default on rates or services but appear not to have the means, or the national or provincial support, to be able to put in place appropriate indigent policies. This affects the social and economic viability not just of the housing projects but also of these small municipalities.[2]

The Constitutional Court has instructed that a 'reasonable programme must clearly allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensure that the appropriate financial and human resources are available' in order to pass constitutional muster. To ensure that it discharges its constitutional duties, the State must give further consideration to the long-term financial sustainability of municipal housing and service provision, particularly in poorer areas with high rates of unemployment and payment default.[3] The recent 'Accreditation Framework for Municipalities to Administer National Housing Programmes' (2006) goes some way towards ensuring that municipalities will have the capacity to carry out the housing function by allowing for 'progressive delegation' before full accreditation. As with many of the initiatives introduced or carried forward in Breaking New Ground, it is too early at this stage to make a meaningful assessment of the assignment process.

(c) 'Breaking New Ground'

The national Department of Housing's new policy statement — Breaking New Ground — responds to a number of problems already identified within the housing sector.[4] In so doing, the document makes many important contributions. In particular, it requires the Department of Housing to focus on the entire residential housing market in order to help bring about 'increased integration between the

[1] See M Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing and Commodified Urban Segregation in South Africa' in C Haferburg & J Oβenbrügge (eds) Ambiguous Restructurings of Post-Apartheid Cape Town: The Spatial Form of Socio-Political Change (2003) 115 (Huchzermeyer 'Low Income Housing') 126. See also Breaking New Ground (supra) at 4 (Problem is acknowledged.)

[2] Public Service Commission Report on the Evaluation of the National Housing Subsidy Scheme (2003) 101. For further discussion on the problems experienced with local government housing delivery, see W Smit Expanding Socio-Economic Rights and Access to Housing (Unpublished paper prepared for the Department of Housing by Urban Sector Network, 2003, on file with the author) 27–29.

[3] For a more detailed discussion of the financial implications of local government housing delivery, see McLean (supra) at 166–71.

[4] Breaking New Ground was announced by the Minister of Housing on 2 September 2004 after receiving Cabinet approval on 1 September 2004. The new policy has a fairly complex relationship with existing policy. See § 55.2*(b)* supra. In brief, the existing legislation and the National Housing Code are being redrafted to conform to the new developments set out in Breaking New Ground. Current legislation and policy is therefore in a state of flux.

primary and secondary housing market'.[1] Breaking New Ground also emphasizes the sustainability of human settlements, the involvement of the private sector and the upgrading of informal settlements. This section briefly discusses three of the more important developments set out in the new policy which were not covered in the previous discussion of housing policy.

(i) Sustainable human settlements

Sustainability is part of an international trend. States have committed themselves to it in a range of documents: Agenda 21 (1992), Habitat Agenda (1996), the UN Millennium Goals (2000) and the World Summit on Sustainable Development (2002). Sustainable development is defined as a commitment to > pursue development especially for the improvement of quality of life and standard of living for all (especially those in poverty and high levels of vulnerability) while being mindful and responsive to the environmental and resource limits as defined through scientific evaluations and monitoring.[2]

The new housing policy, Breaking New Ground, defines sustainable human settlements as > well managed entities in which economic growth and social development are in balance with the carrying capacity of the natural systems on which they depend for their existence and result in sustainable development, wealth creation, poverty alleviation and equity.[3]

To further ensure sustainability, the Department of Housing is promoting the integration of previously excluded communities into existing urban areas.[4] By emphasizing such integration, Breaking New Ground recognizes the limitations of a policy based primarily on (poorly located and poorly serviced) single-stand housing.[5]

(ii) Private sector involvement

While the involvement of the private sector in housing provision is not new (it was already envisaged in the White Paper), Breaking New Ground forges a new type of partnership — one which is negotiated and demand-led.[6] Breaking New Ground

[1] Breaking New Ground (supra) at 8.

[2] S Charlton, M Silverman & S Berrisford Taking Stock: Review of the Department of Housing's Programme, Policies and Practice (1994–2003)(Unpublished paper prepared for the Department of Housing, 2003, on file with the author) 31.

[3] Breaking New Ground (supra) at 11.

[4] Ibid at 12.

[5] Ibid at 8. For a general discussion on the concept of sustainability in housing policy in South Africa, see DK Irurah & B Boshoff 'An Interpretation of Sustainable Development and Urban Sustainability in Low-Cost Housing and Settlements in South Africa' in P Harrison, M Huchzermeyer & M Mayekiso (eds) Confronting Fragmentation: Housing and Urban Development in a Democratising Society (2003) 244.

[6] See 'Press Statement by LN Sisulu Minister of Housing on the Public Unveiling of the New Housing Plan' (Pretoria, 2 September 2004), available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 13 May 2006).

suggests that the State can attract private-sector involvement in housing provision in a number of ways: (1) revision of the housing subsidies to promote public-private partnerships in construction; (2) expansion of the subsidy band to allow medium-income households to access formal finance; (3) funding to provide social housing and risk-sharing with the private-sector lenders; (4) developing mechanisms to counter volatile interest rates and the creation of a functioning residential property market; (5) skills-transfer from the private to the public sector in construction and project management; and (6) employer involvement in housing provision for its employees.[1]

At the same time as Breaking New Ground looks forward to a revived role for the private sector, the Financial Sector Charter is an exciting reciprocal development on the part of commercial lenders, committing South African financial institutions to the provision of greater access to credit for low-income housing.[2] As part of the Charter, financial institutions have committed to providing R 42 billion worth of finance to households earning between R 1 500 and R 7 500 by the end of 2008.[3] In 2005, a 'Memorandum of Understanding' signed by the four major South African banks and the Minister of Housing created mortgage-finance products targeted at this group, with State assistance for the insurance or underwriting of these loans.[4] While the final details of this arrangement have yet to be hammered out, three of the four major banks have recently started offering mortgage products for this group. A number of other institutions also offer similar loans.[5] This partnership between the formal financial sector and the government promises to open up significant opportunities for those within the target group to enter the property market.

(iii) Informal settlements and backyard shacks

Current statistics indicate that there are approximately one million backyard shacks in South Africa. Until recently, the State appeared to have assumed that, as a result of the massive housing delivery drive, most people living in shacks in informal settlements and back yards would eventually be housed in State housing. Breaking New Ground acknowledges that, despite massive delivery, there has been a

[1] Breaking New Ground (supra) at 8–11.

[2] Financial Sector Charter (2003) at paras 2.27.3 read with 2.22, 2.34.3 and 8.3.2. The Financial Sector Charter is available at http://www.treasury.gov.za/press/other/2003101701.pdf (accessed on 16 December 2005).

[3] See Melzer (supra) at 8. This group is said to comprise about 4 million households, or 12 million persons aged over 16. Ibid at 10.

[4] See 'Access Housing' (April 2006, Issue 1) 2, available at http://www.finmarktrust.org.za (accessed on 10 May 2006).

[5] See Melzer (supra) at 22–30. (Discussion of the products offered.) Other institutions which provide finance to the target group include the National Housing Finance Corporation, the Mpumalanga Housing Finance Company, Ithala Limited, Beehive, Masakeni Credit Corporation, Real People Housing, and Greenstart Home Loans (Pty) Ltd. Ibid at 23.

steady growth of households living in shacks.[1] The policy therefore suggests a shift in attention — one that recognizes the intractability of the problem of informal settlements and backyard shacks and seeks to address them. The new Informal Settlement Upgrading Programme provides for interim servicing of informal settlements. Planning is still underway for a more comprehensive approach to informal settlements and backyard shacks.[2] As part of the new interim programme, a single municipality in each province has been charged with the upgrading of informal settlements on a pilot-scheme basis.[3] The best practices that emerge will be used to inform the new programme. It is, as yet, too early to make any meaningful assessment of these schemes.[4]

(d) Social Housing

In addition to so-called 'RDP housing', funded through the project-linked capital subsidy, the dominant subsidy scheme to date, another housing type provided and funded through the institutional subsidy is social housing. Social housing is defined as '[a] rental or co-operative housing option for low income persons at a level of scale and built form which requires institutional management and which is provided by accredited social housing institutions or in accredited social housing projects in designated restructuring zones'.[5] Social housing projects have generally been well located and rentals are subsidized through State and donor funding.[6]

Since 2001, the State has rekindled interest in rental housing as a mechanism for fulfilling the housing needs of the poor at the same time as it regenerates urban areas and creates sustainable settlements.[7] This new development has come

[1] See 'Speech by LN Sisulu Minister of Housing at the Occasion of the Tabling of the Budget Vote for the Department of Housing for the 2004/05 Financial Year' (National Assembly, 10 June 2004), available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 15 May 2006). See also Minister of Housing, Minister Sisulu, 'Speech Regarding Millennium Development Goals at the 13th session of the UN Commission on Sustainable Development, Committing African Governments to the Eradication of Slums in African Cities' (20 April 2005), available at http://www.housing.gov.za (accessed on 13 May 2006).

[2] The Programme was introduced through an amendment to the Housing Code to include a new Chapter 13 'National Housing Programme: Upgrading of Informal Settlements' (2005). At the time of writing, the final version of the new chapter was still not available on the Department's website.

[3] See Breaking New Ground (supra) at 12.

[4] See M Huchzermeyer 'The New Instrument for Upgrading Informal Settlements in South Africa: Contributions and Constraints' in M Huchzermeyer & A Karam (eds) Informal Settlements — A Perpetual Challenge at the Local and Policy Level (forthcoming 2006, on file with the author)(Offers a preliminary discussion of this new policy.)

[5] National Department of Housing Social Housing Policy for South Africa: Towards an Enabling Environment for Social Housing Development (2005)('Social Housing Policy for South Africa') 8. Note that although the policy itself states that it is still a draft, it has apparently been adopted as the final policy.

[6] See M Fish 'Social Housing' in Khan & Thring (supra) at 404.

[7] See F Khan & C Ambert 'Preface' in Khan & Thring (supra) at iv and xvi. For a general discussion on the use and desirability of public rental housing internationally, see A Gilbert 'Some Observations on What Might be Done about Rental Housing in South Africa' in Khan & Thring (supra) at 367.

about for a number of reasons: first, the national Department of Housing has broadened its interpretation of 'secure tenure' to include rental housing; second, the Department has recognized the demand, particularly for those earning between R 2 500 and R 3 500 per month, for well-located rental accommodation; and third, rental housing is able to achieve integrated development in ways which 'RDP housing' has not done to date.[1] Unfortunately, social housing, with its emphasis on the provision of well-located rental stock, still does not take into account the needs of the poorest of the poor. As Charlton, Silverman and Berrisford note:

> To date an engagement with the idea of rental, and mobility, by the National Department of Housing seems to have narrowed to a focus on social housing. . . . [S]ocial housing appears to have an inappropriate over-emphasis . . . given its limited ability to contribute to housing the poor, the complexities associated with its management, and the competitive alternatives offered by a range of private sector rental options.[2]

The very poor will continue to be forced to the urban periphery. Despite this, Breaking New Ground places great importance on social housing, or 'medium-density' housing, for enhancing mobility and promoting urban integration.[3] A range of social housing types are envisaged in the new policy, including:

> [M]ulti-level flat or apartments options [sic] for higher income groups (incorporating beneficiary mixes to support the principle of integration and cross-subsidization); cooperative group housing; transitional housing for destitute households; communal housing with a combination of family and single room accommodation with shared facilities and hostels.[4]

Social housing will, the State argues, 'contribute to urban regeneration, . . . to urban efficiency' and to urban integration of previously excluded groups of people.[5] Breaking New Ground envisages the promulgation of a Social Housing Act[6] that will provide a comprehensive framework for mixed-used projects and increase subsidies for social housing to levels substantially above those allocated to RDP housing.

To date, the high cost of social housing has been borne by donors. These high costs have, up until recently, contributed to the general instability and non-sustainability of the social housing sector.

[1] See K Rust 'No Shortcuts: South Africa's Progress in Implementing its Housing Policy, 1994–2002' (Unpublished paper prepared for the Institute for Housing of South Africa, 2003, on file with the author) 15.

[2] Charlton, Silverman & Berrisford (supra) at 84.

[3] See Breaking New Ground (supra) at 18.

[4] Ibid at 18. See also 'Business Plan 4: Social (Medium-Density) Housing Programme' in Breaking New Ground.

[5] Social Housing Policy for South Africa (supra) at 4.

[6] The timing for the new Social Housing Act is still uncertain, but it is planned to be submitted to and adopted by Parliament by the end of 2006.

55.5 International Law of Housing

FC s 39(1)(b) provides that when courts, tribunals or forums interpret the Bill of Rights they must consider international law.[1] This body of law embraces international agreements that South Africa has ratified, those which it has not,[2] and customary international law.[3] International law has influenced both the courts' and the government's understanding of South Africa's obligations to realize the right to housing. South Africa's National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights, submitted to the United Nations in 1998, identifies the primary international law documents which inform South Africa's approach to the rights to housing and shelter as art 25 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), art 11 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR),[4] and the United Nations Habitat's Global Urban Observatory programme and Habitat Agenda.[5] Of particular importance is the Habitat Agenda 'Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements' in which South Africa 'reaffirm[ed] … [its] commitment to the full and progressive realization of the right to adequate housing'.[6]

The central international instruments for the interpretation of the right to housing are the ICESCR and the Committee for Economic, Social and Cultural

[1] For more on the relationship between international law, constitutional law, and municipal law, see H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law and International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30.

[2] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 35.

[3] FC s 232.

[4] (1966) 993 UNTS 3, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (signed by South Africa on 3 October 1994, but not yet ratified).

[5] Available at http://www.unhabitat.org/programmes/guo/default.asp and http://www.unhabitat.org/unchs/english/hagenda/ (accessed on 11 May 2006). In addition to these documents, there are a number of international and regional treaties which are relevant to the international right to housing. The International Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) 189 UNTS 150 (acceded to by South Africa on 12 January 1996)(Provides for refugee housing rights on the same level as that of nationals); The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1965) UN Doc A/6014, 660 UNTS 195 (ratified by South Africa on 10 December 1998)(Provides for equality in recognizing the right to housing); The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (1979) UN Doc A/34/46 (ratified by South Africa on 15 December 1995)(Prohibits discrimination against women in rural areas in the enjoyment of the right to housing); The African Charter on Human and People's Rights (1981)(ratified by South Africa on 9 June 1996)(Has been read as containing an implied right to housing); The Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) UN Doc A/44/49 (ratified by South Africa on 16 June 1995)(Provides for children's housing rights); The African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child (1990)(ratified by South Africa on 7 January 2000)(Contains children's housing rights.)

[6] Habitat Agenda 'Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements', available at http://www.unhabitat.org/declarations/ist-dec.htm (accessed on 16 January 2006). See also Agenda 21 (1992), adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, available at http://www.un.org/esa/sustdev/documents/agenda21/english/agenda21toc.htm (accessed on 16 January 2006).

Rights' (CESCR) General Comments 3 (GC 3),[1] 4 (GC 4),[2] and 7 (GC 7).[3] On 3 October 1994, the then President of South Africa, Nelson Mandela, signed the ICESCR and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).[4] By doing so, he signalled the new government's commitment to be bound by international human rights norms and South Africa's commitment to protecting economic, social and cultural rights. Unfortunately, South Africa has not yet ratified the ICESCR, so it is not yet bound by the Covenant. Nevertheless, South Africa does incur certain obligations under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Vienna Convention) in the period between signature and ratification: South Africa must refrain from 'acts which would defeat the object and purpose of the treaty';[5] it should use the interim period to review its laws for consistency with the ICESCR; and it incurs a general duty to act in 'good faith' and cannot use domestic law as a justification for failure to ratify the Convention.[6]

Article 2(1) of the ICESCR governs the State's general obligations relating to substantive rights in the Covenant and provides that:

> Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to take steps, individually and through international assistance and co-operation, especially economic and technical, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realization of the rights recognized in the present Covenant by all appropriate means, including particularly the adoption of legislative measures.

Article 2(1) is the primary clause — the 'linchpin' according to Matthew Craven[7] — that deals with the obligations placed on States Party to the Covenant. It sets out the nature of the duties assumed by member States, namely that the rights in the Covenant are to be realized progressively, subject to the available resources of the States Party. This obligation reflects a compromise between two groups — those of which wished to create a fully binding obligation on member States, and those of which recognized the need for greater flexibility in creating an obligation where member States vary greatly in economic means.[8]

[1] See General Comment 3 'The Nature of States Parties' Obligations' (Article 2 of the Covenant)(5th session, 1990) UN Doc. E/1991/23 ('GC 3').

[2] See General Comment 4 'The Right to Adequate Housing' (Article 11 of the Covenant)(6th session, 1991) UN Doc. E/1992/23 ('GC 4').

[3] See General Comment 7 'The Right to Adequate Housing: Forced Evictions' (16th session, 1997) UN Doc. E/1998/22 ('GC 7'). GC 7 is discussed in detail at § 55.6*(d)* infra.

[4] (1966) 999 UNTS 171 (ratified by South Africa on 10 December 1998).

[5] Article 18 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties ('Vienna Convention').

[6] Articles 26 and 27 of the Vienna Convention.

[7] See MCR Craven The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Perspective on Its Development (1995) 106.

[8] Ibid at 150–51.

Under the ICESCR, member States are not required to realize all of the rights in the Covenant immediately; rather, they are under a duty to realize the rights progressively, depending on their available resources. Available resources are to be interpreted broadly and objectively to include all resources available, rather than just the resources allocated to a particular domain by the State.[1] Thus, the obligation of each State Party 'to take steps' was chosen in preference to the duty 'to promote', since the former locution is viewed as a less onerous obligation on member States. Nevertheless, the obligation to 'take steps' is immediate, while the obligation to realize the full right may be implemented progressively.[2] There are two ways to describe the nature of the obligations imposed by the ICESCR.

The first description involves a distinction between obligations to respect, to protect and to fulfil a right.[3] The duty to respect places an obligation on States Party to ensure that the State does not interfere with the rights of individuals and is, in this sense, a 'negative' right. The duty to protect places an obligation on States Party to ensure that others do not interfere with the rights of individuals.[4] The duty to fulfil (or promote) requires States Party to take such steps as are necessary to enable the individual to satisfy the right where he or she is unable to do so without assistance. These latter two duties are 'positive' in that they require the State to undertake affirmative action to protect and to fulfil the rights in the Covenant.

A second way to describe the obligations imposed by the ICESCR is to look at the nature of the obligation entailed. It is often said that civil and political rights give rise to 'obligations of result' and socio-economic rights give rise to 'obligations of conduct'.[5] An obligation of result is one in which the party has an obligation to achieve a particular result and the means of achieving that result is left to the discretion of the party; an obligation of conduct, on the other hand, is where a particular course of action is mandated to achieve a specific goal. This distinction between socio-economic and civil and political rights is not especially helpful, as both sets of rights give rise to a range of obligations. The duties to respect and protect are primarily obligations of result — the obligation on States

[1] See Craven (supra) at 137.

[2] The Limburg Principles on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights UN Doc E/CN.4/1987/17 Annex, reproduced in (1987) 9 Human Rights Quarterly 122 ('The Limburg Principles') at para 16; P Alston & G Quinn 'The Nature and Scope of States Parties' Obligations Under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1987) 9 Human Rights Quarterly 156, 166.

[3] Today, this formulation is usually attributed to Henry Shue. H Shue Basic Rights: Subsistence, Affluence, and U.S. Foreign Policy (2nd Edition, 1996). But it also appears in a slightly different form elsewhere. See A Eide Right to Adequate Food as a Human Right (1989); GJH van Hoof 'The Legal Nature of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: A Rebuttal of Some Traditional Views' in P Alston & K Tomaševski (eds) The Right to Food (1984) 97.

[4] See Jaftha v Schoeman; Van Rooyen v Stoltz 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC) at paras 31–34 (Constitutional Court described obligation in Jaftha as an instance of protecting a negative right.) See § 55.6 infra for further discussion.

[5] See Alston & Quinn (supra) at 185.

Party is to ensure that the rights in the ICESCR are respected and protected, and the States Party are given a wide measure of discretion on how to achieve this. The obligation in art 2(1) to 'take steps' 'progressively' to achieve the right, on the other hand, has been said to constitute primarily an obligation of conduct.[1] As Alston points out, however, the duty is also partly an obligation of result, as 'states must match their performance with their objective capabilities'. Only where the text specifies steps to be undertaken by States Parties would Alston describe the obligation as being solely one of conduct.[2] Nonetheless, the clear objective set out in art 2(1) is the 'full realization of the rights recognized in the present Covenant' and it is important for States Party not to get too caught up with measuring their progressive realization and to lose sight of the ultimate aim of the Covenant. As Craven notes: 'The compliance of a State with its obligations ultimately is to be measured not merely by compliance with some notion of "due process", but by the degree to which it has achieved the full realization of the rights.'[3]

The jurisprudence of the ICESCR and the GCs is referred to extensively in Grootboom. FC s 26(2) places a duty on the State to take 'reasonable legislative and other measures' towards the realization of the right in FC s 26(1) and thereby echoes the language of the ICESCR. FC s 26(2)'s obligation is qualified in two main ways: it must be within the State's 'available resources' and it must be progressively realized. Again, the Final Constitution rehearses the words of the ICESCR. In interpreting 'reasonable measures', the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has held that this means that the State must show that it has taken steps which are 'deliberate, concrete and targeted as clearly as possible' towards fulfilling that right.[4] The CESCR's gloss on 'reasonable measures' resonates with the Grootboom Court's understanding of 'reasonableness'.

(a) 'Adequate' housing

GC 4 is the most comprehensive and authoritative analysis of the meaning of 'adequate housing' in international law. The CESCR begins its analysis by stating that the right to housing should not be interpreted narrowly to refer only to shelter, but should be understood to encompass the right to live in 'security, peace and dignity'.[5] The Committee then goes on to emphasize that housing must be adequate and explains this concept through identifying a number of aspects which should be taken into account when determining adequacy of housing. Specifically, adequate housing should (1) provide legal security of tenure which does not necessarily include ownership and which must provide 'protection

[1] For a contrary view, see Craven (supra) at 107–09.
[2] See Alston & Quinn (supra) at 185.
[3] Craven (supra) at 109.
[4] GC 3 (supra) at para 2.
[5] GC 4 (supra) at para 7.

against forced eviction, harassment and other threats'; (2) provide the 'facilities essential for health, security, comfort and nutrition', such as water and power; (3) be affordable such that 'the attainment and satisfaction of other basic needs are not threatened or compromised'; (4) be habitable, that is, housing should provide 'the inhabitants with adequate space … protecting them from cold, damp, heat, rain, wind or other threats to health, structural hazards, and disease vectors'; (5) be accessible to all groups, including disadvantaged groups which should be given a 'degree of priority consideration'; (6) be located to provide 'access to employment options, health-care services, schools, childcare centres and other social facilities' and should not be located in areas hazardous to health; and (7) express the cultural identity and diversity of those who inhabit it.[1]

In Grootboom, Yacoob J initially distinguishes the right to 'access to adequate housing' in FC s 26(1) from the right to 'adequate housing' found in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) by emphasizing the phrase 'access to':

> The right delineated in s 26(1) is a right of 'access to adequate housing' as distinct from the right to adequate housing encapsulated in the Covenant. This difference is significant. It recognises that housing entails more than bricks and mortar. It requires available land, appropriate services such as the provision of water and the removal of sewage and the financing of all of these, including the building of the house itself. For a person to have access to adequate housing all of these conditions need to be met: there must be land, there must be services, there must be a dwelling. Access to land for the purpose of housing is therefore included in the right of access to adequate housing in s 26. A right of access to adequate housing also suggests that it is not only the State who is responsible for the provision of houses, but that other agents within our society, including individuals themselves, must be enabled by legislative and other measures to provide housing. The State must create the conditions for access to adequate housing for people at all economic levels of our society. State policy dealing with housing must therefore take account of different economic levels in our society.[2]

The Grootboom Court thus recognized that the State's obligation must be context-sensitive: its policy must cater for both those who can afford to pay for adequate housing themselves, and those who require State assistance. Consideration must also be given as to whether the person requiring assistance lives in a rural environment or an urban area — and there may be differences across provinces and cities. The Court's reluctance to follow the CESCR's interpretation of the ICESCR stands in stark contrast to the national government policy laid down in the Housing Code, which expressly accepts the CESCR's interpretation of the ICESCR. In explaining what the word 'adequate' means in FC s 26(1), the Code states that

[1] GC 4 (supra) at para 8.
[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.

> [t]he wording of the housing right provision corresponds with the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966). In that context, 'adequate housing' is measured by certain core factors: legal security of tenure; the availability of services; materials, facilities and infrastructure; affordability; habitability; accessibility; location and cultural adequacy. South Africa's housing policy concurs with this concept of housing.[1]

Thus Yacoob J's interpretation of what constitutes adequate housing is more restrictive than the interpretation adopted by the national Department of Housing. Of course, courts are free to set a lower constitutional standard than that adopted in State policy. In light of the express adoption of the ICESCR definition by the State, however, the Court's lower standard reflects two things. First, it reveals the Court's inadequate assessment of the policy before it. It is particularly important for the Court to have an accurate and a balanced understanding of what State policy is before it decides whether it is reasonable or not.[2] Second, the Court's rejection of the CESCR definition says less about differences in wording between the Final Constitution and the ICESCR, and more about the Court's refusal to engage in a discussion over the substantive meaning of FC s 26(1).[3]

(b) Progressive realization

The term 'progressive realization' was introduced into the ICESCR in order to account for the existing differences in States' abilities to realize socio-economic rights and to allow all States to adhere to the obligations imposed by the Covenant, irrespective of their social and economic development. Those opposed to the use of the term argued that it would enable States to escape their obligations and act as a limitation on the right.[4] Despite the obligation to realize rights progressively, States Party have an obligation to 'take steps' immediately, since this obligation is not subject to budgetary constraints or any other qualifications. In the CESCR's words:

> [W]hile the full realization of the relevant rights may be achieved progressively, steps towards that goal must be taken within a reasonably short time after the Covenant's entry into force for the States concerned. Such steps should be deliberate, concrete and targeted as clearly as possible towards meeting the obligations in the Covenant.[5]

[1] National Department of Housing National Housing Code (2000) Part 1, 7 (footnotes omitted).

[2] Of course, this point could be used to bolster the argument that courts, due to institutional limitations, are poorly placed to assess social and economic policy. This is not, however, the point which is being made here. The Court is well placed to assess whether State housing policy is consistent with international norms and, in order to do so, greater and better evidence should be put before the Court with regard to the nature and content of State policy. If this is not done, the Court should call for more detailed evidence or research the area itself.

[3] See § 55.3*(b)* supra.

[4] See Alston & Quinn (supra) at 172–75; Craven (supra) at 130–31.

[5] GC 3 (supra) at para 2. See also Limburg Principles (supra) at para 21.

In interpreting the term 'progressive realization', the Court in Grootboom referred to GC 3 of the ICESCR Committee and found that the phrase in the Final Constitution has the same meaning as that in the Covenant. The Grootboom Court noted that this provision did not mean the State could take as long as it liked in realizing the right, and that it must 'move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards that goal'.[1]

Article 2(1) does not indicate what steps should be taken and merely states that steps should be taken 'by all available means'. While this gives States a large measure of discretion, the Committee has indicated that it will make 'the ultimate determination as to whether all appropriate measures have been taken'.[2] Despite the text of art 2(1), the Committee states that while legislation, as a general rule, is not mandatory, it is 'highly desirable and in some cases may even be indispensable.[3] New legislation would, however, be required where existing legislation conflicted with the obligations imposed under the Covenant.[4] Legislative measures alone, however, are 'by no means exhaustive of the obligations of States parties',[5] and member States are required to take other methods necessary to secure the progressive realization of the right.

In addition, the obligation to realize rights progressively has been interpreted by the Committee to contain a general prohibition on what it calls 'retrogressive measures', that is, any action which would undermine the existing provision of social, economic and cultural rights under the ICESCR. Any such retrogressive measure would have to be justified in the context of the overall provision of rights:

> Nevertheless, the fact that realization over time, or in other words progressively, is foreseen under the Covenant should not be misinterpreted as depriving the obligation of all meaningful content. It is on the one hand a necessary flexibility device, reflecting the realties of the real world and the difficulties involved for any country in ensuring full realization of economic, social and cultural rights. On the other hand, the phrase must be read in the light of the overall objective, indeed the raison d'être, of the Covenant which is to establish clear obligations for States parties in respect of the full realization of the rights in question. It thus imposes an obligation to move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards that goal. Moreover, any deliberately retrogressive measures in that regard would require the most careful consideration and would need to be fully justified by reference to the totality of the rights provided for in the Covenant and in the context of the full use of the maximum available resources.[6]

States Party would therefore bear the justificatory burden of demonstrating that any retrogressive measure was economically necessary or was aimed at improving the overall provision of rights contained in the Covenant. Moreover,

[1] GC 3 (supra) at para 9, cited in Grootboom (supra) at para 45.
[2] GC 3 (supra) at para 4.
[3] Ibid at para 3; Craven (supra) at 125.
[4] See Limburg Principles (supra) at para 18; Alston & Quinn (supra) at 167; Craven (supra) at 126.
[5] GC 3 (supra) at para 4.
[6] Ibid at para 9.

as Craven argues, a retrogressive measure would constitute a limitation and will therefore have to comply with the provisions of the limitations clause in art 4 of the ICESCR.[1] The prohibition on retrospective measures was accepted by the Constitutional Court in Grootboom.[2]

(c) Within available resources

The financial cost to the State of realizing social and economic rights is one of the primary reasons given for distinguishing between these rights and civil and political rights. While this difference is often overstated, social and economic rights do raise significant budgetary concerns.[3] These concerns may make it difficult for most States Party to commit to immediate, full realization of the rights in the Covenant. For this reason, art 2(1) obliges States to take measures 'to the maximum of its available resources' so that the obligation to realize the rights progressively is dependent on individual member States' financial position. In deciding what resources to allocate in fulfilling its socio-economic rights obligations, a State has a large measure of discretion. Such discretion cannot, however, be completely unfettered, as this would undermine the rationale behind the obligation itself.[4] Indeed, the State's grounds for exercising discretion in a manner that leaves it short of the goal of fulfilling the rights must be open to judicial interrogation. Alston and Quinn sum up the position as follows:

> [A] plea of resource scarcity simpliciter, if substantiated, is entitled to deference especially where a state shows adherence to a regular and principled decision-making process. In the final resort, however, such a plea remains open to some sort of objective scrutiny by the body entrusted with responsibility for supervising states' compliance with their obligations under the Covenant.[5]

While it is clear from the text of the ICESCR that budgetary constraints are the most important limitation on the provision of social and economic rights, the travaux préparatoires also indicate that that this limitation is meant to operate only for countries which do not have sufficient resources. For countries that do have

[1] See Craven (supra) at 132.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 45. In addition to the general requirement in art 2(1) to take steps, certain of the substantive provisions in Part III of the Covenant set out specific steps that States Party are required to take. See arts 6(2), 11(2), 12(2), 13(2) and 15(2) of the ICESCR. In terms of steps which the ICESCR obliges member States to take, the travaux préparatoire indicate that the drafters of the Covenant considered it unnecessary for States Party to provide domestic judicial remedies for violations of the rights under the Covenant. See Alston & Quinn (supra) at 169–70. In practice, however, many States have provided for judicial remedies for many of the rights, and a growing number of countries have included social and economic rights in their domestic constitutions with varying degrees of enforceability and influence.

[3] As is frequently noted, civil and political rights may also raise significant budgetary concerns. See, eg, August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) SA 363 (CC); Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC).

[4] See Alston & Quinn (supra) at 177–80; Craven (supra) at 137.

[5] Alston & Quinn (supra) at 181.

sufficient resources, the State incurs an obligation to fulfil the rights in the Covenant immediately. This interpretation has not, however, been followed by the CESCR, which has interpreted the obligation on developed countries to be the same as that of developing countries — progressive implementation subject to budgetary restrictions.[1]

Article 2(1) requires a State to take steps 'to the maximum of its available resources'. It is clear from the travaux préparatoires that 'available resources' does not simply refer to the resources allocated to a particular sector. Nor should the phrase be interpreted to refer solely to the resources available to the State — it must include international resources as well.[2] While developed country member States may have some sort of obligation to assist developing States in realizing the social, economic and cultural rights in the Covenant, the nature of such a duty to provide assistance to poorer countries, as Craven points out, remains unclear. The 'general consensus' is that developing countries are 'entitled to ask for assistance', but they cannot 'claim it as a legal right'.[3]

The qualification in FC s 26(2), that the State need only fulfil the right to adequate housing within 'available resources', is notably different from the wording in art 2(1) of the ICESCR. The ICESCR provides that a State must take steps 'to the maximum of its available resources'.[4] Thus the duty imposed by the Final Constitution to realize the right is less onerous than the duty imposed by the ICESCR. South Africa is, therefore, unlikely to follow the jurisprudence of the CESCR in determining its financial obligations to realize the right to adequate housing.

(d) Minimum core[5]

Finally, the CESCR has made it clear that States are to provide for the basic needs of their citizens through the provision of the 'minimum core' of each of the rights in the ICESCR. The notion of a minimum core is not expressly included in the ICESCR. The CESCR introduced the notion in General Comment No 3:

> [T]he Committee is of the view that a minimum core obligation to ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels of each of the rights is incumbent upon every State party. Thus, for example, a State party in which any significant number of individuals

[1] See Craven (supra) at 132–33.

[2] Ibid at 137–38, 144–50; Alston & Quinn (supra) at 179; Limburg Principles (supra) at para 26.

[3] See Craven (supra) at 145, 149; Limburg Principles (supra) at paras 29–34.

[4] Article 2(1) of the ICESCR states that '[e]ach State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to take steps, individually and through international assistance and co-operation, especially economic and technical, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realization of the rights recognized in the present Covenant by all appropriate means, including particularly the adoption of legislative measures.'

[5] See S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-22 — 33-32; and D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 56A-28 — 56A-37 (Offers a fuller discussion of the minimum core in socio-economic rights jurisprudence.)

> is deprived of essential foodstuffs, of essential primary health care, of basic shelter and housing, or of the most basic forms of education is, prima facie, failing to discharge its obligations under the Covenant. If the Covenant were to be read in such a way as not to establish such a minimum core obligation, it would be largely deprived of its raison d'être. By the same token, it must be noted that any assessment as to whether a State has discharged its minimum core obligation must also take account of resource constraints applying within the country concerned. Article 2(1) obligates each State party to take the necessary steps 'to the maximum of its available resources'. In order for a State party to be able to attribute its failure to meet at least its minimum core obligations to a lack of available resources it must demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations.[1]

The minimum core notion thus shifts the obligation on to the State Party to 'demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations'.[2] It does not, however, oblige States Party to satisfy the minimum core where resource constraints prevent them from doing so.[3] The notion of a minimum core also prohibits countries from prioritizing among the rights in the ICESCR where doing so would undermine the minimum core of non-prioritized rights.[4]

Whether the minimum core approach constitutes a 'universal' standard, or whether there is room for local interpretation is a difficult question. Often the answer will depend on the degree of specificity which the minimum core is given. For example, if a party defines the minimum core of housing as a brick house of 100 square metres of at least four rooms, with electricity, a television, running hot and cold water and heating, such a standard is unlikely to be adopted as an appropriate universal standard. The minimum core of the right to housing could, however, be said to encompass: security of tenure to ensure protection from 'forced eviction, harassment and other threats'; access to 'services, materials, facilities and infrastructure'; adequate space and protection 'from cold, damp, heat, rain, wind or other threats to health, structural hazards, and disease vectors'; and 'a location which allows access to employment options, health-care services, schools, childcare centres and other social facilities'.[5] Such a flexible

[1] GC 3 (supra) at para 10.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See Craven (supra) at 142–44. Craven interprets this obligation differently. Where a State Party has not discharged its minimum core obligations, this establishes a 'presumption of guilt', and budgetary restrictions are then used as the basis for a limitation of the minimum core obligation. This, he notes, stands in contradiction to the general approach adopted in art 2(1), where budgetary restrictions are used to carve out the extent of the member State's obligation.

[4] See Craven (supra) at 141.

[5] GC 4 (supra) at para 8 (Discussing the content of 'adequate housing'.)

standard, capable of catering for local needs, is a more likely and compelling candidate for adoption as a universal benchmark by which the CESCR and States Party can assess whether the minimum core of the rights has been met.

The question as to whether the minimum core should be incorporated into the interpretation of FC ss 26 and 27 has been the subject of intense academic discussion in South Africa. The Constitutional Court in Grootboom rejected the minimum core approach on two grounds: significant differences in the wording of the two provisions, and insufficient evidence before the Court to justify adoption of the standard.[1] These two reasons lack purchase. First, the Grootboom Court should have taken into consideration the fact that national housing policy has already demonstrated a willingness to conform to the norms laid down by the ICESCR. Second, the issue of evidence is a red herring. The Committee of the ICESCR has laid down a minimum standard in interpreting the meaning of adequate housing, which could be applied irrespective of local conditions.[2] The minimum core obligation is not meant to be a flexible standard, but to 'describe the minimum expected of a State in order to comply with its obligation under the Covenant'.[3]

Despite these criticisms of the Court's reasoning, it must be recognized that adopting the minimum core approach at the domestic level raises a number of concerns. The concept of a minimum core was developed by the CESCR in order to create a set of standards by which the Committee could evaluate meaningfully reports submitted to it by member States, and not as a justiciable standard to which a court should hold a government accountable.

Both the ICESCR and the Final Constitution were born out of a realization that social justice is indispensable to a sustainable democracy. Nevertheless, the interpretation and the enforcement of these two texts operate in different contexts and fulfil different political functions. States voluntarily submit reports to the CESCR, which then engages in a 'constructive dialogue' with States Party to the ICESCR regarding the extent to which State policies are aimed at meeting its obligations under the ICESCR. The CESCR is thus able to engage in a more far-reaching discussion over fundamental questions of policy, such as privatization and the impact of free-market economics on the vulnerable and disadvantaged within a community.[4] The South African Constitutional Court, on the other hand, is located within an adversarial judicial system, where the Court assesses whether and to what extent the State has complied with its constitutional obligations. The Court then makes a judgment which is binding on the State and which could oblige the State to change its policy or resource allocation.

The CESCR and the Constitutional Court thus differ in their adjudicative processes in four critical respects. First, the nature of the adjudication is different: States Party to the ICESCR submit periodic reports to the CESCR to engage in a

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 32.
[2] See GC 3 (supra) at para 10.
[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 31.
[4] See Craven (supra) at 122.

dialogue over their progress in realizing the rights in the Covenant; while the South African government is brought, generally unwillingly, before the Constitutional Court to have its policies assessed in an adversarial forum. Second, the extent to which the CESCR and the Constitutional Court can examine fundamental choices of policy differs: the CESCR is able to engage in a far-reaching discussion over fundamental questions of policy, while the Court, for reasons of institutional comity and separation of powers, cannot undertake a top-to-bottom review of policy choices and is left with the more modest task of assessing the reasonableness of a particular set of State actions. Third, the Constitutional Court is able to grant remedies which may have far-reaching policy and budgetary implications. It must thus be careful about how it crafts its remedies; the CESCR, by contrast, may make broad, sweeping findings about State compliance with the provisions of the ICESCR. Lastly, the level of scrutiny to which State policies are subject will usually differ. The Constitutional Court must attempt to do justice to the parties to a particular dispute and its findings are generally confined to the facts brought before it. The Court will undertake a detailed review of the specific problem raised by a party alleging a constitutional violation. The CESCR is free, on the other hand, to engage in a broad review of the State's entire socio-economic policy, and need not worry about the results of its findings in specific sets of circumstances.

These differences are illustrative of the different political functions which socio-economic rights play at the international level and in the domestic context. In the international arena, they serve to establish a higher ideal to which States Party to the ICSECR subscribe and desire to commit themselves for future achievement. The South African Constitution, however, establishes a standard to which the South African government must be held accountable immediately, or be found in breach of its constitutional obligations. While the two sets of institutional imperatives clearly do not need to map directly onto each other, the conclusions drawn by each institution — the decisions of the Constitutional Court and the General Comments of the CESCR — will be valuable in informing the approach of the other.

55.6 FC s 26(3): Evictions

FC s 26(3) provides that '[n]o one may be evicted from their home, or have their home demolished, without an order of court made after considering all the relevant circumstances. No legislation may permit arbitrary evictions.'

The clause contains three notable features. First, the provision relates to the eviction from one's home.[1] 'Home' is intended to distinguish the occupant facing eviction from occupants on land or property who do not have their home on that land, but engage in some other activity, say farming or another commercial

[1] On the meaning of 'home', see I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 587 (Authors argue that '[i]n order to qualify as a "home" an intention to occupy a dwelling for residential purposes permanently or for a considerable period of time is probably required.') pursuit.[1] Second, FC s 26(3) includes a duty on the State not to enact legislation which allows for 'arbitrary' evictions. FC s 26(3) does not, however, prohibit evictions, even where such an eviction results in the loss of a home.[2] And third, FC s 26(3) must also be understood within the context of the right to housing as a whole. In Jaftha v Schoeman, the Constitutional Court wrote:

> [S]ection 26 of the Constitution must be read as a whole. Section 26(3) is the provision which speaks directly to the practice of forced removals and summary eviction from land and which guarantees that a person will not be evicted from his or her home or have his or her home demolished without an order of court considering all of the circumstances relevant to the particular case. The whole section, however, is aimed at creating a new dispensation in which every person has adequate housing and in which the state may not interfere with such access unless it would be justifiable to do so.[3]

The Jaftha Court went on to interpret the protection against eviction from one's home as part of the negative aspect of the right to housing. It held that 'any measure which permits a person to be deprived of existing access to adequate housing, limits the rights protected in section 26(1)',[4] and must therefore be justified under the general limitations clause of the Final Constitution.

(a) The impact of FC s 26(3) on the common law of evictions

The common law pleading requirements for an action for ejectment are set out in Graham v Ridley[5] and Chetty v Naidoo.[6] According to these two judgments, a plaintiff need only allege and prove two facts: first, that he is the owner of the land, and, second, that the defendant is in occupation. The defendant, if she wishes to oppose the eviction, must plead that the occupation is lawful in terms of a contractual or statutory right. If the plaintiff wishes to succeed, he must obviously counter this plea in his replication, alleging the unlawfulness of the occupation.

The Interim Constitution contained no provision equivalent to FC s 26(3). It was therefore only after the coming into force of the Final Constitution that courts were obliged to consider whether the common law gives adequate effect to constitutional imperatives relating to the granting of an order for eviction.[7] Early High

[1] See Pareto Ltd & Others v Mythos Leather Manufacturing (Pty) Ltd 2000 (3) SA 999 (W)(Common law used in an application for ejectment of a business.)

[2] See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC)('Port Elizabeth Municipality') at para 21.

[3] Jaftha v Schoeman; Van Rooyen v Stoltz 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha') at para 28 (footnote omitted).

[4] Ibid at para 34.

[5] Graham v Ridley 1931 TPD 476, 479.

[6] Chetty v Naidoo 1974 (3) SA 13, 20A–E (A).

[7] For a discussion of possible interpretations of FC s 26(3), written prior to the handing down of Brisley v Drotsky, see G Budlender 'Justiciability of the Right to Housing — The South African Experience' in S Leckie (ed) National Perspectives on Housing Rights (2003)(Budlender 'Justiciability') 211–12.

Court decisions differed on this issue.[1] In Ross v South Peninsula Municipality,[2] for example, the Court held that the plaintiff has an onus to allege and prove those circumstances that would justify the granting of an order for the eviction of the defendant from her home. While the Ross Court declined to list exactly what those circumstances might be, it held that 'guidance' could be sought in the factors set out in PIE.[3] By contrast, in Betta-Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh,[4] Flemming DJP interpreted FC s 26(3) as a 'never again' provision and restricted its application to instances where the ejectment order was sought under apartheid-style legislation. On this reading, FC s 26(3) did not apply to 'ordinary trespass, whether in the form of squatting or holding over or otherwise' and, furthermore, only applied where the State was the plaintiff.[5] According to the Betta-Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd Court, FC s 26(3) had no impact on the existing common-law position on evictions.

The exact extent of FC s 26(3)'s effect on the common law was eventually dealt with by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Brisley v Drotsky.[6] In Brisley, the Court found that the only 'relevant circumstances' were those that were 'legally relevant', rather than any social or personally relevant circumstances facing the defendant.[7] As a result, FC s 26(3) does not confer discretion on a court to refuse to grant an eviction order where it would be granted under the common law or statute. Brisley has been criticized for rendering 'nugatory' the impact of FC s 26(3) on the common law and for embodying a non-transparent 'policy choice in favour of the legislature's power to give content to [FC] s 26(3) as against the judiciary's power to develop the common law'.[8] To a large extent, however, the consequences of Brisley have been overcome or circumvented by the High Courts' general reluctance to grant eviction orders in the absence of alternative accommodation.[9]

This general reluctance is consistent with the Constitutional Court's recent findings in Jaftha v Schoeman. The Jaftha Court found that the provisions in the Magistrates' Courts' rules which allowed for the granting of an order for sale in execution of immovable property by the clerk of the court were unconstitutional because they failed to provide for judicial oversight of the order. In this case, both appellants had been recipients of State subsidies, and both would have had no alternative accommodation if they had been evicted in consequence of the sale of [1] For a fuller discussion of the High Court jurisprudence, see T Roux 'Continuity and Change in a Transforming Legal Order: The Impact of Section 26(3) of the Constitution on South African Law' (2004) 121 SALJ 466 (Roux 'Continuity and Change').

[2] Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589 (C)('Ross').

[3] Ibid at 596H–J. See § 55.6*(b)*(ii) infra for a discussion of the relevant considerations listed in PIE.

[4] Betta-Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 468 (W) at para 7.2.

[5] Ibid at paras 7.2 and 7.3. Flemming DJP then went on to hold that where 'relevant circumstances' are to be considered, these will include 'the unfairness of causing loss to the owner so that the impertinence of land grabbing can stand', and the rights of landowners. Ibid at paras 12.1–12.3.

[6] Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA)('Brisley').

[7] Ibid at para 42.

[8] For a detailed discussion of Brisley, see Roux 'Continuity and Change' (supra) at 485, 486.

[9] See § 55.6*(c)* infra.

their property.[1] While the Magistrates' Court Act contains measures designed to protect vulnerable defendants, the Jaftha Court found that many defendants are not aware of or are unable to approach a court to avail themselves of this protection. The Jaftha Court held that the sale of homes in execution constituted an infringement of the negative right to adequate housing in FC s 26(1).[2] The Court concluded that the provisions of the Magistrates' Court Act did not constitute a justifiable limitation in terms of FC s 36 because they did not give a court a meaningful opportunity 'to consider all the relevant circumstances of a case to determine whether there is good cause to order execution'.[3] The Magistrates' Court rules were accordingly amended by reading in provisions that ensured that courts would, in future, possess such an opportunity.[4]

'The precise ambit of the Jaftha decision has been refined in subsequent court decisions. In Nedbank Ltd v Mortinson, the Court held that where execution is sought against immovables which have been specifically hypothecated in order to secure the debt, there has been no abuse of the court procedure, and the debt exceeds that of the Magistrates' Court's jurisdiction, a creditor may seek default judgment from the High Court Registrar.[5] The Court did, however, amend its practice directions to require the creditor to file an affidavit setting out a number of relevant considerations which would enable a Registrar to decide whether the application should be heard in open court. Similarly, in Standard Bank of South Africa v Saunderson, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that where immovable property had been hypothecated to secure a debt, FC s 26 was not implicated.[6] It did, however, order a practice direction such that defendants should be made aware of their right to raise FC s 26 issues. An appeal against the Saunderson decision was dismissed by the Constitutional Court.[7]

(b) Legislative impact on the common law of evictions

Substantial reform of the common law of evictions has occurred as a result of two pieces of legislation that give effect to FC s 26: (1) PIE; and (2) the Extension of Security of Tenure Act (ESTA).[8] ESTA extends protection against eviction to rural occupiers whose occupation was based upon consent and was initially lawful. PIE extends protection against eviction to certain categories of unlawful occupiers in both rural and urban areas.

[1] See Jaftha (supra) at para 12.
[2] Ibid at para 34.
[3] Ibid at para 54.
[4] Unfortunately, it appears that persons benefiting from RDP housing are still having their homes sold in execution for minor debts, despite a 2001 amendment to the Housing Act prohibiting the sale of RDP houses for eight years. See F Rank 'Residents Fight to Salvage Home from Debt Collectors' in The Herald On-Line available at http://www.theherald.co.za/herald/news/n01_17022006.htm (accessed on 20 February 2006).
[5] Nedbank Ltd v Mortinson 2005 (6) SA 462 (W) at para 33.
[6] Standard Bank of South Africa v Saunderson & Others (Unreported decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal, 15 December 2005).
[7] The Campus Law Clinic (University of KwaZulu-Natal Durban v Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd & Another (Unreported decision of the Constitutional Court, 31 March 2006).
[8] Act 62 of 1997.

(i) ESTA

ESTA was enacted to give effect to FC s 25(6) and FC s 26(3).[1] The Act protects a class of 'occupiers'[2] — which would clearly include those residing in their 'home' for the purposes of FC s 26(3) — from arbitrary eviction. It also regulates the relationship between owners and occupiers. ESTA thereby amends the common law of eviction where a landowner seeks to evict an 'occupier' and extends the legal protection promised in FC s 26(3) to that statutorily-designated group.

Under ESTA, a court may only grant an eviction order where the rights of residence are terminated on lawful grounds and where 'such termination is just and equitable, having regard to all relevant factors', including 'the fairness of any agreement' on which the plaintiff relies, the 'conduct of the parties', the comparative 'interests of the parties', 'the existence of a reasonable expectation of the renewal of the agreement', and the 'fairness of the procedure followed' in terminating the agreement to reside on the land by the plaintiff.[3] ESTA thus grants courts considerable latitude in determining whether granting an eviction order would be just and equitable.

(ii) PIE

PIE is commonly regarded as the companion statute to ESTA. Whereas ESTA protects lawful occupiers, PIE extends statutory protection to unlawful occupiers. Like ESTA, PIE provides that certain factors are to be considered by a court before an eviction order is granted and thereby extends considerable benefits to those facing eviction from their home by requiring a court to take into account a welter of socio-economic circumstances.[4] The factors to be considered will depend on the length of time that the defendant has been in occupation. If the defendant has been in occupation less than six months, a court may grant an eviction order only if it is 'just and equitable to do so, after considering all the relevant circumstances, including the rights and needs of the elderly, children, disabled persons and households headed by women.'[5] Where the defendant has been in occupation for more than six months, a court may grant an order for [1] See ESTA, Preamble.

[2] An occupier is defined as a person residing on land which belongs to another and who had consent to do so, but does not include a person residing on land and using it for commercial purposes, or a person who earns more than R 5 000 per month. The definition of occupier therefore includes the rural poor who live on land as their 'home'. ESTA, s 1. See Robertson v Boss (Unreported decision of the Land Claims Court, 30 September 1998)(On the meaning of 'residing on land', which the Court interpreted as meaning residing in a permanent home.)

[3] ESTA, s 8(1).

[4] An interesting recent judgment illustrates the courts' powers to adopt a more inquisitorial approach to determining relevant circumstances under PIE. See Ritamor Investments (Pty) Ltd & Others v The Unlawful Occupiers of Erf 62, Wynberg & Others (Unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division, 27 January 2006). Bertelsmann J, apparently frustrated with the lack of cooperation from the City of Johannesburg and Gauteng MEC for Housing (two of the respondents) and their refusal to provide relevant information to the Court, ordered those two respondents to return to court at a later date to provide oral evidence, subject themselves to examination and cross-examination, and provide information specified by the Court, including information on the availability of alternative accommodation and reasons for the failure to comply with the earlier requests from the Court regarding this information. Unfortunately, at the time of writing this chapter, the final judgment had not yet been handed down.

[5] PIE, s 4(6).

eviction only 'if it is of the opinion that it is just and equitable to do so, after considering all the relevant circumstances, including, except where land is sold in a sale of execution pursuant to a mortgage, whether land has been made available or can reasonably be made available by a municipality or other organ of State or another land owner for the relocation of the unlawful occupier, and including the rights and needs of the elderly, children, disabled persons and households headed by women.'[1] In addition, the Constitutional Court has held that PIE, when read with FC s 26(3), requires a court to consider, as a further relevant circumstance, whether the parties have engaged in mediation to resolve the matter.[2]

The term 'unlawful occupier, is defined in PIE as meaning:

> [A] person who occupies land without the express or tacit consent of the owner or person in charge, or without any other right in law to occupy such land, excluding a person who is an occupier in terms of the Extension of Security of Tenure Act, 1997, and excluding a person whose informal right to land, but for the provisions of this Act, would be protected by the provisions of the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act, 1996 (Act 31 of 1996).

The ambiguity of the term 'occupies' led to some confusion. It could be interpreted to apply to the initial act of occupation (such as a 'land invasion' or where people 'squat' on land). It could also, however, be interpreted to apply to a current state of illegal occupation where the initial act of occupation may have been legal (such as in instances of 'holding over'[3]). The High Court handed down conflicting decisions on this matter[4] before it was finally resolved by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Ndlovu v Ngcobo. The Ndlovu Court found that the Act does indeed extend to instances of 'holding over': that is, it extends to instances in which the initial occupation may have been lawful, but subsequently became unlawful.

The Department of Housing, evidently unhappy with this interpretation, has tabled the Prevention of Illegal Eviction From and Unlawful Occupation of Land Amendment Bill, 2005[5] ('PIE Amendment Bill'). According to the draft bill, it was never Parliament's intention to extend the reach of PIE to tenants and to mortgagors. Proposed amendments to s 2 of PIE make this intention clear. The PIE Amendment Bill is, however, still under discussion — and the State must also now take account of the conclusions reached by the Constitutional Court in

[1] PIE, s 4(7).

[2] See Port Elizabeth Municipality (supra) at para 45.

[3] 'Holding over' is defined as the continued occupation of property where a contract of lease has expired, or where the occupier has defaulted on her mortgage bond repayments. See Currie & de Waal (supra) at 590.

[4] See, for example, ABSA Bank Ltd v Amod [1999] 2 All SA 423 (W)(Court found that PIE did not extend to cases of holding-over.) This decision was followed in Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589 (C); Cape Killarney Property Investments (Pty) Ltd v Mahamba & Others 2000 (2) SA 67 (C); Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples Dialogue on Land and Shelter & Others 2000 (2) SA 1074 (SE); Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 468 (W); and Van Zyl NO v Maarman [2000] 4 All SA 212 (LCC). But see Bekker & Another v Jika [2001] 4 All SA 573 (SE)(Court held that PIE does apply to mortgage defaulters.) For a discussion of these cases, see AJ van der Walt 'Exclusivity of Ownership, Security of Tenure and Eviction Orders: A Critical Evaluation of Recent Case Law' (2002) 18 SAJHR 371, 385–90; Ndlovu v Ngcobo; Bekker & Another v Jika 2003 (1) SA 113 (SCA)('Ndlovu') at paras 51–64.

[5] Available at http://www.pmg.org.za/docs/2005/050525hanli.htm (accessed on 8 February 2006)(Latest available draft of the Bill.)

Modderklip.[1] At the time of writing, the final form of the PIE Amendment Bill had yet to be determined.[2]

(c) The reach of FC s 26(3)

As a result of ESTA, PIE and Ndlovu, the common law will apply to very few evictions.[3] The dispute in Brisley, for example, would, in light of Ndlovu, be decided under PIE.[4] As Theunis Roux points out, the real benefit of FC s 26(3) has not been to alter directly the common law, but to provide a constitutional justification for legislation protecting people from arbitrary and unjust evictions.[5] FC s 26(3) has therefore had a profound impact on the law of evictions in South Africa and extended both procedural and substantive benefits to those facing eviction from their homes. These benefits do not, of course, preclude eviction, but they do mean that those living in South Africa are less likely to face the threat of arbitrary, inhumane or unjust evictions in the future.[6]

As has already been noted, recent case law indicates that courts are increasingly reluctant to grant eviction orders in the absence of alternative accommodation. Indeed, as Geoff Budlender points out, courts have now developed a general principle that 'in the absence of special justification, an eviction which would otherwise result in homelessness or deprivation of access to housing and shelter is not permitted by the Constitution unless alternative accommodation is available.'[7] Budlender identifies three sets of circumstances which would, according to the courts, constitute 'special justification' for the granting of an eviction in the absence of alternative accommodation: (1) where the eviction is required to [1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip CC').

[2] See, for example, the minutes of the meeting of the Housing Portfolio Committee on 1 June 2005 discussing this matter, available at http://www.pmg.org.za/viewminute.php?id=5916 (accessed on 8 February 2006).

[3] Whereas PIE will apply to all unlawful occupiers, ESTA only applies to lawful occupiers in rural areas who earn under R 5 000 per month. Thus, where lawful occupiers reside in an urban area, irrespective of their income, or where they reside in a rural area and earn over R 5 000 per month, ESTA will not apply to any application for their eviction. In both instances, however, an application for eviction will either be dealt with under the law of contract, the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act 31 of 1996 or the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996.

[4] Clearly, the proposed amendments to PIE would reverse this situation. See § 55.6*(b)*(ii) supra, on the proposed amendments of PIE.

[5] See Roux 'Continuity and Change' (supra) at 469–70. See also Budlender 'Justiciability' (supra) at 210.

[6] Of course, this statement is based on the premise that, in eviction proceedings, ESTA and PIE are properly placed before the court and argued. There is, unfortunately, much evidence that this is not the case in undefended applications in magistrates' courts, particularly where ESTA should be applied. See, for example, Skhosana & Others v Roos t/a Roos se Oord & Others 2000 (4) SA 561 (LCC); Pitout v Mbolane [2000] 2 All SA 377 (LCC).

[7] G Budlender 'The Right to Alternative Accommodation in Forced Evictions' in J Squires, M Langford & B Thiele (eds) The Road to a Remedy: Current Issues in the Litigation of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (2005)(Budlender 'Alternative Accommodation') 127, 131. See also Jaftha (supra) at para 34 (Constitutional Court held that 'any measure which permits a person to be deprived of existing access to adequate housing, limits the rights protected in section 26(1). Such a measure may, however, be justified under section 36 of the Constitution.') See, eg, The City of Johannesburg v Rand Properties (Pty) Ltd & Others (Unreported decision of the Witwatersrand Local Division, 3 March 2006) at para 67 (Court interdicted the City of Johannesburg from evicting the respondents until the municipality developed a coherent programme to cater for the respondents, which must also include alternative accommodation for the respondents.)

reverse a 'land invasion' undertaken with the purpose of forcing the State to provide housing; (2) where not granting the eviction would result in the denial of State-assisted housing to another group who were to be allocated housing on the land in question; and (3) where an eviction is necessary as a result of an immediate and dangerous situation.[1]

President of the Republic of South Africa v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd adds another layer to the constitutional development of the law of evictions in South Africa. In this case, the respondent sought and obtained an eviction order against 40 000 illegal occupiers under PIE. The cost of evicting the illegal occupiers, however, exceeded the value of the land.[2] For this reason, the respondent approached the State for assistance to evict the illegal occupiers; alternatively, it sought to have the State purchase the property. After receiving no assistance, the respondent turned to the courts for relief.[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal found that the failure of the State either to purchase the property or to find alternative accommodation for the illegal occupiers amounted to a breach of the illegal occupiers' FC s 26(1) rights.[4] The Constitutional Court, on the other hand, decided the matter based on an expansive interpretation of the principle of the rule of law in FC s 1*(c)* read with FC s 34's right of access to courts. In particular, the Constitutional Court found that the failure of the State to assist with the evictions or to purchase the land threatened the social fabric and was a 'recipe for anarchy'.[5] It accordingly ordered the State to compensate the respondents for the use of the land by the illegal occupiers, and to purchase the land for settlement by the occupiers or to provide alternative accommodation to the illegal occupiers before evicting them.

(d) International law of evictions

Numerous international instruments condemn the practice of forced evictions.[6] GC 7 of the CESCR contains a general prohibition on forced evictions, which it defines as 'the permanent or temporary removal against their will of individuals, families and/or communities from the homes and/or land which they occupy, without the provision of, and access to, appropriate forms of legal or other protection'.[7] FC s 26(3) should, when interpreted in the light of GC 7, effectively prohibit forced evictions, since, under FC s 26(3), no person may be evicted from their home without a court order 'made after considering all the relevant circumstances'.

[1] See Budlender 'Alternative Accommodation' (supra) at 130–31.

[2] Modderklip CC (supra) at paras 8–9.

[3] Ibid at paras 9–10.

[4] Modderklip Squatters, Greater Benoni City Council v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, Amici Curiae); President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, Amici Curiae) 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA) at para 52.

[5] Modderklip CC (supra) at paras 43, 45.

[6] See, eg, Agenda 21 (1992), adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, available at http://www.un.org/esa/sustdev/documents/agenda21/english/agenda21toc.htm (accessed on 16 January 2006) at paras 7.6 and 7.9*(b)* and the Habitat Agenda (supra) at para 40*(n)*.

[7] GC 7 (supra) at para 3.

GC 7 also sets out the limited circumstances under which forced evictions are permissible and the conditions under which they may be carried out. First, the right to be protected against 'arbitrary or unlawful interference' with one's home is also given recognition in the ICCPR and is therefore not subject to the internal limitation 'available resources'.[1] This reading is consistent with the interpretation of FC s 26(3) adopted by the Constitutional Court in Jaftha.[2] Second, in order to give effective protection to the prohibition against forced eviction, States must enact legislation providing security of tenure and which control the circumstances in which evictions may be carried out.[3] Again, these requirements are largely satisfied by ESTA, PIE, the Interim Protection of Informal Land Rights Act and the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act. Third, GC 7 outlines a number of procedural and due-process measures which must be observed when undertaking a forced eviction. These measures include: (1) giving those affected adequate notice; (2) consulting with those affected prior to the evictions; (3) where possible, identifying alternative land or housing; (4) providing information on the evictions; (5) offering legal remedies and, where possible, legal aid to persons who need it; (6) clear identification of those carrying out eviction; (7) a requirement that eviction should not take place at night or in bad weather; and (8) the presence of government officials where a large group of people is to be evicted.[4]

Finally, GC 7 provides that evictions should not result in those evicted 'being rendered homeless or vulnerable to the violation of other rights' and that a State Party 'must take all appropriate measures, to the maximum of its available resources, to ensure that adequate alternative housing, resettlement or access to productive land, as the case may be, is available'.[5] The Constitutional Court has recently confirmed that the obligation under PIE to consider the availability of suitable alternative accommodation is 'not an inflexible requirement' and that a court may still grant an eviction order even where there is no alternative accommodation.[6] Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court has written that 'a court should be reluctant to grant an eviction against relatively settled occupiers unless it is satisfied that a reasonable alternative is available'.[7] Despite these caveats, the South African jurisprudence on evictions falls short of two ICESCR requirements: (1) that the State is obliged to provide alternative accommodation 'to the maximum of its available resources' and (2) that the State's obligation extends, not solely to 'relatively settled occupiers', but to all those facing eviction.

[1] See ICCPR art 17(1); GC 7 (supra) at para 8.
[2] Jaftha (supra) at para 31.
[3] GC 7 (supra) at para 9.
[4] Ibid at para 15.
[5] Ibid at para 16.
[6] See Port Elizabeth Municipality (supra) at para 28.
[7] Ibid.

55.7 CHILDREN'S RIGHT TO SHELTER[1]

There are two textual sources for children's right to shelter or housing: FC s 26 and FC s 28. FC s 28(1)(c) provides that every child has the right to basic shelter.

The High Court in Grootboom, relying on the precedent established by the Constitutional Court in Soobramoney, found that the respondents had 'produced clear evidence that a rational housing programme has been initiated at all levels of government and that such programme has been designed to solve a pressing problem in the context of the scarce financial resources'.[2] As such, the application based upon FC s 26 had to fail.

The High Court then considered the alternative claim based on FC s 28(1)(c) and found that, while the primary obligation to maintain and shelter children rests on their parents, when parents are unable to provide such shelter there is an obligation on the State to do so.[3] In coming to this conclusion, Davis J noted the textual difference between the two provisions and interpreted this textual difference as according a stronger right of shelter to children:

> Accordingly the question of budgetary limitations is not applicable to the determination of rights in terms of section 28(1)(c). . . . The right is conferred upon children. That right has not been made subject to a qualification of availability of financial resources.[4]

In making this finding, Davis J was quick to point out that this did not mean that the right would be enforceable on demand by all children. All claims would have to be evaluated on their individual merits and the merit of each claim would have to be assessed in terms of the Final Constitution as a whole.[5] For this reason, Davis J went on to hold that:

> A parsimonious interpretation of section 28(1)(c) which denied shelter to 276 infants as well as other children would be incongruent with a constitutional instrument which envisages the establishment of a society based on freedom, equality and dignity. To implement the right in this case so that shelter will be provided for the children in circumstances where they will be denied the psychological comfort and social support of their parents would be to permit the breakup of family life of a kind which the new Constitution is determined to prevent. In my view such a conclusion cannot be justified and hence the relief given must allow the parents to move with their children to the shelter provided to the latter as the bearers of such a right.[6]

[1] For a discussion of children's right to shelter, see A Friedman & A Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 47-6–47-14; S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-48–33-52. Since this topic is already considered in detail in these two chapters, the discussion in this chapter will not be lengthy.

[2] Grootboom v Oostenberg Municipality 2000 (3) SA 277, 286 (C)('Grootboom HC').

[3] Ibid at 288.

[4] Ibid at 291.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

FC s 28(1)(c), on Davis J's reading, means that children have an unconditional right to shelter. Whether this right is, in fact, enforceable against the State will depend on the circumstances of a given case. In this case, the parents of the applicant children were unable to provide shelter for them and therefore the children had a claim against the State. Moreover, since it was in the best interests of the children that they remain with their parents, the parents of the applicant children had a derivative right to shelter.

As already discussed, the Constitutional Court in Grootboom focused on FC ss 26(1) and (2). In so doing, it rejected the argument that FC s 28(1)(c) provides an unqualified socio-economic right to children to adequate shelter. In the view of the Constitutional Court, the High Court's reasoning 'produces an anomalous result':

> People who have children have a direct and enforceable right to housing [note the use of the word housing rather than shelter] under s 28(1)(c), while others who have none or whose children are adult are not entitled to housing under that section, no matter how old, disabled or otherwise deserving they may be. The carefully constructed constitutional scheme for progressive realisation of socio-economic rights would make little sense if it could be trumped in every case by the rights of children to get shelter from the State on demand. Moreover, there is an obvious danger. Children could become stepping stones to housing for their parents instead of being valued for who they are.[1]

There are five primary problems with the Grootboom Court's reasoning in this passage. First, the Court conflates shelter and housing, finding that there is no 'real distinction' between the two.[2] It contends that on the High Court's account, parents are accorded two overlapping rights — a right to housing, subject to available means and progressive realization, in FC s 26, and a right to housing on demand in FC s 28(1)(c). Yet the constitutional drafters clearly intended there to be a difference in meaning between shelter and housing — that intention is reflected in the difference in the language of FC s 26 and FC s 28(1)(c). Second, as Yacoob J himself points out, the Grootboom Court's reading undermines the construction for progressive realization in FC s 26 in a way that the High Court judgment does not. Third, the Grootboom Court's reasoning is based on an inexplicably narrow reading of FC s 28(1)(c). In consequence of the Court's decision, that provision must now be understood to apply only to children who are not in the care of their parents or immediate family. This reading is neither justified by the text nor is it consistent with the constitutionally entrenched 'best interests of the child' principle. Fourth, the Court focuses on the rights of the parents rather than the child, thereby subsuming children's rights under general socio-economic provisions. This subordination of children's rights is reflected in the Grootboom Court's conclusion that

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 71.
[2] Ibid at para 73.

> [t]he obligation created by s 28(1)(c) can properly be ascertained only in the context of the rights and, in particular, the obligations created by ss 25(5), 26 and 27 of the Constitution. . . . There is an evident overlap [in content] between the rights created by ss 26 and 27 and those conferred on children by s 28. Apart from this overlap, the s 26 and 27 rights are conferred on everyone including children while s 28, on its face, accords rights to children alone. This overlap is not consistent with the notion that s 28(1)(c) creates separate and independent rights for children and their parents.[1]

The Grootboom Court then purports to solve this 'problem' by reading FC s 28(1)(b) and (c) together. FC s 28(1) provides that: 'Every child has the right — . . . (b) to family care or parental care, or to appropriate alternative care when removed from the family environment; (c) to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services.' The Grootboom Court, reading these two sections together, concludes that 'appropriate alternative care' in FC s 28(1)(b) is what is outlined in FC s 28(1)(c). This reading means that when children are in the care of their families, they are entitled to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services from their parents, and it is only when they are not in family or parental care that they are entitled to these social goods from the State. Where children are in the care of their parents but their parents are unable to provide these social goods to their children, the children can have no claim against the State. Again, this reading is not justified by the text, and results in a watering down of children's rights. The conclusion is particularly disturbing in a country where a large proportion of parents cannot afford to provide adequate care for their children. This state of affairs cannot be in the best interests of children. This rather harsh position seems, however, to have been somewhat ameliorated in Treatment Action Campaign (TAC). In TAC, the Constitutional Court considered the relevance of FC s 28(1)(c) to the applicant's contention that it was unreasonable for the State to restrict the provision of Nevirapine to two pilot sites per province. The TAC Court found that its interpretation of FC s 28(1)(b) and (c) in Grootboom did not mean that the State had no obligation to care for children who were still in the care of their families. It held, to the contrary, that '[t]he State is obliged to ensure that children are accorded the protection contemplated by section 28 that arises when the implementation of the right to parental or family care is lacking.'[2] Although difficult to square this last line of reasoning with the interpretation placed by the Grootboom Court on FC s 28(1)(c), the TAC Court used FC s 28(1)(c) to bolster conclusions already reached under FC s 27.[3] Indeed, the TAC Court's analysis suggests, in a manner consistent with Grootboom, that the socio-economic rights articulated in FC s 26 and FC s 27 have priority over those socio-economic rights to found in FC s 28.

The final criticism of the Grootboom Court's reasoning on children's socio-economic rights is that the Court fails to appreciate that, according to the current housing subsidy scheme programme, only adults (over 21 years of age) can apply to benefit from low-cost housing. Children are therefore effectively denied housing under FC s 26 where they have no parent or guardian to provide housing on their behalf, and where they do not already have access to adequate housing. Child-headed households, which are increasing significantly in number as a result of the ravages of HIV/AIDS, are often not, in practice, under the care of the State, and are therefore not able to claim housing or shelter under either FC s 26 or FC s 28.

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 74.
[2] TAC (supra) at para 79 (footnotes omitted).
[3] Ibid at paras 74–79.

55.8 Prisoners' Right to Adequate Accommodation[1]

Section 35(2)(e) of the FC provides that every detained person has the right to 'conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least exercise and the provision, at state expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment'. Like the children's right to shelter in FC s 28(1)(c), prisoners' right to 'adequate accommodation' is not qualified by a provision equivalent to FC s 26(2). It may, of course, be limited under the general limitations clause in FC s 36.

The most striking aspect of this right is the seemingly carefully crafted wording of the right of prisoners to 'adequate accommodation'. The term 'adequate accommodation' must be contrasted with children's rights to 'shelter' and everyone's rights to 'access to adequate housing'. Clearly, the constitutional drafters intended to introduce a subtle distinction between these rights. A sensible heuristic framework would interpret a child's 'right to shelter' as merely affording protection against the elements, a prisoner's 'right to adequate accommodation' to permanent accommodation and access to services for the duration of imprisonment, and everyone's 'right to access to adequate housing' to actual housing, subject to the provisos of progressive realization and available resources.

To date, there has been no case law on prisoners' rights to adequate accommodation.[2] The High Court's decision on prisoners' rights to medical treatment in Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services, however, sheds some light on the meaning of 'adequate accommodation'.[3] Van Biljon concerned an application based on FC s 35(2)(e) for adequate medical treatment at State expense. The dispute turned on whether the applicants, who were HIV-positive and 'who [had] reached the symptomatic stage of the disease and whose CD4 counts [were]

[1] See D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 49-31 — 49-35.

[2] At the time of writing this chapter, there was, however, one case pending in the Cape High Court: Prison Care & Support Network & Another v Government of the Republic of South Africa (Case No 9188/05). This case was recently reportedly postponed sine die. See W Roelf 'Prison Overcrowding Case Postponed' available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=13&art_id=qw1145452143638B263 (accessed on 23 April 2006).

[3] Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C)('Van Biljon').

less than 500/ml,[1] were entitled to have prescribed and to receive at State expense appropriate anti-viral medication'. In deciding this matter, Brand J considered carefully the standard of 'adequate medical treatment' set by FC s 35(2)(e).[2] The respondents contended that the right in FC s 35(2)(e) means that detained persons are only entitled to the medical treatment that they would have received at provincial hospitals, had they not been incarcerated.[3] It was common cause that patients in provincial hospitals in the same position as the applicants would not be entitled to anti-retroviral drugs at State expense.[4] The respondents contended that the Court should not scrutinize provincial health policy regarding HIV-positive patients as this policy is 'dictated by budgetary considerations which is a matter of polycentric nature and, therefore, non-justiciable by this Court.'[5]

The applicants countered this argument by contending that the State could not rely on budgetary constraints as a legitimate reason to refuse adequate medical treatment.[6] The Van Biljon Court accepted this argument, but then went on to find that budgetary considerations were nevertheless relevant in determining what constitutes 'adequate medical treatment'. The Court reasoned as follows:

> In principle, I agree . . . that lack of funds cannot be an answer to a prisoner's constitutional claim to adequate medical treatment. Therefore, once it is established that anything less than a particular form of medical treatment would not be adequate, the prisoner has a constitutional right to that form of medical treatment and it would be no defence for the prison authorities that they cannot afford to provide that form of medical treatment. I do not, however, agree with the proposition that financial conditions or budgetary constraints are irrelevant in the present context. What is 'adequate medical treatment' cannot be determined in vacuo. In determining what is 'adequate', regard must be had to, inter alia, what the State can afford. If the prison authorities should, therefore, make out a case that as a result of budgetary constraints they cannot afford a particular form of medical treatment or that the provision of such medical treatment would place an unwarranted burden on the State, the Court may very well decide that the less effective medical treatment which is affordable to the State must in the circumstances be accepted as 'sufficient' or 'adequate medical treatment'.[7]

The Van Biljon Court then went on to find that the 'respondents did not make out a proper case that the medical treatment claimed by applicants [was]

[1] CD4 is a type of white blood cell or lymphocyte involved in fighting infection. The Centre for Disease Control measures the progression of the Human Immunodeficiency Viral (HIV) infection using a CD4 count since the further the disease has progressed, the lower the CD4 count and the less likely the patient is to be able to fight off infection.
[2] Van Biljon (supra) at para 41.
[3] Ibid at para 43.
[4] Ibid at para 44.
[5] Ibid at para 45.
[6] Ibid at para 48.
[7] Ibid at para 49 (footnote omitted).

unaffordable'[1] since the respondents only referred to the level of care available in provincial hospitals. The appropriate test was whether the Department of Correctional Services — and not the provincial hospitals via the Department of Health — could afford such services. Furthermore, the Court found the respondent's case flawed because it was based on a premise that the State did not owe a higher duty of care to those in detention. It suggested that the State may well have such a duty because prisoners who are kept in detention under existing conditions are made more vulnerable to opportunistic infections. For all these reasons, the Court ordered the respondents to supply the applicants with the anti-retroviral medication that had been prescribed for them, concluding as follows:

> Applicants have, therefore, established, in my view, that anti-viral therapy is at present the only prophylactic. The benefits of this treatment — in the form of extended life expectancy and enhanced quality of life — are such that this treatment must be provided for the unfortunate sufferers of HIV infection if at all affordable. As I have already stated, respondents have failed to make out a case that the Department of Correctional Services cannot afford to provide HIV infected prisoners in the stated category with the combination anti-viral therapy claimed by applicants. In these circumstances, I believe that the medical treatment claimed by applicants must be regarded as no more than the 'adequate medical treatment' to which they are entitled in terms of s 35(2)(e) of the Constitution. It follows that the failure to provide applicants with this treatment amounts to an infringement of applicants' constitutional rights.[2]

In short, the Van Biljon Court held that, since the State had failed properly to make out a case that it could not afford the medical treatment claimed by the applicants, budgetary considerations could not be taken into account in determining adequate medical treatment. If the State had made out such a case, the Court implied, its assessment of what constituted adequate medical treatment might have been different.

The reasoning in this judgment has been set out at length because it has a direct bearing on the more immediate question of what constitutes 'adequate accommodation' for prisoners. Thus, while budgetary considerations are relevant to the type and quality of accommodation which is provided to prisoners, lack of funding could not be used to justify the absence of accommodation to prisoners or accommodation which is inconsistent with their right, say, to dignity.[3]

A strong argument could be made that the current overcrowding in prisons undermines prisoners' right to dignity and, consequently, does not constitute adequate accommodation.[4] There are currently 238 operational public prisons in South Africa which were intended to accommodate 114 000 prisoners. As of

[1] Van Biljon (supra) at para 50.
[2] Ibid at para 60.
[3] For more on dignity, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.
[4] See Kalashnikov v Russia (2003) 36 EHRR 34 (European Court of Human Rights found that the overcrowding and poor conditions in Russian prisons amounted to degrading treatment in violation of the European Convention on Human Rights and awarded damages to the applicant.)

March 2004, these prisons were accommodating 187 640 prisoners. 53 876 were awaiting-trial.[1] On average, prisons are approximately 65 per cent overcrowded. The 10 most overcrowded prisons are, however, between 285 to 386 per cent over capacity. This situation is clearly intolerable and, as Justice Fagan notes in his 2004 report, amounts to an on-going breach of prisoners' rights to adequate accommodation.[2]

[1] See Judicial Inspectorate of Prisons Annual Report for the Period 1 April 2003 to 31 March 2004 available at http://judicialinsp.pwv.gov.za/Annualreports/2004a.pdf (accessed on 16 February 2006) 22. This figure was reduced in April and May 2005 by the release of certain prisoners and prisons are currently accommodating approximately 160 000 inmates. See MP Ntsobi Privatisation of Prisons and Prison Services in South Africa (Unpublished Masters thesis submitted to School of Government Faculty of Economic and Management Sciences University of the Western Cape, November 2005, on file with the author) 78.

[2] Judicial Inspectorate of Prisons Annual Report (supra) at 21.

56A Health

David Bilchitz

56A.1 Introduction 56A–1
56A.2 The right to health in the Final Constitution 56A–1
(a) A justiciable constitutional right to health: the black letter law 56A–1
(b) An explanation of some basic conceptual issues attending the right to have access to health-care services in FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–5
(i) Right to health and the right to a healthy environment 56A–5
(ii) Right to have access to health-care services and not a right to resources necessary for health. . . . 56A–5
(iii) The relationship between the right to have access to health-care services and other socio-economic rights in FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–5
(iv) The interdependence of rights. 56A–6
(v) The right to have access to health-care services and immediate benefits 56A–6
(vi) Progressive realization and available resources . . 56A–7
(aa) Progressive realization 56A–7
(bb) Available resources. 56A–8
(vii) The reasonableness approach 56A–11
(c) Beneficiaries of health-care rights as opposed to the ambit of the right: application not interpretation. 56A–13
(d) The relationship between internal and external limitations 56A–16
(e) FC s 27(3) 56A–17
(i) Summary of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3) 56A–17
(ii) Analysis of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3) 56A–17

56A.3 General critique of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–19
(a) The failure to integrate FC s 27(1) and (2). 56A–20
(b) Content of the right to health-care services 56A–21
(c) Reasonableness and its lack of content 56A–22
(d) Reasonableness and context 56A–23
(e) Separation of powers. 56A–24
(f) Remedies 56A–24
56A.4 A preferred reading of FC s 27 that draws on international law 56A–25
(a) Philosophical progression: a right to the conditions necessary for health rather than a right to be healthy . 56A–25
(b) A minimum core? 56A–28
(c) Conceptual issues relating to the minimum core and the right of access to health-care services. 56A–30
(i) The principled minimum core. 56A–31
(ii) A pragmatic minimum threshold. 56A–34
(d) The relationship between the minimum core and progressive realization of the right to health-care services 56A–35
(e) Providing normative content to the right to health-care services 56A–37
(f) Further issues relating to the scarcity of resources and the right to health care 56A–40
(i) Relationship between availability of resources and the right: content or limitation? 56A–40
(ii) The pool of available resources. 56A–42
56A.5 Health-care policy and the Final Constitution 56A–46
(a) Background 56A–46
(b) Themba's story: HIV/AIDS in the public health-care system 56A–46

Health care, food, water and social security

1. Everyone has the right to have access to—

(a) health care services, including reproductive health care;

(b) sufficient food and water; and

(c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance.

2. The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights.

3. No one may be refused emergency medical treatment.

56A.1 Introduction

The Final Constitution[1] is one of few in the world that contains a genuinely justiciable right to health.[2] This chapter offers a summary of the black letter law on the right to health in South Africa (§ 56A.2), a critique of the emerging jurisprudence (§ 56A.3), a preferred approach to the interpretation of the right that draws on international law (§ 56A.4), and an indication of the manner in which current South African health-care policy is failing to realize the right in practice (§ 56A.5).

56A.2 The Right to Health in the Final Constitution

(a) A justiciable constitutional right to health: the black letter law

The key principles enunciated in the general body of socio-economic rights jurisprudence[3] in South Africa may be summarized as follows:

* I would like to thank Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux and Michael Bishop for their astute comments and editorial wisdom. Their contributions have made writing this chapter a pleasure and have enabled me to improve its form significantly.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] See FC s 27(1)(a) and FC s 27(3). It is interesting to note that the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') did not enshrine any of the traditional socio-economic rights and thus there was no right to health expressly included in it. The only aspect of health protected within that Constitution was contained within the environmental right, which guaranteed each person the right to 'an environment which is not detrimental to his or her health or well-being' (IC s 29). Put slightly differently, the Interim Constitution guaranteed a right to a healthy environment — without any guarantee that one would be entitled to the resources or services necessary to stay healthy. For more on the right to a healthy environment, see M van der Linde & E Basson 'Environment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 50.

[3] The leading Constitutional Court cases are: Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney'); Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom'); Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign No. 2 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1023 (CC)('TAC'); Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Another 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa'). For comprehensive analysis of this body of jurisprudence, see D Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-Economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and Its Importance' (2001) 119 SALJ 484; D Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach to the Minimum Core: Laying the Foundations for Future Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 19 SAJHR 1; T Roux 'Legitimating Transformation: Political Resource Allocation in the South African Constitutional Court' (2003) 4 Democratization 10; S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33; S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 22; M Pieterse 'Towards a Useful Role for Section 36 of the Constitution in Social Rights Cases' (2003) 120 SALJ 41; M Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with the Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 383;

- Socio-economic rights do not, generally speaking, embrace an individual entitlement to the immediate provision of any services or resources.[1]
- These rights require the State to develop a systematic, comprehensive programme that is designed to realize these rights progressively within 'available resources'.[2]
- Whether the State has discharged its duty to realize progressively any particular socio-economic right will be evaluated by the courts in terms of the 'reasonableness' of the programme concerned.[3]
- The reasonableness enquiry does not depend on a closed list of criteria. Rather, the criteria will vary according to the context and circumstances of each case. Some of the criteria that have already been considered are that the programme: (1) must ensure that 'the appropriate financial and human resources are available'; (2) 'must be capable of facilitating the realisation of the right'; (3) must be reasonable 'both in its conception and its implementation'; (4) must be flexible; (5) must attend to 'crises'; (6) must not exclude 'a significant segment' of the affected population; and (7) must balance short, medium and long-term needs.[4]

These four principles can be traced through the following three cases.

In Soobramoney, a 41–year-old unemployed man from KwaZulu-Natal, in the final, terminal stages of chronic renal failure, had been denied access by provincial health authorities to regular renal dialysis treatment required to extend his life. He challenged their decision on the grounds that he was entitled, in terms of several

D Moellendorf 'Reasoning About Resources: Soobramoney and the Future of Socio-Economic Rights Claims' (1998) 14 SAJHR 327. For accounts that approve of the court's deferential approach, see CR Sunstein 'Social and Economic Rights? Lessons from South Africa' (2001) 11 Constitutional Forum 123 (Defending the Court's 'administrative law model of socio-economic rights'); M Wesson 'Grootboom and Beyond: Reassessing the Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence of the South African Constitutional Court' (2004) 20 SAJHR 284.

[1] See Soobramoney (supra) at paras 11 and 31, Grootboom (supra) at paras 93–94 and TAC (supra) at para 34.

[2] See Soobramoney (supra) at paras 28–31. See also R v Cambridge Health Authority, Ex Parte B [1995] 2 All ER 129, 137 (CA):

> I have no doubt that in a perfect world any treatment which a patient or a patient's family sought would be provided if doctors were willing to give it, no matter how much it cost, particularly when a life was potentially at stake. It would however, in my view, be shutting one's eyes to the real world if the Court were to proceed on the basis that we do live in such a world. It is common knowledge that health authorities of all kinds are constantly pressed to make ends meet. They cannot pay their nurses as much as they would like; they cannot provide the treatments they would like; they cannot purchase all the extremely expensive medical equipment they would like; they cannot carry out all the research they would like; they cannot build all the hospitals and specialist units they would like. Difficult and agonizing judgments have to be made as to how a limited budget is best allocated to the maximum advantage of the maximum number of patients.

[3] See Khosa (supra) at para 43:

> In determining reasonableness, context is all-important. There is no closed list of factors involved in the reasonableness enquiry and the relevance of various factors will be determined on a case by case basis depending on the particular facts and circumstances in question.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–46, 52, 53, 63–69, 74, 83. For a similar explication of the criteria that a court may employ in the health care context, see C Sprague & S Woolman 'Moral Luck: Exploiting South Africa's Policy Environment to Produce a Viable ARV Programme' paper presented at XVI International AIDS Conference (Toronto, 2006)(On file with author).

constitutional rights, including FC s 27(1)(a), to such care.[1] The Constitutional Court rejected his claims. It held that the obligations imposed on the State by FC s 27(1)(a) are dependent on the resources available for such purposes and that the rights themselves may be justifiably limited because of a lack of resources. With respect to the budgetary allocations at issue, the Court noted that there were many more patients who required renal dialysis than could be accommodated by the existing dialysis machines in the province. It wrote: 'This is a nationwide problem and resources are stretched in all renal clinics throughout the land.'[2] The Court then held that the guidelines that had been developed by the health authorities were fair and rational. They were aimed at benefiting the greatest number of patients possible and such benefits could be measured by the extent to which they saved or extended lives. Such benefits were limited in the case of a person — like Mr Soobramoney — in the terminal stages of illness. The Court reasoned that if everyone in a condition comparable to that of Mr Soobramoney were to be provided with renal dialysis, the existing provincial renal dialysis programme would collapse and no one would receive its benefits.[3] Moreover, the Court held, the State was under a duty to manage its limited resources in order to address all the basic claims made upon it: 'There will be times when this requires it to adopt an holistic approach to the larger needs of society rather than to focus on the specific needs of particular individuals within society.'[4] On this basis, it concluded that the failure to provide renal dialysis to those suffering from chronic renal failure did not represent a breach of the State's obligations in terms of FC s 27(1)(a). Mindful of the suffering caused by its rejection of Mr Soobramoney's complaint, the Court acknowledged the hardship worked on the applicant, his family and all those persons who might be similarly situated.[5]

In Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services; B & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others, four prisoners diagnosed as HIV positive sought orders

[1] I shall consider its decision concerning emergency medical treatment below at § 56A2*(e)*.

[2] Soobramoney (supra) at para 24.

[3] The Soobramoney Court found that if all those with chronic renal failure were to be treated > the cost of doing so would make substantial inroads into the health budget. And if this principle were to be applied to all patients claiming access to expensive medical treatment or expensive drugs, the health budget would have to be dramatically increased to the prejudice of other needs which the State has to meet.

Ibid at para 28. The provincial administration had to make difficult choices in fixing the health budget, and in deciding upon the priorities to be met. Chaskalson P held importantly that '[a] court will be slow to interfere with rational decisions taken in good faith by the political organs and medical authorities whose responsibility it is to deal with such matters'. Ibid at para 29.

[4] Ibid at para 31.

[5] The Court framed its difficult decision against the harsh realities of South African life:

> We live in a society in which there are great disparities in wealth. Millions of people are living in deplorable conditions and in great poverty. There is a high level of unemployment, inadequate social security, and many do not have access to clean water or to adequate health services. These conditions already existed when the Constitution was adopted and a commitment to address them, and to transform our society into one in which there will be human dignity, freedom and equality, lies at the heart of our new constitutional order. For as long as these conditions continue to exist that aspiration will have a hollow ring.

Ibid at para 8.

declaring that, under FC s 35(2)(e), they had the right to the provision, at state expense, of adequate medical treatment.[1] All four had CD4 counts of less than 400/ml. All four therefore satisfied generally accepted criteria for anti-retroviral treatment. Two of the prisoners had already been prescribed appropriate anti-retrovirals by medical practitioners. The other two prisoners had not had any anti-retroviral treatment prescribed by the State. The High Court held that the two prisoners who had been prescribed a combination of AZT and DDL by medical practitioners were entitled to provision of that cocktail at State expense, but that the two prisoners who had not as yet been prescribed either antiretroviral mono-therapy or antiretroviral combination therapy were not entitled to provision of any treatment at State expense. Although not decided under FC s 27, but under the provision for medical treatment of prisoners in FC s 35(2), Van Biljon stands for the proposition that socio-economic rights do not necessarily entitle individuals to specific remedies unless the State has already committed itself to the provision of specific benefits. Thus, in Van Biljon, only the first two applicants were provided with antiretroviral drugs because only the first two applicants could point to a legitimate expectation that the State would provide such treatment to them.

In TAC, the applicants took issue with the South African government's policy toward the provision of nevirapine, an antiretroviral drug that considerably reduces the likelihood of HIV transmission from mother to child at birth. Despite the fact that the manufacturers of nevirapine had offered to make the drug available to the South African government free of charge for a period of five years in order to reduce the risk of the vertical transmission of HIV, only a fraction of the hundreds of thousands of pregnant women infected with HIV had access to nevirapine at a small number of research and training sites throughout the country.[2] The Constitutional Court held that, in terms of FC s 27, the government's decision to confine nevirapine to a limited number of research and training sites was manifestly unreasonable.[3] The Court viewed the facts in TAC through the prism of the criteria developed in Grootboom and found that a comprehensive and coordinated programme of nevirapine could substantially reduce the risk of vertical transmission of HIV without placing a significant burden on the fiscus. It issued a mandamus that required the government to extend the provision of nevirapine beyond the current sites and ordered the government to provide the requisite testing and counselling services needed to make effective use of nevirapine.

[1] 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C)('Van Biljon').
[2] TAC (supra) at para 16.
[3] Ibid at para 47.

(b) An explanation of some basic conceptual issues attending the right to have access to health-care services in FC s 27

(i) Right to health and the right to a healthy environment

In international law, the right to health is a shorthand expression for a composite right with two elements: a right to health care and a right to healthy conditions.[1] The Final Constitution divides these two elements of the right between FC s 27(1)(a) (the right to have access to health-care services) and FC s 24*(a)* (the right to a healthy environment). When a health-related dispute arises, the first step is to determine the Final Constitution provision under which to pursue the matter.

(ii) Right to have access to health-care services and not a right to resources necessary for health

The formulation of the right in FC s 27(1)(a) is fairly narrow: it only provides for a right to have access to health care services; it does not provide for the general resources necessary to preserve and to maintain health. It is possible to adopt an expansive interpretation of 'services' to include such resources. Alternatively, it is possible to understand that the resources necessary to maintain health are specified in some of the other socio-economic rights provisions, including the right to have access to adequate housing (FC s 26(1)), the right to have access to sufficient food and water (FC s 27(1)(b)), and the right to have access to social security (FC s 27(1)(c)).

(iii) The relationship between the right to have access to health-care services and other socio-economic rights in FC s 27

The right to have access to health care services appears together with the right to have access to sufficient food and water, and the right to have access to social security. In addition, FC s 27(3) confers a right to emergency medical treatment. The question thus arises as to what connects all these elements of FC s 27? Are they completely disparate rights, or is there some reason for their inclusion in one section of the Final Constitution? It is possible to read FC s 27(1)(a), (b) and (c) disjunctively as separate rights completely disconnected from one another. However, this does not explain why the drafters decided to include them together in one section. It is submitted that the purpose for doing so was to indicate the interrelated nature of these rights. It would be meaningless to have access to health-care services where one lacks sufficient food and water. Social security in turn allows people to access sufficient food and water, and universal public health care is a form of social security. In fact, the narrow formulation of the right to [1] See § 56A.4 infra, concerning the development of the right at international law. See also P Hunt Reclaiming Social Rights: International and Comparative Perspectives (1996) 111; DM Chirwa 'The Right to Health in International Law: Its Implications for the Obligations of State and Non-state Actors in Ensuring Access to Essential Medicine' (2003) 19 SAJHR 541, 545.

health-care services may be broadened through its inclusion in a provision dealing with rights to particular resources. The failure to include a right to specific resources in FC s 27(1)(a) can thus be said to be remedied by the structure of FC s 27.[1]

(iv) The interdependence of rights

The structure of FC s 27 indicates that the right to have access to health-care services cannot be considered in isolation from other rights, and that the links and interdependencies between this right and other rights need to be explored. The UN Committee responsible for interpreting the right to health has recognized these interdependencies through widening the ambit of the right to include such elements as nutrition, clean water and sanitation.[2] The Final Constitution likewise makes it clear that an integrated understanding of health care will be required when interpreting FC s 27.

(v) The right to have access to health-care services and immediate benefits

In Soobramoney, the Constitutional Court expressly refused to adopt an understanding of the right to health-care services that would require the State to provide individuals with any immediate benefits. Instead, the majority construed the right in light of the broader needs of society:

> The State has to manage its limited resources in order to address all these claims. There will be times when this requires it to adopt an holistic approach to the larger needs of society rather than to focus on the specific needs of particular individuals within society.[3]

The Court adopted a similar position in Grootboom. It held that the positive obligations imposed on the State by FC s 26(1) and (2) do not entitle individuals to claim housing or shelter on demand.[4] Rather, they require the State to develop a comprehensive and workable plan to meet its obligations.[5] In TAC, too, the Court declined to recognize an approach to socio-economic rights that could be 'construed as entitling everyone to demand that the minimum core be provided to them'.[6] Rather, the Court held, the State is required to 'take reasonable measures

[1] On the relationship between the various rights in FC s 27, see D Brand 'Introduction to FC s 27' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 56.

[2] See United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('UNCESCR') General Comment No 14 'The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health' (Article 12 of the Convention)(22nd Session, 2000) UN Doc. E/C. 12/2000/4 available at www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf (accessed on 28 January 2006) at para 4. See A Kok & M Langford 'Water' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 56B.

[3] Soobramoney (supra) at para 31. See S Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobramoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise' (2000) 16 SAJHR 206 (Arguing that the Soobramoney decision was in part driven by utilitarian considerations).

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 95.

[5] See Grootboom (supra) at para 38.

[6] TAC (supra) at para 34.

progressively to eliminate or reduce the large areas of severe deprivation that afflict our society'.[1]

(vi) Progressive realization and available resources

The general approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution is outlined in Grootboom. Yacoob J, writing on behalf of the Court, held that 'the real question in terms of our Constitution is whether the measures taken by the State to realise the right afforded by s 26 are reasonable'.[2] Reasonable measures require the establishment and implementation by the State of a coherent, well co-ordinated and comprehensive programme directed towards the progressive realization of the right of access to adequate housing. Essentially, the Court has found that FC s 26(2) (and its cognate provision, FC s 27(2)) embrace three significant and distinct internal limitations on the rights articulated in FC s 26(1) and FC s 27(1): first, the measures must be reasonable (the factors involved in assessing reasonableness will be summarized below); secondly, the rights have to be realized progressively; and, finally, the measures that are adopted must be within the available resources of the State. I will consider each of the last two limitations in turn.

(aa) Progressive Realization

The Court has had little to say about progressive realization.[3] The only clear dictum on this facet of the socio-economic rights provisions has been in Grootboom. There the Court held that this term indicates that socio-economic rights need not be realized immediately. Nevertheless, 'the goal of the Constitution is that the basic needs of all in our society be effectively met and the requirement of progressive realisation means that the State must take steps to achieve this goal.'[4] This goal, in turn, requires that 'accessibility should be progressively facilitated: legal, administrative, operational and financial hurdles should be examined and, where possible, lowered over time.'[5] In the end, according to the Court, housing must not only be made more accessible to a larger number of people, it must be made available to a wider range of people as time progresses.

Lastly, the Court refers to the origins of the phrase 'progressive realisation' in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR').[6] It then quotes the analysis of this notion by the UNCESCR with approval, arguing that the meaning of the phrase in our Final Constitution is the same as

[1] TAC (supra) at para 36. See further S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at § 33.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 33.

[3] Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33-41–33-44.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 45.

[5] Ibid.

[6] (1966) UN Doc. A/6316, 993 UNTS 3 (signed but not yet ratified by South Africa), available at http://www.unhchr.ch/html/menu3/b/a_cescr.htm (accessed on 28 January 2006).

that it bears in the ICESCR. The Committee refers to the notion of progressive realization, as a 'necessary flexibility device, reflecting the realities of the world and the difficulties involved in ensuring full realisation of economic, social and cultural rights'. The phrase must not be seen to deprive the obligations on State parties of content but imposes an obligation to move as 'expeditiously and effectively as possible towards that goal'. Moreover, 'any deliberately retrogressive measures would require the most careful consideration and would need to be fully justified by reference to the totality of the rights provided for in the Covenant and in the context of the full use of the maximum available resources'.[1]

The Court's analysis of progressive realization is problematic and deficient. It imposes a duty on the State to take steps towards the achievement of socio-economic rights: but what steps should be taken? When are the steps insufficient? The Court says that obstacles to the realization of these rights need to be lowered over time. But what are the implications of this statement? For instance, where a statute lowers the obstacles to housing for some by making it simple to acquire a home loan, it has in one sense lowered the barriers for some to gain access to housing. But what about those who cannot afford the loan? This measure in no way improves their access to housing. Are State obligations only the facilitative ones of removing obstacles or does the State need to take active steps towards fulfilling these rights?

(bb) Available resources

Soobramoney was decided largely on the basis of the scarcity of resources. Chaskalson P held that the obligations imposed on the State by FC ss 26 and 27 are dependent on the resources available for such purposes and the rights themselves are limited because of a lack of resources. In relation to current budgetary allocations, there were many more patients than could be accommodated by the existing dialysis machines.[2] The Court held that the guidelines that had been developed were fair and rational: they were aimed at benefiting the most patients and directed towards the curing of patients. On the other hand, if everyone in the condition of Mr Soobramoney were to be provided with dialysis, the current programme would collapse and no one would benefit.

The Court emphasized this last point: if Mr Soobramoney were to be provided with dialysis, then others in a similar position would also have to be treated. That would prove very costly. The Court took note of the KwaZulu-Natal provincial Department of Health's budget and the significant overspending of the department in the year 1996–1997.[1] It found that if all those with chronic renal failure were to be treated > the cost of doing so would make substantial inroads into the health budget. And if this principle were to be applied to all patients claiming access to expensive medical treatment or expensive drugs, the health budget would have to be dramatically increased to the prejudice of other needs which the State has to meet.[2]

[1] See UNESCR General Comment No 3 'The Nature of States Parties Obligations' (Article 2(1) of the Convention)(5th Session, 1990) UN Doc. E/1991/23 at para 9, available at http://www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf (accessed on 28 January 2006)('GC 3').

[2] Soobramoney (supra) at at para 24.

Chaskalson P noted that '[a] court will be slow to interfere with rational decisions taken in good faith by the political organs and medical authorities whose responsibility it is to deal with such matters'.[3] The Court then held that the State is required to manage its limited resources in order to address all the basic claims upon it. Chaskalson P concluded on this basis that the failure to provide renal dialysis to those suffering from chronic renal failure did not represent a breach of the State's obligations in terms of FC s 27.

Curiously, in Soobramoney, the majority did not engage with the internal limitation in FC s 27(2). Instead, it seemed to rule purely in terms of FC s 27(1)(a) that the very content of the right did not embrace a right to renal dialysis where there is a scarcity of resources.[4] This approach would seem to do away with the need to have an internal limitation clause in FC s 27(2).

[1] In that year, there had been overspending of R152 million, and in the year of the decision overspending was likely to reach R700 million. See Soobramoney (supra) at para 24.

[2] Ibid at para 28.

[3] Soobramoney (supra) at para 29.

[4] There appear to be conflicting dicta in this regard. The dominant approach appears to be expressed in Soobramoney. See Soobramoney (supra) at para 11. Chaskalson P writes: 'what is apparent from these provisions is that the obligations imposed on the State by ss 26 and 27 in regard to access to housing, health care, food, water and social security are dependent upon the resources available for such purposes, and that the corresponding rights themselves are limited by reason of the lack of resources.' The Court's statement here suggests that the availability of resources must be considered in defining the very content of the right itself. In a separate judgment, Sachs J specifically endorses adapting traditional rights analyses to take account of the problem of scarcity and competing interests. He holds that, '[w]hen rights by their very nature are shared and inter-dependent, striking appropriate balances between equally valid entitlements or expectations of a multitude of claimants should not be seen as imposing limits on those rights (which would then have to be justified in terms of s 36), but as defining the circumstances in which the rights may most fairly and effectively be enjoyed'. Ibid at para 54. In Grootboom the Court held that FC '[s]ection 26 does not expect more of the state than is achievable within its available resources' and in so doing suggested that the content of the right itself was determined by the availability of resources. Grootboom (supra) at para 46. The approach of the Court in TAC comes close to viewing socio-economic rights as providing a right to reasonable government action. Since the reasonableness of government action must be determined by having regard to the resources which are available, the content of the right is partially determined by the resources that are available. To that end, Madala J in Soobramoney writes that 'the guarantees of the Constitution are not absolute but may be limited in one way or another. One of the limiting factors to the attainment of the Constitution's guarantees is that of limited or scarce resources.' Ibid at para 43. But there is a subtle difference of emphasis here. Madala J seems to construe constitutional rights as having a content determined prior to a consideration of the availability of resources. The scarcity of resources represents a limitation on the ability to fulfil a constitutional Grootboom addressed the issue of availability of resources only briefly and in the context of the internal limitation in FC s 26(2). Yacoob J held that 'both the content of the obligation in relation to the rate at which it is achieved as well as the reasonableness of the measures employed to achieve the result are governed by the availability of resources.'[1] The decision itself did not have to address whether there were sufficient resources available for housing: it merely held that the government had to allocate a reasonable proportion of the housing budget to providing relief for those in desperate need.

In Khosa, the Court held that it would not simply accept a statement by the State that it could not afford to extend benefits to a group to which it had not previously catered. The criterion according to which any exclusion occurs must be consistent with the purposes of the Bill of Rights and must not amount to unlawful discrimination or create a serious impact upon dignity.[2] The information concerning the actual cost of extending benefits to permanent residents was sketchy and was estimated to be between R243 million and R672 million.[3] It is interesting to note that the Court was prepared to use this speculative estimate to conclude that the actual cost of extending benefits to permanent residents would only be a small proportion of the total expenditure on grants.

These decisions suggest that the Court has not given extensive thought to what is meant by the notion of 'available resources'. The following is a fair summary of the Court's approach towards this criterion thus far: firstly, the Court will focus its enquiry upon the current allocations within a particular department that is directed towards the realization of a particular right; secondly, the Court will be more ready to order reallocations within existing budgets rather than require an increased budget in a particular area; and finally, the Court will not readily accept a defence that there is a lack of available resources where the exclusion of individuals or groups from a government programme constitutes unlawful discrimination or a serious invasion of dignity.[4] guarantee. The majority judgment in Soobramoney can also be interpreted as suggesting that socio-economic rights confer entitlements that go beyond what the government can at present be required to provide: '[g]iven this lack of resources and the significant demands on them that have already been referred to, an unqualified obligation to meet these needs would not presently be capable of being fulfilled.' Soobramoney (supra) at para 11 (my emphasis). In Grootboom, the Court claims that available resources only qualify the content of the obligation in relation to 'the rate at which it is achieved as well as the reasonableness of the measures employed to achieve the result.' Ibid at para 46. This, too, could provide support for the contention that the entitlements conferred by the Final Constitution are to be determined separately from a consideration of the availability of resources.

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 46.

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 45.

[3] Ibid at para 62.

[4] Further important features of the 'availability of resources' limitation that have not been adequately dealt with by the Court are discussed at § 56A.4 infra.

(vii) The reasonableness approach

General understanding of reasonableness

Soobramoney represents the first decision the Constitutional Court had to make in relation to socio-economic rights. The decision was difficult and had tragic results: Mr Soobramoney died within four days of the judgment. The statements of the Court in this decision must be viewed in light of the Court's cautious approach to novel doctrinal questions. For instance, the Court stated that it would interfere with State decisions relating to budgets only where they are irrational. This standard of review appears to have been revised in more recent decisions. The Court has held that State programmes should be evaluated for their reasonableness rather than their rationality.[1]

Grootboom was the first major decision to develop the reasonableness approach. Its use in this context is partially reminiscent of its use in administrative law.[2] For example, Hoexter writes that the notion of reasonableness is designed to refer to that which lies within the 'limits of reason' and allows for a legitimate diversity of views. What is reasonable is not only that which is correct but refers to decisions that lie in between correctness and capriciousness. A reasonable decision is one that is supported by reasons and evidence, rationally connected to a purpose, and is objectively capable of furthering that purpose. A reasonable decision generally also tends to reflect proportionality between ends and means, and between benefits and detriments.[3] The notion of reasonableness is thus designed to allow for the substantive judicial review of decisions by another branch of government, whilst granting the original decision-making body a margin of appreciation.

This standard conforms to the separation of powers doctrine, and the idea that the body that has been mandated to make a decision or has the greatest institutional competence to do so may choose between a number of measures that fall within the range of the reasonable. In the context of socio-economic rights, reasonableness allows the legislature and executive a margin of appreciation in deciding on the measures that need to be taken. Thus, in response to doubts about the institutional competence of courts in making judgments on socio-economic rights,[4] or the legitimacy of judicial decision-making in this

[1] See, for example, T Roux 'Legitimating Transformation: Political Resource Allocation in the South African Constitutional Court' (2003) 4 Democratization 10, 97 (Discussing the different standards of review adopted by the Court in socio-economic rights matters.)

[2] Sunstein terms the court's approach the 'administrative law model of socio-economic rights'. See CR Sunstein 'Social and Economic Rights? Lessons from South Africa' (2001) 11 Constitutional Forum 123. But see M Wesson 'Grootboom and Beyond: Reassessing the Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence of the South African Constitutional Court' (2004) 20 SAJHR 284 (Critiques Sunstein's model.)

[3] C Hoexter 'The Future of Judicial Review in South African Administrative Law' (2000) 117 SALJ 484, 509–13. See also HWR Wade & CF Forsyth Administrative Law (2000); M Elliott 'The Human Rights Act and the Standard of Substantive Review' (2001) 60 CLJ 301.

[4] See, eg, E Mureinik 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries' 1992 (8) SAJHR 464.

arena,[1] the Constitutional Court has crafted a doctrine of reasonableness that allows it to demonstrate appropriate deference to the legislature and executive.

Reasonableness is also a notion familiar from the limitations analysis in FC s 36.[2] In this context it involves a proportionality analysis investigating the importance of the ends involved, the relationships between means and ends and the use of the least restrictive means to further those ends. From the dicta of the courts, however, it does not appear that reasonableness in the context of socio-economic rights replicates the notion that appears in administrative law, nor does it map exactly onto the notion of reasonableness used in the limitations analysis. Rather, it is something in between that can only be understood by considering its specific features.

Specific features of reasonableness

The most extensive discussion of reasonableness takes place in Grootboom. However, TAC and Khosa each add to our understanding of what is involved in this test. The list below reflects an attempt to systematize some of the thinking of the Constitutional Court on this issue:

(1) A reasonable programme must allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government.
(2) It must ensure that the appropriate financial and human resources are available.
(3) The programme must be capable of facilitating the realization of the right in question.
(4) A wide range of possible measures can be reasonable. The question is not whether other measures are more desirable or favourable. (This criterion seems to indicate a difference between reasonableness in the context of socio-economic rights and reasonableness in relation to the limitations clause; the limitation clause requires that the measures adopted be the least restrictive means of violating a right and realising an important social purpose.)[3]
(5) The measures must be reasonable 'both in their conception and their implementation'.
(6) A reasonable programme must be balanced and flexible.
(7) A reasonable programme must attend to 'crises': a reasonable programme must 'respond to the urgent needs of those in desperate situations'.
(8) A reasonable programme must not exclude 'a significant segment' of the affected population.
(9) A reasonable programme must balance short, medium and long-term needs.[4]

[1] See, for instance, D Davis 'The Case Against the Inclusion of Socio-Economic Demands in a Bill of Rights Except as Directive Principles' (1992) 8 SAJHR 475.
[2] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 34.
[3] See Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 34.7.
[4] Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–46, 52, 53, 63–69, 74, 83.

(10) A reasonable programme does not render the best the enemy of the good: it is not necessary to design the ideal programme prior to its initial implementation. For instance, in TAC, waiting for the best programme to be developed for a protracted period of time before deciding to extend the use of nevirapine beyond the research sites was not reasonable given the benefits that could be achieved by rolling out the drug in the interim.[1]

(11) A reasonable programme will not discriminate unlawfully between persons on grounds which can have a serious impact upon dignity.[2]

(c) Beneficiaries of health-care rights as opposed to the ambit of the right: application not interpretation

The approach outlined thus far concerns the content of health-care rights; this does not, however, answer the question as to who is entitled to such rights. The recent case of Khosa dealt with this question. It concerned a number of Mozambican citizens ('the applicants') who had acquired the status of permanent residents in South Africa after living in the country since 1980. All of these people were destitute and thus would have been entitled to pension grants as well as other social assistance grants — such as child-support grants — but for the fact that they were not South African citizens.[3] The applicants challenged the constitutionality of prevailing legislation (the Social Assistance Act 59 of 1992) that limited social assistance grants to South African citizens. They argued that FC s 27 guaranteed the right to social security to 'everyone'. Because 'Everyone', they argued, included permanent residents, the legislation excluding this group was unconstitutional.

After confirming the approach towards the content of rights in Grootboom and TAC, Mokgoro J, writing for the majority, went on to consider the ambit of the right to have access to social security. The Court reasoned that certain rights such as political rights (FC s 19) and the right to have access to land have been expressly limited to citizens (FC s 25(5)). However, FC s 27 does not contain such a modification — it applies to 'everyone'. Since there was no indication that FC s 27 was limited only to citizens, Mokgoro J held that the word 'everyone' could not be construed as referring only to citizens.[4]

The Court then curiously applies its 'reasonableness' approach — that was developed in the context of providing normative content to socio-economic rights — to the question of scope.[5] It asks whether the exclusion of permanent

[1] TAC (supra) at para 81.
[2] Khosa (supra) at para 68.
[3] Ibid at paras 3–4.
[4] Ibid at para 47.
[5] There appears to be a conflation here of two separate questions: the question of scope and the question of content. This matter cannot, however, be addressed in detail here. Iles argues that the difference determines whether the Court should have decided the case under the internal limitations clause or the general limitations clause. See K Iles 'Limiting Socio-Economic Rights: Beyond the Internal Limitations Clauses' (2004) 20 SAJHR 448.

residents from having access to social assistance grants is reasonable. In reaching a conclusion on this matter the Court considers a number of factors. First, it considers the purpose of providing social security to those in need. The reason for the inclusion of a right to social security was because 'as a society we value human beings and want to ensure that people are afforded their basic needs.'[1] Such a purpose included within its ambit the needs of non-citizens. Secondly, there were no good grounds for differentiating between citizens and permanent residents in relation to social assistance benefits. Permanent residents have made South Africa their home and, like citizens, have lived in the country legally for a considerable length of time. In most respects, permanent residents also have similar obligations to citizens; it thus seems unclear why they should not achieve similar benefits.[2] On the evidence, the inclusion of permanent residents would not seem to place an inordinate burden on the state.[3] The impact, however, of the exclusion of permanent residents forces them into relationships of dependency with families, friends and communities. For them, Mokgoro J writes, 'the denial of the right is total and the consequences of the denial are grave. They are relegated to the margins of society and are deprived of what may be essential to enable them to enjoy other rights vested in them under the Constitution.'[4] In light of these considerations, the Court reaches the conclusion that insufficient reasons exist for the invasive treatment of the rights of permanent residents and that consequently, 'the exclusion of permanent residents is inconsistent with section 27 of the Constitution'.[5] In light of this, the Court orders that the words 'or permanent residents' be read into the legislation (after the citizenship requirement) so as to allow for benefits to be allocated to permanent residents.

Although Khosa dealt with social assistance benefits, it is likely that its reasoning will be applicable to the rest of FC s 27. FC s 27 was said to involve the protection of the basic needs of people within South Africa. The protection of the health of permanent residents falls clearly within the ambit of this purpose and thus it is likely that permanent residents will have the same rights as citizens in connection with health care.

The fact that the Court indicates that there is a universalist justification for these rights could, however, form the basis of an extension of such rights to all people within the borders of South Africa, including illegal immigrants and temporary residents. The court in Khosa did not discuss this issue in detail but indicated that, given the tenuous nature of the links such individuals have to the country, there may be a justification for denying them social assistance benefits. In relation to illegal immigrants, it would make no sense for the law to regard their very presence as illegal, but to be able to use that presence to secure a legal entitlement to social assistance benefits. In relation to temporary residents,

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 52.
[2] Ibid at para 59.
[3] Ibid at paras 60–62.
[4] Ibid at para 77.
[5] Ibid at para 85.

matters are not so simple. Temporary residents often become permanent residents and legally reside in the country. If they become destitute whilst in the country, it is unclear why the temporary nature of their stay should in any way diminish their entitlement to assistance. If the criterion upon which benefits is distributed is one of need and dignity, then the automatic exclusion of temporary residents does not appear to be clearly justifiable.

This reasoning applies a fortiori in the case of health care, and, in particular, health care for those suffering from acute conditions. Whilst social assistance benefits may be said to be linked to permanence and one's contribution to a community, health care is a requirement of all who fall within the borders of a country. Anyone anywhere can become ill at any time. To allow someone to die or suffer merely because they are temporarily or even illegally resident in a country runs counter to basic universalist principles of political morality.[1] Many societies, such as those in Europe, provide medical assistance for anyone who falls upon hard times within their countries. This is not dependent on their status in the country (for example, as a tourist). Common humanity and solidarity dictate that a sick person should be treated irrespective of who they are or why they are in a country.[2] At international law, this principle extends to the obligation on an army to treat the wounded enemy soldiers it captures.[3] Thus, in the case of access to health-care services (even if not in the case of social assistance grants), the judgment in Khosa should be extended to all persons within South Africa irrespective of their status.[4]

[1] The basis of this duty may lie in need or simply human vulnerability. See, for example, RE Goodin 'Vulnerabilities and Responsibilities: An Ethical Defence of the Welfare State' in G Brock (ed) Necessary Goods (1998).

[2] Where a person suffers from a chronic condition or one that requires medical treatment over a long period, it may be argued that this kind of care is similar to a social benefit and that the same legal regime should apply: treatment of such conditions should only be available to those with more permanent connections to the political community concerned. Tourists and illegal immigrants may well not qualify for such treatment.

[3] Article 3(2) of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (1950) 75 UNTS 135 (ratified by South Africa on 31 March 1952). The same is true of prisoners, for whom society often has little sympathy. See the discussion in § 56A.2*(a)* of Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services. 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C).

[4] The question of scope also includes the question of our duties to non-human animals. Animals under human control may well have a right to medical treatment from those within whose care and control they fall. A right to such treatment might be implied from the duty to avoid cruelty and neglect in the Animal Protection Act 71 of 1962. It could also be argued that the term 'everyone' in FC s 27(1) should include non-human animals to the extent that they are capable of having these rights attributed to them. At present, it is generally accepted that the rights in the Bill of Rights are only applicable to natural persons (and, in some cases, to juristic persons). See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3. At this stage in our legal development, only human beings have been recognized as constituting natural persons. In my view, animals are capable of bearing rights, and our law should develop to recognize such rights. For some writing on this question, see P Singer Animal Liberation (2nd Edition, 1995); T Regan The Case for Animal Rights (1988); S Wise Rattling the Cage: Towards Legal Rights for Animals (2001).

(d) The relationship between internal and external limitations

Khosa also considered but did not decide some difficult questions relating to the limitation of socio-economic rights, in particular, the relationship between the internal limitation clause in each socio-economic right (FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2)) and the general limitation clause in FC s 36. After raising this question, both the majority and the minority declined to decide it.[1]

Though this matter cannot be engaged at length here, it is unlikely that the indeterminate notion of reasonableness can be shown to bear an inherently different meaning in these two contexts.[2] It would also be extremely confusing for these notions to bear entirely different meanings. However, some guidance can be given as to the distinction between these two enquiries by considering the differing functions of the internal limitation and the general limitations clause. The internal limitation is focused on a particular right: in this context, the right to have access to adequate health-care services. The enquiry requires us to consider whether, in the context of this particular right, and the competing priorities in relation to this particular right, the measures taken by the State are reasonable.[3]

FC s 36 involves a more global enquiry. It requires us to situate the right to have access to health-care services and the measures adopted by the State against a background of others rights and interests that people possess. It allows for the consideration of legitimate government purposes other than those relating to the particular right that has been limited, and requires consideration of a measure's impact on society beyond the sphere of health care.

In standard Bill of Rights analysis, we are required to focus first on a particular context — of health care for instance — and to consider the interests at stake in this context and the measures that the State is required to adopt to alleviate suffering in this area. Policies and decisions can be adopted in this context that may address the problems relating to health care or fail to do so. TAC is an example of a case where there was no need for a wider enquiry: the State failed to adopt a reasonable (or even rational) policy relating to the health care of individuals, and there were virtually no ramifications for other policy areas because of the negligible costs of rolling out a drug that had been offered to the State free of charge. The failure to adopt a comprehensive programme for rolling out the drug was therefore patently unreasonable.

[1] Khosa (supra) at paras 83–84 and 105–106.

[2] For alternative constructions of the relationship between FC s 36 and socio-economic rights, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 34; S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-54–33-56; P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights? Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 3 SAJHR 67, 79–80; M Pieterse 'Towards a Useful Role for Section 36 of the Constitution in Social Rights Cases' (2003) 120 SALJ 41–48 (Pieterse 'Towards a Useful Role'); Iles (supra) at 455–57.

[3] See Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 36.6.

As an abstract matter, however, the existence of the FC s 36 enquiry suggests that a consideration of the health care context alone may not be enough. There may well be legitimate governmental purposes unrelated to health care that could justify a limitation of an FC s 27 right in terms of FC s 36 that could not be limited in terms of FC s 27(2).[1]

(e) FC s 27(3)

(i) Summary of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3)

FC s 27(3) provides that no one may be refused emergency medical treatment. The question as to what constitutes emergency medical treatment arose in Soobramoney. In this instance, the Court could not avoid giving content to the right since its ambit was unclear. The Court held that emergency medical treatment is to be provided in the following cases:

- There must be a sudden or unexpected event or catastrophe.[2]
- This event must be of a passing nature and not be continuous.[3]
- The event must lead to a person requiring medical attention or treatment.[4]
- To the extent such treatment is necessary and available, it must be provided.[5]

(ii) Analysis of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3)

In Soobramoney, counsel for the applicant contended that people who suffer from terminal illnesses and require treatment such as renal dialysis to prolong their life are entitled to such treatment by the State in terms of FC s 27(3).[6] Chaskalson P held, on behalf of the majority, that there were several reasons against extending the phrase 'emergency medical treatment' to include ongoing treatment for chronic illnesses for the purpose of prolonging life. First, this was not the ordinary meaning of the term and, 'if this had been the purpose which s 27(3) was intended to serve, one would have expected that to have been expressed in positive and specific terms'.[7] Secondly, if FC s 27(3) were to be construed in this broad manner, it would make it substantially more difficult for the State to fulfil its primary obligations under FC ss 27(1) and (2) to provide health care services to 'everyone' within its available resources. Thirdly, it would entail the prioritizing of the treatment of terminal illnesses over other forms of medical care and would reduce the resources available to the State for purposes such as preventative health care and medical treatment for persons suffering from illnesses or bodily infirmities which are not life threatening. Again, Chaskalson P states,

[1] See Woolman & Botha (supra) at § 36.6.
[2] Soobramoney (supra) at para 18–20, 38, 51.
[3] Ibid at para 21, 38.
[4] Ibid at para 18.
[5] Ibid at para 20.
[6] Ibid at para 12.
[7] Ibid at para 13.

'for such a conclusion to be reached, clearer language would have to be used than occurs in s 27(3).'[1]

Moreover, the Court holds that FC s 27(3) itself is couched in negative terms: it is a right not to be refused emergency treatment. This means, according to the Court, that the purpose of the right seems to be to ensure that treatment be given in an emergency, and is not frustrated by reason of bureaucratic requirements or other formalities. Chaskalson P also suggests that, in light of our history, this provision is designed to prevent, for instance, the refusal to grant emergency treatment on grounds of race.[2] Thus, the content of the section is to ensure that > a person who suffers a sudden catastrophe which calls for immediate medical attention should not be refused ambulance or other emergency services which are available and should not be turned away from a hospital which is able to provide the necessary treatment. What the section requires is that remedial treatment that is necessary and available be given immediately to avert that harm.[3]

Since Mr Soobramoney suffered from a chronic condition and required dialysis treatment two to three times a week, his condition did not fall within the ambit of an emergency. His incurable condition was an ongoing state of affairs resulting from a deterioration of his renal function. Consequently, FC s 27 (3) did not apply to such facts. Madala J, in his separate judgment, agreed with Chaskalson P that FC s 27(3) envisaged a > dramatic, sudden situation or event which is of a passing nature in terms of time. There is some suddenness and at times even an element of unexpectedness in the concept 'emergency medical treatment.'[4]

Sachs J tied the purpose of FC s 27(3) to the particular > sense of shock to our notions of human solidarity occasioned by the turning away from hospital of people battered and bleeding or of those who fall victim to sudden and unexpected collapse. It provides reassurance to all members of society that accident and emergency departments will be available to deal with the unforeseeable catastrophes which could befall any person, anywhere and at any time.[5]

He held further that the values protected by FC s 27(3) would be undermined rather than reinforced by any unwarranted conflation of emergency and non-emergency treatment.[6]

One of the important consequences of this judgment is that no one who satisfies the court's criteria can be refused treatment. In light of the split between private and public health care in South Africa, FC s 27(3) arguably places an obligation on private health-care providers to offer emergency medical treatment to individuals even if the people who are brought to these hospitals lack health insurance.

---

[1] Soobramoney (supra) at para 19.

[2] FC s 9 outlaws such conduct and it is thus unclear why there would need to be a specific clause to guard against this evil.

[3] Soobramoney (supra) at para 20.

[4] Ibid at para 38.

[5] Ibid at para 52.

[6] Ibid.

The Court clearly had to restrict the scope of FC s 27(3) for fear of supplanting the right in FC s 27(1)(a).[1] On the other hand, the negative formulation of the right is confusing: if no one may be refused treatment, must they, as a necessary corollary, be provided with it? The formulation suggests that the State merely has a duty not to interfere, but it is unclear how one can fail to refuse treatment without providing it. The supposedly negative formulation thus seems to imply that there are in fact positive obligations on the State. FC s 27(3) could, in addition, be developed to impose a positive duty on private health-care providers to offer emergency services where they have facilities and services available.[2]

However, the Court did not in fact indicate the extent to which the State is required to take measures to ensure that people are provided with emergency treatment.[3] For instance, most cities in South Africa have a chronic shortage of ambulances. In remote areas, helicopters would be necessary to ensure people have access to emergency medical treatment. In order to notify authorities about an emergency, some form of communication system is necessary. Is the State required to ensure that telephones are placed in all areas in the country to enable citizens to have access to emergency medical treatment? Is the State required to have adequate ambulance facilities and provide helicopters for inaccessible areas? These questions still need to be determined. It is quite clear, however, that without some of these measures, FC s 27(3) will be meaningless for many people in this country.

56A.3 General Critique of the Constitutional Court's Approach to FC s 27

This brings to an end the discussion of the various facets of the right to health-care services in FC s 27.[4] The main approach adopted by the Constitutional

[1] See Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33–21 (Agrees with this line of analysis when she states that the 'restriction of the scope of the right to genuine medical emergencies seems appropriate'.) Scott and Alston, however, argue that the Court's interpretation of FC s 27(3) renders the right virtually redundant in light of the fact that its content surely falls within any minimal understanding of FC s 27(1). S Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobramoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise' (2000) 16 SAJHR 206, 247.

[2] Scott and Alston further suggest this as a possible manner in which to avoid rendering the right in FC s 27(3) redundant. See Scott & Alston (supra) at 248. For more on the possible horizontal application of socio-economic rights, see also Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33-57–33-59; Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4.

[3] See Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of West Bengal (1996) AIR SC 2426 (Indian Supreme Court required positive measures to be taken to ensure emergency medical facilities were available.) See also Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33–21.

[4] The Final Constitution contains specific guarantees of health care for children and prisoners. The focus of this chapter has been on the right in FC s 27(1), which is a right to which 'everyone' is entitled. The special vulnerability of children may require the State to take special measures to protect their health. In the case of prisoners, the fact that their imprisonment deprives them of resources to gain access to medical treatment imposes a duty on the State to provide them with these resources. It has been held that Court has been to focus on the notion of 'reasonableness'. The Court's 'reasonableness approach' has attracted a number of important academic critiques.[1] The primary problem raised is that the vague notion of reasonableness fails to provide adequate content to socio-economic rights. I shall now elaborate on a few of these critiques.

(a) The failure to integrate FC s 27(1) and (2)

In TAC the Court held that FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) require the State to take 'reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of this right'. The reference to 'this right', it claimed, is clearly aimed at the FC ss 26(1) and 27(1) rights. This wording, together with the inclusion of these subsections within the same overall section of the Bill of Rights, provides evidence that the two subsections are linked and meant to be read together. The Court reasoned that this defeated the approach of the amici curiae who contended that the Final Constitution conferred on each person two distinct causes of action: one under FC ss 26(2) and 27(2), and another under FC ss 26(1) and 27(1) read with FC s 7(2).

From a purely formal point of view, the Court's approach seems to offer the more natural construction of the relationship between FC ss 27(1) and (2). Yet, the Court's argument still raises interpretative difficulties.[2] The Court is clearly eager to emphasize that the rights referred to in FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) are the same rights referred to in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1) respectively.[3] This argument implies that the reasonable measures that the State adopts must be assessed in relation to whether or not they are aimed at the progressive realization of the rights expressed in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1). If so, then an enquiry into the reasonableness of the measures adopted by the State must also involve an enquiry into the content of the rights contained in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1). The problem with the Court's approach in TAC is that it fails to provide an analysis of what the the State has a higher duty of care towards prisoners than towards free persons for the following two reasons: first, they are solely dependent on the State for treatment and cannot use any of their own income to obtain treatment unlike free persons; secondly, the conditions in the prisons often render individuals peculiarly susceptible to illness. These principles are discussed in Van Biljon.

[1] See D Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-Economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and Its Importance' (2001) 119 SALJ 48; D Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach to the Minimum Core: Laying the Foundations for Future Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 19 SAJHR 1; Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33-38–33-41; S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 22; Pieterse 'Towards a Useful Role' (supra); M Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with the Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 383 (Pieterse 'Judicial Enforcement').

[2] See Scott & Alston (supra) at 249 (Argue that already in Soobramoney, the Court shows that it has not applied its mind to the precise role of FC s 27(1) and (2).)

[3] TAC (supra) at para 30.

right to have access to health-care services involves. What are the services to which one is entitled to claim access? Do these services involve preventative medicine, such as immunizations, or treatment for existing diseases, or both? Does the right entitle one to primary, secondary, or tertiary health care services, or all of these?[1] The enquiry concerning the reasonableness of the measures adopted by government cannot be conducted in a vacuum and requires that some content be given to the right to which these measures are designed to give effect.

(b) Content of the right to health-care services

As will be discussed in § 56A.4 below, the normative content of the right to health has been analysed by the UNCESCR in its General Comment 14,[2] and by a number of writers.[3] No doubt the task of specifying the content of this right is a difficult matter, and the Court should not attempt to provide in one case a final and exhaustive definition of what is included therein. That said, TAC could have provided greater specification of the obligations imposed by the right.

For instance, the Final Constitution requires that when interpreting rights, a court must consider international law.[4] Thus, the right in TAC could have been interpreted in light of the ICESCR, which provides specifically in article 12(2)(a) that there be provision for the 'reduction of the still-birth rate and of infant mortality and for the healthy development of the child'. The UNCECSR has interpreted this article as requiring State parties to adopt measures designed to improve child and maternal health, and to extend sexual and reproductive health services. Recognizing such an obligation to provide the services necessary for healthy child development could have provided the basis for the decision to require the government to make nevirapine available beyond the research sites.

Similarly, an argument could have been made to determine the content of FC s 27(1)(a) in accordance with article 12(2)(c) of the ICESCR, which provides for the 'prevention, treatment and control of epidemic, endemic, occupational and other diseases'. The UNCECSR has interpreted this article to require the provision of urgent medical care in cases of epidemics.[5] The TAC Court could have

[1] I do not suggest that the Court was required to answer all these questions, but that it was obliged to provide some analysis of the right in order to reach the conclusion that it did: that access to nevirapine fell within the entitlements conferred upon people by FC s 27(1)(a).

[2] UNCESCR General Comment No 14 'The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health' (Article 12 of the Convention)(22nd Session, 2000) UN Doc. E/C. 12/2000/4 available at www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf (accessed on 28 January 2006)('GC 14').

[3] See, for instance, P Hunt Reclaiming Social Rights: International and Comparative Perspectives (1996); B Toebes The Right to Health as Human Right in International Law (1999); A Chapman 'Core Obligations Related to the Right to Health' in D Brand & S Russell (eds) Exploring the Core Content of Socio-Economic Rights: South African and International Perspectives (2002).

[4] FC s 39(1)(b).

[5] GC 14 (supra) at para 16.

reached its decision by recognizing that FC s 27(1)(a) imposed at least this obligation on the State.

Some of the judges seem to have shown a willingness in New Clicks to provide some normative content to the right in FC s 27(1).[1] Ngcobo J, for instance, made the important statement that 'the right to health care services includes the right of access to medicines that are affordable. The state has an obligation to promote access to medicines that are affordable'.[2] This would involve the imposition of specific obligations upon the State: New Clicks however, turned on issues of administrative law rather than on FC s 27(1).

In sum, the Court has approached socio-economic rights cases by asserting that the test in terms of the Final Constitution is whether the measures adopted by the government are reasonable. This approach fails to integrate FC ss 27(2) and 27(1): it focuses the entire enquiry on FC s 27(2) without providing a role for FC s 27(1). Yet, FC s 27(1) is, in fact, the primary statement of the right, and the Final Constitution directs us to evaluate the reasonableness of government policy in relation to an understanding of what the right in question demands of the State.

(c) Reasonableness and its lack of content

This structural point is mirrored by a further complaint against the reasonableness approach. By focusing on the notion of 'reasonableness' the Court has demonstrated that it will scrutinize the government's policy and conduct for its ability to meet this standard of justification. This development ties in with a prominent argument for constitutionalism: that it resists a culture in which authority is to be respected for its own sake and promotes an environment in which all decisions of those in positions of authority, even those of the legislature, must be justified.[3] An emphasis on justification, in turn, has certain salutary effects on laws and policies: it requires a high degree of accountability and thus provides incentives for public servants to consider carefully their reasons for making decisions, thus helping to expose any weaknesses.[4]

The distinctive role of rights, however, is not simply to draw attention to a failure in the justification of government policy. It is a particular type of failure that we are concerned with: a failure to address adequately certain vital interests. One of the main theoretical defects of this approach to adjudicating socio-economic rights is the failure to place the fundamental interests of individuals at the centre of its enquiry. Instead, the Court has attempted to focus the enquiry on [1] Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks SA (Pty) Ltd & Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Innovative Medicines SA as Aminci Curiae) 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 514. For a brief discussion of this case, see § 56A.4*(e)* infra.

[2] Ibid at para 514.

[3] See E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31.

[4] See E Mureinik 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries' (1992) 8 SAJHR 464.

more abstract and procedural concerns that can tend to obscure the vulnerabilities of individuals.

But it is difficult to find adequate reasons for including socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution without recognizing that they are designed to protect the fundamental interests of individuals in having access to such essential goods as housing, food, water and health care. Thus, the roots of the reasonableness approach do not clearly correlate with the intention behind including socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution.

(d) Reasonableness and context

What is considered reasonable will vary in large measure with the circumstances being evaluated.[1] However, even this approach requires the articulation of some general standards that can be used to appraise State action in a variety of contexts. Otherwise, the enquiry into reasonableness would be empty. For instance, in Grootboom, it was stated that a government programme that was reasonable must be balanced and flexible. That general standard can then be applied to a variety of cases to see whether the programme or policy in question is in fact balanced and flexible.[2]

A contextual determination of reasonableness thus presupposes certain a-contextual standards that guide our appraisal in different contexts. If we analyse what is required by the reasonableness approach more closely, it involves evaluating the justifiability of the links between policies that are adopted and ends that are constitutionally endorsed. It becomes evident in this context that the very contextual sensitivity of reasonableness rests on the fact that different circumstances allow for different conclusions concerning these linkages. However, in any such enquiry, it must be possible to specify the ends that are being aimed at in a way that is general and not specifically related to the particular context. Thus, the very benefits of the reasonableness approach rest upon our ability to identify general ends against which government policy must be evaluated. In this context, those ends are provided by the rights in FC ss 26 and 27. An approach that rejects the need to determine the content of these rights is empty.

[1] The Court seems to recognize this point in TAC. See TAC (supra) at para 24.

[2] It is unclear whether the Court has correctly identified flexibility as being 'reasonable' in all circumstances. In Soobramoney, the government's a policy of rationing the provision of health-care resources was fairly inflexible, yet it seemed reasonable in light of the desire to use the available resources in the best possible manner. The Court's analysis demonstrates the difficulty of giving content to such a vague notion as reasonableness.

(e) Separation of powers

The formalism of the Court's current approach means that 'reasonableness' stands for whatever the Court regards as desirable features of government policy. The problem with such an approach is that it lacks a principled basis upon which to found decisions in socio-economic rights cases. Without clear guidance as to the role of the courts in these cases, the Constitutional Court and other courts may overstep their legitimate role in this area by ruling on matters that should be left to other branches of government. They may also fail to intervene when they should, and their orders may lack practical efficacy.[1] At the same time the Court's amorphous standards fail to provide guidance to other branches of the State concerning the content of these rights and the duties they impose.[2]

(f) Remedies

The vagueness of the Constitutional Court's reasonableness approach is reflected in its orders. In Grootboom, the Court merely made a declaratory order, which has been largely ineffective.[3] In TAC, the Court went further and issued a mandatory order requiring the government to make nevirapine available beyond the dedicated research sites it had identified. However, the Court declined to exercise supervisory jurisdiction over the implementation of its order. This deference occurred in the context of a government policy that had singularly failed to deal with the HIV/AIDS crisis in South Africa, and a government that was reluctant to roll out nevirapine. This lack of a structural injunction led to delays in the rolling out of the drug in a number of provinces, a situation that, arguably, could have been avoided if the Court had opted for a more intrusive remedy.[4] Numerous academics have criticized the TAC Court for its order in this case and have called for more effective remedies to be implemented in future cases. The types of remedy suggested include mandatory orders, structural interdicts (which involve the courts in ongoing supervision to ensure that their orders are implemented) and constitutional damages.[5]

[1] See Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach' (supra) at 10.

[2] Pieterse 'Judicial Enforcement' (supra) at 407 (States that the 'interpretative task should be viewed as courts assisting other branches of government to establish the precise content of their obligations rather than as an antagonistic mandate from the judiciary to the legislature and executive.')

[3] See K Pillay 'Implementing Grootboom: Supervision Needed' (2002) 3(1) ESR Review 13–14; K Pillay 'Implementation of Grootboom: Implications for the Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2003) 6 Law, Democracy and Development 255; M Swart 'Left out in the Cold? Crafting Constitutional Remedies for the Poorest of the Poor' (2005) 21 SAJHR 215, 215–16.

[4] See Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach' (supra) at 23–24; Swart (supra) at 223.

[5] See on the issue of creating more effective remedies, W Trengove 'Judicial Remedies for Violations of Socio-economic Rights' (1999) 1(4) ESR Review 8; Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach' (supra); Pieterse 'Judicial Enforcement' (supra); J Klaaren 'A Remedial Interpretation of the Treatment Action Campaign Case' (2003) 19 SAJHR 460; K Roach & G Budlender 'South African Law on Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction' (2005) 122 SALJ 325; and Swart (supra) at 215.

56A.4 A Preferred Reading of FC S 27 that Draws on International Law

In § 56A.3, I argued that there are numerous weaknesses in the Constitutional Court's current approach to the right to have access to health-care services. This section sets out a preferred approach to this right that draws on some of the developments in international law concerning the right to health. It involves a discussion of the minimum core approach to the right, amplifies to the notion of progressive realization and develops a better understanding of the term 'available resources'.

(a) Philosophical progression: a right to the conditions necessary for health rather than a right to be healthy

Explicit discussions of the right to health at the international law level are of a relatively recent vintage. They can be traced to the Russian Revolution of 1917,[1] the serious economic misery of the Great Depression, and the horrors of the Second World War and the Holocaust.[2] Prior to this, health care for the sick was largely seen as the responsibility of private actors and civil society institutions, such as churches and charities.[3] Little thought was given to the exact nature of a State's responsibility for the health of its citizens.[4]

The early formulations of the right to health within human rights documents situate it within the general basic welfare rights of the individual. The first explicit mention of the right to health within an international human rights instrument is in article 25(1) of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights:

> Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.[5]

[1] See E de Wet The Constitutional Enforceability of Economic and Social Rights (1996) 1–15 (Traces the turning point in the struggle for socio-economic rights to the Russian Revolution of 1917.)

[2] See Chapman (supra) at 39; B Toebes 'The Right to Health' in A Eide, C Krause & A Rosas (eds) Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (2001) 169, 171; and DM Chirwa 'The Right to Health in International Law: Its Implications for the Obligations of State and Non-state Actors in Ensuring Access to Essential Medicine (2003) 19 SAJHR 541, 543–44.

[3] See Chirwa (supra) at 543.

[4] One could trace this entitlement back to many of the early philosophical treatises that provided the foundation for rights discourse. For instance, the individual's basic interest in self-preservation in the theories of Thomas Hobbes and John Locke provide a very early basis for recognizing a fundamental individual right to health care. See T Hobbes Leviathan (1651, Penguin Classics Edition 1985) 192 and J Locke Two Treatises of Government (1690, Cambridge University Press Edition 1988) 271. Such a right can also be traced to political documents that represent the first major advances in the recognition of fundamental rights. See the French Declaration of the Rights of Man; the United States' Declaration of Independence; T Paine Rights of Man (1791).

[5] Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) GA res. 217A (III), UN Doc A/810 available at http://www.un.org/rights/50/decla.htm (accessed on 28 January 2006).

Health was thus seen as different from medical care and related to 'a right to an adequate standard of living, which included other basic needs'.[1] This formulation points to the wider role of health in the lives of human beings (and indeed other sentient creatures). Being in a state of health is a basic condition for the functioning of a human being: it is the state in which people can realize their purposes and goals and to be free from a range of unpleasant phenomenal experiences that hinder the enjoyment of life. Health would be what John Rawls terms a 'natural primary good': goods that are 'necessary conditions for realizing the powers of moral personality and are all-purpose means for a sufficiently wide range of final ends'.[2] It is a natural primary good as opposed to a social primary good because health cannot be completely guaranteed by any society.

This last point is important in understanding the evolution of the right to health at international law. One of the very first formulations of the right occurs in the Constitution of the World Health Organisation ('WHO').[3] The preamble recognizes that 'the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.' Health is understood in this document as 'a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.'[4] Again, we see that health is understood in relation to general well-being. However, although health is often connected to this wider notion, conceptualizing the right to health in this manner was a recipe not only for theoretical confusion but also practical inaction.

A right entitles a human being to a certain good and allows for a claim to be made for this good against another party. The problem with conceptualising the right to health in this way is that no one can guarantee any other person that they will be in such a state of physical and mental well-being. Many of the factors affecting health lie within the province of the individual herself: smoking, for instance, can ruin a person's health, but this is generally an individual choice. The individual cannot ask anyone else to guarantee that she does not smoke: she must make that choice herself. Moreover, the actual state of health is not something that can be guaranteed by a society or even individuals themselves. Whilst one can limit the health risks one is exposed to, even fit young people at times naturally develop debilitating diseases. A right to health conceptualized in this manner seems to go against the basic facts of nature.[5]

[1] See Hunt (supra) at 113, quoting H Fuenzalida-Puelma & S Scholle Connor (eds) The Right to Health in the Americas (1989) 601.

[2] J Rawls 'Social Unity and Primary Goods' in S Freeman (ed) John Rawls: Collected Papers (1999) 367.

[3] World Health Organization ('WHO') Constitution (1946), available at http://www.opbw.org/int_inst/health_docs/who-constitution.pdf (accessed on 28 January 2006).

[4] Ibid at preamble.

[5] There have been many critiques of a right to health conceptualized in this way. See, for instance, V Leary 'The Right to Health in International Human Rights Law' 1994 (1) Health and Human Rights 24, 28; Hunt (supra) at 111; Chapman (supra) at 39; and Chirwa (supra) at 545.

Since there can be no right to be healthy, philosophical analysis shows that the right to health must mean something different. It must relate to that which can in fact be guaranteed to individuals by third parties: certain resources and conditions that are necessary for a person to be healthy. To maintain health and bodily functioning, certain goods are necessary. For instance, it is crucial that people are provided with food adequate to meet the nutritional requirements of a human being. Here, it is interesting to note, that one cannot just be provided with that level of food necessary to be free from threats to one's survival. Such a level of provision may well keep one alive but still undernourished. A person who is undernourished, however, will be hindered in the pursuit of a wide range of purposes. As such, if we wish to protect the conditions necessary to pursue diverse purposes,[1] we must make sure that people are not undernourished and constantly hungry. In such an instance, the food must be sufficient that human beings have the energy and vitality necessary to pursue a range of purposes. The level of food required does not entail that individuals share a basic interest in such luxuries as ice cream and caviar. However, it does mean that individuals have a basic interest in well-balanced nutritional food that enables them to be healthy and physically vigorous, thus being capable of realizing a wide range of purposes.

Similar remarks could be made in relation to human beings about having access to housing, clothing and medical care. Such goods all concern the resources and conditions that must be obtained if individuals are to be in conditions such that they are able to realize a wide range of purposes. Law can affect the ability of individuals to access these resources and conditions such that they are able to function optimally. A right to health ought to entail a right to have access to the resources and conditions necessary for human beings to function in a state of health. The right to health at international law embodies this understanding of the right. It goes beyond a right to health care services such as doctors and medicines,[2] and encompasses the right not to be exposed to dangerous conditions that threaten one's health through, for example, environmental pollution and degradation, or occupational safety hazards. The right to health thus becomes a shorthand expression with two components: a right to health care and a right to healthy conditions.[3] As has been mentioned, these two components are split in the Final Constitution.

[1] This argument assumes that the pursuit of diverse purposes is an important value for human beings. Such an account will be defended in my forthcoming book, D Bilchitz Combating Poverty through Human Rights: The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (forthcoming, 2007). Similar accounts of value are provided by A Gewirth Reason and Morality (1978) and J Raz The Morality of Freedom (1986).

[2] The General Comment on the Right to Health ('GC 14') begins by recognizing that the right to the highest attainable standard of health is not a right to be healthy: it is a right 'to the enjoyment of a variety of facilities, goods, services and conditions necessary for the realization of the highest attainable standard of health'. GC 14 (supra) at para 9. The Committee goes on to interpret the right to health as extending not only to timely and appropriate health care but also to the underlying determinants of health. These include 'access to safe and potable water and adequate sanitation; an adequate supply of safe food, nutrition and housing, healthy occupational and environmental conditions, and access to health-related education and information, including on sexual and reproductive health.' Ibid at para 11.

[3] Hunt (supra) at 111; Chirwa (supra) at 545. For an extensive discussion of the right to health at international law, see B Toebes The Right to Health as Human Right in International Law (1999) 245.

(b) A minimum core?

Despite, or because of, the diverse developments in a range of regional and international instruments, the exact content of the right to health remained unclear. Apart from the work of the World Health Organisation the rights possessed little content and were largely unenforceable. The Constitutional Court's approach thus far suffers from similar defects.

To cure this defect at international law, the UNCESCR drafted General Comment 14 on the Right to Health. The aim of this General Comment was to give greater content to the right to health contained in the ICESCR.[1] The UNCESCR had previously adopted what may be termed the 'minimum core approach' to socio-economic rights in GC 3. GC 3 outlines the general principles that govern the obligations of State parties to the ICESCR.[2] GC 3 states that a 'minimum core obligation to ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels

[1] The most important statement of the right to health at international law is in the ICESCR. Whilst there remains a right to an adequate standard of living in article 11, this is separated from the right to health enshrined in article 12. It reads as follows: '(1) The State Parties to the present Covenant recognize the right of everyone to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health. (2) The steps to be taken by the State Parties to the present Covenant to achieve the full realization of this right shall include those necessary for: (a) the provision for the reduction of the still-birth rate and of infant mortality and for the healthy development of the child; (b) the improvement of all aspects of environmental and industrial hygiene; (c) the prevention, treatment and control of epidemic, endemic, occupational and other disease; (d) the creation of conditions which would assure to all medical service and medical attention in the event of sickness.' The ICESCR is available at http://www.unhchr.ch/html/menu3/b/a_cescr.htm (accessed on 28 January 2006). Numerous other international instruments contain a right to health. Perhaps the clearest and most explicit expression of such a right is contained in article 24 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) 1577 UNTS 3, UN Doc. A/RES/44/25 (ratified by South Africa on 16 July 1995) available at http://www.unhchr.ch/html/menu3/b/k2crc.htm (accessed on 28 January 2006). Since this relates specifically to children, it will not be dealt with in depth in this chapter, which deals with provisions of a more universal applicability. For more on children's rights and entitlements, see A Pantazis & A Friedman 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 48. The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination ('CERD') prohibits racial discrimination in the provision of health care and provides that health care must be provided on a basis of equality (1969) 660 UNTS 195 (ratified by South Africa on 10 December 1998). The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ('CEDAW') obligates states to ensure that discrimination in relation to health care is eliminated and that the provision of health-care services takes place on a basis of equality between men and women. (1981) UN Doc A/34/46 (ratified by South Africa on 13 December 1995). Particular provisions impose health-care obligations to provide adequate health care to women in connection with all matters relating to pregnancy. A range of regional instruments contains provisions concerning the right to health. These instruments include the European Social Charter as well as the Additional Protocol to the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Of particular relevance to South Africa is the fact that the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights contains a guarantee in article 14(1) of a general right to 'enjoy the best attainable state of physical and mental health'. It places an obligation on state parties to take the necessary measures to 'protect the health of their people and to ensure that they receive medical attention when they are sick'. The African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child contains provisions similar to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. It recognizes health as a human right and provides a list of particular measures that the state must take in fulfilling these rights.

[2] See UNESCR General Comment No 3 'The Nature of States Parties Obligations' (Article 2(1) of the Convention)(5th Session, 1990) UN Doc. E/1991/23, available at www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf (accessed on 28 January 2006)('GC 3').

of each of the rights is incumbent upon every State party'.[1] A State party in which any significant number of individuals is deprived of essential foodstuffs, primary health care, shelter and housing is in prima facie breach of its obligations. The UNCESCR went on to qualify this statement by recognizing that such an obligation must be considered in light of the resource constraints faced by a country. It concluded: '[i]n order for a State party to be able to attribute its failure to meet at least its minimum core obligations to a lack of available resources, it must demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations.'[2]

General Comment 14 ('GC 14') amplifies the content of this minimum core obligation in the context of the right to health. GC 14, as guided by the Alma-Ata Declaration,[3] lays out the content of these core obligations as follows:

- To ensure the right of access to health facilities, goods and services on a non-discriminatory basis, especially for vulnerable or marginalized groups;
- To ensure access to the minimum essential food which is nutritionally adequate and safe, to ensure freedom from hunger to everyone;
- To ensure access to basic shelter, housing and sanitation, and an adequate supply of safe and potable water;
- To provide essential drugs, as from time to time defined under the WHO Action Programme on Essential Drugs;
- To ensure equitable distribution of all health facilities, goods and services;
- To adopt and implement a national public health strategy and plan of action, on the basis of epidemiological evidence, addressing the health concerns of the whole population; the strategy and plan of action shall be devised, and periodically reviewed, on the basis of a participatory and transparent process; they shall include methods, such as right to health indicators and benchmarks, by which progress can be closely monitored; the process by which the strategy and plan of action are devised, as well as their content, shall give particular attention to all vulnerable or marginalized groups.

[1] GC 3 (supra) at para 10.
[2] Ibid.
[3] A most important development in understanding what is entailed by the right to health took place at an International Health Conference held at Alma-Ata. Delegates came up with a declaration that stressed the notion of primary health care: a notion that focuses upon the importance of preventing and treating illness at the community level. The idea here was that the problem in the world was not simply a shortage of health resources but a misallocation: instead of focusing all medical resources in urban areas with a very specialized, high-level and curative focus, there was a need to distribute such services more evenly and focus on the prevention of illness. After this conference, several indicators were developed which could help measure the level of primary health-care access in countries around the world. This strategy has had an impact on the right to health in international law and, as is explained in the text above, has come to form part of the minimum core obligations imposed by this right upon all State parties to the Covenant.

It also recognizes what it terms obligations of comparable priority. These obligations include the following:

- To ensure reproductive, maternal (pre-natal as well as post-natal) and child health care;
- To provide immunization against the major infectious diseases occurring in the community;
- To take measures to prevent, treat and control epidemic and endemic diseases;
- To provide education and access to information concerning the main health problems in the community, including methods of preventing and controlling them;
- To provide appropriate training for health personnel, including education on health and human rights.[1]

(c) Conceptual issues relating to the minimum core and the right of access to health-care services

The right to health care raises a number of complex questions about the notion of a minimum core.[2] Dealing with these questions involves recognizing that this concept serves several purposes. In this section, I shall attempt to disentangle some of these strands of thought.

First, it is important to consider the reasons for the introduction of this notion by the UNCESCR. In General Comment 3, the Committee provides two fairly rather opaque rationales: first, it mentions that it became necessary to recognize a

[1] GC 14 (supra) at paras 43–4.

[2] The Constitutional Court has declined to follow the minimum core approach adopted at international law, regarding the minimum core as possibly only being relevant to reasonableness rather than providing independent content to the right. Nevertheless, it is arguable that a number of its underlying reasons for reaching the conclusions it does rest upon notions that implicitly invoke the idea of a minimum core. See Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-Economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and Its Importance' (2001) 119 SALJ 48 (Bilchitz 'Giving Rights Teeth') 497–99. The notion may also over time come to play a more important role in socio-economic rights jurisprudence both here and abroad. Moreover, most academics who have written on socio-economic rights in South Africa have been in favour of adopting a minimum core approach towards socio-economic rights. A non-exhausting list of writers in favour of adopting some variety of this notion, see C Scott & P Macklem 'Constitutional Ropes of Sand or Justiciable Guarantees? Social Rights in a New South African Constitution' (1992) 141 Univ of Pennsylvania LR 1, 77; S Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights' in M Chaskalson, J Klaaren, J Kentridge, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 41–43; P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights: Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 67, 97; G van Bueren 'Alleviating Poverty through the Constitutional Court' (1999) 15 SAJHR 52, 57; S Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobramoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise' (2000) 16 SAJHR 206, 250; T Roux 'Understanding Grootboom — A Response to Cass R. Sunstein' (2002) 12 Constitutional Forum 41, 50; and D Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach to the Minimum Core: Layng the Foundations for Future Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 19 SAJHR 1 ('Towards a Reasonable Approach'). For some arguments against this approach see E de Wet The Constitutional Enforceability of Economic and Social Rights (1996) 96 and M Wesson 'Grootboom and Beyond: Reassessing the Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence of the South African Constitutional Court' (2004) 20 SAJHR 284.

minimum core obligation as a result of its experience in examining the reports of States concerning their compliance with the Covenant; secondly, it makes the following claim: '[i]f the Covenant were to be read in such a way as not to establish such a minimum core obligation, it would be largely deprived of its raison d'etre.'[1]

The first reason fails to explain adequately the problems that the Committee had experienced and why recognition of a minimum core obligation would serve to rectify such difficulties. Presumably, these were practical difficulties relating to the development of normative standards against which to measure State compliance. One central reason for a minimum core is the ability to develop at least minimal benchmarks against which to evaluate state action.

The second reason provided by the Committee is incomplete: it requires an understanding of the purposes behind the Covenant and an explanation as to why recognition of a minimum core obligation is necessary to realize these purposes. As a result, the motivation for introducing a minimum core obligation into the discussions concerning socio-economic rights does not appear clear from the statements in the General Comment. That has allowed for different understandings of the purpose of a minimum core. A reconstruction of the reasons for such an approach is necessary in order to understand why it is of importance to the enforcement of socio-economic rights.[2]

Although a detailed reconstruction of these reasons cannot be provided here,[3] it is enough to note that the General Comment conflates two ways in which the minimum core can be understood. While both of these notions are of importance to the content and enforcement of social rights, they need to be distinguished conceptually.

(i) The principled minimum core

The first notion is what may be termed the 'principled minimum core'. Essentially, this notion relates to the statement by the UNCESCR that the minimum core describes 'minimum essential levels of the right'. The minimum core here refers to the minimum basic resources that are necessary to allow individuals to survive and achieve a minimal level of well-being. The minimum core does not encompass the resources necessary to live a decent life or a dignified life in a community, but rather the basic resources that allow people to move beyond starvation, thirst and homelessness.

[1] GC 3 (supra) at para 10.

[2] I cannot, for reasons of length, investigate all the reasons that have been offered for a minimum core approach, and instead provide here my own limited understanding.

[3] I have dealt with this subject elsewhere. See Bilchitz 'Giving Rights Teeth' and Bilchitz 'Towards a Reasonable Approach'. I engage it at greater length in my forthcoming book, Combating Poverty through Human Rights, The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (forthcoming, 2007).

However, in the context of health care, the specification of a standard of resources that is necessary for survival causes problems for the minimum core approach. For one of the key evils sought to be remedied by the minimum core approach is a lack of practical benchmarks against which to evaluate the performance of States in meeting the needs of people. In relation to food, water and housing, it seems that the principled minimum core notion can provide such benchmarks. We can determine the amount of food necessary to prevent malnutrition or water necessary to avoid dehydration. The State's actions can then be measured against whether it provides this level of food or water. However, matters are different in the context of health care.

There are several strong reasons which can be given to show the difficulty, if not impossibility, of realizing the principled minimum core obligation in the context of health care. First, consider the definition of the principled minimum core obligation as the duty to ensure that individuals are able to survive. In relation to health care, the imposition of such an obligation would involve not only primary health care, but also the provision of expensive drugs and treatments such as dialysis and heart transplants that are necessary to preserve life. The imposition of such an obligation could preclude spending on any other area of human endeavour and result in the entire budget of a country being absorbed by health-care expenditure.[1] The problem with providing such care universally is explained eloquently by Moellendorf:

> The cost of providing needed medical resources to all citizens, unlike the costs of providing universal housing and access to food and water, may be limitless since the costs of new technology are high and resources needs will continue to grow as new treatments become available. If the costs of providing needed medical resources to all citizens is limitless, then clearly available resources are insufficient to meet all claims and a system of rationing available resources is needed.[2]

The second problem with focusing all expenditure on the provision of health-care services is that it will inevitably affect the realization of other less expensive needs, such as the provision of housing and food. The failure to realize these interests in turn has an impact upon the health of individuals. Thus, focusing expenditure purely on health-care services that meet survival needs can be self-defeating — even from a point of view that is concerned with the promotion of the health of individuals.[3]

[1] The problems mentioned here will vary in their severity according to the level of development of a country.

[2] D Moellendorf 'Reasoning about Resources: Soobramoney and the Future of Socio-Economic Rights Claims' (1998) 14 SAJHR 327, 327–33.

[3] The UNCESCR has recognized these points by including access to basic food, water and shelter as part of the minimum core of the right to health. See GC 14 (supra) at para 11.

A UNESCO publication has recognized a similar point in relation to health-care services. The provision of equal access to high-technology care even in industrialized nations, it states, 'would inevitably raise the level of spending to a point which would preclude investment in preventive care for the young, and maintenance care for working adults.'[1]

Finally, the vast spending necessary to maintain everyone at the level of the principled minimum core in relation to health care would ensure that people could only attain a very low standard of living. Few resources would be available for people to use to fulfil their projects and goals beyond those focused on guaranteeing survival needs. It is unlikely that individuals will be content to live in a society which offers such minimal conditions and ambitions for individuals.

Thus, in the context of health care, it is possible to say that there is indeed a principled minimum core that provides strong reasons for prioritizing the health care necessary for survival and to alleviate suffering. However, there are strong countervailing reasons not to impose a practical obligation upon governments to realize the principled minimum core: simply put, giving people in all cases the level of health care necessary to survive can be too costly for a society. In light of this conclusion, it may be objected that the idea of a 'principled minimum core' loses its usefulness and that we should rather focus our energies on defining practical minimum standards against which government action can be measured.

It is important to make two points in response to this objection. The first is to point out the reasons behind identifying the principled minimum core apply to the case of health care as much as to any other important interest: they represent the necessary conditions that must be in place for individuals generally to be able to survive and be free from certain negative experiences which hamper their ability to lead good lives. This threshold recognizes the crucial importance to people of having the health care necessary to survive. Any failure to provide such health care has tragic consequences for the individual, and we should not attempt to pretend otherwise. The provision of such health care remains a priority and only strong reasons can justify the failure to provide such services. The principled minimum core ensures that we recognize the urgency of individual interests and that these have a central place on our list of concerns that governments are obliged to address. That importance persists even if there are strong reasons why a government cannot afford to provide the entire principled minimum core. To focus only on pragmatic standards loses sight of the urgency that certain interests have for individuals irrespective of resource constraints.[2] Tragic consequences may follow for individuals even if it is simply not possible to assist them in realizing these important interests. A principled minimum core thus has the virtue of placing these interests in clear view, and, practically, still requiring justification for the failure to realize them.[1]

[1] EB Brody Biomedical Technology and Human Rights (1993) quoted in Soobramoney (supra) at para 53.

[2] The urgency of many health needs may be the foundation of the view that the obligation exists irrespective of the resources available to a country. See B Toebes The Right to Health as Human Right in International Law (1999) 244.

Secondly, the formulation of pragmatic minimum standards does not take place in a vacuum. The point is that without some form of principled foundation, the pragmatic standards are likely to be arbitrary. It is thus necessary to have a background theory which determines why the minimum practical standards are determined in the way that they are. Central to any formulation of practical standards in relation to fundamental rights must be a recognition of the interests involved, and the differing levels of urgency that must be attached to the realisation of such interests. Thus, even though the principled minimum core will not itself provide the minimum standard against which government action will be evaluated, it remains of importance in helping to define — along with a range of other factors — the practical standards which will be used.

(ii) A pragmatic minimum threshold

While there is good reason to retain the idea of a principled minimum core in the case of health care, a focus on the principled minimum core alone might mean that we fail to articulate practical minimum standards that governments must meet in the provision of health care.

Defining such a 'pragmatic minimum threshold' would involve a number of factors — apart from the urgency of the interests that I have already mentioned — only some of which are canvassed here. First, the cost of the treatment required would clearly be of relevance. Secondly, the availability of resources needs to be taken into account. Thirdly, it will be important to balance a strategy focused on preventing health-care problems from arising against a curative strategy that focuses on treating health-care problems as they arise. Finally, it is important to ensure that each individual is offered equal opportunities for treatment.

The pragmatic minimum threshold is thus arrived at through considering the principled minimum core as well as other theoretical considerations together with the resources and the capacity available in a particular society. These considerations are then used in the process of formulating a threshold which specifies a pragmatic minimum standard to which governments must devote urgent attention. This pragmatic standard is a conglomeration of several considerations that lacks the simplicity of the principled minimum core.[2]

[1] On the importance of the minimum core approach in placing a burden on the state to justify its failure to fulfil minimum core obligations, see S Liebenberg 'South Africa's Evolving Jurisprudence on Socio-Economic Rights: An Effective Tool in Challenging Poverty' (2002) 6 Law, Democracy and Development 159, 176–77.

[2] Eide writes in a similar vein: '[i]t is required to accept a pragmatic compromise between the ideal and the realistic'. A Eide 'The Realisation of Social and Economic Rights and the Minimum Threshold Approach' (1989) 10 HRLJ 35, 47. Russell also states that the notion of minimum state obligations bridges the gap 'between fundamental entitlements and scarce resources'. S Russell 'Minimum State Obligation: International Dimensions' in D Brand & S Russell (eds) Exploring the Core Content of Socio-Economic Rights: South African and International Perspectives (2002).

The UNCESCR has in fact defined a 'pragmatic minimum core' in its General Comment 14 on the right to health care. As was seen above, in this General Comment, the UN Committee purports to define a core obligation to 'ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels' of the right to the highest attainable standard of health in the International Covenant.[1] However, the obligations it identifies do not meet even people's survival needs. Much life-saving health care is left out of the scope of the minimum core.[2] Thus, it is evident that the definition of the minimum core has not only been governed by the 'essential' nature of the interests involved but by pragmatic considerations as well. Distinguishing the principled and pragmatic strands in the minimum core concept, especially where they cannot be reconciled, allows us to understand the various important theoretical and practical purposes that such a concept must fulfil.

(d) The relationship between the minimum core and progressive realization of the right to health-care services

It is curious that in Grootboom Yacoob J approves of the UN Committee's approach to progressive realization but not of its use of the minimum core. In the UN Committee's approach, the two notions are linked.[3] To see this, it is important to recognize that there is an ambiguity in the notion of 'progressive realisation'.

One way of understanding this notion could be in relation to the fact that it imposes an obligation upon the government to make a resource such as housing or health care accessible to a greater number of people over time. Progressive realization thus involves more people gaining houses (or health care) over time. There are several problems with this interpretation. First, the rights in FC s 26(1) and FC s 27(1) vest immediately in everyone. But the failure to offer temporary alleviation of vulnerability (through homelessness or lack of health care) would result in some persons never enjoying the 'full realization' of their right (as some people would not be able to survive). For these people, their rights would be effectively negated. Secondly, this interpretation is unable to capture the important point that some persons are at a greater relative disadvantage than others in South African society. Consider a situation in which the government focused its housing programme on those who could afford to repay loans that it granted for the purpose of building houses. Similarly, the government could focus the health-care programme largely on middle-class health needs and not the problems affecting the poorest in society. It seems that such a programme would constitute 'progressive realization', on the above interpretation, even though it completely ignored those who are most significantly deprived. Again, there is no recognition of the urgent priority that some interests must take over others.

[1] GC 14 (supra) at para 43. This definition of the minimum core comes from GC 3. See GC 3 (supra) at para 10.

[2] For instance, surgery and treatment of life-threatening illnesses that do not constitute epidemic diseases are not part of the minimum core.

[3] See Scott & Alston (supra) at 250.

An alternative interpretation, however, exists, and fits very well with the socio-economic provisions in the Final Constitution. It understands the notion of 'progressive realization' as involving two components: the first component is a minimum core obligation to realize as a matter of priority the minimally adequate levels of provision required to meet basic needs; the second component is a duty on the State to take steps to improve the adequacy of the provision of the resource over time. In other words, progressive realization means, in the context of housing, the movement from the realization of a minimal interest that people have in not being subjected to the elements to the realization of the maximal interest of having a place to live in which people are able to flourish as human beings. Progressive realization involves an improvement in the adequacy of housing for the meeting of human interests. It does not mean that some receive housing now, and others receive it later; rather, it means that each is entitled as a matter of priority to basic housing provision, which the government is required to improve gradually over time. Such an interpretation makes sense of the idea that the socio-economic rights enshrined in the Final Constitution have an aspirational dimension but, like other rights, also impose obligations as a matter of priority for the provision of certain goods.

The problem with trying to divorce the UNCESCR's analysis of progressive realization from its adoption of the minimum core approach to socio-economic rights can now be seen. The Committee claims that the notion of 'progressive realization' imposes 'an obligation to move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards' the full realization of the right, and to refrain from deliberately retrogressive measures.[1] Thus, the State has a duty to take steps towards the full realisation of the right, but is at the same time under an obligation to come up with the essential levels of provision required by the minimum core. While these two duties are fundamentally intertwined in the interpretation given by the Committee, Yacoob J attempts to divorce the one element from the other. Such an interpretation lacks coherence and significantly weakens the protection that socio-economic rights provide for individuals.

What then should the meaning of the term 'progressive realization' be in the context of the right to have access to health care? The Constitutional Court has not really considered this question and its approach in fact militates against providing meaning to this term. The reasonableness approach does not involve considering the content of socio-economic rights and thus how the State can qualitatively improve the realization of the right over time. The Court does not attempt to set any base line below which the standards of health care should not fall; this reticence complicates, if not confounds any appraisal of progressive realization. No doubt, if the State withdraws services that it currently provides, such retrogressive measures might be deemed to violate the demand for progressive realization. However, it is unclear what would constitute an actual progression. It is suggested that what needs to happen in the health-care sector is a determination of pragmatic benchmarks against which government actions can be measured. A number of goals need to be set for government policy (this need not be done by the courts), a minimum level of service specified, and the government must then present its plans and programmes for an increase in the quality of health care over time to citizens. Should it fail to meet these targets, it will be in breach of its constitutional duty to realize the right to health care progressively over time. This requirement thus points a way to the future; it requires that there be a plan in place to ensure decent health care for all over time. That plan requires clear benchmarks and a willingness by the courts to measure the government's progress against such benchmarks.

[1] See GC 3 (supra) at para 9.

(e) Providing normative content to the right to health-care services

The Final Constitution makes it clear that what needs to be progressively realized is the right to have access to health-care services. What exactly is involved in this right? One of the main theoretical defects of the approach to adjudicating socio-economic rights that has been adopted by the Constitutional Court is its failure to place the fundamental interests of individuals at the centre of its enquiry. It is in fact difficult to find adequate reasons for including socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution without recognizing that they are designed to protect the fundamental interests of individuals in having access to such essential goods as housing, food and health care. An 'interests-based approach' to the right that is advocated here thus places the interests that are involved in the right (and those that are affected in a particular case) under the spotlight. This approach also questions the extent to which government policy detrimentally impacts upon these interests.[1] There are a range of interests impacted upon by health, but the most important ones are survival, the ability to be free from negative phenomenal experiences and the ability to function optimally to be able to realise a range of diverse purposes.[2]

Further guidance in giving content to this right and the interests involved can be obtained from General Comment 14. It attempts to specify various elements of the right including:

[1] See D Bilchitz 'Placing Basic Needs at the Centre of Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2003) 4(1) ESR Review 2; D Bilchitz 'Right to Health and Access to HIV/AIDS Drug Treatment' (2003) 1 International Journal of Constitutional Law 524–34.

[2] Again, a full account of relevant interests cannot be provided here.

(a) Availability: there have to be functioning public health facilities and programmes available in sufficient quantity within the State party. This will include the determinants of health — water, food, and sanitation — hospitals, clinics, sufficient trained medical personnel and essential drugs.

(b) Accessibility: This has four dimensions:
- Non-discrimination: health facilities must be accessible to all, particularly the vulnerable and marginalized, without discrimination on prohibited grounds.
- Physical accessibility: health facilities must be within a safe physical reach of the population. This includes adequate access to buildings for people with disabilities.
- Economic accessibility: health facilities must be affordable for all.[1]
- Information accessibility: this involves the right to seek, receive and impart information and ideas concerning health issues.

(c) Acceptability: All health facilities must be respectful of medical ethics and be culturally appropriate. They must respect confidentiality.

(d) Quality: Health facilities must be scientifically and medically appropriate and of a good quality. This involves skilled medical personnel; scientifically approved and unexpired drugs and hospital equipment; safe and potable water and adequate sanitation.

GC 14 then elaborates upon the specific examples contained in article 12(2) of the ICESCR. For instance, the right to health facilities, goods and services (article 12(2)(d)) must embrace: the provision of equal and timely access to basic preventive, curative, rehabilitative health services and health education; regular screening programmes; appropriate treatment of prevalent diseases, illnesses, injuries and disabilities, preferably at community level; the provision of essential drugs; and appropriate mental health treatment and care.[2]

The right to health imposes three types of obligations upon State parties: the obligations to respect, protect and fulfil these rights.[3] The obligation to respect demands the State refrain from interfering directly or indirectly with the enjoyment of the right to health. The state must not deny any person access to

[1] See Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks SA (Pty) Ltd & Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Innovative Medicines SA as Amici Curiae) 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('New Clicks CC')(Constitutional Court held that the right to access health-care services embraces the right to affordable medicines.)

[2] The General Comment also elaborates on the importance of non-discrimination and equal treatment in relation to accessing health care. It recommends the use of a gender perspective in health planning and policies as a result of impact of sex and gender upon health. GC 13 (supra) at para 20. There are also sections dealing specifically with women (para 21), children (paras 22–4), older persons (para 25), persons with disabilities (para 26), and indigenous peoples (para 27).

[3] For an analysis on the obligations imposed by international law with respect to socio-economic rights, see P de Vos 'Pious Wishes or Directly Enforceable Human Rights? Social and Economic Rights in South Africa's 1996 Constitution' (1997) 3 SAJHR 67.

preventative, curative or palliative health services, abstaining from discriminatory practices, and not limiting access to contraceptives or other means of maintaining sexual or reproductive health.

The obligation to protect requires the State to take measures to prevent third parties from interfering with the right to health. The State must adopt legislation: to regulate health services provided by third parties; to ensure that privatisation does not affect the availability of health care services to all; to control the marketing of medicines and medical equipment by third parties; and to ensure that medical practitioners meet appropriate standards of education, skill and codes of conduct.

The obligation to fulfil requires the State to adopt an appropriate national health policy that will lead to the full realization of the right. States must ensure the provision of health-care services, including immunisation, equal access to the underlying determinants of health, access to medical personnel, hospitals and clinics, and treatment of diseases. The obligation to fulfil can be further broken down into an obligation to facilitate, provide and promote. The obligation to facilitate involves the taking of positive measures that enable and assist individuals and communities to enjoy the right to health. States are required actually to provide a service where an individual or group is unable, for reasons beyond their control, to realize the right themselves by the means at their disposal. The obligation to promote involves undertaking actions that create, maintain and restore health among the population: this includes assisting people to make informed choices about their health and to know about healthy lifestyles.

Two recent interventions by the government and the courts have led to the development of the content of the right to health-care services in accordance with the approach suggested above. Although New Clicks concerned primarily the pricing of medicines,[1] and little was said in connection with the right to health care, Ngcobo J stated that

[1] In trying to make drugs affordable to people, the government has attempted to enact regulations to ensure that pharmacies do not overcharge for drugs. Such regulations became mired in conflict and have recently been the subject of a lengthy judgment by the Constitutional Court after conflicting judgments were delivered by the Cape High Court and then the Supreme Court Appeal. The High Court decision is reported as New Clicks SA (Pty) Ltd v Msimang NO & Another; Pharmaceutical Society of SA & Others v Minister of Health & Another 2005 (2) SA 530 (C), [2005] 1 All SA 196 (C). In its judgment, the Supreme Court of Appeal made the following important remarks relating to the right to health care:

> one has to agree that the right of access to health care includes the right of access to medicines although this right is not without limitations. It is also correct that the prohibitive pricing of medicines may be tantamount to a denial of the right of access to health-care.

Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa & Others v Tshabalala-Msimang & Another NNO; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Health & Another 2005 (3) SA 238 (SCA), 2005 (6) BCLR 576 (SCA) at para 42. The Supreme Court of Appeal went further arguing that the obligations of the state in this regard involve affordability as well as access: 'Cheap medicines available at two hypermarkets provide cold comfort to the poor living in a township or on the platteland.' Ibid at para 77. The Supreme Court of Appeal, however, struck down these regulations as ultra vires as they did not comply with the principle of legality. The Constitutional Court overturned that part of the decision of the SCA that held that the whole regulatory scheme was invalid. It held instead that only certain individual regulations were invalid. New Clicks CC (supra) at paras 13–20. The majority held that the dispensing fee that was set was not 'appropriate.' It decided to remit the matter back to the Pricing Committee and Minister for reconsideration and ordered that the Minister publish the amended regulations within 60 days. The judgment was mainly decided on administrative-law grounds.

> The right to health care services includes the right of access to medicines that are affordable. The state has an obligation to promote access to medicines that are affordable.[1]

Similarly, Moseneke J writes that 'the right of access to health care services embraces the right to access quality and affordable medicines' and that 'access to affordable medicines is an important component of any scheme directed at poverty reduction and the physical well-being of all people.'[2] These judgments place an important obligation on the State and begin to do what the other more direct judgments on socio-economic rights have failed to do: provide content to the right to have access to health-care services.

Secondly, framework legislation passed in the form of a National Health Act[3] has the express goal of uniting 'the various elements of the national health system in a common goal to actively promote and improve the national health system in South Africa.' The Act gives specific content to the right to have access to health care by guaranteeing (a) the right of pregnant women and children under six years of age to free health services and (b) all persons the right to free primary health care services unless the individual is a member of a medical aid.[4]

(f) Further issues relating to the scarcity of resources and the right to health care

The problem of scarcity of resources is particularly acute in the case of the right to health care. In accordance with the philosophical principle that 'ought implies can', it is not possible to impose obligations that cannot be realized. However, the difficult problem that generally arises is in interpreting the phrase 'cannot be realized'. It is rare that there is an absolute scarcity of resources. More thus needs to be said about the interpretation of the phrase 'within available resources' which appears in FC ss 26(2) and 27(2).[5]

(i) Relationship between availability of resources and the right: content or limitation?

The first question to determine is whether the availability of resources must be considered in the process of defining the very content of a right, or whether that very content is determined independently of the availability of resources. Under the latter scenario, the scarcity of a resource would represent a limitation on the ability to fulfil a right, whose content is determined independently.

[1] New Clicks CC (supra) at para 514.
[2] Ibid at paras 704–705.
[3] Act 61 of 2003. Other important statutes relating to the right to health-care services that have been passed since 1994 are: Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act 92 of 1996; Traditional Health Practitioners Act 35 of 2004; and Mental Health Care Act 17 of 2002.
[4] Section 4(3) of the National Health Act.
[5] For a discussion of the international law relating to this notion, see RE Robertson 'Measuring State Compliance with the Obligation to Devote the Maximum Available Resources to Realizing Economic, Social and Cultural Rights' (1994) 16 Human Rights Quarterly 693.

Is there any value, then, in recognizing that a right exists when it cannot presently be fulfilled? Is it not better to recognize only those rights that are presently capable of being fulfilled?[1] In answering this question, it is important to go back to the underlying rationale for the recognition of rights. Fundamental rights protect certain basic interests that people have. These guarantees are designed to enable people to survive, avoid significantly negative experiences and to be capable of achieving the purposes they value in the world. Inherent in this conception of rights is the idea that there are entitlements that people have merely by virtue of their status as beings with certain characteristics.[2] If we accept this as one of the underlying ideas behind the protection of fundamental rights, then it becomes clear that rights should be recognized even where they are not presently capable of being fulfilled. People have rights by virtue of being creatures of a certain type with certain interests and not in virtue of having control over a certain quantity of resources. The scarcity of resources does not affect a person's having a right, but rather the capacity to realize that right.[3]

The recognition that people have rights even where there is no ability to realize them is important in that it recognizes that in a world of scarcity, there are often cases where people are not able to acquire that to which they are entitled. It suggests that as the scarcity is lessened, there are entitlements that are already in existence which must now be realized. The idea that people have rights even when these are not presently capable of being fulfilled thus helps to express the idea that there is a moral loss, something deeply disturbing that occurs when we admit that not everyone can be provided with life-saving health care, food, water, and shelter. It enjoins us to change this situation as soon as we can so that people can be given that to which they are entitled. Without such recognition, the failure to meet basic needs under conditions of scarcity does not violate any claim people have. The situation does not demand reform. The recognition of a right's violation confirms our original intuition that there is something morally defective about such a situation.

In addition to these two conceptual arguments for thinking that rights should be recognized even when they are not presently capable of being fulfilled, there are also some textual arguments in favour of this claim. Consider the structure of the principal socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution. First, there is the recognition of the rights in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1). These rights are expressed in [1] See M Kramer 'Getting Rights Right' in M Kramer (ed) Rights, Wrongs and Responsibilities (2001) 28, 65–78.

[2] Such an approach has a long history, and can, for instance, be traced to Immanuel Kant's idea of treating rational agents as ends in themselves. See I Kant The Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1785), reprinted in MJ Gregor (ed) Immanuel Kant: Practical Philosophy (1996) 80. For a lengthy discussion of Kant's notion of individuals as ends-in-themselves, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. For similar, but more contemporary philosophical approaches, see A Gewirth Reason and Morality (1978); J Donnelly 'Human Rights as Natural Rights' (1982) 4 Human Rights Quarterly 391; G Vlastos 'Justice and Equality' in J Waldron (ed) Theories of Rights (1984) 41, 55; and M Nussbaum Women and Human Development (2000).

[3] Donnelly (supra) at 394–95 argues that this analysis of socio-economic rights accords with how cases of impossibility of performance are dealt with in relation to private law rights as well.

unqualified terms and are recognized as existing no matter what the circumstances. FC ss 26(2) and 27(2), however, stress that what can be required of the State in realizing these rights may be limited by the resources that are available. It is important to recognize that the rights and their content are thus to be determined independently of the current obligations of the State in realizing those rights. The State's current obligations must take account of the current situation of scarcity. Where such scarcity is lessened, the obligations of the State change accordingly. Scarcity thus conditions the extent to which the right can be realized but does not qualify the actual content of the right itself.

It may be objected, however, that there is no practical virtue in recognizing a right that is essentially inchoate. What is the difference between recognizing that such a right exists and cannot be fulfilled, and not recognizing that any such right exists? Apart from the theoretical virtues I have mentioned, there could be certain practical effects to adopting an approach of recognizing rights that are not presently capable of being fulfilled. First, the recognition of an existing entitlement entails that the government is required to modify the current position so as to fulfil people's rights as soon as possible. As such, the government can be expected to make every effort to increase its control over those resources that will enable it to fulfil these rights. Secondly, the continued existence of these entitlements can also help influence the behaviour of those who have resources available but are not legally obligated to provide for those suffering from deprivation (private parties or other countries, for instance). The idea that people are being deprived of something that they are entitled to by virtue of their humanity may well have significant persuasive power.[1] Finally, recognizing that a right exists even when not fulfilled entails that, as soon as resources do become available, the government is required to act in order to realize the rights that have been abrogated.[2]

(ii) The pool of available resources

The preceding discussion has considered in what context the availability of resources should be relevant to the right to health-care services. However, it is important to consider the pool of resources that are to be regarded as being available for purposes of realizing socio-economic rights claims. Moellendorf has pointed out that the notion of 'available resources' is ambiguous:

[1] See Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.1*(a)*(Argues that 'the recognition of the inherent dignity of our fellow South Africans broadens the reach of this right [to dignity] from mere duties of justice to duties of virtue that impose on us obligations that have as their aim the qualitative perfection of humanity.')

[2] In dealing with conditions of scarcity and possibility, it is also important to bring in a principle of equality: each individual is entitled to have access to these rights. But, as such, one cannot prioritize the rights of one individual over any other. Thus, a policy must be instituted that is capable of realizing the rights of all individuals to the greatest possible extent. That will usually mean under conditions of scarcity that each specific individual cannot claim their full entitlements under the right; but it also implies that each individual will be provided equally with some access to what resources allow. In this way, we can retain a focus on individuals, as individual rights demand, whilst taking account of the need to make decisions in a collective context. Sachs J comes close to taking this approach to health-care rights in Soobramoney. See Soobramoney (supra) at paras 53–54. Although I have disagreed with his approach to defining the content of the right in relation to resources, he at least recognizes the need to take account of the shared context in which rights are realized, and the extent to which the meaningful exercise of rights is parastic upon substantive equality of access to material resources.

> It may mean those resources that a ministry or department has been allotted and has budgeted for the protection of the right. Alternatively, it may mean any resources that the state can marshal to protect the right.[1]

Moellendorf recognizes that these are two extreme versions of what the term means and that it may fall somewhere between these extremes. In Soobramoney, he argues, Chaskalson P generally employs the term in its narrowest sense: the resources allocated by the provincial government to kidney dialysis.

This position, he points out, does not accord with the position the Court adopted in its First Certification Judgment.[2] Whilst the First Certification Judgment Court recognized that socio-economic rights might well have direct implications for budgetary matters, it also found that this was true when the enforcement of civil and political rights was at issue. It concluded that '[i]n our view it cannot be said that by including socio-economic rights within a bill of rights, a task is conferred upon the courts so different from that ordinarily conferred upon them by a bill of rights that it results in a breach of the separation of powers.'[3]

The Court in this passage does not limit its role in the adjudication of rights claims to the framework of existing allocations. 'Rather' as Moellendorf notes, 'the court may pass judgments on these rights, as with other rights, that require a change in fiscal priorities'.[4] Moellendorf supports this broader reading of 'available resources'[5] because he claims that the narrow reading would reduce rights to mere 'policy priorities'. Rights, he claims, 'must have some role in guiding policy rather than being merely dependent upon it, if they are to be real rights and not mere priorities'.[6]

But Moellendorf does not attend to the manner in which he uses the term 'priority' and fails to explain what the exact difference is between rights and policy priorities. His reasoning suggests this is a distinction in kind between different types of reasons. Yet, when the notion of priority is considered properly, the distinction becomes not one of kind but one between reasons with differing degrees of strength.[7] The right in FC s 27(1) provides a reason which has a

[1] D Moellendorf 'Reasoning About Resources: Soobramoney and the Future of Socio-Economic Rights Claims' (1998) 14 SAJHR 327, 330.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In Re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 77.

[4] Moellendorf (supra) at 331–332.

[5] Ibid at 331.

[6] Ibid at 332.

[7] I cannot develop this argument here. The full argument will be contained in my forthcoming book, Combating Poverty through Human Rights, The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (forthcoming, 2007).

special weight.[1] If we recast Moellendorf's argument in this light, it becomes evident what the real problem with the narrow interpretation of 'available resources' is.

To construe 'available resources' in the narrowest sense would be to ignore the special weight that should be attached to rights. As Molloendorf correctly argues: 'It would be remarkable, for example, for the court to claim that the right to a fair trial need not be protected because those legislating and administering the budget have simply not allowed the resources to provide for fair trials.'[2] That would allow the government to avoid realizing rights merely by virtue of its allocation of the budget. Such allocations may be well motivated but it is also possible that they can fail to have sufficient regard for the urgent interests of individuals or be based upon the poor management of resources. In order to justify a limitation on the right in FC s 27(1), it is essential to raise reasons of sufficient weight to do so.[3]

Thus, if the allocation of the budget is to provide a sufficient reason for not fulfilling certain rights, that allocation itself needs to be justified by reasons of sufficient weight to justify the failure to fulfil such rights. This explains why the mere allocation by the government of resources cannot alone be taken to justify the non-fulfilment of rights. There must be good reasons lying behind such an allocation, which take account of the special weight to be attached to rights.[4] Any other interpretation is incompatible with the decision to include socio-economic rights in a bill of rights. Thus, since the State may be called upon to justify its allocation of resources, the pool of resources that must be considered as being 'available' must be all those that lie within the control of the State.

That formulation, however, itself admits of various meanings. It is clear that it refers at least to those resources that are controlled by the State and form part of the national budget.[5] Any narrower construal of this phrase is not consistent with a purposive approach to interpreting socio-economic rights. What is controversial, however, is whether the notion of 'available resources' can be given an even wider gloss. It is plausible to suggest, for instance, that capital from foreign loans

[1] See, for instance, R Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously (1977) 188 (Argues that '[i]n most cases, when we say that someone has the 'right' to do something, we imply that it would be wrong to interfere with his doing it, or at least that some special grounds are needed for justifying any interference.')

[2] Moellendorf (supra) at 331.

[3] See S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 31, 31–47 (Makes a similar point when she states that 'the courts should not simply accept unsubstantiated allegations regarding resource shortages. The Court's role is to scrutinise the validity of this defence'.)

[4] See, for instance, E Mureinik 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries' (1992) 8 SAJHR 464 (Argues that socio-economic rights place a burden upon the state to justify its resource allocations in light of the commitments contained within the Bill of Rights.)

[5] Scott and Alston claim that the court in Soobramoney was implicitly working from the narrow assumption that available resources refers only to existing state resources. See S Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobrammoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise (2000) 16 SAJHR 206.

may also be said to be 'available' to a State.[1] The question thus arises as to whether there are any limits to — or what the appropriate limits are with respect to — the pool of available resources that should be considered when determining the obligations of a society.

To some extent, the answer to this question depends upon the particular context with which we are concerned and the branch of government that is making decisions about the realization of socio-economic rights. The judiciary generally lacks expertise in macro-economic policy. It would therefore generally be inappropriate for courts to require the government to take out foreign loans in order to meet their constitutional obligations. There would be legitimate fears of the judiciary straying well beyond their sphere of competence and thus, for judges, the notion of 'available resources' would generally not include higher levels of foreign capital than that to which the government currently has access. Courts could only recommend that other branches of government consider this as an option for improving the realization of rights and require that the other branches of government justify their decisions properly in this regard. The executive, however, is well-placed to consider the amount of foreign capital that can be marshalled for the fulfilment of rights and, as such, a realistic assessment of foreign assistance should be part of its understanding of 'available resources'. The extent to which such capital can be acquired will, however, depend on a number of economic and political factors determined by such institutions as the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, which lie beyond the control of any one State.

Privately-held resources within a State may also lie within its control through its regulatory and taxation powers as well as its powers to expropriate property. The question once again arises as to whether the notion of 'available resources' can also be said to include the State's ability to control privately-held resources. That question is an important one to consider, but cannot be developed here as it requires a discussion of the nature and role of property rights in a democracy such as South Africa.[2]

Determining the 'availability of resources' is thus more complicated than it initially appears. Scarcity is in many instances a result not of natural facts but human institutions and decisions. As a result, the availability of resources is not a fixed parameter and its meaning needs to be considered as part of an overarching enquiry into the content of the State's obligations in relation to socio-economic rights. I have argued in this section that the phrase 'available resources' should

[1] Van Bueren argues that resources should not only be considered to include direct economic resources but also human and organisational resources:

> Human resources include the time, energy, motivation, skills, professionalism, the vision and desire of the individual adults and children and communities. Organisational resources include both the formal and the informal relationships by which actions are taken in society including political organisations, indigenous people's organisations, families and non-governmental organisations.

G van Bueren 'Alleviating Poverty through the Constitutional Court' (1999) 15 SAJHR 52, 61–2.

[2] I discuss this question in my forthcoming book, D Bilchitz Combating Poverty through Human Rights, The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (forthcoming, 2007).

be interpreted so as to refer to all those resources that lie within the control of the State. In determining what lies within the control of the State, consideration must first be given to those resources that lie directly within the State's budget. However, the 'availability of resources' may legitimately encompass the ability to secure international loans, to increase taxes, and to interfere with private property rights. The executive may consider this phrase to include all these elements whilst judges may adopt a more restrictive approach consonant with their role in our system of government.

56A.5 Health-care Policy and the Final Constitution

(a) Background

I conclude this chapter in a manner that indicates the way in which health rights are in many ways honoured in the breach in South Africa. In a departure from standard academic practice, I shall relate a tragic story concerning the operation of the South African health-care system with which I was personally involved. Academic writing should not be divorced from such practical realities. That the law needs to be cognizant of the lived experience ordinary people has been confirmed repeatedly by the Constitutional Court.[1] It is in this spirit that I relate a story which, though it provides only anecdotal evidence, nevertheless highlights the multiple ways in which current health-care policy is failing to realize even the most basic elements of the right to have access to health-care services. The story also provides a method of illustrating some of the challenges involved in developing the content of the right in FC s 27.

(b) Themba's story: HIV/AIDS in the public health-care system

On 25 May 2005 at 02h45, Themba Baloyi,[2] aged 25, died at a care home in Johannesburg. Themba's death is attributable to serious deficiencies in the South African health care system. Whilst in hospital, he lay next to many people suffering in the same way that he did. His story exemplifies the suffering of poor people in South Africa.

[1] See, eg, President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC), 1997 (1) SACR 567 (CC). Taking account of the fact that de facto women still remain the primary caregivers in society for children. See also Soobramoney (supra) at para 111 ('Given this lack of resources and the significant demands on them that have already been referred to, an unqualified obligation to meet these needs would not presently be capable of being fulfilled.')

[2] Name changed by request of family.

Themba first became ill at the beginning of 2005. Unable to work, he went to his rural home close to Madibogo, near Mafikeng. With severe vomiting and diarrhoea, Themba was taken to the local clinic. He was given treatment to re-hydrate him and sent back home. His blood was taken. Themba discovered shortly thereafter that he was HIV-positive.

Being unable to travel into Madibogo as an outpatient, Themba returned to Johannesburg, hoping for better treatment. After a short stay in hospital, however, he was discharged whilst still extremely ill. Miraculously, he slowly improved and returned to his employment. His employer had kept Themba's job open because he was an excellent employee: trustworthy and reliable.

Themba tried to have a CD4 count taken. He waited for hours in the Johannesburg General Hospital for a blood test and was sent away without the test having been taken. Because he did not understand how the State health care system operates, Themba accepted this treatment.

At the beginning of May 2005, Themba was taken to the Johannesburg General Hospital with pneumonia. His feet were extremely painful and he was unable to stand on his own. He could not hold down food. Despite his desperate condition, he was kept waiting to see a doctor for ten hours in casualty. There was no triage nurse to assess the urgency with which patients were to be seen in casualty. He was also provided with no information as to when he would be seen.

The doctor who eventually saw Themba helped him to die. Instead of attempting to save this 25-year-old, the doctor sent him from the Johannesburg General to Selby Park Hospital. This hospital is completely under-equipped and, from what we saw, sections of this hospital are used as a warehouse facility in which patients are 'permitted' to die. Themba was given minimal care: whilst he was given anti-biotics, he could not hold down food or drink properly. In any decent hospital, he would have been put on a drip. For most of Themba's stay in Selby Park, he lay without a drip. His body, trying to fight with minimal resources against the illnesses that beset him, now had to cope with dehydration and starvation. Since Themba had AIDS-defining illnesses he was also entitled to anti-retroviral treatment. All attempts to get him such treatment in hospital failed, and he was initially even denied a CD4 count test with the excuse that this was too expensive. The cost of a CD4 count is currently R150.

Placing Themba on a government anti-retroviral programme proved impossible. Despite being malnourished and very sick, the hospital discharged him. On the way to the care home, we managed to arrange for Themba to be placed on a US-funded anti-retroviral programme. He was due to begin his treatment on Wednesday 25th May. We hoped his body ravaged from illness and neglect could cope with these drugs.

Themba died in the early hours of 25 May. His CD4 count was 1.

56B Water

Malcolm Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa

56B.1 Introduction 56B–1
56B.2 International and Comparative Law 56B–3
(a) International recognition 56B–3
(b) Content of the right 56B–9
(c) State obligations 56B–13
(d) Comparative law 56B–15
(i) Availability 56B–16
(ii) Quality of water 56B–17
(iii) Physical accessibility and affordability 56B–19
(iv) Disconnections 56B–20
56B.3 South African Law 56B–21
(a) Explicit and implicit recognition 56B–21
(b) The meaning of FC s 27(1)(b) 56B–24
(i) The prevailing approach to FC s 27 rights 56B–24
(ii) Right holders and protected uses of water 56B–26
(iii) 'Sufficient' 56B–27
(aa) Background to Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg 56B–28
(bb) The consolidation and extension of the stance against 'minimum core content' . . . 56B–31
(cc) A brief note on comparative approaches to questions of sufficient water 56B–33
(iv) The principle of constitutional subsidiarity 56B–34
(v) 'Access' 56B–37
56B.4 Duties of the State 56B–39
(a) Different spheres of government 56B–39
(b) The constitutional obligation to respect, protect, promote and fulfil rights 56B–45
(c) Respect 56B–46
(i) Disconnections 56B–46
(ii) Prepaid meters 56B–51
(d) Protect 56B–54
(i) Privatisation 56B–55
(ii) Farm owners and other landowners 56B–56
(e) Promote 56B–56
(f) Fulfil 56B–57
(i) Ensuring affordability 56B–57

(ii) Free water policy 56B–59
(g) Equality guarantee 56B–61
56B.5 Right to Sanitation 56B–66
(a) International law 56B–66
(i) Express and implied recognition. 56B–66
(ii) A co-right with water? 56B–69
(iii) Individual or collective right? 56B–70
(iv) Content. 56B–71
(v) Obligations. 56B–73
(b) South African law and jurisprudence 56B–74
(i) The constitutional and legislative position 56B–74
(ii) Sanitation, health and the environment 56B–77

Section 27 of the Final Constitution reads, in relevant part, as follows:

(1) [E]veryone has the right to have access to … sufficient … water.
(2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of [this] right.

56B.1 Introduction

Many commentators describe the South African Constitution[1] as the gold standard for all contemporary attempts to arrive at a legitimate basic law. Much, but not all, of this praise flows from the Final Constitution's inclusion of justiciable socio-economic rights.

Such tributes tend to gild the lily. The inclusion of justiciable socio-economic rights is, in reality, part of a broader trend in constitution-making from the mid-1980s onwards rather than a manifestation of any South African exceptionalism.[2] However, when it comes to the right to water and sanitation, the title of frontrunner may be justified. The recognition of the right in FC s 27, together with the right to sanitation in the Water Services Act,[3] has played an important role in shaping international law and policy developments. In 2006, the United Nations Development Programme ('UNDP') recommended that states recognise the right to water and pointed to South Africa as an example of the best model (if not practice).[4] The South African experience grounded two decisive United Nations resolutions in 2010 that removed any doubts over the legal status of water and sanitation rights.

The politics and practice surrounding the right to water (and sanitation) within South Africa presents a more complicated picture. Access to water in South Africa has historically been conditional upon land ownership, and wealth or residency rights in formal urban areas. Race was therefore the primary determining factor in whether one had access to water and sanitation. Since the end of apartheid, the South African government has made significant strides in reversing some of these patterns. According to its definition of access, the proportion of those without access to water fell from 40 to 7 per cent, while the equivalent figures for sanitation are 51 and 21 per cent.[5]

At this juncture, many academics, jurists and social movement leaders might be tempted to shout: 'Lies, damned lies and statistics.' The debate over the actual degree of 'progress' made with respect to water and sanitation rights is quite heated. Critics of the government's efforts will point to the high number of disconnections, the many urban inhabitants and rural communities that have been

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] Of particular note are the post-authoritarian constitutions in Latin America, Eastern Europe, sub-Saharan Africa and, increasingly, Asia. See M Langford (ed) Social Rights Jurisprudence: Emerging Trends in International and Comparative Law (2008); B Simmons 'Should States Ratify? Process and Consequences of the Optional Protocol to the ICESCR' 27(1) Nordic Journal of Human Rights 64.

[3] Act 108 of 1997.

[4] See, for example, UNDP Beyond Scarcity: Power, Power and the Global Water Crisis (2006)

[5] Government of South Africa Millenium Development Goals Report (2005) and Department of Water Affairs and Sanitation Dashboard available at http://www.dwaf.gov.za/dir_ws/wsnis/default.asp?nStn=wsnisindex (accessed on 12 May 2011).

unable to move beyond the most basic level of access due to the tardy pace of slum upgrading, impediments that flow from extremely slow land reform and a range of other limitations on effective access.[1] More time or a growing financial base alone will not solve such problems. Quantitative research across all of South Africa's municipalities shows that the level of 'available resources' within municipalities cannot explain the slow progress in securing access to adequate water and sanitation for all. Politics and policy would appear to hinder progress as much as the purse.[2]

The law's responses to these contemporary dilemmas — on the statute books and in the courtroom — have been the subject of equally intense debate.

The Water Services Act sets out a range of obligations and measures for implementing the right of access to water. It guarantees the right to a basic water supply, incorporates protective procedures against deprivations of water and provides for the setting of national standards and norms for tariffs. This Act and the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act[3] ('Municipal Systems Act') create an elaborate framework designed to use private service providers to overcome obstacles in the delivery of water services.[4] The National Water Act[5] was promulgated to ensure that the nation's water resources are sustainably developed, conserved, managed and controlled.[6] Sustainable development by its very definition takes the needs of the worst off members of our community and protection of the environment into account.[7]

The case law reflects a number of positive developments as well. Grootboom affirmed that access to water (and sanitation) were part of the right to housing and that the state had positive obligations to ensure its progressive realisation.[8] In Joe Slovo, the Constitutional Court found that water and sanitation were key elements of the basic standards for alternative accommodation in the case of eviction.[9] The High Courts and Land Claims Court have provided some guidance with respect to the protection from interference with access to water.[10] National (as opposed to

[1] K Tissington, M Dettmann, M Langford, J Dugard & S Conteh Water Services Fault Lines: An Assessment of South Africa's Water and Sanitation Provision across 15 Municipalities (2008) available at http://www.cohre.org/sites/default/files/water_services_fault_lines_sa_nov08.pdf (accessed on 13 May 2011).

[2] M Langford, E Anderson & J Dugard 'Law, Economics and Politics: The South African Experience' in M Langford & A Russell (eds) The Right to Water: Theory, Practice and Prospects (forthcoming 2012).

[3] Act 32 of 2000.

[4] Municipal Systems Act s 10 and ss 76-78 respectively.

[5] Act 36 of 1998.

[6] National Water Act s 2.

[7] See M Van der Linde & E Basson 'Environment' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 2, October 2010) Chapter 50.

[8] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19('Grootboom') para 35.

[9] Residents of the Joe Slovo Community, Western Cape v Thubelisha Homes & Others 2010 (3) SA 454 (CC), 2009 (9) BCLR 847 (CC), [2009] ZACC 16('Joe Slovo') at para 10.

[10] See § 56B.3 and 56B.4 below.

local) officials in the water sector show a high degree of cognisance of the policy implications of Grootboom.[1]

However, recent judicial developments have tempered some of this early promise. The Constitutional Court's findings and its reasoning in Mazibuko,[2] and, to some degree, Nokotyana,[3] complicate a number of the basic legal assumptions about the right to water that had emerged in the early 2000s. In coming to a conclusion that prepaid water meters did not constitute a form of 'disconnection or limitation' or indirect discrimination, and that a policy to provide an average 25 litres per person per day in Johannesburg was reasonable, the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko appears to narrow the promise of its earlier socio-economic rights jurisprudence. Similarly, Nokotyana raises, rather than lowers, the threshold for success in challenges to the adequacy of government policy in sanitation cases. Of course, both decisions could be explained away (or have their potentially deleterious effects limited) by reference to their facts or the litigation strategy of the applicants. Nonetheless, as matters currently stand, the two judgments represent a particular challenge to advocates who seek to expand the horizons of the constitutional right to water.

This chapter will begin by adumbrating the available international and comparative law on the right to water. These bodies of law have developed rapidly in the last few years and their increasing divergence from the South African jurisprudence on the right to water provides a useful external perspective. §52B.3 offers an analysis of the different elements of the right to water as manifestly expressed in the Constitution. §52B.4 discusses the respective constitutional duties of different levels of Government. §52B.5 explores the emergence of the right to sanitation (internationally and in South Africa).

56B.2 International and Comparative Law

(a) International recognition

The Universal Declaration on Human Rights does not, interestingly enough, contain a right to water: the most elemental ingredient for life at all. The right to water did not appear in international law until 1977. The Mar del Plata Declaration at the 1977 UN Water Conference announced that '[A]ll peoples, whatever their stage of development and their social and economic conditions, have the right to have access to drinking water in quantities and of a quality equal to their basic needs.' The right to water was recognized in the 1992 Dublin Principles[4] action plans emanating from the inter-governmental summits held in 1992 in Rio[5] and 1994 in [1] See C Human 'The Human Right to Water in Africa: The South African Example' in E Riedel & P Rothen (eds) The Human Rights to Water (2006) 83-93.

[2] Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28('Mazibuko').

[3] Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33.

[4] Dublin Statement on Water and Sustainable Development, International Conference on Water and the Environment: Development Issues for the 21st Century UN Doc. A/CONF.151/PC/112 (1992) available at http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/instree/dublinwater1992.html (accessed on 13 May 2011).

[5] Agenda 21: The United Nations Programme of Action from Rio (1992) available at http://www.un.org/esa/dsd/agenda21/ (accessed on 13 May 2011).

Cairo[1] and such regional political bodies such as the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the European Charter on Water Resources.[2] Despite this growing appreciation, the right was not expressly acknowledged in the final statements of a significant number of international meetings on water.[3]

The catalyst for the international recognition of the right to water has been the authoritative but non-binding General Comment 15 on the Right to Water.[4] The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('CESCR') had earlier made passing references to a right to water.[5] In 2002, it devoted an entire recommendation to the topic. Article 11 of the International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR') states that everyone has the 'right to an adequate standard of living, including food, clothing and housing' and the Committee reasoned that the 'use of the word "including" indicates that this catalogue of rights was not intended to be exhaustive'.[6] According to the Committee, the right to water 'clearly falls within the category of guarantees essential for securing an adequate standard of living, particularly since it is one of the most fundamental conditions for survival.'[7]

The creation of the right to water attracted some controversy. For example, Tully levelled a number of arguments against the General Comment: (1) Article 11 offers no interpretive space for 'new' rights; (2) an amendment to the Covenant was necessary for incorporation of the right to water in the treaty; and (3) deference must be given to the states' omission of water in the drafting of the [1] UNDP Programme of Action of the United Nations International Conference on Population & Development (1994) available at http://www.un.org/ecosocdev/geninfo/populatin/icpd.htm (accessed on 13 May 2011) principle 2.

[2] Recommendation 14 (2001) available at https://wcd.coe.int/wcd/ViewDoc.jsp?id=231615&Site=COE (accessed on 13 May 2011) at para 5 ('Everyone has the right to a sufficient quantity of water for his or her basic … '[i]nternational human rights instruments recognise the fundamental right of all human beings to be free from hunger and to an adequate standard of living for themselves and their families. It is quite clear that these two requirements include the right to a minimum quantity of water of satisfactory quality from the point of view of health and hygiene.') The Ministers went on to provide specific recommendations on affordability and prevention of arbitrary disconnections. First. Social measures should be put in place to prevent the supply of water to destitute persons from being cut off.' Ibid. Second. It sets out a user pays system subject to the right to water: 'Without prejudice to the right to water to meet basic needs, the supply of water shall be subject to payment in order to cover financial costs associated with the production and utilisation of water resources.') Ibid at para 19.

[3] See, for example, Ministerial Declaration of the Third World Water Forum (Kyoto, 23 March 2003) available at http://www.mofa.go.jp/policy/environment/wwf/declaration.html (accessed on 13 May 2011); Ministerial Declaration of The Hague on Water Security in the 21st Century (The Hague, 22 March, 2000) available at http://www.cmaq.net/en/node/5025 (accessed on 13 May 2011); Final Declaration, International Conference on Water and Sustainable Development (Paris, 21 March 1998) available at http://www.waternunc.com/gb/decfingb.htm (accessed on 13 May 2011).

[4] CESCR General Comment 15: The Right to Water (Twenty-ninth session, 2002) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2002/11 (2003)('General Comment 15').

[5] See CESCR General Comment 6: The Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of Older Persons (Thirteenth session, 1995), U.N. Doc. E/1996/22 at 20 (1996) at para 5 (Water is referred to as a 'basic right'); CESCR Concluding Observations of CESCR: Israel UN Doc. E/C.12/1/Add.27 (12 April 1998) at para 28 (it had called on Israel to 'recognize the existing Arab Bedouin villages, the land rights of the inhabitants and their right to basic services, including water').

[6] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 2.

[7] Ibid. The Committee also stated that the right can be derived from the right to health in Article 12 though it devotes less attention to this argument.

Covenant.[1] He alleged that the General Comment has received only a lukewarm or negative reaction from states and contended that the topic of access to water would be better placed within other social rights, such as food, housing and health.

Nonetheless, most scholars recommended or applauded the Committee's stance.[2] The Committee offers a coherent legal argument.[3] The Committee draws on earlier state practice in reaching its conclusions,[4] and limits the undue expansion of the number of rights by requiring that new rights are comparable to the rights to food, clothing and housing and are of a serious and fundamental nature.[5]

In any case, in the wake of General Comment 15, states formally recognised (or re-recognised) the right to water and sanitation.[6] In July 2010, the UN General Assembly declared that 'the right to safe and clean drinking water and sanitation as a human right that is essential for the full enjoyment of life and all human rights.'[7] Two months later, the UN Human Rights Council 'affirm[ed] that the human right to safe drinking water and sanitation is derived from the right to an adequate standard of living and inextricably related to the right to the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health, as well as the right to life and human dignity.'[8]

[1] See S Tully 'A Human Right to Access Water? A Critique of General Comment No. 15' (2005) 23 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 35-63. (He makes a number of other arguments such as the absence of a UN agency for water which is somewhat absurd given the late creation of an agency for housing and the absence of one for clothing. In any case, UN Water was recently established as an initiative of 23 UN agencies.) See also M Dennis & D Stewart 'Justiciability of Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights' (2004) 98 American J of Internatioanl L 462.

[2] See S McCaffrey 'A Human Right to Water: Domestic and International Implications' (1992) 5 Georgetown International Environmental Law Review 1; P Gleick 'The Human Right to Water' (1999) 1 Water Policy 487, 478-503; H Smets 'Le Droit de Chacun a L'Eau' (2002) 2 Revue Europeene de Droit de L'environnement 123; M Vidar & M Mekouar Water, Health and Human Rights (2001); S Salman & S McInerney-Lankford The Human Right to Water: Legal and Policy Dimensions (2004); S McCaffrey 'The Human Right to Water' in E Brown Weiss, L Boisson-De Chazournes & N Bernasconi-Osterwalder (eds) Fresh Water and International Economic Law (2005); T Kiefer & C Brolmann 'Beyond State Sovereignty: The Human Right to Water' (2005) 5 Non-State Actors and International Law 183, 183–208; A Cahill 'The Human Right to Water — A Right of Unique Status: The Legal Status and Normative Content of the Right to Water' (2005) 9 International Journal of Human Rights 389, 389-410; A Cahill 'The UN Concept of the Right to Water: New Paradigm for Old Problems?' (2005) 21 International Journal of Water Resources Development 273, 273-282; Riedel & Rothen (supra).

[3] The arguments are fully set out in M Langford 'Ambition that Overleaps Itself? A Response to Stephen Tully's "Critique" of the General Comment on the Right to Water' (2006) 26 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 433, 433-459. See also S Tully 'Flighty Purposes and Deeds: A Rejoinder to Malcolm Langford' (2006) 26 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 461, 461-472; M Langford 'Expectation of Plenty: Response to Stephen Tully' (2006) 26 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 473, 473-479.

[4] See generally M Langford, A Khalfan, C Fairstein & H Jones The Right to Water: National and International Standards (2003) 120.

[5] General Comment 15 (supra) at para. 3.

[6] Between 2002 and 2010 there was a growing acknowledgment of the status of the right to water at various levels. See, for example, European Parliament Resolution on Water Management in Developing Countries and Priorities for EU Development Cooperation (4 September 2003); Commission on Human Rights Adverse Effects of the Illicit Movement and Dumping of Toxic and Dangerous Products and Wastes on the Enjoyment of Human Rights resolution 2004/17, E/CN.4/RES/2004/17 (2004).

[7] The Human Right to Water and Sanitation U.N. Doc A/64/L.63/Rev.1 (2010) at para 1.

[8] Human Rights and Access to Safe Drinking Water and Sanitation U.N. Doc. A/HRC/15/L.14 (2010).

Water and sanitation have long been accepted as elements of other human rights. The 1972 Stockholm Declaration mentions the need to protect natural resources, including water resources, for future generations[1] in the context of what became the right to environmental health.[2] The social dimensions of the emerging global water crisis have also been acknowledged internationally. The Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women ('CEDAW') explicitly mentions water and sanitation in the context of ensuring that rural women have access to adequate health care facilities.[3] In General Recommendation 24, the CEDAW Committee commented that water and sanitation were critical for the prevention of disease and the promotion of good health care.[4] Article 24 of Convention on the Rights of the Child ('CRC') maintains that access to clean drinking water is a part of a child's right to health. The CRC explicitly draws a strong link between the social and environmental dimensions of water:[5]

> States Parties shall pursue full implementation of this right and, in particular, shall take appropriate measures: … (c) To combat disease and malnutrition, including within the framework of primary health care, through, inter alia, the application of readily available technology and through the provision of adequate nutritious foods and clean drinking-water, taking into consideration the dangers and risks of environmental pollution.

[1] See E Riedel 'International Environmental Law — A Law to Serve the Public Interest?' in J Delbrück (ed) New Trends in International Lawmaking — International 'Legislation' in the Public Interest (1997) 61 and E Riedel 'Change of Paradigm in International Environmental Law' (1998) 57 Law and State 22.

[2] Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment (1972) available at http://www.unep.org/Documents.Multilingual/Default.asp?DocumentID=97&ArticleID=1503 (accessed on 13 May 2011)(Principle 1 reads: 'Man [sic] has the fundamental right to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in an environment of a quality that permits a life of dignity and well-being, and he bears a solemn responsibility to protect and improve the environment'). In Resolution 45/94, the UN General Assembly recognised 'that all individuals are entitled to live in an environment adequate for their health and well-being.' This position was reaffirmed by Judge Weeramentary in the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros case who declared that protection of the environment is a 'sine qua non for numerous human rights'. Case Concerning the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project (Slovakia-Hungary) 37 ILM 162, available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/files/92/7383.pdf (accessed on 13 May 2011). It is also arguable that the earlier International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recognises a right to environmental health in article 12(2)(b).

[3] Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women , G.A. res. 34/180, 34 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 46) at 193, U.N. Doc. A/34/46, entered into force 3 September 1981.

[4] General Recommendation 24 (20th session, 1999) at para 28.

[5] Article 24(2) reads:

States Parties shall pursue full implementation of this right and, in particular, shall take appropriate measures:

(a) To diminish infant and child mortality;

(b) To ensure the provision of necessary medical assistance and health care to all children with emphasis on the development of primary health care;

(c) To combat disease and malnutrition, including within the framework of primary health care, through, inter alia, the application of readily available technology and through the provision of adequate nutritious foods and clean drinking-water, taking into consideration the dangers and risks of environmental pollution;

(d) To ensure appropriate pre-natal and post-natal health care for mothers;

(e) To ensure that all segments of society, in particular parents and children, are informed, have access to education and are supported in the use of basic knowledge of child health and nutrition, the advantages of breastfeeding, hygiene and environmental sanitation and the prevention of accidents;

(f) To develop preventive health care, guidance for parents and family planning education and services.

The CESCR too acknowledged the role of access to water and sanitation as essential components of other rights in the ICESCR. The right to housing is said to include 'safe drinking water', 'sanitation and washing facilities' and 'site drainage'[1] and the right to education demands an adequate school with safe drinking water and sanitation facilities for both sexes.[2] In terms of the right to health, the CESCR identifies access to safe and potable water and adequate sanitation as key components of the availability, accessibility and quality of health care services, an underlying determinant of the right, a minimum core obligation and a means to realise the additional obligation in the ICESCR to improve all aspects of environmental and industrial hygiene.[3] Regional human rights instruments pay limited attention to the right to water. The situation may be changing — particularly in Africa. The European Social Charter does not explicitly refer to a right to nutrition or water, although article 11 requires contracting parties to act to combat the causes of ill-health and prevent epidemic, endemic and other diseases. This obligation naturally rests on the provision of proper sanitation and a clean water supply.[4] Article 11 of the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights merely provides a right 'to live in a healthy environment and to have access to basic public services'.[5] The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ('ACHPR') proclaims that state parties 'must take the necessary measures to protect the health of their people'.[6] The provision of water and sanitation clearly qualifies as 'necessary measures' to protect health. The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, in Free Legal Assistance v Zaire,[7] held that '[t]he failure of the Government to provide basic services such as safe drinking water and electricity and the shortage of medicine … constitutes a violation of Article 16'.[8] This relationship is made explicit in the later Protocol to the ACHPR on the Rights of Women in Africa. The first element of the right to nutrition and food in Article 15 is a requirement for states to take appropriate measures to provide women with access to clean drinking water. Article 14(2) (c) of the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child also links safe drinking water to the right to health.[9] Without safe drinking water, neither good health nor adequate nutrition is possible.

[1] General Comment 4: The Right to Adequate Housing, (Sixth session, 1991) U.N. Doc. E/1992/23, annex III at 114 (1991).

[2] General Comment 13: The Right to Education (Twenty-first session, 1999) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/1999/10 (1999), para. 6a.

[3] General Comment 14: The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health (Twenty-second session, 2000) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2000/4 (2000).

[4] A similar logic applies to the right to housing contained in article 31 of the Revised European Charter.

[5] Article 11 of the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

[6] Article 16(2).

[7] Free Legal Assistance Group, Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, Les Témoins de Jehova v Zaire Communications 25/89, 47/90, 56/91, 100/ ('Free Legal Assistance v Zaire').

[8] Ibid at para 47.

[9] Article 14(2)(c) of the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child: 'State parties to the present Charter shall undertake to pursue the full implementation of this right and in particular shall take measures: …(c) to ensure the provision of adequate nutrition and safe drinking water.'

Turning to international humanitarian law, the 1949 Geneva Conventions provide that occupying powers must provide access to minimum water supplies for prisoners and other interned persons.[1] In addition, prisoners are to be provided with shower and bath facilities as well as water, soap and other facilities for their daily personal toilet and washing requirements.[2] The Additional Protocols of 1977 prohibit the destruction of '[o]bjects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population, such as … drinking water installations and supplies and irrigation works.'[3]

International criminal law has transformed a number of these provisions into prosecutable war crimes[4] and crimes against humanity.[5] South Africa has largely incorporated the International Criminal Court Statute ('ICC Statute') into domestic law.[6] Under the ICC Statute, it is a war crime to intentionally use starvation of civilians as a method of warfare by depriving them of objects indispensable to their survival.[7] This phrase obviously resonates with the terminology in the Additional Protocols and would by implication embrace water as necessary for basic needs and livelihoods. The crime has not yet been prosecuted before international tribunals. However, the UN Security Council has often condemned the denial of food.[8] Collective punishments, including specifically collective disciplinary measures that affect food, have also been identified as a crime in the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ('ICTR').[9] The denial of food and water are potential war crimes under customary international law in other tribunals.[10]

Acts or omissions that intentionally or recklessly deprive protected persons of food, leading to death, may amount to the war crimes of 'wilful killing' or 'murder'. The International Committee of the Red Cross has commented that 'it

[1] See Geneva Convention (III) relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (1949) arts 20, 26 and 46; and Geneva Convention (IV) relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1949) arts 89 and 127.

[2] See Geneva Convention III arts 29 and 85.

[3] See Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol 1) (1977) art 54; and Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II) (1977) art 14.

[4] A war crime is a serious and criminally punishable violation of international humanitarian law committed by any person with sufficient connection to armed conflict, international or internal, against a protected person. See generally Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic a.k.a. 'Dule': Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction Case No. IT-94-1-AR72 (2 October 1995) available at http://www.icty.org/x/cases/tadic/acdec/en/51002.htm (accessed on 22 May 2011) 'Tadic-Interlocutory' and Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic a.k.a. 'Dule': Opinion and Judgment Case No. IT-94-1-AR72 [1997] ICTY 1.

[5] Crimes against humanity involve acts or omissions committed against any civilian population, in a widespread and systematic manner based upon State, organisation or group policy.

[6] Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002.

[7] Statute of ICC art 8(2)(b)(xxv). The almost identical prohibitions appear in art 54 Additional Protocol I and art 14 Additional Protocol II, and could also constitute international crimes given the decision in Tadic Interlocutory (supra) at para 134 ('Customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of Article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflict.')

[8] UN Security Council 'Statement by the President' UN Doc S/25334 (25 February 1993).

[9] Article 4*(b)*.

[10] It is prohibited under Geneva Convention IV art 33 and Protocol II art 4 at para 2*(b)*.

seems, that persons who gave instructions for the food rations of civilian internees to be reduced to such a point that deficiency diseases causing death occurred among the detainees' would be responsible for wilful killing.[1] Rottensteiner notes, however, that in three cases before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia ('ICTY') involving deprivation of food to inmates, prosecutors have not utilised this category of war crime.[2] Denial of water may, in some circumstances, amount to the war crime of torture, inhumane treatment, cruel treatment, or wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health.[3] For example, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY found in Deliac that the 'creation and maintenance of an atmosphere of terror in the Celebici prison camp, by itself and a fortiori, together with the deprivation of adequate food, water, sleeping and toilet facilities and medical care' constituted both cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health.[4]

In relation to crimes against humanity, a number of such crimes have an explicit water dimension. Extermination is defined in the Statute of the ICC to include the 'intentional infliction of conditions of life, inter alia the deprivation of access to food and medicine, calculated to bring about the destruction of part of a population.'[5] Torture and other inhumane acts also constitute a crime against humanity.[6] Deliac indicates that a crime against humanity might encompass the deprivation of water. The Prosecutor of the ICTY, in the Nikolic indictment, contended that the accused committed such a crime by:

> Participating in inhumane acts against more than 500 civilians … endangering the health and welfare of detainees by providing inadequate food, endangering the health and welfare of detainees by providing living conditions failing to meet minimal basic standards.[7]

(b) Content of the Right

Beyond the mere recognition of the right, the CESCR has determined its content in significant detail. The most difficult issue was the scope of the right. As water is ubiquitous in human life, identifying a universal and inalienable entitlement was a challenge. It is particularly necessary for realising a range of rights in the ICESCR:

[1] J Pictet (ed) Commentary, IV, Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1958) 597.

[2] She suggests that this may relate to the time and resource burdens in establishing the necessary causality. C Rottensteiner 'The Denial of Humanitarian Assistance as a Crime under International Law' (1999) 835 International Review of the Red Cross 555.

[3] These are grave breaches under common art 3 of the Geneva Conventions and art 4(2)(a) of Additional Protocol II. Rottensteiner suggests that denial of humanitarian assistance in some circumstances may amount to an 'outrage upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment' which is prohibited under the Geneva Conventions and their Protocols and constitutes an international crime under art 4*(e)* ICTR Statute, and arts 8(2)(b)(xxi) and (c)(ii) ICC Statute. Rottensteiner (supra).

[4] The Prosecutor v Zejnil Dlalic et al (16 November 1998) Case No IT-96-21-T at para 422.

[5] Arts 7(1)(b) and 7(2)(b). Extermination involves murder on a large scale but allows for sparing of some member of a group unlike genocide.

[6] Arts 7*(f)* and (k) Statute of ICC.

[7] The Prosecutor v Dragon Nikolic, a.k.a. 'Jenki', Indictment (4 November 1994) Case No IT-94-2, ICTY at para 24.1.

water is necessary for food production and environmental health as well as various livelihoods and cultural practices. The Committee eventually hived off household water uses (consumption, cooking, hygiene and, where necessary, sanitation) from other uses on the basis that they were universal and constant. Everyone requires a basic amount of water every day.

To the extent that greater amounts of water are needed for realising other rights in the ICESCR, such as food, work or environmental health, the right to water becomes conditional. That is, the CESCR states that in realising the right to food, sufficient priority should be 'given to the water resources required to prevent starvation and disease' and efforts should be directed towards 'ensuring that disadvantaged and marginalised farmers, including women farmers, have equitable access to water and water management systems'.[1] Some have argued that the Committee erred in not explicitly considering such household uses as kitchen gardening or livestock herding.[2] It may be culturally and contextually appropriate to consider such uses in some countries as 'household uses'. Van Koppen, Smits and Mikhail have demonstrated that in rural areas such uses of water are sometimes prioritised before some of the household uses identified by the CESCR.[3]

In setting out the key elements of the right, the CESCR closely hues to its approach of disaggregating according to the supply dimensions of availability and quality and the demand-side factors like accessibility and affordability. These elements should, however, be understood in a broader context: the content of the right should be framed by the principles of human dignity, life and health and must be understood as a social and cultural good and not primarily as an economic good. The CESCR argued that the right must be realized in a sustainable manner.[4]

As regards availability, the Committee chose not to specify a precise minimum amount. Instead, it stipulated that the amount must be sufficient and regular for personal and household uses. However, the amount must correspond to World Health Organisation ('WHO') guidelines. The Committee quotes two studies[5] that argue that approximately 50 litres of water is needed per day, with 20 litres as a minimum, although one of the studies places greater emphasis on minimising the distance to a water point as it is the greatest determinant of how water can be practically accessed. Other scholars argue for a higher amount and the policy in a number of developing countries is to aim higher than 50 litres.[6] In

[1] General Comment 15 (supra) at paras 6-7.

[2] M Langford 'Crossfire: There is no Human Right to Water for Livelihoods: A Debate with Melvin Woodhouse' (2009) 28(1) Waterlines 5.

[3] B Van Koppen, S Smits & M Mikhail 'Homestead- and Community-scale Multiple-use Water Services: Unlocking New Investment Opportunities to Achieve the Millennium Development Goals' (2009) 58 Irrigation and Drainage 73.

[4] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 11.

[5] See J Bartram & G Howard 'Domestic Water Quantity, Service Level and Health: What Should be the Goal for Water and Health Sectors' (2002). See also PH Gleick 'Basic Water Requirements for Human Activities: Meeting Basic Needs' (1996) 21 Water International 83.

[6] M Falkenmark 'Meeting Water Requirements of an Expanding World Population' (1997) 352 Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society London 929.

any case, General Comment 15 notes that some 'may also require additional water due to health, climate, and work conditions'.[1]

Water must be of sufficient quality. The CESCR refers to the WHO Guidelines on Drinking Water Quality[2] and indicates that water must be free from 'micro-organisms, chemical substances and radiological hazards that constitute a threat to a person's health'.[3] Quality is interpreted broadly to include acceptability. Acceptability, in turn, encompasses colour, odour and taste.

The key contributions of the CESCR are its accessibility elements: (1) physical accessibility; (2) affordability; (3) non-discrimination; and (4) access to information. 'Physically accessible' means that water must be within or in close proximity to people's homes, schools, health care facilities and workplaces. The facilities must be of sufficient quality and culturally appropriate. The Committee strongly emphasises the role of gender, noting that facilities must be designed with privacy and lifecycle concerns in mind and that physical security should not be threatened when women access water facilities.[4]

Water must also be affordable for all purposes. The Committee uses a formulation earlier deployed in defining the right to housing: 'The direct and indirect costs and charges associated with securing water must be affordable, and must not compromise or threaten the realization of other Covenant rights.'[5] Thus, the Committee steers clear of demanding water be provided free, but, later in the General Comment, it lists a number of options to ensure that water is affordable. These options include provision of free or low-cost water. Other policies such as low-cost techniques and technologies and income supplements are intended to ensure affordability.[6]

The third aspect of accessibility is non-discrimination. States parties must guarantee that the right to water is enjoyed without discrimination,[7] and equally between men and women.[8] The CESCR has observed that states parties are obliged to take steps to remove 'de facto discrimination' which means that 'the allocation of water resources, and investments in water, facilitate access to water for all members of society'.[9] To make the point, the Committee comments on a familiar scenario in Africa:

[1] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 12*(a)*.

[2] World Health Organisation Guidelines for Drinking-water Quality (2nd Edition, vols. 1-3, 1993).

[3] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 15. The Committee refers States parties to standards that are 'intended to be used as a basis for the development of national standards that, if properly implemented, will ensure the safety of drinking water supplies through the elimination of, or reduction to a minimum concentration, of constituents of water that are known to be hazardous to health.'

[4] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 12*(c)*(i).

[5] Ibid at para 12*(c)*(ii).

[6] Ibid at para 27.

[7] ICESCR art 2 para 2.

[8] ICESCR art 3. The express and implied prohibited discrimination on the grounds according to the Committee are race, colour, sex, age, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, physical or mental disability, health status (including HIV/AIDS), sexual orientation and civil, political, social or other status.

[9] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 14.

> investments should not disproportionately favour expensive water supply services and facilities that are often accessible only to a small, privileged fraction of the population, rather than investing in services and facilities that benefit a far larger part of the population.[1]

The General Comment makes extensive reference to the duty of government to confront the obstacles faced by women, children, rural and deprived urban areas, indigenous peoples, nomadic communities, refugees, asylum seekers, people with disabilities, and prisoners and detainees. Importantly, the General Comment covers residents of informal settlements, and stresses their right to receive water irrespective of the legal status of their occupation of the land or housing. The CESCR has often addressed the situation of ethnic groups in its concluding observations. Libya, for example, was urged to 'implement the right of the Amazigh population to access safe water in the regions of Nefoussa and Zouara, and to report back to the Committee on this issue in its next report' given that other regions in the country had greatly improved access.[2] The Committee has also expressed concern about discrimination with respect to access to water in the following situations: Palestinians, Bedouins and Israeli Arabs in Israel;[3] prisoners in Yemen and Zambia;[4] Roma in various European countries;[5] Travellers in Ireland; indigenous peoples in Canada;[6] internally displaced people and a range of other marginalised groups in Georgia; and refugees and internally displaced people in Azerbaijan.[7]

The final dimension is information accessibility. The right to water must embrace the ability to seek, to receive and to impart information that ensures the efficacy of it use.[8]

[1] General Comment 15 (supra).

[2] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Libyan Arab Jamahiriya UN Doc. E/C.12/LYB/CO/2 (25 January 2006) at paras 18 and 35. See also comments on Amazigh population and right to water in Concluding Observations of CESCR: Morocco UN Doc. E/C.12/MAR/CO/3 (2006); and access to water in Republika Srpska in Concluding observations of CESCR: Bosnia and Herzegovina E/C.12/BIH/CO/1 (2006) at paras 27 and 49.

[3] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Israel UN Doc. E/C.12/1/Add.27 (1998) at paras 10, 24, 26 and 28.

[4] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Yemen E/C.12/1/Add.92 (2003) at para 18; Concluding Observations of CESCR: Zambia UN Doc. E/C.12/1/Add.106 (2005).

[5] See Concluding Observations of CESCR: The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia 24/11/2006. E/C.12/MKD/CO/1.

[6] See Concluding Observations of CESCR: Canada UN Doc. E/C.12/CAN/CO/4-E/C.12/CAN/CO/5 (2006) at para 16.

[7] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Azerbaijan E/C.12/1/Add.20 (1997) at para 52.

[8] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 48.

(c) State Obligations

The general duty of state parties to progressively realise the right to water and avoid deliberate retrogressive measures is articulated by the CESCR in General Comment 15. The Committee appears to be at pains to emphasise that the right to water can be realised quickly:

> Realization of the right should be feasible and practicable, since all states parties exercise control over a broad range of resources, including water, technology, financial resources and international assistance, as with all other rights in the Covenant.[1]

The General Comment then breaks down state parties' obligations into three simple duties: respect, protect and fulfil.

The duty to respect is understood as a state obligation not to interfere unjustly with a person's access to water. The following examples spring to mind: denial of equal access; interference with customary or traditional arrangements for water allocation; pollution; and extraction. The Committee clearly specifies that when a household cannot pay for water, disconnection should only proceed if there is sufficient justification, due process and an alternative, adequate and appropriate water source.[2] The Committee has taken up these issues in its concluding observations on Israel. It expressed concern about the impact of security fences on access to water resources for Palestinians and the 'inequitable management, extraction and distribution of shared water resources' by the Israeli government which limited 'access to, distribution and availability of water for Palestinians in the occupied territories.'[3]

General Comment 15 is more precise about the duty to protect than earlier general comments.[4] The Committee first provides examples of state duties to protect: legislate; ensure private actors do not deny equal access; and prevent pollution and inequitable extraction by third parties. However, the General Comment then addresses private actors who provide water services. It specifically requires the state to create a sufficient regulatory framework, including penalties for non-compliance, that ensures that the private sector will act consistently with democratic principles such as participation, and that pushes private actors to take the necessary steps to assist in the realisation of the right to water — or at least not frustrate the objective. An earlier draft used even stronger language. The deleted language called for the deferral of privatisation until a regulatory framework was in place. At the same time, the General Comment opens with the phrase that water is a 'public good'. A 'public good' suggests, at a minimum, that a state should ensure that its possession, use or development is a collective concern. By placing the gloss of a public good on the right to water, the Committee suggests the degree of its unease with private solutions. Some authors, such as Matthew Craven, have criticised the CESCR though for not going far enough on the question of privatisation: 'one may sense that the Committee may be legislating for its own

[1] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 18.

[2] Ibid at para 56. It concludes its prescriptions on due process by noting that '[u]nder no circumstances shall an individual be deprived of the minimum essential level of water'.

[3] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Israel (supra) at para 25.

[4] Ibid at paras 23-24.

absence — or excluding its own competence — in the very area in which the discussion of water rights is most acute and in which the Committee's voice is perhaps most needed'.[1] Nonetheless, the CESCR has perhaps been more stringent in its concluding observations than in the General Comment. In the case of Morocco, it expressed concern over 'privatization of public services such as water and electricity in urban centres in Morocco, the effect of which is to impose an additional economic burden on families living in shantytowns and thus aggravate their poverty.'[2] In 2001, it recommended that Nepal 'ensure that projects involving privatization of water supply provide for continued, assured and affordable access to water by local communities, indigenous people, and the most disadvantaged and marginalized.'[3]

The final domestically-oriented obligation is the duty to fulfil. As we noted earlier, the CESCR strives to emphasise that the realisation of the right was practical (despite the reality that water scarcity and resources constraints are growing problems in many states, and therefore a limiting factor with respect to the right's realisation.) Accordingly, the Committee writes that the Covenant requires that governments use all available resources to progressively implement the right to water. The right does not have to be realised overnight, the Committee maintained, but the government must immediately take steps in the direction of ensuring universal access. According to the General Comment, this includes developing a plan and strategy to expand affordable access while also protecting the quality of the water supply. States must also: actively search for the necessary resources, nationally and locally; implement the plan and monitor its implementation over time; and provide systems of accountability so that citizens, NGOs and others can provide information or complaints about failures in the system. For the first time in the CESCR's jurisprudence, reference is made to a duty of states to properly engage with provincial or regional governments and local authorities. The national government must ensure that these units have sufficient resources to fulfil the right to water and do not discriminate in its provision.[4]

In concluding observations, the Committee has been growing slightly more specific on the steps needed to improve access. In the case of Georgia, the Committee recommended that the state:

> [T]ake effective measures, in consultation with relevant civil society organizations, to improve the situation of internally displaced persons, including the adoption of a comprehensive programme of action aiming at ensuring more effectively their rights to adequate housing, food and water, health services and sanitation, employment and education, and the regularization of their status in the State party … [and] continue its efforts to improve the living conditions of its population, in particular by ensuring that the infrastructure for water, energy provision and heating is improved[.] [5]

[1] M Craven 'Some Thoughts on the Emergent Right to Water' in E Riedel & P Rothen (eds) The Human Rights to Water (2006) 35 at 45-46.

[2] Concluding Observations of CESCR: Morocco (supra).

[3] Conclusions and recommendations of CESCR, Nepal U.N. Doc. E/C.12/1/Add.66 (2001) at paras 41-42.

[4] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 51.

[5] Concluding Observations of the CESCR: Georgia E/C.12/1/Add.83 (2002) at paras 31 and 40.

In the case of Yemen, a water-stressed state, the Committee addressed the human rights dimension of water allocations and the need to take preventive action to protect and improve water resources.[1]

The General Comment also sets out the 'international' obligations to respect, protect and fulfil under article 2(1). In the case of the right to water these obligations are quite specific. States are required to: respect the right in other countries; prevent their nationals and registered corporations from harming the water rights of others overseas; take steps to provide financial and in-kind support to poorer countries struggling to assist their residents; ensure that the international financial institutions of which they are members do not violate the right;[2] and impose sanctions regimes that provide for repairs to infrastructure essential to provide clean water and do not disrupt access to water.

(d) Comparative Law

While South Africa was one of the first countries to incorporate the right to water into its constitution, the right has increasingly become more common and detailed in constitutions across the globe.[3] Since 2000, the number of constitutions with the right to water has tripled.[4] For example, article 23(20) of the Constitution of Ecuador provides that the state shall 'recognise and guarantee to the people' the 'right to a quality of life that ensures … potable water'. Article 249 goes on to clarify that:

> The State shall be responsible for the provision of public utilities of potable water and irrigation … The State may provide those services directly or by means of delegation to mixed public-private companies or private companies, through concession, association, capitalisation, or other contractual forms. The contractual conditions may not be unilaterally modified … The State shall guarantee that public utilities supplied under its control and regulation, respond to the principles of efficiency, responsibility, universality, accessibility, continuity and quality; and will ensure that their tariffs are equitable

The Ecuadorian state is also mandated by its constitution to promote local and communal solutions for the management and provision of water.[5] Article 14 of

[1] Concluding Observations of the CESCR: Yemen (supra) at paras 19, 37, 38 ('The Committee is concerned about the persisting water crisis which constitutes an alarming environmental emergency in the State party, and which prevents access to safe and affordable drinking water, particularly for the disadvantaged and marginalized groups of society, and for rural areas…. The Committee urges the State party to introduce strategies, plans of action, and legislative or other measures to address the scarcity of water problems, in particular the sustainable management of the available water resources. The Committee recommends that effective water management strategies and measures be undertaken in urban setting, exploring possibilities for alternative water treatment and developing ecological dry sanitation methods in rural settings.')

[2] See, further, A Khalfan Implementing General Comment No. 15 on the Right to Water in National and International Law and Policy (2005).

[3] See, generally, M Langford, A Khalfan, C Fairstein & H Jones Legal Resources for the Right to Water: International and National Standards (2004)('Legal Resources').

[4] See T Kiefer Legal Recognition of the Right to Water (2009).

[5] Art 246 states: 'The State shall promote the development of communal or self-management companies, such as cooperatives … potable water management councils and others of similar type, whose property and management belongs to the community or the people that work in them, use their services or consume their products.'

the Constitution of Uganda provides that 'all Ugandans enjoy rights and opportunities and access to … clean and safe water'. Another notable example is Uruguay. A successful constitutional referendum in 2004 recognised the right to water and was supplemented with a proviso that the water supply was to remain in public hands.[1] Other constitutions specifically impose duties upon the state to ensure adequate water for the population at large or contain directive principles for state policy in the area.[2] The environmental aspects of water supply are also protected in a significant number of constitutional documents. These constitutions empower, or command, the states to protect their natural water resources.[3]

Even when the right to water has not been explicitly included in the text of the constitution, foreign constitutional jurisprudence evinces a number of instances in which the right to water has been derived from other constitutional rights. In Arrêt no 36/98, the Belgian Court of Arbitration recognised the right of everyone to a minimum supply of drinking water by utilising article 23 of Belgium's Constitution — the right to the protection of a healthy environment.[4] In India, in Hussain v Union of India, the High Court of Kerala found that the 'right to sweet water, and the right to free air, are attributes of the [constitutional] right to life, for these are the basic elements which sustain life itself'.[5] This holding was later affirmed by the Indian Supreme Court.[6] In Ryan v AG, the Irish Supreme Court similarly recognised the right to water as a natural consequence of the expressly articulated right to life.[7]

The following sections provide a brief overview of how national and regional adjudicators have addressed various dimensions of the right to water.

(i) Availability

In Delhi Water Supply & Sewage Disposal Undertaking & Another v State of Haryana & Others, the Supreme Court of India found that there was insufficient water, even for drinking, available in Delhi in the summer months.[8] The State of Haryana, the upper riparian on the River Yamuna, did not release sufficient water from the Tejwala Head. The Court accorded priority to water use for drinking purposes and held that 'it would be mocking nature to force the people who live on the bank of a river to remain thirsty, whereas others incidentally placed in an advantageous

[1] See 'Referendum Gives Resounding "No" to the Privatisation of Water' Inter Press Service News Agency (1 November 2005) available at http://www.ipsnews.net/print.asp?idnews=26097 (accessed on 22 May 2011).

[2] See, for example, the constitutions of Colombia, Zambia, Iran, Zambia, Gambia and Venezuela and commentary in M Langford 'The Right to Water in National Law: A Review' in Riedel & Rothen (supra) at 115-126; and M Langford, A Khalfan, C Fairstein and H Jones, Legal Resources for the Right to Water: International and National Standards (Geneva: COHRE, 2004), available at www.cohre.org.water.

[3] Examples include Uganda (preamble), Cambodia (art 59), Eritrea (art 10), Co-Operative Republic of Guyana (art 10), Iran (art 45), Laos (art 17), Mexico (art 27), Nigeria (art 20), Portugal (art 81), and Venezuela (art 127).

[4] Wemmel Community, Moniteur Belge, 24/4/98 (1 April 1998).

[5] Hussain v Union of India OP 2741/1988 (26 February 1990).

[6] Subhash Kumar v State of Bihar & Others (1991) AIR 420.

[7] [1965] IR 294, 315.

[8] AIR 1996 SC 2992, (1996) 2 SCC 572, [1996] 3 SCR 13 ('Delhi Water Supply').

position are allowed to use the water for non-drinking purposes'.[1] It found that the upper riparian may not deny the lower riparian 'the benefit of using the water … for quenching the thirst of its residents' and directed the State of Haryana to supply a sufficient quantity of water for domestic purposes to Delhi. In addition, the Court ordered that the two reservoirs in Delhi be kept full to capacity through the supply of water from the River Yamuna.

(ii) Quality of water

Cases concerning the quality of water have addressed both discrete communities and all residents in a water catchment area. An excellent example of the former is Valentina Norte Colony, Defensoría de Menores Nro 3V Poder Ejecutivo Municipal s/ acción de amparo in Argentina.[2] A provincial Children's Public Defender brought a case on behalf of the children of a rural community whose drinking water was contaminated by oil. The court of first instance ordered that the authorities immediately supply 100 litres per day of drinkable water to each child and to each member of their families until the contamination had been removed. The Court later slightly reduced the amount of water and limited it to those families that were legally settled. However this reversal in course was later overturned by the provincial Supreme Court. The provincial Supreme Court took its cue, in part, from provisions of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the internationally recognised demands for higher daily allotments of water for children. In a similar case, the Public Defender filed an amparo action to protect indigenous Mapuche children from water contaminated with lead and mercury.[3] The provincial Civil Court of Appeals upheld the trial court order compelling the province to provide 250 litres of drinking water daily per inhabitant and to take measures to address any damage to health caused by metal contamination. While water was brought in on a daily basis to the community, the state failed to comply with the more systemic orders in relation to water supply and health. A complaint was later filed with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.[4] The state then committed itself to provide affected children with treatment at Gutierrez Hospital, in Buenos Aires, to establish a water treatment plant, and to disclose information on the source of the contamination.

In various countries, public interest litigants have invoked a panoply of constitutional rights to protect water sources. In Hussain v Union of India, the High Court considered conflicting evidence regarding the impact on water quality of a government agency's plans to dig wells on a set of islands.[5] The court required that the agency's plans be referred for official review in order to protect the right

[1] Delhi Water Supply (supra).

[2] Expte. 46-99. Acuerdo 5 del Tribunal Superior de Justicia. Neuquen (2 March 1999).

[3] Menores Comunidad Paynemil s/acción de Amparo Division II of Neuquen's Civil Court of Appeals (19 May 1997).

[4] Mapuche Paynemil and Kaxipayiñ Communities Case No 12.010.

[5] Hussain v Union of India (supra). For an overview of the extensive litigation on water pollution in India, see S Muralidhar 'India: The Expectations and Challenges of Judicial Enforcement of Social Rights' in M Langford (ed) Social Rights Jurisprudence: Emerging Trends in International and Comparative Law (2008) 102.

to water. In Bangladesh, in Dr. Mohiuddin Farooque & Others v Bangladesh & Others, the Government authorities were directed to implement and to ensure compliance with water and air pollution control laws based upon a sweeping interpretation of the constitutional right to life.[1] The Minister of Industries was also directed to ensure that no new industrial units and factories were set up without first arranging adequate and sufficient measures to control pollution. In Surendra Bhandari, in Nepal, the Supreme Court found violations of an implied Constitutional right to environmental health and issued an interdict that forced the respondent industry to comply with its promise to remove pollution of water sources within three months. The relevant District Administration Office was required to monitor the implementation of the order.[2] In Matanza-Riachuelo, collective action was taken against the Argentinean government for failing to regulate more than 3,000 corporations whose industrial activities affected a large river basin, home to 7 million people and the largest proportion of Argentina's poorest communities.[3] After a process involving multiple parties, the Argentinean Supreme Court issued a series of interim structural orders for the development of detailed plans and monitoring procedures. By 2007, a plan had been adopted and the Court requested a federal court to monitor enforcement of the decision.

The quality of water in urban and peri-urban supply services has been challenged. In Prakash Mani Sharma,[4] the Nepal Supreme Court agreed that the state had a responsibility to respect the people's right to pure and clean drinking water as well as to implement legislation requiring it to oversee, to inspect and to monitor the activities of the Water Services Corporation. However, the Court found that it could not assess whether the level of parasites and pathogens in the water contravened WHO standards — as claimed by the applicants. [5] At the same time, it stressed that the Water Services Corporation could not claim immunity from its duties. The Court requested that the Ministry of Physical Planning give appropriate directives to the corporation.[6] In Bhojraj Aire,[7] the Nepal Supreme Court was stricter in relation to the setting of quality standards and ordered the water and [1] Supreme Court, High Court Division, Special Original Jurisdiction, Writ Petition No 891 of 1994 (15 July 2001).

[2] Surendra Bhandari & Others v Shree Distillery Private Ltd & Others Writ No 3259 of the Nepali year 2053, reprinted in Supreme Court Judgments on Constitutional Issues (2001) 206. See also Surya Shama Dhungel v Godavari Marbles Industries, N.K.P. Golden Jubilee Special Issue 2052 at 169.

[3] File M. 1569. XL, Supreme Court of Argentina (8 July 2008).

[4] Prakash Mai Sharma v Nepal Khanepani Sansthan (Nepal Water Supply Corporation) & Others, Writ No 2237 of the year 2047, decision dated 2057/3/26.

[5] The petitioner also cited a study report conducted by the Contagious Disease Department of the Ministry of Health, where the department had collected samples from the water of different restaurants. The study showed the presence of 9000 germs in 100ml of water. According to the petitioner the activities of the Corporation stood against art 11(1) of the 1962 Constitution and ss 3, 5, 6 of the Water Supply Corporation Act 2046.

[6] One can understand that under the 1962 Constitution the Court had difficulty in evaluating evidence, but by the time it gave the decision, the 1990 constitution was already in operation. It could have referred to that.

[7] Bhojraj Aire v Ministry of Water Resources & Others Writ No 3305 of the Nepali year 2056, decision dated 2058/6/11.

environmental ministries to ensure that the water quality standard and pollution tolerance limit met statutory requirements.[1]

(iii) Physical Accessibility and Affordability

In Botswana, the Court of Appeal drew on international standards concerning the right to water to address a prohibition on repairing a well for drinking water. In 2006, a majority of the High Court in Sesana found that an indigenous San community had been wrongfully evicted from the Kalahari Game Reserve and the refusal to provide hunting licenses violated the Constitution.[2] However, the community was later denied permission to repair a borehole for drinking water. In Mosetlhanyane & Matsipane v The Attorney General, the Court of Appeal unanimously held that the community had a statutory right, under the Water Act, as lawful occupiers of land to sink a borehole for domestic purposes.[3] The Court went further and agreed with the applicants that the denial amounted to degrading treatment under the Constitution. After referring to the dire health impacts on the community, the Court cited the international consensus on the right to water as embodied in General Comment 15 and the UN General Assembly's formal recognition of the right in July 2010. The Government was ordered to 'refrain from inflicting degrading treatment'. The Court took steps to facilitate the community's exercise of their right to rehabilitate the bore hole, albeit at the community's own expense.

In Kranti v Union of India & Others, the Supreme Court of India dealt with the adverse living conditions faced by the inhabitants of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands after the tsunami in 2004: the tsunami had caused extensive damage to the shelters and livelihoods of the island inhabitants.[4] The petitioners applied for interim relief to mitigate the effects of the disaster and argued that the available funds were being utilised improperly. The Court issued an interim order directing the local administration to take immediate steps for rain water harvesting, to clean out and to recharge the existing wells and to dig new wells if necessary in order to provide for the drinking water needs of the inhabitants.

A number of foreign cases address the direct or indirect responsibility of private actors. In Mme Lefevre v Ville d'Amiens, Cour de Cassation, Troisième chambre civile, a French tenant had complained that a public housing provider had failed to provide running water.[5] The High Court agreed with the provider that it was not possible to provide water and noted that the tenant had been offered alternative accommodation. The Supreme Court disagreed and found that reasonable housing accommodation — one of the constitutional objectives to protect human

[1] See also Bhojraj Aire v Ministry of Population and Environment, Writ No 4193 of the Nepali year 2056, decision dated 058/10/26. Failure to set standards for other areas of water and air pollution was a violation of constitutional rights to life and environmental health.

[2] Sesana & Others v Attorney General [2006] (2) BLR 633 (HC).

[3] Case No CACLB-074-10 (27 January 2011).

[4] Kranti v Union of India & Others, Civil Appeal No. 2681 of 2007, arising out of S.L.P (c) No. 4716/2006, decided on 16 May 2007.

[5] Supreme Court, 3rd Civil Chamber, Arrêt No 1362 (15 December 2004).

dignity — includes the provision of running water. It ruled that a landlord is responsible for providing access to potable water to a tenant.

In Indonesia, the Constitutional Court reviewed the constitutionality of the Indonesian Law on Water Resources. A challenge mounted by various NGOs contended that the law had encouraged the privatisation of water services.[1] The Court rejected the petition and declared the law to be conditionally constitutional. It passed muster only if it was interpreted, implemented and applied in accordance with the conditions established by the Court. If these conditions were not met, then the law could be subjected to a further review. In its judgment, the Court acknowledged that access to water is a human right: it grounded its finding in various sources of international law and article 28H of the Indonesian Constitution (the right to a life of well-being in body and mind.) The Court stressed that the state has the obligation to respect, to protect and to fulfil the human right to water and held that the responsibilities of the Government, as laid down in the Law on Water Resources, must be interpreted in light of the right to water. Regarding water resources allocation, the Court stressed that '[t]he Government is obligated to prioritize untreated water to fulfil the daily needs for every individual'.[2] The Court further stated that a price can be charged for water processing and distribution. However, the price must not be unaffordable, the mechanism for arriving at the price should be transparent and the various costs should be determined in consultation with communities. The Court also suggested that community participation, as a general matter, should be prioritised in water management.

(iv) Disconnections

Disconnection of water services has often been dealt with under consumer or utility law. However, treatment of water as a utility — when the utility is state-owned — has often been a bulwark against private overreach and subjected the utility to state oversight. Of course, state ownership or regulation of a monopoly is no guarantee that those persons in the greatest need will receive the water that they require. As a result, challenges to disconnection have increased in lock step with the increased recognition of the right to water. In England, the Queen's Bench has held that automatic cut-offs of the water supply upon the exhaustion of credit in a prepaid meter were inconsistent with the statutory requirement of notice before disconnection.[3] In Brazil, the Special Jurisdiction Appellate Court of Paraná found that the disconnection of a water supply, even for non-payment, violated constitutional rights to essential services.[4] In Rajah Ramachandran v Perbadanan Bekalan Air Pulau Pinang Sdn Bhd, the High Court of Malaya, found that disconnection of water services due to non-payment of an inexplicably high

[1] Judicial Review of the Law No 7 of 2004 on Water Resources, Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia, 058-059-060-063/PUUII/2004 (19 July 2005).

[2] Ibid.

[3] R v Director of Water Services, ex parte Lancashire County Council, Liverpool City Council, Manchester City Council, Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council, Tameside Metropolitan Borough Council and Birmingham City Council [1999] Env LR 114, [1998] EWHC 213 (QB). This case is discussed in some depth in § 56B.4*(c)* (ii) below.

[4] Bill of Review, 0208625-3.

water bill was unreasonable.[1] The Court argued that the defendant should have taken a less drastic action that would have caused less inconvenience to the consumer. It could sue the consumer in Court as a 'reasonable' person would. The Court held that the consumer was entitled to an explanation for the bill and that the 'draconian act of cutting off supply was too harsh in the circumstances of this case'.[2]

In François X & the Union Fédérale des Consommateurs d'Avignon v Société Avignonnaise des Eaux, the Avignon Federal Union of Consumers applied to the Court for the reconnection of their water supply. It had been disconnected following a dispute concerning the application of tarification.[3] The French Court found that, pursuant to article 809(1) of the New Code of Civil Procedure, a Circuit Court judge may make an order to prevent imminent prejudice. It ruled that 'disconnecting water amounted to depriv[ing] an essential element of the life of a family made up of six people, of which four are children … and constitutes an important impediment and health risk which could only be remedied by the immediate reconnection of water supply'.[4]

56B.3 South African Law

(a) Explicit and implicit recognition

Section 27(1)(b) of the Final Constitution provides that 'everyone has the right to have access to sufficient food and water'. This right belongs to a cluster of rights that obliges the state to 'take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of each of these rights'.[5] It must be pointed out that the constitutional protection of the right to water does not flow only from FC s 27(1)(b). Rather, a range of other constitutional provisions indirectly recognise and support the right to water. This multiple and overlapping recognition demonstrates the significance of water to humanity and underscores the interrelatedness of water rights and other rights. For example, the right of access to sufficient food is protected in the same provision as the right of access to water because food and water are intimately connected in practice and theory.[6] Water forms an essential component of human nutrition as it is an indispensable raw material for food production[7] Likewise, '[a]ccess to sufficient,

[1] Civil Suit No 22-716-2003 (2 March 2004).

[2] Ibid.

[3] Swiss Tribunal de Grande Instance (District Court) of Avignon, Order No. 1492/95 (12 May 1995) ('François X'). See also In CISE v Association Consommateurs Fontauliere, Tribunal de Grande Instance (District Court) of Privas, Order No. 9800223 (5 March 1998).

[4] François X (supra).

[5] FC s 27(2).

[6] The right of children to nutrition is specifically protected in FC s 28(1)(c). For more on FC s 28(1)(c), see A Friedman, A Pantazis & A Skelton 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, July 2009) § 47.4.

[7] D Chirwa 'Water Rights' in S Khoza (ed) Socio-economic Rights in South Africa: A Resource Book (2007) 343, 352.

affordable, clean water for hygiene purposes should be seen as part of the primary health care services'[1] protected in FC s 27(1)(a).[2]

The significance of water to housing cannot be gainsaid. It thus does not come as a surprise that, in Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others, the Constitutional Court proffered an expansive definition of adequate housing that 'requires available land, appropriate services such as the provision of water and the removal of sewage.'[3] Apart from linking water with housing, this dictum establishes another important connection, in the South African context at least, between water and land. In South Africa, access to water has historically been interwoven with access to land. The so-called riparian principle held that a landowner had the exclusive right to use the water sources on her land, including water emanating from streams and dams on their land and ground water. This principle, in the context of a state-backed apartheid system of disinheriting black people from land ownership, meant that the majority of the people in South Africa did not have control over water resources. In order to rectify this historical injustice, the right of equitable access to land protected by FC s 25 provisions regarding land reform are critical. To the extent that we remain 'locked in' to apartheid era, quasi-private control of riparian rights, the majority of South Africans will continue to be denied adequate access to water. Seen in light of the FC s 26 right of access to housing and its concomitant right against arbitrary evictions, restrictions on access to water for domestic use or for cultivating crops and animals may amount to a constructive eviction that has to be justified in terms of the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act[4] and the Extension of Security of Tenure Act[5] ('ESTA').[6]

Claims to water can also be grounded in FC s 24: the only so-called 'third generation' right protected in the South African Bill of Rights. FC s 24 entitles everyone to 'an environment that is not harmful to their health or well-being', and imposes an obligation on the state to protect the environment by, among other

[1] White Paper on Water Policy for South Africa (1997) available at www.dwaf.gov.za/documents/policies/nwpwp.pdf (accessed on 22 May 2011) at para 2.1.8.

[2] In Free Legal Assistance Group & Others v Zaire Communications 25/89, 47/90, 56/91, 100/93 (2000) AHRLR 74 (ACHPR 1996) at para 47 (The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights held that 'the failure of the government [of Zaire] to provide basic services such as safe drinking water and electricity and the shortage of medicine' amounted to a violation of the right to health under article 16 of the African Charter on Human and peoples Rights).

[3] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 ('Grootboom') at para 35.

[4] Act 3 of 1996 ('Labour Tenants Act').

[5] Act 62 of 1997.

[6] The Labour Tenants Act s 1(vi) defines 'eviction' as including the deprivation of a right to occupy or use land. 'Right in land' means 'any real or personal right in land, including a right to share cropping or grazing land'. See Labour Tenants Act s 1(xvi). Similarly, ESTA s 1(1)(vi) defines 'evict' as to 'deprive a person against his or her will of residence on land, or the use of land, or access to water that is linked to a right of residence in this Act'. See also Mosetlhanyane & Another v The Attorney General CACLB-074-10 (27 January 2011)(The Botswana Court of Appeal emphasised that lawful occupiers of land have an 'inherent' right to extract groundwater from beneath that land for domestic purposes. Ibid at para 16. The Court pointed out that limitation or restriction of access to water necessary for domestic use, to the extent that such limitation or restriction makes continued occupation of the relevant land difficult and induces lawful occupiers to relocate, 'render[s] meaningless' any rights of lawful occupation. Ibid at paras 7, 12 and 16.)

things, preventing pollution and promoting conservation 'through reasonable legislative and other measures'.[1] At the same time, the right requires the 'ecologically sustainable development and use of natural resources' in a way that promotes 'justifiable economic and social development'.[2] The Water Services Act[3] represents a legislative attempt to meet these obligations. Water is a fundamental component of a healthy environment and a critical natural resource, and the Water Services Act recognises this in the clear connection it draws between the rights to sufficient water and to a clean and healthy environment. The preamble to the Act emphasises that it rests on 'the rights of access to basic water supply and basic sanitation … and an environment not harmful to health or well-being'. The interconnected web of rights in which our concern for water is anchored is reflected in the set of interconnected obligations that the state bears in terms of these rights. The National Water Act[4] articulates many of these obligations, and sets out in law a commitment to both sustainable and equitable use of water.[5] The preamble to the Act recognises that South Africa's discriminatory history has prevented equal access to water, and acknowledges the government's responsibility to protect the nation's water resources and ensure the redistribution of water. In line with this governmental responsibility, s 3 of the Act vests ownership of water in the nation as a whole, as 'an indivisible national asset', and designates the executive as the public trustee of that asset.

While the National Water Act establishes the principles and procedures for the management and protection of the nation's water resources, the Water Services Act deals with the supply of water to the population. The substance of the two Acts is closely linked. Proper water supply is impossible without effective management of water resources. Although the provision of water supply and sanitation services is distinct from the overall management of water resources, the preamble to the Water Services Act notes that water provision 'must be undertaken in a manner consistent with the broader goals of water resource management'. The Constitutional Court, for its part, has recognised this connection. In Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg, O'Regan J, writing for a unanimous Court, stated that the Water Services Act 'highlights the connection between the rights of people to have access to a basic water supply and government's duty to manage water ser-

[1] FC ss 24*(a)* and (b)(i) & (ii). For more on FC s 24, see M Van der Linde & E Basson 'Environment' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 2, October 2010) Chapter 50.

[2] FC s 24*(b)*(iii).

[3] Act 108 of 1997.

[4] Act 36 of 1998.

[5] Sustainability and equity are guiding principles of the National Water Act. They appear both in the Act's preamble and the general explanatory paragraphs at the beginning of each chapter, as well as in many of the operative sections of the Act. Section 2 states that the purpose of the National Water Act is to ensure that the country's water resources are protected, used, developed, conserved, managed and controlled in ways which take into account the need to promote equitable access to water and the need to promote efficient, sustainable and beneficial use of water. The section lists a number of factors to be taken into account in the management of water resources, ranging from social concerns like the need to meet growing water demand, promote social and economic development and meet the basic water needs of present and future generations, to the environmental imperatives to protect biodiversity and aquatic ecosystems and prevent pollution and degradation of water resources.

vices sustainably.'[1] Fulfilling the promise of sufficient water for all, she continued, 'will require careful management of a scarce resource. The need to preserve water is a responsibility that affects all spheres of government'.[2]

The following discussion does not set out an exhaustive analysis of all the rights that are relevant to the protection and to the advancement of water rights.[3] It does however give a glimpse of the fluidity of the right to water as a constitutional claim, its connection with other rights and, most importantly, its essentiality. It also exposes the difficulty in the contextual or reasonableness approach to the constitutional interpretation of socio-economic rights adopted by the Constitutional Court. In Soobramoney v Minister of Health,[4] the Court refused to hold that the right to life imposes a positive obligation on the state to provide life saving treatment to a critically ill patient. It contended, implicitly, that limited public health system resources placed an inevitable and unfortunate brake on claims brought under FC s 11's the right to life. (The decision itself largely limits its analysis to claims brought by Mr Soobramoney under FC s 27's rights of access to adequate health care and to emergency medical treatment.) However, claims to water rights are clearly multifaceted and cannot be resolved comprehensively and effectively through FC s 27(1)(b) alone. Boldly stated, therefore, the right of access to water can only be fully realised by a combination of water-specific policies and carefully constructed generic policies concerning other social services such as the environment, sanitation, health, food, housing and land.

(b) The meaning of FC s 27(1)(b)

(i) The prevailing approach to FC s 27 rights

While Mazibuko represents the first case in which the Constitutional Court has dealt directly with the FC s 27(1)(b) right to sufficient water, the Court's prevailing approach to the socio-economic rights conferred in s 27(1) retains a determinative influence over our nascent right-to-water jurisprudence. This interpretative authority flows, on a formal level, from the fact that the right to have access to sufficient water in FC s 27(1)(b) is qualified in exactly the same way by FC s 27(2) as the rights to health care, social assistance and food, in FC ss 27(1)(a), (c) and (d). Along with the FC s 26(1), the right to have access to adequate housing, all of these rights are subject to the state's obligation to take reasonable and other legislative measures, within available resources, to achieve their progressive realisation.

In addition, the Constitutional Court has made it clear in judgments dealing with these rights that neither the s 26(1) right nor the s 27(1) rights exist as self-contained or stand-alone entitlements to the socio-economic resources they concern. Rather, the Court's conjunction of ss 27(1) and 27(2) has resulted in a somewhat inverted analysis in terms of which the content of each right rests on the reasonableness of the state's response to progressively realising that right. Determining

[1] 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28 ('Mazibuko').

[2] Ibid at para 3.

[3] Other relevant rights include the right to equality, dignity, life, administrative justice and the right of detainees to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity.

[4] 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC), [1997] ZACC 17 ('Soobramoney') at para 15.

the content of each right in the first place — that is, working out what the right entitles citizens to — is to proceed on the basis of a determination in the second place of what it would be reasonable for the state to provide, within its available resources, in order to realise the right progressively. In Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign the Court held that 'section 27(1) of the Constitution does not give rise to a self-standing and independent positive right enforceable irrespective of the considerations mentioned in section 27(2).'[1] This approach was affirmed in Khosa v Minister of Social Development, where Mokgoro J stated that 'the ambit of the s 27(1) right can … not be determined without reference to the reasonableness of the measures adopted to fulfil the obligation towards those entitled to the right in s 27(1).'[2] The Court extended this understanding of socio-economic rights to the right to water in Mazibuko:

> Applying this approach to section 27(1)(b), the right of access to sufficient water, coupled with section 27(2), it is clear that the right does not require the state upon demand to provide every person with sufficient water without more; rather, it requires the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures progressively to realise the achievement of the right to sufficient water, within available resources.[3]

This approach has drawn criticism.[4] It is difficult to understand quite how the content of a justiciable right to a socio-economic good, claimable against the government, is defined by the action that government itself takes in providing access to that socio-economic good. The Court has, since Grootboom, fallen back on the notion of reasonableness to assess whether the state's legislative and policy responses to a socio-economic need will pass constitutional muster.

Criticism notwithstanding, the approach is consistent with the Court's reluctance to accept the idea that socio-economic rights carry some kind of 'minimum core content' enforceable against the state in all circumstances.[5] It is important to note though that the CESCR separates the two dimensions: ie, the content of the rights and the minimum core obligations. In each General Comment, it sets out some broad elements — the content of each of the rights (affordability, quality, physical accessibility) — which are to be achieved progressively. But the CESCR requires immediate realisation of a basic threshold for many of these elements. The Constitutional Court has been reluctant to move forward on either front. So although, it has technically rejected the notion of a minimum core, it has

[1] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 ('Treatment Action Campaign' or 'TAC') at para 39.

[2] 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC), [2004] ZACC 11 ('Khosa') at para 43.

[3] Mazibuko (supra) at para 50.

[4] See for example, K Iles 'Limiting Socio-Economic Rights: Beyond the Internal Limitations Clauses' (2004) 20 SAJHR 448, 457 (arguing that the approach misses the distinction between first-stage rights determination and second-stage justification); C Steinberg 'Can Reasonableness Protect the Poor? A Review of South Africa's Socio-Economic Rights Jurisprudence' (2006) 123 SALJ 264; N de Villiers 'Procedural Fairness and Reasonableness Administrative Action within the Social Assistance system: Implications of Some Settled Cases' (2006) 22 SAJHR 405; and D Bilchitz Poverty and Fundamental Rights: The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (2007).

[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 32, TAC (supra) at paras 26-39*, Mazibuko* (supra) at paras 46-68. On the rejection of the idea of minimum core content to socio-economic rights, see §56B.3(iii)(bb) below.

occasionally filled in the content of socio-economic rights in housing and health litigation.[1]

Similarly, the logic of the principle of 'constitutional subsidiarity' squares with the prevailing approach to the socio-economic rights. In terms of this principle, litigants cannot rely directly on the terms of the Final Constitution in support of a rights claim where legislation has been enacted to give effect to that right.[2] Would-be rights-claimants must instead access the constitutional rights through the legislation, and frame a case in the express terms of the legislation rather than in the terms of the constitutional right. Of course, one must remember that the super-ordinate legislation must be consistent with the constitutional provision to which it gives effect. The mere fact that the state says the legislation gives such effect does not make the legislation constitutional and immune to contestation. Applied to socio-economic rights, the principle of subsidiarity has the effect of restricting socio-economic rights claims to the express terms of the legislation enacted to give effect to those rights, unless a challenge to the constitutionality of the legislation is mounted. A fuller consideration of the implications of the Court's jurisprudence, and the connection between this principle and the Court's stance against reading a minimum core content into socio-economic rights, appears below in §§ 56B.3*(a)*(iii) and (iv).

(ii) Right holders and protected uses of water

The right to have access to water as defined in FC s 27(1)(b) may be claimed by 'everyone'. This term opens up the possibility for juristic persons to be considered as holders of this right. (At the same time, juristic persons, given the horizontal application of the Bill of Rights, may be called upon to make provision for a particular good over which it possesses control.[3]) The Final Constitution explicitly states that a juristic person can hold rights 'to the extent required by the nature of the rights and the nature of that juristic person'.[4] The relevance of this provision

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.

[2] The citation in support of this principle is by now a familiar one in the Court's own judgments. The following list is taken directly from Mazibuko (supra) at n 54: 'See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC); 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC), [2004] ZACC 15 at paras 22-6 (in the context of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 which gives effect to the constitutional right to administrative justice in s 33 of the Constitution); MEC for Education, KwaZulu Natal and Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC); 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) [2007] ZACC 21 at para 40 (in the context of s 9 of the Constitution and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000, the Equality Act) and South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC); 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC) [2007] ZACC 10 at para 52 (in the context of labour legislation and the labour rights protected in s 23 of the Constitution).'

[3] See School Governing Body of Juma Musjid Primary School & Others v Ahmed Aruff Essay & Others [2011] ZACC 13 (CC)(Court holds that private trust has violated the right to basic education of learners in a public school by abrogating terms of lease for school grounds and shutting the learners out. The private actor's behaviour unjustifiably infringed the learners' access to a basic education in terms of FC s 29(1).) See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman 'Between Charity and Clarity: Kibitizing with Frank Michelman on How Best to Read the Constitutional Court' in D Bilchitz & S Woolman (eds) Is This Seat Taken? Conversations at the Bar, the Bench and the Academy (2011).

[4] FC s 8(4).

to the right to water is sharply underscored by the fact that there are many uses to which water may be put. These range from domestic use, cultural practices, personal hygiene, environmental protection, agricultural production to industrial use. Juristic persons such as corporations and commercial farmers may, therefore, also be entitled to the right to water. These diverse water uses will invariably lead to conflicts whose settlement would depend on the manner in which the right is interpreted. Typically, difficult decisions would need to be made concerning how much water should be allocated for domestic use on the one hand and industrial use on the other hand.[1] Such conflicts lie at the heart of the 'sustainable development' jurisprudence slowly developing under FC s 24*(b)*(iii).

While FC s 27(1)(b) — read with FC s 8(4) — admits of an interpretation that considers corporations as right holders and a wide spectrum of protected water uses, priority ought to be given to basic human water needs in preference to commercial needs. The Water Services Act[2] provides that '[i]f the water services provided by a water services institution are unable to meet the requirements of all its existing consumers, it must prioritise the provision of basic water supply and basic sanitation to them'. This provision is consistent the CESCR's General Comment 15. The Comment states that 'priority in the allocation of water must be given to the right to water for personal and domestic uses'[3] and 'to the water resources required to prevent starvation and disease, as well as water required to meet the core obligations of each of the Covenant rights.'[4]

(iii) 'Sufficient'

To begin, it must be noted that FC s 27(1)(b) protects the right to have access to 'sufficient' water, not 'adequate' water in terms of the ICESCR. No reason exists to suggest that the South African Constitution intended a different meaning to be accorded to the term 'sufficient' from that ascribed to 'adequate'. The two terms tend to be used interchangeably and should be understood to mean the same thing. Hence, the meaning attached to the term 'adequate' in CESCR's General Comment 3 is of critical relevance to the understanding the right of access to water under the Final Constitution.

[1] Water in South Africa is a very scarce resource. The growth of the industrial sector and commercial farming since the last half of the 20th century has increased the demand for water considerably. According to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), South Africa is already swimming below the water-stress threshold. This gloomy picture is replicated regionally and worldwide. UNDP estimates that a quarter of the world's population currently lives in river basins that are closed and the number of people in water-stressed areas is forecast to spiral upwards from 700 million to 3 billion in 2025. In Sub-Saharan Africa, the percentage of people in water-stressed areas will shoot up from 30 per cent to a whopping 85 per cent. UNDP Beyond Scarcity: Power, Poverty and the Global Water Crisis (2006) 135. The water-stress threshold is determined on the basis of the availability of water against the population. Thus, 1700 cubic metres per person is considered as the national threshold for meeting water requirements for agriculture, industry, energy and the environment. 1000 cubic metres per person constitutes a situation of water scarcity while the availability of under 500 cubic metres per person represents the case of 'absolute scarcity of water'. Ibid.

[2] Act 108 of 1997.

[3] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 6.

[4] Ibid.

The use of the term 'sufficient' serves the primary purpose of underlining the qualitative and quantitative dimensions of the right. Sufficiency presupposes the existence of adequate facilities and mechanisms that enable people to access water services. It also imposes an obligation of result on the state to achieve specified goals with regard to the quantity and the quality of water. As the CECSR has stated, the right to water demands that the state ensure that the water supply for each person is 'sufficient and continuous for personal and domestic uses'.[1] However, the precise quantity of water that may be deemed to be 'sufficient' has not yet been established. It is particularly difficult to set a global benchmark due to the different water demands and needs in different parts of our richly diverse world. The CESCR itself sidestepped the issue in its General Comment 15 and instead deferred to the guidelines developed by the World Health Organisation.[2] However, the two studies the CESCR cites both conclude that approximately 50 litres of water would be needed per day, with 20 litres as a minimum, in order to achieve sufficient health outcomes. [3]

What may be more important than rough numbers is the recognition that the state has an obligation to demonstrate not only that access to water is being measurably extended to a larger number of people, but also that the quality and quantity of access is increasing over time.[4] We shall turn return to this issue when we address the free water policy of the South African government.

It would be pointless to require the state to provide sufficient access to water in clearly delineated quantitative amounts without first taking cognisance of the quality of the water. This right should be understood, following the CESCR, to oblige the state to ensure that the water it provides is 'safe, therefore free from micro-organisms, chemical substances and radiological hazards that constitute a threat to a person's health'.[5] The qualitative dimension of the right also relates to the acceptability of the colour, odour and taste of the water required for personal and domestic use.[6]

(aa) Background to Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg

The question of sufficient water in terms of FC s 27(1)(b) was placed squarely before the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg.[7] At this point it is worthwhile setting out the parameters of the case, describing briefly the policies adopted by the City of Johannesburg and Johannesburg Water (Pty) Ltd and the terms of the challenge to that policy.

---

[1] CESCR General Comment 15: The Right to Water (Twenty-ninth session, 2002) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2002/11 (2003)('General Comment 15') at para 12*(a)*.

[2] According to the CESCR, '[t]he quantity of water available for each person should correspond to World Health organisation (WHO) guidelines.' Ibid at para 12*(a)*.

[3] See J Bartram & G Howard 'Domestic Water Quantity, Service Level and Health: What Should be the Goal for Water and Health Sectors' WHO (2002). See also PH Gleick 'Basic Water Requirements for Human Activities: Meeting Basic Needs' (1996) 21 Water International 83.

[4] See S Liebenberg 'South Africa's Evolving Jurisprudence on Socio-Economic Rights: An Effective Tool in Challenging Poverty' (2002) 6(2) Law, Democracy and Development 159, 172.

[5] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 12*(b)* (emphasis in original).

[6] Ibid.

[7] 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28 ('Mazibuko').

Johannesburg Water is a private company incorporated in January 2001 and wholly owned by the City of Johannesburg.[1] The court challenge against Johannesburg Water and the City of Johannesburg revolved around two aspects of the water service delivery policy: the first was Johannesburg Water's policy of providing 6 kilolitres (6000 litres) of water per month, free of charge, to every accountholder in the city; and the second was the company's programme of upgrading water infrastructure and billing systems — Operation Gcin'amanzi — which involved the installation of either communal taps within 200 metres of each dwelling, yard taps with restricted flow, or metered connections with pre-paid meters. The applicants complained that the free basic water policy was in conflict with FC s 27(1)(b) and that the installation of pre-paid meters in their homes in Phiri, Soweto was unlawful. The latter challenge was primarily based on principles of administrative justice. We discuss this leg of the argument in §56B.4*(c)*(ii) below. Our focus, for now, is on the first claim: that the City's provision of free basic water up to a limit of 6 kilolitres violates the constitutional right to sufficient water.

The Water Services Act 108 of 1997 defines 'basic water supply' to mean:

> the prescribed minimum standard of water supply services necessary for the reliable supply of a sufficient quantity and quality of water to households, including informal households, to support life and personal hygiene.

The 'prescribed minimum' referred to in this definition has been set in terms of national regulations.[2] Regulation 3*(b)* of these regulations provides that the 'minimum standard for basic water supply services' includes a minimum quantity of potable water of 25 litres per person per day or 6 kilolitres per household per month, at a minimum flow rate of not less than 10 litres per minute, within 200 metres of a household, and with an effectiveness such that no-one is without a water supply for more than seven full days in any year. In effect, these provisions adopt a minimum core approach: they set out in legislation and regulations a quantity of water to which every household absolutely must have access. One might contend, therefore, that the South African government has accepted the principle of a minimum core obligation in respect of water, even though, as the litigation in Mazibuko demonstrates all too clearly, the sufficiency of the minimum core obligations it has assumed remain very much in dispute.

[1] Although a private company, Johannesburg Water is nevertheless a 'municipal entity' in terms of s 1 read with ss 86B(1) and 86D(1)(a) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 ('Municipal Systems Act'), because the municipality, as the sole owner, retains effective control of the company. The establishment and corporate structure of the company governed by the Municipal Systems Act, while its financial management is governed by the Local Government: Municipal Finance Management Act 56 of 2003. As the City of Johannesburg remains accountable and responsible for the actions of Johannesburg Water, it would perhaps be inaccurate to describe this as an instance of privatisation.

[2] 'Regulations Relating to Compulsory National Standards and Measures to Conserve Water' Government Gazette No 22355, Notice R509 of 2001 (8 June 2001). These regulations are ostensibly made in terms of s 9 of the Water Services Act, which empowers the Minister to 'prescribe compulsory national standards' relating to the provision of water services, the effective and sustainable use of water resources, among others.

In the Johannesburg High Court, where the applicants launched their challenge to the constitutionality of the Johannesburg water policy, Tsoka J held that the free water policy adopted by the City and Johannesburg Water was irrational and unreasonable. The High Court replaced the policy with an order requiring the City and Johannesburg Water to provide each applicant and similarly placed residents of Phiri with 50 litres of free water per day.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal upheld the City's and Johannesburg Water's appeal against the High Court judgment. However, the outcome of this victory was surely only marginally more appealing to the City and the company than the High Court's order.[2] The SCA held that the free water policy had been based on the mistaken belief that regulation 3*(b)* imposed no obligation to provide the prescribed minimum free of charge to those who could not afford to pay. As such, the City and Johannesburg Water's decision had been 'materially influenced by an error of law' and could be set aside on that basis.[3] The SCA declared that 42 litres of water per day would constitute 'sufficient water' within the meaning of FC s 27(1)(b) and ordered the City and Johannesburg Water to revise their water policy accordingly.

It is worth noting that both the High Court and the SCA seem to have approached the challenge to the free basic water policy as an application for judicial review of an exercise of public power, and that both courts appear to have disposed of the matter in terms of the principles of administrative justice. Both courts used the language of administrative justice to issue orders which 'reviewed and set aside' the decision to adopt the policy: The High Court held that the policy was irrational and unreasonable and the SCA found that adoption of the policy had been materially influenced by an error of law. While neither court mentioned the provisions of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA')[4] as part of their reasons for setting aside the free basic water policy, s 6 of PAJA provides that administrative actions can be reviewed on the grounds of 'irrationality', 'unreasonableness' or if the action was materially influenced by 'an error of law'. So although the SCA found that the Johannesburg water policy amounted to a violation or limitation of the FC s 27(1)(b) right to sufficient water, the opinion is framed in language best suited to review of executive action under administrative law. [5]

In the Constitutional Court, on the other hand, the applicants relied directly on the Constitution for the argument that the free basic water policy should be

[1] Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others (Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions as Amicus Curiae) [2008] 4 All SA 471 (W).

[2] City of Johannesburg & Others v Mazibuko & Others 2009 (3) SA 592 (SCA), 2009 (8) BCLR 791 (SCA) ('Mazibuko SCA').

[3] Ibid at para 38.

[4] Act 3 of 2000.

[5] It is difficult to criticise either court too roundly for taking an administrative law approach here, since it is unclear whether either court actually did so. The terms of their judgments certainly suggest that PAJA and the principle of administrative justice were determinative, but neither court is explicit in basing its reasons for 'reviewing and setting aside' the water policy on PAJA or administrative justice principles. Indeed, it is doubtful that PAJA would even apply to the decisions involved in adopting water policy, because the definition of 'administrative action' is explicit in excluding the executive functions of municipalities. The judgments can, of course, be heartily criticised for their vagueness in this regard.

declared invalid because it is unreasonable within the meaning of FC s 27(2). The applicants further invited the Court to quantify the amount of water that would be 'sufficient' within the meaning of FC s 27(1)(b). They contended that 50 litres per person per day met FC s 27(1)(b)'s requirements. They also argued that since the standards set in regulation 3*(b)* constituted minimum standards, the Court was free to set even higher basic standards.[1]

The Mazibuko Court disagreed. In the first place, it held that the free basic water policy 'falls within the bounds of reasonableness and therefore is not in conflict with either s 27 of the Constitution or with the national legislation regulating water services'.[2] Second, the Court declined the invitation to set a minimum core — at the current levels or higher. As we explain in the discussion that follows, however, the Court's grounds for rejecting the notion of a minimum core for the right to water is not entirely consistent with the use it makes of the concept of reasonableness.

(bb) The consolidation and extension of the stance against 'minimum core content'

The arguments that the applicants urged upon the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko would have required the Court to jettison its prevailing approach to socio-economic rights. The correct approach, the applicants submitted, is to first set out the content of the right by quantifying the amount of water sufficient for dignified human life, and only then to consider whether the state has acted reasonably in seeking to progressively achieve access for all to that quantity of water.[3] In Nokotyana,[4] heard and decided shortly after Mazibuko, the Constitutional Court was presented with the same form of argument. There, the applicants urged the Court to find that the right to housing in FC s 26(1) had to be interpreted to include basic sanitation and electricity, and that the Court's previous decisions with respect to FC s 26 should be revised accordingly.[5]

In both cases, the Court identified this argument as a call for the identification of a minimum core, or basic content, to socio-economic rights. It relied on judgments in its previous socio-economic rights cases — Grootboom and TAC — to reject it.[6] In those cases, the Court declined the invitation to specify a minimum

[1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 44.

[2] Ibid at para 9.

[3] Ibid at para 51. It is worth mentioning, as the Court did, that the applicants' proposal was in fact for a quantified content of the right to water that exceeds a minimum core or basic content. The applicants were explicit in arguing that the quantity of 50 litres of water per person per day is what is sufficient for 'dignified human life', not merely the minimum necessary to support life. Applicants' Heads of Argument at paras 342 and 355; Mazibuko (supra) at para 56. In making this argument the applicants urged on the Court the SCA's interpretation in the court below, which held that the right of access to water 'cannot be anything less than a right of access to that quantity of water that is required for dignified human existence'. Mazibuko SCA (supra) at para 17, quoted in the Applicants' Heads of Argument at para 324.

[4] Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33 ('Nokotyana').

[5] Ibid at para 47.

[6] Mazibuko (supra) at paras 46-68.

core content to the rights to housing and health care. In both of those earlier cases, though, the Court gave some ground to the concept of minimum core by admitting that evidence could be presented to show that a particular right has a particular minimum content, and that such an evidence-based minimum could be influential in assessing the reasonableness of the state's conduct in meeting its socio-economic obligations. The TAC Court was careful to note that establishing such a minimum generally falls beyond the limits of the judicial function:

> Courts are ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where Court orders could have multiple social and economic consequences for the community. The Constitution contemplates rather a restrained and focused role for the Courts, namely, to require the State to take measures to meet its constitutional obligations and to subject the reasonableness of these measures to evaluation.[1]

In Grootboom and TAC, then, the Court seemed to accept that a minimum core content to socio-economic rights could be established, on the basis of evidence, by institutions other than the judiciary. In Mazibuko, the Court reiterates that it would be 'institutionally inappropriate' for a court to determine what the achievement of any particular socio-economic right would entail:

> This is a matter, in the first place, for the legislature and executive, the institutions of government best placed to investigate social conditions in the light of available budgets and to determine what targets are achievable in relation to social and economic rights.[2]

In the preceding paragraph, the Court had said that whatever decisions the legislature and the executive take in this regard, they should never be constrained by a minimum core understanding of socio-economic rights. What these rights require, the Court noted, will vary over time: 'Fixing a quantified content might, in a rigid and counter-productive manner, prevent an analysis of context.'[3] In the face of an apparent willingness on the part of government to assume a minimum core obligation in respect of water, which it has done with a regulative prescription of a 'minimum standard for basic water supply services', the Court's response is disappointing and retrogressive.[4]

The implications of this position are twofold. First, the Court has effectively discharged the government from any obligation the Constitution may have imposed on it to set and work towards concrete goals of socio-economic provision. Second, the Court has sidestepped the question of what 'sufficient' means in the FC s 27(1)(b) right of access to sufficient water. In doing so it has relied on numerous contextual factors which, it argues, influence the sufficiency of a quantity of water, including the manner of water delivery and the uses to which water is put. The obligation to supply water will vary depending on the circum-

[1] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 ('Treatment Action Campaign' or 'TAC') at para 38.

[2] Mazibuko (supra) at para 61.

[3] Ibid at para 60.

[4] On retrogressive state policies or laws and socio-economic rights, see S Woolman, C Sprague & V Black 'Why State Policies that Undermine HIV Lay Counsellors Constitute Retrogressive Measures that Violate the Right of Access to Health Care for Pregnant Women and Infants' (2009) 25 SAJHR 102.

stances of each water-user.[1] More than this, the Court's reasoning ensures that the state bears no obligation to specify a quantity of sufficient water within the meaning of this right, or to take reasonable steps to progressively realise such a goal. Whatever content the legislature or the executive might happen to give to the term 'sufficient' is subject to constitutional scrutiny only against the amorphous concept of reasonableness.

Mazibuko sets out what appears to be the high watermark of its preparedness to enforce the Constitution's socio-economic rights against government:[2] First, it will order a government to take steps to realise rights if it has not taken any steps. Secondly, it will assess the reasonableness of any steps the government has taken, and order government to review its adopted measures, if they turn out to be unreasonable. Following Grootboom, the Court may order government to make provision for those desperately in need, and following TAC, the court may order government to remove unreasonable limitations or exclusions from measures or policies that it has already adopted. The Court stated finally that the obligations imposed by the socio-economic rights provisions of the Constitution further require government to continually revise its policies in order to ensure the progressive realisation of rights. The Court, under the right circumstances, may be prepared to order such revisions.[3]

(cc) A brief note on comparative approaches to questions of sufficient water

It is interesting to note that courts in similarly-situated or poorer countries have taken a more expansive approach to the amount of water to be provided in accordance with the right to water. In Argentina, courts have regularly ordered 100 to 250 litres of water per person per day be provided for situations of emergency relief.[4] In CEDHA v Provincial State and Municipality of Córdoba, the Court relied more explicitly on international standards. CEDHA launched legal actions against provincial and municipal authorities for failing to prevent pollution of communal water sources.[5] The culprit was an under-maintained and over-stretched sewer-treatment plant. The Court implied the right to water from the constitutional right to health and, after quoting General Comment 15, ordered as follows:

[1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 62.

[2] Ibid at para 67.

[3] Ibid at para 67 ('If government takes no steps to realise the rights, the courts will require government to take steps. If government's adopted measures are unreasonable, the courts will similarly require that they be reviewed so as to meet the constitutional standard of reasonableness. From Grootboom, it is cleat that a measure will be unreasonable if it makes no provision for those most desperately in need. If government adopts a policy with unreasonable limitations or exclusions, as in Treatment Action Campaign, the Court may order that those are removed. Finally, the obligation of progressive realisation imposes a duty on government continually to revise its policies to ensure that the achievement of the right is progressively realised.') See also Nokotyana (supra) at para 4 (the Court stated that 'the role of the courts in the achievement of socio-economic goals is an important but limited one').

[4] See discussion of Valentina Norte Colony, Defensoría de Menores N° 3V. Poder Ejecutivo Municipal s/ acción de amparo expte, 46–99 Acuerdo 5 del Tribunal Superior de Justicia, Neuquen (2 March 1999) in 56B.2*(d)*(ii).

[5] CEDHA v Provincial State and Municipality of Córdoba. See R Picolotti, 'The Right to Safe Drinking Water as a Human Right' (2005) 1 (4) Housing and ESC Rights Quarterly 1.

> [T]he municipality of Córdoba adopt all of the measures necessary relative to the functioning of the [facility], in order to minimise the environmental impact caused by it, until a permanent solution can be attained with respect to its functioning; and that the Provincial State assure the [plaintiffs] a provision of 200 daily litres of safe drinking water, until the appropriate public works be carried out to ensure the full access to the public water service, as per decree 529/94.

While 200 litres clearly exceeds the standards referred to in General Comment 15, the Argentine courts have focused more on common, rather than minimum, usage in Argentine society.

In Indonesia, the Constitutional Court has required the Government and municipalities to take heed of international standards on water quantity. The Court has held that '[t]he volume of daily basic needs should be established based on the universally applied standard regarding the minimum water needs to fulfil the daily basic needs.'[1]

(iv) The principle of constitutional subsidiarity

FC ss 32 and 33 — the right of access to information and the right to administrative justice[2] — demand that national legislation 'must be enacted to give effect to these rights'. Similarly, FC s 9(4) requires that national legislation 'must be enacted' to give effect to constitutional equality rights and to prevent or to prohibit unfair discrimination. The right to fair labour practices set out in FC s 23 provides that national legislation 'may be enacted' to regulate certain aspects of the right. FC s 9(2) provides that legislative measures intended to remedy the effects of past discrimination may be promulgated. Legislation has been enacted in respect of each of these five rights.[3] In two of the cases where the Constitution required legislation to be passed — access to information and administrative justice — the rights as set out in the relevant sections of the Constitution were deemed to be inoperative until such time as the required legislation was passed. In order to ensure that people were not left without those rights, Item 23 of Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution reproduced the text of the relevant rights from the Interim Constitution to stand in place of the text of FC ss 32 and 33 until the legislation was passed.

FC ss 32 and 33 were thus inchoate until Parliament promulgated the legislation giving effect to them. This interaction between constitutional rights and the enabling 'super-ordinate' legislation that fleshes them out provides 'a picture' of the Court's constitutional principle of subsidiarity. Subsidiarity views legislation as an optimal method for giving effect to a constitutional right. The principle of subsidiarity is restated in Mazibuko as follows:

---

[1] Judicial Review of the Law No. 7 of 2004 on Water Resources Constitutional Court of Indonesia 058-059-060-063/PUUII/2004 (19 July 2005).

[2] For more on FC s 33, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63.

[3] In relation to FC s 32, the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000; in relation to FC s 33, the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000; in relation to FC s 23, the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 and the Basic Conditions of Employment Act 75 of 1997; in relation to FC s 9, the Employment Equity Act 55 of 1998 and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000.

> This Court has repeatedly held that where legislation has been enacted to give effect to a right, a litigant should rely on that legislation in order to give effect to the right or alternatively challenge the legislation as being inconsistent with the Constitution.[1]

It makes some sense that the principle should apply to the socio-economic rights enshrined in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1). In the first place, the state 'must take legislative and other measures' to give effect to those rights. Secondly, the prevailing approach to socio-economic rights and the Court's stance regarding the minimum core content of those rights suggests that only through the state's 'legislative and other measures' will the Constitution's socio-economic rights contain any clear content at all. Indeed, the Court says as much in Mazibuko:

> The Constitution envisages that legislative and other measures will be the primary instrument for the achievement of social and economic rights. Thus it places a positive obligation upon the state to respond to the basic social and economic needs of the people by adopting reasonable legislative and other measures. By adopting such measures, the rights set out in the Constitution acquire content, and that content is subject to the constitutional standard of reasonableness.[2]

A similar approach was taken by the Durban High Court in one of the first water rights cases.[3] In a decision handed down before the regulations prescribing a basic minimum water supply had been promulgated, the Court held that without state action, the constitutional right to sufficient water is 'incomplete, and accordingly unenforceable'.[4] As the Constitutional Court subsequently held in Mazibuko, the Durban High Court rejected the applicant's argument that FC s 27(1)(b) read with the Water Services Act entitles people to some basic quantity of water:

> It is clear that the Water Services Act was directed at achieving the right embodied in the Constitution. The difficulty, however, is that in the absence of regulations defining the extent of the right of access to a basic water supply, I have no guidance from the Legislature or executive to enable me to interpret the content of the right embodied in s 3 of the Act.[5]

On this approach, the primary obligation the state bears in terms of constitutional socio-economic rights are those that it places on itself in terms of legislative or other measures. These measure may then be assessed for reasonableness in terms of FC ss 26(2) and 27(2). However, it is important to note, that the state is obliged to create a plan that is reasonable, sufficiently well-funded, appropriately administered, capable of realisation, cognisant of short, medium and long-term goals, and sensitive to the plight of those persons in desperate need. The principle of [1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 73. On the principle of constitutional subsidiarity more generally, see the exchange between AJ van der Walt and Karl Klare. See AJ van der Walt 'Normative Pluralism and Anarchy: Reflections on the 2007 Term' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 77; K Klare 'Legal Subsidiarity and Constitutional Rights: A Reply to AJ van der Walt' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 129. See also L du Plessis 'Subsidiarity: What's in the Name for Constitutional Interpretation and Adjudication?' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 207; L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[2] Mazibuko (supra) at para 66.

[3] Manqele v Durban Transitional Metropolitan Council 2002 (6) SA 423 (D).

[4] Ibid at 427F.

[5] Ibid at 427C-D.

subsidiarity does not permit the state to ignore these desiderata in the conception of a plan, nor does it allow the state to offer no plan at all.

Nokotyana reinforces the Court's rubric for socio-economic rights analysis and its general commitment to the principle of subsidiarity. The Court states that the housing legislation in question had been 'promulgated to give effect to the rights conferred by section 26 of the Constitution'.[1] It is clear from what follows in Nokotyana that the Court was concerned largely with the rights the applicants bore in terms of the housing legislation in question. Indeed, it applauded the applicants for relying primarily on the legislation, and stated emphatically that they 'cannot be permitted' to rely only on the Constitution.[2] The decision went the applicants' way because, in the Court's view, the municipality's delay in complying with the obligations imposed on it by the legislation was unacceptable and unreasonable. The obligations themselves, however, and people's corresponding rights, were held to depend entirely on the national housing legislation and the obligations the state imposed on itself therein. Viewed in isolation, little appears to separate this model of constitutional rights from a democratic system based upon parliamentary supremacy. Although the Grootboom criteria remain the measure of 'reasonableness' for socio-economic rights jurisprudence, one should be concerned that our commitment to constitutional supremacy could lose much of its bite were the principle of subsidiarity to allow Parliament (largely alone) to determine the scope and the extent of people's rights.[3]

Were Parliament alone to determine the initial scope of a right, the only thing standing between constitutional socio-economic rights and unbridled parliamentary supremacy would be the possibility of a challenge to the constitutionality of legislation giving effect to those rights. Even so, it is difficult to see how legislation enacted in terms of FC s 26(2) or FC s 27(2) could be found to infringe the rights in FC s 26(1) or FC s 27(1), when the legislation defines the content of those rights.

If an effective constitutional challenge to the state's legislative and other measures has been rendered largely impossible by the Court's convoluted doctrine, it must fall, as the Court loudly proclaims, to the FC s 27(2) concept of reasonableness to assess the constitutionality of the state's actions in meeting its socio-economic obligations. But it is here that the Court's logic begins to, but does not entirely, unravel. In considering whether the principle of constitutional subsidiarity applies to the City of Johannesburg's free basic water policy, the Court in Mazibuko said only that 'it may not'.[4] Were the principle to apply in every instance, water service providers and other organs of state would need only comply with the terms of national legislation giving effect to the right to have [1] Nokotyana (supra) at para 47. Chapters 12 and 13 of the National Housing Code deal with determinations of the status of settlements and the municipal services those determinations entitle them to receive. The Housing Code was published in terms of section 4 of the Housing Act 107 of 1997, and was apparently treated by the Court to form part of that legislation. See further §56B.4*(c)*(i) infra.

[2] Ibid at para 49.

[3] See further D Bilchitz 'Is the Constitutional Court Wasting Away the Rights of the Poor? Nokotyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality' (2010) 127 SALJ 591, and S Liebenberg Socio-Economic Rights: Adjudication under a Transformative Constitution (2010) 463ff.

[4] Mazibuko (supra) at para 74.

access to sufficient water in order to discharge their constitutional obligations. So, for example, if a municipality or other water services authority had within its available resources the capacity to exceed the basic water supply standards set in national legislation, the subsidiarity principle would not require the water service provider or state to provide any more than stated minimum.[1] Such a position is hard to square with the Constitution's own commitment to progressive realisation — a notion that reflects a developmental state's obligation to provide the goods necessary for living a life worth living as those goods become available in greater quantities and quality. That the Mazibuko Court ultimately avoided giving an answer to the question as to whether subsidiarity operates here — by deciding instead that the City's policy could not be said to be unreasonable — suggests that the reasonableness standard has not been displaced by the tautological principle of subsidiarity.

Another important consideration follows from this analysis of the Court's treatment of reasonableness. Whatever teeth the reasonableness requirement retains rests, we believe, on the existence of some prior conception of what a given socio-economic right requires. In other words, reliance of the concept of reasonableness necessarily commits the Court to determining — at least to some degree — the content of the rights the Final Constitution confers on South Africans.

(v) 'Access'

The formulation of the right in FC s 27(1)(b) is one of 'access to water' rather than a 'right to water'. In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court purported to draw a distinction between the right to housing and the right 'to have access to housing' in FC s 26. In highlighting the distinction between the two terms of art, it stated that the right of access to housing recognises that housing entails more than the possession of a box-like physical structure. It also requires 'available land, appropriate services such as the provision of water and the removal of sewerage and the financing of these including the building itself'.[2] More expansively still, the Court went on to add that the words 'access to' suggests that the state possesses the power to require private individuals and organisations to provide housing. It stated: 'it is not only the state who is responsible for the provision of houses, but … other agents within our society, including individuals themselves, who must be enabled by legislative and other measures to provide housing.'[3]

In truth, no meaningful difference really exists between 'the right to housing' and 'the right to have access to housing'. Indeed, the CESCR has interpreted the right to housing in exactly the same terms as those employed by the Constitutional Court when interpreting the right of 'to have access to housing'. The Committee stated that shelter does not mean 'merely having a roof over one's head' and [1] Mazibuko (supra).

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.
[3] Ibid.

cannot be understood 'exclusively as a commodity'.[1] Instead, it has emphasized that shelter should be seen as 'the right to live somewhere in security, peace and dignity'.[2] The CESCR has also extracted from the right to water strikingly similar obligations to those identified by the Constitutional Court under FC s 26's right to housing. To be sure, what the Constitutional Court describes as the meaning and the implications of 'access' for the state is in essence a subset of the state's obligation to fulfil rights. The latter, as we explained above, has two limbs: the obligation to facilitate the realisation of the right and the obligation to provide the basic good to those who cannot afford it.[3]

Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court's definition of the right of access to housing in Grootboom has significant implications for the interpretation of the state's obligations in relation to socio-economic rights generally and the right of access to water specifically. Firstly, it drew attention to the need to discriminate between the obligations of the state to those persons who can afford to exercise socio-economic rights on their own and those who cannot. It stated: 'For those who can afford to pay for adequate housing, the state's primary obligation lies in unlocking the system, providing access to housing stock and a legislative framework to facilitate self-built houses through planning laws and access to finance.'[4] By contrast, the Court required the state to provide actual assistance to those who cannot afford to pay for adequate housing: 'Issues of development and social welfare are raised in respect of those who cannot afford to provide themselves with housing. … The poor are particularly vulnerable and their needs require special attention.'[5]

By implication, the right of access to water requires that the state must not only refrain from interfering with existing access to this right, it must also take measures to facilitate the realisation of this right so that people are able to exercise it relying on their own means and resources. Moreover, the state has the obligation to provide water to those who cannot afford it. This outcome can also be achieved by reading the right of access to water under FC s 27(1)(b), together with FC s 7(2), which recognises the state's duty to fulfil rights. We discuss the interaction of FC ss 7(2) and 27(1)(b) in the next section.

[1] CESCR General Comment 4: The Right to Adequate Housing, (Sixth session, 1991) U.N. Doc. E/1992/23 (1991) at para 7. In the same paragraph, the CESCR endorses the views of the Commission on Human Settlements an the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000: 'Adequate shelter should mean … adequate privacy, adequate space, adequate security, adequate lighting and ventilation, adequate basic infrastructure and adequate location with regard to work and basic facilities — all at a reasonable cost.'

[2] Ibid.

[3] General Comment 15 (supra) at paras 25–29.

[4] Grootboom (supra) at para 36.

[5] Ibid.

In general, however, the state has an obligation to ensure that water and water facilities are accessible to everyone — poor or not — without discrimination. As the CESCR has stated, this duty means that the state must ensure both physical access and economic access.[1] The former indicates that water and water facilities must be within the physical reach for all sections of the population and that the personal security of the people accessing water services is guaranteed. The latter indicates that water services must be affordable for all.[2]

Intriguingly, the Constitutional Court's statement that 'it is not only the state who is responsible for the provision of housing'[3] can be interpreted to mean that privatisation is not prima facie unconstitutional. The state can, through law, rely upon private persons to provide water services. International human rights law lends credence to the idea that the involvement of the private sector in water provision may not be objectionable unless it can be proved that the private party violates the right.[4] Ultimately, however, the Constitution places the burden upon the state to ensure that all of its obligations to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the right to water are met whether it is the service provider, the co-service provider, or the state that determines how other social actors vouchsafe this essential guarantee.

56B.4 Duties of the State

As noted earlier, the South African Constitution expressly recognises the duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil human rights. These duties are addressed in more detail elsewhere in this work.[5] Here, we focus on the application of these duties to the right to have access to water.

(a) Different spheres of government

The provision of water services is a joint responsibility of all three spheres of government — national, provincial and local.[6] The Final Constitution requires the national government to adopt legislation concerning the establishment of municipalities that takes into account 'the need to provide municipal services [including water services] in an equitable and sustainable manner'.[7] It has done so, in respect of water services, in terms of the legislation discussed already in this chapter — the Water Services Act and the National Water Act. The national government has also promulgated numerous regulations setting standards of water quality, outlining the principles of water management and service delivery, and establishing pricing and [1] General Comment 15 (supra) at paras 12*(c)*(i) and (ii).

[2] Ibid.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 35.

[4] See General Comment No. 3: The Nature of States Parties Obligations (Fifth Session, 1990) UN Doc. 12/14/1990 at para 8; and Limburg Principles on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1986) at para 6.

[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[6] D Chirwa 'Water Rights' in S Khoza (ed) Socio-economic Rights in South Africa: A Resource Book (2007) 343, 351.

[7] FC s 155(4).

tariff structures.[1] Moreover, the rule of law, the obligations imposed by the rights to clean water and to a clean and healthy environment, and the provision in FC s 8(1) that all organs of state are bound by the rights in the Bill of Rights, together require that all levels of government meet the legislative and constitutional obligations to manage water resources and provide water services.

According to FC s 152(1), one of the objects of local government is to 'ensure the provision of services to communities in a sustainable manner'. The Water Services Act, accordingly, requires every municipality functioning as a water services authority to make bylaws containing conditions for the provision of water services. These bylaws must provide, at least, for 'the technical conditions of supply, including quality standards, units or standards of measurement, the verification of meters, acceptable limits of error and procedures for the arbitration of disputes relating to the measurement of water services provided.'[2]

However, according to Schedule 4, part B of the Final Constitution — as read with FC s 155(1)(a) and (7) — both the national government and provincial governments have competence through legislation and other measures to monitor and to support local government in the provision of water services. Similarly, any standards of service or water quality set by municipal bylaws are subject to national standards prescribed by the Minister under the Water Services Act. [3] Rates and tariffs charged by water services providers are also subject to the norms and standards set by the Minister.[4] Despite these national regulatory powers, a vast disparity in tariff and pricing structures for water services exists across water services authorities. These disparities, and the injustice they work, suggests the urgent need for a greatly enhanced and engaged role for the national government in the standardisation of water pricing.[5] To put it somewhat differently, the decentralisation of public functions and the distribution of competences in various functional areas across national, provincial and local government is a source of inequality and administrative inefficiency. While water and sanitation services are local government matters, for example, the functional areas of healthcare and housing are matters of national and provincial legislative competence. The close conceptual link between the rights to health, housing and water is thus not mir-

[1] See, for example, 'Regulations Relating to Compulsory National Standards and Measures to Conserve Water', Government Gazette 22355, GN R509 of 2001 (8 June 2001)(Deals among other things, with water quality, water and sanitation services, and the disposal of effluent and other objectionable substance); 'General Authorisations in terms of Section 39' Government Gazette 20526, GN 1191 (8 October 1999) revised in Government Gazette 26187, GN 398 (26 March 2004)(Authorising the use of water resources without need of a license and setting 'wastewater limit values' for the discharge of wastewater into water sources); and 'Establishment of a Pricing Strategy for Water Use Charges in Terms of Section 56(1) of the National Water Act 36 of 1998' Government Gazette 20615, GN 1353 (12 November 1999).

[2] Water Services Act s 21(1)(b).

[3] Water Services Act s 9(1).

[4] Water Services Act ss 10(1) and (2).

[5] K Tissington, M Dettmann, M Langford, J Dugard & S Conteh Water Services Fault Lines: An Assessment of South Africa's Water and Sanitation Provision across 15 Municipalities (2008) available at http://www.cohre.org/sites/default/files/water_services_fault_lines_sa_nov08.pdf (accessed on 13 May 2011) 4-5 and 49.

rored in the regulatory and administrative scheme through which water needs are and are not met in South Africa.[1]

The collaborative relationship between national, provincial and local governments in the provision of municipal services is reinforced by FC s 154(1). The section requires national and provincial governments, by legislative and other means, to 'support and strengthen the capacity of municipalities to manage their own affairs, to exercise their powers and to perform their functions' In at least one case, the national government has provided significant financial assistance to a municipality unable to effectively manage its wastewater treatment facilities. The Emfuleni municipality, responsible for numerous sewage spills into the Vaal River near Parys in the Free State between 2005 and 2009, was allocated R130 million by the national Minister of Water Affairs for the upgrade of facilities and staff.[2]

Further, FC s 155(7) requires the national and provincial governments to monitor the performance of local government structures in fulfilling their constitutional obligations and exercising their functions.[3] In the same vein, s 62(1) of the Water Services Act mandates national and provincial government oversight of the performance of all water services institutions.[4] The national government maintains fairly comprehensive monitoring programmes in respect of water service delivery and water resource management. The 'Blue Drop' system is a monitoring scheme designed to assess the quality of drinking water provided by water service authorities across the country. The 2010 Blue Drop Report describes the Blue

---

[1] Tissington et al (supra) at 17 and 41.

[2] J Tempelhoff 'Civil Society and Sanitation Hydropolitics: A Case Study of South Africa's Vaal River Barrage' (2009) 34 Physics and Chemistry of the Earth 164, 170. See also Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33('Nokotyana') (The Constitutional Court noted that the national government and provincial executive in Gauteng had agreed to make an amount of R1.1 million available to the Ekurhuleni local government in order to increase access to chemical toilets in informal settlements. Ibid at para 36. The SCA has held, however, that FC s 139, which empowers provincial governments to intervene in local government matters to ensure that local governments are able to meet executive obligations in terms of the Constitution or legislation, does not impose a duty on provincial (or national) government to provide financial assistance when a municipality finds itself unable to cover its debts. Member of the Executive Council for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Union & Others 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA)).

[3] FC s 155(7) provides:

The national government, subject to section 44, and the provincial governments have the legislative and executive authority to see to the effective performance by municipalities of their functions in respect of matters listed in Schedules 4 and 5, by regulating the exercise by municipalities of their executive authority referred to in section 156 (1).

[4] Water Services Act s 62(1) provides:

Monitoring of water services institutions

(1) The Minister and any relevant Province must monitor the performance of every water services institution in order to ensure-

(a) compliance with all applicable national standards prescribed under this Act;

(b) compliance with all norms and standards for tariffs prescribed under this Act; and

(c) compliance with every applicable development plan, policy statement or business plan adopted in terms of this Act.

(2) Every water services institution must-

(a) furnish such information as may be required by the Minister after consultation with the Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development; and

(b) allow the Minister access to its books, records and physical assets to the extent necessary for the Minister to carry out the monitoring functions contemplated in subsection (1).

Drop reporting process as part of a drinking water quality regulation programme with the objective of 'ensuring the improvement of tap water quality by means of compliance monitoring.'[1]

Monitoring, however, does not always lead to action. In a recent 'Green Drop' report by the Department of Water Affairs on the quality of the nation's sewage treatment plants, fewer than half were found to score 'better than 50% in measurement against the stringent criteria set'. Only slightly more than half of the country's plants were even assessed, since many plants 'were not sufficiently confident in their levels of competence to be subjected to assessments', or simply did not respond to calls for assessment.[2] Water services authorities constitute one of the biggest groups of polluters of the country's water, and it would appear that even where water service authorities are identified as polluters, little action is taken against them. South Africa's situation is not uncommon. In the US, more than 9400 out of 25000 sewage systems have violated water laws by dumping raw or insufficiently treated sewage into rivers and other water sources. And yet, fewer than one in five of these US sewage treatment authorities is ever sanctioned in any way for its violations of the law.[3] In the US, the reluctance to prosecute organs of state is often put down to a desire to avoid 'political problems'[4] and the obligations of 'co-operative federalism' that animate the US Clean Water Act.[5] The South African Constitution, for its part, establishes a set of principles of 'co-operative government and intergovernmental relations', which include the obligation for organs of state to avoid legal proceedings against one another and make all reasonable efforts to resolve disputes using the 'mechanisms and procedures established for that purpose'.[6] The apparent injunction to avoid confrontation in these provisions has led some commentators to blame them for the failure of national and provincial governments to take action against municipalities in persistent violation of their obligations under the National Water Act.[7]

The legislative and constitutional framework envisages the national government both as a monitor and a regulator of the water services functions of local government. Unfortunately, during the first decade of the Final Constitution (with its scheme of cooperative government), the national government largely

[1] Department of Water Affairs Blue Drop Report 2010: South African Drinking Water Quality Performance Management available at www.dwa.gov.za/dir_ws/DWQR/subscr/ViewNewsDoc.asp?FileID=73 (accessed on 14 April 2011) 1.

[2] Department of Water Affairs Green Drop Report 2009: South African Waste Water Quality Management Performance available at http://www.dwa.gov.za/Documents/GreenDropReport.pdf (accessed on 12 April 2011).

[3] C Duhigg 'As Sewers Fill, Waste Poisons Waterways' New York Times (23 November 2009).

[4] See statements of environmental advocacy group Riverkeeper, quoted by Duhigg ibid.

[5] R Kundis-Craig The Clean Water Act and the Constitution (2009) Chapter 1.

[6] FC ss 41(1)(h)(vi) and 41(3). The preamble to the Water Services Act states that 'in striving to provide water supply services and sanitation services, all spheres of Government must observe and adhere to the principles of co-operative government'. See also S Woolman & T Roux 'Cooperative Government and Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, July 2009) Chapter 14.

[7] Tempelhoff (supra) at 171; J Tempelhoff, V Munnik & M Viljoen 'The Vaal River Barrage, South Africa's Hardest Working Water Way: An Historical Contemplation' (2007) 3 TD: The Journal for Transdisciplinary Research in Southern Africa 107, 130.

failed to play its part as regulator. In recent years, however, it has begun to take a more active role. Between 2006 and 2008 the Department of Water Affairs ('DWA') developed a National Water Services Regulation Strategy for ensuring compliance with water law and policy at all levels of government. To this end, DWA operates a Compliance, Monitoring and Enforcement Directorate, for a time known as the 'Blue Scorpions', mandated, as its name suggests, to monitor and to enforce compliance with water legislation. The Directorate uses four legal instruments against offenders: its starts with notices known as 'pre-directives' and injunctions in the form of directives, and ends with cases in the water tribunal and criminal prosecutions in normal courts of law. In its August 2010 report to Parliament, the Directorate broke down offenders into the following categories: mines; agriculture; industry; water services authorities; and others. In the year up until June 2010, water services authorities had been issued with 86 out of 264 pre-directives, 23 out of 97 directives, had appeared in one out of six cases before the water tribunal, and faced six out of 23 criminal prosecutions.[1]

Along the same lines, the draft National Water Services Regulation Strategy anticipates that the DWA will have the power to reassign water services functions to other departments or spheres of government if major problems arise, or to intervene directly in service delivery in cases of gross failure or where lives or the environment are at risk.[2] This approach seems consistent with the provisions in the Final Constitution that allow for the assumption of responsibility for the fulfilment of constitutional obligations by different spheres of government. FC s 139 empowers provincial executives to intervene in municipal affairs if a municipality 'cannot or does not fulfil an executive obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation'.[3] The powers of intervention set out in the Constitution are not exhaustive, but they include the assumption of responsibility for the obligation in question and the dissolution of the municipal council and the appointment of an administrator. The national government has a similar power of intervention in respect of provincial government affairs[4]

[1] 'Regulation, Compliance Monitoring and Enforcement in the Water Sector' briefing to Parliament's Portfolio Committee on Water and Environmental Affairs (11 August 2010) available from the Parliamentary Monitoring Group website at http://www.pmg.org.za/report/20100811-departemnt-water-affairson-blue-scorpions-setting-compliance-and-enfo (accessed on 27 September 2010).

[2] Tissington et al (supra) at 16.

[3] FC s 139(1).

[4] FC s 100. Provincial governments have intervened far more readily in local government affairs than has the national government in provincial affairs. See generally C Murray & Y Hoffman-Wanderer 'The National Council of Provinces and Provincial Intervention in Local Government' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 7, and Y Hoffman-Wanderer & C Murray 'Suspension and Dissolution of Municipal Councils under section 139 of the Constitution' (2007) Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 141. The first cases in which a province sought to dissolve a municipal council entirely, in the North West municipality of Lekwa-Teemane, did not arise until 2004. The Lekwa-Teemane municipality in that case was crippled by financial instability and an inability to meet many of its service-delivery obligations. One of its problems was an outstanding account with the DWA for unpaid water bills in the amount of R11.7 million, which had led DWA to contemplate the reduction of water supply to the municipality. 'Report of the ad hoc Committee on Intervention in the Lekwa-Teemane Local Municipality in terms of section 139(1)(c) of the Constitution' Proceedings of the National Council of Provinces (11 February 2004) 114ff. The National Council of Provinces did not approve the province's

We offer two brief comments about the constitutionality of this strategy: First, it is unclear as to whether a provincial government or the national government is constitutionally entitled to intervene in matters for which local government bears executive authority. These matters are listed in Part B of Schedule 4 to the Final Constitution, and they include '[w]ater and sanitation services limited to potable water supply systems and domestic waste-water and sewage disposal systems'. It makes no sense, however, to read FC s 139 to mean that the provincial government may intervene only in those functional areas over which the local governments enjoy no executive authority, because, obviously, local government has no executive obligations within the meaning of FC s 139 in those functional areas. Nevertheless, the subject matter is important when considering the constitutional validity of a FC s 139 intervention. City of Cape Town v Premier, Western Cape & Others concerned the lawfulness of the Western Cape Premier's appointment of a commission of inquiry into the affairs of the Cape Town local government. The Cape High Court held that the lawfulness of the Premier's action depended on whether the subject matter of the abortive commission of inquiry was such that a FC s 139 intervention could rationally result from the commission's findings.[1] The implication here is that FC s 139 interventions are limited to certain subject matters, and that the validity of a FC s 139 intervention will rest on the existence of a rational connection between the purpose and the subject matter of the intervention. Since local governments enjoy executive authority only in respect of the matters listed in Part B of Schedule 4 — read with FC s 156(1)(a) — and any matters assigned to them by national or provincial legislation in terms of FC s 156(1)(b), it is reasonable to conclude that the provincial government retains a right of intervention, in terms of FC s 139, only in respect of those subject matters over which local government has executive authority. The provinces therefore retain a right to intervene in, and if necessary assume responsibility for, water and sanitation services at the local level.

Second, one might suspect that the assumption by national government of a local government's water service obligations in terms of the National Water Services Regulation Strategy infringes the provincial right of intervention in terms of FC s 139. Indeed, FC s 100 provides only for national intervention in provincial executive affairs, not in local government matters. The authority for the national government to intervene in this way, however, is founded on FC s 139(7). FC s 139(7)provides that if a provincial government is unable to or chooses not to exercise the powers of intervention set out in the rest of FC s 139, 'the national executive must intervene…in the stead of the relevant provincial executive'.

request to dissolve the council and assume its functions itself in terms of FC s 139(1)(c), with the result that the province intervened only in terms of FC s 139(1)(b) to assume responsibility for certain local government obligations. 'Second Report of the ad hoc Committee on Intervention in the Lekwa-Teemane Local Municipality in terms of section 139(1)(c) of the Constitution' Proceedings of the National Council of Provinces (4 March 2004) 114ff). The national Department of Basic Education recently announced its intention to intervene in the Eastern Cape in terms of FC s 100(1)(b) and assume responsibility for constitutional and legislative obligations in the field of education. Statement to the National Assembly on the Eastern Cape Education Department Intervention by Minister of Basic Education Angie Motshekga (16 March 2011).

[1] 2008 (6) SA 345 (C) at para 89.

(b) The constitutional obligation to respect, protect, promote and fulfil rights

All spheres of governments have obligations with respect to the right of access to water. The question that arises is whether all three spheres of government are equally burdened by the obligations to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the right to have access to water. The duty to fulfil may be different from the other three duties. According to Jaap de Visser and others, the duty to fulfil is onerous: 'local government's hands might be tied by its [limited] constitutional mandate' so it cannot take 'legislative, administrative, budgetary and judicial or other similar measures to fulfil these rights'.[1] However, municipalities would still be bound to respect, protect and promote the right to water.[2] The flip-side of this reasoning is that national and provincial governments are primarily responsible for the duty to fulfil the right of access to water through legislation, budgetary allocation and policies.

In practice, it is not possible to arrive at a clear-cut apportionment of the four duties among the three spheres of government; the determination of which sphere of government is responsible for the failure to comply with any of these duties will depend on the facts of each case. A municipality may be bound by the duty to fulfil the right just as the other two spheres of government may be. Municipalities design policies or make budgetary allocations aimed at implementing their own goals, and the legislation promulgated or policies adopted by national or provincial governments. Municipalities are essentially the implementation arm of the national and provincial governments. They have the constitutional duty to provide municipal services to communities in a sustainable manner.[3]

On the other hand, the obligations of national and provincial governments extend beyond the duty to fulfil. For example, a simple case of disconnection of water by a municipality may flow directly or indirectly from water policies adopted at the national or provincial level. In such an instance, it may be easy to isolate the local authority as a possible violator of the duty to respect the right to water while ignoring the responsibilities of national and provincial governments pertaining to the adoption, through legislation and policies, of protective measures against such matters as arbitrary disconnections of water services.

The upshot of this discussion is that all three spheres of government have obligations in relation to the right of access to water. They are all enjoined to respect, protect, promote and fulfil this right. While local government operates

[1] J de Visser, E Cottle & J Mettler 'Realising the Right of Access to Water: Pipedream or Watershed' (2003) 7(1) Law, Democracy & Development 27, 29.

[2] Ibid.

[3] The Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 provides that a municipal council must annually review the needs of the community, its priorities to meet those needs, its organizational and delivery mechanisms for meeting those needs, and its overall performance in achieving the objects of FC s 152. Similarly, the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 ('Municipal Systems Act') requires municipalities to 'give effect to the provisions of the Constitution and … ensure that all members of the local community have access to at least the minimum level of basic municipal services'. Municipal Systems Act s 73(1)(c). 'Basic municipal service' means 'a municipal service that is necessary to ensure an acceptable and reasonable quality of life and, if not provided, would endanger public health or safety or the environment'. Municipal Systems Act s 1.

at the contact point with communities and, as such, is primarily obligated to provide municipal services to communities, it is important not to ignore the linkages between this responsibility and those of national and provincial governments. As was emphasized in Grootboom, measures aimed at realising socio-economic rights must be comprehensive and well-coordinated in the sense that they must 'clearly allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensure that appropriate financial and human resources are available'.[1] Comprehensiveness and coordination are the hallmarks of cooperative government and conditiones sine qua non for the effective realisation of the right to water.[2]

As the roles in relation to the provision of water of national, provincial and local governments are closely intertwined, so are the functions of various government departments. DWA (formerly the Department of Water Affairs and Forestry) is the principal organ responsible for water services. But, as noted earlier, water is a cross-cutting issue which transcends departmental boundaries. Other government departments dealing with the environment, housing, land, and industrial development are also directly and indirectly responsible for water services. For the state to comply with its obligations under the Constitution, it must put in place and implement legislation and policies that focus both on water directly and on other services that have implications for access to water. These policies must be coherent and comprehensive so that everyone is guaranteed access to water.

(c) Respect

The duty to respect creates a buffer between the state and the individual: it insulates individuals from state interference with their existing access to water. The state can violate this duty through, for example, limiting or cutting off access to water, or destroying water infrastructure and pollution.[3]

(i) Disconnections

As Michael Kidd has argued,[4] disconnection of existing access to water constitutes a prima facie limitation of the right of access to water. The Constitutional Court has recognised that rights in the Bill of Rights impose negative duties on the state, in the sense that any measure that deprives a person of existing access to, for example, adequate housing constitutes an infringement of the right to have access to adequate housing.[5] In South Africa, due in part to the implementation

[1] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 ('Grootboom') at para 39.

[2] Principles of cooperative government are laid down in Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution and include the principle that all spheres of government should provide 'effective, transparent, accountable and coherent government for the Republic as a whole'. FC s 41(1)(c). See, generally, S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government and Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, July 2009) Chapter 14.

[3] CESCR General Comment 15*:* The Right to Water (Twenty-ninth session, 2002) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2002/11 (2003)('General Comment 15') at para 21.

[4] M Kidd 'Not a Drop to Drink: Disconnection of Water Services for Non-Payment and the Right of Access to Water' (2004) 20 SAJHR 119.

[5] Jaftha v Schoemann & Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC), [2004] ZACC 25 at para 34.

of commercialisation principles, disconnections of water supply have become a common occurrence as a means of enforcing payment for water services.[1] Are these disconnections of water for personal and domestic use constitutional? This question is particularly important because, as we have noted above, s 3(1) of the Water Services Act guarantees everyone the right of access to 'basic water supply and basic sanitation'. The Act defines 'basic water supply' as 'the prescribed minimum standard of water supply services necessary for the reliable supply of a sufficient quantity and quality of water to households, including informal households, to support life and personal hygiene'.[2] The regulations promulgated in terms of this provision effectively establish a minimum quantity of water, and minimum standards of access to water, that the state has committed to providing, apparently regardless of the availability of resources.

The Water Services Act restricts the right of a service provider to discontinue water services on any ground. According to s 4(3)(a) of this Act, service providers[3] have the obligation to adopt procedures for the limitation or discontinuance of water services that are fair and equitable. Furthermore, these procedures must:

> (b) provide for reasonable notice of intention to limit or discontinue water services and for an opportunity to make representations, unless —
> (i) other consumers would be prejudiced;
> (ii) there is an emergency situation; or
> (iii) the consumer has interfered with a limited or discontinued service; and
> (c) not result in a person being denied access to basic water services for non-payment, where that person proves, to the satisfaction of the relevant water service authority, that he or she is unable to pay for basic services.[4]

According to these provisions, a disconnection of water service for any reason must accord with the prescribed minimum procedural fairness guarantees of notice and the right to be heard. In Joseph & Others v The City of Johannesburg & Others, the Constitutional Court commented on the need for procedural fairness when electricity supplies are disconnected.[5] It held that where people are 'already receiving a service as a matter of right', the service provider is obliged to fol-

[1] For example, it has been alleged that about 800-1000 disconnections per day were taking place in early 2003 in Durban affecting about 25 000 people in a week. Another study has revealed that between 1999 and 2001, 159 886 households experienced water cut-offs on grounds of non-payment in Cape Town and Tygerberg. See, for example, A Loftus '"Free water" as Commodity: The Paradox of Durban's Water Service Transformations' in D McDonald & G Ruiters (eds) The Age of Commodity: Water Privatization in Southern Africa (2005) 189, 194; L Smith 'The Murky Waters of Second Wave Neoliberalism: Corporatisation as a Service Delivery Model in Cape Town' in McDonald & Ruiters (supra) at 168, 180.

[2] Water Services Act s 1(iii).

[3] In terms of Water Services Act s 1(xxiii), 'water services provider' means 'any person who provides water services to consumers or to another water services institution but does not include a water services intermediary.' The latter means 'any person who is obliged to provide water services to another in terms of a contract where the obligation to provide water services is incidental to the main object of that contract'. See Water Services Act s 1 (xxii).

[4] Water Services Act s 4(3).

[5] 2010 (3) BCLR 212 (CC), 2010 (4) SA 55 (CC), [2009] ZACC 30 ('Joseph').

low fair procedures before terminating those services.[1] Joseph, as has been argued elsewhere, appears to follow a constitutional doctrine of legitimate expectations.[2]

Significantly, a water service provider cannot disconnect water supply where the consumer satisfies the relevant service provider that he or she is unable to pay. In Residents of Bon Vista Mansions v Southern Metropolitan Local Council,[3] Budlender AJ held that the effect of these provisions when read in the light of FC ss 27(1) and 7(2) is that disconnection of an existing water supply to consumers by a local authority is a prima facie breach of its constitutional duty to respect the right of existing access to water. These legislative restrictions are critical to ensuring that poor communities have continued access to water services.

Similarly in Highveldrige Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council & Others, the local authority was directed to reinstate residents' water supply as a form of interim relief.[4] While the judgment primarily deals with the locus standi of the applicant, the Court made an assessment of the balance of convenience. It reasoned that any potential pecuniary losses of the respondents could not outweigh the human need and suffering that would occur due to the lack of fresh water. It relied for that conclusion on both FC s 27 and the rights of children to adequate nutrition in FC s 28.[5] It is clear that section 4(3) (c) of the Water Services Act imposes the onus on the consumer to prove that he or she is unable to pay for basic services. A trickier question is how proof 'to the satisfaction of the relevant service authority' should be interpreted. In the past, such a phrase was interpreted as conferring wide discretion on the authorities. As long as they proved that they were satisfied about the existence of the facts on which the opinion was based, they could not be faulted even if, objectively speaking, the information before them could not have justified the opinion they reached.[6] In the new constitutional order, the Constitutional Court has expressed disquiet against the grant of unguarded and broad discretionary powers because the exercise of such powers comes with a propensity to infringe constitutional rights.[7] In the present case, to leave the determination of who is unable to pay solely within the discretion of a service provider would render

[1] Joseph (supra) at para 47.

[2] See C Sprague & S Woolman 'Moral Luck: Exploiting South Africa's Policy Environment to Produce a Sustainable National Antiretroviral Treatment Programme' (2006) 22 SAJHR 337 (Discussing Van Biljoen v Minister of Correctional Services 1997 (4) SA 441 (C) in which the High Court found that two prisoners with HIV/AIDS previously on ARVs in penal institutions had a legitimate expectation to receive ART while incarcerated.)

[3] 2002 (6) BCLR 625 (W).

[4] High Court (Transvaal Provincial Division) Case No 28521/2001 (17 May 2002).

[5] For more on this aspect of FC s 28, see A Friedman, A Pantazis & A Skelton 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, July 2009) §47.4.

[6] There is a rich, if odious, body of judicial opinion supporting this point in South Africa's security legislation cases. See, example, Kabinet van die Tussentydse Regering vir Suidwes-Afrika v Katofa 1987 (1) SA 695 (A).

[7] See Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8; Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister of Trade & Industry NO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC), [2000] ZACC 18. For a more detailed discussion on subjective phrases, see C Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (2007) 265-271.

the protection of s 4(3)(c) nugatory. Inability to pay should be determined by an objective standard rather than a subjective standard.

How much protection, it may be asked, does s 4(3)(c) of the Water Service Act really offer to those that are unable to pay for basic services? An answer to this question was attempted in Manqele v Durban Transitional Metropolitan Council.[1] The applicant was an unemployed 35 year-old-woman who resided, with seven children, in a flat owned by the respondent. Water supply to her flat was disconnected by the respondent due to non-payment for the service. In her application to have the water reconnected, she relied, among other legal provisions,[2] on her right under s 4(3)(c) to have continued access to water despite her inability to pay. However, the judge responded that since the applicant had used more water than that available under the respondent's free water policy, she could not rely on the protection under this section.[3] According to the Court:

> The applicant chose however not to limit herself to the water supply provided to her free of charge by the respondent, but to consume additional quantities of water in respect of which she has an obligation to pay… . This in my view, takes the applicant outside the ambit of being a person contemplated by section 4(3)(c).

The judgment thus holds that disconnections for non-payment are acceptable where consumers use more water than the relevant water services provider has undertaken or is obliged to provide for free. It is unclear whether, on this view, disconnection for non-payment would result in consumers being denied access to, or even the basic quantity of, free water. Properly constructed, then, Manqele holds that disconnections for non-payment for use of amounts over and above the allotted amount are acceptable so long as people continue to have access to the amount of water supplied for free by the relevant water services provider. The holding may seem tortured — but it retains a certain consistency. End users are entitled to a certain amount of water per month free of charge. After use of their free water, they remain responsible for payment of the remainder. However, disconnection for repayment of the remainder ought not to result in the denial of their monthly free allotments.

The Constitutional Court approved of this approach in Mazibuko. O'Regan J held that the automatic disconnection of water supplied from a prepaid metered system or a yard standpipe after six kilolitres per month was beyond constitutional reproach. The Court concluded that in circumstances where the water supply has been cut off because the basic, free, quantity of six kilolitres has been exhausted, but will be reconnected at the beginning of the following month, it cannot be said that a 'limitation or discontinuation of water services' in terms of s 4(3) of the [1] [2002] 2 All SA 39 (D).

[2] The applicant also relied on the right to basic water supply in Water Services Act s 3. As the regulations defining the extent of this right had not yet been promulgated, Niles Duner J held that this section was not justiciable. This holding is problematic simply because the right to water is itself a justiciable right under the Constitution. The failure to promulgate the regulations itself should have been considered as a violation of the right to water under the Act as read with FC s 27(1)(b).

[3] The respondent's policy later received national legislative approval under the Regulations to the Water Services Act referred to above.

Water Services Act has occurred. It is a 'temporary suspension in supply' to which section 4(3) does not apply.[1]

In sum, people who are unable to pay for water are entitled to no more than the six kilolitres of free water per month per household. If that was what Parliament had intended, however, it would have had no reason to include s 4(3)(c) in the Water Services Act. Section 3 of the Water Services Act provides that everyone has a right of access to a basic water supply, while s 1(iii) defines 'basic water supply' to mean the 'prescribed minimum standard of water supply services necessary…to support life and personal hygiene'. The regulations in turn prescribe the minimum basic water supply as six kilolitres a month per household. Together, these provisions suffice to ensure that people have access to a minimum basic water supply. The Mazibuo/Manqele gloss on FC s 27 and the Water Services Act holds that where the basic water supply is provided free of charge, WSA s 4(3) (c) — which deals with denial of basic water supply for non-payment –does not apply. Section 4(3)(c), on the Mazibuko and Manqele approach, can apply only in situations where the basic water supply is not supplied for free. Since February 2001, however, the South African government has been providing basic water for free in terms of the free basic water policy.[2] While it is true that the government is under no constitutional obligation to provide free basic water,[3] in the context of the prevailing policy landscape, the courts have altered the meaning of s 4(3)(c) of the Water Services Act from disconnection to temporary suspension. If that outcome is what the Court intended, then it should make such a dramatic holding, with all its unfortunate consequences, clear to the reader and to the people of Phiri and other locales.

A policy decision by cabinet and the subsequent implementation of that policy cannot be allowed to alter the meaning of a legislative provision.[4] And it remains true that s 4(3)(c) was designed to protect the water rights of abjectly poor people.

It is for this reason that we propose an alternative interpretation of the provision. Our starting point is the recognition that what is prescribed as a basic water supply in the regulations is the minimum, not the maximum, amount of basic water. The provision of the minimum amount of water does not exhaust the state's obligations under s 3 of the Water Services Act as read with FC s 27(1)(b)'s obligation to progressively realise the right to water for those who are unable to pay for it. Section 4(3)(c) states explicitly that the discontinuation of water services for non-payment must not result in the denial of access to basic water. To the

[1] Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28 ('Mazibuko') at paras 119-124.

[2] 'Free Basic Water Implementation Strategy (version 2)' (2002) available at http://www.dwaf.gov.za/Documents/FBW/FBWImplementStrategyAug2002.pdf (accessed on 17 April 2011).

[3] Mazibuko (supra) at para 85. For further discussion on this point, see § 56B.4*(f)*(ii) below.

[4] But see the approach taken to the principle of constitutional subsidiarity in Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33 ('Nokotyana') (Rights to receive basic service were held to depend on the provisions of chapters 12 and 13 of the National Housing Code — a policy document developed in terms of the Nation Housing Act 107 of 1997.) See also D Bilchitz 'Is the Constitutional Court Wasting Away the Rights of the Poor? Nokotyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality' (2010) 127 SALJ 591 (Contends that this approach has the result of allowing 'a policy document to overrule a legislative obligation' to provide basic sanitation services in terms of the National Water Act and its regulations.).

extent that the paragraph protects only that minimum quantity of basic water, and not any amount of water in excess of that minimum, the provision is inconsistent with the constitutional and policy scheme that sets a minimum, but not a maximum amount, of basic water. The paragraph should rather be read to ensure that no discontinuation (as opposed to suspension) of water services occurs for reasons of non-payment, regardless of how much water is used, in circumstances where people are genuinely unable to pay for water services. It therefore may be reasonable to set some form of maximum limit for persons who cannot pay. All residents face some (soft) limits on high water usage: such limits generally take the form of higher prices.

Last, but not least, it may be asked whether s 4(3)(c) of the Water Services Act can be relied upon in connection with premises that are not private dwellings. A comparison can be made between this section and s 63A of the British Water Industry Act 1991. The British Act makes it an offence for a water services provider to use a limiting device with the intention of enforcing payment of charges due in respect of the supply of water for a list of specified premises: private dwelling houses, children's homes, residential care homes, prisons and detention centres, schools and premises used for children's day care. Although similar provisions are absent from the Water Services Act, Michael Kidd has argued, quite persuasively, that it cannot be deemed 'equitable and fair' in terms of s 3*(a)* of the Act to discontinue water supply for non-payment from such premises as schools.[1] Alternatively, he has argued that in the case of schools, learners are innocent and not direct customers of the water service provider. Consequently, they should be regarded as being unable to pay for the water supply to the private service provider and therefore deserving of protection under s 4(3)(c). Kidd's interpretation would mean that premises like schools and prisons are protected from disconnections where the owners are unable to pay for water services. The Courts' approach to s 4(3)(c), with its manifest difficulties, is unlikely to leave vulnerable classes of persons — learners and prisoners — clearly protected by rights enshrined in FC s 29 and FC 35 vulnerable to disconnection.

(ii) Prepaid meters

Due to the prevalence of non-payment for water services, particularly in black communities, municipalities have increasingly resorted to using prepaid meters as a credit control mechanism in South Africa. These meters have the effect of discontinuing a service automatically after the credit expires. During the 1990s, the use of prepaid meters was opposed in the United Kingdom both by consumers and municipalities concerned about the health risks associated with water cut-offs.

[1] M Kidd 'Not a Drop to Drink: Disconnection of Water Services for Non-Payment and the Right of Access to Water' (2004) 20 SAJHR 119, 136.

Litigation that sought to have prepaid meters declared unlawful was ultimately successful:[1] the use of prepaid water meters was prohibited by legislation in 1999.[2]

In the English litigation, the Queen's Bench held automatic cut-offs of the water supply upon the exhaustion of credit in a prepaid meter to be inconsistent with the statutory requirement that notice be given to the social services department — which can indefinitely delay disconnection — and the requirement that water consumers be given seven days' notice of disconnection and an opportunity to contact and make representations to the relevant social services department. In the South African context, it would seem that prepaid meters circumvent the procedures for discontinuing water service set out in s 4(3) of the Water Services Act. The argument that the installation and operation of prepaid meters violates both the Act and FC s 27(1)(b) was directly before the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko.

The Court's response was vastly different to the Queen's Bench's response in Director of Water Services.[3] Leaving aside the question of whether a cut-off amounts to an administrative action for the purposes of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, s 4(3)(b) of the Water Services Act in any case requires procedures for the disconnection of water services to 'provide for reasonable notice of intention to limit or discontinue water services and for an opportunity to make representations'. The Court considered the meaning of this provision:

[1] R v Director of Water Services, ex parte Lancashire County Council, Liverpool City Council, Manchester City Council, Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council, Tameside Metropolitan Borough Council and Birmingham City Council [1999] Env LR 114, [1998] EWHC 213 (QB). See, generally, M Drakeford 'Water Regulation and Prepayment Meters' (1998) 25 Journal of Law and Society 588; J Dugard 'Rights, Regulation and Resistance: The Phiri Water Campaign' (2008) 24 SAJHR 593; and E Harvey 'Managing the Poor by Remote Control: Johannesburg's Experiment with Pre-Paid Water' in D McDonald & G Ruiters (eds) The Age of Commodity: Water Privatisation in South Africa (2005) 120.

[2] The Water Industry Act of 1991 was amended in 1999. The new section 63A, inserted by section 2 of the Water Industry Act of 1999 provides:

Prohibition of use of limiting devices.

(1) A water undertaker shall be guilty of an offence under this section if it uses a limiting device in relation to any premises specified in Schedule 4A to this Act, with the intention of enforcing payment of charges which are or may become due to the undertaker in respect of the supply of water to the premises.

(2) For the purposes of this section "a limiting device", in relation to any premises, means any device or apparatus which—

(a) is fitted to any pipe by which water is supplied to the premises or a part of the premises, whether that pipe belongs to the undertaker or to any other person, and

(b) is designed to restrict the use which may be made of water supplied to the premises by the undertaker.

(3) An undertaker does not commit an offence under this section by disconnecting a service pipe to any premises or otherwise cutting off a supply of water to the premises.

(4) An undertaker guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

[3] The Final Constitution does not oblige courts to consider foreign law when interpreting the rights in the Bill of Rights, although it may do so. FC s 39(1)(c). Moreover, it does not appear from the Heads of Argument that either the applicants or the amicus curiae cited the case to the Court. Nevertheless, the point here is not to berate the Court for its failure to refer to foreign law, but for the poverty of its logical and intellectual approach in the face of a patently better one.

> Could section 4(3) mean that every time a water supply, provided through a pre-paid meter is about to be suspended because the credit purchased for the water supply is at its end, reasonable notice and an opportunity to be heard must be provided to the relevant customer by the municipality? This would, in my view, have a result that borders on the absurd. It would require the municipality to give advance notice and an opportunity to be heard, possibly several times a month or more to every person who has a pre-paid meter installed. For there is no reason why the reasonable notice should only apply when the suspension of the service arises because the basic water supply has been exhausted. On the applicants' argument it would arise every time the pre-paid water allowance has been consumed and it is time to purchase a further allocation.[1]

To require such onerous procedures, the Court concluded, would be administratively untenable, and for that reason should not be required.[2] In this way, the Court has essentially limited any rights of procedural fairness by seeking to justify their limitation against the difficulty of respecting those rights. To say that rights are too difficult to respect, however, is an unacceptable excuse for abrogating them. The English court in Director of Water Services was faced with precisely the same conundrum. Its response to the situation in which a technology of water reticulation and a set of rights are incompatible was to reject the technology of water reticulation — that is, prepaid meters — rather than to reject the rights. If the only way to respect the welfare rights granted by s 4(3) of the Water Services Act is to ban the use of prepaid meters, then so be it. As to whether disconnection can be justified in terms of FC s 27, our socio-economic jurisprudence permits the Court to balance administrative costs and the provision of basic goods. We would argue that 'access to water' constitutes an urgent need for those persons in desperate circumstances, and that the established criteria for reasonableness articulated in Grootboom ought to prevent disconnection or suspension.

Finally, the applicants argued that the change in water supply policy from one in which people had been charged a flat rate in the form of a 'deemed consumption tariff' to one involving the installation of prepaid meters amounted to a deprivation of existing rights of access to sufficient water and thus a violation of the negative duty to respect rights.[3] Under the terms of the previous system,

[1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 122.

[2] Ibid at para 123. Consider the US Supreme Court's response to the debate around whether statutory welfare and disability rights can be terminated without prior notice or hearing in the two cases of Goldberg v Kelly 397 US 254 (1970) and Mathews v Eldridge 424 US 319 (1976). Having held in Goldberg that welfare rights constitute property for the purposes of the 5th and 14th Amendments' protections of due process, the Supreme Court considered in Mathews the administrative burden the requirements of due process place on officials. It held that any burden placed on the bureaucratic machinery of state welfare support has to be balanced against the urgency of the need in which welfare or disability claimants find themselves. The urgency of need is a theme the Constitutional Court has embraced in its earlier judgments on socio-economic rights, notably Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19; Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening),2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) [2001] ZACC 19; and Residents of Joe Slovo Community, Western Cape v Thubelisha Homes and Others (Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions and Another, Amici Curiae) 2010 (3) SA 454 (CC), 2009 (9) BCLR 847 (CC), [2009] ZACC 16. It is odd, then, that the Court shows so little willingness to take the urgency of the need for water into account, or, as in Mathews, to balance the administrative burden against the urgent need for water.

[3] Mazibuko (supra) at paras 135-136.

residents of Phiri in Soweto had paid a flat rate of R68,40 per month for an unlimited amount of water for domestic use. The free basic water policy provides an amount of six kilolitres per month for free, with water in excess of that amount charged for on the basis of a subsidised block tariff. The Court's response to this argument turns on whether or not water supplied using pre-paid meters is more expensive overall for consumers than the old deemed consumption scheme. The flat rate charged under the old scheme was based on a deemed consumption of 20 kilolitres per month. In terms of the new free basic water programme and pre-paid meters, the charge for 20 kilolitres would come to R95,80 per month. This charge is clearly more than the old flat rate of R68,40. However, the Court points out that according to the 2006/2007 tariff for combined water and sanitation services, consumers 'still charged on the deemed consumption tariff will be charged a flat rate of R131,25 for water and sanitation. Thus, the flat rate appears to cost 25 per cent more than the amount charged to pre-paid meter customers.'[1] The Court concluded from this costs comparison 'that the move from the deemed consumption system to the pre-paid metered system with a free allocation of 6 kilolitres per month [does not] constitute a retrogressive step.'[2]

(d) Protect

The duty to protect is critical to the realisation of the right to water principally because of the increasing involvement of private actors in the provision of water services. The state can privatise the provision of water services but not its obligations implicit in the right to water.[3] In the context of the privatisation of water, the state remains primarily responsible for regulating private service providers so that they do not deny individuals or groups their right to water.[4]

Water services were previously provided predominantly by state departments. The White Paper on the Transformation of the Public Service 1995 marked a formal transition from the state dominated system of service provision to one in which private service providers are allowed to play a part. Privatisation of water services[5] was given a legal boost by the enactment of the Water Services

[1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 140

[2] Ibid at para 142. Against this conclusion see the argument that the tariff structure implemented by Johannesburg Water, with steeply rising water prices at the lower end of the usage scale after the free water allocation has been exhausted rather than a convex curve with steeper price increases at the 'luxury', high consumption end of the scale, impacts negatively on low-income households and makes water bills unaffordable. P Bond & J Dugard 'The Case of Johannesburg Water: What Really Happened at the Pre-paid "Parish Pump"' (2008) 12 Law, Democracy and Development 1, 7; P Bond & J Dugard 'Water, Human Rights and Social Conflict: South African Experiences' (2008) 11(1) Law, Social Justice and Global Development 1, 9-11; and J Dugard 'Civic Action and Legal Mobilisation: The Phiri Water Meters Case' in J Handmaker & R Berkhout (eds) Mobilising Social Justice in South Africa: Perspectives from Researchers and Practitioners (2010) 71, 79-80.

[3] D Chirwa 'Privatization and Freedom from Poverty' in G van Bueren (ed) Freedom from Want (forthcoming 2011).

[4] K de Feyter & FG Isa 'Privatization and Human Rights: An Overview' in K de Feyter & FG Isa (eds) Privatization and Human Rights in the Age of Globalization (2005) 1, 3–4.

[5] Privatisation is used here to refer to the process through which the state involved private actors in the provision of services. It embraces many forms including the total sale of assets, private-public partnerships, management contract, employee buyout and outsourcing.

Act in 1997.[1] The form of privatisation tried in a number of municipalities[2] is a management contract. Under this arrangement, operation of the water system is contracted out to a private provider while the system itself is still owned by the government.

(i) Privatisation

Due partly to the public resistance to privatisation and partly to the failure of these 'pilot' privatisation initiatives to live up to the expectations of greater efficiency,[3] better service quality and enhanced accessibility, the state has now leaned towards corporatisation as a more preferable mode for providing water services. Corporatisation is a process whereby a government department is turned into a public company with the aim of letting it function as a commercial entity.[4] Ownership, control and management of the assets remain in the hands of the state, but the new entity operates in accordance with business principles. Amendments to the Municipal Systems Act in 2003 have made it more difficult for private service providers to become involved in water provision through management contracts or outright sale of state assets than was initially planned.[5] Chances for a private service provider to be awarded a contract such as those awarded to BiWater and SAUR International in Dolphin Coast are now rather slim. Thus, contrary to popular assumptions, water is mostly provided by state departments and corporatised entities. Although municipalities still outsource certain services related to water provision, such as meter reading, very few municipalities have contracted the provision of these services to private companies. In Nkonkobe Municipality v Water Services South Africa (PTY) Ltd & Others,[6] the case turned in large part on the lack of participation in the awarding of a concession for private

[1] Water Services Act s 11.

[2] The delivery of water and sanitation services in three Eastern Cape municipalities — Queenstown, Stutterheim and Fort Beaufort — were the first basic municipal services to be privatised in 1992, 1993 and 1994 respectively. Lyonnaisse Water Southern South Africa (restructured in 1996 as Water and Sanitation Services (WSSA)) was the private actor that won the relevant management contracts. The provision of water services in Nelspruit was in 1999 contracted out to Bi-water, a British based multinational corporation, for 30 years. Again, in 1999, the provision of water and sanitation services in Dolphin Coast and Durban was contracted out to multinational companies SAUR International and Bi-Water respectively. In 2001, management contracts to provide similar services were won by WSSA in respect of Johannesburg.

[3] For assessments of the performance of privatisation initiatives in South Africa, see generally D McDonald & G Ruiters (eds) The Age of Commodity: Water Privatization in Southern Africa (2005).

[4] D McDonald 'Privatization and the New Ideologies of Service Delivery' in D McDonald & L Smith (eds) Privatizing Cape Town: Service Delivery and Policy Reforms since 1996 Municipal Services Project, Occasional Paper Series No 7 (2002) 20.

[5] For example, the procedures now require municipalities to involve communities when deciding to involve external delivery mechanisms and concluding agreements with private service providers, to assess different mechanisms before going external and to opt for an external mechanism only where it presents the best chance of achieving the objectives of the providing municipal services that are accessible and equitable. See D Chirwa 'Water Privatisation and Socio-economic Rights in South Africa' (2004) 8(2) Law, Democracy and Development 181, 191-192; N Steytler 'Socio-economic Rights and the Process of Privatizing Basic Municipal Services' (2004) 8(2) Law, Democracy and Development 157, 169-176.

[6] [2001] ZAECHC 3.

operation of water services. The municipality was successful in nullifying the 6 year-old contract. However, the municipality did not succeed because it claimed it could no longer afford the high management fees of R400 000 per month being charged by the private contractor. Rather, the High Court found that the municipality itself had not complied with the necessary consultation and public participation requirements in awarding the tender.

While the involvement of private service providers creates peculiar problems relating to their regulation by the state and their accountability to the public,[1] issues pertaining to access to water services are essentially the same whether these services are provided by the state, by private service providers, or jointly. This is so because public providers now use commercial principles in providing water services: full cost recovery measures, ring fencing, removal of subsidies, and the use of harsh credit enforcement mechanisms. We explore below the ramifications that these commercial principles have on the right of access to water services.

(ii) Farm owners and other landowners

In some circumstances, interference with water supplies should require a court order in advance. If the disconnection, denial or limitation of access to water services or supplies amounts to a constructive eviction — a resident is forced to leave their home as a result — then there is precedent to suggest that disconnection cannot occur without a court order. Under FC s 26(3) an eviction cannot proceed without the imprimatur of judicial approval. The Land Claims Court, itself, has suggested that severe restrictions on the use of land may amount to an eviction.[2]

The duty to protect the rights in the Bill of Rights may require the state to prevent violations of the right of access to sufficient water by third parties.[3] For instance, if a farmer unreasonably and arbitrarily cuts off access to water to lawful occupiers of his property, then the state must act to restore access to sufficient water to the occupiers. Likewise, water services operated by private operators must be sufficiently regulated by the government to ensure that such operations do not interfere with the right to water of other members of the commonweal.

(e) Promote

The duty to promote is educational in nature. It requires the state to raise awareness among water users about their right to water, including the hygienic use of water, the protection of water sources and sustainable use of water.[4] Indeed, the regulation giving effect to the right to have access to a basic water supply and basic sanitation services contains a requirement that 'appropriate education in respect of effective water use' must be provided.[5]

[1] See, for example, D Chirwa 'Privatization of Water in Southern Africa: A Human Rights Perspective' (2004) 4(2) African Human Rights Law Journal 218.

[2] See Van der Walt & Others v Lang & Others Case No 102/98 (LCC); Dhladhla & Others v Erasmus Case No 11/98 (LCC).

[3] Maastricht Guidelines on violations of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1997) at para 6.

[4] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 25.

[5] Regulation 3*(a)* of the Regulations relating to compulsory national standards and measures to conserve water, Government Gazette 22355, Notice R509 of 2001 (8 June 2001).

The government's duty to promote a right is also a shield against claims arising from other legal provisions or constitutional rights.[1] In Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others, the right to adequate housing assisted the national government in defending its right to create temporary housing for flood victims in the face of claims by neighbouring residents that property values would fall and their peaceful environment would be disturbed.[2] In the case of water such protection is also buttressed by the property right enshrined in FC s 25(8): 'No provision of this section may impede the state from taking legislative and other measures to achieve land, water and related reform, in order to redress the results of past racial discrimination' (Our emphasis).

(f) Fulfil

The duty to fulfil, as mentioned earlier, has two elements: the obligation to facilitate the realisation of the right and the obligation to provide the goods guaranteed by the right. The former requires that the state must put in place measures that enable people to have access to the right using their own means. The latter requires the state to provide direct assistance to those who cannot afford water services so that they can have access to these services. This obligation, as will be demonstrated below, has particular relevance to disconnections, pricing for water services and tariff enforcement mechanisms.

(i) Ensuring Affordability

Access to water in South Africa is determined by consumer tariffs that seek to recover the full cost of the service.[3] According to the White Paper on a National Water Policy for South Africa 1997, '[t]o promote the efficient use of water, the policy will be to charge users for the full financial costs of providing access to water, including infrastructure development and catchment management activities'. While this policy also stipulates that provision will be made for some or all of these charges to be waived in order to promote equitable access to water for basic human needs, it does not explain how this is to be done. This policy now takes the form of the Water Services Act. The Act requires that the Minister, when prescribing norms and standards in respect of tariffs for water services,

[1] See G Budlender 'The Justiciability of the Right to Housing: The South African Experience' in Scott Leckie (ed) National Perspectives on Housing Rights (2003) 207-216. In the context of the right of access to sufficient water, the state's duty to promote the rights in the Bill of Rights might mean the creation of educational and informational programmes designed to enhance awareness and understanding of the right of access to sufficient water. See CESCR General Comment 10: The Role of National Human Rights Institutions in the Protection of Economic, Social and Cutural Rights (19th session, 1998) UN doc E/C12/1999/22 at para 3*(a)*. See also Soobramoney v Minister of Health (Kwazulu-Natal) 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC), [1997] ZACC 17 at para 49 (Madala J)('Perhaps a solution may be to embark upon a massive education campaign to inform the citizens generally.')

[2] , 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC), [2001] ZACC 19.

[3] S Flynn & D Chirwa 'The Constitutional Implications of Commercialising Water in South Africa' in McDonald & Ruiters (eds) (supra) at 59, 65.

consider, among other things, the recovery of the costs reasonably associated with the provision of the water services.[1]

'Full cost recovery' means that the tariff for water services must reflect the initial cost of installing the infrastructure (capital cost) and the expenses associated with operating and maintaining the infrastructure (marginal costs).[2] Where water is provided by a private service provider, the cost of providing it is easy to ascertain. By contrast, where water is provided by a public operator, the cost can only be determined if the accounting system for water services is separated from other services. Thus, the Water Services Act expressly provides that '[w]hen performing the functions of a water service provider, a water services authority must manage and account separately for those functions.' This practice is known as 'ring-fencing'. It enables a service provider to eliminate subsidies and cross-subsidies that might have otherwise enabled the service provider to reduce the full cost of providing water services and hence lowering the tariffs.

Unbridled application of the full cost recovery principle may occasion unfairness in the South African context. As Pape and McDonald have argued, white South Africans and the industrial sector benefited enormously from heavily subsidised municipal services during the apartheid era.[3] As the geographical distribution of the people in South Africa still follows predominantly racial patterns, white communities and the industrial sector continue to benefit from reasonably good infrastructure. Most black communities, in contrast with white communities, require new infrastructure for water services. It follows that charging them the full cost of service delivery will result in higher tariffs, thereby perpetuating and reinforcing the effects of past unfair discrimination.[4]

Subsidies can be provided by the state. In City Council of Pretoria v Walker,[5] the South African Constitutional Court concluded that cross-subsidisation among consumers and differentiation in tariffs for services is not per se unconstitutional.[6] Walker concerned a claim of discrimination by a white person living in a predominantly white community that a neighbouring black community was being favoured with respect to tariffs for municipal services. In the black community, flat rates were charged. In the white community, the tariffs were charged according to the [1] Water Services Act s 10(3)(d). Other considerations in s 10(3) include social equity, the need for the return on the capital invested for the provision of water services and the financial sustainability of the water services in the area in question.

[2] See also P Bond, G Ruiters & D McDonald 'Water Privatization in Southern Africa: The State of the Debate' (2003) 4(4) ESR Review 12.

[3] J Pape & DA McDonald 'Introduction' in DA McDonald & J Pape (eds) Cost Recovery and the Crisis of Service Delivery in South Africa (2002) 20–22.

[4] It has been shown, for example, that the tariff per litre of water in rural KwaZulu-Natal is multiple times higher than that for the previously advantaged suburbs of Richard's Bay. See E Cottle & H Deedat The Cholera outbreak: A 2000-2002 Case Study of the Source of the Outbreak in the Madlebe Tribal Authority areas, uThungulu Region, KwaZulu-Natal' (2002) 79, available at <ftp://ftp.hst.org.za/pubs/research/cholera.pdf> (accessed on 31 May 2011).

[5] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC), [1998] ZACC 1 ('Walker').

[6] The Walker Court stated that 'There may be cases where it is not unfair to charge according to different rates for the same services; it seems to me to be inconsistent with the equality jurisprudence developed by this Court to hold that all cross-subsidisation is precluded by sect 8(2) of the 1993 Constitution'. Ibid at para 42.

exact amount of services consumed. Langa DCJ held that special measures taken to ensure that disadvantaged communities enjoy access to basic services were necessary.[1] The flat rate was permissible 'while phasing in equality in terms of facilities and resources, during a difficult period of transition'.[2] This holding is consistent with comments made by the CESCR regarding service pricing. According to the CESCR:

> Any payment for water services must be based on the principle of equity, ensuring that these services whether publicly or privately provided are affordable for all including socially disadvantaged groups. Equity demands that poorer households should not be disproportionately burdened with water expenses as compared to richer households.[3]

Legislation does place limits on the notion of full cost recovery. For example, the Minister, when setting the norms and standards in respect of tariffs for water services is empowered under s 10(1) of the Water Services Act to differentiate among geographical areas, categories of water users or individual water users.[4] Similarly, s 97(1)(c) of the Municipal Systems Act requires credit control and debt collection policies to make provision for indigent debtors. This statutory provision is consistent with its rates and tariff policies and any national policy on indigents.

However, apart from the free water policy discussed below, it is not clear how equity considerations apply in tariff determination. On the contrary, evidence suggests that municipalities tend to use full cost recovery as the overriding yardstick in setting tariffs.[5] Full cost recovery is achieved through the use of prepaid meters and a pricing system for post-paid meters which operates so that after the first block of free water, the charges for the next blocks rise steeply.[6] This practice contradicts the state's commitments under the Constitution, the Water Services Act and the National Water Act. Together, the Constitution and these two acts require the state to structure tariffs for water services so that the poor are not denied access to water.

(ii) Free water policy

The duty to fulfil the right to water summons the state to provide the means through which poor people can gain access to water. The free water policy is a principal means through which the state has, thus far, provided direct assistance to poor people in accessing water services. To restate: the minimum standard for basic water supply is '25 litres per person per day or 6 kilolitres per household per month' at a minimum flow rate of not less than 10 litres per minute, within 200 metres of a household.[7]

---

[1] However, selective enforcement of payment for tariffs (not forming part of the special measures) was held to be a violation the non-discrimination clause.

[2] Walker (supra) at para 27.

[3] General Comment 15 (supra) at para 27.

[4] Sec 10(1)(a) of the Water Services Act.

[5] See, eg, Cottle & Deedat (supra) at 71–72.

[6] Ibid. See also McDonald (supra) at 28.

[7] Regulations relating to compulsory national standards and measures to conserve water, Government Gazette 22355, Notice R509 of 2001 (8 June 2001), regulation 3*(b)*.

Many writers have argued that this amount of free water is grossly inadequate.[1] These arguments were presented to the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko. The trend at the international level suggests that about 50 litres per person per day is the recommended basic amount of water for drinking and sanitation.[2] In addition to challenging the ultimate amount, some have attacked the free water policy on the ground that it has not been implemented uniformly and properly in all municipalities.[3] For example, a case-study of the Ilembe District Municipality undertaken by the South African Human Rights Commission revealed that over 40 per cent of the population does not have access to free basic water.[4] It has also been argued that those living in informal structures do not benefit from this policy.[5] Of particular concern is the fact that the current pricing system operates in such a way that after the first block of free water, charges for the next blocks rise sharply.[6] It is likely that this last issue will soon be the subject of constitutional litigation.[7]

In Mazibuko, the Constitutional Court made it clear that the state is under no constitutional obligation to provide free water. Referring specifically to the City of Johannesburg, the Court held that 'the City is not under a constitutional obligation to provide any particular amount of free water to citizens per month. It is under a duty to take reasonable measures progressively to realise the achievement of the right.'[8] Indeed, in overturning the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision, the Constitutional Court held that the applicants had based their challenge to the policy on the position that the city was under an obligation to provide a certain amount of free water. The SCA had held that since the City's policy had been formulated on the misconception that it was not under an obligation to provide free water to those who could not afford to pay, the policy was materially influenced by an error of law and should be set aside on that basis.[9] The Constitutional Court overturned this finding. In so doing, it affirmed that the City is under no obligation to provide free water in terms of the prescribed minimum basic water supply.[10]

The Supreme Court of Appeal based at least part of its reasoning on s 4(3) (c) of the Water Services Act.[11] Reading this provision alongside the Constitutional Court's dictum generates a couple of thought-provoking observations. The [1] See, eg, J de Visser, E Cotle & J Mettler 'Realising the Right of Access to Water: Pipedream or Watershed (2003) 7(1) Law, Democracy & Development 27, 43; C Mbazira 'Privatization and the Right of Access to Sufficient Water in South Africa: The Case of Lukhanji and Amahlati' in J de Vissser & C Mbazira (eds) Water Delivery: Public or Private? (2006) 57–85.

[2] See, eg, P Gleick, 'The Human Right to Water' (1999) 1(5) Water Policy 587–503.

[3] See S Booysen The Effect of Privatization and Commercialisation of Water Services on the Right to Water: Grassroots Experiences in Lukhanji and Amahlati (Community Law Centre, 2004) 53.

[4] South African Human Rights Commission 6th Economic and Social Rights Report (2006) 111.

[5] Flynn & Chirwa (supra) at 71–73.

[6] McDonald (supra) at 28.

[7] Private communication from lawyers acting for residents in two informal settlements with Malcolm Lanford (3 May 2011).

[8] Mazibuko (supra) at para 85.

[9] Ibid at para 28.

[10] Ibid at para 85.

[11] City of Johannesburg and Others v Mazibuko and Others (Centre on Housing Rights and Eviction as amicus curiae) 2009 (3) SA 592 (SCA), 2009 (8) BCLR 791 (SCA) at paras 29-38.

section provides that: 'Procedures for the limitation or discontinuation of water services must not result in a person being denied access to basic water services for non-payment, where that person proves, to the satisfaction of the relevant water services provider, that he or she is unable to pay for basic services.' In other words, if a person cannot pay for basic water services, providing that person has an existing connection to a water supply and has been receiving basic water services, that person is entitled to continue receiving basic water services, for free. The protection against water cut-off for reasons of non-payment contained in s 4(3)(c) of the Water Services Act effectively establishes a statutory right to receive free basic water services.

It must be noted, however, that this protection applies only against water cut-offs, or the limitation or discontinuation of water services. The statutory right to free basic water thus only applies to people with existing connections to a metered or deemed-consumption water supply. If this is correct, then it establishes a slightly bizarre disparity between poor people with water connections who cannot afford to pay for basic water, and poor people with no connection who cannot afford to pay for that water. Plainly, people with no existing connection to a water supply cannot be charged for water. In terms of the City of Johannesburg's free basic water policy, these individuals and households are people with access to water in terms of 'service level 1'. Service level 1 constitutes access to water from a communal standpipe with unlimited flow no more than 200 metres away from the dwellings in question.

The more pressing point, however, is this: the statutory entitlement to free basic water does not extend to poor people without an individual connection to a water supply. There is no absolute statutory right to free basic water, and poor people without individual connections to a water supply could be required to pay for a basic water supply. Only once a person has an individual connection to a water supply which is capable of being discontinued do they enjoy a right of free access to basic water services — subject to the provision that they cannot pay for the water themselves. The statutory scheme is consequently under-inclusive. It creates a distinction between two classes of people. The distinction is arbitrary because it is entirely conditional on whether they had a pre-existing connection to a municipal water source or not. The Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on reasonableness in the context of socio-economic rights holds that any reasonable measures must take account of those in desperate circumstances or in urgent need of socio-economic resources. The statutory scheme confers a benefit on one class of people who cannot afford to pay for water, while denying that benefit to a class of people whose need for water is arguably more urgent and desperate. For this reason, the statutory plan would appear to be unreasonable within the Constitutional Court's own understanding of FC s 27(2).

(g) Equality Guarantee

FC s 27 does not create a directly enforceable set of rights. That is, an individual will not be able to sue the government for immediate relief: unless he or she is already in receipt of service or goods in question.[1] However, the rights do require that the government put in place a reasonable plan to effect their progressive implementation. Courts may decide that FC s 27 is not directly enforceable against private parties such as private water service providers.[2]

To avoid the difficulties associated with the individual enforcement of socio-economic rights, an alternative argument could be based on FC s 9. The advantage of basing a claim on s 9 is twofold: Private parties are explicitly prohibited from unfairly discriminating and the right is immediately and directly enforceable. Pierre De Vos[3] proffers the following argument for a FC s 9 claim. He first notes that the Constitutional Court has on various occasions affirmed that all the rights in the Bill of Rights are interdependent, interrelated and often mutually supporting.[4] The Court has also accepted that the Constitution embraces a substantive notion of equality, as opposed to a formal understanding of equality.[5] In deciding whether discrimination is 'unfair,' the deciding factor is the impact of the conduct on the complainant. De Vos puts it as follows:

> What is required is to take into account the impact of the state's action or omission on a specific group with reference to the social and economic context within which the group finds itself. The more economically disadvantaged and vulnerable a group is found to be, the greater the possibility that a court may find that there was a constitutional duty to pay special attention to the needs of such a group.[6]

He further argues that the factors a court would consider in deciding whether the state's plan in realising socio-economic rights is reasonable are comparable to the factors a court would consider when deciding whether unfair discrimination occurred. A failure to take into account the structural inequalities in society, or the failure to take into account the impact of particular conduct on particularly vulnerable groups, could in appropriate circumstances amount to 'unfair' discrimination.[7]

A claim based on unfair discrimination, either against the state or a private water supplier, will only succeed if an appropriate 'prohibited ground' is identified. Two possible grounds are socio-economic status and gender. Socio-economic status is not explicitly listed in the Constitution. A court would have to be persuaded

[1] See Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 'Treatment Action Campaign' or 'TAC') at para 39 ('We therefore conclude that FC s 27(1) does not give rise to a self-standing and independent positive right enforceable irrespective of the considerations mentioned in section 27(2).')

[2] See Grootboom (supra) at para 34; TAC (supra) at para 39. The Constitutional Court held that FC s 26(1) and (2) and FC s 27(1) and 27(2) must be read together to identify the scope of the right. FC s 26(2) only obliges the 'state' to take reasonable measures to realise the right and a court that follows a literal interpretation may then decide that if water supply has been privatised, that only the state may be held liable, as only the state is addressed in FC 26(2).

[3] P De Vos 'Grootboom, the Right of Access to Housing and Substantive Equality as Contextual Fairness' (2001) 17 SAJHR 258.

[4] See General Comment 15 (supra) at para 1 ('State parties have to adopt effective measures to realize, without discrimination, the right to water, as set out in this general comment') and at para 12*(c)*(iii) ('Water and water facilities and services must be accessible to all, including the most vulnerable or marginalized sections of the population, in law and fact, without discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds.')

[5] De Vos (supra) at 267.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at 272.

that such a ground could be read into the list by analogy.[1] Should such an analogy prove successful and should the state or a private water supplier's policy be shown to disparately and negatively impact on the poor, a claim could be brought by an individual or group of individuals against the state or against the private supplier directly.[2] Similarly, a gender-based discrimination suit could be brought against a private water supplier[3] in cases where it can be demonstrated that its water supply policies impact disproportionately on (rural) women. It goes without saying that exhaustive empirical research would probably have to be undertaken to support either the class or gender based claim.

While courts have been very careful in crafting appropriate remedies in socio-economic rights decisions and have not granted immediate relief to claimants,[4] the same situation should not necessarily apply to a claim based on the equality guarantee. The Constitution allows for 'appropriate' relief and the qualifiers contained in FC ss 26(2) and 27(2) do not appear in s 9.[5] It would therefore be open to a court to grant immediate relief to a particular claimant. Courts will, of course, be inclined to hold that since the socio-economic rights as framed in the Constitution explicitly spell out the state's duties, the equality provision may not be used to create more onerous obligations. Indeed, the Grootboom Court, for example refused to allow the more onerous provisions in FC s 28 (Childrens'

[1] 'Social origin' and 'birth' are protected grounds in the Constitution but courts will not necessarily interpret these grounds to include socio-economic status. Section 34 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 hints that 'socio-economic status' is a prohibited ground for discrimination in South African law.

[2] For example, if a particular private water supplier terminates cross-subsidisation measures that lead to an increase in the tariffs charged to poor 'customers', such a supplier could arguably be interdicted to reintroduce cross-subsidisation measures. Cross-subsidisation was found to be 'fair' discrimination in Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) [1998] ZACC 1. The Court implicitly recognised the need for cross-subsidisation measures in Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1998] ZACC 17 at paras 80, 121-125 and 169. See also E Wamugo 'Privatisation and Regulation in Sub-Saharan Africa: Issues for Consideration' (2001) June International Business Lawyer 263 at 265 ('Some level of cross-subsidisation (eg between rural and urban users) may be socially desirable'); COSATU 'The Realities of Privatisation' (2002) 26 SA Labour Bulletin 30 (Raises an argument that privatisation may not occur if it would end cross-subsidisation of services for the poor or would have a negative impact on the poor); De Visser et al (supra) at 43 (Notes that local businesses have been excluded from cross-subsidisation policies and argues that in light of the fact that 78 per cent of water in South Africa is consumed by commercial agriculture and industry and only 12 per cent by domestic water consumption, that equal treatment is unreasonable and local businesses should be expected to participate in cross-subsidisation.)

[3] S Liebenberg & M O'Sullivan 'South Africa's New Equality Legislation: A Tool for Advancing Women's Socio-Economic Equality?' University of Cape Town and the Law, Race and Gender Unit, Faculty of Law (January 2001) 3 (Copy on file with authors)('[W]hile all the poor in South Africa are disadvantaged by a lack of access to social services such as water women are disproportionately affected because they bear a vastly disproportionate burden of household maintenance, child care, and care for elderly or sick relatives.') The authors also note that the Constitutional Court has taken judicial notice of the disproportionate burden of reproductive work performed by women. See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) ('Hugo') at para 37. See also G Brodsky & S Day 'Beyond the Social and Economic Rights Debate: Substantive Equality Speaks to Poverty' (2002) 14 Canadian J of Women and the Law 185.

[4] In Soobramoney, the Court refused to grant relief to the applicant and did not order the state to provide life-saving treatment. In Grootboom and TAC, the Court found that the existing government plans and policies were unreasonable and merely ordered the state to devise and implement a reasonable plan.

[5] FC s 38.

Rights) to allow children with families to secure immediate relief in the form of housing, when the family itself would not be entitled to such relief under FC s 26. Such a conclusion would sorely test Kriegler J's view that the Final Constitution is primarily and emphatically an egalitarian document.[1] And yet it is a conclusion which Kreigler J — and the rest of the Constitutional Court — signed on.

In Mazibuko, the Constitutional Court recognises the validity of this kind of equality claim, even though it ultimately rejects both versions of the applicants' challenges on the basis of equality.[2] In terms of existing constitutional jurisprudence, any differentiation between classes of people that is not rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose is prohibited by FC s 9(1).[3] The applicants in Mazibuko presented the argument that the introduction of prepaid meters in only the Phiri region of Soweto drew a distinction between classes of people that is not related to any legitimate government purpose.[4] There were three other areas in Johannesburg that, like Phiri, had for many years received water as 'deemed consumption areas': Orange Farm, Ivory Park and Alexandra. In none of these other three areas, however, had prepaid water meters been introduced.[5] The Court held, however, that prepaid meters had been introduced in part to reduce water wastage, and in part to remedy the problem of unaccounted for water distributed in Soweto, for which no payment was received and from which no revenue was generated. The attempt to remedy a situation the Court appeared to agree was unsustainable was in the Court's view a legitimate government purpose that could not be held to be irrational in terms of FC s 9(1).[6]

The applicants' second equality challenge to the installation of prepaid meters was that their introduction in predominantly black neighbourhoods, but not in predominantly white neighbourhoods, amounted to unfair discrimination between white and black water consumers. Unfair discrimination by the state is prohibited by FC s 9(3), and discrimination on the basis of race or colour is presumptively unfair in terms of s 9(5). The Court set out the test for unfair discrimination

[1] See Hugo (supra) at para 74 ('The South African Constitution is primarily and emphatically an egalitarian Constitution. The supreme laws of comparable constitutional states may underscore other principles and rights. But in light of our own particular history, and our vision for the future, a Constitution was written with equality at its centre. Equality is our Constitution's focus and its organising principle.')

[2] Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC) [2009] ZACC 28 ('Mazibuko').

[3] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 42. See also Mazibuko (supra) at 84 (Court quoted Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) [1997] ZACC 5 at para 25 as follows: 'In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional State is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate government purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional State. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the State is bound to function in a rational manner.')

[4] Mazibuko (supra) at para 145.

[5] Prepaid electricity meters have been introduced in Orange Farm, and the struggle against them has been going on for some years under the banner of the Soweto Electricity Crisis Committee. See A Egan & A Wafer, 'The Soweto Electricity Crisis Committee: A Case Study for the UKZN Project on Globalisation, Marginalisation and New Social Movements in Post-Apartheid South Africa' (2004) 12. See also R Ballard, A Habib & I Valodia*Voices of Protest: Social Movements in Post-apartheid South Africa* (2006).

[6] Mazibuko (supra) at para 146.

as follows: 'To determine whether the discrimination is unfair it is necessary to look at the group affected, the purpose of the law and the interests affected.'[1] The Court held that the impact of the City's water policy could not be said to be harmful or disadvantageous to the residents of Phiri. They were not treated less favourably under the terms of the City's water policy than residents of other, predominantly white areas in which no prepaid meters were installed. Indeed, the Court continued, Phiri residents actually pay less for their water than consumers in other parts of the City.[2] The differentiation between Phiri residents and others, then, because it entailed no disadvantage or harmful impact for the residents of Phiri, did not amount to unfair discrimination.

The Court went on to make an important comment on how to understand equality in a deeply unequal society such as ours:

> The conception of equality in our Constitution recognises that, at times, differential treatment will not be unfair. Indeed, correcting the deep inequality which characterises our society, as a consequence of apartheid policies, will often require differential treatment.[3]

Slavish adherence to an ideal of equal treatment, in other words, is not necessarily the best way in which to go about achieving a more equal society, nor is it always feasible. The implication of the Court's reasoning here is that where benefits can be brought to one group of people by treating them differently to other groups of people, the ideal of equality should not prevent that. The achievement of equality may necessitate and justify different, perhaps unequal, treatment.[4]

In Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality, however, the Constitutional Court blatantly ignores the principle set out in this dictum.[5] In Nokotyana, the applicants had sought from the respondent an increase in the number of ventilated improved pit latrines in the Harry Gwala informal settlement, so that each family, or alternatively every two families, would have access to a single latrine.[6] The municipality indicated that it was in a position to offer only one latrine to every ten households.[7] It emerged during the litigation that the national and Gauteng provincial governments had offered to finance the provision of toilets to meet the applicants' prayers. The municipality resisted this offer on the ground that to improve access to sanitation services for the residents of the Harry Gwala settlement while not doing the same for other residents of the municipality and the province would amount to unequal treatment. The Court agreed:

> It would not be just and equitable to make an order that would benefit only those who approached a court and caused sufficient embarrassment to provincial and national authorities to motivate them to make a once-off offer of this kind.[8]

---

[1] Mazibuko (supra) at para 150. The Court referred here to Harksen v Lane NO (supra) at para 54 (Test for unfair discrimination is set out in full.)

[2] Ibid at para 152.

[3] Ibid at para 156.

[4] On the distinction between equal treatment and treatment as an equal, see, especially, R Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously (1977), 227ff.

[5] 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33 ('Nokotyana').

[6] Ibid at paras 2 and 21.

[7] Ibid at para 33.

[8] Ibid at para 54. The Court referred here to FC s 172(1)(b). This section enables courts deciding constitutional cases to make any order that is 'just and equitable'.

It is hard to reconcile the approach taken by Van der Westuizen J in Nokotyana with O'Regan J's observations about the nature of equality in Mazibuko, or the Court's well-entrenched precedent in Walker. The Court's adherence to an unachievable ideal of equal treatment in Nokotyana denies access to vastly improved sanitation services to a large number of people.[1] Such a volte face is difficult to explain, let alone stomach.

56B.5 Right to Sanitation

The right to basic sanitation is not mentioned expressly in the Bill of Rights. It has, however, has been recognised in statutory law. In international law and in foreign jurisprudence, as we noted above, sanitation is often viewed as an element of other rights, particularly housing, health and the right to environmental health or clean environment. Failure to control sanitary excreta disposal is one of the major causes of environmental pollution and waterborne diseases.

(a) International Law

(i) Express and implied recognition

A range of international human rights and humanitarian law instruments explicitly protect and promote access to sanitation. Article 14(2)(h) of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women explicitly obliges states parties to ensure that women in rural areas have the right to 'enjoy adequate living conditions, particularly in relation to housing, sanitation, electricity and water supply, transport and communications'. Under the Convention on the Rights of the Child, states parties are to ensure that all segments of society 'are informed, have access to education and are supported in the use of basic knowledge of … hygiene and environmental sanitation.' Under Geneva Convention (III) relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, 1949, occupying powers are 'bound to take all sanitary measures necessary to ensure the cleanliness and healthfulness of camps and to prevent epidemics': the article then goes on to specify in some detail the type of measures required.[2] The same treatment is required in relation to civilian internees under Geneva Convention (IV) relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War.[3] Water resources and infrastructure, which would

[1] For trenchant criticism of this glaring inconsistency in the Court's jurisprudence, see D Bilchitz 'Is the Constitutional Court Wasting Away the Rights of the Poor? Nokotyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality' (2010) 127 SALJ 591, 601-04.

[2] Geneva Convention, Article 29:

Prisoners of war shall have for their use, day and night, conveniences which conform to the rules of hygiene and are maintained in a constant state of cleanliness. In any camps in which women prisoners of war are accommodated, separate conveniences shall be provided for them. Also, apart from the baths and showers with which the camps shall be furnished, prisoners of war shall be provided with sufficient water and soap for their personal toilet and for washing their personal laundry; the necessary installations, facilities and time shall be granted them for that purpose.

[3] Geneva Convention, article 89.

arguably include sewage treatment plants and other sanitation facilities must also be protected during armed conflict.[1]

In the last decade, there have been increasing attempts to recognise a so-called freestanding or independent international human right to sanitation. Until recently, the international recognition of such a right to sanitation has been thin. In 1992, the International Conference on Water and the Environment identified four 'guiding principles'. The fourth principle contained this statement: 'it is vital to recognize first the basic right of all human beings to have access to clean water and sanitation at an affordable price.'[2] Two years later, 177 States at the 1994 Cairo Conference on Population and Development, endorsed a Programme of Action that recognises, in Principle 2, that all individuals have the 'right to an adequate standard of living for themselves and their families, including adequate food, clothing, housing, water and sanitation.'[3] While the 2002 Johannesburg Declaration does not explicitly acknowledge the right to sanitation, it affirms its fundamental connection with human dignity: the principle from which all human rights are said to derive.[4]

The Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights was pressed to imply the right to sanitation along with the right to water enunciated in General Comment 15 in 2002. It declined to do so and gave no public reasons. However, in its General Comment 19, issued in 2008, the Committee began to open the door.[5] This change was largely prompted by a push for recognition within the UN System. In 2001, a Special Rapporteur was appointed by the UN Sub-Commission on Human Rights to report on the right of everyone to drinking water.[6] His draft guidelines begin by identifying sanitation as 'unquestionably a human right'. The guidelines go on to state that '[e]veryone has the right to have access to adequate and safe sanitation that is conducive to the protection of public health and the environment.'[7] In 2006, the newly formed Human Rights Council asked the High

[1] See Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol 1) art 54; and Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II), 1977, art 14.

[2] Dublin Statement on Water and Sustainable Development (1992).

[3] The later UN-Habitat Global Plan of Action (1996) contains identical language to the Cairo Conference. UN-Habitat, The Habitat Agenda Goals and Principles, Commitments and the Global Plan of Action (1996) at para 11:

More people than ever are living in absolute poverty and without adequate shelter. Inadequate shelter and homelessness are growing plights in many countries, threatening standards of health, security and even life itself. Everyone has the right to an adequate standard of living for themselves and their families, including adequate food, clothing, housing, water and sanitation, and to the continuous improvement of living conditions.

[4] See Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment 4, at para 2.

[5] When discussing the coverage for certain social security benefits, it uses the language of rights in relation to sanitation: 'Family and child benefits, including cash benefits and social services, should be provided to families, without discrimination on prohibited grounds, and would ordinarily cover food, clothing, housing, water and sanitation, or other rights as appropriate.' CESCR General Comment 19, The Right to Social Security (Thirty-Ninth session, 2007) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/GC/19 at para 6.

[6] Final report of the Special Rapporteur on the Relationship between the Enjoyment of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Promotion of the Realization of the Right to Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation, 14 July 2004, E/CN.4/Sub.2/2004/20.

[7] The guidelines are available at http://www2.ohchr.org/english/issues/water/index.htm.

Commissioner for Human Rights to prepare a study on the scope and content of relevant human rights obligations related to equitable access to safe drinking water and sanitation under international human rights instruments. The Commissioner acknowledged that the debate as to whether water and sanitation were human rights remained open, but forcefully concluded that she 'believes that it is now time to consider access to safe drinking water and sanitation as a human right'.[1] In 2009, the newly appointed UN Independent Expert on the Issue of Human Rights Obligations related to Access to Safe Drinking Water and Sanitation, submitted her report to the General Assembly with a similar finding.[2]

The issue was finally resolved in 2010 when the UN General Assembly affirmed 'the right to safe and clean drinking water and sanitation as a human right that is essential for the full enjoyment of life and all human rights.'[3] In September 2010, the UN Human Rights Council confirmed the recognition of the right to sanitation[4] and the CESCR immediately issued a Statement on the Right to Sanitation that declared:

> The Committee reaffirms that, since sanitation is fundamental for human survival and for leading a life in dignity, the right to sanitation is an essential component of the right to an adequate standard of living, enshrined in Article 11 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The right to sanitation is also integrally related, among other Covenant rights, to the right to health, … the right to housing, … as well as the right to water, which the Committee recognized in its General Comment No. 15. It is significant, however, that sanitation has distinct features which warrant its separate treatment from water in some respects. Although much of the world relies on waterborne sanitation, increasingly sanitation solutions which do not use water are being promoted and encouraged.[5]

A number of social rights have also been interpreted by UN human rights treaty bodies to include access to sanitation. According to the CESCR, the right to housing embraces facilities for 'sanitation and washing facilities' and 'site drainage'.[6] With regard to the right to health, the same Committee listed sanitation as one of the underlying determinants of health, and thus part of the right to health, on the basis of the drafting history of the Covenant and the wide wording of the provision.[7] Sanitation is mentioned a number of times in General Comment 14 on the Right to Health, particularly in the context of the availability, the quality and the accessibility elements of the right to health.

Sanitation was given equal attention in the CESCR's General Comment 15 although the degree of recognition was still criticised as paltry by some experts at the Day of General Discussion that preceded its adoption. The content of the [1] High Commissioner for Human Rights 'Report on the Right to Water and Sanitation as Human Rights' available at http://www2.ohchr.org/english/issues/water/docs/HRC_decision2-104.pdf (accessed on 31 May 2011).

[2] U.N. Doc A/HRC/12/24 (2009).

[3] The human right to water and sanitation, U.N. Doc A/64/L.63/Rev.1 at para 1.

[4] Human Rights and Access to Safe Drinking Water and Sanitation, U.N. Doc. A/HRC/15/L.14.

[5] U.N. Doc. E/C.12/45/CRP.1.

[6] CESCR General Comment 4 (supra) at para 8*(b)*.

[7] CESCR General Comment 14, The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health (Twenty-second session, 2000) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2000/4 at para 4.

right to water is said to include water for personal hygiene and sanitation and the Committee was anxious to emphasise that access to sanitation was both 'fundamental for human dignity and privacy' and a 'principal mechanisms for protecting the quality of drinking water supplies and resources'.[1] The effective provision of sanitation was articulated as a clear state responsibility: 'States parties have an obligation to progressively extend safe sanitation services, particularly to rural and deprived urban areas, taking into account the needs of women and children.'[2]

The interplay between sanitation and various social rights is particularly visible in foreign jurisprudence. The very first Indian public interest litigation social rights matter engaged sanitation. In Municipal Council, Ratlam v Shri Vardhichand & Others, the Supreme Court of India found that the failure of a municipality to provide toilets for informal settlements and drainage not only violated the Municipality Act but threatened human health and implicated human rights due to the assault on decency and dignity.[3] In the first reported cases that invoked General Comment 15, sanitation was at the forefront. Provincial and municipal authorities in Argentina were found to have violated the rights to health and water by failing to provide the degree of sanitation necessary to prevent pollution of communal water sources.[4]

(ii) A co-right with water?

What is interesting about the recognition of the right to water and sanitation is the use of a singular not a plural noun. All the documents refer to water and sanitation as a human right not human right*s*. Sanitation and water appear to be conceived as twins — a co-right as it were. Some environmentalists express some concern that the constant lumping of water and sanitation together in development and now human rights discourse promotes water-based solutions to sanitation. While such a concern may have merit, it is difficult to imagine that all sanitation issues will invariably necessitate the use of water or engagement with the right to water.

An analogy with the civil right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion might shed some light on the relationship between water and sanitation. Although rights to thought, conscience and religion are related and overlap, they each possess relatively distinct characteristics.

Water quality is largely dependent on the provision of sanitation (water-borne or dry), both water and sanitation services require good hygiene to be effective, and where sanitation is waterborne, infrastructure is often twinned.

However, there are also a number of differences. Responsibility for providing sanitation services is normally spread among many different departments and ministries, and is delivered by a wider range of service providers. The timeframe for the delivery of sanitation services and particularly hygiene promotion tends to be longer. Due to the nature of their delivery, when water services fail, they

[1] CESR, General Comment 15, The Right to Water (Twenty-ninth session, 2002) U.N. Doc. E/C.12/2002/11 at para 29.

[2] Ibid.

[3] (1981) SCR (1) 97 available at http://www.judis.nic.in/supremecourt/qrydisp.aspx?filename=4495 (accessed on 31 May 2011). We are grateful to Justice Krishna Iyer for pointing out this fact to us.

[4] CEDHA v Provincial State and Municipality of Córdoba.

tend to fail in a geographic area, sparking immediate public demand for improvement or replacement services. However, when sanitation services fail, they are more likely to fail by household (full pit or septic tank), so the public demand for improvement is more localised and therefore not as effective. Where only a few people lack sanitation though, all feel the health impact. Nonetheless, it is difficult to assess the weight of such differences. For instance, providing water can be complex if it must be pumped from a distance and if good quality dry toilets are available in a location. The timeframe for the delivery of sanitation services and particularly hygiene promotion tends to be longer because it is simply not prioritised. A manager at a South African local municipality recently commented that the directive from national government was to meet the water targets first and concentrate on sanitation afterwards.[1]

In the South African context, no distinction is drawn between water and sanitation supply and they are lumped together as 'water services'. 'Water authorities' are thus burdened with a range of obligations with respect to them, even where sanitation services are not water-based sewerage services.

(iii) Individual or collective right?

The right to sanitation raises the classical issue of individual rights vs. collective rights. It is not even immediately clear into which category it falls. Sanitation is frequently promoted by health and development practitioners and policymakers on the basis of its public health benefits. Human excreta is the leading cause of water pollution and a major cause of preventable illnesses that lead to death. But how does this translate into human rights terms? Does it imply that we are primarily concerned not with a personal right to sanitation but rather a right for all people to have sanitation, in order that everyone will be protected. Many see 'environmental sanitation' as equally important — focusing not just on human excreta but developing sanitation systems that deal with all types of waste, and which demands not just a collection point of excreta, but also safe transport, treatment and disposal.[2] Sanitation thus possesses the features of a collective right. Could sanitation be better viewed as part of the right to environmental health or merely as a duty stemming from the right to health or water?

International human rights treaty law is largely structured in individual terms and each right is usually premised on a direct connection with human dignity. This question is further complicated in the case of sanitation: practitioners frequently express frustration with a lack of demand for sanitation. 'People need to be educated', they say. How does this fit with human rights? If human rights are meant to spring from universal and basic demands, do we need to be educated about them? Should people not be helped to demand them?

There are two ways to address this conceptual challenge. The first approach denies that the lack of individual access to sanitation is in and of itself an affront to human dignity. A lack of sanitation clearly raises issues of privacy, individual health, personal dignity and equality. Thus the objective impact on the individual

[1] Communication from local official, 17 February 2009.
[2] See WHO What is Environmental Sanitation? (2002).

of a lack of sanitation, whether mental or physical, and its impact on access to other human rights, could be sufficient.

A second, and better, approach is to downplay the theoretical difficulties of recognising a human right with inherent individual and collective characteristics and acknowledge that a right with individual and collective dimensions is acceptable within the international framework. For example, articles 8 and 13(4) of the ICESCR recognise collective rights. The former contains the 'right of trade unions' to establish federations and function freely. Article 13(4) grants 'individuals and bodies' the liberty from interference in the establishment of educational institutions, although it is constructed more as a defence than a right. Indeed, there are many parallels between trade union rights and the broader civil right to freedom of association and a right to sanitation. If only one person has the right to association, but it is denied to others, it is of little value.[1] The utility of the right to freedom of association lies in the ability of all individuals to exercise it and thus jointly organise, express their opinions and take collective action. The cultural rights in articles 1*(a)* and 3 of the ICESCR also have strong collective dimensions. Collective rights are also recognised in Article 27 of the ICCPR in relation to ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities.

Interestingly enough, the right to both a basic water supply and basic sanitation in s 2 of the Water Services Act is framed in such an individual and collective fashion: 'the right of access to a basic water supply and the right to basic sanitation necessary to secure sufficient water and an environment not harmful to human health or well-being'. Thus the purpose of the right to sanitation is to protect other people's human health and well-being. Similar language is used in the UN Sub-Commission guidelines, which arguably go further since they aim to protect the environment generally, and not just human health.[2]

(iv) Content

In the case of sanitation, one challenge is the level of technology. Does everyone have the right to a flush toilet or a dry toilet with equivalent effect? Are ventilated pit latrines or community toilets acceptable in any case or only in communities insufficient resources? How much should be left to progressive realisation and national interpretation? These questions are the subject of a growing debate. Many development agencies favour the use of Ventilated Improved Pits ('VIPs'). VIPs entail lower water demand and maintenance and no need for cost-recovery and revenue collection. However, some question the appropriateness of 'dry systems' for humid environments where, in fact, faecal matter does not easily dry. A further problem with VIPs is that they need to be emptied regularly, which often does not happen. In South Africa, Kathy Eales notes that —

[1] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[2] UN Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights Guidelines for the Realization of the Right to Drinking Water and Sanitation (2006) available at www.ielre.org/content/e501.pdf (accessed on 1 June 2011) 2. (Everyone has the right to have access to adequate and safe sanitation that is conducive to the protection of public health and the environment.)

> Many VIPs are now full and unusable. In many areas, VIPS are now called full-ups. Some pits were too small, or were fully sealed … . South Africa's household sanitation policy is grossly inadequate. It speaks primarily to dry systems, and does not clarify roles and responsibilities around what to do when pits are full. National government under-estimated the scale of technical support required. [1]

This assessment suggests that, even leaving the issue of personal dignity aside, VIPs are not a panacea. They are not necessarily more affordable. The key issue becomes prioritisation.

The WHO guidelines describe sanitary excreta disposal as the isolation and control of faeces from both adults and children so that they do not come into contact with water sources, food or people. The UN Independent Expert has proposed a definition for the right to sanitation which was endorsed by the CESCR in 2010:[2] 'a system for the collection, transport, treatment and disposal or re-use of human excreta and associated hygiene … which is safe, hygienic, secure, socially and culturally acceptable, provides privacy and ensures dignity.'[3] She then went on to lay out the system's various substantive elements:

1. Availability. There must be a sufficient number of sanitation facilities (with associated services) within, or in the immediate vicinity, of each household, health or educational institution, public institutions and places, and the workplace. There must be a sufficient number of sanitation facilities to ensure that waiting times are not unreasonably long….
2. Quality. Sanitation facilities must be hygienically safe to use, which means that they must effectively prevent human, animal and insect contact with human excreta. Sanitation facilities must further ensure access to safe water for hand washing as well as menstrual hygiene, and anal and genital cleansing, as well as mechanisms for the hygienic disposal of menstrual products. Regular cleaning, emptying of pits or other places that collect human excreta, and maintenance are essential for ensuring the sustainability of sanitation facilities and continued access….
3. Physical Accessibility. Sanitation facilities must be physically accessible for everyone within, or in the immediate vicinity of, each household, health or educational institution, public institutions and places, and the workplace. Physical accessibility must be reliable, including access at all times of day and night. The location of sanitation facilities must ensure minimal risks to the physical security of users….
4. Affordability. Access to sanitation facilities and services, including construction, emptying and maintenance of facilities, as well as treatment and disposal of faecal matter, must be available at a price that is affordable for all people without limiting their capacity to acquire other basic goods and services, including water, food, housing, health and education guaranteed by other human rights. Water disconnections resulting from an inability to pay also impact on waterborne sanitation, and this must be taken into consideration before disconnecting the water supply….

[1] B Amisi, P Bond, D Khumalo, & S Nojiyeza 'The neoliberal loo' (18 February 2008) available at http://www.ukzn.ac.za/ccs/default.asp?2,40,5,1514 (accessed on 15 October 2008).

[2] U.N. Doc. E/C.12/45/CRP.1 (2010) at para 8.

[3] Report of the Independent Expert on the Issue of Human Rights Obligations related to Access to Safe Drinking Water and Sanitation U.N. Doc A/HRC/12/24 (2009) available at http://www2.ohchr.org/english/bodies/hrcouncil/docs/12session/A-HRC-12-24_Epdf (accessed on 1 June 2011) ('Report of Independent Expert') at para 63.

5. Acceptability. Sanitation facilities and services must be culturally acceptable. Personal sanitation is still a highly sensitive issue across regions and cultures and differing perspectives about which sanitation solutions are acceptable must be taken into account regarding design, positioning and conditions for use of sanitation facilities. In many cultures, to be acceptable, construction of toilets will need to ensure privacy.[1]

In relation to the first element, the UN Independent Expert particularly notes that 'it is tempting to determine a specific minimum number of toilets.'[2] However, she concedes that that specifications can be 'counterproductive' and that it is crucial that the 'assessment of the sanitation requirements of any community is informed by the context' as well as 'the characteristics of particular groups which may have different sanitation needs'. However, she emphasises the importance of participation in determining such acceptable standards. Of equal significance to the South African context, and the tasking of informal settlement residents to emptying pit latrines, is her comment that:

> Ensuring safe sanitation requires adequate hygiene promotion and education to encourage individuals to use toilets in a hygienic manner that respects the safety of others. Manual emptying of pit latrines is considered to be unsafe (as well as culturally unacceptable in many places, leading to stigmatization of those burdened with this task), meaning that mechanized alternatives that effectively prevent direct contact with human excreta should be used.[3]

(v) Obligations

In its 2010 Statement, the Committee expressed the view that the right to sanitation requires full recognition by states parties in compliance with the human rights principles related to non-discrimination, gender equality, participation and accountability. Following the logic of respect, protect and fulfil, the UN Independent Expert has again attempted to articulate the general contours of state obligations. States are to:

- Refrain from measures which threaten or deny individuals or communities existing access to sanitation. States must also ensure that the management of human excreta does not negatively impact on human rights.
- Ensure that non-State actors act in accordance with human rights obligations related to sanitation, including through the adoption of legislative and other measures to prevent the negative impact of non-State actors on the enjoyment of sanitation. When sanitation services are operated by a private provider, the State must establish an effective regulatory framework.
- Take steps, applying the maximum of available resources, to the progressive realization of economic, social and cultural rights as they relate to sanitation. States must move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards ensuring access to safe, affordable

[1] U.N. Doc A/HRC/12/24 (2009) at paras 70–80. These elements are also mentioned, but not elaborated upon, in the United Nations Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights, Promotion of the Realization of the Right to Drinking Wand Sanitation, (2006) UN Doc. A/HRC/Sub.1/58/L11, adopting the Draft Guidelines for the Realization of the Right to Drinking Water and Sanitation (2005), UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/2005/25, section 1.3.

[2] Report of Independent Expert (supra) at para 71.

[3] Report of Independent Expert (supra) at para 74.

and acceptable sanitation for all, which provides privacy and dignity. This requires deliberate, concrete and targeted steps towards full realization, in particular with a view to creating an enabling environment for people to realize their rights related to sanitation. Hygiene promotion and education is a critical part of this obligation.

- Carefully consider and justify any retrogressive measures related to the human rights obligations regarding sanitation.
- Take the necessary measures directed towards the full realization of economic, social and cultural rights as they relate to sanitation, inter alia, by according sufficient recognition of human rights obligations related to sanitation in the national political and legal systems, and by immediately developing and adopting a national sanitation strategy and plan of action.
- Provide effective judicial or other appropriate remedies at both the national and international levels in cases of violations of human rights obligations related to sanitation. Victims of violations should be entitled to adequate reparation, including restitution, compensation, satisfaction and/or guarantees of non-repetition….
- [P]ay special attention to groups particularly vulnerable to exclusion and discrimination in relation to sanitation, including people living in poverty, sanitation workers, women, children, elderly persons, people with disabilities, people affected by health conditions, refugees and IDPs, and minority groups, among others….
- [E]nsure that concerned individuals and communities are informed and have access to information about sanitation and hygiene and are enabled to participate in all processes related to the planning, construction, maintenance and monitoring of sanitation services….[1]

However, she cautions that human rights law 'does not aim to dictate specific technology options, but instead calls for context-specific solutions' and that a 'safe and otherwise adequate facility in close proximity would suffice as an intermediate step towards full realization of related rights.'[2] States are also not obliged to provide 'sanitation free of charge'.[3]

(b) South African law and jurisprudence

(i) The constitutional and legislative position

This section began by noting that there is no explicit constitutional right to sanitation in South Africa. At most, other rights in the Constitution could be read to contain some concession to sanitation. The right to water is often understood to include an amount of water for sanitation, but it should be noted that sanitation can be achieved through means other than water-borne sewerage systems. The FC s 24*(a)* right to an environment that is not harmful to health or well-being could be read to ensure that sanitation systems capable of safely processing human waste are in place. The link between health and effective sanitation has been alluded to above, but in the South African context there is a right only to health care, not to health, or to be healthy.[4] Finally, the right to adequate housing

[1] U.N. Doc A/HRC/12/24 (2009) at para 64.
[2] Ibid at para 67.
[3] Ibid.
[4] On the distinction between these concepts, see N Daniels Just Health: Meeting Health Needs Fairly (2008). See also N Daniels Just Health Care (1985).

could be understood to include sanitation systems as an element of the meaning of 'adequate housing'. The latter argument was made before the Constitutional Court in Nokotyana and Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality.[1] The Court chose not to engage with this argument. It held, in the first place, that the principle of constitutional subsidiarity prevented the applicants from relying on anything other than the legislative provision that it held had been enacted to give effect to the right to housing. It then held, in the second place, that the applicants had failed to challenge the constitutionality of the relevant legislative provisions in terms of FC's s 26 right to adequate housing.[2] At the very least, however, the Court has not ruled out the possibility that a right to basic sanitation is contained within the right to housing or other rights in the Bill of Rights.

There is, on the other hand, statutory recognition of the right to basic sanitation. The Water Services Act treats water supply services and sanitation services as co-extensive or at least complimentary. The preamble to the Act begins by recognising the rights of access to basic water supply and basic sanitation, and to an environment that is not harmful to health or well-being.[3] Further, the operative provisions of the Act deal with both water and sanitation. Section 3(1) provides that everyone 'has a right of access to basic water supply and basic sanitation'. Section 1 of the Act in turn defines 'basic sanitation' to mean 'the prescribed basic minimum standard of services necessary for the safe, hygienic and adequate collection, removal, disposal or purification of human excreta, domestic waste-water and sewage from households, including informal households. 'Water services' is further defined to include both water supply services and sanitation services.

Regulations promulgated in terms of the Act prescribe that the basic minimum standards of basic sanitation include:

> (a) the provision of appropriate health and hygiene education; and
> (b) a toilet which is safe, reliable, environmentally sound, easy to keep clean, provides privacy and protection against the weather, well ventilated, keeps smells to a minimum and prevents the entry and exit of flies and other disease-carrying pests.[4]

In Nokotyana, the applicants sought to rely on these provisions before the Constitutional Court to establish a free-standing right to basic sanitation and to support their prayers for ventilated improved pit latrines. Note in this regard that the legislative right to sanitation, insofar as a toilet meeting the requirements set out in the regulations does not need to be connected to a water-borne sewerage system, is not derived from the right to water. It is telling then that the applicants in Noko-

[1] 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33 ('Nokotyana') at para 47.

[2] Ibid at paras 47 - 49.

[3] The preamble itself is rather oddly worded in this regard. It reads:

Recognising the rights of access to basic water supply and basic sanitation necessary to ensure sufficient water and an environment not harmful to health or well-being;…Be it enacted…

Clearly, the second clause of this sentence is nonsense. It is submitted that this is a drafting error, and the paragraph should rather be read as follows: 'Recognising the rights of access to basic water supply and sufficient water necessary to ensure basic sanitation and an environment not harmful to health or well-being…' This result is achieved by neither adding nor removing words, but by rearranging them.

[4] 'Regulations Relating to Compulsory National Standards and Measures to Conserve Water', Government Gazette 22355, Notice R509 of 2001 (8 June 2001), Regulation 2.

tyana did not pray for flush toilets, but for pit latrines. The Court did not engage with the argument based on the Water Services Act and its regulations. Despite referring directly to these legislative and regulatory provisions, the Court said little more about them. It appears that the Court refused to entertain arguments based on a statutory right to basic sanitation because they were raised for the first time in the Constitutional Court.[1] Again, the Court has not denied that a right to basic sanitation exists. It has simply chosen not to decide if such a right exists. It is presumably open to another set of litigants to raise the argument that such a right exists in a form that will allow the Constitutional Court to engage directly with it.

The Court's approach in Nokotyana is somewhat different to its approach in Joseph & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others. In Joseph, the applicants had argued that the right to adequate housing entails a right to electricity. [2] As in Nokotyana, the Court declined to engage with this submission, preferring to approach the matter of the basis of whether the requirements of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 required the City to follow fair procedures and afford the applicants a hearing before terminating the electricity supply.[3]

Having declined to decide whether a right to electricity can be derived from the right to adequate housing, the Court went on to hold that a right to receive electricity does arise from the broad duties on local government to provide services.[4] Referring to its earlier judgment in Mkontwana,[5] and the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 read together with the National Housing Act 107 of 1997, the Joseph Court concluded that municipalities are under an obligation to provide electricity as 'an important basic municipal service.'[6]

One might expect that on this basis, a right to basic sanitation services follows from the obligations that municipalities bear to their constituents to provide basic municipal services. It is puzzling, then, that the Court in Nokotyana did not rely on Joseph, decided a month previously, to say something about the existence of a right to sanitation.

---

[1] Nokotyana (supra) at paras 29–31 and 45. The Court would appear to be wrong on this point. In the Court below, the Johannesburg High Court, the applicants relied quite explicitly on regulation 2 of the regulations in terms of the Water Services Act in submitting that the respondent municipality had a duty to comply with 'constitutional and statutory obligations to provide basic sanitation. Nokotyana and Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality & Others [2009] ZAGPJHC 14 at paras 34-35. Even if the applicants did not raise the argument in the court below, David Bilchitz argues that the Court's formalist insistence on rules of pleading has allowed it to shirk its constitutional responsibility to those who are most vulnerable in society to adjudicate fundamental rights claims. See D Bilchitz 'Is the Constitutional Court Wasting Away the Rights of the Poor? Nokotyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality' (2010) 127 SALJ 591, 595-96, 600-01.

[2] 2010 (4) SA 55 (CC) [2009] ZACC 30 ('Joseph').

[3] Ibid at paras 12, 21 and 32-32.

[4] Ibid at paras 34-40. It is apparent that the Court felt it necessary to consider whether a right to electricity existed, since the protections of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act only apply to actions which affect 'rights'.

[5] Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another; Bissett & Others v Buffalo City Municipality & Others; Transfer Rights Action Campaign & Others v MEC, Local Government & Housing, Gauteng, & Others (KwaZulu-Natal Law Society & Msunduzi Municipality as Amici Curiae) 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC); 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC) [2004] ZACC 9 at para 38.

[6] Joseph (supra) at para 40.

(ii) Sanitation, health and the environment

Effective sewage reticulation systems are linked to people's health and to a healthy environment in South Africa. This is because limitation of water supplies forces people to make unhealthy choices about water usage. A link exists between sickness and poorly functioning household and community sewage systems. Poorly functioning sewage treatment plants have an effect on the environment, and particularly water sources.

In the debate over the government's free basic water policy, which provides only six kilolitres of free water per household per month, it is often pointed out that families or households who cannot afford more water than the free basic water policy > are forced to make undignified and unhealthy choices about basic hygiene and health. For example, people living with HIV/AIDS must choose between bathing or washing their soiled bed sheets, and parents must choose between providing their children with body washes before they go to school or flushing the toilet.[1]

In the English litigation which led to the statutory prohibition on the use of prepayment water meters, the Queen's Bench acknowledged the municipalities' concern that the increase in disconnections due to prepaid meters had an effect on public health, which in turn stressed the municipalities' capacity to meet public health demands.[2] In the court of first instance in Mazibuko, Tsoka J made a similar observation, saying that 'to expect the applicants to restrict their water usage, to compromise their health, by limiting the number of toilet flushes in order to save water, is to deny them the rights to health and to lead a dignified lifestyle.'[3]

The South African government, too, has recognised the link between poor sanitation and poor health. In a 1999 policy document the National Department of Health acknowledges that a lack of water and sanitation is a cause of cholera, diarrhoea and other illnesses, and that communicable diseases like TB are more easily spread in conditions of squalor.[4] The disconnection from free water services in Natal in 2000 was linked to a massive outbreak of cholera in which 182 people died.[5] At the same time, the government has recognised the connection between inadequate sewage treatment and processing and pollution, and the

[1] J Dugard 'Rights, Regulation and Resistance: The Phiri Water Campaign' (2008) 24 SAJHR 593, 606.

[2] R v Director of Water Services, ex parte Lancashire County Council, Liverpool City Council, Manchester City Council, Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council, Tameside Metropolitan Borough Council and Birmingham City Council [1999] Env LR 114, [1998] EWHC 213 (QB).

[3] Mazibuko and Others v City of Johannesburg and Others (Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions as Amicus Curiae) [2008] 4 All SA 471 (W) at para 160.

[4] Health Sector Strategic Framework, 1999-2004 (1999).

[5] See C Mugero and A Hoque, 'Review of Cholera Epidemic in South Africa, with Focus on KwaZulu-Natal Province' (2001); D Roithmayr 'Lessons from Mazibuko: Shifting from Rights to Commons' (2010) 3 Constitutional Court Review (forthcoming).

associated health risks it poses.[1] The breakdown of sewage treatment facilities in the Free State municipality of Emfuleni near Parys, between 2005 and 2010, is a dramatic example of the environmental and health effects of poor sanitation systems.[2] The pollution of water sources, moreover, poses a threat to the right to water itself. The integrity of water sources must be maintained if fresh and clean water is to be available to people for drinking, washing and cooking. The need to control pollutants, including sewage, is thus directly related to the capacity to provide clean water.[3]

Even if no explicit right to sanitation exists in the South African Constitution, the need for sanitation and the government's obligations to provide this service has direct statutory protection in the Water Services Act and its regulations. But we need not give up on the basic law. On the basis of the Constitutional Court's approach in Joseph, a right to sanitation arises from local government's ordinary obligations to provide municipal services. However, in a recent, extremely significant judgment, the Western Cape High Court has given the right to sanitation genuinely meaningful content in terms of FC s 27 and the rights to dignity,

[1] The former Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry, Ronnie Kasrils, reported to Parliament that 'Unacceptable sanitation services resulting in sever water pollution, especially bacteriological pollution, is a grave concern in Gauteng' quoted in P Bond & J Dugard 'The Case of Johannesburg Water: What Really Happened at the Pre-Paid "Parish Pump"' (2008) 12 Law, Democracy and Development 1, 22.

[2] Save the Vaal Environment, an NGO representing property owners along the banks of the Vaal River, was successful in court applications seeking to interdict the municipality from continuing to release untreated sewage into the river. The enforcement of these court orders left much to be desired. There are seven separate High Court judgments dealing with the matter, with the only written judgment in the matter lamenting the municipality's persistent failure to comply with court orders, stop polluting the Vaal River, and fix its sewage treatment operations (SAVE v Emfuleni Local Municipality (Unreported), Johannesburg High Court Case No 2009/20978, 3 June 2009).

[3] The Constitutional Court recognised this in Mazibuko, highlighting 'the connection between the rights of people to have access to a basic water supply and government's duty to manage water services sustainably' Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28 at para 3. Further, Water Services Act s 9 empowers the executive to prescribe quality standards for drinking water and for water discharged into water resources. The Minister of Water Affairs has done this in terms of regulations which, among other things, deal with the contamination of water resources. The 'Regulations relating to compulsory national standards and measures to conserve water' Notice No R509, Government Gazette 22355 (8 June 2001) provide:

Control of objectionable substance

6(1) A water services institution must take measures to prevent any substance other than uncontaminated storm water to enter —

(a) any storm water drain; or

(b) any watercourse, except in accordance with the provisions of the National Water Act.

(2) A water services institution must take measures to prevent storm water from entering its sewerage system.

The National Water Act 36 of 1998 referenced in regulation 6(1)(b) above delegates to the executive the discretion to determine how water resources may be used, including for the purposes of disposing of waste water. In 1999, the Department of Water Affairs promulgated regulations governing the discharge of waste or water containing waste into water resources, and set out 'wastewater limit values' 'General Authorisations in terms of section 39' Notice 1191, Government Gazette 20526 (8 October 1999). These values specify maximum concentrations of pollutants like faecal coliforms, ammonia, arsenic, cadmium, cyanide, chlorine and suspended solids. They also set standards of water quality based on chemical oxygen demand and electrical conductivity.

FC s 10, and to privacy, FC s 14.[1] Finally, it is clear that sanitation is an important element of a network of interrelated rights, and the denial of sanitation services will adversely limit the realisation of the rights to water and to an environment that is not harmful, to health or well-being.

[1] Beja & Others v Premier, Western Cape & Others (Unreported), Western Cape High Court Case No. 21332/10, 29 April 2011 (Court holds that Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 echoes the constitutional precepts and obliges a municipality to provide all members of communities with 'the minimum level of basic municipal services', which includes the provision of sanitation and toilet services: 'Any housing development which does not provide for toilets with adequate privacy and safety would be inconsistent with [FC] s 26 … and would be in violation of the constitutional rights to privacy and dignity.')

56C Food

Danie Brand

56C.1 Introduction 56C–1
56C.2 The right to food in international law 56C–2
(a) Content 56C–2
(b) Duties 56C–4
56C.3 The right to food in the Final Constitution 56C–6
(a) Content 56C–6
(b) Duties and violations. 56C–9
(i) The duty to respect the right to food 56C–10
(aa) Refraining from impairing existing access to food. 56C–10
(bb) Mitigating the impact of interferences in the exercise of the right to food 56C–13
(cc) Removing obstacles in the way of the exercise of the right to food 56C–14
(ii) The duty to protect the right to food 56C–15
(aa) Legislative and executive measures. 56C–15
(bb) The judiciary 56C–17
(iii) The duty to promote and fulfil the right to food 56C–21
(aa) A national strategy 56C–23
(bb) Ensuring that the national strategy is reasonable. 56C–24
(cc) Avoiding retrogression 56C–29

56C.1 INTRODUCTION*

In their seminal book, Hunger and Public Action, Jean Drèze and Amartya Sen explore the role of law and legal rights in relation to problems of starvation, hunger and malnutrition.[1] The law is, in the first place, at least partly responsible for these social ills:

> The legally guaranteed rights of ownership, exchange and transaction delineate economic systems that can go hand in hand with some people failing to acquire enough food for survival.[2]

But, so Drèze and Sen argue, the very complicity of law in starvation, hunger and malnutrition also points to law's role in its solution. For if the law indeed maintains starvation and hunger, the most obvious 'remedy to this problem of terrible vulnerability', is 'to turn towards a reform of the legal system, so that rights of social security can be made to stand as guarantees of minimal protection and survival.'[3]

Despite the fact that there is enough food in South Africa to meet the population's nutritional needs,[4] the 'terrible vulnerability' to which Dréze and Sen refer is disturbingly prevalent. Some 14.3 million people in South Africa are vulnerable to food insecurity.[5] 21.6% of children under nine are stunted, 10,3% are underweight and 3,7% experience wasting.[6] At the same time, South Africa has taken the first step toward the reform of its legal system that Dréze and Sen identify as part of the solution. The Final Constitution[7] entrenches a right of everyone to have access to sufficient food,[8] a right of children to basic nutrition[9] and a right of detained persons to adequate nutrition.[10] These constitutional rights are in the process of being translated into concrete legal claims that the 14.3 million people

* My thanks to Len de Vries and Etienne Fourie for research assistance, to Annette Christmas and Moeniba Isaacs for answering questions about security of tenure and subsistence fishing and to Stuart Woolman for expert editorial comment. Mistakes are my own.

[1] J Drèze & A Sen Hunger and Public Action (1989).

[2] Ibid at 20.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Department of Agriculture Integrated Food Security Strategy for South Africa (2002) 19–20. See M de Klerk, S Drimie, M Aliber, S Mini, R Mokoena, R Randela, S Modiselle, B Roberts, C Vogel, C de Swardt & J Kirsten Food Security in South Africa: Key Policy Issues for the Medium Term (2004) 3:

> Despite its comparatively unfavourable natural resource base, [South Africa] is a net exporter of agricultural commodities. Its per capita income is high for a developing country. It does not have a tight foreign exchange constraint. It is not landlocked. Its transport infrastructure is generally good . . . Clearly, food ought always to be available in South Africa.

[5] Food Pricing Monitoring Committee Final Report (2003) i (Report relies on data from Statistics South Africa). Food insecurity means that a person does not enjoy regular access to sufficient food.

[6] D Labadarios (ed) The National Food Consumption Survey (1999) 167–169. Underweight indicates a weight-for-age ratio under two standard deviations from the norm; s*tunting* a height-for-age ratio under two standard deviations from the norm; and wasting (an indicator of severe current malnutrition) a weight-for-height ratio under two standard deviations from the norm.

[7] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[8] FC s 27(1)(b).

[9] FC s 28(1)(c).

[10] FC s 35(2)(e).

in South Africa who experience the 'daily terrorism of hunger' can use to secure regular access to sufficient food.[1] This chapter assesses the progress of this South African translation. After first describing how the right to food is protected in international law and is entrenched in the Final Constitution, I provide an overview of existing legislation and case law through which this right has been given effect in South Africa.

56C.2 The Right to Food in International Law

International law is an important source for the interpretation of the right to food. This is so not only because FC s 39 requires courts to have regard to international law on the right to food, or because the way in which the right to food is entrenched in the Final Constitution closely tracks the way in which it features in international law. It is, rather, a function of the fact that the right to food is not explicitly protected in other domestic constitutions. As a result, there is very little relevant foreign jurisprudence available.[2]

The right to food is entrenched in a range of international treaties, declarations, resolutions and plans of action.[3] The most important instrument remains the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR').[4] Article 11 of the ICESCR proclaims a right of everyone to adequate food and to freedom from hunger.[5]

(a) Content

The United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('Committee on ESCR') — the authoritative interpreter of the ICESCR — describes the content of the right to food in international law as follows:

[1] 'Address of Constitutional Court Justice Madala' International Workshop on the Right to Food (January 2001)(unpublished manuscript on file with author).

[2] While the right to food is not generally protected in domestic legal systems, it is sometimes recognised indirectly through the interpretation of other rights or application of broader legal norms. In Germany, price control regulations were upheld against a freedom of competition-based constitutional challenge because the State, in terms of the 'social state' principle, was held to be obliged to combat high food prices. See Milk and Butterfat Case 18 BVerfGE 315 (1965) 317. In India, the right to basic nutrition has been read into the right to life. See Francis Coralie Mullin v The Administrator, Union Territory of Delhi (1981) 2 SCR 516, 529. See also People's Union for Civil Liberties v Union of India Writ Petition [Civil] 196 (Supreme Court of India 2002)(Interim orders in case over which Supreme Court retains jurisdiction) available at www.righttofoodindia.org/mdm/mdm_scorders.html, (accessed on 15 December 2004).

[3] For a relatively comprehensive list of the different instruments at international law that recognise the right to food, see D Brand 'The Right to Food' in D Brand & CH Heyns (eds) Socio-economic Rights in South Africa (2005) 155, 156–163.

[4] South Africa has signed, but not ratified the ICESCR. It is not legally bound by its specific provisions, but may not act in a way contrary to the general tenor of the document.

[5] General Comment 12 'Substantive Issues Arising in the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: The Right to Adequate Food' (Article 11 of the Covenant)(20th session, 1999) UN doc.E/C.12/1999/5 ('GC 12') at para 15. This document provides a particularly useful elaboration of the content of the right to food and the duties that it imposes.

> The availability of food in a quantity and quality sufficient to satisfy the dietary needs of individuals, free from adverse substances, and acceptable within a given culture; [and] . . . the accessibility of such food in ways that are sustainable and that do not interfere with the enjoyment of other human rights.[1]

By distinguishing between the availability and the accessibility of food, the Committee recognises that people do not usually go hungry because there is not enough food available. They go hungry because they have no claim to the food that is available.[2] Achieving food security therefore depends both on the existence of a sufficient supply of food and on the ability of people to acquire that food.

Availability of food refers to national food security. National food security requires (a) the existence of a national supply of food sufficient to meet the nutritional needs of all the people in the country; (b) distribution networks to make this supply physically available to everyone; and (c) the existence of opportunities for production of food by individuals, families and communities for their own use.[3]

Accessibility of food, in turn, refers to household food security. Household food security requires that people be able to acquire the food that is available or to make use of available opportunities to produce food for own use. This capacity exists if people exercise some entitlement over food or its means of production. That is, they must be able to earn income by selling labour or other commodities which they then, in turn, may use to buy food; or they must have an entitlement to monetary or in-kind social assistance from the State with which they then acquire food; or they must own, or exercise some other form of legal control over, means of food production (land, implements, water etc) so that they can produce food for their own consumption.[4] In the words of the Committee on ESCR:

> [A]ccessibility applies to any acquisition pattern or entitlement through which people procure their food and is a measure of the extent to which it is satisfactory for the enjoyment of the right to adequate food.[5]

[1] GC 12 (supra) at para 8 (my emphasis).

[2] A Sen Poverty and Famines: An Essay on Entitlement and Deprivation (1981) 1. See also R Ravindran & A Blyberg (eds) A Circle of Rights. Economic, Social and Cultural Rights Activism: A Training Resource (2000) 222; GC 12 (supra) at para 5.

[3] GC 12 (supra) at para 12.

[4] Drèze & Sen (supra) at 20 ('[C]ommand over food can be established by . . . growing food oneself and having property rights over what is grown, or selling other commodities and buying food with the proceeds. The third alternative . . . is to receive free food or supplementary income from the state.')

[5] GC 12 (supra) at para 13 (GC 12 distinguishes between economic and physical accessibility. Economic accessibility refers to entitlements self-sufficient people require to gain access to food (income, control of means of food production). Physical accessibility refers to those who are not self-sufficient and have to receive State assistance to gain access to food. The distinction emphasises that States must both facilitate access to food for those who are reasonably self-sufficient and provide food or the means to acquire it directly to those who are not.)

For the right to food to be realised, availability and accessibility of food must be sustainable. Food must be available for and accessible to future generations.[1]

The Committee further emphasises that all persons may claim availability of and access to adequate food — food of a certain quality, quantity and nature. This means, in the first place, that people have an entitlement to food that is nutritionally adequate — that possesses the requisite amounts and balance of nutrients 'for physical and mental growth, development and maintenance, and physical activity … in compliance with human physiological needs … throughout the life cycle.'[2] This definition of adequate food has been leveraged so as to ensure that everyone has access to safe food. In short, food must also be free from harmful agents or contaminants.[3] The Committee on CESCR has, finally, read the right to adequate food to embrace an entitlement to food that is culturally adequate.[4]

(b) Duties

The overarching duty that the right to food imposes on states in international law is described in article 2(1) of the CESCR: the duty to take steps, to the maximum of available resources, progressively to achieve the full realisation of the right.[5] This duty mandates conduct rather than result. The State must act in a certain way — such as to ensure that, over time, and within its resource limitations, a sufficient supply of nutritionally adequate, safe and culturally acceptable food is made available and accessible to everyone on a sustainable basis. More specifically, the Committee on ESCR has said this means the right to food must be respected, protected, and fulfilled:[6]

- To respect the right to food, the State must refrain from impairing existing access to adequate food. It must, where such impairment is unavoidable, take steps to mitigate its impact. It must likewise refrain from placing undue obstacles in the way of people gaining or enhancing access to food.
- To protect the right to food, the State must take steps to protect people's existing access to food and their capacity to enhance their existing access to food and newly to gain access to food, against third party interference.

[1] GC 12 (supra) at para 7.
[2] Ibid at para 9.
[3] Ibid at para 10.
[4] Ibid at para 11. The cultural turn of the General Comment fits the willingness of the Committee to view compliance with the Covenant in light of the particular conditions of a country. Adequacy, access, nutrition and safety are simultaneously necessary and relative conditions. They are relative to such factors as climate, endemic disease, prevalent body type of population and traditional dietary patterns. Ibid at para 7; A Eide 'The Right to Adequate Food and to be Free from Hunger' (1999) E/CN 4/Sub 2/1999/12 at para 49.
[5] See Committee on ESCR, General Comment No 3, 'The Nature of States Parties' Obligations' (1990)('GC 3')(Describes duty in general terms.)
[6] GC 12 (supra) at para 15.

- To fulfil the right to food the State must take steps to create access to food where none exists and to enhance access where it is currently insufficient. The Committee distinguishes between a duty to fulfil as facilitation — which requires the State to enhance the opportunities for self-sufficient people to gain or to enhance access to adequate food — and a duty to fulfil as provision — which requires the State to take steps to make it possible for people who are not self-sufficient to gain access to food. A duty to provide requires the State to supply food directly or to give people the actual means with which to acquire it.

According to the Committee on CESCR, the right to food does not require States to adopt specific measures to achieve its realisation:

> The most appropriate ways and means of [respecting, protecting, promoting and fulfilling] the right to adequate food will inevitably vary significantly from one State party to another [and] [e]very State will have a margin of discretion in choosing its own approaches.[1]

States must adopt those measures that will lead to both the availability and accessibility of adequate food under the specific conditions that obtain in their countries. However, States must adopt measures that in some manner address all elements of food security.[2] This means that the State must create programmes to ensure: (1) the creation and maintenance of a sufficient supply of food (agricultural production planning and subsidisation, food import and export planning and sustainable management and use of natural and other resources for food production); (2) that standards of nutritional adequacy, safety and cultural acceptability of food are maintained (nutritional supplementation of basic foodstuffs and regulation pertaining to toxicity, storage and handling of foodstuffs); (3) facilitation of access to food (tax zero-rating of basic foodstuffs, food-price monitoring, market regulation, subsidisation or actual price control); (4) provision of food in conditions of deprivation (programmes to provide food directly to disaster victims; food stamp or other social assistance programmes to help indigent people gain access to food); (5) that food policies are informed by meaningful information about the country's nutritional situation; (6) that access to food is not marked by discrimination;[3] and (7) that vulnerable groups secure food even under conditions in which the State faces severe resource constraints.[4]

The Committee suggests that States adopt a 'national strategy'[5] set out in a 'framework law'[6] to achieve the realisation of the right to food. This national strategy should ensure the proper coordination of functions and responsibilities between different sectors and levels in government and must contain measures addressing all issues related to food security identified above.[7] The strategy should

[1] GC 12 (supra) at para 21.
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] Ibid at para 26.
[4] Ibid at para 28.
[5] Ibid at para 21.
[6] Ibid at para 29.
[7] Ibid at para 22.

also be developed by way of a transparent and participatory political process and should ensure transparency and accountability in its implementation.[1]

As we have already seen, the States' duty to achieve the realisation of the right to food under the ICESCR is subject to the proviso that it need be done only 'progressively' and 'to the maximum of available resources'. These two conditions on the duty ensure that the intended beneficiaries of the right cannot assert a legal claim to a good that simply does not exist. However, in article 11, by referring both to a right to adequate food and a right to freedom from hunger, the ICESCR distinguishes two different kinds of duties that flow from two different kinds of deprivation. The first engages inadequate access to food. The second addresses hunger as starvation.[2] The Committee on ESCR has made clear that the duty to avoid hunger as starvation takes priority. The failure to meet this duty will attract heightened scrutiny. The Committee writes that:

> when a state fails to ensure the satisfaction of the minimum essential level required to be free from hunger [it] has to demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all the resources at its disposal to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations.[3]

56C.3 The Right to Food in the Final Constitution

The right to food appears in three different provisions in the Final Constitution. FC s 27 reads, in relevant part: '(1) Everyone has the right to have access to … sufficient food … and water; and (2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of [this] right[s].' FC s 28 reads in relevant part: '(1) Every child has the right … to basic nutrition.' FC s 35 reads in relevant part: '(2) Everyone who is detained, including every sentenced prisoner, has the right … (e) at state expense, … [to] adequate … nutrition.'

(a) Content

The right to food is protected in the same way as the other socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution. The right does two things.

First, it creates duties. All three food-related provisions are given content by FC 7(2). The State must 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil' them. As at international law, this requirement means that the State must refrain from interfering [1] GC 12 (supra) at paras 23 and 24.

[2] This distinction tracks that made in a scientific context between nutritional deprivation (a condition of not receiving enough food to avoid stunting, wasting and other serious health risks) and under-nourishment (a condition of not receiving enough food to live a normal, active working life, without, however, facing serious and long-term health risks). See Drèze & Sen (supra) 35. This is — politically, ethically and analytically — a difficult distinction to make. See K Van Marle 'No Last Word' — Reflections On The Imaginary Domain, Dignity and Intrinsic Worth' (2002) 13 Stellenbosch LR 307; Drèze & Sen (supra) 35–45.

[3] GC 12 (supra) at para 17 (my emphasis).

with the exercise of these rights, must adopt measures to protect against interference in the exercise of the rights by private sources, and must take steps to extend access to them to everyone.[1]

Second, it creates standards of justification or standards of scrutiny. When it is shown that the State has violated the duties imposed by the right to food — that, for example, it has interfered with existing access to food; that it has failed adequately to protect against interferences in access to food; or that it has taken insufficient steps to fulfil the right to food — the state must justify its conduct. The right to food then poses a standard of scrutiny that courts use to assess the justification proffered by the State.

Depending on which of the three food-related provisions and which of the duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil are at issue, the standard of scrutiny that the State is required to meet in this respect will vary. In principle, a failure by the State to meet any of the four different duties in respect of any of the three rights is subject to the proportionality standard of scrutiny in terms of FC s 36(1), the general limitation provision.[2] However, with respect to the latter three of the s 7(2) duties (the 'positive' duties to protect, to promote and to fulfil the right to food as opposed to the 'negative' duty to respect), FC s 27(1)(b) — the right of everyone to sufficient food — offers only a qualified right. FC s 27(2) states that in order to comply with the duties to protect, promote and fulfil the FC s 27(1)(b) right, the State must take reasonable steps, within available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of everyone to have access to sufficient food. This qualification has been interpreted by the Constitutional Court — in the context of the rights to adequate housing,[3] health care services[4] and social assistance[5] — as an internal limitation, applying to the duties to protect, promote and fulfil the rights in question. This means that, should the State fail to protect, promote or fulfil a socio-economic right subject to this internal limitation (a right such as the FC s 27(1)(b) right of everyone to have access to sufficient food), its conduct must be justified in terms of a special reasonableness test, distinct from the FC s 36(1) standard of justification. This 'reasonableness' standard of justification usually operates at the intermediate level of a means-end effectiveness test,[6] rising

[1] GC 12 (supra) at para 15. See § 56C.2*(b)* supra.

[2] Proportionality analysis requires that the public interest advanced by the limitation of a right be weighed up against the harmful impact the limitation has on the general exercise of the right and the claimants before the court and that a court consider whether means are available to achieve the purpose of the limitation that are less restrictive of the right and the interests of the claimants. See, generally, S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition OS, August 2005) Chapter 34.

[3] Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) ('Grootboom').

[4] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) ('TAC').

[5] Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa').

[6] Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–45; TAC (supra) at paras 38 and 123. See Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 1 SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') at paras 27 and 29 (Court applied an even more lenient rationality standard of scrutiny.)

only in exceptional cases to the level of a proportionality inquiry.[1] As a rule, this reasonableness standard does not allow courts to prescribe specific measures to the state to remedy its breach of the socio-economic right in question. However, the courts can, and must, require the State to put in place a comprehensive programme that is capable of achieving the realisation of the rights in question over time, subject to the resources at the State's disposal.[2]

The duties to protect and to promote and fulfil the FC s 28(1)(c) nutritional rights of children and the FC s 35(2)(e) nutritional rights of detainees, by contrast, are not subject to the same internal limitation as the FC s 27 right of everyone to have access to sufficient food. FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) are unqualified. The absence of an internal limitation in these rights leaves the impression that the duties to protect, promote and fulfil in respect of these rights are more direct than those found in FC s 27 right of everyone. These two rights appear to entitle individuals to claim specific, concrete relief from the state. But appearances may be deceptive. While FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) may not be subject to an internal limitation test (such as that required by FC s 27(1)(c)), the State will still have an opportunity to justify the laws or conduct intended to discharge its duties under the proportionality test grounded in FC s 36(1). The absence of the internal limitation simply means that a failure by the State adequately to protect and to promote and fulfil the nutritional rights of children and of prisoners is, as a rule, subject to a higher standard of scrutiny than is a failure to protect, promote or fulfil the right of everyone to sufficient food. Put slightly differently, the absence of an explicit fiscal out in FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) means that the State will have greater difficulty in justifying any prima facie infringement of the right to basic nutrition of children or the right to adequate nutrition of prisoners.[3]

The two-stage analysis that applies to the positive State duties in FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) applies also to the 'negative' duties to respect all three food-related rights in FC ss 27(1) 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e). The negative duty to respect grounded

[1] See Khosa (supra) at paras 65 and 82. The Constitutional Court confirmed a High Court ruling that the exclusion of permanent residents from social assistance benefits violated the right to have access to social assistance, FC s 27(1)(c). The measures were found unreasonable because the purpose of the exclusion (to prevent people immigrating to South Africa from becoming a burden on the State) could be achieved through means less restrictive of permanent residents' rights (stricter control of access into the country) and because 'the importance of providing access to social assistance to all who live permanently in South Africa and the impact upon life and dignity that a denial of such access has far outweighs the financial and immigration considerations on which the state relies.' Ibid at para 82.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 41; TAC (supra) at para 38; Khosa (supra) at para 43.

[3] The absence of an internal limitation in FC ss 28(1)(c) and 35(2)(e) places the onus on the state to make its case for justification of its conduct. It must demonstrate that it does not have the requisite resources with which better to give effect to the right in question. Where a FC s 27(2) type of internal limitation applies, however, the onus remains on the claimant to show that the state's conduct is unjustifiable, and particularly to show that the state has the requisite resources to give effect to the right in question.

in FC s 27(1) is not subject to FC s 27(2)'s internal limitation. If the state fails to comply with that duty, then it must satisfy the more stringent requirements of FC s 36(1).[1]

(b) Duties and violations

The concrete legal duties that the Final Constitution's nutritional rights impose on the State and others and the concrete entitlements it creates for poor people can most usefully be elucidated by following the framework established in FC s 7(2). FC s 7(2) identifies duties to respect, to protect and to promote and to fulfil the rights found in chapter 2. An overview of the various existing statutory and other entitlements that give expression to these duties, together with an indication of the instances in which these duties are prima facie infringed, illustrate the different ways in which the right to food can be used as a practical legal tool.

Apart from the three food-related constitutional rights, the right to food is given little explicit expression in our law. The reason for this may be the extent to which the right to food is inextricably linked with other rights. The right to food both depends on and makes possible the enjoyment of other rights, and other rights can be used to protect or advance the enjoyment of the right to food.[2] To acquire food, one needs access to land, to education, to employment and income generation and, in some instances, to social security or assistance. Food does not, in our day, just fall from trees. It has to be produced or acquired through exchange. The ability to produce food or to acquire it through exchange depends on realising these other rights to land, education, employment and social security. Similarly, research has shown that a person's ability to be nourished by food physically acquired and ingested 'depends crucially on characteristics of a person that are influenced by such non-food factors as medical attention, health services, basic education, sanitary arrangements, provision of clean water [and] eradication of infectious epidemics.'[3] So, a person suffering from a simple disease such as diarrhoea, caused by contaminated water, is unable to ingest the nutrients and calories of food eaten. The right to food is thereby compromised by deficiencies in the realization of the right to water. A person who suffers from malaria requires, among other things, additional quantities of iron. State failures in the provision of health care that result in extended malaria morbidity thereby undermine State efforts intended to provide access to sufficient food. Likewise, state failure with respect to the provision of education will result in people being unable to obtain the full benefit of food acquired because they lack the requisite knowledge about optimal storage and preparation of food. The right to equality and the prohibition on unfair discrimination (FC s 9) and the administrative justice rights (FC s 33) are also essential bulwarks for the protection of our right to food.[1] In short, the conditions necessary for the vindication of the right to food are often embedded in the conditions necessary for the vindication of other rights. As a result, the violation of the right to food is often inseparable from the violation of a range of other rights.

[1] Jaftha v Schoeman 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha') at paras 32–34.

[2] Although rights are often characterized as interdependent, the right to food is particularly dependent upon the interpretation and realization of other socio-economic rights. Eide notes a trend in international law to see the right to food, with the rights to education and health care, as elements of a broader right to nutrition, which is again a component of a right to an adequate standard of living. See Eide (supra) at para 44. In the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), the right to food is not guaranteed as a free-standing right, but in conjunction with the rights to health care and education. Article 24(2)(c) requires State Parties to take 'measures to combat disease and malnutrition, including . . . the provision of nutritious foods. . .' Article 24(2)(e) requires State Parties to ensure that 'parents and children are informed about child health and nutrition.' In most international documents the right to food is an element of the right to an adequate standard of living. See, eg, ICESCR, Article 11(1).

[3] Drèze & Sen (supra) at 13.

(i) The duty to respect the right to food

The duty to respect the right to food requires the State to refrain from impairing people's existing access to adequate food. When such impairment is unavoidable, the State must take steps to mitigate its impact. In addition, it must not place obstacles in the way of people newly gaining access or enhancing existing access to food.

(aa) Refraining from impairing existing access to food

In SERAC, Nigerian military forces attempting to quell community opposition to uncontrolled development of oil fields intentionally destroyed crops and killed animals in attacks on Ogoni villages.[2] This wanton destruction led to malnutrition and starvation. Having found that the right to food can be read into the right to life in the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) the African Commission found that these actions violated the duty to respect the right to food of the Ogoni people.[3] The intentional destruction of food as a weapon of war to effect starvation is an unjustifiable infringement of the right to food that is not likely to occur often in South Africa.[4]

[1] See Khosa (supra) at para 42 (On the intersection between equality and socio-economic rights.)

[2] Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria African Commission, Communication 155/96 (1996) ('SERAC'). See C Mbazira 'Reading The Right to Food into the African Charter on Human and People's Rights' (2004) 5(1) ESR Review 5.

[3] SERAC (supra) at paras 64–66. Intentional use of starvation as a weapon of war is a crime in international law. See, eg, Article 8(2)(b)(xxv) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (1998). SERAC also stands for the proposition that a violation of the duty to respect the right to food can occur as a result of the destruction of the means for and environment conducive to the production of food. First, Nigerian forces destroyed farmland and implements. Ibid at para 9. Second, the Nigerian government participated in irresponsible development of oil fields, '[poisoning] much of the soil and water upon which . . . farming and fishing depended'. Ibid. The African Commission found that both the military's destruction of the means for food production and the government's wilful neglect violated the duty to respect the right to food. Ibid at para 66.

[4] Intentional destruction of food was last used as a weapon of war in South Africa during the Anglo-Boer War. British forces instituted a 'scorched earth' policy, systematically destroying herds, crops, food stores and farmsteads to deprive Boer fighters of food and other resources.

The duty to respect the right to food is more often violated indirectly. The State interferes with the entitlements that people use to produce food, thus making it impossible, or very difficult, for people to continue producing food. South Africa's apartheid history provides a particularly pointed and pernicious example of such interference. Segregationist 'homeland' policies, dispossession, forced removals from productive agricultural land, and overcrowding in 'native reserves' or 'homelands' unsuited to agricultural use and particularly unsuitable for subsistence farming meant that people who were once food self-sufficient were rendered food insecure.[1] Recurrence of this kind of large-scale interference by the State in people's access to the resources with which to produce food is unlikely. Indeed, the statutory measures in terms of which these dispossessions occurred have been repealed and new legal measures have been put in place to prevent such a recurrence. (The legacy of such displacement remains.)

Although the best examples of these new legal measures focus explicitly on protecting property rights or housing and security of tenure rights rather than the right to food, they can be, and in some cases have already been, developed by courts to operationalise the duty to respect the right to food. Dispossession of land by the State can now only occur within the limits of FC s 25, through regular expropriation, for a public purpose, following the payment of 'just and equitable' compensation, the amount, and time and manner of payment of which must be determined after all relevant circumstances have been considered.[2] In those cases where a dispossession of land used for subsistence farming is unavoidable, an argument can be made that the fact that the land was used to exercise the constitutional right to food is a circumstance that is eminently relevant to the determination of the amount of 'just and equitable' compensation. This line of argument is illustrated by the interpretation the Land Claims Court has given to elements of the compensatory framework established in the Restitution of Land Rights Act (Restitution Act).[3] Section 2(2) of the Restitution Act states that a claim for the restitution of land rights will only be successful if the claimant can show it did not receive just and equitable compensation at the time of the dispossession. In In Re Kranspoort Community, the validity of a restitution claim in terms of the Restitution Act was challenged on the grounds that the claimant community had been adequately compensated for its loss of rights in land at the time of dispossession[4] The Kranspoort Court found that the compensation that was received covered only improvements to the land and not the loss of 'beneficial occupation'. The community's loss of grazing and cultivation rights — their entitlements to food - had not been compensated. As such the compensation was not 'just and equitable.'[5]

[1] On this history's impact on black farmers' capacity to produce food for own use, see, in general, C Van Onselen The Seed is Mine: The Life of Kas Maine, a South African Sharecropper, 1886–1914 (1996).
[2] FC ss 25(2) and (3). The Expropriation Act further regulates expropriation. Act 63 of 1975.
[3] Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994.
[4] In Re Kranspoort Community 2000 (2) SA 124 (LCC) ('Kranspoort').
[5] Ibid at para 78.

In addition, eviction of people from State land, or by the State from private land, is heavily regulated by a raft of new laws that seek to improve security of tenure for people exercising informal rights to land. These laws are intended to protect both the right to housing and the right to use land as a resource with which to produce food and generate income against State interference. The two most important examples of such legislation in the context of State-owned land and State-sponsored eviction are the Extension of Security of Tenure Act (ESTA)[1] and the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act (PIE).[2] These laws protect informal rights of residence and use of land. They do so by making eviction from land in certain instances more difficult than it would ordinarily be. They require, amongst other things, that a court, before granting an eviction order, consider whether an eviction would be just and equitable in light of all relevant circumstances.[3] Although neither ESTA nor PIE state this explicitly, where the land in question is used to produce food, the exercise of this discretion by a court should surely include a consideration of the extent to which the granting of an eviction order would deleteriously affect the exercise by the evictee of the constitutional right to food.[4] Indeed, some of the factors to be taken into account when making an ESTA or PIE assessment engage circumstances in which occupiers use land to produce food. For example, ESTA s 8(1)(c) requires courts to consider the comparative hardship to the owner or person in charge and the occupier before rendering a decision as to whether or not occupation rights were lawfully terminated.[5] If 'hardship' encompasses 'the impairment of access to sufficient food,' then ESTA can be deployed to ensure that the duty to respect any existing exercise of the right to food is discharged.

People's ability to produce food for their own use and for sale was, under Apartheid, diminished in more insidious ways than dispossession and eviction. The statutory prohibition on sharecropping — a practice in terms of which black farmers were allowed by white landowners to cultivate part of their land in return for a share in the resultant crop — denied to black farmers and their families

[1] Act 62 of 1997. ESTA applies to rural land occupied with the tacit or explicit consent of the owner or person in charge. See ESTA, s 2(1). For the definitions of 'occupier' and 'consent', see ESTA, s 1.

[2] Act 19 of 1998. PIE applies to all land, including State-owned land. See PIE, ss 6 and 7. See also the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996 (Labour Tenants Act). The Labour Tenants Act, s 1, applies to rural land occupied and used in terms of a labour tenancy agreement. This Act will, in practice, not apply to State land. Labour tenancy agreements are usually with private landowners. ESTA, PIE and the Labour Tenants Act also regulate private evictions and as such give effect to the duty to protect the right to food. See § 56C.3*(b)*(ii)(aa) infra.

[3] See ESTA, ss 8(1) and 11(1), (2) and (3); PIE, ss 4(6) and (7), 5(1)(b) and 6(1) and (3).

[4] The relevant factors identified in PIE and ESTA for a decision as to whether the termination of an occupier's residence was lawful or an eviction order should be granted do not constitute a closed list.

[5] See also ESTA s 9(3)(Requires a court, under some circumstances, to consider a report of a probation officer that must, amongst other things, indicate how an eviction will affect the constitutional rights (which would presumably include the right to food) of the occupier, before granting an eviction order.) See also City of Cape Town v Rudolph 2004 (5) SA 39 (C) at para 48 (Selikowitz J describes the discretion to grant an eviction order that PIE affords a court as 'wide and open' and goes further to say that the 'circumstances to be taken into account by the court . . . are also wide-ranging.') access to existing stocks of food and blocked any efforts they might have undertaken to enhance those stocks.[1] Regulation of the South African fishing industry in the apartheid era operated in such a way that subsistence fishing was effectively prohibited.[2] This violation of the duty to respect the right to food in apartheid South Africa has seen recent redress. In 1998, the Marine Living Resources Act (MLRA)[3] was adopted. One of the purposes of the MLRA was to regularise the position of subsistence fishers through the so-called Individual Transferable Quotas (ITQ) system. The ITQ system makes provision for licenses for subsistence fishers.[4] However, despite its laudable aims with respect to subsistence fishers, the MLRA's implementation has been beset with problems. First, after an initial allocation of licenses for subsistence fishing, the annual allocation process, due to administrative backlogs, was postponed a number of times. No quotas were allocated for those years.[5] Second, due to a combination of factors, including influence peddling in the award of quotas; the relatively high costs and complex procedures involved in the application process and government's tendency to favour access for larger commercial enterprises, people who have been subsistence fishers all their lives have been unable to obtain quota access.[6] The State's execution of the MLRA and its attendant interference with the right of subsistence fishers to acquire food from the sea can, therefore, be characterised as a prima facie violation of the duty to respect the right to food.

(bb) Mitigating the impact of interferences in the exercise of the right to food

The duty to respect the right to food does not constitute an absolute bar on State interference with existing access to food. The State must often interfere in food-rights entitlements in order for it to achieve some other important public purpose.

[1] See Van Onselen (supra) at 167. The prohibition on share-cropping was, at least at first, not very successful. Because share-cropping arrangements worked to the benefit of both black (property-less) and white (propertied) farmers, they remained in wide-spread use. However, the prohibition did have another less obvious, but, in practical terms, very serious effect. It meant that, in cases where white farmers reneged on share-cropping agreements, black farmers could not, as they could have previously, rely on the law to enforce the agreements.

[2] Subsistence fishers operated in a legal vacuum. No quota category existed for subsistence fishing and subsistence fishers had to obtain recreational or commercial licences to operate legally. Both options were out of their reach. See E Witbooi 'Subsistence Fishing in South Africa: Implementation of the Marine Living Resources Act' (2002) 17 Int J of Marine and Coastal Law 431, 432. As with the prohibition of share-cropping this meant both that subsistence fishers operated illegally and that they could not rely on the law to protect their fishing against interference. Subsistence fishing is a form of direct food entitlement for a small but significant proportion of South Africa's population: 30 000 fishers depend on subsistence fishing to survive, and at least another 30 000 depend on subsistence fishing in combination with seasonal commercial employment. See J Sunde 'On the Brink' (2003) 12 SPC Women in Fisheries Information Bulletin 30, 30.

[3] Marine Living Resources Act 18 of 1998.

[4] M Isaacs 'Subsistence Fishing in South Africa: Social Policy or Commercial Micro-Enterprise?' (2001) 3(2) Commons Southern Africa 20.

[5] Although exemptions from the regulatory scheme were awarded for those years, the exemptions were granted only after fishers resorted to civil disobedience. Ibid at 21–22. See also Witbooi (supra) at 436–437.

[6] Sunde (supra) at 31.

In such cases, the duty to respect requires that an effort be made to mitigate the effect of the interference in the exercise of the right to food. The security of tenure laws referred to above provide a good example of how this constitutional duty has been translated into a statutory entitlement. The laws, in some instances, require courts to consider to what extent suitable alternative land is available for evictees before granting an eviction order. An eviction order can be denied if such an alternative is absent.[1] Suitable alternative land is, in one instance, defined as land that is suitable with regard to the needs of occupiers for both residential and agricultural use.[2] The laws thereby give expression to the duty of the State to mitigate its interference with existing access by providing alternative modes of access to food.

(cc) Removing obstacles in the way of the exercise of the right to food

The duty to respect the right to food is violated if the State makes it difficult or impossible for people to gain access to food or to enhance their existing access to food. In Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa,[3] the Constitutional Court confirmed a High Court order invalidating a presidential proclamation[4] assigning the administration of the Social Assistance Act (SAA)[5] to provincial governments. Mr Mashavha, an indigent, permanently disabled person, had applied for a disability grant to the Limpopo provincial Department of Health and Welfare in October 2000. After approximately four months he was told that he had been awarded the grant and could start collecting it from the Department's payment offices. However, despite his efforts, the grant was never paid. Only after Mr Mashavha initiated legal action against the Department was the grant finally paid out — on 25 January 2002. Even then, the Department refused to pay the amount owed from the date of the award.[6] Mr Mashavha contended that, had it not been for the assignment of the administration of the SAA to the provinces, his grant would have been approved and paid out to him within a reasonable time. The payment of the grant would have been serviced by an efficient, standardised and adequately resourced national administration rather than the inadequate administration of the Limpopo Department of Health and Welfare. Nor would the grant have had to compete with 'potential demands for the reallocation of social assistance monies to other [provincial] purposes.'[7] Although the presidential proclamation was found constitutionally infirm only [1] See ESTA, ss 9(3)(a), 10(2) and (3) and 11(3); PIE, s 6(3)(b).

[2] See ESTA, s 1 (Definition of 'suitable alternative accommodation'.)
[3] Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa 2004 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC)('Mashavha').
[4] Proclamation R7 of 1996, Government Gazette 16992 GN R7, 23 February 1996. The assignment was made in terms of s 235 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[5] Social Assistance Act 59 of 1992.
[6] See Mashavha (supra) at para 9.
[7] Ibid at para 10.

with respect to the competency to make the assignment,[1] the case is very much about Mr Mashavha's constitutional rights to social assistance and to food. Mr Mashavha and his dependents relied on the regular and efficient payment of his disability grant for their 'daily sustenance and well-being.'[2] In the absence of employment, the disability grant was their only means to acquire food. The administrative inefficiency that bedevilled its payment constituted an obstacle to the exercise of the right to food.[3] The Mashavha Court's ruling supports the proposition that the State must give effect to the duty to respect the right to food by removing an impediment to its effective exercise.

(ii) The duty to protect the right to food

The duty to protect the right to food requires the State to protect the existing enjoyment of this right. The capacity of people to enhance their enjoyment of this right or to gain access to the enjoyment of this right depends on the ability of the State to prevent third party interference.

(aa) Legislative and executive measures

The State can give effect to the duty to protect the right to food by regulating, through legislation or executive/administrative decisions, the manner in which private entities participate in the production, storage and transfer of food. The State must regulate these activities in such a manner, as to enhance everyone's access to food.

One such form of regulation is price regulation. The State either sets a maximum price that may be charged by private producers and retailers for basic foodstuffs to ensure that basic foodstuffs remain reasonably affordable, or introduces other measures to ensure food price stability.[4] The price of a standard loaf of bread used to be regulated in this way in South Africa. However, a general drive towards the deregulation of agricultural markets has seen this protective measure fall away. The result is instructive. In the absence of regulation there

[1] Mashavha (supra) at para 1.

[2] Ibid at para 9.

[3] The extent to which access to social assistance and access to food are directly linked and the lack of access to a social assistance grant translates into the lack of access to food has been demonstrated by a number of studies. See M Chopra, N Sogaula, D Jackson, D Sanders, N Karaolis, A Ashworth & D McCoy 'Poverty Wipes Out Health Care Gains' (2001/02) 6(4) ChildrenFirst 16. It has also been estimated that social assistance grants close the 'poverty gap' (the gap between a grantee's household income and the subsistence income line) by an average of 23%. See Department of Social Development Transforming the Present — Protecting the Future: Report of the Commission of Enquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa ('Taylor Commission') 59.

[4] Measures to introduce or maintain stability in food prices (including stock-piling of food reserves), and direct interventions in the food trade sector such as requiring grain traders to report regularly on realised and planned imports) combined with accurate systems of crop estimates could contribute to stabilising food markets.

has been a 'hidden price rise' in bread. Although the price per loaf in rand remained relatively stable in the period 1990 to 2001, both the weight and quality of the standard loaf deteriorated to such an extent that the real price per gram rose 293% in the same period.[1]

Another form of regulation that enables the State to protect access to adequate food against the depredations of profit-oriented free-market players is through standard setting in respect of the safety and the nutritional value of food. The Foodstuffs, Cosmetics and Disinfectants Act (FCDA) regulates fungicide and pesticide residue and additive and preservative levels in food by setting minimum and maximum standards and creating mechanisms for the monitoring of these levels in foodstuffs.[2] South Africa has also recently introduced mandatory micro-nutrient fortification of certain basic foodstuffs.

A final form of food-protection regulation is manifest in statutory safeguards of informal tenure rights. As I noted above, PIE, ESTA and the Labour Tenants Act protect informal rights to land as a resource for food production against private interference in the same way as they protect these rights against the State: by making eviction more difficult than it would otherwise be through imposing additional procedural and substantive safeguards that have to be met before an eviction order can be granted by a court.[3] In this way, a small but significant constituency have their access to food protected.[4]

The duty of the State to protect the right to food through the regulation of private conduct does not only require it to create a regulatory framework. It must also implement and enforce that framework effectively.[5] Concerns have recently been raised about the extent to which the FCDA is effectively enforced. Studies indicate that the required monitoring is not taking place and that the standards created in the Act are not applied.[6] Similar concerns have been articulated with respect to the effectiveness of security of tenure legislation in rural areas. Critics of government efforts with respect to land tenure cite a host of infirmities in South Africa's regulatory scheme: complicity between magistrates, police, and private landowners; disregard for the law by landowners; the absence of legal aid in rural areas; and the absence of alternative accommodation on farms, in [1] E Watkinson & N Makgetla South Africa's Food Security Crisis (2002) 4, 13.

[2] Act 54 of 1972.

[3] See § 56C.3*(b)*(i) and (ii) supra.

[4] 600 000 people in South Africa depend on farming as their main source of food. A further 1 million use farming to supplement other means of obtaining food. See Watkinson & Makgetla (supra) at 2. See also Magistrates' Courts Act 32 of 1944, s 67*(c)*(Prohibits the attachment and sale in execution to satisfy a judgment debt of the 'stock, tools and agricultural implements of a farmer' and so protects the capacity of a subsistence farmer to produce food against interference from creditors.)

[5] See Grootboom (supra) at para 42 (Constitutional Court held that '[a]n otherwise reasonable programme [to give effect to a socio-economic right] that is not implemented reasonably will not constitute compliance with the State's obligations.') municipal housing projects or other available land distribution programmes.[1] Such systemic failures to implement regulatory measures intended to protect people's right to land tenure security create the conditions for food insecurity and further reflect the State's failure to discharge its duty to protect the right to food.

[6] Watkinson & Makgetla (supra) at 5. They attribute the deterioration in the weight and quality of standard bread partly to the lack of effective enforcement of regulations. Ibid at 4.

(bb) The judiciary

The courts can protect the right to food in two ways.

In the first place, the courts can protect the right to food by insulating State measures to give effect to the right to food against legal challenge based on other constitutional or statutory rights. This protective role of the courts is on display with respect to the right to adequate housing in City of Cape Town v Rudolph. In this case, the Cape High Court rejected a property-based constitutional challenge to PIE. The Rudolph Court held that although the law infringed property rights, the State was justified in enacting the legislation because the Final Constitution required it, or at least authorised it to do so.[2] With respect to the right to food, the German Federal Constitutional Court ('FCC') rejected a challenge to legislation that regulated the price and the sale of drinking milk.[3] This legislation - intended both to keep the price of drinking milk at an affordable level and to ensure that the dairy industry survived over-production - restricted the price of drinking milk and limited the sale of drinking milk to the region in which it was produced.[4] Dairy suppliers and dairies challenged the regulatory scheme on the basis that it infringed their freedom of competition. The German Constitutional Court rejected the challenge on the grounds that milk was a basic foodstuff and that the good of the commonwealth required its price be kept at an affordable level. The FCC identified the dairy sector as a national asset. This finding justified the control of the sale of milk and the imposition of a special tax that invariably

[1] E Lahiff 'Land Reform in South Africa: Is It Meeting the Challenge?' (2001) 1 PLAAS Policy Brief 2.

[2] See G Budlender 'Justiciability of Socio-Economic Rights: Some South African Experiences' in Y Ghai & G Cottrell (eds) Economic, Social And Cultural Rights in Practice: The Role of Judges in Implementing Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (2004) 33, 36. See also Minister of Public Works v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)(State decision, taken in exercise of the constitutional duty to provide access to adequate housing, to house temporarily destitute flood victims on the grounds of a prison outside Johannesburg, was challenged by surrounding property owners as a violation of administrative justice rights. The Court rejected the challenge, albeit without any direct reliance on the State's duty to protect the right to have access to adequate housing.)

[3] 18 BverfGE (supra) at 317.

[4] The price of processed dairy products was not similarly restricted and milk intended for processed dairy products could be sold and bought freely across Germany. The effect of increasing surplus production of milk in this unequally regulated industry was that prices for processed dairy products were significantly lower than prices for drinking milk. To offset this disadvantage for suppliers and dairies selling milk for processed dairy products, suppliers and dairies selling drinking-milk were required to pay a special tax.

restricted the freedom of competition. The FCC's ruling can be read as an affirmation of the existence of an implicit right to have access to adequate food on a sustainable basis.[1]

Courts can protect the right to food in another manner. South African courts are constitutionally obliged to interpret legislation or develop rules of common law so as to promote the 'spirit, purport and objects' of the Bill of Rights.[2] Access to food in a private ownership economy is centrally determined by 'a [statutory and common law] system of legal relations (ownership rights, contractual obligations, legal exchanges, etc).'[3] Quite literally, 'the law stands between food availability and food entitlement.'[4] As a result, the constitutionally informed law-making role of courts is potentially an extremely important way in which the protection of the right to food can be advanced.

The interpretation of legislation offers manifold opportunities for such advancement. Courts have, for example, extended the scope of protection afforded by ESTA and the Labour Tenants Act.[5] They have found that various forms of interference with food production activities constitute evictions that have to comply with the stringent procedural and substantive safeguards imposed by these laws. In Ntshangase v The Trustees of the Terblanché Gesin Familie Trust, the Land Claims Court held that when a property owner prevents an occupier from accessing grazing lands and a watering hole on his property that the occupier had previously used for her cattle, it constitutes an eviction for purposes of ESTA.[6] In respect of the Labour Tenants Act, the Land Claims Court, in Van der Walt v Lang,[7] held that where a property owner had previously allowed an occupier to graze a certain number of cattle on his land, a subsequent restriction of the number of cattle allowed constituted an eviction subject to the Act's safeguards. Similarly, in Zulu v Van Rensburg[8] the Land Claims Court held that impounding the cattle of an occupier constituted an eviction that had to comply with the Act's safeguards.[9]

The Constitutional Court in Jaftha v Schoeman suggested some new directions for court-sponsored development of statutory law. The Jaftha Court was asked to consider the constitutionality of provisions of the Magistrates' Courts Act[10] that

[1] See E de Wet 'Can the Social State Principle in Germany Guide State Action in South Africa in the Field of Social and Economic Rights?' (1995) 11 SAJHR 30, 38.

[2] FC s 39(1).

[3] Sen (supra) at 166.

[4] Ibid.

[5] See §§ 56C.3.3*(a)*(i) and (ii), and (b)(i) supra.

[6] Ntshangase v The Trustees of the Terblanché Gesin Familie Trust [2003] JOL 10996 (LCC)('Ntshangase') at para 4.

[7] Van der Walt v Lang 1999 (1) SA 189 (LCC)('Van der Walt') at para 13.

[8] Zulu v Van Rensburg 1996 (4) SA 1236, 1259 (LCC)('Zulu').

[9] The Land Claims Court has interpreted the term 'rights in land' in the Restitution of Land Rights Act to include 'beneficial occupation'. As a result, the long term use of land for grazing and cultivation purposes also constitutes a right in land that can be reclaimed. See, eg, Kranspoort (supra) at para 78.

[10] MCA, s 66(1)(a).

allowed, where sufficient movables could not be found, the sale in execution of the immovable property, including the home, of a debtor to satisfy a judgment debt. To protect the right of everyone to have access to adequate housing, the Court, through a combination of statutory construction and reading words into the Act, changed the Act in such a way that a judgement debtor's home can now only be sold in execution if a court has ordered it after considering all relevant circumstances.[1] The holding in Jaftha is limited to the protection of a judgment debtor's home in the context of the right to have access to adequate housing. However, in future cases, in which a creditor seeks the sale in execution of immovable property that a judgment debtor uses to produce food, the courts can extend the reasoning in Jaftha to make any sale of immovable property contingent upon the ability of the debtor to exercise his or her right to food.[2] Such extensions of the holding are grounded in the Jaftha Court's emphasis on the severe impact that the execution process could have on the human dignity of a judgment debtor and on a judgement debtor's capacity to have access to the basic necessities of life.[3] Where an indigent person's human dignity and basic survival hang on the attachment and the sale in execution of immovable property used to produce food for personal consumption, any such execution must be understood in the context of the desiderata of the right to food.

Regrettably, the courts have done little to develop socio-economic rights through the development of the common law.[4] In Afrox v Strydom, the Supreme Court of Appeal declined the invitation to develop the common law rules of contract so as better to protect the right to have access to health care services.[5] However, the Courts have been fairly active with respect to the development of the common law rules of eviction. Given that access to land often determines access to food, the existing body of common law rules of eviction that hold that a property owner is entitled to an eviction order upon a showing she is indeed owner of the land in question and that the person occupying it is doing so unlawfully has a direct bearing on the right to food. Where this two-fold showing is made, a court possesses no discretion as to whether or not to award the order.[6] FC s 26(3) of the Constitution could be read so as to alter this rule. FC s 26(3)

[1] Jaftha (supra) at paras 61–64 and 67.

[2] Ibid at para 60 (Court lists factors that should be considered: 'the circumstances in which the debt was incurred; . . . attempts made by the debtor to pay off the debt; the financial situation of the parties; the amount of the debt; whether the debtor is employed or has a source of income to pay off the debt and any other factor relevant to the . . . facts of the case . . .' (my emphasis)).

[3] Ibid at paras 21, 25–30, 39 and 43.

[4] I say 'regrettably' because the realization of socio-economic rights is conditional upon the development of common law rules of contract and property that fundamentally determine access to basic resources, and because one would have expected courts to be more comfortable with the use of the common law — which they make — to enforce socio-economic rights than with the creation of constitutional remedies for the same purpose.

[5] Afrox Health Care Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)(Court rejected argument that common law rules supporting disclaimers in admissions contracts to private hospitals are contrary to the public interest, are unenforceable and should be developed in light of FC s 27(1)(a).)

[6] Graham v Ridley 1931 TPD 476.

states that an eviction from a home may only take place in terms of a court order granted after all relevant circumstances had been considered. (Emphasis added). The tenure security laws — which require courts to consider all relevant circumstances before granting an eviction order — give effect to FC s 26(3).[1]

Recent conflicting decisions in the High Courts created some uncertainty over whether the tenure security laws, particularly PIE, applied also to cases of so-called 'holding over' - cases where initially lawful occupation subsequently became unlawful.[2] High Courts were asked to consider whether FC s 26(3) changed the common law rules of eviction in holding-over cases where PIE did not apply and the common law, by default, did. In Ross v South Peninsula Municipality,[3] the Cape High Court found that an applicant for an eviction order in holding-over cases governed by common law had to address all the relevant circumstances before the court was entitled to grant the order.[4] However, the Witwatersrand High Court in Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh rejected the Ross Court's development of the common law.[5] This High Court split reached the Supreme Court of Appeal in Brisley v Drotsky.[6] The Brisley Court held that FC s 26(3)'s 'relevant circumstances' could only mean legally relevant circumstances. The only circumstances legally relevant to the question as to whether an eviction should be allowed were whether the evictor was owner of the land in question and the evictee was occupying it unlawfully. FC s 26(3) did not change the extant rules of common law governing holding-over.[7] As a result all evictions from residential property where the occupant was 'holding over' remained subject to the old common law rule, which afforded a court no discretion in deciding whether to grant an eviction order. This position soon changed again. In Ndlovu v Ngcobo; Bekker v Jika, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that PIE applied to evictions in cases of 'holding over'.[8] In short, FC s 26(3) required the courts to construe PIE in light of constitutional dictates.[9] In cases of 'holding over' a court now possesses, in terms of PIE, the discretion, exercised in light of all relevant circumstances, to grant an eviction order. The holding in Ndlovu has important consequences for those South Africans who access food through small-scale agricultural production. The kind of property at issue in cases like Ndlovu is used not only for residential purposes but

[1] ESTA, PIE and the Labour Tenants Act. See §§ 56C.3*(a)*(i) and (ii) and (b)(i) supra for a discussion of these laws.

[2] The question raised was whether PIE applied to such evictions. See, eg, Ellis v Viljoen 2001 (4) SA 795 (C), 2001 (5) BCLR 487 (C)(PIE does not apply); Bekker v Jika [2001] 4 All SA 573 (SE)(PIE does apply.)

[3] Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589 (K).

[4] Ibid at 596.

[5] Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 486 (W)(FC s 26(3) only applied to evictions by the State and not to evictions by natural or juristic persons.)

[6] Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA)('Brisley').

[7] Ibid at para 42.

[8] Ndlovu v Ngcobo; Bekker v Jika 2003 (1) SA 113 (SCA).

[9] Ibid at para 23.

also to produce food for personal consumption.[1] Indeed, through various measures the State encourages the cultivation of food gardens on residential plots as a way for people to enhance their access to food.[2] The protection afforded the security of tenure of occupiers of such property after Ndlovu protects both the right to have access to adequate housing and their right to have access to adequate food.

The refusal of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Brisley to develop the common law of eviction could come back to haunt it. At the end of 2003, prompted by lobbying efforts from banks and large property management concerns, the Department of Housing published for public comment a draft amendment Bill to PIE.[3] It changes the definition of an unlawful occupier so that cases of 'holding over' would once again be excluded from PIE. Should this Bill be adopted, the law would revert back to the Brisley Court's characterization. In cases of 'holding over,' a court will no longer be able to take account of the impact the eviction would have on the capacity of the evictee to have access to food.

(iii) The duty to promote and fulfil the right to food

The duty to promote and fulfil[4] the right to food requires the State to 'adopt appropriate legislative, administrative, budgetary, judicial, promotional and other measures'[5] so that those that do not currently enjoy access to food can secure access and so that those who possess access to food may enhance such access.

The standard of justification articulated by the Constitutional Court in socio-economic rights cases has closely tracked the description of the State's duty to fulfil the right to food in international law.[6] If this 'reasonableness' standard of justification were applied to the right to food, it would generate the following criteria by which to assess the State efforts to promote and fulfil the right to food.

First, the State must devise and implement measures to give effect to the right to food.[7] The speed with which, and extent to which, the State can fulfil the right

[1] De Klerk et al (supra) at 54–58. The authors note that food gardens in both urban and rural areas make a significant contribution to food security. They contend that the biggest obstacle to the establishment and the maintenance of food gardens is access to land and security of tenure.

[2] See, eg, the Department of Social Development's Poverty Relief Programme.

[3] The Draft Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Bill, Government Gazette 25391, GN 2276 of 2003 (27 August 2003).

[4] I discuss the duties to promote and to fulfil here as one. Sandra Liebenberg has suggested that the duty to promote requires the State to undertake educational measures in respect of a right. That is, the State must educate people about the nature and content of a right and the tools and the opportunities with which to secure meaningful access to it. S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2003) (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33–6. Geoff Budlender describes it as a duty of executive and administrative agencies 'to have proper regard' to the advancement of socio-economic rights in their decision-making. Both these meanings are included in my discussion of the 'duty to promote and fulfil' the right to food. Budlender (supra) at 37.

[5] Committee on ESCR General Comment No 14 'The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health' (Article 12 of the Covenant) (22nd session, 2000) UN Doc. E/C. 12/2000/4 at para 33.

[6] GC 12 (supra) at paras 21–28.

[7] Ibid at para 21.

to food are determined by the resources at its disposal. The right also only needs be fulfilled progressively.[1] Still, the State must be able to show that it has measures in place and that it is in the process of implementing them. Any deliberate retrogression would constitute a prima facie violation of the right to food and would require a particularly convincing justification.[2]

Second, the state's measures to fulfil the right to food must be reasonable. As a rule, this means that the measures must meet at least the following requirements:

- they must be comprehensive and coordinated and clearly allocate responsibilities to different spheres within government;[3]
- the financial and human resources to implement them must be available;[4]
- they must be both reasonably conceived and reasonably implemented;[5]
- they must be 'balanced and flexible' and capable of responding to intermittent crises and to short-, medium- and long-term food needs;[6]
- they may not exclude 'a significant segment of society';[7]
- they may not 'leave out of account the degree and extent of the denial' of the right to food and must respond to the extreme levels of food insecurity of people in desperate situations; that is, the State's measures must make provision both for access to food being facilitated for those who are able to make use of opportunities for themselves and for access to food being provided to those who are in desperate conditions and cannot make do for themselves;[8] and
- they must be transparent; they must be made known, both during their conception and once conceived, to all affected.[9]

As yet, the duty to fulfil the right to food has not been the basis of a court decision in South Africa.[10] In the absence of any direct indication of what this duty means, a useful way in which to illustrate the concrete legal entitlements and duties that the duty to fulfil the right to food entails is to consider the extent to which the State's existing measures to realise this right indeed meet the kinds of [1] FC s 27(2) reads, in relevant part: 'The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of [this] right. . .' (my emphasis).

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 45. See also GC 3 (supra) at para 9 (Deliberate retrogression would require full justification 'by reference to the totality of rights . . . in the Covenant and in the context of the full use of the maximum available resources.')

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 39. See also GC 12 (supra) at paras 22 and 25.

[4] Ibid. See also GC 12 (supra) at para 21.

[5] Ibid at para 42.

[6] Ibid at para 43.

[7] Ibid. See also GC 12 (supra) at para 26.

[8] Ibid at para 44. See also GC 12 (supra) at para 28.

[9] TAC (supra) at para 123. See also GC 12 (supra) at paras 23 and 24.

[10] The right to food did make a brief, but unsuccessful, appearance in TAC. The Treatment Action Campaign argued that government should be ordered to provide, as part of a comprehensive package to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV, breast milk substitutes free of charge and on demand to HIV positive mothers who give birth at public health facilities. The TAC Court declined to do so, arguing that the complex nature of the question as to whether or not substitutes are appropriate militated against the Court making a binding order in this respect and that such decisions are best left to health professionals. TAC (supra) at para 128.

constitutional demands delineated above. Below, I focus on three elements of the duty to fulfil the right: (1) the duty to have in place a national strategy with which to fulfil the right to food; (2) the duty to ensure that such a national strategy be reasonable; and (3) the duty to avoid any deliberate retrogression in the progressive fulfilment of the right to food.

(aa) A national strategy

Until relatively recently, it was difficult to fill out a constitutional scorecard on the South African government's record in discharging its duty to fulfil the right to food. No coherent policy framework was directed specifically at giving effect to the right. In fact, it seemed that government had no 'national strategy' to fulfil the right to food as it is required to have both in terms of international law[1] and in terms of the Constitutional Court's post-Grootboom jurisprudence.[2] This in itself constituted at the time a prima facie infringement of the right to food.

Prompted in part by the national outcry over the sharp rises in food prices in 2001 and the resultant further erosion of food security amongst the poor, the government has introduced a range of new measures to address specific aspects of food insecurity.[3] It has also made a significant effort to develop and publicise a coherent national strategy, focussed on addressing food insecurity in South Africa. Policies related to the fulfilment of the right to food are currently co-ordinated by the Department of Agriculture.[4] The Department's Integrated Food Security Strategy for South Africa (IFSS) sets out a broad policy framework for measures aimed at enhancing food security and is intended to 'streamline, harmonise and integrate diverse food security sub-programmes'[5] through a cross-departmental and cross-sectoral management structure.[6] The IFSS also identifies a number of key focus areas for policy development and implementation.[7]

[1] GC 12 (supra) at para 21.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 39.

[3] In the year ending June 2002, the food price index rose 16.7% whilst non-food inflation was only 7.2%. In the same period, the price of a bag of maize meal doubled. Watkinson & Makgetla (supra) at 1. For a full assessment of the extent and nature of the food price volatility in 2001/2002, see Food Pricing Monitoring Committee (supra) at 5–8.

[4] Department of Agriculture Integrated Food Security Strategy for South Africa (2002)('IFSS').

[5] Ibid at 11.

[6] An Inter-Ministerial Committee, chaired by the Minister of Agriculture, heads the IFSS at a political level. It is managed and implemented by a National Co-ordinating Unit. The National Co-ordinating Unit works with Provincial Coordinating Units, which, in turn, oversee both the work of District Food Security Officers and, at the local government level, Food Security Officers. The IFSS envisages the establishment of a National Food Security Forum (NFSF), with membership drawn from the public sector, the private sector and civil society and with corollaries at provincial level (Provincial Food Security Forums), at district level (District Food Security Forums) and local level (Local Food Security Action Groups). The role of the NFSF is to provide 'strategic leadership and advisory services on food security' and to set standards and recommend policy options. Ibid at 34.

[7] These key focus areas are: (1) increasing household food production and trading; (2) improving income-generation and job-creation; (3) improving nutrition and food safety; (4) increasing safety nets and food emergency systems; (5) improving analysis and information management systems; (6) Capacity-building; and (7) holding stakeholder dialogues. Ibid at 6.

(bb) Ensuring that the national strategy is reasonable

The policies and programmes the state adopts in order to fulfil the right to food must be reasonable in light of the tests that the Constitutional Court has enunciated in Grootboom, Treatment Action Campaign, and Khosa. As recently as two years ago, government's existing measures to address food insecurity failed this reasonableness test in at least two respects. As I argued at the time, the measures were neither sufficiently focussed nor adequately coordinated to pass a Grootboom-inspired test.[1] No specific government department at national, provincial or local level focused on the right to food in a manner comparable to the Department of Health's focus on the right to have access to health care services. As a result, measures intended to foster food security developed in a piece-meal fashion. Different aspects — and sometimes the same aspects — of nutritional policy were addressed by different departments.[2] This higgledy-piggledy approach confounded all attempts to assess the reasonableness of the State's measures to fulfil the right to food. In light of the constitutional requirement of transparency in policy formulation and implementation, this lack of transparency in food-related policy was itself constitutionally suspect.[3] Both of these potential violations of the right to food have since been adequately addressed. The IFSS coordinates measures to achieve food security. The Department of Agriculture has line-management authority over efforts to fulfil the right to food. Finally, the government has initiated right to food framework legislation, which, if successful, would further enhance the focus, coordination and transparency of measures to fulfil the right to food.[4]

Despite these important advances, there are two general problems with government's national strategy to fulfil the right to food. The first relates to the comprehensiveness of the strategy; the second to its implementation.

The different measures coordinated within the IFSS come close to constituting the kind of 'comprehensive' programme[5] that addresses 'critical issues and measures in regard to all aspects of the food system' required by the FC s 27(2)'s reasonableness test.[6] A number of programmes facilitate access to food. Such programmes as the Department of Agriculture's Food Security and Rural [1] D Brand 'Between Availability and Entitlement: The Constitution, Grootboom and the Right to Food' (2003) 7 Law, Democracy and Development 1, 22 ('Availability and Entitlement'). See Grootboom (supra) at para 39.

[2] See Department of Agriculture (2002) (supra) at 11 (Problem acknowledged by government.)

[3] TAC (supra) at para 123. See also GC 12 (supra) at paras 23 and 24.

[4] See S Khoza 'Protecting the Right to Food in South Africa. The Role of Framework Legislation' (2004) 5(1) ESR Review 3.

[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 39.

[6] For a more comprehensive overview of these measures, see D Brand 'Budgeting and Service Delivery in Programmes Targeted at the Child's Right to Basic Nutrition' in E Coetzee & J Streak (eds) Monitoring Child Socio-Economic Rights in South Africa: Achievements and Challenges (2004) 87, 93–101 ('Budgeting'); and E Watkinson 'Overview of the Current Food Security Crisis in South Africa' SARPN, available at www.sarpn.org.za/documents/d0000222/watkinson/Watkinson_SA_Food_crisis.pdf, (accessed on 14 July 2005).

Development programme,[1] the Departments of Agriculture and Land Affairs' Land Redistribution for Agricultural Development programme,[2] the Department of Public Works' Community Based Public Works (CBPW) programme,[3] and the Department of Social Development's Poverty Relief Programme (PRP)[4] enable more and more South Africans to produce their own food and to generate the income needed to purchase adequate amounts of food. A variety of measures provide access to food to those who cannot make use of existing opportunities to obtain access to food. The bulk of these measures are special needs social assistance cash grants that enable especially vulnerable groups of people to acquire food.[5] Two permanent programmes provide food and nutritional supplementation to children: the Primary School Feeding Scheme (PSFS)[6] and the Protein Energy Malnutrition Programme (PEMP) (the PEMP targets children with acute protein malnutrition).[7] In 2002, government introduced short-term crisis measures in response to rising food prices in the form of a programme to provide food parcels and agricultural starter packs to destitute families.[8]

Government's measures also take account of the need to ensure the availability of food. The Department of Agriculture (through appropriate production policies) and the Department of Trade and Industry (through appropriate food import strategies) have programmes in place to maintain an adequate national food supply and thereby to ensure national food security.[9] Different departments and institutions within government also run programmes to monitor different aspects of national and household food security in South Africa and to enhance

[1] Brand 'Budgeting' (supra) at 95 (Agricultural starter-packs and information packs to enable food production for own consumption is provided to food insecure rural households.)

[2] Ibid at 96 (Financial support is provided for farmers from previously disadvantaged communities to enable them to buy land and agricultural implements.)

[3] Ibid (Jobs are created by involving poor rural communities in public works projects.)

[4] Ibid (The department establishes communal rural food production clusters: food gardens, poultry houses, pig units.)

[5] Ibid at 98 (Special needs grants include the State Old Age Pension; the Child Support Grant; the Foster Care Grant; the Disability Grant; the War Veteran's Grant; the Care Dependency Grant; and Grant in Aid. The Social Relief in Distress Grant, although narrowly tailored, is not a special needs grant.)

[6] Ibid at 104–116 (In terms of the PSFS, a nutritious meal is provided once every school day to primary school learners at school.)

[7] The PEM programme provides treatment in hospitals and clinics to severely malnourished children and discharges them when they have recovered. For a description and evaluation of PEM, see Chopra et al (supra) at 16–17.

[8] In addition to the provision of food parcels and agricultural starter packs, government announced that it would increase a variety of social assistance grants (ranging from an increase of 2% in the Foster Care Grant to an increase of 8% in the Child Support Grant). See E Watkinson & K Masemola 'The Food Crisis: More Action Needed' (2002) November NALEDI Policy Bulletin 4, 4 (Critique of these measures as inadequate to task.)

[9] De Klerk et al (supra) at 3 ('Despite its comparatively unfavourable natural resource base, [South Africa] is a net exporter of agricultural commodities. Its per capita income is high for a developing country. It does not have a tight foreign exchange constraint. It is not landlocked. Its transport infrastructure is generally good.') nutritional status through nutritional education and micronutrient fortification of foodstuffs. An important recent addition to these programmes was the appointment of the Department of Agriculture's National Food Pricing Monitoring Committee — for a period of one year — to investigate and to advise government on food prices in South Africa.[1]

Such measures look, in the aggregate, to be comprehensive. However, government's national strategy fails to fulfil the right to food in one important respect. It does not make any provision for the sustained access to food of a substantial number of people currently in food crisis. The Constitutional Court requires any comprehensive socio-economic rights programme to 'respond to the needs of those most desperate',[2] to take into account the 'amelioration of the circumstances of those in crisis',[3] and not to exclude 'a significant segment of society'.[4] This requirement is closely linked to a requirement of flexibility. Flexibility demands a set of measures that 'make appropriate provision for attention to crises and to short-, medium- and long-term needs.'[5]

These requirements of inclusion and flexibility are echoed in international law. In General Comment No 12, the Committee on ESCR states that a national strategy to fulfil the right to food must include measures of an immediate nature, to address food crises[6] and must include measures to 'ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, the minimum essential level required to be free from hunger.'[7]

Many South Africans do not enjoy basic essential levels of food, let alone fully adequate nutrition. Although the desperate nature of this situation is evident from a wide variety of statistics — both food intake data and anthropometric indicators[8] — it is revealed most dramatically in the number of South African households living in food poverty[9] — 43% — and the number of households nationally that experience hunger on a regular basis — 52%.[10] This crisis is not of a passing nature nor can it be attributed to an aberrant event such as a natural disaster or a period of unusual food market volatility. This crisis is a function of deep structural problems in the economy that deny a majority of South Africans access to basic resources. It is an 'endemic crisis'.[11]

[1] The Committee was appointed for a period of one year. It has completed its work and has submitted its final report to the Department of Agriculture.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 44.

[3] Ibid at para 64.

[4] Ibid at para 43.

[5] Ibid.

[6] GC 12 (supra) at para 16.

[7] Ibid at para 17.

[8] See Watkinson (supra) at 1–6 (For a recent overview of the available food intake data and anthropometric indicators showing this crisis.)

[9] De Klerk et al (supra) at 25.

[10] Ibid at 28.

[11] See Watkinson (supra) at 5 (In fact, not only are the same people who were in food crisis ten years ago still in food crisis — the situation has worsened.)

Those South Africans who do not enjoy the most basic essential levels of 'access to' food are, in Grootboom's terms, 'desperate', 'in crisis' and 'living in intolerable conditions'. Children who waste away because of lack of food and do not grow to their full physical and mental potential because of under- and malnourishment, and people who go hungry every day of their lives, exhibit the same urgent, immediate need with regard to the right to food as the community in Grootboom exhibited with regard to the right to have access to adequate housing. The case law suggests that government is obliged to take account of the needs of such people. The current national food security strategy does not do so. Against the background of a general focus on longer-term capacity building interventions that focus on facilitating access to food for reasonably self-sufficient people, government's food policy scheme of course makes quite substantial provision for the direct transfer of food or the means with which to acquire food. However, all these initiatives - the Primary School Feeding Scheme, the PEM Programme and the various social assistance grants — target only special needs. The Primary School Feeding Scheme benefits only children at primary school and only when they are at school. The PEM programme benefits severely malnourished children treated at public health facilities. The Child Support Grant, when fully extended, will benefit children under 14; the State Old Age Pension men older than 65 and women older than 60; and the Disability Grant disabled persons. The result is that if one is older than 14 years of age and younger than 60 (for women) or 65 (for men), physically and mentally able, not in foster care and not a war veteran, there is no regular State assistance to meet even the most basic of food needs.[1] The only State assistance that is available for such persons is Social Relief in Distress and the current emergency food parcel programme. Both these programmes provide only temporary relief. Social Relief in Distress is provided monthly for a maximum of 3 months at a time. Food parcels are handed out for 3 months in any given year and the programme is only in place until 2005. As such, neither of these crisis response programmes addresses the endemic nature of South Africa's food security crisis. Moreover, the coverage of both programmes is extremely low.[2] The national strategy fails those in desperate need.

A second limitation in our national strategy concerns implementation. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that it is not enough for the State simply to conceive a reasonable national strategy. It must also implement it reasonably.[3] In addition, the Court has said that a programme must be reasonably resourced. Regard must be had to the human, financial and institutional

[1] See Taylor Commission (supra) at 59 (More than half of poor South Africans, or 11 840 597 people — the majority of whom are in food crisis — exist in this social assistance vacuum.)

[2] The implementation of the Social Relief of Distress grant is notoriously patchy. See, eg, Kutumela v Member of the Executive Committee for Social Services, Culture, Arts and Sport in the North West Province Case 671/2003 (unreported 23 October 2003)(B)('Kutumela'). Legal action was taken against the North West Provincial Government for its failure to take adequate steps to implement Social Relief of Distress Grant Programme. The case resulted in a wide-ranging order requiring the provincial government to take adequately resourced steps to ensure that those entitled to the grant do in fact get it.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 42.

resources that a programme requires for its implementation. Once adopted, those resources must be made available for and used for its implementation.[1]

The number of beneficiaries reached through government's various food access facilitation programmes (roughly 120 300 by 2001) constitute only a very small percentage of the nutritionally needy in South Africa.[2] The same can be said of government efforts to provide food or the means through which to acquire food. The uptake rate of the different social assistance grants, despite significant annual gains, remains relatively poor. The Child Support Grant, for instance, currently enjoys an uptake rate of only 2.5 million children. However, an estimated 6.1 million children between the ages of 6 and 15 live below the poverty line and presumably require social assistance.[3]

Two cases illustrate how the 'reasonable implementation' element of the duty to fulfil the right to food can be used to leverage a positive shift in the execution of a comprehensive national food security programme. In People's Union for Civil Liberties v Union of India,[4] the Indian Supreme Court was approached with an application that, in part, was directed at obtaining an order that existing national measures to address food insecurity and famine be adequately resourced and implemented at State level so as to reach intended beneficiaries. The complaint noted that both massive food reserves and legal measures exist to address the food insecurity of poor households and, in specific instances, to address famines. The complaint alleged, however, that India's food delivery system failed to reach intended beneficiaries due to: (1) administrative inefficiency or complacency and (2) the routine diversion by state governments of funds from the Federal government, intended to implement these food programmes, to other needs. The Indian Supreme Court has responded with a series of interim orders requiring, amongst other things, that: (1) the identification of beneficiaries qualifying for State assistance be standardised and completed; (2) the effectiveness of the current public distribution system for food be enhanced and that corruption in the process be rooted out; and (3) that funds allocated from national level to state governments for use in public distribution of food and famine measures be used for those purposes.[5]

In Kutumela v Member of the Executive Committee for Social Services, Culture, Arts and Sport in the North West Province, the High Court engaged a similar set of problems.[6] A number of indigent persons from the North-West Province had applied for a [1] Grootboom (supra) at para 39. See also GC 12 (supra) at para 21.

[2] Brand 'Budgeting' (supra) at 102.
[3] Ibid.
[4] For a discussion of People's Union, see KB Mahabal 'Enforcing the Right to Food in India: The Impact of Social Activism' (2004) 5(1) ESR Review 7.
[5] These orders remain interim orders. The Supreme Court has retained jurisdiction while giving the State the opportunity to discharge this initial set of responsibilities. People's Union Civil Liberties v Union of India (Supreme Court cf India 2002), available at http://www.righttofoodindia.org/mdm/mdm_scorders.html, (accessed on 9 March 2005).
[6] Case 671/2003 (Unreported 23 October 2003)(B)('Kutumela').

Social Relief of Distress grant. The indigent persons clearly qualified for the grant in terms of the established criteria. They did not receive it. The complaint alleged that although, in terms of the Social Assistance Act and its regulations, provincial governments were required to provide the grant to eligible individuals upon application, the North-West Province had not dedicated for its implementation the necessary human, institutional and financial resources. As a result, the grant was available on paper but not in practice. The case was settled between the parties. The settlement agreement was made an order of court. The order is particularly wide-ranging. Apart from granting specific relief to the applicants, it provides for various forms of general relief. It requires the North-West provincial government to acknowledge its legal responsibility to provide Social Relief of Distress grants effectively to those eligible for it. It must devise a programme to ensure the effective implementation of the Social Relief of Distress Grant Programme. This programme must enable the province to process applications for Social Relief of Distress grants on the same day that they are received. The programme must allow officials to assess and to evaluate applications and to ensure the eventual payment of the grant. It must put in place the necessary infrastructure for the administration and payment of the grant. In addition, the National Department of Social Development was ordered to develop uniform standards and procedures across the Republic with regard to the Social Relief of Distress Grant Programme. Finally, the provincial government was ordered to make the availability of Social Relief of Distress grants known to the public.

(cc) Avoiding retrogression

The duty to fulfil the right to food requires the State to 'avoid retrogressive measures'.[1] Any deliberate retrogression in the fulfilment of the right to food will constitute a prima facie infringement of the right to food and will require a compelling justification. This element of the duty to fulfil socio-economic rights has been emphasised by the Constitutional Court[2] and is recognised at international law.[3]

Recent efforts by the National Department of Agriculture (NDA) and the National Department of Land Affairs (DLA) to effect redistribution of agricultural land are good examples of such retrogressive measures. Before 2001, the NDA redistributed agricultural land to farm workers and emerging farmers from previously disadv antaged groups with the explicit purpose of 'improv[ing] their livelihoods and quality of life'.[4] Land was redistributed through a system of State subsidy. Qualifying households would receive a Settlement/Land Acquisition Grant (SLAG) of R16 000 with which to buy land. The Grant for the Acquisition

[1] Liebenberg (supra) at 33–34.
[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 45.
[3] GC 3 (supra) at para 9.
[4] Department of Land Affairs White Paper on Land Policy (1997) 56.

of Municipal Commonage enabled municipalities to make communal land available to the urban and rural poor for grazing and cultivation. These land redistribution efforts enabled people to produce food for their own food needs and to create the additional income needed to purchase extra food and other basic commodities. Problems in the redistribution process and an emphasis on promoting equitable access for emergent black farmers in commercial agriculture[1] led to a reconsideration of the programme in 2000. A new programme — Land Redistribution for Agricultural Development (LRAD) — was launched in 2001. In LRAD, the focus has expressly shifted from improving livelihoods and quality of life to enabling access to the commercial agriculture sector for 'those aspiring to become full-time, medium to large-scale commercial farmers'.[2] This change in focus is reflected in LRAD's structure. To qualify for a SLAG subsidy, a recipient household had to fall under a maximum monthly income of R1 500. To qualify for a grant under LRAD, a recipient has to make a minimum own contribution to the acquisition of land of R5 000. As Edward Lahiff has pointed out, this requirement clearly excludes the poorest of the poor from the benefit of the programme and dramatically reduces the extent to which LRAD can make a contribution to the fulfilment of the right to food.[3] A change in redistribution policy that withdraws its benefits from such a large cohort of individuals is a prima facie infringement of the right to food.

[1] Lahiff (supra) at 4.

[2] Ibid.

[3] The shift in strategy had another much more direct retrogressive effect. See Lahiff (supra) at 4. Lahiff points out that when the Department of Land Affairs was reconsidering its land redistribution measures during 2000, a moratorium on new projects was introduced. The result was that capital expenditure for land redistribution dropped by R358 million in 1998/99, to R173 million in 1999/2000 and to R154 million in 2000/01. As a consequence, the Medium Term Expenditure Framework allocations for land redistribution dropped by 23% in the period 1999/2001.

56D Social Security

Mia Swart

56D.1 Introduction 56D–1
56D.2 Terminology 56D–3
56D.3 The Constitutional Right to Social Security 56D–4
(a) Negative interference 56D–5
(b) Access 56D–6
(c) Reasonableness 56D–6
(d) Reasonableness and the minimum core 56D–7
(e) Beneficiaries of the right 56D–9
(f) Case law 56D–9
(i) Constitutional Court 56D–9
(ii) Eastern Cape social grant cases 56D–13
56D.4 Administration of Social Grants — The Treatment by South African Courts 56D–16
(a) Protection of Procedural Interests 56D–16
(b) Application of Administrative Justice Rules 56D–17
(c) Class Actions 56D–18
(d) Extending social security benefits to non citizens: 56D–19
56D.5 Policy 56D–19
(a) Statutory Framework: White Paper and SASSA 56D–20
(b) Basic Income Grant (BIG) 56D–21
(c) Social grants 56D–22
(i) Old-age grants 56D–23
(ii) Disability grants 56D–24
(iii) Child Care Grants 56D–26
(aa) Child Support Grant ('CSG') 56D–26
(bb) Foster care grant 56D–28
(cc) Care dependency grant 56D–29
56D.6 International Social Security Standards 56D–29
(a) ILO Conventions 56D–30
(b) The International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR') 56D–31
(c) UN Convention on the Rights of the Child 56D–33
(d) Africa 56D–34
(e) SADC 56D–35
56D.7 Non-discrimination 56D–36

27 Health care, food, water and social security:

(1) Everyone has the right to have access to:

(c) Social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance.

(2) The state must take reasonable legislative measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of each of these rights.[1]

56D.1 INTRODUCTION

> To be held in poverty is a cursed condition. Quite apart from the physical discomfort of deprivation it reduces a human in his or her dignity. The inevitable result of being unlawfully deprived of a grant that is required for daily sustenance is the unnecessary further endurance of that condition for so long as the unlawfulness continues.[2]

Roughly half of South Africa's population lives in poverty.[3] Meaningful participation in constitutional democracy is often dependent on financial resources and desperate poverty deprives people of such participation. Providing measures which relieve poverty must, therefore, be South Africa's most pressing social goal.

The social security system includes a host of measures that aim to alleviate poverty: Benefits are paid to the aged, people with disabilities, pregnant women, the unemployed and for the caregivers of children. In 2011, close to 15 million South Africans received social grants.[4] Yet, it is uncertain whether these programmes can actually relieve poverty. Because the South African economy fails to create sufficient employment, many South Africans turn to the social security system for the income they require just to survive. Social grants redistribute existing wealth, but in the absence of increased employment or entrepreneurship, cannot create additional wealth.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996) ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] MEC, Department of Welfare v Kate 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA), [2006] 2 All SA 455 (SCA), [2006] ZASCA 49 ('Kate SCA') at para 33.

[3] Sandra Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 12 SAJHR 234.

[4] See Chris Bathembu 'South Africa Widens Social Security Net' (23 February 2011) available at http://www.expatica.com/za/finance_business/pensions_insurance/South-Africa-widens-social-security-net_17204.html (accessed on 26 February 2012). See also Cele v South African Social Security Agency and 22 Related Cases 2009 (5) SA 105 (D) at para 26 (there were 11 million recipients in 2007). Government projects that the social security budget will grow from R132 billion in the next year to R146.9 billion in 2013 and up to R171 billion by 2014. See also South African Social Security Agency 2010/11 Annual Report (2011) available at http://www.sassa.gov.za/Portals/1/Documents/a197c6cc-9e32-4f9a-8d71-10aa6aa77e94.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012).

The interdependence of rights means that individuals can only enjoy the full spectrum of constitutional rights if they have the economic security to do so.[1] Poverty not only limits the right to social security, it limits access to food, water, housing and healthcare and the ability to exercise or enjoy political rights such as freedom of expression and freedom of association. The Constitutional Court itself has acknowledged the disjuncture between our founding constitutional values and existing conditions of material deprivation.[2] Giving content to the right to social security is, I shall argue, an important means of closing or narrowing this gap between ideal and reality.

The constitutional jurisprudence on the right to social security remains inchoate. The rather piecemeal legislative framework and the limited corpus of case law engaging the meaning of the right to access to social security means that we can expect a broad array of constitutional challenges to legislation and policy in the future. It also means that some of what follows in these pages about the scope of the right to social security remains speculative. Hard law on the right to social security is, however, emerging. The Constitutional Court's decision in Khosa[3] currently constitutes the core of this body of jurisprudence.

This chapter does not aim to cover every nook and cranny of social security law. Instead, it aims to give an overview of the meaning and implementation of the constitutional right to social security through the cases, legislation, policy and international law. I begin by considering some fine terminological distinctions in the social security field. Next, in §56D.3, I discuss the content of the constitutional right to social security as it has been developed in the case law. Thereafter, I examine some of the decisions that have dealt with the social assistance, primarily through the laws of administrative justice. I argue that these cases, rather than those dealing directly with the FC s 27(1)(c) represent the coalface of attempts to enforce the right to social security.

Having discussed the Court's decisions on social security, I turn my attention to extant social security legislation and policy. In the penultimate section, I look at international law on the right to social security and what impact it should have on South African law. The final section highlights instances in which the current social security system could still be challenged on the basis of non-discrimination/inequality.

---

[1] See C Scott 'The Interdependence and Permeability of Human Rights Norms: Towards a Partial Fusion of the International Convention on Human Rights' 1989 (2) Osgoode Hall LJ 769, 786. See also Sandra Liebenberg: 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-1. Grootboom stated that there is a 'close relationship' between the various socio-economic rights.' Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000(11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at para 24. See also Albie Sachs 'Social and Economic Rights: Can they be Justiciable?' (2000) 53 Southern Methodist University Law Review 1389 ('We do not want bread without freedom, nor do we want freedom without bread; we want bread and we want freedom.')

[2] See Soobramoney v Minister of Health 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC), [1998] All SA 268 (CC) at para 8; Grootboom (supra) at para 2 (Constitutional Court confirmed the commitment to transformation.)

[3] Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) [2004] ZACC 11 ('Khosa').

56D.2 TERMINOLOGY

To understand the language of social security one has to navigate one's way through a maze of terminology. One encounters the following terms in the context of social security: social protection, social security, social insurance,[1] social assistance and social welfare. This chapter will focus on social security and social assistance. The most important distinction that needs to be made is between social security and social assistance. Although the two terms are sometimes used interchangeably, we shall see that it remains important to distinguish between them.

No uniform legal definition of 'social security' exists,[2] nor does the Final Constitution define the term. The White Paper for Social Welfare ('White Paper'), however, defines social security as follows:

> Policies which ensure that all people have adequate economic and social protection during unemployment, ill health, maternity, child rearing, widowhood, disability and old age, by means of contributory and non-contributory schemes for providing for their basic needs.[3]

State social assistance includes the flowing four categories of benefits: those associated with old age, disability, child and family care and relief for the poor.[4] A striking feature of the White Paper definition of social security is that it refers to 'all people' and not 'all citizens'.

The International Labour Organisation[5] defines 'social security' as:

> The protection which society provides for its members, through a series of public measures, against the economic and social distress that otherwise will be caused by the stoppage or substantial reduction of earnings resulting from sickness, maternity, employment injury, unemployment, invalidity, old age and death; the provision of medical care; and the provision of subsidies for families with children.[6]

The White Paper definition embraces one of the most generous — and in my view preferred — constructions of 'social security'. Unlike the international definition of 'social security' the White Paper's definition includes private measures. In Law Society of South Africa the Constitutional Court seemed to

---

[1] Elize Strydom 'Introduction to Social Security Law' in Elize Strydom (ed) Essential Social Security Law (2nd Edition, 2006) 7 (Strydom 'Introduction').

[2] M Olivier, N Smit, E Kalula & G Mhone Introduction to Social Security (2004) 15.

[3] Department of Welfare White Paper for Social Welfare (1997) available at http://www.info.gov.za/view/DownloadFileAction?id=127937 (accessed on 26 February 2012) 100.

[4] Ibid.

[5] In terms of FC s 39(1)(b), courts 'must consider international law' when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

[6] International Labour Organization Introduction to Social Security (3rd Edition, 1984) 3 available at http://www.ilo.org/public/libdoc/ilo/1984/84B09_34_engl.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012). See also ILO Convention 102 Convention concerning Minimum Standards of Social Security (1952) discussed in § 56D.6*(a)* below.

adopt an expansive conception of the term by holding that compensation of road accident victims fell within the ambit of 'social security'.[1]

By contrast, 'social assistance' is normally funded from the general revenue of the state rather than individual contributions.[2] In social assistance schemes individuals receive need-based assistance from public funds without ever contributing directly to the scheme. Social assistance schemes are administered by the state. An individual's entitlement to social assistance is generally determined by the application of a means test that assesses both the individual's current wealth and present need.[3]

The White Paper's use of the term 'developmental social assistance' indicates the state's recognition that a substantial percentage of the South African population cannot care for themselves because our society lacks the capacity (currently and in the medium term) to allow them to participate meaningfully in society.[4] Social assistance aims at ensuring that those who are poor at least gain access to minimum income in order to satisfy their basic needs. Liebenberg, however, points out that in modern social security systems, there is no watertight division between contributory and non-contributory social security schemes.[5] The international trend is to give social security a wide interpretation that recognises both types of social security.[6]

'Social protection', finally, is a broader term than social security. Social protection incorporates developmental strategies and programmes designed to ensure, collectively, at least a minimum living standards for all citizens.[7]

56D.3 The Constitutional Right to Social Security

One can understand a right by the company it keeps. In the Final Constitution, social security is grouped with well-recognised socio-economic rights such as the rights to housing and health. Thus, the general jurisprudence on social security

[1] Law Society of South Africa & Others v Minister for Transport & Another 2011 (1) SA 400 (CC), 2011 (2) BCLR 150 (CC), [2010] ZACC 25 ('Law Society of South Africa') at para 66 ('[T]he [Road Accident Fund] Act is itself a social security measure directed at protecting the victims of motor vehicle accidents. It may properly be seen as part of the arsenal of the state in fulfilling its constitutional duty to protect the security of the person of the public and in particular of victims of road accidents. Its principal object is to ameliorate the plight of victims rendered vulnerable by motor accidents. The state may also respect and protect bodily integrity by creating a statutory right to compensation in the event of bodily injury or death arising from a motor collision. In this sense, the impugned legislation is part of that social security.')

[2] Social welfare is a synonym for social assistance. Strydom 'Introduction' (supra) at 7.

[3] Olivier, Smit, Kalula & Mhone (supra) at 15.

[4] D van der Merwe Social Transformation in South Africa by Means of Social Assistance: A Legal Perspective (1998) 20. See also Olivier, Smit, Kalula & Mhone (supra) at 23.

[5] S Liebenberg 'Children's Right to Social Security, South Africa's International and Constitutional Obligations' (2001) Socio-Economic Rights Project, UWC 1 (Liebenberg 'Children's Rights').

[6] Ibid.

[7] See Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa Transforming the Present — Protecting the Future (2002) 41-42, available at www.cdhaarmann.com/Publications/Taylor%20report.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012). As part of a comprehensive social protection package, the Taylor Commission suggested the introduction of a Basic Income Grant; the gradual extension of the Child Support Grant and reform of the current Disability Grant, Foster Child Grant and Child Dependence Grant. I discuss the Taylor Report in greater detail in §56D.5 below.

rights forms the backdrop against which we shall view the more specific right to social security.

I begin my discussion of the content of the right by outlining various important elements. First, I discuss the protection against negative infringement of the s 27(1)(c) right. Second, I explain the meaning of the word 'access' in s 27(1). Third, I expand on the meaning of 'reasonableness' and how it relates to the concept of a 'minimum core content' for the right. Fourth, I briefly consider the meaning of 'available resources' in the context of the right to social security. Fifth, I describe who the beneficiaries of the right to social security are. Finally, I give an overview of the existing case law on the content of s 27(1)(c).

(a) Negative interference

The First Certification Judgment held that '[a]t the very minimum, socio-economic rights can be negatively protected from improper invasion.'[1] In Jaftha v Schoeman & Others the Constitutional Court indicated that a high level of protection will be afforded in the case of negative violations of socio-economic rights.[2]

The sudden suspension of a social grant probably constitutes 'negative interference' with FC s 27(1)(c).[3] The maladministration of social grants may also amount to 'negative interference.' In the context of disability grants, Nick de Villiers states that 'misinterpreted tests, mass discontinuations and the sustained failure to implement the most basic form of a hearing' likewise violate the negative dimension of the right.[4] The logic of negative interference also suggests that social grants that do not keep up with inflation steadily erode the right to social security and might therefore be characterized as a form of negative interference.[5] However, as Sandra Liebenberg notes, the law of social security is still underdeveloped and it is not clear whether the standard for a finding of negative violation is a total deprivation of access or whether partial reductions will meet the constitutional threshold for such a finding.[6]

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly In re: Certification of the Constitution of the RSA, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 78. Importantly, the Court in Jaftha held that a negative violation of the right to housing is not subject to FC s 26(2) qualifications of 'reasonable measures', 'progressive realisation' and the availability of resources. Jaftha v Schoeman and Others, Van Rooyen v Stoltz and Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC), [2004] ZACC 25 at para 31 read with para 34.

[2] Jaftha (supra).

[3] Many people claim that they are not given reasons for the sudden suspension of grant payments and some are unable to do what they need to do to get their grants reinstated (for example the old and bed-ridden).

[4] Nick de Villiers 'Social Grants and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act' (2002) 12 SAJHR 320.

[5] See Sandra Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 12 SAJHR 234, 241.

[6] Sandra Liebenberg 'The Judicial Enforcement of Social Security Rights in South Africa: Enhancing Accountability for the Basic Needs of the Poor' in Eibe Riedel (ed) Social Security as a Human Right (2007) 9.

(b) Access

FC s 27 confers the right of 'access to' social security. What does this mean? In the context of housing, the Grootboom Court acknowledged that 'access to housing' in FC 26(1) could be interpreted as a right that extends beyond an entitlement to a particular physical structure.[1] Grootboom recognizes that housing requires available land, appropriate services such as the provision of water, the removal of sewage and adequate financing.[2] Similarly, the right to 'access to' social security must be understood as extending beyond the payment of monthly grants to embrace all welfare measures that could allow people to escape poverty.[3]

Nick de Villiers points out that the applicant for a social grant has no substantive right to receive a grant in terms of the Social Assistance Act but has a right to access to social assistance in terms of FC s 27(1)(c).[4] According to de Villiers, 'access' must, therefore, refer to 'the process by which an individual enters into the social assistance system and must include access to the decision-making process.'[5] FC s 27(1) vouchsafes a set of procedural rights that protect a person's interest in the fair and equitable consideration of her social assistance application.[6]

(c) Reasonableness

The right to social security is — like the other rights in FC ss 26 and 27 — a qualified socio-economic right. In terms of s 27(2), the state is required to 'take reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation' of the right to social security.[7] The policy of government to focus on developmental social assistance corresponds with the idea of progressive realization as expressed in FC s 27(2).[8]

---

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom and Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 ('Grootboom') at para 35.

[2] Sandra Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-economic Rights' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) at 33-22.

[3] When it comes to children's grants, for example, the take-up of the child-support grant has been low. Access to this grant can be improved by properly publicizing the grant, removing administrative barriers to receiving the grant and changing the onerous requirements that have to be met in order to get access to the grant. See R Liffmann, B Mlalazi, V Moore, S Ogunrombi & M Olivier 'Scope of Application' in M Olivier, N Smit, E Kalula & G Mhone Introduction to Social Security (2004) 34.

[4] De Villiers (supra) at 322. De Villiers writes that the judicial mechanism available to protect the rights of persons with disabilities is due process (legal remedy through courts).

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 323. De Villiers offers two additional interpretations of FC s 27(1)(c). First, if the process of reviewing an application simultaneously determines an applicant's constitutional right of access to social assistance, then the decision constitutes administrative action as defined in the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000. The second related gloss on FC s 27(1)(c) is that the state is obliged to provide a coherent system by which people can obtain access to social grants and that fair administrative action is an unmistakable part of such system. Ibid.

[7] Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' (supra) at 33-5.

[8] Grootboom (supra) at para 44 ('Furthermore, the Constitution requires that everyone must be treated with care and concern. If the measures, though strategically successful, fail to respond to the needs of those most desperate, they may not pass the test').

The Grootboom Court interpreted the phrase 'progressive realisation' in FC s 26 (2) to impose a duty on the state progressively to 'facilitate the accessibility of housing by lowering the legal, administrative and financial hurdles over time'.[1] The state has a similar duty to facilitate the accessibility of social grants.

That still leaves the phrase 'reasonable measures'. The Grootboom Court interpreted reasonableness as follows:

> Mere legislation is not enough. The State is obliged to act to achieve the intended result, and the legislative result will invariably have to be supported by appropriate well-directed policies and programs implemented by the Executive. These policies must be reasonable both in their conception and implementation…An otherwise reasonable programme that is not implemented reasonably will not constitute compliance with the State's obligation.[2]

The Grootboom Court also decided that to be reasonable, measures must be comprehensive and co-ordinated and must prioritise the needs of the poorest of the poor.[3]

If one agrees that social security aims to relieve poverty, a distinction has to be made between poor and desperately poor.[4] The use of a means test to determine eligibility for social grants can be seen as an attempt to prioritize the needs of the most vulnerable South Africans.

As it stands, however, significant numbers of the poorest of the poor cannot access the current social assistance system. In addition, many children who live on the streets and many persons with chronic illness or moderate disabilities do not meet the criteria for care-dependency or disability grants. Difficulties regarding access and the implementation of various means tests (far from facilitating social security) often serve to exclude the poorest of the poor. Such problems with the most basic forms of access suggest that the social security system as a whole does not satisfy a Grootboom-based test for reasonableness.[5]

(d) Reasonableness and the minimum core

The Grootboom Court adopted a standard of reasonableness — rather than the international benchmark of a 'minimum core' — for determining whether

[1] Sandra Liebenberg 'Children's Right to Social Security, South Africa's International and Constitutional Obligations' (2001) Socio-Economic Rights Project, UWC 1 (Liebenberg 'Children's Rights') 9.

[2] Grootboom (supra) at para 42.

[3] Ibid at para 44.

[4] The definition of poverty is the subject of considerable debate. See W Magasela 'Towards a Constitution–based Definition of Poverty in Post–Apartheid South Africa' in S Buhlungu, Daniel Lutchman & R Southall (eds) State of the Nation: South Africa 2005-2006 (2006) 46. By some state-accepted indicators, there has been an increase in poverty since 1994. See Statistics South Africa Earning and Spending in South Africa: Selected Findings and Comparisons from the Income and Expenditure Survey of October - 1995 and October 2000 (2002).

[5] See C Haarman Social Assistance in South Africa: Its Potential Impact on Poverty (2000)(unpublished PhD thesis, University of the Western Cape) 105.

the state has discharged its duties under FC s 27(2).[1] Since Grootboom, the Court has repeatedly re-affirmed its commitment to the reasonableness approach and rejected attempts to adopt some form of the minimum core.[2] This choice has elicited significant criticism from some academics.[3] Whatever its merits, the reasonableness standard is now fully entrenched in South African law.

Despite the doctrinal choice by the Constitutional Court, the Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security (also known as the 'Taylor Commission') recommended that the obligation to take reasonable measures should translate into making a minimum level of social security available to everyone.[4] The Committee also stated that while the state is rolling out medium to long-term programmes, it must still provide 'temporary relief' to the most vulnerable of the poor.[5]

According to Williams, the reasonableness standard and the minimum core standard are not mutually exclusive. Williams writes that the Court in Khosa, without expressly stating that it was doing so, articulated at least one 'minimum core obligation' under FC s 27(1)(c): permanent residents are entitled to social security benefits.[6] For Williams, Khosa suggests that reasonableness analysis can be used to build up, over time, a notion of what constitutes a minimum core.[7] Others — particularly David Bilchitz[8] — have supported a similar analysis concluding that

[1] See Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights General Comment No 3: The Nature of States Parties Obligations (Fifth Session 1990) (art 2 para 1) UN doc E/1991/23, paras 9-12 (each State Party is under 'a minimum core obligation to ensure the satisfaction of, at the very least, minimum essential levels of each of the rights. In order for a State party to be able to attribute its failure to meet at least its minimum core obligations to a lack of available resources, it must demonstrate that every effort has been made to use all resources that are at its disposition in an effort to satisfy, as a matter of priority, those minimum obligations').

[2] See Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 at paras 34 and 38 (Court held that in Grootboom 'Minimum core was thus treated as possibly being relevant to reasonableness under section 26(2), and not as a self-standing right conferred on everyone under section 26(1)'); and Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28, 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC) ('Mazibuko') at paras 52-55 (rejecting an argument that people should be entitled to a minimum of 50 litres of water per day).

[3] See, for example, David Bilchitz Poverty and Fundamental Rights (2007) ('Poverty').

[4] Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa Transforming the Present — Protecting the Future (2002) 43, available at www.cdhaarmann.com/Publications/Taylor%20report.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012)('While the Grootboom case has emphasized that it is incumbent on the state to take reasonable measures, to give effect to each one of these rights, the committee believes that this should be translated into making available a minimum level or measure of provision for everyone. As a result, it may be advisable for the State to stipulate up front its considered minimum obligations for service delivery, such as it is doing for the free water programme, and its intended schedule for progressively realizing this.')

[5] Ibid 'In all likelihood, the state will be unable to ensure that all of its capability and asset programmes have built-in measures for temporary relief for those most vulnerable.') This view is consistent with the emphasis Grootboom placed on not neglecting particularly vulnerable groups. See Grootboom (supra) at para 44.

[6] Lucy Williams 'Issues and Challenges in Addressing Poverty and Legal Rights: A Comparative United States/South Africa Analysis' (2005) 21 SAJHR 450 (Williams writes that the court in Khosa effectively granted permanent residents individually enforceable constitutional entitlement).

[7] Ibid.

[8] Bilchitz Poverty (supra).

the reasonableness must include some form of minimum core to be a meaningful tool of analysis.

(e) Beneficiaries of the right

Liebenberg notes that the restriction of social assistance to those who are unable to support themselves and their dependants raises the question of whom the Final Constitution envisages as being 'unable' to care for themselves and their dependants.[1] It is clear that the right extends to those who cannot afford to provide for their own or their dependants' basic needs because they are old, very young or because they are living with a disability. The critical issue, according to Liebenberg, is 'whether the right has a broader scope, extending to those who are unable to support themselves due to an inability to find employment, very low wages or insufficient access to productive assets.'[2] Liebenberg argues that the high levels of structural unemployment in South Africa support a broader interpretation of the persons the right should be understood to protect.[3]

The right to social security is intimately and inextricably linked to the rights to dignity and equality. Liebenberg writes that dignity demands that society does its utmost to ensure that those groups who are unable to secure access to basic goods through paid employment still receive those goods required to live a dignified life.[4] Mokgoro J identified the connection between social security and equality in Khosa by recognizing that 'decisions about the allocation of public benefits represent the extent to which poor people are treated as equal members of society'.[5] In Mashavha v President of the RSA, Van der Westhuizen J noted that the right to equality and the right to social assistance required fairness and equality in relation to 'distribution and application of resources and assistance.'[6] These cases suggest that there may be support for including the unemployed in the net of those entitled to claim social assistance in terms of s 27(1)(c).

(f) Case law

(i) Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court has heard only one case focusing directly on the right to social security: Khosa.[7] In addition, it has heard four cases tangentially dealing

[1] Sandra Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 12 SAJHR 234, 239.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 17.

[5] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others, Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC), [2004] ZACC 11 ('Khosa') at para 74. For a general discussion of Khosa's place within South African dignity jurisprudence, see Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[6] 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC), [2004] ZACC 6 ('Mashavha') at para 57.

[7] Khosa (supra).

with the s 27(1)(c) right: Mashavha,[1] Minister of Social Development,[2] Njongi[3] and Law Society of South Africa.[4] In Khosa the Court had to decide whether the right to social security extends to permanent residents. Mashavha concerned the more mundane question of whether social security should be provided by national or provincial government. Minister of Social Development involves an application to extend the order granted in Mashavha. In Njongi, the Court considered the claim of an individual for back pay of her social grant. Finally, Law Society of South Africa addresses limitations on the benefits paid to victims of road accidents. I address Khosa, Mashavha and Minister of Social Development in detail and Law Society of South Africa briefly. Njongi is covered in the subsequent section.

Khosa offers the most detailed available account of the right to social security. The applicants in Khosa were Mozambican citizens living in South Africa as permanent residents. They sought an order confirming the invalidity of sections of the Social Assistance Act, 1992 ('SAA 1992')[5] that disqualified non-citizens from receiving social grants.[6] Had the applicants been South African citizens they would have been entitled to receive welfare grants in terms of SAA 1992.

In the High Court the applicants argued that the requirement of citizenship infringed their rights to equality and to social security. The High Court agreed and struck down the challenged provisions. The effect of striking down the offending sections and failing to replace them with any other limiting criterion placed an obligation on the state to provide social assistance to all indigent persons. It was clear that such far-reaching consequences went beyond the relief originally sought.[7]

Writing for the majority of the Constitutional Court, Justice Mokgoro held that the right to social security vests in 'everyone' and that permanent residents were therefore bearers of the rights. The Court further held that the 'intentional, statutorily sanctioned unequal treatment of part of the South African community' had a 'strong stigmatizing effect' and therefore violated the right to equality.[8]

---

[1] Mashavha (supra).

[2] Ex Parte Minister of Social Development 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC), [2006] ZACC 3 ('Minister of Social Development').

[3] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4 ('Njongi').

[4] Law Society of South Africa & Others v Minister for Transport & Another 2011 (1) SA 400 (CC), 2011 (2) BCLR 150 (CC), [2010] ZACC 25 ('Law Society of South Africa').

[5] Act 56 of 1992.

[6] The applicants were denied old-age grants (in terms of s 3*(c)* of the Social Assistance Act 59 of 1992) and the child-support grants and care-dependency grants reserved for South African citizens (in terms of the Welfare Laws Amendment Act 106 of 1997).

[7] See Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development Case No 25455/02 (Unreported decision of the Transvaal Provincial Provision).

[8] Khosa (supra) at para 74.

To remedy this defect, the Court read in the phrase 'permanent resident' into each of the challenged provisions.[1]

Williams believes that the difference between Khosa and other socio-economic rights lies in the fact that Khosa did not deal with citizens waiting in the queue for progressive realization of their right but with a class of persons entirely excluded from the scheme of social grants created by Parliament. In Khosa, the focus shifted from the reasonableness of measures for progressive realization to the reasonableness of exclusion. As a result, the Khosa court granted specific individuals (permanent residents) an individual legally enforceable entitlement. This departure from the Court's general refusal to grant specific relief was interpreted as indicating that the Court may be moving towards a jurisprudence of socio-economic rights that recognizes 'substantive individually enforceable content.'[2]

However, the Court's more recent judgments in Mazibuko[3] and Nokotyana[4] make it clear that it has not altered its stance on socio-economic rights generally. Rather, it seems to be the fact that, in Khosa, the denial of social assistance was combined with unfair discrimination that led the Court to simply expand a socio-economic right to a group of previously excluded people. As Mokgoro J wrote in Khosa: 'What makes this case different to other cases that have previously been considered by this Court is that, in addition to the rights to life and dignity, the social-security scheme put in place by the state to meet its obligations under section 27 of the Constitution raises the question of the prohibition of unfair discrimination.'[5] If the government decided to exclude permanent residents from receiving water, healthcare or housing, one would expect the Court to react in the same way it did in Khosa. Yet that does not seem to be an indication that the Court will change its response to socio-economic rights claims that are not coupled with unfair discrimination.

---

[1] Notwithstanding the outcome in Khosa, the Social Security Act 13 of 2004 must also be applicable to refugees. The courts have taken the view that, unless the relevant provision indicates that a constitutional right is available only to citizens, it is available to everyone. See Tettey v Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 1999 (3) SA 715, 729 (D), 1999 (1) BCLR 68 (D) and Patel & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2000 (2) SA 343, 349 (D), [2000] 4 All SA 256 (D). See also Submission to the Department of Social Development on the Regulations in terms of the Social Assistance Act, 2004 (14 March 2005) (Manuscript on file with the author). In addition, in terms of art 2 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified by South Africa in 1995), a state party to the Convention may not discriminate against or deny any of the rights in the Convention (including social security) to a child due to the child's national origin.

[2] Lucy Williams 'Issues and Challenges in Addressing Poverty and Legal Rights: A Comparative United States/South Africa Analysis' (2005) 21 SAJHR 450, 451.

[3] Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28. For discussion of Mazibuko, see Daria Roithmayr 'Lessons from Mazibuko: Persistent Inequality and the Commons' (2010) 3 Constitutional Court Review 317; Malcolm Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa 'Water' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS3, May 2011) Chapter 56B.

[4] Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality & Others 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33. For discussions of Noktyana, see Redson Kapindu 'The Desperate Left in Desperation: A Court in Retreat — Noktyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality Revisited' (2010) 3 Constitutional Court Review 201; David Bilchitz 'Is the Constitutional Court wasting away the rights of the poor? Nokotyana v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality'(2010) 127 SALJ 591.

[5] Khosa (supra) at para 44.

While Khosa concerned the core substantive question of who can claim the right to social security, Mashavha turned on the validity of a presidential proclamation which sought to assign the administration of the Social Assistance Act of 1992 to the provincial governments.[1] The Court declared the proclamation invalid on the grounds that the Act fell within the ambit of IC s 126(3) and was, therefore, not capable of assignment to the provinces. The Mashavha Court touched only briefly on the content of the rights to equality and social security. Van der Westhuizen J stated:

> In my view social assistance to people in need is indeed the kind of matter referred to in section 126(3)(a), and in a wider sense envisaged by the meaning of the need for minimum standards across the nation in subsection (c). Social assistance is a matter that cannot be regulated effectively by provincial legislation and that requires to be regulated or co-ordinated by uniform norms and standards that apply generally throughout the Republic, for effective performance. Effective regulation and effective performance do not only include procedural and administrative efficiency and accuracy, but also fairness and equality for example as far as the distribution and application of resources and assistance are concerned. A system which disregards historical injustices and offends the constitutional values of equality and dignity could result in instability, which would be the antithesis of effective regulation and performance.[2]

