CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA 2nd Edition

Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop

January 2013: Revision Service 5

Editor's Note

> Intellectual activity is a little bit like seduction. If you go straight for your goal, you almost certainly won't succeed. If you want to be someone who contributes to world historical debates, you almost certainly won't succeed if you start off by contributing to world historical debates. The most important thing to do is to be talking about the things that have, as we might put it, world historical resonance but at the level at which you can be influential. If your contribution to the conversation then gets picked up and becomes part of a larger conversation or part of conversations happening elsewhere as well, then so be it and so much the better. So I don't think intellectuals do very well talking about the need for the world to be democratic, or the need for human rights to be better respected worldwide. It's not that the statement falls short of the desirable, but it contributes very little to either achieving its goal or adding to the rigor of the conversation. Whereas the same person, really showing exactly what's defective about democracy and democracies, sets a much better base for the argument that ours is a democracy that others should be encouraged to emulate… . If you look at the history of nations that maximized the virtues that we associate with democracy, you notice that what came first was constitutionality, rule of law, and the separation of powers. Democracy almost always came last. If by democracy we mean the right of all adults to take part in the choice of government that's going to rule over them, that came very late — in my lifetime in some countries that we now think of as great democracies, like Switzerland, and certainly in my father's lifetime for other European countries like France. So we should not tell ourselves that democracy is the starting point … . That's not an argument for going back to restricted suffrage or two classes of voters, or whatever it might be — you know, the informed or the uninformed. But it is an argument for understanding that democracy is not the solution to the problem of unfree societies.
>
> Tony Judt 'On Intellectuals and Democracy'

Dear Subscribers

Both of the authors whose work appears in this revision service understand Judt's point all too well. They do not bang their drums in the service of some timeless, universal ideal. They address a decidedly South African audience — primarily lawyers, judges and academics — who live here and now, and who must act, in the service of justice, here and now.

Vicky Bronstein's chapter on 'Conflicts' engages a moment in time contemplated by the decidedly practical, hard-nosed drafters of the 1996 Constitution, but not quite yet upon us. When our multi-party constitutional democracy finally catches up with its creators, Professor Bronstein's work will be waiting to mark the path. It's consistent thematic beat enables the reader to track carefully the available interpretations for each provision that addresses potential conflicts between national legislation and provincial legislation. Her notion of 'deliberate regulatory space' provides an incisive, preferred reading of these provisions, and raises her contribution far above more formal, quotidian assessments of the same subject matter found elsewhere.

PJ Schwikkard's chapter on 'Evidence' could, on the other hand, have been forced asunder by the sheer weight of extant case-law that notionally falls within its titular ambit. As the co-author of one of the leading treatises on evidence, Professor Schwikkard understood that the audience for her mini-monograph consists of lawyers and judges daily confronted with a more narrowly defined set of concerns regarding the legitimacy — as determined by a discernible core of rights found in the Constitution — of the evidence allowed into our courtrooms.

We also wish to thank Richard Stacey, Steve Allcock and Patty Searle for their editorial efforts. They understand that the path to creating and to maintaining a decent work on South African constitutional law is neither straight, nor easy, never ideal, and never, ever at an end.

Professor Stu Woolman
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa
Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance and Sustainable Development, University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Academic Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional, Public, Human Rights & International Law
Managing Editor, Constitutional Court Review

Advocate Michael Bishop
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa
Advocate of the High Court of South Africa, Member of the Cape Bar Counsel, Legal Resources Centre's Constitutional Litigation Unit
Research Associate, Department of Public Law, University of Cape Town
Editor, Constitutional Court Review

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

Second Edition

Revision Service 5: January 2013

FILING INSTRUCTIONS

1. Replace the Key to Contents with the Key enclosed in this Revision Service.
2. Replace and Insert the following pages in the existing contents of your binder.

Old pages (remove)		New pages (insert)
		Volume 1
Constitutional Law of South Africa, 2nd Edition, Revision Service 4:		Constitutional Law of South Africa, 2nd Edition, Revision Service 5:
March 2012 (Editor's Note)	RS 4 03-12	January 2013 (Editor's Note)	RS 5 01-13
Filing Instructions	RS 4 03-12	Filing Instructions	RS 5 01-13
Key to Contents	RS 4 03-12	Key to Contents	RS 5 01-13
Title page	RS 4 03-12	Title page	RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (13-14)	RS 1 07-09	Table of Contents (13-14)	RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (14A-14B)	RS 3 05-11	Table of Contents (14A-14B)	RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (15-16)	RS 3 05-11	Table of Contents (15-16)	RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (52A-blank)	RS 2 10-10	Table of Contents (52A/blank)	RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (53-54)	OS 06-08	Table of Contents (53-54)	RS 5 01-13
16-i/16-ii	OS 07-06	16-1/16-ii	RS 5 01-13
16-1/16-28	OS 07-06	16-1/16-31	RS 5 01-13
		Volume 2
Title page	RS 4 03-12	Title page	RS 5 01-13
		Volume 3
Title page	RS 4 03-12	Title page	RS 5 01-13
52-i/52-ii	OS 11-07	52-i/52-ii	RS 5 01-13
52-1/52-72	OS 11-07	52-1/52-86	RS 5 01-13
		Volume 4
Title page	RS 4 03-12	Title page	RS 5 01-13

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

Second Edition

Revision Service 5: January 2013

KEY TO CONTENTS

The Revision Services of the Second Edition of Constitutional Law of South Africa are published incrementally as chapters are received from contributors. Each instalment reflects the law as at the date (month and year) indicated at the bottom of each page. This key reflects the contents published to date.

Please file the chapters issued in this Service into your volume in chronological order. Your volume should then consist of the following pages:

Page	Reflecting the law as at (service, month and year)
Volume 1*
Constitutional Law of South Africa, 2nd Edition, Revision Service 5: January 2013 (Editor's Note)	RS 5 01-13
Filing instructions	RS 5 01-13
Key to Contents	RS 5 01-13
Half-title page	OS 11-07†
Title Page	RS 5 01-13
Divider board: Introduction to Comparative Analysis
Contents of 2nd Edition 1/2	RS 3 05-11
Contents of 2nd Edition 3/4	RS 4 03-12
Summary of Contents	RS 1 07-09
Table of Contents (1-4)	OS* 06-08
Table of Contents (5-6)	RS 2 10-10
Table of Contents (6A-blank)	RS 2 10-10
Table of Contents (7-10)	OS 06-08
Table of Contents (11-12)	RS 1 07-09
Table of Contents (13-14)	RS 5 01-13

 CLOSA consists of four volumes — please rearrange the contents according to the key.
* Original Service.
† deleted/removed.

Table of Contents (14A-14B) . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (15-16) . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (17-18) . . . . . OS 06-08
Table of Contents (19-22) . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Table of Contents (22A-blank) . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Table of Contents (23-46) . . . . . OS 06-08
Table of Contents (47-48) . . . . . RS 1 07-09
Table of Contents (49-52) . . . . . RS 2 10-10
Table of Contents (52A-blank) . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (53-54) . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Table of Contents (55-56) . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Table of Contents (57-58) . . . . . RS 4 03-12
Table of Contents (58A-blank) . . . . . RS 4 03-12
Table of Contents (59-66) . . . . . OS 06-08
1-i . . . . . OS 06-08
1-1/1-11 . . . . . OS 06-08
2-i/2-ii . . . . . OS 06-08
2-1/2-49 . . . . . OS 06-08
3-i/3-ii . . . . . OS 11-07
3-1/3-31 . . . . . OS 11-07
4-i/4-iii . . . . . OS 06-08
4-1/4-132 . . . . . OS 06-08
5-i/5-ii . . . . . OS 03-07
5-1/5-49 . . . . . OS 03-07
6-i/6-ii . . . . . RS 2 10-10
6-1/6-44 . . . . . RS 2 10-10
7-i . . . . . OS 02-05
7-1/7-23 . . . . . OS 02-05
8-i . . . . . OS 07-06
8-1/8-17 . . . . . OS 07-06
9-i/9-iv . . . . . OS 06-08
9-1/9-199 . . . . . OS 06-08
Divider board: Principles of Government
10-i/10-ii . . . . . OS 07-06
10-1/10-77 . . . . . OS 07-06
11-i/11-ii . . . . . OS 02-05
11-1/11-44 . . . . . OS 02-05
12-i/12-ii . . . . . OS 06-08
12-1/12-98 . . . . . OS 06-08
13-i . . . . . OS 12-05

13-1/13-31 . . . . . OS 12-05
14-i/14-ii . . . . . RS 1 07-09
14-1/14-55 . . . . . RS 1 07-09
15-i . . . . . OS 06-04
15-1/15-21 . . . . . OS 06-04
16-i/16-ii . . . . . RS 5 01-13
16-1/16-31 . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Divider board: Structures of Government
17-i/17-ii . . . . . RS 3 05-11
17-1/17-115 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
18-i/18-ii . . . . . OS 06-08
18-1/18-65 . . . . . OS 06-08
19-i/19-ii . . . . . OS 02-05
19-1/19-19 . . . . . OS 02-05
20-i . . . . . OS 03-07
20-1/20-33 . . . . . OS 03-07

Volume 2*

Title Page . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Contents of 2nd Edition 1/2 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Contents of 2nd Edition 3/4 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
21-i . . . . . OS 02-05
21-1/21-20 . . . . . OS 02-05
22-i/22-iv . . . . . OS 06-08
22-1/22-138 . . . . . OS 06-08
23A-i. . . . . OS 03-07
23A-1/23A-24 . . . . . OS 03-07
23B-i/23B-ii. . . . . RS 3 05-11
23B-1/23B-92 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
23C-i. . . . . RS 1 07-09
23C-1/23C-27 . . . . . RS 1 07-09
24A-i. . . . . OS 12-05
24A-1/24A-20 . . . . . OS 12-05
24B-i. . . . . OS 12-05
24B-1/24B-16 . . . . . OS 12-05
24C-i. . . . . OS 12-05
24C-1/24C-19 . . . . . OS 12-05
24D-i . . . . . OS 12-03

* CLOSA consists of four volumes — please rearrange the contents according to the key.

24D-1/24D-11 . . . . . OS 12-03
24E-i. . . . . OS 02-05
24E-1/24E-16 . . . . . OS 02-05
24F-i/24F-ii . . . . . OS 02-05
24F-1/24F-19 . . . . . OS 02-05
25-i/25-ii . . . . . OS 12-03
25-1/25-36 . . . . . OS 12-03
26-i . . . . . OS 12-05
26-1/26-67 . . . . . OS 12-05
27-i/27-ii . . . . . OS 03-07
27-1/27-57 . . . . . OS 03-07
28-i . . . . . OS 12-03
28-1/28-10 . . . . . OS 12-03
29-i . . . . . OS 06-04
29-1/29-32 . . . . . OS 06-04
30-i . . . . . OS 12-05
30-1/30-27 . . . . . OS 12-05
Divider board:
Operational Provisions of the Bill of Rights
31-i/31-iv . . . . . OS 02-05
31-1/31-161 . . . . . OS 02-05
32-i/32-iii . . . . . OS 06-08
32-1/32-193 . . . . . OS 06-08
33-i/33-ii . . . . . OS 12-03
33-1/33-66 . . . . . OS 12-03
34-i/34-iii . . . . . OS 07-06
34-1/34-136 . . . . . OS 07-06

Volume 3*

Divider board:
Substantive Provisions of the Bill of Rights
Title Page . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Contents of 2nd Edition 1/2 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Contents of 2nd Edition 3/4 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
35-i/35-iii . . . . . OS 03-07
35-1/35-85 . . . . . OS 03-07
36-i/36-ii . . . . . OS 12-05
36-1/36-60 . . . . . OS 12-05

* CLOSA consists of four volumes — please rearrange the contents according to the key.

36-61/36-70 . . . . . OS 06-08
36-71/36-75 . . . . . OS 12-05
37-i . . . . . OS 02-05
37-1/37-28 . . . . . OS 02-05
38-i/38-ii . . . . . OS 12-03
38-1/38-43 . . . . . OS 12-03
39-i . . . . . OS 07-06
39-1/39-2 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
39-3/39-21 . . . . . OS 07-06
40-i/40-iii . . . . . OS 07-06
40-1/40-99 . . . . . OS 07-06
41-i/41-ii . . . . . OS 12-03
41-1/41-55 . . . . . OS 12-03
42-i/42-iv . . . . . OS 06-08
42-1/42-193 . . . . . OS 06-08
43-i . . . . . OS 02-05
43-1/43-38 . . . . . OS 02-05
44-i/44ii* . . . . . OS 06-04
44-1/44-52 . . . . . OS 12-03
44-53/44-56† . . . . . OS 06-04
44-57/44-68 . . . . . OS 12-03
45-i/45-ii . . . . . OS 03-07
45-1/45-52 . . . . . OS 03-07
46-i/46-ii . . . . . OS 12-03
46-1/46-37 . . . . . OS 12-03
47-i/47-ii . . . . . RS 1 07-09
47-1/47-47 . . . . . RS 1 07-09
48-i/48-iii . . . . . OS 03-07
48-1/48-68 . . . . . OS 03-07
49-i . . . . . OS 12-03
49-1/49-38 . . . . . OS 12-03
50-i/50-iii RS2 10-10
50-1/50-68 . . . . . RS2 10-10
51-i/51-ii . . . . . OS 07-06
51-1/51-186 . . . . . OS 07-06
52-i/52-ii . . . . . RS 5 01-13
52-1/52-86 . . . . . RS 5 01-13

* Replaces page 44-i/44-ii issued in OS 12-03.
† Replaces page 44-55/44-56 issued in OS 12-03.

Volume 4*

Title Page . . . . . RS 5 01-13
Contents of 2nd Edition 1/2 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
Contents of 2nd Edition 3/4 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
53-i . . . . . OS 07-06
53-1/53-59 . . . . . OS 07-06
54-i . . . . . OS 12-03
54-1/54-12 . . . . . OS 12-03
55-i/55-ii . . . . . OS 07-06
55-1/55-57 . . . . . OS 07-06
56A-i/56A-ii . . . . . OS 12-05
56A-1/56A-47 . . . . . OS 12-05
56B-i/56B-ii . . . . . RS 3 05-11
56B-1/56B-79 . . . . . RS 3 05-11
56C-i . . . . . OS 02-05
56C-1/56C-30 . . . . . OS 02-05
56D-i . . . . . RS 4 03-12
56D-1/56D-38 . . . . . RS 4 03-12
57-i/57-iii . . . . . OS 11-07
57-1/57-95 . . . . . OS 11-07
58-i/58-ii . . . . . OS 03-07
58-1/58-58 . . . . . OS 03-07
58-59/58-60 . . . . . OS 11-07
58-61/58-75 . . . . . OS 03-07
59-i/59-ii . . . . . OS 11-07
59-1/59-107 . . . . . OS 11-07
60-i . . . . . OS 11-07
60-1/60-16 . . . . . OS 11-07
61-i . . . . . OS 03-07
61-1/61-24 . . . . . OS 03-07
62-i . . . . . OS 2002
62-1/62-24 . . . . . OS 2002
63-i/63-iii . . . . . OS 06-08
63-1/63-128 . . . . . OS 06-08
64-i . . . . . OS 02-05
64-1/64-54 . . . . . OS 02-05
65-i . . . . . OS 12-05
65-1/65-18 . . . . . OS 12-05

* CLOSA consists of four volumes — please rearrange the contents according to the key.

66-i . . . . . OS 03-07
66-1/66-13. . . . . OS 03-07
Divider board: Table of Cases
Table of Cases 1/Table of Cases-130 . . . RS 4 03-12
Divider board: Subject Matter Index
Index-1/Index-52 . . . . . RS 4 03-12

Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development, University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional,
Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
Advocate of the High Court and Member of the Cape Bar
Honorary Research Associate, Department of Public Law, University of Cape Town
Junior Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JUTA

Second Edition, Revision Service 5 2013

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by ANdtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 5: 01–13]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART I

COURTS, PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT & STRUCTURES OF GOVERNMENT

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
	Volume 1
Structure of Constitutional Analysis
1	A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa	Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop
2	Constitutional History	Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel
3	Constitutional Litigation	Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop
Courts
4	Jurisdiction	Sebastian Seedorf
5	Rules & Procedure in Constitutional Matters	Kate Hofmeyr
6	Costs	Michael Bishop
7	Standing, Ripeness & Mootness	Cheryl Loots
8	Amicus	Geoff Budlender
9	Remedies	Michael Bishop
Principles of Government
10	Democracy	Theunis Roux
11	Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution	Frank Michelman
12	Separation of Powers	Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda
13	Founding Provisions	Chris Roederer
14	Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations	Stu Woolman & Theunis Roux
15	Legislative Competence	Victoria Bronstein
16	Conflicts	Victoria Bronstein

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Structures of Government
17	National Legislative Authority	Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga
18	National Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Richard Stacey
19	Provincial Legislative Authority	Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman
20	Provincial Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti
21	Provincial Constitutions	Stu Woolman
	Volume 2
22	Local Government	Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser
23A	Public Administration	Anshal Bodasing
23B	Security Services	Stu Woolman
23C	War Powers	Stephen Ellmann
24	Chapter Nine Institutions:
	24A Public Protector	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
	24B Auditor General	Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte
	24C SA Human Rights Commission	Jonathan Klaaren
	24D Commission for Gender Equality	Cathi Albertyn
	24E Independent Communication Authority of South Africa	Justine White
	24F Commission for the Promotion & the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities	Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo
25	Public Procurement	Glenn Penfold & Pippa Reyburn
26	Traditional Leadership	Tom Bennett & Christina Murray
27	Public Finances	Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem
28	Transitional Provisions	Matthew Chaskalson
29	Elections	Glenda Fick
30	International Law & International Agreements	Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART II
The Bill of Rights

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Operational Provisions
31	Application	Stu Woolman
32	Interpretation	Lourens du Plessis
33	Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights	Sandra Liebenberg
34	Limitations	Stu Woolman & Henk Botha

Volume 3

Substantive Provisions
35	Equality	Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt
36	Dignity	Stu Woolman
37	Reproductive Rights	Michelle O'Sullivan
38	Privacy	David McQuoid-Mason
39	Life	Marius Pieterse
40	Freedom and Security of the Person	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
41	Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion	Paul Farlam
42	Freedom of Expression	Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein
43	Freedom of Assembly	Stu Woolman
44	Freedom of Association	Stu Woolman
45	Political Rights	Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch
46	Property	Theunis Roux
47	Children's Rights	Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton
48	Land	Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill
49	Sentencing and Punishment	Dirk Van Zyl Smit

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
50	Environment	Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson
51	Criminal Procedure: Rights of Detained, Arrested & Accused Persons	Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux
52	Evidence	PJ Schwikkard
	Volume 4
53	Labour Relations	Carole Cooper
54	Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession	Dennis Davis
55	Housing	Kirsty McLean
56	Socio-Economic Rights:
	56A Health	David Bilchitz
	56B Water	Malcom Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa
	56C Food	Danie Brand
	56D Social Security	Mia Swart
57	Education	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
58	Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion	Stu Woolman
59	Access to Courts	Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman
60	Citizenship	Jonathan Klaaren
61	States of Emergency	Nicole Fritz
62	Access to Information	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
63	Just Administrative Action	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
64	Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
65	Official Languages	Iain Currie
66	Movement and Residence	Jonathan Klaaren

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

Chapter		Page
	Volume 1
1	A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa	1–1
2	Constitutional History	2–1
3	Constitutional Litigation	3–1
4	Jurisdiction	4–1
5	Rules and Procedure	5–1
6	Costs	6–1
7	Standing, Ripeness and Mootness	7–1
8	Amicus Curiae	8–1
9	Remedies	9–1
10	Democracy	10–1
11	The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution	11–1
12	Separation of Powers	12–1
13	Founding Provisions	13–1
14	Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations	14–1
15	Legislative Competence	15–1
16	Conflicts	16–1
17	National Legislative Authority	17–1
18	The President and the National Executive	18–1
19	Provincial Legislative Authority	19–1
20	Provincial Executive Authority	20–1
21	Provincial Constitutions	21–1
22	Local Government	22–1
	Volume 2
23A	Public Administration	23A–1
23B	Security Services	23B–1
23C	War Powers	23C–1
24A	Public Protector	24A–1
24B	Auditor General	24B–1
24C	Human Rights Commission	24C–1
24D	The Commission for Gender Equality	24D–1
24E	Independent Communication Authority of South Africa (ICASA)	24E–1
24F	Commission for Promotion & Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities	24F–1
25	Public Procurement	25–1
26	Traditional Leadership	26–1
27	Public Finance	27–1
28	Transitional Provisions on Executive Authority, Assets and Liabilities	28–1
29	Elections	29–1
30	International Law & International Agreements	30–1
31	Application	31–1

Chapter		Page
32	Interpretation	32–1
33	The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights	33–1

Volume 3

34	Limitations	34–1
35	Equality	35–1
36	Dignity	36–1
37	Reproductive Rights	37–1
38	Privacy	38–1
39	Life	39–1
40	Freedom and Security of the Person	40–1
41	Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion	41–1
42	Freedom of Expression	42–1
43	Freedom of Assembly	43–1
44	Freedom of Association	44–1
45	Political Rights	45–1
46	Property	46–1
47	Children's Rights	47–1
48	Land	48–1
49	Sentencing and Punishment	49–1
50	Environment	50–1
51	Criminal Procedure	51–1
52	Evidence	52–1

Volume 4

53	Labour Relations	53–1
54	Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession	54–1
55	Housing	55–1
56A	Health	56A–1
56B	Water	56B–1
56C	Food	56C–1
56D	Social Security	56D–1
57	Education	57–1
58	Community Rights, Language, Culture & Religion	58–1
59	Access to Courts	59–1
60	Citizenship	60–1
61	State of Emergency	61–1
62	Access to Information	62–1
63	Just Administrative Action*	63–1
64	Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour	64–1
65	Official Languages	65–1
66	Freedom of Movement	66-1

Table of Cases ..... Table of Cases–1

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

1 A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa

Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop

1.1 Introduction 1–1
1.2 On the methodology of Constitutional Law of South Africa. 1–1
1.3 On the relationship between Constitutional Law of South Africa and the Final Constitution. 1–5

2 Constitutional History

Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel

2.1 The Potemkin Constitution 2–1
2.2 Colonial politics and Apartheid 2–5
(a) Sasikhona (we were always here). 2–5
(b) (Im)modest beginnings of European involvement in South Africa 2–8
(c) European expansion in South Africa. 2–9
(d) English and Roman-Dutch legal traditions. 2–10
(e) Early failed attempts at judicial review. 2–11
(f) The formation of the Union 2–12
(g) Construction of a bifurcated, racist State 2–13
(i) The South African Native Affairs Commission 2–13
(ii) The racial construction of citizenship 2–15
(h) The rise of Apartheid: Harris I, Harris II & Collins 2–15
(i) Apartheid and the Republic 2–17
(i) Denationalization of black South Africans. 2–17
(ii) Apartheid and the creation of Bantustans 2–18
(iii) Apartheid and the silencing of opposition 2–19
(iv) Sharpeville, 1960 and Soweto, 1976 2–21
(v) States of Emergency 2–22
(vi) 1983 Constitution and the endgame of Apartheid 2–22
2.3 The struggle for liberation. 2–23
(a) Ghandi, pass laws & Satayagrha 2–23
(b) The African National Congress, the Pan Africanist Congress and Black Consciousness 2–25
(c) The Freedom Charter of 1955 2–27
(d) The Rivonia Treason Trial. 2–30
(f) The United Democratic Front 2–31
(g) Lawyers, Human Rights and the Rule of Law 2–32
2.4 The road to democracy: private meetings, negotiations, referenda and an assassination. 2–34
(a) Meetings in the 1980s, here and abroad 2–34
(b) ANC initiatives and initiatives from Apartheid institutions. 2–35

(c) CODESA and the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum 2–36
(d) The election of 27 April 1994 2–39
2.5 The Interim Constitution, the Constitutional Assembly, 34 Constitutional Principles and the Certification of the Final Constitution 2–39
(a) The drafting of the Final Constitution 2–39
(b) First Certification Judgment 2–42
(i) Law and politics 2–42
(ii) The grounds for Non-Certification: Institutional concerns, the Rule of Law & Constitutionalism 2–43
(c) Second Certification Judgment 2–45
2.6 The Consolidation of Constitutional Democracy 2–46
(a) Constitutional amendments 2–46
(b) The 14th Amendment Bill 2–47
(c) Dignity, democracy, legality and the Potemkin Constitution 2–48

3 Constitutional Litigation

Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop

3.1 Introduction 3–1
3.2 What is a constitutional issue? 3–2
3.3 Conceptualising the case 3–3
(a) The context in which a constitutional issue may arise 3–3
(b) The need for pleading 3–5
(c) Bill of Rights litigation 3–7
(d) Non-chapter 2 litigation 3–10
(e) Interpretive issues 3–13
3.4 Procedural and jurisdictional issues 3–15
(a) Mootness, ripeness and standing 3–15
(b) Joinder of necessary organs of state 3–16
(c) Submissions by an amicus curiae 3–17
(d) Form of proceedings 3–18
(e) Appropriate court 3–19
(f) Reasons for a court to decline to exercise constitutional jurisdiction 3–20
(g) Principle of constitutional avoidance 3–21
3.5 Appeals 3–21
(a) Appeals to the Constitutional Court 3–21
(b) Appeals to the Supreme Court of Appeal 3–22
3.6 Costs 3–22
3.7 The duties of the state in constitutional litigation 3–23
(a) General ethical duty 3–23
(b) Specific evidentiary burdens 3–27
(i) Limitations 3–27
(ii) Remedies 3–28
(c) Constitutional duty of the state in the enforcement of court orders 3–30

4 Jurisdiction

Sebastian Seedorf

4.1 Introduction 4–2
4.2 The Conceptual Framework for Constitutional Jurisdiction in South Africa . . 4–5
(a) Jurisdiction and the institutional function of the Constitutional Court 4–5
(b) The merits of a case and the dividing line between jurisdiction and access to the Constitutional Court 4–10
4.3 Jurisdiction 4–17
(a) The threshold requirement of finding a 'constitutional matter' 4–17
(i) Just labels: 'constitutional matter', 'constitutional issue', 'constitutional question' 4–18
(ii) The Constitutional Court has not embraced any concept of 'constitutional matter' 4–18
(iii) The Fraser list of case types in which the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction 4–20
(b) FC s 167(4): Constitutional matters falling under the Court's exclusive jurisdiction 4–22
(i) Disputes between organs of state, FC s 167(4)(a) 4–27
(ii) Constitutionality of Bills, FC s 167(4)(b) 4–33
(aa) Initiation of judicial review of a Bill 4–33
(bb) Scope of judicial review of a Bill 4–37
(iii) Abstract review of Acts of Parliament and provincial Acts, FC s 167(4)(c) 4–40
(iv) Amendments to the Constitution, FC s 167(4)(d) 4–44
(v) Constitutional obligations of Parliament or the President, FC s 167(4)(e) 4–45
(vi) Certification of a provincial Constitution, FC s 167(4)(f) 4–48
(vii) Interim relief in matters of exclusive jurisdiction 4–49
(c) Constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction explicitly mentioned in the Constitution 4–52
(i) Confirmation of orders of statutory invalidity, FC s 167(5) 4–53
(ii) Interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution, FC s 167(7) 4–55
(d) Other constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction 4–60
(i) Interpretation of legislation and development of the common law or customary law in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, FC s 39(2) 4–60
(aa) Cases involving the common law 4–62
(bb) Cases involving legislation 4–66
(ii) Exercise of public power and administrative action 4–68
(iii) Interpretation and application of legislation giving effect to the Constitution 4–77
(iv) Fair procedure in the judicial system 4–82
(e) Issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters 4–85
(f) The Constitutional Court's power to make the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter, FC s 167(3)(c) 4–88

(g) The Constitutional Court's findings on what is not a 'constitutional matter' 4–89
(i) Factual findings by lower courts 4–89
(ii) Incorrect application of the law 4–92
(h) An alternative conception of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction' . . . 4–101
(i) Consequences of the Constitutional Court's approach to its jurisdiction 4–101
(aa) It has become impossible to determine when the Constitutional Court will decline jurisdiction'. 4–102
(bb) Every case notionally raises a constitutional matter' 4–106
(cc) The transformative function of the Constitutional Court is impaired'. 4–106
(ii) A functional approach to jurisdiction' 4–109
(aa) Limits of a substantive, and benefits of a functional, understanding of 'constitutional matter' 4–109
(bb) Constitutional leeways as limits to constitutional jurisdiction . 4–118
(cc) FC 167(7) as a basis for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction 4–122
(dd) Consequences of the functionalist approach for some Constitutional Court judgments 4–124
4. Access to the Constitutional Court. 4–125
5. The Constitutional Court as a Single Apex Court 4–128

5 Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters

Kate Hofmeyr

5.1 Introduction 5–1
5.2 General overview of the rules 5–1
5.3 Analysis of particular rules 5–7
(a) Rules 8 & 10: Intervenors and amici curiae 5–7
(i) Rule 8: Intervention of parties in proceedings 5–7
(ii) Rule 10: Amici curiae submissions 5–10
(b) Rules 14 & 15: Referral of Bills and Acts 5–12
(i) Referral of Bills 5–12
(ii) Referral of Acts 5–13
(c) Rule 16: Confirmation proceedings 5–14
(d) Rule 18: Direct access 5–17
(e) Rules 19 & 20: Appeals to the Constitutional Court 5–21
(i) Factors relevant to all applications for leave to appeal 5–24
(aa) Importance of the issue raised 5–24
(bb) Prospects of success 5–24
(cc) Public interest in a determination of the constitutional issues raised 5–24
(dd) Accuracy of pleadings 5–25
(ii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court 5–25
(aa) Savings in time and cost 5–25
(bb) Urgency of having a final determination of the matters in issue 5–25
(cc) Value of the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal. 5–25

(dd) Value of the views of the Labour Appeal Court 5–26
(ee) Compliance with obligations of co-operative government 5–26
(iii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in custody cases: Best interests of the child 5–26
(iv) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in criminal cases . 5–27
(aa) Simultaneous appeals 5–27
(bb) Litigants aggrieved by a decision 5–27
(v) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals against interim orders of execution 5–29
(vi) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals from the Labour Appeal Court 5–29
Appendix: Constitutional Court Rules 5–30

6 Costs

Michael Bishop

6.1 Introduction 6–1
6.2 Basic Principles 6–1
(a) Traditional approach 6–1
(b) General Approach: The Biowatch Framework 6–3
(i) Disputes between a private party and the state 6–4
(ii) Disputes where the state plays a regulatory role 6–5
(iii) True private disputes 6–6
(iv) Inter-governmental disputes 6–9
(v) Criminal litigation 6–9
(vi) Conclusion 6–12
6.3 Factors Justifying a Departure from the Default Approach 6–12
(a) The reason for litigation 6–12
(i) Bothma v Biowatch 6–13
(ii) Motivation in practice 6–15
(b) Partial success 6–16
(c) Conduct of the litigation 6–17
(i) Frivolous constitutional claims 6–18
(ii) Vexatious litigation 6–18
(iii) General inappropriate conduct 6–18
(iv) State's duty to the Court 6–22
(d) Miscellaneous 6–23
(i) Role of attorney 6–23
(ii) Who funds the litigation 6–24
6.3 Specific Cases 6–24
(a) Interlocutory applications 6–24
(b) Matters disposed of on the papers 6–25
(c) Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (1980) 6–26
(d) Costs in applications in terms of FC s 80 6–26
(e) Counsel appearing at the request of the Court 6–28
6.4 Using Costs to Prevent Litigation: Settlement and Security 6–28
(a) Settlement offers 6–28

(b) Security for costs 6–29
6.5 Costs Orders of Lower Courts 6–30
(a) Cost orders of lower courts 6–31
(b) Appeals against costs orders 6–33
6.6 Punitive Costs Awards 6–34
(a) Costs on an attorney and client scale 6–34
(b) Costs de bonis propriis 6–38
6.6 Taxation of Costs 6–41
6.7 Clarifying the Meaning of Costs Awards 6–44

7 Standing, Ripeness and Mootness

Cheryl Loots

7.1 Introduction 7–1
7.2 Standing 7–1
(a) The concept of standing 7–1
(b) Standing in South African law before 1994 7–2
(c) Standing under the Final Constitution 7–3
(i) Anyone acting in their own interest 7–4
(ii) Anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name 7–6
(iii) Anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons 7–7
(iv) Anyone acting in the public interest 7–11
(v) An association acting in the interest of its members 7–12
(d) The wider effect of FC s 38 7–13
7.3 Ripeness 7–14
(a) The concept of ripeness 7–14
(b) Ripeness in South African law before 1994 7–15
(c) Ripeness under the Final Constitution 7–16
(i) Ripeness qua premature action 7–17
(ii) Failure to exhaust other remedies 7–17
(iii) Matters that can be resolved without reaching the constitutional issues 7–18
7.4 Mootness 7–18
(a) The concept of mootness 7–18
(b) Mootness in South African law before 1994 7–20
(c) Mootness under the Final Constitution 7–20
7.5 Delineating the doctrines of standing, ripeness and mootness 7–23

8 Amicus Curiae

Geoff Budlender

8.1 Introduction 8–1
(a) Traditional conceptions of the amicus curiae 8–1
(b) Amicus curiae in the new constitutional order 8–1
(c) Amicus curiae contrasted with an intervening party 8–4
8.2 Parameters of the role of the amicus 8–5
8.3 Amicus curiae in the Constitutional Court 8–6

(a) Constitutional Court rule 10. 8–6
(b) The mechanism for admission 8–7
(c) Procedure for applying for admission as an amicus curiae 8–8
(d) Content of the application for admission 8–9
(e) Court's discretion as to whether to admit an amicus curiae 8–9
(f) Submission of argument by an amicus curiae 8–10
(g) New factual material and evidence. 8–11
8.4 Amicus curiae in other courts. 8–12
(a) Supreme Court of Appeal 8–12
(b) Labour Appeal Court 8–13
(c) High Court 8–14
(d) Land Claims Court 8–15
(e) Labour Court. 8–16
8.5 Costs 8–16

9 Remedies

Michael Bishop

9.1 Introduction 9–1
(a) Pointless 9–1
(b) A Roadmap 9–3
9.2 Theory 9–4
(a) What is a 'remedy'? 9–4
(b) Ubi jus ibi remedium 9–6
(i) General Principle 9–6
(ii) Deviations 9–7
(aa) Imaginary Deviations 9–7
(bb) Real Deviations 9–11
(iii) The Legal Position 9–15
(iv) Remedies without Rights? 9–16
(c) Rights and Remedies 9–18
(i) Ways of Understanding the Rights-Remedies relationship 9–19
(aa) Automatic Remedialism 9–19
(bb) Rights Essentialism 9–20
(cc) Remedial Equilibration 9–21
(ii) Methodological Concerns 9–23
(iii) An Equilibrating Court 9–24
(aa) Remedial Flexibility 9–24
(bb) Remedial Deterrence 9–26
(cc) Remedial Incorporation 9–31
(dd) Remedial Substantiation 9–34
(ee) Litigation Impact 9–37
(ff) Remedies and Jurisdiction 9–38
(gg) Conclusion 9–39
(iv) Equilibration and Transformation 9–39
(d) Discretion 9–44
(i) The Extent of Discretion 9–45
(aa) Standards Axis 9–46
(bb) The Review Axis 9–49
(ii) Discretion and Legitimacy 9–53
(e) Choice of Remedy 9–55
(i) Textual Considerations 9–56
(ii) Rights-maximising and Interest Balancing 9–59
(iii) Ways of Conceiving Choice 9–61
(a) Bollyky's Formula 9–61
(b) The Purposive Approach 9–62
(c) The Principled Approach 9–64
(d) Taxonomies and Constraints 9–65
(iv) Structuring Remedies 9–65
(aa) Effective Relief 9–66
(1) General principle 9–66
(2) Corrective or distributive 9–67

(3) Nature of the violation 9–69
(4) Similarly situated. 9–69
(5) Reason for violation 9–71
(bb) Unavoidable limits. 9–71
(1) Multiple goals. 9–71
(2) Conflicting rights 9–71
(cc) Avoidable limits 9–73
(1) Separation of powers 9–73
(x) Legislature 9–74
(y) Executive 9–74
(2) Courts' limitations. 9–75
(3) Administration of justice 9–75
(4) Financial costs 9–76
(5) Impact on third parties 9–76
(6) Fault 9–77
(dd) Conclusion 9–77
(f) Constitutional and Private Remedies 9–78
(i) Characteristics 9–78
(ii) When should litigants rely on private remedies? 9–79
(iii) Indirect Application and Remedies 9–82
9.3 Categorising Remedies 9–84
9.4 Remedies Following a Finding of Inconsistency. 9–86
(a) Hierarchy 9–86
(b) Reading Down 9–87
(i) The nature of reading down: interpretation or remedy? 9–87
(ii) When is reading down appropriate? 9–90
(c) Bald Declarations of Invalidity 9–95
(d) Limiting Substantive Impact. 9–97
(i) Severance 9–98
(ii) Notional Severance. 9–102
(iii) Reading-in 9–104
(iv) Shinga 9–110
(e) Limiting Temporal Impact 9–111
(i) Suspension. 9–111
(aa) How does suspension operate? 9–111
(x) Suspension as a resolutive condition 9–111
(y) Do suspended orders that come into effect have retrospective force? 9–112
(z) Calculating time periods 9–114
(bb) When is suspension appropriate? 9–115
(x) Factors in support of suspension 9–116
(y) Factors against suspension. 9–121
(cc) Interim orders 9–123
(dd) The Period of Suspension 9–126
(ee) Can suspension be extended? 9–127
(ii) Retrospectivity 9–128

(aa) Mechanics of Retrospectivity 9–128
(x) The default position 9–129
(y) Ways to limit the default position 9–132
(bb) Reasons for limiting retrospectivity 9–134
(x) Injustice to individuals 9–135
(y) Administration of Justice 9–139
(z) Validating invalidating legislation 9–144
(cc) Criticism 9–145
9.5 Individual Remedies 9–150
(a) Damages 9–151
(i) Indirect Constitutional Damages 9–151
(ii) Direct Constitutional Damages 9–156
(aa) Damages to Compensate for Loss 9–157
(bb) Punitive Damages 9–160
(cc) Nominal Damages 9–162
(iii) Is the quantum of damages a constitutional matter? 9–162
(b) Individual Declaratory Relief 9–164
(i) The Nature of the Power 9–164
(ii) When should declarations be ordered? 9–167
(c) Interdictory Relief 9–170
(i) Interdicts versus Declarations 9–170
(ii) Interim Interdicts 9–170
(iii) Final Interdicts 9–172
(d) Contractual relief 9–175
9.6 Systemic Remedies 9–176
(a) Declarations 9–176
(b) Interdicts 9–178
(c) Supervisory Orders 9–179
(i) Models for Supervision 9–179
(ii) The Case Law on Structural Interdicts 9–181
(aa) Supervisory interdicts refused 9–182
(bb) Supervisory interdicts granted 9–184
(iii) Factors 9–188
(iv) Nyathi 9–190
(v) A Theory for Systemic Remedies 9–191
(vi) Beyond Supervision 9–194
9.7 Legislative Remedies 9–196
9.8 Criminal Remedies 9–198

10 Democracy

Theunis Roux

10.1 Introduction 10–1
10.2 Democracy in political theory 10–3
(a) Direct democracy 10–4
(b) Representative democracy 10–8
(c) Contemporary accounts of democracy 10–11

(i) Pluralist democracy . . . 10–12
(ii) Participatory democracy . . . 10–14
(iii) Deliberative democracy . . . 10–15
(d) Constitutional democracy . . . 10–18
10.3 Constitutional provisions referring to democracy . . . 10–22
(a) Preamble . . . 10–22
(b) Founding provisions . . . 10–24
(c) Democracy in the Bill of Rights . . . 10–32
(d) The powers and functions of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and municipal councils . . . 10–37
(i) Rules and orders concerning legislative business must take account of representative and participatory democracy . . . 10–38
(ii) Participation by minority parties in proceedings of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils . . . 10–39
(iii) Public access to and involvement in Parliament and the provincial legislatures . . . 10–43
(e) Miscellaneous provisions . . . 10–45
10.4 Constitutional rights shaping South African democracy . . . 10–46
(a) Freedom of expression . . . 10–48
(b) Political rights . . . 10–53
(c) Socio-economic rights . . . 10–57
10.5 The principle of democracy in South African constitutional law . . . 10–62
(a) Introduction . . . 10–62
(b) The principle of democracy in the constitutional text . . . 10–65
(c) The principle of democracy in the case law . . . 10–69

11 The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution

Frank I. Michelman

11.1 Introduction . . . 11–1
(a) The common law doctrine of legality . . . 11–1
(b) Legality as a norm of enacted constitutional law . . . 11–2
(c) A product of judicial interpretation . . . 11–2
11.2 The principle of legality and the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court . . . 11–4
(a) The scope of 'constitutional matters': The Constitutional Court not envisioned as a court of general jurisdiction . . . 11–4
(b) A problem: The rule of law as a constitutional matter . . . 11–6
(i) An optimistic view of the limited-in-principle scope of 'constitutional matters' . . . 11–7
(ii) The destabilizing effect of introducing the principle of legality as a constitutional matter . . . 11–11
(iii) The Constitutional Court has never directly addressed this difficulty 11–12
11.3 The causes of the constitutionalisation of the legality principle . . . 11–15
(a) Introduction . . . 11–15
(b) The straight historical account . . . 11–26
(c) The justificatory account . . . 11–23

(i) The 'transformative' character of the Final Constitution and the special role of the Constitutional Court 11–24
(ii) The impulse and need for retention of a general principle of legality after the onset of the Bill of Rights 11–26
(iii) The risks of locating the legality principle 'outside' the Final Constitution 11–29
11.4 Supremacy of the Constitution 11–34
(a) Constitutional supremacy as a value (not just a rule) 11–34
(b) The unity of the legal system and the pursuit of justice 11–36
(c) An all-pervasive Constitution? 11–38
(d) Constitutional supremacy as basic-law status 11–41
(e) Constitutional supremacy and discursive style. 11–42

12 Separation of Powers

Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda

12.1 Introduction. 12–1
12.2. Origins and Conceptual Framework of the Separation of Powers Doctrine . . 12–3
(a) 'Power arrests power': the historical development of the idea of separated powers. 12–3
(b) Constitutionalism, 'checks and balances' and the 'pure form' of separation of powers 12–10
(c) The different forms of separation of powers. 12–13
12.3 Separation of Powers under the South African Constitution. 12–16
(a) Separation of powers in the Interim Constitution and the Constitutional Principles. 12–17
(b) Separation of powers in the Final Constitution 12–20
(i) The legislature and the executive. 12–21
(ii) The judiciary. 12–25
(iii) Independent constitutional institutions. 12–30
(c) Beyond the text: separation of powers as a living doctrine 12–34
(i) A distinctively South African model of separation of powers. 12–35
(ii) Justiciability of the separation of powers principle 12–36
(d) Emerging general principles and doctrines of separation of powers 12–39
(i) Legislature, executive and judiciary between pre-eminent domains and checks and balances. 12–39
(aa) A pre-eminent domain for each branch of government. 12–39
(bb) The availability of checks and balances 12–45
(ii) Judicial review and the separation of powers 12–49
(aa) Judicial review in the context of the supremacy of the Constitution, the political question doctrine and intergovernmental respect and courtesy. 12–50
(bb) Separation of powers and the applicable standard of review. . 12–59
(cc) Separation of powers and remedies 12–73
(iii) Delegation of legislative authority and subordinate legislation 12–86
(iv) Executive-controlled dispute resolution. 12–94

13 Founding Provisions

Christopher Roederer

13.1 Introduction. 13–2
13.2 FC Chapter 1 does not contain all the foundational values and not all of the provisions in FC Chapter 1 are foundational. 13–3
(a) Not all the foundational values are found in FC Chapter 1 13–3
(b) Not all the provisions of FC Chapter 1 are foundational. 13–9
13.3 Relationship between the founding provisions and 'an objective, normative value system' 13–9
13.4 Founding provisions and the basic structure argument 13–15
13.5 Function of the various sections of FC Chapter 1 13–18
(a) FC ss 1 and 2. 13–18
(b) FC ss 3 and 6. 13–25
(c) FC ss 4 and 5. 13–26
13.6 Are the founding provisions absolute or at least more important than other provisions in the Final Constitution? 13–27
13.7 Do the founding provisions create justiciable rights? 13–28
(a) FC s 1 does not create justiciable rights. 13–29
(b) Other provisions in FC Chapter 1 give rise to justiciable rights. 13–30

14 Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations

Stuart Woolman & Theunis Roux

14.1 Introduction. 14–1
14.2 Comparative concepts of co-operative government. 14–3
14.3 Co-operative government and the Final Constitution. 14–7
(a) The general framework of co-operative government. 14–7
(b) FC s 40. 14–9
(i) FC s 40(1): Distinctive, interdependent and interrelated. 14–9
(ii) FC s 40(2): Parties bound by chapter 3 14–10
(c) FC s 41. 14–14
(i) FC s 41(1) 14–14
(aa) FC s 41(1)(d): The rule of law. 14–15
(bb) FC s 41(1)(e): Respect for institutional integrity. 14–15
(cc) FC s 41(1)(f): Enumerated powers 14–16
(dd) FC s 41(1)(g): Abuse of power 14–16
(ee) FC s 41(1)(h): The duty to avoid litigation 14–18
(ii) FC s 41(2) 14–20
(iii) FC s 41(3) 14–23
(iv) FC s 41(4) 14–24
14.4 Intergovernmental relations 14–24
(a) Defining intergovernmental relations ('IGR') 14–24
(b) Structures and Statutes for Intergovernmental Relations 14–24
(i) The National Council of Provinces 14–25
(ii) The Intergovernmental Forum ('IGF') and the President's Co-ordinating Committee ('PCC') 14–26

(iii) Intergovernmental Relation Committees of Ministers and Members of Executive Councils ('MINMECs') . . . 14–27
(iv) Forum for South African Directors–General ('FOSAD') . . . 14–28
(v) Fiscal and Financial Commision . . . 14–28
(vi) The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act . . . 14–29
(vii) The Division of Revenue Act and the Explanatory Memorandum for the Division of Revenue . . . 14–29
(viii) The Public Financial Management Act . . . 14–30
(ix) The Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act . . . 14–30
(x) The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Government Act . . . 14–30
(xi) Medium Term Budget Policy Statement (MTBPS) and Medium Term Expenditure Framework (MTEF) . . . 14–31
(xii) Provincial intervention in local government . . . 14–31
(c) An Assessment of Intergovernmental Relations and Co-operative Government by the State and Civil Society . . . 14–32
14.5 The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 . . . 14–34
(a) The Purpose of the Act . . . 14–34
(b) A Reasonable Period for Promulgation of the IGFRA? . . . 14–35
(c) How the IGRFA Works . . . 14–36
(i) The Main Forums for Intergovernmental Cooperation and Coordination . . . 14–36
(ii) Implementation Protocols . . . 14–35
(iii) Settlement of Intergovernmental Disputes . . . 14–39
(d) What Disputes the IGFRA Does Not Cover . . . 14–41
(i) Conflicts between National Legislation and Provincial Legislation . . . 14–41
(ii) Intra-governmental Disputes between Provincial Departments . . . 14–42
(aa) The Problem . . . 14–42
(bb) Executive Authority of Provinces . . . 14–47
(cc) A Lack of Departmental Personality . . . 14–48
(dd) Finding a Legal Nexus . . . 14–50
(ee) Using The IGRFA as a Guide to Intra-Governmental Disputes . . . 14–51
(ff) Dispute Settlement . . . 14–51
(gg) Enforcement . . . 14–52
(e) Practical Problems with the IGFRA: Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums and the District Intergovernmental Forums . . . 14–52
(f) ANC Dominance and the Efficacy of the IGFRA . . . 14–54

15 Legislative Competence

Victoria Bronstein

15.1 Introduction . . . 15-1
15.2 The legislative authority of the Republic . . . 15-2
(a) Schedule 4 — Concurrent legislative competence . . . 15-3
(b) Schedule 5 — Exclusive provincial legislative competence . . . 15-4
(c) Exclusive national legislative competence and assignment of powers by the national legislature . . . 15-5
(d) Other provincial legislative powers . . . 15-5

15.3 Interpretive issues 15-7
(a) The categorisation function: Allocating legislation to functional areas 15-7
(i) Presumptions and politics 15-8
(ii) A functional approach 15-10
(iii) The purpose and effect of the legislation 15-12
(iv) An historical approach 15-12
(b) Interpreting the scope of the section 44(2) override 15-13
(c) Interpreting the scope of the incidental power 15-14
(i) The current source of the incidental power 15-14
(ii) Implicit use of the incidental power in 'DVB Behuising' 15-14
(iii) Approaching the incidental power 15-17
(iv) Is there a point beyond which the incidental power cannot go as implied by the minority judgement in 'DVB Behuising'? 15-20
(v) Another approach 15-20
(vi) The scope of the incidental power in relation to schedule 5 competences 15-20
(d) When is competence tested? 15-21

16 Conflicts

Victoria Bronstein

16.1 Introduction 16-1
(a) Textual background 16-2
(b) Political background 16-2
16.2 Overview of legislative conflict in areas of concurrent competence 16-4
16.3 The threshold question: When does conflict exist between national legislation and provincial legislation? 16-5
(a) A preliminary issue: the relevance of comparative jurisprudence 16-5
(b) Test for direct conflict 16-5
(c) Pre-emption 16-9
(d) How should the question of a conflict between provincial legislation and national legislation be handled under the Final Constitution? 16-11
(i) Protecting deliberate regulatory space 16-11
(ii) Finding inconsistency where the 'limits are shifted' 16-14
(e) Justifying this approach in the light of FC s 150 16-16
16.4 Does the national legislation prevail in terms of FC s 146? Creating meaningful federalism 16-17
(a) General 16-17
(i) Language 16-17
(ii) The drafting history 16-18
(iii) Function and democracy 16-19
(iv) Form of analysis 16-19
(b) Interpreting the constituent clauses of FC s 146 16-21
(i) Uniform application of national legislation 16-21
(ii) National overrides 16-21
(aa) Deference 16-21
(bb) Matters that cannot be regulated effectively by individual provinces 16-21

(cc) Framework legislation 16-24
(dd) Necessity 16-25
(ee) Preventing unreasonable action by a province 16-28
16.5 FC s 148: When the court cannot decide whether national legislation prevails 16-29
16.6 Subordinate national legislation and provincial legislation 16-29
16.7 Conflicts between national legislation and a provincial constitution 16-29
16.8 Conflicts in Schedule 5 areas 16-31
16.9 Building genuine co-operative government: Do courts possess a residual power to invalidate legislation on federalism grounds in the absence of legislative conflict? 16-31

17 National Legislative Authority

Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga

17.1 Introduction 17–1
17.2 Composition of Parliament 17–2
(a) The National Assembly 17–2
(b) The National Council of Provinces 17–4
(i) Composition and electoral system 17–5
(ii) The National Council of Provinces and the legislative process 17–6
(c) Membership and defections 17–11
(d) The relationship between the NA and the NCOP 17–13
17.3 The National Legislative Process 17–14
(a) Bills amending the Constitution 17–14
(b) Bills affecting the provinces 17–22
(c) Bills not affecting the provinces 17–26
(d) Money Bills and the Division of Revenue Bill 17–27
(e) Presidential assent and publication 17–28
(f) Challenges by the President or MPs 17–31
(i) FC s 79: Referral by the President 17–31
(ii) FC s 80: Referral by MPs 17–32
17.4 Timing of Challenges to Legislation 17–33
(a) While a Bill is being deliberated on by Parliament 17–34
(b) After a Bill has been passed by Parliament, but before the President has assented 17–36
(c) After a Bill is assented to, but before it comes into force 17–37
17.5 Substantive Constraints on Legislative Authority 17–38
(a) Federalism constraints 17–38
(b) Fundamental rights constraints 17–39
(c) Extraterritorial competence constraints 17–43
(d) Separation of powers constraints 17–43
(e) Delegation constraints 17–45
(i) Delegation to the executive 17–45
(ii) Delegation to provincial legislatures and municipal councils 17–51
(iii) Sub-delegation 17–52
(iv) Reviewing delegated powers 17–55
(f) Constraints imposed by the legality principle 17–56

(i) Rationality 17–57
(ii) Vagueness 17–58
(g) Constraints on the power to amend the Constitution. 17–60
17.6 Procedural Constraints on Legislative Authority 17–63
(a) Public Participation 17–64
(i) Jurisdiction, standing and timing 17–64
(ii) The place of public participation in the South African democracy and the reasonableness enquiry. 17–66
(aa) The Doctors for Life majority 17–67
(bb) The Doctors for Life dissents 17–70
(cc) Application of reasonableness standard. 17–72
(1) Doctors for Life 17–72
(2) Matatiele II 17–73
(3) Merafong 17–74
(4) Poverty Alleviation Network 17–75
(5) Glenister II 17–77
(iii) Assessment 17–77
(b) Tagging 17–83
(i) The appropriate test 17–84
(ii) Consequences of mistaken tagging 17–86
(iii) Discussion. 17–88
(c) Bills requiring extra-parliamentary consultation 17–90
17.7 Internal Regulation of Parliament 17–91
(a) Control over the internal proceedings of Parliament 17–91
(b) Rules and orders of the National Assembly and the NCOP 17–96
(i) The limits on Parliament's rule-making power 17–97
(ii) The consequences of non-compliance with the rules. 17–102
(c) Parliamentary privilege 17–102
17.8 Political Parties. 17–106
(a) Public or private 17–107
(b) The role of political parties in the legislative process. 17–109

18 The President and the National Executive

Christina Murray & Richard Stacey

18.1 Introduction. 18-1
18.2 The President as Head of State and Head of the National Executive. 18-4
(a) Distinguishing the President as Head of State and as Head of the National Executive 18-5
(b) The President as Head of State 18-8
(c) The President as Head of the national executive 18-16
(i) Specific powers allocated by the Constitution to the President as head of the national executive. 18-17
(ii) Allocating portfolios, transferring functions under FC s 97 and temporary assignment of functions under FC s 98 18-20
(iii) Review of executive decisions taken by the President as head of the national executive. 18-21

(d) Formalities and executive decision making by the President — FC s 101. 18-21
(e) Appointment, end of term and removal 18-23
(f) The President in court 18-25
18.3 Cabinet 18-27
(a) Appointment and dismissal of Cabinet members and Deputy Ministers and assignment of portfolios 18-27
(b) The President, the Presidency and Cabinet committees 18-29
(c) Powers of Cabinet 18-30
(d) A collaborative venture — Cabinet decision making 18-32
(i) Cabinet solidarity 18-32
(ii) Executive decision-making 18-35
(iii) Accountability and responsibility 18-38
(iv) Who is bound by Cabinet solidarity and for what are Cabinet members accountable? 18-39
(e) Individual ministerial accountability 18-40
(f) Outsourcing, privatisation and Cabinet accountability 18-43
(i) Outsourcing arrangements 18-44
(ii) Privatisation 18-46
(g) Votes of no confidence under FC s 102 18-50
(h) Ethics 18-51
(i) The Minister of Finance 18-52
(j) Executive control of the defence force 18-53
(k) Foreign affairs 18-55
(l) Assignment and delegation of executive powers under FC ss 99 and 238 18-60
18.4 Multisphere Government 18-63
(a) FC ss 100 and 139: Interventions in provinces and municipalities 18-64
(b) FC s 125 18-65

19 Provincial Legislative Authority

Tshepo Madlingozi & Stuart Woolman

19.1 Composition of Provincial Legislatures 19–1
(a) Composition and electoral system 19–1
(b) Duration and dissolution 19–2
(c) Qualifications, defections and membership 19–2
(d) Structures and procedures 19–4
(i) Committees 19–4
(ii) Office bearers 19–4
(iii) Organization of business 19–5
19.2 Provincial legislative process 19–5
(a) Decisions 19–5
(b) Ordinary bills and money bills 19–5
(i) Process for ordinary bills 19–6
(ii) Process for money bills 19–6
(c) Assent by the Premier 19–6
19.3 Substantive constraints on provincial legislative authority 19–7
(a) Conflicts and override 19–7

(i) Exclusive provincial legislative competence 19–7
(ii) Concurrent national and provincial legislative competence 19–8
(b) Provincial constitutions 19–10
(c) Co-operative government 19–11
(d) Fundamental rights and the rule of law 19–12
19.4 Delegation 19–12
(a) Parliament to Provincial Legislature 19–12
(b) Provincial Legislature to Provincial Executive 19–13
19.5 Assignment to Local Government 19–14
19.6 Abstract review of Bills and Acts 19–15
19.7 Powers and privileges of Provincial Legislature 19–16
(a) Control over internal proceedings 19–16
(b) Rules and orders 19–16
(c) Privilege 19–16
(d) Public participation and petitions 19–17
19.8 Provincial Legislatures and the National Council of Provinces 19–18

(iii) Intergovernmental Relation Committees of Ministers and Members of Executive Councils ('MINMECs') . . . 14–27
(iv) Forum for South African Directors–General ('FOSAD') . . . 14–28
(v) Fiscal and Financial Commision . . . 14–28
(vi) The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act . . . 14–29
(vii) The Division of Revenue Act and the Explanatory Memorandum for the Division of Revenue . . . 14–29
(viii) The Public Financial Management Act . . . 14–30
(ix) The Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act . . . 14–30
(x) The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Government Act . . . 14–30
(xi) Medium Term Budget Policy Statement (MTBPS) and Medium Term Expenditure Framework (MTEF) . . . 14–31
(xii) Provincial intervention in local government . . . 14–31
(c) An Assessment of Intergovernmental Relations and Co-operative Government by the State and Civil Society . . . 14–32
14.5 The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 . . . 14–34
(a) The Purpose of the Act . . . 14–34
(b) A Reasonable Period for Promulgation of the IGFRA? . . . 14–35
(c) How the IGRFA Works . . . 14–36
(i) The Main Forums for Intergovernmental Cooperation and Coordination . . . 14–36
(ii) Implementation Protocols . . . 14–35
(iii) Settlement of Intergovernmental Disputes . . . 14–39
(d) What Disputes the IGFRA Does Not Cover . . . 14–41
(i) Conflicts between National Legislation and Provincial Legislation . . . 14–41
(ii) Intra-governmental Disputes between Provincial Departments . . . 14–42
(aa) The Problem . . . 14–42
(bb) Executive Authority of Provinces . . . 14–47
(cc) A Lack of Departmental Personality . . . 14–48
(dd) Finding a Legal Nexus . . . 14–50
(ee) Using The IGRFA as a Guide to Intra-Governmental Disputes . . . 14–51
(ff) Dispute Settlement . . . 14–51
(gg) Enforcement . . . 14–52
(e) Practical Problems with the IGFRA: Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums and the District Intergovernmental Forums . . . 14–52
(f) ANC Dominance and the Efficacy of the IGFRA . . . 14–54

15 Legislative Competence

Victoria Bronstein

15.1 Introduction . . . 15-1
15.2 The legislative authority of the Republic . . . 15-2
(a) Schedule 4 — Concurrent legislative competence . . . 15-3
(b) Schedule 5 — Exclusive provincial legislative competence . . . 15-4
(c) Exclusive national legislative competence and assignment of powers by the national legislature . . . 15-5
(d) Other provincial legislative powers . . . 15-5

15.3 Interpretive issues 15-7
(a) The categorisation function: Allocating legislation to functional areas 15-7
(i) Presumptions and politics 15-8
(ii) A functional approach 15-10
(iii) The purpose and effect of the legislation 15-12
(iv) An historical approach 15-12
(b) Interpreting the scope of the section 44(2) override 15-13
(c) Interpreting the scope of the incidental power 15-14
(i) The current source of the incidental power 15-14
(ii) Implicit use of the incidental power in 'DVB Behuising' 15-14
(iii) Approaching the incidental power 15-17
(iv) Is there a point beyond which the incidental power cannot go as implied by the minority judgement in 'DVB Behuising'? 15-20
(v) Another approach 15-20
(vi) The scope of the incidental power in relation to schedule 5 competences 15-20
(d) When is competence tested? 15-21

16 Conflicts

Victoria Bronstein

16.1 Introduction 16–1
(a) Textual background 16–1
(b) Political background 16–2
16.2 An Overview of legislative conflict in areas of concurrent competence 16–4
16.3 The threshold question: When does conflict exist between national legislation and provincial legislation? 16–5
(a) A preliminary issue: The relevance of comparative jurisprudence 16–5
(b) Test for direct conflict 16–5
(c) Pre-emption 16–8
(d) How should the question of a conflict between provincial and national legislation be dealt with under the Final Constitution? 16–10
(i) Protecting deliberate regulatory space 16–10
(ii) Finding inconsistency where the 'limits are shifted' 16–12
(e) Justifying this approach in the light of FC s 150 16–13
16.4 Does the national legislation prevail in terms of FC ss 146? Creating meaningful federalism 16–14
(a) General 16–15
(i) Language 16–15
(ii) The drafting history 16–15
(iii) Function and democracy 16–16
(b) Interpreting the constituent clauses of FC s 146 16–17
(i) Uniform application of national legislation 16–17
(ii) The national overrides 16–17
(aa) Deference 16–17
(bb) Matters that cannot be regulated effectively by provinces 16–18
(cc) Framework legislation 16–20
(dd) Necessity 16–21

(ee) Preventing unreasonable action by a province 16–24
16.5 When the court cannot decide 16–25
16.6 Subordinate national and provincial legislation 16–25
16.7 Conflicts between national legislation and a provincial constitution 16–26
16.8 Conflict in Schedule 5 areas 16–27
16.9 Building genuine co-operative government: Do courts possess a residual power to invalidate legislation on federalism grounds in the absence of legislative conflict? 16–27

17 National Legislative Authority

Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga

17.1 Introduction 17–1
17.2 Composition of Parliament 17–2
(a) The National Assembly 17–2
(b) The National Council of Provinces 17–4
(i) Composition and electoral system 17–5
(ii) The National Council of Provinces and the legislative process 17–6
(c) Membership and defections 17–11
(d) The relationship between the NA and the NCOP 17–13
17.3 The National Legislative Process 17–14
(a) Bills amending the Constitution 17–14
(b) Bills affecting the provinces 17–22
(c) Bills not affecting the provinces 17–26
(d) Money Bills and the Division of Revenue Bill 17–27
(e) Presidential assent and publication 17–28
(f) Challenges by the President or MPs 17–31
(i) FC s 79: Referral by the President 17–31
(ii) FC s 80: Referral by MPs 17–32
17.4 Timing of Challenges to Legislation 17–33
(a) While a Bill is being deliberated on by Parliament 17–34
(b) After a Bill has been passed by Parliament, but before the President has assented 17–36
(c) After a Bill is assented to, but before it comes into force 17–37
17.5 Substantive Constraints on Legislative Authority 17–38
(a) Federalism constraints 17–38
(b) Fundamental rights constraints 17–39
(c) Extraterritorial competence constraints 17–43
(d) Separation of powers constraints 17–43
(e) Delegation constraints 17–45
(i) Delegation to the executive 17–45
(ii) Delegation to provincial legislatures and municipal councils 17–51
(iii) Sub-delegation 17–52
(iv) Reviewing delegated powers 17–55
(f) Constraints imposed by the legality principle 17–56
(i) Rationality 17–57
(ii) Vagueness 17–58

(g) Constraints on the power to amend the Constitution. 17–60
17.6 Procedural Constraints on Legislative Authority 17–63
(a) Public Participation 17–64
(i) Jurisdiction, standing and timing 17–64
(ii) The place of public participation in the South African democracy and the reasonableness enquiry. 17–66
(aa) The Doctors for Life majority 17–67
(bb) The Doctors for Life dissents 17–70
(cc) Application of reasonableness standard. 17–72
(1) Doctors for Life 17–72
(2) Matatiele II 17–73
(3) Merafong 17–74
(4) Poverty Alleviation Network 17–75
(5) Glenister II 17–77
(iii) Assessment 17–77
(b) Tagging 17–83
(i) The appropriate test 17–84
(ii) Consequences of mistaken tagging 17–86
(iii) Discussion. 17–88
(c) Bills requiring extra-parliamentary consultation 17–90
17.7 Internal Regulation of Parliament 17–91
(a) Control over the internal proceedings of Parliament 17–91
(b) Rules and orders of the National Assembly and the NCOP 17–96
(i) The limits on Parliament's rule-making power 17–97
(ii) The consequences of non-compliance with the rules. 17–102
(c) Parliamentary privilege 17–102
17.8 Political Parties. 17–106
(a) Public or private 17–107
(b) The role of political parties in the legislative process. 17–109

18 The President and the National Executive

Christina Murray & Richard Stacey

18.1 Introduction. 18-1
18.2 The President as Head of State and Head of the National Executive. 18-4
(a) Distinguishing the President as Head of State and as Head of the National Executive 18-5
(b) The President as Head of State 18-8
(c) The President as Head of the national executive 18-16
(i) Specific powers allocated by the Constitution to the President as head of the national executive. 18-17
(ii) Allocating portfolios, transferring functions under FC s 97 and temporary assignment of functions under FC s 98 18-20
(iii) Review of executive decisions taken by the President as head of the national executive. 18-21
(d) Formalities and executive decision making by the President — FC s 101. 18-21
(e) Appointment, end of term and removal 18-23

(f) The President in court 18-25
18.3 Cabinet 18-27
(a) Appointment and dismissal of Cabinet members and Deputy Ministers and assignment of portfolios 18-27
(b) The President, the Presidency and Cabinet committees 18-29
(c) Powers of Cabinet 18-30
(d) A collaborative venture — Cabinet decision making 18-32
(i) Cabinet solidarity 18-32
(ii) Executive decision-making 18-35
(iii) Accountability and responsibility 18-38
(iv) Who is bound by Cabinet solidarity and for what are Cabinet members accountable? 18-39
(e) Individual ministerial accountability 18-40
(f) Outsourcing, privatisation and Cabinet accountability 18-43
(i) Outsourcing arrangements 18-44
(ii) Privatisation 18-46
(g) Votes of no confidence under FC s 102 18-50
(h) Ethics 18-51
(i) The Minister of Finance 18-52
(j) Executive control of the defence force 18-53
(k) Foreign affairs 18-55
(l) Assignment and delegation of executive powers under FC ss 99 and 238 18-60
18.4 Multisphere Government 18-63
(a) FC ss 100 and 139: Interventions in provinces and municipalities 18-64
(b) FC s 125 18-65

19 Provincial Legislative Authority

Tshepo Madlingozi & Stuart Woolman

19.1 Composition of Provincial Legislatures 19–1
(a) Composition and electoral system 19–1
(b) Duration and dissolution 19–2
(c) Qualifications, defections and membership 19–2
(d) Structures and procedures 19–4
(i) Committees 19–4
(ii) Office bearers 19–4
(iii) Organization of business 19–5
19.2 Provincial legislative process 19–5
(a) Decisions 19–5
(b) Ordinary bills and money bills 19–5
(i) Process for ordinary bills 19–6
(ii) Process for money bills 19–6
(c) Assent by the Premier 19–6
19.3 Substantive constraints on provincial legislative authority 19–7
(a) Conflicts and override 19–7
(i) Exclusive provincial legislative competence 19–7
(ii) Concurrent national and provincial legislative competence 19–8

(b) Provincial constitutions 19–10
(c) Co-operative government 19–11
(d) Fundamental rights and the rule of law 19–12
19.4 Delegation 19–12
(a) Parliament to Provincial Legislature 19–12
(b) Provincial Legislature to Provincial Executive 19–13
19.5 Assignment to Local Government 19–14
19.6 Abstract review of Bills and Acts 19–15
19.7 Powers and privileges of Provincial Legislature 19–16
(a) Control over internal proceedings 19–16
(b) Rules and orders 19–16
(c) Privilege 19–16
(d) Public participation and petitions 19–17
19.8 Provincial Legislatures and the National Council of Provinces 19–18

20 Provincial Executive Authority

Christina Murray & Okeyrebea Ampofo-Anti

20.1 Introduction 20–1
20.2 Premier 20–2
(a) Appointment and removal 20–2
(b) Powers and functions 20–5
20.3 Executive councils 20–6
(a) Composition, appointment and removal 20–6
(b) Powers and functions 20–9
(c) The role of MECs 20–12
(d) The Executive Council and provincial administration 20–13
(e) Oversight by provincial legislatures 20–15
(f) Ethical accountability 20–16
(g) Salaries 20–19
20.4 Provincial executives and multi-sphere government 20–20
(a) Provincial executives and the national sphere of government 20–21
(i) Law-making 20–21
(ii) Provincial budgets, the Budget Council and the annual Division of Revenue Act 20–23
(iii) Subordinate legislation 20–24
(iv) Police 20–25
(v) Oversight 20–26
(vi) Assignment 20–27
(b) Provincial executives and the local sphere of government 20–27
(i) IGR responsibilities 20–30
(ii) FC s 139 20–31
(c) Provincial executives and traditional leaders 20–33

Volume 2

21 Provincial Constitutions

Stuart Woolman

21.1 Introduction 21–2
21.2 The content of a provincial constitution 21–5
(a) The basic architecture of the FC ss 142 and 143 21–5
(b) The requirement of legislative competence 21–9
(c) The limits of difference: structures and procedures and powers 21–11
(d) Consistency clauses 21–13
(e) Suspensive clauses 21–13
21.3 Certification of a provincial constitutional text 21–14
21.4 Provincial constitution certification cases 21–15
(a) Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 21–15
(b) First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape 21–17
21.5 Conflicts between provincial constitutions and national legislation or the Final Constitution 21–18

22 Local Government

Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser

22.1 Introduction 22–1
(a) History 22–1
(b) Comparative constitutional recognition 22–5
(c) Process of constitutionalization. 22–7
(d) Statutory framework 22–12
(e) Constitutional amendments 22–13
(f) Local self-government 22–15
22.2 Municipal Governance 22–16
(a) Establishment of municipalities. 22–16
(i) Boundaries. 22–17
(ii) Categories of municipalities 22–18
(iii) Types 22–20
(iv) Official languages 22–23
(b) Municipal elections 22–24
(i) Term of office of municipal councils 22–24
(ii) Electoral system 22–24
(iii) Membership. 22–27
(c) Political structures and procedures 22–32
(i) Constitutional development 22–32
(ii) Municipal Council. 22–35
(iii) Executive 22–40
(iv) Traditional leaders 22–41
22.3 Municipal Powers and Functions 22–42
(a) Introduction 22–42
(b) FC section 151(3) 22–43
(i) 'Right to govern' 22–43
(ii) 'On its own initiative' 22–45
(iii) 'Local government affairs of its community' 22–46
(iv) 'Subject to national and provincial legislation' 22–49
(v) 'As provided for in the Constitution' 22–50
(vi) National powers and provincial powers over original local government matters 22–51
(c) Division of powers and functions within local government 22–58
(d) Additional powers and functions 22–58
22.4 Municipal Services 22–63
(a) Scope of municipal services 22–64
(b) Obligation to provide basic services 22–66
(c) Realising socio-economic rights through service provision 22–72
(d) Method of providing services 22–73
(e) Reciprocal nature of providing services: duty to pay for consumption. . 22–73
(i) The power to charge fees 22–73
(ii) The nature of the tariff setting. 22–75
(iii) The duty to charge fees? 22–76
(iv) Duty to pay fees. 22–77

(v) Duty to collect debts and the constitutionality of enforcement mechanisms. . . . 22–78
22.5 Municipal Revenue Raising Powers . . . 22–81
(a) Introduction . . . 22–81
(b) Fiscal powers and responsibility for financial health. . . . 22–82
(c) Constitutional nature of the revenue-raising powers . . . 22–85
(i) Original powers . . . 22–85
(ii) Legislative powers. . . . 22–85
(iii) Division of powers between district and local municipalities . . . 22–86
(iv) Discretionary powers . . . 22–87
(v) Authorisation of further taxing powers . . . 22–88
(d) Supervision of the exercise of a municipality's revenue-raising powers. . . 22–89
(i) Regulatory framework . . . 22–89
(ii) Procedure for adoption . . . 22–90
(iii) Material impact of the exercise of revenue-raising powers . . . 22–92
(e) Rates . . . 22–95
(i) Defining property rates . . . 22–95
(aa) Municipal powers over the setting and collection of rates . . . 22–95
(bb) The process of determining market value of properties . . . 22–98
(f) Surcharges . . . 22–100
(g) Other taxes, levies and duties . . . 22–100
(h) Borrowing . . . 22–101
(i) Short-term debt . . . 22–102
(ii) Long-term debt . . . 22–103
(i) Transfers . . . 22–104
(j) Equitable share . . . 22–104
(i) Nature of entitlement . . . 22–104
(ii) Prescribed process . . . 22–106
(iii) Substantive principles. . . . 22–106
(iv) Payment and withholding of equitable share . . . 22–108
(v) Usage of equitable share . . . 22–110
(k) Conditional grants. . . . 22–110
(l) Provincial transfers . . . 22–111
22.6 Supervision of Municipalities. . . . 22–111
(a) Introduction . . . 22–111
(i) Increasing of supervisory powers . . . 22–112
(ii) Supervision as a single process . . . 22–113
(iii) Dual responsibility for supervision . . . 22–114
(b) Supervision process: monitoring and support. . . . 22–115
(i) Monitoring . . . 22–115
(ii) Support . . . 22–116
(c) Interventions. . . . 22–118
(d) Regular intervention in terms of FC s 139(1) . . . 22–118
(i) Substantive requirement. . . . 22–118
(ii) Measures of intervention. . . . 22–119

(iii) Issuing a directive 22–120
(iv) Assumption of responsibility 22–120
(v) Dissolution of council 22–122
(e) Dissolution of council after failure to pass a budget or revenue raising measures in terms of FC s 139(4) 22–123
(f) Imposition of a financial recovery plan after a financial crisis in terms of FC s 139(5) 22–125
22.7 Co-operative Government 22–126
(a) Constitutional framework 22–126
(i) Local government as a sphere of government 22–126
(ii) Organised local government 22–127
(iii) National Council of Provinces 22–128
(iv) Financial and Fiscal Commission 22–130
(b) Principles and statutory provisions of cooperative government 22–131
(c) Duty of support 22–132
(d) Duty to consult 22–133
(i) Information sharing 22–134
(ii) Consultation 22–134
(iii) Providing opportunities for representation 22–135
(iv) Consultation — seeking out the views of other parties 22–135
(v) Use of consultative forums 22–136

23A Public Administration

Anshal Bodasing

23A.1 Principles and objectives of public administration in a constitutional democracy 23A–3
23A.2 Structure and function: FC Chapter 10 . . . . . 23A–7
23A.3 FC s 195: Values and principles governing Public Administration 23A–8
23A.4 Judicial constructions of FC s 195 . . . . . 23A–9
23A.5 Application of FC s 195(1) 23A–16
23A.6 FC s 196: The Public Service Commission 23A–17
23A.7 The Public Service Commision Report 23A–20
23A.8 FC s 197: The Public Service 23A–22

23B Security Services

Stu Woolman

23B.1 Introduction 23B–1
23B.2 Historical Background: Transformation and the Development of the Post-Apartheid Security Services 23B–4
23B.3 The South African Police Service 23B–9
(a) Composition, structure and mandate 23B–9
(b) Control and management 23B–11
(c) The SAPS and fundamental rights 23B–12
(i) Use of force by the police 23B–12
(aa) Govender and Walters 23B–13
(bb) Changes to CPA s 49 in light of Walters 23B–15

(cc) Shoot to Kill? Proposed Amendments Designed to Undermine Constitutionally Mandated Changes to CPA s 49 . . . . . 23B–16
(ii) Human rights violations by the police. 23B–18
(iii) Duty to protect the public 23B–21
(aa) Carmichele and K 23B–21
(bb) F: The rollback of Carmichele and K? 23B–25
(cc) Novel uses of cost orders as constitutional remedies 23B–29
(d) Limitations on the rights of SAPS members. 23B–31
(e) Accountability and Oversight. 23B–35
(i) Executive and parliamentary oversight 23B–35
(ii) Independent Complaints Directorate 23B–37
(iii) Community Policing Forums. 23B–41
(iv) Police malfeasance, incompetence and corruption. 23B–41
(aa) The Auditor-General's Report on Police Service Delivery (2009) 23B–42
(bb) Public Protector's Report (2011): Against the Rules. 23B–42
(cc) Special Investigative Unit 2011 Preliminary Reports. 23B–43
23B.4 The South African National Defence Force 23B–44
(a) Composition, structure and functions 23B–44
(b) Civil military relations 23B–45
(c) Military discipline 23B–47
(d) Limitations on the rights of SANDF members 23B–48
23B.5 South African Intelligence Services. 23B–54
(a) Composition, structure and functions 23B–54
(b) Control, oversight and accountability 23B–56
(i) Parliamentary oversight 23B–56
(ii) Inspector-General. 23B–57
(iii) The National Intelligence Co-ordinating Committee. 23B–61
(iv) Executive control and oversight 23B–61
(c) Rights issues facing the intelligence agencies. 23B–66
(i) Interception of private communications 23B–66
(ii) Compliance with the principle of open justice. 23B–68
(aa) MISS and the missing Open Democracy Bill. 23B–68
(bb) Independent Newspapers and the principle of open justice 23B–68
(iii) The Protection of Information Bill: A necessary evil with potential constitutional infringements. 23B–76
23B.6 Other Role Players in the Security Sector 23B–81
(a) The Directorate for Special Operations ('DSO' or 'Scorpions') 23B–81
(b) Directorate of Priority Crimes Investigation ('DPCI' or 'Hawks') 23B–83
(i) Powers and functions of the DPCI. 23B–83
(ii) Glenister I: Not ripe enough 23B–84
(iii) Between Glenister I and Glenister II: Legality, rationality review and an anti-domination doctrine 23B–85
(iv) Glenister II: Rights, duties, international law, reasonableness review and a principle of anti-corruption. 23B–88
(c) Electronic Communications (Pty) Ltd ('Comsec') 23B–91

(d) National Communications Centre ('NCC') 23B–92
(e) Office for Interception Centres ('OIC') 23B–92

23C War Powers

Stephen Ellmann

23C.1 Introduction 23C–1
23C.2 Procedural requirements for a State of National Defence. 23C–4
23C.3 Powers granted by the Declaration of a State of National Defence 23C–9
(a) Presidential powers in a state of national defence 23C–9
(b) Parliament's authority to limit the President's powers. 23C–11
(c) Limits on human rights during a state of national defence 23C–13
23C.4 Hostilities without a Declaration of a State of National Defence 23C–17
23C.5 Power of the purse: Parliament's budgetary powers. 23C–21
23C.6 War powers as constitutionally exceptional powers 23C–26

24A Public Protector

Michael Bishop & Stuart Woolman

24A.1 Historical background. 24A–1
24A.2 Nature of the office 24A–2
24A.3 Independence 24A–4
(a) Appointment and removal 24A–4
(b) Financial independence and political autonomy 24A–5
24A.4 Complaints and investigations 24A–7
(a) Jurisdiction. 24A–7
(i) General 24A–7
(ii) Judicial functions 24A–9
(iii) Legislative and executive matters. 24A–10
(b) Manner and method of investigation 24A–12
(i) Types of investigations. 24A–12
(ii) Confidentiality 24A–13
(aa) During investigations 24A–13
(bb) After investigations 24A–14
(iii) Powers of search and seizure. 24A–15
(iv) Other powers 24A–16
(v) Outcomes of investigations. 24A–16
24A.5 Ancillary functions of the public protector. 24A–17
(a) Public reporting 24A–17
(b) Alternative dispute resolution. 24A–17
24A.6 Access, efficacy and forum shopping. 24A–18

24B Auditor-General

Stuart Woolman & Yolandi Schutte

24B.1 Introduction. 24B–1
24B.2 Independence of the Auditor-General. 24B–4
24B.3 Functions of the Auditor-General 24B–7
(a) Constitutional and statutory duties to report 24B–7

(b) Ad hoc investigative powers 24B–13

24C South African Human Rights Commission

Jonathan Klaaren

24C.1 Introduction. 24C–2
24C.2 SAHRC after ten years 24C–3
(a) Political and organisational history. 24C–3
(b) Institutional structures 24C–5
24C.3 Powers and functions of the SAHRC 24C–6
(a) Overview 24C–6
(b) Promotion: public education and information 24C–6
(c) Protection: mediation, adjudication, litigation and interpretation 24C–7
(i) Mediation 24C–7
(ii) Adjudication/litigation/interpretation 24C–7
(d) Respect and fulfil: Monitoring 24C–9
(i) Monitoring: socio-economic rights 24C–9
(ii) Monitoring: remedial orders of court 24C–10
(iii) Monitoring: Investigations and hearings 24C–10
24C.4 SAHRC and Chapter Nine Constitutional Doctrine 24C–11
(a) Separation of powers 24C–11
(b) Independence and accountability 24C–13
(c) Duty of state organs to assist and protect 24C–15
(d) Relationship of constitutional empowerment provisions to establishment legislation. 24C–16
(e) Subject matter jurisdiction 24C–17
(f) Appointment and removal of persons. 24C–18

24D The Commission for Gender Equality

Catherine Albertyn

24D.1 Introduction. 24D-1
24D.2 What is the Commission for Gender Equality (CGE)? 24D-1
24D.3 The independent nature of the CGE. 24D-3
24D.4 Gender equality 24D-3
24D.5 Scope of mandate and functions 24D-5

(a) The monitoring function 24D-5
(b) The educative function 24D-7
(c) The investigative function 24D-7
(d) The advocacy and advisory function 24D-8
(e) The litigation function 24D-9
24D.6 The CGE, democracy and the achievement of gender equality 24D-10

24E Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)

Justine White

24E.1 Broadcasting in the apartheid era 24E–1
24E.2 Broadcasting in transition and the independence of the Broadcast Regulator 24E–2
(a) Interim Constitution 24E–3
(b) Final Constitution 24E–3
(c) International best practise 24E–5
24E.3 The Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA) . . . 24E–7
(a) Appointment and removal of councillors 24E–7
(b) Legislative provisions regarding the powers, duties and independence of ICASA in the regulation of broadcasting 24E–9
(c) Legislative provisions regarding the powers, duties and independence of ICASA in the regulation of telecommunications 24E–11
(d) Policy formation 24E–12
(e) Regulation making. 24E–12
(f) Licensing and pro-competitive determinations. 24E–13
24E.4 ICASA: The challenge of convergence 24E–15

24F The Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities

Stuart Woolman & Julie Soweto Aullo

24F.1 Introduction 24F–1
24F.2 Political background 24F–1
24F.3 Constitutional negotiations, the peculiar history of FC s 185 and the travaux preparatoire for the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Act 24F–4
24F.4 The CRLC 24F–10
(a) Objectives of the CRLC 24F–10
(b) Composition of the CRLC. 24F–11
(c) Mandate and functions of the CRLC 24F–12
(d) Public education and information 24F–13
(e) Investigation and dispute resolution 24F–14
(i) Power to intervene 24F–14
(ii) Complaints and complaint mechanisms. 24F–15
(iii) Requests for intervention. 24F–16
(f) National Consultative Conference 24F–16
(g) Funding 24F–17

(b) Co-operation between the CRLC, other institutions and organs of state 24F–18
(i) Cultural councils 24F–19

25 Public Procurement

Glenn Penfold & Pippa Reyburn

25.1 Introduction: Public procurement as a constitutional principle. 25-1
25.2 The constitutional procurement provisions 25-2
(a) Interim Constitution (IC) 25-2
(b) Final Constitution (FC) 25-3
(c) Application of FC s 217 25-4
(i) 'Organs of state in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'. 25-4
(ii) 'Any other institution identified in national legislation' 25-7
(iii) The meaning of the phrase 'contracts for goods or services' 25-7
25.3 The five principles 25-8
(a) The implications of the principles for public tenders. 25-8
(b) Fairness and equitability. 25-9
(c) Transparency 25-11
(d) Competitiveness and cost-effectiveness 25-11
(e) The principles should be taken as a whole. 25-12
25.4 Preferential procurement. 25-12
(a) Introduction 25-12
(b) Preferential procurement in the Constitution 25-13
(c) The Preferential Procurement Policy Framework Act (PPPFA) 25-13
(i) Application of the PPPFA. 25-13
(ii) Preferential procurement policies 25-15
(iii) Preference points system 25-16
(iv) Specific goals 25-17
(v) Other evaluation criteria 25-18
(vi) Remedies for non-compliance 25-19
(d) PPPFA Regulations. 25-19
(i) Application of preference points system 25-20
(ii) Permissible preferences 25-21
(iii) Equity ownership as a peremptory preference 25-21
(iv) RDP goals. 25-22
(v) Sub-contracting and penalties. 25-22
25.5 The role of the tender boards 25-23
(a) Introduction 25-23
(b) Powers of the State Tender Board 25-24
(c) The diminishing role of tender boards. 25-25
(d) Consequences of non-compliance 25-26
25.6 Municipal procurement. 25-26
(a) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles 25-26
(b) Municipal service provision 25-27
25.7 Public-private partnerships 25-29
(a) Introduction 25-29

(b) Legislative framework 25-29
(c) Applicability of constitutional procurement principles and procurement legislation 25-30
25.8 Procurement and the right to just administrative action 25-31
25.9 Remedies for non-compliance 25-34
(a) Introduction 25-34
(b) Invalidity 25-34
(c) Interdict 25-35
(d) Award of the contract 25-35
(e) Damages 25-35

26 Traditional Leaders

Tom Bennett & Christina Murray

26.1 Introduction 26–1
26.2 The structure of traditional government 26–4
26.3 Conquest, indirect rule and apartheid 26–8
26.4 Constitutional negotiations and the Final Constitution 26–15
26.5 Traditional government in the multi-sphere system 26–20
(a) Traditional communities and councils 26–21
(b) The Houses of traditional leaders 26–24
(i) Composition 26–25
(ii) Powers 26–27
(iii) Procedures, privileges and immunities 26–28
(c) Traditional government and the national and provincial spheres 26–30
(d) Traditional government and local government 26–34
(e) Traditional monarchs 26–41
26.6 Government in traditional areas 26–43
(a) Appointment and succession to office 26–43
(b) Territorial and personal jurisdiction 26–48
(c) Separation of powers with checks and balances 26–50
(i) Judicial powers 26–50
(ii) Legislative powers 26–53
(iii) Executive and administrative powers 26–53
(d) Land 26–56
(i) Traditional power to allot land 26–57
(ii) Traditional power to regulate common resources 26–59
(iii) Traditional powers of expropriation and confiscation 26–59
(iv) The Communal Land Rights Act 26–63
26.7 Traditional leaders: An institution in transition 26–65

27 Public Finance

Ross R Kriel & Mona Monadjem

27.1 Introduction 27–6
(a) Public Finance as a creature of the Final Constitution, statute, institutions, regulations and practice 27–6
(b) Structure of the chapter 27–7

27.2. Raising revenue 27–8
(a) Sources of revenue 27–8
(b) Raising national revenue 27–8
(c) Raising provincial revenue 27–8
(d) Raising municipal revenue 27–9
27.3 Allocating revenue 27–14
(a) Responsibility for expenditure. 27–14
(b) Functional allocation 27–14
(c) Imbalances between revenue and expenditure 27–17
(d) Equitable division of revenue 27–18
(e) Other allocation 27–21
(f) Compliance with grant conditions 27–21
(g) Unfunded mandates 27–22
27.4 The budget process 27–23
(a) Introduction 27–23
(b) Constitutional budgeting principles 27–24
(c) Legislation regulating budgets 27–28
(d) Content of budgets 27–29
27.5 Spending public funds 27–31
(a) Revenue funds 27–32
(b) Contracting 27–33
(c) Government borrowing 27–34
27.6 Monitoring and witholding public funds 27–41
(a) Regulation by National Treasury 27–41
(b) Provincial role in regulating public finance 27–46
(c) Intervention powers of the provinces 27–46
(d) Municipal financial failure 27–50
27.7 Other institutions 27–51
(a) Financial and Fiscal Commission 27–51
(b) Central Bank 27–52
27.8 Local government in South Africa's fiscal structure 27–53
(a) Focus on local government 27–53
(b) Decentralised Structure 27–54

28 Transitional Provisions on Executive Authority, Assets and Liabilities

Matthew Chaskalson

28.1 Introduction 28-1
28.2 The succession to executive authority in relation to old order legislation . . 28-2
(a) Transitional provisions in the Interim Constitution relating to executive authority 28-2
(i) Assignments of executive authority. 28-2
(ii) Administrative responsibility, executive authority and the interpretation of assigned legislation 28-6
(aa) Administration of laws and power to exercise executive authority 28-6
(bb) Interpretation of assigned legislation 28-7

(b) Transitional provisions in the Final Constitution relating to executive authority 28-8
28.3 The transfer of old order State assets and liabilities 28-9

29 Elections

Glenda Fick

29.1 Introduction 29-1
29.2 Voting in national, provincial and municipal elections 29-2
(a) Identity documents and voter registration 29-2
(b) Voting rights of prisoners 29-3
29.3 Election of national and provincial legislatures. 29-7
(a) Calling for elections. 29-7
(b) Composition of the national assembly and provincial legislatures 29-7
(c) The electoral system applicable to national and provincial elections . . . 29-9
(d) Floor-crossing and electoral systems 29-13
(e) Membership in the national and provincial legislatures 29-13
(f) Floor-crossing in the national and provincial legislatures 29-14
29.4 The Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 2003 29-19
29.5 Funding of political parties in the national and provincial legislatures. 29-21
29.6 Election of municipal councils. 29-22
(a) The electoral system applicable to municipal elections. 29-22
(b) Membership of municipal councils 29-25
(c) Floor-crossing in the municipal councils 29-25
29.7 The Electoral Commission 29-26
(a) Establishment of the Commission. 29-26
(b) Composition of the Commission 29-27
(c) Independence of the Electoral Commission. 29-28
29.8 The Electoral Court 29-30

30 International Law

Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins

30.1 International law and its relationship with domestic law 30–1
(a) The nature of international law. 30–1
(i) Definition 30–1
(ii) The transformation of international law 30–2
(b) Sources of international law 30–3
(i) Treaties 30–3
(ii) Customary international law. 30–4
(iii) General principles of law recognised by civilised nations, and judicial decisions and the writings of highly qualified publicists. 30–5
(iv) The impact of overriding principles and values 30–5
(c) The constitutionalisation of international law in South Africa. 30–6
30.2 The incorporation of international law into substantive domestic law in South Africa 30–7
(a) Customary international law as part of South African domestic law . . . 30–7
(b) Treaties and conventions as part of South African domestic law 30–9

(c) United Nations resolutions 30–11
30.3 International law as an aid to interpretation of the Bill of Rights 30–11
30.4 State conduct and obligations 30–14
(a) Jus ad bellum and jus in bello 30–14
(b) Diplomatic immunity 30–18
(c) State immunity 30–18
(d) Diplomatic protection 30–23
(e) Extradition 30–26

31 Application

Stuart Woolman

31.1 Introduction 31–1
(a) A road map 31–1
(b) Application doctrine under the Interim Constitution 31–4
(c) Application doctrine under the Final Constitution 31–6
(d) Decision Tree 1: Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–14
(e) Decision Tree 2: Khumalo v Holomisa 31–15
31.2 Application under the Interim Constitution 31–16
(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Du Plessis 31–16
(i) Facts 31–16
(ii) Holding 31–16
(b) Analysis of Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–18
(i) Court's approach to the text 31–18
(ii) An alternative approach to the text 31–19
(c) Jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–21
(d) Critique of the jurisprudence of Du Plessis v De Klerk 31–23
(i) Fortuity of form 31–23
(ii) Arbitrariness of application 31–23
(iii) An artificial defense of the status quo 31–26
(iv) Untenability of the public-private distinction 31–26
(v) Judicial boundedness 31–28
(vi) History and power 31–29
(e) Jurisprudence of unqualified direct application 31–32
31.3 Application under the Final Constitution: Benefits of the Bill of Rights . . 31–33
(a) Everyone 31–35
(i) Aliens 31–35
(ii) Individuals 31–36
(iii) Foetus 31–37
(b) Citizens 31–38
(c) Children 31–38
(d) Juristic persons 31–39
31.4 Application under the Final Constitution: Burdens of the Bill of Rights . . . 31–42
(a) Application doctrine enunciated in Khumalo v Holomisa 31–42
(i) Facts 31–42
(ii) Holding 31–43
(iii) Court's reasoning 31–43

(iv) The black letter law and the preferred reading . . . 31–45
(v) A good faith reconstruction of Khumalo v Holomisa . . . 31–47
(aa) The First objection . . . 31–48
(bb) The Second objection . . . 31–49
(cc) A Third objection . . . 31–52
(dd) A Fourth objection . . . 31–53
(b) Section 8(1) . . . 31–56
(i) What the courts say FC s 8(1) means . . . 31–56
(ii) What FC s 8(1) should mean . . . 31–56
(aa) Real meaning of 'all law' . . . 31–56
(bb) Application of FC s 8(1) to the common law . . . 31–57
(iii) The binding of the judiciary . . . 31–57
(iv) The binding of the legislature . . . 31–60
(v) The binding of the executive . . . 31–61
(vi) The binding of organs of state . . . 31–62
(c) Section 8(2) . . . 31–62
(i) What FC s 8(2) means in Khumalo v Holomisa . . . 31–62
(ii) What FC s 8(2) should mean and the courts' support for the preferred reading . . . 31–63
(iii) The preferred reading, the no-law thesis and the problem of surplusage . . . 31–70
(d) Section 8(3) . . . 31–74
(i) What the courts say FC s 8(3) means . . . 31–74
(ii) What FC s 8(3) should mean . . . 31–75
(iii) Meaningless phrases in FC s 8(3) . . . 31–76
(e) Section 39(2) . . . 31–77
(i) What FC s 39(2) means . . . 31–78
(ii) FC s 39(2) and the process of developing the common law . . . 31–78
(aa) FC s 39(2) and the over-determination of changes to the common law . . . 31–78
(bb) The obligation to develop the common law . . . 31–80
(iii) The development of the common law and the interaction between FC s 39(2) and FC ss 7, 8, 38, 167, 172 and 173, and a difference in remedies . . . 31–82
(iv) FC s 39(2) and the transformation of the common law . . . 31–86
(v) FC s 39(2) as mandatory canon of statutory interpretation . . . 31–87
(vi) Reading down . . . 31–88
(vii) Shared constitutional interpretation and FC s 39(2) . . . 31–90
(viii) An objective normative value system . . . 31–93
(ix) Customary law . . . 31–95
(x) Stare decisis . . . 31–95
(aa) Walters and Afrox . . . 31–95
(bb) After Afrox and Walters . . . 31–97
(f) Section 239: Organ of State . . . 31–100
(i) Any department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government . . . 31–101
(ii) Any other functionary or institution . . . 31–104

31.5 Application of the Bill of Rights to other sections of the Constitution . . . 31–107
31.6 Extraterritorial effect of the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution. 31–113
(a) Persons outside South Africa's borders 31–114
(b) Foreign law and the Final Constitution 31–119
31.7 The waiver of rights 31–122
(a) A category mistake 31–122
(b) Waiver and the Law of Contract as neutral backdrop 31–130
(c) The poverty of waiver 31–130
(d) The relationship between waiver and the benefits of fundamental rights 31–131
31.8 Temporal application of the Bill of Rights 31–132
(a) Retrospectivity 31–132
(b) Application of the Bill of Rights to matters pending upon commencement of the Final Constitution 31–134
Appendix: Academic Contributions to the Debate on Application 31–136
(1) Sprigman and Osborne 31–137
(2) De Waal and Currie 31–141
(3) Roederer and Hopkins. 31–146
(a) Roederer 31–146
(b) Hopkins 31–150
(4) Cheadle, Davis, Van der Walt and Ellmann 31–152
(a) Cheadle and Davis 31–152
(b) Van der Walt 31–157
(c) Ellmann 31–158

32 Interpretation

Lourens du Plessis

32.1 Introduction 32–1
(a) Aspects of Bill of Rights interpretation in pre-1994 case law 32–3
(b) Bill of Rights interpretation as depicted in early post-1994 constitutional jurisprudence 32–6
(c) Rights interpretation and/as constitutional interpretation 32–11
(d) The scope of constitutional interpretation 32–16
(e) The mechanics of rights analysis. 32–20
(i) Direct application and interpretation of a specific substantive right 32–21
(ii) Subsidiarity and indirect application as preferred modes of interpretation 32–21
32.2 Interpreters of the Constitution 32–22
(a) Constitution-makers 32–23
(b) Courts 32–24
(c) Legislative and executive organs of state 32–25
(d) Citizens and other non-state organs protected, empowered and obliged by the Constitution 32–27
32.3 Theories of interpretation and their relevance for constitutional interpretation 32–28
(a) Common-law theories of statutory interpretation 32–29
(b) Constitutional interpretation and the inadequacy of common-law theories of statutory interpretation. 32–40

(i) Constitutional democracy and the end of the dominance of literalism-cum-intentionalism . . . 32–41
(ii) The linguistic turn . . . 32–44
(iii) 'Politics': predicament or prospect? . . . 32–45
(iv) Purposive interpretation as the increasingly preferred alternative to literalism-cum-intentionalism . . . 32–52
(c) Theories of, theoretical positions on and leitmotivs in constitutional interpretation . . . 32–56
(i) Three comparative examples . . . 32–57
(ii) Theoretical position(s) in relation to interpretive leitmotiv(s) . . . 32–66
(iii) Transitional constitutionalism . . . 32–68
(aa) The Constitution as bridge: justificatory constitutionalism . . . 32–69
(bb) The Constitution as memory and promise: memorial constitutionalism . . . 32–73
(iv) Transformative constitutionalism . . . 32–79
(v) Theoretical accounts and assessments of constitutional adjudication 32–82
(d) Contemporary developments: linguistic-turn thinking and the new textualism . . . 32–86
(e) The Constitution as text sui generis among law-texts . . . 32–92
(i) The Constitution as prescriptive, abstractly-normative law-text . . . 32–93
(aa) Law as text and text(s) as law . . . 32–93
(bb) Narrative and normative law-texts . . . 32–94
(cc) Prescriptive and persuasive (normative) law-texts . . . 32–95
(dd) Abstract and concretized normative law-texts . . . 32–95
(ee) The Constitution as genre text . . . 32–96
(ii) The Constitution as supreme law . . . 32–97
(iii) The Constitution as negotiated and negotiating text . . . 32–100
32.4 The enacted Constitution-in-writing . . . 32–107
(a) The Constitution and the construction of enacted law . . . 32–108
(b) Multilingualism . . . 32–115
(c) Interpretive waymarks in the written constitutional text . . . 32–116
(i) Conspicuous waymarks . . . 32–117
(aa) The Preamble to the Final Constitution . . . 32–117
(bb) FC s 1: Founding Provisions . . . 32–119
(cc) FC s 7: Rights . . . 32–120
(dd) FC s 8: Application . . . 32–125
(ee) FC s 36: Limitation of Rights . . . 32–127
(ff) FC s 39: Interpretation of Bill of Rights . . . 32–128
(gg) FC Chapter 3: Co-operative Government . . . 32–131
(hh) FC s 195: Basic Values and Principles governing Public Administration . . . 32–132
(ii) FC s 239: Definitions . . . 32–132
(ii) Inconspicuous waymarks . . . 32–133
32.5 Methods of constitutional interpretation . . . 32–135
(a) Method(s) as doing(s) . . . 32–135
(b) Reading strategies . . . 32–136
(i) Construing the Final Constitution in a case law context . . . 32–137

(ii) Reading in conformity with the Final Constitution 32–138
(iii) Subsidiarity 32–142
(aa) Jurisdictional subsidiarity 32–146
(bb) Adjudicative subsidiarity. 32–150
(c) Method(s) as canon(s) and canon(s) as method(s) (of construction): Canon-guided reading strategies 32–159
(i) Grammatical interpretation 32–160
(ii) Systematic interpretation 32–162
(iii) Teleological interpretation 32–167
(iv) Historical interpretation. 32–170
(v) Comparative interpretation (or transnational contextualization) . . 32–171
(aa) International law 32–173
(bb) Foreign law 32–183
32.6 Constitutional interpretation in a constitutional state 32–191

33 The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights

Sandra Liebenberg

33.1 Introduction 33-1
33.2 The inclusion of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution. 33-3
(a) Drafting history 33-3
(b) Certification of the Constitution 33-4
(c) Overview of the relevant provisions protecting socio-economic rights. . 33-5
(i) Categories of socio-economic rights 33-5
(ii) The duties to respect, protect, promote and fulfil socio-economic rights. 33-6
33.3 Introduction to the major cases 33-7
33.4 General approach to the interpretation of socio-economic rights 33-8
(a) The justiciability of socio-economic rights 33-8
(b) Interpreting socio-economic rights in context 33-9
(c) International law 33-10
(d) Comparative law 33-16
33.5 Interpreting the socio-economic rights in sections 26 and 27 33-17
(a) The relation between the first and second subsections of sections 26 and 27 33-17
(b) The negative duty 'to respect' socio-economic rights. 33-17
(c) The socio-economic rights in sections 26(3) and 27(3) 33-20
(d) The right of 'access to' socio-economic rights 33-22
(e) Do sections 26 and 27 impose minimum core obligations on the State? 33-22
(i) Grootboom: Rejecting minimum core as a primary basis for adjudicating socio-economic rights 33-23
(ii) TAC: No minimum core obligation under section 27(1) 33-24
(iii) Critiques of the Court's approach. 33-27
(iv) A future role for minimum core obligations?. 33-32
(f) Opting for reasonableness review 33-32
(i) Soobramoney: The standard of rationality. 33-32
(ii) Grootboom: Developing the principles of 'reasonableness review' . . . 33-33

(iii) TAC: Applying the 'reasonableness' test 33-35
(iv) Evaluating reasonableness review 33-38
(g) Progressive realisation 33-41
(i) A national strategy and plan of action. 33-42
(ii) Retrogressive measures 33-43
(h) Within available resources 33-44
33.6 Defending State assistance to vulnerable groups 33-48
33.7 Children's socio-economic rights 33-48
33.8 The other unqualified socio-economic rights 33-52
33.9 Burden of proof 33-53
33.10 Limiting socio-economic rights 33-54
(a) Justifying limitations to socio-economic rights 33-54
(b) Resource-based reasons for limiting socio-economic rights 33-55
33.11 The horizontal application of socio-economic rights. 33-57
(a) Negative duties 33-58
(b) Positive duties 33-58
(c) Development of the common law. 33-60
33.12 Remedies 33-61
33.13 The role of the Human Rights Commission and the Commission for Gender Equality. 33-64

Volume 3

34 Limitations

Stu Woolman & Henk Botha

34.1 Introduction to limitation analysis 34–1
(a) Purpose 34–1
(b) Mechanics 34–3
(c) Shared constitutional interpretation, an appropriate normative framework and hard choices 34–6
34.2 Drafting history 34–10
(a) Evolution of the clause 34–10
(b) Foreign influences 34–12
34.3 Relationship between fundamental rights analysis and limitation analysis. . . 34–16
(a) The value-based approach and the notional approach 34–17
(b) The Constitutional Court's approach to two-stage analysis. 34–18
34.4 Internal modifiers, and their relationship to rights analysis and limitations analysis 34–30
34.5 Internal limitations, and their relationship to rights analysis and limitations analysis 34–31
(a) Internal limitations and burden shifts 34–33
(b) Internal limitations and general limitations 34–33
(i) Internal limitations in FC ss 15(3)(b), 30 and 31 34–33
(ii) Internal limitations in FC ss 9, 26 and 27 34–34
(iii) Internal limitations in FC s 25 and the collapse of stage distinctions 34–41
34.6 Burden of justification 34–42

34.7 Law of general application. 34–47
(a) The purpose and meaning of 'law of general application' 34–47
(b) The relationship between law of general application and the rule of law 34–54
(c) The specific features of law of general application. 34–55
(i) Law and conduct 34–56
(aa) Grant to and exercise of power by officials not constrained by identifiable legal standards 34–56
(bb) Commission and omission 34–58
(x) Conduct carried out under the colour of law but beyond scope of actual legal authority. 34–58
(y) The failure to discharge constitutional duties 34–60
(ii) Criteria for law of general application 34–61
(aa) Parity of treatment 34–61
(bb) Non-arbitariness 34–62
(cc) Precision or clarity 34–63
(dd) Accessibility or public availability 34–65
34.8 'Reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom' 34–67
(a) Introduction 34–67
(b) Proportionality 34–69
(c) FC s 36's five factors 34–70
(i) Nature of the right 34–70
(ii) Importance of the purpose of the limitation 34–73
(iii) Nature and extent of the limitation. 34–79
(iv) Relationship between the limitation and its purpose 34–84
(v) Less restrictive means 34–85
(aa) Narrowly tailored 34–91
(bb) Costs imposed 34–92
(cc) Extent of the limitation 34–92
(dd) Purpose of the limitation 34–92
(d) Balancing and proportionality 34–93
(i) Balancing as a bad metaphor 34–94
(aa) Definitions of balancing. 34–95
(bb) Critiques of balancing 34–95
(w) Pluralism, incommensurability and complexity 34–95
(x) Subjectivity and arbitrariness 34–99
(y) Incrementalism and conservatism 34–100
(z) Science and silence 34–101
(ii) Balancing as a benign practice 34–101
(e) A thick(er) conception of limitations analysis 34–104
(i) Shared constitutional interpretation 34–105
(ii) Norms: 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom' 34–113
(aa) Intersection, convergence, and conflict amongst constitutional values 34–113
(bb) Dignity and democracy 34–116

(x) Primacy of dignity 34–116
(y) Democracy and openness 34–121
(aaa) Principle of democracy. 34–121
(bbb) Principle of openness. 34–125
(iii) Judicial narratives 34–127
(aa) Prince 34–130
(bb) Jordan and Khosa 34–131
34.9 The purpose of FC s 36(2) 34–133

35 Equality

Catherine Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt

35.1 Equality in the Final Constitution 35–1
(a) Introduction 35–1
(b) Meaning of equality. 35–3
(c) Substantive equality in law 35–5
(d) Values underlying the right to equality 35–8
(i) Dignity 35–8
(ii) Equality. 35–13
(iii) Values, substantive equality and institutional boundaries 35–14
35.2 Overview of the Right to Equality 35–14
35.3 FC s 9(1) 35–17
(a) FC s 9(1) as a minimum rationality requirement. 35–17
(i) Has there been a differentiation between individuals or groups? . 35–18
(ii) Does the differentiation have a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? 35–19
(b) Can irrationality be justified under FC s 36? 35–22
(c) FC s 36 as a guarantee of equality in the legal process 35–23
(d) Can inequality in the legal process be justified under FC s 36? 35–25
(e) The future scope of FC s 9(1) 35–26
(i) Beyond rationality? 35–26
(ii) Equality of process as equality of substance and outcome? 35–29
(f) FC s 9(1) and horizontal application 35–29
35.4 FC s 9(2): Positive Measures, Substantive Equality and Equality of Rights 35–29
(a) FC s 9(2) as a statement of substantive equality 35–30
(b) Positive measures 35–31
(c) The relationship of FC s 9(2) to FC s 9(3) and FC s 9(5) 35–32
(i) Fairness. 35–32
(ii) A complete defence 35–33
(iii) The place of FC s 9(3) 35–33
(d) Proving the defence: the internal criteria in FC s 9(2) 35–33
(i) Does the measure target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination?. 35–34
(ii) Is the measure designed to protect persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination? 35–37
(iii) Does the measure promote the achievement of equality 35–38
(e) Applying the criteria to the case 35–39

(f) FC s 9(2) as a sword or a shield? 35–40
(g) FC s 9(2) and FC s 36 35–42
35.5 FC s 9(3), (4) and (5): Prohibition Against Unfair Discrimination 35–42
(a) Test for unfair discrimination 35–43
(b) Step 1: Does the differentiation amount to discrimination? 35–43
(c) 'Directly or indirectly' 35–47
(d) 'Anyone' 35–48
(e) 'Including': unspecified grounds 35–48
(f) 'On one or more grounds' 35–51
(g) Grounds of discrimination 35–53
(i) Race and colour 35–54
(ii) Sex, gender and pregnancy 35–55
(aa) Women's property 35–56
(bb) Women's bodies 35–57
(cc) Women, men and children 35–59
(dd) Critical responses to the Court's gender equality jurisprudence 35–59
(iii) Marital status 35–61
(iv) Ethnic or social origin 35–63
(v) Sexual orientation 35–64
(aa) Recognition of same sex relationships: material benefits . . . 35–65
(bb) Recognition of same-sex relationships: status benefits 35–66
(cc) Recognition of different types of families 35–67
(dd) Marriage 35–67
(vi) Age 35–69
(vii) Disability 35–70
(vii) Religion, conscience, belief, culture, language 35–71
(aa) Discrimination on the basis of religion, conscience and belief 35–71
(bb) Discrimination on the basis of culture 35–72
(cc) Discrimination on the basis of language 35–73
(ix) Birth 35–74
(h) Step 2: Was the discrimination unfair? 35–75
(i) Position of the complainant 35–76
(ii) Nature and purpose of the provision 35–78
(iii) Impairment of the rights or interests of the complainant and dignity 35–79
(i) Step 3: Can the unfair discrimination be justified? 35–80
(j) Evaluation of the application of the FC s 9(3) test 35–82
35.6 FC s 9(4) Unfair Discrimination by Private Persons 35–83
35.7 FC s 9(5) Presumption of Unfairness 35–84
35.8 The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 35–84

36 Dignity

Stuart Woolman

36.1 Introduction 36–1
(a) History of dignity 36–2
(b) Structure of the chapter 36–4
(c) Methodological concerns 36–5

36.2 Definitions of dignity 36–6
(a) Individual as an end (Dignity 1) 36–7
(b) Equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2) 36–10
(c) Self-actualization (Dignity 3) 36–11
(d) Self-governance (Dignity 4) 36–12
(e) Collective responsibility for the material conditions for individual agency (Dignity 5) 36–14
(f) The relationship between the five definitions of dignity and the creation of a realm of ends 36–17
36.3 Uses of dignity 36–19
(a) Dignity as a first order rule 36–19
(b) Dignity as a second order rule 36–20
(c) Dignity as a correlative right 36–21
(d) Dignity as a value or a grundnorm 36–22
36.4 Dignity's relationship to the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights . . . 36–25
(a) Equality 36–25
(b) Association 36–30
(c) Freedom and security of the person 36–31
(i) Development of the common law 36–31
(ii) Reproductive rights 36–33
(iii) Punishment 36–34
(d) Religion, language and culture 36–39
(i) Religion 36–39
(ii) Culture and language 36–42
(e) Privacy 36–43
(f) Freedom of trade, occupation and profession 36–46
(g) Slavery, servitude and forced labour 36–49
(h) Expression 36–52
(i) Pornography and child pornography 36–52
(ii) Hate speech 36–53
(iii) Defamation 36–55
(i) Socio-Economic Rights 36–58
36.5 Dignity's possibilities 36–62
(a) Dignity and transformation 36–62
(i) Dignity as a regulative ideal 36–62
(ii) Dignity and the politics of capability 36–65
(b) Dignity and the imaginary domain 36–70
(c) Dignity and trans-cultural jurisprudence 36–71

37 Reproductive Rights

Michelle O'Sullivan

37.1 Introduction 37–1
37.2 Life 37–2
37.3 Privacy 37–8
37.4 Equality 37–12
37.5 Freedom and security of the person 37–15

37.6 Children's rights 37–18
37.7 Religion 37–21
37.8 Dignity 37–23
37.9 Access to healthcare 37–23
37.10 Access to information 37–24
37.11 Expression 37–25
37.12 Limitations 37–26

38 Privacy

David McQuoid-Mason

38.1 Introduction: The meaning of privacy 38-1
38.2 Common-law right to privacy 38-2
(a) Essentials for liability 38-3
(i) Wrongfulness 38-3
(ii) Fault 38-4
(aa) Intention or animus injuriandi 38-4
(bb) Negligence by the mass media 38-5
(iii) Invasion of privacy 38-6
(aa) Intrusions and interferences with private life 38-7
(bb) Publication of private facts 38-7
(cc) False light 38-8
(dd) Appropriation 38-9
(b) Remedies 38-9
(i) Damages 38-9
(ii) Interdicts 38-10
(iii) Retraction and apology 38-11
(c) Defences 38-12
(i) Defences excluding wrongfulness 38-12
(aa) Truth for the public benefit 38-12
(bb) Fair comment 38-13
(cc) Qualified privilege 38-14
(dd) No closed list of defences 38-15
(ee) 'Reasonable publication' as a defence 38-16
(ii) Defences excluding intention 38-17
(aa) Mistake 38-17
(bb) Jest 38-17
(cc) Rixa 38-18
(dd) No closed list of defences 38-18
(ee) Rebuttal of negligence by mass media 38-18
38.3 Constitutional right to privacy 38-19
(a) Elements for a constitutional invasion of privacy 38-20
(i) Was there an infringement of a constitutional right to privacy? . . . 38-21
(aa) Privacy rights protecting personal autonomy 38-22
(A) Pornography 38-23
(B) Sexual relationships 38-24
(C) Prostitution 38-24

(bb) Privacy rights protecting information 38-25
(ii) Unlawful searches and seizures 38-28
(iii) Infringements of private communications 38-31
(iv) Fault not required. 38-34
(b) Remedies 38-35
(i) Constitutional damages 38-36
(ii) Interdicts 38-37
(iii) Declarations of invalidity 38-38
(iv) Exclusion of improperly obtained evidence 38-38
(v) Any other 'appropriate relief' 38-38
(c) Defences 38-39
38.4 Privacy and juristic persons 38-40
38.5 Privacy and limitations analysis 38-41
(a) Limitation of personal autonomy privacy 38-41
(b) Limitation of informational privacy 38-42

39 Life

Marius Pieterse

39.1 Introduction 39–1
39.2 The object of protection: 'life' 39–2
39.3 The subjects of protection: 'everyone'. 39–3
39.4 End-of-life decision-making. 39–6
39.5 The obligation to respect the right to life 39–8
(a) The core of the right to life: A prohibition on killing 39–8
(b) Beyond the core 39–13
39.6 The obligation to protect the right to life 39–14
39.7 The obligation to promote the right to life 39–16
39.8 The obligation to fulfil the right to life 39–17

40 Freedom and Security of the Person

Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman

40.1 Introduction 40–1
(a) Drafting history 40–1
(i) Evolution of IC s 11 40–1
(ii) Evolution of FC s 12 40–4
(b) Philosophical background. 40–5
(i) IC s 12: Ferriera v Levin, classical liberalism and substantive due process 40–5
(aa) Negative liberty. 40–11
(bb) Substantive due process 40–15
(ii) FC s 12: Enumerated rights, dignity, and dialectic of enlightenment 40–22
40.2 Relationship between FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) 40–26
(a) Dual function of FC s 12(1). 40–26
(b) Reconstructing 'freedom': Discrete roles of FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) 40–30
(c) The 'due process wall': FC ss 12 and 35 40–31

40.3 FC s 12(1)(a) : Arbitrary deprivation of freedom 40–31
(a) Meaning of 'freedom' 40–32
(b) Meaning of 'deprivation' 40–32
(c) Substantive dimension of FC s 12(1)(a) 40–34
(i) Arbitrariness 40–34
(aa) Substantive arbitrainess 40–35
(bb) Procedural arbitrainess 40–36
(ii) Just cause 40–37
(aa) Constitutional values 40–37
(bb) Basic tenets of the legal system. 40–38
(cc) Proportionality 40–41
(d) Procedural dimension of FC s 12(1)(a) 40–42
40.4 FC s 12(1)(b): Detention without trial 40–44
(a) Detention. 40–45
(b) Trial 40–46
(c) Limitation 40–47
40.5 FC s 12(1)(c): Public and private violence 40–48
(a) Violence. 40–49
(b) Positive obligations 40–49
(i) Vertical application 40–49
(ii) Horizontal application 40–54
(c) Negative obligations 40–54
40.6 FC s 12(1)(d): Torture. 40–56
(a) Definition 40–56
(b) Justification 40–60
40.7 FC s 12(1)(e): Cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. 40–63
(a) Components of FC 12(1)(e) 40–63
(i) Treatment and punishment 40–64
(ii) Cruel, inhuman and degrading 40–66
(aa) Dignity. 40–66
(bb) Cruel 40–68
(cc) Inhuman 40–68
(dd) Degrading 40–68
(b) Judicial doctrines. 40–69
(i) Inherently impermissible 40–69
(aa) Physical punishment 40–69
(bb) Imprisonment 40–70
(cc) Other forms of punishment 40–71
(ii) Proportionality 40–71
(aa) Gross diproportionality and mandatory minimum sentences . 40–71
(bb) Gross disproportionality and indefinite incarceration 40–75
(c) Extraterritorial application 40–75
40.8 FC s 12(2): Bodily and psychological integrity 40–76
(a) Bodily integrity 40–76
(b) Psychological integrity 40–78

40.9 FC s 12(2)(a): Decisions concerning reproduction 40–80
(a) Abortion 40–80
(b) Sterilization 40–82
(c) Contraception 40–84
40.10 FC s 12(2)(b): Security in and control over one's body 40–85
(a) 'Security in' 40–85
(b) 'Control over' 40–87
40.11 FC s 12(2)(c): Subjection to medical and scientific experiments 40–91
(a) Medical and scientific experiment 40–91
(b) Informed consent 40–95
(c) Persons unable to consent 40–98

41 Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion

Paul Farlam

41.1 Introduction 41-1
(a) Religion and the State before 1994 41-1
(b) Provisions in the Final Constitution protecting religion 41-3
(c) The origins and development of the religion clause. 41-5
(i) The drafting of s 15 of the Final Constitution 41-5
(ii) The drafting of s 14 of the Interim Constitution. 41-8
(iii) Relevant clauses in international and foreign law 41-10
41.2 Freedom of religion, belief and opinion: s 15(1) 41-11
(a) The importance of the right 41-11
(b) Notable features of the clause. 41-12
(i) The protection of non-religious thoughts and beliefs 41-12
(ii) The protection of 'opinion' 41-14
(iii) The absence of any express mention of religious practice 41-15
(iv) The lack of an 'establishment clause' 41-17
(c) The core of the right to religious freedom 41-18
(d) The penumbra of the right: The protection against subtle non-quantifiable coercion 41-23
(e) The penumbra of the right: Religious equality? 41-29
41.3 The stages of the freedom of religion enquiry 41-30
(a) Sincerity of belief 41-31
(b) Sufficient burden. 41-33
(c) The problem of doctrinal entanglement. 41-40
41.4 Limitations on the right to freedom of religion 41-41
(a) Reasonable and justifiable limitations on religious practice 41-42
(b) Infringements by neutral, generally applicable, measures 41-44
(c) Conflicts with other constitutional rights 41-46
(d) Waiver of the right to religious freedom 41-49
41.5 Religious observances at State or State-aided institutions: s 15(2). 41-51
41.6 Statutory recognition of religous family law. 41-53

42 Freedom of Expression

Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein

42.1 Introduction 42–1
42.2 The Drafting History of FC s 16 42–2
42.3 The Structure of Free Speech Analysis: FC s 16(1) and FC s 16(2) 42–6
42.4 The General Approach of our Courts to the Constitutional Right to Freedom of Expression 42–8
42.5 The Rationales For Freedom Of Expression 42–14
(a) The search for truth 42–16
(b) The proper functioning of democracy 42–21
(c) Self-fulfilment and audience autonomy 42–25
(d) Some other rationales for freedom of expression 42–28
42.6 The Application of FC s 16(1) 42–30
(a) 'Everyone' has the right to freedom of expression 42–30
(b) Direct horizontality of FC s 16(1): Khumalo v Holomisa 42–30
42.7 Protected Expression: Analysis of FC s 16(1) 42–31
(a) Freedom of speech and expression 42–31
(b) Freedom to receive or impart 42–32
(c) Information or ideas 42–33
(d) Freedom of the press and other media 42–34
(i) Press exceptionalism 42–34
(ii) Protection of sources of information 42–36
(aa) Comparative jurisprudence 42–40
(bb) The preferred approach to the privilege under the Final Constitution 42–49
(e) Freedom of artistic creativity 42–52
(i) The centrality of context 42–54
(ii) What is art? 42–57
(f) Academic freedom and freedom of scientific research 42–60
(g) Protecting the means of expression 42–62
(i) Monopolies 42–62
(ii) Testing the means of expression: the availability of alternative means 42–63
(iii) State support for the means of expression and state broadcasters . 42–65
(iv) The Internet 42–67
42.8. Excluded Expression: Analysis of FC s 16 (2) 42–69
(a) FC s 16(2)(a): Propaganda for war 42–69
(b) FC s 16(2)(b): Incitement of imminent violence 42–71
(c) FC s 16(2)(c): Hate speech 42–73
(i) The arguments for and against hate speech prohibitions 42–73
(ii) The constitutional treatment of hate speech 42–79
(aa) The express exclusion in FC s 16(2)(c) 42–79
(bb) 'Advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion' 42–80
(cc) 'Incitement to cause harm' 42–81
(iv) Legislative prohibitions on hate speech 42–84

(aa) The general approach to assessing the constitutionality of hate speech legislation 42–84
(bb) Section 29 of the Films and Publications Act. 42–85
(cc) Section 10 of the Equality Act 42–86
42.9 Major Restrictions on Freedom of Expression 42–88
(a) The law of defamation 42–88
(i) Standing to sue for defamation 42–90
(ii) Defamatory statements 42–91
(iii) The challenges to the onus rule and the strict liability rule 42–93
(iv) The defence of reasonable publication 42–95
(v) Falsity as an ingredient of the plaintiff's cause of action 42–99
(vi) Truth for the public benefit 42–101
(vii) Remedies: Interdicts, damages and the amende honorable. 42–104
(b) The law of privacy 42–107
(i) Lack of negligence in media privacy cases 42–108
(ii) The public interest defence 42–111
(c) Restrictions designed to serve the administration of justice 42–115
(i) The principle of open justice 42–115
(ii) Restrictions on the open justice principle 42–121
(iii) Broadcasting of enquiries and judicial proceedings 42–123
(iv) Balancing freedom of speech against the administration of justice 42–128
(aa) Scandalising the court 42–128
(bb) The sub judice rule 42–134
(d) Intellectual property restrictions 42–140
(i) Parodying famous trademarks 42–140
(ii) Copyright: Defences to infringement 42–145
(e) Sexually explicit expression. 42–149
(i) The statutory framework. 42–149
(ii) Pornographic films and publications as protected expression. . . . 42–150
(iii) Assessing limitations on sexually explicit material: pornography as low-value speech 42–154
(iv) Assessing limitations on pornography: harms sought to be avoided through criminalizing pornography 42–156
(v) Nude dancing as protected expression 42–159
(f) Commercial expression 42–161
(i) Commercial speech as protected expression. 42–162
(ii) Assessing limitations on commercial expression 42–164
(g) Restrictions in the interest of national security, defence and intelligence 42–170
(i) General national security restrictions 42–170
(aa) the Constitution 42–170
(bb) Minimum Information Security Standards 42–171
(cc) Protection of Information Act 42–173
(ii) Other legislative entrenchment of national security restrictions . . 42–174
(aa) The Defence Act 42–174
(bb) The National Key Points Act. 42–175
(cc) The Intelligence Services Act 42–176

(dd) Other legislation 42–176
(iii) Case law 42–177
(b) Prior restraints on publication 42–183
(i) The presumption against prior restraints 42–183
(ii) Legislative prior restraint 42–184
(iii) Judicial prior restraints 42–185
42.10 Special Protection of Speech in the Legislature 42–189

43 Freedom of Assembly

Stuart Woolman

43.1 Introduction 43–1
43.2 The History and the regulation of assembly 43–4
(a) Apartheid and the old statutory framework 43–4
(b) Democracy and the new statutory framework 43–6
(i) Provenance of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 43–6
(ii) Analysis of the Regulation of Gatherings Act 43–7
43.3 Assembly analysis 43–17
(a) The content of the right 43–17
(i) Internal modifiers 43–19
(aa) Peacefully 43–19
(bb) Unarmed 43–20
(ii) Assembly 43–21
(iii) Demonstrations 43–22
(iv) Picketing 43–24
(v) Petitions 43–25
(b) Limitations on the right 43–26
(i) Private property 43–26
(ii) Security and order 43–28
(iii) Content neutrality 43–29
(iv) Time, place and manner restrictions 43–31

44 Freedom of Association

Stuart Woolman

44.1 Introduction to association 44-1
(a) Associations as correlative 44-6
(b) Associations as constitutive 44-9
(i) Associations as constitutive of the self 44-9
(ii) Associations as constitutive of social life 44-12
(c) Associations and capture 44-14
(i) Entrance 44-17
(ii) Voice 44-19
(iii) Exit 44-21
(iv) Social capital, fragility, switching costs and transaction costs 44-23
(v) Permeability, flexibility, contestability and the problem of shifting boundaries 44-25
(vi) Problems with capture analysis 44-26

(d) Association and dissociation 44-30
44.2 Grounds for and models of infringement 44-32
(a) Banning 44-33
(b) Equality and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA') 44-33
(c) Democracy 44-39
(d) Coercion 44-41
44.3 Association analysis 44-42
(a) The content of the right 44-42
(i) Within the ambit 44-42
(ii) Without the ambit 44-45
(b) Limitations on the right 44-47
(i) The complex character of the analysis 44-47
(ii) Grounds for limitation 44-48
(c) Analysis in context 44-49
(i) Political associations 44-49
(ii) Intimate associations 44-51
(iii) Cultural associations 44-53
(iv) Economic associations 44-56
(v) Empowering associations 44-58
(vi) Small social associations 44-59
(vii) Security forces 44-60
(viii) Religious associations 44-62
(ix) Voluntary associations and fair hearings 44-65
(x) Sexual associations 44-66

45 Political Rights

Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch

45.1 Introduction 45-1
45.2 Interpretation of political rights 45-2
(a) Historical background 45-2
(b) Drafting history 45-4
(c) Constitutional context 45-7
(i) Relationship between FC s 1*(d)* and FC s 19 45-7
(ii) Other relevant constitutional provisions 45-7
(d) International law 45-8
(e) Foreign law 45-11
(f) Statutes embodying political rights 45-12
45.3 Horizontal application of political rights 45-13
45.4 Standing to sue in political rights cases 45-14
45.5 Justiciability of political rights 45-16
(a) Separation of powers concerns 45-16
(b) Standard of review in political rights cases 45-18
(c) Remedies in political rights cases 45-23
45.6 The broad and narrow rights to political participation 45-26
45.7 Structure of FC s 19 45-29

45.8 FC s 19(1): the freedom to make political choices 45-30
(a) The right to form a political party. 45-32
(b) The right to participate in the activities of a political party. 45-34
(c) The right to campaign for a political party. 45-35
(i) General 45-35
(ii) State funding of political parties 45-36
(iii) Political parties and the media 45-37
45.9 FC s 19(2): the right to free, fair and regular elections 45-38
45.10 FC s 19(3): the active and passive right to vote. 45-41
(a) The right to vote, the electoral system and the mandate of representatives 45-41
(i) General 45-41
(ii) The mandate of representatives and loss of membership 45-42
(iii) Proportional representation 45-44
(b) The active right to vote 45-46
(i) Equal voting rights 45-46
(ii) Secrecy of the ballot 45-48
(iii) Exclusion of classes of citizens from the right to vote. 45-48
(c) The right to stand for election to public office. 45-51

46 Property

Theunis Roux

The property clause 46-1
46.1 The function and structure of the property clause inquiry. 46-2
46.2 Application 46-6
(a) Application of the property clause to private actors 46-6
(b) Who is entitled to the rights protected by section 25?. 46-9
46.3 Is the interest at stake constitutional property? 46-9
(a) Introduction 46-9
(b) The nature of the right 46-11
(c) The object of the right 46-15
46.4 Has there been a deprivation of property? 46-17
46.5 Is the law that provides for the deprivation consistent with section 25(1)? . 46-20
(a) Law of general application 46-21
(b) Arbitrary deprivation of property 46-21
(c) Deprivation of property and the right to just administrative action. . . . 46-25
46.6 Is the deprivation justified under section 36?. 46-26
46.7 Does the deprivation amount to an expropriation of property? 46-28
46.8 Does the expropriation comply with sections 25(2) and (3)? 46-33
(a) 'For a public purpose or in the public interest'. 46-33
(b) Just and equitable compensation. 46-34
(i) A just and equitable amount of compensation 46-34
(ii) Payment of compensation in a just and equitable manner 46-35
(iii) Payment of compensation within a just and equitable time 46-35
46.9 Is the expropriation justified under section 36? 46-36
46.10 Land rights 46-37

47 Children's Rights

Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton

47.1 Introduction. 47–1
47.2 Name and nationality 47–3
(a) The right to a name. 47–3
(b) The right to a nationality 47–3
47.3 Family care or parental care, or appropriate alternative care. 47–5
(a) The meaning of 'family or parent' 47–5
(b) The purposes of FC s 28(1)(b) 47–8
47.4 Basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care and social services 47–9
(a) Shelter defined. 47–9
(b) Progressive realisation. 47–12
(c) The interaction between FC s 28(1)(b) and FC s 28(1)(c) 47–14
(d) The State of the law 47–17
(e) Socio-economic rights of children living separately from their parents . . 47–17
47.5 Protection from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation 47–18
(a) Corporal punishment 47–18
(b) Christian Education and corporal punishment in schools 47–20
(c) Legislative development 47–24
(d) Child pornography 47–26
47.6 Child labour 47–28
47.7 Children and the Justice System 47–29
(a) Imprisonment as a last resort 47–29
(b) Law reform 47–34
47.8 Legal representation in civil proceedings 47–36
47.9 Children and armed conflict 47–39
47.10 The best interests of the child 47–40
(a) Introduction 47–40
(b) The operation of FC s 28(2) 47–40
(c) Paramountcy v limitation 47–43
47.11 The age of a 'child' 47–46
(a) The beginning of a 'child' 47–46
(b) The end of a 'child'. 47–47

48 Land

Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill

48.1 Introduction. 48–1
48.2 Drafting History 48–3
48.3 Land Rights 48–4
48.4 Interpreting land legislation 48–5
48.5 Land, culture and customary law 48–8
48.6 FC 25(5): Redistribution 48–10

(a) Introduction 48–10
(b) Enabling legislation 48–14
(i) Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996 48–14
(aa) Beneficiaries 48–14
(bb) Labour tenants' rights 48–17
(cc) Redistribution of land — acquisition of land rights under Ch III 48–19
(ii) Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1998 48–20
(iii) Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998 48–22
(c) Policy documents 48–23
(d) Redistribution programme: brief evaluation 48–24
48.7 FC 25(6): Tenure reform 48–25
(a) Introduction 48–25
(b) Enabling legislation 48–26
(i) Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 48–26
(ii) Interim Protection of Informal Rights Act 31 of 1996 48–27
(iii) Communal Property Association Act 28 of 1996 48–28
(iv) Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997 48–28
(aa) Introduction 48–28
(bb) Beneficiaries 48–29
(cc) The promotion of long-term tenure security 48–30
(dd) Occupiers' rights 48–31
1. General 48–31
2. The right to family life 48–31
3. The right to freedom of religion and burial rights 48–32
4. The right to legal representation 48–36
(ee) Occupiers' duties 48–36
(ff) Evictions 48–37
1. General 48–37
2. Procedural requirements 48–38
3. Requirements for eviction 48–38
4. Granting an eviction order 48–40
5. Urgent eviction proceedings 48–41
(gg) Mediation and arbitration 48–42
(hh) Review proceedings 48–42
(v) Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 48–42
(aa) General 48–42
(bb) Application 48–43
(cc) 'Old order' and 'new order' rights 48–44
(dd) Procedure for tenure reform 48–46
1. First steps: structuring the community and conducting a land rights enquiry 48–46
2. The determination phase 48–47
(ee) Formalisation of tenure rights 48–50
(c) Tenure reform: brief evaluation 48–50

48.8 FC 25(7): Restitution 48–52
(a) Introduction 48–52
(b) Role players 48–53
(i) The Commission on Restitution of Land Rights 48–53
(ii) The Land Claims Court 48–53
(c) Restitution procedure 48–54
(i) Formal requirements 48–55
(ii) Legal requirements 48–55
(a) Standing 48–56
(b) Dispossession 48–56
(c) A right in hand 48–58
(d) After 19 June 1913 48–58
(e) Discriminatory law or practice 48–59
(iii) The requirements in practice: Richtersveld 48–60
(d) Brief analysis of the restitution programme 48–64
(i) Tempo of land restitution 48–64
(ii) Number of claims and progress 48–64
(iii) Innovation to expedite the process 48–65
(iv) Budget 48–67
(v) Sustainable development and agriculture 48–67
(vi) Community-related problems 48–68
(e) Outstanding claims 48–68

49 Sentencing and Punishment

Dirk van Zyl Smit

49.1 Introduction 49-1
49.2 The imposition of punishment 49-2
(a) Legality 49-4
(i) Defining penalties 49-4
(ii) Sentencing guidelines 49-6
(b) Equality 49-7
(c) Proportionality 49-9
(i) Mandatory minimum sentences 49-11
(ii) Preventive sentences 49-17
(iii) Exemplary sentences 49-20
(iv) Punishment for specific crimes 49-21
(d) Dignity: Human dignity and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment 49-21
(i) The sentence of death 49-23
(ii) Corporal punishment 49-24
(iii) Imprisonment 49-26
(iv) Life imprisonment 49-27
49.3 The implementation of punishment 49-30
(a) Dignity 49-31
(b) Legality 49-35
(i) During imprisonment 49-35
(ii) On release 49-36

50 Environment

Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson

50.1 Introduction 50–1
50.2 International perspectives on the right to a healthy environment. 50–2
(a) Importance of international perspectives — nature of the right 50–2
(b) Global level of protection 50–3
(c) Regional level of protection 50–5
(d) National Level of Protection 50–8
50.3 South African Constitution 50–8
(a) Historical context and Interim Constitution 50–9
(b) The Final Constitution 50–10
(i) Constructing the right 50–10
(aa) Meaning of 'environment' 50–12
(bb) Meaning of 'health' and 'well-being' 50–13
(x) Health. 50–13
(1) General 50–13
(2) Pollution: Duty of care 50–14
(3) Environmental strict liability. 50–15
(y) Well-being 50–16
(cc) Meaning of 'present and future generations' 50–18
(dd) Meaning of 'ecologically sustainable development'. 50–19
(x) Sustainable development. 50–19
(1) International Law 50–19
(2) Application in South African law 50–21
(y) Ecologically 50–24
(ee) Meaning of 'reasonable legislative and other measures' 50–26
(w) Reasonable measures. 50–26
(x) Financial constraints 50–27
(y) Legislative measures 50–28
(1) National Environmental Management Act (NEMA) 50–30
(2) National Forest Act (NFA) 50–31
(3) National Water Act (NWA) 50–31
(4) Marine Living Resources Act (MLRA) 50–32
(5) Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act (MPRDA) 50–32
(6) National Environmental Management: Protected Areas Act (NEM: PAA) 50–33
(7) National Environmental Management: Biodiversity Act (NEM: BA) 50–33
(8) National Environmental Management: Air Quality Act (the Air Quality Act) 50–33

(9) National Environmental Management: Waste Act (Waste Act) . . . 50–35
(10) National Environmental Management: Integrated Coastal Management Act (ICMA) . . . 50–36
(z) Other measures: integrated environmental management systems and environmental impact assessments . . . 50–36
(ii) Related Rights and constitutional provisions . . . 50–41
(aa) Substantive rights . . . 50–42
(u) Equality . . . 50–42
(v) The right to life . . . 50–43
(w) Human dignity . . . 50–43
(x) Access to housing . . . 50–44
(y) Access to food and water . . . 50–44
(z) Property Clause . . . 50–45
(bb) Procedural Rights . . . 50–46
(x) Access to Information . . . 50–46
(y) Administrative Justice . . . 50–48
(iii) Other constitutional provisions relevant to the environment . . . 50–51
50.4 Application of the right to a healthy environment: practical considerations . . . 50–52
(a) Considering the appropriate forum for environmental dispute settlement . . . 50–52
(b) The issue of standing . . . 50–54
(c) Scope of application . . . 50–55
(d) Limitation of the environmental right . . . 50–56
(e) Interpretational guidelines . . . 50–56
(f) The role of international law in environmental disputes . . . 50–58
(g) The role of foreign law in environmental disputes . . . 50–59
(h) Remedies in Environmental Disputes . . . 50–60
(i) Choosing a remedy . . . 50–60
(ii) Specific remedies in environmental disputes . . . 50–61
(aa) Judicial Review of State Action . . . 50–61
(bb) Interdicts . . . 50–62
(x) Prohibitory interdict . . . 50–62
(y) Mandamus (mandatory interdict) . . . 50–62
(z) Structural interdict . . . 50–62
(cc) Criminal sanctions . . . 50–64
(dd) Declaration of Rights . . . 50–65
(ee) Contractual Obligations . . . 50–65
(ff) Delictual Damages . . . 50–66
(gg) Constitutional remedies . . . 50–66
(hh) Costs . . . 50–66

51 Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons

Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux

51.1 A framework for criminal procedure rights . . . 51–1

(a) General 51–1
(i) Introduction 51–1
(ii) The due process wall 51–1
(iii) Substantive due process and criminal process 51–8
(iv) Fair trial seepage 51–13
(v) Maintaining the wall 51–17
(b) Interpretation of FC s 35 51–20
(i) General 51–20
(ii) Abdication 51–20
(iii) The common law and FC s 35 51–24
(iv) Limitation 51–30
51.2 'Arrested', 'detained' and 'accused' persons 51–38
51.3 Rights of detained persons 51–46
(a) The right to receive required information in a language one understands 51–46
(b) The right to be informed promptly of the reason for being detained 51–48
(c) The right to conditions of detention consistent with human dignity 51–49
(d) Communication and visitation rights 51–53
(e) The right to challenge the lawfulness of detention 51–54
(f) The right to counsel 51–56
(g) Remedies of detainees 51–68
51.4 The rights of arrested persons 51–70
(a) Statutory lawfulness 51–70
(b) Silence and self-incrimination 51–71
(i) The seamless web 51–71
(ii) The right to remain silent 51–73
(iii) The right against compelled self -incrimination 51–79
(c) The right to be brought before a court 51–85
(d) The right to be released (bail) 51–88
51.5 The rights of accused persons 51–100
(a) Introduction 51–100
(b) The right to a fair trial 51–100
(c) The right to be informed with sufficient particularity of the charge 51–108
(d) The right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence 51–113
(e) The right to a public trial before an ordinary court 51–114
(i) Ordinary courts and impartiality 51–114
(ii) The right to a public trial 51–120
(f) The right to a trial within a reasonable time 51–123
(g) The right to be present when being tried 51–134
(h) The right to counsel 51–136
(i) The right to be presumed innocent 51–144
(j) Silence and self-incrimination at trial 51–148
(i) Silence and self-incrimination, and the presumption of innocence 51–148
(ii) The right to silence at trial 51–149
(iii) Self-incrimination at trial 51–153
(k) The right to adduce evidence and challenge evidence 51–160
(l) The right to be tried in a language which one understands 51–167
(m) Retroactivity 51–170

(n) Ne bis in idem (double-jeopardy) 51–173
(i) General 51–173
(ii) Multiple punishment 51–174
(iii) Multiple trials 51–176
(o) The right to appeal or review 51–182

52 Evidence

PJ Schwikkard

52.1 Function and constitutionality 52–1
52.2 The right to a fair trial 52–2
(a) Criminal proceedings 52–2
(b) Other proceedings 52–3
(c) Arrested, detained and accused persons 52–7
52.3 A fair public hearing 52–9
52.4 The presumption of innocence and related rights 52–9

(a) The presumption of innocence 52–10
(i) Content and rationale 52–10
(ii) The scope of the presumption of innocence 52–12
(iii) Reverse onus provisions 52–13
(b) Right to remain silent; Right not to testify during proceedings; and Right to legal representation 52–16
(i) Content and rationale 52–16
(ii) Negative inferences from silence 52–17
(iii) Discharge at the close of the state case 52–25
(c) The right not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence; the right not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence; and the right to legal representation 52–28
(i) The right to legal representation and privilege against self-incrimination 52–28
(ii) Admissions and confessions 52–31
(iii) Ascertainment of bodily features 52–33
52.5 Right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence 52–36
52.6 Right to adduce and challenge evidence 52–41
(a) Cross-examination 52–41
(i) Hearsay 52–42
(ii) Cross-examination of the child witness 52–45
(iii) The hostile witness 52–49
(b) Record of bail application 52–49
(c) State privilege 52–51
(d) Informer's privilege 52–52
(e) Interpretation 52–53
52.7 Equality and dignity 52–55
(a) Cautionary rule: Complainants in sexual offence cases 52–55
(b) Children 52–56
(c) Previous consistent statements 52–60
(d) Character of the complainant in sexual offence cases 52–61
52.8 Rule 31 of the Constitutional Court Rules 52–64
52.9 Privacy and privilege 52–68
(a) Professions 52–68
(b) Spouses 52–69
(c) Parents and children 52–70
52.10 Unconstitutionally obtained evidence 52–71
(a) Scope of discretion and rationale 52–71
(b) When will the admission of evidence render a trial unfair? 52–73
(c) When will the admission of evidence be otherwise detrimental to the administration of justice? 52–76
(d) Entrapment 52–78
(e) Trial-within-a-trial 52–79
(f) Civil proceedings 52–80
(g) Burden of proof and burden of justification 52–81
52.11 Limitations analysis 52–84

Volume 4

53 Labour Relations

Carole Cooper

53.1 Introduction. 53–1
(a) Application 53–2
(i) Burdens 53–2
(ii) Benefits 53–3
(b) Jurisdiction. 53–5
53.2 Right to fair labour practices. 53–10
(a) Broad construction of 'everyone' 53–11
(b) Labour practices 53–11
(c) Fairness 53–15
53.3 Freedom of association rights 53–19
(a) Right to form and join trade unions 53–19
(b) Union security arrangements 53–23
53.4 Right to organise 53–28
53.5 Right to engage in collective bargaining. 53–32
53.6 Right to strike 53–44
(a) Lockouts 53–57
(b) Picketing 53–58

54 Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession

Dennis Davis

54.1 The history of Interim Constitution section 26 and Final Constitution section 22. 54-1
54.2 The logic of section 22 54-2
(a) An overview 54-2
(b) Comparative jurisprudence. 54-3
(i) German case law 54-3
(ii) Japanese case law 54-5
54.3 Section 22 jurisprudence. 54-7
54.4 Restraint of trade clauses 54-9
54.5 The regulation of conduct by professionals and those engaged in trade. 54-11

55 Housing

Kirsty McLean

55.1 Introduction. 55–1
55.2 Overview of South African housing policy 1994–2000 55–2
(a) Historical background. 55–2
(b) Constitutional and legislative framework. 55–3
55.3 FC s 26(1) and (2) 55–8
(a) Overview of Grootboom. 55–8
(b) The relationship between FC s 26(1) and (2) 55–9
(c) The reasonableness standard in Grootboom. 55–12

55.4 Housing policy 2000–2006 55–14
(a) Grootboom criteria 55–14
(b) Evaluation of the housing policy in terms of Grootboom criteria 55–15
(i) Reasonable legislation, policies and programmes 55–15
(ii) Reasonable implementation 55–16
(iii) Flexibility 55–19
(iv) Vulnerable groups 55–20
(v) Co-operative government and local government 55–24
(c) 'Breaking New Ground' 55–26
(i) Sustainable human settlements 55–27
(ii) Private sector involvement 55–27
(iii) Informal settlements and backyard shacks 55–28
(d) Social housing 55–29
55.5 International law of housing 55–31
(a) 'Adequate' housing 55–34
(b) Progressive realization 55–36
(c) Within available resources 55–38
(d) Minimum core 55–39
55.6 FC s 26(3): Evictions 55–42
(a) The impact of FC s 26(3) on the common law of evictions 55–43
(b) Legislative impact on the common law of evictions 55–45
(i) ESTA 55–46
(ii) PIE 55–46
(c) The reach of FC s 26(3) 55–48
(d) International law of evictions 55–49
55.7 Children's right to shelter 55–51
55.8 Prisoners' right to adequate accommodation 55–54

56A Health

David Bilchitz

56A.1 Introduction 56A–1
56A.2 The right to health in the Final Constitution 56A–1
(a) A justiciable constitutional right to health: the black letter law 56A–1
(b) An explanation of some basic conceptual issues attending the right to have access to health-care services in FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–5
(i) Right to health and the right to a healthy environment 56A–5
(ii) Right to have access to health-care services and not a right to resources necessary for health 56A–5
(iii) The relationship between the right to have access to health-care services and other socio-economic rights in FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–5
(iv) The interdependence of rights 56A–6
(v) The right to have access to health-care services and immediate benefits 56A–6
(vi) Progressive realization and available resources 56A–7
(aa) Progressive realization 56A–7
(bb) Available resources 56A–8

(vii) The reasonableness approach 56A–11
(c) Beneficiaries of health-care rights as opposed to the ambit of the right: application not interpretation 56A–13
(d) The relationship between internal and external limitations 56A–16
(e) FC s 27(3) 56A–17
(i) Summary of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3) . . 56A–17
(ii) Analysis of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27(3) . . . 56A–17
56A.3 General critique of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 27 . . . . . 56A–19
(a) The failure to integrate FC s 27(1) and (2) 56A–20
(b) Content of the right to health-care services 56A–21
(c) Reasonableness and its lack of content 56A–22
(d) Reasonableness and context 56A–23
(e) Separation of powers 56A–24
(f) Remedies 56A–24
56A.4 A preferred reading of FC s 27 that draws on international law 56A–25
(a) Philosophical progression: a right to the conditions necessary for health rather than a right to be healthy 56A–25
(b) A minimum core? 56A–28
(c) Conceptual issues relating to the minimum core and the right of access to health-care services 56A–30
(i) The principled minimum core 56A–31
(ii) A pragmatic minimum threshold 56A–34
(d) The relationship between the minimum core and progressive realization of the right to health-care services 56A–35
(e) Providing normative content to the right to health-care services 56A–37
(f) Further issues relating to the scarcity of resources and the right to health care 56A–40
(i) Relationship between availability of resources and the right: content or limitation? 56A–40
(ii) The pool of available resources 56A–42
56A.5 Health-care policy and the Final Constitution 56A–46
(a) Background 56A–46
(b) Themba's story: HIV/AIDS in the public health-care system 56A–46

56B Water

Malcolm Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa

56B.1 Introduction 56B–1
56B.2 International and Comparative Law 56B–3
(a) International recognition 56B–3
(b) Content of the right 56B–9
(c) State obligations 56B–13
(d) Comparative law 56B–15
(i) Availability 56B–16
(ii) Quality of water 56B–17
(iii) Physical accessibility and affordability 56B–19
(iv) Disconnections 56B–20
56B.3 South African Law 56B–21

(a) Explicit and implicit recognition 56B–21
(b) The meaning of FC s 27(1)(b) 56B–24
(i) The prevailing approach to FC s 27 rights 56B–24
(ii) Right holders and protected uses of water 56B–26
(iii) 'Sufficient' 56B–27
(aa) Background to Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg 56B–28
(bb) The consolidation and extension of the stance against 'minimum core content' 56B–31
(cc) A brief note on comparative approaches to questions of sufficient water 56B–33
(iv) The principle of constitutional subsidiarity 56B–34
(v) 'Access' 56B–37
56B.4 Duties of the State 56B–39
(a) Different spheres of government 56B–39
(b) The constitutional obligation to respect, protect, promote and fulfil rights 56B–45
(c) Respect 56B–46
(i) Disconnections 56B–46
(ii) Prepaid meters 56B–51
(d) Protect 56B–54
(i) Privatisation 56B–55
(ii) Farm owners and other landowners 56B–56
(e) Promote 56B–56
(f) Fulfil 56B–57
(i) Ensuring affordability 56B–57
(ii) Free water policy 56B–59
(g) Equality guarantee 56B–61
56B.5 Right to Sanitation 56B–66
(a) International law 56B–66
(i) Express and implied recognition 56B–66
(ii) A co-right with water? 56B–69
(iii) Individual or collective right? 56B–70
(iv) Content 56B–71
(v) Obligations 56B–73
(b) South African law and jurisprudence 56B–74
(i) The constitutional and legislative position 56B–74
(ii) Sanitation, health and the environment 56B–77

56C Food

Danie Brand

56C.1 Introduction 56C–1
56C.2 The right to food in international law 56C–2
(a) Content 56C–2
(b) Duties 56C–4
56C.3 The right to food in the Final Constitution 56C–6
(a) Content 56C–6

(b) Duties and violations 56C–9
(i) The duty to respect the right to food 56C–10
(aa) Refraining from impairing existing access to food 56C–10
(bb) Mitigating the impact of interferences in the exercise of the right to food 56C–13
(cc) Removing obstacles in the way of the exercise of the right to food 56C–14
(ii) The duty to protect the right to food 56C–15
(aa) Legislative and executive measures 56C–15
(bb) The judiciary 56C–17
(iii) The duty to promote and fulfil the right to food 56C–21
(aa) A national strategy 56C–23
(bb) Ensuring that the national strategy is reasonable 56C–24
(cc) Avoiding retrogression 56C–29

56D Social Security

Mia Swart

56D.1 Introduction 56D–1
56D.2 Terminology 56D–3
56D.3 The Constitutional Right to Social Security 56D–4
(a) Negative interference 56D–5
(b) Access 56D–6
(c) Reasonableness 56D–6
(d) Reasonableness and the minimum core 56D–7
(e) Beneficiaries of the right 56D–9
(f) Case law 56D–9
(i) Constitutional Court 56D–9
(ii) Eastern Cape social grant cases 56D–13
56D.4 Administration of Social Grants — The Treatment by South African Courts 56D–16
(a) Protection of Procedural Interests 56D–16
(b) Application of Administrative Justice Rules 56D–17
(c) Class Actions 56D–18
(d) Extending social security benefits to non citizens: 56D–19
56D.5 Policy 56D–19
(a) Statutory Framework: White Paper and SASSA 56D–20
(b) Basic Income Grant (BIG) 56D–21
(c) Social grants 56D–22
(i) Old-age grants 56D–23
(ii) Disability grants 56D–24
(iii) Child Care Grants 56D–26
(aa) Child Support Grant ('CSG') 56D–26
(bb) Foster care grant 56D–28
(cc) Care dependency grant 56D–29
56D.6 International Social Security Standards 56D–29
(a) ILO Conventions 56D–30

(b) The International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR') 56D–31
(c) UN Convention on the Rights of the Child 56D–33
(d) Africa 56D–34
(e) SADC 56D–35
56D.7 Non-discrimination 56D–36

57 Education

Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop

57.1 Introduction: Liberte´, Egalite´, Fraternite´ 57–1
57.2 FC 29(1) 57–6
(a) Section 29(1)(a): Basic Education 57–6
(i) Nature of the right 57–6
(aa) Education as empowerment 57–6
(bb) Negative dimension and positive dimension 57–8
(x) Negative dimension 57–8
(y) Positive dimension 57–9
(ii) Content of the positive right 57–15
(aa) Defining 'Basic Education' 57–15
(x) Goals and years 57–15
(y) Criteria for assessment 57–18
(aaa) Availability/Adequacy 57–19
(bbb) Accessibility 57–21
(xx) Non-discrimination 57–21
(yy) Financial accessibility 57–24
(zz) Physical accesibility 57–30
(ccc) Acceptability 57–30
(ddd) Adaptability 57–32
(iii) Adult Basic Education 57–33
(iv) Looking in the wrong place for 'Free and equal' public schools 57–35
(b) FC s 29(1)(b): Further Education 57–36
(i) Nature of the right 57–36
(ii) Content of the right 57–37
(aa) Defining 'Further Education' 57–37
(bb) Negative dimension of the right 57–38
(cc) Positive dimension of the right 57–41
57.3 FC s 29(2): Language rights in public schools 57–42
(a) Historical background 57–42

(b) Drafting history of the language provisions in the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution 57–48
(c) Legal framework for admissions policies and language policies in public schools 57–55
(i) Language rights and the Final Constitution 57–55
(ii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice 57–59
(iii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice, where that education is reasonably practicable. 57–59
(iv) State's obligation to ensure effective access to and implementation of the right to instruction in an official language and its relationship to single medium public schools. 57–60
(v) Statutory and regulatory framework for linguistic rights. 57–61
(vi) Case law on single medium public schools: Matukane; Middelburg; Mikro; Seodin; Ermelo. 57–63
(vii) Current status of single medium public schools 57–73
57.4 FC s 29(3): Language rights in independent schools. 57–76
(a) Community rights and language rights in a liberal constitutional order . 57–76
(b) State attempt's to control independent schools. 57–77
(c) Legal framework for admissions policies in independent schools 57–78
(i) The Final Constitution 57–79
(ii) Statutory framework and statutory interpretation 57–80
(aa) SASA and PEPUDA. 57–80
(bb) PEPUDA and admissions policies at independent schools. . . 57–83
(cc) PEPUDA's test for admissions at independent schools. 57–84
(i) Constitutional constraints on PEPUDA in the context of independent school admissions 57–88
(aa) Rule-following as a condition of membership 57–88
(bb) Expulsion, rule-following and fair hearings 57–89
(cc) Capture 57–90
(dd) Constitutive attachments. 57–91
(ee) Associational rights, self-governance and pluralism. . 57–92
(ii) Common law norms and the proper construction of PEPUDA in the context of the admissions policies of independent schools 57–92
(iii) Conclusions about constitutional and common law constraints on the PEPUDA test for admissions policies of independent schools 57–93
57.5 FC s 29(4): State subsidies for independent educational institutions 57–94

58 Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion

Stu Woolman

58.1 Introduction 58–1
(a) Exclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation. 58–4
(b) Inclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation 58–10
(c) Distinctions between religious, linguistic and cultural communities . . . 58–13

58.2 Historical background: Negotiating community rights 58–17
(a) Interim Constitution 58–18
(b) Final Constitution 58–21
58.3 Community rights in international law 58–23
(a) Minority rights and community rights 58–24
(b) Structure of international minority rights and community rights 58–26
(i) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 58–27
(ii) UN Declaration on Minorities 58–28
(iii) African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights 58–29
58.4 FC s 31 58–31
(a) Content of FC s 31 58–31
(i) Individual right exercised communally 58–31
(ii) Membership in and belonging to a 'cultural, religious or linguistic community' 58–36
(iii) May not be denied the right 58–37
(iv) Right to enjoyment of culture in community with others 58–38
(v) Right to practice a religion in community with others 58–40
(vi) Right to use a language of choice 58–44
(vii) Right to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations 58–45
(b) Internal limitations of FC s 31 58–
58.5 FC s 30 58–48
(a) Content of FC s 30 58–48
(b) Internal limitations of FC s 30 58–50
58.6 Relationship between the internal limitations clauses in FC s 30 and FC s 31 and the general limitations clause in FC s 36 58–50
58.7 FC s 29 58–51
(a) FC s 29(3): Right to maintain independent schools that advance the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities 58–52
(b) FC s 29(2): Right to maintain public schools that further the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities 58–57
58.8 Self-determination 58–66
(a) Self-determination in International Law 58–66
(b) Self-determination and the Final Constitution 58–67
(i) Interim Constitution, Constitutional Principles and Certification . 58–67
(ii) Volkstaat Council 58–69
(iii) FC s 235 58–71
(iv) Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC') 58–73
(aa) Purpose of the CRLC 58–73
(bb) Weakness of the CRLC 58–74

59 Access to Courts

Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman

59.1 Introduction 59–1
59.2 Interpreting FC s 34 59–1

(a) Historical context 59–1
(b) Related constitutional provisions 59–3
(c) International law 59–6
(d) Foreign law 59–8
59.3 The nature and application of the right. 59–9
(a) Application. 59–9
(i) The bearer of the rights: Juristic persons. 59–10
(ii) The bearer of the obligations: Horizontality. 59–12
(iii) Application to criminal law 59–13
(iv) Application to appeals. 59–14
(v) Disputes that can be resolved by the application of law 59–18
(b) The nature of the state's obligations / nature of the right 59–23
59.4 The content of the right 59–26
(a) Access to court. 59–26
(i) Ouster clauses 59–27
(ii) Prescription 59–37
(iii) Res judicata 59–48
(iv) Procedural rules 59–49
(v) Refusing leave to appeal without reasons 59–57
(vi) Vexatious litigants. 59–58
(vii) Costs. 59–59
(viii) Security for costs 59–61
(ix) Champertous agreements. 59–66
(b) Fair public hearing before a court. 59–67
(i) Legal representation 59–68
(ii) Equality of arms. 59–73
(iii) Independence and impartiality 59–76
(iv) Notice and hearing requirements 59–79
(v) Public hearing 59–83
(c) Another independent and impartial tribunal or forum 59–86
(i) Extradition hearings 59–86
(ii) Arbitration. 59–88
(iii) Parliamentary disciplinary proceedings. 59–92
(iv) The status of refugees and immigrants 59–93
(v) Commissions of inquiry 59–94
(vi) Specialist complaints tribunals 59–95
(d) Right to enforcement of an effective remedy 59–98
59.5 Reasonable limitations of the right 59–102

60 Citizenship

Jonathan Klaaren

60.1 Historical background 60–1
60.2 Questions of interpretation 60–3
60.3 Theories of citizenship 60–4
60.4 Concepts of constitutional citizenship. 60–9

60.5 National legislation 60–11
(a) National legislation: loss 60–12
(b) National legislation: acquisition 60–13
(c) National legislation: beyond acquisition & loss? 60–14
60.6 Rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship 60–14

61 States of Emergency

Nicole Fritz

61.1 Introduction 61–3
61.2 Positioning FC s 37 61–4
(a) Legal regimes that regulate states of emergency 61–4
(b) Challenges brought about by new types of threat 61–7
61.3 Themes emanating from FC s 37 61–11
(a) Role envisaged for the courts 61–11
(b) International law and South Africa's emergency powers 61–13
61.4 Analysis of FC s 37 61–17
(a) When may an emergency be declared? 61–17
(b) Regulating declarations of a state of emergency 61–19
(c) Action taken during an emergency 61–21
(d) Non-derogable rights 61–22
(e) Rights of detainees 61–23

62 Access to Information

Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold

62.1 Introduction 62-1
62.2 The relationship between the Constitution, the Access to Information Act and other legislation 62-4
(a) The relationship between the Constitution and the AIA and between the Constitution and other legislation 62-4
(b) The relationship between the AIA and other legislation 62-7
62.3 General structure of the AIA 62-8
62.4 What the AIA is not: Data protection legislation 62-9
62.5 Blanket exclusion of certain records 62-10
(a) Records requested for criminal or civil proceedings 62-10
(b) Records of Cabinet 62-10
(c) Records of judicial functions of courts 62-11
(d) Records of members of Parliament 62-11
62.6 The distinction between public and private bodies 62-11
62.7 Required for the excercise or protection of any rights 62-14
62.8 Grounds of refusal 62-18
(a) Privacy 62-19
(b) Defence, security and international relations 62-21
(c) Operations of public bodies 62-22
62.9 Public interest override 62-24

63 Just Administrative Action

Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold

63.1 Introduction: administrative justice in a constitutional democracy 63–1
63.2 The relationship between the Final Constitution, PAJA, the principle of legality, and the common law 63–5
(a) The relationship between the Final Constitution and PAJA 63–5
(i) The extent of PAJA's exclusivity 63–6
(ii) The constitutional command to enact legislation contemplated in FC s 33(3) 63–8
(iii) Can other legislation give effect to the right to just administrative action? 63–8
(iv) The continuing role of FC s 33 63–10
(b) The principle of legality 63–15
(c) The relationship between the Final Constitution and the common law 63–19
63.3 The meaning of administrative action 63–20
(a) Introduction 63–20
(b) Administrative action under the Final Constitution 63–25
(i) The general scope of administrative action 63–25
(ii) The distinction between legislative and administrative action 63–26
(iii) The distinction between executive policy decisions, political judgments and administrative action 63–28
(iv) The distinction between judicial and administrative action 63–33
(v) The distinction between administrative action and labour relations. 63–34
(vi) Rule-making as administrative action 63–38
(vii) Statutory arbitrations as administrative action 63–44
(viii) The distinction between public and private power 63–48
(ix) Some relevant factors in assessing whether a power is private or public 63–56
(c) The meaning of administrative action under PAJA 63–59
(i) Background and the general approach to 'administrative action' under PAJA 63–59
(ii) A decision of an administrative nature 63–61
(iii) Made in terms of an empowering provision (or the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation) 63–62
(iv) Specific exclusions from the definition of administrative action . . . 63–65
(v) A decision of an organ of state or person exercising public power or performing a public function 63–68
(vi) The requirement of adversely affecting rights. 63–69
(vii) A direct, external legal effect 63–74
63.4 The right to lawful administrative action 63–75
63.5 The right to procedurally fair administrative action 63–80
(a) Introduction 63–80
(b) The rationales for procedural fairness 63–81
(c) The flexible nature of procedural fairness. 63–83
(d) The scope of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person 63–84

(i) The difficulty in reconciling s 3(1) with the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 of PAJA . . . 63–85
(ii) The meaning of 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person' . . . 63–89
(e) The content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person 63–95
(f) The scope and content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting the public . . . 63–99
(g) The rule against bias . . . 63–100
(h) Institutional bias . . . 63–103
63.6 The right to reasonable administrative action . . . 63–104
(a) Reasonableness: a (somewhat) controversial ground of review . . . 63–104
(b) The constitutional right to reasonable administrative action . . . 63–107
(d) Reasonableness review under PAJA . . . 63–110
63.7 The right to written reasons . . . 63–113
(a) The constitutional right to written reasons . . . 63–113
(b) The rationales for the right to written reasons . . . 63–113
(c) The scope of the right to written reasons . . . 63–114
(d) The content of PAJA s 5: the meaning of 'adequate' reasons . . . 63–117
(e) The request-driven nature of the right to written reasons under PAJA 63–118
63.8 Standing to enforce the right to just administrative action . . . 63–119
63.9 Substantive relief . . . 63–121
63.10 The substantive protection of legitimate expectations . . . 63–123

64 Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour

Stuart Woolman & Michael Bishop

64.1 Introduction . . . 64–1
64.2 Doctrinal Dilemmas . . . 64–2
64.3 Drafting History . . . 64–5
64.4 Definitions . . . 64–5
(a) Slavery . . . 64–6
(b) Servitude . . . 64–11
(c) Forced labour . . . 64–15
64.5 International law obligations . . . 64–18
(a) Customary international law . . . 64–18
(b) General conventions . . . 64–19
(c) Human rights instruments . . . 64–20
64.6 Slavery, servitude and forced labour in context . . . 64–21
(a) Sexual slavery and human trafficking . . . 64–21
(b) Marriage and servitude . . . 64–28
(i) Lobola . . . 64–28
(ii) Religious marriages . . . 64–34
(iii) Mine wives . . . 64–35
(c) Farm labour . . . 64–36
(d) Domestic workers . . . 64–40

(e) Child labour 64–43
(f) Prison labour 64–46
(g) Community service and public works 64–49
(h) Conscription 64–53

65 Official Languages and Language Rights

Iain Currie

65.1 Historical context of the official language provisions 65–1
65.2 Official languages 65–4
(a) The eleven languages 65–4
(b) The meaning of 'official language' 65–4
65.3 Relationship between the official languages 65–5
(a) Equitable treatment and parity of esteem 65–5
(b) Non-diminishment of existing rights and status 65–7
65.4 Use of official languages by government 65–9
(a) The National Language Policy Framework 65–9
(b) National and provincial government 65–9
(i) 'Purposes of government' 65–9
(ii) Legislation 65–10
(iii) Administration 65–12
(iv) The margin of appreciation 65–13
(c) Local Government 65–14
65.5 Corrective measures in relation to indigenous languages 65–14
65.6 Use of an official language in judicial proceedings 65–15
65.7 Pan South African Language Board 65–17

66 Freedom of Movement and Residence

Jonathan Klaaren

66.1 Introduction 66-1
(a) Application and scope of FC s 21 66-1
(i) Beneficiaries of the right 66-1
(ii) Criterion of territoriality 66-2
(iii) Criterion of South African nationality 66-3
(iv) Criterion of legality 66-4
(b) Content of FC s 21 66-5
(i) Purpose of the Right to Freedom of Movement and Residence . . . 66-5
(ii) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement 66-7
(iii) Everyone has the right to leave the Republic 66-9
(iv) Every citizen has the right to enter the Republic 66-10
(v) Every citizen has the right to remain in the Republic 66-10
(vi) Every citizen has the right to reside anywhere in the Republic 66-11
(vii) Every citizen has the right to a passport 66-11
(c) Policy issues relevant to the Right to Freedom and Movement and Residence 66-11

(d) Relationship of freedom of movement and residence to other constitutional rights 66-12
(i) Dignity 66-12
(ii) Equality 66-13

Table of Cases . . . . . Table of Cases–54

1 A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa

Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop

1.1 Introduction 1–1

1.2 On the methodology of Constitutional Law of South Africa 1–1

1.3 On the relationship between Constitutional Law of South Africa and the Final Constitution 1–5

> Do I contradict myself? Very well, then I contradict myself.
> I am large, I contain multitudes.
> Walt Whitman Leaves of Grass

> Constitutional choices must be made; to all of us belong the challenges of making them wisely. We make them at many levels in many ways. Judges must make them whenever choosing among alternative interpretations of the Constitution … Legislators must make such choices … in voting for or against measures challenged as constitutionally infirm … As lawyers and scholars, all of us must make constitutional choices in the cases or causes we argue, in the constitutional viewpoints and principles we espouse or reject. … I write in part out of a conviction that constitutional choices, whatever else their character, must be made as fundamental choices of principle, not as instrumental calculations of utility, or as pseudo-scientific calibrations of social cost against social benefit … in which the 'costs' … are supposedly 'balanced' against the 'benefits' … My reply to this grim metamorphosis of constitutional argument … is not to propose an alternative method… My reply is to question all formulas as concealing the constitutional choices that we must make — and that we cannot responsibly pretend to derive by any neutral technique.
> Laurence Tribe Constitutional Choices

1.1 INTRODUCTION

Writing an introduction to this four-volume, 76 chapter treatise — Constitutional Law of South Africa — is akin to writing a Baedeker for the city of Venice. Coherent as the four volumes may appear on a bookshelf, the contents of this work — like the many twisting streets, hidden canals, cul de sacs and charms of that isle — cannot be captured in the short space we have allotted ourselves. We have, therefore, set ourselves two limited tasks. The first is to explain the method behind this work and what it hopes to achieve. The second is to say something about how Constitutional Law of South Africa connects to the text of the Final Constitution, the jurisprudence of our courts, and the basic principles that animate our constitutional democracy.

1.2 ON THE METHODOLOGY OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

No single account of South African constitutional law could explain either the content of our Constitution, the legislation promulgated by Parliament or the jurisprudence of our courts. Constitutional Law of South Africa certainly never set itself such a Herculean task. But let's say it had. The rapid speed at which South African constitutional law has developed — from the coming into force of the Interim Constitution in 1994, the advent of the Final Constitution in 1997, and the subsequent jurisprudence that has flowed from both these documents — would have defied such an effort.

While this work follows — self-consciously — a maximalist approach to constitutional law, the fact that Constitutional Law of South Africa is a multi-authored work means that any attempt to fit all 76 chapters within a single analytic rubric would likewise have proved impossible.[1] That said, the maximalism and the anti-reductive approach associated with Tribe's American Constitutional Law has determined what we — as the editors — have asked of all our authors.

The first thing that we ask of them is that they take the text of the Final Constitution, the reasoning of cases, the political institutions that govern us, the fellow academics who contribute to their understanding, and a whole range of other quotidian academic considerations — like logic and research —seriously.[2] Within these parameters, we have been able to give the best South African and international legal academics the freedom to write about the area (or areas) of constitutional law doctrine that most interests them. What we may have lost through this approach in overarching coherence, we hope to have made up in discrete, detailed, theoretically sophisticated chapters that provide some insight into the problems thrown up by South Africa's basic law.

A second goal that we set for all of our authors is that they write chapters that succeed in making greater sense of the system of constitutional law within which we operate. In the best of all possible worlds, the authors would — after engaging the text of the Final Constitution, the reasoning of cases, and the contributions of fellow academics in the field — produce a full blown 'theory' about the subject matter of their chapter. Again, such an expectation is subject to three strong limitations. The first limitation is that some subjects — for a variety of reasons — do not lend themselves to detailed accounts of the black letter law (for there may be none), good faith reconstructions of the black letter law (because such a good faith reconstruction is defeated by the black letter law) and preferred readings of the Final Constitution (because there are few, if any, grounds for dispute over the basic law's meaning).[1] The second limitation flows from the fact that many authors may not be inclined to offer a 'deep' account of their subject matter. The third limitation is that quite a number of chapters offer accounts of technical or procedural aspects of constitutional law that neither admit nor warrant a grand theory: a statement of the law as it stands is more than service enough to our readers.[2] As editors, we have imposed a baseline 'standard' for the chapters without dictating a template that all the chapters must follow.

[1] See William Brennan 'Reason, Passion and "The Progress of the Law"' (1988) 10 Cardozo Law Review 3. In speaking about 19th century treatises, Brennan wrote: 'The goal of the treatise — to classify reported cases into objective and determinative categories of legal principle — appealed to the positivist minds of the late-nineteenth century . . . Through classification of subjects, it sought to show that law proceeds not from will but from reason. Through its "black letter" presentation of supposed "general principles" of law it sought to suppress all controversy over policy which promoting the comforting ideal of a logical, symmetrical and, most importantly, inexorable system of law.' Conspicuously absent from the treatises was any narrative voice. The earliest treatises contain no commentary whatsoever, and even in later editions authors eschewed personal commentary on the cases and principles. The absence of commentary was consistent with, and no doubt helped to reinforce, the nineteenth-century conception of law as something that judges discovered but did not help define.' Ibid. It should be obvious that a treatise with over 50 authors defies the earlier efforts of treatises to systematize the law. Indeed, Brennan and the editors share, amongst other things, the belief that law's progress is contingent upon a happy marriage of reason, passion and multiple perspectives. See also Albie Sachs 'A Gentle Provocation: A Reply to Stu Woolman' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 37, 39.

[2] We know, for example, that the correct reading of a founding provision may turn on the placement of a comma — and that a bad outcome may flow from an errant reading of a preposition. On the importance of a comma for understanding the meaning of 'democracy' in our Constitution, see Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10. On the importance of a misinterpretation of a proposition — 'of' in Kaunda — for the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights, see Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

That said, our push for maximalism — and our openness to giving each author a platform to say what she or he wishes — has led many of our authors to adopt the desired approach. As a result, over a third of the chapters are of monograph length and quality. Another third of the chapters offer rich accounts of their subject matter — detailed coverage of the black letter law and a good faith reconstruction of the law as it currently stands — while eschewing the academic predisposition to offer a 'grand' theory. The final third, we hope, say exactly what needs to be said, though they may appear 'thin' by comparison to the more ambitious chapters.

We would like to suggest that the richness of this book lies precisely in its democracy and pluralism — the multi-faceted picture of South African constitutional law that the work as a whole constructs. Step back, and much like one of Seurat's pointillist paintings, all of a sudden discrete dabs of paint begin to cohere and a fuller picture of South African constitutional law starts to emerge.

But perhaps the demand for even that level of coherence cannot be sustained by the many chapters in this work. Indeed, there are many instances where chapters overlap in subject matter and offer distinctly different pictures of their subjects. That sets up the strong democratic Whitmanian or cubist view of Constitutional Law of South Africa. We consider that a virtue of this work. For, by setting our authors free to write as they like over the past seven years, we have had no expectation that they would agree with us or other authors in the book. For example, 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' (Michelman) covers terrain explored in some detail in 'Jurisdiction' (Seedorf). Read both. The conclusions that they draw from the text, the case law and secondary sources are not entirely at odds. However, they do engage in deep, well-articulated, and respectful rational disagreement. Or take the more subject

[1] See, eg, Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo 'The Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious, and Linguistic Communities' (supra) at Chapter 24F (Authors opted for a sociological analysis of this Chapter Nine Institution because it had produced no decisions of note and because the fragility of the institution seemed to be its most compelling feature.)

[2] See, eg, Adrian Friedman 'Costs' (supra) at Chapter 6 (Advocate Friedman's chapter is the only one of its kind — as far as we know — and an invaluable guide to practitioners (and academics) who wish to understand how the awarding of costs works in constitutional matters.)

specific chapters on the 'President and the National Executive' (Murray & Stacey), the 'National Legislative Authority' (Budlender), 'Provincial Executive Authority' (Murray & Ampofo-Anti), 'Provincial Legislative Authority' (Madlingozi & Woolman), 'Local Government' (Steytler & De Visser), 'Legislative Competence' (Bronstein), 'Conflicts' (Bronstein), 'Co-operative Government' (Woolman, Roux & Bekink), 'Democracy' (Roux) and 'Public Finance' (Kriel & Monadjem). While there may be little disagreement on how the case law ought to be read, there are more than marginal differences between the authors about how the powers of our democratic institutions ought to be understood and whether various provisions regarding the allocation of political power in the Final Constitution require a progressive, liberal or conservative reading. Similar kinds of disagreements (between Albertyn, Bishop, Klaaren, Schutte, Soweto-Aullo, White and Woolman) take place in the chapters on the Chapter Nine Institutions

As one might expect, the chapters on the Bill of Rights create even more opportunity for 'dust-ups' — though they are never pitched in that manner. The chapters on Freedom of Association, Dignity, Education and Community Rights (Woolman), and their reliance upon a pretty thick understanding of involuntary associations and the need to protect sources of social capital stand in tension with the unremittingly egalitarian line taken in the chapter on 'Equality' (Albertyn & Goldblatt). The chapters on Socio-Economic Rights are penned by some of the best South African legal academics writing today. Here you'll find a commitment to a thick reasonableness test grounded in dignity (Liebenberg) set off against another chapter's strong philosophical arguments in favour of a minimum core (Bilchitz). Moreover, we benefit equally from the 'Food' chapter's discussion (Brand) on how the State's FC s 7(2) duty to protect, to promote and to fulfil fundamental rights influences our understanding of FC ss 26 and 27, and the 'Housing' chapter's account of the dynamic relationship between constitutional housing law and government housing policy during the past ten years (McLean).

Even the most 'mechanical' sections produce important disagreements. Monograph length chapters on 'Application' (Woolman) and 'Limitations' (Woolman & Botha) bracket an equally lengthy treatment of 'Interpretation' (Du Plessis). However, the normative (and structural) framework of shared constitutional interpretation and experimental constitutionalism that underlies both 'Application' and 'Limitations' sits somewhat uneasily with the predisposition towards subsidiarity in 'Interpretation'.

Who is right? As far as we are concerned, no one author in Constitutional Law of South Africa has written a single chapter that lies beyond the most basic strictures of coherence or plausibility. Constitutional Law of South Africa is large; it contains multitudes; and it may — on occasion — contradict itself. But like a cubist painting, the subject depicted will be all the more interesting for the alternative perspectives that different authors offer our readers.

1.3 On the Relationship Between Constitutional Law of South Africa and the Final Constitution

As we have already noted, many chapters in this work, and some of the best articles in South African constitutional law jurisprudence, aspire to be maximalist. What we mean by that term should not be misunderstood. The maximalist chapters are not designed to exhaust the entire interpretative space that a constitutional provision or norm creates. Rather our understanding of maximalism is that, where possible, and where the author is so inclined, the chapters ought to provide fairly full-blown accounts of the case law as it stands, a good faith reconstruction of the law, a critique where the good faith reconstruction itself lacks coherence and a preferred reading where the critique calls for one.[1]

The 'call' for maximalism — for substantive reasoning, but no specific form of substantive reasoning itself — is hardly new. Various authors have pressed for various forms of maximalism since the Interim Constitution came into being. Etienne Mureinik's 'A Bridge to Where' continues to remind us that the mere authoritative pronouncements of the courts, or Parliament or the President, are not good enough.[2] We are always entitled to good, compelling reasons for government action: and it is, in fact, a constitutional obligation of government to persuade us of the rectitude of its responses to various social needs and problems.[3] Indeed, the demand for reasons — good reasons — explains why we have a just administrative action clause — as well as the Promotion of Access to Justice Act (PAJA)[1] — and why we have justiciable socio-economic rights.[2]

[1] A good faith reconstruction can mean a number of things. First, it can be as simple as pulling together a diverse set of cases that fall within the scope of a particular constitutional provision and demonstrating how — in the absence of any express 'theory' provided by the courts — the author's reconstruction holds that body of law together. That is, in fact, a task undertaken by most academics and practitioners as a matter of course. (In a treatise, one might expect more explanation as to how a brace of cases are held together than one would find in heads of argument.) Second, it may mean something more: in the face of thinly reasoned judgments, academics may be required to 'fill in the gaps' in order to provide an account of what a particular constitutional provision is designed to do. This exercise, to be meaningful, must begin with the premise that the Court is (generally) right about its findings. It falls then, to the honest interpreter to 'struggle' with the texts in order to make them meaningful (in its truest sense) to ordinary readers. See Frank Michelman 'On the Uses of Interpretive Charity: Some Notes From Abroad on Application, Avoidance, Equality, and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1 ('Charity'). Professor Michelman's influence on the writing of many chapters in this work can be traced to his instructions regarding what a good faith reconstruction is, and how the principle of interpretive charity forces a particular kind of discipline on the interpreter. Between the good faith reconstruction and a preferred reading, our authors hope to do more than provide aesthetically pleasing designs of how law ought to appear. These thought projects are intended to stand some test of time.

[2] Etienne Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where?' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 32 ('If the new Constitution is a bridge away from a culture of authority, it is clear what it must be a bridge to. It must lead to a culture of justification — a culture in which every exercise of public power is expected to be justified; in which the leadership given by government rests on the cogency of the case offered in defense of its decisions, not the fear inspired by the force at its command.')

[3] See FC s 7(2); Mureinik (supra) at 32. This vision has been endorsed by the Constitutional Court on a number of occasions. See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 156; Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25; Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: in re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 85.

Karl Klare's 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' picks up where Mureinik left off.[3] In particular, Klare focuses on alternative institutional arrangements that 'can be used to include the interests of people who find it difficult to make use of the participatory [or political] process'.[4] This new institutionalism lies at the heart of his post-liberal order. In a new South African social democratic state, Klare's judiciary would advance the 'progressive agenda' made manifest in our Final Constitution through greater transparency and thicker justifications for the reasoning that underlies the courts' decisions'.[5] However, it is one thing to 'call for substantive reasoning' in constitutional adjudication. It is

[1] Act 1 of 2000.

[2] See Etienne Mureinik 'Beyond a Charter of Luxuries: Socio-Economic Rights in the Constitution' (1992) 8 SAJHR 464. Between the Act and FC s 33, one exhausts many, if not quite all, of the public law disputes brought to court. See Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Pennfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008); Cora Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (2007). However, Professor Mureinik's most significant contribution to the creation of a government of law, and not a government of men, was his staunch defence of the common-law principle of legality. See Etienne Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review: Participation and Accountability' in Hugh Corder (ed) Administrative Law Reform (1993) 35, 38-39. For Professor Mureinik, legality — and the kind of robust review he advocated — is desirable because it makes government more responsive to the people, and because it 'fosters the justification of decisions' which, in turn, 'can be used to include the interests of people who find it difficult to make use of the participatory process.' Ibid at 42. Legality or the rule of law doctrine is now one of the most important features of South African constitutional law. The best articulation of the legality principle or the rule of law doctrine occurs in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers: 'There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control.' See Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at para 44. See also Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure'); Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law Doctrine, the Legality Principle and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11, 11-38. See also Frank Michelman 'Constitutional Supremacy and Appellate Jurisdiction in South Africa' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 33; Justice Kate O'Regan 'On the Reach of the Constitution and the Nature of Constitutional Jurisdiction: A Reply to Frank Michelman' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 51.

[3] (1998) 14 SAJHR 148.

[4] In reading some of the initial judgments of the Constitutional Court, Klare saw some reason for concern. As evidence for such concern, he begins with a quote from S v Makwanyane: 'Our function is to interpret the text of the Constitution as it stands. Accordingly, whatever our personal views on this fraught subject might be, our response must be a purely legal one.' 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 349.

[5] Ibid at 152. It is fair to say that the vast majority of South African constitutional scholars shared (and still share) this vision, and that quite a few had already put that conception into words. See, eg, Stu Woolman & Dennis Davis 'The Last Laugh: Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights under the Interim and the Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361.

quite another to provide a 'theory' that would require our courts to offer substantive arguments grounded in first principles.[1] Klare offers no such theory.[2]

Alfred Cockrell's 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' captures the critical difference between 'a call' for transformative adjudication and the actual delivery of substantive reasons for decisions.[3] Unlike the anti-positivists or anti-formalists who preceded him,[4] Cockrell speaks the language of rules and does not for a moment deny their efficacy. What he wants, however, is greater space for the substantive reasoning that justifies the decision in a case and any rule that might be applied to (or arise from) the case. (And that, for starters, is what Constitutional Law of South Africa does — or attempts to do — when our courts do not.)

But what have these views to do with the decision-making process of the Constitutional Court? The commitment to rules had been thought to obscure from view the ugly, inhumane substantive reasons that served to uphold the racist apartheid regime. (That rather outré belief reflects a rather odd reification of law — in the South African legal academy — in light of the palpable facts on the ground during life under apartheid.) If one could get behind the rules, so the anti-formalists argued, then one might have a better chance at securing the kinds of substantive reasoning that would vouchsafe the humane treatment of the majority of South Africa's citizens in its courts.

Thus, when the Constitutional Court first alighted upon the plethora of 'values' to be found in the Bill of Rights and the Interim Constitution as a whole, it saw an opportunity to liberate itself from the formalism that marked apartheid and to [1] See Theunis Roux 'Transformative Constitutionalism and the Best Interpretation of the South African Constitution: Distinction without a Difference?' Paper presented at Conference on Transformative Constitutionalism after 10 Years Stellenbosch University (8 August 2008).

[2] In fairness to Professor Klare, he had been asked by the South African Journal on Human Rights to author a tribute to the late Professor Mureinik. That tribute takes the form of a serious attempt to honour his friend and extend his work. Professor Klare can hardly be faulted for not offering a full blown theory: it was simply not his brief.

[3] Alfred Cockrell 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 1. Cockrell's offering retains its freshness more than 13 years on, because Cockrell, with his usual perspicacity, saw in the 1995 term's jurisprudence troubling ways of approaching both the constitutional text, and the resolution of disputes before the Court, that remain quite evident in the Court's rulings today. Professor Cockrell begins his piece by traversing several themes: (1) the Court's aversion to rules; (2) The sub-optimality of rules; (3) the Court's preference to speak in values. Cockrell is not entirely averse to rule-making. He rues the formalists' beholdenness to rules, in the first instance, because rules will almost always be over-inclusive and under-inclusive. Ibid at 5-6 citing Frederick Schauer Playing by the Rules: A Philosophical Examination of Rule-Based Decision-Making in Law and in Life (1991) 102. But he then notes that such is the purpose of rules. They convey (often desirable) substantive reasoning and preclude decision-makers from taking matters into their own hands. Or: they take certain considerations off the table because previous decision makers have decided that such considerations should not be the subject of debate or play a role in the outcome of disputes. He concurs, therefore, with Frederick Schauer that rules often preclude a decision-maker from getting to the substantive reasons behind the rules. By blocking the use of substantive-reasoning to arrive at better, more appropriate outcomes with respect to the dispute before a court, rules sometimes promote suboptimal outcomes. Cockrell (supra) at 6 citing PS Atiyah & Robert Summers Form and Substance in Anglo-American Law: A Comparative Study of Legal Reasoning, Legal Theory and Legal Institutions (1987) 21.

[4] See John Dugard 'The Judicial Process, Positivism and Civil Liberty (1971) 88 SALJ 181.

engage in the substantive reasoning that had long been blocked in our judiciary. Cockrell expected such a response. However, the results bore out only half his expectations. The Interim Constitution, and its interpretation by the Court, led to a 'paradigm shift with profound implications'. That is, the Court eschewed unjustified rule-making and the formalism associated with it. Still, the cup was but half-full. 'The most striking feature of the record of the first year of the Constitutional Court', writes Cockrell, '… has been the absence of a rigorous jurisprudence of substantive reasoning.'[1] What we were given instead, he continues, is a quasi-theory so lacking in substance that he proposed to call it 'rainbow jurisprudence':

> We have as much chance of finding genuine instruction about substantive reasoning in the wishy-washy pronouncements as we have in touching a rainbow. Second: it is a feature of these statements … that they seem intent on denying deep conflict in the realm of substantive reasons. My point is that substantive reasons are difficult reasons; they require hard choices to be made between moral or political values which are inherently contestable and over which rational people will disagree.[2]

Cockrell then goes on to note that it would be one thing if the language of rainbow jurisprudence were a 'decoy', 'a cover for some theory that is actually doing the work'.[3] That there is no deep theory, Cockrell contends, emerges from a statement of Sachs J where he acknowledged that 'we will frequently be unable to escape making difficult value judgments, where … logic and precedent are of limited assistance.'[4] Cockrell dissects this statement with characteristic aplomb: since logic and precedent are of limited assistance and rainbow jurisprudence is no decoy for some underlying deeper normative theory, what we are witnessing is a Court averse — in a sizeable number of cases — to the kind of substantive reasoning that would give the Constitution meaningful content.[5]

Twelve years down the road, Cockrell's words still resonate profoundly.[6] What is now clear from the Court's intervening jurisprudence is that it will employ a term of art designed to offer the illusion of substantive reasoning, but fail to make the necessary effort to give that term of art substantive content. We are talking here about the Court's regular invocation of the German Federal Constitutional Court's notion of an 'objective, normative value system'. Unlike the German Federal Constitutional Court, however, the Constitutional Court of South Africa has done little to delineate its extension.[7] Even prior to the use of the phrase in [1] Cockrell (supra) at 10.

[2] Ibid at 11.
[3] Ibid at 12.
[4] Coetzee v Government of the RSA 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 46.
[5] Cockrell acknowledges such exceptions. See, eg, Ferreira v Levin NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 1 (CC).
[6] See Stu Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762.
[7] The Constitutional Court recognizes that there are any number of notionally different approaches one could take when constitutionally pruning the bramble bush that is the South African legal system. However, there is, the Court says, only one true way: '[I]t is within the matrix of … [the Final Constitution's] objective normative value system that the common law must be developed.' See Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 54. See also S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 318 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) at para 27. See also Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security,[1] the Constitutional Court had demonstrated little interest in giving the kind of content to statements about 'values' that might help us better understand the Final Constitution.[2] In Makwanyane, for example, the Court appears to use the 'values' enshrined in the Interim Constitution to do away with capital punishment.[3] However, upon a closer reading of the 11 judgments in this case, one notes that no judgment really takes up the Constitution's invitation to engage in substantive moral, legal or political reasoning. Instead, as Roux notes:

> the common themes running through the eleven judgments are: (1) reference to foreign law as a substitute for the consideration of moral values; (2) rejection of the relevance of public

Phumelela Gaming and Leisure Ltd v Gründlingh & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 883 (CC) at paras 25-29. What this term of art means in South Africa remains unclear. For the clearest exposition of the phrase's meaning, and one entirely ignored by the courts and most academics, see Andre Van Der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism and the Development of South African Property Law: Parts 1 & 2' (2005) TSAR 655 and (2006) TSAR 1. But see Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security 2002 (4) SA 719, 728 (C). Davis J's analysis suggests that the South African usage reflects a modernist response to post-modern anxiety about how memory and power turn law into hotly contested politics. The appeal to universally shared values ostensibly blunts the force of assertions that the Court actually plays politics or that its judgments reflect controversial ethical positions. That said, the phrase currently adds nothing to constitutional analysis. In Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail v Rail Commuters Action Group, the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the Constitutional Court all differed over the content of the civic morality — the objective normative value system — enshrined in the Final Constitution. In Rail Commuter Action Group v Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail, the High Court had found that the Final Constitution imposed a legal duty on Transnet to ensure that all railway commuters — regardless of race or class — enjoyed a certain level of physical safety, 2003 (5) SA 518, 573 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C).While recognizing the 'objective' moral content of our basic law, the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the proposition that our constitutionally mandated morality demanded that a legal duty of care be imposed on Transnet in order to remedy the endemic violence visited upon commuters from historically disadvantaged communities, 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA). When called upon to give the content to the 'objective, normative value system' that would dispose of this matter, the Constitutional Court reversed the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision. Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC). The three decisions offer three obviously different understandings of how the phrase 'objective, normative, value system' determines the meaning of 'freedom and security of the person' and the outcome of a case.

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 54 citing 39 BVerfGE 1, 41.

[2] See Theunis Roux 'Morality, Law and Society: The Constitutional Value System and Social Values in South Africa' Paper presented at the 16th Annual Conference on 'The Individual vs the State' Panel on Constitutional Axiology, or is There Anything Behind/Above the Constitution? Central European University, Budapest, Hungary (June 7-8, 2008)('Values')(Manuscript on file with authors). However, as Roux notes, that does not mean that values have failed to feature, quite significantly, as background norms in a range of cases that have drawn upon various sections of FC s 1. He offers the following examples: the prisoners' right to vote, Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR (CC) at para 21, the allocation of fishing rights, Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 73, the state's duty to provide an effective system for the protection of property rights, President of the Republic of South Africa & others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) paras 48 and 51, and the requirements for registration in municipal elections, African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission & Others 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC). See also Theunis Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International Journal of Constitutional Law — (forthcoming).

[3] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC).

> opinion to the case as a way of defining the Court's institutional function in the new constitutional order; and (3) the use of the indigenous value of ubuntu to forge a link between the constitutional value system and social values.[1]

The Constitutional Court's reticence regarding the meaning of 'an objective normative value system' — or its outright refusal to offer more than thin justifications in a significant number of its decisions — is particularly difficult to reconcile with recent extra-curial remarks of Chief Justice Pius Langa:

> This approach to adjudication requires an acceptance of the politics of law. There is no longer place for assertions that the law can be kept isolated from politics. While they are not the same, they are inherently and necessarily linked. At the same time, transformative adjudication requires judges to acknowledge the effect of what has been referred to elsewhere as the 'personal, intellectual, moral or intellectual preconceptions' on their decision-making. We all enter any decision with our own baggage, both on technical legal issues and on broader social issues. While the policy under apartheid legal culture was to deny these influences on decision-making, our constitutional legal culture requires that we expressly accept and embrace the role that our own beliefs, opinions and ideas play in our decisions. This is vital if respect for court decisions is to flow from the honesty and cogency of the reasons given for them rather than the authority with which they are given.[2]

It is hard to square the Chief Justice's acknowledgement of the politics of law, and the need to provide substantive reasons for a decision, with the Court's preference for couching outcomes in terms of vague reference to the values found in the Final Constitution or to the objective normative value system said to animate the basic law. And thus, 13 years of jurisprudence later, we return to the problem first identified by Cockrell.

What, then, should one make of the Court's lack of interest in making fine distinctions between the right and the good when it regularly relies upon a phrase that requires such distinctions? Perhaps what animates this rhetorical move is no more than a jurisdictional question: namely, how does a specialized constitutional court ensure that the basic law transforms the manner in which courts with plenary jurisdiction dispose of ordinary disputes?[3] Or perhaps this flight from substance 'is necessary to the Court's overall objective of winning public support for its role in the South African political system'.[4] Whatever the reason, a discernible gap clearly exists between what the Court understands its constitutional mandate to be — to model rational discourse and engage in substantive reasoning — and what it actually does.

---

[1] Roux 'Values' (supra) at 23.

[2] (2006) 17 Stellenbosch LR 351.

[3] See S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 318 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC). An 'objective normative value system' grounded in the 'objectives' of FC s 39(2) has the potential to expand dramatically the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Despite the Thebus Court's admission that FC s 39(2) 'does not specify what triggers the need to develop the common law or in which circumstances the development of the common law is justified', the failure of any court to adhere to FC s 39(2)'s obligation to develop the common law in light of the 'notional' demands of the Final Constitution's 'objective normative value system' risks reversal by our highest constitutional tribunal. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at Chapter 31, § 31.4*(e)(ii)(b); Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at Chapter 4, §§ 4.3(d)* and 4.3*(b)*(i)(aa); Michelman 'Rule of Law' (supra) at Chapter 11, § 11.2.

[4] See Roux 'Values' (supra) at 1.

In our view, Constitutional Law of South Africa steps in and fills that gap. It answers Mureinik, Klare, Cockrell and Langa's call for substantive reasoning by, at least momentarily, filling in the 'aporia' in the basic law. Let us be clear: we do not mean to overstate the contribution of Constitutional Law of South Africa. Its 76 chapters and 4 800 or so pages remain a commentary about what the courts, the legislatures, the executive and other institutional actors have already said about our basic law. Our authors engage that work: They do not seek to supplant it. However, where substantive reasoning is missing from the case law, from legislation or executive rule-making, then it falls to the many authors of this work to provide good faith reconstructions — doctrines full of substantive reasons — that 'fill the gap'.

Again, there will be differences amongst the authors about how to fill the gap. The initial surface inclination of some would appear to be toward critique;[1] while others seem more inclined towards charity.[2] But those distinctions reflect no more than the play of surfaces. What does bind the authors of Constitutional Law of South Africa together is that we claim no 'neutral method' of constitutional interpretation that makes hard choices for us. The eschewal of neutral methods — or a single reductive theory of interpretation — further ensures that there is no 'flight from substance' in Constitutional Law of South Africa. As Frank Michelman suggests, the provision of greater heft to a body of case law that is sometimes thinly justified and often under-theorized lies at the heart of the legal theorist's calling. In reflecting upon Tribe's refusal to offer a single theory of interpretation or a neutral method of judicial review that ends all quests for the justification of a constitutional order, Michelman writes: 'When … Tribe speaks … of the futility of the search for … legitimacy, he cannot mean that the question is one we may ever permit ourselves to stop asking.'[3] Such a never-ending quest for the substantive reasons, the full-blown doctrines and 'the fundamental principles' that undergird our basic law is the leitmotif for Constitutional Law of South Africa and its orchestra of authors.[4]

[1] See Stu Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762.

[2] See Frank Michelman 'On the Uses of Interpretive Charity: Some Notes From Abroad on Application, Avoidance, Equality, and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1.

[3] Frank Michelman 'The Not So Puzzling Persistence of the Futile Search: Tribe on Proceduralism in Constitutional Theory' (2008) 42 Tulsa Law Review 797. See also Wil Waluchow 'Constitutions as Living Trees: An Idiot Defends' (2005) 18 Canadian Journal of Law and Jurisprudence 204, 208 (Waluchow suggests that we view Constitutions, Bill of Rights, and Charters as 'representing a mixture of only very modest precommitment[s] combined with a considerable measure of humility. . . Far from being based on the (unwarranted) assumption that we have the right answers to the controversial issues of political morality arising . . .[as constitutional] challenges, the alternative conception stems from the exact opposite: from a recognition that we do not have all the answers, and that we are better off designing our political and legal institutions in ways which are sensitive to this feature of our predicament.')

[4] It is a never-ending quest at a very practical level. Having taken six years to write Constitutional Law of South Africa 2nd Edition (2002–2008), we have been forced to begin its revision immediately upon completion in order to keep pace with the changes in the law and our own points of view.

2 Constitutional History

Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel

2.1 The Potemkin Constitution 2–1
2.2 Colonial politics and Apartheid 2–5
(a) Sasikhona (we were always here) 2–5
(b) (Im)modest beginnings of European involvement in South Africa 2–8
(c) European expansion in South Africa 2–9
(d) English and Roman-Dutch legal traditions 2–10
(e) Early failed attempts at judicial review 2–11
(f) The formation of the Union 2–12
(g) Construction of a bifurcated, racist State 2–13
(i) The South African Native Affairs Commission 2–13
(ii) The racial construction of citizenship 2–15
(h) The rise of Apartheid: Harris I, Harris II & Collins 2–15
(i) Apartheid and the Republic 2–17
(i) Denationalization of black South Africans 2–17
(ii) Apartheid and the creation of Bantustans 2–18
(iii) Apartheid and the silencing of opposition 2–19
(iv) Sharpeville, 1960 and Soweto, 1976 2–21
(v) States of Emergency 2–22
(vi) 1983 Constitution and the endgame of Apartheid . . 2–22
2.3 The struggle for liberation 2–23
(a) Ghandi, pass laws & Satayagrha 2–23
(b) The African National Congress, the Pan Africanist Congress and Black Consciousness 2–25
(c) The Freedom Charter of 1955 2–27
(d) The Rivonia Treason Trial 2–30
(f) The United Democratic Front 2–31
(g) Lawyers, Human Rights and the Rule of Law 2–32

2.4 The road to democracy: private meetings, negotiations, referenda and an assassination 2–34
(a) Meetings in the 1980s, here and abroad. 2–34
(b) ANC initiatives and initiatives from Apartheid institutions 2–35
(c) CODESA and the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum 2–36
(d) The election of 27 April 1994 2–39
2.5 The Interim Constitution, the Constitutional Assembly, 34 Constitutional Principles and the Certification of the Final Constitution 2–39
(a) The drafting of the Final Constitution. 2–39
(b) First Certification Judgment. 2–42
(i) Law and politics 2–42
(ii) The grounds for Non-Certification: Institutional concerns, the Rule of Law & Constitutionalism . . . 2–43
(c) Second Certification Judgment. 2–45
2.6 The Consolidation of Constitutional Democracy. 2–46
(a) Constitutional amendments 2–46
(b) The 14th Amendment Bill 2–47
(c) Dignity, democracy, legality and the Potemkin Constitution 2–48

2.1 The Potemkim Constitution[1]

> There ought to be, behind the door of every happy contented man, some one standing with a hammer continually reminding him with a tap that there are unhappy people; that however happy he may be, life will show him her laws sooner or later — disease, poverty, losses, and no one will see or hear, just as how he neither hears, nor sees others.
>
> Anton Chekhov 'Gooseberries'

Everyone loves a winner. And who would have been churlish enough a year ago to contend that the first 13 years of South Africa's experiment in constitutional democracy was anything but an unadulterated success — especially when viewed against the conflagrations that consumed Bosnia, Rwanda, the Congo, Sudan and Somalia.

On the home front, power passed peacefully from Mandela to Mbeki. The economy grew at 5% a year and a black middle class equal in size and in power to the white middle class arose and suggested that the fundamentals of a bourgeois social democracy had been put in place.

Against this background, the AIDS denialism of the Mbeki regime — its Punch and Judy-like fights with the Treatment Action Campaign — left one shaking one's head. The disaster on the other side of the Limpopo could easily be blamed on an aging dictator with a bad moustache. The ANC's election as party leader of an alleged rapist, a politician charged with being 'on the take', and a public figure who begins populist rallies with intimations about how to take care of the moffies in KZN could be dismissed with deft analyses about how those groups sidelined by Mbeki formed a coalition of self-interest to secure Zuma's party presidency and how democratic politics can actually occur within one-party dominated states. The lights flickering on and off in 2008 could be seen as the price we paid for some very good years, the very bad management of Eskom and petrol rising to almost $150 per barrel (at the time of writing).

But what of the fires that rage, currently, in townships across South Africa. Pat answers about xenophobia do not explain the murderous intent of our fellow citizens. Instead, a scratching of the surface reveals a far more compelling explanation for our current internecine battles.

As recent historiographers of the early 20th century pograms in the Ukraine discovered, the mass murders of Jews were not, primarily, orchestrated by the Czar, the State, the police or the Cossacks, or motivated by such classic anti-semitic fictions as 'The Protocols of the Elders of Zion'.[2] For the most part these continuous outbursts of violence, after the death of the Czar, were the unfortunate responses of large groups of Russians and Ukrainians, who, having moved to the cities from rural environments, found themselves without work, adequate shelter or food. These internal immigrants discovered that outsiders — like the small number of Jews allowed to live in various cities — had access to the scarce resources they so desired. The absence of a strong state, the presence of a political vacuum left by the death of the Czar and high levels of social anxiety created the conditions for the pograms that left some 30,000 dead. Sigmund Freud, reflecting upon these murders and other similar social conflagrations, attributed their occurrence to what he described as 'the narcissism of minor difference'.

* We would like to thank Heinz Klug for permission to use material from his chapter on 'Historical Background' and for constructive suggestions regarding this chapters contents.

[1] See Stu Woolman 'The Potemkin Constitution' Without Prejudice (December 2008).

[2] See Paul Brass (ed) Riots and Pogroms (1996); Johan Klier & Shlomo Lambroza (eds) Pogroms: Anti-Jewish Violence in Modern Russian History (1992).

Freud's theory of the 'narcissism of minor difference' holds that under conditions of instability, people project their anxiety onto others. These 'others' become the ostensible source of the uncertainty — despite the fact that these 'others' bear no responsibility for the current political or economic dynamics of a country, region or city. The us/them dynamic reinforces the identification of individuals with the group and turns the group into a safe harbour or a laager: and it allows these same individuals to turn their rage at their conditions outward toward 'others'. As Freud wrote in Civilization and Its Discontents:

> It is always possible to bind together a considerable number of people in love, so long as there are other people left over to receive the manifestations of their aggressiveness. I once discussed the phenomenon that it is precisely communities with adjoining territories, and related to each other as well, that are engaged in constant feuds and in ridiculing each other — like the Spaniards and the Portuguese, for instance, the North Germans and the South Germans, the English and the Scots and so on. I gave this phenomenon the name of the "narcissism of minor differences".[1]

Relatively recent events in Rwanda bear out the new historiography and the somewhat older Freudian insights. Rwanda's genocide does not reflect a well-conceived orchestration of state-sponsored violence: a political vacuum — created by assassinations and the inability of Hutus and Tutus to arrive at a long-term power sharing arrangement — fed the social anxiety created by too many people forced to make a subsistence living on too little land. The massacre of 800,000 Rwandans by young, male, often unemployed, machete-carrying fellow Rwandans offers a prototypical example of how a weak state incapable of delivering basic services to the majority of its citizens could allow a handful of antagonists to initiate a mass murder.

The ethnic cleansing and genocide in Bosnia and in Nazi Germany bear a strong family resemblance. Yuogoslavia, after Tito's death, had little to hold its loose federation of regions together. With the fall of communism in 1989 — and all the uncertainty that the fall brought to many parts of Eastern Europe — Franjo Tudjman in Croatia and Slobodan Milosevic in Serbia were able to exploit the political vacuum and the social anxiety left by Tito's departure and the absence of a workable democratic constitutional federalist state. The result — aside from the fragmentation of Yugoslavia into some seven autonomous states — was a set of wars, marked by the genocide of Bosnian Serbs. When Michael Ignatieff asked several of the Croatian combatants what this Yugoslavian civil war was all about, he was told: 'They smoke different cigarettes than we do'.[1] Do the conditions out of which the Holocaust arose look so very different? Germany's Weimar Republic was weak. Unemployment rose from 25% before the depression to almost 50% after the depression. Hitler's ability to convince his fellow Germans that the cause of the Reich's rot lay with the assimilation of and miscegenation with non-Aryans — namely the Jews — was rather easy. He had an audience ripe for the taking. And he made it all the easier by using Keynesian economics to drastically reduce unemployment in the 1930s and further convince his fellow Germans that a new Judenfrei Reich would make all of their problems go away.

[1] Sigmund Freud Civilization and Its Discontents (1929) 117. See also Sigmund Freud The Taboo of Virginity (1918); Sigmund Freud Group Psychology and the Analysis of Ego (1921); AG Burstein 'Ethnic Violence and the Narcissism of Minor Differences' (1999) 3 (Manuscript on file with authors)(One might go so far as to claim that the 'in-group exists [solely] by virtue of a denied egoism and a deflected suspicion; the out-group by virtue of the innate suspicion displaced toward it and rationalized on the basis of difference, however minor.') Cf Pal Kostlo 'The "Narcissism of Minor Differences" Theory: Can It Explain Ethnic Conflict?' Filozofijaidrustrutvo (2007).

We are by no means suggesting that the new South Africa bears all — or even many — of the hallmarks of the Ukraine, Rwanda, Czarist Russia, Nazi Germany and the former Yugoslavia. And that is why we have begun our account of South Africa's history by describing our Final Constitution as a Potemkin Constitution. Potemkim, despite the unfortunate idiom attached to his name, did, in fact build a large number of very real villages and ports throughout the Crimea. He has, however, been remembered most for papering over the backwardness of various towns that the Czarina Catherine — and her entourage of foreign guests — would view during a visit through Russia.

We have a Potemkin Constitution because, as we shall see, many of our new institutions and new constitutional doctrines are very real and a marvel to behold. At the same time, the root causes of the riots of 2008 can be traced to a failure — over the past 14 years — to translate the promise of South Africa's liberation into a substantially better life for the majority of South Africans.[2]

We have managed in 14 years to produce a robust commitment to the rule of law within our court system.[3] Shaik, Zuma, Basson have all paid — in part at least — for their sins in courts of law. We have managed in 14 years to establish a commitment in our courts to the recognition of the dignity and the equality of all

[1] Michael Ignatieff The Warrior's Honor (1997)(Offers analysis of Bosnian and Rwandan genocides).

[2] Finance Minister Trevor Manuel recently conceded that xenophobic violence had exposed the government's failure to spread economic gains to the poor. See Financial Times (31 May 2008). In his interview, Manuel admitted that the government's inability to deliver basic services lay behind these deadly riots: 'If you have millions of young people who feel so excluded from all that is good in society, then sometimes this takes a form of actions against others.'

[3] See Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 11; Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers'); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure').

South Africans.[1] Same-sex life partners do not simply enjoy the ability to conduct their 'private affairs' as they wish.[2] They have now been granted the right to form civil unions that place them on an equal legal footing with opposite-sex life partners.[3] We have managed in 14 years to deepen and enrich our notion of democracy. Our democracy is no longer limited to the exercise of the franchise by all citizens every 5 years.[4] It now ensures that citizens are able to participate in various democratic processes that directly affect them.[5]

But this success in building some of the more formal structures of our constitutional order has not been mirrored by an equal degree of success in rectifying wrongs in other domains of our polity. Our HIV/AIDS morbidity and mortality rates for women and children have risen: the same rates have fallen in our poorer neighboring states.[6] Our housing policy — and its predilection for little stands with white picket fences — has not made a significant dent in the backlog that exists for affordable housing.[7] We have yet to see a comprehensive food policy programme that would prevent some 40% of our country from experiencing hunger every year.[8] We are on the verge of having a second lost generation of learners because schools have not been built and our teachers have not been adequately trained.[9]

And so we have, at this historical moment, a Potemkin Constitution.

[1] See Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 35.

[2] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC).

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC).

[4] See August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC); New National Party of SA v Government of the RSA & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC); Democratic Party v Government of the RSA & Others 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC).

[5] See Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10; Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC); Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of South Africa & Others 2007 (6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC).

[6] See UNAIDS Epidemiological Fact Sheet on HIV/AIDS and STIs (South Africa 2006), available at http://www.unaids.org; DT Jamison, RG Feachem, MW Makgoba, ER Bos, FK Baingana, KJ Hofman & KO Rogo (eds) Disease and Mortality in Sub-Saharan Africa (2nd Edition, 2006); Stu Woolman & Courtenay Sprague 'Aspen Pharmacare: Providing Affordable Generic Pharmaceuticals to Treat HIV/AIDS and Tuberculosis' in R Hamann, S Woolman & C Sprague (eds) The Business of Sustainable Development in Africa: Human Rights, Public-Private Partnerships, and New Business Models (2008) Case 13.

[7] See Kirsty McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 55. See also K Rust 'No Shortcuts: South Africa's Progress in Implementing its Housing Policy, 1994—2002' (Unpublished paper prepared for the Institute for Housing of South Africa, 2003, on file with the authors); National Department of Housing Breaking New Ground: The Comprehensive Plan for the Creation of Sustainable Settlements (2004) 4.

[8] See Danie Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 56C.

[9] See Brahm Fleisch Primary Education in Crisis (2007).

That said, we do not have an apartheid Constitution. Our Final Constitution's entrenchment of the rule of law, the right to dignity and various forms of direct, participatory and representative democracy reflects the manner in which we have overcome (some of) the depredations of apartheid.

We shall spend the initial part of this chapter acknowledging that past and explaining, at least obliquely, how the depredations of apartheid — the absence of any semblance of the rule of law, the refusal to recognize the dignity of most of South Africa's denizens, and the wholesale denial of basic democratic rights to 87% of the population — are mirrored by the transformation brought about by the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution. We shall then move from the period that has been identified as both 'Colonial Politics and Apartheid' and 'The Struggle for Liberation' into the period known rightly as 'The Road to Democracy'. In this penultimate section of the chapter, we shall traverse the constitutional negotiations that brought us both democratic constitutions, the certification judgments that officially stamped the Final Constitution as our basic law, the amendments that have shifted the content of our basic law, and an amendment bill that potentially threatens the independence of the institution — the judiciary — vouchsafed with protecting the basic law. In 'The Consolidation of Constitutional Democracy', we end with an acknowledgement of the basic constitutional doctrines that mark the break between the old order and the new, some ruminations as to whether that break is sufficiently radical for the centre to hold, and whether one can expect much more than a formal break from the basic text that animates this treatise.

2.2 Colonial Politics and Apartheid

(a) Sasikhona (We Were Always Here)[1]

South African political history did not begin, as many an outdated legal text might have us believe, in 1652. This portion of southern Africa had long been home to many autonomous communities. Many of these communities — though no longer fully autonomous — continue to form an important part of South Africa's political fabric.

Indeed, one might want to start this section again. There was, in truth, no 'South Africa' prior to the Union of South Africa in 1910. And so even the presence of Europeans, with their history of trading posts, incursions in-land, wars of conquest and a three-century long period of colonialism, often gets filtered by legal historians looking back in time through the distorted political lens of the rather recent construct known as the 'Republic of South Africa'.

[1] Of course, this proposition too is untrue — no matter what the language (Xhosa, rather San or English). All existing human populations are a function of treks back and forth across the globe over the last 200,000 years. What a significant cohort of physical anthropologists and geneticists currently seem to agree upon is that the same mitochondrial DNA — shared by all of humanity — can be traced back to approximately '2,000 to 10,000 Africans who lived around 190,000 years ago'. Stephen Oppenheimer Out of Africa's Eden: The Peopling of the World (2003) 46 citing Rebecca Cann et al 'Mitochondrial DNA and Human Evolution' (1987) 325 Nature 31; E Watson et al 'Mitochondrial Footprints for Human Expansions in Africa' (1997) 61 American Journal of Human Genetics 691; M Richards and V Macauley (2001) 68 American Journal of Human Genetics 1315.

What then can be said? Studies in anthropology clearly demonstrate that

> [t]he region was not demarcated ecologically or culturally. There were two main zones, an arid western one, occupied by Khoisan-speaking hunters and herders [the San were the hunters, the Khoi the herders], and an eastern one, occupied largely by Bantu-speaking agro-pastoralists, but there were further significant differences between the Nguni-speaking peoples of the eastern coastal region and the Sotho-Tswana of the Highveld.[1]

Still, as Adam Kuper notes, Bantu, Nguni and Sotho-Tswana communities possessed a strong linguistic family resemblance and shared a wide array of values, beliefs, rituals and institutions.[2] These values, beliefs, rituals and institutions continue to inform everyday South African life.

One of the primary concepts that continues to animate everyday South African life — at least at the level of rhetoric — is 'ubuntu'. 'Ubuntu', an express grundnorm of the Interim Constitution,[3] and an implicit commitment of the Final Constitution,[4] captures, according to Chief Justice Pius Langa:

> a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.[5]

However, as unique and widespread as the cultural artifact 'ubuntu' may be to southern Africa,[6] it does not radically distinguish the relationship between individuals and the communities in southern African thought from non-African cultural conceptions of the relationship between members of a given society. Hillel's tripartite injunction — 'If I am not for myself, then who will be for me? If I

[1] Adam Kuper 'Review: Carolyn Hamilton's The Mfecane Aftermath: Reconstructive Debates in Southern African History' (1997) 38 Current Anthropology (1997) 471.

[2] Ibid.

[3] The post-amble of the Interim Constitution Act 200 of 1993 ('IC') reads, in pertinent part, as follows: 'This Constitution provides a historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice, and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex. . . . These can now be addressed on the basis that there is a need for understanding but not for vengeance, a need for reparation but not for retaliation, a need for ubuntu but not for victimization.' (Emphasis added.)

[4] See Hoffman v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 38 (According to Justice Ngcobo: 'People living with HIV must be treated with compassion and understanding. We must show ubuntu towards them.')

[5] See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 224-225.

[6] Marius Pieterse notes that most of the pre-colonial African communities still resident in South Africa have a phrase that mirrors 'ubuntu': in Xhosa, the same general commitments are reflected in the maxim 'Umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu' or in the Sotho saying 'Motho ke motho ba batho ba bangwe'. M Pieterse '"Traditional" African Jurisprudence' in C Roederer & D Moellendorf (eds) Jurisprudence (2004) 438, 441.

am not for others who am I? If not now, when? — is grounded in a particularly strong sense of political solidarity (well over 2000 years old) in the Hebraic tradition. A person who answers to the demands of such a call is a 'mensch'. That Yiddish word 'mensch' maps pretty closely onto its linguistic German cousin 'Menschlichkeit'. Both terms represent, at bottom, the goal of every human being to rise above her passions and, in every moral transaction, to attempt to turn herself, as the American writer Henry James wrote, into a person 'upon whom nothing is lost'.[1]

Our point is not to displace 'ubuntu' as a core South African value. Instead we take our more nuanced lead from Marius Pieterse. Pieterse describes The Gorillas in the Mist view of 'ubuntu' and African jurisprudence as clouded by the wishful thinking that 'pre-colonial African society contain[ed] numerous well-hidden "truths" which, once prospected and polished, would enrich the dull worldview of the West with their unsophisticated [and truly authentic] wisdom.'[2] This notion, he continues, 'fails to overcome the ideological bias' — the kind of noble savage/fallenness cleavage associated with Rousseau[3] — and actually stands 'in the way of meaningful engagement with African society' and those long standing conceptions of morality and politics that 'still reverberate through contemporary African society'.[4]

The point of this initial digression is manifestly not to diminish the historical claims of various communities to the land that has come to be known as South Africa.[5] It is, in fact, designed to recognize those claims — but at the same time bracket them. For claims about 'who was already here', invariably begs the question of what one seeks to resolve with questions about time — 'already' (or 'first') — and space — 'here' — and blocks, as Pieterse notes, any genuinely charitable attempt to understand the moral universe occupied by others.[6]

[1] See Henry James The Art of the Novel (1907) 149.

[2] Pieterse (supra) at 339.

[3] Jean-Jacques Rousseau The Social Contract (1762) 1 ('Everything is good in leaving the hands of the Creator of Things; everything degenerates in the hands of man.')

[4] Pieterse (supra) at 339–440. See also Elsje Bonthuys 'Accommodating Gender, Race, Culture and Religion: Outside Legal Subjectivity' (2002) 18 SAJHR 41, 45 ('By their adherence to a somehow purer, authentic lifestyle, residents of the third world compensate sophisticated westerners for their loss of authenticity.')

[5] It is, ultimately, unimportant that the San were here first — several millennia before the Khoikhoi. See Martin Hall The Changing Past: Farmers, Kings, and Traders in southern Africa 200–1860 (1987). What matters is that the Khoisan are treated with equal respect and equal concern within the political community within which we all must live: South Africa.

[6] As Donald Davidson writes: 'Charity is forced on us; whether we like it or not, if we want to understand others, we must count them right in most matters.' Donald Davidson Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation (1984) 197 as cited in Frank Michelman 'On The Uses of Interpretive "Charity": Some Notes From Abroad on Application, Avoidance, Equality, and Objective Unconstitutionality' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1. In addition, the pre-colonial/post-colonial split diminishes, argues Makau wa Mutua, the contribution of Africans (of all hues) to the project of human rights on the continent and to constitutional democracy in South Africa. Makua wa Matua 'The Banjul Charter and the African Cultural Fingerprint: An Evaluation of the Language of Duties' (1994) 35 Virginia Journal of International Law 339, 346–359. We make the same argument later on about the relationship between the Freedom Charter and the Final Constitution.

(b) (Im)Modest Beginnings of European Involvement in South Africa

South Africa's recorded history begins in 1652 — that is to say its European history. During that year the Dutch East India Company ('DEI'), with a party consisting of three ships, arrived at what is now Cape Town. The company's intention was not to establish a colony. They merely meant to create a way-station — a simple refreshment outpost for ships to resupply their basic stocks during their voyages from Europe to the Orient and back.[1]

Indeed, with its eye always on the bottom line, the DEI ordered Jan van Riebeeck, the station commander, to have limited engagement with the local inhabitants.[2] Van Riebeeck was permitted to grow fruit and vegetables and to barter with the Khoisan population of the Cape to purchase animals.[3] A hedge planted around the settlement marked the limits of intended European settlement in Africa.[4] The governance structures of the Cape were equally modest. Executive, legislative and judicial authority vested in a DEI Council of Policy.[5]

The Company's disengagement with the world beyond the hedges ensured that the first European settlers objectified the native populations of South Africa and reduced them to mere instruments in DEI's trade policies.[6] Thus began the next three and a half centuries of disenfranchisement of South Africa's denizens.[7]

Had the Dutch East India Company succeeded at limiting Cape Town to a fuel stop, history may well have taken a different tack. However, the DEI's concern for the bottom line required van Riebeeck to retrench a number of his employees. These employees moved beyond the hedges and remained in the Cape as farmers.

[1] See Frank Welsh A History of South Africa (1998) 25; Allister Sparks The Mind of South Africa (2003) 35.

[2] See Sparks (supra) at 35. The Dutch East India Company had had less than stellar success in the establishment of various colonies. It was, therefore, less inclined to duplicate those follies in the Cape. See Welsh (supra) at 25.

[3] See Sparks (supra) at 35.

[4] Sparks (supra) at xv. Rijkloof van Graan, a visiting commissioner of the Dutch East India Company, suggested the construction of a canal which would separate the settlement from the rest of the African continent. The Dutch East India Company rejected this suggestion.

[5] Welsh (supra) at 25.

[6] See Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005). Dignity requires the recognition of the individual as an end-in-herself, and does not tolerate the treatment of others as mere instruments for the realization of the objectives of others. And yet, from the earliest arrival of European settlers, South Africa's history has been marked by legal conventions designed to turn black South Africans into mere instruments for white colonial control. For example, the notorious restrictions of black land ownership occasioned by the Land Act 27 of 1913 were designed to redeploy black labor from farm to mines — without any regard for the needs of the workers, their families or their communities.

[7] As George Devenish writes, 'the arrival of the Dutch settlers [signalled] a brutal policy of hegemony and inequality between the whites and people of colour that was to endure for nearly 350 years.' George Devenish Commentary on the South African Constitution (1999) 551.

(c) The Expansion of European Involvement in South Africa

In fact, these employees, and the other Europeans that followed them, moved well beyond the hedges. Over the next 250 years, these employees, their descendants, migrants and the indigenous population of South Africa witnessed — and took part in — a series of convulsive events, each marking a distinctive period in the colonial era.

Even the first venture of 'free burghers' beyond the Dutch East Indies' hedge became a source of conflict. The Khoikhoi launched the 'first war of resistance'.[1] The Khoikhoi lost — but took their grievances and cattle elsewhere, namely to land settled by other indigenous communities. A domino effect followed. New wars were waged between communities vying for the same territory. As Allister Sparks notes, the Khoikhoi conflict established South Africa's overriding political principles for the next three centuries:

> Thus was established the right of conquest and a tradition that the land was the White South African's for the taking. It was the first act in a long process of land dispossession that combined with slavery and cheap labour to create the institutions and the habits of apartheid society.[2]

The 'Afrikaner' peace lasted about 150 years. In 1795, the British annexed the Cape Colony. The English — some two centuries ahead of the Afrikaners in politics, in industry and the making of war — initially crushed both Afrikaner and African communities. Moreover, their later discovery of gold and diamonds enabled them 'to launch the continent's only industrial revolution and build its most powerful economy.'[3]

The real result was perpetual war — not peace. The British invasion and the sealing off of the boarder of the Eastern Cape had a much larger domino effect than the Dutch East India Company-Khoikhoi conflict of a century past. Thirty years of war resulted in conflicts between virtually every population group in South Africa. When the dust had settled two important facts were indisputable: the Afrikaners had resettled some '1000 miles to the north and . . . black Africans had been dispossessed of 90% of their land.'[4] In sum, the British invasion led to the establishment of English colonies in the Cape and Natal; the peripatetic trek of the Afrikaners to the north culminated in the eventual creation of the two Boer republics in the Orange Free State and the South African Republic; and wars amongst indigenous population led to the consolidation of a Zulu nation of some 7 million people in Natal. So, by the mid-nineteenth century, we had two colonies, two republics, and a self-governing, not as yet defeated, African kingdom.

The situation remained much the same until the late 1880s.[5] The gold and diamonds of Johannesburg and Kimberly proved too great an attraction to the [1] Sparks (supra) at 36.

[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 43.
[4] Ibid at 48.
[5] Welsh (supra) at 274. Of course, in the interim, the British managed: to conduct a disastrous series of battles with the Zulus; to fail to prevent an equaling damaging war with the Xhosa; to receive the short end of a battle with the Transvaal; and to outrage the Orange Free State through their unilateral annexation of diamond mines. Ibid.

English — as did the seductive prospect of greater wealth in Rhodesia. Only the Orange Free State and the Transvaal stood in the way. The Anglo-Boer war, over diamonds and gold, began in earnest in 1899.

(d) The English Model and the Roman-Dutch Tradition

The introduction of Roman-Dutch law in South Africa followed hot on the heels of the arrival of the Dutch East India Company. Roman-Dutch law — rooted in Roman law, German custom and Dutch practice — was implemented by the company throughout the region.[1]

By 1806, the British had occupied and imposed their public law on the Cape. At the time, the notion that Parliament could 'do everything that is not naturally impossible' was the dominant political doctrine in English law. (English courts retained some sense of 'natural justice'. This sensibility, and a commitment to ensuring that Parliament played by the rules Parliament itself articulated, constituted the full extent of judicial review under English law.[2]) By the time some measure of self-government was granted to the Cape and Natal, parliamentary supremacy was the defining feature of British politics.[3]

The dominance of British legal institutions — parliamentary sovereignty and the common law — in the Cape and Natal did not displace the Roman-Dutch tradition. Indeed, the Roman-Dutch tradition remains an influential feature of South African law today. Of course, as Martin Chanock notes, both systems of law addressed challenges prevalent in Europe and were not 'developed in response to contemporary needs and conflicts' in southern Africa.[4]

After the Anglo-Boer War at the beginning of the 20th century, one of the two systems had to give. And the British had won the war. Great Britain's Westminster System remained the departure point for South African politics from the creation of the Union of South Africa in 1909 through the country's liberation in 1994.[5] As Gretchen Carpenter writes:

> Parliament was composed of members elected on the basis of territorial representation in single-member constituencies; the government was in the hands of a Cabinet of ministers, who were Members of Parliament, belonging to the majority party of Parliament and responsible to Parliament; the most important figure in the government was the Prime Minister, who was the leader of the majority party in Parliament; the State President was a figure-head cast in the mould of the British monarch; conventions played a major role in determining the relationships between the various organs of government; the party system operated in a manner similar to that encountered in Britain; the principles of parliamentary sovereignty and separation of powers were adhered to in the same measure as in Britain,

[1] See John Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 9; Adam Ashforth The Politics of Official Discourse in Twentieth-Century South Africa (1990) 34.

[2] See Dr Bonham's Case 8 Co Rep 113b, 77 ER 646 (CP 1610)(Sir Edward Coke); Roscoe Pound The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty (1957).

[3] See Dugard (supra) at 14-18.

[4] Martin Chanock The Making of South African Legal Culture 1902-1936: Fear, Favour and Prejudice (2001) 155.

[5] See David Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems (1991) 35.

with some adaptations; evolutionary development was a feature of the system; and South Africa had a unitary and not a federal system of government.[1]

(e) The Early Failure of Judicial Review in South Africa

Despite the dominance of English constitutionalism in the Cape and Natal, the Boer Republics established in the mid-nineteenth century sought alternative sources of constitutionalism. Drafters of the Orange Free State Constitution of 1854 turned to the Constitution of the United States of America and adopted rigid rules of amendment and guaranteed rights of peaceful assembly, petition, property, and equality before the law.[2] Although the 1854 Constitution did not explicitly provide for judicial review or a Supreme Court, such a court was established by legislation in 1876 and its power of judicial review was 'accepted as an inherent feature of the Constitution'.[3]

The attempt by Chief Justice JG Kotze in the High Court of the South African Republic ('ZAR') to actually assert the power of judicial review did not meet with much success. In a judgment replete with references to US Chief Justice Marshall's reasoning in Marbury v Madison, Kotze CJ argued that as sovereignty vested in the people of the Republic and not the Volksraad, the court had a duty to strike down legislation incompatible with the Grondwet.[4]

Kotze's decision triggered a firestorm within the executive of the ZAR. ZAR President Paul Kruger's declared that the 'testing right' was an 'invention of the devil'.[5] After the Volksraad adopted legislation denying the court's power of judicial review, President Kruger dismissed the Chief Justice. While Kotze was supported by judges on the Orange Free State Bench, important members of the Cape Bench and the Johannesburg Bar, such as Sir Henry de Villiers and Jan Smuts, supported President Kruger's assertion of legislative supremacy.[6]

Despite the formal recognition of constitutional review in the Orange Free State and its assertion by the Chief Justice of the South African Republic, the court undertook judicial review of legislation in but one case. In Cassim and Solomon v The State, the High Court of the Orange Free State reviewed a law of 1890 that prohibited 'Asians' from settling in the state without the permission of the President. The legislation was challenged on the grounds that it violated the constitutional guarantee of equality before the law. The High Court upheld the [1] Gretchen Carpenter Introduction to South African Constitutional Law (1987) 80. The 1983 Constitution, which attempted to co-opt Indian and Coloured voters, 'combined the state President and Prime Minister into one office, created a tri-cameral parliament, and mandated a multi-party governing cabinet rather than a winner-take-all system.' Ibid at 81. However, given that the 1983 Constitution left all the hallmarks of white minority executive rule in place, it is hard to characterize the 1983 Constitution, as Carpenter does, as a significant break from the Westminster System.

[2] See HR Hahlo & Ellison Kahn South Africa: The Development of its Laws and Constitution (1960) 72–83.

[3] Marburg v Madison 5 US 137 (1803)(Though not the first exercise of judicial review in the United States, Marbury v Madison is viewed as the ur-text for the assertion of such powers in other constitutional democracies.)

[4] Brown v Leyds NO (1897) 4 Off Rep 17.

[5] See Dugard (supra) at 22.

[6] Ibid at 23. See also Hahlo & Kahn (supra) at 107–110.

legislation on the grounds that the constitutional guarantee had to be 'read in accordance with the mores of the Voortrekkers'.[1] Thus even this early experiment with constitutionalism bore the taint of racism that would later be enshrined in South African constitutional law.[2]

(f) The Formation of the Union

After the fragile peace at the end of the Anglo-Boer War in 1902, negotiations began to unite the two former British colonies and the two former Boer Republics.[3] In 1908, the South African National Convention met to discuss this thorny issue and the even thornier 'Native Question'.[4]

The convention ended in 1909 with the creation of the Union of South Africa. The Union laid the foundations for the modern South African state: for the first time, a single territorial entity was called South Africa; and we, today, share those same borders.

The Union was a product of intense compromise. The parties to the 'National Convention' were in basic agreement on the need for white political unity in order to resolve economic tensions between the former colonies and the Boer Republics.[5] Further agreement was finally achieved on the equal official status of English and Dutch (later Afrikaans). Despite Judge Kotze's public plea before a meeting of the Convention for a rigid Constitution with a Bill of Rights, s 152 of the South Africa Act empowered Parliament to 'repeal or alter any of the provisions of this Act' by a simple majority in both Houses.[6] This provision was subject to a number of entrenchment procedures.

The thorniest of issues turned on race. At the time of the Union, the Cape had made provision for a qualified non-white franchise. Indeed, the franchise was open to all 'civilised' men.[7] The Republics were fundamentally opposed to allowing any non-white franchise and the Transvaal maintained a strict colour bar. The Cape's proposal was that the qualified franchise be extended throughout the Union. Not surprisingly, the Afrikaans states threatened to leave the convention. The two sides compromised: the Cape non-white franchise would be maintained

[1] Dugard (supra) at 19.

[2] See John Hund 'A Bill of Rights for South Africa' (1989) 34 American Journal of Jurisprudence 23 (Hund contends that the grounds for the rejection of the notion of a sovereign Bill of Rights — in the Boer Republics — lay in a Calvinist view of the proper place of an individual — namely a subordinate role — within an essentially authoritarian state.)

[3] DJ Brand 'Constitutional Reform — The South African Process' (2002-2003) 33 Cumberland Law Review 1, 3.

[4] Ibid.

[5] The argument for political unity as the most efficient means of realizing economic progress was initially formulated by members of Lord Milner's 'Kindergarten'. It was given the imprimatur of approval by the High Commissioner, Lord Selborne, in 1907 ('Selborne Memorandum'). See Lord Selbourne 'A Review of the Present Mutual Relations of the British South Africa Colonies' (1907) Cd 3564. See also Leonard Thompson 'The Compromise of Union' in M Wilson & L Thompson (eds) The Oxford History of South Africa Vol II (1975) 347.

[6] See Dugard (supra) at 26.

[7] Ibid at 20. Natal shared with the Cape the notion that voting should be extended to all civilised men. However, its property ownership qualification effectively ensured that the existing cohort of 'civilized' men contained virtually no non-white voters.

— but would not be extended beyond the Cape. The parties then subjected this arrangement to entrenched procedures that would not be easy to repeal.[1]

The concessions made by the British administration regarding the voting rights of non-white citizens represented a massive betrayal of the majority of South Africa's population. As George Devenish notes, during the nineteenth century, the Cape Constitution was the most liberal Constitution in the British Empire and, by percentage, more non-white voters enjoyed the franchise in the Cape than did working class voters in Britain.[2]

South Africa, however, was still a colony. Thus, South Africa's first constitution was in fact a product of the British Parliament:[3] The South Africa Act.[4] Until the passing of the Statute of Westminster in 1931, any product of the colony's legislature was subject to the Colonial Laws Validity Act. The Act provided for the invalidation of South African law by the British government.

At the heart of the creation of modern South Africa lay racial exclusion. The Convention was entirely white. This level of exclusivity did not however extend to the effects of the Convention. Black South Africa — although subject to the dictates of a legislature — had no voice, no representation in that legislature. As Iain Currie and Johan de Waal note, the Union, from its very inception violated one of Albert Dicey's essential preconditions for the rule of law.[5] South Africa's Parliament could not, in Diceyean terms, legislate validly for the majority of its citizens: the governed were not subject to the same rules as the governers.[6]

(g) Construction of a Bifurcated, Racist State

(i) The South African Native Affairs Commission

The immediate origins of bifurcation are to be found in the process of unification. The process gained momentum after the establishment of the South African

[1] Section 35 of the South Africa Act l909 (9 Edw 7, c 9). The first proposal would have required a two-thirds majority of each House of Parliament. The final compromise was weaker — a two-thirds vote of both Houses sitting together. See Hahlo & Kahn (supra) at 122.

[2] Devenish (supra) at 554.

[3] The Union adopted the Westminster model. Parliament was bicameral. A senate formed the upper house and held the lion's share of power

[4] See Brand (supra) at 3.

[5] Iain Currie & Johan de Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 3. Albert Dicey Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th Edition, 1959) 171.

[6] Black voters were removed from the common voters roll by the Representation of Natives Act 12 of 1936. The Act provided Africans with indirect representation in Parliament via a 'Natives Representative Council'. The Council, in turn, possessed only limited advisory abilities. Dyzenhaus Hard Cases (supra) at 38. The Act, which was passed in accordance with the entrenched procedures of section 35 of the South Africa Act, was seen by some of its opponents in Parliament as a departure from passing laws that at least can claim to be aimed at improving and 'uplifting' the African population. Ibid. In challenging the validity of the Act, the appellant in Ndlwana v Hofmeyr NO somewhat counter-intuitively argued that as a consequence of the passage of the Statute of Westminster in 1931, the Union Parliament was no longer bound by the entrenched clauses of the South Africa Act. 1937 AD 229 (The Statute of Westminster empowered the Union Parliament to pass laws in conflict with Imperial laws.) In rejecting this argument, the court, per Stratford ACJ, held that an Act of Parliament cannot be questioned as 'Parliament, composed of its three constituent elements, can adopt any procedure it thinks fit; the procedure expressed or implied in the South Africa Act, in so far as Courts of Law are concerned, [are] at the mercy of Parliament like everything else'. Ibid at 238. Indirect representation of Africans in Parliament was finally abolished on 30 June 1960 as a consequence of apartheid policy and the Promotion of Bantu Self-Government Act 46 of l959. See Hahlo & Kahn (supra) at 165.

Native Affairs Commission ('Lagden Commission') and a pan-South African Customs Union in 1903.[1] Although the recognition of African territories and land holdings came out of the interaction of independent African communities and expanding colonialism,[2] the Inter-Colonial Customs Conference of 1903 elevated this recognition into a principle of governance: 'the reservation by the state of land for the exclusive use and benefit of natives involves special obligations on their part to the state'.[3] Appointed 'with the object of arriving at a common understanding' in the formulation of native policy, the Lagden Commission's Report adopted the principle of 'special obligations' and developed a vision of a future South African federation based on the territorial segregation of black and white as a permanent mandatory feature of public life.[4]

While the Commission's endorsement of territorial separation merely coincided with the establishment of segregated 'locations' for urban Africans by the governments of all four colonies, it also gave approval to the established Shepstonian practice of creating 'native reserves'. The Lagden Commission found in this reservation of land, and the 'special obligations' arising out of it, a principled basis for political segregation. The Commission first identifies 'natives' as having 'distinct rights' to the reserved lands as the 'ancestral lands held by their forefathers'. These tenure rights are then characterized as amounting to a form of group ownership under which the 'Tribal Chief' administers the land in trust for the people.

Finally, the chiefs are said to have transferred their sovereign rights — including their powers of administration over communal lands — to the Crown through a process of 'peaceful annexation'. Having received all the rights and obligations previously possessed by the chief as sovereign, the Crown then had the duty to administer the affairs of 'natives' according to traditional forms of governance — 'tribalism'. The Commission described this 'tribal system' as follows: '[like] father exercises authority within his family … so the Chief rules the tribe and guides its Destinies'. This description left no doubt as to the degree of autocracy envisaged by the Commission. Instead of merely acknowledging a plurality of systems of governance, the Commission placed authority in the hands of the white administration which, according to the Commission, was obliged to govern the 'natives' 'as a nation in its nonage'.[5]

The creation of 'differential spheres of citizenship for "European" and "Native" populations within one territory' was reflected in s 147 of the South Africa Act of 1909.[6] While the bulk of the South Africa Act dealt with the powers of a government, to be essentially representative of white male adults, s 147 stated

[1] See Rodney Davenport South Africa: A Modern History (1977) 147–169.
[2] See Rodney Davenport & KS Hunt (eds) The Right to Land (1974) 1–30.
[3] South African Inter-Colonial Customs Conference 1903, Cd 1640, Minutes 'Native Question' at para 1.
[4] Davenport South Africa (supra) at 152.
[5] Adam Ashforth The Politics of Official Discourse (1990) 37.
[6] Ibid.

that '[t]he control and administration of native affairs … throughout the Union shall vest in the Governor-General in Council'.[1] The connection between the exercise of authority over 'natives' and the exercise of authority over land was made explicit in s 147. It stated that the executive (the Governor-General in Council) > shall exercise all special powers in regard to native administration hitherto vested in the Governors of the Colonies or exercised by them as Supreme chiefs, and any lands vested in the Governor … for the purposes of reserves, for native locations shall vest in the Governor-General in Council, who shall exercise all special powers in relation to such reserves as may hitherto have been exercisable by any such Governor.

(ii) The Racial Construction of Citizenship

The history of the franchise and the fragmentation of voting rights provide the two most important keys to unlocking the construction of citizenship in South Africa. While immigration law encouraged the expansion of a 'European' community, it was the constant manipulation of voting rights that determined the character of South African citizenship and the constitutional order. In part, it was the cleavages between the two main segments of the white population, those of English decent and those of Dutch decent, which drove the racialization of political power and the marginalization of Africans. The English — in efforts to appease the defeated Afrikaners immediately after the war, to minimize discontent when the depression hit Afrikaaner semi-skilled workers particularly hard and to ensure that a significant portion of all white South Africans might be enriched by a South African economy built on cheap African labor — systematically stripped black South Africans of all meaningful political power.

(h) The Rise of Apartheid: Harris I, Harris II & Collins

South Africa, like Britain, emerged from the Second World War with its wartime leader facing re-election. Jan Smuts, like Winston Churchill, failed to be re-elected.

In the 1948 general election, South African politics lurched sharply to the right. The Nationalist Party obtained a mandate to govern based largely on a platform of radically institutionalised racial segregation.

The question of the limits of judicial review over Parliamentary action arose soon after the election of the Nationalist Party. In 1951, Parliament passed the Separate Representation of Voter's Act.[2] The Act purported to extinguish what little remained of the non-white vote. The Act was challenged in Harris v Minister of the Interior.[1] The National Party's slender majority in Parliament was to prove to be the Act's undoing. The Act had been passed in both Houses, sitting separately, and by a mere simple majority. Because the Act had failed to secure the special majorities required by the South Africa Act, the Appellate Division upheld the challenge and declared the Act invalid.

[1] See South Africa Act 1909 s 34(i)(The quota of representatives from each province is to be 'obtained by dividing the total number of European male adults in the Union … by the total number of members … .')

[2] Act 46 of 1951.

The Appellate Division's decision in Harris I was not based on the substantive content of the law or its manifest unfairness. It did not invoke, as Brown v Leyds had done, reasoning such as that employed in Marbury v Madison. It struck down the Act on purely procedural grounds.[2]

In response, Parliament passed the High Court of Parliament Act.[3] The Act granted Parliament the power to sit as a court and to review any judgment made by any court which declared any piece of legislation to be invalid.[4] The High Court of Parliament Act met a fate identical to the Separate Representation of Voter's Act. In Harris II, the Appellate Division found that the legislation ran afoul of section 152 of the South Africa Act.[5]

Despite increased support for the National Party ('NP') in the 1956 general elections, the government still could not muster the votes needed to meet the demands of section 35 of the South Africa Act. The government finally arrived at a solution to its problem. It increased the size of the Senate, the upper House of Parliament.[6] Parliament then increased the quorum requirement in the Appellate Division.[7] Having packed the Senate with the numbers necessary to ensure the proper passage of the legislation, the government could rest assured that a similarly loyal bench would uphold the Act.

The South Africa Amendment Act[8] achieved two important objectives for the government. First, it reinstated the 1951 Separation of Voter's Roll Act. Second, it landed the coup de grace on the courts: it excluded the power of judicial review from the exercise of legislative power. The Act provided that '[n]o court of law shall be competent to enquire into or to pronounce upon the validity of any law passed by parliament'. The hegemony of Parliament was now well entrenched. Although a challenge was brought to the Act in Collins v Minister of the Interior, the Appellate division rubber stamped the legislation.[9]

[1] 1952 (2) SA 428 (A)('Harris I').
[2] See Erwin Griswold 'The Demise of the High Court of Parliament Act' (1953) Harvard Law Review 564.
[3] Act 35 of 1953.
[4] Act 35 of 1952.
[5] Minister of the Interior v Harris 1952 (4) SA 769 (A)('Harris II').
[6] The Senate Act 53 of 1955.
[7] The Appellate Division Quorum Act 27 of 1955.
[8] Act 1 of 1958.
[9] Collins v Minister of the Interior 1957 (1) SA 552 (A)('Collins').

(i) Apartheid and the Republic[1]

It is important to constantly recall, as we trawl through the law, David Dyzenhaus' words about the lived experience of apartheid:

> The ordinary day-to-day operation of the apartheid machine inflicted huge suffering on the majority of South Africa's population. In the cause of white supremacy, people were forceably removed from their homes, their land was taken away from them, family members were separated from one another, they were stripped of their citizenship and consigned to dustbowls ruled by dictorial puppets, and they were explicitly told that they should have just those rights and just that amount of education that would fit them into an economic system run for the exclusive benefit of the white majority. … Apartheid inflicted violence on all those who were its victims of its racist laws. That violence was 'ordinary' only in that it was part of the fabric of daily existence. There were also the 'extraordinary' violence of apartheid — the beatings, torture and murder (sometimes amounting to massacre) which the security forces dealt out to political opponents of the ordinary violence.[2]

(i) Denationalization of black South Africans

After all South Africans of colour were officially disenfranchised, three acts in the early 1950s put in place the remaining foundations of apartheid. The Population Registration Act required all South Africans to register — and be classified — as either 'white', 'coloured', 'Indian' or 'Bantu.'[3] The Abolition of Passes and Coordination of Documents Act required all black South African males to carry passes.[4] In 1956, the law was amended to embrace black South African women as well. Finally, the Natives Laws Amendment Act allowed Africans to live in white communities only if they were born there, they had lived there for fifteen years continuously, or they had been continuously employed by the same employer for at least ten years.[5]

[1] As the commitment to apartheid increased, the country's political isolation grew. South Africa was suspended from the Commonwealth. In response, white South African's held a referendum to gauge whether South Africa should end its relationship with Britain and become a Republic. On 31 May 1961, the Republic of South Africa came into being. The advent of the Republic did not bring any substantial constitutional or political change. The South African parliament adopted its own constitution. The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 32 of 1961. The 1961 Constitution enshrined parliamentary sovereignty and limited powers of judicial review.

[2] David Dyzenhaus Judging the Judges, Judging Ourselves: Truth, Reconciliation and the Apartheid Legal Order (1998) 6.

[3] Act 30 of 1950. Interestingly, the definition of European in colonial Natal was constructed primarily around the threefold distinction between indigenous Africans, indentured Indians, and other members of colonial society. For example, prison regulations classified prisoners into three groups, Africans, Indians and Europeans, but the definition of Europeans was unusual in that it included 'all persons of European descent, Eurasians … American Negroes, French Creoles and West Indians'. Albie Sachs Justice in South Africa (1973) 89.

[4] Act 67 of 1952.

[5] Act 54 of 1952.

Given these severe restrictions on black South African participation in South African political life, the government felt obliged to provide some distorted form of political rights to black South Africans. This recognition, combined with the process of decolonization which was sweeping through Africa in the late 1950s, led the apartheid government to produce a scheme which sought to extend franchise rights to the African majority — but only within geographically small, fragmented entities: Bantustans. The logic behind this scheme was the eventual denationalization of the majority of black South Africans and their reconstitution as foreign citizens exercising full political rights outside of the South African constitutional framework. Such Bantustans — the American equivalent of reservations for Native Americans — allowed the cheap African labour force to remain stable — and available — while moving excess workers and their families to fictional homelands 'run' by African leaders controlled by the apartheid state.

(ii) Apartheid and the creation of Bantustans

The Promotion of Bantu Self-Government Act established this scheme.[1] The Union Constitution described these fictional homelands as oases of 'tribal' governance in which Africans could exercise their own unique political aspirations. The apartheid regime referred to this racist, ghettoization of South Africa as the policy of 'separate development'.[2]

This Orwellian language was backed up by action: pass laws and forced removals led to the creation of four notionally 'independent' bantustans and the balkanization of the country.[3] The Transkei Constitution Act initiated the process contemplated by the Bantu Self-Government Act.[4] The Black States Constitution Act continued the process of ghettoization: in a Goebbals-like turn of phrase, the government compared this process 'in form and timing … to African decolonization'.[5] Rejected by the majority of South Africans and the international community as a violation of every black South African's right to self-determination, 'separate development' became a process of denationalization in which the citizenship of black South Africans was re-imagined as foreign citizenship regardless of an individual's place of birth or preference.[6] Ultimately, the [1] See Heinz Klug 'Self-Determination and the Struggle Against Apartheid' (1990) 8 Wisconsin International LJ 251, 294–295.

[2] Act 46 of 1959.

[3] See, generally, HJ Richardson 'Self-Determination, International Law and the South African Bantustan Policy' (1978) 17 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 185; DA Basson & HP Viljoen South African Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 1991) 307–318.

[4] For an early critique of the policy of separate development and the idea of bantustan development, see Govan Mbeki South Africa: The Peasants' Revolt (2nd Edition, 1984) 73–94.

[5] Act 48 of 1963. See WJ Hosten, AB Edwards, C Nathan & F Bosman Introduction to South African Law and Legal Theory (1983) 665–678.

[6] See M Vorster, M Wiechers, D van Vuuren & G Barrie The Constitutions of Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Vendav and Ciskei (1985) 15 (Authors compare the process of 'separate development' under apartheid with the process of decolonization that the British implemented throughout Africa. They show how the South African government attempted to legitimize separate development by following the British decolonization model in form, if not in substance.)

lack of economic infrastructure in the homelands and the refusal of African leaders to participate in this denationalization scheme led to its demise.[1]

(iii) Apartheid and the Silencing of Opposition

From the 1920s onward, the South African government enacted repressive law after repressive law in a largely successful effort to stifle dissent.[2] The promulgation of anti-expression legislation accelerated dramatically after the National Party took power in 1948. The National Party launched its campaign to eviscerate the freedom to dissent — through expression, association and assembly — with the Suppression of Communism Act ('SCA').[3] SCA s 9 allowed the Minister of Justice to prohibit a gathering or an assembly whenever there was, in his opinion, reason to believe that the objects of communism would be furthered at such a gathering.[4] A few years later the government — in response to the ANC's 1952

[1] Dyzenhaus Hard Cases (supra) at 41.

[2] Gilbert Marcus and Derek Spitz lay out a selective, but nowhere near exhaustive, regime of statutory provisions that blocked freedom of expression under apartheid: the Public Safety Act 3 of 1953; the Riotous Assemblies Act 17 of 1956; the Defense Act 44 of 1957; the Police Act 7 of 1958; the Post Office Act 44 of 1958; the Trespass Act 6 of 1956; the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959; the Trademarks Act 62 of 1963; the Armaments Development and Production Act 57 of 1968; the Petroleum Products Act 120 of 1977; the Copyright Act 98 of 1978; the National Key Points Act 102 of 1980; the Intimidation Act 72 of 1982; the Internal Security Act 74 of 1982; the Protection of Information Act 84 of 1982; the Nuclear Energy Act 92 of 1982; the Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993. See Gilbert Marcus & Derek Spitz 'Freedom of Expression' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS2, 1998) Chapter 20, 20-4. See also Anthony Mathews Law, Order and Liberty in South Africa (1971) 240–2, 249–50; John Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 186–91.

[3] Act 44 of 1950. The Act was later incorporated into the Internal Security Act 74 of 1982.

[4] The Minister could, in terms of SCA ss 9 and 5 (which applied to listed persons), give notice to a person prohibiting him from attending any gathering. The provisions gave rise to a number of court cases that turned on the definition of the word 'gathering'. See, eg, S v Meer en 'n Ander 1981 (4) SA 604, 606 (A)(Court accepts premise of the statute — namely that the threat of communism, breakdowns in the security of the State, and the maintenance of public order were real enough to justify radical restrictions on gatherings. Having accepted the premise, the court then articulates a taxonomy of gatherings in which prohibited 'social gatherings' does not 'include the family … activities of the restricted person.') See also C Forsyth In Danger for Their Talents (1985) 148–67; Dugard (supra) at 162–3. The bench's blinkered world-view and its efforts to compartmentalize law and politics meant apartheid era judges could, with a straight face, state that:

> [F]reedom of speech and freedom of assembly are part of the democratic right of every citizen of the Republic, and Parliament guards these rights jealously for they are part of the very foundation upon which Parliament rests. Free assembly is a most important right for it is generally only organized public opinion that carries weight and it is extremely difficult to organize it if there is no right of public assembly.

S v Turrel 1973 (1) SA 248, 256 (C)(Magistrate's prohibition of a meeting in terms of Riotous Assemblies Acts s 2(1) reversed on grounds that the order did not identify the meeting at issue with sufficient clarity.) See also S v Budlender & Another 1973 (1) SA 264 (C). For more on the repression of expression under apartheid, see Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 42. See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Asembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

defiance campaign — passed the Criminal Law Amendment Act ('CLAA').[1] The CLAA increased penalties for crimes committed in the context of political protest.[2]

More serious limitations upon political dissent followed the enactment of a new Riotous Assemblies Act in 1956.[3] Open opposition to the government met with further restrictions in the 1960s and 1970s.[4] By the late 1970s it became almost impossible to obtain permission to protest, to assemble, or to speak out against the tyranny of apartheid.[5] Attempts at reform in the early 1980s failed.[6] In the mid-1980s, as South Africa's political crisis deepened, and it appeared that the law on freedom of speech and conduct could get no worse, the government responded by issuing extremely restrictive 'emergency' regulations under the Public Safety Act.[7]

[1] Act 8 of 1953.

[2] The Internal Security Act was designed to achieve a similar result. Act 74 of 1982 ss 58 and 59. See Ackermann (supra) at 164–168. The judiciary, on occasion, saw a political motive as an aggravating factor in sentencing. See Edwin Cameron 'Civil Disobedience and Passive Resistance' in Hugh Corder (ed) Essays on Law and Social Practice in South Africa (1988) 219, 231.

[3] Act 17 of 1956. Initially, the Act allowed the Minister of Justice to prohibit any public gathering in order to maintain public peace or to prevent the engendering of racial hostility. However, the 1974 amendments to the Act extended the Minister's prohibitory powers to private gatherings. See Riotous Assemblies Amendment Act 30 of 1974 s 2(1). The Riotous Assemblies Act, s 17, states that a person commits the crime of incitement to public violence if the natural and probable consequences of his act, conduct, speech or publication would be the commission of public violence by others. At the time of writing, the Act was, at least partially, still in force.

[4] The General Law Further Amendment Act required that assemblies receive both the local authority's consent and the approval of a magistrate in the district in which the assembly was to take place. Act 92 of 1970 s 15. See Dugard (supra) at 187. Under the Internal Security Acts of 1976 and 1982, the Minister issued annually a notice that declared outdoor gatherings illegal — save for bona fide sporting and religious purposes — unless permission was, at least partially, obtained from a magistrate.

[5] See Hugh Corder & Dennis Davis 'A Long March — Administrative Law in the Appellate Division' (1988) 4 SAJHR 281, 289.

[6] Not only did the Rabie Commission fail to deliver the hoped for reform, it could be argued that it led to an even more repressive regime of laws. See, eg, Internal Security Act 74 of 1982, For a comprehensive analysis of such repressive statutes, see Mathews (supra) at 52–56, 139–147; Ackermann (supra) at 149–168.

[7] Act 3 of 1953. Regulation 7(1), Proclamation 109 of 1986 issued in terms of the Public Safety Act, held that '[t]he . . . Commissioner may for the purpose of the safety of the public . . . issue orders . . . (bA) whereby any particular gathering, or any gathering of a particular nature, class or kind, is prohibited at any place or in any area specified in the order.' A few challenges to the assembly regulations were successful. See, eg, Natal Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v State President of the Republic of South Africa 1986 (4) SA 1109 (N)(Court struck down Regulation 7(1)(d)). The majority were not. See, eg, Van der Westhuizen NO v United Democratic Front 1989 (2) SA 242 (A)(Court upheld regulation 7(1)(bA).) See Etienne Mureinik 'Pursuing Principle: The Appellate Division and Review under the State of Emergency' (1989) 5 SAJHR 60; Deon Basson 'Judicial Activism in a State of Emergency: An Examination of Recent Decisions of the South African Courts' (1987) 3 SAJHR 28; Michael Kidd 'Meetings and the Emergency Regulations' (1989) 5 SAJHR 471. See also John Dugard, Nicholas Haysom & Gilbert Marcus The Last Years of Apartheid: Civil Liberties in South Africa (1992).

(iv) Sharpeville, 1960 and Soweto, 1976[1]

Although official apartheid lasted almost 50 years, two events stand out in the battle against the NP's racist, minority regime: the Sharpeville massacre of 1960 and the Soweto uprising of 1976.

Early on in 1960, the ANC planned to launch a campaign of protests against pass laws. The PAC decided to pre-empt the ANC by launching its own campaign ten days earlier. On March 21, some 7,000 people marched to the police station in Sharpeville.[2] The plan — reminiscent of Ghandi's own campaign — was to make themselves subject to arrest for not carrying their pass books.

The police and the military first responded with fighter planes designed to intimidate the crowd into dispersing. When that tactic failed, the police set up a column of armored vehicles and began to fire upon the crowd.[3] The Truth and Reconciliation Commission noted the ruthless manner of this state-sponsored violence and found 'a degree of deliberation in the decision to open fire'.[4] It further found that the majority killed and wounded were shot in the back.[5] Sixty-nine were left dead.

The domestic response was immediate. Demonstrations, protest marches, strikes, and riots around the country led to the imposition of a state of emergency on 30 May 1960. The international response was almost as immediate — the United Nations and the British Commonwealth condemned the actions.[6] South Africa would not be viewed as the independent Republic it would soon become: the world came to view it as the racist, fascist, pariah state it had long been.

The Soweto Uprising took a somewhat different form. But its effects were equally devastating and substantially longer lasting.

Although the roots of the uprising can be traced back to the Eiselin Report of 1949 — which led to the elimination of mission schools and a radical diminution in state aid for black South African schools — the immediate cause of this massacre was the imposition of Afrikaans on black learners.[7] On June 16, 1976, thousands of black students walked from their schools to Orlando Stadium to protest against this new policy. Again, the organizers of the march had called for peaceful action. The police response — to the throwing of stones and other minimal provocations — was to open fire on the students.[8]

While the number of deaths ran to some 500, the real effect of the Soweto

[1] See, generally, Allister Sparks The Mind of South Africa (1990).

[2] Chris Nicholson 'Nothing Really Gets Better: Reflections on 25 years between Sharpeville and Uitenhage' (1986) 8 Human Rights Quarterly 511, 512.

[3] Ibid at 513.

[4] Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Volume 3, Chapter 6, (1998) 531-537.

[5] Ibid.

[6] United Nations Security Council Resolution 134 (April 1960). See also Geoffrey Robertson Crimes against Humanity (2006) 46.

[7] John Venter Youth Day: June 16 (2007) 8.

[8] Nicholson (supra) at 515.

Uprising was the radicalization of a new generation of South Africans.[1] The lesson many students drew was that violence could only be met with violence. Schools became no-go zones and Umkhonto we Sizwe — the ANC's armed wing — found itself the beneficiary of a new group of willing and able volunteers.[2]

(v) States of Emergency[3]

Under PW Botha's security state in the 1980s, and in the face of the United Democratic Front's efforts to make the country ungovernable, the last years of apartheid rule in South Africa took place in a relatively constant state of emergency.

The State of Emergency declared on 20 July 1985 gave the State President virtually unlimited powers to undermine the resistance to apartheid.[4] He could rule by fiat — the Constitution, for what it was worth, was largely a dead letter. So stringent, so abusive, so inhumane were the security state's efforts that thousands of people were jailed and hundreds 'disappeared'. (The fate of the many disappeared would only be revealed a decade later through the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.) So paranoid and ruthless was PW Botha's regime that possessing documents deemed a 'threat' to state security, advising a person to 'stay away from work' or revealing the names of persons arrested under the State of Emergency became criminal offences.

In 1986, the State of Emergency — initially limited to areas of unrest — was extended to the entire country.[5] It had the reverse of its intended effect: it only further galvanized the opposition. By 1989, Botha had met Mandela and begun to sketch the lineaments of a peaceful transfer of power.[6] A year later, under a new State President, FW de Klerk, the state of emergency was lifted, Mandela was released from 27 years of incarceration, anti-apartheid groups were unbanned, the press was granted greater freedom and the death penalty was suspended.

(vi) 1983 Constitution and the Endgame of Apartheid

The balkanisation of South Africa, under the Bantustan 'states', created additional, unanticipated problems. The white minority government had now created a distorted form of black suffrage in these 'homelands'. It had left unresolved the question as to why two other 'populations' lacked voting power.

---

[1] Thomas Blair 'The Use & Effectiveness of Economic Sanctions against Nations that Violate Human Rights: Can the United States Force Reform on South Africa' (1986) 4 New York Law School Human Rights Annual 511, 512.

[2] George Devenish 'South Africa from Pre-colonial Times to Democracy' (2005) 3 TSAR 547, 565.

[3] See, generally, Stephen Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992).

[4] Devenish (supra) at 565.

[5] See Bloem v State President 1986 (4) SA 1064 (O)(Upholding validity of state of emergency.) See also Edwin Cameron 'Judicial Enforcement of Apartheid Propaganda' (1987) 3 SAJHR 223.

[6] Peter Bouckaert 'The Negotiated Revolution: South Africa's Transition to Multiracial Demoracy' (1995) 33 Stanford Journal of International Law 375, 386. Botha had approached Mandela as early as 1985 — offering emancipatoin in return for a cessation of armed violence. Mandela famously replied: 'Only Free men, not prisoners, can negotiate.'

But the decision in the early 1980s to grant Indian and coloured voters a limited form of the franchise had nothing at all to do with efforts to make South Africa a formally more equal polity. It was, in short, merely an extension of the divide and conquer strategy that drove apartheid politics.[1]

Thus, in 1983, the South African Parliament passed the 1983 South African Constitution ('the Tricameral Constitution'). The 1983 Constitution created three houses of Parliament: the House of Delegates (for Indians), the House of Representatives (for Coloureds) and the House of Assembly (for Whites).[2] However, in no sense was this new institution meant to put these three 'population' groups on an equal footing. (A Department of Information publication released at the time to publicise the new constitution talks, again in 'big lie language', described the 1983 Constitution as a 'sustained effort by various governments to arrive at satisfactory constitutional solutions for South Africa'.[3]

On its face, each group was given the mandate of governing their own affairs. Matters of 'common concern' would be decided by all three houses.[4] However, to ensure that political power remained in white hands on matters of common concern, voting was weighted in terms of a 4:2:1 ratio. The Assembly's votes counted four times the Representatives' votes counted twice. The Delegates' votes counted once only. The ratio ensured that a unified House of Assembly could not be overruled by the other 2 Houses.[5]

At any rate, the political pressures of the anti-apartheid movement resulted in a significant departure from the Westminster system. The 1983 Constitution created a State President. The State President was a much needed product of the times. Under the new Constitution, he could expect Parliament and cabinet to rubber-stamp his decisions. He also enjoyed the power to declare states of emergency that would enable him to further consolidate power in the Executive and act to suppress all threats to the white, minority regime.[6]

2.3 The Liberation Movements: The Struggle for Freedom

It is difficult to say whether there is, as yet, a victor's account of South African history. Many would say we are still on that long walk to freedom.

However, a desiccated historical account of this country's law that failed to consider the role of the liberation movements in shaping the current constitutional landscape would have the perverse effect of emphasizing the actions of those persons in power for the better part of the last few centuries: South Africa's

[1] See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 4; Hugh Corder 'Towards a South African Constitution' (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 491, 495.

[2] For more on the Tricameral Parliament, see John Dugard 'Racism and Repression in South Africa: The Two Faces of Apartheid' (1989) 2 Harvard Human Rights Law Journal 97, 98.

[3] Department of Foreign Affairs and Information Constitutional Guidelines: A New Dispensation for White, Coloureds and Indians (1983)('Constitutional Guidelines') 1.

[4] Ibid at 5.

[5] John van der Vyver 'The 1983 Constitution: An Exercise in Consociationalism?' (1986) 2 SAJHR 341.

[6] See Dugard 'Two Faces' (supra) at 980.

white minority. This section recognizes that the law is more than that which appears in a government gazette. Law — good and bad, enforced and unenforceable — reflects the lived experience of a country's inhabitants.

(a) Ghandi, Pass Laws & Satayagraha[1]

In 1760, the Cape introduced pass laws to regulate the movement of slaves. Pass laws soon became a fashionable way of segregating South Africa — at work, at home and in public. Mahatma Ghandi, a lawyer of Indian extraction arrived, in 1893, to conduct business in Pretoria.[2] He did not find the pass laws attractive or amusing. Soon after purchasing a first class train ticket from Durban, he was forcibly ejected from a train carriage reserved for whites only.[3] Finding himself in jail, and the conditions of Indians in South Africa intolerable, Ghandhi led an Indian movement to have the pass laws withdrawn (for Indians).[4] When various forms of pressure failed, for example, pass burning, he created a new form of resistance: Satayagraha. This peaceful, non-violent form of firm, passive resistance forced the British — who were hell bent on maintaining control of the country through guns, not butter — to reveal the brutal nature of their power.[5]

Shortly after his release from that ignominious stay in jail, Gandhi founded the Natal Indian Congress. The primary purpose of his new endeavor was to teach Indians how to effectively use Satayagraha. And that they did.

In 1906, Gandhi announced that he would return to jail before he obeyed another Anti-Asian law. In addition to various peaceful protests, Gandhi led strikes in the mines and on the plantations — as well as a march from Natal to the Transvaal to protest the racist Anti-Asian measures put in place by the Immigration Act. He paid for his resistance and was jailed on numerous occasions.[6]

But he ultimately succeeded: at least by some lights. In 1914, the relatively new Union government conceded to a number of important demands: the recognition of Indian marriages and the abolition of the poll tax.

Ghandi remembers the course of his life in terms of that first fateful trip from Natal to the Traansvaal:

> I recall particularly one experience that changed the course of my life. Seven days after I had arrived in South Africa the client who had taken me there asked me to go to Pretoria from Durban. It was not an easy journey. On the train I had a first-class ticket, but not a bed ticket. At Maritzburg, when the beds were issued, the guard came and turned me out. The train steamed away leaving me shivering in cold. Now the creative experience comes there. I was afraid for my very life. I entered the dark waiting room. There was a white man in the [1] See, generally, Mohandas Ghandi Satayagraha in South Africa (1928).

[2] John Leubsdorf 'Ghandi's Legal Ethics' 51 Rutgers Law Review (1998) 923, 924.
[3] See Charles DiSalvo 'Ghandi: The Spirituality and Politcs of Suffering' (1997) Oklahoma City University Law Review 51, 53.
[4] See Shuba Ghosh 'Ghandi and the Life of Law' (2003) 53 Syracuse Law Review 1273.
[5] See DiSalvo (supra) at 54.
[6] See Leubsdorf (supra) at 924.

> room. I was afraid of him. What was my duty; I asked my self. Should I go back to India, or should I go forward, with God as my helper and face whatever was in store for me? I decided to stay and suffer. My active non-violence began from that day.[1]

Others take a somewhat dimmer view of Ghandi's contributions. According to Les Switzer, Gandhi saw Satayagraha as little more than a means of protest — and securing reform — on behalf of the Indian in South Africa.[2] Indeed, his language regarding black South Africans was in keeping with the times. He called black South Africans lazy and indolent, and did not, it would appear, make similar efforts to win other South Africans of colour the limited emancipation he secured for Indian South Africans.[3] That said, he did secure such victories in South Africa and quite consciously employed them in India's successful fight for independence.[4]

(b) The African National Congress, the Pan Africanist Congress and Black Consciousness

The African National Congress ('ANC') was formed officially on 8 January 1912.[5] Tribal authorities, people's representatives, church organizations and other prominent individuals — such as John Dube, Pixley ka Isaka Seme and Sol Plaatjie — formed the ANC in order create an institution that defended the rights and freedoms of all black South Africans.[6]

The ANC has a long, complicated history of resistance to white political rule. No short precis of its activities can do it justice. We will therefore confine our account to some of the more important events it orchestrated.

It initiated, in June 1952, and with the assistance of other anti-aparthied movements, the Defiance Campaign. The campaign employed Ghandi's passive resistance techniques against the legal restrictions imposed upon all non-white South Africans. The campaign had limited success — and new laws restricting public protest made passive resistance a less effective means of combating apartheid.

The ANC then helped to engineer the Freedom Charter, again in conjunction with other opponents of apartheid. This document, as we note below, laid the foundation for many of the rights, the freedoms and the democratic institutions we find in the Final Constitution.

The ANC leadership underwent enormous sacrifice in the name of freedom. While many of its leading members were acquitted five years after the first Treason Trial began in 1956, the subsequent Rivonia Trial resulted in the conviction

[1] 'Gandhi in South Africa' available at http://www.encounter.co.za/article/112.html (accessed on 24 June 2008).

[2] Les Switzer South Africa's Alternative Press: Voices of Protest and Resistance, 1880s-1960s (1997).

[3] See David Machlowit 'Ghandi: Lawyer to Legend' (1983) 69 American Bar Association Journal 370.

[4] It would, likewise, be an act of conscious amnesia to forget that Martin Luther King successfully employed Satayagraha in the civil rights movement in the United States some 50 years later.

[5] Thomas Karis 'South African Liberation: The Communist Factor' (1987) 65 Foreign Affairs 267.

[6] Saki Mako Zamce 'The ANC and the Transformation of South Africa' (1995) 2 Brown Journal of World Affairs 241.

and life imprisonment of Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu and many of the other top leaders of the ANC.[1]

Perhaps the ANC's most important pre-liberation decision followed the Sharpeville massacre. The ANC concluded that Ghandhi's Satayagraha would never be an effective means of ending apartheid. The ANC's military wing, Umkhonto we Sizwe ('MK'), was charged with using various forms of violence to sabotage the apartheid state.[2]

In the 1970s and 1980s, the ANC leadership in exile upped the ante. It decided, under Oliver Tambo's leadership, to target for assassination members of the apartheid government and the secret police, and to destroy important assets in the military-industrial complex. The ANC's military attacks convinced many black South Africans that something could be done and the white minority government that they had meaningful opposition when it came to the use of force. The apartheid state's decision to further increase its repressive actions only reinforced the commitment of ANC MK cadres and their United Democratic Front brethren. And it was this commitment through the 1980s that led the apartheid state to concede that it had no option but to cede power to the majority of South Africa's citizens.

It seems ironic then, at this juncture of the narrative, to note that the reason the Pan Africanist Congress ('PAC') split from the ANC in 1959 was that the ANC was thought to be too accommodationist. The PAC, under the leadership of Robert Sobukwe, emphasized mass action and the view that African liberation in South Africa could not be secured with the assistance of Indian, coloured or white members. Although far less of a threat than the ANC — at the time of its formation — the aforementioned two strands of thought had two identifiable consequences. The first was the Sharpville massacre: a direct function of the PAC's desire to pip the ANC to the post in terms of confrontational mass action. The second was an unintended consequence: the ideology of Black Consciousness.

Although the founding of Black Consciousness ('BC') is generally credited to Steve Biko — its political pedigree cannot be denied.[3] Like the PAC, BC held that genuine liberation of black South Africans could not occur within multiracial institutions, parties or movements. Biko sets out the basis for this view in I Write What I Like:

> Black Consciousness is in essence the realization by the black man of the need to rally together with his brothers the cause of their operation — the blackness of their skin — and to operate as a group in order to rid themselves of the shackles that bind them to perpetual > servitude. It seeks to demonstrate the lie that black is an aberration from the 'normal', which is white .... It seeks to infuse the black community with a new-found pride in themselves, their efforts, their value systems .... The interrelationship between the consciousness of the [black] self and [BC's] emancipatory programme is of paramount importance. Blacks no longer seek to reform the system because so doing implies acceptance of the major points around which the system revolves.... Blacks are out to completely transform the system and make of it what they wish. Such an undertaking can only be realized in an atmosphere where people are convinced of the truth inherent in their stand.... With this background in mind we are forced, therefore, to believe that it is a case of haves against have-nots, where whites have been deliberately made haves and blacks have-nots. There is ... no worker in the classic sense among whites in South Africa, for even the most down-trodden white worker still has a lot to lose if the system is changed. He is protected by several laws against the competition at work from the majority. He has a vote and he uses it to return the Nationalist Government to power because he sees them as the only people who, through job reservation laws, are bent on looking after his interests against competition with the 'Natives'. The overall analysis, based upon the Hegelian theory of dialectic materialism, is as follows. That since the thesis is a white racism there can only be one valid antithesis, ie, a solid black unity to counterbalance the scale. If South Africa is to be a land where black and white live together in harmony without fear of group exploitation, it is only when the two opposites have interplayed and produced a viable synthesis of ideas and a modus vivendi. We can never wage any struggle without offering a strong counterpoint to the white races that permeate out society so effectively.[1]

[1] See George Bizos 'The Abrogation and Restoration of the Rule of Law and Judicial Independance in South Africa' (1998) 11 Revue Quebecoise de Droit Internationale 155, 157.

[2] See Bizos (supra) at 157. See also John Dugard 'Soldiers or Terrorists: The ANC & The SADF Compared' (1995) 45 SAJHR 221.

[3] For a discussion of the affect of Black Consciousness on South African Christian establishment, see Peter Walsh 'Church vs State in South Africa: the Christian Institute and the Resurgence of African Nationalism' (1977) Journal of Church & State 457.

As we shall see below, the African National Congress offers in the Freedom Charter a compelling non-racial, but still radical, view of a post-apartheid South Africa. But as we suggest near the end of this chapter, that radical view can be revised — and reiterated — in terms of the standard bourgeois social democratic discourse of modern constitutional law. Biko's BC challenge offered no such accommodation. Whites would — in his view of a Hegelian/Marxist dialectic — be compelled to renounce their current ideology and privilege for some unknown set of institutions that recognized neither capital nor race as singularly important attributes.[2] It is little wonder that the apartheid state saw Steve Biko as a greater threat than everyone's 'hero' — the incarcerated Nelson Mandela. And it is little wonder that the apartheid state engineered his death, while in police custody, in September 1977.[3]

[1] Steve Biko I Write What I Like (1978) 53–55.

[2] Johan Froneman 'Democracy, Constitutional Interpretation and the African Renaissance' (2001) 12 Stellenbosch Law Review 10, 21.

[3] As Kevin Hopkins notes, the murder of Steve Biko was the tipping point for the international community. After his death, South Africa lost the support of France, Britain and the United States. See Kevin Hopkins 'Assessing the Worlds Response to Apartheid: A Historical Account of International Law and its part in the South African Transformation' (2002) 10 Miami International and Comparitive Law Review 241, 254. For an account of the medical attention received by Biko, see also Lawrence Baxter 'The Abdication of Responsibility: the Role of Doctors in the uitenhage Unrest' (1985) 1 SAJHR 151, 152.

(c) The Freedom Charter of 1955

Despite the hegemony of parliamentary sovereignty, the advocacy of human rights from within South Africa's anti-apartheid movement and from social movements outside South Africa kept the notion of inalienable rights alive. Two documents stand out from amongst the others. The ANC's African Claims in South Africa reformulated the Atlantic Charter's principles of freedom and democracy from the perspective of Africans in South Africa. Adopted by the ANC on 16 December 1945, this 'Bill of Rights … made the revolutionary claim of one man one vote, of equal justice in the courts, freedom of land ownership, of residence and of movement … claimed freedom of the press, and demanded equal opportunity in training and in work'.[1] The Freedom Charter, adopted at Kliptown on 26 June 1955 by the Congress of the People, is the second important expression of the aspiration of the majority of South Africans for a charter of rights.[2]

Much is made of the uniqueness and progressiveness of South Africa's Final Constitution. However, that Constitution has a history, and an important part of that history is the adoption of the Freedom Charter. Even the most cursory inspection of the Charter's language reveals the debt our Final Constitution owes to this founding document of the liberation movements in South Africa:

> We, the People of South Africa, declare for all our country and the world to know: that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white, and that no government can justly claim authority unless it is based on the will of all the people; that our people have been robbed of their birthright to land, liberty and peace by a form of government founded on injustice and inequality; that our country will never be prosperous or free until all our people live in brotherhood, enjoying equal rights and opportunities; that only a democratic state, based on the will of all the people, can secure to all their birthright without distinction of colour, race, sex or belief; And therefore, we, the people of South Africa, black and white together equals, countrymen and brothers adopt this Freedom Charter; And we pledge ourselves to strive together, sparing neither strength nor courage, until the democratic changes here set out have been won.
>
> The People Shall Govern! Every man and woman shall have the right to vote for and to stand as a candidate for all bodies which make laws; All people shall be entitled to take part in the administration of the country; The rights of the people shall be the same, regardless of race, colour or sex; All bodies of minority rule, advisory boards, councils and authorities shall be replaced by democratic organs of self-government.
>
> All National Groups Shall have Equal Rights! There shall be equal status in the bodies of state, in the courts and in the schools for all national groups and races; All people shall have equal right to use their own languages, and to develop their own folk culture and customs; All national groups shall be protected by law against insults to their race and national pride; The preaching and practice of national, race or colour discrimination and contempt shall be a punishable crime; All apartheid laws and practices shall be set aside.

[1] Michael Benson The African Patriots: The Story of the African National Congress of South Africa (1963) 117.

[2] See Raymond Suttner & Jeremy Cronin 30 Years of the Freedom Charter (1986). The Congress of the People was launched by the Congress Alliance in 1954 not as a single event but as a series of discussions culminating in the adoption of the Freedom Charter. Professor ZK Mathews, who proposed the Congress of the People, called for 'a gathering to which ordinary people will come, sent there by the people. Their task will be to draw up a blueprint for the free South Africa of the future.' Raymond Suttner The Freedom Charter: The People's Charter in the Nineteen-Eighties (1984).

The People Shall Share in the Country's Wealth! The national wealth of our country, the heritage of South Africans, shall be restored to the people; The mineral wealth beneath the soil, the Banks and monopoly industry shall be transferred to the ownership of the people as a whole; All other industry and trade shall be controlled to assist the wellbeing of the people; All people shall have equal rights to trade where they choose, to manufacture and to enter all trades, crafts and professions.

The Land Shall be Shared Among Those Who Work It! Restrictions of land ownership on a racial basis shall be ended, and all the land re-divided amongst those who work it to banish famine and land hunger; The state shall help the peasants with implements, seed, tractors and dams to save the soil and assist the tillers; Freedom of movement shall be guaranteed to all who work on the land; All shall have the right to occupy land wherever they choose; People shall not be robbed of their cattle, and forced labour and farm prisons shall be abolished.

All Shall be Equal Before the Law! No-one shall be imprisoned, deported or restricted without a fair trial; No-one shall be condemned by the order of any Government official; The courts shall be representative of all the people; Imprisonment shall be only for serious crimes against the people, and shall aim at re-education, not vengeance; The police force and army shall be open to all on an equal basis and shall be the helpers and protectors of the people; All laws which discriminate on grounds of race, colour or belief shall be repealed.

All Shall Enjoy Equal Human Rights! The law shall guarantee to all their right to speak, to organise, to meet together, to publish, to preach, to worship and to educate their children; The privacy of the house from police raids shall be protected by law; All shall be free to travel without restriction from countryside to town, from province to province, and from South Africa abroad; Pass Laws, permits and all other laws restricting these freedoms shall be abolished.

There Shall be Work and Security! All who work shall be free to form trade unions, to elect their officers and to make wage agreements with their employers; The state shall recognise the right and duty of all to work, and to draw full unemployment benefits; Men and women of all races shall receive equal pay for equal work; There shall be a forty-hour working week, a national minimum wage, paid annual leave, and sick leave for all workers, and maternity leave on full pay for all working mothers; Miners, domestic workers, farm workers and civil servants shall have the same rights as all others who work; Child labour, compound labour, the tot system and contract labour shall be abolished.

The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be Opened! The government shall discover, develop and encourage national talent for the enhancement of our cultural life; All the cultural treasures of mankind shall be open to all, by free exchange of books, ideas and contact with other lands; The aim of education shall be to teach the youth to love their people and their culture, to honour human brotherhood, liberty and peace; Education shall be free, compulsory, universal and equal for all children; Higher education and technical training shall be opened to all by means of state allowances and scholarships awarded on the basis of merit; Adult illiteracy shall be ended by a mass state education plan; Teachers shall have all the rights of other citizens; The colour bar in cultural life, in sport and in education shall be abolished.

There Shall be Houses, Security and Comfort! All people shall have the right to live where they choose, be decently housed, and to bring up their families in comfort and security; Unused housing space to be made available to the people; Rent and prices shall be lowered, food plentiful and no-one shall go hungry; A preventive health scheme shall be run by the state; Free medical care and hospitalisation shall be provided for all, with special care for mothers and young children; Slums shall be demolished, and new suburbs built where all have transport, roads, lighting, playing fields, creches and social centres; The aged, the orphans, the disabled and the sick shall be cared for by the state; Rest, leisure and recreation shall be the right of all: Fenced locations and ghettoes shall be abolished, and laws which break up families shall be repealed.

There Shall be Peace and Friendship! South Africa shall be a fully independent state which respects the rights and sovereignty of all nations; South Africa shall strive to maintain world > peace and the settlement of all international disputes by negotiation — not war; Peace and friendship amongst all our people shall be secured by upholding the equal rights, opportunities and status of all; The people of the protectorates Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland shall be free to decide for themselves their own future; The right of all peoples of Africa to independence and self-government shall be recognised, and shall be the basis of close co-operation. Let all people who love their people and their country now say, as we say here: These freedoms we will fight for, side by side, throughout our lives, until we have won our liberty

Aspirational as this document may have been, it resonates profoundly with the document that animates the rest of this four volume treatise. The Freedom Charter, like the Final Constitution, commits itself to a non-racial society (FC s 1), multiparty democracy (FC ss 1 and 19), equality before the law (FC s 9), the universal franchise (FC ss 1 and 20), a redistribution of basic goods and land (FC ss 25, 26 and 27), freedom of trade, occupation and profession (FC s 22), prohibitions on slavery, servitude and forced labour (FC s 13), equal access to education (FC s 29), freedom from public and private violence (FC s 12) and freedom of movement and residence (FC ss 20 and 21). The obvious connections between these two documents gives the lie to the claim that the Final Constitution represents an imposition of western thought on an African society.

(e) The Rivonia Trial

The Rivonia Trial took place during 1963 and 1964. Ten members of the African National Congress — including Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu, Govan Mbeki and Rusty Bernstein — were tried for 221 acts of sabotage. Eight of the accused were found guilty. Only Rusty Bernstein was acquitted.

The state first requested the imposition of the death penalty. However, world-wide protests and skilled legal maneuvers by the defence resulted in sentences of life imprisonment.[1] As the ANC archives note:

> There was no surprise in the fact that Mandela, Sisulu, Mbeki, Motsoaledi, Mlangeni, and Goldberg were found guilty on all four counts. The defense had hoped that Mhlaba, Kathrada, and Bernstein might escape conviction because of the skimpiness of evidence that they were parties to the conspiracy, although undoubtedly they could be prosecuted on other charges. But Mhlaba too was found guilty on all counts, and Kathrada, on one charge of conspiracy. Bernstein, however, was found not guilty. He was rearrested, released on bail, and placed under house arrest. Later he fled the country.[2]

Mandela's conviction took on greater and greater metaphoric dimensions as the years of his imprisonment ticked by. Year after year, 'Free Mandela' became an ever more popular slogan for the anti-apartheid movement. His 27 years of incarceration — and the martyrdom that inevitably followed such a lengthy imprisonment — can blur the meaning and the integrity and the motivations behind Mandela's actions and his willingness to give up his life for the cause of South Africa's freedom. Mandela's own words, at the Rivonia Trial, offer the best possible account of his politics, and the man behind the liberation of South Africa:

[1] The defense was led by Bram Fischer, the distinguished Afrikaner lawyer. He was assisted by Harry Schwarz, Joel Joffe, Arthur Chaskalson, George Bizos and Harold Hanson. Arthur Chaskalson and George Bizos would play, as we note below, an especially significant role in the ongoing legal fight against apartheid. And, of course, Arthur Chaskalson would go on to become the first President of the Constitutional Court, and then still later, Chief Justice of South Africa. See Bizos (supra) at 158. See also Stephen Ellmann 'To Live Outside the Law, You Must be Honest': Brahm Fischer & the Meaning of Integrity' (2001) 17 SAJHR 451.

[2] The Rivonia Trial (2008), available at www.anc.org.za/show.php?=ancdocs/history/trials/toward_ robben_ island.html (accessed on 24 June 2008).

> The structure and organization of early African societies in this country . . . greatly influenced the evolution of my political outlook. The land, the main source of production, belonged to the whole tribe . . . . There were no classes, no rich or poor and no exploitation of man by man. . . . There was much in such a society that was . . . insecure . . . and it certainly would not live up to the demands of the present epoch. But in such a society lay the seeds of revolutionary democracy in which none shall be held in slavery or servitude, and in which poverty, want and insecurity shall be no more. This is the history which . . . inspires . . . our struggle. . . . I would say that the whole life of any thinking African in this country drives him continuously to conflict between his conscience on the one hand and the law on the other. Recently, in Britain, . . . Bertrand Russell, probably the most respected philosopher of the western world, was sentenced and convicted for precisely the type of activities for which I stand before you today — for following his conscience in defiance of the law, as a protest against the nuclear weapons being pursued by his own government. He could do no other than to oppose the law and suffer the consequences for it. Nor can I. Nor can many Africans in this country. The law as it is applied, the law as it is written and designed by the Nationalist government is a law which, in our view, is immoral, unjust and intolerable. . . . I was made, by the law, a criminal, not because of what I had done, but because of what I stood for, because of what I thought, because of my conscience. . . . [T]here comes a time, as it came in my life, when a man is denied the right to live a normal life, when he can only live the life of an outlaw because the government has so decreed to use the law to impose a state of outlawry upon him. I was driven to this situation, and I do not regret the decisions that I did take. Other people will be driven in the same way in this country . . . to follow my course, of that I am certain.[1]

(f) The United Democratic Front

Formed in 1983, the United Democratic Front ('UDF') was an incredibly broad non-racial coalition of about 700 civic, church, student and worker organisations.[2] At its height, the UDF could claim some 3 million members. They were not underground: they were a visible — and intentionally disturbing — part of South African life.

The UDF was initially inspired by the new 'insult' of the 1983 Constitution and its Tricameral Parliament.[3] But the UDF was not brought into being to 'protest' just another apartheid institution. The genius of the UDF's strategy lay in its plan to make South Africa ungovernable. The UDF's strikes, rent boycotts, school

[1] Nelson Mandela Long Walk to Freedom (1995) 329–332.

[2] See Karis (supra) at 269; Bernard Magubane 'The Current Situation in South Africa: A Sociological Perspective' (1987) 5 Journal of Law & Religion 473; Thomas Karis 'Revolution in the Making: Black Politics in South Africa' (1984) 62 Foreign Affairs 378.

[3] Implementation of the tricameral Parliament was met with 90 000 students and 90 000 miners going on strike. See Grayling Williams 'In Support of Azania: Divestiture of Public Pension Funds as One Answer to US Private Investment in South Africa' (1984) 9 Black Law Journal 167, 184.

protests and other forms of non-compliance — along with continued external and internal pressure by the liberation movements — were so successful that State President PW Botha felt it necessary to declare a state of emergency.[1] The state of emergency — as we have seen — failed because the UDF — and such leaders as Archbishop Tutu, Reverand Alan Boesak, Albertina Sisulu and Helen Joseph — maintained multiple forms of pressure on the state.[2] In the end, the UDF can be credited with pressing the government into negotiations and bringing down the apartheid state.

It is also worth noting that the UDF retains a role of prominence in current South African politics. The trade unions — such as the National Union of Mineworkers and the Congress of South African Trade Unions ('COSATU') — provided not only the muscle for the UDF movement, but also much of its brains. COSATU — part of the tripartite alliance that governs South Africa (with the ANC and the much smaller Communist Party) — has ensured that leftist politics have remained an important feature of South African discourse.

(g) Lawyers, Human Rights and the Rule of Law

As we have already seen, the National Party government was quite adept at manipulating the institutions of government in order to realize its grand plan of apartheid. And as Harris I, Harris II and Collins ultimately reflect, the judiciary was no match for the coordinate branches. Indeed, as Richard Abel notes, it became commonplace for the security police to brief magistrates and prosecutors on how they should impose both the law and its sanctions.[3]

But that does not mean lawyers — and some judges — had no role to play in the fight against apartheid. Lawyers such as Arthur Chaskalson, George Bizos, Sydney Kentridge, John Dugard, Geoffrey Budlender, Halton Cheadle, Nicholas Haysom and Gilbert Marcus found ways to exploit gaps in apartheid law in the service of justice and with the aim of destabilizing the apartheid legal system. Judges such as Ismail Mohamed, Laurie Ackermann, Richard Goldstone, John Didcott and Johan Kriegler used the judiciary's ostensible commitment to the rule of law to advance human rights under apartheid — if only at the margins.[4]

Lawyers had always been part of the struggle. Ghandhi had gone to the bar. Mandela and Sisulu were attorneys. Brahm Fischer was an advocate. But they were first and foremost members of the struggle: they were not laywers' lawyers.

After Collins, one might have thought the space for constitutional lawyers rather limited. With parliamentary sovereignty deeply entrenched and the judiciary

[1] See Magubane (supra) at 490.

[2] Cora Hoexter 'Emergency Law' (1990) South African Human Rights Yearbook 110; Jerome Barrett & Anne Motlins 'South Africa Trade Unions: A historical Account, 1970-1990' (1990) 131 Monthly Labour Review 25. See also Van Der Westhuizen NO v United Democratic Front 1989 (2) SA 242 (A).

[3] See Richard Abel Politics by Other Means: Law in the Struggle Against Apartheid, 1980–1994 (1995) 17–18 (Abel recalls an instance in which the security police briefed Durban magistrates and prosecutors — at the behest of the Chief Magistrate.)

[4] See Richard Goldstone Do Judges Speak Out? (1993). See also Stephen Ellmann In Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992).

packed with apartheid state apparatchiks, only persons with incredible imagination and intestinal fortitude could conceive and create the legal institutions required to challenge the State in the courtroom.

John Dugard, then dean of the the University of the Witwatersrand's School of Law, recognized the immediate need to create progressive and effective legal NGOs in the wake of Steve Biko's murder: 'At that time the reputation of the South African legal system sunk to its lowest level and there was a manifest need for the creation of institutions … to work for justice and equality through law.'[1] John Dugard and Felicia Kentridge — along with colleagues from US based foundations such as the Carnegie Corporation — contrived a scheme that brought about the realization of two of South Africa's most important — and still vibrant — public interest litigation units: the Centre for the Applied Legal Studies (CALS) and the Legal Resources Centre (LRC). Dugard did not promise, nor did his funders expect, the sky. Early on, he wrote to his funders a blunt assessment of what law could and could not do under the apartheid regime: 'If a Centre [CALS] and a [public interest law] firm [LRC] are established they will not bring about radical change of the kind prompted [in the United States] by Brown v Board of Education.'[2] Nonetheless, as Rosenfeld, Sprague and McKay note, Dugard 'stressed that the Centre would conduct research into socially relevant areas and reform of the law, and … knit together a group of lawyers who would use the law to contribute to a more just legal order', while the LRC would run cases that exploited 'the interstices of the apartheid legal structure'.[3]

CALS and the LRC — fully-funded and well-staffed by such luminaries as Sydney Kentridge, Arthur Chaskalson, Geoff Budlender, Edwin Cameron and Gilbert Marcus — litigated cases that ran the entire gamut of issues raised by apartheid's cruel injunctions: 'forced removals, censorship, homeland policies, detention without trial, unfair labor practices, housing, citizenship, and bus tariffs.'[4] Adapting some of the tactics successfully employed by the ACLU and the NAACP to a harsher South African reality, the LRC and CALS won such critical cases as Wendy Orr v the State,[5] Komani v Bantu Affairs Administration Board, Peninsula Area 1980[6] and Rikhoto v East Rand Administration

[1] Patricia Rosenfield, Courtenay Sprague & Heather McKay 'Ethical Dimensions of International Grantmaking: Drawing the Line in a Borderless World' (2004) 11 The Journal of Leadership and Organizational Studies 48, 58.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid. See also Wilmot James 'Concluding Remarks' in WG James (ed) The State of Apartheid (1987) 197–198 as quoted in Patricia Rosenfield, Courtenay Sprague & Heather McKay 'Ethical Dimensions of International Grantmaking: Drawing the Line in a Borderless World' (2004) 11 The Journal of Leadership and Organizational Studies 48, 58 (James obsevered the need for the LRC and CALS in these terms: '[T]he army and police now have learned how to kill civilians regularly and get away with it. … This is the modern racial machine of apartheid, which derives its logic from the desire to oppress the majority of the populace.')

[4] Rosenfield, Sprague & McKay (supra) at 59.

[5] Wendy Orr & Other v Minister of Law and Order & Others Case No 2507/85 (South Eastern Cape, Local Division, 1985)(Court acknowledged both torture and abuse of political detainees.)

[6] Komani v Bantu Affairs Administration Board, Peninsula Area 1980 (4) SA 448 (A)(Court granted requested improvements to system of 'influx control'.)

Board.[1] Both Abel and Sprague conclude that these 'cases contributed to the gradual dismantling of apartheid laws regulating movement and torture, and became part of the process of chipping away at the edifice of apartheid policies.'[2] More importantly, notes the LRC's former national director, Geoff Budlender: 'What can … be said without fear of successful contradiction is that the public interest law movement in South Africa made a significant contribution to the movement for democracy in South Africa.'[3]

2.3 The Road to Democracy: Private Meetings, Negotiations, Referenda and an Assassination

(a) Meetings in the 1980s, Here and Abroad[4]

Neither the regular states of emergency, nor the MK's armed resistance had brought South Africa any closer to a resolution of its simmering civil war. Behind the scenes, important changes were afoot.

In the Soviet Union, a bastion of ANC support, some officials suggested that the ANC might do well to concede 'collective rights and group guarantees in a post-apartheid constitution'.[5] While Soviet officials quickly backed away from such a position, the point was clear: the aim was no longer the over-throw of the white minority state, but a negotiated settlement that would bring about a black, democratically-elected government.

The ANC's private position had already changed several years earlier. In 1986, the ANC's President, Oliver Tambo set out the conditions under which the ANC — and other liberation movements — would be prepared to begin negotiations: (1) the release of 'Nelson Mandela and all other political prisoners'; (2) the unbanning of the ANC and other political organizations'; (3) the lifting of the 'state of emergency then in force' and (4) the scrapping of laws central to the maintenance of apartheid.[6] The armed struggle would continue, however, until such conditions had been met.

The NP likewise recognized that it could no longer rule through force on behalf of a white minority. President FW de Klerk secured substantial support, in a 1989 referendum, to begin negotiations. He released major ANC officials

[1] Rikhoto v East Rand Administration Board 1983 (4) SA 278 (W)(Court held regulations unlawfully restricted the freedom of movement of black South Africans.)

[2] See Abel (supra) at 23–65 (In his chapter, 'Carving Loopholes in the Pass Laws', Abel offers detailed accounts of the outcomes in Komani, Rikhoto and Orr); Courtenay Sprague 'The Carnegie Corporation, Public Interest Law, and Apartheid South Africa' Foundations of Globalization Conference, University of Manchester (6-7 November 2003)(Manuscript on file with authors.)

[3] Geoff Budlender 'The Development of the Public Interest Law Movement in South Africa' Symposium on Public Interest Law in Eastern Europe and Russia (June 29 to July 8, 1997) available at http://www.pili.org/en/dmdocuments/durbanb1.pdf (accessed on 24 June 2008) as cited in Rosenfield, Sprague & McKay (supra) at 60.

[4] See, generally, Geoffrey Heald 'Learning Amongst Enemies: A Phenomenological Study of the South African Negotiations from 1985 to 1988' (PhD, Witwatersrand, 2006).

[5] Allister Sparks The Mind of South Africa (2007) 369.

[6] Ibid at 372.

held prisoner since the Rivonia Trial and initiated quiet talks with Nelson Mandela regarding the future shape of South Africa and the logistics necessary for a peaceful transfer of political power.[1]

Of course, these changes occurred against a broader political backdrop. South Africa had long been viewed as a pariah state in the West — and the anti-apartheid movement had only increased pressure on the West to stop propping up this racist regime. And while Mikhail Gorbachev might not have known that perestroika would lead to the falling of the Berlin Wall and the end of communism in the Soviet Union, the ANC knew it could no longer count on unequivocal military or political support from governments on the left.[2] Thus, when on 2 February 1990, FW de Klerk announced that liberation organisations were to be unbanned and political prisoners were to be released — including Nelson Mandela, nine days later, on 11 February 1990 — the international community could hardly be said to be surprised.

(b) ANC Initiatives and Initiatives from Apartheid Institutions

In 1988, the ANC published the Constitutional Guidelines for a Democratic South Africa, the ANC's first public expression of its desire to work toward a negotiated settlement in South Africa.[3] In this declaration, the ANC committed itself to the adoption of a justiciable Bill of Rights and to constitutionalism generally. In August of 1989, the Harare Declaration was adopted by the Organization of African Unity. The Harare Declaration set forth several conditions that the apartheid government must fulfill before serious negotiations could begin: the lifting of restrictions on political activity, the legalization of all political organizations, and the release of all political prisoners. This declaration was later adopted by the Non-Aligned Movement and the United Nations' General Assembly.

The adoption of bills of rights in the Ciskei and Bophuthatswana bantustans in the 1980s provided South African courts with their first meaningful experiments with constitutional review. While the courts began to demonstrate a greater willingness to implement these documents after 1990, many of the early decisions provide an extremely incoherent account of the standards to be applied in constitutional interpretation.[4]

The South African government initiated its own halting steps in the direction of constitutionalism in April 1986.[5] The Minister of Justice announced that he had

[1] See Peter Bouckaert 'The Negotiated Revolution' (1997) 33 Stanford Journal of International Law 375, 385; Hugh Corder 'Towards a South African Constitution' (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 491, 494.

[2] See Corder (supra)at 494.

[3] See Adrienne van Blerk 'Critical Legal Studies in South Africa' (1996) 113 SALJ 86, 93 (ANC was adament that any Bill of Rights be rooted to the Freedom Charter.) See also Cyril Ramaphosa 'A Constitutional Framework for a New South Africa' (1992) 28 Stanford Journal of International Law 23.

[4] See John Hund 'A Bill of Rights for South Africa; 3 (1989) 34 American Journal of Jurisprudence 23.

[5] See Cyril Ramaphosa 'Negotiating a New Nation: Reflections on the Development of South Africa's Constitution' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 71, 75.

requested the South African Law Commission 'to investigate and make recommendations regarding the definition and protection of group [rights] … and the possible extension of the existing rights protection of individual rights'.[1] The Law Commission subsequently issued a working paper in March 1989 and an Interim Report on Group and Human Rights in August 1991 that engaged even the most hostile elements of the extreme right wing in a debate on a bill of rights and constitutionalism.[2]

(c) CODESA and the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum

The immediate challenge — after the unbanning — was to bring together all parties interested in negotiating a road map to peace in South Africa. The Congress for a Democratic South Africa ('CODESA') commenced on 20 December 1991. However, it died soon after in 1992.[3] Despite CODESA's problems, the white electorate, in a referendum held on 17 March 1992, conclusively endorsed the efforts of the de Klerk government to continue with constitutional negotiations aimed at establishing a multi-party democracy based on a universal franchise.[4]

Before detailing the processes and the negotiations that led to the successful adoption of an Interim Constitution in 1993 and the holding of the first truly democratic elections on 27 April 1994, it is important to understand the general philosophical aims of the three major parties: the African National Congress, the National Party, and the Inkatha Freedom Party. It is likewise essential to understand the major compromises that allowed the second round of negotiations to succeed.

The ANC's primary goal was to have a constitution — written by a democratically elected assembly — that would create a government of majority rule with as few restraints as possible on its legislative power.[5] Although the ANC was generally successful in this aim, the NP's steadfast insistence on some form of interim government and an initial power-sharing scheme ultimately kept the desired goal of unfettered majority rule from being realized.

The NP, facing the political realities of universal suffrage, argued that the new constitutional order must devolve power to provinces and local governments and [1] Leonard Thompson 'The Compromise of Union' in M Wilson & L Thompson (eds) The Oxford History of South Africa Vol II (1975) 252.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ackerman (supra) at 635. The death of CODESA was brought about by a deadlock over the percentages necessary for ratification of the Final Constitution by the democratically elected Parliament. The ANC thought two-thirds of the Constitutional Assembly a sufficient amount to secure the Basic Law's legitimacy. The NP naturally wanted the requirement set somewhat higher: 75%. Currie and de Waal (supra) at 5.

[4] Brand (supra) at 7; Currie and de Waal (supra) at 5. The need for a referendum was necessitated by the loss of a by-election in which the NP lost support in favour of a more extreme right wing party. See Bouckaert (supra) at 391. 68.7% of the white electorate threw their weight behind a continued process of negotiation.

[5] See Heinz Klug Constituting Democracy: Law, Globalism and South Africa's Political Reconstruction (2001). See also Heinz Klug 'Participating in the Design: Constitution-Making in South Africa' in Andrews & Ellmann (supra) at 136; Heinz Klug 'Constitutional Law: Towards a New Constitutional Order' 1993 Annual Survey of South African Law 19–28.

thereby place substantial restrictions on the power of the national government. It initially tried to block the idea of a Final Constitution written by a democratically elected assembly. It favoured an extended transitional government and a power-sharing mechanism that would allow the NP to gradually relinquish control and maximize its ability to influence and to restrain the new government.[1] During negotiations, the NP argued that all participating parties should have equal voice in the process. That would, of course, have given undue weight to minority interests. That argument it lost. However, as the negotiation process continued, the NP — with its authority and its resources as government — took the lead as the opposition party to the ANC. Its emphasis on 'collective political rights' — rejected outright by the ANC — shifted to the standard constitutional protections for individuals generally found in a justiciable Bill of Rights.[2]

The IFP, not surprisingly, argued strenuously for a form of federal government that afforded regional governments maximum autonomy. It proposed express limits on the central government's powers (powers it rightly assumed would be wielded by an ANC-led government). As for the eventual adoption of the Final Constitution, 'the IFP argued that since the purpose of a justiciable constitution and a bill of rights is to protect minorities from the tyranny of the majority, the minorities to be protected must give their assent to the particular framework.'[3] This logic would have effectively given minor parties — prior to any elections testing their popular strength — a veto over the text of the Final Constitution. The IFP decided that regular walkouts were an appropriate strategy for securing its ends. The incipient threat of civil war in Natal enabled the IFP to secure many of its aims for regional power without remaining present during constitutional talks.

The ANC and the NP were, despite the IFP's absence, able to arrive at a compromise that largely ended the impasse. The two parties agreed to a 5 year, democratically-elected interim government charged with writing the Final Constitution. Both sides lost things for which they had long pressed. The ANC accepted a limited power-sharing arrangement.[4] The NP gave up its demands for a mandatory coalition government and a rotating presidency.

[1] See Klug 'Participating in the Design' (supra) at 137-138.

[2] See Katherine Savage 'Negotiating South Africa's New Constitution: An Overview of the Key Players and the Negotiation Process' in Andrews & Ellmann (supra) at 164, 165.

[3] Heinz Klug 'Participating in the Design' (supra) at 139.

[4] The final agreement regarding power-sharing called for representation in Cabinet for parties gaining over 5% of the vote, a deputy-presidency for each party receiving more than 20% of the vote, and guaranteed consultation on policy matters. In an attempt to appease the NP, IFP, and Freedom Alliance, the ANC allowed for a more federalized system of government that granted increased powers to regional governments. While the NP was pleased with this compromise, the IFP and the Freedom Alliance continued their boycott of the negotiations. However, both parties decided, at the very last moment, to take part in the elections. To be precise, it was only after the Interim Constitution was amended a second time to entrench the constitutional status of the Zulu King in KwaZulu/Natal, that the IFP agreed — within days of the poll — to enter the electoral process. See Denise Atkinson 'Brokering a Miracle? The Multiparty Negotiating Forum' in S Friedman & D Atkinson (eds) South African Review 7: The Small Miracle, South Africa's Negotiated Settlement (1994) 13–43.

However, the most critical concession — by both sides — involved the creation of a set of Constitutional Principles that would be included as a schedule within the negotiated Interim Constitution. The purpose of these 34 principles was to place meaningful constraints on the ANC's ability to draft the Final Constitution. This concession provided both the NP (and the largely absent IFP) with some assurance that they would not be rendered entirely powerless — after universal franchise elections in 1994 — during the process of shaping the Final Constitution. The ANC was placated by three distinct processes. First, the Interim Constitution would go into effect after the first multi-racial elections and parties would be proportionally represented in Parliament. Second, the newly elected representatives in both Houses of Parliament would sit as a Constitutional Assembly and be required to produce the text of a Final Constitution within two years. Third, an independent Constitutional Court, staffed largely by the ANC's preferred appointees, would have the power to ensure that the Final Constitution — as drafted by the democratically elected Constitutional Assembly — satified the 34 Constitutional Principles.

Why did the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum ('MPNF') succeed where CODESA had failed? Social upheaval, mass action, and escalating violence had placed considerable pressure on the ANC and the NP to alight upon a viable solution.[1] But it would be a mistake to underestimate the importance of Nelson Mandela's impeccable sense of politics and timing.

On 10 April 1993, Chris Hani — the Secretary-General of the SACP and one of the leaders of ANC's armed resistance — was assassinated. His death could easily have precipitated uncontrollable violence. Instead, Mandela directed this moment of grief, anger, anxiety and uncertainty towards the completion of the Interim Constitution and the setting of a firm date for the first universal democratic elections. Within three months, the Interim Constitution was nailed down and elections were set for 27 April 1994.[2]

[1] The Negotiation Planning Conference, the committee which planned the MPNF, tried to construct a negotiation process more conducive to building consensus among the parties. Like CODESA, the ultimate decision-making authority of the MPNF was held in a plenary session in which delegates from each represented political party were present. While decision-making within the process remained tied to the 'sufficient consensus' formula of CODESA, the momentum of the negotiations, and the realization, even among those parties who had resisted participation in CODESA — the PAC and the CP — that there was no longer any alternative to a negotiated solution, kept the process on track. The new process provided for a Negotiating Council to ratify proposals from technical committees which were charged with the clarification of various constitutional issues. These technical committees, dominated by academics and lawyers steeped in the rhetoric of liberal democratic constitutional discourse, facilitated the emergence of clear alternatives for the two parties. These technical committee members did not, of course, set the boundaries for the Interim Constitution. What they succeeded in doing, however, was to harmonize subtle differences in position and to put the provisions of the Interim Constitution in language to which the two prime movers could agree. This new technical language was then submitted to all the political parties as a basis for multilateral negotiation and agreement. See Hassan Ebrahim The Soul of a Nation (1998) 98.

[2] The consequences of the exhaustive, technical and multi-lateral negotiation process are evident in text of the Interim Constitution (and in many respects, the Final Constitution). This process led to the inclusion of rights and provisions unique to the South African political transition: the right to economic

(d) The Elections of 27 April 1994

The first nation-wide, multiracial democratic elections were held from 26 to 29 April 1994. They took place in a surprisingly peaceful, if not ebullient, environment. Almost twenty million South Africans — an estimated 86% of the electorate — cast their ballots. The election results gave the ANC 252 seats, the NP 82 seats and the IFP 43 seats. No other party had more than 9 seats. In total, seven political parties were represented in Parliament (and thus the Constitutional Assembly.) (The IFP withdrew from the Constitutional Assembly in 1995.[1]) The ANC, with 63.7% of the Constitutional Assembly delegates, was but several votes short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass the Final Constitution.[2] That said, the ANC also understood that no constitution would possess the requisite political legitimacy needed for a basic law unless it was the product of a consensus between most of the parties in the Constitutional Assembly.

2.5 The Interim Constitution, The Constitutional Assembly, 34 Constitutional Principles and the Certification of the Final Constitution

(a) The Drafting of the Final Constitution

The Interim Constitution — Act 200 of 1993 — created the conditions necessary to hold democratic elections and to administer a newly-democratic South Africa.[3] As we noted above, once elected, the representative parliament was to wear a second hat — that of the Constitutional Assembly. The Constitutional Assembly was charged with drafting a Final Constitution that complied with the 34 principles set out in Schedule 4 of the Interim Constitution.[4] The newly formed Constitutional Court was given the unprecedented authority to determine whether the Constitutional Assembly had satisfied this task.[5]

Within the Constitutional Assembly, the drafting process was delegated to six theme committees.[6] The theme committees would identify a major issue, invite activity (IC s 26); and the employer's right to lock out workers in the context of collective bargaining (IC s 27(5)); the explicit recognition of sexual orientation among the grounds upon which unfair discrimination is prohibited (IC s 8(2)); a specific provision guaranteeing and protecting programmes designed to enable full and equal enjoyment of rights by historically disadvantaged groups (IC s 8(3)(a)); and the right to restitution of dispossessed land rights (IC s 8(3)(b)). Another consequence of the protracted negotiations was the unavoidable tension between the guarantee of open and accountable government (IC ss 23 and 24) and the guarantee of existing civil service positions to bureaucrats whose training and professional culture had been opposed to openness, to transparency and to accountability (IC s 236(2)). See, generally, Lourens du Plessis & Hugh Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1995) 13.

[1] Savage (supra) at 164.

[2] Ebrahim (supra) at 189.

[3] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) ('First Certification Judgment') at para 13.

[4] IC Schedule 4.

[5] IC s 68(1). The Constitutional Assembly had to produce a final constitution within two years of its first sitting. IC s 73(1).

[6] Christina Murray 'Negotiating Beyond Deadlock: From the Constitutional Assembly to the Court' in P Andrews and S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 103, 113.

the public to submit thoughts and proposals, and hold workshops with the various groups that would be affected by the issue.[1] The theme committees also consulted political experts — both from South Africa and from abroad — to better understand the complexities of the issue.[2]

This multi-committee structure soon proved overly-cumbersome. The Constitutional Assembly supplanted it with a group of about forty politicians. They combined the work of the six theme committees and wrote the initial text of the Final Constitution.[3]

This switch from the six committees to the one committee diminished, to a certain degree, the transparency of the process. Moreover, as the text took shape, the outstanding issues became more and more controversial. Private, bi-lateral negotiations between the ANC and the NP became increasingly commonplace as the deadline of 8 May 1996 drew near.[4] When the assembly was seemingly at an impasse, the chair — Cyril Ramaphosa — would often temporarily adjourn the meeting. He would then summon the chief negotiators for the ANC and the NP to work out a solution to the impasse. This tactic often proved successful.[5] As Savage notes: '[T]hese private … meetings … accounted for much of the progress made on the bulk of [the] chapters.'[6]

The certification requirement both shaped and drove the negotiations.[7] Many of the parties involved — including both the ANC and NP — allowed provisions into the draft text while they simultaneously planned to challenge them during certification. This process allowed disagreements over some issues, like labour relations, to be deferred.[8] The certification process also allowed groups outside the Constitutional Assembly to become more involved in the crafting of the Final Constitution by hiring counsel to draft written briefs and to present oral arguments in the Constitutional Court. Moreover, as power shifted to the new democratic institutions, and the constitution-drafting process took place in full view of the public, members of the Constitutional Assembly found themselves subject to greater pressures from their constituencies.[9]

[1] Ebrahim (supra) at 189
[2] See Savage (supra) at 166.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at 169.
[5] See Murray (supra) at 113.
[6] See Savage (supra) at 171.
[7] A set of intricate tie-breaking procedures — which would kick in if other processes failed — could have led to the dissolution of the Parliament, a new general election and, ultimately, a public referendum. Such conditions provided further inducement to compromise (especially on the part of the NP).
[8] See Murray (supra) at 119.
[9] The degree of public exposure to and participation in the constitution-drafting process is probably without historical precedent. Hundreds of public meetings were held to advertise the drafting of the Final Constitution and to invite public participation in the process. The Constitutional Assembly published its own monthly newsletter, Constitutional Talk, to publicize events related to the development of the Final Constitution. In addition to extensive television and radio coverage, the evolution of the Final Constitution from first draft to final product could be followed on a daily basis on the internet site of the Constitutional Assembly.

Collectively, these conditions produced several results that distinguished the drafting of the Final Constitution from the drafting of the Interim Constitution. Whereas the parties at CODESA and the MPNF had felt obliged to draw the Inkatha Freedom Party into the negotiated constitutional settlement, no such imperative existed in the Constitutional Assembly. When the IFP walked-out from the Constitutional Assembly, the remaining parties simply went about the task of drafting the constitution. Given the established parameters of the 34 principles and the ANC's clear electoral dominance, far fewer incentives existed for the ANC to accommodate IFP concerns.

In respect of almost all the controversial clauses, the consensus ultimately reached tended to favour the ANC. So while the property clause (FC s 25) might appear less expansive than IC s 28, its compromises are largely offset by a comprehensive package of land rights. With regard to labor rights, the ANC succeeded in making the right to economic activity even more attenuated than it had been in the Interim Constitution and having the right to lock out entirely removed. The unexpectedly contentious right to education in a mother tongue in public schools was worked out on the day before the draft of the Final Constitution draft was due. The ANC would simply not allow the state to be subject to an absolute obligation to fund culturally exclusive schools.[1]

The National Party briefly contemplated a confrontation with the ANC over three issues: property, lock-outs and cultural schools. However, the dynamics of the new constitution-drafting process left it no option but to back down. It faced the prospect of a referendum in the event of a failure by the Constitutional Assembly to pass a new constitutional text by a two-thirds majority.[2] On 8 May 1996, 87 per cent of the members of the Constitutional Assembly voted in favour of a new constitutional text. The missing 13 per cent represented the IFP members who had walked out, the Vryheidsfront members who had abstained (largely with respect to issues surrounding cultural schools), and the two African Christian Democratic Party members who voted against the text on religious doctrinal grounds.

Following its adoption by the Constitutional Assembly, the new constitutional text was submitted to the Constitutional Court. All political parties represented in the Constitutional Assembly — other than the ANC and the PAC — lodged objections with the Constitutional Court. In addition, 84 private parties objected. The political parties and 27 private parties were given the right to make oral submissions to the Court in a certification hearing which lasted nine days.[3]

[1] See Savage (supra) at 176. See also Brahm Fleish & Stu Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR 34. The ANC's victory led to the FF's abstention from voting on the text of Final Constitution.

[2] IC s 73(6)

[3] First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 24–25. A schedule of all of the objectors — and the clauses to which they objected — appears as Annexure 3 to the judgment.

On 6 September 1996, the Constitutional Court delivered its unanimous judgment. It refused to certify the initial text of the Final Constitution. And yet the response to this rebuke was mild to say the least. The Constitutional Assembly effected the necessary amendments to the draft — in answer to the Constitutional Court's findings — on 11 October 1996.[1] This revised text was, in turn, submitted to the Constitutional Court. On 4 December 1996, the amended text was certified.

(b) Law, Politics and the First Certification Judgment

The Constitutional Court's finding that the initial text of the Final Constitution was unacceptable, despite its adoption by eighty-six percent of the democratically-elected Constitutional Assembly, was an extraordinary assertion of the power of judicial review. Having a judicial body declare a constitution 'unconstitutional' was without precedent, and the uniqueness and potential perils of such a determination were not lost upon the Court. The Constitutional Court was careful to point out in its unanimous opinion, that 'in general and in respect of the overwhelming majority of its provisions', the Constitutional Assembly had met the predetermined requirements of the Constitutional Principles.[2]

(i) Law and Politics

The Interim Constitution offered little guidance to the Constitutional Court as to how it should determine whether the new text was in accord with the 34 Constitutional Principles.[3] The Constitutional Court therefore went to great lengths to explain its methodology. The Court claimed that its function was strictly legal, not political. In other words, it had a 'judicial not a political mandate',[4] that 'the wisdom or correctness' of the new text of the Final Constitution was left to the Constitutional Assembly,[5] and that it had 'no power, … and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the (Constitutional Assembly) in drafting the (New Text).'[6]

In strictly logical terms, an infinite number of texts could have satisfied the requirements of the 34 principles. The Court's role was not to select its preferred text from amongst the infinite number of potentially certifiable texts. Its role was limited to ensuring that the Constitutional Assembly had selected a compliant text.

In justifying this legal, as opposed to political, approach, the Court emphasized that the Interim Constitution created a 'solemn pact' between the negotiating parties to create a Final Constitution that adhered to the specified Constitutional Principles. To honour that pact, the Court stressed that despite the overwhelming support for the new text in the democratically elected assembly, it must send the [1] Currie and De Waal (supra) at 6.

[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 31.
[3] See Ziyad Motala and Cyril Ramaphosa, Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (1998) 11.
[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 27.
[5] Ibid at para 39.
[6] Ibid at para 27.

constitutional text back for further revision. The Court's patient — 400 page — clause by clause expatiation of the new text reflected a nuanced and politically sensitive response: one largely devoid of 'technical rigidity'.[1] By focusing strictly on the text of the CPs and their relationship to the new text, the Court undertook every conceivable effort to demonstrate that its decisions were not an exercise of political judgment, but simply the application of careful analytic legal reasoning.

Once the Final Constitution was certified, the certification was final and non-reviewable. This aspect of the certification process made the interpretive techniques of the Constitutional Court all the more important. It was clear then, and remains clear now, that more than one reasonable interpretation of a constitutional provision could have been given. In such instances, the Court utilized an interpretive technique 'designed to facilitate certification' and 'to avoid interpretations which would prevent certification'.[2]

This methodology creates several interpretative difficulties. First, the commitment to stare decisis and precedent means that all future decisions by any court that interpreted a provision of the Final Constitution must interpret that provision in a manner consistent with interpretation offered by the Constitutional Court in First Certification Judgment. Second, as we discuss below, the Court did not always analyze the meaning of the new text as it was intended by the Constitutional Assembly: it actually placed its own gloss on several provisions of the new text that were susceptible to multiple interpretations. Thus, despite its initial claims that its judgment was purely legal and in no way political, the Court did adopt interpretations of the next text that clearly reflected a preferred political reading of the new text.

(ii) The Grounds for Non-Certification: Institutional Concerns, the Rule of Law, Constitutionalism

The Constitutional Court rejected the new text on nine discrete grounds.[3] An analysis of the First Certification Judgment reveals an interesting pattern. The local

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 36.

[2] Matthew Chaskalson & Dennis Davis 'Constitutionalism, the Rule of Law, and the First Certification Judgment' (1997) 13 SAJHR 430, 433-434.

[3] The nine elements identified in the first certification judgment as failing to comply with certain constitutional principles were: (1) Section 23 of the new text conferred a right to engage in collective bargaining on employers' associations but not on individual employers. The court held that Principle XXVIII required that individual employers should have a constitutional right to engage in collective bargaining. First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 69. (2) Section 74 of the new text provided for the amendment of the Constitution by a two-thirds majority of the National Assembly. This, the court stated, failed to comply with Principle XV, which required special procedures as well as special majorities for the passing of amendments to the Constitution. Ibid at paras 152–6 It also failed to comply with Principle II because it did not entrench the Bill of Rights by giving its provisions greater protection from amendment than was given to the rest of the Constitution. Ibid at paras 157–9. (3) Section 194 of the new text provided for the removal of the Public Protector and the Auditor General on the grounds of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence, if a committee composed proportionally of all the members of the National Assembly made a finding to that effect which was confirmed by a formal resolution of the National Assembly. This was held to infringe Principle XXIX in that it failed adequately to safeguard the government issues upon which certification was refused clearly failed to comply with the applicable constitutional principles. Excise taxes were simply not appropriate vehicles for local government financing. Furthermore, the scanty provisions of Chapter 7 of the new text could hardly be said to amount to a framework for the 'structures and powers of local government'. The collective bargaining provision in the new text also left little scope for certification.

However, in respect of all the other grounds for refusing certification, the Court could have rather easily gone the other way.[1] That it chose to reject the independence of the Public Protector and Auditor General. Ibid at paras 163–5. (4) Section 196 of the new text provided for a Public Service Commission, but did not specify its functions and powers. This was held to be in contravention of Principle XXIX, a tacit requirement of which was the existence of an independent and impartial Public Service Commission. The court held that it could not certify the capacity of the Public Service Commission to exercise its powers independently unless those powers were entrenched in the Constitution itself. Ibid at para 176. It also held that an analysis of the powers of the Public Service Commission over provincial administrations was necessary for an evaluation of compliance with Principles XVIII.2 and XX, which concerned the powers and autonomy of the provinces. As s 196 of the new text neither provided for provincial service commissions nor placed any express limits on the powers of the Public Service Commission over provincial administrations, it was not possible to certify that Principles XVIII.2 and XX had been complied with. Ibid at para 177. (5) Section 229(1) of the new text gave local government a constitutionally entrenched power to raise excise taxes. It was held that this included the power to impose taxes which were inappropriate for municipalities. This contravened Principle XXV, which required the provision of 'appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories of local government'. Ibid at paras 303–5. (6) Section 241(1) of the text purported to place the Labour Relations Act (Act 66 of 1995) beyond constitutional scrutiny, but did not incorporate the provisions of the Act into the Constitution. This was held to be impermissible because Principle IV required the Constitution to be supreme and Principles II and VII required that the Bill of Rights be justiciable and enforceable. Ibid at para 149. (7) Clause 22(1)(b) of Schedule 6 of the new text similarly contravened Principle IV because it purported to place the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995 beyond constitutional scrutiny. Ibid at para 150. (8) Chapter 7 of the new text dealt with local government. It infringed a number of principles. It created no 'framework for the structures' of local government. Ibid at paras 300–301. It did not differentiate between categories of local government. Ibid at paras 300–301. Finally, it failed to set out formal legislative procedures which had to be followed by local government. Ibid at para 301. (9) The Constitutional Court also held that Principle XVIII.2 was not satisfied by the new text because the powers and functions given to the provinces were substantially less than or inferior to those which the provinces enjoyed under the interim Constitution. Principle XVIII.2 is examined in paras 306–481. The Court summarizes its views on non-compliance with the principle at paras 471–481. The finding of the court with respect to Principle XVIII.2 was very narrowly stated. It identified a reduction of provincial powers in the areas of policing, education, local government, and traditional leadership, but stated that this alone would not contravene Principle XVIII.2. The Court wrote: 'Seen in the context of the totality of provincial power, the curtailment of these four aspects of the Interim Constitution schedule 6 powers would not in our view be sufficient in themselves to lead to the conclusion that the powers of the provinces taken as a whole are substantially less than or substantially inferior to the powers vested in them under the Interim Constitution.' Ibid at para 479. It was only when this reduction of power over specific matters was combined with the greater scope for national legislation to override conflicting provincial legislation that the court concluded that the overall reduction of provincial powers was substantial. In particular, the Court expressed concern at clause 146(4) of the new text, which would have created a presumption that national legislation passed by the National Council of Provinces prevailed over conflicting provincial legislation.

[1] See further Chaskalson & Davis (supra) at 430.

clauses in question is significant. All of them, to a greater or lesser extent, interfered or threatened to interfere with institutions and mechanisms designed to protect the rule of law and the project of constitutional democracy. The First Certification Judgment ensured that it would be more difficult to amend the Final Constitution, and the Bill of Rights in particular, that there would be greater independence for the Public Protector, Public Service Commission and Auditor General, and that no specific pieces of legislation could be placed beyond constitutional scrutiny. Even the question of reduced provincial powers, which was the most politically controversial topic canvassed at the certification hearings and which takes up almost half of the judgment, was ultimately cast as a question of judicial power and independence. The judgment was constructed in such a manner so as to make clear to the Constitutional Assembly that all it had to do to clear these various hurdles was to follow the dictates of the First Certification Judgment.

The First Certification Judgment reflects to a large degree how the Constitutional Court was able to assert its own views about the signal features of a constitutional democracy. That assertion demonstrates, in turn, the institutional confidence the Constitutional Court secured in its first eighteen months of operation and the degree to which constitutionalism and the rule of law had been accepted by most South African political actors by the end of 1996. The fact that none of the political parties questioned the legitimacy either of the certification process itself or of the particular decisions taken by the Constitutional Court during the certification process offers quite a positive, if implicit, commentary on the new democracy's commitment to its constitutional principles.

(c) The Amended Text and the Second Certification Judgment

As the Constitutional Court anticipated at the conclusion of its non-certification opinion, the rejected provisions of the new text of the Final Constitution did not cause any major complications in the negotiating process. After the Court's opinion was handed down, the Constitutional Assembly was quickly recalled in order to pass an amended text that satisfied the Constitutional Principles. Although, in theory, the entire constitution-making process could have been reopened,[1] the major parties confined themselves to amendments designed to overcome the concerns expressed by the Constitutional Court in the First Certification Judgment. On 4 December 1997 the amended text received the stamp of approval of the Constitutional Court in the Second Certification Judgment.[2] The amended text was promulgated by the President on 18 December 1996 and took effect as the Final Constitution on 4 February 1997.

[1] Once the court had refused to certify the original text as a whole the Constitutional Assembly was not bound to retain those elements of the text which had passed the scrutiny of the Constitutional Court.

[2] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

2.6 The Consolidation of Constitutional Democracy

(a) Constitutional Amendments

The Final Constitution has been amended thirteen times since its inception. Most of the amendments have been administrative in nature: changing the wording of the presidential oath;[1] setting forth more detailed procedures for financial legislation and administration;[2] changing municipal districts;[3] and extending the terms of Constitutional Court judges.[4] The exceptions — as discussed elsewhere in this treatise[5] — are amendments 8,[6] 9[7] and 10[8]. These amendments govern legislative floor-crossing at the municipal, the provincial, and the national level, respectively. However, even these amendments — which appeared to threaten the continued existence of minority parties — have proved relatively inconsequential.[9]

Taken together, the first thirteen amendments have not materially altered the Final Constitution. Thus, despite its considerable majorities in the national legislature, the ANC has not, as yet, used its legislative power to enact major changes to the negotiated peace settlement reflected in our Interim Constitution and our

[1] Constitution First Amendment Act of 1997 (previously referred to as Act 5 of 1997).

[2] Constitution First Amendment Act of 2001 (previously referred to as Act 34 of 2001).

[3] Constitution First Amendment Act of 1998 (previously referred to as Act 87 of 1998).

[4] Constitution First Amendment Act of 1999 (previously referred to as Act 3 of 1999).

[5] See Glenda Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 29.

[6] Constitution Eighth Amendment Act of 2002 (previously referred to as Act 18 of 2002)(Municipal floor-crossing).

[7] Constitution Ninth Amendment Act of 2002 (previously referred to as Act 21 of 2002)(NCOP floor-crossing).

[8] Constitution Tenth Amendment Act of 2003 (previously referred to as Act 2 of 2003)(National assembly and provincial legislature floor-crossing).

[9] The Final Constitution' provides for representative democracy primarily in terms of the proportional representation of persons who appear on party lists. FC s 46(1)(d). This principle was somewhat weakened by the eleventh and twelfth amendments. The amendments seek to add some flexibility to representation in Parliament and in provincial legislatures by allowing elected officials to 'cross the floor' to another party and still keep their seat. The system essentially works as follows. If a political party has ten seats in the National Assembly and one of its members wishes to join another political, then her seat is transferred from one political party to the other party (the 10% rule). One party therefore loses a seat in Parliament and the other party gains the seat. Formally, floor-crossing appears incompatible with the notion of proportional representation. Voters in a proportional representation system choose a party, not an individual. However, the Constitutional Court, when faced with a challenge to both the legislation and the amendments that underpin floor-crossing, demurred. On their rather thin conception of democracy — as enshrined in various provisions of the Final Constitution — the occasional window for floor-crossing did not undermine the basic commitment to multi-party democracy based upon proportional representation. See United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC). For a critique of this thin conception of representative democracy, and for a more robust account of what democracy means in our Final Constitution, see Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

Final Constitution. This state of affairs has enabled the political institutions established in 1994 — though still fragile — to consolidate the underlying commitment to the formal and the substantive transformation of South African society.

(b) The Proposed and Mothballed 14th Amendment Bill

Perhaps the only amendment bill that has generated genuine concern over the solidification of our constitutional democracy has been the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Fourteenth Amendment Bill.[1] The Bill proposed: a division of 'judicial' and 'administrative' functions in the court system that would give the executive substantial control over the activities of the judiciary; the prohibition on adjudicating on laws before they commence; and the executive appointment of judges-president and of acting judicial leadership. Both the judiciary and the legal fraternity expressed their deep disapproval over what they considered to be a significant encroachment upon the judiciary's independence.[2] (The Bill also proposed the creation of a unitary court system in which the Constitutional Court would sit at the apex. This proposal did not elicit much criticism: indeed a Supreme Court of Appeal judge, Carole Lewis, expressly endorsed this move.[3])

Judicial independence is grounded FC s 165: 'Courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and to law.' Since the Final Constitution came into effect, the Constitutional Court has sought, in any number of different ways, to insulate the judiciary from the hurly burly of democratic politics. In particular, it has attempted to create a judiciary that possesses nearly unfettered control over its budgeting and personnel decisions.[4]

The threat of the Bill flows from placing the administration of the courts under the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, removing the court's jurisdiction to decide matters regarding the suspension of an act of Parliament prior to its commencement (the so-called 'ouster clause') and diminishing the decision-making power of the Chief Justice and the Judicial Services Commission. As Cathi Albertyn notes:

[1] Government Gazette 28334 GN 2023 (14 December 2005).

[2] See Cathi Albertyn 'Judicial Independence and the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill' (2006) 22 SAJHR 126. (Albertyn notes: 'At a Colloquium organized by the General Council of the Bar on 17 February 2006, the former Chief Justice, Arthur Chaskalson and the current Chief Justice, Pius Langa, both expressed their concerns with provisions that restricted the evolving model of judicial independence. On the same day, veteran human rights lawyer, George Bizos SC made a public speech condemning the Bills. 'Judiciary under threat, Bizos says' Business Day (20 February 2006).)

[3] See Carole Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509 (On the role of the Constitutional Court as the apex court and the rationalisation of the system of appeals.)

[4] See Albertyn (supra) at 131. See also S v Van Rooyen 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 75 (Court describes the evolutionary steps taken over the previous decade to establish the independence of the judiciary.)

> The central problem is that the amendment does not take account of the fact that our evolving model of judicial independence, in line with the Constitution and international trends, is moving away from the system of close executive administration practiced under apartheid. This evolving model envisages at least partial judicial control, if not full autonomy, over finances and administration. In this context, a constitutional amendment that confers authority on the Minister alone for 'the administration and budget of all courts', without qualification, is a regressive move.[1]

The Amendment — Albertyn and others contend — would reverse the trend of the last decade toward an increasingly independent judiciary and bring about 'a pattern of creeping executive power at the expense of the judiciary.'[2] The ouster clause, while of limited practical effect, would represent a symbolic erosion of the Court's ability to provide a check on Parliament's power.[3] In the end, the executive backed down. And while it is too early to say that the battle is over,[4] the shelving of this Bill points to the further consolidation of our constitutional democracy.

(c) Dignity, Democracy, and Legality and the Potemkin Constitution

In this last section, we want to offer some final observations about our Potemkin Constitution. Fourteen years after political liberation, we have little doubt about the dramatic legal changes that have been brought about by the new constitutional order. Our commitment to dignity demands that we no longer treat individuals as mere means; democracy means that everyone can exercise the franchise; and legality principle means that the State must behave in a rational manner when it chooses to act or when it fails to react.[5] We have overcome the meanest, cruelest features of the apartheid state.

---

[1] Albertyn (supra) at 136.

[2] Ibid at 132.

[3] Ibid at 137.

[4] See Theunis Roux 'A Thinkpiece on the 14 Amendment Bill' Seminar on the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill, 2005 (University of Cape Town, 2005)(Manuscript on file with authors)(Notes that executives in constitutional democracies always attempt to influence, if not control, the behaviour of the judiciary. Thus, while the Bill may not be sound, it does not constitute as radical a departure from international practice as some might suggest.)

[5] Albert Dicey identified three feature essential features of the rule of law or the doctrine of legality. Albert Dicey Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (1959, 10th Edition) 187. Dicey claimed that the rule of law was present where, firstly, absolute supremacy of law existed — and not the mere exercise of arbitrary power. Secondly, the courts must administer a system in which all ordinary laws treat all persons equally. Thirdly, Dicey believed that constitutional law necessarily required the protection of individual rights. We prefer John Finnis' account. As John Finnis somewhat cheekily puts it, 'the Rule of Law' is 'the name commonly given to the state of affairs in which a legal system is legally in good shape'. John Finnis Natural Law and Natural Rights (1980) 270. Here are some of the features of a legal system in good shape:

> (i) its rules are prospective, not retroactive, and (ii) are not in any other way impossible to comply with; . . . (iii) its rules are promulgated, (iv) clear, and coherent one with another; . . . (v) its rules are sufficiently stable to allow people to be guided by their knowledge of the content of rules; . . . (vi) the making of decrees and orders applicable to relatively limited situations is guided by rules that are promulgated, clear, stable, and relatively general; and . . . (vii) those people who have authority to make, administer and apply the rules in an official capacity (a) are acountable for their compliance with rules applicable to their performance and (b) do actually administer the law consistently and in accordance with its tenor.

Although the aforementioned commitments to dignity, democracy and legality can be given radical substantive content, it is, perhaps, in the nature of peaceful, negotiated constitutional transformations that these constitutional commitments have remained, for the moment, largely formal. Neither the African National Congress nor the majority of black South Africans have opted for the radical change proffered by Steve Biko. And, in the current climate of globalized, state-enforced capitalism — in which, ironically, notionally communist China may well be the best example — radical transformations of the kind envisaged by Biko may well be impossible. But that does not mean that the denial of the promise of liberation to a majority of South Africans may not have radical consequences. Recent riots over scarce resources augur ill. The failure of government to address the root causes of such discontent likewise causes one to wonder whether the centre will hold.

That said, this book is a book about the content of South African constitutional law. And in so far as the purposes — and the narrow vision — of this book are concerned, the centre has indeed held.[1]

Ibid at 270—271. For more on the 'rule of law', see Stu Woolman & Henk Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34. Finnis' description of the rule of law coheres with Woolman and Botha's account of the formal features of law of general application (for the purposes of limitations analysis.) It is worth stopping a moment to interrogate Finnis' first remark a little more closely. The rule of law, he says, describes a legal system 'legally' 'in good shape'. Finnis is being neither funny nor tautological. What he means is that in an age such as ours, where the ideals of > legality and the Rule of Law . . . enjoy[s] an ideological popularity, . . . conspirators against the common good will regularly seek to gain and hold power through an adherence to constitutional and legal forms which is not the less 'scrupulous' for being tactically motivated, insincere and temporary. Thus, the Rule of Law does not guarantee every aspect of the common good and sometimes it does not even secure the substance of the common good.

Finnis (supra) at 274. In sum, a commitment to the rule of law is a necessary but insufficient condition for a just or a fair society. As Finnis observes, regimes that are exploitative or ideologically fanatical or some mixture of the two could submit themselves to the constraints imposed by the rule of law if it served the realization of their narrow conception of the good. Indeed, both Stephen Ellmann and David Dyzenhaus argue persuasively that South Africa under apartheid was an exploitative and ideologically fanatical regime committed to the rule of law. Stephen Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Security in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992); David Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: South African Law from the Perspective of Legal Philosophy (1991). Why would a fanatic or an ideologue bother? Because by abiding by the rule of law, the ideologue can disguise his malignant intent. That said, while the rule of law did constrain the South African state — and even allowed for a cramped conception of human rights — few would allow that it was fair or just. What was missing was any real commitment to individual dignity and the sense that the purpose of the state was to enable all persons to 'constitute themselves in community'. Finnis (supra) at 274. It should come then as no surprise that the two most important — and somewhat novel — constitutional doctrines developed by the Constitutional Court in its first decade of operation turn on a robust and substantive conception of the rule of law and an account of dignity that makes it a grundnorm for the Final Constitution. See Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, AStein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11; Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. Quite unlike the regime of law authorized by apartheid, the new dispensation recognizes that its legitimacy is conditional upon the state's commitment to act for the 'general' welfare and to treat all individuals as worthy of equal concern and respect.

[6] See Stu Woolman 'The Potemkin Constitution' Without Prejudice (December 2008).

3 Constitutional Litigation

Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop

3.1 Introduction 3–1
3.2 What is a constitutional issue? 3–2
3.3 Conceptualising the case 3–3
(a) The context in which a constitutional issue may arise . . . 3–3
(b) The need for pleading 3–5
(c) Bill of Rights litigation 3–7
(d) Non-chapter 2 litigation 3–10
(e) Interpretive issues 3–13
3.4 Procedural and jurisdictional issues 3–15
(a) Mootness, ripeness and standing 3–15
(b) Joinder of necessary organs of state 3–16
(c) Submissions by an amicus curiae 3–17
(d) Form of proceedings 3–18
(e) Appropriate court 3–19
(f) Reasons for a court to decline to exercise constitutional jurisdiction 3–20
(g) Principle of constitutional avoidance 3–21
3.5 Appeals 3–21
(a) Appeals to the Constitutional Court 3–21
(b) Appeals to the Supreme Court of Appeal 3–22
3.6 Costs 3–22

3.7 The duties of the state in constitutional litigation 3–23
(a) General ethical duty 3–23
(b) Specific evidentiary burdens 3–27
(i) Limitations 3–27
(ii) Remedies 3–28
(c) Constitutional duty of the state in the enforcement of court orders 3–30

3.1 INTRODUCTION

While constitutional litigation has much in common with conventional litigation, it has a number of special rules that justify its treatment as a distinct discipline.[1] So although standard rules of court and principles of evidence, both common law and statutory, apply to constitutional litigation, they are themselves now subject to constitutional scrutiny.[2]

The special rules encompass specific additions to the Uniform Rules of Court relating to joinder[3] and submissions by an amicus curiae.[4] A separate set of rules regulate proceedings in the Constitutional Court.[5] A range of specific provisions of the Final Constitution deal with matters of jurisdiction,[6] standing,[7] and remedy[8] which have application only in constitutional matters. Apart form the Final Constitution itself, the Constitutional Court Complimentary Act regulates matters incidental to the establishment of the Constitutional Court.[9] These matters embrace the scope and the execution of process, the seat of the Court, contempt of the Constitutional Court and the subpoena of witnesses.[10] The Constitutional Court has also developed a number of principles which apply

[1] See HJ Erasmus Superior Court Practice (1994)(devotes an entire chapter to issues peculiar to constitutional litigation).

[2] The Constitutional Court has made it clear that all rules of court must comply with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC'). Where, for example, a particular rule limits the right of access to court or has that effect, the rule itself may be challenged. See, for example, Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 16. In Ferreira v Levin NO & Others, Ackermann J observed that the coming in to operation of the Interim Constitution would require two areas of the law of evidence to be reconsidered in the light of the Bill of Rights: 'The one relates to the way in which evidence, particularly in criminal proceedings is obtained and the second to the question when and to what extent a trial judge has a discretion to exclude otherwise admissible evidence.' 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 146. The latter issue is now regulated by FC s 35(5): 'evidence obtained in a manner that violates any right in the Bill of Rights must be excluded if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice.' For more on FC s 35(5) and constitutionalization of the rules of evidence, see PJ Schwikkard 'Evidence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2007) Chapter 52.

[3] Rule 10A of the Uniform Rules of Court. For more on the rules governing constitutional matters, see K Hofmeyr 'Rules & Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 5.

[4] Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules of Court. For more on the rules governing amicus curiae in constitutional matters, see G Budlender 'Amicus Curiae' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.

[5] The Constitutional Court Rules 2003, GN R1675, Government Gazette 25726 (31 October 2003)('CC Rules').

[6] See T Roux & S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 4.

[7] See C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 7.

[8] See M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008).

[9] Act 13 of 1995.

[10] Section 16 of the Constitutional Court Complimentary Act is the source of the Constitutional Court Rules.

specifically in constitutional litigation: the principle of legality and the principle of constitutional avoidance are, perhaps, the most important.[1]

3.2 WHAT IS A CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUE?

The Final Constitution draws a distinction between constitutional matters and non-constitutional matters. It does so in terms of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court to hear appeals. FC s 167(3)(a) provides that the Constitutional Court 'is the highest court in all constitutional matters'. FC s 167(3)(b) provides that the Constitutional Court 'may decide only constitutional matters and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'. Rule 19 of the Constitutional Court Rules, which regulates appeals to the Constitutional Court, requires that an application for leave to appeal must contain 'a statement setting out clearly and succinctly the constitutional matter raised in the decision, and any other issues including issues that are alleged to be connected with a decision on the constitutional matter.'[2] The purpose of these provisions is to delineate the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court as the highest court in constitutional matters and to distinguish that Court's specialised jurisdiction from the general jurisdiction of other courts. The Supreme Court of Appeal, for example, possesses general jurisdiction. The dividing line, however, between constitutional and non-constitutional matters is far from clear. As Ngcobo J observed in Van der Walt v Metcash Trading Limited: '[W]hether one can speak of a non-constitutional issue in a constitutional democracy where the Constitution is the supreme law and all law and conduct has to conform to the Constitution is not free from doubt.'[3] However, he pointed out that it must be accepted that such a distinction exists and that the judges must 'try to make sense of that distinction'.[4] Justice Carol Lewis of the Supreme Court of Appeal has, nevertheless, argued that the distinction is illusory:

> The most notable defect in the present system arises from the distinction that was sought to be drawn between constitutional and other issues. In the context of a body of law that must necessarily be constitutionally coherent, that distinction is, and always was, an illusion. And because it is an illusory distinction it has not only sown uncertainty as to what is and what is not a 'constitutional issue', with practical consequences for the expeditious treatment of litigation, but it also threatens to impede the coherent development of the law.[5]

[1] For more on the principle of avoidance, see L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 32; I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138; C Sunstein One Case at a Time (1996). For a critique of the jurisprudence of avoidance, see S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762; T Roux 'Principles & Pragmatism in the South African Constitutional Court' International Association of Constitutional Lawyers Conference (Athens, July 2007).

[2] CC Rule 19(3)(b).

[3] 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC) at para 32.

[4] Ibid.

[5] C Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 512 as cited in Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Dikoko') at para 123.

Whatever difficulties there may be in seeking to draw a clear distinction between constitutional issues and non-constitutional issues — and there are many — it is an exercise central to constitutional litigation. The question as to whether the distinction is illusory is beyond the scope of a 'practical' chapter such as ours. An effort to get at the truth of the matter — through an extended engagement with the logic and the (in)coherence of the Court's jurisprudence — is carried out by both Frank Michelman in his chapter on 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution'[1] and by Theunis Roux and Sebastian Seedorf in 'Jurisdiction'.[2] For present purposes, it suffices to say that constitutional matters clearly exist. Such matters embrace challenges to law or to conduct that is allegedly inconsistent with the Final Constitution, issues concerning the status, powers and functions of an organ of state,[3] the interpretation,[4] the application[5] and the upholding of the Final Constitution, the judicial review of administrative action,[6] and the question as to whether the interpretation of any legislation or the development of the common law promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[7]

3.3 CONCEPTUALISING THE CASE

(a) Context in which a constitutional issue may arise

Constitutional matters can arise in a wide diversity of contexts: in both civil litigation and criminal litigation; they can adjudicated by both courts of law and statutory tribunals. A constitutional matter may arise, for example, as a defence to a criminal charge. In such a case, the accused might wish to challenge the constitutional validity of the law in terms of which she has been charged or she might

[1] F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] T Roux & S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2007) Chapter 4.

[3] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) §31.4*(f)*.

[4] See L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 32

[5] See Woolman 'Application' (supra).

[6] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of South Africa and Another: In re: Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 33. See J Klaaren & G Pennfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2002) Chapter 62; Michelman (supra).

[7] On the meaning and use of FC s 39(2), see Woolman 'Application' (supra). See also Dikoko (supra) at para 130.

lodge a constitutional challenge to some pre-trial procedure (ie, the circumstances under which a confession was made.) Similarly, a constitutional issue may arise in a civil context as a defence to a claim. If, for example, an issue arose concerning the validity of a contract which was required to conform to certain statutory formalities, a defendant may wish to challenge the constitutional validity of the statute in question. Because of FC s 8's endorsement of horizontal application, a rule of common law is also susceptible to direct constitutional challenge.[1] FC s 39(2), on the other hand, may be invoked by a party who wishes, through indirect application of the Bill of Rights, to resist the provisions of a contract, trust or will in the name of public policy (now informed by the provisions of the Final Constitution.[2]) Constitutional matters may be raised offensively or defensively. A litigant in civil or criminal proceedings may initiate the challenge to a particular statute or conduct. Or the constitutional matter may arise as a defence to a criminal charge or a civil claim.

The Final Constitution vests a specific power in members of the National Assembly to apply to the Constitutional Court for an order declaring that all or part of an Act of Parliament is unconstitutional.[3] Such an application must be supported by at least one third of the members of the National Assembly and must be made within thirty days of the date on which the President assented to and signed the Act.[4] A similar power vests in members of a Provincial Legislature to apply to the Constitutional Court for an order declaring that all or part of a provincial Act is unconstitutional.[5] Such an application must be supported by at least 20% of the members of the legislature and must be made within thirty days of the date on which the Premier assented to and signed the Act.[6]

Constitutional issues may also be raised in statutory tribunals other than courts of law. Although only a court of law has the power to declare legislation or conduct unconstitutional, statutory tribunals may draw down on the dictates of the Final Constitution. It has been held, for example, that the Competition Tribunal, established in terms of the Competition Act,[7] has the jurisdiction to consider whether or not a particular statutory provision is constitutionally compliant. Although it does not have the power to strike down a provision, if the [1] See, for example, Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)(Common law rule of defamation, in terms of which a plaintiff does not have to allege and to prove the falsity of the defamatory imputations, was unsuccessfully challenged).

[2] See, for example, Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC)(Provisions of a prescriptive period in a contract of insurance unsuccessfully challenged.)

[3] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[4] FC s 80.

[5] See T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 19.

[6] FC s 122.

[7] Act 89 of 1998.

Tribunal were to conclude that the provision was inconsistent with the Final Constitution, it would have a duty not to enforce the provision.[1]

The context in which a constitutional issue is raised has procedural implications which must be considered by practitioners. For example, if a constitutional issue is raised by way of exception in a civil matter or objection to the charge in a criminal matter, an adverse decision against the objector may not be appealable to the Supreme Court of Appeal because it will not be a 'judgment or order' in terms of appealability case law under s 21 of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959.[2] In such cases, if the objector wants a final decision on her constitutional defence in advance of a full hearing of a trial, then she may be better served by bringing a free standing application for declaratory constitutional relief rather than by raising her constitutional defence in exception or objection proceedings.[3]

Similarly, if a constitutional issue is raised in proceedings before a court which has no jurisdiction to hear the constitutional issue,[4] and the litigant fails to institute parallel proceedings before a court with jurisdiction to determine the constitutional issue, then a litigant may find herself in the undesirable situation of either having to lead evidence relevant to the constitutional issue in the proceedings before a court which has no jurisdiction to determine the issue,[5] or having to introduce evidence relevant to the constitutional issue on appeal.

(b) Need for pleading

Irrespective of how and in which forum a constitutional matter arises, it has been frequently stressed that constitutional matters must be properly pleaded.[6] The general principles of civil procedure and the need to alert a party to litigation of the case must be met. Pleading is particularly important in cases where a party seeks to justify a limitation of fundamental rights. Justification cases frequently depend not on facts, but on the policies underlying laws intended to effect legitimate governmental objectives. However, even here, the party seeking to justify existing law must plead that the policy is being furthered by the challenged law, offer the reasons for that policy and demonstrate why it ought to be considered reasonable, in pursuit of that policy, to limit the fundamental right. In the absence

[1] See Federal Mogul Aftermarket Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v Competition Commission &Another 2005 (6) BCLR 613 (CAC).

[2] See, for example, Zweni v Minister of Law and Order 1993 (1) SA 523 (A); Minister of Safety and Security v Hamilton 2001 (3) SA 50 (SCA); S v Western Areas Ltd & Others 2005 (5) SA 214 (SCA), 2005 (1) SACR 441 (SCA)('Western Areas').

[3] See, for example, Western Areas (supra) at para 35.

[4] An example would be a plea that raised a constitutional challenge to a law in proceedings before the magistrates court. In terms of FC s 170, a magistrates' court 'may not enquire into or rule on the constitutionality of any legislation or any conduct of the President.'

[5] This procedure is competent, if unsatisfactory. See Walker v Stadsraad van Pretoria 1997 (4) SA 189 (T).

[6] See National Director of Public Prosecutions v Phillips & Others 2002 (4) SA 60 (W) at para 37 (contains a useful collection of the authorities on the subject).

of pleaded particulars of this nature, the party mounting the constitutional challenge will not have a fair opportunity of rebutting the case for justification through countervailing evidence of a factual or expert nature.[1] Thus a bald allegation in pleadings that a limitation of fundamental rights is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom is excipiable as a vague and embarrassing plea.

Similar considerations would apply to remedial issues in cases where the constitutionality of any law or conduct is being challenged. Because of the Court's wide remedial powers under FC s 38 and FC s 172, it has been frequently stressed that a proper evidential foundation for the granting of ancillary orders of suspension of invalidity, retrospectively or prospectively, must be laid.[2] At the level of pleading, practitioners must ensure that they provide sufficient particulars of their client's remedial case under FC s 38 or FC s 172 to enable their opponents to adduce all relevant evidence necessary to rebut the challenge.

Although the general principle in constitutional litigation is the same as in conventional litigation — that a party raising a constitutional issue must raise the matter appropriately in the affidavits or the pleadings — the courts have also recognised that they may, of their own accord, raise a constitutional matter and give directions for the disposition of the case. In De Beer v Raad Vir Gesondheidsberoepe van Suid-Afrika, the court raised, mero motu, a constitutional issue and laid down particular procedures to be followed by the parties when addressing that constitutional issue.[3] Where courts raise constitutional issues on their own, the following steps should be followed:

1. The reservations or doubts as to the constitutionality of the specific provision or conduct should be described with precision.
2. The provisions of the Final Constitution that allegedly violated or engaged should be identified.
3. The parties should be afforded an unrestricted opportunity to comment on the court's prima facie view.
4. If the court remains of the view that the matter requires the clarification of a constitutional point, then the parties should be invited to assist the court in formulating the question to be resolved.
5. The parties should be afforded an opportunity to comment on whether there are other interested persons who should be invited to join.
6. The parties should be invited and afforded an opportunity to study the authorities on the question before the constitutional point is finally formulated.
7. The formulation adopted has to be acceptable to both parties and to the court.

[1] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 36.

[2] Chief Lesapo v North-West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at para 33.

[3] 2004 (3) BCLR 284 (T).

8. The court should then make appropriate orders in order for the requirements of Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules to be fulfilled.

(c) Bill of Rights litigation

The Bill of Rights contained in Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution has been the primary source of constitutional challenges. Bill of Rights challenges generally involve two independent steps.[1] The first step establishes whether or not the law or conduct entails a breach of the right in question. The party alleging such breach bears the burden of demonstrating that an infringement or limitation has occurred. Once a prima facie violation of a guaranteed right is established, the second stage of the enquiry requires an investigation as to whether or not the limitation of the right by law of general application is justifiable.[2] The burden of justification for proving that the limit on a fundamental right is permissible in terms of FC s 36 rests upon the party seeking to uphold the limitation.[3] The need for specificity in pleading assumes particular importance in relation to questions of justification.

In the assessment of the constitutional validity of a law, it is competent to enquire into both the purpose and the effect of the impugned provision. In this regard, and in the context of unfair discrimination analysis, the Constitutional Court has observed:

> The purpose and effect of a statute are relevant in determining its constitutionality. A statute can be held to be invalid either because its purpose or its effect is inconsistent with the Constitution. If a statute has a purpose that violates the Constitution, it must be held to be invalid regardless of its actual effects. The effect of legislation is relevant to show that although the statute is facially neutral, its effect is unconstitutional. This will be the case where, for example, the legislation has a discriminatory impact on a particular racial group.[4]

Several rights require the enactment of legislation to give effect to the right in question: the right to equality,[5] the right of access to information[6] and the right to just administrative action,[7] and the right to security of tenure.[8] With respect to

[1] For a detailed analysis of the two stages of Bill of Rights litigation, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma') at para 21; S v Wiliams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 54; Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 9. Only law, and not conduct may be justified in terms of FC s 36. See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] Zuma (supra) at paras 35–38; S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 102.

[4] Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('Zondi') at para 90.

[5] FC 9(4) provides: 'national legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination'.

[6] FC 32(2) requires national legislation to give effect to the rights embodied in FC s 32(1).

[7] FC s 33(3) requires national legislation to give effect to the rights embodied in FC s 33(1) and (2).

[8] FC s 25(9) requires national legislation to give effect to the right in FC s 25(6).

all four rights, the envisaged national legislation has been enacted.[1] Other rights envisage, but do not require, national legislation.[2] Where legislation gives effect to a constitutional right, it has been held that it is not permissible to invoke the right directly. Instead, recourse must be had, in the first instance, to the statute giving effect to the right. Thus, where reliance is placed upon the right to just administrative action, a party is obliged to bring the case under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act. If the party contends that this Act does not go far enough to give effect to the fundamental right, only then may it invoke FC s 33 to challenge the constitutionality of the PAJA — as opposed to the conduct ultimately at issue.[3]

Other statutes have been enacted to give effect to constitutional rights even where the Final Constitution does not expressly require it. The Labour Relations Act was enacted to give effect to the labour rights embodied in the Interim Constitution.[4] Likewise, the National Environment Management Act was enacted to give effect to the environmental rights embodied in FC s 24.[5] Where such legislation has been enacted to give effect to a constitutional right, a litigant wishing to invoke the right to challenge the validity of conduct must first proceed under the statute in question rather than the fundamental right.[6] Direct recourse to the fundamental right in such cases is limited to challenges to the validity of the enabling legislation.[7]

Litigation concerning socio-economic rights presents different conceptual and

[1] The prohibition on unfair discrimination is given effect by the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000. The right of access to information is given effect by the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000. The right to administrative justice is given effect by the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000. The right to security of tenure is given effect by a range of legislation including the Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 and the Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997.

[2] FC s 23.

[3] See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Limited v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at paras 22–6 (court held that an applicant for judicial review must invoke the statute rather than the constitutional right). See also Zondi (supra) at paras 99–103; Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Limited & Others (Treatment Action Campaign & Another as amici curiae) 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 92–97.

[4] Act 66 of 1995.

[5] Act 107 of 1998.

[6] NEHAWU v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC)(Court held that with respect to the invocation of rights concerning labour relations in FC s 23, it is not permissible to invoke FC s 23 directly but, recourse should rather be had to the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995.)

[7] See Zondi (supra) at para 99.

evidentiary issues.[1] These differences flow primarily from the nature of the state's duties in relation to such rights and particularly its obligation to ensure the 'progressive realisation' of the rights in question 'within its available resources'.[2] In Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom[3] – in which the state's failure to provide access to adequate housing was challenged – the following principles were laid down:

1. The state is obliged to take positive action to meet the needs of those living in extreme conditions of poverty, homelessness or intolerable housing.[4]
2. The poor are particularly vulnerable and their needs require special attention.[5]
3. The state's obligations depend upon context and may vary.[6]
4. The state is required to 'devise a comprehensive and workable plan to meet its obligations'. That obligation is not unqualified and is defined by the state's obligation to take reasonable measures to achieve the progressive realisation of the right within available resources.[7]
5. A reasonable programme must 'clearly allocate responsibilities and tasks to the different spheres of government and ensure that the appropriate financial and human resources are available'.[8]
6. In the context of housing, 'a co-ordinated state housing programme must be a comprehensive one determined by all three spheres of government in consultation with each other'. Each sphere of government 'must accept responsibility for the implementation of particular parts of the programme but the national sphere of government must assume responsibility for ensuring that laws, policies, programmes and strategies are adequate to meet the state's … obligations'.[9]

[1] See S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33; D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 56A; K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55; D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 56C; A Kok & M Langford 'Water' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 56B; M Swart 'Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56D.

[2] This formula is used in FC s 26(2) and FC s 27(2). Slightly different formulations are used in FC s 24*(b)* and FC s 29(1)(b).

[3] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ibid at para 36.

[6] Ibid at para 37.

[7] Ibid at para 38.

[8] Ibid at para 39.

[9] Ibid at para 40.

7. The measures in question must establish a coherent programme directed towards the progressive realisation of the right: 'The programme must be capable of facilitating the realisation of the right. The precise contours and contents of the measures to be adopted are primarily a matter for the legislature and the executive. They must, however, ensure that the measures they adopt are reasonable.'[1]
8. The state is required to take reasonable legislative and other measures to meet its obligations. Mere legislation is not enough: 'These policies and programmes must be reasonable both in the conception and their implementation. The formulation of a programme is only the first stage in meeting the state's obligations. The programme must also be reasonably implemented.'[2]

These principles must be addressed by the relevant State department once a breach of the right in question has been established.

(d) Non-chapter 2 litigation

The Final Constitution is the supreme law and any law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid. It follows that law or conduct inconsistent with any provision of the Final Constitution may be challenged. Accordingly, provisions of the Final Constitution other than those found in the Bill of Rights may be invoked to challenge the validity of law or conduct.

FC s 1 articulates the founding values of the Constitution. One of those values, embodied in FC s 1*(c), is 'supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law'. The Constitutional Court has relied on FC s 1(c)* to develop the legality principle and the rule of law doctrine. According to the legality principle and the rule of law doctrine: all legislative and executive organs of state can exercise only those powers conferred lawfully on them;[3] executive action cannot be arbitrary;[4] all legislation must be rational;[5] the judiciary may not act arbitrarily and must be held accountable;[6] and rules of law must be stated in a clear and accessible manner.[7]

The Constitutional Court has also held that rationality is a minimum requirement of all law:

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 41.
[2] Ibid at para 42.
[3] Fedsure Life Assurance Limited v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at paras 56-57; President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC) at para 42; President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at para 148.
[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of South Africa & Another: In re: Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufaturers') at paras 83–5.
[5] New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') at para 24.
[6] Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Limited 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) at para 12.
[7] Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 47.

> The constitutional state is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional state.[1]

However, the Constitutional Court has only once struck down a statute as not being rationally connected to a legitimate governmental purpose.[2] In another matter, the Constitutional Court held that a decision by the President was irrational in circumstances where the President himself had conceded the irrationality of the decision under consideration.[3] While law or conduct may be challenged on grounds of irrationality, the Constitutional Court has emphasised the narrow scope of rationality review. It has stated that rationality review is: a deferential standard of review;[4] likely to be invoked only rarely;[5] not to be employed simply because a court disagrees with law or conduct;[6] not designed to enable courts to make policy choices which are the preserve of the legislature;[7] not a legitimate grounds for striking down legislation because the court believes that the legislature could have achieved its desired ends through better means or means that are less invasive of private rights.[8]

Constitutional challenges need not only be founded on the express provisions of the Final Constitution. Implied provisions carry the same force as express provisions. Thus, although the Final Constitution does not expressly create a justiciable doctrine of separation of powers, this doctrine is implicit in the basic

[1] Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)('Prinsloo') at para 25; Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 53.

[2] Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund & Another (Women's Legal Centre Trust as amicus curiae) 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC)(The Court concluded that s 18*(b)* of the Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984 was unconstitutional because it infringed FC s 9(1). Section 18*(b)* prohibited spouses married in community of property from claiming damages for patrimonial loss in respect of bodily injuries caused by the other spouse. The Court held that the section both differentiated between patrimonial and non-patrimonial damages and between marriages in community of property and those out of community of property. The latter distinction was held not to be useful and was no more than a 'relic of the common law of marriage'. The differentiation was arbitrary insofar as it gave one class of person 'greater protection from wilful domestic battery or accidental bodily injury' than another class. The Minister conceded that while the only purpose of the section was to avoid the futility of spousal claims, this objective was not a legitimate government purpose. A spousal claim in respect of patrimonial losses arising from bodily injuries caused by the other spouse would not be futile as the damages awarded in terms of such a claim would not accrue to the joint estate.)

[3] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra).

[4] New National Party (supra) at para 122 (O'Regan J dissenting, but not on this point).

[5] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 90.

[6] Ibid; New National Party (supra) at para 24.

[7] Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Limited (Minister of Labour intervening) 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC) at para 17; S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at paras 41–6.

[8] Prinsloo (supra) at para 36; East Zulu Motors (Pty) Limited v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 24 and 30.

law. A provision of a statute that violated the implied separation of powers was held to be inconsistent with the Final Constitution and therefore invalid.[1]

The Final Constitution prescribes the procedures to be adopted for passing a bill into law. Four different categories are identified and specific procedures are prescribed in each case.[2] The four categories are bills amending the Constitution,[3] ordinary bills not affecting provinces,[4] ordinary bills affecting provinces[5] and money bills.[6] Non-compliance with constitutional procedures will render invalid any law passed pursuant to an incorrect procedure. In Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Court held that the 'manner and form' provisions of the Interim Constitution were not merely directory and can only be departed from when the Constitution permits this expressly or by necessary implication.[7] In Executive Council, Western Cape, the Court held that a provision of a statute which purported to vest a power in the President, acting alone, to amend an Act of Parliament was unconstitutional. The Final Constitution possesses similarly detailed provisions that must be followed for the passing of provincial legislation.[8] In principle, non-compliance with these provisions would likewise render a provincial statute invalid.

The Final Constitution has brought about a fundamental change in the structures of government. Provincial legislatures, for example, are vested with original legislative competence in respect of a wide range of matters and with exclusive legislative competence over matters described in Parts B of Schedules 4 and 5 of the Final Constitution. Legislation, whether national or provincial, may accordingly be challenged as falling beyond the legislative competence of a particular legislature.[9]

[1] South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)(In this case, a provision of the Special Tribunals Act 74 of 1996 required that a judge or acting judge of the High Court be appointed to head a Special Investigating Unit for the purpose of investigating serious malpractices or maladministration in connection with the administration of state institutions. This provision was held to violate the separation of powers between the legislature, executive and judiciary.) See further T Roux & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 12.

[2] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[3] FC s 74.

[4] FC s 75.

[5] FC s 76.

[6] FC s 77. Although money Bills constitute a special category, FC s 77 prescribes that they are to be dealt with in accordance with the procedure established by FC s 75.

[7] 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 62.

[8] See T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 19.

[9] See, for example, Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). See also V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

(d) Interpretive issues

The Final Constitution itself identifies rules of interpretation peculiar to constitutional litigation. FC s 39(2) provides: 'When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.'

The leading decision on the use of FC s 39(2) to develop the common law is Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another.[1] The following principles emerge from that decision:

1. Where the common law deviates from the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, the courts have an obligation to develop it.[2]
2. When courts exercise their powers to develop the common law, they should be 'mindful of the fact that the major engine for law reform should be the legislature and not the judiciary'.[3]
3. Where the cause of action arises before the coming into operation of the Final Constitution, but proceedings take place thereafter, the courts are 'obliged to have regard to the provisions of s 39(2) of the Constitution when developing the common law'.[4]
4. The obligation to develop the common law in the context of FC s 39(2) is not purely discretionary. Courts are under a 'general obligation' to develop the common law. This general obligation does not mean that 'a court must in each and every case where the common law is involved, embark on an independent exercise as to whether the common law is in need of development and, if so, how it is to be developed under s 39(2). At the same time there might be circumstances where a court is obliged to raise the matter on its own and require full argument from the parties.'[5]
5. The development of the common law occurs in two stages which 'cannot be hermetically separated from one another'. The first stage 'is to consider whether the existing common law, having regard to the s 39(2) objectives, requires development in accordance with these objectives. This enquiry requires a reconsideration of the common law in the light of s 39(2). If this enquiry leads to a positive answer, the second stage concerns itself with how such development is to take place in order to meet the s 39(2) objectives'.[6]

[1] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').
[2] Ibid at para 30.
[3] Ibid at para 36.
[4] Ibid at para 37.
[5] Ibid at para 39.
[6] Ibid at para 40.

6. The common law must be developed within the matrix of an 'objective normative system'. This requirement does not, however, entail 'overzealous judicial reform'.[1]

The obligation imposed by FC s 39(2) is not confined to the development of the common law. Its most frequent application arises in the context of the interpretation of statutes. The Constitutional Court has stressed that the obligation imposed by FC s 39(2) requires that 'all statutes must be interpreted through the prism of the Bill of Rights' and that 'the process of interpreting the Constitution must recognise the context in which we find ourselves and the Constitution's goal of a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights.'[2] The Hyundai Court went on to state that 'the purport and objects of the Constitution find expression in s 1 which lays out the fundamental values which the Constitution is designed to achieve'.[3] As such the Final Constitution 'requires that judicial officers read legislation, where possible, in ways that give effect to its fundamental values.'[4]

The obligation to interpret statutes in a manner that promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights assumes particular importance when litigants first seek to characterise the precise nature of the constitutional attack. Prior to the launching of a constitutional challenge, litigants are under an obligation to attempt an interpretation of a law which preserves the statute's constitutionality rather than the adoption of an interpretation that would necessitate the invalidation of the statute. However, the duty to read down a statute to preserve its constitutionality has obvious limits. The language used by the legislature cannot be put under unreasonable strain merely to preserve the constitutionality of the law in question. Consequently, the process required by FC s 39(2) entails that only a reasonable interpretation should be adopted. There may be cases, however, in which the legislature has deliberately framed legislation in a way which consciously entails the violation of a protected right, but does so in a manner which the legislature contends would meet the test for justification under FC s 36. Thus, where the legislature intends legislation to limit rights, and where that legislation does so clearly but justifiably, that interpretation must be preferred. In such circumstances, however, the Court 'would have to be persuaded by careful and thorough argument that such an interpretation was indeed the proper interpretation and that any limitation caused was justifiable as contemplated by s 36 of the Constitution.'[5] Where the legislature actually intends to limit fundamental rights in a justifiable manner, this intention must be specifically pleaded. It

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 55. For a discussion and a critique of the notion of an 'objective normative value system', see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[2] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offenses & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Limited & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 21.

[3] Ibid at para 22.

[4] Ibid.

[5] NUMSA & Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Limited & Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC) at para 37.

cannot be purely a matter of argument. The legislature will likely be required to provide evidence to justify the limitation in question.

While the Final Constitution vests original legislative competence in both the provinces and the national legislature, it also recognises that both legislative spheres have concurrent legislative competence over a range of areas.[1] Legislation on the same topic may be passed by both a provincial legislature and the national legislature. It is therefore necessary to have a mechanism for resolving conflicts between national and provincial legislation.[2] However, in cases of only apparent conflict between national and provincial legislation or between national legislation and a provincial constitution, 'every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation or Constitution that avoids a conflict, over any alternative interpretation that results in a conflict.'[3]

The Final Constitution incorporates various forms of international law into domestic law.[4] With respect to the interpretation of domestic law, FC 233 provides that 'when interpreting any legislation, any court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law'.

3.4 Procedural and jurisdictional issues

(a) Mootness, ripeness and standing[5]

FC s 34 guarantees a right of access to court: 'Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum.'[6] Like all other rights in the Bill of Rights, the right of access to court is capable of justifiable limitations. Indeed, over many years, courts have [1] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

[2] See FC ss 146–50.

[3] FC s 150. A 'conflict' may arise in two different contexts. In the first instance, a conflict may arise where, for example, a provision in provincial legislation is simply beyond the legislative competence of the province. Secondly, a conflict may arise between two legislative provisions where 'they cannot stand at the same time, or cannot stand together, or cannot both be obeyed at the same time'. See Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) at para 24. For more on the resolution of conflicts between a provincial constitution and national legislation or between a provincial constitution and the Final Constitution, see S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 20.

[4] See FC ss 231–233.

[5] See C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7.

[6] J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2007) Chapter 59.

fashioned rules which permit them to avoid deciding cases. In general, courts will only act 'if the right remedy is sought by the right person in the right proceedings and circumstances.'[1] In general, therefore, courts will only entertain matters initiated by persons with standing, which are not hypothetical or academic and which are brought at a time and in a manner which renders them appropriate for decision. Constitutional litigation is, in principle, no different.[2] However, the Constitutional Court has recognised that even in cases which are technically moot as between the parties, the interests of justice may tip the balance in favour of entertaining a particular dispute. Such an occasion might arise, for example, where the law on a particular topic is not settled and is of critical import to the operation of government.[3]

The Final Constitution has substantially relaxed the rules of standing in Bill of Rights litigation. In Ferreira v Levin NO & Others, Chaskalson P, while stressing that the Constitutional Court should not be required to deal with abstract issues, could nevertheless 'see no good reason for adopting a narrow approach to the issue of standing in constitutional cases'.[4] He continued:

> On the contrary, it is my view that we should rather adopt a broad approach to standing. This would be consistent with the mandate given to this Court to uphold the Constitution and would serve to ensure that constitutional rights enjoy the full measure of the protection to which they are entitled.[5]

Notwithstanding the broadened scope of standing under the Final Constitution, those seeking relief in terms of the Bill of Rights must still bring themselves within the ambit of FC s 38.[6]

(b) Joinder of necessary organs of state

In keeping with general principles of litigation, a party initiating a constitutional challenge must join all necessary parties to the dispute.[7] In relation to constitu-

[1] HWR Wade & C Forsyth Administrative Law (7th Edition, 1994) 342 cited in Oudekraal Estates (Pty) Limited v City of Cape Town & Others 2004 (6) SA 222 (SCA) at para 28.

[2] JT Publishing (Pty) Limited & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1997 (3) SA 514 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1599 (CC) at para 15.

[3] AAA Investments (Pty) Limited v Micro-Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC) at para 27.

[4] Ferreira v Levin NO; Vryenhoek v Powell NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 165.

[5] Ibid (The Court was concerned with the standing provisions in the Interim Constitution which, for practical purposes, are the same as those contained in FC s 38.)

[6] See, generally, HJ Erasmus Superior Court Practice (1994) A2–3 to A2–4R.

[7] The common law position is well established. See, for example, Amalgamated Engineering Union v Minister of Labour 1949 (3) SA 637 (A). The matter is also now specifically regulated by Rule 10 of the Uniform Rules of Court. See Erasmus (supra) at B1–93 to B1–98.

tional litigation, however, a special rule has been introduced. Rule 10A of the Uniform Rules provides:

> If in any proceedings before the Court, the constitutional validity of a law is challenged, the party challenging the validity of the law shall join the provincial or national executive authorities responsible for the administration of the law in the proceedings.

This rule is, in any event, a codification of principles established by the Constitutional Court in relation to joinder.[1]

Rule 5 of the Constitutional Court Rules goes further than its counterpart in the Uniform Rules. It provides:

> 5(1) In any matter, including any appeal, where there is a dispute over the constitutionality of any executive or administrative act or conduct or threatened executive or administrative act or conduct, or in any enquiry into the constitutionality of any law, including any act of Parliament or that of a Provincial Legislature, and the authority responsible for the executive or administrative act or conduct or the threatening thereof or for the administration of any such law is not cited as a party to the case, the party challenging the constitutionality of such act or conduct or law shall, within five days of lodging with the Registrar a document in which such contention is raised for the first time in the proceedings before the Court, take steps to join the authority concerned as party to the proceedings.
>
> (2) No order declaring such act, conduct or law to be unconstitutional shall be made by the court in such matter unless the provisions of this rule have been complied with.

The Constitutional Court has stressed the importance of this rule: in a constitutional democracy, 'a court should not declare the acts of another arm of government to be inconsistent with the Constitution without ensuring that that arm of government is given a proper opportunity to consider the constitutional challenge and to make such representations to the court as it considers fit.'[2] The Court stated that there were two reasons for this requirement:

> First, the Minister responsible for administering the legislation may well be able to place pertinent facts and submissions before the Court necessary for the proper determination of the constitutional issue. Secondly, a constitutional democracy such as ours requires that the different arms of government respect and acknowledge their different constitutional functions.[3]

(c) Submissions by an amicus curiae[4]

Constitutional disputes, particularly those affecting the validity of a statute, have implications and effects beyond the immediate parties to the dispute. It is for that

[1] See, eg, Parbhoo & Others v Getz NO & Another 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC) at para 5.

[2] Mabaso v Law Society of the Northern Province & Another 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC) at para 13.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See, generally, G Budlender 'Amicus Curiae' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.

reason that interventions by interested parties are permitted in appropriate circumstances, now regulated by Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules of Court, Rule 16 of the Supreme Court of Appeal Rules and Rule 10 of the Constitutional Court Rules. The provisions of these rules are essentially the same. They all permit intervention by interested third parties on such terms and conditions as the relevant court may allow. Such intervention may have significant consequences. In appropriate circumstances, an amicus may be permitted to introduce new evidence.[1]

One aspect of Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules which is frequently overlooked is the obligation in Rule 16A(1) that requires any person raising a constitutional issue in an application or action to give notice thereof to the Registrar at the time of filing the relevant affidavit or pleading. The notice is required to contain 'a clear and succinct description of the constitutional issue concerned.' The notice must be placed upon a notice board designated for that purpose for a period of twenty days. The purpose of this notice is to inform the world at large that a constitutional issue has been raised and to permit the intervention of interested parties. The Constitutional Court has stressed the importance of this requirement. In Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others, the Court stated that the minds of litigants and, in particular, practitioners in the High Courts should be focused on the need for specificity.[2] The Shaik Court stated that 'the purpose of the rule is to bring to the attention of persons (who may be affected by or have a legitimate interest in the case) the particularity of the constitutional challenge, in order that they may take steps to protect their interests.'[3]

The twenty-day period (and other time periods stipulated by the rule) can be dispensed with by the court if it is in the interests of justice to do so.[4] Rule 16A is enacted in the public interest. The parties to litigation cannot, therefore, simply agree that the requirements of the rule may be ignored: 'The reason for the rule is that constitutional cases often have consequences which go far beyond the parties concerned.'[5] However, circumstances may exist that might justify a relaxation of the requirements of the rule. If the matter in issue has received wide notice in the public media, then the fundamental purpose of the rule would have been achieved. Urgency may also justify a relaxation of the time periods prescribed.[6]

(d) Form of proceedings

Although the vast majority of constitutional cases arise in motion proceedings, no reason exists why constitutional matters should not be dealt with by way of action. The choice of proceeding depends upon long established principles.

[1] See, eg, Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 61.
[2] 2004 (3) SA 599 (CC), 2004 (4) BCLR 333 (CC).
[3] Ibid at para 24.
[4] Rule 16A(9) of the Uniform Rules.
[5] Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C), 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) at para 21.
[6] Ibid at para 22.

With regard to motion proceedings, however, the conventional practice established by the Rules of Court is not ideally suited for rights-based litigation. The general rule limiting the number of affidavits in motion proceedings was not formulated with constitutional litigation in mind.[1] Where an applicant alleges the violation of a fundamental right, the respondent bears the burden of justifying the limitation of the right in question. Accordingly, questions of justification will be raised for the first time in the answering affidavit. The proper disposition of rights-based litigation therefore warrants the filing of further affidavits. (Such a procedure was sanctioned in the pre-constitutional era in cases involving the deprivation of individual liberty.[2])

(e) Appropriate court

The Final Constitution expressly delineates the jurisdiction of the courts of law to hear constitutional matters. The precise rules of jurisdiction are dealt with elsewhere in this work.[3] For present purposes, it must be emphasised that appropriate relief must be sought in an appropriate court. Six matters fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court: disputes between organs of state in the national or provincial sphere concerning the constitutional status, powers or functions of any of those organs of state; the constitutionality of any parliamentary or provincial bill; matters referred to the Constitutional Court by members of the National Assembly or a Provincial Legislature; the constitutionality of any amendment to the Final Constitution; whether Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation; and the certification of a provincial constitution.[4]

Outside of these areas of exclusivity, the High Courts are vested with jurisdiction to decide any constitutional matter unless the matter in question has been assigned by an Act of Parliament to another court of a status similar to a High Court.[5] The Final Constitution further provides in FC s 172(2)(a) that the Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial act or the conduct of the President. However, an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court.

[1] Rule 6(5) of the Uniform Rules of Court envisages a founding affidavit, answering affidavit and replying affidavit in motion proceedings. Rule 6(5)(e) vests the court with a discretion to permit the filing of further affidavits.

[2] See Minister Van Wet en Orde v Matshoba 1990 (1) SA 280 (A)(Botha JA, on behalf of the majority, held that a detainee should be allowed to seek in motion proceedings an order for his release based on a founding affidavit in which he alleges that he is being held against his will notwithstanding the general requirement that an applicant must disclose his complete case in the founding affidavit. Moreover, the court held that the restriction on the number of sets of affidavits usually accepted in motion proceedings should be relaxed in accordance with Rule 6(5)(e) and that the filing of up to five sets of affidavits would be acceptable.)

[3] See T Roux & S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 4.

[4] FC s 167(4)

[5] FC s 169.

The Constitutional Court is vested with jurisdiction to hear matters as a court of first instance. FC s 167(6) provides that National Legislation or the Rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court, to bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court. The matter is regulated by CC Rule 18.

Notwithstanding the jurisdiction to entertain matters by way of direct access, the Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that it is undesirable for it to sit both as the court of first and final instance in a matter in which other courts have jurisdiction.[1] The expansive constitutional jurisdiction of the High Court means that most constitutional cases will not commence in the Constitutional Court itself but will reach it only on appeal.

(f) Reasons for a court to decline to exercise constitutional jurisdiction

A court may decline to hear a constitutional matter within its jurisdiction in certain defined circumstances. In disputes between spheres of government and organs of state, certain procedural requirements must be met before the dispute can be entertained by a court of law.[2] FC s 41(3) provides that an organ of state involved in an intergovernmental dispute 'must make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute by means of mechanisms and procedures provided for that purpose, and must exhaust all other remedies before it approaches a court to resolve the dispute.' FC s 41(4) provides that 'if a court is not satisfied that the requirements of sub-section (3) have been met, it may refer a dispute back to the organs of state involved.' The Constitutional Court has therefore held that a court 'will rarely decide intergovernmental dispute unless the organs of state involved in the dispute have made every reasonable effort to resolve it at a political level.'[3] In any case, the promulgation of the constitutionally mandated Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 15 of 2005 has meant that courts will rarely, if ever, entertain such disputes.

Other important jurisdictional limitations exist. Rule 5 of the Constitutional Court Rules precludes the Constitutional Court from declaring an act, conduct or law to be unconstitutional until the joinder of necessary parties has been effected. Similarly, non-compliance with the notice provisions in Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules of Court may result in a court declining to exercise jurisdiction.

[1] See Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Land Affairs & Another 1997 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1573 (CC) at para 18; Bruce & Another v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC & Others 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC) at para 8; Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 1999 (2) SA 83 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC) at para 12; Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 6; Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 13.

[2] S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

[3] Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC) at para 14.

(g) The principle of constitutional avoidance

At a very early stage of its constitutional jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court laid down a general principle 'that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed'.[1] The Court recognised, however, that the general principle is not inflexible. Thus, where a criminal trial was likely to last a long time, a challenge to the constitutional validity of the statute in terms of which the accused was charged would justify a departure from the general principle.[2] The principle of constitutional avoidance makes the most sense in the context of challenges to the validity of statutes. The striking down of a statute is considered to be a drastic remedy. It is understandable, therefore, that measures short of a striking down are to be preferred. However, the principle of constitutional avoidance cannot be treated a rule of constitutional law that disposes of matters. To elevate 'avoidance' to a constitutional rule would, at a minimum, undermine the obligation imposed by FC s 39(2) to interpret all statutes and to develop the common law in accordance with the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights. It would, if treated as a rule, and not as a form of rhetoric, ultimately empty the specific substantive rights of Chapter 2 of their content.[3]

3.5 Appeals

(a) Appeals to the Constitutional Court

The rules relating to appeals to the Constitutional Court are addressed in detail elsewhere in this work.[4] However, the following principles may be of interest to practitioners:

1. Applications for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court must be made directly to the Constitutional Court. Unlike applications for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Court has no power to grant leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court.
2. The Constitutional Court will grant leave to appeal only when it finds that the interests of justice require the grant of leave: reasonable prospects of success are a necessary, but not sufficient requirement in any application for leave to appeal. In addition to demonstrating reasonable prospects of success, an applicant for leave to appeal will usually have to show that the constitutional issue is of sufficient importance to merit the attention of the Constitutional Court.

[1] S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762.
[4] See K Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5.

3. Ordinarily, the Constitutional Court will not hear an appeal directly from the High Court. It will require appeals to proceed from the High Court to the Supreme Court of Appeal. This general rule is subject to three specific exception: appeals against orders of constitutional invalidity of Acts of Parliament; appeals against orders of invalidity of Acts of a provincial legislature; and appeals against orders invalidating the conduct of the President. In such cases, FC s 172(2)(d) vests the losing litigant with a right of direct appeal to the Constitutional Court.

(b) Appeals to the Supreme Court of Appeal

FC s 168(3) vests the Supreme Court of Appeal with jurisdiction over appeals 'in any matter'. The Supreme Court of Appeal has held that this provision invests it with appellate jurisdiction from specialist appellate courts like the Labour Appeal Court and the Competition Appeal Court. It has, however, made clear that it will exercise this appellate jurisdiction from specialist appellate courts sparingly. The test to be applied in such cases is the test for special leave to appeal. This test requires not only reasonable prospects of success, but also 'some additional factor' militating in favour of leave to appeal. That the applicants for leave to appeal from a specialist appellate court have already had the benefit of a full appeal before that court will ordinarily weigh heavily against the grant of leave to appeal by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1]

The Supreme Court of Appeal has also recognised that FC s 168(3) changes the test for appeals of decisions of the High Court. A decision which does not amount to a 'judgment or order' in terms of the appealability case law[2] generated under s 21 of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959 may yet be appealable to the Supreme Court of Appeal if the applicant can show that it is in the interests of justice for her to be granted leave to appeal.[3] In order to satisfy the Supreme Court of Appeal that the interests of justice support the grant of leave to appeal, the applicant for leave to appeal must canvass all facts relevant to the interests of justice in the affidavits filed in support of her application for leave to appeal.[4]

3.6 Costs[5]

FC s 172 vests courts, when dealing with a constitutional matter, with the widest possible remedial jurisdiction. A court may make any order that is 'just and

[1] American Natural Soda Ash Corp & Another v Competition Commission & Others 2005 (6) SA 158 (SCA) at paras 21-22. See also National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa v Fry's Metals (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 433 (SCA) at para 43.

[2] See, for example, Zweni v Minister of Law and Order 1993 (1) SA 523 (A); Minister of Safety and Security v Hamilton 2001 (3) SA 50 (SCA).

[3] S v Western Areas Ltd & Others 2005 (5) SA 214 (SCA), 2005 (1) SACR 441 (SCA) at para 28.

[4] Ibid at para 35.

[5] For more on costs in constitutional matters, see A Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 6.

equitable'. Pursuant to this power, and its predecessor in the Interim Constitution, the Constitutional Court has deviated from the conventional principle that costs follow the result. The underlying rationale for this deviation has been articulated as follows:

> The award of costs is a matter which is within the discretion of the Court considering the issue of costs. It is a discretion that must be exercised judicially having regard to all the relevant considerations. One such consideration is the general rule in constitutional litigation that an unsuccessful litigant ought not to be ordered to pay costs. The rationale for this rule is that an award of costs might have a chilling effect on the litigants who might wish to vindicate their constitutional rights. But this is not an inflexible rule. There may be circumstances that justify departure from this rule such as where the litigation is frivolous or vexatious. There may be conduct on the part of the litigant that deserves censure by the Court which may influence the Court to order an unsuccessful litigant to pay costs. The ultimate goal is to do that which is just having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case.[1]

In cases which do not amount to some form of abuse of process, the Constitutional Court has frequently recognised that caution should be exercised 'in awarding costs against litigants who seek to enforce their constitutional right against the state, particularly where the constitutionality of the statutory provision is attacked, lest such orders have an unduly inhibiting or 'chilling effect' on other potential litigants in this category'.[2] In litigation between private parties, the Constitutional Court has, on occasion, followed the conventional rule that costs follow the result.[3] And when it comes to the Constitutional Court's review jurisdiction concerning the duties of a taxing master in relation to a bill of costs, it has held that no difference in principle exists between the role of the Constitutional Court and the role of the Supreme Court of Appeal.[4]

3.7 THE DUTIES OF THE STATE IN CONSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION

(a) The General Ethical Duty

The Final Constitution imposes a separate and distinct burden on the state in the conduct of constitutional litigation that is not placed on other constitutional litigants. That duty is best explained by Justice Sachs, writing separately in Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others:

[1] Affordable Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health & Others 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC).

[2] Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC) at para 30.

[3] See, eg, Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 103; Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 46.

[4] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Gauteng Lions Rugby Union & Another 2002 (2) SA 64 (CC), 2002 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 10–12.

> [T]he Constitution requires candour on the part of government. What is involved is not simply a matter of showing courtesy to the public and to the courts, desirable though that always is. It is a question of maintaining respect for the constitutional injunction that our democratic government be accountable, responsive and open. Furthermore, it is consistent with ensuring that the courts can function effectively, as s 165(4) of the Constitution requires. . . . The notion that 'government knows best, end of enquiry', might have satisfied Justice Stratford CJ in the pre-democratic era. It is no longer compatible with democratic government based on the rule of law as envisaged by our Constitution. . . . [F]ar from the foundational values of the rule of law and of accountable government existing in discreet categories, they overlap and reinforce each other. Openness of government promotes both the rationality that the rule of law requires, and the accountability that multi-party democracy demands. In our constitutional order, the legitimacy of laws made by Parliament comes not from awe, but from openness. [1]

As Justice Sachs makes clear, the general 'ethical' duty on the state flows directly from a number of fundamental provisions in the Final Constitution. First, the rule of law requires that all laws and government action are rational.[2] To establish rationality, the government must provide courts with all available and germane information so that the courts deliver decisions based on a full and proper understanding of the facts. Second, FC s 165(4) requires '[o]rgans of state … to assist and protect the courts.'[3] This obligation must impose a duty on the state to act in such a manner when it is involved in litigation. Third, FC s 195(1) requires that all public administration be accountable[4] and transparent.[5] Finally, the general ethical duty gives effect to the transformative ideals of the Final Constitution — these ideals at a minimum, require a transition from a 'culture of authority' to a 'culture of justification'.[6]

[1] 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC)('Matatiele I') at paras 107, 109 and 110.

[2] FC s 1*(c)* entrenches 'the rule of law' as a founding value of the Final Constitution. For more on the rule of law, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2003) Chapter 11. For more on the status and the content of the Final Constitution's founding values, see C Roederer 'Founding Values' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.

[3] FC s 165(4) reads in full: 'Organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the courts to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.'

[4] FC s 195(1)(f).

[5] FC s 195(1)(g). For more on FC s 195, see A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

[6] This 'celebrated formulation' is drawn from Ettienne Mureinik's article 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 32. See also K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146; P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch LR 351. The Constitutional Court has endorsed this principle in S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 156 (Ackermann J); Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25; Ferreira v Levin NO &Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 51 (Ackermann J); Matatiele I (supra) at para 100 (Sachs J).

The main duty on the State is to provide courts with all the information they need to make their decisions. This duty is not limited to the specific stages in constitutional litigation where the State often bears a specific evidentiary burden. It extends to all aspects of constitutional litigation.[1] The duty is not, nor can it be, limited only to the provision of information for the State to win its case. The duty covers all information that would assist a court in rendering its decision. The duty to adduce information arises from the time the litigation begins: it is not necessary for a court to request information from the State.[2]

Because the ethical duty on the State does not flow from its position as a litigant, but from obligations imposed by the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court has emphasised that the State must provide relevant information even if the State does not oppose the specific challenge at issue. In Khosa, the Court wrote:

> Even in those cases where the view is taken that there is nothing to be said in support of challenged legislation, a court, in order to exercise the due care required of it when dealing with such matters, may well require the assistance of counsel. In this case it should have been apparent to the [government] respondents that the declaration of invalidity of the impugned legislation could have significant budgetary and administrative implications for the State. If the necessary evidence is not placed before the courts dealing with such matters their ability to perform their constitutional mandate will be hampered and the constitutional scheme itself put at risk. It is government's duty to ensure that the relevant evidence is placed before the Court.[3]

Apart from providing relevant material, the State's attorney is required to act professionally. Of course, all attorneys bear such a duty, but the duty on the State's attorney flows not only from her duty as a professional, but from the constitutional responsibilities she bears when she represents the State. As the [1] It is arguable that the duty should extend also to non-constitutional matters. Indeed, considering the constitutional sources of the duty, it makes little sense to distinguish between matters concerning the Final Constitution and those that do not. However, that question goes beyond the boundaries of this chapter.

[2] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC); 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 18 ('The respondents had the opportunity to place evidence before the High Court and cannot be heard to say that it was the duty of the High Court to call for evidence before declaring the impugned legislation unconstitutional. It was the respondents who were to be blamed for the failure to place relevant information and argument before the High Court which explained the reasons for the disputed provisions and the purpose they were intended to serve.')

[3] Ibid at para 19. See also Gory v Kolver NO & Others (Starke & Others Intervening) 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 64 (The Minister had not opposed the constitutional challenge in the High Court, but had argued for a retrospective order. In the Constitutional Court the Minister did not oppose confirmation at all, despite the retrospective order being granted by the High Court. Van Heerden AJ commented in this regard as follows: 'To my mind, something more substantive is required when a state official is called upon to deal with the constitutionality of a statutory provision falling under his or her administration and with the formulation of an appropriate remedy in the event that such provision is held to be constitutionally invalid is under consideration by a court.')

Constitutional Court noted in South African Liquor Traders: 'Given the government's responsibility to assist the work of courts, a lapse … in the State Attorney's office gives cause for grave concern.'[1] In two recent hearings, several justices of the Constitutional Court have expressed particular displeasure and concern over the conduct of the State Attorney.[2]

A number of consequences can follow a failure by the State to fulfil its ethical duty. Firstly, it can be mulcted in costs, not only for wasted time, but also in the main application.[3] Secondly, it may justify a postponement of the application. While courts, especially the Constitutional Court, are reluctant to grant postponements,[4] the public importance of most constitutional cases is a powerful justification for postponing a case rather than deciding it without sufficient input from the State.[5] Finally, a failure to present enough evidence will 'tip the scales'

[1] See South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC) at para 52 (The State Attorney had failed to inform the MEC of a constitutional challenge to provincial legislation and had failed to appear in court despite a request by the Registrar. O'Regan J expressed the court's displeasure in the following terms: 'The result is both unfortunate and serious. It is unfortunate because the effect in this case was to give the impression that the MEC, a senior member of the executive in provincial government, was not interested in assisting this court in resolving important constitutional litigation. That impression has now been rectified. It is serious because as a matter of common practice it is the State Attorney who is briefed by the government when it is involved in litigation. Given the government's responsibility to assist the work of courts, a lapse of this sort in the State Attorney's office gives cause for grave concern.')

[2] Nyathi v MEC for Health: Gauteng & Others CCT 19/07 (Heard on 30 August 2007, judgment reserved)(The State Attorney again failed to inform the MEC or the Minister of Justice of a constitutional challenge to the State Liability Act 20 of 1957. The court issued directions requiring the State Attorney to explain the failure. At the hearing several justices expressed dismay at the apparent lack of competence and capacity of the State Attorney. Some even suggested the possibility of a structural interdict so that the court could supervise the Office of the State Attorney and improve its performance.); Shilubana v Nwamitwa CCT 03/07 (Heard on 4 September 2007, judgment reserved)(The State Attorney failed to properly paginate the record or to respond to a request for power of attorney from the respondents. The court was openly hostile to the conduct of the State Attorney and only did not strike the matter from the roll because of its importance.)

[3] See, for example, Liquor Traders (supra) at para 54 (The court ordered costs de bonis propriis against the State Attorney for the negligent way it conducted the case). For more on costs in constitutional litigation, see A Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 6.

[4] The general principles relating to postponements in constitutional matters have been set out by the Constitutional Court in a number of judgments. See Shilubana v Nwamitwa [2007] ZACC 14 (8 June 2007); National Police Service Union & Others v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 2000 (4) SA 1110 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 775 (CC); Lekolwane & Another v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2007 (3) BCLR 280 (CC).

[5] Khosa (supra) at paras 24–5 ('This Court required further information to enable it to discharge its constitutional duty, and it was in the interests of justice that such information be placed before it. In the circumstances, the most appropriate way of dealing with the situation was to require the respondents to place the necessary information before this Court expeditiously. For these reasons, the matter was postponed'); Liquor Traders (supra) at para 20 (There was no appearance for the State at the hearing, despite numerous requests from the Court, because of a failure on the part of the State Attorney. The Court ordered a postponement, presumably because it did not want to hear the matter without input form the state, although the judgment does not specify the reason); Shilubana v Nwamitwa CCT 03/07 (Order of 4 September 2007)(Case was postponed because of a failure by the State to properly paginate the record or to respond to a request for a power of attorney.)

against the State.[1]

(b) Specific Evidentiary Burdens

(i) Limitations[2]

The burden of proof to justify an infringement of rights under FC s 36 will fall on the party relying on FC s 36.[3] The most obvious justification for placing this burden on the party relying upon the law in question, most often the State, is that the State will have unique access to the type of information that would be relevant to a justification analysis. That information will generally consist of statistical or other information that demonstrates: (a) the important purpose served by the law and the adverse consequences that may flow if the law is set aside;[4] or (b) the administrative or financial impact that a change in the law will have on the state.[5]

However, even if government fails to put up a case for justification, a court is still obliged to determine whether the impugned legislation can be justified.[6] However, as Somyalo AJ noted in Moise: 'The absence of evidence or argument in support of the limitation has a profound bearing on the weighing up exercise,

[1] See Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae*)*('Moise') 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 19 ('If the government wishes to defend the particular enactment, it then has the opportunity — indeed an obligation — to do so. The obligation includes not only the submission of legal argument but the placing before Court of the requisite factual material and policy considerations. Therefore, although the burden of justification under s 36 is no ordinary onus, failure by government to submit such data and argument may in appropriate cases tip the scales against it and result in the invalidation of the challenged enactment.')

[2] See, generally, S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) §34.6 – from which this section is primarily drawn.

[3] See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 102 ('It is for the legislature, or the party relying on the legislation, to establish this justification, and not for the party challenging it to show that it was not justified.')

[4] Ibid at paras 116 and 118 (The Attorney-General argued that the death penalty served as a deterrent and pointed to the increase in crime rates since a moratorium had been placed on implementing the death penalty); De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC), 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC) at paras 64–5 (The State led evidence about the link between child pornography and child abuse and the serious effects of child abuse on children); S v Jordan & Others 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC) at para 86 (State argued that the criminalisation of prostitution was justified by leading evidence that prostitution was linked to human trafficking, drug abuse, violent crime, sexually transmitted diseases and child prostitution).

[5] See, eg, Khosa at paras 60-61 (State led evidence of the financial burden of providing social assistance to permanent residents as well as the administrative difficulties in identifying who would qualify for a grant); Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at paras 133–4 (in finding that a prohibition on marijuana use by Rastafari was a justifiable limitation of the right to freedom of religion, the majority of the court relied on evidence presented by the state of the financial and administrative difficulties of establishing and policing an exemption in the form of a permit system).

[6] See Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 31; Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at para 20; J v Director-General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 15.

the more so as the parties who chose to remain silent have special knowledge of provincial and local government administration.'[1] Somyalo AJ then held that a 'failure by government to submit such data and argument may, in appropriate cases, tip the scales against it.'[2]

The State should also bear an evidentiary burden with respect to certain, if not all, internal limitations clauses.[3] Although the text offers no express guidance, and the courts have not yet provided an answer, Liebenberg, Woolman and Botha have all argued that there should be a burden shift in socio-economic rights cases. They contend that, if a litigant establishes a prima facie case of unreasonableness, the burden of justification should shift to the state to prove that it lacks available resources. 'It would be unreasonable,' as Liebenberg notes, 'to expect ordinary litigants to identify and to quantify the resources available to the State for the realisation of particular socio-economic rights.'[4]

(ii) Remedies[5]

Orders that declare legislation invalid ordinarily go into effect immediately and apply retrospectively to the date the Final Constitution came into force.[6] Such orders can, accordingly, seriously affect the operation of government and the conduct of private affairs. They can undo settled arrangements upon which many have reasonably relied. And they can leaving gaping lacuna in the law. The Final Constitution therefore makes specific provision for limiting the effect of declarations of invalidity by both suspending and limiting the retrospective effect of orders of invalidity.[7] However, the Constitutional Court has emphasised

[1] Moise (supra) at para 20. See also Phillips (supra) at para 20 (Yacoob J emphasised that the lack of evidence will 'tip the scales' only in 'appropriate cases'.)

[2] Moise (supra) at para 19.

[3] For more on internal modifiers and internal limitations, and why the State bears the burden of justification for internal limitations (but not internal modifiers), see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34

[4] S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2003) at 33–53—33–54.

[5] For more on constitutional remedies in general, and the operation of orders of invalidity and the circumstances and manner in which they can be limited in particular, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008).

[6] See Women's Legal Centre, Ex parte: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at paras 13-15.

[7] FC s 172(1)(b) reads:

> When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court —
>
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including —
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
>
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.

that it will only grant such an order if an evidentiary basis exists for doing so.[1] That evidence should reflect > the effect of the order … on the successful litigant and on those prospective litigants in positions similar to that of the former, as well as the effect on the administration of justice or State machinery.[2]

The burden to supply that evidence will ordinarily rest on the State, both because it will be the only party in possession of the relevant information and because it will most often be the party seeking a limitation of the order.

The importance of presenting such evidence was demonstrated in Chief Lesapo. The Constitutional Court refused to grant a suspension order – despite the fact that the government had expressed grave concern about the effect of an immediate order – because the government had not presented any evidence to justify its fears.[3] However, specific evidence will not always be necessary. Other concerns may motivate granting such an order.[4] In addition, the detrimental effects might be clear to all concerned from the existing record or the nature of the provision in question.

The State bears an even stricter evidential burden when it seeks an extension of a suspension order. In such cases, the state must demonstrate that it is 'just and equitable' to extend the suspension. A court, when deciding to grant such an extension, will consider the following factors:

[1] S v Mello 1998 (3) SA 712) (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 908 (CC) at para 11. See also Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC)('Chief Lesapo') at para 33; S v Ntsele 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC) at para 13; S v Julies 1996 (4) SA 313 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 899 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 108 (CC) at para 4; S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC) at para 30; S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 748 (CC) at para 30.

[2] Chief Lesapo (supra) at para 33. See also S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC) at para 27 (The Ntuli Court set aside provisions requiring a judge's certificate before an appeal from the magistrates' court, but suspended the order because of the impact it would have on the administration of justice.)

[3] Chief Lesapo (supra) at para 33.

[4] For example, suspension is often justified on the basis that the matter has many possible solutions and is best left to the legislature to decide. See, eg, Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at paras 50–51 (Court suspended an order invalidating a provision which did not require the consent of fathers of children born-out-of-wedlock for their adoption because of the many possible ways the legislature could address the problem); Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)(The unconstitutionality of limiting marriage to heterosexual couples was suspended to allow the legislature to deal with it, both because there were a number of possibilities and because any change was more likely to be accepted if it came from the legislature.) Courts often limit retrospectivity because of the obvious injustice that will flow from retrospective application, without the need for evidence of any specific injustices. See, eg, Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security v Walters 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 74 (The Court invalidated provisions permitting policemen to use lethal force in effecting an arrest, but limited the retrospective effect because it would criminalize acts performed in good faith); S v Masiya [2007] ZACC 9 (10 May 2007)(After extending the definition of rape to include anal penetration of a female, the court refused to apply the decision retrospectively because it would violate the principle of legality.)

> the sufficiency of the explanation for failure to comply with the original period of suspension; the potentiality of prejudice being sustained if the period of suspension were extended or not extended; the prospects of complying with the deadline; the need to bring litigation to finality; and the need to promote the constitutional project and prevent chaos.[1]

It is not possible to extend a suspension order if the original suspension period has already lapsed.[2]

(c) Constitutional duty of the state in the enforcement of court orders

Part of the general ethical duty imposed on the state flows from FC s 165(4):

> Organs of state, through legislative and other means, must assist and protect the courts to ensure independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.

This general obligation, together with the rule of law and the right of access to courts, implies a duty on the state, in certain circumstances, to take positive action to ensure compliance with court orders or the maintenance of the social fabric.

In President of RSA & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd & Others, the Constitutional Court was faced with a situation where tens of thousands of people had taken residence on a private party's land.[3] The scale of the problem prevented the enforcement of an ordinary eviction order. Langa ACJ (as he then was) found that FC s 34 imposed an obligation on the state to find a solution to the problem:

> The obligation on the State goes further than the mere provision of the mechanisms and institutions referred to above. It is also obliged to take reasonable steps, where possible, to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur in the wake of the execution of court orders, thus undermining the rule of law. The precise nature of the State's obligation in any particular case and in respect of any particular right will depend on what is reasonable, regard being had to the nature of the right or interest that is at risk, as well as on the circumstances of each case.[4]

The obligation to take steps to ensure compliance with court orders does not, it seems, extend to a failure to comply with court orders against foreign states. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Rootman v President of the Republic of South Africa rejected an application to force the government to take steps to force the Democratic Republic of Congo to comply with an existing High Court order in the applicants favour.[5] Lewis JA relied on the principle established in Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa that the Final Constitution does not apply

[1] Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2006 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 47.

[2] See Ex Parte Minister of Social Development 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC); Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC).

[3] 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 43.

[5] [2006] SCA 80 (RSA)('Rootman').

outside South Africa and therefore cannot require the DRC to comply with South African court orders.[1]

Finally, the State has a duty to comply with court orders against the State. The Transvaal High Court, in Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for Health, Gauteng & Another, found that s 3(1) of the State Liability Act violated FC ss 34 and 165(5)[2] because it prohibited attachment 'or like processes' in enforcing a court order against the State.[3] This decision implies that the State has a constitutional duty to ensure that court orders can be effectively enforced.

[1] Rootman (supra) at para 12. For a compelling critique of Kaunda, and thus its application in Rootman, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) § 31.6. Even if the Final Constitution does not apply outside South Africa, Mr Rootman and the South African government are 'in' South Africa. It is therefore possible to require the State to take action to enforce the court order without invoking extra-territorial application of the Final Constitution (say, by freezing the assets of the foreign state located in South Africa.). Lewis JA accepted that the State could take certain diplomatic steps (eg writing a letter or making a telephone call). However, she concluded that these steps would likely be ineffective and therefore should not be granted. However, while the effect of diplomatic negotiations cannot be foreseen, the uncertainty of securing a positive response should hardly be grounds for releasing the government from taking any steps at all. For an alternative reading of Kaunda, see J Klaaren 'Citizenship' in S Woolman, J Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS December 2007) Chapter 60.

[2] FC s 165(5) reads: 'An order issued by a court binds all persons to whom and all organs of state to which it applies.'

[3] [2007] ZAGPHC 16 (30 March 2007). The matter was then heard as part of confirmation proceedings in the Constitutional Court. CCT 19/07 (30 August 2007). At the time of writing, judgment had not yet been delivered.

4 Jurisdiction

Sebastian Seedorf

1. Introduction 4–2
2. The Conceptual Framework for Constitutional Jurisdiction in South Africa 4–5
   (a) Jurisdiction and the institutional function of the Constitutional Court 4–5
   (b) The merits of a case and the dividing line between jurisdiction and access to the Constitutional Court 4–10
3. Jurisdiction 4–17
   (a) The threshold requirement of finding a 'constitutional matter'. 4–17
      (i) Just labels: 'constitutional matter', 'constitutional issue', 'constitutional question'. 4–18
      (ii) The Constitutional Court has not embraced any concept of 'constitutional matter'. 4–18
      (iii) The Fraser list of case types in which the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction 4–20
   (b) FC s 167(4): Constitutional matters falling under the Court's exclusive jurisdiction 4–22
      (i) Disputes between organs of state, FC s 167(4)(a) . . . 4–27
      (ii) Constitutionality of Bills, FC s 167(4)(b). 4–33
         (aa) Initiation of judicial review of a Bill 4–33
         (bb) Scope of judicial review of a Bill 4–37
      (iii) Abstract review of Acts of Parliament and provincial Acts, FC s 167(4)(c) 4–40
      (iv) Amendments to the Constitution, FC s 167(4)(d) . . . 4–44
      (v) Constitutional obligations of Parliament or the President, FC s 167(4)(e). 4–45
      (vi) Certification of a provincial Constitution, FC s 167(4)(f) 4–48
      (vii) Interim relief in matters of exclusive jurisdiction 4–49

(c) Constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction explicitly mentioned in the Constitution 4–52
(i) Confirmation of orders of statutory invalidity, FC s 167(5) 4–53
(ii) Interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution, FC s 167(7) 4–55
(d) Other constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction . . . 4–60
(i) Interpretation of legislation and development of the common law or customary law in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, FC s 39(2) 4–60
(aa) Cases involving the common law. 4–62
(bb) Cases involving legislation 4–66
(ii) Exercise of public power and administrative action . . 4–68
(iii) Interpretation and application of legislation giving effect to the Final Constitution 4–77
(iv) Fair procedure in the judicial system 4–82
(e) Issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters . 4–85
(f) The Constitutional Court's power to make the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter, FC s 167(3)(c) 4–88
(g) The Constitutional Court's findings on what is not a 'constitutional matter' 4–89
(i) Factual findings by lower courts 4–89
(ii) Incorrect application of the law. 4–92
(h) An alternative conception of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction' 4–101
(i) Consequences of the Constitutional Court's approach to its jurisdiction 4–101
(aa) It has become impossible to determine when the Constitutional Court will decline jurisdiction' 4–102
(bb) Every case notionally raises a constitutional matter' 4–106
(cc) The transformative function of the Constitutional Court is impaired' 4–106
(ii) A functional approach to jurisdiction' 4–109
(aa) Limits of a substantive, and benefits of a functional, understanding of 'constitutional matter' 4–109

(bb) Constitutional leeways as limits to constitutional jurisdiction. 4–118
(cc) FC 167(7) as a basis for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction 4–122
(dd) Consequences of the functionalist approach for some Constitutional Court judgments 4–124
4. Access to the Constitutional Court 4–125
5. The Constitutional Court as a Single Apex Court 4–128

167 Constitutional Court

(1) The Constitutional Court consists of the Chief Justice of South Africa, the Deputy Chief Justice and nine other judges.

(2) A matter before the Constitutional Court must be heard by at least eight judges.

(3) The Constitutional Court —

(a) is the highest court in all constitutional matters;

(b) may decide only constitutional matters, and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters; and

(c) makes the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.

(4) Only the constitutional Court may —

(a) decide disputes between organs of state in the national or provincial sphere concerning the constitutional status, powers or functions of any of those organs of state;

(b) decide on the constitutionality of any parliamentary or provincial Bill, but may do so only in the circumstances anticipated in section 79 or 121;

(c) decide applications envisaged in section 80 or 122;

(d) decide on the constitutionality of any amendment to the Constitution;

(e) decide that Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation; or

(f) certify a provincial constitution in terms of section 144.

(5) The Constitutional Court makes the final decision whether an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President is constitutional, and must confirm any order of invalidity made by the Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court, or a court of similar status, before that order has any force.

(6) National legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court —

(a) to bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court; or

(b) to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court.

(7) A constitutional matter includes any issue involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution.

172 Powers of courts in constitutional matters

(1) When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court —

(a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and

(b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including —

(i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and

(ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.

(2)(a) The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court.

(b) A court which makes an order of constitutional invalidity may grant a temporary interdict or other temporary relief to a party, or may adjourn the proceedings, pending a decision of the Constitutional Court on the validity of that Act or conduct.

(c) National legislation must provide for the referral of an order of constitutional invalidity to the Constitutional Court.

(d) Any person or organ of state with a sufficient interest may appeal, or apply, directly to the Constitutional Court to confirm or vary an order of constitutional invalidity by a court in terms of this subsection.

1 Introduction

The issue of jurisdiction is obviously of importance to the person initiating litigation: to which court should she address her claim? But jurisdiction is equally important for the court itself since it forms the basis for the court's power to grant or to refuse the relief sought. If a court declines jurisdiction, then the application will be dismissed without reaching the merits of the case — and without the court granting the relief sought, even if the applicant would otherwise have been entitled to it. To use what is still a relevant definition in South African law: jurisdiction means 'the power vested in a court by law to adjudicate upon, determine and dispose of a matter'.[1]

The framework for the jurisdiction of courts in South Africa is set out in Chapter 8 of the Final Constitution,[2] more specifically, in FC ss 167, 168, 169, 170 and 172. According to these provisions, jurisdiction in constitutional matters is shared between the Constitutional Court and other courts, such as the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts. The crucial provision is FC s 167(3)(b), which provides that the Constitutional Court 'may decide only constitutional matters, and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'. This provision links the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction to the term 'constitutional matter', which in turn clearly indicates that the Constitutional Court was conceived as a court of limited rather than plenary jurisdiction.

If the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction had covered every possible matter, then a chapter on the jurisdiction of the Court would not have had much relevance. The inclusion of the term 'constitutional matter', however, means that prospective applicants to the Constitutional Court need to determine whether their case falls within the Court's jurisdiction and accordingly whether the Court will hear the case at all. A proper appreciation for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is therefore the first criterion of success in any matter brought to the Court. Whether seeking leave to appeal or approaching the Court directly, parties are required, in addition to establishing the substantive merits of their case, to establish its constitutional dimension.[3] It is for this reason that this chapter is the first in a series of chapters in this work dealing with different aspects of constitutional litigation.

Once the Constitutional Court assumes jurisdiction, the applicant faces the possibility that the Constitutional Court may not hear the matter because it is not in the interests of justice for it to do so. Only if this question is answered in

* I would like to thank Theunis Roux and Michael Bishop for their insightful comments on and supportive criticisms of previous drafts of this chapter, and participants in a seminar at the South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional, Public, Human Rights and International Law (SAIFAC), where an earlier draft of the chapter was presented, for their helpful suggestions.

[1] Ewing McDonald & Co Ltd v M&M Products 1991 (1) SA 252, 256G (A).

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (hereafter 'the Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[3] See Carole Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509, 519.

the affirmative will the Court consider whether the other procedural preconditions for deciding the case have been met.[1] The Court may thereafter deal with questions of standing, ripeness and mootness,[2] and the possible participation of amici curiae.[3]

When the Constitutional Court was established by the Interim Constitution of 1993[4] the intention was not to replace the Appellate Division (as the Supreme Court of Appeal was then known), but to supplement it with a specialized new institution whose powers would be limited to adjudicating issues arising under the Final Constitution. The reason for this was political: it was felt that judges who had been appointed under apartheid should not be the custodians of the new democracy. The Appellate Division, and indeed the judiciary generally, were regarded as indelibly tainted by apartheid, and thus not well suited to hear cases brought under the new Constitution.[5] On the other hand, the Appellate Division and the Constitutional Court were placed on the same hierarchical level, and neither court could hear appeals from the other. The Final Constitution changed this arrangement, giving to the other courts, including the Supreme Court of Appeal, jurisdiction in constitutional matters, while leaving the final word to the Constitutional Court.

To clarify the different roles that the High Courts, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court would play, the framers of both the Interim and the Final Constitutions decided not to make the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court discretionary, but to limit it in a substantial way. In the Interim Constitution this was achieved through a provision that the Constitutional Court should have jurisdiction in the Republic as the court of final instance over all matters relating to the 'interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of this Constitution' (IC s 98(2)). In the Final Constitution, this limitation is contained in FC s 167(3)(b), which provides that the Constitutional Court may decide only 'constitutional matters'.

[1] See Kate Hofmeyer 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5.

[2] See Cheryl Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7.

[3] See Geoff Budlender 'Amicus Curiae' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993 (Interim Constitution).

[5] See Johann van der Westhuizen 'The Protection of Human Rights and a Constitutional Court for South Africa: Some Questions and Ideas, with Reference to the German Experience' (1991) 24 De Jure 1, 5-6; Patric Mzolisi Mtshaulana 'The History and Role of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' in Penelope Andrews & Stephen Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions (2001) 535; Lewis (supra) at 10; Arthur Chaskalson 'Constitutional Courts and Supreme Courts — A Comparative Analysis with Particular Reference to the South African Experience' in Ingolf Pernice, Juliane Kokott & Cheryl Saunders (eds) The Future of the European Judicial System in a Comparative Perspective (2006) 97, 100.

This jurisdictional limitation distinguishes the South African Constitutional Court from supreme courts in most other countries with a common-law tradition, where court proceedings typically progress to a single judicial body, irrespective of whether the country has a supreme-law Constitution with a fully fledged Bill of Rights (like the USA, Canada, India or Ireland), a supreme-law constitution with some (express or implied) constitutional rights (like Australia), or a Bill of Rights that gives the courts the power to declare legislation incompatible with a particular right or rights, but not the power to strike down legislation (like New Zealand or the UK). Instead, the prototype for a separate court with limited constitutional jurisdiction was the German Federal Constitutional Court,[1] whose influence on the South African model may be attributed to these two countries' shared history of totalitarianism, and the concomitant desire to make a clean break with the past.[2]

A decision to establish a specialist constitutional court is invariably contested. During the drafting of the 1949 German Constitution, the choice between a separate Constitutional Court and a single Supreme Court was very controversial.[3] Eventually, the proposal for a separate Constitutional Court carried the day, at least in part because it was felt that the quality of the ordinary courts' jurisprudence, based as it was on 'pure law' adjudication, would be compromised if they became involved in the more 'political' cases that a Constitutional Court would have to decide.[4] In South Africa, too, the Law Commission and the judiciary

[1] The idea of such a separate court is not a German invention, but was first used in Austria in 1920. Hans Kelsen, who later became internationally famous for his writings in international law and legal theory, was very influential in the establishment of the specialized Austrian Constitutional Court. For a historic overview and international comparison, see Georg Schmitz 'The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Austria 1918-1920' (2003) 16 Ratio Juris 240; Stanley L Paulson 'Constitutional Review in the United States and Austria: Notes on the Beginnings' (2003) 16 Ratio Juris 223. After the end of the Second World War, other European countries with a civil law tradition have also set up separate Constitutional Courts, notably Austria (in reviving the earlier tradition) and Italy. Others followed after breaking away from authoritarian rule (Spain, 1978 and Portugal, 1982). More Constitutional Courts in Europe have been set up after the end of the Cold War in middle and eastern European states, such as Poland and Hungary. The latter drew heavily on the German experience. See Wojciech Sadurski Rights Before Courts: A Study of Constitutional Courts in Postcommunist States of Central and Eastern Europe (2005).

[2] On 'the Bundesverfassungsgerichtm' see Penuell Maduna 'Judicial Review and Protection of Human Rights Under a New Constitutional Order for South Africa' (1989) 21 Columbia Human Rights Law Review 73, 83; Marius Wiechers 'Regional Government in the New South Africa: The Role of Courts' (1991) 54 THRHR 618, 619-21; Johann van der Westhuizen 'The Protection of Human Rights and a Constitutional Court for South Africa: Some Questions and Ideas, with Reference to the German experience' (1991) 24 De Jure 1; Kader Asmal 'Constitutional Courts — a Comparative Survey' 1991 CILSA 315, 320; Johan Kruger 'A Constitutional Court for South Africa' (1993) 6(1) Consultus 13, 17-18.

[3] The first drafting conference, the 'Herrenchiemsee Convent' (August 1948), could not reach agreement on this matter and left the decision 'explicitly' open. Eventually, the drafting body of the Grundgesetz, the so-called 'Parliamentary Council' (Parlamentarischer Rat), agreed in December 1948 to create a separate Constitutional Court.

[4] For documentation on the drafting history of the Grundgesetz, see (1951) 1 Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts (Neue Folge) 669-72; and for commentary on th drafting history, see Hans-Peter Schneider (ed) Das Grundgesetz — Dokumentation seiner Entstehung Vol 23/1 (1999). For an English account of the establishment of the German Federal Constitutional Court, see Martin Borowski 'The Beginnings of Germany's Federal Constitutional Court' (2003) 16 Ratio Juris 155.

expressed deep scepticism about the introduction of a separate Constitutional Court,[1] but the desire for a new institutional beginning proved to be too strong.

The decision to create a new Constitutional Court inevitably entails a decision about which matters the new court should be able to hear. The fundamental policy choice here is between enumerating a list of the disputes the Constitutional Court may decide and introducing an umbrella term to encompass all possible disputes. Obviously, South Africa (at least in the Final Constitution) opted for the latter choice: the Constitutional Court may decide only 'constitutional matters'.[2] As long as the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is defined through that phrase, there is a need to distinguish between constitutional and non-constitutional matters. This chapter will therefore focus on the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in terms of that phrase and how it has sought to define its jurisdiction in relation to it.

2 The Conceptual Framework for Constitutional Jurisdiction in South Africa

Before analyzing the constitutional provisions on jurisdiction and how the Constitutional Court has applied and interpreted them, it is useful briefly to set out how the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court relates to its overall functioning, and how it connects to related concepts such as the standard of review the Court applies, the merits of the case and any access enquiry.

(a) Jurisdiction and the institutional function of the Constitutional Court

The jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court reflects, as it should, the function that the Court performs under the Final Constitution.

The South African Constitutional Court is a court with all-encompassing, procedural and substantive review powers with regard to all law and conduct, including the conduct of all branches of government and (to a certain extent) of natural

[1] South African Law Commission Project 58: Group and Human Rights — Working Paper 25 (1989) 445. Cf Michael McGregor Corbett, Memorandum Submitted on Behalf of the Judiciary of South Africa on the Chapter on the Administration of Justice in the Draft Interim Constitution, to the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights of the Multi-Party Negotiation Process, 3rd September 1993. See also South African Law Commission, Project 77 — Report on Constitutional Models (1992) Vol III at paras 22.218–22.230 (A special 'constitutional chamber' of the Appellate Division could serve as the Constitutional Court.)

[2] The jurisdiction of most other Constitutional Courts seems to be defined by enumerating the types of disputes they are empowered to adjudicate. That is, for example, the situation in Spain (see art 161 of the Constitution of Spain (1978)), Poland (see art 188 of the Constitution of Poland (1997)) and Germany (see art 93 of the German Basic Law (1949)). In early drafts of the German Grundgesetz, it was suggested that the Federal Constitutional Court should have jurisdiction in 'constitutional disputes' between federal organs of state. This phrase was later abandoned, because it was seen to be too unspecified and, it was argued, would only require the Court to decide 'political questions'. This is why in the Grundgesetz today the disputes falling within the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court are each specified and not collated under a single heading. See Grundgesetz in 1 (1951) Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts (Neue Folge) 669-72 (On the drafting history).

and juristic persons as well. This description is, in a nutshell, the essence of constitutional review: the judicial control and limitation of public and (certain forms of) private power by reference to the supreme law. The status of the Constitutional Court is thus similar to the Supreme Courts of the USA and Canada, to almost every court that calls itself a 'Constitutional Court' worldwide, and to international courts such as the European Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Justice. Its comprehensive review powers distinguish the Constitutional Court of South Africa from the House of Lords in the UK, where Parliament is supreme and statutes may not be struck down for inconsistency with the Human Rights Act, and the Conseil Constitutionnel in France, which may only review statutes before they enter into force.

The institutional function of the Constitutional Court is reflected in FC ss 172(5) and 167(5). These provisions deal with the validity of presidential conduct and Acts of Parliament. The status of the Constitutional Court as an institution on an equal footing with the other branches of government is reflected in the provisions on exclusive jurisdiction in FC s 167(4). And the Constitutional Court's superior role with regard to other courts is provided for in its competence to determine whether a matter is a constitutional matter (or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter) in FC s 167(3)(c).

In addition to relying on these express provisions, the Constitutional Court has been careful to safeguard its review powers even where the constitutional text is silent. Thus, in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the Court made it clear that the Final Constitution sets the review standard for executive and administrative action,[1] and, in Carmichele, the Court showed that it would supervise other courts' interpretation and application of the ordinary law in terms of the Final Constitution.[2] These decisions, as argued below, have significant consequences for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is not determined only by the scope of its review powers, but also by the standard of review it applies. It is in this connection that the 'political question doctrine' becomes relevant, a term that in the United States has been used to describe a form of judicial restraint amounting to a refusal to assume jurisdiction in certain cases.[3]

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC).

[2] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[3] It is beyond the scope of this chapter to provide a comprehensive insight into the history and status of this doctrine. For leading contributions, see Louis Henkin 'Is There a 'Political Question' Doctrine?' (1976) 85 Yale LJ 597; Mark Tushnet 'Law and Prudence in the Law of Justiciability: The Transformation and Disappearance of the Political Question Doctrine' (2002) 80 N Car LR 1203. See also Sanele Sibanda & Sebastian Seedorf 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12 at § 12.3*(d)*(ii)(aa).

The Constitutional Court is first and foremost a court of law. It is incorporated in the court structure (FC s 166*(a)*) as the first-mentioned court in the judicial branch of government, underling its superior role. Of the Constitutional Court judges, at least four must at all times be persons who were judges at the time they were appointed to the Constitutional Court (FC s 174(5)). By means of this rule, the Final Constitution intends to ensure that not only legal, but also distinctively judicial experience is reflected in the Court's jurisprudence. Equally, from the emphasis placed on the status of the Constitutional Court as a court, it follows that the Constitutional Court may decide only legal disputes. It is not expected or empowered to decide political or moral disputes.

These principles have been outlined by the Constitutional Court on several occasions. In the First Certification Judgment,[1] the Court clarified its function:

> First and foremost it must be emphasised that the Court has a judicial and not a political mandate. Its function is clearly spelt out in [IC s 71(2)]: to certify whether all the provisions of the [draft text of the Final Constitution] comply with the [constitutional principles]. That is a judicial function, a legal exercise. Admittedly a constitution, by its very nature, deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power as also with the relationship between political entities and with the relationship between the state and persons. But this Court has no power, no mandate and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the [Constitutional Assembly] in drafting the [Final Constitution], save to the extent that such choices may be relevant either to compliance or non-compliance with the [constitutional principles]. Subject to that qualification, the wisdom or otherwise of any provision of the [Final Constitution] is not this Court's business.[2]

This finding was later confirmed in another context:

> This case is not about the merits or demerits of the provisions of the disputed legislation. That is a political question and is of no concern to this Court. What has to be decided is not whether the disputed provisions are appropriate or inappropriate, but whether they are constitutional or unconstitutional.[3]

This dictum emphasizes the distinction between a political and a judicial role, not with regard to the subject matter of a dispute, but with regard to the review standard — the normative yardstick that is and needs to be applied. Political expediency is irrelevant in the judicial decision-making process. Instead, the Court, in applying the Constitution as the sole review standard, determines the constitutional framework for political decision-making.

A distinction between the subject matter of a case and the applicable review standard is essential because constitutional law is inevitably about the social and political order of a country and its society. To expect a constitutional order to be

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC).

[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 27.

[3] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR (CC) at para 11.

pure and separate from political developments is an illusion, and to hope that a Constitutional Court will 'stay out of politics' is futile. In Germany, the Bundesverfassungsgericht, in 1952 (the first year of operation of the Court), published a memorandum on its status, in which it proclaimed its institutional independence from the Department of Justice.[1] In this memorandum, the Court defined its distinctive role with reference to its institutional function in the political process: it had to deal with 'political legal disputes' and 'political law', meaning disputes in which political decisions are the subject of judicial assessment, measured against existing legal norms.[2] In this way, the Bundesverfassungsgericht adopted the view that one cannot separate legal from political questions by reference to subject matter since questions of constitutional law are inherently political.

A similar view has been adopted by the South African Constitutional Court. In holding in Doctors for Life that the decision whether Parliament has fulfilled its obligation to facilitate public involvement in the legislative process is 'pre-eminently a "crucial political" question', it did not draw the conclusion that it was prevented from reviewing that question. Instead, it held that it would have exclusive jurisdiction in the matter.[3] The fact that a decision has political implications does not prevent the Court from making a decision, but only requires the Court to apply a legal standard in making the decision.[4] In other words, the Constitutional Court is not asked to make political decisions, it is asked to ensure that political decisions comply with the (at times limited) standards the Final Constitution sets.

The same is true for the role of Constitutional Court judges. Their decisions will in many cases have political implications. They imply value and moral judgements. The judges are not asked to ignore the political and moral consequences of their decisions — quite the opposite. The judges are required to base their decisions on the Final Constitution and make pronouncements on the Final Constitution's values and moral choices — not on values they may hold themselves.

[1] Die Stellung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts, Denkschrift des Bundesverfassungsgerichts vom 27. Juni 1952, in: 6 (1957) Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts (Neue Folge) 144-48.

[2] 'Die Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit hat es mit einer besonderen Art von Rechtsstreitigkeiten zu tun, nämlich den 'politischen' Rechtsstreitigkeiten. Unter politischen Rechtsstreitigkeiten sind dabei solche Rechtsstreitigkeiten zu verstehen, bei denen über politisches Recht gestritten wird und das Politische selbst an Hand der bestehenden Normen zum Gegenstand der richterlichen Beurteilung gemacht wird.' Ibid at 144-45.

[3] Doctors for Life International v The Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 21.

[4] From the Constitutional Court's decisions on socio-economic rights is it clear that the Court will not refrain from striking down government decisions just because they have a policy basis. Instead, the Court has made clear that it will test policy decisions of the executive against the Final Constitution. See Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC); Grootboom v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC).

The Constitutional Court is a court of law with a distinctive political function. That neither detracts from its status as a court, nor denies or downplays the political role it plays.

The Final Constitution stands as a symbol for the transformation of society from might to right. Against that background, the Constitutional Court has to place the 'right' — the constitutional imperatives and obligations — in the centre of its dispute-resolution processes. Might is a factor the Court has to take into account when it imposes different obligations on the parties: the state possesses its conceptually infinite resources and its monopoly on the legitimate use of force, while the individual litigant often has very limited resources and a much higher degree of vulnerability. The Court may also adopt different standards of review: these different standards allow parties greater latitude with regard to the constitutionality of their conduct. Such differences in the standard of review may, in effect, lead to greater 'might' in certain circumstances. But might as such is no basis for the Court's ruling; it can only be collateral to a holding based on a legal finding. A party (or even both parties to a dispute) may approach the Court to get an answer to the question of what it may do or may not do according to the law. And the Court is asked to give an answer only with regard to that legal yardstick. As long as the Court's answer is based on constitutional criteria, it fulfils its mandate as a court of law with special constitutional jurisdiction.

The second important institutional function of the Constitutional Court is to promote the transformative agenda of the Final Constitution. The Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution were adopted not as an embodiment of the social status quo, but with an almost revolutionary purpose: to provide a historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans.[1] This purpose distinguishes the South African Constitution from other constitutions:

> In some countries, the Constitution only formalizes, in a legal instrument, a historical consensus of values and aspirations evolved incrementally from a stable and unbroken past to accommodate the needs of the future. The South African Constitution is different: it retains from the past only what is defensible and represents a decisive break from, and a ringing rejection of, that part of the past which is disgracefully racist, authoritarian, insular, and repressive and a vigorous identification of and commitment to a democratic, universalistic, caring and aspirationally egalitarian ethos, expressly articulated in the Constitution. The contrast between the past which it repudiates and the future to which it seeks to commit the nation is stark and dramatic.[2]

[1] See the clause on National Unity and Reconciliation in the Interim Constitution.

[2] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 262 (per Mahomed J).

This purpose of the Final Constitution has a direct impact on the functioning of the Constitutional Court:

> The Constitutional Court occupies a special place in this new constitutional order. It was established as part of that order as a new court with no links to the past, to be the highest court in respect of all constitutional matters, and as such, the guardian of our Constitution.[1]

Thus, it was not only that old-order judges could not be relied upon to give effect to the fundamental rights enshrined in the new Interim Constitution. The new Constitutional Court was also entrusted with an active role in shaping the entire legal system and bringing it into line with the new Constitutions.

The Constitutional Court's transformative function has a jurisdictional dimension as well. It is against this backdrop that the Constitutional Court has been eager to take on a supervisory role with regard to the rest of the judiciary. The Court most often relies FC s 39(2) in discharging this function. But if the main focus of the Constitutional Court is to ensure that the law in general develops and is practised in line with the Final Constitution, then it follows that the Court should not be burdened with cases in which no constitutional guidance needs to be given. To be the guardian of the Final Constitution is in itself a formidable task. There is no need to engage the Court in litigation where the Final Constitution is not implicated and where there is thus nothing to guard. As I argue below, this is an important consideration when deciding what constitutes a constitutional matter.

(b) The merits of a case and the dividing line between jurisdiction and access to the Constitutional Court

In several judgments, the Constitutional Court has clearly distinguished between the 'threshold enquiry'[2] into its jurisdiction and the question of whether it is in the interests of justice for it to hear the case.[3] In Ingledew v The Financial Services Board, the Constitutional Court articulated this distinction in a way that came close to a checklist:[4] 'Leave to appeal will be granted if, firstly, the application raises a constitutional matter and secondly, it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal.'[5]

An even stricter distinction has to be made between issues of jurisdiction and the interests of justice, on the one hand, and the merits of the case, on the other. The enquiry into jurisdiction is exhausted once a court has established that it is the competent forum to deal with the matter — not when it decides that the

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 55.
[2] Fraser v ABSA Bank Limited 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at para 35.
[3] See National Education Health & Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC) ('NEHAWU') at paras 13, 25.
[4] 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC).
[5] Ibid at para 13.

claim has merit. Earlier findings in this regard see a distinction between jurisdiction and the merits of the case as a matter of practicality: to avoid lengthy discussions of the legal arguments when the claim may in any case fail on jurisdictional grounds.[1] Later, the Court adopted a more categorical approach. In Fredericks & Others v MEC for Education and Training, Eastern Cape & Others, O'Regan J, writing for a unanimous court, simply stated: 'Whether the applicants' claim has merit or not can have no bearing on whether their claim raises a constitutional matter.'[2] In Fraser v ABSA Bank Limited, the Court confirmed that '[t]he acknowledgement by this Court that an issue is a constitutional matter . . . does not have to result in a finding on the merits of the matter in favour of the applicant who raised it.'[3] In another case, Langa CJ held that it was 'axiomatic' that the substantive merits of a claim cannot determine whether a court has jurisdiction to hear it.[4]

However, this 'axiomatic' distinction has not been followed in every case. In at least two judgments, the Court held that there were doubts whether the case raised a constitutional matter, but nevertheless approached the matter as if a constitutional issue were involved, showing that the Court will at times simply assume jurisdiction to allow it to deal with the merits: '[W]e prefer not to express an opinion on the question whether this case raises a constitutional matter but will assume, without deciding, that the matter does raise a constitutional issue.'[5]

The Court does not only on occasion skip the first leg of its enquiry so that it is not barred from dealing with the merits. Sometimes, the distinction between jurisdiction, the interests of justice and the merits of a claim is somewhat blurred. In two of the very few cases thus far in which the Constitutional Court has explicitly declined jurisdiction — S v Boesak[6] and Phoebus Apollo Aviation v Minister of Safety and Security[7] — the Court engaged fairly extensively with the merits of the case before eventually coming to the conclusion that no constitutional matter was

[1] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC) (SARFU I) at para 21 ('The record and judgment [of the High Court] in this matter run to some thousands of pages and it is important that the question of the proper forum should be determined before the record and detailed arguments on the merits are prepared'.)

[2] 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 (CC) at para 11.

[3] 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at para 40; see also, Fredericks & Others v MEC for Education and Training, Eastern Cape & Another 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 (CC) at para 11 ('whether the applicants' claim has merit or not can have no bearing on whether their claim raises a constitutional matter'); Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC) at para 21 ('When determining whether an argument raises a constitutional issue, the Court is not strictly concerned with whether the argument will ultimately be successful'.)

[4] Langa CJ in a separate concurring judgment in Chirwa v Transnet Limited & Others 2008 (4) SA 367 (CC), 2008 (3) BCLR 251 (CC) at para 155.

[5] Van der Merwe & Another v Taylor NO & Others 2008 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2007 (11) BCLR 1167 (CC) at para 106. Also see Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Ltd. 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) at para 7.

[6] 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC).

[7] 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC).

raised.[1] In Boesak, the Court held that the right to remain silent in terms of FC s 35(1)(a) is not impaired when a trial court draws negative inferences from the fact that the accused fails to challenge evidence that is brought against him.[2] In so doing, the Court stated quite explicitly that 'the evaluation of the evidence by the Supreme Court of Appeal did not breach the applicant's constitutional right to silence'.[3] The Boesak Court may have had good arguments for that conclusion, but it cannot be denied that the statement touches on the substantive merits of the claim.

The difference between a court's examination of its jurisdiction and the merits is that the former involves the definition of the subject matter of the case — a delineation of the questions the court is asked to decide (whether of fact or law) — while the merits comprise the answers the court gives to those questions. In Boesak, the Constitutional Court answered the question whether the claimant's right to silence had been breached. It did so in the negative, but nevertheless as a result of a substantive analysis, not merely as an exercise in deciding whether it was competent to conduct such an analysis. If the Constitutional Court had wanted to stay within the jurisdictional stage of the enquiry it should have said that the questions the claimant raised did not involve a constitutional matter, not that the answers did not.

The Boesak Court went on to state that the applicant could not successfully challenge his conviction for theft on the basis that this violated his right not to be deprived of freedom without just cause (FC s 12(1)(a)) because such a conviction constitutes just cause for depriving a person of personal freedom.[4] Here again, while the Court delivered a (convincing) interpretation of the Final Constitution, this gloss on the text did not resolve a jurisdictional question. It went to the very heart of the dispute. At some stage, the Court seems to have lost track of what it was doing: although the Court dismissed all the complaints raised by the applicant on the basis that they were 'without merit', the conclusion it drew was that the applicant did not raise 'a constitutional matter … over which this Court has jurisdiction'.[5]

In Phoebus Apollo Aviation the Court's engagement with the merits was not as explicit as in Boesak. Here, the applicant had tried to hold the Minister concerned vicariously liable for the theft of money by three dishonest policemen, acting

[1] See Van Vuuren v S 2005 (7) BCLR 639 (CC)(Court declined jurisdiction by simply applying its holding in Boesak.) In several other cases, the Constitutional Court found that one or some of the issues raised are outside its jurisdiction. See Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Others 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC) at para 8; Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road, Berea Township & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC), 2008 (5) BCLR 475 (CC) at para 6 ('I would suggest that the standard for deciding whether or not to consider applications for leave to appeal should also apply when we are to decide whether to consider particular issues in an application for leave to appeal.')

[2] Boesak (supra) at paras 23-29.

[3] Ibid at para 29.

[4] Ibid at para 38.

[5] Ibid at paras 39-40.

under their assumed authority as police officers. The applicant asked the court to develop the common law in terms of FC s 39(2) and also invoked other sections of the Final Constitution in support of its case. The Court explicitly declined jurisdiction because the application of the common-law doctrine of vicarious liability had to be regarded as a merely factual matter, and because 'no convincing argument' had been advanced to establish why the common law should be developed so as to accommodate the claim.[1]

That may well have been so, but the Court's reasoning itself engages the merits of the case. The finding that the applicant's arguments were not convincing entails an assessment of these arguments in terms of the Constitution and therefore falls squarely within the Constitutional Court's constitutional mandate. The Court might — and indeed should — have assumed jurisdiction to decide the matter with reference to its responsibility to ensure that the development of the common law takes place in accordance with FC s 39(2), and thereafter found that both the doctrine and its application by the lower courts were in line with the Bill of Rights. For this reason I agree with Frank Michelman's comment elsewhere in this treatise that the Court's dismissal of the case for lack of jurisdiction was hardly an irresistible dictate of strict logic.[2]

It can be argued that the Constitutional Court decision to decline jurisdiction is equally confusing in a third case: Van der Walt v Metcash Trading Limited.[3] Here, the Court was faced with a litigant who lost his claim in the Supreme Court of Appeal even though, one day later, a different panel of the same court came to the opposite conclusion in a case identical to the first. Understandably, the losing litigant tried to rectify this seemingly unjust outcome by appealing to the Constitutional Court. The Court dismissed the application.

At no point in Metcash does the Court actually accept or refuse jurisdiction. Goldstone J, writing for the majority, holds that the question to be decided is whether the fact that the Supreme Court of Appeal came to different conclusions in two identical cases was 'unconstitutional'.[4] In answering this question, he interprets FC s 34 (access to courts) and FC s 9 (equality), and concludes that there is 'no merit in the reliance upon section 34 of the Constitution' and that 'section 9(1) of the Constitution has not been violated'.[5] This line of reasoning strongly suggests that the Court assumed jurisdiction and dismissed the case on its merits.

[1] Phoebus Apollo Aviation (supra) at para 6.

[2] Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11 at § 11.2*(b)(i)*.

[3] 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 11.

[5] Ibid at paras 14, 25, respectively.

Halfway through the judgment, however, Goldstone J, almost by way of parenthesis, states that the difference in outcome between the two cases does not raise a 'constitutional question'.[1] At another point, he states that decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal enjoy finality only in 'non-constitutional matters'.[2] But nowhere in the majority judgment does the Court explicitly reject jurisdiction because the application does not raise a constitutional matter in terms of FC s 167(3). Rather, it is in the minority judgements that it becomes clear that lack of jurisdiction was apparently the basis for the majority decision. Madala J thus dissents on the grounds that the majority judgment on the basis that '[t]he disparate orders of the SCA themselves raise the constitutional matter'.[3] He is also the only judge in the matter to sustain the conceptual distinction between jurisdiction and the merits of the case: 'It seems that this Court is duty-bound to enquire whether the disparate outcomes raise a constitutional matter. We must then decide whether this outcome is unconstitutional or not.'[4]

Madala J's careful observations about the need to distinguish between jurisdiction and constitutionality notwithstanding, the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from the decisions in Metcash, Boesak and Phoebus Apollo is that a case may sometimes simply be too weak on the merits to engage the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. At this point we need to return to the distinction between jurisdiction and the Court's consideration of whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. The Court's occasional engagement with the merits of a case as a means to determine its jurisdiction is similar to the approach it has developed in this latter context.

It is settled law that a claim's prospects of success are an important factor in the Court's determination of whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal.[5] The Court has used various criteria to assess this issue. It has said, for example, that an applicant would have to show that there are prospects that the Court would 'reverse or materially alter' the lower court's decision.[6] In criminal cases, the holding of the lower court must have been crucial for the conviction and not merely some point of law.[7] Assessing the prospects of success of a claim inevitably implies an assessment of whether the applicant potentially has a case. At the heart of the assessment, therefore, lies a more or less abstract engagement with the merits of the case.

[1] Metcash (supra) at para 14.
[2] Ibid at para 8.
[3] Ibid at para 63; also see Ngcobo J's statement at para 32 and Sachs J's reasoning at para 81.
[4] Ibid at para 72 (my emphasis).
[5] Boesak (supra) at para 12.
[6] Pennington & Another v S 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) at para 52, cited with approval in Boesak at para 12. The phrase 'reverse or materially alter the judgment' of the court a quo was also used in Rule 18(6)(a)(iii) of the 1998 Constitutional Court Rules, but is not part of the 2003 rules.
[7] S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC) at para 9.

In its early judgments, before the 1998 Constitutional Court Rules of Procedure came into force, the Court quite frankly admitted that the merits play a role in the assessment of a claim's prospects of success during the interests of justice enquiry. In Pennington & Another v S,[1] the Court (per Chaskalson CJ) held that '[the] procedure [of granting leave to appeal] requires a consideration of the merits of the appeal and is an exercise of the appellate jurisdiction vested in the Court'.[2] This consideration was justified, the Court stated, because:

> 'Leave to appeal' is . . . a requirement needed to 'protect' the process of this Court against abuse by appeals which have no merit, and it is in the 'interests of justice' that this requirement be imposed, for if appeals without merit were allowed against decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal, justice would be delayed.[3]

Although the Court has said that it will not apply a full-blown test of constitutionality during the interests of justice stage of its enquiry (but rather inquire whether an appeal is 'viable'[4]), the reasonable prospects of success test is still applied. In Pennington, Chaskalson CJ not only laid out rules for the general procedure of appeals. He also dismissed the appeal 'in the light of the argument on the merits'.[5]

The Court has continued to use this approach in more recent judgements, albeit in a more subtle way. It still sometimes dismisses applications for leave to appeal because they 'have no prospects of success on the merits'[6] and continues to state that, in determining the interests of justice, 'each case is considered on its own merits'.[7] More often however, the Court proceeds directly to an in-depth examination of the applicable constitutional provision(s) and ordinary law, and only at the very end concludes that — because of its findings of substance — the application for leave to appeal should be granted or dismissed.[8]

---

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC).

[2] Ibid at para 27.

[3] Ibid at para 26 (my emphasis). Against that background the court made the order that applications for leave to appeal will have to show prospects that the Constitutional Court 'will reverse or materially alter' the decision of the lower court.

[4] See Beyers v Elf Regters van die Gondwetlike Hof 2002 (6) SA 630 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1001 (CC) at para 11 ('Die betrokke hof loop nie 'n beslissing aangaande die deugde van die voorgenome appèl vooruit nie, maar kyk slegs of die appèl lewensvatbaar is. As daar maar net 'n redelike vooruitsig op sukses is, word verlof tot appèl toegestaan.')

[5] Pennington (supra) at paras 28-44.

[6] See Xinwa & Others v Volkswagen of South Africa (Pty) Ltd 2003 (4) SA 390 (CC), 2003 (6) BCLR 575 (CC) at para 17. In a similarly clear manner, the Constitutional Court rejected an application for leave to appeal in Concerned Land Claimants Organisation of PE v PE Land and Community Restoration Association & Others. 2007 (2) SA 531 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 111 (CC).

[7] See Union of Refugee Women & Others v Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others 2007 (4) SA 395 (CC), 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC) at para 21.

[8] See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC). Here Sachs J, writing for a unanimous Court, delivered a carefully balanced judgment on the constitutional relationship between FC s 25 (property rights) and FC s 26 (right to housing) and a City's duties towards informal settlers within the 'leave to appeal' enquiry. In President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd, the Court likewise discussed the merits and only afterwards reached the conclusion that leave to appeal should be granted. 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC).

A perfect illustration of this structure of analysis appears in Du Toit v Minister of Transport. In Du Toit, the applicant challenged the amount of compensation awarded by the Supreme Court of Appeal for the expropriation of a quantity of gravel from his farm.[1] Mokgoro J, writing for the majority, treated the decision whether leave to appeal should be granted as a 'preliminary question' and decided it according to fairly abstract criteria, such as the importance of the subject matter of the dispute and the need to create certainty in the application of the Expropriation Act.[2] Mokgoro J thus dealt with the granting of leave to appeal before engaging with the merits — and eventually rejected the claim. Langa ACJ, in a dissenting judgment in which three judges concurred, dismissed the application for leave to appeal on the grounds that it bore no prospects of success.[3]

The majority and minority in Du Toit therefore reached the same conclusion, i e that the compensation paid for the expropriation of the gravel was just and equitable. But the way in which the minority judgment phrased this finding came close to a holding that the question whether a constitutional right had been violated was crucial to the interests of justice test and not only to the later enquiry into the merits:

> Given that it is our conclusion that the compensation awarded was not inconsistent with the Constitution, the applicant had no prospects of success. The applicant did not point to any other considerations relevant to the interests of justice which would suggest the application should have been granted. In my view, therefore, the application for leave to appeal should have been dismissed on this basis.[4]

In addition, the minority judgment seemed to suggest that the appeal should fail because no constitutional matter had been raised:

> If the compensation awarded by the Supreme Court of Appeal is just and equitable as contemplated by section 25(3) of the Constitution, then the applicant has no cause for constitutional complaint, no matter how the compensation was calculated in other courts. The applicant would accordingly have no prospects of obtaining relief in this Court.[5]

For reasons explained below, I am quite sympathetic to the minority view that the Constitutional Court should not hear a case when there is no contention that a constitutional standard (in this case that compensation should be just and equitable) has been 'notionally' violated. Typically, however, there is such a contention, and the Constitutional Court must therefore engage in a preliminary analysis of the merits. In many cases, the level of constitutional analysis used for this assessment (whether conducted at the jurisdiction or the interests of justice stage) amounts to no more than a qualified guess. It is also possible for the Constitutional Court to decide the prospects of success question without engaging

[1] 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC).
[2] Act 63 of 1975 (ibid at para 25).
[3] Ibid at para 57.
[4] Ibid at para 88.
[5] Ibid at para 85.

the merits at all: such occasions arise where the lower courts have divided over the matter in question.[1] But in many cases, as we have seen, the Court has engaged in a full assessment of the merits before either declining jurisdiction or refusing leave to appeal, and there is no reason to suspect that it will not continue to do so again in the future.

What this means is that the dividing line between jurisdiction and access is not as clear as the Constitutional Court has sometimes proclaimed it to be. Both stages of the constitutional enquiry serve a similar purpose, i e ensuring that the Court hears and decides only those cases that it should hear based on the function it performs in the judicial system and the constitutional system more generally. In both the enquiry into jurisdiction and the granting of leave to appeal, the Court fulfils its constitutionally mandated role of ensuring (a) that other courts are given an opportunity to contribute to the development of constitutional law doctrine and (b) that judicial resources are not wasted.

This chapter formally deals with jurisdiction. Since the access enquiry is complementary to the jurisdiction enquiry, however, the relation between these two stages is also addressed.

3 JURISDICTION

(a) The threshold requirement of finding a 'constitutional matter'

The Constitutional Court is a specialized court since, according to s 167(3)(b), it may decide only constitutional matters and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters. This description of the Court's jurisdiction, which the Court itself has called a 'definition',[2] makes the question whether a constitutional matter is raised as a 'threshold enquiry'[3] in every case.

The question of what constitutes a 'constitutional matter' has preoccupied the Constitutional Court and other courts in a considerable number of judgments. It has also been discussed in the academic literature. In the case law the question at stake is usually very specific, the more general question is whether an overarching definition, or comprehensive theory, of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court can be derived from the Final Constitution and the Court's judgments. Additionally, the question has been asked as to whether, in a constitutional system in which the Final Constitution is supreme and its values permeate every aspect of the law, the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters can be sustained.[4]

[1] NEHAWU (supra) at para 26.

[2] Alexkor Limited v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC) at para 21.

[3] See Fraser (supra) at para 35. In Boesak, it is called a 'threshold requirement' Boesak (supra) at para 11.

[4] See Carole Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509. See also Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11 at § 11.2.

(i) Just labels: 'constitutional matter', 'constitutional issue', 'constitutional question'

In the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, the terms 'constitutional issue', 'constitutional question' and 'constitutional nature' are used synonymously with 'constitutional matter'.[1] Some judgments have also used the terms 'constitutional issue of substance'[2,] 'constitutional substratum',[3] and even 'jurisdictional matter'.[4]

To some extent, the proliferation of terms may be explained by the inexact wording of the Interim Constitution.[5] IC s 98(2) stated that the Constitutional Court should have jurisdiction over all 'matters relating to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of this Constitution' (my emphasis). However, in IC s 102(3) (dealing with referrals of cases from the Supreme Court to the Constitutional Court), the Interim Constitution used the phrase 'constitutional and other issues' (my emphasis), and went on to use 'constitutional issue' for the better part of that section.[6]

In the judgments of the Constitutional Court, all of the above terms are still common and no distinct meaning is attached to any of them. The Final Constitution itself avoids the linguistic confusion of its predecessor and sticks to the phrase 'constitutional matter', using 'issue' only in the term 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters' and in FC s 167(7), where a constitutional matter is said to include 'any issue involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution'. This suggests that the term 'issue' connotes something narrower than 'matter', but nothing appears to turn on this. In the course of this chapter, only the term 'constitutional matter' will accordingly be used.

(ii) The Constitutional Court has not embraced any concept of 'constitutional matter'

How has the Constitutional Court itself approached the apparent contradiction that it has, on the one hand, a far-reaching transformative task and, on the other, only a limited jurisdiction to decide constitutional matters? To start with, it has

[1] See, eg, K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC) at para 12; Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 59; Lane & Fey NNO v Dabelstein & Others 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC) at para 5; Van Der Walt v Metcash Trading Limited 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC) at paras 14 , 81; S v Thebus & Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) at para 9; Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at para 40; Union of Refugee Women & Others v Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others 2007 (4) SA 395 (CC), 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC) at para 23.

[2] Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) at para 23.

[3] Phoebus Apollo Aviation (supra) at para 3.

[4] Prophet v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2007 (2) BCLR 140 (CC) at para 45.

[5] Act 200 of 1993.

[6] To complicate matters even further, IC s 102(12) introduced the notion of 'issues of constitutionality'.

identified the important connection that exists between any concept of its jurisdiction (following from its institutional imperatives) and the major criterion for triggering that jurisdiction, i e that the case should involve a 'constitutional matter'. The Constitutional Court has stated that it regards its jurisdiction as 'clearly … extensive'[1] and that it would be inappropriate to construe the term 'constitutional matter' narrowly. [2] The second statement follows logically from the first as it would be impossible for the Court to have jurisdiction in respect of a wide range of cases unless the term used to define its jurisdiction were interpreted in such a way as to cater to that wide range.

Apart from these statements, however, the Constitutional Court has thus far not provided an all-embracing definition or a principled understanding of the term 'constitutional matter'. Instead, the Court has decided on a largely ad hoc basis whether particular cases have involved constitutional matters or not. In Boesak, the Constitutional Court went so far to say that '[t]he Constitution offers no definition of a constitutional matter, or an issue connected with a decision on a constitutional matter. Section 167(3)(c) leaves that ultimately to the Constitutional Court to decide.'[3] This statement is true as a matter of the plain wording of the Constitution. There is indeed no section that offers a clear-cut definition in the style of 'a constitutional matter is a matter in which …' The only reference to the meaning of the phrase 'constitutional matter' is in FC s 167(7), and here the phrase is non-exhaustively explained as including 'any issue involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution'.[4]

Rather than providing a definition, the Constitutional Court's preferred approach has been to compile lists of case categories or standard issues that it regards as involving constitutional matters. The first such list was drawn up in Boesak by Langa DP (as he then was):

> If regard is had to the provisions of section 172(1)(a) and section 167(4)(a) of the Constitution, constitutional matters must include disputes as to whether any law or conduct is inconsistent with the Constitution, as well as issues concerning the status, powers and functions of an organ of state. Under section 167(7), the interpretation, application and upholding of the Constitution are also constitutional matters. So too, under section 39(2), is the question whether the interpretation of any legislation or the development of the common law promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[5]

[1] S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC) at para 14

[2] Fraser (supra) at para 37

[3] Boesak (supra) at para 13 (footnote omitted).

[4] See Radio Pretoria v Chairperson, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa & Another 2005 (4) SA 319, 2005 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at para 19 (Court held that '[an] application [for leave to appeal] must raise a constitutional matter, in other words an issue which involves the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution' (my emphasis). This statement incorrectly elevates FC s 167(7) to the status of a definition.) Cf Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th ed, 2005) 103 (Treats FC s 167(7) as a definition).

[5] Boesak (supra) at para 14 (footnotes omitted).

In this passage, the Court identified four kinds of case that involve constitutional matters within the meaning of FC s 167(3). It did not, however, suggest that this list was comprehensive. Rather, the Court went on to say that it was neither necessary nor desirable to attempt to define the limits of its jurisdiction.[1] It is nevertheless noteworthy that the Court included only one area of exclusive jurisdiction (FC s 167(4)(a) — disputes between organs of state) of the six possible areas in FC s 167(4). The Court also significantly misquoted FC s 167(7) by substituting the terms 'application and upholding' for 'protection or enforcement'.

Six years after Boesak, in Fraser v ABSA Bank Ltd, the Court compiled a second list of cases that it said would necessarily involve a constitutional matter:

> This Court has held that a constitutional matter is presented where a claim involves: (a) the interpretation, application or upholding of the Constitution itself, including issues concerning the status, powers or functions of an organ of state and disputes between organs of state; (b) the development of (or the failure to develop) the common law in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights; (c) a statute that conflicts with a requirement or restriction imposed by the Constitution; (d) the interpretation of a statute in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights (or the failure to do so); (e) the erroneous interpretation or application of legislation that has been enacted to give effect to a constitutional right or in compliance with the legislature's constitutional responsibilities; or (f) executive or administrative action that conflicts with a requirement or restriction imposed by the Constitution.[2]

Though more comprehensive than the Boesak list, the Fraser list is not exhaustive either. Nor, like its predecessor, does it purport to offer anything more than a provisional list of the type of cases in which the Court has assumed jurisdiction.

The Constitutional Court's reluctance to define the term 'constitutional matter' does not mean that it is not possible or useful to specify or at least describe the term for purposes of FC s 167(3). A principled understanding of the extent and limits of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction can only strengthen the working relationship between Bloemfontein and Constitution Hill. In addition, litigants are entitled to know in advance whether it is more or less likely that they will be able to approach the Constitutional Court.

The rest of this chapter tries to provide such a principled understanding by starting with the Fraser list. It then expands upon this list on the basis of a functionalist reading of the Constitutional Court's role in the judicial system.

(iii) The Fraser list of case types in which the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction

It is immediately apparent that the list of case types the Constitutional Court compiled in its judgment in Fraser is fragmentary at best. As seen in the passage quoted above, the Court introduces its list with the statement that it 'has held that a constitutional matter is presented' whenever a claim involves one of six categories. A cursory glance at its record, however, reveals that the Constitutional Court has decided cases that do not fall into any of these categories (for example, the provincial certification judgments,[1] which involved the Court's exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(f), and its various judgments on the constitutionality of constitutional amendments,[2] in which its jurisdiction was based on FC s 167(4)(d)).

[1] Boesak (supra) at para 14.
[2] 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at para 38 (footnotes omitted).

The first category in the Fraser list (category (a): 'the interpretation, application or upholding of the Constitution itself, including issues concerning the status, powers or functions of an organ of state and disputes between organs of state') is a particularly odd example of legal systematization. Its origin is the predecessor list from the Court's judgment in Boesak. For no apparent reason, the Fraser Court collapses what were two categories in Boesak into one, making 'the interpretation, application or upholding of the Constitution itself' a general category into which 'issues concerning the status, powers or functions of an organ of state and disputes between organs of state' are made to fit. In restating the first part of this new, overarching category, the Court cites Boesak's reference to FC s 167(7), but repeats its earlier error in misquoting the constitutional provision ('protection or enforcement' being once again replaced with 'application and upholding'). Or perhaps the Court is not misquoting FC s 167(7) — but deliberately reinterpreting it. If so, we are not provided with any reasons for its decision.

The next problem with category (a) is that it is not entirely clear why the second part of this category — disputes between organs of state — is made a subset of the first part. Perhaps the Court wanted to say that every dispute between organs of state necessarily involves an exercise of constitutional interpretation, application or upholding. This would turn FC s 167(7) into an overarching category that covers other categories of constitutional matter. As I argue below, there are, indeed, good reasons for such an understanding of FC s 167(7). If this is what the Fraser Court wanted to say, however, then it is not clear why disputes between [1] Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC); Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) and Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Amended Text of Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC).

[2] See Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC) at para 34. Matatiele was decided just months before Fraser. See also United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (1) 2003 (1) SA 488 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) and United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC); African National Congress & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others (Krog & Others Intervening) 2003 (1) SA 533 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). See also African National Congress & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others (supra) at para 13. Admittedly, of these judgments, only the last one explicitly mentions the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction and does so without reference to FC s 167(4)(d). Nevertheless, the Court in Fraser must have been well aware that its jurisdiction was not confined to FC s 167(4)(a).

organs of state in terms of FC s 167(4)(a) involve the 'interpretation, application or upholding' of the Final Constitution, but other categories of exclusive jurisdiction in FC s 167(4) do not engage 'interpretation, application or upholding' of the Final Constitution. There is also some sloppy citation here, because neither Boesak nor Fraser refers to the only case the Constitutional Court has thus far decided under FC s 167(4)(a): Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa & Another.[1]

Category (c) — cases involving 'a statute that conflicts with a requirement or restriction imposed by the Constitution' — is not supported by any case citations at all. We are therefore left wondering whether this category refers only to cases involving the confirmation of orders of invalidity, or whether it goes beyond FC s 167(5).

Even if the Fraser list and the Court's treatment of the jurisdictional issue in that case do not provide us with a comprehensive overview of cases in which the Constitutional Court has assumed jurisdiction, they do at least re-enforce the distinction between constitutional matters and non-constitutional matters. They also draw attention to the fact that we may be able to identify certain types of case in which the Constitutional Court will always have jurisdiction. However, the Court's case category approach is limited. Instead of compiling a list of cases over which the Court has assumed jurisdiction, it may be more instructive to start with the Constitution itself. Following this approach, three broad categories of constitutional matter suggest themselves:

- constitutional matters falling under the Court's exclusive jurisdiction;
- constitutional matters that are explicitly mentioned as falling under the Constitutional Court's concurrent jurisdiction; and
- other constitutional matters not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution.

(b) FC s 167(4): Constitutional matters falling under the Court's exclusive jurisdiction

FC s 167(4) lists six different types of dispute in which the Constitutional Court enjoys exclusive jurisdiction.[2] All of these types of dispute must by implication involve a constitutional matter since it is inconceivable that the Constitutional Court could assume jurisdiction on one of the grounds listed in subparas (a)-(f) and at the same time decline jurisdiction for want of a constitutional matter. FC s 167(4) in this way serves two functions: it defines a core set of cases that constitute constitutional matters, and denies other courts the jurisdiction to hear such cases.

The six categories of case falling under the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction correspond to the Court's primary function as guardian and final interpreter of the Constitution, as outlined in § 4.2*(a)* above. All of the categories in FC s 167(4) have to do with disputes in which the other spheres of government are directly involved. In this way, the Constitutional Court is tasked with ensuring that the structural principles of the South African political system as envisaged in the Constitution are upheld. When it adjudicates in such conflicts it not only acts as a neutral arbiter. It also exercises a decidedly political function:

[1] 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC) at para 2.

[2] Admittedly, the Constitutional Court's responsibility to certify provincial constitutions as set out in FC s 167(4)(f) does not relate to typical dispute resolution.

> The Constitutional Court has been given the responsibility of being the ultimate guardian of the Constitution and its values. Section 167(4) thus confers exclusive jurisdiction to this Court in a number of crucial political areas which include the power to decide disputes between organs of state in the national and provincial sphere, to decide on the constitutionality of any parliamentary or provincial Bill, to decide on the constitutionality of any amendment to the Constitution and to decide whether Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation. . . . It follows that the drafters of the Constitution necessarily envisaged that this Court would be called upon to adjudicate finally in respect of issues which would inevitably have important political consequences.[1]

In adjudicating disputes within its exclusive jurisdiction the Constitutional Court fulfils its function as the political head of the judicial branch of government. In so doing, it assumes a status in the constitutional system equal to that of the other branches.

The exclusion of other courts from matters falling with this part of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is an exception to the general rule that the Constitution vests the judicial authority of South Africa in all courts (FC s 165(1)). It is also a deviation from the principle that a decision of a court of first instance should be subject to appeal. As the Constitutional Court has repeatedly pointed out, it is not generally desirable for a court to sit as a court of first and last instance,[2] and this should accordingly occur in exceptional circumstances only.[3] The notion that certain matters should fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court therefore has to be justified.

The first plausible justification for FC s 167(4) is that the provision for exclusive jurisdiction is a means to speed up the judicial process in certain cases. In the absence of hearings before other courts, the 'final word' on the meaning of the Final Constitution is inevitably delivered sooner. Since disputes between organs of state, branches of government and the executive and the legislature may interrupt the smooth functioning of the political system, it is appropriate that these disputes should be decided expeditiously in this way.

The second justification is based on less practical considerations: In its own way, the provision for exclusive jurisdiction serves the goal of separation of powers. In a constitutional state where judges can review everything the other branches of government do, the judiciary as an institution enjoys a high level of political influence. In the long term the other political actors have to accept this fact as a necessary part of a constitutional system that also serves their interests.[1] Although in a system of checks and balances all three branches of government in principle control each other, the practical reality is that the judiciary does most of the controlling. There are more cases to be decided by judges than judges to be elected, and more administrative action to be reviewed than court budgets to be negotiated. Against this background, even in a system of comprehensive judicial review (of both government action and legislation), the judiciary's control function has to be exercised with a certain amount of diplomacy.

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) ('SARFU II') at paras 72-73.

[2] See Bruce & Another v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC & Others 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC) at paras 7-9.

[3] See Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 1999 (2) SA 83 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC) at para 4; Dormehl v Minister of Justice 2000 (2) SA 987 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 471 (CC) at para 5.

The Final Constitution entrusts the Constitutional Court with sufficient institutional power to act on the same level as the political branches of government. This is of particular importance in disputes where the political branches are directly involved as parties. Here, their constitutionally enshrined status and their function in the political system make it appropriate that the dispute be decided by an institution of equal importance and political weight. The relevant point is not so much the intrusion into another branch's territory (the review of legislation that is already in force is after all a much stronger intrusion into the political branches' domain than the adjudication of a dispute between organs of state). It is rather that there is a legitimate expectation on the part of the legislature and the executive about which institution and therefore which individuals are appropriate to deal with their disputes. This expectation is based more on perception than judicial capability. Nevertheless, the status of the judges that perform a particular function is important for the acceptance of their decisions by the other branches of government. A certain amount of diplomacy and what may be called 'institutional respect' is thus inherent in the concept of exclusive jurisdiction.

It is this 'institutional respect' that links the idea of exclusive jurisdiction to the separation of powers doctrine: a connection frequently referred to in judgments by the Constitutional Court.[2] This correlation is particularly visible in the Court's three decisions in President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others.[3] The case dealt with the decision of the President

[1] For an argument about the way the Constitutional Court has developed its jurisprudence to ensure that its decisions are indeed respected by the government and Parliament, and to a lesser extent by the public, see Theunis Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International J of Constitutional Law (forthcoming).

[2] For an analysis of the Court's understanding of this issue, see Sanele Sibanda & Sebastian Seedorf 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) and President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC).

to appoint a commission of enquiry into the affairs of organized rugby in South Africa. The High Court decided that some of the applicants' factual claims needed clarification and ordered the President to give oral evidence. On appeal, the Constitutional Court did not completely rule out the possibility that the President may be required by a court of law to give evidence in relation to the performance of his official duties. But it emphasized that such a decision would require special consideration:

> [T]here is the public interest in ensuring that the dignity and status of the President is preserved and protected, that the efficiency of the executive is not impeded and that a robust and open discussion take place unhindered at meetings of the Cabinet when sensitive and important matters of policy are discussed. Careful consideration must therefore be given to a decision compelling the President to give evidence and such an order should not be made unless the interests of justice clearly demand that this be done. The judiciary must exercise appropriate restraint in such cases, sensitive to the status of the head of state and the integrity of the executive arm of government.[1]

In another part of the decision, the Constitutional Court considered the purpose of its exclusive jurisdiction:

> The purpose of these provisions . . . is to preserve the comity between the judicial branch of government on the one hand and the legislative and executive branches of government on the other, by ensuring that only the highest court in constitutional matters intrudes into the domains of the principal legislative and executive organs of state.[2]

The Court later confirmed this reasoning in explaining why the Final Constitution granted it exclusive jurisdiction in all of the areas listed in FC s 167(4).[3]

The same considerations inform both the general notion of judicial restraint in terms of the separation of powers and the idea of exclusive jurisdiction: there is no substantial difference between a preservation of the 'dignity and status' of the President and the idea of 'comity' towards the legislative and executive branches of government. Through the doctrine of separation of powers, and in particular the Constitutional Court's invocation of it,[4] the courts show institutional respect for the other branches. In matters involving the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction, the Constitution ensures that the same institutional respect is maintained by preventing courts other than the Constitutional Court from hearing such cases.

[1] SARFU III (supra) at para 243.

[2] See SARFU I (supra) at para 29. On the meaning of FC s 172(2), but endorsed more broadly in relation to 'provisions of the Constitution which confer exclusive jurisdiction upon [the Constitutional Court] to decide certain constitutional matters', see President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others. 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) at para 20.

[3] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 23.

[4] See Sanele Sibanda & Sebastian Seedorf 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12 at § 12.3*(d)(ii)(aa)*; Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism' (supra).

It is interesting to note that other constitutional democracies, too, subscribe to the idea that the highest court in the land should enjoy exclusive jurisdiction with regard to disputes in which other important political actors — such as the head of government, members of the national executive or the chairperson of the national parliament — are involved. The jurisdiction of the German Federal Constitutional Court, for example, is almost entirely exclusive. Article 93 of the German Grundgesetz enumerates seven types of dispute falling in its jurisdiction, six of which are exclusive, including 'disputes concerning the extent of the rights and duties of a supreme federal body or of other parties vested with rights of their own by this Basic Law' (art 93(1) No 1).[1] Only the category of 'Constitutional Complaints' (Verfassungsbeschwerde) according to arts 93(1) No 4a and 94(2) has a quasi-appeal character, since a claimant may be required to exhaust all other legal remedies before filing a claim. In certain other proceedings, such as 'concrete norm control' (konkrete Normenkontrolle, art 100(1)), other courts must refer the matter to the Constitutional Court. Thus, another court is inserted between the plaintiff and the Constitutional Court, although only the Constitutional Court may decide on the constitutionality of acts of parliament.

The jurisdiction of the US Supreme Court is comprised of two types: original jurisdiction, in which the court acts as a court of first instance or as a trial court, and appellate jurisdiction. Article III Section 2 of the Constitution grants original jurisdiction to the US Supreme Court over cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those to which a state is party (in all other cases the US Supreme Court is granted appellate jurisdiction). While in most legal systems, original and exclusive jurisdiction for the highest court are the same thing, the US Supreme Court has held that Congress can give the lower federal courts concurrent jurisdiction even when the Constitution specifies that the Supreme Court should have original jurisdiction.[2] Effectively, the US Supreme Court only assumes exclusive jurisdiction in disputes between two or more states.[3]

[1] According to s 63 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act (Bundesverfassungsgerichtsgesetz) only these institutions are 'highest organs of the state' and have standing in disputes with the exclusive jurisdiction of the Bundesverfassungsgericht in terms of art 93(1) No. 1 of the Basic Law: The President of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Bundestag (Parliament), the Bundesrat (Federal Council of Provinces), the Federal Government and those parts of these organs that have been vested with own rights either in the Grundgesetz or in the rules and orders of the Bundestag or the Bundesrat. However, this limited provision has been extended by the Bundesverfassungsgericht to the Chancellor and every Minister of the Federal Government individually (BVerfGE 67, 100 ('Flick-Untersuchungsausschuss' ['Flick-Parliamentary Commissions of Enquiry']), individual members, groups and caucuses of Parliament (BVerfGE 80, 188 ('Wüppesahl') and political parties (BVerfGE 1, 208, 223 ('7,5%-Sperrklausel' ['7,5%-minimum threshold'])).

[2] See Ames v Kansas ex rel/ Johnson 111 US 449, 464 (1884).

[3] The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is laid out by statute in 28 USC § 1251. The section provides that the Supreme Court shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all controversies between two or more States. In actions or proceedings to which ambassadors, other public ministers, consuls, or vice consuls of foreign states are parties, in all controversies between the United States and a State and in all actions or proceedings by a State against the citizens of another State or against aliens, the Supreme Court shall have only original but not exclusive jurisdiction. In these cases, the plaintiff has the option to initiate proceedings directly in the Supreme Court.

The Constitutional Court of South Africa has stated that the more important and complex the issues in a case, the more compelling the need for it to be assisted by the views of another court.[1] In matters involving its exclusive jurisdiction, however, the Court cannot enjoy the benefit and assistance of the views of other courts. In these cases, it is precisely the importance of the matters at stake for the overall constitutional structure that requires the Constitutional Court to be a court of first and last instance.

On several occasions, the South African Constitutional Court has been confronted with litigants who sought to bring their matter directly to it, bypassing the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. The Constitutional Court has declined to hear most of these cases. Its grounds for rejecting these cases, however, have mostly been based on FC s 167(6)(a), i e on whether it was in the interests of justice for the Court to hear the matter as a court of first instance, and not on considerations related to its jurisdiction.[2] The basis of the Court's approach in this regard is that only in exceptional circumstances should direct access be granted, because in such cases it does not enjoy the benefits and the assistance of the views of other courts on the matter before it.[3]

A similar approach should be followed in understanding the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction in terms of FC s 167(4): Because exclusive jurisdiction is an exception to the general rule that the judicial authority vests in all courts, this category of cases should be narrowly construed.

(i) Disputes between organs of state, FC s 167(4)(a)

Although 'organ of state' is a term defined in FC s 239, this category of exclusive jurisdiction is the one most open to interpretation. Even the Final Constitution's detailed definition still leaves ample room for differing views about what institutions qualify as organs of state.[4]

[1] See Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another; Bissett & Others v Buffalo City Municipality & Others; Transfer Rights Action Campaign & Others v MEC, Local Government and Housing, Gauteng & Others (Kwazulu-Natal Law Society and Msunduzi Municipality as Amici Curiae) 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC) at para 11.

[2] See, eg, Mkontwana (supra) at para 11 (Contains additional references.)

[3] This approach has been criticized by Jackie Dugard. She argues that the Court's practice regarding direct access applications does not adequately facilitate the uptake of issues affecting the fundamental rights of poor people. In so doing, the Court has failed to live up to its transformative promise. Jackie Dugard 'Court of First Instance?: Towards a Pro-Poor Jurisdiction for the South African Constitutional Court' (2006) 22 SAJHR 261.

[4] See Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31, § 31.4*(f)*(On whether a department of state acts as an organ of state when entering into contracts or whether privatized formerly state-run entities qualify as organs of state.) One may also ask whether any functionary or institution exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of the common law (as opposed to legislation) would qualify as an organ of state in terms of FC s 239.

One would expect that, since the definition in FC s 239 is rather broad, disputes between organs of state relying on the Court's exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(a) would not be uncommon.[1] FC s 167(4)(a), however, includes two qualifiers limiting the scope of the Court's jurisdiction in this respect. First, it refers only to organs of state in the national or provincial sphere, thereby excluding from its ambit disputes between organs of state in the local government sphere.[2] The second qualification is that the dispute between organs of state must concern their 'constitutional status, powers or functions'.

At first glance, the second qualification on the Court's jurisdiction under FC 167(4)(a) seems to be contradictory: Is the status of every organ of state not derived from the Constitution and do they not all exercise their powers and functions subject to the Final Constitution? In its leading judgment on this matter, National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu-Natal & Others, [3] the Constitutional Court accepted this point, but held that, in the context of exclusive jurisdiction, it was necessary to go beyond the obvious. While the Court had no difficulty in asserting that the parties to the case[4] were indeed organs of state in terms of FC s 239, it was unsympathetic to the applicant's view that every power which is traceable to the Final Constitution is a 'constitutional power' within the meaning of FC 167(4)(a), and likewise that every issue of constitutional status or function, is an issue capable of founding the Court's exclusive jurisdiction under this subparagraph.[5] Certainly, the Court held, in a constitutional state all public power is derived from the Final Constitution.[6] But if the word 'constitutional' in FC s 167(4)(a) is understood only to repeat this basic principle, it would follow that every dispute between organs of state concerning their status, powers or functions would be a matter exclusively within the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. This result, the Court implied, was not desirable, and the word 'constitutional' in the phrase 'constitutional status, powers or functions' would serve no

[1] However, the Constitutional Court has thus far decided only one case explicitly on the basis of this section: Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa & Another 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC). This case is discussed below. See Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 10. (Court considered exclusive jurisdiction and held that it was unclear what it was characterized by: the identity of the parties to the dispute or the subject matter of the dispute. Eventually, these questions were left undecided because the right of the parties to come directly to the Constitutional Court was not put in issue and the Court was satisfied that the interests of justice required that leave to come directly to it be granted.)

[2] See National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu Natal & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC) at para 20.

[3] 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC).

[4] The National Gambling Board, the Minister of Trade and Industry, the Premier of KwaZulu-Natal and the KwaZulu-Natal Gambling Board.

[5] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 23.

[6] See Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC). For a discussion of these judgments, see § 4.3*(d)*(ii).

purpose.[1] Rather, the subparagraph had to be narrowly construed so as to balance the need for the Court to hear certain matters as a court of first and last instance against the countervailing principle that, in general, it was better for it to have the benefit of other courts' views.

What then is the meaning of 'constitutional status, powers or functions' in FC s 167(4)(a)? The Constitutional Court in National Gambling Board found assistance in the definition of 'organ of state' in FC s 239:

> In paragraph (b) of the definition of organ of state, a distinction is made between an institution or functionary 'exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Constitution' and those doing so 'in terms of any legislation'. The word 'constitutional' in section 167(4)(a) encapsulates the same distinction: It refers to status, powers or functions explicitly or by implication provided for in terms of the Constitution as opposed to those provided for in terms of any legislation. Put differently, the term 'constitutional status, powers or functions' in section 167(4)(a) means status, powers or functions derived directly from the Constitution.[2]

The Court here used a criterion that is consistent with the general principle that the ambit of its exclusive jurisdiction should be narrowly construed. Additionally, one can read a principle of proximity into the Court's reasoning: the closer the rights, or 'status, powers or functions' in question are to a constitutional provision, the more likely it is that they will trigger the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction. This principle characterizes the Court's exclusive jurisdiction as something that lies at the core of constitutional adjudication, and which is directly connected to its primary function as the guardian and final interpreter of the Constitution. The more important part of the Constitutional Court's approach in National Gambling Board, in other words, is not the (formal) criterion of absence of legislation, but the substantive criterion that the status, powers or functions in dispute should be explicitly or by implication provided for in the Constitution. Take for example legislation that prescribes the privileges and immunities of the National Assembly, Cabinet members and members of the Assembly, as contemplated in FC s 58(2). Is any dispute concerning these privileges automatically outside the scope of FC s 167(4)(a) because the privileges are based on legislation and not derived directly from the Constitution? Surely not. While keeping the exceptional nature of exclusive jurisdiction in mind, the Constitutional Court should determine whether the rights in question are genuinely founded on legislation or whether they are in fact, or by implication, provided by the Constitution. Such a substantive understanding of this part of its exclusive jurisdiction would give the Court the necessary discretion to avoid any over-interpretation of its mandate while at the same time taking into account the institutional respect due to the parties involved and the purpose of FC s 167(4)(a).

[1] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 23.
[2] Ibid at para 24.

In National Gambling Board, the Constitutional Court rejected the argument that the dispute involved these core constitutional issues, and held that it was a simple conflict between a national and a provincial Act that fell to be resolved in terms of FC ss 146, 148 and 150.[1] In its judgment, the Court emphasized that the dispute was about the effect of the legislation and not the power to make it.[2] This statement is quite revealing. It is clear that the Constitutional Court had in mind a standard situation with regard to the sort of dispute that would fall under FC s 167(4)(a), i e disputes about the respective legislative competence of the National Assembly and the provinces in terms of FC ss 44 and 104, and Schedules 4 and 5 of the Constitution.

This understanding of the purpose of FC s 167(4)(a) has much to recommend it. If the National Assembly passes legislation with regard to a matter falling within a functional area listed in Schedule 5 (exclusive provincial legislative competence) it can only do so by way of 'intervention' in terms of FC s 44(2). Whether the preconditions of FC s 44(2) are met is a matter of constitutional interpretation and thus any dispute over the National Assembly's power to pass such legislation would be a dispute about a power derived directly from the Constitution. The same argument would apply if a province legislated with regard to a matter which that was allegedly outside one of the functional areas listed in Schedule 4 or 5. Here, the allegation would be that the province had intruded on the exclusive legislative domain of the National Assembly, which is a power derived directly from the Final Constitution. Such a dispute would accordingly fall into the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction.

On the other hand, if both Parliament and the provincial legislatures are entitled to legislate on a particular matter — as was the case in National Gambling Board, which concerned 'Casinos, racing, gambling and wagering, excluding lotteries and sports pools' as provided for in Schedule 4 Part A of the Final Constitution — the question of which legislation should prevail would not depend on the status, powers or functions of Parliament or the province concerned. To be sure, the case would involve the interpretation of the Constitution, i e whether the conditions of FC s 146(2) or 146(3) had been met. But this would not be enough to bring the case within the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction since the powers of both Parliament and the provincial legislature to legislate on the matter would by definition not be in dispute. This reading is supported by the text of FC s 146(4) and FC s 150. These sections respectively refer to 'a court' and 'every court' and imply that disputes over matters of concurrent legislative competence are not exclusively for the Constitutional Court to decide.

The Constitutional Court's understanding of the constitutional status, powers and functions of organs of state is well illustrated by Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa & Another[3] — the only case the Court has thus far decided under FC s 167(4)(a). At first glance, the Court's conceptual engagement with the issue of jurisdiction in this case is rather feeble: Chaskalson P, writing for a unanimous Court, simply asserts the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court to hear the matter without providing any reasons.[1] But, on a closer reading, the Court's decision is squarely in line with its more elaborate reasoning in National Gambling Board two and a half years later.

[1] National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 25-26.
[2] Ibid at para 26.
[3] 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC).

The dispute in Premier of the Western Cape concerned an amendment to the Public Service Act with repercussions for the way in which provinces were administered. Properly understood, the conflict between the national and provincial sphere was not about their respective legislative competences but about whether the national legislation at issue infringed the executive authority of the Western Cape, as set out in FC s 125. The precise question was whether Parliament had the competence to prescribe to provinces how to structure their respective administrations.[2] In answering this question, the Court held that FC s 197, which provides for a public service in South Africa, directly confers on Parliament the necessary power to regulate the structure of the public service, both for the national and the provincial sphere, and that no implied provincial executive power was infringed by the contested legislation.[3] In the Court's words:

> [T]he competence concerning the structure and functioning of the public service is dealt with specifically in the Constitution, and was not left to be dealt with under the general legislative power conferred on parliament by section 44(1)(a).[4]

The second aspect of the Court's judgment in Premier of the Western Cape had to do with an alleged infringement of the principle of co-operative government in Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution. As it turned out, the Court largely rejected this contention, but for the purposes of this chapter the relevant question is whether any case between two organs of state (solely) based on an infringement of the principles of co-operative government in FC ss 40 and 41 will by definition concern the constitutional status, powers or functions of those organs of state in terms of FC s 167(4)(a).

The correct position, it is submitted, is that the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court cannot be triggered simply by asserting that the principle of co-operative government has been violated. I offer four reasons for this conclusion. First, most parts of FC ss 40 and 41 do not refer to the constitutional powers, status or functions of organs of state.[5] Secondly, those parts that do

[1] Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa (supra) at para 2.

[2] Ibid at para 7.

[3] Ibid at para 44 (Constitutional Court stated that FC s 197(1) does not draw a distinction between provincial and national competences, and that Chapter 10 applies to all aspects of public administration in every sphere of government.)

[4] Ibid at para 46.

[5] It is in fact debatable whether large parts of Chapter 3 provide for legally binding norms at all. But see S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 14 (Several provisions that might have been thought to be non-justiciable have been used to dispose of matters — and in quite a few early case, it disposed of disputes between the state and private parties.)

refer to constitutional powers, do not create national or provincial powers but presuppose them. FC s 41(1)(g), for example, as the Court in Premier of the Western Cape remarked, is concerned with the way power is exercised, not with whether or not a power exists (which is determined by other provisions of the Final Constitution).[1] Thirdly, FC s 41(3) and (4) refer to 'a court' in relation to the resolution of intergovernmental disputes — not solely to the Constitutional Court. Not every dispute mentioned in FC s 41(3) and (4), therefore, is a dispute for purposes of FC s 167(4)(a).[2] If the Constitutional Assembly had intended this to be the case, it would have mentioned the Constitutional Court by name.[3] Finally, the provisions of FC Chapter 3 are framed in such a broad way, and encompass so many wide (and difficult to define) concepts, that virtually any dispute between different spheres of government could be framed as a violation of the principle of co-operative government. If every dispute concerning FC Chapter 3 were understood to be a dispute concerning a constitutional power, status or function, however, then every such dispute involving the provincial and the national sphere would fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. This consequence the Constitutional Court expressly rejected in National Gambling Board.

It follows that intergovernmental disputes in which the Constitutional Court exercises exclusive jurisdiction should be limited to cases involving FC s 41(1)(e), (f) and (g).[4] Additionally, the Constitutional Court should follow a case-by-case approach, taking into account factors such as whether other aspects of the case also fall under FC s 167(4)(a), as was the case in Premier of the Western Cape. In that case, the Court emphasized that the functional and institutional integrity of the different spheres of government, as envisaged in FC s 41(1)(g), must be determined with due regard to the respective place of the national, provincial and local spheres in the constitutional order, their powers and functions under the Constitution, and the countervailing powers of other spheres of government.[5] The [1] Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa (supra) at para 57. Admittedly, on a plain-language reading, one can argue that the Constitutional Court enjoys exclusive jurisdiction when the exercise of a constitutional power is at stake as well as in cases where the existence of that power is the relevant issue. FC s 167(4)(a) does not distinguish between these two classes of cases.

[2] That question was raised but left open in Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs ; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa. 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 10.

[3] There is no provision in the South African Constitution similar to art 93 (1) No.3 of the German Grundgesetz. That provision of the Basic Law provides the Bundesverfassungsgericht with exclusive jurisdiction 'in the event of disagreements respecting the rights and duties of the Federation and the Länder [provinces]'.

[4] Of course, this limitation does not apply when the challenge to another subsection of FC s 41 is brought under one of the other headings in FC s 167(4). For example, in Matatiele I, the Court considered an (ill-conceived) challenge in terms of FC s 41 on the basis of its exclusive jurisdiction in terms of FC s 167(4)(d), because the case involved a constitutional amendment. See Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC) at paras 54-57.

[5] Premier of the Western Cape v President of South Africa (supra) at para 58.

Court thereby understood the powers and functions referred to in FC Chapter 3 in the context of other powers or functions explicitly or by implication derived from the Final Constitution. A similar kind of connection between a FC Chapter 3 power or function and another constitutional power or function would have to be present in a co-operative government dispute before such a case could be decided by the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 167(4)(a).

(ii) Constitutionality of Bills, FC s 167(4)(b)

FC s 167(4)(b) confers on the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction to decide the constitutionality of a bill, but only in 'the circumstances anticipated in section 79 or 121'. These circumstances ensure that judicial review of bills may only be initiated by a very limited group of persons for limited purposes.

(aa) Initiation of judicial review of a Bill

In a constitutional order that adheres to the separation of powers, the legislative process on the national and the provincial level is the domain of Parliament or the provincial legislatures, as the case may be. Any judicial challenge to a statute in bill form is thus an intrusion into the domain of the people's democratically elected representatives and should, in the words of the Constitutional Court, be treated with caution:

> The legislature has a very special role to play in such a democracy — it is the law-maker consisting of the duly elected representatives of all of the people. With due regard to that role and mandate, it is drastic and far-reaching for any court, directly or indirectly, to suspend the commencement or operation of an Act of Parliament and especially one amending the Constitution, which is the supreme law.[1]

The Final Constitution, therefore, > contains clear and express provisions which preclude any court from considering the constitutionality of a bill save in the limited circumstances referred to in sections 79 and 121 of the Constitution, respectively.[2]

In its judgment in Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others,[3] the Constitutional Court repeated this point and emphasized the importance of an unobstructed legislative process:

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) at para 25.
[2] Ibid at para 26.
[3] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC).

> [Parliament] must be free to carry out its functions without interference. . . . The business of Parliament might well be stalled while the question of what relief should be granted is argued out in the courts. Indeed the parliamentary process would be paralysed if Parliament were to spend its time defending its legislative process in the courts. This would undermine one of the essential features of our democracy: the separation of powers.[1]

The separation of powers principle, the Constitutional Court continued, functions as a limitation on challenges to the parliamentary process and prevents the other branches of government[2] and everyone else from interfering with it — apart from certain constitutionally mandated exceptions. FC ss 79 and 121, as referred to in FC s 167(4)(b), define these constitutionally mandated exceptions. They limit the persons who may challenge a parliamentary or provincial bill to the President and the Premier of a province.

FC s 79 regulates one of the final stages in the process of national legislation.[3] Because legislating is the domain of Parliament, the executive can have no veto on laws that have been passed. Consequently, the Final Constitution imposes an obligation on the President to assent to and sign a Bill into law. In so doing, he or she may raise neither political objections nor editorial concerns.[4] The only objection the President may raise, FC s 79 provides, is to the constitutionality of the Bill. In this case, the President must refer the Bill back to Parliament. If that process fails, and the Bill is again passed in a form that does not put an end to the dispute,[5] then — to avoid a stalemate — the President may refer the Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality (FC s 79(4)(b)).[6]

[1] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 36.

[2] With regard to the judiciary, the Court on the one hand stressed that courts must be conscious of the vital limits on judicial authority while on the other hand made clear that Parliament is also bound by the Constitution and that it is up to the Constitutional Court to ensure that Parliament fulfils its constitutional obligations. Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 37, 38.

[3] This process is regulated by FC s 81: A Bill becomes an Act of Parliament the moment the President assents to and signs it. This Act of Parliament must then be published in the Government Gazette and enters into force when published or on a date determined in terms of the Act. See Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[4] This set of circumstances is not totally hypothetical. See In re: the Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC) at para 2 (Premier of the Mpumalanga Province when referring the Bill for reconsideration to the provincial legislature, besides raising constitutional concerns, recommended that certain typographical and grammatical errors be corrected.)

[5] The Bill does not have to be passed again in the original draft version to engage this provision. The Bill may have been amended but the amendment may still not satisfy the constitutional concerns of the President. FC s 79(4) does not focus on the formal criterion of an unchanged passing, but on the substantive factor whether the President is of the opinion that his constitutional concerns have been addressed. See also Ex parte the President of the Republic of South Africa In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 14.

[6] The President is explicitly entitled to refer a Bill back to the National Assembly for reconsideration of the Bill's constitutionality and, eventually, to the Constitutional Court for a decision on the Bill's constitutionality. See FC ss 84(2)(b) and (c).

FC s 121 provides for basically the same arrangement in the provincial sphere: a Premier of a province has to assent to and sign a Bill passed by the provincial legislature or, if the Premier has reservations about the constitutionality of the Bill, refer it back to the legislature for reconsideration. If, after reconsideration, the Premier is still not convinced that the Bill complies with the Final Constitution, he or she must refer it to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality.

By cross-referring to these provisions, FC s 167(4)(b) serves two purposes. First, it anticipates a specific conflict, i e a dispute between the President and Parliament (or the equivalent institutions at the provincial level) on the constitutionality of a Bill and ensures that this dispute is resolved in a swift manner by the only body that is institutionally capable of acting as a referee between these two constitutional organs. If the Constitutional Court decides that the contested provision indeed would violate the Constitution, then the dispute ends there. The Bill may not be signed into law and does not create unconstitutional obligations.[1] If, however, the Constitutional Court decides that the Bill is constitutional, then the President must assent to and sign it (FC s 79(5)).[2]

The second purpose served by FC s 167(4)(b) is that it prevents any judicial review of Bills except at the instance of the President or a provincial Premier. The Constitutional Court has emphasized that referral by the President is the decisive factor triggering its exclusive jurisdiction with regard to Bills. All other constitutional organs, political parties, civil society groups or individuals have to wait until the Bill is in force before approaching a court to get a ruling on its constitutionality. Consequently, all other courts are prohibited from exercising the exceptional 'power of abstract judicial review'[3] envisaged in FC s 167(4)(b).[4]

[1] See Liquor Bill (supra) at para 18.

[2] The premier of a province is similarly bound. FC s 121(3).

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) at para 26.

[4] See Ex parte the President of the Republic of South Africa In re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill (supra) at paras 7-9. Cameron AJ's judgment provides an overview of similar procedures of pre-enactment constitutional scrutiny. Apparently, in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Germany no comparable procedure exists. Similar referrals are, however, part of the constitutional law of Ireland, France, Canada and India. In Germany, however, it is established constitutional practice that the Federal President is entitled to withhold signature of a parliamentary Bill when he has constitutional concerns regarding the legislative procedure and, to a lesser extent, also with regard to substantive constitutional provisions (Article 82(1) of the Grundgesetz). On eight occasions, different Federal Presidents have since 1949 refused to sign a Bill. As there is no referral procedure, the Bundestag (Parliament) would have to apply to the Constitutional Court for an order compelling the President to sign the Bill within the procedure of a dispute between organs of state. Such a request has never occurred. Instead, Parliament has either reconsidered the Bill or, on one occasion, the Grundgesetz has been amended to accommodate the concerns. On the other hand, German Presidents have signed several Bills with publicly expressed reservations, which effectively invited challenges to the Act almost immediately after it entered into force. See, for example BVerfGE 106, 310 ('Zuwanderungsgesetz'['Migration Act']) of 2002 and BVerfGE 115, 118 ('Luftsicherheitsgesetz' ['Aviation Security Act']) of 2006.

In Doctors for Life, an advocacy group challenged the constitutionality of four health-related statutes on the grounds that during the legislative process leading to the enactment of these statutes, the National Council of Provinces and the provincial legislatures had failed to comply with their constitutional obligation to facilitate public involvement. When the application was launched, all but one of the statutes had already been enacted. The applicants, however, challenged all four statutes, including the one that was still in Bill form.

The Constitutional Court held that the applicants could not base their complaint against the statute that was still in Bill form on FC s 167(4)(b):

> [W]hile [section 167(4)(b)] confers exclusive jurisdiction on this Court to consider the constitutional validity of a national or provincial bill, this power is expressly limited to a challenge brought by the President or a Premier and in circumstances contemplated in section 79 or 121 of the Constitution. The provisions of these sections are too clear to admit of any other construction.[1]

To surmount this hurdle, the applicant tried to approach the Constitutional Court using FC s 167(4)(e), which grants the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction to decide if the President or Parliament has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation.[2] But the Court correctly rejected this argument, too. The only applicable provision with regard to Bills is FC s 167(4)(b), as it is a more specific provision than FC s 167(4)(e). All other access roads to any other court are, in effect, blocked for as long as the Bill is not signed. It is, as the Court pointed out, also not relevant whether the Bill is challenged for procedural or substantive reasons: even a complaint relating to a failure by Parliament to facilitate public involvement in its legislative processes (as was brought in Doctors for Life) will invariably require a court to consider the validity of the resulting bill. The purpose and the effect of litigation that is brought in relation to a Bill is therefore always to render the Bill passed by Parliament invalid — and it is exactly this kind of litigation that FC s 167(4)(b) seeks to preclude.[3]

The Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction with regard to Bills and the entire referral procedure had a different focus under the Interim Constitution.[4] Under the Interim Constitution, concerns about the constitutionality of a Bill (or any of its provisions) were assumed to be part of a dispute between different political groups inside Parliament (or a provincial legislature). According to IC ss 98(2)(d) and 98(9), the Constitutional Court could decide a dispute over the

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 43.
[2] This subsection is dealt with in more detail below.
[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 44-56.
[4] Cf Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995; Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC); Speaker of the National Assembly, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC); Gauteng Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC).

constitutionality of any Bill only at the request of the Speaker of the National Assembly, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of a provincial legislature, and then only upon receipt by these persons of a petition by at least one third of all the members of the National Assembly, the Senate or the affected provincial legislature requiring them to do so. Thus, the rationale behind the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction was not the resolution of a dispute between two or more organs of state, but the protection of minority parties in the parliamentary process. Given the circumstances leading up to the enactment of the Interim Constitution, it may be assumed that the intention of the drafters, in addition to confining the various legislatures to the imperatives of the new constitutional order, was to give the political opposition in Parliament, the Senate (as it then was) and any provincial legislature an effective tool to stop the ruling party from enacting constitutionally problematic legislation. The protection of parliamentary minority parties is no longer part of the rationale behind the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(b). Under the Final Constitution, parliamentary minority groups may still approach the Constitutional Court and access its exclusive jurisdiction, but only after the Bill has been signed into law and have become an Act of Parliament. This procedure is set out in FC s 167(4)(c) read with FC s 80. I discuss its primary features below.

(bb) Scope of judicial review of a Bill

Once a referral is made in accordance with either FC s 79 or FC 121, the Constitutional Court not only has exclusive jurisdiction to hear the case, but also has to decide the matter. A formally correct referral by the President or the Premier of a province, in other words, imposes an obligation on the Constitutional Court to decide on the constitutionality of the Bill to resolve the dispute. But the scope of the Court's review power is limited. In Liquor Bill, the Constitutional Court emphasized that it was not obliged to scrutinize the whole of a Bill in order to determine its constitutionality for purposes of FC s 79.[1] Rather, FC s 79(5) must be read as empowering the Court to make a decision regarding the Bill's constitutionality only in relation to the points raised in the President's reservations.[2] These reservations, however, and thus the focus of the Court's attention, may relate both to specific provisions and to the Bill as a whole.[3]

The scope of the Court's review powers in respect of Bills was further refined in In re: The Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000.[4] Here, the Premier of the Mpumalanga Province's reservations included a concern not previously

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 13. The Court goes on to say that FC s 79 does not entail a 'mini-certification' process (at para 16).
[2] Ibid at para 14.
[3] Ibid at paras 17-18.
[4] 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC).

referred to the legislature, but which had been raised for the first time only in papers before the Court. The Court eventually declined jurisdiction in terms of FC s 167(4)(b), holding that such a referral by the Premier (or the President) is defective for non-compliance with the constitutional requirement that it should first be referred to the legislature for (re-)consideration of the Bill. The principle of respect for the democratically elected legislature and the value of an unobstructed legislative process, which underlie the rules about who may initiate the review of a Bill, are also decisive here:

> The Court's function to adjudicate upon the Bill commences only after this political process [contemplated by FC s 121] has been exhausted and it is limited to a consideration of the Premier's reservations together with the responses of the parties represented in the legislature. The role of the legislature would be undermined if the Premier's reservations could be entertained by this Court without having been referred to the legislature for its consideration.[1]

In Liquor Bill, the Court had explicitly left open whether it may ever be appropriate for it, upon a presidential referral, to consider other provisions of the Bill which appear to be manifestly unconstitutional, but which were not included in the President's reservations.[2] In Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, the Court settled this question: In referral proceedings under FC ss 79 and 121, the Court held, no room exists for the Court to consider issues that have not been properly raised by the President or the Premier,[3] either — one may add — because the issue has not been raised earlier at all, or because it has not previously been referred to the legislature. This interpretation of the Court's function in terms of FC s 167(4)(b) appears correct. Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether the Court really would refrain from considering a provision in a Bill that was manifestly unconstitutional. One could imagine at the very least the Court's bringing a patent constitutional defect in a Bill to the attention of the parties, even where that defect was not properly before it.

In Gauteng School Education Bill, the Court assumed jurisdiction and found the Bill to be in line with the Interim Constitution even though the Bill, after referral to the Court, had been passed and duly enacted (as the Gauteng School Education Act of 1995).[4] Although the disputed sections had not been put into operation at the time of the Court's decision, the Bill technically no longer existed, and the Constitutional Court could have decided that the case had become moot.[5] It

[1] Mpumalanga Petitions Bill (supra) at para 9. FC s 79(2) provides similarly with regard to the President and a Parliamentary Bill.

[2] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 15.

[3] Mpumalanga Petitions Bill (supra) at para 13. Consequently, the Court requires that the document in terms of which the President or Premier conveys his or her reservations to Parliament or the provincial legislature ought to form part of the referral to the Constitutional Court under the provisions of FC ss 79 or 121.

[4] Gauteng Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC).

[5] Of course, the constitutionality of the provisions in dispute could have been challenged in another way and eventually the Constitutional Court would have had to decide the matter, anyway — but not in terms of its exclusive jurisdiction.

did not do so, with Mahomed DP stressing that none of the parties had contended that the Court's exclusive jurisdiction was 'in any way ousted' because the Bill had since been enacted.[1] In Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court confirmed this approach on more principled grounds. In this case, the Court held that it would follow the general rule in South African law that the crucial time for determining whether a court has jurisdiction is the time when the proceedings commenced.[2] Once a referral has been made or an application lodged, the Court will objectively assess whether the conditions for its jurisdiction have been fulfilled. The subjective intention of the parties cannot influence the Court's decision at this stage.[3]

It is in any case very likely that the President, having referred a case to the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 79, would wait for the Court's decision before signing the Bill into law. But what if he does not? In Doctors for Life, the Court held that a lack of jurisdiction to entertain a challenge to a Bill could not be compensated for by the fact that the Court would later have jurisdiction to pronounce on the constitutional validity of the resultant Act.[4] This line of reasoning would probably not operate the other way, however. If the President, after the referral, signs the Bill, the Court no longer has to resolve a live dispute between the President and Parliament and, consequently, it should decline to hear the case as moot.[5] The exception to this rule, as Gauteng School Education Bill suggests, is that the Court might still be prepared to entertain the case if the contested provisions have not yet been put into operation.

Finally in this regard, a decision by the Constitutional Court under FC s 167(4)(b) that a Bill is constitutional does not in any way prevent further constitutional challenges to the statute after its enactment. Of course, stare decisis prevents re-litigation of issues that the Court has already determined in its analysis of the Bill.[6]

[1] Gauteng School Education Bill (supra) at para 2.

[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 57 referring to Thermo Radiant Oven Sales (Pty) Ltd v Nelspruit Bakeries (Pty) Ltd 1969 (2) SA 295, 310D-E (A) and MV Snow Delta Serva Ship Ltd v Discount Tonnage Ltd 2000 (4) SA 746 (SCA) at para 7.

[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 9 (Constitutional Court states: 'the question whether this Court has exclusive jurisdiction in this matter is too important to be resolved by concession.' On a very narrow reading, the Court here only ruled on 'this matter'. But the principle of exclusive jurisdiction cannot generally depend on consent only. First, this would contradict the exceptional nature of the jurisdiction compared to the normal case of concurrent jurisdiction. Secondly, the Constitutional Court can always grant direct access in terms FC s 167(6)(a), and there is therefore no need for a wide conception of its exclusive jurisdiction.)

[4] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 57.

[5] This reasoning applies, of course, mutatis mutandis to the provincial sphere in terms of FC s 121.

[6] See Liquor Bill (supra) at para 20.

(iii) Abstract review of Acts of Parliament and provincial Acts, FC s 167(4)(c)

FC s 167(4)(c) grants the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction in applications envisaged in FC ss 80 and 122. These are applications brought by members of the National Assembly or members of provincial legislatures for an order declaring that all or part of an Act of Parliament (or provincial Act, as the case may be) is unconstitutional. The Constitutional Court's jurisdiction in such applications starts where its jurisdiction in terms of FC s 167(4)(b) ends, ie, at the moment the President signs the Bill into law. As with FC s 167(4)(b), the Court's powers under FC s 167(4)(c) are powers of abstract review in relation to a particular kind of dispute. The procedure that triggers the Court's jurisdiction is not part of FC s 167(4)(c) itself, but is regulated by the Constitution's provisions on the national and provincial legislative process.

FC s 80 provides that, within 30 days of its signing into law, one third or more of the members of the National Assembly may apply to the Constitutional Court for an order declaring 'all or part of an Act of Parliament … unconstitutional'.[1] This provision balances the parliamentary majority's interest in legislating according to its political convictions against the parliamentary minority's interest in having any constitutional concerns with regard to a statute resolved in a timely manner. Members of the National Assembly may not stop a Bill from becoming an Act since this would contradict the basic principle of majority rule. On the other hand, they are given the right to initiate a process of abstract review to test the constitutionality of a provision or entire statute. This right may be regarded as an adjunct of the general principle, articulated in FC s 57(2)(b), that the rules and orders of the National Assembly must provide for participation by minority parties.

The primary function of Parliament as the democratically elected lawmaker does not only protect it from undue outside interference, as mentioned above.[2] Ngcobo J's remarks in Doctors for Life that the business of Parliament might be paralysed if Parliament were to spend its time defending its legislative process in the courts are also relevant here, where the threat of undue influence comes from the inside.[3] This explains the relatively high proportion of members that is required for an application under FC s 80[4] and the strict 30-day time limit within which the application must be brought.[5] Parliament is required to take

[1] The following comments apply, unless otherwise indicated, mutatis mutandis to the equivalent procedure with regard to a provincial legislature in terms of FC s 122.

[2] See FC s 167(4)(b) above.

[3] Cf Doctors for Life (supra) at para 36.

[4] In the provincial sphere, the one-third requirement for the National Assembly is reduced to 20 per cent of the members of the provincial legislature (FC s 122).

[5] The National Assembly currently consists of 400 members, of which 297 are members of the ruling party, the African National Congress (74.25 %). See Electoral Institute of Southern Africa 'South Africa: National Assembly floor-crossing outcome 2007' available at (www.eisa.org.za). Thus, not even all members of the National Assembly from other parties together reach the quorum of FC s 167(4)(c). This fact explains why so far there has been not a single application to the Constitutional Court in terms of this subsection.

constitutional constraints into account when drafting Bills. Had FC s 80 allowed a small number of minority members of Parliament to challenge the constitutionality of an Act at any time after its signing into law, the application process would have been turned into a political device for the parliamentary minority to continue a fight over a statute that had been lost in the ordinary legislative process.

Interestingly, FC s 80 does not specify that only those who voted against the Bill in Parliament may apply for its consideration by the Constitutional Court under FC s 80, or only those who raised constitutional concerns about the Bill in plenary session or in committee. Neither do the applicants have to belong to a single parliamentary caucus. In contrast to the situation where the President acts under FC s 79, members of Parliament acting under FC s 80 do not interfere from outside with the legislative process. They are part of it. This explains why the President's right of referral in FC s 167(4)(b) is a matter of last resort after the failure of a fairly elaborate internal dispute resolution process, whereas members of Parliament may apply to the Constitutional Court under FC s 167(4)(c) immediately after the Bill has been signed into law, without further consideration of the matter by Parliament.

The crucial date for the start of the 30-day time limit is the date on which the President signs the Act into law, not the date on which it takes effect, which may be some time later. The fact that the Act may not be in force at the time of the application does not affect the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction to hear the matter, as held in a different context in Khosa.[1] The holding in that case was based on FC s 172(2)(a), which does not distinguish between the courts' powers to invalidate statutory provisions that have been brought into force and those which have not.[2] In Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court confirmed this holding in respect of entire statutes, on the grounds that FC s 80 and FC s 122 did not exhaust the circumstances in which Acts of Parliament that had not yet been brought into force could be challenged.[3] Indeed, there is nothing to prevent a member of the public from challenging a provision of an Act of Parliament during the 30-day window-period contemplated in FC s 80.[4]

FC s 80(3) provides for a special form of preliminary ruling in terms of which the Constitutional Court, while it is contemplating the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament under FC s 80, may order that all or part of the Act has no force. The Court may only make such an order if the interests of justice require it and the main application under FC s 80(1) has a reasonable prospect of success. Both these criteria are based on well-established principles that form part of the criteria for the granting of direct access under FC s 167(6). FC s 80(3) is nevertheless

[1] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 90.
[2] Khosa (supra) at para 91.
[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 63-64.
[4] Ibid at 63-64.

distinctive in treating the applicant's prospects of success and the interests of justice as separate criteria. Under FC s 167(6) the applicant's prospects of success form part of the interests-of-justice enquiry. This difference may be attributed to the fact that the 'prospects of success' criterion serves a special purpose under FC s 80(4) (as I discuss below). In respect of the enquiry whether an order of suspension in terms of FC s 80(3) should be granted, it has to be taken into account that Parliament has passed the Act in question and that the President has assented to it. In sum, the two organs of state responsible for legislation have already come to the conclusion that the statute is constitutionally sound. The test for purposes of FC s 80(3) should therefore be similar to that for the granting of an urgent application: namely, whether the applicant will suffer irreparable harm if the challenged provision remains in force and his or her challenge ultimately proves to be successful. The same test should apply in respect of challenges to provincial acts under FC s 122(3).

The final part of FC s 80(4) entitles the Court to order the applicant members of Parliament to pay the costs of the application in the event that it is unsuccessful and did not have a reasonable prospect of success. This subsection clearly has a punitive character. As mentioned above, even though members of Parliament are permitted to apply to the Constitutional Court for the abstract review of the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament, they may not do so simply to carry on a political dispute lost in the legislature. They may only do so in order to raise a genuine constitutional challenge to the Act. The threat of an adverse costs order is specifically mentioned so as to deter members of Parliament from making frivolous applications. The Rules of the Constitutional Court reinforce this provision by requiring applicants to support their application by providing an affidavit setting out the contentions on which they rely, including the statutory provision or provisions being challenged, the relevant provision or provisions of the Final Constitution relied upon, and the grounds upon which the respective provisions are deemed to be in conflict.[1]

On the other hand, it is in the interests of Parliament as a whole that its laws should be constitutional. If a sufficient proportion of members of the National Assembly are legitimately concerned about the constitutionality of a provision, they should not be penalized simply because the Constitutional Court ultimately upholds the provision. It is accordingly submitted that the second condition for the granting of a costs order — that the applicant should have no reasonable prospect of success — should be generously interpreted. This approach was followed in a slightly different setting by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Gauteng Provincial Legislature v Kilian & Others.[2]

Kilian was decided under the Interim Constitution, which allowed members of Parliament to challenge the constitutionality of statutes when still in Bill form,

[1] Constitutional Court Rules 15(1) and 15(4) of 2003.
[2] 2001 (2) SA 68 (SCA), 2001 (3) BCLR 253 (SCA).

with the application reaching the Constitutional Court by way of request by the Speaker of the National Assembly.[1] In such circumstances, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, applications by minority party members for the review of a statute were in the interests of the provincial legislature and its effective and efficient functioning. Indeed, such applications could be seen to be 'part and parcel of the legislative process'.[2] On the facts, the applicants had not acted in their personal capacity, and their action was not frivolous, vexatious or due to improper motives.[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal accordingly found that they should not be held liable for costs.

Under the Final Constitution this precise line of reasoning no longer applies. By the time of a challenge under FC s 80 or FC s 122, the Bill has been signed into law and the legislative process is conclusively over. Nevertheless, the basic principle that applicants who raise important issues of constitutional principle should not be penalized is still relevant. As held by Mahomed DP in Gauteng School Education Bill:

> A litigant seeking to test the constitutionality of a statute usually seeks to ventilate an important issue of constitutional principle. Such persons should not be discouraged from doing so by the risk of having to pay the costs of their adversaries, if the Court takes a view which is different from the view taken by the petitioner. This, of course, does not mean that such litigants can be completely protected from that risk. The Court, in its discretion, might direct that they pay the costs of their adversaries if, for example, the grounds of attack on the impugned statute are frivolous or vexatious or they have acted from improper motives or there are other circumstances which make it in the interest of justice to direct that such costs should be paid by the losing party.[4]

This holding should be applied mutatis mutandis to costs orders in respect of applications under FC s 80. Save for frivolous, vexatious or improperly motivated applications, applicants must generally be understood to be acting as members of the National Assembly in the interests of ensuring that the statute in question complies with the Constitution.[5] Other factors the Court may legitimately

[1] According to IC ss 98(2)(d) and 98(9), the Constitutional Court would have to decide a dispute over the constitutionality of any Bill only at the request of the Speaker of the National Assembly, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of a provincial legislature, who should make such a request to the Court upon receipt of a petition by at least one-third of all the members of the National Assembly, the Senate or the affected provincial legislature requiring him or her to do so.

[2] Kilian (supra) at para 29.

[3] Ibid at para 24.

[4] Gauteng Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 (supra) at para 36.

[5] In coming to this conclusion, I respectfully disagree with Steven Budlender. Budlender is of the opinion that applications in terms of FC s 80 should not occur at the expense of the legislature. See Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17 at § 17.5*(b)*. See also Adrian Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 6, § 6.2*(g)*(Friedman also advocates a more flexible approach than Steven Budlender.)

consider are whether the constitutional concerns raised were discussed in Parliament and whether they were supported during public hearings.[1]

(iv) Amendments to the Constitution, FC s 167(4)(d)

In terms of FC s 167(4)(d), only the Constitutional Court may review the constitutionality of an amendment to the Final Constitution.[2] Because other courts are prevented from declaring constitutional amendments invalid (neither FC s 172 nor the confirmation procedure of FC s 167(5) apply) litigants can approach the Constitutional Court directly. However, although the effect is the same, applications for access to the Court under FC s 167(4)(d) have a different basis to applications for direct access under FC s 167(6)(a). Direct access is typically granted only in exceptional circumstances because it requires the Constitutional Court to sit as a court of first and last instance in circumstances where other courts are capable of hearing the application. In applications based on FC s 167(4)(d), on the other hand, only the Constitutional Court is competent to hear the matter. Whether the Constitutional Court should be approached directly is therefore a function of the nature of the case, and in particular of whether the case consists of a linked challenge to ordinary legislation and to a constitutional amendment, or simply of a challenge to a constitutional amendment. In the former instance, it may be necessary first to approach the High Court in respect of the challenge to ordinary legislation, and then to proceed to the Constitutional Court (a) for an order confirming the High Court's order of invalidity (or appealing its failure to grant such an order) and (b) for an order of constitutional invalidity in respect of the constitutional amendment. This procedure was followed in United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (1),[3] where the applicants first initiated urgent proceedings in the High Court for review of the two pieces of ordinary legislation challenged, and then approached the Constitutional Court in respect of the legislative package (including constitutional amendments) lifting the ban on floor-crossing as a whole.

In Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others,[4] the applicants approached the Constitutional Court under FC s 167(4)(d) with regard to their challenge to the Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act and under FC s 167(6)(a) with regard to their challenge to the Cross-Boundary Municipalities Laws and Related Matters Act ('the Repeal Act').[5] In its two judgments in this case, the Constitutional Court drew a clear distinction between

[1] The Constitutional Court's ordinary test for prospects of success takes into account whether earlier court decisions were divided over the constitutional matter. This part of the test is obviously not possible here, as the Constitutional Court has exclusive jurisdiction, but it shows that the existence of differing viewpoints on a matter may give rise to an impression of reasonable prospects of success.

[2] The scope of challenges to constitutional amendments is limited. See Budlender (supra) at § 17.2*(a)* and § 17.3*(g)*.

[3] 2003 (1) SA 488 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC).

[4] 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC) (Matatiele I); 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)(Matatiele II).

[5] Act 23 of 2005. See Matatiele I (supra) at para 33.

'normal' access applications and those where litigants approach the Court on the basis of its exclusive jurisdiction. Its first judgment briefly confirmed its exclusive jurisdiction in respect of the challenge to the constitutional amendment. It did not considering issues relevant to applications for direct access, such as the interests of justice.[1] In its second judgment, the question as to whether the applicants were entitled to approach the Court directly on the issue of the validity of the Repeal Act was considered only after it had dealt with the constitutionality of the Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act.[2] The Court granted direct access because of the interrelationship between the two Acts: it would have been unreasonable for the litigants to challenge one of the legislative components of a comprehensive package in a different forum.[3] The exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in assessing a constitutional amendment therefore influences (if not determines) whether it is in the interests of justice in terms of FC s 167(6)(a) to grant access to the Court directly with a simultaneous challenge to another act of Parliament when both regulate the same subject matter.[4]

(v) Constitutional obligations of Parliament or the President, FC s 167(4)(e)

FC s 167(4)(e) is the clearest example of an area of exclusive jurisdiction based on the principle of institutional respect.[5] Given the inevitably controversial nature of such disputes, it makes sense that only the highest Court in constitutional matters should be able to decide whether 'Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation'. But what does the term 'constitutional obligation' mean in this context? It surely cannot refer to these institutions' general duty to act in conformity with the Constitution, since such an interpretation would contradict FC s 172(2)(a), which empowers the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal to make orders concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament and any conduct of the President.[6]

[1] Matatiele I (supra) at para 34.

[2] Ibid at para 14 ('Ordinarily, the issue of direct access would be considered first, before considering the merits of the constitutional challenge. However, this issue relates to the Repeal Act only and does not affect the Twelfth Amendment. It will therefore be convenient to address the constitutional validity of the Twelfth Amendment first, followed by the question whether the applicants were entitled to approach this Court directly on the issue of the validity of the Repeal Act, and if so, whether the Repeal Act is constitutionally valid.')

[3] See Matatiele II (supra) at para 105 ('Otherwise, the applicants would have been required to lodge a constitutional challenge relating to the Twelfth Amendment in this Court, which is the only court having jurisdiction in relation to the Twelfth Amendment, and lodge a separate challenge to the Repeal Act in the High Court. The result would be two applications in two different courts raising substantially the same issue.')

[4] This approach is similar to the tack taken by the Court with regard to 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'. See § 4.3*(e)* infra.

[5] See § 4.3*(b)* supra.

[6] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 16-17.

In the first SARFU judgment, the Constitutional Court, referring to the need to reconcile FC s 167(4)(e) with FC s 172(2)(a), held that not all conduct of the President amounts to a constitutional obligation for purposes of FC s 167(4)(e), and that this provision should accordingly be given a narrow meaning.[1] The Court, however, declined to define the term 'fulfil a constitutional obligation', holding that its meaning would depend on 'the facts and the precise nature of the challenges to the conduct of the President'.[2] In Doctors for Life, the Court extended this holding to the alleged failure by Parliament to fulfil a constitutional obligation.[3]

In the absence of an overarching definition, the ambit of FC s 167(4)(e) must be discerned from the cases in which this provision has been considered. The first such case after SARFU I was the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in King & Others v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control & Another.[4] In this case, the applicants challenged the validity of a statute on the grounds that Parliament had failed to fulfil its obligation in terms of FC s 59(1) to facilitate public involvement in its processes. The High Court had dismissed the claim on the grounds that there had been due compliance with this requirement. The Supreme Court of Appeal approached the matter on a different basis. Since the applicants had argued that a constitutional obligation had been breached, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, the crucial question was whether it had jurisdiction to grant an order of statutory invalidity in terms of FC s 172(2)(a), or whether the case fell to be decided exclusively by the Constitutional Court under FC s 167(4)(e).[5]

In answering this question, the Supreme Court of Appeal, like the Constitutional Court in SARFU I, did not offer a definition of 'constitutional obligation' for purposes of FC s 167(4)(e). Instead, it pointed out which constitutional provisions would not give rise to such an obligation, but nevertheless could justify the invalidation of a statute under FC 172(2)(a), if not adhered to. First, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, there are parts of the Constitution, like the Bill of Rights, which define 'the scope of Parliament's legislative authority'. Statutes that infringe these parts of the Constitution may be invalidated by the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal under FC s 172(2)(a), subject to confirmation by the Constitutional Court.[6]

Secondly, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, the Constitution imposes certain procedural or 'manner and form' requirements that must be complied with for a statute to be valid.[7] Failure to comply with these procedural requirements would also not found the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(e):

[1] SARFU I (supra) at para 25.
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 20.
[4] 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 462 (SCA).
[5] King (supra) at para 15.
[6] Ibid at para 16.
[7] Ibid at para 17.

> Procedural requirements that are prerequisites to validity do not impose obligations. This is because constitutional limitations on legislative authority generally — albeit not invariably — derive from disabilities contained in rules that qualify the way in which the Legislature may act: and it is a mistake to confuse legal limitations that arise from procedural prerequisites and from other limitations of legislative power with those that derive from the imposition of duties. . .[1]

This left, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, situations where 'Parliament so completely fails to fulfil the positive obligations the Constitution imposes on it that its purported legislative acts are invalid'.[2] Unlike a failure to comply with a manner and form provision, which was a purely 'formal question', an allegation that Parliament had failed to fulfil a positive obligation imposed on it by the Final Constitution was 'a crucial political question' of the sort that the Constitutional Court was uniquely qualified to decide.[3] As an example of this sort of obligation the Supreme Court of Appeal cited the constitutional obligation that 'Parliament function in accordance with the principles of accountability, responsiveness and openness' in FC s 1*(d).[4] The National Assembly's duty under FC s 59(1) to 'facilitate public involvement' in its processes was part of a series of provisions giving effect to FC s 1(d)*, and an allegation that Parliament had failed to comply with this duty was accordingly the kind of 'extreme' case that the Final Constitution reserved for the Constitutional Court to decide.[5]

In its decision in Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court endorsed the Supreme Court of Appeal's holding in King that disputes concerning the substantive or formal constitutional validity of a statute or conduct on the part of the President are not to be equated with disputes concerning a failure to fulfil a constitutional obligation.[6] The Constitutional Court was also generally supportive of the Supreme Court of Appeal's conclusion that the question whether Parliament has fulfilled its obligation to facilitate public involvement is a 'crucial political question' of the kind that the Constitutional Court was uniquely qualified to decide.[7] The Constitutional Court's justification for this conclusion, however, is somewhat different. The relevant distinction, Ngcobo J held, was between 'constitutional provisions that impose obligations that are readily ascertainable and are unlikely to give rise to disputes' and 'those provisions which impose the primary obligation on Parliament to determine what is required of it'.[8] Decisions in [1] King (supra) at para 17. The Supreme Court of Appeal then quotes with approval HLA Hart's distinction between 'legal duties' on the one hand and 'legal disabilities' and 'legal limits' on the other. The latter implies, not the presence of a duty, but the absence of legal power.

[2] Ibid at para 19.

[3] Ibid at paras 18 and 23.

[4] Ibid at para 19.

[5] Ibid at para 23.

[6] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 16-17. The judgment cites the duties in FC s 7(2) as an example of a (substantive) provision to which the state has to adhere, but which does not amount to a constitutional obligation in the sense of FC s 167(4)(e).

[7] Ibid at para 21.

[8] Ibid at para 25.

respect of the former type of case involve purely formal criteria, whereas a decision in respect of the second type of case 'trenches on the autonomy of Parliament to regulate its own affairs and thus the principle of separation of powers'.[1] A dispute over an alleged failure on the part of Parliament to facilitate public involvement in its affairs was a case of the second type because the relevant sections of the Constitution (FC s 59(1 and s 72(1)) do not set a readily ascertainable standard, but leave it to Parliament to determine how best to facilitate public involvement in its affairs. The most important issue for the Constitutional Court in assuming exclusive jurisdiction in Doctors for Life, in other words, was not the degree to which Parliament had failed to fulfil its positive obligations,[2] but the fact that the case required the Court to substitute its view of how Parliament should regulate its processes for that of Parliament.

The ratio of the Constitutional Court's decision in Doctors for Life is accordingly that the Constitutional Court will have exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(e) whenever the case involves a dispute over the content of the obligation imposed on Parliament or the President, in a situation where the Constitution can be understood as imposing the primary duty for developing the content of the obligation on Parliament or the President, as the case may be. This principle is obviously a fairly abstract one, and the dividing line between purely formal requirements and content-dependent requirements will need to be refined in future cases. As a general rule, however, the less specific the provisions in the Constitution are on what Parliament or the President must do, the more likely it is that the Court will assume exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(e). Such an approach is also in line with the more general idea of shared responsibilities between the Constitutional Court and the other courts (with the Supreme Court of Appeal at their helm), i e, that the Constitutional Court's function is to set abstract standards and not primarily to decide whether they have been applied.

(vi) Certification of a provincial Constitution, FC s 167(4)(f)

According to FC s 144, a provincial Constitution or an amendment to it does not become law until the Constitutional Court has certified that the provincial Constitution or amendment complies with the national Constitution.[3] Since FC s 167(4)(f) provides that only the Constitutional Court may exercise this certification function, it thus confers exclusive jurisdiction on the Court.

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 26.

[2] The Constitutional Court expressly rejects this part of the Supreme Court of Appeal's reasoning in King. See Doctors for Life (supra) at para 21, fn 16.

[3] For a more in-depth analysis, see Stu Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 21.

The certification of a provincial Constitution is a slightly odd facet of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. It requires the Court to perform an abstract review in the absence of a dispute. Admittedly, abstract review is also the subject matter of FC ss 167(4)(b) and (c). Under FC ss 167(4)(b) and (c), however, the abstract review arises out of a conflict either between the President/Premier and Parliament/provincial legislature (FC s 167(4)(b) read together with FC ss 79 and 121) or between a majority and minority of parliamentarians in the national or provincial sphere (FC s 167(4)(c) read together with FC ss 80 and 122). In assessing the constitutionality of a Bill or an Act of Parliament in these circumstances, the Constitutional Court simultaneously resolves the dispute that gave rise to the case. The certification process for a provincial Constitution does not depend on the existence of a dispute. A provincial Constitution may be hotly contested within a province, but that is not relevant to the constitutional enquiry: even if a draft Constitution enjoys unanimous support in the province, the Constitutional Court still has to certify it in order for it to become law.[1] Consequently, the purpose of this certification exercise is not dispute resolution, but simply achieving certainty in the law, i e, ensuring that a provincial Constitution complies with the national Constitution and thereby putting its constitutionality beyond doubt.[2]

The Constitutional Court must certify or decline to certify the text of a provincial Constitution in its entirety.[3] It can neither limit its 'certificate' to parts of the proposed Constitution, nor can it declare parts that are inconsistent with the national Constitution invalid. The Court may only point out where there are problems with a provision and, consequently, why it will not certify the text.

(vii) Interim relief in matters of exclusive jurisdiction

Under the Interim Constitution, any High Court (then a division of the Supreme Court) had jurisdiction to grant an interim interdict in relation to matters exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, even where such interdict or relief might have the effect of suspending (or otherwise interfering with) the application of an Act of Parliament (IC s 101(7)). The Final Constitution does not contain such a provision.

[1] This set of circumstances was reflected in the proposed Constitution of KwaZulu-Natal: while the ANC and the national government of the day objected to the draft Constitution at the Constitutional Court, the draft was passed unanimously by the KwaZulu-Natal legislature. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court correctly pointed out that this 'fact' could not in any way influence the performance of its certification function. Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) at para 12. The amended draft of the Constitution of the Western Cape was also submitted without objection. See Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Amended Text of Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC) at para 2. Similarly, the Final Constitution was supported by 87% of the Constitutional Assembly — and yet met with objections during the certification process by some of the very parties that had voted for it.

[2] Certification of the Constitution of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 11.

[3] Ibid at para 10.

At common law, a court's jurisdiction to entertain an application for interim relief depends upon whether it has jurisdiction to preserve or restore the status quo, as this is the purpose of preliminary legal protection. It does not depend on whether a court has jurisdiction to decide the main dispute.[1]

On this basis, the Constitutional Court in National Gambling Board determined that a High Court will have jurisdiction to grant interim relief in matters of exclusive jurisdiction as long as the preliminary ruling does not involve a final determination of the rights of the parties and does not affect the final determination.[2] Additionally, an applicant for such relief must rely on manifest prejudice or prejudice that is established on the facts placed before the court.[3] The jurisdiction of the High Court is independent from the form or effect of the interim interdict applied for. On the other hand, the High Court must not engage in an in-depth analysis of the contested constitutional right, but instead determine only whether the applicant has a prima facie right to the relief which is sought in the Constitutional Court.[4]

In addition to this systemic consideration, functional considerations also point towards granting jurisdiction to High Courts in matters of urgency:

> The Constitutional Court is not designed to act in matters of extreme urgency. It consists of eleven members and a quorum of the Court is eight of them. This Court is in recess for some months of each year and during those times its members disperse to their homes which, in some cases, are a considerable distance from the seat of the Court in Johannesburg … [and] it is not always possible to convene a quorum of the Court at very short notice during a recess.[5]

If it was only up to the Constitutional Court to grant interim relief in constitutional matters, even in matters of exclusive jurisdiction, there would be a great risk that a person might be left without the protection of the law.

Every category of exclusive jurisdiction has to be treated and interpreted separately to decide whether a High Court has the power to grant or refuse interim relief pending the decision of a matter exclusively within the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.[6] FC s 167(4)(a) grants exclusive jurisdiction to the Constitutional Court to decide disputes between organs of state. Provided that it does not decide the dispute, a High Court has jurisdiction to grant interim relief pending the final determination of such a dispute.[7] In contrast, FC s 167(4)(b) leaves no room for interim relief with regard to Bills. As no court may, save as provided in FC ss 79 and 121, consider the constitutionality of a bill, no court may grant interim relief either. There would in any case be no proceedings in respect of [1] Airoadexpress v LRTB, Durban 1986 (2) SA 663 (A).

[2] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 50.
[3] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) at para 33.
[4] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 52.
[5] President of the RSA v United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 30.
[6] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 51.
[7] Ibid at para 53.

which such relief would be relevant.[1] In the nature of things, a Bill referred to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality would not have been signed into law and would have no legal force. It follows that interim relief would not be necessary because no one would be left without protection of the law, as might be the case with an Act of Parliament.

The special application procedures of FC s 80 (national sphere) and FC s 122 (provincial sphere) that are referred to in FC s 167(4)(c) provide for a specific mechanism in matters of urgency (FC ss 80(3) and 122(3), respectively) that only the Constitutional Court may entertain.[2] Here, High Courts are prevented from granting interim relief.[3] In President of the RSA v United Democratic Movement, the Constitutional Court nevertheless left open the question whether a High Court could have jurisdiction to suspend an Act of Parliament — before or after publication — outside the special application procedure of FC s 80 (or FC s 122). It is conceivable that a High Court might grant such an order in exceptional cases.[4]

With regard to constitutional amendments and exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(d), the Constitutional Court has held that, although a constitutional amendment does not usually have an immediate effect on persons or their rights, in exceptional cases interim relief may be granted by a High Court to prevent serious and irreparable prejudice, provided that in doing so the court a quo does not decide on the amendment's constitutionality. However, courts should take notice where a constitutional amendment has achieved the special support required by FC s 74, and should be careful not to thwart the will of the legislature, save in extreme cases.[5]

Should ordinary legislation fall within the High Court's jurisdiction in terms of FC s 172(2), the High Court may also grant an interim order pending its own decision, or, if the legislation is found unconstitutional, pending an application for confirmation by the Constitutional Court.[6] In National Gambling Board, the Constitutional Court explicitly left undecided whether a High Court would have jurisdiction to grant interim relief in circumstances where Parliament or the President had failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation (FC s 167(4)(e)). However, there is no reason why the general rule — avoidance of a decision and preservation of the status quo — should not apply here.

In any case, interim relief should only be granted where it is strictly necessary in the interests of justice. The Constitutional Court has held that the constitutional standard of FC s 80(3) should apply in other cases — at the very least in cases of exclusive jurisdiction. In determining 'the interests of justice', the High Court has to balance the interests of the person seeking interim relief against the interests of

[1] President of the RSA v United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 26.
[2] See above at § 4.3*(b)*(iii).
[3] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 51.
[4] President of the RSA v United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 27.
[5] Ibid at paras 28-30.
[6] Ibid.

others who might be affected by the grant of such relief. Where the case involves the enactment of legislation, any interim relief should be strictly tailored so as not to interfere with the operation of that legislation. This proviso is germane to instances in which the legislation relates to a constitutional amendment.[1]

(c) Constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction explicitly mentioned in the Constitution

In all constitutional matters not falling within the Constitutional Court's exclusive jurisdiction, the Court shares concurrent jurisdiction with other courts. However, the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is not completely congruent with that of other courts. It remains a specialized court. As outlined above, the Constitutional Court is a court of limited, rather than plenary jurisdiction, as embodied in the text of FC s 167(3)(b). Therefore, the Constitutional Court may decide only constitutional matters, and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters.

The threshold question of what constitutes a 'constitutional matter' is not in play for matters of exclusive jurisdiction. The Court cannot decline jurisdiction by arguing that the matter is not 'constitutional' within the meaning of FC s 167(3). There is another subset of cases where the 'constitutional matter' enquiry is only nominally engaged. These are cases where the Final Constitution, although not granting the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction, nevertheless assigns a special task to the Court. The Court can fulfil these tasks without much consideration of the constitutional nature of the case. The first class of cases under this subset are those cases in which the Constitutional Court has to confirm an order of invalidity of an Act of Parliament made by a lower court according to FC s 167(5). In this subsection, the Constitution says in plain language that 'the Constitutional Court … must confirm any order of invalidity' (emphasis added). The Court cannot decline jurisdiction here.[2] The second class of cases are those that involve 'the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution'. Such cases are constitutional matters by reason of FC s 167(7). A term like 'interpretation' is not self-explanatory, of course. Nevertheless, to find that a matter requires the interpretation of the Final Constitution and then to draw the conclusion that it involves a constitutional matter is an exercise different from an independent finding that a case involves a constitutional matter. The former enquiry is guided by the text of FC s 167(7), while the latter is a more open-ended exercise of finding a basis for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.

[1] President of the RSA v United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 32.

[2] Cf Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 at para 16 ('A declaration of constitutional invalidity raises a constitutional matter which in the ordinary course must be considered by this Court'.)

(i) Confirmation of orders of statutory invalidity, FC s 167(5)

FC s 167(5) must be read in conjunction with FC s 172(2)(a). Together, the two provisions set the scene for the judicial review of national and provincial statutes and conduct of the President. This defining feature of a constitutional state — that all three branches of government must adhere to the Constitution (and face invalidation of their acts if they do not) — was uncontroversial throughout the negotiation of both the Interim and the Final Constitutions.[1] It is today unequivocally enshrined in the supremacy clause (FC s 2) and, specifically with regard to the Bill of Rights, in the application clause (FC s 8(1)). It has also been confirmed by the courts.[2] As an almost inevitable consequence of this principle, the Final Constitution confers on the judiciary the power to review Acts of Parliament. According to FC s 172(1)(a), '[w]hen deciding a constitutional matter within its power a court — (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency.'

This clause covers all statutory provisions enacted by Parliament. It does not extend to subordinate legislation (e g regulations and by-laws),[3] to conduct other than conduct of the President,[4] or to the common law.[5] In regard to these other forms of law and conduct, confirmation of a declaration of invalidity is not required and the High Court's finding is final — provided the parties do not appeal the case to the Constitutional Court. From the perspective of this chapter, the crucial question is which court has the power to make a (final) finding on the constitutionality of legislation.

Two features of South Africa's hybrid system determine the answer to this question: first, the fact that the task of declaring legislation invalid is not solely assigned to one court (as in the US or Germany); and, secondly, the fact that not all courts are equally competent to make a final decision, again provided that the decision is not appealed to a higher court (as in Japan).

As to the first point: not every court is competent to make orders concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament or a provincial Act. The courts that are competent to make such orders are the 'Supreme Court of Appeal, a

[1] The idea of a breaking away from the Westminster tradition of parliamentary sovereignty was a position shared or at least publicly advocated across the political spectrum in the early 1990s. See Albie Sachs Protecting Human Rights in a New South Africa (1990) 34-36; South African Law Commission Project 58: Group and Human Rights — Interim Report (1991) at para 1.31. For an even earlier view on this matter, see Marinus Wiechers 'The Fundamental Laws behind Our Constitution' in Ellison Kahn (ed) Fiat Iustitita: Essays in Honour of Oliver Deneys Schreiner (1983) 383 at 385.

[2] De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C) at para 25.

[3] See Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 11; Booysen & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC) at para 1; Minister of Home Affairs v Liebenberg 2002 (1) SA 33; 2001 (11) BCLR 1168 (CC) at para 9.

[4] See Van Rooyen & Others v State and Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 8.

[5] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 2.

High Court or a court of similar status' (FC s 172(2)(a)).[1] The Magistrates' Courts are explicitly excluded from any decision on the constitutional validity of these types of statutes (FC s 170). Courts 'of similar status' either to the Supreme Court of Appeal or to a High Court are the Labour Court (s 151(2) of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995), the Labour Appeal Court (s 167(3) of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995),[2] and the Land Claims Court (s 22(2)(a) of the Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994).[3]

As to the second point: FC s 172(2)(a) makes it clear that an order of constitutional invalidity has no force until it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court. Thus, a decision by a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal declaring an Act of Parliament or a provincial Act invalid has no force until the Constitutional Court has confirmed such an order.[4] Here, the Constitutional Court's power of [1] This enumeration is congruent with the powers of these courts in constitutional matters in general. See FC s 168(3) for the Supreme Court of Appeal and FC s 169*(a)* for the High Courts. Even if the Supreme Court of Appeal is not the highest court in constitutional matters it may nevertheless decide them.

[2] There is an ongoing dispute between the High Courts and the Labour Court with regard to their respective jurisdictions. They are especially at odds in cases where the state is the employer. See John Grogan Workplace Law (9th ed. 2007) 449-451, 455-458. This turf battle has no consequences for the powers of these courts in constitutional matters. A similar dispute on who had the final word in labour law matters between the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Labour Appeals Court was resolved in favour of the Supreme Court of Appeal in NUMSA & Others v Fry's Metal (Pty) Ltd (2005) 26 ILJ 689 (SCA). In constitutional matters, appeals from the Labour Appeals Court must generally first go to the Supreme Court of Appeal. See NEHAWU (supra) at paras 20-22.

[3] Thus far, no order of constitutional invalidity has been made by any court other than a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[4] Under the Interim Constitution, only the Constitutional Court had jurisdiction over 'any enquiry into the constitutionality of any law, including an Act of Parliament' and no other court could make orders of statutory invalidity (IC ss 98(2)(c) and 98(3)). Under the Interim Constitution, the Constitutional Court was placed on the same hierarchical level as the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court and neither court could hear appeals from the other. When a local or provincial division of the Supreme Court held that a finding on the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament may be decisive for the case, it had to refer the matter in a complicated way to the Constitutional Court (IC s 102(1). A similar procedure had to be followed by Magistrates' Courts (IC ss 103(3) and 103(4)). In essence, the procedures prescribed in the Interim Constitution contemplated that enquiries into the validity of Acts of Parliament should be raised formally in proceedings before the Supreme Court of Appeal or other courts. They were only to be referred to the Constitutional Court for its decision in circumstances where it would be appropriate to do so according to a decision by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, thus, could not make any decision with regard to Acts of Parliament, but acted as a gatekeeper to the Constitutional Court. It had to ensure that the hearing of cases was not disrupted by unnecessary applications to refer issues to the Constitutional Court. Cases were only referred after all the evidence necessary for such a decision had been placed on record so that the determination of a constitutional issue could be deemed decisive. After the amendment of the Interim Constitution in 1995 (IC s 101(7) added by s 3 of Act 44 of 1995), interim relief could be granted by the Supreme Court. Because of the complicated referral procedure, the Constitutional Court explained the correct approach in a number of cases: S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC); Luitingh v Minister of Defence 1996 (2) SA 909 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 581 (CC); Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC). It is most likely that the intricate referral procedure under the Interim Constitution was one of the reasons for changing the system in the Final Constitution to the current scheme where only an affirmative decision by a High Court that a statute is invalid has to be referred to the Constitutional Court. Other advantages of this procedure are that the High Courts may feel a greater responsibility for declarations of invalidity and that the Constitutional Court has the advantage of another court's view on the matter.

review is nearly exclusive, i e, it has the final word in any decision on statutory invalidity. This superior role follows from the purpose of FC s 172(2)(a), and, by extension, FC s 167(5):

> [The Constitutional Court] has exclusive jurisdiction in respect of certain constitutional matters, and makes the final decision on those constitutional matters that are also within the jurisdiction of other courts. This is the context within which section 172(2)(a) . . . is concerned with the law making acts of the legislatures at the two highest levels [national and provincial], and the conduct of the President, who as head of state and head of the executive is the highest functionary within the state. . . . The apparent purpose of the section is to ensure that this Court, as the highest court in constitutional matters, should control declarations of constitutional invalidity made against the highest organs of state.[1]

This statement's emphasis on separation of powers is consistent with the Constitutional Court's understanding of FC s 167(4). Additionally, the Court's position that its superior role is constitutionally warranted by 'comity' towards the other branches of government has been emphasized, first with regard to FC s 172(2), and later with regard to exclusive jurisdiction in the strict sense.[2]

Rule 16 of the Constitutional Court Rules sets out the procedural requirements for a referral to confirm an order of constitutional invalidity of a statute.[3] Although the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is triggered by an order of constitutional invalidity, in many cases parties themselves have applied to the Constitutional Court for a confirmation order.[4] As Kate Hofmeyer points out, an application is not necessary as the Constitutional Court receives the case 'automatically' (and will confirm or decline to confirm in due course). However, such a redundant procedure is permitted by FC s 172(2)(d) and can be strategically employed by parties to avoid a delay in the final decision caused, for example, by the other party's appealing to the Supreme Court of Appeal.[5]

(ii) Interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution, FC s 167(7)

FC s 167(7) offers a hint of what the Constitutional Assembly might have intended when it decided that the Constitutional Court should be a court with

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 55-56.

[2] See § 4.2*(c)* supra.

[3] See, further, Kate Hofmeyer 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5, § 5.2*(c)*.

[4] See Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC) at para 14 (Constitutional Court pointed out that in these circumstances an application to the Constitutional Court does not require leave of the court making the declaration or the Constitutional Court itself.) But see President Ordinary Court Martial & Others v Freedom of Expression Institute and Others 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC) at para 16 (Where a provision declared invalid by a High Court has subsequently been repealed by an Act of Parliament, the Constitutional Court has a discretion to decide whether or not it should deal with the matter.)

[5] Hofmeyer (supra) at § 5.2*(c)*.

jurisdiction limited to 'constitutional matters'. FC s 167(7) is the only subsection that offers something like an explanation of what makes up 'constitutional matters' and gives both the Constitutional Court and the legal community at large some indication of how to distinguish constitutional from non-constitutional matters.[1] One has to keep in mind that under the Interim Constitution the entire jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court was defined through this legal triad (of interpretation, protection and enforcement).[2] Under that Constitution, the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction was triggered by 'matter[s] relating to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of [the Interim] Constitution', which encompassed all sorts of disputes and enquiries (some of them within the Court's exclusive jurisdiction), rather than the presence of a 'constitutional matter.'

It seems that the Constitutional Assembly believed that the phrase 'interpretation, protection and enforcement' might be too narrow and thus replaced it with 'constitutional matter'. At the same time, however, the Constitutional Assembly apparently did not want to drop this phrase altogether. Instead, it altered it from a term that comprehensively defined the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction to one that defined a group of related cases falling under the overall jurisdiction of the Court. The consequence of this revision is that, today, both the courts and legal scholars focus entirely on whether a case presents a 'constitutional matter', while FC s 167(7) enjoys no prominence (even to the extent of being misquoted by the Constitutional Court).[3]

Its origins notwithstanding, FC s 167(7) on its own has an indeterminate scope. It states that 'a constitutional matter includes any issue involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution' (emphasis added). This phraseology implies that, at least conceptually, there may be a constitutional

[1] It has also been argued that FC s 167(7) serves to emphasize the supremacy of the Final Constitution by pronouncements of the Constitutional Court in the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the Final Constitution, in particular with regard to the Bill of Rights. See De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C) at para 34.

[2] IC s 98(2) of the Interim Constitution provided:

The Constitutional Court shall have jurisdiction in the Republic as the court of final instance over all matters relating to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of this Constitution, including —

(a) any alleged violation or threatened violation of any fundamental right entrenched in Chapter 3;
(b) any dispute over the constitutionality of any executive or administrative act or conduct or threatened executive or administrative act or conduct of any organ of state;
(c) any enquiry into the constitutionality of any law, including an Act of Parliament, irrespective of whether such law was passed or made before or after the commencement of this Constitution;
(d) any dispute over the constitutionality of any Bill before Parliament or a provincial legislature, subject to subsection (9);
(e) any dispute of a constitutional nature between organs of state at any level of government;
(f) the determination of questions whether any matter falls within its jurisdiction; and
(g) the determination of any other matters as may be entrusted to it by this Constitution or any other law.

[3] The Constitutional Court has misquoted FC s 167(7) in two cases. See Boesak (supra) at para 14; Fraser (supra) at para 38. See § 4.3*(a)*(ii) and (iii) supra.

matter that does not involve the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution. Still, FC s 167(7) serves the very important purpose of guaranteeing at least a minimum standard for identifying cases that the Constitutional Court must deal with. Any enquiry by the Constitutional Court into whether it should assume or decline jurisdiction should therefore start with an enquiry into whether there is an issue in the case that involves the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution. If this question is answered in the affirmative, it is strictly speaking unnecessary to embark on a free-floating consideration of the constitutional nature of the case.

As we have seen, FC s 167(7) stipulates that constitutional matters include any 'issue' involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution. It is unlikely, however, that the distinction between 'matter' and 'issue' will prove significant: a constitutional 'matter' can be understood as the entire case, while an 'issue' is limited to one aspect of the case. This is simply an acknowledgment that legal disputes usually contain a bundle of different questions, factual and legal, all of them 'issues' for decision by a competent court. Against this background, FC s 167(7) provides that only one aspect of a case need involve the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution to trigger the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. Such a reading is consistent with the distinction between constitutional matters and 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters' in FC s 167(3)(b). The Constitutional Court may also decide other issues, which do not involve the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution and are — at least prima facie — not constitutional matters, if they are sufficiently connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.[1]

Splitting up FC 167(2) into its constituent parts, a constitutional matter is present, first, whenever there is an issue that involves the 'interpretation' of the Final Constitution. Much has been written on the interpretation of the Final Constitution in general and on the Bill of Rights in particular.[2] However, the purpose of this literature is predominantly to show how the Final Constitution should be interpreted. The Constitutional Court has on numerous occasions, beginning with its first decision, elaborated how it approaches the interpretation of the Final Constitution and what it takes into account when doing so.[3] All very important considerations — no doubt — but for the Constitutional Court to assume jurisdiction in terms of FC s 167(7), it is necessary to determine when it is interpreting the Final Constitution, not how it interprets it. One has to go a step back, so to speak.

[1] See § 4.3*(e)* infra.

[2] See Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[3] See, eg, S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 17 (On purposive interpretation and its limits); Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at paras 59-64 (Reading down of statutes); Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others; Matiso v The Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 11 (Interpretation to promote values of the Bill of Rights applies to both the fundamental right and the evaluation of any limitation according to the criteria of the limitation clause).

A court interprets the Final Constitution when it gives meaning to one or more of its provisions. Interpretation involves the understanding, exposition, and application of a text in order to ascertain and give effect to the intention of its author.[1] While this is true across disciplines, in the legal field interpretation has a more specific purpose: to determine whether a specific situation falls within the scope of a provision, and whether a case is covered by a particular legal norm. The interpretation of a statute requires a norm to be transposed into a concrete situation.[2] Ultimately, courts are asked to interpret a legal provision, such as a clause in the Final Constitution, in order to establish whether law or conduct is inconsistent with that provision.[3] A matter, therefore, involves the 'interpretation' of the Final Constitution under FC s 167(7) when meaning must be given to one or more provisions of the Final Constitution (or to the Final Constitution as a whole) in order to determine the constitutionality of law or conduct.

Next, it is necessary to ask when a court 'protects' the Final Constitution and thus entertains a 'constitutional matter' in the second sense mentioned in FC s 167(7). One possible understanding of the term 'protection' may be found in FC s 7(2), the opening section of the Bill of Rights, which stipulates that the state must 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights'. However, the meaning of the different obligations FC s 7(2) imposes on the state is all but clear. The Constitutional Court usually does not distinguish between them, but rather uses them conjunctively to define the state's obligations in terms of the Bill of Rights.[4] In academic writing, it has been suggested that the phrase 'protect' in FC s 7(2) refers to the state's positive duty to give effect to the Bill of Rights.[5] If such a positive duty can be established, any nonfeasance has the same legal quality as the abuse of state power: both would be infringements of the Final Constitution.[6]

The problem with such an approach to FC s 167(7) is that it is difficult to imagine why the Constitutional Court should only have jurisdiction when the state has failed to perform a particular positive obligation in the Bill of Rights. Why

[1] Lourens du Plessis & Hugh Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 61.

[2] Lourens du Plessis & Hugh Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 89; IG Rautenbach General Provisions of the South African Bill of Rights (1995) 17-18.

[3] Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 145.

[4] See, eg, Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 57.

[5] See Lourens du Plessis 'The Bill of Rights in the Working Draft of the New Constitution — An Evaluation of Aspects of a Constitutional Text Sui Generis' (1996) 7 Stell LR 3. 8.

[6] Such a case could involve socio-economic rights where the state has to take (reasonable) positive measures to achieve their progressive realization. See Grootboom v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 38; Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC) at para 39.

would the Final Constitution exclude the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court when a right needs to be, say, respected or fulfilled? Additionally, 'protection' may very well include the obligation not to infringe the Final Constitution in a negative way. It is much more likely that the word 'protection' in FC s 167(7) was carried over from the Interim Constitution without the intention of confining it to the same meaning as 'protect' in FC s 7(2). It is submitted, therefore, that 'protection' in FC s 167(7) refers to cases where the safeguarding of the Final Constitution is at stake, regardless of whether negative or positive duties are implicated.

Finally, the 'enforcement' of the Final Constitution is an issue that is in some way incidental to its interpretation and protection. Enforcement overlaps partly with protection, as effective protection demands the enforcement of a legal provision. However, both interpretation and protection require a court to pronounce on what the Final Constitution says with regard to a specific situation. They involve inquiries into the meaning of the Final Constitution. 'Enforcement', on the other hand, is less concerned with the meaning of the constitutional text and more concerned with its practical implementation in the form of remedies. To fall within the meaning of 'enforcement', one would have to establish, first, that the Final Constitution demands certain (positive or negative) conduct from the state or an individual. Second, one would need to establish guidelines for effective compliance. Thus, a case would involve a constitutional matter according to FC s 167(7) if it involves an order that gives effect to the Final Constitution.

Of course, these definitions of 'interpretation', 'protection' and 'enforcement' are not meant to create discrete categories. One may argue that every process of 'interpreting' the Final Constitution also requires its 'protection', and vice versa. The point is not that these categories are mutually exclusive; the differences between them are merely matters of emphasis. The categories of FC s 167(7) may overlap, but they were all included in this subsection to emphasize the different ways by which the Final Constitution may be implicated.

Having said that, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that every single one of the over 300 cases the Constitutional Court has thus far decided could be classified as involving either the 'interpretation', the 'protection' or the 'enforcement' of the Final Constitution. From this perspective, it is not obvious that there really is any room for constitutional matters outside of FC s 167(7). How, for example, could a court make a finding on the constitutionality of a Bill, an Act of Parliament, or even an amendment to the Final Constitution without interpreting the Final Constitution? Likewise, disputes between organs of state concerning their constitutional status, powers or functions will always demand some interpretation of the Final Constitution. Is a decision whether an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President is constitutional at all possible without at least an implicit evaluation of what the constitutional text demands in the situation? The term 'constitutional matter' does not seem to include more than what is already envisaged in FC s 167(7). To this extent, the framers of the Interim Constitution appear to have been quite forward-looking in their approach to the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.

This being so, the next question is whether FC s 167(7) provides only retrospective justification for the assumption of jurisdiction in cases the Constitutional Court has already decided, or whether it can also help us to understand how the Court should decided future cases. Is it possible to use FC s 167(7) to decide that a case does not involve the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution, and therefore that the Court should not assume jurisdiction? Not in such a simple way. As argued below, the subsection is indeed capable of limiting the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, but this requires a specific functionalist understanding of the Court's jurisdiction and a specific definitional approach to FC s 167(7).[1] Before elaborating on this point, it is necessary to review the cases in which the Constitutional Court has assumed jurisdiction without express reliance on FC ss 167(4), 167(5) or 167(7), and also those cases where it has held that no constitutional matter is present.

(d) Other constitutional matters of concurrent jurisdiction

Thus far, the constitutional matters discussed have all been linked to FC ss 167(4), 167(5) or 167(7). In addition to cases in which its jurisdiction has been founded on these provisions, the Constitutional Court has held that it has jurisdiction in a number of other cases, all of which involve 'constitutional matters' in terms of FC s 167(3)(b). These cases can be grouped into several broad categories, all of which help to understand the Court's approach to its jurisdiction.

(i) Interpretation of legislation and development of the common law or customary law in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, FC s 39(2)

FC s 39(2) imposes duties on the judiciary in the normal process of adjudication. In a nutshell, courts have to take the Bill of Rights into account whatever they do.[2] This section requires the courts to live up to a constitutional standard when they interpret statutory provisions or develop the common law or customary law. The context in which FC s 39(2) applies is not the interpretation or application of the Final Constitution itself, but solely the application, interpretation and development of the ordinary law. The Final Constitution is not relevant in these cases because it is invoked directly. In fact, neither of the parties may have relied on the Final Constitution for their claim. Rather, the Final Constitution is relevant because it influences the ordinary law.

[1] See § 4.3*(b)*(ii) infra.

[2] For a detailed analysis of what FC s 39(2) requires the courts to do, see Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31, § 31.4*(e)*.

FC s 39(2) is not merely a directive for courts to develop the common law and interpret legislation. Courts do this in any event. Instead, this section sets the standard according to which the common law needs to be developed and legislation interpreted. In short, FC s 39(2) imposes an obligation on every court, tribunal or forum to ensure that the ordinary law evolves in a specific direction, ie, in accordance with the Final Constitution. In Carmichele, the Constitutional Court stated:

> [I]t is implicit in section 39(2) read with section 173 that where the common law as it stands is deficient in promoting the section 39(2) objectives, the courts are under a general obligation to develop it appropriately.[1]

FC s 39(2) sets the same standard for the interpretation of legislation. Consequently, the Constitutional Court has followed a similar approach to statutory interpretation as it has to the development of the common law. Just as every court must apply the common law within the framework of the Final Constitution, every court has a duty to interpret statutes through 'the prism of the Bill of Rights'.[2] The obligations are the same:

> [The Constitutional Court has held] that the obligation of courts to develop the common law, in the context of the section 39(2) objectives, is not purely discretionary but that the courts are under a general obligation to develop the common law appropriately where it is deficient, as it stands, in promoting the section 39(2) objectives. There is a like obligation on the courts, when interpreting any legislation … to promote those objectives.[3]

A constitutional matter arises where a court, tribunal or forum fails to interpret legislation or fails to develop the common law consistent with this constitutional standard. The obligation is both process- and outcome-based. As Frank Michelman rightly points out, the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction here derives from its oversight function in steering the course of the common law (and statutory law) in the direction mandated by the Final Constitution.[4] In this regard, it is not only FC s 39(2), but also provisions such as FC ss 8(3) and 173 (which guarantee the inherent power of, among others, the Constitutional Court to develop the common law) that take this steering function into account.

In pursuit of its oversight function, the Constitutional Court has allowed a significant number of cases to trigger its jurisdiction based on FC s 39(2). Although the Court has held that the obligations of FC s 39(2) are the same for both common and statutory law, it has nevertheless approached cases involving the common law differently from those involving only legislation.

---

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 39 (emphasis added).

[2] The Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others; In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 21.

[3] First National Bank (FNB) of SA t/a Wesbank v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Services & Another; First National Bank of SA t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 31 and quoted with approval in Fraser (supra) at para 43.

[4] Michelman (supra) at § 11.2*(a)*.

(aa) Cases involving the common law

Not every case that involves the common law is automatically deemed to be a constitutional matter. Generally speaking, the Constitutional Court distinguishes between different challenges to the common law. Only some give rise to a constitutional matter.

First, similar to a challenge to statutory provisions, an applicant may challenge the constitutionality of a particular common-law rule. The Constitutional Court has held that the question of whether a distinct common-law rule is in conflict with the Final Constitution is indeed a constitutional matter which should properly be determined by the Court and that it, therefore, 'is entitled to decide' such a question.[1]

Secondly, in S v Boesak, the Constitutional Court made clear that a court's failure to develop a common-law rule consistent with its obligation under FC s 39(2), or with some other right or principle of the Final Constitution, may give rise to a constitutional matter.[2] The Constitutional Court, however, has been careful to distinguish between the development of a common-law rule and its mere application in cases where there is no advancement of that rule. In one of its earlier cases, the Court clearly stated that the application of an ordinary common-law principle would generally not raise a constitutional matter:

> What the correct application of the [common law principle of stare decisis] should have been in the proceedings … is, however, not a 'constitutional issue' which falls within the jurisdiction of this Court, in terms of the Constitution. The Supreme Court had jurisdiction to determine that question. It is simply the proper interpretation of a common law principle. It is not an issue which can properly be referred to this Court.[3]

In this passage, the Court draws a distinction between the review of a common-law rule, the application or interpretation of that rule, and the question of whether the rule needs to be developed. This distinction is also apparent in Phoebus Apollo Aviation:

> It is not suggested that in determining the question of vicarious liability the Supreme Court of Appeal applied any principle which is inconsistent with the Constitution. Nor is there any suggestion that any such principle needs to be adapted or evolved to bring it into harmony with the spirit, purport or objects of the Bill of Rights. On the contrary, counsel for the appellant expressly conceded that the common law test for vicarious liability, as it stands, is consistent with the Constitution. … The thrust of the argument presented on behalf of the appellant was essentially that though the Supreme Court of Appeal has set the correct test, it had applied that test incorrectly — which is of course not ordinarily a constitutional issue. … It is not for [the Constitutional Court] to agree or disagree with the manner in which the SCA applied a constitutionally acceptable common law test to the facts of the present case.[4]

[1] Shabalala & Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal, & Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC) at para 9.
[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15*(b)*.
[3] Shabalala (supra) at para 8.
[4] Phoebus Apollo Aviation (supra) at para 9.

Thus, FC s 39(2) may be invoked either when a common-law rule as it stands is inconsistent with the Bill of Rights or when it needs to be adapted or evolved to conform with the Final Constitution. It is important to note, however, that the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is triggered because the common law purportedly needs to be developed — not because this is in fact demanded by the Final Constitution, as this is a question going to the merits of the case. On this basis, the Court has assumed jurisdiction even when it later decided that the Final Constitution did not require development of the common-law rule at issue.[1]

In other cases, however, this neat distinction between the development and application of the common law has not been followed by the Constitutional Court. In some instances, even the application of a legal rule may constitute a constitutional matter. In Boesak, the Court recognized the possibility, without citing an example, that the application of a rule could be inconsistent with some right or principle in the Final Constitution.[2] Not every application of a common-law rule raises a constitutional matter, but cases may exist in which even the simple application of a common-law rule (that is itself consistent with the Final Constitution) triggers constitutional jurisdiction. The case that best illustrates such a possibility is K v Minister of Safety and Security.[3] In K, the Constitutional Court found that a common-law rule may have a 'policy-laden character' and that it may be 'imbued with social policy and normative content'.[4] Therefore, the Court concluded, both the rule and its application need to be developed to accord more fully with the spirit, purport and objects of the Final Constitution.[5]

In the abstract, it is sound to hold that the application of policy-laden common-law rules has a constitutional dimension and is therefore subject to constitutional scrutiny. South African courts have long held that common-law rules include concepts that are open to policy considerations — such as 'public policy', 'boni mores' or 'reasonableness' — and courts have used these notions of fairness and justice to influence the formal structure of the law.[6] Courts could, in shaping the legal order, account for changing social attitudes without changing the structure of the existing common law by invoking such principles as 'contemporary boni mores and the general sense of justice of the community'.[7] With the enactment of the Interim Constitution, the new Bill of Rights became the predominant

[1] Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC).
[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15.
[3] 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC).
[4] K (supra) at para 22.
[5] Ibid at para 23 (emphasis added).
[6] See Eastwood v Shepstone 1902 TS 294; Jajbhay v Cassim 1939 AD 537; Magna Alloys and Research SA (Pty) Ltd v Ellis 1984 (4) SA 874 (A); Sasfin (Pty) Ltd. v Beukes 1989 (1) SA 1 (A); National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA) 1204; Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accident Fund 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA) at para 21.
[7] Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd v Sage Holdings Ltd 1993 (2) SA 451 (A) at 462G (my emphasis).

guiding force for these open concepts.[1] Ackermann J's judgment in Du Plessis v De Klerk[2] emphasized this function of the Bill of Rights:

> [T]he law can deal effectively with these challenges [of private discrimination] through the very process envisaged by section 35(3) [of the Interim Constitution], namely, the indirect radiating effect of the Chapter 3 rights on the post constitutional development in the common law and statute law of concepts such as public policy, the boni mores, unlawfulness, reasonableness, fairness and the like. . .. The common law of this country has, in the past, proved to be flexible and adaptable, and I am confident that it can also meet this new constitutional mandate.[3]

The correlation between the Final Constitution and the common law (with its inherent notions of policy and open clauses) has become an accepted feature of South African Law.[4] As Davis J puts it:

> Like the concept of boni mores in our law of delict, the concept of good faith is shaped by the legal convictions of the community. While Roman-Dutch law may well supply the conceptual apparatus for our law, the content with which concepts are filled depends on an examination of the legal conviction of the community . . . In short, the constitutional State which was introduced in 1994 mandates that all law should be congruent with the fundamental values of the Constitution. . . . In accordance with its constitutional mandate the courts of our constitutional community can employ the concept of boni mores to infuse our law of contract with this concept of bona fides.[5]

The problem with the Constitutional Court's decision in K is not the rationale of the finding but the inconsistency with which it treats the common-law rule at issue. The Court held that the rule (or rather set of rules in this case) on vicarious liability was so imbued with social policy that even its application raised a constitutional matter. Yet, in Phoebus Apollo Aviation, which involved the very same set of common-law rules, the Court declined jurisdiction. In K, the question as to whether an employer should be held vicariously liable for unlawful acts by its employees is treated as a policy issue that necessarily has a constitutional dimension whereas in Phoebus Apollo this question is treated as a mere application of an acceptable common-law test in which no constitutional issue is raised. No wonder the notion that there is any legally-relevant distinction between these two cases has been described as tenuous at best.[6]

[1] Cf JA Ferreira & GM Robinson 'Reflections on the Boni Mores in the Light of Chapter Three of the 1993 Constitution' (1997) 60 THRHR 303, 307.

[2] 1996 (3) SA 850, 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC).

[3] Du Plessis v De Klerk (supra) at para 110.

[4] See, eg, Carmichele (supra) at paras 54-56; Steenkamp v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC) at para 41; Phumelela Gaming and Leisure Ltd v Gründlingh & Others 2007 (6) SA 350 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 31; Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA) at para 17.

[5] Mort NO v Henry Shields-Chiat 2001 (1) SA 464, 474J and 475F and cited with approval by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 at para 69 and by the Constitutional Court in Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC) at para 140 (per Sachs J).

[6] See Carole Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509, 518.

In K, the Constitutional Court tried to justify its decision by referring to the fact that in Phoebus Apollo Aviation the applicant had not argued that the common-law rule of vicarious liability needed reconsideration. In K, by contrast, the applicant had claimed that the common law should be developed so as to vindicate its constitutional rights.[1] In K, therefore, the 'sharp issue of the constitutionality of the common-law rule' was in issue.[2] This distinction, however, is not convincing: if 'courts are under a general obligation to develop the common law appropriately where it is deficient, as it stands, in promoting the section 39(2) objectives'[3] why should it be an applicant's responsibility to draw the court's attention to the possibility of a deficiency and the need for development? Instead, every court, tribunal or forum has to assess on its own whether a common-law rule that is put in issue and that does not support the claim (or the defence) needs to be developed according to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[4] Indeed, the Constitutional Court has held that all courts operate under such an obligation.

Assuming the Constitutional Court decides to stick to its current approach, advocates who wish the Constitutional Court to hear their client's case would be well advised to argue that the application of the common-law rule in question involves a policy question informed by the values of the Final Constitution and that, in any case, the common law is never just applied but always developed.[5]

---

[1] K (supra) at para 14.

[2] Ibid at para 20. However, the constitutionality of the common law rule was not at issue. At no time does the Court genuinely test the common-law principle of vicarious liability against the Final Constitution, neither does it contemplate declaring it unconstitutional. Instead, the judgment is at pains to show that the common-law principle can perfectly accommodate the demands of the Bill of Rights. See K (supra) at para 44:

> The objective element of the test [of vicarious liability in case of an intentional wrongful act of an employee] which relates to the connection between the deviant conduct and the employment, approached with the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution in mind, is sufficiently flexible to incorporate not only constitutional norms, but other norms as well. It requires a court when applying it to articulate its reasoning for its conclusions as to whether there is a sufficient connection between the wrongful conduct and the employment or not. Thus developed, by the explicit recognition of the normative content of the objective stage of the test, its application should not offend the Bill of Rights or be at odds with our constitutional order.

This quote shows that the Court does not test the constitutionality of the principle. What it does, in fact, is indirect application of the Constittion through the interpretation of an open-ended phrase ('sufficient connection'), similar to the interpretation of phrases like 'boni mores' or 'wrongfulness'. In the words of the Constitutional Court, one has to look 'at the principle of vicarious liability through the prism of section 39(2) of the Constitution'. Ibid at para 22.

[3] First National Bank (FNB) of SA t/a Wesbank v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Services & Another; First National Bank of SA t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 31. See Carmichele (supra) at para 39.

[4] Cf Phumelela (supra) at para 27 ('A court is required to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights when interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law. In this no court has a discretion' (my emphasis).)

[5] A beautiful example is Phumelela. In the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal the applicant relied entirely on the law of delict, viz the delict of unlawful competition. When it appealed to the Constitutional Court it realized that it had to bring in the Final Constitution to make the case a constitutional matter. It thus started to argue that the Supreme Court of Appeal had failed to determine the wrongfulness of the conduct of the defendants by reference to FC s 39(2). It was submitted that, had the Supreme Court of Appeal developed the common law as it ought to have, it would have recognized the applicant's claim as a constitutionally protected interest (in this case in terms of the property clause).

This approach was followed in the third case that came before the Constitutional Court involving the common-law rules relating to vicarious liability: Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters.[1] In this case, an off-duty policeman had shot and wounded several people he suspected of robbing his house. The Minister, faced with a claim for civil liability, asked for a variation of the test formulated in K to exclude police officers who were not on duty when they committed an offence. The Court rejected this submission and confirmed its holding in K. In so doing, it had little difficulty in assuming jurisdiction on the basis that the Minister had sought the development of the common law of vicarious liability under FC s 39(2) and thereby 'forced the Court to consider constitutional rights or values'.[2]

In other cases, the Constitutional Court has stated that it will leave the primary task of common-law development to the Supreme Court of Appeal.[3] Even when an applicant asserts that the common-law rule in question requires reconsideration in the light of the Final Constitution, such arguments must first be placed before the Supreme Court of Appeal before being raised in the Constitutional Court.[4] On the other hand, the Court has stated that, because all courts are under a duty to consider the Bill of Rights, even where the parties have not referred to it, a party's failure to raise a FC s 39(2) argument in the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal does not necessarily bar that party from accessing the Constitutional Court.[5] The Constitutional Court's statements about common-law development being the primary task of the Supreme Court of Appeal must therefore be treated with caution: the mere attribution of primary responsibility to the Supreme Court of Appeal does not alter the scope of the jurisdiction that the Constitutional Court reserves for itself. The net has been cast wide, and the only possible conclusion is that every application of the common law is potentially subject to appeal to the Constitutional Court.[6]

(bb) Cases involving legislation

Where legislation is directly challenged as being in violation of the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is founded on FC ss 167(5) and

[1] 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC).

[2] Luiters (supra) at para 23. The Court did, however, reject jurisdiction on the first element of the K test — whether the policeman intended to act in the course and scope of employment — because this was a purely factual matter. Ibid at paras 14 and 28.

[3] Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accident Fund 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC) at para 33 ('The Supreme Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to develop the common law in all matters including constitutional matters. Because of the breadth of its jurisdiction and its expertise in the common law, its views as to whether the common law should or should not be developed in a 'constitutional matter' are of particular importance.')

[4] S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC) at para 7.

[5] Phumelela (supra) at para 26.

[6] Here I agree with Stu Woolman's conclusion that a sword of Damocles has been placed over High Courts and the SCA. Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31, § 31.4*(e)*(ii)(bb).

172(2)(a).[1] Where no direct challenge is made, the Court's jurisdiction may be founded on FC s 39(2). As the Constitutional Court put it in NEHAWU:

> In relation to a statute a constitutional matter may arise either because the constitutionality of its interpretation or its application is in issue or because the constitutionality of the statute itself is in issue. A challenge to the manner in which the statute has been interpreted or applied does not require the litigant to challenge the constitutionality of the provision the construction of which is in issue.[2]

The Court's jurisdiction, in other words, is not limited to explicit challenges. If the issues in an application concern the interpretation of legislation in conformity with the Final Constitution, the case will involve a constitutional matter.[3] Because the interpretation of legislation in accordance with the Final Constitution is an obligation of every court, tribunal or forum, the Constitutional Court may found its jurisdiction on points of statutory interpretation raised by the courts mero motu. However, in most cases, the applicant will explicitly ask the Constitutional Court to review the interpretation of the statutory provision that was adopted by the lower court.

The interpretation of legislation in conformity with the Final Constitution lay at the heart of the Fraser. In Fraser, the applicant challenged a Supreme Court of Appeal ruling preventing him from accessing certain frozen assets in terms of s 26 of the Prevention of Organized Crime Act 121 of 1998 ('the POCA'). The Fraser Court held:

> The question raised by this application is whether the Supreme Court of Appeal's interpretation of section 26 [of the POCA] has failed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights in terms of section 39(2) [of the Constitution]. This differs from an attack on an allegedly wrong factual finding or incorrect interpretation or application of the law, as in the cases referred to earlier. . . . A constitutional matter has thus been raised, and this Court accordingly has jurisdiction to hear the matter.[4]

The Fraser Court then went on to state some additional reasons in support of its competence to provide guidance on the interpretation of the POCA — not just the section relevant to the case but the whole statute. Though the POCA serves a legitimate purpose, the Court held, it could have potentially far-reaching and abusive effects, if not interpreted and applied in accordance with the rights and [1] There have been 'borderline cases' where a statutory provision has been challenged on the ground that it was, on a proper interpretation, in violation of the Final Constitution (jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 172(2)). However, the Constitutional Court (by a majority) held that the statute was not invalid as it was indeed open to an interpretation that brought the challenged wording in line with the Final Constitution (jurisdiction in terms of FC s 39(2)). See, eg, Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC).

[2] NEHAWU (supra) at para 15.

[3] S v Shaik & Others 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 83.

[4] Fraser (supra) at para 47.

values protected in the Constitution. Moreover, it was (then) relatively new on the statute book, and thus there was not an abundance of jurisprudence to enlighten and guide its interpretation and application.[1]

The Constitutional Court's understanding of FC s 39(2) as a yardstick for constitutionally appropriate statutory interpretation or application, and common-law interpretation, application or development, has made such exercises constitutional matters in terms of FC s 167(3)(b) and has considerably expanded its jurisdiction. In addition to these cases, the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction in respect of the interpretation of legislation is also triggered when a court, in interpreting legislation, fails to have due regard to the demands of international law in terms of FC s 233.[2]

(ii) Exercise of public power and administrative action

An important function of every Final Constitution is the restraint of executive and administrative power. Not only law, but also conduct may be challenged under the Final Constitution. In contrast to the legislature, the executive organs of state are not bound only by the Final Constitution. They are also bound by the ordinary law of the land, either in its statutory or in its common-law form. This is a central aspect of the doctrine of legality, which in itself is part of the rule of law.[3]

For purposes of this chapter, it is necessary to ask whether there is a difference between constraints on executive and administrative action by way of common law or statutory law, and constraints imposed directly by the Final Constitution. Is a constitutional matter raised only when there is a specific constitutional constraint on executive or administrative action or also where the constraint is based on the common law or a statute? The Constitutional Court has given a clear answer to this question. According to it, there are not two yardsticks for measuring the conduct of the executive and the administration, but only one — the Final Constitution. Consequently, it is the task of the judiciary to establish that all executive and administrative action complies both with the ordinary law and the Final Constitution. And it is the function of the Constitutional Court to ensure that the constitutional requirements in this regard have been duly observed, which, in turn, makes the review of any exercise of public power a constitutional matter in terms of FC s 167(3)(b).

[1] Fraser (supra) at para 46.

[2] S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC) at para 100.

[3] The principle of legal supremacy has been recognized in English law since medieval times. See William Searle Holdsworth A History of English Law vol 10 (1936) 647. Dicey emphasized this central aspect of the rule of law: '[The rule of law] means, in the first place, the absolute supremacy or predominance of regular law as opposed to the influence of arbitrary power, and excludes the existence of arbitrariness, of prerogative, or even wide discretionary authority on the part of the government.' AV Dicey Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (9th Edition, 1939) Part II Ch. IV. See also Michelman (supra) at § 11.1*(a)*. This aspect of the rule of law has always been part of South African law. See Ben Beinart 'The Rule of Law' 1962 Acta Juridica 99, 102. This feature of the rule of law also has a long tradition in continental Europe: it is embodied in the 'principe de legalité' as being part of the 'Etat légal' or 'Etat de droit' in the French tradition and the 'Legalitätsprinzip' as being part of the 'Rechtsstaat' in the German tradition. See Sabine Michalowski & Lorna Woods German Constitutional Law — the Protection of Civil Liberties (1999) Part 1, Section 2.2.3; David P Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 18-20.

The first case in which the Constitutional Court was asked to determine the scope of its jurisdiction to review executive action was President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo.[1] The case concerned a presidential decision to pardon certain categories of prisoners. It did not involve the testing of that decision against the common law, but only against the Constitution itself. The Court, however, wrote that the supremacy clause subjects all presidential action to the Constitution, that there is no room for prerogative powers outside the scope of judicial review, and that the exercise by the President of his powers is subject to review by courts of appropriate jurisdiction.[2] In Hugo there could be no doubt that the Constitutional Court itself was the 'court of appropriate jurisdiction' because the Final Constitution authorised the presidential power in question (viz the power to pardon or reprieve offenders in terms of IC s 82(1)(k)). But the idea that the Final Constitution also incorporates traditional rule of law concepts is first made visible in the separate judgment of Mokgoro J. Mokgoro J applies the doctrines of accessibility, precision and general applicability to enquire whether the challenged presidential decision could be justified under the limitations clause.[3]

The relationship between the Inrerim Constitution and common law and statutory limits was further set out in Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others.[4] This case involved a challenge to a rate increase imposed by a local government structure on property owners. The applicants had challenged the rate increase on the grounds that it was ultra vires the powers conferred on local government by the applicable proclamation and ultra vires the sections of the Interim Constitution empowering local governments to levy rates, levies, fees, taxes and tariffs. When the case, which had started in the Johannesburg High Court, went on appeal, the Supreme Court of Appeal considered whether it had 'some kind of parallel jurisdiction with the Constitutional Court where the relevant attack is founded on common-law grounds',[5] but ultimately referred this question to the Constitutional Court in the following form:

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC).
[2] See Hugo (supra) at paras 8, 12, 13, 28. See also SARFU III (supra) at para 148.
[3] Hugo (supra) at para 102 (per Mokgoro J).
[4] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC).
[5] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 1115 (SCA) at 1124B, 1998 (6) BCLR 671, 678 (SCA). This assertion was made despite the fact that under the general scheme of the Interim Constitution the respective jurisdictions of the Constitutional Court and the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court mutually excluded each other: The Constitutional Court had jurisdiction only in constitutional issues while the Appellate Division had jurisdiction only in non-constitutional issues. IC s 101(5).

> [W]hether or not the interim Constitution preserved for the predecessor of the Supreme Court of Appeal any residual or concurrent jurisdiction to adjudicate upon any attack made by the appellants on … administrative actions … on the grounds that such administrative actions fell to be set aside, reviewed or corrected at common law.[1]

The Constitutional Court, in its answer to this question, began by setting out the general relationship between constitutional and common law (with regard to the powers of local government):

> [T]he powers, functions and structures of local government provided for in the Constitution will be supplemented by powers, functions and structures provided for in other laws made by a competent authority. There is no provision in the interim Constitution which expressly states that where a local government acts ultra vires its empowering statutes it acts unconstitutionally, but it seems that the proposition must be correct [because several provisions of the Constitution require a local government to act consistently with both the Constitution and an Act of Parliament or an applicable provincial law]. … These provisions imply that a local government may only act within the powers lawfully conferred upon it. There is nothing startling in this proposition — it is a fundamental principle of the rule of law, recognised widely, that the exercise of public power is only legitimate where lawful. The rule of law — to the extent at least that it expresses this principle of legality — is generally understood to be a fundamental principle of constitutional law.[2]

Because unlawful acts are in breach of the principle of legality, which is part of the rule of law, which, in turn, is part of constitutional law, the Court in effect held, every unlawful act by a local government body is in itself a breach of the Interim Constitution.[3] This holding had an immediate jurisdictional consequence:

> There is of course no doubt that the common law principles of ultra vires remain under the new constitutional order. However, they are underpinned (and supplemented where necessary) by a constitutional principle of legality. In relation to 'administrative action' the principle of legality is enshrined in section 24(a) [of the interim Constitution]. In relation to legislation and to executive acts that do not constitute 'administrative action', the principle of legality is necessarily implicit in the Constitution. Therefore, the question whether the various local governments acted intra vires in this case remains a constitutional question.[4]

The consequence of this holding was that the Constitutional Court reserved jurisdiction in these matters for itself.[5] Under the Interim Constitution, with its provision for two separate jurisdictional spheres headed by the Constitutional Court and the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court (as the Supreme Court of Appeal was then known), this conclusion deprived the Appellate Division of [1] Order No 1*(b)* of the Supreme Court of Appeal judgment. Fedsure (supra) at para 20.

[2] Fedsure (supra) at paras 54-56 (footnotes omitted). At another point in the judgment, the Court emphasizes that the principle of legality is at least fundamental to the Interim Constitution, while leaving the question open whether any constitutional dimension of the rule of law has greater content than the principle of legality (at para 58).

[3] SARFU III confirmed this holding with regard to acts by the President. SARFU III (supra) at para 148.

[4] Fedsure (supra) at para 59 (my emphasis).

[5] Ibid at para 105.

jurisdiction to review executive conduct and administrative action. Even the Constitutional Court regarded this outcome as 'unsatisfactory', as courts would be denied the benefit of the experience and expertise of the Appellate Division in administrative-law matters.[1] However, Fedsure was decided in October 1998, almost two years after the coming into force of the Final Constitution. The practical effect of Fedsure was therefore temporary only.[2] Under the Final Constitution, the Fedsure holding does not deprive the Supreme Court of Appeal of jurisdiction to review executive conduct and administrative action, but simply asserts the Constitutional Court's power to have the final word on these matters.

The Constitutional Court's approach to the judicial review of administrative action and executive conduct in Hugo and Fedsure was confirmed in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others.[3] This decision has featured prominently in academic writing on the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturer involved a presidential decision to bring an Act of Parliament into force that was found to be ultra vires the provisions of the Act in question by a full bench of the High Court.[5] The Constitutional Court began its judgment by clarifying that, although Fedsure was decided under the Interim Constitution, it was applicable to the exercise of public power under the Final Constitution.[6] In fact, the proposition that the principle of legality was foundational to the Final Constitution had become even easier to assert: the rule of law and the principle of constitutional supremacy are expressly listed as founding values in FC s 1*(c)*. On this basis, the Constitutional Court confirmed the key holding of Fedsure in the following terms:

> The exercise of all public power must comply with the Constitution which is the supreme law, and the doctrine of legality which is part of that law. The question whether the President acted intra vires or ultra vires in bringing the Act into force when he did, is accordingly a constitutional matter. The finding that he acted ultra vires is a finding that he acted in a manner that was inconsistent with the Constitution.[7]

[1] Fedsure (supra) at para 106.

[2] To rectify its own finding, the Constitutional Court eventually held that it would be in the interests of justice that, in respect of constitutional issues under the Interim Constitution that may come before the Supreme Court of Appeal, it should exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it over constitutional matters in terms of the Final Constitution. See Fedsure (supra) at para 113.

[3] 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC).

[4] See Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 103-104; Michelman (supra) at §§ 11.1*(b)* and 11.3*(b)*.

[5] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA and Another: In re Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (4) SA 788 (T). The case reached the Constitutional Court in a rather odd way. The finding of the High Court that the President had acted ultra vires in bringing the Act into force did not rely on the Final Constitution. In fact, the High Court explicitly stated that '[n]one of those powers which are conferred upon the President by the Constitution are in issue in the present case'. Ibid at 796F. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court was asked to confirm that order as one of 'constitutional invalidity' with regard to conduct of the President in terms of FC s 172(2)(a). The Court was thus asked to give its opinion on an order that was not made.

[6] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 17.

[7] Ibid at para 20.

On a narrow reading, one could argue that this statement is confined to presidential acts, as was the case in Hugo. The President's powers are after all defined by the Final Constitution, and therefore the exercise of these powers is subject to review for constitutionality on this basis. This narrow construction was the view taken by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Container Logistics — a judgment handed down after the Constitutional Court's decision in Fedsure.[1] In Container Logistics, the Supreme Court of Appeal tried to distinguish between judicial review under the Final Constitution and judicial review under the common law. It held that 'constitutional review' would be concerned only with the constitutional legality of executive or administrative action, the question in each case being whether the action was or was not consistent with the Constitution.[2] Common-law review, on the other hand, would assess whether executive or administrative action was in accordance with the empowering statute and the requirements of natural justice.[3] Whenever the Final Constitution does not explicitly set the standard for executive or administrative action, the Supreme Court of Appeal seems to contend that the matter is purely one of common law and, consequently, not a constitutional matter. In Fraser, the Constitutional Court seemed to support such a distinction when it held — with explicit reference to Hugo and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers — that a claim has to involve executive or administrative action that conflicts with a requirement or restriction imposed by the Final Constitution.[4]

But such a narrow understanding of constitutional imperatives in relation to executive and administrative action is neither supported by the Court's decision in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, nor by other judgments on this topic. On the one hand, Fedsure was not about presidential conduct, but about a composite local government decision that required review both of legislative action and of administrative action.[5] On the other hand, the importance of the Constitutional Court's decision in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers is that it applies to any exercise of public power, without exception, and therefore goes beyond the review of presidential acts. The Final Constitution does not impose a specific category of review, limited to certain decision makers in the executive sphere or to a confined sphere of 'constitutional legality'. As the Constitutional Court emphasized in that case, there is only one standard of review:

> The control of public power by the courts through judicial review is and always has been a constitutional matter. Prior to the adoption of the interim Constitution this control was exercised by the courts through the application of common law constitutional principles. Since the adoption of the interim Constitution such control has been regulated by the Constitution which contains express provisions dealing with these matters. The common

[1] Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Rennies Group Ltd t/a Renfreight 1999 (3) SA 771 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (SCA). For a more in-depth analysis of the case, see Michelman (supra) at § 11.3*(b)*.

[2] Container Logistics (supra) at para 20.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Fraser (supra) at para 38 (my emphasis).

[5] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 27.

> law principles that previously provided the grounds for judicial review of public power have been subsumed under the Constitution, and in so far as they might continue to be relevant to judicial review, they gain their force from the Constitution. In the judicial review of public power, the two are intertwined and do not constitute separate concepts.[1]

After holding that the entire common law is subject to the Constitution, the Court concludes:

> What would have been ultra vires under the common law by reason of a functionary exceeding a statutory power is invalid under the Constitution according to the doctrine of legality. In this respect, at least, constitutional law and common law are intertwined and there can be no difference between them. . . . What would have been ultra vires under the common law by reason of a functionary exceeding a statutory power is invalid under the Constitution according to the doctrine of legality. In this respect, at least, constitutional law and common law are intertwined and there can be no difference between them. . . . One of [the Constitutional Court's] duties is to determine finally whether public power has been exercised lawfully. It would be failing in its duty if it were to hold that an issue concerning the validity of the exercise of public power is beyond its jurisdiction.[2]

In consequence, every case involving the lawfulness of administrative or executive action, from the President to other organs of state, to authorities in the national or provincial sphere, to any regional or local administrative structure, automatically involves a constitutional matter in terms of FC s 167*(3)(b)*.[3] Administrative or executive action in this sense includes law-making, such as regulations, by-laws and other forms of delegated legislation.[4]

The Constitutional Court's decision in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers has received a great deal of academic attention. Frank Michelman, in his chapter on the rule of law in this work, focuses on the consequences of the holding that the principle of

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 33.

[2] Ibid at paras 50 and 51.

[3] In later cases the Constitutional Court has confirmed that several different authorities have to adhere to the principle of legality: The President (SARFU III (supra) at para 148; Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2008 (1) SA 566 (CC), 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 78); ministers and other functionaries in national departments (Affordable Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC) at para 50; Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 22); the national government (Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) at para 34); provincial departments (Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Western Cape Province & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) per Mokgoro and Sachs JJ at para 40); the CCMA (Sidumo & Another v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd & Others 2008 (2) SA 24 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 158 (CC) at para 41, but see the dissenting judgement of Ngcobo J at para 163); municipalities (City of Cape Town and the Minister of Provincial and Local Government v Robertson & Another 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC) at para 61).

[4] See Affordable Medicines Trust (supra) at para 108. For a detailed analysis of what constitutes administrative action (in particular with regard to FC s 33 and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 (PAJA)) see Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 63.

legality as part of the rule of law is enshrined in the constitutional supremacy clause in FC s 2. He raises a number of relevant questions with regard to the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction in 'constitutional matters'. As I understand him, he asks whether, in a system of constitutional supremacy, a distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters is at all possible. This chapter will try to provide an answer to that question once all the different aspects of the Constitutional Court's approach to the term 'constitutional matters' have been outlined.

In relation to the Constitutional Court's understanding of violations of the principle of legality as constitutional matters, Michelman argues that the Court's decision to found the principle of legality on the Final Constitution itself makes the concept of constitutional matter meaningless.[1] According to Michelman, the principle of legality does not only require the executive and the legislative branches to act in accordance with the law, but also so requires of the judiciary. This result, in turn, makes every appeal from a lower-court decision a constitutional matter, since an appeal necessarily involves a complaint that a judicial body made a legally wrong decision.

In my opinion, Michelman raises a valid point. However, his argument rests on an assumption which, although reasonable in the abstract, has no authority in South African law, ie that judges' decisions are subject to the principle of legality in the same way as administrative, executive and legislative conduct.[2] Neither in the (traditional) academic understanding of the principle of legality nor in the jurisprudence of the courts is there any indication that a mistaken legal finding by a court, either on the facts or the law, in itself constitutes an infringement of the principle of legality.

During the Apartheid era, the content of the rule of law was a highly contested issue. Some authors tried to argue that this concept included substantive guarantees, such as civil rights.[3] Others emphasized that the rule of law determined mainly the formal legal framework according to which justice was administered.[4] Despite these differences, there seems to have been agreement on the point that the rule of law included the proposition that a judge had to observe the law.[5] The emphasis in this regard, however, fell on the principle that the judiciary was independent and organized according to professional standards.[6] Nowhere was explicit reference made to the view that an erroneous decision in itself constituted a violation of the rule of law. Rather, the availability of an appeal structure to [1] Michelman (supra) at § 11.2*(b)*(ii).

[2] Of course, Frank Michelman is very much aware of the assumption on which this statement depends and admits that his view may not be the position of the Constitutional Court. See Michelman (supra) at § 11.2*(b)*(iii)).

[3] See Andrew Mathews 'The Rule of Law — A Reassessment' in Ellison Kahn (ed) Fiat Iustitita: Essays in Honour of Oliver Deneys Schreiner (1983) 294, 307.

[4] See Ben Beinart 'The Rule of Law' 1962 Acta Juridica 99.

[5] Beinart (supra) at 111; Andrew Mathews State, Security and the Rule of Law (1988) 27-30.

[6] Beinart (supra) at 112-114.

rectify such erroneous decisions was seen as essential to the rule of law. In contemporary academic writing, too, the rule of law is always exclusively discussed in relation to actions by organs of state, administrative officials and the various legislatures.[1]

In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, the abstract question of whether the principle of legality applies to the judiciary has not been specifically addressed. Thus far, the Court has only applied the principle of legality to the executive branch of government (including the administration), Parliament and the provincial legislatures.[2] The rule of law has on occasion also been invoked to guarantee fair procedures in courts. In this limited sense, the Constitutional Court has held that the judiciary is subject to the rule of law:

> [I]n terms of section 1 of the Constitution, the rule of law is one of the founding values of our democratic state, and the judiciary is bound by it. The rule of law undoubtedly requires judges not to act arbitrarily and to be accountable.[3]

However, not every procedural shortcoming is remedied by reference to the rule of law and it certainly provides no remedy for substantive errors of law.[4] Material findings of lower courts that have been reversed by the Constitutional Court have not been reversed on the basis that they constituted an infringement of the principle of legality. They have instead been overturned on the basis that the court a quo misinterpreted some or other aspect of the Final Constitution.

The assumption that every 'unlawful' court decision should be treated like an unlawful official act is also hard to reconcile with the Constitutional Court's decisions in Metcash and Boesak. Metcash, it will be recalled, involved two contradictory Supreme Court of Appeal decisions on the same set of facts and law. As long as one assumes that there is only one legally correct answer to the same legal question, one of the Supreme Court of Appeal decisions must have been wrong, and thus 'unlawful'. The Constitutional Court, however, declined jurisdiction, holding that, 'even if the decision in the applicant's matter was wrong, and the contrary decision was correct, that would not provide a basis for the relief claimed by the applicant'.[5] In Boesak, the Constitutional Court was faced with an argument

[1] See Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 10-13; George Devenish 'Constitutional Law' The Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, 2004) Volume 5, § 4.

[2] With regard to Parliament, see New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 24 (Arbitrary legislation is inconsistent with the rule of law).

[3] Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Ltd 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) at para 12.

[4] But see Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa v Tshabalala-Msimang & Another NNO; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Health & Another 2005 (3) SA 238 (SCA); 2005 (6) BCLR 576 (SCA) at paras 38-39 (Supreme Court of Appeal found a delay on the part of a High Court in deciding an application for leave to appeal to be 'unreasonable' and quoted with approval an English judgment that found such a delay 'ultimately subversive of the rule of law'.)

[5] Metcash (supra) at para 14.

that the Supreme Court of Appeal had convicted the appellant on insufficient evidence. In its judgment, the Court did not say that the evidence was sufficient to establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It held that a mere allegation that an error of this kind had been made did not raise a constitutional matter.[1] To support its holding, the Court posited a counterfactual, arguing that, if it were to have jurisdiction in such cases, all criminal cases would be constitutional matters, and the distinction drawn in the Final Constitution between the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and that of the Supreme Court of Appeal would collapse.[2] It is clear from this judgment that the Constitutional Court wanted to preserve — at least in theory — a space for the Supreme Court of Appeal to have the final word in some cases.

This argument should not be understood as denying that the judiciary is bound by the rule of law to the extent that judges should follow the law and apply it correctly. This proposition follows clearly from FC s 8(1), which provides that the judiciary is bound by the Bill of Rights. The rule of law does not mean the rule of judges: every judicial officer must swear or solemnly affirm that he or she will administer justice 'in accordance with the Final Constitution and the law'.[3] It is not possible to infer from this, however, that erroneous decisions per se violate the principle of legality.

There is, finally, a procedural argument for treating court decisions and those by other branches of government differently. FC s 167(6)(a) provides that a person, 'when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court', may 'bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court'. The word 'directly' here means that no other court need be involved in the matter. If a case that did not involve a constitutional matter were brought to the Constitutional Court in terms of this provision, the Court would not have jurisdiction to decide it. On Michelman's view, however, the same case would have to be treated differently if it were not brought to the Constitutional Court by way of direct access, but by way of appeal. Even if the case dealt purely with factual issues or the most standard, non-policy-imbued common-law principle, it would be turned into a constitutional matter the moment the lower court ruled on it. In order to found the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction on appeal, the losing party would simply need to contend that the case had been wrongly decided, and therefore that the principle of legality had been breached. Such an understanding of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is unpalatable for two reasons. First, either a case raises a constitutional matter at the outset or it does not. It cannot subsequently turn into a case that raises a constitutional matter, except, perhaps, where a constitutionally relevant procedural error in the lower courts occurs.[4] Secondly,

[1] See § 4.2*(e)(i)* infra.
[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15.
[3] Item 6 of Schedule 2 of the Final Constitution (my emphasis). This argument was also used by Ngcobo J in a dissenting judgment in Metcash. Metcash (supra) at para 33.
[4] See § 4.3*(d)*(iv) infra.

on Michelman's approach, the parties have the power to determine whether a case involves a constitutional matter by their choice of procedure. If applicants apply for direct access in terms of FC s 167(6)(a), they run the risk that the Constitutional Court may reject their application for lack of jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, they approach the High Court first, they will either win their case or be entitled to appeal it to the Constitutional Court. The principle of legality would in this way have different implications depending on the procedure adopted. Such a possibility is not envisaged by the Final Constitution.[1]

(iii) Interpretation and application of legislation giving effect to the Final Constitution

The Constitutional Court might not have accepted the general proposition that it has the power to review every decision by a lower court simply on the basis that the decision might be wrong and therefore in violation of the rule of law. It has, however, adopted what amounts to this approach in a vast number of subject-specific areas, including labour law, administrative law, land rights, environmental law and broadcasting law. What all these areas have in common, as we shall see, is that every legal dispute falling in one of these areas will automatically involve a constitutional matter. It is hard not to see a flat contradiction between the Court's approach in this sub-set of cases and its floodgates-driven holding in Boesak that a finding of guilt in a criminal case does not per se give rise to a constitutional matter.[2] Why should the Constitutional Court be reluctant to review all criminal law cases but eager to review all labour law cases? Surely a sentence of imprisonment is about the strongest state interference with constitutional rights imaginable?[3] The answer, according to the Court, is that the areas of law in which it will automatically grant jurisdiction are all governed by statutes which were enacted to give content or effect to a constitutional right, or otherwise to meet the legislature's constitutional obligations.[4]

[1] One comparison comes to mind, viz the approach the US Supreme Court took with regard to state action in Shelley v Kramer 334 US 1 (1948) that every court decision in itself constitutes state action sufficient to subject the challenged private action to constitutional scrutiny. This decision — which has apparently not been followed by the Supreme Court in later cases — effectively made state action a formal criterion and would have rendered the distinction between private and state action meaningless.

[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15.

[3] The Court acknowledged this argument in S v Shaik. It stated that a sentence involving imprisonment is a potentially drastic infringement of the right to freedom in FC s 12(1) and that a trial must be fair in terms of FC s 35(3). However, it would not hear appeals against sentences based on a trial court's alleged incorrect evaluation of facts. See S v Shaik & Others 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 71. This holding is somewhat ambiguous: is the right to personal freedom in the context of sentencing only implicated when the trial was not fair? Could a wrong evaluation of facts possibly amount to an unfair trial and then raise a constitutional matter?

[4] In criminal law matters, such a distinction seems to be largely arbitrary. The Criminal Procedure Act is, in a sense, constitutionally required. It would be impossible to arrest, try and imprison anyone constitutionally without an authorizing law.

The first case in which the Constitutional Court adopted this approach was NEHAWU v University of Cape Town. In NEHAWU, the Court was faced with an appeal against a judgment of the Labour Appeal Court ('LAC'). The LAC had (by majority decision) rejected a claim by the appellant (a union) that the outsourcing of certain services by the respondent (a university) constituted the transfer of a 'going concern' in terms of s 197 of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 ('the LRA'). The union did not challenge the constitutionality of this provision as such, but contended that the interpretation of the provision by the LAC was inconsistent with the rights of employees to fair labour practices in terms of FC s 23(1), and that the LAC had therefore failed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights in terms of FC s 39(2).[1]

On the case as presented, the Court could have easily assumed jurisdiction on the basis of its supervisory powers under FC s 39(2).[2] But, instead, it took a different approach. Writing that it was not necessary to deal with FC s 39(2), the Court held:

> The LRA was enacted 'to give effect to and regulate the fundamental rights conferred by section [23] of the Constitution.' In doing so the LRA gives content to section 23 of the Constitution and must therefore be construed and applied consistently with that purpose. Section 3*(b)* of the LRA underscores this by requiring that the provisions of the LRA must be interpreted 'in compliance with the Constitution'. Therefore the proper interpretation and application of the LRA will raise a constitutional issue.[3]

On the face of it, there seems to be no difference between this approach and the Court's approach to statutory interpretation in terms of FC s 39(2): in both cases the Court ensures that legislation is interpreted in accordance with the Bill of Rights. But FC s 39(2) takes as its starting point the individual case, and the specific interpretation given to the legislation by the lower court. In such cases, the Court has held that the mere application of the statute does not on its own raise a constitutional matter. Before assuming jurisdiction, the Court must consider whether the specific legal finding at issue transgressed the limits set by the Final Constitution. The NEHAWU Court, by contrast, took a shortcut. The starting point was not the interpretation exercise, but the legal norm. In emphasizing the constitutional foundation of the LRA, the Court effectively argued that the entire Act had a 'policy-laden character' and was 'imbued with social policy and normative content' — to use the terminology devised in relation to the development of the common law under FC s 39(2). On this approach, not only interpretations of the LRA that require consideration of the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights are open to Constitutional Court review, but every case involving the interpretation of this statute.

[1] NEHAWU (supra) at para 13.
[2] See § 4.3*(d)(i)* supra.
[3] NEHAWU (supra) at para 14.

The respondent in NEHAWU pointed out that such an approach would mean that the Constitutional Court would have jurisdiction in all labour matters. The Court replied as follows:

> If the effect of this requirement is that this Court will have jurisdiction in all labour matters that is a consequence of our constitutional democracy. The Constitution '. . . is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control.' Our constitutional democracy envisages the development of a coherent system of law that is shaped by the Constitution.[1]

This statement is hard to reconcile with the idea of the Constitutional Court as a court of special and limited jurisdiction. The quote within the quote comes from paragraph 44 of Pharmaceutical Manufacturers and illuminates the point at issue in that case. By contrast, the issue in NEHAWU was not the constitutional control of 'the law', but the application of the law by the labour courts. In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the Court did not equate the constitutional control of the law with its application — it was the fact that the addressees of the law (administrative officials) were bound by both the (common) law and the Final Constitution that triggered constitutional review. The Court in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers was concerned to ensure that no administrative action should escape judicial review:

> Courts no longer have to claim space and push boundaries to find means of controlling public power. That control is vested in them under the Constitution which defines the role of the courts, their powers in relation to other arms of government, and the constraints subject to which public power has to be exercised.[2]

This rationale is not applicable in labour law cases. Three different bodies (the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration, the Labour Court and the LAC) already exist to review employers' actions under the LRA. Nevertheless, the argument used in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers is turned in NEHAWU from an argument about the need for every exercise of public power to be subject to judicial review to something approximating the need for the Constitutional Court to have general jurisdiction. In so doing, the NEHAWU Court comes very close to Frank Michelman's understanding of the principle of legality: every (wrong) application of the ordinary (labour) law is a constitutional matter, because the yardstick for what is right and wrong in labour law is at base a constitutional one.

In NEHAWU, the Constitutional Court held that the case did not require it 'to go beyond the regulatory framework established by the LRA'.[3] If the case really fell entirely within the framework of the LRA, however, why did it raise a constitutional matter? According to the Court, the labour law question presented to it — the precise nature of a transfer of employment — had to be interpreted in accordance with the constitutional right to fair labour practices, which seeks to ensure the continuation of the relationship between the employer and the employee on terms that are fair to both.[1] There can be no quibble with this. But the Court should have made this point the trigger for its jurisdiction in this particular case. Such an approach would have been in line with its holding in Boesak that not every criminal case involves a constitutional matter, even though, of course, some interpretations of criminal law provisions have a constitutional dimension. The Constitutional Court's role when assuming jurisdiction in labour law matters should be to go beyond the LRA to see what the Final Constitution demands in the circumstances of the particular case.

[1] Ibid at para 16.
[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 45.
[3] NEHAWU (supra) at para 17.

Interestingly, one week after deciding NEHAWU, the Court delivered its decision in National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa v Bader Bop Ltd.[2] In Bader Bop, the Court adopted a more case-based approach to its jurisdiction in labour law matters. Here, the Court held that it was presented with a constitutional matter, not because the matter was a labour law matter, but because the applicants had argued that the interpretation of the LRA adopted by the majority of the LAC constituted an infringement of their constitutional right to strike, alternatively that the provisions concerned were unconstitutional.[3] The idea that the Court might have jurisdiction just because the case involved the LRA played no role. Only Ngcobo J, in a separate concurring judgment, repeated the holding from NEHAWU.[4]

In NEHAWU, then, the Constitutional Court essentially declared itself to be the 'Labour Appeal Appeal Court'. The only constraint in this respect is that it must be in the interests of justice for it to hear appeals from the LAC. Because the main responsibility for overseeing the ongoing interpretation and application of the LRA lies with the Labour Court and the LAC, the Constitutional Court will be reluctant to hear appeals from the LAC unless they raise important issues of principle.[5] This is very similar to the Court's approach to the Supreme Court of Appeal's primary responsibility for development of the common law in Bierman.[6] In both instances, what prevents the Constitutional Court from taking every conceivable case is not its limited jurisdiction, but the interests of justice criterion.

Following the reasoning in NEHAWU, the Court has held that the interpretation and application of the following statutes give rise to a constitutional matter:

[1] NEHAWU (supra) at paras 42-43.
[2] 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC).
[3] Bader Bop (supra) at para 15.
[4] Ibid at para 51. Ngcobo J had, in fact, written the (unanimous) judgment in NEHAWU.
[5] NEHAWU (supra) at paras 30-31.
[6] S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC).

- the Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994, which gives content to FC s 25(7);[1]
- the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000, which gives effect to FC s 33;[2]
- the Broadcasting Act 4 of 1999 and the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act 13 of 2000, which give effect to FC s 192 (independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest) and protect the fundamental right to freedom of expression;[3] and
- the Environment Conservation Act 73 of 1989 and the National Environmental Management Act 107 of 1998, which give effect to FC s 24.[4]

Litigation under any of these statutes will involve a constitutional matter because they were all enacted to give content to a constitutional right or otherwise to meet the legislature's constitutional obligations. On the same grounds, the Court will likely also assume jurisdiction in cases that involve the Water Services Act 108 of 1997 and the Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002,[5] the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000,[6] the Promotion of [1] See Alexkor Limited v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC) at para 23; Department of Land Affairs & Others v Goedgelegen Tropical Fruit (Pty) Ltd 2007 (6) SA 199 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1027 at paras 30-31. These Constitutional Court judgments, on a narrow reading, limit that jurisdictional finding to s 2(1) of the Restitution of Land Rights Act: this subsection was 'enacted to give content to the section 25(7) constitutional right and to fulfil Parliament's obligations'. However, the preamble to the Restitution of Land Rights Act expressly states that the entire Act was enacted in respect of the constitutional provision for the restitution of a right in land to a person or community dispossessed under or for the purpose of furthering the objects of any racially based discriminatory law. Consequently, in Mphela & Others v Haakdoornbult Boerdery CC & Others, the Constitutional Court held that its jurisdiction also includes the application and interpretation of other sections of the Restitution of Land Rights Act. 2008 (4) SA 488 (CC), 2008 (7) BCLR 675 (CC) at para 24.

[2] See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 25. With Bato Star, administrative law has been entirely 'constitutionalized': the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction either because the PAJA has been applied or because the ruling in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers regarding administrative officials is applicable.

[3] See Radio Pretoria v Chairperson, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa & Another 2005 (4) SA 319, 2005 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at para 20.

[4] See Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at para 40; see also MEC Department of Agriculture Conservation and Environment & Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd. 2008 (2) SA 319 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 417 (CC) at para 24. However, in HTF Developers, the Constitutional Court assumed jurisdiction on the basis of FC s 39(2) and because the ECA requires an interpretation that gives effect to the environmental right contained in the Final Constitution. Ibid at para 19.

[5] They seem to have also been enacted to give effect to FC s 24*(b)*(iii).

[6] That issue was partly considered in Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In Re Financial Services Board v van der Merwe & Another. 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC); 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC). It was not decided as PAIA had not yet entered into force. But see S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC) at para 90.

Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000[1] and the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998.[2]

(iv) Fair procedure in the judicial system

In certain cases the Constitutional Court has held that it is not the subject matter, but rather an aspect of the lower court's handling of the case that gives it jurisdiction to review it.

Such an approach is perhaps best visible in Mphahlele v FNB. In this case, the Court found that courts are under a constitutional duty to give reasons for their decisions. Goldstone J (writing for a unanimous Court) held that the case raised a question of procedure. Whether that question in turn gave rise to a constitutional matter was open to doubt, but the Court was prepared to assume for purposes of its decision that it did.[3] This may not be a very principled approach, but the case nevertheless shows that it is not only the subject matter of the case that can trigger constitutional review. Moreover, the Court explicitly denied that the original case in the High Court had raised a constitutional matter.[4] Hence, even if Goldstone J was not entirely convinced, the aspect of the case that made him treat it as a constitutional matter was solely the procedural question.

A number of other cases have centred on the recusal of decision-makers, both in court cases and also in quasi-judicial and administrative proceedings, due to alleged bias. The Court held that all of these cases involved constitutional matters.[5] The basis for the assumption of jurisdiction in these cases, however, has varied from case to case. In the SARFU II, the Constitutional Court held that a court that allowed a judge to hear a case despite a reasonable apprehension of bias would infringe FC s 34.[6] The Court also held that the impartial adjudication of

[1] The first Constitutional Court case involving the Equality Act (sometimes referred to by its rather inelegant acronym 'PEPUDA') was decided in 2007. MEC for Education: KwaZulu-Natal & Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC). Although the Constitutional Court asserted that the case raised a 'constitutional issue' and held that the Equality Act is 'clearly the legislation contemplated in section 9(4) and gives further content to the prohibition on unfair discrimination', the Court did not draw the conclusion that the former followed from the latter, as it did in NEHAWU. Ibid at paras 30 and 39.

[2] According to the Constitutional Court, the Act provides 'legislative texture to guide the courts in determining the approach to eviction now required by section 26 (3) of the Constitution'. Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at para 24. See also Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road, Berea Township & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC), 2008 (5) BCLR 475 (CC) at para 38, (Court saw no need to decide the question whether the Prevention of Illegal Eviction Act applied, or to expand on the relationship between FC s 26 and the Act).

[3] Mphahlele (supra) at para 7.

[4] Ibid at paras 7, 18-19.

[5] SARFU II (supra); South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union & Another v Irvin & Johnson Ltd Seafood's Processing Division 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC); S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC).

[6] See SARFU II (supra) at para 30. Additionally, the judge would act in breach of the requirements of FC s 165(2) and the prescribed oath of office.

disputes is 'a cornerstone of any fair and just legal system'.[1] This finding was later cited as a rationale for holding that judicial recusal is a constitutional matter.[2] Such an understanding indicates that, on occasion, the Constitutional Court sees the need for a more general power of intervention to guarantee the right to a fair procedure, based on a broad understanding of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

In most cases involving procedural questions, however, constitutional jurisdiction flows from the fact that the court a quo failed to take account of a litigant's right of access to court in terms of FC s 34. In New Clicks, the High Court's failure to decide an application for leave to appeal in a timely manner was criticized on this basis.[3] In Giddey, the Court held that a lower court's order requiring a company in liquidation to furnish security for costs affected the company's right of access to court in terms of FC s 34.[4]

A broad range of procedural decisions fall into the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction because they relate to a fair criminal trial in terms of FC s 35(3). The Court has used that criterion of 'fairness' to review procedural decisions by trial courts in relation, for example, to the admission of evidence. The Court has emphasized that such decisions involve the exercise of discretion by the trial court based on all the circumstances of the particular case.[5] On appeal, the scope of review is limited:

> The ordinary approach on appeal to the exercise of a discretion … is that the appellate court will not consider whether the decision reached by the court at first instance was correct, but will only interfere in limited circumstances; for example, if it is shown that the discretion has not been exercised judicially or has been exercised based on a wrong appreciation of the facts or wrong principles of law.[6]

In the exercise of such discretion, the trial court must have regard to what is fair in the circumstances, and this makes a challenge to its decision a constitutional matter in terms of FC s 167(3).[7]

Other cases suggest, however, that respect for the discretionary powers of trial courts will not be a barrier to review if the Constitutional Court really wants to hear the case. This point is well illustrated by Dikoko v Mokhatla.[8] The case concerned the defamation of one municipal official by another, and centred on

[1] SARFU II (supra) at para 35.
[2] See Basson (supra) at para 21.
[3] Minister of Health & Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amicus Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 68.
[4] Giddey NO v Barnard 2007 (5) SA 525 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 4.
[5] See S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC); 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC) at paras 97-98.
[6] Giddey (supra) at para 19.
[7] Basson (supra) at para 26.
[8] 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR (CC).

the question of whether municipal councillors should enjoy some form of parliamentary immunity. The High Court had rejected such a notion and had awarded damages to the defamed official in the amount of R110 000. On appeal, the Constitutional Court rejected the applicant's arguments and confirmed the holding of the High Court denying him privilege. The matter did not end there, however, because in the course of the hearing the issue had been raised whether the amount of damages awarded was appropriate. On this point the Court was divided. Three judges found the amount too high and wanted to reduce it to R50 000. Seven judges found the amount to be reasonable, and one judge held that the question did not raise a constitutional matter and therefore declined to comment on the amount. In all three judgments the question whether the assessment of defamation damages is a constitutional matter in terms of FC s 167(3)(b) featured prominently.

Both the majority and the minority took the view that the extent of damages for defamation has implications for the balance between the right to dignity and free expression because overly excessive amounts of damages will deter free speech.[1] The majority, additionally, held that such an assessment would perhaps give rise to a constitutional matter because the remedy of sentimental damages (although located within the common law) would constitute 'appropriate relief' within the meaning of FC s 38.[2] While Mokgoro J, writing for the minority, concluded that the Court was 'clearly seized' with a constitutional matter, the majority (per Moseneke DCJ) decided to leave this question open (although it saw 'a very strong argument to be made' for it), and simply assumed in favour of the applicant that a constitutional matter had indeed been raised.

The reasoning in both the majority and the minority judgments appears to be outcome-driven rather than principled. Just as the decision in NEHAWU means that every labour law matter falls within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, Dikoko effectively subjects the entire law of defamation — now premised on the appropriate balance between the right to dignity and freedom of expression — to constitutional review. Such an approach is virtually bottomless. Almost every legal rule can be construed to strike a balance between two or more competing rights.[3] It is one thing, however, to say that courts must have regard to constitutional rights when applying the common law, another to say that the application of a common-law rule that is premised on the balance to be struck between two or more constitutional rights necessarily raises a constitutional matter. This makes nonsense of the attempt in FC s 39(2) to limit the application of the Constitution to instances of common-law development.

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 92 (majority judgment). Ibid at paras 53-54 (minority judgment).

[2] Ibid at para 90.

[3] Cf Stu Woolman 'Application' (supra) at Chapter 31, Appendix (Contends that not every legal dispute engages a constitutional right, and, it follows that not every legal dispute can be recast as a case concerning conflicting constitutional rights.)

The Dikoko Court's treatment of FC s 38 is more defensible. But if the Court really wanted to respect trial courts' discretionary powers, it should not have said that the assessment of defamation damages necessarily gives rise to a constitutional matter. Rather, it should have pointed out the circumstances in which such an assessment may give rise to one. As long as the Court simply substitutes its own view of the appropriate quantum of damages for that of the trial court, there is no difference between constitutional and non-constitutional matters. Any relief granted by a court must be 'appropriate'. A meaningful distinction is only drawn when the Court provides general criteria, which a lower court can apply.

This more principled approach was taken by the lone dissenter, Skweyiya J:

> A judge calculating damages in a case where defamation has been proved is given a set of guidelines which he must work with in settling on the amount of damages. These guidelines take the form of a number of factors which may be considered when arriving at the appropriate quantum. There is no rigid test in that none of the factors are mandatory. The manner in which a judge chooses to apply the factors, the factors which he chooses to give weight to and other similar matters are matters left to his discretion.[1]

This is not to say that the Constitutional Court can never interfere with a lower court's assessment of the quantum of damages. It must do so, however, when it sees a shortcoming in the procedure followed, not in the outcome:

> It is possible that in a future case an applicant will be able to show that as a result of the way in which the lower court judge evaluated the factors a constitutional right is violated; or that the judge failed to infuse the values of the Constitution into the process whereby he settled on an amount of damages to be awarded.[2]

The general implications of this approach for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction are explored below.[3]

(e) Issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters

FC s 167(3)(b) does not only refer to constitutional matters but also to 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'. As stated above, while a constitutional matter can be understood as comprising the entire case, an issue is just one aspect of the case.[4] Legal disputes usually contain a bundle of different factual and legal questions — all of them 'issues' for a competent court to decide — and at least one of these issues must implicate the Final Constitution for the case to raise a constitutional matter. Once jurisdiction is assumed on this basis, FC s 167(3)(b) grants the Court jurisdiction to decide every other issue, even if these other issues are not constitutional matters themselves — when considered

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 133.
[2] Ibid at para 135.
[3] See § 4.3*(b)*(ii) infra.
[4] See § 4.3*(c)*(ii) supra.

in the abstract. The reasons for this rule are largely practical. As the Court has held: 'Were it to be otherwise, this Court's ability to fulfil its constitutional task of determining constitutional matters would be frustrated.'[1]

The Constitutional Court commented extensively on the scope and meaning of this part of its jurisdiction in Richtersveld. The Richtersveld Court was faced with several 'issues bearing on or related to establishing the existence of' the constitutional claims made by the applicants.[2] As these issues were preconditions for consideration of the constitutional matter, the Court examined the nature of the connection required between these issues and the constitutional matter for the issues to fall under its jurisdiction. The judgment starts with a literalist approach:

> 'Connected', defined variously by the Oxford English Dictionary as 'linked together' or 'joined together in order or sequence (as words or ideas)' or 'related, associated (in nature or idea)', is clearly a word of wide import, connoting a relationship between, amongst other things, ideas or concepts. It is not limited by any sense of immediacy or close relationship.[3]

The obvious but nevertheless important consequence of this holding is that issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters can only enlarge the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, but never establish it on their own. Any 'connection' requires (at least) two things between which the connection is made — and one of these needs to be a valid and independent constitutional matter. In other words, a case always has to raise at last one proper constitutional matter before the Court may consider whether the case may also involve issues connected with decisions on that constitutional matter. There can be no jurisdiction in a case that has only issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters but no constitutional matter itself. The purpose of including issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters in FC s 167(3)(b) was to give the Court the power to decide (legal and factual) issues within a case in which it already has jurisdiction. The purpose of the provision was not to grant the Constitutional Court jurisdiction in more cases.

After establishing the wide scope of the word 'connected', the Richtersveld Court went on to scrutinize this reading in light of the purpose of FC s 167(3)(b):

> This wide construction is consistent with the purpose of the provision. It is intended to extend the jurisdiction of this Court to matters that stand in a logical relationship to those matters that are primarily, or in the first instance, subject to the Court's jurisdiction. The underlying purpose is to avoid fettering, arbitrarily and artificially, the exercise of this Court's functioning when obliged to determine a constitutional matter. If any anterior matter, logically or otherwise, is capable of throwing light on or affecting the decision by this Court on the primary constitutional matter, then it would be artificial and arbitrary to

[1] Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at para 52.
[2] Richtersveld (supra) at para 24.
[3] Ibid at para 29.

> exclude such consideration from the Court's evaluation of the primary constitutional matter. To state it more formally, when any factum probandum of a disputed issue is a constitutional matter, then any factum probans, bearing logically on the existence or otherwise of such factum probandum, is itself an issue 'connected with [a] decision[] on [a] constitutional matter[]'.[1]

The Court then confirmed this holding not only with regard to the purpose of the provision, but also with regard to broader policy considerations:

> Whatever the precise meaning of the word 'connected' in the phrase 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters', it must include a relationship of dependence between a primary order on a constitutional matter and an ancillary order. What constitutes 'dependence' must be understood in a broad sense. There are important policy reasons for such an approach: if a party may not approach this Court for leave to appeal on these ancillary matters, this would give rise to a bifurcated appeal and confirmation procedure in which the appeal on the ancillary matters could not be resolved before this Court together with the confirmation application, but would have to be heard and resolved in separate proceedings before another court. This would obviously be a most undesirable state of affairs, undermining the achievement of finality for the parties and resulting in an unnecessary waste of judicial resources.[2]

On that basis the Court concluded: '[Issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters] are all legal and factual issues that need to be decided in order to determine [a constitutional matter].'[3] Thus, the decisive factor is that a decision on the 'issues' is crucial to any meaningful decision on the constitutional matter itself, i e it must be a legal question that needs to be considered in order to reach a decision on the constitutional matter.[4]

The Constitutional Court has the final word not only with regard to constitutional matters, but also with regard to issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters. This contention appears to be self-evident. FC s 167(3)(a), however, states that the Constitutional Court 'is the highest court in all constitutional matters' and does not mention issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters. Moreover, FC s 168(3) declares that the Supreme Court of Appeal 'is the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters'. On the basis of these provisions, the Final Constitution could be interpreted to mean that the Constitutional Court may indeed decide issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters, but that it is the Supreme Court of Appeal that has the final word on these issues. Such an interpretation, however, would obviously lead to the time-consuming, costly and disruptive passing of cases back and forth between the two courts. The Constitutional Court has therefore made it clear that this interpretation is not supported by a proper understanding of its jurisdiction:

[1] Richtersveld (supra) at para 30.
[2] Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 47.
[3] Basson (supra) at para 22.
[4] See Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 107.

> [W]hen one adopts a purposive approach to the harmonising of section 167(3) and (7) and section 168(3) … it is evident that this Court is the highest court in respect of issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters. The contrary conclusion would be anomalous and contrary to the Constitution's structure of jurisdiction and its division between this Court and the SCA. It would mean that, although this Court is granted jurisdiction in respect of 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters,' those would be the only matters under its jurisdiction in respect whereof its judgment would not be final. This would moreover give rise to a serious hiatus in the Constitution, since there is no appeal from this Court. The conclusion that this Court is the highest court also in relation to 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters' is in our view placed beyond doubt by the fact that section 167(3)(c) provides that this Court also makes the final decision on 'whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.[1]

In sum, the Constitutional Court has the final word on everything that falls under its jurisdiction.

(f) The Constitutional Court's power to make the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter, FC s 167(3)(c)

FC s 167(3)(c) provides that the Constitutional Court 'makes the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter'. This provision is the other side of the coin of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. The limited jurisdiction the Court enjoys must always be understood against the background of its institutional purpose and function, i e to ensure that all law and conduct is in line with the Final Constitution. All the Court's reasoning about there being only one legal standard for executive and administrative action, and its holdings about how the Final Constitution permeates the entire body of South African law, would be of little effect if it did not have the power finally to determine whether a matter is a constitutional matter.

On the other hand, it is not as though the entire constitutional structure would fall apart without FC s 167(3)(c). Even in the absence of this provision, the Constitutional Court would have been able to come to the conclusion that its role as final interpreter of the Final Constitution necessarily implied the power to decide whether a particular matter was a constitutional matter. As noted above, the Constitutional Court had little difficulty in finding that its final decision-making powers related to both 'constitutional matters' and 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'. It simply held that 'the contrary conclusion would be anomalous and contrary to the Final Constitution's structure of jurisdiction and its division between this Court and the SCA.' The Court would no doubt have used a similar argument to ensure that its jurisdiction included the power finally to decide whether a particular matter was a constitutional matter or not. Given this, it seems that FC s 167(3)(c) was included simply to head off a potential source of conflict between the Constitutional Court and other courts over whether a lower court could prevent a case from going to the Constitutional Court by declaring that it did not involve a constitutional matter. In light of FC s 167(3)(c), lower courts clearly do not have the power to do this.

[1] Richtersveld (supra) at paras 27-28.

Nobody has questioned the Constitutional Court's power finally to determine the scope of its jurisdiction. One could, however, argue that such a power renders obsolete any attempt to define the term 'constitutional matter' in an abstract and principled way. If the Court has the power finally to determine the meaning of this term, why should we bother to define it? Two reasons come to mind. First, it is certainly not the purpose of FC s 167(3)(c) to rule out the possibility that there might be a general principle underlying the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. Had that been the case, the term 'constitutional matter' would not have featured so prominently as an ostensible limitation on the Court's jurisdiction. Put differently, if the Constitutional Assembly had not wanted this term to function in this way, it would have granted the Constitutional Court jurisdiction in every matter in which it decided to grant access.[1] Secondly, the interpretation of any phrase or term in the Final Constitution is ultimately for the Constitutional Court to decide, even if this is not explicitly stated in the Final Constitution. Nothing precludes the Court from developing a principled understanding of these other phrases and terms, and the same should thus be true of the phrase 'constitutional matter'.

(g) The Constitutional Court's findings on what is not a 'constitutional matter'

(i) Factual findings by lower courts

The leading case in which the Constitutional Court declined jurisdiction for want of a constitutional matter is Boesak. In this case, as we have seen, the Court held that a challenge to a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal on the sole basis that it was wrong on the facts is not a constitutional matter.[2] The Court held:

> In the context of section 167(3) of the Constitution the question whether evidence is sufficient to justify a finding of guilt beyond reasonable doubt cannot in itself be a constitutional matter. Otherwise, all criminal cases would be constitutional matters, and the distinction drawn in the Constitution between the jurisdiction of this Court and that of the SCA would be illusory. There is a need for finality in criminal matters. … Disagreement with the SCA's assessment of the facts is not sufficient to constitute a breach of the right to a fair trial. … Unless there is some separate constitutional issue raised therefore, no constitutional right is engaged when an appellant merely disputes the findings of fact made by the SCA.[3]

[1] Frank Michelman argues that a principled approach to constitutional matters is supported by such a provision because it pins final responsibility on the Constitutional Court for the prudent implementation of such a principle. Michelman (supra) at § 11.2*(a)*.

[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15.

[3] Ibid.

Langa DP's argument in this passage is essentially pragmatic: all criminal cases require the court to decide whether the accused really committed the crime. If that process raised a constitutional matter, then the Constitutional Court would have jurisdiction to review all criminal matters. In addition to this, pragmatic considerations determine that criminal cases should be brought to finality as soon as possible.

The problem with this 'everything becomes a constitutional matter' argument is that it has not always been consistently invoked by the Constitutional Court. As noted above, the Court has had no problem in assuming jurisdiction to review every labour law case, every land restitution case, every broadcasting case and every administrative law case. It has also had no problem in reviewing all defamation cases on the basis that defamation law in general strikes a constitutional balance between freedom of expression and dignity. One might argue that when a matter deals with a statute, which has been enacted to give content or effect to a constitutional right, the Court is not confronted with questions of fact, as it was in Boesak, but of law. This is true, but the argument in Boesak was not that the Constitutional Court did not want to deal with evidentiary matters, but that the term 'constitutional matter' should not be defined in a way that would bring an entire body of law under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. What the Court said in Boesak, in essence, was that the standard question faced by courts in a particular area of law cannot in itself be a constitutional matter. The standard question that a court in criminal cases is asked to decide is whether there is sufficient evidence to make a finding of guilt. In other areas of law, the standard question is different. In labour law, for example, the Labour Court has to decide whether a dismissal was fair. The difference between these two standard cases is not so big as to justify the Court's holding that the first type of case never gives rise to a constitutional matter whereas the other always does. What would happen, one is tempted to think, if Parliament enacted a new Criminal Procedure Act with the express aim of giving effect to FC s 35? The logic of NEHAWU and the other decisions mentioned earlier would suggest that, in that event, all criminal cases would indeed give rise to constitutional matters.

Perhaps one should understand the Boesak judgment as standing for the principle that the Constitutional Court will not assume jurisdiction if all it is being asked to do is to reverse a factual finding made by a lower court. In a more recent judgment, the Constitutional Court has indeed stated its reluctance to reconsider factual findings already established in the course of adjudication: 'This Court, as any court of appeal, would be slow to interfere with findings of fact by a trial court based on a careful assessment of the credibility of witnesses and the probabilities of their respective versions.'[1] If this is so, however, this principle should apply to labour law and any other area of law as well. In addition, the basis for this principle would need to change from a pragmatic concern for limiting the flow of cases to the Court to an institutional and functional concern for the appropriate supervisory role of the Constitutional Court in relation to findings of fact (note the reference to 'any court of appeal' in the quote immediately above).

[1] Minister of Safety and Security v Van Niekerk 2007 (10) BCLR 1102 (CC) at para 10.

Even this narrow version of the Boesak principle has not been consistently applied by the Constitutional Court. While the Luiters Court held that the question of whether a person acted with intention is a purely factual question beyond the scope of its jurisdiction,[1] this very question was the basis on which the Court assumed jurisdiction in NM.[2] In another case, Rail Commuters Action Group, the Court emphasized that the Boesak judgment should not be read to mean that factual questions may never be resolved by the Court:

> This reasoning [in Boesak] does not imply that disputes of fact may not be resolved by this Court. It states merely that where the only issue in a criminal appeal is dissatisfaction with the factual findings made by the SCA, and no other constitutional issue is raised, no constitutional right is engaged by such a challenge. Where, however, a separate constitutional issue is raised in respect of which there are disputes of fact, those disputes of fact will constitute 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters' as contemplated by section 167(3)(b) of the Constitution.[3]

The rationale behind this holding, apparently, is that, in the eyes of the Constitutional Court, too many cases turn on the application of open-textured laws to facts in ways that render a distinction between fact and law uncertain. This conclusion means, in turn, that the distinction between fact and law does not provide a principled basis for determining the Court's jurisdiction.[4] This point obviously raises the question as to whether the Constitutional Court is in a position to establish facts itself. In most cases, it will rely on the facts as they have been established in the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. But there will be exceptions to this rule:

> Where an applicant seeks constitutional relief, and there is a dispute of fact on the papers before the Court, the identification of the facts upon which the constitutional matter should be adjudicated constitutes an issue connected with a decision on a constitutional matter which falls within this Court's jurisdiction. In such circumstances, this Court is not bound by the facts as determined by the SCA . . .[5]

In other words, the Constitutional Court will not decide a case that only raises factual questions. Factual questions are not constitutional matters in themselves. Nevertheless, the Court may decide them in exceptional circumstances where a

[1] See Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC) at para 28.
[2] See NM & Others v Smith & Others (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening) 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC).
[3] Rail Commuters Action Group (supra) at para 52.
[4] Kate O'Regan 'On the Reach of the Constitution and the Nature of Constitutional Jurisdiction: A Response to Frank Michelman' in Stu Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 51.
[5] Rail Commuters Action Group (supra) at para 53.

clear mistake made by a trial court can possibly justify the re-examination of a factual finding[1] or when doing so is necessary to decide another constitutional matter raised by the case, since factual questions would then be issues connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.

(ii) Incorrect application of the law

In Phoebus Apollo Aviation and, arguably, Metcash, the Constitutional Court declined jurisdiction on the basis that it has no power to overturn lower court judgments where the ordinary law is simply incorrectly applied. The starting point for this holding was the short decision of Lane & Fey NNO v Dabelstein & Others.[2] As in Boesak, the applicants in this case had argued that the Supreme Court of Appeal had failed to consider certain evidence and made a wrong factual finding, which infringed their right to a fair trial. The Constitutional Court rejected this argument:

> Even if the SCA had erred in its assessment of the facts that would not constitute the denial of the constitutional right contended for. The Constitution does not and could hardly ensure that litigants are protected against wrong decisions. On the assumption that section 34 of the Constitution does indeed embrace that right [to a fair trial], it would be the fairness and not the correctness of the court proceedings to which litigants would be entitled.[3]

The second and the third sentence in the above quote extend the Court's holding beyond the purely factual realm. In these sentences, the Court implies that it will not assume jurisdiction to overturn legally wrong decisions by lower courts if no additional constitutional complaint is involved. This rule formed the basis for the Court's later holding in Metcash that, as a general rule, litigants who dispute the correctness of an order made by the High Court — on the law or on the facts — are confined to an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal, with the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision being final.[4] As noted earlier, these statements show that the Constitutional Court does not accept the argument that a wrong legal finding constitutes unlawful action by a court, and that such a finding in itself violates the principle of legality, thereby raising a constitutional matter.[5]

The problem with the principle that the application of the ordinary law is not a matter for the Constitutional Court is that is has been so eroded by the Court that today it is very difficult to predict whether the Court would accept such an argument (typically raised in opposition to an application for leave to appeal). One simply needs to recall the cases discussed above in which the Court has

[1] Minister of Safety and Security v Van Niekerk (supra) at para 10 with explicit reference to Rail Commuters Action Group.
[2] 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC).
[3] Dabelstein (supra) at para 4.
[4] Metcash (supra) at para 14.
[5] See § 4.3*(d)*(ii) supra.

included whole areas of law under its jurisdiction on the basis that the controlling statute was enacted to give effect to the Final Constitution.[1] All of these cases involve the application of the ordinary law, and yet any such case will automatically raise a constitutional matter.

Even beyond these areas of law, the mere application of a legal rule in itself is sometimes regarded as being inconsistent with some constitutional right or principle. In Phoebus Apollo Aviation, the Constitutional Court declined jurisdiction on the basis that the application of a common-law principle was a matter solely for the High Courts and, eventually, for the Supreme Court of Appeal to determine. In K, the Constitutional Court held the very same common-law principle to be so imbued with policy and normative content that every application of it raised a constitutional matter.[2] In consequence, only applications of the ordinary law that do not involve policy choices can be said not to raise a constitutional matter.

Finally, there is a thin line between application and interpretation of legislation and application and development of the common law, the second of each of these pairs being subject to constitutional jurisdiction under FC s 39(2). There is also a lot of merit in the argument that application and interpretation are in fact one and the same thing.[3] In Fraser, the Court defined its role as being that of a benign interpreter of a statute that was relatively new on the statute book, the interpretation and application of which the Court therefore had to guide.[4] Could this mean that only the application of old statutes or longstanding common-law principles might not give raise to a constitutional matter? Probably not. Instead, what is crucial for the Constitutional Court is whether the lower court's decision is in line with the Final Constitution: 'Where an individual's rights have been infringed because a legal norm has been applied to a set of facts in a manner oblivious or careless of constitutional rights, a constitutional issue is raised.'[5]

In more practical terms, cases at the level of the Supreme Court of Appeal or the LAC usually involve questions about the interpretation of law and the development of the common law. It seems inevitable that any legal finding made by these courts could be attacked on the basis that it did not take the Final Constitution properly into account.

How far the Constitutional Court is prepared to go in assuming jurisdiction to review a case that really just deals with the application of non-constitutional law is also visible in Basson. One of the challenges in this case involved the trial judge's

[1] See § 4.3*(d)*(iii) supra.
[2] See § 4.3*(d)(i)* supra.
[3] See Lourens du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts. The Epoch of Constitutionalism and the Agenda for Statutory and Constitutional Interpretation in South Africa' (2000) 15 SAPR/PL 257, 295—99; Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32, § 32.3*(d)* and § 32.5*(c)(ii)*.
[4] Fraser (supra) at para 46 (my emphasis).
[5] Kate O'Regan 'On the Reach of the Constitution and the Nature of Constitutional Jurisdiction: A Response to Frank Michelman' in Stu Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 51.

decision to quash certain charges because they did not disclose an offence. The Supreme Court of Appeal had declined to reverse this finding because South African criminal law does not permit the prosecution to reserve a question of law for decision by the Supreme Court of Appeal in circumstances where an objection to a charge is upheld by a trial court. On appeal by the state, the Constitutional Court eventually held that this question raised a constitutional matter. But it was divided on how to justify this conclusion.

A majority of the Court took a route that rode roughshod over established precedents on constitutional jurisdiction. After a rather emotional beginning on how the criminal law plays an important role in protecting constitutional rights and values, and on the importance of the state's prosecutorial capacities, the majority held:

> Where a court quashes charges on the ground that they do not disclose an offence with the result that the state cannot prosecute that accused for that offence, the constitutional obligation of the prosecuting authority and the state, in turn, is obstructed. The constitutional import of such a consequence is particularly severe where the state is in effect prevented from prosecuting an offence aimed at protecting the right to life and security of the person. In these circumstances the quashing of a charge in an indictment will raise a constitutional matter.[1]

This passage is hard to reconcile with the Court's decision in Boesak, in which it held that the conviction of an accused is not in itself a constitutional matter. It would appear to follow from that decision that the acquittal of an accused should not in itself constitute a constitutional matter either. While Boesak could perhaps be distinguished on the grounds that it dealt with factual findings, cases like Dabelstein and Metcash clearly hold that legally wrong decisions do not per se raise constitutional matters. The majority in Basson is not, of course, wrong to say that the effective prosecution of crime is impeded if an accused is erroneously acquitted. But the error in such cases is part of the ordinary law and is exactly the sort of error that the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal are in the best position to rectify. This, at any rate, was the view taken by the minority in Basson. For these judges, there was no difference between a wrong decision that leads to the failure of a prosecution and a wrong decision that leads to the conviction and imprisonment of an accused person.

The Basson minority found a more sophisticated way to assume jurisdiction. First, the minority considered whether the trial court, in interpreting the applicable law, failed to take international law properly into account. This question is in line with the question the Constitutional Court asks in assuming jurisdiction under FC s 39, only in this case FC s 233 is the operative section. Having raised this question, however, the minority ultimately left it open in favour of assuming jurisdiction on another ground. This second ground was based, not on the decision by the trial court, but on the decision by the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[1] Basson (supra) at para 33.

According to the minority, FC s 168(3), which regulates the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal, was 'relevant to the proper construction' of the section of the Criminal Procedure Act on which the Supreme Court of Appeal had relied in deciding not to review the trial court's decision to quash the charges. It was this point that put the case within the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. An interpretation of the Criminal Procedure Act that precludes an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal, the minority held, 'has a material bearing' on 'the nature and ambit' of the powers of the Supreme Court of Appeal, and therefore raises a constitutional matter.[1]

This line of argument appears flawed: an interpretation of the Criminal Procedure Act in a single case has nothing to do with the general appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Appeal, and certainly does not limit 'the powers' of the Supreme Court of Appeal in terms of Chapter 8 of the Final Constitution. The only ground, therefore, that could convincingly have been used to bring the Basson matter under the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court would have been the proper consideration of international law by the trial court, but the minority found this question to be too difficult to decide.

A similarly faulty line of reasoning was applied in Phillips & Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions.[2] This matter concerned a High Court decision rescinding an earlier restraint order against certain assets of the applicants on the basis of a provision of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act 121 of 1998 ('the POCA'). The Supreme Court of Appeal reversed the High Court's decision, holding that a restraint order may not be varied or rescinded except in the narrow circumstances provided for in a statute or on the basis of a recognized common-law ground, which must have existed when the restraint order was granted. A High Court that grants a restraint order, in other words, has no inherent jurisdiction to rescind that order, because the POCA has limited that possibility. On appeal, the Constitutional Court rejected the respondent's claim that no constitutional matter was present as being 'clearly incorrect'.[3] According to the Court, the applicants' contention once again related to the 'nature and ambit of the powers of superior courts, in particular the scope of their inherent power'.[4]

In both Basson and Phillips, the Constitutional Court relied on its earlier decision in Bannatyne v Bannatyne.[5] Bannatyne concerned the power of a High Court to commit someone to prison for contempt of a maintenance order by a magistrate's court by way of so-called process-in-aid.[6] The respondent had contended that the [1] Basson (supra) at paras 109-111.

[2] 2006 (1) SA 505 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 274 (CC).
[3] Phillips (supra) at para 31.
[4] Ibid.
[5] 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC).
[6] Although money judgments cannot ordinarily be enforced by contempt proceedings, maintenance orders are in a special category in which such relief is competent. However, while a High Court has the power to entertain civil proceedings for committal for contempt to ensure that its own orders are obeyed, a maintenance court (which has the status of a magistrate's court) does not have these inherent powers, as there are only statutory remedies for the enforcement of its orders. Its orders may be enforced by execution upon the property of the person against whom the order has been made, or by the attachment of emoluments or debts due to him. The failure to comply with such an order might also constitute a criminal offence.

High Court had no jurisdiction to commit him for contempt by reason of his failure to comply with an order of the maintenance court, and that the applicant instead had to rely on the limited powers granted to the maintenance court. The Constitutional Court had assumed jurisdiction because it regarded this question as one concerning 'the nature and ambit' of the High Court's powers, thus implicating FC s 169.[1]

This finding appears justified. However, it perhaps stretches (a bit) the implications of FC Chapter 8 High Court powers. In Bannatyne, the Constitutional Court indeed had to rule on the exercise by the High Court of a general power, ie the power to convict a person for contempt when the original order was issued by another court. In Basson, by contrast, the Supreme Court of Appeal's general competence to hear appeals was not in question, but merely whether the state was entitled to a particular remedy in the circumstances. In Phillips, too, the Supreme Court of Appeal had not questioned the general power of the High Court to rescind its own orders. The Supreme Court of Appeal judgment in Phillips, in fact, was a decision on the merits: the applicants did not seek to have the restraint order rescinded on one of the grounds provided for in the Act — presumably because none of them would have been met. The same applied to the so-called common-law grounds under which a court may always set aside its own decisions,[2] as those conditions were not met either. Instead, Mr Phillips and the other applicants had asked the High Court to rescind the order in the circumstances which prevailed in that particular case. Against this background, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the statute prescribed conclusively the circumstances in which a High Court may vary or rescind a restraint order.[3] Thus, the Phillips case did not concern the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court, but whether in the specific circumstances of that case there was a legal basis for the applicants' rescission claim.

In the end, therefore, the Constitutional Court's reasoning in both Phillips and Basson that these cases touched on the nature and ambit of the judiciary's powers as contemplated in FC Chapter 8 is not persuasive. Instead, both cases simply involved questions of statutory interpretation (of the Criminal Procedure Act in Basson, and of the POCA in Phillips). As such, they illustrate the Constitutional Court's general willingness to reconsider the interpretation of the ordinary law by a lower court.

The Constitutional Court's decisions in other cases involving the POCA confirm this trend. The Act provides that property derived from crime ('proceeds') or used in the commission of crime ('instrumentalities') may be forfeited to the [1] Bannatyne (supra) at para 17.

[2] Such judgments would encompass decisions founded upon fraud, common mistake and the doctrine of instrumentum noviter repertum (the coming to light of as yet unknown documents). See the SCA judgment in National Director of Public Prosecutions v Phillips & Others 2005 (5) SA 265 (SCA) at para 21.

[3] Phillips SCA (supra) at para 19. See also Phillips CC (supra) at para 36 ('[T]he grounds for rescission provided by the Act constitute a closed list'.)

state.[1] The first set of cases concerned challenges to the procedure followed under the Act. All of these challenges were unsuccessful.[2] In 2006, however, an applicant challenged the forfeiture as such and thereby the application of the POCA.[3] The applicant, Mr Prophet, contended that there had to be proportionality between the offence committed and the property forfeited and that this had been not the case in the forfeiture in question (a house which he had allegedly used for manufacturing drugs). The Supreme Court of Appeal agreed with the applicant that the POCA required some form of proportionality between the crime committed and the property to be forfeited. The majority of the Supreme Court of Appeal, however, set a standard of 'significant disproportionality' to render a deprivation of property arbitrary and thus unconstitutional, and found that no disproportionality justifying the refusal of a forfeiture order had been shown to exist in Mr Prophet's case.[4]

The Constitutional Court assumed jurisdiction on the basis of FC s 39(2), holding that the relevant sections of the POCA needed to be interpreted in light of the Final Constitution, particularly the property clause in FC s 25.[5] The Court first considered whether the property at issue had been 'an instrumentality of an offence'. This pure question of law had been answered by the Supreme Court of Appeal. Instead of providing guidelines on how this term should be interpreted, however, the Constitutional Court merely repeated the Supreme Court of Appeal's finding. In so doing, the Constitutional Court did not refer to the Final Constitution at all, but simply re-evaluated the evidence.[6] The only thing the Court was asked to do was to confirm the constitutionality of the evidentiary standard applied by the SCA (proof on a balance of probabilities). It did so in a single sentence, almost by way of parenthesis.

With regard to the proportionality enquiry, the Constitutional Court did provide guidelines, holding that the proportionality of a forfeiture order depended on a number of different factors, including whether the property was integral to the commission of the crime; whether the forfeiture would prevent the further commission of the offence and its social consequences; whether the 'innocent owner'

[1] Both 'instrumentalities forfeiture' and 'proceeds forfeiture' are possible when the owner is not convicted of an offence but where it is established, on a balance of probabilities, that the particular property has been used to commit an offence, or constitutes the proceeds of unlawful activities, even where no criminal proceedings in respect of the relevant crimes have been instituted.

[2] See National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2002 (4) SA 843 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 970 (CC); National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC).

[3] Prophet v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2007 (6) SA 169 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 140 (CC). The applicant had also challenged the provisions of the POCA. The Constitutional Court did not allow the challenge because the applicant raised the issue for the first time in the Constitutional Court and had not sought a declaration of constitutional invalidity in the High Court or in the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[4] See Prophet v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SA 38 (SCA) at paras 37 and 41.

[5] Prophet (supra) at para 46.

[6] Ibid at paras 55-57.

defence would be available to the applicant; the nature and use of the property; and the effect on the applicant of the forfeiture of the property.[1] Since the Supreme Court of Appeal had essentially applied this test, the appeal was dismissed.

In Prophet, therefore, the Constitutional Court fulfilled its constitutional mandate by giving guidance to other courts on how to interpret and apply the POCA in line with the Constitution. In Mohunram, however, the Court assumed jurisdiction without adding to Prophet in any significant way.[2] The facts of Mohunram were almost identical to those in Prophet, the difference being that the offence of which Mr Mohunram had been accused was illegal gambling rather than the production of drugs. In addition, the property to be forfeited — the premises on which Mr Mohunram operated gaming machines — was registered in the name of a company in which he held a 100 percent member's interest. The High Court had dismissed the state's application for a forfeiture order, concluding that the property had not been shown to be an instrumentality of an offence. The state appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeal, which upheld the appeal and granted the forfeiture order.

Mr Mohunram appealed to the Constitutional Court. The Court assumed jurisdiction on the basis of its holding in Prophet.[3] It later did the same in Fraser.[4] These cases therefore indicate that the Court seems to have taken the view that every application of the POCA raises a constitutional matter. This conclusion either means that the Court has included the POCA in its list of statutes, the mere application of which is always subject to constitutional review, or that civil forfeiture is an area of law so imbued with policy considerations that every application of the POCA raises a constitutional matter.[5] Either way, these cases further erode the general principle that the ordinary application of the law is not subject to constitutional review.

In its decision on the merits in Mohunram, the majority of the Constitutional Court (in two separate judgments) found the forfeiture to be disproportional. (A minority found it to be proportional.) Before considering this issue, the Court reviewed all of the applicant's contentions in the same way that the Supreme Court of Appeal had done, with all the judges agreeing that an illegal casino

[1] The quantity of the prohibited substance found on the premises was not a decisive factor in determining proportionality. Prophet (supra) at paras 63, 65.

[2] Mohunram & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another (Law Review Project As Amicus Curiae) 2007 (4) SA 222 (CC), 2007 (6) BCLR 575 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 9.

[4] Fraser v ABSA Bank Limited 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 219 (CC).

[5] A similar argument was used in Van der Merwe & Another v Taylor NO & Others 2008 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2007 (11) BCLR 1167 (CC)(With regard to seizure in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act.) In a minority judgment, Mokgoro J wrote: 'Once the State seizes private property . . . and the legal basis for the seizure and holding is in dispute, the question of arbitrary deprivation of property under section 25(1) of the Constitution is clearly implicated, making the matter intrinsically a constitutional one.' Ibid at para 20. The majority of the Court avoids that conclusion (because it may have 'serious implications') and merely assumes, without deciding, that the case raises a constitutional matter. Ibid at para 106.

had been operated on the premises in question[1] and that the property was instrumental in this illegal gambling activity.[2] In addition to these questions, the Constitutional Court considered two aspects of the case that had not been considered earlier, viz, whether illegal gambling was a sufficiently serious offence for an order of civil forfeiture in terms of the POCA (the minority of the Court held that it was while the majority left this question open),[3] and whether the forfeiture provisions in the applicable provincial gambling act should preclude the application of the POCA (the minority and the majority disagreed on this question).[4] These two questions on their own could be said to have raised constitutional matters since they required the Court to define the overall scope of the POCA in light of the Bill of Rights and to determine whether a provincial or a national act should apply. Even if the Constitutional Court was legitimately entitled to answer these questions, however, it was not strictly speaking necessary for it to reconsider the Supreme Court of Appeal's factual findings, or its application of the proportionality test. While these issues could be seen to be issues connected to the Court's decision on the two genuinely constitutional matters, a more restrained Court might have assumed jurisdiction to decide the two novel points, and left the Supreme Court of Appeal's findings on the facts, and its application of the proportionality test, undisturbed.

Mohunram is not the only case in which the Constitutional Court has essentially second-guessed the Supreme Court of Appeal's application of a legal test without adding to our constitutional understanding of it. A common thread running through these judgments is that they almost all involve some sort of proportionality or balancing enquiry mandated by the ordinary law. Dikoko, for example, concerned the assessment of damages for defamation,[5] while Du Toit v Minister of Transport engaged the calculation of compensation for expropriation.[6] In some of these cases the Constitutional Court agreed with the Supreme Court of Appeal, while in others it substituted its view for that of the other court. In theory, when the Constitutional Court upholds an appeal against the Supreme Court of Appeal, it must do so on the basis that the Supreme Court of Appeal failed to take constitutional considerations into account, or that it misunderstood the true import of the Final Constitution for the case. All that the Constitutional Court really does in these cases, however, is to repeat the enquiry that the Supreme Court of Appeal has already conducted. Whether it ultimately upholds or dismisses the appeal, the ordinary law is not constitutionally developed.

[1] Van der Merwe & Another v Taylor NO & Others (supra) at paras 35-37.
[2] Ibid at paras 43-55.
[3] Ibid at paras 15-34 (minority) and 111-117 (majority).
[4] Ibid at paras 38-42 (minority) and 127-128 (majority).
[5] Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 236 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[6] 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC).

A particularly unfortunate example of this trend is NM & Others v Smith & Others (Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening).[1] The applicants in NM claimed damages against the defendants for publishing their names and HIV status in a book without their prior consent. The High Court had dismissed the claim on the basis that the defendants had not acted wrongfully and had had no intention of harming the applicants. The Constitutional Court, by majority judgment, awarded damages. The jurisdictional part of the judgment is nothing short of a conceptual disaster:

> The dispute before us is clearly worthy of constitutional adjudication and it is in the interests of justice that the matter be heard by this Court since it involves a nuanced and sensitive approach to balancing the interests of the media, in advocating freedom of expression, privacy and dignity of the applicants irrespective of whether it is based on the constitutional law or the common law. This Court is in any event mandated to develop and interpret the common law if necessary.[2]

As mentioned above in relation to Dikoko, the problem with assuming jurisdiction to review rules that are related to constitutional rights is that almost every legal rule is so related. For the Court to base its jurisdiction on this factor — not to mention on an empty slogan like 'worth[iness]' — is to ignore even the lowest threshold the Final Constitution offers for limiting it jurisdiction. The holding in NM not only distorts any such idea. It also seems to imply that the idea of limited jurisdiction is nothing but a minor inconvenience that can be ignored or overcome with ease. FC s 167 does not, however, grant jurisdiction to the Constitutional Court when a dispute is 'worthy', but only when it involves a constitutional matter. What has happened in NM, one might ask, to the notion of the need for a bona fide constitutional matter emphasized in Fraser? The reference to the development of the common law only adds insult to injury. The High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal are primarily responsible for developing and interpreting the common law. The Constitutional Court is only mandated to oversee their decisions when there is some indication that these courts have developed the law in a way not countenanced by the Final Constitution. Instead, FC s 39(2) is introduced in NM almost light-heartedly as a kind of fall-back position. It is exactly this understanding of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction that has made more or less every application of the common or statutory law a constitutional matter.

The NM Court might be forgiven had it been necessary to develop the common law in order to vindicate the applicant's claim. But the majority expressly held that the common law as it stood was in line with the Final Constitution.[3] The sole basis for its decision was that the defendants, contrary to what the lower courts had found, had acted intentionally. The assumption of jurisdiction in such circumstances directly contradicts Luiters, in which the Court held that the question of whether someone acts with intention is a factual question and does not therefore raise a constitutional matter.[1] In ignoring this precedent, the majority in NM assumed the role of an ordinary appeal court, second-guessing the lower courts' application of the ordinary law and their interpretation of the facts. Although the Constitutional Court may, after this decision, still pay lip service to the doctrine that cases involving the application of the ordinary law, whether common or statutory, do not raise constitutional matters, its own jurisprudence points in the other direction.

[1] 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC).
[2] NM (supra) at para 31.
[3] NM (supra) at para 57.

(h) An alternative conception of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction

This chapter has thus far been concerned with an overview of the Constitutional Court's case law on its jurisdiction under FC s 167. The different categories of constitutional matters that the Constitutional Court has embraced have been examined, together with the situations in which the Court has declined jurisdiction. The critique thus far has been limited to the question of coherence, i e to the question whether the Court has established clear rules determining its jurisdiction and whether these rules have been consistently applied. The aim of this exercise has been to provide litigants with assistance on how to assess their case with regard to the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction — the first hurdle in bringing a successful constitutional claim.

This section tries to address the broader consequences of the Constitutional Court's understanding of its jurisdiction and asks a number of conceptual questions. Has the Court delivered on its mandate as a court of limited jurisdiction and as an institution with a transformative function? Does the framework for the division of responsibilities between the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal devised by the Constitutional Assembly in the mid-1990s still make sense? Is it possible to draw a theoretically sound distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters in a system of constitutional supremacy? Is it possible to draw a meaningful distinction between matters that are decided by the Constitutional Court and those that are not?

(i) Consequences of the Constitutional Court's approach to its jurisdiction

The Constitutional Court's approach to understanding the term 'constitutional matter' as the entry point to its jurisdiction has had a number of unfortunate consequences.

[1] See Luiters (supra) at para 28.

(aa) It has become impossible to determine when the Constitutional Court will decline jurisdiction

If the cases discussed above indicate anything at all, it is that the Constitutional Court has adopted an understanding of the all-pervasiveness of the Final Constitution in the legal system that effectively renders the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters illusory. This is not to say that the Constitutional Court will never decline jurisdiction. It is just that it has become impossible to predict with any certainty in which cases it will do so. This is not merely a problem for parties seeking to access the Court. It also casts doubt on the foundational notion of the Constitutional Court as a court of special, limited jurisdiction.

Save for the exceptional situation where no issue other than a purely factual question is present when the case reaches the Constitutional Court,[1] every case that involves the interpretation and application of either statutory or common law may potentially raise a constitutional matter. With regard to statutes that have been enacted after 1994, one can never be entirely sure whether the Constitutional Court will include them in its list of legislation enacted to give effect or content to a provision of the Bill of Rights, or otherwise to provide the framework for some constitutional principle. Depending on this classification, the Constitutional Court may or may not assume jurisdiction over any interpretation or application of the legislation concerned, leading in the first instance to total control of the subject matter of the case.

With regard to the common law, the distinction between development of the law (which is subject to constitutional scrutiny) and mere application (which is supposedly not) has collapsed in cases where the common-law principle is open to 'policy choices' or where the case 'implicates' one or more rights in the Bill of Rights. And yet what lawyer would confidently advise a client that the common-law principle central to his or her matter was not an expression of some or other social policy or a balance struck between competing constitutional rights?

How did this happen? The most likely explanation is that the Constitutional Court's almost de facto plenary jurisdiction is a consequence of the supervisory role it has undertaken to ensure that lower courts interpret, develop, construe or apply the law through the prism of the Final Constitution. The original basis for this notion was the Court's understanding of the all-pervasiveness of the Final Constitution in relation to the rest of the legal system. The Court early on recognized that the ordinary law is not separate from the Final Constitution, but 'intertwined'[2] with it, and that the Final Constitution and the ordinary law form

[1] This qualifier is important to show that the case may well have included many constitutional matters when it started in the High Court. However, on its way up the court hierarchy all of them had been decided and the parties did not pursue any of them further. The open questions that were still decisive for the case had been reduced. What the Constitutional Court is really saying, therefore, is that it does not want to deal with cases where the only matter left for it to decide is one of fact.

[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 33.

just one standard against which the conduct of those bound by the Final Constitution is to be measured. Frank Michelman has pointed out that the Constitutional Court in this respect follows an ideal of the unity of the legal system.[1] In my view, Michelman not only correctly describes the ideals followed by the Constitutional Court, his description also embraces the ideals espoused by the Final Constitution itself. This ideal is to be found not only in the supremacy clause (FC s 2) but also in FC s 8(1) — FC s 8(1) proclaims that the Bill of Rights applies to all law.

None of the above is problematic. The problem only arises because of the further step that the Constitutional Court has taken: according to its jurisprudence, not only is all law subject to the Final Constitution, but so too is every legal finding. In the eyes of the Court, every alleged shortcoming in a judgment renders the case in principle appealable. Here, I respectfully differ with Michelman: the structural basis for this understanding is not the principle of legality, ie the fact that the lower court (allegedly) made a wrong finding of law. Instead, the Constitutional Court assumes jurisdiction because it regards it as its duty to ensure that lower courts fulfil their constitutional obligation to interpret and apply the ordinary law in line with the Final Constitution. The constitutional basis, therefore, is not the principle of legality, but FC s 39(2). The Constitutional Court has developed its understanding of its mandate on the back of this provision, but reads the provision in a very wide sense, in a way that arguably goes beyond the provision's intended scope. Today, the Constitutional Court's understanding of FC s 39(2) requires 'every court, tribunal or forum [to] promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights' not only when interpreting any legislation and when developing the common law (or customary law), but in everything they do, including every settlement of a dispute and every process of adjudication. From this conception of the constitutional character of other courts' ordinary functions, the Constitutional Court has developed its conception of itself as being constitutionally mandated and empowered to supervise the work of the lower courts. This does not mean, of course, that every assumption of jurisdiction by the Constitutional Court can be retraced to FC s 39(2). What it means is that the Court has adopted a reading of FC s 39(2) that renders the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters practically meaningless.

The enlargement of the scope of FC s 39(2) so as to support the Constitutional Court's supervisory role is paradoxically visible in the Boesak case, one of the few cases in which the Court eventually declined jurisdiction. In Boesak, the Court held that a constitutional matter would arise if the Supreme Court of Appeal (or any other court) 'developed, or failed to develop, the rule under circumstances inconsistent with its obligation under section 39(2) of the Constitution or with some other right or principle of the Constitution.'[2] In this passage the wide reading of FC s 39(2) is clearly present: the Court's jurisdiction to oversee the development of the law arises not just where FC s 39(2) is directly engaged and not only when the Bill of Rights is in issue, but also where the lower court develops or fails to develop the law in line with 'some other [constitutional] right or principle'.[1]

[1] Michelman (supra) at § 11.4*(b)*.
[2] Boesak (supra) at para 15*(b)*, my emphasis, footnote omitted.

Other cases point in the same direction, in particular those in which the Constitutional Court assumed jurisdiction on questionable grounds — most obviously, Dikoko, Basson, NM and K, but also NEHAWU. In all these cases the Court assumed jurisdiction on the basis that the lower court was bound to take the Final Constitution into account: either in the exercise of its discretion in relation to a procedural or substantive matter, or in the application of a statute. It is this understanding that makes the Court's conception of what constitutes a 'constitutional matter' virtually limitless. Put slightly differently, the Final Constitutional Court has adopted an understanding of the influence of the Final Constitution in the application of the ordinary law that is based on an extremely wide interpretation of FC s 39(2).

Michelman argues that the principle of legality, properly understood, collapses the distinction between unlawful and unconstitutional decisions of lower courts. His point is that the yardstick for every court, ie the lawfulness of its decision, has been constitutionalized. But the distinction between unlawful and unconstitutional decisions is at least theoretically still upheld in South African law (with the exception of cases involving the review of administrative and executive action). The Constitutional Court has adopted its own yardstick for reviewing lower court decisions that encompasses everything they do in a way that makes it irrelevant whether the lower court's decision was lawful or not. To put it differently: when the emphasis is placed on the principle of legality, every wrong decision is open to review by the Constitutional Court. This means that an applicant to the Constitutional Court would have to argue that the lower court made a wrong decision in the same way s/he would argue an appeal from a High Court to the Supreme Court of Appeal. When the emphasis is placed on the Constitutional Court's power to control the interpretation and application of the law, every decision is open to review by the Court, even lawful ones.

Is such a wide understanding of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction the consequence of the underlying principle embodied by FC s 39(2) or just of an aberrational reading of that provision? One approach might be to argue that every application of legislation necessarily involves its interpretation, but that there must be a difference between the development and the mere application of the common law. FC s 39(2) only mentions the former and thus the Constitutional Court was right to emphasize the distinction between application and development in cases like Shabalala and Carmichele. But is it really possible hermetically to seal off the courts' function in applying the law from their duty to develop or interpret it?

[1] See Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32 at § 32.1*(c)*: although there are difference between provisions of the Bill of Rights and other provisions in the Constitution these should not be overemphasized as both can mutually reinforce the values of the Constitution, in particular with regard to rights: fundamental rights can be protected — or conditions conducive to their protection can be created and enhanced — by giving effect to constitutional norms that do not form part of the Bill of Rights.

Both legal scholars and practitioners have strongly and convincingly advocated that it is not.[1] In her extra-curial writings, Constitutional Court judge Kate O'Regan has pointed out that the Constitution envisages a unified legal system within an overall objective, normative framework provided by the text of the Final Constitution. This unified system encompasses statute law, common law and customary law, and subjects all of them to the discipline of constitutional norms and values. FC s 39(2) is a textual indicator that all courts are enjoined to work within this unified system to promote the Final Constitution's vision for a just society.[2] Against that backdrop, there can be no distinction between interpretation, application and development of non-constitutional law.

Furthermore, experience in Germany suggests that once constitutional influence on the interpretation, application and formation of non-constitutional law is accepted and subject to review by the Constitutional Court (by the method of indirect application of the Final Constitution under an objective, normative framework), the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is potentially limitless.[3] When a Constitution is both supreme and all-pervasive, and when this all-pervasiveness is at least partly executed by way of the interpretation and application of the ordinary law, a clear-cut distinction between constitutional and ordinary (read: non-constitutional) law, and between a Constitutional Court and every other court, is impossible to draw.[4] Importantly, any resultant blurring of the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional jurisdiction should not be seen as part of some or other strategy on the part of the Constitutional Court to expand its domain at the expense of other judicial and political actors. Rather, any shift in

[1] See Lourens du Plessis 'Re-reading Enacted Law-texts. The Epoch of Constitutionalism and the Agenda for Statutory and Constitutional Interpretation in South Africa' (2000) 15 SAPR/PL 257, 295–299; Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32, § 32.3*(d)* and § 32.5*(c)*(ii).

[2] Kate O'Regan 'On the Reach of the Constitution and the Nature of Constitutional Jurisdiction: A Response to Frank Michelman' in Stu Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 51.

[3] The Bundesverfassungsgericht's jurisprudence on indirect horizontal application and the establishment of an objective order of values has been criticized on the basis that, although these doctrines have opened the legal system to fundamental rights, they have at the same time eliminated any distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional law. See Ernst-Wolfgang Böckenförde Zur Lage der Grundrechtsdogmatik nach 40 Jahren Grundgesetz (1990) 32; Christian Starck 'Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit und Fachgerichte' (1996) 51 Juristenzeitung 1033, 1035. It has even been suggested that the doctrine of a clear-cut distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional law in the German context is nothing but a 'Lebenslüge' (a lifelong illusion). See Philip Kunig 'Verfassungsrecht und einfaches Recht — Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit und Fachgerichtsbarkeit' (2002) 61 VVDStRL 34, 40.

[4] See Georg Hermes 'Verfassungsrecht und einfaches Recht — Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit und Fachgerichtsbarkeit' (2002) 61 VVDStRL 119, 124-126; and the comment by Dieter Grimm (ibid) at 180-82.

the balance of power between the various branches of government and within the judicial branch must be seen as an almost inevitable consequence of the Constitutional Court's attempt to give full recognition to the Final Constitution.[1]

(bb) Every case notionally raises a constitutional matter

The other side of the coin of the Constitutional Court's move to control lower courts' interpretation and application of the law is that every case can be treated as raising a constitutional matter. The Constitutional Court has been very clear that a constitutional matter raised must be genuine:

> [T]his Court will not assume jurisdiction over a non-constitutional matter only because an application for leave to appeal is couched in constitutional terms. It is incumbent upon an applicant to demonstrate the existence of a bona fide constitutional question. An issue does not become a constitutional matter merely because an applicant calls it one.[2]

The Court itself, however, is to blame for the fact it has become all too easy to do just that. By ruling that it has jurisdiction whenever a litigant contends that a lower court has failed to develop the common law or to interpret legislation in accordance with the Final Constitution, the Court has set the jurisdictional threshold very low: such allegations, at any rate, are seemingly sufficient to raise a bona fide constitutional matter.

The crucial point is not that a litigant will sometimes try to postpone a final ruling by applying to the Constitutional Court and desperately 'couch[ing]' its application 'in constitutional terms'. Rather, the point is that the Court's conception of the term 'constitutional matter' does not stop it from assuming jurisdiction if it wants to in these cases. It is always possible to claim that the ordinary law either itself infringes the Final Constitution or that the lower court did or did not interpret/develop the ordinary law consistently with the Final Constitution.

(cc) The transformative function of the Constitutional Court is impaired

A third consequence of the approach adopted by the Constitutional Court to its jurisdiction is that the Court has blurred the line between itself, on the one hand, and the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts, on the other, in a way that has damaged its transformation agenda. As we have seen, the Constitutional Court has asserted its jurisdiction in a way that goes beyond even the few conceptual limits it has imposed on the exercise of its powers. It has decided not only cases, or issues within cases, that engaged the Final Constitution, but on several occasions has assumed jurisdiction when merely the application of statutory or common law was at stake. To this extent, I agree with Stu Woolman that part of the problem lies in the fact that the mere assertion by a litigant of a need to develop the common law often persuades the Court to assume jurisdiction, even though the judges later find that the common law need not be developed.[1] But the deeper problem is that the Court does not take its own institutional function seriously.

[1] Dieter Grimm 'Constitutional Issues in Substantive Law — Limits of Constitutional Jurisdiction' in Ingolf Pernice, Juliane Kokott & Cheryl Saunders (eds) The Future of the European Judicial System in a Comparative Perspective (2006) 277, 279.

[2] Fraser (supra) at para 40 (footnote omitted).

As I pointed out at the beginning of this chapter, the Constitutional Court was established to institutionalize the break from the colonial and apartheid legal order to a new legal order in which constitutional parameters would inform the limits and the content of the law, both with regard to rules and their application in day-to-day life. The purpose of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is, consequently, to ensure that this transformation takes place. The role of the Constitutional Court is, as far as the common law and statutory law are concerned, to ensure legal unity from the perspective of the Final Constitution.[2] This transformative function is secured by the possibility of appeal to the Constitutional Court against any lower court's decision, and by the Constitutional Court's mandate to ensure that other courts have as much regard to the Final Constitution as it does itself. The Court's jurisdiction 'includes' (or is equivalent to, as noted earlier) 'the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution' (FC s 167(7)), because the exercise of these powers by the Court ensures that the legal order is brought into line with constitutional imperatives. The Court needed to say in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers that there is only one system of law in South Africa because its comprehensive review powers, and thus its transformative function, would otherwise have been threatened. This is also why the Court in Du Plessis v De Klerk and later in Carmichele mentioned the 'evolving fabric of our society',[3] to which the judiciary has to have regard in bringing the common law into harmony with the Final Constitution. By interpreting, protecting and enforcing the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court guides the development of the legal order, and ensures that constitutional standards that have already been established are adhered to.

The flipside of these observations, however, is that the Constitutional Court should not have jurisdiction when the constitutional project is not advanced. When there is neither a need to bring the law into line with the Final Constitution nor to ensure that a lower court adheres to an established constitutional standard, there is also no need for the Constitutional Court to become involved in the matter. What is required in these cases is the simple ascertainment of facts or the mere application of constitutionally compliant law. This principle does not only apply to entire judgments, but is also valid with regard to different aspects of a judgment. As most cases involve several legal issues, the Constitutional Court

[1] See Stu Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007)124 SALJ 762, 782 n40 (With particular reference to NM).

[2] The value of legal unity as a constitutional value has been convincingly portrayed by Michelman. See Michelman (supra) at § 11.4*(b)*.

[3] Du Plessis v De Klerk (supra) at para 61; Carmichele (supra) at para 36.

should distinguish between those aspects of a case that raise a constitutional matter and those that do not. As we have seen, however, the Constitutional Court, while upholding the credo that purely factual questions are none of its business, has effectively given up (or at least has substantially cut back) on its limited jurisdiction in cases where constitutionally compliant law is applied. In so doing it has turned itself into an 'Über-Appeal Court'.

The Court's failure to distinguish between matters in which it provides a constitutional guideline and those where it assumes the role of a High Court and second-guesses the facts of the case weakens the influence of the Constitution in the overall legal framework of South Africa. This is so for two reasons. First, since the Court has to justify its findings with regard to the Final Constitution, deciding cases that it does not have to creates the impression that everything may be deduced from the Final Constitution. The Final Constitution is, in other words, presented as the answer to all legal questions. This stance undermines the value of the Final Constitution as a foundation — but not a substitute — for the legal and social order in South Africa.

Secondly, the Constitutional Court, even with all the supervisory powers it has assumed, will not be able to transform the entire legal system on its own. As a practical matter, the Court will never be able to hear all the cases that have constitutional implications. What is needed to ensure the transformation of the South African legal order is for every other court to feel not only bound, but also encouraged to 'promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights' (FC s 39(2)). To achieve transformation of the kind envisaged by the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court needs the support of the lower courts, in particular the Supreme Court of Appeal. It is in this regard that the 'über-appeal-court approach' taken by the Constitutional Court has been particularly unhelpful.

The same criticism could be levelled against the Constitutional Court's seeming determination to decide every factual question in the process of adjudicating a constitutional matter, even where this means overturning factual findings made by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1] The Constitutional Court's assumption of a general supervisory role can be justified. The principle underlying FC s 39(2), after all, inevitably leads to this sort of role. But the Court's supervisory role should be performed with care and respect for the Supreme Court of Appeal — not only because of the Supreme Court of Appeal's greater experience in dealing with the common law, but also because of the need to trust the Supreme Court of Appeal's general willingness and capacity to take account of the Final Constitution in its decisions. The need for such institutional respect has been acknowledged by the Constitutional Court on several occasions. But it needs to be observed, too. What this means is that, when the Constitutional Court is asked to review a decision of the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal involving the balancing of rights or the application of a proportionality test, the Constitutional Court should refrain from interfering with the decision unless it can be shown to have been based on a misunderstanding of the applicable constitutional standard or a misapplication of the applicable constitutional criteria. The mere fact that the Constitutional Court would have decided the case differently is not enough.

[1] See Rail Commuters Action Group (supra) at para 53; but compare Minister of Safety and Security v Van Niekerk (supra) at para 10.

To sum up: the Constitutional Court has established an understanding of the term 'constitutional matter' that makes it impossible to predict whether it will assume jurisdiction in any given case, and which encourages parties to pretend that their case raises a constitutional matter. The Court has also asserted its jurisdiction in a way that often second-guesses the Supreme Court of Appeal's legal findings, even where the Final Constitution is not applied. This approach has led to a situation in which the Court has declared large areas of law to be automatically subject to its jurisdiction, including labour law, administrative law, broadcasting law and the law of defamation. In these matters, the Court does not distinguish between cases and aspects of cases that engage the Final Constitution, but applies and interprets the common law and statute law like any other court. This approach is not what was envisaged by the Constitutional Assembly. It is also conceptually and analytically weak, and bad for the Court's own transformation agenda.

(ii) A functional approach to jurisdiction

In order to remedy these shortcomings, the Constitutional Court needs to do three things. First, it should in conception and in practice adopt an approach to its jurisdiction that recognizes the limited powers it is supposed to exercise according to FC s 167(3)(b). Secondly, the Court's approach to its jurisdiction should at least to some extent distinguish between cases it is likely to hear and those it will leave to the Supreme Court of Appeal to decide. Finally, the Court should take account of its transformative function, which is to say, it should distinguish between cases it needs to decide to ensure that the ordinary law is in line with the Final Constitution, both in form and in application, and those that it does not need to decide for this reason.

(aa) Limits of a substantive, and benefits of a functional, understanding of 'constitutional matter'

The Court's current, substantive approach to the definition of 'constitutional matter' is inherently inadequate. An all-encompassing, all-pervasive Constitution and a Constitutional Court that has a mandate to ensure the unity of the legal system — as Frank Michelman has convincingly shown — is irreconcilable with any distinction between areas of substantive law that fall inside, and areas that fall outside, the scope of the Court's jurisdiction. Any definition of the term 'constitutional matter' that tries to limit the type of matters that the Court may conceivably hear by asking what the case is about is futile and bound to fail. As long as a dispute is legal, and as long as there is any statutory, customary or common-law principle guiding the dispute, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, i e must decide the case from a constitutional vantage point. And as long as the Court adopts its supervisory role with regard to other courts' obligations under FC s 39(2), there is no case which is beyond its jurisdiction.

In Dikoko, Skweyiya J, in dissent, made a remark that pointed to the dilemma that a solely substantive understanding of the Court's jurisdiction poses: '[W]hile it is accepted that all matters have constitutional implications, in order to recognise and preserve this Court's jurisdictional distinction a line must be drawn.'[1] When all matters have 'constitutional implications', substantive considerations cannot be used to distinguish between constitutional and non-constitutional matters: something cannot be part of itself. It is necessary therefore to ignore substantive considerations — at least to a certain extent. For the Constitutional Court to make sense of its limited jurisdiction and to develop an understanding of its position in the court structure, the Court will have to move beyond the notion that in some areas of law legislation has been enacted to give effect to a fundamental right. It will also have to move beyond the notion that a dispute raises a constitutional matter because it has implications for the balance struck between rights enshrined in the Final Constitution. These propositions are not false, but they are meaningless as devices to determine the Court's jurisdiction. In some very limited cases, the substantive approach may suffice — for example, to decline jurisdiction when only factual questions are left for decision by the Constitutional Court. But in the majority of cases factual questions play only a secondary role. And, in any case, the Constitutional Court's approach to its jurisdiction cannot be restricted to sorting out purely factual disputes. Legal questions can be non-constitutional matters, too.

It remains a dilemma that with an all-pervasive Constitution every legal rule has some or other constitutional dimension. This conclusion seems to be at odds with the idea of a Constitutional Court separate from other courts, not only as an institution, but also in jurisdictional terms. Other constitutional courts, however, have also struggled with this situation, and there is much to be learned from their experience. In Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court has over time developed an approach that tries to reconcile its limited jurisdiction with the all-pervasiveness of the German Constitution.[2] The conceptual breakthrough in this process came when the Court realized that a distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters (or between constitutional and non-constitutional law) based on purely substantive criteria was not viable — but that functional criteria might work.

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 123.

[2] In Germany, the pervasiveness of the Basic Law is amplified by the fact that the Grundgesetz states explicitly what Frank Michelman assumes to be the case for South Africa's Final Constitution. According to art 20(3) of the Grundgesetz, both the executive and the judiciary are bound by law and justice. Thus, in the constitutional order of the Grundgesetz, every wrong legal finding can indeed be seen as an infringement of the principle of legality and thus the Constitution.

From early on the Bundesverfassungsgericht made it clear that it would ensure that all courts in their respective jurisdictions took the Constitution into account and did not adjudicate contrary to it. The approach adopted by the Bundesverfassungsgericht has widened the scope of its review powers to include, effectively, all judgments of all other courts.[1] Of course, such an extensive and all-encompassing supervisory function, which the Court has opened up through its judgments, has raised questions about its status as a court of limited jurisdiction, and also about the practicality of broadening its jurisdiction in this way. The Bundesverfassungsgericht has therefore moved to temper its broad review powers by reducing the intensity of its control function, especially with regard to constitutional complaints concerning judicial decisions (roughly the equivalent of appeals to the South African Constitutional Court). In particular, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has developed the principle that it will — notwithstanding the doctrine of legality — not review every (alleged) breach of the ordinary law, but only whether the court a quo's interpretation and application of the law has disregarded constitutional obligations:

> The Bundesverfassungsgericht has to check whether the ordinary court has rightly assessed the scope and the effect of the fundamental rights in the sphere of civil law. There follows from this at the same time the limit to this review: it is not for the Constitutional Court to check judgments of the civil courts completely for errors in law; the Constitutional Court has merely to assess the 'permeating effect' [also translated as the 'radiating effect'] of the fundamental rights on the civil law mentioned, and bring the value content of the constitutional principle to bear here too. It is the object of the institution of the constitutional complaint to make all acts of the legislative, executive and judicial power subject to review for 'constitutionality' (s 90 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act). Just as the Federal Constitutional Court is not called upon to act as a body for appeal or indeed 'super appeal'

[1] Milestones in the Bundesverfassungsgericht's jurisprudence in this regard are: BVerfGE 6, 32 ('Elfes')(1957)('The constitutional right to personal freedom protects every aspect of human behaviour and not just those specified and enumerated by other, more specific constitutional rights or by legislation. An infringement of a constitutional right can only be justified when the infringing act is both procedurally and substantively in line with the Constitution. Anybody can challenge any burdensome law as an infringement of basic rights through the procedure of constitutional complaint. The Constitutional Court will have jurisdiction in these cases and will assess both whether the challenged norm violates the fundamental rights as such and whether the norm was enacted according to the formally correct procedure); BVerfGE 7, 198 ('Lüth')(1958) (Ordinary courts can infringe fundamental rights when they fail to recognize the impact the Constitution has on private law. Here the Court used the 'objective value order' argument that later featured prominently in the South African Constitutional Court's decision in Carmichele. The Constitutional Court will review judgments with regard to such failures); BVerfGE 39, 1 ('Schwangerschaftsabbruch (1)' ['First Abortion Decision'])(1975)(The state has a duty to protect the fundamental rights of the Grundgesetz against private infringement. If non-action leaves citizens' fundamental rights unprotected, the legislature is constitutionally obliged to act. The Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to decide whether the state has fulfilled these positive obligations.)

> over the civil courts, so it should not universally refrain from reviewing such judgments and ignoring a misapprehension of norms and standards of fundamental rights that may occur in them.[1]

In this passage, the Bundesverfassungsgericht made it clear that its function is not to ensure that other courts' judgments are 'correct' — this is the task of the appeal courts — and that it will not overturn judgments simply because they are wrong in law. Like the efforts by the South African Constitutional Court to get to grips with the term 'constitutional matter', however, the Bundesverfassungsgericht initially struggled to determine when the judgment of an ordinary court should be construed as violating the Constitution. In 1964 it invented a test, which it has retained and developed since then:

> The . . . specific function of the Bundesverfassungsgericht would not be achieved if it were to review court decisions on questions of law in an unrestricted way like an appellate court, just because an incorrect decision could possibly affect the constitutional rights of the parties concerned. . . . Only when a court decision violates specific constitutional law, may the Bundesverfassungsgericht interfere on the basis of a constitutional complaint. Specific constitutional law has not been violated merely when a judgment has been incorrectly decided in terms of the ordinary law; instead the mistake of the lower court must lie in its disregard for constitutional rights.[2]

The now famous 'Heck formula' of 'specific constitutional law' (named after its inventor, Judge Karl Heck) of course begs the question of what is 'specific' about constitutional law. The Bundesverfassungsgericht admitted that even this formula would not always be able to delineate the limits of the court's review powers. However, it claimed, nevertheless, that limitation was a blessing in disguise: a certain degree of flexibility in the scope of its review powers was necessary to ensure the performance of its supervisory function. In later judgments, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has refined its definition of 'specific constitutional law'.[1] As the law now stands, a judgment of a lower court violates constitutional law:

[1] BVerfGE 7, 198, 207 ('Lüth'): 'Das Verfassungsgericht hat zu prüfen, ob das ordentliche Gericht die Reichweite und Wirkkraft der Grundrechte im Gebiet des bürgerlichen Rechts zutreffend beurteilt hat. Daraus ergibt sich aber zugleich die Begrenzung der Nachprüfung: es ist nicht Sache des Verfassungsgerichts, Urteile des Zivilrichters in vollem Umfange auf Rechtsfehler zu prüfen; das Verfassungsgericht hat lediglich die bezeichnete 'Ausstrahlungswirkung' der Grundrechte auf das bürgerliche Recht zu beurteilen und den Wertgehalt des Verfassungsrechtssatzes auch hier zur Geltung zu bringen. Sinn des Instituts der Verfassungsbeschwerde ist es, daß alle Akte der gesetzgebenden, vollziehenden und richterlichen Gewalt auf ihre 'Grundrechtmäßigkeit' nachprüfbar sein sollen (§ 90 BVerfGG). Sowenig das Bundesverfassungsgericht berufen ist, als Revisions- oder gar 'Superrevisions'-Instanz gegenüber den Zivilgerichten tätig zu werden, sowenig darf es von der Nachprüfung solcher Urteile allgemein absehen und an einer in ihnen etwa zutage tretenden Verkennung grundrechtlicher Normen und Maßstäbe vorübergehen.' This judgment was published in English in Bundesverfassungsgericht (ed) Decisions of the Bundesverfassungsgericht 1958-1995, Volume 2/I (1998) 1.

[2] BVerfGE 18, 85, 92–93 ('Patentbeschluss' ['Patent Decision']): '[Es würde] . . . der besonderen Aufgabe des Bundesverfassungsgerichts nicht gerecht werden, wollte dieses ähnlich wie eine Revisionsinstanz die unbeschränkte rechtliche Nachprüfung von gerichtlichen Entscheidungen um deswillen in Anspruch nehmen, weil eine unrichtige Entscheidung möglicherweise Grundrechte des unterlegenen Teils berührt. . . . [N]ur bei einer Verletzung von spezifischem Verfassungsrecht durch die Gerichte kann das Bundesverfassungsgericht auf Verfassungsbeschwerde hin eingreifen. Spezifisches Verfassungsrecht ist aber nicht schon dann verletzt, wenn eine Entscheidung, am einfachen Recht gemessen, objektiv fehlerhaft ist; der Fehler muß gerade in der Nichtbeachtung von Grundrechten liegen.' (References omitted)

1. when the court a quo relies on a statute that in itself is unconstitutional;
2. when the court a quo infringes a procedural constitutional right of the applicant;
3. when the interpretation and application of the law by the court a quo violates constitutional law; and
4. when the decision of the court a quo is arbitrary.

The last criterion is obviously a very flexible one that effectively allows the Court to overturn judgments when it does not like the outcome — even if the judgment was based entirely on non-constitutional law. But while this category can be seen as an emergency escape hatch in cases where the need for equity outweighs the value of legality, the more important category is the third one, which mirrors the cases the South African Constitutional Court decides on the basis of FC s 39(2). As to the question when the interpretation and application of the law by the court a quo violates constitutional law, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has offered the following guideline:

> The ordinary application of the ordinary law to the case is beyond the review powers of the Constitutional Court unless the lower court's errors in interpreting the law were based on a fundamental misconception of the importance of the fundamental right, in particular its scope, and had some significance for the specific case.[2]

In addition to such 'fundamental misconceptions', a lower court commits a constitutional error in the interpretation and application of the law when it fails to realize that the Constitution impacts on the interpretation of the ordinary law or that conflicting fundamental rights need to be balanced against each other. Furthermore, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has held that the intensity of its powers of review depends on the intensity of the asserted impairment to a constitutional right.[3] Generally, the Constitutional Court will refrain from reviewing the interpretation and application of the ordinary law and from substituting its

[1] For a summary of the Bundesverfassungsgericht's jurisprudence, see Werner Heun 'Access to the German Federal Constitutional Court' in Ralf Rogowski & Thomas Gawron (eds) Constitutional Courts in Comparison — The U.S. Supreme Court and the German Federal Constitutional Court (2002) 143–145.

[2] BVerfGE 18, 85, 93: 'Freilich sind die Grenzen der Eingriffsmöglichkeiten des Bundesverfassungsgerichts nicht immer allgemein klar abzustecken; dem richterlichen Ermessen muß ein gewisser Spielraum bleiben, der die Berücksichtigung der besonderen Lage des Einzelfalls ermöglicht. Allgemein wird sich sagen lassen, daß die normalen Subsumtionsvorgänge innerhalb des einfachen Rechts so lange der Nachprüfung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts entzogen sind, als nicht Auslegungsfehler sichtbar werden, die auf einer grundsätzlich unrichtigen Anschauung von der Bedeutung eines Grundrechts, insbesondere vom Umfang seines Schutzbereichs beruhen und auch in ihrer materiellen Bedeutung für den konkreten Rechtsfall von einigem Gewicht sind.' (References omitted) view for the assessment and evaluation of the particular circumstances of the case by the trial court. So, for example, in a defamation case, the Constitutional Court will not second-guess the trial court's findings about what was said and done and whether it was defamatory or not.[1] In cases of a high 'infringement intensity', however, constitutional review extends into the details of the application and interpretation of the law, both by the administration and the judiciary.[2] In some cases, the Constitutional Court may even substitute its view of the appropriate balance to be struck for that of the lower court.[3]

[3] BVerfGE 35, 202 ('Lebach').

As Werner Heun has correctly pointed out, all these allocation criteria, and the differentiation between 'specific constitutional law' and limited review by the Bundesverfassungsgericht, are incomprehensible if they are only seen as an exercise in the interpretation of the constitutional text.[4] Instead, one needs to see them as an attempt to distribute tasks functionally between the Bundesverfassungsgericht and the other courts. The latter have comprehensive jurisdiction in the interpretation and application of all (usually statutory) law. The Constitutional Court controls whether the Constitution has been properly taken into account, without, however, hesitating to overrule a particularly grave miscarriage of justice.

Strictly speaking, by the time all these deliberations on the scope and intensity of review occur, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has already assumed jurisdiction and is dealing with the merits of the case. However, reduced review is, in effect, a jurisdictional criterion as it is used to distinguish between those aspects of the case in which the decision of the lower court is final and those in which the Constitutional Court can and does exercise its review powers. The distinction is a device to respect the expertise of the ordinary courts in their field and to limit the caseload of the Federal Constitutional Court. It achieves this in two ways: first, it allows the Court to decline to decide a case when the crucial matters are the interpretation and application of the law. Secondly, within a case, it allows the Constitutional Court to distinguish those aspects that have no constitutional implications from those that do. This is more than the decision, or rather non-decision, of 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters' found in FC s 167(3)(b). It is an exercise that leaves legal questions as they were decided by the lower courts and concentrates on those that demand a decision by the Constitutional Court. Lower courts enjoy discretion in their interpretation, application and development of the law unless it is the specific interpretation, application and development of statutory or common law adopted by the lower court that is prohibited by the Constitution or — the other way around — unless there is a [1] BVerfGE 30, 173, 197 ('Mephisto'). This judgment was published in English in Bundesverfassungsgericht (ed) Decisions of the Bundesverfassungsgericht 1958-1995, Volume 2/I (1998) 147.

[2] BVerfGE 83, 130 ('Josephine Mutzenbacher') at 145. This judgment was published in English in Bundesverfassungsgericht (ed) Decisions of the Bundesverfassungsgericht 1958-1995, Volume 2/II (1998) 474, 485-86.

[3] BVerfGE 42, 143, 148 ('Deutschland Magazine').

[4] Heun (supra) at 145.

specific interpretation, application and development of statutory or common law demanded by the Constitution which the lower court failed to adopt.

As the South African Constitutional Court faces the very same challenge of ensuring that the legal order complies with the all-encompassing Constitution (and transforms in this direction), while exercising limited jurisdiction in constitutional matters, the Court might profitably draw on the German experience. In particular, the Constitutional Court could adopt an approach to its jurisdiction where it is not primarily the subject matter of a case, but its function with regard to other courts, and its overall transformative role in the South African court structure, that determines whether it decides to review a case or not.

The functional approach is partly based on the specific setting and composition of the court concerned and its relative advantages and disadvantages. Such factors have already been recognized by the Constitutional Court, for example, with regard to evidentiary matters. The Court has declined to decide purely factual issues, at least in part because it is ill equipped to do so. Besides the fact that some of the judges of the Constitutional Court have no experience as trial judges, the fact that the Court is composed of eleven judges is not ideal for cross-examining witnesses.

Then there is the fact that the Court is often in recess and not ready to sit:

> The Constitutional Court is not designed to act in matters of extreme urgency. It consists of eleven members and a quorum of the Court is eight of them. This Court is in recess for some months of each year and during those times its members disperse to their homes which, in some cases, are a considerable distance from the seat of the Court in Johannesburg … [and] it is not always possible to convene a quorum of the Court at very short notice during a recess.[1]

This dictum in one of the UDM decisions was used in the context of exclusive jurisdiction. But it points to a functional understanding of the Constitutional Court as a court that deals with abstract legal questions that has wider implications for its jurisdiction in general.

The Court should also adopt a functional approach to its jurisdiction in cases where these practical aspects are not decisive. Even when, for example, the balancing of rights in a defamation case could be justifiably argued to raise a constitutional matter, the Constitutional Court should refrain from doing so and respect the lower court's discretionary judgment. To make sense of its limited jurisdiction and to ensure that the Final Constitution's transformation agenda is advanced, the Constitutional Court needs to focus on questions of constitutional principle, not on the application of the law. It should see its function as being to define the constitutional standards for the interpretation of a statute, the application and development of a common-law rule or the balancing of competing interests in the ordinary law. The Court should ask itself whether a case requires it to set or elaborate these standards. It also needs to ask itself what can be achieved by deciding a certain case: is it just adjudicating a dispute between two parties or deciding what the common law is in relation to a specific set of circumstances, or is it shaping the constitutional order in the broadest sense? By focusing on principles, the Constitutional Court would ensure that the law transforms according to the Final Constitution.

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement & Others 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) at para 30, cited with approval in Ex parte: Minister of Social Development & Others 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC) at para 51.

The purpose of such an approach is not to limit the relevance of the Final Constitution and its influence in court proceedings — every court, tribunal or forum must still promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. Rather, since this obligation creates a common and mutual task for every court, the aim is to distribute the burden of this task between the courts, and to ensure that the Constitutional Court is able to fulfil its mandate.

Although the Constitutional Court's main task is to set guidelines for other courts, this does not mean that, once this task is done, the Court may not intervene when questions concerning the application of the guidelines arise. Guidelines set in earlier cases may need further clarification from time to time, or another criterion may need to be added. In this regard, the distinction between the Court's focus on issues of principle and the adoption of a supervisory role is really one of emphasis. By focusing on issues of principle the Constitutional Court would be able to demonstrate, not only that other courts have a duty to promote the Final Constitution, but that they are trusted agents of the constitutional project. The more credibility the Constitutional Court enjoys among the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the more room it leaves them for manoeuvre in the development of the common law and the interpretation of statutes, the more the judges of these other courts will take account of constitutional values in the adjudicative process. In addition, the more the Constitutional Court leaves the application of the constitutional guidelines it sets to the lower courts, the more these courts will accept that the Court may on occasion have to exercise its supervisory function under FC s 39(2) to review an erroneous application of these guidelines.

A functionalist (and consequently more limited) understanding of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction, therefore, not only makes sense of the principle of limited jurisdiction as set out in the Final Constitution. It also promotes the constitutional transformation of the legal order by passing more responsibility for the transformation of the ordinary law to the other courts. Of course, this argument may be contested. One could argue that the Constitutional Court needs to assert the utmost possible control of the other courts in order to ensure transformation. From this perspective, a limited jurisdiction is indeed an obstacle, and the Constitutional Court should endeavour to expand its jurisdiction as much as possible. The Court, on this approach, should decide as many cases as possible in order to build a strong body of constitutional law and ensure that the other courts toe the line.

This view is voiced by Moseneke J in Daniels v Campbell NO:[1]

> The problem of readily importing interpretations piecemeal into legislation is the precedent it sets. Courts below will follow the lead and readily interpret rather than declare invalid statutes inconsistent with the Constitution. However, constitutional re-interpretation does not come to this Court for confirmation. The result may be that high courts develop interpretations at varying paces and inconsistently. This makes for an even more fragmented jurisprudence and would have deleterious effects on how people regulate their affairs. It is highly undesirable to have an institution as important as marriage recognised for some people in some provinces and not in others. The rule of law requires legal certainty.[2]

Moseneke J's concern in this passage is directed against the threat of a fragmented legal system and a concomitant loss of control by the Constitutional Court. He raises this concern in relation to the difference between declarations of invalidity, which have to be confirmed by the Court, and lower court decisions on how statutes should be interpreted, which do not. But the same unease may be raised in relation to jurisdiction: is there not a danger, if the Constitutional Court relinquishes the wide jurisdiction it currently enjoys, that constitutional transformation will develop in different ways and at different speeds in the lower courts?

This concern is valid. But it can also be exaggerated. In every legal system, different courts may interpret or apply legal rules in different ways. That is why there are appeal courts, whose task it is to settle these differences. The occurrence and eventual settling of conflicting interpretations is part and parcel of the legal process, as much as it may cause dissatisfaction in a particular case. Like other legal systems, the South African legal system makes provision for this scenario: conflicting High Court interpretations of the common law or of particular statutes eventually reach the Supreme Court of Appeal, whose decision, absent a constitutional matter, should be final.

The same process should apply to constitutional matters: conflicting constitutional interpretations by different courts should be reviewed by the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 39(2). Any such conflicts would be temporary only, pending the Constitutional Court's decision. Admittedly, such conflicts would not automatically reach the Constitutional Court, since they would be dependent on the aggrieved litigant's capacity to prosecute an appeal. There is no greater risk, however, that such conflicts would endure in the legal system than there is with regard to conflicting common-law interpretations. The main concern is that the Final Constitution should be mirrored in the legal system, and that its values should inform statutory interpretation and the development of the common law. From this perspective, the best system is one that encourages lower courts to take the Final Constitution into account. In some cases, parties may not have the financial means or the emotional stamina to appeal a particular disputed interpretation all the way to the Constitutional Court. But in other cases litigants may benefit from a High Court that is not afraid to shape the law in terms of the Final Constitution by its own lights. The point is not that the Constitutional Court should necessarily decide fewer cases. It is that the Court should be more aware of the competence of lower courts to take the Final Constitution into account, both so that it can concentrate on those cases (or those aspects of cases) that really require its attention, and so as to encourage lower courts to apply the Final Constitution in their daily work.

[1] 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC).
[2] Daniels v Campbell NO (supra) at para 104.

(bb) Constitutional leeways as limits to constitutional jurisdiction

The functionalist approach to the definition of 'constitutional matter' suggested above is well-suited to reconciling the principle of an all-pervasive Constitution with the idea of the Constitutional Court's limited jurisdiction. The virtue of the functionalist approach is apparent when the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is linked to the way in which the Final Constitution itself 'applies to all law'. Although the Final Constitution is supreme and all-pervasive, its function is nevertheless limited to that of a framework and a foundation for the legal order. This conclusion means that the Final Constitution, on the one hand, sets the outer limits for every possible legal rule, but, on the other hand, does not contain all possible legal rules. Instead it contains 'leeways' — such leeways allow conflicting legal rules to be constitutional.

A constitutional leeway exists when the Final Constitution neither prohibits nor demands a certain decision. The Final Constitution, of course, prohibits decisions that are inconsistent with a constitutional right (not necessarily, but most often, a right in the Bill of Rights). The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court is full of cases in which the Court has held that a particular legal rule infringes the Final Constitution and cannot be justified. Cases in which the Final Constitution demands a certain decision are less common. Here, the Final Constitution may set a minimum standard that can rise until there is only one decision possible. The Court has also sometimes ordered the legislature to cure a constitutional defect in a specific way.[1] More often, minimum standards may be satisfied by more than one decision, and the courts, the legislature or the executive may exercise their discretion about how to do this.[2] Where the Final Constitution neither prohibits nor demands a particular decision, it creates a leeway.[1] Leeways start, in other words, where the definitive normative control of the Final Constitution ends.

[1] See Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC); Minister of Home Affairs and Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC).

[2] See, eg, Grootboom v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC); Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC).

The South African Constitution leaves ample leeway in this sense for the ordinary law to exist and evolve.[2] Such evolution takes place in the courts through the interpretation and application of legislation and the common law. It is also done through traditional dispute-resolution mechanisms in the case of customary law. When there is no conflict between the rule or its application and the Final Constitution, then the rule still derives its force from the Final Constitution and is subject to its supremacy.[3]

Since the Final Constitution is the Constitutional Court's only yardstick and its sole basis for review, the jurisdiction of the Court should end where constitutional leeway begins. The Constitutional Court should recognize the existence of leeways and respect the Supreme Court of Appeals's final decision-making powers in relation to matters falling within a leeway. It may, of course, review whether the lower courts have remained within the boundaries of a leeway left open by the Final Constitution. But the Constitutional Court should not substitute its view for that of a lower court where this set of circumstances does not obtain. In the context of constitutional interpretation, Lourens du Plessis has rightly pointed out that the Final Constitution is indisputably the supreme law of the Republic of South Africa, but that at the same time it is not the 'overarching, all-encompassing, omni-regulative, super law'.[4] The Final Constitution does not take the place of any other legal rule or, in other words, it does not have readymade answers to all legal problems.[5] This does not mean that the Final Constitution is not all-pervasive, however. What it means is that the Final Constitution leaves many legal questions for decision according to the ordinary law, provided such decisions remain within the parameters set by the Final Constitution.

In Mhlungu, Kentridge AJ remarked: 'I would lay it down as a general principle that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a

[1] Robert Alexy 'Verfassungsrecht und Einfaches Recht — Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit und Fachgerichtsbarkeit' (2002) 61 VVDStRL 7, 22. See also Robert Alexy A Theory of Constitutional Rights (2002) 394. Instead of leeway, Alexy's translator uses the phrase '(structural) discretion'.

[2] The High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal have adopted an approach to the development of the common law that takes note of this leeway. See Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31, § 31.4*(e)*(iv).

[3] Here I agree with Kate O'Regan, who emphasizes that an issue may be regulated in several different ways, but still be part of one legal system whose precise content is not entirely or perhaps even substantially determined by the Constitution, because it operates within an overall normative constitutional framework. See Kate O'Regan 'On the Reach of the Constitution and the Nature of Constitutional Jurisdiction: A Response to Frank Michelman' in Stu Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 51.

[4] Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32 at § 32.3*(e)(ii) and § 32.5(b)*(iii)(bb).

[5] Du Plessis (supra) at § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(bb).

constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.'[1] This remark, which is usually regarded as the origin of the 'principle of avoidance',[2] was made in a jurisdictional context, ie in the context of deciding when a case should be referred to the Constitutional Court rather than being decided by the High Court. In my view, the 'possibility' of deciding a case without reaching a constitutional issue has both a material and a functional side to it. The principle of avoidance is the other side of the coin of the Constitutional Court's limited jurisdiction. It is a manifestation of 'jurisdictional subsidiarity', a term coined by Lourens du Plessis with which I fully agree, requiring a (lower) court to take a decision in the realm of its own jurisdiction if it is possible to do so and refrain from referring it to the Constitutional Court merely because the matter could be construed as raising a constitutional matter.[3] That does not mean that lower courts should avoid the Final Constitution, but rather that they should endeavour to bring the ordinary law in line with the imperatives of an all-pervasive Constitution. The Constitutional Court would then only exercise jurisdiction where, in terms of FC s 39(2), this standard has not been met. High Courts should be aware of their obligation to take the Final Constitution into account when applying the ordinary law, but a case does not need to be reviewed by the Constitutional Court when the Final Constitution is not engaged by it.

The problem, of course, is how to determine whether the Final Constitution is engaged. When is it necessary for the Court to decide a legal question in accordance with the Final Constitution and when should it leave legal questions to the Supreme Court of Appeal to decide? The German experience shows that the determination of a constitutional leeway will always be difficult, and will not be entirely free of contradictions. Nevertheless, in order to establish whether there is a constitutional leeway, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has adopted (but not always applied) a test that may be helpful in the South African context. According to this test, the interpretation or application of the law by the court a quo needs to be tested against the Constitution in the same way that a statutory provision is tested against the Constitution in the process of abstract review. The logic underlying this test is that a court should not be able to apply or interpret the law in a way that would be unconstitutional if the legislature were to enact such application or interpretation as a general legal rule. The first step in the performance of this test, therefore, is for the Constitutional Court (hypothetically) to reframe the court a quo's interpretation or application of the law as a general rule. The second step is for the Court to test the reframed rule against the Final Constitution. If the legal rule, reframed as an abstract norm, is not inconsistent with the Final Constitution, then the court a quo must be found to have adopted an interpretation that falls into the leeway allowed by the Final Constitution. In other words, the interpretation or application of the statute or the common law in itself needs to be constitutional — nothing more, nothing less.[1]

[1] S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59.

[2] See Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 24-25; Stu Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762, 784; Transnet Ltd & Others v Chirwa 2007 (2) SA 198 (SCA) at para 42.

[3] Du Plessis (supra) at § 32.5*(b)*(iii)(aa).

The application of this test can be illustrated by using the contract law question Michelman employs in his 'rule of law' chapter: is it a constitutional matter whether acceptance of a written contractual offer occurs as soon as a letter of acceptance is posted or only later when it is received?[2] Although it is settled South African law that, according to the 'expedition theory', an offer made in writing becomes a contract on the posting of the letter of acceptance,[3] an aggrieved party might some day challenge this theory and appeal to the Constitutional Court to reverse a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal. On a purely substantive understanding of its jurisdiction, the Constitutional Court could legitimately decide this case on the basis that the answer requires it to interpret the Final Constitution. According to the functionalist approach, however, it should decline jurisdiction. The rule that the Supreme Court of Appeal would have applied in this case — 'an offer made in writing becomes a contract on the posting of the letter of acceptance' — does not violate any constitutional provision. Parliament could enact such a rule as a statutory provision. Therefore, even if the judges of the Constitutional Court were of the opinion that it would be better on policy grounds that a contract should become valid once the acceptance letter has been received by the offeror, it should decline to decide the case.

The crucial point about a constitutional leeway is that, even if South African law had adopted the other rule (that an offer made in writing becomes a contract when the letter of acceptance is received), this rule, too, would have been within the boundaries of the Final Constitution, and therefore beyond the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. It is the institutional function of the Supreme Court of Appeal to determine the common law. This construction of the Final Constitution means that the Supreme Court of Appeal should have the final say on the common law as long as its holdings are in line with the Final Constitution. The Constitutional Court may be asked to perform its function in ensuring that every legal rule is constitutional, even if the 'rule' is the consequence of an interpretation of the law. But this is a different question from the one the Supreme Court of

[1] In German constitutional law this test is known as the 'Schumann formula' because it was first proposed in Ekkehard Schumann Verfassungs- und Menschenrechtsbeschwerden gegen richterliche Entscheidungen (1963). It was, for example, applied in BVerfGE 89, 28 ('Richterliche Selbstablehnung' ['Judicial Recusal']) at 36: 'Nicht jeder Verfahrensfehler ist zugleich auch als Verletzung von Art. 103 Abs. 1 GG zu werten. Es gibt jedoch ein Mindestmaß an Verfahrensbeteiligung, das keinesfalls verkürzt werden darf. Ein Verfassungsverstoß liegt zumindest dann vor, wenn die Auslegung durch die Gerichte zu einem Ergebnis führt, das nicht einmal der Gesetzgeber anordnen könnte.'

[2] Michelman (supra) at § 11.4*(c)*.

[3] See Cape Explosive Works Ltd v South African Oil and Fat Industries Ltd 1921 CPD 244; Kerguelen Sealing and Whaling Co Ltd v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1939 AD 487. For a discussion of the theory, see Schalk van der Merwe et al Contract — General Principles (3rd Edition, 2007) 68-72.

Appeal is asked to decide. Any pronouncement by the Constitutional Court on the narrow contract law question itself would not advance the constitutional project.

Such an approach would in no way limit the Constitutional Court's supervisory function under FC s 39(2). The Court would still protect the Final Constitution and ensure that the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal observed the limits of the Final Constitution in the application and interpretation of statutes and the common law. The difference between the two approaches is that the functionalist approach is case-based, not area-of-law-based. On the functionalist approach, a case does not raise a constitutional matter because it involves the Labour Relations Act or because it deals with administrative action. It raises a constitutional matter because it engages the Final Constitution. The Constitutional Court would still be able to hold that, in any given case, the Supreme Court of Appeal or a High Court failed to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. It could do so in cases where administrative action is present, in labour law disputes and in defamation cases. But it would be necessary to define more precisely what constitutional obligation the court a quo misconstrued or misapplied. Such an approach would not only provide greater clarity about what the rights in the Final Constitution really mean and what content they have. It would also clarify what sort of disputes should be decided finally by the Supreme Court of Appeal as opposed to the Constitutional Court.

(cc) FC 167(7) as a basis for the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction

FC s 167(7) can be read as laying the basis for this functionalist understanding of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. As pointed out above, this subsection was the source of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction under the Interim Constitution. Although, in the Final Constitution, the subsection is phrased in a way that suggests that there must be more to a constitutional matter than the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution, it is reasonable at least to begin with these terms. What they have in common is that they emphasize that the Final Constitution is the starting point in determining the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction.

To be sure, the Constitutional Court would have to interpret FC s 167(7) in a particular way. It would have to say that the word 'involving' in FC s 167(7) should be read as implying that there must be a reasonably close connection between the legal question and the constitutional provision to be interpreted, protected or enforced. Such an interpretation of FC s 167(7) would be the opposite of the interpretation offered in Dikoko, i.e. that the legal question must have 'implications' for a right in the Bill of Rights.[1] The Dikoko reading is certainly plausible, but is no more plausible than one that attributes to FC s 167(7) a jurisdiction-limiting function, in line with the rest of FC s 167.

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 92 (majority judgment) and Dikoko (supra) at paras 53-54 (minority judgment).

If FC s 167(7) is read in this way, the 'involvement' of the Final Constitution would be the threshold test for the limited jurisdiction of the Court. The Constitutional Court would need to ask in every application for leave to appeal or direct access whether the Final Constitution needs to be interpreted, protected or enforced. Effectively, this means that the Court should ask itself if the Final Constitution has anything to say on the question that the parties bring to it and which (in most cases) a lower court has already decided. By adopting such an approach the Court would give greater content and meaning to the Final Constitution because it would start its enquiry by asking which constitutional provision needs to be interpreted.[1] The Court would at an early stage of the investigation be able to look a little deeper into the contestation by a party that a lower court failed to interpret legislation or develop the common law in accordance with the Final Constitution. It could ask if there really is anything the Final Constitution can add to the interpretation or application of the common or statutory law. It could, at least, assess whether these concerns were already addressed in earlier judgments. It could, in short, use its role as an interpreter, protector and enforcer of the Final Constitution to be more of a guide for the other courts than just a supervisor.

An understanding of FC s 167(7) as the basis of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction not only explains the Court's assumption of jurisdiction in almost every case it has thus far decided, it also explains the cases in which jurisdiction was declined. In Boesak, at least when the matter reached the Constitutional Court, the Constitution provided no answer to the only question still open, as it was purely factual. Phoebus Apollo, seen against the background of the later decision in K, is still hard to grasp. But one could read it as saying that both applications of the common law contended for were in line with the Final Constitution and thus the Constitutional Court had nothing to add to the finding of the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Even in cases involving the development of the common law, a closer connection to the Final Constitution could be required. Indeed, it seems that the Court has occasionally realized that it has opened the door too wide for applicants to argue constitutional matters. In Luiters, for example, the Court held: 'In the case of the development of the common law under section 39(2) of the Constitution, the [jurisdictional] question is whether the argument forces us to consider constitutional rights or values.'[2] Here, at least, the use of the word 'force' suggests that the argument for the application of the Final Constitution needs to be compelling, and a mere allegation that the development of the common law somehow has constitutional implications might not suffice.

[1] Such an approach would accommodate the argument so forcefully made by Stu Woolman that the Constitutional Court has become more and more reluctant to give content to constitutional provisions, in particular with regard to the Bill of Rights. See Stu Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' 124 (2007) SALJ 762.

[2] Luiters (supra) at para 21, my emphasis.

(dd) Consequences of the functionalist approach for some Constitutional Court judgments

To be sure, FC s 167(7) is not the answer to all problems. In many cases, the Court would have to decide if the Final Constitution needs to be interpreted, protected or enforced to decide the matter. There will always be a grey area of unpredictability. But an understanding that a constitutional matter should involve the interpretation of the constitutional text, the protection of its principles or the enforcement of its obligations could at least provide some guidance that goes beyond the fragmented understanding the Court has adopted thus far. Again, absolute certainty in advance is not possible. The question of what a constitutional matter is must be answered at a level of abstraction that defies absolute certainty.

More important than absolute predictability is that the Court should assume jurisdiction on the basis of the specific case and its constitutional relevance, not on the basis that certain parts of the law always trigger constitutional scrutiny. On the functionalist approach, the Constitutional Court should have declined jurisdiction or assumed jurisdiction on a different basis in a number of cases:

NEHAWU: The Constitutional Court should not have based its jurisdiction on the fact that the Labour Relations Act gives effect to the right to fair labour practices. Rather, the Court should have assumed jurisdiction because in the case presented to it an interpretation of a constitutional provision was at stake. It had jurisdiction because it was asked to ensure that the specific interpretation of s 197 of the LRA passed constitutional scrutiny. Other labour law matters in future may or may not raise constitutional matters in this way.

Dikoko: The Constitutional Court should have declined jurisdiction on the basis of the dissenting judgment by Skweyiya J. It may be a constitutional matter whether a judge calculating damages in a defamation case has applied the constitutionally required guidelines. But the manner in which a judge chooses to apply the guidelines, the factors to which he chooses to give weight and other similar matters are matters left to his discretion.

Mohunram: Here, it is important to differentiate. A proper understanding of jurisdiction that advances the transformation agenda of the Constitutional Court and respects the domain of the Supreme Court of Appeal should not only work as a switch to the overall competence of the Constitutional Court to deal with a case. It should work as a gauge for the identification of those parts of a legal dispute where constitutional guidance is really required. Hence, the Constitutional Court did legitimately decide the few legal questions in which constitutional guidelines were necessary (on the scope of the POCA). But it should not have engaged in assessing the proportionality of the forfeiture, as it had already given guidelines on this issue in the earlier case of Prophet and there was no indication that this test had not been applied by the Supreme Court of Appeal.

To some extent, the Constitutional Court has already adopted the functionalist approach. It has, however, not done so through its approach to jurisdiction, but through its jurisprudence on whether it is in the interests of justice to hear an appeal or grant direct access. In the beginning of this chapter we saw that in several cases the distinction between jurisdiction and access, and even between the merits of the case and these two earlier stages of the constitutional enquiry, has been blurred. The conclusion seems inevitable that one needs to consider at least briefly the merits of a case to decide whether the Constitutional Court should decide a matter.

4 Access to the Constitutional Court

As we have seen, the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction has developed in a way that renders the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters illusory.[1] In consequence, the jurisdictional door to the Constitutional Court has been left so wide open that the Court has had to develop another way of limiting its case load. The method the Court has devised for this purpose is to test whether it is in the interests of justice for it to grant leave to appeal.

The constitutional basis for this test is FC s 167(6), which states that '[n]ational legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court to— (a) bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court; or (b) to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court'. The Court has held that the term 'any other court' in this provision excludes the Supreme Court of Appeal, because the subsection does not concern itself with appeals to the Constitutional Court in the ordinary course and in the context of the hierarchy of courts, but only with 'direct appeals', which is a situation in which the Supreme Court of Appeal (and perhaps other courts) is bypassed.[2] Although the rules of the Constitutional Court do not distinguish between 'normal appeals' from the Supreme Court of Appeal and 'direct appeals' from other courts, the Court has established slightly different criteria for these two forms of appeal. The details on appeals and other ways of accessing the Constitutional Court are set out elsewhere in this work.[3] For purposes of this chapter, it is sufficient to show how the enquiry into the interests of justice relates to the question of jurisdiction.

[1] See § 4.3*(h)* supra.

[2] Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Robinson 2005 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at para 22.

[3] See Kate Hofmeyer 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5.

The decision to grant leave to appeal is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Constitutional Court.[1] A standard practice has, however, emerged to guide the exercise of this discretion. While FC s 167(6) could be read in such a way that jurisdiction, the interests of justice and leave to appeal are treated as three different criteria that all need to be fulfilled, the Constitutional Court has held that jurisdiction and the interests of justice are the two decisive criteria in deciding whether leave to appeal will be granted.[2] Once jurisdiction has been established, everything depends on the interests of justice. If interests of justice are established, then the application for leave to appeal will be granted.

Whether it is in the interests of justice for an application for leave to appeal to be granted depends on a careful and balanced weighing-up of all relevant factors,[3] in which each case has to be considered in the light of its own facts and all the relevant circumstances.[4] Some of these factors include broad principles of public policy, such as the importance of the constitutional matter raised or the public interest in a determination of the constitutional issue.[5] On this basis, the Constitutional Court has affirmed that it is in the interests of justice for it to consider a case even where the prospects of success are not self-evident.[6] In other cases, the Court has stated that it may decide a constitutional matter for the benefit of the broader public or to achieve legal certainty, even though such a decision would go beyond the immediate needs of the parties,[7] or would have no practical value to the litigants themselves.[8] The purpose of broadening the interests of justice test in these cases is to go beyond the limited criterion of prospects of success and to give the Court an opportunity to decide a matter it might otherwise have been forced to decline. Against this background, it would require a bold move for the Court explicitly to accommodate functional considerations, as outlined above,[9] as part of the interests of justice enquiry and to state, for example, that the broader public would benefit were it not to decide the case, but rather leave the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal to have the final word on the matter.

[1] This position has been confirmed by the Court on several occasions. See, eg, Armbruster & Another v Minister of Finance & Others 2007 (6) SA 550 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1283 (CC) at para 24; Phillips (supra) at para 31; NEHAWU (supra) at para 25; Ingledew (supra) at para 13.

[2] See Ingledew (supra) at para 13.

[3] S v Shaik & Others 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 15 (For further references.)

[4] S v Basson (supra) at para 39 (For further references.)

[5] See Hofmeyer (supra) § 5.

[6] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at para 3.

[7] Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) at para 18.

[8] Radio Pretoria (supra) at para 22.

[9] See § 4.3*(b)*(ii) supra.

The Court could, however, use the prospects of success enquiry, which is an important factor in determining the interests of justice,[1] as a means to limit the cases it decides from a functional point of view. At the beginning of this chapter, it was argued that both in the Constitutional Court's enquiry into its jurisdiction, and in its enquiry whether it is in the interests of justice to decide a case, the merits of the applicant's claim play an important role.[2] Here the substantive assessment whether a case involves the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution becomes instrumental again.

As argued above, the Constitutional Court should not substitute the outcome of a balancing enquiry or an interpretation of the ordinary law by a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal with its own view, simply because FC s 167(3)(c) gives it the power to so. This would just undermine the transformative potential of the Final Constitution. It was also argued that the Court could apply a more rigid approach to its jurisdiction by way of a stricter approach to FC s 167(7), i e by asking whether a case really requires the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Final Constitution. If the Court, however, wants to keep the jurisdictional door wide open and still apply functional criteria, it would have to adopt an approach to the prospects of success criterion that takes the discretion of the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal in the interpretation of statutes and the common law seriously, even if the legal issue for decision involves policy considerations. It would then have to say that the Final Constitution sets the limits for such interpretations, but leaves margins in which the lower courts may exercise their jurisdiction, such that every outcome that stays within these limits is constitutional. Cases assessed as staying within constitutional limits in this way would have no prospects of success.

Such an approach was followed in the dissenting judgment of Langa ACJ in Du Toit v Minister of Transport.[3] As explained above,[4] the minority judgment emphasized that an application will have no prospects of success if it is simply aimed at overturning the lower court's interpretation of the ordinary law without stating a constitutional ground for this:

> If the compensation awarded by the Supreme Court of Appeal is just and equitable as contemplated by section 25(3) of the Constitution, then the applicant has no cause for constitutional complaint, no matter how the compensation was calculated in other courts. The applicant would accordingly have no prospects of obtaining relief in this Court.[5]

This is an approach that could reconcile the idea that the Constitutional Court is a court of limited jurisdiction with that of its supervisory role. At the same time, it

[1] See Hofmeyer (supra) at § 5.3*(e)(i)*(bb).
[2] See § 4.2*(b)* supra.
[3] Du Toit (supra) at paras 57-90.
[4] See § 4.2*(b)* supra.
[5] Du Toit (supra) at para 85.

does not require the Court to change (not to mention overrule) its existing jurisprudence. The problem with this solution, of course, is that the Constitutional Court would still not operate as a court of limited jurisdiction in the technical sense, because it would first assume jurisdiction and then decline to hear the matter because the applicant has no cause for constitutional complaint. It would be a little contradictory, to say the least, for the Court to hold that cases where no constitutional complaint has been established were nonetheless constitutional matters. But perhaps conceptual clarity in this instance has to give way to the need for a good working relationship between the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal and the promotion of the constitutional project.

5 The Constitutional Court as a Single Apex Court

In December 2005, the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development published the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill for comment.[1] The aim of the Bill was, among other things, to transform the Constitutional Court into the highest court in all matters and to further regulate the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. Several lawyers and concerned interest groups commented on the Bill and made submissions to the Portfolio Committee on Justice and Constitutional Development.[2] Most of these submissions were highly critical of the Bill for undermining the independence of the judiciary, a topic that is beyond the scope of this chapter. The submission to Parliament on behalf of the general Council of the Bar of South Africa, though generally critical of these aspects of the Bill, nevertheless welcomed the proposed creation of a single apex court, as did Carole Lewis in her 2005 Oliver Schreiner Memorial Lecture.[3] Following the largely negative response, the Bill was withdrawn from the formal parliamentary process. Its eventual re-introduction, however, seems certain after a decision taken at the ANC's Polokwane conference in December 2007 that the Constitutional Court should become the single apex court in South Africa. It is therefore worth examining these particular provisions

[1] GN 2023 in GG 28334 of 2005. The Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill was introduced as part of a package of Bills, including the Superior Courts Bill (B52-2003); the Judicial Service Commission Amendment Bill; the South African National Justice Training College Draft Bill and the Judicial Conduct Tribunal Bill. Only the first two Bills were introduced to Parliament at that stage, while the other three Bills were still the subject of discussion between the Department and the Judiciary. The Judicial Service Commission Amendment Bill was eventually introduced in November 2007 (B50 — 2007), and a reworked South African Judicial Education Institute Bill in February 2007 (B4 — 2007). Neither of these bills has yet been passed.

[2] Submissions were made by, inter alia, the General Council of the Bar of South Africa, the International Bar Association, the Legal Resources Centre and IDASA.

[3] Submission by the General Council of the Bar of South Africa to the Portfolio Committee on Justice and Constitutional Development in re Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill (2005) and Superior Courts Bill (2003) at 27; Carole Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509, 510.

of the Bill to see what difference they would make to the current arrangements.[1]

Clause 3 of the Bill substitutes FC s 167(3) as follows (words in square brackets indicate deletions from the current text, words underlined indicate additions):

'(3) The Constitutional Court–
(a) is the highest court [in all constitutional matters] of the Republic; and
(b) may decide [only]–
(i) constitutional matters–[, and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters;]
(aa) on appeal;
(bb) directly, in accordance with subsection (6); or
(cc) referred to it as contemplated in section 172(2)(c) or in terms of an Act of Parliament; and
(ii) any other matter, if the Constitutional Court grants leave to appeal that matter on the grounds that the interests of justice require that the matter be decided by the Constitutional Court.
(c) [makes the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.]';

In addition, FC s 167(6)(a) would be amended to allow a person to bring a constitutional matter (but not other kinds of matter) directly to the Constitutional Court and by the addition of a new section 167(8) confirming the Constitutional Court's power to make the final decision whether a matter is a constitutional matter (i e the current FC 167(3)(c), which would be deleted by clause 3).

The consequence of these amendments to FC s 167 would be that the term 'constitutional matter' would still be mentioned in the constitutional text, but would no longer delimit the ambit of the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction. Instead, the Court would have jurisdiction both in constitutional matters and in other matters. Effectively, therefore, the amendment would collapse the current two-stage enquiry into jurisdiction and access into a single enquiry, with the emphasis on whether granting leave to appeal would be in the interests of justice. With regard to constitutional matters, the Court would continue to grant leave to appeal on this basis in terms of FC s 167(6)(b), which remains unchanged. In non-constitutional matters, the new FC s 167(3)(b)(ii) dictates that the same criterion would apply.[2]

[1] In May 2008, the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development published a new Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill for comment. This Bill, however, concerned only the so-called 'floor-crossing' of members of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces. This Bill did not affect the structure of the judiciary at all and has nothing to do with the Bill published in 2005.

[2] The submission by the General Council of the Bar that constitutional matters will have a privileged status because they will have a greater prospect of being heard by the Court than a non-constitutional matter is therefore not supported by the text of the Bill. See Submission by the General Council of the Bar of South Africa to the Portfolio Committee on Justice and Constitutional Development in re Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill (2005) and Superior Courts Bill (2003) at 30.

It is doubtful whether the proposed amendment would substantially change the Constitutional Court's current jurisdictional practice. As indicated in this chapter, the Constitutional Court has watered down the criterion of constitutional matter to such an extent that it is already the apex court in every possible case. Effectively, the Constitutional Court already has the final word in the interpretation of statutes and the development of the common law. The proposed constitutional amendment would merely confirm this situation.[1] An earlier, 2001 amendment to the Final Constitution that changed the title of the President of the Constitutional Court to 'Chief Justice' in any case confirmed the Constitutional Court's status as the de facto apex court.

Given the Constitutional Court's generous interpretation of the term 'constitutional matter', the number of cases decided by the Court should not increase significantly as a consequence of this amendment. As we have seen, the Court rarely declines jurisdiction, and controls the size of its docket through its access jurisprudence. The constitutional amendment would not change this: the new FC s 167(3)(b)(ii) and FC s 167(6) would still require that a case should be heard only where it is in the interests of justice to do so.

The main change introduced by the amendment is that it would allow the Constitutional Court to decide non-constitutional matters as long as it was in the interests of justice to do so. When would this condition be satisfied? First, since the amendment removes the Court's power to decide 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters', the Court could simply hold that it was in the interests of justice to decide non-constitutional matters connected with decisions on constitutional matters. Secondly, the amendment enlarges the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction, but does not abolish the Supreme Court of Appeal. Thus, most non-constitutional matters reaching the Constitutional Court would already have been decided by the Supreme Court of Appeal. It may be assumed that the Constitutional Court would not want to make the SCA completely redundant, and thus that it would decide non-constitutional matters only where the Final Constitution demanded a particular decision. The remaining aspects of the interests of justice enquiry as currently applied would remain unchanged.

This raises a more general question: what should the relationship between the Constitutional Court, on the one hand, and the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts, on the other hand, be, once the Constitutional Court's notionally limited jurisdiction has fallen away? The argument throughout this chapter has been that the Constitutional Court misses an opportunity to promote the Final Constitution's transformative agenda whenever it fails to encourage the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts to apply the Final Constitution in everyday adjudication. The chapter has also argued that the Constitutional Court's occasional second-guessing of Supreme Court of Appeal decisions does not help in this regard (apart from being irreconcilable with the notion of separate constitutional matters).

[1] The Department's Memorandum on the Objects of the Bill describes the purposes of the amendment to FC s 167 as being 'to confirm the status of the Constitutional Court as the apex court' (my emphasis).

As long as the Supreme Court of Appeal exists, even if it is effectively downgraded to an in-between appellate court,[1] the Constitutional Court would have to explain its choice to hear some appeals from the Supreme Court of Appeal but not others. Here, functional considerations might again be decisive. Although the proposed constitutional amendment would change the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, it would not change its function: it would still be the guardian of the Final Constitution and oversee the transformation of the South African legal order. Therefore, any future interests of justice test would have to include consideration of the transformative effect of the judgment and whether the Final Constitution needed to be engaged in the particular case.

Carole Lewis has argued that if the Constitutional Court is given the power to hear an appeal on any matter of general public importance, then the Court should be composed largely of judges appointed on the basis of wider skills and experience than is presently the case with the Constitutional Court.[2] This conclusion is not obviously necessary. As things stand, FC s 174(5) ensures that at least four of the Constitutional Court judges must at all times be persons who were judges at the time of their appointment to the Constitutional Court. Thus, a distinctive judicial qualification beyond constitutional law in the formal sense is already ensured in the composition of the court. Secondly, most constitutional cases concern the normative interaction between the common law, statutory law and the Final Constitution, rather than the philosophical elaboration of abstract values. In order to deliver competent judgments, the judges of the Constitutional Court need to engage with and fully grasp the common-law rules or statutory provisions that the case implicates. The record of the Constitutional Court to date shows that its members possess such a capacity. There is no reason to anticipate, therefore, that giving the Court the additional power to decide non-constitutional matters would render it less technically competent to decide cases than it currently is. In recent years, a number of judges from other courts have served on the Constitutional Court as acting judges. The skills and experiences of these acting judges have certainly enhanced the capacity of the Constitutional Court. At the same time, however, one hopes that these judges have returned to their courts with a better understanding of the Constitutional Court and its role in the judicial system.

At the end of the day, the Constitutional Court will have to define where it sees itself in the South African legal order. In my view, the Court has rightly adopted an understanding of its function that links it strongly to the Final Constitution's

[1] It would operate like a US Court of Appeals ('Circuit Court') or an Oberlandesgericht in Germany: the important difference is that the Supreme Court of Appeal's territorial jurisdiction would cover the whole of South Africa.

[2] Lewis (supra) at 522.

transformative project and its underlying value system. To fulfil this function, the Constitutional Court needs to establish a relationship with other courts that best serves these interests. It needs to do so as a court of limited, specialized jurisdiction. However, it would face the same task should it one day become the single apex court of South Africa. Under either arrangement, it is impossible for one court singlehandedly to drive constitutional transformation. On the other hand, the central and unique character of the Final Constitution in the legal system justifies a specialized court whose task it is to ensure that the transformative potential of the Final Constitution is fulfilled and its values embraced by other courts.

5 Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters

Kate Hofmeyr

5.1 Introduction 5–1
5.2 General overview of the rules 5–1
5.3 Analysis of particular rules 5–7
(a) Rules 8 & 10: Intervenors and amici curiae 5–7
(i) Rule 8: Intervention of parties in proceedings 5–7
(ii) Rule 10: Amici curiae submissions 5–10
(b) Rules 14 & 15: Referral of Bills and Acts 5–12
(i) Referral of Bills 5–12
(ii) Referral of Acts 5–13
(c) Rule 16: Confirmation proceedings 5–14
(d) Rule 18: Direct access 5–17
(e) Rules 19 & 20: Appeals to the Constitutional Court 5–21
(i) Factors relevant to all applications for leave to appeal . 5–24
(aa) Importance of the issue raised 5–24
(bb) Prospects of success 5–24
(cc) Public interest in a determination of the constitutional issues raised 5–24
(dd) Accuracy of pleadings 5–25
(ii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court 5–25
(aa) Savings in time and cost 5–25
(bb) Urgency of having a final determination of the matters in issue 5–25
(cc) Value of the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal 5–25

(dd) Value of the views of the Labour Appeal Court 5–26
(ee) Compliance with obligations of co-operative government 5–26
(iii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in custody cases: Best interests of the child 5–26
(iv) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in criminal cases 5–27
(aa) Simultaneous appeals 5–27
(bb) Litigants aggrieved by a decision 5–27
(v) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals against interim orders of execution 5–29
(vi) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals from the Labour Appeal Court 5–29
Appendix: Constitutional Court Rules 5–30

5.1 Introduction

This chapter begins with a general overview of the 2003 Rules[1] and then proceeds to discuss certain of the Rules in greater detail: Rules 8 & 10: intervenors and amici curiae;[2] Rules 14 & 15: referral of Bills and Acts; Rule 16: confirmation proceedings; Rule 18: direct access; and Rules 19 & 20: appeals. For ease of reference, the Rules are reproduced in full in an appendix to this chapter.

5.2 General Overview of the Rules

The 2003 Rules commence with a definitions' section and certain general provisions.[3] Of particular significance for practitioners is the inclusion, among the general provisions, of matters which were previously covered by Practice Direction 2.[4]

Rule 1(3) now stipulates that any references to 'lodging documents with the Registrar'[5] in the Rules shall be construed as including prior service of such documents on other parties and the lodging of 25 copies of all relevant documents and an electronic version thereof that is compatible with the software used by the Court.[6] This marks a change from the position under Practice Direction 2, where the lodging of an electronic copy was not compulsory.[7] By contrast, Rule 1(3) is couched in mandatory terms. Rule 1(3)'s requirement that 25 copies of all relevant documents be lodged with the Registrar must be read subject to the proviso in Rule 20(2)(i). Rule 20(2)(i) provides that where a disk or electronic version of a document other than a record is provided in an appeal, the party need lodge only 13 copies of the document concerned with the Registrar.

Rule 1(4) now covers the requirement — previously found in Practice Direction 2[8] — that where notices or other communications are made by electronic copy, the party giving such notice or communication must lodge with the Registrar a hard copy of the notice or communication with a certificate signed by such party verifying the date of such communication or notice.

* I would like to thank Matthew Chaskalson for his helpful comments on previous drafts of this chapter and Adrian Friedman for all the insights our discussions on various aspects of this chapter produced.

[1] The Constitutional Court Rules, 2003 ('2003 Rules') were promulgated under Government Notice R1675 in Government Gazette 25726 of 31 October 2003 and came into effect on 1 December 2003. These rules replaced the Constitutional Court Rules, 1998 ('1998 Rules') which were promulgated on 29 May 1998 — GN R757 Reg Gaz 6199. In a number of respects, the 2003 Rules have simplified the procedures that existed under the 1998 Rules, particularly in relation to appeals to the Constitutional Court.

[2] For an extended discussion of the rules and practice of amici curiae, see G Budlender 'Amicus' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.

[3] Rule 1(2)–1(8).

[4] 1999 (2) SA 666 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 260 (CC), 1999 (1) SACR 370 (CC).

[5] In the remainder of the chapter, references to 'Registrar' will denote the Registrar of the Constitutional Court and references to 'Court' will denote the Constitutional Court.

[6] Although Practice Direction 2 (para 2) indicated that electronic copies of documents lodged with the Registrar should be in Word Perfect (5, 6, or 7) format, the Registrar, at the time of writing, has indicated a preference for documents to be formatted in MS Word.

[7] 1999 (2) SA 666 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 260 (CC), 1999 (1) SACR 370 (CC) at para 2.

[8] Ibid at para 4.

Rule 1(8) stipulates that, subject to Rule 5, the provisions of rule 4 of the Uniform Rules of Court shall apply, with the necessary modifications, to the service of any process of the Court.

Following the definitions' section, the Rules are divided into ten parts. Part 1 of the rules details the Court terms.[1] Part 2 includes provisions relating to the Registrar's office hours[2] and general duties.[3] Whenever the Court makes an order declaring or confirming any law to be inconsistent with the FC 172, the Registrar is required, no later than 15 days after such order has been made, to publish such order in the Government Gazette or the Provincial Gazette if the order relates to provincial legislation. The Registrar also has certain duties in relation to unrepresented parties who apply to the Court. Those obligations have, in fact, been slightly amended in the 2003 Rules from the position under the 1998 Rules. Under the 1998 Rules, the Registrar was obliged to refer that party to the nearest office of the South African Human Rights Commission, the Legal Aid Board, or any law clinic which may be willing to assist the party. The Registrar was similarly obliged to render assistance in preparing the papers required by the rules if the unrepresented party was unable to obtain assistance or, if so directed by the President of the Court, to request an advocate or attorney to assist the party. These latter two requirements have been altered under the 2003 Rules. In terms of Rule 4(11), the Registrar is now only required to refer an unrepresented party to the nearest office or officer of the Human Rights Commission, the Legal Aid board, a law clinic or such other appropriate body or institution that may be willing and in a position to assist such party.[4]

In two recent decisions, De Kock v Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry and Mnguni v Minister of Correctional Services the Constitutional Court, despite refusing to grant direct access to the unrepresented applicants in both cases, directed the Registrar to bring the judgments to the attention of the Law Society of the Northern Provinces. The Registrar was obliged to ask the Law Society of the Northern Provinces whether one of its members might provide assistance to the unrepresented applicants. In neither of these cases were the obligations of the Registrar in terms of Rule 4(11) discussed. It therefore remains unclear whether such a referral occurred. However, it must be safe to assume that, if it did take place, the applicants were unsuccessful in obtaining legal assistance. It will be interesting to see the extent to which the Court makes use of such a procedure where unrepresented applicants seek direct access to the Court in cases that raise 'important yet difficult issues which may well require adjudication'.[5] [2] Rule 3. The office of the Registrar is open from 08h30 to 13h00 and from 14h00 to 15h30 on Court days.

[1] Rule 2.

[3] Rule 4.

[4] See De Kock v Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry 2005 (12) BCLR 1183 (CC)('De Kock'); Mnguni v Minister of Correctional Services 2005 (12) BCLR 1187 (CC)('Mnguni').

[5] De Kock (supra) at para 5; Mnguni (supra) at para 7.

Part 3 deals with the joinder of organs of state.[1] Rule 5(2) makes it clear that no order declaring an executive or administrative act or conduct, or threatened executive or administrative act or conduct, or any law to be unconstitutional may be made by the Court unless the party challenging the constitutionality of such act, conduct or law has, within five days of lodging with the Registrar a document in which such contention is raised for the first time in the proceedings before the Court, taken steps to join the authority concerned as a party to the proceedings.[2] In Mabaso v Law Society, Northern Provinces, and Another, O'Regan J, writing for the Court, spoke to the importance of this rule.[3] She highlighted the fact that, in a constitutional democracy, a court should not declare the acts of another arm of government to be inconsistent with the Final Constitution without ensuring that that arm of government is given a proper opportunity to consider the constitutional challenge and to make such representations to the court as it considers fit.[4] O'Regan J identified two underlying rationales for this approach. First, the Minister responsible for administering the legislation may well be able to place before the court pertinent facts and submissions necessary for the proper determination of the constitutional issue.[5] Second, Rule 5 shows respect for the other arms of government and their different constitutional functions.[6]

Part 4 covers matters relating to the representation of parties;[7] a change of parties owing to the fact that a party dies or becomes incompetent to continue any proceedings;[8] intervention by a party to the proceedings;[9] and requirements relating to powers of attorney.[10] Unless otherwise directed by the Chief Justice,

[1] Rule 5.

[2] The Court indicated, with respect to the 1998 Rules, that although the Rules apply only to proceedings in the Constitutional Court, in cases concerning the constitutional validity of law or an executive act, the relevant executive authority should be given the opportunity to be joined in the proceedings at the earliest possible stage. See Pharboo and Others v Getz NO &Another 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC)('Pharbo') at para 5; Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at paras 27-8. See, further, Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC)('Jooste') at paras 7-9.

[3] 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC)('Mabaso').

[4] Mabaso (supra) at para 13. In Mabaso, the applicant had failed to join the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development, who was responsible for administering the Act, which he challenged in his application for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court. In the special circumstances of the case, however, the Registrar had provided the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development with a copy of the full record in the case, as well as the written submissions lodged by the parties and given her an opportunity to indicate whether she wished to intervene as a party. In a written notice to the Court, the Minister consented to being joined as a party in the proceedings, and indicated that she would abide by any judgment given by the Court. Thus, the Court had, on its own motion, cured the applicant's failure to take steps to join the Minister. The Court was, however, quick to emphasise that it would not ordinarily take steps to remedy the failure by an applicant to comply with Rule 5. It stressed that it had done so only because the Rule had recently been introduced and the applicant had taken steps to comply with the former Rule. Ibid at para 14.

[5] Ibid at para 13.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Rule 6.

[8] Rule 7.

[9] Rule 8.

[10] Rule 9.

only persons who are entitled to appear in the High Courts may appear on behalf of any party to proceedings of the Court.[1] Legal representatives are not required to file a power of attorney, but one can be demanded by a party who disputes the authority of a practitioner to act on behalf of another party.[2] Any person entitled to join as a party or liable to be joined as a party in the proceedings may, on notice to all parties, at any stage of the proceedings, apply for leave to intervene as a party.[3]

Part 5 deals with amici curiae submissions.[4] It provides for any person interested in any matter before the Court to appear as an amicus curiae either in terms of the written consent of all the parties in the matter, or, if such written consent has not been secured, on application to the Chief Justice to be admitted as an amicus curiae.

Part 6 covers Rules 11 to 13 which deal with application procedure,[5] urgent applications[6] and argument.[7] In any matter in which an application is necessary, including the obtaining of directions from the Court, the procedure to be used is notice of motion supported by affidavit.[8] The procedure prescribed is similar to the High Court application procedure. Once all affidavits have been filed, the application will be placed before the Chief Justice and he or she will then issue directions as to how the application will be dealt with and, in particular, whether it shall be set down for hearing.[9] Rule 13(2) makes it clear that oral argument will be allowed in the matter only if directions to that effect are given by the Chief Justice.[10] The Chief Justice may, when giving directions, permit the lodging of further affidavits.[11] Where an application is urgent, the Chief Justice may, at the request of the applicant, dispense with the forms and the service provided for in the Rules.[12]

Part 7 of the Rules covers those matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court, including, referrals of Bills in terms of FC s 79(4)(b) or FC s 121(2)(b);[13] applications in terms of FC s 80(1) and FC s 122(1);[14] confirmations of orders of constitutional invalidity;[15] and certifications of provincial constitutions.[16] Not all

[1] Rule 6.
[2] Rule 9(1).
[3] Rule 8(1).
[4] Rule 10. See, further, G Budlender 'Amicus' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.
[5] Rule 11.
[6] Rule 12.
[7] Rule 13.
[8] Rule 11(1).
[9] Rule 11(4).
[10] Rule 13(2).
[11] Rule 11(3)(d).
[12] Rule 12(1).
[13] Rule 14.
[14] Rule 15.
[15] Rule 16. See M Bishop, S Budlender, M Chaskalson & J Klaaren 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 9.
[16] Rule 17. See S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 20.

matters which fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court are specifically dealt with in the Rules, however. Those matters excluded are twofold: the constitutionality of amendments to the Final Constitution and matters relating to the failure of the President or Parliament to perform a constitutional obligation.[1] Matatiele Municipality and Others v The President of the Republic of South Africa deals with the first form of exclusion.[2] In Matatiele, the applicants challenged the constitutional validity of the Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act ('Twelfth Amendment') and the Cross-Boundary Municipalities Laws Repeal and Related Matters Act[3] ('Repeal Act'). Although the Court had exclusive jurisdiction to resolve the issue in relation to the Twelfth Amendment under FC s 167(4)(d), the applicants' challenge to the Repeal Act did not fall within the Court's exclusive jurisdiction and thus an application was made for direct access to the Court to challenge the constitutionality of the Repeal Act in the same proceedings. On the question as to whether to grant the application for direct access, the Court held that the close interrelationship between the two Acts was sufficient to warrant granting the application for direct access. As the discussion of direct access later in this chapter makes plain, the Constitutional Court has been inclined to grant direct access in situations where a matter, to which the substance of the direct access application is closely related, is already before the Court.

Part 8 of the Rules deals with matters which fall within the concurrent jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, the High Courts, the Supreme Court of Appeal and other courts of similar status. Rule 18 deals with direct access to the Constitutional Court. In appropriate cases, direct access will be granted, with leave of the Court, when it is in the interests of justice to do so. Rule 19 deals with appeals to the Constitutional Court and vastly simplifies the bifurcated approach to appeals that had been adopted under the 1998 Rules. Rule 20 details the procedures to be adopted on appeal. Rule 21 covers matters previously dealt with in Practice Direction 2.[4]

[1] Such matters will, in all likelihood, have to be brought using the application procedure provided for in Rule 11 which applies to 'any matter in which an application is necessary for any purpose' except those matters for which Rules have been specifically provided. It should be noted that Rule 11(1)(a) itself refers to matters contemplated in FC s 167(4)(a): that is, disputes between organs of state in the national or provincial sphere concerning the constitutional status, powers or functions of any of those organs of state.

[2] Matatiele Municipality and Others v The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (No 2) CCT 73/05 (Decided on 18 August 2006, as yet unreported.)

[3] Act 23 of 2005.

[4] 1999 (2) SA 666 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 260 (CC), 1999 (1) SACR 370 (CC). This direction dealt with the practice notes which were required to be filed together with any application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity or appeal against such an order, as well as any application for leave to appeal. The notes were required to set out the length of the record or, if the record had not yet been transcribed, an estimate of its length and the time required for transcription. In addition, the practice note was required to set out any special circumstances which might justify a hearing of more than one day, or which might otherwise be relevant to the directions to be given by the President of the Court. The new Rule 21 replicates these requirements subject to the necessary amendment to replace references to the 'President of the Court' with references to the 'Chief Justice'.

Part 9 of the Rules deals with fees and costs.[1] The last section of the Rules — Part 10 — covers remaining miscellaneous provisions, including, matters relating to the library;[2] translations of records or other documents lodged with the Registrar;[3] models diagrams and exhibits;[4] the withdrawal of cases;[5] the formatting of documents;[6] the application of certain rules of the Uniform Rules of Court[7] and sections of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959;[8] non-compliance with the rules;[9] execution;[10] transitional provisions;[11] repeal of the previous rules;[12] and the short title.[13] In addition to these twelve items, Part 10 also includes a rule, which is dealt with in detail in the chapter in this treatise entitled 'Constitutional Litigation', that relates to the lodging of documents that canvass factual material which is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and which does not specifically appear on the record.[14]

[1] Rules 22 & 23. See A Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 6.

[2] Rule 24.

[3] Rule 25.

[4] Rule 26.

[5] Rule 27.

[6] Rule 28.

[7] Rule 29. The Uniform Rules incorporated the following: joinder of parties on application and other matters relating to application procedure; amendments to pleadings and documents; discovery, inspection and production of documents; procuring evidence for trial by way of a hearing before a commission; variation and rescission of orders; sworn translators; interpretation of evidence; filing, preparing and inspection of documents; authentication of documents executed outside the Republic for use within the Republic; destruction of documents; and enrolment of commissioners of the Court.

[8] Rule 30. The sections of the Supreme Court Act that apply concern the reference of matters for investigation by a referee; the powers of court on the hearing of appeals; examinations by interrogatories of persons whose evidence is required in civil cases; and the manner of dealing with commissions rogatorie, letter of request and documents for service originating from foreign countries. It should be noted that the last-mentioned provision is to apply subject to the replacement of 'English and Afrikaans' with the phrase 'any official language'.

[9] Rule 32.

[10] Rule 33 stipulates that costs orders of the Constitutional Court are to be executed in the magistrates' courts. Where a costs order has not been complied with, the party in whose favour the order was made is to file with the Registrar an affidavit setting out the details of the costs order and stating that the order has not been complied with or has not been complied with in full, as well as the outstanding amount, and requesting that the Registrar furnish him or her with a certified copy of such costs order. Rule 33(2). The party in whose favour the costs order was made must then file the certified copy of the order with the clerk of the civil court of the district in which he or she resides, carries on business or is employed. Rule 33(4). The order shall be executed in accordance with the provisions of the Magistrates' Courts Act 32 of 1944 and the Magistrates' Courts Rules published under GN R1108 of 21 June 1968, as amended, regarding warrants of execution against moveable and immoveable property and the issuing of emolument attachment orders and garnishee orders only. Rule 33(5).

[11] Rule 34.

[12] Rule 35.

[13] Rule 36.

[14] Rule 31. See M Chaskalson & G Marcus 'Constitutional Litigation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition) OS, July 2007) Chapter 3.

5.3 Analysis of Particular Rules

(a) Rules 8 & 10: intervenors and amici curiae

Although Geoff Budlender engages the role of an amicus curiae at length elsewhere in this work, it is worth spending a moment here to consider the manner in which the 2003 Rules distinguishes the roles of amici and intervenors.[1] In Hoffman v South African Airways,[2] the Constitutional Court places the following gloss on this distinction:

> An amicus curiae assists the Court by furnishing information or argument regarding questions of law or fact. An amicus is not a party to litigation, but believes that the Court's decision may affect its interest. The amicus differs from an intervening party, who has a direct interest in the outcome of the litigation and is therefore permitted to participate as a party to the matter. An amicus joins proceedings, as its name suggests, as a friend of the Court. It is unlike a party to litigation who is forced into the litigation and thus compelled to incur costs. It joins in the proceedings to assist the Court because of its expertise on or interest in the matter before the Court. It chooses the side it wishes to join unless requested by the Court to urge a particular position.[3]

(i) Rule 8: Intervention of parties in proceedings

The 2003 Rules' inclusion of a specific provision relating to the procedure to be adopted by parties seeking leave to intervene in proceedings before the Court marks a change from the position under the 1998 Rules. The 1998 Rules embraced many of the Uniform Rules of Court. However, Rule 12 — which details the procedure for the intervention of parties — was excluded.[4] Rule 12 of the Uniform Rules of Court was also excluded from incorporation in the 2003 Rules. However, an entirely new Rule 8 — which substantially mimics Rule 12 of the Uniform Rules of Court — has been added in the 2003 Rules.[5]

Although the Court has yet to interpret Rule 8 itself, the Court's previous case law on intervention, as well as the case law surrounding Rule 12 of the Uniform Rules of Court, may provide some indication of what to expect from the Court

[1] See G Budlender 'Amicus' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8.

[2] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffman').

[3] Ibid at para 63.

[4] Rule 12 (which is to be read with Rule 10) reads as follows:

Any person entitled to join as a plaintiff or liable to be joined as a defendant in any action may, on notice to all parties, at any stage of the proceedings apply for leave to intervene as a plaintiff or a defendant. The court may upon such application make such order, including any order as to costs, and give such directions as to further procedure in the action as to it may seem meet.

[5] Rule 8 reads as follows:

1. Any person entitled to join as a party or liable to be joined as a party in the proceedings may, on notice to all parties, at any stage of the proceedings apply for leave to intervene as a party.
2. The Court or the Chief Justice may upon such application make such order, including any order as to costs, and give such directions as to further procedure in the proceedings as may be necessary.

under Rule 8. In Minister of Public Works and Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association and Another (Mukhwevho Intervening), an application was made by one of the Alexandra flood victims — who was offered temporary accommodation at Leeuwkop — for leave to intervene as a party.[1] Chaskalson P noted the applicant's 'direct and substantial interest in the proceedings' — the test articulated in the case law surrounding Rule 12 of the Uniform Rules of Court — and determined that it entitled him to be joined in his own right to the proceedings.[2]

In United Watch and Diamond Company (Pty) Ltd v Disa Hotels Ltd,[3] Corbett J highlighted the fact that the test of a direct and substantial interest in the subject-matter of the action had been regarded as the decisive criterion in applications for intervention.[4] He also drew two important distinctions which relate to the power of a court in intervention applications. The first distinction is that between applications for intervention and cases where the non-joinder of a necessary party is raised by a defendant or by the court mero motu. The second distinction is that between applications for intervention and those cases where joinder of another is demanded as of right. In the case of the former distinction, Corbett J held that the court has a discretion in relation to the intervenor application which does not exist where the non-joinder issue is raised by a defendant or the court mero motu. In relation to the second distinction, Corbett J held that the power of a court to grant leave to intervene is wider than where joinder of another is demanded as of right.[5]

The conclusions reached by the courts in Kyalami and United Watch and Diamond Company raise several interesting questions in relation to Rule 8. On its face, it is clear that the Rule envisages leave being sought from the Court by a party wishing to intervene in proceedings before it. By adding the requirement that leave be sought, the Rule seems to envisage that while an applicant's entitlement to join as a party or liability to be joined as a party in the proceedings is a necessary requirement for intervention, it is not sufficient. The Court would appear to retain a discretion where a party seeks to intervene in proceedings. If this is, indeed, the correct construction of Rule 8, the success of applications under the Rule will depend on the factors identified by the Court as guiding the exercise of this discretion.

Although the Court's judgment in Kyalami regarded the existence of a 'direct and substantial interest' as the definitive criterion for the success of the applicant's leave to intervene application, it will be interesting to see whether the Court continues to adopt this approach to Rule 8 applications under the 2003 Rules. It should be noted, however, that if this 'interest' remains the sole criterion, the discretionary space which appears to be provided by Rule 8 will have been almost

[1] 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)('Kyalami').
[2] Ibid at para 30.
[3] 1972 (4) SA 409 (C)('United Watch and Diamond Company').
[4] United Watch and Company (supra) at 416.
[5] Ibid.

entirely eliminated.[1] By contrast, if the Court were to add a proviso regarding the 'interests of justice' then its discretionary scope would be increased.

The Court may well wish to retain this discretionary space, particularly in relation to applications under Rule 8 in confirmation proceedings.[2] As Ackermann J emphasised in National Director of Public Prosecutions v Mohamed NO,[3] the Constitution demands that the courts adopt an objective approach to questions of constitutional validity.[4] The Court had previously made clear in Ferreira v Levin NO and Others[5] that such an approach entails that:

> a statute is either valid or 'of no force and effect to the extent of its inconsistency'. The subjective positions in which parties to a dispute may find themselves cannot have a bearing on the status of the provisions of a statute under attack. The Constitutional Court, or any other competent Court for that matter, ought not to restrict its enquiry to the position of one of the parties to a dispute in order to determine the validity of a law. The consequence of such a (subjective) approach would be to recognise the validity of a statute in respect of one litigant, only to deny it to another. Besides resulting in a denial of equal protection of the law, considerations of legal certainty, being a central consideration in a constitutional state, militate against the adoption of the subjective approach.[6]

The class of applicants with a direct and substantial interest in a declaration of invalidity that reaches the Constitutional Court for confirmation is potentially vast. In principle, any person affected by the impugned provision or conduct may satisfy the requirements for joinder and would therefore be entitled, should the test be limited to the showing of a direct and substantial interest, to intervene in the proceedings. However, against the backdrop of an objective approach to constitutional validity, the specific circumstances of those applicants, although they may shed further light on some of the implications of the impugned law or conduct, ought to be immaterial to the determination of the Court.[7] When the demands of an objective approach to constitutionality is considered alongside the potentially extensive class of persons with a direct and substantial interest in confirmation proceedings, the Court may be tempted to increase the requirements

[1] See Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Others v Greyvenouw CC & Others 2004 (2) SA 81 (SE), at para 9 (Plasket J offers a construction of Uniform Rule 12 which excludes any discretion on the part of the court when a direct and substantial interest has been established.)

[2] I am grateful to Matthew Chaskalson for pointing me to the application of Rule 8 to confirmation proceedings.

[3] 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 58.

[5] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira').

[6] Ferreira (supra) at para 26. For more on the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality, see C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness & Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 7; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[7] For more on the relationship between the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality and the interpretation of constitutional rights, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

for admission as an intervenor under Rule 8. Were the Court to do so, though, it would need to ensure that the applicant's right under FC s 34 was not unjustifiably limited by such an approach.[1] Thus, where a person is entitled to join as a party in terms of the direct and substantial interest test, the Court would be obliged to show that the interests of justice outweigh those interests and justify the denial of the application. Where an application is made to be admitted as an amicus curiae, the situation is different. The applicant is not a party to the proceedings and hence cannot claim a direct interest in the outcome of the litigation. Instead, it appears with the consent of the parties or by direction of the Chief Justice in order to assist the Court because of its expertise on or interest in the matter before the Court. The procedure governing amici curiae submissions is dealt with in Rule 10.

(ii) Rule 10: Amici curiae submissions

In In Re Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others,[2] the Constitutional Court discussed the particular duty which an amicus curiae owes to the Court:

> In return for the privilege of participating in the proceedings without having to qualify as a party, an amicus has a special duty to the Court. That duty is to provide cogent and helpful submissions that assist the Court. The amicus must not repeat arguments already made but must raise new contentions; and generally these new contentions must be raised on the data already before the Court.[3]

Despite this warning, the Constitutional Court regularly notes the valuable role that amici curiae have played in shaping the Court's thinking about the matter before it.[4] In terms of Rule 10, an amicus may be admitted in only one of two scenarios: first, where it has obtained written consent of all the parties in the matter.[5] Where this consent has been obtained, the amicus will be admitted upon such terms and conditions, and with such rights and privileges as are agreed upon in writing with all the parties before the Court or as is directed by the Chief Justice.[6] Furthermore, the Chief Justice may amend any terms, conditions, rights and privileges which are agreed upon with all the parties.[7] The second scenario in

[1] For more on FC s 34, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 60.

[2] 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1028 (CC)('TAC').

[3] Ibid at para 5.

[4] See, eg, Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC)('Bannatyne') at para 3; Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) ('Moise') at para 4; Minister of Defence v Potsane and Another; Legal Soldier (Pty) Ltd and Others v Minister of Defence and Others 2002 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1137 (CC) at para 9.

[5] Rule 10(1).

[6] Rule 10(1).

[7] Rule 10(3). In relation to its predecessor in the 1995 Rules, the Court in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security stressed that although a person or body has obtained the written consent of all parties, the Court's control over the participation of the amicus in the proceedings is not diminished because, in terms of subrule (3), 'the terms, conditions, rights and privileges agreed upon between the parties and the person seeking amicus status are subject to amendment by the [Chief Justice]'. 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 9.

which an amicus may be admitted is on application to the Chief Justice.[1] Such an application must be made within the time limits prescribed by any direction given in the matter, or in the absence of such directions, not later than five days after the lodging of the respondent's written submissions or after the time for lodging such submissions has expired.[2]

An application to be admitted as an amicus curiae must engage three issues. First, it must briefly describe the interest of the amicus in the proceedings. Secondly, it must briefly identify the position to be adopted by the amicus in the proceedings. Thirdly, it must set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus, their relevance to the proceedings and the amicus's reasons for believing that the submissions will be useful to the Court and different from the submissions of the other parties.[3]

An amicus has the right to lodge written argument, provided that argument does not repeat any matter set forth in the argument of the other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.[4] Rule 10(8) makes it clear that the amicus will be limited (subject to the provisions of Rule 31) to the record on appeal or referral and the facts found proved in other proceedings. Furthermore, the default position in relation to oral argument by an amicus is that oral argument will not be presented.[5] In practice, however, amici curiae are often invited by the Chief Justice, pursuant to the power under Rule 10(1) and (3), to present oral argument.[6]

An amicus is subject to the same requirements as the parties to the proceedings in so far as Rule 1(3) is concerned. An amicus will be required to serve any documents lodged with the Registrar on the parties to the proceedings and to lodge 25 copies, as well as an electronic version, of such documents with the Registrar.

Finally, amici curiae should be aware that pursuant to Rule 10(10), a costs order may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of an amicus. This Rule raises two possibilities: either an amicus curiae may be ordered to pay a portion of the costs, or costs may be awarded in its

[1] Rule 10(4).

[2] Rule 10(5). It should be noted that this changes the situation somewhat from that which existed under the 1998 Rules. Under the 1998 Rules, the application had to be made, in the case of an application for leave to appeal to the Court and in any case where the right of direct access had been invoked, within ten days after such application had been lodged with the Registrar. In any other matter, the application had to be made not later than ten days after the lodging of the respondent's written submissions or after the time for lodging such submissions had expired.

[3] Rule 10(6)(a)-(c).

[4] Rule 10(7).

[5] Rule 10(8).

[6] See, eg, Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors for Life International and Others, Amici Curiae) Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC) 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie') at paras 37-8; Bhe and Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, and Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole and Others; South African Human Rights Commission and Another v President of The Republic of South Africa and Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005(1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at para 11; Kaunda and Others v President of The Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2005 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda') at para 6; Janse van Rensburg NO and Another v Minister of Trade and Industry and Another NNO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)('Janse van Rensburg') at para 6.

favour. In President of The Republic of South Africa and Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri Sa And Others, Amici Curiae), the Pretoria High Court had awarded costs in favour of the applicant, Modderklip Boerdery Pty Ltd, and the amicus curiae Agri SA.[1] On appeal, the Supreme Court of Appeal declined to interfere with the costs order made by the High Court. Langa ACJ, writing for the Constitutional Court, noted that although it is unusual, and will rarely be appropriate for costs to be awarded in favour of an amicus curiae, the State had expressly indicated in the Constitutional Court that it was not seeking to overturn the order of the High Court awarding those costs to Agri SA. Given that there was, accordingly, no basis upon which to interfere with the costs orders, the Constitutional Court did not disturb the costs order in favour of Agri SA.[2]

(b) Rules 14 & 15: Referral of Bills and Acts

(i) Referral of Bills

The referral of a Bill in terms of FC s 79(4)(b) or FC s 121(2)(b) by the President of the Republic or by the Premier of a province must be in writing and addressed to the Registrar and to the Speaker of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces (in respect of a national Bill) or to the Speaker of the provincial legislature in question (in respect of a provincial Bill).[3] The referral must cover the following three issues. First, it must identify the provision*(s)* of the Bill in respect of which the President or Premier has reservations.[4] Second, it must specify the constitutional provision*(s)* which the President or Premier believes render the Bill constitutionally infirm. Third, it must set out the grounds or reasons for such reservations.[5] Rule 14 makes further provision for political parties represented in the national Parliament or the provincial legislature concerned, to be entitled, as of right, to make written submissions relevant to the [1] 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), (2005) (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip Boerdery').

[2] Ibid at para 67.

[3] Rule 14(1).

[4] In In Re Constitutionality of The Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000, the Court held that it did not have jurisdiction to decide upon an objection which a Premier had not referred to the relevant legislature, but had raised for the first time before the Court. 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC)('Mpumalanga Petitions Bill'). In Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000, was submitted to the Premier for his assent and signature in terms of FC s 121. The Premier had reservations concerning the constitutionality of the powers conferred on the Speaker by clauses 18 and 19 of the Bill. Acting in terms of FC s 121(1), the Premier then referred the Bill back to the legislature for reconsideration, specifying his reservations in respect of these two clauses only. Although the legislature made certain amendments to the Bill on the basis of other typographical and grammatical changes suggested by the Premier, it failed to address the Premier's reservations concerning the functions and powers given to the Speaker under clauses 18 and 19. The Premier then referred the Bill to the Constitutional Court, in terms of FC s 121(2)(b), but in addition to requesting that the Court determine the constitutionality of clauses 18 and 19 of the Bill, he requested that the Court determine whether the Mpumalanga legislature had the competence to pass the Petitions Bill. It was this latter question which the Court held that it did not have jurisdiction to entertain, given that it had not been referred to the legislature for consideration. Ibid at para 11.

[5] Rule 14(2)(a)-(c).

determination of the issue.[1] Directions, issued by the Chief Justice, will indicate the time frames for receipt of such submissions[2] and may include a request to the relevant Speaker or Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces for additional information considered necessary or expedient to deal with in the matter.[3]

(ii) Referral of Acts

The procedure in relation to applications in terms of FC s 80(1) and FC s 122(1) substantially mimics the procedure for Bills discussed above. However, a few differences warrant comment. In the case of the referral of a Bill by the President or Premier, the referral is made in writing and is addressed to the Registrar of the Court, as well as the Speaker of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces (in respect of a national Bill) or to the Speaker of the provincial legislature in question (in respect of a provincial Bill). In the case of an application in terms of FC s 80(1) and FC s 122(1), the application is to be brought on notice of motion supported by an affidavit which is lodged with the Registrar and served on the Speaker of the National Assembly and, where applicable, the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, or on the Speaker of the provincial legislature concerned.[4] The application must be accompanied by a certificate from the Speaker of the legislature concerned indicating that the members of the legislature have complied with the requirements of FC s 80(2)(a) or FC s 122(2)(a).[5] The notice of motion must also request the Speaker and, if relevant, the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, to bring the application to the attention of all political parties represented in the relevant house or legislature.[6] The application should cover all those matters required in terms of any referral under Rule 14, and, in addition, must specify the relief, including interim relief, sought.[7]

Rule 15(5) requires any political party in the legislature concerned, or any government that wishes to oppose the granting of the order sought in such application, to give notice of its intention to oppose to the Registrar, in writing, within fifteen days of service of such application.[8] Where such notice is given, the application is to be disposed of in accordance with the application procedures set out in Rule 11.[9] Where no notice of opposition is lodged, the matter is to be disposed of in accordance with directions issued by the Chief Justice.[10]

[1] Rule 14(3).
[2] Rule 14(4)(b)
[3] Rule 14(4)(a).
[4] Rule 15(1).
[5] Rule 15(3).
[6] Rule 15(2).
[7] Rule 15(4).
[8] Rule 15(5)(a).
[9] Rule 15(5)(b).
[10] Rule 15(6).

(c) Rule 16: Confirmation proceedings

FC s 172(2)(a) makes it clear that although the Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, an order of constitutional invalidity issued by such a court has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court.[1]

FC s 172(2)(c) further stipulates that national legislation must provide for the referral of an order of constitutional invalidity to the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court Complementary Act[2] was amended in 1997 in order to make provision for such referrals.

Section 8(1)(a) of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act provides:

> Wherever the Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status declares an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President invalid as contemplated in section 172(2)(a) of the Constitution that court shall, in accordance with the rules, refer the order of constitutional invalidity to the [Constitutional] Court for confirmation.

In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In Re Ex Parte President of The Republic of South Africa and Others, the Court placed the following gloss on FC s 172(2):

> [The Constitutional Court] has exclusive jurisdiction in respect of certain constitutional matters and makes the final decision on those constitutional matters that are also within the jurisdiction of other courts. This is the context within which s 172(2)(a) provides that an order made by the SCA, a High Court or a Court of similar status 'concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President' has no force unless confirmed by the Constitutional Court. The section is concerned with the law-making acts of the legislatures at the two highest levels, and the conduct of the President who, as head of State and head of the Executive, is the highest functionary within the State. The apparent purpose of the section is to ensure that this Court, as the highest Court in constitutional matters, should control declarations of constitutional invalidity made against the highest organs of State.[3]

In SARFU, the Court emphasised that the aim of the section was to 'preserve the comity between the judicial branch of government, on the one hand, and the legislative and executive branches of government, on the other.'[4]

---

[1] The Constitutional Court has, on a number of occasions, made it clear that declarations of invalidity made in respect of regulations are not subject to confirmation under FC s 172(2). See Satchwell v President of The Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)('Satchwell') at para 2; Van Rooyen and Others v The State & Others (General Council of The Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC)('Van Rooyen'), 2002 (2) 222 SACR (CC) at para 11; Minister of Home Affairs v Liebenberg 2002 (1) SA 33 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1168 (CC)('Liebenberg')at para 13; Booysen & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)('Booysen') at para 1. But see Moseneke & Others v The Master & Another 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR103 (CC)('Moseneke') at para 13 (Court left open the question of whether FC s 172(2)(a) applies to regulations made by State Presidents prior to the coming into force of the Interim Constitution.)

[2] Act 13 of 1995.

[3] 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at paras 55-56.

[4] President of The Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC)('SARFU') at para 29.

In accordance with section 8(1)(a) of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act, Rule 16(1) requires the registrar of a court that has made an order of constitutional invalidity, as contemplated in FC s 172, to lodge a copy of such order with the Registrar of the Constitutional Court. Such an order must be lodged within fifteen days of such order having been made. Thus, the Constitutional Court receives notification of orders of invalidity automatically on the lodging of such orders by the registrars of the other courts.[1] It is not, therefore, necessary for the parties concerned to apply for confirmation of such orders.[2] However, the trend has been for parties to make such applications. The motive for many such applications is to pre-empt an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal by a respondent who does not wish the case to go directly to the Constitutional Court.

In a number of judgments, the Constitutional Court has highlighted the pursuit of legal certainty as an important aim of the confirmation process. Given the need to achieve legal certainty, the fact that a settlement may have been reached between the litigants in a case does not dispose of the need for confirmation proceedings.[3]

[1] See Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another NNO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)('Janse van Rensburg'). In Janse van Rensburg, the Constitutional Court held that the approach of the registrar of the Transvaal High Court to delay referring the order of constitutional invalidity made by the Transvaal High Court to the Constitutional Court on the basis that he was aware that there was an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal and was thus under the impression that the registrar of the Supreme Court of Appeal would have the duty of lodging any order of constitutional invalidity made by the Supreme Court of Appeal with the Constitutional Court was incorrect. Pursuant to the then existing Rule 15, the registrar of the Transvaal High Court ought to have referred the declaration of invalidity to the Constitutional Court within fifteen days of its having been made, irrespective of the fact that there was an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal in the matter. Ibid at para 4.

[2] See Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions, Johannesburg &Others 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC)('Sibiya'). The applicants had applied for confirmation of the orders of constitutional invalidity of certain provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997. Although the High Court order also declared certain conduct of the President to be invalid, the applicants had not applied for confirmation of that aspect of the High Court's order. According to the Constitutional Court, the absence of any application for confirmation and any appeal against the order declaring the conduct of the President to be invalid raised the question whether the Court should enquire into the correctness of that aspect of the High Court order. In answering this question in the affirmative, the Court reasoned that it would not be appropriate to leave such a declaration of invalidity 'in limbo', with the attendant uncertainty that such a situation would create. Accordingly, the Court held that it must consider the issue. Ibid at para 44. It seems that this reasoning (and, indeed, the raising of the question) was superfluous. Section 8(1)(a) of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act specifically obliges the courts concerned to refer any orders of constitutional invalidity made by them in relation to an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President to the Constitutional Court for confirmation. Thus the fact that the applicants did not apply for confirmation of that provision of the order relating to the conduct of the President cannot be relevant to the question whether the Constitutional Court must consider that aspect of the order. Such an application is not required in order to place the matter before the Constitutional Court; it is by virtue of its referral to the Constitutional Court by the court a quo that the matter is placed before the Constitutional Court and hence deserves its attention.

[3] See Moise (supra) at para 4; Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development and Others; Mahlaule and Others v Minister of Social Devlopment and Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 35.

This certainty rationale has further implications in relation to challenges to an applicant's standing in confirmation proceedings. The question whether an applicant's standing to bring an application for confirmation of a declaration of constitutional invalidity can be challenged was raised in Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another.[1] In the High Court proceedings, the government had disputed the standing of the applicants and had argued in favour of the validity of the impugned sections of the Immigration Act.[2] The High Court held that the applicants did have the requisite standing and further held that two of the impugned provisions were constitutionally invalid. In dealing with the challenge to the applicants' standing, Yacoob J remarked obiter that > [I]t may in any event be incumbent on [the Constitutional] Court to deal with the substance of a dispute concerning the constitutionality of legislation that reaches [it] pursuant to s 172(2) of the Constitution. This is because a High Court has already declared a particular provision to be inconsistent with the Constitution. There are good public policy reasons to suggest that the uncertainty in relation to constitutional consistency ought not to be allowed to prevail. There is therefore a strong argument that the purpose of s 172(2) of the Constitution is to ensure that the uncertainty generated by the High Court decision of unconstitutionality is eliminated and that the substance of the debate raised by the declaration is finally determined.[3]

This reasoning seems to support the view that even where the court a quo has made an error in relation to the standing of an applicant before it, the fact of its order of constitutional invalidity and the uncertainty that such an order creates prior to confirmation by the Constitutional Court may require that such an error be overlooked.

In cases where the provision declared invalid by the court a quo has subsequently been repealed, the Constitutional Court has held that it possesses the discretion to decide whether or not to deal with the matter.[4] In deciding how to exercise its discretion, the Court will consider whether any order it may make will have a practical effect on the parties or on others. In at least two such confirmation cases, the Court has declined to exercise its discretion.[5]

FC s 172*(2)(d)* declares that any person or organ of state with a sufficient interest may appeal, or apply directly, to the Constitutional Court to confirm or to [1] 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights').

[2] Act 13 of 2002.

[3] Ibid at para 24.

[4] President, Ordinary Court Martial & Others v Freedom of Expression Institute and Others 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC)('President, Ordinary Court Martial') at para 16.

[5] President, Ordinary Court Martial & Others v Freedom of Expression Institute & Others 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC); Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of The Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC). In Janse van Rensberg, the Court held that given that one of the provisions, in respect of which a declaration of invalidity had been made by the High Court, had subsequently been amended by legislation which removed the inconsistency, the matter had become moot. It accordingly held that no order would be made in respect of the confirmation proceedings relating to that particular provision of the impugned legislation. Janse van Rensberg (supra) at paras 9-10.

vary an order of constitutional invalidity granted by a court.[1] Rules 16(2) and (4) set out the requirements for the lodging of an appeal against an order of invalidity and for confirming such an order. Once a notice of appeal or an application for confirmation is lodged, the matter is to be disposed of in accordance with directions issued by the Chief Justice. Where no notice or application is lodged, the matter is to be disposed of in accordance with directions issued by the Chief Justice to that effect.[2]

In City of Cape Town & Another v Robertson & Another, the Cape High Court had, pursuant to FC s 172(2)(a), referred its order of invalidity to the Constitutional Court for confirmation.[3] The City of Cape Town and the Minister of Provincial and Local Government had opposed the confirmation and appealed directly to the Court in terms of FC s 172(2)(d). In addition, however, they had also appealed against other orders of the High Court which were not subject to confirmation. There was no objection to this procedure, and while the Court did not finally answer the question whether the appeal against the other orders lies as of right in terms of FC s 172(2)(d), the Court did hold that even if the appeal was regarded as an application for leave to appeal against those other aspects of the order, leave would have been granted in the interests of justice.[4] It is difficult to conceive of a case where it would not be in the interests of justice to grant the application for leave to appeal against the other aspects of the court a quo's order and thus it is likely that the Constitutional Court will hear such matters as part of the confirmation proceedings.

(d) Rule 18: Direct access

Although the Constitutional Court ordinarily functions as an appellate court in constitutional matters, provision is made for the Court to act as a court of first instance where it is in the interests of justice to do so.[5] To facilitate such applications, Rule 18 provides for direct access to the Court.

Rule 18 replicates the requirements of its predecessor in the 1998 Rules.[6] An application for direct access is to be brought on notice of motion, supported by

[1] See President of The Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC)(Court highlighted the fact that the reference to 'sufficient interest' in subsection (d) qualifies the persons entitled to appeal or apply for confirmation and not the subject-matter of the appeal or application.)

[2] Rule 16(5).

[3] 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC)('City of Cape Town').

[4] Ibid at para 2. It should be noted that Van Rooyen left open the same question. See Van Rooyen (supra) at para 11.

[5] FC s 167(6) provides: National legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court — (a) to bring a matter directly to the Constitutional Court.

[6] The rules are identical save for the necessary substitution of references to 'the Chief Justice' for 'the President of the Court'.

affidavit.[1] The application must be lodged with the Registrar and hence the provisions of Rule 1(3) apply to the form and number of copies required and the service of the application[2] on 'all parties with a direct or substantial interest in the relief claimed'.[3]

The application must set out the following: (a) the grounds on which it is contended that it is in the interests of justice for an order for direct access be granted; (b) the nature of the relief sought and the grounds upon which such relief is based; (c) whether the matter can be dealt with by the Court without the hearing of oral evidence and, if it cannot, (d) how such evidence should be adduced and the conflicts of fact resolved.[4] Rule 18(3) makes provision for any person or party wishing to oppose the application for direct access to notify the applicant and the Registrar in writing of his or her intention to oppose within ten days from the lodging of the application for direct access. After such notice is received, or where the period during which it may be lodged has expired, the matter will be disposed of in accordance with directions issued by the Chief Justice. Those directions may either call upon the respondents to make written submissions to the Court as to whether or not direct access should be granted or indicate that no written submissions or affidavits need to be filed.[5] Provision is made for such applications to be dealt with summarily, provided that where the respondent has indicated an intention to oppose, an application for direct access shall be granted only after the respondents have made written submissions to the Court, within the time period specified in directions, as to whether or not direct access should be granted.[6]

The Court has repeatedly emphasised that direct access is an exceptional procedure[7] and that it is not ordinarily in the interests of justice for the Court to sit as

[1] Rule 18(1).

[2] See Ex Parte Omar 2006 (2) SA 284 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1087 (CC)('Ex Parte Omar') at para 7 (Court confirmed that it is necessary for applicants to comply with the provisions of Rule 1(3) when making an application for direct access.)

[3] Rule 18(2).

[4] Rule 18(2)(a)-(d).

[5] Rule 18(4)(a)-(b).

[6] Rule 18(5).

[7] S v Zuma and Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC) at para 11; S v Mhatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371 (CC) at para 29; Luitingh v Minister of Defence 1996 (2) SA 909 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 581 (CC) at para 15; Besserglik v Minister of Trade, Industry and Tourism & Others (Minister of Justice Intervening) 1996 (4) SA 331 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 745 (CC)('Beseerglik') at para 6; Tsotetsi v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd 1997 (1) SA 585 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1439 (CC) at para 12; Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Land Affairs & Another 1997 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1573 (CC)('Transvaal Agricultural Union') at para 16; Hekpoort Environmental Preservation Society and Another v Minister of Land Affairs and Others 1998 (1) SA 349 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1537 (CC) at para 6; Van Der Spuy v General Council of The Bar of South Africa (Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Advocates for Transformation and Law Society of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 392 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1092 (CC) ('Van Der Spuy') at para 7; Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another; Bissett and Others v Buffalo City Municipality & Others; Transfer Rights Action Campaign and Others v MEC, Local Government And Housing, Gauteng & Others (Kwazulu-Natal Law Society and Msunduzi Municipality as Amici Curiae) 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC)('Mkontwana') at para 11; Ex Parte Omar (supra) at para 4.

a court of first and last instance.[1] According to the Court, 'experience shows that decisions are more likely to be correct if more than one court has been required to consider the issues raised'.[2] Thus 'compelling reasons'[3] are required to persuade the Court that it should exercise its discretion to grant direct access.[4]

Three factors count against the granting of direct access:[5] first, where direct access is granted the Court may be called on to deal with disputed facts on which the leading of evidence might be necessary;[6] secondly, the Court may be required to decide constitutional issues which are not decisive of the litigation and which might prove to be purely academic; and thirdly, where litigants approach the Court directly, the Court is required to adjudicate the matter without the benefit of the views of other Courts having constitutional jurisdiction. Furthermore, where the applicant is an organ of state, direct access will rarely be granted where those organs have not fulfilled their obligations of cooperative government as detailed in FC ss 40 and 41.[7] In addition, the Court has made it clear that it 'will not grant an application for direct access to consider a challenge to the constitutionality of legislation where the Minister responsible for the legislation is not cited in the application.'[8]

In setting out the grounds upon which it is contended that it is in 'the interests of justice' for an order of direct access to be granted, an applicant should cover the following three matters. First, the applicant's request must engage the

[1] Transvaal Agricultural Union (supra) at para 18; Bruce & Another v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC & Others 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC)('Fleecytex') at para 8; Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 1999 (2) SA 83 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC)('Christian Education South Africa') at para 12; Van der Spuy (supra) at para 19; Satchwell (supra) at para 6; Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs and Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('Zondi') at para 13; Mkontwana (supra) at para 11.

[2] Fleecytex (supra) at para 8. See also Fourie (supra) at para 39.

[3] See Fleecytex (supra) at para 9; Dormehl v Minister of Justice and Others 2000 (2) SA 987 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 471 (CC)('Dormehl') at para 5.

[4] See J Dugard 'Court of First Instance? Towards a Pro-Poor Jurisdiction for the South African Constitutional Court' 22 SAJHR (2006) 261, 275, 277 (Dugard is critical of the extent to which the combination of the absence of 'a de facto right to legal representation at state expense' and the Court's restrictive approach to direct access increases the risk of the Court becoming an elite institution. In response, Dugard proposes a pro-poor revamping of the requirements for direct access that would seek to lower the hurdle to access.) See also S Woolman & D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in This Classroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Walters and Afrox' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38 (Sets out the doctrine of stare decisis for all courts with constitutional jurisdiction, and the severe constraints that the current doctrine, as explicated in Walters and Afrox, imposes on the development of constitutional doctrine, common-law rules and statutory interpretation in the High Courts.)

[5] Fleecytex (supra) at para 7.

[6] For a decision to deny an application for direct access in terms of this factor, see Van Der Spuy (supra) at paras 16-17, 19.

[7] See National Gambling Board v Premier, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC) at paras 29-31, 37 (Parties' failure to comply with their FC Chapter 3 obligations was deemed to be a sufficient ground for refusing direct access.) See, generally, S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Cooperative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

[8] Ex parte Omar (supra) at para 4.

question whether the applicant has exhausted all other remedies or procedures that may have been available.[1] Secondly, the applicant's request must demonstrate that the matter raised in the application is of sufficient urgency or public importance to warrant direct access.[2] To this end, proof of prejudice to the public interest or the ends of justice and good government will be relevant considerations.[3] Thirdly, the applicant's request must address the prospects of success.[4]

On a number of occasions, the Constitutional Court has emphasised that direct access should not be used where another procedure is appropriate, nor should it be used to cure a defect in an application. In S v Shongwe, the Court held that the applicant's application for direct access was in essence an application for leave to appeal against his conviction by the High Court.[5] The Court held that the rule governing direct access was not applicable to appeal procedures and could not be used for disguised appeals.[6] Furthermore, where an applicant attempted to use the direct access provision of the rules to have a judgment of the High Court declared 'unconstitutional and invalid', the Court stressed that when the correctness of a judgment is in question, the appropriate procedure is not to seek direct access to have the judgment declared a nullity. It is, rather, to seek leave to appeal against the judgment.[7] Thus the general approach of the Court is to insist that direct access is an exceptional procedure that may not be used to avoid the consequences of a failure properly to formulate a constitutional challenge.[8]

Direct access applications are increasingly being used by parties where the relief they seek is substantially similar to, or has a direct impact on, the relief sought by other parties in a matter already before the Constitutional Court.[9] The [1] Besserglik (supra) at para 6.

[2] Transvaal Agricultural Union (supra) at para 19 (An applicant who contends that such urgency exists assumes an obligation of establishing such averment to the satisfaction of the Court.)

[3] Fleecytex (supra) at para 19.

[4] Ibid at para 7. See Christian Education South Africa (supra) at para 6; Dormehl (supra) at para 5.

[5] 2003 (5) SA 276 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 858 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 103 (CC)('Shongwe').

[6] Ibid at para 4.

[7] Wallach v High Court of South Africa, Witwatersrand Local Division, and Others 2003 (5) SA 273 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at para 5.

[8] See Zondi (supra) at para 19. Zondi raised a number of interesting procedural issues. The applicant challenged the constitutional validity of a number of the provisions of the Pound Ordinance (KwaZulu-Natal), 1947 ('the Ordinance') in the Pietermaritzburg High Court. The High Court held the impugned provisions of the Ordinance constitutionally invalid and referred its order of invalidity to the Constitutional Court for confirmation in terms of FC s 172(2)(a). The respondent also noted an appeal against the High Court decision. On the eve of the hearing of the matter, the applicant additionally brought an application for direct access to the Court to challenge the validity of the entire Ordinance. In rejecting the application for direct access the Court held that direct access applications should not be used to cure failures to formulate properly constitutional challenges from the outset of litigation. Ibid at para 19. It went on to consider the question whether a declaration of invalidity given in respect of the provisions of an ordinance required confirmation under FC s 172(2)(a). However, because of the existence of the respondent's appeal in the case, and the Court's resolve to treat the notice of appeal as an application for leave to appeal (which it summarily granted), the Court declined to answer this interesting question. Ibid at para 30.

[9] See Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, and Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission and Another v President of The Republic of South Africa and Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe'); Mkontwana (supra); Fourie (supra).

Constitutional Court has tended to grant these applications where, and to the extent that, the submissions sought to be made by the applicants relate to substantive issues that are already before the Court and where the insights offered by the applicants may help to resolve difficult issues before the Court. Such issues often encompass questions of the appropriate remedy[1] or enable the Court to fill in doctrinal 'gaps' in the matter already before the Court. However, where the issues raised in the application for direct access are complex, the Court will tend to privilege the value of another court's views on the topic over the interests of the applicant in securing direct access. In Mkontwana, the Court granted the WLD applicants[2] direct access in relation to the constitutionality of section 118(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000. That issue was already before the Court in a confirmation proceeding.[3] However, it declined to grant the applicants direct access in relation to other aspects of their challenge. With respect to the applicant's challenge to section 118(3) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000, the Court found that the 'reasoned judgment of another court on how the section is to be interpreted is likely to be helpful'.[4]

(e) Rules 19 & 20: Appeals to the Constitutional Court

The most substantial change from the 1998 Rules to the 2003 Rules relates to appeals procedure. Whereas the 1998 Rules drew a distinction between appeals directly from the High Courts or other superior courts (such as the Labour Courts or Land Claims Court) to the Constitutional Court, on the one hand (Rule 18), and appeals from the Supreme Court of Appeal to the Constitutional Court, on the other (Rule 20), the 2003 Rules deal with all appeals in terms of one category — Rule 19.

Under the 1998 Rules, a litigant wishing to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court in terms of Rule 18 had, first, to obtain a certificate on the prospects of success and the desirability of a direct appeal from the court which gave the decision which formed the subject of the appeal, and had, secondly, to make an application for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court. In relation to appeals from the Supreme Court of Appeal, under the 1998 Rules, a litigant did not have [1] See Bhe (supra) at para 33.

[2] In December 2002, an application was launched in the Witwatersrand Local Division of the High Court. That application required a consideration of the meaning and constitutionality of national, provincial and local government legislation including s 118(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000. Certain consequential relief was also sought in the application. The applicants included an association of persons and were jointly referred to as 'the WLD applicants'.

[3] The Mkontwana Court also granted direct access in relation to section 50(1)(a) of a Gauteng Local Government Ordinance 17 of 1939. The arguments advanced by the parties regarding the interpretation and the constitutionality of section 50(1)(a) were virtually the same as those directed at section 118(1). See Mkontwana (supra) at para 15.

[4] Ibid at para 13. The Court also declined to grant direct access in relation to the WLD applicants' challenge to section 49 of Gauteng Local Government Ordinance 17 of 1939 and certain by-laws of the City of Johannesburg. Ibid at para 14.

to obtain leave to appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal prior to applying for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court.[1]

Under the 2003 Rules, a single, vastly simplified procedure has been adopted for all appeals. That said, differences of substance, as opposed to form, remain. For example, the Constitutional Court takes a number of distinct, and additional, factors into the 'interests of justice' evaluation when an application for leave to appeal concerns a matter which has been dealt with only by a High Court (or court of similar status) as opposed to an application for leave to appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal. Moreover, the Constitutional Court has stressed that applicants not conflate the considerations which influence decisions regarding direct access with the considerations which influence leave to appeal applications.[2] The difference in the respective considerations turns primarily on the fact that in direct access cases the Court sits as a court of first instance, whereas in the latter set of cases it sits as a court of appeal.

The procedure set out in Rule 19 requires the lodging of an application for leave to appeal, after notice has been given to the other party or parties involved, within fifteen days of the order[3] against which the appeal is sought.[4] The application for leave to appeal must be signed by the applicant or his or her legal representative and must contain the following: (a) the decision against which the appeal is sought and the grounds upon which such decision is disputed; (b) a statement setting out clearly and succinctly the constitutional matter raised in the decision; and any other issues allegedly connected with a decision on a constitutional matter; (c) such supplementary information or argument as the applicant considers necessary to bring to the attention of the Court; and (d) a statement indicating whether the applicant has applied or intends applying for leave or special leave to appeal to any other court and, if so, (i) which court, (ii) whether such application is conditional upon the application to the Constitutional Court

[1] In addition, the certificate procedure which used to form part of the direct appeals procedure has not been carried over to the 2003 Rules.

[2] See Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party & Others 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC)('Members of the Executive Council') at paras 26-27.

[3] Rule 19 refers, as did its predecessor under the 1998 Rules, to applications for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court where a decision on a constitutional matter has been given by any court. The reference to 'decision' was interpreted, in relation to its predecessor — Rule 18 — under the 1998 Rules, in Khumalo v Holomisa. 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo'). The Khumalo Court had to determine whether the dismissal of an exception was appealable to the Constitutional Court where such a dismissal was not appealable to the SCA. The Khumalo Court held that the term 'decision', in Rule 18, should not be given the same meaning as the words 'judgment or order' in section 20(1) of the Supreme Court Act. According to the Khumalo Court, were it to adopt a restrictive meaning of 'decision' in the light of a range of policy considerations relevant to determining when a matter should be the subject of an appeal, it would be adopting a test different to that proclaimed by the Final Constitution, namely, that the interests of justice be the determinative criterion for deciding when appeals should be entertained by the Court. Furthermore, the Court opined that all the considerations that had led the SCA to adopt a limited interpretation of 'judgment or order' could be accommodated by the 'interests of justice' criterion. Ibid at para 8.

[4] Rule 19(2). It should be noted that where the Chief Justice has refused leave to appeal, the fifteen day period will run from the date of the order refusing leave.

being refused, and (iii) the outcome of such application if known at the time that the application to the Constitutional Court is made.[1]

The respondent is given ten days from the date upon which the application is lodged with the Registrar to respond in writing thereto,[2] indicating whether or not the application for leave to appeal is being opposed and, if so, on what grounds.[3] Furthermore, where a respondent wishes to lodge a cross-appeal, an application for leave to cross-appeal must be lodged with the Registrar within the same ten day period following the lodging of the application for leave to appeal.[4]

Applications for leave to appeal may be dealt with summarily.[5] The Court may order that the application be set down for argument and direct that the written argument of the parties deal not only with the question as to whether leave to appeal should be granted, but also with the merits of the dispute.[6] Rule 20 then sets out the procedure to be followed when leave to appeal is granted.[7]

Whether to grant leave is a matter within the discretion of the Court.[8] Leave to appeal to the Court will be granted where the application raises a constitutional matter and it is in the interests of justice to grant the application. In Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Robinson, the Court held that Rule 19 must be interpreted in the context of FC s 167(3) and FC s 167(6)(b).[9] The former section — read with FC s 167(7) — makes the Constitutional Court the highest court in all constitutional matters, including any issue concerning the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the Final Constitution.[10] The latter section stipulates that national legislation or the Rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court, with leave of the Constitutional Court, whenever it is in the interests of justice.[11]

[1] Rule 19(3). This provision makes it clear that it is permissible to apply for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court while at the same time applying for leave to appeal to another appellate court.

[2] The response must be signed by the respondent or his or her legal representative. Rule 19(4)(b).

[3] Rule 19(4)(a).

[4] Rule 19(5)(a).

[5] Rule 19(6)(b).

[6] Rule 19(6)(c).

[7] The requirements of the Constitutional Court in respect of the formatting of documents for an appeal record are less stringent than those of the corresponding Supreme Court of Appeal rule. See, in this regard, Rule 20(2) of the 2003 Rules as compared with rule 8 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Appeal promulgated under GN R1523 in Government Gazette 19507 of 27 November 1998.

[8] Phillips & Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SA 505 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 274 (CC)('Philips') at para 30; National Education Health & Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC), 2003 (24) ILJ 95 ('NEHAWU') at para 25; Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In Re Financial Services Board v Van Der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) at para 13; S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC)('Boesak'), at para 12.

[9] 2005 (4) SA 1 (CC) ('Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope').

[10] On what constitutes a 'constitutional matter', see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality, and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11; T Roux & M Sikhekhane 'The Jurisdiction of the Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 4.

[11] Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope (supra) at para 21.

The Court's assessment of the interest of justice 'involves a careful and balanced weighing-up of all relevant factors'[1] and a case-specific approach which allows for each application to be considered in the light of its own facts.[2] The following section outlines the factors relevant to the Court's evaluation of the interests of justice.

(i) Factors relevant to all applications for leave to appeal

(aa) Importance of the issue raised[3]

In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division & Others, the Court held that the relevant question is whether the grounds of appeal raise a constitutional issue of importance on which a decision by the Court is desirable.[4]

(bb) Prospects of success

Although the prospects of success is an important factor in the determination of the interests of justice, the Court has repeatedly emphasised that it is not, generally, outcome determinative.[5] Indeed, the Court has stressed that the prospects of success is rather accommodating: 'the Court does not anticipate a decision as to the success of the intended appeal, but considers only the viability of the appeal'.[6] In S v Boesak, the Court held that an applicant who seeks leave to appeal must ordinarily show that there are reasonable prospects that the Court will reverse or materially alter the decision against which leave is sought.[7]

(cc) Public interest in a determination of the constitutional issues raised[8]

The Court has held that it may, in certain circumstances, be in the interests of justice for it to decide a constitutional matter for the benefit of the broader public or to achieve legal certainty or some other public purpose, even if the decision is of no practical value to the litigants themselves.[9]

[1] Radio Pretoria v Chairperson, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa, and Another 2005 (4) SA 319 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 321 (CC)('Radio Pretoria') at para 19.

[2] S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 285 (CC) at para 39.

[3] Khumalo (supra) at para 14; Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity Convention') at para 15; Member of the Executive Council (supra) at para 32.

[4] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 445 (CC)('De Reuck') at para 3.

[5] De Reuck (supra) at para 3; National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa and Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd and Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182(CC)('NUMSA') at para 17; NEHAWU (supra) at para 25; Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (No 1) 2002 (5) SA 703 (CC)('TAC I') at paras 9-10; Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments (Pty) Ltd & Others 2000 (2) SA 837 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 465 (CC)('Brummer') at para 3; Fraser v Naude & Others 1999 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1357 (CC)('Fraser') at para 7.

[6] Beyers v Elf Regters van die Grondwetlike Hof 2002 (6) SA 630 (CC)('Beyers') at para 11.

[7] S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC)('Boesak') at para 12.

[8] Islamic Unity Convention (supra) at para 18; Khumalo (supra) at para 14.

[9] Radio Pretoria (supra) at para 22.

(dd) Accuracy of pleadings

In Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others,[1] the Court emphasised that 'it constitutes sound discipline in constitutional litigation to require accuracy in the identification of statutory provisions that are attacked on the ground of their constitutional invalidity'[2] and that such accuracy will be relevant to an interests of justice determination.[3]

(ii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court

(aa) Saving in time and costs

In Dudley v City of Cape Town & Another, the Court noted that it would consider whether savings in time and costs would result from a direct appeal.[4]

(bb) Urgency of having a final determination of the matters in issue[5]

In Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening),[6] the Court held that although there were a number of issues with which the High Court did not deal and which it would be forced to adjudicate if it were to grant leave to appeal, the interests of justice demanded that the dispute as to the legality of the transit camp that the government had established for flood victims at Leeuwkop be resolved as expeditiously as possible.[7]

(cc) Value of the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal

In Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund,[8] the Court noted that > when a constitutional matter is one which turns on the direct application of the Constitution and which does not involve the development of the common law, considerations of costs and time may make it desirable that the appeal be brought directly to [the Constitutional] Court. But when the constitutional matter involves the development of the common law, the position is different. The Supreme Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to develop the common law in all matters including constitutional matters. Because of the breadth of its jurisdiction and its expertise in the common law, its views as to whether the common law should or should not be developed in a 'constitutional matter' are of particular importance.[9]

[1] 2004 (3) SA 599 (CC), 2004 (4) BCLR 333 (CC)('Shaik').
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] See, further, Phillips (supra) at para 40.
[4] Dudley v City of Cape Town & Another 2005 (5) SA 429 (CC), 2004 (8) BCLR 805 (CC), 2004 (95) ILJ 991 (CC)('Dudley') at para 7; Member of Executive Council (supra) at para 32; Islamic Unity Convention (supra) at para 19.
[5] Dudley (supra) at para 7; Member of Executive Council (supra) at para 32.
[6] 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC).
[7] Ibid at para 28.
[8] 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC)('Amod').
[9] Ibid at para 33. See also Khumalo (supra) at para 10; S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2005 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC)('Bierman') at para 7.

Employing the same logic, the Court has also held that where both constitutional and other issues have been raised on appeal, it will seldom be in the interests of justice for the appeal to be brought directly to the Constitutional Court.[1] However, in Mkangeli and Others v Joubert and Others, the Constitutional Court noted that where the Court refuses leave to appeal because the matter properly belongs before the Supreme Court of Appeal, this decision does not preclude a litigant from approaching the Constitutional Court again for leave to appeal after the Supreme Court of Appeal has disposed of the matter.[2] Whether the Supreme Court of Appeal has disposed of the matter by way of a judgment or by refusing the petition for leave to appeal, the Constitutional Court will consider the application on its merits.[3]

(dd) Value of the views of the Labour Appeal Court

In Dudley v City of Cape Town and Another, the Court held that direct appeals from the labour courts deny it the advantage of having before it the judgments of the Labour Appeal Court on the matters in issue.[4] Any saving of time and costs and avoidance of delay must, according to the Court, be weighed against the need to ensure that the Labour Appeal Court, as the appellate court in labour matters, has had the opportunity to express its views on important labour matters.[5]

(ee) Compliance with obligations of cooperative government

The Court has held that where organs of State have not discharged their duties of co-operative government, such failure may militate against granting an organ of State leave to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court.[6]

(iii) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in custody cases: Best interests of the child

In Fraser v Naude and Others, the Court held that where a matter involves a child, the interests of that child are paramount in assessing whether to grant leave to appeal.[7] The Fraser Court opined that even if leave to appeal were to be granted, and the applicant were to succeed in his application to have the adoption order set aside, that would not be the end of the matter. The adoption proceedings would then have to be reopened and the dispute would again have to wind its way through the courts.[8] Thus, according to the Fraser Court, even where it could be

[1] Member of Executive Council (supra) at para 32.
[2] 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 316 (CC)('Mkangeli').
[3] Ibid at para 7.
[4] 2005 (5) SA 429 (CC), 2004 (8) BCLR 805 (CC)('Dudley').
[5] Ibid at para 8.
[6] MEC for Health, Kwazulu-Natal v Premier, Kwazulu-Natal: In Re Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others 2002 (5) SA 717 (CC), 2005 (10) BCLR 1028 (CC)('TAC II') at para 9.
[7] 1999 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1357(CC)('Fraser') at para 9.
[8] Ibid.

shown that there were reasonable prospects of success, it would not generally be in the interests of justice for a further appeal to be heard because the continued uncertainty as to the status and the placing of the child could not be in the child's best interests.[1]

(iv) Factors relevant to applications for leave to appeal in criminal cases

The decision to grant leave to appeal in criminal cases tends to turn on three primary considerations: (1) the nature of the crimes concerned; (2) the FC s 35 rights of accused persons; and (3) the interests of the victims of the crimes.[2] In S v Bierman, the Court also indicated that it would not be in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal against a criminal conviction on a point of law where a favourable decision would not result in the conviction being set aside.[3]

(aa) Simultaneous appeals

In S v Basson,[4] the Court made it clear that it would not sanction simultaneous appeals which, in effect, gave the litigant 'two bites at the appeal process'.[5] Thus litigants will not be permitted to apply for leave to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from a High Court judgment where the issue in dispute has already been dealt with by the Supreme Court of Appeal and special leave to appeal has also been sought against that judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal.[6]

This principle received further attention in Mabaso v Law Society, Northern Provinces, and Another.[7] In Mabaso, the applicant had sought leave to appeal against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal. The Supreme Court of Appeal had refused condonation for a failure to comply with its rules and had not dealt with the constitutional issue raised by the applicant in the High Court judgment. The Constitutional Court held that, in such circumstances, the applicant should seek leave to appeal against the judgment of the High Court in which the constitutional matter was considered.[8] For although the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision whether to condone a failure to comply with its Rules is a matter of discretion, the Court held that such discretionary decisions by the Supreme Court of Appeal could not be allowed to frustrate the Constitutional Court in the performance of its constitutional duty to ensure that constitutional matters are engaged appropriately.[9]

[1] Fraser (supra) at paras 9-10.
[2] S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 285 (CC)('Basson') at para 39.
[3] 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2005 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC)('Bierman') at para 9.
[4] 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 285 (CC)('Basson').
[5] Ibid at para 77.
[6] Ibid at para 78.
[7] 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC)('Mabaso').
[8] Ibid at para 23.
[9] Ibid at para 24.

On their face, these two judgments may appear contradictory. However, they do, in fact, cohere. What Basson prohibits is simultaneous appeals in which the appeal from the High Court judgment is used, in effect, to cure shortcomings in the appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal.[1] By contrast, what Mabaso recommends is that in a case where a constitutional matter is raised in the High Court's decision but, owing to the Supreme Court of Appeal's refusal to condone non-compliance with its rules, the Supreme Court of Appeal decision on the matter fails to deal with that constitutional matter, a litigant should apply to the Constitutional Court for leave to appeal against the judgment of the High Court. No problem of simultaneous appeals arises in the latter set of cases because the correct procedure to follow is to seek leave to appeal against the High Court decision alone.

That said, in Mabaso-like cases, reference will need to be made to the Supreme Court of Appeal decision, and, where available, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal will presumably need to be lodged with the Constitutional Court: the Court has stressed that in assessing whether to grant such an application for leave to appeal, it will consider the circumstances in which the Supreme Court of Appeal has refused the application for condonation.[2] Furthermore, where there has been a flagrant and gross breach of the rules of the Supreme Court of Appeal by the litigant, that will, according to the Court, militate against the grant of leave. It will only be in the interests of justice for leave to be granted in such cases where it is clear that the constitutional issue is of some importance and that there are reasonable prospects of success in relation to the appeal on the constitutional issue.[3]

(bb) Litigants aggrieved by a decision

In Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Robinson,[4] the respondent contended that, in terms of Rule 19(2), the Director of Public Prosecutions ('DPP') was neither 'aggrieved by the decision of the High Court' nor a 'litigant' within the meaning of the Rule and hence the application for leave to appeal was not competent.[5] The High Court decision, against which leave to appeal was sought by the DPP, held that the magistrate concerned ought not to have declared that the respondent was liable to surrender within the meaning of section 10(1) of the Extradition Act.[6] On the magistrate's reading of the apposite section, the respondent would, contrary to the provisions of the Final Constitution, be forced, upon extradition, to serve a sentence of imprisonment imposed in his absence. In answering the respondent's contention, the Court held that the reference to 'person' in FC s 167(6) should be broadly construed.[7] On the basis of this

[1] Basson (supra) at para 78.
[2] Mabaso (supra) at para 27.
[3] Ibid.
[4] 2005 (4) SA 1 (CC)('Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope').
[5] Ibid at para 15.
[6] Act 67 of 1962.
[7] Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope (supra) at para 31.

reading of FC s 167(6), the Court held that the DPP qualified as a 'litigant' for the purposes of Rule 19.[1] Moreover, the Court held that the DPP was more than merely 'disappointed by the High Court decision'.[2] The office was, according to the Court, 'aggrieved' by the decision of the High Court because it had a direct and substantial interest in the adjudication of the issue: the DPP wished to have the respondent extradited and had been barred from extraditing him as a result of the High Court judgment.[3]

(v) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals against interim orders of execution

In so far as appeals against interim orders of execution are concerned, the Court has held that it will generally not be in the interests of justice for a litigant to be granted leave to appeal against such orders.[4] Ordinarily, for an applicant to succeed in such an application, the applicant would have to show that irreparable harm would result if the interim appeal were not to be granted — a matter which would, by definition, have been considered by the court below in deciding whether or not to grant the execution order. If irreparable harm cannot be shown, an application for leave to appeal will generally fail. If the applicant can show irreparable harm, that irreparable harm would have to be weighed against any irreparable harm that the respondent (in the application for leave to appeal) may suffer were the interim execution order to be overturned.[5]

(vi) Factors to be considered with respect to appeals from the Labour Appeal Court

In so far as appeals from the Labour Appeal Court are concerned, the Constitutional Court has held that it will be slow to hear appeals from the Labour Appeal Court because, by their very nature, labour disputes ought to be resolved expeditiously and be brought to finality so that the parties can organise their affairs accordingly.[6] It is in the public interest that labour disputes be resolved speedily and by experts appointed for that purpose. Nevertheless, where the case raises important matters of constitutional principle, as it did in National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town and Others, the Constitutional Court may grant leave to appeal.[7]

[1] Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope (supra) at para 39.
[2] Ibid at para 40.
[3] Ibid.
[4] TAC I (supra) at para 12.
[5] Ibid.
[6] National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2004 (3) BCLR 237 (CC) at para 31.
[7] Ibid at para 32.

APPENDIX: CONSTITUTIONAL COURT RULES

1 Definitions

1. In these Rules any word or expression to which a meaning has been assigned in the Constitution shall bear that meaning and, unless the context otherwise indicates:

'affidavit' includes an affirmation or a declaration contemplated in section 7 of the Justices of the Peace and Commissioners of Oaths Act, 1963 (Act 16 of 1963);

'apply' means apply on notice of motion, and 'application' has a corresponding meaning;

'Chief Justice' means the Chief Justice of South Africa appointed in terms of section 174 (3) of the Constitution;

'Constitution' means the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996;

'Court' means the Constitutional Court established by section 166 (a) of the Constitution, read with item 16 (2) (a) of Schedule 6 to the Constitution;

'Court day' means any day other than a Saturday, Sunday or public holiday, and only Court days shall be included in the computation of any time expressed in days prescribed by these rules or fixed by any order of the Court;

'Deputy Chief Justice' means the Deputy Chief Justice appointed in terms of section 174 (3) of the Constitution;

'directions' means directions given by the Chief Justice with regard to the procedures to be followed in the conduct and disposition of cases;

'judge' means a judge or acting judge of the Court appointed under section 174 or 175 of the Constitution, sitting otherwise than in open court;

'law clinic' means a centre for the practical legal education of students in the faculty of law at a university in the Republic, and includes a law centre controlled by a non-profit organisation which provides the public with legal services free of charge and is certified as contemplated in section 3(1)(f) of the Attorneys Act, 1979 (Act 53 of 1979);

'legal representative' means an advocate admitted in terms of section 3 of the Admission of Advocates Act, 1964 (Act 74 of 1964), or an attorney admitted in terms of section 15 of the Attorneys Act, 1979 (Act 53 of 1979);

'party' or any other reference to a litigant includes a legal representative appearing on behalf of a party, as the context may require;

'President' means the President of the Supreme Court of Appeal;

'Registrar' means the Registrar of the Court, and includes any acting or assistant Registrar of the Court, or in their absence any person designated by the Director of the Court;

'sheriff' means a person appointed in terms of section 2 of the Sheriffs Act, 1986 (Act 90 of 1986), and includes a person appointed in terms of section 5 or section 6 of that Act as an acting or a deputy sheriff, respectively, and a sheriff, an acting or a deputy sheriff appointed in terms of any law not yet repealed by a competent authority and in force immediately before the commencement of the Constitution, in any area which forms part of the national territory;

'Supreme Court of Appeal Rules' means the rules regulating the conduct of the proceedings of the Supreme Court of Appeal published under Government Notice R1523 of 27 November 1998; and

'Uniform Rules' means the rules regulating the conduct of the proceedings of the several provincial and local divisions of the high courts published under Government Notice R48 of 12 January 1965, as amended.

2. Any powers or authority vesting in the Chief Justice in terms of these rules may be exercised by a judge or judges designated by the Chief Justice for that purpose.
3. Any reference in these rules to a party having to sign documents shall be construed as including a reference to a legal representative representing such party, and a reference to lodging documents with the Registrar as including prior service of such documents on other parties and the lodging of 25 copies of all relevant documents and an electronic version thereof that is compatible with the software used by the Court, with the Registrar.
4. Notices, directions or other communications in terms of these rules may be given or made by registered post or by facsimile or other electronic copy: Provided that, if a notice or other communication is given by electronic copy, the party giving such notice or communication shall forthwith lodge with the Registrar a hard copy of the notice or communication, with a certificate signed by such a party verifying the date of such communication or notice.
5. The Chief Justice may extend any time limit prescribed in these rules.
6. Written arguments, responses and any other representations to the Court shall be clear and succinct.
7. Applications shall be legible and in double-spaced, typewritten format on A4-size paper.
8. Subject to rule 5, the provisions of rule 4 of the Uniform Rules shall apply, with such modifications as may be necessary, to the service of any process of the Court.

PART I (RULE 2)

2 COURT

1. There shall be four terms in each year as follows:
   - 15 February to 31 March, inclusive;
   - 1 May to 31 May, inclusive;
   - 15 August to 30 September, inclusive;

- 1 November to 30 November, inclusive.

2. A case may be heard out of term if the Chief Justice so directs.
3. If the day fixed for the commencement of a term is not a Court day, the term shall commence on the next succeeding Court day and, if the day fixed for the end of a term is not a Court day, the term shall end on the Court day preceding.

PART II REGISTRAR (RULES 3-4)

3 REGISTRAR'S OFFICE HOURS

1. The office of the Registrar shall be open from 08:30 to 13:00 and from 14:00 to 15:30 on Court days.
2. The Registrar may in exceptional circumstances accept documents at a time outside office hours, and shall do so when directed by a judge.

4 GENERAL DUTIES OF THE REGISTRAR

1. A notice of appeal, an order of court referring any matter to the Court by another court, or another document by which proceedings are initiated in the Court in terms of these rules shall be numbered by the Registrar with a consecutive number for the year during which it is filed.
2. Every document afterwards lodged in such a case or in any subsequent case in continuation thereof shall be marked with that number by the party lodging it and shall not be received by the Registrar until so marked.
3. All documents delivered to the Registrar to be filed in a case shall be filed by the Registrar in a case file under the number of such case.
4. All documents referred to in subrule (1) shall be subject to the payment of R75, 00 court fees in the form of a revenue stamp: Provided that if a party satisfies the Registrar in terms of subrule (5) that he or she is indigent, the payment of court fees shall be waived by the Registrar who shall make a note to that effect on the first page of the document in question.
5. A party who desires to initiate or oppose proceedings in the Court and who is of the opinion that he or she is indigent, or anybody on behalf of such party, shall satisfy the Registrar that, except for household goods, wearing apparel and tools of trade, such party is not possessed of property to the amount of R20 000 and will not be able within a reasonable time to provide such sum from his or her earnings.
6. Where photocopies are made, the fee prescribed in subrule (6) (a) shall be payable. Copies of a record may be made by any person in the presence of the Registrar.
   a. The Registrar shall at the request of a party make a copy of any court document on payment of court fees with revenue stamps of R0, 50 for every photocopy of an A4-size page or part thereof and shall against payment of a fee of R1, 00 certify that photocopy to be a true copy of the original.

b. The payment of court fees may be waived by the Registrar in the case of an indigent person referred to in subrules (4) and (5).

7. Whenever the Court makes an order declaring or confirming any law or provision thereof to be inconsistent with the Constitution under section 172 of the Constitution, the Registrar shall, not later than 15 days after such order has been made, cause such order to be published in the Gazette and in the relevant Provincial Gazette if the order relates to provincial legislation.
8. The Registrar shall publish a hearing list, which shall be affixed to the notice board at the Court building not less than 15 days before each term for the convenience of the legal representatives and the information of the public.
9. Directions with regard to any proceedings shall be furnished by the Registrar to the parties concerned within five days of such directions having been given.
10. a. The Registrar shall maintain the Court's records and shall not permit any of them to be removed from the court building.
    b. Any document lodged with the Registrar and made part of the Court's records shall not thereafter be withdrawn permanently from the official court files.
    c. After the conclusion of the proceedings in the Court, any original records and papers transmitted to the Court by any other court shall be returned to the court from which they were received.
11. a. If it appears to the Registrar that a party is unrepresented, he or she shall refer such party to the nearest office or officer of the Human Rights Commission, the Legal Aid Board, a law clinic or such other appropriate body or institution that may be willing and in a position to assist such party.
    b. The State or the Registrar shall not be liable for any damage or loss resulting from assistance given in good faith by that Registrar to such party in proceedings before the Court or in the enforcement of an order in terms of these rules in the form of legal advice or in the compilation or preparation of any process or document.

PART III JOINDER OF ORGANS OF STATE (RULE 5)

5 JOINDER OF ORGANS OF STATE

1. In any matter, including any appeal, where there is a dispute over the constitutionality of any executive or administrative act or conduct or threatened executive or administrative act or conduct, or in any inquiry into the constitutionality of any law, including any Act of Parliament or that of a provincial legislature, and the authority responsible for the executive or administrative act or conduct or the threatening thereof or for the administration of any such law is not cited as a party to the case, the party challenging the constitutionality of such act or conduct or law shall, within five days of lodging with the Registrar a document in which such contention is raised for the first time in the proceedings before the Court, take steps to join the authority concerned as a party to the proceedings.

2. No order declaring such act, conduct or law to be unconstitutional shall be made by the Court in such matter unless the provisions of this rule have been complied with.

PART IV PARTIES (RULES 6-9)

6 REPRESENTATION OF PARTIES

Except where the Court or the Chief Justice directs otherwise, no person shall be entitled to appear on behalf of any party at any proceedings of the Court unless he or she is entitled to appear in the high courts.

7 CHANGE OF PARTIES

1. If a party dies or becomes incompetent to continue any proceedings, the proceedings shall thereby be stayed until such time as an authorised representative or other competent person has been appointed in the place of such party, or until such incompetence ceases to exist.
2. Where an authorised or other competent person has been so appointed, the Court may, on application, order that such authorised or competent person be substituted for the party who has so died or become incompetent.

8 INTERVENTION OF PARTIES IN THE PROCEEDINGS

1. Any person entitled to join as a party or liable to be joined as a party in the proceedings may, on notice to all parties, at any stage of the proceedings apply for leave to intervene as a party.
2. The Court or the Chief Justice may upon such application make such order, including any order as to costs, and give such directions as to further procedure in the proceedings as may be necessary.

9 POWER OF ATTORNEY OR AUTHORISATION TO ACT

1. A power of attorney need not be filed, but the authority of a legal practitioner to act on behalf of any party may, within 21 days after it has come to the notice of any party that the legal practitioner is so acting, or with the leave of the Court on good cause shown at any time before judgment, be disputed by notice, whereafter the legal practitioner may no longer so act, unless a power of attorney is lodged with the Registrar within 21 days of such notice.
2. Every power of attorney or authorisation to act lodged shall be signed by or on behalf of the party giving it, and shall otherwise be duly executed according to law.
3. No power of attorney or authorisation to act shall be required to be lodged by anyone acting on behalf of the State.

PART V (RULE 10)

10 AMICI CURIAE

1. Subject to these rules, any person interested in any matter before the Court may, with the written consent of all the parties in the matter before the Court, given not later than the time specified in subrule (5), be admitted therein as an amicus curiae upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as may be agreed upon in writing with all the parties before the Court or as may be directed by the Chief Justice in terms of subrule (3).
2. The written consent referred to in subrule (1) shall, within five days of it having been obtained, be lodged with the Registrar and the amicus curiae shall, in addition to any other provision, comply with the times agreed upon for the lodging of written argument.
3. The Chief Justice may amend the terms, conditions, rights and privileges agreed upon as referred to in subrule (1).
4. If the written consent referred to in subrule (1) has not been secured, any person who has an interest in any matter before the Court may apply to the Chief Justice to be admitted therein as an amicus curiae, and the Chief Justice may grant such application upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as he or she may determine.
5. If time limits are not otherwise prescribed in the directions given in that matter an application pursuant to the provisions of subrule (4) shall be made not later than five days after the lodging of the respondent's written submissions or after the time for lodging such submissions has expired.
6. An application to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall-
   a. briefly describe the interest of the amicus curiae in the proceedings;
   b. briefly identify the position to be adopted by the amicus curiae in the proceedings; and
   c. set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus curiae, their relevance to the proceedings and his or her reasons for believing that the submissions will be useful to the Court and different from those of the other parties.
7. An amicus curiae shall have the right to lodge written argument, provided that such written argument does not repeat any matter set forth in the argument of the other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.
8. Subject to the provisions of rule 31, an amicus curiae shall be limited to the record on appeal or referral and the facts found proved in other proceedings and shall not add thereto and shall not present oral argument.
9. An order granting leave to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall specify the date of lodging the written argument of the amicus curiae or any other relevant matter.
10. An order of Court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of an amicus curiae.

11. The provisions of rule 1 (3) shall be applicable, with such modifications as may be necessary, to an amicus curiae.

PART VI APPLICATIONS (RULES 11-13)

11 APPLICATION PROCEDURE

1. Save where otherwise provided, in any matter in which an application is necessary for any purpose, including-
   a. in respect of a matter contemplated in section 167 (4) (a) of the Constitution; and
   b. the obtaining of directions from the Court, such application shall be brought on notice of motion supported by an affidavit as to the facts upon which the applicant relies for relief and shall set out an address within 25 kilometres from the office of the Registrar stating the physical and postal address with facsimile, telephone numbers and an e-mail address, where available, at which he or she will accept notice and service of all documents in the proceedings and shall set forth a day, not less than five days after service thereof on the respondent, on or before which such respondent is required to notify the applicant in writing whether he or she intends to oppose such application and shall further state that if no such notification is given, the Registrar will be requested to place the matter before the Chief Justice to be dealt with in terms of subrule (4).

2. When relief is claimed against any person, authority, government, organ of state or body, or where it is necessary or proper to give any of the aforementioned notice of an application referred to in subrule (1), the notice of motion shall be addressed to both the Registrar and the aforementioned, and shall set out such particulars, including physical address, facsimile, telephone numbers and an e-mail address, where available, of the party against whom the relief is sought, as will enable the Registrar to communicate with such party, otherwise it shall be addressed to the Registrar and shall be as near as may be in accordance with Form 1 or 2, as the case may be.
3. a. Any person opposing the granting of an order sought in the notice of motion shall—
      i. within the time stated in the said notice, notify the applicant and the Registrar in writing of his or her intention to oppose the application and shall in such notice appoint an address within 25 kilometres of the office of the Registrar at which he or she will accept notice and service of all documents in the proceedings;
      ii. within 15 days of notifying the applicant of his or her intention to oppose the application lodge his or her answering affidavit, if any, together with any relevant documents, which may include supporting affidavits.
   b. The applicant may lodge a replying affidavit within 10 days of the service upon him or her of the affidavit and documents referred to in paragraph (a) (ii).

c. i. Where no notice of opposition is given or where no answering affidavit in terms of paragraph (a) (ii) is lodged within the time referred to in paragraph (a) (ii), the Registrar shall within five days of the expiry thereof place the application before the Chief Justice.
ii. Where an answering affidavit is lodged, the Registrar shall place the application before the Chief Justice within five days of the lodging of the replying affidavit.

d. The Chief Justice may, when giving directions under subrule (4), permit the lodging of further affidavits.

4. When an application is placed before the Chief Justice in terms of subrule (3) (c), he or she shall give directions as to how the application shall be dealt with and, in particular, as to whether it shall be set down for hearing or whether it shall be dealt with on the basis of written argument or summarily on the basis of the information contained in the affidavits.

12 Urgent Applications

1. In urgent applications, the Chief Justice may dispense with the forms and service provided for in these rules and may give directions for the matter to be dealt with at such time and in such manner and in accordance with such procedure, which shall as far as is practicable be in accordance with these rules, as may be appropriate.
2. An application in terms of subrule (1) shall on notice of motion be accompanied by an affidavit setting forth explicitly the circumstances that justify a departure from the ordinary procedures.

13 Argument

1. Written argument shall be filed timeously and shall contain a table of contents, and a table of authorities with references to the pages in the document on which they are cited.
2. Oral argument shall not be allowed if directions to that effect are given by the Chief Justice.
3. a. Oral argument shall be relevant to the issues before the Court and its duration shall be subject to such time limits as the Chief Justice may impose.
b. The parties shall assume that all the judges have read the written arguments and that there is no need to repeat what is set out therein.
4. a. Argument may be addressed to the Court in any official language and the party concerned shall not be responsible for the provision of an interpreter.
b. Should a person wish to address the Court in an official language other than the language in which such person's written argument is couched, such person shall, at least seven days prior to the hearing of the matter in question, give written notice to the Registrar of his or her intention to use another official language and shall indicate what that language is.

5. On the Court's own motion, or on the application of one or more parties, the Court may order that two or more cases, involving what appear to be the same or related questions, be argued together as one case or on such other terms as may be prescribed.

PART VII MATTERS WITHIN THE EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION OF THE COURT (RULES 14-17)

14 REFERRAL OF A BILL

1. The referral of a Bill in terms of section 79 (4) (b) or 121 (2) (b) of the Constitution by the President of the Republic of South Africa or by the Premier of a province, as the case may be, shall be in writing and shall be addressed to the Registrar and to the Speaker of the National Assembly and the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, or to the Speaker of the provincial legislature in question, as the case may be.
2. Such referral shall specify-
   a. the provision or provisions of the Bill in respect of which the President of the Republic of South Africa or the Premier of a province has reservations;
   b. the constitutional provision or provisions relating to such reservations; and
   c. the grounds or reasons for such reservations.
3. Political parties represented in the national Parliament or the provincial legislature concerned, as the case may be, shall be entitled as of right to make written submissions relevant to the determination of the issue within the time specified in directions given under subrule (4).
4. Upon receipt of the referral, the matter shall be dealt with in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice, which may include a direction-
   a. requesting the relevant Speaker or the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, as the case may be, for such additional information as the Chief Justice may consider to be necessary or expedient to deal with the matter; and
   b. calling upon all interested political parties in the national Parliament or the provincial legislature concerned, as the case may be, who may wish to do so to make such written submissions as are relevant to the determination of the issue within a period to be specified in such direction.

15 CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AN ACT

1. An application in terms of sections 80 (1) and 122 (1) of the Constitution by members of the National Assembly or a provincial legislature shall be brought on notice of motion supported by an affidavit as to the contentions upon which the applicants rely for relief and shall be lodged with the Registrar and served on the Speaker of the National Assembly and, where applicable, the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, or on the Speaker of the provincial legislature concerned, as the case may be.

2. The notice shall request the Speaker and, if relevant, the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces, to bring the application to the attention of all political parties represented in the relevant house or legislature in writing within five days of the service upon him or her of such application.
3. The application referred to in subrule (1) shall be accompanied by a certificate by the Speaker of the legislature concerned that the requirements of section 80 (2) (a) or section 122 (2) (a) of the Constitution, as the case may be, have been complied with.
4. The application referred to in subrule (1) shall also specify—
   a. the provision or provisions of the Act being challenged;
   b. the relevant provision or provisions of the Constitution relied upon for such challenge;
   c. the grounds upon which the respective provisions are deemed to be in conflict; and
   d. the relief, including any interim relief, sought.
5. a. Any political party in the legislature concerned or any government that wishes to oppose the granting of an order sought in such an application shall notify the Registrar in writing within 15 days of service of such application of such intention to oppose and shall, in such notification, appoint an address at which such party or government will accept notice and service of all documents in the proceedings.
   b. If such a notice is given, the application shall be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of rule 11.
6. If a notice to oppose is not lodged in terms of subrule (5), the matter shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice, which may include a direction—
   a. calling for such additional information as the Chief Justice may consider necessary or expedient to deal with the matter; and
   b. that all interested political parties in the national Parliament or the provincial legislature concerned, as the case may be, who wish to do so make such written submissions as are relevant to the determination of the issue within a period specified in such direction.

16 Confirmation of an Order of Constitutional Invalidity

1. The Registrar of a court which has made an order of constitutional invalidity as contemplated in section 172 of the Constitution shall, within 15 days of such order, lodge with the Registrar of the Court a copy of such order.
2. A person or organ of state entitled to do so and desirous of appealing against such an order in terms of section 172 (2) (d) of the Constitution shall, within 15 days of the making of such order, lodge a notice of appeal with the Registrar and a copy thereof with the Registrar of the Court which made the order, whereupon the matter shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice.

3. The appellant shall in such notice of appeal set forth clearly the grounds on which the appeal is brought, indicating which findings of fact and/or law are appealed against and the order it is contended ought to have been made.
4. A person or organ of state entitled to do so and desirous of applying for the confirmation of an order in terms of section 172 (2) (d) of the Constitution shall, within 15 days of the making of such order, lodge an application for such confirmation with the Registrar and a copy thereof with the Registrar of the Court which made the order, whereupon the matter shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice.
5. If no notice or application as contemplated in subrules (2) and (4), respectively, has been lodged within the time prescribed, the matter of the confirmation of the order of invalidity shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice.

17 Certification of a Provincial Constitution

1. The Speaker of a provisional legislature which has passed or amended a constitution in terms of sections 142 and 144 (2) of the Constitution and which wishes such constitution or constitutional amendment to be certified by the Court shall certify in writing the content of the constitution or amendment passed by the provincial legislature and submit such constitution or constitutional amendment to the Registrar with a formal request to the Court to perform its functions in terms of section 144 of the Constitution.
2. The certificate contemplated in subrule (1) shall include a statement specifying that the constitution or the constitutional amendment was passed by the requisite majority.
3. Any political party represented in the provincial legislature shall be entitled as of right to present oral argument to the Court, provided that such political party may be required to submit a written submission to the Court in advance of the oral argument.
4. Upon the receipt of the request referred to in subrule (1), the matter shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice, which may include—
    a. referral to the Speaker for such additional information as is considered by the Chief Justice to be necessary or expedient to deal with the matter;
    b. a direction, specifying the time within which written submissions from interested political parties shall be made;
    c. a direction that any written submissions made in terms paragraph (b) should be brought to the attention of other political parties in the provincial legislature by such means as the Chief Justice considers suitable.

5. An order of the Court pursuant to section 144 of the Constitution may specify the provisions of the provincial constitution or of the constitutional amendment, if any, which comply and which do not comply with the Constitution.

PART VIII DIRECT ACCESS AND APPEALS (RULES 18-21)

18 DIRECT ACCESS

1. An application for direct access as contemplated in section 167 (6) (a) of the Constitution shall be brought on notice of motion, which shall be supported by an affidavit, which shall set forth the facts upon which the applicant relies for relief.
2. An application in terms of subrule (1) shall be lodged with the Registrar and served on all parties with a direct or substantial interest in the relief claimed and shall set out—
   a. the grounds on which it is contended that it is in the interests of justice that an order for direct access be granted;
   b. the nature of the relief sought and the grounds upon which such relief is based;
   c. whether the matter can be dealt with by the Court without the hearing of oral evidence and, if it cannot;
   d. how such evidence should be adduced and conflicts of fact resolved.
3. Any person or party wishing to oppose the application shall, within 10 days after the lodging of such application, notify the applicant and the Registrar in writing of his or her intention to oppose.
4. After such notice of intention to oppose has been received by the Registrar or where the time for the lodging of such notice has expired, the matter shall be disposed of in accordance with directions given by the Chief Justice, which may include—
   a. a direction calling upon the respondents to make written submissions to the Court within a specified time as to whether or not direct access should be granted; or
   b. a direction indicating that no written submissions or affidavits need be filed.
5. Applications for direct access may be dealt with summarily, without hearing oral or written argument other than that contained in the application itself: Provided that where the respondent has indicated his or her intention to oppose in terms of subrule (3), an application for direct access shall be granted only after the provisions of subrule (4) (a) have been complied with.

19 APPEALS

1. The procedure set out in this rule shall be followed in an application for leave to appeal to the Court where a decision on a constitutional matter, other than an order of constitutional invalidity under section 172 (2) (a) of the Constitution, has been given by any court including the Supreme Court of Appeal, and irrespective of whether the President has refused leave or special leave to appeal.

2. A litigant who is aggrieved by the decision of a court and who wishes to appeal against it directly to the Court on a constitutional matter shall, within 15 days of the order against which the appeal is sought to be brought and after giving notice to the other party or parties concerned, lodge with the Registrar an application for leave to appeal: Provided that where the President has refused leave to appeal the period prescribed in this rule shall run from the date of the order refusing leave.
3. An application referred to in subrule (2) shall be signed by the applicant or his or her legal representative and shall contain—
   a. the decision against which the appeal is brought and the grounds upon which such decision is disputed;
   b. a statement setting out clearly and succinctly the constitutional matter raised in the decision; and any other issues including issues that are alleged to be connected with a decision on the constitutional matter;
   c. such supplementary information or argument as the applicant considers necessary to bring to the attention of the Court; and
   d. a statement indicating whether the applicant has applied or intends to apply for leave or special leave to appeal to any other court, and if so—
      i. which court;
      ii. whether such application is conditional upon the application to the Court being refused; and
      iii. the outcome of such application, if known at the time of the application to the Court.
4. a. Within 10 days from the date upon which an application referred to in subrule (2) is lodged, the respondent or respondents may respond thereto in writing, indicating whether or not the application for leave to appeal is being opposed, and if so the grounds for such opposition.
   b. The response shall be signed by the respondent or respondents or his or her or their legal representative.
5. a. A respondent or respondents wishing to lodge a cross-appeal to the Court on a constitutional matter shall, within 10 days from the date upon which an application in subrule (2) is lodged, lodge with the Registrar an application for leave to cross-appeal.
   b. The provisions of these rules with regard to appeals shall apply, with necessary modifications, to cross-appeals.
6. a. The Court shall decide whether or not to grant the appellant leave to appeal.
   b. Applications for leave to appeal may be dealt with summarily, without receiving oral or written argument other than that contained in the application itself.

c. The Court may order that the application for leave to appeal be set down for argument and direct that the written argument of the parties deal not only with the question whether the application for leave to appeal should be granted, but also with the merits of the dispute. The provisions of rule 20 shall, with necessary modifications, apply to the procedure to be followed in such procedures.

20 Procedure on Appeal

1. If leave to appeal is given in terms of rule 19, the appellant shall note and prosecute the appeal as follows:
   a. The appellant shall prepare and lodge the appeal record with the Registrar within such time as may be fixed by the Chief Justice in directions.
   b. Subject to the provisions of subrule (1) (c) below, the appeal record shall consist of the judgment of the court from which the appeal is noted, together with all the documentation lodged by the parties in that court and all the evidence which may have been led in the proceedings and which may be relevant to the issues that are to be determined.
   c. i. The parties shall endeavour to reach agreement on what should be included in the record and, in the absence of such agreement, the appellant shall apply to the Chief Justice for directions to be given in regard to the compilation of the record.
      ii. Such application shall be made in writing and shall set out the nature of the dispute between the parties in regard to the compilation of the record and the reasons for the appellant's contentions.
      iii. The respondent may respond to the application within 10 days of being served with the application and shall set out the reasons for the respondent's contentions.
      iv. The Chief Justice may assign the application to one or more judges, who may deal with the matter on the papers or require the parties to appear before him or her or them on a specified day and at a specified time to debate the compilation of the record.
      v. The judge or judges concerned shall give directions in regard to the compilation of the record, the time within which the record is to be lodged with the Registrar and any other matters which may be deemed by him or her or them to be necessary for the purpose of enabling the Court to deal with the appeal, which directions may include that the matter be referred back to the court a quo for the hearing of additional evidence specified in the directions, or that additional evidence be put before the Court by way of affidavit or otherwise for the purpose of the appeal.
2. a. One of the copies of the record lodged with the Registrar shall be certified as correct by the Registrar of the court appealed from.

b. Copies of the record shall be clearly typed on stout A4-size paper, double-spaced in black record ink, on one side of the paper only.
c. Legible documents that were typed or printed in their original form such as cheques and the like shall not be retyped and clear photocopies on A4-size paper shall be provided instead.
d. The pages shall be numbered clearly and consecutively and every tenth line on each page shall be numbered and the pagination used in the court a quo shall be retained where possible.
e. Bulky records shall be divided into separate conveniently-sized volumes of approximately 100 pages each. The record shall be securely bound in book format to withstand constant use and shall be so bound that upon being used will lie open without manual or other restraint.
f. All records shall be securely bound in suitable covers disclosing the case number, names of the parties, the volume number and the numbers of the pages contained in that volume, the total number of volumes, the court a quo and the names of the attorneys of the parties.
g. The binding required by this rule shall be sufficiently secure to ensure the stability of the papers contained within the volume; and where the record consists of more than one volume, the number of each volume and the number of the pages contained in a volume shall appear on the upper third of the spine of the volume.
h. Where documents are lodged with the Registrar, and such documents are recorded on a computer disk, the party lodging the document shall where possible also make available to the Registrar a disk containing the file in which the document is contained, or transmit an electronic copy of the document concerned by e-mail in a format determined by the Registrar which is compatible with software that is used by the Court at the time of lodgement, to the Registrar at: registrar@concourt.org.za: Provided that the transmission of such copy shall not relieve the party concerned from the obligation under rule 1 (3) to lodge the prescribed number of hard copies of the documents so lodged.
i. If a disk is made available to the Registrar the file will be copied and the disk will be returned to the party concerned. Where a disk or an electronic copy of a document other than a record is provided, the party need lodge only 13 copies of the document concerned with the Registrar.

3. If a record has been lodged in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (b) and (c) of subrule (1), the Registrar shall cause a notice to be given to the parties to the appeal requiring—
   a. the appellant to lodge with the Registrar written argument in support of the appeal within a period determined by the Chief Justice and specified in such notice; and

b. the respondent to lodge with the Registrar written argument in reply to the appellant's argument by a specified date determined by the Chief Justice, which shall be subsequent to the date on which the appellant's argument was served on the respondent.

4. The appellant may lodge with the Registrar written argument in answer to the respondent's argument within 10 days from the date on which the respondent's argument was served on the appellant.
5. The Chief Justice may decide whether the appeal shall be dealt with on the basis of written arguments only.
6. Subject to the provisions of subrule (5), the Chief Justice shall determine the date on which oral argument will be heard, and the Registrar shall within five days of such determination notify all parties to the appeal of the date of the hearing by registered post or facsimile.

21 Additional Information to be Furnished to the Registrar

When an application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity or a notice of appeal against such order is lodged with the Registrar in terms of rule 16, or an application for leave to appeal is lodged in terms of rule 19, the applicant or appellant shall at the same time provide the Registrar with a note—

a. setting out the length of the record, or if the record consists of evidence that has not been transcribed, an estimate of the length of the record and the time required for transcription;
b. whether there are any special circumstances that may require a hearing of more than one day or which might otherwise be relevant to the directions to be given by the Chief Justice.

Part ix Fees and Costs (Rules 22-23)

22 Taxation of Costs and Attorneys' Fees

1. Rules 17 and 18 of the Supreme Court of Appeal Rules regarding taxation and attorneys' fees shall apply, with such modifications as may be necessary.
2. In the event of oral and written argument, a fee for written argument may in appropriate circumstances be allowed as a separate item.

23 Fees of the Court

1. In addition to the Court fees already prescribed in these rules the fees in Schedule 2 shall be the fees of the court payable with revenue stamps.
2. The proviso to rule 4 (4) and the provisions of rule 4 (5) shall apply, with such modifications as may be necessary.

PART X MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS (RULES 24-36)

24 LIBRARY

1. The Court's library shall be available for use by the judges, the staff of the Court and other persons who have permission from the librarian for the purposes of constitutional research.
2. The library shall be open during such times as the reasonable needs of the Court may require and its operation shall be governed by the rules made by the Court's Library Committee in consultation with the Chief Justice.

25 TRANSLATIONS

Where any record or other document lodged with the Registrar contains material written in an official language that is not understood by all the judges, the Registrar shall have the portions of such record or document concerned translated by a sworn translator of the High Court into a language or languages that will be understood by such judges, and shall supply the parties with a copy of such translations.

26 MODELS, DIAGRAMS AND EXHIBITS

1. Models, diagrams and exhibits of material forming part of the evidence taken in a case and brought to the Court for its inspection shall be placed in the custody of the Registrar at least 10 days before the case is to be heard or submitted.
2. All models, diagrams and exhibits of material placed in the custody of the Registrar shall be removed by the parties within 40 days after the case is decided.
3. When this is not done, the Registrar shall notify the party concerned to remove the articles forthwith and if they are not removed within six months thereafter, the Registrar shall destroy them or otherwise appropriately dispose of them.

27 WITHDRAWAL OF CASES

Whenever all parties, at any stage of the proceedings, lodge with the Registrar an agreement in writing that a case be withdrawn, specifying the terms relating to the payment of costs and payment to the Registrar of any fees that may be due, the Registrar shall, if the Chief Justice so directs, enter such withdrawal, whereupon the Court shall no longer be seized of the matter.

28 FORMAT OF DOCUMENTS

1. Every document that exceeds 15 pages shall, regardless of the method of duplication, contain a table of contents with correct references.
2. Every document at its close shall bear the name of the party or his or her attorney, the postal and physical address, facsimile, telephone number and an e-mail address, where available, and the original document shall be signed by the party or his or her attorney.

3. a. The Registrar shall not accept for lodging any document presented in a form not in compliance with these rules, but shall return it to the defaulting party indicating respects in which there has been a failure to comply: Provided that if new and proper copies of any such document are resubmitted within five days of receiving written notification, such lodging shall not be deemed late.

   b. If the Court finds that the provisions of these rules have not been complied with, it may impose, in its discretion, appropriate sanctions.

29 Application of Certain Rules of the Uniform Rules

The following rules of the Uniform Rules shall, with such modifications as may be necessary, apply to the proceedings in the Court:

6 (7) to 6 (15)	Joinder of parties on application and related matters
28	Amendments to pleadings and documents
35 (13)	Discovery, inspection and production of documents
38 (3) to 38 (8)	Procuring evidence for trial
42	Variation and rescission of orders
59	Sworn translators
61	Interpretation of evidence
62	Filing, preparation and inspection of documents
63	Authentication of documents executed outside the Republic for use within the Republic
64	Destruction of documents
65	Commissioners of the Court

30 Application of Certain Sections of the Supreme Court Act, 1959 (Act 59 of 1959)

The following sections of the Supreme Court Act, 1959 (Act 59 of 1959), shall apply, with such modifications as may be necessary, to proceedings of and before the Court as if they were rules of their court.

19bis	Reference of particular matters for investigation by referee
22	Powers of court on hearing of appeals
32	Examinations by interrogatories of persons whose evidence is required in civil cases
33	Manner of dealing with commissions rogatoire, letters of request and documents for service originating from foreign countries: Provided that this provision shall apply subject to the replacement of English or Afrikaans with the phrase 'any official language'.

31 Documents Lodged to Canvass Factual Material

1. Any party to any proceedings before the Court and an amicus curiae properly admitted by the Court in any proceedings shall be entitled, in documents lodged with the Registrar in terms of these rules, to canvass factual material that is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and that does not specifically appear on the record: Provided that such facts—
   a. are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible; or
   b. are of an official, scientific, technical or statistical nature capable of easy verification.
2. All other parties shall be entitled, within the time allowed by these rules for responding to such document, to admit, deny, controvert or elaborate upon such facts to the extent necessary and appropriate for a proper decision by the Court.

32 Non-compliance with the Rules

The Court or the Chief Justice may—
1. of their own accord or on application and on sufficient cause shown, extend or reduce any time period prescribed in these rules and may condone non-compliance with these rules; and
2. give such directions in matters of practice, procedure and the disposal of any appeal, application or other matter as the Court or Chief Justice may consider just and expedient.

33 Execution: Section 3 of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act, 1995 (Act 13 of 1995)

Costs orders of the Court shall be executed in the magistrate's court as follows:
1. The costs order shall have the effect of a civil judgment of the magistrate's court and the party in whose favour a costs order was made shall be deemed the judgment creditor and the party against whom such order was made shall be deemed the judgment debtor.
2. The party in whose favour a costs order was made shall, where a costs order has not been complied with, fiile with the Registrar an affidavit setting out the details of the costs order and stating that the costs order has not been complied with or has not been complied with in full, as the case may be, and the amount outstanding, and shall request the Registrar to furnish him or her with a certified copy of such costs order.
3. The Registrar shall, after having inspected the court file concerned to verify the contents of the affidavit, furnish the party referred to in subrule (2) with a certified copy of the costs order concerned and shall record such furnishing on the Court file.
4. The party referred to in subrule (2) shall file the said copy with the clerk of the civil court of the district in which he or she resides, carries on business or is employed.

5. Such order shall be executed in accordance with the provisions of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1944 (Act 32 of 1944), and the Magistrates' Courts Rules published under Government Notice R1108 of 21 June 1968, as amended, regarding warrants of execution against movable and immovable property and the issuing of emolument attachment orders and garnishee orders only.

34 Transitional Provisions

When a time is prescribed for any purpose in terms of these rules, and such time would otherwise have commenced to run prior to the commencement of these rules, such time shall begin to run only on the date on which these rules come into operation.

35 Repeal of Rules

The Rules of the Constitutional Court previously published shall be repealed on the date on which these rules come into operation: Provided that any directions in writing pertaining to the procedures to be followed in the determination of a dispute or an issue in cases already instituted shall remain in force, unless repealed in writing by the Chief Justice.

36 Short Title

These rules shall be called the Constitutional Court Rules, 2003.

Schedule 1 — Forms

Form 1: notice of motion to registrar
Form 2: notice of motion to registrar and respondent

Schedule 2 — Fees

	R
Lodging of any application (other than the first document)	10,00
Lodging of an answering affidavit (each)	10,00
Lodging of a notice of appeal or cross-appeal	15,00
Order of the court granting leave to appeal	15,00
For the Registrar's certificate on certified copies of documents (each)	1,00
Taxing fee in any matter	25,00

6 Costs*

Michael Bishop

6.1 Introduction 6–1
6.2 Basic Principles 6–1
(a) Traditional approach. 6–1
(b) General Approach: The Biowatch Framework 6–3
(i) Disputes between a private party and the state . . 6–4
(ii) Disputes where the state plays a regulatory role . 6–5
(iii) True private disputes 6–6
(iv) Inter-governmental disputes 6–9
(v) Criminal litigation 6–9
(vi) Conclusion 6–12
6.3 Factors Justifying a Departure from the Default Approach . . 6–12
(a) The reason for litigation. 6–12
(i) Bothma v Biowatch 6–13
(ii) Motivation in practice 6–15
(b) Partial success 6–16
(c) Conduct of the litigation 6–17
(i) Frivolous constitutional claims 6–18
(ii) Vexatious litigation 6–18
(iii) General inappropriate conduct 6–18
(iv) State's duty to the Court 6–22
(d) Miscellaneous 6–23
(i) Role of attorney. 6–23
(ii) Who funds the litigation 6–24
6.3 Specific Cases 6–24
(a) Interlocutory applications 6–24
(b) Matters disposed of on the papers 6–25
(c) Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (1980) 6–26
(d) Costs in applications in terms of FC s 80. 6–26
(e) Counsel appearing at the request of the Court. 6–28
6.4 Using Costs to Prevent Litigation: Settlement and Security . . 6–28
(a) Settlement offers. 6–28

* The original version of this chapter was authored by Adrian Friedman. I am grateful that he has allowed me to draw liberally from his work in preparing this updated version. However, the views expressed in this chapter reflect my opinion alone.

(b) Security for costs 6–29
6.5 Costs Orders of Lower Courts 6–30
(a) Cost orders of lower courts 6–31
(b) Appeals against costs orders 6–33
6.6 Punitive Costs Awards 6–34
(a) Costs on an attorney and client scale 6–34
(b) Costs de bonis propriis 6–38
6.6 Taxation of Costs 6–41
6.7 Clarifying the Meaning of Costs Awards 6–44

6.1 Introduction

Costs orders do not, generally, excite the passions of constitutional academics — although they most certainly interest litigants and litigators! As the Constitutional Court has noted, costs awards 'come at the tail-end of judgments as appendages to decisions on the merits.'[1] However, as the same Court has been at pains to explain, the way in which courts distribute the burden of costs in constitutional litigation is vital to the health of a constitutional democracy. If potential litigants are deterred from bringing cases by the cost of litigation, then constitutional violations will go unremedied and fewer constitutional disputes will be settled by the courts. An errant approach to costs in constitutional matters could leave important questions about the content of our basic law undecided. That is a real problem: In a constitution expressly committed to the rule of law, the absence of clearly articulated constitutional norms could put the rule of law itself in jeopardy. A constitutional democracy such as that contemplated by our Constitution only works when all actors know, in advance, what the law expects of them.

This chapter focuses primarily, though not exclusively, on the costs jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court in constitutional matters. It begins by laying out the basic principles that guide courts in awarding costs in constitutional cases. The next section considers the factors that might persuade a court to depart from the default rules. Thereafter, the third section considers a number of specific situations that might warrant a somewhat different approach to costs. Section Four considers two situations where costs can legitimately be used to limit access to courts. The fifth section looks at the relationship between higher and lower courts on the issue of costs: when can an appeal court interfere with a lower court's award? When can a litigant appeal solely on the issue of costs? The penultimate section considers the nitty-gritty of taxing costs, while the final section discussess the clarification of costs orders.

6.2 Basic principles

(a) Traditional approach

South African courts have historically treated costs as a matter of largely unfettered discretion.[2] Notwithstanding this 'free hand', a coherent set of principles on cost orders has emerged from the case law.

In civil litigation, the ordinary approach is that costs orders should indemnify a party against expenses that were incurred as a result of litigation that she should not have been required to initiate or to defend.[3] The rationale behind the rule in civil litigation is that if a private person is brought to court to defend a claim with insufficient merit, then it could hardly be fair to expect her to pay legal costs to defend an action that, objectively, ought not to have been brought in the first place.

[1] Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources and Others 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 ('Biowatch') at para 1.

[2] See A Cilliers The Law of Costs (2006) at § 14.04, citing Neugebauer & Co Ltd v Hermann 1923 AD 564, 575; Penny v Walker 1936 AD 241, 260; Protea Assurance Co Ltd v Matinise 1978 (1) SA 963, 976 (A); Kilian v Geregsbode, Uitenhage 1980 (1) SA 808, 815-816 (A).

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Gauteng Lions Rugby Union & Another 2002 (2) SA 64 (CC), 2002 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2001] ZACC 5 at para 15.

Although the Constitutional Court has departed significantly from this principle, it still remains the foundation of all costs awards. The different rules for costs in constitutional cases do not exist because the 'loser pays' principle doesn't apply. The Constitutional Court has departed from this basic principle in constitutional matters because the 'loser pays' principle is often outweighed by other, competing rationales.

The existence of competing rationales for departure from the civil law norm was recognised early on in the Constitutional Court's existence. Ackermann J, in Ferreira v Levin NO (2), highlighted the two principles established by the superior courts to deal with costs orders.[1] First, the award of costs is, unless otherwise enacted, within the discretion of the judicial officer. Second, a successful litigant should ordinarily receive his costs.[2] Ackermann J was of the view that these principles were sufficiently flexible to apply to constitutional litigation and, to the extent required, adaptation could occur on a case-by-case basis.[3] Ackermann J then pointed out that (a) the second principle yields to the first principle and (b) this lexical ordering will be subject to various exceptions.[4] While not wishing to provide a comprehensive list of the exceptions that might apply, Ackermann J identified the following factors that would have a bearing on whether a successful litigant would be entitled to costs in constitutional matters: (a) the conduct of the parties; (b) the conduct of the legal representatives; (c) whether a party has had only a technical success; (d) the nature of the litigants; and (e) the nature of the proceedings.[5]

These principles, Justice Ackermann held, > are by their nature sufficiently flexible and adaptable to meet new needs which may arise in regard to constitutional litigation. They offer a useful point of departure. [However] if the need arises the rules may have to be substantially adapted… . . [T]his should however be done on a case by case basis. It is unnecessary, if not impossible, at this stage to attempt to formulate comprehensive rules regarding costs in constitutional litigation.[6]

For 12 years, that is how matters proceeded: the Constitutional Court applied the above-mentioned factors to various situations as they arose. Eventually, the case-by-case application crystallised into a relatively clear, if not comprehensive, set of principles for different types of cases. Those principles were finally expressly set out in a fairly full and comprehensive manner by the Court in Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others.[7]

---

[1] 1996 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 441 (CC), [1996] ZACC 27 ('Ferreira (2)') at para 3.

[2] Ibid at para 3.

[3] Ibid. See also Rudolph & Another v Commissioner for Inland Revenue & Others 1996 (4) SA 552 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 889 (CC) at para 21.

[4] Ferreira (2) (supra) at para 3.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

[7] 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 ('Biowatch'). For commentary on Biowatch, see T Humber 'The Biowatch Case: Major Advance in South African Law of Costs and Access to Environmental Justice' (2010) 22 Journal of Environmental Law 125, 132 ('In the Biowatch decision, the Constitutional Court has made a remarkable effort to establish clarity on the question of costs in constitutional litigation.')

(b) General Approach: The Biowatch Framework

Biowatch not only provides the clearest and most recent statement on costs in constitutional matters, it also provides the appropriate framework through which to analyse the rest of the Court's jurisprudence on costs. Biowatch concerned an access to information dispute between an environmental NGO — Biowatch — and the Registrar for Genetic Resources. Biowatch had requested a range of information relating to Genetically Modified Organisms ('GMO'). The Registrar refused to provide the information, forcing Biowatch to sue. Monsanto (Pty) Ltd — a company involved in GMO production — intervened in the litigation in an attempt to prevent the disclosure of confidential information held by the Registrar. Biowatch was largely successful in its information request. It won access to eight of eleven categories of information that it had sought.[1] However, the High Court held that Biowatch's request had been framed vaguely and ineptly and therefore refused to grant a costs order against the Registrar. Instead it required each party to pay its own costs. Moreover, it ordered Biowatch to pay Monsanto's costs because the ostensibly poor quality of Biowatch's request had forced Monsanto to intervene to protect its interests. The decision on costs was confirmed by a unanimous full bench of the High Court.[2] Biowatch appealed to the Constitutional Court.

The High Court's decision sent a 'shockwave' that 'swept through the public interest law community'.[3] NGOs conducting public interest litigation — many of which relied entirely on donor funding — worried that adverse costs orders would render them unable to bring future constitutional challenges. Lawyers for Human Rights, the Centre for Child Law and the Centre for Applied Legal Studies all joined the matter as amici curiae in the Constitutional Court to seek a reversal of the High Court's decision.

In a unanimous judgment penned by Justice Sachs, the Court clearly set out its approach to costs in all constitutional matters. These principles convinced the Court to reverse the High Court's costs orders. It ordered the Registrar to pay Biowatch's costs and Monsanto to bear its own costs. These principles were, generally, not new; they had been developed and applied in countless cases over the previous 12 years. The value of Biowatch is that it brought the principles that had been developed — and the rationales supporting those principles — in the Court's existing jurisprudence together into a (largely) coherent statement on the law of costs in constitutional cases. The Court divided constitutional cases into three categories, with different rules for costs in each case. As we shall see, there are two further categories that the Biowatch Court did not explicitly address, but that fit neatly into the principles that the Biowatch Court adopted.

[1] Trustees for the timebeing of the Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others [2005] ZAGPHC 135.

[2] Trustees for the time being of The Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others [2007] ZAGPHC 270

[3] Biowatch (supra) at para 5.

(i) Disputes between a private party and the state

The first category is direct litigation between the state and private parties. Summarising its earlier jurisprudence, the Biowatch Court stated the principle in these cases as follows: 'ordinarily, if the government loses, it should pay the costs of the other side, and if the government wins, each party should bear its own costs.'[1] Sachs J set out three reasons for this departure from the traditional principle:

> In the first place it diminishes the chilling effect that adverse costs orders would have on parties seeking to assert constitutional rights. Constitutional litigation frequently goes through many courts and the costs involved can be high. Meritorious claims might not be proceeded with because of a fear that failure could lead to financially ruinous consequences. Similarly, people might be deterred from pursuing constitutional claims because of a concern that even if they succeed they will be deprived of their costs because of some inadvertent procedural or technical lapse. Secondly, constitutional litigation, whatever the outcome, might ordinarily bear not only on the interests of the particular litigants involved, but on the rights of all those in similar situations. Indeed, each constitutional case that is heard enriches the general body of constitutional jurisprudence and adds texture to what it means to be living in a constitutional democracy. Thirdly, it is the state that bears primary responsibility for ensuring that both the law and state conduct are consistent with the Constitution. If there should be a genuine, non-frivolous challenge to the constitutionality of a law or of state conduct, it is appropriate that the state should bear the costs if the challenge is good, but if it is not, then the losing non-state litigant should be shielded from the costs consequences of failure. In this way responsibility for ensuring that the law and state conduct is constitutional is placed at the correct door.[2]

Although Biowatch mentions these rationales primarily in relation to the first category, they appear throughout its jurisprudence on costs and undergird the Court's approach to most classes of cases. The primary reason for almost all the deviations from the traditional 'loser pays' rule — whether the litigation directly involves the state or not — is the desire not to discourage litigants from raising legitimate constitutional claims.

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 22. The Court quoted the following cases in support: Affordable Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health & Another 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC), [2005] ZACC 3 ('The award of costs is a matter which is within the discretion of the court considering the issue of costs. It is a discretion that must be exercised judicially having regard to all the relevant considerations. One such consideration is the general rule in constitutional litigation that an unsuccessful litigant ought not to be ordered to pay costs. The rationale for this rule is that an award of costs might have a chilling effect on the litigants who might wish to vindicate their constitutional rights. But this is not an inflexible rule. There may be circumstances that justify departure from this rule such as where the litigation is frivolous or vexatious. There may be conduct on the part of the litigant that deserves censure by the court which may influence the court to order an unsuccessful litigant to pay costs. The ultimate goal is to do that which is just having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case'); Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC), [2005] ZACC 9 at para 55 ('Although the respondent had asked for a costs order, the applicant has brought an important issue to this Court regarding the application and interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Act. I therefore make no order as to costs'); Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2004 (6) SA 288 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC), [2005] ZACC 2; Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Ltd (Minister of Labour intervening) 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC), [1998] ZACC 18; and Steenkamp NO v The Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC), [2006] ZACC 16.

[2] 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 at para 23.

The application of the principle is not unqualified. An application that is 'frivolous or vexatious, or in any other way manifestly inappropriate' will be treated as an ordinary civil case.[1] Moreover, '[m]erely labeling the litigation as constitutional and dragging in specious references to sections of the Constitution would, of course, not be enough in itself to invoke' the special costs rule.[2] I discuss these factors in more detail below.[3]

(ii) Disputes where the state plays a regulatory role

The Court defined the second category of cases as 'constitutional litigation where the state is sued for a failure to fulfil its responsibilities for regulating competing claims between private parties'.[4] As Sachs J explained:

> Usually, there will be statutes or regulations which delineate the manner in which the governmental agencies involved must fulfil their responsibilities. In matters such as these a number of private parties might have opposite interests in the outcome of a dispute where a private party challenges the constitutionality of government action. The fact that more than one private party is involved in the proceedings does not mean, however, that the litigation should be characterised as being between the private parties. In essence the dispute turns on whether the governmental agencies have failed adequately to fulfil their constitutional and statutory responsibilities. Essentially, therefore, these matters involve litigation between a private party and the state, with radiating impact on other private parties.[5]

The dispute between Monsanto and Biowatch fits this description. Monsanto had been pulled into the litigation because of the Registrar's failure to fulfil its constitutional and statutory duty to provide the information to Biowatch. As the Court put it:

> [T]his case did not truly involve litigation between private parties. It was litigation in which private parties with competing interests were involved, not to settle a legal dispute between themselves, but in relation to determining whether the state had appropriately shouldered its constitutional and statutory responsibilities.[6]

Other examples that come readily to mind are applications for licenses and tenders.[7]

The rule in this category of cases is: 'the state should bear the costs of litigants who have been successful against it, and ordinarily there should be no costs orders

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 24.
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] See § 6.3 below.
[4] Biowatch (supra) at para 26.
[5] Ibid at para 28.
[6] Ibid at para 54.
[7] The Court used two earlier cases as examples: Fuel Retailers Association of South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Director General, Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment, Mpumalanga Province & Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 at para 107 (A dispute about whether environmental approval to permit a fuel station had been properly granted. The proprietors of the station argued that it had, an association of fuel retailers contended that it had not.); Walele v City of Cape Town & Others 2008 (6) SA 129 (CC), 2008 (11) BCLR 1067 (CC), [2008] ZACC 11 (Dispute between private parties over a municipality's decision to grant approval for building.) See also, for example, Department of Land Affairs & Others v Goedgelegen Tropical Fruits (Pty) Ltd 2007 (6) SA 199 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1027 (CC), [2007] ZACC 12 at para 89 (In a land against any private litigants who have become involved.'[1] In Biowatch, the rule resulted in a finding that while the state must pay Biowatch's costs, Monsanto must bear its own costs.[2]

Biowatch does not tell us what the appropriate principle is when the challenge is unsuccessful. In Omar v Government, RSA & Others, the Constitutional Court found that although the applicant's challenge to the Domestic Violence Act[3] was 'to a considerable extent ill-conceived', no costs order should be made in favour of the governmental entities defending the Act.[4] At the same time, however, the Court ordered the applicant to pay the costs of the third respondent.[5] The third respondent, the applicant's ex-wife under Islamic law, had been obliged to acquire various protection orders against the applicant in terms of the Domestic Violence Act. The Omar Court viewed that matter as one in which the state regulated a private dispute between husband and wife. Stated as a general principle: unsuccessful private parties will not pay the costs of the state, but will pay the costs of other private parties. Fair enough. Moreover, it squares with the rationales articulated in Biowatch. As a matter of practice, however, the actual outcome is likely to depend on the nature of the issue, the parties involved and how compelling a constitutional point was raised.

(iii) True private disputes

The third class of cases is true private disputes. Contractual disputes, arguments over intellectual property, private delictual disputes and defamation claims readily fall into this category. Here, the Biowatch Court failed to provide clear guidance. It began by endorsing the earlier decision in Barkhuizen v Napier,[6] a case in which the applicant had unsuccessfully raised a constitutional challenge to a contractual provision. The Barkhuizen Court had made no order as to costs on the grounds that the determination of these contractual 'issues is beneficial not only to the parties in this case but to all those who are involved in contractual relationships.'[7] The general principle in Barkhuizen — that Sachs J in Biowatch appeared to ten-restitution dispute, the Court held that the dispute was really between the claimants and the state and that, although the current landowner had resisted the claim, it should only pay its own costs); MEC for Education: Kwazulu-Natal & Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC), [2007] ZACC 21 at para 118 (Court upheld a challenge by a pupil to a decision of her school not to permit her to wear a nose stud. In dealing with costs, Langa CJ, held that the pupil should receive her costs and that the School should not have to pay costs as it had found itself 'at the centre of a difficult constitutional issue' and had 'played an important role in ventilating' that dispute. The provincial Department of Education therefore paid all the pupil's costs.)

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 56.

[2] Ibid at paras 58-59.

[3] Act 116 of 1998.

[4] 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC), [2005] ZACC 17 ('Omar').

[5] Ibid at para 64.

[6] Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC), [2007] ZACC 5.

[7] Ibid at para 90 quoted in Biowatch (supra) at para 26. The Court followed a similar approach in Campus Law Clinic (University of KwaZulu-Natal Durban) v Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd & Another 2006 (6) SA 103 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 669 (CC), [2006] ZACC 5 at para 28 (although dismissing leave to appeal, the Court held that the applicant had 'sought to raise important constitutional issues in this Court' and therefore made no order as to costs.)

tatively endorse — seems to be that private parties engaged in a bona fide private constitutional dispute should bear their own costs.

However, the Biowatch Court noted (in a footnote) that there were several similar cases where the Court had ordered costs against the unsuccessful private party. In Laugh it Off,[1] Khumalo[2] and NM[3] — all cases involving clashes between freedom of expression and other constitutional rights — the Court ordered costs to follow the result. Thus, the Biowatch Court was confronted with two lines of cases and two different principles: one line of cases awarded costs to successful private litigants; the other line of cases required each party to bear its own costs.

The Court avoided dealing with this inconsistency. It wrote: 'The present matter does not ... require us to consider whether the award of costs in those matters is consistent with the decision in Barkhuizen or with the general principles outlined in this judgment.'[4] The Biowatch Court declined to decide whether different rules obtain for different private disputes or different kinds of claims, or if its earlier decisions were wrong.

Fortunately, the Court provided some clarity — at the expense of backtracking on the principles announced in Biowatch — in Bothma v Els.[5] The Bothma Court concluded: 'The general principle as far as private litigation is concerned is that costs will ordinarily follow the result' however, there would be 'exceptional cases' which would justify a departure from this rule.[6] The primary factor 'justifying this departure from the general rule has been the extent to which the pursuit of public interest litigation could be unduly chilled by an adverse costs order.'[7]

Bothma provides a clear statement of principle and (more-or-less) reconciles the two lines of cases. Private litigants that raise constitutional claims solely to achieve commercial or private ends should be treated like litigants in ordinary, non-constitutional disputes.[8] However, private litigants that raise constitutional claims for non-commercial reasons — those who litigate in the 'public interest',

[1] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International and Another 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC), [2005] ZACC 7.

[2] Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2002] ZACC 12.

[3] NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC), [2007] ZACC 6.

[4] Biowatch (supra) at fn 31.

[5] Bothma v Els & Others 2010 (2) SA 622 (CC), 2010 (1) SACR 184 (CC), 2010 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2009] ZACC 27 ('Bothma').

[6] Ibid at paras 91-93.

[7] Ibid at para 93.

[8] See, for example, Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1998] ZACC 17 ('Fedsure') at para 116 (Although the Court did not, in Fedsure, explain the basis for awarding costs against the appellants, it has subsequently explained that an unsuccessful applicant will be required to pay costs when pursuing a private commercial interest); South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union and Others v Irvin & Johnson Limited Seafoods Division Fish Processing 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC), [2000] ZACC 10 at para 52 ('In this Court, the general principle has been established that parties should not be discouraged from asserting and vindicating their fundamental constitutional rights and freedoms as against the state. This principle does not apply to all private litigants unsuccessfully asserting constitutional claims against the state. This Court has for instance ordered such litigants to pay costs in the absence of good faith, or where the litigant mulcted in costs was apparently pursuing private commercial interests.' (footnotes omitted)).

as the Bothma Court puts it — should not be mulcted in costs for raising constitutional claims.

I discuss the reliance on a litigant's motive — which I believe is mistaken — in more detail below.[1] Suffice it to say that I believe the basic Bothma position to be undesirable (even as it tidies up the obvious incongruity in the law.) The Court had it right in Barkhuizen and Biowatch. As Bothma itself notes,[2] two of the three Biowatch rationales that justify a departure from the traditional approach to costs in litigation between citizens and the state apply to constitutional litigation between private parties: (a) the high costs of constitutional litigation will deter private parties from raising constitutional claims; and (b) constitutional decisions — even in private litigation — redound to the benefit of other members of the commonweal. In my view, the third Biowatch rationale — that it is the state that is ultimately responsible for unconstitutional laws — will usually apply to litigation between private parties. Most private constitutional litigation involves a claim that the existing law should be developed (in the case of the common law), or interpreted (in the case of legislation) to bring it in line with the Constitution. It is ultimately the state that is responsible for allowing those unconstitutional laws to remain in effect.[3] If all three rationales apply equally, then it makes little sense to apply a different default rule. It may be that departures from the rule will more often be justified in pure private disputes. But that fact is not reason enough to change the default position.

Applying the Bothma rule will not only contradict the Biowatch rationales, it will also, in some cases, be unfair on a more basic level. Bothma seems to assume that parties rely on the Constitution in private disputes either for narrow, selfish personal gain, or in the public interest. That is false. Litigants can also rely on constitutional rights simply because they want their rights protected. They can do this without expecting any additional, commercial gain and without consciously doing so in the public interest. They should not be penalised for doing so.

Bothma is a perfect example of this type of motivation and of the unfairness of the rule. Bothma, who alleged that Els had repeatedly raped her thirty-nine years earlier, instituted a private prosecution against him. Els went to the High Court to seek a permanent stay of that prosecution. He argued that his right to a fair trial would be impaired by a trial so long after the alleged crime. The High Court granted the stay. The Constitutional Court reversed and allowed the private prosecution to proceed. However, it acknowledged that Els's reliance on the right to a fair trial was genuine, not frivolous. However, in deciding to order Els to pay Bothma's costs, Sachs J wrote: 'The proceedings in effect sought to deny Mrs Bothma the opportunity to establish at the trial a factual explanation for her long delay in laying a complaint.'[4] The Court characterized Els' opposition as mere obstructionism. But Els' concerns about the fairness of his trial raised legitimate constitutional issues: if

[1] See § 6.3*(a)* below.

[2] Bothma (supra) at para 95.

[3] On this view, the line between the second and third category largely evaporates. The difference is not in the nature of the state's involvement, but the more practical difference that the state is not a party to the case. If the state were a party in Laugh it Off, Khumalo, NM or Bothma, then I have little doubt the Court would have found a way to make them bear a large portion of the costs.

[4] Bothma (supra) at para 98.

having a trial after such a long delay would render the trial unfair, then a permanent stay of prosecution might be warranted. It seems harsh in the extreme to require Els to pay Bothma's costs for trying to enforce his right to a fair trial without knowing (which the Court did not) whether Bothma's allegations are true or not.[1]

(iv) Inter-governmental disputes

Biowatch only addresses the three aforementioned categories. A fourth category of cases exists: inter-governmental disputes. Although the Constitution — and the Inter-governmental Relations Framework Act[2] — asks that government entities exhaust all possible avenues of non-judicial dispute resolution,[3] inter-governmental litigation does occur. The Court has not been explicit on this issue, but it seems that the general principle is that each government entity should bear its own costs. In City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Gauteng Development Tribunal & Others — a dispute between local and provincial governments — Jafta J wrote of the question of costs:

> Wisely so, none of the parties have asked for costs. Excluding the amici curiae, all parties that took part in the hearing of this matter are organs of state. In addition the matter raises constitutional issues of some considerable importance. Therefore, there should be no order as to costs.[4]

While Jafta J articulates the preferred approach, it should not — as is the case with all costs orders — be a hard and fast rule. The conduct of the parties, or the nature of the issue involved, may require a different result. The role of the parties in failing to find a non-judicial solution to the dispute will, quite likely, be particularly relevant. For example, should costs be equally born when one party attempted to find a non-litigious solution, while the other ignored all efforts to arrive at a mutually agreeable outcome? (Of course, one must ask 'who pays' — inevitably, the taxpayer — and how uncooperative state parties can be made held to account for their lack of institutional comity. The latter question is not easily answered.)

(v) Criminal litigation

Criminal cases constitute the fifth and final category. At common law, costs orders are generally not made in criminal cases. As the Court held in Sanderson, in 'criminal

[1] The Court was perhaps influenced by the unusual character of the dispute — an application to prevent a private prosecution. The award of costs in private prosecutions is specifically addressed by the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ss 14–17. But the Court does not refer to these sections and explicitly treats the case as a pure private dispute — despite the inevitable impact of the state's decision not to prosecute. Despite its mixed character, Bothma can properly be treated as reflecting the Court's attitude to costs in private disputes.

[2] Act 13 of 2005.

[3] See, generally, S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, July 2009) Chapter 14.

[4] [2010] ZACC 11 at para 94.

proceedings, which are instituted by the state … costs orders are not competent'.[1] This conclusion rather easily aligns with the general principle when the applicant is unsuccessful. Criminal accused should be entitled to raise all constitutional claims without fear of an adverse costs order. Of course, this rule, like all costs rules, is not inflexible. In Thint Holdings (Southern Africa) (Pty) Ltd & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions, the Court required the unsuccessful applicants to pay the state's costs.[2] The applicants had persisted in challenging the validity of a letter to Mauritian officials requesting evidence, despite the fact that it became increasingly clear during the litigation that they would be able to challenge the admissibility of the evidence at the trial.[3]

However, the rule — that there should be no costs orders in criminal cases — also seems to apply when the applicant is successful. A litigant who successfully argues that a statute that led (or may lead) to his conviction is unconstitutional, or that his trial was unfairly conducted, is not entitled to his costs, but a litigant who successfully argues that he has a right to make funny t-shirts is.[4] This principle is so deeply embedded that the Court often does not even mention the question of costs when the criminal litigant has been successful. Moreover, while it has been crystal clear about what the rule is, it has never provided a rationale for the rule.

At first, this rule may appear strange. Why should a criminal accused who successfully argues that his constitutional right to a fair trial (or some other right) was violated by the state be treated differently from a civil litigant? The facts of Weare indicate the degree of absurdity at work.[5] Weare pre-emptively challenged the constitutionality of a provincial law that prevented juristic persons from holding a bookmaker's license. He lost, but the Court did not award costs against him — despite his commercial motivation — because > the litigation is a challenge to a law which it is alleged the applicants have contravened. Any person contravening the Ordinance is guilty of an offence and subject to a fine of up to R5000 or two years' imprisonment or both. In my view, this Court should be careful not to dissuade litigants from challenging the constitutionality of laws of the state under which they face statutory penalties.[6]

That conclusion dovetails with the Court's general approach to costs. Yet, if Mr Weare had waited until he was actually accused before challenging the legislation,

[1] Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC), [1997] ZACC 18 at para 44. See also Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re: Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC), [2000] ZACC 12 ('Hyundai') at para 59; Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 478 (CC), [2000] ZACC 29 at para 30; S & Others v Van Rooyen & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC), [2002] ZACC 8 at para 270; S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 620 (CC), [2004] ZACC 13 at para 78.

[2] 2009 (1) SA 141 (CC), 2008 (2) SACR 557 (CC), 2009 (3) BCLR 309 (CC), [2008] ZACC 14.

[3] Ibid at para 68.

[4] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International & Another 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC), [2005] ZACC 7.

[5] Weare & Another v Ndebele NO & Others 2009 (1) SA 600 (CC), 2009 (4) BCLR 370 (CC), [2008] ZACC 20.

[6] Ibid at para 79.

he would not have been entitled to his costs because it would be a criminal case. Can this distinction be justified?

On reflection, there are three plausible (but ultimately unconvincing) reasons for this approach. First, we would not want to discourage the state from bringing bona fide prosecutions because of the fear of costs. There is always some unpredictability in prosecuting a case: a prosecutor never knows how witnesses will perform on the stand, what evidence the judge will admit and so forth. If the state risked an adverse costs order every time it lost, then it might be inclined to prosecute fewer cases. This rationale is also supported by various sections of the Criminal Procedure Act[1] that temper the general rule by permitting courts to make awards of costs where, for example, the state unsuccessfully appeals against a High Court order.[2] In addition, accused who believe their prosecution was mala fide can sue for malicious prosecution. These provisions indicate that, as long as the state acts in good faith, it should not pay defendants' costs.

While a powerful rationale in ordinary criminal cases, I am not convinced that it ought to apply to allegations of rights violations. In such cases the state has manifestly not acted properly because it has either given the specific accused an unfair trial, or has allowed a law that violates the accused person's rights to remain on the books. The state can legitimately be mulcted in costs because it has failed to fulfil its constitutional duty to provide fair trials, and not violate other rights. The Court has not hesitated to apply different rules to constitutional civil matters than are applied in ordinary civil matters. No compelling reason exists to fail to make such a distinction in criminal cases.

The second rationale is that the vast majority of criminal defendants do not in fact pay for their defence team. They are either represented by the Legal Aid Board or some other form of pro bono representation. In those cases it makes no sense to shift funds between the NPA and the Legal Aid Board. Although that may be a powerful rationale in the majority of cases, it does not provide a sufficient explanation in cases where the accused does indeed pay for her own defence.

Third, it could be argued that the primary rationale for a different attitude to costs in constitutional cases — that costs would chill constitutional litigation — does not apply to criminal cases. Those persons charged with crimes are likely to raise whatever issues they can to avoid conviction — including constitutional claims. The threat of punishment renders the issue of costs a less important factor because issues of cost are unlikely to deter the accused from raising constitutional issues that may lead to their acquittal. However, the rule does not fit with the other

[1] Act 51 of 1977 ('CPA').

[2] See CPA s 65A(2)(c)(If the state unsuccessfully appeals against the granting of bail, then the court may order the state to pay the accused's costs); CPA s 306(3)(If the accused takes a Magistrates' Court decision on review, then the state cannot be ordered to pay costs, whatever the outcome); CPA s 310A(6)(If the state appeals against the sentence of lower court, the appeal court may order the state to pay the accused's costs); CPA s 311(2)(If the state appeals against a High Court conviction to the Supreme Court of Appeal and the appeal is dismissed, then the appeal court may order costs against the state); CPA s 316B(3)(If the state appeals to the Supreme Court of Appeal against the sentence of a High Court, then the appeal court may order the state to pay the accused's costs); CPA s 342A(3)(e)(If proceedings are being delayed unreasonably, then each party must pay the cost it caused).

two Biowatch rationales. Constitutional claims in criminal cases redound to the benefit of the greater society just as much as civil constitutional complaints. They ensure that 'everyone' receives fair trials and, in some cases, that the state strikes unconstitutional laws from the books. In addition, the state, in criminal matters, will always be responsible either for the unconstitutional law on the books, or the unconstitutional conduct.

I can discern no compelling rationale for the unique treatment of costs in constitutional criminal cases. The Court has squarely confronted the issue of costs in civil cases. It should apply its mind with equal force to the underlying principles of costs in criminal cases.

It is possible that a more basic, unmentionable explanation exists: Criminals — and even innocent persons charged with a crime — are viewed as dangers to the realm and treated as outcasts. So while fellow citizens pressing constitutional civil claims enjoy our sympathy to some degree, alleged criminals do not. 'They' are the problem. 'They' are what ills the land. Surely these lepers amongst us ought not to enjoy the benefits of cost orders even when they ensure that the law on the books is 'fair' and 'just' for anyone charged in a criminal matter. The Constitutional Court has never endorsed this reasoning, and it does not square with its jurisprudence on the rights of criminals. Nonetheless, until the Court explains its position, there will be a suspicion that this rather natural bias tacitly informs their decisions.

(vi) Conclusion

To recap, the following general principles apply in the five categories:

(a) Litigation between private party and the state — if private party wins, then the state pays costs; if the state wins, then each party pays their own costs;
(b) Litigation between private parties as a result of state failure — state should pay the successful party's costs; no costs against any additional private parties involved in litigation; unsuccessful private party pays other private parties' costs;
(c) Litigation between private parties — the successful party gets its costs, unless there are exceptional circumstances, which most often concern whether the litigation is in the public interest;
(d) Inter-governmental litigation — each party bears its own costs;
(e) Criminal proceedings — no costs order.

While these principles provide clear starting points for each class of cases, reasons will often exist to deviate from them. In the next section I discuss those reasons that might justify departing from the default position.

6.3 Factors Justifying a Departure from the Default Approach

Various factors, particularly the conduct of litigants, are likely to have a bearing on the award of costs. However there is no closed list; a court will consider virtually any feature of a case that may be germane to a cost order. That said, the most commonly considered factors are: (a) the motivation for the litigation; (b) the conduct of the parties; and (c) whether the parties achieved full or partial success.

(a) The reason for litigation

The reason a party chooses to litigate is, on the Court's current approach, a relevant factor in deciding on a costs award. However, this rationale requires more reflection than might be commonly expected. For while the Biowatch Court unambiguously held that motivation was not relevant to a costs order, only four months later the Bothma Court later re-entrenched the relevance of purpose. How should one treat this disjunction? I break the discussion down into three parts. First, I consider, again, the tension between Biowatch and Bothma. Second, I attempt to reconcile these two apparently opposing positions. Third, I contend that motivation should not be relevant to determining costs.

Before going further, I should note that purpose is primarily relevant in true private disputes. It is unlikely that the purpose of litigation alone will be sufficient to convince a court to depart from the default position in other disputes.

(i) Bothma v Biowatch

The reason for the litigation is, on the authority of Bothma v Els, a relevant consideration. Those who litigate for commercial gain are more likely to pay the other side's costs if they are unsuccessful and less likely to receive their costs if they are successful, than litigants who go to court for the public good. As the Bothma Court puts it, '[a] factor that has loomed large in justifying this departure from the general rule [that the successful party should receive its costs] has been the extent to which the pursuit of public interest litigation could be unduly chilled by an adverse costs order.'[1] Although the Bothma Court does not define 'public interest litigation', it clearly does not embrace litigation motivated by pure economic interest. This principle has guided the Court in earlier cases as well. The Court has even held that 'when the litigation is pursued for private commercial gain' an unsuccessful litigant should pay the costs of the other party — even when the other party is the state.[2]

At first glance, this conclusion seems quite reasonable. Unfortunately, it runs counter to a powerful argument made by the same court in Biowatch.[3] One of the [1] Bothma v Els & Others 2010 (2) SA 622 (CC), 2010 (1) SACR 184 (CC), 2010 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2009] ZACC 27 ('Bothma') at para 93 (my emphasis).

[2] Weare & Another v Ndebele NO & Others 2009 (1) SA 600 (CC), 2009 (4) BCLR 370 (CC), [2008] ZACC 20 at para 78 citing South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union (SACCAWU) & Others v Irvin & Johnson Ltd (Seafoods Division Fish Processing) 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC), [2000] ZACC 10 at para 51, with reference to Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1998] ZACC 17 at para 116.

[3] See T Humber 'The Biowatch Case: Major Advance in South African Law of Costs and Access to Environmental Justice' (2010) 22 Journal of Environmental Law 125, 133 ('At first blush, the Court's rejection of an approach that would take the nature of the parties or the causes they advance into account is a point of criticism: By failing to acknowledge that parties do not come to court with an equality of arms — especially in the environmental sphere — the Court in fact perpetuates the systemic unfairness that bedevils access to justice in South Africa. But this avoidance is in fact a carefully considered and brilliant move because it effectively circumvents difficult questions as to which parties are acting 'in the public interest' and which are not, or what the threshold might be if the capacity of the 'war chest' with which litigants come to court should be taken into account. Unlike the test formulated with regard to protective costs orders in the UK, or attempts to formulate a special approach to costs in public interest litigation in other jurisdictions, arguments advanced by the NGO amici was that courts should promote public-interest litigation by being slow to make costs orders against entities litigating in the public interest. The Constitutional Court strongly rejected this argument. While Sachs J acknowledged the important role that public interest litigators play in maintaining the vitality of a constitutional democracy, he held that the focus when determining an appropriate costs order should not be on the characterisation of the parties, but on the issues. It should not matter whether the litigant in respect of whom a costs order may be made is acting in its own name or in the public interest, is possessed of funds, is indigent or is reliant on external funding. 'The primary consideration in constitutional litigation', the Biowatch Court found, 'must be the way in which a costs order would hinder or promote the advancement of constitutional justice.'[1] The Court held, further, that the principle of equal protection before the law envisaged in s 9(1) of the Constitution required courts to focus on whether litigants sought to assert rights protected by the Constitution and not on whether a litigant was rich and litigating for commercial gain or was externally funded and acting in the public interest:

> Courts are obligated to be impartial with regard to litigants who appear before them. Thus, litigants should not be treated disadvantageously in making costs and related awards simply because they are pursuing commercial interests and have deep pockets. Nor should they be looked upon with favour because they are fighting for the poor and lack funds themselves. What matters is whether rich or poor, advantaged or disadvantaged, they are asserting rights protected by the Constitution.[2]

It is difficult to square the statements in Biowatch with Bothma. If litigants should not 'be looked upon with favour because they are fighting for the poor', why should we consider whether they are litigating in the public interest rather than for commercial gain?

It is possible to read the cases together if we construe the finding in Biowatch very narrowly. The argument rejected in Biowatch was that the status of the litigant should be relevant — that merely because they were an NGO, they should not be mulcted in costs. That is different from the reason a litigant raises a constitutional claim. An NGO can, conceivably, litigate for its own commercial advantage, just as a large corporation could litigate for non-commercial reasons. Although some of the language in Biowatch slips between status and reason, the core of the argument is that the nature of the institution is irrelevant. The central point in Bothma turns on the motivation for litigation, not the nature of the party. This distinction does not perfectly align all of the costs orders in existing case law. Instances certainly exist in which the Court has explicitly deemed a commercial motivation relevant. But it seems the best way to uphold the forceful point made in Biowatch with the decision in Bothma and the Court's longstanding and ongoing practice of relying on motivation.

However, the Court is still wrong to consider motivation. The Constitution does not exist only to protect the poor and the vulnerable, it exists to protect all the Constitutional Court's approach in the Biowatch matter leaves very little room for a subsequent restrictive interpretation of the principles it lays forth. All that matters is whether the litigation has been undertaken to assert constitutional rights and whether there has been any impropriety in the manner in which it has been conducted.')(Footnotes omitted)

---

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 16.

[2] Ibid at para 17 (my emphasis).

members of society, including the rich and powerful. As Justice Sachs wrote in Biowatch:

> It is true that our Constitution is a transformative one based on the understanding that there is a great deal of systemic unfairness in our society. This could be an important, even decisive factor to be taken into account in determining the actual substantive merits of the litigation. It has no bearing, however, on the entitlement of all litigants to be accorded equal status when asserting their rights in a court of law.[1]

Some constitutional rights — the right to property, freedom of trade — are intended to protect commercial interests. Other rights — expression,[2] dignity[3] and equality[4] — can also be raised for commercial reasons. Assuming a constitutional point was legitimately raised, to scrutinise the motive for relying on a right creates a hierarchy of rights: those that protect the poor and vulnerable are more important than those that protect the rich and powerful. The Court has, correctly, explicitly rejected the notion of a hierarchy of rights. It should not allow that notion to creep into its jurisprudence through the backdoor of costs.

Perhaps the biggest danger is the uncertainty that still reigns in this area. While the status/motivation distinction makes sense of the Court's jurisprudence, the Court has not clearly endorsed it. The result is that private parties thinking about raising constitutional claims will be uncertain about how costs will be determined in their case. That uncertainty will chill constitutional litigation as parties are less likely to take the risk of litigating without certainty about how costs are likely to be distributed. The Court would do well to take the next opportunity to provide a clear answer to this question.

(ii) Motivation in practice

Despite the contested terrain discussed above, in numerous instances the Court has considered the commercial motivations of parties in making a costs award. Here are but a few examples.

In International Trade Administration Commission v SCAW South Africa (Pty) Ltd the applicants had challenged the anti-dumping recommendation of the International Trade Administration Commission as it related to its trade in steel wire.[5] Their application failed, and the Court found no reason why — in what was essentially a commercial matter that raised some constitutional questions — costs should not follow the result.[6]

The Court in Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd v Andrews & Another also relied on the applicant's commercial motivation.[7] The applicant argued that an arbitration it had been involved in had not been fairly conducted and had, as a

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 17.

[2] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International & Another 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC), [2005] ZACC 7.

[3] Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC), [2007] ZACC 5.

[4] Weare & Another v Ndebele NO & Others 2009 (1) SA 600 (CC), 2009 (4) BCLR 370 (CC), [2008] ZACC 20 ('Weave').

[5] 2010 (5) BCLR 457 (CC), [2010] ZACC 6.

[6] Ibid at para 113.

[7] 2009 (4) SA 529 (CC), 2009 (6) BCLR 527 (CC), [2009] ZACC 6 ('Mphaphuli').

result, violated its FC s 34 right of access to court. A slim majority of the Court found that FC s 34 does not apply directly to private arbitrations.[1] On the issue of costs, O'Regan ADCJ concluded:

> Mphaphuli has raised a constitutional issue in this Court. The respondents were brought to this Court to answer that argument. They did not rely on any constitutional right of their own but disputed the constitutional argument made by the applicant. Properly construed, therefore, this is private litigation relating to a commercial matter and the applicant has lost. In my view, it should pay the costs, including those consequent upon the employment of two counsel.[2]

However, in Weare the Court overlooked the applicant's commercial motivation because 'this Court should be careful not to dissuade litigants from challenging the constitutionality of laws of the state under which they face statutory penalties.'[3] And in Giddey, despite holding that, in commercial matters, to force a litigant to provide security for costs did not violate the right of access to courts, O'Regan J made no costs order because 'the applicant has raised a constitutional issue of some importance'.[4]

The Court does not seem to adopt a principled position here. In some cases a commercial motivation is relevant, while in others it is trumped by the importance of the constitutional issue, or the Court's analysis of the fairness of the issue. Successful litigants will always be able to raise the commercial motivations of their opponents, but there is no guarantee that they will receive their costs.

(b) Partial success

When a litigant is only partial successful — or only successful on a technical, rather than a substantive point — this outcome may affect the court's determination of costs. The Court's first substantive decision on costs — Ferreira v Levin NO (2) — recognized this tenet. In Ferreira v Levin NO (1),[5] the applicants had challenged the constitutionality of section 417 of the Companies Act.[6] Section 417 provided for enquiries to be held in respect of companies being wound up for failure to pay their debts. The gist of the applicants' complaint was that they were required, in terms of the provision, to give evidence in such an enquiry and evidence they gave could later be used against them in a criminal trial. The Court declared the section unconstitutional to the extent that the evidence could be used in a subsequent criminal trial. In Ferreira v Levin NO (2), the Court dealt with the question of costs. The applicants had been only partially successful. The order of the Constitutional Court in Ferreira (1) still permitted the enquiry to take place and only barred the use of evidence in a subsequent criminal trial. In Ferreira (2),

[1] For a discussion on the right of access to courts, although not of Mphaphuli, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[2] Mphaphuli (supra) at para 279.

[3] Weare (supra) at para 79.

[4] Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (5) SA 525 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC), [2006] ZACC 13 at para 35.

[5] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1995] ZACC 13 ('Ferreira (1)').

[6] Act 61 of 1973.

therefore, the Court held that the applicants had not been successful as against the respondents. The respondents wanted evidence from the applicants and, notwithstanding the order in Ferreira (1), were still able to secure it.[1] The applicants were, therefore, not entitled to their costs.[2] The Court has adopted a similar approach where a litigant claiming the return of foreign currency was successful with regard to some, but not all of the money,[3] in a dispute over a third party's rights to frozen assets,[4] and in a disagreement between provincial and national governments over local government legislation.[5]

The rule — or rather standard — is by no means firm. There are instances where an applicant does not achieve full success, but still receives its costs. If the claim — or the defence — is substantially (but not completely) successful, then the costs award will probably not be affected. Biowatch is perhaps the best example. Biowatch was only partially successful in the sense that it obtained only eight out of the eleven categories of information it had sought. Yet it still received its costs.[6] Similarly, in Dawood, the applicants succeeded in the substance of their appeal, but lost in their appeal against the suspension of the order of invalidity that had been granted by the High Court.[7] They still received their costs.

(c) Conduct of the litigation

One of the primary factors that will always affect a court's award of costs is the way that the litigants have conducted the litigation. If they have litigated vexatiously (including if the constitutional issue they raise has no firm basis in the Constitution) or abused the Court's process, the Court is likely to punish them by denying them costs to which they would otherwise be entitled or to order costs

[1] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek and Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 441 (CC), [1996] ZACC 27 ('Ferreira (2)') at para 5.

[2] Ferreira (2) (supra) at para 7. See also Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) In re: Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6 at para 76 (Partially successful applicants bear their own costs.)

[3] Van Der Merwe & Another v Taylor NO & Others [2007] ZACC 16, 2007 (11) BCLR 1167 (CC), 2008 (1) SA 1 (CC).

[4] Fraser v ABSA Bank Limited 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 219 (CC), [2006] ZACC 24 (The applicant's assets had been frozen, except for what he needed for legal fees. ABSA, who had obtained default judgment against the applicant, applied to prevent the applicant from spending his unfrozen assets on legal fees as that would deplete the money available to satisfy its debt. The applicant succeeded in preventing the money that would be used for his legal fees from being frozen. But ABSA succeeded in being permitted to intervene in proceedings that would determine the extent of the assets the applicant would be able to use. The Court accordingly made no costs order.)

[5] Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), [1999] ZACC 13 at para 138 (The Western Cape and KwaZulu-Natal challenged the constitutionality of the whole Local Government: Municipal Structures Act. They succeeded only with regard to some sections. One of the reasons Ngcobo J supplied for making no costs award was that the applicants had only been partially successful.)

[6] Biowatch (supra).

[7] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8.

against them when they would otherwise have escaped without paying costs. In particularly severe cases, the court can make a punitive costs award.[1]

In this section I discuss the general issue of conduct under three subheadings. One, raising frivolous constitutional claims. Two, vexatious litigation. Three, other inappropriate conduct.

(i) Frivolous Constitutional Claims

In Biowatch, the Court held that a person raising a constitutional matter vexatiously would not be entitled to his costs. Sachs J wrote:

> Merely labeling the litigation as constitutional and dragging in specious references to sections of the Constitution would, of course, not be enough in itself to invoke the general rule …. The issues must be genuine and substantive, and truly raise constitutional considerations relevant to the adjudication.[2]

It is difficult to find examples of such cases. The Constitutional Court will ordinarily dismiss frivolous constitutional claims without a judgment. If it hears the case, then there will almost always be a plausible constitutional claim. However, in the High Court, litigants should not expect that throwing in random references to the Constitution will protect them from costs orders.

(ii) Vexatious Litigation

Occasionally an unsuccessful applicant raises an important constitutional matter, but does so in the context of vexatious and unmeritorious litigation. The Constitutional Court has held that it would be unfair to expect the respondents in such matters to bear their own costs and has awarded costs to them. The classic example must be Beinash & Another v Ernst & Young & Others.[3] The respondents obtained an order against the applicants — who had instituted 45 different claims against the respondents — in terms of the Vexatious Proceedings Act.[4] They thereby prevented the applicants from instituting any litigation without the permission of the High Court. The applicants appealed to the Constitutional Court, arguing that the Act violated their right of access to court. Mokgoro J disagreed and held that 'by litigating as persistently and vexatiously as they did, the applicants placed respondents in the untenable position where they had to respond to such unmeritorious litigation, resulting in unnecessary costs. … In the circumstances, costs should follow the result.'[5]

(iii) General inappropriate conduct

There is no closed list of the type of conduct that might affect a court's decision on costs. What follows are merely some examples from the Constitutional Court's

[1] See §6.5 below.

[2] Biowatch (supra) at para 25.

[3] Beinash & Another v Ernst & Young & Others 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC), [1998] ZACC 13 ('Beinash').

[4] Act 3 of 1956.

[5] Beinash (supra) at para 30.

history of conduct that influenced the Court's decision on costs — but was not so objectionable as to justify a punitive order.

In Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue,[1] the applicant sought and was granted an order referring to the Constitutional Court questions regarding the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Income Tax Act.[2] The Constitutional Court held that the referral was not competent because not only was the constitutionality of the Act not germane with respect to the matter before the Supreme Court, but the applicant had failed to pursue potential non-constitutional remedies.[3] The Constitutional Court held that, although its general approach was not to award costs against unsuccessful applicants, this approach would not be followed to the extent that litigants would be 'induced into believing that they are free to challenge the constitutionality of statutory provisions … no matter how spurious the grounds for doing so may be or how remote the possibility that [the Constitutional Court] will grant them access.'[4] Such a state of affairs would undermine the administration of justice and be unfair to those opposing this kind of application.[5] Given that the applicant had not explained her failure to use the non-constitutional remedies available in the Act and had revealed a general lack of candour in her papers before the Constitutional Court, the Court in Motsepe concluded that her application constituted a delaying tactic that justified an award of costs against her.[6]

In Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks & Others, the Constitutional Court was contronted with a government respondent that, in the Supreme Court of Appeal, had refused to address the merits of the case.[7] The circumstances that led to this decision were as follows: Various pharmacies challenged medicine pricing regulations. They were unsuccessful in the High Court, and sought an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal. Despite the urgency of the matter, the High Court delayed for several months in handing down its judgment on leave to appeal. The pharmacies approached the Supreme Court of Appeal for leave to appeal before the High Court's judgment was handed down and the matter was set down in the Supreme Court of Appeal with the application for leave to appeal to be argued together with the merits (which would be determined should leave be granted). The Minister's counsel refused to address the Supreme Court of Appeal on the merits, arguing that the Supreme Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to hear argument on the merits until the question of leave to appeal was determined by the High Court.

[1] Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC), [1997] ZACC 3 ('Motsepe').

[2] Act 58 of 1962.

[3] Motsepe (supra) at paras 20, 22-23.

[4] Ibid at para 30.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at para 31.

[7] Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks SA (Pty) Ltd & Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Innovative Medicines SA as Amici Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2005] ZACC 14 ('New Clicks').

The Constitutional Court condemned the Minister's refusal to address the merits.[1] To underscore its disapproval, the Court in New Clicks ordered the Minister to pay half of the pharmacies' costs in the Constitutional Court and the High Court and full costs in the Supreme Court of Appeal.[2]

A far worse example of abusing court process occurred in President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Quagliani.[3] In an earlier decision, the Court had decided complex issues relating to the validity of South Africa's extradition agreements with various other countries.[4] On the morning that judgment was to be handed down, the applicants brought an application to postpone judgment and join the Speaker of the National Assembly and the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces. The Court postponed judgment in order to allow the parties to address the issue. When it delivered the judgment approximately a month later, it observed: 'To say that the application for postponement of delivery of this judgment is remarkable would be a gross understatement.'[5] It severely criticised the applicants for bringing the application so late and required the parties to make submissions on who should bear the costs of the abortive application, including whether a punitive order should be made.

In Quagliani II, the Court granted costs against the applicant despite the applicant's attorneys contention that they were merely trying to act in the best interests of their client. Justice Sachs explained the Quagliani II Court's rejection of the applicant's argument as follows:

> [T]he only explanation for the extraordinary lateness of the application boiled down to a fear by the legal representatives that they might have paid insufficient attention during the four years of the litigation to the need to comply with certain procedural requirements. If the advantages of hindsight were allowed to prevail, litigants anticipating defeat would have second, third, and even fourth or fifth bites of the cherry. The litigation would be endless, court planning would be impossible and legal representatives would be rewarded for inadequate preparation.[6]

Although a lawyer should do all in her power for her client, 'it is quite unacceptable for a legal representative to clutch at each and every straw, giving false hope to a client, even if the motive is to do one's best on behalf of the client.'[7] However, the Court did not find the attorneys' conduct so unacceptable as to warrant a punitive order against them. Instead, it held that the applicant himself should bear the risk of instructing his attorneys to lodge the application and ordered costs to be imposed on an attorney and client scale.[8]

---

[1] New Clicks (supra) at para 82. Although this discussion forms part of the judgment of Chaskalson CJ, which did not represent the majority on all issues, a majority of the Court concurred in this part of Chaskalson CJ's judgment. In addition, there is nothing to suggest that the dissenting members of the Court disagreed with this aspect of Chaskalson CJ's judgment.

[2] Ibid at para 21.

[3] 2009 (8) BCLR 785 (CC), [2009] ZACC 9 ('Quagliani II').

[4] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Quagliani 2009 (4) BCLR 345 (CC), [2009] ZACC 1 ('Quagliani I').

[5] Quagliani I (supra) at para 70.

[6] Quagliani II (supra) at para 7.

[7] Ibid at para 9.

[8] Ibid at para 10.

While in Quagliani the litigant was penalised for acting too late, in Chonco II, the Court ordered costs against the applicants for acting too hastily.[1] In Chonco I,[2] the Court held that the applicants — who sought to have their applications for political pardons decided — had incorrectly sued the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development, when they should have sued the President. The applicants took the Court's advice and sued the President nine days later. Too quick, the Court held. As it turned out, on the day of the hearing the President largely conceded to all of the applicants' demands and indicated that he had considered most of the 384 applications. The applicants — despite the long history of presidential disinterest in the matter — should, the Court held, have first given the President an opportunity to respond to Chonco I before litigating anew. Khampepe J wrote as follows:

> I am mindful that the applicants, in the context of this case, would wish to vindicate their rights with greater urgency and use these proceedings as a 'bargaining chip'. This Court would not wish to deprive the litigants of a necessary weapon to use in order to vindicate their rights. But in the circumstances it is difficult not to conclude that the institution of these proceedings was hasty. At the very least, it behoved the applicants to put the Presidency on terms before resorting to litigation. A simple letter to the President putting him on terms or making inquiries in regard to the processing of their applications for pardon, given the decision in Chonco 1, would have sufficed.[3]

Similarly, in Koyabe, the Court criticised the applicants for failing to exhaust available internal remedies, before resorting to litigation.[4] Had the state not also acted inappropriately, they might have been forced to pay the state's costs.[5]

The Court has, finally, departed from the default positions when litigants failed (a) to initiate urgent challenges at the appropriate time;[6] (b) to properly identify the issues;[7] and (c) to use the proper procedure when raising an important constitutional matter.[8]

---

[1] Chonco & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa 2010 (6) BCLR 511 (CC), [2010] ZACC 7 ('Chonco II').

[2] Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development v Chonco & Others [2009] 2010 (4) SA 82 (CC), 2010 (1) SACR 325 (CC), 2010 (2) BCLR 140 (CC), ZACC 25 ('Chonco I').

[3] Chonco II (supra) at para 13.

[4] Koyabe & Others v Minister for Home Affairs & Others [2009] 2010 (4) SA 327 (CC), 2009 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC), ZACC 23 ('Koyabe') at para 86.

[5] Ibid at para 87.

[6] A Party & Another v The Minister for Home Affairs & Others, Moloko & Others v The Minister for Home Affairs & Another [2009] 2009 (3) SA 649 (CC), 2009 (6) BCLR 611 (CC), ZACC 4 at para 82 (The applicant successfully challenged legislation prohibiting citizens from voting overseas. The challenge had been brought only months before the 2009 national election. This would have influenced the Court to deny the applicant its costs, had the government not also acted inappropriately.)

[7] Chagi & Others v Special Investigating Unit 2009 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2009 (3) BCLR 227 (CC), 2009 (1) SACR 339 (CC), [2008] ZACC 22 at para 49 (Court made no order on costs as both parties had been responsible for confusing the issue in the SCA.)

[8] Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Land Affairs & Another 1997 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1573 (CC), [1996] ZACC 22 at para 47.

(iv) State's duty to the Court

In addition to the ordinary rules that govern all litigants' conduct, constitutional litigation imposes special duties upon the state.[1] The state's ability to discharge those duties will affect the nature of any cost order that might be levied against them.

Gory v Kolver NO & Others[2] concerned a challenge to s 1(1) of the Intestate Succession Act.[3] This section of the Act conferred rights of intestate succession on heterosexual spouses but not on homosexual life partners. The applicant for confirmation had successfully challenged the constitutionality of s 1(1) in the High Court. In the High Court, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development did not formally oppose the application and filed an answering affidavit only on the issue of the potential retrospectivity of the declaration of invalidity.[4] The High Court did not limit the retrospectivity of its order in the manner suggested by the Minister. When the applicant applied for confirmation to the Constitutional Court, he sought a costs order against the Minister. The Minister opposed confirmation, not on the basis of the failure of the High Court to limit the retrospectivity of its order, but simply because the applicant sought a costs order against her.[5]

The Court ordered that the Minister bear the applicant's costs, not only in the Constitutional Court, but in the High Court as well. In oral argument, counsel for the Minister explained that she did not abandon her concerns about retrospectivity and opposed confirmation of that part of the order of the High Court dealing with retrospectivity despite the fact that she had not, in her papers before the Constitutional Court, done so formally. This argument was, in the Gory Court's view, inadequate. The Court held that something more substantive is required from a state official responsible for the administration of a statute declared unconstitutional when the question of appropriate remedy comes before the Court.[6] The Minister ought to have formally opposed confirmation in the Constitutional Court on the question of remedy and filed heads of argument dealing with the matter. Moreover, Van Heerden AJ pointed out that the state is under a constitutional duty to respect and promote the rights in the Bill of Rights — that duty encompasses the creation of an appropriate remedy for unconstitutional provisions in statutes. Despite this duty, no comprehensive legislation on same-sex partnerships had been enacted and same-sex couples had repeatedly been obliged to approach the courts for piece-meal relief. On the Court's view, since the State had created the circumstances that led to the constitutional challenge, justice required that the state bear the ill resourced applicant's

[1] See M Chaskalson, G Marcus & M Bishop 'Constitutional Litigation' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) § 3.7.

[2] Gory v Kolver NO & Others (Starke & Others intervening) 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC), [2006] ZACC 20 ('Gory').

[3] Act 81 of 1987.

[4] Gory (supra) at para 62.

[5] Ibid at para 64.

[6] Ibid.

costs in what it deemed to be an important constitutional challenge.[1] This line of argument is largely a variation on the reasoning that justifies the default position in cases where the state plays a regulatory role. However, the Gory court, in addition also relies on the specific litigation choices of the Minister.

In a somewhat more extraordinary state of affairs, the Court has relied on this line of reasoning in ordering the state to pay costs even though the state was ultimately successful. In Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development v Chonco & Others, the respondents challenged the failure of the Minister to decide on their applications for pardons.[2] The High Court found in their favour. However, the Constitutional Court overturned the High Court's decision. It held that the respondents should have sued the President, not the Minister. Despite the respondent's procedural error, the Court found that the Minister's failure to discharge her responsibilities justified awarding costs against the state. Government intransigence with respect to such a significant issue, in the Court's view, far outweighed any mistake the respondent's counsel might have made. Langa CJ wrote:

> Six years have passed since Mr Chonco posted his application for pardon to the Minister. Yet, despite public undertakings made by the President and the Minister to expedite a response to the applications, the respondents have waited in vain. This is unacceptable. The Constitution requires that all constitutional obligations, wherever they lie, 'must be performed diligently and without delay.'[3]

(d) Miscellaneous

In addition to the major factors discussed above — motivation, the extent of success, conduct and the state's special duties — an endless variety of other factors could be deemed relevant to the determination of a costs order. A few, discussed below, give one a taste of the diverse range of concerns that can influence such determinations.

(i) Role of Attorney

Where an attorney initiates an action in his own name, on behalf of others, and in order to secure an order that does not affect him personally, courts must carefully scrutinize the litigation for abuse.[4] Even so, the Constitutional Court has applied

[1] Gory (supra) at para 65. This finding does not suggest that the relevant Minister will always be obliged to oppose confirmation when a High Court has declared legislation unconstitutional. Rather, where the relevant Minister can render substantive assistance to the Court in crafting the appropriate remedy — which will almost always be the case when a statute under her administration is declared unconstitutional — she should do so.

[2] 2010 (4) SA 82 (CC), 2010 (2) BCLR 140 (CC), 2010 (1) SACR 325 (CC), [2009] ZACC 25 ('Chonco I').

[3] Ibid at para 47.

[4] Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg & Others 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC), [2003] ZACC 10 ('Eisenberg') at para 72.

its pro-applicant costs order principles in relation to unsuccessful litigation initiated by an attorney seeking to challenge regulations affecting his clients.[1]

(ii) Who funds the litigation

The funder of the litigation may be relevant to a costs order. In Mohamed & Another v President of the RSA & Others, the applicant was handed over to the United States authorities, on their request, to stand trial in the US for his alleged part in the 1998 bombings of US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.[2] Mohamed succeeded in his challenge to the lawfulness of this exchange because the South African authorities had failed to secure an assurance from US authorities that the applicant would not face the death penalty if convicted.[3] However, the Court declined to make a costs order in favour of the applicant. Although the applicant had successfully prosecuted an important constitutional claim, the United States government had paid his legal fees.[4] Making a costs order in his favour would 'effectively oblige the South African government to reimburse the United States government, for whose benefit and at whose instance' the applicant had been deported.[5] Unlike costs orders that turn on the status of the parties themselves, the costs order in Mohamed reflect the intervention of a non-party, 'external' funder of the litigation.

6.3 Specific Cases

The preceding sections have laid out the general rules for costs and the factors that might motivate a court to depart from those rules. This section considers a few specific situations that, although they may still fit the general pattern, warrant separate consideration.

(a) Interlocutory applications

In SARFU III,[6] the Constitutional Court endorsed the following dictum from Fripp v Gibbon and Co in respect of interlocutory orders:

> I agree that as a rule it is fair and just that the costs should follow the event, whether of claim or counterclaim. But I cannot agree with the view that the unsuccessful party should bear the burden of all the costs simply on the ground that in the final result he is the unsuccessful party. To me it seems more in accordance with the principles of equity and justice that costs incurred in the course of litigation which judged by the event or events, prove

[1] Eisenberg (supra). See also, Kruger v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 417 (CC), 2009 (3) BCLR 268 (CC), [2008] ZACC 17 (Attorney challenged an unintentional error of the President to bring amendments to the Road Accident Fund Act into effect on the wrong dates. He acted both in his own interest and that of his clients. The fact that it was an attorney acting did not affect the award of costs.)

[2] 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC), [2001] ZACC 18 at para 7.

[3] Ibid at para 73.

[4] Ibid at para 72.

[5] Ibid.

[6] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [1999] ZACC 11 ('SARFU III').

> to have been unnecessarily or ineffectively incurred should, as a rule, be borne by the party responsible for such costs.[1]

So, in cases in which it is appropriate for the respondent to bear the costs and in which there have been interlocutory orders made by the Court, the Court will not simply award all costs to the applicant. When it comes to costs orders for the interlocutory applications, it will assess each individually.[2] The party who succeeds with an interlocutory order will receive its costs.[3] Again, the Court has emphasized the discretionary nature of such costs orders and the reluctance of appellate courts to interfere with existing costs orders by the High Courts. However, the Court's ruling in SARFU III suggests that the Court will overturn costs orders of the High Court with respect to successful interlocutory applications where appropriate.[4]

Despite endorsing the separation of interlocutory claims, the Court does not always follow its own advice. In Independent Newspapers, the Court considered a newspaper group's claim to open to the public, sealed portions of the Court's record in a case involving the dismissal of the head of the National Intelligence Agency.[5] In an interlocutory application, the newspaper group argued that its directors and lawyers should have access to the sealed part of the record in order to prepare argument on whether they should ultimately be made public. The Court found against Independent Newspapers in the interlocutory application, but they were partially successful in having some of the sealed parts of the record released. Moseneke DCJ made no costs order in the main application and then held:

> The [interlocutory] application was merely interim and must be disposed of as part of the main application. Another relevant consideration is that the arguments which were advanced in relation to the interlocutory application were in great part repeated in relation to the main application. I would follow the course I have taken in relation to the main application and that is to make no order as to costs in the interlocutory application as well.[6]

Perhaps Independent Newspapers is a special case as the substantive issues in the main and interlocutory applications were largely the same. But the case does indicate that costs in interim applications can not be completely divorced from the outcome and conduct of the main case.

(b) Matters Disposed of on the Papers

The Constitutional Court has held that it will not ordinarily make a costs order when an application is dealt with summarily — and thus without written or oral argument — on the basis of information contained in the affidavits.[7] Although

[1] 1913 AD 354, 361 cited in SARFU III (supra) at para 247.
[2] SARFU III (supra) at para 247.
[3] Ibid at paras 248-249.
[4] Ibid at paras 246-250.
[5] Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) In re: Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6 ('Independent Newspapers').
[6] Ibid at para 78.
[7] See, for example, Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments (Pty) Ltd & Others 2000 (2) SA 837 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 465 (CC) at para 7.

the Court has not announced it, the same rule seems to apply in cases that are dismissed without any judgment.

(c) Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (1980)

The Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction protects children from the harmful effects of their wrongful removal or retention from the state of their habitual residence.[1] The Convention also provides for their prompt return to the place of origin. It has been incorporated into South African law by the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction Act.[2]

States parties are obliged to designate a 'Central Authority' to discharge the duties that the Convention imposes.[3] In South Africa, the Family Advocate is designated as the Central Authority.[4] Since the Family Advocate must ensure the return of children wrongfully removed from their state of habitual residence, the Family Advocate must sometimes adopt an adversarial role with respect to a parent who resists the return of the child.[5]

In LS v AT, the parents of a young girl were divorced in Canada. A court order allowed the mother to leave Canada for one month with the girl on the condition that she return with the child. When the mother did not return and the father instituted proceedings for the return of the girl, the Family Advocate intervened to ensure that the girl was indeed returned. Despite ordering that the mother return the child to Canada, the Constitutional Court overturned the order of the High Court that the mother was to pay the costs of the Family Advocate. The Convention provides that the Central Authorities of states parties must bear their own costs and it was not appropriate, therefore, for the mother to bear the Family Advocate's costs.[6]

(d) Costs in Applications in Terms of FC s 80

In terms of the Interim Constitution,[7] the Constitutional Court had exclusive jurisdiction in cases involving 'any dispute over the constitutionality of any Bill before Parliament or a provincial legislature'.[8] This jurisdiction would only be exercised 'at the request of the Speaker of the National Assembly, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of a provincial legislature, who [was required to] make such a request to the Court upon receipt of a petition by at least one-third of all the members of the National Assembly, the Senate or such provincial legislature, as the case may be, requiring him or her to do so.'[9] The Constitutional Court re-inforced the principle, in light of the content of IC s 98, that an unsuccessful

[1] See LS v AT & Another 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC)('LS') at para 10.
[2] Act 72 of 1996.
[3] LS (supra) at para 13.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at para 14.
[6] Ibid at para 55.
[7] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[8] IC s 98(2)(d).
[9] IC s 98(9).

applicant who raises an important constitutional issue should not be penalized with a costs order.[1]

FC s 80 contains similar, if somewhat more detailed, language regarding costs orders:

> (1) Members of the National Assembly may apply to the Constitutional Court for an order declaring that all or part of an Act of Parliament is unconstitutional.
> (2) An application:
> (a) must be supported by at least one third of the members of the National Assembly; and
> (b) must be made within 30 days of the date on which the President assented to and signed the Act.
> (3) The Constitutional Court may order that all or part of an Act that is the subject of an application in terms of subsection (1) has no force until the Court has decided the application if:
> (a) the interests of justice require this; and
> (b) the application has a reasonable prospect of success.
> (4) If an application is unsuccessful, and did not have a reasonable prospect of success, the Constitutional Court may order the applicants to pay costs.

FC s 80 sketches out the contours of a test to determine the question of costs in such matters: if an application does not have a reasonable prospect of success, the court may make a costs order against the applicants. However, since the provision leaves the matter in the discretion of the Court, the Constitutional Court need not depart from its general approach to costs: if the applicant raises an important constitutional issue, then it will ordinarily not be penalized in costs if it loses.

In the context of the equivalent provision in the Interim Constitution, the Court pointed out the kinds of exceptions that might exist to this principle:

> This [principle that losing applicants are not mulcted in costs], of course, does not mean that such litigants can be completely protected from that risk. The Court, in its discretion, might direct that they pay the costs of their adversaries if, for example, the grounds of attack on the impugned statute are frivolous or vexatious or they have acted from improper motives or there are other circumstances which make it in the interest of justice to direct that such costs should be paid by the losing party.[2]

Again: the text of FC s 80 accommodates the existing approach of the Constitutional Court. A bona fide applicant will not be forced to pay costs. However, where an application has been launched in terms of FC s 80 and there are no reasonable prospects of success, this abuse of process will often, but not always, amount to conduct justifying a costs order against the applicants.

[1] See In re: National Education Policy Bill No 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC), [1996] ZACC 3 at para 36; In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995; In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC), [1996] ZACC 15 at para 49.

[2] In re: The School Education Bill of 1995 (supra) at para 36.

(e) Counsel appearing at the request of the Court and Amicus Curiae

Where counsel appears at the request of the Constitutional Court, it is not customary for the court to make a costs order against the losing party[1] or in favour of a partially successful applicant.[2] In the case of a successful applicant, no costs are awarded because the applicant has incurred no costs.[3] The same rule applies to amicus curiae. The Court has held that, whatever the outcome, an amicus 'is neither a loser nor a winner and is generally not entitled to be awarded costs.'[4] The issue is discussed in detail in Geoff Budlender's chapter on amicus curiae.[5]

6.4 Using Costs to Prevent Litigation: Settlement and Security

This section addresses two seemingly disparate issues: (a) the effect of a rejected settlement offer on costs; and (b) the ability of a court to demand that an applicant provide security for the other party's costs before initiating litigation. What these subjects have in common is that they are both legitimate ways to use the threat of costs to keep potential litigants out of court. Both tactics have been, weakly, endorsed by the Constitutional Court.

(a) Settlement Offers

Rule 34 of the Uniform Rules of Court regulates offers of settlement. Rule 34(11) states: 'The fact that an offer or tender referred to in this rule has been made may be brought to the notice of the court after judgment has been given as being relevant to the question of costs.' The role of rule 34(11) was considered by the Constitutional Court in NM v Smith.[6] The plaintiffs had sued the defendants — the author, publisher and subject of an authorised biography of the politician Patricia De Lille — for revealing their HIV status without their consent. The plaintiffs had participated in a controversial HIV study conducted by the University of Pretoria. De Lille was involved in subsequent investigations of the study, an episode which was related in her biography. On the morning of the trial, the defendants offered the plaintiffs R35 000 each and a private apology as a settlement. The offer did not include an admission of liability. The plaintiffs refused the offer. The plaintiffs were only partially successful in the High Court and received R15 000 in damages. After the trial, the rejected settlement offer was revealed to the judge. Subsequent to the revelation, the judge ordered the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs from three days after the offer was made until judgment was handed down.

[1] See Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC), [1997] ZACC 7 at para 43.

[2] See Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions: Johannesburg High Court & Others 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC), [2005] ZACC 6 ('Sibiya') at para 63.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC), [2000] ZA 17 at para 63.

[5] Geoff Budlender 'Amicus Curiae' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 8.5.

[6] NM & Others v Smith & Others 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC), [2007] ZACC 6 ('NM').

The majority of the Constitutional Court overruled the High Court. The NM Court held the defendants liable for iniuria. It also awarded the respondents R35 000 in damages. The Court then overturned the High Court's award of costs and required each party to bear its own costs in both the High Court and the Constitutional Court. Although both parties specifically addressed the role of Rule 34 in the constitutional scheme the Court had created for considering costs, the majority avoided any engagement with the legitimacy or the effects of the rule. Instead, the NM Court focused on the timing and nature of the settlement offer. In the NM Court's view it had been made too hastily, without any attempt at negotiation.

The truly interesting statements on Rule 34 come from the partially dissenting judgment of Chief Justice Langa. The Chief Justice tackled the rule head-on. He held that the discretion to award costs in light of a settlement offer had to be exercised differently when the case concerned constitutional rights. He offered two reasons for this conclusion. First, money alone is not (always) enough to vindicate constitutional rights.[1] Second, Langa CJ noted that constitutional litigation — even between private parties — often demands a systemic and wide-reaching change in the existing law. The threat of an adverse costs order for failing to take a settlement offer could permit rich, powerful litigants to prevent changes to the law by making generous offers to keep the issue from being decided by a court. (Indeed, insurance companies are notorious for using settlement offers to avoid litigation that might establish an adverse precedent.) In the Chief Justice's words:

> There is a danger that the risk of adverse costs orders, despite ultimate success, might permit rich and powerful defendants to prevent the law from adapting to meet constitutional imperatives by throwing money at plaintiffs who cannot afford to take that chance. It already takes immense courage for ordinary people to take large powerful defendants to court and the additional peril of an adverse costs order will mean even fewer plaintiffs get their day in court. That could easily have happened in this case and the liability of media defendants for disclosing private medical facts would have remained unquestioned. The achievement of our constitutional vision should not be obstructed by the vested interests of those who have the money to protect them.[2]

The Chief Justice does not mean that costs can never be granted against plaintiffs who refuse settlement offers in constitutional cases. Rather, as this entire chapter has made patently clear, the litigation of constitutional rights dramatically 'alters the framework within which [a court's] discretion [with respect to costs] must be exercised'.[3] Langa CJ would have ordered the respondents to pay all of the applicants costs in both courts. While the Chief Justice's views on Rule 34 are beyond reproach, they attracted neither the attention nor the support of the majority. Post-NM, Rule 34 should be applied identically in constitutional and non-constitutional matters.

[1] NM (supra) at para 119 ('No matter the value of the offer, it does not give the acknowledgement of wrong-doing that is often far more valuable than any money could be.')

[2] Ibid at para 120.

[3] Ibid at para 121.

(b) Security for Costs

Section 13 of the Companies Act[1] permits a court to order a plaintiff company to provide security for the defendant's costs if there is reason to believe that it will not be able to afford an adverse costs order. If the company cannot provide security, then it will be prevented from litigating. The application of this provision was fully canvassed by the Constitutional Court in Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners.[2] The liquidator of a company had sued its previous accountants for failing to hold R100 million in trust. The accountants then made a s 13 application for costs to avoid defending the issue. The High Court granted the order and the applicant appealed to the Constitutional Court. Importantly, the applicant did not challenge the constitutionality of s 13; he merely argued that it should be applied in light of the right of access to court.[3]

O'Regan J lucidly explained the purpose of s 13:

> A salutary effect of the ordinary rule of costs — that unsuccessful litigants must pay the costs of their opponents — is to deter would-be plaintiffs from instituting proceedings vexatiously or in circumstances where their prospects of success are poor. Where a limited liability company will be unable to pay its debts, that salutary effect may well be attenuated. Thus the main purpose of section 13 is to ensure that companies, who are unlikely to be able to pay costs and therefore not effectively at risk of an adverse costs order if unsuccessful, do not institute litigation vexatiously or in circumstances where they have no prospects of success thus causing their opponents unnecessary and irrecoverable legal expense.[4]

A court has a discretion whether to grant the application for security. In exercising its discretion, a court should 'balance the potential injustice to a plaintiff if it is prevented from pursuing a legitimate claim as a result of an order requiring it to pay security for costs, on the one hand, against the potential injustice to a defendant who successfully defends the claim, and yet may well have to pay all its own costs in the litigation.'[5] In performing this balancing act, a court should also consider: 'the likelihood that the effect of an order to furnish security will be to terminate the plaintiff's action; the attempts the plaintiff has made to find financial assistance from its shareholders or creditors; … whether it is the conduct of the defendant that has caused the financial difficulties of the plaintiff; as well as the nature of the plaintiff's action.'[6] Section 13 was not capable, Justice O'Regan held, of being read to prohibit an award for security for costs where the award would prevent the plaintiff company from bringing the litigation. Absent a future constitutional challenge, bankrupt companies can be prevented from initiating litigation through s 13.

6.5 Costs Orders of Lower Courts

This section considers, first, when an appellate court can alter lower court's costs

[1] Act 61 of 1973.
[2] 2007 (5) SA 525 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC), [2006] ZACC 13 ('Giddey').
[3] Ibid at para 18.
[4] Ibid at para 7.
[5] Ibid at para 8.
[6] Ibid at para 30.

award (when it reaches the same outcome on the merits) and, second, when it is permissible to appeal only the question of costs.

(a) Cost Orders of Lower Courts[1]

The award of costs is a discretionary matter and an appellate court will be slow to interfere with a costs order made by a lower court. The Constitutional Court, adopting the approach of Corbett JA in Attorney-General, Eastern Cape v Blom & Others,[2] has held that the circumstances in which such interference will be justified are limited 'to cases of vitiation by misdirection or irregularity, or the absence of grounds on which a court, acting reasonably, could have made the order in question.'[3]

However, in Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape,[4] the Constitutional Court set aside what appears, on its face, to be a perfectly reasonable costs order by the High Court. The appellant (applicant in the High Court) had unsuccessfully sought various relief based on his right to a fair trial. The High Court had applied the ordinary approach to costs and awarded the costs to the respondents. Although the appellant was unsuccessful in the Constitutional Court, the court set aside the costs order of the High Court on the basis that the principle that an unsuccessful litigant who raises a substantial constitutional issue should not be mulcted in costs applies equally to the other courts.[5] The fact that the constitutional issues were raised during the course of a criminal trial, in which costs orders are generally not competent, shaped the Court's decision in Sanderson.[6] The Court has followed the same approach in at least one non-criminal matter. In ANC v Minister of Local Government and Housing, KwaZulu-Natal,[7] the Court overturned the costs order of the court a quo against unsuccessful appellants who had raised an important constitutional issue.[8]

In Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Province, Western Cape & Another, the appellants had initially applied to the High Court for an order compelling the respondents to provide information.[9] The appellants received the information just prior to the hearing. They then sought to amend their prayers, in light of this information, and mounted a substantive challenge to various aspects of the province's education policy. The High Court issued a costs order against the appel-

[1] The term 'lower court' is often used to refer to the 'inferior courts' such as the magistrates' courts. I use the term here to refer to all courts beneath the Constitutional Court.

[2] 1988 (4) SA 645, 670D–F (A).

[3] Premier, Province of Mpumalanga & Another v Executive Committee of the Association of Governing Bodies of State-Aided Schools: Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC), [1998] ZACC 20 at para 53. See also Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC), [2004] ZACC 20 at para 110 (Court refused to find that the High Court had exercised its discretion improperly.) See Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 at paras 29-31.

[4] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC), [1997] ZACC 18 ('Sanderson').

[5] Ibid at para 44. See also Mohamed & Another v President of the RSA & Others 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC), [2001] ZACC 18 at para 72 (The same approach was followed.)

[6] Sanderson (supra) at para 44.

[7] 1998 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 399 (CC), [1998] ZACC 2.

[8] Ibid at para 34.

[9] Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Western Cape Province & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC), [2002] ZACC 2 ('Bel Porto').

lants with respect to the application for information. In the Constitutional Court, the appellants sought an order overturning this costs order.[1] Chaskalson CJ refused to interfere with the costs order of the High Court on the grounds that the Constitutional Court 'should not be required to determine questions of law that have no relevance other than the responsibility for costs of aborted litigation, particularly where those costs are but a small fraction of the costs that have been incurred.'[2]

In Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund & Another,[3] the applicant for confirmation successfully challenged certain provisions of the Matrimonial Property Act that prevented her from claiming damages for her husband's intentional assault with a motor vehicle.[4] The court a quo made no order as to costs.[5] In weighing up the position of the parties as part of its determination of costs, the Constitutional Court pointed out that the applicant 'is an immediate beneficiary of the outcome of the case; but it is also true that there are similarly situated people who are not before us. The outcome of this litigation has a wide reach and is clearly in the public interest.'[6] On the other hand, the respondent was a juristic person created and funded by the State. Furthermore, it had persisted in defending the challenged law despite the view of another Minister that the law was unconstitutional.[7] In those circumstances, the Court in Van der Merwe could see no reason why 'a private citizen in the position of [the applicant] should forfeit the opportunity to recover onerous costs [incurred] in two courts' from an organ of state that sought to uphold a facially unconstitutional law.[8]

This approach introduces novel considerations into the question of whether a successful applicant should receive her costs. It does not, however, constitute a radical departure to the approach on costs orders of lower courts. The court a quo in Van der Merwe does not seem to have applied its mind to the question of costs. Thus, technically, the Constitutional Court's award does not constitute an example of interference with a lower court's discretion.

However, Swartbooi & Others v Brink & Another (2) offers a window on to another kind of case in which the Constitutional Court may set aside a decision of a lower court on costs.[9] The appellants were members of a municipal council. They had taken certain decisions, as members of the municipal council, adverse to the first and second respondents, also members of the municipal council. The first and second respondents had these decisions reversed by the High Court. The High Court ordered costs de bonis propriis against the appellants in their personal capacity.

In making its costs order, the High Court failed to take account of legislation providing immunity to councillors from civil proceedings in certain circumstances

[1] Bel Porto Governing Body (supra) at para 130.
[2] Ibid at para 131.
[3] 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC), [2006] ZACC 4 ('Van der Merwe').
[4] Act 88 of 1984.
[5] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 78.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid.
[8] Ibid.
[9] 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC), [2003] ZACC 25 ('Swartbooi').

and, as a result, had materially misdirected itself. It was open to the Constitutional Court, therefore, to consider afresh the High Court's costs order.[1]

In rejecting the approach of the High Court to costs, the Court pointed out that the High Court appeared to be motivated, at least in part, by a desire to teach the councillors a lesson and to discourage them from making a similar decision in the future. The Constitutional Court held that

> [t]his is an improper approach and reflects an improper purpose. It trenches upon the separation of powers because it is judicial conduct aimed at influencing the conduct of the Legislative and Executive branches of Government. Courts have the power to set aside executive and legislative decisions that are inconsistent with the Constitution. They cannot attempt, by their orders, to punish municipal councillors and, in so doing, influence what members of these bodies might or might not do. This motive of the High Court constitutes a dangerous intrusion into the legislative and executive domain.[2]

If taken as a broad statement rather than a reaction to the specific facts of the case, this statement in Swartbooi is probably overbroad. Courts can and should use the threat of adverse and punitive costs awards to influence government conduct. The Court has specifically endorsed the use of costs to, for example, encourage the state to properly defend legislation it believes is constitutional,[3] prompt government to remove unconstitutional laws from the books before they are litigated,[4] and dissuade the state from raising cynical defences to avoid their constitutional responsibilities.[5] Swartbooi should, therefore, be read narrowly to discourage costs orders that attempt to influence government actors in the exercise of their political discretion in a way not required by the Constitution or some other law. Costs are a legitimate and effective mechanism to encourage government actors to comply with their legal obligations.

(b) Appeals against Costs Orders

A topic closely related to the question of when it will be appropriate to interfere with decisions of lower courts on the question of costs is the question: When it will be appropriate for appellate courts, and in particular the Constitutional Court, to permit a party to appeal solely against a costs order? Section 21A of the Supreme Court Act[6] states, in a somewhat convoluted fashion, that courts of appeal should permit an appeal on the issue of costs only in exceptional circumstances. Although that section does not bind (and does not refer to) the Constitutional Court, the Court in Biowatch held that principle underlying the section is 'manifestly meritorious'.[7] The Court held that although the standard applicable to the question as to whether leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court on the question of costs alone

[1] Swartbooi (supra) at para 23.
[2] Ibid at para 25.
[3] Gory v Kolver NO & others (Starke & Others intervening) 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC), [2006] ZACC 20.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4.
[6] Act 59 of 1959.
[7] Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources and Others 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 ('Biowatch') at para 11.

is not, as in the case of other appellate courts, whether 'exceptional circumstances' exist, it will rarely be 'in the interests of justice' for leave to appeal to be granted solely on the question of costs.[1]

In Biowatch, leave to appeal on the question of costs alone was granted on the basis that the case raised the question as to whether the general principles established by courts in relation to costs orders require modification to meet the needs of constitutional litigation.[2] The case therefore sends the message that, in the ordinary course, leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court will not be granted on the issue of costs alone, unless there is some important issue of principle, transcending the parties to the matter, which requires resolution in the interests of justice.

Although Biowatch provides the most comprehensive treatment of the principles applicable to costs orders in constitutional litigation (in all courts) to date, it cannot be read as having covered the field on all issues of principle. There may, therefore, be scope in the future for leave to appeal to be sought from the Constitutional Court on an issue (or issues) relating only to a costs order made by a lower court. However, given the range of issues that Biowatch addressed, it will be rare for a case to arrive in which it would be in the interests of justice for leave to appeal to the Constitutional Court on the issue of costs alone.

In so far as other courts are concerned, section 21A continues to apply. However, it would not require too much imagination to interpret the phrase 'exceptional circumstances' as embracing the types of cases which the Constitution Court in Biowatch held would appropriately ground an application for leave to appeal to that court. This is especially so, given the now-trite principle that all legislation must be read in the light of the Bill of Rights. So, the reference in section 21A of the Supreme Court Act to 'exceptional circumstances', read in the light of the Bill of Rights, must mean that where a question of principle relating to costs in constitutional litigation arises in a case in the High Court it may constitute 'exceptional circumstances' justifying the granting of leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal on the issue.[3]

6.5 Punitive Costs Awards

Ordinary costs awards are, well, ordinary cost awards. However, there are situations — where the conduct of the litigants has been particularly deplorable — that justify a punitive costs award. I discuss: (a) costs on an attorney and client scale; and (b) costs de bonis propriis.

[1] Biowatch (supra) at para 11. The rationale of the Constitutional Court's finding in this regard is that appeals on costs orders alone have the effect of piling costs upon costs, favouring litigants with deep pockets and resulting in the unnecessary ventilation of side issues.

[2] Biowatch (supra) at para 12.

[3] Section 21A of the Supreme Court Act deals with appeals either to the Supreme Court of Appeal or to full benches of the High Court. Since, however, it is already well-accepted that appeals on issues of general application and wide-reaching principles should be heard by the Supreme Court of Appeal and not a full-bench of the appropriate High Court, it will be very rare indeed when it will be appropriate for leave to appeal to a full bench of the High Court to be granted on an issue relating to costs in constitutional litigation.

(a) Costs on an attorney and client scale

The Constitutional Court has adopted the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal to the question of costs on an attorney and client scale: Because the Court does not wish to inhibit the right of appeal,[1] it will rarely award punitive costs.[2] The Court has also endorsed the traditional rationale for attorney and client costs:

> The true explanation of awards of attorney and client costs … seems to be that, by reason of special considerations arising either from the circumstances which give rise to the action or from the conduct of the losing party, the court in a particular case considers it just, by means of such an order, to ensure more effectually than it can do by means of a judgment for party and party costs that the successful party will not be out of pocket in respect of the expense caused to him by the litigation.[3]

Swartbooi neatly demonstrates the Court's attitude toward punitive costs.[4] Two members of a local council went to the High Court to have decisions of the Council negatively affecting their rights set aside. They succeeded and the High Court granted costs on an attorney and client scale. The respondents appealed to the Constitutional Court. Yacoob J agreed that the Council's decisions were so obviously invalid that the members should not have had to go to court to have them declared so.[5] It was therefore an appropriate case to award attorney and client costs in the High Court. But the Court did not agree with the High Court that those costs should be paid de bonis propriis by the parties themselves. Puzzlingly, without explanation, it gave an ordinary costs award in the appeal. Despite the outcome in Swartbooi, the Court is generally willing to uphold punitive awards made in the lower courts.[6]

However, the Court has been reluctant to award costs on an attorney and client scale against parties appearing before it. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, the applicants had challenged the constitutionality of immigration legislation limiting the ability of foreigners to join their South African same-sex partners.[7] The respondents had filed no answering affidavit in the High Court during the seven months after the application had been launched. They then decided, 24 hours before the hearing in the High Court, to seek a postponement in order to file an answer.[8] The High Court refused the application. In the Constitutional Court, the respondents filed two applications. They sought an

[1] Premier, Province of Mpumalanga & Another v Executive Committee of the Association of Governing Bodies of State-Aided Schools: Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC), [1998] ZACC 20 at para 55.

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC), [1999] ZACC 17 ('NCGLE') at para 93.

[3] Nel v Waterberg Landbouwers Ko-operatieve Vereeniging 1946 AD 597, 607 quoted in Swartbooi & Others v Brink & Another (2) 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC), [2003] ZACC 25 at para 27 and South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson Gauteng Liquor Board and Others 2009 (1) SA 565 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC), [2006] ZACC 7 at para 48.

[4] Swartbooi & Others v Brink & Another 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (3) BCLR 502 (CC), [2003] ZACC 25,.

[5] Ibid at para 27.

[6] See, for example, Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC), [2004] ZACC 20 at para 110.

[7] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC), [1999] ZACC 17 ('NCGLE').

[8] Ibid at para 5.

order condoning their failure to file an answering affidavit in the High Court and allowing them to file one. In the alternative, they sought to amend their notice of appeal to include a new basis for appeal: namely, that the High Court, in exercising its discretion, erred in refusing the postponement.[1] The Constitutional Court held that the first application was wholly misconceived: 'Short of setting aside on appeal an order made by another court and substituting a different order, [the Constitutional Court] has no jurisdiction to make an order on behalf of another court properly seized of a matter or to condone, on behalf of such court, non-compliance with the rules of procedure to which such court is subject.'[2] The second application was dismissed on the basis that, given the exercise of discretion by courts a quo, the High Court could not be said to have misdirected itself.[3]

The applicants argued that the costs in respect to the respondent's applications should be awarded on an attorney and client scale because they constituted an abuse of process and were manifestly without merit.[4] The Court acknowledged the application's lack of substance. 'If the argument … concerning the merits of the appeal had revealed the same lack of substance and apparent disregard for the rights of the applicants', Ackermann J hypothesized, 'I would have had no hesitation in ordering them to pay costs as between attorney and client'.[5] But the costs occasioned by the two applications were slight and the respondents had raised issues of substance in the main application. So, although the respondents' conduct in bringing the applications was ill-conceived, it was not 'such a serious abuse of the process of the Court' as to warrant the imposition of costs on an attorney and client scale.[6]

If the Court was ever going to award costs on an attorney and client scale, one would have expected them to do so in President of the RSA & Others v SARFU & Others.[7] The case concerned a challenge by the former head of South African rugby, Louis Luyt, to the appointment of a commission of enquiry into the administration of rugby. The matter was, to put it mildly, acrimonious. The most contentious element was a recusal application that alleged that a majority of the members of the Constitutional Court had close links to the ANC government and could not be trusted to render an impartial judgment. The recusal request failed. Three grounds were then raised in favour of a costs order on an attorney and client scale against the unsuccessful Dr Luyt. First, the recusal challenge had impugned the integrity of the Court in circumstances that could be described as 'extraordinary and contemptuous'.[8] Second, during the course of the proceedings, the respondent had essentially accused the President of South Africa of deliberately misleading the Court.[9] Third, during oral argument in the Constitutional

[1] NCGLE (supra) at paras 8-9.
[2] Ibid at para 10.
[3] Ibid at paras 10-11.
[4] Ibid at para 90.
[5] Ibid at para 93.
[6] Ibid at paras 93-96.
[7] 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [1999] ZACC 11 ('SARFU III').
[8] Ibid at para 251.
[9] Ibid at para 252.

Court, the mandate of the respondent's advocates was summarily withdrawn without explanation.[1]

Despite these factors, the Constitutional Court declined to order costs on an attorney and client scale. The Court in SARFU III noted that the respondent's tactics bore > the hallmark of spin-doctoring by a respondent who, knowing that the appeal might succeed, lays the ground to discredit the court with the object of undermining a decision which might go against him. The appellants might succeed, but it would be a pyrrhic victory, secured by a dishonest President from a compliant Court.[2]

However, the Court held that the harm done by the recusal application was to the Court and not to the appellants.[3] Furthermore, the respondent was attempting to confirm the judgment of the court a quo. So although that judgment turned out to be wrong, the respondent was entitled to defend it.[4] The Court observed:

> If we were satisfied that there was indeed a calculated policy to prosecute the appeal in a manner designed to discredit the judgment of this Court and to undermine a decision it might give in favour of the appellants, we would have ordered costs to be paid on the attorney and client scale. We have concluded, however, though not without some hesitation, that there is insufficient evidence to permit us to draw such an inference with the certainty required for the making of such an order.[5]

SARFU indicates both that the conduct will have to be particularly egregious and that compelling evidence must indicate the nefarious motives of the transgressor.

The Constitutional Court's general reluctance to award costs on an attorney and client scale is further reflected in New Clicks.[6] In New Clicks, counsel for the Minister refused to address the Supreme Court of Appeal on the merits of the appeal, even though the Supreme Court of Appeal had specifically directed them to do so. The Constitutional Court awarded the pharmacies their full costs in the Supreme Court of Appeal. However, the Court in New Clicks Court did not award costs on an attorney and client scale. That fact is, perhaps, surprising given that the Court described the Minister's conduct as 'deplorable'.

However, occasions exist in which the court has found costs on the attorney and client scale appropriate. In Quagliani II,[7] which is discussed in full above,[8] the applicants brought an application for postponement and joinder on the morning the judgment was delivered. The Court was particularly critical of the attorneys' conduct and justifiably decided that the applicant himself should bear the risk of his agents' actions.

---

[1] SARFU III (supra) at para 253.
[2] Ibid at para 255.
[3] Ibid at para 155.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at para 256.
[6] See Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 872 (CC), [2005] ZACC 14 ('New Clicks') at para 82.
[7] President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Quagliani 2009 (8) BCLR 785 (CC), [2009] ZACC 9 ('Quagliani II').
[8] § 6.3*(c)* above.

The Court awarded costs on an attorney and client scale in Alexkor,[1] for a late decision by the government to appeal, and, government's dilatory conduct in Njongi.[2] The Alexkor Court was motivated by the inconvenience the late application had caused for the other litigants and the Court. The cost order in Njongi was motivated by the Court's moral outrage that the government chose to raise a defence of prescription to avoid the obligation to provide a social grant to a disabled woman.

(b) Costs de bonis propriis

Costs de bonis propriis — literally, 'of his own goods' — are orders that require either the members/representative of an institutional defendant, or an attorney to personally pay the costs of an application, normally on a punitive scale. They are employed to express the court's displeasure at the conduct of the litigation. The standard for both attorneys and representatives is similar. The Constitutional Court held that an attorney will be required to pay costs de bonis propriis 'where a court is satisfied that there has been negligence in a serious degree.'[3] The traditional test, for litigants, as stated by Innes CJ, is: 'his conduct in connection with the litigation in question must have been mala fide, negligent or unreasonable'.[4] In fleshing out the meaning of costs de bonis propriis, we look at (a) the conduct of attorneys; and (b) the actions of government officials.

South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board & Others[5] concerned the constitutionality of the definition of the word 'shebeen' in the Gauteng Liquor Act.[6] The applicants challenged the definition in the High Court and no answering affidavits were filed on behalf of the respondents.[7] On the day of the hearing, the State Attorney, on behalf of the respondents, indicated that the respondents did not oppose the application and consented to the relief sought. As a consequence, the High Court entered an order by consent declaring the definition unconstitutional.[8]

Once the application for confirmation was lodged in the Constitutional Court, the Chief Justice issued directions enrolling the matter for hearing and calling for written submissions. The applicants duly lodged their submissions but the respondents did not.[9] The Chief Justice issued further directions requesting the third respondent, the MEC, Finance and Economic Affairs, Gauteng, to file an affidavit speaking to the constitutionality of the challenged definition and to file written submissions by a particular date. A week before the written submissions were due, the State Attorney wrote a letter to the Constitutional Court saying

[1] Alexkor Ltd & Another v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC), [2003] ZACC 18 at para 17.

[2] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4 ('Njongi').

[3] South African Liquor Traders Association and Others v Chairperson Gauteng Liquor Board & Others 2009 (1) SA 565 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC), [2006] ZACC 7 ('SALTA') at para 54.

[4] Vermaak's Executor v Vermaak's Heirs 1909 TS 679, 691 quoted with approval in Visser v Cryopreservation Technologies CC 2003 (6) SA 607 (T) at para 6.

[5] SALTA (supra).

[6] Act 2 of 2003.

[7] SALTA (supra) at para 13.

[8] Ibid at paras 13-14.

[9] Ibid at paras 15-16.

that the respondents continued not to oppose the relief sought and did not feel it necessary to file the affidavit or written submissions requested by the Chief Justice.[1] The Chief Justice then issued additional directions calling on the parties to address argument on the question as to whether the Chief Justice should issue directions compelling the third respondent to file the requested affidavit and written submissions. Once again, there was no response from the respondents.[2]

The day before the hearing, the registrar's office of the Constitutional Court contacted the attorney of record at the State Attorney's office and requested that she be present in court for the hearing. There was, however, no appearance at all for the respondents at the hearing.[3] After submissions were made by the applicants' counsel at the hearing, the matter was postponed to a later date and the Court made an order directing the third respondent to file an affidavit addressing, amongst other things, the constitutionality of the section. Shortly after the order was made, the State Attorney withdrew as attorney of record for the third respondent, and the affidavit and written submissions were, finally, submitted.[4]

In dealing with the costs order in this matter, O'Regan J pointed out that the attorney in the office of the State Attorney had not read the request for the affidavit and the submissions issued by the Chief Justice and had simply placed the order of the Chief Justice in the case file.[5] It was clear that the attorney in question was recently qualified and inexperienced in constitutional litigation. However, there was no indication that she had sought the assistance of her supervisors and there was no evidence from her supervisors of any system to supervise junior attorneys in important matters:[6]

> The result is both unfortunate and serious. It is unfortunate because the effect in this case was to give the impression that the MEC, a senior member of the executive in provincial government, was not interested in assisting this Court in resolving important constitutional litigation. … It is serious because as a matter of common practice it is the State Attorney who is briefed by the government when it is involved in litigation. Given the government's responsibility to assist the work of courts, a lapse of this sort in the State Attorney's office gives cause for grave concern.[7]

In SALTA, the state attorney ought to have placed the matter in the hands of a senior member of the office.[8] The failure of the state attorney to provide sufficient guidance to a younger member of staff justified the award of costs de bonis propriis against the state attorney.[9]

[1] SALTA (supra) at para 18.
[2] Ibid at para 19.
[3] Ibid at paras 19-20.
[4] Ibid at paras 20-21.
[5] Ibid at para 50.
[6] Ibid at para 51.
[7] Ibid at para 52.
[8] Ibid at para 53.
[9] Ibid at para 54.

If the misconduct in SALTA was related to professional judgment and issues of legal administration, in Njongi,[1] the potential for an award de bonis propriis arose from the moral or political decisions of the state and its attorneys. Mrs Njongi had been receiving a disability grant from the Eastern Cape Provincial Government. Her grant — along with tens of thousands of other — was inexplicably cancelled in 1997. She re-applied, and received her grant again in 2000, together with R1 100 in back pay. Believing she was owed significantly more in back pay — and receiving no joy from her requests to the Provincial Government — Mrs Njongi went, in 2004, to the High Court to overturn the administrative act that had cancelled her disability grant. In the High Court, the Provincial Government argued that her claim had prescribed because more than three years had elapsed since her grant was cancelled. Ms Njongi won in the High Court, lost before a Full Bench, was denied a hearing by the Supreme Court of Appeal and eventually made it to the Constitutional Court.

At the hearing, the Court raised the question whether the respondent (the MEC for Welfare) should be ordered to pay costs de bonis propriis for even raising the issue of prescription. The next day the Court issued directions requiring the MEC to 'show cause by affidavit why, irrespective of the outcome of the application, he should not be ordered to pay the Applicant's costs in the application on the scale as between Attorney and Client de bonis propriis.'[2] Moreover, if the MEC indicated that other people were responsible for the decision, 'each person identified in the [MEC]'s affidavit must also show cause by affidavit why, irrespective of the outcome of the application, they should not be ordered to pay the Applicant's costs on the scale as between Attorney and Client de bonis propriis.'[3]

The Court, in a unanimous judgment of Yacoob J, ultimately rejected the MEC's prescription claim. It then considered the question of costs. Yacoob J stressed that the government had a decision whether to raise prescription or not that had to be properly exercised in light of constitutional values, particularly the right to social security:

> There is an inevitable and, in my view, moral choice to be made in relation to whether a debtor should plead prescription particularly when the debt is due and owing. The Legislature has wisely left that choice to the debtor. For it is the debtor who would face the commercial, community and other consequences of that choice.
>
> A decision by the State whether or not to invoke prescription in a particular case must be informed by the values of our Constitution. It follows that the Provincial Government too, must take a decision whether to plead prescription to defeat a claim for arrear disability grant payments. This is not a decision for the State Attorney to make. It is an important decision and must not be made lightly. It must be made after appropriate processes have been followed and by a sufficiently responsible person in the Provincial Government who must take into account all the relevant circumstances. It is the duty of the State to facilitate

[1] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4 ('Njongi').

[2] Ibid at para 61.

[3] Ibid.

rather than obstruct access to social security. This will be a fundamental consideration in making the assessment.[1]

Yacoob J described the provincial government's decision to raise prescription to avoid paying Mrs Njongi the grants she was owed as a 'cynical position devoid of all humanity'.[2] For reasons he does not explain,[3] however, he concluded that there was not sufficient evidence to justify an award de bonis propriis. All was not lost. The state's heartless attitude toward Mrs Njongi prompted Yacoob J to order the state to pay Mrs Njongi's costs in all courts on an attorney and client scale. Although the Court does not say so, it seems likely that the reason they could not make a de bonis propriis order was because the lines of authority were so muddied that no individual or group of individuals could be identified as responsible for this particularly egregious behaviour. The state officials did an excellent job of obscuring the facts of the matter — thereby masking their own culpability and that of other parties to the malfeasance.

6.6 Taxation of Costs

Up to now, this chapter has outlined the principles that govern what costs order a court should make. In this penultimate section, I look at the more technical part of costs orders: how they will be taxed. 'Taxing' is the process parties engage in to determine the precise amount that is owing based on the Court's costs decision.

Rule 22 of the Constitutional Court Rules, 2003 provides that:

(1) Rules 17 and 18 of the Supreme Court of Appeal Rules regarding taxation and attorneys' fees shall apply, with such modifications as may be necessary.
(2) In the event of oral and written argument, a fee for written argument may in appropriate circumstances be allowed as a separate item.

Rule 22 is functionally equivalent to Rule 21 in the 1998 Rules.

The power of the Constitutional Court in a review proceeding of the taxing master's exercise of her powers is identical to the power of the Supreme Court of Appeal acting under its Rule 17.[4] Although the Constitutional Court's approach to the award of costs might differ to the approach of other courts, the Court — in President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Gauteng Lions Rugby Union & Another — pointed out that 'there is nothing inherent in the distinction between the respective areas of competence of the two courts to indicate that there should be any difference between their respective powers and duties to control their functionaries in the performance of their official duties.'[5] The Court further concluded that no reason exists to depart from the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal 'on the actual details of costs or their taxation' and, in particular, 'with regard to the taxation of bills of costs by its taxing master.'[6]

[1] Njongi (supra) at paras 78-79.
[2] Ibid at para 90.
[3] Ibid at para 63.
[4] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Gauteng Lions Rugby Union 2002 (2) SA 64 (CC), 2002 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2001] ZACC 5 ('Gauteng Lions') at para 10.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at para 11.

The primary questions for a court facing a challenge to the taxing master's award are: (a) what principles should the taxing master follow? and (b) under what circumstances is the court entitled to interfere? The Gauteng Lions Court, drawing from the experience of the Supreme Court of Appeal (and the approach of its taxing master),[1] set out the principles it would follow. These principles were succinctly summarised in Hennie De Beer Game Lodge CC v Waterbok Bosveld Plaas CC & Another:

> (a) Costs are awarded to a successful party to indemnify it for the expense to which it has been put through having been unjustly compelled either to initiate or defend litigation.
> (b) A moderating balance must be struck which affords the innocent party adequate indemnification, but within reasonable bounds.
> (c) The Taxing Master must strike this equitable balance correctly in the light of all the circumstances of the case.
> (d) An overall balance between the interests of the parties should be maintained.
> (e) The Taxing Master should be guided by the general precept that the fees allowed constitute reasonable remuneration for necessary work properly done.
> (f) And the Court will not interfere with a ruling made by the Taxing Master merely because its view differs from his or hers, but only when it is satisfied that the Taxing Master's view differs so materially from its own that it should be held to vitiate the ruling.[2]

This summary provides a clear explication of the Court's approach to costs orders involving the taxing master. However, some of these points require amplification.

First, where members of the Court are better equipped to deal with matters having a bearing on costs, they are more likely to review the decision of the taxing master. For example, whereas determinations as to the quantum of fees fall within the area of expertise of the taxing master, other areas, such as 'where a point as to admissibility of a segment of evidence is determined by the court and subsequently bears materially on costs items in dispute', may best be determined by the Court.[3]

Second, the practice of advocates to 'book the time actually spent in the preparation of a case and charge an hourly or daily rate for such time' is only one consideration in the overall assessment of reasonable costs. Indeed, the practice of billing on a 'rate-per-time' basis may encourage slow and inefficient work and

[1] Gauteng Lions (supra) at para 12.

[2] [2010] ZACC 1 ('Hennie De Beer') at para 8, summarising Gauteng Lions (supra) at paras 15-16 and 45. This approach to review was established, albeit in a different context, by Innes CJ in Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Co. v Johannesburg Town Council 1903 TS 111. It was first applied to review of decisions of the taxing master in Ocean Commodities Inc & Others v Standard Bank of SA Ltd & Others 1984 (3) SA 15 (A) 18. See also JD van Niekerk en Genote Ing v Administrateur, Transvaal 1994 (1) SA 595 (A).

[3] Gauteng Lions (supra) at para 14. See also Hennie De Beer (supra) at para 10 ('The Supreme Court of Appeal has taken note of "the almost invariable practice throughout the country nowadays for legal practitioners to make their charges time-related". The principle flowing from this is that time charged is not decisive. An objective assessment of the features of the case is primary, and time actually spent in preparing an appeal cannot be decisive in determining the reasonableness, between party and party, of a fee for that work. The reason is that time alone would put a premium on slow and inefficient work and would conduce to the charging of fees wholly out of proportion to the value of services rendered.') conduce to 'the charging of fees that are wholly out of proportion to the value of the services rendered'.[1] Moreover, allowing counsel to charge on a rate-per-time basis also encourages over-lengthy written submissions. The Court in Gauteng Lions wrote that a rate-per-time basis is not only unfair to the litigants saddled with the costs, but 'places an additional burden on all who have to study the resultant verbosity'.[2] In Hennie De Beer, for example, respondent's counsel had charged 61 hours for preparing an affidavit opposing leave to appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal. The taxing master approved the request. The applicant objected that, considering the same counsel had been involved in the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal, 61 hours was excessive. The Constitutional Court agreed. 'It is difficult to conceive', the Court wrote, 'how a competent professional acquainted with the issues, as counsel would have been in this case, could require more [than 20 hours] for this task.'[3]

Third, on a related note, although the details of the determination of costs is left to the taxing master, the one role the court generally plays is determining how many counsel were appropriate. Constitutional Court matters are generally complex and will ordinarily require the services of two counsel. However, there is a limit to the number of counsel a litigant may engage. In Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others, the applicants engaged six counsel.[4] Considering the complexity of the issues, the Court awarded them the costs of three counsel. However, the Court interfered with the High Court's decision to award them the costs of five counsel. '[I]t is hard to conceive', Ngcobo CJ held 'of any basis on which a more generous award could have been justified in the High Court. It seems to me that awarding the costs of five counsel was excessive and unjustified.'[5] Although acknowledging the discretion that should be afforded to trial judges to craft appropriate costs orders, the Chief Justice felt that, in this matter, 'the High Court gave markedly over-generous weight to the complexity of the issues in the case, and to the research the case required. The award therefore failed to reflect fairly the position as between the parties, and consequently imposed an undue burden on the respondents.'[6]

Fourth, the primary consideration is not the hours spent, but always whether the fees charged are 'reasonable'. More generally, the Gauteng Lions Court stated that when it comes to party and party costs

> [o]ne is not primarily determining what are proper fees for counsel to charge their client for the work they did. That is mainly an attorney and client issue and when dealing with a party and party situation it is only the first step. When taxing a party and party bill of costs the object of the exercise is to ascertain how much the other side should contribute to the reasonable fees the winning party has paid or has to pay on her or his own side. Or, to put

[1] Gauteng Lions (supra) at paras 27-28 and 46.
[2] Ibid at para 46.
[3] Hennie De Beer (supra) at para 14.
[4] [2010] ZACC 10 ('Tongoane').
[5] Ibid at para 130.
[6] Ibid at para 131.

it differently, how much of the client's disbursement in respect of her or his own counsel's fees would it be fair to make recoverable from the other side?[1]

Lastly, the one material difference between the calculation process in the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court relates to the preparation of heads of argument. The Supreme Court of Appeal emphasizes the presentation of oral argument. Indeed, the rules of the Supreme Court of Appeal specifically provide that heads of argument are meant only to constitute succinct outlines of the arguments to be advanced at the hearing. The Constitutional Court, however, places far greater emphasis on written submissions. Rule 22(2) of the Constitutional Court Rules specifically provides that a fee for written argument may be allowed as a separate item. In the Supreme Court of Appeal, the practice is to award counsel a significant first-day fee. That fee encompasses remuneration for work done in preparation for the hearing. While it is appropriate for the taxing master to allow separate remuneration for the preparation of written submissions in the Constitutional Court, taxing masters in the Constitutional Court do not award a 'heavy first-day fee'.[2] As the Constitutional Court has observed: 'That would condone cumulative debiting and result in excessive fees being allowed.'[3]

6.7 Clarifying the Meaning of Costs Awards

Although costs awards are generally simple, it is possible — as the decision in Chonco III illustrates — from them to create confusion.[4] Chonco III concerned a dispute about whether the Constitutional Court's costs award required the government to pay the costs in the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. Although the order explicitly indicated that the government should pay the costs in the Supreme Court of Appeal, it did not mention the High Court. However, the text of the judgment made it clear that the government should pay costs in the High Court as well. Khampepe J relied on the Court's powers under Rule 29 of its rules — which incorporates Rule 42 of the High Court rules[5] — to alter the order to properly reflect the intention in the judgment.

---

[1] Gauteng Lions (supra) at para 47. See also Hennie De Beer (supra) at para 15.

[2] Gauteng Lions (supra) at paras 44-45.

[3] Ibid at para 45.

[4] Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development v Chonco & Others 2010 (7) BCLR 629 (CC), [2010] ZACC 9 ('Chonco III').

[5] Rule 42 reads:

(1) The court may, in addition to any other powers it may have, mero motu or upon the application of any party affected, rescind or vary:
   (a) An order or judgment erroneously sought or erroneously granted in the absence of any party affected thereby;
   (b) an order or judgment in which there is an ambiguity, or a patent error or omission, but only to the extent of such ambiguity, error or omission;
   (c) an order or judgment granted as the result of a mistake common to the parties.

(2) Any party desiring any relief under this rule shall make application therefor upon notice to all parties whose interests may be affected by any variation sought.

(3) The court shall not make any order rescinding or varying any order or judgment unless satisfied that all parties whose interests may be affected have notice of the order proposed.

7 Standing, Ripeness and Mootness

Cheryl Loots

7.1 Introduction 7–1
7.2 Standing 7–1
(a) The concept of standing 7–1
(b) Standing in South African law before 1994 7–2
(c) Standing under the Final Constitution 7–3
(i) Anyone acting in their own interest 7–4
(ii) Anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name 7–6
(iii) Anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons 7–7
(iv) Anyone acting in the public interest 7–11
(v) An association acting in the interest of its members 7–12
(d) The wider effect of FC s 38 7–13
7.3 Ripeness 7–14
(a) The concept of ripeness 7–14
(b) Ripeness in South African law before 1994 7–15
(c) Ripeness under the Final Constitution 7–16
(i) Ripeness qua premature action 7–17
(ii) Failure to exhaust other remedies 7–17
(iii) Matters that can be resolved without reaching the constitutional issues 7–18
7.4 Mootness 7–18
(a) The concept of mootness 7–18
(b) Mootness in South African law before 1994 7–20
(c) Mootness under the Final Constitution 7–20
7.5 Delineating the doctrines of standing, ripeness and mootness. 7–23

7.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter deals with three issues that may present a barrier to adjudication of the merits of a dispute: standing, mootness and ripeness. These issues, which all concern the procedural justiciability of a claim, need to be distinguished from various other issues that go to substantive justiciability.

Whereas procedural justiciability concerns the identity of the person bringing the claim and the timing of the claim, substantive justiciability concerns the subject matter of the claim, and whether it is competent for the courts to decide claims of that sort. There are some issues that are not appropriately decided by the courts at all: For example, whether a foreign state should be recognized or not. Such decisions are clearly the prerogative of the executive, and their justiciability is typically dealt with in terms of a political question doctrine, or some other doctrine falling under the more general doctrine of separation of powers.[1]

In the case of procedural justiciability, by contrast, the merits of the dispute are appropriate for resolution by the court, but there is an alleged procedural barrier to those merits being heard. Such procedural barriers include: whether the plaintiff has standing to claim the relief; whether the dispute is ripe for resolution; and whether the dispute has been resolved and the issue is therefore moot.

In general, the requirement of procedural justiciability is based upon the principle that it is not the function of the courts to determine academic or hypothetical issues. This is a principle to which our courts still adhere.[2] However, where it is in the public interest that an issue be decided, there is an increasing trend towards regarding such issues as non-academic and, accordingly, justiciable.[3]

7.2 STANDING

(a) The concept of standing

The concept of standing is concerned with whether a person who approaches the court is a proper party to present the matter in issue to the court for adjudication.[4] The word 'standing' has been referred to as 'a metaphor used to designate a

[1] See Ngxuza v Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government 2001 (2) SA 609, 626G–H (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E). Froneman J wrote: 'The nature and extent of a Court's assessment of the justiciability of a constitutional issue is, I think, intimately related to the extent to which it judges that those issues can adequately and better be dealt with by other democratic means.' Froneman J expressed the opinion that the position in South Africa is very different from the position in the United States of America because our Bill of Rights specifically recognizes socio-economic rights. Ibid at 625I–626B.

[2] See Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei & Others 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) at para 7; Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at paras 164–165.

[3] Port Elizabeth Municipality v Prut NO & Another 1996 (4) SA 318, 325E–F (E), 1996 (9) BCLR 1240 (E); Ferreira (supra) at para 164; Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others 2001 (4) SA 396, 422C–424I (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 915 (T).

[4] Adolf Homburger 'Private Suits in the Public Interest in the United States of America' (1974) 23 Buffalo LR 343, 388.

proper party to a court action.'[1] An inquiry into standing should thus focus on the party who brings the matter before the court, not on the issues to be adjudicated.[2] Doctrines of standing have assumed increasing importance in public law because often the party who brings a public-law issue before the court does so, not for personal gain, but out of a sense of conviction that public authorities — or some other non-state actor — should not be allowed to act unlawfully. Such 'ideological plaintiffs' or 'non-Hohfeldian plaintiffs' claim relief in the public interest or in the interest of a section of the public whose rights have, allegedly, been adversely affected by the wrong complained of.[3]

(b) Standing in South African law before 1994

Before the introduction of the Interim Constitution in 1994 South African courts adopted a restrictive attitude towards the issue of standing. They required a person who approached the court for relief both to have a personal interest in the matter and to have been adversely affected by the wrong alleged.[4] A plaintiff or applicant could not approach a court on the basis that the defendant or respondent was doing something contrary to the law and that the public interest demanded that the court grant appropriate relief.[5] A plaintiff or applicant who lacked a personal interest would have no 'locus standi', or 'standing', to be before the court.

Wood & Others v Ondangwa Tribal Authority & Another constitutes a notable exception to this general rule.[6] In Wood, the Appellate Division allowed church leaders to seek an interdict in the interest of a large, vaguely defined group of persons who feared that they would be illegally arrested, tried and subjected to summary punishment on account of their political affiliations. The court took into account that it would be impractical to expect the people under threat, many of [1] Marla E Mansfield 'Standing and Ripeness Revisited: The Supreme Court's Hypothetical Barriers' (1992) 68 North Dakota LR 1, 6, citing Steven L Winter 'The Metaphor of Standing and the Problem of Self-Governance' (1988) 40 Stanford LR 1371.

[2] Gene R Nichol Jr 'Rethinking Standing' (1984) 72 California LR 68, 85.

[3] Louis L Jaffe 'The Citizen as Litigant in Public Actions: The Non-Hohfeldian or Ideological Plaintiff' (1968) 116 University of Pensylvania LR 1033. Hohfeld postulated a plaintiff who would be seeking a determination that he had a right, a privilege, an immunity or a power. See Wesley N Hohfeld 'Some Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning' (1913) 23 Yale LJ 16.

[4] Bagnall v The Colonial Government (1907) 24 SC 470 ('Bagnall'); Patz v Greene & Co 1907 TS 427, 433–435 ('Patz'); Director of Education v McCagie & Others 1918 AD 616, 621–2, 631 ('McCagie'); Cabinet for the Transitional Government for the Territory of South West Africa v Eins 1988 (3) SA 369, 389I (A)('Cabinet for the Transitional Government'); Shifidi v Administrator-General for South West Africa & Others 1989 (4) SA 631, 637 D-F (SWA)('Shifidi'); Milani & another v South African Medical and Dental Council & another 1990 (1) SA 899, 902D–903G (T); Waks en Andere v Jacobs en 'n Ander 1990 (1) SA 913, 917B–919C (T); Natal Fresh Produce Growers' Association & Others v Agroserve (Pty) Ltd & Others 1990 (4) SA 749, 758G–759D (N). As to what constitutes sufficient interest, see Jacobs en 'n Ander v Waks en Andere 1992 (1) SA 521 (A); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 1115 (SCA), 1998 (6) BCLR 671 (SCA).

[5] Bagnall (supra) at 470; Patz (supra) at 433; Dalrymple & others v Colonial Treasurer 1910 TS 372, 386; McCagie (supra) at 621, 627; Roodepoort-Maraisburg Town Council v Eastern Properties (Pty) Ltd 1933 AD 87, 101; Von Molkte v Costa Areosa (Pty) Ltd 1975 (1) SA 255, 259A–C (C); Wood & Others v Ondangwa Tribal Authority & another 1975 (2) SA 294, 310F (A); Cabinet for the Transitional Government (supra) at 387I–389A.

[6] 1975 (2) SA 294 (A)('Wood').

whom were tribesmen living far from the seat of the court, to approach the court themselves. This decision could have been used by the courts as precedent to justify the relaxation of the traditional rule against representative standing. Instead, the Appellate Division limited its application to matters involving violations of life, liberty or physical integrity.[1]

(c) Standing under the Final Constitution

FC s 38 provides:

> Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief,[2] including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are —
> (a) anyone acting in their own interest;
> (b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name;
> (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons;
> (d) anyone acting in the public interest; and > (e) an association acting in the interest of its members.[3]

These provisions alter radically the common-law rules of standing and the courts have accepted that such a generous approach to standing is appropriate

[1] Christian League of Southern Africa v Rall 1981 (2) SA 821, 826–7 (O); Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ihaati-Islam Lahore (South Africa) & Another v Muslim Judicial Council (Cape) & Others 1983 (4) SA 855, 864E–F (C); National Education Crisis Committee v State President of the Republic of South Africa Case No 16736/86 (Unreported, 9 September 1986, Witwatersrand Local Division) as discussed in Cheryl Loots 'Keeping Locus Standi in Chains' (1987) 3 SAJHR 66, 69; National Union of Mineworkers v Free State Consolidated Gold Mines (Operations) Ltd 1989 (1) SA 409, 413–4 (O)(Misrepresents Wood as relaxing standing only for the purpose of the actio de libero homine exhibendo.) See also Marievale Consolidated Mines Ltd v President of the Industrial Court & Others 1986 (2) SA 485, 492A (T)(Counsel requested the court to apply the Wood doctrine, but the court found it unnecessary to do so as it held that the applicant had standing on other grounds.)

[2] As to what constitutes appropriate relief, see Jonathan Klaaren, Matthew Chaskalson & Steven Budlender 'Judicial Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 9. See also Gerber v Voorsitter: Komitee oor Amnestie van die Kommissie vir Waarheid en Versoening 1998 (2) SA 599 (T) (Court held that, in applying FC s 38, the nature of the remedy is not important.)

[3] IC s 7(4) contained similar provisions and read as follows:

(a) When an infringement of or threat to any right entrenched in this Chapter is alleged, any person referred to in paragraph (b) shall be entitled to apply to a competent court of law for appropriate relief, which may include a declaration of rights.

(b) The relief referred to in paragraph (a) may be sought by —
  (i) a person acting in his or her own interest;
  (ii) an association acting in the interest of its members;
  (iii) a person acting on behalf of another person who is not in a position to seek such relief in his or her own name;
  (iv) a person acting as a member of or in the interest of a group or class of persons; or
  (v) a person acting in the public interest.'

for the purpose of the enforcement of the fundamental rights found in Chapter 2.[1] The Constitutional Court issued an early directive to this effect in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others.[2] In Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others, Southwood J extended the reasoning in Ferreira to support of the proposition that FC s 38 confers practically unlimited locus standi in judicio and that no limit is placed on the manner in which persons may approach the court.[3] The Constitutional Court has not yet endorsed Southwood J's conclusions. In Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality, the Constitutional Court stated that there is, presently, no clarity as to the outer reaches of FC ss 38*(a)–(e)*.[4]

(i) Anyone acting in their own interest

This provision appears to reflect the common-law rule that relief may be claimed by a person acting in his or her own interest. However, in Van Huyssteen v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism Farlam J held that the term 'interest' was 'wide enough' to include the interest of a trustee in maintaining the value of a property. The court seemed to assume that the interest referred to in FC s 38*(a)* could be broader than that interest referred to at common law.[5]

In Ferreira v Levin NO & Others Ackermann J took the view that the interest referred to in the corresponding provision of the Interim Constitution — IC s 7(4) — must relate to the vindication of a constitutional right of the applicant and not of some other person.[6] A majority of the court disagreed. Chaskalson P found that although the person must act in his or her own interest, that person did not need to be the person whose constitutional right had been infringed.[7] While it remained for the Constitutional Court to decide what constituted a 'sufficient interest', Chalkalson P wrote that the Court would would adopt a broad approach to the question of standing: 'This would be consistent with the mandate given to [the] Court to uphold the Constitution and would serve to ensure that constitutional rights enjoy the full measure of the protection to which they are entitled.'[8]

[1] Beukes v Krugersdorp Transitional Local Council & Another 1996 (3) SA 467, 474B–J (W); McCarthy & Others v Constantia Property Owners' Association & Others 1999 (4) SA 847, 855B–F (C); Dawood and Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (1) SA 997, 1028J–1030B (C); Coetzee v Comitis & Others 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C) at paras 17.1–18.4.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 165.

[3] 2001 (4) SA 396, 232G–I (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 995 (T)('Van Rooyen').

[4] 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 15.

[5] 1996 (1) SA 283, 301G–H (C), 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C). See also Ferreira (supra) at para 165 (Chaskalson P); Bafokeng Tribe v Impala Platinum Ltd & Others 1999 (3) SA 517, 549E–551A (B), 1998 (11) BCLR 1373 (B); and National and Overseas Modular Construction (Pty) Ltd v Tender Board, Free State Provincial Government & Another 1999 (1) SA 701, 704A–E (O).

[6] Ferreira (supra) at para 38. Ibid at para 226 (O'Regan J, dissenting, rejects Ackermann J's narrow construction.)

[7] Ibid at paras 163–8.

[8] Ibid at para 165. See also Van Rooyen (supra) at 422D–424I.

Port Elizabeth Municipality v Prut NO & Another illustrates the proposition that the interest referred to need not relate to a constitutional right of the applicant, but may relate to a constitutional right of some other person.[1] The applicant municipality sought an order declaring that its differential treatment of white ratepayers black ratepayers in terms of the Black Local Authorities Act did not constitute unfair discrimination. The court held that the municipality had an interest in obtaining a declaratory order as to whether its conduct infringed the rights of the ratepayers.[2]

These dicta make it clear that a party can litigate in his, her or its own interest even where it is not that party's constitutional right that has been infringed. This principle was relied upon by the court in a matter in which the foreign homosexual partners of South African citizens challenged a statute that infringed the constitutional rights of their South African partners.[3] Relying on the objective theory of unconstitutionality, the court held that 'a litigant who has standing may properly rely on the objective unconstitutionality of a statute for the relief sought, even though the right unconstitutionally infringed is not that of the litigant in question but of some other person.'[4]

Several recent cases evince this relationship between a broad approach to standing and the objective theory of unconstitutionality. In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others the court held that an applicant who had been charged, and might be convicted, in terms of a statutory provision had a direct interest in challenging the validity of that provision.[5] In National and Overseas Modular Construction (Pty) Ltd v Tender Board, Free State Provincial Government, & Another, an unsuccessful tenderer established that it had had a sufficient interest to apply for the review of the decision awarding the tender in terms of the constitutional right to just administrative action.[6] In Eisenberg & Associates v Minister of Home Affairs a firm of attorneys which practised exclusively in the field of immigration law was deemed to possess locus standi to apply for a declaration of invalidity in respect of Regulations that allegedly did not comply with the notice and comment provisions of s 7 of the Immigration Act.[7]

[1] 1996 (4) SA 318 (E), 1996 (9) BCLR 1240 (E).

[2] Ibid at 324H–325J.

[3] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC).

[4] Ibid at para 29.

[5] 2002 (6) SA 370 (W).

[6] 1999 (1) SA 701 (O). Cf Vulindlela Furniture Manufacturers (Pty) Ltd v MEC, Department of Education and Culture, Eastern Cape, & Others 1998 (4) SA 908 (TK)(Held that the applicant did not have locus standi to compel the provincial government to insist on fulfilment of the terms and conditions of a contract by fellow successful tenderers.)

[7] 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC) at para 28.

(ii) Anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name.

This provision makes the decision in Wood v Ondangwa Tribal Authority applicable to the enforcement of all the rights guaranteed in Chapter 2. The Wood doctrine is no longer limited to situations in which life and liberty are endangered. The applicant is, however, still obliged to spell out why the person whose rights are affected is not able to approach the court personally and must allege that the person would have done so had he or she been in a position to do so.[1]

In Wood, the court determined that it would be impractical for all the people who feared that their rights would be infringed to approach the court themselves, particularly when they were resident about 800 kilometres from the seat of the court and lived in an environment in which legal assistance was not easily procured.[2] The facts of Wood support the conclusion that standing should be allowed under FC s 38*(b)* where the party affected fears that she may be victimized by launching an action in her own name.[3]

Some courts tend to confuse the provisions of FC s 38*(b)* and FC s 38*(c)*. In a number of cases in which the applicant clearly acted in the interest of a group or class of persons, the courts nevertheless considered whether the individual members of that group or class of persons were unable to act in their own names. In Maluleke v MEC, Health and Welfare, Northern Province Southwood J, referring to FC s 38*(b)*, concluded that the applicant did not have locus standi because there was no evidence that the persons on behalf of whom the applicant claimed the relief could not act in their own names.[4] With respect, the Judge erred. In view of the fact that the applicant was acting in the interests of 'some 92 000 beneficiaries', the applicable section was FC s 38*(c). FC s 38(c)* is not constrained by a requirement that the members of the group or class not be able to act in their own names.

That the domain of cases covered by FC s 38*(b)* overlaps with the domain of cases covered by FC s 38*(c)* is born out by Highveldridge Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council & Others.[5] In Highveldridge Residents, the applicant association instituted proceedings on behalf of the residents of a township, in the public interest and in the interest of its members. The Highveldridge Residents court held that the association had also established locus standi in terms of FC s 38*(b)*, since it was evident that the people affected by the alleged unlawful action were indigent and therefore unable individually to pursue their claims.[6]

[1] See Wood (supra) at 311G.
[2] Ibid at 313C–D.
[3] Jacques R De Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (2003) 424; Geoff Budlender 'The Accessibility of Administrative Justice' in T W Bennet & Hugh Corder Administrative Law Reform (1993) 128, 131.
[4] 1999 (4) SA 367, 374A–C (T)('Maluleke').
[5] 2002 (6) SA 66 (T), 2003 (1) BCLR 72 (T)('Highveldridge Residents').
[6] Ibid at para 27.

(iii) Anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons

This subsection introduces the class action into South African law. The essence of a class action, or representative action as it is known in many countries, is that one person may bring an action in the interest of a class of persons all having the same cause of action.[1] In other jurisdictions the representative plaintiff must be a member of the class. She must share the same cause of action and she must have the same interest as the other members of the class.[2] The use of the words 'acting as a member of or in the interest of' in FC s 38*(c)*, however, makes it clear that the representative plaintiff may be an ideological plaintiff and is not required to be pursuing an 'own interest'. Indeed, the courts have gone so far as to hold that a government authority may claim relief in the interest of members of the public whose rights are being infringed. In Minister of Health and Welfare v Woodcarb (Pty) Ltd & Another, the court held that the Minister of Health and Welfare could seek an interdict to prevent continued pollution of the atmosphere on the grounds that the pollution impaired the right of members of the public under IC s 29 to 'an environment not detrimental to health or well-being.'[3]

In other jurisdictions, a judgment in a class action is generally binding on the members of the class.[4] A public interest action, which seeks to benefit the group in whose interest it is brought, is not binding on the members of the class.[5] The concept of an action being binding upon persons not party to the action, in the sense that it will be res judicata against them, is foreign to South African lawyers.[6] It is important to realize that where such a class action fails on the merits, members of the class will be prevented from taking the same issue to court themselves. For this reason due process requires that class members be given notice of the action and have the opportunity to exclude themselves from the [1] Representative actions have their origin in the seventeenth-century English Courts of Chancery. The Courts of Chancery developed a representative action to allow a single person to bring or to defend an action on behalf of all persons with a common interest. See Adolf Homburger 'State Class Actions and the Federal Rules' (1971) 71 Columbia LR 609–11; Stephen C Yeazell From Medieval Group Litigation to the Modern Class Action (1987) 132.

[2] In the United States, Rule 23*(a)* of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that '[o]ne or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all.' The Ontario Class Proceedings Act provides in s 2(1) that '[o]ne or more members of a class of persons may commence a proceeding in court on behalf of the members of the class.' The Quebec Civil Code also refers to a member instituting a class action in article 1002.

[3] 1996 (3) SA 155 (N). See also Bafokeng Tribe v Impala Platinum Ltd & Others 1999 (3) SA 517 (B), 1998 (11) BCLR 1373 (B)(Friedman J held that a tribe could rely on FC s 38*(c)* to sue in the interest of its members.)

[4] The application of the res judicata principle to class actions was examined in detail by the Ontario Law Reform Commission in its Report on Class Actions (1982)('Ontario LRC Report on Class Actions') 753–70.

[5] See Adolf Homberger 'Private Suits in the Public Interest in the United States of America' (1974) 23 Buffalo LR 243, 288.

[6] The representative action of English law, which was the predecessor of the modern class action, was received into other Anglo-American legal systems, but not into South African law. The reason is that it was a procedure of courts of equity and the law of equity never became part of South African law.

class if they could be prejudiced by a decision given in the matter.[1] If a judgment is to have a binding effect on the members of the class, the court should consider whether notice to the class members is necessary and what type of notice is appropriate. Notice requirements will, some day, be regulated by legislation.[2] In many instances, say where there is a successful outcome in a challenge to legislation, notice is not particularly critical: the protection of rights will be achieved by a public interest action and the benefits automatically accrue to the group or class of persons in whose interest the action is brought. Where the action is of this nature, notice need not be given to the members of the group or class since an adverse judgment on the merits will not bar them from approaching the court on the same issue.[3]

Some early attempts to utilize the class action provision of the Interim Constitution failed.[4] It was, however, successfully invoked in Beukes v Krugersdorp Transitional Local Council & Another. In Beukes a white ratepayer raised a constitutional challenge to the levying by local authorities of 'flat rate' charges in black townships in contrast with higher 'user-based' charges levied in formerly white areas.[5] The applicant brought the application in his own interest and as a member of or in the interest of a group or class of persons — 'literally thousands' of other ratepayers within the jurisdiction of the Transitional Local Council. The names, addresses, telephone numbers and signatures of 120 of the persons on whose behalf the applicant purported to act were listed on a form appended to the application and contained the authorization of the signatories for the applicant to act on their behalf. The respondent objected to the procedure adopted on the grounds, inter alia, that none of the persons listed had deposed to an application in support of the application and that the group had not been accurately defined. In an enlightened judgment, Cameron J, adopting the broad approach to standing advocated by Chaskalson P in Ferreira v Levin & Others,[6] held that it would run counter to the spirit and purport of the Interim Constitution to require that persons, who identify themselves as members of a group or class as a member of whom and in whose interest a litigant acts, should be obliged to reiterate with formalistic precision the complaint with which they associate themselves, or to require that they attest to their status or that they put in affidavits joining in the litigation.[7]

[1] See Ontario LRC Report on Class Actions (supra) at 467–518 (Comprehensive analysis of notice requirements.)

[2] See South African Law Reform Commission Report on the Recognition of Class Actions and Public Interest Actions in South African Law (1998) Project 88 ('SALC Report on Class Actions').

[3] The operation of stare decisis will, however, deter repeated attempts to litigate the same issues.

[4] See Matiso v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Another 1994 (3) SA 899 (E), 1994 (3) BCLR 80 (E); Lifestyle Amusement Centre (Pty) Ltd & Others v The Minister of Justice & Others 1995 (1) BCLR 104 (C).

[5] 1996 (3) SA 467 (W)('Beukes').

[6] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 165.

[7] Beukes (supra) at 474G–I. See also City of Cape Town v Unlawful Occupiers, Erf 1800, Capricorn (Vrygrond Development) & Others 2003 (6) SA 140, 149H–J (C), 2003 (8) BCLR 878 (C).

Not all judgments demonstrate such discernment. In Maluleke v MEC, Health and Welfare, Northern Province, Southwood J held that an applicant seeking an order setting aside the decision of a welfare authority suspending payment of her own pension — and payment of the pensions of some 92 000 other beneficiaries — could succeed only with regard to her own pension. He reasoned that, under FC s 38*(c)*, the applicant must allege that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened and that it was difficult to imagine how the suspension of payment of pensions could be an infringement of a right in the Bill of Rights. This decision was severely criticized[1] and subsequently overruled by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[2]

In a similar matter, Ngxuza v Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government, it was held that the applicants did have standing to bring an application of behalf of a large number of persons whose social welfare grants had been cancelled by welfare authorities without compliance with the requirements of procedural fairness.[3] Froneman J had no doubt that the suspension of the payment of social benefits without affording the beneficiaries a hearing was an infringement of the constitutional right to just administrative action and that a class action was therefore competent in terms of FC s 38*(c)*.[4] The learned judge explained the importance of social context in this type of matter and offered a number of solutions to some of the procedural problems presented by class action litigation in the absence of a well-developed set of court rules. He suggested that leave must be sought from the court to proceed on a representative basis before actually embarking on that road.[5] The Ngxuza I court made an order granting the applicants leave to pursue a class action and ordered the respondent to provide information concerning the members of the class to the applicant. This order provides a useful departure point for those initiating class actions.[6]

The respondent in Ngxuza I took the decision to grant the applicants leave to institute a class action on appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal. Cameron JA, writing for the appeal court, delivered a scathing attack on the strategies employed by the welfare authority to try to avoid being held accountable for its unlawful action. Ngxuza II held that the circumstances of the case — 'unlawful conduct by a party against a disparate body of claimants lacking access to individualised legal services, with small claims unsuitable for, if not impractical of, enforcement in isolation — should have led to the conclusion, in short order, that the applicants' assertion of authority to institute class action proceedings was unassailable.'[7] The

[1] Clive Plasket 'Standing Welfare Rights and Administrative Justice: Maluleke v MEC Health and Welfare Northern Province' (2000) 117 SALJ 652.

[2] Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government v Ngxuza 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA)('Ngxuza II') at para 19.

[3] 2001 (2) SA 609 (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E)('Ngxusa I').

[4] Ibid at 622F–J.

[5] Ibid at 624D–J.

[6] Ibid at 629I–631D.

[7] Ngxusa II (supra) at paras 14–15.

Court held that the quintessential requirements for a class action were satisfied in that the class was so numerous that joinder of all its members was impracticable and that there were questions of law and fact common to the class. It also found that the applicants, through their legal representatives, the Legal Resources Centre, would fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.[1] On the issue of territorial jurisdiction, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the Final Constitution requires adjustment of rules relating to the jurisdiction of courts along sensible and practical lines to ensure the efficacy of the class action mechanism.[2]

The decisions in Ngxuza I and II go a long way towards providing guidelines on the circumstances in which a class action is appropriate and the procedures which should be followed. Class action rules would further facilitate this kind of litigation. In August 1998 the South African Law Commission published a report on its research into class actions and public interest actions and recommended the enactment of both enabling legislation and court rules.[3] Unfortunately, neither an act nor court rules has been forthcoming. An act would extend the power of the courts to hear class actions beyond claims for enforcement of constitutional rights. While no act is necessary for the enforcement of constitutional rights, because FC s 38 provides the courts with clear authority to entertain class actions, court rules would provide procedural guidelines both for litigants and the courts. Such rules are particularly necessary because while Magistrates' Courts are given jurisdiction to hear class actions in terms of the Promotion of Access to Information Act[4] ('PAIA'), the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act[5] ('PAJA'), and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[6] ('PEPUDA'), they do not have the inherent jurisdiction to develop rules of procedure. South Africa's neighbour Zimbabwe has enacted such class action legislation.[7]

In developing class actions, South African courts have drawn on the practice and the experience of this type of litigation in other countries.[8] The complexities of class actions are explored in the Working Paper that preceded the Law Commission's Report.[9] An excellent comparative overview of class actions is to be found in the Ontario Law Reform Commission's Report on Class Actions.

[1] Ngxusa II (supra) at para 16.
[2] Ibid at paras 20–7.
[3] SALC Report on Class Actions (supra) at 1.
[4] Act 2 of 2000.
[5] Act 3 of 2000
[6] Act 4 of 2000.
[7] See Petho v Minister of Home Affairs, Zimbabwe, & Another 2003 (3) SA 131 (ZS).
[8] See Ngxuza II (supra) at fn 5.
[9] South African Law Commission The Recognition of a Class Action in South African Law Working Paper 57 (1995).

(iv) Anyone acting in the public interest

The provision in FC s 38*(d)* that 'anyone acting in the public interest' may approach a competent court for relief is, potentially, the most far-reaching of the five grounds on which standing may be granted to persons seeking to enforce the rights guaranteed in Chapter 2. On its face, this provision appears to introduce an unrestricted public interest action. The actual extent to which standing is unrestricted in terms of this clause, of course, will depend upon the way in which the courts interpret the words 'in the public interest'. Our courts would do well to follow the generous approach adopted by the Supreme Court of India. It regards any constitutional challenge to legislation or governmental action to be in the public interest, and on this basis allows any citizen to bring such a matter before the court.[1] A similarly liberal rule of standing in constitutional matters has been developed by the Canadian Supreme Court. It has held that a person who is not directly affected by legislation may challenge it, provided that there is a serious issue to be tried in which that person has a genuine interest as a citizen, and there is no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue may be brought before the court.[2] Given that both of these liberal rules of standing have been developed in the absence of a provision equivalent to FC s 38*(d)*, it would be anomalous were South African courts to adopt a more restrictive interpretation.

In Ferreira v Levin NO & Others, O'Regan J was the only justice to reach the issue of locus standi to claim relief in the public interest. She identified IC s 7(4)(v) (which is virtually identical to FC s 38*(d)*) as 'the provision in which the expansion of the ordinary rules of standing is most obvious',[3] and said that the Court should require an applicant 'to show that he or she is genuinely acting in the public interest'. She elaborated on this requirement as follows:

> Factors relevant to determining whether a person is genuinely acting in the public interest will include considerations such as: whether there is another reasonable and effective manner in which the challenge can be brought; the nature of the relief sought, and the extent to which it is of general and prospective application; and the range of persons or groups who may be directly or indirectly affected by any order made by the Court and the opportunity that those persons or groups have had to present evidence and argument to the Court.[4]

In Port Elizabeth Municipality v Prut NO & Another, the Eastern Cape High Court held that a municipality was acting in the public interest, as well as in its own interest, by requesting an order declaring that its differential treatment of ratepayers did not constitute unfair discrimination within the meaning of IC s 8(2). Referring to the broad approach to standing adopted by Chaskalson P in Ferreira v Levin,[5] Melunsky J held that a court should be slow to refuse to exercise

[1] See Cheryl Loots 'Standing to Enforce Fundamental Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 49, 50 ('Standing').
[2] Minister of Justice of Canada v Borowski 130 DLR (3d) 588, [1981] 2 SCR 575. See Loots 'Standing' (supra) at 55 (Discussion of this and other Canadian cases on standing.)
[3] Ferreira (supra) at para 233.
[4] Ibid at para 234.
[5] Ibid at paras 164–165.

its jurisdiction in terms of IC s 7(4) where a decision would be in the public interest and where it may put an end to similar disputes.[1]

In Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others, a magistrate and the Association of Regional Magistrates of South Africa were held by the High Court to have locus standi in terms of FC s 38*(d)* to attack the validity of legislation which they contended undermined the independence of the magistrates' courts guaranteed by the Final Constitution.[2] Southwood J held that it was clearly in the public interest that the issue of the independence of the courts should be addressed and resolved.[3]

(v) An association acting in the interest of its members

The provision in FC s 38*(e)* that an association acting in the interest of its members may seek relief is important because, before 1994, there were a number of cases in which the courts had not allowed associations to claim such relief.[4] In South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others, FC s 38*(e)* was applied in granting the applicant association locus standi to challenge the constitutionality of search and seizure provisions that threatened to infringe the constitutional rights of its members.[5]

While FC s 38*(e)* clearly enables an association to act as a representative of its members, in two cases it has been relied upon by courts to deal with a challenge to the capacity of an unincorporated association to litigate in its own name. In Highveldridge Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council & Others — in which the applicant association sought relief in the interests of the residents of a township — the association's locus standi was challenged on the basis that, as an unincorporated association which did not have the attributes of a universitas, it did not have the capacity to sue.[6] The court held that the Final Constitution's expanded standing provisions indicated that the common-law restrictions on the standing of voluntary associations could not apply without qualification to associations seeking redress for alleged infringements of fundamental rights. This decision gives effect to the directive in FC s 39(2) that, in

[1] Port Elizabeth (supra) at 325E–F.

[2] 2001 (4) SA 396, 424H (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 995 (T).

[3] This matter went on to the Constitutional Court for confirmation of the declaration of invalidity and on appeal, but locus standi was not in issue before the Constitutional Court. See Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others (General Council of the Bar Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC).

[4] Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ihaati-Islam Lahore (South Africa) & Another v Muslim Judicial Council (Cape) & Others 1983 (4) SA 855, 864E–F (C); South African Optometric Association v Frames Distributors (Pty) Ltd 1985 (3) SA 100, 103F–105C (O); Natal Fresh Produce Growers' Association & Others v Agroserve (Pty) Ltd & Others 1990 (4) SA 749, 758G–759D (N).

[5] 2000 (10) BCLR 1131 (T). Locus standi was not in issue when this matter subsequently came before the Constitutional Court. See South African Asssociation of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC).

[6] 2002 (6) SA 66 (T), 2003 (1) BCLR 72 (T)('Highveldridge').

developing the common law, courts must promote the spirit, purport and objectives of the Bill of Rights.[1] A similar approach to the capacity of a voluntary association to claim relief in the interests of a vulnerable constituency was adopted in Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others (No 1). The Rail Commuter Court held that 'to restrict voluntary associations in the way that they are restricted by common-law requirements would be contrary to the ideal of a vibrant and thriving civil society which actively participates in the evolvement and development of a rights culture pursuant to the rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights.'[2] While this liberal attitude is a welcome indication of the commitment of the courts to the promotion of access to justice and the development of the common law, these findings were not strictly speaking necessary since Uniform Rule 14 permits such an association the procedural convenience of litigating in its own name.

(d) The wider effect of FC s 38

It is important to note that the extended standing provisions of FC s 38 apply only with regard to actions claiming relief in respect of the infringement of a right entrenched in Chapter 2. In all other matters the common-law rules of standing continue to apply. Over time, the common-law rules should be liberalized in view of the FC s 39(2) requirement that courts should have due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights in the interpretation of any legislation and the development of the common law or customary law. This has already begun to happen. In Wildlife Society of Southern African & Others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism of the Republic of South Africa & Others, Pickering J adopted an extremely expansive approach to standing, expressing the opinion that, even at common law, an environmental conservation association should have locus standi to apply for an order compelling the state to enforce a conservation statute.[3]

In contrast to the decision in Wildlife Society, an extremely restrictive approach to the right of an association to represent the interests of its members was adopted by Pickering J in Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa v Minister for Local Government, Eastern Cape, & Others.[4] The applicant association applied for

[1] The argument considered by the court in paragraph 26 of the judgment is, with respect, without any merit and exhibits a great deal of conceptual confusion. Counsel submitted that if the court found that the association had no capacity to sue, then its members would still constitute a 'group of people' who would have standing in terms of FC s 38*(c). FC s 38(c)* does not give standing to a group of people – it gives standing to an applicant who represents the interests of a group of people.

[2] 2003 (5) SA 518, 556 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288, 318–9 (C)('Rail Commuter') quoting Highveldridge (supra) at para 24.

[3] 1996 (3) SA 1095 (Tk) 1996 (9) BCLR 1221 (Tk)('Wildlife Society').

[4] 1996 (2) SA 898 (Tk)('Congress of Traditional Leaders'). It is interesting to compare the restrictive approach to locus standi in this matter with the expansive approach to locus standi adopted by the same judge in Wildlife Society of Southern. See § 7.2*(c)*(iii) infra.

an order declaring certain legislation relating to local government unconstitutional and therefore invalid. The court held that the applicant's essential complaint was that the legislation deprived traditional leaders of powers, derived from earlier legislation, that were, in some sense, entrenched in substantive provisions of the Interim Constitution.[1] Despite the fact that the application involved a constitutional issue, the court held that the association did not have locus standi to represent the interests of the traditional leaders because there was no claim based upon an alleged infringement of the Bill of Rights, and the Bill's standing provisions therefore did not apply. While it is correct that the constitutional standing provisions apply only in respect of infringements of the Bill of Rights, it is submitted that the court should have followed the line of cases in which courts have allowed associations to represent their members.[2]

The development of the common law in the direction of a more liberalized notion of standing is apparent from the decisions in Highveldridge Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council & Others and Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others (No 1). In these cases it was held that the restrictive common-law attitude to the capacity of unincorporated voluntary associations to sue was not appropriate when such associations sought to enforce the specific provisions of and general values manifest in the Bill of Rights.[3] In both cases the courts referred to FC s 38 in support of the decision to liberalize the common-law rules.

7.3 RIPENESS

(a) The concept of ripeness

The doctrine of ripeness prevents a party from approaching a court before that party has been subject to prejudice, or the real threat of prejudice, as a result of the legislation or conduct challenged.

This doctrine is well developed in American law.[4] The United States Supreme

[1] Congress of Traditional Leaders (supra) at 902A–C.
[2] See § 7.2*(c)(v)* supra.
[3] See § 7.2*(c)(v)* supra.
[4] See Lawrence H Tribe American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 1988) 77–82; United Public Workers v Mitchell (1947) 330 US 75 (an example of the application of the doctrine of ripeness in a matter in which federal employees challenging a statute which banned them from being involved in political activities were denied relief because they had not yet violated the statute). See also Laird v Tatum (1972) 408 US 1. (The same principle applies where an administrative practice, programme or policy is challenged as being unconstitutional. Anti-war activists who challenged a programme of surveillance of civilians by the United States Army were refused declaratory and injunctive relief because they had not yet suffered any injury in consequence of the surveillance and could assert no more than a fear that the army might someday misuse the information gathered to their detriment. In a dissenting judgment, Justice Douglas said that a person in the position of the applicants (respondents in the appeal) should not have to wait until he loses his job or until his reputation is defamed before he is entitled to sue because that would in effect immunize from judicial scrutiny the alleged unconstitutional conduct.)

Court has held that the rationale behind the ripeness requirement is to enable courts to avoid becoming entangled in abstract disagreements with other branches of government.[1] It has also described the ripeness inquiry as a 'threshold' determination designed to measure whether the 'actual controversy' requirement of Article III of the US Constitution has been met.[2] In deciding whether to apply the doctrine as a bar to consideration of the merits of a case the courts have taken into account 'the hardship to the parties of withholding court consideration.'[3]

(b) Ripeness in South African law before 1994

The doctrine of ripeness was employed by South African courts as long ago as 1906 in African Political Organization and the British Indian Association v Johannesburg Municipality.[4] The plaintiffs sought an order declaring ultra vires a regulation in terms of which persons of colour were prohibited from traveling on the municipal tramway service. The court dismissed the application on the grounds that there was no allegation that any of the persons represented by the plaintiff associations had been refused access to the tramcars operated by the respondent. The inequity which results from the application of the doctrine in circumstances such as this is that people aggrieved by the legislation are required first to break the law or subject themselves to the indignity of being refused access to the facility concerned before the court will allow them to challenge the validity of the legislation.

Not all South African courts adopted this attitude. In Transvaal Coal Owners Association v Board of Control Gregorowski J reasoned as follows:

> It is perfectly true that usually the court does not solve hypothetical problems and abstract questions and declaratory actions cannot be brought unless the rights in question in such action have actually been infringed. But this is quite a different matter. Here the applicants are condemned to do certain things or to abstain from doing certain things which otherwise they are at perfect liberty to do or to abstain from doing. If they contravene the order they are liable to fine and imprisonment. If the order is invalid their right and freedom of action are infringed, and it is not at all convincing to say you must first contravene the order and render yourself liable to fine and imprisonment, and then only can you test the validity of the order, and have it decided whether you are liable to the penalty or not.[5]

The courts in Gool v Minister of Justice[6] and Afdelingsraad van Swartland v Administrateur, Kaap reached similar conclusions.[7] Baxter suggests that the criterion by which ripeness is to be measured is whether prejudice has already resulted or is inevitable, irrespective of whether the action is complete or not.[8]

---

[1] Abbott Laboratories v Gardner 387 US 136, 148 (1967)('Abbot Laboratories').
[2] See Gene R Nichol Jr 'Ripeness and the Constitution' (1987) 54 University of Chicago LR 153, 163.
[3] Pacific Gas & Electric Co v State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Commission 461 US 190, 201 (1983), quoting Abbott Laboratories (supra) at 149.
[4] 1906 TS 962. See also Rossouw v Minister of Mines and Minister of Justice 1928 TPD 741, 747.
[5] 1921 TPD 447, 452.
[6] 1955 (2) SA 682 (C).
[7] 1983 (3) SA 469 (C).
[8] Lawrence Baxter Administrative Law (1984) 720.

In Cabinet of the Transitional Government for the Territory of South West Africa v Eins, the Appellate Division ostensibly refused consideration on the merits because the applicant lacked locus standi. In fact it applied the doctrine of ripeness.[1] Eins applied for an order declaring legislation invalid in terms of the South West Africa Constitution Act 39 of 1968. The legislation at issue was an Act passed by the Legislative Assembly, which authorized the Transitional Cabinet to prohibit certain persons from being within the territory or order them to be removed from the territory if it had reason to believe that such persons endangered, or were likely to endanger, the security of the territory or its inhabitants or the maintenance of public order, or that such persons engendered, or were likely to engender, a feeling of hostility between members of the different population groups of the territory.[2] The persons who could be prohibited or removed in terms of this legislation were persons who were not born in the territory and were not rendering service in the defence force or employed by the government.[3] Eins alleged that he was one of thousands of people who were permanent residents of South West Africa, but who were not born in the territory and could, therefore, be prohibited from being in the territory or be removed from the territory in terms of the Act. It was submitted that the Act deprived Eins, and obviously others in his position, of the fundamental right to reside in South West Africa — which was guaranteed by the Constitution — and supplanted such right with a licence revocable at the discretion of the Cabinet of the Transitional Government of South West Africa.[4] The court of first instance declared the Act to be unconstitutional, invalid and unenforceable for want of compliance with the Bill of Fundamental Rights incorporated in the South West Africa Legislative and Executive Authority Establishment Proclamation[5] and enacted in terms of s 38 of the South West Africa Constitution Act.[6] On appeal, the Appellate Division refused to consider the merits of the application. It held that Eins had no locus standi to claim the relief because there was no evidence that any action had been taken against him, or that the Cabinet intended to take any action against him in terms of the Act. Cabinet of the Transitional Government offers a classic example of the blurring of the doctrines of standing and ripeness.[7]

(c) Ripeness under the Final Constitution

Ripeness is usually said to be at issue when the person bringing the action has not yet been affected by the unlawfulness of which he complains. The term may also, however, be used where alternative remedies have not been exhausted, or an issue can be resolved without recourse to the Final Constitution.

[1] 1988 (3) SA 369 (A)('Cabinet of the Transitional Government').
[2] Residence of Certain Persons in South West Africa Regulation Act 33 of 1985, s 9 ('Residence Act').
[3] Residence Act, s 9(1)(a).
[4] Cabinet of the Transitional Government (supra) at 386G–I.
[5] R101 of 1985.
[6] Act 39 of 1968.
[7] See Cheryl Loots 'Standing to Enforce Fundamental Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 49.

(i) Ripeness qua premature action

Ripeness qua premature action was first dealt with by the Constitutional Court in Ferreira v Levin NO & Others. The applicants challenged the examination process in s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act as an infringement of their fair trial rights. The section obliged them to give potentially incriminating answers that could be used in a future criminal proceeding. A minority of the Ferreira Court was of the view that the challenge was too hypothetical to be heard under IC s 7(4)(b)(i) because there was no evidence that the applicants were likely to face criminal charges.[1] However, for the majority of the Ferreira Court, ripeness was not an issue because the applicants were faced with an immediate demand to give potentially incriminating answers to the examiner's questions, and they faced imprisonment if they refused to provide these answers. The applicants could not, in those circumstances, be expected to expose themselves to prosecution under the statute before they were afforded an opportunity to challenge its constitutionality.[2]

Ripeness could have been raised in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others. The applicants, who sought to have an immigration law declared invalid, had never applied for an immigration permit under the impugned provision and had therefore not had action taken against them.[3] The state's argument on ripeness was, however, put in the form of an allegation that if the applicants had made the application, they may have been granted the permit, and this would have resolved the matter without resort to a constitutional challenge.[4]

The wording of both FC s 38 and IC s 7(4) indicate that the drafters intended that procedural barriers should not stand in the way of courts deciding constitutional issues. Where there is a real threat of a constitutional irregularity, a court should be prepared to hear the matter at the instance of any plaintiff who brings the issue before it. In Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government v Ngxuza, Cameron JA expressed disapproval of the conduct of the respondent, who had raised 'every stratagem and device and obstruction, every legal argument and non-argument that it thought lay to hand' including contradictory arguments as to ripeness and mootness.[5]

(ii) Failure to exhaust other remedies

Many constitutional claims involve judicial review of administrative action. The common-law principle that before claiming judicial review a party should first [1] Ferreira (supra) at para 41 (Ackermann J), at paras 199 and 205 (Kriegler J), and at paras 231–232 (O'Regan J). O'Regan J nevertheless found that the public interest in determining the constitutionality of the section rendered the issue ripe for hearing and afforded the applicants standing under IC s 7(4)(b)(v). Ibid at paras 233–237.

[2] Ibid at paras 162–164.

[3] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE II') at paras 21–26.

[4] See § 7.3*(c)*(iii) infra.

[5] 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA) at para 14.

exhaust internal remedies[1] is now been embodied in s 7(2)(a) of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA').[2] Where a party who claims judicial review of an administrative action has failed to exhaust internal remedies, the point may be taken that the matter is not ripe for hearing. At common law, a court had the discretion as to whether to uphold such an argument.[3] Section 7(2)(c) of PAJA now provides that a court or tribunal may 'in exceptional circumstances' exempt a person from the obligation to exhaust internal remedies if this is deemed to be 'in the interests of justice'.[4]

(iii) Matters that can be resolved without reaching the constitutional issues

In NCGLE II, the Constitutional Court held that '[t]he concept of ripeness also embraces the general principle that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.'[5] This principle was first enunciated by Kentridge AJ in S v Mhlungu & Others.[6] In Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei, the Court added the corollary that only where a compelling reason to do so exists should a court deviate from this principle.[7] If a putative constitutional issue is deemed not to be ripe, then the lack of ripeness applies only to the constitutional issue, not to the case as a whole.

7.4 Mootness

(a) The concept of mootness

While the 'ripeness' doctrine is concerned with cases that are brought too early, the 'mootness' doctrine is relevant to cases that are brought or heard too late because the issues underlying the dispute have, in some way, been resolved. A case is moot and therefore not justiciable if it no longer presents an existing or live controversy or the prejudice, or threat of prejudice, to the plaintiff no longer exists. Part of what underlies this doctrine is the notion that the courts should

[1] See Baxter (supra) at 720; Yvonne Burns Administrative Law under the 1996 Constitution (2nd Edition, 2003) 290; Jacques De Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (2003) 464; Cora Hoexter The New Constitutional and Administrative Law (2002) 303; Marius Wiechers Administrative Law (translated by Gretchen Carpenter)(1985) 270.

[2] Act 3 of 2000.

[3] See Baxter (supra) at 720; Burns (supra) at 290; De Ville (supra) at 464; Hoexter (supra) at 303; Wiechers (supra) at 270.

[4] See Hoexter (supra) at 304–305; Iain Currie & Jonathan Klaaren The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act Benchbook (2002) 182–183.

[5] NCGLE II (supra) at para 21. See Johan de Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 66–70.

[6] 1995 (3) SA 867, 895E (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59.

[7] 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) at para 4. See also S v Bequinot 1997 (2) SA 887 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1588 (CC) at paras 12–3; and S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC)('Dlamini') at para 27.

avoid giving advisory opinions on abstract propositions of law.[1]

A classic example of mootness in American jurisprudence is DeFunis v Odegaard.[2] DeFunis was denied admission as a first-year law student at the University of Washington Law School. He challenged this decision, contending that the procedures and criteria employed by the Law School Admission Committee discriminated against him on account of his race in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court granted a mandatory injunction commanding the law school to admit him. It did. On appeal this judgment was reversed by the Washington Supreme Court. DeFunis then petitioned the United States Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. The writ resulted in a stay of the judgment of the Washington Supreme Court pending the final disposition of the case. By the time the matter came before the United States Supreme Court, DeFunis had registered for his final quarter in law school. The Supreme Court held that it could not, consistent with the case and controversy requirement of Article III, consider the substantive constitutional issues raised by the parties because DeFunis would complete his law school studies regardless of the decision of the court. Justice Brennan, in dissent, highlighted the unfortunate effect of a finding of mootness on a matter that engages issues of public interest:

> The constitutional issues which are avoided today concern vast numbers of people, organizations, and colleges and universities, as evidenced by the filing of twenty-six amicus curiae briefs. Few constitutional questions in recent history have stirred as much debate, and they will not disappear. They must inevitably return to the federal courts and ultimately again to this court.

In certain circumstances, American courts have exercised their discretion to decide a case seemingly moot where the result of refusing to decide the issues would create a situation 'capable of repetition, yet evading review'.[3] In Roe v Wade, a pregnant woman's class action challenging the constitutionality of state anti-abortion statutes reached the Supreme Court only post partum.[4] The Roe Court observed that '[p]regnancy often comes more than once to the same woman, and in the general population, if man is to survive, it will always be with us.'[5] The Roe Court also took into account that the term of pregnancy is shorter than the period of gestation required for a matter to work its way up to the United States Supreme Court; review would never be possible if the court were to insist upon the plaintiff still being pregnant.

In Minister of Justice of Canada v Borowski, a challenge to anti-abortion legislation was disposed of on the basis that it had become moot.[6] The plaintiff's standing

[1] NCGLE II (supra) at para 21 fn 18.
[2] (1974) 416 US 312.
[3] See Tribe American Constitutional Law (supra) at 84.
[4] 410 US 113 (1973).
[5] Ibid at 125.
[6] (1981) 130 DLR (3rd) 588, [1981] 2 SCR 575('Borowski').

to bring suit had initially been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada and the case had proceeded to its merits. But, after the case had been decided by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, and leave had been granted to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, all of the abortion provisions of the relevant Criminal Code were struck down in another matter.[1] Nevertheless, the claimant, Mr Borowski, wanted to continue his proceedings on the basis that non-therapeutic abortions as well as therapeutic abortions were now permitted. The Supreme Court of Canada refused to hear the matter. It held that there was no longer a live controversy to resolve because the conditions that gave rise to Mr Borowski's appeal had disappeared.

In the very same year, the Canadian Supreme Court exercised its discretion to decide another abortion case despite the fact that it had become moot. In Tremblay v Daigle, the plaintiff relied on the constitutional right to life of a foetus to claim an injunction against his girlfriend to restrain her from having an abortion.[2] By the time the case was argued, the defendant had had the abortion. The Tremblay Court denied the request for an injunction. It exercised its discretion to decide the case because it believed that it was important to remove the threat of such injunctive proceedings in the interest of other pregnant women. Hogg indicates that the Canadian Supreme Court has more often than not exercised its discretion to decide issues that have become moot where it is persuaded that there is a serious legal question to be decided and that the question, despite its mootness, would be properly argued on both sides.[3]

(b) Mootness in South African law before 1994

The doctrine of mootness does not appear to have been applied in South African law prior to the advent of the Interim Constitution.[4] One explanation for this may be that even where an issue had become moot, the court usually decided the merits for the purpose of determining which party was to pay the costs.

(c) Mootness under the Final Constitution

The Constitutional Court has held that mootness will be a possible bar to relief 'in the absence of any remaining triable issue.'[5] Mootness is particularly likely to be a bar to relief where the constitutional issue is not merely moot as between the parties but is also moot relative to society at large, and no considerations of compelling public interest require the court to reach a decision.[6] Where it

[1] R v Morgentaler (No 2) (1988) 44 DLR (4th) 385, [1988] 1 SCR 30.
[2] (1989) 62 DLR (4th) 634, [1989] 2 SCR 530.
[3] Peter W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, 1992) § 56.3*(c)*.
[4] The principle that the court will not decide academic issues which will not have binding effect on the parties is, however, well established in South African law. See Masuku & Another v State President & Others 1994 (4) SA 374, 380I (T) applying Ex parte Nell 1963 (1) SA 754, 760B–C (A).
[5] Dlamini (supra) at paras 27 and 32.
[6] See President of the Ordinary Court Martial NO v Freedom of Expression Institute 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC)('FXI').

is in the public interest that the constitutionality of legislation should be determined, an argument that the matter is moot is less likely to succeed.[1] Where there are conflicting High Court decisions, the need to resolve the conflict may persuade the Supreme Court of Appeal or Constitutional Court to hear the matter.[2]

In 1997, s 21A was introduced into the Supreme Court Act to give the Supreme Court of Appeal or any High Court sitting as a court of appeal the discretion to dismiss an appeal if the circumstances are such that the order it might give will have no practical effect or results.[3] In Premier, Provinsie Mmpumulanga en 'n Ander v Groblerdalse Stadsraad Olivier JA held that the effect of this section was to eliminate the use of such vague concepts of 'abstract', 'academic' or 'hypothetical' as criteria for the exercise of the power of a court of appeal not to hear an appeal.[4] Instead, the court held, s 21A imposes a positive test: Will the judgment or order have a practical effect or result? In Western Cape Education Department & Another v George, Howie JA assumed, without deciding, that the practical effect or result referred to in s 21A is not restricted to the position inter partes, but that it was wide enough to include a practical effect or result in some other respect, such as a matter of wide public interest or urgency, or to resolve conflicting High Court decisions.[5]

There is no provision similar to s 21A of the Supreme Court Act applicable to the Constitutional Court. However, in President of the Ordinary Court Martial NO v Freedom of Expression Institute, the Constitutional Court held that it had the discretion to exercise its power in terms of FC s 172(2) to confirm an order of another court declaring legislation to be invalid when the matter in issue had become moot. In exercising its discretion, the FXI Court stated that it would consider whether any order it may make would have any practical effect, either on the parties or on others.[6] This rule has been held to be equally applicable to appeals to the Constitutional Court.[7]

In Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality, the Court held that its discretion must be exercised according to the interests of justice and that relevant factors may include the practical effect that any possible order may have, the importance of the issue, its complexity, and the fullness or otherwise of the argument advanced.[8] The Langeberg Court made it clear, however, that the fact that it had exercised its discretion in favour of hearing one moot argument did not mean that it would be obliged to reach a finding with respect to other moot issues.[9]

---

[1] See S v Manamela 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC).

[2] See Western Cape Education Department & Another v George 1998 (3) SA 77, 84D–E (SCA)('George').

[3] Act 59 of 1959. The amendment was enacted in 1993, but came into operation only on 14 February 1997.

[4] 1998 (2) SA 1136, 114D–F (SCA).

[5] George (supra) at 83E–F and 84D–E.

[6] FXI (supra) at para 16. In FXI and in Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry NNO & Another, the Constitutional Court declined to confirm the order of invalidity of a statutory provision on the ground that the issue had become moot. 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC).

[7] Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('Langeberg') at para 9.

[8] Ibid at para 11.

[9] Ibid.

The first case in which the Constitutional Court refused to hear a matter on the ground that the issue had become moot was J T Publishing (Pty) Ltd & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others.[1] In J T Publishing, the Court declined on appeal to make an order declaring the Publications Act[2] and the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act[3] unconstitutional because, after the application had been dismissed in the Supreme Court (now the High Court), legislation was tabled to repeal the two impugned laws. By the time the Constitutional Court gave its judgment on appeal this legislation had been passed by Parliament as the Films and Publications Act[4] — although it had not yet been brought into effect by the President. The Constitutional Court refused to grant the order sought by the applicant, because, as Didcott J wrote:

> [T]here can hardly be a clearer instance of issues that are wholly academic, of issues exciting no interest but an historical one, than those on which our ruling is wanted have now become. The repeal of the Publications Act has disposed altogether of the question pertaining to that. And any aspect of the one about the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act which our previous decision on it did not answer finally has been foreclosed by its repeal in turn. I therefore conclude that we should decline at this stage to grant a declaratory order on either topic.[5]

It is interesting to note that IC s 102(8) specifically provided that if any division of the Supreme Court disposed of a matter in which a constitutional issue had been raised and such court was of the opinion that the constitutional issue was of such public importance that a ruling should be given thereon, it could, notwithstanding the fact that the matter had been disposed of,[6] refer such issue to the Constitutional Court for decision. This provision highlighted the distinction between mootness as to parties and mootness relative to society at large. Where a decision on an issue had implications for the public or members thereof, the Constitutional Court could decide the issue despite the fact that it was moot with regard to the parties. There is no similar provision in the Final Constitution.

[1] 1997 (3) SA 514 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1599 (CC)('JT Publishing').
[2] Act 42 of 1974.
[3] Act 37 of 1967.
[4] Act 65 of 1996.
[5] J T Publishing (supra) at para 17. The case illustrates the dangers of concluding prematurely that a matter has become moot. The decision of the Constitutional Court was handed down on 21 November 1996. In January 1998, the Films and Publications Act had still not been brought into operation. Thus the 'moribund and futureless provisions' which the Constitutional Court chose not to declare invalid continued to authorize unconstitutional censorship for more than a year after the Court had decided that their validity was a moot issue.
[6] As to the meaning of the expression 'disposes of a matter', see Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another. 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at paras 26–28.

7.5 Delineating the Doctrines of Standing, Ripeness and Mootness

It seems clear that the standing doctrine should be concerned with which person may raise a particular issue, whereas the ripeness and mootness doctrines are concerned with when issues may be raised. However, the dividing lines between the doctrines are often fuzzy. In a decision that turns on ripeness or mootness, the court will often hold that the plaintiff has no standing.[1] In City of Los Angeles v Lyons, a plaintiff who had been choked to unconsciousness by an officer of the Los Angeles Police Department sought an injunction against the police department's alleged practice of applying unnecessary and life-threatening chokeholds.[2] The Lyons Court held that the plaintiff lacked the standing to request such relief. It has been suggested that the effect of this decision is that the standing doctrine has displaced the more flexible doctrine of mootness as the preferred hurdle in litigation predicated on past injuries.[3] The doctrine of mootness is more flexible because a court retains the discretion to hear a case which is moot, a finding that the plaintiff does not have standing will be an absolute bar to the matter being heard.

The fact that FC s 38 virtually precludes any opportunity for a court to refuse to hear a matter on the grounds that the plaintiff does not have standing may be advanced as a reason for retaining the doctrines of ripeness and mootness. However, while there is undoubtedly great advantage to be had in the retention of all three doctrines in their most flexible form, the courts should never exercise their discretion against hearing a matter if there is any public benefit to be derived from a decision being made.

[1] Cabinet of the Transitional Government for the Territory of South West Africa v Eins 1988 (3) SA 369 (A) (Discussed at § 7.2*(a)* supra).

[2] 461 US 95 (1983).

[3] Richard H Fallon Jr 'Of Justiciability, Remedies, and Public Law Litigation: Notes on the Jurisprudence of Lyons' (1984) 59 New York University LR 1, 6. See also Gene R Nichol 'Ripeness and the Constitution' (1987) 54 University of Chicago LR 153, 172.

8 Amicus Curiae

Geoff Budlender

8.1 Introduction 8–1
(a) Traditional conceptions of the amicus curiae 8–1
(b) Amicus curiae in the new constitutional order 8–1
(c) Amicus curiae contrasted with an intervening party. 8–4
8.2 Parameters of the role of the amicus. 8–5
8.3 Amicus curiae in the Constitutional Court 8–6
(a) Constitutional Court rule 10. 8–6
(b) The mechanism for admission 8–7
(c) Procedure for applying for admission as an amicus curiae 8–8
(d) Content of the application for admission. 8–9
(e) Court's discretion as to whether to admit an amicus curiae 8–9
(f) Submission of argument by an amicus curiae. 8–10
(g) New factual material and evidence 8–11
8.4 Amicus curiae in other courts. 8–12
(a) Supreme Court of Appeal 8–12
(b) Labour Appeal Court 8–13
(c) High Court. 8–14
(d) Land Claims Court 8–15
(e) Labour Court 8–16
8.5 Costs 8–16

8.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) Traditional conceptions of the amicus curiae

The term amicus curiae can have a wide variety of meanings.[1] Traditionally, the most common form of amicus curiae is a person who appears at the request of the court to represent an unrepresented party or interest.[2] The task of such an amicus is to present the best possible case for the unrepresented party or interest. In such cases, the role of the amicus does not differ in principle from that of the paid legal representative of a party. A second form of amicus responds to a request by a court for counsel to appear before it to provide assistance in developing answers to novel questions of law which arise in a matter, or (less commonly) where a person asks leave to intervene for this purpose. In such cases, the amicus curiae does not, ostensibly, represent a particular interest or point of view. A third common type of amicus curiae takes the form of the Law Society or Bar Council's intervention in an application for the admission of a legal practitioner. The professional body makes submissions to the court not to represent the interests of the professional body's members, but to assist and to advise the court in promoting the interests of the administration of justice.

(b) Amicus curiae in the new constitutional order

The new constitutional order introduced a fourth form of amicus curiae: a non-party requests the right to intervene so that it might advance a particular legal position which it has itself chosen.[3] This form of amicus was not permitted under the common law.[4] This new form of amicus curiae reflects two important changes brought about by our new constitutional democratic order. First, it reflects the underlying theme of participatory democracy in the Final Constitution. In matters of broad public interest, such as the interpretation of the Final Constitution, courts are more disposed towards listening to the voices of persons other than the parties to a particular dispute. Secondly, it reflects the fact that constitutional litigation often affects a range of people and interests that go well beyond those of the parties already before the court.

Courts in many jurisdictions have adopted special procedures for the intervention of non-parties (sometimes referred to as third-party interventions) in litigation of this kind.[5] The comments of Lieven and Kilroy with regard to the Human

[1] For a discussion of different types of amicus curiae, see HG Erasmus Superior Court Practice (1994) C4-19–C4-20; Christina Murray 'Litigating in the Public Interest: Intervention and the Amicus Curiae' (1994) 10 SAJHR 240, 241–43.

[2] See, eg, The Merak S: Sea Melody Enterprises SA v Bulktrans (Europe) Corporation 2002 (4) SA 273 (SCA).

[3] Unlike the first two traditional forms of amicus curiae, the amicus is the intervening non-party, not the legal practitioner who appears before the court on its behalf.

[4] Connock's (SA) Motor Co Ltd v Pretorius 1939 TPD 355, 356-57.

[5] For an overview of the position in various countries, see Nathalie Lieven & Charlotte Kilroy 'Access to the Court under the Human Rights Act: Standing, Third Party Intervenors and Legal Assistance' in Jeffrey Jowell & Jonathan Cooper (eds) Delivering Human Rights: How the Human Rights Act is Working (2003) 115.

Rights Act in the United Kingdom apply with equal force to constitutional litigation in South Africa:

> The Public Law Project in their report on third party interventions point out that judicial review cases increasingly raise fundamental social, moral and economic issues and require competing rights and interests to be finely balanced or difficult policy questions to be addressed. Often such cases raise issues of more general significance beyond the interests of parties to the litigation. PLP observe that the advent of the HRA [Human Rights Act] only strengthens the need for specialist information. Not only are previously untested issues of fundamental and competing rights now coming before the courts which must be decided within complex social context, but in addition the courts are now required to apply the doctrine of proportionality when determining whether any interference with qualified rights is justified, and in doing so may need to weigh the impact upon other groups who are not represented by the litigants. The notion that the issues are merely between the parties will often not be correct.[1]

The response of the Constitutional Court in Ferreira v Levin reflects Lieven and Kilroy's' contention that courts must be aware of the impact of constitutional litigation on parties not already before the court.[2] In Ferreira – a matter that addressed various constitutional questions arising from the provisions of the Companies Act[3] which deal with examinations conducted during the winding up of a company – the Court invited and accepted written memoranda from the Association of Law Societies, the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board, the South African Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Association of Insolvency Practitioners of South Africa.[4] The Court's rationale for these invitations was that the outcome of the case potentially affected very many non-parties.

This chapter is almost exclusively concerned with this new or fourth form of amicus curiae. Constitutional Court rule 10 describes this form of amicus as a person that is 'interested in any matter before the Court' and which chooses at its own initiative to seek to intervene in the proceedings. This form of amicus is also contemplated in the rules of other courts.[5]

Rule 10(6) makes it clear that to qualify as an amicus, the person must be 'interested' in the proceedings. That interest must be described in the application for admission. The rule also requires that the would-be amicus identify the 'position' which it will adopt in the proceedings. The amicus curiae is, therefore, by definition not a disinterested party. The amicus curiae in constitutional litigation under Constitutional Court rule 10 — or equivalent rules in other courts — is similar to an amicus curiae in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the US Supreme Court, an 'amicus brief' is 'filed by someone not a party to the case but

[1] Lieven & Kilroy (supra) at 129.

[2] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 441 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 4. See also Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 15-16.

[3] Act 61 of 1973.

[4] Ferreira (supra) at para 4.

[5] See § 8.4 infra.

interested in the legal doctrine to be developed there because of the relevance of that doctrine for their own preferred policy or later litigation'.[1]

Despite this express recognition of the amicus as an interested party, traditional conceptions of the amicus curiae as a friend of the court, whose primary task is to assist the court rather than to put forward a particular point of view, persist in the jurisprudence.[2] In Hoffmann v South African Airways the Constitutional Court offered the following account of the role of the amicus curiae:

> An amicus curiae assists the Court by furnishing information or argument regarding questions of law or fact. An amicus is not a party to litigation, but believes that the Court's decision may affect its interest. The amicus differs from an intervening party, who has a direct interest in the outcome of the litigation and is therefore permitted to participate as a party to the matter. An amicus joins proceedings, as its name suggests, as a friend of the Court. It is unlike a party to litigation who is forced into the litigation and thus compelled to incur costs. It joins in the proceedings to assist the Court because of its expertise on or interest in the matter before the Court. It chooses the side it wishes to join unless requested by the Court to urge a particular position.[3]

This description, with all due respect, rather confuses matters. To assert that an amicus joins proceedings 'as a friend of the Court … to assist the Court' is to perpetuate a fiction which is derived from the more traditional forms of amicus, and of course from the term amicus curiae itself. In truth, an amicus under rule 10 intervenes in the proceedings because it has an interest of its own which it wishes to promote. Under rule 10, it not only chooses its own position but is, in fact, required by rule 10(6) to identify that position in its application for admission.

A party or a person requested by the Court to argue a particular position, to represent an unrepresented party or interest, or to advise the court is not an amicus curiae in terms of rule 10. Such a person is not required to follow the rule 10 procedures, such as requesting the parties to consent to its participation as an amicus curiae, and making application to the Court in that regard.[4] The request comes from the Court, and the person concerned is an amicus in the traditional sense. The terms of participation are determined by the invitation or request made by the Court.

A clear example of this distinction emerged in the very first case argued in the Constitutional Court, S v Makwanyane.[5] In Makwanyane, the Court requested that the Johannesburg Bar Council appoint counsel to represent the unrepresented

[1] Kermit L Hall (ed) 'Amicus Brief' The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States (1992) as quoted by Murray (supra) at 244.

[2] See In Re Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission [2002] UKHL 25 at para 24 (Lord Slynn emphasized the distinction between a conventional amicus curiae, who takes a non-partisan approach to the case, and a third party intervenor who advocates a particular position.) See also Sarah Hannett 'Third Party Intervention: In the Public Interest?' [2003] Public Law 128.

[3] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffmann') at para 63.

[4] Erasmus (supra) at C4-20.

[5] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) ('Makwanyane').

accused. In his judgment, Chaskalson P referred to counsel who performed this role as acting pro amico.[1] He did not describe them as amici curiae. By contrast, a number of 'rule 10-type'[2] amici curiae made written submissions. Several of these amici sought and received permission to submit oral argument. They were the Black Advocates Forum, Lawyers for Human Rights, the Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa, and a private individual who was a campaigner for the retention of the death penalty. The South African Police Service submitted an 'amicus brief', but did not make oral submissions.

(c) Amicus curiae contrasted with an intervening party

The passage from Hoffmann quoted above draws attention to the important distinction between an amicus curiae, which is 'interested' in the proceedings but has no right to participate in them, and an intervening party, which has a 'direct interest' and may intervene as a matter of right in the ordinary manner. Every party which has a 'direct interest' in the proceedings will be 'interested' in the proceedings; but it does not follow that every party which is 'interested' has a 'direct interest'. In logical terms, those who have a direct interest are a subset of those who are interested.

It is, therefore, possible for a person to seek to intervene on two alternative bases: that it has a direct interest and should therefore be admitted as of right; or that it is 'interested' and should be admitted as an amicus curiae. In Kyalami Ridge — a matter that engaged the legality of steps taken by the government to provide emergency housing for flood victims on government-owned land — an association representing private land-owners in the vicinity of the proposed emergency camp applied for an interdict to stop the settlement of the flood victims on the government-owned land. [3] The applicant did not join the flood victims as parties to the litigation. When the matter reached the Constitutional Court, one of the flood victims applied for leave to intervene in the application as a party and, alternatively, as an amicus curiae. He was admitted as a party, on the basis that he had 'a direct and substantial interest in the proceedings', and was therefore 'entitled to be joined as a party in his own right'.[4]

This distinction between an intervener and an amicus has considerable significance for three reasons. First, a person with a 'direct and substantial interest' has a right to intervene in the proceedings, and does not ask for any special dispensation. An amicus needs permission to intervene. Secondly, a person who intervenes as a party has procedural rights, such as the right to adduce evidence and to present oral argument to the Court. An amicus curiae has no such rights unless

[1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 50.

[2] Rule 9 was the rule governing amici then in force. See Rules of the Constitutional Court, Government Gazette 16204, Regulation Gazette 5450 (6 January 1995).

[3] Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another (Mukhwevho Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)('Kyalami Ridge').

[4] Ibid at para 30.

they are specifically granted by the Court. Thirdly, an intervening party is subject to the usual rules as to its ability to recover costs, and its liability for costs of opposing parties. In the ordinary course, an amicus curiae is neither awarded costs nor ordered to pay the costs of opposing parties.

These differences have the result that a would-be participant who (like Mr Mukhwevho in Kyalami Ridge) is a person with a direct and substantial interest may need to make a strategic decision as to whether to seek to intervene as a party or as an amicus curiae. This choice carries advantages and disadvantages that will vary with the particular circumstances of the case.

8.2 Parameters of the Role of the Amicus

An amicus curiae does not have the right to raise a new cause of action. If the amicus wishes to do so, that should be referred to in its application for admission, and permission to do so must be sought. The Chief Justice will then decide whether it would be appropriate to permit such an issue to be raised in the appeal.

Such permission is unlikely to be given if it would involve the joining of additional parties to the litigation, or if there is a likelihood that one or more of the parties would be prejudiced.[1] For example, in VRM v Health Professions Council of South Africa & Others, application was made for admission as an amicus curiae in an appeal which was pending before a full bench of the Transvaal Provincial Division.[2] The applicant had not raised a constitutional issue in the main case, but the amicus curiae wished to do so in the appeal. The court held that it was not in the interests of justice to seek determination of important constitutional issues raised by the would-be amicus curiae when such issues had not been properly raised, canvassed and debated in the court a quo. The court accordingly refused the application for admission as an amicus curiae.[3]

It does not follow from the finding in VRM that the amicus is always limited to the issues raised by the parties. If a matter has been raised and dealt with on the papers, the amicus may address it. In Grootboom, the applicants had asserted a right under FC s 26 (the right to housing) and FC s 28(1)(c) (the child's right to shelter).[4] The High Court decided the FC s 26 argument against the applicants, and the FC s 28(1)(c) argument in favour of the applicants. On appeal, the written argument submitted by the parties concentrated on the meaning and import of FC s 28(1)(c). The amici curiae sought to broaden the arguments engaged by the Constitutional Court by contending that all of the applicants (including those who were adults) were entitled to shelter by reason of minimum core obligations

[1] De Beer NO v North Central Local Council and South Central Local Council & Others (Umhlatuzana Civic Association Intervening) 2001 (2) SA 429 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1109 (CC) at para 31.

[2] 2004 (3) BCLR 311 (T).

[3] Ibid at 316.

[4] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) ('Grootboom').

incurred by the State in terms of FC s 26. The Constitutional Court articulated no objection to the content of the amici's intervention and, ultimately, grounded its findings in terms of its view of the State's obligations under FC s 26.[1]

The statement by the Constitutional Court in Hoffmann that an amicus 'is neither a loser nor a winner'[2] might lead one to conclude that an amicus may never ask for relief. This is not so. In Moise, the Constitutional Court had declared certain provisions of a statute invalid.[3] Thereafter, the amicus curiae in the original proceedings applied to the Court for a variation of the order of invalidity. It asked that the order be made retrospective so as to apply to all extant actions that had not already been time-barred when the Interim Constitution came into effect.[4] The amicus curiae contended that the failure to address the retrospective effect of the invalidity constituted an error in the judgment of the Court which fell to be corrected. The Court held that the order was, in any event, retrospective as a matter of law, and the application was dismissed. The Moise Court did not, however, question the right of the amicus curiae to bring the application. On the contrary, the Court stated that the amicus 'is to be commended for conscientiously raising in the public interest a perceived error in need of correction'.[5]

8.3 Amicus Curiae in the Constitutional Court

The Constitutional Court was the first to introduce a rule which made provision for the intervention of an amicus curiae and which regulated that intervention. The rules of other courts are based broadly on that model and use similar concepts. I shall therefore deal first, in some detail, with the amicus curiae in the Constitutional Court. As we shall see in the section that follows, much of this analysis and commentary applies to the amicus in other courts.

It should be noted at the outset that that an amicus curiae does not appear to be a 'party' in terms of the rules.[6] It follows that those rules which refer to a party and its rights do not refer to an amicus curiae.

(a) Constitutional Court rule 10

Constitutional Court rule 10 provides as follows:

> (1) Subject to these rules, any person interested in any matter before the Court may, with the written consent of all the parties in the matter before the Court, given not later than the time specified in subrule (5), be admitted therein as an amicus curiae upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as may be agreed upon in

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 18.
[2] Hoffmann (supra) at para 63.
[3] Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice & Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as amicus curiae) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC).
[4] Ex Parte Women's Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC).
[5] Ibid at para 3.
[6] See, in this regard, rule 31 which distinguishes between a 'party' to any proceedings before the Court, and an amicus curiae. This approach is also reflected in the judgment in Hoffmann, which similarly distinguishes between an amicus and a party.

writing with all the parties before the Court or as may be directed by the Chief Justice in terms of subrule (3).

(2) The written consent referred to in subrule (1) shall, within five days of it having been obtained, be lodged with the Registrar and the amicus curiae shall, in addition to any other provision, comply with the times agreed upon for the lodging of written argument.

(3) The Chief Justice may amend the terms, conditions, rights and privileges agreed upon as referred to in subrule (1).

(4) If the written consent referred to in subrule (1) has not been secured, any person who has an interest in any matter before the Court may apply to the Chief Justice to be admitted therein as an amicus curiae, and the Chief Justice may grant such application upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as he or she may determine.

(5) If time limits are not otherwise prescribed in the directions given in that matter an application pursuant to the provisions of subrule (4) shall be made not later than five days after the lodging of the respondent's written submissions or after the time for lodging such submissions has expired.

(6) An application to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall —

(a) briefly describe the interest of the amicus curiae in the proceedings;

(b) briefly identify the position to be adopted by the amicus curiae in the proceedings; and

(c) set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus curiae, their relevance to the proceedings and his or her reasons for believing that the submissions will be useful to the Court and different from those of the other parties.

(7) An amicus curiae shall have the right to lodge written argument, provided that such written argument does not repeat any matter set forth in the argument of the other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.

(8) Subject to the provisions of rule 31, an amicus curiae shall be limited to the record on appeal or referral and the facts found proved in other proceedings and shall not add thereto and shall not present oral argument.

(9) An order granting leave to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall specify the date of lodging the written argument of the amicus curiae or any other relevant matter.

(10) An order of Court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of an amicus curiae.

(11) The provisions of rule 1(3) shall be applicable, with such modifications as may be necessary, to an amicus curiae.

(b) The mechanism for admission

At first glance, rule 10 appears to contemplate two mechanisms for admission as an amicus curiae: (1) through rule 10(1), which requires the consent of the parties (on the basis that under rule 10(3) the Chief Justice may amend the terms, conditions, rights and privileges which have been agreed upon with the parties); or (2) alternatively through rule 10(4), by the permission of the Chief Justice, with the Chief Justice granting the application on such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as he or she may determine. One might be forgiven for taking this approach, not only because of the apparent meaning of the words, but because the Constitutional Court has itself on occasion read the rule in that manner.[1]

However, the Constitutional Court has now made it clear that there are not two discrete means of securing admission as an amicus curiae:

> An amicus is a friend of the Court and no person may be admitted as an amicus without the consent contemplated in subrule 10(4) … it is implicit, if not explicit, from subrule 10(1) that after obtaining the necessary consent [of the parties] an applicant for admission as an amicus must still make an application to the Chief Justice for admission as an amicus.[2]

That statement in Institute for Security Studies is now the unequivocal position of the Constitutional Court. Not only does it post-date previous statements on the subject, but the Court has also stated that its holding in Institute for Security Studies 'must be regarded as a general instruction on how to prepare an application for admission as an amicus.'[3]

(c) Procedure for applying for admission as an amicus curiae

Institute for Security Studies sets out the steps which an applicant should take in order to obtain admission as amicus curiae.

The first step is to apply to the other parties for their consent under rule 10(1). This request must place the parties in a position where they can assess properly whether the request complies with the underlying principles governing applications for admission as amicus curiae.[4] Those principles are whether the submissions sought to be advanced are relevant to the issues before the court, will be useful to the court and are different from those of the other parties.[5] These matters are to be readily ascertainable from the application.

The next step is to seek the consent of the Court. If the written consent of the parties has been obtained, it does not follow automatically that the Court is bound to admit the applicant. The Court may refuse to admit the applicant where the principles referred to have not been satisfied.[6] The fact that the applicant has obtained the written consent of the parties contemplated in subrule 10(1) is simply a factor to be taken into consideration in the exercise of the Court's discretion whether or not to admit a person as an amicus.[7]

---

[1] In re Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1023 (CC)('Certain Amicus Curiae Applications') at para 3 ('A person may be admitted as an amicus either on the basis of the written consent of all the parties in the proceedings or on the basis of an application addressed to the Chief Justice.')

[2] Institute for Security Studies: In re S v Basson CCT 30/03 (Unreported decision of 9 September 2005)('Institute for Security Studies') at paras 6 and 9.

[3] Ibid at para 11.

[4] Ibid at para 10.

[5] Ibid at para 7.

[6] Ibid at para 7.

[7] Ibid at para 9.

If time limits have not been otherwise prescribed in the directions given in a matter, then in those cases where the written consent of the parties has not been secured, application for admission should be made to the Chief Justice not later than five days after the lodging of the respondent's written submissions, or after the time for lodging such submissions has expired.[1] The rules are silent as to the time within which the application is to be made to the Chief Justice if the written consent of the parties has been secured. Having regard to the interpretation which the Constitutional Court has now given to the rule, the five-day period may well also apply where the written consent of the parties has been obtained in terms of rule 10(1).

(d) Content of the application for admission

Institute for Security Studies also sets out what is to be contained in the application to the Chief Justice:

> Subrule 10(6)(c) requires an application for admission as an amicus curiae to set out the submissions to be advanced, their relevance to the proceedings, the reasons for believing that the submissions would be useful to the Court and different from those of the other parties to the proceedings. It is not always easy to assess these matters from mere allegations in the affidavit in support of an application for admission as amicus. Nor is it possible to assess them from a letter requesting consent to be admitted as amicus curiae. For a proper assessment of these matters to be made, the application for admission as an amicus must ordinarily be accompanied by a summary of the written submissions sought to be advanced. This will enable the Court to assess the application properly and evaluate the submissions sought to be advanced in the light of the principles governing the admission of an amicus. An applicant who fails to comply with this requirement runs the risk of the application being refused if the matters required by rule 10(6)(c) are not readily ascertainable from the application.[2]

Where the Chief Justice admits the applicant as an amicus curiae, the notice of admission invariably sets out the terms and the conditions of such admission, and the rights and the privileges which the amicus curiae is to have.

(e) Court's discretion as to whether to admit an amicus curiae

In Institute of Security Studies, the Court described the 'underlying principles' governing applications for admission as an amicus curiae as follows: (a) whether the submissions sought to be advanced are relevant to the issues before the Court, (b) whether the submissions will be useful to the Court and (c) whether the submissions are different from those of the other parties. It is striking that the judgment does not refer to an assessment of the 'interest' of the applicant in the proceedings as one of the underlying principles. Rule 10(1) states that only a person 'interested' in a matter before the Court may apply for admission as an amicus. In all likelihood, the reason for the Court's silence on this matter is that, in practice, this threshold test is fairly easily satisfied.

[1] Rule 10(5).
[2] Institute for Security Studies (supra) at para 10.

Erasmus suggests that the sort of 'interest' contemplated in the rule is 'an interest in the issues of law and policy involved in the matter by way of (for example) a standing commitment to the advancement of a particular point of view in relation to those issues, or a specialised knowledge of the matters in issue.'[1] This approach is consistent with the practice of the Constitutional Court. The threshold requirement of an 'interest' has never been a stumbling-block to admission as an amicus. If the applicant proposes to make submissions which are indeed relevant to the issues before the Court, which will be useful to the court, and which are different from those of the other parties, the Court will not refuse the application on the basis that the applicant is not sufficiently 'interested' in the matter before the Court.

However, when considering whether the applicant for admission as an amicus curiae has satisfied the principles underlying the rule, the fact that the person was admitted as an amicus curiae in the court below does not in itself give such a person the right to be admitted as an amicus in the Constitutional Court.[2] In criminal cases, an additional factor is relevant to the exercise of rule 10 discretion by the Court:

> As a general matter, in criminal matters a court should be astute not to allow the submissions of an amicus to stack the odds against an accused person. Ordinarily, an accused in criminal matters is entitled to a well-defined case emanating from the state. If the submissions of an amicus tend to strengthen the case against the accused, this is cause for caution. This, however, is not an inflexible rule. But it is a consideration based on fairness, equality of arms, and more importantly, what is in the interests of justice.'[3]

(f) Submission of argument by an amicus curiae

Admission as an amicus curiae carries with it the right to lodge written argument, provided that the written argument does not repeat matters set forth in the argument of other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.[4] The directions given by the Chief Justice invariably set out the time limits for the lodging of written argument.

Rule 10(8) states flatly that an amicus curiae 'shall not present oral argument'. While that is the default position provided by the rules, it is not the invariable position or even the usual practice. In practice, a person admitted as an amicus is usually permitted, on application, to present oral argument. While rule 10 does not provide for this exercise of discretion, the power to permit the amicus to offer oral argument would appear to be derived from rule 32(2). Rule 32(2) states that the Court or the Chief Justice may give such directions in matters of practice, procedure and the disposal of any appeal, application or other matter as the Court

[1] HG Erasmus Superior Court Practice (1994) C4-23.
[2] Institute for Security Studies (supra) at para 11.
[3] Ibid at para 15.
[4] Rule 10(7).

or Chief Justice may consider just and expedient. The test is therefore whether it is 'just and expedient' to permit the amicus curiae to present oral argument. Given the Court's reliance on oral argument as an opportunity for members of the Court to debate issues raised in heads of argument, it is easy to understand why the Court will ordinarily allow a person who has been admitted as an amicus — and whose submissions by definition are different from those of the parties and may be useful to the court — to submit oral argument. Time limits are usually laid down to ensure that the hearing of the matter is not unnecessarily prolonged.

(g) New factual material and evidence

An amicus curiae is, like the parties, permitted by rule 31 to canvass factual material that is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and that does not specifically appear on the record, provided that such facts (a) are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible; or (b) are of an official, scientific, technical or statistical nature capable of easy verification.

The scope of rule 31 is dealt with elsewhere in this volume.[1] The rule's essence is that the material must be of such a nature that it does not lead to any genuine and serious dispute of fact. Typically, the material submitted under this rule consists of statistical information from sources which are generally accepted as reliable,[2] articles from learned journals, government reports, reports of official bodies, and empirical data relevant to the matters at issue.[3] Where an amicus seeks to introduce evidence in terms of rule 31, a dispute as to the facts 'if genuine, usually will demonstrate that they are not "incontrovertible" or "capable of easy verification". Where this is so, the material will be inadmissible.'[4]

A question which has not yet been answered by the Constitutional Court is under what circumstances will an amicus curiae be permitted to introduce evidence which does not fall within the rubric of rule 31. Rule 10(8) states that, subject to the provisions of rule 31, an amicus curiae shall be limited to the record on appeal or referral and the facts found proved in other proceedings and shall not add thereto. That injunction can, however, not be invariable. It is followed

[1] See Kate Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 5.

[2] August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 12.

[3] Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as amicus curiae) 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC) at paras 3 and 26. The material admitted by the Court in this matter is described at footnotes 35, 36 and 37 of the judgment and gives a good indication of the range of material deemed admissible.

[4] S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at paras 22–25; Prince v President, Cape Law Society & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at paras 10, 11 and 98; Certain Amicus Curiae Applications (supra) at para 8.

immediately by the injunction that the amicus curiae shall not present oral argument, and as we have seen, the Court has the power to permit oral argument. The Court must therefore also have the power to permit an amicus curiae to adduce additional evidence outside rule 31.

The general principle is that ordinarily it is inappropriate for an amicus to try to introduce new contentions based on fresh evidence. Similarly, evidence which is untested, and will lead to submissions which open an entirely new issue on appeal, will generally not be permitted. A further factor will be whether the new evidence will necessitate the postponement — and thus the resolution — of an otherwise urgent matter.[1] It is clear, however, that the role of an amicus is not limited to questions of law: the amicus also turns the Court's attention to relevant matters of fact.[2]

Whether the submission of new evidence will be permitted in any given case will depend on what is 'just and expedient' (the governing principle of rule 32(2)). Factors relevant to this assessment include: (a) the delay caused by giving the other parties an opportunity to respond to the new evidence; (b) the Constitutional Court's reluctance to deal with evidential material without having the benefit of the views of another court;[3] (c) the cogency of the evidence; and (d) the importance of the evidence to the matters which the Court has to decide. Where a party has, in its evidence, referred to the views or conduct of another person, which is not a party, but which is in fact interested in the proceedings and is subsequently admitted as an amicus curiae, that ought to strengthen the claim of the amicus to put its position on the record for the benefit of the Court.[4]

8.4 Amicus Curiae in Other Courts

(a) Supreme Court of Appeal

In the Supreme Court of Appeal, the admission of an amicus curiae is dealt with in rule 16. That rule is for practical purposes identical to Constitutional Court rule 10. There are, however, two exceptions.

First, rule 16(5) provides that an application for admission as an amicus curiae shall be made within one month after the record has been lodged with the Registrar. This proviso therefore requires lodging of the application by the amicus at an earlier stage than is the case in the Constitutional Court.

[1] Certain Amicus Curiae Applications (supra) at paras 6 and 7.

[2] Ibid at para 5.

[3] In this regard, the jurisprudence dealing with direct access to the Constitutional Court is relevant.

[4] See, eg, Magidimisi NO v Premier of the Eastern Cape (High Court, Bisho, Case No 2180/2004). In Magidimisi, the respondents made general statements about the conduct of the administration of the system of social grants, and contrasted their relationship with the applicants' attorney with their relationship with the Black Sash, a non-governmental organisation. The Black Sash was admitted as an amicus curiae, and was permitted to place before the court evidence as to its relationship with the respondents, and their administration of the social grant system.

Secondly, the rules of the Supreme Court of Appeal do not have a provision equivalent to Constitutional Court rule 31 that might accommodate documents lodged to support non-disputed factual claims. The amicus curiae in the SCA is therefore limited on appeal to the record. That said, Rule 11(1)(b) authorizes the President of the Court or the Court to give directions in matters of practice, procedure and the disposal of any appeal in such manner as the President or the Court may consider just and expedient. This rule would appear to give the President and the Court the power to permit an amicus curiae to adduce additional evidence, just as they have the power to authorize an amicus curiae to present oral argument notwithstanding the statement in rule 16(8) that an amicus shall not present any oral argument.

(b) Labour Appeal Court

In the Labour Appeal Court, the admission of an amicus curiae is dealt with in rule 7. The criteria for admission as an amicus curiae are, for all practical purposes, identical to those in the Constitutional Court. The person concerned must be 'interested' in the proceedings before the Court.[1] The application for admission must describe the interest of the amicus, identify the position to be adopted by the amicus, set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus, demonstrate the relevance of the submissions to the proceedings, and reflect that person's reasons for believing that the submissions will be helpful to the Court and different from those of the other parties.[2]

Rule 7 makes no provision for a request to the other parties to consent to the admission of the would-be amicus curiae. The application is made directly to the Judge President or a Judge authorized by the Judge President. The application must be made not later than fifteen days before the date of hearing.[3]

The amicus curiae has the right to deliver written argument.[4] No reference is made in the rules to the submission of oral argument. But as Woolworths indicates, oral argument is permitted on occasion.[5] If new matters or arguments are raised by the amicus curiae, any other party has the right to file written argument within five days from the date on which the argument of the amicus curiae was served on those parties.[6]

An order of court dealing with costs 'may make provision for the payment of the intervention of the amicus curiae'.[7] This rule could be narrowly construed to mean that an order may be made for the payment of the costs incurred by the

[1] Rule 7(1).
[2] Rule 7(4).
[3] Rule 7(3).
[4] Rule 7(5).
[5] Woolworths (Pty) Ltd v Whitehead (Women's Legal Centre Trust Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 529 (LAC).
[6] Rule 7(6).
[7] Rule 7(7).

amicus, but not an order for costs against the amicus curiae. However, in Woolworths, the court implicitly accepted the proposition that it possessed the power to make an order for costs against an amicus curiae.

(c) High Court

In the High Court, the making of submissions by amici curiae is linked to rule 16A. Rule 16A requires a person raising a constitutional issue in an application or action to give notice thereof to the registrar at the time of filing the relevant affidavit or pleading. The registrar is required to place that notice forthwith on a notice board which has been designated for that purpose. The purpose of the rule is to bring the constitutional challenge to the attention of persons who may be affected by, or who may have a legitimate interest in, the case. This rule enables such persons to seek to intervene either as a party, or as an amicus curiae.[1]

The intervention process created by rule 16A is generally similar to that created by rule 10 in the Constitutional Court. There are, however, some significant differences.

The time limit for making application to the High Court for admission as an amicus curiae is not later than 20 days after the filing of the affidavit or pleading in which the constitutional issue was raised. This time period is much shorter than that of either the Constitutional Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Unlike the rules of the Constitutional Court and Supreme Court of Appeal, High Court rule 16A makes provision for a party to oppose an application for admission as an amicus curiae. A party wishing to oppose is required to file an answering affidavit within five days of service of the application upon that party. The answering affidavit must clearly and succinctly set out the grounds of opposition. The court hearing the application for admission may refuse it or grant it upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.[2]

The rule is silent both on the question of the admission of evidence, and on the presentation of oral argument. It is, therefore, clear that a High Court has the discretion to permit both. It is rather easy to understand why this is so, particularly in relation to the question of evidence. The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal are (subject to very limited exceptions in the case of the Constitutional Court) courts of appeal. They do not hear matters at first instance. Appeals are, as a result, generally limited to the record of the court a quo. Where, however, the matter is heard at first instance by the High Court, it will be easier for an amicus curiae to persuade the court that it should be permitted to adduce evidence.

[1] Fourie & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) 241 (SCA)('Fourie') at para 55; Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development & Others 2004 (3) SA 599 (CC), 2004 (4) BCLR 333 (CC) at para 24; Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C), 2004 (12) 1328 (C) at para 21.

[2] Rule 16A(8).

In Modderklip, the applicant — who had already obtained an eviction order from the High Court — sought an order that the governmental respondents were to take immediate steps to evict unlawful occupiers from land owned by the applicant.[1] AgriSA, a voluntary association representing commercial farmers, sought leave to intervene as an amicus curiae. The High Court not only permitted this intervention, but also permitted the amicus curiae to file affidavits providing a factual foundation for the submissions which it wished to make.[2]

(d) Land Claims Court

In the Land Claims Court the admission of an amicus curiae is dealt with in rule 14. Rule 14 is quite detailed and differs in some material respects from the framework created by Constitutional Court rule 10.

The most material difference is that rule 14(1) makes it clear that there are two alternative routes for admission as an amicus curiae: (a) through written agreement between the would-be amicus and all participating parties;[3] or (b) by order of the presiding judge or the court.[4] It seems clear that once the consent of all participating parties has been obtained, there is no requirement of permission of the presiding judge or the court. The agreement must be delivered or the application for admission must be made within 10 days after the filing of the last affidavit or pleading referred to in the rules, or after the time for filing such document has expired.[5]

Where application is made for an order admitting an amicus curiae, a party may oppose by filing an answering affidavit. The applicant may then file a replying affidavit.[6] The matter is dealt with in chambers by the presiding judge without any person being present. The judge may make an order on the application or refer it to the court for argument and decision.[7]

The question of evidence is dealt with explicitly. An application to the court for an order admitting a person or organisation as an amicus curiae must contain a summary of the evidence (if any) to be presented by the amicus.[8] The agreement with the participating parties, or the order of court admitting the amicus, must set forth the right (if any) which the amicus curiae has to produce evidence to the court, to cross-examine witnesses, to make written submissions, and to present oral argument to the court.[9] The possibility of the active participation of the [1] Modderklip Boerdery (Edms) Bpk v President van die RSA & Andere 2003 (6) BCLR 638 (T)('Modderklip').

[2] Ibid at para 23. For more on the nature of the evidence, see Modderklip (supra) at para 30. The governmental respondents objected to this evidence, but the objection was rejected, partly on the grounds that the respondents had had the opportunity to answer it. Ibid at para 30.
[3] Rule 14(1)(a).
[4] Rule 14(1)(b).
[5] Rule 14 (1A).
[6] Rule 14(3) and (4).
[7] Rule 14(5).
[8] Rule 14(2)(b)(iii).
[9] Rule 14(6).

amicus through the presentation of evidence and cross-examination of witnesses is thus explicitly contemplated. The court may, at any time, vary the rights of the amicus set out in an agreement with the participating parties or in a prior order of the court.[1]

Unless the court orders otherwise, an amicus curiae is not entitled to any order for costs against any party. It may, in addition, not be subject to any order for costs in favour of any party.[2]

(e) Labour Court

In the Labour Court, the admission of an amicus curiae is dealt with in rule 19. This rule is identical to rule 7 of the Labour Appeal Court, except that the time for the filing of written argument in response to new matters or arguments raised by the amicus curiae is seven days from the date on which the argument of the amicus curiae was served on the parties.[3]

8.5 Costs

Constitutional Court rule 10(1) provides that an order of court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of an amicus curiae. From this it appears that an order for costs may be made both in favour of and against an amicus curiae. However, that is seldom if ever done. There has not yet been any case in which the Constitutional Court has made such an order.

In Hoffmann, the amicus curiae asked for an order that the unsuccessful respondent pay its costs. Ngcobo J for the Court stated the general principle as follows:

> An amicus, regardless of the side it joins, is neither a loser nor a winner and is generally not entitled to be awarded costs. Whether there may be circumstances calling for departure from this rule is not necessary to decide in this case. Suffice it to say that in the present case no such departure is warranted.[4]

As pointed out above, rule 10(1) does in fact provide that an order of court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of an amicus curiae. There must therefore be circumstances in which such an order may be made. The implication of the judgment of Ngcobo J is that exceptional circumstances are required before such an order will be made.

In Woolworths (Pty) Ltd v Whitehead (Women's Legal Centre Trust Intervening), the appellant succeeded in its appeal to the Labour Appeal Court.[5] It contended that [1] Proviso to Rule 14(6).

[2] Rule 14(7).
[3] Rule 19(6).
[4] Hoffmann (supra) at para 63.
[5] 2000 (3) SA 529 (LAC)('Woolworths').

the amicus, which had supported the position of the unsuccessful respondent, should be ordered to pay the costs occasioned by its intervention. The applicant contended that the amicus had raised issues collateral to those defined by the pleadings and the parameters of the lis between the parties, and that this intervention went beyond the proper functions of an amicus. Conradie JA did not agree:

> The amicus has contributed valuable submissions on the appropriateness of the test for determining unfairness and has assisted the Court on the question of onus. In my view the amicus does not deserve to be mulcted in costs.[1]

Zondo AJP agreed with Conradie JA that the amicus curiae should have been admitted:

> Even though the basis on which I have decided the matter did not require much of the arguments presented by the amicus, I am unable to say that the amicus was unnecessary or that he addressed collateral issues. I think he was sufficiently helpful to the Court.[2]

No order for costs was made either in favour of or against the amicus.[3]

The law reports identify only one case in which an amicus curiae has either been awarded its costs, or ordered to pay costs. In Modderklip Boerdery, the High Court ordered the respondents to pay the costs of the amicus curiae with regard to an unsuccessful application by the respondents for the striking out of certain evidence. That order for costs was not affected by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal.[4] When the matter came before the Constitutional Court, Langa ACJ noted that 'it is unusual and indeed it will rarely be appropriate for costs to be awarded in favour of an amicus curiae'. However, the state had expressly stated that it was not seeking to overturn the order of the High Court awarding those costs to the amicus curiae. There was, accordingly, no basis for the Constitutional Court to interfere with the costs order.[5]

A court has made a costs order against an amicus curiae in one unreported case. In Fourie & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, Roux J, in the Transvaal Provincial Division of the High Court, was of the opinion that the conduct of the amicus curiae went well beyond what had been regarded as proper by the Constitutional Court in Treatment Action Campaign. He ordered the amicus to pay the respondents' costs jointly and severally with the appellants. However, the respondents (wisely) abandoned that part of the order of the court.[6] The Supreme Court of Appeal did not make any order in respect of the costs of the amicus curiae, or the costs incurred as a result of the intervention of the amicus curiae.

---

[1] Woolworths (supra) at para 52.
[2] Ibid at para 28.
[3] Ibid at para 151.
[4] Modderfontein Squatters, Greater Benoni City Council v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA and Legal Resources Centre, amici curiae); President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, amici curiae) 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA) at para 50.
[5] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA & Others, amici curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 786 (CC) at para 67.
[6] Fourie (supra) at para 55.

9 Remedies

Michael Bishop

9.1 Introduction 9–1
(a) Pointless 9–1
(b) A Roadmap 9–3
9.2 Theory 9–4
(a) What is a 'remedy'? 9–4
(b) Ubi jus ibi remedium 9–6
(i) General Principle 9–6
(ii) Deviations 9–7
(aa) Imaginary Deviations 9–7
(bb) Real Deviations 9–11
(iii) The Legal Position 9–15
(iv) Remedies without Rights? 9–16
(c) Rights and Remedies 9–18
(i) Ways of Understanding the Rights-Remedies relationship 9–19
(aa) Automatic Remedialism 9–19
(bb) Rights Essentialism 9–20
(cc) Remedial Equilibration 9–21
(ii) Methodological Concerns 9–23
(iii) An Equilibrating Court 9–24
(aa) Remedial Flexibility 9–24
(bb) Remedial Deterrence 9–26
(cc) Remedial Incorporation 9–31
(dd) Remedial Substantiation 9–34
(ee) Litigation Impact 9–37
(ff) Remedies and Jurisdiction 9–38
(gg) Conclusion 9–39
(iv) Equilibration and Transformation 9–39

(d) Discretion 9–44
(i) The Extent of Discretion 9–45
(aa) Standards Axis 9–46
(bb) The Review Axis 9–49
(ii) Discretion and Legitimacy 9–53
(e) Choice of Remedy 9–55
(i) Textual Considerations 9–56
(ii) Rights-maximising and Interest Balancing 9–59
(iii) Ways of Conceiving Choice 9–61
(a) Bollyky's Formula 9–61
(b) The Purposive Approach 9–62
(c) The Principled Approach 9–64
(d) Taxonomies and Constraints 9–65
(iv) Structuring Remedies 9–65
(aa) Effective Relief 9–66
(1) General principle 9–66
(2) Corrective or distributive 9–67
(3) Nature of the violation 9–69
(4) Similarly situated 9–69
(5) Reason for violation 9–71
(bb) Unavoidable limits 9–71
(1) Multiple goals 9–71
(2) Conflicting rights 9–71
(cc) Avoidable limits 9–73
(1) Separation of powers 9–73
(x) Legislature 9–74
(y) Executive 9–74
(2) Courts' limitations 9–75
(3) Administration of justice 9–75
(4) Financial costs 9–76
(5) Impact on third parties 9–76
(6) Fault 9–77
(dd) Conclusion 9–77
(f) Constitutional Remedies and Private Remedies 9–78
(i) Characteristics 9–78
(ii) When should litigants rely on private remedies? 9–79
(iii) Indirect Application and Remedies 9–82

9.3 Categorising Remedies 9–84
9.4 Remedies Following a Finding of Inconsistency 9–86
(a) Hierarchy 9–86
(b) Reading Down 9–87
(i) The nature of reading down: interpretation or remedy? 9–87
(ii) When is reading down appropriate? 9–90
(c) Bald Declarations of Invalidity 9–95
(d) Limiting Substantive Impact 9–97
(i) Severance 9–98
(ii) Notional Severance 9–102
(iii) Reading-in 9–104
(iv) Shinga 9–110
(e) Limiting Temporal Impact 9–111
(i) Suspension 9–111
(aa) How does suspension operate? 9–111
(x) Suspension as a resolutive condition 9–111
(y) Do suspended orders that come into effect have retrospective force? 9–112
(z) Calculating time periods 9–114
(bb) When is suspension appropriate? 9–115
(x) Factors in support of suspension 9–116
(y) Factors against suspension 9–121
(cc) Interim orders 9–123
(dd) The Period of Suspension 9–126
(ee) Can suspension be extended? 9–127
(ii) Retrospectivity 9–128
(aa) Mechanics of Retrospectivity 9–128
(x) The default position 9–129
(y) Ways to limit the default position 9–132
(bb) Reasons for limiting retrospectivity 9–134
(x) Injustice to individuals 9–135
(y) Administration of Justice 9–139
(z) Validating invalidating legislation 9–144
(cc) Criticism 9–145
9.5 Individual Remedies 9–150
(a) Damages 9–151
(i) Indirect Constitutional Damages 9–151

(ii) Direct Constitutional Damages 9–156
(aa) Damages to Compensate for Loss 9–157
(bb) Punitive Damages 9–160
(cc) Nominal Damages 9–162
(iii) Is the quantum of damages a constitutional matter? . 9–162
(b) Individual Declaratory Relief 9–164
(i) The Nature of the Power 9–164
(ii) When should declarations be ordered? 9–167
(c) Interdictory Relief 9–170
(i) Interdicts versus Declarations 9–170
(ii) Interim Interdicts 9–170
(iii) Final Interdicts 9–172
(d) Contractual relief 9–175
9.6 Systemic Remedies 9–176
(a) Declarations 9–176
(b) Interdicts 9–178
(c) Supervisory Orders 9–179
(i) Models for Supervision 9–179
(ii) The Case Law on Structural Interdicts 9–181
(aa) Supervisory interdicts refused 9–182
(bb) Supervisory interdicts granted 9–184
(iii) Factors 9–188
(iv) Nyathi 9–190
(v) A Theory for Systemic Remedies 9–191
(vi) Beyond Supervision 9–194
9.7 Legislative Remedies 9–196
9.8 Criminal Remedies 9–198

38. Enforcement of Rights
Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights.

172. Powers of courts in constitutional matters
1. When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court—
(a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
(b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including—
(i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
(ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.

9.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) Pointless. . .

To paraphrase Edmund Blackadder: Law without remedies is like a broken pencil. Pointless.[1] Indeed, for Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes and his realist progeny, the law is nothing but remedies: 'The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law.'[2] Holmes' theory is based on the intuition pump of the hypothetical 'bad man' who is interested only in what the costs and benefits of obeying or disobeying the law are. But it is not, as Holmes makes clear, only the 'bad man' who cares more about what the court does than what it says. The ultimate concern of virtually all litigants is what the court orders, not why it orders it. When a father comes to court to prevent the adoption of his child, he does not care what test the judges adopt or what factors they consider. He cares only whether he will see his child again. When people approach a court because they have nowhere to live and their constitution tells them they have a right to a house, they are not concerned about whether the court adopts a reasonableness test or a minimum-core approach to socio-economic rights. They want only to know where they will sleep tomorrow. When two men facing state-sanctioned execution in the United States appeal to a court in a faraway land because that country's government illegally handed them over to the people who might now kill them, the reasons for the court's decision are irrelevant. They are interested only in whether the court can keep them alive.

* A chapter as long as this does not happen without the aid of many people who must be thanked. Firstly, Stu Woolman for making me part of CLOSA and for his continuous and unflinching support and encouragement (despite me missing endless deadlines), his constant advice and his fantastic and generous edit under immense pressure. Without him I would never have started, let alone finished, this chapter. Secondly, Theunis Roux for giving me the space to work on this project at SAIFAC. Thirdly, Jonathan Klaaren, Steven Budlender and Matthew Chaskalson for allowing me to use their draft material and Kate Hofmeyr for giving me access to her fantastic Thesis. Fourthly, Irene de Vos, Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti, Lisa Chamberlain and Lauren Kelso for last-minute editorial support. Fifthly, Ute Kuhlmann and her team at Juta for being so accommodating and allowing me to push the deadline to literally the last second. Last but not least, Clare Ballard for being a constant inspiration, even in her absence.

[1] 'Chains' (1986) Episode 6 Blackadder II ('Queeny: And me, did you miss me Edmund? Blackadder: Madame, life without you is like a broken pencil. Queeny: Explain. Blackadder: Pointless.')

[2] 'The Path of the Law' in Collected Papers (1920) 173 (my emphasis).

I am not saying that substantive legal reasoning is not important. It is, obviously, fundamental to any system committed to the rule of law. And I do not agree with Holmes that law is nothing but prophecy. But I am saying, and I do believe, that if courts did nothing but reason, if they only spoke about what should happen, but had no power to make it happen, they might still be interesting and influential social actors, but they would not be courts.[3] In the words of Paul Gerwitz:

> To be of the law, as opposed to philosophy and economic theory . . . one must take reality as the primary realm of activity. Law moves beyond articulation to implementation, and legal scholarship therefore must address the complexities of acting within an imperfect, resisting, often vulgar real world. In law, reality is not a footnote to theory or an appendix to the ideal. The claims of reality are a central intellectual imperative as much as a practical one.[4]

In 'Nomos and Narrative', Robert Cover imagines law as a normative universe, a 'nomos', that is constituted and can only be understood through narrative, through stories.[5] These stories are about what happens in the real world — what people have done and made and felt and lost. The normative universe of law is a function of the gap between the real world of these stories and the ideal world of our hopes and dreams:

> Law may be viewed as a system of tension or a bridge linking a concept of a reality to an imagined alternative — that is, as a connective between two states of affairs, both of which can be represented in their normative significance only through the devices of narrative. . . . But the concept of a nomos is not exhausted by its 'alternity'; it is neither utopia nor pure vision. A nomos, as a world of law, entails the application of human will to an extant state of affairs as well as toward our visions of alternative futures. A nomos is a present world constituted by a system of tension between reality and vision.[6]

This tension between the ideal and the real is the primary domain of legal remedies and, thus, of this chapter. But remedies do more than negotiate the difficult terrain that lies between the 'is' and the 'ought': 'To live in a legal world requires that one know not only the precepts, but also their connections to possible and plausible states of affairs. It requires that one integrate not only the "is" and the "ought," but the "is," the "ought," and the "what might be."'[7] This chapter tries

[1] See D Levinson 'Rights Essentialism and Remedial Equilibration' (1999) 99 Columbia LR 857, 939 ('Perhaps the institution of judicial review could even be changed to facilitate nonfunctional constitutional interpretation, for example by establishing a separate constitutional court and making constitutional adjudication purely declaratory or advisory. This would ensure that judges were not peeking at consequences, because there would be none, and it would insulate abstract constitutional judgments from social contexts where they would be too costly to implement or threaten serious harm. Constitutional judges, given the leisure to "follow the ways of the scholar" full-time, might then more closely approach Dworkin's Herculean ideal, bringing coherence and integrity to a closed philosophical system of abstract legal principles. Obviously, however, this utopian or dystopian model of constitutional law would bear little resemblance to the current practice of constitutional adjudication.')

[2] P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585, 680.

[3] (1983) 97 Harvard LR 4.2

[4] Ibid at 9.

[5] Ibid at 10 (my emphasis).

not only to examine what courts have done to make the black letter doctrine of courts real. It endeavours to conceive of remedies as a way for imagining new ways of seeing the Final Constitution and thereby re-imagining what our founding document means; not in the doctrinal sense (that occupies much of the remaining 5000 pages of this treatise), but in the fullest (social, political, philosophical, economic) sense of 'meaning'. It aims, though not explicitly, to save remedies from its often parasitic relationship to rights and place them at the centre of our understanding of South African constitutional law. It hopes to paint remedies not as a limitation on what can be, but as an opportunity to imagine 'what might be'.

(b) A Roadmap

This ambitious goal is tackled in two separate halves. The first half — § 9.2 — asks some of the basic questions that are relevant to all remedies and is more theoretical in nature. The second half — § 9.3–9.6 — considers specific remedies and is more practical in nature. The latter portion also tries to separate the explication of the law from criticism. I hope that this separation of issues will make the chapter more useful for both practitioners and academics. Those who are interested only in the principles for the application of a specific remedy can skip straight to that discussion. Readers who want a more in-depth discussion of what remedies are, how they work and what principles should generally guide courts in their choice of remedies will be best served by the first half. This bifurcation does mean that there is a fair amount of repetition between the two sections that those brave readers who attack the chapter from beginning to end may notice. To them I apologise, but I hope the repetition serves my remaining readers well.

The chapter begins (§ 9.2*(a)) by examining the various meanings of 'remedy' that are used in law and providing a fairly stable definition for the rest of the discussion. Next (§ 9.2(b)*), I examine the contours of the central principle: ubi jus ibi remedium (where there's a right, there's a remedy). § 9.2*(c)* examines the relationship between rights and remedies. In short, I argue that the traditional separation of rights and remedies is descriptively inaccurate; rights and remedies influence each other in a number of ways. However, maintaining the separation between the two is, at the same time, beneficial because it makes it easier for courts to combat existing injustices. The following section (§ 9.2*(d)) considers the extent of discretion that courts have in choosing remedies and the implications that may have for legitimacy. The way is then clear to consider the principles that should guide the courts' choices between different remedies. That is the task I set myself in § 9.2(e). I suggest a structure for considering remedies that tries to make sense of the Constitutional Court's often ambiguous jurisprudence. The final question considered in the first half of the chapter is the relationship between private remedies and constitutional remedies (§ 9.2(f)*).

§ 9.3 sets up the remainder of the discussion. It explains why the specific remedies are divided into remedies following a finding of invalidity, individual remedies and systemic remedies and the limitations of that division. I then consider each of these categories in turn. The first — discussed in § 9.4 — concerns the action that a court takes after it declares a law invalid. Courts can employ a number of mechanisms to limit the often drastic impact of declaring a law invalid. Courts can: add or remove specific words to invalidate only the specific portion of the law invalid; suspend the order of invalidity to allow new measures to be put in place; and regulate the effect of the declaration on past actions. Individual remedies — cases where there is a single victim of a right — are broken down into damages, declarations and interdicts. Each remedy is discussed in § 9.5. The last important part of the chapter — § 9.6 — considers an emerging and extremely important area of constitutional remedies: remedies for systemic violations. This section considers some of the same orders — declarations and interdicts — as the previous section. However, it does so in the context of systemic, rather than individual violations of rights. Finally, I briefly consider constitutional remedies flowing from statutes enacted to give effect to constitutional rights (§ 9.7) and offer a few remarks about remedies in criminal cases (§ 9.8).

9.2 THEORY

(a) What is a 'remedy'?

The word remedy has many different meanings in legal scholarship and practice. Peter Birks has identified at least five different denotations in English law: They range from 'a cause of action', to 'a right born of a wrong', to 'a right born from a court order'.[1] Such varied uses of the term 'remedy' likewise abound in South African case law. The courts have referred to the following as a 'remedy': a statutory right;[2] a common-law right;[3] an order of summary judgment;[4] a right of appeal;[5] and the court's order.[6]

[1] P Birks 'Rights, Wrongs and Remedies' (2000) 20 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 1, 9–17 (The two meanings not mentioned in the text are a right born of an injustice or grievance, and right born of a court's order issued on a discretionary basis.) See also R Zakraewski Remedies Reclassified (2005)(Offers a fascinating discussion of how to understand remedies and their relationship to substantive rights in the context of English law.)

[2] See, for example, Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Wolfaardt 2002 (1) SA 49 (SCA) at para 2 ('The 1956 Act . . . created a statutory remedy for the commission of what was referred to as an "unfair labour practice" which was soon interpreted by the Courts to C include the unfair dismissal of an employee'.)

[3] See, for example, Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd v Oneanate Investments (Pty) Ltd (In Liquidation) 1998 (1) SA 811, 821A (A)('Its remedy, if any, was to sue Oneanate by way of a condictio.')

[4] See, for example, First National Bank of SA Ltd v Myburgh 2002 (4) SA 176 (C) at para 8 ('Summary judgment is designed to give plaintiff a speedy and cost-effective remedy in the case where the defendant does not disclose a valid and bona fide defence. It is an extraordinary and stringent remedy.')

[5] See, for example, S v Dzukuda & Others; S v Tshilo 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC) at para 48 ('If the provisions are misapplied the accused has an appeal remedy or may use the special entry mechanism of the CPA in case of irregularity.')

[6] See, for example, Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 21 ('The Starke sisters argue that reading words into section 1(1) as ordered by the High Court is not the appropriate remedy in this case.')

Why such variation? 'Remedy' has a very different meaning when used by a court involved with a common-law action where the only possible order it can grant is one of damages than it does when a court considers a constitutional case where it has virtually unlimited discretion to grant whatever order it deems fit. And both systems encourage different uses of 'remedy' when a lawyer provides advise to her client ('Your best remedy here is defamation.') What all these uses of the word 'remedy' have in common is, as Birk writes > that that which is referred to as a remedy is represented as a cure for something nasty. To remedy is to cure or make better. The only precondition to the use of the word is a state of affairs which needs making better.[1]

For the purposes of clarity, I will adopt a definition of 'remedy' suggested by Kate Hofmeyr: 'that which is provided by [a] court in response to the claimant's success in showing that his or her right has been violated [or threatened].'[2]

A few points about this definition. It does not refer only to orders. Although most remedies are found in a court's order, sometimes there are elements of a judgment not included in the order that nonetheless have direct practical effect. For example, when a court decides that legislation should be interpreted in a particular way, it ordinarily does not include that in its order. If the interpretation is the response to a showing that a right has been violated, then it qualifies as a remedy. A right must have been violated or threatened. I am, by and large, not concerned with decisions that do not involve the finding of a violation of a right or some other constitutional provision. Developments of the common law based on FC s 39(2) dismissals of leave to appeal, interim orders of condonation, postponement and so forth do not follow from the violation of a right and are not considered here. I also do not address costs. Those issues are all ably dealt with elsewhere in this treatise.[3] That said, the right need not always be constitutional in nature. In some places, I refer to cures outside the Final Constitution as 'remedies'. However, I am primarily concerned only with constitutional remedies. And so, unless the context indicates otherwise, the reader can assume that when I use the word 'remedy', I am referring to a cure for the violation of a constitutional right.

[1] Birks (supra) at 9.

[2] K Hofmeyr 'Understanding Constitutional Remedial Power' unpublished Mphil Thesis (Oxford University, 2006, on file with the author) 11.

[3] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; K Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedures' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 5; A Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Steyn, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 6.

(b) Ubi jus ibi remedium

> There can to my mind be no doubt that the authors of the Constitution intended that those rights (that is, the rights entrenched in the Constitution) should be enforced by the Courts of law. They could never have intended to confer a right without a remedy. The remedy is, indeed, part and parcel of the right. Ubi jus, ibi remedium.[1]
>
> — Centlivres CJ

(i) General Principle

This dictum — and the ancient principle that 'where there is a right, there is a remedy' — was adopted by the Constitutional Court in August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others.[2] The applicants in August were prisoners who wished to exercise the franchise. Ostensibly, no law prevented them from doing so and they were told that their right to vote remained as real as that possessed by any other citizen. All that prevented them from exercising their right were the prison walls between them and the polling stations. Sachs J employed the ubi jus, ibi remedium principle to justify an order requiring the government to take steps to make it practically possible for prisoners to vote. August clearly established the principle as part of our law and our courts have consistently re-affirmed that commitment.[3]

The idea that a right must be accompanied by a remedy has achieved near universal assent in legal systems across the world[4] and does not seem to require much by way of normative justification. As one writer on the topic has noted: 'The principle is so obviously correct that assent to it is instinctive.'[5] The best

[1] Minister of the Interior v Harris & Others 1952 (4) SA 769, 780 (A)('Harris').

[2] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 34.

[3] See Kaunda & Others v Presdient of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 181 (In a claim for diplomatic protection to ensure that the human rights of South African citizens being held in Zimbabwe were respected, Ngcobo J held: 'Unless the South African government grants South African nationals abroad diplomatic protection, they are likely to remain without a remedy for violations of their internationally recognised human rights. And if the government cannot protect South African nationals abroad against violations or threatened violations of their international human rights, it may well be asked, what then are the benefits of being a South African citizen?'); Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC), 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC) at para 21 (In the context of common-law remedies, the Court held: 'The remedy is part and parcel of a right (ubi ius ibi remedium)').

[4] For the position in Canada, see Nelles v Ontario [1989] 2 SCR 170, 196 quoted with approval in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 69 n 187 ('To create a right without a remedy is antithetical to one of the purposes of the Charter which surely is to allow courts to fashion remedies when constitutional infringements occur.')

[5] D Zeigler 'Rights Require Remedies: A New Approach to the Enforcement of Rights in the Federal Courts' (1987) 38 Hastings LJ 665, 665 ('The principle that legal rights must have remedies is fundamental to democratic government. In a democracy, legal rights define social relations and promote human well-being in the broadest sense. Justice requires their enforcement'). See also T Thomas 'Ubi Jus, Ibi Remedium: The Fundamental Right to a Remedy Under Due Process' (2004) 41 *San Diego L*R 1633; J Jeffries 'The Right-Remedy Gap in Constitutional Law' (1999) Yale Law Journal 87, 87 ('Ever since John Marshall insisted that for every violation of a right, there must be a remedy, [Marbury v Madison 5 US 137, 163] American constitutionalists have decried the right-remedy gap in constitutional law. Everyone justification is to simply state the consequence of rejecting the principle:

> The greatest absurdity imaginable in law is: 'that a man hath a right to a thing for which the law gives him no remedy; which is in truth as great an absurdity, as to say, the having of right, in law, and having no right, are in effect the same.'[1]

There would be no point in possessing a right, in terms of law, that offered no relief to the person who sought its enforcement. On its face, South African law clearly requires that the violation of every right is accompanied by some sort of remedy.[2] However, the case law of the Constitutional Court suggests that the application of this general principle is not a simple matter. As it turns out, our law throws up instances in which this foundational commitment principle cannot be honoured. By considering some of these exceptions to the rule, we can get a better understanding of what ubi jus ibi remedium really means in South African law.

(ii) Deviations

The Court seems to have departed from the principle in two classes of cases. One, cases where the principle may appear to be ignored, but is in fact respected. Two, cases where the principle is not, in fact, respected.

(aa) Imaginary Deviations

First, does a declaratory order count as a remedy? If all a court does is state what the right means or that a right has been violated, is there really a remedy? For example, in Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet t/a Metrorail & Others, the applicants argued that various government entities (the respondents) had a responsibility to ensure their safety on public trains and that those entities had failed to meet that obligation.[3] The Court agreed both that the respondents had an obligation and that they had failed to fulfil it. However, the only relief they granted the applicants was to declare the existence of the obligation.

As I argue in more detail later,[4] declaratory relief can indeed be a remedy if it cures, or attempts to cure, the alleged ill. It will be a highly effective remedy in agrees that victims of constitutional violations should have effective redress. So when Akhil Amar declares that governments acting unconstitutionally "must in some way undo the violation by ensuring that victims are made whole," [A Amar 'Of Sovereignty and Federalism' (1987) Yale LJ 1425, 1427] he voices a proposition commanding nearly universal assent.')

[1] Harris (supra) at 78C quoting Dixon v Harrison 124 All ER 958, 964, quoted with approval in Administrator, Transvaal v Brydon 1993 (3) SA 1, 13–14 (A).

[2] However, as I note below, the relationship between rights and remedies is not that simple. Remedies are not merely the handmaidens of rights; in many ways they substantively affect the content and value of rights. See § 9.2*(c)* infra.

[3] 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C).

[4] See §§ 5*(b)* and 6*(a)* infra.

situations where all the parties seek is the clarification of the legal position[1] or where the underlying dispute has already become moot.[2] The difficulty is not whether a declaration is a remedy — it is and therefore upholds the ubi jus principle — but whether it is an effective remedy. In Rail Commuters, the declaration might not be as effective as another remedy might be. But it does achieve the partial remedial goal of regulating the future relationship between the parties and should make it easier for the applicants to assert a claim for 'better' relief (such as damages or an interdict) if the respondents fail to adhere to the declaration of rights.

Secondly, in some cases, it will seem impossible for a court to provide any relief — say, because the party or the parties are no longer in their jurisdiction.[3] In Mohamed & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the applicants had been deported to the US (from South Africa) to be tried for the bombing and the destruction of the US embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam.[4] In the United States, a conviction in federal district court could result in the imposition of a death sentence. The Constitutional Court held that the deportation was illegal. Given the unconstitutionality of the death sentence under the Final Constitution, the South African government ought not to have allowed them to be secreted out of the country by US officials (working in collusion with South African officials) without first obtaining an assurance that they would not receive the death penalty. By the time the decision was handed down the applicants were in New York — outside the Court's jurisdiction. Is it possible for the Court to provide a remedy in such a case?

The answer, again, must be yes. The Mohamed Court considered carefully what remedy would be appropriate and decided to give a declaratory order specifying how the government had breached the law and ordered that the judgment be sent to the federal district court in New York.[5] The Court also held that it possessed the authority to order the South African Government to intervene on the applicants' behalf with the US government but, considering the advanced stage of the criminal trial, declined to do so.[6] Still, the Court's order and its transmission to the district court might well have influenced the district court's decision not to impose the death penalty. Although the remedy was by necessity weak, it represented an attempt to cure the wrong that had been done to the applicants. It therefore demonstrates the Court's respect for the ubi jus principle.

[1] See, for example, South African Police Service v Public Servants Association 2007 (3) SA 521 (CC), [2007] 5 BLLR 383 (CC)(Both parties only sought clarification of the legal power of the National Commissioner of Police to upgrade or downgrade officers.)

[2] See, for example, KwaZulu-Natal MEC of Education & Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)(The respondent convinced the Court that her daughter had a right to wear a nose-stud to school, but by the time the case was decided, she had already left the school.)

[3] Under common law, the inability to enforce its judgment because the parties are not in its jurisdiction is a reason for a court to refuse to exercise jurisdiction at all. See, for example, Tsung & Another v Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa Limited & Another 2006 (4) SA 177 (SCA) at para 3.

[4] 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).

[5] Ibid at paras 70–72.

[6] Ibid at para 72.

Thirdly, FC s 35(5) would appear to endorse violations of rights that then go unremedied. It permits the admission of evidence obtained in violation of rights in the Bill of Rights if it will not render the trial unfair. FC s 35(5) recently caused something of a dust-up between the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court. A majority of the Supreme Court of Appeal had held that if a court found that evidence had been obtained in terms of an invalid search warrant, the documents had to be returned to the person from whom they were seized.[1] Nugent JA rejected the view that the power to fashion a 'just and equitable' remedy in terms of FC s 38 could justify a 'preservation order' that would allow the state to keep the material until the trial court decided whether it was admissible or not: 'It seems to me that the power to fashion remedies for constitutional infringements is given to courts to enable them to vindicate rights rather than to deny them.'[2] Because a preservation order would, on his view, permit a continuing violation of the right to privacy, he regarded it as an impermissible remedy.

When the matter came to the Constitutional Court, Langa CJ came to the opposite conclusion.[3] He held that preservation orders were not only permissible, but should be the default remedy where a warrant was declared invalid.[4] In the Chief Justice's view, it should be up to the trial court — not the court hearing the application to invalidate the warrant — to decide in terms of FC s 35(5) whether

[1] National Director for Public Prosecutions v Mohamed [2007] ZASCA 135; [2007] SCA 135 (RSA)(Nugent JA (Mlambo J concurring) and Ponnan JA made up the majority on this issue. Farlam JA (Cloete JA concurring) would have granted the preservation order. On the ultimate outcome, however, Ponnan JA was in the minority. He was unwilling to grant any preservation order. Farlam and Cloete JJA were, for the sake of deciding the case, willing to sign onto the limited preservation order accepted by Nugent JA that allowed a copy of the documents to be kept in case a future dispute about their identity arose.)

[2] Ibid at para 21 (Ponnan JA was even more forceful in his rejection of preservation orders: 'If the courts were to simply escape their responsibility for redressing constitutional violations, people will be secure only in the discretion of the police and the protections of the right would evaporate. After all, the entire point of the police conduct in this case that violated constitutional guarantees was to obtain evidence for use at a possible subsequent criminal trial. The Bill of Rights must not be reduced to a code that the State may abide in its discretion. The Constitution requires more; it demands a remedy for a violation. That remedy, one would have thought, is well-settled. But, says the State in this case, there now exists a constitutional injunction to reconsider existing remedies and to re-fashion them in accordance with the spirit of our new constitutional order. To my mind, there is a fallacy in that approach. It is this: Out of a remedy available to someone wronged by a rights violation, the wrongdoer seeks to fashion for itself a right that it otherwise would not have had. That can hardly be authorised by our Constitution. Moreover, the preservation order is being sought in this case in anticipation of possible criminal proceedings, not against the respondent, but against her erstwhile client, Mr Zuma. How, it must be asked, can the State resist a claim for restoration where the items were illegally seized and where, even at the date of the hearing of this appeal, there has been no firm commitment by it that fresh charges will as a fact be preferred against Mr Zuma in regard to which the seized items might be used by it as evidence?' Ibid at para 39.)

[3] Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others; Zuma and Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2008] ZACC 13 ('Thint').

[4] Ibid at para 222.

the evidence should be admitted at trial or not.[1] The trial court would be unable to exercise that discretion if the evidence was returned to the applicant. More importantly, he did not think there was anything unusual with his decision:

> Although the point of departure is that a victim of a constitutional violation is entitled to effective relief, a court must also take into account other relevant circumstances, including the interests of others and the public interest, which in turn includes the public interest in the prosecution of serious crime.[2]

I agree with the Chief Justice's conclusion, but not all his reasoning. Within the structure of the Bill of Rights, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the admissibility of evidence must be left to the trial court. To put it differently, even if you regard a preservation order as an ongong violation of the right to privacy, it is endorsed by FC s 35(5). It is also legitimate to argue that there could still be a remedy: a declaration that the warrant violated the applicant's right to privacy. Such a declaration would enable an accused to clear the first hurdle in FC s 35(5): the demonstration of a violation of the right to privacy. However, to the extent that Langa CJ suggests that in contexts outside of FC s 35(5) matters, considerations outside the need to vindicate the right can justify granting no remedy at all — which, unfortunately, seems the most natural reading of the decision —he ignores the ubi jus principle. Moreover, given that the Court has strongly endorsed the ubi jus at principle, it is disingenuous to argue that the decision is unambiguously supported by previous precedent.

The final case of imaginary deviations is Fose v Minister of Safety and Security.[3] Mr Fose sued the Minister for pain that he had suffered as a result of abuse while in police custody. He relied directly on his constitutional rights rather than on a delictual action. The Court held that it was impermissible for him to have done so as a delictual action would have provided an adequate remedy for the violation of his rights.[4] There is no violation of the ubi jus principle in this case. The principle does not entitle a litigant to any specific type of relief or even to 'direct' relief. Kriegler J makes this clear in his concurring judgment: 'while applicants are entitled to relief if their fundamental rights have been violated, they have no right to a particular remedy.'[5] As long as the law somehow provides redress for the wrong suffered, it cannot matter whether the legal basis for that relief is delictual or constitutional.[6]

[1] Thint (supra) at para 221.
[2] Ibid at para 223.
[3] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose').
[4] The interaction between public and private remedies is discussed in more detail in § 9.2*(f)* infra. Damages are discussed in § 9.5*(a)* infra.
[5] Fose (supra) at n 215.
[6] See also Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at paras 96–97 (The Court upheld the applicant's complaint that the selective enforcement of the obligation to pay electricity rates in different areas of Pretoria unfairly discriminated against him on the basis of race. However, it decided that this was not a defence to the Council's action against him. The right entitled him to other forms of relief such as a declaration of rights or a mandamus to force the Council to cease its discriminatory practices. This decision does not deny the right, it just says that the applicant is not entitled to the remedy he sought — immunity from a claim for electricity rates due. He was entitled to other relief, but he had not sought it.)

(bb) Real Deviations

The following cases reflect instances where, despite a finding that a right had been violated, a court does not afford the actual litigant any remedy. A litigant might prove that a constitutional violation has occurred and then find that the requested relief is ultimately offered to others, but not to him. In Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others the applicant successfully challenged a law that permitted a child to be adopted without the natural father's consent.[1] However, because of the many different ways in which the matter could be regulated, the Court decided to suspend the order for two years to allow the legislature to draft new legislation.[2] The effect was that Mr Fraser's child could be, and was, adopted without his consent. Mr Fraser found himself in precisely the same position he would have been in if the Court had concluded that he had no right at all.[3] Apart from cursorily noting that '[t]he applicant is not the only person affected by the impugned provision',[4] the Court does not even acknowledge, let alone justify, this breach of the ubi jus principle or the injustice that follows from failing to come to the aid of a litigant who has gone to enormous expense to have a statute declared unconstitutional. The Court's reasoning for ordering a suspension is compelling. However, it does not explain why they could not have created an interim remedy that would have come to the aid of the applicant and others in the same position.[5]

In other cases, a remedy is granted to some bearers of the right, but not to others. The Court's decision to limit the retrospective effect of its orders invariably has this consequence. For example, in Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another, the Court invalidated a provision that permitted police to use lethal force in affecting arrests in unconstitutionally wide circumstances.[6] However, the invalidity would only apply from the date of the judgment. So although the constitutional right had been in effect from 1994, people who lost breadwinners where the police had used unconstitutional force after 1994, but prior to Walters, would have no civil claim. Those persons who suffered a similar loss after the decision would have a civil claim. As the right existed both before and after the decision, a remedy was granted to some bearers of a right and not to others.

Here, the departure from the general principle seems eminently justifiable. Retrospective application would criminalise conduct that was not criminal at the

[1] 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)('Fraser').

[2] Ibid at paras 45–51.

[3] This case should be distinguished from other cases where suspension does not deny a remedy, but merely delays it. See, for example, Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International and Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)(A majority of the Court suspended an order that would legalize homosexual marriages. The right was only delayed because homosexual couples would be able to marry as soon as the period of suspension ended.)

[4] Fraser (supra) at para 50.

[5] For more on interim remedies, see § 9.4*(e)(i)(cc)* infra.

[6] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters').

time it was committed. Such an outcome would not only be unfair, but would potentially infringe FC s 35(3)(l).[1] Providing a remedy for one right — the FC s 12(2) right to bodily integrity — would unjustifiably limit another. In such situations, a court can justifiably depart from the principle that a remedy always requires a right.[2]

However, even here it is necessary to proceed with care. There may well have been alternative remedies that would have avoided a violation of FC s 35(3)(l) but still vindicated FC s 12(2). The Court might have ordered the State to establish a fund to compensate victims of unconstitutional shootings, or have created a precedent or a mechanism whereby survivors or the families of deceased victims could have attained the symbolic recognition that their right to freedom and security had been violated. While situations may arise where a conflict between rights makes it genuinely impossible to provide a remedy, in almost all cases some form of 'imperfect' or 'second-best' relief will be available.

Most of the other cases where the Court has limited the effect of its retrospectivity so as to deny some people a remedy have not justified the denial based upon an unjustifiable limitation of another right. In most instances, the Court's decision turns on the potentially deleterious social consequences of a fully retrospective order. In cases dealing with succession, they have limited their orders to cases where the estate has not yet been wound up.[3] In cases involving statutory time-bars[4] and reverse onus provisions[5] the orders have only applied to cases that have not yet been decided on appeal. For reasons I explain in more detail in the section dealing with retrospectivity, I believe that these departures from the ubi jus principle, while not entirely without foundation, are certainly constitutionally suspect and in many instances constitutionally infirm.[6] To put it briefly, the practical costs have to be extremely high to justify a departure from a principle that is as important to our constitutional system as the bond between rights and remedies.

[1] Walters (supra) at para 74. FC s 35(3)(l) reads: 'Every accused person has the right to a fair trial, which includes the right — not to be convicted for an act or omission that was not an offence under wither national or international law at the time it was committed or omitted'. See also Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria and Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)(The Court declared the common-law definition of rape unconstitutional because it applied only to female vaginal rape, not female anal rape. The decision only had prospective effect in order not to criminalize past conduct.) For more on FC s 35(3)(l), see F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 51.5*(m)*.

[2] See D Zeigler 'Rights Require Remedies: A New Approach to the Enforcement of Rights in the Federal Courts' (1987) 38 Hastings LJ 665, 680.

[3] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 563 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 126–129; Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at paras 32–43.

[4] Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC) at para 25; Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC), 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC)2 at para 45.

[5] See, for example, S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 748 (CC) at paras 32–34; S v Ntsele 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC) at paras 13–14.

[6] § 9.4*(e)*(ii) infra.

The final, and most disturbing, case in which the Court has not respected the general rule is Steenkamp NO v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape.[1] The applicant was a liquidator of a company (Balraz) that had been awarded a tender to provide an automatic cash payment service for welfare grants in the Eastern Cape. Soon after they were awarded the tender they began preparing to discharge their contractual responsibilities, incurring significant expenses in the process. However, a year later the tender was set aside by the High Court because of negligence by the Tender Board and was re-awarded to a different company. Balraz went insolvent as a result. The applicant complained that the Board was liable for the out-of-pocket expenses the company had incurred in preparing to perform the tender and sued the Board in delict.[2] The applicant took this course because the ordinary administrative remedies — having the award set aside or interdicting the Board to comply with some requirement — were not available in his situation. The sole issue for determination was whether the Board's conduct was wrongful, or to put it differently, whether the applicant was, in principle, entitled to claim damages.

A majority of the Constitutional Court held that even accepting that the Board had acted negligently — and therefore that Balraz's FC s 33 right to reasonable administrative action had been violated — the applicant was not entitled to a claim for damages. Moseneke DCJ went so far as to hold that 'even if there may not be a public law remedy such as an interdict, review or appeal this is no reason for resorting to damages as a remedy for out-of-pocket loss.'[3] He offers a number of reasons for this conclusion: namely: (a) it would result in different treatment for successful and unsuccessful tenderers;[4] (b) public considerations which require tender board adjudicators to be immune from damages claims in respect of their negligent but honest decisions;[5] (c) the legislation was designed to ensure

[1] 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC)('Steenkamp').

[2] As a result, the determination of whether the applicant was entitled to reclaim the lost expenses took place in the legal framework of a debate about the delictual wrongfulness of the Board's actions. This undoubtedly coloured the Court's approach to the question of whether a remedy was available or not. This intersection between public and private remedies is discussed in more detail in § 9.2*(f)* infra. However, from a constitutional point of view, it should not make a difference that the claim was brought in this manner as the right at stake remains a constitutional one. Indeed, after Fose (supra) the applicant was obliged to rely first on a delictual claim.

[3] Steenkamp (supra) at para 54. He reached this conclusion because, in his view, Balraz was not without a remedy: it could have (a) re-applied for the tender; or (b) ensured contractual protection for the possibility of out-of-pocket expenses. Ibid at paras 49–52. However, as Langa CJ and O'Regan J point out in their dissent, neither of these are effective remedies for the violation of the right to administrative justice. Ibid at paras 88–89. Indeed, they are not even remedies; they are steps that Balraz might have taken to mitigate its loss, not remedies that could be enforced by a court for the violation of Balraz's rights. To equate these options with judicial remedies is a mistake as they would have these options even without a right to administrative justice. This discussion proceeds on the basis that there were no alternative remedies.

[4] Ibid at para 54

[5] Ibid at para 55*(a)*.

a tender process in the public interest, not to protect tenderers;[1] and (d) permitting damages claims would create 'a spiral of litigation [that] is likely to delay, if not to weaken the effectiveness of or grind to a stop the tender process.'[2] As the dissent of Langa CJ and O'Regan J notes, these reasons do not hold up to scrutiny.[3]

But even if they did, even if they were excellent reasons, they do not change the principle which underlies the Court's decision: it is entitled to deny a specific applicant the only possible remedy for the violation of a constitutional right if it believes that it is in the public interest. This arrogation of power — that may well constitute a form of judicial overreach (re-writing, not interpreting, the basic law itself) — in effect denies the applicant the right: 'Where a man has but one remedy to come at his right, if he loses that he loses his right.'[4] Steenkamp, it seems to me, is a far more disturbing precedent than Walters or Fraser. Those cases all concerned the validity of legislation and the practical difficulty of giving relief to specific classes of rights-bearers because of the nature of the legislation and the manner in which the case was brought. The deprivation is a temporary one that only affects the right for a limited period of time, either in the past (retrospectivity) or in the future (suspension). Although one can criticise the conclusions that the Court reached in particular cases, these exceptions to the general principle seems to be an unfortunate necessity of operating within a constitutional democracy.

Steenkamp, on the other hand, stands for the proposition that a court can permanently deny a remedy to bearers of a right. No initially successful tenderer will ever be able to claim delictual damages because of the loss they suffered as a result of the negligence of a tender board.[5] That makes the right to administrative justice worthless. Again: the Court has effectively decided to rewrite the Final Constitution in a manner that allows it not only to decide when a constitutional right should be upheld, but whether a constitutional right actually exists.[6] That is a

[1] Steenkamp (supra) at para 55*(b)*

[2] Ibid at para 55*(c)*.

[3] Ibid at paras 87–93.

[4] Ashby v White (1703) 92 Eng Rep 126 (KB).

[5] Fortunately, the impact on the law is likely to be very limited as applicants in the position of Balraz might well have a claim under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 ('PAJA'). PAJA s 8(1)(c)(ii)(bb) permits the payment of compensation in exceptional circumstances. The absence of any other vindication would surely qualify as 'exceptional circumstances'. See Steenkamp (supra) at paras 99–101 (Sachs J). This however does not alter the effect of the remedial principle adopted in Steenkamp which may affect the future development of the common law.

[6] I am not advocating that rights cannot be limited — FC s 36 clearly permits them to be — but they can only be limited by laws of general application that are reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. If legislation or the common law outlawed damages claims in circumstances such as those that Balraz found itself in, government could attempt to justify that limitation of FC s 33 before a Court. There would not be a problem of a right without a remedy, as the right itself would be properly limited. The problem with Steenkamp is that there is no attempt to limit the right to administrative justice; the right, theoretically, remains unlimited but it is de-valued by denying a remedy for its violation. For more on FC s 36, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

very dangerous precedent indeed.[1] However broad the Court's power under the Final Constitution may be, it does not possess the power to amend the Final Constituion.[2] That power lies with Parliament alone.

(iii) The Legal Position

What then is the legal status of the ubi jus, ibi remedium principle in South African constitutional law? After Fraser, Walters and Steenkamp, it is clearly not an absolute rule. Those cases make it clear that a right can exist without a remedy. One danger is that the Court appears to treat the principle[3] as if it were merely part of a remedial balancing exercise — an orientation that absolves the Court of the need to provide a more compelling justification for these aberrant conclusions. Were the Court to reflect upon the collective effect of these deviant judgments, I do not think it would endorse as many exceptions to the rule. Its general rhetoric in favour of granting effective remedies in every case is far too strong.[4] Even in Steenkamp, Moseneke DCJ wrote:

> It goes without saying that every improper performance of an administrative function would implicate the Constitution and entitle the aggrieved party to appropriate relief. In each case the remedy must fit the injury. The remedy must be fair to those affected by it and yet vindicate effectively the right violated.[5]

Therefore, I think it is best to view Steenkamp as mistakes. The correct position

[1] The reason for the decision in Steenkamp seems to be confusion between the law of delict and constitutional law. Under delict a person only has a claim to damages if an act is 'wrongful'. In effect, wrongfulness determines the existence of a right — there is no right for compensation caused by non-wrongful conduct. Under constitutional law, the entitlement to a remedy is not based on 'wrongfulness' but on whether a specific right has been violated. The flaw in the majority's reasoning is to assume that even though a constitutional right has been violated, there may not be a remedy if the violation is not wrongful. This subverts the relationship between the law of delict and constitutional law by placing delictual principles of wrongfulness above constitutional rights. This fails to respect the decree in FC s 2 that '[t]he Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic' (my emphasis). The correct position is that if conduct violates a right in the Bill of Rights (or indeed, any other chapter of the Constitution) it is delictually wrongful. For more on the relationship between private remedies and public remedies, see § 9.2*(f)* infra.

[2] There is a more generous interpretation of Steenkamp: All the Court said was that the applicant was not entitled to delictual damages, but he might have been entitled to constitutional damages. This interpretation seems to conform with Moseneke DCJ's focus on the delictual wrongfulness of the act and it is conceivable that the Court would have come to a different conclusion if the case had been brought as a direct reliance on the FC s 33. But I find it very difficult to believe that the Court would not have considered the same factors when determining if an award of damages was 'just and equitable' under FC s 38 as it did in determining whether the conduct was delictually wrongful. If the Court would have reached a different decision under FC s 33 then it just shows that the decision not to award delictual damages was wrong. It makes no sense to afford constitutional damages but not delictual damages when the law of delict can reasonably be interpreted to permit the claim.

[3] See, for example, Thint and Steenkamp.

[4] That rhetoric is discussed in more detail at § 9.2*(e)* infra.

[5] Steenkamp (supra) at para 29 (my emphasis).

must be that the principle is not absolute, but that any deviation must be grounded in extremely weighty and compelling considerations. Every remedial avenue should be explored and 'new tools forged'[1] before a court concedes that it really is impossible to afford any relief at all.

(iv) Remedies without Rights?

A final interesting question is whether a court can provide a remedy without finding that a right has been violated. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, perhaps surprisingly, suggests that it can. In Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions: Johannesburg High Court & Others, the Court concluded that legislation detailing how the sentences of people on death-row should be replaced did not violate any constitutional rights.[2] However, the Sibiya Court held that the government had taken far too long to complete the process of substituting sentences. It ordered a supervisory interdict to monitor the completion of the process. In doing so, it did not suggest that government's slow progress violated any rights. Yacoob J simply reasoned: 'This Court has the jurisdiction to issue a mandamus in appropriate circumstances and to exercise supervisory jurisdiction over the process of the execution of its order [in S v Makwanyane & Another][3]. It is appropriate in this case for this to be done.'[4] However the Court was not just enforcing Makwanyane. The order in Makwanyane required that all persons on death row 'will remain in custody under the sentences imposed on them, until such sentences have been set aside in accordance with law and substituted by lawful punishments.'[5] It did not set any time limit, nor suggest that a delay would violate a right. The order in Sibiya does not simply enforce the order in Makwanyane: it goes further by requiring that the sentences be converted within a specified timeframe. And it does so without first finding a violation of any right.[6]

Consider also Mnguni v Minister of Correctional Services & Others[7] and De Kock v Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry & Others.[8] In both these cases — involving claims for medical parole and for prevention of pollution respectively — the

[1] Fose (supra) at para 69 ('Particularly in a country where so few have the means to enforce their rights through the courts, it is essential that on those occasions when the legal process does establish that an infringement of an entrenched right has occurred, it be effectively vindicated. The courts have a particular responsibility in this regard and are obliged to "forge new tools" and shape innovative remedies, if needs be, to achieve this goal.')

[2] 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC)('Sibiya').

[3] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane').

[4] Sibiya (supra) at para 61.

[5] Makwanyane (supra) at para 151.

[6] See also Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng & Others [2008] ZACC 8 at para 152 (Justice Nkabinde adopted a similar stance in her dissent. Despite finding that the legislation at issue — which prevented the attachment of state assets for the satisfaction of a judgment debt — did not violate any rights, she still concurred in the majority's grant of a supervisory interdict to regulate the payment of government debts.)

[7] 2005 (12) BCLR 1187 (CC)('Mnguni').

[8] 2005 (12) BCLR 1183 (CC)('De Kock').

Court, in very brief judgments, refused the applications for direct access. However, because it saw some potential merit in the cases, it referred them to the Law Society with a request that the Society consider whether one of its members could represent the applicants.[1] Thus, the applicants received a remedy (of sorts) without establishing that the Court had jurisdiction or that a right had been violated.

While granting a remedy where no right has been violated may seem anomalous, there is clear support for this practice in the constitutional text. FC s 172(1)(b) empowers any court 'when deciding a constitutional matter' to 'make any order that is just and equitable'. The power to make the order is not dependent on a finding that a right has been violated, but simply that the matter is a constitutional one. Similarly, FC s 38 requires only an allegation that a right has been infringed or threatened to trigger a court's power to 'grant appropriate relief'. There will be cases where a sense of justice manifestly requires a remedy, even where no right has been violated. Courts engage in such behaviour when they grant interim remedies; no right has yet been violated, but the real possibility that a right might be violated justifies an order to prevent that violation.[2] The wide wording of FC ss 38 and 172(1)(b) suggests that constitutional drafters seemed to have envisioned that such cases would arise and that respect for the Final Constitution would require judicial intervention. One might also contend that open ended provisions such as FC s 39(2) invite the Court to pursue justifiable remedies without any meaningful alteration of the law (and thus any finding of a constitutional violation.)

However, despite the textual space for granting remedies where no rights have been violated, there are serious problems with exercising this power. Firstly, it is generally inappropriate to impose a remedial burden on a party, even the government, when they have not failed to discharge a legal duty or are not guilty of some constitutional infraction. It is not only unfair to the party, it undermines legal certainty as government does not know how it should act in order to avoid sanction. Secondly, it threatens the courts' legitimacy. As I explain more fully below,[3] unfettered remedial discretion poses potential problems for courts whose legitimacy depends, at least in part, on the constraints of legal materials. Courts that view themselves as unconstrained by legal texts and well-established principles are, indeed, usurping the roles of the legislature and executive. The idea that courts can only exercise their remedial powers following a legal finding that a right has been violated is an essential constraint on judicial power and lies at the heart of a new legal order that has self-consciously turned the rule of law doctrine and the principle of legality into first principles of our constitutional democracy.

I would therefore suggest that the power should only be exercised in limited circumstances. I can think of four such circumstances — although they by no means constitute a closed list. Firstly, FC s 38 contemplates situations in which a remedy may be provided where a right has not yet been violated — the right may merely be threatened. This pre-emptive remedy is an extension of the general ubi jus principle: it is necessary to protect the right.[1] Second, the protection of a constitutional principle — as opposed to a right — may require a remedy. This rationale underlies the majority's order in Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng & Others.[2] In justifying the imposition of a structural interdict to regulate the payment of outstanding court orders against the state, Madala J argues that:

[1] Mnguni (supra) at para 7 and De Kock (supra) at paras 5–6.
[2] See § 9.5*(c)*(ii) infra.
[3] See § 9.2*(d)*(ii) infra.

> Certain values in the Constitution have been designated as foundational to our democracy. . . . If these values are not observed and their precepts not carried out conscientiously, we have a recipe for a constitutional crisis of great magnitude. In a state predicated on a desire to maintain the rule of law, it is imperative that one and all should be driven by a moral obligation to ensure the continued survival of our democracy. That, in my view, means at the very least that there should be strict compliance with court orders.[3]

These foundational values, rather than the enforcement of any rights, justified the structural remedy.

Thirdly, a remedy may be required that goes beyond the apparent parameters of the right in order to ensure that the right is actually respected. The Court in Sibiya seems to regard the interdict it grants as necessary to give full effect to the right not to be subjected to capital punishment.

Fourthly, a remedy may be necessary to ensure both the proper administration of our courts and effective use of our legal system by those most in need of the protection it ostensibly affords. Such reasons appear to animate the decisions in Mnguni and De Kock. The applicants were clearly without legal assistance and would, because of the way courts generally function, be unable to pursue possibly legitimate claims without legal assistance.

Whenever a court issues a remedy in the last three circumstances mentioned above, or in any other circumstance where a right has not been violated, it should consider very carefully the impact its decision will have on legal certainty and judicial legitimacy. Neither good should be lightly sacrificed.

(c) Rights and Remedies

This section considers the relationship between rights and remedies. The traditional wisdom is that 'rights and remedies are made of different stuff'.[4] Rights are

[1] See, for example, Jamiat-Ul-Ulama of Transvaal v Johncom Media Investment Ltd & Others [2006] ZAGPHC 12 (The High Court granted an interdict preventing the Sunday Times from publishing cartoons depicting the Muslim prophet Mohammed because it would violate the dignity of Muslims. If one accepts that finding, then granting the remedy makes sense.) For criticism of this decision, see D Milo, G Penfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 42.9*(h)*.

[2] Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng & Others [2008] ZACC 8.

[3] Ibid at para 80.

[4] D Levinson 'Rights Essentialism and Remedial Equilibration' (1999) 99 Columbia Law Review 857,2 858.

philosophical constructs that describe our ideal society. Remedies reflect the practical wisdom — the actual means — required to make those aspirations a reality. However, I will argue that the traditional wisdom is descriptively inaccurate. Remedies are not simply tools to be used to realise rights. In a variety of ways, remedies determine both the value and the content of rights.

(i) Ways of understanding the rights-remedies relationship

There are three ways in which to understand the relationship between rights and remedies.[1] First, 'automatic remedialism'.[2] Under this approach a specific remedy flows automatically from the assertion of the right. Secondly, rights and remedies can be seen as separate. Judges have a discretion to choose a remedy that gives effect to the right. One might call this description: 'rights essentialism'. Thirdly, rights and remedies can be viewed as inter-related. The rights a constitution recognizes obviously affect the remedies that are available; but remedies also affect the value and the content of rights. I will call this 'remedial equilibration'.[3] The three approaches differ on two issues: the extent to which remedies affect rights and the discretion courts have in crafting remedies.

(aa) Automatic remedialism

This approach to remedies holds that when a litigant proves that a delictual right has been violated, the remedy — normally an award of damages — flows automatically. In the United States, Abram Chayes has characterised this 'traditional' model of civil adjudication in the following terms:

> The scope of the relief is derived, more or less logically from the substantive violation under the general theory that the plaintiff will get compensation measured by the harm caused by the defendant's breach of duty.[4]

This is, generally,[5] the position for common-law actions. Courts do not have discretion to choose a remedy; the right a litigant relies on generally determines the remedy. A delictual claim equals damages while the rei vindicatio demands the [1] See K Cooper-Stephenson 'Principle and Pragmatism in the Law of Remedies' in J Bennyman (ed) Remedies: Issues and Perspectives (1991) 1, 5–6.

[2] Cooper-Stephenson calls this approach 'rights maximising' — a phrase he borrows from Paul Gerwitz. Ibid at 5 citing P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585. I do not believe Cooper-Stephenson's use of the term in this context accurately describes the manner in which Gerwitz employs it. Gerwitz does not imply that rights-maximising judges do not have a discretion in choosing a remedy. He simply argues that such a judge must exercise the discretion in a manner that will best give effect to the right. For more on 'rights-maximising', see § 9.2*(e)*(ii) infra.

[3] Both 'rights essentialism' and 'remedial equilibration' are terms borrowed from Daryl Levinson.

[4] A Chayes 'The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation' (1976) 89 Harvard LR 1281, 1282.

[5] There are, however, cases where courts have some discretion. For example, in certain contractual claims courts can choose whether to order damages or specific performance. In defamation claims, courts can order an apology or retraction in addition to damages.

return of property. Similarly, in constitutional law a finding that law or conduct is unconstitutional results automatically in a declaration of invalidity.[1] The right and the remedy are seen as a single package — right = remedy. Courts have no discretion in picking a remedy and remedial options do not affect the content of rights. But apart from this important exception, the idea of automatic remedialism does not generally hold sway. The Constitutional Court has regularly asserted that courts have a discretion in fashioning remedies. Although it has established a number of rules and principles that confine the extent of that discretion, it has certainly not adopted any rules that automatically require a particular remedy for the violation of a particular right.[2]

(bb) Rights Essentialism

Lawrence Sager describes 'in a nutshell'[3] what rights essentialists believes:

> It is part of the intellectual fabric of constitutional law and its jurisprudence that there is an important distinction between a statement which describes an ideal which is embodied in the Constitution and a statement which attempts to translate such an ideal into a workable standard for the decision of concrete issues.[4]

Rights essentialists treat rights as 'ideals, ultimate value judgments that are derived from some privileged source of legitimacy' while remedies 'exist not in the realm of the ideal but in the realm of the concrete, not in the domain of constitutionally privileged values but in the domain of contingent facts.'[5] Rights represent the ideal society; remedies are the means through which that society is brought into being. Rights essentialism holds that courts have a discretion in fashioning remedies and that the causal relationship only flows from rights to remedies, not vice versa.

This is the pre-eminent view in South African constitutional law. It is most obvious in the structure of analysis in the vast majority of Constitutional Court cases. The cases distinguish rights (and limitations) analysis from remedies analysis: only after a finding of an unjustifiably limitation of a right can does one consider the appropriate response to the violation. Moreover, in Fose Kriegler J echoed the description of rights essentialism I gave earlier when he wrote: 'When courts give relief, they attempt to synchronise the real world with the ideal construct of a constitutional world'.[6] Stressing the one-way relationship between [1] FC s 172(1)(a). For more on declarations of invalidity, see § 9.4*(c)* infra.

[2] For more detail on the extent of courts' remedial discretion, see § 9.2*(d)(i)* infra.

[3] Levinson (supra) at 861.

[4] L Sager 'Fair Measure: The Legal Status of Underenforced Constitutional Norms' (1978) 91 Harvard LR 1212, 1213.

[5] Levinson (supra) at 861. See also Cooper-Stephenson (supra) at 6 ('In sum, a court does very distinct things when it adjudicates a right and fashions a remedy. It reasons at different levels of abstraction, appeals to different kinds of justifications, employs different conceptual and linguistic strategies, and invokes different criteria of choice.') rights and remedies, Sachs and Mokgoro JJ in Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier, Western Cape & Another held: 'It is the remedy that must adapt itself to the right, not the right to the remedy.'[1] These statements clearly indicate the court's preference for rights essentialism. Rights essentialism also seems to be the creed of South African scholars. In their excellent chapter on remedies, Iain Currie and Johan De Waal write that the object of constitutional remedies 'is to make the real world more consistent with the Bill of Rights.'[2]

[6] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose') at para 94.

(cc) Remedial Equilibration

Although the 'theory' has existed for some time,[3] remedial equilibration owes both its name and its full explication to Daryl Levinson. On this account, rights essentialism is an illusion that bears no relation to reality:

> In the actual practice of constitutional adjudication … the qualitative distinction between rights and remedies blurs, or even dissolves … rights and remedies in constitutional law are interdependent and inextricably intertwined.[4]

While the rights essentialists argue that causation only runs from rights to remedies — rights affect remedies, but remedies don't affect rights — Levinson's theory of remedial equilibration shows how causation also runs the other way — from remedies to rights.[5] It is this 'reciprocity of right-remedy causation' that Levinson identifies as the 'central feature of the remedial equilibration model'.[6] Perhaps the position is best explained by Paul Gerwitz:

> All dimensions of the law are affected by the world of the practical, the real, the subjective, the political — in short, 'the world' as we know it. The duality of the ideal and the real exists, but it pervades the judicial function. The two-sidedness is not conveniently deposited in the separate categories of right and remedy. The practicalities cannot be cordoned off into a separate domain to keep rights-declaring purely 'ideal.' There is a permeable wall between rights and remedies: The prospect of actualizing rights through a remedy — the recognition that rights are for actual people in an actual world — makes it inevitable that thoughts of remedy will affect thoughts of right, that judges' minds will shuttle back and forth between right and remedy.[7]

[1] 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto') at para 186.
[2] The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 196.
[3] See Gerwitz (supra) and Cooper-Stephenson (supra).
[4] Levinson (supra) at 857. See also S Sturm 'Equality and the Forms of Justice' (2003) 58 Univ of Miami LR 51, 51 ('law operates in the world of the practical, tethered to the realities of dispute processing and implementation. The work of many great legal scholars and activists occupies this unstable space between principle and practice.')
[5] Levinson (supra) at 884.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Gerwitz (supra) at 678–679 (footnotes omitted).

This theory of 'the tail wagging the dog'[1] has received significant support among American academics.[2]

Although the Constitutional Court has primarily adopted a rights essentialist position, it has, in at least one case, acknowledged the impact that rights have on remedies. In Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape the Court was concerned with the FC s 35(3)(d) right to a trial within a reasonable time.[3] Before considering American and Canadian case law on the topic, Kriegler J cautioned that the precedents were of limited value because the only possible remedy in those jurisdictions was a stay of prosecution and that this remedy had determined (and thereby constrained) the proper interpretation of the right.[4] He then held that: 'Our flexibility in providing remedies may affect our understanding of the right.'[5] And indeed it did.[6] He interpreted the right to entitle applicants to different forms of relief depending on the nature of prejudice they had suffered.[7] (By contrast, US and Canadian courts can do no more than consider whether the right is violated and a permanent stay is justified.)

Part of the doctrine of remedial equilibration is that courts often mix remedies and rights unconsciously or without acknowledging that remedial concerns are affecting their construction of the right. Sanderson is therefore very unusual: both because it does not conform with the Court's general adherence to rights essentialism and because the Court explicitly admits that available remedies are a factor in interpreting the content of a right. Sanderson is not, however, the only case in

[1] Cooper-Stehphenson (supra) at 10 ('A so-called right to contractual performance, to a fair hearing or even to equality is similarly dependant on the issuance of a specific remedy — not only in its substantive form but in the 'completeness' of is legal protection, since a substitutional remedy such as damages may fall short in so many ways. The remedial tail will frequently wag the substantive dog and thereby redefine the dog's substantive character. What may happen is that the apparent 'rule' of substantive entitlement is waived aside by a contradictory 'standard' of the law of remedies.')

[2] Apart from Gerwitz and Levinson, the theory is endorsed, in some form, in, for example, J Jeffries 'The Right-Remedy Gap in Constitutional Law' (1990) 109 Yale LJ 87; B Friedman 'When Rights Encounter Reality: Enforcing Federal Remedies' (1992) 65 Southern California LR 735; C Sabel & W Simon 'Destablization Rights: How Public Law Litigation Succeeds' (2004) 117 Harvard LR 1015.

[3] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC)('Sanderson').

[4] Ibid at para 27 and n 23.

[5] Ibid at para 27 quoted with approval in Bel Porto (supra) at para 180 (Sachs and Mokgoro JJ).

[6] See F Snyckers & J Le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Accused and Detained Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 51–131 (The authors argue that Kriegler J's statement 'should not be understood to conflate the right with the remedy, or as allowing a finding of violation to depend on the appropriateness of the remedy sought. On the contrary, it is to be taken as a cue to separate the question of violation from that of the remedy sought. For while the broad array of remedies available under the Final Constitution does make it easier for a court to find a violation of a fundamental right, one must keep in mind that the finding of a violation need not entail the very drastic remedy of what amounts to unconditional discharge.' The authors are correct that the statement does not 'conflate the right with the remedy'; that is, it does not endorse a form of automatic remedialism. However, the assertion that it 'separates' right and remedy does not mean it supports rights essentialism. As they acknowledge, the statement clearly conceives of the possibility of remedial options impacting on the content of the right. That is remedial equilibration.)

[7] Sanderson (supra) at para 41.

which the Court has engaged in remedial equilibration. The following section argues that, despite its assertions to the contrary, remedial equilibration is in many ways a more accurate description of the Court's remedial jurisprudence than rights essentialism.

(ii) Methodological Concerns

Before I explore each of the ways in which remedies affect rights, I must note the limits of this exercise. In almost all these cases, the judges do not acknowledge that remedies influence their construction of the right. Attributing the result to remedial concerns is therefore speculative. Levinson acknowledges this limitation with reference to remedial deterrence, although both the caution and the explanation seem to me equally applicable to other forms of remedial equilibration:

> Individual examples of remedial deterrence are difficult to document with great confidence because claiming that a right would be different if a different remedy followed entails a counterfactual claim that is ordinarily highly speculative: that the right would have been A rather than B if the remedy had been X rather than Y. If we knew what the 'real' shape or extension of the right looked like, then we could decide whether the observed shape was 'distorted,' and if so, whether remedial deterrence was a causal factor. Lacking direct epistemic access to the 'real' right (even assuming the ontology of such an entity), the best we can do is observe the changes in judicial decisionmaking over time and test likely causes. As a result, any individual example of remedial deterrence will inevitably be contestable. This is especially true of the examples that follow, which are presented without any serious attempt to rule out alternative explanations. Nevertheless, generating a series of plausible cases will hopefully suffice to illustrate the general point that remedial consequences exert an important influence over the shape and existence of constitutional rights.[1]

My own examples are even more deficient than Levinson's as they are, generally, not based on patterns of court behaviour over time but on a court's action in a single case. Nevertheless, like Levinson, I believe that remedial equilibration is generally the best explanation for the Constitutional Court's action and that the accumulation of cases strongly suggests the validity of the equilibration thesis.

Two major differences in the legal framework in South Africa and in the US require us to slightly alter the way we understand Levinson's contribution. Firstly, unlike the US Constitution, the Final Constitution includes a limitations clause — FC s 36(1) — that is meant to permit limitations of rights if doing so is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom, dignity and equality'. The limitations analysis will almost always include the evaluation of the practical — read 'remedial' — consequences of upholding or abolishing the limitation.[2] Showing the influence of possible remedies on the interpretation or application of FC s 36(1) would be redundant. This section therefore only considers cases where remedial concerns influence rights rather than the limitation of rights. Secondly, Levinson notes that

[1] Levinson (supra) at 890.

[2] For more on FC s 36(1), see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 31.

> [a]ll judicially interpreted constitutional rights are over- and under-enforced in the sense that they might well be different in some abstract, theoretical realm (or a purely declaratory system of constitutional adjudication) where they would never have to be enforced.[1]

Although South Africa is certainly not a 'purely declaratory system', it does demand declaration in some cases[2] and the Constitutional Court has shown a discernable partiality to declaration as an appropriate remedy.[3] The availability of a declaration of invalidity as a remedy does perhaps mean that courts are substantially freer to define rights in the abstract than they might be in the US. However, I do not think this 'freedom' undermines the validity of the thesis as a whole.

(iii) An Equilibrating Court

Rights affect remedies in six ways. Firstly, as the Court did in Sanderson, the availability of remedies can expand the content of rights. I will call this remedial flexibility. Two: remedial deterrence is in some sense the opposite of remedial flexibility — the negative practical consequences of giving a right a wide meaning may force a court to give it a narrower interpretation. Thirdly, remedial incorporation occurs where a prophylactic rule is incorporated into a right because of the remedial difficulties of precise enforcement. Remedial substantiation, four, is different from the previously mentioned methods: it does not alter the content of the right. Instead, it asserts that the value of a right is dependant on the remedies that are available for its vindication. Fifthly, the availability of remedies affects the cases that litigants are willing to bring to court and, as a result, the rights that receive the most development. Finally, the remedy requested may determine whether a litigant even gets his foot in the courtroom door.

(aa) Remedial flexibility

This practice is precisely what occurred in Sanderson. As Kriegler J says, it is the 'flexibility in providing remedies' that impacts on the 'understanding of the right'.[4] Levinson seems to regard this practice as part of remedial deterrence.[5] He argues that the Supreme Court could never have created the Miranda[6] rules if it had not been able to limit the retroactive impact because 'if the warning requirement had

[1] Levinson (supra) at 925–926 (my emphasis).
[2] FC s 172(1)(b). See § 9.4*(a)* infra.
[3] See § 9.5*(b)* and § 9.6*(a)* infra.
[4] Sanderson (supra) at para 27.
[5] Levinson (supra) at 889–890.
[6] Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966).

applied retroactively … every prisoner [would have been] released from custody on postconviction review.'[1] It was only '[b]y making Miranda mostly nonretroactive, [that] the Court eliminated the remedial deterrent threat of emptying the prisons and enabled the Miranda right to exist.'[2]

To my mind, this practice is different from remedial deterrence. Remedial deterrence involves a court interpreting a right in a certain way to avoid an undesirable remedial consequence. Remedial flexibility occurs when a court feels free to interpret the right as it deems fit because of the range of remedial options available to it. That freedom is a hallmark of remedial equilibration — and not rights essentialism — because a rights essentialist would interpret the right in the same way no matter what remedies were available. A court relying on its remedial flexibility considers the remedial consequences in fashioning the content of the right as it would reach a different decision if it did not have such a range of remedial options.

Remedial flexibility is, ironically, both the most prevalent and the most difficult to prove form of remedial equilibration in South African case law. Because of the immense remedial flexibility our courts have,[3] it could be argued that any decision where they rely on that flexibility might have turned out differently if they did not have that flexibility. Apart from Sanderson, the Court[4] does not admit that its conclusions might have been different if it had fewer remedial options. However, the consequences of a more confined remedial discretion in two classes of cases illustrates the likelihood that the Court's remedial flexibility affects its construction of rights.

Firstly, consider cases where, as in Miranda, the Court limits the retrospective effect of its orders. It is difficult to believe that the Court would have found violations in certain cases if this remedial option was not open to it. Take, for example, S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) — the Court invalidated the rule casting a reverse onus on people in possession of stolen goods to prove they had reasonable cause to believe the goods were not stolen.[5] The Court limited the retrospective effect so that it only applied to cases that had not been finalised. Considering the compelling reasons in the dissent of O'Regan J and Cameron AJ, would the majority have reached the same conclusion if they could not limit the retrospective impact and, as a result, all prisoners convicted under the section since 1994 would have to be released? Or how about Masiya[6] and Walters.[7] In both cases the Court limited the retrospective impact so as not

[1] Levinson (supra) at 890.
[2] Ibid.
[3] See § 9.2*(d)*(i) infra.
[4] The minority of Mokgoro and Sachs JJ endorse the statement in Bel Porto (supra) at para 181.
[5] 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC).
[6] 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya'). Masiya is also one of the few cases where the Court explicitly explains how its remedial concerns influenced on its construction of the right.
[7] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC).

to criminalize past conduct.[1] Would they have reached the same conclusion if the necessary result was to violate the FC s 35(3)(l) right not to be convicted of an act that was not a crime at the time it was committed?

The second class of cases are a function of the Court's suspension of an order of invalidity. In S v Ntuli[2] and S v Steyn,[3] the failure to suspend the order of invalidity would have resulted in a massive increase in the number of criminal appeals from the Magistrates' Court and potentially would have swamped the High Courts. The failure to suspend the order of invalidity in Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others[4] would potentially have meant that there was no legal authority for government to make social assistance payments,[5] while in Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others[6] it would have necessitated the invalidation of a five-month-old election. Would the court have constructed the right in the same way if it knew that these drastic consequences would inevitably follow?

In all these cases, although we cannot know for sure, it seems very likely that the Court would have reached a different conclusion at the rights stage if the option of limiting retrospectivity or suspending the order had not been available.

(bb) Remedial Deterrence

Remedial deterrence is the most worrying form of remedial equilibration. It is the flip-side of remedial flexibility. While in remedial flexibility rights can develop freely because remedial options are available to limit their impact, remedial deterrence shows us how constraints in the provision of remedies or concerns about the consequence of remedies directly alter the content of rights. This normally acts to constrain or lessen the content of rights as a 'threat of undesirable remedial consequences motivate[s] courts to construct the right in such a way as to avoid those consequences'.[7]

The history of school desegregation in the US provides a good model of this phenomenon. It was unclear for a long time whether the finding in Brown v Board of Education[8] — where the Supreme Court banned racial segregation in schools and, in Brown II,[9] required that existing segregation be remedied 'with all

[1] In Masiya, the conduct (anal rape of a female) was a crime, but would be re-classified as rape rather than indecent assault.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC).

[3] 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC).

[4] 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC) at para 69 (The Court held that the government had improperly assigned the payment of social grants to the provinces.)

[5] See Ex parte Minister of Social Development & Others 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC) at paras 18–20 (The Court was considering an application to extend the suspension granted in Mashavha. Although it did not decide the issue, it accepted that the possibility of the suspension expiring without new legislation being enacted would be to remove the authority for officials to pay social grants.)

[6] 2007 (6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC).

[7] Levinson (supra) at 885.

[8] 347 US 483 (1954)('Brown').

[9] Brown v Board of Education 349 US 294 (1955).

deliberate speed' — was a prohibition only of de jure segregation or of de facto segregation.[1] As Levinson argues, the Brown and Brown II courts left that question open as they were dealing only with de jure segregation and obstructive officials. The real meaning of what the equal protection clause required 'only later came into focus, gradually and retrospectively, through the lens of remedy.'[2] Immediately after Brown the Supreme Court held that although de facto segregation was not in itself unconstitutional, but if the school district had engaged in earlier de jure segregation, it attracted a strong presumption of unconstitutionality.[3] The consequence of this approach was that a large number of school districts came under the control of the federal judiciary. The judiciary then devised a range of remedies — with the bussing of children and the rearrangement of school districts being the most prominent — to achieve de facto integration. This interventionism led, in turn, to growing political opposition and judicial unease about the extent to which the courts were micro-managing school affairs and local government. The Supreme Court then made a series of decisions limiting the use of bussing.[4] As Levinson notes:

> Nominally, these are all changes that rein in remedies while leaving the Brown right untouched; functionally, however, these decisions have redefined the right. Just as allowing expansive remedies had pushed Brown toward a de facto right in many school districts, constricting remedies is now pulling Brown toward a de jure right.[5]

This line of cases culminates in the recent case of Parents Involved in Community Schools v Seattle School District No. 1. A plurality of the Supreme Court rejected two school districts' integration plans and fell one vote short[6] of redefining Brown as endorsing a colour-blind constitution — and therefore prohibiting only de jure segregation.[7] The case was not brought as a challenge to the underlying principle of Brown, and the Court did not rule out all attempts at integration. But the impact of the extremely small range of remedies that the Court deemed permissible — (bussing was not one) — had the effect of altering the content of the right.

Remedial deterrence is most obviously prevalent in the Constitutional Court's socio-economic rights jurisprudence. In its first brush with socio-economic rights,

[1] That is, did Brown prohibit only laws preventing integrated schools, or did it require that schools in fact be integrated?

[2] Levinson (supra) at 875.

[3] Swann v Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education 402 US 1, 26 (1971).

[4] Levinson (supra) at 877. Levinson cites Milliken v Bradley 418 US 717 (1974)(Students in areas that had not engaged in de jure segregation could not be part of bussing plans); Missouri v Jenkins 515 US 70 (1995)(remedies must be narrowly tailored to remedying previous segregation); Freeman v Pitts 503 US 467 (1992), Board of Education v Dowell 498 (US) 237 (1991) and Pasadena City Board of Education v Spangler 427 US 424 (1976). All three cases envision that integration plans will come to an end.

[5] Levinson (supra) at 877.

[6] Justice Kennedy's concurrence does not fully endorse a colour-blind constitution, although the space he leaves for continued action to force integration is very limited.

[7] 551 US _ (2007).

Soobramoney v Minster of Health (KwaZulu-Natal), the Court was confronted with a man suffering from chronic renal failure who argued that his FC s 27 right of access to healthcare entitled him to be placed on a dialysis machine at state expense.[1] The Court rejected the claim. It argued that the practical consequences of granting Mr Soobramoney's claim would be to decrease the money available for other health needs, and ultimately for other legitimate state goals.[2] In determining the content of the right, the Court does not conduct a purely philosophical inquiry. It looks at the practical (read remedial) consequences of its acts. The conclusion must be that rights (or at least socio-economic rights) are made in part of the same 'stuff' as remedies.

Similarly, in Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom[3] and Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign[4] the Court (largely)[5] rejected a 'minimum core' approach to FC ss 26 and 27. Two related reasons offered by the Court are, arguably, remedial. Firstly, in Grootboom the Court argues that the minimum core may be different for people in different circumstances and that it does not have information to determine what is required.[6] Underlying this concern is the spectre of the judiciary becoming involved in the details of managing each municipal housing scheme in order to determine what the 'minimum core' for that section of the population is. That is an undesirable remedial consequence. Second, in TAC, the unanimous Court held that '[c]ourts are ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where court orders could have multiple social and economic consequences for the community.'[7] Note that this mere assertion is not a philosophical argument as to how one should determine the content of the right. It is a bald statement of concern about the impact that any remedy granted by the Court might have on social affairs that lie beyond its immediate control. And it is these remedial concerns, amongst others, that lead the Court to reject the call for a minimum core approach.

The recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions[8] and National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mahomed[9] also offer a powerful indication of how remedies impact on rights. Both cases concerned the validity of search warrants. In NDPP v Mahomed it was accepted that the right to privacy had been violated. Nugent and Mlambo JJA would only grant very limited preservation orders (which would permit copies of the seized documents to be kept in case of future disputes) because they feared that anything more would make the right to privacy — which the State admitted had been infringed — meaningless. Farlam and Cloete JJA on the other hand

[1] 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC).
[2] Ibid at paras 27–28.
[3] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').
[4] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC').
[5] The Court may have left some space in the 'reasonableness' test for minimum core obligations to play a role. See D Bilchitz The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-economic Rights (2007).
[6] Grootboom (supra) at paras 32–33.
[7] TAC (supra) at para 38 (my emphasis).
[8] [2007] ZASCA 139.
[9] 2008 (1) SACR 309 (SCA), [2008] 1 All SA 181 (SCA)('NDPP v Mahomed').

were willing to grant a preservation order that would allow the NPA to later gain access to the documents and to potentially use them at trial. Ponnan JA was unwilling to grant any preservation order at all. These findings become even more interesting when one examines the same judges' findings in the Zuma matter. In Zuma, the applicant argued that the warrants issued to search his premises were overbroad, primarily because the definition of the crime was not specific enough, and therefore violated his right to privacy. Farlam and Cloete JJA agreed and would have set aside the warrants, but granted a preservation order on the same terms as the one they were willing to grant in Mahomed. Nugent, Mlambo and Ponnan JJA disagreed, holding that the warrants did not infringe the right to privacy.

The direct correlation between the voting blocs in the two cases, all but demands the conclusion that all the judges' decisions in Zuma were influenced by their convictions about the possible remedy in Mahomed. It was easier for Farlam and Cloete JJA to hold that Zuma's privacy had been infringed because they knew it was unlikely to influence his future prosecution: the documents would be preserved and easily admissible at trial. Similarly, Nugent, Mlambo and Ponnan JJA would have been extremely hesitant to find a violation of privacy because the only remedy that they deemed acceptable would have almost certainly ensured that the documents would never have been introduced in the trial. Both sets of judges, it seems, allow their idea of the appropriate remedy to influence their construction of the right to privacy.

Let me offer one final example of the way in which remedies have impacted on the content of not only of rights, but also on the doctrine of application of rights:[1] Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae*)*.[2] The case concerned the trial of a man who had anally raped a young girl. The issue before the Court was whether the common-law definition of rape, which only criminalized the non-consensual penetration of a vagina by a penis, was unconstitutional for not including anal penetration. A majority of the Court[3] concluded that the common-law definition did not directly violate any of the rights relied on — equality, dignity, freedom and security of the person and privacy — but that it should be developed in terms of FC s 39(2) in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights to include anal penetration of females, but not males. This remarkable conclusion is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the remedies available to the Court following a finding of direct invalidity. The Court's reasoning is summarized in this passage:

[1] For more on application doctrine, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31. For arguments relating to application and rights interpretation in Masiya, see S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762 ('Amazing'); F Michelman 'On the Uses of Interpretive 'Charity': Some Notes From Abroad on Application, Avoidance, Equality, and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1.

[2] 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya').

[3] Langa CJ (Sachs J concurring) left this issue open. Ibid at para 76.

> The definition of rape is not unconstitutional in so far as it criminalises conduct that is clearly morally and socially unacceptable. In this regard it is different from the common law crime of sodomy which was declared unconstitutional by this Court[1] because it subjected people to criminal penalties for conduct which could not constitute a crime in our constitutional order. There is nothing in the current definition of rape to suggest that it is fatally flawed in a similar manner. The current definition of rape criminalises unacceptable social conduct that is in violation of constitutional rights. It ensures that the constitutional right to be free from all forms of violence, whether public or private, as well as the right to dignity and equality are protected. Invalidating the definition because it is under-inclusive is to throw the baby out with the bath water. What is required then is for the definition to be extended instead of being eliminated so as to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[2]

The Court was operating under the mistaken assumption[3] that a finding of direct invalidity can only result in declaring the common-law definition unlawful. Because it believed its remedial options were limited, the Court changed the content of the right to avoid that undesirable remedial consequence — total invalidity of the definition. The majority asserts that FC s 9 — insofar as it applies to crime-creating laws — requires only that laws do not criminalize conduct that 'could not constitute a crime in our constitutional order.' It does not require rational reasons for the differentiation or that any differentiation does not amount to unfair discrimination. On this reasoning, crimes that only prohibited acts by white people or Jews would not violate the right to equality because their only flaw would be 'under-inclusiveness'. That is a serious — and unwelcome — change in the content of the right.[4]

In addition, the majority's assumption that only indirect application can permit the alteration of a common-law rule explains their distaste for the direct application of rights to the common law. If it were indeed true that direct application only permitted a common-law rule to be accepted or rejected, the Court's preference for indirect application would make sense. Because this hypothesis is blatantly false this choice has, rightly in my view, been the subject of serious

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v The Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC).

[2] Masiya (supra) at para 27 (my emphasis).

[3] This assumption is clearly incorrect. See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)(In Fourie, the Court relied on the direct application of the right to equality to extend the common-law definition of marriage to include homosexual couples. Clearly the Court could also have used direct application to extend the definition in Masiya.)

[4] For the content of the right prior to Masiya, see, for example, Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 53 (Sets out the test for the violation of the right to equality.) See also C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 35. Hopefully, the Court will treat Masiya as an aberration and will not follow this precedent in future cases.

criticism.[1] However, the wisdom of the decision is not the point here. The point is that remedial concerns — the remedies that the Court believes are at its disposal or the remedies that it would prefer to use — alter the content both of rights and application doctrine.

There are many other cases in which one could argue that the Court has, consciously or unconsciously, engaged in remedial deterrence.[2] But I trust that these examples suffice to prove that remedial deterrence is a part of the fabric of our constitutional law.

(cc) Remedial Incorporation

The third way in which remedies impact on rights is remedial incorporation.[3]

[1] Woolman 'Amazing' (supra)(Woolman argues that the Courts decisions in Masiya, NM & Others v Smith & Others (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae*)* 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC) and Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC) indicate a disturbing predilection for relying on FC s 39(2) and therefore an ongoing failure to give content to the rights in the Bill of Rights.)

[2] See I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 192 n 7 (The authors argue that '[c]ourts are likely to be more hesitant to find a violation of a right in situations where there is no appropriate remedy for the violation.' They mention President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') and New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') as examples. In Hugo the Court was faced with an equality challenge to a decision by the President to remission of sentences to all mothers of children under 12. The President's act was challenged, predictably, by a father of a child under 12. A majority of the Court held that although there was discrimination, it was fair. Currie and De Waal suggest that part of the reason for this conclusion was that any remedy would either release a large number of male prisoners or re-incarcerate the mothers who had already been released. The New National Party Court concluded, very shortly before the 1999 elections, that a law requiring voters to have a bar-coded Identity Document was valid. Currie and De Waal argue that the Court was 'hesitant to find a violation because any relief that it granted would have placed the 1999 elections in jeopardy'.) See also Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)(The applicants argued that the President had an obligation to intervene diplomatically on their behalf to ensure that their human rights were not violated while they were in Zimbabwe. A majority of the Court concluded that citizens only have a right to request diplomatic protection and to have that decision properly considered by government. Part of its reasoning was that courts are institutionally ill-suited to control diplomatic negotiations: 'The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill equipped to deal. The best way to secure relief for the national in whose interest the action is taken may be to engage in delicate and sensitive negotiations in which diplomats are better placed to make decisions than judges, and which could be harmed by court proceedings and the attendant publicity.' Ibid at para 77. Because it saw the only available remedy — ordering government to make diplomatic representations — as potentially more harmful to the applicants' interests than granting no remedy at all, it limited the right to require intervention only when government had incorrectly exercised its discretion.)

[3] See, generally, Levinson (supra) at 899–904. See also O Fiss 'Foreword: The Forms of Justice' (1979) 93 Harvard LR 1, 49–50 (Fiss argues that specific elements of structural orders (such as requiring showers) are not directly required by the right, but are instrumental means to enforce the right either by preventing evasion, or simply to let officials know what is expected of them. However, unlike Levinson, he argues that these considerations do not become part of the right itself but are 'instrumental or remedial rights rather than constitutional rights proper'. The strength of the remedial equilibration model is that it illustrates that there is no difference between 'remedial rights' and constitutional rights. All rights are affected by remedial concerns and are no less valid or real for being motivated by instrumentality instead of principle.)

Remedial incorporation occurs when a court defines a right to include a prophylactic remedy that is not itself part of the right, but is necessary to ensure that the 'core' of the right is not violated. In Hutto v Finney, the Supreme Court held that keeping a prisoner in isolation for longer than 30 days was not itself a violation of the prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.[1] However, it upheld a District Court order limiting stays in isolation cells to 30 days. There were two reasons for this apparently contradictory stance. Firstly, the other conditions in the prison — including overcrowding and malnutrition — when combined with long periods of solitary confinement did constitute cruel and unusual punishment and it was pointless to determine which specific combination of conditions was a violation and which was not. Secondly, the long history of unwillingness on the part of the state to remedy prison conditions necessitated 'specific, and easily verifiable remedial orders that aimed for a level of prison quality well above the constitutional standard.'[2]

The remedial influence on rights here is perhaps more subtle than remedial deterrence. Because the standard of 'cruel and unusual punishment' is inherently subjective and incapable of specific articulation, '[r]emedies are used by courts to define a constitutional standard that would otherwise be impossible to articulate, and those remedies become the normative criteria by which constitutional violations are judged.'[3] The real impact is not seen in Hutto itself, but in subsequent cases where litigants — and courts — rely on the remedial measures taken to establish constitutional violations.[4]

There are not as many South African examples of this practice. However, Dawood & Another; Shalabi & Another; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others does fit the profile.[5] In Dawood, the Court struck down a provision

[1] 437 US 678 (1978).

[2] Levinson (supra) at 879. See also J Jeffries 'The Right-Remedy Gap in Constitutional Law' (1990) 109 Yale LJ 87, 111–112 (Discussion of impact of remedies on rights in prison reform litigation. Referring to Levinson, he argues: 'Whether this phenomenon is described as remedy exceeding right or as remedy implicitly redefining right or as remedy merely becoming a "criter[ion] by which . . . lawfulness is judged" is for present purposes immaterial. The important point is that in structural reform litigation, courts prospectively and selectively impose requirements that in other remedial contexts would not be constitutionally compelled.')

[3] Levinson (supra) at 879.

[4] Ironically, the consequence of this phenomenon was for district courts to get involved in the minutiae of prison management which in turn led to concerns of the legitimacy of judicial management and the Supreme Court eventually cutting down the content of the right to limit such interference to cases of 'deliberate indifference' by prison officials. This is another example of remedial deterrence — fears that the nature of remedies will lead to cutting down the content of rights. Levinson (supra) at 881–882.

[5] 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood'). My use of Dawood is inspired by D Strauss 'The Ubiquity of Prophylactic Rules' (1988) 55 University of Chicago LR 190, referred to and discussed in Levinson (supra) at 900–904. Strauss's goal is to establish the legitimacy of prophylactic rules — rules which are not themselves required by the Constitution, but are practically necessary to ensure a right is protected — such as the Miranda warnings. He does this by showing that prophylactic rules are the norm, not the exception. He relies, for example, on Lovell v Griffin (303 US 444 (1938), where the Supreme Court struck down a statute prohibiting people from distributing literature without the permission of the City Manager. The rationale for this holding was not that the material Lovell wanted to distribute was protected by the First Amendment or that the City Manager had improperly denied Lovell permission.

which required foreign spouses of South African citizens to be outside South Africa when they applied for a permanent residence permit. An exception was made that allowed spouses to stay in South Africa on a temporary permit, but the granting of the temporary permit was subject to the unguided discretion of an administrative official. O'Regan J held that, even though it was possible that the power would be properly exercised, the existence of the power was itself a limitation of the right to dignity.[1] Having found that the limitation was unjustifiable, the Court suspended the order of invalidity but created interim guidelines on how the administrative officials should exercise their discretion in the meantime. This remedy can be nothing other than a prophylactic rule. O'Regan J's contention that the state's power itself violates dignity is unconvincing – as it implies that a spouse's dignity is impaired even if she is in fact granted the permit. In fact, what the Dawood Court does is to expand the right to dignity to include a right for administrative officials to act according to proper guidelines because of the possibility of officials making the wrong decision and the remedial difficulty/impossibility of a court re-assessing each application.

The Union of Refugee Women & Others v The Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others fits the same mould.[2] The applicants unsuccessfully challenged a law that prevented refugees from registering as security guards. However, they also brought a challenge to the way that the regulator dealt with their applications for exemption from that law. A majority of the Constitutional Court held that the failure of the Authority to provide information to applicants on how to apply for exemption might violate their FC s 33 right to administrative action.[3] It therefore ordered the Authority to ensure that all potential applicants had the necessary information. The Court must be right that the failure by the Authority to provide information cannot in itself be an infringement of the right to administrative action. There may be individual applicants who are assisted by the Authority or who are aware of what information to supply without the Authority's assistance, or who supply the correct information simply by careful Rather, as Strauss notes, the Court's reasoning was that 'if there are no standards to guide an official's discretion, the official is too likely to deny a permit for an impermissible reason. Relatively clear standards do not eliminate the danger that an official will deny permission for an improper reason, but at least they reduce that danger.' Strauss (supra) at 196. The comparison with this case and Dawood should be immediately apparent. For more on prophylactic remedies, see T Thomas 'The Prophylactic Remedy: Normative Principles and Definitional Parameters of Broad Injunctive Relief' (2004) 52 Buffalo LR 301.

[1] Dawood (supra) at para 39 ('The right to dignity of spouses is limited by the statutory provisions that empower immigration officers and the DG to refuse to grant or extend a temporary permit.')

[2] 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC)('Union of Refugee Women').

[3] Ibid at para 79 (Kondile AJ poses the following question: 'Is the provision of this information not an element of procedurally fair administrative action envisaged in section 3 of [the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000]?' However, it leaves the question unanswered. The clearest indication that Kondile AJ had no intention of answering the question is that, despite his insistence that all administrative action claims must first be considered in terms of PAJA, he does not engage PAJA at all.)

thought, or by chance. In all these situations, the applicants will receive a fair hearing and the decisions that follow will be lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair. It is the probability that many applicants will not know what information to supply or how to apply that requires a prophylactic rule to prevent the potential of a limitation of FC s 33 because it is impractical for each applicant to separately request information when they do not have it. In the process, the Court builds into FC s 33 a right to information where the failure to provide it is likely to make it impossible to apply. The difficulty in fashioning perfect remedies for each violation necessitates a different interpretation of the right.

One more example: Jaftha v Schoeman & Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others.[1] The two applicants had their houses sold in execution to repay meagre Magistrate Court judgment debts. They challenged the provision which permitted their immoveable property to be sold without the intervention of a court. The Constitutional Court held that the removal of somebody's existing access to housing violated FC s 26(1) which guarantees that '[e]veryone has the right to have access to adequate housing.' They remedied the violation by reading words into the statute that required a magistrate, after considering all relevant circumstances, to approve the execution of any immoveable property.[2] This seems like an entirely appropriate remedy. However, like Dawood and Union of Refugee Women, Jaftha effectively turns the FC s 26(1) right to adequate housing into a right not to have any immoveable property sold without intervention of a court. The remedy — and therefore the right — applies equally to the execution of business premises or a holiday home as it does to a person's only potential shelter). The necessary prophylactic rule expands the content of the right because it was too difficult (or even impossible) to draft a remedy that would only apply to those persons whose access to basic housing was really at stake. Although the owner of business premises or a holiday home will not be able to avoid execution, after Jaftha, FC s 26(1) prevents his property from being sold unless a court has considered the case.

(dd) Remedial Substantiation

While the first three forms of remedial equilibration all affect the content of the right, the fourth — remedial substantiation — exposes how remedies determine a right's value : 'the cash value of the right is … nothing more than what the courts … will do if the right is violated'[3] or, to put it differently, it is not only the case that 'a right without a remedy is worthless, but also that a right with less remedy is worth less and a right with more remedy is worth more.'[4] Unlike remedial

[1] 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha').
[2] Ibid at paras 64 and 67.
[3] Levinson (supra) at 887.
[4] Ibid at 904. This extension of the normative basis for the ubi jus ibi remedium principle is discussed earlier at § 9.2*(b)* supra.

deterrence and remedial incorporation, remedial substantiation is always present — the value of every right is determined by the possible (or probable) remedies that accompany its violation. A right that can only be accompanied by a declaratory order is generally less valuable than a right that can be remedied by an interdict or an award of damages.[1] Remedial substantiation does not rely on a single conception of value. As long as the metric employed takes some account of how a right brings about real-world change, the value of the right is affected by the remedy it can provide.

This idea of remedial substantiation is, in many ways, the heart of the assertion that rights and remedies are not separate. The ultimate test of the value of a right, on this account, is the practical change that it can achieve. As Thomas correctly argues:

> Rights standing alone are simply expressions of social values. It is the remedy that defines the right by making the value real and tangible by providing specificity and concreteness to otherwise abstract guarantees.[2]

Levinson offers the fate of criminal procedure rights in the post-Warren Court era as an example of remedial substantiation.[3] The Warren Court had established very powerful doctrines protecting accused persons: perhaps none so powerful as the Miranda rights to be informed of the right to silence and the right to legal counsel.[4] Under the more conservative Burger and Rehnquist courts, these rights remained untouched and were even rhetorically strengthened. However, the remedies available to enforce these rights were dramatically reduced. Originally, the admission of any evidence obtained without Miranda warnings was automatically excluded. However, the Court later defined the warnings as a sub-constitutional prophylactic rule that could be deviated from in certain circumstances.[5] This move then permitted the Court to permit the admission of evidence indirectly derived from a Miranda violation[6] and to hold that evidence obtained

[1] Of course the standard to determine whether a remedy is 'better' or 'worse' — and therefore whether a right is more or less valuable — is far from uncontroversial. Although I think that other considerations can legitimately be taken into account in choosing a remedy (see § 9.2*(d)* infra), for present purposes, when I say that a remedy is less valuable, I mean that it provides less relief to the victim. However, even employing that relatively clear standard, what remedy best vindicates a right and therefore makes the right more 'valuable' will, in many cases, be open for debate. The best I can do is to acknowledge that limitation.

[2] T Thomas 'Ubi Jus, Ibi Remedium: The Fundamental Right to a Remedy Under Due Process' (2004) 41 San Diego LR 1633, 1638.

[3] Levinson (supra) at 908–911. See also C Steiker 'Counter-Revolution in Constitutional Criminal Procedure? Two Audiences, Two Answers' (1996) 94 Michigan LR 2466.

[4] 384 US 436 (1966).

[5] See, for example, Michigan v Tucker 417 US 433, 439 (1974).

[6] Oregon v Elstad 470 US 298, 306–09 (1985).

without a Miranda warning is admissible to impeach the accused's testimony.[1] Levinson's point is that a right requiring automatic exclusion is very different from a right that permits evidence to be admitted in certain circumstances.

It is not strictly necessary to provide examples of remedial substantiation. Once the basic principle — that rights are only worth as much as their remedies — is accepted, every decision where a remedy is provided provides a measure of the value of the right. However, for the sake of illustration, I will provide a few examples of rights that are worth less (or more) because of the remedies that they can provide.[2] The big difference between these examples and the fate of the Miranda remedies outlined above is that these do not describe a change in the value of rights over time, but show how the choice of remedy in specific instances affects the worth of the right.

Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape is an excellent example of remedial substantiation.[3] To recap: Sanderson concerns the FC s 35(3)(d) right to be tried without unreasonable delay. Kriegler J held that the remedy granted for a violation of the right depended on the nature of the prejudice caused by the delay:

> appropriate relief for an awaiting-trial prisoner who has been held too long; a refusal of a postponement is appropriate relief for a person who wishes to bring matters to a head to avoid remaining under a cloud; a stay of prosecution is appropriate relief where there is trial prejudice.[4]

In contrast, in both the US and Canada the only remedy available is a permanent stay, no matter what the nature of the prejudice.[5] The difference in possible remedies means that the value of the South African right is very different from American or Canadian right. One permits an accused to go free without ever facing a trial; the other will ordinarily only allow the accused to speed up the trial or to be compensated for a delay.

Other easy examples are Fose v Minister of Safety and Security and Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others; Zuma & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others.[6] In Fose, the Court held that punitive damages are not appropriate for isolated cases of police abuse.[7] The case is easy because the 'cash value' of the right can be measured in monetary terms. If the Court had

[1] Oregon v Hass 420 US 714, 722–24 (1975); Harris v New York 401 US 222, 225–26 (1971).
[2] See also the cases discussed in § 9.2*(b)* supra.
[3] 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC).
[4] Ibid at para 41.
[5] Although, as I noted above (§ 9.2*(c)(i)*(cc) supra) the difference in remedy also allowed the Court to adopt a much more lenient approach to determining whether a delay was unreasonable than that adopted in the US and Canada. In some ways, the combination of making it easier to prove a violation but offering lesser remedies once that is done places the South African right on more or less the same level as the US or Canadian alternative.
[6] [2008] ZACC 13.
[7] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).

permitted punitive damages, Mr Fose would have received far more compensation and the right would have had impact on the systemic problem of police brutality. In Thint the Constitutional Court overturned an SCA decision[1] that had held when a warrant was declared invalid for violating the right to privacy, the items seized under the warrant had to be returned to the accused. The Constitutional Court held that the evidence could be preserved so that the trial court could decide whether to admit or not. The value of the right to privacy varies drastically across the two decisions.

The next two examples are instances where the Constitutional Court suspends orders of invalidity. One. When the Constitutional Court invalidated the laws prohibiting homosexual marriage, it suspended — over the dissenting voice of O'Regan J — the order for one year to allow the legislature to create an appropriate legislative framework.[2] The effect was that the applicants, and all other homosexual couples, would have to wait one year to marry. The majority and O'Regan J envisage not only different remedies, but different rights: the majority protects a right to marry in the future; O'Regan J protects a right to marry now. Two: Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[3] The applicants successfully challenged a constitutional amendment that had moved them from KwaZulu-Natal to the Eastern Cape just before the 2006 municipal elections. The Court ruled that the KwaZulu-Natal legislature had not adequately facilitated public involvement when it considered the legislation. The Court, however, decided not to invalidate the elections and granted Parliament 18 months to remedy the defect.[4] The right of the people of Matatiele to participate in the law-making process permitted only a future opportunity to convince the legislature not to move them to the Eastern Cape. It did not — and was therefore worth less than a right which did — automatically entitle them to elections held in accordance with lawfully drawn provincial boundaries.

(ee) Litigation Impact

Remedies can determine the content of rights by influencing what rights get litigated and how they get litigated.[5] A right with a powerful remedy is more likely to encourage potential beneficiaries of the right to seek a judicial solution, while beneficiaries of a right with a very weak remedy might be more inclined to seek alternative redress. For example, the Constitutional Court in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs found that it had the power to [1] National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mahomed [2008] 1 All SA 181 (SCA).

[2] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

[3] 2007 (6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele II').

[4] Ibid at paras 92–99.

[5] Levinson (supra) at 912–913 (Levinson does not fully develop this aspect, but suggests it as an additional possibility.)

read words into a statute and therefore to extend benefits offered to heterosexual couples to same-sex couples.[1] This sparked a long string of cases successfully challenging similar laws. And in most cases, the Court articulated virtually identical remedies.[2] It is conceivable that the Court could have decided that it did not have the power to read words into a statute, or that the appropriate remedy was to declare the provision invalid, leaving both heterosexual and homosexual couples without legal recognition. If it had chosen either course, it is highly unlikely that the other cases would have been brought. Same-sex couples would know that they would have very little to gain even if they succeeded on the merits.

Socio-economic rights offer a powerful counter-example. Despite the unique inclusion of directly enforceable socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution and widespread lack of access to adequate food, water, healthcare, housing and education, relatively few socio-economic rights cases have been litigated. Thus far the Constitutional Court has considered only five cases that rely directly on socio-economic rights.[3] There has been no direct challenge in any court on the rights to education or food. While there are a number of possible reasons for this paucity of challenges,[4] at least one plausible cause is the ineffectiveness of the orders that the Constitutional Court has granted in the cases that it has decided. Despite the applicant's 'success' in Grootboom and TAC, serious structural and political problems undermine the implementation of the respective orders. Potential litigants may feel that it is not worth their time to litigate socio-economic rights if the remedy they are likely to receive will do little to directly alter their circumstances — even if it does have some influence on government policy.

(ff) Remedies and Jurisdiction

Finally, the remedy an applicant claims may determine whether the Court hears the case at all.[5] The paradigmatic case is East Zulu Motors (Proprietary) Limited v

[1] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC).

[2] See, for example, Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)(Extending benefits for judges partners); Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)(Extending adoption rights); Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC)(Permitting same-sex partners to inherit intestate).

[3] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC); Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC); Minister of Health and others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC); Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minster of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)(Extending social security benefits to permanent residents); and Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road, Berea Township and 197 Main Street Johannesburg v City of Johannesburg & Others) 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC)(Addressing the housing rights of residents in dilapidated buildings in the inner city of Johannesburg.)

[4] The most obvious reasons are lack of resources to litigate and the difficulty of proving a violation under the reasonableness standard adopted by the Court.

[5] See generally, R Fallon 'The Linkage Between Justiciability and Remedies — And Their Connections to Substantive Rights' (2006) 92 Virgina LR 633 (Argues that remedies affect whether litigants have standing to litigate rights. Because of our extremely wide standing rules, this exact link is not present (or at least, not visible) in South Africa. However, the issue under discussion here — the link between jurisdiction and remedies — is closely related.)

Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council & Others.[1] The Court held that because there were no 'reasonable prospects that this Court would make an order on appeal which would be of any benefit to the applicant', it refused leave to appeal.[2] Similarly, in Hlophe v Constitutional Court of South Africa & Others, the minority judges refused to consider Judge President Hlophe's allegations that the Constitutional Court had infringed its constitutional rights because no matter what they found on the substantive question, they would not have granted the remedy he sought — a declaration of rights.[3]

Although the content of the right is not directly affected by the remedy, the remedy determines whether the content of the right is examined at all. It acts in a similar way to the phenomenon discussed above — the remedy may influence a court to consider some rights in detail and ignore others completely.

This approach also echoes elements of remedial substantiation. A right that cannot be meaningfully litigated to achieve certain ends is worth less than a right that can be so used. That is not to say that there are not good reasons to limit jurisdiction to avoid hearing cases where the remedy sought is clearly inappropriate, but it does mean that there is a connection between right and remedy.

(gg) Conclusion

I hope I have shown that, as a descriptive matter, the theory of remedial equilibration (and not rights essentialism) is the most accurate account of the manner in which the Constitutional Court operates. The Court does not think about rights in a void that is uninfluenced by the practicalities of the real world. It interprets rights with a constant eye on the remedy that it could provide. These observations are not, generally, meant as a criticism of the Court, but as a description of how it reasons. In the next section I consider whether remedial equilibration, as well as being descriptively accurate, recommends itself on normative grounds.

(iv) Equilibration and Transformation

The fact that courts do allow remedial considerations to colour their interpretation of rights does not automatically mean that we should support that practice. Despite the difficulties inherent in separating remedies from rights in the judicial mind, it is not impossible to imagine a judicial system that does just that:

> the institution of judicial review could . . . be changed to facilitate nonfunctional constitutional interpretation, for example by establishing a separate constitutional court and making constitutional adjudication purely declaratory or advisory. This would ensure that judges were not peeking at consequences, because there would be none, and it would insulate abstract constitutional judgments from social contexts where they would be too costly to implement or threaten serious harm.[4]

[1] 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 13.
[3] [2008] ZAGPHC 289 (Gildenhuys J and Marais J wrote dissenting judgments.)
[4] Levinson (supra) at 939.

Levinson himself seems to advocate against this approach. In his view, full adoption of remedial equilibration is preferable and would be very different from the 'dystopia' described above:

> In a constitutional culture that had thoroughly repudiated rights essentialism, courts would be liberated to take as full account of empirical knowledge in the process of interpreting the Constitution as they sometimes do in developing elaborate institutional reform remedies. There would be no reason, for example, why the types of fact-finding procedures used by legislatures and administrative agencies — and for that matter by courts in the remedial phase of structural reform litigation — should not also be available to courts deciding the shape of constitutional rights.[1]

In order to understand the debate between these two visions properly, it is useful to sketch the outlines of a deeper jurisprudential debate between Ronald Dworkin and his adherents on the one hand, and the Chicago School of Richard Posner and Cass Sunstein on the other. Dworkin endorses a rights essentialist philosophy where judges seek legal principles and then apply them to concrete cases.[2] Posner and Sunstein prefer a theory more compatible with remedial equilibration — their theory takes account from the start of social realities and devises constitutional rights in order to best solve practical problems.[3] The difference is exemplified by Levinson's discussion of the two school's different approaches to the question of assisted suicide which came before the United States Supreme Court in Washington v Glucksberg.[4] Dworkin contributed to an amicus brief — which became known as the 'Philosophers' Brief' — that argued that the moral and constitutional principles demanded the recognition of a right 'to live and die in the light of [one's] own religious and ethical beliefs'.[5] The implementation of that right was only relevant once the principle had been adopted. Sunstein and Posner rejected Dworkin's 'top down' approach and agreed with the Court that the existence of a right to assisted suicide should depend on the practicalities of implementing it: If the risks of abuse by doctors or others are too great, then there ought not to be any cognizable right.[6]

[1] Levison (supra) at 939.

[2] Ibid at 927 citing R Dworkin 'In Praise of Theory' (1997) 29 Arizona State LJ 353. See also, generally, R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986).

[3] Levinson (supra) at 927–928 citing R Posner Overcoming Law (1995) 171–97; R Posner 'Conceptions of Legal "Theory": A Response to Ronald Dworkin' (1997) 29 Arizona State LJ 377; R Posner 'The Problematics of Moral and Legal Theory' (1998) 111 Harvard LR 1637; C Sunstein 'From Theory to Practice' (1997) 29 Arizona State LJ 389.

[4] 521 US 702 (1997).

[5] Levinson (supra) at 928–929.

[6] Ibid at 929–930. Another issue that arises in the choice between rights essentialism and remedial equilibration is the question of legitimacy. One defence of rights-essentialism is that it is the foundation for the legitimacy of judicial review. While judicial remedies inevitably bear a great resemblance to legislative or executive action, constitutional rights have some higher authority by virtue of the manner of the adoption or the truth of the principles they embody that separates them from the ordinary political concerns of the other branches of government. Traditional justifications for constitutionalism rest on the special status of constitutional rights. Remedies are merely the 'practical handmaidens' necessary to realise these rights. A theory that disrupts the separation between rights and remedies also threatens

Both positions seem to have benefits and drawbacks. Remedial equilibration makes it easier to take account of detailed facts. The problem is that by making that inquiry part of the definition of the right, it seems more likely to protect the status quo. If a court defines a right according to the existing position, it will be far more difficult to explain why the right requires that position to change. On the other hand, while it avoids the danger of stasis, the rights essentialist position risks irrelevance by creating rights that can never be realized.[1] It seems obvious to me that either extreme position is undesirable. But what balance should South African courts strike?[2]

To begin, we must remember that the Final Constitution is not an ordinary document; it is a powerfully transformative document.[3] It is not meant to maintain the legitimacy of judicial review. As Levinson notes, the fact that legitimacy depends on rights rather than remedies can be used cynically by courts to keep rights officially untouched but gut their meaning by altering the remedies they can provide: 'Evisceration of constitutional protections is often accomplished by severing remedies while preserving the veneer of rights. . . . Eliminating remedies, on the other hand, does not create the same kind of legitimacy problems, not just because remedies are much less visible to the public, but, more importantly, because constitutional theory takes for granted that remedies are expected to change along with political and policy preferences.' Levinson (supra) at 934–935. On the other hand, 'whenever the Court revokes a controversial constitutional right, it announces that constitutional rights are the contingent product of political forces and social needs rather than abstract, timeless moral principles, and consequently threatens its own legitimacy as the privileged expositor of constitutional values, ibid at 936–937. Levinson argues against this conclusion which is, in his view, based on a narrow view of democracy and therefore of what is necessary to legitimate judicial review. But while he suggests possible ways for political theory to develop to legitimate a more remedial-equilibration-type view of judicial practice: One, 'jettison the simplistic equation of democracy and majoritarianism and develop a richer conception of democracy more inclusive of minority viewpoints than simple majoritarianism.' Two, 'give up trying to reconcile judicial review and democracy and instead to show how judicial review serves values that are supplementary to, and perhaps (in limited areas) more important than, democracy.' Ibid at 937. His main argument is that 'the legitimacy of judicial review, as a sociological matter, depends far more on its practical consequences than on any political theory developed to defend it. . . . A persuasive theoretical defense of the legitimacy of judicial review,' he continues, 'therefore, may be a cog that plays no part in any consequential mechanism. Perhaps forgetting about legitimacy and concentrating on results would lead not only to better results but also, ironically, to enhanced legitimacy.' Ibid.

[1] See Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier, Western Cape & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 186 (Mokgoro and Sachs JJ)('It would indeed be most unsatisfactory and have negative consequences for constitutionality to fail to provide a remedy where there has been an infringement of a constitutional right. While courts should exhibit significant deference towards the administration and recognise the practical difficulties which the administration faces, it could create a misleading impression that in instances where there is an infringement of a constitutional right, and there are significant practical difficulties in remedying the injustice caused, a decision-maker will not be held to account. It is the remedy that must adapt itself to the right, not the right to the remedy.')

[2] I am concerned here only with South African courts and not with creating a theory for all jurisdictions primarily because I do not think the same approach would necessarily be appropriate in all jurisdictions.

[3] See, for example, P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2007) 17 Stellenbosch 351; K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146; E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31; D Moseneke 'The Fourth Bram Fischer Memorial Lecture: Transformative Adjudication' (2002) 18 SAJHR 309; C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248.

the status quo, but to change it. Its goals map most closely onto those of the rights essentialist. In the words of Justice Kriegler:

> When Courts give relief, they attempt to synchronise the real world with the ideal construct of a constitutional world created in the image of s 4(1). There is nothing surprising or unusual about this notion. It merely restates the familiar principle that rights and remedies are complementary. The relationship holds true and is uncontroversial at common law. The Constitution is also a body of legal rules and we should expect to find in it the same pairing of rights and remedies. Indeed, how much more so in the case of an instrument that seeks to 'to create a new order' and provide a bridge
>
> > 'between the past of a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice, and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex'.[1]

The nature of our founding document favours a rights essentialist position that is more likely to transform current understandings of how society is structured.

That said, judges will inevitably consider remedial consequences in their determination of rights. Even in the pure declaratory system Levinson hypothesises,

[1] Fose (supra) at para 94 (my emphasis) quoting the FC's preamble. See also S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 262 (Mahomed J)('All Constitutions seek to articulate, with differing degrees of intensity and detail, the shared aspirations of a nation; the values which bind its people, and which discipline its government and its national institutions; the basic premises upon which judicial, legislative and executive power is to be wielded; the constitutional limits and the conditions upon which that power is to be exercised; the national ethos which defines and regulates that exercise; and the moral and ethical direction which that nation has identified for its future. In some countries the Constitution only formalises, in a legal instrument, a historical consensus of values and aspirations evolved incrementally from a stable and unbroken past to accommodate the needs of the future. The South African Constitution is different: it retains from the past only what is defensible and represents a decisive break from, and a ringing rejection of, that part of the past which is disgracefully racist, authoritarian, insular, and repressive, and a vigorous identification of and commitment to a democratic, universalistic, caring and aspirationally egalitarian ethos expressly articulated in the Constitution. The contrast between the past which it repudiates and the future to which it seeks to commit the nation is stark and dramatic. The past institutionalised and legitimised racism. The Constitution expresses in its preamble the need for a "new order . . . in which there is equality between . . . people of all races". . . . The past was redolent with statutes which assaulted the human dignity of persons on the grounds of race and colour alone; s 10 constitutionally protects that dignity. The past accepted, permitted, perpetuated and institutionalised pervasive and manifestly unfair discrimination against women and persons of colour; the preamble, s 8 and the post-amble seek to articulate an ethos which not only rejects its rationale but unmistakenly recognises the clear justification for the reversal of the accumulated legacy of such discrimination. The past permitted detention without trial; s 11(1) prohibits it. The past permitted degrading treatment of persons; s 11(2) renders it unconstitutional. The past arbitrarily repressed the freedoms of expression, assembly, association and movement; ss 15, 16, 17 and 18 accord to these freedoms the status of "fundamental rights". The past limited the right to vote to a minority; s 21 extends it to every citizen. The past arbitrarily denied to citizens, on the grounds of race and colour, the right to hold and acquire property; s 26 expressly secures it. Such a jurisprudential past created what the post-amble to the Constitution recognises as a society 'characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice'. What the Constitution expressly aspires to do is to provide a transition from these grossly unacceptable features of the past to a conspicuously contrasting "future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex".') judges would be influenced by the actions that might flow from the implementation of their declarations. It is useless to deny or suppress the judicial instinct to coordinate rights and remedies that permits judges to occupy simultaneously the world of the ideal and the world of the real. This recognition seems to support a moderate rights essentialist position. First, the awareness of remedial consequences that Levinson celebrates as the major benefit of a remedial equilibrationist position can occur equally well within the bifurcated structure of rights essentialism by relegating the serious fact-finding procedures to the remedial stage. Courts can there take cognisance of factual reality without distorting the aspirational and transformative nature of the Final Constitution.

Secondly, the major benefit of Levinson's thesis is making us all — and especially judges — aware of how rights and remedies are connected. While that awareness can be used to embrace those connections, it can also be used to try and avoid them. If a judge is aware of the potential dangers of remedial equilibration, she will be more likely to keep rights and remedies separated in her mind and her judgments. It is necessary here to distinguish between the various forms of remedial equilibration: for not all forms of remedial equilibration preclude judges from making the constitutional dream real. Remedial flexibility and remedial incorporation aid in the realisation of the constitutional ideal by making it possible for rights to be defined as broadly as possible and by including practical guarantees that do not undermine the content of the right itself. Remedial substantiation is neutral in this regard — it is simply a way of evaluating the worth of rights. Looking through that frame can inspire more or less change. The relationships between remedies and litigation strategies can similarly act either way depending on the remedy. It can promote or prevent litigation to enforce rights. The only truly dangerous relationship is remedial deterrence. The urge for judges to define rights restrictively because they believe their remedial options are limited undercuts the transformative potential of the Final Constitution.

In my view, awareness of remedial deterrence, combined with a commitment to making constitutional rights real and a remedial regime that gives courts virtually unlimited powers to construct any remedy they need to realise the right, justifies rejecting the adoption of remedial equilibration as the normative basis for remedial action. While there will always be instances where judges instinctively limit the content of a right in order to avoid the creation of paper tigers, we ought to encourage judges to be adventurous in fashioning remedies to give effect to rights which may, on first blush, seem unenforceable. Paul Gerwitz has, in a slightly different context,[1] endorsed a similar approach:

> While the existence of certain remedial costs may justify their consideration at the remedy stage if they are not part of the definition of the right, it does not explain or justify why these costs are not included as part of the right itself, why the right-remedy gap should not be > closed by redefining the right to take such costs into account. … The … answer is that where [the] consideration of remedial costs leads to a failure to provide a fully effective injunction, it does not necessarily foreclose other remedies. Even if an injunctive remedy is too costly, other judicial remedies such as damages may be available to eliminate some effects of the violation, or other branches of government may try to vindicate the right in ways that a court believes it should not. Thus, it is meaningful not to redefine the right but to preserve it as an aspiration that may be vindicated in other ways or places.[1]

[1] Gerwitz is concerned with different ways of choosing remedies — rights maximizing or interest balancing — which are discussed in detail below. § 9.2*(e)*(ii) infra.

An important element that Gerwitz identifies is that courts are not the be all and end all of enforcing rights. Other branches of government, and even civil society and individual citizens, have the power and in some cases, the responsibility to realise the constitutional dream. But if courts define rights restrictively then the other branches are likely to view the restrictive interpretation as the limit of their obligations.[2]

To sum up, my answer to the relationship between rights and remedies is: (a) acknowledge the interaction between the two; (b) use this awareness to avoid those instances where remedies act to narrow rights; (c) use creative remedies to realise rights — it is better that we start by imagining that things 'could be different, could be better.'[3] Of course my answer requires a remedial regime which gives courts the necessary discretion. That regime is the subject of the next section.

(c) Discretion

This section considers two issues: (a) the extent of remedial discretion enjoyed by South Africa's courts; and, briefly, (b) the relevance of discretion for the legitimacy of judicial review.

[1] P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585, 606.

[2] That is not to suggest that courts should only declare rights, but that their declarations of rights impact not only what courts do in individual cases, but how all other social actors perceive the meaning of the Final Constitution. Susan Sturm has correctly argued against privileging the rule elaboration role of courts because courts are much more than rule-announcers. S Sturm 'Equality and the Forms of Justice' (2003) 58 Univ of Miami LR 51, 63 ('Treating rule elaboration and enforcement as the only legitimate mode of judicial interaction discounts much of courts' actual practice. It also discourages the development of theories and criteria to guide judicial intervention aimed at responding to complex conditions that threaten publicly articulated values.') But that does not mean that rule-announcing is not part of the courts' role.

[3] Langa (supra) at 360 ('For as long as [challenges to the constitutional goal] exist there will be a drive to overcome them, there will be a tension that keeps alive the idea that things can be different. When all the challenges are gone, that is when the real danger arises. That is when we slip into a useless self-congratulatory complacency, a misplaced euphoria that where we are now is the only place to be. That is when we stop dreaming, imagining and planning that things could be different, could be better. That, for me, is the true challenge of transformation.')

(i) The Extent of Discretion

> It is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion. It is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion.[1]

These words of McIntyre J were written about s 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights. Section 24(1) permits courts the power to grant a remedy that is 'appropriate and just in the circumstances'. The words of our own Constitution in FC s 38 — 'appropriate relief' — and FC s 172(1)(b) — 'any order that is just and equitable' — are equally broad. Have South African courts followed Justice McIntyre's advice about not interfering with this free discretion? Yes and no. The courts have paid considerable judicial lip service to the broad discretion afforded by FC ss 38 and 172(1)(b). But they have limited remedial discretion by creating standards and principles to guide the exercise of that discretion and have limited the discretion that trial courts have by interfering regularly on appeal (at least in some classes of cases).[2]

Kate Hofmeyr argues that we should analyse the extent of remedial discretion courts can exercise using a 'central case' model.[3] This model works by determining what the conditions would be for the freest exercise of discretion — the central case — and then analysing how far from that central case any particular system falls. She analyses this on two axes: standards and review. The standards axis measures 'the range of choices open to the decision-maker' while the review axis evaluates 'the extent to which the decision is reviewable and the grounds upon which it is reviewed'.[4] The central case of discretion exists where a body has

[1] R v Mills [1986] 1 SCR 863, 965

[2] 'Understanding Constitutional Remedial Power'(Unpublished Mphil Thesis Oxford University, 2006, on file with the author)('Remedial Power').

[3] Ibid at 42 relying on D Galligan Discretionary Powers (1986). She rejects Roach's three-legged approach which distinguishes, in a Dworkinian fashion, between three types of discretion. K Roach 'Principled Remedial Discretion' (2004) 25 Supreme Court Law Review (2d) 101. The first type of discretion, 'strong discretion', is entirely unbound by rules or principles. 'Rules-based discretion' is, as the name suggests, limited by rules. The form Roach favours is 'principled discretion' is 'not under-governed by law in the way of the first, strong sense of discretion, nor is it over-governed by self-executing categories and rules'. Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at 44. Hofmeyr's primary reason for rejecting this matrix is that it simplifies the many varied ways in which remedial discretion can be structured: 'discretion is a matter of degree and thus there are no bright lines distinguishing rule-based, from principled, from unfettered, discretion. Instead, each exercise of constitutional remedial power differs from the central case of discretion in varying degrees.' Ibid at 46. I agree.

[4] Hofmeyr credits her use of these two axes to Galligan (supra) and M Rosenberg 'Judicial Discretion of the Trial Court, Viewed from Above' (1971) 22 Syracuse LR 635. Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at n 100. Her taxonomy is also comparable — although it employs different nomenclature — to that suggested by William Fletcher. 'The Discretionary Constitution: Institutional Remedies and Judicial Legitimacy' (1982) 91 Yale LJ 635, 642–645. Fletcher describes the forms of control over discretion as 'internal' and 'external'. Internal controls correspond to Hofmeyr's 'standards' axis and determine the impact of legal norms on the original decision. External controls are those controls which operate after the decision has been made, usually by appellate courts.

a complete range of choices available with no rules or standards governing its choice and it also has the first and final say on the decision. Clearly the remedial discretion of South African courts does not fit that description. But just how far is our situation from that of the central case? This question is best answered by separately analysing the two axes.

(aa) Standards Axis

The standards axis can be further broken down to measure both procedural and substantive standards. Hofmeyr identifies three procedural limits on judicial remedial discretion: (a) courts must reach a decision; they cannot — generally — decide not to decide;[1] (b) courts are constrained by form — they must provide a reasoned judgment;[2] (c) courts are reactive — they have to wait for cases to come to them.[3] A fourth procedural constraint relates to the adversarial nature of the South African legal system. The court will, ordinarily, not consider a remedy that has not been debated by the parties because it is unfair to make an order without giving both sides an opportunity to comment on it. The remedy need not be raised by the parties themselves — the Court could raise the possibility in oral argument — but the parties must somehow be able to argue for or against it.[4] This was explicitly recognised by the Supreme Court of Appeal[5] — and endorsed by the Constitutional Court[6] — in Modderklip. Harms JA held as follows:

> If a constitutional breach is established, [courts are] mandated to grant appropriate relief. A claimant in such circumstances should not necessarily be bound to the formulation of the relief originally sought or the manner in which it was presented or argued.[7]

However, this does not detract from the duty to raise, as the SCA did in Modderklip, alternative relief with the parties either in oral argument or through directions. This procedural rule does therefore still somewhat limit the options that a court may choose from.

The impact of substantive standards depends not only on the quantity of standards, but also their 'quality'; or, to put it differently, how many options the standard leaves for the decision maker. Generally, a standard can be either 'broad' or 'narrow'. A broad standard constrains discretion but still leaves a

[1] Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at 53.
[2] Ibid at 54.
[3] Ibid at 54–55.
[4] See, for example, Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another [2008] ZACC 8 (Court ordered raised the possibility of a structural interdict with the parties in oral argument. It eventually made the order, despite no party originally requesting it.)
[5] Modderfontein Squatters, Greater Benoni City Council v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, amici curiae); President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, Amici Curiae) 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA)('Modderklip SCA').
[6] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae*)* 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)2 at para 52.
[7] Modderklip SCA (supra) at para 18.

number of options open. On the other hand, a narrow standard allows very few possible outcomes.[1] In terms of this framework, to what extent are South African courts bound by substantive standards? There are two answers to this question: what the Constitutional Court says, and what it does. These are not in direct conflict, but they are in tension.

At the level of rhetoric, the Court has constantly maintained that courts must possess a broad discretion in crafting remedies.[2] The Final Constitution gives the courts the power to grant 'appropriate relief' for any infringement or threat of infringement to a right in the Bill of Rights[3] and the power to 'make any order that is just and equitable' when deciding any constitutional matter.[4] The best rhetorical statement of the Court's position appears, somewhat ironically, in Fose: The only requirement of the interim Constitution is that the relief given by a competent court in any particular case should be "appropriate relief". It is left to the courts to decide what would be appropriate relief in any particular case.'[5]

The Court has only accepted two unalterable limitations on remedial discretion. First, the Court has acknowledged that the command in FC s 172(1)(a) that a court 'must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency' prevents it from granting an order that avoids invalidity. Second, as discussed in detail later, the Court has read the Final Constitution to require that every remedy must be 'effective'.[6]

But despite the Constitutional Court's expression of relatively unfettered choice of remedy, it has, over time, established a wide range of specific presumptions and principles that seriously constrain the decisions of both itself and lower courts. As Hofmeyr puts it:

> The Constitutional Court's remedial approach has mimicked the development of equitable discretion in English law in so far as it has set out guidelines for the exercise of remedial power in order to constrain its exercise. With the accretion of cases, this approach has drawn the constitutional remedial power towards the periphery of the concept of discretion.[7]

[1] Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at 55–57.

[2] See, for example, Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v The Minister of Trade and Industry NO & Another 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) at para 28 ('This Court has broad remedial discretion to make a just and equitable order' (my emphasis)); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) at para 101 ('[FC s 38] contemplates that where it is established that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed a court will grant "appropriate relief". It has wide powers to do so'. (my emphasis)); Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at paras 27 and 38 ('Our flexibility in providing remedies may affect our understanding of the right' and '[the court has] adopted a flexible approach that is certainly inconsistent with the availability of a single remedy in North American jurisdictions' (my emphasis)).

[3] FC s 38.

[4] FC s 172(1)(b). As noted above this power embraces the ability to grant a remedy even where there has been no violation of a right. See § 9.2*(b)*(iv) supra.

[5] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 18 (The court does earlier recognize the limitation imposed by the obligation to declare unconstitutional law and conduct invalid.)

[6] See § 9.2*(e)* infra. This 'limitation' is not, however, universally respected.

[7] Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at para 63.

For example, there are presumptions in favour of retrospectivity[1] and against suspension,[2] supervisory interdicts,[3] punitive damages[4] and interim interdicts.[5] The Court has also created a real hierarchy of remedial choice when dealing with the substantive effect of declarations of invalidity.[6] A court must first determine whether the provision is capable of a constitutional interpretation. If not, it should, if possible, read-in or sever to cure a constitutional infirmity rather than declare the whole section invalid. The Court has created relatively complex rubrics to determine whether reading-in[7] or severance is appropriate.[8] Only if reading-in or severance are not possible should it declare the whole section invalid. The Court has also established at least two absolute rules: Notional severance can never be used to cure an omission[9] and a suspension can never be extended after the period of suspension has expired.[10]

But it is not only the presumptions, principles and rules that the Court has laid down that constrain remedial discretion. The general principle that like cases should be treated alike means that decisions in similar previous cases will have a strong gravitational pull on future judgments.[11] For example, in Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund the Court had to decide whether to limit the retrospective effect of an order that a prescription clause was unconstitutional.[12] It conducted no analysis of the effect of retrospectivity in the specific case. Instead, it simply cited a general principle that 'an order of invalidity should have no effect on cases which have been finalised prior to the date of the order of invalidity'[13] and then noted that the 'principle was apparently applied in Mohlomi'[14] [another case dealing with prescription] and there is no reason not to apply it in this matter.'[15] For the Court, a principle combined with its application in a similar case provided an

[1] See § 9.4*(d)*(ii) infra.
[2] See § 9.4*(e)(i)* infra.
[3] See § 9.6*(e)* infra.
[4] See § 9.5*(a)*(ii)(bb) infra.
[5] See § 9.5*(c)*(ii) infra.
[6] See § 9.4*(a)* infra.
[7] See § 9.4*(d)*(iii) infra.
[8] See § 9.4*(d)(i)* infra.
[9] See § 9.4*(d)*(ii) infra.
[10] See § 9.4*(e)(i)*(ee) infra.
[11] For example, a string of cases concerning the retrospective application of changes affecting succession took virtually identical tacks. See Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha and Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 563 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) discussed in § 9.4*(e)*(ii) infra.
[12] 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC)('Engelbrecht').
[13] Ibid at para 45 quoting S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC).
[14] Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC)
[15] Engelbrecht (supra) at para 45.

absolute answer to the question of remedy. As the Court decides more and more cases, courts' remedial discretion will move further and further along the standards axis and away from the central case of discretion.

This narrowing of discretion was inevitable. The Court was confronted with a blank canvas and had to create some sort of guidelines to ensure certainty and relative uniformity in the future. If the Court had not set down guidelines for when reading-in was appropriate, High Courts would not have known what to look for and might have taken disparate approaches. The disparity between these approaches would eventually have to be solved by the Constitutional Court on appeal. If it did so without laying down principles, the problem would have been perpetuated. However, it is important that the guidelines and standards remain just that. FC ss 38 and 172(1)(b) do afford broad discretion: such discretion ought not to be undermined by judicial fiat. And there is nothing in the case law to suggest that the Constitutional Court would want to do so. The danger comes when the Court relies too easily on past precedent and fails to consider the virtue and vices of various remedies afresh in each case that comes before it.[1] Similar cases may require similar results. However, an exercise of remedial discretion in one case should only provide guidance on how it should be exercised in a future case, not binding precedent.

(bb) The Review Axis

The review axis measures the extent to which lower court decisions are subject to alteration by higher tribunals. The central case would be where there is no review of a decision. In constitutional matters, the Constitutional Court occupies this position. But what is the position of the lower courts? A standard of review will fall closer to the central case if a higher court is only entitled to intervene in tightly circumscribed instances such as abuse of power or irrationality. The furthest one can go from the central case is de novo review.

The approach of the Constitutional Court turns on the nature of the remedy requested. These fall into two classes. If it is confronted with a 'constitutional remedy' such as a reading-in or suspension, then it applies a very high standard of review — and usually considers the remedy afresh. The Court has adopted the same approach to interdicts. On the other hand, where a more traditional remedy such as damages or a sentence of imprisonment is at issue, the Court has, generally, given lower courts much more leeway.

As Hofmeyr argues, the Court's approach to the first class of remedies — which I will, for lack of a better term, call 'constitutional remedies' — must be understood in light of the fact that the Court is obliged to confirm any order declaring an Act of Parliament or conduct of the President unconstitutional before the order has any force.[2] As a result, the Court is obliged to determine the extent of the violation and therefore to interfere with the lower court's decision relating to the substantive extent of the invalidity and therefore will often have a direct impact on the possibility of reading-in and severance. In S v Shinga, the Court confirmed the High Court's declaration of invalidity of s 309B and 309C of the Criminal Procedure Act regulating appeals from the Magistrates' Court.[1] But whereas the High Court found the procedure invalid in toto, the Constitutional Court found it invalid only to the extent that it permitted a record not to be sent in some cases and for appeals to be considered by only one judge. Accordingly, Yacoob J simply read the necessary words in to cure those narrow constitutional inconsistencies.[2]

[1] See my criticism of the Court's retrospectivity jurisprudence in § 9.4*(e)*(ii)(cc) infra.
[2] FC 167(5).

Although the Final Constitution does not require the Constitutional Court to review the lower court's ancillary remedial orders — such as suspension, limiting retrospectivity and so on — the Court has assumed that it has the power to do so virtually de novo. This attitude of the Constitutional Court is expressed by O'Regan J in Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs:

> Although this matter is before this Court for the confirmation of an order of invalidity, there is nothing in section 172 that suggests that the Court's power to make appropriate orders is limited in such matters. It seems clear from the language of section 172(1), in particular, that as long as a court is deciding a constitutional matter "within its power", it has the remedial powers conferred by that section, as broad as they may be. In the circumstances, therefore, the Court is not empowered merely to confirm or refuse to confirm the order that is before it. The Court, as section 172(1) requires, must, if it concludes that the provision is inconsistent with the Constitution, declare the provision invalid and then the Court may make any further order that is just and equitable.[3]

The Court has interpreted its power under FC s 167(5) to include a power to alter the remedy as it deems fit. This power is not an obvious consequence of the wording of either ss 167(5) or 172(2)(a).

This interpretation might also explain the Court's willingness to interfere with the granting of supervisory orders. In both Grootboom[4] and TAC[5] the Court, although largely confirming the High Courts' substantive findings, replaced the structural interdicts both High Courts had granted with declaratory orders. In neither case did the Court even consider the possibility of deference to the High Court's determination. This attitude is not limited to the Constitutional Court. The Supreme Court of Appeal expressed a similar willingness to interfere with orders requiring supervision in President of the Republic of South Africa v Modderklip Boerdery.[6]

However, when it comes to the second class of cases — traditional remedies

[1] 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC).
[2] Ibid at paras 55–56.
[3] 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 60.
[4] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC).
[5] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC').
[6] President of the RSA & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA).

— the Court has been reluctant to meddle with high court orders. In Dikoko v Mokhatla a majority of the Constitutional Court held that even if the amount of damages in a defamation suit was a constitutional issue (and it suggested strongly that it was) appellate courts should be very hesitant to interfere with the determination of the trial court.[1] Moseneke DCJ held that in determining damages the 'trial court is entrusted with a wide discretion'[2] that should only be interfered with if it was 'based on wrong principle' or was 'glaring disproportiona[te]'.[3] Similarly, when dealing with criminal sentences, the Court has stated that the discretion of the trial court must be respected. In S v Shaik, a unanimous Court held:

> It has been stated repeatedly by courts that an appeal court would not easily interfere with a sentence imposed by a trial court exercising its discretion. The question is not which sentence the appeal court would have imposed, but rather whether the sentence is shockingly inappropriate, or whether an irregularity or misdirection occurred.[4]

The same approach has been taken with regard to the exclusion of evidence in criminal trials.[5] The approach in all these circumstances applies a much lighter form of review and therefore places the remedial discretion of lower courts much closer to the central case for traditional remedies.

What is the reason for this seemingly schizophrenic approach: zero discretion in some cases, massive deference in others, and virtually nothing in between? The Court has never explained its approach and so what follows is largely speculative. Based on the Court's judgments, the first answer that comes to mind is that the 'traditional remedies' are more intimately tied up with the facts of a specific case. A trial court would be better suited to determine the 'fact'. 'Constitutional remedies' are largely contingent upon issues of constitutional principle. An appellate court is equally well placed to determine such matters — indeed an 11 person bench may be better equipped to engage issues of principle.

However, on its own, the 'fact-principle' distinction is insufficient. Many remedial decisions in the class of constitutional remedies depend on the facts. When deciding to read-in, sever, suspend the order of invalidity or limit its retrospectivity, some of the most important factors are the impact that it will have on government administration, the budget or any other number of factual concerns. The same goes for supervisory orders: whether it is necessary to monitor the state's progress and what the precise terms of the order should be depend, as

[1] 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 94.
[3] Ibid at para 95.
[4] 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 72.
[5] See, for example, Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others; Zuma & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2008] ZACC 13 at para 61 ('The trial court, rather than preliminary courts, is best placed to balance the varying public and private interests at stake, namely, the public and private interests in the emergence of truth, the applicants' interests in their privacy and property, and the accused persons' fair trial rights.') the Court itself has admitted,[1] largely on the factual situation, not on constitutional principle.

The additional difference between the two classes is that the 'constitutional remedies' deal with relief that will often have an impact on large classes of persons other than the litigants. Traditional remedies normally affect only the parties before the court. It is not so much that one determination is factual and the other is not. Rather, it is the nature of the facts. The relevant facts for 'traditional remedies' relate to the actions of individuals and the impact it will have in a very specific setting. On the other hand, 'constitutional remedies' rely on facts affecting the broad functioning of the mechanisms of government and a wider domain of social life. These facts are more connected to how our ideal society ought to be constructed (and how government ought to go about constructing it) than are facts about the appropriate sentence for a particular criminal.

A final possible explanation is precedent. When the Interim Constitution came into force there was no existing precedent specifying when constitutional remedies should be granted. That precedent had to be created. If the Constitutional Court had adopted an extremely deferential approach, the development of principles to guide remedial discretion would have been severely delayed and would have been created largely by the High Courts. The contrary is true when we consider the individual remedies: there was a huge amount of precedent relating to sentencing, damages and the exclusion of evidence. Not only was it not necessary for the Court to develop new precedent, but the existing precedent told it to avoid interfering in the decisions of trial courts.

Going forward, the Court would be well advised to increase the scope given to trial courts to fashion remedies, particularly supervisory orders. The main reason is that trial courts are better positioned to gather and analyse evidence than appellate courts. The Court has recognised this greater access to the pertinent facts. In S v Ntsele Kriegler J had the following to say:

> [Q]uestions of retrospectivity, prospectivity and the conditional suspension of orders of invalidity often present difficult choices, as is borne out by several judgments of this Court. Those choices often depend upon factors in respect of which evidence is necessary, for example, regarding the likely impact on the administration of justice if a provision were to be struck down with immediate effect, or the financial consequences for third parties of a retrospective order. Where that is so, all the relevant evidence should be received and evaluated by the court of first instance.[2]

[1] TAC (supra) at para 129 (The Court refused to order a structural interdict. It noted: 'In appropriate cases [courts] should exercise such a power if it is necessary to secure compliance with a court order. That may be because of a failure to heed declaratory orders or other relief granted by a court in a particular case. We do not consider, however, that orders should be made in those terms unless this is necessary. The government has always respected and executed orders of this Court. There is no reason to believe that it will not do so in the present case.') See also Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another [2008] ZACC 8 at para 84 (In this case the Court did grant a structural interdict because: 'It is apparent from the facts and history of this case that the legislature and the executive have not taken measures, legislative or otherwise, to ensure that the orders of a court are obeyed.')

[2] 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC) at para 13.

(ii) Discretion and Legitimacy

The problem judicial remedial discretion poses for the legitimacy of judicial review is best expressed by Owen Fiss:

> The rightful place of courts in our political system turns on the existence of public values and on the promise of those institutions - because they are independent and because they must engage in a special dialogue - to articulate and elaborate the true meaning of those values. The task of discovering the meaning of constitutional values such as equality, liberty, due process, or property is, however, quite different from choosing or fashioning the most effective strategy for actualizing those values, for eliminating the threat posed to those values by a state bureaucracy.[1]

In essence, Fiss' argument is that courts derive their legitimacy from their unique — because they are independent and have to engage in reasoned dialogue with anybody who brings a case to court — ability to give content to public values. But they are not unique in their ability to give effect to those values. While courts can claim legitimacy in determining rights, they cannot claim the same legitimacy in crafting remedies. If they are given a free reign in crafting remedies — particularly constitutional remedies that have influence far outside the confines of the parties to a particular case — they will be performing tasks that could be equally well performed by the legislature or the executive.[2]

There are a number of solutions to this problem of legitimacy. Fiss' solution is that we cannot afford to allow judges only to declare rights and other branches of government to enforce them because 'a delegation of the task of actualization to another agency … necessarily creates the risk that the remedy might distort the right, and leave us with something less than the true meaning of the constitutional value.'[3] In order to ensure the protection of rights, it is necessary that remedies are devised by the same body that defines the rights.

Paul Gerwitz finds Fiss' solution uncompelling. He supports the remedial equilibration thesis,[4] namely that 'it [is] inevitable that thoughts of remedy will

[1] O Fiss 'Foreword: The Forms of Justice' (1979) 93 Harvard LR 1 ('Forms of Justice') 51.

[2] Ibid at 51–52. See also William Fletcher 'The Discretionary Constitution: Institutional Remedies and Judicial Legitimacy' (1982) 91 Yale LJ 635, 694 (Fletcher argues that structural reform by federal courts must always be presumptively illegitimate. 'When a court resolves a non-legal polycentric problem ordinarily resolved by a political body, it mimics the manner of decisionmaking of the political body. But even if the mimicking is skillfully done, a critical element is, and always must be, missing. As an unavoidable structural matter, a federal judge is not controlled by the elements of the problem that he resolves. This control by the problem's constituent parts is what legitimates the exercise of discretion by a political body. Since this political control cannot exist over a federal judge, his or her discretionary resolution of the same problem simply cannot be legitimated on the same basis. And since the problem is non-legal in nature, the conventional means of control within the judiciary — legal rule and principle applied through the traditions of judicial reasoning and craft — are also unavailable as bases upon which to legitimate this exercise of power. Finally, since the problem is non-legal in nature, the district judge lacks even the internal control that would permit him or her to distinguish as a legal matter between appropriate and inappropriate remedial solutions.')

[3] Fiss 'Forms of Justice' (supra) at 53.

[4] See § 9.2*(c)(i)(cc)* supra.

affect thoughts of right, that judges' minds will shuttle back and forth between right and remedy.'[1] The rights declaring function is already a function that mixes with those traditionally assigned to the other branches of government. However, even if it were possible to separate rights and remedies, Gerwitz does not believe that Fiss' reasoning solves the problem of legitimacy. It simply shifts judges' illegitimate engagement with the real world to a different box. 'If legitimacy is undercut when judges behave adaptively and compromise with realities', Gerwitz argues, 'then this behaviour undercuts legitimacy at whatever "stage" it occurs.'[2] In Gerwitz's view, the legitimacy problem is insoluble on Fiss' terms. Fiss sets a standard for legitimacy that can only be met by a court that does not engage with the real world at all.

> If constitutional adjudication as we know it is to be deemed legitimate, the conditions of legitimacy must accommodate both the idealizing and adaptive nature of the enterprise and the pervasive nature of the enterprise and the pervasiveness of the duality.[3]

While Gerwitz is probably right that Fiss' definition of legitimacy puts him in a Chinese finger-trap from which he can't escape, Gerwitz' solution is equally unsatisfying. He seems to say: 'We must find a definition of legitimacy that legitimizes what we currently have.' That seems to get things backwards. It is current practice that must meet a definition of legitimacy, not the other way round.

William Fletcher offers an alternative.[4] He argues that since 'remedial discretion in institutional suits[5] is inevitably political in nature, it must be regarded as presumptively illegitimate.'[6] That presumption can only be 'overcome when the political bodies that should ordinarily exercise such discretion are seriously and chronically in default.'[7] A 'credible threat' of judicial intervention will encourage government to solve the problem: 'the greatest benefit of legitimating judicial remedial power may not be that it permits the court to act, but rather that it may force the political bodies to perform their functions.'[8]

Theunis Roux's recent work suggests a final possible approach to legitimacy.[9] Roux is not concerned with providing a theory of legitimacy. His project is instead to provide a description of the Constitutional Court's actions in a number

[1] P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585, 679.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 680.
[4] 'The Discretionary Constitution: Institutional Remedies and Judicial Legitimacy' (1982) 91 Yale LJ 635.
[5] Although Fletcher is concerned with institutional suits, there is no reason why his reasoning would not apply to other remedies such as reading-in, severance, suspension and limiting retrospectivity that also tend to push into the territory of the other branches.
[6] Fletcher (supra) at 637.
[7] Ibid.
[8] Ibid at 696.
[9] 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International Journal of Constitutional Law (forthcoming).

of difficult cases. He argues that these cases are best understood in terms of the Court trying to maintain a balance between three different forms of legitimacy: legal legitimacy, public support and institutional security. The first measures whether a decision is convincing within the legal community, the second whether it enjoys public support, and the third, 'the court's capacity to resist real or threatened attacks on its independence'.[1] He argues that the Constitutional Court acts out of mixed motives of principle and pragmatism in order to secure its institutional security without sacrificing its legal or public legitimacy. For example, Roux argues that the two decisions in Fourie[2] are best understood through this lens. There was no clear legal answer to the difficult question of whether the Court should suspend its order permitting same-sex couples to get married. In deciding in favour of suspension, Sachs J can be understood to have wanted to 'enlist the legislature's co-operation in the enforcement of a legal change that was likely to be highly divisive, and ran the risk of … weakening public support for the Court.'[3] O'Regan J, who would have made the order immediate, felt that suspension would undermine the Court's legal legitimacy which 'was ultimately a more important factor in securing public support for the Court.'[4]

My own view is that the question of legitimacy is not as difficult in South Africa as it may be in the United States. As noted earlier, the Final Constitution explicitly gives the courts very wide remedial powers. They can make any 'appropriate' order and any order that is 'just and equitable'. It would be odd indeed to argue that the existence of those powers is illegitimate.

However, that does not satisfactorily answer the deeper normative question. While the existence of discretion is secure, there is still an argument that it may be exercised in a way that undermines legitimacy. There is no doubt that courts have the power to take over the management of government institutions or even whole departments, but if they did so in situations that did not warrant that incursion, it would be perceived (rightly) as illegitimate. Let me put the point differently, the question for legitimacy in South Africa is whether the exercise of judicial discretion is indeed 'appropriate' or 'just and equitable'. It would not, absent special circumstances, be just and equitable for a court to take over the running of government or to re-write legislation from scratch. That leads into the next discussion: how courts choose remedies in specific cases.

(e) Choice of Remedy

This section constitutes the core of the chapter. It examines what factors are relevant to a court's choice of remedy generally and attempts to construct a framework for the determination of an appropriate remedy.

[1] Roux 'Principles and Pragmatism' (supra).
[2] 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC).
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid.

(i) Textual Considerations

The Final Constitution gives very little guidance on what concerns should guide a court's choice of remedy. It says only that any relief granted for the infringement or threat of infringement for a violation of a right in the Bill of Rights must be 'appropriate' and that when dealing with any constitutional matter, a court may make 'any order that is just and equitable.' But what do these fairly vague terms mean and is there a difference between 'appropriate relief' in terms of FC s 38 and a 'just and equitable' order in terms of FC s 172(1)(b)?

The Court has given us some guidance on what 'appropriate relief' in terms of FC s 38 means. It has held that '[a]ppropriate relief will in essence be relief that is required to protect and enforce the Constitution'[1] and that appropriateness, > require[s] "suitability" which is measured by the extent to which a particular form of relief vindicates the Constitution and acts as a deterrent against further violations of rights enshrined in chapter 3.'[2]

More recently, the Court has held that 'appropriate relief must necessarily be effective.'[3] These dicta — which as we shall see are not the Court's last word on the topic — suggest that 'appropriate relief' demands a victim-centred approach to remedies.

Does 'just and equitable' in FC s 172(1)(b) bear a different meaning? Some of the cases suggest that it does. The Constitutional Court has in a number of contexts held that what is 'just and equitable' requires a balance between the interests of all parties involved.[4] It has re-iterated that interpretation with regard

[1] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose') at para 19.

[2] Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 38. Although Kriegler J purports to be relying on the majority judgment in Fose, his construction more closely resembles the interpretation of 'appropriate relief' suggested in his concurring judgment. See Fose (supra) at para 97 ('When something is appropriate it is "specially fitted or suitable". Suitability, in this context, is measured by the extent to which a particular form of relief vindicates the Constitution and acts as a deterrent against further violations of rights enshrined in chapter three.')

[3] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae*)* 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) at para 57.

[4] See Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC) at para 33 (Interpreted 'just and equitable' in FC s 25(3) — which concerns compensation for expropriated property — to mean that compensation 'must reflect an equitable balance between the interests of the public and of those affected by the expropriation'); Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at paras 33–38 (Determined 'just and equitable' in the context of evictions in terms of the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 to require a consideration of all factors and approved of the High Court's approach that viewed 'just and equitable' as referring 'not only to the persons who occupied the land illegally but to the landowner as well.') to the use of the phrase in FC s 172(1)(b).[1] So while FC s 38 requires a victim-oriented approach, FC s 172(1)(b) can be read to require an all-embracing, all things considered exercise of discretion.

The conflict between the two remedial forms is plainly presented in the following passage from Bayda CJS's opinion in Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission v Kodellas:[2]

> Appropriateness connotes efficaciousness and suitability from the standpoint of the violation itself — a remedy 'to fit the offence' as it were. It suggests a remedy that, from the perspective of the person whose right was violated, will effectively redress the grievance brought about by the violation. The quality of justness, on the other hand, has a broader scope of operation. It must fill a more extensive set of criteria than the quality of appropriateness. To be just a remedy must be fair to all who are affected by it. That group may well include persons other than the person whose right was violated.[3]

The Constitutional Court was required to engage just such a conflict in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others.[4] In considering whether it was possible for a court to grant a

[1] See, for example, Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 130 (In a case concerning cattle that trespassed on neighbours' land, the Court held that 'just and equitable' relief 'should protect both the rights of stockowners and landowners.'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 94 (The Court was considering when an order limiting retrospectivity would be just and equitable and specifically whether there was a difference between s 98(6) of the Interim Constitution, which mentioned 'the interests of good government' and the Final Constitution. Ackermann J held that 'the test under the [Final] Constitution is a broader and more flexible one, where the concept of the interests of good government is but one of many possible factors to consider.'); Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 132 (Court held that the test for whether a suspension should be granted is 'what is just and equitable, taking account of all the circumstances' (my emphasis).)

[2] (1989) 60 DLR (4th) 143; [1989] 5 WWR 1 (Sask CA)(The Court was required to consider the meaning of s 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which permits those whose Charter rights are infringed to 'obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.' The facts concerned an applicant whose complaint of sexual harassment had not been decided by the Human Rights Commission for over four years. All the judges agreed that the delay violated Kodellas' Charter rights, but disagreed on the remedy. Bayda CJS held that a stay was inappropriate because it would impact negatively on the original complainants' rights to have their sexual harassment complaint dealt with. He was however in the minority. Vancise and Wakeling JA held that only a permanent stay of the proceedings could cure the infringement of the applicant's rights. Interestingly, although they reached a different result, the majority's conception of the meaning of 'appropriate and just' was virtually indistinguishable from Bayda CJS's interperetation.)

[3] Ibid at para 34. The Constitutional Court has rejected this dictum. Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffmann') at n 36 ('This statement must be understood in the context of section 24(1) of the Canadian Charter, which provides that anyone whose rights, guaranteed in the Charter, have been infringed may apply to court "to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances." The Canadian Constitution, therefore, makes a distinction between "appropriateness" and "justness". Our Constitution does not. As we shall see, this assertion is not entirely true.') temporary exemption from a statutory provision in order to allow prisoners to vote, it held:

[4] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('Nicro').

> This must of course be done within the overriding considerations of justice and equity. These considerations must be understood in the light of the constitutional imperative of providing appropriate relief to successful litigants.[1]

This reasoning is contradictory. The word 'overriding' suggests that justice and equity are the primary considerations. However, the use of 'imperative' implies that the relief must be appropriate at all costs. The dictum does not tell us what to do when justice and equity pull in one direction and appropriateness in another.

As Ackermann J argues in Fose, in many cases a remedy can be just, equitable and appropriate:

> Construed purposively … I see no material difference between the two concepts. It can hardly be argued, in my view, that relief which was unjust to others could, where other available relief meeting the complainant's needs did not suffer from this defect, be classified as appropriate. In [determining what is 'appropriate'] the interests of both the complainant and society as a whole ought, as far as possible, to be served.[2]

Of course, a court should choose a remedy that is both appropriate and just — that fulfils the interests of the right-bearer and society. But Ackermann J too does not tell us what should be done in those cases, however few they may be,[3] where it is not possible to find a remedy that is both 'just' and 'appropriate'. Is appropriateness ultimately subordinated to justness or do the interests of the right-bearer trump those of society?

The Court tried to finesse — or deny, if one wishes to be less charitable — this conflict in Hoffmann v South African Airways by importing the element of 'fairness':

> Section 38 of the Constitution provides that where a right contained in the Bill of Rights has been infringed, 'the Court may grant appropriate relief'. In the context of our Constitution 'appropriate relief' must be construed purposively, and in the light of s 172(1)(b), which empowers the Court, in constitutional matters, to make 'any order that is just and equitable'. Thus construed, appropriate relief must be fair and just in the circumstances of the particular case. Indeed, it can hardly be said that relief that is unfair or unjust is appropriate. As Ackermann J remarked in the context of a comparable provision in the interim Constitution, '[i]t can hardly be argued, in my view, that relief which was unjust to others could, where other available relief meeting the complainant's needs did not suffer from this defect, be classified as appropriate'. Appropriateness, therefore, in the context of our Constitution, imports the elements of justice and fairness.
>
> Fairness requires a consideration of the interests of all those who might be affected by the order. In the context of employment, this will require a consideration not only of the interests of the prospective employee but also the interests of the employer. In other cases, the interests of the community may have to be taken into consideration.[4]

[1] Nicro (supra) at para 77.
[2] Fose (supra) at para 38.
[3] His qualification 'as far as possible' implies that he realised such cases would arise.
[4] Hoffmann (supra) at paras 42–43.

Again, Ngcobo J, by relying on Justice Ackermann's reasoning in Fose, only answers the easy question: what to do when 'other available relief meeting the complainant's needs' is not unjust to others. He does not tell us what to do when the only relief 'meeting the complainant's needs' is unjust to others. That is the hard question. Resort to the word 'fairness' does not answer it — it simply slaps a label on the problem.[1]

(ii) Rights-maximising and Interest Balancing

As should be clear by now, this textual debate about the difference between 'appropriate' and 'just' reflects a deeper conflict about the purpose of constitutional remedies. A classification of the possible approaches to this problem should help to clarify the issue. Paul Gerwitz identifies two basic approaches to the choice of remedy: 'rights maximising' and 'interest balancing'.[2] Any approach to remedies will fall somewhere between these two poles. The 'rights maximising' approach is entirely victim-focused; the sole aim is to vindicate the right in the most effective way possible. Other considerations — such as the separation of powers or budgetary concerns — will only be relevant if they have a bearing on the effectiveness of the right or if two remedies give effect to the right equally well and a court needs to choose between them.[3] A less than perfect remedy is only acceptable if it is unavoidable. This corresponds to some of the interpretations of 'appropriate' adopted by the Constitutional Court.

On the other hand, 'interest balancing' would appear to reflect the Court's understanding of the FC s 172(1)(b) phrase 'just and equitable'. It treats the vindication of a right as one of many factors to be considered in fashioning a remedy: 'In evaluating a remedy, courts in some sense "balance" its net remedial benefits to victims against the net costs it imposes on a broader range of social interests.'[4] Unlike a 'rights maximising' judge, a judge adopting an 'interest balancing' philosophy could choose a remedy that gives less than optimal effect to the right. She choose this less effective remedy because sufficiently weighty concerns justify doing so.[5]

A pure rights-maximising position — however intuitively attractive it may be for people like me who find the practical difficulties in implementing rights a permanent frustration — is untenable. In Gerwitz's words:

[1] On the use of words like 'fairness' to plaster over difficult legal cracks, see J Frank Law and the Modern Mind (1985)('Lawyers use what the layman describes as "weasel words", so-called "safety-valve concepts," such as "prudent", "negligence", "freedom of contract", "good faith," "ought to know," "due care," "due process," — terms with the vaguest meaning — as if these vague words had a precise and clear definition; they thereby create an appearance of continuity, uniformity and definiteness which does not in fact exist.')

[2] P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585, 591.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid.

> However strong remedial effectiveness is as a value, it is not society's only value. Where effective remedies conflict with interests that were not considered at the rights stage — interests that are not relevant to the question of whether a right has been violated — those interests press to be considered at the remedy stage and, on occasion, to override the value of remedying violations of the right.[1]

However, as the quote implies, it does not follow that interest balancing ought to be the default position. Effective relief must be a priority if the Final Constitution is to have any meaning. And it should only be overridden 'on occasion'. But between these two contrasting extremes there are an infinite number of interim positions. The spectrum starts with the (hypothetical) judge who would accept that no limits are unavoidable — the right must always be fully vindicated. It then proceeds to judges who accept that some gap between right and remedy is unavoidable. The greater the acceptable gap, and the more often they will permit a gap to exist, the further they depart from the absolutist rights maximiser. Eventually, there will be a judge who accepts that an imperfect remedy is avoidable but other considerations are so strong that they justify granting it. We are now in the domain of 'interest balancing'. From there, the weaker the interests that are needed to outweigh the need to vindicate the right, the more the judge tends towards the interest balancing end of the spectrum. The final position is occupied by a judge for whom the need to vindicate the right is but one of many factors that must be weighed with all the others in choosing an appropriate remedy.

Where does the Constitutional Court's approach fall on the spectrum between rights maximiser and interest balancer? The case law throws up no easy answer. The passages from NICRO, Fose and Hoffmann quoted earlier show how ambivalent the Court has been on this score. The two primary impediments for slotting the Court into an identifiable position along the spectrum between rights maximizer and interest balancer are: (1) what the Court has said, and what it has done are not always the same; (2) it has adopted different approaches in different cases. In some remedial contexts, like damages, it has emphasized the need to maximize the right. In others, say, where reading-in is the remedy, it has stressed the importance of other factors. Even when concerned with the same remedy, the Court has sometimes adopted seemingly incompatible positions.[2]

However, despite this ambiguity, two things are clear. First, the Court is not a pure rights-maximiser. It has constantly accepted the proposition that avoidable concerns can limit rights. Second, neither is it a hard-core interest-balancer. It consistently emphasizes the need to provide effective relief as not merely one of many factors, but as an 'imperative'. Read as a whole, the Court's jurisprudence suggests that its preferences lie somewhere in the middle. The Court sees the need for effective relief as the primary goal of a remedy. Yet it accepts that in certain circumstances other considerations will justify affording relief that is less than perfect, (or will justify affording no relief at all[1]), even if perfect or more effective relief is available.

[1] Gerwitz (supra) at 604.
[2] On retrospectivity, see § 9.4*(e)*(ii) infra.

The position is most clearly exhibited in the Court's consideration of a remedy in Gory v Kolver NO & Others.[2] The Court, concerned with whether the Intestate Succession Act[3] should be extended to same-sex life-partners, held that 'where a litigant does establish that an infringement of an entrenched right has occurred, he or she should as far as possible be given effective relief so that the right in question is properly vindicated.'[4] This rights-maximising position accepts only unavoidable limits with regard to the vindication of the right. However, two paragraphs later, the Court describes a different, interest-balancing, approach:

> It is necessary to balance the potentially disruptive effects of an order of retrospective invalidity … and the effect of such an order on the vested rights of third parties, on the one hand, with the need to give effective relief to Mr Gory and similarly situated persons, on the other.[5]

To properly understand the tension — if not the contradictions — in the Court's approach, these two statements need to be read together: The Court will try as hard as possible to vindicate the right, but will allow avoidable limits in compelling circumstances. Within that broad framework, there still remain a number of different ways to thinking about remedial choice.

(iii) Ways of conceiving choice

In this section I proffer five ways of thinking about how courts choose remedies. Each brings something new to the table. My own Frankenstein-like approach draws down on the insights from all these approaches.

(a) Bollyky's Formula

Thus far, the most serious attempt to construct a 'theory' for choice of remedies in South Africa has been provided by Thomas Bollyky.[6] Although his primary targets are remedies in socio-economic rights cases, his theory draws from, and is meant to apply to, all constitutional cases. Bollyky expresses his theory in the form of the following algorithm: R if C > P + B. I will let him explain what this formula means:

---

[1] See § 9.2*(b)* supra.
[2] 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC)('Gory').
[3] Act 81 of 1987.
[4] Gory (supra) at para 40 (my emphasis).
[5] Ibid at para 42.
[6] 'R if C > P + B: A Paradigm for Judicial Remedies of Socio-economic Rights Violations' (2002) 18 SAJHR 161.

> When remedying a violation of the Bill of Rights, courts intuitively weigh the degree to which they must make choices regarding policies and budgets against the extent of the constitutional violation. If a remedy entails extensive — quantitatively and qualitatively — policy and budgetary considerations, the court will not make them for a constitutional violation which is not proportionately — quantitatively or qualitatively — extensive. The reverse is also true.
>
> This insight may be expressed algebraically as: R if C > P + B, where R is the desired remedy, C equals the extent of the constitutional violation (expressed as a product of its quantitative and qualitative elements), P is the level of policy interference required by the remedy sought, and B equals the level of budgetary interference required by that remedy.[1]

Bollyky emphasises that the formula does not propose a 'cost benefit analysis'. 'The common unit for the variables is not', he insists, 'economic.'[2]

> Instead, it describes the intuitive calculation judges use to arrive at an assessment of the legitimacy of ordering a particular remedy in a constitutional democracy with separation of powers. . . . The common unit, or the basis of comparison, for the variables in this paradigm is whether they add, or detract, from the legitimacy of granting the form of relief. Judges intuitively weigh these competing normative values and ultimately make an assessment of remedies based on their proportionality.[3]

Bollyky's theory has its virtues and vices — as well as its inconsistencies and inaccuracies. His characterisation of the choice of remedies as an intuitive weighing of competing normative values is extremely helpful. The choice of remedies will almost always involve competing values and interests that cannot, ultimately, be weighed on any other metric other than the judge's own sense of legitimacy.[4] However, this insight seems to undermine the core of Bollyky's project: to reduce this intuitive process to a simple formula. A process this complex will necessarily resist analysis based on any three (intuitive) variables. Here is a short list of factors that the Bollyky equation ignores: unfairness to third parties; conduct of the victim or the violator; impact on existing practice; the courts' own practical limitations; and whether the problem is isolated or systemic. These factors are not easily captured under either 'the extent of the violation', 'policy interference' or 'budgetary interference'.

(b) The purposive approach

Kent Roach explains that, at least until recently, the Canadian Supreme Court adopted a 'purposive approach' to remedies which sought 'to integrate Charter remedies with purposes of the particular Charter right being remedied, the general

[1] Bollyky (supra).
[2] Ibid at 175.
[3] Ibid.
[4] For critiques of the metaphor of balancing generally, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.8*(d)*; S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations: Shared Constitutional Interpretation, An Appropriate Normative Framework and Hard Choices' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 149.

purposes and values of the Charter and the methodology that is applied to the interpretation of all Charter remedies.'[1] To put it plainly, the remedy must be fashioned to give effect to the purpose of the right, interpreted in light of the whole Bill of Rights. So, in Osborne v Canada (Treasury Board) Sopinka J wrote:

> In selecting an appropriate remedy under the Charter, the primary concern of the court must be to apply the measures that will best vindicate the values expressed in the Charter and to provide the form of remedy to those whose rights have been violated that best achieves that objective.[2]

The Constitutional Court, famous for its purposive approach to interpretation,[3] has flirted with purposivism as a remedial theory. In Fourie, Justice Sachs held that it was important: 'to look at the precise circumstances of each case with a view to determining how best the values of the Constitution can be promoted by an order that is just and equitable.'[4]

This purposive approach avoids 'restrictive and technical approaches' to remedies — such as Bollyky's — and encourages courts to 'be explicit about what they are trying to accomplish' with a particular remedy.[5] However, it is also incomplete. Rights serve many different goals. A purposive approach still requires a court to 'select among different purposes and constraints and apply them in particular contexts.'[6] The purpose of the Final Constitution as a whole, or of a specific right, even if it could be divined, would only ever be part of the inquiry. It also is incompatible with an interest-balancing approach —partially endorsed by the Court — that recognizes that other factors other than fulfilling the purpose of a right are relevant to crafting a remedy.

[1] K Roach Constitutional Remedies (1994)('Remedies') § 3.310.

[2] [1991] 2 SCR 170, 346 as quoted in Roach Remedies (supra) at § 3.380.

[3] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[4] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 135. See also Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose') at para 96 (Kriegler J)('Our object in remedying these kinds of harms should, at least, be to vindicate the Constitution, and to deter its further infringement. Deterrence speaks for itself as an object, but vindication needs elaboration. Its meaning, strictly defined, is to "defend against encroachment or interference". It suggests that certain harms, if not addressed, diminish our faith in the Constitution. It recognises that a Constitution has as little or as much weight as the prevailing political culture affords it. The defence of the Constitution — its vindication — is a burden imposed not exclusively, but primarily, on the judiciary. In exercising our discretion to choose between appropriate forms of relief, we must carefully analyse the nature of a constitutional infringement, and strike effectively at its source.')

[5] Roach Remedies (supra) at § 3.400

[6] Ibid.

(c) The principled approach

In Hoffmann the Constitutional Court set out an approach to remedies that, although not denying the importance of the purpose, sets out more specific principles to be considered:

> The determination of appropriate relief, therefore, calls for the balancing of the various interests that might be affected by the remedy. The balancing process must at least be guided by the objective, first, to address the wrong occasioned by the infringement of the constitutional right; second, to deter future violations; third, to make an order that can be complied with; and fourth, of fairness to all those who might be affected by the relief. Invariably, the nature of the right infringed and the nature of the infringement will provide guidance as to the appropriate relief in the particular case. Therefore, in determining appropriate relief, "we must carefully analyse the nature of [the] constitutional infringement, and strike effectively at its source."[1]

Similar approaches have been adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court[2] and South African writers.[3] These approaches do not leave the determination to the vague idea of the purpose of a right — let alone the Bill of Rights as a whole. Nor do they try to construct a strict formula which automatically spits out remedies. They provide more general guidance than Bollyky and more specific and universal direction than the purposive approach.

What they lack though is a clear system for their application. They do not order the principles nor do they suggest how a conflict between principles is to be resolved. While no perfect lexical ordering of principles is possible, one can, I think, offer greater specificity about what factors to consider when crafting a remedy.

[1] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 45 quoting Fose (supra) at para 96 (Kriegler J).

[2] Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Minister of Education) [2003] 3 SCR 3 (The Court provided a list of five-principles which should be used to determine the remedy: (a) The remedy must 'meaningfully vindicate[ ] the rights and freedoms of the claimants'. Ibid at para 55. (b) The remedy 'must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy' and should not 'depart unduly or unnecessarily from [the courts'] role of adjudicating disputes and granting remedies that address the matter of those disputes.' Ibid at para 56. (c) The court must understand its functional limitations and should not grant remedies 'for which its design and expertise are manifestly unsuited'. Ibid at para 57. (d) The relief must also be 'fair to the party against whom the order is made.' Ibid at para 58. (e) '[T]he judicial approach to remedies must remain flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case.' Ibid at para 59.)

[3] I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 196–198 (The authors identify eight factors that are relevant in choosing a remedy: (a) providing an effective remedy; (b) coming to the aid of similarly situated people; (c) the separation of powers; (d) the identity of the violator; (e) the nature of the violation; (f) the impact on the victim; (g) victim responsibility; and (h) the possibility of successful execution. I include all of these in my structure (and owe much of my thinking to Currie and de Waal's discussion of them) but instead of treating them as free-floating factors, I place them in a structure which I think gives effective relief its proper weight.)

(d) Taxonomies and constraints

Ken Cooper-Stephenson has suggested a detailed structure. He calls his rubric a 'remedial taxonomy' — to evaluate remedies.[1] The purpose of the taxonomy is not to provide a 'rigid sequence' or formula to determine remedies, but a 'framework for organizing analytic constructs'. The main headings of his taxonomy are: (a) the target of the remedy; (b) the purpose of the remedy; (c) applicable legal principles; (d) procedural issues; and (e) implementation.[2] Each of these headings then has a large number of subheadings. These concepts are 'heavily integrated and will function in an interactive way.'[3] In addition to these factors, Cooper-Stephenson also identified a number of underlying themes that are relevant to most or all of the taxonomic factors.[4]

The approach Roach adopts is to identify both the purposes remedies serve and the constraints that limit the achievement of those purposes. He conducts his discussion under four headings: (a) correction of the violation;[5] (b) regulating government behaviour;[6] (c) balancing interests;[7] and (c) institutional roles.[8] The first two are aimed at the vindication of the right[9] and the last two at what may justify departing from full vindication. Finally, as explained earlier, Paul Gerwitz distinguishes between avoidable and unavoidable limits on the full realisation of a right.[10] I think this is a useful distinction because it helps us to identify when a court is engaged in weighing interests, and when it is simply recognizing unfortunate but inevitable limits on its powers.

(iv) Structuring Remedies

Roach, Gerwitz and Cooper-Stephenson all articulate 'theories' that identify both the purposes remedies serve and the constraints that limit the achievement of those purposes. My somewhat eclectic approach borrows the best from each.

In my view, a court should start by determining what the most effective possible relief would be without regard for any potential problems with actually providing that relief. In doing so, it must consider the purpose of the right

[1] K Cooper-Stephenson 'Principle and Pragmatism in the Law of Remedies' in J Bennyman (ed) Remedies: Issues and Perspectives (1991).
[2] Ibid at 11.
[3] Ibid.
[4] These themes are: (a) indeterminacy; (b) time; (c) neutrality; (d) cohesion; and (e) efficiency.
[5] Roach Remedies (supra) at 223.410–3.550.
[6] Ibid at § 3.560–3.670.
[7] Ibid at § 3.680–3.780.
[8] Ibid at § 3.790–3.870.
[9] They seem to conform to Justice Kriegler's call for vindication and deterrence as the aim of remedies. Fose (supra) at para 97 ('Suitability, in this context, is measured by the extent to which a particular form of relief vindicates the Constitution and acts as a deterrent against further violations of rights enshrined in chap 3.') which, it must be remembered, will often go beyond the interests of the specific litigant before the court. From there, a court should consider the unavoidable limitations and pare down the remedy accordingly. Finally, the court should consider if any of the avoidable limitations justify a further limitation of the remedy. At all times, the goal should be to make the relief as effective as possible. I think this structure reflects the courts' emphasis on effective relief while still acknowledging the role that other factors play. In my view, it does this better than simply including effective relief as one of many factors to be considered.
[10] Gerwitz (supra) at 591–608.

However, this structured approach also has limitations. Firstly, although I think following this three-step structure is a useful way to balance competing interests, courts need not — and probably will not — go through each and every potential limitation in every case. The relevant limitations will often be clear — largely because of the experience manifest in existing precedent. But in cases where courts are uncertain as to what the appropriate remedy should be, thinking of it in these terms should be helpful. Secondly, there may well be considerations that are not listed here that may also be relevant to choice of remedy. What is most important about this structure, to my mind, is not so much the specific factors that it includes, but the structure that forces courts to first determine the most effective remedy and then justify every departure from that ideal. Finally, by far the biggest limitation is that it does not tell courts when an avoidable limitation justifies a limitation of a right. There is no absolute answer to that question. I hope that the second half of this chapter – which examines in depth each type of remedy – provides some more guidance about what sort of limitations on effective relief are justifiable and why. But at this very abstract level, it is impossible to provide more direction. In Justice Kriegler's words: 'One cannot be more specific. The facts surrounding a violation of rights will determine what form of relief is appropriate.'[1]

(aa) Effective Relief

(1) General principle

The Court has regularly stressed the need for effective relief. In Fose v Minister of Safety and Security, decided under the Interim Constitution, Ackermann J held:

> Given the historical context in which the interim Constitution was adopted and the extensive violation of fundamental rights which had preceded it, I have no doubt that this Court has a particular duty to ensure that, within the bounds of the Constitution, effective relief be granted for the infringement of any of the rights entrenched in it. In our context an appropriate remedy must mean an effective remedy, for without effective remedies for breach, the values underlying and the rights entrenched in the Constitution cannot properly be upheld or enhanced.[2]

[1] Fose (supra) at para 97.
[2] Ibid at para 69 (my emphasis).

The Court has since made it clear that this holding applies equally to FC s 38.[1]

In Modderklip the Court identified a 'constitutional right[ ] to an effective remedy as required by the rule of law and entrenched in section 34 of the Constitution.'[2] However, considering the factual matrix of the case,[3] it appears that this remedy does not issue from FC s 38. Instead, it is a right to have remedies properly enforced by the state.[4] Even if this more limited interpretation is correct, Modderklip still adds to the right to effective remedies because it ensures that a remedy, once granted, will become a reality.

Having established the importance that the Court places on providing effective relief, it is necessary to consider what the phrase actually means. 'Effective relief' is relief that leaves no gap between right and remedy: it makes the constitutional ideal a reality. The purpose of the right and of the constitutional scheme as a whole will be central in this determination. However, there are a number of more specific issues that can be identified.

(2) Corrective or distributive

The first question is whether the relief requires the rectification of past injustices or the prevention of present and future injustices. Some cases will only require rectification. In NM & Others v Smith, the applicants' privacy and dignity interests had been violated by the negligent publication of their HIV status.[5] There was no

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000(1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at para 65; President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others Amici Curiae*)* 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip') at para 57. As Hofmeyr notes, the courts interpretation of FC s 38 is strange because its predecessor (IC s 7(4)(a)) was couched in mandatory terms while FC s 38 is in permissive terms. K Hofmeyr 'Understanding Constitutional Remedial Power' (Unpublished Mphil Thesis, Oxford University, 2006, on file with the author)('Remedial Power') 64–65. IC s 7(4)(a) read: 'When an infringement of or threat to any right entrenched in this Chapter is alleged, any person referred to in paragraph (b) shall be entitled to apply to a competent court of law for appropriate relief, which may include a declaration of rights.' Although s 7(4)(a) is ambiguous as to whether the 'shall' entitles a person only to approach a court or also to appropriate relief, one would have thought that any ambiguity would have been removed by the use of the word 'may' in FC s 38. The Court, however, seems to have ignored this change.

[2] Modderklip (supra) at para 50. It is, admittedly, unclear whether this is a reference to a remedy for the violation of constitutional rights or simply a statement that litigants are entitled to have court orders enforced.

[3] Modderklip involved the invasion of a farm by people searching for housing. The state was unable or unwilling to enforce the eviction order secured by the owner of the farm. It was this failure that lead to a finding that right to access to courts had been violated.

[4] See A Friedman & J Brickhill 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) § 59.4*(b)*; Hofmeyr 'Remedial Power' (supra) at 67–68. Although this result seems like the best interpretation, it is strange that the Court did not rely on this finding in Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng & Others [2008] ZACC 8 (The Court struck down a provision which prevented judgment creditors from attaching state assets to satisfy a court order.)

[5] 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC).

systemic wrong that required improvement.[1] The problem was an isolated incident of journalistic recklessness and all that was required was for the applicants to be compensated for their suffering. Other cases will be almost entirely forward looking. When Lawyers for Human Rights challenged the new Immigration Act, they did not allege or cite any wrongs that had been committed.[2] They challenged the Act in order to prevent constitutional rights being violated in the future. A mere declaration of invalidity sufficed and no damages or release orders were necessary.

Thus, Kriegler J may have overstated the case when he said that all remedies must both vindicate the right and deter future violations.[3] However, he was undoubtedly correct that most cases will require a court to look both backwards and forwards — even cases that seem to involve only an individual claim. In Hoffmann v South African Airways, for example, the applicant had been refused a post as an air host because he was HIV positive.[4] Ngcobo J found this action unconstitutional and decided that instatement was the appropriate remedy:

> Where a person has been wrongfully denied employment, the fullest redress obtainable is instatement. Instatement serves an important constitutional objective. It redresses the wrong suffered, and thus eliminates the effect of the unfair discrimination. It sends a message that under our Constitution discrimination will not be tolerated and thus ensures future compliance. In the end, it vindicates the Constitution and enhances our faith in it. It restores the human dignity of the person who has been discriminated against, achieves equality of employment opportunities and removes the barriers that have operated in the past in favour of certain groups, and in the process advances human rights and freedoms for all.[5]

If Justice Ngcobo had chosen to simply award Mr Hoffmann damages, then companies in the future might have decided that it was worth refusing to employ HIV positive people and to compensate them with damages. By insisting on employment as the appropriate remedy, Ngcobo J removed that possibility and made future violations less likely.

It will not always be possible to both rectify past injustice and prevent future injustice. Such a choice between past and future faced the Court in Fraser.[6] If it

[1] This is true of the majority opinion which found that the journalists had acted with intention. The minority opinions of Langa CJ and O'Regan J recognized that the common law should be developed to punish negligent wrongdoing by journalists. This was a systemic change that also recognized the need to protect people in the applicants' position in the future.

[2] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC).

[3] Fose (supra) at para 97.

[4] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 52. See also NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 82 ('But it must vindicate at more than an abstract level. It must operate to eradicate these stereotypes. Our constitutional commitment to non-discrimination and equal protection demands this. There is a wider public dimension. The bell tolls for everyone, because "[t]he social cost of discrimination is insupportably high and these insidious practices are damaging not only to the individuals who suffer the discrimination, but also to the very fabric of our society."') did not suspend the order, then Mr Fraser would be able to prevent the adoption of his child. However, other children might not be adopted in the future because fathers less worthy than Mr Fraser could prevent the adoption from taking place. The Court felt that permitting the injustice to Mr Fraser was warranted in order to safeguard the interests of children in the future. However, as I argue when considering orders of suspension,[1] difficulties such as those confronting the Fraser Court are not insurmountable. At the initial stage of imagining the most effective possible relief, courts should avoid 'lesser evil' outcomes: They should conjure up solely those remedies that would both vindicate and deter.

[6] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC).

(3) Nature of the violation

The nature of the violation can be broken down in several ways: isolated or systemic; complete or ongoing; serious or trivial; individual or widespread. For a remedy to be effective it must consider these differences. Rail Commuters — which concerned violent attacks on trains — explains the impact of a number of these distinctions.[2] If the case had simply concerned a single, complete attack, then damages would probably have been the most effective remedy. However, the violation was not isolated but, ongoing and widespread — a result of systemic deficiencies in the security apparatus on all trains. Damages, even for all the people who had been victims, would not have been an effective solution. As a result, the High Court granted a structural interdict to ensure that security on the train improved.[3]

(4) Similarly situated

The Constitutional Court has made it clear on several occasions that '[e]ffective relief requires that relief be afforded not only to the specific litigant, but to all people who are similarly situated.'[4] A remedy that only aids a single litigant is not 'effective relief'. In many cases, this result will be easy and obvious. In Fourie, the right of same-sex couples to marry was extended to all same-sex couples, not just the particular couple that litigated the case. In Bhulwana the invalidation of a

[1] See § 9.4*(e)(i)(cc)* infra.

[2] Rail Commuter Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C).

[3] But see, Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)(On appeal the Constitutional Court overturned this order and granted a simple declaration setting out the state's obligations. However, the Court does not seem to have regarded this as the most effective relief, but that the most effective relief — a structural interdict — was not appropriate because of separation of powers concerns.)

[4] S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 32. See also Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 42; Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund & Another (The Women's Legal Centre Trust as amicus curiae*)* 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) at para 71; Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 74.

reverse onus provision had to apply not only to the litigant who had challenged it, but to all other people who had been convicted or were being convicted under the law.[1] But determining who is similarly situated is not always easy. In S v Masiya, the Court had to consider whether the definition of rape should be extended to include anal penetration.[2] The particular case before the Court concerned a young girl who had been raped. The majority of the Court decided that it should limit itself to the facts of the case before it and extended the definition of rape solely to the anal penetration of females.[3] Chief Justice Langa (with the support of Justice Sachs) dissented. He found that boys who were anally raped were 'similarly situated' and were therefore entitled to the same relief.[4] In Satchwell the Court refused to 'lump together' unmarried homosexual partners — to whom it extended the benefits of the law in question — with unmarried heterosexual partners — to whom it did not extend those benefits.[5] In the Court's view, the two groups raised 'quite different legal and factual issues'.[6]

At the stage of determining what qualifies as effective relief, 'similarly situated people' should be defined as widely as possible. Only if a genuinely meaningful difference exists between the two groups should effective relief be limited at this stage. I therefore agree with Chief Justice Langa that such a difference was not present in Masiya. The very reasons the majority relied upon — that rape is about power, not sex and that rape infringes the victim's dignity and bodily autonomy[7] —to extend the common law to cover anal rape of females applies equally to males.[8] However, the distinction in Satchwell fits with the reasoning because homosexual couples were unable to get married at the time — and therefore automatically qualify for the benefits at issue — while heterosexual people had that opportunity. Whether this distinction would ultimately justify refusing benefits to unmarried heterosexual couples is unclear, but it does clearly raise different substantive questions.

[1] But see § 9.4 (e)(ii)(cc) infra. I criticise the Court's approach to retrospectivity in this and other cases. Although I do not frame the criticism as one of not giving relief to 'similarly situated' people, it can be seen in that way. By only applying the declaration of invalidity to people whose cases have not yet been finalised, the Court could be said to presume there is a meaningful distinction (on a par with the distinction between men and women in Masiya or heterosexual and homosexual in Satchwell) between the two classes. It seems obvious to me that there is not. However, although the judgments are unclear on this point, I do not think that is how the Court conceived of the problem. Rather, I think they would acknowledge that finalised and unfinalised cases are similar, but that other reasons (concerns about the administration of justice) justify treating them differently.

[2] 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya').

[3] Ibid at para 29.

[4] Ibid at para 92.

[5] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC) at para 16.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Masiya (supra) at paras 78–79.

[8] Ibid at para 80. For criticism of the decision along these lines, see K Phelps & S Kazee 'The Constitutional Court Gets Anal About Rape-Gender Neutrality and the Principle of Legality in Masiya v DPP' (2007) 20 South African Journal of Criminal Justice 341.

(5) Reason for violation

This issue is considered in more detail in the context of systemic relief.[1] Suffice to say that different forms of relief may be more or less effective depending on whether the reason for the infringement of the right is inattentiveness, incompetence or intransigence. In the first instance, a mere declaration pointing out the problem may be sufficient. In the other cases, interdicts or structural remedies may be necessary to ensure that the appropriate steps are taken.

(bb) Unavoidable limits

Once one has determined what a fully effective remedy would be, there may be certain unavoidable limits on achieving it.

(1) Multiple goals

Where a remedy aims to achieve multiple goals, one may have to be sacrificed for another. Gerwitz offers the example of school desegregation.[2] Desegregation might have the dual goal of creating integrated schools and improving education in black schools. The best remedy for the first goal might be bussing, while the best remedy for the second goal might be to improve education in one-race schools.[3] It might be necessary to trade the one goal off against the other. A similar conflict confronted the Court in Fourie.[4] Effective relief clearly demanded that same-sex couples be permitted to marry immediately, but the Court was aware that it was necessary to attain social recognition and stability for those unions. Such legitimacy, the majority concluded, would best be achieved if the change came from Parliament.

(2) Conflicting rights

A different form of the multiple goals problem is the problem of conflicting rights. Different parties may have different legitimate interests that cannot all be satisfied. In Mandel & Another v Johncom Media Limited; Johncom Media Limited v Mandel & Others, the applicants challenged the constitutionality of s 12 of the

[1] See § 9.6*(c)*(v) infra. See also K Roach & G Budlender 'Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When is it Appropriate, Just and Equitable?' (2005) 122 SALJ 325; K Cooper-Stephenson 'Principle and Pragmatism in the Law of Remedies' in J Bennyman (ed) Remedies: Issues and Perspectives (1991) 15–17 (Cooper-Stephenson draws even finer distinctions than I, following Roach and Budlender. He distinguishes between (a) failure of comprehension; (b) failure of capacity; (c) failure of motivation; (d) failure by negligence; and (e) systemic failure.)

[2] P Gerwitz 'Remedies and Resistance' (1983) 92 Yale LJ 585, 594.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

Divorce Act.[1] The section prohibited the reporting of divorce proceedings.[2] Although the ban clearly violated the right to freedom of expression, lifting the ban completely — which would have been the most effective relief as far as the right to freedom of expression was concerned — might have undermined FC s 28(2)'s protection of the best interests of the child.[3]

The problem also arises when the retrospective application of a crime is in question. In Walters, the Court declared invalid a provision of a statute that permitted the use of deadly force to arrest criminals because it violated the rights to life, freedom and security and dignity of victims.[4] However, to give it full retrospective application would turn legal acts (at the time they were committed) into criminal acts and thereby violate FC s 35(3)(l).

(3) Implementation

A final unavoidable limitation is implementation. It may be physically impossible for a fully effective remedy to be implemented. In Mohamed, the applicants had been illegally deported to the US to face trial where they might be sentenced to death.[5] Fully effective relief would have required that the applicants be returned to South Africa and extradited to the US only following a proper procedure and on assurance that he would not receive the death penalty. And that was not about to happen.

Problems of implementation will not always be that extreme. More often, they will only nibble at the edges of effective relief and not prevent it completely. In Modderklip, the applicant's farm had been invaded by people seeking land and the police were unable or unwilling to evict them. Part of the reason the Supreme Court of Appeal[6] and the Constitutional Court[7] opted for damages as an appropriate remedy stemmed from the practical difficulty of enforcing an order of eviction.[8]

[1] Act 70 of 1979.

[2] [2008] ZAGPHC 36.

[3] Ibid at paras 10–12 (The Court ultimately rejected this contention because it held that the discretion retained by the High Court as the upper guardian of all minors afforded sufficient protection. At the time of writing, judgment was reserved in the Constitutional Court where the amicus curiae argued strongly in favour of a limited order. Johncom Media Investments Limited v Mandel & Others CCT08/08 (Heard on 8 May 2008).)

[4] Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC).

[5] Mohamed & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).

[6] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA).

[7] President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip').

[8] This case also involved a conflict of rights as the invaders' right to housing would be infringed by forcing them off the land to vindicate the applicant's right to property (SCA) or access to court (Constitutional Court).

(cc) Avoidable limits

This section addresses limits that are avoidable. Such limits constrain a court's ability to provide an effective remedy only as a matter of good judgment, not of necessity.

(1) Separation of powers

The separation of powers, in its most basic form, is the idea that that the three branches of government have separate roles to play and that the other branches should not interfere in those roles. However, as Seedorf and Sibanda argue, this 'pure' or 'negative' form of separation of powers does not tell the whole story.[1] In order to be effective, separation of powers requires not only the independence of the three branches, but also their interdependence. The power of the legislature to dismiss the President or judges, of the Executive to appoint judges and of the Judiciary to strike down illegal laws or executive conduct all form part of the separation of powers.

However, when separation of powers is invoked in the remedial context, it is normally meant in its 'pure' form and is used as a reason for a court to refrain from providing fully effective relief. To do so would allegedly intrude too far into the prerogatives of the other branches. The Court has admitted that this doctrinal injunction remains rather vague:

> [A court must keep the principle of separation of powers in mind] and, flowing therefrom, the deference it owes to the legislature in devising a remedy for a breach of the Constitution in any particular case. It is not possible to formulate in general terms what such deference must embrace, for this depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. In essence, however, it involves restraint by the courts in not trespassing onto that part of the legislative field which has been reserved by the Constitution, and for good reason, to the legislature.[2]

Not only is it vague, but at least one Constitutional Court Justice has questioned its relevance at the remedial stage. In Fourie, Justice O'Regan held:

> The doctrine of the separation of powers is an important one in our Constitution but I cannot see that it can be used to avoid the obligation of a court to provide appropriate relief that is just and equitable to litigants who successfully raise a constitutional complaint.[3]

I agree with this statement insofar as separation of powers can never be a reason to avoid providing any relief at all. However, I think, and the Court's jurisprudence clearly accepts, that it can be used to make relief less than perfect. Justice O'Regan herself relied on the separation of powers in Dawood to suspend an order of invalidity — where immediate invalidity would have been the ultimate effective relief.[1] Her statement in Fourie should be understood in this light.

[1] S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 12.2*(b)*.

[2] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 66 as quoted in Sibanda & Seedorf (supra) at § 12.3*(d)*(ii)(cc).

[3] Fourie (supra) at para 170.

Separation of powers concerns arise in the courts' relationship with both the legislature and the executive. I consider each in turn.

(x) Legislature

Deference to the legislature is of greatest concern where the most effective remedy would require reading-in words to legislation.[2] If there are a number of possible ways to cure the invalidity, then the judiciary might stand accused of usurping the role of the legislature if the court decided which of those possibilities to adopt. Dawood best expresses this concern:

> Where, as in the present case, a range of possibilities exists . . . it will ordinarily be appropriate to leave the legislature to determine in the first instance how the unconstitutionality should be cured. This Court should be slow to make those choices which are primarily choices suitable for the legislature.[3]

(y) Executive

Deference to the executive is most relevant when a court is considering detailed interdicts or supervisory orders.[4] The Court has recognised that the separation of powers doctrine does not prevent the issuing of these orders against the state:

> Where state policy is challenged as inconsistent with the Constitution, courts have to consider whether in formulating and implementing such policy the state has given effect to its constitutional obligations. If it should hold in any given case that the state has failed to do so, it is obliged by the Constitution to say so. In so far as that constitutes an intrusion into the domain of the executive, that is an intrusion mandated by the Constitution itself.[5]

However, in the same case, the Court held that the power to supervise the state's compliance with an order should only be exercised when the government has given the Court reason to believe that it will not obey the order.[6] This proviso

[1] Dawood & Another; Shalabi & Another; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at paras 62–63 ('It would be inappropriate for this Court to seek to remedy the inconsistency in the legislation under review. The task of determining what guidance should be given to the decision-makers, and in particular, the circumstances in which a permit may justifiably be refused, is primarily a task for the legislature and should be undertaken by it. There are a range of possibilities that the legislature may adopt to cure the unconstitutionality.') O'Regan J did however grant interim relief in Dawood and, as I argue below, seemed to make interim relief mandatory in cases where suspension would fail to effectively vindicate rights. See § 9.4*(e)(i)(bb)* infra. For this reason, I think this reading of her statement in Fourie is probably the best interpretation.

[2] For a full discussion, see § 9.4*(c)*(iii) Infra.

[3] Dawood (supra) at para 64. See also NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at paras 65–66.

[4] For more, see § 9.6 infra.

[5] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) at para 99.

[6] Ibid at para 129. See also President of the RSA & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA) at para 39 ('Structural interdicts . . . have a tendency to blur the distinction between the executive and the judiciary and impact on the separation of powers. They tend to deal with policy matters and not with the enforcement of particular rights.') implies that the courts should expect the other branches to be competent and willing to do whatever the Final Constitution demands. Unlike the more structural elements of the separation of powers, this respect can be lost and earned. If the executive continuously fails to comply with court orders, the Court will feel more comfortable issuing detailed interdicts or supervisory orders.[1]

(2) Courts' limitations

In addition to the need to respect the position of the legislature and the executive, the nature of the Court as an institution may make it unsuitable or unable to carry out certain tasks. When the Court had to order the Electoral Commission to make arrangements to permit prisoners to vote, it acknowledged that it did 'not have the information or expertise to enable it to decide what those arrangements should be or how they should be effected.'[2] It therefore had to rely on the Commission to determine the steps that had to be taken.[3] Courts are generally ill-suited to taking over the detailed management of institutions and are therefore often hesitant to grant structural interdicts that will place them in a role that they have neither the expertise nor the resources to fulfil.

(3) Administration of justice

One of the most common limitations on full effective relief is the impact that an immediate change in the law will have on the past and the future. As explained in detail later,[4] orders of invalidity apply retrospectively to the date the Final Constitution came into force unless the Court orders otherwise. Effective relief would ordinarily require this retrospective application to ensure that all people who were affected by this unconstitutional law will be afforded redress. However, in some cases this will result in many decided cases being overturned. In the context of the criminal law, the Constitutional Court has adopted the reasoning of Justice Harlan of the United States Supreme Court:

[1] See Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another [2008] ZACC 8 (Court, on its own initiative, grants a structural interdict to monitor the payment of the State's outstanding judgment debts); MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA)(Court orders damages, rather than a mere declaration, because the state continuously failed to comply with court orders.)

[2] August & Another v The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 39.

[3] See also Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 32 (Although it relates more to the content of the right, the Constitutional Court's rejection of a minimum core because of the informational deficit inherent in its institutional position also demonstrates this problem.). Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 77 (court unsuited to diplomatic negotiations).

[4] See § 9.4*(e)*(ii) infra.

> No one, not criminal defendants, not the judicial system, not society as a whole is benefited by a judgment providing a man shall tentatively go to jail today, but tomorrow and every day thereafter his continued incarceration shall be subject to fresh litigation on issues already resolved.[1]

Administration of justice can also be affected by giving a decision immediate prospective effect. In S v Ntuli, the Court struck down the overly restrictive system for appeals from the Magistrates' Court to the High Court.[2] If the decision had had immediate effect, then the High Courts would have been swamped by all the appeals.[3] It was necessary to suspend the declaration of invalidity to allow some other filter mechanism to be implemented.

(4) Financial costs

Courts might also be deterred from providing a remedy if it would involve massive financial cost. Courts are hesitant, though not unwilling, to interfere with budgetary concerns. However, the refusal to interfere need not be motivated by separation of powers issues. A court may, on its own accord, come to the conclusion that the cost is too high. That was the case in Fose.[4] The applicant claimed punitive damages for the abuse he suffered in police custody because he believed that such damages would help prevent similar attacks in the future. Ackermann J held that even if punitive damages would have such a deterrent effect, they would be inappropriate:

> In a country where there is a great demand generally on scarce resources, where the government has various constitutionally prescribed commitments which have substantial economic implications and where there are 'multifarious demands on the public purse and the machinery of government that flow from the urgent need for economic and social reform', it seems to me to be inappropriate to use these scarce resources to pay punitive constitutional damages to plaintiffs who are already fully compensated for the injuries done to them, with no real assurance that such payment will have any deterrent or preventative effect.[5]

(5) Impact on third parties

A remedy may have negative consequences for people who aren't party to the litigation. A court may feel that it is unfair to require others to suffer so that the litigants can receive effective relief. The Court has relied on just this sense of injustice to justify limiting the retrospective effect of its orders. For example, in Gory v Kolver NO — one of a number of important challenges to succession laws

[1] Mackey v US 401 US 667, 691 (1971) quoted in S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 32.
[2] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC).
[3] Ibid at para 27.
[4] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose').
[5] Ibid at para 72.

— the Court extended the Intestate Succession Act[1] to apply to same-sex couples but did not apply that decision to estates that had already been wound up or to payments that had been received in good faith because it would be unfair to take benefits away from people who had already received them.[2] This remedy may be rather easily distinguished from the unavoidable harm of conflicting rights. The interests at stake here are mere private or financial interests. The most obvious example is the difference between criminal and civil liability in Walters.[3] Criminal liability invokes another constitutional right (FC s 35(3)(l)). Civil liability invokes only a financial interest.

(6) Fault

A court may decide that although effective relief is possible, the litigant is not entitled to it because of the way he has conducted the litigation. Thus, in Pretoria City Council v Walker the Court refused to grant a remedy to a litigant who proved that the City's rate-collection policy was unfairly discriminatory because he had simply stopped paying his arrears rather than pursuing 'more practical remedies which would have been effective in getting the council to cease its objectionable conduct, thus eradicating the reason for the complaint.'[4] A similar attitude seems to have motivated the Court in Steenkamp when it refused a remedy because the applicant should have re-applied for the tender or secured better contractual protection when it was awarded the tender.[5]

(dd) Conclusion

Courts should only detract from the fully effective relief to the minimum degree necessary to accommodate the countervailing principle. If the problem is the financial cost, that is not a reason to provide no remedy at all, but to provide a remedy that incurs the maximum accessible economic burden. Where the limitation is based on the inadequacy of the Court as an institution, the answer is not for the Court to throw up its hands and do nothing, but to do the most it can within its limitations or to find another body that has the capacity to do what it cannot. This leads to the final point, that I have made before, and I want to make again. Courts must not feel constrained by the traditional forms of remedies. Anything is possible. Courts must think outside the box. They must 'forge new tools' and 'shape innovative remedies' to ensure that, within the inevitable limitations they provide the most effective relief available.[6] No, not 'available'. The most effective relief imaginable.

[1] Act 81 of 1987.
[2] 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC).
[3] Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: in Re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)
[4] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 96.
[5] 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC) at paras 49–50.
[6] Fose (supra) at para 69.

(f) Constitutional Remedies and Private Remedies

This section attempts to answer two questions and make one suggestion about the relationship between constitutional remedies and private remedies.[1] First, what characteristics do the two types of remedies share, and what sets them apart? Second, when should a litigant rely on a constitutional remedy and when on a private remedy? Third, I suggest that where the Constitutional Court has spurned direct reliance on the Bill of Rights for common-law cases in favour of indirect application in terms of FC s 39(2), direct application may still have a role to play when a new remedy is needed.

(i) Characteristics

Traditionally, a fairly strict distinction is drawn between private remedies and constitutional remedies based on the purpose that they serve. This distinction is accurately summarised by Currie and de Waal: 'Constitutional remedies are forward-looking, community-oriented and structural [while private remedies are] backward-looking, individualistic and retributive.'[2] The Constitutional Court, speaking in the context of the law of delict, has described the difference in more detail:

> The objectives of the law of delict differ fundamentally from those of constitutional law. The primary purpose of the former is to regulate relationships between private parties whereas the latter, to a large extent, aims at protecting the Chapter 3 rights of individuals from state intrusion. Similarly the purpose of a delictual remedy differs fundamentally from that of a constitutional remedy. The former seeks to provide compensation for harm caused to one private party by the wrongful action of another private party whereas the latter has as its objective (a) the vindication of the fundamental right itself so as to promote the values of an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality and respect for human rights; (b) the deterrence and prevention of future infringements of fundamental rights by the legislative and executive organs of state at all levels of government; (c) the punishment of those organs of state whose officials have infringed fundamental rights in a particularly egregious fashion; and (d) compensation for harm caused to the plaintiff in consequence of the infringement of one or more of the plaintiff's rights entrenched in Chapter 3.[3]

[1] The term 'public remedies' is often employed instead of 'constitutional remedies'. In my view, as well as that of Justice Ackermann, the former term is misleading. For Ackermann J, the problem is that using the term 'public' pulls one into the debate about the distinction between the 'public' and the 'private'. That debate is unhelpful when one attempts to understand the distinction between private remedies and constitutional remedies. I do not think that the difficulty can be avoided by changing the words we use. But I have my own reason for preferring the 'constitutional' prefix: Using 'public remedies' implies that there are public remedies outside of the Final Constitution that share features with the subset of constitutional remedies. I know of no remedies that fall into that category and therefore prefer to stick to the term: 'constitutional remedies'.

[2] I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 196. See also Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at para 80.

[3] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 17. See also Steenkamp v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape 2007 (3) BCLR 280 (CC) at para 29 (In an administrative law context, Moseneke DCJ said: 'Ultimately the purpose of a public remedy is to afford the prejudiced party administrative justice, to advance efficient and effective public administration compelled by constitutional precepts and at a broader level, to entrench the rule of law.')

This distinction is generally accurate. It is especially true when we are talking about remedies flowing from a finding that a law is invalid or when the constitutional remedy is aimed at a systemic violation. But the distinction should not be pressed in too categorical a fashion. Constitutional remedies are concerned with the future, but they must also be concerned with the past. They must provide relief to the individual before them which will often be retrospective in nature. At the same time, when crafting private law remedies courts are often concerned with the future impact of their decisions. When a court decides whether to impose delictual liability in the face of a new set of facts, it considers not only the backward-looking justice of doing so, but also the forward-looking question of how imposing liability in all similar future cases will affect society. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Steenkamp refused to impose delictual liability for out-of-pocket expenses suffered by an successful tenderer because:

> [t]he chilling effect of the imposition of delictual liability on tender boards in a young democracy with limited resources, human and financial, on balance, is real because if liability were to be imposed, the potentiality of a claim by every successful tenderer would cast a shadow over the deliberations of a tender board on each tender and that may slow the process down or even grind it to a virtual halt.[1]

In addition, interim and final interdicts — which are designed not to compensate for loss, but prevent it — are available under common law and are forward rather than backward looking. So while it may be necessary to distinguish between retributive private remedies and distributive public remedies, the distinction has limited utility in understanding the details of either category of remedies.

(ii) When should litigants rely on private remedies?

The general rule for when a litigant should rely on a constitutional remedy and when a private remedy, can best be described in terms of the notion of subsidiarity. Kentridge AJ explains the principle of subsidiarity as follows: 'I would lay it down as a general principle that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.'[2] This principle was applied to remedies in Fose v Minister of Safety and

[1] 2006 (3) SA 151 (SCA) at para 40. See also National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196, 1210 (SCA), [1998] 4 All SA 347 (SCA)(the court changed the law of defamation for media defendants from strict liability to reasonableness in part because: 'If we recognise, as we must, the democratic imperative that the common good is best served by the free flow of information and the task of the media in the process, it must be clear that strict liability cannot be defended . . . . Much has been written about the "chilling" effect of defamation actions but nothing can be more chilling than the prospect of being mulcted in damages for even the slightest error.')

[2] S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59. This principle has been adopted by the full Court in a number of cases. See, eg, Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: in Re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 64. For more on subsidiarity, see L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32; AJ van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism and the Development of South African Property Law (Part 1)' (2005) TSAR 655 and AJ van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism and the Development of South African Property Law (Part 2)' (2006) TSAR 1.

Security where the Constitutional Court rejected a claim for constitutional damages because the damages the plaintiff could claim under the existing law of delict would adequately vindicate the right. The implication of the judgment is that where there is an adequate private law remedy — whether in common law or statute — that vindicates the right, it should be used. Only if the remedy supplied by the existing law is insufficient to fully vindicate the right, should resort be made to direct reliance on constitutional remedies.[1]

Subsidiarity in constitutional remedies works fine in theory. It should not prevent any constitutional right from being vindicated. If common-law remedies are not adequate, then litigants are always entitled to bring a pure constitutional claim. Indeed, it has the apparent additional benefit of preventing the development of two different streams of jurisprudence for compensatory damages: a common-law stream and a constitutional stream. However, the doctrine has two practical drawbacks. The first relates to the way it encourages litigants to act. Although Fose does not prevent litigants from bringing private claims and constitutional claims together when the relief they seek goes beyond what private law can provide, in the majority of cases an individual litigant seeking compensation will have no motivation to go beyond the ordinary confines of the private law. The individual litigant is interested primarily in securing individual compensation — and far less concerned about preventing future violation. Broader problems with state actions or private conduct may go unnoticed and unaddressed. For example, in Carmichele,[2] K,[3] and Zealand[4] the litigants brought pure delictual claims for individual damages even though their individual loss may well have been related to broader structural problems with the police and correctional services. Constitutional remedies by necessity address themselves to systemic problems and hold out the promise that future violations of the Final Constitution will be curtailed.

Steenkamp v Provincial, Tender Board, Eastern Cape demonstrates the second potential pitfall of the Fose approach — namely, a business as usual orientation towards remedies.[5] The applicant, presumably motivated by the Court's decision in Fose, relied on the law of delict to enforce his constitutional right to just

[1] See J Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 9–9; H Varney 'Forging New Tools: A Note on Fose v Minsiter of Safety and Security CCT 14/96' (1998) 14 SAJHR 336, 343.

[2] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)(The applicant was attacked because of a failure by the police and the prosecutor to oppose bail.)

[3] K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)(Applicant was attacked and raped by off-duty policemen.)

[4] Zealand v Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development and Another 2008 (4) SA 458 (CC), 2008 (6) BCLR 601 (CC), 2008 (2) SACR 1 (CC)(The applicant was kept in gaol for five years longer than his criminal sentence because of administrative failures.)

[5] 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC). For more on Steenkamp, including the facts and a criticism of the Court's failure to provide a remedy, see § 9.2*(b)*(ii)(bb) supra.

administrative action.[1] The majority of the Court, although recognising that 'every improper performance of an administrative function would implicate the Constitution and entitle the aggrieved party to appropriate relief' considered the case within the traditional delictual framework and found that the act was not 'wrongful' in a textbook delictual sense. Now, it is difficult to know what the Court would have done if Mr Steenkamp had not relied on the law of delict, but directly on the Final Constitution to found his claim. The Court may well have reached the same conclusion. But it seems to me that it would have been much more difficult for the Court to say: 'Your right to administrative justice has been infringed, but we will give you no remedy'. The business as usual approach allowed the Court to say: 'Your constitutional right has been infringed, but unfortunately that does not entitle you to delictual damages.' The Fose principle, at least in cases like Steenkamp, requires a litigant to frame his constitutional claim in delictual terms, but then allows the law of delict to prevent the vindication of the constitutional right.[2]

Based on these two practical difficulties, I think a slight modification of the Fose principal is warranted. The way it is ordinarily interpreted,[3] Fose stands for the following proposition:

> If a private remedy partially vindicates the constitutional right, then a litigant must rely on the private law for that part of the relief and may also rely on constitutional law for the relief necessary to vindicate the rest of the right.

My modification of the Fose principle would be:

> If a private remedy fully vindicates a constitutional right, the litigant must rely on the private remedy. If the private remedy only partially vindicates the right, a litigant is entitled, but not obliged, to rely solely on constitutional law for all aspects of her relief. If she does so, the existence of a remedy under private law should not be a bar for granting the same relief under constitutional law.

This modest modification reflects the position taken by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Kate.[4] In considering whether direct constitutional damages could be awarded to compensate to the plaintiff for the state's inexplicable delay in deciding whether to grant a social security grant, Nugent JA held:

[1] Without explaining the facts in any detail, the ordinary administrative law remedy — setting aside the decision — would not have aided the applicant. The only remedy he regarded as effective was an award of damages — hence the reliance on the law of delict.

[2] I should make it clear that this does not mean that whenever a constitutional right founds a delictual claim, the applicant is automatically entitled to damages. Where there is an alternative effective remedy, it will not be necessary for the vindication of the constitutional right to grant delictual damages. This was the case in, for example, Olitzki where an ordinary review of the administrative action would have adequately vindicated the right. Olitzki Property Holdings v State Tender Board & Another 2001(3) SA 1247 (SCA). That was not the case in Steenkamp.

[3] This interpretation seems like the correct interpretation to me because Ackermann J refuses to grant compensatory constitutional damages before he has decided whether to grant punitive constitutional damages. Therefore, even if he had decided that punitive damages were warranted, Mr Fose would still have had to rely on the law of delict, not his constitutional right, for compensation.

[4] MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA)('Kate').

> No doubt the infusion of constitutional normative values into delictual principles itself plays a role in protecting constitutional rights, albeit indirectly. And no doubt delictual principles are capable of being extended to encompass state liability for the breach of constitutional obligations. But the relief that is permitted by s 38 of the Constitution is not a remedy of last resort, to be looked to only when there is no alternative — and indirect — means of asserting and vindicating constitutional rights. While that possibility is a consideration to be borne in mind in determining whether to grant or to withhold a direct s 38 remedy it is by no means decisive, for there will be cases in which the direct assertion and vindication of constitutional rights is required. Where that is so the further question is what form of remedy would be appropriate to remedy the breach.[1]

Although not a closed list, the Supreme Court of Appeal listed two factors that prompted it to grant direct constitutional damages. First, the constitutional infirmity was a direct breach of a specific normative right, not 'merely a deviation from a constitutionally normative standard'.[2] Second, the breach of the right was endemic and required a clear assertion of the importance of the constitutional — as opposed to only the private — right.[3] The first justification goes further than my revision suggests because it would permit a constitutional remedy where the reliance is on a specific right, even if the private law completely vindicates the right. I am not sure if Nugent JA intended for the first justification alone to be a sufficient condition. One good reason to reject that proposition is that it could lead to the development of parallel systems of law.[4] For example, there could be one set of rules for victims of police brutality who relied on the law of delict and another for those who based their claim on a direct violation of FC s 12. That is undesirable. In my view, the first reason — a direct violation — is a necessary but insufficient justification for a constitutional remedy. It will need to be supplemented by other factors, such as the systemic breach at issue in Kate.

(iii) Indirect application and remedies

In addition to its preference for private remedies rather than constitutional remedies, the Constitutional Court has also expressed a clear preference for indirect application rather than direct application of the Bill of Rights to the common law. Because the Court is generally able to achieve all its preferred goals equally well through indirect application as it would through direct application, there is a danger that direct horizontal application — despite its explicit inclusion in the Final Constitution — may become extinct. Leaving aside criticisms of this move[5]

[1] Kate (supra) at para 27.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Some commentators have suggested that two parallel systems — with twin peaks so to speak — might not be such a bad idea. See, for example, F Michelman 'Constitutional Supremacy and Appellate Jurisdiction in South Africa' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations (2008) 33.
[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762.

— with which I agree — the question for supporters of direct application is what role, if any, it might still play in private disputes.

I think a small space for direct application exists when the remedy sought falls outside the range of the private action or goes against the general purpose of the law. For example, the ordinary private law remedy for defamation is compensation because the purpose of the remedy is to right the wrong done to the person defamed. Other possible common-law remedies include an apology and retraction and an interdict to prevent publication.[1] Those remedies would ordinarily seem more than sufficient. But imagine that a newspaper regularly defamed people and that the problem seemed to be inadequate fact-checking structures or a 'we do whatever we please' culture which the institution was unwilling to fix. A well-known figure who was defamed by this newspaper might want not only compensatory damages, but also a supervisory interdict to ensure that the structural deficiencies were rectified. A court would not be able to grant such an order under existing common law, but it might be willing to do so based on a direct reliance on the right to dignity.[2]

While examples of such situations may be limited,[3] I think that we, in fact, anticipate such challenges. Viewing FC s 8 as a means of providing remedies in private disputes that would not be available through indirect application may guarantee a meaningful, ongoing role for direct application of the Bill of Rights and therefore avoid the untoward end that the Court's expansive use of FC s 39(2) currently promises.[4]

[1] See D Milo, G Penfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 42.7*(c)*(vi).

[2] Although it would seem questionable whether the constitutional right to dignity should really protect reputation, the Constitutional Court has unambiguously held that it does. See Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC). Of course, the court could also develop the common law to permit the remedy as part of the common law. However, there are good reasons they might prefer not to. Firstly, it would be a very substantial change to the common law and the courts generally prefer incremental developments. Secondly, it would break down the traditional — although as we saw not exclusive — retributive, individualistic, backward-looking focus of private law. Thirdly, the need for a remedy of this nature would presumably only exist where a constitutional right had in fact been violated. To build in the direct violation of a right as an element of a common-law test seems inelegant, repetitive and unnecessary.

[3] Perhaps more realistic scenarios than the defamation example are companies that are polluting the environment because of structural problems, employers or private schools that have a culture of discrimination or intolerance that cannot be solved by a simple indirect application. This last situation is specifically envisaged by s 21(2) of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000, but in the Act's absence there is little doubt that it could only be achieved through a direct application of FC s 9.

[4] I must stress that I do not view this as an optimal solution. I agree with Woolman that litigants should be free to rely on either the direct application or indirect application of the Final Constitution and that the Court's reluctance to permit this choice is inconsistent with the text of the Final Constitution. My suggestion here is a good faith reconstruction to try and find a space for direct horizontal application within the Court's existing doctrinal framework.

9.3 Categorising Remedies[1]

There are many ways to break down a discussion of remedies. We could separate them into positive remedies (that tell people to do something) and negative remedies (that tell people not to do something). The line could be drawn between remedies that change law and those that do not. The relevant distinction could rest on the degree of discretion that courts have: confined remedies and unconfined remedies. Remedies that are based on a direct reliance on the Final Constitution could be separated from those that rest on an indirect reliance. All of these are valid, but limited, ways of thinking about remedies.

I separate remedies into three categories: (a) remedies following the invalidation of a law; (b) remedies for isolated/individual violations of rights; and (c) remedies for systemic violations. The first type is easy to define: They are whatever order a court makes following a finding in terms of FC s 172(1)(b) that law is unconstitutional. FC s 172(1)(b) necessitates that this include a declaration of invalidity, but it can also include supplementary orders regulating when the declaration begins to have effect and to isolate the specific parts of the law that are invalid from those that are not. These remedies are easy to differentiate from the other two types of remedies which do not involve the invalidation of law or conduct. The first of these two, individual remedies, concerns isolated or individual violations of rights. Individual is perhaps not the best label as I include under this heading violations of the rights of a group where that violation is a once-off or completed occurrence. By contrast, systemic remedies concern ongoing violations of many people's rights. The cause of the violation is often the result of existing policies, practices or institutional structures that actively or tacitly encourage rights violations. These situations more often, though not always, require remedies that try not only to compensate for past losses but to prevent or deter future violations.

However, while I separate these three categories for ease of analysis, it is important to stress the large degree of overlap between them.[2] In fact, it is perhaps best not to see them as separate categories but as points on a spectrum. On the one extreme are the most general remedies, those involving invalidity. These remedies are the most general because they affect the whole country. At the other extreme are individual remedies which concern the compensation of only a single individual. Systemic remedies fall in the middle as they require both individual redress and forward-looking transformation. Few cases will fall exactly in any category. They will have elements of each type and will rest somewhere on the spectrum between the various categories.

[1] This categorisation is motivated entirely by suggestions of Jonathan Klaaren, Matthew Chaskalson and Steven Budlender.

[2] See generally S Sturm & H Gadlin 'Conflict Resolution and Systemic Change' (2007) Journal of Dispute Resolution (Argue, in the context of conflict resolution in the National Institute of Health that individual problems can require systemic interventions and systemic problems may only permit individual interventions.)

Thus, an invalidity remedy will almost always arise out of an actual individual or systemic violation and there will be real litigants who will often want relief that goes beyond merely declaring the law invalid. In Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another the applicant, who had been seriously injured by negligence in a state hospital, went to court because he wanted an interim payment from the state.[1] It was only when the state failed to pay that Mr Nyathi challenged the constitutionality of s 3 of the State Liability Act which exempted the State from attachment procedures.[2] By the time the case arrived at the Constitutional Court, it was clear that Mr Nyathi's experience was far from an isolated incident. There was a systemic problem with the state's payment of judgment debts. One can only understand Nyathi properly and provide an adequate remedy if one sees the intersections between the three categories of remedies. The Constitutional Court did just that. At the first hearing — which was set down as an urgent matter — the Court demanded that the state immediately pay Mr Nyathi the money he was owed. Once that urgent issue was addressed the Court postponed the case to consider the challenge to the legislation and the systemic problem in more detail. In addition to declaring s 3 invalid, the Court, on its own initiative, raised the question of a supervisory interdict to monitor the state's payment of all outstanding judgment debts — an order it eventually granted.

Sometimes the links are less obvious. In KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education & Others v Pillay the litigation was a result of a school's refusal to allow a specific learner (Sunali) to wear a nose-stud to school.[3] However, the Constitutional Court recognized that the case was about more than Sunali's nose; it was about the way that the school — and many other schools — evaluated claims for exemptions from their code of conduct. If the remedy had applied only to Sunali, it would not necessarily have aided learners who found themselves in a similar position in the future. The Court therefore ordered the School to change its code of conduct to create a better process and substantive standard for granting religious and cultural exemptions.

There might also be cases where a systemic violation only permits an individual remedy. Fose is perhaps such a case.[4] The applicant was severely assaulted and tortured while in police custody. However, the evidence showed that the problem, especially at the police station where the assault took place, was widespread and endemic. The applicant claimed delictual damages, but in addition claimed constitutional punitive damages in part to deter future violations. Kriegler J noted that 'where there are systematic, pervasive and enduring infringements of constitutional rights, delictual relief compensating a particular plaintiff does not seem adequate as a means of vindicating the Constitution and deterring further violations of it.'[5] However, the alternative — punitive damages — was not an

[1] [2008] ZACC 8.
[2] Act 20 of 1957.
[3] 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC).
[4] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).
[5] Ibid at para 102.

appropriate remedy because it unduly enriched a single plaintiff without any clear impact on the underlying problem. The possibility of a supervisory order to improve the situation was not raised and the court could not consider it. Despite the systemic nature of the problem, only an individual remedy could be afforded.

The inter-connectedness of these three types of remedies is vital in order to make constitutional rights real. Courts must always be aware of the potential systemic problems that may underlie an application to declare a law invalid or for individual damages. They should not be afraid to raise these issues mero motu and have the parties address potential remedies that may go beyond the narrow interests of the parties to the case.

9.4 REMEDIES FOLLOWING A FINDING OF INCONSISTENCY

(a) Hierarchy

A finding that a law — whether statutory, common or customary[1] — is inconsistent with the Final Constitution requires a particular set of remedies to cure the defect. There are two basic options: either interpret the law so that it is conforms to the dictates of the Final Constitution to avoid the violation or invalidate the law. If a court chooses the second option, they can limit their declaration of invalidity by cutting out only the offending words or adding new words or making the application of the law subject to a condition. Courts are also specifically empowered by FC s 172(1)(b) to suspend an order of invalidity to allow the legislature to put a new law in place and to limit the impact that the declaration of invalidity will have on the past.

The Constitutional Court has set out the following basic hierarchy for choosing these remedies:

(a) If possible, the law must be interpreted — 'read down' — to avoid the inconsistency;
(b) If that is not possible, the law must be declared invalid;
(c) Rather than declaring the law completely invalid, the substantive impact of the declaration should, if possible, be limited by altering the law through severance, reading-in or notional severance to cure the constitutional defect;[2]

[1] Although the vast majority of cases concern legislation, and most of the Constitutional Court's statements only mention legislation, there is no reason in theory why the same principles should not apply to rules of common law and customary law that are found to directly violate (rather than to be in need of development in terms of FC s 39(2)) the Final Constitution. See, for example, National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)(Invalidated the common-law criminalization of sodomy); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole and Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 563 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Invalidated customary-law rule of primogeniture).

[2] See Van Rooyen v The State 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 88 ('[L]egislation must be construed consistently with the Constitution and thus, where possible, interpreted so as to exclude a construction that would be inconsistent with [the Constitution]. If held to be unconstitutional, the appropriate remedy ought, if possible, to be in the form of a notional or actual severance, or reading-in, so as to bring the law within acceptable constitutional standards. Only if this is not possible, must a declaration of complete invalidity of the section or subsection be made.')

(d) It might also be necessary to limit the temporal impact of the order by:
   a. If it is not possible to make an order in terms of (c), suspending the order of invalidity.[1]
   b. Even if an order in terms of (c) is competent, limiting the retrospective effect of the order.

The discussion that follows will adhere, roughly, to this structure. However, this remedial hierarchy is not set in stone. Quite often, one step will affect the determination under another step. For example, whether a court is willing to read words in to a law may depend on the possibility of suspending the order and a court's willingness to read-down may be affected by the retrospective implications of that decision. The Constitutional Court has also combined temporary reading-in orders with suspension orders — that combination does not fit neatly into this structure.[2] But the hierarchy still provides a useful starting point for how the Court thinks about how to remedy constitutionally infirm laws.

(b) Reading Down

(i) The nature of reading down: interpretation or remedy?

It is necessary at the outset to explain precisely what reading-down means, and perhaps more importantly, what it does not mean. Reading down occurs when a statute[3] possesses two (or more) possible interpretations: one construction is constitutional while the other directly violates a constitutional provision.[4] A court faced with this situation must choose the constitutional interpretation over the unconstitutional interpretation. The classic statement[5] of this principle appears in Hyundai Motor Distributors: 'judicial officers must prefer interpretations

[1] J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 22 ('Where the appropriate remedy is reading-in words in order to cure the constitutional invalidity of a statutory provision, it is difficult to think of an occasion when it would be appropriate to suspend such an order.' This statement is discussed in more detail at § 9.4*(d)*(iii) infra.)

[2] See § 9.4*(e)(i)(cc)* infra.

[3] Technically, this mode of interpretation can also apply to rules of common law and customary law. However, those forms of law are generally less clear than statutes and are also open to 'development' under FC s 39(2). Reading down of common law or customary law is therefore theoretically possible, but practically irrelevant.

[4] Although ordinarily applied to the Bill of Rights, reading down applies to all other sections of the Final Constitution as well. See AAA Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC) at para 72 (Langa CJ, dissenting, held: 'This principle is not limited to consistency with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights as required by section 39(2), it is an implied principle of the Constitution as a whole that a constitutional interpretation should always be preferred to a non-constitutional interpretation.') of legislation that fall within constitutional bounds over those that do not, provided that such an interpretation can be reasonably ascribed to the section.'[1] Described in this sense, reading down does not appear as a remedy but as a mandatory rule of interpretation. Unlike 'true' remedies, reading down does not follow a finding of invalidity, but avoids such a finding by choosing an interpretation that does not violate the Final Constitution.[2] Is it still accurate to talk about reading down as a 'remedy'?

[5] Although this case provides the clearest account of what reading down entails, it was not the first time the method was considered as an option. See S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 28; Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) at para 32; and National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at paras 23–24.

The position is further complicated by the existence of a process very similar to reading-down: indirect application. In order to understand the difference between reading down and indirect application, it is necessary to look briefly at the Interim Constitution. That document created two separate rules of interpretation. The first demanded that if the prima facie reading of a law limited a right in the Bill of Rights, but the law was capable of another construction that did not limit the right, the law should be given the second interpretation.[3] The second rule required courts to interpret all law with 'due regard to the spirit, purport and objects' of the Bill of Rights.[4] The phrase 'reading down' referred exclusively to the first process. The second process was called 'indirect application'. Under the Final Constitution indirect application is entrenched in similar terms in FC s 39(2).[5] However, no equivalent provision exists for 'reading down'. Reading

[1] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Hyundai Motor Distributors') at para 23 (The case concerned s 29(5) of the National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998 which allowed for search and seizure warrants for preparatory investigations to be issued without a reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing. The section was challenged as a violation of the right to privacy. The Court held that, constitutionally interpreted, the section did require a reasonable suspicion that an offence had been committed.) See also National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC) at para 35 ('If the one construction leads to constitutional invalidity but the other not, the latter construction, being in conformity with the Constitution must be preferred to the former, provided always that such construction is reasonable and not strained.')

[2] See NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 24 ('There is a clear distinction between interpreting legislation in a way which "promote*(s)* the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights" as required by s 39(2) of the Constitution and the process of reading words into or severing them from a statutory provision which is a remedial measure under s 172(1)(b), following upon a declaration of constitutional invalidity under s 172(1)(a). . . . The first process, being an interpretative one, is limited to what the text is reasonably capable of meaning. The latter can only take place after the statutory provision in question, notwithstanding the application of all legitimate interpretative aids, is found to be constitutionally invalid.' While this statement is correct as far as it goes, it fails to draw a distinction between reading down and interpretation in terms of s 39(2). As I argue below, there is a difference between the two.)

[3] IC s 35(2).

[4] IC s 35(3).

[5] The major difference between IC s 35(3) and FC s 39(2) is that s 39(2) also permits 'development' of common law and customary law. While the exact scope of the development power is unclear, it certainly is broader than mere interpretation as it permits courts to change the wording of common law tests. See, for example, Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)(Court altered the common-law definition of rape). This important distinction allows courts dealing with the common law or customary law to largely dispense with direct application and the specific remedies that down survives only as an implicit provision of the Final Constitution.[1] (Indeed, the absence of an equivalent provision to IC s 35(2) in the Final Constitution has led courts and academics to conflate the two processes.)

Does it make any sense to distinguish between reading down and indirect application? In the realm of substantive constitutional analysis, the two processes are clearly distinct. Reading down first requires the application and the interpretation of a specific substantive right to the law under scrutiny. Indirect application amounts to little more than an 'all-things-considered' type of test: namely does the rule of law comport with some vague notion of the spirit, purport, and object. But does that difference translate to a difference from a remedial perspective? Yes, because indirect application does not have a remedial phase. Determining whether interpretations conform to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights — and whether they do not — and then choosing the best interpretation or alteration of that rule of law is undertaken simultaneously. The substantive and remedial phases are collapsed into a single inquiry. In terms of direct application of a specific substantive provision of the Bill of Rights, the substantive and remedial phases can be logically separated.[2] At the first phase the court deter-follow as any changes they wish to make to the law can be achieved through indirect application. That option is not available when dealing with legislation that can only be interpreted. In drawing the distinction between 'reading-down' and indirect application, I am referring only to that part of indirect application that applies to the interpretation of statutes. For more on the development and reading down in terms of FC s 39(2), see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[1] That reading down remains part of the Final Constitution is clear from, amongst other cases, Hyundai Motor Distributors (supra) which performed reading down under the Final Constitution.

[2] Although this answer provides a conclusive theoretical reason for treating the two processes separately, it still seems somewhat practically unsatisfying. A litigant could not care less whether a court engages in 'reading down' or indirect application; what she cares about is the end result. For the litigant an interpretation flowing from an indirect interpretation is as much a 'remedy' as one that results from reading down. This takes us back to the different uses of the word 'remedy'. The litigant uses the word in its broad sense to connote any action that cures a wrong. I use it in its narrow sense to connote a discretionary decision taken by a court following some finding of constitutional inconsistency. That is again a theoretical rather than a practical answer. However, there is also an important practical consequence to the choice of direct or indirect application. If a litigant only brings an indirect challenge and the words of the statute are incapable of bearing a meaning that is compatible with 'the spirit, purports and objects of the Bill of Rights' a court is obliged to apply that statute anyway and the litigant will receive no remedy. See, for example, Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (5) SA 525 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 29 (O'Regan J held that s 13 of the Companies Act was incapable of being read so as to prohibit requiring security for costs if doing so would prevent the litigation. Because '[t]he applicant did not challenge the constitutionality of the section' he failed.) On the other hand, if the litigant relies on the direct application of the Bill of Rights and the statute cannot be interpreted to avoid a finding of inconsistency, the statute will still be declared invalid and the litigant will, probably, find some other form of relief. From this perspective, direct application would seem like the preferable option. However, the position is further complicated by the Constitutional Court's preference for indirect application. The Constitutional Court prefers, if it can, to engage in indirect application, rather than direct application, a fact which reinforces the reliance by litigants on indirect application. From a strategic point of view, if there is any doubt that the words to be interpreted can bear the meaning contended for, it is best to bring both a direct and an indirect challenge.

mines whether a right has been violated. At the second phase it decides how to cure that violation. I am, therefore, not concerned here with interpretations and alterations of the law that flow from an indirect application of the Bill of Rights. That topic is dealt with at length elsewhere in this treatise.[1]

However, two further issues regarding the relationship between reading down and indirect application bear mention. One, the test for how far the words of a statute can be stretched to bear a constitutional meaning is similar under both processes and it is therefore not inappropriate to draw some guidance from FC s 39(2) cases when a court first attempts to read down a statute.[2] Two, the Constitutional Court's preference for indirect application rather than direct application[3] may well make reading down, in the formal sense described here, largely redundant. Courts will always be able to reach the same result through reliance on the general test in FC s 39(2) rather than the specific rights analysis required by direct application and reading down. They are likely to follow the Constitutional Court's lead and employ FC s 39(2) wherever possible.

(ii) When is reading down appropriate?

Reading down comes into the picture when some form of limitation of a constitutional provision is alleged. An interesting question is whether, when the provision in question is a right in the Bill of Rights, the interpretation must also be unjustifiable under FC s 36(1) before reading down, or whether reading down can be used as a means not to prevent a limitation, but to allow it to be justified under s 36(1), or, finally, whether reading down occurs to prevent any limitation of the right at all. It seems that reading down can be used in all three ways. The first form of analysis was at play in Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another.[4] The High Court had interpreted s 34(8) of the new Immigration Act to permit the mere say-so of an immigration officer to cause the indefinite detention of an immigrant. Yacoob J held that such an interpretation 'would be arbitrary and the subsection would be unconstitutional'.[5] He therefore adopted an interpretation of the subsection to avoid that consequence. Langa DP employed reading down in its second guise in Hyundai Motor Distributors. He was obliged to interpret a provision that permitted investigators to obtain a search warrant if there was a 'suspicion' that an offence had been committed to mean

[1] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32; Woolman 'Application' (supra) at Chapter 31.

[2] The test, explained in more detail below, is whether the words are 'reasonably capable' of bearing the assigned meaning. See § 9.4*(a)*(ii). For the most recent endorsements of this principle, see MEC Department of Agriculture Conservation and Environment & Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd [2007] ZACC 25 at para 75; Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd & Another [2008] ZACC 12 at para 105 (Yacoob J dissenting).

[3] See S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 114 SALJ 762.

[4] 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 29.

'reasonable suspicion'. That interpretation still limited the right to privacy.[1] However, because the limitation was very 'narrow', it was deemed justifiable under FC s 36(1). Reading down takes its third form in Daniels v Campbell. A majority of the Court re-interpreted the word 'spouse' so as to avoid any limitation of the right to equality.[2]

Reading-down cannot occur if there is no (notional) invalidity with respect to any of these three interpretive processes. That is, it is not possible to read down a statute that does not violate or limit a section of the Final Constitution. That rule would seem self-evident. However, it was ignored by Nicholson J in his recent decision in Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions.[3] He concluded that s 179 of the National Prosecuting Authority Act should have required the National Director of Public Prosecutions to consult the accused when reconsidering a decision to prosecute made not only by the Directors of Public Prosecutions — which the section mentioned — but also the Deputy National Director of Public Prosecutions (DNDPP) — which the section did not mention.[4] He reached this conclusion without finding — or even suggesting — that s 179 limited any provision of the Final Constitution. His only reason for adopting his line of argument was that when the statute was enacted, prosecutions did not begin with the DNDPP. Today they do. It therefore makes no sense to exclude the DNDPP.[5] That may be a good argument to interpret the statute in a particular way. However, it does not require, or even permit, a constitutional remedy, either in the form of reading down or reading-in.

This Zuma judgment also highlights the distinction between reading-in and reading down. Nicholson J called his actions: 'the process of interpretation known as reading-in'. This statement of the law is an error. Reading-in is not a process of 'interpretation' but of adding words to a statute. If he really meant to interpret s 179 then he was engaged in reading down not reading-in. If he thought he was engaged in reading-in, then he failed to do so. His order contains no mention of changing the words in the section.[6]

[1] Hyundai Motor Distributors (supra) at para 52.

[2] Daniels v Campbell & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels')(The Court interpreted 'spouse' to include parties to a Muslim marriage and thereby avoided any limitation of the right to equality.) See also Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC) at paras 33–38 (Although the Court rejected the interpretation urged on it, if it had accepted it, it would have operated at the third level.)

[3] [2008] ZAKZHC 71.

[4] Ibid at para 125.

[5] Ibid.

[6] See Daniels (supra) at para 85 (In dissent, Moseneke J criticised the majority of the Court for interpreting the word 'spouse' to include parties to a Muslim marriage rather than declaring the provision invalid and reading-in words to include Muslim marraiges: 'The meaning of "spouse" preferred in the main judgment is said to be compelled by the need to redress "past discriminatory interpretations". The main judgment explains that "the potential under-inclusiveness and consequent discriminatory impact is avoided simply by correcting the interpretation." In this way, the main judgment conflates the meaning that the Acts can reasonably bear with the constitutional remedy the applicant and others similarly situated may be entitled to. These processes ought to be two separate enquiries; the first goes to interpretation, and the second to remedy. Otherwise the meaning of the text becomes subservient to a preferred outcome or relief.' (my emphasis)).

After a court has found some form of constitutional violation, the next question is how far a court will go in stretching the words of a statute to afford it a meaning that conforms with the Final Constitution. The Hyundai Motor Distributors Court clearly identified the framework within which reading down should operate:

> On the one hand, it is the duty of a judicial officer to interpret legislation in conformity with the Constitution so far as this is reasonably possible. On the other hand, the Legislature is under a duty to pass legislation that is reasonably clear and precise, enabling citizens and officials to understand what is expected of them. A balance will often have to be struck as to how this tension is to be resolved when considering the constitutionality of legislation. There will be occasions when a judicial officer will find that the legislation, though open to a meaning which would be unconstitutional, is reasonably capable of being read 'in conformity with the Constitution'. Such an interpretation should not, however, be unduly strained.[1]

As is clear from this description, reading down is not always possible: the provision must be 'reasonably capable' of the constitutional interpretation.[2] If it is not reasonably capable of that meaning, then words must be severed or read-in to the statute.[3] To give an indication of how far the Court will go in interpreting statutes so that they remain constitutionally valid,[4] the Court has interpreted the word 'direction' in one section to mean something different from 'direction' in the next section,[5] and that a statute that required submission to a 'local representative' could be satisfied by submission to a central collecting point.[6]

[1] Hyundai Motor Distributors (supra) at para 24 (footnotes omitted). See also Daniels (supra) at para 46 (Ngcobo J).

[2] See, for example, S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 29 (Holding that a reverse-onus provision cannot be read down to impose an evidentiary burden); NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at paras 25–26 (The court found that the word 'spouse' could not be read to include same-sex couples and thus cure a constitutional defect.)

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie') at para 33 ('In my view where the Legislature prescribes a formula of this kind its words can not be substituted by "updating" interpretation. If the court, and not the Legislature, is to make a constitutionally necessary change to such a formula, that must be done not by interpretation but by the constitutional remedy of "reading-in". That remedy is appropriate because it changes in a permissible manner the nature of the action the statute requires, without purporting merely to interpret its words.')

[4] Both these cases rely on FC s 39(2). However, as I noted earlier, the 'reasonably capable' test is used both for reading down and indirect application to statutes, so they do provide useful guidance on how far a court will stray from the natural meaning of a statute.

[5] MEC Department of Agriculture Conservation and Environment & Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd [2007] ZACC 25 (The applicant successfully argued that 'direction' in s 31A of the Environmental Conservation Act 73 of 1989 — which permitted local government to direct that a person stop harming the environment — was not the same as the reference to 'direction' in s 32 — which required that directions be published 30 days before taking effect for public comment. The Court relied on the FC s 24 right to a healthy environment and the FC s 33 right to just administrative action.)

[6] African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)(The legislation required a deposit to be submitted in order to contest a local election. The ACDP had, by the cut off date, had not submitted its deposit to the Cape Town office, but had submitted enough money to cover their participation in the Cape Town election to the central office of the Independent Electoral Commission. O'Regan J (Skweyiya J dissenting) held that, interpreted in light of the right to vote, this constituted sufficient compliance with the statute.)

However, on other occasions the desired 'constitutional interpretation' would stretch the extension of the words beyond all recognition.[1] As Justice Yacoob has recently warned, it is very dangerous for courts to begin assigning meanings to statutes that the words are incapable of bearing:

> This Court has no mandate, constitutional or otherwise, to afford to any law a meaning that it cannot reasonably bear. Courts ought never to go down that road, even to fulfil the laudable aim of achieving greater harmony between fundamental rights conferred by the Constitution and the law in question.[2]

In Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa, the Court was confronted with a section that gave medical inspectors overly broad powers to search any home containing medicine.[3] Sachs J found that it was impossible to read the legislation down as it would do 'violence to the explicit language' of the legislation and alter drastically the powers of the inspectors.[4] One might contend, following Sachs J, that Nicholson J exceeded the bounds the words were reasonably capable of bearing in Zuma. The phrase 'Director of Public Prosecutions' does not seem to be obviously capable of meaning 'Director of Public Prosecutions and Deputy National Director of Public Prosecutions'.

Whether an interpretation is 'reasonable' is not always obvious. It has twice been the subject of disagreement on the Constitutional Court.[5] Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd & Another[6] required the Constitutional Court to consider whether a piece of land qualified as 'agricultural land' in terms of s 1 of the Agricultural Land Act.[7] The details of the argument are somewhat technical. The interesting point is that a majority of seven judges held that the land was agricultural land while the remaining three judges not only disagreed with the finding, but disagreed so strongly that they would have dismissed leave to appeal because the majority's construction was not reasonable. Both sets of judges relied on a contextual method of interpretation. And yet they reached radically different conclusions. (It might seem, therefore, that context isn't everything.)

The reasonableness of an interpretation is debatable not only because of disagreement about the technical meaning of a word, but because it is a value-laden exercise. Two decisions regarding the meaning of 'spouse' illuminate this point. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, the Court was faced with legislation that facilitated the immigration of 'spouses', but not same-sex life partners. The question was whether the word 'spouse' could be read

[1] The most obvious instances are the various cases concerning the word 'spouse'. Those cases are dealt with in more detail later in this section.
[2] Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd and Another [2008] ZACC 12 at para 105.
[3] 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC).
[4] Ibid at para 32.
[5] Daniels is discussed in greater detail below.
[6] [2008] ZACC 12.
[7] Act 70 of 1970.

to include same-sex life partners. The Court held that 'spouse' as it was used generally and in the context of the legislation applied only to married couples.[1] As same-sex marriage was, at that time, not possible, 'spouse' could not apply to same-sex couples. The Court was forced to make a finding of invalidity and to read words in to the statute to cure the discrimination.[2] This restrictive reading of the word 'spouse' was confirmed in a case involving payments to partners of homosexual judges,[3] and the maintenance of partners of life-long co-habitants.[4]

By contrast, in Daniels v Campbell, the Court adopted a much broader understanding of the word 'spouse'.[5] In Daniels, the question was whether parties to a Muslim marriage — that was not recognised by law — could be identified as 'spouses' for purposes of intestate succession. The High Court purported to follow NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs and found that 'spouse' applied only to legally recognised marriages and therefore did not cover Muslim unions.[6] The majority of the Constitutional Court reversed that decision. Sachs J found that any ordinary understanding of 'spouse' would embrace the parties to a Muslim marriage and that the extension of the word 'spouse' would have to be drastically curtailed in order to exclude them.[7] Daniels held that any interpretation of the word 'spouse' had to be conducted with reference to the social context and the purpose of the particular statute. In Daniels, the purpose was, largely, to give protection to widows. The question, according to Sachs J, was therefore, 'not whether it had been open to the applicant to solemnise her marriage under the Marriage Act, but whether, in terms of "common sense and justice" and the values of our Constitution, the objectives of the Acts would best be furthered by including or excluding her from the protection provided.'[8] Ngcobo J (also writing for the majority) distinguished Daniels from NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs by arguing that the same-sex couples accepted that their partnership was not protected by any law, while the Muslim applicants based their claim on the recognition Islamic law afforded their union.[9]

As Moseneke J notes in his dissent,[10] there is much to quarrel with in the

[1] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at paras 25–26.
[2] For more on reading-in, see § 9.4 (c) (iii) infra.
[3] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC) at para 9.
[4] Volks v Robinson NO 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC) at paras 40–45.
[5] 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels').
[6] Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2003 (9) BCLR 969 (C) .
[7] Daniels (supra) at para 19.
[8] Ibid at para 25.
[9] Ibid at paras 60–61.
[10] Moseneke J accused the Court of engaging in reading-in instead of reading down. Ibid at para 86. He also held that the word 'spouse' was incapable of bearing the meaning the majority assigned it. Ibid at paras 88–89.

Court's attempt to distinguish the two cases.[1] But for now, the most important point to make is that the distinction rests on implicit normative assumptions about what types of relationships the word 'spouse' encompasses. This exercise is a far cry from looking up 'spouse' in a dictionary.[2]

A final, obvious, point to make is that the reading down must solve the constitutional violation (at whatever level that is pitched). The interpretation adopted must in fact cure the constitutional violation asserted; it must be 'effective relief'. If it only provides a partial solution, then the court may have to order additional relief in addition to the new gloss on the statute. In Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund, the Court was concerned with an access to court challenge to a regulation that gave people only 14 days to submit a claim to the RAF.[3] However, the regulation also included the qualifications 'if in a position to do so' and 'if reasonably possible'. The Court gave these phrases a relatively wide construction that would require that the claimant was 'mentally and physically able to do so and, in addition, [had] knowledge of the identity of the debtor and of the facts from which the claim arises and which the affidavit has to contain'[4] and was not prevented from submitting the affidavit by some outside force.[5] Kondile AJ held that, even with this relatively expansive interpretation, the regulation still violated the right at issue.[6] Reading down was not a solution because it did not cure the violation.

(c) Bald Declarations of Invalidity

As Currie and de Waal note, while the Court has held that the enactment of the

[1] The problem with this reasoning is that it simply does not explain the outcome in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs. At the time there was no law that granted recognition to same-sex couples. It was therefore not a choice on the part of the NCGLE applicants not to get married; it was impossible for them to do so. To confine the protection afforded by the word 'spouse' to couples who had gained enough social recognition to have a form of law that recognised their relationship, fails to protect the most marginalised in society: those whom no law recognises. It also has the absurd consequence that if the NCGLE applicants belonged to some form of religion that did recognise their relationship, they would, on Daniel's logic, qualify as spouses. That seems discriminatory on the basis of religion. Many people may think it is a distinction without a difference whether a group of people is aided by including them in the word 'spouse' or reading-in a phrase to legislation that excludes them. But there are two important bonuses of the former: (a) the symbolic impact of being recognised as being the same as everybody else; and (b) once the word 'spouse' is found to include a particular group in one piece of legislation it is very likely — though not certain — that other pieces of legislation will be interpreted in the same way without the need for further litigation. Further litigation would be necessary for the read-in option.

[2] It is more than a little ironic that when the Court eventually extended marriage to same-sex life partners, it did so by reading-in the word 'spouse' to the Marriage Act. See Fourie (supra).

[3] 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC)('Engelbrecht'). For more on the FC s 34 right of access to court, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[4] Engelbrecht (supra) at para 36.

[5] Ibid at para 37.

[6] Ibid at para 38.

Final Constitution automatically invalidated all unconstitutional laws[1] (and continues to do so whenever a new unconstitutional law is enacted), 'as a practical matter, inconsistency, invalidity and remedies cannot be separated from one another. … Invalidity … follows from inconsistency with the constitution but, by declaring the law or conduct to be invalid, a court grants a remedy.'[2] FC s 172(1)(a) recognises this inextricable link by requiring that a court 'must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid'. The word 'must' means that, unlike most remedies, declarations of invalidity are not subject to judicial discretion: a declaration of invalidity is a mandatory result of a finding of constitutional inconsistency and flows automatically from that finding. This mandatory rule is sourced in the principle of the supremacy of the Final Constitution. While any court may declare a statue invalid, declarations of invalidity of national or provincial legislation or conduct of the President have no force unless they are confirmed by the Constitutional Court.[3]

These orders are the default remedy following a finding of invalidity and will only be departed from when a more limited order will provide a better outcome.[4] This 'better remedy' outcome is, as often as not, the rule. In most cases, the problem with a statute will be the exclusion (or inclusion) of a particular group, the attachment of a particularly onerous condition or process or some other form of overbreadth. Or, the invalid law may serve an important purpose that would make invalidation an inappropriate response. To give two of the simplest examples, if a law is invalid for permitting heterosexual couples to marry, but not same-sex couples, no sensible person would suggest that the appropriate remedy is to destroy — through a declaration of invalidity — the legal framework for marriage for everyone.[5] Or, where full invalidity would remove the legal authority for the government to pay social grants, it would make no sense to give the declaration immediate force.[6]

However, although surprisingly uncommon, cases exist in which complete, immediate and fully retrospective[7] invalidity is the only sensible remedy.[8] In

[1] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 26 and 158; Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 94 (Kriegler J).

[2] I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 193.

[3] FC s 172(2)(a).

[4] See Currie & de Waal (supra) at 199 (The authors contend that a limited remedy is justified 'where the resulting situation would be more unconstitutional than the existing one.' For the reasons described in detail earlier in this chapter, I do not think that comparative constitutionality is the only — or even the most — relevant concern. See § 9.2*(e)* supra.)

[5] See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International and Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC).

[6] See Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC).

[7] Under the IC the default position was not full retrospectivity. See § 9.4*(e)*(ii)(aa) infra. I include cases here where the Court adopted the default position under the Interim Constitution.

[8] See, for example, Magajane v Chairperson: North West Gambling Board 2006 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1133 (CC) at paras 97–99 (Court declared a whole section permitting unconstitutional search and seizures invalid immediately and in toto); Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security and Others; Curtis v

S v Makwanyane, the Constitutional Court declared all provisions permitting the death penalty immediately invalid and banned any executions based on convictions already delivered.[1] Although the Court has expressed a clear preference for limited rather than full declarations of invalidity, in some cases, full declarations of invalidity respect the separation of powers more than limited orders, such as severance or reading-in. With unlimited orders, the Court does not appear to be making law. Instead, it puts the ball back in the legislature's court. Mokgoro J adopted this reasoning in Larbi-Odam & Others v Member of the Executive Council for Education (North-West Province) & Another to declare unconstitutional a regulation which prevented permanent residents from being employed as teachers in a permanent capacity.[2] Invalidating the legislation in part might have operated unfairly with regard to temporary residents. The Justice was certain that the legislature would not want such a result.[3] By issuing a simple order of invalidity, she left it up to the legislature to decide the best course to follow.

(d) Limiting Substantive Impact

Limiting substantive impact — invalidating only part of the legal effect of a law — can take three different forms: severance, notional severance, and reading-in. Severance requires the excision of certain words from a statute. When a court leaves the words of a statute unaltered, but submits its application to a condition, it engages in notional severance. Finally, when a court adds words to a statute, we call it 'reading-in'. These practices are not mutually exclusive. A court can simultaneously sever words and read-in words. Here, I treat them separately. For although the tests for each remedy may be similar, certain features are unique to each one.

Generally, a court should use one of these devices rather than a bald declaration of invalidity because it is 'less intrusive of the legislative function' to invalidate only that portion of the legislation that violates the Constitution, rather than the whole.[4] These devices permit the law to continue in operation rather than

Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)(Obscenity law); Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)(Civil imprisonment); Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC)(Time limitation clause).

[1] S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC) at para 151

[2] 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 45–46.

[4] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at para 87. See also National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2002 (4) SA 843 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 970 (CC) at para 29; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC), 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at paras 73–76.

creating a lacuna in the law that may disrupt social relations and require immediate action by the legislature.[1]

A special relationship exists between limiting substantive impact, and suspension. Both suspension and the three devices for limiting substantive impact aim to cure a defect in the law in the least intrusive manner. Suspension accomplishes this end by allowing the legislature an opportunity to fix the problem, while the other three remedies propose a solution that the legislature remains free to amend. Which remedy is to be preferred? In J v Director General, Department of Home Affairs Goldstone J seemed to express a preference for limiting substantive impact rather than suspending an order:

> Where the appropriate remedy is reading-in words in order to cure the constitutional invalidity of a statutory provision, it is difficult to think of an occasion when it would be appropriate to suspend such an order. This is so because the effect of reading-in is to cure a constitutional deficiency in the impugned legislation. If reading-in words does not cure the unconstitutionality, it will ordinarily not be an appropriate remedy. Where the unconstitutionality is cured, there would usually be no reason to deprive the applicants or any other persons of the benefit of such an order by suspending it. Moreover the legislature need not be given an opportunity to remedy the defect, which has by definition been cured.[2]

The same reasoning would apply equally if the appropriate remedy was severance or notional severance. We can agree that there is no point in delaying a remedy when an adequate cure can be instantly provided. However, Goldstone J moves too quickly. He ignores the possibility of combined orders. As I discuss in more detail when I address suspension,[3] it is possible to limit the substantive impact of the section as a temporary measure while the suspension lasts or to suspend an order, but craft a limited order that takes effect if the legislature fails to remedy the defect in time.

(i) Severance

Severance involves precisely what it describes: an invalid section of a statute is 'severed' or 'cut off' from the rest of the statute. Severance is appropriate when only part of a piece of legislation is constitutionally infirm. It gives effect to the injunction in FC s 172(1)(a) that law that is inconsistent with the Final Constitution must be declared invalid 'to the extent of its inconsistency'. Unlike reading-in, severance has never been viewed as controversial; it does not seem to infringe the separation of powers to invalidate less, rather than more of a statute.

[1] Not all bald declarations of invalidity create problematic gaps. When the Constitutional Court struck down corporal punishment in S v Williams there was no gap as other sentences could be employed in its place. 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC).

[2] 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC).

[3] See § 9.4*(e)(i)* infra.

However, severance is not always appropriate. Sometimes the law may be structured in such a way that it is impossible or unwise to sever only the unconstitutional parts without affecting the rest of the legislation. Accordingly, in Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court laid down the following two-part test for severance:

> [I]f the good is not dependent on the bad and can be separated from it, one gives effect to the good that remains after the separation if it still gives effect to the main objective of the statute. The test has two parts: first, is it possible to sever the invalid provisions and, second, if so, is what remains giving effect to the purpose of the legislative scheme?[1]

The first requirement has been rephrased as the need to 'ensure that the provision which results from severance or reading words into a statute is consistent with the Constitution and its fundamental values'.[2] Whether this objective can be realised will depend on the wording of the particular section as well as its place in the broader statutory scheme. The Court has also held that since 'the statute books still contain many provisions enacted by a Parliament not concerned with the protection of human rights, the first consideration will in those cases often weigh more heavily than the second'.[3]

A good example of where it was easy to separate the good from the bad is South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another.[4] O'Regan J found that a regulation was valid to the extent that it prohibited strike action by members of the Defence Force, but invalid in so far as it banned public protest. To remedy the defect, the Court simply severed the words 'or perform any act of public protest' and related phrases and left the proscription of strike action intact.[5]

On the other hand, such textual surgery was impossible in Magajane v Chairperson, North West Gambling Board.[6] Van der Westhuizen J held that a provision permitting warrantless search and seizures of unlicensed gambling premises was overbroad and therefore unconstitutional. However, the provisions permitting the searches applied to both licensed and unlicensed premises. Justice van der Westhuizen concluded that the 'intertwining of licensed and unlicensed premises … make[s] severance difficult and undesirable.[7] To put it in Kriegler J's words, it was not possible to separate the good (licensed premises) from the bad (unlicensed premises).

---

[1] Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)(footnote omitted).

[2] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 74.

[3] Ibid.

[4] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU I'). See also S v Lawrence; S v Negal: S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 133 (O'Regan J dissenting would have cured the infringement of separation between church and state in a law banning the selling of alcohol on Sundays, Christmas Day and Good Friday — referred to in the legislation as 'closed days' — by simply excising 'closed days' from the prohibition.)

[5] SANDU I (supra) at paras 15 and 45.

[6] 2006 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1133 (CC), 2006 (2) SACR 447 (CC).

[7] Ibid at para 98.

Other cases resist textual surgery.[1] Most of these cases fail the severance test at the second leg. However, before I address those cases, let me give one example where the severed legislation would still give effect to the purpose of the legislation — ie that would pass the second leg.[2] In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others[3] Chaskalson CJ severed a portion of the Electoral Act[4] that prevented prisoners from voting. The Court did not even discuss whether the severance still gave effect to the purpose of the law. The purpose of the legislation — regulating elections and thereby promoting the right to vote — could obviously only be enhanced by expanding the pool of voters.

Fraser v Children's Court Pretoria North & Others illustrates the contrary position — where severance would not give effect to the intent of the legislation. Mahomed DP refused to sever a portion of the unconstitutional legislation that permitted a child born out of wedlock to be adopted without the father's consent.[5] The effect of the severance would be that the father's consent would always be required: thus the fathers of children born from rape, incest or 'a very casual encounter on a single occasion' would retain the right to consent — or to withhold such consent.[6] The Court was not satisfied that position 'would adequately reflect what Parliament would wish to retain if it became alive to the fact that the section was vulnerable' for the reasons described in the judgment.[7] Severance was therefore inappropriate.

The same problem arose in South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson Gauteng Liquor Board & Others.[8] The Constitutional Court held a provision that defined a shebeen as an unlicensed outfit selling less than 10 cases of beer, without specifying the time within which the 10 cases had to be sold, to be unconstitutionally vague. The High Court had simply severed the words 'and is selling less than ten (10) cases'.[9] The effect of that order was that 'any business

[1] See, for example, Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at paras 30–32 (The Court found it was impossible to sever the offending provisions which allowed the Bank to bypass courts as it would require an amendment to other sections. In addition, severance would not give effect to the statutory scheme or to the legislative purpose to provide the Bank with a quick and effective remedy. Severance failed at both legs of the test); First National Bank of South Africa Ltd v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Others; Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC)('Sheard') at paras 14–15 (The case concerned similar legislation to Chief Lesapo and was inappropriate for the same reasons. The Court also held: 'Severing the proposed part would alter the system of debt recovery set forth by the Legislature and would amount to legislating, a function reserved for Parliament'.)

[2] See also Shinga v S (Society of Advocates, Pietermaritzburg Bar as Amicus Curiae); O'Connell & Others v S 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC)(Court severs exceptions from the general rule that the record should be applied to the High Court in criminal appeals from the Magistrates' Courts.)

[3] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC).

[4] Act 73 of 1998.

[5] 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at paras 47–49.

[6] Ibid at para 49.

[7] Ibid at para 48.

[8] 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC)('South African Liquor Traders').

[9] Ibid at para 30.

primarily concerned with the sale of liquor and unlicensed, [would] fall within the terms of the definition and would in terms of the regulation be entitled to operate unlicensed.[1] O'Regan J concluded that severance would not be the correct remedy because the 'potential harm to the wider community of such a broad definition is clear and directly in conflict with the stated purposes of the Act': namely to regulate the sale of liquor.[2]

Although the Court has presented the severance test as requiring two separate inquiries, in many cases the two steps are collapsed into a single inquiry. Case v Minister of Safety and Security; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security provides an excellent example of the linguistic difficulty associated with separation of powers questions.[3] The Court was concerned with a censorship provision that was manifestly overbroad. Mokgoro J held, applying the first part of the Coetzee test, that severance was not a 'viable option' because the 'overbreadth cannot be laid at the door of any one word, or group of words, but rather permeates the entire text.'[4] She then went on to hold that even if it were possible to 'apply a blue pencil to each and every [word] that presents overbreadth problems, we would effectively write a new provision that bears only accidental resemblance to that enacted by Parliament.'[5] The Court would violate the second leg of the test by 'paring down' the provision 'to prohibit only that discrete set of sexually-oriented expressions that this Court believes may constitutionally be restricted' and thus 'depart[ ] fundamentally from its assigned role under our Constitution'.[6] What is interesting about Case & Curtis is that whether the Court believes severance is textually plausible depends, at least in part, on the degree to which severance would usurp the legislature's role. The two elements of the test should be seen as related, not isolated, and should be considered simultneously, not sequentially.

[1] South African Liquor Traders (supra) at para 32.
[2] Ibid at para 34.
[3] 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 587 (CC)('Case & Curtis') at paras 70–75. See also Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at paras 30–32 (The Court found it was impossible to sever the offending provisions which allowed the Bank to bypass courts as it would require an amendment to other sections. In addition, severance would not give effect to the statutory scheme or to the legislative purpose to provide the Bank with a quick and effective remedy. Severance failed at both legs of the test.); Sheard (supra) at paras 14–15 (The case concerned similar legislation to Chief Lesapo and was inappropriate for the same reasons. The Court also held: 'Severing the proposed part would alter the system of debt recovery set forth by the Legislature and would amount to legislating, a function reserved for Parliament.'); South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at paras 47–48 (The Court held that the investigative (constitutional) and litigation (unconstitutional) functions of a judge appointed to head a commission of inquiry were inextricably linked. It was impossible to separate the good from the bad.)
[4] Case & Curtis (supra) at para 71.
[5] Ibid at para 72.
[6] Ibid at paras 72 and 73.

(ii) Notional Severance

Notional severance is one of the more difficult remedies to understand. Like severance, it involves removing parts of the offending provision while leaving other words and provisions intact. However, as the adjective 'notional' suggests, no words are actually excised from the law. Instead the unconstitutional reach of the provision is identified by limiting the cases to which the law can apply or by making its valid operation subject to a condition. Notional severance also bears a passing similarity to reading down: both remedies leave the words of the statute unaltered, but affect its meaning or application. The difference between the two remedies is that notional severance does not claim that the words can actually bear the meaning that the court ascribes to them. In fact, they clearly cannot. Were it otherwise, the Court would have been obliged to read down the section, rather than notionally sever its parts. Notional severance provides instructions for the application of the rule, rather than specifying the correct interpretation.

These fine distinctions can be difficult to grasp. Perhaps the best way to explain notional severance is by example. In Islamic Unity Convention, the Court found that a clause prohibiting broadcast of any material that was 'likely to prejudice relations between sections of the population' was over-broad and infringed the right to freedom of expression.[1] Langa DCJ found that invalidating the provision completely would leave an impermissible gap in the law. Severance or reading-in, on the other hand, would trench too deeply into the legislative domain.[2] He therefore opted for an order of notional severance which declared the clause invalid except to the extent that it prohibited what was already impermissible in terms of FC s 16(2): '(i) propaganda for war; (ii) incitement of imminent violence; or (iii) advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.'[3] The effect of the order was that a prohibition on certain broadcasts remained in place, but that prohibition would henceforth only apply to the much more limited category of broadcasts that conflicted with the dictates of FC s 16(2).

While Islamic Unity is perhaps the clearest illustration of notional severance, it is by no means the only one.[4] Notional Severance was first employed in Ferreira v Levin No & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others. The Ferreira Court

[1] 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) at paras 21–51.

[2] Ibid at para 56.

[3] Ibid at paras 57 and 60.

[4] See, for example, First National Bank (FNB) of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 114 (The Court declared invalid a provision permitting property to be sold to cover a customs debt, even if the owner of the property is not the custom debtor. The constitutional flaw was limited to the selling of property belonging to a third party. It accordingly ordered a notional severance limiting the invalidity to these situations); Prince v President, Cape Law Society & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC) at para 85 (Ngcobo J dissenting)(Ngcobo J held that legislation prohibiting the possession of dagga violated the rights of Rastafarians. He declared it invalid to the extent that it prohibited 'the use or possession of cannabis by Rastafari adherents for bona fide religious purposes'.)

invalidated legislation[1] permitting a recalcitrant witness in a company's winding up process to be imprisoned.[2] However, the only defect the Ferreira Court found in the law was that the answers given by the witness could be used against the witness in subsequent criminal proceedings. It therefore limited the order of invalidity by a notional severance: it prohibited the answers given in the winding up proceedings from being used in non-perjury related criminal proceedings.[3] Notional severance has also been successfully combined with a suspension order so that the condition comes into effect if the legislature fails to fix the problem by the time the suspension period ends.[4] The benefit of this combination — if done properly[5] — is that it gives clear guidance to the legislature regarding the nature of the constitutional defect, and provides a 'constitutional fix' should the legislature fail to intervene before the suspension period expires.

While notional severance is an attractive remedy for courts faced with teasing out the good from the bad in intricately worded statutes, it has its limits. These limits were explained by Ackermann J in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs:

> The device of notional severance can effectively be used to render inoperative portions of a statutory provision, where it is the presence of particular provisions which is constitutionally offensive and where the scope of the provision is too extensive and hence constitutionally offensive, but the unconstitutionality cannot be cured by the severance of actual words from the provision. . . . Where, however, the invalidity of a statutory provision results from an omission, it is not possible, in my view, to achieve notional severance by using words such as 'invalid to the extent that' or other expressions indicating notional severance. An omission cannot, notionally, be cured by severance.[6]

[1] Companies Act 61 of 1973 s 417(2)(b).

[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 156–157. See also De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 103 (The Court invalidated a law that permitted imprisonment of recalcitrant witnesses in insolvency proceedings only to the extent that the imprisonment could be ordered by non-judicial officers.)

[4] See Nyathi v MEC of the Department of Health & Another [2008] ZACC 8 (Madala J, for the majority, declared that s 3 of the State Liability Act was invalid 'to the extent that it does not allow for execution or attachment against the state and that it does not provide for an express procedure for the satisfaction of judgment debts.' He suspended that order for 12 months. This order gives Parliament a clear indication of what they need to alter to ensure that the new system is constitutional. The first part of the notional severance also makes it clear that if Parliament does not act, judgment creditors will be able to execute against state assets. The second part clearly might also justify the courts themselves to develop a process for attaching state assets if the legislature failed to do so.)

[5] An example of a failure to do this intelligently is Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at paras 45–52 (The Court invalidated s 18(4)(d) of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 which permitted a child to be adopted without an unmarried father's consent. It suspended the order to allow the legislature to regulate the area. However, although it noted that it was indeed proper to dispense with the father's consent in certain cases — such as rape — its order would have required the father's consent even in the case of rape. The Court would have done better to construct a more limited order.)

[6] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at paras 63 and 64. See also S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1181 (CC) at para 31; National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2002 (4) SA 843 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 970 (CC) at paras 26–27 (The High Court attempted to cure a defect in the Prevention of Organised Crime Act by declaring the provision invalid that it did

Notional severance can cure presence, not absence. The High Court's judgment in National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others provides a fine example of such misapplication.[1] The constitutional flaw at issue flowed from the fact that s 38 of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act[2] always required an application for preservation of property to be brought ex parte and did not permit a court to issue a rule nisi for interested parties to make submissions. Cloete J attempted to remedy this defect by an order for notional severance that would allow courts to make a rule nisi order. On appeal, Ackermann J held that the remedy was not competent. The High Court had attempted to cure what was in fact 'an omission from the section, namely the failure to provide for the above procedure and remedy.'[3] That could not be done by notionl severance.

In addition, because of the greater certainty provided by actual severance, an order of actual severance should be preferred to an order of notional severance if it is 'linguistically competent'.[4] This advice was not followed in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others.[5] The Court invalidated s 18(4)(d) of the Child Care Act.[6] The infirm provision had permitted a child to be adopted without an unmarried father's consent. The Court suspended the order to allow the legislature to regulate the area. However, it also fashioned its order — which would come into effect at the end of the suspension period if the legislature did not cure the defect — as notional severance of s 18(4)(d) 'to the extent that it dispenses with the father's consent for the adoption of an "illegitimate" child in all circumstances.'[7] Precisely the same result could have been better achieved by simply deleting the proviso to s 18(4)(d).

One final point. Like actual severance, notional severance will only be appropriate where it is possible to quarantine the unconstitutional parts of the legislation and where what is left will still give effect to the purpose of the legislation.

(iii) Reading-in

Reading-in is the opposite of severance. Instead of removing words from legislation, when a court reads-in it adds words to the statute to cure the constitutional not allow an application to be brought in a different form); Dawood & Another; Shalabi & Another; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 61; Janse van Rensburg v Minister of Trade and Industry 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) at para 28.

[1] Unreported Witwatersrand Local Division Case No. 2000/21921.

[2] Act 121 of 1998.

[3] National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2002 (4) SA 843 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 970 (CC) at para 26.

[4] SANDU I (supra) at para 16.

[5] 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)('Fraser').

[6] Act 74 of 1983. Section 18(4)(d) read: 'A children's court to which application for an order of adoption is made . . . shall not grant the application unless it is satisfied - (d) that consent to the adoption has been given by both parents of the child, or, if the child is illegitimate, by the mother of the child, whether or not such mother is a minor or married woman and whether or not she is assisted by her parent, guardian or husband, as the case may be'.

[7] Fraser (supra) at para 52.

defect. It is also important to distinguish reading-in from reading down and notional severance. With both reading down and notional severance, the text of the legislation remains untouched; it is simply given a meaning that conforms to the Final Constitution. When reading-in, courts change the text.

Reading-in has been the object of some suspicion. The actual act of 'writing' and 'editing' legislation, some charge, constitutes a judicial usurpation of legislative prerogatives and, therefore, a violation of the separation of powers.[1] The Constitutional Court thus went to some length to justify the use of reading-in in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs.[2] Although it acknowledged that reading-in invariably posed this apparent problem, it rejected the idea that reading-in should be treated any differently from severance:

> there is in principle no difference between a court rendering a statutory provision constitutional by removing the offending part by actual or notional severance, or by reading words into a statutory provision. In both cases the parliamentary enactment, as expressed in a statutory provision, is being altered by the order of a court. In the one case by excision and in the other by addition. This chance difference cannot by itself establish a difference in principle. The only relevant enquiry is what the consequences of such an order are and whether they constitute an unconstitutional intrusion into the domain of the legislature.[3]

The same considerations that apply to severance, therefore, also apply to reading-in: the reading-in must remedy the defect, interfere as little as possible with the legislation and still give effect to the purpose of the legislation.[4] However, because reading-in is more often employed to extend the reach of a law, courts are, despite the assertions in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs, more wary of reading-in.

There are two other important threads to be drawn from NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs. The first is what has been called 'the equality of the vineyard or the graveyard':[5] When a statute is unfairly discriminatory because it provides a benefit

[1] For more on the separation of powers, see § 9.2*(e)*(iv)(cc)(1) supra. See also S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[2] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs').

[3] Ibid at paras 67–68.

[4] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 75 ('In deciding to read words into a statute, a Court should also bear in mind that it will not be appropriate to read words in, unless in so doing a Court can define with sufficient precision how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, when reading-in (as when severing) a Court should endeavour to be as faithful as possible to the legislative scheme within the constraints of the Constitution.')

[5] See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian & Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 149 ('[T]he achievement of equality would not be accomplished by ensuring that if same-sex couples cannot enjoy the status and entitlements coupled with the responsibilities of marriage, the same should apply to heterosexual couples. Levelling down so as to deny access to civil marriage to all would not promote the achievement of the enjoyment of equality. Such parity of exclusion rather than of inclusion would distribute resentment evenly, instead of dissipating it equally for all. The law concerned with family formation and marriage requires equal celebration, not equal marginalisation; it calls for equality of the vineyard and not equality of the graveyard.')

to some groups and not others, is the correct remedy to provide the benefit to everybody, or to nobody?[1] There is no single answer. The remedy will, as always, depend on the facts of the case. However, possible budgetary implications that reading-in would have should not automatically deter a court from expanding protection.[2] The court should instead consider the extent of the budgetary intrusion and weigh the intrusion against the injustice of 'levelling down' — a Vonnegutian consequence in which everyone is made equal by ensuring that all are similarly disabled. In doing so, the guiding principle should not be the purpose of the legislation, but the constitutional norms underlying the finding of inequality.[3] Budgetary implications, did not, for example, deter the Khosa Court from expanding social security benefits to protect permanent residents as well as citizens.[4] However, an 'unsupportable budgetary intrusion' would bar a reading-in that would otherwise be valid.[5]

The second thread to be drawn from NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs is that reading-in does not give the judiciary the final word on what the law is. It merely starts a conversation between the legislature and the courts.[6] In the Court's words: 'Legislatures are able, within constitutional limits, to amend the remedy, whether by re-enacting equal benefits, further extending benefits, reducing them, amending them, "fine-tuning" them or abolishing them. Thus they can exercise final control over the nature and extent of the benefits.'[7] It matters not whether the remedy is pure invalidity, severance, notional severance or reading-in. However, because reading-in generally provides the Court with more options than the other remedies, courts should be especially cautious in this domain and are best

[1] See E Caminker 'A Norm-based Remedial Model for Underinclusive Statutes' (1986) 95 Yale LJ 1185.

[2] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 75 ('Even where the remedy of reading-in is otherwise justified, it ought not to be granted where it would result in an unsupportable budgetary intrusion. In determining the scope of the budgetary intrusion, it will be necessary to consider the relative size of the group which the reading-in would add to the group already enjoying the benefits.')

[3] Caminker (supra) quoted with approval in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 72.

[4] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minster of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa')(The budgetary considerations in Khosa were considered as part of the limitations analysis rather than the remedy analysis. This is, perhaps, a mistake as the budgetary impact depends on the remedy that the Court chooses to grant which should not be determined at the limitations stage. The Court could conceivably have devised a remedy that slightly decreased the social grants across the board in order to accommodate the permanent residents. If the budgetary increase is considered before a remedy is devised, the remedial possibility of avoiding — or at least minimizing — the increase in spending is lost.)

[5] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 75.

[6] For more on constitutional dialogue, see K Roach 'Constitutional, Remedial, and International Dialogues About Rights: The Canadian Experience' (2005) 40 Texas Journal of International Law 537. On shared constitutional interpretation, see generally S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[7] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 76.

advised to leave the choice to the legislature.[1] Such caution is most commonly signalled by suspending the order of invalidity. In Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs, the Court suspended an order relating to residence permanents for South Africans' spouses because there were so many ways the legislature could cure the defect.

The most obvious use for reading-in is to increase the reach of a provision to include a class of people currently excluded by the law. That was how the remedy was first employed in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs. The Constitutional Court read in the words 'or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership' after the word 'spouse' so as to extend the benefit of immigration laws to same-sex couples. It has employed the same strategy in a long string of subsequent cases to bring homosexual couples within the reach of various laws.[2] The Court has also used reading-in to extend social security to permanent residents,[3] to allow attorneys from the former homelands to be admitted in South Africa[4] and to allow multiple spouses and children to benefit from intestate succession.[5] The last case, Bhe, is particularly interesting because of the extreme detail of the Court's order. The Court invalidated the customary-law rule of primogeniture which limited inheritance to the eldest son. However, the Court could not simply apply the provisions of the Intestate Succession Act[6] because the Act did not cater for polygamous unions. It therefore fashioned what is, in effect, an entirely new set of laws to regulate these families which largely adhered to the same basic principles that regulated monogamous unions. But grafting such principles on to

[1] Dawood & Another; Shalabi & Another; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 64 ('Where, as in the present case, a range of possibilities exists and the Court is able to afford appropriate interim relief to affected persons, it will ordinarily be appropriate to leave the Legislature to determine in the first instance how the unconstitutionality should be cured. This Court should be slow to make those choices which are primarily choices suitable for the Legislature.')

[2] See Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC) and Satchwell v President of South Africa & Another 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Legislation limited benefits for judges' spouses to heterosexual couples); J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC)(Law prohibited same-sex partners from becoming the parents of a child born by artificial insemination); Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development and Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amici Curiae ) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)(Provision at issue prevented same-sex couples from adopting); Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae*); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others* 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)(Altered the common law and the Marriage Act to permit homosexuals to marry); Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC)(Expanded the Intestate Succession Act to apply to homosexual couples).

[3] Khosa (supra).

[4] Mabaso v Law Society, Northern Provinces 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC).

[5] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA &Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

[6] Act 81 of 1987.

polygamous unions is hardly uncontroversial.[1] The Court justified this extensive incursion into the legislative terrain by stressing the vulnerability of those persons who would be affected by a delay and by stating that its order 'should be regarded by the legislature as an interim measure.'[2] Ngcobo J dissented. In his view, regulating the problem involved policy choices that were best left to the legislature.[3] While there is something to be said for Ngcobo J's rejection of the Court's reading-in — its boldest use of the remedy thus far — the result remains the best solution to a difficult, if not intractable, problem.[4]

Reading-in can also be used to add a proviso to a section.[5] This use of reading-in bears many similarities to forms of notional severance except that reading-in actually adds the words. It does not simply prevent an unconstitutional

[1] The Bhe Court never uses the word 'reading-in' to describe its order, nor is the order itself fashioned in the normal manner for reading-in orders which read: 'The omission of "X" from the provision is unconstitutional.' Further, the order is phrased more like an order for notional severance that is aimed at the 'application' of the Intestate Succession Act rather than its wording. This judicial sleight of hand is interesting because it indicates that the Court realised how much further its order went than traditional reading-in orders that are limited to a few words or a phrase. However, it is clear that the order can be nothing but an order for reading-in. It cannot be notional severance because it cures an omission. See § 9.4*(d)*(ii) supra. It cannot be an instruction on how to interpret the Act because the words of the Act clearly cannot bear that meaning. The only way the Court could achieve its desired outcome is by altering the law; ie, reading-in.

[2] Bhe (supra) at paras 115–116.

[3] Ibid at paras 224–226 ('The determination of the choice of law rule which regulates the circumstances in which indigenous law is applicable involves policy decisions. In particular, it involves a decision on the criteria for determining when indigenous law is applicable. There is a range of options in this regard. The choice of law may be based on, among other things, agreement, the lifestyle of individuals, the type of marriage, the nature of the property such as family land, justice and equity, or a combination of all these factors. The Legislature is better equipped to make these policy choices.')

[4] Ngcobo J's solution was for customary to continue to apply without the absolute rule of primogeniture. The parties would try to reach agreement and if they failed, a Magistrate would have to come up with a solution that was 'fair, just and equitable in the circumstances of the case.' Ibid at para 239. There is good reason to be sceptical of this proposal. Not only does it not provide any solace to vulnerable women, but it fails to take seriously the systems of power that operate in many communities that would continue to prevent women from inheriting. The only other alternative — suspension — was rightly rejected by Langa DCJ for failing to provide relief to extremely vulnerable people whose most basic rights to equality were being violated.

[5] See, for example, S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela') at paras 55–59 (The law at issue created a presumption that a person in possession of stolen property was guilty of an offence unless they could prove they had a 'reasonable cause' to posses it. A majority of the Court found that construction overly invasive of the right to be presumed innocent but because of the prevalence of 'fencing' they did not want to strike down the whole provision. Instead, they removed the offending phrase and replaced it with the following slightly narrower construction: 'In the absence of evidence to the contrary which raises a reasonable doubt, proof of such possession shall be sufficient evidence of the absence of reasonable cause.'); Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC) at para 47 (The Immigration Act 13 of 2002 permitted people to be detained indefinitely without a trial. The Court found that position unconstitutional and read-in words to require that if the person were detained for 30 days, their continued detention had to be confirmed by a court for a maximum period of 90 days.); S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at paras 33–34 (The Court read in the words 'Provided that no such prisoner shall be detained for a period exceeding 15 years' to prevent indefinite detention of habitual criminals.)

application. For example, in Jaftha v Minister of Justice the Court altered s 66(1)(a) of the Magistrates Court Act to prevent attachment of immoveable property without court intervention.[1] It read-in the words 'a court, after consideration of all relevant circumstances, may order execution' to ensure that people were not deprived of their right to housing.[2]

There are, however, many other possible uses for reading-in. As the Court has noted, reading-in need not be 'confined to cases in which it is necessary to remedy a provision that is under-inclusive. There is no reason in principle why it should not also be used as part of the process of narrowing the reach of a provision that is unduly invasive of a protected right.'[3]

Reading-in cannot, however, be used as a 'back door' to address issues that were not properly raised in argument about the content of the right. In Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another, the Court expanded a statute regulating benefits for judges' spouses to include same-sex life partners.[4] The Court was not, however, willing to extend it to heterosexual life partners. As Madala J put it:

> This Court is not at large to grant any relief under its power to grant "appropriate relief" — it cannot import matters that are remote to the case in question — otherwise it will be intruding too far into the legislative sphere. The intended accommodation of heterosexuals cannot be introduced via the backdoor into this case. It was not properly before us, nor did we hear argument on the complexities involved.[5]

The appropriateness of reading-in will always turn on the reason for invalidity and the structure of the particular section. Two possible scenarios warrant mention. In South African Liquor Traders, the Constitutional Court was faced with provincial legislation that intended to bring shebeens into the legislative framework.[6] The legislation defined shebeens as commercial operations that sold only 10 cases of quarts, but failed to specify the period in which they should be sold. The Court

[1] 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC).

[2] Ibid at para 67.

[3] Manamela (supra) at para 57. The cases described as to adding 'conditions' could also be described as narrowing the scope of the law. It is because they all narrow the scope in a particular way that I have chosen to place them under the rubric of 'conditions'.

[4] 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 40. See also Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)(The Court expanded, through FC s 39(2), the common-law definition of rape to include anal penetration of women, but refused to include men because the litigant in the case was female. If this alteration of the law had presented itself as a question of reading-in — if the Court had found a direct violation of the Final Constitution — reading-in might not have been justified for the same reason. However, Masiya differs from Satchwell because the issue of male anal rape was in fact raised in argument. But once the Court made its substantive decision on a basis that excluded men, it would have been improper to bring them back into the fold through the remedy.)

[6] South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC)('South African Liquor Traders').

invalidated the provision on the basis of vagueness. Given the proffered evidence, the Court decided that shebeens could sell 60 cases within a week.[1] As an interim measure, and in order to avoid leaving the situation unregulated, it read words into the legislation to that effect.[2] The Court was not, however, prepared to permanently read words into the statute.[3]

If expanding protection and creating additional conditions are the primary uses for reading-in, the most common argument against it is the range of choices available to the legislature. Again, the concern raised here engages separation of powers doctrine: the 'Court should be slow to make … choices which are primarily choices suitable for the legislature.'[4] Such care was, at least on its face, part of the motivation for the majority's decision in Fourie to suspend the declaration of invalidity.[5] Sachs J believed that there were different ways that the state could solve the problem of same-sex marriage. The state could simply include same-sex couples under the existing legislation or it could create some variation on existing templates for traditional marriages and normal marriages.[6] O'Regan J rightly pointed out how limited these options — especially when combined with the Court's guidelines — were.[7] Even with such limited options, eight judges felt that 'the legislature [should] be given an opportunity to map out what it considers to be the best way forward.'[8] One senses here a genuine separation of powers concern: if legislatures possess greater political legitimacy by virtue of their election and ongoing accountability, then the legislature, and not an ostensibly unaccountable judiciary, should take responsibility for crafting a remedy that better fits the 'mores' and the inclinations of the electorate.

(iv) Shinga

I conclude this discussion of limiting the substantive impact of decisions with a case where a number of remedial options were in play: Shinga v S (Society of Advocates, Pietermaritzburg Bar as Amicus Curiae); O'Connell & Others v S.[9] The Court found constitutional defects in three sections of the Criminal Procedure Act[10] dealing with appeal procedures from the Magistrates' Court to the High Court and used three different remedial strategies. The first defect related to a [1] South African Liquor Traders (supra) at paras 41–45.

[2] Ibid at para 55.
[3] Ibid at para 40.
[4] Dawood (supra) at para 64. Se also South African Liquor Traders (supra) at para 44.
[5] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae ); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC).
[6] Ibid at paras 139–147.
[7] Ibid at para 168.
[8] Ibid at para 147.
[9] 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC)('Shinga').
[10] Act 51 of 1977.

procedure which permitted petitions for appeal to be considered in chambers instead of in open court. The Court found the entire process unconstitutional and invalidated the whole section.[1] The second defect related to s 309C(4)(c). This section required the record of the case to be sent to the High Court except in four instances: all four instances included appeals related only to sentence or to condonation. The Constitutional Court held that the record should be sent in every case and, therefore, that all the exceptions were unconstitutional. Declaring the whole section invalid would mean the record would never have to be sent. The Court therefore severed the exceptions and left intact the general rule that the record should be sent.[2] The final defect concerned a section which required that appeals only had to be considered by one judge, save in exceptional circumstances where the appeal would be considered by two judges. The Court held that the right to an appeal required that appeals always be considered by at least two judges. Shinga combined severance and reading-in by removing the reference to one judge and the proviso for exceptional circumstances, and by reading-in a requirement that appeals be considered by two judges.[3]

(e) Limiting Temporal Impact

The previous section considered ways in which courts can 'work' declarations of invalidity in a manner that limits their impact to only those substantive issues that have a genuine affect on our constitutional rights. This section addresses how a court can regulate the effect of their orders of invalidity on the future and the past. Suspension orders allow a court to prevent an order of invalidity from having effect until a future date. Retrospectivity orders determine an order's impact on the past. Although declarations of invalidity normally operate retrospectively to the date of the law's enactment or the enactment of the Final Constitution, courts are able to limit the potentially disruptive impact of such orders in many different ways.

(i) Suspension

(aa) How does suspension operate?

(x) Suspension as a resolutive condition

Ordinarily orders apply from the date upon which they are made. However, FC s 172(1)(b)(ii) specifically gives courts the power to suspend the coming into effect of an order of invalidity. It is important to understand exactly how these orders work. A court will declare a provision invalid, but state that the invalidity

[1] Shinga (supra) at para 54.
[2] Ibid at para 55.
[3] Ibid at para 56.

will only come into effect on a future date. The primary reason for suspension is to give the body responsible for the unconstitutional provision — normally the Legislature — an opportunity to rectify the defect. For that reason the suspension acts as a resolutive condition:

> If the matter is rectified, the declaration falls away and what was done in terms of the law is given validity. If not, the declaration of invalidity takes place at the expiry of the prescribed period and the normal consequences attaching to such a declaration ensue.[1]

While this approach is eminently sensible, it could lead to confusion down the line. It leaves uncertain whether the measures adopted by the legislature have in fact 'rectified' the matter. Such a matter has not yet come before the courts. However, a party with an interest in the outcome could apply to the Constitutional Court to determine whether the defect has been correctly remedied and whether the suspended order of invalidity should come into effect. It might be argued, for example, that the separate regime created by the new Civil Union Act[2] did not really 'rectify' the unconstitutional failure to permit same-sex couples to marry identified by the Court in Fourie. If it did not, then the suspended consequences specified in the Fourie order[3] (altering the common law and reading-in 'or spouse' to the Marriage Act[4]) should, in theory, have come into effect on the expiry of the suspension period.

(y) Do suspended orders that come into effect have retrospective force?

The next interesting question is whether — when the legislature fails to cure the defect and the suspended order comes into effect — the declaration operates retrospectively. As I explain below, unless the Court explicitly limits the retrospective effect, any declaration of invalidity operates back to 4 February 1997.[5] In theory then, if a declaration comes into force on a suspended date and the Court has not said anything about retrospectivity, the order should operate back to when the Final Constitution came into force, or at least to the date the order was made. The Court in Executive Council of the Western Cape held that if the constitutional infirmity was not rectified 'the normal consequences attaching to such a declaration ensue. In the present case that would mean that [the relevant law] and everything done under it would be invalidated.'[6] In short, the order will operate retrospectively. General retrospective effect for a suspended order is not,

[1] Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President, Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council, Western Cape 1995') at para 106.

[2] Act 17 of 2006.

[3] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 162.

[4] Act 25 of 1961.

[5] See § 9.4*(e)*(ii)(aa) infra.

[6] Executive Council, Western Cape 1995 (supra) at para 106.

however, how the Court has understood suspension orders since Executive Council of the Western Cape. Although it has not explicitly dealt with the issue, the correct position seems to be that suspended orders will not operate retrospectively unless the court has expressly stated otherwise.

In an ordinary case, when a suspension order is based on the need to retain the legal position in place in order to avoid disruption of a legal system, the order will not operate retrospectively. It would make no sense to have a suspension order act retrospectively when it would cause the precise ill that the court intended to avoid. The Constitutional Court implicitly confirmed this principle in Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[1] The Mashavha Court declared various provisions of a presidential proclamation[2] — assigning the administration of social grants to the provinces — invalid and suspended that invalidity for 18 months without any mention, in the judgment or the order, of the retrospective effect. Eighteen months later, the minister responsible for social grants applied to the Court to extend the suspension period.[3] In refusing to extend the period, , the Court noted that the invalidity would operate only from the date the suspension period expired. It is, therefore, open to a court to specifically regulate the timing, and the retrospectivity, of the order of suspension. In Executive Council of the Western Cape 1999, for example, the Court's order made it clear that if the defect was not remedied, the order would not have retrospective effect.[4]

However, in at least one case, the ratio and the holding of the Court's judgment required retrospective application. In Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Court invalidated part of a constitutional amendment that had changed the provincial boundary between KwaZulu-Natal and the Eastern Cape because the KwaZulu-Natal legislature had failed to facilitate public involvement.[5] The amendment was made only a few months before the 2006 municipal elections and the decision given a few months after the election. The Court decided to suspend the declaration for 18 months. The declaration posed the possibility of a massive disruption in service delivery. Moreover, Parliament could pass another amendment — this time following the correct procedure — in the same terms as the invalidated amendment. However, the Court recognised that '[i]f Parliament decides not to proceed with the amendment, or does not enact it within the period of suspension, or if the KwaZulu-Natal provincial legislature decides to veto an amendment that alters its

[1] 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC).
[2] Proclamation R7 of 1996.
[3] 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC).
[4] Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 139 ('In the event of the period of one year . . . expiring before the defect in question is corrected, the declaration of invalidity in paragraph 4.1 above will only take effect as from the date of such expiry.')
[5] 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele II').

boundary, the order of invalidity will take effect and the elections of 1 March 2006 will be rendered invalid.'[1] It therefore contemplated the retrospective effect of the suspended order. If the order did not have retrospective effect, the past election could not be rendered invalid. (That said, the change in municipal boundaries would have necessitated a new election).

Matatiele II is an easy case because it explicitly states that the order could have retrospective effect. The difficult cases occur when the rationale for the Court's order is not based on a need to avoid disruption and the Court remains silent on retrospectivity. In Volks NO v Robinson,[2] a minority of the Court would have read-in words to extend the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act[3] to apply to permanent heterosexual life-partners. It would have suspended the order because it recognised that there were a number of ways the legislature could solve the problem. However, if the legislature had failed to attend to the matter, then one would expect that the order would have had the same limited retrospective effect that the Court has employed for other succession cases. The invalidity would apply to all estates that have not yet been finalised. In situations such as Volks, there is enough uncertainty to necessitate an application to the Court to clarify the position, but there is no principle that prevents suspended orders from acting retrospectively.[4]

(z) Calculating time periods

Considering the difficulty in getting periods of suspension extended,[5] it is necessary to know exactly how time periods are calculated. In Ex Parte Minister of Social Development, the Constitutional Court had to consider how time periods in suspension orders should be computed.[6] The relevant order of invalidity had been delivered on 6 September 2004 and suspended its effect for 18 months.[7] On 6 March 2006, the Minister applied for an order extending the period of suspension. The Court rejected the Minister's contention that a special form of computation of time should apply to suspensions of invalidity.[8] It held that ordinary

[1] Matatatiele II (supra) at para 96.
[2] 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC).
[3] Act 27 of 1990.
[4] Indeed, a principled approach would place the onus on the person disclaiming retrospectivity as orders are always retrospective unless specified otherwise. However, a practical approach seems more appropriate — at least until the Court provides greater clarity — and the person seeking retrospective application of a suspended order should apply to the Court to make it clear whether the order operates retrospectively or not.
[5] See § 9.4 (e) (i)(ee) infra.
[6] 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC).
[7] The declaration of invalidity emanated from the decision in Mashavha v President of the RSA. 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC).
[8] 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC) at paras 25–26.

common-law rules of computation of time should apply: the period would expire at the end of the day of the previous calendar day of the relevant month. In this case, the period would expire at midnight on 5 March 2006.[1]

(bb) When is suspension appropriate?

In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others — the first case in which the Constitutional Court considered (and rejected) the option of suspension — Sachs J foretold the Court's approach for the next 13 years:

> The words 'in the interests of justice and good government'[2] are widely phrased and, in my view, it would not be appropriate, particularly at this early stage, to attempt a precise definition of their ambit. They clearly indicate the existence of something substantially more than the mere inconvenience which will almost invariably accompany any declaration of invalidity, but do not go so far as to require the threat of total breakdown of government. Within these wide parameters, the Court will have to make an assessment on a case-by-case basis as to whether more injustice would flow from the legal vacuum created by rendering the statute invalid with immediate effect, than would be the case if the measure were kept functional pending rectification. No hard and fast rules can be applied.[3]

Although the Court operates on a case-by-case analysis, one can divine some common features in its suspension jurisprudence. In short, some factors support suspension and some factors do not.[4] In J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others, Goldstone articulated the primary components of the Court's inquiry:

> the Court must consider, on the one hand, the interests of the successful litigant in obtaining immediate constitutional relief and, on the other, the potential disruption of the administration of justice that would be caused by the lacuna.[5]

[1] Ex Parte Minister of Social Development (supra) at paras 23–24.

[2] Referring to IC s 98(5). The equivalent in the Final Constitution is s 172(2) which permits an order of suspension if it is 'just and equitable'.

[3] 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) at para 76 (footnote added). See also First National Bank v Land and Agricultural Bank 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC) at para 13 ('To suspend an order in terms of s 172(1)(b)(ii) it is required that the purpose served by the challenged statute outweighs the constitutional violation effected under its provisions'); I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 212 ('The possible detrimental effects of immediate invalidation must be compared against the detrimental effects of continued operation of the unconstitutional law or conduct. This involves a prediction. The court must determine whether a declaration of invalidity with immediate effect will result in a situation that is more inconsistent with the Constitution than the existing situation.' (Footnotes omitted.))

[4] In Mistry, 1the Court proposed the following list of factors: 'what the negative consequences for justice and good government of an immediately operational declaration of invalidity would be; why other existing measures would not be an adequate alternative stop-gap; what legislation on the subject, if any, is in the pipeline; and how much time would reasonably be required to adopt corrective legislation.' Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) at para 30. I have identified a few more factors and prefer to deal with the last two listed here as issues concerning the length of suspension, as that seems to be where they have their primary impact.

[5] 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 21.

This statement properly sets out the main elements of the test. There are, however, other factors that are also relevant.

(x) Factors in support of suspension

One: The most common and obvious use for a suspension order is when an immediate order of invalidity will create a lacuna in the law that would create uncertainty, administrative confusion or potential hardship.[1] For example, in S v Ntuli the Constitutional Court set aside legislation requiring that people appealing from the Magistrates' Court obtain a judge's certificate.[2] Because of the massive number of appeals that would ensue and the need to create structures to deal with those appeals, the Court suspended the order to allow for those structures to be created.[3] The Court in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Justice suspended a declaration lifting a ban on trade unions in the military to allow the Defence Force to create regulations.[4] It reasoned that immediate invalidity would be 'potentially harmful' and that regulations 'should assist in avoiding the disruption to discipline feared by the respondents and to ensure that labour relations develop in an orderly and constructive manner.'[5] In South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others, Chaskalson P held that the Special Investigating Unit that had been set up to investigate government corruption could not be headed by a judge.[6] He suspended the order so as not to disrupt the 'important work' being done by the Unit.[7]

[1] See Prince v President, Cape Law Society & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at para 86 (The minority — Ngcobo, Mokgoro and Sachs JJ and Madlanga AJ — would have required an exemption to legislation criminalizing cannabis for Rastafarians. They would have suspended the declaration because immediate invalidity 'would result in an uncontrolled use of cannabis and this will undermine the admittedly legitimate governmental goal of preventing the harmful effects of dependence-producing drugs and trafficking in those drugs'); Van Rooyen & Others v the State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 272 (Suspended invalidity of provision permitting ad hoc appointment of acting magistrates 'to permit temporary magistrates to be appointed when that is necessary pending an appropriate amendment to the section.' The concern apparently being that not permitting any magistrates to be appointed would be detrimental to the functioning of the Magistrates' Courts); Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 135 (Court concluded that Parliament did not have the power to amend municipal powers as it had usurped the powers of the Municipal Demarcation Board. It suspended the order because failing to do so would result in there being 'no mechanism for declaring district management areas.').

[2] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 27–28. See also S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC) at paras 45–46 (The Court invalidated the legislative response to Ntuli and again suspended the period to allow a new system to be implemented. The Court however granted a much shorter suspension period and coupled it with an interim order to regulate the situation in the meantime. Ibid at para 47.)

[4] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 42.

[6] 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)('Heath').

[7] Ibid at paras 49–50.

A variation of this motivation — not to disrupt important work or services — has been relied on to protect the holding of future elections and the validity of past elections. The Court in Executive Council of the Western Cape suspended an order to ensure that the first local government elections went ahead. It reasoned that even the possibility that the elections would be disrupted 'could lead to increased tension in areas where the inhabitants are anxious to democratise their local structures and to considerable waste of expenditure bearing in mind the preparations that are already under way and the steps that have been taken to lay the groundwork for such elections.'[1] In Matatiele II the Court also refused to invalidate elections. Had they done so there would have been 'no municipalities in the affected areas'. The absence of these municipalities would 'have serious implications for the provision of services in the affected areas.'[2]

An undesirable lacuna in the law does not necessarily exist merely because a power or requirement is removed: the remaining powers may well continue to give adequate effect to the purpose of the legislation.[3] Indeed, in the majority of the cases in which the issue has been considered, the Court has rejected claims that immediate invalidity will create a lacuna. In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, the Court held that the invalidation of imprisonment as an option to enforce civil debt collection could take immediate effect because the system of enforcing debts was not 'dependent upon the imprisonment sanction for its

[1] Heath (supra) at para 110 (Chaskalson P) and paras 158–159 (Ackermann & O'Regan JJ).

[2] Matatiele II (supra) at para 92.

[3] See Magajane v The Chairperson, Northwest Gambling Board 2006 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1133 (CC) at para 99 (The Court invalidated provisions permitting searches without warrant of unlicensed casinos. It held that the remaining search and inspection options were more than sufficient to fulfil the purpose of the Act); Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC) at para 44 (The Court invalidated a regulation requiring certain claimants from the Road Accident Fund to file an affidavit with the police within 14 days. It did not suspend the declaration as the purposes of the Act could be achieved without that requirement); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 38 (Invalidity of legislation banning public protest by soldiers not suspended because other regulations preventing acts causing 'actual or potential prejudice to good order and military discipline' catered for any gap); De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 106 (Declared legislation permitting non-judicial officers to imprison people who failed to answer questions at an insolvency inquiry unconstitutional because only judicial officers should have that power. Refused to suspend the order because the function could validly be performed by magistrates); Minister of Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick & Others 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (7) BCLR 713 (CC) at paras 35–36 (Order permitting foreign couples to adopt South African children not suspended because existing legislation and international law provided adequate safeguards to children); First National Bank (FNB) of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 123 (Invalidated legislation permitting the forfeiture to pay customs debts of property owned by people not responsible for the debt because those 'goods represent no more than a minute proportion of goods annually attached and its effect on the fiscus is negligible'); Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 41 (Court permitted homosexual and unmarried couples to adopt children because the upper guardianship of the High Court provided sufficient safeguards.)

viability' and there were 'a number of other aids to judgment debt collection in the system.'[1] That was also the reasoning in Case v Minister of Safety and Security.[2] The Court struck down laws prohibiting the possession of obscene material for being overbroad. It refused to suspend the order because there was sufficient other legislation prohibiting the dealing in various forms of obscene and indecent material.[3] A final example is Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: in Re S v Walters and Another.[4] The Walters Court invalidated s 49(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act[5] which permitted the use of lethal force to effect an arrest or prevent a suspect from fleeing. The Court found it unnecessary to suspend the order because the surviving s 49(1) provided the police with sufficient powers to effect arrests.[6] All these cases indicate that the Court will scrutinize very closely any allegation that invalidity will create a gap in the law.

Two: Suspension may also be appropriate where multiple legislative cures to the constitutional defect exist.[7] This rationale is based on the separation of powers doctrine. It is for the legislature, not the judiciary, to make policy decisions where the Final Constitution does not require a particular outcome.[8] In Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, the Court had invalidated a provision that did not require the consent of fathers of children born-out-of-wedlock for their adoption.[9] When determining the remedy, Mahomed DP found that there were 'multifarious and nuanced legislative responses which might be available to the legislature in meeting these issues' and that it was therefore 'in the interests of justice and good government that there should be proper legislation to regulate' the situation.[10] The Court suspended the order for two years notwithstanding the

[1] 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee') at para 18.
[2] 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC).
[3] Ibid at paras 84–86 (Mokgoro J, concurred in this part by the majority).
[4] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters').
[5] Act 51 of 1977.
[6] Walters (supra) at para 76.
[7] See Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC) at para 69 (Van der Westhuizen J suspended an order invalidating the assignment of the payment of social grants to the provinces because the whole social payment grant needed to be 'unified' which was a 'Herculean task' requiring legislative action); South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC) at para 103 (Order invalidating legislation regulating membership of Military Arbitration Boards who determine union disputes suspended because there were so many ways that the legislation could be constitutionally constituted); S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force and Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC) at paras 125–126 (O'Regan and Sachs JJ, in dissent, would have found that a law criminalizing only the prostitute and not her client was unfairly discriminatory. Because the constitutional defect was not based on the right to privacy, decriminalization was not the only option available to the legislature. It could also choose to criminalize prostitution without discriminating. They therefore would have suspended the invalidity.)
[8] See generally S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.
[9] 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)('Fraser').
[10] Ibid at para 50.

fact that this suspension would deny the applicant the relief he sought.[1] Similar concerns motivated the Court to suspend the order in Dawood.[2] The Dawood Court had invalidated, as a violation of the right to dignity, a provision which limited the right of foreign spouses of South African citizens to reside in South Africa while seeking permanent residence status. O'Regan J reasoned:

> There are a range of possibilities that the legislature may adopt to cure the unconstitutionality. For example, the legislature may decide that it is not necessary for foreign spouses of persons permanently and lawfully resident in South Africa to possess valid temporary residence permits while their applications for immigration permits are being processed. Another alternative would be for the legislature to provide an exhaustive list of circumstances that it considers would permit an official justifiably to refuse to grant a temporary permit. There are almost certainly other alternatives as well. Where, as in the present case, a range of possibilities exists, and the Court is able to afford appropriate interim relief to affected persons, it will ordinarily be appropriate to leave the legislature to determine in the first instance how the unconstitutionality should be cured. This Court should be slow to make those choices which are primarily choices suitable for the legislature.[3]

The italicised portion of the above quote indicates a slight departure from the approach under Fraser. The existence of legislative choice on its own should not, it would seem, justify suspension where continued validity would have an ongoing deleterious effect on the applicant's constitutional rights. In such circumstances, other concerns must justify a suspension — such as the possibility of service disruption or the need to protect the threatened rights.[4]

The difference in approach appears to be the basis for the disagreement within the Court regarding the appropriate order in Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie.[5] In Fourie, the Court held that the common law and legislation preventing same-sex couples from marrying was unconstitutional and read-in words to cure the defect. However, the majority of the Court decided to suspend the invalidity for one year. It did so not because immediate invalidity would create a gap in the law, but because there was a limited range of choices as to exactly how same-sex couples could be accommodated.[6] But if we take Dawood seriously, the presence of an array of legislative choices should not, on its own, justify a suspension without interim relief. This recognition might have prompted Sachs J to put forward two additional justifications: (a) legislation would ostensibly provide a more solid foundation for the change in the law and would lessen the likelihood

[1] Fraser (supra) at para 51.
[2] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others ; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC).
[3] Ibid at paras 64–65.
[4] For more on interim orders, see § 9.4*(e)(i)*(cc) infra.
[5] 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').
[6] Ibid at para 139.

of an alteration of the law in the future;[1] and (b) on such a contentious social issue, a change in the law would be viewed as more legitimate if it was initiated by the legislature rather than the courts:

> The right to celebrate their union accordingly signifies far more than a right to enter into a legal arrangement with many attendant and significant consequences, important though they may be. It represents a major symbolical milestone in their long walk to equality and dignity. The greater and more secure the institutional imprimatur for their union, the more solidly will it and other such unions be rescued from legal oblivion, and the more tranquil and enduring will such unions ultimately turn out to be.[2]

These justifications have not been used before or since Fourie to justify suspension. The justifications appear to turn on the Court's awareness that same-sex marriage was extremely unpopular in South Africa. It is difficult to imagine that the Court would have felt it necessary to suspend the order if the majority of citizens were overwhelmingly in favour of permitting same-sex couples to marry.

O'Regan J dissented on the issue of suspension. She reasoned as follows. Given that the definition of marriage was found in the common law and that the common law remains within the accepted purview of the courts,[3] that the choices available to Parliament were very limited,[4] that it was important to provide individual relief,[5] and that Parliament always retained the power to amend the position later,[6] the order should have had immediate effect.[7] O'Regan J was correct not to take the majority's reliance on legislative choice seriously. The 'guidelines' the majority provided offered Parliament little space for choice. Justice Sachs wrote that the new law must not 'create equal disadvantage for all'[8] and must also be 'as generous and accepting towards same-sex couples as it is to heterosexual couples, both in terms of the intangibles as well as the tangibles involved.'[9] It is difficult to think of any remedy other than granting homosexuals all the benefits of marriage and calling the new institution of homosexual union 'marriage' that would satisfy these criteria. The justification for the remedy in Fourie relies entirely on an alleged need for stability and greater public acceptance. Ordinarily, such ground would not justify a suspension of invalidity. However, because the effect of suspension in Fourie was only to delay, not permanently deny, the applicants' rights, these weak justifications may be defensible, if not terribly convincing.

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 136–137.
[2] Ibid at para 137. See also ibid at para 138.
[3] Ibid at para 167.
[4] Ibid at para 168.
[5] Ibid at para 170.
[6] Ibid at para 168.
[7] Ibid at para 173.
[8] Ibid at para 149.
[9] Ibid at para 153.

Three: If the deficiency found in the law is purely procedural, the Court may suspend the order to give the legislature a chance to pass new legislation according to the proper procedures and to avoid a gap in the legal system. In Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others,[1] the Court invalidated two entire pieces of legislation — the Traditional Health Practitioners Act[2] and the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Amendment Act[3] — because of a failure by the National Council of Provinces to facilitate public involvement. It suspended the order of invalidity for the following reasons: 'Members of the public may have already taken steps to regulate their conduct in accordance with these statutes. An order of invalidity that takes immediate effect will be disruptive'.[4] It would be particularly disruptive to remove the existing legal framework only to have that framework return when Parliament passed the legislation again with the correct procedure.

(y) Factors against suspension

There is always a presumption against suspension. In the absence of any of the factors discussed above, suspension will not be granted. The two factors mentioned here will only become relevant if some of the factors favouring suspension are also present.

Perhaps the primary factor which weighs against granting a suspension is the importance of the right at issue to the constitutional scheme, or the extent of the violation of the right.[5] Kriegler J in Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa held that even if immediate invalidity of the system of imprisonment for civil debt would 'lead to a break down of the whole debt collection procedure' the order could not be suspended because civil imprisonment 'is so clearly inconsistent with the right to freedom protected by [IC] section 11(1) and so manifestly indefensible under section 33(1) of the [Interim] Constitution that there is no warrant for its retention, even temporarily.'[6] In Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others, the Court likewise rejected the option of suspending an order

[1] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life').
[2] Act 35 of 2004.
[3] Act 38 of 2004.
[4] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 214.
[5] See, for example, S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 30 (Suspension of reverse onus provision for cannabis possession would result in possibly innocent people being convicted); S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC) at para 30 (Suspension inappropriate because the provision — which created a reverse onus for arms possession — was 'not only manifestly unconstitutional, but [would] also result[ ] in grave consequences for potentially innocent persons in view of the serious penalties prescribed') De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 106 ('It would . . . be unconscionable to continue to allow persons to be committed to prison unconstitutionally in the future.')
[6] Coetzee (supra) at para 18.

invalidating the customary-law rule of primogeniture.[1] Langa DCJ's sole justification was that '[t]he rights implicated are [so] important … [that] those subject to the impugned provisions should not be made to wait much longer to be relieved of the burden of inequality and unfair discrimination'.[2] Of course, if the suspension will not result in further violations of the rights in question, then the severity of the past violation loses its relevance.[3]

However, the value of the right at issue is not always decisive. In Moseneke & Others v The Master of the High Court & Another, the Court was confronted with perhaps the most flagrant violation of the Final Constitution: a statue that created different procedures for the administration of the estates of Black people.[4] The Court acknowledged that the law was 'manifestly racist', made 'invidious and wounding distinctions on grounds of race'[5] and was part of 'a law which was a pillar of "the past of a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice"'.[6] Despite the odious aspects of the law, it suspended the order of invalidity because the law had become 'encrusted with processes of great practical, day-to-day importance to a large number of people' and immediate invalidity would cause 'undue dislocation and hardship'.[7] It was necessary for the legislature to create a new system. However, in line with the reasoning in Dawood, the Court did draft an interim order to protect individuals against the 'continuing indignity of racist treatment'.[8]

Two: The Court will be very reluctant to grant suspension if it has previously granted a suspension on the same or similar issue. In S v Steyn[9] the Court had to consider the legislature's attempt to remedy the provisions declared unconstitutional several years earlier in S v Ntuli.[10] The state had failed to make use of the suspension granted in Ntuli and had enacted new provisions after that period expired[11] which failed to take account of the Court's judgments and again limited accused persons' right to appeal. Somyalo AJ expressed the Court's extreme displeasure at the state's conduct and made it clear that their continued failure to mend the situation weighed against granting another suspension:

[1] 2005 (1) SA 563 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[2] Ibid at para 108.

[3] See South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 50 (Noting that the damage to the independence of the judiciary had already been caused and would not be substantially worsened by a suspension of invalidity.)

[4] 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 25.

[6] Ibid at para 26 quoting the epilogue to the Interim Constitution.

[7] Ibid at para 26.

[8] Ibid at para 27.

[9] 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC)('Steyn').

[10] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC).

[11] See Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC)(The state applied for an extension of the suspension period in Ntuli which the Court refused. For more detail, see § 9.4*(e)(i)*(ee) infra.)

> [Suspension] by no means sanctions tolerance for that which has already been adjudged inconsistent with the Constitution. Even in the face of this Court's suspension of an order of invalidity, it is imperative that obligations imposed by the Constitution remain. Any unconstitutionality must be cured "diligently and without delay".[1]

In such circumstances the Court will not necessarily refuse to order suspension altogether, it is more likely, as the Court concluded in Steyn, to affect the length of the suspension.[2] In S v Shinga — the most recent (and hopefully final) case in the saga of Magistrate's Court appeals — Yacoob J did not even mention the possibility of suspension.[3] This silence might be a direct result of the states continuous failure to make good on previous suspensions.[4] Related issues, such as whether new legislation is in the pipeline, might also affect the court's determination. However, even pipeline legislation is only likely to affect the length of the period of suspension.[5]

(cc) Interim orders

I have, in the preceding discussion, referred to the possibility of granting an interim remedy during the period of suspension to diminish the continued violation of rights. It is a power that the Court has exercised fairly regularly and a practice that, in my view, should be expanded even further. These interim orders fall into two broad categories: those orders that establish guidelines for the exercise of a power and those orders that read-in words to the statute.

The Court first granted an interim order in Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs.[6] The Dawood Court held that s 25(9) of the Aliens Control Act[7] violated the right to dignity because it gave officials the discretion to refuse to grant a temporary residence permit to the spouse of a South African Citizen without giving any guidance as to how that discretion should be exercised. The Court held that a suspension was necessary because there were a number of options open to the legislature on how to regulate the issue in the future. However, O'Regan J then noted that the Court should also 'ensure that appropriate relief is provided to the successful litigants in this case, and to those who are situated similarly to those litigants in the meantime.'[8] She therefore included a mandamus

[1] Steyn (supra) at para 45. See also South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at paras 40–42 (Noted that the Defence Force's tardiness in remedying the constitutional defect weighed against suspension, but still granted a very short 3-month suspension.)

[2] For more, see § 9.4*(e)(i)*(dd) infra.

[3] 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC).

[4] The Court did however suspend the order for two weeks under the misleading heading of 'retrospectivity'.

[5] See Walters (supra) at para 76 (Refuses suspension in part because there was legislation 'in the wings' that could be put into effect in a matter of days.)

[6] 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood').

[7] Act 96 of 1991.

[8] Dawood (supra) at para 66 (footnote omitted).

in the order that required the relevant officials, when exercising their discretion, to consider the constitutional rights of the applicants and only to refuse the permit if 'good cause' was shown.[1] Justice O'Regan maintained that this order constituted a limited interference with the legislative power to provide guidance to decision-makers, and, therefore, that it was 'the best way in which to avoid usurping the function of the legislature on the one hand without shirking our constitutional responsibility to protect constitutional rights on the other.'[2]

The reasoning and approach in Dawood was followed soon after in, amongst other cases,[3] Janse van Rensburg v Minister of Trade and Industry.[4] The challenged provision permitted the Minister to issue orders to stay or prevent unfair business practices. The Court concluded that it was unconstitutional because it did not provide the Minister with any guidance on how to exercise her powers. The Court suspended the order of invalidity. At the same time, it provided detailed guidelines on how the Minister should exercise her discretion until new legislation was enacted.[5] It stressed that the guidelines were not meant to inform any future legislative enactments. The order merely regulated the exercise of executive discretion in the intervening period.[6] The Court also used an interim remedy in S v Steyn.[7] The decision had a long history as the Court had previously declared similar provisions regulating appeals from the Magistrates' Court unconstitutional. Although Madlanga AJ agreed to give the legislature one last chance to remedy the defect, he held that it was 'necessary to ameliorate the adverse effects of the leave to appeal and petition procedure' in the interim.[8] These procedures required the clerk of the Magistrates Court to provide the High Court with the record of the case in certain circumstances. The final order reads more like a piece of legislation in the way it identifies when a record is required and went far further than the Court would have gone if they had altered the law through a permanent reading-in.[9]

[1] Dawood (supra) at para 67.

[2] Ibid at para 68.

[3] See also Booysen & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)(In a very similar case to Dawood — this time involving work permits — the Court gave an order in terms comparable to that in Dawood.); Volks NO v Robinson 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC) at paras 136 and 216–218 (Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ as well as Sachs J, in dissent, would have suspended an order invalidating the restriction of maintenance to surviving spouses only to married couples because 'the discrimination we have found may be cured by the Legislature in a variety of ways and that those ways need not be identical to the manner in which marriages are currently regulated.' The minority would, like the Dawood Court, have provided an interim solution.)

[4] 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC).

[5] Ibid at paras 29–36.

[6] Ibid at para 30.

[7] 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC).

[8] Ibid at para 47.

[9] See also Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)(The Court struck down laws permitting farmers to sell livestock that wandered onto their property. Ngcobo J crafted detailed interim procedures that would protect stockowners from having their livestock sold without their knowledge. Like Steyn, the procedures read more like legislation than a court order)

The second class of cases — where the Court alters the wording of the legislation — needs to be properly understood. As I noted earlier,[1] the Court has expressed the opinion that reading-in (or severance or notional severance) and suspension should be mutually exclusive.[2] This statement is not compatible with the Court's interim remedies jurisprudence. Why the discrepancy? When a court reads in as an interim measure, it has already found that reading-in as a permanent solution is inappropriate and suspension is necessary (normally because of the range of possible solutions). Nonetheless, it concludes that until the legislature gets around to deciding which of the many options it prefers, a stop-gap measure is required. The temporary reading-in is not an ultimate cure for the constitutional defect. Conceived as such, temporary reading-in does not violate the principle requiring reading-in rather than suspension.

The two examples of this practice are Moseneke v The Master of the High Court[3] and South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board & Others.[4] In Moseneke the Court invalidated the sections of the Black Administration Act that provided for the estates of Black people to be administered by Magistrates, while white estates were dealt with by the Master of the High Court. As explained earlier, the Court suspended the order because of the practical value of the procedure. In the interim, it ordered that black people should be able to choose whether their estates would be governed by the Magistrates or the High Court. To accomplish this end, it ordered that the word 'shall' in the relevant section should be read as 'may' for the duration of the suspension.[5]

South African Liquor Traders offers an even more extreme example of the extent of the Court's interim remedial powers. The Court struck down as vague and irrational provincial legislation which limited the amount of beer that shebeens could sell to '10 cases' without specifying the period within which those cases must be sold. The Court deemed it necessary to suspend the order to allow the Gauteng Legislature to attend to the problem, but also concluded it necessary to provide some interim regulation because it would be inconsistent with the rule of law to leave in force a provision that was meaningless.[6] Based on the evidence before it, it concluded that most shebeens sold approximately 60 cases of beer per week and ordered that during the suspension period, the legislation and all licenses issued under it, should be read accordingly.[7]

[1] See § 9.4*(d)*(iii) supra.

[2] J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 21.

[3] 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC)('Moseneke').

[4] 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC)('South African Liquor Traders').

[5] Moseneke (supra) at para 27. In some sense this is more of a reading down than a reading-in because the word is not replaced, but 'read as'. However, it would not make sense for it to be a reading down because then there would be no reason for it not to be permanent. However it is classified, the order remains a good example of the possibilities of interim relief.

[6] South African Liquor Traders (supra) at para 41.

[7] Ibid at paras 43–45.

The usefulness of both categories of interim remedies is obvious. It permits the Court to have the best of both worlds — deferring ultimately to the legislature, but providing interim relief to the litigants and other similarly situated persons. Because they are only stop-gap measures that do not permanently interfere with the law, the Court feels free to go further than it might were the judgment to require permanent reading-in of potentially contentious wording or the fashioning of quite detailed procedures to guide the executive. Such flexible 'new tools' can be used to vindicate rights without interfering with other remedial goals. An interim remedy could, for example, have been productively employed in Fraser to prevent the applicant's child from being adopted without his consent.[1]

Of course, interim remedies will not always be helpful. I tend to agree with Justice Sachs that an interim remedy would not have served any purpose in Fourie. The very reason to suspend the invalidity was to find a permanent solution to the problem.[2] It would also not have helped in cases like Matatiele[3] or Doctors for Life[4] where the purpose of the suspension was to allow the legislature to craft a remedy for a procedural defect.

(dd) The Period of Suspension

The period for which the Constitutional Court suspends a declaration of invalidity varies widely from two weeks[5] to 18 months.[6] The majority of suspensions range from 12 to 18 months. The Court has not constructed any rules in this regard, nor would it have been wise for it do so. Each case should be judged on its merits. Generally, the relevant factors for determining the period of suspension are: the government's previous conduct;[7] whether there is any legislation in the pipeline or how long it will take to draft new legislation if there is not;[8] and the nature and severity of the continuing infringement. The onus is on the government to provide the court with the information necessary for it to make a reasoned decision. In addition, courts should remember that suspension is always a departure from the standard position that remedies for violations of constitutional rights should be immediate. Courts should always, therefore, adopt the shortest feasible time period for suspension.[9]

[1] For example, the Court could have read-in words permitting the Children's Court to depart from the general rule that paternal consent was unnecessary on application by the father.

[2] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at paras 154–155.

[3] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the RSA & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele II').

[4] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life').

[5] S v Shinga 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC).

[6] See, for example, Doctors for Life (supra); Matatiele II (supra).

[7] Steyn (supra) at para 46.

[8] Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) at para 30.

[9] See K Roach & G Budlender 'Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When is it Appropriate, Just and Equitable?' (2005) 122 SALJ 325, 340–341.

(ee) Can suspension be extended?

On three occasions the State has applied to the Constitutional Court for an extension of the period of suspension in order to enact the provisions that would remedy a constitutional flaw. These three cases paint a fairly clear picture of when an extension will be granted, and when it will not.

In Minister of Justice v Ntuli the Minister applied for an 'extension' of the period after the original period had expired.[1] The Court pointed out that as the period had already expired, the Minister was in reality asking for a revival of the suspension. The Court expressed severe doubts as to whether such a revival was possible.[2] However, while the Ntuli Court assumed that there might be exceptional cases where such an order was possible, given the lassitude of the Minister and the minimal effect of the order of invalidity, the Court decided that the instant matter was not an appropriate case for such an order.[3]

In Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others, the Minster asked for an extension of suspension before the expiry of the original period.[4] The Constitutional Court held that it had not only the power, but an obligation under FC s 172(1) to extend the period, if it would be just and equitable on the facts of the case.[5] Ngcobo J emphasised, however, that the power only existed for as long as the original suspension period lasted.[6] While noting that in the interests of finality extending a period of suspension was a power that should be 'very sparingly exercised', it was ultimately a question of what relief was just and equitable.[7] Factors relevant to that decision included > the sufficiency of the explanation for failure to comply with the original period of suspension; the potentiality of prejudice being sustained if the period of suspension were extended or not extended; the prospects of complying with the deadline; the need to bring litigation to finality; and the need to promote the constitutional project and prevent chaos.[8]

The Zondi Court found that the case satisfied these criteria and that it was therefore appropriate to extend the suspension period.

Ex Parte Minister of Social Development is the final case in the trilogy.[9] In Mashava v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Court had set aside a [1] 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC)('Ntuli').

[2] Ibid at para 26 ('The construction suggested by counsel for the Minister would enable a Court to revive a statute which it had previously declared to be invalid. If such an unusual power had been intended, I would have thought that it would be expressed in language much clearer than that which has been used, and that there would at least be some indication of the circumstances which would have to exist to justify the exercise of the power.')

[3] Ibid at paras 35–39.

[4] 2006 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 423 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 39. The Court considered that it might also have the power under FC s 173 which gives the Court the power to regulate its own process. However, it found it unnecessary to decide the question.

[6] Ibid at paras 40 and 43.

[7] Ibid at paras 46–47.

[8] Ibid at para 47.

[9] 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC)('Ex Parte Minister of Social Development').

presidential proclamation that provided for the payment of social grants and suspended the order for 18 months. The Minister lodged an application the day before the period expired and the case was heard on the day the order expired. The effect of the Mashava order coming into force would be the absence of legal authority for the state to pay social grants.[1] The Court, though not unmindful of the hardship this lacuna in the law might cause, correctly confirmed what had been implicit in Ntuli and Zondi : a court has no power to revive an invalid law.[2] According to van der Westhuizen J

> There are important reasons of constitutional principle underlying the conclusion that a court is not empowered to resuscitate legislation that has been declared invalid. To do so, a court would in effect legislate. Such an exercise would offend both the separation of powers principle in terms of which law-making powers are reserved for the legislature, and the principle of constitutional supremacy which renders law that is inconsistent with the Constitution invalid.[3]

While clearly not wanting to encourage that the grants be paid without legal authority, the Court suggested that there might be other means to ensure that people received their grants.[4]

(ii) Retrospectivity

While the power to suspend an order of invalidity allows courts to determine the impact of the order on the future, the power to limit the retrospective effect permits regulation of the order's consequences for the past. Of course, the regulation of the past is only interesting because it affects the present. The retrospective effect of an order of invalidity can determine whether people remain in jail, receive inheritances, or are able to bring claims for damages. It may also determine whether subordinate legislation or executive action taken under an invalid law shares its fate.

In this section I describe, first, the default position for the retrospective application of laws and the variety of mechanisms a court can employ to regulate the retrospective effect of an order. Second, I discuss the reasons that may motivate a court to depart from that default position. Thirdly, and finally, I criticise the Court's approach to retrospectivity as overly cautious.

(aa) Mechanics of Retrospectivity

This section first explains how retrospectivity operates in the absence of any order by a court. It then briefly considers the various ways in which a court can limit retrospectivity.

[1] Ex Parte Minister of Social Development (supra) at paras 18–19.
[2] Ibid at para 38.
[3] Ibid at para 39.
[4] Ibid at paras 45–46.

(x) The Default Position

The retrospectivity provisions of the Final Constitution differ markedly from those in the Interim Constitution. Under s 98(6) of the Interim Constitution,[1] a distinction was drawn between pre- and post-constitutional law. A declaration of constitutional invalidity of a law existing when the Interim Constitution was adopted (pre-constitutional law) would not operate retrospectively and therefore would not invalidate acts performed under the invalid law, unless the Constitutional Court ordered otherwise.[2] However, an order invalidating post-constitutional law would ordinarily — again, unless the Constitutional Court ordered otherwise — operate retrospectively and thus invalidate all acts performed in terms of that law. The reason for this distinction was explained in Executive Council, Western Cape as follows: 'The former are an inheritance from the past. The latter are the actions of a Legislature in a constitutional State and special circumstances must exist to justify a decision by the Court to give validity to such legislation.'[3]

The Final Constitution differs from the Interim Constitution in three important ways. Ackermann J identified these differences in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice.[4] First, the Final Constitution draws no distinction between pre- and post-constitutional laws. This understanding follows from viewing the Interim Constitution as responsible for governance during a specific transition period which followed directly after apartheid. After the three-year

[1] IC s 98(6) read:
Unless the Constitutional Court in the interests of justice and good government orders otherwise, and save to the extent that it orders, the declaration of invalidity of a law or a provision thereof-
(a) existing at the commencement of this Constitution, shall not invalidate anything done or permitted in terms thereof before the coming into effect of such declaration of invalidity; or
(b) passed after such commencement, shall invalidate everything done or permitted in terms thereof.

[2] IC s 98(6)(a).

[3] Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 108. See also Women's Legal Centre, Ex p: In re Moise v Greater Germiston TLC 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 13. This fails to fully explain the distinction. There is no reason why an 'inheritance from the past' — and a racist and totalitarian past at that — should have ensured validity for even one day after the enactment of the Interim Constitution. The missing piece of the puzzle from the Court's explanation would seem to be that retrospective application to pre-constitutional laws would cause greater disruption to 'the interests of justice and good government'. But that too seems to be wrong; the impact of retrospective application depends primarily on the nature of the law in question, not on when it was enacted. However, one could reasonably have drafted the Interim Constitution in the opposite way so that pre-constitutional law was presumed to be retrospectively invalid and post-constitutional law was not. It could be argued that the Interim Constitution was meant to be a break from the past from the moment of its enactment and that it should therefore immediately invalidate all the existing (pre-constitutional) laws that violated its terms. Post-constitutional laws, on the other hand, are the work of a democratically elected legislature and should be afforded more deference by limiting the retrospective impact of orders invalidating them.

[4] 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Justice') at para 84.

buffer the Interim Constitution provided, the majority of unconstitutional apartheid-era laws should have been removed and the continued existence of any such laws could be made the responsibility of the new legislature that has failed to repeal them.

Second, and most importantly, if no ancillary order is made, an order of invalidity under the Final Constitution is automatically retrospective to either: (a) 4 February 1997 — the day the Final Constitution came into effect — if the law existed on that date; or (b) the date the law came into force if it was enacted after the Final Constitution. This position is based both on the wording of FC s 172(1)(b)(i) and the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality.[1] FC s 172(1)(b)(i) grants courts the power to 'limit the retrospective effect of [a] declaration of invalidity'. The implication must be that if they do not exercise that power, the declaration has full retrospective effect. The doctrine of objective unconstitutionality was first enunciated in Ferreira v Levin NO[2] and states — in part — that all pre-existing unconstitutional laws were automatically invalidated the moment the Final Constitution came into effect and all post-Constitutional laws that violate the Constitution were automatically invalid from the moment they are enacted. 'The Court's order' the Ferreira Court tells us, 'does not invalidate the law; it merely declares it to be invalid.'[3]

The automatic retrospectivity of orders was at issue in Ex Parte Women's Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston TLC.[4] In an earlier case[5] the Court had issued a declaration of invalidity without saying anything about the retrospective effect of its order. The amicus in the original case brought an application for the Court to clarify the retrospective effect of its order. Kriegler J, for the Court, held that there was no need for clarification: 'Because the order … [was] silent on the question of limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration, the declaration was retrospective to the moment the Constitution came into effect. That is when the inconsistency arose. As a matter of law the provision has been a nullity since that date.'[6] This holding is important. The Court often does not mention

[1] For more on the theory of objective unconstitutionality, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). Although Ferreira was decided under the Interim Constitution, the Court has held that the doctrine is equally applicable under the Final Constitution. See Ex Parte Women's Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston TLC 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at para 12; Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 39.

[3] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 27.

[4] 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC)('Women's Legal Centre').

[5] Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC)(The case held that a 1970 statute that required a plaintiff suing a local government to issue notice of her intention to sue within 90 days of the debt becoming due violated the FC s 34 right of access to court.) For more on FC s 34, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[6] Women's Legal Centre (supra) at para 13.

retrospectivity in cases where it may seem that the retrospective effect of an order would be undesirable. Women's Legal Centre makes it plain that there is no need for doubt in these cases: the orders are fully retrospective.

A question that is not answered by the constitutional text is the retrospective effect of orders that develop the common law in terms of FC s 39(2) rather than declare it invalid in terms of FC s 172. It seems that, under the Interim Constitution, and for current developments that do not rely on the Final Constitution, the common law is presumed to be developed retrospectively. In the words of Kentridge AJ in Du Plessis v De Klerk :

> In our Courts a judgment which brings about a radical alteration in the common law as previously understood proceeds upon the legal fiction that the new rule has not been made by the Court but merely 'found', as if it had always been inherent in the law. Nor do our Courts distinguish between cases which have arisen before, and those which arise after, the new rule has been announced. For this reason it is sometimes said that 'Judge-made law' is retrospective in its operation.[1]

Of course, as Kentridge AJ went on to note,[2] and as the Court later held in Masiya,[3] courts are entitled to depart from this starting point. The standard — discussed in the next paragraph — for limiting retrospectivity should not be any different under FC s 39(2) than under FC s 172: the order should be 'just and equitable'. However, in Masiya, Nkabinde J states that prospective development will only be appropriate in 'rare cases'.[4] To the extent that Nkanbinde's statement suggests a higher bar for prospective development as opposed to retrospective application in FC s 39(2) cases, it should be ignored. There is, in this context, no meaningful distinction between development and invalidity.

A similar question is the retrospective effect of 'reading down' a provision. The Court explicitly left the question open in Daniels v Campbell NO.[5] It has not yet answered it. Despite the Court's reluctance to address the issue, it seems that the normal rule should apply: the interpretation is presumptively fully retrospective, but it can be limited. There is no reason why a court should have the power to limit the retrospective effect of an order of invalidity, but not have the same power when adopting a new interpretation. Indeed, courts would be well advised

[1] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('Du Plessis') at para 65 quoted with approval (and therefore still law under the Final Constitution) in Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies & Another, Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC)('Masiya') at para 48.

[2] Du Plessis (supra) at para 65.

[3] Masiya (supra) at para 48.

[4] Ibid at para 51.

[5] Daniels v Campbell & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC) at para 38 ('It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to deal with the possible retrospective effect of upholding the appeal. No pronouncement is made on whether in the absence of a declaration of invalidity, this Court is empowered to limit the retrospective effect of the declaration. Should problems concerning retrospectivity arise, they stand to be dealt with on a case by case basis.') to address the issue as soon as they adopt a new interpretation — and force the parties, particularly the government — to supply them with the necessary information to do so — rather than waiting for problems to arise and forcing the courts and other parties to undertake further costly and time-consuming litigation to solve them.

The third difference under the Final Constitution from the position under the Interim Constitution is noted in NCGLE v Minister of Justice.[1] Under IC s 98(6), retrospective effect could be altered if it was 'in the interests of justice and good government'. The same power under the Final Constitution is part of the court's general 'just and equitable' remedial discretion. Because the Interim Constitution's formulation requires that the order be in the interests of justice and of 'good government' it is much narrower than the broad discretion afforded to courts by the phrase 'just and equitable'.[2] Although in many cases what is 'just and equitable' will also be what is 'in the interests of justice and good government', there will be other cases where it is not. The change in wording seems to imply that there may be cases where retrospectivity need not be limited, even if it is in the interests of good government. Why? Again, the litigation may raise other concerns — such as the rights of individuals — that are more important. I argue below that the Court has failed to account of this important alteration.

A final difference between the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution — noted by the Court in S v Ntsele[3] — is that all courts are empowered to make orders affecting retrospectivity under the Final Constitution. Under the Interim Constitution, only the Constitutional Court exercised such powers. In Ntsele, Kriegler J stressed the importance of lower courts considering the issue of retrospectivity because (a) their reasoning would aid the Constitutional Court when deciding whether to confirm the order; and (b) the order would often depend on the evidence led and the trial court is generally in the best position to evaluate the evidence and to request more evidence if necessary.[4]

(y) Ways to limit the default position

An order limiting retrospectivity can take two main forms. It can limit the date from which it operates, or it can limit the type of people or cases to which the order applies. Thus far, the Court, when limiting retrospectivity based on a date, has made its orders applicable from the date of judgment and therefore effectively given the order no retrospective effect. However, there is no reason why the Court could not choose a date in the past and thus make the order applicable to a relatively short period before the judgment. It is, however, an unusual case in which that kind of remedy would be prefferable to an order that is limited to certain classes of cases or people.

[1] See NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at paras 84 and 92–94.
[2] For more on the meaning of 'just and equitable', see § 9.2*(e)(i)* supra.
[3] 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC) at para 12.
[4] Ibid at para 13.

Masiya is a good example of an order with prospective effect only. The Court developed the common-law definition of rape to include non-consensual anal penetration of women and, in order not to retrospectively create a crime, ordered that the development would only apply prospectively from the date of the order.[1] People who anally penetrated a woman before the date Masiya was handed down would be guilty of indecent assault. Those persons who committed the same act after the judgment would be guilty of rape.

In some situations, an order based solely on a date will not cover all those cases that the court wishes the order to cover and exclude all those cases that the court does not want the order to affect. In such circumstance, the court will specify the types of cases or people to which the order applies. For example, in S v Bhulwana O'Regan J held that her order invalidating a reverse onus provision would only apply to cases that had not yet been finally decided on appeal, or where an appeal could still be noted.[2] This common construction has been adopted by the Court in other cases concerning reverse-onus provisions,[3] statutory time bars[4] and crime-creating provisions.[5] I will call this type of order: 'the finalised cases order'.

The Court had to create an even more detailed remedy to address the difficulties posed by invalidating provisions dealing with succession. The first attempt came in Brink v Kitshoff NO. In Brink, the Court applied its order invalidating gender discriminatoy provisions retrospectively to all estates, but exempted payments that had been made in terms of the invalidated provisions.[6] In Bhe Langa DCJ constructed an even more narrowly tailored solution.[7] The Court had invalidated the customary law rule, and accompanying legislation, that provided for male primogeniture. But it did not want to invalidate transfers that had already been made, provided they were made in good faith — ie, that they were not made while the beneficiary was aware of the court challenge to the rules of primogeniture. Accordingly, the order did not apply to estates that had already been wound up, unless the beneficiary had been aware of the pending decision in Bhe.[8] The Court adopted the same construction when it expanded the Intestate Succession Act to apply to homosexual partners.[9]

[1] Masiya (supra) at paras 47–57. See also Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In Re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC).

[2] 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC).at paras 33–34.

[3] See, for example, S v Coetzee 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) at para 52.

[4] Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC) at para 26; Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering Gauteng & Andere 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC) at para 11; Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund & Another 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC) at paras 45 and 47.

[5] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra).

[6] 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC).

[7] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SA Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 563 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

[8] Ibid at paras 126–127 and 136.

[9] Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC)('Gory') at paras 32–42 (Applying the same remedy to an invalidation of provisions of the Intestate Succession Act which prevented same-sex life partners from inheriting from each other.)

As Bhe suggests, there is virtually no limit to the manner in which a court may phrase an order limiting retrospective effect. Courts should not be afraid to craft innovative and detailed retrospective orders that catch all the people — and only those people — to whom it would be just and equitable to apply the order. However, although courts have a wide discretion, the Constitutional Court has explicitly rejected the possibility of reaching back into the past to aid a single litigant and deny the same benefits to others who are similarly situated. In Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council, the Court struck down a law that permitted searches of medical professionals' homes and offices in unconstitutionally broad terms.[1] Sachs J gave the order only prospective effect. Indeed, the Court refused to come to the aid even of the applicant in the case who had gone 'to the trouble and expense of launching constitutional litigation' because making 'an order reaching selectively back into the past simply to come to the aid of one successful litigant without affording such relief to "all people who are in the same situation as the [litigant]" would "result in a denial of equal protection of the law [and would] raise considerations of legal certainty".'[2] However, it is not clear that Mistry imposes an absolute prohibition on retrospectivity to aid a single litigant. In the subsequent paragraphs, Justice Sachs points out that the impact of the prospective order on Mr Mistry was in fact minimal.[3] It may be that in a case where non-retrospectivity will have disastrous consequences for the named litigant — or even for a small group that can only be captured by naming them individually — the Court may be willing to reach back in time to come to her aid alone.

(bb) Reasons for limiting retrospectivity

Two rough categories exist for limiting retrospectivity. First, unlimited retrospectivity may cause some form of injustice to the litigants before the court or other similarly placed people. Second, retrospectivity may impair the administration of justice by invalidating acts already performed. All cases where the Constitutional Court has limited retrospectivity fall, fairly neatly, into one of these two categories. However, limiting retrospectivity is not a one-way street: the protection of individual rights almost always conflicts in some way with the good of the commonweal. What is interesting about retrospectivity is that individual good sometimes calls for limited and sometimes for unlimited retrospectivity. The same is true of the common good.[4]

[1] 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC)('Mistry').

[2] Ibid at para 42 (footnotes omitted).

[3] Ibid at paras 42–43.

[4] For example, in Walters — where the Court found that the law permitting the use of force in effecting an arrest was too broad — retrospective effect would have acted unfairly against the individual litigants who had acted according to the law by criminalizing (and rendering civilly actionable) their ostensibly lawful acts. Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security v Walters 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC). Non-retrospectivity, on the other hand, would operate unfairly on those who lost breadwinners as a result of reliance on the provision as they would have no civil claim for their loss, despite the

Before I consider these cases in more detail, I should mention that retrospectivity is, usually,[1] also limited when an order of invalidity is suspended. Many of the concerns that motivate a court to suspend an order may also have motivated it to limit retrospectivity. However, in this section I consider only cases where there was no suspension, but retrospectivity alone was circumscribed. In S v Shinga the Court, under the heading of 'Retrospectivity' held that it would not be just and equitable for the order — invalidating large portions of the system for criminal appeals from the Magistrates' Court — to apply retrospectively but that the order should only apply from 14 days after the order.[2] This order is not, strictly speaking, an order limiting retrospectivity, but an order suspending the declaration of invalidity that makes express that the suspended order, when it comes into force, will not operate retrospectively.[3]

(x) Injustice to individuals

There are a number of ways in which retrospectivity can cause harm to individuals: from criminalising previously legal conduct to imposing formerly non-existent financial obligations. The first case — criminalising past conduct — is, perhaps, the consequence most at odds with a system committed to legality and the rule of law. In Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security v Walters, the Constitutional Court held that s 49(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act,[4] which permitted police officers to use lethal force when affecting arrest, violated the rights to life and freedom and security of the person.[5] The Court decided that it had to limit the retrospective effect to avoid injustice:

> [I]t would clearly be neither just, nor equitable to allow unqualified retrospectivity of invalidation. This the instant case demonstrates. When the two accused shot the fleeing burglar, they were ostensibly entitled to invoke the indemnity afforded them by section 49(2). The effect of the unqualified striking down of the section by the trial court might in their case in effect retrospectively criminalise conduct that was not punishable at the time it authorizing statute being unconstitutional. In cases, such as Bhulwana, involving the invalidation of criminal laws, non-retrospectivity operates unfairly to individuals because they remain in jail. And in the succession cases, non-retrospectivity would have been unfair to some individuals — because they would not benefit from the change in the law — and beneficial to others — because their concluded transactions would be unaffected.

[1] See § 9.4*(e)(i)*(aa)(y) supra.

[2] 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC).

[3] For a more detailed discussion of when suspension orders operate retrospectively and when they don't, see § 9.4*(e)(i)*(aa)(y) supra.

[4] Act 51 of 1977.

[5] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters')(The underlying facts were that a father and son who owned a bakery shot and killed a fleeing burglar. They relied on s 49(2) to justify their actions.)

> was committed. Whipping away the protective statutory shield against criminal prosecution with the wisdom of constitutional hindsight would not only be unfair but would arguably offend the right protected by section 35(3)(l) of the Constitution "not to be convicted for an act … that was not an offence … at the time it was committed".[1]

Although the Walters Court in this passage relies on FC s 35(3)(l), such reliance was clearly not necessary for its decision: The Court also refused to permit any retrospective application that might lead to civil liability. The Court wrote that it would 'to some extent still be unfair to create even civil liability only after the event', even though, creating civil liability would not have been prohibited by s 35(3)(l).[2] Retrospectivity can, therefore, be limited even where s 35(3)(l) is not violated.[3]

A more difficult set of facts — in which the High Court and the Constitutional Court disagreed — arose in Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions (Pretoria).[4] The accused had been charged with rape for anally penetrating a young girl. The problem was that, at the time the crime was committed, the definition of rape only covered vaginal penetration. The High Court found the common-law definition to directly violate the right to equality and altered it to include anal rape.[5] According to Ranchod AJ, retrospective application was not a problem and did not violate FC s 35(3)(l) because the order would not criminalise non-criminal activity — anal penetration already constituted the crime of indecent assault:

> The unlawful deed the accused committed is simply given another name, such name constituting a more serious form of indecent assault. The accused knew very well that he was acting unlawfully. It has never been a requirement that an accused should know, at the time of the commission of an unlawful deed, whether it is a common law or statutory offence, or what the legal/official terminology is in naming it.[6]

The Constitutional Court approached the matter differently. Firstly, it relied on indirect application of the Bill of Rights in terms of FC s 39(2) — instead of direct application under FC s 8 — to develop the common law definition[7] and,

[1] Ibid at para 74. See also Masiya (supra) at para 6 of the order (The Court extended the definition of rape to include anal penetration, but to avoid retroactively creating crimes, made the decision prospective only. This decision meant that the applicant before them could only be convicted of indecent assault, not rape.)

[2] Walters (supra) at para 75. The Court did however acknowledge that the development of the law carried out by the SCA in Govender would apply to all unfinished cases. Govender v Minster of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA).

[3] For more on FC s 35(3)(l), see F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: The Rights of Arrested, Accused and Detained Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) Chapter 51.

[4] For a discussion of Masiya see C Snyman 'Extending the Scope of Rape - A Dangerous Precedent' (2007) 124 SALJ 677 (Argues against any extension of crimes by courts).

[5] S v Masiya 2006 (11) BCLR 1377 (T), 2006 (2) SACR 357 (T).

[6] Ibid at para 73.

[7] For a (justified) criticism of this approach, see S Woolman 'The Amazing Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762. For an attempt to defend the Court's approach, see F Michelman 'On the Uses of Interpretive 'Charity': Some Notes From Abroad on Application, Avoidance, Equality, and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review (forthcoming).

secondly, the new definition embraced only anal rape of females.[1] More importantly for present purposes, it refused to apply the development retrospectively. Nkabinde J held that s 35(3)(l) — as interpreted in Veldman v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division)[2] — prohibited a court from giving a person a greater sentence than what had been proscribed at the time of the offence. Since rape carried a heavier sentence than indecent assault, FC s 35(3)(l) proscribed retrospective application.[3] In addition, Mr Masiya could not have been expected to foresee that his conduct would constitute rape, rather than indecent assault and it would therefore be unfair to convict him of the former offence.[4] The Court therefore endorsed a very strict approach to retrospectivity when altering criminal offences or sentences. Indeed, under the Masiya approach, it is difficult to think of any case where it would be permissible to apply such an order retrospectively.

The Constitutional Court has also limited retrospectivity to avoid financial hardship to individuals. This approach to retrospectivity has occurred, primarily,[5] in two contexts: succession and delictual liability. In the succession cases — Brink, Bhe and Gory — individual hardship flows from both full retrospectivity and non-retrospectivity. In Brink v Kitshoff NO[6] the Court invalidated legislation[7] that limited the benefits that a wife could gain from her husband's life insurance policy if it was ceded to her and the husband's estate was insolvent. It permitted the policy's benefits to flow to the estate's creditors. O'Regan J held that, on the one

[1] Langa CJ (Sachs J concurring) dissented on this point. For criticism of this aspect of the majority decision, see K Phelps & S Kazee 'The Constitutional Court Gets Anal about Rape — Gender Neutrality and the Principle of Legality in Masiya v DPP' (2007) 20(3) SACJC 341.

[2] 2007 (3) SA 210 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC).

[3] Masiya (supra) at paras 55–56.

[4] Ibid at para 56. The reasoning in Masiya is questionable. On the first point, it would have been possible to convict Masiya of rape, but still sentence him as if his crime were indecent assault. The only additional punishment he would incur would be the additional stigma that might attach to the label 'rapist'. This additional punishment is however not mentioned in the judgment. The second argument supposes that in order to convict a person, that person must know not only that his act is criminal, but what crime it constitutes. That cannot be correct. The High Courts and the Supreme Court of Appeal regularly re-align the border between, for example, murder and culpable homicide or theft and fraud. The result of the Masiya approach is that whenever they do so, they must convict the person before them on law that they perceive to be wrong. It is in any event difficult to accept that Mr Masiya, or indeed any other right minded person, would not have described his anal penetration of a nine-year-old girl as anything other than 'rape'.

[5] See First National Bank (FNB) of SALtd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Another; First Nationa Bank of SALtd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 122 (The Court struck down a section that permitted property to be sold to settle a customs debt, even if the owner of the property was not the customs-debtor. However, it prevented the decision from applying to goods that had already been sold in good faith or cases that had been finalised by the courts. The Court mixed both injustice and administration reasons as it would prejudice indivduals and also be 'disruptive, burdensome and difficult to reverse the consequences of such sales if they were to be invalidated.')

[6] 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC)('Brink').

[7] Insurance Act 27 of 1943 s 44.

hand, unlimited retrospectivity would operate unfairly to creditors of estates that had already been wound up and who had, in good faith, benefited from the provision.[1] On the other hand, purely prospective application 'would deny some married women the protection of the Constitution' as their husbands' estates would still be subject to the discriminatory law.[2] To avoid (as far as possible) both injustices, O'Regan J limited the order of invalidity to apply only where payments had already been made in reliance on the now invalid provision.[3]

De Lange v Smuts NO indicates the clear distaste on the part of the Court for creating delictual liability for people, even official bodies, who relied on unconstitutional laws.[4] The provision in question permitted officials, including non-judicial officers, to imprison a person who refused to answer questions at an insolvency inquiry. The majority of the Court found the provision invalid only to the extent that the power was extended to non-judicial officers. They also held that the decision should only apply from the date of the decision:

> Persons who have, since the coming into operation of the Constitution, been unconstitutionally committed to prison, can unfortunately not be afforded effective relief in the sense of undoing any detention they might have suffered prior to the making of this order. Moreover, if the order is granted any retrospective effect it could raise uncertainties as to whether a person unconstitutionally committed to prison in the past had a claim for damages in respect of a committal which was unassailable at common law at the time and ordered in good constitutional faith. If it were to transpire that the retrospective operation of the order does not provide a cause of action for damages, then persons unconstitutionally detained in the past suffer no prejudice in relation to damages. If it has the effect of giving rise to such a claim, then it seems to be a most undesirable consequence, having regard to the fact that the committal took place in good faith. Retrospectivity can in any event not assist the applicant, inasmuch as his committal was ordered by a magistrate and was therefore constitutional.[5]

[1] Brink (supra) at para 56.

[2] Ibid at para 57.

[3] Ibid at paras 58 and 60. The same analysis — and a similar solution — was adopted in both Bhe (supra) (invalidated customary-law rule of primogeniture) and Gory (supra)(expanded the Intestate Succession Act to same-sex life partners). In Bhe a retrospective order would invalidate the transfer of money or goods which had already occurred in good faith. A prospective order would preserve a blatantly unconstitutional law and would prevent re-opening transactions even when the person who benefited knew that the rule of primogeniture was under court challenge. The Court therefore applied the order only to payments made in good faith.) In Gory, the law in issue was s 1(1) of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 which prevented homosexual life-partners from inheriting from their partners' intestate estates. A group of three sisters intervened in the case because if it was successful they would not benefit from the estate of their (homosexual) brother. Van Heerden AJ, for a unanimous Court, held that it would not be 'just and equitable' to deny Mr Gory relief, at least partly because he was part of a group that had been the victim of continued stigmatization and marginalization. Ibid at para 40. Van Heerden AJ therefore adopted the form of the order in Bhe with the additional proviso that if a party could show serious administrative or financial hardship, they could approach the Court for a variation of the order. Ibid at paras 41–42.

[4] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC).

[5] Ibid at paras 104–105.

The Walters[1] and Mistry[2] Courts express a similar sentiment: namely that it is a lesser evil for a constitutional violation to go without compensation than to impose monetary liability on a person who, knowingly or not, relied on what she thought to be a valid law.

Of course, where that reliance was indeed in good faith and where the person on whom liability might be imposed is a private person, that assessment seems correct. However, where the body that would bear liability is an organ of state — and therefore responsible for respecting, protecting, promoting and fulfilling the rights in the Bill of Rights[3] — or where the person knew the law was subject to a constitutional challenge, there would seem to be very good reasons in favour of imposing liability. There might well be good reasons that justify limiting retrospectivity even in these circumstances — but they would have to be clearly established by the state.[4] If they were not established, a court could easily make an order that — along the lines of those granted in Bhe and Gory — strikes a fair balance between the various interests at stake by making retrospective application dependant on whether the person or organ of state acted in good faith or bad faith. The simple prospective orders in De Lange and Walters fail to take account of these nuanced possibilities.

(y) Administration of Justice

The primary reason for limiting retrospectivity is that it can threaten the administration of justice and legal certainty by invalidating acts (or laws) that have been taken (or made) under the invalidated provision. The Court has regularly relied on the need to preserve the sanctity of legal order to limit retrospectivity where it would undo court decisions or executive or legislative action.

This trend began in the Court's very first decision: S v Zuma & Others.[5] The Court struck down a law that placed the onus on the accused to prove that a confession was not made freely and voluntarily. Although the Court recognised that limiting retrospectivity 'may well … cause[ ] injustice to accused persons', it concluded that it 'cannot repair all past injustice by a simple stroke of the pen.'[6] It

[1] Walters (supra) at para 75 ('Allowing the order to operate retrospectively in respect of civil liability only would not involve section 35(3)(l) of the Constitution and would not be as manifestly inequitable as retrospectively taking away a defence to a criminal charge. Nevertheless it would be anomalous to have such a distinction between civil and criminal liability and it would to some extent still be unfair to create even civil liability only after the event.')

[2] Mistry (supra) at para 41 ('[Retrospectivity] could also give rise to delictual claims by persons subjected to searches and seizures after that date, and add further burdens to a health budget already under considerable strain.')

[3] FC s 7(2).

[4] Of course, even when dealing with a state acting in bad faith, the quantity of compensation might be so immense that it would jeopardise the functioning of the state.

[5] 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)('Zuma').

[6] Ibid at para 44.

therefore limited[1] the retrospective effect of the order to cases that (a) started after 27 April 1994 (the day the Interim Constitution came into force); and (b) were not completed at the date of the judgment.[2] However, the Zuma position would turn out to be only a temporary solution. Both elements of this order on retrospectivity would be altered by the Court two months later in S v Mhlungu & Others.[3]

The reason for the change was a serious disagreement within the Court on how to interpret IC s 241(8). IC s 241(8) dealt with the application of the Interim Constitution to cases pending when the Interim Constitution was enacted.[4] One camp of judges (led by Kentridge AJ) proposed a literal reading of the provision that would preclude the application of the Interim Constitution to any cases pending on 27 April 1994. However, the majority of judges (represented by Mahomed J) preferred a more liberal reading that permitted application of the Interim Constitution to pending cases. Although Mahomed J proffered a number of reasons for his reading of the section, the first justification was the 'very unjust, perhaps even absurd, consequences' that would result from Kentridge AJ's reading. One of those consequences was:

> [M]erely because an accused person was served with an indictment before 27 April 1994, (and even if no evidence whatever was lead before that date) he could not contend that the [reverse onus for confessions was] unconstitutional. In the result, the Court could be compelled to convict him (and in consequence thereof even to imprison him for a substantial period) in circumstances where it has a reasonable doubt whether his confession was freely and voluntarily made and therefore even if the Court has a reasonable doubt about his guilt. Another accused charged as his co-conspirator could be acquitted simply because the indictment was served on him on 28 April 1994 in respect of an offence arising from exactly the same incident and the same evidence.[5]

[1] Strictly speaking, the Court did not limit the retrospectivity as, under the Interim Constitution, non-retrospectivity was the default position for pre-constitutional legislation. However, because the Court has not altered its practice under the Final Constituiton — a point I criticise later (see § 9.4*(e)*(ii)(cc) infra) — and in order to integrate the discussion of Interim Constitution and Final Constitution cases, I use the phraseology of 'limiting retrospectivity' under both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution.

[2] Ibid at para 44.

[3] 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC)('Mhlungu'). In this chapter I consider only the relevance of Mhlungu for retrospectivity. For more on the different interpretative strategies adopted by the judges, see L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[4] IC s 241(8) read: 'All proceedings which immediately before the commencement of this Constitution were pending before any court of law, including any tribunal or reviewing authority established by or under law, exercising jurisdiction in accordance with the law then in force, shall be dealt with as if this Constitution had not been passed: Provided that if an appeal in such proceedings is noted or review proceedings with regard thereto are instituted after such commencement such proceedings shall be brought before the court having jurisdiction under this Constitution.'

[5] Mhlungu (supra) at para 4. Ibid at paras 5–6 (Details further 'absurd' consequences that would follow from the minority's interpretation.)

Mahomed J felt that it was 'arbitrary and irrational' that accused persons whose cases had been finalised before the date of the order in Mhlungu should not qualify for protection while otherwise identically placed accused whose trials were not yet finalised would be protected.[1] He therefore changed the order in Zuma to apply to all cases pending on 27 April 1994, whether they had been finalised or not.

Mhlungu stands for a very powerful principle in favour of retrospective application when non-retrospectivity will arbitrarily deny people their constitutional rights. The strength of the Court's commitment to this principle is evident both in the lengths they went to finesse the wording of IC s 241(8) and the fact that they were willing to effectively overrule their own order that was but two-months-old. One of the most interesting aspects of Mhlungu is that, unlike Zuma and the cases that would come later, there is very little attention paid to the potential impact of re-opening already finalised court decisions. The majority's focus is solely on the rights of the accused. It is therefore extremely surprising that, less than six months later, the Court would retreat from its position in Mhlungu and revert, largely, to the reasoning and outcome it adopted in Zuma.

S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso[2] turned on a very similar issue to Zuma and Mhlungu : a reverse onus provision. The law at issue in Bhulwana placed an onus on people found in possession of a certain amount of marijuana to prove that they were not guilty of distribution (as well as simple possession). The Court easily found the provision unconstitutional and then, in what has since become the standard precedent for retrospectivity cases, held that the order should only apply to cases that had not yet been finalised, or that could still be appealed[3] — what I earlier labelled the 'the finalised cases construction'.[4] Because of the influence Bhulwana has had on similar matters over the past 13 years, it is worth quoting O'Regan J's reasoning at some length:

> Central to a consideration of the interests of justice in a particular case is that successful litigants should obtain the relief they seek. It is only when the interests of good government outweigh the interests of the individual litigants that the court will not grant relief to successful litigants. In principle too, the litigants before the court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants. On the other hand, as we stated in S v Zuma, we should be circumspect in exercising our powers under [IC] s 98(6)(a) so as to avoid unnecessary dislocation and uncertainty in the criminal justice process. As Harlan J stated in Mackey v US 401 US 667 (1971) at 691:
>
> > "No one, not criminal defendants, not the judicial system, not society as a whole is benefited by a judgment providing a man shall tentatively go to jail today, but tomorrow and every day thereafter his continued incarceration shall be subject to fresh litigation on issues already resolved."

[1] Mhlungo (supra) at para 48.
[2] 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC)('Bhulwana').
[3] Ibid at para 33.
[4] § 9.2*(e)*(ii)(aa)(y) supra.

As a general principle, therefore, an order of invalidity should have no effect on cases which have been finalised prior to the date of the order of invalidity.[1]

This final principle has been accepted as the definitive statement of law on retrospectivity where the problem is that decided cases will be overturned.[2]

It should be helpful to list some of the situations in which the principle has been applied. It has been applied in a series of case which, like Bhulwana, concerned reverse onus provisions.[3] Most of these cases are very short. They simply repeat the holdings in previous decisions and then applying the remedy developed in Bhulwana. The template has also been used in time-limitation clause cases. In Mohlomi v Minister of Defence,[4] s 113(1) of the Defence Act[5] required people suing the Defence Force to do so within six months of the claim arising and to give notice within one month. Didcott J concluded that the provision unjustifiably limited the applicant's right of access to court.[6] Without much explanation, he adopted a slight variation of the finalised cases construction. His remedy limited the retrospective effect to cases that were not already barred by s 113 and that had been either decided on first instance on appeal or settled. Similar orders were made in Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering[7] and Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund.[8] Interestingly, in Moise, which concerned a very similar provision, the order was permitted to operate with full retrospectivity.[9]

[1] Bhulwana (supra) at para 32 (references omitted, emphasis added).

[2] This passage — or parts of it — has been quoted with approval on numerous occassions. See S v Ntsele 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC)('Ntsele') at para 14; S v Mello 1998 (3) SA 712 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 908 (CC)('Mello') at para 13; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 94; Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund & Another 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC) at para 45. The reasoning has been followed in S v Mbatha 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC)('Mbatha') at para 31; Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 54; S v Julies 1996 (4) SA 313 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 899 (CC)('Julies') at para 4; Scagell & Others v Attorney-General, Western Cape & Others 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC) at paras 35–36.

[3] See Julies (supra)(Presumption that possessor of drugs was also a dealer); Scagell (supra)(various reverse-onus provisions concerning gambling); Ntsele (supra)(Person in charge of land where marijuana plants found, presumed to be dealing in marijuana); Mello (supra)(Person in 'immediate vicinity' of drugs, presumed to be in possession thereof); Mbatha (supra)(law presumed that a person on a property where illegal arms were found was in possession of those arms.)

[4] 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC).

[5] Act 44 of 1957.

[6] For more on the right of access to court, see J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Court' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[7] 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC).

[8] Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund & Another 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC)('Engelbrecht').

[9] Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae ) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC).

The Court provided no explanation for why Moise was treated differently. None is apparent upon close analysis after the fact.[1]

Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa is another excellent example of the chaos that can be caused by retrospectivity.[2] The Court struck down an overbroad search and seizure provision with prospective effect only because:

> Any general declaration of invalidity with retrospective effect would impact negatively on good government by rendering unlawful all such searches conducted after the retrospective date specified. This could create considerable uncertainty with regard to the validity of proceedings which were conducted on the basis of evidence obtained as a result of such searches.[3]

Other contexts in which retrospectivity has been limited to avoid disruption are the process for appointing magistrates,[4] indefinite detention,[5] adoption,[6]

[1] The best explanation seems to be that the Court simply forgot to deal with retrospectivity in the original judgment and when they were caught out in the subsequent case of Ex Parte Women's Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council, did not want to admit their error. 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC).

[2] 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 41. Compare this response to Magajane v The Chairperson, Northwest Gambling Board, where the Court also struck down search and seizure provisions but did not limit retrospectivity. 2006 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1133 (CC). Unfortunately the Magajane Court did not explain its decision, so it is difficult to know if there is any meaningful difference between the two cases.

[4] Van Rooyen & Others v The State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 272 (The Court invalidated a variety of provisions detailing how Magistrates are appointed. Without much ado, Chaskalson CJ held that it was 'All that is necessary is to make the orders prospective so that completed matters are not affected.' The order clearly makes sense as retrospectivity would have invalidated all the cases decided by a magistrate appointed in terms of the defunct provisions and the constitutional flaw was in any event fairly minor.)

[5] S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at para 33 (A provision permitting indefinite detention of habitual criminals was held to constitute 'cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment' contrary to FC s 12(1)(e). The order set the maximum detention period at 15 years and was prospective only. What is interesting about Niemand is that the Court specifically recognized that the prospective order would still aid currently imprisoned criminals because '[i]mprisonment is an ongoing process, and the terms of the order will apply to all such persons, despite the fact that they were declared to be habitual criminals before the coming into effect of the order.')

[6] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North 1997 (2) SA 2 (z) 61 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at para 51 (A law permitting adoption without the consent of the father was held to be unfairly discriminatory. Mahomed DP limited the retrospective impact of the order because 'it would be quite chaotic and clearly prejudicial to the interests of justice and good government if we made any order in terms of section 98(6) of the Constitution which might have the effect of invalidating any adoption order previously made'.)

immigration,[1] decriminalizing an act,[2] and permitting inter-spouse civil claims.[3]

(z) Validating invalidating legislation

Generally, a court will not limit retrospectivity in the absence of any of the factors discussed above. Indeed, the Court has produced a large number of orders in which it provides no reasons for its decision not to limit the order's retrospective effect.[4] In addition to the general presumption in favour of retrospectivity, there

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 89 (The Court invalidated a law that facilitated immigration of heterosexual spouses without affording the same benefit to homosexuals, and read-in words to cure the defect. Retrospectivity, the Court held, would 'cause uncertainty concerning the validity of decisions taken and acts performed in the past' and since limiting retrospectivity would cause no prejudice to homosexual couples as they could 'seek afresh, or persist with seeking' under the altered version of the legislation.)

[2] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Justice')(The Court invalidated the common-law (and the derivative statutory) criminalisation of consensual sodomy and limited retrospectivity with a slight varioation of the 'unfinalised cases' construction. Ackermann J argued that Bhulwana, where the flaw was in the trial procedure, was not entirely applicable in this context because in Bhulwana 'unqualified retrospective operation . . . could cause severe dislocation to the administration of justice and also be unfair to the prosecution who had relied in good faith on such evidentiary provisions.' Ibid at para 95. The unconstitutionality of criminalising consensual sodomy was different because it was 'manifestly and grossly unjust and inequitable that such convictions should not be capable of being set aside' where the crime had in fact ceased to exist in 1994 and where it was just a 'chance fact' that a challenge to the act had not been brought earlier. Ibid at para 96. Accordingly, Ackermann J ordered that although the order should not apply directly to finalized cases, where the time for lodging an appeal had lapsed, people in jail should have an opportunity to apply for condonation for late filing of their appeal. Although there is technically nothing to stop people from doing this on the ordinary 'finalised cases' construction, it has not been specifically included in the order in other cases); Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, and Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at para 31 (The Court, over the dissent of Madala J, found unconstitutional a provision which criminalised, amongst other acts, stripping on premises that sold liquor. Without much explanation, Yacoob J found that it was 'just and equitable' to apply the standard 'finalised cases' construction); South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 39 (Invalidated the criminal prohibition on members of the Defence Force engaging in acts of public protest. 'Given the scope of the prohibition and the absence of proof of any unconstitutional reliance on the provisions, it is not appropriate in the circumstances of this case to make an order with retrospective effect.')

[3] Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund & Another (The Women's Legal Centre Trust as amicus curiae ) 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) at para 77 (Moseneke DCJ invalidated legislation that prohibited spouses married in community of property from claiming patrimonial damages from each other. In a very confusing piece of retrospectivity analysis, he held: 'I think that the interest of justice requires that Mrs Van der Merwe and people similarly situated should get effective relief immediately from this order. I have not been referred to any major administrative dislocation or other consideration that militates against making the order retrospective. I have not been pointed to any prejudice; nor can I find any. I plan to limit the operation of the order to claims in which a final court order has not been made.' It is unclear what he meant by 'prejudice' or how the conclusion follows from the premises.

[4] There are several cases where the Court did not limit retrospectivity and did not provide reasons for not doing so where it might seem that reasons were warranted. See, for example, Du Toit & Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development & Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae*)* 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)(Permitting same-sex couples to adopt); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Expanding judicial benefits to same-sex life partners); Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)(Invalidating restrictive broadcast regulations); J v Director General, Department of Home Affairs 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC)(Permitting same sex couples to engage in artificial insemination.)

is a specific situation in which the court has held retrospectivity is inappropriate for separate reasons. In Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Court overturned legislation under which various proclamations amended the initial legislation.[1] The proclamations — though made in error — had been intended to create the structure for the first local government elections in 1994. The Court eventually suspended the order to ensure that the elections could take place. It then considered the possibility of limiting retrospectivity in order to save the proclamations (despite invalidation of the empowering legislation.) It rejected this option. Although the Court accepted that its remedial powers are broad enough to do so, it concluded that > it will seldom, if ever, be appropriate to use this power to validate amendments made to Acts of Parliament. It is logically inconsistent to strike down the empowering legislation, and at the same time, to validate Proclamations made under it, which will have the result that the things validated — laws which should be made only by Parliament — will apply not only to the past, but to the future as well. This is a task for Parliament and not for the Court.[2]

(cc) Criticism

The power to limit the retrospective impact of decisions is not uncontroversial. Under the leadership of Chief Justice Warren, the US Supreme Court, in a series of landmark criminal procedure cases,[3] was roundly criticised for using its remedial powers to 'mak[e] the law' and violating the separation of powers by permitting judges to legislate by creating new law.[4] Other critics complained that retrospectivity made it too easy for the Court to change settled constitutional doctrine.[5] As these criticisms indicate, limiting retrospectivity was originally associated with a liberal or 'activist' court. Fallon and Meltzer show how this perspective changed under the more conservative Burger and Rehnquist Courts. The power to limit retrospective effect which had been a tool to expand constitutional rights, became a means to deny people rights by prohibiting them from relying on 'new law'.[6] Victims of rights vilations were not permitted to rely on doctrines

[1] 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC).

[2] Ibid at para 105.

[3] See, for example, Mapp v Ohio 367 US 643 (1961)('Mapp')(Court requires states to exclude evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment); Linkletter v. Walker 381 U.S. 618 (1965)(Held that Court had the power to limit the retrospective impact of Mapp); Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966)('Miranda')(Court requires warnings to be read to people who are arrested).

[4] R Fallon & D Meltzer 'New Law, Non-Retroactivity and Constitutional Remedies' (1991) 104 Harvard LR 1731, 1734.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 1734–1735. Indeed even during the Warren era there was a tension between the judges. Although almost all the judges supported limiting retrospectivity, some did so because it permitted them to more easily expand existing doctrine, while others did it to limit the impact of a doctrine they disagreed with. Ibid at 1739–1740.

developed after their rights had been infringed. The American experience leaves us with two important lessons. One, the power to limit retrospectivity is one of the most powerful tools the Court has in its possession. Indeed, some suggest that this power is almost as important as judicial review itself. Courts should always keep that in mind. Two, the power can be used both to promote change and to deny rights.

Flowing from this brief introduction, I have four inter-related criticisms of the Court's approach to retrospectivity. These criticisms focus mainly on the reverse-onus and time-limitation lines of cases because they are the most egregious, though not the only, examples of the flaws I see in the current retrospectivity doctrine.

Firstly, by continuing to apply the Bhulwana test — 'as a general principle … an order of invalidity should have no effect on cases which have been finalised prior to the date of the order of invalidity'[1] — the Court has failed to appreciate two vital differences between the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution.[2] First, under the Interim Constitution invalidation of pre-constitutional legislation — such as that at issue in Bhulwana — was presumed not to operate retrospectively. The presumption under the Final Constitution is reversed — all declarations are presumed to operate retrospectively. Second, the substance of the test is not based on 'the interests of justice and good government', but what is 'just and equitable'. These standards differ: 'the test under the [Final] Constitution is a broader and more flexible one, where the concept of the interests of good government is but one of many possible factors to consider.'[3] Indeed, the Constitutional Court itself has acknowledged that Bhulwana can no longer provide the authoritative test.[4] Yet, more than eight years later, the Court still relies on Bhulwana as if it were binding precedent.[5] But considering these two changes, Bhulwana cannot be the controlling test. It creates a presumption that runs counter to the more basic presumption in favour of retrospectivity and it privileges non-interference in legal decisions above other concerns that go to justice and equity. While both may have been justified under the Interim Constitution, they cannot be justified under the Final Constitution.

Secondly, and most importantly, the standard is inherently unjust, even under the Interim Constitution. The result in Bhulwana is that a person who may well have been innocent of the crime of distribution remains in prison because of a law that violated one of his most basic rights: the right to be presumed innocent. To argue that the general need for finality in legal decisions is more important than the constitutional demand that innocent people should not be imprisoned seems outrageously indefensible. Take the facts in Engelbrecht. Kondile AJ held,

[1] Bhulwana (supra) at para 32.
[2] See § 9.2*(e)*(ii)(aa)(x) supra.
[3] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 94.
[4] Ibid at paras 93–94.
[5] See Engelbrecht (supra) at para 45 ('[The] Bhulwana principle was apparently applied in Mohlomi and there is no reason not to apply it in this matter.') correctly, that a regulation which required certain motor vehicle accident victims to submit an affidavit to the Road Accident Fund[1] within two weeks of their accident, failing which they would have no claim, violated their right of access to court because it gave them an unreasonably short period to act. The Court, without any explanation other than a bald referral to Bhulwana limited the retrospective effect to unfinalised cases.[2] The principle the Court created was that it is more important not to disturb decided cases than to provide relief to innocent victims of road accidents. As a result, a person who had been paralysed by a hit-and-run accident, had submitted their affidavit one day late and whose final appeal was turned down the day before Engelbrecht was decided would be entitled to absolutely nothing. In the words of Mahomed J, such an outcome is 'very unjust, perhaps even absurd'.[3] The Court seems stuck in a traditional common-law mindset that values legal certainty and stability — especially the sanctity of court decisions — above all else, even the rights conferred by a Final Constitution whose manifest aim is transformation.[4] From the perspective of a transformative constitution, disruption is the norm, not the exception. A society founded on a transformative constitution is a society in which, as Chief Justice Langa has put it, 'new ways of being are constantly explored and created, accepted and rejected and in which change is unpredictable but the idea of change is constant.'[5] The Court's approach to retrospectivity is incommensurable with that vision.

Thirdly. I do not wish to argue that retrospectivity should never be limited. The cost — monetary or otherwise — to the country may well matter. My problem with the case law is that, as a general rule, it does not examine the evidence to determine what the actual cost of retrospectivity will be. There is no reference to statistics that indicate how many prisoners will be released or how many claims will have to be paid out. The judges do not question whether the state institutions have the capacity or the funds to deal with the impact of retrospectivity. Instead they seem to act on the assumption that in any case where a single prisoner might be released or a single penny spent, the cost will be too great. That approach gets the onus in retrospectivity cases back-to-front. If the starting point is full retrospectivity, then the state must bear the onus of providing evidence that would move a court to depart from that norm. Where the state fails to present evidence, it must face the consequences, namely, full retrospectivity. Of course, there may

[1] The Road Accident Fund Act 56 of 1996 makes the Road Accident Fund the only body against which delictual claims arising from motor vehicle accidents can be instituted. Victims are not entitled to institute claims against the actual wrongdoer. RAF Act s 17 read with s 21.

[2] Engelbrecht (supra) at para 45.

[3] Mhlungu (supra) at para 4. The gap that is sometimes left for people who would otherwise be denied relief to approach a court is insufficient as it requires resources and knowledge that are far beyond the means of ordinary people.

[4] See E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where?' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31; K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146; P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch LR 351.

[5] Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (supra) at 356.

be cases where the social chaos created by retrospectivity will be so great and so obvious that the court may only take judicial notice of the likely consequences and not require the state to lead evidence.[1] But that could not possibly be the case in Bhulwana or Engelbrecht or any of the other reverse-onus or time-limitation clause cases where the Court could not possibly have had any idea how many innocent people were in gaol, or how many people who had filed their claims late still had legitimate claims, without the state supplying such evidence. If the Court had that evidence, then they certainly did not mention it in their judgments. That possibility would imply that they did not think the evidence was necessary to decide the case: but that too would be perverse. It would mean the rule was applied irrespective of the facts.

Fourthly, the Court has been inconsistent in its application of the principles it has laid down and has often failed to justify its decisions. Let's take the time-limitation cases. In Mohlomi, Potgieter and Engelbrecht the Court applies the unfinalised cases construction. In Moise it orders full retrospectivity. No attempt was made to distinguish Moise from the other cases — not even when an amicus questioned the retrospective effect of the order.[2] Earlier I tried to expound in the best possible light the Court's movement from Zuma through Mhlungu to Bhulwana. But the truth is that the Zuma and Bhulwana cannot be reconciled with Mhlungu. In Mhlungu Mahomed J held that '[i]t would … be arbitrary and irrational to deny to an accused person the right to rely on such invalidity merely because the declaration of invalidity by the Court took place on a date subsequent to the date when his pending trial was fortuitously completed.'[3] Yet that is precisely what the Court in Bhulwana does. It denies relief to people whose cases had been '[un]fortuitously completed' before the order was made. O'Regan J does not deny the consequences of these remarks in Mhlungu. She simply ignores them.[4] We are left to speculate as to why the Court backtracked in Bhulwana rather than sticking with the clearly superior principle it adopted in Mhlungu.[5]

[1] I think that Mapp (supra) and Miranda (supra) are good examples of this. Unlimited retrospectivity in these cases would have resulted in a large portion (perhaps even the majority in the case of Miranda) of convicted prisoners being released. That would clearly be unacceptable.

[2] Women's Legal Centre (supra).

[3] Mhlungu (supra) at para 45.

[4] Bhulwana (supra) at para 31.

[5] The only difference is that Mhlungu applies to all cases where there is a confession, while the other applies only to cases involving a certain amount of marijuana possession. This difference gives rise to two possible — but ultimately unsuccessful — justifications. First, the Court might have been motivated by the greater number of cases that would be affected by one order rather than the other. However, there were no facts before the Court on this question and it would seem that more cases would be affected by the provision in Mhlungu than that in Bhulwana. Second, there may have been a greater sympathy on the part of the Justices for people whose confessions were coerced than for those who carried too much marijuana on them. However there is nothing in the Constitution that seems to require a greater protection for the one class than the other. Both are victims of the same constitutional defect — a violation of their right to be presumed innocent — and should be afforded the same relief. Perhaps the best explanation is that Mahomed J — the author of Mhlungu — did not sit in Bhulwana. . .

I also find the Court's attempt to distinguish Bhulwana in NCGLE v Minister of Justice highly unsatisfactory. In NCGLE v Minister of Justice, the court invalidated the common law crime of sodomy. It held that it would be 'manifestly and grossly unjust and inequitable' to allow convictions for consensual sodomy to stand.[1] However, the Court felt that the overturning of those convictions should still occur through the machinery of the courts. It therefore made specific provision in the order for those persons to apply to a court for the late filing of a notice to appeal so that they could have their convictions set aside.[2] The NCGLE v Minister of Justice Court tries to draw a distinction between the two cases by arguing that it was concerned with the validity of a criminal provision, not a rule of evidence.[3] The latter would involve much greater disruption to the criminal justice system. Each case would have to be considered anew to determine whether the person would still have been convicted without the excluded evidence, and would be unfair to the prosecution who had relied on the evidence in good faith.[4]

Leaving aside the ridiculous reference to unfairness to the prosecutor,[5] and the absolute lack of evidence in any of the reverse-onus cases to show that the state could not easily cope with the number of prisoners who might be affected by the decision, the distinction might still have a gut-reaction appeal. However, consider this comparison: X is convicted of being in possession of arms and ammunition solely because he happened to be innocently present in a building where, without his knowledge, a large arms cache was stored. He is arrested and at trial is unable to satisfactorily explain his presence and is sentenced to 15 years imprisonment.[6] Y, who knows that sodomy is a crime, continues to have sex with his boyfriend and is convicted of sodomy and sentenced to 5 years imprisonment. Is it more unjust for Y to remain in gaol after the law under which he was convicted is

[1] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 96.

[2] Ibid at para 97. The relevant section of the order read: 'In terms of s 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution, it is ordered that the order in para 1.1 shall not invalidate any conviction for the offence of sodomy unless that conviction relates to conduct constituting consensual sexual conduct between adult males in private committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or a review of, the relevant judgment is pending, or the time for noting of an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired, or condonation for the late noting of an appeal or late filing of an application for leave to appeal is granted by a Court of competent jurisdiction.' While there was technically nothing stopping those convicted under the Bhulwana law from applying for the same condonation, the Bhulwana Court clearly did not envisage that it would be 'just and equitable' to include it in the order. The result is that any prisoner who did apply for condonation would be far less likely to receive it because the implication of the Court's judgment seems to be that he deserves to remain incarcerated.

[3] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 95.

[4] Ibid.

[5] It is ridiculous because the prosecutor suffers no prejudice if his good faith decision is later set aside because of a change in the law. The accused continues to sit in gaol.

[6] This was the effect of the statue invalidated in S v Mbatha, S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC)('Mbatha'). The Court which relied directly on, and imposed the same order as the Court had in Bhulwana. The minimum sentence was 5 years and the maximum 25 years. Mbatha (supra) at para 20.

invalidated? That, in sum, is the reasoning in NCGLE v Minister of Justice. Such reasoning cannot be countenanced. The continued imprisonment of X and Y are, in my eyes, equally unjust.

These four criticisms demonstrate, I hope, that the Court needs to rethink its attitude to retrospectivity. I do not think it needs to look far. All the tools are already in its jurisprudence. The first flaw can be cured simply by picking up on the difference, which it has already explained, between the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution. The reasoning I rely on to make the second criticism is nothing more than what Mahomed J had to say in Mhlungu. The Court already demands — in rhetoric but not practice — that litigants, especially the state, provide evidence of the practical impact of retrospectivity.[1] The inconsistency in the Court's judgments will probably be cured by taking the first three criticisms to heart and thinking a little more carefully about retrospectivity.

The Court also has the remedial tools to deal with the types of problems that arise in cases like Bhulwana and Engelbrecht. Simple retrospectivity would not be enough as there is no way to know whether all the people whom the declaration would affect would hear of the decision, whether they would be able to access a lawyer to take advantage of it and whether the state would aid or inhibit the realisation of the order. The best way to solve these problems is to make the type of supervisory order that the Court made in Sibiya.[2] The Sibiya order regulated the commuting of the death sentences of people still on death row when the death penalty was abolished. The government was required to provide a list of all the people who were still under sentence of death and then report on a regular basis on what progress was being made to change their sentences. In a case like Bhulwana — or even NCGLE v Minister of Justice — the government could be ordered to provide a list of all the people convicted in terms of the relevant statute and examine their cases to determine whether they might fall under the Court's order. Some mechanism could then be devised to deal with the cases.[3] Although this scheme would impose a small administrative burden on the Court, the gain we secure in the protection of individual rights make such a scheme an obvious improvement on the current default position on retrospectivity.

9.5 Individual remedies

This section considers remedies available for an isolated violation of an individual's rights (or the violation of the rights of a small identifiable group of individuals). I should stress again that individual remedies are not strictly separable

[1] See M Chaskalson, G Marcus & M Bishop 'Constitutional Litigation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) § 3.7.

[2] Sibiya & Others v The Director of Public Prosecutions, Johannesburg, & Others 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC).

[3] For example, they could be classified into cases where the person should clearly be released and cases where release was uncertain. The first class could be immediately released. The second class could be referred to the High Court to reconsider.

from systemic remedies or remedies following findings of invalidity. All three types of remedies are rooted in similar textual sources, offer analogous forms of relief and often reinforce one another. In sum, all three remedies are interrelated and must be as part of the same basket of remedies available to a court.

The three main remedies assayed under this heading — damages, declarations of rights and interdicts — are all available in most cases and the primary role of a court is to choose between them. No formula or algorthim exists for courts charged with determining which remedy is appropriate. Indeed, the chosen remedy most often turns on the facts and the relief pursued by the person asserting a constitutional claim. That said, the process of determining individual remedies is not as casuistic as it might appear. Upon closer inspection, the cases reveal some principles and suggest the process by which courts determine the appropriate remedy in cases where an individual's rights have been violated.

(a) Damages[1]

There are two categories of damages in constitutional matters. The first category consists of damages awarded in terms of the common law or a statute that gives effect to a constitutional right. I call these 'indirect constitutional damages' because they do not flow directly from the Final Constitution. The second category — 'direct constitutional damages' — flow from the Final Constitution alone. As I explain in more detail below, courts will, where possible, award indirect, rather than direct damages. Indeed, the courts will do so even if the award of indirect damages necessitates a development or re-interpretation of the law at issue.

(i) Indirect constitutional damages

In some sense, every award of delictual damages where the right asserted is also a constitutional right — such as dignity, bodily integrity, privacy or freedom of expression — is a constitutional remedy. Why? Because the indirect constitutional remedy serves to cure the violation of a constitutional right. The Court first ennunciated this proposition in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security.[2] Mr Fose had sued in delict for abuse suffered at the hands of the police but had, in addition to the normal delictual damages, asked for further constitutional damages to vindicate the violation of his constitutional rights. The Minister excepted to the second part of the claim. Ackermann J dismissed Mr Fose's argument in the following terms:

[1] For an excellent discussion of constitutional damages from a comparative perspective — US, New Zealand and India — see L Tortell Monetary Remedies for Breach of Human Rights: A Comparative Perspective (2006).

[2] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose').

> [T]here can, in my view, be no place for further constitutional damages in order to vindicate the rights in question. Should the plaintiff succeed in proving the allegations pleaded he will no doubt, in addition to a judgment finding that he was indeed assaulted by members of the police force in the manner alleged, be awarded substantial damages. This, in itself, will be a powerful vindication of the constitutional rights in question requiring no further vindication by way of an additional award of constitutional damages.[1]

The remedial principle established in Fose is that where a remedy under existing law adequately vindicates the constitutional right, there is no need to rely on the Constitution to create a new, self-standing, remedy.[2] Litigants who wish to vindicate a constitutional right through an award of damages should first determine whether they have a common-law (or statutory) claim. Claims that implicate constitutional rights of, for example, dignity[3] and privacy[4] have been successfully litigated in the Constitutional Court in the form of delictual actions and requests, where necessary for the development of delictual actions in order to secure the desired relief.

As I have just noted, the Final Constitution is not just the source of direct constitutional remedies. It also underwrites the creation and the award of indirect constitutional damages. Indirect constitution damages sourced in the Constitution generally occur where the Final Constitution is used to develop the common law (or interpret a statute) to provide a damages claim where no such claim was previously available.[5] The case that set the precedent for this kind of development was Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security.[6]

Ms Carmichele had been assaulted by a known offender who had recently been arrested and then released on bail. Carmichele argued that the investigators and prosecutors were at fault for not having informed the presiding magistrate of the offender's state of mind and previous convictions. The High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the claim on the basis that the state officials did not owe any legal duty to Carmichele in the circumstances. The Constitutional Court reversed the Supreme Court of Appeal. It held that the Final Constitution placed a cognizable duty on the state to protect people, particularly women, from violent crime. It sent the case back to the High Court[7] to reconsider the matter and to appropriately develop the common-law of delict in light of its findings. After further litigation in both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal,[8]

[1] Fose (supra) at para 67.

[2] See § 9.2*(f)*(ii) supra.

[3] Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)(Defamation).

[4] NM & Others v Smith and Others (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae ) 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)(Disclosure of private medical facts).

[5] The line between these two classes of cases is by no means clear. I accept that some of the cases I identify as 'developments' merely relied on existing precedent. But nothing turns, from a remedial perspective, on whether a case is a development or not; the same principles of when damages are available apply.

[6] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[7] See Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another 2003 (2) SA 656 (C), 2002 (10) BCLR 1100 (C).

[8] Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Carmichele 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA).

Ms Carmichele succeeded in her claim for (indirect constitutional) damages. Carmichele led to the litigation of a significant number of other cases that turned on alleged negligence or abuse by state officials. In these matter, the Final Constitution was employed to extend common-law liability beyond its traditional boundaries to hold the state liable for permitting prisoners to escape,[1] issuing licenses to an unstable person[2] and failing to remove a gun from a man they knew to be dangerous.[3] In another line of cases, the courts have use the Final Constitution in order to stretch the bounds of vicarious liability to ensure that those who are injured by delinquent policemen are able to claim from the state.[4]

These cases have relied heavily on the norm of accountability — one of the founding values of the Final Constitution mentioned in FC s 1[5] — to establish the award of (indirect constitutional) damages. This sentiment, and its limitations, is best expressed by Nugent JA:

> Where the conduct of the State, as represented by the persons who perform functions on its behalf, is in conflict with its constitutional duty to protect rights in the Bill of Rights, in my view, the norm of accountability must necessarily assume an important role in determining whether a legal duty ought to be recognised in any particular case. The norm of accountability, however, need not always translate constitutional duties into private law duties enforceable by an action for damages, for there will be cases in which other appropriate remedies are available for holding the State to account. Where the conduct in issue relates to questions of State policy, or where it affects a broad and indeterminate segment of society,

[1] Van Eeden v Minister of Safety and Security (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA), 2002 (4) All SA 346.

[2] Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Hamilton 2004 (2) SA 416 (SCA).

[3] Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA)('Van Duivenboden')(The failure of the police failed to remove a gun from a man they knew to be dangerous led, almost ineluctably, to the shooting deaths of the man's wife and daughter.) But see Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Rudman & Another 2005 (2) SA 16 (SCA)(No legal duty on policeman without necessary training to perform CPR on drowning baby). For a discussion of these cases, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 40.5 (b).

[4] K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)(Court held the Minister vicariously liable for the rape of a woman by on-duty policemen); Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 1006 (4) SA 160 (SCA)(Minister vicariously liable for shooting spree of off-duty policeman); Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC)(Confirmed SCA decision.)

[5] FC s 1*(d)* reads: 'The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values: . . . (d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.' For more on the role of founding values, see Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) and Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 21 ('The values enunciated in section 1 of the Constitution are of fundamental importance. They inform and give substance to all the provisions of the Constitution. They do not, however, give rise to discrete and enforceable rights in themselves.') See also C Roederer 'Founding Values' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) Chapter 13. For more on the correct reading of FC s 1*(d)*, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

> constitutional accountability might at times be appropriately secured through the political process or through one of the variety of other remedies that the courts are capable of granting. . . . There are also cases in which non-judicial remedies, or remedies by way of review and mandamus or interdict, allow for accountability in an appropriate form and that might also provide proper grounds upon which to deny an action for damages. However, where the State's failure occurs in circumstances that offer no effective remedy other than an action for damages the norm of accountability will, in my view, ordinarily demand the recognition of a legal duty unless there are other considerations affecting the public interest that outweigh that norm.[1]

Nugent JA also suggests that 'in some cases the need for effective government, or some other constitutional norm or consideration of public policy, will outweigh accountability in the process of balancing the various interests that are to be taken into account in determining whether an action should be allowed.'[2] To the extent that this suggestion applies to cases where no remedy other than damages is appropriate, it must be regarded with care. As I have argued above, there may be cases where compelling concerns justify the granting of no remedy at all.[3] However, in order to live up to the Final Constitution's promise of effective redress, such cases ought to remain the rare exception. This principle — itself extracted from the cases law — should be understood as a safety valve. It is not to be read as an endorsement for judicial abdication in cases where constitutional rights are deemed to conflict with one another.[4]

While the courts have been very eager to develop the common law to provide remedies for those who have suffered physical injury as a result of state negligence or abuse, they have proved far less sympathetic to those persons who have incurred only financial loss as a result of the state's negligence. In a string of cases related to negligent administrative action, the courts have refused to develop common-law administrative principles[5] to provide for compensation where the

[1] Van Duivenboden (supra) at para 21, quoted with approval in, for example, Premier of The Province of the Western Cape v Fair Cape Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 2003 (6) SA 13 (SCA)('Fair Cape') at para 40; Steenkamp v Provincial Tender Board, Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC) at para 86 (Langa CJ and O'Regan J dissenting); Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Carmichele 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA) at para 37 .

[2] Van Duivenboden (supra) at para 22. But see Fair Cape (supra) at para 40 (Lewis JA implies that Nugent JA held that there would definitely be cases where accountability would be outweighed by other factors. In my view, Nugent JA's use of the phrase 'there might be cases' and his deliberate avoidance of the issue point to a far more tentative suggestion.)

[3] See § 9.2*(b)*(iii) supra.

[4] For a critique of balancing generally, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.8*(d)*.

[5] These cases were decided before the advent of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 which now governs administrative law. PAJA specifically permits compensation in extraordinary circumstances. PAJA s 8 (1)(c)(ii)(bb). It is therefore highly unlikely that there will be any further cases in this field. However, the tender cases provide a useful model for how courts might address similar questions that are not specifically regulated by statute.

constitutional right to administrative justice has been infringed.[1] The holding in Olitzki Properties offers two main reasons for this distinction.

The applicant ('Olitzki') applied unsuccessfully for a government tender to provide office space. Disappointed, Olitzki argued that the tender board had been improperly influenced by the provincial government and that they should have won the tender. It argued that the board had breached its responsibilities under the procurement provision of the Interim Constitution and therefore was liable in delict for the loss of profit Olitzki had suffered as a result of not receiving the tender. Cameron JA rejected the claim. Firstly, he held that Olitzki had alternative remedies. It could have had the decision set aside and re-applied, or — because it was aware of the government's influence before the decision was taken — it could have sought an interdict preventing the award of the tender.[2] Secondly, Olitzki was claiming the profit it lost as a result of not receiving the tender (some R10 million). Such an award would, the court found, place an undue burden on the 'public purse'. The award would amount to 'a double imposition on the State, which would have to pay the successful tenderer the tender amount in contract while paying the same sum in delict to the aggrieved plaintiff.'[3]

On the facts of Olitzki Properties, these reasons are compelling. However, they are far less compelling on the facts of Steenkamp. The case is discussed in detail earlier in this chapter and I will not rehearse the facts or my criticism here.[4] In short, the principles articulated in Olitzki ought not to have been applied in Steenkamp because there were no meaningful alternative remedies available and the applicant was only claiming the money it had spent in preparing to perform the tender. The Supreme Court of Appeal and the majority of the Constitutional Court were therefore wrong to deny the claim for damages.

The only context in which the courts have been willing to grant compensation for loss suffered from unjust administrative action is where there is proof of fraud on the part of the state.[5] In Minister of Finance & Others v Gore NO, Cameron JA distinguished Olitzki and Steenkamp in the following terms:

[1] See, for example, Olitzki Property Holdings v State Tender Board 2001 (3) SA 1247 (SCA)('Olitzki')(An unsuccessful tenderer may not claim the lost profits it would have received had it been awarded the tender); Faircape (supra)(No damages for loss suffered from negligent processing of application for removal of restrictions on property. Fair Cape, though an important decision, does not add much to our understanding of when damages can be awarded for negligent); Dispersion Technology (SA) (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelo Healthcare v State Tender Board & Another [2007] ZAGPHC 175 (Claim for damages flowing from a decision not to award a tender at all refused); Steenkamp v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape 2006 (3) SA 151 (SCA); Steenkamp NO v Provincial Tender Board, Eastern Cape 2007 (3) BCLR 280 (CC).

[2] Olitzki (supra) at paras 36–38.

[3] Ibid at para 30.

[4] See § 9.2*(b)*(ii)(bb) supra.

[5] Minister of Finance & Others v Gore NO 2007 (1) SA 111 (SCA).

> In Olitzki and Steenkamp, the cost to the public purse of imposing liability for lost profit and for out of pocket expenses when officials innocently bungled the process was among the considerations that limited liability. We think the opposite applies where deliberately dishonest conduct is at issue: the cost to the public of exempting a fraudulent perpetrator from liability for fraud would be too high.[1]

(ii) Direct Constitutional Damages

Direct constitutional damages are damages that arise from a provision or a principle in the Final Constitution rather than from the common law or a statute which protects — purposefully or incidentally — a constitutional right. While it has been rightfully chary with regard to the award of such damages, the Constitutional Court has made it clear that constitutional damages are appropriate in our constitutional regime:

> [T]here is no reason in principle why 'appropriate relief' should not include an award of damages, where such an award is necessary to protect and enforce [IC] chap 3 rights. Such awards are made to compensate persons who have suffered loss as a result of the breach of a statutory right if, on a proper construction of the statute in question, it was the Legislature's intention that such damages should be payable, and it would be strange if damages could not be claimed for, at least, loss occasioned by the breach of a right vested in the claimant by the supreme law. When it would be appropriate to do so, and what the measure of damages should be will depend on the circumstances of each case and the particular right which has been infringed.[2]

The rest of the judgment in Fose made quite clear that, generally,[3] constitutional damages will be inappropriate where the existing law — as developed and interpreted in light of the Constitution — provides a remedy that fully vindicates the right.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal has — in MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate — taken a view that permits direct damages in a somewhat wider set of circumstances:

[1] Gore (supra) at para 88. While the decision in Gore is clearly correct — the law cannot immunise dishonest government action from liability — it also highlights what is wrong with Steenkamp. Surely the Constitution requires the government to be not only honest, but also competent. See FC s 195(1). Where other remedies are unavailable and the strain on the public purse is minimal, the same reasons that motivate granting damages in Gore should have led to the opposite outcome in Steenkamp.

[2] Fose (supra) at para 60.

[3] Ackermann J does not set the principle as an absolute rule, but it is difficult to think of a situation where another form of relief (whether damages or otherwise) is available through common law or statute and direct constitutional damages would still be justified. Perhaps, where a statute only permits a partial remediation (by limiting the damages to special damages for example) and it cannot be interpreted or developed to provide full remediation, direct constitutional damages should be employed to make up the shortfall.

[4] Fose (supra) at para 67.

> No doubt the infusion of constitutional normative values into delictual principles itself plays a role in protecting constitutional rights, albeit indirectly. And no doubt delictual principles are capable of being extended to encompass state liability for the breach of constitutional obligations. But the relief that is permitted by s 38 of the Constitution is not a remedy of last resort, to be looked to only when there is no alternative — and indirect — means of asserting and vindicating constitutional rights. While that possibility is a consideration to be borne in mind in determining whether to grant or to withhold a direct s 38 remedy it is by no means decisive, for there will be cases in which the direct assertion and vindication of constitutional rights is required.[1]

The Kate Court did not provide any detail on what those cases might be. But it did draw a distinction between a breach of a 'constitutionally normative standard' where indirect damages would be appropriate and the 'direct breach of a substantive constitutional right' where direct damages are fitting.[2] Also, if the breach of rights was widespread and continuous — as they were in Kate — then the situation would 'call out … for the clear assertion of [the right's] independent existence' through direct damages.[3]

The reasoning in Kate is far superior to that proffered in Fose. The vast majority of cases can be adequately addressed through indirect damages. However, a litigant should not have to fail at claiming indirect damages or prove that they will be ineffective to qualify for direct relief. Whether a court should award direct or indirect damages should depend on all the facts of the matter. The fact that a person framed a claim in terms of direct relief rather than indirect relief should not be used to deny them any relief at all. For what is ultimately at stake is the vindication of a constitutional right.[4]

That being said, three types of direct damages have been at least notional recognized. They are: damages to compensate for loss; punitive damages in addition to damages already claimed; and nominal or symbolic damages.

(aa) Damages to compensate for loss

To date, the Constitutional Court has only awarded direct constitutional damages in one, very unusual, case: President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd.[5] A large number of people had illegally occupied a portion of Modderklip's farm. Modderklip eventually obtained an eviction order. However, by that time, some 40 000 illegal occupants lived on the farm. The sheriff required a deposit of R 1.8 million to enlist the help of a private contractor to evict the unlawful occupiers. That amount was far more than the value of the [1] 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA) at para 27.

[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] This was not the case. In Fose, the claim was for free-standing constitutional damages was made in addition to what he could claim through ordinary reliance on the law of delict.
[5] President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip').

occupied portion of the farm, so Modderklip sought alternative relief. It instituted action against the President and the Ministers of Safety and Security, Housing and Agriculture and Land Affairs. The Pretoria High Court ordered the various organs of state to ensure compliance with the eviction order and devised a supervisory interdict[1] to ensure compliance.[2]

On appeal, the Supreme Court of Appeal confirmed the findings that the state had failed to fulfill its obligations under FC ss 25 and 26. However, it altered the High Court's remedy.[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal took into consideration the fact that if the occupiers were evicted, they would have nowhere to go. Removing them from the land in the absence of alternative land was therefore not a viable option. It held:

> The only appropriate relief that, in the particular circumstances of the case, would appear to be justified is that of 'constitutional' damages, ie damages due to the breach of a constitutionally entrenched right. No other remedy is apparent. Return of the land is not feasible. There is in any event no indication that the land, which was being used for cultivating hay, was otherwise occupied by the lessees or inhabited by anyone else. Ordering the State to pay damages to Modderklip has the advantage that the Gabon occupiers can remain where they are while Modderklip will be recompensed for that which it has lost and the State has gained by not having to provide alternative land.[4]

The matter then came before the Constitutional Court. While the Court altered the basis of the relief,[5] it essentially confirmed the Supreme Court of Appeal's award of damages. Langa ACJ specifically referred to the findings in Fose that sometimes constitutional damages would be the only appropriate relief[6] and that the need for an effective remedy supported an award of constitutional damages.[7] An order of compensation also fit with the spirit and purpose of the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998.[8] Finally, the Court identified the following factors as favouring an award of constitutional damages:

> It compensates Modderklip for the unlawful occupation of its property in violation of its rights; it ensures the unlawful occupiers will continue to have accommodation until suitable alternatives are found and it relieves the state of the urgent task of having to find such alternatives.[9]

[1] For more on structural interdicts, see § 9.5*(c)*(iv) infra.

[2] Modderklip Boerdery (Edms) Bpk v President van die RSA & Andere 2003 (6) BCLR 616 (T) at paras 51–52.

[3] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA).

[4] Ibid at para 43.

[5] Modderklip (supra) at paras 39–51 (Instead of relying on violations of the rights to property and housing, it based the decision on contempt for the rule of law and the right of access to courts (FC s 34).)

[6] Fose (supra) at para 60.

[7] Ibid at para 69.

[8] Modderklip (supra) at para 55.

[9] Ibid at para 59. The Court also avoided the difficulty of determining the amount of damages by holding that it should be determined in terms of the Expropriation Act 63 of 1975. Ibid.

The Court rejected the possibilities of declaratory relief[1] and an order for the state to expropriate the property.[2] It eventually settled on an award of damages. The appropriate lesson to draw from Modderklip is precisely what was suggested in Fose. There will be situations that require constitutional damages. They will, however, be exceptional cases where no other remedy is appropriate.

Somewhat more encouragingly, direct constitutional damages were also awarded by the Supreme Court of Appeal in the, now infamous, context of the continued failure of the Eastern Cape provincial government to pay social grants to people who were clearly entitled to them.[3] The case, MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate, concerned an unexplained 40 month delay to decide whether to award Kate a disability grant.[4] Nugent JA held that the delay infringed Kate's FC s 27(1)(c) right to social security and that damages were the appropriate remedy.[5] Whether damages are appropriate must, he held, 'necessarily be determined casuistically with due regard to, amongst other things, the nature and relative importance of the rights that are in issue, the alternative remedies that might be available to assert and vindicate them, and the consequences of the breach for the claimant concerned.'[6] Like Langa DCJ in Modderklip, Nugent JA

[1] Modderklip (supra) at para 60 (The Court held that a declaratory order would not fully satisfy the right. Importantly, it held that this was the case even though Modderklip would still be able to bring a subsequent delictual action.)

[2] Ibid at paras 62–64 (The Court expressed concern that such an order would violate the separation of powers, but eventually rejected it because it did not know if the state had alternative land available to relocate the illegal occupiers. An order to expropriate would be unjust if such land was available.)

[3] For a summary of the situation and the accompanying litigation, see Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC) at paras 8–26. See also Ngxuza & Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another 2001 (2) SA 609, 615F-618D (E); Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another v Ngxuza & Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA).

[4] 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA)('Kate'). See also Kate v MEC, Dept of Welfare, Eastern Cape [2005] 1 All SA 745 (SE)(Froneman J too awarded constitutional damages, but for the violation of the right to administrative action.)

[5] Kate (supra) at para 22 (It is significant that the SCA found a violation of the right to social security rather than the right to administrative action. Nugent JA held: 'The realisation of substantive rights is usually dependant upon an administrative process. Rights that protect that process, like those that are embodied in s 33(1) and s 237 of the Constitution and in PAJA, are essentially ancillary to the realisation of those substantive rights. For without protection being given to the process the substantive rights are capable of being denied. Where, as in this case, the realisation of the substantive right to social assistance is dependant upon lawful and procedurally fair administrative action, and the diligent and prompt performance by the state of its constitutional obligations, the failure to meet those process obligations denies to the beneficiary his or her substantive right to social assistance. What has been denied to Kate is not merely the enjoyment of a process in the abstract, but through denial of that process she has been denied her right to social assistance, which is dependant for its realisation upon an effective process. It is the denial of that substantive right that lies at the centre of her claim.' (footnote omitted).) For more on FC s 27(1)(c), see M Swart 'Social Security' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56D. For more on FC s 33, see G Penfold & J Klaaren 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63.

[6] Kate (supra) at para 25.

also considered and rejected the possibility of a declaration and a mandamus. A declaration was inappropriate because the long history of litigation made it clear that merely pointing out the illegality would have no impact on government.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal seriously considered the possibility that Kate could have, within the 40 months she waited, obtained an interdict forcing the government to decide her application. Ultimately, this option was rejected for two reasons. First, persons who relied on social grants were amongst the poorest in society and they 'can be expected to have little or no knowledge of where their rights lie nor the resources readily to secure them'.[2] Second, given the existence of numerous other cases like Kate, a requirement that interdicts be sought in all of them would simply render impotent an already dysfunctional process.[3] Significantly, Nugent JA rejected an argument that damages would place an undue drain on the public purse in the following strident terms: 'the cause for that is the unlawful conduct of the provincial administration and it does not justify withholding a remedy.'[4] A final, vital element of Kate is that the damages did not cover financial loss. 'To be held in poverty is a cursed condition,' wrote Nugent JA. Kate was therefore entitled to compensation for both the physical discomfort and the reduction in her human dignity that her continued endurance of that condition caused.[5]

(bb) Punitive damages

The question of punitive damages was thoroughly considered by the Constitutional Court in Fose v Minister of Safety and Security. The applicant had been severely assaulted and tortured while in police custody. He also alleged that police torture and abuse were widespread at that police station. He asked the Court not only for delictual damages for his physical and emotional suffering, but for constitutional damages which, in addition to vindicating the right and compensating the applicant for loss suffered, would aim (a) to deter and to prevent future infringements of fundamental rights by the legislative and executive organs of State at all levels of government; and (b) to punish those organs of State whose officials had infringed fundamental rights in a particularly egregious fashion.[6]

The Fose Court refused to award any constitutional damages: of greatest import, perhaps, was its rejection of punitive damages. The majority adumbrated

[1] Kate (supra) at paras 28–29.
[2] Ibid at para 31.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at para 32.
[5] Ibid at para 33.
[6] Fose (supra) at para 17.

twelve criticisms of punitive constitutional damages.[1] However, it appears that the two most telling concerns were the unfairness and ineffectiveness of punitive damages. Ackermann J held that punitive damages in civil cases were generally inappropriate as it would give an aggrieved party the 'option to inflict for his own benefit punishment by a method which denies to the offender the protection of the criminal law'.[2] He also questioned whether an award of damages would really serve to decrease instances of police abuse in the current South African context:

> For awards to have any conceivable deterrent effect against the government they will have to be very substantial and, the more substantial they are, the greater the anomaly that a single plaintiff receives a windfall of such magnitude. . . . In a country where there is a great demand generally on scarce resources, where the government has various constitutionally prescribed commitments which have substantial economic implications and where there are 'multifarious demands on the public purse and the machinery of government that flow from the urgent need for economic and social reform', it seems to me to be inappropriate to use these scarce resources to pay punitive constitutional damages to plaintiffs who are already fully compensated for the injuries done to them, with no real assurance that such payment will have any deterrent or preventative effect. It would seem that funds of this nature could be better employed in structural and systemic ways to eliminate or substantially reduce the causes of infringement.[3]

However, despite these strong misgivings about punitive damages, the majority made it clear that its decision was limited to the facts of the specific case and left open the door for the possibility of punitive awards in future matters.[4] It would, however, be accurate to describe Fose as creating a presumption against punitive damages.[5]

[1] Fose (supra) at para 65 read with para 71 ((a) Punitive damages run counter to the tradition of 'carefully calculated compensatory damages'; (b) an expanded notion of the type of damages available for individual damages can achieve the same goal without shifting the focus from the individual; (c) there is no empirical evidence that punitive damages have any deterrent effect; (d) even if punitive damages can lead to systemic change, other relief can achieve the same goal faster; (e) punitive damages are too forward looking, detracting from the wrong actually suffered by the claimant; (f) 'it provides an unjustifiable windfall'; (g) funds can be better spent on directly improving the problems; (h) there is no warrant for punitive damages where the problem cannot be solved by deterrence; (i) the symbolic importance of rights can be demonstrated as well by non-pecuniary relief; (j) punitive damages are inappropriate in class actions; (k) they exact punishment without the safeguards of the criminal process; and (l) such awards against the government will ultimately be borne by the taxpayers.)

[2] Ibid at para 70 quoting Lord Devlin in Rookes v Barnard [1964] AC 1129, 1230 (HL).

[3] Fose (supra) at paras 71–72 (footnote omitted).

[4] Ibid at paras 20–21 and 74. Two judges took slightly different views on the correct approach to punitive damages. Didcott J felt the logic of Ackermann J's judgment served to completely rule out the possibility of punitive damages in any case. Ibid at para 86. Kriegler J preferred to limit his finding even more closely to the facts of the case where a punitive order was unlikely to solve the systemic problems described by the applicant. He left completely unanswered the possibility of punitive damages in other cases. Ibid at para 103.

[5] See J Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 9–11.

(cc) Nominal damages

Finally, damages could be awarded merely as a symbolic means to vindicate a plaintiff's right. This award would occur where the plaintiff had not suffered any actual damages and no punitive damages were required. Although not deciding the issue, the Fose Court had considerable doubts whether, even in the case of the infringement of a right which does not cause damage to the plaintiff, an award of constitutional damages in order to vindicate the right would be appropriate for purposes of [IC] s 7(4). The subsection provides that a declaration of rights is included in the concept of appropriate relief and the Court may well conclude that a declaratory order combined with a suitable order as to costs would be a sufficiently appropriate remedy to vindicate a plaintiff's right even in the absence of an award of damages.[1]

It is difficult to argue that, as far as symbolic value goes, damages will have any more force than a finding of invalidity or a declaration of rights.

(iii) Is the quantum of damages a constitutional matter?

The Constitutional Court's jurisdiction is limited by FC 167(3) to 'constitutional matters' and 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters'.[2] In order for the Court to reconsider a quantum of a damages award handed down by a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal, a litigant must convince the Court that it falls into one of those two categories. Given the Court's liberal approach to its jurisdiction — which has allowed the Court to recognise and to reinterpret traditional common-law issues, such as defamation or bodily injury claims as constitutional challenges — it is somewhat surprising that the Court has resisted a similar reconceptualization of damages.

However, it has not entirely shied away from using our basic law to rethink time-honoured approaches to damages. The Court recently engaged in a rather interesting — albeit unresolved — debate on damages in Dikoko v Mokhatla.[3]. Dikoko concerned defamation in the environment of a municipal council. The main application related to whether the statement was protected by the councillor's legislative privilege. The Court found that it was not. It then considered whether Dikoko's claim that the High Court's award of damages was too high raised a constitutional issue. Moseneke DCJ, for the majority, argued that defamation affects the right of freedom of speech and dignity and therefore concerns constitutional rights.[4] He reasoned that '[t]here appears to be no sound reason why common law remedies, which vindicate constitutionally entrenched rights,

[1] Fose (supra) at para 68.

[2] For more on the jurisdiction of the Court, see S Seedorf 'Jurisidction' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June) Chapter 4.

[3] 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Dikoko').

[4] Ibid at para 90.

should not pass for appropriate relief within the reach of section 38', thus rendering the quantum a constitutional issue.[1] He noticed that especially high awards in defamation cases would have a 'chilling effect' on freedom of speech which is the 'lifeblood of an open and democratic society'.[2] However, despite holding that 'there is a very strong argument to be made that the assessment of damages in a defamation suit is a constitutional matter,' the majority avoided deciding the issue. Instead, it found that interference with the High Court's award was not justified.[3] Mokgoro J, with whom Nkabinde J concurred, were inclined to decrease the quantum and were forced to conclude, for the reasons given by Moseneke DCJ, that the question of quantum raised a constitutional issue.[4] Sachs J agreed with Mokgoro J, but wrote separately to emphasise the need for a more restorative approach to damages claims.

By contrast, Skweyiya J held that the quantum of damages generally does not raise a constitutional matter or issues connected with constitutional matters. He emphasised that despite the wide impact of the Final Constitution, a line had to be drawn somewhere between constitutional and non-constitutional issues.[5] He argued, with reference to earlier decisions,[6] that a mere disagreement with the High Court on its finding of quantum on the facts of the case, without some general challenge to the rule on which it relied, could not raise a constitutional issue. However, Skweyiya J conceded that '[i]t is possible that in a future case an applicant will be able to show that as a result of the way in which the lower court judge evaluated the factors a constitutional right is violated; or that the judge failed to infuse the values of the Constitution into the process whereby he settled on an amount of damages to be awarded.'[7] Such a case might raise a constitutional issue, he argued, but Dikoko was not such a case.

The possibilities envisaged by Skweyiya J arose in NM & Others v Smith & Others.[8] NM concerned the non-consensual disclosure of the HIV status of three

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 91.
[2] Ibid at para 92.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at paras 53–54.
[5] For more on what constitutes a constitutional issue, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11; Seedorf 'Juridiction' (supra) at Chapter 4.
[6] S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC)(appeal against factual findings of a criminal court not a constitutional matter) and Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Safety & Security 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC)(whether employer liable for employee's actions on a particular set of fact not a constitutional matter.) The holding in Boesak and especially Phoebus Apollo have been somewhat undermined by the decision in K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)(accepted that vicarious liability almost always raises constitutional issues). See further, Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at Chapter 4; C Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa" (2005) 21 SAJHR 512.
[7] Dikoko (supra) at para 135.
[8] 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)('NM').

women in the biography of a prominent politician. The High Court partly upheld their claim but in determining damages took into account the fact that the women were poor and illiterate and that it was unlikely that other people in their community would read the book.[1] The majority of the Constitutional Court, including Skweyiya J, agreed that consideration of these factors was inappropriate and that the High Court had failed to give sufficient weight to the claimants' rights to dignity and privacy.[2] It accordingly increased the damages from R15 000 to R35 000. Although it never specifically declared the issue a constitutional matter or explained why thought it was, it is clear that they considered it such.

Ultimately, it seems that the conclusion that the amount damages in a constitutional matter is also a constitutional matter will most likely prevail. It has the tentative support of seven judges. Another three were willing to eschew their caution and hold that it is. However, there is much to be said for Skweyiya J's objection. One must wonder whether the Court would find it had jurisdiction where an applicant in, say, a medical negligence case, did not question the merits of the High Court's decision but only the quantum of damages awarded. A medical negligence claim, like a defamation claim, requires a court to consider important constitutional rights: the right to bodily integrity. A particularly high award could discourage any innovation by doctors, while a low award would seem to tolerate negligence. A similar analysis could be constructed for most non-commercial common-law damages claims. Do they all fall within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court? The reasoning in Dikoko would suggest that they do. It was, perhaps, this rather drastic consequence that motivated the majority of judges to prefer not to finally decide the issue.

Until the Court is confronted with a case where damages are the only issue, they are likely to leave this new and potential radical 'doctrine' undecided. Until then, an easier path, both for litigants and the Court will be to argue that where the gravamen of the complaint constitutes a constitutional challenge, as in Dikoko, the issue of quantum is an 'issue connected to a decision on a constitutional matter'. This reasoning may limit the number of cases that fall within the Court's jurisdiction, but still enable it to intervene in most cases where it finds the award of damages to be inappropriate.

(b) Individual Declaratory Relief

(i) The nature of the power

FC s 38 makes specific provision for a court to grant a 'declaration of rights'. A declaration of rights does not invalidate any laws or actions. It simply declares that certain conduct fails to meet constitutional standards or specifies what conduct would meet those standards. Jonathan Klaaren describes a declaration of rights in the following terms:

[1] NM (supra) at para 75.
[2] Ibid at paras 74–75 and 81.

> By declaring the shape and content of the fundamental rights at issue — although not enforcing them directly in terms of any order — a court may employ a remedy that in a sense goes beyond the usual defensive remedy of refusing to apply an unconstitutional law. A declaration of rights purports merely to clarify but not to alter an unconstitutional law.[1]

The importance of the distinction between clarity and invalidity arose clearly in Hlophe v The Constitutional Court of South Africa & Others.[2] The facts are notorious. The Constitutional Court issued a public statement that it had lodged a complaint with the Judicial Services Commission ('JSC') against Judge President John Hlophe for attempting to influence their decision on the validity of search warrants executed against ANC President Jacob Zuma.[3] Hlophe JP took exception to the complaint being made public and, in addition to lodging a counter-complaint with the JSC, applied to the Johannesburg High Court for a declaration that the Constitutional Court had violated a range of his constitutional rights, particularly his rights to be heard, to dignity and to equality. Because of the unusual circumstances of the case, it was heard by a bench of five judges that produced three judgments. Hlophe argued that if the High Court found that his rights were violated, they were obliged under FC s 172(1)(a) to declare them as such. All three judgments rejected this proposition because what was sought was not invalidity, but a declaration of rights.[4] The distinction is made clear by considering, as Marais J did, the absurd consequences of a declaration of invalidity:

> we would … have to make an order 'that the publication of a media statement by the Constitutional Court judges was invalid'. What exactly would this mean? The act complained of was done; it cannot be undone. In what sense was it 'invalid'? Are we declaring it to have no force and effect? The applicant's very complaint is that it has a most detrimental force and effect and invades his rights. That cannot be undone by a declaration of invalidity.[5]

A declaration of rights would not suffer from this same absurdity because it would not claim to undo anything but merely state that rights had been violated.

The general approach taken in Hlophe is certainly correct: a declaration of invalidity can only apply to conduct that has legal effect. It is senseless to talk about invalidating something that was never 'valid'. In these cases, courts clearly do have a discretion to grant or to refuse to issue a declaration of rights.

However, while the Hlophe court was entitled not to issue an order of invalidity, Kriegler J in Hugo v President of the Republic of South Africa had no such luxury.[6] The [1] Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' (supra) at 9–8A.

[2] [2008] ZAGPHC 289 ('Hlophe'). To avoid confusion, please note that the paragraph numbers of the unreported version of the judgment restart at the beginning of each of the two dissenting opinions.

[3] That decision was handed down several weeks later. Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others; Zuma & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others [2008] ZACC 13.

[4] Hlophe (supra) at para 108 (Mojapelo DJP), para 26 (Gildenhuys J)('The publication of the media statement has happened. A declaration of invalidity cannot change that.') and paras 3–9 (Marais J).

[5] Ibid at para 9.

[6] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo').

Court was required to determine whether a Presidential order freeing female prisoners if they had children under the age of 12, but not their male counterparts was discriminatory on the basis of sex or gender. Kriegler J found, in dissent, that the Presidential order constituted unfair discrimination and was then faced with the difficult issue of what order to make. An order of invalidity would mean that the mothers who had already been released would — absent a further Presidential order — have to be re-incarcerated. An order extending the reach of the President's order would release a large portion of the criminal population. To avoid these unwanted consequences, Kriegler J did not declare the order invalid but issued a declaration that the Presidential order violated the right to equality.[1] While one sympathises with the difficult position that Kriegler J was in, the Presidential order, unlike the publication at issue in Hlophe, had legal effect and the Court was therefore obliged, under FC s 172(1)(a) to declare it invalid. The same result could have been achieved by limiting the retrospective effect of the order of invalidity so that the mothers who had been released would not have to be incarcerated and no male prisoners would be released.

Before we get to the more interesting discussion of when declarations can actually be granted, it is necessary to consider the source of the power to make a declaration of rights. Hlophe provides a useful lens through which to analyse this problem. Mojapelo DJP held that the power rested in s 19(1)(a)(ii) of the Supreme Court Act[2] read with FC s 38.[3] Gildenhuys J held that the power came from FC s 38, but then applied it with heavy reliance on s 19(1)(a)(ii).[4] Marais J agreed that FC s 38 was the fountainhead of the power but did not refer to the statutory discretion in his discussion of how it should be exercised. All three approaches have some merit, but none are entirely correct.

Firstly, FC s 38 applies only to violations of the Bill of Rights, not to other provisions of the Final Constitution. It is therefore only the remedial source in fundamental rights challenges. When other constitutional provisions are at stake, litigants can rely on the 'just and equitable' jurisdiction in FC s 172(1)(b).[5] Secondly, s 19(1)(a)(ii) cannot be the source of the power where constitutional rights are concerned. The power flows solely from FC ss 38 and 172(1)(b). Thirdly, the case law that has developed to interpret s 19(1)(a)(ii) has no precedential value in so far as the exercise the constitutional discretion is concerned. The considerations relied on by courts interpreting that statutory provision may, however, be persuasive if they provide sound normative guidance.

[1] Hugo (supra) at paras 87–88.
[2] Act 59 of 1959.
[3] Hlophe (supra) at para 108.
[4] Ibid at para 26.
[5] See Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Rail Commuters') at para 106.

(ii) When should declarations be ordered?

Before I begin, I must repeat that I am not here concerned with declarations for remedying systemic problems.[1] We are still occupied by individual rights violations.

There are not, as yet, any clear constitutional principles for when declaratory relief should be granted. It is useful to briefly look at the principles for relief under s 19(1)(a)(ii). There are two requirements for a declaration under this section: 'First the Court must be satisfied that the applicant is a person interested in an "existing, future or contingent right or obligation", and then, if satisfied on that point, the Court must decide whether the case is a proper one for the exercise of the discretion conferred on it.'[2] The first leg will obviously be satisfied if a constitutional right is at issue. The meaning of the second leg was given the following gloss in Adbro investment Co Ltd v Minister of Interior & Others :

> For a case to be a proper case, in my view, generally speaking it would require to be shown that despite the fact that no consequential relief is being claimed or perhaps could be claimed in the proceedings, yet nevertheless justice or convenience demands that a declaration be made, for instance as to the existence of or as to the nature of a legal right claimed by the applicant or of a legal obligation said to be due by a respondent. I think that a proper case for a purely declaratory order is not made out if the result is merely a decision on a matter which is really of mere academic interest to the applicant. I feel that some tangible and justifiable advantage in relation to the applicant's position with reference to an existing future or contingent legal right or obligation must appear to flow from the grant of the declaratory order sought.[3]

The idea of 'tangible' advantage is misleading. At common law, declarations would be avoided because of the courts' general aversion to deciding hypothetical cases. The Final Constitution has, however, vastly increased standing rules and is aimed at regulating society and future conduct, not only resolving past disputes between individuals.[4] The question is not therefore whether declaratory relief has a 'tangible' impact, but whether it is the most appropriate relief available. If damages or interdicts are unavailable, declaratory relief will often be an appropriate fall-back in constitutional litigation.

For example, declaratory relief has been used in cases that are already moot because the order retains symbolic value. In Pillay, a high school student successfully challenged her school's decision to prevent her from wearing a nose stud to school as part of her Hindu Tamil religion and culture. However, by the time final appeal was decided in the Constitutional Court, she had already left school.

[1] See § 9.6*(a)* infra.

[2] Durban City Council v Association of Building Societies 1942 AD 27, 32 quoted with approval in Hlophe (supra) at para 28 (Gildenhuys J).

[3] 1961 (3) SA 283, 285B-D (T) quoted with approval in Hlophe (supra) at para 31 (Gildenhuys J).

[4] See generally on standing, C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7.

O'Regan J, in dissent, held that as the matter was moot, a declarator was not just and equitable.[1] Chief Justice Langa, writing for the majority, rejected this proposition. He held: 'The declarator is simply a reflection of this Court's findings. A failure to grant a declarator would, to my mind, fail to vindicate [the student]'s right and would therefore not qualify as effective relief.'[2] Langa CJ is clearly correct. Although the declaration would neither elucidate the legal positions of the parties nor regulate their future conduct, a declaration of rights has the psychological and the symbolic effect that a mere finding in a judgment does not.[3] In short, it provides an important reminder of the potential consequences of any similar future violation.

The symbolic value of a declaration was also part of the motivation behind the order in Mohamed.[4] The applicants had been illegally removed from South Africa to face trial in the USA. No more powerful relief could be granted because the applicants were already in US custody. In rebuffing assertions by the government that no appropriate relief was available, the Court stressed that 'quite apart from the particular interest of the applicants in this case, there are important issues of legality and policy involved and it is necessary that we say plainly what our conclusions as to those issues are.'[5] A declaration was therefore necessary.[6]

Perhaps the best instance for declaratory relief occurs where there is uncertainty as to the respective obligations of the parties and they have come to court solely to seek clarity on the legal position.[7] For example, in South African Police Service v Public Service Association, a dispute arose as to whether the National Commissioner had a discretion to continue to employ a person when their post was upgraded or if the person had to automatically be employed in the upgraded post.[8] The lack of clarity caused significant disruption: many disgruntled employees had taken their cases to arbitration.[9] The case was brought in order to obtain

[1] KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education v Pillay 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) at para 183.

[2] Ibid at para 115.

[3] This effect is perhaps also what motivated Kriegler J in Hugo.

[4] Mohamed & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 71.

[6] The Court also noted that the declaration might have some real practical effect if it was sent to the US court where the applicants were being tried. Ibid.

[7] See Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Rail Commuters') at paras 106–109. See also Alexkor v The Richtersveld Community 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC)(The only issue before the Court was whether the community in question was entitled to the return of their land in terms of the Restitution of Land Act. The Richtersveld Court simply declared that they were without determining how that return would be facilitated); Shilubana & Others v Nwamitwa [2008] ZACC 9; Shilubana & Others v Nwamitwa (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (2) SA 432 (SCA); Nwamitwa v Philla & Others 2005 (3) SA 536 (T)(The applicant in this case sought a declarator that he was the rightful hosi (chief) of the Valoyi community. The order was granted by the High Court and the SCA and refused by the Constitutional Court. Because the parties sought only a clarification of their legal rights, a declarator was the only remedy on the table.)

[8] 2007 (3) SA 521 (CC), [2007] 5 BLLR 383 (CC)('SAPS').

[9] Ibid at para 4.

clarity on the extent of Commissioner's powers.[1] The Court's eventual order was a simple declarator giving the Commissioner a limited discretion that gave the parties guidance for the future.[2] South African Police Service, like many cases of this nature, is interesting because a remedy is granted where no right has been violated. This phenomenon is discussed in more detail above.[3]

Similarly, declarators are also appropriate where the law has changed because of the influence of the Final Constitution and it would be unfair to immediately impose liability on a party who relied upon the legal position under the Interim Constitution or the pre-constitutional democratic era. Under such circumstance, it may be more appropriate to simply declare the new position under the Final Constitution and give the party an opportunity to comply. Thus, when the High Court developed the common law to impose a duty on paternal grandparents to support their extra-marital grandchildren, it did not order the grandparents at issue to pay any money. It simply declared that they now had a legal duty to do so.[4]

A number of other important principles emerge from the dissenting judgments in Hlophe.[5] Both Gildenhys J and Marais J found that a decalaration of rights was inappropriate for several reasons. Firstly, if the declaration bound the JSC, it might well usurp its constitutionally assigned jurisdiction, which Hlophe had accepted by lodging a complaint with that body, to decide the complaint.[6] Secondly, and alternatively, if the court's decision could not bind the JSC, it would make no sense to have the issue adjudicated twice.[7] Marais J articulated the objections against having two tribunals decide the same issue as follows:

> It is inherently undesirable that two tribunals inquire into the same conduct, this being a waste of time, money and expertise. But more than that the two tribunals particularly where there are different methods of arriving at a decision might come to different conclusions. This in itself is undesirable but even more undesirable is that this is a high profile matter and the public perception has to be taken into account. The judiciary would inevitably be subject to a loss of confidence in the public eye should there be such different results, as the public will be unable to understand the effect of different methods of deciding the same dispute. The public would simply say that judges cannot agree on what occurred and that will leave them in the dark in a matter of this public moment and exposure. This is highly undesirable.[8]

[1] SAPS (supra) at para 5.
[2] Ibid at para 37.
[3] See § 9.2*(b)*(iv) supra.
[4] Petersen v Maintenance Officer & Others 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C).
[5] The majority judgment of Mojapelo DJP simply asserted, without discussion, that delaratory relief was appropriate. Hlophe (supra) at para 108.
[6] Ibid at paras 37–41 and 45–46 (Gildenhuys J) and para 35 (Marais J).
[7] Ibid at paras 42–44 (Gildenhuys J).
[8] Ibid at para 34.

Similarly, and thirdly, if the purpose of the claim was to pave the way for a future damages claim, then it would result in a twofold process which was itself enough reason not to grant the order.[1] Finally, Gildenhuys J stressed that declaratory relief was not appropriate for mere unfair treatment. The treatment also had to violate a statutory or constitutional right.[2]

A Court will also be disinclined to settle for a declaration where it has reason to believe that the government will not comply with the order. Thus, in MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate, the Supreme Court of Appeal found that the Eastern Cape provincial government's continued failure to comply with court orders compelling them to provide social welfare was sufficient reason to reject the possibility of declaratory relief.[3]

(c) Interdictory Relief

(i) Interdicts versus declarations

Unlike declarations of rights, interdicts not only declare what the legal position is, they order a party to perform, or not to perform, a specific act. They are therefore far more powerful remedies. A party that fails to comply with an interdict risks being held in contempt of court. Despite, or perhaps because of, the additional power of an interdict, the Constitutional Court has expressed some hesitation in employing it in place of simple declaratory relief. The reason for this approach seems to be based upon respect for the other arms of government: absent indications to the contrary, it is necessary for the courts to presume that the other branches of government will comply with its declarations without the threat of an interdict requiring them to do so.[4] That expectation of good faith is particularly apt when a court considers a supervisory interdict.[5] In sum, courts should be hesitant to employ an interdict if the same result can be obtained through declaratory relief.

(ii) Interim interdicts

Interim interdicts can be given prior to the final determination of a matter to ensure that no irreparable harm is suffered before the matter is finally determined. The requirements for an interim interdict at common law are four-fold:

[1] Hlophe (supra) at paras 48–49 (Gildenhuys J).

[2] Ibid at paras 57–58. Neither Gildenhuys J nor Marais J made a finding whether Hlophe's rights had been violated because they determined first that the remedy sought was inappropriate.

[3] MEC for the Department of Welfare v Kate 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA) at paras 28–29.

[4] Rail Commuters (supra) at para 109.

[5] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) at para 129.

(a) a prima facie right;
(b) a well-grounded apprehension of irreparable harm if the relief is not granted;
(c) that the balance of convenience favours the granting of an interim interdict; and
(d) that the applicant has no other satisfactory remedy.[1]

The Constitutional Court seems to have adopted these principles for interim interdicts flowing from violations of constitutional rights as well.[2] Generally, these principles are appropriate. Because interim interdicts by definition arise when it is impossible to finally decide the issue, an interim interdict should only be granted when absolutely necessary. However, the common law test is not binding on courts exercising their powers under FC ss 38 or 172. If a court feels that it is necessary to grant an interim interdict where one of the four requirements are not met, it is free to do so.

While current rules for interim interdicts remain quite general, we can expect new, more nuanced, rules to develop over time in response to the exigencies of novel constitutional claims. For example, the Supreme Court of Appeal has suggested that prior restraints on publication of, for example, defamatory material will seldom be justified.[3] (Thus a new rule for interim interdicts flows from our commitment to freedom of expression.)

A similar special role for interim interdicts in constitutional law may arise when a party requests the suspension of the enactment of legislation pending a determination of the constitutionality of that legislation. Such a problem arose in United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa.[4] Parliament had passed legislation, including a constitutional amendment, that allowed legislators to change political parties. Various parties urgently challenged the constitutionality of the legislation. The High Court suspended the operation of the laws pending an application to the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court did not suspend the operation of the acts. (However its order did preserve the status quo.) The Court explained that the peculiar circumstances of the case and the immense political uncertainty[5] created by the High Court order and the pending

[1] Hix Networking Technologies v System Publishers (Pty) Ltd and Another 1997 (1) SA 391, 398I-399A (A) quoted with approval in Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another NNO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)('Janse van Rensburg') at para 32.

[2] Janse van Rensurg (supra) at para 32.

[3] 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA) at para 20 ('Where it is alleged, for example, that a publication is defamatory, but it has yet to be established that the defamation is unlawful, an award of damages is usually capable of vindicating the right to reputation if it is later found to have been infringed, and an anticipatory ban on publication will seldom be necessary for that purpose.') For more on prior restraints, see D Milo, G Penfold & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 42.9*(h)*.

[4] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC)('UDM').

[5] It appeared that many politicians had already attempted to change political parties and that this could potentially cause municipal and provincial power to shift from one party to another. Ibid at para 10–11.

constitutional challenge warranted an interim order.[1] The Court made it clear that granting an interim interdict, or what it called a status-quo order, would turn on the particular facts of the case. A litigant would have to prove that 'there is a need to prevent what might otherwise be substantial prejudice.'[2]

While it is clear that status-quo orders turn on the facts of the case, it seems that the following three factors are the most relevant for their issuance:

(a) are there reasonable prospects that the statute will be found unconstitutional?
(b) is there a real prospect of irreparable harm to the applicants or others?
(c) taking into account the public interest, where does the balance of convenience lie?[3]

Interim interdicts have also been regularly employed by the Constitutional Court to regulate the period until a suspension order takes effect. These cases involving interim interdicts and suspension orders are discussed in depth elsewhere in this chapter.[4]

Interim interdicts may also be of service where a High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal wishes to regulate a situation pending the confirmation of an order of invalidity by the Constitutional Court. For example, the High Court prohibited an inquiry in terms of s 415 of the Companies Act from asking questions of a director that might incriminate him in a criminal offence while the Constitutional Court itself was considering the constitutionality of s 415.[5]

(iii) Final interdicts

Final interdictory relief can take the form of either mandatory relief or prohibitory relief. Mandatory relief — normally called a mandamus — obliges a party to act. A prohibitory interdict — often referred to simply as an interdict — compels a party not to act. There is no way to identify the manifold situations in which an interdict will be appropriate other than to (somewhat rather facilely) state that they will be appropriate where the plaintiff wants another person to do or refrain from doing something.

At common law, the requirements for a final interdict are slightly different from those for an interim interdict. These requirements make it both easier and harder to obtain final relief. Easier: there is no need to show that the balance of convenience favours granting an interdict.[6] Harder: instead of a mere prima facie right, an applicant for a final interdict must show a clear right.[7] The requirements

[1] UDM (supra) at paras 9–11.
[2] Ibid at para 12.
[3] J Klaaren 'Judicial Remedies' (supra) at 9–14.
[4] For more on these orders, see § 9.4*(e)*(i)(cc) supra.
[5] Wehmeyer v Lane NO 1994 (2) BCLR 14 (C).
[6] Uthukela District Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2002 (5) BCLR 479 (N).
[7] Ibid.

of irreparable harm and the absence of an alternative remedy apply equally to final interdicts. Again, these common-law rules should be seen as guidelines, not rules when constitutional rights are at stake. Specifically, the court should not feel bound by the 'no alternative remedy' requirement. In fact it would make little sense for them to feel so bound. In many cases where final interdicts might be appropriate, an alternative remedy will be an award for direct constitutional damages. But the Constitutional Court has also held that direct damages are a remedy of last resort. What does a court do when confronted with a choice between two remedies, both of which can only be employed if the other is unavailable? Interdicts should be granted when appropriate, even if other remedies are technically available.

Probably the most common use for an interdict in the constitutional context is to force an official to perform a constitutional duty. Interdicts are used to: force the police to investigate crimes;[1] enforce environmental regulations;[2] force an administrative body to make a decision about registration;[3] require the Legal Aid Board to provide legal aid;[4] force the government to intervene with foreign states for the benefit of a citizen;[5] and make the Minister of Defence negotiate with unions.[6] In these cases interdicts were the only way to fully vindicate the right. The right to a healthy environment at stake in Wildlife Society of Southern Africa could not have been protected by a damages award after the environment

[1] Fullimput 221 CC t/a Hawk Molaba Luxury Tours v Sono & Another; In Combination with Fullimput 221 CC t/a Hawk Molaba Luxury Tours v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 2006 (10) BCLR 1202 (T)(The applicant had obtained an interim order to prevent members of the taxi industry from intimidating or assaulting his employees. When the attacks continued, he requested the police to investigate which the refused to do. Relying on the Police Service's constitutional duty to prevent people from harm, the Court granted an interdict compelling the police to investigate the incidents.)

[2] Wildlife Society of Southern Africa & Others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1996 (9) BCLR 1221 (Tk)(The government had failed to enforce a decree making part of the Transkei coast an ecologically protected area. Various people had been violating the decree with impunity. Relying in part on the constitutional right to a healthy environment, the applicants obtained an interdict forcing the government to enforce the decree.)

[3] Noupoort Christian Care Centre v Minister of National Department of Social Development & Another 2005 (10) BCLR 1034 (T)(The applicant ran a centre for drug addicts. The Minister had granted temporary registration pending compliance with a number of requirements which the applicant said it had fulfilled. The Minister refused to apply his mind to the question of final registration. The court ordered the Minister to take a decision within 1 month.)

[4] Klink v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1997 (10) BCLR 1453 (E)(The applicant believed he was entitled to legal aid for a criminal appeal. The application was dismissed on the grounds that a final decision not to grant legal aid had not yet been taken.)

[5] See Kaunda & Others v The President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)(The applicants wanted the government to ensure they were properly treated while in custody in Zimbabwe); Van Zyl & Others v Government of RSA and Others 2005 (11) BCLR 1106 (T)(Application for diplomatic protection to enforce mining rights in Lesotho refused).

[6] 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T)(Smit J found that FC s 23(5) imposed a duty on the Minister to negotiate with unions, and therefore ordered him to do so.)

had been destroyed. Where an interdict would prevent a crime from taking place, one cannot, in good faith, argue that an award of damages after a person has been the victim of a crime will constitute a full a vindication of the right.

A particularly interesting form of interdict was at play in Hoffmann v South African Airways.[1] Mr Hoffmann was refused employment by SAA on the grounds that he was HIV positive. The Court held that SAA's conduct constituted unfair discrimination. In light of the clear factual finding that, but for his HIV status, Hoffmann would have been employed, the appropriate remedy was instatement. The Court ordered the SAA to employ Hoffmann. Describing the order as the 'fullest possible redress', Ngcobo J expressed the benefits of instatement in these terms:

> Instatement serves an important constitutional objective. It redresses the wrong suffered, and thus eliminates the effect of the unfair discrimination. It sends a message that under our Constitution discrimination will not be tolerated and thus ensures future compliance. In the end, it vindicates the Constitution and enhances our faith in it. It restores the human dignity of the person who has been discriminated against, achieves equality of employment opportunities and removes the barriers that have operated in the past in favour of certain groups, and in the process advances human rights and freedoms for all. All these are founding values in our Constitution.[2]

Instatement should only be denied if there were other considerations rendering it unfair or impractical.[3] No such considerations obtained in this case. Mr Hoffmann was perfectly capable of performing the job. The Court also made the important point that '[w]hat constitutes appropriate relief depends on the facts of each case' and the possibility that granting relief in one case would open a floodgate of other cases should be ignored.[4] While the Court has not applied this reasoning in other remedial contexts, particularly damages,[5] it is certainly a prudent principle to guide the award of final interdicts.

Prohibitory interdicts have been less common. There have simply been fewer instances in which threatened or ongoing violations of constitutional rights have come before the courts. The Constitutional Court did, however, grant a prohibitory interdict in the very first case it heard: S v Makwanyane.[6] The Court declared

[1] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffmann'). See also, for example, Police and Prisons Civil Rights Union & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 971 (E)(Reinstatement was ordered after setting aside as unlawful administrative action the dismissal of a large group of employees.)

[2] Hoffmann (supra) at para 52.

[3] Ibid at para 53.

[4] Ibid at para 55.

[5] See, for example, Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), Steenkamp v Provincial Tender Board, Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC).

[6] S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC).

the legislation providing for the death penalty invalid and, in addition, ordered that 'the State is and all its organs are forbidden to execute any person already sentenced to death'.[1]

Although the following comments do not fall not strictly within the scope of this chapter, I think it important to the manner in which interdicts may function as limits on constitutional rights. For example, in Acting Superintendent-General of Education of Kwazulu-Natal v Ngubo & Others, the respondents were the leaders of a group that had been protesting at the Natal College of Education in favour of more teachers in black high schools.[2] The protest turned belligerent and property was damaged. A temporary order banned further protests. Hurt J was asked to make that order final. The judge acknowledged the importance of the rights to freedom of assembly and to freedom of expression relied upon by the respondents. He found, however, that the rights were not absolute and could be limited by an interdict. In this case, the limitation might be said to have engaged the penumbra of the two rights: the respondents could still get their message across equally, if not more effectively, by other means. He found instead that the more pressing right at stake favoured the applicants: namely the right to be protected from trespass, vandalism and intimidation. The mere fact that the leaders admitted that they were unaware of the unlawful activities of the original protesters constituted sufficient reason to believe that they could not, in good faith, provide an assurance that similar, harmful activities would not occur again.

(d) Contractual relief

The relief granted in terms of contracts can also be affected by — and used to vindicate — constitutional rights. In Mpange & Others v Sithole, the High Court made innovative use of the Final Constitution to justify an order of specific performance.[3] The applicants were lessees of a 'slum'. The abysmal living conditions under which they were forced to live encompassed shelters without partitions between rooms, unhygienic sanitation facilities and general decay.[4] They took their landlord to court in order to force him to improve the conditions as required by the rental contract. Satchwell J noted that specific performance was not traditionally awarded in these cases. Lessees are expected to effect repairs themselves and then claim damages from the lessor. However, in this case, the constitutional rights to housing, dignity and privacy compelled the court to [1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 151. Strictly speaking, the interdict was unnecessary as execution had been made illegal. The Court does not explain why it felt it necessary to include the interdict. Perhaps it wished to make clear that the order applied even to people who had been convicted and sentenced before the Interim Constitution came into force without engaging with the difficulties of retrospective application of the order of invalidity. For more on retrospectivity, see § 9.4*(e)*(ii) supra.

[2] 1996 (3) BCLR 369 (N).

[3] [2007] ZAGPHC 202 ('Mpange').

[4] Ibid at para 7.

develop the common law to permit specific performance to be granted in situations where the lessees could not afford to put up the funds to repair the dwelling themselves.[1] However, the Court eventually decided against an order for specific performance. It noted two significant impediments. First, the owner of the property — to which substantial alterations would have to be made — was not joined. Second, the order would have to be quite specific. The Court found that it lacked sufficient information to make a meaningful order.[2] Instead, the Court ordered a reduction of rent. While not as dramatic as specific performance, this remedy constituted a significant departure from the ordinary common-law position.[3] Mpange deserves special attention from judges, lawyers and academics alike. It demonstrates how all traditional remedies can be radically reconstructed or reconceived when viewed through a constitutional lens.

9.6 Systemic remedies

In this section I discuss three possible remedies for systemic violations: declarations, interdicts and supervisory orders. Supervisory orders are declarations or interdicts over which the court maintains continuing jurisdiction.

(a) Declarations

While it is often perceived as a weak remedy because it creates no direct legal consequences, declaratory relief is often very useful in allowing a court to maintain its own institutional role and to reinforce the duties and the obligations of other branches of government. It is particularly useful when confronting systemic violations of constitutional rights because the steps that need to be taken to address the violations may be detailed and complex, and therefore avoid precise formulation in a court order. The Canadian Supreme Court has put it this way: '[a] declaration as opposed to some kind of injunctive relief, is the appropriate remedy in this case because there are myriad options available to the government that may rectify the unconstitutionality of the current system. It is not this Court's role to dictate how this is to be accomplished.'[4]

This advice was followed by the Constitutional Court in Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail.[5] The applicant was a group representing rail commuters in the Western Cape who were unhappy with the high levels of violence on trains in the area. They argued that the organs of state responsible for the railway had a constitutional duty to ensure commuters' safety which they

[1] Mpange (supra) at paras 48–58.
[2] Ibid at paras 75–82.
[3] Ibid at paras 64–70.
[4] Eldridge v British Columbia (1997) 151 DLR (4th) 577 (SCC) at para 96 quoted in K Roach & G Budlender 'Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When is it Appropriate, Just and Equitable?' (2005) 122 SALJ 325, 338.
[5] 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Rail Commuters').

had failed to fulfil. The Constitutional Court agreed. As a remedy, the applicant sought a supervisory order that would have made sure the state took steps to improve safety on trains.[1] The Court, however, preferred a simple declaration of the state's obligations:

> A declaratory order is a flexible remedy which can assist in clarifying legal and constitutional obligations in a manner which promotes the protection and enforcement of our Constitution and its values. . . . It should also be borne in mind that declaratory relief is of particular value in a constitutional democracy which enables courts to declare the law, on the one hand, but leave to the other arms of government, the executive and the legislature, the decision as to how best the law, once stated, should be observed.[2]

The Constitutional Court has also employed declaratory relief in socio-economic rights cases: the orders in both Grootboom[3] and TAC[4] (in part) defined the scope of the government obligations — under the rights to housing and the right to healthcare respectively. The decisions largely left the creation of 'coordinated and comprehensive programmes' required to fulfill constitutional desiderata to the government.

The benefits of declaratory relief for the separation of powers are twofold. Firstly, it gives the government another chance to eliminate the constitutional infirmity and allows the court to avoid the dangers associated with threats of contempt of court. Secondly, it permits the court to avoid getting too involved in the detail of state administration and limits the court's role to placing an appropriate gloss on the constitutional norm without telling the state how to meet its requirements.

However, declaratory relief for systemic violations can be too weak a remedy. Iacobucci J of the Canadian Supreme Court has identified the following deficiencies: 'declarations can suffer from vagueness, insufficient remedial specificity, an [1] This remedy was granted by the High Court.

[2] Rail Commuters (supra) at para 108.

[3] Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at paras 96 and 99. (The case concerned a group of people who were in a crisis situation and had no access to housing. The Court granted the following delarator:

(a) Section 26(2) of the [Final] Constitution requires the State to devise and implement within its available resources a comprehensive and co-ordinated program progressively to realise the right of access to adequate housing.

(b) The program must include reasonable measures such as, but not necessarily limited to, those contemplated in the Accelerated Managed Land Settlement Program, to provide relief for people who have no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who are living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations.

(c) As at the date of the launch of this application, the State housing program in the area of the Cape Metropolitan Council fell short of compliance with the requirements in para (b), in that it failed to make reasonable provision within its available resources for people in the Cape Metropolitan area with no access to land, no roof over their heads, and who were living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations.)

[4] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC') at para 235 (The Court coupled the declaratory relief with an interdict.)

inability to monitor compliance, and an ensuing need for subsequent litigation to ensure compliance'.[1] In his view, declarations were only appropriate in cases where compliance with the Charter of Rights was optional or where an interdict would make the claimants worse off.[2]

In the South African context, these deficiencies are perhaps even more serious than they are in Canada. Government is generally less efficient and less likely to be able to comply with broad declarations and litigants are not as well-resourced and will find it more difficult to bring subsequent litigation. The post-litigation history of TAC testifies to the inadequacy of simple declaratory orders.[3] While there may still be cases in which they can be productively employed, the general fondness for declarations rather than interdicts expressed in Rail Commuters should be reconsidered. This is especially true considering that there are a number of other remedial devices that bring about the benefits of declaratory orders, without the negative effects. As discussed later, the Court's more recent jurisprudence suggests that they may be more inclined to supervision rather than declaration in the future.[4]

(b) Interdicts

Non-supervisory interdicts have been productively employed to solve systemic problems. For example, in Union of Refugee Women & Others v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority the applicants were refugees who wanted to become security guards.[5] The relevant legislation, which the majority of the Court upheld, generally prohibited refugees from becoming security guards, but made provision for them to be granted an exemption. However, the majority of refugee applicants were unaware of how to apply for this exemption or what information was required because the regulatory authority took no steps to inform them. The Court found this behaviour unacceptable:

> The least that can be done by the Authority is to furnish the refugee applicants with information regarding the existence of various categories of security activities and information regarding the possibility of exemptions and the procedure for applying for them.[6]

[1] Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada (Minister of Justice) [2000] 2 SCR 1120 ('Little Sisters') at para 258 quoted in Roach & Budlender (supra) at 339. See also D Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and its Importance' (2002) 119 SALJ 484, 500–501 (Argues that the Court's declaratory order in Grootboom was inadequate because it was too vague, failed to set deadlines and would be difficult to enforce.)

[2] Little Sisters (supra) at paras 259–260.

[3] See Roach and Budlender (supra) at 334 (Noting that, at least in Mpumalanga 'there was only token compliance.' Only after another application threatening to hold the relevant MEC in contempt did the province comply. 'It is not' according to Roach and Budlender 'over-dramatic to suggest that as a result of the failure by the province to comply effectively with the order of the Constitutional Court a significant number of babies may have been infected with HIV where this was avoidable, with probably fatal consequences.')

[4] See § 9.6*(c)*(iv) infra.

[5] 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC)('Union of Refugee Women').

[6] Ibid at para 83.

The Court accordingly ordered the regulatory authority to make all potential applicants 'aware of the nature of the information that must be furnished in their applications for exemption'.[1] An interdict was also employed in, KwaZulu Natal MEC for Health v Pillay.[2] The Court held that Durban Girls High School had violated a learner's right to equality by not allowing her to wear a nose-stud in school. (The nose-stud was deemed to be an important part of her Hindu religious and cultural identity and practice.) In addition to declaring her right to wear a nose-stud to school, the Court also ordered the school to change its rules so that it would accommodate other learners in a similar position in the future.[3]

Once-off interdicts occupy a halfway station between declarations and supervisory interdicts. Unlike declarations, they are enforceable by an order of contempt. Like declarations, the Court does not retain jurisdiction or supervision over the process, so it is still up to litigants to go to court to enforce the order. If they are unable to do so, then there is no way to force the government to comply with the order.

(c) Supervisory orders

(i) Models for supervision

Supervisory orders[4] come in a variety of forms but share the common characteristic that the performance of the remedy is kept under the supervision of the court. Supervisory orders have two primary purposes: (a) to determine the terms of a more detailed future order; and (b) to ensure that the state[5] complies with an order. A supervisory order can bear one or both of these purposes. The form of the order will generally depend on what the purpose of the order is.

The most common form of the order is an interdict coupled with a requirement that the government submit regular reports on its compliance with this order. These reports are ordinarily submitted to the courts and the other original parties, but can also be ordered to be submitted to other parties who were not involved in the initial litigation.[6] The other parties are given an opportunity to [1] Union of Refugee Women (supra) at para 90.

[2] 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay').
[3] Ibid at para 117.
[4] There are two points to make, one terminological and one structural. One: Supervisory orders are often also referred to as 'structural interdicts'. This is a less accurate term as not all supervisory orders are structural, while all structural orders require supervision. A supervisory order simply entails that the court retains jurisdiction or oversight over the implementation of its order. The term 'structural' implies either that the problem to be solved is with the structure of an institution or is in some sense caused by the structure of power. That need not be the case. Two: The supervisory order can rest either on a declaration or an interdict. The term 'interdict' or 'injunction' is therefore misleading.
[5] There is no reason in South Africa why supervisory orders cannot be used to cure constitutional violations by private parties, particularly corporations. See § 9.2*(f)* supra. However, the primary target will invariably be the state.
[6] S v Z and 23 Similar Cases 2004 (4) BCLR 410 (E).

comment on the reports and the Court will then make another order. The order can also include a specific re-hearing date when the reports will be discussed, or the option of re-hearing can be left open and the Court will only hold a future hearing if the reports seem to make it necessary. This basic form can be used to achieve both the compliance and the determinative purpose. It is also possible that the Court could delegate the monitoring of the case to another body.[1]

When the purpose is primarily to determine what the appropriate relief should be, Sturm has identified five basic models employed in US courts.[2] The first — the traditional adjudicatory model — does not deviate from a courts' ordinary practice in crafting a remedy and is only supervisory if the court maintains jurisdiction over its implementation. The traditional court either makes a decision based on the evidence before it, or leaves it to the defendant to determine what should be done. This has with only a few exceptions been the approach adopted by South African courts.

The second model is 'bargaining' where the parties are encouraged to agree to a remedy. This can be done by forcing negotiation between the parties or appointing a third party to oversee the negotiations or simply requiring the parties to submit proposals and penalising one or both if they fail to reach agreement. A variant of this was used by the Constitutional Court in Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road, Berea Township and 197 Main Street Johannesburg v City of Johannesburg and Others to encourage agreement between the parties.[3] At the hearing the Court issued an order compelling the parties to negotiate to attempt to reach an agreement. They did, and that agreement was made part of the Court's order.

